Individual Rights and Liberties Under the U.S. Constitution

The Case Law of the U.S. Supreme Court

Ioannis G. Dimitrakopoulos

Individual Rights and Liberties Under the U.S. Constitution

The Case Law of the U.S. Supreme Court

Ioannis G. Dimitrakopoulos

Martinus Nijhoff Publishers
Leiden / Boston

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dimitrakopoulos, Ioannis G.
Individual rights and liberties under the U.S. Constitution: the case law of the U.S. Supreme Court / by Ioannis G. Dimitrakopoulos.
p.cm.
Includes index.
ISBN-13: 978-90-04-15791-0
ISBN-10: 90-04-15791-3
1. Civil rights—United States—Cases. 2. United States. Supreme Court.
I. Title.
KF4748.D465 2007
342.7308'5—dc222006048095

Manufactured in the United States of America

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ioannis G. Dimitrakopoulos was born in 1971 in Athens, Greece. In 1993, he received his Law degree (with Honors) from Athens Law School. In 1994, he obtained his Masters degree, in the field of Internal Public Law, from the University Panthéon—Assas (Paris II). In 1998, he graduated at the top of his class from the National School for the Judiciary and was appointed Junior Judge to the Council of State, the Supreme Administrative Court of Greece, which deals mainly with cases involving questions of constitutional, administrative, or European Community law.

During the academic year 2003–2004, he was a Senior Visiting Fellow in the University of California, Berkeley (Earl Warren Legal Institute). In 2005, he was promoted to Associate Judge of the Council of State. He is currently detached to the European Union, serving as a Principal Legal Adviser of the European Ombudsman. His previous publications include the following books (in Greek): Case Law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities and Essential Community Legislation Concerning Environment and European Community Law on Public Procurement.

PREFACE—ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This is a treatise on individual rights and liberties, under the U.S. Constitution, as interpreted by the federal Supreme Court. It contains references to more than 2,500 opinions of the Court, and covers, in a comprehensive way, ten major decisional areas:

- general issues of constitutional rights (e.g., rightholders, state action, affirmative obligations of government, substantive due process, waiver of rights);
- procedural rights (including fundamental rights in criminal procedure);
- personal inviolability and liberty;
- substantive guarantees against criminal or civil penalties;
- personal or family privacy and autonomy;
- searches and seizures;
- freedoms of conscience, thought, belief, and religion (including the Establishment Clause);
- freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and association;
- substantive protection of property rights and economic interests;
- equal protection.

It also includes an introductory chapter on the Supreme Court, its organization, jurisdiction, and procedures and the exercise of judicial review. The cut-off date is January 1, 2006.

The book has been based on an exhaustive research of the relevant materials, conducted mostly through computer databases. In the interest of accuracy, the text stays close to, and often reproduces, the actual language of the Court's opinions. In many cases, the presentation and analysis are based on the Court's own analysis and understanding of its prior decisions.

This book was written, in great part, while I was a Senior Visiting Scholar (for the 2003–2004 academic year) in the Earl Warren Legal Institute (renamed as "Institute for Legal Research"), at the University of California, Berkeley. I cannot thank enough Professor Harry Scheiber, Director of the Institute, Riesenfeld Professor of Law and History, and former President of the American Society of Legal History, for his friendship, valuable guidance, and multiple efforts to make my visit to Boalt Hall, School of Law, as profitable as possible. I also wish to express my thanks to all the others Faculty Members of Boalt Hall who offered me their support, especially to Jesse Choper, Earl Warren Professor of Public Law and to Laurent Mayali, Lloyd M. Robbins Professor of Law.

Ioannis G. Dimitrakopoulos
Strasbourg, November 2006

CHAPTER 1

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT—AN OVERVIEW

A. THE COURT AS AN INSTITUTION

[A1] Article III, Section 1, of the U.S. Constitution states that the "judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The federal judiciary constitutes one of the three co-equal branches of federal government and is independent from the executive and the legislature. Article III, Section 1, "serves both to protect the role of the independent judiciary within the constitutional scheme of tripartite government, . . . and to safeguard litigants' right to have claims decided before judges who are free from potential domination by the other branches of government."[1] The Supreme Court of the United States is at the top of the country's judicial branch.

[A2] The Court consists of nine members, the Chief Justice of the United States and eight Associate Justices. Justices of the Supreme Court are appointed for life by the President of the United States and must be confirmed by a majority vote in the Senate. All of them have been lawyers, although the Constitution does not so require. During the last decades, most of them have been selected among law professors and judges of state or lower federal courts. Usually they are appointed in their 50s and retire (voluntarily) after age 80. They may be removed from office only by first being impeached by a majority vote of the U.S. House of Representatives and then convicted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Every Justice is aided by four law clerks, usually recent top graduates of law schools.

B. THE COURT'S JURISDICTION

1. In General [2]

[A3] A federal court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter if the cause does not "arise under" the federal Constitution, laws, or treaties[3] (or falls within one of the other enumerated categories of Article III), or if it is not a "case or controversy" within the meaning of that phrase in Article III, or if the cause is not one described by any jurisdictional statute.[4] Only in a few cases, such as actions between states or disputes between

---

1 Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 848, 850 (1986).

2 See also para. B89 (Eleventh Amendment).

3 "Dismissal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because of the inadequacy of the federal claim is proper only when the claim is so insubstantial, implausible, foreclosed by prior decisions of th[e] Court, or otherwise completely devoid of merit as not to involve a federal controversy." See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 89 (1998).

4 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 198 (1962).

a state and the federal government, does the Supreme Court have original jurisdiction. For the most part, the Court adjudicates appeals on decisions of lower federal courts and state supreme courts.[5]

2. The "Case or Controversy" Requirement

a. Introduction

[A4] The "case or controversy" limitation serves two complementary purposes. It "limit[s] the business of federal courts to questions presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of resolution through the judicial process," and it "define[s] the role assigned to the judiciary in a tripartite allocation of power to assure that the federal courts will not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of government."[6] The several doctrines that have grown up to elaborate that requirement—not only standing but mootness, ripeness, political question, and the like—are "founded in concern about the proper—and properly limited—role of the courts in a democratic society."[7]

b. Advisory Opinions—Administrative Duties—Rulemaking

[A5] The judicial power to decide cases and controversies does not include the provision of purely advisory opinions to the executive.[8] Indeed, as a general rule, "executive or administrative duties of a nonjudicial nature may not be imposed on judges holding office under Art. III of the Constitution."[9] The purpose of this limitation is "to

---

In Steel Co. v. Citizens For Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83 (1998), the Court declined to endorse the "doctrine of hypothetical jurisdiction," under which a federal court may proceed immediately to the merits question despite jurisdictional objections, at least where (1) the merits question is more readily resolved, and (2) the prevailing party on the merits would be the same as the prevailing party were jurisdiction denied. The Court concluded that "[h]ypothetical jurisdiction produces nothing more than a hypothetical judgment—which comes to the same thing as an advisory opinion, disapproved by this Court from the beginning. . . . The statutory and (especially) constitutional elements of jurisdiction are an essential ingredient of separation and equilibration of powers, restraining the courts from acting at certain times, and even restraining them from acting permanently regarding certain subjects. For a court to pronounce upon the meaning or the constitutionality of a state or federal law when it has no jurisdiction to do so is, by very definition, for a court to act ultra vires." Id. at 101–02.

5 Interpretation of state law: Where the Court is dealing with a state statute on direct review of a state court decision that has construed the statute, such a construction is binding on the Court. See New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 769, n.24 (1982).

Since "district courts and courts of appeals are better schooled in and more able to interpret the laws of their respective States" (see, e.g., Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 500, n.9 (1985)), the Court normally follows lower federal court interpretations of state law (see McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 786 (1997)).

6 Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968).

7 Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 750 (1984), quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975).

8 Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 700 (1997).

9 Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 677 (1988), quoting Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 123 (1976).

help ensure the independence of the Judicial Branch and to prevent the Judiciary from encroaching into areas reserved for the other branches."[10]

[A6] Nevertheless, the Court has recognized certain exceptions to this principle. "Congress may delegate to the Judicial Branch nonadjudicatory functions that do not trench upon the prerogatives of another Branch and that are appropriate to the central mission of the Judiciary."[11] For example, Congress may confer upon the judiciary the power to promulgate federal rules of civil procedure[12] or to make "all necessary orders for the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts."[13] In addition, it may assign to courts or auxiliary bodies within the judicial branch "administrative or rulemaking duties that . . . are necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the judgments which the judicial department has power to pronounce."[14] The Court also has upheld a federal law authorizing appointment of an independent counsel (exercising investigative and prosecutorial authority) by a three-judge panel.[15]

c. Ripeness[16]

[A7] The ripeness requirement is designed to "prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies, and also to protect the agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects felt in a concrete way by the challenging parties."[17] In deciding whether an agency's decision is, or is not, ripe for judicial review, the Court examines "both the fitness of the issues for judicial decision and the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration."[18] As to the "fitness of the issues," the Court takes into account that interpretation "of legislation in advance of its immediate adverse effect in the context of a concrete case may involve too remote and abstract an inquiry for the proper exercise of the judicial function,"[19] that the courts "would benefit from further factual development of the issues presented,"[20] and that "postponing consideration of the questions presented until a more concrete controversy arises may also have the advantage of permitting the state courts further opportunity to construe the provisions."[21] Moreover, the Court considers whether "judicial intervention would inappropriately interfere with further administrative action."[22]

---

10 Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 678 (1988).

11 Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 388 (1989).

12 Sibbach v. Wilson & Co., 312 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1941).

13 Chandler v. Judicial Council, 398 U.S. 74, 86, n.7 (1970).

14 Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 389–90 (1989) (upholding delegation of authority to Sentencing Commission, an independent body in the judicial branch, to promulgate Sentencing Guidelines).

15 Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 677–96 (1988).

16 See also paras. J24–J27 (regulatory takings of property).

17 Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 148–49 (1967).

18 Id. at 149.

19 Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 301 (1998), quoting Longshoremen v. Boyd, 347 U.S. 222, 224 (1954).

20 Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998).

21 Texas v. United States, 523 U.S. 296, 301 (1998).

22 Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 733 (1998).

d. Standing

i. Constitutional Requirements

[A8] The doctrine of standing is an essential part of the case-or-controversy require-

---

The doctrine of "exhaustion of administrative remedies." As analyzed in McCarthy v. Madigan, 503 U.S. 140, 144–49 (1992),

> The Court long has acknowledged the general rule that parties exhaust prescribed administrative remedies before seeking relief from the federal courts. . . . Exhaustion is required because it serves the twin purposes of protecting administrative agency authority and promoting judicial efficiency.
>
> As to the first of these purposes, the exhaustion doctrine recognizes the notion, grounded in deference to Congress' delegation of authority to coordinate branches of government, that agencies, not the courts, ought to have primary responsibility for the programs that Congress has charged them to administer. Exhaustion concerns apply with particular force when the action under review involves exercise of the agency's discretionary power or when the agency proceedings in question allow the agency to apply its special expertise. . . . The exhaustion doctrine also acknowledges the common sense notion of dispute resolution that an agency ought to have an opportunity to correct its own mistakes with respect to the programs it administers before it is haled into federal court. Correlatively, exhaustion principles apply with special force when frequent and deliberate flouting of administrative processes could weaken an agency's effectiveness by encouraging disregard of its procedures. . . . As to the second of the purposes, exhaustion promotes judicial efficiency in at least two ways. When an agency has the opportunity to correct its own errors, a judicial controversy may well be mooted, or at least piecemeal appeals may be avoided. . . . And even where a controversy survives administrative review, exhaustion of the administrative procedure may produce a useful record for subsequent judicial consideration, especially in a complex or technical factual context. . . .
>
> Notwithstanding these substantial institutional interests, federal courts are vested with a virtually unflagging obligation to exercise the jurisdiction given them. . . . Accordingly, the Court has declined to require exhaustion in some circumstances even where administrative and judicial interests would counsel otherwise. In determining whether exhaustion is required, federal courts must balance the interest of the individual in retaining prompt access to a federal judicial forum against countervailing institutional interests favoring exhaustion. . . . Administrative remedies need not be pursued if the litigant's interests in immediate judicial review outweigh the government's interests in the efficiency or administrative autonomy that the exhaustion doctrine is designed to further. (emphasis added) . . . Application of this balancing principle is "intensely practical," . . . because attention is directed to both the nature of the claim presented and the characteristics of the particular administrative procedure provided.
>
> The Court's precedents have recognized at least three broad sets of circumstances in which the interests of the individual weigh heavily against requiring administrative exhaustion. First, requiring resort to the administrative remedy may occasion undue prejudice to subsequent assertion of a court action. Such prejudice may result, for example, from an unreasonable or indefinite timeframe for administrative action. See Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564, 575, n.14 (1973) (administrative remedy deemed inadequate "[m]ost often . . . because of delay by the agency"). See also Coit Independence Joint Venture v. FSLIC, 489 U.S. 561, 587 (1989) ("Because the Bank Board's regulations do not place a reasonable time limit on FSLIC's consideration of claims, Coit cannot be required to exhaust those procedures"); Walker v. S. R. Co., 385

ment of Article III,[23] which remains open to review at all stages of the litigation.[24] The standing inquiry focuses on the party seeking to get his complaint before a federal

---

U.S. 196, 198 (1966) (possible delay of 10 years in administrative proceedings makes exhaustion unnecessary); Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 270 U.S. 587, 591–92 (1926) (claimant "is not required indefinitely to await a decision of the ratemaking tribunal before applying to a federal court for equitable relief"). Even where the administrative decision making schedule is otherwise reasonable and definite, a particular plaintiff may suffer irreparable harm if unable to secure immediate judicial consideration of his claim. Bowen v. City of New York, 476 U.S. 467, 483 (1986) (disability benefit claimants "would be irreparably injured were the exhaustion requirement now enforced against them"); Aircraft & Diesel Equipment Corp. v. Hirsch, 331 U.S. 752, 773 (1947) ("impending irreparable injury flowing from delay incident to following the prescribed procedure" may contribute to finding that exhaustion is not required). By the same token, exhaustion principles apply with less force when an individual's failure to exhaust may preclude a defense to criminal liability. Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 497, n.5 (1977) (plurality opinion); McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, 197 (1969).

Second, an administrative remedy may be inadequate "because of some doubt as to whether the agency was empowered to grant effective relief." Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564, 575 (1973). For example, an agency, as a preliminary matter, may be unable to consider whether to grant relief because it lacks institutional competence to resolve the particular type of issue presented, such as the constitutionality of a statute. See, e.g., Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 497, n.5 (1977); Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 76 (1976). In a similar vein, exhaustion has not been required where the challenge is to the adequacy of the agency procedure itself, such that "the question of the adequacy of the administrative remedy . . . [is] for all practical purposes identical with the merits of [the plaintiff's] lawsuit." Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55, 63, n.10 (1979), quoting Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564, 575 (1973). Alternatively, an agency may be competent to adjudicate the issue presented, but still lack authority to grant the type of relief requested. McNeese v. Bd. of Educ., 373 U.S. 668, 675 (1963) (students seeking to integrate public school need not file complaint with school superintendent because the "Superintendent himself apparently has no power to order corrective action" except to request the Attorney General to bring suit); Montana Bank v. Yellowstone County, 276 U.S. 499, 505 (1928) (taxpayer seeking refund not required to exhaust where "any such application [would have been] utterly futile, since the county board of equalization was powerless to grant any appropriate relief" in face of prior controlling court decision).

Third, an administrative remedy may be inadequate where the administrative body is shown to be biased or has otherwise predetermined the issue before it. Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. at 575, n.14; Houghton v. Shafer, 392 U.S. 639, 640 (1968) (in view of Attorney General's submission that the challenged rules of the prison were "validly and correctly applied to petitioner," requiring administrative review through a process culminating with the Attorney General "would be to demand a futile act"); Association of National Advertisers, Inc. v. FTC, 201 U.S. App.D.C. 165, 170–171, 627 F.2d 1151, 1156–1157 (1979) (bias of Federal Trade Commission chairman), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 921 (1980). See also Patsy v. Florida International University, 634 F.2d 900, 912–913 (CA5 1981) (en banc) (administrative procedures must "not be used to harass or otherwise discourage those with legitimate claims"), rev'd on other grounds, Patsy v. Board of Regents of Florida, 457 U.S. 496 (1982).

[23] See, e.g., Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992).

[24] See, e.g., Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 546–47 (1986).

court,[25] although that inquiry "often turns on the nature and source of the claim asserted."[26] The standing question, in its Article III aspect, is whether the plaintiff has "alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to warrant his invocation of federal court jurisdiction and to justify exercise of the court's remedial powers on his behalf."[27]

[A9] It has been established by a long line of cases that a party seeking to invoke a federal court's jurisdiction must demonstrate three things:

> (1) injury in fact, by which the Court means an invasion of a legally protected interest that is
>
> (a) concrete and particularized, and
>
> (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical;
>
> (2) a causal relationship between the injury and the challenged conduct, which means that the injury fairly can be traced to the challenged action of the defendant, and has not resulted from the independent action of some third party not before the court; and
>
> (3) a likelihood that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision, by which it is meant that the prospect of obtaining relief from the injury as a result of a favorable ruling is not too speculative.[28]

These elements—injury in fact, causation, and redressability—are the "irreducible minimum" required by the Constitution,[29] and the party invoking federal jurisdiction bears the burden of establishing their existence.[30]

[A10] The "injury in fact" requirement "helps assure that courts will not pass upon abstract, intellectual problems, but adjudicate concrete, living contests between adversaries."[31] "The complainant must allege an injury to himself that is "distinct and palpa-

---

[25] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 99 (1968).

[26] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500 (1975).

[27] Id. at 498–99. The question of standing is not subject to waiver. See United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 742 (1995). The federal courts are under an independent obligation to examine their own jurisdiction, and standing is perhaps the most important of the jurisdictional doctrines. Hence, the Court is required to address the issue even if the courts below have not passed on it, and even if the parties fail to raise the issue before the Court. See FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 230–31 (1990).

[28] Ne. Florida Chapter, Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 663–64 (1993).

[29] Valley Forge Christian College v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 472 (1982).

[30] See FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231 (1990) ("It is a long-settled principle that standing cannot be inferred argumentatively from averments in the pleadings, . . . but rather must affirmatively appear in the record. . . . And it is the burden of the party who seeks the exercise of jurisdiction in his favor, . . . clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute."). See also Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992) ("Since they are not mere pleading requirements, but rather an indispensable part of the plaintiff's case, each element [of standing] must be supported in the same way as any other matter on which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof, i.e., with the manner and degree of evidence required at the successive stages of litigation.").

[31] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 20 (1998).

ble, . . . as opposed to merely abstract, . . . and the alleged harm must be actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical."[32] The alleged "injury must be legally and judicially cognizable;" the plaintiff must establish that he has suffered an invasion of a legally protected interest that is concrete and particularized.[33] "Particularized" means that "the injury must affect the plaintiff in a personal and individual way."[34]

[A11] The Court has consistently held that a plaintiff "raising only a generally available grievance about government—claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large—does not state an Article III case or controversy."[35] In Frothingham a taxpayer brought suit challenging the constitutionality of the Maternity Act of 1921, which provided federal funding to the states for the purpose of improving maternal and infant health. The injury she alleged consisted of the burden of taxation in support of an unconstitutional regime, which she characterized as a deprivation of property without due process. The Court concluded that the only "injury" was the fact that officials of the executive department of the government were executing and would execute an Act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional. Any tangible effect of the challenged statute on the plaintiff's tax burden was "remote, fluctuating and uncertain." In rejecting this as a cognizable injury sufficient to establish standing, the Court pointed out that "[t]he party who invokes the power [of judicial review] must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid, but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally."[36]

[A12] The taxpayer plaintiffs in Flast sought to enjoin the expenditure of federal funds under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, which they alleged were being used to support religious schools in violation of the Establishment Clause. The Court developed a two-part test to determine whether the plaintiffs had standing to sue. First, because a taxpayer alleges injury only by virtue of his liability for taxes, the Court held that "a taxpayer will be a proper party to allege the unconstitutionality only of exercises of congressional power under the taxing and spending clause of Art. I, § 8, of the Constitution." Second, the Court required the taxpayer to "show that the chal-

---

[32] Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 155 (1990).

[33] Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 819 (1997).

[34] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, n.1 (1992).

While Congress lacks the constitutional power to abrogate the "injury in fact" requirement, Congress may enact statutes creating legal rights, the invasion of which creates standing, even though no injury would exist without the statute. See Linda R. S. v. Richard D., 410 U.S. 614, 617, n.3 (1973). Congress may thus elevate to the status of legally cognizable injuries concrete, de facto injuries that were previously inadequate in law. See, e.g., Trafficante v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205, 208–12 (1972) (injury to an individual's personal interest in living in a racially integrated community); Hardin v. Kentucky Utils. Co., 390 U.S. 1, 6 (1968) (injury to a company's interest in marketing its product free from competition)]. As the Court has pointed out, "[statutory] broadening [of] the categories of injury that may be alleged in support of standing is a different matter from abandoning the requirement that the party seeking review must himself have suffered an injury." See Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 578 (1992), quoting Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 738 (1972).

[35] Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 573–74 (1992).

[36] Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 487–88 (1923).

lenged enactment exceeds specific constitutional limitations upon the exercise of the taxing and spending power, and not simply that the enactment is generally beyond the powers delegated to Congress by Art. I, § 8." The plaintiffs in Flast satisfied this test because "[t]heir constitutional challenge [wa]s made to an exercise by Congress of its power under Art. I, § 8, to spend for the general welfare," and because the Establishment Clause, on which plaintiffs' complaint rested, "operates as a specific constitutional limitation upon the exercise by Congress of the taxing and spending power conferred by Art. I, § 8." The Court distinguished Frothingham on the ground that Mrs. Frothingham "had relied not on a specific limitation on the power to tax and spend, but on a more general claim based on the Due Process Clause."[37] Thus, the Court reaffirmed that the "case or controversy" aspect of standing is unsatisfied "where a taxpayer seeks to employ a federal court as a forum in which to air his generalized grievances about the conduct of government or the allocation of power in the Federal System."[38]

[A13] Richardson dismissed for lack of standing a taxpayer suit challenging the government's failure to disclose the expenditures of the Central Intelligence Agency, in alleged violation of the constitutional requirement, Article I, Section 9, clause 7, that "a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time." The Court held that such a suit rested upon an impermissible generalized grievance and was inconsistent with the framework of Article III, because the impact on the plaintiff was "plainly undifferentiated and common to all members of the public."[39] In Schlesinger, the Court dismissed, for the same reasons, a citizen-taxpayer suit contending that it was a violation of the Incompatibility Clause (Article I, Section 6, clause 2) for Members of Congress to hold commissions in the military reserves. It said that the challenged action, standing alone, would adversely "affect only the generalized interest of all citizens in constitutional governance."[40]

[A14] In Valley Forge, the Court rejected a claim of standing to challenge a government conveyance of property to a religious institution. The plaintiffs were without standing to sue as taxpayers, because the source of their complaint was not a congressional action but a decision by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to transfer a parcel of federal property, and because the conveyance in question was not an exercise of Congress' authority conferred by the Taxing and Spending Clause (Article I, Section 8), but by the Property Clause (Article IV, Section 3, clause 2). Insofar as the plaintiffs relied simply on "their shared individuated right" to a government that made no law respecting an establishment of religion, the Court held that plaintiffs had not alleged a judicially cognizable injury, noting that "assertion of a right to a particular kind of Government conduct, which the Government has violated by acting differently, cannot alone satisfy the requirements of Art. III without draining those requirements of meaning."[41]

[A15] Whitmore held that a third party has no standing to challenge the validity of a death sentence imposed on a capital defendant who has elected to forgo his right of

---

[37] See Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 479 (1982), discussing Flast.

[38] Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 102–06 (1968).

[39] United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 176–77 (1974).

[40] Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 217 (1974).

[41] Valley Forge Christian College v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 483 (1982).

appeal to the state supreme court. In reaching this conclusion, the Court rejected the notion that Article III permits a citizen-suit to prevent a condemned criminal's execution on the basis of "the public interest protections of the Eighth Amendment."[42]

[A16] "The rule against generalized grievances applies with as much force in the equal protection context as in any other."[43] Allen v. Wright made clear that even if a governmental actor is discriminating on the basis of race, the resulting injury "accords a basis for standing only to those persons who are personally denied equal treatment by the challenged discriminatory conduct."[44] And Hays recognized that a plaintiff who resides in a district that is the subject of a racial gerrymander claim, has standing to challenge the legislation that created that district, but a plaintiff from outside that district lacks standing absent specific evidence that he personally has been subjected to a racial classification, even though the racial composition of his own district might have been different had the legislature drawn the adjacent majority-minority district another way.[45] In the context of apportionment, the Court has held that voters have standing to challenge an apportionment statute, because they assert "a plain, direct and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes."[46]

[A17] "Often the fact that an interest is abstract and the fact that it is widely shared go hand in hand. But their association is not invariable, and, where a harm is concrete, though widely shared, the Court has found 'injury in fact.' . . . Thus, the fact that a political forum may be more readily available where an injury is widely shared (while counseling against, say, interpreting a statute as conferring standing) does not, by itself, automatically disqualify an interest for Article III purposes. Such an interest, where sufficiently concrete, may count as an 'injury in fact.'"[47] That is the case, for example, where large numbers of voters suffer interference with voting rights conferred by law. In Akins, the Federal Election Commission had determined that the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) was not a "political committee" as defined by the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA), and, for that reason, the Commission had refused to require AIPAC to make disclosures regarding its membership, contributions, and expenditures that FECA would otherwise require. The Court held that respondents, a group of voters, had standing to challenge the Commission's determination in court, concluding that "the informational injury at issue here, directly related to voting, the most basic of political rights, is sufficiently concrete and specific such that the fact that it is widely shared does not deprive Congress of constitutional power to authorize its vindication in the federal courts."[48]

---

42 Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 160 (1990).

43 United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 743 (1995).

44 Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 755 (1984) (black school children's parents who claimed a "stigmatizing injury" due to Internal Revenue Service decision to grant tax-exempt status to racially discriminatory private schools had not been personally denied equal treatment, and thus had not been injured). See also Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 489–90, n.26 (1982) (disapproving the proposition that every citizen has "standing to challenge every affirmative action program on the basis of a personal right to a government that does not deny equal protection of the laws").

45 United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744–46 (1995).

46 Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 208 (1962).

47 Federal Election Comm'n v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 24 (1998).

48 Id. at 24–25.

[A18] The alleged harm must be actual or imminent. "Although 'imminence' is concededly a somewhat elastic concept, it cannot be stretched beyond its purpose, which is to insure that the alleged injury is not too speculative for Article III purposes—that the injury is certainly impending."[49] For example, in O'Shea, the Court held there was no case or controversy where residents of an Illinois town sought injunctive relief against a magistrate and a circuit court judge whom the plaintiffs claimed were engaged in a pattern and practice of illegal bond-setting, sentencing, and jury-fee practices in criminal cases. The allegation of plaintiffs in that case amounted to a claim that if they "proceed to violate an unchallenged law and if they are charged, held to answer, and tried in any proceedings before petitioners, they will be subjected to the discriminatory practices that petitioners are alleged to have followed." The Court observed that "[p]ast exposure to illegal conduct does not in itself show a present case or controversy regarding injunctive relief . . . if unaccompanied by any continuing, present adverse effects." Past wrongs were evidence bearing on "whether there is a real and immediate threat of repeated injury." But the prospect of future injury rested "on the likelihood that [plaintiffs] will again be arrested for and charged with violations of the criminal law, and will again be subjected to bond proceedings, trial, or sentencing before petitioners." The Court concluded that the threat to the plaintiffs was not "sufficiently real and immediate to show an existing controversy simply because they anticipate[d] violating lawful criminal statutes and being tried for their offenses."[50] Similarly, Lyons held that a plaintiff lacked standing to seek an injunction against the enforcement of a police chokehold policy, because he could not credibly allege that he faced a realistic threat from the policy.[51]

[A19] In Adarand Constructors, petitioner claimed that the federal government's practice of giving general contractors on government projects a financial incentive to hire sub-contractors controlled by "socially and economically disadvantaged individuals," and, in particular, the government's use of race-based presumptions in identifying such individuals, violated the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The Court held that Adarand did not have to demonstrate that it had been, or would be, the low bidder on a government contract: "the injury in cases of this kind is that a discriminatory classification prevents the plaintiff from competing on an equal footing."[52] Because the evidence in the record of the case indicated that the Department of Transportation was likely to let contracts involving guardrail work containing a sub-contractor compensation clause at least once per year in Colorado, that Adarand was very likely to bid on each such contract, and that Adarand often must compete for such contracts against small disadvantaged businesses, the Court found that

---

49 Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 565, n.2 (1992).

50 O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 495–97 (1974).

51 Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 107, n.7 (1983). The Court noted that "[t]he reasonableness of Lyons' fear is dependent upon the likelihood of a recurrence of the allegedly unlawful conduct," and his "subjective apprehensions" that such a recurrence would even take place were not enough to support standing. Id. at 108, n.8. The Court has likewise thought inadequate allegations of future injury contingent on the prospective future candidacy of a former congressman (see Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103, 109 (1969)), and on police using deadly force against a person fleeing from an as yet uneffected arrest (see Ashcroft v. Mattis, 431 U.S. 171, 172, n.2 (1977)).

52 Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 211 91995).

Adarand had standing to seek declaratory and injunctive relief against any future use of sub-contractor compensation clauses.[53]

[A20] In Allen, parents of black public school children alleged that, even though it was the policy of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) to deny tax-exempt status to racially discriminatory schools, the IRS had not adopted sufficient standards and procedures to enforce this policy. The parents alleged that the lax enforcement caused white students to attend discriminatory private schools and, therefore, interfered with their children's opportunity to attend desegregated public schools. The Court held that the chain of causation between the challenged action and the alleged injury was too attenuated to confer standing: "It is, first, uncertain how many racially discriminatory private schools are in fact receiving tax exemptions. Moreover, it is entirely speculative . . . whether withdrawal of a tax exemption from any particular school would lead the school to change its policies. . . . It is just as speculative whether any given parent of a child attending such a private school would decide to transfer the child to public school as a result of any changes in educational or financial policy made by the private school once it was threatened with loss of tax-exempt status. It is also pure speculation whether, in a particular community, a large enough number of the numerous relevant school officials and parents would reach decisions that collectively would have a significant impact on the racial composition of the public schools."[54]

[A21] In Simon, the respondents challenged an IRS revenue ruling that granted favorable tax treatment to non-profit hospitals that offered only emergency-room services to the poor. The respondents argued that the revenue ruling encouraged hospitals to deny services to indigents. As in Allen, the Court held that the chain of causation was too attenuated: "It is purely speculative whether the denials of service . . . fairly can be traced to [the IRS's] 'encouragement,' or instead result from decisions made by the hospitals without regard to the tax implications. It is equally speculative whether the desired exercise of the court's remedial powers in this suit would result in the availability to respondents of such services. So far as the complaint sheds light, it is just as plausible that the hospitals to which respondents may apply for service would elect to forgo favorable tax treatment to avoid the undetermined financial drain of an increase in the level of uncompensated services."[55] The respondents, thus, failed to carry their burden of showing that their injury was the consequence of the revenue ruling or that prospective relief would remove the harm.

[A22] Similarly, Warth held that low-income persons seeking the invalidation of a town's restrictive zoning ordinance lacked standing, because they failed to show that the alleged injury, inability to obtain adequate housing within their means, was fairly attributable to the challenged ordinance instead of to other factors. The Court noted that plaintiffs relied "on little more than the remote possibility, unsubstantiated by allegations of fact, that their situation might have been better had defendants acted otherwise, and might improve were the court to afford relief."[56]

---

[53] Id. at 212.

[54] Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 752–53, 758 (1984).

[55] Simon v. E. Kentucky Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 42–43 (1976).

[56] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 507 (1975).

Probably the most attenuated injury conferring Article III standing was that asserted by the respondents in United States v. SCRAP, 412 U.S. 669 (1973). There, an environmental group challenged the Interstate Commerce Commission's (ICC) approval of a surcharge on railroad

[A23] In Linda R. S., the mother of an illegitimate child brought an action in U.S. district court to enjoin "discriminatory application" of a Texas Penal Code provision that imposed criminal sanctions on a parent who willfully deserted, neglected, or refused to provide child support. The Texas courts had held that the statute applied only to the parents of legitimate children and did not apply to the parents of illegitimate children. The Court held that the appellant in Linda R. S. did not have standing to challenge the statute, because she had failed to allege a sufficient nexus between her injury and the government's failure to prosecute fathers of illegitimate children. Even "if appellant were granted the requested relief, it would result only in the jailing of the child's father. The prospect that prosecution [would], at least in the future, result in payment of support [could] at best, be termed only speculative."[57]

[A24] Steel Co. v. Citizens for Better Environment [58] involved a private enforcement action under the citizen suit provision of the Emergency Planning and Community Right-To-Know Act of 1986 (EPCRA). Respondent, an association of individuals interested in environmental protection, sued petitioner, a small manufacturing company in Chicago, alleging that petitioner had violated EPCRA by failing to file timely toxic and hazardous chemical storage and emission reports for past years. The complaint asked for

(1) a declaratory judgment that petitioner violated EPCRA;

(2) authorization to inspect periodically petitioner's facility and records (with costs borne by petitioner);

(3) an order requiring petitioner to provide respondent copies of all compliance reports submitted to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA);

(4) an award of all respondent's costs in connection with the investigation and prosecution of this matter, including reasonable attorney and expert witness fees;

(5) an order requiring petitioner to pay civil penalties of $25,000 per day for each violation.

The Court held that respondent lacked standing to sue. Even assuming that petitioner's failure to report EPCRA information in a timely manner, and the lingering effects of that failure, constituted a concrete injury in fact to respondent and its members that freight rates, claiming that the adverse environmental impact of the ICC's action on the Washington metropolitan area would cause the group's members to suffer "economic, recreational and aesthetic harm." Id. at 678. The SCRAP group alleged that "a general rate increase would . . . cause increased use of non-recyclable commodities as compared to recyclable goods, thus resulting in the need to use more natural resources to produce such goods, some of which resources might be taken from the Washington area, and resulting in more refuse that might be discarded in national parks in the Washington area." Id. at 688. The Court held that those pleadings alleged a specific and perceptible harm sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for lack of standing, but also indicated that the United States could have been entitled to summary judgment on the standing issue if it showed that "the allegations were sham and raised no genuine issue of fact." Id. at 689, and n.15. In Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 159 (1990), the Court observed that "the analysis of the standing question in SCRAP . . . surely went to the very outer limit of the law."

---

[57] Linda R. S. v. Richard D., 410 U.S. 614, 618 (1973). The Court also stressed that "a private citizen lacks a judicially cognizable interest in the prosecution or non-prosecution of another." Id. at 619.

[58] Steel Co. v. Citizens for Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83 (1998).

satisfied Article III, the complaint nevertheless failed the redressability test of standing. As to the first item, there being no controversy over whether petitioner had failed to file reports, or over whether such a failure constituted a violation, the declaratory judgment was not only worthless to respondent but also to everybody else. The second or third relief sought by respondent could not conceivably remedy any past wrong but was aimed at deterring petitioner from violating EPCRA in the future; however, respondent had not alleged a continuing violation or the imminence of a future violation. With regard to the fourth item, it is obvious that a plaintiff cannot achieve standing to litigate a substantive issue by bringing suit for the cost of bringing suit. Finally, as the Court explained in Friends of the Earth, Steel Co. established that "citizen suitors lack standing to seek civil penalties for violations that have abated by the time of suit."[59] By contrast, "for a plaintiff who is injured or faces the threat of future injury due to illegal conduct ongoing at the time of suit, a [civil penalty] that effectively abates that conduct and prevents its recurrence provides a form of redress."[60]

ii. Non-Constitutional Prudential Considerations

[A25] In addition to the immutable requirements of Article III, the Court has also adopted several prudential principles that bear on the question of standing, such as the general prohibition on a litigant's raising another person's legal rights and the requirement that a plaintiff's complaint fall within the zone of interests protected by the law invoked.[61] "Like their constitutional counterparts, these judicially self-imposed limits on the exercise of federal jurisdiction . . . are founded in concern about the proper role of the courts in a democratic society, . . . but, unlike their constitutional counterparts, they can be modified or abrogated by Congress."[62]

[A26] "In the ordinary course, a litigant must assert his or her own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest a claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties."[63] However, this fundamental restriction on judicial authority admits to certain, limited exceptions. A "litigant may raise a claim on behalf of a third party if the litigant can demonstrate that he or she has suffered a concrete, redressable injury, that he or she has a close relation with the third party, and that there exists some hindrance to the third party's ability to protect his or her own interests."[64] When "enforcement of a restriction against the litigant prevents a third party from entering into a relationship with the

---

59 Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 187–88 (2000).

60 Id. at 185–86.

61 See, e.g., Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984).

62 Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 162 (1997).

63 Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410 (1991).

64 Edmondson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614, 629 (1991). In Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991), the Court held that a white defendant has standing to challenge racial discrimination against black persons in the use of peremptory challenges. The Court concluded that (1) a defendant suffers a serious injury in fact because discrimination at the voir dire stage "casts doubt on the integrity of the judicial process . . . and places the fairness of a criminal proceeding in doubt;" (2) the excluded juror and criminal defendant have a close relationship—they share a common interest in eliminating discrimination; and (3) given the economic burdens of litigation and the small financial reward available, "a juror dismissed because of race probably will leave the courtroom possessing little incentive to set in motion the arduous process needed to vindicate his own rights." Id. at 411–15. In Edmondson, supra, the Court applied the same analysis in deciding that civil litigants have standing to raise the equal protection rights of jurors excluded on the basis of their race.

litigant (typically a contractual relationship), to which relationship the third party has a legal entitlement, . . . third-party standing has been held to exist."[65] And "next friend" standing has been an accepted basis for jurisdiction in certain circumstances.[66]

[A27] The "zone of interests" formulation was first employed in Data Processing. Section10(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) provides: "A person suffering legal wrong because of agency action, or adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute, is entitled to judicial review thereof." The Court interpreted Section 10(a) of the APA to impose a prudential standing requirement in addition to the requirement, imposed by Article III of the Constitution, that a plaintiff have suffered a sufficient injury in fact. For a plaintiff to have prudential standing under the APA, "the interest sought to be protected by the complainant [must be] arguably within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute . . . in question."[67] Although the "zone of interests" test "denies a right of review if the plaintiff's interests are marginally related to, or inconsistent with, the purposes implicit in the statute, that it cannot reasonably be assumed that Congress intended to permit the suit[,] [t]he test

---

In Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 257 (1953), a covenantor who breached a racially restrictive covenant by selling to blacks was permitted to set up the buyers' rights to equal protection in defense against a damages action by the covenantees. The Court considered that the general rule outweighed "the need to protect [these] fundamental rights" in a situation "in which it would be difficult if not impossible for the person whose rights are asserted to present their grievance before any court."

65 See United States Dep't of Labor v. Triplett, 494 U.S. 715, 720 (1990) (attorney may challenge an attorney's fees restriction by asserting the due process rights of the client), citing Secretary of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 954–58 (1984) (professional fundraiser given third-party standing to challenge statute limiting its commission to 25 percent as violation of clients' First Amendment right to hire him for a higher fee).

66 "A 'next friend' does not himself become a party to the action in which he participates, but simply pursues the cause on behalf of the detained person, who remains the real party in interest. . . . [A] 'next friend' must provide an adequate explanation—such as inaccessibility, mental incompetence, or other disability—why the real party in interest cannot appear on his own behalf to prosecute the action, . . . [and] must be truly dedicated to the best interests of the person on whose behalf he seeks to litigate." See Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 163 (1990). Most frequently, "next friends" appear in court on behalf of detained prisoners who are unable, usually because of mental incompetence or inaccessibility, to seek relief themselves. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 13, n.3 (1955) (prisoner's sister brought habeas corpus proceeding while he was being held in Korea). See also paras. G63–G66 (Fourth Amendment rights); paras. I32 et seq. (freedom of speech and the "overbreadth" doctrine).

67 Ass'n of Data Processing Serv. Orgs., Inc. v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150, 152–53 (1970). There, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (the Comptroller) had interpreted the National Bank Act's incidental powers clause to permit national banks to perform data processing services for other banks and bank customers. The plaintiffs, a data processing corporation and its trade association, alleged that this interpretation was impermissible, because providing data processing services was not, as was required by the statute, an incidental power necessary to carry on the business of banking. The court of appeals had held that the banks' data processing competitors were without standing to challenge the alleged violation of the Act. In reversing, the Court noted that although the relevant federal statutes did not "in terms protect a specified group[,] . . . their general policy is apparent; and those whose interests are directly affected by a broad or narrow interpretation of the Acts are easily identifiable." As competitors of national banks, which were engaging in data processing services, the plaintiffs were within that class of "aggrieved persons" entitled to judicial review of the Comptroller's interpretation. Id. at 157.

is not meant to be especially demanding; in particular, there need be no indication of congressional purpose to benefit the would-be plaintiff."[68]

iii. Particular Questions of Standing[69]

[A28] Equal Protection Claims.[70] "When the government erects a barrier that makes it more difficult for members of one group to obtain a benefit than it is for members of another group, a member of the former group seeking to challenge the barrier need not allege that he would have obtained the benefit but for the barrier in order to establish standing. The 'injury in fact' in an equal protection case of this variety is the denial of equal treatment resulting from the imposition of the barrier, not the ultimate inability to obtain the benefit."[71] To establish standing, therefore, a party challenging a municipal program according preferential treatment to certain minority-owned businesses in the award of city contracts "need only demonstrate that it is able and ready to bid on contracts and that the discriminatory policy prevents it from doing so on an equal basis."[72]

---

[68] Clarke v. Secs. Indus. Ass'n, 479 U.S. 388, 399–400 (1987). See also Nat'l Credit Union Admin. v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 522 U.S. 479, 491–92 (1998). In Clarke, a securities dealers trade association sued the Comptroller, this time for authorizing two national banks to offer discount brokerage services both at their branch offices and at other locations inside and outside their home states. The plaintiff contended that the Comptroller's action violated the McFadden Act, which permitted national banks to carry on the business of banking only at authorized branches and to open new branches only in their home states and only to the extent that state-chartered banks in that state could do so under state law. The Court again held that the plaintiff had standing under the APA. By limiting the ability of national banks to do business outside their home states, "Congress ha[d] shown a concern to keep national banks from gaining a monopoly control over credit and money." The interest of the securities dealers in preventing national banks from expanding into the securities markets directly implicated this concern, because offering discount brokerage services would allow national banks "access to more money, in the form of credit balances, and enhanced opportunities to lend money, viz., for margin purchases." Id. at 403.

Other cases have applied the "zone of interests" test also in suits not involving review of federal administrative action. See Dennis v. Higgins, 498 U.S. 439, 449 (1991); Boston Stock Exch. v. State Tax Comm'n, 429 U.S. 318, 320–21, n.3 (1977). The Court has made clear, however, that the breadth of the zone of interests varies according to the provisions of law at issue, so that what comes within the zone of interests of a statute for purposes of obtaining judicial review of administrative action under the "generous review provisions" of the APA may not do so for other purposes. See Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 163 (1997), citing Clarke v. Secs. Indus. Ass'n, 479 U.S. 388, 400, n.16 (1987).

[69] See also paras. G63–G66 (Fourth Amendment rights); paras. J80–J82 (taking of property).

[70] See also paras. A16, A19–A23.

[71] Ne. Florida Chapter, Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 666 (1993). See also Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 262 (2003) (since petitioner had applied to the University as a freshman applicant, and had been denied admission even though an underrepresented minority applicant with his qualifications would have been admitted, he demonstrated that he was "able and ready" to apply as a transfer student should the University cease to use race in undergraduate admissions; he therefore had standing to seek prospective relief with respect to the University's continued use of race in undergraduate admissions, even though he had not actually applied for admission as a transfer student).

[72] Ne. Florida Chapter, Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 666 (1993).

[A29] "The right to equal treatment guaranteed by the Constitution is not coextensive with any substantive rights to the benefits denied the party discriminated against. Rather, . . . discrimination itself, by perpetuating 'archaic and stereotypic notions' or by stigmatizing members of the disfavored group as 'innately inferior,' and therefore less worthy participants in the political community, . . . can cause serious noneconomic injuries to those persons who are denied equal treatment solely because of their membership in a disfavored group."[73] "In every equal protection attack upon a statute challenged as under-inclusive, the Government may satisfy the Constitution's commands either by extending benefits to the previously disfavored class or by denying benefits to both parties (e.g., by repealing the statute as a whole)."[74] If a severability clause would forbid only the latter and not the former, kind of relief in a case where the plaintiff has been denied monetary benefits allegedly on a discriminatory basis, the injury caused by the unequal treatment allegedly suffered by him may be redressed by a favorable decision, and he therefore has standing to prosecute such an action.[75]

[A30] Abortion Laws. In Roe v. Wade, the Court held that a woman who was not pregnant at the time the suit was filed did not have standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Texas abortion laws. Her alleged injury rested on "possible future contraceptive failure, possible future pregnancy, possible future unpreparedness for parenthood, and possible future impairment of health." However, any one or more of these several possibilities might not take place, and all might not combine. And as to her estimation that these possibilities might have some impact upon her marital happiness, the Court was not prepared to say that "the bare allegation of so indirect an injury is sufficient to present an actual case or controversy."[76]

[A31] A physician has standing to challenge an abortion law that poses for him a threat of criminal prosecution.[77] By contrast, a pediatrician has no standing to litigate the standards of medical practice that ought to be applied to the performance of abortions, for he "has an interest, but no direct stake, in the abortion process."[78] One's claim of conscientious objection to abortion does not provide a judicially cognizable interest; and one cannot assert any constitutional right of the unborn fetus, since "[o]nly the State may invoke regulatory measures to protect that interest [or] the power of the courts when those measures are subject to challenge."[79]

---

73 Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728, 739–40 (1984).

74 Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268, 272 (1979).

75 Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728, 740 (1984).

76 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 128 (1973).

77 Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188 (1973). As noted by the Court, "[t]he physician is the one against whom [the Missouri Act] directly operate[s] in the event he procures an abortion that does not meet the statutory exceptions and conditions. The physician appellants, therefore, assert a sufficiently direct threat of personal detriment. They should not be required to await and undergo a criminal prosecution as the sole means of seeking relief."

In Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 66 (1986), the Court rejected a pediatrician's attempt to defend a state law restricting abortions, because his complaint that fewer abortions would lead to more paying patients was "unadorned speculation" insufficient to invoke the federal judicial power.

78 Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 67 (1986)

79 Id. at 67.

[A32] Environmental Harm.[80] The relevant showing for Article III standing is not injury to the environment, but injury to the plaintiff.[81] Environmental plaintiffs adequately allege injury in fact when "they aver that they use the affected area and are persons for whom the aesthetic and recreational values of the area will be lessened by the challenged activity."[82]

[A33] Commerce Clause Challenges.[83] Cognizable injury from unconstitutional discrimination against inter-state commerce does not stop at members of the class against whom a state ultimately discriminates. "[C]ustomers of that class may also be injured, . . . where the customer is liable for payment of the tax, and, as a result, presumably pays more for the goods it gets from out-of-state producers and marketers. Consumers who suffer this sort of injury from regulation forbidden under the Commerce Clause satisfy the standing requirements of Article III."[84]

---

[80] See also paras. A22, A24.

[81] Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 181 (2000).

[82] Id. at 183, citing Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 735 (1972). A plaintiff claiming injury from environmental damage must use the area affected by the challenged activity, and not an area roughly "in the vicinity" of it. See Lujan v. Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n, 497 U.S. 871, 887–89 (1990). The Court thus has rejected the proposition that "any person who uses any part of a 'contiguous ecosystem' adversely affected by a funded activity has standing even if the activity is located a great distance away." See Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 565–66 (1992).

In the latter case, the Court held that "some day" intentions—without any description of concrete plans, or indeed even any specification of when the "some day" would be—to visit endangered species halfway around the world did not support a finding of "actual or imminent" injury. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 564 (1992). The Court added: "It is clear that the person who observes or works with a particular animal threatened by a federal decision is facing perceptible harm, since the very subject of his interest will no longer exist. It is even plausible—though it goes to the outermost limit of plausibility—to think that a person who observes or works with animals of a particular species in the very area of the world where that species is threatened by a federal decision is facing such harm, since some animals that might have been the subject of his interest will no longer exist, see Japan Whaling Ass'n v. Am. Cetacean Soc., 478 U.S. 221, 231, n.4 (1986). It goes beyond the limit, however, and into pure speculation and fantasy, to say that anyone who observes or works with an endangered species, anywhere in the world, is appreciably harmed by a single project affecting some portion of that species with which he has no more specific connection." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 566–67 (1992).

In Lujan v. National Wildlife Federation, 497 U.S. 871 (1990), an environmental organization assailed the Bureau of Land Management's "land withdrawal review program," a program covering millions of acres, alleging that the program illegally opened up public lands to mining activities. The defendants moved for summary judgment, challenging the plaintiff organization's standing to initiate the action under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 702. The Court held that the plaintiff could not survive the summary judgment motion merely by offering "averments which state only that one of [the organization's] members uses unspecified portions of an immense tract of territory, on some portions of which mining activity has occurred or probably will occur by virtue of the governmental action." Lujan v. Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n, 497 U.S. 871, 889 (1990).

[83] See also paras. A36, A37.

[84] Gen. Motors Corp. v. Tracy, 519 U.S. 278, 286 (1997). There, the Court found that petitioner had standing to challenge an Ohio statute that imposed a general sales and use taxes on natural gas purchases from all sellers, whether in-state or out-of-state, except regulated public utilities meeting Ohio's statutory definition of a "natural gas company." Similarly, in Bacchus

[A34] Legislators. Coleman upheld standing for state legislators claiming an institutional injury. In that case, 20 of Kansas' 40 state senators voted not to ratify the proposed "Child Labor Amendment" to the federal Constitution. With the vote deadlocked 20–20, the amendment ordinarily would not have been ratified. However, the state's lieutenant governor, the presiding officer of the state Senate, cast a deciding vote in favor of the amendment, and it was deemed ratified (after the state House of Representatives voted to ratify it). The 20 state senators who had voted against the amendment, joined by a 21st state senator and three state House members, filed an action in the Kansas supreme court seeking a writ of mandamus that would compel the appropriate state officials to recognize that the legislature had not in fact ratified the amendment. That court held that the members of the legislature had standing to bring their mandamus action, but ruled against them on the merits. The Court affirmed. By a vote of five-to-four, it held that the members of the legislature had standing, for they had "a plain, direct, and adequate interest in maintaining the effectiveness of their votes, [which] would have been sufficient to defeat ratification."[85] By contrast, in Raines, the Court held that members of Congress lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act, which gave the President the authority to cancel certain spending and tax benefit measures after having signed them into law, finding that there "is a vast difference between the level of vote nullification at issue in Coleman and the abstract dilution of institutional legislative power that is alleged here."[86]

[A35] Federal Agencies. Federal "[a]gencies do not automatically have standing to sue for actions that frustrate the purposes of their statutes."[87] The Court has held, for example, that the Director of the Office of Workers' Compensation Programs in the U.S. Department of Labor is not "adversely affected or aggrieved," within the meaning of Section 21(c) of the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, by decisions made by the benefits review board that deny claimants compensation to which they are allegedly entitled. In so concluding, the Court noted, inter alia, that the Director failed to establish "such a clear and distinctive responsibility for employee compensation as to overcome the universal assumption that 'person adversely affected or aggrieved' leaves private interests (even those favored by public policy) to be litigated by private parties."[88]

Importers, Ltd. v. Dias, 468 U.S. 263, 267 (1984), the Court held that in-state liquor wholesalers had standing to raise a Commerce Clause challenge to a Hawaiian tax regime exempting certain alcohols produced in-state from liquor taxes. Although the wholesalers were not among the class of out-of-state liquor producers allegedly burdened by Hawaii's law, the Court reasoned that the wholesalers suffered economic injury both because they were directly liable for the tax and because the tax raised the price of their imported goods relative to the exempted in-state beverages. See Gen. Motors Corp. v. Tracy, supra, at 287, discussing Bacchus.

See also Fulton Corp. v. Faulkner, 516 U.S. 325 (1996) (in-state stockholder challenged tax regime imposing higher taxes on stock from issuers with out-of-state operations than on stock from purely in-state issuers); W. Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy, 512 U.S. 186 (1994) (in-state milk dealers challenged tax and subsidy scheme discriminating against out-of-state milk producers).

85 Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 438 (1939).

86 Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 826 (1997). In Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417 (1998), the Court held the cancellation procedures set forth in the Line Item Veto Act violated the Presentment Clause (U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 2).

87 Dir., Office of Workers' Comp. Programs v. Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., 514 U.S. 122, 132 (1995).

88 Id. The United States has standing to sue on behalf of Indians, in light of the government's status as guardian. See Heckman v. United States, 224 U.S. 413, 437 (1912). Cf. Moe v. Confederated Salish & Kootenai Tribes of Flathead Reservation, 425 U.S. 463, 474, n.13 (1976).

[A36] States. A state may sue in vindication of its sovereign interests[89] or its proprietary interests. Moreover, a state may bring suit in its capacity as parens patriae, if it asserts an injury to what has been characterized as a "quasi-sovereign" interest. Although the articulation of these quasi-sovereign interests is a matter for case-by-case development, certain characteristics of such interests emerge from the Court's cases.

> These characteristics fall into two general categories. First, a State has a quasi-sovereign interest in the health and wellbeing—both physical and economic—of its residents in general. Second, a State has a quasi-sovereign interest in not being discriminatorily denied its rightful status within the federal system.
>
> The Court has not attempted to draw any definitive limits on the proportion of the population of the State that must be adversely affected by the challenged behavior. Although more must be alleged than injury to an identifiable group of individual residents, the indirect effects of the injury must be considered as well in determining whether the State has alleged injury to a sufficiently substantial segment of its population. One helpful indication in determining whether an alleged injury to the health and welfare of its citizens suffices to give the State standing to sue as parens patriae is whether the injury is one that the State, if it could, would likely attempt to address through its sovereign lawmaking powers.
>
> Distinct from but related to the general wellbeing of its residents, the State has an interest in securing observance of the terms under which it participates in the federal system. In the context of parens patriae actions, this means ensuring that the State and its residents are not excluded from the benefits that are to flow from participation in the federal system. Thus, the State need not wait for the Federal Government to vindicate the State's interest in the removal of barriers to the participation by its residents in the free flow of interstate commerce. . . . Similarly, federal statutes creating benefits or alleviating hardships create interests that a State will obviously wish to have accrue to its residents.[90]

[A37] Representational or Associational Standing. An association may have standing in its own right to seek judicial relief from injury to itself and to vindicate whatever rights and immunities the association itself may enjoy. Moreover, "in attempting to secure relief from injury to itself, the association may assert the rights of its members, at least so long as the challenged infractions adversely affect its members' associational ties."[91] Even in the absence of injury to itself, an association may have standing solely as the represen-

---

[89] As the Court noted in Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico ex rel. Barez, 458 U.S. 592, 601 (1982), "[t]wo sovereign interests are easily identified: first, the exercise of sovereign power over individuals and entities within the relevant jurisdiction—this involves the power to create and enforce a legal code, both civil and criminal; second, the demand for recognition from other sovereigns—most frequently this involves the maintenance and recognition of borders." In Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 450 (1992), the Court recognized a state's standing to bring a negative Commerce Clause action on the basis of its consequential loss of tax revenue.

[90] Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico ex rel. Barez, 458 U.S. 592, 601–02, 607–08 (1982). A state does not have standing as parens patriae to bring an action against the federal government. See Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 485–86 (1923) ("While the State, under some circumstances, may sue in that capacity for the protection of its citizens, it is no part of its duty or power to enforce their rights in respect of their relations with the Federal Government.").

[91] Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 511 (1975), citing NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 458–60 (1958).

tative of its members. "[A]n association has standing to bring suit on behalf of its members when (a) its members would otherwise have standing to sue in their own right; (b) the interests at stake are germane to the organization's purpose; and (c) neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires the participation of individual members in the law suit."[92]

[A38] Shareholders. The so-called shareholder standing rule is "a longstanding equitable restriction that generally prohibits shareholders from initiating actions to enforce the rights of the corporation unless the corporation's management has refused to pursue the same action for reasons other than good faith business judgment. . . . There is,

---

[92] Hunt v. Washington State Apple Adver. Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 343 (1977). There the Washington Apple Advertising Commission brought suit to declare as violative of the Commerce Clause a North Carolina statute requiring that all apples sold or shipped into North Carolina in closed containers be identified by no grade other than the applicable federal grade or a designation that the apples were not graded. The Commission was a statutory agency designed for the promotion and protection of the Washington state apple industry and composed of 13 state growers and dealers chosen from electoral districts by their fellow growers and dealers, all of whom by mandatory assessments financed the Commission's operations. The Court held that, while the apple growers and dealers were not "members" of the Commission in the traditional trade association sense, they possessed all of the indicia of membership in an organization, and concluded that the Commission had standing to bring the above action in a representational capacity. As the Court noted in United Food & Commercial Workers v. Brown Group, Inc. 517 U.S. 544, 546 (1996), "Hunt held that 'individual participation' is not normally necessary when an association seeks prospective or injunctive relief for its members, but indicated that such participation would be required in an action for damages to an association's members, thus suggesting that an association's action for damages running solely to its members would be barred for want of the association's standing to sue. See Hunt at 343."

In United Food & Commercial Workers v. Brown Group, Inc. 517 U.S. 544, 555–57 (1996), the Court held that Congress may abrogate the Hunt standing limitation, and disentangled the constitutional from the prudential strands of the associational standing test: "[Hunt's] first prong can only be seen as itself an Article III necessity for an association's representative suit. . . . Hunt's second prong is at the least, complementary to the first, for its demand that an association plaintiff be organized for a purpose germane to the subject of its member's claim raises an assurance that the association's litigators will themselves have a stake in the resolution of the dispute, and thus be in a position to serve as the defendant's natural adversary. But once an association has satisfied Hunt's first and second prongs assuring adversarial vigor in pursuing a claim for which member Article III standing exists, it is difficult to see a constitutional necessity for anything more. To see Hunt's third prong as resting on less than constitutional necessity is not, of course, to rob it of its value. It may well promote adversarial intensity. It may guard against the hazard of litigating a case to the damages stage only to find the plaintiff lacking detailed records or the evidence necessary to show the harm with sufficient specificity. And it may hedge against any risk that the damages recovered by the association will fail to find their way into the pockets of the members on whose behalf injury is claimed. But these considerations are generally on point whenever one plaintiff sues for another's injury. . . . [T]he general prohibition on a litigant's raising another person's legal rights is a judicially self-imposed limit on the exercise of federal jurisdiction, not a constitutional mandate. Indeed, the entire doctrine of 'representational standing,' of which the notion of 'associational standing' is only one strand, rests on the premise that in certain circumstances, particular relationships (recognized either by common law tradition or by statute) are sufficient to rebut the background presumption . . . that litigants may not assert the rights of absent third parties. Hence the third prong of the associational standing test is best seen as focusing on these matters of administrative convenience and efficiency, not on elements of a case or controversy within the meaning of the Constitution."

however, an exception to this rule allowing a shareholder with a direct, personal interest in a cause of action to bring suit even if the corporation's rights are also implicated."[93]

[A39] Intervention—Appeal. An intervenor's right to continue a suit in the absence of the party on whose side intervention was permitted is contingent upon a showing by the intervenor that he fulfills the requirements of Article III.[94] Similarly, "[t]he standing Article III requires must be met by persons seeking appellate review, just as it must be met by persons appearing in courts of first instance. . . . The decision to seek review is not to be placed in the hands of concerned bystanders, persons who would seize it as a vehicle for the vindication of value interests."[95]

e. Mootness

[A40] To qualify as a case fit for federal court adjudication, "an actual controversy must be extant at all stages of review, not merely at the time the complaint is filed."[96] A case becomes moot "when the issues presented are no longer 'live' or the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome."[97] In such a case, any opinion as to the legality of the challenged action would be advisory.[98]

---

93 Franchise Tax Bd. of California v. Alcan Aluminium, Ltd., 493 U.S. 331, 336 (1990).

94 Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 68 (1986).

95 Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 64–65 (1997).

96 Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 67 (1997), quoting Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975).

97 See, e.g., Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 496 (1969).

98 Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 287 (2000).

Distinction between Mootness and Standing. The Court has stated that the doctrine of mootness can be described as "the doctrine of standing set in a timeframe: the requisite personal interest that must exist at the commencement of the litigation (standing) must continue throughout its existence (mootness)." See Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 68, n.22 (1997), quoting United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 397 (1980).

However, in Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 190–92 (2000), the Court said:

> Careful reflection on the long-recognized exceptions to mootness . . . reveals that the description of mootness as "standing set in a timeframe" is not comprehensive. (emphasis added) . . . [A] defendant claiming that its voluntary compliance moots a case bears the formidable burden of showing that it is absolutely clear the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur. By contrast, in a law suit brought to force compliance, it is the plaintiff's burden to establish standing by demonstrating that, if unchecked by the litigation, the defendant's allegedly wrongful behavior will likely occur or continue, and that the "threatened injury [is] certainly impending." Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 158 (1990). Thus, in Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983), we held that a plaintiff lacked initial standing to seek an injunction against the enforcement of a police choke-hold policy because he could not credibly allege that he faced a realistic threat arising from the policy. 461 U.S. at 105–110. Elsewhere in the opinion, however, we noted that a city-wide moratorium on police choke-holds—an action that surely diminished the already slim likelihood that any particular individual would be choked by police—would not have mooted an otherwise valid claim for injunctive relief, because the moratorium by its terms was not permanent. Id. at 101. The plain lesson of these cases is that there are circumstances in which the prospect that a defendant will engage in (or resume) harmful conduct may be too speculative to support standing, but not too speculative to overcome mootness.

[A41] Since a federal court has no authority to give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare principles or rules of law, which cannot affect the matter in issue in the case before it, if an event occurs while a case is pending that makes it impossible for the court to grant "any effectual relief whatever" to a prevailing party, the complaint must be dismissed. But while a court may not be able to return the parties to the status quo ante, when a court can fashion some form of meaningful relief, the case cannot be deemed moot.[99]

---

Furthermore, if mootness were simply "standing set in a timeframe," the exception to mootness that arises when the defendant's allegedly unlawful activity is "capable of repetition, yet evading review" could not exist. When, for example, a mentally disabled patient files a law suit challenging her confinement in a segregated institution, her post-complaint transfer to a community-based program will not moot the action, Olmstead v. L.C., 527 U.S. 581, 594, n.6 (1999), despite the fact that she would have lacked initial standing had she filed the complaint after the transfer. Standing admits of no similar exception; if a plaintiff lacks standing at the time the action commences, the fact that the dispute is capable of repetition yet evading review will not entitle the complainant to a federal judicial forum. See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Envi't, 523 U.S. 83, 109 (1998) ("the mootness exception for disputes capable of repetition yet evading review . . . will not revive a dispute which became moot before the action commenced"). . . .

We acknowledged the distinction between mootness and standing most recently in Steel Co.: "The United States . . . argues that the injunctive relief does constitute remediation because there is a presumption of [future] injury when the defendant has voluntarily ceased its illegal activity in response to litigation, even if that occurs before a complaint is filed. . . . This makes a sword out of a shield. The presumption the Government refers to has been applied to refute the assertion of mootness by a defendant who, when sued in a complaint that alleges present or threatened injury, ceases the complained-of activity. . . . It is an immense and unacceptable stretch to call the presumption into service as a substitute for the allegation of present or threatened injury upon which initial standing must be based." 523 U.S. at 109.

Standing doctrine functions to ensure, among other things, that the scarce resources of the federal courts are devoted to those disputes in which the parties have a concrete stake. In contrast, by the time mootness is an issue, the case has been brought and litigated, often . . . for years. To abandon the case at an advanced stage may prove more wasteful than frugal. This argument from sunk costs does not license courts to retain jurisdiction over cases in which one or both of the parties plainly lacks a continuing interest, as when the parties have settled, or a plaintiff pursuing a non-surviving claim has died. See, e.g., DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312 (1974) (per curiam) (non-class-action challenge to constitutionality of law school admissions process mooted when plaintiff, admitted pursuant to preliminary injunction, neared graduation and defendant law school conceded that, as a matter of ordinary school policy, plaintiff would be allowed to finish his final term); Arizonans, 520 U.S. at 67 (non-class-action challenge to state constitutional amendment declaring English the official language of the State became moot when plaintiff, a state employee who sought to use her bilingual skills, left state employment). But the argument surely highlights an important difference between the two doctrines. See generally Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 329–332 (1988) (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring).

[99] Church of Scientology of California v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992). This case involved two tapes recording conversations between officials of the Church of Scientology

[A42] The Court has recognized an exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review." This doctrine "applies only in exceptional situations, . . . where the following two circumstances are simultaneously present: (1) the challenged action is in its duration too short to be fully litigated prior to cessation or expiration, and (2) there is a reasonable expectation that the same complaining party will be subject to the same action again."[100]

[A43] As a general rule, voluntary cessation of allegedly illegal conduct does not deprive the tribunal of power to hear and determine the case, i.e., does not make the case moot; if it did, "the courts would be compelled to leave the defendant free to return to his old ways."[101] "But jurisdiction, properly acquired, may abate if the case becomes moot because (1) it can be said with assurance that there is no reasonable expectation that the alleged violation will recur, and (2) interim relief or events have completely and irrevocably eradicated the effects of the alleged violation. When both conditions are satisfied, it may be said that the case is moot because neither party has a legally cognizable interest in the final determination of the underlying questions of fact and law."[102] The "heavy burden of persuading the court that the challenged conduct cannot reasonably be expected to start up again lies with the party asserting mootness."[103]

Church and their attorneys, which were delivered to the IRS, pursuant to a court order enforcing compliance with an IRS summons. The Court said: "Taxpayers have an obvious possessory interest in their records. When the Government has obtained such materials as a result of an unlawful summons, that interest is violated, and a court can effectuate relief by ordering the Government to return the records. Moreover, even if the Government retains only copies of the disputed materials, a taxpayer still suffers injury by the Government's continued possession of those materials, namely, the affront to the taxpayer's privacy. A person's interest in maintaining the privacy of his 'papers and effects' is of sufficient importance to merit constitutional protection. Indeed, that the Church considers the information contained on the disputed tapes important is demonstrated by the long, contentious history of this litigation. Even though it is now too late to prevent, or to provide a fully satisfactory remedy for, the invasion of privacy that occurred when the IRS obtained the information on the tapes, a court does have power to effectuate a partial remedy by ordering the Government to destroy or return any and all copies it may have in its possession. The availability of this possible remedy is sufficient to prevent this case from being moot." Id. at 13.

100 See, e.g., Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 17 (1998). The mootness exception for disputes capable of repetition yet evading review will not revive a dispute that became moot before the action commenced. See Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 320–21 (1991), citing O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 495–96 (1974) (past exposure to illegal conduct does not, in itself, show a present case or controversy regarding injunctive relief if unaccompanied by any continuing, present adverse effects).

In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973), the Court held that a continuing controversy over the constitutionality of Texas abortion laws existed as to a named plaintiff who was pregnant when the suit was filed, even though she might not have been pregnant at later stages of the appeal. The Court concluded that this case provided an example of an issue capable of repetition, yet evading review, and that the termination of the plaintiff's pregnancy while the case was on appeal did not render the case moot: "[T]he . . . human gestation period is so short that . . . pregnancy will come to term before the usual appellate process is complete. If that termination makes a case moot, . . . appellate review will be effectively denied."

101 Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189 (2000).

102 County of Los Angeles v. Davis, 440 U.S. 625, 631 (1979).

103 Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189 (2000), citing United States v. Concentrated Phosphate Exp. Ass'n, Inc., 393 U.S. 199, 203 (1968).

Mootness and Class Actions. In Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393 (1975), the Court held that, in the class action context, mootness of the named plaintiff's individual claim after a class has been

f. Final Judgments—Reopening of Cases

[A44] "The Constitution enumerates and separates the powers of the three branches of government in Articles I, II, and III, and it is this very structure of the Constitution that exemplifies the concept of separation of powers. . . . While the boundaries between the three branches are not hermetically sealed, . . . the Constitution prohibits one branch from encroaching on the central prerogatives of another."[104] "Article III establishes a judicial department with the province and duty to say what the law is in particular cases and controversies. . . . [T]he Framers crafted this charter of the judicial department with an expressed understanding that it gives the Federal Judiciary the power, not merely to rule on cases, but to decide them, subject to review only by superior courts in the Article III hierarchy—with an understanding, in short, that a judgment conclusively resolves the case because a judicial Power is one to render dispositive judgments."[105]

[A45] Hayburn's Case[106] arose out of a 1792 statute that authorized pensions for veterans of the Revolutionary War. The statute provided that the circuit courts were to review the applications and determine the appropriate amount of the pension, but that the Secretary of War had the discretion either to adopt or reject the courts' findings. Although the Court did not reach the constitutional issue in Hayburn's Case, the opinions of five Justices sitting on circuit courts were reported, and the Court has since recognized that the case "stands for the principle that Congress cannot vest review of the decisions of Article III courts in officials of the Executive Branch."[107] "Such an effort by a coequal branch to annul a final judgment is an assumption of Judicial power and therefore forbidden."[108]

[A46] "No decision of any court of the United States can, under any circumstances be liable to a revision, or even suspension, by the Legislature."[109] Plaut held that a federal statute, which required federal courts to reopen final judgments that had been entered before the statute's enactment, was unconstitutional on separation of powers grounds. The plaintiffs had brought a civil securities fraud action seeking money damages. While that action was pending, the Court ruled, in Lampf, that such suits must be commenced within one year after the discovery of the facts constituting the violation and within three years after such violation.[110] In light of this intervening decision, the Plaut plaintiffs' suit was untimely, and the district court accordingly dismissed the action as time barred. After the judgment dismissing the case had become final, Congress duly certified does not render the action moot. The Court reasoned that "even though appellees . . . might not again enforce the Iowa durational residency requirement against [the class representative], it is clear that they will enforce it against those persons in the class that appellant sought to represent and that the District Court certified." Id. at 400.

---

104 Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 341 (2000).

105 Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 218–19 (1995).

106 Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409 (1792).

107 See Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 218 (1995), discussing Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409 (1792).

108 Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 343 (2000), citing Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 224 (1995).

109 Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 226 (1995), discussing Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409, 413 (1792) (opinion of Iredell, J., and Sitgreaves, D.J.).

110 Lampf, Pleva, Lipkind, Prupis & Petigrow v. Gilbertson, 501 U.S. 350 (1991).

enacted a statute providing for the reinstatement of those actions, including the Plaut plaintiffs', which had been dismissed under Lampf but that would have been timely under the previously applicable statute of limitations. The Court concluded that this retroactive command that federal courts reopen final judgments exceeded Congress' authority. "The decision of an inferior court within the Article III hierarchy is not the final word of the department (unless the time for appeal has expired), and it is the obligation of the last court in the hierarchy that rules on the case to give effect to Congress's latest enactment, even when that has the effect of overturning the judgment of an inferior court, since each court at every level, must decide according to existing laws. . . . But once a judicial decision achieves finality, it becomes the last word of the judicial department, . . . and Congress cannot retroactively command Article III courts to reopen final judgments."[111]

[A47] Nevertheless, "prospective relief under a continuing, executory decree remains subject to alteration due to changes in the underlying law."[112] This conclusion follows from the Court's decisions in Wheeling Bridge I[113] and Wheeling Bridge II.[114] In the first case, the Court held that a bridge across the Ohio River, because it was too low, unlawfully obstructed the navigation of the Ohio, and ordered that the bridge be raised or permanently removed. Shortly thereafter, Congress enacted legislation declaring the bridge to be a lawful structure, establishing the bridge as a "post-road for the passage of the mails of the United States," and declaring that the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company was authorized to maintain the bridge at its then-current site and elevation. After the bridge was destroyed in a storm, Pennsylvania sued to enjoin the bridge's reconstruction, arguing that the statute legalizing the bridge was unconstitutional, because it effectively annulled the Court's decision in Wheeling Bridge I. The Court rejected that argument, concluding that the decree in Wheeling Bridge I provided for ongoing relief by "directing the abatement of the obstruction" that enjoined the defendants from any continuance or reconstruction of the obstruction. "The Court explained that, had Wheeling Bridge I awarded money damages in an action at law, then that judgment would be final, and Congress' later action could not have affected plaintiff's right to those damages. . . . But because the decree entered in Wheeling Bridge I provided for prospective relief—a continuing injunction against the continuation or reconstruction of the bridge—the ongoing validity of the injunctive relief depended on 'whether or not the bridge interferes with the right of navigation.' . . . When Congress altered the underlying law such that the bridge was no longer an unlawful obstruction, the injunction against the maintenance of the bridge was not enforceable."[115]

---

111 See Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 344 (2000), referring to Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 218–19, 227 (1995). However, "Congress' mere waiver of the res judicata effect of a prior judicial decision rejecting the validity of a legal claim against the United States does not violate the doctrine of separation of powers." See United States v. Sioux Nation, 448 U.S. 371, 407 (1980), where the Court upheld a law required the Court of Claims, "[n]otwithstanding any other provision of law . . . to review on the merits, without regard to the defense of res judicata or collateral estoppel" a Sioux claim for just compensation from the United States.

112 Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 344 (2000).

113 Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 13 How. 518 (1852) (Wheeling Bridge I).

114 Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How. 421 (1856) (Wheeling Bridge II).

115 Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 345–46 (2000), discussing Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How. 421, 431–32 (1856).

[A48] Hence, "when Congress changes the law underlying a judgment awarding prospective relief, that relief is no longer enforceable to the extent it is inconsistent with the new law."[116] Miller v. French involved the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (PLRA), which established standards for the entry and termination of prospective relief in civil actions challenging prison conditions. If prospective relief under an existing injunction did not satisfy these standards, a defendant or intervenor was entitled to immediate termination of that relief. And under the PLRA's "automatic stay" provision, a motion to terminate prospective relief operated as a stay of that relief during the period beginning 30 days after the filing of the motion (extendable for up to 90 days for "good cause") and ending when the court ruled on the motion. Congress clearly intended to make operation of the automatic stay mandatory, precluding courts from exercising their equitable powers to enjoin the stay. The Court held that the "automatic stay" provision did not violate separation of powers principles, since "the stay merely reflects the changed legal circumstances—that prospective relief under the existing decree is no longer enforceable, and remains unenforceable unless and until the court makes the findings" required by the new legal standard for relief.[117]

3. Adequate State Grounds

[A49] The Court "will not review a question of federal law decided by a state court if the decision of that court rests on a state law ground that is independent of the federal question and adequate to support the judgment."[118] "This rule applies whether the state law ground is substantive or procedural."[119] "In the context of direct review of a state court judgment, the independent and adequate state ground doctrine is jurisdictional."[120] Because the Court "has no power to review a state law determination that is sufficient to support the judgment, resolution of any independent federal ground for the decision could not affect the judgment, and would therefore be advisory."[121]

[A50] It is not always easy for a federal court to apply the independent and adequate state ground doctrine. "State court opinions will, at times, discuss federal questions at length and mention a state law basis for decision only briefly. In such cases, it is often

---

[116] Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 347 (2000).

[117] Id. at 348.

[118] Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 729 (1991), citing Fox Film Corp. v. Muller, 296 U.S. 207, 210 (1935); Klinger v. Missouri, 13 Wall. 257, 263 (1872).

[119] See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 729 (1991), citing Fox Film Corp. v. Muller, 296 U.S. 207 (1935) and Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U.S. 441 (1935).

[120] Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 729 (1991). "The independent and adequate state ground doctrine is not technically jurisdictional when a federal court considers a state prisoner's petition for habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254, since the federal court is not formally reviewing a judgment, but is determining whether the prisoner is 'in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.' The Court has nonetheless held that the doctrine applies to bar consideration on federal habeas of federal claims that have been defaulted under state law." See Lambrix v. Singletary, 520 U.S. 518, 523 (1997) (citing cases). In the habeas context, the application of the doctrine, "is grounded in concerns of comity and federalism." Id. at 730.

[121] See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 729 (1991), citing Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117, 125–26 (1945) (the Court is "not permitted to render an advisory opinion, and if the same judgment would be rendered by the state court after we corrected its views of federal laws, our review could amount to nothing more than an advisory opinion.").

difficult to determine if the state law discussion is truly an independent basis for decision, or merely a passing reference. In other cases, state opinions purporting to apply state constitutional law will derive principles by reference to federal constitutional decisions from the Court. Again, it is unclear from such opinions whether the state law decision is independent of federal law."[122] Michigan v. Long provided a partial solution to this problem in the form of a conclusive presumption. Prior to Long, when faced with ambiguous state court decisions, the Court had adopted various inconsistent and unsatisfactory solutions including dismissal of the case,[123] remand to the state court for clarification,[124] or an independent investigation of state law.[125] "These solutions were burdensome both to the Court and to the state courts. They were also largely unnecessary in those cases where it fairly appeared that the state court decision rested primarily on federal law. The most reasonable conclusion in such cases is that there is not an independent and adequate state ground for the decision. Therefore, in order to minimize the costs associated with resolving ambiguities in state court decisions while still fulfilling [its] obligation to determine if there was an independent and adequate state ground for the decision,"[126] the Court established in Long a conclusive presumption of jurisdiction in these cases: "[W]hen . . . a state court decision fairly appears to rest primarily on federal law, or to be interwoven with the federal law, and when the adequacy and independence of any possible state law ground is not clear from the face of the opinion, we will accept as the most reasonable explanation that the state court decided the case the way it did because it believed that federal law required it to do so."[127] "After Long, a state court that wishes to look to federal law for guidance or as an alternative holding while still relying on an independent and adequate state ground can avoid the presumption by stating 'clearly and expressly that [it's decision] is . . . based on bona fide separate, adequate, and independent grounds.'"[128]

[A51] In Caldwell, the Court applied the Long presumption in the context of an alleged independent and adequate state procedural ground.[129] Caldwell, a criminal defendant, challenged at trial part of the prosecutor's closing argument to the jury, but he did not raise the issue on appeal to the Mississippi supreme court. That court raised the issue sua sponte, discussing this federal question at length in its opinion and deciding it against Caldwell. It also made reference to its general rule that issues not raised on appeal are deemed waived. The state argued to the Court that the procedural default constituted an independent and adequate state ground for the Mississippi court's decision. The Court rejected this argument, noting that the state decision fairly appeared to rest primarily on federal law, and there was no clear and express statement that the Mississippi supreme court was relying on procedural default as an independent ground.[130]

---

122 See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 732 (1991).

123 See, e.g., Lynch v. New York ex rel. Pierson, 293 U.S. 52 (1934).

124 See, e.g., California v. Krivda, 409 U.S. 33 (1972); Herb v. Pitcairn, 324 U.S. 117 (1945).

125 See, e.g., Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730, 732–33, n.1 (1983) (plurality opinion).

126 See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 732–33 (1991).

127 Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1040–41 (1983).

128 See Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 733 (1991), quoting Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1041 (1983).

129 A state procedural default is not an "independent and adequate state ground" barring subsequent federal review unless the state rule was "firmly established and regularly followed" at the time it was applied. See Ford v. Georgia, 498 U.S. 411, 423–24 (1991).

130 Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320, 327 (1985). Harris v. Reed, 489 U.S. 255 (1989),

4. The Abstention Doctrine

[A52] The doctrine of abstention, under which a federal court may decline to exercise or postpone the exercise of its jurisdiction, is an extraordinary and narrow exception to the duty of federal courts to adjudicate the controversies properly before them. "Abdication of the obligation to decide cases can be justified under this doctrine only in the exceptional circumstances where the order to the parties to repair to the state court would clearly serve an important countervailing interest,"[131] for example "where abstention is warranted by considerations of proper constitutional adjudication, regard for federal-state relations, or wise judicial administration."[132] Pullman abstention generally is appropriate when determination of an unsettled question of state law by a state court could avoid the need for decision of a substantial question of federal constitutional law.[133] Younger declared that federal restraint of state prosecutions is permissible only if the state defendant establishes "great and immediate" irreparable injury, beyond that "incidental to every criminal proceeding brought lawfully and in good faith."[134] As applied in federal habeas the presumption the Court adopted in Long and Caldwell for direct review cases.

---

[131] Allegheny County v. Frank Mashuda Co., 360 U.S. 185, 188–89 (1959).

[132] Quackenbush v. Allstate Ins. Co., 517 U.S. 706, 716 (1996). In "cases where the relief sought is equitable in nature or otherwise discretionary, federal courts not only have the power to stay the action based on abstention principles, but can also, in otherwise appropriate circumstances, decline to exercise jurisdiction altogether by either dismissing the suit or remanding it to state court. . . . [The Court has] applied abstention principles to actions 'at law' only to permit a federal court to enter a stay order that postpones adjudication of the dispute, not to dismiss the federal suit altogether." Those principles also do not support the outright dismissal or remand of damages actions. Id. at 719, 721.

[133] R.R. Comm'n v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941). Nevertheless, the Court has "never held that a federal litigant must await a state court construction or the development of an established practice before bringing the federal suit." See Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 945 (2000).

"In cases involving a facial challenge to a statute, the pivotal question in determining whether abstention is appropriate is whether the statute is fairly subject to an interpretation which will render unnecessary or substantially modify the federal constitutional question. . . . If the statute is not obviously susceptible of a limiting construction, then, even if the statute has never been interpreted by a state tribunal, it is the duty of the federal court to exercise its properly invoked jurisdiction." See Harman v. Forssenius, 380 U.S. 528, 534–35 (1965).

[134] Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 46–47 (1971). Younger recognized, however, the prospect of extraordinary circumstances in which immediate federal injunctive relief might be obtained. The Court referred initially to bad faith, harassing police and prosecutorial actions pursued without "any expectation of securing valid convictions." Id. at 48. Further, the Court observed that there may be other "extraordinary circumstances in which the necessary irreparable injury can be shown even in the absence of the usual prerequisites of bad faith and harassment"—for example, where a statute is "flagrantly and patently violative of express constitutional prohibitions in every clause, sentence, and paragraph, and in whatever manner and against whomever an effort might be made to apply it." Id. at 53–54.

The Court has been particularly reluctant to abstain in cases involving facial challenges based on the First Amendment. See Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 467, and n.17 (1987) (citing cases). In Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 489–90 (1965), the Court held that "abstention is inappropriate for cases where statutes are justifiably attacked on their face as abridging free expression, or as applied for the purpose of discouraging protected activities. In such cases, to force the plaintiff who has commenced a federal action to suffer the delay of state court proceedings the Court recognized in Huffman and its progeny, the principles underlying Younger—that state courts are fully competent to adjudicate constitutional claims and that threat to the federal system is posed by displacement of state courts by those of the national government—are also applicable to civil proceedings in which important state interests are involved.[135] Under the Burford doctrine,[136] where timely and adequate state court review is available, a federal court does not interfere with the proceedings or orders of state administrative agencies when there are "difficult questions of state law bearing on policy problems of substantial public import whose importance transcends the result in the case then at bar," or when the "exercise of federal review of the question in a case and in similar cases would be disruptive of state efforts to establish a coherent policy with respect to a matter of substantial public concern."[137] Finally, under the Rooker/Feldman abstention doctrine, "a party losing in state court is barred from seeking what in substance would be appellate review of the state judgment in a United States District Court, based on the losing party's claim that the state judgment itself violates the loser's federal rights."[138] might itself effect the impermissible chilling of the very constitutional right he seeks to protect." See also Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 252 (1967). Nevertheless, in Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 50–51 (1971), the Court held that a chilling effect does not "by itself justify federal intervention."

---

[135] See Huffman v. Pursue, Ltd., 420 U.S. 592 (1975) (non-criminal proceedings directed at obtaining the closure of places exhibiting obscene films); Juidice v. Vail, 430 U.S. 327 (1977) (contempt proceedings); Trainor v. Hernandez, 431 U.S. 434 (1977) (welfare fraud action); Moore v. Sims, 442 U.S. 415 (1979) (child abuse regulation); Middlesex County Ethics Comm. v. Garden State Bar Ass'n, 457 U.S. 423 (1982) (bar disciplinary proceedings); Ohio Civil Rights Comm. v. Dayton Christian Sch., Inc., 477 U.S. 619 (1986) (anti-discrimination laws).

Where vital state interests are involved, a federal court should abstain unless state law clearly bars the interposition of federal constitutional claims. See Moore v. Sims, 442 U.S. 415, 426 (1979). The pertinent inquiry is whether the state proceedings afford an adequate opportunity to raise the constitutional claims. Id. at 430.

[136] Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943).

[137] New Orleans Pub. Serv., Inc. v. New Orleans, 491 U.S. 350, 361 (1989). See, e.g., Louisiana Power & Light Co. v. City of Thibodaux, 360 U.S. 25 (1959) (scope of the eminent domain power of municipalities under state law); Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. v. Huffman, 319 U.S. 293 (1943) (collection of state taxes); Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943) (reasonableness under Texas state law of a state commission's permit to drill oil; the reasonableness of the permit in that case was not of transcendent importance, but review of reasonableness by the federal courts in that and future cases, where the state had established its own elaborate review system for dealing with the geological complexities of oil and gas fields, would have had an impermissibly disruptive effect on state policy for the management of those fields).

Since the Constitution leaves with the states primary responsibility for apportionment of their federal congressional and state legislative districts (U.S. Const., art. I, § 2), absent evidence that the branches of state government will fail timely to perform that duty, a federal court must neither affirmatively obstruct state reapportionment nor permit federal litigation to be used to impede it. See Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 34 (1993).

[138] See Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1005–06 (1994), citing District of Columbia Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462, 482 (1983) and Rooker v. Fid. Trust Co., 263 U.S. 413, 416 (1923).

5. The "Not Pressed or Passed Upon Below" Rule

[A53] Only in exceptional cases will the Court review a question neither raised before nor considered by the court below.[139] There are several purposes underlying the "not pressed or passed upon" rule. First, "questions not raised below are those on which the record is very likely to be inadequate, since it certainly was not compiled with those questions in mind. . . . [Moreover,] due regard for the appropriate relationship of th[e] Court to state courts, . . . demands that those courts be given an opportunity to consider the constitutionality of the actions of state officials, to rest their decisions on adequate and independent state grounds, and, equally important, to fashion the appropriate remedies for unconstitutional actions."[140] By contrast, "[o]nce a federal claim is properly presented, a party can make any argument in support of that claim; parties are not limited to the precise arguments they made below."[141]

6. Political Questions

[A54] Although it is the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is, sometimes "the law is that the judicial department has no business entertaining the claim of unlawfulness—because the question is entrusted to one of the political branches or involves no judicially enforceable rights. Such questions are said to be 'nonjusticiable' or 'political questions.'"[142] "The political question doctrine excludes from judicial review those controversies which revolve around policy choices and value determinations constitutionally committed for resolution to the halls of Congress or the confines of the Executive Branch. The Judiciary is particularly ill-suited to make such decisions, as courts are fundamentally under-equipped to formulate national policies or develop standards for matters not legal in nature."[143] In Baker v. Carr, the Court set forth six tests for the existence of a political question: "a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility

---

[139] For example, in Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), the Court reversed a state criminal conviction on a constitutional ground not urged in state court, nor even in the Court. Likewise, Vachon v. New Hampshire, 414 U.S. 478 (1974), summarily reversed a state criminal conviction on the ground, not raised in state court, or in the Court, that it had been obtained in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court indicated in a footnote (id. at 479, n.3), that it possessed discretion to ignore the failure to raise in state court the question on which it decided the case.

The Court has expressed inconsistent views as to whether this rule is jurisdictional or prudential in cases arising from state courts. See Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 218–20 (1983); Howell v. Mississippi, 543 U.S. 440, 445 (2005) (per curiam). In cases arising from federal courts, the rule is prudential only. See, e.g., Yee v. Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 533 (1992), citing Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 17, n.2 (1980).

Where issues presented in petition for certiorari were not raised below nor passed upon by the state's highest court, and where the only issue actually litigated does not alone justify exercise of certiorari jurisdiction, the writ of certiorari is dismissed as improvidently granted. See Tacon v. Arizona, 410 U.S. 351, 352 (1973).

[140] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 221–22 (1983).

[141] Yee v. Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 534 (1992).

[142] Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 277 (2004).

[143] Japan Whaling Ass'n v. Am. Cetacean Soc'y, 478 U.S. 221, 230 (1986).

of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non judicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of the government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question."[144]

---

[144] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1969). In Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 228–29 (1993), the Court pointed out that "the concept of a textual commitment to a coordinate political department is not completely separate from the concept of a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; the lack of judicially manageable standards may strengthen the conclusion that there is a textually demonstrable commitment to a coordinate branch. . . . [T]he courts must, in the first instance, interpret the text in question and determine whether and to what extent the issue is textually committed."

Application of the doctrine.

Political gerrymandering. See paras. K170–K171.

Foreign relations. In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211–13 (1969), the Court said:

> [I]t is error to suppose that every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance. Our cases in this field seem invariably to show a discriminating analysis of the particular question posed, in terms of the history of its management by the political branches, of its susceptibility to judicial handling in the light of its nature and posture in the specific case, and of the possible consequences of judicial action. For example, though a court will not ordinarily inquire whether a treaty has been terminated, since on that question, governmental action must be regarded as of controlling importance, if there has been no conclusive governmental action, then a court can construe a treaty, and may find it provides the answer. . . . Though a court will not undertake to construe a treaty in a manner inconsistent with a subsequent federal statute, no similar hesitancy obtains if the asserted clash is with state law. . . .
>
> While recognition of foreign governments so strongly defies judicial treatment that, without executive recognition, a foreign state has been called a republic of whose existence we know nothing, and the judiciary ordinarily follows the executive as to which nation has sovereignty over disputed territory, once sovereignty over an area is politically determined and declared, courts may examine the resulting status and decide independently whether a statute applies to that area. Similarly, recognition of belligerency abroad is an executive responsibility, but if the executive proclamations fall short of an explicit answer, a court may construe them seeking, for example, to determine whether the situation is such that statutes designed to assure American neutrality have become operative. . . . Still again, though it is the executive that determines a person's status as representative of a foreign government, . . . the executive's statements will be construed where necessary to determine the court's jurisdiction. . . . Similar judicial action in the absence of a recognizedly authoritative executive declaration occurs in cases involving the immunity from seizure of vessels owned by friendly foreign governments.

Legality of wars. In the Prize Cases, 2 Black 635, 668 (1863), the Court said:

> By the Constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. The Constitution confers on the President the whole Executive power. He has no power to initiate or declare a war either against a foreign nation or a domestic State. . . .
>
> If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorized, but bound, to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority.

7. The "Act of State" Doctrine

[A55] The classic statement of the act of state doctrine, is found in Underhill, where the Court said: "Every sovereign state is bound to respect the independence of every other sovereign state, and the courts of one country will not sit in judgment on the acts

---

In Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952), the Court held that President Truman, in the undeclared Korean war, had no power to seize the steel mills in order to increase war production. Regarding the "war" in Vietnam, which was not declared by Congress, the lower courts generally ruled that the question of the war's legality was not a justiciable one, but the Court never passed on the question authoritatively. See, in particular, Atlee v. Laird, 347 F. Supp. 689 (E.D. Pa. 1972), aff'd summarily sub. nom, Atlee v. Richardson 411 U.S. 911 (1973).

Dates of duration of hostilities. In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 213–14 (1969), the Court said:

> [T]hough it has been stated broadly that the power which declared the necessity is the power to declare its cessation, and what the cessation requires [Commercial Trust Co. v. Miller, 262 U.S. 51, 57 (1923)], here too analysis reveals isolable reasons for the presence of political questions, underlying this Court's refusal to review the political departments' determination of when or whether a war has ended. Dominant is the need for finality in the political determination, for emergency's nature demands "a prompt and unhesitating obedience," Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19, 30 (1827) (calling up of militia). Moreover, the cessation of hostilities does not necessarily end the war power . . . [which] includes the power to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress, and continues during that emergency. . . . But deference rests on reason, not habit. The question in a particular case may not seriously implicate considerations of finality—e.g., a public program of importance (rent control), yet not central to the emergency effort. Further, clearly definable criteria for decision may be available. In such case, the political question barrier falls away: [A] Court is not at liberty to shut its eyes to an obvious mistake, when the validity of the law depends upon the truth of what is declared. . . . [It can] inquire whether the exigency still existed upon which the continued operation of the law depended. Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U.S. 543, 547–548 (1924). On the other hand, even in private litigation which directly implicates no feature of separation of powers, lack of judicially discoverable standards and the drive for evenhanded application may impel reference to the political departments' determination of dates of hostilities' beginning and ending.

Validity of enactments. In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 214 (1969), the Court noted:

> [I]n Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), this Court held that the questions of how long a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution remained open to ratification, and what effect a prior rejection had on a subsequent ratification, were committed to congressional resolution and involved criteria of decision that necessarily escaped the judicial grasp. Similar considerations apply to the enacting process: "[t]he respect due to coequal and independent departments," and the need for finality and certainty about the status of a statute contribute to judicial reluctance to inquire whether, as passed, it complied with all requisite formalities. See Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 672, 676–77 (1892); Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137 (1922).

The status of Indian tribes. In Baker v. Carr, supra at 214, the Court said:

> This Court's deference to the political departments in determining whether Indians are recognized as a tribe, while it reflects familiar attributes of political questions, also has a unique element in that "The relation of the Indians to the United States is marked by peculiar and cardinal distinctions which exist no where else. . . . [The Indians are] domestic dependent nations . . . in a state of pupilage. Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian." See The Cherokee Nation of the government of another, done within its own territory. Redress of grievances by reason of such acts must be obtained through the means open to be availed of by sover-

---

v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 1, 16–17 (1831). Yet here, too, there is no blanket rule. While "[I]t is for [Congress] . . . and not for the courts, to determine when the true interests of the Indian require his release from [the] condition of tutelage, . . . it is not meant by this that Congress may bring a community or body of people within the range of this power by arbitrarily calling them an Indian tribe." See United States v. Sandoval, 231 U.S. 28, 46 (1913).

The Guarantee Clause. The Guarantee Clause (art. IV, § 4 of the Constitution) provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government. . ." (emphasis added). In most of the cases in which the Court has been asked to apply the Clause, the Court has found the claims presented to be non-justiciable under the "political question" doctrine. See, e.g., Taylor & Marshall v. Beckham, 178 U.S. 548 (1900) (claim that Kentucky's resolution of contested gubernatorial election deprived voters of republican government); Pac. States Tel. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118 (1912) (claim that initiative and referendum negated republican government held non-justiciable); Kiernan v. Portland, 223 U.S. 151 (1912) (claim that municipal charter amendment per municipal initiative and referendum negated republican government); Marshall v. Dye, 231 U.S. 250 (1913) (claim that Indiana's constitutional amendment procedure negated republican government); O'Neill v. Leamer, 239 U.S. 244 (1915) (claim that delegation to court of power to form drainage districts negated republican government); Ohio ex rel. Davis v. Hildebrant, 241 U.S. 565 (1916) (claim that invalidation of state reapportionment statute per referendum negates republican government); Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U.S. 219 (1917) (claim that workmen's compensation violates republican government); Ohio ex rel. Bryant v. Akron Metro. Park Dist., 281 U.S. 74 (1930) (claim that rule requiring invalidation of statute by all but one justice of state court negated republican government). The view that the Guarantee Clause implicates only non-justiciable political questions has its origin in Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1 (1849), in which the Court was asked to decide which of two rival governments was the legitimate government of Rhode Island. The Court held that "it rests with Congress," not the judiciary, "to decide what government is the established one in a State." Id. at 42. Nevertheless, in some cases, the Court addressed the merits of claims founded on the Guarantee Clause without any suggestion that the claims were not justiciable. See Attorney Gen. of Michigan ex rel. Kies v. Lowrey, 199 U.S. 233, 239 (1905); Forsyth v. Hammond, 166 U.S. 506, 519 (1897); In re Duncan, 139 U.S. 449, 461–62 (1891); Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 175–76 (1875). More recently, the Court has suggested that perhaps not all claims under the Guarantee Clause present non-justiciable political questions. See Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 582 (1964) ("some questions raised under the Guarantee Clause are nonjusticiable"). Cf. New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 185 (1992), where the Court avoided "this difficult question." In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), the Court held that the manner of apportionment of members of a state legislature raised a non-justiciable question under the Guarantee Clause, but a justiciable question under the Equal Protection Clause.

Qualifications of Members of Congress: The issue in Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), was whether courts could review the House of Representatives' conclusion that Powell was "unqualified" to sit as a member because he had been accused of misappropriating public funds and abusing the process of the New York courts. The Court stated that the question of justiciability turned on whether the Constitution committed authority to the House to judge its members' qualifications, and if so, the extent of that commitment. Article I, Section 5 provides that "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members." In turn, Article I, Section 2 specifies three requirements for membership in the House: the candidate must be at least 25 years of age, a citizen of the United States for no less than seven years, and an inhabitant of the state he is chosen to represent. The Court "held that, in light of the three requirements specified in the Constitution, the word 'qualifications'—of which the House was to be the Judge—was of a precise, limited nature. . . . The claim by the House that its power to 'be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own eign powers as between themselves."[145] The doctrine is not an inflexible one; "it is a principle of decision binding on federal and state courts alike, but compelled by neither international law nor the Constitution. . . . The act of state doctrine does, however, have constitutional underpinnings. It arises out of the basic relationships between Members' was a textual commitment of unreviewable authority was defeated by the existence of this separate provision specifying the only qualifications which might be imposed for House membership. The decision as to whether a member satisfied these qualifications was placed with the House, but the decision as to what these qualifications consisted of was not." See Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224, 237 (1993), discussing Powell.

---

Impeachment. The Impeachment Trial Clause (art. I, § 3, cl. 6, of the Constitution) provides that the "Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments." Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (1993), involved the issue whether a Senate rule, allowing a committee of senators to hear evidence against an individual who had been impeached and to report that evidence to the full Senate, violated the Impeachment Trial Clause. The Court decided that the question was not a justiciable one, considering that (1) the language and structure of the Clause demonstrated a textual commitment of impeachment to the Senate, and that (2) the lack of finality, inherent in exposing the country's political life "to months, or perhaps years, of chaos," and the difficulty of fashioning relief, other than simply setting aside the Senate's judgment of conviction, counseled against justiciability.

The Origination Clause. United States v. Munoz-Flores, 495 U.S. 385 (1990), raised the question whether a federal statute, which required courts to impose a monetary "special assessment" on any person convicted of a federal misdemeanor, violated the Origination Clause of the Constitution. That Clause mandates that "[a]ll Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives" (U.S. Const., art. I, § 7, cl. 1). The Court concluded that the case did not present a political question, since it had none of the six characteristics identified in Baker v. Carr as essential to a finding that a case raises such a question.

The President's executive privilege. In United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), the Court reviewed the denial of a motion to quash a third-party subpoena duces tecum, issued by a district court, which directed the President of the United States to produce certain tape recordings and documents relating to his conversations with aides and advisers. At issue was the production or non-production of specified evidence that the Special Prosecutor deemed to be relevant and admissible in a pending criminal case, but the Chief Executive considered as involving the confidentiality of the communications of the President. The Court held that these issues were "of a type which are traditionally justiciable." Id. at 697. The Court emphasized that it was its province and duty "to say what the law is" with respect to the claim of privilege presented in that case, and concluded that > Absent a claim of need to protect military, diplomatic, or sensitive national security secrets, we find it difficult to accept the argument that even the very important interest in confidentiality of Presidential communications is significantly diminished by production of such material for in camera inspection with all the protection that a district court will be obliged to provide.

>
> The impediment that an absolute, unqualified privilege would place in the way of the primary constitutional duty of the Judicial Branch to do justice in criminal prosecutions would plainly conflict with the function of the courts under Art. III.

Id. at 706–07.

[145] Underhill v. Hernandez, 168 U.S. 250, 252 (1897) (emphasis added). Following this precept, the Court, in that case, refused to inquire into acts of Hernandez, a revolutionary Venezuelan military commander whose government had been later recognized by the United States, which were made the basis of a damage action by Underhill, an American citizen, who claimed that he had had unlawfully assaulted, coerced, and detained in Venezuela by Hernandez.

branches of government in a system of separation of powers. It concerns the competency of dissimilar institutions to make and implement particular kinds of decisions in the area of international relations. The doctrine . . . expresses the strong sense of the Judicial Branch that its engagement in the task of passing on the validity of foreign acts of state may hinder, rather than further, the country's pursuit of goals both for itself and for the community of nations as a whole in the international sphere."[146]

---

[146] Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 427, 423 (1964). Some Justices have suggested possible exceptions to application of the doctrine, where the underlying policies would seemingly not be served: an exception, for example, for acts of state that consist of "purely commercial" transactions (see Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba, 425 U.S. 682, 695–706 (1976) (opinion of White, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Powell and Rehnquist, JJ.)); or an exception for cases in which the Executive Branch has represented that it has no objection to denying validity to the foreign sovereign act, since then the courts would be impeding no foreign policy goals (see First Nat'l City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759, 768–70 (1972) (opinion of Rehnquist, J., in which Burger, C.J., and White, J., joined)).

In Bernstein v. Van Heyghen Freres Societe Anonyme, 163 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1947), suit was brought to recover from an assignee property allegedly taken, in effect, by the Nazi government, because plaintiff was Jewish. Recognizing the odious nature of this act of state, the court, through Judge Learned Hand, nonetheless refused to consider it invalid on that ground. Rather, it looked to see if the Executive had acted in any manner that would indicate that U.S. courts should refuse to give effect to such a foreign decree. Finding no such evidence, the court sustained dismissal of the complaint. In a later case involving similar facts, the same court again assumed examination of the German acts improper, Bernstein v. N.V. Nederlandsche-Amerikaansche Stoomvaart-Maatschappij, 173 F.2d 71 (2d Cir. 1949), but, quite evidently following the implications of Judge Hand's opinion in the earlier case, amended its mandate to permit evidence of alleged invalidity, 210 F.2d 375 (2d Cir. 1954), subsequent to receipt by plaintiff's attorney of a letter from the Acting Legal Adviser to the State Department written for the purpose of relieving the court from any constraint upon the exercise of its jurisdiction to pass on that question. At least five members of the Court in First National City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba, 406 U.S. 759 (1972), disapproved the Bernstein exception to the act of state doctrine. Id. at 773 (Powell, J., concurring in judgment); id. at 776–77 (dissenting opinion of Brennan, J., with whom Justices Stewart, Marshall, and Blackmun joined). Justice Brennan said: "Mr. Justice Rehnquist's opinion reasons that the act of state doctrine exists primarily, and perhaps even solely, as a judicial aid to the Executive to avoid embarrassment to the political branch in the conduct of foreign relations. Where the Executive expressly indicates that invocation of the rule will not promote domestic foreign policy interests, his opinion states the view, adopting the Bernstein exception, that the doctrine does not apply. This syllogism—from premise to conclusion—is, with all respect, mechanical and fallacious. Moreover, it would require us to abdicate our judicial responsibility to define the contours of the act of state doctrine so that the judiciary does not become embroiled in the politics of international relations to the damage not only of the courts and the Executive, but of the rule of law." Id. at 777–78.

In W. S. Kirkpatrick & Co. v. Environmental Tectonics Corp., International, 493 U.S. 400 (1990), respondent complained that petitioners had obtained a construction contract from the Nigerian government by bribing Nigerian officials. Nigerian law prohibits both the payment and the receipt of such bribes. Respondent, an unsuccessful bidder for the contract, filed an action for damages against petitioners under various federal and state statutes. The Court held the act of state doctrine does not bar a court in the United States from entertaining a cause of action that "does not rest upon the asserted invalidity of an official act of a foreign sovereign, but that does require imputing to foreign officials an unlawful motivation (the obtaining of bribes) in the performance of such an official act." Id. at 401.

C. JUDICIAL REVIEW

1. Generally

[A56] The Supreme Court's greatest task is to review the constitutionality of governmental acts. The principle of "judicial review" was first enunciated in Marbury v. Madison, where Chief Justice Marshall wrote:

> The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws whenever he receives an injury. . . .
>
> Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation. . . .
>
> The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the Constitution. . . .
>
> It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. . . .
>
> If then the courts are to regard the constitution, and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.[147]

2. Standards of Review in Constitutional Rights Cases

[A57] In deciding questions of constitutional rights, the Court has employed various standards or review that reflect a balancing of the competing interests involved. The Court's case law, in the equal protection context, provides a good example of the different levels of constitutional review:

> The general rule is that legislation is presumed to be valid, and will be sustained if the classification drawn by the statute is rationally related to a legitimate state interest . . . . When social or economic legislation is at issue, the Equal Protection Clause allows the States wide latitude, . . . and the Constitution presumes that even improvident decisions will eventually be rectified by the democratic processes.
>
> The general rule gives way, however, when a statute classifies by race, alienage, or national origin. These factors are so seldom relevant to the achievement of any legitimate state interest that laws grounded in such considerations are deemed to reflect prejudice and antipathy—a view that those in the burdened class are not as worthy or deserving as others. For these reasons, and because such discrimination is unlikely to be soon rectified by legislative means, these laws are subjected to strict scrutiny, and will be sustained only if they are suitably tailored to serve a compelling state interest. . . . Similar oversight by the courts is due when state laws impinge on personal rights protected by the Constitution. . . .

---

147 Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 163, 177–78 (1803).

> Legislative classifications based on gender also call for a heightened, though less strict, standard of review. That factor generally provides no sensible ground for differential treatment. . . . [Hence, a] gender classification fails unless it is substantially related to a sufficiently important governmental interest . . . . Because illegitimacy is beyond the individual's control and bears no relation to the individual's ability to participate in and contribute to society, . . . official discriminations resting on that characteristic are also subject to somewhat heightened review. Those restrictions will survive equal protection scrutiny to the extent they are substantially related to a legitimate state interest.[148]

---

[148] See Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 440–41 (1985) (citing cases—emphasis added—internal quotation marks omitted).

In Tuan Anh Nguyen v. Immigration & Naturalization Service, 533 U.S. 53, 74–78 (2001), Justice O'Connor summarized the differences between "rational basis" and "heightened" scrutiny, as deduced from the Court's case law:

> [U]nder heightened scrutiny, "the burden of justification is demanding and it rests entirely on [the party defending the classification]." . . . Under rational basis scrutiny, by contrast, the defender of the classification "has no obligation to produce evidence to sustain the rationality of a statutory classification." . . . Instead, "the burden is on the one attacking the legislative arrangement to negative every conceivable basis which might support it, whether or not the basis has a foundation in the record." . . .
>
> Further, a justification that sustains a sex-based classification "must be genuine, not hypothesized or invented post hoc in response to litigation." . . . "[T]he mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose is not an automatic shield which protects against any inquiry into the actual purposes underlying a statutory scheme." . . . Under rational basis review, by contrast, it is "constitutionally irrelevant what reasoning in fact underlay the legislative decision." . . .
>
> Heightened scrutiny does not countenance justifications that "rely on overbroad generalizations about the different talents, capacities, or preferences of males and females." . . . Rational basis review, by contrast, is much more tolerant of the use of broad generalizations about different classes of individuals, so long as the classification is not arbitrary or irrational. . . .
>
> Moreover, overbroad sex-based generalizations are impermissible even when they enjoy empirical support. . . . Under rational basis scrutiny, however, empirical support is not even necessary to sustain a classification. . . .
>
> The different burdens imposed by these equal protection standards correspond to the different duties of a reviewing court in applying each standard. The court's task in applying heightened scrutiny to a sex-based classification is clear: "Focusing on the differential treatment or denial of opportunity for which relief is sought, the reviewing court must determine whether the proffered justification is 'exceedingly persuasive.'" . . . In making this determination, the court must inquire into the actual purposes of the discrimination, "for a tenable justification must describe actual state purposes, not rationalizations for actions in fact differently grounded." . . . The rational basis standard, on the other hand, instructs that "a classification must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification." This standard permits a court to hypothesize interests that might support legislative distinctions, whereas heightened scrutiny limits the realm of justification to demonstrable reality.

[A58] The various formulations adopted by the Court in cases involving the freedoms of speech and assembly constitute another example of the Court's complex approach of constitutional issues in the field of individual rights. "Strict scrutiny" applies to content-based restrictions: the restriction must be "necessary to serve a compelling state interest and . . . narrowly drawn to achieve that end."[149] Under the "intermediate" standard of review (a form of "heightened" scrutiny), applicable to content-neutral "time, place and manner regulations" of speech, the regulations are permissible so long as they are "narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication."[150] Nevertheless, when evaluating a content-neutral injunction, the Court asks whether the challenged provisions of the injunction "burden no more speech than necessary to serve a significant government interest,"[151] a standard that is more stringent than intermediate scrutiny but less rigorous than strict scrutiny.

[A59] However, one may infer from the Court's case law that statutes (or government policies or actions) endangering fundamental rights are usually subject to some form of "heightened scrutiny," under which the party defending the challenged statute must show at least that the statute serves important governmental objectives and that there is a sufficiently close fit between the regulation at issue and the interests it serves.[152] Statutory

---

> These different standards of equal protection review also set different bars for the magnitude of the governmental interest that justifies the statutory classification. Heightened scrutiny demands that the governmental interest served by the classification be "important," . . . whereas rational basis scrutiny requires only that the end be "legitimate." . . .
>
> The most important difference between heightened scrutiny and rational basis review, of course, is the required fit between the means employed and the ends served. Under heightened scrutiny, the discriminatory means must be "substantially related" to an actual and important governmental interest. . . . Under rational basis scrutiny, the means need only be "rationally related" to a conceivable and legitimate state end. . . .
>
> The fact that other means are better suited to the achievement of governmental ends therefore is of no moment under rational basis review. . . . "[W]here rationality is the test, a State does not violate the Equal Protection Clause merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect." . . . But because we require a much tighter fit between means and ends under heightened scrutiny, the availability of sex-neutral alternatives to a sex-based classification is often highly probative of the validity of the classification.

149 Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 45 (1983).

150 Id.

151 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc. 512 U.S. 753, 765 (1994).

152 A statute is narrowly tailored if "it targets and eliminates no more than the exact source of the 'evil' it seeks to remedy." See Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 485 (1988) (emphasis added). See also para. K10.

The "quantum of empirical evidence needed to satisfy heightened judicial scrutiny of legislative judgments will vary up or down with the novelty and plausibility of the justification raised." See Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Gov't PAC, 528 U.S. 377, 391 (2000) (emphasis added).

In Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 512 U.S. 622, 665–66 (1994), the Court pointed out that limitations on individual freedoms are also examined for definiteness or certainty of expression.[153]

> [C]ourts must accord substantial deference to the predictive judgments of Congress [emphasis added]. . . . Sound policymaking often requires legislators to forecast future events

3. Facial Challenges

[A60] A "facial" challenge means "a claim that the law is invalid in toto, and therefore > and to anticipate the likely impact of these events based on deductions and inferences for which complete empirical support may be unavailable. . . . As an institution, moreover, Congress is far better equipped than the judiciary to "amass and evaluate the vast amounts of data" bearing upon [legislative] issue[s]. . . . And Congress is not obligated, when enacting its statutes, to make a record of the type that an administrative agency or court does to accommodate judicial review.

---

>
> That Congress' predictive judgments are entitled to substantial deference does not mean, however, that they are insulated from meaningful judicial review altogether. On the contrary, [the Court has] stressed in First Amendment cases that the deference afforded to legislative findings does "not foreclose our independent judgment of the facts bearing on an issue of constitutional law." This obligation to exercise independent judgment when First Amendment rights are implicated is not a license to reweigh the evidence de novo, or to replace Congress' factual predictions with our own. Rather, it is to assure that, in formulating its judgments, Congress has drawn reasonable inferences based on substantial evidence.

"When a legislature 'undertakes to act in areas fraught with medical and scientific uncertainties, legislative options must be especially broad and courts should be cautious not to rewrite legislation.'" See Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 360, n.3 (1997), quoting Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 370 (1983) (emphasis added).

153 See Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357 (1983); Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402–03 (1966).

"[C]onstitutional rights may not be denied simply because of hostility to their assertion or exercise." (Emphasis added.) See Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526, 535 (1963), citing Wright v. Georgia, 373 U.S. 284, 292 (1963), and Brown v. Bd. of Educ. of Topeka, 349 U.S. 294, 300 (1955). As declared in Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 16 (1958), "law and order are not . . . to be preserved by depriving the Negro children of their constitutional rights."

Inquiry into legislative motivation. In principle, the Court "will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit motive." See United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383 (1968); Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 652 (1994).

Nevertheless, in certain cases, legislative motive has been a relevant inquiry in determining the constitutionality of a statute. See, in particular, paras. K26–K27 (racial discrimination); paras. H63–H65 (establishment of religion); para. E29 (bills of attainder). The distinction between improper legislative motive and impermissible statutory object or goal is sometimes unclear. See, e.g., Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993) (statute targeting at a particular class of religious observers held violative of the Free Exercise Clause), at 540–42 (plurality opinion); and at 557–58 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

Relatedly, the Court noted in McCreary County, Kentucky, v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005):

> Examination of purpose is a staple of statutory interpretation that makes up the daily fare of every appellate court in the country, . . . and governmental purpose is a key element of a good deal of constitutional doctrine, e.g., Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976) (discriminatory purpose required for Equal Protection violation); Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 352–353 (1977) (dis-incapable of any valid application."[154] As a general matter, for a facial challenge to be successful, "the challenger must establish that no set of circumstances exists under which the [statute] would be valid."[155] In a facial challenge to the overbreadth of a law, the court should determine whether the enactment "reaches a substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct,"[156] i.e., whether the statute is "unconstitutional in a subcriminatory purpose relevant to dormant Commerce Clause claim); Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993) (discriminatory purpose raises level of scrutiny required by free exercise claim). With enquiries into purpose this common, if they were nothing but hunts for mares' nests deflecting attention from bare judicial will, the whole notion of purpose in law would have dropped into disrepute long ago. But scrutinizing purpose does make practical sense, as in Establishment Clause analysis, where an understanding of official objective emerges from readily discoverable fact, without any judicial psychoanalysis of a drafter's heart of hearts. . . . The eyes that look to purpose belong to an "objective observer," one who takes account of the traditional external signs that show up in the text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute or comparable official act. (Emphasis added.)

---

Review of factual determinations. In cases in which there is a claim of denial of rights under the federal Constitution, the Court is not bound by the conclusions of lower courts, but will reexamine the evidentiary basis on which those conclusions are founded. See Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc. 466 U.S. 485, 509–10 (1984). The requirement of independent appellate review is a rule of federal constitutional law, which does not limit the Court's deference to a trial court on matters of witness credibility, but which generally requires the Court to review the finding of facts by a court below where "a conclusion of law as to a federal right and a finding of fact are so intermingled as to make it necessary, in order to pass upon the Federal question, to analyze the facts." See Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian & Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557, 568 (1995). For example, in cases involving the area of tension between the First and Fourteenth Amendments, on the one hand, and state defamation laws, on the other, the Court reviews the evidence in the record to determine whether it could constitutionally support a judgment for the plaintiff. See, e.g., Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279, 284 (1971).

Sometimes the Court adopts presumptions to guide lower court determinations. See Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373, 379–80 (1966) (plurality opinion) (adopting rule, based on definition of "petty offense" in U.S. Code, that right to jury trial extends to all cases in which sentence of six months or greater is imposed); County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56–58 (1991) (adopting presumption, based on lower court estimate of time needed to process arrestee, that 48–hour delay in probable cause hearing after arrest is reasonable, hence constitutionally permissible); State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 425 (2003) (few punitive damage awards exceeding a single-digit ratio between punitive and compensatory damages will satisfy due process).

"[A] universal and long-established tradition of prohibiting certain conduct creates a strong presumption that the prohibition is constitutional." See Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 785 (2002) (emphasis added).

154 See, e.g., Vill. of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 494, n.5 (1982).

155 United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987); Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 301 (1993). The threat of criminal prosecution is not a necessary condition for the entertainment of a facial challenge. See Los Angeles Police Dep't v. United Reporting Publ'g Corp., 528 U.S. 32, 39 (1999).

156 Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc. 455 U.S. 489, 494 (1982). In making that determination, "a court should evaluate the ambiguous as well as the unambiguous scope of the enactment. To this extent, the vagueness of a law affects overbreadth analysis. . . . [A]mbiguous meanings cause citizens to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked." Id. at 494, n.6.

stantial portion of the cases to which it applies."[157] "Facial overbreadth challenges are especially to be discouraged. Not only do they invite judgments on fact-poor records, but they entail a further departure from the norms of adjudication in federal courts: [such] challenges call for relaxing prudential requirements of standing, to allow a determination that the law would be unconstitutionally applied to different parties and different circumstances from those at hand."[158] Accordingly, the Court has recognized the validity of facial attacks alleging overbreadth (though not necessarily using that term) in relatively few settings, and, "generally, on the strength of specific reasons weighty enough to overcome [its] well-founded reticence."[159]

4. Avoidance of Constitutional Questions

[A61] The Court has developed, for its own governance in the cases confessedly within its jurisdiction, a series of rules under which it has avoided passing upon a large part of all the constitutional questions pressed upon it for decision. First, the Court will not "anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it."[160] Second, the Court will not "formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied."[161] In addition, normally the Court will not pass upon a constitutional question, although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of.[162] This rule has found most varied application. Thus, if a case can be decided on either of two grounds, one involving a constitutional question, the other a question of statutory construction or general law, the Court will decide only the latter.[163] Appeals

---

157 Regan v. Time, Inc. 468 U.S. 641, 650 (1984).

158 Sabri v. United States, 541 U.S. 600, 609 (2004). See also New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 767–68 (1982): "The traditional rule is that a person to whom a statute may constitutionally be applied may not challenge that statute on the ground that it may conceivably be applied unconstitutionally to others in situations not before the Court. . . . [T]his rule reflects two cardinal principles of our constitutional order: the personal nature of constitutional rights and the prudential limitations on constitutional adjudication. . . . [I]t would indeed be undesirable for this Court to consider every conceivable situation which might possibly arise in the application of complex and comprehensive legislation. By focusing on the factual situation before it, and similar cases necessary for development of a constitutional rule, we face 'flesh and blood' legal problems with data relevant and adequate to an informed judgment."

159 See Sabri v. United States, 541 U.S. 600, 609 (2004), citing Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U. S. 601 (1973) (free speech); Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U. S. 500 (1964) (right to travel); Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U. S. 914, 938–46 (2000) (abortion). Facial challenges to overly broad statutes are allowed primarily for the benefit of society, e.g., to prevent the statute from chilling the First Amendment rights of other parties not before the court. The First Amendment overbreadth doctrine is discussed at length in paras. I32 et seq.

160 See, e.g., Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia S.S. Co. v. Emigration Comm'rs, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885); Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 501 (1985).

161 See, e.g., Rescue Army v. Mun. Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 570, n.34 (1947); Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 690, n.11 (1997).

162 See, e.g., Rescue Army v. Mun. Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 569 (1947); Escambia County, Florida v. McMillan, 466 U.S. 48, 51 (1984) (per curiam).

163 See, e.g., Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co., 213 U.S. 175, 191 (1909) (state or local law); Dep't of Commerce v. House of Representatives, 525 U.S. 316, 344 (1999) (federal statute); Slack v. McDaniel, 529 U.S. 473, 485 (2000) (district court is allowed and encouraged to deny a habeas petition on procedural grounds without reaching the prisoner's underlying constitutional claim).

from the highest court of a state challenging its decision of a question under the federal Constitution are frequently dismissed, because the judgment can be sustained on an independent state ground.[164] And the Court may assume, without deciding, that the alleged right or interest is constitutionally protected if it considers that the claim of constitutional infringement cannot be sustained on the merits.[165]

[A62] Finally, "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a federal statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress. . . . This approach not only reflects the prudential concern that constitutional issues not be needlessly confronted, but also recognizes that Congress is bound by and swears an oath to uphold the Constitution. The courts will therefore not lightly assume that Congress intended to infringe constitutionally protected liberties or usurp power constitutionally forbidden it."[166] "[T]his interpretative canon is not a license for the judiciary to rewrite language enacted by the legislature. . . . Any other conclusion, while purporting to be an exercise in judicial restraint, would trench upon the legislative powers vested in Congress by Art. I, § 1, of the Constitution. . . . Proper respect for those powers implies that 'statutory construction must begin with the language employed by Congress and the assumption that the ordinary meaning of that language accurately expresses the legislative purpose.'"[167] The rule allows courts to choose among constructions that are "fairly possible,"[168] not to press statutory construction to the point of disingenuous evasion even to avoid a constitutional question.[169] Hence, the constitutional doubt canon does not apply where the statute is unambiguous;[170] where Congress has made its intent clear, the Court must give effect to that intent.[171]

D. EFFECTS OF THE COURT'S DECISIONS

1. Judicial Supremacy[172]

[A63] Article VI of the Constitution makes the Constitution the "supreme Law of the Land." In 1803, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for a unanimous Court, referring to the Constitution as "the fundamental and paramount law of the nation," declared in

---

164 See, e.g., Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45, 53 (1908). See, in extenso, paras. A49–A51.

165 See, e.g., Smith v. Org. of Foster Families for Equal. & Reform, 431 U.S. 816, 847 (1977). The fact that there may be buried in the record a non-constitutional ground for decision is not, by itself, enough to invoke the prudential rule of avoiding constitutional questions, when the relevant issue was neither raised before nor considered by the court below. See Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 8 (1993).

166 Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988). See also Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 238 (1998) (construction of statute that avoids invalidation best reflects congressional will).

167 United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675, 680 (1985), quoting Park 'N Fly v. Dollar Park & Fly, Inc., 469 U.S. 189, 194 (1985).

168 Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932).

169 Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 60 (1997).

170 See, e.g., Pennsylvania Dep't of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 212 (1998).

171 Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 336 (2000). A constitutional question confronted in order to preserve, if possible, a congressional enactment is not a constitutional question confronted unnecessarily. See Edmond v. United States, 520 U.S. 651, 658 (1997).

172 See also paras. A44–A48 (finality of judgments).

the notable case of Marbury v. Madison, that "it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is."[173] This decision "declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle constitutes a permanent and indispensable feature of the constitutional system of the United States."[174] It follows that "Congress may not legislatively supersede [the Court's] decisions interpreting and applying the Constitution."[175] And Article VI of the Constitution makes the Court's constitutional decisions of binding effect on the states "any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."[176]

2. Declaration of Unconstitutionality

[A64] An unconstitutional statute "confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed."[177] However, a party can be held in contempt of court for violating an injunction, even if the injunction was invalid under the federal Constitution.[178]

[A65] "In exercising its power to review the constitutionality of a legislative Act, a federal court should act cautiously. A ruling of unconstitutionality frustrates the intent of the elected representatives of the people. Therefore, a court should refrain from invalidating more of the statute than is necessary. . . . [Hence,] whenever [a statute] contains unobjectionable provisions separable from those found to be unconstitutional, it is the duty of the court to so declare, and to maintain the [enactment] insofar as it is valid."[179] The question of severability is one of legislative intent: would the legislature still have passed certain provisions had it known that other provisions of the statute were invalid?[180] "Partial invalidation would be improper if it were contrary to legislative intent in the sense that the legislature had passed an inseverable Act or would not have passed it had it known the challenged provision was invalid."[181]

---

[173] Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803).

[174] Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958).

[175] Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 437 (2000). "Judgments, within the powers vested in courts by the Judiciary Article of the Constitution, may not lawfully be revised, overturned, or refused faith and credit by another Department of Government." See Plaut v. Spendthrift Farms, 514 U.S. 211, 225–26 (1995), quoting Chicago & S. Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 113 (1948).

[176] Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958). The guarantees of the Bill of Rights "are warrants for the here and now, and, unless there is an overwhelmingly compelling reason, they are to be promptly fulfilled." See Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526, 533 (1963).

[177] Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886).

[178] See Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 313–14 (1967). Nevertheless, in upholding the contempt citations at issue, the Court noted that that was "not a case where the injunction was transparently invalid or had only a frivolous pretense to validity." Id. at 315.

[179] See Regan v. Time, Inc., 468 U.S. 641, 652–53 (1984) (plurality opinion).

[180] See Denver Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 518 U.S. 727, 767 (1996) (plurality opinion). If a statute contains no express "severability clause," courts can find the statute's "severability" intention in its structure and purpose. Id.

In United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 223 (2005), the Court held that it should retain those portions of the federal statute at issue that were constitutionally valid, "capable of functioning independently," and "consistent with Congress' basic objectives in enacting the statute."

[181] Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 506 (1985). See also Champlin Ref. Co. v. Corp. Comm'n of Oklahoma, 286 U.S. 210, 234 (1932) ("Unless it is evident that the

3. Power of Precedent

[A66] The Court's decisions are binding as precedents on state and lower federal courts. Stare decisis means that the Court should regard its prior decisions as controlling precedents. "The doctrine of stare decisis is essential to the respect accorded to the judgments of the Court and to the stability of the law."[182] This doctrine "promotes the even-handed, predictable, and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the actual and perceived integrity of the judicial process."[183] Stare decisis "is not an inexorable command, . . . but instead reflects a policy judgment that, in most matters, it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right."[184] That policy is at its weakest when the Court interprets the Constitution, because its interpretation can be altered only by constitutional amendment or by the Court itself.[185] But even in constitutional cases, the doctrine carries such persuasive force that the Court requires a departure from precedent to be supported by some "special justification."[186] Thus, the Court has held, for example, that stare decisis does not prevent it from overruling a previous decision that is "unworkable or badly reasoned"[187] or where there has been a significant change in or subsequent development of the constitutional law.[188]

4. Retroactivity[189]

[A67] The Court has recognized a general rule of retrospective effect for its constitutional decisions.[190] In Linkletter, however, it developed a doctrine under which it could Legislature would not have enacted those provisions which are within its power independently of that which is not, the invalid part may be dropped if what is left is fully operative as a law.").

---

Although the Court does not normally grant petitions for certiorari solely to review what purports to be an application of state law, it has done so where a lower federal court's severability decision is plainly wrong and leads to blatant nullification of state law. See Leavitt v. Jane L., 518 U.S. 137, 144–45 (1996) (per curiam).

182 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 577 (2003).

183 Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 827 (1991).

184 Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 235 (1997).

185 Id.

186 United States v. Int'l Bus. Machs. Corp., 517 U.S. 843, 856 (1996).

187 See, e.g., United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 712 (1993).

188 See Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 235–36 (1997), citing United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 521 (1995) (stare decisis may yield where a prior decision's "underpinnings [have been] eroded, by subsequent decisions of this Court"); Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 803 (1989) (noting that a "later development of . . . constitutional law" is a basis for overruling a decision). See also Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 854–55 (1992): "[F]or example, we may ask whether the rule has proved to be intolerable simply in defying practical workability, Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 382 U.S. 111, 116 (1965); whether the rule is subject to a kind of reliance that would lend a special hardship to the consequences of overruling and add inequity to the cost of repudiation, e.g., United States v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 265 U.S. 472, 486 (1924); whether related principles of law have so far developed as to have left the old rule no more than a remnant of abandoned doctrine, see Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 173–174 (1989); or whether facts have so changed or come to be seen so differently, as to have robbed the old rule of significant application or justification."

189 See also paras. E51–E54 (retroactive judicial decision making and the "fair warning" doctrine).

190 See, e.g., Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425, 442 (1886).

deny retroactive effect to a newly announced rule of criminal law. Under Linkletter, "a decision to confine a new rule to prospective application rested on the purpose of the new rule, the reliance placed upon the previous view of the law, and the "effect on the administration of justice of a retrospective application' of the new rule."[191] In the civil context, Chevron Oil similarly permitted the denial of retroactive effect to "a new principle of law" if such a limitation "would avoid 'injustice or hardship' without unduly undermining the 'purpose and effect' of the new rule."[192]

[A68] The Court subsequently overruled Linkletter in Griffith, and eliminated limits on retroactivity in the criminal context by holding that all newly declared constitutional rules must be applied retroactively to all criminal cases pending on direct review. This holding rested on two basic norms of constitutional adjudication. First, the Court reasoned that, unlike a legislature, it does not promulgate new rules of constitutional criminal procedure on a broad basis, and that the integrity of judicial review requires application of a new constitutional rule announced in a specific case to all similar cases pending on direct review. Second, the Court concluded that "selective application of new rules violates the principle of treating similarly situated defendants the same."[193] Relying on the same principles, Harper held that when the Court applies a rule of federal law to the parties before it in a non-criminal case, that rule is "the controlling interpretation of federal law, and must be given full retroactive effect in all cases still open on direct review and as to all events, regardless of whether such events predate or postdate" its announcement of the rule.[194] Conversely, new constitutional rules for the conduct of criminal prosecutions are not applicable to those cases that have become final before the new rules are announced by the Court, unless the new rule places "certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal law-making authority to proscribe,"[195] or "addresses a substantive categorical guarantee accorded by the Constitution, such as a rule prohibiting a certain category of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense,"[196] or could be considered a "'watershed rule of criminal procedure,' implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding."[197]

---

191 See Harper v. Virginia Dep't of Taxation, 509 U.S. 86, 94 (1993), discussing Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 636 (1965).

192 See Harper v. Virginia Dep't of Taxation, 509 U.S. 86, 94–95 (1993), referring to Chevron Oil Co. v. Huson, 404 U.S. 97, 106–07 (1971).

193 Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314, 322–23 (1987).

194 Harper v. Virginia Dep't of Taxation, 509 U.S. 86, 97 (1993).

195 Caspari v. Bohlen, 510 U.S. 383, 396 (1994), quoting Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 311 (1989) (plurality opinion).

196 Saffle v. Parks, 494 U.S. 484, 494 (1990).

197 Saffle v. Parks, 494, U.S. 484, 488 (1990), quoting Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 311 (1989). See also Graham v. Collins, 506 U.S. 461, 478 (1993). To fall within this exception, a new rule must meet two requirements: infringement of the rule must "seriously diminish the likelihood of obtaining an accurate conviction," and the rule must "alter [the] understanding of the bedrock procedural elements essential to the fairness of a proceeding." See Tyler v. Cain, 533 U.S. 656, 665 (2001) (emphasis added).

A holding constitutes a "new rule" within the meaning of Teague if it "breaks new ground," "imposes a new obligation on the States or the Federal Government," or was not "dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final." See, e.g., Graham v. Collins, 506 U.S. 461, 467 (1993).

E. HOW THE COURT ADJUDICATES CASES

[A69] Until 1988, the Supreme Court was required to hear and decide a significant portion of cases appealed from lower courts. In that year, Congress abolished most of the mandatory appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, giving the Court almost complete control over its docket. As a result, the Court reviews, as a matter of principle, only those cases it chooses to hear by means of the writ of certiorari,[198] i.e., an order directing a lower court to send the record of a case for review. Under Rule 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court (Sup.Ct.Rules),

> Review on a writ of certiorari is not a matter of right, but of judicial discretion. A petition for a writ of certiorari will be granted only for compelling reasons. The following, although neither controlling nor fully measuring the Court's discretion, indicate the character of the reasons the Court considers:
>
> (a) a United States court of appeals has entered a decision in conflict with the decision of another United States court of appeals on the same important matter; has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with a decision by a state court of last resort; or has so far departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings, or sanctioned such a departure by a lower court, as to call for an exercise of this Court's supervisory power;
>
> (b) a state court of last resort has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with the decision of another state court of last resort or of a United States court of appeals;
>
> (c) a state court or a United States court of appeals has decided an important question of federal law that has not been, but should be, settled by this Court, or has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with relevant decisions of this Court.
>
> A petition for a writ of certiorari is rarely granted when the asserted error consists of erroneous factual findings or the misapplication of a properly stated rule of law.

To apply Teague, a federal habeas court must: (1) determine the date on which the defendant's conviction became final; (2) survey the legal landscape as it existed on that date to determine whether a state court then considering the defendant's claim would have felt compelled by existing precedent to conclude that the rule the defendant seeks was constitutionally required; and (3) if not, consider whether the relief sought falls within one of two narrow exceptions to non-retroactivity. See Lambrix v. Singletary, 520 U.S. 518, 527 (1997).

198 28 U.S.C. Section 1254 provides that "Cases in the courts of appeals may be reviewed by the Supreme Court by . . . writ of certiorari granted upon the petition of any party to any civil or criminal case, before or after rendition of judgment or decree." Under 28 U.S.C. Section 1257(a), "Final judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had may be reviewed by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari where the validity of a treaty or statute of the United States is drawn in question or where the validity of a statute of any State is drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is specially set up or claimed under the Constitution or the treaties or statutes of, or any commission held or authority exercised under, the United States."

Sup.Ct.Rule 11 provides that "A petition for a writ of certiorari to review a case pending in a United States court of appeals, before judgment is entered in that court, will be granted only upon a showing that the case is of such imperative public importance as to justify deviation from normal appellate practice and to require immediate determination in this Court." The Court ordinarily considers "only the questions set forth in the petition, or fairly included therein" (Sup.Ct.Rule 14.1(a)). Nevertheless, it may request the parties to address an important question of law not raised in the petition for certiorari,[199] and will consider such a question in exceptional cases.[200]

---

[199] See, e.g., Payne v. Tennessee, 498 U.S. 1080 (1991).

[200] Izumi Seimitsu Kogyo Kabushiki Kaisha v. U.S. Philips Corp., 510 U.S. 27, 28 (1993) (per curiam).

Content of a Petition for a Writ of Certiorari. Sup.Ct.Rule 14 provides that:

1. A petition for a writ of certiorari shall contain, in the order indicated:
   - (a) The questions presented for review, expressed concisely in relation to the circumstances of the case, without unnecessary detail. The questions should be short and should not be argumentative or repetitive. If the petitioner or respondent is under a death sentence that may be affected by the disposition of the petition, the notation "capital case" shall precede the questions presented. The questions shall be set out on the first page following the cover, and no other information may appear on that page. The statement of any question presented is deemed to comprise every subsidiary question fairly included therein. Only the questions set out in the petition, or fairly included therein, will be considered by the Court.
   - (b) A list of all parties to the proceeding in the court whose judgment is sought to be reviewed (unless the caption of the case contains the names of all the parties), and a list of parent companies and non-wholly owned subsidiaries as required by Rule 29.6.
   - (c) If the petition exceeds five pages, a table of contents and a table of cited authorities.
   - (d) Citations of the official and unofficial reports of the opinions and orders entered in the case by courts or administrative agencies.
   - (e) A concise statement of the basis for jurisdiction in this Court, showing:
     - (i) the date the judgment or order sought to be reviewed was entered (and, if applicable, a statement that the petition is filed under this Court's Rule 11);
     - (ii) the date of any order respecting rehearing, and the date and terms of any order granting an extension of time to file the petition for a writ of certiorari;
     - (iii) express reliance on Rule 12.5, when a cross-petition for a writ of certiorari is filed under that Rule, and the date of docketing of the petition for a writ of certiorari in connection with which the cross-petition is filed;
     - (iv) the statutory provision believed to confer on this Court jurisdiction to review on a writ of certiorari the judgment or order in question; and
     - (v) if applicable, a statement that the notifications required by Rule 29.4(b) or (c) have been made.
   - (f) The constitutional provisions, treaties, statutes, ordinances, and regulations involved in the case, set out verbatim with appropriate citation. If the provisions involved are lengthy, their citation alone suffices at this point, and their pertinent text shall be set out in the appendix referred to in subparagraph 1(i).
   - (g) A concise statement of the case setting out the facts material to consideration of the questions presented, and also containing the following:
     - (i) If review of a state-court judgment is sought, specification of the stage in the proceedings, both in the court of first instance and in the appellate courts, when the federal questions sought to be reviewed were raised; the method or [A70] Except where the petitioner proceeds in forma pauperis, the petitioner must file 40 copies of a petition for a writ of certiorari and pay a docket fee (Sup.Ct.Rule 12). "Unless otherwise provided by law, a petition for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment in any case, civil or criminal, entered by a state court of last resort or a United States court of appeals is timely when it is filed with the Clerk of th[e] Court within 90

---

manner of raising them and the way in which they were passed on by those courts; and pertinent quotations of specific portions of the record or summary thereof, with specific reference to the places in the record where the matter appears (e.g., court opinion, ruling on exception, portion of court's charge and exception thereto, assignment of error), so as to show that the federal question was timely and properly raised and that this Court has jurisdiction to review the judgment on a writ of certiorari. When the portions of the record relied on under this subparagraph are voluminous, they shall be included in the appendix referred to in subparagraph 1(i).

(ii) If review of a judgment of a United States court of appeals is sought, the basis for federal jurisdiction in the court of first instance.

(h) A direct and concise argument amplifying the reasons relied on for allowance of the writ. See Rule 10.

(i) An appendix containing, in the order indicated:

(i) the opinions, orders, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, whether written or orally given and transcribed, entered in conjunction with the judgment sought to be reviewed;

(ii) any other opinions, orders, findings of fact, and conclusions of law entered in the case by courts or administrative agencies, and, if reference thereto is necessary to ascertain the grounds of the judgment, of those in companion cases (each document shall include the caption showing the name of the issuing court or agency, the title and number of the case, and the date of entry);

(iii) any order on rehearing, including the caption showing the name of the issuing court, the title and number of the case, and the date of entry;

(iv) the judgment sought to be reviewed if the date of its entry is different from the date of the opinion or order required in sub-subparagraph (i) of this subparagraph;

(v) material required by subparagraphs 1(f) or 1(g)(i); and

(vi) any other material the petitioner believes essential to understand the petition.

If the material required by this subparagraph is voluminous, it may be presented in a separate volume or volumes with appropriate covers.

2. All contentions in support of a petition for a writ of certiorari shall be set out in the body of the petition, as provided in subparagraph 1(h) of this Rule. No separate brief in support of a petition for a writ of certiorari may be filed, and the Clerk will not file any petition for a writ of certiorari to which any supporting brief is annexed or appended.

3. A petition for a writ of certiorari should be stated briefly and in plain terms and may not exceed the page limitations specified in Rule 33 (30 pages).

4. The failure of a petitioner to present with accuracy, brevity, and clarity whatever is essential to ready and adequate understanding of the points requiring consideration is sufficient reason for the Court to deny a petition.

5. If the Clerk determines that a petition submitted timely and in good faith is in a form that does not comply with this Rule or with Rule 33 or Rule 34, the Clerk will return it with a letter indicating the deficiency. A corrected petition received no more than 60 days after the date of the Clerk's letter will be deemed timely.

days after entry of the judgment." (Sup.Ct.Rule 13.1.) "A brief in opposition to a petition for a writ of certiorari may be filed by the respondent in any case, but is not mandatory, except in a capital case, or when ordered by the Court." (Sup.Ct.Rule 15.1.)

[A71] After considering the relevant documents, the Court enters an appropriate order, which may be a summary disposition on the merits (Sup.Ct.Rule 16.1). According to the "Rule of Four" principle, the votes of four Justices are enough to grant certiorari and bring a case before the Court for oral argument. Nevertheless, five Justices can undo the grant by voting, after the case has been heard, to dismiss the writ as improvidently granted. Of the 7,000 or so certiorari petitions filed each year,[201] plenary review with oral arguments is granted in about 100 cases per term. Formal written opinions are delivered in about 80 cases; approximately half of them concern issues of constitutional law. The Court disposes of 50 or so additional cases summarily. The Court's denial of certiorari does not constitute a ruling on the merits.[202]

[A72] A party to a judgment sought to be reviewed by the Court may present to a Justice an application to stay the enforcement of that judgment. The application must be addressed to the Justice allotted to the circuit from which the case arises. The conditions that must be shown to be satisfied before a circuit Justice may grant such an application are well established: "a likelihood of irreparable injury that, assuming the correctness of the applicants' position, would result were a stay not issued; a reasonable probability that the Court will grant certiorari; and a fair prospect that the applicant will ultimately prevail on the merits."[203] "[I]n a close case, it may be appropriate to 'balance the equities'—to explore the relative harms to applicant and respondent, as well as the interests of the public at large."[204] The burden is on the applicant "to rebut the presumption that the decisions below—both on the merits and on the proper interim disposition of the case—are correct."[205]

[A73] When the Court grants certiorari, the parties submit briefs before oral argument. The petitioner must file 40 copies of the brief on the merits within 45 days of the order granting the writ of certiorari (Sup.Ct.Rule 25.1). The respondent will file 40 copies of the brief on the merits within 30 days after receiving the brief for the petitioner (Sup.Ct.Rule 25.2). The petitioner files 40 copies of the reply brief, if any, within 30 days after receiving the brief for the respondent, but any reply brief must actually be received by the Clerk no more than one week before the date of oral argument (Sup.Ct.Rule 25.3).[206]

---

[201] The Court's caseload has increased rapidly in recent years. In 1960, only 2,313 cases were on the docket.

[202] See, e.g., Barber v. Tennessee, 513 U.S. 1184 (1995) (opinion of Stevens, J., respecting denial of certiorari). In considering which cases are certworthy, the Justices usually rely on memoranda prepared for that purpose by their law clerks.

[203] See, e.g., Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 510 U.S. 1309, 1310 (1994) (Justice Souter in chambers).

[204] Rostker v. Goldberg, 448 U.S. 1306, 1308 (1980) (Justice Brennan in chambers).

[205] Id.

[206] Content of Briefs. Rule 24 of the Rules of the Supreme Court provides that:

1. A brief on the merits for a petitioner or an appellant shall comply in all respects with Rules 33.1 and 34 and shall contain in the order here indicated:
   (a) The questions presented for review under Rule 14.1(a). The questions shall be set out on the first page following the cover, and no other information may appear on that page. The phrasing of the questions presented need not be identical with that in the petition for a writ of certiorari or the jurisdictional statement, but the brief may not raise additional questions or change the substance of the questions already presented in those documents. At its option, however, the Court may consider a plain error not among the questions presented but evident from the record and otherwise within its jurisdiction to decide.

[A74] "An amicus curiae brief which brings to the attention of the Court relevant matter not already brought to its attention by the parties may be of considerable help to the Court. An amicus curiae brief that does not serve this purpose burdens the Court, and its filing is not favored." (Sup.Ct.Rule 37.1.) "An amicus curiae brief in a case before the Court for oral argument may be filed if accompanied by the written consent of all parties, or if the Court grants leave to file." (Sup.Ct.Rule 37.3.) "No motion for leave to file an amicus curiae brief is necessary if the brief is presented on behalf of the United States by the Solicitor General; on behalf of any agency of the United States allowed by law to appear before the Court when submitted by the agency's authorized legal representative; on behalf of a State, Commonwealth, Territory, or Possession when submitted by its Attorney General; or on behalf of a city, county, town, or similar entity when submitted by its authorized law officer." (Sup.Ct.Rule 37.4.)

---

(b) A list of all parties to the proceeding in the court whose judgment is under review (unless the caption of the case in this Court contains the names of all parties). Any amended list of parent companies and nonwholly owned subsidiaries as required by Rule 29.6 shall be placed here.

(c) If the brief exceeds five pages, a table of contents and a table of cited authorities.

(d) Citations of the official and unofficial reports of the opinions and orders entered in the case by courts and administrative agencies.

(e) A concise statement of the basis for jurisdiction in this Court, including the statutory provisions and time factors on which jurisdiction rests.

(f) The constitutional provisions, treaties, statutes, ordinances, and regulations involved in the case, set out verbatim with appropriate citation. If the provisions involved are lengthy, their citation alone suffices at this point, and their pertinent text, if not already set out in the petition for a writ of certiorari, jurisdictional statement, or an appendix to either document, shall be set out in an appendix to the brief.

(g) A concise statement of the case, setting out the facts material to the consideration of the questions presented, with appropriate references to the joint appendix, e. g., App. 12, or to the record, e. g., Record 12.

(h) A summary of the argument, suitably paragraphed. The summary should be a clear and concise condensation of the argument made in the body of the brief; mere repetition of the headings under which the argument is arranged is not sufficient.

(i) The argument, exhibiting clearly the points of fact and of law presented and citing the authorities and statutes relied on.

(j) A conclusion specifying with particularity the relief the party seeks.

2. A brief on the merits for a respondent or an appellee shall conform to the foregoing requirements, except that items required by subparagraphs 1(a), (b), (d), (e), (f), and (g) of this Rule need not be included unless the respondent or appellee is dissatisfied with their presentation by the opposing party.

3. A brief on the merits may not exceed the page limitations specified in Rule 33.1(g) (50 pages). An appendix to a brief may include only relevant material, and counsel are cautioned not to include in an appendix arguments or citations that properly belong in the body of the brief.

4. A reply brief shall conform to those portions of this Rule applicable to the brief for a respondent or an appellee, but, if appropriately divided by topical headings, need not contain a summary of the argument.

[A75] All Justices read the briefs before oral argument, which should emphasize and clarify the written arguments in the briefs (Sup.Ct.Rule 28.1). Unless the Court directs otherwise, each side is allowed one-half hour for argument (Sup.Ct.Rule 28.3). Oral argument is more like a conversation than a lecture, since the advocate is usually called upon to answer questions from the bench. As a matter of principle, only one attorney will be heard for each side (Sup.Ct.Rule 28.4). Oral argument is not allowed on behalf of any party for whom a brief has not been filed (Sup.Ct.Rule 28.6). By leave of the Court, counsel for an amicus curiae who has filed a brief may argue orally on the side of a party, with the consent of that party. In the absence of consent, counsel for an amicus curiae may seek leave of the Court to argue orally by a motion setting out specifically and concisely why oral argument would provide assistance to the Court not otherwise available. Such a motion will be granted only in the most extraordinary circumstances (Sup.Ct.Rule 28.7).

[A76] The Supreme Court does not sit in panels; all nine Justices sit to hear the oral arguments and decide each case. A member of the Court may disqualify himself or herself from sitting in a case, e.g., when he or she has a personal interest in the outcome of the case. If the remaining Justices are divided in opinion, the judgment below is affirmed; an affirmance by an equally divided Court is not entitled to precedential weight.[207] Similarly, the lower court's decision is affirmed when the Court fails to find a quorum of six Justices.

[A77] The Court's view of the law in each case is expressed by the majority opinion. By tradition, the senior Justice in the majority either assumes responsibility for the task of writing the Court's opinion or assigns that task to another of the Justices who make up the majority. Justices file concurring opinions when they do not agree with all or part of the majority's (or the plurality's) reasoning but agree with the outcome in a case. Justices who disagree with the result the Court has reached file dissenting opinions.[208] The Court's official decisions are published in the United States Reports.

---

5. A reference to the joint appendix or to the record set out in any brief shall indicate the appropriate page number. If the reference is to an exhibit, the page numbers at which the exhibit appears, at which it was offered in evidence, and at which it was ruled on by the judge shall be indicated, e.g., Pl. Exh. 14, Record 199, 2134.
6. A brief shall be concise, logically arranged with proper headings, and free of irrelevant, immaterial, or scandalous matter. The Court may disregard or strike a brief that does not comply with this paragraph.

[207] See, e.g., United States v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 216 (1942).

[208] "When a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds." See Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193 (1977) (emphasis added). When a disposition of a litigation does not command a majority of the Court, and in order that disposition may be made of the case, a Justice has to join the order that is more nearly in accord with his or her own views concerning appropriate disposition. See Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 134 (1945) (Rutledge, J., concurring).

CHAPTER 2

GENERAL ISSUES OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

A. RIGHTHOLDERS

1. Fetus

[B1] In Roe v. Wade, the Court examined thoroughly and rejected the argument of the state of Texas that the fetus is a "person," within the language and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. After a brief analysis of the use of the term "person" in the Constitution,[1] the Court came to the conclusion that none of the relevant constitutional provisions "indicates, with any insurance, that it has any possible pre-natal application." Moreover, although "unborn children have been recognized by the law as acquiring rights or interests by way of inheritance or other devolution of property, . . . perfection of the interests involved . . . has generally been contingent upon live birth." "In short, the unborn have never been recognized in the law as persons in the whole sense." Thus, without resolving the awkward question of when life begins, the Court decided unanimously that abortion does not terminate life protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.[2]

2. Private Associations and Corporations

[B2] Associations and corporations, recognized by the state as legal persons, enjoy several constitutional rights. A corporation is a "person" within the meaning of the equal protection and due process of law clauses of the Constitution.[3] Corporations have the right to publicize their views on issues of public importance, even though not materially affecting their business or property, because the role of the First Amendment is not only to foster individual self-expression, but also to guarantee "the public access to dis-

---

1 Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment contains three references to "person." The first, in defining "citizens," speaks of "persons born or naturalized in the United States." The word also appears both in the Due Process Clause and in the Equal Protection Clause. "Person" is also used in other places in the Constitution: in the listing of qualifications for representatives and senators, Article I, Section 2, Clause 2, and Section 3, Clause 3; in the Apportionment Clause, Article I, Section 2, Clause 3; in the Migration and Importation provision, Article I, Section 9, Clause 1; in the Emolument Clause, Article I, Section 9, Clause 8; in the Electors provisions, Article II, Section 1, Clause 2, and the superseded Clause 3; in the provision outlining qualifications for the office of President, Article II, Section 1, Clause 5; in the Extradition provisions, Article IV, Section 2, Clause 2, and the superseded Fugitive Slave Clause 3; and in the Fifth, Twelfth, and Twenty-second Amendments, as well as in Sections 2 and 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

2 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 156–62 (1973).

3 Grosjean v. Am. Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 244 (1936). By contrast, the Privileges and Immunities Clause (art. IV, § 2) is inapplicable to corporations. See Hemphill v. Orloff, 277 U.S. 537, 548–50 (1928); W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization of California, 451 U.S. 648, 656 (1981).

cussion, debate, and the dissemination of information and ideas."[4] Political parties have the First Amendment right of self-government[5] and the right to exclude the non-members from participating in the primary elections of party nominees for federal or state offices.[6] The Fourth Amendment guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures is applicable to corporations.[7] Yet, artificial entities are not entitled to "purely personal" guarantees whose "historic function . . . has been limited to the protection of individuals."[8] Hence, corporations enjoy no constitutional privilege against compulsory self-incrimination by virtue of the Fifth Amendment,[9] and they may be compelled to produce their books and records in criminal proceedings,[10] even if these documents might incriminate their representatives.[11]

3. Governmental Bodies

[B3] A state is not a "person" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment; nor does it have standing to invoke the Bill of Attainder Clause of Article I or the principle of separation of powers, which exist only to protect private individuals or groups.[12] A state has the power to create—and dissolve—legal entities as its political subdivisions. Such entities are the municipalities, which are not entitled to self-government, under the federal Constitution. A city, either as "an agent of the state for governmental purposes [or] as an organization to care for local needs in a private or proprietary capacity," cannot invoke against its state the constitutional right of property[13] or the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[14] Likewise, the purpose of the First Amendment is "to protect private expression, and nothing in the guarantee precludes the government from controlling its own expression."[15]

---

4 See First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777 (1978) ("The inherent worth of the speech in terms of its capacity for informing the public does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union, or individual."). In that case, appellants, national banking associations and business corporations, wanted to spend money to publicize their views opposing a referendum proposal to amend the Massachusetts Constitution to authorize the legislature to enact a graduated personal income tax and challenged the constitutionality of a Massachusetts criminal statute that prohibited them and other specified business corporations from making contributions or expenditures "for the purpose of . . . influencing or affecting the vote on any question submitted to the voters, other than one materially affecting any of the property, business or assets of the corporation."

5 See Marchioro v. Chaney, 442 U.S. 191, 199 (1979).

6 California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 574–75, 586 (2000).

7 Silverthorne Lumber Co., Inc. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920); G. M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 353–54 (1977).

8 First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 779, n.14 (1978).

9 California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 55 (1974).

10 United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694, 699 (1944).

11 Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, 384–86, 400 (1911); Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99, 109–18 (1988).

12 S. Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 323–24 (1966).

13 Trenton v. New Jersey, 262 U.S. 182, 191–92 (1923).

14 Newark v. New Jersey, 262 U.S. 192, 196 (1923).

15 See CBS, Inc. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 139, n.7 (1973) (concurring opinion of Justice Stewart).

B. PERSONS BOUND BY CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS—THE CONCEPT OF "STATE ACTION"

1. Public Authorities and Agents

[B4] The action of all state and federal officers is constrained by the constitutional provisions on individual rights, when they act in their official capacity,[16] even in the context of administrative practices[17] or in relation to private policies.[18] A body of citizens that enacts laws, via referenda, is also bound by individual rights and liberties.[19] The Constitution constrains governmental action "by whatever instruments or in whatever modes . . . [or] under whatever congressional label" that action may be taken.[20] Hence, government agencies must comply with constitutional guarantees even when acting under conditions similar to those under which an individual entrepreneur does business.[21]

[B5] The concept of "state action" is closely interconnected to the notion of "acting under color of (state) law," which is a requirement for a lawsuit under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983[22] or a conviction under 18 U.S.C. Section 242.[23] The Court has made clear that, if a defendant's conduct satisfies the state action requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment, that conduct also constitutes action "under color of state law" for Section 1983 purposes.[24] The traditional definition of acting under color of state law requires that the defendant in a Section 1983 action or the accused of a Section 242 offense has exercised power "possessed by virtue of state law" and that the misuse of such power

---

[16] See, e.g., Chicago Burlington & Quincy R.R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226, 234 (1897); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 14 (1948).

[17] Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373–74 (1886), involved the power of municipal authorities to grant, at their own will, licenses to keep lawful business of public laundries and washhouses. As the Court stated, "[t]hough the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal protection of the laws is still within the prohibition of the Constitution."

[18] Griffin v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 130, 136–37 (1964), concerned the exclusion of African Americans from a privately owned amusement park. The Court held that "when a State undertakes to enforce a private policy of racial segregation," the state violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

[19] Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 373–81 (1967) (judicial scrutiny, under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, of rules added to a state constitution, pursuant to a referendum). However, "statements made by private individuals during a citizen-driven petition drive . . . do not, in and of themselves, constitute state action for Fourteenth Amendment purposes," and private motives behind a referendum drive are not, in principle, attributable to the state. See City of Cuyahoga Falls v. Buckeye Cmty. Hope Found., 538 U.S. 188 (2003).

[20] Lebron v. Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp., 513 U.S. 374, 392–93 (1995).

[21] See, in particular, Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 726 (1961) (when a state agency leases a restaurant located in a publicly owned and operated automobile parking building, "the proscriptions of the Fourteenth Amendment must be complied with by the lessee as certainly as though they were binding covenants written into the agreement itself").

[22] 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 provides a federal cause of action against any person who, acting under color of state law, deprives another of his federal rights.

[23] 18 U.S.C. Section 242 makes it an offense for any person, under color of law, willfully to subject any inhabitant of any state, territory, or district to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

[24] Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 935 (1982).

was "made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law."[25] To constitute state action, the deprivation of constitutional rights must "be caused by the exercise of some right or privilege created by the State or by a person for whom the State is responsible and the party charged with the deprivation must be a person who may fairly be said to be a state actor. . . . State employment is generally sufficient to render the defendant a state actor. It is firmly established that an individual acts under color of state law when he abuses the position given to him by the State. . . . Thus, generally, a public employee acts under color of state law while acting in his official capacity or while exercising his responsibilities pursuant to state law." In the light of the previous observations, the Court has held that a physician who is under contract with the state to provide medical services to inmates at a state prison hospital, on a part-time basis, acts under color of state law when he treats an inmate (even though he acts in accordance with professional discretion and judgment and even when he does not exercise custodial or supervisory authority), given the state's obligation, under the Eighth Amendment and state law, to provide adequate medical care to those whom it has incarcerated.[26] Moreover, the action of an individual who, as a deputy sheriff possessing state authority, purports to act pursuant to that authority, is state action; it is immaterial that he could have taken the same action in a purely private capacity, or that his action was not authorized by state law.[27] Similarly, a private detective, employed by a business corporation to find the thieves of its property, who held a special police officer's card issued by the City of Miami, and had taken an oath and qualified as a special police officer, acted "under color of law," within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. Section 242, when, showing his badge and accompanied by a regular policeman, he beat certain suspects and thereby obtained confessions.[28] By contrast, a public defender does not act "under color of state law" when performing a lawyer's traditional functions as counsel to an indigent defendant in a state criminal proceeding, because he keeps his professional independence vis-à-vis the state and works on behalf of his client, to whom he owes a duty of undivided loyalty.[29] And the murder of a 15-year-old girl by a parolee five months after he was released from prison, despite his history as a sex offender, cannot be fairly characterized as state action, since the parolee was in no sense an agent of the parole board, which was not aware that the girl faced any special danger.[30]

[B6] The Court has also dealt with the character of activities of various legal entities created by the government. With respect to that matter, it is established that whenever "the Government creates a corporation by special law for the furtherance of governmental objectives, and retains for itself permanent authority to appoint a majority of that corporation's directors, the corporation is part of the Government for pur-

---

[25] United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 326 (1941); Williams v. United States, 341 U.S. 97, 99 (1951); Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 929 (1982).

[26] West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 49–57 (1988).

[27] Griffin v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 130, 135 (1964). In that case, petitioners, five young African-Americans, were convicted of criminal trespass for refusing to leave a privately owned and operated amusement park (which had a policy of racial segregation), at the command of an employee of the amusement park acting under color of his authority as a deputy sheriff.

[28] Williams v. United States, 341 U.S. 97, 98–100 (1951).

[29] Polk County v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 312, 317–22 (1981).

[30] Martinez v. California, 444 U.S. 277, 285 (1980) (under the particular circumstances of the case, "appellants' decedent's death [wa]s too remote a consequence of the parole officers' action to hold them responsible under the federal civil rights law").

poses of the First Amendment." A contrary holding would allow government to evade its constitutional obligations by simply resorting to the corporate form. Hence Amtrak, the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, though nominally a private corporation and though its authorizing statute provides that it "will not be an agency or establishment of the United States Government," must be regarded as an agency or instrumentality of the United States for the purpose of individual rights guaranteed against the government by the Constitution, since it was created by the Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970, in the interest of the public convenience and necessity, and the legislation establishes detailed goals for Amtrak, sets forth its structure and powers, and assigns the appointment of a majority of its board of directors to the President.[31] On the contrary, the United States Olympic Committee (USOC), a private corporation, is not a governmental actor to whom the Fifth Amendment applies; the mere fact that Congress granted it a corporate charter does not render the USOC a government agent.[32]

[B7] A legal entity's character is "determined neither by its expressly private characterization in statutory law, nor by the law's failure to acknowledge its inseparability from recognized government officials or agencies." Hence, state action can be found when there is "public entwinement in the management and control" of a private organization. The nominally private character of an association may be "overborne by the pervasive entwinement of public institutions and public officials in its composition and workings, and there is no substantial reason to claim unfairness in applying constitutional standards to it."[33] The decisions of the Court in that area can be summarized as follows.

[B8] By will probated in 1831, a testator left a fund to the City of Philadelphia in trust for the erection, maintenance, and operation of a "college," providing that it was to admit poor white male orphans. The college was established and being operated by a Board appointed under a Pennsylvania statute. Even though the Board was acting as a trustee, it was an agency of the state, and its refusal to admit African-American boys to the college solely because of their race violated the Fourteenth Amendment.[34]

[B9] A tract of land was willed in trust to the Mayor and City Council of Macon, Georgia, as a park for white people, to be controlled by a white Board of Managers. The Court assumed that "[i]f a testator wanted to leave a school or center for the use of one race only, and in no way implicated the State in the supervision, control, or management of that facility," no constitutional difficulty would be encountered. The park in issue, however, was in a different posture. "For years, it was an integral part of the City of Macon's activities. It was swept, manicured, watered, patroled, and maintained by the city as a public facility for whites only, as well as granted tax exemption." Despite the appointment of "private" trustees, there had been no change in municipal maintenance and concern over this facility. If a municipality is "firmly entwined in the management or control" of such a park, it remains subject to the constitutional restraints. Taking into account that "the service rendered even by a private park of this character is municipal

---

[31] Lebron v. Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp., 513 U.S. 374, 383–99 (1995).

[32] San Francisco Arts & Athletics Inc. v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 542–47 (1987).

[33] Brentwood Acad. v. Tennessee Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288, 298 (2001).

[34] Pennsylvania v. Bd. of Dirs. of City Trusts of the City of Philadelphia, 353 U.S. 230, 230–31 (1957) (per curiam).

in nature," the Court concluded that the park should "be treated as a public institution" and had to comply with the commands of the Fourteenth Amendment.[35]

[B10] A not-for-profit athletic association, organized to regulate inter-scholastic sport among the public and private high schools in Tennessee that belonged to it, penalized a private high school member of the association for violating a rule prohibiting "undue influence" in recruiting athletes. "To the extent of 84 percent of its membership, the Association was an organization of public schools represented by their officials acting in their official capacity to provide an integral element of secondary public schooling," inter-scholastic athletics. School officials made up the voting membership of the association's governing council and control board, which typically held meetings during regular school hours. The association set membership standards and student eligibility rules and had the power to penalize any member school that violated those rules. The State Board of Education had long acknowledged the association's role in regulating inter-scholastic competition in public schools, and its members were non-voting members of the association's governing bodies. In the light of the above, the Court held that such a "pervasive entwinement of state school officials in the structure of the Association" required that the association be charged with a public character and judged by constitutional standards, regarding its regulatory activity.[36]

2. Private Persons

a. General Principles[37]

[B11] Some rights established by the Constitution are protected from both governmental and private abridgment.[38] However, most rights secured by the Constitution are protected only against infringement by governments.[39] In relation to the Fourteenth

---

[35] Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 299–302 (1966). The park was eventually eliminated and reverted to the testator's heirs because the park's segregated character was considered to be an essential and inseparable part of the testator's plan. See Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435 (1970).

[36] Brentwood Academy v. Tennessee Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288 (2001).

[37] See also para. B4 (referendary rules).

[38] See, e.g., United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 942 (1988), concerning the Thirteenth Amendment's prohibition of "involuntary servitude;" United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 315 (1941) (the constitutional right of the people to choose representatives in Congress is secured against the action of individuals, as well as of states).

[39] See, e.g., Flagg Bros., Inc. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 156 (1978).

It must be noted that, although private action is not, in principle, restrained by any constitutional rights, it does not follow that the federal government or a state cannot impose, by proper legislation, such restrictions. See, e.g., Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964) (prohibition of racial discrimination in places of public accommodation, under the Civil Rights Act of 1964); Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409 (1968) (federal law which provides that all citizens shall have the same right, in every state and territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property); Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160 (1976) (federal law precluding private, commercially operated, nonsectarian schools from denying admission to prospective students because of their race); PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980) (state constitutional provisions that permit individuals reasonably to exercise free speech and petition rights on the property of a privately owned shopping center to which the public is invited); Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987) (state statute requiring Rotary Clubs to admit women).

Amendment, the Courts has emphasized "the essential dichotomy set forth in that Amendment between deprivation by the State, subject to scrutiny under its provisions, and private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful, against which the Fourteenth Amendment offers no shield."[40] Careful adherence to the "state action" requirement "preserves an area of individual freedom by limiting the reach of federal law and federal judicial power [and] also avoids imposing on the State, its agencies or officials, responsibility for conduct for which they cannot fairly be blamed."[41] The question whether particular conduct is "private," on the one hand, or "state action," on the other, frequently admits to no easy answer. Reflecting the discontinuity that marks the law in this area, the Court has variously characterized the inquiry as whether "there is such a close nexus between the State and the challenged action that seemingly private behavior may be fairly treated as that of the State itself,"[42] whether the state, "by encouraging the challenged conduct, could be thought "responsible for those actions,"[43] or whether "the alleged infringement of federal rights [is] fairly attributable to the State."[44] Whatever the semantic formulation, "what is fairly attributable to the State is a matter of normative judgment, and the criteria lack rigid simplicity. From the range of circumstances that could point toward the State behind an individual face, no one fact can function as a necessary condition across the board for finding state action; nor is any set of circumstances absolutely sufficient, for there may be some countervailing reason against attributing activity to the government."[45] Though each case giving rise to the question of "state action" is "decided separately by sifting facts and weighing circumstances,"[46] the Court's opinions reflect a two-part approach to this question of "fair attribution:" "First, the deprivation must be caused by the exercise of some right or privilege created by the State or by a rule of conduct imposed by the State. . . . Second, the private party charged with the deprivation must be a person who may fairly be said to be a state actor, because he has acted together with or has obtained significant aid from state officials, or because his conduct is otherwise chargeable to the State. Without a limit such as this, private parties could face constitutional litigation whenever they seek to rely on some state rule governing their interactions with the community surrounding them."[47] From the Court's case law, one can reasonably infer some safe, substantive criteria[48] upon which the Court relies its judgments in that field.

---

[40] See Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 349 (1974), citing Civil Rights Cases (United States v. Singleton), 109 U.S. 3 (1883).

[41] Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 936 (1982).

[42] Brentwood Acad. v. Tennessee Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288, 295 (2001), quoting Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 351 (1974).

[43] See Lebron v. Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp., 513 U.S. 374, 408 (1995) (opinion of Justice O'Connor), citing Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1005 (1982).

[44] Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 838 (1982); Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 936 (1982).

[45] Brentwood Acad. v. Tennessee Ass'n, 531 U.S. 288, 295–96 (2001).

[46] Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 299–300 (1966), quoting Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 722 (1961).

[47] Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 937 (1982).

[48] These criteria are objective. The motives underlying the action in question are not to be taken into consideration. Cf. Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. Inc., 500 U.S. 614, 626 (1991) and, in particular, Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 54–55 (1992) (the exercise by a criminal defendant or by a private party in a civil case of peremptory challenges in selecting the jury constitutes state action, even though the motive underlying the exercise of the peremptory challenge may be to protect a private interest).

[B12] One of the basic criteria applied by the Court resides in the delegation of public functions. "[W]hen private individuals or groups are endowed by the State with powers or functions governmental in nature, they become agencies or instrumentalities of the State and subject to its constitutional limitations."[49] However, the mere fact that a private entity performs a "function which serves the public" doesn't suffice to render this entity a state actor,[50] even if it enjoys a substantial monopoly in its activities.[51] The function performed ought to constitute an "exclusive public function,"[52] or, according to a slightly different semantic formulation, must "traditionally" constitute an "exclusive prerogative of the State,"[53] or be "associated with sovereignty, such as eminent domain."[54]

[B13] In addition, a state can be held responsible for a private decision when it has exercised "coercive power"[55] or has provided "such significant encouragement, either overt or covert, that the choice must in law be deemed to be that of the State."[56] However, a state's inaction or mere acquiescence regarding a private action cannot be deemed an "authorization" or "encouragement" of the private action at issue and does not convert such action into that of the state.[57] "Private use of state-sanctioned private remedies or procedures does not rise to the level of state action,"[58] nor "is the State's involvement in the mere running of a general statute of limitations generally sufficient to implicate due process."[59] But when private parties "make use of state procedures with the overt, significant assistance of state officials," state action can be found.[60] Such assistance may consist, particularly, in the placement of state sanctions "behind" the private practice in question.[61]

---

49 Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 299 (1966).

50 Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 842 (1982).

51 Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451, 462 (1952).

52 See Flagg Bros. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 161 (1978); Am. Mfrs.' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 526 U.S. 40, 57 (1999).

53 See, e.g., Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 353 (1974); Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1005, 1011 (1982).

54 Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 353 (1974).

55 See Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1005, 1004 (1982) and, in particular, Peterson v. City of Greenville, 373 U.S. 244, 248 (1963) (when the state has commanded by law a particular result, it has saved to itself the power to determine that result, and thereby, to a significant extent, has "become involved" in it, and, in fact, has removed that decision from the sphere of private choice; in this case, there is state action even if the private person would have acted as he did independently of the existence of the state law).

56 Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1004 (1982).

57 See Flagg Bros. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 164–65 (1978).

58 Tulsa Prof'l Collection Servs. Inc. v. Pope, 485 U.S. 478, 485 (1988), citing Flagg Bros. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 165 (1978) ("If the mere denial of judicial relief is considered sufficient encouragement to make the State responsible for private acts, all private deprivations of property would be converted into public acts whenever the State, for whatever reason, denies relief sought by the putative property owner.").

59 Tulsa Prof'l Collection Servs. Inc. v. Pope, 485 U.S. 478, 485–86 (1988), citing Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516 (1982). Nevertheless, there is "state action" when the time bar is activated only after specific actions, in which a court is intimately involved.

60 Tulsa, supra note 59, at 486.

61 Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 178 (1972). See also Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 254 (1953).

[B14] A private conduct may also be attributed to the state, when the state "place[s] its power, property and prestige behind" the private practice at issue, and therefore "insinuate[s] itself into a position of interdependence" (in other words, into a "symbiotic relationship") with the private person, it must be recognized as a "joint participant" in the challenged activity.[62] Nonetheless, "the mere fact that a private business is subject to [extensive] state regulation does not, by itself, convert its action into that of the State."[63] Furthermore, the receipt of public funds is not a crucial element for the characterization of a private behavior as state action; the situation of a private person subsidized by the government "is not fundamentally different from many private corporations whose business depends primarily on contracts" with the government and whose acts "do not become acts of the government by reason of their significant or even total engagement in performing public contracts."[64]

b. Particular Applications

[B15] Party Primaries. If a primary election to nominate a party candidate for state or federal office is regulated by state statute, the duties performed under this statute are acts under color of state law.[65] In a series of decisions known as the "White Primary Cases," the Court applied the Fifteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to strike down a succession of measures by authorities in Texas to exclude minority voters from their nomination processes. These cases demonstrate that electoral practices implemented by political parties have the potential to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color. The first case involved the validity of a Texas statute enacted in 1923 that flatly provided "in no event shall a negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic party primary election held in the State of Texas." The statute was found to be a direct and obvious infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment.[66] Promptly after the announcement of that decision, the Texas legislature replaced the invalid provision with a substitute that authorized the executive committee of every political party to determine "in its own way" who would be "qualified to vote or otherwise participate in such political party." The State Executive Committee of the Democratic Party adopted a rule that only "white democrats" could participate in the party's primary elections. The Court held that the authors of the discriminatory rule "should be classified as representatives of the State to such an extent and in such a sense that the great restraints of the Constitution set limits to their action."[67] The decision "relied on the fact that a state statute authorized the Party's Executive Committee to determine the qualifications of

---

62 Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 725 (1961).

63 See, e.g., Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 350 (1974); Am. Mfrs.' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 526 U.S. 40, 52 (1999).

64 Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 840–41 (1982).

65 United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 325 (1941) (if a statute requires the election officials "to count the ballots, to record the result of the count and to certify the result of the election," the actions of election official in willfully altering and falsely counting and certifying the ballots, are acts under color of state law); Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 140 (1972) (state statute requiring payment of a filing fee as an absolute prerequisite to a candidate's participation in a primary election; since the mechanism of party primary elections is the creature of state legislative choice, it is "state action" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment).

66 Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536, 540 (1927).

67 Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73, 85–89 (1932).

voters."[68] Thereafter, the party implemented the same discriminatory policy without statutory authorization by adopting a resolution at a state convention restricting party membership to "white persons." When it first confronted the issue, the Court held that implementation of that rule by the managers of the primary election was not state action, because the Democratic Party, as a voluntary political association, had "the right . . . to define its membership" and to adopt such policies as seemed wise to it.[69] A few years later, however, the Court overruled Grovey and decided that a similar resolution adopted by the party's state convention constituted state action violative of the Fifteenth Amendment, even though it was not expressly authorized by statute. What changed was not the extent of state regulation, but the Court's understanding, based on its intervening decision in United States v. Classic,[70] that primaries were "a part of the machinery for choosing officials."[71] In Smith v. Allwright, the Court pointed out that if the state "requires a certain electoral procedure, prescribes a general election ballot made up of party nominees so chosen and limits the choice of the electorate in general elections for state offices, practically speaking, to those whose names appear on such a ballot, it endorses, adopts and enforces the discrimination against Negroes, practiced by a party entrusted by [state] law with the determination of the qualifications of participants in the primary. . . . [T]he recognition [by state law] of the place of the primary in the electoral scheme makes clear that state delegation to a party of the power to fix the qualifications of primary elections is delegation of a state function that may make the party's action the action of the state."[72]

[B16] The previous rationale was extended to a non-official "all-white" pre-primary Democratic Party nominating process, which was meant to circumvent the commands of the Fifteenth Amendment. The same policy of excluding all non-white voters from the electoral process was implemented in a Texas county by a private organization known as the Jaybird Democratic Association. The Association held an election in each election year to select candidates for county offices to run for nomination in the official Democratic primary. The Association's elections were not governed by state laws, and did not utilize state elective machinery or funds. Candidates elected by the Association were not certified by the Association as its candidates in the Democratic primary but filed their own names as candidates. However, for more than 60 years, the Association's county-wide candidates had invariably been nominated in the Democratic primaries and elected to office. After admitting that such a discriminatory policy in the county-operated primaries would be unconstitutional, the Court found that it violated the Fifteenth Amendment for a state "to permit within its borders the use of any device that produce[d] an equivalent of the prohibited election."[73] Although the Jaybirds had no official status, received no state funds, and conducted a purely private election, the Court readily concluded that, since the Jaybird primary had become, as a matter of fact, an integral part, indeed the only effective part, of the elective process that determined who would rule and govern in the county, this voluntary association's exclusion of

---

68 See Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia, 517 U.S. 186, 212 (1996) (leading opinion of Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg).

69 Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U.S. 45, 49–55 (1935).

70 United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 318 (1941).

71 See Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia, 517 U.S. 186, 200, n.17 (1996) (leading opinion of Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg), discussing Smith v. Allwright.

72 Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 660, 664 (1944).

73 Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 469–70 (1953).

African-Americans voters from its primaries on racial grounds was prohibited by the Fifteenth Amendment and that the combined discriminatory Jaybird-Democratic-general election machinery had unlawfully deprived citizens of voting rights because of their color.[74]

[B17] Peremptory Challenges. The exercise by a private litigant in a civil case of a peremptory challenge in selecting the jury constitutes state action for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause. First, it involves the exercise of a right provided by federal or state statute, hence "having its source in state authority." Second, "without the overt, significant participation of the government, the peremptory challenge system, as well as the jury trial system of which it is a part, simply could not exist. . . . [P]eremptory challenges have no utility outside the jury system, a system which the government alone administers. . . . The government summons jurors, constrains their freedom of movement, and subjects them to public scrutiny and examination. The party who exercises a challenge invokes the formal authority of the court, which must discharge the prospective juror, thus effecting the 'final and practical denial' of the excluded individual's opportunity to serve on the petit jury." Moreover, the action in question involves the performance of a traditional governmental function, since "the peremptory challenge is used in selecting the jury, an entity that is a quintessential governmental body having no attributes of a private actor." Finally, the Court indicated that the courtroom setting in which the peremptory challenge is exercised intensifies the harmful effects of the private litigant's discriminatory act and contributes to its characterization as state action, for "[f]ew places are a more real expression of the constitutional authority of the government than a courtroom, where the law itself unfolds."[75]

[B18] For similar reasons, the Constitution prohibits a criminal defendant from engaging in purposeful discrimination on the ground of race in the exercise of peremptory challenges.[76] This conclusion is not inconsistent with the Court's holding in Polk County v. Dodson,[77] in which it was decided that a public defender does not qualify as a state actor when engaged in his general representation of a criminal defendant, since the determination whether a public defender is a state actor for a particular purpose

---

[74] See Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia, 517 U.S. 186, 213 (1996) (leading opinion of Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg). Morse involved a party's requirement of payment of a registration fee as a condition for a candidate's participation in a primary election. Five members of the Court held that the requirement fell within the scope of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. Section 1973c. Among these members, Justices Stevens and Ginsburg, guided by the reasoning of Smith v. Allwright, concluded that, because Virginia law provided that the nominees of the two major political parties would automatically appear on the general election ballot and authorized the two parties to determine for themselves how they would select their nominees, whether by primary, nominating convention, or some other method, the Republican Party of Virginia acted "under authority" of state law when it picked its candidate at the convention. The fact that Virginia did not require its political parties to conduct primary elections to nominate their candidates could not make a difference, since the right to choose the method of nomination made "the delegation of authority in this case more expansive, not less," for the party was granted even greater power over the selection of its nominees. Id. at 195–99.

[75] Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. Inc., 500 U.S. 614, 618–28 (1991). See also Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 50–53 (1992), analyzing Edmonson.

[76] Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 50–55 (1992).

[77] Polk County v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 312 (1981).

depends on the nature and context of the specific function he is performing. "The exercise of a peremptory challenge differs significantly from other actions taken in support of a defendant's defense. In exercising a peremptory challenge, a criminal defendant is wielding the power to choose a quintessential governmental body."[78]

[B19] Company Towns—Shopping Centers. Another line of cases under the public function doctrine originated with Marsh v. Alabama. Marsh, a Jehovah's Witness, undertook to distribute religious literature on a sidewalk in the business district of Chickasaw, Alabama. Chickasaw, a so-called company town, was wholly owned by Gulf Shipbuilding Corporation. The town and its shopping district were accessible to and freely used by the public in general, and there was nothing to distinguish them from any other town and shopping center except the fact that the title to the property belonged to a private corporation. The corporation had posted notices in the stores stating that the premises were private property and that no solicitation of any kind without written permission would be permitted. Marsh was told that she must have a permit to distribute her literature, and that a permit would not be granted to her. When she declared that the company rule could not be utilized to prevent her from exercising her constitutional rights under the First Amendment, she was ordered to leave Chickasaw. She refused to do so, and was arrested for violating Alabama's criminal trespass statute. The Court reversed her conviction, by reasoning on the basis of the performance of public function. It indicated that "[t]he more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the constitutional (and statutory) rights of those who use it. . . . Thus, the owners of privately held bridges, ferries, turnpikes and railroads may not operate them as freely as a farmer does his farm. Since these facilities are built and operated primarily to benefit the public, and since their operation is essentially a public function, it is subject to state regulation. . . . [S]uch regulation may not result in an operation of these facilities, even by privately owned companies, which unconstitutionally interferes" with individual rights.[79] Since Gulf Shipbuilding Corp. performed "all the necessary municipal functions" in the town of Chickasaw, which it owned, the Court concluded that it was bound to recognize the right of Jehovah's Witnesses to distribute religious literature on its streets.[80]

[B20] The Court expanded this municipal function theory in Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, to encompass the activities of a private shopping center. That case involved peaceful picketing within a large shopping center near Altoona, Pennsylvania. One of the tenants of the shopping center was a retail store that employed a wholly non-union staff. Members of a local union picketed the store, carrying signs proclaiming that it was non-union and that its employees were not receiving union wages or other union benefits. The picketing took place on the shopping center's property in the immediate vicinity of the store. A Pennsylvania court issued an injunction that required all picketing to be confined to public areas outside the shopping center, and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirmed the issuance of this injunction. The Court's opinion reviewed the Marsh case in detail, emphasized the similarities between the business block in Chickasaw, and the Logan Valley shopping center, and unambiguously concluded that the shopping center there was clearly the "functional equivalent" of the business district of Chickasaw involved in Marsh. Upon the basis of that conclusion, the Court held that,

---

78 Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 54 (1992).

79 Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 506–08 (1946).

80 See Flagg Bros. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 159 (1978), discussing Marsh.

because "the shopping center serves as the community business block and is freely accessible and open to the people in the area and those passing through, . . . the State may not delegate the power, through the use of its trespass laws, wholly to exclude those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put." Therefore the First and Fourteenth Amendments required reversal of the judgment of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court.[81]

[B21] Four years later, the Court had occasion to reconsider the Logan Valley doctrine in Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner. That case involved a shopping center covering some 50 acres in downtown Portland, Oregon. On a November day in 1968, five young people entered the mall of the shopping center and distributed handbills protesting the then ongoing American military operations in Vietnam. Security guards told them to leave, and they did so, to avoid arrest. They subsequently brought suit in a federal district court, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. The trial court ruled in their favor, holding that the distribution of handbills on the shopping center's property was protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the judgment, expressly relying on the Court's Marsh and Logan Valley decisions. The Court reversed the judgment of the court of appeals. Its "ultimate holding in Lloyd amounted to a rejection of the holding in Logan Valley."[82] After reminding that the First and Fourteenth Amendments safeguard the rights of free speech and assembly by limitations on state action, not on action by the owner of private property used non-discriminatorily for private purposes only, the Court emphasized that Marsh "involved the assumption by a private enterprise of all of the attributes of a state-created municipality and the exercise by that enterprise of semi-social municipal functions as a delegate of the State. In effect, the owner of the company town was performing the full spectrum of municipal powers, and stood in the shoes of the State." By contrast, in the Lloyd case, "there [wa]s no comparable assumption or exercise of municipal functions or power." Hence, it was held that there had been no such dedication of Lloyd's privately owned and operated shopping center to public use as to entitle respondents to exercise therein the asserted First Amendment rights.[83] The reasoning in Lloyd was confirmed in the Hudgens case, which involved a strikers' picketing in front of their employer's leased store located in petitioner's shopping center. The Court decided that the pickets "did not have a First Amendment right to enter this shopping center for the purpose of advertising their strike" against their employer and concluded that the constitutional guarantee of free expression had no part to play in a case such as that.[84]

[B22] Restaurants—Clubs. The Court has dealt, on several occasions, with discriminatory refusal of service in public eating places. In Peterson, ten African-Americans were convicted of trespass in violation of a city ordinance after they had seated themselves at a restaurant to protest its refusal of service to African-Americans. There, the Court held that, although the initiative for the trespass prosecution came from the proprietor, the existence of a local ordinance requiring segregation of races in such places was tantamount to the state's having "commanded a particular result" and, thereby, "to a signif-

---

[81] Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc. 391 U.S. 308, 318–20 (1968).

[82] See Hudgens v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 424 U.S. 507, 518 (1976).

[83] Lloyd Corp. Ltd. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551, 569–70 (1972).

[84] Hudgens v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 424 U.S. 507, 520–21 (1976).

icant extent, [having] become involved in it." Hence, the manager's conduct should be deemed state action, forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment, independently of "the mental urges of the discriminators."[85] In a similar case, decided the same day as Peterson, the petitioners' convictions were reversed, as violative of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because, although no state statute or city ordinance required racial segregation in restaurants, both the Mayor and the Superintendent of Police had announced publicly that such "sit-in demonstrations" would not be permitted and, thus, had issued "an official command which ha[d] at least as much coercive effect as an ordinance."[86]

[B23] In Burton, a restaurant located in a publicly owned and operated automobile parking building refused to serve an African-American food or drink solely because of his race. The building was built and maintained with public funds and devoted to a public parking service. It was owned and operated by an agency of the state of Delaware, from which the private operator of the restaurant leased its premises. The restaurant was not only physically but also financially "an integral part of the public building," since it constituted "an indispensable part of the State's plan to operate its project as a self-sustaining unit." The lease relationship between the private entrepreneur and the state agency entailed "an incidental variety of mutual benefits:" tax exemptions for the restaurant, rent payments for the parking authority, and increased business for both. Because of this "interdependence," the state should be recognized as a "joint participant in the challenged activity, which, on that account, [could not] be considered to have been so 'purely private' as to fall without the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment." In drawing this conclusion, the Court stressed that, "by its inaction, . . . the State ha[d] not only made itself a party to the refusal of service, but ha[d] elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the admitted discrimination."[87]

[B24] In Moose Lodge, appellee Irvis, an African-American guest of a Caucasian member of appellant, a private club, was refused service at the club's dining room and bar solely because of his race. In suing for injunctive relief, Irvis contended that the discrimination was state action and thus a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because the Pennsylvania Liquor Board had issued appellant a private club liquor license. The district court adopted Irvis' view that state action was present, pointing out that an applicant for a club license should make such physical alterations in its premises as the Board might require, should file a list of the names and addresses of its members and employees, should keep extensive financial records, and was subject to Board's inspections at any time when patrons, guests, or members were present. The Court disagreed, holding that, with the exception noted below, there was no state action in the mere fact that the club's beverage bar was licensed and regulated by the state. It stressed that the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board played "absolutely no part in establishing or enforcing the membership or guest policies of the 85 Peterson v. City of Greenville, 373 U.S. 244, 248 (1963). See also Robinson v. Florida, 378 U.S. 153, 156 (1964) (while the state regulations, which required segregated rest rooms and segregated facilities, did not "directly and expressly forbid restaurants to serve both white and colored people together, they embod[ied] a state policy putting burdens upon any restaurant which serve[d] both races, burdens bound to discourage the serving of the two races together").

---

86 Lombard v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 267, 273 (1963).

87 Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 721–26 (1961).

club" that it had licensed to serve liquor, concluding that "[h]owever detailed this type of regulation may be in some particulars, it cannot be said to in any way foster or encourage racial discrimination" nor could it be said to "make the State in any realistic sense a partner or even a joint venturer in the club's enterprise." The "one exception" further illustrates this point. The Court enjoined enforcement of a state rule requiring Moose Lodge to comply with its own constitution and bylaws insofar as they contained racially discriminatory provisions. The effect of this particular regulation on Moose Lodge "would be to place state sanctions behind its discriminatory membership rules."[88] "State enforcement of this rule, either judicially or administratively, would, under the circumstances, amount to a governmental decision to adopt a racially discriminatory policy."[89]

[B25] Parks. In Evans v. Newton, it was decided that private trustees to whom a city had transferred a park were nonetheless state actors barred from enforcing racial segregation, since the park served the community by providing mass recreation, and "the municipality remain[ed] entwined in [its] management [and] control."[90]

[B26] Public Utility Corporations. The Capital Transit Company, a privately owned public utility corporation, whose service and equipment were subject to regulation by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia (an agency authorized by Congress), received and amplified radio programs through loudspeakers in its streetcars and buses. The programs consisted generally of 90 percent music, 5 percent announcements, and 5 percent commercial advertising. The Commission, after an investigation and public hearings, concluded that the radio service was not inconsistent with public convenience, comfort, and safety and permitted it to continue, despite protests of some passengers that to do so violated their constitutional rights under the First and Fifth Amendments. The Court found "a sufficiently close relation between the Federal Government and the radio service to make it necessary for [the Court] to consider those Amendments." In finding this relation, the Court didn't "rely on the mere fact that Capital Transit operate[d] a public utility on the streets of the District of Columbia under authority of Congress." Nor did it "rely upon the fact that, by reason of such federal authorization, Capital Transit enjoye[d] a substantial monopoly of street railway and bus transportation in the District of Columbia." The Court relied "particularly upon the fact that the regulatory agency had affirmatively approved the practice of the regulated entity after full investigation." In light of these considerations, the Court assumed that "the action of Capital Transit in operating the radio service, together with the action of the Commission in permitting such operation, amounte[d] to sufficient Federal Government action to make the First and Fifth Amendments applicable thereto."[91]

[B27] In Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison, a New York resident brought suit against a privately owned and operated utility corporation, claiming that she had been denied due process when the utility terminated her electric service without notice or a hearing and alleging that the utility's summary termination procedures had been "specifically authorized and approved" by the state. In sustaining dismissal of the complaint, the Court "held that authorization and approval did not transform the procedures of the company into the procedures of the State."[92] As Jackson pointed out, "[t]he nature of gov-

---

88 Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 171–79 (1972).

89 See Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 938, n.20 (1982).

90 Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 301–02 (1966).

91 Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451, 462 (1952).

92 See Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 251 (1977) (Powell, J., concurring).

ernmental regulation of private utilities is such that a utility may frequently be required by the state regulatory scheme to obtain approval for practices a business regulated in less detail would be free to institute without any approval from a regulatory body. Approval by a state utility commission of such a request from a regulated utility, where the Commission has not put its own weight on the side of the proposed practice by ordering it, does not transmute a practice initiated by the utility and approved by the Commission into 'state action.' At most, the Commission's failure to overturn this practice amounted to no more than a determination that a Pennsylvania utility was authorized to employ such a practice if it so desired. Respondent's exercise of the choice allowed by state law where the initiative comes from it, and not from the State, does not make its action in doing so 'state action' for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment." Moreover, the mere fact that the private utility provided services affected with a public interest did not, by itself, convert its action into that of the state, for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment, in the absence of any exercise of power delegated to it by the state that was "traditionally associated with sovereignty."[93]

[B28] Schools.[94] In Rendell-Baker, a former vocational counselor and teachers at a privately operated school for maladjusted high school students brought actions in federal district court under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, claiming that they had been discharged by the school in violation of their First, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Nearly all of the school's students had been referred to the school by city school committees under a Massachusetts statute or by a state agency. When the students were referred to the school by the city committees, these cities paid for the students' education. The school was also receiving funds from a number of state and federal agencies. Public funds accounted for at least 90 percent of the school's operating budget. To be eligible for tuition funding under the state statute, the school should comply with certain state regulations, but these regulations imposed few specific requirements as regards personnel standards and procedures. Similarly, the school's contracts with the state and the city committees generally did not cover personnel policies. The Court, first, noted that the school's receipt of public funds could not be considered sufficient to make the discharge decisions acts of the state, since the school was not fundamentally different from many private corporations whose business depends primarily on contracts with the government and whose acts do not become acts of the government by reason of "their significant or even total engagement in performing public contracts." The decision to discharge petitioners was not "compelled or even influenced by any state regulation," and the fact that the school performed a public function in educating maladjusted high school students did not make its acts state action, given that the services rendered by the school were not the "exclusive province" of the state. Moreover, since the school's fiscal relationship with the state was not any different from that of many contractors performing services for the government, there was no "symbiotic relationship" between the school and the state. Under these circumstances, the Court held that the school did not act under color of state law when it discharged petitioner employees.[95]

---

[93] Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 349–59 (1974).

[94] See also para. B32.

[95] Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 839–43 (1982).

In Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455 (1973), the Court invalidated a program in which a state purchased textbooks and loaned them to students in public and private schools, including private schools with racially discriminatory policies. In so doing, the Court noted that "[a] State may not grant the type of tangible financial aid here involved if that aid has a significant tendency to facilitate, reinforce, and support private discrimination." Id. at 466.

[B29] Nursing Homes. In Blum, the Court considered whether certain private nursing homes, participating in the Medicaid program established by the Social Security Act in 1965, were state actors for the purpose of determining whether decisions regarding transfers of patients to lower levels of care could be fairly attributed to the state and, hence, be subjected to Fourteenth Amendment due process requirements. These nursing homes were subject to extensive regulation by the state, which encouraged them to transfer patients to less expensive facilities when possible. However, the Court rejected the respondents' argument that, under the pertinent statutes and regulations, the state "affirmatively command[ed] the summary discharge or transfer of Medicaid patients who [we]re thought to be inappropriately placed in their nursing facilities." The state, by requiring completion by physicians or nursing homes of forms relating to a patient's condition and discharge or transfer decisions, was not responsible for the decisions of the physicians or nursing homes. "Those decisions ultimately turn[ed] on medical judgments made by private parties according to professional standards that [we]re not established by the State." Similarly, regulations imposing penalties on nursing homes that failed to discharge or transfer patients whose continued stay was inappropriate did not themselves "dictate the decision to discharge or transfer in a particular case." And even though the state subsidized the operating and capital costs of the facilities, paid the medical expenses of more than 90 percent of the patients in the facilities, and licensed the facilities, the action of the nursing homes could not thereby be converted into "state action." Finally, the Court rejected the argument that "state action" should be found because of the nature of the functions performed by the nursing home, noting "decisions made in the day-to-day administration of a nursing home are the kind of decisions traditionally and exclusively made by the sovereign for and on behalf of the public."[96]

[B30] Insurance Companies. A private insurer's decision, made pursuant to a state statute, to withhold payment for disputed medical treatment, pending an independent review to determine whether the treatment is reasonable and necessary, was held, in American Manufacturer's Mutual Insurance Co. v. Sullivan, not to be fairly attributable to the state of Pennsylvania, so as to subject the insurer to the Fourteenth Amendment's constraints. The statute simply authorized, but did not require, insurers to withhold payments for disputed medical treatment. The decision to withhold payment "turn[ed] on judgments made by private parties" without "standards established by the State." Although the pertinent state statute could, in some sense, be seen as "encouraging" the insurers to make such a decision, "this kind of subtle encouragement is no more significant than that which inheres in the State's creation or modification of any legal remedy. [The Court has] never held that the mere availability of a remedy for wrongful conduct, even when the private use of that remedy serves important public interests, so significantly encourages the private activity as to make the State responsible for it. . . . The State's decision to allow insurers to withhold payments pending review [could] just as easily be seen as state inaction, or, more accurately, a legislative decision not to intervene in a dispute between an insurer and an employee over whether a particular treatment is reasonable and necessary." While the statutory scheme previously prohibited insurers from withholding payment for disputed medical services, it no longer did so. "Such permission of a private choice cannot support a finding of state action." The argument that state action was present because the state had delegated to insurers powers traditionally reserved to itself also lacked merit. First, nothing in Pennsylvania's constitution or statutory scheme obligated the state to provide either medical treatment or workers' compensation benefits to injured workers. Second, there was no traditionally exclusive governmental function of deciding whether to suspend payment for disputed medical treatment. "That Pennsylvania had [originally] recognized an insurer's traditionally private prerogative to withhold payment, then restricted it, and [afterwards] restored it [could] not constitute the delegation of an exclusive public function. Pennsylvania ha[d] done nothing more than authorize (and indeed limit)—without participation by any public official—what private insurers would tend to do, even in the absence of such authorization." Finally, the Court rejected the respondents' reliance on Burton, noting that "privately owned enterprises providing services that the State would not necessarily provide, even though they are extensively regulated, do not fall within the ambit" of the "joint participation" theory of state action, set forth in Burton, and that, although the workers' compensation insurers appeared to be extensively regulated, the state statutory and regulatory scheme left the challenged decisions to the judgment of insurers.[97]

---

[96] Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1003–12 (1982).

[B31] United States Olympic Committee. San Francisco Arts & Athletics, Inc. (SFAA), a non-profit California corporation, promoted the "Gay Olympic Games," to be held in 1982, by using those words on its letterheads and mailings, in local newspapers, and on various merchandise sold to cover the costs of the planned games. The United States Olympic Committee (USOC), which, under the Amateur Sports Act of 1978, had the right to prohibit certain commercial and promotional uses of the word "Olympic" and various Olympic symbols, requested from SFAA to terminate the use of the word "Olympic" in its description of the planned games. When the SFAA failed to do so, the USOC brought suit in federal district court and obtained summary judgment and a permanent injunction. The federal district court did not reach the SFAA's claim that the USOC's enforcement of its rights was discriminatory in violation of the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, because it held that the USOC was not a governmental actor to which the Constitution applied. The Court affirmed, holding that "[t]he USOC's choice of how to enforce its exclusive right to use the word 'Olympic' simply is not a governmental decision." "The fact that Congress granted it a corporate charter does not render the USOC a Government agent. All corporations act under charters granted by a government, usually by a State. . . . Nor is the fact that Congress has granted the USOC exclusive use of the word 'Olympic' dispositive. All enforceable rights in trademarks are created by some governmental act, usually pursuant to a statute or the common law. . . . Moreover, the intent on the part of Congress to help the USOC obtain funding does not change the analysis. The Government may subsidize private entities without assuming constitutional responsibility for their actions." And although "the activities performed by the USOC serve a national interest, . . . neither the conduct nor the coordination of amateur sports has been a traditional governmental function."[98]

---

[97] Am. Mfrs.' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 526 U.S. 40, 49–58 (1999).

[98] San Francisco Arts & Athletics Inc. v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 542–47 (1987). In his dissenting opinion, Justice Brennan, considering the international political and athletic significance of the Olympic Games, indicated that the USOC, not only was inextricably intertwined with the government, but also performed "the distinctive, traditional governmental function . . . [of] represent[ing] th[e] Nation to the world community" and should therefore be considered as a governmental actor. Id. at 550.

[B32] National Collegiate Athletic Association. The State University of Nevada, Las Vegas (UNLV), an undoubtedly state actor, suspended its basketball coach, Tarkanian, in order to comply with rules and recommendations of the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA), regarding improper recruiting practices. The coach charged the NCAA, an unincorporated association of approximately 960 members, including virtually all public and private universities and four-year colleges conducting major athletic programs in the United States, with deprivation of his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The Court rejected the allegation and held that the NCAA's participation in the events that led to Tarkanian's suspension did not constitute "state action" prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment and was not performed "under color of" state law within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. Section 1983. The NCAA could not be deemed to be a state actor on the theory that it misused power it possessed by virtue of state law. "[T]he source of the legislation adopted by the NCAA [wa]s not Nevada, but the collective membership, speaking through an organization that [wa]s independent of any particular State." Moreover, taking into account that "UNLV retained the authority to withdraw from the NCAA and establish its own standards, . . . UNLV's decision to adopt the NCAA's standards . . . [was not] a sufficient reason for concluding that the NCAA was acting under color of Nevada law when it promulgated standards governing athlete recruitment, eligibility, and academic performance." Tarkanian's assertion that the NCAA's investigation, enforcement proceedings, and consequent recommendations constituted state action, because they resulted from a delegation of power by UNLV, had equally no merit, because "UNLV delegated no power to the NCAA to take specific action against any university employee," "[d]uring the several years that the NCAA investigated the alleged violations, the NCAA and UNLV acted much more like adversaries than like partners engaged in a dispassionate search for the truth," and the "NCAA enjoyed no governmental powers to facilitate its investigation." Finally the Court rejected Tarkanian's argument that the power of the NCAA was so great that UNLV had no practical alternative but to comply with the Association's demands, pointing out that even if "a private monopolist can impose its will on a state agency by a threatened refusal to deal with it, it does not follow that such a private party is therefore acting under color of state law."[99]

[B33] Drug and Alcohol Testing of Railroad Employees. Upon the basis of evidence indicating that alcohol and drug abuse by railroad employees had caused or contributed to a number of significant train accidents, the Federal Railroad Administration (FRA) promulgated regulations, which, among other things, required railroads to see that blood and urine tests of employees are conducted following certain major train accidents or incidents (Sub-part C), and authorized, but did not require, railroads to administer breath or urine tests, or both, to employees who violated certain safety rules (Sub-part D). The Court held that the Fourth Amendment was applicable to the drug and alcohol tests in question. These tests could not be viewed as private action. On the one hand, a railroad that complied with Sub-part C did so "by compulsion of sovereign authority." On the other hand, even though Sub-part D did not compel railroads to test, it could not be concluded that such testing would "be primarily the result of private initiative." "The Government ha[d] removed all legal barriers to the testing authorized by Subpart D, and indeed ha[d] made plain not only its strong preference for testing but also its desire to share the fruits of such intrusions. In addition, it ha[d] mandated that the railroads not bargain away the authority to perform tests granted by Subpart D. These [we]re clear indices of the Government's encouragement, endorsement, and participation, and suffice[d] to implicate the Fourth Amendment."[100]

---

[99] Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Tarkanian, 488 U.S. 179, 191–99 (1988).

[B34] Broadcast Stations. A broadcast licensee refused to accept a paid editorial advertisement concerning the Vietnam conflict. Under the Communications Act, Congress maintained "a substantial measure of journalistic independence for the broadcast licensee," which had "the initial and primary responsibility for fairness, balance, and objectivity," while the role of the government was that of "an 'overseer' and ultimate arbiter and guardian of the public interest." Moreover, the Federal Communications Commission "ha[d] not fostered the licensee policy challenged [t]here; it ha[d] simply declined to command particular action because it fell within the area of journalistic discretion." Since it could not be said that the government was a "partner" to the contested action of the broadcast licensee, nor "was it engaged in a 'symbiotic relationship' with the licensee, profiting from the invidious discrimination of its proxy," the private conduct in question was not thought to be "government action" for First Amendment purposes.[101]

[B35] Racially Restrictive Covenants. "Private racial biases may be outside the reach of the Constitution, but the law cannot, directly or indirectly, give them effect."[102] Private agreements to exclude persons of designated race or color from the use or occupancy of real estate for residential purposes, standing alone, do not violate any rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. However, given that the actions of state courts and judicial officers in their official capacities are actions of the states, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, judicial enforcement of such private agreements constitutes "state action" contrary to the constitutional command of the equal protection of the laws.[103] Similarly a court's awarding damages for breach of such a covenant constitutes state action, violative of the Fourteenth Amendment; indeed "the result of that sanction by the State would be to encourage the use of restrictive covenants" and to "coerce" the respondent contracting party to continue the use of the property in a discriminatory manner.[104]

[B36] Lien Foreclosures—Seizures of Property. In Flagg Brothers, a warehouseman was sued under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 because it sought to execute a lien by selling goods, entrusted to him for storage, pursuant to a statute of the New York Uniform Commercial Code. While the sale was authorized by a state statute, it did not amount to "state action." No public officials participated in the proposed sale. The challenged statute did not delegate to the creditor storage company an exclusive prerogative of the sovereign. In addition, other remedies for the settlement of disputes between debtors and creditors, which is not traditionally a public function, remained available to the parties. And "a

---

100 Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 498 U.S. 602, 614–16 (1989).

101 See Columbia Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 114–21 (1973) (plurality opinion of three members of the Court).

102 Cf. Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 433–34 (1984) ("[t]he effects of racial prejudice, however real, cannot justify a racial classification removing an infant child from the custody of its natural mother").

103 Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 18–23 (1948). Cf. Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24, 31–35 (1948).

104 Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 254 (1953).

State's mere acquiescence in a private action does not convert such action into that of the State. . . . the State of New York ha[d] not compelled the sale of a bailor's goods, but ha[d] merely announced the circumstances under which its courts [would] not interfere with a private sale." Therefore, the Fourteenth Amendment was not applicable to the action in question.[105] By contrast, "a private party's 'joint participation' with state officials in the seizure of disputed property is sufficient to characterize that party as a state actor for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment."[106]

[B37] Collective Bargaining Agreements. A master collective bargaining agreement that includes an affirmative action plan for African-American employees does not involve state action and, thus, does not present an alleged violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[107]

[B38] Anti-Competitive Acts Under the Federal Anti-Trust Legislation. Regarding the concept of state action, it is also worth observing that, in the field of the federal anti-trust legislation, the Court applies a two-pronged test to determine whether anti-competitive conduct engaged in by private parties should be deemed state action and thus shielded from the anti-trust laws: "first, the challenged restraint must be one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy; second, the anti-competitive conduct must be actively supervised by the State itself." "Only if an anti-competitive act of a private party meets both of these requirements is it fairly attributable to the State" and, hence, falls outside the scope of the Sherman Act.[108]

C. TERRITORIAL APPLICATION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS ABOUT INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

[B39] During the late 19th century, the Court acknowledged that "the guarantees of protection contained in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution extend to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States."[109] However, the constitutional protections may also operate outside the country's borders. Mrs. Clarice Covert killed her husband, a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force, at an airbase in England. Mrs. Covert, who was not a member of the armed services, was residing on the base with her husband at the time. She was tried and convicted by a court-martial for murder under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The Court decided that her court-martial did not meet the requirements of Article III, Section 2 or the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. In reaching this conclusion, a four-Justice plurality rejected the idea that, "when the United States acts against citizens abroad, it can do so free of the Bill of Rights."[110]

[B40] The previous holding may not apply to aliens.[111] In Eisentrager, 21 German nationals were captured in China by the U.S. Army and tried and convicted in China

---

105 Flagg Bros. v. Brooks, 436 U.S. 149, 155–66 (1978).

106 See Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 941 (1982), citing Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 152 (1970) ("a willful participant in joint activity with the State or its agents" must be deemed as acting "under color" of law).

107 United Steelworkers of Am., AFL-CIO-CLC v. Weber, 443 U.S. 193, 200 (1979).

108 See, in particular, Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 100 (1988).

109 Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 369 (1886) (emphasis added).

110 Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 5 (1957).

111 "[O]nce an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all 'persons' within the United States, including aliens, whether their

by an American military commission for violations of the laws of war committed in China prior to their capture, specifically for giving certain information to Japanese military forces, after Germany had surrendered. They were transported to the American-occupied part of Germany and imprisoned there in the custody of the Army. At no time were they within the territorial jurisdiction of any American civil court. Claiming that their trial, conviction, and imprisonment violated, inter alia, Articles I and III, the Fifth Amendment, and other provisions of our Constitution, they petitioned the District Court for the District of Columbia for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army, and several officers of the Army having directive power over their custodian. The claim was rejected, for "in extending constitutional protections beyond the citizenry, the Court has been at pains to point out that it was the alien's presence within its territorial jurisdiction that gave the Judiciary power to act." By contrast, these prisoners "at no relevant time were within any territory over which the United States was sovereign, and the scenes of their offense, their capture, their trial and their punishment were all beyond the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States." The Court also emphasized that "such trials would hamper the war effort," since they might mean that the U.S. Army should transport the prisoners across the seas for hearing, which "would require allocation of shipping space, guarding personnel, billeting, rations [and] transportation for whatever witnesses the prisoners desired to call, as well as transportation for those necessary to defend legality of the sentence." Apart from that, the result of such enemy litigiousness might be "a conflict between judicial and military opinion, highly comforting to enemies of the United States."[112] In dissent, three members of the Court stressed that the prisoners were convicted by American military tribunals, years after hostilities had ceased, and concluded that American courts have the power to grant habeas relief, "whenever any United States official illegally imprisons any person in any land . . . govern[ed]" by U.S. executive or military agencies.[113]

[B41] The German prisoners involved in Eisentrager "(a) [were] enemy alien[s]; (b) ha[d] never been or resided in the United States; (c) [were] captured outside of [U. S.] territory and there held in military custody as prisoner[s] of war; (d) [were] tried and convicted by a Military Commission sitting outside the United States; (e) for offenses committed against laws of war committed outside the United States; (f) and [were] at all times imprisoned outside the United States."[114] In Rasul, two Australians and 12 Kuwaitis, captured abroad during the country's military campaign against Al Qaeda and the Taliban regime established in Afghanistan, were being held in military custody at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Naval Base, which the United States occupies under a lease and treaty recognizing Cuba's ultimate sovereignty, but giving the United States "complete jurisdiction and control" for so long as it does not abandon the leased areas. These prisoners differed from the Eisentrager detainees in important respects: "they [we]re not presence there is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent." See Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693 (2001). However, the temporary harborage of entering aliens aboard the vessel that carries them or in a state facility, pending determination of their admissibility, does not affect their status, since they are "treated as if stopped at the border." See Shaughnessy v. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 215 (1953); United States v. Ju Toy, 198 U.S. 253, 263 (1905). Cf. Kaplan v. Tod, 267 U.S. 228, 230 (1925).

---

112 Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 769–81 (1950).

113 Id. at 798.

114 Id. at 777.

nationals of countries at war with the United States, and they den[ied] that they ha[d] engaged in or plotted acts of aggression against the United States; they ha[d] never been afforded access to any tribunal, much less charged with and convicted of wrongdoing; and for more than two years they ha[d] been imprisoned in territory over which the United States exercise[d] exclusive jurisdiction and control." Under those considerations, the Court concluded that U.S. courts had jurisdiction to consider "challenges to the legality of the detention of the foreign nationals captured abroad in connection with hostilities and incarcerated at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base."[115]

[B42] After the government obtained an arrest warrant for Verdugo-Urquidez,—a Mexican citizen and resident believed to be a leader of an organization that smuggles narcotics into the United States—he was apprehended by Mexican police and transported to U.S. soil, where he was arrested. Following his arrest, Drug Enforcement Administration agents, working with Mexican officials, searched his Mexican residences and seized certain documents, without a warrant. Regarding his motion to suppress the evidence, on the basis of the Fourth Amendment, the Court held that this amendment does not apply to "the search and seizure by United States agents of property owned by a non-resident alien and located in a foreign country." The Court observed that the alleged constitutional violation had occurred solely in Mexico and pointed out that aliens can invoke the protection of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments only when they "have come within the territory of the United States, and [voluntarily] developed substantial connections with this country," which was not the case of Verdugo-Urquidez. Furthermore, the result of accepting his claim would have "significant and deleterious consequences for the United States in conducting activities beyond its boundaries." If the Fourth Amendment applied to the searches and seizures at issue, it should also apply "not only to law enforcement operations abroad but also to other foreign policy operations that might result in 'searches or seizures.' The United States frequently employs armed forces outside the country—over 200 times in [its] history—for the protection of American citizens or national security. . . . Application of the Fourth Amendment to those circumstances could significantly disrupt the ability of the political branches to respond to foreign situations involving [the Unites States'] national interest. . . . If there are to be restrictions on searches and seizures which occur incident to such American action, they must be imposed by the political branches through diplomatic understanding, treaty, or legislation."[116] This approach drew a sharp dissent from Justice Brennan who concluded that if foreign nationals, "wherever they may be, [are expected] to abide by [the United States] laws, [the government] cannot tell the world that its law enforcement officers need not do the same."[117]

[B43] In a series of decisions known as the Insular Cases, which involved territories that had only recently been conquered or acquired by the United States (Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Islands), the Court created the doctrine of "incorporated and unincorporated Territories." The former category encompassed those territories clearly destined for statehood, and the Constitution was applied to them with full force.[118] The latter category included those territories not possessing that anticipation of statehood, since they had not been expressly or impliedly incorporated into the Union by Congress;

---

115 Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 476 (2004).

116 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 273–75 (1990).

117 Id. at 297.

118 See, e.g., Rassmussen v. United States, 197 U.S. 516, 520–25 (1905).

as to them, only "fundamental" constitutional rights—such as the due process rights[119]—were guaranteed to the inhabitants[120] because of their "wholly dissimilar traditions and institutions."[121]

D. CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS IN WARTIME OR IN CASE OF INSURRECTION[122]

[B44] The war power of the national government is "the power to wage war successfully."[123] The Constitution is not to be interpreted as a self-defeating charter;[124] hence, a "wide latitude of discretion" must be accorded to Congress in the exercise of the war powers[125] under Article I, Section 8, Clause 11 of the federal Constitution. War power "extends to every matter and activity so related to war as substantially to affect its conduct and progress. It embraces every phase of the national defense, including the protection of war materials and the members of the armed forces from injury and from the dangers which attend the rise, prosecution and progress of war."[126] War power may be properly exercised even absent a declaration of war, since it also refers to "reasonable preparation for the storm of war."[127] Moreover, the war power carries with it the power "to guard against immediate renewal of the conflict and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress"[128] and continues during that emergency. "Whatever may be the reach of that power, it is plainly adequate to deal with problems of law enforcement which arise during the period of hostilities, but do not cease with them."[129] The Court's constitutional review of government restrictive measures during wartime seems not go beyond the inquiry whether, "in the light of all the relevant circumstances [and the common experience,] the challenged orders and statute[s] afforded a reasonable basis for the action taken."[130] Such measures are to be interpreted as intend-

---

119 Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 312–13 (1922).

120 See, e.g., Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 (1922) (fifth Amendment right to jury trial inapplicable in Puerto Rico); Ocampo v. United States, 234 U.S. 91 (1914) (Sixth Amendment grand jury provision inapplicable in Philippines); Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138 (1904) (jury trial provision inapplicable in Philippines); Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197 (1903) (provisions on indictment by grand jury and jury trial inapplicable in Hawaii); Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901) (revenue clauses of Constitution inapplicable to Puerto Rico).

On the other hand, the Court has held or otherwise indicated that Puerto Rico is subject to the First Amendment Speech Clause (see Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 314 (1922)); the Fourth Amendment (see Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465 (1979)); the Due Process Clause of either the Fifth or the Fourteenth Amendment, (see Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 668–69, n.5 (1974)); and the Equal Protection guarantee of either the Fifth or the Fourteenth Amendment (see Examining Bd. of Eng'rs, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 599–601 (1976)). In Califano v. Torres, 435 U.S. 1, 4, n.6 (1978) (per curiam), the Court assumed, without deciding, that the constitutional right to travel extends to the Commonwealth.

121 See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 14 (1957).

122 See also para. J57.

123 Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S 81, 93 (1943).

124 Cf. Case v. Bowles, 327 U.S. 92, 102 (1946).

125 Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U.S. 146, 163 (1919).

126 Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S 81, 93 (1943).

127 Silesian-Am. Corp. v. Clark, 332 U.S. 469, 476 (1947).

128 Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U.S. 146, 161 (1919).

129 Fleming v. Mohawk Wrecking & Lumber Co., 331 U.S. 111, 116 (1947).

130 Cf. Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S 81, 101–02 (1943).

ing "the greatest possible accommodation between [the constitutional liberties of the citizen] and the exigencies of war."[131]

[B45] "The resident enemy alien is constitutionally subject to summary arrest, internment, and deportation whenever a 'declared war' exists. Courts will entertain his plea for freedom from Executive custody only to ascertain the existence of a state of war and whether he is an alien enemy. Once these jurisdictional elements have been determined, courts will not inquire into any other issue as to his internment."[132] Enemy aliens may be deported[133] or tried by a military commission for violations of the law of war, notwithstanding the fact that the civil courts are open and functioning normally,[134] even after hostilities have ceased, "at least until peace has been officially recognized by treaty or proclamation by the political branch of the Government."[135] "Although the official termination of the state of war is "a matter of political judgment for which judges have neither technical competence nor official responsibility,"[136] the Court makes sure that the constitutional guarantees are fully applied at a time long after cease-fire, when the continuation of restrictions of constitutional rights would be wholly unjustifiable. In a case involving a judgment of conviction pronounced by a court-martial for offences having occurred on June 10, 1949—after actual termination of hostilities in 1945, but before termination of the wars with Germany and Japan had been proclaimed by the President or the Congress—the Court read the term "in time of peace," used in a federal statute prohibiting court-martial for murder or rape committed in time of peace, so as not to deprive soldiers or civilians of the safeguards guaranteed in civil courts in capital cases, including the benefit of jury trials, four years after all hostilities had ceased.[137] In that respect, it has also been held that a law "depending upon the existence of an emergency or other certain state of facts to uphold it may cease to operate if the emergency ceases or the facts change."[138] In such a case, it is open to the courts to inquire "whether the exigency still exists upon which continued operation of the law depends."[139]

[B46] During World War II, the Court dealt with measures involving restrictions against citizens of Japanese descent. While the United States was at war with Japan, the military commander of the Western Defense Command, pursuant to a presidential executive order ratified by Congress, promulgated an order requiring, inter alia, that all persons of Japanese ancestry within a designated military area "be within their place of residence between the hours of eight p.m. and six a.m." Hirabayashi, a U.S. citizen of Japanese ancestry, was convicted in the federal district court for violation of this curfew order. After admitting that "it was within the constitutional power of Congress and the executive arm of the Government to prescribe this curfew order for the period under 131 Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283, 300 (1944). The mere existence of a state of war does not suspend the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and persons accused of crime must be adequately informed of the nature and cause of the accusation (Fifth and Sixth Amendments). See United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U.S. 81, 88 (1921).

---

132 Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 775 (1950).

133 Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U.S. 160, 163–75 (1948).

134 Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942).

135 In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1, 12 (1946).

136 Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U.S. 160, 170 (1948).

137 Lee v. Madigan, 358 U.S. 228, 236 (1959).

138 Chastleton Corp. v. Sinclair, 264 U.S. 543, 547 (1924) (order regulating rents in the District of Columbia).

139 Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 443 (1934).

consideration," the Court examined whether the order in question could be deemed reasonable. In the critical days of March 1942, approximately 112,000 persons of Japanese descent resided in California, Oregon, and Washington. The majority of these were American citizens, concentrated in or near three of the large cities, Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles, all in the military area. In addition, large numbers of children of Japanese parentage were sent to Japanese language schools outside the regular hours of public schools; some of these schools were generally believed to be sources of Japanese nationalistic propaganda, cultivating allegiance to Japan. Furthermore children born in the United States of Japanese alien parents were, under many circumstances, deemed, by Japanese law, to be citizens of Japan. At a time "of threatened air raids and invasion by the Japanese forces," these facts and circumstances "could afford . . . ground for differentiating citizens of Japanese ancestry from other groups in the United States," given that, "in time of war, residents having ethnic affiliations with an invading enemy may be a greater source of danger than those of a different ancestry" and taking into consideration that it was impossible to bring about an immediate segregation of the disloyal from the loyal persons of Japanese origin. Hence, the challenged order was held to be a reasonable preventive measure against "sabotage of war materials and utilities in areas thought to be in danger of Japanese invasion and air attack."[140] For the same reasons, the Court sustained the validity of an order, which directed the exclusion after May 9, 1942, from a described West Coast military area of all persons of Japanese ancestry.[141] By contrast, the detention of a concededly loyal citizen in a concentration camp bears no relationship with the power to protect the war effort against espionage and sabotage and cannot be sustained as a useful or convenient step in an evacuation program.[142]

[B47] Limitation on the freedom of expression may be broader in wartime. Schenck, general secretary of the Socialist Party, was charged with attempts to cause insubordination in the military and obstruction of enlistment during World War I, by anti-draft leafleting. The pamphlets that were distributed urged resistance to the draft, denounced conscription, and impugned the motives of those backing the war effort. The First Amendment was tendered as a defense. The Court rejected that defense, pointing out that when a nation is at war, "many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight, and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right."[143]

[B48] In exercising its war power, Congress has authority to draft business organization to support the fighting men in war[144] and to fix maximum prices for state sales or

---

[140] Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S 81, 94–102 (1943).

[141] Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 217–20 (1944).

[142] Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283, 302 (1944).

[143] Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 51–52 (1919). Justice Holmes noted, in an often-quoted passage, that "[t]he question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." The "clear and present danger" of Schenck evolved into the "incitement rule" of Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969) (a state cannot forbid "advocacy of the use of force or of law violation, except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action").

[144] United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 315 U.S. 289, 305 (1942).

to control rents, in order to prevent the evils of inflation and profiteering,[145] even if the system of price control does not assure each landlord a "fair return" on his property.[146] Congress may also authorize administrative agencies to recoup "excess profits" paid under wartime government contracts.[147] Under the war power, the United States may confiscate the property of a national of an enemy nation. "This taking may be done as a means of avoiding the use of the property to draw earnings or wealth out of [the United States] to territory where it may more likely be used to assist the enemy than if it remains in the hands of [the American] government." Moreover, any property in U.S. territory of any friendly alien may be summarily reduced to possession by the United States in furtherance of the war effort, without prior compensation, the settlement of which may await the judicial process.[148] The wartime destruction by the Army of strategically important private property, in order to prevent its imminent capture and use by an advancing enemy, does not entitle the owner to compensation under the Fifth Amendment; in such circumstances the safety of the state overrides all considerations of private loss, which "must be attributed solely to the fortunes of war and not to the sovereign."[149] But the question whether an emergency existed, justifying the challenged deprivation of property rights, is judicially reviewable.[150] Similarly, the power to prohibit the liquor traffic as a means of increasing war efficiency is part of the war power of Congress and may be exercised without providing for compensation.[151] And a government order requiring non-essential gold mines to cease operations, for the purpose of conserving equipment and manpower for use in mines more essential to the war effort, is justified

---

145 Case v. Bowles, 327 U.S. 92, 102 (1946).

146 Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 519 (1944). See also Woods v. Cloyd W. Miller Co., 333 U.S. 138, 143–44 (1948), where the Court upheld the constitutionality of control of housing rentals promulgated after hostilities were ended and before peace was formally declared, noting that Congress had the power to deal "with the consequences of a housing deficit greatly intensified during the period of hostilities by the war effort" and "to act to control the forces that a short supply of the needed article created."

147 In Lichter v. United States, 334 U.S. 742, 787–88 (1948), the Court held that "The recovery by the Government of excessive profits received or receivable upon war contracts is in the nature of the regulation of maximum prices under war contracts or the collection of excess profits taxes, rather than the requisitioning or condemnation of private property for public use. . . . The collection of renegotiated excessive profits on a war subcontract also is not in the nature of a penalty, and is not a deprivation of a subcontractor of his property without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment."

148 Silesian-Am. Corp. v. Clark, 332 U.S. 469, 474–77 (1947).

149 United States v. Caltex (Philippines) Inc., 344 U.S. 149, 150–56 (1952) (demolition of oil terminal facilities located at the Philippines Islands).

United States v. Pacific Railroad Co., 120 U.S. 227, 238–39 (1887), involved bridges that had been destroyed during the war between the states by a retreating Northern Army to impede the advance of the Confederate Army. The Court raised the question of whether this act constituted a compensable taking by the United States and answered it in the negative. See also Juragua Iron Co. v. United States, 212 U.S. 297, 306–07 (1909), where recovery was denied to the owners of a factory that had been destroyed by American soldiers in the field in Cuba, because it was thought that the structure housed the germs of a contagious disease. In that case, the Court found that property of citizens of the United States in Cuba constituted during the war with Spain "enemy property subject to the laws of war."

150 Cf. Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378, 400–04 (1932).

151 Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U.S. 146, 164 (1919); Jacob Ruppert v. Caffey, 251 U.S. 264, 301–02 (1920).

by the exigency of war.[152] By contrast, the government's seizure and direction of operation of a coal mine to prevent a national strike of coal miners during the war constitutes a compensable taking.[153]

[B49] In case of insurrection, "the ordinary rights of individuals," including the right of habeas corpus,[154] may "yield to what [the government] deems the necessities of the moment." In a situation like that, the government "may kill persons who resist [or] use the milder measure of seizing the bodies of those whom he considers to stand in the way of restoring peace. Such arrests are not necessarily for punishment, but are by way of precaution, to prevent the exercise of hostile power."[155] Nevertheless, a State Organic Act, authorizing the governor, "in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it," to place the territory under martial law, does not give the armed forces, during a period of martial law, power "to supplant all civilian laws and to substitute military for judicial trials" of civilians not charged with violations of the law of war, if it is not impossible for the civilian government and the courts to function.[156] If a state of martial law is proclaimed and state officials invade rights safeguarded by the Constitution, the question whether an exigency existed, justifying the challenged interference with constitutional rights is subject to judicial inquiry and determination. "What are the allowable limits of military discretion, and whether or not they have been overstepped in a particular case, are judicial questions."[157] "[T]he matter is to be judged on the facts as they appeared then, and not merely in the light of the event."[158]

E. RETROACTIVE LAWMAKING

[B50] In both the civil and the criminal context, the Constitution places limits on the sovereign's ability to enact retroactive rules.[159] The Ex Post Facto Clause (Article I,

---

[152] United States v. Cent. Eureka Mining Co., 357 U.S. 155, 165–69 (1958). As the Court noted, "War . . . demands the strict regulation of nearly all resources. . . . But wartime economic restrictions, temporary in character, are insignificant when compared to the widespread uncompensated loss of life and freedom of action which war traditionally demands." Id. at 168.

[153] United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U.S. 114, 115–17 (1951).

[154] Article I, Section 9, Clause 2, of the Constitution provides: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it."

[155] Moyer v. Peabody, 212 U.S. 78, 84–85 (1909), cited in United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 748 (1987).

[156] Duncan v. Kohanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946).

[157] Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378, 401 (1932) (military orders restricting the production of oil wells).

[158] Moyer v. Peabody, 212 U.S. 78, 85 (1909).

"Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved. . . . [However,] emergency may furnish the occasion for the exercise of [existing] power" in conformity to constitutional principles. See Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 425–26 (1934) (emphasis added). Cf. Wilson v. New, 243 U.S. 332, 348 (1917).

[159] "A statute does not operate 'retrospectively' merely because it is applied in a case arising from conduct antedating the statute's enactment . . . or upsets expectations based in prior law. . . . Rather, [the question is] whether the new provision attaches new legal consequences to events completed before its enactment." See Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 269–70 (1994).

Section 9, Clause 3; Section 10, Clause 1) flatly prohibits retroactive application of penal legislation. The prohibitions on "Bills of Attainder" in Article I, Sections 9–10, prohibit legislatures from singling out disfavored persons and meting out summary punishment for past conduct. Article I, Section 10, Clause 1, prohibits states from passing another type of retroactive legislation, laws "impairing the Obligation of Contracts." The Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause prevents the legislature (and other government actors) from depriving private persons of vested property rights except for a "public use" and upon payment of "just compensation." The Due Process Clause also prohibits "arbitrary and irrational" retroactive legislation.[160]

[B51] These provisions demonstrate that retroactive statutes raise particular concerns. Indeed, "[e]lementary considerations of fairness dictate that individuals should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly; settled expectations should not be lightly disrupted. For that reason, the legal effect of conduct should ordinarily be assessed under the law that existed when the conduct took place has timeless and universal appeal."[161] Accordingly, the Court has adopted a rebuttable presumption against the retroactive application of new laws, as "an essential thread in the mantle of protection that the law affords the individual citizen."[162]

F. AFFIRMATIVE OBLIGATIONS OF GOVERNMENT

[B52] "[T]he Due Process Clauses generally confer no affirmative right to governmental aid, even where such aid may be necessary to secure life, liberty, or property interests of which the government may not deprive the individual."[163] Nor do they guarantee "certain minimal levels of safety and security" against private violence, even if state officials may be aware of the threatened dangers, as long as the state played no part in their creation and did not do anything to render the person harmed more vulnerable to them.[164]

[B53] The government "has no constitutional duty to subsidize an activity merely because it is constitutionally protected."[165] Thus, it may validly choose to allocate public funds for medical services relating to childbirth but not to abortion,[166] even if medically necessary.[167] Indeed the Court has implicitly rejected the idea that welfare is a fundamental right.[168] Furthermore there is no constitutional right to public education,[169]

---

160 See, e.g., Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. R. A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 733 (1984).

161 Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 265–66 (1994).

162 Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433, 439 (1997).

163 DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dep't of Soc. Servs., 489 U.S. 189, 195–96 (1989). Cf. Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 126–30 (1992).

164 DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, 489 U.S 189, 194–203 (1989), involved a case of child abuse that resulted in the permanent brain damage of the minor. In that case, the social workers of the county department of social services, although they had received complaints that the boy was beaten and injured by his father, and had taken various steps to protect him, did not act to remove the child from his father's custody.

165 Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 201 (1991).

166 Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 509–11 (1989). See also Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 474 (1977).

167 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 325 (1980).

168 See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 484 (1970).

169 San Antonio Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 33–36 (1973). Nevertheless, to any particular job or occupation,[170] or to access to dwellings of a particular quality.[171] The First Amendment does not impose any affirmative obligation on the government to listen and respond to an association of public employees or to bargain with it, even if the government has listened to individual employees.[172] And when the government makes general policy, it is under no constitutional obligation to listen to the public at large or to any specially affected class.[173]

[B54] Nevertheless, certain "special relationships" created or assumed by the state with respect to particular individuals may give rise to an affirmative duty, enforceable through the Due Process Clause, to provide adequate protection. "[W]hen the State, by the affirmative exercise of its power, so restrains an individual's liberty that it renders him unable to care for himself, and at the same time fails to provide for his basic human needs, . . . it transgresses the substantive limits on state action set by . . . the Due Process Clause. . . . The affirmative duty to protect arises not from the State's knowledge of the individual's predicament or from its expressions of intent to help him, but from the limitations which it has imposed on his freedom to act on his own behalf, through imprisonment, institutionalization, or other similar restraint of personal liberty."[174] The Court has recognized that the Due Process Clause requires the responsible governmental entity to provide medical care to suspects in police custody who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.[175] Furthermore, federal prison officials have a duty under the Eighth Amendment to provide "humane conditions of confinement." Thus, they "must ensure that inmates receive adequate food, clothing, shelter, and medical care," and must "protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners;" however, a constitutional violation occurs only where the deprivation alleged is, "objectively, sufficiently serious," and the official has acted with "'deliberate indifference' to inmate health or safety."[176] Similarly, the state is obligated, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, to provide involuntarily committed mental patients with adequate food, shelter, clothing, and medical care. Such individuals enjoy constitutionally the Court has not foreclosed the possibility that some identifiable quantum of education is a constitutionally protected prerequisite to the meaningful exercise of either the right to speak or the right to vote. See Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 284 (1986); San Antonio Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 25, n.60, 36–37 (1973).

---

170 See dissenting opinion of Justice Douglas in Barsky v. Bd. of Regents of the Univ. of the State of New York, 347 U.S. 442 (1954), involving the suspension of a physician's license to practice.

171 Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 73–74 (1972).

172 Smith v. Arkansas State Highway Employees, Local 1315, 441 U.S. 463, 465 (1979) (per curiam).

173 Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 283–87 (1984).

174 DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dep't of Soc. Servs., 489 U.S 189, 199–200 (1989). See also Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 126–27 (1992) (the Due Process Clause does not impose a duty upon municipalities to provide certain minimal levels of safety and security in the workplace of their employees).

175 City of Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244–45 (1983). However, as long as the governmental entity ensures that the medical care needed is in fact provided, the Constitution does not dictate how the cost of that care should be allocated as between the entity and the provider of the care. That is a matter of state law.

176 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832–34 (1994). See also Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103–06 (1976) and West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 54–56 (1988) (the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, requires the state to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners).

protected liberty interests in "reasonable conditions of safety and freedom from unreasonable restraints" and such "minimally adequate training . . . as may be reasonable in light of" these interests. Whether the patient's constitutional rights have been violated must be determined by balancing these liberty interests against the relevant state interests. The proper standard for determining whether the state has adequately protected such rights is whether "professional judgment, in fact, was exercised." In determining what is "reasonable," courts must show "deference to the judgment exercised by a qualified professional," whose decision is "presumptively valid."[177]

[B55] The Constitution also imposes upon the state affirmative duties in favor of the criminal defendant. Every indigent defendant in a criminal trial has a constitutional right to the assistance of appointed counsel.[178] "Once the right to counsel has attached and been asserted, . . . [t]he Sixth Amendment . . . imposes on the State an affirmative obligation to respect and preserve the accused's choice to seek this assistance."[179] "To safeguard the due process rights of the accused, a trial judge has an affirmative constitutional duty to minimize the effects of prejudicial pretrial publicity. And because of the Constitution's pervasive concern for these due process rights, a trial judge may surely take protective measures, even when they are not strictly and inescapably necessary."[180]

[B56] Moreover "the fundamental constitutional right of access to the courts requires prison authorities to assist inmates in the preparation and filing of meaningful legal papers. . . . [W]hile adequate law libraries are one constitutionally acceptable method to assure meaningful access to the courts, . . . alternative means to achieve that goal, . . . [such as] legal assistance programs, [are not to be foreclosed.] Among the alternatives are the training of inmates as paralegal assistants to work under lawyers' supervision, the use of paraprofessionals and law students, either as volunteers or in formal clinical programs, the organization of volunteer attorneys through bar associations or other groups, the hiring of lawyers on a part-time consultant basis, and the use of full-time staff attorneys, working either in new prison legal assistance organizations or as part of public defender or legal services offices."[181] Special care must be taken to ensure that "inmates with language problems have a reasonably adequate opportunity to file nonfrivolous legal claims challenging their convictions or conditions of confinement."[182]

---

[177] Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 321–25 (1982).

[178] Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 339–45 (1963). The suspect held in police custody must, prior to interrogation, be clearly informed that, if he is indigent, a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. See Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 472–73 (1966). Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972), established that counsel must be provided before any indigent may be sentenced to prison, even where the crime is petty and the prison term brief. However, the Court has refused to extend the right to appointed counsel to include prosecutions that, though criminal, do not result in the defendant's loss of personal liberty. See Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979). The Constitution also may require the appointment of counsel for indigent persons in certain "quasi-criminal" proceedings. See Lassiter v. Department of Social Services of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 27–32 (1981), concerning parental status termination proceedings.

[179] Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 170–74 (1985).

[180] In Gannett Co. Inc. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 378 (1979), the Court stressed that publicity concerning pre-trial suppression hearings poses special risks of unfairness, because it may influence public opinion against a defendant and inform potential jurors of inculpatory information wholly inadmissible at the actual trial.

[181] Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817, 824–32 (1977).

[182] Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 356 (1996).

G. WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

1. In General

[B57] The classic description of an effective waiver of a constitutional right is the "intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege."[183] The relinquishment of a constitutional right must be "voluntary in the sense that it was the product of a free and deliberate choice, rather than intimidation, coercion, or deception;"[184] there is no effective consent if government officers "convey a message that compliance with their requests is required."[185] The Court has also underlined that a waiver of constitutional rights may be invalid if it "impairs to an appreciable extent any of the public policies behind the rights involved."[186]

[B58] An express written or oral statement is not thought to be indispensable, in any case, for a valid waiver, which may be inferred from an action or omission; indeed "an explicit statement of waiver is not invariably necessary to support a finding that the defendant waived the right to remain silent or the right to counsel guaranteed by the Miranda case."[187] However, the Court does "not presume acquiescence in the loss of fundamental rights."[188] In that respect, it has been implicitly acknowledged that, while a confession after proper Miranda warnings may be found "voluntary" for Fifth Amendment purposes, such a confession does not carry with it a waiver of the right to invoke the Fourth Amendment in case of an arrest without probable cause.[189]

[B59] As a matter of principle, waivers of constitutional rights during the criminal process must be "voluntary, knowing, intelligent acts done with sufficient awareness of

---

183 Coll. Sav. Bank v. Florida Prepaid Post-Secondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666, 682 (1999) quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938).

In Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965), the Court held that an accused has no right to a bench trial, despite his capacity to waive his right to a jury trial. In so holding, the Court stated that "[t]he ability to waive a constitutional right does not ordinarily carry with it the right to insist upon the opposite of that right." Id. at 34–35 (emphasis added).

184 See, in particular, Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421 (1986). See also Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 453 (1966) (indicting police tactics "to induce a confession out of trickery," such as using fictitious witnesses or false accusations).

Nevertheless, in Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167 (1986), the Court held that "coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not 'voluntary,' within the meaning of the Due Process Clause." Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966), held that placing an undercover agent near Hoffa in order to gather incriminating information did not affect the voluntariness of Hoffa's statements. Similarly, in Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990), the Court held that the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against compulsory self-incrimination does not require suppression of a statement made by an incarcerated suspect to an undercover agent.

185 Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 435 (1991).

186 McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 213 (1971). See also Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386, 392, n.2 (1987).

187 N. Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369, 373–76 (1979). Cf. also United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. 522, 529 (1985) (per curiam) (failure by a criminal defendant to invoke his right to be present under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 43 at a conference that he knows is taking place between the judge and a juror in chambers constitutes a valid waiver of that right).

188 Ohio Bell Tel. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of Ohio, 301 U.S. 292, 307 (1937). See also Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 530–33 (1972) (the Court does not presume waiver of a fundamental right from inaction).

189 Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 216–17 (1979).

the relevant circumstances and likely consequences."[190] In criminal cases in which the suspect waives his right to remain silent and to refuse to answer any questions that might incriminate him or his right to the presence of counsel, the waiver must be made "with a full awareness of both the nature of the right being abandoned and the consequences of the decision to abandon it;"[191] the failure of police to administer Miranda warnings means that courts will "presume the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination has not been intelligently exercised."[192] Nevertheless, the Constitution does not require that "a criminal suspect know and understand every possible consequence of a waiver of the Fifth Amendment privilege."[193] "[T]he law ordinarily considers a waiver knowing, intelligent, and sufficiently aware if the defendant fully understands the nature of the right and how it would likely apply in general in the circumstances—even though the defendant may not know the specific detailed consequences of invoking it."[194] Nor does the Constitution require "that the police supply a suspect with a flow of information to help him calibrate his self-interest in deciding whether to speak or stand by his rights."[195]

[B60] The determination whether statements obtained during custodial interrogation are admissible against the accused is to be made "upon an inquiry into the totality of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation, to ascertain whether the accused in fact knowingly and voluntarily decided to forgo his rights to remain silent and to have the assistance of counsel."[196] "This 'totality of the circumstances' approach is adequate to determine whether there has been a waiver even where interrogation of juveniles is involved."[197] Those potential circumstances include not only the crucial element of

---

[190] Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 748 (1970); United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002), citing Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969).

In New York v. Hill, 528 U.S. 110, 114–15 (2000), the Court noted that "For certain fundamental rights, the defendant must personally make an informed waiver. See, e.g., Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464–65 (1938) (right to counsel); Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1966) (right to plead not guilty). For other rights, however, waiver may be effected by action of counsel. Although there are basic rights that the attorney cannot waive without the fully informed and publicly acknowledged consent of the client, the lawyer has—and must have—full authority to manage the conduct of the trial. See Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 417–18 (1988). As to many decisions pertaining to the conduct of the trial, the defendant is deemed bound by the acts of his lawyer-agent and is considered to have notice of all facts, notice of which can be charged upon the attorney. . . . Thus, decisions by counsel are generally given effect as to what arguments to pursue, see Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751 (1983), what evidentiary objections to raise, see Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U.S. 443, 451 (1965), what agreements to conclude regarding the admission of evidence. . . . Absent a demonstration of ineffectiveness, counsel's word on such matters is the last. Scheduling matters are plainly among those for which agreement by counsel generally controls."

[191] Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421 (1986).

[192] Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 310 (1985).

[193] Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 574–77 (1987) (a suspect's awareness of all the crimes about which he may be questioned is not relevant to determining the validity of his decision to waive the Fifth Amendment privilege, for it may "affect only the wisdom of a Miranda waiver, not its essentially voluntary and knowing nature").

[194] See United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622, 629 (2002).

[195] Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 422 (1986).

[196] Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 725 (1979)

[197] Id. at 725 (involving the right against self-incrimination). Cf. Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292 (1993) (concerning the right to a hearing).

police physical brutality,[198] or mental/psychological coercion, through various interrogation techniques, such as the length of the interrogation,[199] its location,[200] its continuity,[201] or the administration of a "truth serum" to the suspect,[202] but also the defendant's age,[203] experience,[204] education,[205] physical[206] or mental[207] condition, and intelligence.[208] Yet, the Fifth Amendment privilege is not concerned "with moral and psychological pressures to confess emanating from sources other than official coercion;"[209] thus a defendant's "perception of coercion flowing from the 'voice of God' . . . is a matter to which the United States Constitution does not speak."[210]

[B61] The voluntariness of a confession is a mixed question of fact and law, meriting independent determination by a federal habeas court.[211] A relevant factual dispute needs to be resolved only by a preponderance of the evidence.[212] Consequently "a waiver of the auxiliary protections established in Miranda should require no higher burden of proof."[213]

[B62] "[A] guilty plea, is not simply 'an admission of past conduct,' but also constitutes a waiver of constitutional trial rights such as the right to call witnesses, to confront and cross-examine one's accusers, and to trial by jury."[214] Only a "voluntary and intelli-

---

198 Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167 (1986).

199 Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, 153–54 (1944).

200 Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433, 441 (1961).

201 Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556, 561 (1954).

202 Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293, 307–09 (1963).

203 See, e.g., Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596, 599–601 (1948).

204 See, e.g., Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938).

205 Clewis v. Texas, 386 U.S. 707, 712 (1967).

206 Greenwald v. Wisconsin, 390 U.S. 519, 520–21 (1968) (per curiam).

207 Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 164 (1986).

208 Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191, 196 (1957).

209 Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 170 (1986), quoting Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 305 (1985).

210 Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 170–01 (1986).

"Events occurring outside of a suspect's presence and entirely unknown to him can have no bearing on the capacity to comprehend and knowingly relinquish a constitutional right." Hence, the police's failure to inform a suspect that an attorney retained for him by somebody else sought to reach him does not taint the validity of the waivers of his Miranda rights and does not therefore require exclusion of his confessions. See Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421–24 (1986).

211 Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104, 111–12 (1985).

212 Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477, 488–89 (1972).

213 Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 169 (1986).

214 Harine v. Prosise, 462 U.S. 306, 319 (1983), citing Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 747–48 (1970).

In Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999), the Court held that, in the federal criminal system, a guilty plea does not waive the self-incrimination privilege at sentencing, noting, inter alia, that "Treating a guilty plea as a waiver of the privilege would be a grave encroachment on defendants' rights. . . . [For example, with respect to drug distribution offenses, it would allow prosecutors to] indict without specifying a drug quantity, obtain a guilty plea, and then put the defendant on the stand at sentencing to fill in the quantity. . . . Where the sentence has not yet been imposed, a defendant may have a legitimate fear of adverse consequences from further testimony. [And any] effort by the State to compel the defendant to testify against his will at the sentencing hearing clearly would contravene the Fifth Amendment."

gent" guilty plea by a competent criminal defendant is constitutionally valid.[215] A plea is not intelligent unless a defendant first receives "real notice of the true nature of the charge against him;"[216] yet the Constitution does not require the government to provide affirmative defense information to the defendant prior to plea bargaining.[217] Furthermore "conscious waiver is not necessary with respect to each potential defense relinquished by a plea of guilty."[218] A plea of guilty is not invalid "merely because entered to avoid the possibility of the death penalty."[219] A defendant who pleads guilty upon the advice of counsel "may only attack the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea by showing that the advice he received from counsel"[220] was not "within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases."[221] The defendant must show, on one hand, that "counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness" and, on the other hand, that "there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different."[222] The competency standard for pleading guilty is whether the defendant has "sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding" and a "rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him."[223]

---

[215] See Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 396–402 (1993); Bousley v. United States, 523 U.S. 614, 618 (1998), citing Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 748 (1970).

The plea-bargaining process necessarily exerts pressure on defendants to plead guilty and to abandon a series of fundamental rights, but the government "may encourage a guilty plea by offering substantial benefits in return for the plea." See Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212, 219 (1978) (upholding a statute that imposed higher sentences on defendants who went to trial than on those who entered guilty pleas). "While confronting a defendant with the risk of more severe punishment clearly may have a discouraging effect on the defendant's assertion of his trial rights, the imposition of these difficult choices is an inevitable—and permissible—attribute of any legitimate system which tolerates and encourages the negotiation of pleas." See Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978).

[216] Bousley v. United States, 523 U.S. 614, 618 (1998), citing Smith v. O'Grady, 312 U.S. 329, 334 (1941).

[217] United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002).

[218] United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563, 573 (1989).

[219] Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 755 (1970).

In United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570 (1968), the Court held that the death sentence provided by the Federal Kidnapping Act was invalid, because it could be imposed only upon the recommendation of a jury accompanying a guilty verdict, whereas the maximum penalty for those tried to the court after waiving a jury and for those pleading guilty was life imprisonment: only those insisting on a jury trial faced the possibility of a death penalty. The Court found that the interest of the government in having the jury retain the power to render the death penalty could be realized without this imposition on the rights of the accused. In Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742, 746 (1970), the Court succinctly articulated the narrow holding in Jackson: "Because the legitimate goal of limiting the death penalty to cases in which a jury recommends it could be achieved without penalizing those defendants who plead not guilty and elect a jury trial, the death penalty provision needlessly penalized the assertion of a constitutional right."

[220] Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258, 267 (1973).

[221] McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 771 (1970).

[222] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 688, 694 (1984).

[223] Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 397–400 (1993).

[B63] In relation to the above, it is worth noting that the Court "evaluate[s] the knowing and intelligent nature of the waiver of trial rights in trial-type situations,"[224] such as the waiver of the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination before an administrative agency[225] or a congressional committee[226] or the waiver of counsel in a juvenile proceeding.[227]

[B64] Constitutional rights regarding the execution of criminal sentences are also waivable. Indeed the Court has admitted that the Eighth Amendment protections can be waived even in the area of capital punishment.[228]

[B65] However, there is "a vast difference between those rights that protect a fair criminal trial and the rights guaranteed under the Fourth Amendment. Nothing, either in the purposes behind requiring a 'knowing' and 'intelligent' waiver of trial rights, or in the practical application of such a requirement suggests that it ought to be extended to the constitutional guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures. . . . When the subject of a search is not in custody and the State would justify a search on the basis of his consent, the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments require that it demonstrate that the consent was in fact, voluntarily given, and not the result of duress or coercion, express or implied. Voluntariness is . . . to be determined from all the circumstances, and while the subject's knowledge of a right to refuse is a factor to be taken into account, the prosecution is not required to demonstrate such knowledge as a prerequisite to establishing a voluntary consent."[229] Thus, the Fourth Amendment does not require that "a lawfully seized defendant be advised that he is 'free to go' before his consent to search will be recognized as voluntary."[230] In case of a warrantless search, permission (voluntary consent) to search may be obtained from a third party who possesses "common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected."[231]

[B66] The waiver question has also arisen in relation to civil trials. It is settled that "parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit to the jurisdiction of a given court, to permit notice to be served by the opposing party, or even to waive notice altogether."[232] "The due process rights to notice and hearing prior to a civil judgment are subject to waiver."[233] A cognovit clause agreed to by the parties with advice of counsel and with full awareness of the legal consequences is, in principle, valid.[234] Furthermore, a "release-dismissal" agreement, whereby a prosecutor dismisses the charges against a

---

[224] Schneckcloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 238 (1973).

[225] Smith v. United States, 337 U.S. 137, 149–52 (1949).

[226] Emspak v. United States, 349 U.S. 190, 196–98 (1954).

[227] In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 42 (1967).

[228] Stewart v. La Grand, 526 U.S. 115, 119 (1999) (per curiam) (La Grand waived his claim that execution by lethal gas was unconstitutional, by choosing lethal gas over lethal injection).

[229] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 241, 248–49 (1973).

[230] Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39–40 (1996).

[231] United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 (1974).

[232] Nat'l Equip. Rental, Ltd. v. Szukhent, 375 U.S. 311, 315–16 (1964).

[233] D. H. Overmyer Co., Inc. of Ohio v. Frick, 405 U.S. 174, 185 (1972); Swarb v. Lennox, 405 U.S. 191, 200–01 (1972).

[234] D. H. Overmyer Co., Inc. of Ohio v. Frick, 405 U.S. 174, 182–88 (1972) ("where the contract is one of adhesion, where there is great disparity in bargaining power, and where the debtor receives nothing for the cognovit provision, other legal consequences may ensue").

criminal defendant since the latter agrees voluntarily to release any claims he might have against the government or its officials for any harm caused by his arrest, may be a valid waiver of the right to sue under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, which provides a federal cause of action against any person who, acting under color of state law, deprives another of his federal rights.[235] However, a guilty plea, while it results in the defendant's loss of any meaningful opportunity he might otherwise have had in the criminal proceeding to challenge the admissibility of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment, is not "a waiver of antecedent Fourth Amendment claims that may be given effect outside the confines of the criminal proceeding."[236]

[B67] Finally, revocation of a valid waiver is not to be excluded. Although a guilty plea may not be withdrawn,[237] one has the right to withdraw the waiver of his privilege against self-incrimination[238] or a waiver of his right to the presence of counsel during his interrogation by the police.[239] If a waiver is part of an agreement, the relevant principle is that "a promise is unenforceable if the interest in its enforcement is outweighed in the circumstances by a public policy harmed by enforcement of the agreement."[240]

2. Waiver of a Constitutional Right as a Condition for Receiving Discretionary Government Benefits—Doctrine of Unconstitutional Conditions[241]

[B68] Particularly interesting is the doctrine of "unconstitutional conditions," under which, "[e]ven though government has no obligation to provide a person, or the public, a particular benefit, it does not follow that conferral of the benefit may be conditioned on the surrender of a constitutional right"[242] or the sacrifice of a constitutionally protected interest.[243] "It is inconceivable that guaranties embedded in the Constitution of the United States may thus be manipulated out of existence;"[244] the government is not allowed to establish such statutory conditions in order "to produce a result that it could not command directly."[245] The Court has found unconstitutional, inter alia,

(1) the requirement of loyalty oaths as a condition of tax exemptions provided for veterans by a state Constitution;[246]

---

[235] Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386, 392, 400 (1987). The Court pointed out that " although we agree that, in some cases, these agreements may infringe important interests of the criminal defendant and of society as a whole, we do not believe that the mere possibility of harm to these interests calls for a per se rule." Id. at 392.

[236] Haring v. Prosise, 462 U.S. 306, 319 (1983).

[237] See, e.g., Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970).

[238] Stevens v. Marks, 383 U.S. 234, 238–44 (1966).

[239] See Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 502 (1966) (opinion of Justice Clark).

[240] Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386, 392 (1987).

[241] See also paras. I225 et seq. (government funding of speech).

[242] Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. R.R. Comm'n of California, 271 U.S. 583, 594 (1926); Liquormart Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 513 (1996).

[243] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972).

[244] U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 831 (1995), quoting Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 345 (1960) and Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. R.R. Comm'n of California, 271 U.S. 583, 594 (1926).

[245] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972).

[246] Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 514–29 (1958) (enforcement of this provision "through procedures which place the burdens of proof and persuasion on the taxpayer[s]" deny

(2) the disqualification of a member of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church for unemployment compensation benefits, solely because of her refusal to accept employment in which she would have to work on Saturday contrary to her religious belief;[247]

(3) the imposition of more onerous taxes or other burdens on foreign corporations doing business within the United States than those imposed on domestic corporations, "unless the discrimination between foreign and domestic corporations bears a rational relation to a legitimate state purpose;"[248]

(4) the non-renewal of the contract of a government employee or independent contractor because of his constitutionally protected speech;[249]

(5) patronage decisions regarding hiring, promotion, transfer, recall, or dismissal of public employees, based on party affiliation and support, unless these practices are "narrowly tailored to further vital government interests;"[250]

(6) a federal law that forbids any non-commercial educational station that receives public grants to engage in editorializing;[251]

(7) a federal program that provides financial support for legal assistance to indigent clients in, inter alia, welfare benefits claims, on the condition that legal representation funded by the program does not involve an effort to amend or otherwise challenge existing welfare law.[252]

[B69] The Court seemed to deviate from its prior holdings in Posadas, which involved Puerto Rico's Act providing that no gambling room would be permitted to advertise or otherwise offer their facilities to the public of Puerto Rico. There a five-member majority upheld the constitutionality of the Act, noting, inter alia, that, since the Puerto Rico Legislature "surely could have prohibited casino gambling by the residents of Puerto Rico altogether, the greater power to completely ban casino gambling necessarily included the lesser power to ban advertising of casino gambling."[253] But the Posadas sylthem freedom of speech without the procedural safeguards required by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

---

[247] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 404–05 (1963) (unconstitutional burden on the free exercise of religion).

[248] W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. Bd. of Equalization, 451 U.S. 648, 657, 667–68 (1981).

[249] Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597–98 (1972); Bd. of County Comm'rs, Wabaunsee County, Kansas v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668, 673–86 (1996).

[250] See Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 355–60, 375 (1976); Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 514 (1980); and, in particular, Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62, 68–79 (1990) ("A government's interest in securing effective employees can be met by discharging, demoting, or transferring persons whose work is deficient, [and its] interest in securing employees who will loyally implement its policies can be adequately served by choosing or dismissing high-level employees on the basis of their political views.")

[251] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 374–402 (1984) (ban held violative of the First Amendment).

[252] Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001).

[253] Posadas de Puerto Rico Assocs., dba Condado Holiday Inn v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328, 345–46 (1986). Nevertheless, the Court reached this argument only after it already had found that the state regulation survived the Central Hudson test (see, in extenso, para. I185).

logism was expressly disavowed some years later. In Liquormart, concerning a state law banning the advertisement of retail liquor prices except at the place of sale, a four-member plurality rejected the "greater includes the lesser" argument of the state—which reasoned that its undisputed authority to ban alcoholic beverages should include the power to restrict advertisements offering them for sale—as inconsistent with the well-settled doctrine of unconstitutional conditions.[254] Meyer rejected the position that a state's power to end ballot initiatives includes the power to limit discussion of political issues raised in initiative petitions and to prohibit the use of paid petition circulators.[255] And in Greater New Orleans Broadcasting, the Court made clear that "the power to prohibit or to regulate particular conduct does not necessarily include the power to prohibit or regulate speech about that conduct."[256]

[B70] Nevertheless, the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions does not preclude the government from imposing conditions reasonably related to the purpose of the relevant government benefit. A state program, providing for aid to families with dependent children, which requires home visits by caseworkers as a condition for assistance "in order that any treatment or service tending to restore beneficiaries to a condition of self-support and to relieve their distress may be rendered," does not violate any right guaranteed by the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, as this requirement is a "reasonable administrative tool," mainly in light of the state's "appropriate and paramount interest and concern in seeing and assuring that the intended and proper objects of that tax produced assistance are the ones who benefit from the aid it dispenses."[257] A statute that provides the government benefit of obtaining registration of an insecticide may confer upon the government a license to use and disclose the trade secrets contained in the application, thus making new end-use products available to consumers more quickly and assuring the public that the product is safe and effective.[258] In the same context, the Court has admitted that the government may not require a person to give up his constitutional right to receive just compensation when his property is taken for a public use, in exchange for a discretionary granting of a construction permit, where "the property sought has little or no relationship to the benefit."[259]

[B71] Regulations that prohibit federally funded family-planning projects from engaging in counseling concerning, referrals for, and activities advocating abortion as a method of family planning, are permissible. Such restrictions on the subsidization of [254] Liquormart Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 513 (1996). The Court struck down the statutory ban as an unconstitutional abridgment of the freedom of commercial speech.

---

[255] Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414, 424–25 (1988). See also Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765 (2002) (the greater power to dispense with elections altogether does not include the lesser power to conduct elections under conditions of state-imposed voter ignorance; if the state chooses to tap the energy and the legitimizing power of the democratic process, it must accord the participants in that process the First Amendment rights that attach to their roles).

[256] Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n, Inc. v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 193 (1999).

[257] Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309, 318–25 (1971).

[258] Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1014–15 (1984).

[259] Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374, 385–86 (1994). More particularly, it must be determined whether an "essential nexus" exists between a "legitimate state interest" and the permit condition and, if one does, then it must be decided whether "the degree of the exactions demanded by the permit conditions" is "roughly proportionate" to "the projected impact of the proposed development."

abortion-related speech were not held to unconstitutionally condition the receipt of a benefit (funding) on the relinquishment of a constitutional right, the right to engage in abortion advocacy and counseling. The Court has pointed out that "[t]here is a basic difference between direct state interference with a protected activity and state encouragement of an alternative activity consonant with legislative policy."[260] "The Government can, without violating the Constitution, selectively fund a program to encourage certain activities it believes to be in the public interest [such as to subsidize family planning services which will lead to conception and childbirth, and declining to 'promote or encourage abortion'], without at the same time funding an alternate program which seeks to deal with the problem in another way. . . . In contrast, [the Court's] 'unconstitutional conditions' doctrine involves situations in which the government has placed a condition on the recipient of the subsidy, rather that on a particular program or service, thus effectively prohibiting the recipient from engaging in the protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program."[261]

H. SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

[B72] The Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments contain "a substantive component that bars certain arbitrary, wrongful government actions regardless of the fairness of the procedures used to implement them."[262] So-called "substantive due process" protects against government power exercised "without any reasonable justification in the service of a legitimate governmental objective;"[263] it prevents the government from engaging in conduct that "shocks the conscience" or interferes with rights "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty."[264]

[B73] "While due process protection in the substantive sense limits what the government may do in both its legislative, . . . and its executive capacities, . . . criteria to identify what is fatally arbitrary differ depending on whether it is legislation or a specific act of a governmental officer that is at issue. [The Court's] cases dealing with abusive executive action have repeatedly emphasized that only the most egregious official conduct can be said to be arbitrary in the constitutional sense."[265] Thus, the Court has spoken of the cognizable level of executive abuse of power as that which "shocks the conscience;"[266] "while the measure of what is conscience-shocking is no calibrated yardstick, it does point the way."[267]

---

[260] Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 475 (1977).

[261] Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 193, 197 (1991) (emphasis added).

[262] Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113, 125 (1990).

[263] County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 846 (1998).

[264] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987).

[265] County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 846 (1998). In Collins v. Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 126 (1992), for example, the Court said that the Due Process Clause was intended to prevent government officials "from abusing [their] power, or employing it as an instrument of oppression."

[266] The Court first put the test this way in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 172–173 (1952), where it found the forced pumping of a suspect's stomach enough to offend due process as conduct "that shocks the conscience" and violates the "decencies of civilized conduct."

[267] See County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 846–47 (1998). The issue in that case was whether a police officer violates the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process by causing death in a high-speed automobile chase aimed at apprehending a suspected

[B74] The Due Process Clauses provide heightened protection against government interference with certain fundamental rights and liberty interests.[268] The Court's established method of substantive due process analysis has two primary features. First, the Due Process Clauses specially protect those fundamental rights and liberties that are, objectively, "deeply rooted in [the] Nation's history and tradition,"[269] or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," such that "neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed."[270] Second, the Court has required in substantive due process cases a "careful description" of the asserted fundamental liberty interest.[271] Thus, the Court has held that, in addition to the specific freedoms protected by the Bill of Rights, the "liberty" specially protected by the Due Process Clauses includes the rights to marry,[272] to have children,[273] to direct the education and upbringing of one's children,[274] to marital privacy,[275] to use contraception[276] to engage in intimate sexual conduct with a member of the same sex,[277] to bodily integrity,[278] and to abortion.[279] The Court has also assumed, and strongly suggested, that the Due Process Clause protects the traditional right to refuse unwanted lifesaving medical treatment.[280]

[B75] However, as a general matter, the Court has been "reluctant to expand the concept of substantive due process, because guideposts for responsible decisionmaking in this unchartered area are scarce and open-ended."[281] For example, the Court has held offender. The Court answered no, and held that, "in such circumstances, only a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of arrest will satisfy the element of arbitrary conduct shocking to the conscience necessary for a due process violation."

---

[268] See, e.g., Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 301–02 (1993) ("the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments' guarantee of due process of law . . . include[s] a substantive component which forbids the government to infringe certain fundamental liberty interests at all, no matter what process is provided, unless the infringement is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest").

Where another provision of the Constitution provides "an explicit textual source of constitutional protection," a court must assess a plaintiff's claims under that explicit provision and "not the more generalized notion of substantive due process." See Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989); Conn v. Gabbert, 526 U.S. 286, 293 (1999) (emphasis added).

[269] Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 720–21 (1997).

[270] Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 325, 326 (1937). In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 572 (2003), the Court noted that "history and tradition are the starting point, but not in all cases the ending point, of the substantive due process inquiry" (emphasis added).

[271] Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 302 (1993); Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 125 (1992).

[272] Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967).

[273] Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942).

[274] Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923); Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925).

[275] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

[276] Id.; Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972).

[277] Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

[278] Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952). This liberty interest in bodily integrity encompasses the right to resist enforced medication. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22 (1990).

[279] Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992).

[280] Cruzan v. Dir., Missouri Dep't of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278–79 (1990).

[281] Collins v. Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115, 125 (1992). Hence, "beyond the specific guarantees enumerated in the Bill of Rights, the Due Process Clause has limited operation." See Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 352 (1990).

that assisted suicide is not a fundamental right protected by due process[282] and that an alien juvenile who has no available parent, close relative, or legal guardian, and for whom the government is responsible, has no fundamental right to be placed in the custody of a private custodian rather than of a government-operated or government-selected child care institution.[283]

I. CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF PARTICULAR CATEGORIES OF PERSONS

1. Aliens[284]

[B76] There are literally millions of aliens within the jurisdiction of the United States. "The Fifth Amendment, as well as the Fourteenth Amendment, protects every one of these persons from deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. . . . Even one whose presence in this country is unlawful, involuntary, or transitory is entitled to that constitutional protection."[285] And First Amendment rights are accorded to aliens residing in the country.[286]

[B77] The Constitution grants Congress the power to "establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization" (Article I, Section 8, Clause 4). Drawing upon this broad power, upon its plenary authority with respect to foreign relations and international commerce, and upon the inherent power of a sovereign to close its borders, "Congress regularly makes rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens. The exclusion of aliens and the reservation of the power to deport have no permissible counterpart in the Federal Government's power to regulate the conduct of its own citizenry. The fact that an Act of Congress treats aliens differently from citizens does not, in itself, imply that such disparate treatment is 'invidious.'"[287] By contrast, since states enjoy no such powers, "there

---

[282] Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997).

[283] Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 301–305 (1993).

[284] In Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253, 268 (1967), the Court recognized that the first sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment, "protect[s] every citizen of this Nation against a congressional forcible destruction of his citizenship," and that every citizen has "a constitutional right to remain a citizen . . . unless he voluntarily relinquishes that citizenship."

Vance v. Terrazas, 444 U.S. 252 (1980), held that, in establishing loss of citizenship, under the Immigration and Nationality Act, the government must "prove an intent to surrender United States citizenship," not just the "voluntary commission of an [expatriating] act such as swearing allegiance to a foreign nation." The Court said that Congress does not have any "general power, express or implied, to take away an American citizen's citizenship without his 'assent,'" which means "an intent to relinquish citizenship, whether the intent is expressed in words or is found as a fair inference from proved conduct." Id. at 258–60. Further, noting that expatriation proceedings are civil in nature, and do not threaten a loss of liberty, the Court decided that, in such proceedings, the Due Process Clause does not require proof beyond a preponderance of the evidence. Id. at 264–67.

In Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 159–86 (1963), the Court held that deprivation of citizenship cannot be imposed as punishment for the offense of remaining outside the country to avoid military service, without the procedural safeguards granted by the Fifth and Sixth Amendments.

[285] Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 76–77 (1976), citing Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 48–51 (1950).

[286] Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 148 (1945).

[287] Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 79–80 (1976).

would be few very—if any—areas in which a State could legitimately distinguish between its citizens and lawfully resident aliens."[288] Illegal aliens, whatever their status under the immigration laws, may claim the benefit of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[289]

2. Prisoners

[B78] The Court has determined that incarceration does not divest prisoners of all constitutional protections. Inmates retain, for example, the right to marry,[290] certain protections of the First Amendment,[291] the right to be free from racial discrimination,[292] and the right to due process.[293]

[B79] The Court nonetheless has maintained that "the constitutional rights that prisoners possess are more limited in scope than the constitutional rights held by individuals in society at large."[294] In the First Amendment context, for instance, some rights are inconsistent with the status of a prisoner or "with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system."[295] The Court has thus sustained proscriptions of media interviews with individual inmates,[296] prohibitions on the activities of a prisoners' labor union,[297] and restrictions on inmate-to-inmate written correspondence.[298] Moreover, "because the problems of prisons are complex and intractable, and because courts are particularly ill equipped to deal with these problems, . . . [the Court] generally ha[s] deferred to the judgments of prison officials in upholding these regulations against constitutional challenge."[299]

[B80] Reflecting this understanding, in Turner, the Court adopted a deferential standard for reviewing prisoners' constitutional claims: "When a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests."[300] Under this standard, four factors are relevant.

---

[288] See Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 438 (1982), citing Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 372 (1971).

[289] Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 210–16 (1982).

[290] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 95–96 (1987).

[291] Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 408–09 (1974) (freedom of expression); O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 348 (1987) (freedom of religion); Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969) (right to petition the government for redress of grievances).

[292] Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333 (1968) (per curiam).

[293] Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974).

[294] Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 229 (2001).

[295] Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822 (1974).

[296] Id. at 833–35.

[297] Jones v. N. Carolina Prisoners' Union, 433 U.S. 119, 133 (1977).

[298] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 93 (1987).

[299] See Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 229 (2001).

[300] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89 (1987).

Turner is not applicable to race discrimination and Eighth Amendment cases. In Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 510–11 (2005), the Court stressed that it has "applied Turner's reasonable-relationship test only to rights that are inconsistent with proper incarceration. . . . The right not to be discriminated against based on one's race is not susceptible to the logic of Turner. It is not a right that need necessarily be compromised for the sake of proper prison administration. On the contrary, compliance with the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on racial discrimination is not only consistent with proper prison administration, but also bolsters the legitimacy of the entire

First, there must be a "valid, rational connection" between the prison regulation and the legitimate governmental interest put forward to justify it. . . . Thus, a regulation cannot be sustained where the logical connection between the regulation and the asserted goal is so remote as to render the policy arbitrary or irrational. Moreover, the governmental objective must be a legitimate and neutral one. [The Court has] found it important to inquire whether prison regulations restricting inmates' First Amendment rights operated in a neutral fashion, without regard to the content of the expression. . . .

A second factor relevant in determining the reasonableness of a prison restriction is whether there are alternative means of exercising the right that remain open to prison inmates. Where "other avenues" remain available for the exercise of the asserted right, . . . courts should be particularly conscious of the "measure of judicial deference owed to corrections officials . . . in gauging the validity of the regulation." . . .

A third consideration is the impact accommodation of the asserted constitutional right will have on guards and other inmates, and on the allocation of prison resources generally. In the necessarily closed environment of the correctional institution, few changes will have no ramifications on the liberty of others or on the use of the prison's limited resources for preserving institutional order. When accommodation of an asserted right will have a significant "ripple effect" on fellow inmates or on prison staff, courts should be particularly deferential to the informed discretion of corrections officials. . . .

Finally, the absence of ready alternatives available to the prison for achieving the governmental objectives is evidence of the reasonableness of a prison regulation. . . . By the same token, the existence of obvious, easy alternatives may be evidence that the regulation is not reasonable, but is an exaggerated response to prison concerns. This is not a "least restrictive alternative" test: prison officials do not have to set up and then shoot down every conceivable alternative method of accommodating the claimant's constitutional complaint. . . . But if an inmate claimant can point to an alternative that fully accommodates the prisoner's rights at de minimis cost to valid penological interests, a court may consider that as evidence that the regulation does not satisfy the reasonable relationship standard.[301] criminal justice system. Race discrimination is especially pernicious in the administration of justice. . . . When government officials are permitted to use race as a proxy for gang membership and violence without demonstrating a compelling government interest and proving that their means are narrowly tailored, society as a whole suffers. For similar reasons, we have not used Turner to evaluate Eighth Amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment in prison. We judge violations of that Amendment under the 'deliberate indifference" standard,' rather than Turner's 'reasonably related' standard. This is because the integrity of the criminal justice system depends on full compliance with the Eighth Amendment." In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that "strict scrutiny" was the proper standard of review for an equal protection challenge to California's policy of racially segregating prisoners in double cells in reception centers for up to 60 days each time they entered a new correctional facility.

---

[301] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–91 (1987).

[B81] For example, applying the Turner analysis, the Court sustained, in Overton, prison regulations that placed certain restrictions on visits with prison inmates. Under these regulations, an inmate could be visited only by qualified members of the clergy and attorneys on official business and by persons placed on an approved list, which might include an unlimited number of immediate family members and ten other individuals the prisoner designated, subject to some restrictions. Minors under the age of 18 might not be placed on the list, unless they were the children, stepchildren, grandchildren, or siblings of the inmate. If the inmate's parental rights were terminated, the child could not be a visitor. A child authorized to visit should be accompanied by an adult who was an immediate family member of the child or inmate or the child's legal guardian. An inmate could not place a former prisoner on the visitor list, unless the former prisoner was an immediate family member of the inmate, and the warden gave his approval. Prisoners who had committed two substance-abuse violations could receive only clergy and attorneys but might apply for reinstatement of visitation privileges after two years. The Court did not imply that "any right to intimate association is altogether terminated by incarceration or is always irrelevant to claims made by prisoners" but did not attempt "to explore or define the asserted right of association at any length or determine the extent to which it survives incarceration," because it thought that the challenged regulations bore a "rational relation to legitimate penological interests." The Court, first, found that, with respect to the restrictions on visitation by children, the regulations bore a rational relation to the state's valid interests "in maintaining internal prison security and protecting child visitors from exposure to sexual or other misconduct or from accidental injury." "The regulations promote[d] internal security, perhaps the most legitimate of penological goals, . . . by reducing the total number of visitors and by limiting the disruption caused by children in particular. Protecting children from harm is also a legitimate goal. . . . The logical connection between this interest and the regulations [wa]s demonstrated by trial testimony that reducing the number of children allowed guards to supervise them better, to ensure their safety and to minimize the disruptions they cause[d] within the visiting areas. As for the regulation requiring children to be accompanied by a family member or legal guardian, it [wa]s reasonable to ensure that the visiting child [wa]s accompanied and supervised by those adults charged with protecting the child's best interests." The contention that excluding minor nieces and nephews and children as to whom parental rights had been terminated bore no rational relationship to these penological interests was rejected, and in all events it would "not suffice to invalidate the regulations as to all noncontact visits." "To reduce the number of child visitors, a line must be drawn, and the categories set out by these regulations [we]re reasonable. Visits [we]re allowed between an inmate and those children closest to him or her—children, grandchildren, and siblings. The prohibition on visitation by children as to whom the inmate no longer ha[d] parental rights [wa]s simply a recognition by prison administrators of a status determination made in other official proceedings. [The rule] prohibiting visitation by former inmates [bore] a self-evident connection to the State's interest in maintaining prison security and preventing future crimes. . . . Finally, the restriction on visitation for inmates with two substance-abuse violations, a bar which [might] be removed after two years, serve[d] the legitimate goal of deterring the use of drugs and alcohol within the prisons." As the Court pointed out, "[w]ithdrawing visitation privileges is a proper and even necessary management technique to induce compliance with the rules of inmate behavior, especially for high-security prisoners who have few other privileges to lose." Relatedly, the Court agreed that the restriction was "severe," and noted that, "if faced with evidence that [the] regulation was treated as a de facto permanent ban on all visitation for certain inmates, [it] might reach a different conclusion in a challenge to a particular application of the regulation." Having determined that each of the challenged regulations bore a rational relationship to a legitimate penological interest, the Court then considered whether inmates had alternative means of exercising the constitutional right they sought to assert. "Were it shown that no alternative means of communication existed, though it would not be conclusive, it would be some evidence that the regulations [we]re unreasonable. That showing, however, [could] not be made. Inmates [did] have alternative means of associating with those prohibited from visiting. [They could] communicate with those who [might] not visit by sending messages through those who were allowed to visit. Although this option [wa]s not available to inmates barred all visitation after two violations, they and other inmates [could] communicate with persons outside the prison by letter and telephone." Respondents argued that letter-writing was inadequate for illiterate inmates and for communications with young children, and that phone calls were brief and expensive, so that these alternatives were not sufficient. But, as the Court stressed, "alternatives to visitation need not be ideal; they need only be available" (emphasis added). There, the alternatives were "of sufficient utility that they [gave] some support to the regulations, particularly in a context where visitation [wa]s limited, not completely withdrawn." Another relevant consideration was "the impact that accommodation of the asserted associational right would have on guards, other inmates, the allocation of prison resources, and the safety of visitors. Accommodating respondents' demands would cause a significant reallocation of the prison system's financial resources and would impair the ability of corrections officers to protect all who [we]re inside the prison's walls. When such consequences are present, [the Court is] 'particularly deferential' to prison administrators' regulatory judgments." Finally, in considering whether the presence of ready alternatives undermined the reasonableness of the regulations, the Court emphasized that "Turner does not impose a least-restrictive-alternative test, but asks instead whether the prisoner has pointed to some obvious regulatory alternative that fully accommodates the asserted right while not imposing more than a de minimis cost to the valid penological goal." Respondents had not suggested alternatives meeting this "high standard" for any of the regulations at issue. The Court disagreed with respondents' suggestion that allowing visitation by nieces and nephews or children for whom parental rights had been terminated was an obvious alternative. "Increasing the number of child visitors in that way surely would have more than a negligible effect on the goals served by the regulation." As to the limitation on visitation by former inmates, respondents argued the restriction could be time limited, but the Court deferred to the state's judgment that "a longer restriction better serve[d] its interest in preventing the criminal activity that could result from these interactions." And although respondents suggested the duration of the restriction for inmates with substance-abuse violations could be shortened or that it could be applied only for the most serious violations, "these alternatives do not go so far toward accommodating the asserted right with so little cost to penological goals that they meet Turner's high standard."[302]

---

[302] Overton v. Mazzetta, 539 U.S. 126 (2003).

In Block v. Rutherford, 468 U.S. 576 (1984), a ban on contact visits was upheld on the ground that "responsible, experienced administrators have determined, in their sound discretion, that such visits will jeopardize the security of the facility," and the regulation was reasonably related to these security concerns. Id. at 586–89.

3. Minors

[B82] "A child, merely on account of his minority, is not beyond the protection of the Constitution;"[303] "whatever may be their precise impact, neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Bill of Rights is for adults alone."[304] Nevertheless, the state has "somewhat broader authority to regulate the activities of children than of adults."[305] There are "three reasons justifying the conclusion that the constitutional rights of children cannot be equated with those of adults: the peculiar vulnerability of children; their inability to make critical decisions in an informed, mature manner; and the importance of the parental role in child rearing."[306]

[B83] "The Court's concern for the vulnerability of children is demonstrated in its decisions dealing with minors' claims to constitutional protection against deprivations of liberty or property interests by the State."[307] For example, the Court has held that the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee against the deprivation of liberty without due process of law is applicable to children in juvenile delinquency proceedings.[308] State procedures for involuntarily admitting a child for treatment in a state mental hospital must also satisfy procedural due process.[309] Children have a protected liberty interest in "freedom from institutional restraints," even absent the stigma of being labeled "delinquent," or "mentally ill."[310] Corporal punishment of schoolchildren implicates a constitutionally protected liberty interest.[311] Similarly, children may not be deprived of certain property interests without due process.[312] Nevertheless, "although children generally are protected by the same constitutional guarantees against governmental deprivations as are adults, the State is entitled to adjust its legal system to account for children's vulnerability and their needs for concern, sympathy, and paternal attention."[313] For instance, hearings in juvenile delinquency cases need not necessarily "con-

---

303 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 633 (1979).

304 In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 13 (1967). See also Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 74 (1976) ("Constitutional rights do not mature and come into being magically only when one attains the state-defined age of majority. Minors, as well as adults, are protected by the Constitution, and possess constitutional rights.").

305 Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 74 (1976).

306 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 634 (1979) (plurality opinion of Justice Powell, joined by Burger, C.J., Stewart and Rehnquist, JJ.).

307 Id.

308 In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967). Gault held that a child in delinquency proceedings must be provided various procedural due process protections (notice of charges, right to counsel, right of confrontation and cross-examination, privilege against self-incrimination), when those proceedings may result in the child's institutional confinement. See also In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970) (proof beyond reasonable doubt standard applies to delinquency proceedings); Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519 (1975) (double jeopardy protection applies to delinquency proceedings).

309 Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584 (1979)

310 Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 265 (1984). There the Court upheld a New York statute authorizing pre-trial detention of dangerous juveniles, but only after analyzing the statute at length to ensure that it complied with substantive and procedural due process.

311 Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 673–74 (1977).

312 Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 573–74 (1975) (students facing temporary suspension from a public school).

313 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 635 (1979) (plurality opinion).

form with all of the requirements of a criminal trial or even of the usual administrative hearing."[314] Thus, juveniles are not constitutionally entitled to trial by jury in delinquency adjudications.[315]

[B84] Second, "the Court has held that the States validly may limit the freedom of children to choose for themselves in the making of important, affirmative choices with potentially serious consequences. These rulings have been grounded in the recognition that, during the formative years of childhood and adolescence, minors often lack the experience, perspective, and judgment to recognize and avoid choices that could be detrimental to them."[316] For example, the Court has sustained a criminal conviction for selling sexually oriented magazines to a minor under the age of 17 in violation of a New York state law,[317] finding that the New York Legislature "rationally could conclude that the sale to children of the magazines in question presented a danger against which they should be guarded."[318] "Although the State has considerable latitude in enacting laws affecting minors on the basis of their lesser capacity for mature, affirmative choice, . . . certain cases illustrate that it may not arbitrarily deprive them of their freedom of action altogether."[319] For example, a state may not require a minor seeking an abortion to obtain the consent of a parent or guardian, without providing an adequate judicial bypass procedure.[320] And a schoolchild's First Amendment freedom of expression entitles him, contrary to school policy, to attend school wearing a black armband as a silent protest against American involvement in the hostilities in another country.[321]

[B85] Third, "the guiding role of parents in the upbringing of their children justifies limitations on the freedoms of minors. The State commonly protects its youth from adverse governmental action and from their own immaturity by requiring parental consent to or involvement in important decisions by minors."[322] But an additional and more important justification for state deference to parental control over children is that "the child is not the mere creature of the State; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."[323] This duty must be read "to include the inculcation of moral standards, religious beliefs, and elements of good citizenship."[324] Thus, "it is cardinal that the custody, care and nurture of the child reside first in the parents."[325] "Properly

---

[314] In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 30 (1967).

[315] McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971).

[316] Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 635 (1979) (plurality opinion).

[317] Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 641 (1968).

[318] See Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 636 (1979), discussing Ginsberg.

[319] Id. at 637, n.15.

[320] Ohio v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, 497 U.S. 502, 511–13 (1990) (Akron II).

[321] Tinker v. Des Moines Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969). The Court noted, inter alia, that the conduct at issue did not "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school." Id. at 509.

However, it is an appropriate function of public school education to prohibit the use of vulgar and offensive terms in public discourse. See Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986). And public school authorities may censor school-sponsored publications so long as the censorship is reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns. See Hazlewood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 273 (1988).

[322] Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 637 (1979).

[323] Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 535 (1925).

[324] Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 233 (1972).

[325] Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944).

understood, then, the tradition of parental authority is not inconsistent with the tradition of individual liberty; rather, the former is one of the basic presuppositions of the latter. Legal restrictions on minors, especially those supportive of the parental role, may be important to the child's chances for the full growth and maturity that make eventual participation in a free society meaningful and rewarding."[326] Under the Constitution, the state "can properly conclude that parents and others, teachers for example, who have the primary responsibility for children's well-being are entitled to the support of laws designed to aid discharge of that responsibility."[327] Of course, rights of parenthood are not beyond limitation. "Acting to guard the general interest in youth's wellbeing, the State, as parens patriae, may restrict the parent's control by requiring school attendance, regulating or prohibiting the child's labor, and in many other ways."[328]

4. Public Employees—Military Personnel

[B86] "The restrictions that the Constitution places upon the Government in its capacity as lawmaker, i.e., as the regulator of private conduct, are not the same as the restrictions that it places upon the government in its capacity as employer."[329] "[A] governmental employer may subject its employees to such special restrictions as are reasonably necessary to promote effective government."[330] The Court has recognized this in many contexts. For example, policemen can be prevented from wearing long hair.[331]

---

[326] Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 638–39 (1979).

[327] Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 639 (1968).

[328] Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944). In that case, an adult had permitted a child in her custody to sell religious literature on a public street in violation of a state child labor statute. The child had been permitted to engage in this activity upon her own sincere request. In upholding the adult's conviction under the statute, the Court found that "the interests of society to protect the welfare of children" and to give them "opportunities for growth into free and independent well developed men and citizens" permitted the state to enforce its statute, which concededly would be invalid, if made applicable to adults. Id. at 165–67.

[329] Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62, 94 (1990) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

[330] Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 356, n.13 (1980).

[331] See Kelley v. Johnson, 425 U.S. 238 (1976). The Court reasoned as follows: "The promotion of safety of persons and property is unquestionably at the core of the State's police power, and virtually all state and local governments employ a uniformed police force to aid in the accomplishment of that purpose. Choice of organization, dress, and equipment for law enforcement personnel is entitled to the same sort of presumption of legislative validity as are state choices to promote other aims within the cognizance of the State's police power. . . . Thus, the question is not . . . whether the State can establish a 'genuine public need' for the specific regulation. It is whether respondent can demonstrate that there is no rational connection between the regulation, based as it is on the county's method of organizing its police force, and the promotion of safety of persons and property. . . . The constitutional issue to be decided . . . is whether petitioner's determination that such regulations should be enacted is so irrational that it may be branded 'arbitrary,' and therefore a deprivation of respondent's 'liberty' interest in freedom to choose his own hairstyle. The overwhelming majority of state and local police of the present day are uniformed. This fact itself testifies to the recognition by those who direct those operations, and by the people of the States and localities who directly or indirectly choose such persons, that similarity in appearance of police officers is desirable. This choice may be based on a desire to make police officers readily recognizable to the members of the public, or a desire for the esprit de corps which such similarity is felt to inculcate within the police force itself. Either one is a sufficiently rational justification for regulations so as to defeat respondent's claim based on the liberty guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 247–48.

Private citizens cannot have their property searched without probable cause, but in certain circumstances government employees can.[332] A public employee may be fired if he "speaks not as a citizen upon matters of public concern, but instead as an employee upon matters only of personal interest."[333] Federal and state employees can be dismissed and otherwise punished for partisan political activity.[334] Nevertheless, "a public employee does not relinquish First Amendment rights to comment on matters of public interest by virtue of government employment"[335] and may not be discharged for refusing to support a political party or its candidates, "unless political affiliation is a reasonably appropriate requirement for the job in question."[336]

[B87] "[T]he military is, "by necessity, a specialized society separate from civilian society. . . . While members of the military community enjoy many of the same rights and bear many of the same burdens as do members of the civilian community, within the military community, there is simply not the same autonomy as there is in the larger civilian community."[337] "Military personnel must be ready to perform their duty whenever the occasion arises. To ensure that they always are capable of performing their mission promptly and reliably, the military services 'must insist upon a respect for duty and a discipline without counterpart in civilian life.'"[338] Hence, "the military must possess substantial discretion over its internal discipline,"[339] and "Congress is permitted to legislate both with greater breadth and with greater flexibility when prescribing the rules by which the [military society] shall be governed than it is when prescribing rules for the [civilian society.]"[340] "Judicial deference . . . is at its apogee when legislative action under the congressional authority to raise and support armies and make rules and regulations for their governance is challenged."[341] The Court has adhered to this principle of deference in a variety of contexts where the constitutional rights of servicemen were implicated.[342]

---

[332] O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 723 (1987) (plurality opinion); id. at 732 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment).

[333] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147 (1983).

[334] Pub. Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 101 (1947); United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548, 556 (1973); Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 616–17 (1973).

[335] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 140 (1983), citing Pickering v. Bd. of Educ., 391 U.S. 563 (1968).

[336] See O'Hare Truck Serv., Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 714, (1996), citing Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976) and Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980).

[337] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 743, 751 (1974).

[338] Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 354 (1980), quoting Schlesinger v. Councilman, 420 U.S. 738, 757 (1975).

[339] See Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 357 (1980), citing Schlesinger v. Councilman, 420 U.S. 738 (1975); Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974); Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137 (1953); Orloff v. Willoughby, 345 U.S. 83 (1953); In re Grimley, 137 U.S. 147 (1890).

[340] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 756 (1974). In that case, the Court held that statutory provisions punishing a commissioned officer for "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," and punishing any serviceman for "all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces" were not unconstitutionally vague.

[341] Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 508 (1986).

[342] Id. at 509–10 (uniform dress requirements held not violative of the freedom of religion); Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296, 300–05 (1983) (enlisted military personnel may not maintain suits to recover damages from superior officers for injuries sustained as a result of vio-

J. LIABILITY FOR CONSTITUTIONAL VIOLATIONS

[B88] It is elementary that "[t]he United States, as sovereign, is immune from suit save as it consents to be sued, and the terms of its consent to be sued in any court define that court's jurisdiction to entertain the suit."[343] "[A] waiver of the Federal Government's sovereign immunity must be unequivocally expressed in statutory text,"[344] and "cannot be implied."[345] Further, as a matter of principle, "a waiver of the Government's sovereign immunity will be strictly construed, in terms of its scope, in favor of the sovereign."[346] "To sustain a claim that the Government is liable for awards of monetary damages, the waiver of sovereign immunity must extend unambiguously to such monetary claims."[347]

[B89] The Eleventh Amendment provides: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State." "Although, by its terms, the Amendment applies only to suits against a State by citizens of another State, [the Court's] cases have extended the Amendment's applicability to suits by citizens against their own States."[348] "The ultimate guarantee of the Eleventh Amendment is that non-consenting States may not be sued by private individuals in federal court"[349] or in state court.[350] State sovereign immunity bars suits only in the absence of consent;[351] a state's consent to suit must be "unequivocally expressed."[352] Besides, "sovereign immunity bars suits against States but not against lations of constitutional rights in the course of military service); Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64–66, 70–71 (1981) (selective service registration can constitutionally exclude women); Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 354, 357, 360 (1980) (Air Force regulations requiring members of that service to obtain approval from their commanders before circulating petitions on Air Force bases are facially valid, since "speech that is protected in the civil population may undermine the effectiveness of response to command," and, therefore, can be excluded from a military base).

---

In Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435 (1987), the Court held that the jurisdiction of a court-martial depends solely on the accused's status as a member of the armed forces, and not on the "service-connection" of the offense charged.

343 United States v. Sherwood, 312 U.S. 584, 586 (1941).

344 Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 192 (1996).

345 Irwin v. Dep't of Veterans Affairs, 498 U.S. 89, 95 (1990), quoting United States v. Mitchell, 445 U.S. 535, 538 (1980).

346 Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 192 (1996) (citing cases).

347 Id. at 192, citing United States v. Nordic Vill., Inc. 503 U.S. 30, 34 (1992).

348 Bd. of Trs. of Univ. of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 363 (2001), citing, inter alia, Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 54 (1996), and Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1, 15 (1890).

349 Bd. of Trs. of Univ. of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 363 (2001), citing Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 73 (2000).

350 See Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 730–54 (1999).

351 Generally, a waiver will be found either if the state voluntarily invokes court jurisdiction (see Coll. Sav. Bank v. Florida Prepaid Post-Secondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666, 676 (1999), citing Gunter v. Atl. Coast Line R. Co., 200 U.S. 273, 284 (1906)) or else if the state makes a "clear declaration" that it intends to submit itself to court jurisdiction (see Coll. Savings Bank, supra, at 676, citing Great N. Life Ins. Co. v. Read, 322 U.S. 47, 54 (1944)).

352 Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 99 (1984). "Thus, a State does not consent to suit in federal court merely by consenting to suit in the courts of its own lesser entities," such as municipal corporations, or against a state officer for injunctive or declaratory relief or for money damages, "so long as the relief is sought not from the state treasury but from the officer personally."[353] Moreover, the Court has recognized that "Congress may abrogate the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity when it both unequivocally intends to do so and 'acts pursuant to a valid grant of constitutional authority.'"[354] "Congress may not . . . base its abrogation of the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity upon the powers enumerated in Article I" of the Constitution.[355] Nevertheless, Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment does grant Congress the authority to abrogate the states' sovereign immunity.[356]

[B90] In Bivens, the Court recognized for the first time an implied private action for damages against federal officers alleged to have violated a citizen's constitutional rights. There the Court held that a victim of a Fourth Amendment violation by federal officers may bring suit for money damages against the officers in federal court. Relying largely on earlier decisions implying private damages actions into federal statutes, and finding "no special factors counseling hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress," the Court found an implied damages remedy available under the Fourth Amendment.[357]

[B91] In Davis and Carlson, the Court applied the core holding of Bivens, recognizing in limited circumstances a claim for money damages against federal officers who abuse their constitutional authority. In Davis v. Passman, the Court recognized an implied damages remedy under the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. There the Court "inferred a new right of action chiefly because the plaintiff lacked any other remedy for the alleged constitutional deprivation."[358] Carlson inferred a right of action, under the Eighth Amendment's proscription against creation" (Coll. Sav. Bank v. Florida Prepaid Post-Secondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666, 676 (1999), citing Smith v. Reeves, 178 U.S. 436, 441–45 (1900)). "Nor does it consent to suit in federal court merely by stating its intention to 'sue and be sued'" (see Coll. Sav. Bank v. Florida Prepaid Post-Secondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666, 676 (1999), citing Florida Dep't of Health and Rehabilitative Servs. v. Florida Nursing Home Ass'n, 450 U.S. 147, 149–50 (1981) (per curiam)), "or even by authorizing suits against it 'in any court of competent jurisdiction'" (see Coll. Sav. Bank, supra, at 676, citing Kennecott Copper Corp. v. State Tax Comm'n, 327 U.S. 573, 577–79 (1946)). The Court has "even held that a State may, absent any contractual commitment to the contrary, alter the conditions of its waiver and apply those changes to a pending suit" (see Coll. Sav. Bank, supra, at 676, citing Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How. 527, 529 (1858)).

---

353 Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 755–57 (1999).

354 Bd. of Trs. of Univ. of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 363 (2001), citing Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 73 (2000).

355 Bd. of Trs. of Univ. of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 364 (2001), citing Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 79 (2000) and Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 72–73 (1996).

356 Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 456 (1976).

In Kiowa Tribe of Oklahoma v. Manufacturing Technologies, Inc., 523 U.S. 751, 754 (1998), the Court held that an Indian tribe is not subject to suit in a state court—even for breach of contract involving off-reservation commercial conduct—unless Congress has authorized the suit or the tribe has waived its immunity.

357 Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 395–97 (1971).

358 See Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 67 (2001), discussing Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228, 245 (1979).

cruel and unusual punishment, against individual prison officials where the plaintiff's only alternative was a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) claim against the United States. The Court reasoned that "the threat of suit against the United States was insufficient to deter the unconstitutional acts of individuals . . . [and] also found it 'crystal clear' that Congress intended the FTCA and Bivens to serve as 'parallel' and 'complementary' sources of liability."[359]

[B92] Since Carlson, the Court has consistently refused to extend Bivens liability to any new context or new category of defendants. Bush v. Lucas declined to create a Bivens remedy against individual government officials for a First Amendment violation arising in the context of federal employment. "Although the plaintiff had no opportunity to fully remedy the constitutional violation, [the Court] held that administrative review mechanisms crafted by Congress provided meaningful redress and thereby foreclosed the need to fashion a new, judicially crafted cause of action. [Correlatively, the Court] recognized Congress' institutional competence in crafting appropriate relief for aggrieved federal employees as a 'special factor counseling hesitation in the creation of a new remedy.'"[360]

[B93] The Court has reached a similar result in the military context. Chappell "reversed a determination that no 'special factors' barred a constitutional damages remedy on behalf of minority servicemen who alleged that, because of their race, their superior officers 'failed to assign them desirable duties, threatened them, gave them low performance evaluations, and imposed penalties of unusual severity.' [The Court] found 'factors counseling hesitation' in the 'need for special regulations in relation to military discipline, and the consequent need and justification for a special and exclusive system of military justice.' [It] observed that the Constitution explicitly confers upon Congress the power, inter alia, '[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces' (Art. I, § 8, cl. 14), thus showing that 'the Constitution contemplated that the Legislative Branch have plenary control over rights, duties, and responsibilities in the framework of the Military Establishment.' Congress . . . had exercised that authority to 'establis[h] a comprehensive internal system of justice to regulate military life, taking into account the special patterns that define the military structure.' [The Court] concluded that, '[t]aken together, the unique disciplinary structure of the Military Establishment and Congress' activity in the field constitute 'special factors' which dictate that it would be inappropriate to provide enlisted military personnel a Bivens-type remedy against their superior officers.'"[361]

[B94] In Schweiker, the Court declined to infer a damages action against individual government employees alleged to have violated due process in their handling of Social Security applications. The Court noted that "[t]he absence of statutory relief for a constitutional violation . . . does not by any means necessarily imply that courts should award money damages against the officers responsible for the violation. . . . When the design of a Government program suggests that Congress has provided what it considers ade-

---

[359] See Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 68 (2001), discussing Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 19–21 (1980)

[360] See Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 68 (2001), discussing Bush v. Lucas, 462 U.S. 367, 378, n.14, 380, 386–89 (1983).

[361] See United States v. Stanley, 483 U.S. 669, 679 (1987), analyzing Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296, 300–04 (1983). Stanley disallowed Bivens actions by military personnel "whenever the injury arises out of activity incident to service."

quate remedial mechanisms for constitutional violations that may occur in the course of its administration, we have not created additional Bivens remedies." It therefore rejected the claim that a Bivens remedy should be implied simply for want of any other means for challenging a constitutional deprivation in federal court and concluded that, since the elaborate "continuing disability review" remedial scheme devised by Congress did not include a money damages remedy against officials responsible for unconstitutional conduct leading to the wrongful denial of benefits, such a remedy was unavailable.[362]

[B95] FDIC v. Meyer unanimously declined an invitation to extend Bivens to permit suit against a federal agency, even though the agency—because Congress had waived sovereign immunity—was otherwise amenable to suit. The Court's opinion emphasized that "the purpose of Bivens is to deter the officer," not the agency. The Court "reasoned that if given the choice, plaintiffs would sue a federal agency instead of an individual. To the extent aggrieved parties had less incentive to bring a damages claim against individuals, 'the deterrent effects of the Bivens remedy would be lost.' Accordingly, to allow a Bivens claim against federal agencies 'would mean the evisceration of the Bivens remedy, rather than its extension.' [The Court] noted further that 'special factors' counseled hesitation in light of the 'potentially enormous financial burden' that agency liability would entail."[363]

[B96] "Suits for monetary damages are meant to compensate the victims of wrongful actions and to discourage conduct that may result in liability. Special problems arise, however, when government officials are exposed to liability for damages. To the extent that the threat of liability encourages these officials to carry out their duties in a lawful and appropriate manner, and to pay their victims when they do not, it accomplishes exactly what it should. By its nature, however, the threat of liability can create perverse incentives that operate to inhibit officials in the proper performance of their duties. Because government officials are engaged by definition in governing, their decisions will often have adverse effects on other persons. When officials are threatened with personal liability for acts taken pursuant to their official duties, they may well be induced to act with an excess of caution or otherwise to skew their decisions in ways that result in less than full fidelity to the objective and independent criteria that ought to guide their conduct. In this way, exposing government officials to the same legal hazards faced by other citizens may detract from the rule of law instead of contributing to it. Such considerations have led to the creation of various forms of immunity from suit for certain government officials. Aware of the salutary effects that the threat of liability can have, however, as well as the undeniable tension between official immunities and the ideal of the rule of law, th[e] Court has been cautious in recognizing claims that gov-

---

[362] Schweiker v. Chilicky, 487 U.S. 412, 421–25 (1988)

[363] See Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 69–70 (2001), discussing Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. (FDIC) v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 485–86 (1994). Meyer "made clear that the threat of litigation and liability will adequately deter federal officers for Bivens purposes no matter that they may enjoy qualified immunity, . . . are indemnified by the employing agency or entity, . . . or are acting pursuant to an entity's policy." See Corr. Servs. Corp., supra, at 70, discussing Meyer, supra, at 473–74, 485–86.

In Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61 (2001), the Court held that Bivens' limited holding may not be extended to confer a right of action for damages against private entities acting under color of federal law.

ernment officials should be free of the obligation to answer for their acts in court. Running through th[e] Court's cases, with fair consistency, is a 'functional' approach to immunity questions other than those that have been decided by express constitutional or statutory enactment. Under that approach, th[e] Court examines the nature of the functions with which a particular official or class of officials has been lawfully entrusted, and seeks to evaluate the effect that exposure to particular forms of liability would likely have on the appropriate exercise of those functions. Officials who seek exemption from personal liability have the burden of showing that such an exemption is justified by overriding considerations of public policy, and th[e] Court has recognized a category of 'qualified' immunity that avoids unnecessarily extending the scope of the traditional concept of absolute immunity."[364]

[B97] "For officials whose special functions or constitutional status requires complete protection from suit, [the Court has] recognized the defense of 'absolute immunity.'"[365] The absolute immunity of legislators, in their legislative functions,[366] and of judges, in their judicial functions,[367] is well settled. The Court's decisions also have extended absolute immunity to certain officials of the Executive Branch. These include prosecutors and similar officials,[368] executive officers engaged in adjudicative functions,[369] and the President of the United States.[370]

[B98] "For executive officials in general, however, [the Court's] cases make plain that qualified or good faith immunity represents the norm."[371] In Scheuer, the Court emphasized that "in varying scope, a qualified immunity is available to officers of the executive branch of government, the variation being dependent upon the scope of discretion and responsibilities of the office and all the circumstances as they reasonably appeared at the time of the action on which liability is sought to be based" and held that a governor and his principal subordinates enjoyed only qualified or good faith immunity.[372] Butz extended the approach of Scheuer to high federal officials of the Executive Branch, noting that "federal officials who seek absolute exemption from personal liability for unconstitutional conduct must bear the burden of showing that public policy requires an exemption of that scope."[373] In several instances, moreover, the Court has "concluded that no more than a qualified immunity attaches to administrative employment decisions, even if the same official has absolute immunity when performing other functions."[374]

---

364 Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 223–24 (1988).

365 Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 807 (1982).

366 See, e.g., Eastland v. United States Servicemen's Fund, 421 U.S. 491 (1975). See also para. I85 (legislative immunity created by the Speech or Debate Clause).

367 See, e.g., Stump v. Sparkman, 435 U.S. 349 (1978).

368 Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478, 508–12 (1978).

369 Id. at 513–17.

370 Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982). This immunity is based on the President's "unique position in the constitutional scheme." Id. at 749. "It does not extend indiscriminately to the President's personal aides . . . or to Cabinet level officers." See Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 225 (1988), citing Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) and Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511 (1985), respectively.

371 Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 807 (1982).

372 Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 247–48 (1974).

373 Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478, 506 (1978).

374 See Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21, 29 (1991), citing Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219 (1988)

[B99] Thus, government officials performing discretionary functions generally are granted a qualified immunity and are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate "clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."[375] "A court evaluating a claim of qualified immunity must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Deciding the constitutional question before addressing the qualified immunity question promotes clarity in the legal standards for official conduct, to the benefit of both the officers and the general public."[376] "[I]n effect, the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the 'fair warning' standard to give officials (and, ultimately, governments) the same protection from civil liability and its consequences that individuals have traditionally possessed in the face of vague criminal statutes."[377] For a constitutional right to be clearly established, its "contours . . . must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful; but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent."[378] "In some circumstances, as when an earlier case expressly leaves open whether a general rule applies to the particular type of conduct at issue, a very high degree of prior factual particularity may be necessary. . . . But general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though this conduct has not previously been held unlawful."[379]

K. THE ENFORCEMENT CLAUSE OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

[B100] Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that Congress may "enforce" by "appropriate legislation" the constitutional guarantee that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor deny any person equal protection of the laws. Section 5 "is an affirmative grant of power to Congress."[380] "It is for Congress in the first instance to determine whether and what legislation is needed to secure the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment, and its conclusions are entitled to much deference."[381] Congress' power "to enforce" the Fourteenth Amendment

---

(dismissal of court employee by state judge) (damages action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983); Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) (discharge of Air Force employee, allegedly orchestrated by senior White House aides) (Bivens action); Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979) (dismissal of congressional aide) (Bivens action).

375 Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982) (emphasis added).

376 Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 609 (1999). There the Court also observed that the qualified immunity analysis is identical in suits under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 and Bivens.

377 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 270–71 (1997).

378 Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U. S. 635, 640 (1987).

379 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 271 (1997). "Although earlier cases involving 'fundamentally similar' facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding. The same is true of cases with 'materially similar' facts." See Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002).

380 Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 80 (2000).

381 City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 536 (1997).

"includes the authority both to remedy and to deter violation of rights guaranteed thereunder by prohibiting a somewhat broader swath of conduct, including that which is not itself forbidden by the Amendment's text."[382] "Nevertheless, Congress cannot "decree the substance of the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions on the States. . . . It has been given the power 'to enforce,' not the power to determine what constitutes a constitutional violation."[383] "While the line between measures that remedy or prevent unconstitutional actions and measures that make a substantive change in the governing law is not easy to discern, and Congress must have wide latitude in determining where it lies, the distinction exists and must be observed. There must be a congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end. Lacking such a connection, legislation may become substantive in operation and effect."[384]

---

[382] Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 81 (2000), citing City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 518 (1997), where it was noted that, for example, the Court had "upheld a suspension of literacy tests and similar voting requirements under Congress' parallel power to enforce the provisions of the Fifteenth Amendment, (U.S.Const., Amdt. 15, Sect. 2), as a measure to combat racial discrimination in voting (see S. Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308 (1966)), despite the facial constitutionality of the tests under Lassiter v. Northampton County Bd. of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959). [The Court has] also concluded that other measures protecting voting rights are within Congress' power to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, despite the burdens those measures placed on the States. S. Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra (upholding several provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965); Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641 (1966) (upholding ban on literacy tests that prohibited certain people schooled in Puerto Rico from voting); Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970) (upholding five-year nationwide ban on literacy tests and similar voting requirements for registering to vote); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 161 (1980) (upholding seven-year extension of the Voting Rights Act's requirement that certain jurisdictions pre-clear any change to a 'standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting')."

[383] City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 519 (1997). "Preventive measures prohibiting certain types of laws may be appropriate when there is reason to believe that many of the laws affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional. . . . Remedial legislation under § 5 should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to provide against." Id. at 532.

For instance, in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 11 (1883), the Court held that the public accommodation provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which applied to purely private conduct, were beyond the scope of the Section 5 enforcement power, since Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment has reference to state action exclusively.

[384] City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 519–20 (1997). That case involved the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) of 1993. Congress enacted RFRA in direct response to Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), in which the Court upheld, against a free exercise challenge, a state law of general applicability criminalizing peyote use, as it applied to denying unemployment benefits to Native American Church members who lost their jobs because of such use. RFRA prohibited "government" from "substantially burden[ing]" a person's exercise of religion even if the burden resulted from a rule of general applicability, unless the government could demonstrate the burden was "in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest" and was "the least restrictive means of furthering" that interest. The Court held that RFRA was not appropriate legislation under Section 5. It first noted that the legislative record contained very little evidence of the unconstitutional conduct purportedly targeted by RFRA's substantive provisions. Rather, Congress had uncovered only "anecdotal evidence" that, standing alone, did not reveal a "widespread pattern of religious discrimination" in the country. Second, RFRA was "so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it could not be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior. It appeare[d], instead, to attempt a substantive change in constitutional protections, proscribing state conduct that the Fourteenth Amendment itself did not prohibit. . . . [Its] [s]weeping coverage ensure[d] its intrusion at every level of government, displacing laws and prohibiting official actions of almost every description and regardless of subject matter. [It had] no termination date or termination mechanism. . . . [Moreover,] [r]equiring a State to demonstrate a compelling interest and show that it has adopted the least restrictive means of achieving that interest is the most demanding test known to constitutional law. . . . [Hence, RFRA was] a considerable congressional intrusion into the States' traditional prerogatives and general authority to regulate for the health and welfare of their citizens, [and was] not designed to identify and counteract state laws likely to be unconstitutional because of their treatment of religion." Id. at 531–35.

CHAPTER 3

PROCEDURAL RIGHTS

A. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS

1. Introduction—Substantive v. Procedural Due Process

[C1] Under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, the federal government and the states may not "deprive any person of life, liberty, property without due process of law." "[T]he touchstone of due process is protection of the individual against arbitrary action of government, . . . whether the fault lies in a denial of fundamental procedural fairness, . . . or in the exercise of power without any reasonable justification in the service of a legitimate governmental objective."[1] Hence, the clauses protect individuals against two types of government action. So-called "substantive due process" protects individual liberty against "certain government actions regardless of the fairness of the procedures used to implement them."[2] "When government action depriving a person of life, liberty, or property survives substantive due process scrutiny, it must still be implemented in a fair manner."[3] This requirement has traditionally been referred to as "procedural" due process, which is "meant to protect persons not from the deprivation, but from the mistaken or unjustified deprivation of life, liberty, or property."[4]

[C2] "Vague laws in any area suffer a constitutional infirmity."[5] "[O]ne of the basic purposes of the Due Process Clauses has always been to protect a person against having the Government impose burdens upon him except in accordance with the valid laws

---

1 County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 845–46 (1998).

2 Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327, 331 (1986). The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. incorporates and makes applicable to the states many of the specific protections defined in the Bill of Rights, such as the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures, or the First Amendment's protection of freedom of speech.

With respect to substantive due process, see, in extenso, paras. B72 et seq.

3 United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987).

4 Carey v. Piphus, 435 U.S. 247, 259 (1978). In that case, the Court explained that a deprivation of procedural due process is actionable under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 without regard to whether the same deprivation would have taken place even in the presence of proper procedural safeguards. Id. at 266 (even if the deprivation was, in fact, justified, so the plaintiffs did not suffer any "other actual injury" caused by the lack of due process, "the fact remains that they were deprived of their right to procedural due process"). The Court went on to say, however, that, in cases where the deprivation would have occurred anyway, and the lack of due process did not itself cause any injury (such as emotional distress), the plaintiff may recover only nominal damages. Id. at 264, 266.

5 Ashton v. Kentucky, 384 U.S. 195, 200 (1966)

of the land. Implicit in this constitutional safeguard is the premise that the law must be one that carries an understandable meaning with legal standards that courts must enforce."[6]

2. General Principles

a. Deprivation of Protected "Liberty" or "Property" Interests[7]

[C3] It is well settled that the requirements of procedural due process apply only to the deprivation of interests encompassed by the Fifth or the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of liberty and property. In determining whether such liberty or property interests are implicated by a particular government action, courts "must look not to the weight, but to the nature, of the interest at stake."[8] The Court has rejected the notion that "any grievous loss visited upon a person by the State is sufficient to invoke the procedural protections of the Due Process Clause."[9] Consequently, "as long as a property deprivation is not de minimis, its gravity is irrelevant to the question whether account must be taken of the Due Process Clause."[10] Furthermore, as a matter of principle, the due process provisions of the Constitution do not apply to the indirect adverse effects of governmental action.[11]

---

[6] Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 403 (1966). At issue in that case was a statute that left to the discretion of the jury whether to assess costs against an acquitted criminal defendant. The statute did not set out any standards to guide the jury's determination. The Court did not hesitate in striking down the statute on vagueness grounds. It reasoned that the utter lack of standards subjected acquitted defendants to "arbitrary and discriminatory impositions of costs." Id. at 402. See, in extenso, paras. E59 et seq. ("void for vagueness" doctrine).

[7] The Court has not resolved the questions of when "life" begins or ends. However, in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 159 (1973), the Court held that an abortion is not "the termination of life entitled to Fourteenth Amendment protection."

[8] Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 571 (1972) (emphasis added).

[9] See Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 224 (1976).

[10] Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 576 (1975). There the Court held that a ten-day suspension from school is not de minimis.

[11] O'Bannon v. Town Court Nursing Ctr., 447 U.S. 773, 787–89 (1980). In that case, the Court, after making "the simple distinction between government action that directly affects a citizen's legal rights, or imposes a direct restraint on his liberty, and action that is directed against a third party and affects the citizen only indirectly or incidentally," concluded that "the fact that the decertification of a [qualified skilled nursing] home may lead to severe hardship for some of its elderly residents does not turn the decertification into a governmental decision to impose that harm" and "did not directly affect the patients' legal rights or deprive them of any constitutionally protected interest in life, liberty, or property." At the same time the Court noted:

> We, of course, need not and do not hold that a person may never have a right to a hearing before his interests may be indirectly affected by government action. Conceivably, for example, if the Government were acting against one person for the purpose of punishing or restraining another, the indirectly affected individual might have a constitutional right to some sort of hearing. But in this case, the Government is enforcing its regulations against the home for the benefit of the patients as a whole, and the home itself has a strong financial incentive to contest its enforcement decision; under these circumstances, the parties suffering an indirect adverse effect clearly have no constitutional right to participate in the enforcement proceedings.

[C4] "Liberty" and "property" are among "the great constitutional concepts purposely left to gather meaning from experience [and] relate to the whole domain of social and economic fact."[12] Nevertheless, "[t]he types of interests that constitute 'liberty' and 'property' for Fourteenth Amendment purposes are not unlimited; the interest must rise to more than an 'abstract need or desire,' . . . and must be based on more than a 'unilateral hope.' . . . Rather, an individual claiming a protected interest must have a legitimate claim of entitlement to it."[13] "[A] benefit is not a protected entitlement if government officials may grant or deny it in their discretion."[14]

[C5] Protected liberty interests may arise from two sources—the Due Process Clauses themselves and the laws of the states.[15] While the Court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty guaranteed by these clauses, "the term has received much consideration and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt, it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized . . . as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."[16] "In a Constitution for a free people, there can be no doubt that the meaning of 'liberty' must be broad indeed."[17] It also embodies, for example, the freedom from bodily punishment[18] and a person's interest in being free from the arbitrary administration of anti-psychotic drugs.[19] Moreover, state statutes may create liberty interests that are entitled to the procedural protections of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. For instance, although there is no constitutional right to parole, once a state grants a prisoner the conditional liberty

---

Id. at 789, n.22.

See also Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748 (2005) (no property interest, for due process purposes, in police enforcement of a restraining order, considering, inter alia, that "the alleged property interest here arises incidentally, not out of some new species of government benefit or service, but out of a function that government actors have always performed—to wit, arresting people who they have probable cause to believe have committed a criminal offense").

[12] Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 571 (1972). For that reason, the Court has rejected the wooden distinction between "rights" and "privileges" that once seemed to govern the applicability of procedural due process rights. In a leading case decided many years ago, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that procedural due process protections did not apply to government employment because it was merely a privilege, and not a right. Bailey v. Richardson, 86 U.S. App. D.C. 248, 182 F.2d 46 (D.C. Cir. 1950), aff'd by an equally divided Court, 341 U.S. 918 (1951). The basis of this holding was thoroughly undermined in the ensuing years. For example, the Court found constitutional restraints applicable to disqualification for unemployment compensation (see Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)); denial of a tax exemption (see Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958)); and termination of welfare benefits (see Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)).

[13] Kentucky Dep't of Corr. v. Thompson, 490 U.S. 454, 460 (1989) (emphasis added).

[14] See Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748 (2005), citing Kentucky Dep't of Corr. v. Thompson, 490 U.S. 454, 462–63 (1989).

[15] Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 466 (1983).

[16] Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 572 (1972), quoting Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923). See also supra, paras. B72 et seq. ("substantive" due process).

[17] Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 572 (1972).

[18] Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 673–74 (1977) (students subjected to disciplinary corporal punishment).

[19] Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22 (1990).

properly dependent on the observance of special parole restrictions, due process protections attach to the decision to revoke parole.[20]

[C6] Likewise, the Court has made clear that "the property interests protected by procedural due process extend well beyond actual ownership of real estate, chattels, or money."[21] In Roth, the Court stated:

> To have a property interest in a benefit, a person clearly must have more than an abstract need or desire for it. He must have more than a unilateral expectation of it. He must, instead, have a legitimate claim of entitlement to it. It is a purpose of the ancient institution of property to protect those claims upon which people rely in their daily lives, reliance that must not be arbitrarily undermined. . . . Property interests . . . are not created by the Constitution. Rather, they are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law—rules or understandings that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlement to those benefits.[22] [20] See Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 488 (1980), citing Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972).

---

Yet, a person is not deprived of "liberty" when he simply is not rehired in one job but remains as free as before to seek another. See Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 575 (1972).

This same conclusion applies to the discharge of a public employee whose position is terminable at the will of the employer, when there is no public disclosure of the reasons for the discharge, which might impair the employee's interest in his good name. See Bishop v. Wood, 426 U.S. 341, 348 (1976).

In Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484 (1995), the Court rejected the proposition that that any state action taken for a punitive reason encroaches upon a liberty interest under the Due Process Clause, even in the absence of any state regulation.

[21] Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 571–72 (1972).

[22] Id. at 577.

The Court has rejected the position that a property right is defined by, and conditioned on, the legislature's choice of procedures for its deprivation. As noted in Cleveland Board of Educcation v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 540 (1985), this view "has its genesis in the plurality opinion in Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974). Arnett involved a challenge by a former federal employee to the procedures by which he was dismissed. The plurality reasoned that, where the legislation conferring the substantive right also sets out the procedural mechanism for enforcing that right, the two cannot be separated: 'The employee's statutorily defined right is not a guarantee against removal without cause in the abstract, but such a guarantee as enforced by the procedures which Congress has designated for the determination of cause. . . . [W]here the grant of a substantive right is inextricably intertwined with the limitations on the procedures which are to be employed in determining that right, a litigant in the position of appellee must take the bitter with the sweet.' Id. at 152–54. This view garnered three votes in Arnett, but was specifically rejected by the other six Justices."

Later cases clearly rejected the above theory. In Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 491 (1980), the Court pointed out that "minimum [procedural] requirements [are] a matter of federal law, they are not diminished by the fact that the State may have specified its own procedures that it may deem adequate for determining the pre-conditions to adverse official action." This conclusion was reiterated in Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 432 (1982), where the Court reversed the lower court's holding that, because the entitlement arose from a state statute, the legislature had the prerogative to define the procedures to be followed to protect that entitlement. Finally, in Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 541 (1985), the Court stressed that "The hallmark of property, the Court has emphasized, is an individual entitlement grounded in state law, which cannot be removed except 'for cause.'"[23] Once that characteristic is found, the types of interests protected as "property" are varied and, as often as not, intangible, relating to the whole domain of social and economic fact.[24]

b. Procedural Requirements

i. Introduction—The Mathews Balancing Test

[C7] It is well established that due process, unlike some legal rules, "is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances."[25] "[D]ue process is flexible, and calls for such procedural protections as the particular > the "bitter with the sweet" approach misconceives the constitutional guarantee. . . . The point is straightforward: the Due Process Clause provides that certain substantive rights—life, liberty, and property—cannot be deprived except pursuant to constitutionally adequate procedures. The categories of substance and procedure are distinct. Were the rule otherwise, the Clause would be reduced to a mere tautology. "Property" cannot be defined by the procedures provided for its deprivation any more than can life or liberty.

---

[23] Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 430 (1982), citing Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1978); Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 573–74 (1975); Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 576–78 (1972). For example, the Roth Court found that a teacher had no property interest in a renewal of his one-year contract despite the fact that most teachers hired on a year-to-year basis by the university were rehired. Id. at 578, n.16. The Court concluded that the teacher had no legitimate entitlement to continued employment, because the discretion of the university officials to renew or not renew such a contract was subject to no "cause" limitations.

In Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972), a teacher who had held his position for a number of years but was not tenured under contract alleged that he had de facto tenure under contract law due to the existence of rules or understandings with the college which employed him. Id. at 602. The Court stated that proof of these allegations would establish the teacher's legitimate claim of entitlement to continued employment absent sufficient cause for discharge. In these circumstances, the teacher would have a property interest safeguarded by due process. Id. at 603.

[24] See, e.g., Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535 (1971) (driver's license); Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55 (1979) (horse trainer's license); Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1 (1978) (utility service); Ohio Bell Tel. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of Ohio, 301 U.S. 292 (1937) (ordered refund of previously collected rate charges); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970) (welfare benefits); Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976) (disability benefits); Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565 (1975) (high school education); Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306 (1950) (cause of action); Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 428 (1982) (cause of action and right to use adjudicatory procedures established by a state's Fair Employment Practices Act); Connell v. Higginbotham, 403 U.S. 207 (1971) (government employment); Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., 481 U.S. 252, 263 (1987) (employer's interest in controlling the makeup of its workforce).

For example, the welfare recipients in Goldberg v. Kelly, supra, had a claim of entitlement to welfare payments that was grounded in the statute defining eligibility for them. The recipients had not yet shown that they were, in fact, within the statutory terms of eligibility. But the Court held that they had a right to a hearing at which they might attempt to do so.

[25] Cafeteria & Rest. Workers v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961).

situation demands."[26] Mathews v. Eldridge announced that identification of the specific dictates of due process generally requires consideration of three distinct factors:

> first, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and, finally, the Government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail.[27]

ii. Notice

[C8] "The fundamental requisite of due process of law is the opportunity to be heard. . . . This right to be heard has little reality or worth unless one is informed that the matter is pending and can choose for himself whether to appear or default, acquiesce or contest. . . . [Hence,] [a]n elementary and fundamental requirement of due process in any adjudicative proceeding which is to be accorded finality is notice reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections. . . . The notice must be of such nature as reasonably to convey the required information, . . . and it must afford a reasonable time for those interested to make their appearance. . . . But if, with due regard for the practicalities and peculiarities of the case, these conditions are reasonably met, the constitutional requirements are satisfied. The criterion is not the possibility of conceivable injury, but the just and reasonable character of the requirements, having reference to the subject with which the statute deals."[28]

---

[26] Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 481 (1972).

[27] Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976). As to the second part of the inquiry, the Court noted that procedural due process rules are "shaped by the risk of error inherent in the truthfinding process as applied to the generality of cases, not the rare exceptions." Id. at 344.

The Court has not viewed Mathews as announcing an all-embracing test for deciding due process claims. For example, when confronted with questions regarding the adequacy of the method used to give notice, the Court has regularly turned to Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314 (1950) (notice must be "reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections"). See Dusenbery v. United States, 534 U.S. 161, 168 (2002) (collecting cases).

The four-factor balancing test of Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972) (see para. C167), developed to determine when government delay has abridged the right to a speedy trial, provides the relevant framework for determining whether the government's delay in filing a forfeiture action is reasonable. See United States v. $8,850, 461 U.S. 555, 562–65 (1983).

[28] Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314–15 (1950).

The right to a hearing embraces a "reasonable opportunity to know the claims of the opposing party and to meet them. The right to submit argument implies that opportunity; otherwise the right may be but a barren one. Those who are brought into contest with the Government in a quasi-judicial proceeding aimed at the control of their activities are entitled to be fairly advised of what the Government proposes and to be heard upon its proposals before it issues its final command." See Morgan v. United States, 304 U.S. 1, 18–19 (1938) (emphasis added).

Section 6(j) of the Selective Service Act of 1948 provided that "[t]he Department of Justice, after appropriate inquiry, shall hold a hearing with respect to the character and good faith" of the claimed conscientious objections of any person claiming exemption from combatant training and service because of such objections. In United States v. Nugent, 346 U.S. 1, 6 (1953), the Court held that "the Department of Justice satisfies its duties under § 6(j) when it accords a fair opportunity to the registrant to speak his piece before an impartial hearing officer; when it permits him to produce all relevant evidence in his own behalf and at the same time supplies him with a fair resume of any adverse evidence in the investigator's report." (Emphasis added.)

[C9] In Mullane, the Court considered the constitutional sufficiency of notice given to the beneficiaries of a common trust fund of a judicial settlement of accounts by the trustee of the fund. The Court held that the notice by publication authorized by the relevant New York statute was not sufficient, since it was not reasonably calculated to

---

Similarly, in Gonzales v. United States, 348 U.S. 407, 415 (1955), where petitioner had been denied conscientious objector exemption, the Court noted: "Just as the right to a hearing means the right to a meaningful hearing, so the right to file a statement before the Appeal Board includes the right to file a meaningful statement, one based on all the facts in the file and made with awareness of the recommendations and arguments to be countered." (Emphasis added.)

In Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., 481 U.S. 252, 264, 269 (1987), a case that involved a statute forbidding the discharge of employees in the commercial motor transportation industry in retaliation for refusing to operate motor vehicles that did not comply with applicable safety standards or for filing complaints alleging such non-compliance, five members of the Court found that minimum due process for the employer in this context required, inter alia, notice of the employee's allegations, and notice of the substance of the relevant supporting evidence.

The due process standards of Mullane apply to an "adjudication" that is to be accorded finality. They do not apply in the context of a purely investigatory, fact finding agency, which does not "adjudicate" or "issue orders." See Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420 (1960). The appellants in that case were persons subpoenaed to appear before the Civil Rights Commission in connection with complaints about deprivations of voting rights. The Court held that persons whose conduct was under investigation by the Commission were not entitled, by virtue of the Due Process Clause, to know the specific charges that were being investigated, as well as the identity of the complainants, and did not have the right to cross-examine those complainants and other witnesses. In so concluding, the Court noted, inter alia, that "the investigative process could be completely disrupted if investigative hearings were transformed into trial-like proceedings, and if persons who might be indirectly affected by an investigation were given an absolute right to cross-examine every witness called to testify. Factfinding agencies without any power to adjudicate would be diverted from their legitimate duties and would be plagued by the injection of collateral issues that would make the investigation interminable." Id. at 443.

The Court also has made the basic distinction between rulemaking and adjudication. "The Constitution does not grant to members of the public generally a right to be heard by public bodies making decisions of policy." Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 283 (1984). In Bi-Metallic Investment Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 239 U.S. 441, 445 (1915), the Court stated: "Where a rule of conduct applies to more than a few people, it is impracticable that everyone should have a direct voice in its adoption. The Constitution does not require all public acts to be done in town meeting or an assembly of the whole. General statutes within the state power are passed that affect the person or property of individuals, sometimes to the point of ruin, without giving them a chance to be heard. Their rights are protected in the only way that they can be in a complex society, by their power, immediate or remote, over those who make the rule."

In Londoner v. Denver, 210 U.S. 373 (1908), the Court held that due process had not been accorded a landowner who objected to the amount assessed against his land as its share of the benefit resulting from the paving of a street. Local procedure had accorded him the right to file a written complaint and objection but not to be heard orally. The Court held that "where the legislature of a state, instead of fixing the tax itself, commits to some subordinate body the duty of determining whether, in what amount, and upon whom it shall be levied, and of makapprise the beneficiaries of the pendency of the judicial proceeding. The notice was deficient "not because, in fact, it fail[ed] to reach everyone, but because, under the circumstances, it [wa]s not reasonably calculated to reach those who could easily be informed by other means at hand." Personal service of written notice, the Mullane Court acknowledged, is "the classic form of notice always adequate in any type of proceeding its assessment and apportionment, due process of law requires that at some stage of the proceedings, before the tax becomes irrevocably fixed, the taxpayer shall have an opportunity to be heard, of which he must have notice, either personal, by publication, or by a law fixing the time and place of the hearing." Id. at 385. In Bi-Metallic, supra, at 446, the Court distinguished Londoner by stating that there, a small number of persons "were exceptionally affected, in each case upon individual grounds."

---

Statutory notice. The Court has stressed that "all citizens are presumptively charged with knowledge of the law." See, e.g., Atkins v. Parker, 472 U.S. 115, 130 (1985), citing N. Laramie Land Co. v. Hoffman, 268 U.S. 276, 283 (1925). It is well settled that "laws must give the person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly," but it has "never been suggested that each citizen must in some way be given specific notice of the impact of a new statute on his property before that law may affect his property rights. . . . Generally, a legislature need do nothing more than enact and publish the law, and afford the citizenry a reasonable opportunity to familiarize itself with its terms and to comply. [In this context,] the Court shows the greatest deference to the judgment of state legislatures. A legislative body is in a far better position than a court to form a correct judgment concerning the number of persons affected by a change in the law, the means by which information concerning the law is disseminated in the community, and the likelihood that innocent persons may be harmed by the failure to receive adequate notice." See Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 532, 535–36 (1982) (emphasis added). There, the Court upheld a state statute pursuant to which a severed mineral interest that had not been used for a period of 20 years automatically lapsed and reverted to the current surface owner of the property, unless the mineral owner filed a statement of claim in the county recorder's office within two years of the statute's passage. In so doing, the Court noted, inter alia that (1) the two-year grace period foreclosed any argument that the statute was invalid, because mineral owners might not have had an opportunity to become familiar with its terms; (2) the reasoning in Mullane was applicable to a judicial proceeding brought to determine whether a lapse of a mineral estate had or had not occurred but not to the self-executing feature of the statute.

As a matter of principle, "notice of remedies and procedures is [not] required." City of West Covina v. Perkins, 525 U.S. 234, 242 (1999) (emphasis added). "[W]hen law enforcement agents seize property pursuant to warrant, due process requires them to take reasonable steps to give notice that the property has been taken so the owner can ascertain who was responsible for his loss, and pursue available remedies for the return of its property. No similar rationale justifies requiring individualized notice of state law remedies which are established by published, generally available state statutes and case law. Once the property owner is informed that his property has been seized, he can turn to these public sources to learn about the remedial procedures available to him." Hence, the Constitution does not require a state or its local entities to give detailed and specific instructions or advice to owners who seek return of property lawfully seized but no longer needed for police investigation or criminal prosecution. Id. at 240–242.

Nevertheless, "notice of the procedures for protecting one's property interests may be required when those procedures are arcane and are not set forth in documents accessible to the public." City of W. Covina v. Perkins, 525 U.S. 234, 242 (1999). In Memphis Light, Gas & Water Division v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1 (1978), the Court held that "a public utility must make available to its customers the opportunity to discuss a billing dispute with a utility employee who has authority to resolve the matter before terminating utility service for nonpayment. The Court also held that due process required the utility to inform the customer not only of the planned termination, but also of the availability and general contours of the internal administrative pro-ing."[29] But that classic form, the Court next developed, "has not in all circumstances been regarded as indispensable to the process due residents, and it has more often been held unnecessary as to nonresidents." The statutory notice by publication was sufficient as to any beneficiaries whose interests or addresses were unknown to the trustee, since there were no other means of giving them notice that would be both practicable and more effective. But as to known beneficiaries of known places of residence, notice by publication would not do. Personal service on the large number of known resident or non-resident beneficiaries, however, would "seriously interfere with the proper administration of the fund" (delay as well as expense rendered such service impractical). For that group, the Court indicated, ordinary mail to the record addresses, which might be sent with periodic income remittances, was the minimal due process requirement.[30] In a series of cases following Mullane, the Court similarly condemned notice by publication or posting as not reasonably calculated to inform persons with known interests in a proceeding.[31] In these cases, the Court identified mail service as a satisfactory supplement to statutory provisions for publication or posting.[32] cedure for resolving the accounting dispute. In requiring notice of the administrative procedures, the Court relied not on any general principle that the government must provide notice of the procedures for protecting one's property interests but on the fact that the administrative procedures at issue were not described in any publicly available document." See City of W. Covina v. Perkins, 525 U.S. 234, 241–42 (1999), discussing Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 13–15 (1978).

---

[29] Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 313 (1950). In Covey v. Town of Somers, 351 U.S. 141, 146–47 (1956), the Court held that, in the context of a foreclosure action by the town, notice to a person known by the town to be an incompetent, who was without the protection of a guardian, was inadequate.

[30] Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 313–19 (1950). The risk that notice would not reach even all known beneficiaries, the Court reasoned, was justifiable, for the common trust "presupposes a large number of small interests. The individual interest does not stand alone but is identical with that of a class. The rights of each in the integrity of the fund and the fidelity of the trustee are shared by many other beneficiaries. Therefore notice reasonably certain to reach most of those interested in objecting is likely to safeguard the interests of all, since any objection sustained would inure to the benefit of all." Id. at 319.

[31] See Dusenbery v. United States, 534 U.S. 161, 177 (2002) (dissenting opinion of Justice Ginsburg), citing Tulsa Prof'l Collection Servs., Inc. v. Pope, 485 U.S. 478 (1988) (notice by publication inadequate as to estate creditors whose identities were known or ascertainable by reasonably diligent efforts); Mennonite Bd. of Missions v. Adams, 462 U.S. 791 (1983) (notice by publication and posting inadequate to inform real property mortgagee of a proceeding to sell the mortgaged property for non-payment of taxes); Greene v. Lindsey, 456 U.S. 444 (1982) (posting summons on door of a tenant's apartment provided inadequate notice of eviction proceedings, given that "notices posted on apartment doors in the area where these tenants lived were not infrequently removed by children or other tenants before they could have their intended effect"); Schroeder v. City of New York, 371 U.S. 208 (1962) (publication plus signs posted on trees inadequate to notify property owners of condemnation proceedings).

[32] See Dusenbery v. United States, 534 U.S. 161, 177 (2002) (dissenting opinion of Justice Ginsburg). In Dusenbery, a five-member majority held that, when the government seeks to provide notice to a federal inmate of its intention to forfeit property in which the inmate appears to have an interest, it may send such notice by certified mail addressed to the prisoner. In so doing, the Court rejected the argument that the Due Process Clause required actual receipt of the notice in such a case.

iii. Hearing [33]

[C10] The fundamental requirement of due process is "the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner."[34] The Court has acknowledged that "the timing and nature of the required hearing 'will depend on appropriate accommodation of the competing interests involved.' . . . These include the importance of the private interest and the length [and] finality of the deprivation; . . . the likelihood of governmental error; . . . and the magnitude of the governmental interests involved."[35]

[C11] Balancing the competing interests involved, the Court usually has held that the Constitution requires some kind of a hearing before the government deprives a person of liberty or property;[36] "[t]he demands of due process do not require a hearing at the initial stage or at any particular point or at more than one point in an administrative proceeding so long as the requisite hearing is held before the final order becomes effective."[37] Nevertheless, the Court has rejected the proposition that due process always requires the government to provide a hearing prior to the initial deprivation of protected interests. "[T]he necessity of quick action by the State or the impracticality of

---

[33] See also para. C8 (notice).

[34] See, e.g., Armstrong v. Manzo, 380 U.S. 545, 552 (1965); City of Los Angeles v. David, 538 U.S. 715 (2003).

Due process does not entitle a person to a hearing to establish a fact that is not material under the relevant statutes. See Connecticut Dep't of Pub. Safety v. Doe, 538 U.S. 1, 7 (2003).

[35] Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 434 (1982).

"[T]he right of oral argument as a matter of procedural due process varies from case to case in accordance with differing circumstances, as do other procedural regulations." See Fed. Communications Comm'n v. WJR, 337 U.S. 265, 276 (1949) (emphasis added).

In Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970), a case that concerned termination of welfare benefits, the Court said: "The opportunity to be heard must be tailored to the capacities and circumstances of those who are to be heard. It is not enough that a welfare recipient may present his position to the decision maker in writing or second-hand through his caseworker. Written submissions are an unrealistic option for most recipients, who lack the educational attainment necessary to write effectively and who cannot obtain professional assistance. Moreover, written submissions do not afford the flexibility of oral presentations; they do not permit the recipient to mold his argument to the issues the decision maker appears to regard as important. Particularly where credibility and veracity are at issue, as they must be in many termination proceedings, written submissions are a wholly unsatisfactory basis for decision. The second-hand presentation to the decision maker by the caseworker has its own deficiencies; since the caseworker usually gathers the facts upon which the charge of ineligibility rests, the presentation of the recipient's side of the controversy cannot safely be left to him. Therefore, a recipient must be allowed to state his position orally." Id. at 268–69.

[36] See, e.g., Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 542 (1985) (hearing required before termination of employment); Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584, 606–07 (1979) (determination by neutral physician whether statutory admission standard is met required before confinement of child in mental hospital); Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 18 (1978) (hearing required before cutting off utility service); Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 579 (1975) (informal hearing required before suspension of students from public school); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 557–58 (1974) (hearing required before forfeiture of prisoner's good-time credits); Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67, 80–84 (1972) (hearing required before issuance of writ allowing repossession of property); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 264 (1970) (hearing required before termination of welfare benefits).

[37] Opp Cotton Mills v. Adm'r, 312 U.S. 126, 152–53 (1941).

providing any . . . predeprivation process," may mean that a post-deprivation remedy is constitutionally adequate.[38] "[D]eprivation of property to protect the public health and safety is one of the oldest examples of permissible summary action."[39] Moreover, "where the potential length or severity of the deprivation does not indicate a likelihood of serious loss and where the procedures . . . are sufficiently reliable to minimize the risk of erroneous determination," a prior hearing may not be required.[40] The Court, thus, has recognized on many occasions that a statutory provision for a post-deprivation administrative hearing, or the existence of a judicial remedy for erroneous deprivation, satisfies due process.[41]

---

[38] Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 436 (1982), quoting Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527, 539 (1981). See also Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Mallen, 486 U.S. 230, 240 (1988) ("[a]n important government interest, accompanied by a substantial assurance that the deprivation is not baseless or unwarranted, may in limited cases demanding prompt action justify postponing the opportunity to be heard until after the initial deprivation").

[39] See Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 300 (1981). See, e.g., North Am. Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U.S. 306 (1908) (upholding the right of a state to seize and destroy unwholesome food without a pre-seizure hearing); Ewing v. Mytinger & Casselberry, Inc., 339 U.S. 594 (1950) (upholding the summary seizure and destruction of misbranded drugs without a pre-seizure hearing).

[40] Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113, 128 (1990), quoting Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 19 (1978) and citing Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 682 (1977) (hearing not required before corporal punishment of junior high school students).

[41] See, e.g., Fahey v. Mallonee, 332 U.S. 245 (1947) (immediate seizure of property without a prior hearing when substantial questions are raised about the competence of a bank's management); Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 679 (1974) (the government may seize a yacht subject to civil forfeiture without affording prior notice or hearing, for a yacht is the "sort [of property] that could be removed to another jurisdiction, destroyed, or concealed, if advance warning of confiscation were given"); Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Co., 416 U.S. 600, 619–20 (1971) (hearing not required before issuance of writ to sequester debtor's property); Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55, 64–66 (1979) (upholding a 15-day suspension, pending a prompt judicial or administrative hearing, of a horse trainer's racing license, upon a probable cause showing that his horse was drugged before a race); Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981) (in case of revocation of a passport on the ground that the holder's activities in foreign countries are causing or are likely to cause serious damage to the national security or foreign policy of the United States, due process calls for no more than a statement of reasons and an opportunity for a prompt post-revocation hearing); Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 692 (2001) ("under certain circumstances, the constitutional requirement of due process is a requirement of judicial process"); Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503 (1944) (rent control orders, during wartime, without providing a hearing to landlords before the order or regulation fixing rents became effective; judicial review of the orders satisfied due process); Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984) (there the Court held that, in case of intentional destruction of an inmate's property, the state's post-deprivation tort remedies provided the prisoner with all the process that was due him, noting that "when deprivations of property are effected through random and unauthorized conduct of a state employee, predeprivation procedures are simply impracticable, since the state cannot know when such deprivations will occur"). But see also Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422 (1982) (in case a state terminates a complainant's cause of action, under its Fair Employment Practices Act, because a state official, for reasons beyond the complainant's control, failed to comply with a statutorily mandated procedure, the availability of a post-termination tort action does not provide due process; in such a case, the complainant is entitled to have the state Fair Employment Practices Commission consider the merits of his charge).

[C12] The Due Process Clause does not mandate that all governmental decision-making comply with standards that assure perfect, error-free determinations. Thus, even though legal tradition regards the adversary process as the best means of ascertaining truth and minimizing the risk of error, the principle established by the Court's decisions is that "something less than an evidentiary hearing is sufficient prior to adverse administrative action. . . . And, when prompt post-deprivation review is available for correction of administrative error, [the Court has] generally required no more than that the pre-deprivation procedures used be designed to provide a reasonably reliable basis for concluding that the facts underlying the official action are as a responsible governmental official warrants them to be,"[42] and justify the proposed action. Nevertheless, depending on the circumstances, and the interests at stake, a pre-deprivation hearing closely approximating a judicial trial may be constitutionally required.[43]

iv. Right to (Retained or Appointed) Counsel[44]

[C13] "The right to be heard would be, in many cases, of little avail if it did not comprehend the right to be heard by counsel."[45] For example, at a hearing regarding termination of welfare benefits, the recipient must be allowed to retain an attorney, who "can help delineate the issues, present the factual contentions in an orderly manner, conduct cross-examination, and generally safeguard the interests of the recipient."[46] By contrast, prison inmates do not have a right to either retained or appointed counsel in disciplinary hearings, mainly because the insertion of counsel into the prison discipli-

---

Since the Due Process Clause requires provision of a hearing "at a meaningful time," at some point, a delay in the post-termination hearing may become a constitutional violation. See, in particular, Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55, 66 (1979).

42 Mackey v. Montrym, 443 U.S. 1, 13 (1979).

43 Compare, e.g., Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 266–71 (1970) (suspension of welfare benefits invalid if not preceded by an evidentiary hearing giving the recipient an opportunity to confront witnesses and present evidence and argument orally) with Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 343–44 (1976) (an evidentiary hearing is not required prior to the termination of disability benefits, the determination of disability, based largely on written medical assessments, is more sharply focused and easily documented than the typical determination of welfare entitlement).

Confrontation and cross-examination: In Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 269 (1970), the Court noted that "[i]n almost every setting where important decisions turn on questions of fact, due process requires an opportunity to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses." However, such a requirement may not be appropriate in certain situations. See, e.g., Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 567–69 (1974) (an inmate has no constitutional right to confrontation and cross-examination in prison disciplinary proceedings, in view of the interest of the state in avoiding prison disruption).

Statement of evidence and reasoning relied on: The Court has held that, in certain contexts, due process requires a written statement by the fact finders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for their decision. See, e.g., Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 489 (1972) (parole revocation); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 271 (1970) (termination of public assistance payments). See also para. C8, n.28. The decision should rest "solely on the legal rules and evidence adduced at the hearing." Goldberg v. Kelly, supra, at 271.

44 See also paras. C64, C65, C68 (indigents' right to appellate counsel); paras. C79, C87 (right to counsel during custodial interrogation); paras. C92 et seq. (Sixth Amendment right to counsel).

45 Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 669 (1932).

46 Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 270–71 (1970). The Court added that it did not anticipate that this assistance would unduly prolong or otherwise encumber the hearing.

nary process "would inevitably give the proceedings a more adversary cast and tend to reduce their utility as a means to further correctional goals."[47]

[C14] The Court has drawn from its decisions "the presumption that an indigent litigant has a right to appointed counsel only when, if he loses, he may be deprived of his physical liberty."[48] Thus, Argersinger established that counsel must be provided before any indigent may be sentenced to prison, even where the crime is petty and the prison term brief.[49] By contrast, the government is not required to provide counsel at a hearing regarding termination of welfare benefits.[50]

[C15] However, "it is the defendant's interest in personal freedom, and not simply the special Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments right to counsel in criminal cases, which triggers the right to appointed counsel."[51] This is "demonstrated by the Court's announcement in In re Gault, that 'the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that in respect of proceedings to determine delinquency which may result in commitment to an institution in which the juvenile's freedom is curtailed,' the juvenile has a right to appointed counsel even though those proceedings may be styled 'civil,' and not 'criminal.'"[52] Similarly, four of the five Justices, who reached the merits in Vitek, concluded that an indigent prisoner is entitled to appointed counsel before being involuntarily transferred for treatment to a state mental hospital.[53]

---

47 Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 570 (1974).

In Walters v. National Association of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305 (1985), the Court upheld against due process attack a statutory $10 limitation on attorney's fees payable by veterans seeking disability or death benefits in proceedings before the Veterans' Administration. The Court determined that the government had a legitimate interest in administering benefits in an informal and non-adversarial fashion, and that invalidation of the fee limitation would seriously frustrate Congress' principal goal of wanting the veteran to get the entirety of the award. The Court thus required those challenging the law to make "an extraordinarily strong showing of probability of error under this system—and the probability that the presence of attorneys would sharply diminish that possibility—to warrant a holding that the fee limitation denied claimants due process of law." Id. at 326. No such showing was made out on the record of the case. In light of the government interests at stake, the evidence before the district court as to the success rates in claims handled with or without lawyers showed no such great disparity as to warrant the inference that the fee limitation violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. And what evidence there was regarding complex cases fell far short of the kind that would warrant upsetting Congress' judgment.

United States Department of Labor v. Triplett, 494 U.S. 715 (1990), involved a provision of the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972 that prohibited attorneys from receiving fees for representing claimants except as approved by the Department of Labor. In implementing this provision, the Department promulgated approval procedures that invalidated all contractual fee arrangements. The Court held that the fee limitation scheme did not violate due process, because the record of the case did not establish that claimants could not obtain representation and that this unavailability of attorneys was attributable to the government's fee regime.

48 Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 26–27 (1981).

49 Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972).

50 Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 270 (1970).

51 Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 25 (1981).

52 Id. at 25, discussing In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 41 (1967).

53 Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 496–97 (1980). The fifth Justice declined to exclude the possibility that the required assistance may be rendered by licensed psychiatrists or other mental health professionals or by competent laymen in some cases. Id. at 500.

[C16] "Significantly, as a litigant's interest in personal liberty diminishes, so does his right to appointed counsel."[54] In Gagnon v. Scarpelli, the Court gauged the due process rights of a previously sentenced probationer at a probation revocation hearing. In Morrissey, which involved an analogous hearing to revoke parole, the Court had said: "revocation deprives an individual not of the absolute liberty to which every citizen is entitled, but only of the conditional liberty properly dependent on observance of special parole restrictions."[55] Relying on that discussion, the Court in Scarpelli "declined to hold that indigent probationers have, per se, a right to counsel at revocation hearings, and instead left the decision whether counsel should be appointed to be made on a case-by-case basis."[56] In Lassiter, the Court held that parental termination cases "are most appropriately ranked with probation-revocation hearings: While the Court declined to recognize an automatic right to appointed counsel, it said that an appointment would be due when warranted by the character and difficulty of the case."[57]

[C17] Moreover, "the Court has refused to extend the right to appointed counsel to include prosecutions which, though criminal, do not result in the defendant's loss of personal liberty."[58] The Court in Scott v. Illinois interpreted the central premise of Argersinger to be "that actual imprisonment is a penalty different in kind from fines or the mere threat of imprisonment," and the Court endorsed that premise as "eminently sound and warrant[ing] adoption of actual imprisonment as the line defining the constitutional right to appointment of counsel." The Court thus held that "the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution require only that no indigent criminal defendant be sentenced to a term of imprisonment unless the State has afforded him the right to assistance of appointed counsel in his defense."[59]

v. Standard of Proof

[C18] The function of a standard of proof, as that concept is embodied in the Due Process Clause, "is to instruct the fact finder concerning the degree of confidence society thinks he should have in the correctness of factual conclusions for a particular type of adjudication. . . . The standard serves to allocate the risk of error between the litigants and to indicate the relative importance attached to the ultimate decision."[60]

[C19] Generally speaking, the evolution of this area of the law has produced, across a continuum, three standards or levels of proof for different types of cases. "At one end of the spectrum is the typical civil case involving a monetary dispute between private parties. Since society has a minimal concern with the outcome of such private suits, plaintiff's burden of proof is a mere 'preponderance of the evidence.' The litigants thus share the risk of error in roughly equal fashion."[61] "In a criminal case, on the other

---

54 Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 26 (1981).

55 Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 480 (1972).

56 See Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 26 (1981), discussing Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 790 (1973).

57 See M. L. B. v. S. L. J., 519 U.S. 102, 117 (1996), discussing Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 31–32 (1981). See, in extenso, para. F31.

58 Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 26 (1981).

59 Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367, 373–74 (1979).

60 Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 423 (1979).

61 Id. at 423. The burden of showing something by a preponderance of evidence simply requires the trier of fact to believe that the existence of a fact is more probable than its nonexistence before he may find in favor of the party who has the burden to persuade the judge of the fact's existence.

hand, the interests of the defendant are of such magnitude that, historically and without any explicit constitutional requirement, they have been protected by standards of proof designed to exclude as nearly as possible the likelihood of an erroneous judgment. In the administration of criminal justice, society imposes almost the entire risk of error upon itself. This is accomplished by requiring under the Due Process Clause that the state prove the guilt of an accused 'beyond a reasonable doubt.'"[62] The Court has mandated an intermediate standard of proof—"clear and convincing evidence"[63]—when "the individual interests at stake . . . are both particularly important and more substantial than mere loss of money."[64] Thus, such a standard has been required in deportation proceedings,[65] in denaturalization proceedings,[66] in civil commitment proceedings,[67] and in proceedings for the termination of parental rights.[68] Further, this level of proof, has traditionally been imposed in civil cases involving allegations of fraud or some other quasi-criminal wrongdoing by the defendant.[69]

vi. Legislative Presumptions[70]

[C20] A legislative presumption of one fact from evidence of another does not constitute a denial of due process of law or a denial of the equal protection of the law as long as there is "some rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, and the inference of one fact from proof of another [is] not so unrea-

---

[62] Id. at 423–24, citing In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970). See also para. C123.

[63] Clear and convincing evidence is that measure or degree of proof that will produce, in the mind of the trier of facts, a firm belief or conviction as to the allegations sought to be established. It is intermediate, being more than a mere preponderance, but not to the extent of such certainty as is required beyond a reasonable doubt as in criminal cases.

[64] Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 363 (1996), quoting Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 756 (1982).

[65] Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276, 285 (1966).

[66] Chaunt v. United States, 364 U.S. 350, 353 (1960); Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 125, 159 (1943).

[67] Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 425–33 (1979).

[68] Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 758–68 (1982).

[69] Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 424 (1979). See also Woodby v. INS, 385 U.S. 276, 285, n.18 (1966).

In Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990), the Court held that the Due Process Clause does not prohibit a state from requiring a third party, who seeks to terminate life-sustaining treatment, to demonstrate, by clear and convincing evidence, that the incompetent person receiving such treatment would wish that step to be taken. The Court reasoned that the heightened standard of proof was permissible, because the decisionmaker was a surrogate for the incompetent individual, and because the consequences of an erroneous decision were irreversible. Id. at 280–83.

In Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 497 U.S. 502 (1990), the Court upheld an Ohio statute that required an unmarried, unemancipated minor woman, who sought to obtain an abortion without notifying a parent, to prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that judicial bypass of the notification requirement was appropriate in her case. The Court approved the heightened standard of proof in that case largely because the proceeding at issue was ex parte. Id. at 515–16.

In Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348 (1996), the Court held that a state statute under which the defendant in a criminal prosecution is presumed to be competent to stand trial, unless he proves his incompetence by clear and convincing evidence, violates due process and that a defendant may not be put to trial even though it is more likely than not that he is incompetent.

[70] See also paras. C124 et seq. (presumptions in the criminal context).

sonable as to be a purely arbitrary mandate."[71] However, statutes creating "permanent irrebuttable presumptions have long been disfavored under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments."[72]

[C21] Bell v. Burson involved a Georgia statute, which provided that, if an uninsured motorist was involved in an accident and could not post security for the amount of damages claimed, his driver's license must be suspended without any hearing on the question of fault or responsibility. The Court held that, "since the State purported to be concerned with fault in suspending a driver's license, it could not, consistent with procedural due process, conclusively presume fault from the fact that the uninsured motorist was involved in an accident, and could not, therefore, suspend his driver's license without a hearing on that crucial factor."[73]

[C22] Likewise, Stanley struck down, as violative of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Illinois' irrebuttable statutory presumption that all unmarried fathers were unqualified to raise their children. Because of that presumption, the statute required the state, upon the death of the mother, to take custody of all such illegitimate children, without providing any hearing on the father's parental fitness. The Court held "that the State could not conclusively presume that any individual unmarried father was unfit to raise his children; rather, it was required by the Due Process Clause to provide a hearing on that issue."[74]

[C23] In Vlandis, a statutory definition of "residents" for purposes of fixing tuition to be paid by students in a state university system was held invalid. The Court held that, where a state "purport[s] to be concerned with residency, it might not, at the same time, deny to one seeking to meet its test of residency the opportunity to show factors clearly bearing on that issue."[75]

[C24] Murry involved a conclusive presumption contained in a federal statute providing that "[a]ny household which includes a member who has reached his eighteenth birthday and who is claimed as a dependent child for Federal income tax purposes by a taxpayer who is not a member of an eligible household, shall be ineligible to participate in any food stamp program . . . during the tax period such dependency is claimed and for a period of one year after the expiration of such tax period." This provision had been generated by congressional concern over non-needy households participating in the food stamp program and abuses of the program by college students and children of wealthy parents. The Court invalidated the provision, as violative of due process, because "the deduction taken for the benefit of the parent in the prior year is not a rational measure of the need of a different household with which the child of the tax deducting parent lives, and rests on an irrebuttable presumption often contrary to fact."[76]

---

71 Mobile, J. & K. C. R. Co. v. Turnipseed, 219 U.S. 35, 43 (1910).

72 Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441, 446 (1973).

73 Id. at 446–47, discussing Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535 (1971).

74 Id. at 447, discussing Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972). A four-Justice majority concluded, in Stanley, that the denial to unwed fathers of the hearing on fitness accorded to all other parents whose custody of their children was challenged by the state constituted a denial of equal protection of the laws. Id. at 658. However, in Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380, 385, n.3 (1979), the Court explicitly described Stanley as a case involving procedural due process.

75 Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749, 771 (1975), discussing Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441, 452 (1973).

76 United States Dep't of Agric. v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508, 514 (1973)

[C25] In LaFleur, the Court held invalid school board regulations requiring pregnant school teachers to take unpaid maternity leave commencing four to five months before the expected birth. The regulations were violative of due process, since they created a conclusive presumption that every teacher who was four or five months pregnant was physically incapable of continuing her duties, whereas medical experts agreed that "the ability of any particular pregnant woman to continue at work past any fixed time in her pregnancy is very much an individual matter."[77]

[C26] Nevertheless, Michael H. v. Gerald D. held, without a majority opinion, that a putative natural father was not entitled to rebut a state law presumption that a child born in a marriage was a child of the marriage.[78] A four-member plurality noted: "A conclusive presumption does, of course, foreclose the person against whom it is invoked from demonstrating, in a particularized proceeding, that applying the presumption to him will in fact not further the lawful governmental policy the presumption is designed to effectuate. But the same can be said of any legal rule that establishes general classifications, whether framed in terms of a presumption or not. In this respect, there is no difference between a rule which says that the marital husband shall be irrebuttably presumed to be the father and a rule which says that the adulterous natural father shall not be recognized as the legal father. Both, rules deny someone in Michael's situation a hearing on whether, in the particular circumstances of his case, California's policies would best be served by giving him parental rights. Thus, as many commentators have observed, . . . our 'irrebuttable presumption' cases must ultimately be analyzed as calling into question not the adequacy of procedures, but—like our cases involving classifications framed in other terms . . .—the adequacy of the 'fit' between the classification and the policy that the classification serves."[79] By contrast, five Justices agreed that the flaw inhering in a conclusive presumption terminating a constitutionally protected interest without any hearing whatsoever is a procedural one.[80]

---

[77] Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632, 645 (1974).

[78] Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989). See, in extenso, para. F26.

[79] Id. at 120–21 (opinion of Justice Scalia, in which Rehnquist, C.J., O'Connor and Kennedy, JJ., joined). For example, in Carrington v. Rash, 380 U.S. 89 (1965), the Court held that a permanent irrebuttable presumption of non-residence violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. That case involved a provision of the Texas Constitution that prohibited any member of the armed forces, who entered the service as a resident of another state and then moved his home to Texas during the course of his military duty, from ever satisfying the residence requirement for voting in Texas elections, so long as he remained a member of the armed forces. The effect of that provision was to create a conclusive presumption that all servicemen who moved to Texas during their military service, even if they became bona fide residents of Texas, nonetheless remained non-residents for purposes of voting. The Court held that "[b]y forbidding a soldier ever to controvert the presumption of nonresidence, the Texas Constitution imposes an invidious discrimination in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 96.

[80] Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110, 153 (1989) (dissenting opinion of Brennan, J., with whom Marshall and Blackmun, JJ., joined); id. at 163 (White, J., dissenting); id. at 132 (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment). Justice Brennan found disturbing the plurality's "failure to recognize that the defect from which conclusive presumptions suffer is a procedural one: the State has declared a certain fact relevant, indeed controlling, yet has denied a particular class of litigants a hearing to establish that fact. This is precisely the kind of flaw that procedural due process is designed to correct."

vii. Impartial Decisionmaker

[C27] "Before one may be deprived of a protected interest, whether in a criminal or civil setting, . . . one is entitled as a matter of due process of law to an adjudicator who is not in a situation 'which would offer a possible temptation to the average man as a judge . . . which might lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear and true.'"[81] "The neutrality requirement helps to guarantee that life, liberty, or property will not be taken on the basis of an erroneous or distorted conception of the facts or the law. . . . At the same time, it preserves both the appearance and reality of fairness, generating the feeling . . . that justice has been done, . . . by ensuring that no person will be deprived of his interests in the absence of a proceeding in which he may present his case with assurance that the arbiter is not predisposed to find against him."[82] "Even appeal and a trial de novo will not cure a failure to provide a neutral and detached adjudicator."[83]

[C28] The requirement of impartiality in the judicial context has been guarded by the Court on various occasions, usually involving financial interest or personal hostility.[84] Most [81] Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 617–18 (1993), quoting Ward v. Vill. of Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57, 60 (1972).

---

[82] Marshall v. Jerrico, Inc., 446 U.S. 238, 242 (1980).

[83] Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 618 (1993), citing Ward v. Vill. of Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57, 61 (1972).

[84] See Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813, 822–25 (1986) (judge violated due process by sitting in a case in the outcome of which he had a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest); Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 523, 531–34 (1927) (reversing convictions rendered by the mayor of a town when the mayor's salary was paid in part by fees and costs levied by him acting in a judicial capacity); Ward v. Vill. of Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57, 58–62 (1972) (invalidating a procedure by which sums produced from a mayor's court accounted for a substantial portion of municipal revenues, even though the mayor's salary was not augmented by those sums, for the mayor's executive responsibilities for village finances might make him partisan to maintain the high level of contribution from the mayor's court); Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245 (1977) (per curiam) (invalidating a system in which justices of the peace were paid for issuance, but not for non-issuance, of search warrants); Johnson v. Mississippi, 403 U.S. 212, 215–16 (1971) (per curiam) (judge violated due process by sitting in a case in which one of the parties was a previously successful litigant against him); Taylor v. Hayes, 418 U.S. 488 (1974) (in the context of contempt before a judge, where "marked personal feelings were present on both sides," and the marks of "unseemly conduct [had] left personal stings," criminal contempt proceedings should be held before a judge other than the one reviled by the contemnor); Bracy v. Gramley, 520 U.S. 899, 905 (1997) (would violate due process if a judge was disposed to rule against defendants who did not bribe him in order to cover up the fact that he regularly ruled in favor of defendants who did bribe him).

"Judges repeatedly issue arrest warrants on the basis that there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the person named in the warrant has committed it. Judges also preside at preliminary hearings where they must decide whether the evidence is sufficient to hold a defendant for trial. Neither of these pretrial involvements has been thought to raise any constitutional barrier against the judge's presiding over the criminal trial and, if the trial is without a jury, against making the necessary determination of guilt or innocence. Nor has it been thought that a judge is disqualified from presiding over injunction proceedings because he has initially assessed the facts in issuing or denying a temporary restraining order or a preliminary injunction." See Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 56 (1975).

In Weiss v. United States, 510 U.S. 163, 176–81 (1994), the Court rejected the contention that a military judge who does not have a fixed term of office lacks the independence necessary of the law concerning disqualification of judges because of interest and possible bias applies with equal force to administrative adjudicators.[85]

---

to ensure impartiality. The Court held that the applicable provisions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), and corresponding regulations, by insulating military judges from the effects of command influence, sufficiently preserved judicial impartiality, noting that the UCMJ (1) placed military judges under the authority of the appropriate Judge Advocate General, rather than under the authority of the convening officer; (2) protected against command influence by precluding a convening officer or any commanding officer from preparing or reviewing any report concerning the effectiveness, fitness, or efficiency of a military judge relating to his judicial duties; (3) prohibited convening officers from censuring, reprimanding, or admonishing a military judge with respect to the findings or sentence adjudged by the court or with respect to any other exercise of its or his functions in the conduct of the proceeding; (4) provided that a military judge, either trial or appellate, should refrain from adjudicating a case in which he had previously participated and allowed a defendant to challenge both a court-martial member and a court-martial judge for cause; (5) allowed a defendant to learn the identity of the military judge before choosing whether to be tried by the judge alone, or by the judge and court-martial members. Moreover, the Court stressed the fact that the entire system was overseen by the Court of Military Appeals, which was composed entirely of civilian judges serving for fixed terms of 15 years. This court had demonstrated its vigilance in checking any attempts to exert improper influence over military judges, holding, for example, that the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, or his designee, could not rate a military judge based on the appropriateness of the judge's sentences at courts-martial, and that a Judge Advocate General could not decertify or transfer a military judge based on the General's opinion of the appropriateness of the judge's findings and sentences.

With respect to the (more relaxed) requirement of a disinterested criminal prosecutor, see Marshall v. Jerrico, Inc., 446 U.S. 238, 248 (1980), and Young v. United States ex rel. Vuitton et Fils S.A., 481 U.S. 787, 802–09 (1987) (counsel for a party that is the beneficiary of a court order may not be appointed to undertake criminal contempt prosecutions for alleged violations of that order).

[85] See Gibson v Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564, 579 (1973). In that case, the Court forbade a state administrative board consisting of optometrists in private practice from hearing charges filed against licensed optometrists competing with board members.

In Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 485–86 (1972), the Court prohibited a parole officer (who acts as counselor for and confidant of the parolee, and, on the basis of preliminary information, decides to arrest the parolee) from making the determination whether reasonable grounds exist for the revocation of parole, noting that "the officer directly involved in making recommendations cannot always have complete objectivity in evaluating them" (emphasis added).

Mere familiarity with the facts of a case gained by an agency in the performance of its statutory role does not, however, disqualify a decisionmaker. Combination of investigative and adjudicative functions does not necessarily create an unconstitutional risk of bias in administrative adjudication. See Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35 (1975), where the Court said:

> It is . . . very typical for the members of administrative agencies to receive the results of investigations, to approve the filing of charges or formal complaints instituting enforcement proceedings, and then to participate in the ensuing hearings. This mode of procedure . . . does not violate due process of law. We should also remember that it is not contrary to due process to allow judges and administrators who have had their initial decisions reversed on appeal to confront and decide the same questions a second time around. . . .
>
> Here, the Board stayed within the accepted bounds of due process. Having investigated, it issued findings and conclusions asserting the commission of certain acts, and ultimately concluding that there was probable cause to believe that appellee had violated the statutes.

3. Particular Applications

a. Takings of Property

[C29] "[P]roperty may not be taken for public use without reasonable notice of the proceedings authorized for its taking and without reasonable opportunity to be heard

---

> The risk of bias or prejudgment in this sequence of functions has not been considered to be intolerably high or to raise a sufficiently great possibility that the adjudicators would be so psychologically wedded to their complaints that they would consciously or unconsciously avoid the appearance of having erred or changed position. Indeed, just as there is no logical inconsistency between a finding of probable cause and an acquittal in a criminal proceeding, there is no incompatibility between the agency filing a complaint based on probable cause and a subsequent decision, when all the evidence is in, that there has been no violation of the statute. Here, if the Board now proceeded after an adversary hearing to determine that appellee's license to practice should not be temporarily suspended, it would not implicitly be admitting error in its prior finding of probable cause. Its position most probably would merely reflect the benefit of a more complete view of the evidence afforded by an adversary hearing.
>
> The initial charge or determination of probable cause and the ultimate adjudication have different bases and purposes. The fact that the same agency makes them in tandem, and that they relate to the same issues, does not result in a procedural due process violation. Clearly, if the initial view of the facts based on the evidence derived from non-adversarial processes, as a practical or legal matter, foreclosed fair and effective consideration at a subsequent adversary hearing leading to ultimate decision, a substantial due process question would be raised. But, in our view, that is not this case.
>
> That the combination of investigative and adjudicative functions does not, without more, constitute a due process violation does not, of course, preclude a court from determining, from the special facts and circumstances present in the case before it, that the risk of unfairness is intolerably high.

Id. at 56–58.

"Nor is a decisionmaker disqualified simply because he has taken a position, even in public, on a policy issue related to the dispute, in the absence of a showing that he is not capable of judging a particular controversy fairly on the basis of its own circumstances." See Hortonville Sch. Dist. v. Hortonville Educ. Ass'n, 426 U.S. 482, 493 (1976) (emphasis added). In that case, the Court found that School Board members, could, consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, dismiss teachers engaged in a strike prohibited by state law. More specifically, the Court held that the Board's prior role as collective bargaining agent for the school district did not disqualify it to decide that the public interest in maintaining uninterrupted classroom work required that teachers striking in violation of state law be discharged, noting that that the Board members did not have the kind of personal or financial stake in the decision that might create a conflict of interest, and there was nothing in the record to support charges of personal animosity. Id. at 491–93.

"Where an initial determination is made by a party acting in an enforcement capacity, due process may be satisfied by providing for a neutral adjudicator to conduct a de novo review of all factual and legal issues." See Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 618 (1993), citing Marshall v. Jerrico, Inc., 446 U.S. 238 (1980). In Jerrico, the Court emphasized the distinction between adjudication and enforcement. The Court was faced with a federal agency administrator who determined violations of a child labor law and assessed penalties under the statute. Sums collected as civil penalties were returned to the Employment Standards Administration (ESA) of the Department of Labor in reimbursement for the costs of determining violations and assessing penalties. The Court concluded that the administrator could not be held to the high standards required of those "whose duty as to substantial matters of right affected by the taking."[86] Thirty days' notice by publication of the condemnation of the land for a public highway has been thought to be sufficient.[87] But notice of condemnation proceedings published in a local newspaper is an inadequate means of informing a landowner "whose name was known to the city and was on the official records."[88] Similarly, publication in a newspaper and posted notices it is to make the final decision and whose impartiality serves as the ultimate guarantee of a fair and meaningful proceeding." Id. at 250. Of the administrator there, the Court said: "He is not a judge. He performs no judicial or quasi-judicial functions. He hears no witnesses and rules on no disputed factual or legal questions. The function of assessing a violation is akin to that of a prosecutor or civil plaintiff. . . . It is the administrative law judge, not the assistant regional administrator, who performs the function of adjudicating child labor violations." Id. at 247–48. The Court went on to note:

---

> Our legal system has traditionally accorded wide discretion to criminal prosecutors in the enforcement process, . . . and similar considerations have been found applicable to administrative prosecutors as well. Prosecutors need not be entirely neutral and detached. In an adversary system, they are necessarily permitted to be zealous in their enforcement of the law. . . .
>
> We do not suggest . . . that the Due Process Clause imposes no limits on the partisanship of administrative prosecutors. Prosecutors are also public officials; they too must serve the public interest. In appropriate circumstances, the Court has made clear that traditions of prosecutorial discretion do not immunize from judicial scrutiny cases in which the enforcement decisions of an administrator were motivated by improper factors or were otherwise contrary to law. . . . Moreover, the decision to enforce—or not to enforce—may itself result in significant burdens on a defendant or a statutory beneficiary, even if he is ultimately vindicated in an adjudication. . . . A scheme injecting a personal interest, financial or otherwise, into the enforcement process may bring irrelevant or impermissible factors into the prosecutorial decision, and, in some contexts, raise serious constitutional questions. . . . But the strict requirements of neutrality cannot be the same for administrative prosecutors as for judges.

Id. at 248–50 (emphasis added). Further, the Court found that it was unnecessary in that case to determine with precision what limit there might be on a financial or personal interest of one who performed a prosecutorial function, for "the influence alleged to impose bias is exceptionally remote. No governmental official stands to profit economically from vigorous enforcement of child labor provisions. . . . Nor is there a realistic possibility that the assistant regional administrator's judgment will be distorted by the prospect of institutional gain as a result of zealous enforcement efforts. . . . [It] is plain that the enforcing agent is in no sense financially dependent on the maintenance of a high level of penalties. Furthermore, since it is the national office of the ESA, and not any assistant regional administrator, that decides how to allocate civil penalties, such administrators have no assurance that the penalties they assess will be returned to their offices at all." Id. at 250–51.

"There is a presumption of honesty and integrity in those serving as administrative adjudicators. . . . Without a showing to the contrary, state administrators are assumed to be men of conscience and intellectual discipline, capable of judging a particular controversy fairly on the basis of its own circumstances." See Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 47, 55 (1975).

86 North Laramie Land Co. v. Hoffman, 268 U.S. 276, 282–83 (1925). By contrast, "the necessity and expediency of the taking of property for public use are legislative questions, no matter who may be charged with their decision, and a hearing thereon is not essential to due process in the sense of the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 284.

87 Id. at 283–84.

88 Walker v. City of Hutchinson, 352 U.S. 112, 116 (1956).

are inadequate to apprise a property owner of condemnation proceedings when "his name and address were readily ascertainable from both deed records and tax rolls."[89]

[C30] The estimate of the just compensation for property taken for the public use, under the right of eminent domain, is not required to be made by a jury.[90] It is thus settled that "there is no constitutional right to a jury in eminent domain proceedings."[91] But with respect to a regulatory takings claim under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, which provides relief for invasions of rights protected under federal law, the Court has held that in actions at law otherwise within the purview of the Seventh Amendment, the issue whether a landowner has been deprived of all economically viable use of his property is for the jury, since it is predominantly factual. Further, although the question whether a land use decision substantially advances legitimate public interests is probably best understood as a mixed question of fact and law, the narrow question whether, when viewed in light of the context and history of the development application process, a city's decision to reject a particular development plan bore a reasonable relationship to its proffered justifications is "essentially fact-bound in nature," and thus may be properly submitted to a jury.[92]

---

89 Schroeder v. New York City, 371 U.S. 208, 210 (1962).

90 Bauman v. Ross, 167 U.S. 548, 593 (1897).

91 United States v. Reynolds, 397 U.S. 14, 18 (1970). Similarly, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not require a jury trial in state condemnation proceedings. See, e.g., Dohany v. Rogers, 281 U.S. 362, 369 (1930).

Where a commission is appointed under federal statute to determine the issue of just compensation in eminent domain proceedings, "there is danger that commissioners, unlike juries, may use their own expertise, and not act as a deliberative body applying constitutional standards. A jury, until it retires, sits under the direct supervision of the judge, who rules on the admissibility of evidence, who sees that witnesses are properly qualified as experts, and who polices the entire hearing, keeping it within bounds. Then, in due course, the judge instructs the jury on the law, answering any inquiries its members may have on the law. The jury is under surveillance from start to finish, and subject to judicial control. Hence, its general verdict that the land is worth so many dollars is not overturned for lack of particularized findings. A judge who uses commissioners, however, establishes a tribunal that may become free-wheeling, taking the law from itself, unless subject to close supervision. The first responsibility of the District Court, apart from the selection of responsible commissioners, is careful instruction of them on the law. But the instructions should explain with some particularity the qualifications of expert witnesses, the weight to be given other opinion evidence, competent evidence of value, the best evidence of value, illustrative examples of severance damages, and the like. The commissioners should be instructed as to the manner of the hearing and the method of conducting it, of the right to view the property, and of the limited purpose of viewing. They should be instructed on the kind of evidence that is inadmissible, and the manner of ruling on it. . . . [They are also] required to state not only the end result of their inquiry, but the process by which they reached it," by revealing the reasoning they use in deciding on a particular award. See United States v. Merz, 376 U.S. 192, 197–99 (1964).

92 Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes at Monterey, Ltd., 526 U.S. 687, 720–21 (1999). This Seventh Amendment holding was limited in various respects. The Court noted that it did not address the jury's role in an ordinary inverse condemnation suit. The action in that case had been brought under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, "a context in which the jury's role in vindicating constitutional rights has long been recognized by the federal courts. A federal court, moreover, cannot entertain a takings claim under [42 U.S.C. Section] 1983 unless or until the complaining landowner has been denied an adequate post-deprivation remedy." The Court, thus, did not attempt "a precise demarcation of the respective provinces of judge and jury in determining whether a zoning decision substantially advances legitimate governmental interests." Id. at 721–22.

b. Pre-Judgment Attachments—Civil Forfeitures

[C31] Beginning with Sniadach, the Court "has consistently held that constitutional requirements of due process apply to garnishment and pre-judgment attachment procedures whenever officers of the State act jointly with a creditor in securing the property in dispute."[93] In Sniadach, "the Court struck down a Wisconsin statute that permitted a creditor to effect pre-judgment garnishment of wages without notice and prior hearing to the wage earner."[94] Fuentes likewise "found a Due Process violation in state replevin provisions that permitted a secured installment seller to repossess the goods sold, through an ex parte application to a court clerk and the posting of a bond."[95] In North Georgia Finishing, "the Court again invalidated an ex parte garnishment statute that not only failed to provide for notice and prior hearing, but that also failed to require a bond, a detailed affidavit setting out the claim, the determination of a magistrate, or a prompt post-deprivation hearing."[96] Conversely, in Mitchell v. W. T. Grant, the Court upheld a Louisiana ex parte procedure allowing a lienholder to have disputed goods sequestered. Mitchell, however, carefully noted that Fuentes had been decided against a sufficiently different factual and legal background. "Those differences included Louisiana's provision of an immediate post-deprivation hearing along with the option of damages; the requirement that a judge, rather than a clerk, determine that there is a clear showing of entitlement to the writ; the necessity for a detailed affidavit; and an emphasis on the lienholder's interest in preventing waste or alienation of the encumbered property."[97]

[C32] Doehr involved a state statute authorizing pre-judgment attachment of real estate, without prior notice or hearing, upon the plaintiff's verification that there was probable cause to sustain the validity of his claim. Petitioner DiGiovanni applied to the state superior court for such an attachment on respondent Doehr's home in conjunction with a civil action for assault and battery that he was seeking to institute against Doehr in the same court. The judge found probable cause and ordered the attachment. Application of the Mathews factors demonstrated that the statute, as applied to that case, violated due process. First, the interests affected were significant for the property owner, "since attachment ordinarily clouds title; impairs the ability to sell or otherwise alienate the property; taints any credit rating; reduces the chance of obtaining a home equity

---

93 Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 932–33 (1982).

94 See Connecticut v. Doehr, 501 U.S. 1, 9 (1991), discussing Sniadach v. Family Fin. Corp. of Bay View, 395 U.S. 337 (1969).

95 See Connecticut v. Doehr, 501 U.S. 1, 9 (1991), discussing Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67 (1972). Fuentes involved kitchen appliances and household furniture. Under the challenged statute, the officer seizing the property should keep it for three days. During that period, the defendant could reclaim possession by posting his own security bond for double the property's value, in default of which the property was transferred to the applicant for the writ, pending a final judgment in the underlying repossession action. That the debtor was deprived of only the use and possession of the property, and perhaps only temporarily, did not put the seizure beyond scrutiny under the Due Process Clause. As the Court noted "The Fourteenth Amendment draws no bright lines around three-day, ten-day, or 50-day deprivations of property." Id. at 86. Because the official seizures had been carried out without notice and without opportunity for a hearing or other safeguard against mistaken repossession, they were held to be in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

96 See Connecticut v. Doehr, 501 U.S. 1, 10 (1991), discussing N. Georgia Finishing, Inc. v. DiChem, Inc., 419 U.S. 601, 606–08 (1975).

97 See Connecticut v. Doehr, 501 U.S. 1, 10 (1991), discussing Mitchell v. W. T. Grant Co., 416 U.S. 600, 615–18 (1974).

loan or additional mortgage; and can even place an existing mortgage in technical default where there is an insecurity clause. . . . [And] even the temporary or partial impairments to property rights that such encumbrances entail are sufficient to merit due process protection." Second, the statute presented too great a risk of erroneous deprivation under any of the suggested interpretations of the "probable cause" requirement. "Permitting a court to authorize attachment merely because the plaintiff believes the defendant is liable, or because the plaintiff can make out a facially valid complaint, would permit the deprivation of the defendant's property when the claim would fail to convince a jury, when it rested on factual allegations that were sufficient to state a cause of action but which the defendant would dispute, or, in the case of a mere good faith standard, even when the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The potential for unwarranted attachment in these situations is self-evident, and too great to satisfy the requirements of due process absent any countervailing consideration." Moreover, "[e]ven if the provision requires the plaintiff to demonstrate, and the judge to find, probable cause to believe that judgment will be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the risk of error was substantial in this case. [T]he judge could make no realistic assessment concerning the likelihood of an action's success based upon the one-sided, self-serving, and conclusory submissions [in the complaint]. . . . Unlike determining the existence of a debt or delinquent payments, the issue does not concern ordinarily uncomplicated matters that lend themselves to documentary proof." The state pointed out that its statute provided an expeditious post-attachment adversary hearing, notice for such a hearing, judicial review of an adverse decision, and a double damages action if the original suit was commenced without probable cause. "Similar considerations were present in Mitchell, where [the Court] upheld Louisiana's sequestration statute despite the lack of predeprivation notice and hearing. But in Mitchell, the plaintiff had a vendor's lien to protect, the risk of error was minimal because the likelihood of recovery involved uncomplicated matters that lent themselves to documentary proof . . . and plaintiff was required to put up a bond. None of these factors diminishing the need for a predeprivation hearing is present in this case. It is true that a later hearing might negate the presence of probable cause, but this would not cure the temporary deprivation that an earlier hearing might have prevented." Finally, the Court concluded "that the interests in favor of an ex parte attachment, particularly the interests of the plaintiff, are too minimal to supply such a consideration here. Plaintiff had no existing interest in Doehr's real estate when he sought the attachment. His only interest in attaching the property was to ensure the availability of assets to satisfy his judgment if he prevailed on the merits of his action. Yet there was no allegation that Doehr was about to transfer or encumber his real estate or take any other action during the pendency of the action that would render his real estate unavailable to satisfy a judgment. Our cases have recognized such a properly supported claim would be an exigent circumstance permitting postponing any notice or hearing until after the attachment is effected. . . . Absent such allegations, however, the plaintiff's interest in attaching the property does not justify the burdening of Doehr's ownership rights without a hearing to determine the likelihood of recovery."[98]

[C33] The Court also has examined the constitutionality, under due process principles, of ex parte seizures of forfeitable property. Calero-Toledo held that Puerto Rico could seize a yacht subject to civil forfeiture (pursuant to Puerto Rican statutes providing for forfeiture of vessels used for unlawful purposes, even if the owner was neither involved in nor aware of the act of the lessee of the vessel which resulted in the forfeiture), without affording prior notice or hearing. "Central to [the Court's] analysis was the fact that a yacht was the 'sort [of property] that could be removed to another jurisdiction, destroyed, or concealed, if advance warning of confiscation were given.' . . . The ease with which an owner could frustrate the Government's interests in the forfeitable property created a special need for very prompt action that justified the postponement of notice and hearing until after the seizure."[99]

[98] Connecticut v. Doehr, 501 U.S. 1, 11–16 (1991). Although a majority of the Court did not reach the issue, four Justices held that due process "also requires the plaintiff to post a bond or other security in addition to requiring a hearing and showing of some exigency." Id. at 18.

[C34] Conversely, Good held that the government must afford the owner of a house, subject to forfeiture as property used to commit or to facilitate commission of a federal drug offense, notice and a hearing before seizing the property. One's "right to maintain control over his home, and to be free from governmental interference, is a private interest of historic and continuing importance. . . . The seizure deprived Good of valuable rights of ownership, including the right of sale, the right of occupancy, the right to unrestricted use and enjoyment, and the right to receive rents. . . . The practice of ex parte seizure, moreover, creates an unacceptable risk of error. [Besides,] real property, . . . by its very nature, can be neither moved nor concealed. . . . If there is evidence, in a particular case, that an owner is likely to destroy his property when advised of the pending action, the Government may obtain an ex parte restraining order, or other appropriate relief, upon a proper showing in district court."[100]

c. Damage to a Person's Reputation

[C35] Government action that defames a person's reputation might infringe his constitutionally protected liberty.[101] "Where a person's good name, reputation, honor, or integrity is at stake because of what the government is doing to him, notice and an opportunity to be heard are essential," according to the Due Process Clause.[102] An official characterization of an individual as "a person who by excessive drinking produces certain conditions or exhibits specified traits, such as exposing himself or family to want

---

[99] See United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 52 (1993), discussing Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 678–79 (1974). In Calero-Toledo, the Court gave another two reasons for upholding the summary forfeiture at issue: "fostering the public interest in preventing continued illicit use of the property," and the fact that "the seizure is not initiated by self-interested private parties." Id. at 679.

[100] United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 53–58 (1993). In Degen v. United States, 517 U.S. 820 (1996), the Court held that a district court may not strike the filings of a claimant in a forfeiture suit and grant summary judgment against him for failing to appear in a related criminal prosecution.

[101] In relation to private defamatory actions and First Amendment protection, the Court has acknowledged the "important social values which underlie the law of defamation" and recognized that "society has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation," (see Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1, 22 (1990)), since the right of a man to the protection of his own reputation from unjustified invasion and wrongful hurt reflects no more than "the basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty" (see Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 341 (1974)).

[102] Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433, 436–37 (1971). See also Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 573 (1972).

or becoming dangerous to the peace of the community," which is made public, through "posting," pursuant to a state statute allowing the prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors to such persons, produces such a stigma or badge of disgrace, that procedural due process requires the previous guarantees.[103]

[C36] However, the Court has pointed out that "mere injury to reputation, even if defamatory, does not constitute the deprivation of a liberty interest."[104] In Paul v. Davis, a photograph of respondent bearing his name was included in a "flyer" of "active shoplifters," after he had been arrested on a shoplifting charge. At the time the flyer was circulated, Davis was employed as a photographer by two newspapers. The executive director of photography for these two newspapers informed respondent that, although he would not be fired, he "had best not find himself in a similar situation" in the future. After the charge against Davis had been dismissed, he brought this action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 against the police chiefs, who had distributed the flyer to area merchants, alleging that their action under color of law deprived him of his constitutional rights. A five-member majority of the Court rejected his claim, holding that "reputation alone, apart from some more tangible interests such as employment, is [n]either 'liberty' [n]or 'property' by itself sufficient to invoke the procedural protection of the Due Process Clause."[105] Such interests appear to involve "a right or status previously recognized by state law that was distinctly altered or extinguished,"[106] like children's right to attend public school, one's right to purchase or obtain liquor in common with the rest of citizenry, or a public employee's right not to lose his job. On the contrary one's future employment prospects do not constitute such tangible interest.[107]

[C37] The Court has also dealt with the question of injury to the reputation of individuals under administrative investigation into possible violations of the law in fields such as labor-management relations or stock market exchanges. The Court has ruled that there the Due Process Clause does not come into play, even if those being investigated are subject to public opprobrium, as long as the administrative agency has a "purely investigative and factfinding" function and, thus, does not adjudicate, does not hold trials or determine anyone's civil or criminal liability, does not issue orders, nor does it indict, punish, or impose any legal sanctions and, in short, "does not and cannot take any affirmative action which will affect an individual's legal rights," but "the only purpose of its existence is to find facts which may subsequently be used as the basis for legislative or executive action."[108] The Due Process Clause is not implicated under such circumstances, because an administrative investigation adjudicates no legal rights.[109]

---

[103] Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433, 436 (1971).

[104] Connecticut Department of Public Safety v. Doe, 538 U.S. 1, 6–7 (2003), referring to the Court's holding in Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976). See also Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226 (1991).

[105] Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 701 (1976) (emphasis added).

[106] Id. at 711.

[107] Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226, 233–34 (1991), involving petitioner's inability to obtain appropriate employment, because he was denied credentials by the federal hospital at which he was working.

[108] Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 441 (1960). The Court noted that any adverse consequences to those being investigated, were purely conjectural, and, in any case, were merely collateral, and "not the result of any affirmative determinations made by the Commission." Id. at 443.

[109] Sec. & Exch. Comm'n v. Jerry T. O' Brien, Inc., 467 U.S. 735, 742 (1984).

Nevertheless, due process comes into play if the executive investigative agency "is concerned only with exposing violations of criminal laws by specific individuals," is empowered "to find named individuals guilty . . . and to brand them as criminals in public," and, in short, "exercises a function very much akin to making an official adjudication of criminal culpability."[110]

d. Deprivation of Public or Private Employment—Exclusion from a Professional Activity

[C38] Public employees who can be discharged only for cause have a constitutionally protected property interest in their tenure[111] and cannot be fired without due process, which requires existence of some pre-termination opportunity to respond.[112] In Arnett, six Justices found constitutional minima satisfied where the employee had access to the material upon which the charge was based, could respond orally and in writing and present rebuttal affidavits, and was entitled to an evidentiary trial-type hearing at the appeal stage of the proceeding."[113] And Loudermill held that "a public employee dismissable only for cause was entitled to a limited hearing prior to his termination, to be followed by a more comprehensive post-termination hearing within a reasonable period of time."[114] Stressing that the pre-termination hearing "should be an initial check against mistaken decisions—essentially, a determination of whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the charges against the employee are true and support the proposed action," the Court decided, in view of "the government's interest in quickly removing an unsatisfactory employee," that pre-termination process need only include "oral or written notice of the charges against [the employee], an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity for the employee to tell his side of the story."[115]

[C39] In Gilbert v. Homar, the Court held that a state does not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by failing to provide notice and a hearing before suspending, without pay, a tenured policeman who has been arrested by state police and charged with a drug felony. Regarding the first of the Mathews factors, the Court 110 Jenkins v. McKeithen, 395 U.S. 411, 427–28 (1969). There three members of the Court, in their plurality opinion, found the Act involved unconstitutional as severely limiting the right of a person being investigated to confront and cross-examine the witnesses against him, where as two members of the Court, concurring in the judgment, considered that the statute in question had established a scheme for a nonjudicial tribunal to charge, try, convict, and punish people without any of the procedural safeguards that the Bill of Rights provides.

---

111 See, in extenso, para. C6.

112 Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 542 (1985).

113 Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974).

114 See Gilbert v. Homar, 520 U.S. 924, 929 (1997), discussing Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532 (1985).

115 Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 545–46 (1985). The Court's holding rested in part on the provisions in state law for a full post-termination hearing. Loudermill asserted, as a separate constitutional violation, that his administrative proceedings had taken too long. The Court accepted that "at some point, a delay in the post-termination hearing would become a constitutional violation," but rejected the complaint, noting that a nine-month adjudication is not unconstitutionally lengthy per se, and that Loudermill offered no indication that his wait had been unreasonably prolonged, other than the fact that it had taken nine months. Id. at 546–47.

noted that, "[s]o long as a suspended employee receives a sufficiently prompt post-suspension hearing, the lost income is relatively insubstantial (compared with termination), and fringe benefits such as health and life insurance are often not affected at all." "On the other side of the balance, the State has a significant interest in immediately suspending employees charged with felonies who occupy positions of public trust and visibility, such as police officers." Relatedly, the Constitution does not require the government "to give an employee charged with a felony paid leave at taxpayer expense." The remaining Mathews factor was the most important in that case: the purpose of a pre-suspension hearing—to assure that there are reasonable grounds to support the suspension without pay—"had already been assured by the arrest and the filing of charges."[116]

[C40] In McElroy, the Court held that no hearing should be provided to a cook employed by a private concessionaire of the Navy before the government revoked her security clearance. The summary exclusion of a civilian cook from a naval gun factory was within the "unfettered control" of the federal government in order "to manage the internal operation of an important federal military establishment."[117]

[C41] In Barchi, a horse trainer's license was suspended for 15 days after a horse he trained was discovered to have had drugs in its system during a race. The state regulatory scheme raised a rebuttable presumption that the trainer either administered the drug or was negligent in protecting against such an occurrence. In considering the administrative scheme, the Court first concluded that the state acted within the bounds of due process in suspending the trainer without a pre-suspension hearing. Although the magnitude of a trainer's interest in avoiding suspension was substantial, the state also had "an important interest in assuring the integrity of racing carried on under its auspices. In these circumstances, . . . the State is entitled to impose an interim suspension, pending a prompt judicial or administrative hearing that would definitely determine the issues, whenever it has satisfactorily established probable cause to believe that a horse has been drugged and that a trainer has been at least negligent in connection with the drugging. In such circumstances, the State's interest in preserving the integrity of the sport and in protecting the public from harm becomes most acute. At the same time, there is substantial assurance that the trainer's interest is not being baselessly compromised." In the case at hand, "[a]s proof that Barchi's horse had been drugged, the State adduced the assertion of its testing official, who had purported to examine Barchi's horse pursuant to prescribed testing procedures. . . . At the interim suspension stage, an expert's affirmance, although untested and not beyond error, would appear sufficiently reliable to satisfy constitutional requirements. As for the trainer's culpability, the inference, predicated on the fact of drugging, that the trainer had been at least negligent was accepted by the Court as defensible. However, the Court concluded that the scheme violated due process, because it did not assure a prompt post-suspension hearing, "one that would proceed and be concluded without appreciable delay."[118]

[C42] Mallen concerned the constitutionality of a statutory provision that authorized the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) to suspend from office an indicted

---

[116] Gilbert v. Homar, 520 U.S. 924, 932–34 (1997). That there might have been discretion not to suspend did not mean that Homar had to be given the opportunity to persuade officials of his innocence before the making of the decision. Id. at 934–35.

[117] Cafeteria & Rest. Workers v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 896 (1961).

[118] Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55, 63–66 (1979).

official of a federally insured bank. The Court held that the bank official was not entitled to a pre-suspension hearing, since the important governmental interest in protecting depositors and maintaining public confidence in the banking institutions, coupled with the fact that a grand jury had determined that there was probable cause to believe that the official had committed a felony, justified prompt action before a suspension hearing was held. Further, the bank official was accorded due process by a notice and hearing procedure that would render a decision within 90 days of the suspension.[119]

e. Suspension of a Driver's License[120]

[C43] At issue in Love was a statute permitting the summary revocation of the license of a repeat traffic offender on the strength of a cumulative record of traffic convictions and suspensions. The Court stressed that the appellee had not contested the factual basis for his license revocation, and had not contested the procedures followed in securing his previous convictions. Instead, the Love appellee had merely asserted a right to appear in person in advance to ask for leniency. Under these circumstances, the Court held that summary suspension was permissible, for the "appellee had the opportunity for a full judicial hearing in connection with each of the traffic convictions on which the decision was based."[121]

[C44] Mackey v. Montrym held that the Massachusetts statute mandating suspension of a driver's license because of his refusal to take a breath-analysis test, upon arrest for driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor, did not violate the Due Process Clause

---

[119] Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Mallen v. Mallen, 486 U.S. 230, 243–47 (1988). The fact that the criminal proceedings might be concluded more promptly than the FDIC proceeding was irrelevant to the due process determination, since an acquittal would require that the suspension order be vacated, while a conviction would merely strengthen the case for maintaining the suspension. Id. at 247.

Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., 481 U.S. 252 (1987), involved a federal statute protecting employees in the commercial motor transportation industry from being discharged in retaliation for refusing to operate a motor vehicle that did not comply with applicable state and federal safety regulations or for filing complaints alleging such non-compliance. The statute provided for an initial investigation of an employee's discharge by the Secretary of Labor and, upon a finding of reasonable cause to believe that the employee had been discharged in violation of the Act, required the Secretary to issue an order directing the employer to reinstate the employee. The employer could then request an evidentiary hearing and a final decision from the Secretary, but this request did not operate to stay the preliminary order of reinstatement. The Court held that (1) the statute unconstitutionally deprived the employer of Fifth Amendment procedural due process by failing to provide him with the substance of the evidence supporting the employee's complaint; and (2) minimum due process in this context did not require employer confrontation and cross-examination of witnesses before preliminary reinstatement, where a prompt post-reinstatement evidentiary hearing was available. Four Justices held that due process required that the employer have a pre-reinstatement opportunity to submit a written response and an opportunity to meet with the investigator and present statements from rebuttal witnesses.

[120] See also para. C21.

[121] Dixon v. Love, 431 U.S. 105, 113–14 (1977). The Court accepted the possibility of clerical error, but noted that written objection would bring a matter of that kind to the attention of the Secretary of State, who had the authority to suspend a driver's license.

of the Fourteenth Amendment. In undertaking the first step of the Mathews balancing process, the Court's concern centered on the duration of the deprivation of the driver's property interest in continued possession and use of his license. Under the Massachusetts statute, the license of a driver who refused to submit to a breath-analysis test was suspended pending the outcome of a hearing that he was entitled to demand, and the suspension was authorized for a maximum of only 90 days. As to the second stage of the Mathews inquiry, the Court found that the risk of erroneous observation or deliberate misrepresentation by the reporting police officer of the facts forming the basis for the suspension was insubstantial. Moreover, it was significant that Montrym did not dispute that probable cause existed for his arrest, or that he had initially refused to take the breath-analysis test at the arresting officer's request. Finally, the compelling interest in highway safety justified Massachusetts in making a summary suspension effective pending the outcome of the available prompt post-suspension hearing. Such interest was substantially served in several ways by the summary suspension. "First, the very existence of the summary sanction of the statute serve[d] as a deterrent to drunken driving. Second, it provide[d] strong inducement to take the breath-analysis test, and thus effectuate[d] the Commonwealth's interest in obtaining reliable and relevant evidence for use in subsequent criminal proceedings. Third, in promptly removing such drivers from the road, the summary sanction of the statute contribute[d] to the safety of public highways. . . . A pre-suspension hearing would substantially undermine the state interest in public safety by giving drivers significant incentive to refuse the breath-analysis test and demand a pre-suspension hearing as a dilatory tactic. Moreover, the incentive to delay arising from the availability of a pre-suspension hearing would generate a sharp increase in the number of hearings sought, and therefore impose a substantial fiscal and administrative burden on the Commonwealth."[122]

f. Suspension or Dismissal of Students from Public Schools

[C45] Students facing temporary suspension have interests qualifying for protection of the Due Process Clause, and "due process requires, in connection with a suspension of ten days or less, that the student be given oral or written notice of the charges against him and, if he denies them, an explanation of the evidence the authorities have and an opportunity to present his side of the story. The Clause requires at least these rudimentary precautions against unfair or mistaken findings of misconduct and arbitrary exclusion from school. There need be no delay between the time 'notice' is given and

---

[122] Mackey v. Montrym, 443 U.S. 1, 12–19 (1979).

Illinois v. Batchelder, 463 U.S. 1112 (1983) (per curiam) involved a state statute, under which, if a driver, arrested for driving while intoxicated, refused to take a breath-analysis test, the arresting officer filed with the clerk of the appropriate circuit court an affidavit that included the statement that the officer had "reasonable cause to believe the person was driving the motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor." The clerk should then notify the arrestee that his license would be suspended unless he requested a hearing within a specified time. The Court held that the Constitution did not require arresting officers to recite in an affidavit the specific and concrete evidentiary matters constituting "the underlying circumstances which provided him with a reasonable belief that the arrested person was driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor." The driver's right to a hearing, before he might be deprived of his license for failing to submit to a breath-analysis test, accorded him all of, and probably more than, the process that the federal Constitution assured.

the time of the hearing. In the great majority of cases the disciplinarian may informally discuss the alleged misconduct with the student minutes after it has occurred. . . . Since the hearing may occur almost immediately following the misconduct, it follows that as a general rule notice and hearing should precede removal of the student from school. [H]owever, . . . there are recurring situations in which prior notice and hearing cannot be insisted upon. Students whose presence poses a continuing danger to persons or property or an ongoing threat of disrupting the academic process may be immediately removed from school. In such cases, the necessary notice and rudimentary hearing should follow as soon as practicable."[123]

[C46] In Horowitz, respondent, a student at a state medical school, after being fully informed of the faculty's dissatisfaction with her clinical progress and the danger that this posed to timely graduation and continued enrollment, was dismissed by the school during her final year of study for failure to meet academic standards. The Court stressed that "[a]cademic evaluations of a student, in contrast to disciplinary determinations, bear little resemblance to the judicial and administrative fact finding proceedings to which [it] has traditionally attached a full hearing requirement. In Goss, the school's decision to suspend the students rested on factual conclusions that the individual students had participated in demonstrations that had disrupted classes, attacked a police officer, or caused physical damage to school property. The requirement of a hearing, where the student could present his side of the factual issue, could, under such circumstances provide a meaningful hedge against erroneous action. The decision to dismiss respondent, by comparison, rested on an academic judgment which is, by its nature, more subjective and evaluative than the typical factual questions presented in the average disciplinary decision. Like the decision of an individual professor as to the proper grade for a student in his course, the determination whether to dismiss a student for academic reasons requires an expert evaluation of cumulative information, and is not readily adapted to the procedural tools of judicial or administrative decisionmaking." Under these circumstances, the Court declined "to ignore the historic judgment of educators, and thereby formalize the academic dismissal process by requiring a hearing. The educational process is not, by nature, adversary; instead, it centers around a continuing relationship between faculty and students, one in which the teacher must occupy many roles—educator, adviser, friend, and, at times, parent substitute. In Goss, the Court concluded that the value of some form of hearing in a disciplinary context outweighs any resulting harm to the academic environment. Influencing this conclusion was clearly the belief that disciplinary proceedings, in which the teacher must decide whether to punish a student for disruptive or insubordinate behavior, may automatically bring an adversary flavor to the normal student-teacher relationship. The same conclusion does not follow in the academic context." The Court thus held that "a hearing may be useless or harmful in finding out the truth as to scholarship."[124]

g. Termination of Welfare or Disability Benefits[125]

[C47] Goldberg held that a state that terminates public assistance payments to a particular recipient without affording him the opportunity for an evidentiary hearing prior

---

123 Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 581–83 (1975).

124 Bd. of Curators of the Univ. of Missouri v. Horowitz, 435 U.S. 78, 89–90 (1978).

125 The procedural component of the Due Process Clause does not "impose a constituto termination denies the recipient procedural due process in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

> For qualified recipients, welfare provides the means to obtain essential food, clothing, housing, and medical care. . . . Thus, the crucial factor in this context . . . is that termination of aid pending resolution of a controversy over eligibility may deprive an eligible recipient of the very means by which to live while he waits. Since he lacks independent resources, his situation becomes immediately desperate. His need to concentrate upon finding the means for daily subsistence, in turn, adversely affects his ability to seek redress from the welfare bureaucracy.
>
> Moreover, important governmental interests are promoted by affording recipients a pre-termination evidentiary hearing. . . . Welfare, by meeting the basic demands of subsistence, can help bring within the reach of the poor the same opportunities that are available to others to participate meaningfully in the life of the community. At the same time, welfare guards against the societal malaise that may flow from a widespread sense of unjustified frustration and insecurity. Public assistance, then, is not mere charity, but a means to promote the general welfare. . . . The same governmental interests that counsel the provision of welfare, counsel as well its uninterrupted provision to those eligible to receive it; pre-termination evidentiary hearings are indispensable to that end. . . .
>
> The requirement of a prior hearing doubtless involves some greater expense, and the benefits paid to ineligible recipients pending decision at the hearing probably cannot be recouped, since these recipients are likely to be judgment-proof. But the State is not without weapons to minimize these increased costs. Much of the drain on fiscal and administrative resources can be reduced by developing procedures for prompt pre-termination hearings and by skillful use of personnel and facilities. . . . Thus, the interest of the eligible recipient in uninterrupted receipt of public assistance, coupled with the State's interest that his payments not be erroneously terminated, clearly outweighs the State's competing concern to prevent any increase in its fiscal and administrative burdens. . . .
>
> [Nevertheless,] the pre-termination hearing need not take the form of a judicial or quasi-judicial trial. . . . [T]he statutory "fair hearing" will provide the recipient with a full administrative review. Accordingly, the pre-termination hearing has one function only: to produce an initial determination of the validity of the welfare department's grounds for discontinuance of payments in order to protect a recipient against an erroneous termination of his benefits. Thus, a complete record and a comprehensive opinion, which would serve primarily to facilitate judicial review and to guide future decisions, need not be provided at the pre-termination stage. [In addition,] both welfare authorities and recipients have an interest in relatively speedy resolution of questions of eligibility, they are used to dealing with one another informally, and some welfare departments have very burdensome caseloads. These considerations justify the limitation of the pre-termination hearing to certain procedural safeguards, adapted tional limitation on the power of Congress to make substantive changes in the law of entitlement to public benefits." See Atkins v. Parker, 472 U.S. 115, 129 (1985), quoting Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78, 81 (1971).

---

> to the particular characteristics of welfare recipients, and to the limited nature of the controversies to be resolved. . . .
>
> [Due process thus requires] that a recipient have timely and adequate notice detailing the reasons for a proposed termination, and an effective opportunity to defend by confronting any adverse witnesses and by presenting his own arguments and evidence orally. These rights are important in cases where recipients have challenged proposed terminations as resting on incorrect or misleading factual premises or on misapplication of rules or policies to the facts of particular cases. . . .
>
> Further, the recipient must be allowed to retain an attorney if he so desires. Counsel can help delineate the issues, present the factual contentions in an orderly manner, conduct cross-examination, and generally safeguard the interests of the recipient.
>
> Finally, the decisionmaker's conclusion as to a recipient's eligibility must rest solely on the legal rules and evidence adduced at the hearing. . . . To demonstrate compliance with this elementary requirement, the decisionmaker should state the reasons for his determination and indicate the evidence he relied on, . . . though his statement need not amount to a full opinion, or even formal findings of fact and conclusions of law. And, of course, an impartial decision maker is essential. . . . [P]rior involvement in some aspects of a case will not necessarily bar a welfare official from acting as a decisionmaker. He should not, however, have participated in making the determination under review.[126]

[C48] In Mathews v. Eldridge, the Court found that the needs of Social Security disability recipients were not of comparable urgency, and, moreover, that existing pre-termination procedures, based largely on written medical assessments, were likely to be more objective and evenhanded than typical welfare entitlement decisions. In view of "the typically modest resources of the family unit of the physically disabled worker, the hardship imposed upon the erroneously terminated disability recipient may be significant. Still, the disabled worker's need is likely to be less than that of a welfare recipient. In addition to the possibility of access to private resources, other forms of government assistance will become available where the termination of disability benefits places a worker or his family below the subsistence level." Moreover, "a medical assessment of the worker's physical or mental condition is a more sharply focused and easily documented decision than the typical determination of welfare entitlement. In the latter case, a wide variety of information may be deemed relevant, and issues of witness credibility and veracity often are critical to the decision making process. . . . By contrast, the decision whether to discontinue disability benefits will turn, in most cases, upon routine, standard, and unbiased medical reports by physician specialists, concerning a subject whom they have personally examined. . . . To be sure, credibility and veracity may be a factor in the ultimate disability assessment in some cases. But procedural due process rules are shaped by the risk of error inherent in the truth-finding process as applied to the generality of cases, not the rare exceptions. The potential value of an evidentiary hearing, or even oral presentation to the decisionmaker, is substantially less in this context than in Goldberg." And requiring an evidentiary hearing upon demand in all cases prior to the termination of disability benefits would entail a substantial additional cost in terms of money and administrative burden. Under these considerations, the Court concluded that an evidentiary hearing is not required prior to the termination of disability benefits.[127]

---

126 Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 264–71 (1970).

h. Right to Notice and Hearing in the Civil Trial Context

[C49] "[T]he Due Process Clauses protect civil litigants who seek recourse in the courts, either as defendants hoping to protect their property or as plaintiffs attempting to redress grievances."[128] The Court has read the "property" component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause to impose constitutional limitations upon the power of courts, even in aid of their own valid processes, to dismiss an action without affording a party the opportunity for a hearing on the merits of his cause.[129] Similarly, "the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause has been interpreted as preventing the States from denying potential litigants use of established adjudicatory procedures, when such an action would be 'the equivalent of denying them an opportunity to be heard upon their claimed rights.'[130] Indeed, due process requires that, "absent a countervailing state interest of overriding significance, persons forced to settle their claims of right and duty through the judicial process must be given a meaningful opportunity to be heard."[131]

[C50] Mullane confronted a challenge to a state law that provided for the judicial settlement of common trust fund accounts by fiduciaries, upon notice given through newspaper publication. The effect of the judicial settlement was to terminate "every right which beneficiaries would otherwise have against the trust company . . . for improper management of the common trust fund." This, the Court said, worked to deprive the beneficiaries of property by, among other things, "cut[ting] off their rights to have the trustee answer for negligent or illegal impairments of their interests." Such a result was impermissible unless constitutionally adequate notice of the petition for a judicial settlement of accounts was established in accordance with the Fourteenth Amendment.[132]

---

[127] Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 342–49 (1976).

[128] Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 429 (1982).

[129] Id. at 429, quoting Societe Internationale v. Rogers, 357 U.S. 197, 209 (1958).

"Due process does not, of course, require that the defendant in every civil case actually have a hearing on the merits. A State, can, for example, enter a default judgment against a defendant who, after adequate notice, fails to make a timely appearance, . . . or who, without justifiable excuse, violates a procedural rule requiring the production of evidence necessary for orderly adjudication. . . . What the Constitution does require is 'an opportunity, . . . granted at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner,' . . . 'for a hearing appropriate to the nature of the case.' . . . The formality and procedural requisites for the hearing can vary, depending upon the importance of the interests involved and the nature of the subsequent proceedings." See Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 378 (1971).

[130] Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 429–30 (1982), quoting Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 380 (1971).

[131] Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 378 (1971).

[132] Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 311–15 (1950).

Similarly, in Covey v. Town of Somers, 351 U.S. 141 (1956), the Court held that notice by publication in a foreclosure action, even though sufficient to provide a normal person with an opportunity for a hearing, was not sufficient where the defendant was a known incompetent.

In Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 265 (1983), the Court held that a putative biological [C51] In Nelson v. Adams, OCP Corporation sued Adams USA, claiming patent infringement. The district court eventually dismissed OCP's claim and ordered OCP to pay Adams' costs and attorney fees. Adams feared that OCP might be unable to pay the fee award and therefore sought a means to recover from Nelson, president and sole shareholder of OCP, in his individual capacity. In pursuit of that objective, Adams moved under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to amend its pleading to add Nelson as a party; Adams also asked the court, to amend the fee award. The district court granted the motion in full, simultaneously making Nelson a party and subjecting him to judgment. The court of appeals affirmed. The Court held that the district court had erred in amending the judgment immediately upon permitting amendment of the pleading, for due process required that Nelson "be given an opportunity to respond and contest his personal liability for the award after he was made a party and before the entry of judgment against him."[133]

i. Prisoners' Liberty Interests[134]

[C52] Cases involving parole revocation implicate due process. In Morrissey, the Court noted that "the liberty of a parolee, although indeterminate, includes many of the core values of unqualified liberty and its termination inflicts a 'grievous loss' on the parolee and often on others." Hence, the state cannot revoke parole without some orderly process. Nevertheless, "[g]iven the previous conviction and the proper imposition of conditions, . . . the State has an overwhelming interest in being able to return the individual to imprisonment without the burden of a new adversary criminal trial. . . . What is needed is an informal hearing structured to assure that the finding of a parole violation will be based on verified facts, and that the exercise of discretion will be informed by an accurate knowledge of the parolee's behavior." First, due process requires, in this context, "that some minimal inquiry be conducted at or reasonably near the place of the alleged parole violation or arrest and as promptly as convenient after arrest while information is fresh and sources are available. . . . Such an inquiry should be seen as in the nature of a 'preliminary hearing' to determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions. . . . [T]he determination that reasonable ground exists for revocation of parole should be made by someone not directly involved in the case." The parolee should receive prior notice of the hearing, its purpose, and the alleged violations. "At the hearing, the parolee may appear and speak in his own behalf; he may bring letters, documents, or individuals who can give relevant information to the hearing officer. On request of the parolee, a person who has given adverse information on which parole revocation is to be based is to be made available for questioning in his presence. However, if the hearing officer determines that an informant would be subjected to risk of harm if his identity were disclosed, he need not be sub-father who had never established an actual relationship with his child did not have a constitutional right to notice of his child's adoption by the man who had married the child's mother, noting that "[t]he Constitution does not require either the trial judge or a litigant to give special notice [of the adoption proceeding] to nonparties who are presumptively capable of asserting and protecting their own rights."

---

133 Nelson v. Adams USA, Inc., 529 U.S. 460, 463 (2000).

134 See also para. D30 (involuntary transfer to a state mental hospital); para. D31 (involuntary administration of psychotropic drugs); para. B56 (right to access to courts).

jected to confrontation and cross-examination. . . . Based on the information before him, the officer should determine whether there is probable cause to hold the parolee for the final decision of the parole board on revocation. . . . [The officer] should state the reasons for his determination and indicate the evidence he relied on." Second, the "revocation hearing must be tendered within a reasonable time after the parolee is taken into custody. A lapse of two months . . . would not appear to be unreasonable." Minimum requirements of due process at the revocation hearing include: "(a) written notice of the claimed violations of parole; (b) disclosure to the parolee of evidence against him; (c) opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and documentary evidence; (d) the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses (unless the hearing officer specifically finds good cause for not allowing confrontation); (e) a 'neutral and detached' hearing body such as a traditional parole board, members of which need not be judicial officers or lawyers; and (f) a written statement by the factfinders as to the evidence relied on and reason for revoking parole."[135]

[C53] Gagnon v. Scarpelli concluded that the procedures outlined in Morrissey for parole revocation should also apply to probation revocation proceedings.[136] Further, the Court found "no justification for a new inflexible constitutional rule with respect to the requirement of counsel. . . . [T]he decision as to the need for counsel must be made on a case-by-case basis in the exercise of a sound discretion by the state authority charged with responsibility for administering the probation and parole system. Although the presence and participation of counsel will probably be both undesirable and constitutionally unnecessary in most revocation hearings, there will remain certain cases in which fundamental fairness—the touchstone of due process—will require that the State provide at its expense counsel for indigent probationers or parolees. . . . Presumptively, it may be said that counsel should be provided in cases where, after being informed of his right to request counsel, the probationer or parolee makes such a request based on a timely and colorable claim (i) that he has not committed the alleged violation of the conditions upon which he is at liberty; or (ii) that, even if the violation is a matter of public record or is uncontested, there are substantial reasons which justified or mitigated the violation and make revocation inappropriate, and that the reasons are complex or otherwise difficult to develop or present. In passing on a request for the appointment of counsel, the responsible agency also should consider, especially in doubtful cases, whether the probationer appears to be capable of speaking effectively for himself. In every case in which a request for counsel at a preliminary or final hearing is refused, the grounds for refusal should be stated succinctly in the record."[137]

[C54] In Wolff, Nebraska inmates challenged the decision of prison officials to revoke good time credits without adequate procedures. Inmates earned good time credits under a state statute that bestowed mandatory sentence reductions for good behavior, revo-

---

[135] Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 482–89 (1972) (the Court did not "reach or decide the question whether the parolee is entitled to the assistance of retained counsel or to appointed counsel if he is indigent"). See also Young v. Harper, 520 U.S. 143 (1997) (Oklahoma's "pre-parole conditional supervision program" found to differ from parole in name alone).

In Pennsylvania Board of Probation & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 365–68 (1998), the Court held that the federal exclusionary rule does not bar the introduction, at parole revocation hearings, of evidence seized in violation of parolees' Fourth Amendment rights. See also para. G225.

[136] Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 782 (1973).

[137] Id. at 790–91.

cable only for "flagrant or serious misconduct." The Court stressed that that the Due Process Clause itself does not create a liberty interest in credit for good behavior, but that the statutory provision created a liberty interest in a "shortened prison sentence" that resulted from good time credits. The Court, thus, articulated minimum procedures necessary to reach a "mutual accommodation between institutional needs and objectives and the provisions of the Constitution." More specifically, noting that prison disciplinary proceedings are not part of a criminal prosecution, and the full panoply of rights due a defendant in such proceedings does not apply, the Court held that: (1) "[W]ritten notice of the charges must be given to the disciplinary action defendant in order to inform him of the charges and to enable him to marshal the facts and prepare a defense. At least a brief period of time after the notice, no less than 24 hours, should be allowed to the inmate to prepare for the appearance before" the prison's disciplinary body;" (2) "[T]here must be a written statement by the factfinders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for the disciplinary action;" (3) The inmate "should be allowed to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense when permitting him to do so will not be unduly hazardous to institutional safety or correctional goals;"[138] (4) The inmate has no constitutional right to confrontation and cross-examination in prison disciplinary proceedings, "where prison disruption remains a serious concern;"[139] (5) Inmates have no right to retained or appointed counsel in such proceedings." "The insertion of counsel into the disciplinary process would inevitably give the proceedings a more adversary cast, and tend to reduce their utility as a means to further correctional goals. There would also be delay and very practical problems in providing counsel in sufficient numbers at the time and place where hearings are to be held." However, "[w]here an illiterate inmate is involved, or where the complexity of the issue makes it unlikely that the inmate will be able to collect and present the evidence necessary for an adequate comprehension of the case, he should be free to seek the aid of a fellow inmate, or if that is forbidden, to have adequate substitute aid in the form of help from the staff or from a sufficiently competent inmate designated by the staff."[140]

[C55] Inmates in Meachum sought injunctive relief, declaratory relief, and damages by reason of transfers from a Massachusetts medium security prison to a maximum security facility with substantially less favorable conditions. The transfers were ordered in the aftermath of arson incidents, for which the transferred inmates were thought to be responsible, and did not entail a loss of good time credits or any period of disciplinary confinement. The Court, first, rejected the notion "that any change in the conditions of confinement having a substantial adverse impact on the prisoner involved is sufficient to invoke the protections of the Due Process Clause." It then held that the Due Process Clause does not itself create a liberty interest in prisoners to be free from intra-

---

[138] Prison officials are required to explain, in a limited manner, the reason why witnesses were not allowed to testify, "but that they may do so either by making the explanation a part of the 'administrative record' in the disciplinary proceeding or by presenting testimony in court if the deprivation of a 'liberty' interest is challenged because of that claimed defect in the hearing. In other words, the prison officials may choose to explain their decision at the hearing, or they may choose to explain it 'later.'" See Ponte v. Real, 471 U.S. 491, 497 (1985).

[139] Due process does not require written reasons for denying inmates the opportunity to confront or cross-examine adverse witnesses. See Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 320–23 (1976).

[140] Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 556–70 (1974).

state prison transfers, since "[c]onfinement in any of the State's institutions is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the State to impose." The Court distinguished Wolff by noting that no Massachusetts law stripped officials of the discretion to transfer prisoners to alternate facilities "for whatever reason or for no reason at all."[141]

[C56] "Shortly after Meachum, the Court embarked on a different approach to defining state-created liberty interests. Because dictum in Meachum distinguished Wolff by focusing on whether state action was mandatory or discretionary, the Court in later cases laid ever greater emphasis on this dichotomy."[142] In Greenholtz, inmates alleged that they had been unconstitutionally denied parole. Their claim centered on a state statute that set the date for discretionary parole at the time the minimum term of imprisonment less good time credits expired. The statute ordered release of a prisoner at that time, unless one of four specific conditions were shown;[143] the parole board's decision, as defined by the statute, was necessarily subjective in part and predictive in part. The Court noted that there is no "constitutional or inherent right" to parole, but held that the statute's mandatory language—the use of the word "shall"—and the statutory presumption that parole release must be granted, unless one of four designated justifications for deferral was found, created a legitimate expectation of release, a liberty interest entitled to protection under the Due Process Clause.[144] "The Court thus held in Greenholtz that the presence of general or broad release criteria—delegating significant discretion to the decisionmaker—did not deprive the prisoner of the liberty interest in parole release created by the Nebraska statute. In essence, the Court made a distinction between two entirely distinct uses of the term discretion. In one sense of the word, an official has discretion when he or she 'is simply not bound by standards set by the authority in question.' . . . In this sense, officials who have been told to parole whomever they wish have discretion. In Greenholtz, the Court determined that a scheme awarding officials this type of discretion does not create a liberty interest in parole release. But the term discretion may instead signify that 'an official must use judgment in applying the standards set him [or her] by authority;' in other words, an official has discretion when the standards set by a statutory or regulatory scheme 'cannot be applied mechanically.' . . . The Court determined in Greenholtz that the presence of official discretion in this sense is not incompatible with the existence of a liberty interest in parole release, when release is required after the Board determines (in its broad discretion) that the necessary prerequisites exist."[145] Nevertheless, the state ultimately prevailed in that case, because the minimal process it had awarded the prisoners was deemed sufficient under the Fourteenth Amendment.[146]

---

141 Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 224–28 (1976).

142 See Sandin v. Conner, 515 U. S. 472, 479 (1995)

143 The Nebraska statute involved in Greenholtz provided as follows: "Whenever the Board of Parole considers the release of a committed offender who is eligible for release on parole, it shall order his release unless it is of the opinion that his release should be deferred because: (a) There is a substantial risk that he will not conform to the conditions of parole; (b) His release would depreciate the seriousness of his crime or promote disrespect for law; (c) His release would have a substantially adverse effect on institutional discipline; or (d) His continued correctional treatment, medical care, or vocational or other training in the facility will substantially enhance his capacity to lead a law-abiding life when released at a later date."

144 Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1979).

145 See Bd. of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. 369, 375–76 (1987), discussing Greenholtz.

146 Under Nebraska statutes, hearings were conducted in two stages to determine whether [C57] "The Court made explicit in Hewitt what was implicit in Greenholtz. In evaluating the claims of inmates who had been confined to administrative segregation, it first rejected the inmates' claim of a right to remain in the general population as protected by the Due Process Clause, . . . [noting that] the Due Process Clause, standing alone, confers no liberty interest in freedom from state action taken 'within the sentence imposed.' It then concluded that the transfer to less amenable quarters for non-punitive reasons was ordinarily contemplated by a prison sentence. Examination of the possibility that the State had created a liberty interest by virtue of its prison regulations followed. Instead of looking to whether the State created an interest of 'real substance' comparable to the good time credit scheme of Wolff, the Court asked whether the State had gone beyond issuing mere procedural guidelines and had used 'language of an unmistakably mandatory character' such that the incursion on liberty would not occur 'absent specified substantive predicates.' . . . Finding such mandatory directives in the regulations before it, the Court decided that the State had created a protected liberty interest. It nevertheless, held, as it had in Greenholtz, that the full panoply of procedures conferred in Wolff were unnecessary to safeguard the inmates' interest and, if imposed, would undermine the prison's management objectives."[147] to grant or deny parole: initial review hearings and final parole hearings. Initial review hearings should be held at least once a year for every inmate. At the first stage, the Board of Parole examined the inmate's pre-confinement and post-confinement record and held an informal hearing; the Board interviewed the inmate and considered any letters or statements presented in support of a claim for release. If the Board determined that the inmate was not yet a good risk for release, it denied parole, stating why release was deferred. If the Board determined that the inmate was a likely candidate for release, a final hearing was scheduled, at which the inmate could present evidence, call witnesses, and be represented by counsel. A written statement of the reasons should be given, if parole was denied. The court of appeals required that a formal hearing be held for every inmate eligible for parole and that every adverse parole decision include a statement of the evidence relied upon by the Board. The Court reversed this holding. First, the formal hearing "would provide, at best, a negligible decrease in the risk of error. . . . [Since the Board of Parole's decision at its initial review hearing] is one that must be made largely on the basis of the inmate's file, this procedure adequately safeguards against serious risks of error, and thus satisfies due process. . . . [Second,] nothing in the due process concepts . . . requires the Parole Board to specify the particular 'evidence' in the inmate's file or at his interview on which it rests its discretionary determination to deny release. The Board communicates the reason for its denial as a guide to the inmate for his future behavior. . . . To require the parole authority to provide a summary of the evidence would tend to convert the process into an adversary proceeding and to equate the Board's parole release determination with a guilt determination. . . . The Nebraska procedure affords an opportunity to be heard, and, when parole is denied, it informs the inmate in what respects he falls short of qualifying for parole; this affords the process that is due under these circumstances. "See Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 14–16 (1979).

---

147 See Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 480 (1995), discussing Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 468–72 (1983). In the latter case, the Court held that prison officials were obligated to engage only in an informal, non-adversary review of the information supporting inmates' administrative confinement.

In Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 480–81 (1995), the Court also made the following remarks: "In a series of cases following Hewitt, the Court wrestled with the language of intricate, often rather routine prison guidelines to determine whether mandatory language and substantive predicates created an enforceable expectation that the state would produce a particular outcome with respect to the prisoner's conditions of confinement. In Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 U.S. 238 (1983), the claimants identified prison regulations that required a particular kind [C58] The Court abandoned Hewitt's methodology in Sandin. There, the Court found that Hewitt "has produced at least two undesirable effects." First, it creates disincentives for states to codify prison management procedures in the interest of uniform treatment, for states might avoid creation of "liberty" interests by having scarcely any regulations, or by conferring standardless discretion on correctional personnel. Second, the Hewitt approach had led to the involvement of federal courts in the day-to-day management of prisons, often squandering judicial resources with little off-setting benefit to anyone. Hence, it was contrary to the principle that federal courts ought to afford appropriate deference and flexibility to state officials trying to manage a volatile environment. Such flexibility is especially warranted in the fine-tuning of the ordinary incidents of prison life. In light of these considerations, and following Wolff, Sandin recognized that states may, under certain circumstances, create liberty interests, which are protected by the Due Process Clause, but held that "these interests will be generally limited to freedom from restraint which, while not exceeding the sentence in such an unexpected manner as to give rise to protection by the Due Process Clause of its own force, . . . [148] nonetheless imposes atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[149] of hearing before the prison administrator could, in his discretion, effect an inter-state transfer to another prison. Parsing the language of the regulation led the Court to hold that the discretionary nature of the transfer decision negated any state-created liberty interest. Id. at 249–50. Kentucky Department of Corrections v. Thompson, 490 U.S. 454 (1989), dealt with regulations governing the visitation privileges of inmates. Asserting that a regulation created an absolute right to visitors absent a finding of certain substantive predicates, the inmates sought review of the adequacy of the procedures. . . . [T]he Court determined the regulation left visitor exclusion to the discretion of the officials, and refused to elevate such expectations to the level of a liberty interest. 490 U.S at 464–65."

---

148 See, e.g., para. D30 (transfer to mental hospital), and para. D31 (involuntary administration of psychotropic drugs).

149 Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 483–84 (1995) (emphasis added). The Court concluded that Conner's discipline in segregated confinement did not present the type of atypical, significant deprivation in which a state might conceivably create a liberty interest. The record showed that, at the time of Conner's punishment, "disciplinary segregation, with insignificant exceptions, mirrored those conditions imposed upon inmates in administrative segregation and protective custody. . . . Based on a comparison between inmates inside and outside disciplinary segregation, the State's actions in placing him in disciplinary segregation for 30 days did not work a major disruption in his environment. . . . Nor [did] Conner's situation present a case where the State's action [would] inevitably affect the duration of his sentence. Nothing in [state] law require[d] the parole board to deny parole in the face of a misconduct record or to grant parole in its absence, even though misconduct [wa]s by regulation a relevant consideration. . . . The decision to release a prisoner rest[ed] on a myriad of considerations. And, the prisoner [wa]s afforded procedural protection at his parole hearing in order to explain the circumstances behind his misconduct record. The chance that a finding of misconduct [would] alter the balance [wa]s simply too attenuated to invoke the procedural guarantees of the Due Process Clause." The Court held, therefore, that neither the state prison regulation in question, nor the Due Process Clause itself, afforded Conner a protected liberty interest that would entitle him to the procedural protections set forth in Wolff. "The regime to which he was subjected as a result of the misconduct hearing was within the range of confinement to be normally expected for one serving an indeterminate term of 30 years to life." Id. at 485–87. The dissenters found that Conner had a liberty interest, protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, in avoiding disciplinary confinement. Conner's prison punishment "effected a severe alteration in the conditions of his incarceration. . . . Disciplinary confinement as punishment

B. RIGHT OF ACCESS TO COURTS

1. In General[150]

[C59] The Court has recognized a constitutional right of access to courts, which "assures that no person will be denied the opportunity to present to the judiciary allegations concerning violations of fundamental constitutional rights."[151] The basis of this right is unsettled. Decisions of the Court have grounded the right of access to courts in the Article IV Privileges and Immunities Clause,[152] the First Amendment Petition for 'high misconduct' not only deprives prisoners of privileges for protracted periods; unlike administrative segregation and protective custody, disciplinary confinement also stigmatizes them and diminishes parole prospects." Id. at 488–89, 494.

---

In Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209 (2005), the Court found that inmates had a constitutionally protected liberty interest in avoiding assignment at OSP, Ohio's maximum security prison with highly restrictive conditions, noting that "[f]or an inmate placed in OSP, almost all human contact is prohibited, even to the point that conversation is not permitted from cell to cell; the light, though it may be dimmed, is on for 24 hours; exercise is for 1 hour per day, but only in a small indoor room. Save perhaps for the especially severe limitations on all human contact, these conditions likely would apply to most solitary confinement facilities, but here there are two added components. First is the duration. Unlike the 30-day placement in Sandin, placement at OSP is indefinite and, after an initial 30-day review, is reviewed just annually. Second is that placement disqualifies an otherwise eligible inmate for parole consideration. While any of these conditions standing alone might not be sufficient to create a liberty interest, taken together they impose an atypical and significant hardship within the correctional context." Id. at 223–24. Further, the Court held that the process by which Ohio classified prisoners for placement at OSP provided prisoners with sufficient protection to comply with the Due Process Clause. Under the challenged rules, a prison official conducted a classification review either upon entry into the prison system if the inmate had been convicted of certain offenses, e.g., organized crime, or during the incarceration if the inmate engaged in specified conduct, leading a prison gang. The rules also provided for a three-tier review process after a recommendation that an inmate be placed in OSP. Among other things, the inmate should receive notice of the factual basis leading to consideration for OSP placement and a fair opportunity for rebuttal at a hearing, although he might not call witnesses. In addition, the inmate was invited to submit objections prior to the final level of review. Although a subsequent reviewer could overturn an affirmative recommendation for OSP placement at any level, the reverse was not true; if one reviewer declined to recommend OSP placement, the process terminated. Ohio also provided for a placement review within 30 days of an inmate's initial assignment to OSP, and annual review thereafter. Id. at 225–29.

An inmate seeking commutation of a life sentence has no protected liberty interest in release from lawful confinement. See Connecticut Bd. of Pardons v. Dumschat, 452 U.S. 458, 461, 464 (1981). But it is incorrect to say that a prisoner has been deprived of all interest in his life before his execution. Thus, some minimal procedural safeguards apply to clemency proceedings, where the clemency decision is entrusted to executive discretion. See Ohio Adult Parole Auth. v. Woodard, 523 U.S. 272, 289 (1998) (concurring opinion of Justice O'Connor, with whom Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., joined); id. at 290–93 (opinion of Justice Stevens). "Judicial intervention might, for example, be warranted in the face of a scheme whereby a state official flipped a coin to determine whether to grant clemency, or in a case where the State arbitrarily denied a prisoner any access to its clemency process." Id. at 289 (opinion of Justice O'Connor).

150 See also paras. B88 et seq. (constitutional torts, sovereign immunity).

151 Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 579 (1974).

152 Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co., 207 U.S. 142, 148 (1907); Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 249 (1898).

Clause,[153] the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause,[154] and the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection[155] and Due Process Clauses.[156]

[C60] There are two categories of cases on denial of access to courts. "In the first are claims that systemic official action frustrates a plaintiff or plaintiff class in preparing and filing suits at the present time."[157] "Thus, in the prison-litigation cases, the relief sought may be a law library for a prisoner's use in preparing a case"[158] "or a reader for an illiterate prisoner, . . . or simply a lawyer."[159] "In 'denial-of-access' cases challenging filing fees that poor plaintiffs cannot afford to pay, the object is an order requiring waiver of a fee to open the courthouse door for desired litigation, such as direct appeals or federal habeas petitions in criminal cases,"[160] "or civil suits asserting family-law rights."[161] "In cases of this sort, the essence of the access claim is that official action is presently denying an opportunity to litigate for a class of potential plaintiffs. The opportunity has not been lost for all time, however, but only in the short term; the object of the denial-of-access suit, and the justification for recognizing that claim, is to place the plaintiff in a position to pursue a separate claim for relief once the frustrating condition has been removed."[162] "The second category covers claims not in aid of a class of suits yet to be litigated, but of specific cases that cannot now be tried (or tried with all material evidence), no matter what official action may be in the future. The official acts claimed to have denied access may allegedly have caused the loss or inadequate settlement of a meritorious case, . . . the loss of an opportunity to sue, . . . or the loss of an opportunity to seek some particular order of relief. . . . These cases do not look forward to a class of future litigation, but backward to a time when specific litigation ended poorly, or could not have commenced, or could have produced a remedy subsequently unobtainable. The ultimate object of these sorts of access claims, then, is not the judgment in a further lawsuit, but simply the judgment in the access claim itself, in providing relief obtainable in no other suit in the future."[163]

---

153 Be & K Constr. Co. v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 536 U.S. 516 (2002); Bill Johnson's Rests., Inc. v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 461 U.S. 731, 741 (1983); California Motor Transp. Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510, 513 (1972).

154 Murray v. Giarratano, 492 U.S. 1, 11 n.6 (1989), (plurality opinion); Walters v. Nat'l Ass'n of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305, 335 (1985).

155 Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 557 (1987).

156 Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 576, 579 (1974); Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 380–81 (1971).

157 Christopher v. Harbury, 536 U.S. 403, 413 (2002).

158 Id. at 413, citing Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817, 828 (1977). To establish a Bounds violation, an inmate must demonstrate that the alleged shortcomings in the prison library or legal assistance program have hindered his efforts to pursue a non-frivolous legal claim. This requirement derives ultimately from the doctrine of standing. See Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 351–53 (1996).

159 Id. 413, citing Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 346–48 (1996).

160 Id. at 413, citing Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708, 713–14 (1961) (filing fee for habeas petitions); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252, 255–58 (1959) (fee for direct appeal in a criminal case); Mayer v. Chicago, 404 U.S. 189, 195–96 (1971) (same, as to petty crime); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 16–20 (1956) (transcript fee for appellate review in a criminal case).

161 Id. at 413, citing Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U. S. 371, 372 (1971) (divorce filing fee); M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U. S. 102, 106–07 (1996) (record fee in parental-rights termination action).

162 Christopher v. Harbury, 536 U.S. 403, 413 (2002).

163 Id. at 413–14.

[C61] "While the circumstances thus vary, the ultimate justification for recognizing each kind of claim is the same. Whether an access claim turns on a litigating opportunity yet to be gained or an opportunity already lost, the very point of recognizing any access claim is to provide some effective vindication for a separate and distinct right to seek judicial relief for some wrong. . . . [Hence, the right of access to courts] is ancillary to the underlying claim, without which a plaintiff cannot have suffered injury by being shut out of court. [The Court] indicated as much in Lewis v. Casey, where [it] noted that even in forward-looking prisoner class actions to remove roadblocks to future litigation, the named plaintiff must identify a 'non-frivolous,' 'arguable' underlying claim, . . . and [there is] no reason to treat backward-looking access claims any differently in this respect. It follows that the underlying cause of action, whether anticipated or lost, is an element that must be described in the complaint, just as much as allegations must describe the official acts frustrating the litigation. It follows, too, that when the access claim . . . looks backward, the complaint must identify a remedy that may be awarded as recompense but not otherwise available in some suit that may yet be brought. There is, after all, no point in spending time and money to establish the facts constituting denial of access when a plaintiff would end up just as well off after litigating a simpler case without the 'denial of access' element."[164]

2. Indigents' Access to Judicial Processes

a. Generally

[C62] The Court's decisions "concerning indigents' access to judicial processes reflect both equal protection and due process concerns;"[165] in cases of this order, "due process and equal protection principles converge."[166] "'Due process' emphasizes fairness between the State and the individual dealing with the State, regardless of how other individuals in the same situation may be treated. 'Equal protection,' on the other hand, emphasizes disparity in treatment by a State between classes of individuals whose situations are arguably indistinguishable;"[167] "[t]he equal protection concern relates to the legitimacy of fencing out would-be litigants and appellants based solely on their inability to pay core costs."[168] In this area, the Court "inspect[s] the character and intensity

---

[164] Christopher v. Harbury, 536 U.S. 403, 414–15 (2002).

Although those who petition government for redress are generally immune from anti-trust liability, such immunity is withheld when petitioning activity "ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, is a mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly" with a competitor's business relationships. See E. R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 144 (1961). In Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 60–61 (1993), the Court adopted a two-part definition of sham anti-trust litigation: first, it "must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits;" second, the litigant's subjective motivation must "concea[l] an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor . . . through the use [of] the governmental process—as opposed to the outcome of that process—as an anti-competitive weapon."

[165] M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 120 (1996).

[166] Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660, 665 (1983).

[167] Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 609 (1974).

[168] See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 120 (1996).

Most decisions concerning access to appeal rest on an equal protection framework, for "due of the individual interest at stake, on the one hand, and the State's justification for its exaction, on the other."[169]

b. In Criminal Cases[170]

[C63] Griffin involved an Illinois rule that effectively conditioned thoroughgoing appeals from criminal convictions on the defendant's procurement of a transcript of trial proceedings. Indigent defendants, other than those sentenced to death, were not excepted from the rule, so, in most cases, defendants without means to pay for a transcript had no access to appellate review at all. "Although the Federal Constitution guarantees no right to appellate review, . . . once a State affords that right, Griffin held, the State 'may not bolt the door to equal justice.'"[171]

[C64] Griffin and succeeding decisions regarding an indigent defendant's access to appellate review of a conviction[172] "stand for the proposition that a State cannot arbi-process does not independently require that the State provide a right to appeal." See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 120 (1996).

---

[169] Id. Court "fee requirements ordinarily are examined only for rationality. . . . The State's need for revenue to off-set costs, in the mine run of cases, satisfies the rationality requirement; . . . States are not forced by the Constitution to adjust all tolls to account for disparity in material circumstances." Id. at 123 (emphasis added).

[170] See also paras. C79, C87 (right to counsel during custodial interrogation); paras. C92 et seq. (right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment).

[171] See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 110 (1996), discussing Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 18, 24 (1956). The Griffin plurality recognized "the importance of appellate review to a correct adjudication of guilt or innocence." Id. at 18. Judging the Illinois rule inconsonant with the Fourteenth Amendment, "the Griffin plurality drew support from the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses." See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 110 (1996), citing Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 13, 18 (1956). Justice Frankfurter, concurring in the judgment in Griffin, emphasized and explained the decision's equal protection underpinning as follows: "Of course, a State need not equalize economic conditions. . . . But when a State deems it wise and just that convictions be susceptible to review by an appellate court, it cannot, by force of its exactions, draw a line which precludes convicted indigent persons, forsooth erroneously convicted, from securing such a review." Id. at 23.

"Griffin did not impose an inflexible requirement that a State provide a full trial transcript to an indigent defendant pursuing an appeal." See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 112, n.5 (1996), citing Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 20 (1956) (state need not "purchase a stenographer's transcript in every case where an indigent defendant cannot buy it. The [state] Supreme Court may find other means of affording adequate and effective appellate review to indigent defendants."). In Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963), the Court invalidated a state rule that tied an indigent defendant's ability to obtain a transcript at public expense to the trial judge's finding that the defendant's appeal was not frivolous. It emphasized, however, that the Griffin requirement is not rigid. "Alternative methods of reporting trial proceedings," the Court observed, "are permissible if they place before the appellate court an equivalent report of the events at trial from which the appellant's contentions arise." Id. at 495. Moreover, the Court held, an indigent defendant is entitled only to those parts of the trial record that are "germane to consideration of the appeal." Id. See also Mayer v. Chicago, 404 U.S. 189, 194 (1971) ("A record of sufficient completeness does not translate automatically into a complete verbatim transcript.").

[172] See, e.g., Williams v. Oklahoma City, 395 U.S. 458, 458–59 (1969) (per curiam) (transcript needed to perfect appeal must be furnished at state expense to indigent defendant sen-

trarily cut off appeal rights for indigents while leaving open avenues of appeal for more affluent persons."[173] In Douglas v. California, however, "the Court departed somewhat from the limited doctrine of the transcript and fee cases and undertook an examination of whether an indigent's access to the appellate system was adequate. The Court in Douglas concluded that a State does not fulfill its responsibility toward indigent defendants merely by waiving its own requirements that a convicted defendant procure a transcript or pay a fee in order to appeal, and held that the State must go further and provide counsel for the indigent on his first appeal as of right. . . . [More specifically, Douglas] held unconstitutional California's requirement that counsel on appeal would be appointed for an indigent only if the appellate court determined that such appointment would be helpful to the defendant or to the court itself. The Court noted that, under this system, an indigent's case was initially reviewed on the merits, without the benefit of any organization or argument by counsel. By contrast, persons of greater means were not faced with the preliminary 'ex parte examination of the record,' . . . but had their arguments presented to the court in fully briefed form."[174] Consequently, "where the record [wa]s unclear or the errors [we]re hidden, the indigent ha[d] only the right to a meaningless ritual, while the rich man ha[d] a meaningful appeal."[175] Further, relying on Douglas, the Court held, in Halbert v. Michigan, that the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses required the appointment of counsel for defendants, convicted on their pleas, who sought access to first-tier discretionary review in the Michigan Court of Appeals.[176] tenced to 90 days in jail and a $50 fine for drunk driving); Long v. Dist. Court of Iowa, Lee County, 385 U.S. 192, 192–94 (1966) (per curiam) (transcript must be furnished at state expense to enable indigent state habeas corpus petitioner to appeal denial of relief); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708, 708–09 (1961) (filing fee to process state habeas corpus application must be waived for indigent prisoner); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252, 253, 257–58 (1959) (filing fee for motion for leave to appeal from judgment of intermediate appellate court to state supreme court must be waived when defendant is indigent).

---

[173] Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 607 (1974). See also Rinaldi v. Yeager, 384 U.S. 305, 310 (1966), (avenues of appellate review "must be kept free of unreasoned distinctions that can only impede open and equal access to the courts").

Mayer v. Chicago, 404 U.S. 189 (1971), involved an indigent defendant convicted on nonfelony charges of violating two city ordinances. Fined $250 for each offense, the defendant petitioned for a transcript to support his appeal. He alleged prosecutorial misconduct and insufficient evidence to convict. The state provided free transcripts for indigent appellants in felony cases only. The Court declined to limit Griffin to cases in which the defendant faced incarceration. "The invidiousness of the discrimination that exists when criminal procedures are made available only to those who can pay," the Court said in Mayer, "is not erased by any differences in the sentences that may be imposed." Id. at 197. Petty offenses can entail serious collateral consequences. Id. at 197.

[174] See Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 607–08 (1974), discussing Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963).

[175] Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 358 (1963).

[176] Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. 429 (2005). In so holding, the Court stressed, first, that the Michigan Court of Appeals, in ruling on an application for leave to appeal, looked to the merits of the appellant's claims, providing the first, and likely the only, direct review of the defendant's conviction and sentence, and, second, that indigent defendants pursuing first-tier review in the court of appeals were generally ill equipped to represent themselves.

Scope of court-appointed appellate counsel's duty to an indigent client. An indigent's right to counsel on direct appeal "does not include the right to bring a frivolous appeal and, concomitantly, [C65] Nevertheless, "the duty of the State . . . is not to duplicate the legal arsenal that may be privately retained by a criminal defendant in a continuing effort to reverse his conviction, but only to assure the indigent defendant an adequate opportunity to present his claims fairly in the context of the State's appellate process." Ross thus held that neither the fundamental fairness required by the Due Process Clause nor the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantee necessitated that states provide counsel in state discretionary appeals where defendants already had one appeal as of right.[177] Similarly, in Finley, the Court decided that there is no right to counsel in state collateral proceedings after exhaustion of direct appellate review.[178]

---

does not include the right to counsel for bringing a frivolous appeal." See Smith v. Robbins, 528 U.S. 259, 278 (2000). Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967), held that a court may not permit appointed counsel to withdraw from a criminal appeal on the basis of the bald assertion that "there is no merit to the appeal." Central to the Court's analysis was the constitutional imperative to assure penniless defendants the same rights and opportunities on appeal—as nearly as is practicable—as are enjoyed by those persons who are in a similar situation but who are able to afford the retention of private counsel. Id. at 745. This "constitutional requirement of substantial equality and fair process," the Court held, "can only be attained where counsel acts in the role of an active advocate in behalf of his client, as opposed to that of amicus curiae." Id. at 744 (emphasis added). Further, the Court set out what would be an acceptable procedure for treating frivolous appeals: "[I]f counsel finds his case to be wholly frivolous, after a conscientious examination of it, he should so advise the court and request permission to withdraw. That request must, however, be accompanied by a brief referring to anything in the record that might arguably support the appeal. A copy of counsel's brief should be furnished the indigent and time allowed him to raise any points that he chooses; the court—not counsel—then proceeds, after a full examination of all the proceedings, to decide whether the case is wholly frivolous. If it so finds, it may grant counsel's request to withdraw and dismiss the appeal insofar as federal requirements are concerned, or proceed to a decision on the merits, if state law so requires. On the other hand, it if finds any of the legal points arguable on their merits (and therefore not frivolous), it must, prior to decision, afford the indigent the assistance of counsel to argue the appeal." Id. at 744.

In Smith v. Robbins, 528 U.S. 259 (2000), the Court made clear that the procedure sketched in Anders is a prophylactic one and that the states are free to adopt different procedures, so long as those procedures adequately safeguard a defendant's right to appellate counsel. Subsequently, it upheld a procedure under which counsel neither explicitly stated that his review had led him to conclude that an appeal would be frivolous nor requested to withdraw but remained silent on the merits of the case and offered to brief issues at the court's direction.

In Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745 (1983), the Court held that appellate counsel who files a merits brief need not (and should not) raise every non-frivolous claim, but rather may select from among them in order to maximize the likelihood of success on appeal.

[177] Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 616 (1974).

[178] Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 556–57 (1987).

The indigent defendant's right to expert services. Applying the Mathews balancing test, the Court held, in Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68, 78–83 (1985), that the Constitution requires that an indigent defendant have access to the psychiatric examination and assistance necessary to prepare an effective defense based on his mental condition, when his sanity at the time of the offense is seriously in question. Hence, when the prosecutor presents psychiatric evidence of an indigent defendant's future dangerousness in a capital sentencing proceeding, due process requires that the state provide the defendant with the assistance of an independent psychiatrist. In Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 444–45 (1992), the Court noted that the holding in Ake "can be understood as an expansion of earlier due process cases holding that an indigent criminal defendant is entitled to the minimum assistance necessary to assure him 'a fair opportunity to present his defense' and 'to participate meaningfully in [the] judicial proceeding.'"

c. In Civil Cases

[C66] The Court has "recognized a narrow category of civil cases in which the State must provide access to its judicial processes without regard to a party's ability to pay court fees."[179] Boddie held that the state could not deny a divorce to a married couple based on their inability to pay approximately $60 in court costs. Crucial to the Court's decision was the fundamental interest at stake. "[G]iven the basic position of the marriage relationship in the society's hierarchy of values and the concomitant state monopolization of the means for legally dissolving this relationship," the Court held that due process "prohibit[s] a State from denying, solely because of inability to pay, access to its courts to individuals who seek judicial dissolution of their marriages."[180]

[C67] Little held that the Due Process Clause required the states to provide a free blood grouping test to an indigent defendant in a paternity action. The Court observed that, "[a]part from the putative father's pecuniary interest in avoiding a substantial support obligation and liberty interest threatened by the possible sanctions for noncompliance at issue is the creation of a parent-child relationship. This Court frequently has stressed the importance of familial bonds, whether or not legitimized by marriage, and accorded them constitutional protection. Just as the termination of such bonds demands procedural fairness, so too does their imposition."[181]

[C68] M.L.B. held that a state could not, consistent with the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, condition appeals from trial court decrees terminating parental rights on the affected parent's ability to pay record preparation fees.[182] Lassiter concerned the appointment of counsel for indigent persons seeking to defend against the state's termination of their parental status. The Court held that "appointed counsel was not routinely required to assure a fair adjudication; instead, a case-by-case determination of the need for counsel would suffice, an assessment to be made 'in the first instance by the trial court, subject . . . to appellate review.'"[183]

[C69] In Kras, "the Court clarified that a constitutional requirement to waive court fees in civil cases is the exception, not the general rule."[184] Kras concerned fees, totaling $50, required to secure a discharge in bankruptcy. The Court noted that bankruptcy discharge entails no "fundamental interest." Although "obtaining [a] desired new start in life [is] important," that interest, the Court explained, "does not rise to the same constitutional level as the interest in establishing or dissolving a marriage." And in contrast with divorce, bankruptcy is not the only method available to a debtor for the adjustment of his legal relationship with his creditors.[185]

[C70] In Ortwein, the Court adhered to the line drawn in Kras. The appellants in Ortwein sought court review of agency determinations reducing their welfare benefits. Alleging poverty, they challenged, as applied to them, an Oregon statute requiring appellants in civil cases to pay a $25 fee. The Court summarily affirmed the Oregon Supreme

---

179 M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 113 (1996).

180 Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 374 (1971).

181 Little v. Streater, 452 U.S. 1 (1981).

182 M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 119–24 (1996). See, in extenso, para. F32.

183 See M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 117 (1996), discussing Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 32 (1981). See, in extenso, para. F31.

184 M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 114 (1996).

185 United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 445–46 (1973).

Court's judgment rejecting appellants' challenge. As in Kras, the Court saw no "fundamental interest . . . gained or lost depending on the availability" of the relief sought by the complainants. Absent a fundamental interest or classification attracting heightened scrutiny, the applicable equal protection standard was that of rational justification. The fee produced some revenue to assist the state in offsetting the expenses of its court system. Appellants did not contend that the fee was disproportionate or that it was not an effective means to accomplish the state's goal. Hence, the requirement of rationality was met. At the same time, the Court expressly rejected the argument that a fee waiver was required for all civil appeals, because the state permitted in forma pauperis filings in special classes of cases (criminal appeals, habeas corpus petitions from state institutions or civil commitment proceedings, and appeals from terminations of parental rights, including appeals from terminations of parental rights). In so doing, the Court noted that "if the Oregon courts have interpreted the applicable law to give special rights in the criminal area, in civil cases that result in loss of liberty, and in cases terminating parental rights, we cannot say that this categorization is capricious or arbitrary."[186]

[C71] Lindsey addressed the constitutionality of an Oregon statute that required tenants challenging eviction proceedings to post a bond of twice the amount of rent expected to accrue pending appellate review. The bond was forfeited to the landlord if the lower court decision was affirmed. The Court held that the double-bond requirement violated the Equal Protection Clause. For one thing, it was "unrelated to actual rent accrued or to specific damage sustained by the landlord." For another thing, the requirement, which burdened only tenants, including tenants whose appeals were nonfrivolous, erected "a substantial barrier to appeal faced by no other civil litigant in Oregon." The Court therefore concluded that the requirement bore no reasonable relationship to any valid state objective, and that it discriminated against the class of tenants appealing from adverse decisions in wrongful detainer actions in an arbitrary and irrational fashion. In so holding, the Court pointed out that the classification disadvantaged non-indigent, as well as indigent, appellants.[187]

---

[186] Ortwein v. Schwab, 410 U.S. 656, 659–61 (1973) (per curiam).

[187] Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 76–79 (1972).

In Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 551–53 (1949), the Court upheld, against a due process and equal protection challenge, a state law that required a shareholder who wished to file a shareholder's derivative suit but who owned less than 5 percent of the corporation's stock or whose stock was worth less than $50,000 to file, as a pre-condition to bringing the suit, a bond for the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, that might be incurred by defendants. The purpose of the security requirement was to protect the corporation from being injured by "strike suits" that harmed the very interests that plaintiffs claimed to be protecting.

In Bankers Life & Casualty Co. v. Crenshaw, 486 U.S. 71, 84–85 (1988), the Court upheld, against an equal protection challenge, a Mississippi statute imposing a 15-percent penalty on parties who appealed unsuccessfully from a money judgment. The statute passed constitutional muster under the rational basis test, since it was reasonably tailored to achieve the state's legitimate objectives of discouraging frivolous appeals, compensating appellees for the intangible costs of litigation, and conserving judicial resources. The statute posed little danger of discouraging meritorious appeals along with insubstantial ones, since the 15-percent penalty operated only after a judgment had been affirmed without modification and represented a relatively modest additional assessment.

C. JURY TRIAL IN CIVIL CASES[188]

[C72] The Seventh Amendment provides that "[i]n suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." "On its face, this language is not directed to jury characteristics, such as size, but rather defines the kind of cases for which jury trial is preserved."[189] The Seventh Amendment "bears not only on the allocation of trial functions between judge and jury, . . . [but] also controls the allocation of authority to review verdicts."[190] The Amendment "exacts a trial by jury according to the course of the common law—that is, by a unanimous verdict"[191] and applies only to proceedings in federal court, not in state court.[192]

[C73] The right of trial by jury, thus preserved, is the right that existed under the English common law when the Amendment was adopted. Hence, the Court's interpretation of the Amendment has been guided by historical analysis comprising two principal inquiries. The Court asks, first, whether it is "dealing with a cause of action that either was tried at law at the time of the founding or is at least analogous to one that was. If the action in question belongs in the law category, [the Court] then ask[s] whether the particular trial decision must fall to the jury in order to preserve the substance of the common law right as it existed in 1791."[193]

---

188 See also para. C30 (taking of property).

189 Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 152 (1973). There the Court upheld a federal court rule providing that a jury for the trial of civil cases will consist of six persons.

190 Gasperini v. Ctr. for Humanities, Inc., 518 U.S. 415, 432 (1996). There the Court held that the Seventh Amendment's re-examination clause does not inhibit the authority of trial judges to grant new trials "for any of the reasons for which new trials have heretofore been granted in actions at law in the courts of the United States" and does not preclude appellate review, confined to abuse of discretion, of the trial judge's denial of a motion to set aside a jury verdict as excessive.

191 Minneapolis & St. Louis R.R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U.S. 211, 216 (1916).

192 See, e.g., Gasperini v. Ctr. for Humanities, Inc., 518 U.S. 415, 418 (1996).

193 Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 517 U.S. 370, 376 (1996).

With respect to the first inquiry, the Court has held that "suits at common law" include "not merely suits, which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but also suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized, and equitable remedies were administered. . . . The Seventh Amendment thus applies not only to common law causes of action, but also to statutory causes of action analogous to common law causes of action ordinarily decided in English law courts in the late 18th century, as opposed to those customarily heard by courts of equity or admiralty." See City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes at Monterey, Ltd., 526 U.S. 687, 708–09 (1999). There, the Court held that a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 suit, seeking legal relief, is an action at law within the meaning of the Seventh Amendment.

With regard to the second question (whether the particular trial issue is necessarily a jury issue), the Court has referred to the distinction between substance and procedure, and has also spoken of the line as one between issues of fact and law. See Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 517 U.S. 370, 378 (1996), citing Baltimore & Carolina Line v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 657 (1935); Ex parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300, 309–10 (1920). But the sounder course is to compare the modern practice to historical sources. Where there is no exact antecedent in the common law, the modern practice should be compared to earlier practices whose allocation to court or jury is known, and the best analogy that can be drawn between an old and the new must be

D. THE FIFTH AMENDMENT'S PRIVILEGE AGAINST COMPULSORY SELF-INCRIMINATION

1. General Considerations

[C74] The Fifth Amendment states that "[n]o person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The Fifth Amendment's Self-Incrimination Clause is incorporated in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and thus applies to the states.[194] The Court has held that the privilege against self-incrimination "not only permits a person to refuse to testify against himself at a criminal trial in which he is a defendant, but also privileges him not to answer official questions put to him in any other proceeding, civil or criminal, formal or informal, where the answers might incriminate him in future criminal proceedings."[195] The privilege afforded not only extends "to answers that would, in themselves, support a conviction under a criminal statute, . . . but likewise embraces those which would furnish a link in the chain of evidence needed to prosecute the claimant for a crime."[196]

[C75] To qualify for the Fifth Amendment privilege, a communication must be testimonial, incriminating, and compelled. "[T]o be testimonial, an accused's communication must itself, explicitly or implicitly, relate a factual assertion or disclose information."[197] By contrast, the privilege does not protect a suspect from being com-sought. Thus, the Court searches the English common law for "appropriate analogies," rather than a "precisely analogous" common law cause of action. See Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 517 U.S. 370, 377–78 (1996). In that case, the Court addressed the question whether the interpretation of a so-called patent claim, the portion of the patent document that defines the scope of the patentee's rights, is a matter of law reserved entirely for the court or subject to a Seventh Amendment guarantee that a jury will determine the meaning of any disputed term of art about which expert testimony is offered. The Court concluded that the construction of a patent, including terms of art within its claim, is exclusively within the province of the court.

---

Congress may devise novel causes of action involving "public rights" free from the strictures of the Seventh Amendment if it assigns their adjudication to tribunals without statutory authority to employ juries as fact finders. But it lacks the power to strip parties contesting matters of private right of their constitutional right to a trial by jury. For these purposes, a "public right" is not limited to a matter arising between the government and others but extends to a seemingly "private" right that is closely intertwined with a federal regulatory program that Congress has power to enact. See Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33, 51–55 (1989).

194 Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 6–11 (1964).

195 Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420, 426 (1984). Concern with prosecution by a foreign nation is beyond the scope of the Self-Incrimination Clause.

196 Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486 (1951).

"It is well established that a witness, in a single proceeding, may not testify voluntarily about a subject and then invoke the privilege against self-incrimination when questioned about the details. See Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314, 321 (1999), citing Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367, 373 (1951). "The justifications for the rule of waiver in the testimonial context are evident: a witness may not pick and choose what aspects of a particular subject to discuss without casting doubt on the trustworthiness of the statements and diminishing the integrity of the factual inquiry." See Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314, 322 (1999). As noted in Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367, 371 (1951), a contrary rule "would open the way to distortion of facts by permitting a witness to select any stopping place in the testimony." As the Court said in Brown v. United States, 356 U.S. 148, 156 (1958), it would "make of the Fifth Amendment not only a humane safeguard against judicially coerced self-disclosure, but a positive invitation to mutilate the truth a party offers to tell."

197 Doe v. United States, 487 U.S. 201, 210 (1988). "Whenever a suspect is asked for a pelled by the government to produce real or physical evidence.[198] Thus, a suspect may be compelled to furnish a blood sample,[199] to provide a handwriting exemplar,[200] or a voice exemplar,[201] to stand in a line-up,[202] and to wear particular clothing.[203] The Court "held that the privilege was not implicated in each of those cases, because the suspect was not required 'to disclose any knowledge he might have,' or 'to speak his guilt.'"[204] Similarly, "the fact that incriminating evidence may be the byproduct of obedience to a regulatory requirement," such as filing an income tax return,[205] maintaining required records,[206] or response requiring him to communicate an express or implied assertion of fact or belief, the suspect confronts the 'trilemma' of truth, falsity, or silence, and hence the response (whether based on truth or falsity) contains a testimonial component." See Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582, 597 (1990). A drunk-driving suspect's response to a question regarding the date of his sixth birthday is testimonial, because he is required to communicate an assertion of fact and, thus, is confronted with the above trilemma. Id. at 598–99.

---

198 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 764 (1966).

199 Id. at 765.

200 Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 266–267 (1967).

201 United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 7 (1973). "[A]ny slurring of speech and other evidence of lack of muscular coordination revealed by [one's] responses . . . constitute nontestimonial components of those responses. Requiring a suspect to reveal the physical manner in which he articulates words, like requiring him to reveal the physical properties of the sound of his voice . . . , does not, without more, compel him to provide a 'testimonial' response for purposes of the privilege." See Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582, 592 (1990).

202 United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 221–22 (1967).

203 Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245, 252–53 (1910).

204 See Doe v. United States, 487 U.S. 201, 210–11 (1988), citing United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 222–23 (1967); United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 7 (1973); Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 266–67 (1967).

205 United States v. Sullivan, 274 U.S. 259 (1927). The Court pointed out that "[I]f the form of return provided called for answers that the defendant was privileged from making, he could have raised the objection in the return, but could not on that account refuse to make any return at all." Id. at 263.

206 Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1 (1948). There, the Court considered an application of the Emergency Price Control Act and a regulation issued thereunder that required licensed businesses to maintain records and make them available for inspection by administrators. The Court indicated that no Fifth Amendment protection attached to production of the "required records," which the "defendant was required to keep, not for his private uses, but for the benefit of the public, and for public inspection." Id. at 17–18. The Court's discussion of the constitutional implications of the scheme focused upon the relation between the government's regulatory objectives and the government's interest in gaining access to the records in Shapiro's possession: "It may be assumed at the outset that there are limits which the Government cannot constitutionally exceed in requiring the keeping of records which may be inspected by an administrative agency and may be used in prosecuting statutory violations committed by the recordkeeper himself. But no serious misgiving that those bounds have been overstepped would appear to be evoked when there is a sufficient relation between the activity sought to be regulated and the public concern so that the Government can constitutionally regulate or forbid the basic activity concerned, and can constitutionally require the keeping of particular records, subject to inspection by the Administrator." Id. at 32.

In Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968), the Court held that a plea of the Fifth Amendment privilege provided a complete defense to a prosecution for failure to register and pay the occupational tax on wagers required by federal legislation. The Court noted that wagering was a crime in almost every state and that federal law required that lists of wagering taxpayers be furnished to state and local prosecutors on demand. The Court concluded that reporting an accident,[207] "does not clothe such required conduct with the testimonial privilege."[208] Moreover, "a person may be required to produce specific documents even though they contain incriminating assertions of fact or belief, because the creation of those documents was not 'compelled' within the meaning of the privilege."[209] Nevertheless, "the act of producing subpoenaed documents may have a compelled testimonial aspect." That act, as well as a custodian's compelled testimony about whether he has produced everything demanded, "may certainly communicate information about the documents' existence, custody, and authenticity."[210] compliance with the statute would have subjected petitioner to a real and appreciable risk of self-incrimination. It further recognized that the occupational tax was not imposed in "an essentially noncriminal and regulatory area" but was "directed to a selective group inherently suspect of criminal activities." The Court found that it would be inappropriate to impose restrictions on use of the information collected under the statute—a course urged by the government as a means of removing the impact of the statute upon the privilege against self-incrimination—because of the evident congressional purpose to provide aid to prosecutors. It noted that, unlike the petitioner in Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1 (1948), Marchetti was not required to supply information that had a "public aspect" or was contained in records of the kind he customarily kept.

---

[207] California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424 (1971). There the Court upheld a California law making it a crime to leave the scene of an automobile accident without giving one's name and address. The plurality found it significant that the law "was not intended to facilitate criminal convictions, but to promote the satisfaction of civil liabilities" and was not aimed at a "highly selective group inherently suspect of criminal activities." Id. at 430. Similarly, Justice Harlan, in his concurring opinion, stressed "the noncriminal governmental purpose in securing the information, the necessity for self-reporting as a means of securing the information, and the [limited] nature of the required disclosures," which left the accusatorial burden upon the state. Id. at 458.

[208] United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 35 (2000). Likewise, a mother who is the custodian of her child pursuant to a court order may not invoke the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination to resist a subsequent court order to produce the child, that has been abused. See Baltimore City Dep't of Soc. Servs. v. Bouknight, 493 U.S. 549 (1990).

[209] See United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 35–36 (2000), citing Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976). That decision dealt with summonses issued by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) seeking working papers used in the preparation of tax returns. Because the papers had been voluntarily prepared prior to the issuance of the summonses, they could not "be said to contain compelled testimonial evidence, either of the taxpayers or of anyone else." Accordingly, the taxpayer could not "avoid compliance with the subpoena merely by asserting that the item of evidence which he [wa]s required to produce contain[ed] incriminating writing, whether his own or that of someone else." Id. at 409–10.

[210] United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 36–37 (2000).

Corporations and other artificial entities are not protected by the Fifth Amendment. See, e.g., United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694, 701 (1944) (labor union has no privilege). "Individuals, when acting as representatives of a collective group, cannot be said to be exercising their personal rights and duties, nor to be entitled to their purely personal privileges. . . . In their official capacity, therefore, they have no privilege against self-incrimination. And the official records and documents of the organization that are held by them in a representative, rather than in a personal, capacity cannot be the subject of the personal privilege against self-incrimination, even though production of the papers might tend to incriminate them personally." See Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99, 110–11 (1988), quoting United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694, 699 (1944). "Because the custodian acts as a representative, the act is deemed one of the corporation, and not the individual. Therefore, [the government] may make no evidentiary use of the [C76] The Fifth Amendment prohibits only compelled testimony that is incriminating. It has "long been settled that [the Fifth Amendment's] protection encompasses compelled statements that lead to the discovery of incriminating evidence even though the statements themselves are not incriminating and are not introduced into evidence;"[211] "incriminating" the Court has meant disclosures that "could be used in a criminal prosecution or could lead to other evidence that might be so used."[212] The government can compel testimony from an unwilling witness who invokes the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination by conferring immunity from use of the compelled testimony and evidence derived therefrom in subsequent criminal proceedings, as "such immunity from use and derivative use is coextensive with the scope of the privilege and is sufficient to compel testimony over a claim of the privilege." When a person is prosecuted for matters related to immunized testimony, the prosecution has an "affirmative duty to prove that the evidence it proposes to use is derived from a legitimate source wholly independent of the compelled testimony." This ensures that the grant of immunity leaves the witness and the government in substantially the same position as if the witness had claimed his privilege in the grant's absence.[213]

[C77] The Fifth Amendment protects against compulsory self-incrimination. A statement cannot be considered voluntary if it is not the product of free choice.[214] Thus, when a state "compels testimony by threatening to inflict potent sanctions unless the constitutional privilege is surrendered, that testimony is obtained in violation of the Fifth Amendment and cannot be used against the declarant in a subsequent criminal prosecution."[215] In Garrity, for example, police officers under investigation were told that, if they declined to answer potentially incriminating questions, they would be removed from office, but that any answers they did give could be used against them in a criminal prosecution. The Court held that statements given under such circumstances were made involuntarily and could not be used to convict the officers of crime.[216] The

---

'individual act' against the individual. For example, in a criminal prosecution against the custodian, the Government may not introduce into evidence before the jury the fact that the subpoena was served upon and the corporation's documents were delivered by one particular individual, the custodian. The Government has the right, however, to use the corporation's act of production against the custodian. . . . The jury may draw from the corporation's act of production the conclusion that the records in question are authentic corporate records, which the corporation possessed, and which it produced in response to the subpoena. And if the defendant held a prominent position within the corporation that produced the records, the jury may, just as it would had someone else produced the documents, reasonably infer that he had possession of the documents or knowledge of their contents." See Braswell, supra, at 118.

[211] Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 195 (2004), quoting United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 37 (2000). In the former case, the Court held that "[a]nswering a request to disclose a name is likely to be so insignificant as to be incriminating only in unusual circumstances."

[212] Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 195 (2004), quoting Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 445 (1972).

[213] Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 453, 460, 462 (1972).

[214] See also para. B57.

[215] Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801, 805 (1977).

[216] Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967).

The issue in Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968), was whether the state might discharge a police officer who, after he was summoned before a grand jury to testify about the perform-

Fifth Amendment also prohibits indirect compulsion effected by comments on a defendant's refusal to testify. In Griffin, the trial court instructed the jury that it was free to take the defendant's failure to deny or explain facts within his knowledge as tending to indicate the truth of the prosecution's case. The Court held that such a comment, by "solemniz[ing] the silence of the accused into evidence against him," unconstitutionally "cuts down on the privilege [against self-incrimination] by making its assertion costly."[217]

---

ance of his official duties and was advised of his right against compulsory self-incrimination, then refused to waive that right as requested by the state. Conceding that appellant could be discharged for refusing to answer questions about the performance of his official duties, if not required to waive immunity, the Court held that the officer could not be terminated, as he was, for refusing to waive his constitutional privilege.

In Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801 (1977), the Court held that a political party officer cannot be removed from his position by the state and barred for five years from holding any other party or public office, because he has refused to waive his constitutional privilege against compelled self-incrimination.

[217] Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 614 (1965).

In Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), the defendants, after being arrested for selling marijuana, received their Miranda warnings and chose to remain silent. At their trials, both took the stand and claimed that they had not sold marijuana but had been "framed." To impeach the defendants, the prosecutors asked each why he had not related this version of events at the time he was arrested. The Court held that this violated the defendants' rights to due process because the Miranda warnings contained an implicit "assurance that silence will carry no penalty." Id. at 618. Likewise, Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986), held that the prosecutor's use of respondent's post-arrest, post-Miranda warnings, silence as evidence of sanity violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

By contrast, "the Constitution does not prohibit the use for impeachment purposes of a defendant's silence prior to arrest, . . . or after arrest if no Miranda warnings are given. . . . Such silence is probative, and does not rest on any implied assurance by law enforcement authorities that it will carry no penalty." See Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 628 (1993) (emphasis added), citing Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231, 239 (1980), and Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603, 606–07 (1982) (per curiam).

Moreover, the Court has held that it is constitutional for a prosecutor, in his summation, to call the jury's attention to the fact that the defendant had the opportunity to hear all other witnesses testify and to tailor his testimony accordingly. See Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61 (2000).

Compulsion in the probation context. In Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), the defendant's probation officer had previously received information from a treatment counselor that respondent had admitted to a rape and murder unrelated to his probation. One of the terms of the defendant's probation required him to be truthful with the probation officer in all matters. Seizing upon this, the officer interviewed the defendant about the rape and murder, and the defendant admitted his guilt. The Court found no Fifth Amendment violation, despite the defendant's fear of being returned to prison for 16 months if he remained silent. Id. at 434–39.

Compulsion in the prison context. In Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 319 (1976), the Court refused to extend the Griffin rule to the context of state prison disciplinary hearings, because those proceedings "involve the correctional process and important state interests other than conviction for crime."

McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24 (2002), involved a Sexual Abuse Treatment Program (SATP), under which participating inmates were required to complete and sign an "Admission of Responsibility" form, accepting responsibility for the crimes for which they had been sentenced, and completing a sexual history form detailing all prior sexual activities, regardless of whether the activities constituted uncharged criminal offenses. Prison officials informed respondent that if he refused to participate in the SATP, his prison privileges would be reduced, resulting in the

2. Suspects' Self-Incriminating Statements During Custodial Interrogation

a. Historical Background

[C78] Prior to Miranda, the Court "evaluated the admissibility of a suspect's confession under a voluntariness test. The roots of this test developed in the common law, as the courts of England and then the United States recognized that coerced confessions are inherently untrustworthy. . . . Over time, [the Court's] cases recognized two constitutional bases for the requirement that a confession be voluntary to be admitted into evidence: the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."[218] For the middle third of the 20th century, the Court's cases based the rule against admitting coerced confessions primarily, if not exclusively, on notions of due process.[219] "Those cases refined the test into an inquiry that examines 'whether a defendant's will was overborne' by the circumstances surrounding the giving of a confession."[220] The due process test takes into consideration "the totality of all the surrounding circumstances—both the characteristics of the accused and the details of the interrogation."[221] The determination "depend[s] upon a weighing of the circumstances of pressure against the power of resistance of the person confessing."[222] automatic curtailment of his visitation rights, earnings, work opportunities, ability to send money to family, canteen expenditures, access to a personal television, and other privileges. He also would be transferred to a potentially more dangerous maximum-security unit. Respondent refused to participate in the SATP. A sharply divided Court held that the alterations in respondent's prison conditions as a result of his failure to participate in the SATP did not constitute compulsion for the purposes of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. A four-Justice plurality thought that the Court's holding in Sandin v. Conner, 515 U. S. 472, 484 (1995), which challenged prison conditions, cannot give rise to a due process violation unless they constitute "atypical and significant hardship[s] on [inmates] in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life" provided "a reasonable means of assessing whether the response of prison administrators to correctional and rehabilitative necessities are so out of the ordinary that one could sensibly say they rise to the level of unconstitutional compulsion." Id. at 41. Justice O'Connor, concurring in the judgment, agreed with the four dissenters that the Fifth Amendment compulsion standard is broader than the "atypical and significant hardship" standard the Court has adopted for evaluating due process claims in prisons, but concluded that the foregoing alterations were no so great as to amount to compulsion on any reasonable test.

---

In Ohio Adult Parole Authority v. Woodard, 523 U.S. 272 (1998), the Court held that a death row inmate could be made to choose between incriminating himself at his clemency interview and having adverse inferences drawn from his silence. The Court reasoned that it "is difficult to see how a voluntary interview could compel respondent to speak. He merely faces a choice quite similar to the sorts of choices that a criminal defendant must make in the course of criminal proceedings, none of which has ever been held to violate the Fifth Amendment." Id. at 286.

[218] See Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 433 (2000), citing, respectively, Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542 (1897) and Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936).

[219] See, e.g., Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963); Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143 (1944); Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227 (1940).

[220] Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 434 (2000), quoting Schneckcloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 226 (1973).

[221] Id.

[222] Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 434 (2000), quoting Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 185 (1953). See, in extenso, paras. B59–B61.

b. The Miranda Warnings

[C79] The Court has never abandoned the foregoing due process jurisprudence and thus continues to exclude confessions that were obtained involuntarily. But its decision in Miranda changed the focus of much of the inquiry in determining the admissibility of suspects' incriminating statements. In that case, the Court noted that the advent of modern custodial police interrogation, which is psychologically, rather than physically, oriented, brings with it an increased concern about confessions obtained by coercion. Because custodial police interrogation, by its very nature, isolates and pressures the individual, the Court stated that, "[e]ven without employing brutality, . . . custodial interrogation exacts a heavy toll on individual liberty and trades on the weakness of individuals."[223] It thus "concluded that the coercion inherent in custodial interrogation blurs the line between voluntary and involuntary statements, and thus heightens the risk that an individual will not be accorded his privilege under the Fifth Amendment not to be compelled to incriminate himself."[224] Accordingly, the Court laid down concrete constitutional guidelines for law enforcement agencies and courts to follow. Those guidelines established that the admissibility in evidence of any statement given during custodial interrogation of a suspect would depend on whether the police provided the suspect with four warnings. These warnings (which have come to be known colloquially as "Miranda rights") are: a suspect "has the right to remain silent, that anything he says can be used against him in a court of law, that he has the right to the presence of an attorney, and that if he cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for him prior to any questioning if he so desires."[225] Miranda warnings need not be given in the exact form described in that decision; the inquiry is simply whether the warnings reasonably convey to a suspect his rights as required by Miranda.[226] After initially being advised of his Miranda rights, the accused may himself validly waive his rights[227] and respond to interrogation. "[F]ailure to give the prescribed warnings and obtain a waiver of rights

---

[223] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 455 (1966).

[224] See Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 433 (2000), discussing Miranda.

[225] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 479 (1966). In Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 432–44 (2000), the Court reaffirmed Miranda and struck down a federal statute that, in essence, laid down a rule that the admissibility of a suspect's statements made during custodial interrogation should turn only on whether or not they were voluntarily made.

[226] See Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 202–03 (1989); California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355, 361 (1981) (per curiam).

In New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984), the Court recognized a public safety exception to the usual Fifth Amendment rights afforded by Miranda, so that police could recover a firearm that otherwise would have remained in a public area. In that case, police apprehended, after a chase in a grocery store, a rape suspect known to be carrying a gun. After handcuffing and searching him (and finding no gun)—but before reading him his Miranda warnings—the police demanded to know where the gun was. The defendant nodded in the direction of some empty cartons and responded that "the gun is over there." The Court held that both the unwarned statement—"the gun is over there"—and the recovered weapon were admissible in the prosecution's case in chief, considering that the concealed gun posed dangers to the public safety: an accomplice might make use of it, or a customer or employee might later come upon it.

In Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 429, n.10 (1984), the Court noted that, under the public safety exception to Miranda, "when the police arrest a suspect under circumstances presenting an imminent danger to the public safety, they may, without informing him of his constitutional rights, ask questions essential to elicit information necessary to neutralize the threat to the public. Once such information has been obtained, the suspect must be given the standard warnings."

[227] "'[A] valid waiver will not be presumed simply from the silence of the accused after before custodial questioning generally requires exclusion of any statements obtained. Conversely, giving the warnings and getting a waiver has generally produced a virtual ticket of admissibility; maintaining that a statement is involuntary even though given after warnings and voluntary waiver of rights requires unusual stamina, and litigation over voluntariness tends to end with the finding of a valid waiver."[228]

c. What Constitutes "Custodial Interrogation"

[C80] Miranda held that pre-interrogation warnings are required in the context of custodial interrogations given the compulsion inherent in custodial surroundings.[229] The Court explained that "custodial interrogation" meant "questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way."[230] The Miranda decision did not provide the Court with an opportunity to apply that test to a set of facts. After Miranda, the Court first applied the custody test in Oregon v. Mathiason. In that case, a police officer contacted the suspect after a burglary victim identified him. The officer arranged to meet the suspect at a nearby police station. At the outset of the questioning, the officer stated his belief that the suspect was involved in the burglary but that he was not under arrest. During the 30-minute interview, the suspect admitted his guilt. He was then allowed to leave. The Court held that the questioning was not custodial because there was "no indication that the questioning took place in a context where [the suspect's] freedom to depart was restricted in any way." The Court noted that the suspect had come voluntarily to the police station, that he was informed that he was not under arrest, and that he was allowed to leave at the end of the interview.[231] In California v. Beheler, the Court warnings are given, or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained.' . . . An express written or oral statement of waiver of the right to remain silent or of the right to counsel is usually strong proof of the validity of that waiver, but is not inevitably either necessary or sufficient to establish waiver. The question is not one of form, but rather whether the defendant, in fact, knowingly and voluntarily waived the rights delineated in the Miranda case. As was unequivocally said in Miranda, mere silence is not enough. That does not mean that the defendant's silence, coupled with an understanding of his rights and a course of conduct indicating waiver, may never support a conclusion that a defendant has waived his rights. The courts must presume that a defendant did not waive his rights; the prosecution's burden is great; but in at least some cases, waiver can be clearly inferred from the actions and words of the person interrogated." See N. Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369, 373 (1979). See also paras. B60–B61.

---

[228] See Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 608–09 (2004) (plurality opinion).

[229] In Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 (1976), the defendant, without being advised of his Miranda rights, made incriminating statements to government agents during an interview in a private home. He later asked that Miranda "be extended to cover interrogation in non-custodial circumstances after a police investigation has focused on the suspect." The Court found his argument unpersuasive, explaining that it "was the compulsive aspect of custodial interrogation, and not the strength or content of the government's suspicions at the time the questioning was conducted, which led the Court to impose the Miranda requirements with regard to custodial questioning." Id. at 346–47. As a result, the Court concluded that the defendant was not entitled to Miranda warnings: "Although the focus of an investigation may indeed have been on Beckwith at the time of the interview . . . , he hardly found himself in the custodial situation described by the Miranda Court as the basis for its holding." Id. at 347.

[230] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966) (emphasis added).

[231] See Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492, 495 (1977) (per curiam), as discussed in Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 661 (2004).

reached the same result in a case with facts similar to those in Mathiason. In Beheler, the state court had distinguished Mathiason based on what it described as differences in the totality of the circumstances. The police interviewed Beheler shortly after the crime occurred; Beheler had been drinking earlier in the day; he was emotionally distraught; he was well known to the police; and he was a parolee who knew it was necessary for him to cooperate with the police. The Court agreed that "the circumstances of each case must certainly influence" the custody determination but re-emphasized that "the ultimate inquiry is simply whether there is a formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest." The Court found the case indistinguishable from Mathiason. It noted that how much the police knew about the suspect and how much time had elapsed after the crime occurred were irrelevant to the custody inquiry.[232]

[C 81] The Court's "more recent cases instruct that custody must be determined based on a how a reasonable person in the suspect's situation would perceive his circumstances."[233] In Berkemer v. McCarty, a police officer stopped a suspected drunk driver and asked him some questions. Although the officer reached the decision to arrest the driver at the beginning of the traffic stop, he did not do so until the driver failed a sobriety test and acknowledged that he had been drinking beer and smoking marijuana. The Court held the traffic stop non-custodial despite the officer's intent to arrest, because he had not communicated that intent to the driver. The lack of communication was crucial, for, under Miranda, "[a] policeman's unarticulated plan has no bearing on the question whether a suspect was in custody at a particular time;" rather, "the only relevant inquiry is how a reasonable man in the suspect's position would have understood his situation."[234] In a footnote, the Court cited a New York state case for the view that an objective test was preferable to a subjective test in part because it does not "place upon the police the burden of anticipating the frailties or idiosyncrasies of every person whom they question."[235] Stansbury confirmed this analytical framework. Stansbury explained that "the initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned." Courts must examine "all of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation" and determine "how a reasonable person in the position of the individual being questioned would gauge the breadth of his or her freedom of action."[236] Finally, in Thompson v. Keohane, the Court offered the following description of the Miranda custody test: "Two discrete inquiries are essential to the determination: first, what were the circumstances surrounding the interrogation; and second, given those circumstances, would a reasonable person have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave. Once the scene is set and the players' lines and actions are reconstructed, the court must apply an objective test to resolve the ultimate inquiry: was there a formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest."[237]

---

[232] See California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121, 1125 (1983) (per curiam), discussed in Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 661–62 (2004).

[233] Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 662 (2004).

[234] See Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 442 (1984), discussed in Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 662 (2004).

[235] Id., at 442, n.35 (quoting People v. P., 21 N. Y. 2d 1, 9–10, 233 N. E. 2d 255, 260 (1967)).

[236] Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318, 322–25 (1994) (per curiam).

[237] Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99, 112 (1995). The first inquiry is distinctly factual.

[C82] In Miranda, the Court observed that, by interrogation, it meant "questioning initiated by law enforcement officers."[238] "This passage and other references throughout the opinion to 'questioning' might suggest that the Miranda rules were to apply only to those police interrogation practices that involve express questioning of a defendant while in custody. [The Court has not,] however, construe[d] the Miranda opinion so narrowly. The concern of the Court in Miranda was that the 'interrogation environment' created by the interplay of interrogation and custody would 'subjugate the individual to the will of his examiner,' and thereby undermine the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. The police practices that evoked this concern included several that did not involve express questioning. For example, one of the practices discussed in Miranda was the use of line-ups in which a coached witness would pick the defendant as the perpetrator. This was designed to establish that the defendant was, in fact, guilty as a predicate for further interrogation. A variation on this theme discussed in Miranda was the so-called 'reverse line-up' in which a defendant would be identified by coached witnesses as the perpetrator of a fictitious crime, with the object of inducing him to confess to the actual crime of which he was suspected in order to escape the false prosecution. The Court in Miranda also included in its survey of interrogation practices the use of psychological ploys, such as to 'posi[t]' 'the guilt of the subject,' to 'minimize the moral seriousness of the offense,' and 'to cast blame on the victim or on society.'[239] It

---

State court findings on these scene- and action-setting questions attract a presumption of correctness under 28 U.S.C. Section 2254(d). The second inquiry, however, calls for application of the controlling legal standard to the historical facts. This ultimate determination presents a "mixed question of law and fact" qualifying for independent review. Id. at 112–13.

In Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004), respondent helped Soto try to steal a truck, leading to the death of the truck's owner. Alvarado was called in for an interview with Los Angeles detective Comstock. Alvarado was 17 years old at the time, and his parents brought him to the station and waited in the lobby during the interview. Comstock took Alvarado to a small room where only the two of them were present. The interview lasted about two hours, and Alvarado was not given a warning under Miranda. Although he at first denied being present at the shooting, Alvarado slowly began to change his story, finally admitting that he had helped Soto try to steal the victim's truck and to hide the gun after the murder. Comstock twice asked Alvarado if he needed a break and, when the interview was over, returned him to his parents, who drove him home. The Court held that the state court had not erred in failing to account for Alvarado's youth and inexperience when evaluating whether a reasonable person in his position would have felt free to leave the interview. Moreover, the Court found that the state court's conclusion that Alvarado was not in custody, for Miranda purposes during his police interview, was not unreasonable. Certain facts weighed against a finding that Alvarado was in custody. The police did not transport him to the station or require him to appear at a particular time; they did not threaten him or suggest he would be placed under arrest; his parents remained in the lobby during the interview, suggesting that the interview would be brief; Comstock appealed to Alvarado's interest in telling the truth and being helpful to a police officer; Comstock twice asked Alvarado if he wanted to take a break; and, at the end of the interview, Alvarado went home. Other facts pointed in the opposite direction. Comstock interviewed Alvarado at the police station; the interview lasted four times longer than the 30-minute interview in Mathiason; Comstock did not tell Alvarado that he was free to leave; he was brought to the station by his legal guardians rather than arriving on his own accord; and his parents allegedly asked to be present at the interview but were rebuffed. Given these differing indications, the state court's application of the Court's custody standard was held to be reasonable, within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. Section 2254(d)(1).

[238] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966).

[239] Id. at 450.

is clear that these techniques of persuasion, no less than express questioning, were thought, in a custodial setting, to amount to interrogation."[240] "This is not to say, however, that all statements obtained by the police after a person has been taken into custody are to be considered the product of interrogation. As the Court in Miranda noted: 'Confessions remain a proper element in law enforcement. Any statement given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences is, of course, admissible in evidence. The fundamental import of the privilege while an individual is in custody is not whether he is allowed to talk to the police without the benefit of warnings and counsel, but whether he can be interrogated. . . . Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred by the Fifth Amendment, and their admissibility is not affected by our holding today.'"[241] "[T]herefore, the special procedural safeguards outlined in Miranda are required not where a suspect is simply taken into custody, but rather where a suspect in custody is subjected to interrogation. 'Interrogation,' as conceptualized in the Miranda opinion, must reflect a measure of compulsion above and beyond that inherent in custody itself."[242] Under these considerations, the Court, in Rhode Island v. Innis, concluded that "the Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent. That is to say, the term 'interrogation' under Miranda refers not only to express questioning, but also to any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect. The latter portion of this definition focuses primarily upon the perceptions of the suspect, rather than the intent of the police. This focus reflects the fact that the Miranda safeguards were designed to vest a suspect in custody with an added measure of protection against coercive police practices, without regard to objective proof of the underlying intent of the police. A practice that the police should know is reasonably likely to evoke an incriminating response from a suspect thus amounts to interrogation. But, since the police surely cannot be held accountable for the unforeseeable results of their words or actions, the definition of interrogation can extend only to words or actions on the part of police officers that they should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. Any knowledge the police may have had concerning the unusual susceptibility of a defendant to a particular form of persuasion might be an important factor in determining whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect."[243]

[C83] In Innis, the defendant was arrested at 4:30 a.m. for robbery and was advised of his Miranda rights. He stated that he understood his rights and wanted to speak with a lawyer. He was then confined in a "caged wagon." While en route to the police station, two of the officers accompanying him engaged in a conversation between them-

---

[240] See Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 298–99 (1980), discussing and quoting Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444, 450, 453, 457–58 (1966).

[241] See Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 298–99 (1980), discussing and quoting Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444, 450, 453, 457–58 (1966).

[242] Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300–01 (1980).

[243] Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300–02 (1980). "Any knowledge the police may have had concerning the unusual susceptibility of a defendant to a particular form of persuasion might be an important factor in determining whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect." Id. at 302, n.8.

selves concerning the missing shotgun. One of the officers stated that there were "a lot of handicapped children running around in this area," because a school for such children was located nearby, and "God forbid one of them might find a weapon with shells and they might hurt themselves." Respondent interrupted the conversation, stating that the officers should turn the car around so he could show them where the gun was located. Upon returning to the scene of the arrest where a search for the shotgun was in progress, respondent was again advised of his Miranda rights, replied that he understood those rights, but he "wanted to get the gun out of the way because of the kids in the area in the school" and then led the police to the shotgun. The Court held that respondent had not been "interrogated" in violation of his right under Miranda to remain silent until he had consulted with a lawyer. First, there was no express questioning of respondent; the conversation between the two officers was, at least in form, nothing more than a dialogue between them to which no response from respondent was invited. Moreover, respondent was not subjected to the "functional equivalent" of questioning. "There was nothing in the record to suggest that the officers were aware that respondent was peculiarly susceptible to an appeal to his conscience concerning the safety of handicapped children," or that "the police knew that respondent was unusually disoriented or upset at the time of his arrest." Nor did the record indicate that, in the context of a brief conversation, the officers should have known that respondent would suddenly be moved to make a self-incriminating response. The Court concluded that, while it might be said that respondent was subjected to "subtle compulsion," it should also be established that a suspect's incriminating response "was the product of words or actions on the part of the police that they should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response," which had not been done in that case.[244]

[C84] Conversations between suspects and undercover agents do not implicate the concerns underlying Miranda. "It is the premise of Miranda that the danger of coercion results from the interaction of custody and official interrogation. . . . The essential ingredients of a 'police-dominated atmosphere' and compulsion are not present when an incarcerated person speaks freely to someone that he believes to be a fellow inmate. Coercion is determined from the perspective of the suspect. When a suspect considers himself in the company of cellmates and not officers, the coercive atmosphere is lacking. . . . Ploys to mislead a suspect or lull him into a false sense of security that do not rise to the level of compulsion or coercion to speak are not within Miranda's concerns. . . . [Hence,] an undercover law enforcement officer posing as a fellow inmate need not give Miranda warnings to an incarcerated suspect before asking questions that may elicit an incriminating response."[245]

[C85] Muniz held that a police officer may ask an arrestee his name, address, height, weight, eye color, date of birth, and current age, without giving Miranda warnings. Four members of the Court held that such questions, when asked only for record-keeping purposes, fall within a "routine booking question" exception that exempts from Miranda's coverage "questions to secure the biographical data necessary to complete

---

[244] Id. at 293–95, 302–03. In Arizona v. Mauro, 481 U.S. 520, 525–30 (1987), while respondent was in police custody, he indicated that he did not wish to answer any questions until a lawyer was present. The Court held that, in the circumstances of that case, officers did not interrogate respondent in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments when they allowed him to speak with his wife in the presence of a police officer.

[245] Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292, 296–97, 300 (1990).

booking or pretrial services."[246] Four other Justices found that an arrestee's responses to such "booking" questions are not testimonial and therefore do not warrant application of the Fifth Amendment's privilege.[247]

[C86] Estelle v. Smith considered a situation in which a psychiatrist conducted an ostensibly neutral competency examination of a capital defendant, but drew conclusions from the defendant's uncounseled statements regarding his future dangerousness, and later testified for the prosecution on that crucial issue. The Court likened the psychiatrist to "an agent of the State recounting unwarned statements made in a post-arrest custodial setting," and held that a "criminal defendant, who neither initiates a psychiatric evaluation nor attempts to introduce any psychiatric evidence, may not be compelled to respond to a psychiatrist if his statements can be used against him at a capital sentencing proceeding." The admission of the psychiatrist's testimony under those "distinct circumstances" violated the Fifth Amendment.[248]

d. Procedure to Be Followed When a Suspect Invokes His Miranda Rights

[C87] "If the individual indicates, in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease."[249] And if he requests counsel, the interrogation must cease "until counsel has been made available to him, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police."[250] This layer of prophylaxis for the Miranda right to counsel "is designed to prevent police from badgering a defendant into waiving his previously

---

[246] Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582, 601 (1990).

[247] Id. at 608.

[248] Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 466–68 (1981).

[249] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 474 (1966). In Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402, 422–23 (1987), the Court held that, if a defendant requests a psychiatric examination, in order to prove a mental status defense, he waives the right to raise a Fifth Amendment challenge to the prosecution's use of evidence obtained through that examination to rebut the defense.

[250] Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 436, 484–85 (1981). The applicability of Edwards "requires courts to determine whether the accused actually invoked his right to counsel. . . . To avoid difficulties of proof and to provide guidance to officers conducting interrogations, this is an objective inquiry. . . . Invocation of the Miranda right to counsel requires at a minimum, some statement that can reasonably be construed to be an expression of a desire for the assistance of an attorney. . . . But if a suspect makes a reference to an attorney that is ambiguous or equivocal in that a reasonable officer, in light of the circumstances, would have understood only that the suspect might be invoking the right to counsel, cessation of questioning is not required. . . . Rather, the suspect must unambiguously request counsel." See Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 458–59 (1994) (emphasis added).

Connecticut v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523 (1987), concerned a suspect who had "told the officers that he would not give a written statement unless his attorney was present but had no problem talking about the incident." The Court held that this was a limited request for counsel, that Barrett himself had drawn a distinction between oral and written statements, that this distinction did not indicate "an understanding of the consequences so incomplete that [it] should deem Barrett's limited invocation of the right to counsel effective for all purposes," and, thus, that the officers could continue to question him. Hence, Barrett's incriminating oral statements concerning his involvement in a sexual assault were admissible in court, there being no evidence that he had been "threatened, tricked, or cajoled" into speaking to the police. Id. at 527–30.

asserted Miranda rights."[251] To that end, the Court has held that the requirement that counsel be "made available" to the accused refers not merely to the opportunity to consult with an attorney outside the interrogation room but to the right to have the attorney present during custodial interrogation.[252] "If the interrogation continues without the presence of an attorney and a statement is taken, a heavy burden rests on the government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel."[253]

e. The Exclusionary Rule

[C88] The Self-Incrimination Clause contains its own exclusionary rule. "Unlike the Fourth Amendment's bar on unreasonable searches, the Self-Incrimination Clause is

---

In Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 723–24 (1979), the Court held that a juvenile's request, made while undergoing custodial interrogation, to speak with his probation officer does not constitute a per se request to remain silent, nor is it tantamount to a request for an attorney.

The meaning of "initiation" of further communication with the police. In Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039 (1983), respondent asked for an attorney, and subsequently inquired of a police officer, "Well, what is going to happen to me now?" Four members of the Court held that "there are some inquiries, such as a request for a drink of water or a request to use a telephone, that are so routine that they cannot be fairly said to represent a desire on the part of an accused to open up a more generalized discussion relating directly or indirectly to the investigation. Such inquiries or statements, by either an accused or a police officer, relating to routine incidents of the custodial relationship, will not generally 'initiate' a conversation in the sense in which that word was used in Edwards. Although ambiguous, the respondent's question in this case as to what was going to happen to him evinced a willingness and a desire for a generalized discussion about the investigation; it was not merely a necessary inquiry arising out of the incidents of the custodial relationship. It could reasonably have been interpreted by the officer as relating generally to the investigation." Id. at 1045–46 (emphasis added). Four other Justices agreed that, in order to constitute "initiation" under Edwards, an accused's inquiry must demonstrate a desire to discuss the subject matter of the criminal investigation but concluded that, under the circumstances of this case, it was plain that respondent's only "desire" was to find out where the police were going to take him. Id. at 1055.

[251] Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 350 (1990).

[252] See Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 150–56 (1990). "Miranda does not require that attorneys be producible on call. . . . The Court in Miranda emphasized that it was not suggesting that 'each police station must have a "station house lawyer" present at all times to advise prisoners.' . . . If the police cannot provide appointed counsel, Miranda requires only that the police not question a suspect unless he waives his right to counsel." See Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 204 (1989), discussing Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 436, 474 (1981).

[253] Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 475 (1966). When a suspect asserts his right to cut off questioning, the police may scrupulously honor that right by "immediately ceas[ing] the interrogation, resum[ing] questioning only after the passage of a significant period of time and the provision of a fresh set of warnings, and restrict[ing] the second interrogation to a crime that had not been a subject of the earlier interrogation." See Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96, 106 (1975) (emphasis added).

A suspect's request for counsel, unlike his decision to cut off questioning, raises the presumption that he is unable to proceed without a lawyer's advice. Hence, the Edwards rule applies to bar "police-initiated interrogation following a suspect's request for counsel in the context of a separate investigation." See Butler v. McKellar, 494 U.S. 407, 411 (1990) (emphasis added), discussing Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 682 (1988).

self-executing."[254] "[T]hose subjected to coercive police interrogations have an automatic protection from the use of their involuntary statements (or evidence derived from such statements) in any subsequent criminal trial."[255]

[C89] "Failure to administer Miranda warnings creates a presumption of compulsion. Consequently, unwarned statements that are otherwise voluntary within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment must nevertheless be excluded from evidence under Miranda. Thus, in the individual case, Miranda's preventive medicine provides a remedy even to the defendant who has suffered no identifiable constitutional harm."[256] "But the Miranda presumption, though irrebuttable for purposes of the prosecution's case in chief, does not require that the statements and their fruits be discarded as inherently tainted."[257]

---

[254] United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630, 640 (2004) (plurality opinion).

[255] Chavez v. Martinez, 538 U.S. 760, 769 (2003) (plurality opinion), citing, for example, Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 307–08 (1985).

[256] Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 307 (1985).

[257] Id. at 307. In that case, the police went to the young suspect's house to take him into custody on a charge of burglary. Before the arrest, one officer spoke with the suspect's mother, while the other one joined the suspect in a brief stop in the living room, where the officer said he "felt" the young man was involved in a burglary. Id. at 301. The suspect acknowledged he had been at the scene. The Court noted that the pause in the living room "was not to interrogate the suspect but to notify his mother of the reason for his arrest" and described the incident as having "none of the earmarks of coercion." Id. at 316. The Court, indeed, took care to mention that the officer's initial failure to warn was an "oversight" that "may have been the result of confusion as to whether the brief exchange qualified as custodial interrogation or . . . may simply have reflected . . . reluctance to initiate an alarming police procedure before [an officer] had spoken with respondent's mother." Id. at 315–16. At the outset of a later and systematic station house interrogation going well beyond the scope of the laconic prior admission, the suspect was given Miranda warnings and made a full confession. In holding the second statement admissible and voluntary, Elstad rejected the "cat out of the bag" theory that any short, earlier admission, obtained in arguably innocent neglect of Miranda, determined the character of the later, warned confession. Id. at 311–14. On the facts of that case, the Court thought any causal connection between the first and second responses to the police was "speculative and attenuated." Id. at 313.

Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 (2004), involved the technique of interrogating in successive, unwarned and warned phases. In that case, "[t]he unwarned interrogation was conducted in the station house, and the questioning was systematic, exhaustive, and managed with psychological skill. When the police were finished there was little, if anything, of incriminating potential left unsaid. The warned phase of questioning proceeded after a pause of only 15 to 20 minutes, in the same place as the unwarned segment. When the same officer who had conducted the first phase recited the Miranda warnings, he said nothing to counter the probable misimpression that the advice that anything Seibert said could be used against her also applied to the details of the inculpatory statement previously elicited. In particular, the police did not advise that her prior statement could not be used. Nothing was said or done to dispel the oddity of warning about legal rights to silence and counsel right after the police had led her through a systematic interrogation, and any uncertainty on her part about a right to stop talking about matters previously discussed would only have been aggravated by the way the interrogating officer set the scene by saying 'we've been talking for a little while about what happened on Wednesday the twelfth, haven't we?' . . . The impression that the further questioning was a mere continuation of the earlier questions and responses was fostered by references back to the confession already given." Id. at 616. Under these considerations, a four-Justice plurality held that "[i]t would have been reasonable to regard the two sessions as parts of a continuum, in which it would have been unnatural to refuse to repeat at the second stage what had been said before"

For example, in Harris v. New York, the Court held that statements elicited from a defendant in violation of Miranda, can be introduced to impeach that defendant's credibility, even though they are inadmissible as evidence of his guilt, so long as the jury is instructed accordingly.[258] In reaching this conclusion, "the Court weighed the incremental deterrence of police illegality against the strong policy against countenancing perjury. In the balance, use of the incriminating statements for impeachment purposes prevailed."[259] Moreover, a failure to give a suspect Miranda warnings does not require suppression of the physical fruits of the suspect's unwarned but voluntary statements.[260]

E. OTHER BASIC PROCEDURAL GUARANTEES IN THE CRIMINAL CONTEXT[261]

1. Right to Fair Notice of the Charges and the Grand Jury Clause

[C90] Due process requires that a person be given reasonable notice of the charges against him.[262] "An indictment not framed to apprise the defendant with reasonable certainty, of the nature of the accusation against him is defective, although it may follow the language of the statute. . . . Undoubtedly, the language of the statute may be used in the general description of an offense, but it must be accompanied with such a statement of the facts and circumstances as will inform the accused of the specific offense, coming under the general description, with which he is charged."[263] In Cole, petitioners were convicted at trial of one offense, but their convictions were affirmed by the supreme court of Arkansas on the basis of evidence in the record indicating that they had committed another offense on which the jury had not been instructed. In reversing the convictions, a unanimous Court wrote: "It is as much a violation of due process to send an accused to prison following conviction of a charge on which he was never tried as it would be to convict him upon a charge that was never made. . . . To conform to due process of law, petitioners were entitled to have the validity of their convictions appraised on consideration of the case as it was tried and as the issues were and that the above circumstances should "be seen as challenging the comprehensibility and efficacy of the Miranda warnings to the point that a reasonable person in the suspect's shoes would not have understood them to convey a message that she retained a choice about continuing to talk." Id. at 616–17. In his concurring opinion, Justice Kennedy concluded that when a two-step interrogation technique is used, post-warning statements related to pre-warning statements "must be excluded unless curative measures are taken before the post-warning statement is made. [Such] measures should be designed to ensure that a reasonable person in the suspect's situation would understand the import and effect of the Miranda warning and . . . waiver. For example, a substantial break in time and circumstances between the prewarning statement and the Miranda warning may suffice" in most instances, as may an additional warning explaining the likely inadmissibility of the pre-warning statement. Id. at 622.

---

258 Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222, 223–26 (1971).

259 New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450, 458 (1979).

260 United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630, 634, 644–45 (2004).

261 See also paras. C59 et seq. (access to judicial processes); paras. D58–D60 (pre-trial detention).

262 In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 273 (1948).

263 Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749, 765 (1962). For example, when one is accused of violating a federal statute, which makes it a misdemeanor for any person summoned to testify before a committee of Congress to refuse to answer "any question pertinent to the question under inquiry," the grand jury indictment must state the question that was under inquiry at the time of the defendant's alleged default or refusal to answer. Id. at 753–68.

determined in the trial court."[264] "These fundamental principles of procedural fairness apply with no less force at the penalty phase than they do in the guilt-determining phase of any criminal trial."[265]

[C91] The Fifth Amendment provides that federal prosecutions for capital or otherwise infamous crimes must be instituted by presentments or indictments of grand juries.[266] The grand jury does not sit to determine the truth of the charges brought against a defendant, but only to determine whether there is probable cause to believe them true, so as to require him to stand trial. An accused is not entitled to a hearing before a grand jury or to present evidence. A grand jury may act secretly, and its operation generally is unrestrained by the technical procedural and evidentiary rules governing the conduct of criminal trials.[267] Several constitutional protections afforded defendants in criminal proceedings have no application before that body. For example, the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment does not bar a grand jury from returning an indictment when a prior grand jury has refused to do so.[268] The Sixth Amendment right to counsel, the Court has suggested, does not attach when an individual is summoned to appear before a grand jury, even if he is the subject of the investigation.[269] Although the grand jury may not force a witness to answer questions in violation of the Fifth Amendment's constitutional guarantee against self-incrimination, an indictment obtained through the use of evidence previously obtained in violation of the privilege against self-incrimination is nevertheless valid.[270] Indeed, "neither the Fifth Amendment nor any other constitutional provision prescribes the kind of evidence upon which grand juries must act; . . . [a]n indictment returned by a legally constituted and unbiased grand jury, . . . if valid on its face, is enough to call for trial of the charge on the merits."[271] Hence, an indictment is not invalidated by the grand jury's consideration of hearsay,[272] by the introduction of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment,[273] or by the government's failure to disclose to the grand jury "substantial exculpatory evidence" in its possession.[274]

---

[264] Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196, 201–02 (1948).

[265] Presnell v. Georgia, 439 U.S. 14, 16 (1978) (per curiam). There, the Court reversed a death sentence that the Georgia supreme court had affirmed on the basis of its own finding that evidence in the record would support a statutory aggravating circumstance that had not been found by the jury.

[266] There is no constitutional requirement that states institute prosecutions by means of an indictment returned by a grand jury. See Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)). However, that fact does not relieve those states that do employ grand juries from complying with the commands of the Fourteenth Amendment in the operation of those juries. See Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545, 557, n.7 (1979) (racial discrimination in the selection of grand jurors).

[267] See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 343 (1974).

[268] See United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 49 (1992), citing Ex parte United States, 287 U.S. 241, 250–51 (1932), and United States v. Thompson, 251 U.S. 407, 413–15 (1920).

[269] See United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 49 (1992), citing United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 581 (1976) (plurality opinion), and In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 333 (1957). The right to counsel mandated by Miranda was fashioned to secure the suspect's Fifth Amendment privilege in a setting thought inherently coercive.

[270] See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 346 (1974); Lawn v. United States, 355 U.S. 339, 348–50 (1958).

[271] Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 362–63 (1956).

[272] Id. at 361–63.

[273] See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 342–55 (1974).

[274] See United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 45–55 (1992).

2. The Sixth Amendment's Right to Counsel[275]

a. In General

[C92] The Sixth Amendment provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence." "Of all the rights that an accused person has, the right to be represented by counsel is by far the most pervasive, for it affects his ability to assert any other rights he may have."[276] Since this right is of fundamental nature, it is not only immune from federal abridgment, but it is equally protected against state invasion by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[277] The right is offense-specific.[278] "It cannot be invoked once for all future prosecutions, for it does not attach until a prosecution is commenced,"[279] that is, "at or after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment."[280]

[C93] The Sixth Amendment's provision for the assistance of counsel applies to criminal prosecutions, if conviction results in imprisonment. Argersinger rejected a formalistic distinction between petty and non-petty offenses and held the foregoing constitutional guarantee applicable to "any criminal trial, where an accused is deprived of his liberty."[281] Scott confirmed the "adoption of actual imprisonment as the line defining the constitutional right to appointment of counsel," noting that actual imprisonment is a penalty different in kind from fines or the mere threat of imprisonment. Subsequently, although the governing statute in that case authorized a jail sentence of up to one year, the Court held that the defendant had no right to state-appointed counsel, because the sole sentence actually imposed on him was a $50 fine.[282] In Alabama v. Shelton, the Court made clear that "a suspended sentence that may end up in the actual [275] See also paras. C115–C116 (show-ups and line-ups).

---

[276] United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 654 (1984).

[277] Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963).

[278] Since the right is "offense-specific," it does not extend to offenses that are "factually related" to those that have actually been charged. Nevertheless, it encompasses offenses that, even if not formally charged, would be considered the same offense under the Blockburger test that has been applied to delineate the scope of the Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause, which prevents multiple or successive prosecutions for the "same offense." See Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162 (2001).

[279] McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175 (1991). By contrast, the Miranda-Edwards "Fifth Amendment" right to counsel, is not offense-specific: "once a suspect invokes the Miranda right to counsel for interrogation regarding one offense, he may not be reapproached regarding any offense unless counsel is present." See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 177 (1991), citing Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988).

[280] See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175 (1991), quoting United States v. Gouveia, 467 U.S. 180, 188 (1984). In the latter case, the Court relied upon the significance of the absence of a formal charge in concluding that the Sixth Amendment does not require the appointment of counsel for indigent prison inmates confined in administrative detention while authorities investigate their possible involvement in criminal activity.

[281] Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25, 32–33, 37 (1972).

[282] Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367, 368, 373 (1979). In Nichols v. United States, 511 U.S. 738, 748–49 (1994), the Court overruled Baldasar v. Illinois, 446 U.S. 222 (1980), and held that, consistent with the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution, an uncounseled misdemeanor conviction, valid under Scott, because no prison term was imposed, is also valid when used to enhance punishment at a subsequent conviction.

deprivation of a person's liberty may not be imposed unless the defendant was accorded the 'guiding hand of counsel' in the prosecution for the crime charged."[283] [C94] The right to the assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments is indispensable to the fair administration of the American adversarial system of criminal justice. Embodying "a realistic recognition of the obvious truth that the average defendant does not have the professional legal skill to protect himself,"[284] "the right to counsel safeguards the other rights deemed essential for the fair prosecution of a criminal proceeding."[285] As it was explained in Powell v. Alabama, "[e]ven the intelligent and educated layman has small and sometimes no skill in the science of law. If charged with crime, he is incapable, generally, of determining for himself whether the indictment is good or bad. He is unfamiliar with the rules of evidence. Left without the aid of counsel, he may be put on trial without a proper charge, and convicted upon incompetent evidence, or evidence irrelevant to the issue or otherwise inadmissible. He lacks both the skill and knowledge adequately to prepare his defense, even though he have a perfect one. He requires the guiding hand of counsel at every stage of the proceedings against him."[286] The Court thus has recognized that "the assistance of counsel cannot be limited to participation in a trial; to deprive a person of counsel during the period prior to trial may be more damaging than denial of counsel during the trial itself. Recognizing that the right to the assistance of counsel is shaped by the need for [283] Alabama v. Shelton, 535 U.S. 654, 658 (2002) (emphasis added).

---

In Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976), the Court held the right to counsel inapplicable to summary court-martial defendants. The Uniform Code of Military Justice provided four methods for disposing of cases involving offenses committed by servicemen: the general, special, and summary courts-martial, and disciplinary punishment administered by the commanding officer pursuant to Article 15. General and special courts-martial resembled judicial proceedings, nearly always presided over by lawyer judges with lawyer counsel for both the prosecution and the defense. General courts-martial were authorized to award any lawful sentence, including death. Special courts-martial might award a bad-conduct discharge, up to six months' confinement at hard labor, forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for six months, and, in the case of an enlisted member, reduction to the lowest pay grade. Article 15 punishment, conducted personally by the accused's commanding officer, was an administrative method of dealing with the most minor offenses. The summary court-martial occupied a position between informal non-judicial disposition under Article 15 and the courtroom-type procedure of the general and special courts-martial. Its purpose, was "to exercise justice promptly for relatively minor offenses under a simple form of procedure." It was an informal proceeding conducted by a single commissioned officer with jurisdiction only over non-commissioned officers and other enlisted personnel. The presiding officer acted as judge, fact finder, prosecutor, and defense counsel. The presiding officer should inform the accused of the charges and the name of the accuser and call all witnesses whom he or the accused desired to call. The accused should consent to trial by summary court-martial; if he did not do so, trial could be ordered by special or general court-martial. The maximum sentence elements that might be imposed by summary courts-martial were: one month's confinement at hard labor; 45 days' hard labor without confinement; two months' restriction to specified limits; reduction to the lowest enlisted pay grade; and forfeiture of two-thirds pay for one month. Assuming, for purposes of its opinion, that the Sixth Amendment applied to courts-martial in general, the Court held that, because of their special characteristics, summary courts-martial in particular were simply not "criminal prosecutions" within the meaning of the Sixth Amendment.

[284] Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 462–63 (1938).

[285] Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 169 (1985).

[286] Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 68–69 (1932).

the assistance of counsel, [the Court has] found that the right attaches at earlier, 'critical' stages in the criminal justice process 'where the results might well settle the accused's fate and reduce the trial itself to a mere formality.'"[287] A pre-trial event constitutes a "critical stage" when the accused "require[s] aid in coping with legal problems or help in meeting his adversary."[288]

[C95] "Once the right to counsel has attached and been asserted, the State must, of course, honor it. This means more than simply that the State cannot prevent the accused from obtaining the assistance of counsel. The Sixth Amendment also imposes on the State an affirmative obligation to respect and preserve the accused's choice to seek this assistance. . . . [In this regard, the Court has] made clear that, at the very least, the prosecutor and police have an affirmative obligation not to act in a manner that circumvents and thereby dilutes the protection afforded by the right to counsel."[289] In a line of cases beginning with Massiah, "the Court has held that, once formal criminal proceedings begin, the Sixth Amendment renders inadmissible in the prosecution's case-in-chief statements 'deliberately elicited' from a defendant without an express waiver of the right to counsel."[290]

[C96] Following his indictment for first-degree murder, the defendant in Spano retained a lawyer and surrendered to the authorities. Before leaving the defendant in police custody, counsel cautioned him not to respond to interrogation. The prosecutor and police questioned the defendant, persisting in the face of his repeated refusal to answer and his repeated request to speak with his lawyer. The lengthy interrogation involved improper police tactics, and the defendant ultimately confessed. Agreeing with the Court that the confession was involuntary, and thus improperly admitted in evidence under the Fourteenth Amendment, the concurring Justices also took the position that

---

[287] Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 170 (1985), quoting United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 224 (1967).

"The purpose of the Sixth Amendment counsel guarantee—and hence the purpose of invoking it—is to protect the unaided layman at critical confrontations with his 'expert adversary,' the government, after the adverse positions of government and defendant have solidified with respect to a particular alleged crime. The purpose of the Miranda-Edwards Fifth Amendment guarantee against compelled self-incrimination, on the other hand—and hence the purpose of invoking it—is to protect a quite different interest: the suspect's desire to deal with the police only through counsel. This is in one respect narrower than the interest protected by the Sixth Amendment guarantee (because it relates only to custodial interrogation), and in another respect broader (because it relates to interrogation regarding any suspected crime and attaches whether or not the 'adversarial relationship' produced by a pending prosecution has yet arisen)." See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 177–78 (1991), where the Court held that an accused's invocation of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel does not constitute an invocation of the Miranda-Edwards right to counsel.

[288] See Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285, 298 (1988), quoting United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300, 313 (1973).

In Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. 680 (1989) (per curiam), the Court held that, once a defendant is formally charged, the Constitution precludes the state from subjecting him to a psychiatric examination, concerning future dangerousness, without notice to counsel, and that such evidence of future dangerousness, taken in deprivation of a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel, cannot be used against him at a sentencing proceeding.

[289] Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 170–01 (1985).

[290] Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 348 (1990).

the defendant's right to counsel was violated by the secret interrogation.[291] The position of the concurring Justices in Spano was adopted by the Court in Massiah. Massiah was indicted, along with a man named Colson, for conspiracy to possess and to distribute cocaine. Massiah retained a lawyer, pleaded not guilty, and was released on bail. Colson, meanwhile, decided to cooperate with government agents in their continuing investigation of the narcotics activity in which Massiah and others were thought to be engaged. Colson permitted a government agent to install a radio transmitter under the front seat of his automobile. Massiah held a lengthy conversation with Colson in this automobile while a government agent listened over the radio. Massiah made several incriminating statements, and these were brought before the jury through the testimony of the government agent. Massiah's conviction was reversed on the ground that the incriminating statements were obtained in violation of Massiah's rights under the Sixth Amendment. The Court held that, once a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached, he is denied that right when federal agents "deliberately elicit" incriminating statements from him in the absence of his lawyer.[292] "The Court adopted this test, rather than one that turned simply on whether the statements were obtained in an 'interrogation,' to protect accused persons from 'indirect and surreptitious interrogations,' as well as those conducted in the jailhouse."[293]

[C97] In Brewer v. Williams, a suspect in the abduction and murder of a ten-year-old girl had fled from the scene of the crime in Des Moines, Iowa, some 160 miles east to Davenport, Iowa, where he surrendered to police. An arrest warrant was issued in Des Moines on a charge of abduction, and the suspect was arraigned on that warrant before a Davenport judge. Des Moines police traveled to Davenport, took Williams into custody, and began the drive back to Des Moines. During the trip, respondent expressed no willingness to be interrogated in the absence of an attorney, but instead stated several times that he would tell the whole story after seeing his Des Moines lawyer. Along the way, one of the police officers, who knew that respondent was a former mental patient and was deeply religious, sought to obtain incriminating remarks from respondent by stating to him during the drive that he felt they should stop and locate the girl's body, because her parents were entitled to a Christian burial for the girl, who was taken away from them on Christmas Eve. Respondent eventually made several incriminating statements in the course of the trip and finally directed the police to the girl's body. The Court thought that the police officer had elicited incriminating remarks from the defendant through his "Christian burial speech." Consequently, it held that the evidence in question had been wrongly admitted at respondent's trial on the ground that he had been denied his constitutional right to the assistance of counsel.[294]

[C98] In United States v. Henry, the Court applied the Massiah test to incriminating statements made to a jailhouse informant. Henry was arrested and indicted for bank robbery. Counsel was appointed, and Henry was held in jail pending trial. Nichols, an inmate at the same jail and a paid informant for the Federal Bureau of Investigation,

---

[291] Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 325–26 (1959) (Douglas, J., concurring, joined by Black and Brennan, JJ.); id. at 326–27 (Stewart, J., concurring, joined by Douglas and Brennan, JJ.).

[292] Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 206 (1964).

[293] See Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 457 (1986), discussing Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 206 (1964).

[294] Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 399–401 (1977).

told a government agent that he was housed in the same cellblock as several federal prisoners, including Henry. The agent told Nichols to pay attention to statements made by these prisoners, but expressly instructed Nichols not to initiate any conversations and not to question Henry regarding the bank robbery. Nichols and Henry subsequently engaged in some conversations during which Henry told Nichols about the robbery. Nichols testified about these conversations at Henry's trial, and Henry was convicted. The Court reversed, finding that the "[b]y intentionally creating a situation likely to induce Henry to make incriminating statements without the assistance of counsel, the Government violated Henry's Sixth Amendment right to counsel." Several facts were emphasized in the Court's opinion: that Nichols was acting as an informant for the government, and therefore had an incentive to produce useful information; that Henry was unaware of Nichols' role as a government informant; and, finally, that Henry and Nichols were incarcerated together at the time the conversations took place. With respect to this last fact, the Court reasoned that confinement may bring into play subtle influences that will make an individual particularly susceptible to the ploys of undercover government agents. Considering Nichols' conversations with Henry in light of these circumstances, the Court concluded that Nichols "deliberately used his position to secure incriminating information from Henry when counsel was not present," in violation of the Sixth Amendment. Although the informant had not questioned the defendant, the informant had "stimulated" conversations with the defendant in order to "elicit" incriminating information; those facts amounted to "indirect and surreptitious interrogation" of the defendant. The government argued that it should not be held responsible for Nichols' conduct, because its agent had instructed Nichols not to question Henry and had not intended that Nichols take affirmative steps to obtain incriminating statements. The Court rejected this argument, finding that, under the circumstances, the agent "must have known" that Nichols would take affirmative steps to secure incriminating information.[295]

[C99] Henry left open the question whether the Sixth Amendment forbids admission in evidence of an accused's statements to a jailhouse informant who was placed in close proximity but made no effort to stimulate conversations about the crime charged. This question was answered negatively in Kuhlmann. There, the Court made clear that "the primary concern of the Massiah line of decisions is secret interrogation by investigatory techniques that are the equivalent of direct police interrogation. Since the Sixth Amendment is not violated whenever—by luck or happenstance—the State obtains incriminating statements from the accused after the right to counsel has attached, . . . a defendant does not make out a violation of that right simply by showing that an informant, either through prior arrangement or voluntarily, reported his incriminating statements to the police. Rather, the defendant must demonstrate that the police and their informant took some action, beyond merely listening, that was designed deliberately to elicit incriminating remarks."[296]

[C100] In Maine v. Moulton, the defendant made incriminating statements in a meeting with his accomplice, who had agreed to cooperate with the police. During that meeting, the accomplice, who wore a wire transmitter to record the conversation, discussed with the defendant the charges pending against him, repeatedly asked the defendant to remind him of the details of the crime, and encouraged the defendant to describe his plan for killing witnesses. The Court concluded that these investigatory techniques denied the defendant his right to counsel on the pending charges. In so doing, the Court emphasized that, because of the relationship between the defendant and the informant, the informant's "engaging [the defendant] in active conversation about their upcoming trial was certain to elicit incriminating statements" from the defendant. Thus, the informant's "merely participating in this conversation was 'the functional equivalent of interrogation.'"[297]

---

295 United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264, 270–74 (1980).

296 Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 459 (1986).

[C101] "For the fruits of post-indictment interrogations to be admissible in a prosecution's case-in-chief, the State must prove a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent relinquishment of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel."[298] The constitutional minimum for determining whether a waiver was "knowing and intelligent" is that the accused be "made sufficiently aware of his right to have counsel present and of the possible consequences of a decision to forgo the aid of counsel."[299] When a suspect waives his right to counsel after receiving warnings equivalent to those prescribed by Miranda, "that will generally suffice to establish a knowing and intelligent waiver of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel for purposes of post-indictment questioning."[300]

[C102] In Michigan v. Jackson, the Court created a bright-line rule for deciding whether an accused, who has "asserted" his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, has subsequently waived that right. "Transposing the reasoning of Edwards v. Arizona, which had announced an identical 'prophylactic rule' in the Fifth Amendment context, the Court decided that, after a defendant requests assistance of counsel, any waiver of Sixth Amendment rights given in a discussion initiated by police is presumed invalid, and evidence obtained pursuant to such a waiver is inadmissible in the prosecution's case-in-chief."[301] However, just as statements taken in violation of only the prophylactic

---

[297] Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 177, n.13 (1985).

[298] Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 348–49 (1990), citing Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285, 292, and n.4 (1988).

[299] Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285, 292–93 (1988).

[300] See Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 349 (1990), discussing Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285 (1988).

In Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77 (2004), the Iowa supreme court had held that a defendant must be advised specifically that waiving counsel's assistance in deciding whether to plead guilty (1) entails the risk that a viable defense will be overlooked and (2) deprives him of the opportunity to obtain an independent opinion on whether, under the facts and applicable law, it is wise to plead guilty. The Court held that neither warning was mandated by the Sixth Amendment, noting, inter alia, that these warnings "might be misconstrued as a veiled suggestion that a meritorious defense exists or that the defendant could plead to a lesser charge, when neither prospect is a realistic one. If a defendant delays his plea in the vain hope that counsel could uncover a tenable basis for contesting or reducing the criminal charge, the prompt disposition of the case will be impeded, and the resources of either the State (if the defendant is indigent) or the defendant himself (if he is financially ineligible for appointed counsel) will be wasted." Id. at 93. In addition, the Court held that "[t]he constitutional requirement of a knowing and intelligent waiver is satisfied when the trial court informs the accused of the nature of the charges against him, of his right to be counseled regarding his plea, and of the range of allowable punishments attendant upon the entry of a guilty plea." Id. at 81.

Incriminating statements pertaining to other crimes, as to which the Sixth Amendment right has not yet attached, are, of course, admissible at a trial of those offenses. See Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 180, n.16 (1985).

[301] See Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 349 (1990), discussing Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625, 636 (1986).

Miranda-Edwards rules are admissible to impeach conflicting testimony by the defendant,[302] the prosecution may use a statement taken in violation of the Jackson rule to impeach a defendant's false or inconsistent testimony.[303]

b. The Right to Counsel of One's Choice

[C103] The Sixth Amendment's guarantee of assistance of counsel comprehends "the right to select and be represented by one's preferred attorney." However, this right "is circumscribed in several important respects. Regardless of his persuasive powers, an advocate who is not a member of the bar may not represent clients (other than himself) in court. Similarly, a defendant may not insist on representation by an attorney he cannot afford, or who for other reasons declines to represent the defendant. Nor may a defendant insist on the counsel of an attorney who has a previous or ongoing relationship with an opposing party, even when the opposing party is the Government."[304]

[C104] Morris v. Slappy held that a state court did not violate a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel by denying his motion for a continuance until the public defender initially assigned to defend him was available. In reaching that conclusion, the Court noted the new defense counsel's statement that he was fully prepared and ready for trial and rejected the claim that the Sixth Amendment guarantees a "meaningful relationship" between an accused and his counsel.[305]

[C105] Caplin & Drysdale involved a federal drug forfeiture statute containing no exemption for assets that a defendant wished to use to pay an attorney who conducted his defense in the criminal case where forfeiture was sought. The Court held that the statute did not offend the Fifth or Sixth Amendments, finding that a defendant cannot escape an otherwise appropriate forfeiture sanction by pointing to his need for counsel to represent him on the underlying charges.[306]

[C106] "[T]he essential aim of the Sixth Amendment is to guarantee an effective advocate for each criminal defendant, rather than to ensure that a defendant will inexorably be represented by the lawyer whom he prefers." Hence, in multiple-representation cases, "a court confronted with and alerted to possible conflicts of interest must take adequate steps to ascertain whether the conflicts warrant separate counsel." Although the Sixth Amendment mandates "a presumption in favor of accepting a criminal defendant's choice of counsel, . . . that presumption may be overcome not only by a demonstration of actual conflict, but [also] by a showing of a serious potential for conflict. The evaluation of the facts and circumstances of each case under this standard must be left primarily to the informed judgment of the trial court."[307]

---

302 See Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971); Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975).
303 See Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 350–51 (1990).
304 Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 159 (1988).
305 Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1, 12–14 (1983).
306 Caplin & Drysdale, Chartered v. United States, 491 U.S. 617, 624–35 (1989).
307 Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 159, 160, 164 (1988).

c. Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel [308]

[C107] "The Sixth Amendment recognizes the right to the assistance of counsel because it envisions counsel's playing a role that is critical to the ability of the adversarial system to produce just results."[309] An accused is entitled to be assisted by an attorney, whether retained or appointed, who plays the role necessary to ensure that the trial is fair. For that reason, the Court has recognized that the right to counsel is the right to the effective assistance of counsel,[310] the essence of which is "the right of the accused to require the prosecution's case to survive the crucible of meaningful adversarial testing."[311] The text of the Sixth Amendment itself suggests as much. The Amendment requires not merely the provision of counsel to the accused, but "Assistance," which is to be "for his defence." Thus, "the core purpose of the counsel guarantee was to assure 'Assistance' at trial, when the accused was confronted with both the intricacies of the law and the advocacy of the public prosecutor."[312] "If no actual 'Assistance' 'for' the accused's 'defence' is provided, then the constitutional guarantee has been violated. To hold otherwise 'could convert the appointment of counsel into a sham and nothing more than a formal compliance with the Constitution's requirement that an accused be given the assistance of counsel.'"[313] "Government violates the right to effective assistance when it interferes in certain ways with the ability of counsel to make independent decisions about how to conduct the defense."[314] "Counsel, however, can also deprive a defendant of the right to effective assistance, simply by failing to render 'adequate legal assistance.'"[315]

[C108] Because there is a presumption that the lawyer is competent to provide the guiding hand that the defendant needs, "the burden rests on the accused to demonstrate a constitutional violation."[316] Strickland announced a two-part test for evaluating claims that a defendant's counsel performed so incompetently in his or her representation of a defendant that the defendant's sentence or conviction should be reversed. Under this test, the defendant must prove two things: first, that counsel's "representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness" and second, that "there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the [308] See also para. C64 (scope of court-appointed appellate counsel's duty to an indigent client).

---

[309] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 685 (1984).

[310] McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 771, n.14 (1970).

[311] United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 656 (1984).

[312] United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300, 309 (1973).

[313] United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 654 (1984), quoting Avery v. Alabama, 308 U.S. 444, 446 (1940).

[314] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 686 (1984), citing Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976) (bar on attorney-client consultation during overnight recess); Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853 (1975) (bar on summation at bench trial); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 612–13 (1972) (requirement that defendant be first defense witness); Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 593–96 (1961) (bar on direct examination of defendant).

[315] Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 686 (1984), citing Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980) (actual conflict of interest adversely affecting lawyer's performance renders assistance ineffective). See also McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 770–71 (1970), where the Court indicated that the accused is entitled to "a reasonably competent attorney," whose advice is "within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases."

[316] United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 658 (1984).

proceeding would have been different; a reasonable probability is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome."[317]

[C109] "The proper measure of attorney performance [is] reasonableness under prevailing professional norms. . . . Representation of a criminal defendant entails certain basic duties. Counsel's function is to assist the defendant, and hence counsel owes the client a duty of loyalty, a duty to avoid conflicts of interest. . . . From counsel's function as assistant to the defendant derives the overarching duty to advocate the defendant's cause and the more particular duties to consult with the defendant on important decisions and to keep the defendant informed of important developments in the course of the prosecution. Counsel also has a duty to bring to bear such skill and knowledge as will render the trial a reliable adversarial testing process. . . . These basic duties neither exhaustively define the obligations of counsel nor form a checklist for judicial evaluation of attorney performance. In any case presenting an ineffectiveness claim, the performance inquiry must be whether counsel's assistance was reasonable considering all the circumstances. . . . Judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential. . . . A fair assessment of attorney performance requires that every effort be made to eliminate the distorting effects of hindsight, to reconstruct the circumstances of counsel's challenged conduct, and to evaluate the conduct from counsel's perspective at the time. Because of the difficulties inherent in making the evaluation, a court must indulge a strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance; that is, the defendant must overcome the presumption that, under the circumstances, the challenged action 'might be considered sound trial strategy.' . . . Thus, a court deciding an actual ineffectiveness claim must judge the reasonableness of counsel's challenged conduct on the facts of the particular case, viewed as of the time of counsel's conduct. A convicted defendant making a claim of ineffective assistance must identify the acts or omissions of counsel that are alleged not to have been the result of reasonable professional judgment. The court must then determine whether, in light of all the circumstances, including the defendant's own statements or actions, the identified acts or omissions were outside the wide range of professionally competent assistance."[318]

[C110] Under the "prejudice" component of the Strickland test, the defendant must show that "counsel's errors were so serious as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial, a trial whose result is reliable."[319] Thus, "an analysis focusing solely on mere outcome determination, without attention to whether the result of the proceeding was fundamentally unfair or unreliable, is defective. . . . Unreliability or unfairness does not result if the ineffectiveness of counsel does not deprive the defendant of any substantive or procedural right to which the law entitles him."[320] For example, even if a defendant's

---

317 Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 688, 694 (1984).

318 Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 688–90 (1984). In Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 171 (1986), the Court held that counsel's refusal to cooperate in presentation of perjury falls "well within . . . the range of reasonable professional conduct acceptable under Strickland."

319 Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687 (1984).

320 Lockhart v. Fretwell, 506 U.S. 364, 369, 372 (1993). There, the Court concluded that, given the overriding interest in fundamental fairness, the likelihood of a different outcome attributable to an incorrect interpretation of the law should be regarded as a potential "windfall" to the defendant rather than the legitimate "prejudice" contemplated by our opinion in Strickland. The death sentence that Arkansas had imposed on Fretwell was based on an aggra-false testimony might have persuaded the jury to acquit him, it is not fundamentally unfair to conclude that he was not prejudiced by counsel's interference with his intended perjury.[321]

[C111] "There are, however, circumstances that are so likely to prejudice the accused that the cost of litigating their effect in a particular case is unjustified. Most obvious, of course, is the complete denial of counsel. . . . The Court has uniformly found constitutional error without any showing of prejudice when counsel was either totally absent or prevented from assisting the accused during a critical stage of the proceeding."[322] "Similarly, if counsel entirely fails to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing, then there has been a denial of Sixth Amendment rights that makes the adversary process itself presumptively unreliable."[323] The same is true "where counsel is called upon to render assistance under circumstances where competent counsel very likely could not."[324] By contrast, "the possibility of prejudice that inheres vating circumstance (murder committed for pecuniary gain) that duplicated an element of the underlying felony (murder in the course of a robbery). Shortly before the trial, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit had held that such "double counting" was impermissible (Collins decision), but Fretwell's lawyer (presumably because he was unaware of the Collins decision) failed to object to the use of the pecuniary gain aggravator. Before Fretwell's claim for federal habeas corpus relief reached the Supreme Court, the Collins case was overruled. Accordingly, even though the Arkansas trial judge probably would have sustained a timely objection to the double counting, it had become clear that the state had a right to rely on the disputed aggravating circumstance. Because the ineffectiveness of Fretwell's counsel had not deprived him of any substantive or procedural right to which the law entitled him, the Court held that his claim did not satisfy the "prejudice" component of the Strickland test.

---

321 See Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 175–76 (1986).

322 See United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 658–59, n.25 (1984), citing Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976) (attorney-client consultation prevented during overnight recess); Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853 (1975) (bar on summation at bench trial); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 612–13 (1972) (requirement that defendant be first defense witness); Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 593–96 (1961) (bar on direct examination of defendant); White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963) (absence of counsel from arraignment proceeding that affected entire trial because defenses not asserted were irretrievably lost); Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961) (same).

323 United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 659 (1984).

324 Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685, 696 (2002), citing United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 659–62 (1984), where the Court discussed Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), as follows: "The defendants had been indicted for a highly publicized capital offense. Six days before trial, the trial judge appointed 'all the members of the bar' for purposes of arraignment. 'Whether they would represent the defendants thereafter if no counsel appeared in their behalf was a matter of speculation only, or, as the judge indicated, of mere anticipation on the part of the court.' . . . On the day of trial, a lawyer from Tennessee appeared on behalf of persons 'interested' in the defendants, but stated that he had not had an opportunity to prepare the case or to familiarize himself with local procedure, and therefore was unwilling to represent the defendants on such short notice. The problem was resolved when the court decided that the Tennessee lawyer would represent the defendants, with whatever help the local bar could provide. 'The defendants, young, ignorant, illiterate, surrounded by hostile sentiment, haled back and forth under guard of soldiers, charged with an atrocious crime regarded with especial horror in the community where they were to be tried, were thus put in peril of their lives within a few moments after counsel for the first time charged with any degree of responsibility began to represent them.' . . . The Court held that 'such designation of counsel as was attempted was either so indefinite or so close upon the trial as to amount to a denial of effective and substantial aid in that regard.' . . .

in almost every instance of multiple representation" does not justify "the adoption of an inflexible rule that would presume prejudice in all such cases. Instead, [the Court] 'presume[s] prejudice only if the defendant demonstrates that counsel actively represented conflicting interests and that an actual conflict of interest adversely affected his lawyer's performance.'"[325]

d. The Defendant's Right to Self-Representation

[C112] In Faretta, the Court considered the case of a criminal defendant who was required to present his defense exclusively through counsel. The Court "held that an accused has a Sixth Amendment right to conduct his own defense at trial, provided only that he knowingly and intelligently forgoes his right to counsel and that he is able and willing to abide by rules of procedure and courtroom protocol."[326] Faretta stressed that, "[u]nless the accused has acquiesced in [representation through counsel], the defense presented is not the defense guaranteed him by the Constitution, for, in a very real sense, it is not his defense."[327] This "holding was based on the longstanding recognition of a right of self-representation in federal and most state courts, and on the language, structure, and spirit of the Sixth Amendment. Under that Amendment, it is the accused, not counsel, who must be 'informed of the nature and cause of the accusation,' who has the right to confront witnesses, and who must be accorded 'compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor.' The Counsel Clause itself, which permits the accused 'to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence,' implies a right in the defendant to conduct his own defense, with assistance at what, after all, is his, not counsel's trial."[328]

The Court did not examine the actual performance of counsel at trial, but instead concluded that, under these circumstances, the likelihood that counsel could have performed as an effective adversary was so remote as to have made the trial inherently unfair."

[325] See Burger v. Kemp, 483 U.S. 776, 783 (1987), quoting Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 692 (1984). See also Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162, 173–74 (2002).

[326] See McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168, 173 (1984), discussing Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). As the Court cautioned in the latter case, "[a]lthough a defendant need not himself have the skill and experience of a lawyer in order competently and intelligently to choose self-representation, he should be made aware of the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation, so that the record will establish that he knows what he is doing and his choice is made with eyes open." Id. at 835.

[327] Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 821 (1975).

[328] See McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168, 174 (1984), discussing Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975).

The federal appellate courts have split on whether Faretta implies a right of the pro se defendant to have access to a law library. In Kane v. Espitia, 546 U.S. 9 (2005), the Court did not resolve that question, but made clear that Faretta does not, as 28 U.S.C. Section 2254(d)(1) requires for habeas corpus relief, "clearly establis[h]" the law library access right.

In Martinez v. Court of Appeal of California, 528 U.S. 152 (2000), the Court held that, under the Sixth Amendment and the Due Process Clauses of the Federal Constitution, there is no right to self-representation on direct appeal from a criminal conviction. The Court reasoned that (1) the Sixth Amendment deals strictly with trial rights, and does not include any right to appeal; (2) the risk of disloyalty by a court-appointed attorney is not a sufficient concern to conclude that such a right is a necessary component of a fair appellate proceeding; and (3) the states are clearly within their discretion to conclude that the government's interest in the fair and efficient administration of the appellate process outweighs an invasion of the appellant's interest in self-representation.

[C113] "A defendant's right to self-representation plainly encompasses certain specific rights to have his voice heard. The pro se defendant must be allowed to control the organization and content of his own defense, to make motions, to argue points of law, to participate in voir dire, to question witnesses, and to address the court and the jury at appropriate points in the trial. . . . [Nevertheless, a] defendant does not have a constitutional right to receive personal instruction from the trial judge on courtroom procedure. Nor does the Constitution require judges to take over chores for a pro se defendant that would normally be attended to by trained counsel as a matter of course."[329]

[C114] The right to self-representation is not absolute. The trial judge "may terminate self-representation by a defendant who deliberately engages in serious and obstructionist misconduct. . . . Of course, a State may—even over objection by the accused—appoint a 'standby counsel' to aid the accused, and to be available to represent the accused in the event that termination of the defendant's self-representation is necessary."[330] However, the right to proceed pro se may be undermined by unsolicited and excessively intrusive participation by standby counsel. "In determining whether a defendant's Faretta rights have been respected, the primary focus must be on whether he had a fair chance to present his case in his own way. . . . Accordingly, the Faretta right must impose some limits on the extent of standby counsel's unsolicited participation. First, the pro se defendant is entitled to preserve actual control over the case he chooses to present to the jury. If standby counsel's participation over the defendant's objection effectively allows counsel to make or substantially interfere with any significant tactical decisions, or to control the questioning of witnesses, or to speak instead of the defendant on any matter of importance, the Faretta right is eroded. Second, participation by standby counsel without the defendant's consent should not be allowed to destroy the jury's perception that the defendant is representing himself. The defendant's appearance in the status of one conducting his own defense is important in a criminal trial, since the right to appear pro se exists to affirm the accused's individual dignity and autonomy. . . . Participation by standby counsel outside the presence of the jury engages only the first of these two limitations. . . . Thus, Faretta rights are adequately vindicated in proceedings outside the presence of the jury if the pro se defendant is allowed to address the court freely on his own behalf and if disagreements between counsel and the pro se defendant are resolved in the defendant's favor whenever the matter is one that would normally be left to the discretion of counsel."[331] If "a defendant elects to have counsel appear before the court or jury, his complaints concerning counsel's subsequent unsolicited participation lose much of their force. A defendant does not have a constitutional right to choreograph special appearances by counsel. Once a pro se defendant invites or agrees to any substantial participation by counsel, subsequent appearances by counsel must be presumed to be with the defendant's acquiescence, at least until the defendant expressly and unambiguously renews his request that standby counsel be silenced. Faretta rights are also not infringed when standby counsel assists the pro se defendant in overcoming routine procedural or evidentiary obstacles to the completion of some specific task, such as introducing evidence or objecting to testimony, that the defendant has clearly shown he wishes to complete. Nor are they infringed when counsel merely helps to ensure the defendant's compliance with basic rules of courtroom

---

329 McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168, 174, 183–84 (1984).

330 Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 834, n.46 (1975).

331 McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168, 177–79 (1984).

protocol and procedure. In neither case is there any significant interference with the defendant's actual control over the presentation of his defense. . . . The likelihood that the defendant's appearance in the status of one defending himself will be eroded is also slight, and, in any event, it is tolerable. Accordingly, . . . a defendant's Sixth Amendment rights are not violated when a trial judge appoints standby counsel—even over the defendant's objection—to relieve the judge of the need to explain and enforce basic rules of courtroom protocol or to assist the defendant in overcoming routine obstacles that stand in the way of the defendant's achievement of his own clearly indicated goals."[332]

3. Safeguards Regarding Show-Ups, Line-Ups, and Other Pre-Trial Identification Procedures

[C115] In Wade and Gilbert, the Court held that "a post-indictment pretrial lineup at which the accused is exhibited to identifying witnesses is a critical stage of the criminal prosecution, and that police conduct of such a lineup without notice to and in the absence of his counsel denies the accused his Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment right to counsel and calls in question the admissibility at trial of the in-court identifications of the accused by witnesses who attended the lineup."[333] "Those cases further held that no 'in-court identifications' are admissible in evidence if their 'source' is a lineup conducted in violation of this constitutional standard."[334] "Only a per se exclusionary rule as to such testimony can be an effective sanction," the Court explained, "to assure that law enforcement authorities will respect the accused's constitutional right to the presence of his counsel at the critical lineup."[335]

[C116] Kirby declined to extend the Wade-Gilbert per se exclusionary rule to identification testimony based upon a police station show-up that took place before the defendant had been indicted or otherwise formally charged with any criminal offense.[336] Ash held that there is no Sixth Amendment right to counsel whatsoever at a post-indictment photographic display identification, because this procedure is not one at which the accused requires aid in coping with legal problems or assistance in meeting his adversary.[337]

---

[332] Id. at 183–84.

[333] Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 272 (1967); United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967).

[334] See Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682, 683 (1972)

[335] Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 273 (1967).

[336] Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972).

[337] See United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300, 313 (1973). The Court also noted: "Pre-trial photographic identifications . . . are hardly unique in offering possibilities for the actions of the prosecutor unfairly to prejudice the accused. Evidence favorable to the accused may be withheld; testimony of witnesses may be manipulated; the results of laboratory tests may be contrived. In many ways, the prosecutor, by accident or by design, may improperly subvert the trial. The primary safeguard against abuses of this kind is the ethical responsibility of the prosecutor, who, as so often has been said, may 'strike hard blows,' but not 'foul ones.' Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88 (1935); Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87–88 (1963). If that safeguard fails, review remains available under due process standards. See Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972); Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 112 (1935); Miller v. Pate, 386 U.S. 1 (1967); Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973). These same safeguards apply to misuse of photographs. See Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 384 (1968). We are not persuaded that the risks inherent in the use of photographic displays are so pernicious that an extraordinary system of safeguards is required. "Id. at 320–21.

[C117] Of course, this does not suggest that there may not be occasions during the course of a criminal investigation when the police do abuse identification procedures. Such abuses are not beyond the reach of the Constitution. When a person has not been formally charged with a criminal offense, Stovall strikes the appropriate constitutional balance between the right of a suspect to be protected from prejudicial procedures and the interest of society in the prompt and purposeful investigation of an unsolved crime. That case concerned a petitioner who had been convicted in a New York court of murder. He was arrested the day following the crime and was taken by the police to a hospital where the victim's wife, also wounded in the assault, was a patient. After observing Stovall and hearing him speak, she identified him as the murderer. She later made an in-court identification. On federal habeas, Stovall claimed the identification testimony violated his Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the petition, and the court of appeals, en banc, affirmed. The Court also affirmed. "On the identification issue, the Court reviewed the practice of showing a suspect singly for purposes of identification, and the claim that this was so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification that it constituted a denial of due process of law. The Court noted that the practice 'has been widely condemned,' . . . but it concluded that 'a claimed violation of due process of law in the conduct of a confrontation depends on the totality of the circumstances surrounding it.' . . . In that case, showing Stovall to the victim's spouse was 'imperative.' The Court then quoted the observations of the Court of Appeals, . . . to the effect that the spouse was the only person who could possibly exonerate the accused; that the hospital was not far from the courthouse and jail; that no one knew how long she might live; that she was not able to visit the jail; and that taking Stovall to the hospital room was the only feasible procedure, and, under the circumstances, 'the usual police station line-up . . . was out of the question.'"[338]

[C118] Subsequently, in Simmons, where the witnesses made in-court identifications arguably stemming from previous exposure to a suggestive photographic array, the Court restated the governing test: "each case must be considered on its own facts, and . . . convictions based on eye witness identification at trial following a pretrial identification by photograph will be set aside on that ground only if the photographic identification procedure was so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification." Again the Court found the identification procedure to be supportable, relying both on the need for prompt utilization of other investigative leads and on the likelihood that the photographic identifications were reliable, the witnesses having viewed the bank robbers for periods of up to five minutes under good lighting conditions at the time of the robbery.[339]

In Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 384 (1968), the Court stated: "Despite the hazards of initial identification by photograph, this procedure has been used widely and effectively in criminal law enforcement, from the standpoint both of apprehending offenders and of sparing innocent suspects the ignominy of arrest by allowing eyewitnesses to exonerate them through scrutiny of photographs. The danger that use of the technique may result in convictions based on misidentification may be substantially lessened by a course of cross-examination at trial which exposes to the jury the method's potential for error."

[338] See Manson v. Braithwaite, 432 U.S. 98, 104 (1977), discussing and quoting Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 301–02 (1967).

[339] Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 384–85 (1968).

[C119] In Foster v. California, the witness failed to identify Foster the first time he confronted him, despite a suggestive line-up. The police then arranged a show-up, at which the witness could make only a tentative identification. Ultimately, at yet another confrontation, this time a line-up, the witness was able to muster a definite identification. The Court concluded that "the suggestive elements in this identification procedure made it all but inevitable that David would identify petitioner whether or not he was, in fact, 'the man.' In effect, the police repeatedly said to the witness, 'This is the man.' This procedure so undermined the reliability of the eyewitness identification as to violate due process."[340]

[C120] Neil v. Biggers concerned a respondent who had been convicted in a Tennessee court of rape, on evidence consisting in part of the victim's visual and voice identification of Biggers at a stationhouse show-up seven months after the crime. The victim had been in her assailant's presence for some time and had directly observed him indoors and under a full moon outdoors. She testified that she had "no doubt" that Biggers was her assailant. She previously had given the police a description of the assailant. She had made no identification of others presented at previous show-ups, line-ups, or through photographs. On federal habeas, the district court held that the confrontation was so suggestive as to violate due process. The court of appeals affirmed. The Court reversed on that issue, and held that the evidence properly had been allowed to go to the jury. The Court expressed concern about the lapse of seven months between the crime and the confrontation, and observed that this would be a seriously negative factor in most cases. The central question, however, was whether "under the totality of the circumstances, the identification was reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive." Applying that test, the Court found "no substantial likelihood of misidentification."[341]

[C121] Manson reaffirmed that "reliability is the linchpin in determining the admissibility of identification testimony." "The factors to be considered . . . include the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, the witness' degree of attention, the accuracy of his prior description of the criminal, the level of certainty demonstrated at the confrontation, and the time between the crime and the confrontation. Against these factors is to be weighed the corrupting effect of the suggestive identification itself."[342]

---

[340] Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440, 442–43 (1969).

[341] Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188, 199–201 (1972) (emphasis added).

[342] Manson v. Braithwaite, 432 U.S. 98, 114 (1977). In that case, Glover, a trained police officer, had a sufficient opportunity to view the suspect, accurately described him, positively identified respondent's photograph as that of the suspect, and made the photograph identification only two days after the crime. The Court held that, although identifications arising from single-photograph displays may be viewed in general with suspicion, the foregoing indicators of Glover's ability to make an accurate identification were hardly outweighed by the corrupting effect of the challenged identification, for, in the specific case, there was little pressure on the witness to acquiesce in the suggestion that such a display entailed. A police officer had left the photograph at Glover's office, and was not present when Glover first viewed it two days after the event. There thus was little urgency, and Glover could view the photograph at his leisure. And since Glover examined the photograph alone, there was no coercive pressure to make an identification arising from the presence of another. The identification was made in circumstances allowing care and reflection. Hence, the Court could not say that, under all the circumstances of this case, there was a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. Id. at 114–16.

4. The Excessive Bail Clause

[C122] The Eighth Amendment addresses pre-trial release by providing merely that "[e]xcessive bail shall not be required." "This Clause says nothing about whether bail shall be available at all. . . . The only arguable substantive limitation of the Bail Clause is that the Government's proposed conditions of release or detention not be 'excessive' in light of the perceived evil. . . . [T]o determine whether the Government's response is excessive, [one] must compare that response against the interest the Government seeks to protect by means of that response. Thus, when the Government has admitted that its only interest is in preventing flight, bail must be set by a court at a sum designed to ensure that goal, and no more."[343] But "when Congress has mandated detention on the basis of a compelling interest other than prevention of flight," such as the government's interest in community safety, "the Eighth Amendment does not require release on bail."[344]

5. Standard and Burden of Proof[345]

[C123] Proof of a criminal charge beyond a reasonable doubt is constitutionally required. Winship held that the Due Process Clause protects the accused "against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged."[346] A "reasonable doubt" has been described as one "based on reason, which arises from the evidence or lack of evidence."[347] Hence, Winship "presupposes as an essential of the due process guarantee that no person will be made to suffer the onus of a criminal conviction except upon sufficient proof."[348]

[C124] Generally, in a criminal case, the prosecution bears both the burden of producing evidence and the burden of persuasion.[349] Nevertheless, presumptions may be used to encourage the jury to find certain (elemental) facts, with respect to which no direct evidence is presented, solely because other (basic) facts have been proved. Such encouragement can be provided either by statutory presumptions or by presumptions created in the common law.[350] A permissive inference or presumption "leaves the trier of fact free to credit or reject the inference and does not shift the burden of proof. Hence, it affects the application of the beyond a reasonable doubt' standard only if, under the facts of the case, there is no rational way the trier could make the connection permitted by the inference. . . . [By contrast, a mandatory rebuttable presumption] may affect not only the strength of the 'no reasonable doubt' burden, but also the placement of that burden; it tells the trier that he or they must find the elemental fact upon 343 United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 752, 754 (1987), citing Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1, 5 (1951).

---

344 Id. at 754–55.

345 See also para. C153 (facts treated as sentencing factors).

346 In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970).

347 See Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356, 360 (1972) (citing cases).

348 Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 316 (1979).

349 See, e.g., Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684, 702, n.31 (1975). A jury instruction violates due process of it fails to give effect to the requirement that the state prove every element of the offense. See Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510, 520–21 (1979).

350 See County Court of Ulster County v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140, 168, n.1 (1979) (Powell, J., dissenting).

proof of the basic fact, at least unless the defendant has come forward with some evidence to rebut the presumed connection between the two facts. . . . In this situation, the Court has generally examined the presumption on its face to determine the extent to which the basic and elemental facts coincide. . . . To the extent that the trier of fact is forced to abide by the presumption, and may not reject it based on an independent evaluation of the particular facts presented by the State, the analysis of the presumption's constitutional validity is logically divorced from those facts and based on the presumption's accuracy in the run of cases."[351]

[C125] In Tot, the Court had before it a federal statute that made it a crime for one previously convicted of a crime of violence to receive any firearm or ammunition in an inter-state transaction. The statute further provided that "the possession of a firearm or ammunition by any such person shall be presumptive evidence that such firearm or ammunition was shipped or transported or received, as the case may be, by such person in violation of this Act." The Court held: "[A] statutory presumption cannot be sustained if there be no rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, if the inference of the one from proof of the other is arbitrary because of lack of connection between the two in common experience. This is not to say that a valid presumption may not be created upon a view of relation broader than that a jury might take in a specific case. But where the inference is so strained as not to have a reasonable relation to the circumstances of life as we know them, it is not competent for the legislature to create it as a rule governing the procedure of courts."[352] "The Tot Court reduced to the status of a 'corollary' another test which had some support in prior decisions: whether it was more convenient for the defendant or for the Government to supply proof of the ultimate fact which the presumption permitted to be inferred."[353] The Court stated that "[t]he argument from convenience is admissible only where the inference is a permissible one."[354] "The Court rejected entirely another suggested test with some backing in the case law, according to which the presumption should be sustained if Congress might legitimately have made it a crime to commit the basic act from which the presumption allowed an inference to be drawn."[355] "Applying the 'rational connection' test, the Court held the Tot presumption unconstitutional. The Court rejected the contention that, because most States forbade intrastate acquisition of firearms without a record of the transaction or registration of ownership, it could be inferred merely from possession that an acquisition which did not meet these requirements must have been interstate, noting the alternative possibilities of unlawful intra-state acquisition and inter-state shipment prior to the beginning of state regulation."[356]

---

[351] Id. at 157–59.

Even if there may be ample evidence in the record other than an invalid presumption to support a conviction, the conviction must be reversed, as long as there is no certainty that the jury did not rely on the presumption. See Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 30–32 (1969).

[352] Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 467–68 (1943).

[353] See Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 34, n.59 (1969), discussing Tot and citing Morrison v. California, 291 U.S. 82 (1934); Rossi v. United States, 289 U.S. 89 (1933).

[354] Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 469 (1943).

[355] See Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 34, n.60 (1969), discussing Tot and citing Ferry v. Ramsey, 277 U.S. 88 (1928).

[356] See Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 34–35 (1969), discussing Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 468 (1943).

[C126] The statutory presumption in Gainey permitted a jury to infer from a defendant's presence at an illegal still that he was "carrying on" the business of a distiller "unless the defendant explains such presence to the satisfaction of the jury." The Court held that the presumption should be tested by the "rational connection" standard announced in Tot, adding that "[th]e process of making the determination of rationality is, by its nature, highly empirical, and, in matters not within specialized judicial competence or completely commonplace, significant weight should be accorded the capacity of Congress to amass the stuff of actual experience and cull conclusions from it." Applying these principles, the Court sustained the Gainey presumption, finding that it "did no more than accord to the evidence, if unexplained, its natural probative force," in light of the common knowledge that illegal stills were secluded, secret operations.[357]

[C127] The following term, the Court determined, however, that presence at an illegal still could not support the inference that the defendant was in possession, custody, or control of the still, a narrower offense. While stating that the result in Gainey was entirely justified, since presence at an operating still was sufficient evidence to prove the charge of "carrying on," because anyone present at the site was very probably connected with the illegal enterprise, the Court concluded: "Presence is relevant and admissible evidence in a trial on a possession charge; but absent some showing of the defendant's function at the still, its connection with possession is too tenuous to permit a reasonable inference of guilt."[358]

[C128] Leary involved a challenge to a statutory inference that possession of marihuana, unless satisfactorily explained, was sufficient to prove that the defendant knew that the marihuana had been illegally imported into the United States. "The Court concluded that in view of the significant possibility that any given marihuana was domestically grown and the improbability that a marihuana user would know whether his marihuana was of domestic or imported origin, the inference did not meet the standards set by Tot, Gainey, and Romano."[359] Referring to these three cases, the Leary Court stated that an inference is "irrational" or "arbitrary," and hence unconstitutional, "unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend."[360] The Court invalidated the statute, finding there to be insufficient basis in fact for the conclusion that those who possess marihuana are more likely than not to know that it was imported illegally. In a footnote, the Court stated that, since the challenged inference failed to satisfy the "more likely than not" standard, it did not have to "reach the question whether a criminal presumption which passes muster when so judged must also satisfy the criminal 'reasonable doubt' standard if proof of the crime charged or an essential element thereof depends upon its use."[361]

[C129] In Turner, the Court considered the constitutionality of instructing the jury that it may infer from possession of heroin and cocaine that the defendant knew these drugs had been illegally imported. The Court noted that Leary reserved the question of whether the "more likely than not" or the "reasonable doubt" standard controlled in

---

357 United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 67–71 (1965).

358 United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136, 141 (1965).

359 See Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 842 (1973), discussing Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969).

360 Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 36 (1969).

361 Id. at 36, n.64.

criminal cases, but it likewise found no need to resolve that question. It held that the inference with regard to heroin was valid judged by either standard, since it was abundantly clear that little, if any, heroin was made the United States. With regard to cocaine, the inference failed to satisfy even the "more likely than not" standard.[362]

[C130] Barnes addressed the constitutionality of a quite different sort of presumption—one that suggested to the jury that "[p]ossession of recently stolen property, if not satisfactorily explained, is ordinarily a circumstance from which you may reasonably draw the inference . . . that the person in possession knew the property had been stolen." After reviewing the various formulations used by the Court to articulate the constitutionally required basis for a criminal presumption, the Court once again found it unnecessary to choose among them. As for the presumption suggested to the jury in Barnes, the Court found that it was well founded in history, common sense, and experience and therefore upheld it as being "clearly sufficient to enable the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt" that those in the unexplained possession of recently stolen property know it to have been stolen.[363]

[C131] Patterson stressed that "a State must prove every ingredient of an offense beyond a reasonable doubt, and that it may not shift the burden of proof to the defendant by presuming that ingredient upon proof of the other elements of the offense."[364] The Court thus has struck down a state murder statute providing that the element of malice (in the sense of want of provocation) would be presumed upon proof of intent to kill resulting in death, subject to a defendant's right of rebuttal that he had acted on provocation in the heat of passion, which would reduce the offense to manslaughter.[365]

[C132] A mandatory conclusive presumption "removes the presumed element from the case once the State has proved the predicate facts giving rise to the presumption."[366] The Court has held that a conclusive presumption of intent, which testimony cannot overthrow, violates due process, for it "would effectively eliminate intent as an ingredient of the offense," it "would conflict with the overriding presumption of innocence with which the law endows the accused and which extends to every element of the crime," and it "would invade the fact findingfunction" assigned solely to the jury.[367]

6. The Right to Present Evidence

a. Generally

[C133] Few rights are more fundamental than that of an accused to present material evidence in his own defense. However, this right "is not unlimited, but rather is subject to reasonable restrictions."[368] A defendant's interest in presenting such evidence may

---

362 Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398, 405–18 (1970).

363 Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 840, n.3, 845 (1973).

364 See Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 215 (1977), discussing Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975).

365 Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975).

366 Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 314, n.2 (1985).

367 Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510, 522–23 (1979), quoting Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 274–75 (1952).

368 United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 308 (1998) (citing cases).

thus "bow to accommodate other legitimate interests in the criminal trial process,"[369] such as the exclusion of unreliable evidence. "As a result, state and federal rulemakers have broad latitude under the Constitution to establish rules excluding evidence from criminal trials. Such rules do not abridge an accused's right to present a defense so long as they are not 'arbitrary' or 'disproportionate to the purposes they are designed to serve.'"[370] The Court has found "the exclusion of evidence to be unconstitutionally arbitrary or disproportionate only where it has infringed upon a weighty interest of the accused."[371]

[C134] In Washington v. Texas, the Court was confronted with a state statute that prevented persons charged as principals, accomplices, or accessories in the same crime from being introduced as witnesses for one another. The statute was grounded in a concern for the reliability of evidence presented by an interested party: it was thought that, if two persons charged with the same crime were allowed to testify on behalf of each other, each would try to swear the other out of the charge. As the Court recognized, the incompetency of a co-defendant to testify had been rejected on non-constitutional grounds in 1918, when the Court stated: "[T]he conviction of our time [is] that the truth is more likely to be arrived at by hearing the testimony of all persons of competent understanding who may seem to have knowledge of the facts involved in a case, leaving the credit and weight of such testimony to be determined by the jury or by the court."[372] The Court concluded that this reasoning was compelled by the Sixth Amendment's protections for the accused. In particular, the Court reasoned that the Sixth Amendment was designed in part "to make the testimony of a defendant's witnesses admissible on his behalf in court." By preventing the defendant from having the benefit of his accomplice's testimony, the state "arbitrarily denied him the right to put on the stand a witness who was physically and mentally capable of testifying to events that he had personally observed, and whose testimony would have been relevant and material to the defense."[373]

[C135] "Just as a State may not apply an arbitrary rule of competence to exclude a material defense witness from taking the stand, it also may not apply a rule of evidence that permits a witness to take the stand, but arbitrarily excludes material portions of his testimony."[374] In Chambers v. Mississippi, the Court invalidated a state's hearsay rule on

---

[369] Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 55 (1987), quoting Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 295 (1973).

[370] United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 308 (1998), quoting Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 56 (1987).

[371] United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 308 (1998), citing Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 58 (1987); Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973); Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 22–23 (1967).

[372] Rosen v. United States, 245 U.S. 467, 471 (1918).

[373] Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 22–23 (1967). Under the Sixth Amendment, a defendant in a criminal case enjoys the right to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. The Compulsory Process Clause is applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. See Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 17–19 (1967).

In United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 874 (1982), the Court held that due process is violated when testimony is made unavailable to the defense by government deportation of witnesses "only if there is a reasonable likelihood that the testimony could have affected the judgment of the trier of fact."

[374] Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 55 (1987).

the ground that it abridged the defendant's right to present witnesses in his own defense. Chambers was tried for a murder to which another person repeatedly had confessed in the presence of acquaintances. The state's hearsay rule, coupled with a "voucher" rule that did not allow the defendant to cross-examine the confessed murderer directly, prevented Chambers from introducing testimony concerning these confessions, which were critical to his defense. "The Court reversed the judgment of conviction, holding that, when a state rule of evidence conflicts with the right to present witnesses, the rule may 'not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice,' but must meet the fundamental standards of due process. In the Court's view, the State in Chambers did not demonstrate that the hearsay testimony in that case, which bore 'assurances of trustworthiness' including corroboration by other evidence, would be unreliable, and thus the defendant should have been able to introduce the exculpatory testimony."[375]

[C136] "The right to testify on one's own behalf at a criminal trial has sources in several provisions of the Constitution. It is one of the rights that 'are essential to due process of law in a fair adversary process.' . . . The right to testify is also found in the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment, which grants a defendant the right to call 'witnesses in his favor,' a right that is guaranteed in the criminal courts of the States by the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Logically included in the accused's right to call witnesses whose testimony is 'material and favorable to his defense' . . . is a right to testify himself, should he decide it is in his favor to do so. . . . A defendant's opportunity to conduct his own defense by calling witnesses is incomplete if he may not present himself as a witness. The opportunity to testify is also a necessary corollary to the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against compelled testimony. . . . 'The choice of whether to testify in one's own defense . . . is an exercise of the constitutional privilege.' [Hence, an accused has the right] to present his own version of events in his own words."[376] In Rock, the defendant, accused of a killing to which she was the only eyewitness, was allegedly able to remember the facts of the killing only after having her memory hypnotically refreshed. Because Arkansas excluded all hypnotically refreshed testimony, the defendant was unable to testify about certain relevant facts, including whether the killing had been accidental. In holding that the exclusion of this evidence violated the defendant's right to present a defense, the Court noted:

> Despite the unreliability that hypnosis concededly may introduce, however, the procedure has been credited as instrumental in obtaining investigative leads or identifications that were later confirmed by independent evidence.
>
> The inaccuracies the process introduces can be reduced, although perhaps not eliminated, by the use of procedural safeguards. One set of suggested guidelines calls for hypnosis to be performed only by a psychologist or psychiatrist with special training in its use and who is independent of the investigation. . . . These procedures reduce the possibility that biases will be communicated to the hypersuggestive subject by the hypnotist. Suggestion will be less likely also if the hypnosis is conducted in a neutral setting, with no one present but the hypnotist and the subject. Tape or video recording of all interrogations, before, during, and after hypnosis, can help reveal if leading questions were asked. Such guidelines do not guarantee the accuracy of the testimony, because they > cannot control the subject's own motivations or any tendency to confabulate, but they do provide a means of controlling overt suggestions.

---

375 Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973).

376 Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 51–53 (1987) (emphasis added).

>
> The more traditional means of assessing accuracy of testimony also remain applicable in the case of a previously hypnotized defendant. Certain information recalled as a result of hypnosis may be verified as highly accurate by corroborating evidence. Cross-examination, even in the face of a confident defendant, is an effective tool for revealing inconsistencies. Moreover, a jury can be educated to the risks of hypnosis through expert testimony and cautionary instructions. Indeed, it is probably to a defendant's advantage to establish carefully the extent of his memory prior to hypnosis, in order to minimize the decrease in credibility the procedure might introduce.
>
> We are not now prepared to endorse without qualifications the use of hypnosis as an investigative tool; scientific understanding of the phenomenon and of the means to control the effects of hypnosis is still in its infancy. Arkansas, however, has not justified the exclusion of all of a defendant's testimony that the defendant is unable to prove to be the product of prehypnosis memory. A State's legitimate interest in barring unreliable evidence does not extend to per se exclusions that may be reliable in an individual case. Wholesale inadmissibility of a defendant's testimony is an arbitrary restriction on the right to testify in the absence of clear evidence by the State repudiating the validity of all posthypnosis recollections. The State would be well within its powers if it established guidelines to aid trial courts in the evaluation of posthypnosis testimony and it may be able to show that testimony in a particular case is so unreliable that exclusion is justified. But it has not shown that hypnotically enhanced testimony is always so untrustworthy and so immune to the traditional means of evaluating credibility that it should disable a defendant from presenting her version of the events for which she is on trial.[377]

In that case, the defective condition of the gun, which was prone to fire, when hit or dropped, without the trigger's being pulled, corroborated the details petitioner remembered about the shooting. The tape recordings provided some means to evaluate the hypnosis, and the trial judge concluded that the doctor did not suggest responses with leading questions. Those circumstances presented an argument for admissibility of Rock's testimony, an argument that should have been considered by the trial court.[378]

[C137] Scheffer presented the question whether a Military Rule of Evidence, which made polygraph evidence inadmissible in court-martial proceedings, unconstitutionally abridged the right of accused members of the military to present a defense. First, the Court found that the rule was "a rational and proportional means of advancing the legitimate interest in barring unreliable evidence," for, "[a]lthough the degree of reliability of polygraph evidence may depend upon a variety of identifiable factors, there is simply no way to know in a particular case whether a polygraph examiner's conclusion is accurate, because certain doubts and uncertainties plagued even the best polygraph exams." In addition, Rock, Washington, and Chambers did not require that the rule be invalidated, because, unlike the evidentiary rules at issue in those cases, the rule did not implicate any significant interest of the accused. In Scheffer, "the court members heard

---

377 Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 60–61 (1987) (emphasis added).

378 Id. at 62.

all the relevant details of the charged offense from the perspective of the accused, and the Rule did not preclude him from introducing any factual evidence. Rather, respondent was barred merely from introducing expert opinion testimony to bolster his own credibility. Moreover, [the Rule] did not prohibit respondent from testifying on his own behalf; he freely exercised his choice to convey his version of the facts to the court-martial members." The Court therefore could not "conclude that respondent's defense was significantly impaired by the exclusion of polygraph evidence." The rule was thus constitutional.[379]

b. Discovery and Disclosure

[C138] Brady held that "the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution."[380] The Court has since held that the duty to disclose such evidence is applicable, even though there has been no request by the accused,[381] and that the duty encompasses impeachment evidence, as well as exculpatory evidence.[382] Such evidence is material "if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different."[383] Moreover, the rule encompasses evidence known only to police investigators and not to the prosecutor.[384] In order to comply with Brady, therefore, the prosecutor "has a duty to learn of any favorable evidence known to the others acting on the government's behalf in this case, including the police."[385]

[C139] "These cases, together with earlier cases condemning the knowing use of perjured testimony,[386] illustrate the special role played by the American prosecutor in the search for truth in criminal trials. Within the federal system, for example, the Court has said that the United States Attorney is 'the representative not of an ordinary party to a controversy, but of a sovereignty whose obligation to govern impartially is as compelling as its obligation to govern at all; and whose interest, therefore, in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done.'"[387] "This special status explains both the basis for the prosecution's broad duty of disclosure and the conclusion that not every violation of that duty necessarily establishes that the outcome was unjust. . . . [Thus,] there is never a real "Brady violation" unless the nondisclosure was so serious that there is a reasonable probability that the suppressed evidence would have

---

379 United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 312, 316–17 (1998).

380 Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87 (1963).

381 United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 107 (1976).

382 United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 676 (1985).

383 Id. at 682. Information that may be deemed immaterial upon original examination may become important as the proceedings progress, and the court would be obligated to release information material to the fairness of the trial. See Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 60 (1987).

384 Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995).

385 Id. at 437.

386 See, e.g., Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 112 (1935) (per curiam); Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213, 216 (1942); Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 269–70 (1959).

387 Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281 (1999), quoting Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88 (1935).

produced a different verdict. There are three components of a true Brady violation: the evidence at issue must be favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory or because it is impeaching; that evidence must have been suppressed by the State, either willfully or inadvertently; and prejudice must have ensued."[388]

[C140] But a defendant's claim that he has a right to notice of the evidence, which the state plans to use to prove the charges, stands on quite a different footing. The Due Process Clause "has little to say regarding the amount of discovery which the parties must be afforded."[389] In Weatherford, the Court considered the due process claim of a defendant who had been convicted with the aid of surprise testimony of an accomplice who was an undercover agent. Although the prosecutor had not intended to introduce the agent's testimony, he changed his mind the day of trial. To keep his cover, the agent had told the defendant and his counsel that he would not testify against the defendant. The Court rejected the defendant's claim, explaining that "[t]here is no general constitutional right to discovery in a criminal case, and Brady," which addressed only exculpatory evidence, "did not create one."[390]

[C141] In Williams v. Florida, the Court upheld a Florida rule that required a criminal defendant to notify the state in advance of trial of any alibi witnesses that he intended to call. The Court observed that the notice requirement "by itself in no way affected [the defendant's] crucial decision to call alibi witnesses. . . . At most, the rule only compelled [the defendant] to accelerate the timing of his disclosure, forcing him to divulge at an earlier date information that [he] planned to divulge at trial." Accelerating the disclosure of this evidence did not violate the Constitution, the Court explained, because a criminal trial is not "a poker game in which players enjoy an absolute right always to conceal their cards until played."[391] In a subsequent decision, the Court described notice requirements as "a salutary development which, by increasing the evidence available to both parties, enhances the fairness of the adversary system."[392] This does not mean, of

---

[388] Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281–82 (1999).

"A defendant's right to discover exculpatory evidence does not include the unsupervised authority to search through the [State's] files. . . . In the typical case where a defendant makes only a general request for exculpatory material under Brady, . . . it is the State that decides which information must be disclosed. Unless defense counsel becomes aware that other exculpatory evidence was withheld and brings it to the court's attention, the prosecutor's decision on disclosure is final. Defense counsel has no constitutional right to conduct his own search of the State's files to argue relevance." See Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 59 (1987). That case involved the confidentiality of the Commonwealth's investigative files concerning child abuse. The Court found that Ritchie's interest (as well as that of the Commonwealth) in ensuring a fair trial could be protected fully by requiring that the files be submitted only to the trial court for in camera review. Id. at 60.

In Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), by contrast, the Court recognized that the Due Process Clause "requires a different result when we deal with the failure of the State to preserve evidentiary material of which no more can be said than that it could have been subjected to tests, the results of which might have exonerated the defendant." The Court concluded that the failure to preserve this "potentially useful evidence" does not violate due process "unless a criminal defendant can show bad faith on the part of the police." Id. at 57–58 (emphasis added).

[389] Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 474 (1973).

[390] Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559–60 (1977). See also Gray v. Netherland, 518 U.S. 152, 168–69 (1996).

[391] Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 82, 85 (1970).

[392] Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 474 (1973). The Court held in that case that state course, that all notice requirements pass constitutional muster; for example, a brief notice period contravenes the Constitution if it is "arbitrary or disproportionate to the State's legitimate interests."[393]

[C142] Evidence may be excluded on account of a defendant's failure to comply with a discovery rule. In Taylor v. Illinois, the defendant violated a state procedural rule by failing to identify a particular defense witness in response to a pre-trial discovery request. The trial court sanctioned this violation by refusing to allow the undisclosed witness to testify. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that, under the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment, "preclusion is never a permissible sanction for a discovery violation."[394] Taylor "did not hold that preclusion is permissible every time a discovery rule is violated. Rather, [the Court] acknowledged that alternative sanctions 'would be adequate and appropriate in most cases.'"[395] The Court "stated explicitly, however, that there could be circumstances in which preclusion was justified because a less severe penalty 'would perpetuate, rather than limit, the prejudice to the State and the harm to the adversary process.'"[396] Taylor was such a case. The trial court found that Taylor's discovery violation amounted to "willful misconduct" and was designed to obtain "a tactical advantage." Based on these findings, the Court determined that, "[r]egardless of whether prejudice to the prosecution could have been avoided" by a lesser penalty, "the severest sanction [wa]s appropriate."[397]

c. The Confrontation Clause

[C143] The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment provides: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him." Since the right of confrontation and cross-examination is an essential and fundamental requirement for the kind of fair trial, the clause is made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.[398] notice-of-alibi requirements could be enforced only if the state provided reciprocal discovery rights for the defendant. The defendant in that case had not given a notice of alibi. The state argued that he could not assert his constitutional claim, because he should have given his notice of alibi and then argued that the state had to grant him reciprocal discovery. The Court rejected that argument, and held that he need not give notice to raise his constitutional claim.

---

Where a defense counsel seeks to impeach the credibility of key prosecution witnesses by testimony of a defense investigator regarding statements previously obtained from the witnesses by the investigator, a federal trial court may compel the defense to reveal the relevant portions of the investigator's report for the prosecution's use in cross-examining him. See United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975).

393 Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 151 (1991).

394 Taylor v. United Stales, 484 U.S. 400, 414 (1988).

395 See Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 152 (1991), discussing Taylor v. United Stales, 484 U.S. 400, 413 (1988).

396 Id.

397 Taylor v. United Stales, 484 U.S. 400, 417 (1988). See also Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 152–53 (1991) (a defendant's failure to give statutorily required notice of his intention to present evidence of an alleged rape victim's past sexual conduct may, in some cases, justify even the severe sanction of preclusion).

398 Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 405–06 (1965).

[C144] "[T]he principal evil at which the Confrontation Clause is directed is the civil-law mode of criminal procedure, and particularly its use of ex parte examinations as evidence against the accused."[399] Accordingly, the Court has rejected "the view that the Confrontation Clause applies of its own force only to in-court testimony. . . . Leaving the regulation of out-of-court statements to the law of evidence would render the Confrontation Clause powerless to prevent even the most flagrant inquisitorial practices."[400] Moreover, "the Confrontation Clause applies to 'witnesses' against the accused—in other words, those who 'bear testimony.' 'Testimony,' in turn, is typically '[a] solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact.' . . . An accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not. [Thus, the Confrontation Clause is implicated by] 'extrajudicial statements contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions.'"[401] "The Clause does not bar admission of a statement so long as the declarant is present at trial to defend or explain it."[402] But "testimonial statements of witnesses absent from trial may be admitted only where the declarant is unavailable, and only where the defendant has had a prior opportunity to cross-examine."[403]

[C145] Bruton involved two defendants—Evans and Bruton—tried jointly for robbery. Evans did not testify, but the government introduced into evidence Evans' confession, which stated that both he (Evans) and Bruton together had committed the robbery. The trial judge told the jury it could consider the confession as evidence only against Evans, not against Bruton. The Court held that, despite the limiting instruction, the introduction of Evans' out-of-court confession at Bruton's trial had violated Bruton's right, protected by the Sixth Amendment, to cross-examine witnesses. The Court recognized that in many circumstances, a limiting instruction will adequately protect one defendant from the prejudicial effects of the introduction at a joint trial of evidence intended for use only against a different defendant. But it said that "there are some contexts in which the risk that the jury will not, or cannot, follow instructions is so great, and the consequences of failure so vital to the defendant, that the practical and human limitations of the jury system cannot be ignored. Such a context is presented here, where the powerfully incriminating extra-judicial statements of a co-defendant, who stands accused side by side with the defendant, are deliberately spread before the jury in a joint trial. Not only are the incriminations devastating to the defendant, but their credibility is inevitably suspect. . . . The unreliability of such evidence is intolerably compounded when the alleged accomplice, as here, does not testify, and cannot be tested by cross-examination."[404]

---

399 Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 51 (2004).

400 Id. at 52.

401 Id. at 51–52.

402 Id. at 59, n.9.

403 Id. at 59.

In White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 352–53 (1992), the Court rejected the proposition that the Confrontation Clause applies only to testimonial statements, and does not constitutionalize the "hearsay rule" and its exceptions (prohibition of introduction of hearsay into a trial unless the evidence falls within a "firmly rooted" hearsay exception, which is an exception that, in light of longstanding judicial and legislative experience, rests on such a solid foundation that admission of virtually any evidence within it comports with the substance of the constitutional protection). However, the Court's analysis in Crawford casts doubt on that holding.

404 Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 135–36 (1968).

[C146] Richardson limited Bruton's scope. The case involved a joint murder trial of Marsh and Williams. The state had redacted the confession of one defendant, Williams, so as to "omit all reference" to his co-defendant, Marsh—"indeed, to omit all indication that anyone other than . . . Williams" and a third person had "participated in the crime." The trial court also instructed the jury not to consider the confession against Marsh. As redacted, the confession indicated that Williams and the third person had discussed the murder in the front seat of a car while they traveled to the victim's house. The redacted confession contained no indication that Marsh—or any other person—was in the car. Later in the trial, however, Marsh testified that she was in the back seat of the car. For that reason, in context, the confession still could have helped convince the jury that Marsh knew about the murder in advance and therefore had participated knowingly in the crime. The Court held that this redacted confession fell outside Bruton's scope and was admissible (with appropriate limiting instructions) at the joint trial. The Court distinguished Evans' confession in Bruton as a confession that was "incriminating on its face" and that had "expressly implicated" Bruton. By contrast, Williams' confession amounted to "evidence requiring linkage" in that it "became" incriminating in respect to Marsh "only when linked with evidence introduced later at trial." The Court held that "the Confrontation Clause is not violated by the admission of a nontestifying codefendant's confession with a proper limiting instruction when the confession is redacted to eliminate not only the defendant's name, but any reference to his or her existence."[405]

[C147] Richardson depends "in significant part upon the kind of, not the simple fact of, inference."[406] "Redactions that simply replace a name with an obvious blank space or a word such as 'deleted' or a symbol or other similarly obvious indications of alteration leave statements that, considered as a class, so closely resemble Bruton's unredacted statements that . . . the law must require the same result. For one thing, a jury will often react similarly to an unredacted confession and a confession redacted as here, for it will realize that the confession refers specifically to the defendant, . . . even when the State does not blatantly link the defendant to the deleted name. . . . For another thing, the obvious deletion may well call the jurors' attention specially to the removed name. By encouraging the jury to speculate about the reference, the redaction may overemphasize the importance of the confession's accusation—once the jurors work out the reference. . . . Finally, Bruton's protected statements and statements redacted to leave a blank or some other similarly obvious alteration, function the same way grammatically. They are directly accusatory."[407]

[C148] The Confrontation Clause "guarantees the defendant a face-to-face meeting with witnesses appearing before the trier of fact."[408] That guarantee serves the perception that "confrontation is essential to fairness" and helps to "ensure the integrity of the factfinding process" by making it more difficult for witnesses to lie.[409] The procedure challenged in Coy involved the placement of a screen that prevented two child witnesses in a child abuse case from seeing the defendant as they testified against him at trial. In holding that the use of this procedure violated the defendant's right to confront wit-

---

405 See Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200, 208, 211 (1987), discussed in Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185, 191 (1998).

406 Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185, 196 (1998).

407 Id. at 192–94.

408 Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1016 (1988).

409 Id. at 1019–20.

nesses against him, the Court suggested that any exception to the right "would surely be allowed only when necessary to further an important public policy"—i.e., only upon a showing of something more than the generalized, "legislatively imposed presumption of trauma" underlying the statute at issue in that case. The Court concluded that, "since there had been no individualized findings that these particular witnesses needed special protection, the judgment could not be sustained by any conceivable exception."[410]

[C149] In Maryland v. Craig, the Court made clear that the Confrontation Clause does not guarantee "criminal defendants the absolute right to a face-to-face meeting with witnesses against them at trial" and held that the "right to confront accusatory witnesses may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only where denial of such confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy, and only where the testimony's reliability is otherwise assured."[411] In that case, the Court sustained a conviction that resulted from a trial in which a child witness testified via closed circuit television after a particularized showing that such a procedure was necessary to avert a risk of harm to the child. While such a procedure prevents the child from seeing the defendant, it "preserves all of the other elements of the confrontation right: the child witness must be competent to testify and must testify under oath; the defendant retains full opportunity for contemporaneous cross-examination; and the judge, jury, and defendant are able to view (albeit by video monitor) the demeanor (and body) of the witness as he or she testifies. . . . [T]he presence of these other elements of confrontation . . . adequately ensures that the testimony is both reliable and subject to rigorous adversarial testing in a manner functionally equivalent to that accorded live, in-person testimony."[412] Moreover, "if the State makes an adequate showing of necessity, the state interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant. The requisite finding of necessity must be a case-specific one: the trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure is necessary to protect the welfare of the particular child witness who seeks to testify. . . . The trial court must also find that the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant. . . . Finally, the trial court must find that the emotional distress suffered by the child witness in the presence of the defendant is more than de minimis, i.e., more than 'mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify.'" Without deciding "the minimum showing of emotional trauma required for the use of the special procedure," the Court held that the Maryland statute at issue, which required a determination that the child would suffer "serious emotional distress such that the child [could not] reasonably communicate," clearly sufficed to meet constitutional standards. In so doing, the Court stressed that "where face-to-face confrontation causes significant emotional distress in a child witness, there is evidence that such confrontation would in fact disserve the Confrontation Clause's truth-seeking goal."[413]

---

410 Id. at 1021.

411 Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 844, 850 (1990).

412 Id. at 851, 855.

413 Id. at 855–57.

7. Public Trial

[C150] The Sixth Amendment, applicable to the states through the Fourteenth, guarantees to a defendant in a criminal case the right to a public trial. However, it does not guarantee the right to compel a private trial.[414] No right ranks higher than the right of the accused to a fair trial. But the primacy of the accused's right is difficult to separate from the right of everyone in the community to an open trial that promotes fairness. "Closed proceedings, although not absolutely precluded, must be rare and only for cause shown that outweighs the value of openness. . . . The presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values, and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest."[415]

8. The Right to Jury Trial

a. General Considerations

[C151] The Sixth Amendment in terms guarantees "trial, by an impartial jury" in federal criminal prosecutions. Because trial by jury in criminal cases is fundamental to the American scheme of justice, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees the same right in state criminal prosecutions.[416] In essence, the right to jury trial guarantees, to the criminally accused, a fair trial by a panel of impartial, "indifferent" jurors.[417]

[C152] It is well established that the Sixth Amendment "reserves this jury trial right for prosecutions of serious offenses, and that there is a category of petty crimes or offenses which is not subject to the Sixth Amendment jury trial provision.'"[418] To determine whether an offense is petty, the Court considers "the maximum penalty attached to the offense," since this criterion "reveals the legislature's judgment about the offense's severity."[419] "The judiciary should not substitute its judgment as to seriousness for that of a legislature, which is far better equipped to perform the task."[420] "An offense carrying a maximum prison term of six months or less is presumed petty, unless the legislature has authorized additional statutory penalties so severe as to indicate that the legislature considered the offense serious."[421] That a defendant is "tried for two counts of a petty offense, and therefore faces an aggregate potential term of imprisonment of more than six months, does not change the fact that the legislature deemed this offense petty."[422] "Where the legislature has not specified a maximum penalty, courts use the severity of the penalty actually imposed as the measure of the character of the particular offense."[423]

---

414 Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 382 (1979).

415 Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 464 U.S. 501, 509–10 (1984) (Press-Enter. I). The relevant issues are discussed at length in paras. I254 et seq. (First Amendment right of the public and press to a public trial).

416 Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 149 (1968).

417 Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 722 (1961).

418 Lewis v. United States, 518 U.S. 322, 325 (1996), quoting Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 159 (1968).

419 Lewis v. United States, 518 U.S. 322, 326 (1996).

420 Id. at 326, quoting Blanton v. N. Las Vegas, 489 U.S. 538, 541 (1989).

421 Id. at 326, citing Blanton v. N. Las Vegas, 489 U.S. 538, 543 (1989).

422 Id. at 330.

423 Id. at 328, citing Codispoti v. Pennsylvania, 418 U.S. 506, 511 (1974). Codispoti was a

[C153] The constitutional proscription of any deprivation of liberty without due process of law and the constitutional guarantee of a jury trial, taken together, entitle a criminal defendant to "a jury determination that he is guilty of every element of the crime with which he is charged, beyond a reasonable doubt."[424] Further, the Constitution requires that "[o]ther than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."[425] The "statutory maximum" is "the maximum sentence a judge may impose solely on the basis of the facts reflected in the jury verdict or admitted by the defendant."[426] By contrast, the Constitution does not preclude a state from enacting a law under which anyone convicted of certain enumerated felonies is subject to a mandatory minimum sentence, if the sentencing judge finds, by a preponderance of the evidence, a particular fact.[427] Moreover, "there is no Sixth Amendment right to jury sentencing, even where the sentence turns on specific findings of fact."[428]

[C154] The Sixth Amendment requires that the jury have at least six members.[429] In state criminal cases involving 12-person juries, the verdict need not be unanimous to satisfy constitutional requirements. Thus, the Court has upheld a state statute provid-criminal contempt case. There the Court held that the Sixth Amendment requires a jury trial if the sentences imposed aggregate more than six months, even though no sentence for more than six months was imposed for any one act of contempt.

---

"Like other minor crimes, 'petty' contempts may be tried without a jury, but contemnors in serious contempt cases have a Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial. . . . [L]acking legislative authorization of more serious punishment, a sentence of as much as six months in prison, plus normal periods of probation, may be imposed without a jury trial. . . . [B]ut imprisonment for longer than six months is constitutionally impermissible unless the contemnor has been given the opportunity for a jury trial." See Muniz v. Hoffman, 422 U.S. 454, 475–76 (1975).

Moreover, the imposition of serious criminal contempt fines triggers the right to jury trial. See Mine Workers v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 837–38, n.5 (1994).

424 United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506, 510 (1995). See also In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970).

425 Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466, 490 (2000). Apprendi involved a New Jersey hate-crime statute that authorized a 20-year sentence, despite the usual ten-year maximum, if the judge found the crime to have been committed "with a purpose to intimidate . . . because of race, color, gender, handicap, religion, sexual orientation or ethnicity." In Ring v. Arizona, 536 U. S. 584 (2002), the Court applied Apprendi to an Arizona law that authorized the death penalty if the judge found one of ten aggravating factors. In each case, the Court concluded that the defendant's constitutional rights had been violated, because the judge had imposed a sentence greater than the maximum he could have imposed under state law without the challenged factual finding.

In United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), the Court held that the Sixth Amendment, as construed in Apprendi and Blakely, does apply to the federal sentencing guidelines, taking into account that these sentencing rules are mandatory and binding on all judges.

426 Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296, 303 (2004).

427 McMillan v. Pennsylvania, 477 U.S. 79 (1986).

428 Id. at 93.

429 Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223 (1978). The Court, in separate opinions, held that conviction by a unanimous five-person jury in a trial for a non-petty offense deprives an accused of his right to trial by jury. While readily admitting that the line between six members and five was not altogether easy to justify, at least five members of the Court believed that reducing a jury to five persons in non-petty cases raised sufficiently substantial doubts as to the fairness of the proceeding and proper functioning of the jury to warrant drawing the line at six. See id. at 239 (opinion of Blackmun, J.); id. at 245–246 (opinion of Powell, J.).

ing that only ten members of a 12-person jury need concur to render a verdict in certain non-capital cases.[430] However, the Sixth Amendment requires a unanimous verdict in federal criminal jury trials.[431] Moreover, conviction for a non-petty criminal offense in a state court by a non-unanimous six-person jury violates the accused's right to trial by jury guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments.[432]

[C155] In Ludwig, the appellant challenged a state system for disposition of certain crimes in which the defendant was first tried without a jury. If convicted, he could appeal and obtain a jury trial de novo. Although the range of penalties was the same at each tier, Ludwig suffered a harsher sentence when he appealed and was found guilty by a jury. Recognizing the interest of the state in efficient criminal procedure, the Court upheld the scheme, and rejected a claim that the system discouraged the assertion of the right to a jury trial by imposing harsher sentences upon those who exercised that right.[433]

[C156] In Singer, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a federal rule of criminal procedure, which conditioned a defendant's waiver of his right to a jury trial on the approval of the court and the prosecution. The Court reasoned that "[t]he Constitution recognizes an adversary system as the proper method of determining guilt, and the Government, as a litigant, has a legitimate interest in seeing that cases in which it believes a conviction is warranted are tried before the tribunal which the Constitution regards as most likely to produce a fair result."[434]

b. Jury Selection[435]

[C157] "The purpose of a jury is to guard against the exercise of arbitrary power—to make available the common sense judgment of the community as a hedge against the overzealous or mistaken prosecutor and in preference to the professional, or perhaps overconditioned or biased response of a judge. . . . This prophylactic vehicle is not provided if the jury pool is made up of only special segments of the populace or if large, distinctive groups are excluded from the pool. Community participation in the admin-

---

[430] Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972). In terms of the role of the jury as a safeguard against oppression, the plurality opinion perceived no difference between those juries required to act unanimously and those permitted to act by votes of ten to two. Nor was unanimity viewed by the plurality as contributing materially to the exercise of the jury's common sense judgment or as a necessary pre-condition to effective application of the requirement that jury panels represent a fair cross-section of the community. Id. at 411–12. Justice Powell concurred in the judgment, concluding that, although Sixth Amendment history and precedent required jury unanimity in federal trials, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not incorporate all the elements of a jury trial required by the Sixth Amendment and did not prevent Oregon from permitting conviction by a verdict of ten to two. Id. at 369–80.

[431] Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972) (see concurring opinion of Justice Powell, dissenting opinion of Justice Douglas, in which Justices Brennan and Marshall joined, and dissenting opinion of Justice Stewart).

[432] Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130 (1979).

[433] Ludwig v. Massachusetts, 427 U.S. 618 (1976).

[434] Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24, 36 (1965).

[435] With regard to race- or gender-based exclusion at the venire stage and at the individual petit jury stage, see paras. K30 et seq. (racial discrimination), and paras. K87–K88 (gender discrimination). With respect to prejudicial pre-trial publicity, see para. I263.

istration of the criminal law, moreover, is not only consistent with the country's democratic heritage, but is also critical to public confidence in the fairness of the criminal justice system. Restricting jury service to only special groups or excluding identifiable segments playing major roles in the community cannot be squared with the constitutional concept of jury trial." Under these considerations, the Court held, in Taylor v. Louisiana, that the Sixth Amendment requires that the jury venire be drawn from a fair cross-section of the community.[436]

[C158] "[T]he Constitution presupposes that a jury selected from a fair cross-section of the community is impartial, regardless of the mix of individual viewpoints actually represented on the jury, so long as the jurors can conscientiously and properly carry out their sworn duty to apply the law to the facts of the particular case."[437] While "petit juries must be drawn from a source fairly representative of the community, [there is] no constitutional requirement that petit juries actually chosen must mirror the community and reflect the various distinctive groups in the population; defendants are not entitled to a jury of any particular composition."[438] "A prohibition upon the exclusion of cognizable groups through peremptory challenges has no conceivable basis in the text of the Sixth Amendment, and would undermine, rather than further, the constitutional guarantee of an impartial jury. . . . The Sixth Amendment requirement of a fair cross-section on the venire is a means of assuring, not a representative jury (which the Constitution does not demand), but an impartial one (which it does). Without that requirement, the State could draw up jury lists in such manner as to produce a pool of prospective jurors disproportionately ill-disposed towards one or all classes of defendants, and thus more likely to yield petit juries with similar disposition. The State would have, in effect, unlimited peremptory challenges to compose the pool in its favor. The fair-cross-section venire requirement assures, in other words, that in the process of selecting the petit jury the prosecution and defense will compete on an equal basis."[439]

[C159] "Peremptory challenges, by enabling each side to exclude those jurors it believes will be most partial toward the other side, are a means of 'eliminat[ing] extremes of partiality on both sides,' . . . thereby 'assuring the selection of a qualified and unbiased jury.'"[440] Moreover, "[t]he essential nature of the peremptory challenge is that it is one exercised without a reason stated, without inquiry and without being subject to the court's control."[441] To date, the Court has recognized only one substantive control over a state actor's choice of whom to challenge peremptorily: under the Equal Protection Clause, a defendant or a prosecutor may not exercise a peremptory challenge to remove a potential juror solely on the basis of the juror's gender, ethnic origin, or race.[442]

[C160] Nevertheless, unlike the right to an impartial jury guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment, "peremptory challenges are not of federal constitutional dimension. . . .

---

436 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 530 (1975).

437 Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 184 (1986).

438 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 538 (1975).

439 Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474, 478, 480–81 (1990).

440 Id. at 484, quoting Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, 219 (1965) and Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 91 (1986) respectively.

441 Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, 220 (1965).

442 See, e.g., J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994) (gender); Hernandez v. New York, 500 U.S. 352 (1991) (ethnic origin); Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986) (race).

[Rather,] they are a means to achieve the constitutionally required end of an impartial jury. So long as the jury that sits is impartial, the fact that the defendant had to use a peremptory challenge to achieve that result does not mean the Sixth Amendment or the Due Process Clause was violated."[443] In case of erroneous refusal of a trial judge to dismiss a potential juror for cause, followed by the defendant's exercise of a peremptory challenge to remove that juror, no constitutional deprivation occurs, when the defendant is convicted by a jury on which no biased juror sat.[444]

[C161] "[P]art of the guaranty of a defendant's right to an impartial jury is an adequate voir dire to identify unqualified jurors."[445] "Without an adequate voir dire, the trial judge's responsibility to remove prospective jurors who will not be able impartially to follow the court's instructions and evaluate the evidence cannot be fulfilled."[446] "Hence, '[t]he exercise of [the trial court's] discretion, and the restriction upon inquiries at the request of counsel, [are] subject to the essential demands of fairness.'"[447] "Because the obligation to impanel an impartial jury lies in the first instance with the trial judge, and because he must rely largely on his immediate perceptions, trial judges have been accorded ample discretion in determining how best to conduct the voir dire."[448] However, the Court has not hesitated to find that certain inquiries must be made to effectuate constitutional protections. For example, there are "special circumstances" under which the Constitution requires a question on racial or ethnic prejudice.[449] While the Court enjoys more latitude in setting standards for voir dire in federal courts under its supervisory power than it has in interpreting the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment

---

[443] Ross v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 81, 88 (1988). In that case, a state trial court refused to remove for cause a juror who declared he would vote to impose death automatically if the jury found the defendant guilty. That juror was removed by the defendant's use of a peremptory challenge, and, for that reason, the death sentence could be affirmed. But "[h]ad [this juror] sat on the jury that ultimately sentenced petitioner to death, and had petitioner properly preserved his right to challenge the trial court's failure to remove [the juror] for cause, the sentence would have to be overturned." Id. at 85. The Court rejected the defendant's due process objection that forced use of a peremptory challenge to cure a trial court's error in denying a challenge for cause arbitrarily deprived him of the full complement of peremptory challenges allowed under Oklahoma law. An Oklahoma statute accorded the defendant nine such challenges. State courts had read into that grant a requirement that a defendant who disagreed with the trial court's ruling on a for-cause challenge must, in order to preserve the claim that the ruling deprived him of a fair trial, exercise a peremptory challenge to remove the juror. Even then, under state law, the error was grounds for reversal only if the defendant exhausted all peremptory challenges, and an incompetent juror therefore was forced upon him. The defendant in Ross, the Court concluded, did not lose any state law right when he used one of his nine challenges to remove a juror who should have been excused for cause; rather, he received all that state law allowed him and the fair trial that the Federal Constitution guaranteed. Id. at 89–91.

[444] United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 528 U.S. 304, 307 (2000).

[445] Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 729 (1992), citing Dennis v. United States, 339 U.S. 162, 171–72 (1950) ("preservation of the opportunity to prove actual bias is a guarantee of a defendant's right to an impartial jury").

[446] Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 729–30 (1992), quoting Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182, 188 (1981) (plurality opinion).

[447] Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 730 (1992), quoting Aldridge v. United States, 283 U.S. 308, 310 (1931).

[448] Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182, 189 (1981) (plurality opinion).

[449] See Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589 (1976).

with respect to voir dire in state courts, two principles emerge from both sets of the Court's cases: "first, the possibility of racial prejudice against a black defendant charged with a violent crime against a white person is sufficiently real that the Fourteenth Amendment requires that inquiry be made into racial prejudice; second, the trial court retains great latitude in deciding what questions should be asked on voir dire."[450]

[C162] In several cases, the Court has examined the procedures for selection of jurors in criminal trials involving the possible imposition of capital punishment. Witherspoon held that the state infringes a capital defendant's right under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to trial by an impartial jury when it excuses for cause all those members of the venire who express conscientious objections to capital punishment. Such a practice, the Court held, violated the Constitution by creating a "tribunal organized to return a verdict of death."[451] Nevertheless, the Witherspoon Court "also recognized the State's legitimate interest in excluding those jurors whose opposition to capital punishment would not allow them to view the proceedings impartially, and who therefore might frustrate administration of a State's death penalty scheme."[452] Witt held that the proper standard for determining when a prospective juror may be excused for cause because of his or her views on capital punishment is "whether the juror's views would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his duties as a juror in accordance with his instructions and his oath."[453] Under this standard, it is clear that a juror, who in no case would

---

[450] Mu'Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415, 424 (1991).

In Ham v. South Carolina, 409 U.S. 524 (1973), the defendant was black and had been active in the civil rights movement in South Carolina; his defense at trial was that enforcement officers were "out to get him," because of his civil rights activities, and that he had been framed on the charge of marijuana possession of which he was accused. He requested that two questions be asked regarding racial prejudice and one question be asked regarding prejudice against persons, such as himself, who wore beards. The Court held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment required the court to ask "either of the brief, general questions urged by the petitioner" with respect to race, but rejected his claim that an inquiry as to prejudice against persons with beards be made, given the traditionally broad discretion accorded to the trial judge in conducting voir dire. Id. at 527–28.

In Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589 (1976), the Court held that the Constitution does not require a state court trial judge to question prospective jurors as to racial prejudice in every case where the races of the defendant and the victim differ. Nevertheless, in Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28 (1986), the Court held that, in a capital case involving a charge of murder of a white person by a black defendant, such questions must be asked.

[451] Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510, 521 (1968).

[452] See Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 416 (1985), discussing Witherspoon.

[453] Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 424 (1985), quoting Adams v. Texas, 448 U.S. 38, 45 (1980) (emphasis added).

In Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510, 522, n.21 (1968), the Court had noted that venirepersons can be constitutionally excluded from service in capital cases if they make it "unmistakably clear that they would automatically vote against the imposition of capital punishment without regard to any evidence that might be developed at the trial of the case before them, or that their attitude toward the death penalty would prevent them from making an impartial decision as to the defendant's guilt." The Witt standard, "in addition to dispensing with Witherspoon's reference to 'automatic' decision making, does not require that a juror's bias be proved with 'unmistakable clarity.' This is because determinations of juror bias cannot be reduced to question-and-answer sessions which obtain results in the manner of a catechism. . . . [M]any veniremen simply cannot be asked enough questions to reach the point where their bias has been made 'unmistakably clear;' these veniremen may not know how they will react when faced with vote for capital punishment or who will automatically vote for the death penalty (and will fail in good faith to consider the evidence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances), regardless of his or her instructions, is not an impartial juror, and must be removed for cause.[454] On voir dire, a trial court must, at the defendant's or the state's request, inquire into the prospective jurors' views on capital punishment.[455]

[C163] In federal habeas corpus cases, the question of juror impartiality, "is not one of mixed law and fact. Rather, it is plainly one of historical fact: did a juror swear that he could set aside any opinion he might hold and decide the case on the evidence, and should the juror's protestation of impartiality have been believed."[456] A trial court's findings of juror impartiality may be overturned only for "manifest error."[457]

9. Freedom from Physical Restraints Visible to the Jury

[C164] Due process of law protected by the federal Constitution "prohibit[s] the use of physical restraints visible to the jury absent a trial court determination, in the exercise of its discretion, that they are justified by a state interest specific to a particular trial. Such a determination may of course take into account the factors that courts have traditionally relied on in gauging potential security problems and the risk of escape at trial."[458] The above rule gives effect to three fundamental legal principles. First, "the criminal process presumes that the defendant is innocent until proved guilty." Second, the use of physical restraints diminishes the right to counsel. And third, "judges must seek to maintain a judicial process that is a dignified process."[459] Given the presence of similarly weighty considerations, the foregoing rule also applies to the penalty phase of a capital proceeding.[460] imposing the death sentence, or may be unable to articulate, or may wish to hide their true feelings. Despite this lack of clarity in the printed record, however, there will be situations where the trial judge is left with the definite impression that a prospective juror would be unable to faithfully and impartially apply the law. . . . [T]his is why deference must be paid to the trial judge who sees and hears the juror." See Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 424–26 (1985).

---

In Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 165 (1986), the Court held that the Constitution does not prohibit the removal for cause, prior to the guilt phase of a bifurcated capital trial, of prospective jurors whose opposition to the death penalty is so strong that it would prevent or substantially impair the performance of their duties as jurors at the sentencing phase of the trial, considering, inter alia, that such a removal serves the state's entirely proper interest in obtaining a single jury that could impartially decide all of the issues in a capital case.

454 See Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 728–29 (1992).

455 Id. at 729–34; Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162, 170, n.7 (1986).

456 Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1036 (1984).

457 See Mu'Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415, 428 (1991), quoting Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1031 (1984).

458 Deck v. Missouri, 544 U.S. 622, 629 (2005).

459 Id. at 630–31.

460 Id. at 633. In so holding, the Court noted, inter alia, that although the defendant's conviction means that the presumption of innocence no longer applies, (1) the jury's decision between life and death is no less important than the decision about guilt; and (2) the appearance of the offender during the penalty phase in shackles, almost inevitably implies to a jury, as a matter of common sense, that court authorities consider the offender a danger to the community—often a statutory aggravator and nearly always a relevant factor in jury decisionmaking—and also almost inevitably affects adversely the jury's perception of the character of the defendant.

10. The Right to a Speedy Trial

[C165] The Sixth Amendment guarantees that, "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy . . . trial." This right is "fundamental," and is imposed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment on the states.[461]

[C166] "The Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial is . . . not primarily intended to prevent prejudice to the defense caused by passage of time; that interest is protected primarily by the Due Process Clause and by statutes of limitations. The speedy trial guarantee is essentially designed to minimize the possibility of lengthy incarceration prior to trial, to reduce the lesser, but nevertheless substantial, impairment of liberty imposed on an accused while released on bail, and to shorten the disruption of life caused by arrest and the presence of unresolved criminal charges."[462] The Court thus has held that the Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment "does not apply to the period before a defendant is indicted, arrested, or otherwise officially accused."[463] Until such an event occurs, a citizen "suffers no restraints on his liberty and is not the subject of public accusation: his situation does not compare with that of a defendant who has been arrested and held to answer."[464] "[W]hen no indictment is outstanding, only the 'actual restraints imposed by arrest and holding to answer a criminal charge engage the particular protections of the speedy trial provision of the Sixth Amendment.'"[465] "Although delay prior to arrest or indictment may give rise to a due process claim under the Fifth Amendment,"[466] "or to a claim under any applicable statutes of limitations, no Sixth

---

461 Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 515 (1972), citing Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213, 223 (1967).

462 United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 8 (1982).

463 Id. at 6, discussing United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 313 (1971).

464 United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 321 (1971).

465 United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 310 (1986), quoting United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 320 (1971) (emphasis added).

466 United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7 (1982), citing United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 788–89 (1977). Such claims can prevail only upon a showing that the delay caused substantial prejudice to the defendant's rights to a fair trial, and that the government delayed seeking an indictment "in a deliberate attempt to gain an unfair tactical advantage over the defendant or in reckless disregard of its probable prejudicial impact upon the defendant's ability to defend against the charges." See United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 324 (1971); United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 790 (1977); United States v. $8,850, 461 U.S. 555, 563 (1983).

In Lovasco, the Court rejected the proposition that "once the Government has assembled sufficient evidence to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it should be constitutionally required to file charges promptly, even if its investigation of the entire criminal transaction is not complete." First, "compelling a prosecutor to file public charges as soon as the requisite proof has been developed against one participant on one charge would cause numerous problems in those cases in which a criminal transaction involves more than one person or more than one illegal act. In some instances, an immediate arrest or indictment would impair the prosecutor's ability to continue his investigation, thereby preventing society from bringing lawbreakers to justice. In other cases, the prosecutor would be able to obtain additional indictments despite an early prosecution, but the necessary result would be multiple trials involving a single set of facts. Such trials place needless burdens on defendants, law enforcement officials, and courts. Second, insisting on immediate prosecution, once sufficient evidence is developed to obtain a conviction, would pressure prosecutors into resolving doubtful cases in favor of early—and possibly unwarranted—prosecutions. . . . Finally, requiring the Government to make charging decisions immediately upon assembling evidence sufficient to establish guilt would preclude the Amendment right to a speedy trial arises until charges are pending."[467] Similarly, the Clause "has no application after the Government, acting in good faith, formally drops charges. Any undue delay after charges are dismissed, like any delay before charges are filed, must be scrutinized under the Due Process Clause. . . . Once charges are dismissed, . . . the formerly accused is, at most, in the same position as any other subject of a criminal investigation."[468]

[C167] On its face, the Speedy Trial Clause is written with such breadth that, taken literally, it would forbid the government from delaying the trial of an "accused" for any reason at all. The Court, however, has qualified the literal sweep of the provision by specifically recognizing the relevance of four separate enquiries: "whether delay before trial was uncommonly long, whether the government or the criminal defendant is more to blame for that delay, whether, in due course, the defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial, and whether he suffered prejudice as the delay's result."[469]

> The length of the delay is to some extent a triggering mechanism. Until there is some delay which is presumptively prejudicial, there is no necessity for inquiry into the other factors that go into the balance. Nevertheless, because of the imprecision of the right to speedy trial, the length of delay that will provoke such an inquiry is necessarily dependent upon the peculiar circumstances of the case. To take but one example, the delay that can be tolerated for an ordinary street crime is considerably less than for a serious, complex conspiracy charge.
>
> Closely related to length of delay is the reason the government assigns to justify the delay. Here, too, different weights should be assigned to different reasons. A deliberate attempt to delay the trial in order to hamper the defense should be weighted heavily against the government. A more neutral reason such as negligence or overcrowded courts should be weighted less heavily but nevertheless should be considered since the ultimate responsibility for such circumstances must rest with the government, rather than with the defendant. Finally, a valid reason, such as a missing witness, should serve to justify appropriate delay.
>
> [Third,] failure to assert the right will make it difficult for a defendant to prove that he was denied a speedy trial. . . . Whether and how a defendant asserts his right is closely related to the other factors mentioned above. The strength of his efforts will be affected by the length of the delay, to some extent by the reason for the delay, and most particularly by the personal prejudice, which is not always readily identifiable, that he experiences. The more serious the deprivation, the more likely a defendant is to complain. The defendant's assertion of his speedy trial right, then, is entitled to strong evidentiary weight in determining whether the defendant is being deprived of the right.
>
> A fourth factor is prejudice to the defendant. Prejudice, of course, should be assessed in the light of the interests of defendants which the speedy trial right was designed to protect. Th[e] Court has identified three such interests: (i) to prevent Government from giving full consideration to the desirability of not prosecuting in particular cases." See United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 792–94 (1977).

---

467 United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7 (1982).

468 United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7–9 (1982).

469 Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 651 (1992).

> oppressive pre-trial incarceration; (ii) to minimize anxiety and concern of the accused; and (iii) to limit the possibility that the defense will be impaired. . . .
>
> [The Court] regard[s] none of the four factors identified above as either a necessary or sufficient condition to the finding of a deprivation of the right of speedy trial. Rather, they are related factors, and must be considered together with such other circumstances as may be relevant. In sum, these factors have no talismanic qualities; courts must engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. But, this process must be carried out with full recognition that the accused's interest in a speedy trial is specifically affirmed in the Constitution.[470]

---

[470] Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 530–533 (1972).

A 90-month delay in the trial of charges of possessing firearms and dynamite is presumptively prejudicial and serves to trigger application of Barker's other factors. See United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 314 (1986).

"[D]elay is a two-edged sword. It is the Government that bears the burden of proving its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The passage of time, following the filing by the defendant of repetitive and unsuccessful motions, may make it difficult or impossible for the Government to carry this burden." See United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 315 (1986).

A constitutional violation may occur when a significant interval separates the formal accusation from the arrest, possibly because the accused is out of the jurisdiction or because of administrative delays in effecting the arrest. See Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647 (1992) (time lag between indictment and arrest of eight and a half years, due, in part, to the defendant's absence from the country and, in part, to the government's negligence).

In Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 383 (1969), the Court held that a state must, consistent with the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments, "make a diligent, good faith effort to bring" a prisoner to trial on a state indictment even though he is incarcerated in another jurisdiction.

In United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 312–16 (1986), the Court held: "The speedy trial safeguards may be as important to the accused when the delay is occasioned by an unduly long appellate process as when the delay is caused by a lapse between the initial arrest and the drawing of a proper indictment, . . . or by continuances in the date of trial. . . . At the same time, there are important public interests in the process of appellate review. The assurance that motions to suppress evidence or to dismiss an indictment are correctly decided through orderly appellate review safeguards both the rights of defendants and the 'rights of public justice.' . . . Under Barker, delays in bringing the case to trial caused by the Government's interlocutory appeal may be weighed in determining whether a defendant has suffered a violation of his rights to a speedy trial. . . . [Nevertheless,] an interlocutory appeal by the Government ordinarily is a valid reason that justifies delay. In assessing the purpose and reasonableness of such an appeal, courts may consider several factors. These include the strength of the Government's position on the appealed issue, the importance of the issue in the posture of the case, and—in some cases—the seriousness of the crime. For example, a delay resulting from an appeal would weigh heavily against the Government if the issue were clearly tangential or frivolous. Moreover, the charged offense usually must be sufficiently serious to justify restraints that may be imposed on the defendant pending the outcome of the appeal. . . . In that limited class of cases where a pretrial appeal by the defendant is appropriate (see, e.g., United States v. Hollywood Motor Car Co., 458 U.S. 263, 265–66 (1982)), delays from such an appeal ordinarily will not weigh in favor of a defendant's speedy trial claims. A defendant with a meritorious appeal would bear the heavy burden of showing an unreasonable delay caused by the prosecution in that appeal, or a wholly unjustifiable delay by the appellate court. A defendant who resorts to an interlocutory appeal normally should not be able upon return to the district court to reap the reward of dismissal for failure to receive a speedy trial (emphasis added)."

[C168] "The amorphous quality of the right to a speedy trial leads to the unsatisfactorily severe remedy of dismissal of the indictment when the right has been deprived. This is indeed a serious consequence, because it means that a defendant who may be guilty of a serious crime will go free, without having been tried. Such a remedy is more serious than an exclusionary rule or a reversal for a new trial, but it is the only possible remedy."[471]

11. Appeals and Post-Conviction Review

a. The Defendant's Right to Appeal

[C169] It is well settled that there is no constitutional right to an appeal. The right of appeal, as it is presently known in criminal cases, is purely a creature of statute; in order to exercise that statutory right of appeal, one must come within the terms of the applicable statute.[472]

[C170] "While sentencing discretion permits consideration of a wide range of information relevant to the assessment of punishment, . . . [the Court has] recognized it must not be exercised with the purpose of punishing a successful appeal."[473] While the Constitution does not impose an absolute bar to a more severe sentence upon reconviction, the Court held in North Carolina v. Pearce that "[d]ue process of law . . . requires that vindictiveness against a defendant for having successfully attacked his first conviction must play no part in the sentence he receives after a new trial. And since the fear of such vindictiveness may unconstitutionally deter a defendant's exercise of the right to appeal or collaterally attack his first conviction, due process also requires that a defendant be freed of apprehension of such a retaliatory motivation on the part of the sentencing judge. In order to assure the absence of such a motivation, we have concluded that, whenever a judge imposes a more severe sentence upon a defendant after a new trial, the reasons for his doing so must affirmatively appear."[474] "Otherwise, a presumption arises that a greater sentence has been imposed for a vindictive purpose—a presumption that must be rebutted by 'objective information . . . justifying the increased sentence.'"[475]

[C171] "While the Pearce opinion appeared on its face to announce a rule of sweeping dimension, . . . subsequent cases have made clear that its presumption of vindictiveness 'do[es] not apply in every case where a convicted defendant receives a higher sentence on retrial.'"[476] "The evil the [Pearce] Court sought to prevent" was not the imposition of "enlarged sentences after a new trial," but "vindictiveness of a sentencing judge."[477] Because the Pearce presumption may operate in the absence of any proof of an improper motive, and thus block a legitimate response to criminal conduct, the Court

---

471 Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 522 (1972). See also Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434, 440 (1973).

472 See, e.g., Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651, 656 (1977).

473 Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 798 (1989).

474 North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 725–26 (1969).

475 Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 798–99 (1989), quoting Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134, 142 (1986) (quoting United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 374 (1982)).

476 Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 799 (1989), quoting Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134, 138 (1986).

477 Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134, 138 (1986).

has limited its application to circumstances where its objectives are thought most efficaciously served. "Such circumstances are those in which there is a 'reasonable likelihood' . . . that the increase in sentence is the product of actual vindictiveness on the part of the sentencing authority."[478] "Where there is no such reasonable likelihood, the burden remains upon the defendant to prove actual vindictiveness."[479]

[C172] In Colten, for example, the Court refused to apply the presumption when the increased sentence was imposed by the second court in a two-tier system which gave a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor in an inferior court the right to trial de novo in a superior court. The Court observed that the trial de novo represented a "completely fresh determination of guilt or innocence" by a court that was not being "asked to do over what it thought it had already done correctly." If the de novo trial resulted in a greater penalty, the Court said that "it no more follows that such a sentence is a vindictive penalty . . . than that the inferior court imposed a lenient penalty."[480] Similarly, Chaffin held that no presumption of vindictiveness arose when a second jury, on retrial following a successful appeal, imposed a higher sentence than a prior jury. The Court thought that a second jury was unlikely to have a "personal stake" in the prior conviction or to be "sensitive to the institutional interests that might occasion higher sentences by a judge desirous of discouraging what he regards as meritless appeals."[481]

b. The "Harmless Error" Rule

[C173] In Chapman v. California, the Court held that federal constitutional errors in the course of a criminal trial do not require reversal of a conviction if they are "harmless." Under harmless error analysis, the state must establish "beyond a reasonable doubt

---

[478] See Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 799–800 (1989), quoting United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 373 (1982).

[479] Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 800 (1989), citing Wasman v. United States, 468 U.S. 559, 569 (1984).

[480] Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104, 117 (1972).

[481] Chaffin v. Stynchcombe, 412 U.S. 17, 27 (1973).

In Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134 (1986), respondent was tried before a jury in a Texas district court and convicted of murder. He elected to be sentenced by the jury, as was his right under Texas law, and the jury imposed a 20-year sentence. The trial judge then granted respondent's motion for a new trial on the basis of prosecutorial misconduct. Respondent was retried before a jury, with the same trial judge presiding, and again was found guilty. This time he elected to have the judge fix his sentence, and she imposed a 50-year sentence. The Court found that the facts of this case provided no basis for a presumption of vindictiveness, since (1) unlike the judge who has been reversed, the trial judge in that case had no motivation to engage in self-vindication; and (2) different sentencers assessed the varying sentences, the second sentencer providing an on-the-record, logical, non-vindictive reason for the longer sentence.

In Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794 (1989), after successfully challenging the validity of his plea bargain on the ground that the trial judge had misinformed him about the penalties he could face, respondent went to trial. He was convicted and resentenced to a longer sentence than the one he had initially received as a result of his plea bargain. The Court held that no presumption of vindictiveness arises when the first sentence was based upon a guilty plea and the second sentence follows a trial, reasoning that, even when the same judge imposes both sentences, the relevant sentencing information available to the judge after the plea will usually be considerably less than that available after a trial, and that the factors that may have indicated leniency as consideration for the guilty plea are no longer present in such a case.

that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained."[482] The Chapman standard recognizes that certain constitutional errors, no less than other errors, may have been "harmless" in terms of their effect on the fact finding process at trial.[483] Harmless error review "looks to the basis on which 'the jury actually rested its verdict.' . . . The inquiry, in other words, is not whether, in a trial that occurred without the error, a guilty verdict would surely have been rendered, but whether the guilty verdict actually rendered in the specific trial was surely unattributable to the error."[484]

---

[482] Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24 (1967). However, a federal court reviewing a state court determination in a habeas corpus proceeding should apply the "harmless error" standard that the Court had previously enunciated in Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750 (1946), namely "whether the error had substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict." See Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 637 (1993), citing Kotteakos, supra, at 776. This standard reflects the presumption of finality and legality that attaches to a conviction at the conclusion of direct review. It protects the state's sovereign interest in punishing offenders and its good faith attempts to honor constitutional rights, while ensuring that the extraordinary remedy of habeas corpus is available to those whom society has grievously wronged. See Brecht, supra, at 633–35.

[483] Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 681 (1986).

[484] Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275, 279 (1993).

In Yates v. Evatt, 500 U.S. 391, 403–05 (1991), the Court stated:

> To say that an error did not contribute to the ensuing verdict is not, of course, to say that the jury was totally unaware of that feature of the trial later held to have been erroneous. When, for example, a trial court has instructed a jury to apply an unconstitutional presumption, a reviewing court can hardly infer that the jurors failed to consider it, a conclusion that would be factually untenable in most cases, and would run counter to a sound presumption of appellate practice, that jurors are reasonable and generally follow the instructions they are given. To say that an error did not contribute to the verdict is, rather, to find that error unimportant in relation to everything else the jury considered on the issue in question, as revealed in the record. Thus, to say that an instruction to apply an unconstitutional presumption did not contribute to the verdict is to make a judgment about the significance of the presumption to reasonable jurors, when measured against the other evidence considered by those jurors independently of the presumption. Before reaching such a judgment, a court must take two quite distinct steps. First, it must ask what evidence the jury actually considered in reaching its verdict. If, for example, the fact presumed is necessary to support the verdict, a reviewing court must ask what evidence the jury considered as tending to prove or disprove that fact. Did the jury look at only the predicate facts, or did it consider other evidence bearing on the fact subject to the presumption? In answering this question, a court does not conduct a subjective enquiry into the jurors' minds. The answer must come, instead, from analysis of the instructions given to the jurors and from application of that customary presumption that jurors follow instructions and, specifically, that they consider relevant evidence on a point in issue when they are told that they may do. Once a court has made the first enquiry into the evidence considered by the jury, it must then weigh the probative force of that evidence as against the probative force of the presumption standing alone. To satisfy Chapman's reasonable doubt standard, it will not be enough that the jury considered evidence from which it could have come to the verdict without reliance on the presumption. Rather, the issue under Chapman is whether the jury actually rested its verdict on evidence establishing the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, independently of the presumption. Since that enquiry cannot be a subjective one into the jurors' minds, a court must approach it by asking whether the force of the evidence presumably considered by the jury in accordance with the instructions is so overwhelming as to leave it beyond

[C174] Since Chapman, the Court has applied harmless error analysis to a wide range of errors and has recognized that most constitutional errors can be harmless.[485] "The common thread connecting these cases is that each involved 'trial error'—error which occurred during the presentation of the case to the jury, and which may therefore be quantitatively assessed in the context of other evidence presented in order to determine whether its admission was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt."[486] However, in a limited class of cases, the Court has found an error to be "structural" and thus subject to automatic reversal.[487] For example, "the entire conduct of the trial, from beginning to end, is obviously affected by the absence of counsel for a criminal defendant, just as it is by the presence on the bench of a judge who is not impartial. . . . [In case of such constitutional deprivations, which affect] the framework within which the trial proceeds, . . . 'a criminal trial cannot reliably serve its function as a vehicle for determination of guilt or innocence, and no criminal punishment may be regarded as fundamentally fair.'"[488]

---

a reasonable doubt that the verdict resting on that evidence would have been the same in the absence of the presumption. It is only when the effect of the presumption is comparatively minimal to this degree that it can be said, in Chapman's words, that the presumption did not contribute to the verdict rendered. (Emphasis added.)

[485] See, e.g., Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 306–12 (1991) (admission of coerced confessions); Clemons v. Mississippi, 494 U.S. 738, 752–54 (1990) (unconstitutionally overbroad jury instructions at the sentencing stage of a capital case); Satterwhite v. Texas, 486 U.S. 249 (1988) (admission of evidence at the sentencing stage of a capital case in violation of the Sixth Amendment Counsel Clause); Carella v. California, 491 U.S. 263, 266 (1989) (jury instruction containing an erroneous conclusive presumption); Rose v. Clark, 478 U.S. 570 (1986) (jury instruction containing an erroneous rebuttable presumption); Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1 (1999) (jury instruction that omits an element of an offense); Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497, 501–04 (1987) (jury instruction misstating an element of the offense); Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 691 (1986) (erroneous exclusion of defendant's testimony regarding the circumstances of his confession); Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673 (1986) (restriction on a defendant's right to cross-examine a witness for bias in violation of the Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause); Rushen v. Spain, 464 U.S. 114, 117–18, and n.2 (1983) (denial of a defendant's right to be present at trial); United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499 (1983) (improper comment on defendant's silence at trial, in violation of the Fifth Amendment Self-Incrimination Clause); Hopper v. Evans, 456 U.S. 605 (1982) (statute improperly forbidding trial court's giving a jury instruction on a lesser-included offense in a capital case in violation of the Due Process Clause); Kentucky v. Whorton, 441 U.S. 786 (1979) (failure to instruct the jury on the presumption of innocence); Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220, 232 (1977) (admission of identification evidence in violation of the Sixth Amendment Counsel Clause); Brown v. United States, 411 U.S. 223, 231–32 (1973) (admission of the out-of-court statement of a non-testifying co-defendant in violation of the Sixth Amendment Counsel Clause); Milton v. Wainwright, 407 U.S. 371 (1972) (confession obtained in violation of Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)); Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42, 52–53 (1970) (admission of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment); Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 10–11 (1970) (denial of counsel at a preliminary hearing in violation of the Sixth Amendment Counsel Clause).

[486] Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 307–08 (1991).

[487] Johnson v. United States, 520 U.S. 461, 468 (1997), citing Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (complete denial of counsel); Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927) (biased trial judge); Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986) (racial discrimination in selection of grand jury); McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984) (denial of self-representation at trial); Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39 (1984) (denial of public trial); Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275 (1993) (defective reasonable doubt instruction vitiates all the jury's findings, and produces consequences that are necessarily unquantifiable and indeterminate).

[488] Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 309–10 (1991), quoting Rose v. Clark, 478 U.S. 570, 577–78 (1986).

CHAPTER 4

DIGNITY AND WORTH OF THE INDIVIDUAL—PERSONAL INVIOLABILITY AND LIBERTY

A. DIGNITY AND WORTH OF THE INDIVIDUAL

[D1] The Constitution of the United States does not provide explicitly for the protection of dignity and intrinsic worth of every individual. However the Court considers that the respect of human dignity lies at the heart of various constitutional provisions and constitutes an essential element of the constitutional order. "The overriding function of the Fourth Amendment is to protect personal privacy and dignity against unwarranted intrusion by the State."[1] The police violate the Constitution when they use brutal methods, "offensive to human dignity," to obtain evidence.[2] The Fifth Amendment, assuring the right against self-incrimination, precludes interrogation methods "destructive of human dignity," such as the inflicting of psychological intimidation, for the purpose of subjugating the person under investigation to the will of his examiner.[3]

[D2] The Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments, whose reach extends to the conditions of serving a sentence,[4] embodies "broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity, and decency," against which the Court evaluates penal measures,[5] has in its core the basic concept of human dignity[6] and requires observance of the "evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society."[7] Abortion is considered to be a choice "central to personal dignity and autonomy," lying at the heart of liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.[8] Unlawful gender discrimination "deprives persons of their individual dignity."[9] Racial discrimination in the qualification or selection of jurors "offends the dignity of persons"

---

1 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 767 (1966).

2 Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 174 (1952).

3 Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 457 (1966).

4 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832 (1994) (prison officials have a duty under the Eighth Amendment to provide humane conditions of confinement); Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 346 (1981) (conditions of imprisonment must meet the contemporary standards of human decency).

5 Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 102 (1976).

6 See, e.g., Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738 (2002), citing Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 100 (1958) (plurality opinion). See also Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 173 (1976) (three-member plurality).

7 Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361, 369 (1989); Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815, 821 (1988); Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101 (1958) (plurality opinion).

8 See Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 851 (1992).

9 Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 625 (1984).

and the integrity of the courts, in violation of the Equal Protection Clause.[10] Discrimination based on ancestry demeans a person's "dignity and worth."[11] Experimentation on soldiers, without their voluntary consent, "offends their essential human dignity;" the subject of experimentation who has not volunteered is treated as an object, a sample.[12] Therefore, one's dignity and worth constitute an established constitutional value.

[D3] The Court has also used the concept of human dignity and decency with respect to society as a whole. The Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments protects "the dignity of society itself from the barbarity of exacting mindless vengeance."[13] The political system of the United States rests upon "individual dignity and choice."[14] The interest to a decent society may justify restrictions on civil liberties, especially on the freedom of expression. The pervasive and strong interest of the society in preventing and redressing attacks upon one's reputation "reflects no more than [the] basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty."[15] The nation and the states have the right to "maintain a decent society;"[16] thus, "the primary requirements of decency may be enforced against obscene publications."[17] Nonetheless, the mere dissemination of ideas—no matter how offensive to good taste—on a state university campus cannot be proscribed in the name alone of "conventions of decency."[18] Moreover, the state's interest in preserving the dignity of the legal profession is insufficient to justify the ban on all use of illustrations in attorney advertisements.[19]

B. PERSONAL INVIOLABILITY AND LIBERTY

1. Compulsory Labor and Service

[D4] The Thirteenth Amendment forbids slavery or involuntary servitude,[20] except if it is inflicted as punishment for a crime of which an individual was duly convicted.

---

10 Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 402 (1991).

11 Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 517 (2000) (voting qualification, implemented by the Hawaiian law, that limits the right to vote to "native Hawaiians," defined as descendants of the peoples inhabiting the Hawaiian Islands in 1778).

12 See dissenting opinion of three Justices in United States v. Stanley, 483 U.S. 669, 708 (1987) (a serviceman volunteered for what was ostensibly a chemical warfare testing program, but in which he was secretly administered LSD, pursuant to an Army plan to test the effects of the drug on human subjects, whereby he suffered severe personality changes that led to his discharge and the dissolution of his marriage).

13 See Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399, 410 (1986) (the Eighth Amendment prohibits the state from inflicting the death penalty upon a prisoner who is insane).

14 Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 24 (1971).

15 Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1, 22 (1990), quoting Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (Stewart, J., concurring).

16 Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 59 (1973).

17 Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931); Kingsley Books Inc. v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436, 440 (1957).

18 Papish v. Bd. of Curators of the Univ. of Missouri, 410 U.S. 667, 670 (1973).

19 Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 647–49 (1985).

20 The Amendment is "self-executing without any ancillary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances. See United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 942 (1988), quoting Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 20 (1883).

The aim of this prohibition "was not merely to end slavery, but to maintain a system of completely free and voluntary labor throughout the United States;"[21] that is why its scope extends beyond state action and reaches legal relations between private persons.[22] Pursuant to the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress may strike down all laws, regulations, and usages in the states that attempt "to maintain and enforce, directly or indirectly, the involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons in the liquidation of any debt or obligation."[23] "[N]o state can make the quitting of work any component of a crime, or make criminal sanctions available for holding unwilling persons to labor."[24]

[D5] The Thirteenth Amendment prohibition refers to involuntary servitude "enforced by the use or threatened use of physical or legal coercion. The guarantee of freedom from involuntary servitude has never been interpreted specifically to prohibit compulsion of labor by other means, such as psychological coercion. . . . [The latter construction] does not imply that evidence of other means of coercion, or of extremely poor working conditions, or of the victim's special vulnerabilities, is irrelevant. The vulnerabilities of the victim are relevant in determining whether the physical or legal coercion or threats thereof could plausibly have compelled the victim to serve. In addition, a trial court could properly find that evidence of other means of coercion or of extremely poor working conditions is relevant to corroborate disputed evidence regarding the use or threatened use of physical or legal coercion, the defendant's intention in using such means, or the causal effect of such conduct."[25]

[D6] Yet, "not all situations in which labor is compelled by physical coercion or force of law violate the Thirteenth Amendment. By its terms, the Amendment excludes involuntary servitude imposed as legal punishment for a crime. Similarly, the Court has recognized that the prohibition against involuntary servitude does not prevent the State or Federal Governments from compelling their citizens, by threat of criminal sanction, to perform certain civic duties,"[26] such as the giving of testimony and the attendance upon court or grand jury in order to testify,[27] jury service,[28] roadwork,[29] or military service. The grant to Congress of the power to raise and support armies, considered in conjunction with the grants of the powers to declare war, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and to make laws necessary and proper for

---

[21] Pollock v. Williams, 322 U.S. 4, 17 (1944).

[22] See, in particular, United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 942 (1988).

[23] United States v. Reynolds, 235 U.S. 133, 143 (1914) (constant fear of punishment under the criminal law renders work compulsory).

[24] Pollock v. Williams, 322 U.S. 4, 18 (1944) (state law subjecting debtors to prosecution and criminal punishment for failing to perform labor and receiving an advance payment).

[25] United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 944, 952 (1988).

[26] Id. at 943–44.

[27] Hurtado v. United States, 410 U.S. 578, 588–89 (1973). The government may compel witnesses to testify at trial or before a grand jury, on pain of contempt, so long as the witness in not the target of the criminal case in which he testifies. See Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 443–44 (1972); Chavez v. Martinez, 538 U.S. 760, 767–68 (2003).

[28] See, e.g., Butler v. Perry, 240 U.S. 328, 333 (1916).

[29] Butler v. Perry, 240 U.S. 328 (1916) (a reasonable amount of work on public roads near his residence is a part of the duty owed by able-bodied men to the public, and a requirement by a state to that effect does not amount to imposition of involuntary servitude otherwise than as a punishment for crime within the prohibition of the Thirteenth Amendment, nor does the enforcement of such requirement deprive persons of their liberty and property without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment).

executing granted powers (Article I, Section 8), includes the power to compel military service. Compelled military service is neither repugnant to a free government nor in conflict with the constitutional guaranties of individual liberty; indeed, "[i]t may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right to compel it."[30] Furthermore Article I establishes that Congress may authorize members of the National Guard of the United States to be ordered to active duty for purposes of training outside the United States without either the consent of a state governor or the declaration of a national emergency.[31] The constitutional power of Congress to raise and support armies and to make all laws necessary and proper to that end is "broad and sweeping." Pursuant to this power, "Congress may establish a system of registration for individuals liable for training and service, and may require such individuals, within reason, to cooperate in the registration system. The issuance of certificates indicating the registration and eligibility classification of individuals is a legitimate and substantial administrative aid in the functioning of this system. . . . [And since] the Nation has a vital interest in having a system for raising armies that functions with maximum efficiency and is capable of easily and quickly responding to continually changing circumstances," criminal legislation to insure the continuing availability of issued certificates serves a legitimate and substantial purpose in the system's administration.[32]

[D7] Apart from that, the Court has observed that the Thirteenth Amendment was not intended to apply to "exceptional" cases well established in the common law at the time of the Thirteenth Amendment, such as the right of parents and guardians to the custody of their minor children or wards or laws preventing sailors who contracted to work on vessels from deserting their ships.[33]

2. The Right to Travel

a. The Right to Travel and Settle in the United States—Residency Requirements[34]

[D8] Although the Articles of Confederation provided that "the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State," that right finds no explicit mention in the Constitution. "The reason, it has been suggested, is that a right so elementary was conceived from the beginning to be a necessary concomitant of the stronger Union the Constitution created."[35] The Court has recognized that "the nature of [the] Federal Union and . . . constitutional concepts of personal liberty unite to require that all citizens be free to travel throughout the length and breadth of [the land

---

30 Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 378 (1918).

31 Perpich v. Dep't of Def., 496 U.S. 334, 347–55 (1990).

32 United States v. O' Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 377–78, 381–82 (1968) (a criminal law that prohibits the willful mutilation or destruction of "draft cards" does not abridge free speech on its face).

33 United States v. Kozminski, 487 U.S. 931, 944 (1988), citing Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 282, 288 (1897).

34 See also paras. K132 et seq. (durational voter residency requirements).

35 United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 758 (1966); Shapiro v. Thompson 394 U.S. 618, 630–31 (1969).

of the United States] uninhibited by statutes, rules, or regulations which unreasonably burden or restrict this movement."[36] According to Justice O'Connor, the right predates the Constitution, and was carried forward in the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV;[37] but equally plausible is the argument that the right resides in the Commerce Clause[38] or in the Privileges and Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[39] In any event, freedom to travel throughout the United States has long been recognized as a basic right under the Constitution.[40] The constitutional right to travel from one state to another encompasses the right "to use the highways and other instrumentalities of interstate commerce in doing so,"[41] as well as the freedom to reside in any state.[42] The freedom to travel is thought to be an "unconditional personal right."[43] Nevertheless, since the right to travel is a part of the constitutionally protected "liberty" of the individual, it may be limited, so long as the due process clause is observed.[44] Indeed that freedom "does not mean that areas ravaged by flood, fire or pestilence cannot be quarantined when it can be demonstrated that unlimited travel to the area would directly and materially interfere with the safety and welfare of the area or the Nation as a whole."[45] On the contrary, a state statute making it a misdemeanor for anyone knowingly to bring or assist in bringing into the state a nonresident "indigent person" is invalid as an unconstitutional burden on inter-state commerce.[46]

[D9] The right to travel embraces also "the right to be treated as a welcome visitor rather than an unfriendly alien when temporarily present" in another state.[47] This component of the freedom to travel is, however, expressly protected by the text of the Constitution. The first sentence of Article IV, Section 2, provides: "The Citizens of each

---

[36] Shapiro v. Thompson 394 U.S. 618, 629 (1969).

[37] See concurring opinion of Justice O'Connor in Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 78–81 (1982). Cf. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180 (1869); Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430 (1871).

[38] Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 173 (1941). See also Justice Brennan's opinion in Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 66 (1982).

[39] See opinion of Justice Douglas in Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 177–78 (1941) and Justice Brennan's opinion in Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 66–67 (1982).

[40] United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 758 (1966); Shapiro v. Thompson 394 U.S. 618, 631 (1969).

[41] United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 757 (1966).

[42] Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 338 (1972). See also Attorney Gen. of New York v. Soto Lopez, 476 U.S. 898, 902 (1986) (plurality opinion).

[43] Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 341 (1972); Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 498 (1999).

[44] Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 125–27 (1958).

[45] Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 15–16 (1965). See also Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 29 (1905) (an American citizen, arriving at an American port on a vessel in which, during the voyage, there had been cases of yellow fever or Asiatic cholera, although apparently free from disease himself, may yet, in some circumstances, be held in quarantine against his will on board of such vessel or in a quarantine station until it be ascertained by inspection, conducted with due diligence, that the danger of the spread of the disease among the community at large has disappeared).

[46] Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 172–74 (1941). The statute was held invalid as an unconstitutional burden on inter-state commerce, but it was the right to go from one place to another, including the right to cross state borders while en route, that was vindicated, as the Court noted in Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 500 (1999).

[47] Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 500 (1999).

State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States." Thus, by virtue of a person's state citizenship, a citizen of one state who travels in other states, intending to return home at the end of his journey, is entitled to enjoy the "Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States" that he visits. This provision removes "from the citizens of each State the disabilities of alienage in the other States"[48] and was designed "to place the citizens of each State upon the same footing with citizens of other States, so far as the advantages resulting from citizenship in those States are concerned."[49] However, "it is 'only with respect to those "privileges" and "immunities" bearing on the vitality of the Nation as a single entity' that a State must accord residents and nonresidents equal treatment."[50] As a threshold matter, it must be determined "whether the out-of-state resident's interest at issue is sufficiently 'fundamental' to the promotion of interstate harmony."[51] Thus, the Clause provides protection for non-residents who enter a state whether to procure medical services,[52] to obtain employment,[53] or to engage in professional activities.[54] On the contrary, amateur recreational activities do not fall within the category of rights protected by the Privileges and Immunities Clause.[55]

[D10] Moreover, like many other constitutional provisions, the privileges and immunities clause is not an absolute.[56] The Clause does not preclude discrimination against non-residents where "there is a substantial reason for the difference in treatment and . . . the discrimination practiced against nonresidents bears a substantial relationship to the State's objective. . . . In deciding whether the discrimination bears a close or substantial relationship to the State's objective, the Court has considered the availability of less restrictive means."[57] This inquiry must be conducted "with due regard for the principle that the States should have considerable leeway in analyzing local evils and

---

48 Id. at 501, quoting Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180 (1869).

49 Supreme Court of Virginia v. Friedman, 487 U.S. 59, 64 (1988), quoting Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180 (1869).

50 Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 279 (1985), quoting Baldwin v. Montana Fish & Game Comm'n of Montana, 436 U.S. 371, 383 (1978).

51 Building Trades & Constr. Trades Council of Camden County and Vicinity v. Mayor and Council of the City of Camden, 465 U.S. 208, 218 (1984).

52 Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 200 (1973) (state law allowing abortion only if the patient was a state resident).

53 Building Trades & Constr. Trades Council of Camden County and Vicinity v. Mayor and Council of the City of Camden, 465 U.S. 208, 214–18 (1984) (city ordinance requiring that at least 40 percent of the employees of contractors and subcontractors working on city construction projects be city residents); Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 526–34 (1978) (Alaska statute requiring that all Alaskan oil and gas leases, easements or right-of-way permits for oil and gas pipelines, and unitization agreements contain a requirement that qualified Alaska residents be hired in preference to non-residents).

54 See, in particular, Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396–403 (1948) (state law requiring non-residents fishermen to pay a license fee for each shrimp boat 100 times higher than the fee due by residents).

55 Baldwin v. Fish & Game Comm'n of Montana, 436 U.S. 371, 384–88 (1978) (state statutory elk hunting license scheme, which imposed substantially higher (at least seven and a half times) license fees on non-residents of the state than on residents, and which required non-residents (but not residents) to purchase a "combination" license in order to be able to obtain a single elk).

56 See, e.g., Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396 (1948).

57 Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 284 (1985).

in prescribing appropriate cures;"[58] "[t]his caution is particularly appropriate when a government body is merely setting conditions on the expenditure of funds it controls."[59] Subsequently a city ordinance requiring that at least 40 percent of the employees of contractors and sub-contractors working on city construction projects be city residents may be valid, if necessary to counteract grave economic and social ills, for example when spiraling unemployment, a sharp decline in population, and a dramatic reduction in the number of businesses located in the city have eroded property values and depleted the city's tax base.[60] However, even under the dubious assumption that a state may validly alleviate its unemployment problem by requiring private employers within the state to discriminate against non-residents,[61] such a statute cannot be upheld, if the state's unemployment is not attributable to the influx of non-resident job-seekers, but rather to the fact that a substantial number of jobless residents were unemployed either because of lack of education and job training or because of geographical remoteness from job opportunities and, moreover, if the statutory preference over non-residents is given to all state residents, not just those who are unemployed.[62] Similarly a state law requiring non-residents fishermen to pay a license fee for each shrimp boat 100 times more than the fee due by residents was struck down, since the state could eliminate the danger of excessive trawling through less restrictive means, such as by restricting the type of equipment used in its fisheries, graduating license fees according to the size of the boats, or charging non-residents a differential to compensate for the added enforcement burden they imposed.[63]

[D11] Finally, for those travelers who elect to become permanent residents in a state, the freedom to travel embraces a third component, "the right to be treated like other citizens of that State."[64] That right is protected by the new arrival's status as both a state citizen and a U.S. citizen, and it is plainly identified in the Fourteenth Amendment's Privileges or Immunities Clause. The Fourteenth Amendment's Citizenship Clause expressly "equates citizenship with residence . . . [and] does not tolerate a hierarchy of . . . subclasses of similarly situated citizens based on the location of their prior residences."[65] Thus, a discriminatory classification of state citizens having the effect of imposing a penalty on the exercise of the constitutional right of inter-state immigration is upheld only if it is "shown to be necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest."[66] Besides, such a classification is impermissible, even if there is no finding that the discriminatory statute actually deterred travel.[67]

---

58 Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396 (1948).

59 Building Trades & Constr. Trades Council of Camden County and Vicinity v. Mayor and Council of the City of Camden, 465 U.S. 208, 223 (1984).

60 Id. at 222–23.

61 In Building Trades, supra note 59 at 223, the Court noted that the Alaska hire statute, at issue in Hicklin v. Orbeck, was invalidated as an attempt to force virtually all businesses (public and private) that benefited in some way from the economic ripple effect of Alaska's decision to develop its oil and gas resources to bias their employment practices in favor of the state's residents.

62 Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518, 526–28 (1978).

63 See Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 284, n.17 (1985), discussing Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 397–399 (1948).

64 Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 500 (1999).

65 Id. at 506–07.

66 Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634 (1969). See also Attorney Gen. of New York v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898, 906 (1986).

67 See Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 339–40 (1972); Mem'l Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 258 (1974).

[D12] The Court's jurisprudence regarding the third component of the freedom to travel involves mainly state laws that condition the conferral of welfare benefits on the duration of residency in the state. In Shapiro, the leading case in that field, the Court struck down state statutory provisions that denied welfare assistance to persons who were residents and met all other eligibility requirements except that they had not resided within the jurisdiction for at least a year immediately preceding their applications for assistance.[68] First, the Court noted that the purpose of deterring the in-migration of indigents could not serve as justification for the classification created by the one-year waiting period, since that purpose was constitutionally impermissible; moreover, a state may no more try to fence out those indigents who seek higher welfare benefits than it may try to fence out indigents generally. In any case, the statutes were not tailored to serve that objective; rather, the class of barred newcomers was all-inclusive, lumping the great majority who came to the state for other purposes with those who came for the sole purpose of collecting higher benefits. The argument that the challenged classification might be sustained as an attempt to distinguish between new and old residents on the basis of the contribution they had made to the community through the payment of taxes was rejected, since this reasoning would logically permit the state to bar new residents from schools, parks, and libraries or deprive them of police and fire protection and, in general, to apportion all benefits and services according to the past tax contributions of its citizens, in disregard of the Equal Protection Clause.[69] Next the Court pointed out that, although a state has a valid interest in preserving the fiscal integrity of its programs, it may not accomplish such a purpose by invidious distinctions between classes of its citizens; the relevant argument that the waiting period requirement facilitated budget predictability was considered to be wholly unfounded. The argument that the waiting period served as an administratively efficient rule of thumb for determining residency did not also withstand scrutiny, since the residence requirement and the one-year waiting period requirement were distinct and independent prerequisites for assistance under the statutes at issue. Similarly, there was no need for a state to use the one-year waiting period as a safeguard against fraudulent receipt of benefits, for less drastic means were available to minimize that hazard, like administrative inquiries (in fact already employed) and cooperation among state welfare departments. Finally, the suggestion that the one-year waiting period was justified as a means of encouraging new residents to join the labor force promptly would also require a similar waiting period for long-term residents of the state and, thus, provided no rational basis for imposing a one-year waiting period restriction on new residents only.[70]

[D13] Applying analogous reasoning, the Court has invalidated a state statute requiring a year's residence in a county as a condition to an indigent's receiving non-emergency hospitalization or medical care at the county's expense. More particularly, the

---

[68] Yet, the Constitution does not require that a person who travels to a state must be given benefits superior to those enjoyed by other residents of that state, if the newcomer enjoyed those benefits in the state from which he came. See Califano v. Torres, 435 U.S. 1, 4–5 (1978) (per curiam).

[69] Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 632–33 (1969). See also Zobel v. Williams, 47 U.S. 55, 64 (1982), where four members of the Court, concurring, noted that "even the idea of rewarding past public service offers scarce support for the 'past contribution' justification for durational residence classifications, since length of residence has only the most tenuous relation to the actual service of individuals to the State." Id. at 71.

[70] Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634–38 (1969).

claim that the one-year waiting period was a convenient rule of thumb to determine bona fide residence was rejected, because this test was "certainly overbroad to accomplish its avowed purpose . . . [since a] mere residence requirement would accomplish the objective of limiting the use of public medical facilities to bona fide residents of the County without sweeping within its prohibitions those bona fide residents who had moved into the State within the qualifying period."[71] Moreover, the allegation that the waiting period was a useful tool for preventing fraud was held as ill-suited to that purpose. On the one hand, an indigent applicant, intent on committing fraud, could as easily swear to having been a resident of the county for the preceding year as to being one currently; on the other hand, there was no need for the state to rely on the durational requirement as a safeguard against fraud when other mechanisms to serve that purpose were available that would have a less drastic impact on constitutionally protected interests, for example, the state law making it a crime to file an untrue statement for the purpose of obtaining hospitalization, medical care, or outpatient relief, at county expense.[72]

[D14] In Zobel, the Court ruled that Alaska's program of distributing cash dividends on the basis of the recipient's years of residency in the state violated the Equal Protection Clause. First, the Court found that the state objective of creating a financial incentive for individuals to establish and maintain Alaska residence was not rationally related to the distinction Alaska sought to make. Assuming, arguendo, that granting increased dividend benefits for each year of continued Alaska residence might give some residents an incentive to stay in the state in order to reap increased dividend benefits in the future, the state's interest was not in any way served by granting greater dividends to persons for their residency during the 21 years prior to the enactment. Further, the Court emphasized that rewarding citizens for past contributions was not a legitimate state purpose and concluded: "If the states can make the amount of a cash dividend depend on length of residence, what would preclude varying university tuition on a sliding scale based on years of residence—or even limiting access of finite public facilities, eligibility for student loans, for civil service jobs, or for government contracts by length of domicile? Could states impose different taxes based on length of residence? Alaska's reasoning could open the door to state apportionment of other rights, benefits, and services according to length of residency. It would permit the states to divide citizens into expanding numbers of permanent classes. Such a result would be clearly impermissible."[73]

[D15] Similarly, the Court invalidated on equal protection grounds New Mexico's policy of providing a permanent tax exemption for Vietnam veterans who had been state residents before May 8, 1976, but not to more recent arrivals. The Court expressly rejected the state's claim that it had a legitimate interest in providing special rewards to veterans who lived in the state before 1976, and concluded that "[n]either the Equal Protection Clause nor this Court's precedents permit the State to prefer established resident veterans over newcomers in the retroactive apportionment of an economic benefit."[74]

---

[71] Mem'l Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 267 (1974). Nevertheless, in Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441 (1973), involving a statutory definition of "residents" for purposes of fixing tuition to be paid by students in a state university system, the Court warned that its decision should not be construed to deny a state the right to impose on a student, as one element in demonstrating bona fide residence, a reasonable durational residency requirement.

[72] Mem'l Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 268 (1974).

[73] Zobel v. Williams, 47 U.S. 55, 64 (1982).

[74] Hooper v. Bernalillo County Assessor, 472 U.S. 612, 623 (1985).

[D16] In Saenz, the Court found violative of the Fourteenth Amendment a law of the state of California (which had one of the highest welfare benefit levels in the country) that limited new residents, during their first year in California, to the welfare benefits they would have received in the state of their prior residence. The statute was doubly vulnerable: neither the duration of California residence of the beneficiaries nor the identity of their prior states of residence had any relevance to their need for benefits; nor did those factors bear any relationship to the state's interest in making an equitable allocation of the funds to be distributed among its needy citizens.[75]

[D17] Soto-Lopez invalidated a statutory scheme of the state of New York that granted a civil service employment preference, in the form of points added to examination scores, to New York residents who were honorably discharged veterans of the armed forces, served during time of war, and were New York residents when they entered military service. A four-Justice plurality found an unconstitutional transgression of the freedom of travel, considering that New York did not demonstrate that its classification was necessary to accomplish a compelling state interest. More specifically, the justifications offered in support of the prior residence requirement—encouraging New York residents to join the armed forces, helping war veterans re-establish themselves, inducing veterans to return to New York, and employing a "uniquely valuable class of public servants" who possessed useful experience acquired through military service—failed to pass constitutional muster, since New York could accomplish these purposes without penalizing the right to travel by awarding special credits to all qualified veterans.[76]

[D18] On other occasions, the Court found no violation of the freedom to travel. A state statutory requirement that a petitioner in a divorce action be a resident of the state for one year preceding the filing of the petition is valid, for such requirement "may reasonably be justified on grounds . . . [of the State's] interest in requiring those seeking a divorce from its courts to be genuinely attached to the State, as well as [of the State's] desire to insulate its divorce decrees from the likelihood of successful collateral attack."[77] A charge, like a "use and service charge" for each passenger enplaning any commercial aircraft operated from a state airport, designed to make the user of state-provided facilities pay a reasonable fee—fixed according to some "uniform, fair and practical standard"—for their construction and maintenance may constitutionally be imposed on inter-state and intra-state users; since the facility provided at public expense aids, rather than hinders, the right to travel, a permissible charge to help defray the cost of the facility is not a burden in the constitutional sense.[78] Moreover, although a simple penalty for leaving a state is impermissible, if departure aggravates the consequences of conduct that is otherwise punishable, such as the abandonment of a minor child, the state may treat the entire sequence of events, from the initial offense to departure from the state, as more serious than its separate components, without infringing upon the constitutionally protected right to travel.[79]

---

[75] Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 507 (1999).

[76] Attorney Gen. of New York v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898, 906–11 (1986). Two members of the Court concurred in the judgment, finding a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.

[77] Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 406, 409 (1975).

[78] Evansville-Vanderburgh Airport Auth. Dist. v. Delta Airlines, Inc. 405 U.S. 707, 713–14 (1972).

[79] Jones v. Helms, 452 U.S. 412, 422–23 (1981).

[D19] A municipal regulation requiring employees of the city to be residents of that city is valid.[80] And the states have the power to require that voters be bona fide residents of the relevant political subdivision, for an "appropriately defined and uniformly applied requirement of bona fide residence may be necessary to preserve the basic conception of a political community, and therefore can withstand close constitutional scrutiny."[81] A state statute that permits a school district to deny tuition-free admission to its public schools for a minor who lives apart from a parent, guardian, or other person having lawful control of him, if his presence in the district is for the primary purpose of attending the public free schools, satisfies constitutional standards, because the fact that provision for primary and secondary education is one of the most important functions of local government is an adequate justification for local residence requirements, absent which "the proper planning and operation of the schools would suffer significantly."[82] Moreover, a zoning ordinance, prohibiting automobile commuters from parking in designated residential neighborhoods and providing for free parking permits for residents of such neighborhoods, does not violate the Equal Protection Clause, for the distinction drawn between residents and non-residents of a neighborhood bears a rational relation to the the ordinance's stated legitimate objectives of reducing air pollution and other adverse consequences of automobile commuting and of enhancing the quality of life in residential areas, such as by reducing noise, traffic hazards, and litter.[83]

[D20] Taking into account that "the right to remove from one place to another, according to inclination," has been acknowledged as "an attribute of personal liberty,"[84] three members of the Court admitted, in Morales, that the freedom to loiter for innocent purposes is part of the "liberty" protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Subsequently they concluded that a city ordinance, prohibiting criminal street gang members from remaining in any public place with no apparent purpose, was void for vagueness, for it failed to establish standards sufficient to guard against arbitrary deprivation of liberty.[85]

b. The Right to International Travel

[D21] The right to international travel is considered to be a part of the "liberty" of which a citizen cannot be deprived without due process of law under the Fifth Amendment.[86] The Court's jurisprudence in this field involves principally cases of passport[87] denial or revocation.

---

80 McCarthy v. Philadelphia Civil Serv. Comm'n, 424 U.S. 645 (1976) (per curiam).

81 See, e.g., Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 343–44 (1972).

82 Martinez v. Bynum, 461 U.S. 321, 329 (1983).

83 Arlington County Bd. v. Richards, 434 U.S. 5, 7 (1977) (per curiam).

84 Williams v. Fears, 179 U.S. 270, 274 (1900).

85 Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 53, 56–60 (1999) (plurality opinion).

86 Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 125 (1958); Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 514 (1964); Regan v. Wald, 468 U.S. 222, 240–42 (1984).

87 A passport is a document identifying a citizen, in effect requesting foreign powers to allow the bearer to enter and to pass freely and safely, recognizing the right of the bearer to the protection and good offices of American diplomatic and consular officers. See United States v. Laub, 385 U.S. 475, 481 (1967).

[D22] The Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 provided that, when a Communist organization was registered, or under final order to register, it would be unlawful for any member with knowledge or notice thereof to apply for or use a passport. Under that provision, the Department of State revoked the passports of high-ranking officials of the Communist Party, who filed suits. Beginning its reasoning, the Court observed that, even though the protection of national security is a legitimate and substantial governmental purpose, "that purpose cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved. The breadth of legislative abridgment should be viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." The provision in question swept within its prohibition both knowing and unknowing members. At the same time, it rendered irrelevant "the member's degree of activity in the organization and his commitment to its purpose," establishing an irrebuttable presumption that individuals who were members of the specified organizations would, if given passports, engage in activities inimical to the security of the United States. The prohibition applied regardless of the purposes for which an individual wished to travel and regardless of the security-sensitivity of the areas that a party member would like to visit. In addition, Congress had within its power "less drastic" means of achieving the congressional objective of safeguarding the national security. For example, under Executive Order No. 9835, membership in a Communist organization was not considered conclusive but only as one factor to be weighed in determining the loyalty of an applicant or employee. The foregoing considerations compelled the conclusion that the regulation swept too widely and too indiscriminately across the right to international travel and was unconstitutional on its face.[88]

[D23] On the contrary, the Court has twice approved measures prohibiting travel to Cuba. In 1962, after the United States had broken diplomatic relations with Cuba and the Department of State had eliminated Cuba from the area for which passports were not required, an American citizen applied to have his passport validated for travel to Cuba to satisfy his curiosity and to make him a better informed citizen. His request was denied, under the Passport Act of 1926, and he filed suit seeking a judgment declaring that he was entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States to travel to Cuba and to have his passport validated for that purpose. The Court emphasized that in the early days of the Castro regime, U.S. citizens had been arrested and imprisoned without charges. The United States and other members of the Organization of American States had determined that travel between Cuba and the other countries of the Western Hemisphere was an important element in the spreading of subversion. Since the Secretary of State had justifiably concluded that travel to Cuba by American citizens might involve the action in dangerous international incidents, the Court, pointing out that the right to travel may be limited in cases involving the safety and welfare of the nation as a whole and recalling, at the same time, the Cuban missile crisis of October 1962, admitted that the challenged restriction was supported by the weightiest considerations of national security.[89] Similarly the Court upheld, in 1984, a federal regulation

---

[88] Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 508–14 (1964). Cf. Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958).

[89] Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 14–15 (1965). The Court also noted that, "because of the changeable and explosive nature of contemporary international relations, and the fact that the Executive is immediately privy to information that cannot be swiftly presented to, evaluated by, and acted upon by the legislature, Congress—in giving the Executive authority over matters of foreign affairs—must of necessity paint with a brush broader than that it customarily wields in domestic areas." Id. at 17.

excluding general tourist and business travel to Cuba. Respondents alleged that there was no "emergency" at that time, and that the relations between Cuba and the United States were subject to only the normal tensions inherent in contemporary international affairs. The Court rejected the argument. First, it observed that matters relating to the conduct of foreign relations are "so exclusively entrusted to the political branches of government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference." Next, it stressed that relations between Cuba and the United States had not been "normal" for the last quarter of a century, and that those relations had deteriorated further in recent years due to increased Cuban efforts to destabilize governments throughout the Western Hemisphere. Given the traditional deference to executive judgment in the realm of foreign policy, the Court thought that there was an adequate basis under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to sustain the President's decision to curtail the flow of hard currency to Cuba—currency that could then be used in support of Cuban adventurism—by restricting travel.[90]

[D24] In 1974, Agee, an American citizen and a former employee of the Central Intelligence Agency, who had held key positions in the Agency's division responsible for covert intelligence-gathering in foreign countries, announced a campaign to expose CIA officers and agents and to take the measures necessary to drive them out of the countries where they were operating. He then engaged in activities abroad that resulted in identifications of alleged undercover CIA agents and intelligence sources in foreign countries. Because of these activities, the Secretary of State revoked respondent's passport, explaining that the revocation was based on a regulation authorizing revocation of a passport where the Secretary determined that an American citizen's activities abroad were causing or were likely to cause serious damage to the national security or the foreign policy of the United States. The Court noted that the freedom to travel abroad with a "letter of introduction" in the form of a passport issued by the sovereign is "subordinate to national security and foreign policy considerations [and,] as such, it is subject to reasonable governmental regulation." Not only had Agee jeopardized the security of the United States, but he had also endangered the interests of other countries, thereby creating serious problems for American foreign relations and foreign policy. Subsequently, restricting Agee's foreign travel, although perhaps not certain to prevent all of Agee's harmful activities, was upheld, as the only avenue open to the government to limit these activities. Furthermore, it was decided that when there is a substantial likelihood of serious damage to national security or foreign policy as a result of a passport holder's activities in foreign countries, the government may take action to ensure that the holder may not exploit the sponsorship of his travels by the United States, without a pre-revocation hearing; in such cases the Constitution's due process guarantees call for no more than a statement of reasons and an opportunity for a prompt post-revocation hearing.[91]

[D25] The question of violation of the right to international travel has also arisen in relation to a federal law providing that no benefits under the Supplemental Security Income program for the needy aged, blind, and disabled were to be paid for any month that the recipient spent entirely outside of the United States. The Court stressed that the provision at issue had only an incidental effect on the freedom to travel; it did not limit the availability or validity of passports, but merely withdrew a governmental benefit during and shortly after an extended absence from this country. Therefore, it would be enough if the provision were rationally based. The Court noted that the statute added assurance that the beneficiary's residency in the United States was genuine and that Congress might simply have decided to limit payments to those who needed them in the United States and, indeed, might only have wanted to increase the likelihood that these funds would be spent inside the United States. Hence, the law was held to be constitutional as having a rational basis.[92]

---

90 Regan v. Wald, 468 U.S. 222, 242–43 (1984).

91 Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 306–10 (1981).

3. The Right to Bodily Integrity

a. Generally

[D26] The Constitution guarantees the right of the individual that "his person be held inviolable"[93] and the right to "bodily integrity."[94] The vitiation of these rights may contravene the Eighth Amendment, when the government acts against a convicted person who serves his sentence,[95] or the Fourth Amendment, in relation to searches and seizures involving the body.[96] In any other case, the Court invokes the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, considering that the "liberty" specially protected by the Due Process Clause includes, inter alia, the right to bodily integrity.[97]

b. Corporal Punishment in Public Schools

[D27] "Where school authorities, acting under color of state law, deliberately decide to punish a child for misconduct by restraining the child and inflicting appreciable physical pain, . . . Fourteenth Amendment liberty interests are implicated. . . . The openness of the public school and its supervision by the community afford significant safeguards against . . . abuses. . . . [T]hese safeguards are reinforced by the legal constraints of the common law, [whereby any punishment going beyond that which] is reasonably necessary for the proper education and discipline of the child . . . may result in both civil and criminal liability. . . . The concept that reasonable corporal punishment in school is justifiable . . . represents the balance between the child's interest in personal security and the traditional view that some limited corporal punishment may be necessary in the course of a child's education. Under that longstanding accommodation of interests, there can be no deprivation of substantive rights as long as disciplinary corporal punishment is within the limits of the [foregoing] common law privilege. . . . In view of the low incidence of abuse, the openness of [public] schools, and the common law safeguards that already exist, the risk of error that may result in violation of a school child's substantive rights can only be regarded a minimal. Imposing additional admin-

---

92 Califano v. Aznavorian, 439 U.S. 170, 175–78 (1978).

93 Breithaupt v. Abram, 352 U.S. 432, 439 (1957).

94 See Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 720 (1997), citing Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952); Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 272 (1994) (plurality opinion). Cf. Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985), in which the Court referred to the individual's constitutionally protected "interest" in bodily integrity.

95 See paras. E121 et seq.

96 See paras. G49, G112, G137, G204, G214–G216.

97 See, e.g., Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 720 (1997). The Court has also invoked the Sixth Amendment, in case of involuntary medication of an individual found mentally incompetent to stand trial. See Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127, 133–38 (1992).

istrative safeguards as a constitutional requirement might reduce that risk marginally, but would also entail a significant intrusion into an area of primary educational responsibility. [Therefore,] the Due Process Clause does not require notice and a hearing prior to the imposition of corporal punishment in the public schools, as that practice is authorized and limited by the common law."[98]

c. The Right to Refuse Medical Treatment, Vaccination, and the Administration of Drugs

[D28] Under the Due Process Clause, a competent person has a "liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment."[99] The Court admitted implicitly the previous rule at the beginning of the 20th century when it examined the constitutionality of a state regulation providing for compulsory vaccination against smallpox. Regarding the claim that vaccination had little or no value as a means of preventing the spread of smallpox and tended to bring about other diseases, the Court pointed out that, although it was for the legislative department—and no part of its function—to make such determinations, it could take judicial notice of the fact that, according to the common belief (opinion accepted by the mass of the people, as well as by most members of the medical profession), vaccination had a decisive tendency to prevent the spread of smallpox and to render it less dangerous to those who contracted it. Thus it held that the statute in question had been enacted in a reasonable and proper exercise of the police power. However, the Court expressed the reservation that the police power of a state "may be exerted in such circumstances or by regulations so arbitrary and oppressive in particular cases as to justify the interference of the courts to prevent wrong and oppression, [for instance, in] case of an adult who is embraced by the mere words of the act, but yet to subject him to vaccination in a particular condition of his health or body, would be cruel and inhuman in the last degree." Subsequently, the Court construed the statute in a way that vaccination was not required, if it was apparent or could be shown "with reasonable certainty" that an individual was not "at the time a fit subject of vaccination or that vaccination, by reason of his then condition, would seriously impair his health or probably cause his death."[100]

[D29] Similarly, in the interest of discouraging the violation of narcotics laws or in the interest of the general health and welfare of its inhabitants, a state might establish a program of compulsory treatment for those addicted to narcotics. And penal sanctions might be imposed for failure to comply with established compulsory treatment procedures.[101]

[D30] A prisoner has a constitutionally protected interest in not being arbitrarily subjected to unwelcome medical treatment. In Vitek, a convicted felon was placed in solitary confinement, where he set his mattress on fire, burning himself severely. Since he was found to suffer from a mental illness or defect and could not receive proper treatment in the penal complex, he was transferred to the security unit of a state mental hospital, without notice and opportunity for a hearing. The Court noted that "involuntary

---

98 Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 670, 674, 676, 682 (1977).

99 Cruzan v. Dir., Missouri Dep't of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278 (1990).

100 Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 25–35, 38–39 (1905).

101 Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 664–65 (1962).

commitment to a mental hospital is not within the range of conditions of confinement to which a prison sentence subjects an individual. A criminal conviction and sentence of imprisonment extinguish an individual's right to freedom from confinement for the term of his sentence, but they do not authorize the State to classify him as mentally ill and to subject him to involuntary psychiatric treatment without affording him additional due process protections." Although the state's interest in segregating and treating mentally ill patients appears to be strong, the prisoner's interest in not being arbitrarily classified as mentally ill and subjected to unwelcome treatment is also powerful, and the risk of error in making the relevant determinations is substantial enough to warrant the following minimum procedural safeguards: written notice to the prisoner that a transfer to a mental hospital is being considered; a hearing, sufficiently after the notice to permit the prisoner to prepare, at which disclosure to the prisoner is made of the evidence being relied upon for the transfer and at which an opportunity to be heard in person and to present documentary evidence is given; an opportunity at the hearing to present testimony of witnesses by the defense and to confront and cross-examine witnesses called by the state, except upon a finding, not arbitrarily made, of good cause for not permitting such presentation, confrontation, or cross-examination; an independent decisionmaker, who need not come from outside the prison or hospital administration; and a written statement by the fact finder as to the evidence relied on and the reasons for transferring the inmate.[102]

[D31] In Harper, a ward of the Washington state penal system engaged in violent conduct and received psychiatric treatment, including the consensual administration of anti-psychotic drugs. On two occasions, he was transferred to the Special Offender Center (SOC), a state institute for convicted felons with serious mental illness, where he was diagnosed as suffering from a manic-depressive disorder. While at the center, he was required to take anti-psychotic drugs against his will pursuant to an SOC regulation, providing, inter alia, that, if a psychiatrist ordered such medication, an inmate might be involuntarily treated only if he suffered from a "mental disorder" and was "gravely disabled" or posed a "likelihood of serious harm" to himself or others; that, after a hearing and upon a finding that the above conditions were met, a special committee consisting of a psychiatrist, a psychologist, and a center official, none of whom might be currently involved in the inmate's diagnosis or treatment, could order involuntary medication if the psychiatrist was in the majority; and that the inmate had the right to notice of the hearing, the right to attend, present evidence, and cross-examine witnesses, the right to representation by a disinterested lay advisor versed in the psychological issues, the right to appeal to the center's superintendent, and the right to periodic review of any involuntary medication ordered. The Court upheld the above regulatory scheme. Although an inmate possesses a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of anti-psychotic drugs under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, prison administrators have an interest in ensuring the safety of prison staffs and administrative personnel and, at the same time, "have the duty to take reasonable measures for the prisoners' own safety." Thus, the challenged regulation served the state's legitimate interest in combating the danger posed by a violent, mentally ill inmate. Moreover, the regulation was reasonably related to the furtherance of that interest, since (1) it applied exclusively to mentally ill inmates who were gravely disabled or represented a significant danger to themselves or others; (2) there was little dispute in the psychiatric profession that proper use of anti-psychotic drugs was one of the most effective means of treating and controlling a mental illness likely to cause violent behavior; (3) the drugs could be administered only for treatment and under the direction of a licensed psychiatrist. Taking into account the above government interest, the Court rejected Harper's contention that, as a pre-condition to anti-psychotic drug treatment, the state should find him incompetent and then obtain court approval for the treatment. The Court also rejected Harper's allegation that physical restraints or seclusion were alternative means for accommodating his interest in rejecting the forced administration of anti-psychotic drugs, noting, on the one hand, that physical restraints are effective only in the short term and can have serious physical side effects when used on a resisting inmate, as well as leaving the staff at risk of injury while putting the restraints on or tending to the inmate who is in them, and, on the other hand, that Harper had failed to demonstrate that physical restraints or seclusion are acceptable substitutes for anti-psychotic drugs, in terms of either their medical effectiveness or their toll on limited prison resources. In addition, the regulation's hearing procedures comported with procedural due process. The Due Process Clause does not require a judicial hearing before the state may treat a mentally ill prisoner with anti-psychotic drugs against his will, considering, among other things, that the inmate's interest is adequately protected and perhaps better served by allowing the decision to medicate to be made by independent medical professionals rather than a judge, and, second, that the inmate may obtain judicial review of the committee's decision. Neither was the regulation deficient in not allowing representation by counsel, since the provision of an independent lay advisor, who understood the psychiatric issues, was sufficient protection given the medical nature of the decision to be made.[103]

[102] Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 493–96 (1980). Four of the five Justices who reached the merits concluded that an indigent prisoner is entitled to appointed counsel before being involuntarily transferred for treatment to a state mental hospital. Id. at 496–497. The fifth Justice thought that due process merely requires that the state provide an inmate with qualified and independent assistance, which may be rendered by a licensed psychiatrist, or other mental health professional, or competent laymen in some cases. Id. at 500.

[D32] In Riggins, the Court repeated that an individual has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in avoiding involuntary administration of anti-psychotic drugs—an interest that only an "essential" or "overriding" state interest might overcome. The Court suggested that, in principle, forced medication in order to render a defendant competent to stand trial for murder was constitutionally permissible. The Court, citing Harper, noted that the state would have satisfied due process, if the prosecution had demonstrated that treatment with anti-psychotic medication was "medically appropriate and, considering less intrusive alternatives, essential for the sake of Riggins' own safety or the safety of others." And it said that the state similarly "might have been able to justify medically appropriate, involuntary treatment with the drug by establishing that it could not obtain an adjudication of Riggins' guilt or innocence of the murder charge by using less intrusive means." Because the trial court had permitted forced medication of Riggins without taking account of his "liberty interest," with a consequent possibility of trial prejudice, the Court reversed Riggins' conviction and remanded for further proceedings.[104]

---

[103] Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 219–36 (1990).

[104] Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127, 133–38 (1992). Justice Kennedy, concurring in the judgment, emphasized that anti-psychotic drugs might have side effects that would interfere with the defendant's ability to receive a fair trial. Id. at 138.

[D33] The Court has held that these two cases, Harper and Riggins, indicate that "the Constitution permits the Government involuntarily to administer anti-psychotic drugs to a mentally ill defendant facing serious criminal charges in order to render that defendant competent to stand trial, but only if the treatment is medically appropriate, is substantially unlikely to have side effects that may undermine the fairness of the trial, and, taking account of less intrusive alternatives, is necessary significantly to further important governmental trial-related interests."[105]

---

[105] Sell v. Unites States, 539 U.S. 166, 179 (2003). The Court explained (id. at 180–83) that this standard says or fairly implies the following:

> First, a court must find that important governmental interests are at stake. The Government's interest in bringing to trial an individual accused of a serious crime is important. That is so whether the offense is a serious crime against the person or a serious crime against property. . . .
>
> Courts, however, must consider the facts of the individual case in evaluating the Government's interest in prosecution. Special circumstances may lessen the importance of that interest. The defendant's failure to take drugs voluntarily, for example, may mean lengthy confinement in an institution for the mentally ill—and that would diminish the risks that ordinarily attach to freeing without punishment one who has committed a serious crime. We do not mean to suggest that civil commitment is a substitute for a criminal trial. The Government has a substantial interest in timely prosecution. And it may be difficult or impossible to try a defendant who regains competence after years of commitment during which memories may fade and evidence may be lost. The potential for future confinement affects, but does not totally undermine, the strength of the need for prosecution. The same is true of the possibility that the defendant has already been confined for a significant amount of time (for which he would receive credit toward any sentence ultimately imposed. . . . Moreover, the Government has a concomitant, constitutionally essential interest in assuring that the defendant's trial is a fair one.
>
> Second, the court must conclude that involuntary medication will significantly further those concomitant state interests. It must find that administration of the drugs is substantially likely to render the defendant competent to stand trial. At the same time, it must find that administration of the drugs is substantially unlikely to have side effects that will interfere significantly with the defendant's ability to assist counsel in conducting a trial defense, thereby rendering the trial unfair. . . .
>
> Third, the court must conclude that involuntary medication is necessary to further those interests. The court must find that any alternative, less intrusive treatments are unlikely to achieve substantially the same results. . . . And the court must consider less intrusive means for administering the drugs, e.g., a court order to the defendant backed by the contempt power, before considering more intrusive methods.
>
> Fourth, . . . the court must conclude that administration of the drugs is medically appropriate, i.e., in the patient's best medical interest in light of his medical condition. . . .
>
> [T]he court applying these standards is seeking to determine whether involuntary administration of drugs is necessary significantly to further a particular governmental interest—namely the interest in rendering the defendant competent to stand trial. . . . There are often strong reasons for a court to determine whether forced administration of drugs can be justified on these alternative grounds before turning to the trial competence question.

4. Termination of Life-Sustaining Medical Treatment—Assisted Suicide

[D34] In Cruzan,[106] the Court dealt with the issue of termination of artificial life support. Nancy Beth Cruzan suffered severe brain damage, as the result of an automobile accident, and entered a persistent "vegetative" state—generally, a condition in which a person exhibits motor reflexes but evinces no indications of significant cognitive function. The state of Missouri was bearing the cost of her care. Her parents and coguardians sought a court order directing the withdrawal of their daughter's artificial feeding and hydration equipment after it became apparent that she had virtually no chance of recovering her cognitive faculties. The case reached the federal Supreme Court. The Court noted that the Due Process Clause protects an interest in life as well as an interest in refusing life-sustaining medical treatment; however the majority of the Court's members avoided the acknowledgment of a competent person's constitutional right to refuse lifesaving hydration and nutrition but only assumed the existence of such a right for the purposes of the case.[107] Then, the Court pointed out that an incompetent person, like Nancy Beth Cruzan, could not possess the above right, since such a person is unable to make an informed and voluntary choice to exercise that hypothetical right or any other right. Petitioners alleged that the foregoing right should be exercised for their daughter by some sort of surrogate. Missouri recognized, indeed, that, under certain circumstances, a surrogate might act for the patient in electing to withdraw hydration and nutrition and thus cause death. Yet, it had established a procedural safeguard to assure that the surrogate's action conformed, as best it might, to the wishes expressed by the patient while competent. More particularly, it required a judicial (nonadversarial) procedure in which the incompetent's wishes as to the withdrawal of treatment should be proved by clear and convincing evidence. The Court considered this heightened evidentiary standard as appropriate. First, the majority explained that the state may constitutionally adopt this rule to govern determinations of an incompetent's wishes in order to advance the state's substantive interest in the preservation of human life; in relation to that, the state "may properly decline to make judgments about the 'quality' of life that a particular individual may enjoy, and simply assert an unqualified interest in the preservation of human life to be weighed against the constitutionally protected interests of the individual."[108] Thus, it is entitled to guard against potential abuses

---

> For one thing, the inquiry into whether medication is permissible, say, to render an individual nondangerous is usually more "objective and manageable" than the inquiry into whether medication is permissible to render a defendant competent. . . . For another thing, courts typically address involuntary medical treatment as a civil matter, and justify it on these alternative, Harper-type grounds. Every State provides avenues through which, for example, a doctor or institution can seek appointment of a guardian with the power to make a decision authorizing medication—when in the best interests of a patient who lacks the mental competence to make such a decision. . . .
>
> If a court authorizes medication on these alternative grounds, the need to consider authorization on trial competence grounds will likely disappear. Even if a court decides medication cannot be authorized on the alternative grounds, the findings underlying such a decision will help to inform expert opinion and judicial decisionmaking in respect to a request to administer drugs for trial competence purposes.

[106] Cruzan v. Dir., Missouri Dep't of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278–87 (1990).

[107] Four Members of the Court admitted the constitutional protection of that right. See id. at 289 and at 304–07.

[108] Id. at 282.

by surrogates who may not act to protect the patient. Moreover, the state may also legitimately seek to safeguard the personal element of an individual's choice between life and death and is under no constitutional obligation to accept the "substituted judgment" of close family members in the absence of substantial proof that their views reflect the patient's. Apart from that, a state "is entitled to consider that a judicial proceeding to make a determination regarding an incompetent's wishes may very well not be an adversarial one, with the added guarantee of accurate factfinding that the adversary process brings with it." The clear and convincing evidence standard also serves as a societal judgment about how the risk of error should be distributed between the litigants; the state may permissibly place the increased risk of an erroneous decision on those seeking to terminate life-sustaining treatment. An erroneous decision not to terminate results in a maintenance of the status quo with at least the potential that a wrong decision will eventually be corrected or its impact mitigated by an event, such as an advancement in medical science or the patient's unexpected death. However, an erroneous decision to withdraw such treatment is not susceptible to correction. In the light of the foregoing considerations, the Court confirmed the judgment of the state supreme court, that had found no "clear and convincing" proof of Nancy Cruzan's desire to have hydration and nutrition withdrawn.

[D35] In the same case, Justice Brennan filed a very interesting dissenting opinion in which two other members of the Court joined. He stressed that a patient has a fundamental right to be free from unwanted lifesaving medical care and is "entitled to choose to die with dignity" and not to be remembered in a persistent vegetative state; the mere fact that the patient is incompetent does not deprive him of his fundamental rights. The state "has no legitimate general interest in someone's life, completely abstracted from the interest of the person living that life, that could outweigh the person's choice to avoid medical treatment;" the only state interest that may be asserted is an interest in safe-guarding the accuracy of the determination of the patient's desire. The determination needed in this context is whether the incompetent person would choose to live in a persistent vegetative state on life-support or to avoid this medical treatment. Just as a state may not override the patient's choice directly, it may not do so indirectly through the imposition of a procedural rule. Missouri's standard of proof imposed a markedly asymmetrical evidentiary burden and constituted an obstacle to the exercise of a constitutional right: only clear and convincing evidence of specific statements of treatment choice made by the patient when competent was admissible to support a finding that the patient would wish to avoid further medical treatment; no proof was required to support a finding that the incompetent person would wish to continue treatment. On the other hand, Justice Brennan noted, the testimony of close friends and family members may often be the best evidence available of what the patient's choice would be, for it is they that have a unique knowledge of the patient that is vital to any decision on his or her behalf. In addition, the majority's argument that the allocation of the risk of error was justifiable, because an erroneous decision to terminate life-support is irrevocable, while an erroneous decision not to terminate results in a maintenance of the status quo, might not be sustained, since "from the point of view of the patient, an erroneous decision in either direction is irrevocable. . . . An erroneous decision not to terminate life-support . . . robs a patient of the very qualities protected by the right to avoid unwanted medical treatment; his own degraded existence is perpetuated, his family's suffering is protracted and the memory he leaves behind becomes more and more distorted."[109]

---

[109] Cruzan v. Dir., Missouri Dep't of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 302, 313, 317, 321 (1990).

[D36] Yet, there is no constitutional right to assisted suicide. The Court has not accepted the proposition that, under the Equal Protection Clause, ending or refusing lifesaving medical treatment "is nothing more nor less than assisted suicide," holding that the distinction between letting a patient die and making that patient die is important, rational, and well established: it comports with fundamental legal principles of causation and intent and has been widely recognized and endorsed in the medical profession, the state courts, and the overwhelming majority of state legislatures, which have permitted the former while prohibiting the latter.[110] The question is essentially whether the "liberty" specially protected by the Due Process Clause includes a right to commit suicide, which itself includes a right to assistance in doing so. The Court declined the existence of such a right, noting, on the one hand, that this right has no place in the nation's traditions, given the country's consistent, almost universal, and continuing rejection of the right, even for terminally ill, mentally competent adults, and, on the other hand, that, although many of the rights and liberties protected by the Due Process Clause sound in personal autonomy, it does not follow that any and all important, intimate, and personal decisions are so protected.[111] State laws making assisted suicide a crime do not violate the Due Process Clause, as they are rationally related to important and legitimate government interests. These interests include preserving human life and its sanctity; preventing the serious public health problem of suicide, especially among the young, the elderly, the depressed or mentally ill persons, or those who are suffering from untreated pain; protecting the medical profession's integrity and ethics and maintaining physicians' role as their patients' healers; protecting the poor, the elderly, disabled persons, the terminally ill, and persons in other vulnerable groups from subtle coercion, undue influence, and societal indifference; and avoiding a possible slide towards voluntary and perhaps even involuntary euthanasia.[112]

5. Deprivation of Personal Liberty Without Prior Criminal Conviction

a. In General

[D37] As a general rule of substantive due process, the government may not detain a person prior to a judgment of guilt in a criminal trial.[113] Apart from that, government detention violates the Due Process Clause unless it is ordered in a criminal proceeding with adequate procedural safeguards, or a special justification outweighs the individual's liberty interest.[114] In that context, the Court has recognized a distinction between punitive measures that may not constitutionally be imposed prior to a determination of guilt and regulatory restraints that may.[115]

[D38] In times of war or insurrection, when society's interest is at its peak, the government may detain individuals deemed to be dangerous to the public safety.[116] But

---

[110] Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793, 800–08 (1997) (a state legislation that accords different treatment to those competent, terminally ill persons who wish to hasten their deaths by self-administering prescribed drugs than it does to those who wish to do so by directing the removal of life-support systems, comports with the Equal Protection Clause).

[111] Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 723–28 (1997).

[112] Id. at 728–35; Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793, 808–09 (1997).

[113] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 749 (1987).

[114] Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690 (2001).

[115] See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 537 (1979).

[116] See United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 748 (1987), citing Moyer v. Peabody, 212 U.S. 78, 84–85 (1909) (rejecting due process claim of individual jailed without probable cause by even in times of peace, "sufficiently compelling governmental interests can justify detention of dangerous persons."[117] If the police suspect an individual of a crime, they may arrest and hold him until a neutral magistrate determines whether probable cause exists.[118] Pre-trial detention may be permissible on the basis of prevention of flight or danger to the community.[119] A state can involuntarily confine persons afflicted with a highly contagious disease.[120] A state program of compulsory treatment for those addicted to narcotics might require periods of involuntary confinement.[121] The government may also detain mentally unstable individuals who present a danger to the public,[122] even if their condition is not treatable,[123] and dangerous defendants who become incompetent to stand trial.[124] Similarly there is no absolute constitutional barrier to detention of potentially dangerous resident aliens pending deportation proceedings.[125] However, dangerousness, standing alone, is not a sufficient ground upon which to justify detention; this rationale would be only a step away from substituting confinements for dangerousness for the present criminal system and would permit the state to hold indefinitely, e.g., any convicted criminal, even though he has completed his prison term.[126]

b. Involuntary Commitment to a Mental Institution

i. Generally

[D39] Involuntary commitment to a mental hospital entails a massive curtailment of liberty that requires due process protection.[127] The loss of liberty produced by an involuntary commitment is more than a loss of freedom from confinement, since it can engender adverse social consequences to the individual.[128] "At one time or another, every person exhibits some abnormal behavior which might be perceived by some as symptomatic of a mental or emotional disorder, but which is, in fact, within a range of conduct that is generally acceptable. . . . Loss of liberty calls for a showing that the individual suffers from something more serious than is demonstrated by idiosyncratic behavior."[129] governor in time of insurrection), and Ludecke v. Watkins, 335 U.S. 160, 163–66 (1948), (approving unreviewable executive power to detain enemy aliens in time of war). See also paras. B45–B46.

---

117 United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 748 (1987).

118 See Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 119 (1975). A direction by a legislature to the police to arrest all persons who are "suspicious" for past or future criminality would not pass constitutional muster. See Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 169 (1972).

119 United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 746–52 (1987).

120 Compagnie Francaise de Navigation a Vapeur v. Louisiana State Bd. of Health, 186 U.S. 380 (1902). See also Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 366 (1997).

121 Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 665 (1962).

122 See, e.g., Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 80 (1992).

123 Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 366 (1997).

124 Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 731–39 (1972).

125 Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 537–42 (1952).

126 See Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 82–83 (1992).

127 Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 491–92 (1980).

128 Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 425–26 (1979).

129 Id. at 427.

[D40] "A finding of 'mental illness' alone cannot justify a State's locking a person up against his will and keeping him indefinitely in simple custodial confinement. . . . [T]here is no constitutional basis for confining such persons involuntarily if they are dangerous to no one and can live safely in freedom. [The State may not] confine the mentally ill merely to ensure them a living standard superior to that they enjoy in the private community. . . . [T]he mere presence of mental illness does not disqualify a person from preferring his home to the comforts of an institution. Moreover, while the State may arguably confine a person to save him from harm, incarceration is rarely, if ever, a necessary condition for raising the living standards of those capable of surviving safely in freedom, on their own or with the help of family or friends. [In addition the State may not] fence in the harmless mentally ill solely to save its citizens from exposure to those whose ways are different, . . . [since] [m]ere public intolerance or animosity cannot constitutionally justify the deprivation of a person's physical liberty. . . . In short, a State cannot constitutionally confine, without more, a nondangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends."[130] Besides, dangerousness, standing alone, is not a sufficient ground upon which to justify indefinite involuntary commitment.[131] Generally, the Court has sustained a commitment statute if it couples proof of dangerousness with proof of some additional factor, such as a "mental illness" or "mental abnormality,"[132] which makes it difficult, if not impossible, for the person to control his dangerous behavior.[133]

[D41] A "clear and convincing" standard of proof is required by the Fourteenth Amendment in a civil proceeding brought under state law to commit an individual involuntarily for an indefinite period to a state mental hospital. "The individual should not be asked to share equally with society the risk of error when the possible injury to the individual is significantly greater than any possible harm to the state. [T]he individual's interest in the outcome of a civil commitment proceeding is of such weight and gravity that due process requires the state to justify confinement by proof more substantial than a mere preponderance of the evidence." On the other hand, due process does not require states to use the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof applicable in criminal prosecutions and delinquency proceedings. "The subtleties and nuances of psychiatric diagnosis render certainties virtually beyond reach in most situations. The reasonable doubt standard of criminal law functions in its realm because there the stan-

---

[130] O'Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563, 575–76 (1975). Cf. Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113, 133–34 (1990).

[131] Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 75–85 (1992); Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 358 (1997).

[132] The task of defining terms of a medical nature that have legal significance is traditionally left to legislators, and those definitions may not fit precisely with the specialized terms to define mental health concepts. See Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 359 (1997). See also Kansas v. Crane, 534 U.S. 407, 413 (2002) (the states retain considerable leeway in defining the mental abnormalities and personality disorders that make an individual eligible for commitment).

[133] Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 358 (1997). See also Kansas v. Crane, 534 U.S. 407, 411–15 (2002), where the Court explained that there must be proof of serious difficulty in controlling behavior, but there is no requirement of total or complete lack of control and that, when considering civil commitment, it has not ordinarily distinguished for constitutional purposes between volitional, emotional, and cognitive impairments.

dard is addressed to specific, knowable facts. Psychiatric diagnosis, in contrast, is to a large extent based on medical 'impressions' drawn from subjective analysis and filtered through the experience of the diagnostician. This process often makes it very difficult for the expert physician to offer definite conclusions about any particular patient. Within the medical discipline, the traditional standard for 'factfinding' is a "reasonable medical certainty.' . . . [The state should not] be required to employ a standard of proof that may completely undercut its efforts to further the legitimate interests of both the state and the patient that are served by civil commitments."[134] However, indefinite commitment of an insanity acquittee, based on proof of insanity by only a preponderance of the evidence, comports with due process, since the insanity defense was advanced by the acquittee himself and, more important, the proof that he committed a criminal act as a result of mental illness eliminates the risk that he is being committed for mere "idiosyncratic behavior."[135]

[D42] An individual involuntary committed to a psychiatric hospital is entitled to constitutionally adequate procedures to establish the grounds for his confinement.[136] To determine what procedural protections the Constitution requires in a particular case, several factors are to be weighed. First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and, finally, the government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail. Since the relative issues are "of unusual delicacy, in an area where professional judgments regarding desirable procedures are constantly and rapidly changing, . . . restraint is appropriate on the part of courts called upon to adjudicate whether a particular procedural scheme is adequate under the Constitution."[137]

[D43] The Due Process Clause usually requires some kind of a hearing before the state deprives a person of liberty. If a person signs forms, requesting admission to, and treatment at, a mental hospital, it is foreseeable that he might be incapable of informed consent. Thus, the hospital staff should be in a position to take notice of any misuse of the voluntary admission process and to ensure that the proper procedures for involuntary placement are afforded both to those patients who are unwilling and to those who are unable to give consent.[138]

[D44] Allowing guardians and immediate family members to participate as parties in commitment proceedings does not violate due process, for it "increases the accuracy of those proceedings and implements the State's interest in providing family members a voice in the proceedings, without undermining those interests of the individual protected by the Due Process Clause." Even if parents, close family members, or legal guardians can be said, in certain instances, to have interests adverse to those of the person facing commitment, their participation as formal parties in the commitment proceedings does not increase the risk of an erroneous deprivation of this person's liberty interest. Rather, these parties often will have valuable information that, if placed before

---

134 Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 427, 430 (1979).

135 Jones v. United States., 463 U.S. 354, 366–68 (1983).

136 Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 79 (1992).

137 Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 333 (1993), quoting Smith v. Org. of Foster Families for Equal. & Reform, 431 U.S. 816, 855–56 (1977).

138 Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113, 127–37 (1990).

the court, will increase the accuracy of the commitment decision. And the fact that they may favor commitment is beside the point, because, "[a]t least to the extent protected by the Due Process Clause, the interest of a person subject to governmental action is in the accurate determination of the matters before the court, not in a result more favorable to him."[139]

[D45] "Due process requires that the nature of commitment bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which the individual is committed."[140] The purpose of commitment following an insanity acquittal, like that of civil commitment, is to treat the individual's mental illness and protect him and society from his potential dangerousness. "When a criminal defendant establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that he is not guilty of a crime by reason of insanity, the Constitution permits the Government, on the basis of the insanity judgment, to confine him to a mental institution until such time as he has regained his sanity or is no longer a danger to himself or society."[141] A verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity is sufficiently probative of mental illness and dangerousness to justify commitment of the acquittee for the purposes of treatment and the protection of society. Such a verdict establishes that the defendant committed an act constituting a criminal offense, and that he committed the act because of mental illness. It is not unreasonable for the legislator to determine that these findings constitute an adequate basis for hospitalizing the acquittee as a dangerous and mentally ill person. The fact that a person has been found, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have committed a criminal act certainly indicates dangerousness. Nor is it unreasonable to conclude that an insanity acquittal supports an inference of continuing mental illness. "It comports with common sense to conclude that someone whose mental illness was sufficient to lead him to commit a criminal act is likely to remain ill and in need of treatment. The precise evidentiary force of the insanity acquittal, of course, may vary from case to case, but the Due Process Clause does not require [the legislator] to make classifications that fit every individual with the same degree of relevance." A statutory provision of a hearing within 50 days of the commitment assures that every acquittee has prompt opportunity to obtain release if he has recovered. Moreover, an insanity acquittee is not entitled to his release merely because he has been hospitalized for a period longer than he could have been incarcerated if convicted. There simply is no necessary correlation between severity of the offense and length of time necessary for recovery.[142] In the same context, the Court has held that "a person charged by a State with a criminal offense, who is committed solely on account of his incapacity to proceed to trial, cannot be held more than the reasonable period of time necessary to determine whether there is a substantial probability that he will attain that capacity in the foreseeable future. If it is determined that this is not the case, then the State must either institute the customary civil commitment proceeding that would be required to commit indefinitely any other citizen, or release the defendant. Furthermore, even if it is determined that the defendant probably soon will be able to stand trial, his continued commitment must be justified by progress toward that goal."[143]

---

139 Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 331–33 (1993).

140 Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 79 (1992), citing Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 738 (1972), and Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 368 (1983).

141 Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 370 (1983).

142 Id. at 363–69.

143 Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 738 (1972).

[D46] A state must observe the Equal Protection Clause when it fixes the statutory conditions of involuntary commitment to, and release from, a mental institution. A state prisoner is denied equal protection if he is civilly committed at the expiration of his prison sentence on the finding of a surrogate, without a jury trial available to all others civilly committed in the state, and in case his commitment to an institution is maintained by the Department of Correction beyond the expiration of his prison term without the judicial determination that he is dangerously mentally ill, such as that afforded to all others so committed.[144] If criminal conviction and imposition of sentence are insufficient to justify less procedural and substantive protection against indefinite commitment than that generally available to all others, the mere filing of criminal charges surely cannot suffice. A system for pre-trial commitment of those accused of crime, which subjects criminal defendants to a more lenient commitment standard and to a more stringent standard of release than those generally applicable to all other persons not charged with offenses, runs counter the Equal Protection Clause.[145]

[D47] However, a state statute concerning involuntary commitment of dangerous mentally retarded or mentally ill individuals does not violate the Equal Protection Clause, if it establishes procedures for the commitment of these two groups that differ in the two following aspects: first, the applicable burden of proof in mental retardation commitment proceedings is clear and convincing evidence, while the standard in mental illness proceedings is beyond a reasonable doubt; second, guardians and immediate family members of the subject of a mental retardation proceeding may participate as if parties to those proceedings, with all attendant rights. "[M]ental retardation is easier to diagnose than is mental illness, . . . [for it] is a developmental disability that becomes apparent before adulthood. . . . By the time the person reaches 18 years of age the documentation and other evidence of the condition have been accumulated for years. Mental illness, on the other hand, may be sudden, and may not occur, or at least manifest itself, until adulthood. . . . Furthermore, . . . diagnosis of mental illness is difficult. . . . If diagnosis is more difficult in cases of mental illness than in instances of mental retardation, a higher burden of proof for the former tends to equalize the risks of an erroneous determination that the subject of a commitment proceeding has the condition in question. . . . From the diagnostic standpoint alone, [the state's] differential burdens of proof . . . are rational. There is, moreover, a 'reasonably conceivable state of facts,' . . . from which [the state can] conclude that the second prerequisite to commitment—that 'the person presents a danger or a threat of danger to self, family, or others,'—is established more easily, as a general rule, in the case of the mentally retarded. Previous instances of violent behavior are an important indicator of future violent tendencies. . . . Mental retardation is a permanent, relatively static condition, . . . so a determination of dangerousness may be made with some accuracy based on previous behavior. . . . This is not so with the mentally ill. Manifestations of mental illness may be sudden, and past behavior may not be an adequate predictor of future actions. Prediction of future behavior is complicated as well by the difficulties inherent in diagnosis of mental illness. . . . There is a further, more far-reaching rationale justifying the different burdens of proof: the [144] Baxstrom v. Herold, 383 U.S. 107, 110 (1966). In rejecting the state's argument that Baxtrom's conviction and sentence constituted adequate justification for the difference in procedures, the Court noted that there is no conceivable basis for distinguishing the commitment of a person who is nearing the end of a penal term from all other civil commitments. Id. at 111–12.

---

[145] Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 724, 729–30 (1972).

prevailing methods of treatment for the mentally retarded, as a general rule, are much less invasive than are those given the mentally ill."[146] There is also a rational basis for a state to allow immediate family members and guardians to participate as parties in proceedings to commit the mentally retarded but not the mentally ill. A state can rationally conclude that "close relatives and guardians, both of whom likely have intimate knowledge of a mentally retarded person's abilities and experiences, have valuable insights which should be considered during the involuntary commitment process. . . . Mental illness, by contrast, may arise or manifest itself with suddenness only after minority, . . . when the afflicted person's immediate family members have no knowledge of the medical condition and have long ceased to provide care and support. Further, determining the proper course of treatment may be far less dependent upon observations made in a household setting. . . . In addition, adults previously of sound mental health who are diagnosed as mentally ill may have a need for privacy that justifies the State in confining a commitment proceeding to the smallest group compatible with due process. Based on these facts, [the state] may have concluded that participation as parties by relatives and guardians of the mentally ill would not, in most cases, have been of sufficient help to the trier of fact to justify the additional burden and complications of granting party status."[147]

ii. Civil Commitment of Minors

[D48] A child has a liberty interest in not being confined unnecessarily for medical treatment, and, presumably, a protectible interest in not being erroneously labeled as mentally ill. Therefore, a minor is constitutionally entitled to appropriate procedural guarantees, when his parents or guardian seek state administered institutional mental health care for him. "In defining the respective rights and prerogatives of the child and parent in the voluntary commitment setting, [the Court's] precedents permit the parents to retain a substantial, if not the dominant, role in the decision, absent a finding of neglect or abuse, and . . . the traditional presumption that the parents act in the best interests of their child should apply. . . . [H]owever, . . . the child's rights and the nature of the commitment decision are such that parents cannot always have absolute and unreviewable discretion to decide whether to have a child institutionalized. They, of course, retain plenary authority to seek such care for their children, subject to a physician's independent examination and medical judgment. [Furthermore] [t]he State obviously has a significant interest in confining the use of its costly mental health facilities to cases of genuine need, . . . [and] in not imposing unnecessary procedural obstacles that may discourage the mentally ill or their families from seeking needed psychiatric assistance. The parens patriae interest in helping parents care for the mental health of their children cannot be fulfilled if the parents are unwilling to take advantage of the opportunities because the admission process is too onerous, too embarrassing, or too contentious. . . . The State also has a genuine interest in allocating priority to the diagnosis and treatment of patients as soon as they are admitted to a hospital, rather than to time-consuming procedural minuets before the admission. One factor that must be considered is the utilization of the time of psychiatrists, psychologists, and other behavioral specialists in preparing for and participating in hearings, rather than performing the task for which their special training has fitted them."[148] As to "what process protects adequately the child's constitutional rights by reducing risks of error without unduly trenching on traditional parental authority and without undercutting efforts to further the legitimate interests of both the state and the patient that are served by voluntary commitments," the Court concluded, in light of the above considerations, that "the risk of error inherent in the parental decision to have a child institutionalized for mental health care is sufficiently great that some kind of inquiry should be made by a 'neutral factfinder' to determine whether the statutory requirements for admission are satisfied. . . . That inquiry must carefully probe the child's background using all available sources, including, but not limited to, parents, schools, and other social agencies. Of course, the review must also include an interview with the child. . . . Finally, it is necessary that the child's continuing need for commitment be reviewed periodically by a similarly independent procedure."[149] The Court further explained that due process does not require that "the neutral and detached trier of fact be law trained or a judicial or administrative officer. . . . Thus, a staff physician will suffice, so long as he or she is free to evaluate independently the child's mental and emotional condition and need for treatment. . . . It is not necessary that the deciding physician conduct a formal or quasi-formal hearing. . . . [D]ue process is not violated by use of informal, traditional medical investigative techniques. . . . [A] formalized, factfinding hearing [would also pose the danger] for significant intrusion into the parent-child relationship. . . . A confrontation over such intimate family relationships would distress the normal adult parents, and the impact on a disturbed child almost certainly would be significantly greater. . . . In general, . . . an independent medical decisionmaking process, which includes the thorough psychiatric investigation described earlier, followed by additional periodic review of a child's condition, will protect children who should not be admitted; . . . the risks of error in that process would [not] be significantly reduced by a more formal, judicial-type hearing."[150] Finally, although the situation of civil commitment of a ward of the state differs from the one where a child's natural parents request his admission to a state mental hospital, the two situations do not justify requiring different procedures at the time of the child's initial admission to the hospital, considering the valid statutory presumption that the state acts in the child's best interest. Yet, it is possible that the procedures required in reviewing a ward's need for continuing care should be different from those used to review the need of a child with natural parents, for a ward of the state may be "lost in the shuffle."[151]

---

[146] Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 321–24 (1993). Classifications neither involving fundamental rights nor proceeding along suspect lines are subject to "rational basis" review.

[147] Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 328–29 (1993).

iii. Conditions of Confinement

[D49] Due process requires that the conditions and duration of confinement bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which persons are committed.[152] A mentally ill or retarded person, involuntarily committed to a state mental institution, has

---

148 Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584, 599–606 (1979).

149 Id. at 606–07. See also Sec'y of Public Welfare of Pennsylvania v. Institutionalized Juveniles, 442 U.S. 640 (1979).

150 Id. at 607–13.

151 Id. at 618–19.

152 Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250, 265 (2001). The statutory features of civil commitment may affect how a confinement scheme is evaluated to determine whether it is civil or punitive, but a confinement scheme's civil nature cannot be altered based merely on vagaries in the authorizing statute's implementation. Id. at 263.

constitutionally protected liberty interests, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, freedom from unreasonable bodily restraints, and "minimally adequate or reasonable training to ensure safety and freedom from undue restraint."[153] Yet, these interests are not absolute; indeed, to some extent, they are in conflict. In operating a mental institution, there are occasions in which it is necessary for the state to restrain the movement of residents—for example, to protect them, as well as others, from violence. Similar restraints may also be appropriate in a training program. Therefore, it is necessary to balance these liberty interests against the relevant state interests. The proper standard is whether professional judgment, in fact, was exercised. The relevant decision, "if made by a professional, is presumptively valid; . . . [s]uch a presumption is necessary to enable institutions of this type—often, unfortunately, overcrowded and understaffed—to continue to function. . . . [L]iability may be imposed only when the decision by the professional is such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment."[154]

c. Detention of Aliens Who Are Deportable or Whose Deportability or Admissibility Is Under Review

[D50] An alien who seeks admission to the United States may not do so under any claim of constitutional right. Admission of aliens to the United States is a privilege granted by the sovereign U.S. government. Such privilege is granted to an alien only upon such terms as the United States shall prescribe. "Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned."[155] "Once an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all persons within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent."[156] Therefore, the Fifth Amendment entitles aliens to due process in deportations proceedings.[157] However, an alien's temporary harborage in government facilities, pending determination of his admissibility, is not to be regarded as an "entry" into the United States and bestows no additional rights; in such cases, aliens are still treated, for constitutional purposes, as if stopped at the border.[158]

[D51] The question of the procedures due a returning resident alien arose in Kwong Hai Chew.[159] There, the regulations permitted the exclusion of an arriving alien without a hearing. The Court interpreted those regulations not to apply to Chew, a permanent resident alien who was returning from a five-month voyage abroad as a crewman on an American merchant ship, reasoning that for purposes of his constitutional right to due process, Chew's status was "assimilate[d] . . . to that of an alien continuously

---

153 Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 315–19 (1982).

154 Id. at 319–24.

155 See Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 542–44 (1950).

156 Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693 (2001).

157 Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 306 (1993).

158 See Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 215 (1953); United States v. Ju Toy, 198 U.S. 253, 263 (1905). Cf. Kaplan v. Tod, 267 U.S. 228, 230 (1925).

159 Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U.S. 590, 596, 600–03 (1953).

residing and physically present in the United States." Then, to avoid constitutional problems, the Court construed the regulation as inapplicable. Although the holding was one of regulatory interpretation, the rationale was one of constitutional law.[160] Any doubts that Chew recognized constitutional rights in the resident alien returning from a brief trip abroad were dispelled by Rosenberg v. Fleuti, where the Court described Chew as holding "that the returning resident alien is entitled as a matter of due process to a hearing on the charges underlying any attempt to exclude him."[161]

[D52] If the permanent resident alien's absence is extended, he may lose his entitlement to assimilation of his status to that of an alien continuously residing and physically present in the United States.[162] Mezei, an alien seemingly born in Gibraltar of Hungarian or Romanian parents, lived in the United States from 1923 to 1948. In May of that year, he sailed for Europe, apparently to visit his dying mother in Romania. Denied entry there, he remained in Hungary for some 19 months, due to "difficulty in securing an exit permit." Finally, armed with a quota immigration visa issued by the American Consul in Budapest, he proceeded to France and boarded a ship bound for New York. Upon arrival on February 9, 1950, he was temporarily excluded from the United States. Pending disposition of his case, he was received at Ellis Island. After reviewing the evidence, the Attorney General, on May 10, 1950, ordered the temporary exclusion to be made permanent, without a hearing before a board of special inquiry, on the "basis of information of a confidential nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest." That determination rested on a finding that respondent's entry would be prejudicial to the public interest for security reasons. Mezei shipped out twice to return whence he came; France and Great Britain refused him permission to land. Because other nations refused to accept him, his exclusion at Ellis Island was continued for 21 months. The Court denied relief. First, it pointed out that Mezei, apparently without authorization or re-entry papers, had simply left the United States and remained behind the Iron Curtain for 19 months. Moreover, neither his harborage on Ellis Island nor his prior residence in the United States transformed the administrative proceeding against him into something other than an exclusion proceeding; Mezei was an entrant alien or "assimilated to that status" for constitutional purposes. Subsequently, the Court rejected Mezei's argument that he was entitled to due process in assessing his right to admission on his return.[163]

[D53] As noted above, the Fifth Amendment entitles aliens to due process of law in deportation proceedings. At the same time, however, detention during such proceedings is a constitutionally valid aspect of the deportation process; detention, or temporary confinement, as part of the means necessary to give effect to the provisions for the expulsion of aliens—even juvenile aliens[164]—is not unconstitu-

---

160 See Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 33 (1982), discussing Kwong Hai Chew.

161 Rosenberg v. Fleuti, 374 U.S. 449, 460 (1963).

162 Landon v. Plasencia, 459 U.S. 21, 33 (1982).

163 Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 207–16 (1953). According to the dissenting opinion of three members of the Court, exclusion of an alien without judicial hearing, of course, does not deny due process when it can be accomplished merely by turning him back on land or returning him by sea, but when indefinite confinement becomes the means of enforcing exclusion, due process requires that the alien be informed of its grounds and have a fair chance to overcome them. Mezei's intolerable situation was remedied after four years imprisonment only through executive action as a matter of grace.

164 See Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292 (1993). There the Court held that alien juveniles (not tional.[165] A statute providing for detention of deportable criminal aliens, pending their removal proceedings, necessarily serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing and remaining at large in the Unites States, often engaging in further criminal activities. Such a provision is valid, even if the government does not show that individualized bond hearings would be ineffective, because, "when the Government deals with deportable aliens, the Due Process Clause does not require it to employ the least burdensome means to accomplish its goal."[166] Similarly, there is no denial of due process under the Fifth Amendment in the detention of alien residents, without bail, pending determination of deportability, where there is reasonable cause to believe that their release on bail would endanger the safety and welfare of the United States. Accordingly, evidence of membership in a political party advocating the use of force and violence for the accomplishment of its aims, plus personal activity in supporting and extending the party's philosophy concerning violence, gives adequate ground for such a detention, even if the government cannot show specific acts of sabotage or incitement to subversive action.[167]

[D54] The Court has also dealt with the issue of the duration of the detention of a removable alien. In Zadvydas, the Court considered a due process challenge to detention of aliens under a federal law, which governed detention following a final order of removal and provided, among other things, that when an alien, who had been ordered removed, was not in fact removed during the 90-day statutory "removal period," that alien might "be detained beyond the removal period" in the discretion of the Attorney General. A five-member majority of the Court read the provision, in light of the Constitution's demands, not to permit indefinite detention but to authorize continued detention of an alien following the 90-day removal period for only such time as was "reasonably necessary to secure the alien's removal."[168] A statute permitting indefinite detention would raise serious constitutional questions. Government detention in civil proceedings, like the ones at issue, violates the Due Process Clause unless a special justification outweighs the individual's liberty interest. Yet the government failed to proffer sufficiently strong justification for indefinite civil detention under this statute. Preventing flight, the first justification advanced by the government, was considered to be weak or non-existent where removal seemed a remote possibility, at best. The government's relevant allegation that whatever liberty interest the aliens possessed, it was "greatly diminished" by their lack of a legal right to live at large in the United States, was rejected outright, for the choice was not between imprisonment and the alien "living at large," but between imprisonment and supervision under release conditions that might not be violated. Preventive detention based on the second justification—protecting the community—has been upheld only when limited to specially dangerous individuals and subject to strong procedural protections; when preventive detention is potentially indefinite, this dangerousness rationale must also be accompanied by some other special circumstance, such as mental illness, that helps to create the danger. The accompanied by their parents or other related adults) who are held in INS custody pending their deportation hearings, do not have a constitutional right to be released into the custody of other "responsible adults."

---

165 Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 531 (2003).

166 Id. at 528.

167 Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524, 541 (1952). The Court noted that the problem of unusual delay in deportation hearings was not involved in that case.

168 Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 699 (2001).

civil confinement in question was potentially permanent, and once the flight risk justification evaporated, the only special circumstance was the alien's removable status, which bore no relation to dangerousness. Moreover, the sole procedural protections were found in administrative proceedings, where the alien had the burden of proving he was not dangerous, without significant later judicial review. The Court also examined the question of what period could be deemed reasonably necessary to bring about the alien's removal from the United States. "Reasonableness" should be measured primarily in terms of the statute's purpose of assuring the alien's presence at the moment of removal. Thus, if removal was not "reasonably foreseeable," the habeas corpus court should hold continued detention unreasonable and no longer authorized. If it was foreseeable, the court should consider the risk of the alien's committing further crimes as a factor potentially justifying continued confinement. Without abdicating their responsibility to review the detention's lawfulness, the courts could take appropriate account of such matters as the Executive Branch's greater immigration-related expertise, the Immigration and Naturalization Service's administrative needs and concerns, and the nation's need to speak with one voice on immigration. In order to limit the occasions when courts would need to make the difficult judgments called for by the recognition of this necessary executive leeway and for the sake of uniform administration in the federal courts, the Court felt that it was practically necessary to recognize a presumptively reasonable period of detention. Since there were reasons to believe that Congress doubted the constitutionality of more than six months' detention, the Court concluded that six months would be the appropriate period;[169] after the six-month period, once an alien provided "good reason to believe that there [wa]s no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future," the government should furnish evidence sufficient to rebut that showing.[170]

d. Detention of "Enemy Combatants"[171]

[D55] The capture and detention of lawful combatants and the capture, detention, and trial of unlawful combatants, by universal agreement and practice, are important incidents of war. The object of capture is to prevent the captured individual from serving the enemy; he is disarmed and from then on must be removed as completely as practicable from the front, treated humanely, and, in time, exchanged, repatriated, or otherwise released. And there is no bar to the "nation's holding one of its own citizens as an enemy combatant." Moreover, "it is a clearly established principle of the law of war that detention may last no longer than active hostilities."[172]

---

[169] The duration at stake in Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510 (2003), was much shorter, since the detention of removable criminal aliens lasted roughly a month and a half, in the vast majority of cases, and about five months in the minority of cases in which the alien chose to appeal.

[170] Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690–701 (2001). In Clark v. Martinez, 543 U.S. 371 (2005), the Court held that the interpretation of federal rules adopted in Zadvydas was applicable to inadmissible aliens as well, noting inter alia, that, even if the statutory purpose and constitutional concerns influencing the Zadvydas construction were not present for inadmissible aliens, that could not justify giving the same statutory text a different meaning depending on the characteristics of the aliens involved. Id. at 380.

[171] With respect to detention of enemy aliens abroad, see paras. B40–B41.

[172] Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 518–20 (2004). For purposes of this case, the government had made clear that the "enemy combatant" it sought to detain was an individual who,

[D56] Hamdi addressed the question of what process is constitutionally due to a citizen who disputes his enemy-combatant status. Striking the proper constitutional balance under the three-factor standard articulated in Mathews v. Eldridge, the Court concluded that a citizen-detainee seeking to challenge his classification as an enemy combatant must receive notice of the factual basis for his classification and a fair opportunity to rebut the government's factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker. In so holding, the plurality pointed out that "as critical as the Government's interest may be in detaining those who actually pose an immediate threat to the national security of the United States during ongoing international conflict, history and common sense teach that an unchecked system of detention carries the potential to become a means for oppression and abuse of others who do not present that sort of threat."[173]

e. Deprivation of Personal Liberty During Criminal Proceedings

i. In General

[D57] Individuals may face substantial liberty restrictions as a result of the operation of the criminal justice system. If the police suspect an individual of a crime, they may arrest and hold him until a neutral magistrate determines whether probable cause exists.[174] The government may detain dangerous defendants who are incompetent to allegedly, had been "part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners" in Afghanistan and who had "engaged in an armed conflict against the United States" there.

---

[173] Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 530 (2004) (plurality opinion). The plurality noted inter alia: "The parties agree that initial captures on the battlefield need not receive the process we have discussed here; that process is due only when the determination is made to continue to hold those who have been seized. . . . There remains the possibility that the standards we have articulated could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal. . . . [Hamdi] unquestionably has the right to access to counsel in connection with the proceedings on remand. . . . [E]nemy combatant proceedings may be tailored to alleviate their uncommon potential to burden the Executive at a time of ongoing military conflict. Hearsay, for example, may need to be accepted as the most reliable available evidence from the Government in such a proceeding. Likewise, the Constitution would not be offended by a presumption in favor of the Government's evidence, so long as that presumption remained a rebuttable one and fair opportunity for rebuttal were provided. Thus, once the Government puts forth credible evidence that the habeas petitioner meets the enemy-combatant criteria, the onus could shift to the petitioner to rebut that evidence with more persuasive evidence that he falls outside the criteria. A burden-shifting scheme of this sort would meet the goal of ensuring that the errant tourist, embedded journalist, or local aid worker has a chance to prove military error while giving due regard to the Executive once it has put forth meaningful support for its conclusion that the detainee is in fact an enemy combatant." Id. at 533–34.

Relatedly, Justice Souter (with whom Justice Ginsburg joined, concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in the judgment) said: "I do not adopt the plurality's resolution of constitutional issues that I would not reach. It is not that I could disagree with the plurality's determinations . . . that someone in Hamdi's position is entitled at a minimum to notice of the Government's claimed factual basis for holding him, and to a fair chance to rebut it before a neutral decision maker; nor, of course, could I disagree with the plurality's affirmation of Hamdi's right to counsel. On the other hand, I do not mean to imply agreement that the Government could claim an evidentiary presumption casting the burden of rebuttal on Hamdi, or that an opportunity to litigate before a military tribunal might obviate or truncate enquiry by a court on habeas." Id. at 553–54.

[174] Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 119 (1975).

stand trial.[175] Furthermore "[t]he duty to disclose knowledge of crime . . . is so vital that one known to be innocent may be detained, in the absence of bail, as a material witness."[176]

ii. Pre-Trial Detention of Criminally Accused Persons

[D58] Generally. An arrestee may be incarcerated until trial if he presents a risk of flight, for the government "has a substantial interest in ensuring that persons accused of crimes are available for trials and, ultimately, for service of their sentences."[177] Furthermore, a criminal defendant may be subject to pre-trial confinement if he "presents an identified and articulable threat to an individual or the community."[178] "[F]rom a legal point of view, there is nothing inherently unattainable about a prediction of future criminal conduct."[179] Such a prediction is an experienced one, which can be based on a host of variables, including the nature and seriousness of the charges; whether the charges are likely to be proved at trial; the arrestee's prior record; and, in case of a juvenile arrestee, the adequacy and effectiveness of his home supervision or his school situation.[180] Besides, the final disposition of a case is largely irrelevant to the legality of a pre-trial detention.[181]

[D59] Under the Bail Reform Act of 1984, 18 U.S.C. Section 3142(e), courts are required to detain, prior to trial, arrestees charged with certain serious felonies—crimes of violence, offenses for which the sentence is life imprisonment or death, serious drug offenses, or certain repeat offenders—if the government demonstrates by clear and convincing evidence, after an adversary hearing, that no release conditions will "reasonably assure . . . the safety of any other person and the community." The Act provides arrestees with a number of procedural rights at the detention hearing, including the right to request counsel, to testify, to present witnesses, to proffer evidence, and to cross-examine other witnesses. The Act also specifies the factors to be considered in making the detention decision, including the nature and seriousness of the charges, the substantiality of the government's evidence, the arrestee's background and characteristics, and the nature and seriousness of the danger posed by his release. Under the Act, a decision to detain must be supported by written findings of fact and a statement of reasons and is immediately reviewable. Such a regulatory scheme is not considered to be facially invalid under the Due Process Clause, given its legitimate and compelling purpose and the procedural protections it offers.[182] In so holding, the Court pointed out that "the

---

[175] See, e.g., Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 731–39 (1972). See, in extenso, paras. D45–D46.

[176] Hurtado v. United States, 410 U.S. 578, 588, n.9 (1973), quoting Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 184 (1953). The government "may compel witnesses to testify at trial or before a grand jury, on pain of contempt, so long as the witness in not the target of the criminal case in which he testifies." See Chavez v. Martinez, 538 U.S. 760, 767–68 (2003), citing Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 443 (1972).

[177] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 534 (1979).

[178] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 751 (1987).

[179] Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 278 (1984).

[180] Id. at 279.

[181] Id. at 273, citing Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137, 145 (1979)

[182] United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 752 (1987). Furthermore, according to the same opinion of the Court, the provisions at issue are not facially unconstitutional as violative of the Excessive Bail Clause of the Eighth Amendment, since "the Eighth Amendment does not require release on bail." Id. at 755.

pretrial detention contemplated by the Bail Reform Act is regulatory in nature, and does not constitute punishment before trial in violation of the Due Process Clause."[183]

[D60] Preventive Detention of Juveniles. The Constitution does not preclude preventive detention of juveniles. A state statute authorizing a brief pre-trial detention of an accused juvenile delinquent, based on a finding that there is a "serious risk" that the juvenile "may before the return date commit an act which if committed by an adult would constitute a crime," has been upheld as valid, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Preventive detention under the statute served "the legitimate state objective, held in common with every State in the country, of protecting both the juvenile and society from the hazards of pretrial crime. . . . [Moreover,] the terms and conditions of confinement [we]re compatible with" that objective.[184] Detained juveniles were entitled to an expedited factfinding hearing. The maximum possible detention of a youth accused of a serious crime, was 17 days and, for less serious crimes, six days; these time frames were "suited to the limited purpose of providing the youth with a controlled environment and separating him from improper influences pending the speedy disposition of his case." Besides, a detained juvenile could not, absent exceptional circumstances, be sent to a prison or lockup where he would be exposed to adult criminals but was screened by an "assessment unit" of the Department of Juvenile Justice. Finally, the procedural safeguards afforded by the statute in question provided sufficient protection against erroneous and unnecessary deprivations of liberty. Notice, a hearing, and a statement of facts and reasons were given to the juvenile prior to any detention, and a formal probable cause hearing was then held within a short time thereafter, if the factfinding hearing was not itself scheduled within three days. Moreover, the post-detention procedures—habeas corpus review, appeals, and motions for reconsideration—provided a sufficient mechanism for correcting, on a case-by-case basis, any erroneous detention.[185]

[D61] Confinement Conditions. Under the Due Process Clause, "a detainee may not be punished prior to an adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law."[186] A

---

[183] Id. at 748. The Court noted in this regard: "Congress did not formulate the pretrial detention provisions as punishment for dangerous individuals, [but] perceived pretrial detention as a potential solution to a pressing societal problem. . . . There is no doubt that preventing danger to the community is a legitimate regulatory goal. . . . Nor are the incidents of pretrial detention excessive in relation to the regulatory goal Congress sought to achieve. The Bail Reform Act carefully limits the circumstances under which detention may be sought to the most serious of crimes. . . . The arrestee is entitled to a prompt detention hearing, . . . and the maximum length of pretrial detention is limited by the stringent time limitations of the Speedy Trial Act. . . . Moreover, . . . the conditions of confinement envisioned by the Act 'appear to reflect the regulatory purposes relied upon by the' Government. . . . [T]he statute at issue here requires that detainees be housed in a 'facility separate, to the extent practicable, from persons awaiting or serving sentences or being held in custody pending appeal.'" Id. at 747–48. The Court intimated no view "as to the point at which detention in a particular case might become excessively prolonged, and therefore punitive, in relation to Congress' regulatory goal." Id. at 747, n.4.

[184] Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 274, 269 (1984).

[185] Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 270–281 (1984).

[186] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535 (1979). A sentenced inmate, on the other hand, may be punished, although that punishment may not be "cruel and unusual" under the Eighth Amendment. The Court recognized this distinction in Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 671, n.40 (1977) ("Eighth Amendment scrutiny is appropriate only after the State has complied with the constitutional guarantees traditionally associated with criminal prosecutions. . . . Where the person lawfully committed to pre-trial detention has not been adjudged guilty of any crime. Thus, in evaluating the constitutionality of conditions or restrictions of pre-trial detention, "the proper inquiry is whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee. . . . Not every disability imposed during pretrial detention amounts to 'punishment' in the constitutional sense, however. . . . Loss of freedom of choice and privacy are inherent incidents of pretrial confinement; . . . the fact that such detention interferes with the detainee's understandable desire to live as comfortably as possible and with as little restraint as possible during confinement does not convert the conditions or restrictions of detention into 'punishment.' . . . Absent a showing of an expressed intent to punish on the part of detention facility officials, that determination generally will turn on 'whether an alternative purpose to which the restriction may rationally be connected is assignable for it, and whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned to it.' . . . [Therefore,] if a particular condition or restriction of pretrial detention is reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective, it does not, without more, amount to punishment. Conversely, if a restriction or condition is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the governmental action is punishment that may not constitutionally be inflicted upon [pretrial] detainees. . . . [I]n addition to ensuring the detainees' presence at trial, the effective management of the detention facility once the individual is confined is a valid objective that may justify imposition of conditions and restrictions of pretrial detention and dispel any inference that such restrictions are intended as punishment."[187]

[D62] Certain inmates filed, in federal district court, a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the constitutionality of numerous conditions of confinement and practices in the Metropolitan Correctional Center (MCC), a federally operated short-term custodial facility in New York City, designed primarily to house pre-trial detainees. The MCC differed markedly from the familiar image of a jail, since it was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design of detention facilities; there were no barred cells, dank, colorless corridors, or clanging steel gates. The district court enjoined, inter alia, the practice of housing, primarily for sleeping purposes, two inmates in individual rooms, of approximately 75 square feet, originally intended for single occupancy ("double-bunking"). The court relied on two factors for its conclusion: (1) the fact that the rooms were designed to house only one inmate, and (2) that confining two persons in one room or cell of this size constituted a "fundamental denial of decency, privacy, personal security, and, simply, civilized humanity." The court of appeals agreed with the district court and noted that the lack of privacy inherent in double-celling in rooms intended for one individual was a far more compelling consideration than a comparison of square footage or the substitution of doors for bars, carpet for concrete, or windows for walls. The Supreme Court disagreed with both the district court and the court of appeals that there is "some sort of 'one man, one cell' principle lurking in the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment." The Court emphasized that, "[w]hile confining a given number of people in a given amount State seeks to impose punishment without such an adjudication, the pertinent constitutional guarantee is the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.").

---

[187] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535–40 (1979). In determining whether restrictions or conditions are reasonably related to the government's interest in maintaining security and order and operating the institution in a manageable fashion, courts should ordinarily defer to the expert judgment of corrections officials in such matters. See, e.g., Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 827 (1974).

of space in such a manner as to cause them to endure genuine privations and hardship over an extended period of time might raise serious questions under the Due Process Clause as to whether those conditions amounted to punishment, nothing even approaching such hardship" was shown by the record of the case. Detainees were required to spend only seven or eight hours each day in their rooms, during most or all of which they presumably were sleeping. The rooms provided more than adequate space for sleeping. During the remainder of the time, the detainees were free to move between their rooms and the common area. And nearly all of the detainees were released within 60 days. The Court concluded that requiring a detainee to share toilet facilities and this admittedly rather small sleeping place with another person for generally a maximum period of 60 days did not violate the Constitution.[188]

[D63] Similarly, the conditions of preventive detention of accused juvenile delinquents must be compatible with the relevant legitimate state objective of protecting both the juvenile and society from the hazards of pre-trial crime. In Schall v. Martin, the Court upheld a state law authorizing pre-trial detention of juveniles. It noted, among other things, that a detained juvenile could not, absent exceptional circumstances, be sent to a prison or lockup where he would be exposed to adult criminals. Instead, the child was screened by an "assessment unit" of the Department of Juvenile Justice, which placed the child in either non-secure or secure detention. Non-secure detention involved an open facility in the community, a sort of "halfway house," without locks, bars, or security officers where the child received schooling and counseling and had access to recreational facilities. In secure detention, children were assigned to separate dorms based on age, size, and behavior; they were wearing street clothes provided by the institution and were partaking in educational and recreational programs and counseling sessions run by trained social workers; misbehavior was punished by confinement to one's room. The Court concluded that, although secure detention was more restrictive, it was not imposed for the purpose of punishment and was "still consistent with the regulatory and parens patriae objectives relied upon by the State."[189]

6. The Right to Keep and Bear Arms

[D64] The Second Amendment provides that "[a] well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed." The Second Amendment must be interpreted and applied with the view of maintaining a militia. In United States v. Miller, the Court upheld a federal law making criminal the shipment in inter-state commerce of a sawed-off shotgun, for there was no evidence that a sawed-off shotgun had "some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia;" such a weapon was not shown to be "ordinary military equipment" that could "contribute to the common defense."[190] The Court did not, however, attempt to define, or otherwise construe, the right protected by the Second Amendment.

---

[188] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 542–43 (1979). In the same case, the Court also found constitutional the enforcement of the so-called "publisher only" rule, prohibiting inmates from receiving hard-cover books that were not mailed directly from publishers, book clubs, or bookstores; the prohibition against inmates' receipt of packages of food and personal items from outside the institution; the practice of body cavity searches of inmates following contact visits with persons from outside the institution; and the requirement that pre-trial detainees remain outside their rooms during routine inspections by MCC officials.

[189] Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 271 (1984).

[190] United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174, 178 (1939).

CHAPTER 5

SUBSTANTIVE GUARANTEES AGAINST CRIMINAL OR CIVIL PENALTIES

A. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN CRIMINAL PUNISHMENTS AND CIVIL SANCTIONS OR RESTRAINTS

1. In General

[E1] The distinction between a criminal punishment and a civil penalty, remedy, or regulatory restraint is of constitutional import. The Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment, is expressly limited to "any criminal case." Similarly, the protections provided by the Sixth Amendment are available only in "criminal prosecutions;" proof beyond a reasonable doubt is required only in criminal cases.[1] Other constitutional guarantees, while not explicitly limited to one context or the other, have been so limited by decision of the Court. The Double Jeopardy Clause protects only against multiple criminal punishments for the same offense.[2] Since 1798 the Court has considered the Ex Post Facto Clause[3] to apply only in the criminal context.[4] Similarly, the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments applies only to criminal penalties.[5] On the contrary, the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment is not expressly limited to criminal cases, and its history does not require such a limitation.[6]

[E2] The question whether a statutory scheme "is civil or punitive in nature is initially one of statutory construction. . . . A court must first ascertain whether the legislature intended the statute to establish civil proceedings."[7] The court considers the "statute's text and structure to determine the legislative objective."[8] The court must first ask "whether the legislature indicated either expressly or impliedly a preference for one

---

1 United States v. Regan, 232 U.S. 37, 47–48 (1914). See also One Lot Emerald Cut Stones and One Ring v. United States, 409 U.S. 232, 235 (1972) (per curiam) (the difference in the burden of proof in criminal and civil cases precludes application of the doctrine of collateral estoppel).

2 See, e.g., Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 399 (1938); Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 99 (1997). As noted in Helvering v. Mitchell, supra, at 399, "Congress may impose both a criminal and a civil sanction with respect to the same act or omission; for the double jeopardy clause prohibits merely punishing twice, or attempting a second time to punish criminally, for the same offense."

3 U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3; art. I, § 10, cl. 1.

4 Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390–92 (1798). See also, e.g., Collins v. Youngblood, 497 U.S. 37, 41, n.2 (1990).

5 See, in particular, Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 664–68 (1977).

6 Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 608–09 (1993).

7 Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250, 261 (2001).

8 Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 92 (2003).

label or the other."[9] "If the intention of the legislature was to impose punishment, that ends the inquiry."[10] If, however, the intention was to enact a regulatory scheme that is civil, the court must further examine whether the statutory scheme is "so punitive in form,"[11] "purpose or effect as to negate [the State's] intention to deem it civil."[12] Because "the courts "ordinarily defer to the legislature's stated intent,"[13] "only the clearest proof will suffice to override that intent and transform what has been denominated a civil remedy into a criminal penalty."[14]

[E3] In examining the legislature's intent, the fact that the statute under review contains two separate and distinct provisions imposing sanctions, and that these appear in different parts of the statutory scheme, is relevant in determining the character of the provisions and may support the conclusion that one sanction is criminal and the other is civil.[15] The same is true when a provision for sanctions is meant to be broader in scope than a statute providing for criminal punishment.[16] The fact that the sanction in question is not contained in the criminal code may also be taken into account.[17] Nevertheless "[t]he location and labels of a statutory provision do not by themselves transform a civil remedy into a criminal one."[18] Also telling is the fact that the statute does not require the procedures adopted to contain any safeguards associated with the criminal process. "By contemplating 'distinctly civil procedures,' the legislature indicate[s] clearly that it intended a civil, not a criminal, sanction."[19] And if "the State has indicated quite clearly its intent that certain proceedings be civil in nature[,] its decision to provide some of

---

9 Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 99 (1997).

10 Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 92 (2003).

11 See United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267, 290 (1996); Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 104 (1997).

12 Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361 (1997), quoting United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242, 248–49 (1980).

13 Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361 (1997).

14 Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 100 (1997).

15 See Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 404 (1938); One Lot Emerald Cut Stones and One Ring v. United States, 409 U.S. 232, 236–37 (1972); United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242, 250 (1980).

16 United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 364–65 (1984). "[A] State can address a major social problem both by way of an administrative scheme and through penal sanctions. Administrative statutes and penal laws may have the same ultimate purpose of remedying the social problem, but they have different subsidiary purposes, and prescribe different methods of addressing the problem. An administrative statute establishes how a particular business in a 'closely regulated' industry should be operated, setting forth rules to guide an operator's conduct of the business and allowing government officials to ensure that those rules are followed. Such a regulatory approach contrasts with that of the penal laws, a major emphasis of which is the punishment of individuals for specific acts of behavior." See New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 712–13 (1987).

17 See Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361 (1997).

18 See Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 94 (2003), where the provisions at issue—found civil—were codified in Alaska's Code of Criminal Procedure. See also United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984), where the Court held a forfeiture provision to be a civil sanction, even though the authorizing statute was in the criminal code.

19 Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 96 (2003), quoting Unites States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267, 289 (1996). See also Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 402 (1938); United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 363 (1984).

the safeguards applicable in criminal trials cannot itself turn these proceedings into criminal prosecutions requiring the full panoply of rights applicable there."[20]

[E4] In making the second determination, the following factors, listed in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, provide useful guideposts: "[w]hether the sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint; whether it has historically been regarded as a punishment; whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter; whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment—retribution and deterrence; whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime; whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it; and whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned."[21] These factors must be considered in relation to the statute on its face[22] and not "as applied" to a particular case.[23] Furthermore, this list of considerations is neither exhaustive nor dispositive.[24] The purpose of deterrence may serve civil as well as criminal goals.[25] Moreover, the fact that the conduct for which statutory sanctions are imposed may also be criminal is insufficient to render the sanctions criminally punitive,[26] particularly in the double jeopardy context.[27]

2. Forfeitures[28] and Fines

[E5] On various occasions, the Court has admitted that forfeiture of property or its value and the payment of fixed or variable sums of money are enforcible by civil proceedings.

[E6] There is no constitutional objection to the forfeiture of property used in defrauding the United States of the exaction provided by a statute that imposes a "tax," greater than and including the basic tax, on all distilled "spirits diverted to beverage purposes." In such a case, "[i]t is the property which is proceeded against, and, by resort to a legal fiction, held guilty and condemned as though it were conscious instead of inanimate and insentient. In a criminal prosecution, it is the wrongdoer in person who is proceeded against, convicted, and punished." This forfeiture is not part of the punishment for the criminal offense and thus civil in nature.[29]

[E7] A forfeiture of imported merchandise not included in a declaration and entry pursuant to a tariff provision is not barred by a prior acquittal under a statute that—unlike the forfeiture proceeding—requires proof of an intent to defraud; nor is the forfeiture action barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause, since Congress may impose both a criminal and civil sanction respecting the same act or omission. Such a forfeiture is [20] Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364, 372 (1986). See also Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 364 (1997).

---

[21] Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 168–69 (1963).

[22] Id. at 169.

[23] See Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 100 (1997), disavowing United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 447 (1989). See also Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250, 267 (2001).

[24] United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242, 249 (1980).

[25] Unites States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267, 292 (1996); Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 105 (1997).

[26] Unites States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267, 292 (1996).

[27] Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 105 (1997).

[28] See also paras. E143–E144.

[29] Various Items of Pers. Prop. v. United States, 282 U.S. 577, 581 (1931).

intended to aid in the enforcement of tariff regulations. "It prevents forbidden merchandise from circulating in the United States, and, by its monetary penalty, it provides a reasonable form of liquidated damages for violation of the inspection provisions and serves to reimburse the Government for investigation and enforcement expenses." As long as the measure of recovery fixed by the legislature is not unreasonable or excessive, these proceedings establish civil remedies and not criminal penalties.[30]

[E8] 89 Firearms involved a statute requiring forfeiture of unlicensed firearms. The owner of the defendant weapons was acquitted of charges of dealing firearms without a license. The government then brought a forfeiture action against the firearms under 18 U.S.C. Section 924(d), alleging that they were used or were intended to be used in violation of federal law. The Court announced that "unless the forfeiture sanction was intended as punishment, so that the proceeding is essentially criminal in character, the Double Jeopardy Clause is not applicable." In the first stage, the Court looked to Congress' intent, and concluded that Congress had designed forfeiture under Section 924(d) as a remedial civil sanction. This conclusion was based upon several findings. First, noting that the forfeiture proceeding was in rem, the Court found it significant that "actions in rem have traditionally been viewed as civil proceedings, with jurisdiction dependent upon the seizure of a physical object." Second, it found that the forfeiture provision, because it reached both weapons used in violation of federal law and those "intended to be used" in such a manner, reached a broader range of conduct than its criminal analogue. Third, the Court concluded that the civil forfeiture furthered broad remedial aims, including both "discouraging unregulated commerce in firearms" and "removing from circulation firearms that have been used or intended for use outside regulated channels of commerce." In the second stage of the inquiry, the Court observed that only one of the Mendoza-Martinez factors—whether or not the proscribed behavior is already a crime—supported the position that Section 924(d) imposed a criminal penalty; however, this element was too weak to lend support to the foregoing proposition, since Congress could impose both a criminal and a civil sanction with respect to the same conduct and had drafted Section 924(d) to cover a broader range of conduct than was proscribed by the relevant criminal provisions. The Court concluded that the civil forfeiture at issue was not an additional penalty for the commission of a criminal act but rather "a separate civil sanction, remedial in nature."[31]

[E9] Similarly, in Ursery, the Court dealt with civil forfeiture proceedings against various property that, allegedly, had been used to facilitate illegal drug transactions (21 U.S.C. Section 881(a)(7)), was the proceeds of a felonious drug transaction (21 U.S.C. Section 881(a)(6)), or had been involved in unlawful money laundering (18 U.S.C. Section 981(a)(1)(A)). Congress intended proceedings under Sections 881 and 981 to be civil, since those statutes' procedural enforcement mechanisms were themselves distinctly civil in nature. Regarding the second aspect of the analysis, the Court first noted that "requiring the forfeiture of property used to commit federal narcotics violations encourages property owners to take care in managing their property and ensures that they will not permit that property to be used for illegal purposes" and that, "[i]n many circumstances, the forfeiture may abate a nuisance." Besides, to the extent that Section 881(a)(6) applied to "proceeds" of illegal drug activity, it served the additional non-punitive goal of ensuring that persons did not profit from their illegal acts. Furthermore, the Court pointed out that (1) "in rem civil forfeiture has not historically been regarded as punishment;" (2) there was no requirement in the statutes under review that the government demonstrate scienter in order to establish that the property was subject to forfeiture, since the property might be subject to forfeiture even if no party filed a claim to it, and the government never showed any connection between the property and a particular person; (3) the fact that the statutes served a deterrent purpose or were tied to a criminal activity was insufficient in itself to render them punitive.[32] Consequently the Court held that the forfeitures in question were neither "punishment" nor criminal for purposes of the Double Jeopardy Clause.

---

[30] One Lot Emerald Cut Stones and One Ring v. United States, 409 U.S. 232, 237 (1972) (per curiam).

[31] United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 366 (1984).

[E10] The Court has "emphasized the line between civil, remedial actions brought primarily to protect the government from financial loss and actions intended to authorize criminal punishment to vindicate public justice."[33] In general, sanctions imposing additions to a tax, in case of a deficiency due to fraud with intent to evade tax, have a remedial character, for they "are provided primarily as a safeguard for the protection of the revenue and to reimburse the Government for the heavy expense of investigation and the loss resulting from the taxpayer's fraud."[34] The same is true for monetary penalties imposed on persons who cause to be presented for payment any claim upon or against the government, knowing such claim to be fraudulent; this remedy does not lose the quality of a civil action because more than the precise amount of so-called actual damage is recovered, because Congress might have provided "for recovery of 'threefold the damages . . . sustained and the cost of suit.'"[35] Similarly a provision for liquidated damages is distinct from criminal penalty.[36] Yet, the measure of recovery fixed by the legislature may be "so unreasonable or excessive that it transform[s] what was clearly intended as a civil remedy into a criminal penalty."[37]

[E11] The civil penalty involved in Halper provided for a fixed monetary penalty for each false claim count on which the defendant was convicted in the criminal proceed-

---

[32] Unites States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267, 290–92 (1996). The Court added that the case-by-case balancing test set forth in Halper, in which a court should compare the harm suffered by the government against the size of the penalty imposed, was inapplicable to civil forfeiture, noting that "[t]hough it may be possible to quantify the value of the property forfeited, it is virtually impossible to quantify, even approximately, the nonpunitive purposes served by a particular civil forfeiture. Hence, it is practically difficult to determine whether a particular forfeiture bears no rational relationship to the nonpunitive purposes of that forfeiture." Id. at 284.

[33] United States ex rel. Marcus v. Hess, 317 U.S. 537, 548–49 (1943).

[34] Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 401 (1938), involving a 50-percent addition to tax. The Court also took into account that Congress had provided a distinctly civil procedure for the collection of the additional 50 percentum. Id. at 402.

[35] United States ex rel. Marcus v. Hess, 317 U.S. 537, 550 (1943). "By the common as well as by statute law, persons are often punished for aggravated misconduct or lawless acts by means of a civil action and the damages, inflicted by way of penalty or punishment, given to the party injured." Id. at 550. The Court was unable to say that the provision for $2,000 plus double damages would "do more than afford the government complete indemnity for the injuries done it." Id. at 549. In concluding, the Court recognized that the inherent difficulty of choosing a proper specific sum, which would give full restitution, was a problem for Congress. Id. at 552.

[36] Rex Trailer Co., Inc. v. United States, 350 U.S. 148 (1956).

[37] Id. at 154. Cf. One Lot Emerald Cut Stones and One Ring v. United States, 409 U.S. 232, 237 (1972).

ing. The Court stressed that a civil penalty authorized by the federal civil False Claims Act might "be so extreme and so divorced from the Government's damages and expenses as to constitute punishment." Given Halper's 65 separate violations of the Act, he appeared to be liable for a penalty of $130,000, despite the fact he had actually defrauded the government of less than $600. The Court found that the disparity between the approximation of the government's expenses ($16,000) and Halper's statutory liability was sufficiently disproportionate that the sanction provided by the Act, as applied to Halper, constituted a second punishment violative of double jeopardy.[38] However, eight years later, in Hudson, the Court expressly disavowed the Halper rationale in two key respects. First, the Halper Court focused on whether the sanction was so grossly disproportionate to the harm caused as to constitute "punishment," and thereby elevated to dispositive status one of the factors listed in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, for determining whether a statute intended to be civil was so punitive as to transform it into a criminal penalty, even though Mendoza-Martinez itself emphasized that no one factor should be considered controlling. Second, Halper assessed the character of the actual sanctions imposed, rather than evaluating the "statute on its face" to determine whether it provided for what amounted to a criminal sanction.[39] Subsequently, the Hudson Court, applying the traditional method of analysis, characterized as civil the monetary penalties and the sanction of occupational debarment that the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency had imposed on petitioners for violating 12 U.S.C. Sections 84(a)(1) and 375b, by causing two banks, in which they were officials, to make certain loans in a manner that unlawfully allowed Hudson to receive the loans' benefit. Similarly, the Court has held that a statute providing for the imposition of a "civil penalty" against any owner or operator of an onshore facility from which oil was discharged, in violation of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, is civil, not criminal.[40]

[E12] "A 'tax' is an enforced contribution to provide for the support of government; a 'penalty' . . . is an exaction imposed by statute as punishment for an unlawful act. The two words are not interchangeable one for the other. . . . [I]f an exaction be clearly a penalty, it cannot be converted into a tax by the simple expedient of calling it such."[41] More particularly, such an exaction may be a criminal punishment.[42] That was considered to be the case in Kurth Ranch. Montana law enforcement officers raided the farm of the Kurth family, arrested them, and confiscated and later destroyed their marijuana plants. After the Kurths pleaded guilty to drug charges, the Revenue Department attempted, in a separate proceeding, to collect a state tax imposed on the possession and storage of dangerous drugs. That tax was collected only after any state or federal fines or forfeitures had been satisfied, and taxpayers should file a return after they were

---

38 United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 442, 452 (1989).

39 Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 101–02 (1997).

40 United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242, 248–51 (1980).

41 United States v. La Franca, 282 U.S. 568, 572 (1931) (the "tax" on retail liquor imposed the National Prohibition Act, providing for the assessment and collection of a "tax" in double the amount provided by law upon evidence of an illegal sale under the Act, was not a true tax, but a penalty). See also Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co., 259 U.S. 20, 38 (1922), known as "Child Labor Tax Case" (penalty, characterized under the statute as a "tax," for unlawful employment of children); United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287, 294 (1935) (provision that imposed in addition to the $25 excise tax laid on retail liquor dealers, a "special excise tax" of $1,000 on such dealers when they carried on the business contrary to local state or municipal law).

42 United States v. La Franca, 282 U.S. 568, 572 (1931).

arrested. In bankruptcy proceedings filed by the Kurths, they objected to petitioner's proof of claim for the tax and challenged the tax's constitutionality. The lower courts held that the assessment on harvested marijuana, a portion of which resulted in a tax eight times the product's market value, was a form of double jeopardy, invalid under the federal Constitution. The Court affirmed. It began by noting that neither a high rate of taxation—more than eight times the drug's market value—nor an obvious deterrent purpose automatically marked the tax under review a form of punishment, since many taxes presumed valid, such as taxes on cigarettes and alcohol, were also both high and motivated to some extent by an interest in deterrence; the Court added that although those factors were not dispositive, they were at least consistent with a punitive character. Other unusual features, however, were thought to set the statute at issue apart from most taxes: this so-called tax was conditioned on the commission of a crime; that condition was significant of penal and prohibitory intent, rather than the gathering of revenue; the tax assessment not only hinged on the commission of a crime, it also was exacted only after the taxpayer had been arrested for the precise conduct that gave rise to the tax obligation in the first place; since the taxed activity was completely forbidden, the legitimate revenue-raising purpose that might support the tax could be equally well served by increasing the fine imposed upon conviction; and although the exaction purported to be a species of property tax, yet it was levied on goods—in that case the destroyed marijuana plants—that the taxpayer neither owned nor possessed. Considering these factors, the Court drew the conclusion that Montana's "tax" was not a remedial sanction, but could fairly be characterized as a criminal punishment.[43]

3. Contempt Sanctions

[E13] The Court follows a somewhat different approach when it comes to contempt sanctions. Underlying the distinction between civil and criminal contempt sanctions is what procedural protections are due before any particular contempt penalty may be imposed. "Because civil contempt sanctions are viewed as nonpunitive and avoidable, fewer procedural protections for such sanctions have been required."[44] Petty, direct contempts—i.e., those occurring in the presence of the court—"traditionally have been subject to summary adjudication, 'to maintain order in the courtroom and the integrity of the trial process in the face of an actual obstruction of justice.' . . . In light of the court's substantial interest in rapidly coercing compliance and restoring order, and because the contempt's occurrence before the court reduces the need for extensive fact finding and the likelihood of an erroneous deprivation, summary proceedings have been tolerated."[45] "Summary adjudication becomes less justifiable once a court leaves the realm of immediately sanctioned, petty direct contempts. If a court delays punishing a direct contempt until the completion of trial, for example, due process requires that the contemnor's rights to notice and a hearing be respected."[46] "Direct contempts also cannot be punished with 'serious' criminal penalties, absent the full protections of a criminal jury trial."[47]

---

43 Dep't of Revenue of Montana v. Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S. 767, 780–83 (1994).

44 Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 831 (1994).

45 Id. at 832.

46 Id. citing Taylor v. Hayes, 418 U.S. 488 (1974).

47 Id. at 833, citing Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 210 (1968).

[E14] The question of the distinction between civil and criminal contempt sanctions arises mainly when it comes to indirect contempts, those occurring out of court.[48] Although the procedural contours of the two forms of contempt are well established,[49] the distinguishing characteristics of civil versus criminal contempts are less clear. In Gompers, the leading early case addressing this issue in the context of imprisonment, the Court emphasized that whether a contempt is civil or criminal turns on the "character and purpose" of the sanction involved. Thus, a contempt sanction is considered civil if it "is remedial, and for the benefit of the complainant. But if it is for criminal contempt the sentence is punitive, to vindicate the authority of the court."[50] Later on, the Court held that conclusions about the civil or criminal nature of a contempt sanction are properly drawn, "from an examination of the character of the relief itself."[51]

[E15] "The paradigmatic coercive, civil contempt sanction, as set forth in Gompers, involves confining a contemnor indefinitely until he complies with an affirmative command such as an order 'to pay alimony, or to surrender property ordered to be turned over to a receiver, or to make a conveyance.'"[52] "Imprisonment for a fixed term similarly is coercive when the contemnor is given the option of earlier release if he complies."[53] "In these circumstances, the contemnor is able to purge the contempt and obtain his release by committing an affirmative act, and thus 'carries the keys of his prison in his own pocket.'"[54]

---

[48] "Certain indirect contempts, are appropriate for imposition through civil proceedings. Contempts such as failure to comply with document discovery, for example, while occurring outside the court's presence, impede the court's ability to adjudicate the proceedings before it and thus touch upon the core justification for the contempt power. Courts traditionally have broad authority through means other than contempt—such as by striking pleadings, assessing costs, excluding evidence, and entering default judgment—to penalize a party's failure to comply with the rules of conduct governing the litigation process. . . . Such judicial sanctions never have been considered criminal, and the imposition of civil, coercive fines to police the litigation process appears consistent with this authority. Similarly, indirect contempts involving discrete, readily ascertainable acts, such as turning over a key or payment of a judgment, properly may be adjudicated through civil proceedings, since the need for extensive, impartial fact finding is less pressing." See Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 833 (1994) (emphasis added).

[49] Criminal contempt sanctions are entitled to full criminal process. See, e.g., Hicks v. Feiock, 485 U.S. 624, 632 (1988). For "serious" criminal contempts involving imprisonment of more than six months, the constitutional protections include the right to jury trial. See Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 199 (1968). In contrast, "civil contempt sanctions, or those penalties designed to compel future compliance with a court order, are considered to be coercive and avoidable through obedience, and thus may be imposed in an ordinary civil proceeding upon notice and an opportunity to be heard. Neither a jury trial nor proof beyond a reasonable doubt is required." See Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 827 (1994).

[50] Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 441 (1911).

[51] Hicks v. Feiock, 485 U.S. 624, 636 (1988).

[52] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 828 (1994), quoting Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 442 (1911). See also McCrone v. United States, 307 U.S. 61, 64 (1939) (failure to testify).

[53] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 828 (1994), citing Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364, 370, n.6 (1966).

[54] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 828 (1994), quoting Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 442 (1911).

[E16] By contrast, "a fixed sentence of imprisonment is punitive and criminal if it is imposed retrospectively for a 'completed act of disobedience,' such that the contemnor cannot avoid or abbreviate the confinement through later compliance."[55] Thus, the Court has decided that a 12-month sentence imposed on an individual for violating an anti-boycott injunction is criminal.[56]

[E17] "This dichotomy between coercive and punitive imprisonment has been extended to the fine context. A contempt fine, accordingly, is considered civil and remedial if it either 'coerces the defendant into compliance with the court's order [or] . . . compensate[s] the complainant for losses sustained.'"[57] "Where a fine is not compensatory, it is civil only if the contemnor is afforded an opportunity to purge. . . . Thus, a 'flat, unconditional fine' totaling even as little as $50 announced after a finding of contempt is criminal if the contemnor has no subsequent opportunity to reduce or avoid the fine through compliance."[58]

[E18] A close analogy to coercive imprisonment is a per diem fine imposed for each day a contemnor fails to comply with an affirmative court order. Like civil imprisonment, such fines exert a constant coercive pressure, and once the jural command is obeyed, the future, indefinite, daily fines are purged. Less comfortable is the analogy between coercive imprisonment and suspended, determinate fines."[59] In United Mine Workers, the Court "held that fixed fines also may be considered purgable and civil when imposed and suspended pending future compliance;"[60] yet, in Hicks, the Court admitted that suspended or probationary sentences are criminal.[61]

---

[55] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 828–29 (1994), quoting Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 443 (1911).

[56] Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 442–43 (1911).

[57] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 829 (1994), quoting United States v. United Mine Workers of Am., 330 U.S. 258, 303–04 (1947).

[58] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 829 (1994), citing Penfield Co. of California v. Sec. & Exch. Comm'n, 330 U.S. 585, 588, 590 (1947).

[59] Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 829 (1994).

[60] Id. at 829–30, discussing United States v. United Mine Workers of Am., 330 U.S. 258 (1947) as follows: "[The case] involved a $3,500,000 fine imposed against the Union for nationwide post-World War II strike activities. Finding that the determinate fine was both criminal and excessive, the Court reduced the sanction to a flat criminal fine of $700,000. The Court then imposed and suspended the remaining $2,800,000 as a coercive civil fine, conditioned on the union's ability to purge the fine through full, timely compliance with the trial court's order. The Court concluded, in light of this purge clause, that the civil fine operated as a 'coercive imposition upon the defendant union to compel obedience with the court's outstanding order.'"

[61] Hicks v. Feiock, 485 U.S. 624, 639 (1988). The Court adopted the following reasoning. "That a determinate sentence is suspended and the contemnor put on probation does not make the remedy civil in nature, for a suspended sentence, without more, remains a determinate sentence, and a fixed term of probation is itself a punishment that is criminal in nature. A suspended sentence with a term of probation is not equivalent to a conditional sentence that would allow the contemnor to avoid or purge these sanctions. A determinate term of probation puts the contemnor under numerous disabilities that he cannot escape by complying with the dictates of the prior orders, such as: any conditions of probation that the court judges to be reasonable and necessary may be imposed; the term of probation may be revoked and the original sentence (including incarceration) may be reimposed at any time for a variety of reasons without all the safeguards that are ordinarily afforded in criminal proceedings; and the contemnor's probationary status could affect other proceedings against him that may arise in the future (for example, this fact might influence the sentencing determination made in a criminal prosecution for some wholly independent offense)." Id. at 639, n.11.

[E19] In its most recent decision in the field, the Court relied primarily on due process considerations. The Court stressed that for certain indirect contempts civil procedural protections may be insufficient. Especially, "[c]ontempts involving out-of-court disobedience to complex injunctions often require elaborate and reliable factfinding. . . . Such contempts do not obstruct the court's ability to adjudicate the proceedings before it, and the risk of erroneous deprivation from the lack of a neutral fact finder may be substantial. . . . Under these circumstances, criminal procedural protections such as the rights to counsel and proof beyond a reasonable doubt are both necessary and appropriate to protect the due process rights of parties and prevent the arbitrary exercise of judicial power."[62]

[E20] In the particular case, the Court was confronted with contempt fines that were difficult to distinguish either from determinate, punitive fines or from initially suspended, civil fines. A month after enjoining the International Union of Mine Workers of America from conducting unlawful strike-related activities against certain mining companies, a Virginia trial court held a contempt hearing, fined the union for its disobedience, and announced that the union would be fined for any future breach of the injunction. In subsequent contempt hearings, the court levied against the union over $64 million in what it termed coercive, civil fines, ordering most of the money to be paid to the Commonwealth of Virginia and the two counties affected by the unlawful activities. The Court was "not persuaded that dispositive significance should be accorded to the fact that the trial court had prospectively announced the sanctions it would impose."[63] Due process traditionally requires that criminal laws provide prior notice both of the conduct to be prohibited and of the sanction to be imposed. The trial court there simply announced the penalty that would be imposed for future contempts. "The union's ability to avoid the contempt fines was indistinguishable from the ability of any ordinary citizen to avoid a criminal sanction by conforming his behavior to the law. The fines [we]re not coercive day fines, or even suspended fines, but [we]re more closely analogous to fixed, determinate, retrospective criminal fines which petitioners had no opportunity to purge once imposed." Instead, the Court found significant other elements of the case. The Virginia trial court "levied contempt fines for widespread, ongoing, out-of-court violations of a complex injunction. In so doing, the court effectively policed petitioners' compliance with an entire code of conduct that the court itself had imposed. The union's contumacy lasted many months and spanned a substantial portion of the State. The fines assessed were serious, totaling over $52,000,000. Under such circumstances, disinterested factfinding and evenhanded adjudication were essential."

---

62 Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 833–34 (1994).

63 Id. at 836. The Court also rejected the union's argument that the sanctions were criminal, because the injunction primarily prohibited certain conduct rather than mandated affirmative acts. The Court noted that "the distinction between coercion of affirmative acts and punishment of prohibited conduct is difficult to apply when conduct that can recur is involved, or when an injunction contains both mandatory and prohibitory provisions. Moreover, in borderline cases, injunctive provisions containing essentially the same command can be phrased either in mandatory or prohibitory terms. Under a literal application of petitioners' theory, an injunction ordering the union: "Do not strike," would appear to be prohibitory and criminal, while an injunction ordering the union: "Continue working," would be mandatory and civil. Id. at 835.

Thus, the contempt fines under review were criminal and constitutionally could be imposed only through a jury trial.[64]

4. Involuntary Civil Commitment of Sexually Dangerous Persons and Other Civil Measures Against Such Individuals

[E21] State statutes providing for the involuntary civil commitment of mentally abnormal persons, adjudged sexually dangerous or violent, have been considered, in several cases, as establishing civil, not criminal, proceedings.

[E22] In Allen, the Court first pointed out that the aim of the Illinois Sexually Dangerous Persons Act was to provide treatment, not punishment, for such persons and established a system under which committed persons might be released after a brief time of confinement. That the state could not file a sexually dangerous person petition under the Act, unless it had already filed criminal charges against the person in question and thus had chosen not to apply the Act to the larger class of mentally ill persons who might be found sexually dangerous, did not transform a civil proceeding into a criminal one. Besides, the state should prove more than just the commission of a sexual assault; it also had to prove the existence of a mental disorder for more than one year and a propensity to commit sexual assaults, in addition to showing that propensity through sexual assault. Furthermore, the fact that the Act provided some of the safeguards applicable in criminal proceedings—rights to counsel, to a jury trial, and to confront and cross-examine witnesses, and the requirement that sexual dangerousness be proved beyond a reasonable doubt—was itself insufficient to turn the proceedings under the Act into criminal proceedings requiring the full panoply of rights applicable there. And the fact that a person adjudged sexually dangerous under the Act was committed to a maximum security institution that also housed convicts needing psychiatric care did not make the conditions of that person's confinement amount to "punishment," and thus render "criminal" the proceedings that had led to confinement.[65]

[E23] Hendricks involved Kansas' Sexually Violent Predator Act. Commitment under the Act was not held to implicate either of the two primary objectives of criminal punishment: retribution or deterrence. The Act did not affix culpability for prior criminal conduct but used such conduct solely for evidentiary purposes. It did not make criminal conviction a prerequisite for commitment, and it lacked a scienter requirement, an important element in distinguishing criminal and civil statutes. Nor could the Act be said to act as a deterrent, since persons with a mental abnormality or personality disorder were unlikely to be deterred by the threat of confinement. And the conditions surrounding that confinement did not suggest a punitive purpose on the state's part, since an individual confined under the Act was not subject to the more restrictive conditions placed on state prisoners but instead experienced essentially the same conditions as any involuntarily committed patient in the state mental institution. Although the commitment scheme involved an affirmative restraint, the Court emphasized that such restraint of the dangerously mentally ill had been historically regarded as a legitimate non-punitive objective. And the confinement's potentially indefinite duration was linked not to any punitive objective but to the purpose of holding a person until his mental abnormality no longer caused him to be a threat to others; he was thus permitted immediate release upon a showing that he was no longer dangerous, and the longest he could be detained, pursuant to a single judicial proceeding, was one year. Moreover, the state's use of procedural safeguards applicable in criminal trials did not itself turn the proceedings into criminal prosecutions. Finally, the Act was not thought to be punitive, in case that treatment for a condition was not possible, because the state had a legitimate interest in protecting the public from dangerous individuals with treatable as well as untreatable conditions.[66]

---

64 Int'l Union, United Mine Workers of Am. v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 836–38 (1994).

65 Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364, 369–72 (1986).

[E24] Young was committed as a sexually violent predator at a special center, under the Washington State's Community Protection Act of 1990. The Act was strikingly similar to, and in fact was the pattern for, the Kansas Act upheld in Hendricks. Thus, it was considered to be civil. Moreover, in affirming Hudson's method of analysis, the Court pointed out that a statute, found to be civil, cannot be deemed punitive "as applied" to a single individual and provide cause for release. "The civil nature of a confinement scheme cannot be altered based merely on vagaries in the implementation of the authorizing statute."[67] But this did not mean that Young had no remedy for the alleged conditions and treatment regime at the center. Since the Act was civil in nature, designed to incapacitate and to treat, due process required that "the conditions and duration of confinement under the Act bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which persons [we]re committed."[68]

[E25] The Court also characterized as civil the Alaska Sex Offender Registration Act. Under this Act, any sex offender or child kidnaper incarcerated in the state must register with the Department of Corrections within 30 days before his release, providing his name, address, and other specified information. If the individual was at liberty, he should register with local law enforcement authorities within a working day of his conviction or of entering the state. If he had been convicted of a single, non-aggravated sex crime, the offender must provide annual verification of the submitted information for 15 years. If he had been convicted of an aggravated sex offense or of two or more sex offenses, he must register for life and verify the information quarterly. The offender's information was forwarded to the Department of Public Safety, which maintained a central registry of sex offenders. Some of the data, such as fingerprints, driver's license number, anticipated change of address, and whether the offender had had medical treatment afterwards was kept confidential. The offender's name, aliases, address, photograph, physical description, driver's license number, motor vehicle identification numbers, place of employment, date of birth, crime, date and place of conviction, length and conditions of sentence, and a statement as to whether the offender was in compliance with the Act's update requirements or could not be located were, however, published on the Internet. Both the Act's registration and notification requirements were retroactive. The Court admitted that the Alaska legislature's intent was to create a civil, non-punitive scheme designed to protect the public from harm. The Act did not involve a traditional means of punishing and imposed no affirmative disability or restraint. Offenders subject to the Act were free to move where they wished and to live and work as other citizens, with no supervision. While registrants must inform the authorities after they changed their facial features, borrow a car, or seek psychiatric treatment, they were not required to seek permission to do so. Moreover, the Act had a rational connection

---

66 Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 362–69 (1997).

67 Seling v. Young, 531 U.S. 250, 263 (2001).

68 Id. at 265.

to a legitimate non-punitive purpose, "public safety, which [wa]s advanced by alerting the public to the risk of sex offenders in their community." That the Act might not be narrowly drawn to accomplish the stated purpose was not dispositive, since "[a] statute is not deemed punitive simply because it lacks a close or perfect fit with the nonpunitive aims it seeks to advance." Such imprecision "does not suggest that the Act's nonpunitive purpose is a 'sham or mere pretext.'"[69] And the regulatory scheme was not excessive with respect to the Act's purpose. The state's determination to legislate with respect to convicted sex offenders as a class, rather than require individual determination of their dangerousness, did not render the Act punitive. The duration of the reporting requirements was not excessive, since empirical research on child molesters, for instance, had shown that most reoffenses did not occur within the first several years after release but might occur as late as 20 years following release. Furthermore, the wide dissemination of offender information did not render the Act excessive, given the general mobility of the population. Therefore, the regulatory means chosen were reasonable in light of the non-punitive objective of the Act. Subsequently, the Court found the Act civil and upheld it against a constitutional challenge based on the Ex Post Facto Clause.[70]

5. Other Cases

[E26] In Cummings, the Court struck down a provision of the Missouri post-Civil War Reconstruction Constitution that barred persons from various professions unless they stated under oath that they had not given aid or comfort to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States and had never "been a member of, or connected with, any order, society, or organization, inimical to the government of the United States." The Court recognized that the oath was required not as a means of ascertaining whether parties were qualified for their professions but rather to effect a punishment for having associated with the Confederacy. The provisions at issue "[did] not, in terms, define any crimes or declare that any punishment should be inflicted, but they produce[d] the same result upon the parties against whom they [we]re directed as though the crimes had been defined and the punishment had been declared." So they were found to be criminal, in substance, and therefore violative of the Ex Post Facto Clause.[71] In Trop, the Court held unconstitutional a statute providing for the expatriation of one who had been sentenced by a court-martial to dismissal or dishonorable discharge for wartime desertion. The majority of the Court characterized the statute as punitive. However, no single opinion commanded the support of a majority. "The plurality opinion rested its determination, at least in part, on its inability to discern any alternative purpose which the statute could be thought to serve. . . . The concurring opinion found in the specific historical evolution of the provision in question compelling evidence of punitive intent."[72] Likewise, in Mendoza-Martinez, the Court, considering the legislative and judicial history of the challenged provision and their predecessors, held expatriation for remaining outside the country to avoid military service to constitute impermissible punishment without a criminal trial.[73]

---

[69] Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 103 (2003).

[70] Id. at 104–06.

[71] Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 327–28 (1867).

[72] See Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603 (1960), discussing Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 97, 107–09 (1958).

[73] Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1963).

[E27] On the contrary, termination of old-age benefits payable to deportable aliens was not found to amount to punishment, mainly because the disqualification of certain deportees from receipt of Social Security benefits while they were not lawfully in the United States had a rational connection to the purposes of the legislation of which it was a part.[74] "[N]or is deportation a punishment; it is simply a refusal by the government to harbor aliens whom it does not want."[75] Furthermore, in Zadvydas, involving the detention of deportable aliens, the Court observed that the proceedings at issue there were civil and assumed that they were non-punitive in purpose or effect.[76]

B. THE BILL OF ATTAINDER CLAUSE

[E28] The Constitution provides that "[n]o Bill of Attainder . . . shall be passed" by Congress (Article I, Section 9, Clause 3) or the states (Article I, Section 10, Clause 1). "In forbidding bills of attainder, the draftsmen of the Constitution sought to prohibit the ancient practice of the Parliament in England of punishing without trial specifically designated persons or groups."[77] The Bill of Attainder Clauses were intended "to ensure that the legislature would not overstep the bounds of its authority and perform the functions of the other departments" of government and "also reflected the Framers' belief that the Legislative Branch is not so well suited as politically independent judges and juries to the task of ruling upon the blameworthiness, of, and levying appropriate punishment upon, specific persons."[78] Historically, bills of attainder generally named the persons to be punished. However, "[t]he singling out of an individual for legislatively prescribed punishment constitutes an attainder whether the individual is called by name or described in terms of conduct which, because it is past conduct, operates only as a designation of particular persons."[79] "When past activity serves as 'a point of reference for the ascertainment of particular persons ineluctably designated by the legislature' for punishment, . . . the Act may be an attainder."[80] Nonetheless, the prohibition against bills of attainder "was not intended to serve as a variant of the equal protection doc-

---

74 Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 617 (1960).

75 See Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 594 (1952), quoting Bugajewitz v. Adams, 228 U.S. 585, 591 (1913) (opinion of Justice Holmes).

76 Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690 (2001). Similarly in United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987), the Court rejected the allegation that pre-trial detention of dangerous arrestees, authorized by the Bail Reform Act of 1984, constituted impermissible punishment, under the Due Process Clause. Id. at 746–48. The Act's legislative history clearly indicated that Congress had formulated the detention provisions not as punishment for dangerous individuals but as a potential solution to the pressing societal problem of crimes committed by persons on release. Moreover, the incidents of detention under the Act were not found to be excessive in relation to that goal, since the Act carefully limited the circumstances under which detention might be sought to the most serious of crimes, the maximum length of detention was limited by the Speedy Trial Act, and detainees should be housed apart from convicts. Thus, the Act was considered to constitute permissible regulation rather than impermissible punishment.

77 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 847 (1984).

78 United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 444–45 (1965).

79 Communist Party of United States v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 86 (1961).

80 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 848 (1984), quoting Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 324 (1867)

trine, invalidating every Act by Congress or the States that burdens some persons or groups but not all other plausible individuals. . . . [W]hile the Bill of Attainder Clause serves as an important bulwark against tyranny, it does not do so by limiting Congress to the choice of legislating for the universe, or legislating only benefits, or not legislating at all."[81]

[E29] The proscription against bills of attainder reaches only statutes that inflict punishment on the specified individual or group. In deciding whether a statute inflicts forbidden punishment, the Court has "recognized three necessary inquiries: (1) whether the challenged statute falls within the historical meaning of legislative punishment; (2) whether the statute, 'viewed in terms of the type and severity of burdens imposed, reasonably can be said to further non-punitive legislative purposes;' and (3) whether the legislative record 'evinces a legislative intent to punish.'"[82] In determining whether a statute inflicts punishment within the proscription against bills of attainder, "the severity of a sanction is not determinative of its character as punishment."[83] "Punishment is not limited solely to retribution for past events, but may involve deprivations inflicted to deter future misconduct."[84] "The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment, the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office may be punishment, as in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Disqualification from the pursuits of a lawful avocation, or from positions of trust, or from the privilege of appearing in the courts, or acting as an executor, administrator, or guardian, may also be imposed as punishment."[85] "It is thus apparent that, though the governing criteria for an attainder may be readily indicated, each case has turned on its own highly particularized context."[86]

[E30] Cummings involved the constitutionality of amendments to the Missouri Constitution of 1865, which provided that no one could engage in a number of specified professions (Cummings was a priest) unless he first swore that he had taken no part in the rebellion against the Union. Although the state Constitution did not mention the persons or groups required to take the oath by name, the Court concluded that, in creating a qualification having no possible relation to their fitness for their chosen professions, the Constitution was intended "to reach the person, not the calling."[87] On the same day that it decided Cummings, the Court struck down a similar oath that was

---

81 Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 471 (1977).

82 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 852 (1984), citing and quoting Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs, 433 U.S. 425, 473, 475–76, 478 (1977). See also De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 160 (1960): "The question in each case where unpleasant consequences are brought to bear upon an individual for prior conduct is whether the legislative aim was to punish that individual for past activity, or whether the restriction of the individual comes about as a relevant incident to a regulation of a present situation, such as the proper qualifications for a profession."

83 Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 616, n.9 (1960).

84 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 851–52 (1984), citing United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 458–59 (1965), which overruled Am. Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 413 (1949).

85 United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 448 (1965), quoting Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 320 (1867).

86 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 852 (1984).

87 Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 320 (1867).

required for admission to practice law in the federal courts. "Like the oath considered in Cummings, the oath 'operate[d] as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion' from the practice of law, since past affiliation with the Confederacy prevented attorneys from taking the oath without perjuring themselves."[88]

[E31] The next extended discussion of the Bill of Attainder Clause came in Lovett, where the Court invalidated a law that prohibited payment of further salary, to three named federal employees, as a bill of attainder. The Court found that the purpose of the Act was not merely to cut off respondents' compensation through regular disbursing channels, but permanently to bar them from government service; the Act's language, as well as the circumstances of its passage, showed that it was designed to force the employing agencies to discharge respondents and to bar their being hired by any other governmental agency, because Congress deemed them guilty of "subversive activities," and therefore "unfit" to hold a federal job. "This permanent proscription from any opportunity to serve the Government [wa]s punishment, and of a most severe type."[89]

[E32] In Douds, the Court upheld a law that conditioned trade union access to the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board upon the submission of non-Communist affidavits by officers of the union. Although the requirement undoubtedly discouraged unions from choosing officers with Communist affiliations, it did not prohibit their election. Moreover, the Court noted that the union officers involved were not being punished for past actions but were "subject to possible loss of position only because there [wa]s substantial ground for the congressional judgment that their beliefs and loyalties would be transformed into future [disruptive] conduct."[90]

[E33] However, the latter argument was disavowed some years later in Brown. Brown was convicted under Section 504 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, which made it a crime for one who belonged to the Communist Party, or who had been a member thereof during the preceding five years, willfully to serve as a member of the executive board of a labor organization. The five-member majority of the Court rejected the claim that the Act did not constitute a bill of attainder, because its aim was not retributive—to punish past acts—but preventive; the majority stressed that "[i]t would be archaic to limit the "'punishment,' [within the meaning of the Bill of Attainder Clause,] to 'retribution.'"[91] Furthermore, it reasoned that although Congress undoubtedly possessed power under the Commerce Clause to enact legislation designed to keep from positions affecting inter-state commerce persons who might use such positions to bring about political strikes, in Section 504 Congress had exceeded the authority granted it by the Constitution. The statute did not set forth "a generally applicable rule decreeing that any person who commit[ted] certain acts or possesse[d] certain characteristics (acts and characteristics which, in Congress' view, ma[de] them likely to initiate political strikes) [should] not hold union office, and leav[ing] to courts and juries the job of deciding what persons ha[d] committed the specified acts or pos-

---

88 See Selective Service System v. Minnesota Public Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 848 (1984), discussing and quoting Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 327, 377 (1867), where the Court pointed out, inter alia, that admission or exclusion of lawyers was the exercise of judicial power, since attorneys and councelors were officers of the court, whose duties related almost exclusively to proceedings of a judicial nature.

89 United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303, 316 (1946).

90 Am. Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 413 (1950).

91 United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 458 (1965).

sess[ed] the specified characteristics. Instead, it designate[d] in no uncertain terms the persons who possess[ed] the feared characteristics and therefore [could not] hold union office without incurring criminal liability—members of the Communist Party. . . . Even assuming that Congress had reason to conclude that some Communists would use union positions to bring about political strikes, it [could not] automatically be inferred that all members share[d] their evil purposes or participate[d] in their illegal conduct."[92]

[E34] In Garner, the Court upheld a city's charter that required the municipal employees to execute affidavits disclosing whether or not they were or ever had been members of the Communist Party or the Communist Political Association. The Court construed the charter as barring from the city's public service persons who, since its adoption in 1941, advocated the violent overthrow of the government or who were or became affiliated with any group doing so. Such provisions constituted a reasonable regulation to protect the municipal service. Since they merely provided standards of qualification and eligibility for public employment and did not inflict punishment, they were not a bill of attainder.[93]

[E35] In 1961, the Court dealt with a case involving an appeal from an order by the Control Board ordering the Communist Party to register as a "Communist action organization," under the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, which defined the "Communist action organization" as "any organization in the United States . . . which (i) is substantially directed, dominated, or controlled by the foreign government or foreign organization controlling the world Communist movement referred to in section 2 of this title, and (ii) operates primarily to advance the objectives of such world Communist movement." The Court considered that the Act was not a bill of attainder, mainly because "[i]t attache[d] not to specified organizations, but to described activities in which an organization might or might not engage. . . . [The Act required] the registration only of organizations which, after the date of the Act, [we]re found to be under the direction, domination, or control of certain foreign powers and to operate primarily to advance certain objectives. This finding must be made after full administrative hearing, subject to judicial review which open[ed] the record for the reviewing court's determination whether the administrative findings as to fact were supported by the preponderance of the evidence. . . . [And] [t]he fact that activity engaged in prior to the enactment of the legislation [might] be regarded administratively and judicially as relevant to a determination that an organization [was then] presently foreign controlled and . . . work[ed] to advance the objectives of the world Communist movement [did] not alter the operative structure of the Act."[94]

[E36] De Veau involved a New York statute that prohibited any labor organization representing waterfront employees from collecting dues if any of its officers or agents had been convicted of a felony and had not subsequently been pardoned or cleared by the Parole Board. The Court pointed out that the statute embodied no further implications of appellant's guilt than were contained in his previous judicial conviction and that barring convicted felons from certain employments is a reasonable legislative device "to insure against corruption in specified vital areas. . . . New York sought not to punish ex-felons, but to devise what was felt to be a much-needed scheme of regulation of the

---

92 Id. at 450, 456.

93 Garner v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Los Angeles, 341 U.S. 716, 720–24 (1951).

94 Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 86–87 (1961).

waterfront, and, for the effectuation of that scheme, it became important whether individuals had previously been convicted of a felony." So the statute could not be deemed as a bill of attainder.[95]

[E37] In 1974 Congress passed the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act, directing the General Services Administrator to take custody of Nixon's presidential materials and have them screened by government archivists in order to return to Nixon those personal and private in nature and to preserve those having historical value and to make the materials available for use in judicial proceedings subject to "any rights, defenses or privileges which the Federal Government or any person might invoke." The Act's specificity in referring to Nixon by name did not automatically offend the Bill of Attainder Clause. Since, at the time of the Act's passage, Congress was only concerned with the preservation of Nixon's materials—the papers of former Presidents already were housed in libraries—Nixon constituted a legitimate class of one. Moreover, the Act did not "inflict punishment" within the historical meaning of bills of attainder, and there was no evidence in the legislative history or in the provisions of the Act showing a congressional intent to punish appellant. In addition, the law was an act of non-punitive legislative policymaking, for it aimed to preserve the availability of historically significant materials and judicial evidence for the Watergate-related crimes. Thus, the Act did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause.[96]

[E38] In 1984 the Court confronted a statute denying federal financial assistance to male students between the ages of 18 and 26 who failed to register for the draft, in violation of a presidential proclamation requiring young men to register for the draft within 30 days of their 18th birthday. The Court held that the statute was not a bill of attainder. On the one hand, the law did not single out non-registrants and make them ineligible for aid based on their past conduct, i.e., failure to register. The statutory requirements were not irreversible, but could be met readily by either timely or late registration. One the other hand, the challenged statute did not inflict "punishment," given, among other things, that it left open perpetually the possibility of qualifying for aid. Besides the statute furthered non-punitive legislative goals. Conditioning receipt of financial aid on draft registration was "a rational means to improve compliance with the registration requirements." And it also promoted "a fair allocation of scarce federal resources by limiting [the] aid to those who [we]re willing to meet their responsibilities to the United States by registering for the draft when required to do so."[97]

C. NON-RETROACTIVITY

1. In the Criminal Context

a. The Ex Post Facto Clauses

[E39] The Constitution precludes Congress (Article I, Section 9, Clause 3) and the states (Article I, Section 10, Clause 1) from passing ex post facto laws.[98] The Ex Post Facto

---

95 De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 158–60 (1960).

96 Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 472–84 (1977).

97 Selective Serv. Sys. v. Minnesota Pub. Interest Research Group, 468 U.S. 841, 854 (1984).

98 A bill of attainder may also be a forbidden ex post facto law. See, e.g., Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277 (1867); Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 (1867).

Clauses not only ensure that individuals have "fair warning" about the effect of criminal statutes,[99] but also "restricts governmental power by restraining arbitrary and potentially vindictive legislation."[100] The ex post facto prohibition "cannot be avoided merely by adding to a law notice of the obvious fact that it might be changed."[101] The prohibition applies only to criminal laws;[102] for example, it is inapplicable to retroactive tax penalties[103] or to the deportation of convicted aliens.[104] As the text of the clauses makes clear, "it is a limitation upon the powers of the Legislature, and does not of its own force apply to the Judicial Branch of government."[105]

[E40] The foregoing prohibition is not directed against procedural changes,[106] even if application of the new rule operates to a defendant's disadvantage in a particular case. Thus, the Ex Post Facto Clauses are inapplicable with respect to intervening procedural statutes that allow reformation of improper verdicts;[107] or require, in principle, a joint trial of persons jointly indicted for a felony;[108] or establish different methods employed in determining whether the death penalty is to be imposed, without any alterations in the quantum of punishment attached to the crime.[109] Furthermore, the constitutional inhibition on ex post facto laws is not to obstruct mere alterations in the conditions of infliction of humane punishment.[110]

[E41] To fall within the ex post facto prohibition, a criminal law must apply to events occurring before its enactment[111] and disadvantage the offender affected by it.[112] There

---

[99] A person must receive fair notice not only of the punishable conduct but also of the severity of the punishment prescribed for the crime. See, e.g., Miller v. Florida, 482 U.S. 423, 431 (1987).

[100] Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 28–29 (1981).

[101] Miller v. Florida, 482 U.S. 423, 431 (1987).

[102] Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390–92 (1798).

[103] Bankers Trust Co. v. Blodgett, 260 U.S. 647, 652 (1923).

[104] Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32, 39 (1924); Marcello v. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 349 U.S. 302, 314 (1955).

[105] Rogers v. Tennessee, 532 U.S. 451, 456 (2001), quoting Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 191 (1977), citing, in turn, Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309, 344 (1915).

[106] The distinction between (procedural) laws involving "substantial protections" and those that are merely "procedural" was disavowed in Collins v. Youngblood, 497 U.S. 37, 45–52 (1990). A legislature does not immunize a law from scrutiny under the clauses simply by labeling the law "procedural." Id. at 46.

[107] Collins v. Youngblood, 497 U.S. 37 (1990) (new statute allowing an appellate court to reform an improper verdict assessing a punishment not authorized by law).

[108] Beazell v. Ohio, 269 U.S. 167, 170 (1925).

[109] Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 293–97 (1977) (new statute requiring, upon the conviction of a capital felon, a separate sentencing hearing before the trial judge and jury, at which the jury would render an advisory decision, not binding on the judge, whereas, under the previous statute, the jury determined, without review by the trial judge, whether the death penalty should be imposed).

[110] Malloy v. S. Carolina, 237 U.S. 180, 183 (1915) (statute not changing the penalty of death for murder but only the place of execution and the mode of producing death).

[111] Whether an offense against a temporary Act may be punished after the Act has expired depends upon the legislative purpose. The Ex Post Facto Clause does not come into play in such a case. See United States v. Powers, 307 U.S. 214, 216–18 (1939).

[112] See, e.g., Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 29 (1981).

is no ex post facto violation, if, "in the light of reason and common sense,"[113] the changes are, on the whole,[114] favorable to the offender. A law that enlarges the period of confinement prior to the actual execution of the criminal is ameliorative, because, on the one hand, the giving of three months' additional time to live, after the rendition of judgment, is clearly to his advantage, for the Court assumes that every rational person desires to live as long as he may, and, on the other hand, the extension of the time to live, increases the opportunity of the accused to obtain a pardon from the governor of the state before his execution.[115]

[E42] There are four categories of ex post facto criminal laws.[116]

[E43] First, "[e]very law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action."[117] A statute by which "whoever has been twice convicted of crime . . . for terms of not less than three years each shall, upon conviction of a felony committed . . . after the passage of this act, be deemed to be an habitual criminal, and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for twenty-five years" imposes a punishment on none but future crimes and is not ex post facto.[118] Similarly, a state law making it unlawful for a person to possess intoxicating liquors that, previous to its enactment, he had lawfully acquired for consumption as a beverage in his home, and subjecting them to seizure and destruction, is not an ex post facto law, for it does not fix a penalty for the owner for having become possessed of the liquor, but it imposes a punishment for continuing to possess the liquor after the enactment of the law.[119]

[E44] Second, "[e]very law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed."[120] This category refers, particularly, to a statute that inflicts punishments, where the party was not, by law, liable to any punishment. Hence, it is thought to include a law enacted after expiration of a previously applicable limitations period, when it is applied to revive a previously time-barred prosecution.[121]

[E45] Third, "[e]very law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed."[122] In Lindsey, the sentencing provision in effect at the time the petitioners committed their crimes provided for a maximum sentence of "not more than fifteen years." Before they were sentenced, however, a new statute was passed that required the judge to sentence the petitioners to the 15-year maximum; under the new statute, the petitioners could secure an earlier release only through the grace of the Parole Board. The Court held that the application of this statute to petitioners violated the Ex Post Facto Clause, because the measure of punish-

---

113 Rooney v. N. Dakota, 196 U.S. 319, 325 (1905).

114 See Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 294–97 (1977); Garner v. Jones, 529 U.S. 244, 252 (2000).

115 Rooney v. N. Dakota, 196 U.S. 319, 325–26 (1905).

116 Justice Chase set out these categories in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386 (1798). The Court has endorsed this understanding, including the fourth category. See, in particular, Carmell v. Texas, 529 U.S. 513, 525 (2000).

117 Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390 (1798) (emphasis added).

118 McDonald v. Massachusetts, 180 U.S. 311, 313 (1901).

119 Samuels v. McCurdy, 267 U.S. 188, 193 (1925).

120 Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390 (1798) (emphasis added).

121 See Stogner v. California, 539 U.S. 607 (2003).

122 Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390 (1798) (emphasis added).

ment, prescribed by the later statute, was more severe than that of the earlier.[123] The statute at issue in Miller contained a similar defect. Florida's sentencing scheme had established "presumptive sentencing ranges" for various offenses, which sentencing judges were required to follow in the absence of "clear and convincing reasons" for a departure. At the time that Miller committed his crime, his presumptive sentencing range would have been three and a half to four and a half years. Before his sentencing, however, the state legislature altered the formula for establishing the presumptive sentencing range for certain sexual offenses by increasing the "primary offense points" assigned to those crimes. As a result, petitioner's presumptive range jumped from five and a half to seven years. The Court held that the resulting increase in the "quantum of punishment" violated the Ex Post Facto Clause.[124]

[E46] In Weaver, the petitioner had been sentenced to 15 years in prison for his crime of second-degree murder. Both at the time of his crime and at the time his sentence was imposed, state statutes provided a formula for mandatory reductions to the terms of all prisoners who complied with certain prison regulations and state laws. The challenged statute retroactively reduced the amount of "gain time" credits available to prisoners under this formula. Though the statute preserved the possibility that some prisoners might win back these credits if they convinced prison officials to exercise their discretion to find that they were especially deserving, it was invalidated, since "it effectively eliminated the lower end of the possible range of prison terms."[125] Likewise, in Lynce, the Court struck down a statute that retroactively canceled all early release credits awarded to prison inmates convicted of murder and attempted murder, for the new statute objectively lengthened the period that someone in petitioner's position should spend in prison.[126]

[E47] In Morales, a California statute changed the default frequency of reconsideration for parole from every year to up to every three years, for prisoners convicted of more than one homicide, without altering the substantive standards for determining either the initial date for parole eligibility or an inmate's suitability for parole. The Court emphasized that not every retroactive procedural change creating a risk of affecting an inmate's terms or conditions of confinement is prohibited. The question is "a matter of degree;" the controlling inquiry is whether retroactive application of the change in parole provisions creates "a sufficient risk of increasing the measure of punishment attached to the covered crimes."[127] The amended California law was not found to violate this standard, since it created "only the most speculative and attenuated possibility of increasing the measure of punishment for covered crimes." First, the amendment applied only to those who had taken more than one life, a class of prisoners for whom the likelihood of release on parole was quite remote. Second, it affected the timing only of subsequent hearings and did so only when the Board made specific findings in the

---

123 Lindsey v. Washington, 301 U.S. 397 (1937).

124 See Miller v. Florida, 482 U.S. 423 (1987), as discussed in California Dep't of Corr. v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499, 506 (1995).

125 See California Dep't of Corrs. v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499, 506 (1995), discussing Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24 (1981).

126 Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433 (1997). The fact that the generous gain-time provisions in the earlier 1983 statute were motivated more by the interest in avoiding overcrowding than by a desire to reward good behavior, was not relevant to that inquiry.

127 California Dep't of Corrs. v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499, 509 (1995)

first hearing. Moreover, the Board had the authority to tailor the frequency of subsequent hearings to the particular circumstances of the individual prisoner. Since the rule did not, by its own terms, show a significant risk of increased incarceration, the convict should demonstrate, by evidence drawn from the rule's practical implementation by the agency charged with exercising discretion, that its retroactive application would result in a longer period of incarceration than under the earlier rule. Still Morales offered no support for his speculation that prisoners might experience an unanticipated change that would be sufficiently monumental to alter their suitability for parole, or that such prisoners might be precluded from receiving a subsequent expedited hearing.[128]

[E48] The retroactive application of a statute that authorizes a district court to impose an additional term of supervised release, following the reimprisonment of those who violate the conditions of an initial term, would run counter the Ex Post Facto Clause, because post-revocation penalties are attributable to the original conviction, not to convicts' new offenses for violating their supervised release conditions.[129]

[E49] Dobbert was convicted of three murders committed between December 31, 1971, and April 8, 1972. During that period of time, the Florida legislation provided that a person convicted of a capital felony was to be punished by death unless the verdict included a recommendation of mercy by a majority of the jury. On June 22, 1972, in Furman, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Georgia death penalty statute as violative of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Shortly thereafter, the Florida supreme court found the 1971 Florida death penalty statutes inconsistent with Furman. Late in 1972, Florida enacted a new death penalty statute under which Dobbert was sentenced to death. Dobbert invoked the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws, arguing there was no death penalty "in effect" in Florida at the time of the murder, because the earlier statute in effect at such time was later held invalid by the Florida supreme court. The majority of the Court rejected the claim, noting that the existence of the earlier statute at the time of the murder served as an "operative fact" to warn petitioner of the penalty that Florida would seek to impose on him if he were convicted of first-degree murder, and this was sufficient compliance with the ex post facto provision of the Constitution, notwithstanding the subsequent invalidation of the statute.[130] Three mem-

---

[128] Id. at 509–13. See also Garner v. Jones, 529 U.S. 244 (2000), involving the retroactive application of a Georgia law permitting the extension of intervals between parole considerations. The Georgia law was prima facie qualified, since it vested the Board of Paroles with discretion as to how often to set an inmate's date for reconsideration, with an eight-year maximum, and the Board's policies permitted expedited reviews in the event of a change in circumstance or new information. The case was remanded, as the court of appeals had erred in not considering the Board's internal policy statements, along with the Board's actual practices, factors that would provide important instruction as to how the Board interpreted its enabling statute and regulations and, therefore, whether, as a matter of fact, the amendment under review created a significant risk of increased punishment. In relation to the above inquiry, the Court observed that, absent a demonstration to the contrary, it should be presumed the Board followed its statutory commands and internal policies in fulfilling its obligations.

[129] Johnson v. United States, 529 U.S. 694, 700–01 (2000).

[130] Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282, 298 (1977). The Court also held that the imposition of the death sentence upon petitioner pursuant to the new statute did not deny him equal protection of the laws. Having been neither tried nor sentenced prior to Furman, he was not similarly situated to those whose death sentences were commuted, and it was not irrational for Florida to relegate him to the class of those prisoners whose acts could properly be punished under the new statute that was in effect at the time of his trial and sentence.

bers of the Court dissented, stressing, inter alia, that, since at the time of petitioner's offense, there was no constitutional procedure for imposing the death penalty in Florida, the possibility of such capricious punishment was not "fair warning," under any meaningful use of those words.[131]

[E50] The fourth category comprises "[e]very law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less, or different, testimony, than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender."[132] "A law reducing the quantum of evidence required to convict is as grossly unfair as retrospectively eliminating an element of the offense, increasing punishment for an existing offense, or lowering the burden of proof."[133] Accordingly, "[r]equiring only the victim's testimony to convict, rather than that testimony plus corroborating evidence, is surely 'less testimony required to convict'" and falls within the scope of the prohibition.[134] The Court has also indicated that, since "a statute of limitations reflects a legislative judgment that, after a certain time, no quantum of evidence is sufficient to convict, . . . to resurrect a prosecution after the relevant statute of limitations has expired is to eliminate a currently existing conclusive presumption forbidding prosecution, and thereby to permit conviction on a quantum of evidence where that quantum, at the time the new law is enacted, would have been legally insufficient."[135]

b. Retroactive Judicial Decisionmaking[136]

[E51] The Ex Post Facto Clauses are directed against legislative action only. But the essential principle on which the clauses are based—the notion that persons have a right to "fair warning" of conduct that will give rise to criminal penalties—is fundamental to the concept of constitutional liberty. As such, that right is protected against judicial action by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth and Fourtheenth Amendments. "Indeed, an unforeseeable judicial enlargement of a criminal statute, applied retroactively, operates precisely like an ex post facto law, such as Art. I, § 10, of the Constitution forbids."[137] If legislatures are prohibited from passing such laws, it must follow that courts are "barred by the Due Process Clause from achieving precisely the same result by judicial construction."[138] "If a judicial construction of a criminal statute is unexpected and indefensible by reference to the law that had been expressed prior to the conduct in issue, it must not be given retroactive effect" to the defendant's detriment.[139] Hence, "due process bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope."[140]

---

131 Id. at 309.
132 Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 390 (1798) (emphasis added).
133 Carmell v. Texas, 529 U.S. 513, 532 (2000).
134 Id. at 530–31 (case involving a conviction for sexual offenses).
135 Stogner v. California, 539 U.S. 607, 615–16 (2003).
136 See also paras. A67–A68 (retroactive effect of the Supeme Court's decisions in criminal cases).
137 Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 353 (1964).
138 Id. at 353–54.
139 Id. at 354.
140 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 266 (1997).

[E52] In Bouie, the leading case in the field, the petitioners had refused to leave a restaurant after being asked to do so by the restaurant's manager. Although the manager had not objected when the petitioners entered the restaurant, the petitioners were convicted of violating a South Carolina trespass statute proscribing "entry upon the lands, of another . . . after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting such entry." The South Carolina court construed the statute to extend to patrons of a drug store who had received no notice prohibiting their entry into the store but had refused to leave the store when asked. Prior to the court's decision, South Carolina cases construing the statute had uniformly held that conviction under the statute required proof of notice before entry. None of those cases, moreover, had given the slightest indication that requirement could be satisfied by proof of the different act of remaining on the land after being told to leave. Consequently, the Court decided that the South Carolina court's retroactive application of its construction violated due process.[141]

[E53] In Marks, petitioners were convicted of transporting obscene materials in violation of a federal statute, providing that "whoever knowingly transports in inter-state or foreign commerce for the purpose of sale or distribution any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, film, . . . or any other matter of indecent or immoral character, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both." The Court held that the retroactive application of the obscenity standards announced in Miller,[142] to the potential detriment of the petitioner, violated the Due Process Clause, because, at the time that the defendant committed the challenged conduct, the Court's decision in Memoirs[143] provided the governing law.[144]

[E54] A trial court's construction of the term "arrest" as including a traffic citation, and application of that construction to defendant to revoke his probation, was judged unforeseeable and thus violated due process.[145] By contrast, Rogers found that the Tennessee court's abolition of the "year and a day" common law rule—under which no defendant could be convicted of murder unless his victim died by the defendant's act within a year and a day of the act—was not unexpected and indefensible, because advances in medical and related science had so undermined the rule's usefulness as to render it, without question, obsolete, the rule had been legislatively or judicially abolished in the vast majority of jurisdictions, and it had never once served as a ground of decision in any murder prosecution in Tennessee.[146]

[E55] Apart from that, a new constitutional rule announced by the Supreme Court in the criminal context applies retroactively to all cases, state or federal, not yet final.[147]

---

141 Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964).

142 Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), under which the appropriate test was "whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."

143 Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966), under which expressive material was constitutionally protected unless it was "utterly without redeeming social value."

144 Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188 (1977).

145 Douglas v. Buder, 412 U.S. 430 (1973) (per curiam).

146 Rogers v. Tennessee, 532 U.S. 451 (2001). The Court concluded that far from a marked and unpredictable departure from prior precedent, the Tennessee court's decision was a routine exercise of common law decisionmaking that brought the law into conformity with reason and common sense.

147 See, in particular, Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 102 (1974) and Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314, 323 (1987).

After the Court has announced a new rule in the case selected for review, the integrity of judicial review requires the Court to apply that rule to all similar cases pending on direct review. In addition, selective application of a new rule would violate the principle of treating similarly situated defendants the same.[148]

2. In the Civil Context[149]

[E56] In certain civil cases, usually involving fraud, malice, willful and wanton conduct, or recklessness, the plaintiff may be awarded punitive damages, as a means of punishing the defendant for his behavior. The very label of "punitive" damages, as well as the rationale supporting them, demonstrate that they share key characteristics of criminal sanctions, and therefore would raise a serious question under the Ex Post Facto Clause if retroactively imposed.[150]

[E57] "The Due Process Clause also protects the interests in fair notice and repose that may be compromised by retroactive legislation."[151] Retrospective civil legislation may offend due process, if it is "particularly harsh and oppressive;"[152] that standard does not differ from the prohibition against arbitrary and irrational legislation.[153] A justification sufficient to validate a statute's prospective application under the clause may not suffice to warrant its retroactive application.[154] Indeed, the Court has announced that it would "hesitate to approve the retrospective imposition of liability on any theory of deterrence . . . or blameworthiness."[155]

D. DEFINITENESS AND THE "FAIR WARNING" DOCTRINE

1. In the Criminal Context

a. In General

[E58] Before criminal liability may be imposed for violation of any penal law, due process requires "fair warning . . . of what the law intends."[156] There are three related

---

[148] Griffith v. Kentucky, 479 U.S. 314, 320–26 (1987). A new rule of criminal law can be retroactive to cases on collateral review only if it places certain kinds of primary, private individual conduct beyond the power of the criminal lawmaking authority to proscribe, or if it prohibits a certain category of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense, or if it constitutes a watershed rule of criminal procedure, implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding. See, e.g., O'Dell v. Netherland, 521 U.S. 151, 157 (1997). See also para. A68.

[149] See also para. A68 (retroactivity of the Court's decisions in civil cases).

[150] Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 281 (1994). Cf. De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 160 (1960).

[151] Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433, 439 (1997), quoting Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 266 (1994).

[152] United States Trust Co. v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 17, n.13 (1977), quoting Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 147 (1938).

[153] Pension Benefit Guar. Co. (PBGC) v. R. A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 733 (1984).

[154] Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 17 (1976), cited in Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 266 (1994).

[155] Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 17 (1976). Cf. United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 542 (1975).

[156] McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 27 (1931). There is no adequate warning if nei-manifestations of the fair warning requirement. First, the vagueness doctrine bars enforcement of a statute that "either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application."[157] Second, "as a sort of 'junior version of the vagueness doctrine,' . . . the canon of strict construction of criminal statutes, or rule of lenity, ensures fair warning by so resolving ambiguity in a criminal statute as to apply it only to conduct clearly covered."[158] "The canon in favor of strict construction is not an inexorable command to override common sense and evident statutory purpose. . . . [It] does not require distortion of the fair import of the statutory language or nullification of the purpose of the legislation. Nor does it demand that a statute be given the 'narrowest meaning;' it is satisfied if the words are given their fair meaning in accord with the manifest intent of the lawmakers."[159] Third, "although clarity at the requisite level may be supplied by judicial gloss on an otherwise uncertain statute, . . . due process bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope."[160] "In each of these guises, the touchstone is whether the statute, either standing alone or as construed, made it reasonably clear at the relevant time that the defendant's conduct was criminal."[161]

b. The "Void for Vagueness" Doctrine

i. Generally

[E59] "[T]he rule of law implies equality and justice in its application."[162] In this context, the void for vagueness doctrine "requires that a penal statute define the criminal offense with sufficient definiteness that ordinary people can understand what conduct is prohibited and in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement."[163] "The requirement that government articulate its aims with a reasonable degree of clarity ensures that state power will be exercised only on behalf of policies reflecting an authoritative choice among competing social values, reduces the danger of caprice and discrimination in the administration of the laws, enables indi-ther the existence nor the publication of the rule is proved. See, e.g., Wright v. Georgia, 373 U.S. 284 (1963).

---

157 Connally v. Gen. Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926).

158 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 266 (1997), citing Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 427 (1985). See also United States v. Mersky, 361 U.S. 431, 440 (1960). The rule of lenity is applicable only if there is a "grievous ambiguity or uncertainty" in the statute. See Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 463 (1991), quoted in Muscarello v. United States, 524 U.S. 125, 138–39 (1998).

159 United States v. Brown, 333 U.S. 18, 25–26 (1948), quoted in United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576, 588, n.10 (1981) and United States v. Moore, 423 U.S. 122, 145 (1975).

160 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 266 (1997). See, in extenso, paras. E51 et seq.

161 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 267 (1997).

162 Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 171 (1972).

163 Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357 (1983). The Court pointed out that, although the doctrine focuses both on actual notice to citizens and arbitrary enforcement, the more important aspect of the vagueness doctrine is not actual notice but the other principal element of the doctrine—the requirement that a legislature establish minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement. See also Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566, 574 (1974).

viduals to conform their conduct to the requirements of law, and permits meaningful judicial review."[164] "[T]he constitutionality of a vague statutory standard is closely related to whether that standard incorporates a requirement of mens rea;"[165] indeed, "a scienter requirement may mitigate a law's vagueness, especially with respect to the adequacy of notice to the complainant that his conduct is proscribed."[166]

[E60] Nonetheless, "lack of precision is not itself offensive to the requirements of due process."[167] "The prohibition against excessive vagueness does not invalidate every statute which a reviewing court believes could have been drafted with greater precision. Many statutes will have some inherent vagueness, for 'in most English words and phrases there lurk uncertainties.'"[168] Consequently, "no more than a reasonable degree of certainty can be demanded."[169] "'The Constitution does not require impossible standards;' all that is required is that the language 'conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices.'"[170]

[E61] "The degree of vagueness that the Constitution tolerates—as well as the relative importance of fair notice and fair enforcement—depends in part on the nature of the enactment. Thus, economic regulation is subject to a less strict vagueness test because its subject matter is often more narrow and because businesses, which face economic demands to plan behavior carefully, can be expected to consult relevant legislation in advance of action."[171] Furthermore, "[b]ecause of the factors differentiating military society from civilian society, . . . Congress is permitted to legislate both with greater breadth and with greater flexibility when prescribing the rules by which the former shall be governed than it is when prescribing rules for the latter."[172] Subsequently, the proper standard of review for a vagueness challenge to rules of the Uniform Code of Military Justice defining military offenses is the same that applies to criminal statutes regulating economic affairs.[173] Conversely, "[w]here a statute's literal scope is capable of reaching expression sheltered by the First Amendment, the [due process doctrine of vagueness] demands a greater degree of specificity than in other contexts,"[174] because of the potential "chilling effect" on free speech.[175]

---

164 Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 629 (1984).

165 Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 395 (1979).

166 Vill. of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 499 (1982), citing Boyce Motor Lines v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 342 (1952).

167 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 491 (1957).

168 Rose v. Locke, 423 U.S. 48, 49–50 (1975) (per curiam). See also See Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 110 (1972) ("condemned to the use of words, we can never expect mathematical certainty in our language").

169 Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 340 (1952).

170 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 491 (1957), quoting United States v Petrillo, 332 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1947) (per curiam).

171 Vill. of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 498 (1982).

172 Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 756 (1974).

173 Id.

174 Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566, 573 (1973).

175 Cf. Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 871–72 (1997) (the vagueness of a regulation based on the undefined terms "indecent" and "patently offensive," coupled with its increased deterrent effect as a criminal statute, raises special First Amendment concerns because of its obvious chilling effect on free speech).

[E62] "[I]f the general class of offenses to which the statute is directed is plainly within its terms, the statute will not be struck down as vague, even though marginal cases could be put where doubts might arise. . . . And if this general class of offenses can be made constitutionally definite by a reasonable construction of the statute, th[e] Court is under a duty to give the statute that construction."[176]

[E63] This was the course adopted in Screws. In that case, the Court dealt with a statute that imposed criminal penalties to whoever, under color of law, "willfully" subjected any persons to the deprivation "of any rights" protected by the Constitution. The plurality construed the word "willfully" in its setting to mean the doing of an act with "a specific intent" to deprive an individual of a constitutional right; indeed, one who acted with such specific intent was aware that what he did was precisely that which the statute forbade. Furthermore, it held that the specific intent required by the Act was an intent to deprive a person of a "right which has been made specific either by the express terms of the Constitution or laws of the United States or by decisions interpreting them." Accordingly, when broad constitutional requirements, such as the ones under the Due Process Clause, have been "made specific" by the text or settled interpretations, willful violators "certainly are in no position to say that they had had no adequate advance notice that they would be visited with punishment." Thus, Screws limited the statute's coverage to rights fairly warned of, having been announced and defined by the time of the charged conduct.[177] More recently, in Lanier, involving the similar criminal provision of 18 U.S.C. Section 242, the Court held that not only its own opinions, but decisions of other courts, also could provide the required warning; and such precedents need not have been applied to a "fundamentally similar" factual situation.[178]

ii. Vagrancy Laws

[E64] The Court has struck down, as impermissibly vague, several "vagrancy" statutes, the common justification of which was to prevent "suspicious" persons from criminal activities. Lanzetta involved a criminal provision against "any person not engaged in any lawful occupation, known to be a member of any gang consisting of two or more persons." The statute was indefinite and uncertain as to the meaning of the word "gang" and the expression "known to be a member." And since it condemned no act or omission, it was found repugnant to the Due Process Clause.[179] Likewise, in Morales, a Chicago ordinance, prohibiting criminal street gang members from remaining in any public place with no apparent purpose, was held to violate the requirement that a legislature establish minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement; in particular, the ordinance failed to establish any standard for the police by which it could be judged if an individual had an "apparent purpose."[180]

[E65] Palmer was convicted of violating a municipal "suspicious person ordinance," that is, of being a "person who wanders about the streets or other public ways or who

---

176 United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 618 (1954). Nevertheless, the Court has no authority to construe the language of a state statute more narrowly than the state's highest court. See Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 61 (1999), citing Smiley v. Kansas, 196 U.S. 447, 455 (1905).

177 Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 104–05 (1945).

178 United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 268–70 (1997).

179 Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939).

180 Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999).

is found abroad at late or unusual hours in the night without any visible or lawful business and who does not give satisfactory account of himself." The ordinance was found unconstitutionally vague, as applied to Palmer, since it gave insufficient notice to the average person that discharging a friend at an apartment house and then talking on a car radio while parked on the street was enough to show him to be without any visible or lawful business.[181] In Papachristou, a similar ordinance was held void for vagueness, since it provided no standards governing the exercise of the discretion it granted. The Court pointed out that a "presumption that people who might walk or loaf or loiter or stroll or frequent houses where liquor is sold . . . or who look suspicious to the police are to become future criminals is too precarious for a rule of law."[182] In Kolender, the Court dealt with a California statute requiring persons who loiter or wander on the streets to identify themselves and to account for their presence when requested by a peace officer. The California court had defined "credible and reliable" identification as "carrying reasonable assurance that the identification is authentic and providing means for later getting in touch with the person who has identified himself." The statute, as drafted and as construed by the state court, was judged to be unconstitutionally vague on its face, because "it encourage[d] arbitrary enforcement, by failing to describe with sufficient particularity" what a suspect should do in order to provide a "credible and reliable" identification; although due process does not require "impossible standards" of clarity, "this was not a case where further precision in the statutory language [wa]s either impossible or impractical."[183]

iii. Restrictions on Expression—Generally

[E66] "[S]tricter standards of permissible statutory vagueness may be applied to a statute having a potentially inhibiting effect on speech; a man may the less be required to act at his peril here, because the free dissemination of ideas may be the loser."[184] For example, a penal law prohibiting distribution of a magazine, "principally made up of news or stories of criminal deeds of bloodshed or lust so massed as to become vehicles for inciting violent and depraved crimes" is impermissibly vague and indefinite.[185]

[E67] Goguen was convicted of violating the provision of the Massachusetts flag-misuse statute, for wearing a small U.S. flag sewn to the seat of his trousers; the provision at issue subjected to criminal liability anyone who publicly treated contemptuously the flag of the United States. Taking into consideration that casual treatment of the flag in many contexts had become a widespread phenomenon and that the foregoing controversial phrase was devoid of a narrowing state court interpretation at the relevant time

---

[181] Palmer v. City of Euclid, 402 U.S. 544 (1971) (per curiam).

[182] Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 171 (1972). The statute provided: "Rogues and vagabonds, or dissolute persons who go about begging; common gamblers, persons who use juggling or unlawful games or plays, common drunkards, common night walkers, thieves, pilferers or pickpockets, traders in stolen property, lewd, wanton and lascivious persons, keepers of gambling places, common railers and brawlers, persons wandering or strolling around from place to place without any lawful purpose or object, habitual loafers, disorderly persons, persons neglecting all lawful business and habitually spending their time by frequenting houses of ill fame, gaming houses, or places where alcoholic beverages are sold or served, persons able to work but habitually living upon the earnings of their wives or minor children shall be deemed vagrants and, upon conviction in the Municipal Court shall be punished."

[183] Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 362 (1983).

[184] Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 151 (1959).

[185] Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 518 (1948).

in the case, the Court recognized that the challenged statutory language was void for vagueness, since, by failing "to draw reasonably clear lines between the kinds of nonceremonial treatment of the flag that [we]re criminal and those that [we]re not," it did not provide adequate warning of forbidden conduct, and set forth "a standard so indefinite that police, court, and jury were free to react to nothing more than their own preferences for treatment of the flag."[186]

iv. Breach of the Peace—"Fighting" Words

[E68] The Court has upheld, as sufficiently definite, a statute that punishes the use in a public place of offensive words directly tending to cause a breach of the peace by provoking the addressee to acts of violence.[187] Conversely, a state law, providing that "any person who shall, without provocation, use to or of another, and in his presence . . . opprobrious words or abusive language, tending to cause a breach of the peace . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor" that has not been narrowed by the state courts to apply only to "fighting" words, "which by their very utterance . . . tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace," is on its face unconstitutionally vague.[188] Similarly, a conviction for criminal libel, defined at trial as the publication of a writing calculated to disturb the peace, may not stand, for it is based on an unconstitutionally vague standard, which "involves calculations as to the boiling point of a particular person or a particular group, not an appraisal of the nature of the comments per se."[189]

[E69] Grayned concerned an ordinance that prohibited persons near schools from "disturbing the peace" of the schools. The Court held that, given the "particular context" of the ordinance, it gave fair notice of its scope: "although the prohibited quantum of disturbance is not specified in the ordinance, it is apparent from the statute's announced purpose that the measure is whether normal school activity has been or is about to be disrupted."[190] Moreover, in Kovacs, the plurality rejected a vagueness challenge to a city ordinance forbidding "loud and raucous" sound amplification, noting that these "abstract words ha[d] through daily use acquired a content that convey[ed] to any interested person a sufficiently accurate concept of what [wa]s forbidden."[191]

v. Protection of Public Morals—Obscenity Laws[192]

[E70] A criminal statute, inhibiting conspiracy "to commit acts injurious to public morals," does not provide reasonable standards of guilt and may lead to conviction for agreement to do almost any act that a judge and jury might find contrary to his or its

---

186 Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566, 574, 578 (1973).

187 Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 573 (1942). The appellations "damned racketeer" and "damned Fascist" are epithets likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace. Id. at 574.

188 Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518, 525–28 (1972).

189 Ashton v. Kentucky, 384 U.S. 195, 200 (1966). Cf. Edwards v. S. Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 236–38 (1963).

190 Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 112 (1972). Likewise, a statute permitting dispersal of congregations directed at an embassy, when the police reasonably believe that the embassy's "security or peace" is threatened, "is crafted for a particular context, and, given that context, it is apparent that the prohibited quantum of disturbance is whether normal embassy activities have been or are about to be disrupted. The statute communicates its reach in words of common understanding." See Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 332 (1988).

191 Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 79, 87–89 (1949).

192 See also paras. E86, I135.

notions of what was good for morals or order.[193] Still, a statute proscribing "crime against nature" was held not unconstitutionally vague as applied to cunnilingus.[194]

[E71] Moreover, on various occasions, the Court upheld obscenity laws against a due process challenge that the definitions of obscenity were too vague.[195] In Roth,[196] the leading case in the area, a federal statute (18 U.S.C. Section 1461) made punishable the mailing of material that was "obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy . . . or other publication of an indecent character" and a California statute criminalized the keeping, for sale or advertising, material that was "obscene or indecent." Although the Court recognized that such terms were not precise, nevertheless, it noted that these words, applied according to the proper standard for judging obscenity, specified by the Court,[197] gave adequate warning of the conduct proscribed; the fact that there might be marginal cases in which it would be difficult to determine the side of the line on which a particular fact situation fell was no sufficient reason to hold the language too ambiguous to define a criminal offense. Besides, the possibility that different juries might reach different conclusions as to the same material did not render the statutes unconstitutional.[198] This approach was implicitly affirmed by a five-member majority in Paris Adult Theatre.[199] There, three members of the Court, in dissent, noted that the relative standards established by the Court, such as "prurient interest," "patent offensiveness," or "serious literary value," constituted "indefinite concepts," the meaning of which "necessarily varies with the experience, outlook, and even idiosyncrasies of the person defining them," and suggested that limitation of the state regulatory power to the distribution of sexually oriented material to juveniles and offensive exposure of such material to unconsenting adults would introduce a large measure of clarity to this area.[200]

---

193 Musser v. Utah, 333 U.S. 95 (1948).

194 Rose v. Locke, 423 U.S. 48 (1975) (per curiam).

195 Obscene material is not protected by the First Amendment. See, e.g., Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 23 (1973).

196 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 491 (1957).

197 In Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 489 (1957), the Court held that the standard for judging obscenity, adequate to withstand the charge of constitutional infirmity, was "whether, to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material, taken as a whole, appeal[ed] to prurient interest." Under Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973), the appropriate standard is "(a) whether the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." Miller disavowed the "utterly without redeeming social value" test of Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 419 (1966). In Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 116–17 (1974), the Court held that Miller's rejection of Memoirs' "social value" formulation did not mean that 18 U.S.C. Section 1461 was unconstitutionally vague at the time of petitioners' convictions, because it did not provide them with sufficient guidance as to the proper test of "social value," since that formula had been rejected not for vagueness reasons but because it departed from Roth's obscenity definition and entailed a virtually impossible prosecutorial burden.

198 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 492, n.30 (1957) ("it is common experience that different juries may reach different results under any criminal statute"). See also Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 26, n.9 (1973); Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 309 (1977).

199 Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973).

200 Id. at 84, 113–14.

vi. Prohibition of Assemblies[201]

[E72] A state statute, prohibiting picketing near a courthouse, certainly lacks specificity in the word "near." Nevertheless, this lack of specificity may not render the statute unconstitutionally vague, "at least as applied to a demonstration within the sight and hearing of those in the courthouse."[202] On the contrary, an ordinance making it a criminal offense for three or more persons to assemble on any of the sidewalks and there conduct themselves in a manner "annoying" to persons passing by, which has not been narrowed by any construction of the state courts, is on its face unconstitutionally vague, in the sense that no standard of "annoying" conduct is specified at all.[203]

vii. Anti-Communist Criminal Legislation—Loyalty Oaths

[E73] The issue of clarity also arose with respect to anti-Communist laws. The Smith Act, making it a crime for any person knowingly or willfully to advocate the overthrow or destruction of the government of the United States by force or violence, to organize or help to organize any group that does so, or to conspire to do so, was held not to violate the Fifth Amendment because of indefiniteness.[204]

[E74] An oath of office may not be so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application. If the meaning of the required oath is vague and uncertain, the state cannot, consistently with the Due Process Clause, force an employee either to take such an oath, at the risk of subsequent prosecution for perjury or face immediate dismissal from public service. "Concern for vagueness in the oath cases has been especially great because uncertainty as to an oath's meaning may deter individuals from engaging in constitutionally protected activity conceivably within the scope of the oath."[205] Cramp involved an oath "that I have not and will not lend my aid, support, advice, counsel or influence to the Communist Party." The provision of such an oath, which says nothing of advocacy of violent overthrow of state or federal government, completely lacks in terms "susceptible of objective measurement."[206] Similarly, the Court has invalidated an oath requiring a state teacher to swear that he is not one who commits an act or who advises, teaches, abets, or advocates, by any means, another person to commit or aid in the commission of any act intended to overthrow or alter, or to assist the overthrow or alteration, of the constitutional form of government by revolution, force, or violence.[207] An oath exacting a prom-

---

[201] See also para. E69.

[202] Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 568 (1965). Such a provision implies "a degree of on-the-spot administrative interpretation by officials charged with responsibility for administering and enforcing it. . . . This administrative discretion to construe the term 'near' concerns a limited control of the streets and other areas in the immediate vicinity of the courthouse, and is the type of narrow discretion which th[e] Court recognizes as the proper role of responsible officials in making determinations concerning the time, place, duration, and manner of demonstrations." Id. at 568–69.

[203] Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611, 614 (1971).

[204] Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 516 (1951).

[205] Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676, 681 (1972)

[206] Cramp v. Bd. of Pub. Instruction, 368 U.S. 278, 286 (1961). For example, could one who had ever cast his vote for a Communist Party candidate safely subscribe to this legislative oath? Or could a journalist who had ever defended the constitutional rights of the Communist Party conscientiously take an oath that he had never lent the Party his "support"? Id. at 286.

[207] Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 367–70 (1964).

ise that the affiant will "by precept and example, promote respect for the flag and the institutions of the United States of America and the State of Washington . . . and undivided allegiance to the government of the United States" equally offends due process because of vagueness. The range of activities, which are or might be deemed inconsistent with the required promise, is very wide indeed. "Even criticism of the design or color scheme of the state flag or unfavorable comparison of it with that of a sister State or foreign country could be deemed disrespectful, and therefore violative of the oath. And what are 'institutions' for the purposes of this oath? . . . It is likewise difficult to ascertain what might be done without transgressing the promise to 'promote undivided allegiance to the government of the United States.'"[208]

[E75] The Constitution clearly permits the requirement of oaths by officeholders to uphold the Constitution itself (compare Article II, Section 1, Clause 8, Article VI, Clause 3). An oath that contains a promise "to oppose the overthrow of the government of the United States of America or of this Commonwealth by force, violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional method" has been upheld as "a commitment not to use illegal and constitutionally unprotected force to change the constitutional system."[209]

viii. Contempt of a Congressional Investigatory Committee

[E76] The law may make it a crime for any person, summoned as a witness by either House of Congress or a committee thereof, to refuse to answer "any question pertinent to the question under inquiry." In such a case, fundamental fairness demands that the witness be informed "what the topic under inquiry is and the connective reasoning whereby the precise questions asked relate to it." Due process requires that a witness before a congressional investigating committee should not be compelled to decide, at peril of criminal prosecution, whether to answer questions propounded to him without first knowing the "question under inquiry" "with the same degree of explicitness and clarity that the Due Process Clause requires in the expression of any element of a criminal offense."[210]

ix. Abortion Laws

[E77] Furthermore, the Court has been presented with the "void for vagueness" question in the field of abortion laws. A state statute making abortions criminal, unless done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or "health," is not unconstitutionally vague. The term "health," in accord "with general usage and modern understanding," includes psychological as well as physical well-being and, as thus construed, cannot be deemed as overly vague; indeed, "whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a professional judgment that physicians are obvi-

---

[208] Id. at 371.

[209] Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676, 684 (1972). The Court noted that, since violation of the oath was punishable only by a prosecution for perjury and, since perjury is a knowing and willful falsehood, the constitutional vice of punishment without fair warning could not occur there.

[210] Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 215, 209 (1957). There the Court found that the meaning of "un-American" propaganda activities in the resolution defining the Committee's authority was so vague that it was "difficult to imagine a less explicit authorizing resolution." Likewise, the Chairman's statement that the Sub-Committee was investigating "subversion and subversive propaganda" was woefully inadequate to convey sufficient information as to the pertinency of the questions to the topic under inquiry, since this was a subject at least as broad and indefinite as the authorizing resolution of the Committee.

ously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered."[211] Likewise, a statutory requirement that a physician's decision to perform an abortion must rest upon "his best clinical judgment" of its necessity is not unconstitutionally vague, since that judgment "may be exercised in the light of all factors—physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age—relevant to the wellbeing of the patient."[212]

[E78] The case is thought to be different if a criminal law requires every person who performs an abortion to make a determination "based on his experience, judgment or professional competence" that the fetus is not viable; and if such person determines that the fetus "is viable," or "if there is sufficient reason to believe that the fetus may be viable," then he must exercise the same care to preserve the fetus' life and health as would be required in the case of a fetus intended to be born alive, and must use the abortion technique providing the best opportunity for the fetus to be aborted alive, so long as a different technique is not necessary to preserve the mother's life or health. The viability determination requirement contains a double ambiguity. "First, it is unclear whether the statute imports a purely subjective standard, or whether it imposes a mixed subjective and objective standard. . . . In other words, it is ambiguous whether there must be 'sufficient reason' from the perspective of the judgment, skill, and training of the attending physician, or 'sufficient reason' from the perspective of a cross-section of the medical community or a panel of experts. . . . Second, it is uncertain whether the phrase 'may be viable' simply refers to viability, as that term has been defined in Roe . . . [potential ability of the fetus to live outside the mother's womb, albeit with artificial aid] or whether it refers to an undefined penumbral or 'gray' area prior to the stage of viability. . . . The vagueness of the viability determination requirement is compounded by the fact that the statute subjects the physician to potential criminal liability without regard to fault. . . . [T]he standard of care provision is [likewise] impermissibly ague. . . . It is uncertain whether the statute permits the physician to consider his duty to the patient to be paramount to his duty to the fetus, or whether it requires the physician to make a 'trade-off' between the woman's health and additional percentage points of fetal survival. . . . [W]here conflicting duties of this magnitude are involved, the State, at the least, must proceed with greater precision before it may subject a physician to possible criminal sanctions."[213]

[E79] The Court also has struck down, as impermissibly vague, a penal statute that requires physicians performing abortions to ensure that fetal remains are disposed of in a humane and sanitary manner. The phrase "humane and sanitary" did suggest a possible intent to mandate some sort of decent burial of an embryo at the earliest stages of formation. However, this level of uncertainty is fatal for statutes imposing criminal liability.[214]

x. Economic Regulation[215]

[E80] The early cases dealing with the issue of vagueness involved criminal statutes regulating economic affairs. In Cohen Grocery, a due process attack was mounted upon

---

[211] United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62, 71–72 (1971).

[212] Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 192 (1973).

[213] Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 391, 394, 397, 400–01 (1979).

[214] Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc. (Akron I), 462 U.S. 416, 451 (1983).

[215] It must be reminded that economic regulation is subject to a less strict vagueness standard. See para. E61.

a section of the Food Control Act of 1917 that attached a penalty of fine or imprisonment to the making by any person of "any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries" and was construed as forbidding and penalizing the exaction of an excessive price upon the sale of a commodity. The Court invalidated the section, since its words fixed no ascertainable standard of guilt and forbade no specific or definite act.[216] Similarly in Connally, a state criminal statute imposing severe punishments upon contractors with the state who paid their workmen less than the "current rate of per diem wages in the locality" where the work was performed, was held void for vagueness. The provision presented a double uncertainty, fatal to its validity. In the first place, the words "current rate of wages" did not "denote a specific or definite sum, but minimum, maximum, and intermediate amounts, indeterminately, varying from time to time and dependent upon the class and kind of work done." In the second place, additional obscurity was imparted to the statute by the use of the qualifying word "locality," for no one could say with accuracy what areas constituted the locality where a given piece of work was being done; in other connections or under other conditions, the term "locality" might be definite enough, but not so in such a statute.[217] Conversely, an Act making it a crime, by the use or threat of use of force, violence, intimidation, or duress, to coerce, compel, or constrain or attempt to coerce, compel, or constrain a radio broadcasting licensee to employ or agree to employ, in connection with the conduct of the licensee's broadcasting business, any person or persons "in excess of the number of employees needed by such licensee to perform actual services," was not found so vague, indefinite or uncertain as to violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[218]

[E81] In Boyce Motor Lines, the Court considered a statute that punished anyone who "knowingly" violated a regulation requiring trucks transporting dangerous items to avoid "so far as practicable . . . driving into or through congested thoroughfares, places where crowds are assembled, street car tracks, tunnels, viaducts, and dangerous crossings." The Court read "knowingly" to mean that the driver knew that there was such a practicable, safer route, and yet deliberately took the more dangerous route through the tunnel, or that he willfully neglected to exercise his duty under the regulation to inquire into the availability of such an alternative route. Furthermore it stressed that "safer practicable route" was not an expression too vague to be understood, for it found adequate interpretation in common usage and understanding. Consequently, it rejected a vagueness challenge against the statute.[219]

[E82] A law criminalizing the selling of goods at "unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor" is not unconstitutionally vague or indefinite as applied to sales made below cost without any "legitimate commercial objective, such as the liquidation of excess, obsolete or perishable merchandise, or the need to meet a lawful, equally low price of a competitor," and with specific predatory intent.[220] Likewise, a state statute that generally prohibits the sale on Sunday of all merchandise, but exempts, inter alia, the retail sale of "merchandise essential to, or customarily sold at, or incidental to, the operation of" bathing beaches, amusement parks,

---

216 United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U.S. 81, 89 (1921).

217 Connally v. Gen. Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 393–95 (1926).

218 United States v. Petrillo, 332 U.S. 1, 6–8 (1947).

219 Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 340–42 (1952).

220 United States v. Nat'l Dairy Prods. Corp., 372 U.S. 29, 36–37 (1963).

etc., is not so vague as to violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, since "business people of ordinary intelligence . . . would be able to know what exceptions are encompassed by the statute either as a matter of ordinary commercial knowledge or by simply making a reasonable investigation at a nearby bathing beach or amusement park within the county."[221]

[E83] More recently the Court dealt with a federal law providing that it is unlawful for any person to knowingly make use of the services of the Postal Service or other interstate conveyance as part of a scheme to sell "drug paraphernalia," defined as any equipment "primarily intended or designed for use" in consuming specified illegal drugs, "such as . . . ," followed by a list of 15 items constituting per se drug paraphernalia and another list of eight objective factors that might be considered "in addition to all other logically relevant factors" in "determining whether an item constitutes drug paraphernalia." The provision was not found unconstitutionally vague as applied to persons convicted of using an inter-state conveyance as part of a scheme to sell, among other things, pipes, bongs, scales, roach clips, and drug diluents, since the statute was sufficiently determinate with respect to the items it listed as constituting per se drug paraphernalia, including many of the items involved in the specific case, set forth objective criteria for assessing whether items constituted drug paraphernalia, and since the scienter requirement assisted in avoiding any vagueness problem. However, the Court added that application of the challenged provision to multiple-use items—such as scales, razor blades, and mirrors—might raise more serious concerns, for such items can be used for legitimate, as well as illegitimate, purposes, and a certain degree of ambiguity necessarily surrounds their classification.[222]

xi. Military Rules

[E84] "The fundamental necessity for obedience, and the consequent necessity for imposition of discipline, may render permissible within the military that which would be constitutionally impermissible outside it."[223] For the reasons that differentiate military from civilian society, Congress is permitted to legislate "both with greater breadth and with greater flexibility" when prescribing rules for the former than when prescrib-

---

[221] McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 428 (1961).

[222] Posters 'n' Things, Ltd. v. United States, 511 U.S. 513, 526 (1994). Compare Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 499–503 (1982), involving an ordinance that required a business to obtain a license if it sold any items that were "designed or marketed for use with illegal cannabis or drugs" and provided guidelines for defining such items. There, the Court rejected the facial vagueness challenge, because appellee did not show that the ordinance was impermissibly vague in all of its applications. The ordinance's language "designed . . . for use" was not found unconstitutionally vague on its face, since it was clear that such standard encompassed at least an item that was principally used with illegal drugs by virtue of its objective features, i.e., features designed by the manufacturer. As to the "marketed for use" standard, the guidelines referred to the display of paraphernalia and to the proximity of covered items to otherwise uncovered items, and thus that standard required scienter on the part of the retailer. Under this test, appellee had ample warning that its marketing activities required a license, and by displaying a certain magazine and certain books dealing with illegal drugs physically close to pipes and colored rolling paper, it was in clear violation of the guidelines, as it was in selling "roach clips."

[223] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 758 (1974). See also Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25, 38 (1976) (much of the conduct proscribed by the military is not "criminal" conduct in the civilian sense of the word).

ing rules for the latter.[224] The Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) "cannot be equated to a civilian criminal code. It . . . regulate[s] aspects of the conduct of members of the military which in the civilian sphere are left unregulated. While a civilian criminal code carves out a relatively small segment of potential conduct and declares it criminal, the Uniform Code of Military Justice essays more varied regulation of a much larger segment of the activities of the more tightly knit military community."[225] A provision of the UCMJ is void for vagueness if one "could not reasonably understand that his contemplated conduct is proscribed. . . . In determining the sufficiency of the notice, [the] statute must . . . be examined in the light of the conduct with which a defendant is charged."[226]

[E85] In Parker v. Levy, the Court dealt with a conviction based on Articles 133 and 134 of the UCMJ, which punish a commissioned officer for "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" and for "all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces." Each provision had been construed by the U.S. Court of Military Appeals or by other military authorities so as to limit its scope (e.g., the reach of Article 134 had been limited to conduct that was "directly and palpably prejudicial to good order and discipline," and Article 133 had been interpreted as inhibiting any conduct that offended "so seriously against law, justice, morality or decorum as to expose to disgrace, socially or as a man, the offender, and at the same time [wa]s of such a nature or committed under such circumstances as to bring dishonor or disrepute upon the military profession"), thus narrowing the very broad reach of the literal language of the articles. At the same time the Manual for Courts-Martial supplied considerable specificity by way of examples of the conduct that these articles covered (e.g., examples of punishable acts under Article 134 were utterances designed to promote disloyalty or disaffection among troops, as praising the enemy, attacking the war aims of the United States, or denouncing the American form of government). Subsequently the Court held that Articles 133 and 134 were not unconstitutionally vague, as applied to an officer convicted for making public statements urging African-American enlisted men to refuse to obey orders to go to Vietnam and referring to Special Forces personnel as "liars and thieves," "killers of peasants," and "murderers of women and children." Indeed, Levy could have had no reasonable doubt that his statements were punishable under the above rules.[227]

2. In the Civil Context

[E86] Regardless of whether a statute permitting the deprivation of one' s property or liberty is "penal" or "civil," it must meet the due process requirement of sufficient definiteness.[228] The elementary notion of fairness enshrined in the Court's constitu-

---

[224] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 756 (1974).

[225] Id. at 749.

[226] Id. at 757, quoting United States v. Nat'l Dairy Prods. Corp., 372 U.S. 29, 32–33 (1963).

[227] Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 752–57 (1974).

[228] See Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402 (1966). A state law permitting jurors to "determine, by their verdict, whether the [acquitted] defendant shall pay the costs" and providing for his commitment to jail in default of payment or security, is unconstitutionally vague; and the absence of any statutory standards is not cured by judicial interpretations that allow juries to impose costs on a defendant where they find the defendant's conduct, though not unlawful, was "reprehensible" or "improper," or where the jury finds that the defendant committed "some misconduct." Id. at 403–04.

tional jurisprudence dictates that a person receives fair notice of the conduct that will subject him to punishment and the severity of the penalty that a state may impose also in the civil context. Although "[t]he strict constitutional safeguards afforded to criminal defendants are not applicable to civil cases, . . . the basic protection against 'judgments without notice' afforded by the Due Process Clause, . . . is implicated by civil penalties."[229] The Court has "expressed greater tolerance of enactments with civil, rather than criminal, penalties because the consequences of imprecision are qualitatively less severe."[230] In this context, the Court has held, that, "[g]iven the school's need to be able to impose disciplinary sanctions for a wide range of unanticipated conduct disruptive of the educational process, the school disciplinary rules need not be as detailed as a criminal code" and found that two days' suspension from school "does not rise to the level of a penal sanction calling for the full panoply of due process protections applicable to a criminal prosecution."[231]

E. OTHER DUE PROCESS RESTRICTIONS

1. In the Criminal Context

a. Entrapment

[E87] "[T]here can be no dispute that the Government may use undercover agents to enforce the law. 'It is well settled that the fact that officers or employees of the Government merely afford opportunities or facilities for the commission of the offense does not defeat the prosecution. Artifice and stratagem may be employed to catch those engaged in criminal enterprises.'"[232] "In their zeal to enforce the law, however, Government agents may not originate a criminal design, implant in an innocent person's mind the disposition to commit a criminal act, and then induce commission of the crime so that the Government may prosecute."[233] "[A] valid entrapment defense has two related elements: government inducement of the crime and a lack of predis-

---

[229] BMW of N. America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 574, n.22 (1996). Three guideposts, each of which indicated that BMW had not received adequate notice of the magnitude of the sanction that Alabama might impose to it for not advising its dealers, and hence their customers, of pre-delivery damage to new cars, when the cost of repair did not exceed 3 percent of the car's suggested retail price, led the Court to the conclusion that the award against BMW of punitive damages 500 times the amount of the actual harm was grossly excessive: "the degree of reprehensibility of the nondisclosure; the disparity between the harm or potential harm suffered by Gore and his punitive damages award; and the difference between this remedy and the civil penalties authorized or imposed in comparable cases." Id. at 574.

[230] Vill. of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 498–99, n.13 (1982), citing Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 515 (1948) ("[t]he standards of certainty in statutes punishing for offenses is higher than in those depending primarily upon civil sanction for enforcement").

[231] Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 686 (1986). The Court also found that the school disciplinary rule proscribing "obscene" language and the pre-speech admonitions of teachers had given adequate warning to Fraser that his lewd speech could subject him to sanctions.

[232] Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540, 548 (1992), quoting Sorrells v. United States, 287 U.S. 435, 442 (1932).

[233] Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540, 548 (1992), citing Sorrells v. United States, 287 U.S. 435, 442 (1932); Sherman v. United States, 356 U.S. 369, 372 (1958).

position on the part of the defendant to engage in the criminal conduct."[234] "Where the Government has induced an individual to break the law and the defense of entrapment is at issue, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant was an 'unwary criminal' who readily availed himself of the opportunity to perpetrate the crime."[235] Yet, that kind of defense is not of a constitutional dimension.[236] Therefore, "Congress may address itself to the question and adopt any substantive definition of the defense that it may find desirable."[237]

[E88] However, the Constitution does not tolerate the conviction of persons who were affirmatively misled by the responsible administrative agency into believing that the law did not apply in their situation. In Raley, the Court held that "due process precluded the conviction of individuals for refusing to answer questions asked by a state investigating commission which itself had erroneously provided assurances, express or implied, that the defendants had a privilege under state law to refuse to answer."[238] Similarly in Cox, it was held that "an individual could not be punished for demonstrating 'near' a courthouse where the highest police officials of the city had advised the demonstrators that they could meet where they did without violating the statutory proscription against demonstrations 'near' the courthouse."[239] In both cases the Court emphasized that to sustain the challenged convictions "would be to sanction an indefensible sort of entrapment by the State—convicting a citizen for exercising a privilege which the State had clearly told him was available to him," in violation of the Due Process Clause.[240]

b. Arbitrary Penalties

[E89] A person who has been convicted for a crime is eligible for, and the court may impose, whatever punishment is authorized by statute for his offense[241] "so long as that penalty is not cruel and unusual . . . and so long as the penalty is not based on an arbitrary distinction that would violate the Due Process Clause. In this context, . . . an argu-

---

[234] Mathews v. United States, 485 U.S. 58, 63 (1988). In that case the Court held that, "even if the defendant in a federal criminal case denies one or more elements of the crime, he is entitled to an entrapment instruction whenever there is sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could find entrapment." Id. at 62.

[235] Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540, 548–49 (1992).

[236] United States v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423, 433 (1973).

[237] Id.

[238] See United States v. Caceres, 440 U.S. 741, 753, n.15 (1979), discussing Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423, 437–38 (1959).

[239] See United States v. Caceres, 440 U.S. 741, 753, n.15 (1979), discussing Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965).

[240] Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423, 426 (1959); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 571 (1965).

[241] "Legislatures have extremely broad discretion . . . in setting the range of permissible punishments for each offense." See Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001). It is not impermissible for judges to exercise discretion in imposing a sentence within the range prescribed by statute. See, e.g., Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466, 481 (2000). Judicial decisions that operate within the legislatively enacted guidelines are typically reviewed for abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001).

ment founded on equal protection essentially duplicates an argument based on due process."[242]

[E90] In Chapman, petitioners were convicted for selling ten sheets (1,000 doses) of blotter paper containing LSD (a pure dose of LSD is so small that it must be sold to retail customers in a "carrier" created by dissolving pure LSD and, inter alia, spraying the resulting solution on paper), in violation of 21 U.S.C. Section 841, which called for a five-year mandatory minimum sentence for the offense of distributing more than one gram of "a mixture or substance containing a detectable amount" of LSD. Although petitioners' pure LSD weighed only 50 milligrams, the district court included the total weight of the paper and LSD, 5.7 grams, in calculating their sentences, thus requiring the imposition of the mandatory minimum sentence. The Court held that this statutory construction was not unconstitutional. Determining the lengths of sentences in accordance with the LSD carrier's weight was not arbitrary and, thus, did not violate due process. The penalty scheme was intended to punish severely large-volume drug traffickers at any level, and it increased the penalty for such persons by measuring the quantity of the drugs according to their street weight in the diluted form in which they were sold, not their active component's net weight. Thus, it was rational for Congress to set penalties based on the weight of blotter paper, the chosen tool of the trade for those trafficking in LSD. Congress was also justified in seeking to avoid arguments about the accurate weight of pure drugs that might have been extracted from the paper if it had chosen to calibrate sentences according to that weight. And, since the blotter paper seemed to be the carrier of choice, the vast majority of cases would do exactly what the sentencing scheme was designed to do—punish more heavily those dealing in larger amounts of drugs.[243]

c. Mandatory Non-Capital Sentences[244]

[E91] The legislature "has the power to define criminal punishments without giving the courts any sentencing discretion."[245] A sentencing scheme providing for "individualized sentences rests not on constitutional commands, but on public policy enacted into statutes."[246] Hence, a statute imposing a fixed sentence for distributing any quantity of LSD, in any form, without considering individual degrees of culpability, would clearly be constitutional.[247]

---

[242] Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 465 (1991), citing Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 362, n.10 (1983).

[243] Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 464–66 (1991).

[244] Mandatory death penalty statutes are unconstitutional. See para. E112. With respect to mandatory life sentence schemes, see paras. E134, E136–E139.

[245] Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 467 (1991), citing ex parte United States, 242 U.S. 27 (1916).

[246] Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 467 (1991), quoting Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 604–05 (1978) (plurality opinion).

[247] See Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 467 (1991).

d. Conditions of Imprisonment

[E92] A prisoner has a constitutionally protected interest in not being arbitrarily subjected to unwelcome medical treatment.[248] Apart from that, challenged prison conditions cannot give rise to a due process violation unless those conditions constitute "atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."[249] A 30-day disciplinary segregation for misconduct has been held not to fall within this standard.[250]

2. In the Civil or Quasi-Criminal Context

a. In General

[E93] The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause makes the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against excessive fines applicable to the states; the Due Process Clause, of its own force, also prohibits the states from imposing "grossly excessive" punishments on tort-feasors.[251] In the same context, it has been held that the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses protect individuals from sanctions that are "downright irrational."[252]

[E94] In early cases, the Court stated that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposed substantive limits beyond which penalties might not go[253] and that it would not review state action fixing the penalties for unlawful conduct unless the fines imposed were "so grossly excessive as to amount to a deprivation of property without due process of law."[254] Indeed, in Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Co., the Court set aside a penalty imposed on a telephone company, on the ground that, since there was no intentional wrongdoing, no departure from any prescribed or known standard of action, and no reckless conduct on the part of the company, the penalty was so "plainly arbitrary and oppressive" as to violate the Due Process Clause.[255]

b. Excessive Punitive Damages[256]

[E95] Although compensatory damages and punitive damages are typically awarded at the same time by the same decisionmaker, they serve distinct purposes. The former

---

[248] Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 493 (1980); Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 221–22 (1990).

[249] Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484 (1995). See also McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24, 37 (2002).

[250] Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 485–87 (1995). The Court found that the disciplinary punishment at issue did not work a major disruption in Conner's environment.

[251] Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 433 (2001), citing BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 562 (1996) and TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Res. Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 453–55 (1993) (plurality opinion).

[252] Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 103 (1997).

[253] Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U.S. 73, 78 (1907). See also St. Louis I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 251 U.S. 63, 66–67 (1919); Standard Oil Co. of Indiana v. Missouri, 224 U.S. 270, 286 (1912). In each of those cases, the Court actually found no constitutional violation.

[254] Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 212 U.S. 86, 111 (1909).

[255] Sw. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Danaher, 238 U.S. 482, 490–91 (1915).

[256] The Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment does not apply to punitive damages awards in cases between private parties and does not constrain such an award when the

"are intended to redress the concrete loss that the plaintiff has suffered by reason of the defendant's wrongful conduct."[257] The latter, which have been described as "quasi-criminal,"[258] "operate as 'private fines' intended to punish the defendant and to deter future wrongdoing."[259] "Although these awards serve the same purposes as criminal penalties, defendants subjected to punitive damages in civil cases have not been accorded the protections applicable in a criminal proceeding."[260] Thus, "punitive damages pose an acute danger of arbitrary deprivation of property," which is "heightened when the decisionmaker is presented with evidence having little bearing on the amount that should be awarded."[261]

[E96] "While States possess discretion over the imposition of punitive damages, it is well established that there are substantive constitutional limitations on these awards."[262] The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits the imposition of grossly excessive or arbitrary punishments on tort-feasors.[263] "To the extent an award is grossly excessive, it furthers no legitimate purpose and constitutes an arbitrary deprivation of property."[264] In deciding whether the relevant constitutional line has been crossed, courts reviewing punitive damages must consider three guideposts:

(1) the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's misconduct;

(2) the disparity between the actual or potential harm suffered by the plaintiff and the punitive damages award; and

(3) the difference between the punitive damages awarded by the jury and the civil penalties authorized or imposed in comparable cases.[265] government neither has prosecuted the action nor has any right to recover a share of the damages awarded. See Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vermont, Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 262–76 (1989).

---

257 Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001).

258 See Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting); Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 54 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

259 Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001), citing Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974). "A jury's assessment of the extent of a plaintiff's injury is essentially a factual determination, whereas its imposition of punitive damages is an expression of its moral condemnation." See Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001).

260 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 417 (2003).

261 Id. at 417–18.

262 Id. at 416.

263 The reason is that "elementary notions of fairness . . . dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose." See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 574 (1996), quoted in State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 417 (2003).

264 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 417 (2003).

265 BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 575 (1996); State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 418 (2003). Due process guarantees judicial review of the amount awarded. See Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 432 (1994). Appellate courts should apply a de novo standard when reviewing trial court determinations of the constitutionality of punitive damages awards. See Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 436 (2001).

[E97] "[T]he most important indicium of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award is the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct."[266] In making this determination, courts must inquire whether: "the harm caused was physical as opposed to economic; the tortious conduct evinced an indifference to or a reckless disregard of the health or safety of others; the target of the conduct had financial vulnerability; the conduct involved repeated actions or was an isolated incident; and the harm was the result of intentional malice, trickery, or deceit, or mere accident."[267] "The existence of any one of these factors weighing in favor of a plaintiff may not be sufficient to sustain a punitive damages award; and the absence of all of them renders any award suspect. It should be presumed a plaintiff has been made whole for his injuries by compensatory damages, so punitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant's culpability, after having paid compensatory damages, is so reprehensible as to warrant the imposition of further sanctions to achieve punishment or deterrence."[268] "A State cannot punish a defendant for conduct that may have been lawful where it occurred. . . . Nor, as a general rule, does a State have a legitimate concern in imposing punitive damages to punish a defendant for unlawful acts committed outside of the State's jurisdiction. . . . Lawful out-of-state conduct may be probative when it demonstrates the deliberateness and culpability of the defendant's action in the State where it is tortious, but that conduct must have a nexus to the specific harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . . A defendant's dissimilar acts, independent from the acts upon which liability was premised, may not serve as the basis for punitive damages. A defendant should be punished for the conduct that harmed the plaintiff, not for being an unsavory individual or business. Due process does not permit courts, in the calculation of punitive damages, to adjudicate the merits of other parties' hypothetical claims against a defendant under the guise of the reprehensibility analysis. . . . [And although] repeated misconduct is more reprehensible than an individual instance of malfeasance, . . . in the context of civil actions, courts must ensure the conduct in question replicates the prior transgressions."[269]

[E98] With respect to the second guidepost (the disparity between the actual or potential harm suffered by the plaintiff and the punitive damages award), the Court has observed that "single-digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process, while still achieving the State's goals of deterrence and retribution, than awards with ratios in range . . . of 145 to 1."[270] "Nonetheless, because there are no rigid benchmarks that a punitive damages award may not surpass, ratios greater than [four-to-one] may comport with due process where 'a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages.'"[271] A higher ratio may also be justified in cases in which "the injury is hard to detect or the monetary value of noneconomic harm might have been difficult to determine."[272] "The converse is also true, however. When compensatory damages are substantial, then a lesser ratio, perhaps only equal to compensatory

---

266 BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 575 (1996).

267 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 419 (2003), citing BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 576–77 (1996).

268 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 419 (2003), citing BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 575 (1996).

269 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 421–23 (2003).

270 Id. at 425.

271 State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 425 (2003), quoting BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 582 (1996).

272 BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 582 (1996).

damages, can reach the outermost limit of the due process guarantee."[273] Furthermore, it must be taken into account that compensatory damages for emotional distress already contain a punitive element.[274] Besides, the wealth of a defendant may provide "an open-ended basis for inflating awards, . . . [but it] cannot make up for the failure of other factors, such as reprehensibility, to constrain significantly an award that purports to punish a defendant's conduct."[275]

[E99] The third guidepost is the disparity between the punitive damages award and the civil penalties authorized or imposed in comparable cases. In Haslip, the Court also looked to criminal penalties that could be imposed.[276] "The existence of a criminal penalty does have bearing on the seriousness with which a State views the wrongful action. When used to determine the dollar amount of the award, however, the criminal penalty has less utility. . . . Punitive damages are not a substitute for the criminal process, and the remote possibility of a criminal sanction does not automatically sustain a punitive damages award."[277]

[E100] In Haslip, the Court declared that imposing exemplary damages on an insurance corporation, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, when one of its agents commits intentional fraud within the scope of his employment, is not fundamentally unfair, for it rationally advances the state's interest in deterring fraud and creates a strong financial incentive for vigilance by insurers. In that case, the Court upheld a punitive damages award that was more than four times the amount of compensatory damages and more than 200 times the out-of-pocket hospital expenses of respondent Haslip, noting that, while the monetary comparisons were wide and might be close to the constitutional line, the challenged award "did not lack objective criteria."[278]

[E101] In TXO, the Court considered a punitive award of $10 million, which was 526 times greater than the amount of actual damages awarded. In upholding the challenged judgment, the plurality remarked that petitioner's malicious behavior was part of a larger pattern of fraud, trickery, and deceit. Furthermore, it relied heavily on the harm to the victim that would have ensued if the tortious plan had succeeded, that is the potential harm that might have resulted from the defendant's conduct and also took account of the fact that TXO was a large, wealthy company.[279]

[E102] Gore involved a punitive award of $2 million, whereas compensatory damages were $4,000, for non-disclosure of the pre-sale repainting of a new BMW. The harm inflicted on Gore was purely economic; the pre-sale repainting had no effect on the car's performance, safety features, or appearance. BMW's conduct evinced no indifference to, or reckless disregard for, the health and safety of others. Moreover, BMW could reasonably have interpreted the relevant state statutes as establishing safe harbors for non-disclosure of presumptively minor repairs, and there was no evidence that BMW

---

[273] State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 425 (2003).

[274] Id. at 426.

[275] Id. at 427–428, quoting BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 591 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring).

[276] Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 23 (1991).

[277] State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 428 (2003).

[278] Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 23 (1991).

[279] TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Res. Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993). The case involved a fraudulent course of action on the part of TXO to win back the lucrative stream of royalties that it had ceded to Alliance.

had acted in bad faith, or that it had persisted in its course of conduct after it had been adjudged unlawful, or that it had engaged in deliberate false statements, acts of affirmative misconduct, or concealment of evidence of improper motive. In addition, the award was 500 times the amount of Gore's actual harm and substantially greater than Alabama's applicable $2,000 fine and the penalties imposed in other states for similar malfeasance. And, in the absence of a BMW history of non-compliance with known statutory requirements there was no basis for assuming that a more modest sanction would not have been sufficient. In light of the foregoing considerations, a five-member majority concluded that the award against BMW was grossly excessive and therefore violative of the Due Process Clause.[280]

[E103] Similarly, in State Farm, the Court struck down a punitive damages award of $145 million, 145 times higher than the compensatory award—$1 million for a year and a half of emotional distress suffered by the Campbells—imposed on State Farm Automobile Insurance Company because of its mishandling of the claims against the Campbells, who had been involved in a fatal car accident. State Farm's conduct was, indeed, reprehensible: it had disregarded the overwhelming likelihood of liability, declined to settle the ensuing claims for the $50,000 policy limit, ignored its own investigators' advice, taken the case to trial, leading to a judgment of $185,849, and initially refused to cover the $135,849 in excess liability. However, the state courts had used the case as a platform to expose and punish the perceived deficiencies of State Farm's nationwide operations, which bore no relation to the Campbells' harm. Moreover, the Campbells had shown no conduct similar to that which had harmed them. In addition, the challenged punitive award was 145 times the awarded amount of compensatory damages, a portion of which already contained a punitive element, since the actual damage was related to emotional distress. The Court concluded that the punitive award of $145 million was "neither reasonable nor proportionate to the wrong committed" and noted that, in light of the substantial compensatory damages awarded, due process likely would justify a punitive damages award at or near the amount of compensatory damages.[281]

F. THE CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS CLAUSE

1. In General

[E104] The Eighth Amendment prohibits the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments.[282] Only criminal penalties fall within the scope of this prohibition.[283] Hence, the Eighth Amendment is not applicable to the deportation of aliens[284] or corporal punishment of pupils by their teachers,[285] not even to conditions of confinement of pretrial detainees.[286]

---

[280] BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 574–75 (1996).

[281] State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 429 (2003).

[282] The Eighth Amendment applies to the states through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 666 (1962); Wilson v. Seiter 501 U.S. 294, 296–97 (1991).

[283] Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 664–71 (1977).

[284] Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 730 (1893); Mahler v. Eby, 264 U.S. 32 (1924).

[285] Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 668–71 (1977).

[286] Cf. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979)

[E105] The Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause embodies "broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity, and decency," against which the Court evaluates penal measures[287] and requires observance of the "evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society."[288] In assessing contemporary values, the Court relies on "objective factors to the maximum possible extent."[289] "[T]he clearest and most reliable objective evidence of contemporary values is the legislation enacted by the country's legislatures."[290] The Court also has been guided by the sentencing decisions of juries, because "they are a significant and reliable objective index of contemporary values."[291] In addition to objective evidence,[292] the Constitution contemplates that, in the end, the Court will bring its own judgment to bear on the question whether "there is reason to disagree with the judgment reached by the citizenry and its legislators."[293]

[E106] The Clause circumscribes the criminal process in three ways:

(1) It limits the kinds of punishment that can be imposed on those convicted of crimes;

(2) It proscribes punishment grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime;[294] and

(3) It imposes substantive limits on what can be made criminal and punished as such.

---

[287] Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 102 (1976).

[288] Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101 (1958) (emphasis added). See also, e.g., Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815, 821 (1988).

[289] Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 312 (2002), quoting Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 1000 (1991).

[290] Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 312 (2002), quoting Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 331 (1989).

[291] McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 300 (1987).

[292] Other objective indicia have been considered to be the views expressed by respected professional organizations—such as the American Bar Association or the American Law Institute—and the international community. See Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815, 830, n.31 (1988) (plurality opinion). In Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551, 578 (2005), the Court noted that "[t]he opinion of the world community [against the juvenile death penalty], while not controlling our outcome, does provide respected and significant confirmation for our own conclusions."

Opinion surveys indicating strong public opposition to a specific kind of punishment are not thought to establish a societal consensus, absent some legislative reflection of the sentiment expressed therein. See Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 334–35 (1989).

[293] Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 313 (2002), quoting Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584, 597 (1977).

[294] Where the minimum sentence that the court might impose is cruel and unusual, the fault is in the law, not in the sentence, and if there is no other statute under which sentence can be imposed, the law must be declared void. Where sentence cannot be imposed under any law except that declared unconstitutional, the case cannot be remanded for new sentence, but the judgment must be reversed with directions to dismiss the proceedings. See Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367, 382 (1910).

2. Kind or Method of Punishment

a. The Death Penalty[295]

[E107] Until Furman,[296] the Court never confronted squarely the fundamental claim that the punishment of death always, regardless of the enormity of the offense or the procedure followed in imposing the sentence, is cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution.[297] Although this issue was presented and addressed in Furman, it was not resolved by the Court. Four Justices would have held that capital punishment is not unconstitutional per se; two Justices would have reached the opposite conclusion; and three Justices left open the question whether such punishment may ever be imposed. Still, four years later, in Gregg and its companion cases, seven Justices recognized that the imposition of the death penalty is not per se cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment.[298] However, the Court has erected serious constitutional barriers to the imposition of capital punishment.

[E108] First, the death penalty, which is "unique in its severity and irrevocability,"[299] may be imposed only in murder cases.[300] The sentence of death for the crime of rape is forbidden as grossly disproportionate and excessive punishment.[301] While robbery is a serious crime deserving serious punishment, it is not a crime "so grievous an affront to humanity that the only adequate response may be the penalty of death;" the culpability of a robber who did not kill or intend to kill is different from that of the robbers who killed, and, under the Eighth Amendment, it is impermissible for the state to treat them alike.[302] Nevertheless, the Eighth Amendment does not prohibit the death penalty as disproportionate where "the defendant's participation in the felony murder is major and the likelihood of killing is so substantial as to raise an inference of . . . reckless indifference to human life."[303] Indeed, "the reckless disregard for human life, implicit in knowingly engaging in criminal activities known to carry a grave risk of death, represents a highly culpable mental state that may be taken into account in making a capital sentencing judgment when that conduct causes its natural, though also not inevitable, lethal result."[304]

---

[295] See also para. K38 (discriminatory administration of a capital sentencing scheme).

[296] Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

[297] Before Furman, the Court, on a number of occasions, had both assumed and asserted the constitutionality of capital punishment. In several cases, that assumption had provided a necessary foundation for the decision, as the Court had been asked to decide whether a particular method of carrying out a capital sentence would have been allowed to stand under the Eighth Amendment. See Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459, 464 (1947); In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 447 (1890); Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130, 134–35 (1879).

[298] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976).

[299] Id. at 187.

[300] Cf. Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982).

[301] Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977) (plurality opinion of four Justices).

[302] Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782, 797–98 (1982). The majority noted that it "would be very different if the likelihood of a killing in the course of a robbery were so substantial that one should share the blame for the killing if he somehow participated in the felony." Id. at 799.

[303] Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137, 154, 158 (1987) (upholding a death penalty on two brothers who planned and carried out the armed prison breakout of their father and another convicted murderer, helped them to hijack a passing car containing a family of four, and witnessed the murder of the family by their father and the other escapee).

[304] Id. at 157–58.

[E109] Second, the capital punishment may be deemed as cruel for some particular categories of offenders. First, the Constitution prohibits a state from carrying out a sentence of death upon a prisoner who is insane; "[w]hether its aim be to protect the condemned from fear and pain without comfort of understanding, or to protect the dignity of society itself from the barbarity of exacting mindless vengeance, the restriction finds enforcement in the Eighth Amendment."[305]

[E110] In Penry, the Court decided that the Eighth Amendment did not—then—categorically prohibit the execution of mentally retarded capital murderers.[306] The two state statutes prohibiting execution of the mentally retarded, even when added to the 14 states that rejected capital punishment completely, did not provide sufficient evidence of a national consensus against executing mentally retarded capital murderers. Moreover, all mentally retarded people of petitioner's ability (having an IQ between 50 and 63, a mental age of a six-and-a-half-year-old and a social maturity, or ability to function in the world, of a nine-year-old)—"by virtue of their mental retardation alone, and apart from any individualized consideration of their personal responsibility"—were not found to "inevitably lack the cognitive, volitional, and moral capacity to act with the degree of culpability associated with the death penalty." In addition to the varying degrees of mental retardation, the consequences of a retarded person's mental impairment, including the deficits in his or her adaptive behavior, might be ameliorated through education and habilitation. And the concept of "mental age" was an insufficient basis for a categorical Eighth Amendment rule, since it was imprecise and did not adequately account for individuals' varying experiences and abilities. The Court concluded that, while a national consensus against execution of the mentally retarded might someday emerge, reflecting the "evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society," there was insufficient evidence of such a consensus at that time.[307] Indeed, 13 years later, in Atkins,[308] the Court revisited the issue and reversed course, finding that much had changed since the foregoing conclusion. After Penry, 16 more states had concluded that death was not a suitable punishment for a mentally retarded criminal; this fact reflected the consistency of the direction of change. The Court stressed that, because of the impairments and diminished culpability of the mentally handicapped, its death penalty jurisprudence provides two reasons consistent with the legislative consensus that such persons should be categorically excluded from execution. First, there is a serious question whether either justification recognized as a basis for the death penalty—retribution and deterrence of capital crimes—applies to mentally retarded offenders.[309] As to retribution, the severity of the appropriate punishment

---

[305] Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399, 410 (1986). The Court noted that it left to the states the task of developing appropriate ways to enforce the constitutional restriction upon its execution of sentences.

[306] Insanity defense includes mental defect or disease.

[307] Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302, 330–40 (1989). The Court noted that the sentencing body should be allowed to consider mental retardation as a mitigating circumstance in making the individualized determination whether death is the appropriate punishment in a particular case. Id. at 338–39.

[308] Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).

[309] "Unless the imposition of the death penalty on a mentally retarded person 'measurably contributes to one or both of these goals, it is nothing more than the purposeless and needless imposition of pain and suffering, and hence an unconstitutional punishment.'" See Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 319 (2002), quoting Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782, 798 (1982).

necessarily depends on the offender's culpability. The Court has consistently confined the imposition of the death penalty to a narrow category of the most serious crimes. "If the culpability of the average murderer is insufficient to justify imposition of death, culpability of the mentally retarded offender surely does not merit that form of retribution."[310] As to deterrence, "the same cognitive and behavioral impairments that make mentally retarded defendants less morally culpable—for example, the diminished ability to understand and process information, to learn from experience, to engage in logical reasoning, or to control impulses—also make it less likely that they can process the information of the possibility of execution as a penalty and, as a result, control their conduct based upon that information. Nor will exempting the mentally retarded from execution lessen the death penalty's deterrent effect with respect to offenders who are not mentally retarded."[311] In addition, mentally retarded defendants face a special risk of wrongful execution because of the possibility of false confessions and their lesser ability to make a persuasive showing of mitigation in the face of prosecutorial evidence of one or more aggravating factors. "Mentally retarded defendants may be less able to give meaningful assistance to their counsel and are typically poor witnesses, and their demeanor may create an unwarranted impression of lack of remorse for their crimes."[312]

[E111] In 1988, in Thompson v. Oklahoma, a four-Justice plurality held that the Eighth Amendment, prohibited the execution of a person who was under 16 years of age at the time of his or her offense. The plurality based its opinion on (1) the relevant state statutes; (2) the behavior of juries as evidenced by statistics; (3) the views expressed by the international community and professional organizations; (4) the juvenile's reduced culpability; and (5) the fact that the application of the death penalty to this class of offenders does not measurably contribute to retribution and deterrence.[313] The next year, a five-member majority found, in Stanford, that the imposition of capital punishment on an individual for a crime committed at 16 or 17 years of age did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, considering that the pattern of federal and state laws revealed no national consensus forbidding the imposition of capital punishment on 16- or 17-year-old murderers.[314] Nonetheless, 16 years later, a divided Court reached a different conclusion in Roper v. Simmons. The objective indicia of consensus in this case—the rejection of the juvenile death penalty in the majority of states (30 states prohibited the juvenile death penalty, comprising 12 that rejected the death penalty altogether, and 18 maintained it but, by express provision or judicial interpretation, excluded juveniles from its reach); the infrequency of its use even where it

---

[310] Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 319 (2002).

[311] Id. at 320.

[312] Id. at 320–21.

[313] Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815, 821–38 (1988). Justice O'Connor concurred in vacating the challenged sentence, on the ground that, since the available evidence suggested a national consensus forbidding the imposition of capital punishment for crimes committed before the age of 16, there was considerable risk that, in enacting a statute authorizing capital punishment for murder without setting any minimum age, the Oklahoma legislature either had not realized that its actions would effectively render 15-year-olds death-eligible, or had not given the question serious consideration, whereas the Eighth Amendment required special care and deliberation in decisions that might lead to the imposition of the death penalty.

[314] Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361, 365–74 (1989). The majority noted that 22 of the 37 death penalty states permitted the death penalty for 16-year-old offenders, and, among these 37 states, 25 permitted it for 17-year-old offenders.

remained on the books; and the consistency in the trend toward abolition of the practice—provided sufficient evidence that contemporary society viewed juveniles, as categorically less culpable than the average criminal. Moreover, there are three general differences between juveniles under 18 and adults. First, a "lack of maturity and an underdeveloped sense of responsibility are found in youth more often than in adults and are more understandable among the young. These qualities often result in impetuous and ill-considered actions and decisions. . . . The second area of difference is that juveniles are more vulnerable or susceptible to negative influences and outside pressures, including peer pressure. . . . The third broad difference is that the character of a juvenile is not as well formed as that of an adult. The personality traits of juveniles are more transitory, less fixed."[315] As the Court pointed out, "[t]hese differences render suspect any conclusion that a juvenile falls among the worst offenders. The susceptibility of juveniles to immature and irresponsible behavior means their irresponsible conduct is not as morally reprehensible as that of an adult. . . . Their own vulnerability and comparative lack of control over their immediate surroundings mean juveniles have a greater claim than adults to be forgiven for failing to escape negative influences in their whole environment. . . . The reality that juveniles still struggle to define their identity means it is less supportable to conclude that even a heinous crime committed by a juvenile is evidence of irretrievably depraved character. . . . Once the diminished culpability of juveniles is recognized, it is evident that the penological justifications for the death penalty apply to them with lesser force than to adults."[316] Under these considerations, the Court concluded that the death penalty cannot be imposed upon juvenile offenders. In so holding, the Court also noted that the opinion of the world community against the juvenile death penalty, "while not controlling the outcome, [did] provide respected and significant confirmation for [its] conclusions."[317]

[E112] Third, mandatory death penalty statutes are unconstitutional.[318] "[T]he fundamental respect for humanity underlying the Eighth Amendment . . . requires consideration of the character and record of the individual offender and the circumstances of the particular offense as a constitutionally indispensable part of the process of inflicting the penalty of death."[319] This principle applies "even where the crime of first-degree murder is narrowly defined;" the fact that the murder victim was a peace officer performing his regular duties may be regarded as an aggravating circumstance but cannot justify a law allowing for no consideration of particularized mitigating factors in deciding whether the death sentence should be imposed.[320] Similarly a statute that mandates

---

315 Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551, 569–70 (2005).

316 Id. at 570–71.

317 Id. at 578.

318 Woodson v. N. Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 303–05 (1976) (plurality opinion); Roberts Stanislaus v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325, 333–36 (1976) (plurality opinion).

319 Woodson v. N. Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 304 (1976) (plurality opinion). "A process that accords no significance to relevant facets of the character and record of the individual offender or the circumstances of the particular offense excludes from consideration in fixing the ultimate punishment of death the possibility of compassionate or mitigating factors stemming from the diverse frailties of humankind. It treats all persons convicted of a designated offense not as uniquely individual human beings, but as members of a faceless, undifferentiated mass to be subjected to the blind infliction of the penalty of death." Id.

320 Roberts v. Louisiana, 431 U.S. 633, 636–37 (1977) (per curiam).

the death penalty for a prison inmate, who is convicted of murder while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole, violates the Eighth Amendment.[321]

[E113] Fourth, the sentencer, a jury or judge,[322] may not be given unbridled discretion in determining the fates of those charged with capital offenses. Central to the Court's holding in Furman "was the conviction that the vesting of standardless sentencing power in the jury violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."[323] "The Constitution instead requires that death penalty statutes be structured so as to prevent the penalty from being administered in an arbitrary and unpredictable fashion."[324] Thus, the Court has held that a state must "genuinely narrow the class of persons eligible for the death penalty and must reasonably justify the imposition of a more severe sentence on the defendant compared to others found guilty of murder."[325]

[E114] To render a defendant eligible for the death penalty in a homicide case, the jury[326] must convict the defendant of murder and find "one 'aggravating circumstance' (or its equivalent) at either the guilt or penalty phase. . . . The aggravating circumstance may be contained in the definition of the crime or in a separate sentencing factor."[327] The aggravating circumstance must meet two requirements. "First, the circumstance may not apply to every defendant convicted of a murder: it must apply only to a subclass of defendants convicted of murder. . . . Second, the aggravating circumstance may not be unconstitutionally vague."[328]

---

[321] Sumner v. Nevada Dep't of Prisons, 483 U.S. 66 (1987).

[322] Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984). See also Harris v. Alabama, 513 U.S. 504 (1995) (the Eighth Amendment does not require the state to define the weight the sentencing judge must give to an advisory jury verdict).

[323] See Woodson v. N. Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 302 (1976) (plurality opinion), citing Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) at 309–10 (Stewart, J., concurring); id. at 313 (White, J., concurring); cf. id. at 253–57 (Douglas, J., concurring).

[324] California v. Brown, 479 U.S. 538, 541 (1987), citing Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976) and Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

[325] Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 877 (1983).

[326] Under the Sixth Amendment, capital defendants are entitled to "a jury determination of any fact on which the legislature conditions" the imposition of the death penalty. See Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584, 589 (2002), overruling Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990).

[327] Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 971–72 (1994), citing Lowenfield v. Phelps, 484 U.S. 231, 244–46 (1988). The culpability of the average murderer is insufficient to justify imposition of death. See Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420, 433 (1980).

[328] Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 972 (1994), citing Arave v. Creech, 507 U.S. 463, 471, 474 (1993) (an aggravating factor is constitutionally infirm if the sentencing jury "fairly could conclude that an aggravating circumstance applies to every defendant eligible for the death penalty"). "When a federal court is asked to review a state court's application of an individual statutory aggravating or mitigating circumstance in a particular case, it must first determine whether the statutory language defining the circumstance is itself too vague to provide any guidance to the sentencer. If so, then the federal court must attempt to determine whether the state courts have further defined the vague terms and, if they have done so, whether those definitions are constitutionally sufficient, i.e., whether they provide some guidance to the sentencer." See Bell v. Cone, 543 U.S. 447, 453 (2005) (per curiam), quoting Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 654 (1990).

The Eighth Amendment permits sentencing juries to consider evidence relating to the victim's personal characteristics and the emotional impact of the murder on the victim's family. Assessment of the harm caused by the defendant has long been an important factor in deter-

[E115] Fifth, in determining whether a defendant eligible for the death penalty should in fact receive that sentence (selection stage), the sentencer cannot be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, "any aspect of the defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the particular offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death."[329] "What is important at the selection stage is an individualized determination on the basis of the character of the individual and the circumstances of the crime."[330] The rule's central requirement is that a state "may not cut off in an absolute manner the presentation of mitigating evidence, either by statute or judicial instruction, or by limiting the inquiries to which it is relevant so severely that the evidence could never be part of the sentencing decision at all."[331]

[E116] "A capital sentencer need not be instructed how to weigh any particular fact in the sentencing decision."[332] Indeed, the Court's decisions suggest that complete jury discretion in this field is constitutionally permissible.[333] Nevertheless, a state is not barred from guiding the sentencer's consideration of mitigating evidence. Indeed, "there is no constitutional requirement of unfettered sentencing discretion in the jury, and States are free to structure and shape consideration of mitigating evidence 'in an effort to achieve a more rational and equitable administration of the death penalty.'"[334] Hence, there is no constitutional objection to a statute providing that the jury must impose the death penalty, if it decides that the aggravating circumstances "outweigh" the mitigating circumstances[335] or when it finds no such mitigating circumstances.[336]

[E117] Sixth, "[b]ecause the proper degree of definition of eligibility and selection factors often is not susceptible of mathematical precision, [the Court's] vagueness review is quite deferential, [and relies] on the basic principle that a factor is not unconstitutional if it has some 'common sense core of meaning that criminal juries should be capable of understanding.'"[337] The Court has found only a few factors vague, and those, in fact, are quite similar to one another: murder "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel;"[338] mining the appropriate punishment, and "victim impact" evidence is simply another method of informing the sentencing authority about such harm. See Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 817, 825, 827 (1991), overruling Booth v. Maryland, 482 U.S. 496 (1987), and S. Carolina v. Gathers, 490 U.S. 805 (1989).

---

329 Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 604 (1978) (plurality opinion); Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 110 (1982); Blystone v. Pennsylvania, 494 U.S. 299, 305 (1990).

330 Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 879 (1983).

331 Johnson v. Texas, 509 U.S. 350, 361 (1993). In Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370, 380 (1990), the Court held that the standard for determining whether jury instructions satisfy these principles is whether "there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury has applied the challenged instruction in a way that prevents the consideration of constitutionally relevant evidence."

332 Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 979 (1994), citing California v. Ramos, 463 U.S. 992, 1008–09 (1983).

333 See Buchanan v. Angelone, 522 U.S. 269, 276–77 (1998), citing Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 978–79 (1994), and Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862, 875 (1983).

334 Johnson v. Texas, 509 U.S. 350, 362 (1993), quoting Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370, 377 (1990).

335 Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370, 377 (1990).

336 Blystone v. Pennsylvania, 494 U.S. 299, 305 (1990).

337 Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 973 (1994), quoting Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262, 279 (1976) (White, J., concurring in judgment).

338 Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420, 427–29 (1980).

murder "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman."[339] In providing for individualized sentencing, "the States may adopt capital sentencing processes that rely upon the jury, in its sound judgment, to exercise wide discretion."[340] That is evident from the numerous factors that the Court has upheld against vagueness challenges: consideration of the victim's "personal characteristics," "young age, slight stature, background," or the effect of the crime on the victim's family;[341] consideration of the "circumstances of the crime of which the defendant was convicted and the existence of any special circumstances found to be true," the "presence or absence of criminal activity involving the use or attempted use of force or violence or the express or implied threat to use force or violence," and "the defendant's age at the time of the crime;"[342] question whether the defendant was a "cold-blooded, pitiless slayer;"[343] question whether perpetrator "inflicted mental anguish or physical abuse before the victim's death" with "mental anguish including a victim's uncertainty as to his ultimate fate;"[344] question whether the crime was a "conscienceless or pitiless crime which was unnecessarily torturous to the victim;"[345] question "whether there is a probability that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society."[346]

[E118] In addition, the Eighth Amendment places limits on the methods of carrying out a death penalty. Burning at the stake, crucifixion or breaking on the wheel,[347] drawing, quartering, and public dissecting[348] are cruel and unusual punishments. Conversely, the Court has upheld public execution by shooting[349] and electrocution[350] as permissible modes of punishment. The Court also has tolerated execution by hanging[351] or exposure to cyanide gas,[352] as well as the execution of prisoners who have spent nearly 20 years or more on death row.[353]

[E119] An accident, although it may produce added anguish, is not, on that basis alone, to be characterized as wanton infliction of unnecessary pain. In Louisiana ex rel. Francis, the Court concluded that it was not unconstitutional to force a prisoner to undergo a second effort to electrocute him after a mechanical malfunction had thwarted the first attempt. A four-Justice plurality observed that "the cruelty against which the Constitution protects a convicted man is cruelty inherent in the method of punishment,

---

339 Maynard v. Cartwright, 486 U.S. 356, 363–64 (1988).

340 Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 974 (1994).

341 Jones v. United States, 527 U.S. 373, 400 (1999) (plurality opinion).

342 Tuilaepa v. California, 512 U.S. 967, 975–80 (1994). The Court noted that "difficulty in application is not equivalent to vagueness." Id. at 977.

343 Arave v. Creech, 507 U.S. 463, 472–73 (1993).

344 Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639, 654 (1990).

345 Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242, 255–58 (1976) (plurality opinion of three Justices).

346 Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262, 274–76 (1976) (plurality opinion of three members of the Court).

347 In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436, 446 (1890).

348 Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130, 135–36 (1878).

349 Id.

350 In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436 (1890).

351 Campbell v. Wood, 511 U.S. 1119 (1994) (per curiam) (stay of execution denied).

352 Gray v. Lucas, 463 U.S. 1237 (1983) (writ of certiorari and stay of execution denied).

353 See Lackey v. Texas, 514 U.S. 1045 (1995); Elledge v. Florida, 525 U.S. 944 (1998); Moore v. Nebraska, 528 U.S. 990 (1999) (certiorari denied).

not the necessary suffering involved in any method employed to extinguish life," and considered that the second execution would not violate the Eighth Amendment, because the first attempt was an "unforeseeable accident."[354]

b. Deprivation of Citizenship

[E120] Trop, a native-born American, was declared to have lost his citizenship by reason of a conviction by court-martial for wartime desertion. A four-Justice plurality concluded that loss of citizenship amounted to a cruel and unusual punishment that violated the Eighth Amendment, stressing that denationalization is a form of punishment more primitive than torture, for it strips the citizen of his status in the national and international political community and deprives him "of the right to have rights."[355]

c. Prison Deprivations

i. Generally

[E121] In Estelle v. Gamble, the Court first acknowledged that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause can be applied to some deprivations that are not specifically part of the sentence but are suffered during imprisonment.[356] "[T]he Constitution does not mandate comfortable prisons"[357] but neither does it permit inhumane ones, and it is now settled that "the treatment a prisoner receives in prison and the conditions under which he is confined are subject to scrutiny under the Eighth Amendment."[358] In its prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments, the Eighth Amendment "places restraints on prison officials, who may not, for example, use excessive physical force against prisoners."[359] "The Amendment also imposes duties on these officials, who must provide humane conditions of confinement; prison officials must ensure that prisoners receive adequate food, clothing, shelter and medical care,"[360] and are obliged "to take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates."[361] The Court has recognized, under federal law, an implied damages remedy for the imposition of cruel and unusual punishments on prisoners.[362]

---

354 Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459, 464 (1947). Justice Frankfurter's concurrence, based solely on the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, concluded that, since the first attempt had failed because of "an innocent misadventure," the second would not be "repugnant to the conscience of mankind." Id. at 470–71. The four dissenters held that two separated, deliberate, and intentional applications of electric current were sufficiently "cruel and unusual" to be prohibited.

355 Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101–02 (1958). Another member of the Court concluded that the statute authorizing deprivations of citizenship exceeded Congress' legislative powers.

356 Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976).

357 Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 349 (1981).

358 Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 31 (1993).

359 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832 (1994), citing Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 5–12 (1992).

360 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832 (1994). Cf. DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dep't of Soc. Servs., 489 U.S. 189, 200 (1989).

361 Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 526–27 (1984).

362 Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 18–25 (1980). However, Bivens-type actions may be

ii. Conditions of Imprisonment—Medical Care of Prisoners

[E122] Conditions of confinement, "alone or in combination," "must not involve the wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain, nor may they be grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime warranting imprisonment. . . . But conditions that cannot be said to be cruel and unusual under contemporary standards are not unconstitutional. To the extent such conditions are restrictive and even harsh, they are part of the penalty that criminals pay for their offenses against society."[363]

[E123] In the context of prison conditions, a prison official violates the Eighth Amendment only when two requirements are met. First, the deprivation alleged must be "objectively, sufficiently serious;"[364] "a prison official's act or omission must result in the denial of 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'"[365] "For a claim . . . based on a failure to prevent harm, the inmate must show that he is incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm."[366] Indeed, the Eighth Amendment protects against current unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, as well as future harm to inmates. The Amendment requires that inmates be furnished with the basic human needs, one of which is reasonable safety. Thus, prison authorities may not "ignore a condition of confinement that is sure or very likely to cause serious illness and needless suffering" in the future; the Eighth Amendment protects against exposing a prisoner to a "sufficiently substantial risk of serious damage to his future health," such as demonstrably unsafe drinking water or serious communicable diseases. An injunction cannot be denied to inmates who plainly prove an unsafe, life- or health-threatening condition, on the ground that nothing yet has happened to them.[367]

[E124] The second requirement follows from the principle that only the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain implicates the Eighth Amendment. To violate the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, a prison official must have a "sufficiently culpable state of mind."[368] That state of mind is one of "deliberate indifference" to the inmates' health or safety and can be inferred from the fact that the risk of harm is obvious.[369] Subjective recklessness is the appropriate test for deliberate indifference; "the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference."[370] Nevertheless, "prison officials who actually knew of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety may be found free from liability if they responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately brought only against federal agents, not against federal agencies or private entities acting under color of federal law. See Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 484–86 (1994); Corr. Servs. Co. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61 (2001).

---

363 Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347 (1981).

364 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834 (1994), citing Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 298 (1991).

365 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834 (1994), quoting Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347 (1981). See also Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8–9 (1992).

366 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834 (1994), citing Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 35 (1993).

367 See Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 33–35 (1993). Similarly, a prisoner need not wait until he is actually assaulted before obtaining relief. See Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559, 572 (10th Cir. 1980), discussed in Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 34 (1993).

368 Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8 (1992).

369 Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 842 (1994).

370 Id. at 837.

was not averted."[371] Accordingly, "a prison official may be held liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement only if he knows that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it."[372]

[E125] Deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners is prohibited by the Eighth Amendment. "This is true whether the indifference is manifested by prison doctors in their response to the prisoner's needs or by prison guards in intentionally denying or delaying access to medical care or intentionally interfering with the treatment once prescribed. . . . This conclusion does not mean, however, that every claim by a prisoner that he has not received adequate medical treatment states a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . [A]n inadvertent failure to provide adequate medical care cannot be said to constitute 'an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' or to be 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind.' Thus, a complaint that a physician has been negligent in diagnosing or treating a medical condition does not state a valid claim of medical mistreatment under the Eighth Amendment. Medical malpractice does not become a constitutional violation merely because the victim is a prisoner. In order to state a cognizable claim, a prisoner must allege acts or omissions sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifference to serious medical needs."[373]

[E126] Rhodes v. Chapman dealt with the practice of "double celling" of inmates at a maximum security prison. The lower courts had found the practice violative of the Eighth Amendment, resting on five considerations: (1) inmates at the prison were serving long terms of imprisonment; (2) the prison housed 38 percent more inmates than its "design capacity;" (3) the recommendation of several studies that each inmate have at least 50–55 square feet of living quarters, as opposed to the 63 square feet shared by the double celled inmates; (4) the suggestion that double celled inmates spent most of their time in their cells with their cellmates; and (5) the fact that double celling at the prison was not a temporary condition. The Court disagreed; such considerations fall far short, in themselves, of proving cruel and unusual punishment, and are weighed by the legislature and prison administration, rather than by a court.[374]

---

[371] Id. at 844.

[372] Id. at 847. "One does not have to await the consummation of threatened injury to obtain preventive relief." In a suit for prospective relief, the subjective factor, deliberate indifference, "should be determined in light of the prison authorities' current attitudes and conduct, their attitudes and conduct at the time suit is brought and persisting thereafter." In making the requisite showing of subjective culpability, the prisoner may rely on developments that postdate the pleadings and pre-trial motions, as prison officials may rely on such developments to show that the prisoner is not entitled to an injunction. Id. at 845–47.

[373] Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104–106 (1976). Considering that four different doctors had seen respondent on 17 occasions during a three-month span and treated his injury and other problems, the Court rejected the inmate's claim in that case that prison doctors had inflicted cruel and unusual punishment by inadequately attending to his medical needs. The doctors' failure to perform an X-ray or to use additional diagnostic techniques was not found to constitute cruel and unusual punishment but, at most, medical malpractice, cognizable in the state courts.

[374] Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 348–50 (1981). Three Justices, concurring, noted that in determining when prison conditions pass beyond legitimate punishment and become cruel and unusual, the "touchstone is the effect upon the imprisoned. . . . The court must examine the effect upon inmates of the condition of the physical plant (lighting, heat, plumbing, [E127] In Hutto v. Finney, the Court considered the relationship between the Eighth Amendment and conditions of confinement in "punitive isolation" in the Arkansas prison system. An average of four, and sometimes as many as ten, prisoners were crowded into small, vandalized cells. Because inmates in punitive isolation were often violently anti-social, overcrowding led to persecution of the weaker prisoners. Prisoners in isolation received fewer than 1,000 calories a day; their meals consisted primarily of four-inch squares of "grue," a substance created by mashing meat, potatoes, oleo, syrup, vegetables, eggs, and seasoning into a paste and baking the mixture in a pan. Because of their inadequate numbers, guards assigned to the punitive isolation cells frequently resorted to physical violence, using nightsticks and mace in their efforts to maintain order. Prisoners were sometimes left in isolation for months, their release depending on their attitudes as appraised by prison personnel. The Court admitted that these conditions, "taken as a whole," violated the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. In addition, it noted that the length of confinement could not be ignored in deciding whether the confinement met constitutional standards; a filthy, overcrowded cell and a diet of "grue" might be tolerable for a few days and intolerably cruel for weeks or months. Subsequently it upheld the challenged district court's order placing a 30-day limitation on punitive isolation.[375]

[E128] Among the unnecessary and wanton inflictions of pain, forbidden by the Eighth Amendment, are those that are "totally without penological justification." Hope, a prison inmate, was handcuffed to a "hitching post," following his refusal to work and his consequent fight with a guard. He was shirtless all day and the sun burned his skin. He remained attached to the post for approximately seven hours. During this seven-hour period, he was given water only once or twice and was given no bathroom breaks. Furthermore, at one point, a guard taunted Hope about his thirst. The Court found that the use of the hitching post under these circumstances was offensive to human dignity and amounted to gratuitous infliction of wanton and unnecessary pain, in violation of the Eighth Amendment.[376]

[E129] Withdrawal of visitation privileges may make the prisoner's confinement unbearable and, therefore, is reviewable under the Eighth Amendment. A prison regulation providing that inmates who have committed two substance-abuse violations may receive only clergy and attorneys, but can apply for reinstatement of visitation privileges after two years, has been upheld against an Eighth Amendment challenge. Such a rule serves the legitimate goal of deterring the use of drugs and alcohol within the prisons, constitutes a rational means of effecting prison discipline, and is not a dramatic departure from accepted standards for conditions of confinement. Nevertheless, the case ventilation, living space, noise levels, recreation space); sanitation (control of vermin and insects, food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories and showers, clean places for eating, sleeping, and working); safety (protection from violent, deranged, or diseased inmates, fire protection, emergency evacuation); inmate needs and services (clothing, nutrition, bedding, medical, dental, and mental health care, visitation time, exercise and recreation, educational and rehabilitative programming); and staffing (trained and adequate guards and other staff, avoidance of placing inmates in positions of authority over other inmates). . . . When the cumulative impact of the conditions of incarceration threatens the physical, mental, and emotional health and well-being of the inmates and/or creates a probability of recidivism and future incarceration, the court must conclude that the conditions violate the Constitution." Id. at 364.

---

375 Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 686–87 (1978).

376 Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 737–38 (2002).

might be different, if the withdrawal of all visitation privileges were permanent or for a much longer period, or if it were applied in an arbitrary manner to a particular inmate.[377]

iii. Use of Excessive Force Against Inmates

[E130] "[O]fficials confronted with a prison disturbance must balance the threat unrest poses to inmates, prison workers, administrators, and visitors against the harm inmates may suffer if guards use force. Despite the weight of these competing concerns, corrections officials must make their decisions in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance. . . . [A]ccordingly, . . . application of the deliberate indifference standard is inappropriate when authorities use force to put down a prison disturbance. Instead, 'the question whether the measure taken inflicted unnecessary and wanton pain and suffering ultimately turns on whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'"[378]

[E131] "Whether the prison disturbance is a riot or a lesser disruption, corrections officers must balance the need to maintain or restore discipline through force against the risk of injury to inmates. Both situations may require prison officials to act quickly and decisively. Likewise, both implicate the principle that 'prison administrators should be accorded wide-ranging deference in the adoption and execution of policies and practices that, in their judgment, are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.' . . . In recognition of these similarities, [the Court has held] that, whenever prison officials stand accused of using excessive physical force in violation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, the core judicial inquiry is [the same as described above]: whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm."[379]

[E132] "[T]he extent of injury suffered by an inmate is one factor that may suggest 'whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary' in a particular situation, 'or instead evinced such wantonness with respect to the unjustified infliction of harm as is tantamount to a knowing willingness that it occur.' . . . In determining whether the use of force was wanton and unnecessary, it may also be proper to evaluate the need for application of force, the relationship between that need and the amount of force used, the threat 'reasonably perceived by the responsible officials,' and 'any efforts made to temper the severity of a forceful response.' The absence of serious injury is therefore relevant to, but does not end, the Eighth Amendment inquiry. . . . When prison officials maliciously and sadistically use force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency always are violated. . . . This is true whether or not significant injury is evident. Otherwise, the Eighth Amendment would permit any physical pun-

---

[377] Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126 (2003).

[378] Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6 (1992), discussing and quoting Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 320–21 (1986). The latter case involved an Eighth Amendment claim of an inmate shot in the knee by a guard during a prison riot. The Court rejected the claim considering, inter alia, that respondent could reasonably be thought to pose a threat to the attempt of the security manager to free a hostage. Id. at 322–26. The Court also stated that, in the prison security context, the Due Process Clause affords no greater protection than does the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. Id. at 327.

[379] Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1992).

ishment, no matter how diabolic or inhuman, inflicting less than some arbitrary quantity of injury. . . . [Still the Amendment does not reach] de minimis uses of physical force, provided that such use is not of a sort 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind.'"[380]

3. Proportionality of Sentences—Mandatory Life Imprisonment

[E133] In the landmark case of Weems, the Court identified a second principle inherent in the Eighth Amendment, "that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to offense."[381] However, the only "clearly established" law emerging from the Court's jurisprudence in this area is that a "gross disproportionality" principle applies to such sentences; because the Court's cases lack clarity regarding what factors may indicate gross disproportionality, the principle's precise contours are unclear, applicable only in the "exceedingly rare" and "extreme" case.[382]

[E134] In Rummel, the Court held constitutional a mandatory life sentence—pursuant to Texas' recidivist statute—with parole available within 12 years, for the offense of obtaining $120 by false pretenses, committed by an offender with two prior felony convictions, involving small amounts of money. The Court noted that "like the line dividing felony theft from petty larceny, the point at which a recidivist will be deemed to have demonstrated the necessary propensities and the amount of time that the recidivist will be isolated from society are matters largely within the discretion of the punishing jurisdiction" and that "Texas was entitled to place upon Rummel the onus of one who is simply unable to bring his conduct within the social norms prescribed by the criminal law of the State." Moreover, taking into account that "parole is an established variation on

---

[380] Id. at 7, 9–10 (1992), quoting Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 321, 327 (1986). Blows that caused bruises, swelling, loosened teeth, and a cracked dental plate, are not de minimis for Eighth Amendment purposes. Id. at 10.

[381] Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367 (1910). This case represents the first time that the Court invalidated a penalty prescribed by a legislature for a particular offense. Weems, an officer of the Bureau of Coast Guard and Transportation of the U.S. Government of the Philippine Islands, was convicted of falsifying a public and official document. He was sentenced to 15 years' incarceration at hard labor with chains on his ankles, to an unusual loss of his civil rights, and to perpetual surveillance. In striking down the challenged penalty imposed, the Court examined the punishment in relation to the offense, compared the punishment to those inflicted for other crimes and to those imposed in other jurisdictions, and concluded that the punishment was excessive. The Court rejected the argument that the statutory provision of imprisonment was separable from the accessory punishment (a chain at the ankle and wrist of the offender, hard and painful labor, etc.), reasoning that the statute united the penalties of cadena temporal, principal and accessory, and it was not in the Court's power to separate them, even if they were separable, unless their independence was such that it could be said that their union had not been made imperative by the legislature.

In Howard v. Fleming, 191 U.S. 126, 136 (1903), the Court, in essence, had followed this approach. In rejecting the claim that ten-year sentences for conspiracy to defraud were cruel and unusual, the Court considered the nature of the crime, the purpose of the law, and the length of the sentence imposed.

[382] Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63, 71–73 (2003). In that case, the Court considered if a state court's decision to affirm Andrade's conviction to two consecutive terms of 25 years to life, under the California "three strikes" statute, was contrary to, or an unreasonable application of, the Court's clearly established federal law, within the meaning 28 U.S.C. Section 2254(d)(1).

imprisonment of convicted criminals," the five-Justice majority relied heavily on the possibility that petitioner would not actually be imprisoned for the rest of his life, since he was likely to have been eligible for parole within 12 years of his initial confinement.[383]

[E135] In Hutto v. Davis, the defendant was sentenced to two consecutive terms of 20 years in prison for possession with intent to distribute nine ounces of marijuana and distribution of marijuana. The Court found the sentence constitutional and stated that "federal courts should be reluctant to review legislatively mandated terms of imprisonment, and that successful challenges to the proportionality of particular sentences should be exceedingly rare."[384]

[E136] In Solem v. Helm, the Court confronted a sentence of life imprisonment without parole, for the crime of writing a $100 check on a non-existent bank account, committed by an offender with six prior non-violent felony convictions, including three for burglary. A five-Justice majority recognized that courts "should grant substantial deference to the broad authority that legislatures necessarily possess in determining the types and limits of punishments for crimes" and underlined that "no penalty is per se constitutional."[385] Moreover, it pointed out that three factors may be relevant to a determination of whether a sentence is so disproportionate that it violates the Eighth Amendment: "(1) the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty; (2) the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction; and (3) the sentences imposed for commission of the same crime in other jurisdictions."[386] Yet, "no one factor will be dispositive in a given case."[387] Applying these factors and considering the gravity of Helm's prior offenses, the Court struck down the defendant's sentence, specifically noting the contrast between that sentence and the sentence in Rummel, pursuant to which the convict was eligible for parole.[388]

[E137] Harmelin involved a first-time offender convicted of possessing 672 grams of cocaine. He was sentenced to a mandatory term of life in prison without possibility of parole. A five-Justice majority of the Court rejected petitoner's claim that his sentence was so grossly disproportionate that it violated the Eighth Amendment.[389] The Court, however, could not agree on why his proportionality argument failed. Two members of the Court declined to apply gross disproportionality principles in reviewing non-capital sentences.[390] Justice Kennedy, joined by two other members of the Court, concurred in part and concurred in the judgment. Kennedy recognized that the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause encompasses a "narrow proportionality principle" that applies to non-capital sentences.[391] He then identified five 383 Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263, 268–85 (1980).

---

384 Hutto v. Davis, 454 U.S. 370, 374 (1982) (per curiam).

385 Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 290 (1983).

386 Id. at 292.

387 Id. at 291, n.17.

388 The Court also declined to admit that the possibility of commutation of a life sentence matches the possibility of parole. Assuming good behavior, parole is the normal expectation in the vast majority of cases and is governed by specified legal standards, whereas commutation is an ad hoc exercise of executive clemency that may occur at any time for any reason without reference to any standards. Id. at 300–301.

389 Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991).

390 Id. at 994.

391 Id. at 996–97 (opinion of Kennedy, J., joined by O'Connor and Souter, JJ.).

principles that give content to the uses and limits of proportionality review: (1) "the fixing of prison terms for specific crimes involves a substantial penological judgment that, as a general matter, is properly within the province of the legislature," and reviewing courts should grant substantial deference to legislative determinations; (2) "the Eighth Amendment does not mandate adoption of any one penological theory," taking into account that "the federal and state criminal systems have accorded different weights at different times to the penological goals of retribution, deterrence, incapacitation, and rehabilitation, . . . and competing theories of mandatory and discretionary sentencing have been in varying degrees of ascendancy or decline since the beginning of the Republic;" (3) "marked divergences both in sentencing theories and the length of prescribed prison terms are the inevitable, often beneficial, result of the federal structure, . . . [and] differing attitudes and perceptions of local conditions may yield different, yet rational, conclusions regarding the appropriate length of terms for particular crimes;" (4) "proportionality review by federal courts should be informed by objective factors to the maximum extent possible;" (5) the foregoing principles inform the final one: the Eighth Amendment does not require strict proportionality between crime and sentence, but rather "forbids only extreme sentences that are grossly disproportionate to the crime."[392] Reading Solem, Davis, Rummel, and Weems, Justice Kennedy also pointed out that "one factor may be sufficient to determine the constitutionality of a particular sentence" and stated that intra-jurisdictional and inter-jurisdictional comparative analyses are appropriate only in the rare case in which a threshold comparison of the crime committed and the sentence imposed leads to an inference of gross disproportionality.[393] Taking into consideration that 650 grams of cocaine had a potential yield of between 32,500 and 65,000 doses, Justice Kennedy admitted that the Michigan legislature "could with reason conclude that the threat posed to the individual and society by possession of this large an amount of cocaine—in terms of violence, crime, and social displacement—[wa]s momentous enough to warrant the deterrence and retribution of a life sentence without parole." Accordingly, he upheld the challenged punishment, without conducting a comparative analysis between Harmelin's sentence and sentences imposed for other crimes in Michigan and for the same crime in other jurisdictions.[394]

[E138] In the same case, Harmelin further argued that it was "cruel and unusual" to receive a mandatory sentence of such severity, without any consideration of so-called

---

[392] Id. at 998–1001.

[393] Id. at 1004–05. Three Justices, in dissent, remarked that Solem was directly to the contrary, for there (463 U.S. at 291, n.17) the Court had made clear that "no single criterion can identify when a sentence is so grossly disproportionate that it violates the Eighth Amendment." Id. at 1019.

[394] Id. at 1003–05. Three members of the Court dissented, noting, among other things, that the challenged statute was not "tailored to a defendant's personal responsibility and moral guilt." To convict someone under that statute, it was only necessary to prove that the defendant knowingly possessed a mixture containing narcotics that weighed at least 650 grams. There was no mens rea requirement of intent to distribute the drugs, as there was in a parallel statute. Indeed, the presence of a separate statute, which reached manufacture, delivery, or possession with intent to do either, undermined the state's position that the purpose of the possession statute was to reach drug dealers. Although intent to deliver could be inferred from the amount of a controlled substance possessed by the accused, the inference was one to be drawn by the jury. Moreover, the statute did not require a pecuniary motive and applied equally to first-time offenders, such as petitioner, and recidivists. Id. at 1023–25.

mitigating factors, such as, in his case, the fact that he had had no prior felony convictions. A five-Justice majority rejected this contention, finding that it had no support in the text and history of the Eighth Amendment and stressing that "severe, mandatory penalties may be cruel, but they are not unusual in the constitutional sense, having been employed in various forms throughout our Nation's history." Moreover, although petitioner's claim found some support in the so-called "individualized capital sentencing doctrine" of the Court's death penalty jurisprudence,[395] the majority explained that the specific doctrine might not be extended outside the capital context because of the qualitative differences between death—a punishment which is unique in its irrevocability—and all other penalties.[396]

[E139] In Ewing,[397] the Court dealt with a conviction under the California "three strikes" law. There a five-member majority upheld a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment, with possibility of parole after a term of 25 years, for the crime of stealing three golf clubs, priced at $399 a piece, committed by an offender previously convicted of numerous offenses, including four "serious or violent" felonies (three burglaries and a robbery). Once more, the majority was divided. Two Justices agreed that the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause contains no proportionality principle. Three members of the Court applied the proportionality principles set forth in Justice Kennedy's concurrence in Harmelin and concluded that the challenged sentence was not grossly disproportionate, for it was justified by the state's public-safety interest in incapacitating and deterring recidivist felons and amply supported by Ewing's long, serious criminal record.[398] The same five-member majority also held that, in applying the gross disproportionality principle, for 28 U.S.C. Section 2254(d)(1) purposes,[399] it was not unreasonable for a California court to affirm a sentence of two consecutive terms of 25 years to life in prison—carrying a 50-year minimum before parole eligibility—for the offense of stealing $150 worth videotapes, committed by an 37-year-old man with five prior felony and misdemeanor convictions (for transportation of marijuana, first-degree residential burglary, and theft).[400]

---

[395] See para. E112.

[396] Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 994–96 (1991). Cf. Chapman v. United States, 500 U.S. 453, 467 (1991) (the legislature "has the power to define criminal punishments without giving the courts any sentencing discretion").

[397] Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003).

[398] Id. at 29–30. The same Justices noted that, in weighing the offense's gravity, both the sentence-triggering criminal conduct and the offender's criminal history should be placed on the scales. Id. at 29. The four dissenters found Ewing's sentence grossly disproportionate, even under Harmelin's narrow proportionality framework. Still they observed that the three-factor analysis established in Solem, which specifically had addressed recidivist sentencing, seemed more directly on point.

[399] This section provides that "(d) An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim that was adjudicated on the merits in State court proceedings unless the adjudication of the claim . . . resulted in a decision that was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States."

[400] Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003).

4. Punishable Conduct

[E140] Legislatures have extremely broad discretion in defining criminal offenses.[401] Nevertheless, the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause of the Eighth Amendment imposes substantive limits on what can be made criminal and punished.[402] In Robinson v. California, the Court found unconstitutional a state statute that made the status of being addicted to a narcotic drug a criminal offense. The statute did not punish a person for the use of narcotics, for their purchase, sale or possession, or for anti-social or disorderly behavior resulting from their administration; it criminalized not an act but the mere "status" or "chronic condition" of narcotic addiction of an individual, who could be prosecuted at any time before he reformed. The Court stressed that a state may not punish a person for being mentally ill, or a leper, or afflicted with a venereal disease.[403] Considering that narcotic addiction is an illness, which, in fact, may be contracted innocently or involuntarily,[404] the Court concluded that "a state law which imprisons a person thus afflicted as a criminal, even though he has never touched any narcotic drug within the State or been guilty of any irregular behavior there, inflicts a cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."[405]

[E141] In Powell v. Texas, the Court refused to extend the above rationale to punishment of public drunkenness by a chronic alcoholic. Robinson was not considered controlling, since appellant had been convicted not for being a chronic alcoholic but for "public behavior which may create substantial health and safety hazards both for [him] and for members of the general public, and which offends the moral and esthetic sensibilities of a large segment of the community." A five-member majority, in upholding the conviction, noted that the record did not show that Powell suffered from such an irresistible compulsion to drink and to get drunk in public, that he was unable to control his performance of these acts, and thus could not be deterred from public intoxication.[406]

G. THE EXCESSIVE FINES CLAUSE

[E142] The Eighth Amendment prohibits the imposition of excessive fines. The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause makes the aforesaid prohibition applicable to the states.[407] The Eighth Amendment's text is not expressly limited to criminal cases, and its history does not require such a limitation.[408] However, the Excessive Fines Clause does not apply to punitive damages awards in cases between private parties; the 401 Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424 (2001), citing Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 268–269, n.18 (1984).

---

402 Cf. Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 80 (1992).

403 See also Justice Brennan's concurring opinion in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 273 (1972) ("To inflict punishment for having a disease is to treat the individual as a diseased thing, rather than as a sick human being.").

404 Not only may addiction innocently result from the use of medically prescribed narcotics, but a person may even be a narcotics addict from the moment of his birth.

405 Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 665, 667 (1962).

406 Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514, 532, 535 (1968).

407 Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc. 532 U.S. 424, 433–34 (2001).

408 Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 607–10 (1993). See also Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 103 (1997) (the Eighth Amendment protects against excessive civil fines).

Clause "was intended to limit only those fines directly imposed by, and payable to, the government."[409]

[E143] The Clause "limits the government's power to extract payments, whether in cash or in kind, as punishment for some offense."[410] Forfeitures—payments in kind—that constitute punishment for an offense are thus "fines,"[411] even if they also serve some remedial purpose.[412] While in rem forfeitures are not considered punishment, to the extent that they aim at the "guilty property" independently of the owner's conduct,[413] in personam criminal forfeitures have historically been treated as punitive.[414] Forfeitures under 21 U.S.C. Section 881(a)(4) and (a)(7), which provide for the forfeiture of, respectively, vehicles and real property used, or intended to be used, to facilitate the commission of certain drug-related crimes, are properly considered punishment, since both subsections clearly focus on the owner's culpability by expressly providing "innocent owner" defenses and by tying forfeiture directly to the commission of drug offenses, and since the legislative history confirms that Congress understood the provisions as serving to deter and to punish.[415] In case an individual is sentenced to a prison term and fine under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, forfeiture of his businesses, pursuant to this Act, is a form of monetary punishment and therefore subject to the Excessive Fines Clause.[416]

[E144] The touchstone of the constitutional inquiry under the Excessive Fines Clause is the principle of proportionality: the amount of the fine must bear some relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to punish. The Court has adopted the standard of gross disproportionality, articulated in its Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause precedents.[417] In Bajakajian, the Court considered, for the first time, the proportionality of a criminal forfeiture. Bajakajian attempted to leave the United States without reporting, as required by federal law, that he was transporting more than $10,000 in currency. Title 18 U.S.C. Section 982(a)(1) provides that a person convicted of willfully violating this reporting requirement shall forfeit to the government "any property . . . involved in such offense." The district court found, among other things, that the entire $357,144 was subject to forfeiture because it was "involved in" the offense, that the funds were not connected to any other crime, and that Bajakajian was transporting the money to repay a lawful debt. Concluding that full forfeiture would be grossly disproportional to the offense in question, and would therefore violate the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment, the court ordered forfeiture of $15,000, in addition to three years' probation and the maximum fine of $5,000. The 409 Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vermont, Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 268 (1989).

---

410 United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 328 (1998), quoting Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 609–10 (1993).

411 United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 328 (1998).

412 Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 610 (1993).

413 See paras. E6 et seq.

414 United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 331–32 (1998).

415 Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 619–22 (1993).

416 Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544, 558–59 (1993).

417 See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 336 (1998), citing Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 288 (1983) and Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263, 271 (1980). With respect to this standard, see paras. E133 et seq. In applying that standard, the courts of appeals should review the trial court proportionality determination de novo. See Bajakajian, supra, at 336–37.

Ninth Circuit came to the same conclusion. The Court, by a sharply divided vote, affirmed, on the following grounds. The essence of the Bajakajian's offense was a willful failure to report. His violation was unrelated to any other illegal activities. Bajakajian did not fit into the class of persons for whom the statute had been principally designed: money launderers, drug traffickers, and tax evaders. And the maximum penalties that could have been imposed under the federal law, a six-month sentence and a $5,000 fine, confirmed a minimal level of culpability. The harm that the offender had caused was also minimal. The failure to report affected only the government and in a relatively minor way. There was no fraud on the United States and no loss to the public fisc. Thus, there was no "articulable correlation" between the $357,144 and any government injury.[418]

H. THE DOUBLE JEOPARDY CLAUSE

1. In General

[E145] The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment, applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment,[419] provides that no person shall "be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." The clause applies only in the criminal context;[420] its protections are not triggered by litigation between private parties.[421]

[E146] The Fifth Amendment guarantee against double jeopardy[422] consists of three separate constitutional protections:[423]

(1) It protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal;[424]

(2) It protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and

(3) It protects against multiple criminal punishments for the same offense.

The clause also protects against retrial after the declaration of a mistrial in certain circumstances.[425] These protections stem from the underlying premise that a defen-

---

[418] United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 337–40 (1998). The four dissenters noted, inter alia, that the government needed the information to investigate other serious crimes and it needed the penalty to ensure compliance, regardless of the commission of another offense, related to drug trade, money laundering or tax evasion. Id. at 348, 351–52.

[419] Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784, 793–96 (1969), overruling Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937).

[420] See, e.g., Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 99 (1997).

[421] United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 451 (1989).

[422] The Due Process Clause does not provide greater double jeopardy protection than does the Double Jeopardy Clause. See Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003).

[423] The Clause operates primarily as a bar against repeated attempts to convict, with consequent subjection of the defendant to embarrassment, expense, anxiety, and insecurity, and the possibility that he may be found guilty, even though innocent. See Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 187–88 (1957); United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 136 (1980).

[424] See N. Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969).

[425] See Justices of Boston Mun. Court v. Lydon, 466 U.S. 294, 307, n.6 (1984), citing United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978).

dant should not be twice tried or punished for the same offense.[426] In addition, the clause embodies the collateral estoppel doctrine, which prohibits the government from relitigating an issue of ultimate fact that has been determined by a valid and final judgment.[427]

2. Attachment and Termination of Jeopardy

[E147] The first inquiry in any double jeopardy case must be whether jeopardy has "attached."[428] The Court has consistently adhered to the view that jeopardy does not attach, and the constitutional prohibition can have no application, until a defendant "is put to trial before the trier of the facts, whether the trier be a jury or a judge."[429] In the case of a jury trial, jeopardy attaches when a jury is empaneled and sworn.[430] The reason for that holding lies in the need to protect the interest of an accused in retaining a chosen jury.[431] In a non-jury trial, jeopardy attaches when the court begins to hear evidence,[432] that is, when the first witness is sworn.[433] In case of a juvenile defendant, jeopardy attaches at "a proceeding whose object is to determine whether a juvenile has committed acts that violate a criminal law and whose potential consequences include both the stigma inherent in such a determination and the deprivation of liberty for many years;" therefore a juvenile is placed twice in jeopardy when, after an adjudicatory finding in juvenile court that he violated a criminal statute and a subsequent finding that he was unfit for treatment as a juvenile, he is transferred to an adult criminal court and tried and convicted for the same conduct.[434]

[E148] The protection of the Double Jeopardy Clause, by its terms, applies only if there has been some event, such as an acquittal,[435] that terminates the original jeopardy. Neither the failure of the jury to reach a verdict nor a trial court's declaration of a mistrial, following a jury's inability to agree on a verdict, terminates the original jeopardy.[436] This rule accords recognition to society's interest in giving the prosecution "one complete opportunity to convict those who have violated its laws."[437]

---

426 United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 339 (1975).

427 Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 443–47 (1970). See also Dowling v. Unites States, 493 U.S. 342, 347–48 (1990).

428 Swisher v. Brady, 438 U.S. 204, 220 (1978).

429 United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 479 (1971).

430 Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 35 (1978), citing Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963).

431 Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 35 (1978).

432 Serfass v. United States, 420 U.S. 377, 388 (1975).

433 Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 35, n.15 (1978).

434 Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 529 (1975).

435 Acquittal may be "express or implied by a conviction on a lesser included offense when the jury was given a full opportunity to return a verdict on the greater charge." See Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323, 329 (1970); Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 190–91 (1957). Cf. Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222, 236 (1994).

In Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005), the Court held that if, after a facially unqualified mid-trial dismissal of one count, the trial has proceeded to the defendant's introduction of evidence on the remaining counts, the acquittal must be treated as final, unless the availability of reconsideration has been plainly established by pre-existing rule or case authority expressly applicable to mid-trial rulings on the sufficiency of the evidence.

436 Richardson v. United States, 486 U.S. 317, 322–26 (1984).

437 Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 509 (1978).

[E149] The question whether, under the Double Jeopardy Clause, there can be a new trial after a mistrial has been declared, without the defendant's request or consent, depends on whether "there is a manifest necessity for the mistrial, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated."[438] For example, there is such necessity if a defendant has been brought to trial under a fatally deficient indictment.[439] Where a defendant successfully seeks to avoid his trial prior to its conclusion by a motion for a mistrial, the Double Jeopardy Clause is not offended by a second prosecution, for "[s]uch a motion by the defendant is deemed to be a deliberate election on his part to forgo his valued right to have his guilt or innocence determined by the first trier of fact."[440] Similarly, when the defendant has his case dismissed and his trial terminated, not because of his assertion that the government has failed to make out a case against him, but because of a legal claim that the government's case against him must fail even though it might satisfy the trier of fact that he was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, a new prosecution or an appeal by the government from his successful effort to do so is not barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause.[441]

[E150] It is well settled that if a defendant is convicted, but appeals the conviction and succeeds in having it set aside, jeopardy has not terminated, so that the double jeopardy guarantee does not preclude his retrial.[442] This rule rests on the premise that the original conviction has been nullified and "the slate wiped clean."[443] That a defendant's conviction is overturned on collateral, rather than direct, attack is irrelevant for that purpose.[444]

[E151] There is an important exception, however, to the aforesaid rule. A defendant may not be retried if he obtains a reversal of his conviction on the sole ground that the evidence was insufficient to convict.[445] The Double Jeopardy Clause forbids a second trial for the purpose of affording the prosecution another opportunity to supply evidence

---

[438] United States v. Perez, 9 Wheat. 579, 580 (1824); United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600, 606 (1976).

[439] Illinois v. Somerville, 410 U.S. 458, 461 (1973).

[440] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 93 (1978), citing United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600, 606–08 (1976).

[441] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 96 (1978): Lee v. United States, 432 U.S. 23, 28–31 (1977).

[442] See, e.g., United States v. Ball, 163 U.S. 662, 672 (1896); Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101, 106 (2003). The retrial must be limited to the offense for which the defendant was convicted at his first trial. See Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323, 327 (1970). For example, a defendant may not be retried and convicted of first-degree murder after an earlier guilty verdict on the lesser included offense of second-degree murder is set aside on appeal. In such a case, the first jury's verdict of guilty on the second-degree murder charge is considered to be an "implicit acquittal" on the charge of first-degree murder, as long as the jury was given a full opportunity to return a verdict on that charge and instead reached a verdict on the lesser charge. See Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 190–91 (1957). If the first conviction was limited to the lesser included offense, the retrial must be limited to that lesser offense.

[443] N. Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 721 (1969).

[444] United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463, 466 (1964).

[445] Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 18 (1978); Greene v. Massey, 437 U.S. 19, 24–27 (1978). Burks is not to be read as holding that double jeopardy protections are violated only when the prosecution has adduced no evidence at all of the crime or an element thereof. See Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40, 43 (1981).

that it failed to muster in the first proceeding. This holding is "based on the view that an appellate court's reversal for insufficiency of the evidence is, in effect, a determination that the government's case against the defendant was so lacking that the trial court should have entered a judgment of acquittal, rather than submitting the case to the jury."[446] A reversal for legally insufficient evidence represents a determination that no "rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt,"[447] and, therefore, the defendant was entitled to a judgment of acquittal as a matter of law. "[I]t makes no difference that a defendant has sought a new trial as one of his remedies, or even as the sole remedy. It cannot be meaningfully said that a person 'waives' his right to a judgment of acquittal by moving for a new trial."[448]

[E152] A reversal of a conviction based on "the weight of the evidence, . . . unlike a reversal based on insufficient evidence, does not mean that acquittal was the only proper verdict. Instead, the appellate court sits as a 'thirteenth juror' and disagrees with the jury's resolution of the conflicting testimony. A deadlocked jury does not result in an acquittal barring retrial under the Double Jeopardy Clause. Similarly, an appellate court's disagreement with the jurors' weighing of the evidence does not require the special deference accorded verdicts of acquittal. A reversal based on the weight of the evidence, moreover, can occur only after the State has presented sufficient evidence to support conviction and has persuaded the jury to convict. The reversal simply affords the defendant a second opportunity to seek an acquittal. An appellate court's decision to give the defendant this second chance does not create an unacceptably high risk that the Government, with its superior resources, will wear down the defendant and obtain conviction solely through its persistence."[449]

[E153] Reversal for trial error, such as the incorrect receipt or rejection of evidence, is distinguished from evidentiary insufficiency, since "it implies nothing with respect to the guilt or innocence of the defendant [but is simply] a determination that he has been convicted through a judicial process which is defective in some fundamental respect."[450] Hence, when a reviewing court determines that a defendant's conviction must be set aside, because certain evidence was erroneously admitted against him, and also concludes that, without the inadmissible evidence, there was insufficient evidence to support a conviction, the Double Jeopardy Clause does not forbid his retrial, so long as the evidence admitted, even erroneously, by the trial court was sufficient to sustain a guilty verdict.[451]

3. The "Dual Sovereignty" Doctrine

[E154] "When a defendant in a single act violates the 'peace and dignity' of two sovereigns by breaking the laws of each, he has committed two distinct 'offences.'"[452] But

---

[446] Lockhart v. Nelson, 488 U.S. 33, 39 (1988), citing Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 16–17 (1978).

[447] Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319 (1979).

[448] Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1978).

[449] Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31, 42–43 (1982).

[450] Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 15 (1978).

[451] Lockhart v. Nelson, 488 U.S. 33, 39–42 (1988) (there is no constitutional infirmity in holding a second sentencing hearing where the first sentence was improperly based on a prior conviction for which the defendant had been pardoned).

[452] Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82, 88 (1985), citing United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377, 382 (1922).

the dual sovereignty doctrine is limited, by its own terms, to cases where "the two entities that seek successively to prosecute a defendant for the same course of conduct can be termed separate sovereigns. This determination turns on whether the two entities draw their authority to punish the offender from distinct sources of power"[453] not on whether they are pursuing separate interests.[454]

[E155] Thus, the Court has uniformly held that the states are separate sovereigns with respect to the federal government because each state's power to prosecute is derived from its own "inherent sovereignty," not from the federal government.[455] "The States are no less sovereign with respect to each other than they are with respect to the Federal Government. Their powers to undertake criminal prosecutions derive from separate and independent sources of power and authority originally belonging to them before admission to the Union and preserved to them by the Tenth Amendment."[456] On the basis of the same reasoning, the Court has found that the Navajo Tribe, whose power to prosecute its members for tribal offenses is derived from the Tribe's "primeval sovereignty," rather than a delegation of federal authority, is an independent sovereign from the federal government for double jeopardy purposes of the dual sovereignty doctrine.[457] Conversely, the Court has held that successive prosecutions by federal and territorial courts are barred, because such courts are "creations emanating from the same sovereignty."[458] Similarly, municipalities that derive their power to try a defendant from the same organic law that empowers the state to prosecute are not separate sovereigns with respect to the state.[459]

4. Same Offense

[E156] In Blockburger, the Court announced that "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[460] This test emphasizes the elements of the two crimes. "If each requires proof of a fact that the other does not, the Blockburger test is satisfied, notwithstanding a substantial overlap in the proof offered to establish the

---

[453] Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82, 88, 91–93 (1985).

[454] See United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 725 (1993) (opinion of Justice White).

[455] See, e.g., Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187, 193–94 (1959).

[456] Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82, 89 (1985).

[457] United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. 313, 328 (1978). In Duro v. Reina, 495 U.S. 676, 684–85 (1990), the Court ruled that a tribe lacks sovereign authority to prosecute persons (even Indians) who are not tribe members and commit crimes on the reservation. Nevertheless, under United States v. Lara, 541 U.S. 193 (2004), Congress has the constitutional power to lift the restrictions on the tribes' criminal jurisdiction over non-member Indians.

[458] Puerto Rico v. Shell Co., 302 U.S. 253, 264 (1937). See also Grafton v. United States, 206 U.S. 333, 354–55 (1907).

[459] Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387, 393 (1970).

[460] Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932). See also United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 704 (1993), overruling Grady v. Corbin, 495 U.S. 508, 515–24 (1990). In Grady, the Court held that, in addition to passing the Blockburger test, a subsequent prosecution must satisfy a "same-conduct" test to avoid the double jeopardy bar. Under that test, "if, to establish an essential element of an offense charged in that prosecution, the government will prove conduct that constitutes an offense for which the defendant has already been prosecuted," a second prosecution may not be had. See Grady, supra, at 510.

crimes."[461] "The greater offense is, . . . by definition, the 'same,' for purposes of double jeopardy, as any lesser offense included in it. . . . [T]he Fifth Amendment forbids successive prosecution and cumulative punishment for a greater and lesser included offense." For example, since, under state law, the misdemeanor of joyriding (taking or operating a vehicle without the owner's consent) is a lesser included offense in the felony of auto theft (joyriding with the intent permanently to deprive the owner of possession), a prosecution for the misdemeanor bars a second prosecution for the felony.[462] This protection applies even if the acquittal is based on an "egregiously erroneous foundation."[463]

[E157] "The Double Jeopardy Clause is not such a fragile guarantee that prosecutors can avoid its limitations by the simple expedient of dividing a single crime into a series of temporal or spatial units." Taking the previous example of joyriding and auto theft, the specification of different dates in the two charges against an individual cannot alter the fact that the theft and operation of a single car is a single offense.[464]

[E158] The Court has cautioned against "ready transposition of the 'lesser included offense' principles of double jeopardy from the classically simple situation of a single course of conduct to the multilayered conduct, both as to time and to place, involved" in "continuing criminal enterprise" prosecutions.[465] In a closely related context, it has recognized that a substantive crime and a conspiracy to commit that crime are not the same offense for double jeopardy purposes, even if they are based on the same underlying incidents, because "the essence of a conspiracy offense is in the agreement or confederation to commit a crime."[466]

[E159] The Double Jeopardy Clause does not preclude the imposition, in a single trial, of cumulative punishments pursuant to separate criminal statutes proscribing the same conduct. "The assumption underlying the [Blockburger] rule is that Congress ordinarily does not intend to punish the same offense under two different statutes. Accordingly, where two statutory provisions proscribe the 'same offense,' they are construed not to authorize cumulative punishments in the absence of a clear indication of contrary legislative intent."[467] Therefore, "where . . . a legislature specifically authorizes cumulative

---

461 Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 785, n.17 (1975) (emphasis added).

462 Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 168–69, (1977). An exception may exist where the state is unable to proceed on the more serious charge at the outset because the additional facts necessary to sustain that charge have not occurred or have not been discovered despite the exercise of due diligence. Id. at 169, n.7.

463 Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141, 143 (1962) (per curiam); Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 68–69 (1978). "[W]hen a jeopardy-barred conviction is reduced to a conviction for a lesser included offense that is not jeopardy-barred, the burden shifts to the defendant to demonstrate a reasonable probability [i.e., a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome] that he would not have been convicted of the nonjeopardy-barred offense absent the presence of the jeopardy-barred offense. . . . [W]here it is clear that the jury necessarily found that the defendant's conduct satisfies the elements of the lesser included offense, it would be incongruous to order another trial as a means of curing" the double jeopardy violation. See Morris v. Mathews, 475 U.S. 237, 246–47 (1986).

464 Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 169–70 (1977).

465 See Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773, 789 (1985).

466 United States v. Felix, 503 U.S. 378, 389–91 (1992).

467 Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684, 691–92 (1980). See also Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 340 (1981) (the Blockburger test is a "rule of statutory construction" and because punishments under two statutes, regardless of whether those two statutes proscribe the 'same' conduct under Blockburger, a court's task of statutory construction is at an end, and the prosecutor may seek and the trial court or jury may impose cumulative punishment under such statutes in a single trial."[468] "The presumption when Congress creates two distinct offenses is that it intends to permit cumulative sentences, and legislative silence on this specific issue does not establish an ambiguity or rebut this presumption."[469]

[E160] "By entering a guilty plea, an accused does not simply state that he did the discrete acts described in the indictment; he is admitting guilt of a substantive crime." Hence, when a defendant pleads guilty to two indictments, he concedes guilt to two separate offenses and, consequently, relinquishes the opportunity to receive a factual hearing on a double jeopardy claim.[470]

5. The Collateral Estoppel Component

[E161] The Double Jeopardy Clause incorporates the doctrine of collateral estoppel in criminal proceedings. Collateral estoppel, or, in modern usage, issue preclusion, means that "when an issue of ultimate fact has once been determined by a valid and final judgment, that issue cannot again be litigated between the same parties in any future lawsuit. . . . Where a previous judgment of acquittal was based upon a general verdict, as is usually the case, the trial court must examine the record of the prior proceeding, taking into account the pleadings, evidence, charge, or other relevant matter, and conclude whether a rational jury could have grounded its verdict upon an issue other than that which the defendant seeks to foreclose from consideration."[471] Jury silence on a specific charge does not have collateral estoppel effect "unless the record establishes that the issue was actually and necessarily decided in the defendant's favor."[472] The burden is "on the defendant to demonstrate that the issue whose relitigation he seeks to foreclose was actually decided in the first proceeding;" if there are "any number of possible explanations for the jury's acquittal verdict," the defendant has failed to satisfy this burden.[473] Besides, the collateral estoppel doctrine does not bar the later use of evidence relating to alleged criminal conduct for which a defendant has been acquitted, if such evidence is to be evaluated under a standard of proof less strict than that required for a conviction.[474]

6. Sentencing

[E162] "In the multiple punishments context, . . . the Double Jeopardy Clause does no more than prevent the sentencing court from prescribing greater punishment than it serves as a means of discerning congressional purpose, the rule should not be controlling where there is a clear indication of contrary legislative intent).

---

468 Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 368–69 (1983).

469 Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773, 793 (1985).

470 United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563, 570, 573 (1989).

471 Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 443–44 (1970). The preclusive effect of the jury's verdict is a question of federal law which the Court reviews de novo. See Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222, 232 (1994).

472 Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222, 236 (1994).

473 Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 350, 352 (1990).

474 Id. at 348–50.

the legislature intended."[475] "The imposition of a particular sentence usually is not regarded as an 'acquittal' of any more severe sentence that could have been imposed."[476] As noted above,[477] where an appeals court overturns a conviction on the ground that the prosecution proffered insufficient evidence of guilt, that finding is comparable to an acquittal, and the Double Jeopardy Clause precludes a second trial. "Where a similar failure of proof occurs in a sentencing proceeding, however, the analogy is inapt. The pronouncement of sentence simply does not 'have the qualities of constitutional finality that attend an acquittal.'"[478] Consequently, the guarantee against double jeopardy does not prevent the prosecution from seeking review of a sentence.[479] Furthermore, if a defendant, after having his initial conviction overturned, is convicted again, "he constitutionally may be subjected to whatever punishment is lawful, whether or not it is greater than the sentence imposed after the first conviction,"[480] "subject only to the limitation that he receive credit for time served."[481] [E163] However, the Court has established a "narrow exception" to the general rule that double jeopardy principles have no application in the sentencing context. Under Bullington, the Double Jeopardy Clause does apply to capital-sentencing proceedings that "have the hallmarks of the trial on guilt or innocence," such as separate sentencing proceedings at which the jury is presented with a choice between two alternatives, together with standards to guide their decision, and the prosecution is required to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, certain statutorily defined facts in order to justify the death sentence.[482] In such cases, it must be examined whether a defendant's initial life sentence amounted to his acquittal of whatever was necessary for the imposition of the death sentence. Thus, "the relevant inquiry for double jeopardy purposes is not whether the defendant received a life sentence the first time around, but rather whether a first life

---

[475] Jones v. Thomas, 491 U.S. 376, 381 (1989), quoting Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 366 (1983).

[476] Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 438 (1981).

[477] See para. E151.

[478] Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721, 729 (1998), quoting United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 134 (1980).

[479] Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721, 730 (1998). See also United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 132–39 (1980), where the Court upheld the constitutionality of a statute that allowed the United States to appeal the sentence imposed on a defendant adjudged to be a "dangerous special offender."

[480] Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 442 (1981). In Stroud v. v. United States, 251 U.S. 15 (1919), the Court unanimously held that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not bar imposition of the death penalty at the new trial of a murderer who had been sentenced to life imprisonment at his first trial.

[481] Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 442 (1981). See also N. Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 718–19 (1969) (the constitutional guarantee against double jeopardy is violated when punishment already exacted for an offense is not fully "credited" in imposing a new sentence for the same offense, after retrial).

It would not be possible to "credit" a fine against time in prison. See Jones v. Thomas, 491 U.S. 376, 384 (1989). If a defendant is sentenced to a fine and imprisonment, under a statute that provides only for fine or imprisonment, and pays the fine, he is entitled to be released, for one valid alternative provision of the sentence has been satisfied. See In re Bradley, 318 U.S. 50, 52 (1943).

[482] Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 437–46 (1981). See also Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 209–12 (1984).

sentence was an 'acquittal' based on findings sufficient to establish legal entitlement to the life sentence—i.e., findings that the government failed to prove one or more aggravating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt."[483] Subsequently, if the jury in the first proceeding was deadlocked on whether to impose the death penalty and made no findings with respect to a particular aggravating circumstance, that result cannot fairly be called an acquittal, based on findings sufficient to establish legal entitlement to a life sentence.[484] Nevertheless, a capital sentencer's failure to find a particular aggravating circumstance alleged by the prosecution does not always constitute an "acquittal" of that circumstance for double jeopardy purposes. In case a defendant is sentenced to death and argues on appeal that the evidence presented at his sentencing hearing was, as a matter of law, insufficient to support the aggravating circumstances on which his death sentence was based, "the Double Jeopardy Clause does not require the reviewing court, if it sustains that claim, to ignore evidence in the record supporting another aggravating circumstance which the sentencer has erroneously rejected."[485]

[E164] The above exception is confined to the unique circumstances of capital sentencing. In many respects, a capital trial's penalty phase is a continuation of the trial on guilt or innocence of capital murder. The death penalty is unique in both its severity and its finality, and the qualitative difference between a capital sentence and other penalties calls for individualized sentencing and a greater degree of reliability when it is imposed. On these grounds, the Court has declined to extend Bullington's rationale to non-capital sentencing proceedings, even if such proceedings have the hallmarks of the trial on guilt or innocence.[486]

[E165] "Recidivism has long been recognized as a legitimate basis for increased punishment."[487] There is no constitutional infirmity in using prior convictions to enhance sentences for subsequent convictions, "even though this means a defendant must, in a certain sense, relitigate in a sentencing proceeding conduct for which he was previously tried."[488] Under recidivist sentencing schemes, "the enhanced punishment imposed for the latter offense 'is not to be viewed as either a new jeopardy or additional penalty for the earlier crimes,' but instead as 'a stiffened penalty for the latest crime, which is considered to be an aggravated offense because a repetitive one.'"[489]

[E166] If a kidnapper who killed his victim is given a life sentence for murder and later is convicted of the separate crime of kidnapping, the sentencing court may take into account, in determining the proper sentence for the kidnapping, the fact that the kidnapping victim was murdered.[490] Therefore, the "use of evidence of related criminal conduct to enhance a defendant's sentence for a separate crime within the authorized statutory limits does not constitute punishment for that conduct within the meaning

---

[483] Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101, 108 (2003). See also Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 211 (1984); Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 445 (1981).

[484] Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003).

[485] Poland v. Arizona, 476 U.S. 147, 156–57 (1986).

[486] Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721, 731–34 (1998).

[487] Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11, 25 (2003) (opinion of Justice O'Connor).

[488] Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222, 230–31 (1994), citing Spencer v. Texas, 385 U.S. 554, 560 (1967) and Moore v. Missouri, 159 U.S. 673, 678 (1895).

[489] Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389, 400 (1995), quoting Gryger v. Burke, 334 U.S. 728, 732 (1948).

[490] Williams v. Oklahoma, 358 U.S. 576, 585–86 (1959).

of the Double Jeopardy Clause." In this context, it makes no difference whether the enhancement occurred in the first or second sentencing proceeding. Accordingly, double jeopardy principles do not bar "a later prosecution or punishment for criminal activity where that activity has been considered at sentencing for a separate crime."[491]

[E167] Thus, sentencing courts may constitutionally consider "a defendant's past criminal behavior, even if no conviction resulted from that behavior. . . . An acquittal is not a finding of fact; it can only be an acknowledgment that the government failed to prove an essential element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Without specific jury findings, no one can logically or realistically draw any factual finding inferences."[492] Consequently, "a jury's verdict of acquittal does not prevent the sentencing court from considering conduct underlying the acquitted charge, so long as that conduct has been proved by a preponderance of the evidence."[493]

---

491 Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389, 398–99 (1995).

492 United States v. Watts, 519 U.S. 148, 152, 155 (1997) (per curiam).

493 Id. at 157.

CHAPTER 6

PERSONAL OR FAMILY PRIVACY AND AUTONOMY

A. IN GENERAL

[F1] The Constitution does not explicitly mention any right of privacy. However, the Court has recognized that a right of personal privacy and autonomy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the substantive due process protection of "liberty."[1] In varying contexts, the Court also has found the roots of that right in the First,[2] Fourth,[3] and Fifth[4] Amendments and in the "penumbras" of the Bill of Rights.[5]

[F2] The constitutionally protected private sphere includes "only personal rights that can be deemed 'fundamental' or 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.'"[6] It involves at least three different kinds of interests. The first is the right of the individual to be free in his private affairs from governmental surveillance and intrusion;[7] this interest is primarily protected by the Fourth Amendment. The Court also has held that,

---

[1] See, e.g., Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 152 (1973); Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 684 (1977); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 562 (2003) ("liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of certain intimate conduct"). The Court has announced that its obligation is "to define the liberty of all, not to mandate [its] own moral code." See Lawrence, supra, at 571, quoting Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 850 (1992).

[2] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969) (the First Amendment prohibits making mere private possession of obscene material a crime). The Court has stated that the principle of individual liberty in the home has special resonance when the government seeks to constrain a person's ability to speak there. See City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 58 (1994), involving the display of a residential anti-war sign.

[3] See California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 211 (1986) (wherever an individual has manifested a reasonable "expectation of privacy," he is entitled to be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion).

[4] Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S. 406, 416 (1966), citing Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52, 55 (1964) (the privilege against self-incrimination reflects the Constitution's concern for the essential values represented by the "respect for the inviolability of the human personality and of the right of each individual to a private enclave where he may lead a private life").

[5] Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 484–85 (1965) (a statute forbidding use of contraceptives violates the right of marital privacy).

[6] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 152 (1973). For example, there is no fundamental privacy right, implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, to watch obscene movies in places of public accommodation. See Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 66 (1973).

[7] Cf. Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 499, n.24 (1977). A state bar committee may reasonably inquire as to the nature and extent of the actual acquaintance between an applicant for admission to practice law and the persons who certify the applicant's character and fitness. In that context, an affiant may be asked to state whether he has visited the applicant's home and, if so, how often. See Law Students Civil Rights Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 160 (1971).

under the First Amendment, a state "has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch."[8] The second is "the individual interest in avoiding disclosure of personal matters."[9] The third is "the interest in independence in making certain kinds of important decisions,"[10] such as those relating to marriage,[11] sexual conduct,[12] procreation,[13] contraception,[14] abortion,[15] family relationships[16] or living arrangements,[17] child rearing, and education.[18] "These matters, involving the most intimate and personal choices a person may make in a lifetime, choices central to personal dignity and autonomy, are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. At the heart of liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life. Beliefs about these matters could not define the attributes of personhood were they formed under compulsion of the State."[19] "[A] state interest in standardizing its children and adults, making the 'private realm of family life' conform to some state-designed ideal, is not a legitimate state interest at all."[20]

[F3] In the same context, the Court has recognized that "the freedom to enter into and carry on certain intimate or private relationships is a fundamental element of 'liberty' protected by the Bill of Rights."[21] "Without precisely identifying every consideration that may underlie this type of constitutional protection, the Court has noted that certain kinds of personal bonds have played a critical role in the culture and traditions of the Nation by cultivating and transmitting shared ideals and beliefs; they thereby foster diversity and act as critical buffers between the individual and the power of the State. . . . [T]he constitutional shelter afforded such relationships reflects the realization that individuals draw much of their emotional enrichment from close ties with others. Protecting these relationships from unwarranted state interference therefore safeguards the ability independently to define one's identity that is central to any concept of liberty."[22] That

---

8 Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 565 (1969). Nevertheless, the government may criminalize the possession of child pornography. See Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990). Furthermore, the Court has negated the idea that some zone of constitutionally protected privacy follows obscene material when it is moved outside the home area. See United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139, 141–42 (1973).

9 Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599 (1977). See also Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 457–65 (1977).

10 Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599–600 (1977).

11 Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967); Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 383–87 (1978).

12 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

13 Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).

14 Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481–86 (1965); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 453–54, 460 (1972); Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 685 (1977).

15 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 152–154 (1973); Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 846–53 (1992).

16 Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944).

17 Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 498–99 (1977) (plurality opinion).

18 Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 535 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923).

19 Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 851 (1992).

20 Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417, 452 (1990).

21 Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 545 (1987).

22 Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 618–19 (1984).

constitutional protection is not restricted to relationships among family members but embraces "those relationships, including family relationships, that presuppose 'deep attachments and commitments to the necessarily few other individuals with whom one shares not only a special community of thoughts, experiences, and beliefs, but also distinctively personal aspects of one's life.'"[23] Among other things, therefore, these relationships "are distinguished by such attributes as relative smallness, a high degree of selectivity in decisions to begin and maintain the affiliation, and seclusion from others in critical aspects of the relationship."[24] Large groups that produce an inclusive, not exclusive membership and carry on many of their central activities in the presence of numerous strangers lack the distinctive characteristics that might afford constitutional protection to the decision of its members to exclude women.[25]

[F4] Privacy is intertwined with the right of every person "to be let alone,"[26] which has been characterized as "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."[27] A basic aspect of the aforesaid right is the right of an individual to be "free from [unwanted] sights, sounds and tangible matter."[28] "The right to avoid unwelcome speech has special force in the privacy of the home . . . and its immediate surroundings."[29] Thus, the intrusion into the home of an unwelcome solicitor,[30] unwanted mail,[31] excessive noise,[32] or, even, patently offensive radio broadcasts[33] may be forbidden. Similarly, the government may prohibit picketing focused on, and taking place in front of, a particular residence.[34] The same right can also be protected in a setting not relating to one's home. Hence, the government may make it a crime for any person within 100 feet of a health care facility's entrance to knowingly approach within eight feet of another person, without that person's consent, in order to display a sign

---

[23] Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 545 (1987), citing Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 619–20 (1984).

[24] Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 620 (1984).

[25] Id. at 621–22; Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 546–47 (1987). See also New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. New York City, 487 U.S. 1, 12 (1988) (the fact that a club provides "regular meal service" and receives regular payments "directly or indirectly from or on behalf of nonmembers for the furtherance of trade or business" is also significant in defining the non-private nature of such an association, because of the kind of role that strangers play in its ordinary existence). See also FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 237 (1990) (any "personal bonds" that are formed from the use of a motel room for less than ten hours are not those that have played a critical role in the culture and traditions of the American nation by cultivating and transmitting shared ideals and beliefs).

[26] See, e.g., Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 716–17 (2000).

[27] Id., quoting Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (1928) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

[28] Rowan v. United States Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728, 736–37 (1970).

[29] Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 717 (2000). "The interest in privacy has the same dignity in a densely populated apartment complex . . . or in an affluent neighborhood of single-family homes. In either context, the protection of the individual interest may involve the imposition of some burdens on the general public." See City of Memphis v. Greene, 451 U.S. 100, 127 (1981).

[30] See Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 147–48 (1943).

[31] See Rowan v. United States Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728, 736–37 (1970).

[32] See Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 87–89 (1949).

[33] See Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 748–49 (1978).

[34] See Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 484–85 (1988).

to, or engage in oral protest, or counseling with that person.[35] Nevertheless, the broadcasting of radio programs in public busses does not violate the privacy rights of passengers who do not wish to listen to those programs.[36]

B. PROTECTION OF PERSONAL DATA AND COMMUNICATIONS

[F5] Privacy encompasses "the individual's control of information concerning his or her person. . . . [T]he fact that an event is not wholly 'private' does not mean that an individual has no interest in limiting disclosure or dissemination of the information."[37]

[F6] In Whalen v. Roe, the Court confronted a facial challenge against a statute that allowed the state of New York to record, in a centralized computer file, the names and addresses of all persons obtaining, pursuant to a doctor's prescription, certain drugs for which there was both a lawful and an unlawful market. The challenged program was found to be a rational measure against the misuse of dangerous drugs, for the patient identification requirement could reasonably be expected to have a deterrent effect on potential violators, as well as to aid in the detection or investigation of specific instances of apparent abuse. The statute expressly prohibited public disclosure of the identity of patients and contained several security provisions: the prescription forms would be retained in a vault in a room surrounded by a locked wire fence and protected by an alarm system; in addition, the computer tapes would be kept in a locked cabinet, and the computer would be running "off-line," which meant that no terminal outside of the computer room could read or record any information. Besides, there was no support in the record for an assumption that these security provisions would be administered improperly. And the remote possibility that judicial supervision of the evidentiary use of particular items of stored information would provide inadequate protection against unwarranted disclosures was not a sufficient reason for invalidating the entire patient identification program. In light of the above, the Court upheld the statute, noting that "disclosures of private medical information to doctors, to hospital personnel, to insurance companies, and to public health agencies are often an essential part of modern medical practice even when the disclosure may reflect unfavorably on the character of the patient, [and] [r]equiring such disclosures to representatives of the State having responsibility for the health of the community, does not automatically amount to an impermissible invasion of privacy."[38]

[F7] "The decision to terminate a pregnancy is an intensely private one that must be protected in a way that assures anonymity."[39] If the state decides to require a pregnant minor to obtain parental consent for an abortion, it also must provide an alternative judicial procedure, whereby authorization for the abortion can be obtained. The bypass proceeding must insure the minor's anonymity.[40] This requirement is satisfied, when state law prohibits the juvenile court from notifying the parents that the complainant is pregnant and wants an abortion, requires state courts to preserve her anonymity and the confidentiality of court papers, and makes it a crime for any state

---

35 See Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 716–18 (2000).

36 See Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451, 463–65 (1952).

37 Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm., 489 U.S. 749, 763, 770 (1989).

38 Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 602 (1977).

39 Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 766 (1986).

40 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 644 (1979) (plurality opinion).

employee to disclose documents not designated as public records. The mere possibility of unauthorized, illegal disclosure by state employees is not dispositive. Nor is the fact that the minor is obligated to supply identifying information at the complaint form, since complete anonymity is not critical under the Court's decisions.[41]

[F8] Record keeping and reporting provisions of abortion laws "that are reasonably directed to the preservation of maternal health and that properly respect a patient's confidentiality and privacy are permissible."[42] Reports of abortions, while not mentioning the woman's name, may not be available to the public, if they contain such detailed information about her and the circumstances under which she had an abortion that identification is likely.[43]

[F9] Skinner involved a regulation that mandated blood and urine tests of railroad employees who were involved in certain train accidents. When employees produced the blood and urine samples required by the regulation, they were asked by medical personnel to complete a form stating whether they had taken any medications during the preceding 30 days. The completed forms were shipped with the samples to the Federal Railroad Administration's laboratory, and this information was used to ascertain whether a positive test result could be explained by the employee's lawful use of medications. While this procedure permitted the government to learn certain private medical facts that an employee might prefer not to disclose, there was no indication that the government did not treat this information as confidential, or that it used the information for any other purpose. Under the circumstances, the Court did not view this procedure as a significant invasion of privacy.[44]

[F10] In Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, the Court dealt with the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act, which directed an official of the Executive Branch, to take custody of the presidential papers and tape recordings of former President Richard Nixon, and promulgate regulations providing, inter alia, for the orderly processing and screening by Executive Branch archivists of such materials, for the purpose of returning to Nixon those that were personal and private in nature. The materials at issue consisted of some 42 million pages of documents and some 880 tape recordings of conversations. Nixon challenged the Act's constitutionality, claiming among other things, that the Act on its face violated his privacy interests. The Court pointed out that the vast proportion of Nixon's presidential materials were official documents or records and, therefore, Nixon's privacy claim related only to a very small fraction of the massive volume of these materials and embraced, for example, extremely private communications between him and, among others, his wife, his daughters, his physician, lawyer, clergyman, and his close friends, as well as personal diary dictabelts and his wife's personal files. Considering Nixon's status as a public figure, his lack of 41 Ohio v. Akron Center for Reprod. Health, 497 U.S. 502, 512–13 (1990).

---

42 Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri. v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 80 (1976). Similarly a pathology report requirement is constitutional, for it is reasonably related to generally accepted medical standards, and furthers important health-related state concerns. See Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Kansas City, Missouri, Inc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476, 486–90 (1983). Although such requirements might increase the cost of abortions by a slight amount, they do not impose a substantial obstacle to a woman's choice. See Planned supra at 489; Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 901 (1992) (plurality opinion).

43 Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 767 (1986).

44 Skinner v. Ray. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 626, n.7 (1989).

any expectation of privacy in the overwhelming majority of the presidential materials, the important public interest in preservation of these materials, the virtual impossibility of segregating the small quantity of private materials without comprehensive screening, the Act's sensitivity to Nixon's legitimate privacy interests, the unblemished record of the archivists for discretion, and the likelihood that the regulations that should be promulgated by the administrator would further moot Nixon's fears that his materials would be reviewed by "a host of persons," the Court rejected Nixon's privacy claim.[45]

[F11] As a general matter, state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of truthful information about a matter of public significance, absent a need of the highest order.[46] Privacy is an important interest but does not prohibit any such publication. Where the publisher has lawfully obtained information from a source who obtained it unlawfully, by intercepting and recording a confidential cell phone conversation, privacy concerns may give way when balanced against the interest in publishing matters of public importance.[47] The commission and investigation of a violent crime that has been reported to authorities is considered to be a matter of public significance. Hence, although the interests in protecting the privacy and safety of sexual assault victims and in encouraging them to report offenses without fear of exposure are highly significant, the state may not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, impose civil sanctions on the accurate publication of a rape victim's name obtained from a government news release[48] or official court documents open to public inspection.[49] Furthermore, in actions for damages, where the interest at issue is privacy and the right claimed is to be free from the publication of false or misleading information about one's affairs, the target of the publication must prove knowing or reckless falsehood where the materials published, although assertedly private, are matters of public interest.[50]

C. FREEDOM TO MARRY

[F12] Marriage has been characterized as the most important relationship in life[51] and as fundamental to our very existence and survival.[52] The freedom to marry, or not to marry, has been recognized as "one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men" and is considered to be part of the fundamental right of privacy.[53] A state statute banning marriages between persons solely on the basis of racial classifications violates the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment.[54]

---

45 Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 455–65 (1977).

46 See Smith v. Daily Mail Publ'g Co., 443 U.S. 97, 103 (1979).

47 See Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514, 534 (2001).

48 Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 536–41 (1989).

49 Cox Broad. Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 487–95 (1975).

50 Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 387–88 (1967).

51 See Maynard v. Hill, 125 U.S. 190, 205 (1888). The state has a legitimate interest in the creation and dissolution of the marriage contract. See Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417, 446 (1990) (plurality opinion), citing Maynard v. Hill, supra, and Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 404 (1975).

52 Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).

53 Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967).

54 Id.

[F13] A law that significantly interferes with the exercise of the right to marry cannot be upheld unless it is supported "by sufficiently important state interests and is closely tailored to effectuate only those interests."[55] In Zablocki, the Court dealt with a state statute conditioning the right to marry upon a court approval order, which could not be granted unless the marriage applicant submitted proof of compliance with his child support obligation under a court judgment and demonstrated that the children covered by the support judgment were not then, and were not likely thereafter, to become public charges. With respect to individuals who were unable to meet the statutory requirements, the statute merely prevented these persons from getting married, without delivering any money at all into the hands of their prior children. Moreover, the state already had numerous other means for exacting compliance with support obligations, means that were at least as effective as the measure at issue and yet did not impinge upon the right to marry; indeed court-determined support obligations could be enforced directly via wage assignments, civil contempt proceedings, and criminal penalties. And, if the state believed that parents of children out of their custody should be responsible for ensuring that those children did not become public charges, this interest might be achieved by adjusting the criteria used for determining the amounts to be paid under their support orders. Furthermore, the challenged provision was grossly underinclusive with respect to this purpose of preventing the marriage applicants from incurring new support obligations, since it did not limit in any way new financial commitments by the applicants other than those arising out of the contemplated marriage. The statutory classification was substantially overinclusive as well: given the possibility that the new spouse would actually better the applicant's financial situation, by contributing income from a job or otherwise, the statute, in many cases, might prevent affected individuals from improving their ability to satisfy their prior support obligations. And, although it was true that the applicant would incur support obligations to any children born during the contemplated marriage, preventing the marriage might only result in the children's being born out of wedlock, for the support obligation was the same whether the child was born in or out of wedlock. Consequently, the Court struck down the statute as violative of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[56]

[F14] Nevertheless, the Court has not suggested "that every state regulation, which relates in any way to the incidents of or prerequisites for marriage, must be subjected to rigorous scrutiny. To the contrary, reasonable regulations that do not significantly interfere with decisions to enter into the marital relationship may legitimately be imposed."[57] In Jobst, the Court upheld sections of the Social Security Act providing, inter alia, for termination of a dependent child's benefits upon marriage to an individual not entitled to benefits under the Act. As the opinion for the Court noted, the rule terminating benefits upon marriage was not an attempt to interfere with the individual's freedom to make a decision as important as marriage. The Social Security provisions placed no direct legal obstacle in the path of persons desiring to get married, and there was no evidence that the law significantly discouraged any marriages.[58]

---

55 Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 388 (1978).

56 Id. at 383–91.

57 Id. at 386.

58 Califano v. Jobst, 434 U.S. 47, 54 (1977).

[F15] An individual's right to marry survives incarceration. "Many important attributes of marriage remain after taking into account the limitations imposed by prison life. First, inmate marriages, like others, are expressions of emotional support and public commitment. These elements are an important and significant aspect of the marital relationship. In addition, many religions recognize marriage as having spiritual significance; for some inmates and their spouses, therefore, the commitment of marriage may be an exercise of religious faith as well as an expression of personal dedication. Third, most inmates eventually will be released by parole or commutation, and therefore most inmate marriages are formed in the expectation that they ultimately will be fully consummated. Finally, marital status often is a pre-condition to the receipt of government benefits (e.g., Social Security benefits), property rights (e.g., tenancy by the entirety, inheritance rights), and other, less tangible benefits (e.g., legitimation of children born out of wedlock). These incidents of marriage, like the religious and personal aspects of the marriage commitment, are unaffected by the fact of confinement or the pursuit of legitimate corrections goals. Taken together, . . . these elements are sufficient to form a constitutionally protected marital relationship in the prison context."[59]

[F16] A prison regulation that impinges on prisoners' right to marry is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests; hence, the protection of prison security may require placing reasonable restrictions upon this right and may justify requiring approval of the superintendent. However, a regulation prohibiting inmate marriage, except with consent of the prison superintendent made upon proof of compelling circumstances, represents an exaggerated response to prison concerns, since allowing marriages, unless the warden finds a threat to security, order, or the public safety, represents an obvious, easy alternative that would accommodate the right to marry while imposing a de minimis burden on the pursuit of security objectives.[60]

[F17] Polygamy may be prohibited, even if its practice is supported by a religious creed. In Reynolds, the Court upheld the polygamy conviction of a Mormon, stressing that "polygamy leads to the patriarchal principle, and . . . fetters the people in stationary despotism."[61] In the nineteenth century, the Court also approved exclusions of bigamists and polygamists from the franchise, under territorial laws.[62]

---

[59] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 95–96 (1987). The Court noted that its decision in Butler v. Wilson, 415 U.S. 953 (1974), summarily affirming Johnson v. Rockefeller, 365 F. Supp. 377 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), was not to the contrary. That case involved a prohibition on marriage only for inmates sentenced to life imprisonment; and, importantly, denial of the right was part of the punishment for crime. See id. at 381–82 (Lasker, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (asserted governmental interest of punishing crime sufficiently important to justify deprivation of the right).

[60] Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 97–98 (1987). The Court rejected the argument that "love triangles" might lead to violent confrontations between inmates, noting that there was nothing in the record suggesting that the marriage regulation was viewed as preventing such entanglements and that there was no logical connection between the marriage restriction and the formation of love triangles.

[61] Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 166 (1879).

[62] See Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U.S. 15 (1885); Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890).

The question whether there is a constitutional right to "same-sex" marriage, under the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses, has not come before the Court. However, in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 585 (2003), Justice O'Connor suggested that a state may legitimately distinguish between heterosexuals and homosexuals for the purpose of preserving the traditional institution of marriage.

D. SEXUAL FREEDOM[63]

[F18] In Bowers, the Court held that, since homosexual behavior was not deeply rooted in the nation's history and tradition or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, a Georgia law prohibiting private consensual sodomy needed only a rational basis in order to comply with the Due Process Clause. Moral opposition to sodomy and homosexuality was considered to provide that rational basis.[64] Bowers was overruled 13 years later. In Lawrence, the Court confronted a Texas statute forbidding two persons of the same sex from engaging in certain intimate sexual conduct. A five-Justice majority observed that the issue was not simply the right to engage in certain sexual conduct. The challenged statute had "more far-reaching consequences, touching upon the most private human conduct, sexual behavior, and in the most private of places, the home;" it sought "to control a personal relationship that, whether or not entitled to formal recognition in the law, is within the liberty of persons to choose without being punished as criminals. . . . [I]ndividual decisions by married or unmarried persons, concerning the intimacies of their physical relationship, even when not intended to produce offspring, are a form of 'liberty' protected by the Due Process Clause. . . . [And] the fact that the governing majority in a State has traditionally viewed a particular sexual practice as immoral is not a sufficient reason for upholding a law prohibiting the practice." Under these considerations, the Court found the statute violative of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[65]

E. PARENTAL RIGHTS

1. Generally

[F19] The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects the fundamental right of parents and guardians "to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children;"[66] "as a general matter, the father's interest in the welfare of the child and the mother's interest are equal."[67] The American "constitutional system long ago rejected any notion that a child is the mere creature of the State and, on the contrary, asserted that parents generally have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare [their children] for additional obligations. . . . The law's concept of the family rests on a presumption that parents possess what a child lacks in maturity, experience, and capacity for judgment required for making life's difficult decisions.

---

63 See also para. K82 (statutory rape).

64 Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186, 190–96 (1986).

65 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 567, 577–78 (2003). Justice O'Connor denied to overrule Barrows, but agreed that the statute was unconstitutional. She based that conclusion on the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, noting that a state cannot single out one identifiable class of citizens for punishment that does not apply to everyone else, with moral disapproval as the only asserted state interest for the law. In Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), the Court invalidated an amendment to Colorado's Constitution, which named, as a solitary class, persons who were homosexuals, lesbians, or bisexual either by orientation, conduct, practices, or relationships and deprived them of protection under state anti-discrimination laws, concluding that the provision had been born of animosity toward the class of persons affected and, further, that it had no rational relation to a legitimate governmental purpose.

66 See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 66 (2000) (plurality opinion, citing cases).

67 Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 896 (1992).

More important, historically it has recognized that natural bonds of affection lead parents to act in the best interests of their children."[68] "Accordingly, so long as a parent adequately cares for his or her children (i.e., is fit), there will normally be no reason for the State to inject itself into the private realm of the family to further question the ability of that parent to make the best decisions concerning the rearing of that parent's children."[69] There is "little doubt that the Due Process Clause would be offended if a State were to attempt to force the breakup of a natural family, over the objections of the parents and their children, without some showing of unfitness and for the sole reason that to do so was thought to be in the children's best interest."[70]

2. Education of Children

[F20] Parents and guardians have the right to direct the education of their children. This liberty right may not be abridged by legislation that has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the state. "The power of the State to compel attendance at some school and to make reasonable regulations for all schools, including a requirement that they shall give instructions in English" is not questionable.[71] However, the Court has held that a state law forbidding the teaching, in any private or public school, of any modern language, other than English, to any child who has not successfully passed the eighth grade, invades impermissibly the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, since proficiency in a foreign language seldom comes to one not instructed at an early age, and experience shows that this is not injurious to the health, morals, or understanding of the ordinary child.[72] Likewise, a state is not allowed to infringe the parent's right to choose private rather than public school education.[73] Relatedly, the government may prohibit the exclusion of racial minorities from private schools without transgressing the right of parents to send their children to such schools.[74]

[F21] Parents have a traditional interest in the religious upbringing of their children. In that context, the Court has recognized that the Amish may decline to send their children to public or private high school. In doing so, the Court has considered not only that the Amish sincerely believe that high school attendance is contrary to their religion and way of life, but also that the Amish provide continuing informal vocational education to their children, designed to prepare them for life in the rural Amish community, and that "accommodating their religious objections by forgoing one or two additional years of compulsory education [would] not impair the physical or mental health of the child, or result in an inability to be self-supporting or to discharge the duties and

---

68 Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584, 602 (1979).

69 Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 68–69 (2000) (plurality opinion), citing Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 303 (1993).

70 Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246, 255 (1978).

71 Meyer v. State of Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 402 (1923). Courts are ill-equipped to determine the "necessity" of discrete aspects of a state's program of compulsory education. Hence, "courts must move with great circumspection in performing the sensitive and delicate task of weighing a State's legitimate concern in universal education when faced with a parent's claim for exemption from generally applicable educational requirements." See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 235 (1972).

72 Meyer v. State of Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399–403 (1923).

73 Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534 (1925).

74 Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 175–79 (1976).

responsibilities of citizenship, or in any other way materially detract from the welfare of society."[75] Nevertheless, parental rights protected by the First Amendment can be limited by the state's interest in protecting the welfare of children. "It is the interest of youth itself, and of the whole community, that children be both safeguarded from abuses and given opportunities for growth into free and independent well developed men and citizens."[76] Hence, the parent cannot claim freedom from compulsory vaccination for the child on religious grounds.[77] Similarly, a Jehovah's Witness may be prosecuted under the child labor laws for allowing his children to circulate religious literature on the public streets. Such activity may create "emotional excitement and psychological or physical injury. Parents may be free to become martyrs themselves. But it does not follow they are free, in identical circumstances, to make martyrs of their children before they have reached the age of full and legal discretion when they can make that choice for themselves."[78]

3. Rights of Unwed Fathers[79]

[F22] A statutory scheme under which the children of unmarried fathers, upon the death of the mother, are automatically made wards of the state is unconstitutional. One the one hand, a father's interest in the companionship, care, custody, and management of his children is cognizable and substantial, and, on the other hand, the state's interest in caring for the children is de minimis, if the father is, in fact, a fit parent. The state cannot, consistently with due process requirements, merely presume that unmarried fathers, in general, are unsuitable parents. Therefore, a state is barred, as a matter of due process, from taking custody of the children of an unwed father, absent a hearing and a particularized finding that the father is an unfit parent.[80]

[F23] Quilloin involved the constitutionality of a state statute that authorized the adoption, over the objection of the natural father, of a child born out of wedlock. The father, in that case, had never legitimated the child, who had always been in the mother's custody. It was only after the mother had remarried and her new husband had filed an adoption petition that the natural father sought visitation rights and filed a petition for legitimation. The trial court found adoption by the new husband to be in the child's

---

[75] Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 234–36 (1972). The Court did not consider the question whether a child who expresses a desire to attend public high school, in conflict with the wishes of his parents, should not be prevented from doing so.

[76] Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 165 (1944).

[77] Id. at 166, citing Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905).

[78] Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 170 (1944).

[79] The mother's biological relation to the child is verifiable from the birth itself, and is documented by the birth certificate or hospital records and the witnesses to the birth. However, a father need not be present at the birth, and his presence is not incontrovertible proof of fatherhood. Hence, "[f]athers and mothers are not similarly situated with regard to proof of biological parenthood. The imposition of a different set of rules for making that legal determination with respect to fathers and mothers is [not] troublesome from a constitutional perspective." Moreover, the Constitution does not require that Congress elect one particular mechanism, like DNA testing, from among many possible methods of establishing paternity. See Tuan Anh Nguyen v. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 533 U.S. 53, 63–64 (2001).

[80] Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 647–58 (1972). The father, in that case, had lived with his children all their lives, and had lived with their mother for 18 years.

best interests. The Court stressed that the unwed father had not at any time had, or sought, actual or legal custody of his child. Moreover, the result of the adoption was to give full recognition to a family unit already in existence, a result desired by all concerned, except the natural father of the child. Subsequently, the Court unanimously held the challenged adoption to be consistent with the Due Process Clause. The father also advanced an equal protection argument, based on the fact that the law required both parents' consent to the adoption of children born in wedlock but only the mother's consent for children born out of wedlock and not legitimated by their fathers. The Court rejected the claim, noting that the state, under any standard of review, could take into consideration that an unwed father, unlike a married, or even divorced, one, had never exercised actual or legal custody over his child and thus had never shouldered any significant responsibility with respect to the daily supervision, education, protection, or care of the child.[81]

[F24] Caban involved a statute permitting an unwed mother, but not an unwed father, to block the adoption of their child simply by withholding her consent. The father, in that case, had established a substantial relationship with his children and had admitted his paternity. The Court found that the challenged sex-based distinction between unmarried mothers and unmarried fathers violated the Equal Protection Clause, because it bore no substantial relation to any important state interest. "[M]aternal and paternal roles are not invariably different in importance. Even if unwed mothers, as a class, were closer than unwed fathers to their newborn infants, the generalization concerning parent-child relations would become less acceptable to support legislative distinctions as the child's age increased. . . . [But] [i]n those cases where the father never has come forward to participate in the rearing of the child, nothing in the Equal Protection Clause precludes the State from withholding from him the privilege of vetoing the adoption of that child."[82]

[F25] "The difference between the developed parent-child relationship that was implicated in . . . Caban, and the potential relationship involved in Quilloin, is significant. When an unwed father demonstrates a full commitment to the responsibilities of parenthood 'by com[ing] forward to participate in the rearing of his child,' . . . his interest in personal contact with his child acquires substantial protection under the Due Process Clause. [In such a case,] it may be said that he]act[s] as a father toward his children.' . . . But the mere existence of a biological link does not merit equivalent constitutional protection. . . . '[T]he importance of the familial relationship, to the individuals involved and to the society, stems from the emotional attachments that derive from the intimacy of daily association, and from the role it plays in promoting a way of life through the instruction of children . . . as well as from the fact of blood relationship.' . . . The significance of the biological connection is that it offers the natural father an opportunity that no other male possesses to develop a relationship with his offspring. If he grasps that opportunity and accepts some measure of responsibility for the child's future, he may enjoy the blessings of the parent-child relationship and make uniquely valuable contributions to the child's development. If he fails to do so, the Federal Constitution will not automatically compel a State to listen to his opinion of where the child's best interests lie."[83] Therefore, a putative biological father, who has never estab-

---

81 Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246, 254–56 (1978).

82 Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380, 389, 392 (1979).

83 Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 261–62 (1982).

lished an actual relationship with his child, does not have a constitutional right to notice of his child's adoption by the man who had married the child's mother.[84]

[F26] Nevertheless, in Michael H., the Court concluded that, despite both biological parenthood and an established relationship with a young child, a father's due process liberty interest in maintaining some connection with that child was not sufficiently powerful to overcome a state statutory presumption that a child born to a married woman living with her husband, who was neither impotent nor sterile, was a child of the marriage. As a result of the presumption, which might be rebutted only by the husband or wife, the biological father could be denied even visitation with the child, because, as a matter of state law, he was not a "parent." A four-member plurality observed that the presumption expressed and implemented a substantive rule of law, based on the state legislature's determination, as a matter of overriding social policy, that the husband should be held responsible for the child and that the integrity and privacy of the family unit should not be impugned. Furthermore, it recognized that the parental liberty interest is a function not simply of isolated factors, such as biology and intimate connection, but of the broader interest in the "unitary" family. Consequently, it held that, where "the child is born into an extant marital family, the natural father's unique opportunity to develop a relationship with the child conflicts with the similarly unique opportunity of the husband of the marriage, and it is not unconstitutional for the State to give categorical preference to the latter" in favor of traditional family relationships.[85] Justice Stevens, concurring, and the four dissenters stressed that a natural father might have a constitutionally protected interest in his relationship with a child whose mother was married to, and cohabiting with, another man at the time of the child's conception and birth. However, Justice Stevens concluded that the statutory scheme at issue, as applied in the specific case, was consistent with the Due Process Clause, since it had not deprived the natural father of a fair opportunity to prove that he was an "other person having an interest in the welfare of the child" to whom reasonable visitation rights could be awarded under state law.[86]

---

[84] Id. at 263–65. That case involved a New York law that automatically provided mothers of "illegitimate" children with prior notice of an adoption proceeding and the right to veto an adoption, but only extended those rights to unmarried fathers whose claim of paternity was supported by some formal public act, such as a court adjudication, the filing of a notice of intent to claim paternity, or written acknowledgment by the mother. The petitioner, an unmarried putative father, need only have mailed a postcard to the state's "putative father registry" to enjoy the same rights as the child's undisputed mother. The Court held that the statute did not invidiously discriminate between the father and mother in that case, since the state could take account of the fact that the father had never established any custodial, personal, or financial relationship with his daughter. Id. at 267.

[85] Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110, 123, 129 (1989) (plurality opinion). For the same reasons, the plurality rejected the proposition that the child had a liberty interest in maintaining a filial relationship with her natural father. Id. at 131. The child's claim that her equal protection rights had been violated, because, unlike her mother and presumed father, she had had no opportunity to rebut the presumption of her legitimacy, also was found without merit, since the state's decision to treat her differently from her parents pursued the legitimate end of preventing the disruption of an otherwise peaceful union by the rational means of not allowing anyone but the husband or wife to contest legitimacy. Id. at 131–32.

[86] The dissenters thought that appellant had a due process right to a meaningful opportunity to be heard and support his assertion of paternity.

4. Rights of Foster Parents[87]

[F27] "[T]he importance of the familial relationship, to the individuals involved and to the society, stems from the emotional attachments that derive from the intimacy of daily association, and from the role it plays in promoting a way of life through the instruction of children, . . . as well as from the fact of blood relationship. [Thus,] a deeply loving and interdependent relationship between an adult and a child in his or her care may exist even in the absence of blood relationship. At least where a child has been placed in foster care as an infant, has never known his natural parents, and has remained continuously for several years in the care of the same foster parents, it is natural that the foster family should hold the same place in the emotional life of the foster child, and fulfill the same socializing functions, as a natural family. . . . But there are also important distinctions between the foster family and the natural family. First, . . . [whereas] the liberty interest in family privacy has its source, and its contours are ordinarily to be sought, in intrinsic human rights, . . . a foster family . . . has its source in state law and contractual arrangements. . . . [W]hatever emotional ties may develop between foster parent and foster child have their origins in an arrangement in which the State has been a partner from the outset. While liberty interests may in some cases arise from positive law sources, . . . in such a case, . . . it is appropriate to ascertain from state law the expectations and entitlements of the parties. . . . [T]he limited recognition accorded to the foster family by [state] statutes and the contracts executed by the foster parents argue against any but the most limited constitutional 'liberty' in the foster family."[88] Second, the right of the natural parent of a foster child in voluntary placement must be properly taken into consideration. "It is one thing to say that individuals may acquire a liberty interest against arbitrary governmental interference in the family-like associations into which they have freely entered, even in the absence of biological connection or state law recognition of the relationship and it is quite another to say that one may acquire such an interest in the face of another's constitutionally recognized liberty interest that derives from blood relationship, state law sanction, and basic human right—an interest the foster parent has recognized by contract from the outset. Whatever liberty interest might otherwise exist in the foster family as an institution, that interest must be substantially attenuated where the proposed removal from the foster family is to return the child to his natural parents," who initially gave up their child to the state only on the express understanding that the child would be returned to them.[89]

---

[87] A child who has no available parent, close relative, or legal guardian, and for whom the government is responsible, has no substantive due process right to be placed in the custody of a private custodian rather than of a decent and humane, government-operated or government-selected, child care institution. See Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292, 301–03 (1993).

[88] Smith v. Org. of Foster Families for Equal. & Reform, 431 U.S. 816, 844–46 (1977).

[89] Id. at 846–47. In that case, the Court assumed that there was a protected liberty interest in the foster family relationship, without resolving the relevant questions definitively. Consequently, the Court found constitutionally adequate the challenged procedures for removal of foster children from foster homes. The Court held, inter alia, that due process (1) is not infringed by a removal procedure limited to the foster parents and the agency; (2) does not demand a full trial-type pre-removal hearing, if the child is being returned to his natural parents; (3) does not require an automatic hearing in every case; (4) is not violated by a provision limiting pre-removal judicial review to cases where the child has been in foster care for 18 months or more, since there is no reason to assume that the emotional attachments between a child and his foster parents ripen at less than 18 months, or indeed at any precise point. Id. at 851–55.

5. Visitation Rights of Third Persons

[F28] In Troxel, the Court dealt with a state statute allowing "any person" to petition for visitation rights "at any time" and authorizing state superior courts to grant such rights whenever visitation may serve a child's best interest. The Troxels petitioned for the right to visit their deceased son's daughters. Granville, the girls' mother, did not oppose all visitation but objected to the amount sought by the Troxels. The superior court ordered more visitation than Granville desired. A four-Justice plurality found that the statute, as applied to Granville and her family, violated her due process right to make decisions concerning the rearing of her children, since it effectively permitted a court to disregard and overturn any decision by a fit custodial parent concerning visitation whenever a third party affected by the decision filed a visitation petition.[90]

6. Termination of Parental Rights

[F29] "The fundamental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and management of their child does not evaporate simply because they have not been model parents or have lost temporary custody of their child to the State. Even when blood relationships are strained, parents retain a vital interest in preventing the irretrievable destruction of their family life. If anything, persons faced with forced dissolution of their parental rights have a more critical need for procedural protections than do those resisting state intervention into ongoing family affairs. When the State moves to destroy weakened familial bonds, it must provide the parents with fundamentally fair procedures."[91]

[F30] Application of a "fair preponderance of the evidence" standard in civil proceedings indicates both society's minimal concern with the outcome, and a conclusion that the litigants should share the risk of error in roughly equal fashion. However, "[t]he individual should not be asked to share equally with society the risk of error when the possible injury to the individual is significantly greater than any possible harm to the state. . . . In parental rights termination proceedings, the private interest affected is commanding; the risk of error from using a preponderance standard is substantial; and the countervailing governmental interest favoring that standard is comparatively slight. . . . Thus, at a parental rights termination proceeding, a near-equal allocation of the substantial risk of erroneous fact finding between the parents and the State is constitutionally intolerable."[92] Like civil commitment hearings, termination proceedings often require the fact finder to evaluate medical and psychiatric testimony and to decide issues difficult to prove to a level of absolute certainty (i.e., "beyond a reasonable doubt"), such as lack of parental motive, absence of affection between parent and child, and failure of parental foresight and progress. Therefore, due process is satisfied if the state supports its allegations by at least clear and convincing evidence.[93]

---

[90] Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 67–73 (2000). Justice Souter concurred in the judgment, concluding that the statute was facially invalid, for it swept too broadly in authorizing any person at any time to request and a judge to award visitation rights, with the only requirement being that the visitation served the best interest of the child. Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment, noting that strict scrutiny was the appropriate standard of review to apply and that the state lacked a compelling interest in second-guessing a fit parent's decision regarding visitation with third parties.

[91] Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753–54 (1982).

[92] Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 758, 768 (1982).

[93] Id. at 768–69. Determination of the precise burden equal to or greater than that standard is a matter of state law properly left to state legislatures and state courts. Id. at 769–70.

[F31] After weighing the Mathews factors,[94] the Court has held that the right to appointed counsel in a case involving the threatened termination of parental rights depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. "The parent's interest is an extremely important one (and may be supplemented by the dangers of criminal liability inherent in some termination proceedings); the State shares with the parent an interest in a correct decision, has a relatively weak pecuniary interest, and, in some but not all cases, has a possibly stronger interest in informal procedures; and the complexity of the proceeding and the incapacity of the uncounseled parent could be, but would not always be, great enough to make the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the parent's rights insupportably high. . . . Thus if, in a given case, the parent's interests were at their strongest, the State's interests were at their weakest, and the risks of error were at their peak," due process would require appointment of counsel.[95]

[F32] Access to judicial processes in cases "quasi-criminal" in nature may not turn on ability to pay. The Court has placed decrees forever terminating parental rights in the category of cases in which the state may not "bolt the door to equal justice." In M.L.B., the Court held that Mississippi could not, consistent with the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, deny an indigent parent appellate review of the sufficiency of the evidence on which a state court had based its parental termination decree. In reaching this conclusion, the Court inspected the character and intensity of the individual interest at stake, on the one hand, and the state's justification for its exaction, on the other. The state's pocketbook interest in prepayment of record preparation fees was found unimpressive when measured against the stakes for the parent. And the risk of error, was considerable, since the trial court's order, in that case, simply had recited statutory language, without describing any evidence and otherwise detailing any reasons for finding M.L.B. clearly and convincingly unfit to be a parent.[96]

F. LIVING ARRANGEMENTS

[F33] When the government intrudes on choices concerning family living arrangements, the usual deference to the legislature is inappropriate, and the courts "must examine carefully the importance of the governmental interests advanced and the extent to which they are served by the challenged regulation."[97] In Moore v. East Cleveland, the Court struck down a housing ordinance that limited occupancy of a dwelling unit to members of a single "family" as violating the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth

---

94 See para. C7.

95 Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham County, 452 U.S. 18, 31 (1981). Three of the dissenters thought the same balancing required appointment of counsel in all such cases. Id. at 35. In the circumstances of that case, the five-Justice majority concluded that the trial judge had not denied petitioner due process of law in not appointing counsel for her. The record showed, inter alia, that the petition to terminate petitioner's parental rights contained no allegations of neglect or abuse upon which criminal charges could be based; no expert witnesses testified; the case presented no specially troublesome points of law; and the presence of counsel could not have made a determinative difference for petitioner, who had expressly declined to appear at a previous child custody hearing. Id. at 32–33.

96 M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 119–24 (1996). The Court relied primarily on the Equal Protection Clause, for due process does not independently require that the state provide a right to appeal.

97 Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S.494, 499 (1977) (plurality opinion).

Amendment. East Cleveland's ordinance selected certain categories of relatives who might live together and declared that others could not; in particular, East Cleveland's definition of "family" made a crime of a grandmother's choice to live with her grandson. In response to East Cleveland's argument that its aim was to prevent overcrowded dwellings, streets, and schools, the Court observed that the municipality's restrictive definition of family served the asserted, and undeniably legitimate, goals marginally, at best. For example, the ordinance permitted any family consisting only of husband, wife, and unmarried children to live together, even if the family contained a half dozen licensed drivers, each with his or her own car. At the same time, it forbade an adult brother and sister from sharing a household, even if both faithfully used public transportation. Besides, another ordinance specifically addressed the problem of overcrowding, tying the maximum permissible occupancy of a dwelling to the habitable floor area.[98]

[F34] In Belle Terre, the Court confronted a New York village ordinance that restricted land use to one-family dwellings, defining the word "family" to mean one or more persons related by blood, adoption, or marriage, or not more than two unrelated persons, living and cooking together as a single housekeeping unit. The ordinance affected only unrelated individuals and was not found to involve any rights of privacy. In sustaining the ordinance, the Court noted that desires to avoid congestion and noise from both people and vehicles were legitimate guidelines in a land use project addressed to "family needs" and that it was quite within the village's power to lay out "zones where family values, youth values, and the blessings of quiet seclusion and clean air made the area a sanctuary for people."[99]

[F35] Although a ban on inter-racial cohabitation applies to all races, the Court has established that such a classification is constitutionally impermissible. In McLauglin, the Court invalidated a statute prohibiting an unmarried inter-racial couple from habitually living in and occupying the same room at night. The law was held unconstitutional because it penalized individuals solely because of their race, while there was no overriding state interest requiring the proscription of the specified conduct when engaged in by members of a different race, but not otherwise.[100]

[F36] In Lyng v. Castillo, the Court considered a constitutional challenge to the definition of "household" in the Food Stamp Act, which treated parents, siblings, and children who lived together, but not more distant relatives or unrelated persons who did so, as a single household for purposes of defining eligibility for food stamps. Although [98] Id. at 498–500, n.7 (1977) (four-member plurality). The plurality also noted that the constitutional protection of the institution of the family is not limited to respect for the bonds uniting the members of the nuclear family; "the tradition of uncles, aunts, cousins, and especially grandparents sharing a household along with parents and children has roots equally deserving of constitutional recognition." Id. at 504–05. A fifth Justice concluded that the zoning ordinance constituted a taking of property without due process and without just compensation, for it had no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. Id. at 513–21.

---

[99] Vill. of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1, 7–9 (1974). The Court rejected the argument that if two unmarried people could constitute a "family," there was no reason why three or four might not, observing that every line drawn by a legislature leaves some out that might well have been included and that such exercise of discretion, however, is a legislative, not a judicial, function.

[100] McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 191–94 (1964).

the challenge in that case was brought solely on equal protection grounds, the Court was obliged to decide whether the statutory classification should be reviewed under a stricter standard than mere rational basis review, because it directly and substantially interfered with family living arrangements and thereby burdened a fundamental right. The Court noted that the statute did not order or prevent any group of persons from dining together. Indeed, in the overwhelming majority of cases, it probably had no effect at all; it was exceedingly unlikely that close relatives would choose to live apart simply to increase their allotment of food stamps, for the costs of separate housing would almost certainly exceed the incremental value of the additional stamps. Hence, the provision could not be deemed as "directly and substantially" interfering with family living arrangements.[101]

G. PROCREATION[102]

[F37] In 1927, the Court ruled that society "can prevent those who are manifestly unfit from continuing their kind." Thus, it upheld a statute providing for the sexual sterilization of inmates of institutions supported by the state who were found to be afflicted with an hereditary form of insanity or imbecility. The Court stressed that, since the society may call upon the best citizens for their lives, it would be strange if it could not call upon those who already sap the strength of the state for lesser sacrifices, in order to prevent its being swamped with incompetence, and concluded that "three generations of imbeciles are enough."[103]

[F38] Fifteen years later, the Court recognized that, since the power to sterilize affects a "basic liberty," strict scrutiny of the classification, which a state makes in a sterilization law, is essential. When the law lays an unequal hand on those who have committed intrinsically the same quality of offense and sterilizes one and not the other, it has made an invidious discrimination, in violation of the Equal Protection Clause.[104]

H. CONTRACEPTION

[F39] In Griswold, the Court held that a statute forbidding the use of contraceptives violates the right of marital privacy. In doing so, the Court noted that the idea of allowing "the police to search the sacred precincts of marital bedrooms for telltale signs of the use of contraceptives" was repulsive to the notions of privacy surrounding the marriage relationship.[105]

[F40] The freedom to use contraceptives was later guaranteed, under the Equal Protection Clause, for unmarried persons. In Eisenstadt v. Baird, the Court invalidated a law that made it a felony for anyone to give away a drug, medicine, instrument, or article for the prevention of conception except in the case of a registered physician admin-

---

101 Lyng v. Castillo, 477 U.S. 635, 638 (1986). See also Bowen v. Gilliard, 483 U.S. 587, 602–03 (1987).

102 See also paras. K72 et seq. (pregnancy classifications).

103 Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 207 (1927). The fact that the provision did not reach persons outside the institutions named, did not render it obnoxious to the Equal Protection Clause. Id. at 208.

104 Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).

105 Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 485–86 (1965).

istering or prescribing it for a married person or an active registered pharmacist furnishing it to a married person presenting a registered physician's prescription. The statute could not be upheld as a deterrent to fornication or as a health measure. First, it had, at best, a marginal relation to the deterrence of premarital sex, particularly in light of the admitted widespread availability to all persons in the state, unmarried as well as married, of birth control devices for the prevention of disease, as distinguished from the prevention of conception. Moreover, in making contraceptives available to married persons without regard to their intended use, the state did not attempt to deter married persons from engaging in illicit sexual relations with unmarried persons. Second, if health were the rationale of the prohibition, the statute would be both discriminatory and overbroad. Indeed, if there was need to have a physician prescribe, and a pharmacist dispense, contraceptives, that need was as great for unmarried persons as for married persons. The statute also would be overbroad with respect to the married, since not all contraceptives are potentially dangerous. And if the legislature intended to prevent the distribution of articles, which might have undesirable or dangerous physical consequences, the challenged provision was not required, in view of the federal and state laws already regulating the distribution of harmful drugs. Third, the statute could not be sustained simply as a prohibition on contraception, which the state considered immoral. If Griswold was no bar to a prohibition on the distribution of contraceptives, the state could not, consistently with the Equal Protection Clause, outlaw distribution to unmarried, but not to married, persons, for in each case, the evil, as perceived by the state, would be identical, and the underinclusion would be invidious. On the other hand, if, under Griswold, the distribution of contraceptives to married persons could not be prohibited, a ban on distribution to unmarried persons would be equally impermissible, since the marital couple is not an independent entity, with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals, each with a separate intellectual and emotional makeup. Therefore, whatever the rights of the individual to access to contraceptives might be, the rights should be the same for the unmarried and the married alike.[106]

[F41] As the Court made clear in Carey v. Population Services International, "the constitutionally protected right of privacy extends to an individual's liberty to make choices regarding contraception." But it does not follow that every state regulation in this area is invalid. "The business of manufacturing and selling contraceptives may be regulated in ways that do not infringe protected individual choices. And even a burdensome regulation may be validated by a sufficiently compelling state interest."[107] Where a decision as fundamental as whether to bear or beget a child is involved, regulations imposing a burden on it may be justified only by "compelling" state interests, and must be "narrowly drawn" to express only those interests. "This is so not because there is an independent fundamental 'right of access to contraceptives,' but because such access is essential to exercise of the constitutionally protected right of decision in matters of childbearing."[108]

---

[106] Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 446–55 (1972) (four-Justice majority). The majority concluded that if the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.

[107] Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 685–86 (1977).

[108] Id. at 688.

[F42] "Limiting the distribution of nonprescription contraceptives to licensed pharmacists clearly imposes a significant burden on the right of the individuals to use contraceptives if they choose to do so. . . . The burden is, of course, not as great as that under a total ban on distribution. Nevertheless, the restriction of distribution channels to a small fraction of the total number of possible retail outlets renders contraceptive devices considerably less accessible to the public, reduces the opportunity for privacy of selection and purchase, and lessens the possibility of price competition."[109] Such a provision does not serve a compelling state interest. Insofar as it applies to nonhazardous contraceptives, it bears no relation to the state's interest in protecting health. "Nor is the interest in protecting potential life implicated in state regulation of contraceptives."[110] Nor can the provision be justified by a concern that young people not sell contraceptives, or as being designed to serve as a quality control device or as facilitating enforcement of the other provisions of the statute. The first interest "hardly can justify the statute's incursion into constitutionally protected rights, and in any event, the restriction is obviously not substantially related to any goal of preventing young people from selling contraceptives." Second, such a provision is not designed to serve as a quality control device, since there is no proof "that pharmacists are particularly qualified to give advice on the merits of different nonmedical contraceptives, or that such advice is more necessary to the purchaser of contraceptive products than to consumers of other nonprescription items. . . . As to ease of enforcement, the prospect of additional administrative inconvenience is not thought to justify invasion of fundamental constitutional rights."[111]

[F43] A statute prohibiting any "advertisement or display" of contraceptives is equally unconstitutional. "[I]n addition to the substantial individual and societal interests in the free flow of commercial information, . . . [such a statute] suppresse[s] information related to activity with which, at least in some respects, the State cannot interfere." This ban cannot be justified on the ground that advertisements of contraceptive products might offend and embarrass those exposed to them. Nor can it be sustained on the basis that permitting such advertisements would legitimize sexual activity of young people, since the advertisements merely stating the availability of constitutionally protected products may not be characterized as directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and likely to incite or produce such action.[112]

[F44] The Court also has struck down a provision prohibiting distribution of contraceptives to persons under 16. "[T]he right to privacy in connection with decisions affecting procreation extends to minors, . . . [and] [s]ince a State may not impose a blanket prohibition, or even a blanket requirement of parental consent, on the choice of a minor to terminate her pregnancy,[113] the constitutionality of a blanket prohibition of the distribution of contraceptives to minors is, a fortiori, foreclosed." The argument that minors' sexual activity may be deterred by increasing the hazards attendant on it cannot stand, for "[i]t would be plainly unreasonable to assume that the state has prescribed pregnancy and the birth of an unwanted child, or the physical and psychological dangers of an abortion, as punishment for fornication." Moreover, there is substantial

---

109 Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 689 (1977).

110 Id. at 690.

111 Id. at 691.

112 Id. at 700–01.

113 See para. F59.

reason for doubt whether limiting access to contraceptives will, in fact, substantially discourage early sexual behavior. And the fact that the statute does not totally prohibit distribution of contraceptives to minors under 16, but allows such minors to be supplied with a contraceptive by a physician, does not save the aforesaid significant burden to the right to decide whether to bear children, especially when this restriction is not justified by any asserted medical necessity.[114]

I. ABORTION

1. Generally

[F45] In Roe v. Wade, the Court held that the right of privacy is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. "Though abortion is conduct, it does not follow that the state is entitled to proscribe it in all instances. That is because the liberty of the woman is at stake in a sense unique to the human condition, and so, unique to the law. The mother who carries a child to full term is subject to anxieties, to physical constraints, to pain that only she must bear."[115] "Specific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved. Maternity, or additional offspring, may force upon the woman a distressful life and future. Psychological harm may be imminent. Mental and physical health may be taxed by child care. There is also the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child, and there is the problem of bringing a child into a family already unable, psychologically and otherwise, to care for it. In other cases, . . . the additional difficulties and continuing stigma of unwed motherhood may be involved."[116] Therefore, the suffering of a pregnant woman "is too intimate and personal for the State to insist, without more, upon its own vision of the woman's role."[117]

[F46] In this context, the Court has stressed that the fetus is not a "person" within the language and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment; accordingly, an abortion is not the termination of life entitled to Fourteenth Amendment protection.[118] And it has

---

[114] Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 693–99 (1977) (plurality opinion of four members of the Court). Three Justices concurred in the result. A member of the Court found that the prohibition against distribution of contraceptives to persons under 16 could not be justified primarily because the state had not demonstrated that such prohibition measurably contributed to the purpose of deterrence of sexual relationships between juveniles that the state advanced as justification. Id. at 702. Another Justice concluded that this prohibition is defective both because it infringes the privacy interests of married females between the ages of 14 and 16, and because it prohibits parents from distributing contraceptives to their children, thus unjustifiably interfering with parental interests in rearing children. Id. at 707–08. The third Justice, who concurred, agreed that the challenged statute could not be applied to married females between the ages of 14 and 16. Furthermore, he held that the prohibition against distribution of contraceptives to persons under 16 denies such persons and their parents a choice that, if available, would reduce exposure to venereal disease or unwanted pregnancy, and that the prohibition cannot be justified as a means of discouraging sexual activity by minors. Id. at 713–16.

[115] Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 852 (1992).

[116] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 153 (1973).

[117] Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 852 (1992).

[118] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 156–57, 159 (1973). Nevertheless, the state may offer protections to unborn children in tort and probate law. See id. at 162.

made clear that "a State may not adopt one theory of when life begins to justify its regulation of abortions."[119]

[F47] Nevertheless, a pregnant woman "does not have an absolute constitutional right to an abortion on her demand."[120] The right to abortion "is not unqualified, and must be considered against important state interests in regulation. . . . A State may properly assert important interests in safeguarding the health of the pregnant woman, in maintaining medical standards, and in protecting potential life."[121] Roe established a trimester framework to govern abortion regulations. Under this construct, the state may not restrict the decision of the patient and her physician regarding abortion during the first trimester of pregnancy, because, until that point in time, "mortality in abortion may be less than mortality in normal childbirth. It follows that, from and after this point, a State may regulate the abortion procedure to the extent that the regulation reasonably relates to the preservation and protection of maternal health. Examples of permissible state regulation in this area are requirements as to the qualifications of the person who is to perform the abortion; as to the licensure of that person; as to the facility in which the procedure is to be performed, that is, whether it must be a hospital or may be a clinic or some other place of less-than-hospital status; as to the licensing of the facility; and the like. This means, on the other hand, that, for the period of pregnancy prior to this 'compelling' point, the attending physician, in consultation with his patient, is free to determine, without regulation by the State, that, in his medical judgment, the patient's pregnancy should be terminated. If that decision is reached, the judgment may be effectuated by an abortion free of interference by the State. With respect to the State's important and legitimate interest in potential life, the 'compelling' point is at viability. This is so because the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb." Hence, during the third trimester, when the fetus is viable, prohibitions are permitted provided the life or health of the mother is not at stake.[122]

[F48] In Casey, a sharply divided Court reaffirmed Roe's essential holding as to each of its three parts. "First is a recognition of the right of the woman to choose to have an abortion before viability and to obtain it without undue interference from the State. Before viability, the State's interests are not strong enough to support a prohibition of abortion or the imposition of a substantial obstacle to the woman's effective right to elect the procedure. Second is a confirmation of the State's power to restrict abortions after fetal viability if the law contains exceptions for pregnancies which endanger a woman's life or health. And third is the principle that the State has legitimate interests from the outset of the pregnancy in protecting the health of the woman and the life of the fetus that may become a child."[123]

[F49] However, in Casey, a three-Justice plurality rejected the trimester framework set forth in Roe. The state has a legitimate interest in ensuring that first trimester abortions are performed as safely as possible. Moreover, "[t]hough the woman has a right to

---

[119] Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc. 462 U.S. 416, 444 (1983) (Akron I). See also Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 504–07 (1989). Hence, a statute may not require the physician to inform his patient that "the unborn child is a human life from the moment of conception." See Akron I, supra, at 444

[120] Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 189 (1973).

[121] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 154 (1973).

[122] Id. at 163–64.

[123] Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 846 (1992).

choose to terminate or continue her pregnancy before viability, it does not at all follow that the State is prohibited from taking steps to ensure that this choice is thoughtful and informed. Even in the earliest stages of pregnancy, the State may enact rules and regulations designed to encourage the pregnant woman to know that there are philosophic and social arguments of great weight that can be brought to bear in favor of continuing the pregnancy to full term, and that there are procedures and institutions to allow adoption of unwanted children as well as a certain degree of state assistance if she chooses to raise the child herself. . . . Unless it has that effect on her right of choice, a state measure designed to persuade her to choose childbirth over abortion will be upheld if reasonably related to that goal. Regulations designed to foster the health of a woman seeking an abortion are valid if they do not constitute an undue burden."[124] An undue burden exists, and therefore a provision of law is invalid, if its "purpose or effect is to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion" before the fetus attains viability."[125] This standard of review was reaffirmed in Stenberg, where a five-member majority declined to revisit the issue.[126]

2. Fetal Viability

[F50] Viability marks the earliest point at which the state's interest in fetal life is constitutionally adequate to justify a legislative ban on non-therapeutic abortions. "Viability is reached when, in the judgment of the attending physician on the particular facts of the case before him, there is a reasonable likelihood of the fetus' sustained survival outside the womb, with or without artificial support."[127] Besides, "there must be a potentiality of 'meaningful life,' . . . not merely momentary survival."[128]

[F51] Webster involved a state statute mandating medical tests that were useful in making subsidiary viability findings regarding an unborn child of 20 or more weeks' gestational age. A three-Justice plurality upheld the statute as reasonably designed to ensure that abortions were not performed where the fetus was viable. The provision created essentially a presumption of viability at 20 weeks, which the physician, prior to performing an abortion, should rebut with tests—including, if feasible, those for gestational age, fetal weight, and lung capacity—indicating that the fetus was not viable. The plurality noted that, while medical evidence established that a 20-week fetus was not viable, and that 23 to 24 weeks' gestation was the earliest point at which a reasonable possibility of viability existed, there might be a four-week error in estimating gestational age, which supported testing at 20 weeks.[129]

---

[124] Id. at 872, 878 (plurality opinion of O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter, JJ.).

[125] Id. at 877 (emphasis added).

[126] Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 921 (2000).

[127] Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 388 (1979). In that case, the Court struck down, as unconstitutionally vague, a criminal statute that governed the determination of viability. See, in extenso, para. E78. A statute defining viability as "that stage of fetal development when the life of the unborn child may be continued indefinitely outside the womb by natural or artificial life supportive systems" withstands constitutional attack. See Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 63–65 (1976).

[128] Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 387 (1979), quoting Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 163 (1973).

[129] Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 514–16 (1989) (plurality opinion). Justice O'Connor, concurring, stressed that the state had not attempted to substitute its judg-

3. Informed Consent of the Pregnant Woman

[F52] "The decision to abort . . . is an important and often a stressful one, and it is desirable and imperative that it be made with full knowledge of its nature and consequences. The woman is the one primarily concerned, and her awareness of the decision and its significance may be assured, constitutionally, by the State to the extent of requiring her prior written consent." Therefore, a statute providing that a woman, prior to submitting to an abortion during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, must certify in writing her consent to the procedure and that "her consent is informed and freely given, and is not the result of coercion" is constitutionally valid.[130]

[F53] In Akron I, the Court held that the state's interest in ensuring that appropriate information be conveyed to the pregnant woman does "not justify abortion regulations designed to influence the woman's informed choice between abortion or childbirth." In that case, the Court confronted a city ordinance requiring that the attending physician inform his patient of the status of her pregnancy, the development of her fetus, the date of possible viability, the physical and emotional complications that might result from an abortion, the availability of agencies to provide her with assistance and information with respect to birth control, adoption, and childbirth and also inform her of the particular risks associated with her pregnancy and the abortion technique to be employed. The informational requirements in the Akron ordinance were found invalid for two equally decisive reasons. First, much of the information required was designed not to inform the woman's consent, but rather to persuade her to withhold it altogether. A provision required the physician to inform his patient that "the unborn child is a human life from the moment of conception," a requirement inconsistent with the Court's holding in Roe v. Wade that a state may not adopt one theory of when life begins to justify its regulation of abortions. Moreover, much of the detailed description of "the anatomical and physiological characteristics of the particular unborn child" required by the statute would involve, at best, speculation by the physician. And the subsection beginning with the dubious statement that "abortion is a major surgical procedure" and proceeding to describe numerous possible physical and psychological complications of abortion, was a "parade of horribles" intended to suggest that abortion was a particularly dangerous procedure.[131] The second reason was that "a rigid requirement that a specific body of information be given in all cases, irrespective of the particular needs of the patient, intruded upon the discretion of the pregnant woman's physician."[132] "By insisting upon recitation of a lengthy and inflexible list of information, Akron unreasonably ha[d] placed obstacles in the path of the doctor upon whom [the woman was] entitled to rely for advice in connection with her decision."[133]

[F54] These two reasons were considered to apply with equal and controlling force to the specific and intrusive informational prescriptions of the Pennsylvania statutes

---

ment for the physician's ascertainment of viability and that the marginal increase in the cost of an abortion, created by the viability testing provision, did not place an undue burden on a woman's abortion decision. Id. at 527–31. Justice Scalia would reconsider and explicitly overrule Roe v. Wade.

[130] Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 67 (1976).

[131] Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc. 462 U.S. 416, 444–45 (1983) (Akron I).

[132] See Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 762 (1986), discussing Akron I.

[133] Akron I, supra, at 445.

invalidated in Thornburgh. Under these provisions, seven explicit kinds of information should be delivered to the woman—the five first of them should be presented by her physician—at least 24 hours before her consent was given: (1) the name of the physician who will perform the abortion; (2) the fact that there might be detrimental physical and psychological effects which were not accurately foreseeable; (3) the particular medical risks associated with the particular abortion procedure to be employed; (4) the probable gestational age; (5) the medical risks associated with carrying the child to term; (6) the fact that medical assistance benefits might be available for prenatal care, childbirth, and neonatal care; and (7) the fact that the father was liable to assist in the child's support. The woman also had to be informed that materials describing the fetus and listing agencies offering alternatives to abortion were available for her review. The materials described the probable anatomical and physiological characteristics of the unborn child at two-week gestational increments from fertilization to full term, including any relevant information on the possibility of the unborn child's survival. These materials seemed to the Court to be "nothing less than an outright attempt to wedge the Commonwealth's message discouraging abortion into the privacy of the informed consent dialogue between the woman and her physician. The mandated description of fetal characteristics at 2-week intervals, no matter how objective, [wa]s plainly overinclusive, [since this was] not medical information always relevant to the woman's decision, and it [might] serve only to confuse and punish her, and to heighten her anxiety, contrary to accepted medical practice. Even the listing of agencies in the printed Pennsylvania form present[ed] serious problems; it contain[ed] names of agencies that well [might] be out of step with the needs of the particular woman, and thus place[d] the physician in an awkward position and infringe[d] upon his or her professional responsibilities. . . . The requirements . . . that the woman be advised that medical assistance benefits [might] be available, and that the father [wa]s responsible for financial assistance in the support of the child, similarly [we]re found to be poorly disguised elements of discouragement for the abortion decision. Much of this would be nonmedical information, and, for many patients, would be irrelevant and inappropriate. For a patient with a life-threatening pregnancy, the 'information' in its very rendition could be cruel. . . . [A] victim of rape should not have to hear gratuitous advice that an unidentified perpetrator was liable for support if she continued the pregnancy to term. . . . [And it is well known that] theoretical financial responsibility often does not equate with fulfillment. . . . The requirements . . . that the woman be informed by the physician of 'detrimental physical and psychological effects' and of all 'particular medical risks' compound[ed] the problem of medical attendance, increase[d] the patient's anxiety, and intrude[d] upon the physician's exercise of proper professional judgment. This type of compelled information is the antithesis of informed consent."[134]

[F55] However, Akron I and Thornburgh were later disavowed in part. In Casey, which involved a similar "informed consent" requirement, not applying in the case of a medical emergency,[135] a three-member plurality held that "[t]o the extent Akron I and

---

[134] Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 762–64 (1986).

[135] Under the statute, a medical emergency was "[t]hat condition which, on the basis of the physician's good faith clinical judgment, so complicates the medical condition of a pregnant woman as to necessitate the immediate abortion of her pregnancy to avert her death or for which a delay will create serious risk of substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function." If this definition foreclosed the possibility of an immediate abortion despite some significant health risks, the Court would be required to invalidate the restrictive opera-

Thornburgh find a constitutional violation when the government requires . . . the giving of truthful, nonmisleading information about the nature of the procedure, the attendant health risks and those of childbirth, and the 'probable gestational age' of the fetus, those cases go too far, are inconsistent with Roe's acknowledgment of an important interest in potential life, and are overruled."[136] The plurality also found "no reason why the State may not require doctors to inform a woman seeking an abortion of the availability of materials relating to the consequences to the fetus, even when those consequences have no direct relation to her health. . . . [R]equiring that the woman be informed of the availability of information relating to fetal development and the assistance available, should she decide to carry the pregnancy to full term, is a reasonable measure to insure an informed choice, one which might cause the woman to choose childbirth over abortion. This requirement cannot be considered a substantial obstacle to obtaining an abortion."[137] Four Justices concurred, finding that such requirements do not constitute a large burden and are rationally related to maternal health and to the state's legitimate interests in informed consent and the preservation of unborn life.[138]

[F56] In Casey, the Court also upheld, against a facial challenge, a 24-hour mandatory waiting period—not applying in medical emergencies—between the time that the pregnant woman received the required information and the performance of an abortion. Four Justices said that, "in providing time for reflection and reconsideration, the waiting period help[ed] ensure that a woman's decision to abort [wa]s a well-considered one, and reasonably further[ed] the State's legitimate interest in maternal health and in the unborn life of the fetus."[139] Three other members of the Court agreed that, at least in theory, the waiting period was a reasonable measure to implement the state's interest in protecting the life of the unborn. The district court had found that, for those women who had the fewest financial resources, those who should travel long distances, and those who had difficulty explaining their whereabouts to husbands, employers, or others, the 24-hour waiting period would be "particularly burdensome." The same three Justices noted that these findings were troubling in some respects, but they did not demonstrate that the waiting period constituted an undue burden. Hence, on the record of the case, and in the context of this facial challenge, they were not convinced that the 24-hour waiting period constituted an undue burden.[140]

---

tion of the provision, for the essential holding of Roe forbids a state from interfering with a woman's choice to undergo an abortion procedure if continuing her pregnancy would constitute a threat to her health. Nevertheless, the court of appeals had read the medical emergency exception as intended by the Pennsylvania legislature to assure that compliance with its abortion regulations would not in any way pose a significant threat to the life or health of a woman. See Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 879–80 (1992).

136 Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 882 (1992) (opinion of O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter, JJ.).

137 Id. at 882–83. The plurality also noted that the doctor-patient relationship is derivative of the woman's position and does not underlie or override the woman's right to make family decisions and her right to physical autonomy.

138 Id. at 967–68.

139 Id. at 969.

140 Id. at 885–87.

4. Consent or Notification of the Spouse

[F57] The Court has emphasized that it "cannot hold that the State has the constitutional authority to give the spouse unilaterally the ability to prohibit the wife from terminating her pregnancy when the State itself lacks that right. . . . [W]hen the wife and the husband disagree on the abortion decision, the view of only one of the two marriage partners can prevail. Inasmuch as it is the woman who physically bears the child and who is the more directly and immediately affected by the pregnancy, as between the two, the balance weighs in her favor." Therefore, a statute requiring the written consent of the spouse of a woman seeking a non-therapeutic abortion, during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, is unconstitutional.[141]

[F58] A spousal notification requirement is equally impermissible, for it is "likely to prevent a significant number of women from obtaining an abortion. . . . In well functioning marriages, spouses discuss important intimate decisions such as whether to bear a child. . . . [But] for the great many women who are victims of abuse inflicted by their husbands, or whose children are the victims of such abuse, a spousal notice requirement enables the husband to wield an effective veto over his wife's decision. Whether the prospect of notification itself deters such women from seeking abortions, or whether the husband, through physical force or psychological pressure or economic coercion, prevents his wife from obtaining an abortion until it is too late, the notice requirement will often be tantamount to" an unconstitutional spousal veto.[142]

5. Consent or Notification of the Parents of a Pregnant Unmarried Minor

[F59] "[T]he State may not impose a blanket provision requiring the consent of a parent or person in loco parentis as a condition for abortion of an unmarried minor during the first 12 weeks of her pregnancy."[143] "Although . . . such deference to parents may be permissible with respect to other choices facing a minor, the unique nature and consequences of the abortion decision make it inappropriate 'to give a third party an absolute, and possibly arbitrary, veto over the decision of the physician and his patient to terminate the patient's pregnancy, regardless of the reason for withholding the consent.'"[144] "Any independent interest the parent may have in the termination of the minor daughter's pregnancy is no more weighty than the right of privacy of the competent minor mature enough to have become pregnant."[145]

[F60] Nevertheless, it does not follow that "every minor, regardless of age or maturity, may give effective consent for termination of her pregnancy."[146] "The State has a strong and legitimate interest in the welfare of its young citizens, whose immaturity, inexperience, and lack of judgment may sometimes impair their ability to exercise their rights wisely. . . . That interest, which justifies state-imposed requirements that a minor obtain his or her parent's consent before undergoing an operation, marrying, or enter-

---

141 Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 70–71 (1976).

142 Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 892–93, 897 (1992).

143 Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 74 (1976).

144 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 643 (1979), quoting Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri. v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 74 (1976).

145 Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 75 (1976).

146 Id.

ing military service, . . . extends also to the minor's decision to terminate her pregnancy."[147] Therefore, "a State may require a minor seeking an abortion to obtain the consent of a parent or guardian, provided that there is an adequate judicial bypass procedure."[148] Under Bellotti, a constitutional parental consent statute must contain a bypass provision that meets four criteria: "(1) allow the minor to bypass the consent requirement if she establishes that she is mature enough and well enough informed to make the abortion decision independently; (2) allow the minor to bypass the consent requirement if she establishes that the abortion would be in her best interests; (3) ensure the minor's anonymity; and (4) provide for expeditious bypass procedures."[149] Hence, a city may not make a blanket determination that all minors under the age of 15 are too immature to make the abortion decision, or that an abortion never may be in the minor's best interests without parental approval.[150] A bypass procedure, contemplating an ex parte proceeding at which no one opposes the minor's testimony, does not violate due process by placing the burden of proof on the issues of maturity or best interests on the minor or by requiring a heightened (clear and convincing evidence) standard of proof, when she is assisted by an attorney and a guardian ad litem.[151]

[F61] A statute setting out a mere requirement of parental notice does not violate the constitutional rights of an immature, dependent minor. A state may reasonably determine that parental consultation is particularly desirable with respect to the abortion decision. Thus, such a requirement serves the important considerations of family integrity and protecting adolescents. In addition, it furthers a significant state interest by providing an opportunity for parents to supply essential medical and other information to a physician.[152]

[F62] A state statute requiring that a minor wait 48 hours after notifying a single parent of her intention to obtain an abortion, is constitutionally valid, for it reasonably furthers the legitimate state interest in ensuring that the minor's decision is knowing and

---

147 Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417, 444–45 (1990) (opinion of Justice Stevens).

148 See, e.g., Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 899, 970–971 (1992). A State may require an "informed" parental consent. See id. at 899–900 (plurality opinion).

149 See Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292, 295 (1997) (per curiam), discussing Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 643–44 (1979) (Bellotti II) (plurality opinion of four Justices). See also Ohio v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, 497 U.S. 502, 511–13 (1990) (Akron II). In Bellotti II, supra, at 642–56, the Court struck down a state statute requiring parental or judicial consent before an abortion could be performed on any unmarried minor. There the state's highest court had construed the statute to allow a court to overrule the minor's decision even if the court found that the minor was capable of making, and in fact had made, an informed and reasonable decision to have an abortion. The Court held that the judicial bypass provision was too restrictive and unconstitutionally burdened a minor's right to an abortion. Four Justices concluded that the flaws in the statute were that, as construed by the state court, (1) it permitted overruling of a mature minor's decision to abort her pregnancy; and (2) it required parental consultation or notification in every instance, without affording the pregnant minor an opportunity to receive an independent judicial determination that she was mature enough to consent or that an abortion would be in her best interests. Four other Justices concluded that the defect was in making the abortion decision of a minor subject to veto by a third party, whether parent or judge, no matter how mature and capable of informed decisionmaking the minor might be.

150 Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 439–40 (1983) (Akron I).

151 Ohio v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, 497 U.S. 502, 515–16 (1990) (Akron II).

152 H. L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398, 409–13 (1981).

intelligent. The state may properly enact laws designed to aid a parent who has assumed "primary responsibility" for a minor's well-being in discharging that responsibility. The 48-hour waiting period provides the parent the opportunity to consult with his or her daughter and spouse and a family physician. And the delay imposes only a minimal burden on the minor's rights.[153]

[F63] Although the Constitution might allow a state to demand that notice be given to one parent prior to an abortion, it may not require that similar notice be given to both parents, unless the state incorporates a judicial bypass procedure in that two-parent requirement. "A statutory requirement that both parents be notified, whether or not both wish to be notified or have assumed responsibility for the upbringing of the child, does not reasonably further any legitimate state interest. The usual justification for a parental consent or notification provision is that it supports the authority of a parent who is presumed to act in the minor's best interest, and thereby assures that the minor's decision to terminate her pregnancy is knowing, intelligent, and deliberate. To the extent that such an interest is legitimate, it would be fully served by a requirement that the minor notify one parent, who can then seek the counsel of his or her mate or any other party when such advice and support is deemed necessary to help the child make a difficult decision. In the ideal family setting, notice to either parent would normally constitute notice to both. A statute requiring two-parent notification would not further any state interest in those instances. In many families, however, the parent notified by the child would not notify the other parent. In those cases, the State has no legitimate interest in questioning one parent's judgment that notice to the other parent would not assist the minor or in presuming that the parent who has assumed parental duties is incompetent to make decisions regarding the health and welfare of the child. . . . [Moreover, a two-parent notification] disserves the state interest in protecting and assisting the minor with respect to dysfunctional families," where this requirement, ostensibly designed for the benefit of the minor, may be harmful to the minor, and often to a parent as well. In some cases, the parents are divorced and the second parent does not have custody or otherwise participate in the child's upbringing. In other instances, the second parent has either deserted or abused the child, or is not notified because of the considered judgment that notification would inflict unnecessary stress on a parent who is ill. "In these circumstances, the statute [is] not merely ineffectual in achieving the State's goals, but actually counterproductive. The focus on notifying the second parent [may] distrac[t] both the parent and minor from the minor's imminent abortion decision." There is also no merit to the argument that the two-parent requirement is justified because, in the ideal family, the minor should make her decision only after consultation with both parents, who should naturally be concerned with her welfare. The state has no legitimate interest in conforming family life to a state-designed ideal by requiring family members to talk with one another. "Nor can any state interest in protecting a parent's interest in shaping a child's values and lifestyle overcome the liberty interests of a minor acting with the consent of a single parent or court. . . . [T]he combined force of the separate interest of one parent and the minor's privacy interest must outweigh the separate interest of the second parent, . . . [and] the justification for any rule requiring parental involvement in the abortion decision rests entirely on the best interests of the child."[154]

---

[153] Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417, 448–49, 496–97 (1990).

[154] Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417, 450–54 (1990); id. at 461, 497–501. One Justice

[F64] In Akron II, the Court upheld a statute requiring a minor to notify one parent before having an abortion, subject to a judicial bypass provision. The Court "declined to decide whether a parental notification statute must include some sort of bypass provision to be constitutional. . . . Instead, [it] held that [the challenged] bypass provision satisfied the four Bellotti criteria required for bypass provisions in parental consent statutes, and that a fortiori it satisfied any criteria that might be required for bypass provisions in parental notification statutes."[155] As the Court explained in Lambert, underlying Akron II, was "an assumption that a judicial bypass procedure requiring a minor to show that parental notification is not in her best interests is equivalent to a judicial bypass procedure requiring a minor to show that abortion without notification is in her best interests, as the context of the opinion, the statutory language, and the concurring opinion" all made clear.[156]

6. Methods of Abortion

[F65] "[S]ubsequent to viability, the State may regulate and even proscribe abortion except where it is necessary,[157] in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother."[158] "[A] State may promote but not endanger a woman's health when it regulates the methods of abortion."[159] The woman's right to receive medical care in accordance with her licensed physician's best judgment and the physician's right to administer it are substantially and unduly limited by a statute mandating that the procedure be approved by a hospital staff abortion committee.[160]

[F66] In Thornburgh, the Court dealt with a statute providing that "the abortion technique employed shall be that which would provide the best opportunity for the unborn child to be aborted alive unless," in the physician's good faith judgment, that technique "would present a significantly greater medical risk to the life or health of the pregnant woman." The provision was unconstitutional because it required a "trade-off" between the woman's health and fetal survival and failed to require that maternal health be the physician's paramount consideration.[161]

[F67] In the early 1970s, inducing labor through the injection of saline into the uterus was the predominant method of second trimester abortion. Danforth involved a

---

held that two-parent notification is unconstitutional without judicial bypass, but constitutional with bypass; four Justices held that two-parent notification is constitutional with or without bypass; and four other Justices held that two-parent notification is unconstitutional with or without bypass.

155 See Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292, 295 (1997) (per curiam), discussing Ohio v. Akron Center for Reprod. Health, 497 U.S. 502, 510 (1990) (Akron II).

156 Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292, 297–98 (1997) (per curiam).

157 The word "necessary" does not refer to "absolute proof or require unanimity of medical opinion." See Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 937 (2000).

158 See Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 921 (2000), quoting Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 899, 879 (1992) (plurality opinion), quoting, in turn, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 164–65 (1973).

159 Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 931 (2000). There, the Court rejected the proposition that this principle is limited "to situations where the pregnancy itself creates a threat to health," noting "a State cannot subject women's health to significant risks both in that context, and also where state regulations force women to use riskier methods of abortion." Id. at 931.

160 Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 197–98 (1973).

161 Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 768–69 (1986).

statute prohibiting, after the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, the abortion procedure of saline amniocentesis as "deleterious to maternal health." The provision prohibited the most commonly used abortion procedure in the country, which was safer, with respect to maternal mortality, than even the continuation of pregnancy until normal childbirth, and forced pregnancy terminations by methods more dangerous to the woman's health than the method outlawed. Therefore, it failed as a reasonable protection of maternal health. Instead, it was found to be "an unreasonable or arbitrary regulation designed to inhibit, and having the effect of inhibiting, the vast majority of abortions after the first 12 weeks." As such, it did not withstand constitutional challenge.[162]

[F68] During recent years, the medical profession has switched from medical induction of labor to surgical procedures for most second trimester abortions. The most commonly used procedure is called "dilation and evacuation" (D&E). D&E involves (1) dilation of the cervix; (2) removal of at least some fetal tissue using non-vacuum instruments; and (3) after the 15th week, the potential need for instrumental disarticulation or dismemberment of the fetus or the collapse of fetal parts to facilitate evacuation from the uterus. The D&E procedure carries certain risks. The use of instruments within the uterus creates a danger of accidental perforation and damage to neighboring organs. Sharp fetal bone fragments create similar dangers. And fetal tissue accidentally left behind can cause infection and various other complications. Nonetheless, studies show that the risks of mortality and complication that accompany the D&E procedure between the 12th and 20th weeks of gestation are significantly lower than those accompanying induced labor procedures, which are the next safest mid-second trimester procedures. A variation of D&E, known as "intact D&E," is used after 16 weeks. It involves removing the fetus from the uterus through the cervix "intact," i.e., in one pass rather than several passes. Some physicians prefer this method, because they consider that (1) it reduces the dangers from sharp bone fragments passing through the cervix, (2) minimizes the number of instrument passes needed for extraction and lessens the likelihood of uterine perforations caused by those instruments, (3) reduces the likelihood of leaving infection-causing fetal and placental tissue in the uterus, and (4) could help to prevent potentially fatal absorption of fetal tissue into the maternal circulation. The intact D&E proceeds in one of two ways, depending on whether the fetus presents head first or feet first. The feet-first method is known as "dilation and extraction" (D&X). D&X is ordinarily associated with the term "partial birth abortion." Stenberg[163] involved a Nebraska's statute criminalizing the performance of partial birth abortions, unless necessary to save the mother's life. It defined "partial birth abortion" as a procedure in which the doctor "partially delivers vaginally a living unborn child before killing the child" and defined the latter phrase to mean "intentionally delivering into the vagina a living unborn child, or a substantial portion thereof, for the purpose of performing a procedure that the [abortionist] knows will kill the . . . child and does kill the . . . child." The Court invalidated the statute for two independent reasons. First, the law lacked any exception for the preservation of the health of the mother.[164] Second, it imposed an undue burden on a woman's ability to choose an abortion, since, even if its basic aim was to ban D&X, it also covered D&E.

---

[162] Planned Parenthood of Cent. Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 78–79 (1977).

[163] Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 922–40 (2000).

[164] The Court rejected Nebraska's contention that there was no need for a health exception, because safe alternatives remained available and a ban on partial-birth abortion/D&X would create no risk to women's health. Given the district court's finding that D&X obviates

7. Persons Performing Abortions

[F69] The performance of abortions may be restricted to physicians. In promoting its interest in the health of the pregnant woman, the state may define the term "physician" to mean only a physician currently licensed by the state, and may proscribe any abortion by a person who is not a physician as so defined.[165]

[F70] A statute mandating that the performing physician's judgment be confirmed by independent examinations of the patient by two other licensed physicians is unconstitutional. "If a physician is licensed by the State, he is recognized by the State as capable of exercising acceptable clinical judgment. If he fails in this, professional censure and deprivation of his license are available remedies. Required acquiescence by co-practitioners has no rational connection with a patient's needs, and unduly infringes on the physician's right to practice."[166]

[F71] A state may require the presence of a second physician during an abortion performed after viability. The state has a compelling interest in protecting and preserving fetal life, and the second physician's presence provides assurance that the state's interest is protected more fully than with only one physician in attendance.[167] Nevertheless, a statute incorporating such a requirement is unconstitutional if it has no exception for emergency situations and "evinces no intent to protect a woman whose life may be at risk."[168]

8. Facilities in Which Abortions May Be Performed

[F72] A second trimester hospitalization requirement is not a reasonable health regulation. By preventing the performance of D&E abortions[169] "in an appropriate nonhospital setting, [a city imposes] a heavy and unnecessary burden on women's access to a relatively inexpensive, otherwise accessible, and safe abortion procedure."[170] health risks in certain circumstances, a highly plausible record-based explanation of why that might be so, a division of medical opinion over whether D&X is generally safer, and an absence of controlled medical studies that would help answer these medical questions, the Court was not convinced that a health exception was never necessary to preserve the health of women. For one thing, the word "necessary" in Casey's phrase "necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the health of the mother," cannot refer to absolute proof or require unanimity of medical opinion. Doctors often differ in their estimation of comparative health risks and appropriate treatment. And Casey's words "appropriate medical judgment" must embody "the judicial need to tolerate responsible differences of medical opinion." For another thing, the division of medical opinion signals uncertainty. If those who believe that D&X is a safer abortion method in certain circumstances turn out to be right, the absence of a health exception will place women at an unnecessary risk; if they are wrong, the exception will simply turn out to have been unnecessary. See Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 936–37 (2000).

---

165 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 165 (1973); Mazurek v. Armstrong, 520 U.S. 968, 974–75 (1997) (per curiam).

166 Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 199 (1973).

167 Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Kansas City, Missouri, Inc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476, 482–86, 505 (1983).

168 Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 770–71 (1986).

169 See para. F68.

170 Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc. 462 U.S. 416, 438 (1983) (Akron I). See also Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 194–95 (1973), concerning a hospital requirement for first trimester abortions.

Conversely, a statutory requirement that second trimester abortions be performed in "licensed clinics" has been upheld as a means of protecting the woman's own health and safety that comports with accepted medical standards.[171]

9. Abortion Funding—Allocation of Public Resources

[F73] The Court has stressed that "[t]here is a basic difference between direct state interference with a protected activity and state encouragement of an alternative activity consonant with legislative policy."[172] "[A]lthough government may not place obstacles in the path of a woman's exercise of her freedom of choice, it need not remove those not of its own creation. Indigency falls in the latter category."[173]

[F74] At issue in Maher was a Connecticut welfare regulation under which Medicaid recipients received payments for medical services incident to childbirth but not for medical services incident to non-therapeutic abortions. The regulation placed no obstacles in the pregnant woman's path to an abortion. The indigency that might make it difficult and, in some cases, perhaps, impossible—for some women to have abortions was neither created nor in any way affected by the Connecticut regulation, which was rationally related to and furthered the state's strong and legitimate interest in encouraging normal childbirth. Consequently, the Court did not find the regulation repugnant to the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses.[174] Likewise, there is no constitutional violation by a city "in electing, as a policy choice, to provide publicly financed hospital services for childbirth without providing corresponding services for nontherapeutic abortions."[175]

[F75] In Harris v. McRae, the Court extended the rationale of Maher to Congress' refusal to fund medically necessary abortions, except those necessary to save the life of the mother. The Court emphasized that, "regardless of whether the freedom of a woman to choose to terminate her pregnancy for health reasons lies at the core or the periphery of the due process liberty recognized in Wade, it simply does not follow that a woman's freedom of choice carries with it a constitutional entitlement to the financial resources to avail herself of the full range of protected choices." Moreover, Congress' authorization of reimbursement for medically necessary services generally, but not for certain medically necessary abortions, was upheld against an equal protection challenge, as rationally related to the legitimate governmental goal of encouraging childbirth and protecting fetal life; indeed, no other procedure involved the purposeful termination of a potential life.[176]

---

171 Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506, 516–19 (1983).

172 Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 475 (1977).

173 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 316 (1980).

174 Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 473–74, 478–80 (1977). As to whether the Connecticut welfare regulation discriminated against a suspect class, under equal protection analysis, the Court observed: "This case involves no discrimination against a suspect class. An indigent woman desiring an abortion does not come within the limited category of disadvantaged classes so recognized by our cases. Nor does the fact that the impact of the regulation falls upon those who cannot pay lead to a different conclusion. In a sense, every denial of welfare to an indigent creates a wealth classification as compared to non-indigents who are able to pay for the desired goods or services. But this Court has never held that financial need alone identifies a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis." Id. at 470–71.

175 Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 519, 521 (1977) (per curiam).

176 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 316, 324–25 (1980). See also Williams v. Zbaraz, 448 U.S. 358, 369 (1980).

[F76] If the state may make a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion and implement that judgment by the allocation of public funds, it may also do so "through the allocation of other public resources, such as hospitals and medical staff. . . . [A state's] refusal to allow public employees to perform [non-therapeutic] abortions in public hospitals leaves a pregnant woman with the same choices as if the State had chosen not to operate any public hospitals at all. [Such a provision only restricts] a woman's ability to obtain an abortion to the extent that she chooses to use a physician affiliated with a public hospital. This circumstance is more easily remedied, and thus considerably less burdensome, than indigency. . . . Nothing in the Constitution requires States to enter or remain in the business of performing abortions."[177]

[177] Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 509–10 (1989).

CHAPTER 7

SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

A. INTRODUCTION

[G1] The Fourth Amendment secures the persons, houses, papers, and effects of the people against unreasonable searches and seizures and requires the existence of probable cause before a warrant shall issue. That Amendment is made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth;[1] it has also been held applicable to Puerto Rico.[2] However, its protections do not extend to non-resident aliens outside the territorial boundaries of the United States.[3]

[G2] The basic purpose of the Fourth Amendment is to safeguard "the privacy and personal security of individuals" against arbitrary invasions by governmental officials.[4] The Fourth Amendment's requirement that searches and seizures be reasonable "also may limit police use of unnecessarily frightening or offensive methods of surveillance and investigation."[5]

B. SCOPE OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT

1. Government Conduct

[G3] The evil toward which the Fourth Amendment was primarily directed was the resurrection of the pre-Revolutionary practice of using general warrants or "writs of assistance" to authorize searches for contraband by officers of the Crown.[6] But the Court "has never limited the Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures to operations conducted by the police. Rather, th[e] Court has long spoken of the

---

1 See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), overruling Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), and holding the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule applicable to state prosecutions. See also Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 30–34 (1963), in which the Court held that the same probable cause standards were applicable to federal and state warrants under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. While a state is free as a matter of its own law to impose greater restrictions on police activity than those the Court holds to be necessary, under the Fourth Amendment, state courts cannot interpret this Amendment more restrictively than interpreted by the Court. See Arkansas v. Sullivan, 532 U.S. 769, 772 (2001).

2 Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465, 468–71 (1979).

3 nited States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259, 264–75 (1990). There, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to the search and seizure by U.S. agents of property owned by a non-resident alien and located in a foreign country. See, in extenso, para. B42.

4 See, e.g., United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 554 (1976).

5 United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 895 (1975).

6 See United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1977); Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 624–29 (1886).

Fourth Amendment's strictures as restraints imposed upon 'governmental action, that is upon the activities of sovereign authority.'"[7] Accordingly, it has held the Fourth Amendment applicable to the activities of criminal as well as civil authorities.[8] Because the individual's interest in privacy and personal security "suffers whether the government's motivation is to investigate violations of criminal laws or breaches of other statutory or regulatory standards,"[9] it would be "anomalous to say that the individual and his private property are fully protected by the Fourth Amendment only when the individual is suspected of criminal behavior."[10]

[G4] On the contrary, the Fourth Amendment does not apply to a search or seizure, even an arbitrary one, effected by a private party on his own initiative, without the participation or knowledge of any government official.[11] Nevertheless, the Amendment protects against such intrusions "if the private party acted as an instrument or agent of the Government."[12]

2. What Constitutes "Search" or "Seizure"

a. Generally

i. Search

[G5] In determining whether a "search," within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, occurs, the lodestar is Katz. In that case, government agents had intercepted the contents of a telephone conversation by attaching an electronic listening device to the outside of a public phone booth. The Court rejected the argument that a "search" can occur only when there has been a "physical intrusion" into a "constitutionally protected area," noting that the Fourth Amendment "protects people, not places." Because the government's monitoring of Katz's conversation "violated the privacy upon which he justifiably relied while using the telephone booth," the Court held that it constituted a Fourth Amendment search.[13]

---

[7] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 335 (1985), quoting Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 (1921).

[8] See New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 335 (1985) (citing cases).

[9] Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 312–13 (1978).

[10] Camara v. Mun. Court, 387 U.S. 523, 530 (1967).

[11] Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 (1921); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 487 (1971); United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 113–14 (1984). Such private wrongdoing does not deprive the government of the right to use evidence that it has acquired lawfully. See Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649, 656 (1980).

[12] Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 614 (1989). See, in extenso, para. G172. In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 487–90 (1971), the Court determined that a suspect's wife was not operating as an agent of the state when she handed over her husband's guns and clothing to the police, since the wife had not been coerced. The Court found nothing constitutionally suspect in the subjective forces that impelled the spouse to cooperate with the police, like the simple, but often powerful, convention of openness and honesty, the fear that secretive behavior would intensify suspicion and uncertainty as to what course was most likely to be helpful to the absent spouse. In California Bankers Association v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 52–53 (1974), the Court rejected the contention that banks act as agents of the government, when they keep records of their depositors' transactions pursuant to a federal statute.

[13] Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351–53 (1967).

[G6] Consistently with Katz, the Court uniformly has held that the application of the Fourth Amendment depends on whether "the person invoking its protection can claim a 'justifiable,' a 'reasonable,' or a 'legitimate expectation of privacy' that has been invaded by government action."[14] This inquiry embraces two discrete questions. The first is whether the individual has "manifested a subjective expectation of privacy in the object of the challenged search;"[15] "[w]hat a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection."[16] The second question is whether "the individual's subjective expectation of privacy is one that society is willing to recognize as reasonable."[17]

[G7] In assessing the degree to which a search infringes upon individual privacy, "the Court has given weight to such factors as the intention of the Framers of the Fourth Amendment,"[18] "the uses to which the individual has put a location,"[19] and the "societal understanding that certain areas deserve the most scrupulous protection from government invasion."[20] "The common law may guide consideration of what areas are protected by the Fourth Amendment by defining areas whose invasion by others is wrongful."[21]

[G8] "The concept of an interest in privacy that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable is, by its very nature, critically different from the mere expectation, however well justified, that certain facts will not come to the attention of the authorities. Indeed, this distinction underlies the rule that government may utilize information voluntarily disclosed to a governmental informant, despite the criminal's reasonable expectation that his associates would not disclose confidential information to the authorities."[22] The Court "has held repeatedly that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the obtaining of information revealed to a third party and conveyed by him to Government authorities, even if the information is revealed on the assumption that it will be used only for a limited purpose and the confidence placed in the third party will not be betrayed."[23]

---

[14] Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 740 (1979) (citing cases) (emphasis added). The creation of a mere potential for an invasion of privacy does not amount to search. See United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 712 (1984). State tort law governing unfair competition does not define the limits of the Fourth Amendment. See Dow Chem. Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227, 232 (1986).

[15] California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 211 (1986), citing Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 740 (1979).

[16] California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 213 (1986).

[17] See Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 740 (1979). See also California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 211 (1986).

[18] Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 178 (1984), citing United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1977).

[19] Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 178 (1984), citing Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 265 (1960).

[20] Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 178 (1984), citing Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980).

[21] Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 183 (1984).

[22] United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 122–23 (1984), citing United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745, 751–52 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[23] See United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 443, n.5 (1976) (a customer of a bank cannot challenge on Fourth Amendment grounds the admission into evidence in a criminal prosecution of financial records obtained by the government from his bank pursuant to allegedly defective subpoenas, despite the fact that he was given no notice of the subpoenas). Cf. Sec. and Exch. Comm'n v. Jerry T. O'Brien 467 U.S. 735, 743 (1984). See also Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 743–44 (1979) (when one uses his phone, one voluntarily conveys numerical information

This Amendment affords no protection to "a wrongdoer's misplaced belief that a person to whom he voluntarily confides his wrongdoing will not reveal it."[24]

[G9] Finally, it must be noted that a governmental intrusion into a person's legitimate expectations of privacy constitutes a "search," even if the intrusion is imposed by law as a condition of eligibility for a particular benefit, such as a promotion,[25] or an opportunity to participate in an extracurricular activity.[26]

ii. Seizure

[G10] Seizure of Persons—In General. The word "seizure," in the language of the Fourth Amendment, "readily bears the meaning of a laying on of hands or application of physical force to restrain movement, even when it is ultimately unsuccessful. . . . It does not remotely apply, however, to the prospect of a policeman yelling 'Stop, in the name of the law!' at a fleeing suspect who continues to flee."[27] An attempted seizure is not a Fourth Amendment seizure.[28] A police car pursuing with flashing lights, or a policeman in the road signaling an oncoming car to halt, does not effect a seizure.[29] "An arrest requires either physical force, as described above, or, where that is absent, submission to the assertion of authority. Mere words will not constitute an arrest, while, on the other hand, no actual, physical touching is essential. The apparent inconsistency in the two parts of this statement is explained by the fact that an assertion of authority and purpose to arrest, followed by submission of the arrestee, constitutes an arrest. There can be no arrest without either touching or submission."[30] "[T]he test for existence of a 'show of authority' is an objective one: not whether the citizen perceived that he was being ordered to restrict his movement, but whether, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, the officer's words and actions would have conveyed that to a reasonable person."[31] to the telephone company and assumes the risk that the company would reveal to police the numbers he dialed).

---

[24] Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293, 302 (1966). The question of evidentiary privileges, such as that protecting communications between an attorney and his client, is different. Cf. Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 403–05 (1976).

A subpoena to a third party to obtain the records of that party does not violate the rights of a defendant, even if a criminal prosecution is contemplated at the time the subpoena is issued. See United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 444 (1976), citing California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 53 (1974).

[25] See Nat'l Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989) (drug test for U.S. Customs Service employees seeking transfer or promotion to certain positions).

[26] See Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995) (drug testing of student athletes).

The relevant portion of Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309, 317–18 (1971), has been implicitly overruled. This case presented the issue whether a beneficiary of the program for Aid to Families with Dependent Children may refuse a home visit by the caseworker without risking the termination of benefits. Considering that the visitation, in itself, was not forced or compelled, and that the beneficiary's denial of permission was not a criminal act, the Court found that the Fourth Amendment did not come into play.

[27] California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626 (1991).

[28] See id. at 626, n.2.

[29] Cf. Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 598 (1989).

[30] California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626–27 (1991).

[31] Id. at 628. Under the so-called Mendenhall test, formulated by Justice Stewart's opinion in United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980), and adopted by the Court in later cases

[G11] The protection against unreasonable seizures extends to seizures that "involve only a brief detention short of traditional arrest."[32] "[W]henever a police officer accosts an individual and restrains his freedom to walk away, he has 'seized' that person."[33] For example, "[t]emporary detention of individuals during the stop of an automobile by the police, even if only for a brief period and for a limited purpose, constitutes a 'seizure of 'persons,'" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.[34] Temporary detention of the occupant of a home being lawfully searched is also subject to the Fourth Amendment guarantees.[35] This Amendment applies to involuntary detention occurring at the investigatory stage, as well as at the accusatory stage. Detentions for the sole purpose of obtaining fingerprints are subject to the constraints of the Fourth Amendment.[36] Likewise, "detention for custodial interrogation—regardless of its label—intrudes so severely on interests protected by the Fourth Amendment as necessarily to trigger the traditional safeguards against illegal arrest."[37]

[G12] "A Fourth Amendment seizure does not occur whenever there is a governmentally caused termination of an individual's freedom of movement (the innocent passerby), nor even whenever there is a governmentally caused and governmentally desired termination of an individual's freedom of movement (the fleeing felon), but only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied. . . . Thus, if a parked and unoccupied police car slips its brake and pins a passerby against a wall, it is likely that a tort has occurred, but not a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And the situation would not change if the passerby happened, by lucky chance, to be a serial murderer for whom there was an outstanding arrest warrant—even if, at the time he was thus pinned, he was in the process of running away from two pursuing constables."[38] Hence, there is no seizure in case a pursuing police car seeks to stop a suspect only by the show of authority represented by flashing lights and continuing pursuit, but the suspect is stopped by a different means—his loss of control of his vehicle and the subsequent crash. If, instead of that, the police cruiser pulls alongside the fleeing car and sideswipes it, producing the crash, then the termination of the suspect's freedom of movement would be a seizure.[39] Similarly, "a roadblock is not just a significant show of authority to induce a voluntary stop, but is designed to produce a stop by physical impact if voluntary compliance does not occur."[40]

(see, e.g., INS v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210, 215 (1984); Michigan v. Chesternut, 486 U.S. 567, 573–74 (1988)), "[a] person has been 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment only if, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." This test says that a person has been seized "only if," not that he has been seized "whenever." Hence, "it states a necessary, but not a sufficient, condition for seizure" effected through a "show of authority," as explained in California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 628 (1991).

[32] United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 878 (1975); Immigration and Naturalization Serv. v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210, 215 (1984).

[33] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 16 (1968).

[34] Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 809 (1996), citing Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 653 (1979).

[35] Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 695–96 (1981).

[36] Davis v. Mississipi, 394 U.S. 721, 726–27 (1969).

[37] Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 216 (1979).

[38] Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596–97 (1989).

[39] Id. at 597.

[40] Id. at 598. See also County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 843–44 (1998).

[G13] Consensual Encounters with the Police. "Law enforcement officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable seizures merely by approaching individuals on the street or in other public places and putting questions to them if they are willing to listen. . . . Even when law enforcement officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may pose questions, ask for identification, and request consent to search luggage—provided they do not induce cooperation by coercive means. . . . If a reasonable person would feel free to terminate the encounter, then he or she has not been seized."[41]

[G14] In Kaupp, a 17-year-old boy was awakened in his bedroom at three in the morning by at least three police officers, one of whom stated "we need to go and talk." Kaupp said "Okay." He was taken out in handcuffs, without shoes, dressed only in his underwear in January, placed in a patrol car, driven to the scene of a crime and then to the sheriff's offices, where he was taken into an interrogation room and questioned. The Court found that Kaupp had been "seized." Kaupp's "Okay" in response to the officer's statement was no showing of consent under the circumstances. Kaupp was offered no choice, and "a group of police officers rousing an adolescent out of bed in the middle of the night with the words 'we need to go and talk' presents no option but 'to go.'" There was no reason to think that Kaupp's answer was anything more than "a mere submission to a claim of lawful authority." And if reasonable doubt were possible on this point, the ensuing events would resolve it—removal from one's house in handcuffs on a January night with nothing on but underwear for a trip to a crime scene on the way to an interview room at law enforcement headquarters. Hence, when the detectives began to question Kaupp, "a reasonable person in his situation [could not] have thought he was sitting in the interview room as a matter of choice, free to change his mind and go home to bed."[42]

[G15] In Mendenhall, the respondent was walking along an airport concourse when she was approached by two federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) officers. The officers asked for Mendenhall's airline ticket and some identification; the names on the ticket and identification did not match. When one of the agents specifically identified himself as attached to the DEA, Mendenhall became visibly shaken and nervous. After returning the ticket and identification, one officer asked Mendenhall if she would accompany him to the DEA airport office, 50 feet away, for further questions. Mendenhall did so, without a verbal response to the request. The Court held that Mendenhall's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated when she went with the agents from the concourse to the DEA office. She was not told that she had to go to the office but was simply asked if she would accompany the officers, and there were neither threats nor any show of force. In addition, the facts that the respondent was 22 years old, had not been graduated from high school, and was an African-American accosted by Caucasian officers, while not irrelevant, were not decisive. Hence, the totality of the evidence in this case was plainly adequate to support the district court's finding that the respondent voluntarily consented to accompany the officers to the DEA office.[43]

---

41 United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 200–01 (2002). See also Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 434 (1991) (mere police questioning does not constitute a seizure).

42 Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 631–32 (2003) (per curiam).

43 United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 557–58 (1980). Regarding the initial encounter between Mendenhall and the DEA agents, two Justices were of the view that the encounter was consensual, and that no seizure had taken place. Three other Justices assumed

[G16] In Royer, when Drug Enforcement Administration agents found that the respondent matched a drug courier profile, the agents approached him and asked him for his airplane ticket and driver's license, which the agents then examined. A majority of the Court believed that the request and examination of the documents did not amount to a "seizure."[44] But after the initial questioning, the detectives told Royer that he was suspected of transporting narcotics, asked him to accompany them to the police room, and seized his luggage, while retaining his airline ticket and driver's license and without indicating in any way that he was free to depart. The Court found that "[w]hat had begun as a consensual inquiry in a public place had escalated into an investigatory procedure in a police interrogation room." Accordingly, the Court held that the defendant's detention constituted an arrest.[45]

[G17] At issue in Delgado was the INS's practice of visiting factories at random and questioning employees to determine whether any were illegal aliens. Several INS agents would stand near the building's exits, while other agents walked through the factory questioning workers. The Court acknowledged that the workers may not have been free to leave their worksite, but explained that this was not the result of police activity, but was due to the workers' voluntary obligations to their employers. The Court concluded that there was no seizure, because, even though the workers were not free to leave the building without being questioned, the agents' conduct should have given employees "no reason to believe that they would be detained if they gave truthful answers to the questions put to them or if they simply refused to answer."[46]

[G18] In Bostick, two police officers requested a bus passenger's consent to a search of his luggage. The passenger agreed, and the resulting search revealed cocaine in his suitcase. The Court first observed that "in order to determine whether a particular encounter constitutes a seizure, a court must consider all the circumstances surrounding the encounter to determine whether the police conduct would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter."[47] It "noted next that the traditional rule, which states that a seizure does not occur so long as a reasonable person would feel free 'to disregard the police and go about his business,' . . . is not an accurate measure of the coercive effect of a bus encounter. A passenger may not want to get off a bus if there is a risk it will depart before the opportunity to reboard. . . . A bus rider's movements are confined in this sense, but this is the natural result of choosing to take the bus; it says nothing about whether the police conduct is coercive. The proper inquiry 'is whether a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.'"[48] Finally, the Court rejected Bostick's argument that he must have been seized because no reasonable person would consent to a search of luggage containing drugs. "The reasonable person test, the Court explained, is objective and that there had been a seizure but would have held that there was reasonable suspicion to warrant it. Id. at 551–57, 566.

---

44 Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 502, 523, n.3 (1983).

45 Id., at 501–03, 509.

46 Immigration and Naturalization Serv. v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210, 218 (1984).

47 Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 432, 439 (1991) (emphasis added).

48 See United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 201–02 (2002), discussing and quoting Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 434–36 (1991).

'presupposes an innocent person.'"[49] In light of the limited record, the Court refrained from deciding whether a seizure occurred. The Court, however, identified two factors particularly worth noting on remand. First, although it was obvious that an officer was armed, he did not remove the gun from its pouch or use it in a threatening way. Second, the officer advised the passenger that he could refuse consent to the search.[50]

[G19] In Drayton, it was made clear that the Fourth Amendment does not require police officers to advise bus passengers of their right not to cooperate and to refuse consent to searches. The Court also reaffirmed that "[t]he fact that an encounter takes place on a bus does not, on its own, transform standard police questioning into an illegal seizure." Furthermore, it found ample grounds to conclude that the encounter at issue was cooperative and not coercive or confrontational. "There was no application of force, no intimidating movement, no overwhelming show of force, no brandishing of weapons, no blocking of exits, no threat, no command, not even an authoritative tone of voice."[51]

[G20] Grand Jury Subpoenas. "Citizens generally are not constitutionally immune from grand jury subpoenas."[52] A subpoena to appear before a grand jury is not a "seizure" in the Fourth Amendment sense, even though that summons may be inconvenient or burdensome. "The compulsion exerted by a grand jury subpoena differs from the seizure effected by an arrest or even an investigative stop in more than civic obligation. For . . . [t]he latter is abrupt, is effected with force or the threat of it, and often in demeaning circumstances, and, in the case of arrest, results in a record involving social stigma. A subpoena is served in the same manner as other legal process; it involves no stigma whatever; if the time for appearance is inconvenient, this can generally be altered; and it remains at all times under the control and supervision of a court."[53] "Although the powers of the grand jury are not unlimited, and are subject to the supervision of a judge, the longstanding principle that the public has a 'right to every man's evidence,' except for those persons protected by a constitutional, common law, or statutory privilege, . . . is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings."[54] "'The personal sacrifice involved is a part of the necessary contribution of the individual to the welfare of the public.' . . . And while the duty may be 'onerous' at times, it is 'necessary to the administration of justice.'"[55]

[G21] Seizure of Property. A "seizure" of property occurs when "there is some meaningful interference with an individual's possessory interests in that property."[56] A purchase of obscene magazines is not a seizure, since it involves a voluntary transfer of the seller's possessory interests in the magazines to the purchaser upon the receipt of the

---

49 See United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 202 (2002), discussing and quoting Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 437–38 (1991).

50 See Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 432 (1991).

51 United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 204 (2002).

52 Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 682 (1972).

53 See United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 10 (1973)

54 Id. at 9, quoting Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 688 (1972).

55 Id. at 10, quoting Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281 (1919).

56 United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 113, 124–25 (1984) (a chemical test, conducted for the purpose of determining the identity of a particular substance, is within the reach of the Fourth Amendment, since, by destroying a quantity of the powder, it results in a permanent deprivation of possessory interests).

funds.[57] The Fourth Amendment protects property even where privacy or liberty is not implicated and even though no search within its meaning has taken place.[58] This Amendment also places restrictions on seizures conducted for purposes of civil forfeiture.[59]

[G22] Mistake as to Persons or Things Seized. "A seizure occurs even when an unintended person or thing is the object of the detention or taking, . . . but the detention or taking itself must be willful."[60]

iii. Abandonment[61]

[G23] Abandoned property is not within the reach of the Fourth Amendment. Evidentiary items found in a hotel room's wastepaper basket, after the occupant paid his bill and vacated the room, are abandoned articles.[62] If a suspect, while being pursued—but not seized—by the police, drops a container, he abandons it.[63] But "a citizen who attempts to protect his private property from inspection, after throwing it on a car to respond to a police officer's inquiry, clearly has not abandoned that property."[64]

b. Particular Types of Searches and Seizures

i. Particular Places, Effects, or Papers

[G24] Residential Dwellings. "The Fourth Amendment protects the individual's privacy in a variety of settings. In none is the zone of privacy more clearly defined than when bounded by the unambiguous physical dimensions of an individual's home."[65] Private residences are places in which the individual normally expects privacy free of governmental intrusion; that expectation is plainly one that society is prepared to recognize as justifiable.[66] A hotel room is not much different from a home.[67] A trailer home equally falls within the scope of the Fourth Amendment.[68]

---

57 Maryland v. Macon, 472 U.S. 463, 469 (1985).

58 See Soldal v. Cook County, Illinois, 506 U.S. 56, 62–64 (1992), rejecting the position that the seizure and removal of a trailer home is "pure deprivation of property," not cognizable under the Fourth Amendment.

59 See United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 49 (1993), citing One 1958 Plymouth Sedan v. Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693, 696 (1965) (the exclusionary rule applies to forfeiture of property not intrinsically illegal in character but involved in the commission of a criminal offense).

When the government seizes property not to preserve evidence of wrongdoing, but to assert ownership and control over the property itself, its action must comply with the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. See United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 52 (1993).

60 Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 596 (1989), citing Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 802–05 (1971) and Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 85–89 (1987).

61 See also para. G44 (garbage).

62 Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217, 241 (1960).

63 Nester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57, 58 (1924); California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 629 (1991).

64 Smith v. Ohio, 494 U.S. 541, 543–44 (1990).

65 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 589 (1980).

66 United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 714 (1984).

67 See Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293, 301 (1966), citing United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48 (1951).

68 Soldal v. Cook County, 506 U.S. 56, 61 (1992).

[G25] "The Fourth Amendment's protection of the home has never been tied to measurement of the quality or quantity of information obtained. . . . In the home, . . . all details are intimate, because the entire area is held safe from prying government eyes."[69]

[G26] Open Fields and Curtilage of a House. The "open fields" doctrine was first enunciated in Hester[70] and was reaffirmed in Oliver.[71] Under this doctrine, the government's intrusion upon the open fields is not one of those "unreasonable searches" proscribed by the text of the Fourth Amendment. The open fields are not "effects," within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. "The Framers would have understood the term 'effects' to be limited to personal, rather than real, property."[72]

[G27] "The term 'open fields' may include any unoccupied or undeveloped area outside of the curtilage. An open field need be neither 'open' nor a 'field' as those terms are used in common speech. For example, . . . a thickly wooded area nonetheless may be an open field, as that term is used in construing the Fourth Amendment."[73] And the erection of fences on an open field does not create a constitutionally protected privacy interest.[74] "[A]n individual may not legitimately demand privacy for activities conducted out of doors in fields, except in the area immediately surrounding the home. . . . There is no societal interest in protecting the privacy of those activities, such as the cultivation of crops, that occur in open fields. Moreover, as a practical matter, these lands usually are accessible to the public and the police in ways that a home, an office, or commercial structure would not be. It is not generally true that fences or 'No Trespassing' signs effectively bar the public from viewing open fields in rural areas. . . . [Besides,] the public and police lawfully may survey lands from the air. For these reasons, [a subjective] expectation of privacy in open fields is not an expectation that society recognizes as reasonable."[75]

[G28] Moreover, "in the case of open fields, the general rights of property protected by the common law of trespass have little or no relevance to the applicability of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The law of trespass recognizes the interest in possession and control of one's property, and for that reason permits exclusion of unwanted intruders. But it does not follow that the right to exclude conferred by trespass law embodies a privacy interest also protected by the Fourth Amendment. To the contrary, the common law of trespass furthers a range of interests that have nothing to do with privacy, and that would not be served by applying the strictures of trespass law to public officers. Criminal laws against trespass are prophylactic: they protect against intruders who poach, steal livestock and crops, or vandalize property. And the civil action of trespass serves the important function of authorizing an owner to defeat claims of prescription by asserting his own title. . . . For these reasons, the law of trespass confers protections from intrusion by others far broader than those required by Fourth Amendment interests."[76]

---

69 Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27. 37 (2001).

70 Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57, 59 (1924).

71 Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 176–77 (1984).

72 Id. at 177, n.7.

73 Id. at 180, n.11.

74 Id. at 182–83.

75 Id. at 178–79. Planting marihuana on secluded land and erecting fences and "No Trespassing" signs around the property, do not establish that expectations of privacy in an open field are legitimate in the sense required by the Fourth Amendment. Id. at 182–83.

76 Id. at 183–84, n.15.

[G29] Open fields are distinguished from the "curtilage" of a house, "the land immediately surrounding and associated with the home."[77] The curtilage is protected by the Fourth Amendment. "[T]he extent of the curtilage is determined by factors that bear upon whether an individual reasonably may expect that the area in question should be treated as part of the home. . . . [T]he central component of this inquiry [is] whether the area harbors 'the intimate activity associated with the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life.'"[78] "[C]urtilage questions should be resolved with particular reference to four factors: the proximity of the area claimed to be curtilage to the home, whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home, the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by."[79]

[G30] "Under Oliver and Hester, there is no constitutional difference between police observations conducted while in a public place and while standing in the open fields."[80] The Fourth Amendment protection "has never been extended to require law enforcement officers to shield their eyes when passing by a home on public thoroughfares."[81] The fact "that the objects observed by the officers lay within an area" that the Court has assumed is protected by the Fourth Amendment does not affect this conclusion.[82]

[G31] Business Premises—Offices. "The businessman, like the occupant of a residence, has a constitutional right to go about his business free from unreasonable official entries upon his private commercial property."[83] But a store operator does not have any reasonable expectation of privacy "in areas of the store where the public [is] invited to enter and to transact business. . . . [Thus, a police] officer's action in entering a bookstore and examining the wares that are intentionally exposed to all who frequent the place of business" does not constitute a search.[84] Likewise, an entry into the public lobby of a motel and restaurant for the purpose of serving an administrative subpoena is not forbidden by the Fourth Amendment.[85]

[G32] Within the workplace context, the Court has recognized that employees may have a reasonable expectation of privacy against governmental intrusions.[86] Thus, a

---

77 Id. at 180.

78 United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 300 (1987), discussing and quoting Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 180 (1984).

79 United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 301 (1987). The area of a barn is not within the curtilage of a ranch house, for Fourth Amendment purposes, if the barn (1) is located at a substantial distance from the fence surrounding the rancher's house (50 yards) and from the house itself (60 yards), (2) stands out as a distinct and separate portion of the ranch, (3) is not used as part of the rancher's home, and (4) may be observed by those standing outside of the ranch, since the ranch's fences, being of the type used to corral livestock, do not to ensure privacy. Id. at 301–03.

80 Id. at 304.

81 California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 213 (1986).

82 United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 304 (1987).

83 See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541, 543 (1967).

84 Maryland v. Macon, 472 U.S. 463, 469 (1985). Nevertheless, the fact that a retail store invites the public to enter does not mean that "it consents to wholesale searches and seizures that do not conform to Fourth Amendment guarantees." See Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 329 (1979) (emphasis added), citing Lewis v. United States, 385 U.S. 206, 211 (1966).

85 Donovan v. Lone Steer 464 U.S. 408, 413 (1984).

86 Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170, 178, n.8 (1984) ("The Fourth Amendment's pro-union employee who shares an office with other union employees has a privacy interest in his desk and filing cabinet in that office.[87] Public employees may also have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their place of work. "Individuals do not lose Fourth Amendment rights merely because they work for the government, instead of a private employer. The operational realities of the workplace, however, may make some employees' expectations of privacy unreasonable, when an intrusion is by a supervisor, rather than a law enforcement official. in certain situations. Public employees' expectations of privacy in their offices, desks, and file cabinets, like similar expectations of employees in the private sector, may be reduced by virtue of actual office practices and procedures, or by legitimate regulation. . . . Given the great variety of work environments in the public sector, the question whether an employee has a reasonable expectation of privacy must be addressed on a case-by-case basis."[88]

[G33] Fire-Damaged Premises. "[R[easonable privacy expectations may remain in fire-damaged premises."[89] "People may go on living in their homes or working in their offices after a fire. Even when that is impossible, private effects often remain on the fire-damaged premises."[90] "Privacy expectations will vary with the type of property, the amount of fire damage, the prior and continued use of the premises, and in some cases the owner's efforts to secure it against intruders. Some fires may be so devastating that no reasonable privacy interests remain in the ash and ruins, regardless of the owner's subjective expectations."[91] tection of offices and commercial buildings in which there may be legitimate expectations of privacy is based upon societal expectations that have deep roots in the history of the Amendment").

[G34] Prison Cells.[92] Society is not prepared to recognize as legitimate any subjective expectation of privacy that a prisoner might have in his prison cell. "A right of privacy in . . . Fourth Amendment terms is fundamentally incompatible with the close and continual surveillance of inmates and their cells required to ensure institutional security and internal order." Accordingly, the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches does not apply within the confines of the prison cell. It follows from this conclusion that prison officials may conduct irregular or random "shakedown" searches of cells, in the absence of the cell occupants, and are free to seize from cells any articles that, in their view, disserve legitimate institutional interests.[93]

---

87 Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 369 (1968).

88 O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 717–18 (1987) (plurality opinion); id. at 737–38 (dissenting opinion).

89 See Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 292 (1984) (plurality opinion), discussing Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 505 (1978).

90 Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 505 (1978). Fire victims retain the protection of the Fourth Amendment, even if they are suspected of arson, for it is "impossible to justify a warrantless search on the ground of abandonment by arson when that arson has not yet been proved, and a conviction cannot be used ex post facto to validate the introduction of evidence used to secure that same conviction." Id. at 505–06.

91 Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 292 (1984) (plurality opinion).

92 See also para. G137 (pre-trial detainees).

93 Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517, 527–28, n.8 (1984). The Eighth Amendment stands as a protection against "calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs." Id. at 530.

[G35] Automobiles. Automobiles are "effects" and thus within the reach of the Fourth Amendment. A search of an automobile is an invasion of privacy.[94] Nevertheless, the Court has traditionally drawn a distinction between automobiles and homes or offices in relation to the Fourth Amendment. The function of a motor vehicle is transportation, and "it seldom serves as one's residence or as the repository of personal effects."[95] "The expectation of privacy as to automobiles is further diminished by the obviously public nature of automobile travel."[96] Motor vehicles "trave[l] public thoroughfares where both its occupants and its contents are in plain view."[97] "All States require vehicles to be registered and operators to be licensed. States and localities have enacted extensive and detailed codes regulating the condition and manner in which motor vehicles may be operated on public streets and highways."[98] Therefore, "[o]ne has a lesser expectation of privacy in a motor vehicle."[99]

[G36] "The exterior of a car . . . is thrust into the public eye, and thus to examine it does not constitute a 'search.'"[100] The examination of the tire on the wheel and the taking of paint scrapings from the exterior of a vehicle left in a public parking lot infringe no expectation of privacy.[101] In addition, "it is unreasonable to have an expectation of privacy in an object required by law to be located in a place ordinarily in plain view from the exterior of the automobile," like the Vehicle Identification Number, which plays an important role in the pervasive governmental regulation of the automobile.[102] Moreover, like the dog sniff in Place,[103] a sniff by a narcotics-detection dog that simply walks around a car is not a "search,"[104] since "governmental conduct that only reveals the possession of contraband compromises no legitimate privacy interest."[105]

[G37] Mail. "Letters and sealed packages . . . in the mail are as fully guarded from examination and inspection, except as to their outward form and weight, as if they were retained by the parties forwarding them in their own domiciles. The constitutional guar-

---

94 United State v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 896 (1975).

95 Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 590 (1974) (plurality opinion).

96 S. Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364, 368 (1976).

97 Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 590 (1974) (plurality opinion).

98 See United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 12–13 (1977), quoting Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 441 (1973).

99 See United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 12 (1977), quoting Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 590 (1974) (plurality opinion).

100 New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106, 114 (1986).

101 Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 591 (1974) (plurality opinion)

102 New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106, 114 (1986).

103 See para. G42.

104 City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 40 (2000).

105 Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S. 405, 408 (2005). In that case, the Court held that "the use of a well-trained narcotics-detection dog—one that does not expose non-contraband items that otherwise would remain hidden from public view—during a lawful traffic stop, generally does not implicate legitimate privacy interests," after noting that "[a]lthough respondent argues that the error rates, particularly the existence of false positives, call into question the premise that drug-detection dogs alert only to contraband, the record contains no evidence or findings that support his argument. Moreover, respondent does not suggest that an erroneous alert, in and of itself, reveals any legitimate private information, and, in this case, the trial judge found that the dog sniff was sufficiently reliable to establish probable cause to conduct a full-blown search of the trunk." Id. at 409.

anty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be."[106] Hence, "first-class mail such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage—as distinguished from newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter—is free from inspection by postal authorities except in the manner provided by the Fourth Amendment."[107]

[G38] Bank Records. A depositor has no expectation of privacy and thus no protectable Fourth Amendment interest in copies of checks and deposit slips retained by his bank. "The checks are not confidential communications, but negotiable instruments to be used in commercial transactions. [The relevant records] contain only information voluntarily conveyed to the banks and exposed to their employees in the ordinary course of business."[108]

[G39] In California Bankers, the Court upheld federal regulations requiring the reporting of domestic financial transactions by financial institutions. The Court noted that organizations engaged in commerce do not possess "an unqualified right to conduct their affairs in secret" and may be required "to file reports dealing with particular phases of their activities," since the government has a legitimate right to satisfy itself that "corporate behavior is consistent with the law and the public interest."[109] Moreover, the information sought was "sufficiently described and limited in nature, and sufficiently related to a tenable congressional determination as to improper use" of large transactions in currency in inter-state commerce.[110] In light of these considerations, the Court rejected the Fourth Amendment challenge made by the bank plaintiffs.

[G40] Luggage—Containers. A person possesses a privacy interest in the contents of personal luggage that is protected by the Fourth Amendment. "By placing personal effects inside a double-locked footlocker, a person manifests an expectation that the contents would remain free from public examination. No less than one who locks the doors of his home against intruders, one who safeguards his personal possessions in this manner is due the protection" of the Fourth Amendment.[111]

[G41] "[T]ravelers are particularly concerned about their carry-on luggage; they generally use it to transport personal items that, for whatever reason, they prefer to keep close at hand. . . . When a bus passenger places a bag in an overhead bin, he expects that other passengers or bus employees may move it for one reason or another. Thus, a bus passenger clearly expects that his bag may be handled. He does not expect that other passengers or bus employees will, as a matter of course, feel the bag in an exploratory manner." Therefore, a law enforcement officer's physical manipulation of 106 Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727, 733 (1878) (letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage in the mail can be opened and examined only under like warrant, particularly describing the thing to be seized).

---

107 United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U.S. 249, 251 (1970).

108 United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 442 (1976). Cf. United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727, 732 (1980), involving a loan guarantee agreement in which respondent had pledged as security his funds in a foreign bank account.

109 California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 65 (1974), citing and quoting United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652 (1950).

110 California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 67 (1974).

111 United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 11 (1977).

a bus passenger's carry-on luggage comes within the scope of the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches.[112]

[G42] Subjecting luggage to a "sniff test" by a trained narcotics detection dog is not a "search" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. "A 'canine sniff' by a well-trained narcotics detection dog does not require opening the luggage. It does not expose noncontraband items that otherwise would remain hidden from public view, as does, for example, an officer's rummaging through the contents of the luggage. Thus, the manner in which information is obtained through this investigative technique is much less intrusive than a typical search. Moreover, the sniff discloses only the presence or absence of narcotics, a contraband item. Thus, despite the fact that the sniff tells the authorities something about the contents of the luggage, the information obtained is limited."[113]

[G43] "No protected privacy interest remains in contraband in a container once government officers lawfully have opened that container and identified its contents as illegal. The simple act of resealing the container to enable the police to make a controlled delivery does not operate to revive or restore the lawfully invaded privacy rights. . . . [T]he rigors and contingencies inescapable in an investigation into illicit drug traffic often make 'perfect' controlled deliveries impossible to attain. Conducting such a surveillance undetected is likely to render it virtually impossible for police so perfectly to time their movements as to avoid detection and also be able to arrest the owner and reseize the container the instant he takes possession. Not infrequently, police may lose sight of the container they are trailing, as is the risk in the pursuit of a car or vessel. During such a gap in surveillance, it is possible that the container will be put to other uses—for example, the contraband may be removed or other items may be placed inside. The likelihood that this will happen depends on all the facts and circumstances, including the nature and uses of the container, the length of the break in surveillance, and the setting in which the events occur. However, the mere fact that the police may be less than 100% certain of the contents of the container is insufficient to create a protected interest in the privacy of the container. . . . The issue then becomes at what point after an interruption of control or surveillance, courts should recognize the individual's expectation of privacy in the container as a legitimate right protected by the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches. . . . A workable, objective standard that limits the risk of intrusion on legitimate privacy interests is whether there is a substantial likelihood that the contents of the container have been changed during the gap in surveillance. Absent a substantial likelihood that the contents have been changed, there is no legitimate expectation of privacy in the contents of a container previously opened under lawful authority."[114]

[G44] Garbage. The search and seizure of garbage left for collection outside the curtilage of a home does not come within the scope of the Fourth Amendment. "It is common knowledge that plastic garbage bags left along a public street are readily accessible to animals, children, scavengers, snoops, and other members of the public. Moreover, [an individual places is refuse] at the curb for the express purpose of conveying it to a third party, the trash collector, who might himself [sort] through the garbage or permit others, such as the police, to do so. Accordingly, having deposited [his] garbage in an area particularly suited for public inspection, . . . for the express purpose of having

---

112 Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334, 337–39 (2000).

113 United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 707 (1983).

114 Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 771–73 (1983).

strangers take it," an individual can have no reasonable expectation of privacy in the inculpatory items that he discarded.[115]

ii. Particular Acts or Methods[116]

[G45] Frisk of Persons. "[A] careful exploration of the outer surfaces of a person's clothing," in an attempt to find weapons, is a "search" under the Fourth Amendment.[117] If an officer "lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object whose contour or mass makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons."[118]

[G46] Voice or Handwriting Exemplars. A compelled production of "physical characteristics" that are "constantly exposed to the public" is not to be examined under the Fourth Amendment.[119] Handwriting, like speech, is repeatedly shown to the public. No person can have a reasonable expectation that others will not know the sound of his voice or the characteristics of his script. Hence, no intrusion into an individual's privacy results from compelled execution of handwriting or voice exemplars.[120]

[G47] Fingerprints—Fingernail Samples. "Fingerprinting involves none of the probing into an individual's private life and thoughts that marks an interrogation or search." Nevertheless, detentions for the sole purpose of obtaining fingerprints are subject to the constraints of the Fourth Amendment.[121] Unlike the obtaining of fingerprints or voice and handwriting exemplars, the search of one's fingernails goes beyond mere "physical characteristics constantly exposed to the public" and constitutes "the type of severe, though brief, intrusion upon cherished personal security that is subject to constitutional scrutiny."[122]

[G48] Chemical Tests. "A chemical test that merely discloses whether or not a particular substance is cocaine does not compromise any legitimate interest in privacy. . . . [E]ven if the results are negative—merely disclosing that the substance is something other than cocaine—such a result reveals nothing of special interest. [Since] Congress has decided . . . to treat the interest in 'privately' possessing cocaine as illegitimate, . . . governmental conduct that can reveal whether a substance is cocaine, and no other arguably 'private' fact, compromises no legitimate privacy interest."[123]

[G49] Blood, Urine, or Breath Testing. "[A] compelled intrusion into the body for blood to be analyzed for alcohol content" constitutes a search. "[T]his physical intrusion, pen-

---

115 California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35, 40–41 (1988).

116 See also paras. G36, G42 (dog sniff).

117 Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 16 (1968).

118 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993). "[I]f the object is contraband, its warrantless seizure would be justified by the same practical considerations that inhere in the plain view context." Id. at 375–76.

119 United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 14 (1973).

120 Id. at 14; United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19, 21 (1973); United States v. Euge, 444 U.S. 707, 713, 718 (1980).

121 Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721, 727 (1969).

122 Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291, 295 (1973).

123 United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 123 (1984). However, such a test constitutes a "seizure," to the extent that it affects one's possessory interests protected by the Fourth Amendment, since, by destroying a quantity of the powder, it converts what has been only a temporary deprivation of possessory interests into a permanent one. Id. at 124–25.

etrating beneath the skin, infringes an expectation of privacy that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable. The ensuing chemical analysis of the sample to obtain physiological data is a further invasion of the tested person's privacy interests. . . . Much the same is true of breath-testing procedures. . . . Subjecting a person to a breathalyzer test, which generally requires the production of alveolar or 'deep lung' breath for chemical analysis, . . . implicates similar concerns about bodily integrity and, like the blood-alcohol test . . . should also be deemed a search. . . . [Procedures prescribed by governmental regulations] for collecting and testing urine samples do not entail a surgical intrusion into the body. It is not disputed, however, that chemical analysis of urine, like that of blood, can reveal a host of private medical facts about [a person,] including whether he or she is epileptic, pregnant, or diabetic. Nor can it be disputed that the process of collecting the sample to be tested, which may in some cases involve visual or aural monitoring of the act of urination, itself implicates privacy interests; [indeed,] there are few activities in our society more personal or private than the passing of urine." Therefore, the collection and subsequent analysis of blood, urine, or breath samples must be deemed Fourth Amendment searches.[124]

[G50] Visual Inspection. "[V]isual observation is no 'search' at all."[125] "[T]he mere fact that an individual has taken measures to restrict some views of his activities [does not] preclude an officer's observation from a public vantage point where he has a right to be and which renders the activities clearly visible."[126] That the objects observed by the officers lay within an area that is presumably protected by the Fourth Amendment does not affect this conclusion. The Fourth Amendment "has never been extended to require law enforcement officers to shield their eyes when passing by a home on public thoroughfares."[127] And "there is no constitutional difference between police observations conducted while in a public place and while standing in the open fields."[128]

[G51] A "cursory inspection—one that involves merely looking at what is already lawfully exposed to view, without disturbing it—is not a 'search' for Fourth Amendment purposes."[129] Hence, the mere recording of the serial numbers of stereo equipment does not constitute a search. But when a police officer, suspecting that the stereo components are stolen, moves some of them, in order to read and record their serial numbers, he "searches" for evidence plain and simple.[130]

[G52] Electronic Surveillance, Aerial Inspections, and Sense-Enhancing Devices. Until Katz, neither wiretapping nor electronic eavesdropping violated a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights, if there was no "seizure of his tangible material effects, or an actual physical invasion of his house or curtilage for the purpose of making a seizure."[131] But where eavesdropping was accomplished by means of an unauthorized physical penetration into the premises occupied by the defendant, the Fourth Amendment was con-

---

124 Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 616–17 (1989).

125 Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 32 (2001), citing Dow Chem. Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227, 234–35, 239 (1986).

126 California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 213 (1986).

127 Id.

128 United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 304 (1987).

129 Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 328 (1987).

130 Id. at 324–25.

131 Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 466 (1928); Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129, 135–36 (1942).

sidered to be violated.[132] Katz, however, finally swept away doctrines that electronic eavesdropping is permissible under the Fourth Amendment unless physical invasion of a constitutionally protected area produced the challenged evidence. In that case, government agents, without petitioner's consent or knowledge, attached a listening device to the outside of a public telephone booth and recorded the defendant's end of his telephone conversations. The Court overruled Olmstead and Goldman and held that the agents violated Katz's privacy, on which he justifiably relied while using the telephone in those circumstances.[133]

[G53] "[A] police agent who conceals his police connections may write down for official use his conversations with a defendant and testify concerning them without a warrant authorizing his encounters with the defendant and without otherwise violating the latter's Fourth Amendment rights."[134] "For constitutional purposes, no different result is required if the agent, instead of immediately reporting and transcribing his conversations with defendant, either simultaneously records them with electronic equipment which he is carrying on his person, . . . or carries radio equipment which simultaneously transmits the conversations either to recording equipment located elsewhere or to other agents monitoring the transmitting frequency."[135]

[G54] "[T]elephone subscribers . . . do not harbor any general expectation that the numbers they dial will remain secret. . . . Telephone users typically know that they must convey numerical information to the phone company; that the phone company has facilities for recording this information; and that the phone company does in fact record this information for a variety of legitimate business purposes." Thus, the state activity of installing and using a pen register is not a "search."[136]

[G55] The monitoring of an electronic device, such as a beeper, may constitute a search. In Knotts, law enforcement officials, with the consent of the seller, installed a beeper in a five-gallon can of chloroform and monitored the beeper after delivery of the can to the buyer in Minneapolis. Although there was partial visual surveillance as the automobile containing the can moved along the public highways, the beeper enabled the officers to locate the can in the area of a cabin near Shell Lake, Wisconsin, and it was this information that provided the basis for the issuance of a search warrant. The record did not show that the beeper was monitored while the can containing it was inside the cabin. The Court held that, since visual surveillance from public places would have sufficed to reveal the movements of the automobile and the arrival of the can containing the beeper in the area of the cabin, no Fourth Amendment violation was committed by monitoring the beeper during the trip to the cabin. "Nothing in the Fourth Amendment prohibited the police from augmenting their sensory faculties with such enhancement as science and technology afforded them in this case."[137]

---

[132] Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505, 509, 511 (1961). See also Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963); Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41, 52 (1967).

[133] Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 351–53 (1967). To the extent that Katz departed from previous decision of the Court, it was held to be applied prospectively only. See Desist v. United States, 394 U.S. 244 (1969).

[134] United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745, 751 (1971) (plurality opinion of four Justices), citing Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293, 300–03 (1966).

[135] United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745, 751 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[136] Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735, 743, 745–46 (1979).

[137] United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276, 282 (1983).

[G56] Installation of a beeper in a container of chemicals with the consent of the original owner does not constitute a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, when the container is delivered to a buyer having no knowledge of the presence of the beeper. "It is the exploitation of technological advances that implicates the Fourth Amendment, not their mere existence." The mere transfer of a can containing an unmonitored beeper infringes no privacy interest, for it conveys no information at all. But the monitoring of a beeper falls within the ambit of the Fourth Amendment when it reveals information that could not have been obtained through visual surveillance. The monitoring of an electronic tracking device in a private residence, a location not open to visual surveillance, constitutes a search. "The beeper tells the government agent that a particular article is actually located at a particular time in the private residence and is in the possession of the person or persons whose residence is being watched. Even if visual surveillance has revealed that the article to which the beeper is attached has entered the house, the later monitoring not only verifies the officers' observations but also establishes that the article remains on the premises."[138]

[G57] "[O]btaining by sense-enhancing technology any information regarding the interior of the home that could not otherwise have been obtained without physical intrusion into [it], constitutes a search—at least where . . . the technology in question is not in general public use."[139] In the sanctity of the home, "all details are intimate details."[140] Therefore, the use of a thermal imaging device aimed at a private home from a public street, to determine if the amount of heat emanating from it is consistent with the high-intensity lamps, typically required for indoor marijuana growth, constitutes a Fourth Amendment search.[141]

[G58] In Ciraolo, the Court held that a naked-eye police inspection of a fenced backyard from a plane flying at an altitude of 1,000 feet, within public navigable space, did not violate a reasonable expectation of privacy. As a general proposition, the police may see what may be observed from a public vantage point where they have a right to be. Thus, the police, like the public, would have been free to inspect the backyard garden from the street if their view had been unobstructed. They were likewise free to inspect the yard from the vantage point of an aircraft flying in the navigable airspace. The Court concluded that, "[I]n an age where private and commercial flight in the public airways is routine, it would be unreasonable for respondent to expect that his marijuana plants were constitutionally protected from being observed with the naked eye from an altitude of 1,000 feet."[142] Similarly, in Riley, the Court decided that police observation of a greenhouse in a home's curtilage from a helicopter lawfully passing at an altitude of 400 feet did not violate the Fourth Amendment.[143]

[G59] Dow Chemical involved enhanced aerial photography of an industrial complex, from navigable airspace. The Court stressed that "the open areas of an industrial plant

---

138 United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 712, 715 (1984).

139 Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 34 (2001).

140 Id. at 37.

141 Id. at 34–40. The four dissenters observed, inter alia, that heat waves enter the public domain if and when they leave a building and, hence, a subjective expectation that they would remain private is not reasonable.

142 California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 215 (1986). The fact that the officers were trained to recognize marijuana was considered to be irrelevant for Fourth Amendment purposes.

143 Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445, 449–55 (1989).

complex with numerous plant structures spread over an area of 2,000 acres are not analogous to the 'curtilage' of a dwelling for purposes of aerial surveillance." And although "surveillance of private property by using highly sophisticated surveillance equipment not generally available to the public, such as satellite technology," might be a "search" and constitutionally proscribed absent a warrant, the photographs there were not "so revealing of intimate details as to raise constitutional concerns," since they remained limited to an outline of the facility's buildings and equipment. "The mere fact that human vision is enhanced somewhat, at least to the degree [in that case], does not give rise to constitutional problems."[144] For example, the use of artificial means to illuminate a darkened area does not constitute a search.[145]

[G60] Governmental Search Subsequent to a Private Search. An invasion of one's "effects" that is occasioned by private action, without any governmental involvement, does not violate the Fourth Amendment, because of its private character. The additional invasions of one's privacy by government agents "must be tested by the degree to which they exceeded the scope of the private search." That standard was adopted by a majority of the Court in Walter and was reaffirmed in Jacobsen.[146]

[G61] In Walter,[147] a private party had opened a misdirected carton, found rolls of motion picture films that appeared to be contraband, and turned the carton over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Later, without obtaining a warrant, FBI agents obtained a projector and viewed the films. While there was no single opinion of the Court, a majority did agree on the appropriate analysis of a governmental search that follows on the heels of a private one.[148] Two Justices noted that, "[e]ven though some circumstances—for example, if the results of the private search are in plain view when materials are turned over to the Government—may justify the Government's reexamination of the materials, surely the Government may not exceed the scope of the private search, unless it has the right to make an independent search." In that case, the private party had not actually viewed the films. Prior to the government screening, one could only draw inferences about what was on the films. The projection of the films was a significant expansion of the search that had been conducted previously by a private party and therefore should be characterized as a separate search, which was not supported by any exigency or by a warrant.[149] "Four additional Justices were also of the view that the legality of the governmental search must be tested by the scope of the antecedent private search."[150] Taking into account the fact that the FBI had received the film cartons after they had been opened, and after the films' labels had been exposed to the public, they concluded that the FBI's subsequent viewing of the movies on a projector did not change the nature of the search and was not an additional search subject to the warrant requirement.[151]

[G62] In Jacobsen, the Court explained that the foregoing standard follows from the analysis applicable when private parties reveal other kinds of private information to the

---

144 Dow Chem. Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227, 238–39 (1986).

145 Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730, 739–40 (1983). The use of a searchlight is comparable to the use of a marine glass or a field glass. See United States v. Lee, 274 U.S. 559, 563 (1927).

146 See United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 115 (1984).

147 Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980).

148 See United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 115 (1984), discussing Walter.

149 Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649, 657 (1980).

150 See United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 116 (1984), discussing Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649, 663–64 (1980).

151 Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649, 663–64 (1980).

authorities. The Court has held repeatedly that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the obtaining of information revealed to a third party and conveyed by him to government authorities, even if the information is revealed on the assumption that it will be used only for a limited purpose, and the confidence placed in a third party will not be betrayed.[152] "The Fourth Amendment is implicated only if the authorities use information with respect to which the expectation of privacy has not already been frustrated."[153] In the specific case, the employees of a private freight carrier had notified the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), after observing a white powdery substance in the innermost of a series of four plastic bags that had been concealed in a tube inside a damaged package. When a DEA agent arrived, he removed the tube from the box and the plastic bags from the tube, saw the white powder, opened the bags, removed a trace of the powder, subjected it to a field chemical test, and determined it was cocaine. The DEA agent's removal of the plastic bags from the tube and his visual inspection of their contents enabled him to learn nothing that had not previously been learned during the private search. It infringed no legitimate expectation of privacy and, hence, was not a "search" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. By contrast, the agent's field test exceeded the scope of the private search.[154]

3. Who May Invoke the Fourth Amendment Safeguards

[G63] Fourth Amendment rights are personal in nature.[155] In order to claim the protection of the Fourth Amendment, a defendant "must demonstrate that he personally has an expectation of privacy in the place or item searched, and that his expectation is reasonable—i.e., one which has 'a source outside of the Fourth Amendment, either by reference to concepts of real or personal property law or to understandings that are recognized and permitted by society.'"[156] The Court has rejected a so-called "target" the-

---

[152] See United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 443 (1976).

[153] United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 117 (1984).

[154] Id. at 115–21.

[155] The "definition of those rights is more properly placed within the purview of substantive Fourth Amendment law than within that of standing." See Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83, 87–88 (1998), quoting Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 140 (1978) (emphasis added).

[156] Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83, 88 (1998), quoting Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 143–44, n.12 (1978).

This rule applies equally to defendants charged with crimes of possession. See United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 86–95 (1980), overruling Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 262-63 (1960). The Jones Court held that the defendant was not obligated to establish that his own Fourth Amendment rights had been violated, but only that the search and seizure of the evidence was unconstitutional. In order to prevent both the risk that self-incrimination would attach to the assertion of Fourth Amendment rights, as well as to prevent the vice of prosecutorial self-contradiction (asserting that the defendant possessed the goods for purposes of criminal liability, while simultaneously asserting that he did not possess them for the purposes of claiming the protections of the Fourth Amendment), the Court adopted the rule of "automatic standing." This rule was disavowed in Salvucci. The first reason was eliminated by Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 389-94 (1968), wherein it was held that testimony given by a defendant in support of a motion to suppress cannot be admitted as evidence of his guilt at trial. As to the second reason given in Jones, the Court noted that a prosecutor, without legal contradiction, may simultaneously maintain that a defendant criminally possessed the seized goods but was not subject to a Fourth Amendment deprivation, because it must be asked not merely whether the defendant has a possessory interest in the items seized, but also whether he had an expectation of privacy in the area searched.

ory, whereby any criminal defendant at whom a search was "directed" would have the right to contest the legality of that search and object to the admission at trial of evidence obtained as a result of the search. And the position that anyone legitimately on the premises where a search occurs may challenge its legality has been expressly repudiated.[157] Accordingly, automobile passengers cannot assert the protection of the Fourth Amendment against the seizure of incriminating evidence from a vehicle where they own neither the vehicle nor the evidence.[158]

[G64] A person may not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of a container in the possession of another, even if he owns them. In Rawlings, the Court approved the admission of drugs seized from a woman's purse because her male companion did not prove that he had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the purse, even though he claimed ownership of the drugs. The Court emphasized that petitioner had known the woman for only a few days, had never sought or received access to her purse, nor had he had any right to exclude other persons from access to this purse.[159]

[G65] "The homeowner may object to police conduct that reveals what has gone on in his home, irrespective of whether he has any expectation of privacy in the effects that have been searched and seized."[160] "If the police make an unwarranted search of a house and seize tangible property belonging to third parties—even a transcript of a third-party conversation—the homeowner may object to its use against him, not because he had any interest in the seized items as 'effects' protected by the Fourth Amendment, but because they were the fruits of an unauthorized search of his house, which is itself expressly protected by the Fourth Amendment."[161]

[G66] Although the text of the Amendment suggests that its protections extend only to people in their houses, the Court has held that, in some circumstances, a person may have a legitimate expectation of privacy in the house of someone else. For example, staying overnight in another's home is a longstanding social custom that serves functions recognized as valuable by society. Thus, an overnight guest in a home may claim the protection of the Fourth Amendment.[162] But one who is merely present with the consent of the householder may not. A person staying in another's home for a couple of hours, in order to carry out an illegal business (drug) transaction, without having any previous relationship with the apartment's lessee, is found in a situation similar to that of one simply permitted on the premises and has no legitimate expectation of privacy in the apartment.[163]

---

157 See Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 133–38, 141–44 (1978).

158 Id. at 148–49. "Participants in a criminal conspiracy may have privacy expectations or property interests, but the conspiracy itself neither adds nor detracts from them." See United States v. Padilla, 508 U.S. 77, 82 (1993) (per curiam).

159 Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 104–106 (1980).

160 Karo, United States v., 468 U.S. 705, 732, n.7 (1984) (opinion of Stevens, J.)

161 Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 176–77 (1969).

162 Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 98 (1990). See also Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 259 (1960), where the defendant, seeking to exclude evidence resulting from a search of an apartment, had been given the use of the apartment by a friend, had clothing in it, had slept there "maybe a night," and at the time was the sole occupant of the place.

163 Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83, 90–91 (1998).

C. LEGALITY OF SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

1. General Requirements

a. Warrant

i. In General

[G67] Except in certain well-defined circumstances, a search or seizure in a criminal case is not reasonable unless it is accomplished pursuant to a judicial warrant issued upon probable cause. Administrative searches also generally require warrants.[164] The "essential purpose of the warrant requirement is to protect privacy interests by assuring citizens subject to a search or seizure that such intrusions are not the random or arbitrary acts of government agents. A warrant assures the citizen that the intrusion is authorized by law, and that it is narrowly limited in its objectives and scope. . . . A warrant also provides the detached scrutiny of a neutral magistrate, and thus ensures an objective determination whether an intrusion is justified in any given case."[165]

[G68] The Court has made it clear that there are exceptions to the warrant requirement. "When faced with special law enforcement needs, diminished expectations of privacy, minimal intrusions, or the like, the Court has found that certain general, or individual, circumstances may render a warrantless search or seizure reasonable."[166]

ii. Particularity

[G69] The Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment categorically prohibits the issuance of any warrant except one "particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."[167] The manifest purpose of this particularity requirement was to prevent general searches and seizures. "By limiting the authorization to search to the specific areas and things for which there is probable cause to search, the requirement ensures that the search will be carefully tailored to its justifications, and will not take on the character of the wide-ranging exploratory searches the Framers

---

164 See, e.g., Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 506 (1978).

165 Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 619, 621–22 (1989). "[T]he presumptive rule against warrantless searches applies with equal force to searches whose only defect is a lack of particularity in the warrant." See Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 559 (2004).

166 Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 330 (2001). See, e.g., Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. 938, 940–41 (1996) (per curiam) (search of automobile supported by probable cause); Michigan Dep't of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444, 455 (1990) (suspicionless stops at drunk driver checkpoint); United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 706 (1983) (temporary seizure of luggage based on reasonable suspicion); Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 702–05 (1981) (temporary detention of suspect without arrest warrant to prevent flight and protect officers while executing search warrant); Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 27 (1968) (temporary stop and limited search for weapons based on reasonable suspicion); United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42–43 (1976) (hot pursuit of a fleeing felon); Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 762 (1969) (protective search incident to arrest); Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509 (1978) (ongoing fire).

167 When an administrative agency subpoenas corporate books or records, the Fourth Amendment requires that the subpoena be "sufficiently limited in scope, relevant in purpose, and specific in directive so that compliance will not be unreasonably burdensome." See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541, 544 (1967). See also United States v. Moron Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652–53 (1950).

intended to prohibit."[168] A particular warrant also "assures the individual whose property is searched or seized of the lawful authority of the executing officer, his need to search, and the limits of his power to search."[169] The Court requires that a warrant contain "a description sufficient to enable the officers who execute it to ascertain with reasonable effort where they are to search and what they are to seize."[170]

[G70] "The Fourth Amendment by its terms requires particularity in the warrant, not in the supporting documents."[171] If the warrant provides no description of the type of evidence sought, the fact that the application adequately described the "things to be seized" does not save the warrant from its facial invalidity, at least when the application (which has been placed under seal) does not accompany the warrant. And for good reason—the presence of a search warrant serves a high function, and "that high function is not necessarily vindicated when some other document, somewhere, says something about the objects of the search, but the contents of that document are neither known to the person whose home is being searched nor available for his inspection."[172]

[G71] Stanford invalidated a search aimed at obtaining evidence that an individual had violated a sweeping and many-faceted law that, among other things, outlawed the Communist Party and created various individual criminal offenses. The search warrant authorized a search of Stanford's private home for books, records, and other materials concerning illegal Communist activities. After spending more than four hours in Stanford's house, police officers seized half of his books, which included works by Sartre, Marx, Pope John XXIII, Justice Hugo Black, Theodore Draper, and Earl Browder, as well as private documents, including a marriage certificate, insurance policies, household bills and receipts, and personal correspondence. The Court held this to be an unconstitutional general search.[173]

[G72] In Andresen, the Court held that the warrants at issue had not been rendered fatally "general" by the addition, in each warrant, to the exhaustive list of particularly described documents pertaining to the fraudulent sale of certain realty (Lot 13T), of the phrase "together with other fruits, instrumentalities and evidence of crime at this time unknown." In doing so, the Court read the challenged phrase as authorizing only the search for and seizure of evidence relating to "the crime of false pretenses with respect to Lot 13T."[174]

---

168 Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 84 (1987). The discovery of facts demonstrating that a valid warrant was unnecessarily broad does not retroactively invalidate the warrant. Id. at 85.

169 United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 9 (1977).

170 See Steele v. United States, 267 U.S. 498, 503 (1925). Cf. Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192, 196 (1927) ("As to what is to be taken, nothing is to be left to the discretion of the officer executing the warrant."). As a constitutional matter, search warrants need not name the person from whom the things will be seized. See Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 555 (1978), citing United States v. Kahn, 415 U.S. 143, 155 n.15 (1974).

171 Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 557 (2004).

172 Id. The Court did not say that the Fourth Amendment forbids a warrant from cross-referencing other documents. Indeed, as the Court noted, most courts of appeals have held that a court may construe a warrant with reference to a supporting application or affidavit, if the warrant uses appropriate words of incorporation, and if the supporting document accompanies the warrant. Id. at 557–58.

173 Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476, 480–86 (1965).

174 Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463, 480 (1976).

[G73] The Fourth Amendment does not "countenance open-ended warrants to be completed while a search is being conducted and items seized or after the seizure has been carried out." Except for the specification of copies of two films previously purchased, the warrant at issue in Lo-Ji Sales left it entirely to the discretion of the officials conducting the search to decide what items were likely obscene and to accomplish their seizure. The search began when the local justice entered the premises. The search progressed pursuant to the sweeping open-ended authorization in the warrant. It was not limited at the outset as a search for other copies of the two "sample" films; it expanded into a more extensive search because other items were found that the local justice deemed illegal. The Court found that the search warrant and what had followed the entry on petitioner's premises were repugnant to the Fourth Amendment.[175]

[G74] "If there is sufficient evidence of a citizen's participation in a felony to persuade a judicial officer that his arrest is justified, it is constitutionally reasonable to require him to open his doors to the officers of the law. Thus, for Fourth Amendment purposes, an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within."[176]

[G75] "A lawful search of fixed premises generally extends to the entire area in which the object of the search may be found, and is not limited by the possibility that separate acts of entry or opening may be required to complete the search. Thus, a warrant that authorizes an officer to search a home for illegal weapons also provides authority to open closets, chests, drawers, and containers in which the weapon might be found. A warrant to open a footlocker to search for marihuana would also authorize the opening of packages found inside."[177]

[G76] By contrast, "a warrant to search a place cannot normally be construed to authorize a search of each individual in that place." A warrant authorizing the search of a tavern and the person of the bartender for "evidence of the offense of possession of a controlled substance" gives the police no authority whatever to invade the constitutional protections possessed individually by the tavern's customers.[178]

iii. Issuing Officials

[G77] Criminal warrants must be issued by "neutral, disinterested magistrates."[179] In Coolidge, the Court voided a search warrant issued by a state Attorney General, serving as justice of peace, since the Attorney General was "the chief government enforcement agent of the State, [and] actively in charge of the investigation."[180] In Shadwick, the issue centered on the qualification of municipal court clerks to issue arrest warrants for breaches of ordinances. "The Court held that the clerks, although laymen, worked within the judicial branch under the supervision of judges, and were qualified to deter-

---

175 Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 325–26 (1979).

176 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 602–03 (1980).

177 United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 820–21 (1982).

178 Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 92, n.4 (1979). There, the Court noted that it "need not consider situations where the warrant authorizes the search of unnamed persons in a place and is supported by probable cause to believe that persons who will be in the place at the time of the search will be in possession of illegal drugs."

179 Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 255 (1979).

180 Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 450 (1971).

mine the existence of probable cause. They were, therefore, 'neutral and detached magistrates' for purposes of the Fourth Amendment."[181] In Connally, the Court invalidated a system in which justices of the peace were paid for issuance, but not for non-issuance, of search warrants; an officer of the court who has a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in his decision to issue or deny the warrant cannot be deemed neutral.[182] Finally, in Lo-Ji Sales, the Court found that a magistrate who participates in a search, based on an invalid, general warrant issued by himself, acts as "an adjunct law enforcement officer" and, therefore, does not manifest that neutrality and detachment demanded of a judicial officer when presented with a warrant application and cannot provide valid authorization for the otherwise unconstitutional search.[183]

[G78] Administrative search warrants may, but do not necessarily, have to be issued by courts.[184] The Court has suggested that they must be issued by "neutral officers."[185]

b. Probable Cause—Reasonable Suspicion

i. Generally

[G79] The Fourth Amendment prescribes that "where the matter is of such a nature as to require a judicial warrant, it is also of such a nature as to require probable cause."[186] But even a search or a seizure that may be performed without a warrant must be based, as a general matter, on "probable cause;" thus, the scope of a lawful search "is defined by the object of the search and the places in which there is probable cause to believe that it may be found."[187] However, "'probable cause' is not an irreducible requirement of a valid search or seizure. The fundamental command of the Fourth Amendment is that searches and seizures be reasonable, and although both the concept of probable cause and the requirement of a warrant bear on the reasonableness of a search, . . . in certain limited circumstances neither is required."[188] Thus, in a number of cases, where "special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement, make the probable cause requirement impracticable,"[189] the Court has upheld "the legality of searches and seizures based on suspicions that, although 'reasonable,' do not rise to the level of probable cause. . . . Where a careful balancing of governmental and private interests suggests that the public interest is best served by a Fourth Amendment standard of reasonableness that stops short of probable cause, [the Court has] not hesitated to adopt such a standard."[190] Nonetheless, the Court has made clear that "[a] search or seizure

---

[181] See Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245, 250 (1977) (per curiam), discussing Shadwick v. City of Tampa, 407 U.S. 345, 346 (1972).

[182] Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245, 250–51 (1977) (per curiam).

[183] Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 326–27 (1979).

[184] Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 877 (1987).

[185] Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 323 (1978).

[186] Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 877 (1987).

[187] United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 824 (1982).

[188] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 340 (1985).

[189] O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 725 (1987).

[190] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 341 (1985). The first, and leading, case of a minimally intrusive search held valid when based on suspicion short of probable cause is Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 30 (1968), where the Court held that a police officer who observes unusual conduct suggesting criminal activity by persons he reasonably suspects are armed and presently is ordinarily unreasonable in the absence of individualized suspicion of wrongdoing."[191] While such suspicion is not an irreducible component of reasonableness,[192] the Court has recognized only limited circumstances in which the usual rule does not apply;[193] "where the privacy interests implicated by the search [or seizure] are minimal, and where an important governmental interest [—other than crime detection—] furthered by the intrusion would be placed in jeopardy by a requirement of individualized suspicion, a search or seizure may be reasonable despite the absence of such suspicion."[194]

[G80] Articulating precisely what "reasonable suspicion" and "probable cause" mean is not possible. "They are common sense, nontechnical conceptions that deal with 'the dangerous may conduct a carefully limited search of the outer clothing of such persons. See also United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985) (upholding brief stop of person described on wanted flyer while police ascertain if arrest warrant has been issued); Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979) (invalidating discretionary stops of motorists to check licenses and registrations when not based on reasonable suspicion that the motorist is unlicensed, the automobile is unregistered, or that the vehicle or an occupant should otherwise be detained); Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977) (upholding limited search where officers who had lawfully stopped car saw a large bulge under the driver's jacket); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975) (upholding brief stops by roving border patrols where officers reasonably believe car may contain illegal aliens); Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972) (upholding brief stop to interrogate suspicious individual believed to be carrying narcotics and gun).

---

[191] Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305, 308 (1997).

[192] United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 561 (1976).

[193] For example, the Court has upheld certain regimes of suspicionless searches where the program was designed to serve "special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement." See, e.g., Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995) (random drug testing of student athletes); National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989) (drug tests for U.S. Customs Service employees seeking transfer or promotion to certain positions); Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602 (1989) (drug and alcohol tests for railway employees involved in train accidents or found to be in violation of particular safety regulations). The Court has also allowed searches for certain administrative purposes without particularized suspicion of misconduct, provided that those searches are appropriately limited. See, e.g., New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 702–04 (1987) (warrantless administrative inspection of premises of "closely regulated" business); Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 507–09, 511–12 (1978) (administrative inspection of fire-damaged premises to determine cause of blaze); Camara v. Mun. Court of City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523, 534–39 (1967) (administrative inspection to ensure compliance with city housing code). The Court has also upheld brief, suspicionless seizures of motorists at a fixed Border Patrol checkpoint designed to intercept illegal aliens and at a sobriety checkpoint aimed at removing drunk drivers from the road. See United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 561 (1976); Michigan Dep't of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444, 451–55 (1990).

[194] Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305, 314 (1997), quoting Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 624 (1989). In Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 273–74 (2000), the Court was careful to point out that its opinion did not suggest that public safety officials in quarters where the reasonable expectation of Fourth Amendment privacy is diminished, such as airports and schools, cannot conduct protective searches on less than individualized suspicion or that there are not circumstances under which the danger alleged in an anonymous tip, lacking indicia of reliability, might be so great as to justify a search even without a showing of reasonable suspicion. Likewise, in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 47–48 (2000), the Court noted that its opinion did not affect the validity of searches at places like airports and government buildings, where the need for such measures to ensure public safety can be particularly acute.

factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act.'"[195] As such, the standards "are not readily, or even usefully, reduced to a neat set of legal rules,"[196] and they are "incapable of precise definition or quantification into percentages."[197] The Court has described reasonable suspicion simply as "a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the person stopped of criminal activity."[198] Reasonable suspicion is a less demanding standard than probable cause and requires a showing considerably less than preponderance of the evidence.[199] "The substance of all the definitions of probable cause to arrest is a reasonable ground for belief of guilt."[200] And this means less than evidence that would justify conviction but "more than bare suspicion."[201] Probable cause to arrest exists where > the facts and circumstances within the officers' knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information are sufficient in themselves to warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense has been or is being committed.[202]

Probable cause to search has been described as existing where > the known facts and circumstances are sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable prudence in the belief that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found;[203] [it means] a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place.[204]

"[T]hese two legal principles are not 'finely-tuned standards,' comparable to the standards of proof beyond a reasonable doubt or of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. . . . They are instead fluid concepts that take their substantive content from the particular contexts in which the standards are being assessed."[205]

[G81] "The principal components of a determination of reasonable suspicion or probable cause will be the events which occurred leading up to the stop or search, and then the decision whether these historical facts, viewed from the standpoint of an objectively reasonable police officer,[206] amount to reasonable suspicion or to probable cause. The first part of the analysis involves only a determination of historical facts, but the second

---

195 See Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690 (1996), quoting Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 231 (1983), quoting in turn Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 176 (1949).

196 Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 232 (1983).

197 See Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 371 (2003).

198 United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 417–18 (1981).

199 United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 7 (1989).

200 Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 175 (1949).

201 Id.

202 Id. at 175–76.

203 Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 696 (1996).

204 Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238 (1983).

205 Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 696 (1996).

206 An officer's improper subjective motivations play no role in ordinary, probable cause Fourth Amendment analysis. See Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 813 (1996) and Arkansas v. Sullivan, 532 U.S. 769, 771–72 (2001). The standards applicable to the factual basis supporting the officer's probable cause assessment at the time of the challenged arrest and search are at least as stringent as the standards applied with respect to the magistrate's assessment. See Whiteley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560, 566 (1971).

is a mixed question of law and fact."[207] The assessment of probable cause or reasonable suspicion "must be based upon all of the circumstances. The analysis proceeds with various objective observations, information from police reports, if such are available, and consideration of the modes or patterns of operation of certain kinds of lawbreakers. From these data, a trained officer draws inferences and makes deductions—inferences and deductions that might well elude an untrained person. The process does not deal with hard certainties, but with probabilities."[208] "While an effort to fix some general, numerically precise degree of certainty corresponding to 'probable cause' may not be helpful, it is clear that 'only the probability, and not a prima facie showing, of criminal activity, is the standard of probable cause.'"[209]

[G82] "Reasonable minds frequently may differ on the question whether a particular affidavit establishes probable cause."[210] "[A]fter-the-fact scrutiny by courts of the sufficiency of an affidavit should not take the form of de novo review. A magistrate's 'determination of probable cause should be paid great deference by reviewing courts.'"[211] "Deference to the issuing magistrate, however, is not boundless. It is clear, first, that the deference accorded to a magistrate's finding of probable cause does not preclude inquiry into the knowing or reckless falsity of the affidavit on which that determination was based."[212] Moreover, "reviewing courts will not defer to a warrant based on an affidavit that does not 'provide the magistrate with a substantial basis for determining the existence of probable cause.'"[213] "Sufficient information must be presented to the magistrate to allow that official to determine probable cause; his action cannot be a mere ratification of the bare conclusions of others."[214] "Even if the warrant application was supported by more than a 'bare bones' affidavit, a reviewing court may properly conclude that, notwithstanding the deference that magistrates deserve, the warrant was invalid because the magistrate's probable cause determination reflected an improper analysis of the totality of the circumstances, . . . or because the form of the warrant was improper in some respect."[215]

[G83] "[P]olice officers called upon to aid other officers in executing arrest warrants are entitled to assume that the officers requesting aid offered the magistrate the infor-

---

[207] Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 696 (1996).

[208] United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 418 (1981).

[209] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 235 (1983), quoting Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 419 (1969). See also Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 804 (1971) ("sufficient probability, not certainty, is the touchstone of reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment").

[210] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 914 (1984).

[211] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 236 (1983), quoting Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 419 (1969).

[212] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 914 (1984), citing Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 165 (1978).

[213] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 914 (1984), quoting Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 239 (1983). As a general matter, determinations of reasonable suspicion and probable cause should be reviewed de novo on appeal. Nevertheless, an appeals court should take care both to review findings of historical fact only for clear error and to give due weight to inferences drawn from those facts by resident judges and local law enforcement officers. See Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 699 (1996).

[214] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 239 (1983). See also Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480, 486 (1958).

[215] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 915 (1984).

mation requisite to support an independent judicial assessment of probable cause. Where, however, the contrary turns out to be true, an otherwise illegal arrest cannot be insulated from challenge by the decision of the instigating officer to rely on fellow officers to make the arrest."[216]

[G84] "[A] person's mere propinquity to others independently suspected of criminal activity does not, without more, give rise to probable cause to search that person. . . . Where the standard is probable cause, a search or seizure of a person must be supported by probable cause particularized with respect to that person. This requirement cannot be undercut or avoided by simply pointing to the fact that coincidentally there exists probable cause to search or seize another or to search the premises where the person may happen to be."[217] Hence, a search warrant, issued upon probable cause, which gives the officers authority to search a tavern and the person of the bartender for drugs, gives them no authority whatever to invade the constitutional protections possessed individually by the tavern's customers.[218] By contrast, a car passenger "will often be engaged in a common enterprise with the driver, and have the same interest in concealing the fruits or the evidence of their wrongdoing." Thus, when the quantity of drugs and cash found in a car being driven by its owner indicates the likelihood of drug dealing, there is probable cause to arrest the front seat passenger in the car.[219]

[G85] There must be "at least a minimal level of objective justification" [for having a 'reasonable suspicion.'] . . . An individual's presence in a 'high crime area,' standing alone, is not enough to support a reasonable, particularized suspicion that the person is committing a crime. . . . But officers are not required to ignore the relevant characteristics of a location in determining whether the circumstances are sufficiently suspicious to warrant further investigation. . . . [N]ervous, evasive behavior is another pertinent factor in determining reasonable suspicion. . . . Headlong flight is the consummate act of evasion: it is not necessarily indicative of wrongdoing, but it is certainly suggestive of such. . . . [A]ny refusal to cooperate, without more, does not furnish the minimal level of objective justification needed for a detention or seizure, based on reasonable suspicion. . . . But unprovoked flight is simply not a mere refusal to cooperate. Flight, by its very nature, is not 'going about one's business;' in fact, it is just the opposite. Allowing officers confronted with such flight to stop the fugitive and investigate further is quite consistent with the individual's right to go about his business or to stay put and remain silent in the face of police questioning."[220]

[G86] Unlawfully seized evidence may not be the basis for probable cause. "It is axiomatic that a search incident to an arrest made without probable cause may not serve as part of its justification."[221]

[G87] The showing of "probable cause" necessary to secure a search warrant for administrative purposes "may vary with the object and intrusiveness of the search,"[222]

---

216 Whiteley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560, 568 (1971).

217 Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 91 (1979).

218 Id. at 92.

219 Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 373 (2003).

220 Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119, 123–25 (2000).

221 Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 63 (1968), citing Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 16–17 (1948).

222 Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 506 (1978).

because, in that context, the term is used "as referring not to a quantum of evidence, but merely to a requirement of reasonableness."[223] For example, in administrative searches conducted to enforce local building, health, or fire codes, probable cause to issue a warrant to inspect exists if "reasonable legislative or administrative standards for conducting an . . . inspection are satisfied with respect to a particular dwelling [or establishment]. Such standards, which will vary with the program being enforced, may be based upon the passage of time, the nature of the building, . . . or the condition of the entire area, but they will not necessarily depend upon specific knowledge of the condition of the particular dwelling."[224]

ii. Informant's Tip

[G88] The Court has repeatedly faced the question whether an informant's tip establishes probable cause for the issuance of a warrant. In Aguilar, a search warrant had issued upon an affidavit of police officers who swore only that they had "received reliable information from a credible person and do believe" that narcotics were being illegally stored on the described premises. While recognizing that the constitutional requirement of probable cause can be satisfied by hearsay information, the Court held the affidavit inadequate for two reasons. First, the application failed to set forth any of the "underlying circumstances" necessary to enable the magistrate independently to judge the validity of the informant's conclusion that the narcotics were where he said they were. Second, the affiant officers did not attempt to support their claim that their informant was credible or his information reliable.[225] In Spinelli, police officers observed petitioner going to and from a particular apartment, which the telephone company said contained two telephones with stated numbers. The officers also were "informed by a confidential reliable informant that Spinelli was engaging in illegal gambling activities" at the apartment, and that he used two phones with numbers corresponding to those possessed by the police. The officers submitted an affidavit with this information to a magistrate and obtained a warrant to search Spinelli's apartment. The Court held that the magistrate could have made his determination of probable cause only by abdicating his constitutional function. The government's affidavit contained absolutely no information regarding the informant's reliability. In addition, the tip failed to satisfy Aguilar's requirement that it detail some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that narcotics were where he claimed they were.[226]

[G89] An informant's "veracity," "reliability," and "basis of knowledge" are also relevant in the reasonable suspicion context, "although allowance must be made in applying them for the lesser showing required to meet that standard."[227] For example, in Adams the Court sustained an investigatory stop and frisk undertaken on the basis of a tip given in person by a known informant who had provided information in the past. The Court concluded that, while the unverified tip might have been insufficient to support an arrest or search warrant, the information carried enough "indicia of reliability" to justify reasonable suspicion.[228]

---

[223] Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 877, n.4 (1987).

[224] Camara v. Mun. Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523, 538 (1967). See also Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 320–21 (1978).

[225] Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 114 (1964).

[226] Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 415–17 (1969).

[227] Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325, 328–29 (1990).

[228] Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 146–47 (1972).

[G90] Aguilar and Spinelli were understood to require strict satisfaction of a "two-pronged test" whenever an affidavit supporting the issuance of a search warrant relies on an informant's tip. Under this test, the affidavit, first, should establish the "basis of knowledge" of the informant—the particular means by which he came by the information given in his report; and, second, it should provide facts establishing either the general "veracity" of the informant or the specific "reliability" of his report in the particular case. In Gates, the Court made clear that, although those factors that had been considered critical under Aguilar and Spinelli—an informant's "veracity," "reliability," and "basis of knowledge"—remain "highly relevant in evaluating his report," a "totality of the circumstances" approach is appropriate in determining whether an informant's tip establishes probable cause.[229]

[G91] Under the "totality of the circumstances" analysis, corroboration of details of an informant's tip by independent police work is of significant value.[230] The Court's decision in Draper is the classic case on the value of corroborative efforts of police officials. There, an informant named Hereford reported that Draper would arrive in Denver on a train from Chicago in one of two days, and that he would be carrying a quantity of heroin. The informant also supplied a fairly detailed physical description of Draper, and predicted that he would be wearing a light colored raincoat, brown slacks, and black shoes and would be walking "real fast." Hereford gave no indication of the basis for his information. On one of the stated dates, police officers observed a man matching this description exit a train arriving from Chicago; his attire and luggage matched Hereford's report, and he was walking rapidly. The Court explained that, by this point in his investigation, the arresting officer had personally verified every facet of the information given him by Hereford except whether petitioner had accomplished his mission and had the three ounces of heroin on his person or in his bag. And surely, with every other bit of Hereford's information being thus personally verified, the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that the remaining unverified bit of Hereford's information—that Draper would have the heroin with him—was likewise true.[231]

[G92] In White, the police received an anonymous tip asserting that a woman was carrying cocaine and predicting that she would leave an apartment building at a specified time, get into a car matching a particular description, and drive to a named motel. Standing alone, the tip would not have justified an investigatory stop, based on rea-

---

[229] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 230 (1983). The Court noted that a deficiency in one of the Aguilar prongs "may be compensated for, in determining the overall reliability of a tip, by a strong showing as to the other, or by some other indicia of reliability." Id. at 233. "If, for example, a particular informant is known for the unusual reliability of his predictions of certain types of criminal activities in a locality, his failure, in a particular case, to thoroughly set forth the basis of his knowledge should not serve as an absolute bar to a finding of probable cause based on his tip. . . . Likewise, if an unquestionably honest citizen comes forward with a report of criminal activity—which, if fabricated, would subject him to criminal liability—. . . rigorous scrutiny of the basis of his knowledge is unnecessary. . . . Conversely, even if [there is] some doubt as to an informant's motives, his explicit and detailed description of alleged wrongdoing, along with a statement that the event was observed first-hand, entitles his tip to greater weight than might otherwise be the case." Id. at 233–34.

[230] Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 241 (1983). Anonymous tips, particularly "when supplemented by independent police investigation, frequently contribute to the solution of otherwise 'perfect crimes.'" Id. at 237–238.

[231] Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307, 309–13 (1959).

sonable suspicion. Only after police observation showed that the informant had accurately predicted the woman's movements, the Court explained, did it become reasonable to think the tipster had inside knowledge about the suspect and therefore to credit his assertion about the cocaine.[232]

[G93] By contrast, an anonymous tip that a person is carrying a gun is not, without more, sufficient to justify reasonable suspicion of illegal conduct and a police officer's stop and frisk of that person. In Florida v. J.L., the officers' suspicion that respondent was carrying a weapon arose not from their own observations but solely from a call made from an unknown location by an unknown caller. The tip lacked sufficient indicia of reliability to provide reasonable suspicion to make a Terry stop: "it provided no predictive information, and therefore left the police without means to test the informant's knowledge or credibility." The Court rejected the contentions of Florida that the tip was reliable, because it accurately described J.L.'s visible attributes, noting that the reasonable suspicion at issue in the specific case required that a tip "be reliable in its assertion of illegality, not just in its tendency to identify a determinate person."[233]

c. Reasonableness

[G94] The touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness.[234] The Court has often looked to the common law in evaluating the reasonableness, for Fourth Amendment purposes, of police activity.[235] The Court also evaluates the search or seizure "under traditional standards of reasonableness by assessing, on the one hand, the degree to which it intrudes upon an individual's privacy and, on the other, the degree to which it is needed for the promotion of legitimate governmental interests."[236] The balancing of competing interests has been described as the key principle of the Fourth Amendment.[237] Because one of the factors to be taken into account is the extent of the intrusion, it is plain that reasonableness depends on not only when a search or a seizure is conducted but also how it is carried out,[238] including its duration;[239] a search, as actually conducted, must be "reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place."[240] Reasonableness "is measured in objective

---

[232] Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325, 328–32 (1990).

[233] Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 271–72 (2000). The Court also declined to adopt the argument that the standard Terry analysis should be modified to license a "firearm exception," under which a tip alleging an illegal gun would justify a stop and frisk even if the accusation would fail standard pre-search reliability testing. The facts of this case did not require the Court to speculate about the circumstances under which the danger alleged in an anonymous tip might be so great—e.g., a report of a person carrying a bomb—as to justify a search even without a showing of reliability and reasonable suspicion. Id. at 272–74.

[234] See, e.g., Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 108–09 (1977) (per curiam); Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 250 (1991).

[235] Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 13 (1985).

[236] See, e.g., Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 300 (1999).

[237] Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 700, n. 12 (1981).

[238] Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 8 (1985).

[239] Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 101 (2005), citing Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S. 405 (2005) (a lawful seizure can become unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete that mission).

[240] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 341 (1985) (emphasis added).

terms by examining the totality of the circumstances. In applying this test, [the Court has] consistently eschewed bright-line rules, instead emphasizing the fact-specific nature of the reasonableness inquiry."[241]

[G95] Nevertheless, in light of the Court's decisions, certain generalizations may be made. For example, in most cases, the Court strikes the balance in favor of the procedures described by the Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment. The Court has recognized exceptions to this rule, when exigent circumstances[242] or special needs,[243] beyond the normal need for law enforcement, make the warrant and probable cause requirements impracticable.[244] But even in such cases, searches and seizures are ordinarily unreasonable in the absence of individualized suspicion of wrongdoing.[245] And where probable cause has existed, the only cases in which the Court found it necessary actually to perform the "balancing" analysis involved searches or seizures "conducted in an extraordinary manner, unusually harmful to an individual's privacy or even physical interests."[246]

[G96] In fashioning "reasonableness" standards, the Court is mindful of three principles: first, the standard "should be workable for application by rank-and-file, trained police officers;"[247] second, it should be reasonable;[248] and third, the standard "should be objective, not dependent on the belief of individual police officers."[249] For example, the Court has announced that "when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search the passenger compartment of that automobile . . . [and] may also examine the contents of any containers found within the passenger compartment."[250]

[G97] The Court has stated that "[t]he reasonableness of any particular government activity does not necessarily or invariably turn on the existence of alternative 'less intrusive' means."[251] "It is obvious that the logic of such elaborate 'less-restrictive-alternative'

---

241 Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39 (1996).

242 "Exigent circumstances" involve "specially pressing or urgent" needs for official action. See Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 331 (2001) (emphasis added). For example, a warrantless entry by criminal law enforcement officials may be legal when there is compelling need for official action and no time to secure a warrant. See Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 298–99 (1967) (warrantless entry of house by police in hot pursuit of armed robber). A burning building clearly presents an exigency of sufficient proportions to render a warrantless entry "reasonable." See Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509 (1978). And a warrantless blood test for alcohol may be "reasonable" where the delay would have led to loss of evidence. See Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 770–71 (1966).

243 Merely symbolic needs are not "special." See Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305, 321–22 (1997) (a state's requirement that candidates for state office pass a drug test cannot be justified by the state's need to display its commitment to the struggle against drug abuse).

244 Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 619 (1989).

245 City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 37 (2000).

246 Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 818 (1996).

247 See Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 772 (1983), citing New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 458–60 (1981) and United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 821 (1982).

248 See Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 773 (1983).

249 Id. at 773, citing Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 21–22 (1968).

250 See New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 460 (1981).

251 Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 647 (1983). See also Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646, 663 (1995).

arguments could raise insuperable barriers to the exercise of virtually all search-and-seizure powers, . . . because judges engaged in post hoc evaluations of government conduct can almost always imagine some alternative means by which the objectives of the Government might have been accomplished."[252]

2. Particular Types of Searches and Seizures

a. Particular Places, Effects, or Persons

i. Private Dwellings

[G98] It is axiomatic that the "physical entry of the home is the chief evil against which the wording of the Fourth Amendment is directed."[253] And a principal protection against unnecessary intrusions into private dwellings is the warrant requirement imposed by the Fourth Amendment on agents of the government who seek to enter the home for purposes of search or arrest.[254] Therefore, searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are "presumptively unreasonable."[255] "[T]he police bear a heavy burden when attempting to demonstrate an urgent need that might justify warrantless entries, searches, or seizures in the home context."[256] Indeed, the Court has recognized only a few such emergency conditions, where "there is compelling need for official action and no time to secure a warrant ."[257]

[G99] Warrantless arrests in the home are generally prohibited by the Fourth Amendment; the police may not make a warrantless and non-consensual entry into a suspect's home in order to conduct a routine felony arrest.[258] The Court's "hesitation

---

[252] Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 629, n.9 (1989).

[253] United States v. United States Dist. Court, 407 U.S. 297, 313 (1972).

[254] Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 13–14 (1948).

[255] Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 474–75 (1971).

[256] Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 749–50 (1984).

[257] Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509 (1978). See United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42–43 (1976) (hot pursuit of a fleeing felon); Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 334–336 (1990) (protective search incident to arrest); Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 293, 299 (1984) (ongoing fire); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 392 (1978) (person in need of immediate aid and searches of a homicide scene for possible other victims or a killer on the premises); Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326 (2001) (brief seizure of the premises, supported by probable cause and designed to prevent the loss of evidence, while obtaining a search warrant).

When "the home is converted into a commercial center to which outsiders are invited for purposes of transacting unlawful business, a government agent, in the same manner as a private person, may accept an invitation to do business and may enter upon the premises for the very purposes contemplated by the occupant. Of course, this does not mean that, whenever entry is obtained by invitation and the locus is characterized as a place of business, an agent is authorized to conduct a general search for incriminating materials." See Lewis v. United States, 385 U.S. 206, 211 (1966).

[258] See Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 583–90 (1980). An arrest warrant alone will suffice to enter a suspect's own residence to effect his arrest. Id. at 602–03. But forcible entry into a third party's premises to execute an arrest warrant is unconstitutional, if the entry is without a search warrant and in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances. See Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 211–16 (1981). Absent a search warrant or consent, the police may not serve capiases at the areas of a private clinic that are not open to the public. See Pembauer v. Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469, 472, 484 (1986).

in finding exigent circumstances, especially when warrantless arrests in the home are at issue, is particularly appropriate when the underlying offense for which there is probable cause to arrest is relatively minor."[259] A warrantless, night-time entry into an individual's home to arrest him for a non-jailable traffic offense cannot be upheld simply because evidence of the driver's blood alcohol level might have dissipated while the police obtained a warrant.[260]

ii. Commercial Premises—Offices

[G100] In the absence of consent or exigent circumstances, official entry into "the portions of commercial premises which are not open to the public may only be compelled through prosecution or physical force within the framework of a warrant procedure."[261] Nevertheless, "[a]n expectation of privacy in commercial premises . . . is different from, and indeed less than, a similar expectation in an individual's home."[262] The Court has emphasized that, unlike a homeowner's interest in his dwelling, the interest of the owner of commercial property is not one in being free from any administrative inspections.[263]

[G101] One's office is constitutionally protected against warrantless governmental intrusions. Hence, a union employee who shares an office with other union employees has a privacy interest in the office sufficient to challenge successfully the warrantless search of that office.[264] However, in the context of public employment, where the government has a direct and overriding interest in ensuring that the work of the agency is conducted in a proper and efficient manner, "special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement" make the warrant and probable cause requirement impracticable, for legitimate work-related, non-investigatory intrusions as well as investigations of work-related misconduct.[265]

iii. Fire-Damaged Premises

[G102] "If reasonable privacy interests remain in the fire-damaged property, the warrant requirement applies, and any official entry must be made pursuant to a warrant in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances."[266] "A burning building clearly pres-

---

[259] Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 750 (1984).

[260] Id. at 754.

[261] See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541, 545 (1967). Moreover, the fact that a retail store invites the public to enter does not mean that it consents "to wholesale searches and seizures that do not conform to Fourth Amendment guarantees." See Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 329 (1979).

[262] New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 700 (1987).

[263] Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594, 598–99 (1981). See also para. G183.

[264] Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 369–72 (1968).

[265] O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 724–26 (1987) (plurality opinion of four Justices); id. at 732 (concurring opinion of Justice Scalia). The plurality held that public employer intrusions on the constitutionally protected privacy interests of government employees for non-investigatory, work-related purposes, as well as for investigations of work-related misconduct, should be judged by the standard of reasonableness under all the circumstances. Under this reasonableness standard, both the inception and the scope of the intrusion must be reasonable. Ordinarily, a search of an employee's office by a supervisor will be justified at its inception when there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the employee is guilty of work-related misconduct or that the search is necessary for a non-investigatory, work-related purpose, such as to retrieve a needed file. Id. at 725–26.

[266] Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 292–93 (1984) (plurality opinion of four members of the Court).

ents an exigency of sufficient proportions to render a warrantless entry 'reasonable.' . . . [But] [f]ire officials are charged not only with extinguishing fires, but also with finding their causes. Prompt determination of the fire's origin may be necessary to prevent its recurrence, as through the detection of continuing dangers such as faulty wiring or a defective furnace. Immediate investigation may also be necessary to preserve evidence from intentional or accidental destruction. And, of course, the sooner the officials complete their duties, the less will be their subsequent interference with the privacy and the recovery efforts of the victims. For these reasons, officials need no warrant to remain in a building for a reasonable time to investigate the cause of a blaze after it has been extinguished."[267]

[G103] "Thereafter, additional entries to investigate the cause of the fire must be made pursuant to the warrant procedures governing administrative searches."[268] "To secure a warrant to investigate the cause of a fire, an official must show more than the bare fact that a fire has occurred. The magistrate's duty is to assure that the proposed search will be reasonable, a determination that requires inquiry into the need for the intrusion on the one hand, and the threat of disruption to the occupant, on the other. . . . The number of prior entries, the scope of the search, the time of day when it is proposed to be made, the lapse of time since the fire, the continued use of the building, and the owner's efforts to secure it against intruders might all be relevant factors."[269]

[G104] Evidence of arson discovered in the course of such investigations is admissible at trial.[270] Nevertheless, "if the investigating officials find probable cause to believe that arson has occurred and require further access to gather evidence for a possible prosecution, they may obtain a warrant only upon a traditional showing of probable cause applicable to searches for evidence of crime."[271]

[G105] In Tyler, the Court upheld a warrantless post-fire search of a furniture store, despite the absence of exigent circumstances, on the ground that it was a continuation of a valid search begun immediately after the fire. The investigation was begun as the last flames were being doused but could not be completed because of smoke and darkness. The search was resumed promptly after the smoke cleared and daylight dawned.

---

[267] Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509–10 (1978). "The circumstances of particular fires and the role of firemen and investigating officials will vary widely. A fire in a single-family dwelling that clearly is extinguished at some identifiable time presents fewer complexities than those likely to attend a fire that spreads through a large apartment complex or that engulfs numerous buildings. In the latter situations, it may be necessary for officials—pursuing their duty both to extinguish the fire and to ascertain its origin—to remain on the scene for an extended period of time repeatedly entering or re-entering the building or buildings, or portions thereof. In determining what constitutes a 'reasonable time to investigate,' appropriate recognition must be given to the exigencies that confront officials serving under these conditions, as well as to individuals' reasonable expectations of privacy." Id. at 510, n.6.

[268] Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 511 (1978).

[269] Id. at 507. See also Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 293–94 (1984) (plurality opinion).

[270] "The 'plain view' doctrine must be applied in light of the special circumstances that frequently accompany fire damage. In searching solely to ascertain the cause, firemen customarily must remove rubble or search other areas where the cause of fires is likely to be found. An object that comes into view during such a search may be preserved without a warrant." See Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 295, n.6 (1984) (plurality opinion).

[271] Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 512 (1978).

Because the post-fire search was interrupted for reasons that were evident, the Court held that the early morning search was "no more than an actual continuation of the first, and the lack of a warrant thus did not invalidate the resulting seizure of evidence."[272]

[G106] The case in Clifford was distinguishable for several reasons. First, the challenged search was not a continuation of an earlier search. Second, between the time the firefighters had extinguished the blaze and left the scene and the arson investigators first arrived to begin their investigation, the Cliffords had taken steps to secure the privacy interests that remained in their residence against further intrusion, by having a work crew board up the house. Third, the privacy interests in the residence—particularly after the Cliffords had acted—were significantly greater than those in the fire-damaged furniture store. Thus, a four-Justice plurality concluded that the post-fire search at issue should have been conducted pursuant to a warrant, consent, or the identification of some new exigency.[273]

iv. Murder Scenes

[G107] The Court has rejected the contention that there is a "murder scene exception" to the Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment. Although police may make warrantless entries on premises where "they reasonably believe that a person within is in need of immediate aid," and "may make a prompt warrantless search of the area to see if there are other victims or if a killer is still on the premises," a general "murder scene exception" would be inconsistent with the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.[274] Hence, the warrantless search of the suspected murderer's apartment is not constitutionally permissible simply because a homicide has recently occurred there.[275]

v. Public Places

[G108] The Court's Fourth Amendment jurisprudence "has consistently accorded law enforcement officials greater latitude in exercising their duties in public places,"[276] such as streets, parks, and restaurants.[277] It is one thing to seize without a warrant persons or property found in an open area, and it is quite another thing to effect a warrantless seizure "in private premises to which access is not otherwise available for the seizing officer."[278] For example, although a warrant presumptively is required for a felony arrest in a suspect's home, the Fourth Amendment permits the warrantless arrest of an individual in a public place upon probable cause.[279] A person standing in the doorway of a house, where he is "exposed to public view, speech, hearing, and touch," is "in a pub-

---

[272] Id. at 511.

[273] Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287, 296–97 (1984). Justice Stevens agreed that the search of respondents' home was unreasonable, holding that a non-exigent, forceful, warrantless entry cannot be reasonable unless the investigator has made some effort to give the owner sufficient notice to be present while the investigation of the cause of fire is made. Id. at 303–04.

[274] Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 392, 395 (1978). See also Thompson v. Louisiana, 469 U.S. 17, 21 (1984) (per curiam); Flippo v. West Virginia, 528 U.S. 11, 14 (1999).

[275] Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 395 (1978).

[276] Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559, 655 (1999).

[277] See, e.g., Donovan v. Lone Steer, 464 U.S. 408, 413–16 (1984) (an entry into the public lobby of a motel and restaurant for the purpose of serving an administrative subpoena is not the sort of governmental act that is forbidden by the Fourth Amendment).

[278] See G. M. Leasing Co. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 354 (1977).

[279] United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 416–24 (1976).

lic place" and hence subject to arrest without a warrant permitting entry of the home.[280] The Court has stressed that "[t]he congregation of a large number of persons in a private home does not transform it into a public place open to the police."[281]

[G109] It is also well settled that objects, such as weapons or contraband, found in a public place may be seized by the police without a warrant. "The seizure of property in plain view involves no invasion of privacy and is presumptively reasonable, assuming that there is probable cause to associate the property with criminal activity."[282] Federal agents do not violate the Fourth Amendment by failing to secure a warrant prior to seizing automobiles in partial satisfaction of income tax assessments, if the seizure of the automobiles takes place on public streets, parking lots, or other open places.[283]

vi. Border Searches

[G110] "[T]he expectation of privacy [is] less at the border than in the interior."[284] Moreover, consistently with the longstanding power of the sovereign to protect itself "by stopping and examining persons and property crossing into th[e] country, . . . the Fourth Amendment balance between the interests of the Government and the privacy right of the individual is . . . struck much more favorably to the Government at the border."[285] Hence, "[r]outine searches of the persons and effects of entrants are not subject to any requirement of reasonable suspicion, probable cause, or warrant."[286] "Automotive travelers may be stopped at fixed checkpoints near the border without individualized suspicion, even if the stop is based largely on ethnicity."[287] "[T]he Government's authority to conduct suspicionless inspections at the border includes the authority to remove, disassemble, and reassemble a vehicle's fuel tank."[288] Moreover, "boats on inland waters with ready access to the sea may be hailed and boarded with no suspicion whatever" for inspection of their documents.[289]

[G111] Incoming international letter-class mail may be opened without a warrant on less than probable cause. The rationale of the "border search" exception "suggests no

---

[280] United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42 (1976).

[281] Recznik v. City of Lorain, 393 U.S. 166, 168–69 (1968).

[282] Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 586–87 (1980).

[283] G. M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 351 (1977). See also Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559, 563–66 (1999) (the Fourth Amendment does not require the police to obtain a warrant before seizing an automobile from a public place when they have probable cause to believe that it is forfeitable contraband).

[284] United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 539 (1985).

[285] Id. at 538, 540.

[286] Id. at 538.

[287] Id. at 538, citing United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 562–63 (1976). In City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 47–48 (2000), which involved drug checkpoints, the Court noted that its opinion did not affect the validity of border searches.

[288] United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. 149, 155 (2004). As the Court noted, a gas tank search involves a brief procedure that can be reversed without damaging the safety or operation of the vehicle. If damage to a vehicle were to occur, the motorist might be entitled to recovery. While the interference with a motorist's possessory interest is not insignificant when the government removes, disassembles, and reassembles his gas tank, it nevertheless is justified by the government's paramount interest in protecting the border. In addition, delays of one to two hours at international borders are to be expected.

[289] United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 538 (1985), citing United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579 (1983). See, in extenso, para. G128.

distinction in constitutional doctrine stemming from the mode of transportation across the borders."[290] Hence, the Fourth Amendment is not transgressed by a federal statute that authorizes customs officials to inspect incoming international mail when they have a "reasonable cause to suspect" that the mail contains illegally imported merchandise.[291]

[G112] In Montoya de Hernandez, the Court held that "the detention of a traveler at the border, beyond the scope of a routine customs search and inspection, is justified at its inception if customs agents, considering all the facts surrounding the traveler and his trip, reasonably suspect that the traveler is smuggling contraband in his alimentary canal. . . . [T]his type of smuggling gives no external signs, and inspectors will rarely possess probable cause to arrest or search, yet governmental interests in stopping smuggling at the border are high indeed. Under this standard, officials at the border must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person of alimentary canal smuggling."[292]

[G113] Routine border searches may, in certain circumstances, "take place not only at the border itself, but at its functional equivalents as well. For example, searches at an established station near the border, at a point marking the confluence of two or more roads that extend from the border, might be functional equivalents of border searches. For another example, a search of the passengers and cargo of an airplane arriving at a St. Louis airport after a non-stop flight from Mexico City would clearly be the functional equivalent of a border search. But the search of [one's] automobile by a roving patrol, on a California road that lies at all points at least 20 miles north of the Mexican border," is not a border search or the functional equivalent thereof.[293]

---

[290] United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606, 621 (1977).

[291] Id. at 621–23. Moreover, since applicable postal regulations flatly prohibit, under all circumstances, the reading of correspondence absent a search warrant, the opening of international mail in search of customs violations, does not impermissibly chill the exercise of free speech. Id. at 623–24.

[292] United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 541–42 (1985). In that case, respondent arrived at Los Angeles International Airport shortly after midnight, on a direct ten-hour flight from Bogota, Colombia. A Customs Inspector reviewed her documents and noticed from her passport that she had made at least eight recent trips to either Miami or Los Angeles. Respondent revealed that she spoke no English and had no family or friends in the United States. She explained in Spanish that she had come to the United States to purchase goods for her husband's store in Bogota, which was known as a "source city" for narcotics. She admitted that she had no appointments with merchandise vendors and no hotel reservations, and she could not recall how her airline ticket had been purchased. Moreover, she had no shoes other than the high-heeled pair she was wearing. The inspectors requested a female customs inspector to take respondent to a private area and conduct a patdown and strip search. During the search, the female inspector felt respondent's abdomen area and noticed a firm fullness, as if respondent were wearing a girdle. The search revealed no contraband, but the inspector noticed that respondent was wearing two pairs of elastic underpants with a paper towel lining the crotch area. The Court found that these facts and their rational inferences clearly supported a reasonable suspicion that respondent was a "balloon swallower." Id. at 533–34, 542. See also para. G149, regarding the duration of respondent's detention.

The Court suggested no view on what level of suspicion, if any, is required for non-routine border searches such as strip, body cavity, or involuntary x-ray searches. See id. at 541, n.4.

[293] Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272–73 (1973).

vii. Automobiles—Motorists

[G114] The Automobile Exception to the Warrant Requirement. The automobile exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement requires only that there be probable cause to conduct a search. This exception was first set forth by the Court in Carroll. "There, the Court recognized that the privacy interests in an automobile are constitutionally protected; however, it held that the ready mobility of the automobile justifies a lesser degree of protection of those interests."[294] The Court rested this exception on a long-recognized distinction between stationary structures and vehicles: "the guaranty of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures by the Fourth Amendment has been construed, practically since the beginning of Government, as recognizing a necessary difference between a search of a store, dwelling house or other structure in respect of which a proper official warrant readily may be obtained, and a search of a ship, motor boat, wagon or automobile, for contraband goods, where it is not practicable to secure a warrant because the vehicle can be quickly moved out of the locality or jurisdiction in which the warrant must be sought."[295] "More recent cases provide a further justification: the individual's reduced privacy expectation in an automobile owing to its pervasive regulation."[296] "If a car is readily mobile and probable cause exists to believe it contains contraband, the Fourth Amendment thus permits police to search the vehicle, without more."[297] This rule may also apply to motor homes: "[w]hen a vehicle is being used on the highways or is capable of such use and is found stationary in a place not regularly used for residential purposes—temporary or otherwise—the two justifications for the vehicle exception come into play."[298]

[G115] "The scope of a warrantless search of an automobile is . . . not defined by the nature of the container in which the contraband is secreted. Rather, it is defined by the object of the search and the places in which there is probable cause to believe that it may be found. . . . [For example,] [p]robable cause to believe that a container placed in the trunk of a taxi contains contraband or evidence does not justify a search of the entire cab."[299] Hence, the police may search an automobile and the containers within it where they have probable cause to believe contraband or evidence is contained.[300]

---

[294] See California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386, 390 (1985), discussing Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925).

[295] Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 153 (1925).

[296] Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. 938, 940 (1996) (per curiam), citing California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386, 391–92 (1985). See also para. G35.

[297] Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. 938, 940 (1996) (per curiam). The automobile exception does not require a separate finding of exigency in addition to a finding of probable cause. See Maryland v. Dyson, 527 U.S. 465, 466 (1999) (per curiam).

[298] California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386, 392–393 (1985) (respondent's vehicle was so situated that an objective observer would conclude that it was being used not as a residence, but as a vehicle).

[299] United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 824 (1982), overruling Robbins v. California, 453 U.S. 420 (1981).

[300] California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565, 580 (1991), overruling Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753, 764–65 (1979). In Sanders, the police had probable cause to believe a suitcase contained marijuana. They watched as the defendant placed the suitcase in the trunk of a taxi and was driven away. The police pursued the taxi for several blocks, stopped it, found the suitcase in the trunk, and searched it. Although the Court had applied the Carroll doctrine to searches of integral parts of the automobile itself (indeed, in Carroll, contraband whiskey was in the

This rule applies "to all containers within a car, without qualification as to ownership. . . . [P]olice officers with probable cause to search a car may inspect passengers' belongings found in the car that are capable of concealing the object of the search. . . . [And] a package may be searched, whether or not its owner is present as a passenger or otherwise, because it may contain the contraband that the officer has reason to believe is in the car."[301]

[G116] When police officers have probable cause to believe there is contraband inside an automobile that has been stopped on the road, the officers may conduct a warrantless search of the vehicle, even after it has been impounded and is in police custody,[302] and even though a prior search has already been made.[303] "There is no requirement that the warrantless search of a vehicle occur contemporaneously with its lawful seizure."[304] The Court has rejected the position that warrantless searches of containers must invariably be conducted "immediately" as part of the vehicle inspection or "soon thereafter."[305] It is clear that "the justification to conduct such a warrantless search does not vanish once the car has been immobilized; nor does it depend upon a reviewing court's assessment of the likelihood in each particular case that the car would have been driven away, or that its contents would have been tampered with, during the period required for the police to obtain a warrant."[306] upholstery of the seats), it did not extend the doctrine to the warrantless search of personal luggage "merely because it was located in an automobile lawfully stopped by the police." Id. at 765. The Sanders majority "stressed the heightened privacy expectation in personal luggage, and concluded that the presence of luggage in an automobile did not diminish the owner's expectation of privacy in his personal items." See California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565, 572 (1991), discussing Sanders, supra, at 764–65. In Acevedo, supra, at 580, the Court eliminated the "line between the search of an automobile that coincidentally turns up a container and the search of a container that coincidentally turns up in an automobile," noting that the protections of the Fourth Amendment must not turn on such coincidences.

---

[301] Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 301, 307 (1999). The Court observed, inter alia, that, in contrast to the passenger's reduced privacy expectations, the governmental interest in effective law enforcement would be appreciably impaired without the ability to search the passenger's belongings, since (1) an automobile's ready mobility creates the risk that evidence or contraband will be permanently lost while a warrant is obtained; (2) a passenger may have an interest in concealing evidence of wrongdoing in a common enterprise with the driver; and (3) a criminal might be able to hide contraband in a passenger's belongings as readily as in other containers in the car. Id. at 304–05.

[302] Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42, 52 (1970); Texas v. White, 423 U.S. 67, 68 (1975) (per curiam). The police exercise a form of custody or control over a car disabled as a result of an accident, when, for reasons of traffic safety, they have such a car towed to a private garage. See Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 442–43 (1973).

[303] Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. 259, 261 (1982) (per curiam) (prior inventory search); Florida v. Meyers, 466 U.S. 380, 382 (1984) (prior search for criminal evidence).

[304] United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. 478, 484 (1985).

[305] United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. 478, 484 (1985) (a warrantless search of the packages found in a truck was not unreasonable merely because it occurred three days after the packages were placed in a DEA warehouse). See also Cooper v. California, 386 U.S. 58, 61–62 (1967) (upholding a warrantless search that took place seven days after the seizure of the automobile, pending forfeiture proceedings).

[306] Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. 259, 261 (1982) (per curiam).

[G117] Stops for Traffic Violations. Detention of a motorist is reasonable where probable cause exists to believe that a traffic violation has occurred.[307] On these occasions, "licenses and registration papers are subject to inspection, and drivers without them will be ascertained."[308] Moreover, the Fourth Amendment does not forbid a warrantless arrest for a minor traffic offense, such as a misdemeanor seatbelt violation punishable only by a fine.[309]

[G118] In case of a routine traffic stop, the police cannot conduct a full field-type search; there is no "search incident to citation" exception to the Fourth Amendment's probable cause requirement.[310] Nevertheless, "officers have other, independent bases to search for weapons and protect themselves from danger."[311] For example, they may order out of a vehicle both the driver and any passengers;[312] "perform a 'pat-down' of a driver and any passengers upon reasonable suspicion that they may be armed and dangerous;"[313] conduct a "pat-down" of the passenger compartment of a vehicle upon reasonable suspicion that an occupant is dangerous and may gain immediate control of a weapon;[314] and even conduct a full search of the passenger compartment, including any containers therein, pursuant to a custodial arrest.[315]

[G119] Checkpoint Stops. The reasonableness of checkpoint stops turns on factors, such as the checkpoint's purpose, location, and method of operation.[316] The Court has upheld brief, suspicionless seizures at a fixed checkpoint designed to intercept illegal aliens[317] and at a sobriety checkpoint aimed at removing drunk drivers from the road.[318] The Court has also suggested that a similar roadblock to verify drivers' licenses and registrations would be permissible to serve a highway safety interest.[319] While the Court has not limited "the purposes that may justify a checkpoint program to any rigid set of categories," it has declined to approve a checkpoint "program whose primary purpose is ultimately indistinguishable from the general interest in crime control. . . . When law enforcement authorities pursue primarily general crime control purposes at checkpoints, stops can only be justified by some quantum of individualized suspicion or by an emergency. . . . For example, . . . the Fourth Amendment would . . . permit an appropriately tailored roadblock set up to thwart an imminent terrorist attack or to catch a dangerous criminal who is likely to flee by way of a particular route."[320]

---

[307] Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 809–16 (1996) (the temporary detention of a motorist upon probable cause to believe that he has violated the traffic laws does not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures, even if a reasonable officer would not have stopped the motorist absent some additional law enforcement objective).

[308] Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 659 (1979).

[309] Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318 (2001).

[310] Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 117–18 (1998).

[311] Id. at 117.

[312] Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 108–11 (1977) (per curiam); Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 412–15 (1997). See, in extenso, paras. G206–G207.

[313] Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 118 (1998), citing Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

[314] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049 (1983). See, in extenso, para. G155.

[315] New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 460 (1981). See also paras. G162–G163.

[316] See United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 565 (1976). Operation of a fixed checkpoint need not be authorized in advance by a judicial warrant. Id. at 566.

[317] United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976).

[318] Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990).

[319] Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 663 (1979).

[320] City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 44, 47 (2000).

[G120] In Martinez-Fuerte, the Court entertained Fourth Amendment challenges to stops at two permanent immigration checkpoints located on major U.S. highways less than 100 miles from the Mexican border. This practice involved slowing all oncoming traffic "to a virtual, if not a complete, halt," at a highway roadblock. Most motorists were allowed to resume their progress without any oral inquiry or close visual examination. In a relatively small number of cases, the Border Patrol agents concluded that further inquiry was in order and directed these cars to a secondary inspection area where their occupants were asked about their citizenship and immigration status. The Court emphasized that the checkpoints were located near the border and served a border control function made necessary by the difficulty of guarding the border's entire length. It also stressed the impracticality of the particularized study of a given car to discern whether it was transporting illegal aliens. While the need to make immigration checkpoint stops was great, the consequent intrusion on Fourth Amendment interests was relatively modest, mainly because the generating of concern or even freight on the part of lawful traveler was quite limited. The potential interference with legitimate traffic was minimal. Motorists using these highways were not taken by surprise, as they knew, or could obtain knowledge of, the location of the checkpoints. The motorist could see that other vehicles were being stopped and could also observe visible signs of the officers' authority. Furthermore, checkpoint operations both appeared to involve, and actually involved, a limited discretionary enforcement activity. "The regularized manner in which these established checkpoints [we]re operated [wa]s visible evidence, reassuring to law-abiding motorists, that the stops [we]re duly authorized and believed to serve the public interest." And since field officers might stop only those cars passing the checkpoint, there was little room for abusive or harassing stops of individuals. Consequently, the Court found that the balance tipped in favor of the government's interests in policing the nation's borders.[321]

[G121] In Sitz, the Court evaluated the constitutionality of a state highway sobriety checkpoint program. The Sitz checkpoint involved brief suspicionless stops of motorists so that police officers could detect signs of intoxication and remove impaired drivers from the road. Motorists who exhibited signs of intoxication were diverted for a license and registration check and, if warranted, further sobriety tests. This checkpoint program was clearly aimed at reducing the immediate hazard posed by the presence of drunk drivers on the highways, and there was an obvious connection between the imperative of highway safety and the law enforcement practice at issue. Conversely, the weight bearing on the other scale—the measure of the intrusion on motorists stopped briefly at sobriety checkpoints—was slight. As to the "subjective intrusion" and the potential for generating fear and surprise, the Court explained that the "fear and surprise" to be considered were "not the natural fear of one who has been drinking over the prospect of being stopped at a sobriety checkpoint but, rather, the fear and surprise engendered in law abiding motorists by the nature of the stop." The checkpoints at issue were selected pursuant to state guidelines, and uniformed police officers stopped every approaching vehicle. Hence, the intrusion resulting from the brief stop at the sobriety

---

[321] United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 556–62 (1976). The Court also found it permissible to refer motorists selectively to a secondary inspection area for limited inquiry. Even if such referrals were made largely on the basis of apparent Mexican ancestry, the Court perceived no constitutional violation, as the intrusion was sufficiently minimal that no particularized reason was necessary to justify it, and the Border Patrol officers should have wide discretion in selecting the motorists to be diverted for the brief questioning involved. Id. at 563–64.

checkpoint was, for constitutional purposes, indistinguishable from the checkpoint stops upheld in Martinez-Fuerte. In balancing "the State's interest in preventing drunken driving, the extent to which the program [could] reasonably be said to advance that interest, and the degree of intrusion upon individual motorists who [we]re briefly stopped," the Court concluded that the program was consistent with the Fourth Amendment.[322]

[G122] In Edmond, the Court upset a drug checkpoint program of the city of Indianapolis. Pursuant to relevant police directives, at least one officer approached the vehicle, advised the driver that he or she was being stopped briefly at a drug checkpoint, and asked the driver to produce a license and registration. The officer also looked for signs of impairment and conducted an open-view examination of the vehicle from the outside. A narcotics-detection dog walked around the outside of each stopped vehicle. The Court noted that what principally distinguished this checkpoint program from those it had previously approved was its primary purpose. The programs approved in Martinez-Fuerte and Sitz were designed primarily to serve purposes closely related to the problems of policing the border or the necessity of ensuring roadway safety. By contrast, the primary purpose of the Indianapolis narcotics checkpoint program was to "detect evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing" on the part of the occupants of the stopped vehicles.[323] For that reason, the program was found unconstitutional. The Court stressed that "[w]ithout drawing the line at roadblocks designed primarily to serve the general interest in crime control, the Fourth Amendment would do little to prevent such intrusions from becoming a routine part of American life."[324] And if the program could be justified by its lawful secondary purposes of keeping impaired motorists off the road and verifying licenses and registrations, authorities would be able to establish checkpoints for virtually any purpose so long as they also included a license or sobriety check; that is why the Court should determine the primary purpose of the checkpoint program.[325]

[G123] The checkpoint stop at issue in Lidster differed significantly from that in Edmond. The stop's primary law enforcement purpose was not to determine whether a vehicle's occupants were committing a crime, but to ask vehicle occupants, as members of the public, for their help in providing information about a hit-and-run accident occurring about one week earlier at the same location and time of night—a crime in all likelihood committed by others. This special law enforcement concern could justify highway stops without individualized suspicion; the relevant public concern was grave and was advanced by the challenged stop to a significant degree. Moreover, the stops interfered only minimally with liberty of the sort the Fourth Amendment seeks to protect. Viewed objectively, each stop required only a brief wait in line—a very few minutes at most. Contact with the police lasted only a few seconds. Police contact consisted simply of a request for information and the distribution of a flyer. Viewed subjectively, the contact provided little reason for anxiety or alarm; the police stopped all vehicles systematically, and there was no allegation that the police acted in a discriminatory or otherwise unlawful manner while questioning motorists during stops. In upholding the constitutional-

---

[322] Michigan Dep't of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444, 451–55 (1990).

[323] City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 41 (2000). The purpose inquiry in this context "is to be conducted only at the programmatic level, and is not an invitation to probe the minds of individual officers acting at the scene." Id. at 48.

[324] Id. at 42 (emphasis added).

[325] Id. at 46.

ity of the challenged stop, the Court also noted that "an Edmond-type rule is [not] needed to prevent an unreasonable proliferation of police checkpoints," since "[p]ractical considerations—namely, limited police resources and community hostility to traffic tie-ups—seem likely to inhibit any such proliferation," and "the Fourth Amendment's normal insistence that the stop be reasonable in context will still provide an important legal limitation on police use of this kind of information-seeking checkpoint."[326]

[G124] Discretionary Stops. The Court has disapproved random, roving patrol stops of vehicles, relying "on the more intrusive nature of random patrols as compared with fixed-checkpoint stops, . . . and on the ever-present danger of arbitrariness and abuse posed by the completely discretionary nature of random roving patrol stops."[327]

[G125] In Brignoni-Ponce, the Court addressed the limits on police officers' power to stop vehicles and question the occupants about their citizenship and immigration status, without searching either vehicles or occupants. The stop was made by Border Patrol officers on a roving patrol. In weighing the public interest in preventing the illegal entry of aliens at the Mexican border against the interference with individual liberty that results when an officer stops an automobile and briefly questions its occupants, the Court held that such stops were permitted only if the police had a reasonable suspicion that the vehicle contained illegal aliens. Random roving patrol stops could not be tolerated, because they "would subject the residents of . . . [border] areas to potentially unlimited interference with their use of the highways, solely at the discretion of Border Patrol officers," who would have the authority "to stop motorists at random for questioning, day or night, anywhere within 100 miles of the 2,000-mile border, on a city street, a busy highway, or a desert road, without any reason to suspect that they had violated any law."[328] Hence, except at the border and its functional equivalents, "officers on roving patrol may stop vehicles only if they are aware of specific articulable facts, together with rational inferences from those facts, that reasonably warrant suspicion" that criminal activity may be afoot.[329]

---

[326] Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. 419, 426 (2004).

[327] United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579, 604 (1983) (opinion of Brennan, J.).

[328] United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 882–83 (1975). "Any number of factors may be taken into account in deciding whether there is reasonable suspicion to stop a car in the border area. Officers may consider the characteristics of the area in which they encounter a vehicle. Its proximity to the border, the usual patterns of traffic on the particular road, and previous experience with alien traffic are all relevant. . . . They also may consider information about recent illegal border crossings in the area. The driver's behavior may be relevant, as erratic driving or obvious attempts to evade officers can support a reasonable suspicion. . . . Aspects of the vehicle itself may justify suspicion. For instance, officers say that certain station wagons, with large compartments for fold-down seats or spare tires, are frequently used for transporting concealed aliens. . . . The vehicle may appear to be heavily loaded, it may have an extraordinary number of passengers, or the officers may observe persons trying to hide. . . . [Mexican appearance] is a relevant factor, but, standing alone, . . . [it] would justify neither a reasonable belief . . . [that they the car's occupants are aliens,] nor a reasonable belief that the car conceal[s] other aliens who [a]re illegally in the country." Id. at 884–87.

[329] Id. at 884. Cf. United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266, 273 (2002). In the latter case, respondent was stopped by Border Patrol Agent Stoddard while driving on an unpaved road in a remote area of Southeastern Arizona. A consent search of his vehicle revealed more than 100 pounds of marijuana. Considering the totality of the circumstances and giving due weight to the factual inferences drawn by the law enforcement officer, the Court held that Stoddard had

[G126] In Prouse, the Court invalidated a discretionary, suspicionless stop for a spot check of a motorist's driver's license and vehicle registration. The officer's conduct in that case was unconstitutional primarily on account of his exercise of standardless and unconstrained discretion. Moreover, the Court observed that no empirical evidence indicated that such stops would be an effective means of promoting roadway safety and said that it seemed common sense that the percentage of all drivers on the road, who were driving without a license was very small, and that the number of licensed drivers who would be stopped in order to find one unlicensed operator would indeed be large. The Court concluded that "[t]he marginal contribution to roadway safety possibly resulting from a system of spot checks cannot justify subjecting every occupant of every vehicle on the roads to a seizure—limited in magnitude compared to other intrusions, but nonetheless constitutionally cognizable—at the unbridled discretion of law enforcement officials."[330] However, it suggested that questioning of all oncoming traffic at roadblock-type stops would be a lawful means of serving the state interest in highway safety.[331]

[G127] Random Searches. A search, even of an automobile, is a substantial invasion of privacy. The Court has rejected the contention that the government's strong interest in controlling immigration and the practical difficulties of policing the Mexican border combine to justify dispensing with both warrant and probable cause for vehicle searches near the border or its functional equivalents. In Almeida-Sanchez, the question was whether a roving patrol unit constitutionally could search a vehicle for illegal aliens simply because it was in the general vicinity of the border. The Court recognized the government's strong interest in controlling immigration and the practical difficulties of policing the Mexican border, but it held that searches by roving patrols impinged so significantly on Fourth Amendment privacy interests that a search could be conducted without consent only if there was probable cause to believe that a car contained illegal aliens, at least in the absence of a judicial warrant authorizing random searches by roving patrols in a given area.[332] In Ortiz, the Court held that the same limitations apply to reasonable suspicion to believe that Arvizu was engaged in illegal activity. It was reasonable for Stoddard to infer from his observations, his registration check, and his experience as a Border Patrol agent that respondent had set out from a border area notorious for alien and narcotics smuggling along a little-traveled route used by smugglers to avoid a specific highway checkpoint. Stoddard's knowledge further supported a common sense inference that respondent intended to pass through the area at a time when officers would be leaving their backroads patrols to change shifts. The likelihood that respondent and his family were on a picnic outing was diminished by the fact that the minivan had turned away from the known recreational areas. The knees of the two children sitting in the very back seat were unusually high, which suggested the existence of concealed cargo in the passenger compartment. Finally, Stoddard's assessment of respondent's reactions upon seeing him and the children's mechanical-like waving, which continued for a full four to five minutes, were entitled to some weight. While each of these factors alone was susceptible to innocent explanation, taken together, the same factors sufficed to form a particularized and objective basis for Stoddard to stop the vehicle.

---

330 Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 661 (1979).

331 Id. at 663.

332 Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 269–72, n.3, 283–285, 288 (1973). "Although standards for probable cause in the context of this case are relatively unstructured, there are a number of relevant factors which would merit consideration: they include (i) the frequency with which aliens illegally in the country are known or reasonably believed to be transported within a particular area; (ii) the proximity of the area in question to the border; (iii) the extensiveness and geographic characteristics of the area, including the roads therein and similar vehicle searches conducted at a permanent checkpoint. The severity of the intrusion and the selective discretion necessarily exercised by police in the field require that that discretion be limited by a requirement of probable cause.[333]

viii. Vessels

[G128] The Fourth Amendment is not offended when customs officials, acting pursuant to a statute authorizing them to board any vessel at any time and at any place in the United States to examine the vessel's manifest and other documents, board, without any suspicion of wrongdoing, for inspection of documents a vessel that is located in waters providing ready access to the open sea. In reaching that conclusion, the Court considered several factors. In 1790, the First Congress clearly authorized the suspicionless boarding of vessels, reflecting its view that such boardings are not contrary to the Fourth Amendment. Second, while random stops of vehicles, without any articulable suspicion of unlawful conduct away from the borders, are not permissible under the Fourth Amendment, and whereas vehicles stops at fixed checkpoints or at roadblocks may be, there are important factual differences between vessels located in waters offering ready access to the open sea and automobiles on principal thoroughfares. "[N]o reasonable claim can be made that permanent checkpoints would be practical on waters where vessels can move in any direction at any time, and need not follow established 'avenues,' as automobiles must do. [W]hile permanent checkpoints could be established at various ports, . . . vessels having ready access to the open sea need never come to harbor. Should the captain want to avoid the authorities at port, he could carry on his activity by anchoring at some obscure location on the shoreline, or . . . [he] could transfer his cargo from one vessel to another. . . . [Moreover,] the system of prescribed outward markings used by States for vehicle registration is also significantly different from the system of external markings on vessels, and the extent and type of documentation required by federal law is a good deal more variable and more complex than are the state vehicle registration laws. . . . These documentation laws serve the public interest in many obvious ways. . . . They are the linchpin for regulation of participation in certain trades, such as fishing, salvaging, towing, and dredging, as well as areas in which trade is sanctioned, and for enforcement of various environmental laws. The documentation laws play a vital role in the collection of customs duties and tonnage duties. They allow for regulation of imports and exports assisting, for example, Government officials in the prevention of entry into th[e] country of controlled substances, illegal aliens, prohibited medicines, adulterated foods, dangerous chemicals, prohibited agricultural products, diseased or prohibited animals, and illegal weapons and explosives. . . . [Finally,] [w]hile the need to make document checks is great, the resultant intrusion on Fourth Amendment interests is quite limited, . . . [since] it involves only a brief detention where officials come on board, visit public areas of the vessel, and inspect documents."[334]

---

the extent of their use; and (iv) the probable degree of interference with the rights of innocent persons, taking into account the scope of the proposed search, its duration, and the concentration of illegal alien traffic in relation to the general traffic of the road or area. . . . Experience with an initial search or series of searches would be highly relevant in considering applications for renewal of a warrant." Id. at 283–84, n.3 (concurring opinion of Justice Powell).

333 United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891, 895–97 (1975).

334 United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579, 585, 589–93 (1983).

ix. Seizure of Materials Presumptively Protected by the First Amendment

[G129] "[W]hile the general rule under the Fourth Amendment is that any and all contraband, instrumentalities, and evidence of crimes may be seized on probable cause (and even without a warrant in various circumstances), it is otherwise when materials presumptively protected by the First Amendment are involved. . . . It is the risk of prior restraint, which is the underlying basis for the special Fourth Amendment protections accorded searches for and seizure of First Amendment materials that motivates this rule."[335] "Prior restraint of the right of expression, whether by books or films, calls for a higher hurdle in the evaluation of 'reasonableness;'"[336] yet, no "higher" probable cause standard is required.[337]

[G130] Pre-trial seizures of allegedly obscene materials may only be undertaken pursuant to "a procedure designed to focus searchingly on the question of obscenity."[338] Such warrantless seizures cannot be justified as incident to arrest.[339] A warrant for the seizure of allegedly obscene books cannot be issued on the conclusory opinion of a police officer that the books sought to be seized are obscene, without any inquiry by the issuing magistrate into the factual basis for the officer's conclusions.[340] And "the constitutional requirement that warrants must particularly describe the 'things to be seized' is to be accorded the most scrupulous exactitude when the 'things' are books, and the basis for their seizure is the ideas which they contain."[341]

[G131] Most importantly, the Court has noted that "seizing films to destroy them or to block their distribution or exhibition is a very different matter from seizing a single copy of a film for the bona fide purpose of preserving it as evidence in a criminal proceeding." Therefore, until there has been a judicial determination of the obscenity issue in an adversary proceeding, exhibition of a film cannot be restrained by seizing all the available copies of it.[342] The same is also true for books or any other expressive materials. "While a single copy of a book may be seized and retained for evidentiary purposes based on a finding

---

[335] Fort Wayne Books v. Indiana, 489 U.S. 46, 63–64 (1989).

[336] Roaden v. Kentucky, 413 U.S. 496, 504 (1973).

[337] New York v. P. J. Video, 475 U.S. 868, 875 (1986) ("an application for a warrant authorizing the seizure of materials presumptively protected by the First Amendment should be evaluated under the same standard of probable cause used to review warrant applications generally").

[338] A Quantity of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205, 210 (1964). See also para. I25.

[339] Roaden v. Kentucky, 413 U.S. 496, 506 (1973).

[340] Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 731–32 (1961); Lee Art Theatre v. Virginia, 392 U.S. 636, 637 (1968).

[341] Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476, 485 (1965). There the Court invalidated a warrant authorizing the search of a private home for all books, records, and other materials relating to the Communist Party, on the ground that, whether or not the warrant would have been sufficient in other contexts, "it authorized the searchers to rummage among and make judgments about books and papers, and was the functional equivalent of a general warrant." See Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 564 (1978).

[342] Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483, 492–93 (1973). On a showing to the trial court that other copies of the film are not available to the exhibitor, the court should permit the seized film to be copied so that showing can be continued pending a judicial determination of the obscenity issue in an adversary proceeding.

of probable cause, the publication may not be taken out of circulation completely until there has been a determination of obscenity after an adversary hearing."[343]

[G132] The Fourth Amendment does not forbid warrants where the press is involved. The courts must "apply the warrant requirements with particular exactitude when First Amendment interests would be endangered by the search; . . . no more than this is required where the warrant requested is for the seizure of criminal evidence reasonably believed to be on the premises occupied by a newspaper. Properly administered, the preconditions for a warrant . . . should afford sufficient protection against" interference with the press's ability to gather, analyze, and disseminate news.[344]

x. Searches and Seizures in the Public School Context

[G133] The Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures applies to searches conducted by public school officials. "In carrying out searches and other functions pursuant to disciplinary policies mandated by state statutes, school officials act as representatives of the State, not merely as surrogates for the parents of students, and they cannot claim the parents' immunity from the Fourth Amendment's strictures."[345]

[G134] Schoolchildren have legitimate expectations of privacy. "They may find it necessary to carry with them a variety of legitimate, noncontraband items, and there is no reason to conclude that they have necessarily waived all rights to privacy in such items by bringing them onto school grounds."[346] But "[a] student's privacy interest is limited in the public school environment, where the State is responsible for maintaining discipline, health and safety."[347] "[T]he preservation of order and a proper educational environment requires close supervision of schoolchildren, as well as the enforcement of rules against conduct that would be perfectly permissible if undertaken by an adult. . . . [Striking] the balance between schoolchildren's legitimate expectations of privacy and the school's equally legitimate need to maintain an environment in which learning can take place . . . requires some easing of the restrictions to which searches by public authorities are ordinarily subject. The warrant requirement, in particular, is unsuited to the school environment: requiring a teacher to obtain a warrant before searching a child suspected of an infraction of school rules (or of the criminal law) would unduly interfere with the maintenance of the swift and informal disciplinary procedures needed in the schools. . . . [Moreover,] the accommodation of the privacy interests of schoolchildren with the substantial need of teachers and administrators for freedom to maintain order in the schools does not require strict adherence to the requirement that searches be based on probable cause to believe that the subject of the search has violated or is violating the law. Rather, the legality of a search of a student should depend simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search. Determining the reasonableness of any search involves a twofold inquiry: first, one must consider 'whether the . . . action was justified at its inception;' . . . second, one must determine whether the search as actually conducted 'was reasonably related in scope to the cir-

---

343 Fort Wayne Books v. Indiana, 489 U.S. 46, 63 (1989).

344 Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 563–65 (1978).

345 New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 336–37 (1985).

346 Id. at 339.

347 Bd. of Educ. of Ind. Sch. Dist. No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822, 830 (2002).

cumstances which justified the interference in the first place.' . . . Under ordinary circumstances, a search of a student by a teacher or other school officialwill be 'justified at its inception' when there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school. Such a search will be permissible in its scope when the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."[348]

[G135] Random, suspicionless drug testing of students who participate in inter-scholastic sports is constitutional. First, the subjects of such a regulation have a limited expectation of privacy, mainly because of the school's custodial responsibility and authority. The requirements that public schoolchildren submit to physical examinations and be vaccinated indicate that they have a lesser privacy expectation with regard to medical examinations and procedures than the general population. Student athletes have even less of a legitimate privacy expectation, for an element of communal undress is inherent in athletic participation, and athletes are subject to pre-season physical exams and rules regulating their conduct. Second, the privacy interests compromised by the process of obtaining the urine sample are negligible, at least when the conditions of production of the sample are nearly identical to those typically encountered in public restrooms that schoolchildren use daily, the tests look only for standard drugs, not medical conditions, and the results are disclosed only to a limited class of school personnel who have a need to know, and they are not turned over to law enforcement authorities or used for any internal disciplinary function. Third, the importance of the governmental concern in preventing drug use by schoolchildren cannot be doubted. School years are the time when the physical, psychological, and addictive effects of drugs are most severe. And, of course, the effects of a drug-infested school are visited not just upon the users but upon the entire student body and faculty, as the educational process is disrupted. The health and safety interest furthered by drug testing is undoubtedly substantial for all children, athletes and non-athletes alike. The need to prevent and deter the substantial harm of childhood drug use provides the necessary immediacy for a school testing policy; indeed, it would make little sense to require a school district to wait for a substantial portion of its students to begin using drugs before it was allowed to institute a drug testing program designed to deter drug use. Taking into account all the factors considered above—the decreased expectation of privacy, the relative unobtrusiveness of the search, and the severity of the need met by the search—the Court has found that drug testing of students who participate in extracurricular activities is reasonable.[349]

xi. Patients at Public Hospitals

[G136] The Court has held that, "[w]hile state hospital employees . . . may have a duty to provide the police with evidence of criminal conduct that they inadvertently acquire in the course of routine treatment, when they undertake to obtain such evidence from their patients for the specific purpose of incriminating those patients, they have a special obli-

---

[348] New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 339–42 (1985). The Court expressed no opinion on the question of the appropriate standard for assessing the legality of searches conducted by school officials in conjunction with or at the behest of law enforcement agencies. Id. at 341, n.7.

[349] Bd. of Educ. of Ind. Sch. Dist. No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822, 830–38 (2002); Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646, 654–64 (1995).

gation to make sure that the patients are fully informed about their constitutional rights, as standards of knowing waiver require."[350]

xii. Pre-Trial Detainees

[G137] Assuming that a pre-trial detainee retains a diminished expectation of privacy after commitment to a custodial facility, the requirement that pre-trial detainees remain outside their rooms during inspections by custodial officials does not violate the Fourth Amendment, but simply facilitates the safe and effective performance of the searches, and thus does not render such searches "unreasonable."[351] Similarly, assuming that pre-trial detainees retain some Fourth Amendment rights upon commitment to a corrections facility, the practice of visual body cavity searches of inmates, following contact visits with persons from outside the institution, does not violate that Amendment. Balancing the significant and legitimate security interests of the institution against the inmates' privacy interests, such searches can be conducted without probable cause and are not unreasonable.[352]

xiii. Probationers

[G138] In Griffin, the Court upheld a search of a probationer conducted pursuant to a Wisconsin regulation permitting "any probation officer to search a probationer's home without a warrant as long as his supervisor approves and as long as there are reasonable grounds to believe the presence of contraband." The Court held that a state's operation of its probation system presents a "special need" for the exercise of supervision to assure that probation restrictions are in fact observed. That special need makes the warrant requirement impracticable and justifies replacement of the probable cause standard with a "reasonable grounds" standard. Because it is the very assumption of the institution of probation that the probationer is in need of rehabilitation and is more likely than the ordinary citizen to violate the law, the Court thought it enough if the information supporting the search indicated only the "likelihood" of facts justifying the search.[353] Likewise, the warrantless search of a probationer's apartment, supported by

---

[350] Ferguson v. City of Charleston, 532 U.S. 67 (2001). See also para. G175.

[351] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 557 (1979); Block v. Rutherford, 468 U.S. 576, 590–91 (1984). Moreover, such a room search rule does not violate the Due Process Clause. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 560–61 (1979).

[352] Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 558–60 (1979).

[353] Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868, 873–80 (1987). "A warrant requirement would interfere to an appreciable degree with the probation system, setting up a magistrate, rather than the probation officer, as the judge of how close a supervision the probationer requires. Moreover, the delay inherent in obtaining a warrant would make it more difficult for probation officials to respond quickly to evidence of misconduct, . . . and would reduce the deterrent effect that the possibility of expeditious searches would otherwise create. . . . [T]he probation regime would also be unduly disrupted by a requirement of probable cause. . . . [This requirement] would reduce the deterrent effect of the supervisory arrangement. . . . [I]t is both unrealistic and destructive of the whole object of the continuing probation relationship to insist upon the same degree of demonstrable reliability of particular items of supporting data, and upon the same degree of certainty of violation, as is required in other contexts. In some cases—especially those involving drugs or illegal weapons—the probation agency must be able to act based upon a lesser degree of certainty than the Fourth Amendment would otherwise require in order to intervene before a probationer does damage to himself or society. The agency, moreover, must be able to proceed on the basis of its entire experience with the probationer, and to assess probabilities in the light of its knowledge of his life, character, and circumstances." Id. at 876, 878–79.

reasonable suspicion and authorized by a probation condition, satisfies the Fourth Amendment.[354]

b. Particular Acts, Methods, or Forms

i. Arrests

[G139] Arrests may constitutionally be made only on probable cause.[355] But the police may arrest a suspect without a warrant. In Watson, the Court held that the warrantless felony arrest of an individual in a public place upon probable cause does not violate the Fourth Amendment.[356] And in Atwater, the Court admitted that the Fourth Amendment does not forbid a warrantless arrest for a minor criminal offense committed in the officer's presence, such as a misdemeanor seatbelt violation punishable only by a fine.[357]

[G140] In Gerstein, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment requires a prompt judicial determination of probable cause as a prerequisite to an extended pre-trial detention following a warrantless arrest and that this determination may be made by a judicial officer without an adversary hearing. In reaching this conclusion, the Court attempted to reconcile important competing interests. "On the one hand, States have a strong interest in protecting public safety by taking into custody those persons who are reasonably suspected of having engaged in criminal activity, even where there has been no opportunity for a prior judicial determination of probable cause. . . . On the other hand, prolonged detention based on incorrect or unfounded suspicion may unjustly 'imperil [a] suspect's job, interrupt his source of income, and impair his family relationships.' . . . The Court, thus, established a 'practical compromise' between the rights of individuals and the realities of law enforcement."[358]

---

[354] Unites States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112 (2001). The Court did not decide whether respondent's acceptance of the search condition constituted consent to a complete waiver of his Fourth Amendment rights, because the search was reasonable under the Court's general Fourth Amendment "totality of the circumstances" approach. In reaching that conclusion, the Court considered, inter alia, that Knights's reasonable expectation of privacy had been significantly diminished as a result of the search condition of his probation. Id. at 118–20.

[355] Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 208, 213–14 (1979); Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 815 (1985).

[356] United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 414–24 (1976). The Court relied on (1) the well-settled common law rule that a warrantless arrest in a public place is valid if the arresting officer had probable cause to believe the suspect is a felon; (2) the clear consensus among the states adhering to that well-settled common law rule; and (3) the expression of the judgment of Congress that such an arrest is "reasonable."

[357] Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318 (2001). There, the five-member majority rejected petitioner's request to mint a new rule of constitutional law forbidding custodial arrest, even upon probable cause, when conviction could not ultimately carry any jail time, and the government can show no compelling need for immediate detention. In doing so, the majority noted, inter alia, that the Court has traditionally recognized that "a responsible Fourth Amendment balance is not well served by standards requiring sensitive case-by-case determinations of government need, lest every discretionary judgment in the field be converted into an occasion for constitutional review." Id. at 347.

[358] See County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 52–53 (1991), discussing and quoting Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 112–13 (1975).

[G141] Taking into account the foregoing competing interests, the Court decided in McLaughlin that a jurisdiction providing judicial determinations of probable cause within 48 hours of arrest would, as a general matter, comply with the promptness requirement of Gerstein. But this is not to say that the probable cause determination in a particular case passes constitutional muster simply because it is provided within 48 hours. "Such a hearing may nonetheless violate Gerstein, if the arrested individual can prove that his or her probable cause determination was delayed unreasonably. Examples of unreasonable delay are delays for the purpose of gathering additional evidence to justify the arrest, a delay motivated by ill-will against the arrested individual, or delay for delay's sake. In evaluating whether the delay in a particular case is unreasonable, however, courts must allow a substantial degree of flexibility. Courts cannot ignore the often unavoidable delays in transporting arrested persons from one facility to another, handling late-night bookings where no magistrate is readily available, obtaining the presence of an arresting officer who may be busy processing other suspects or securing the premises of an arrest, and other practical realities."[359] "Where an arrested individual does not receive a probable cause determination within 48 hours, the calculus changes. In such a case, the arrested individual does not bear the burden of proving an unreasonable delay. Rather, the burden shifts to the government to demonstrate the existence of a bona fide emergency or other extraordinary circumstance. The fact that, in a particular case, it may take longer than 48 hours to consolidate pre-trial proceedings does not qualify as an extraordinary circumstance. Nor, for that matter, do intervening weekends. A jurisdiction that chooses to offer combined proceedings must do so as soon as is reasonably feasible but in no event later than 48 hours after arrest."[360]

[G142] In Payton, the Court proclaimed for the first time a rigid warrant requirement for all non-exigent home arrest entries, stressing that a home arrest "involves not only the invasion attendant to all arrests, but also an invasion of the sanctity of the home."[361] A warrantless, night-time entry into a person's home to arrest him for a non-jailable traffic offense clearly contravenes the Fourth Amendment.[362]

[G143] "[I]t is not 'unreasonable' under the Fourth Amendment for a police officer, as a matter of routine, to monitor the movements of an arrested person, as his judgment dictates, following the arrest. The officer's need to ensure his own safety—as well as the integrity of the arrest—is compelling. Such surveillance is not an impermissible invasion of the privacy or personal liberty of an individual who has been arrested." Hence, once an officer has placed an individual under lawful arrest, the officer is authorized to accompany the arrestee to his room, for the purpose of obtaining identification.[363]

---

[359] County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56–57 (1991).

[360] Id. at 57.

[361] Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 588–89 (1980). At the same time, the Court recognized that, "[i]f there is sufficient evidence of a citizen's participation in a felony to persuade a judicial officer that his arrest is justified, it is constitutionally reasonable to require him to open his doors to the officers of the law. Thus, for Fourth Amendment purposes, an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within." Id. at 602–03.

[362] Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 748–54 (1984).

[363] Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1, 7 (1982). Consequently, the officer may lawfully seize any contraband discovered in "plain view" in the arrestee's room.

ii. Investigatory Stops and Frisks

[G144] Brief Stops of Persons. "The Fourth Amendment does not require a policeman who lacks the precise level of information necessary for probable cause to arrest to simply shrug his shoulders and allow a crime to occur or a criminal to escape. On the contrary, . . . it may be the essence of good police work to adopt an intermediate response. . . . A brief stop of a suspicious individual, in order to determine his identity or to maintain the status quo momentarily while obtaining more information, may be most reasonable in light of the facts known to the officer at the time."[364] This was recognized in Terry v. Ohio, which held that, where a police officer has a reasonable suspicion supported by articulable facts that criminal activity may be "afoot"—imminent or ongoing—the officer may briefly stop the suspicious person and make "reasonable inquiries" aimed at confirming or dispelling his suspicions.[365] Similarly, "if police have a reasonable suspicion, grounded in specific and articulable facts, that a person they encounter was involved in or is wanted in connection with a completed felony, then a Terry stop may be made to investigate that suspicion; . . . if a ["wanted flyer"] has been issued on the basis of articulable facts supporting a reasonable suspicion that the person wanted has committed an offense, then reliance on that flyer . . . justifies a stop to check identification, . . . to pose questions, . . . or to detain the person briefly while attempting to obtain further information."[366]

[G145] "Stop and identify" statutes vary from state to state, but all permit an officer to ask or require a suspect to disclose his identity. In Brown v. Texas, the Court invalidated a conviction for violating a Texas stop and identify statute on Fourth Amendment grounds. The Court ruled that the initial stop was not based on specific, objective facts establishing reasonable suspicion to believe the suspect was involved in criminal activity. Absent that factual basis for detaining the defendant, the Court held, the risk of arbitrary and abusive police practices was too great and the stop was impermissible.[367] Four terms later, the Court invalidated a stop and identify statute on vagueness grounds. The California law in Kolender required a suspect to give an officer "credible and reliable" identification when asked to identify himself. The Court held that the statute was void because it provided no standard for determining what a suspect must do to comply with it, resulting in "virtually unrestrained power to arrest and charge persons with a violation."[368] Hiibel made clear that the state may require a suspect to disclose his name in the course of a Terry stop, and that a suspect can be arrested and prosecuted for failure to identify himself, if the request for identification was "reasonably related in scope to the circumstances" justifying the stop.[369]

---

[364] Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 145–46 (1972), citing Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 21–23 (1968). Cf. Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 704–05 (1981) ("If the evidence that a citizen's residence is harboring contraband is sufficient to persuade a judicial officer that an invasion of the citizen's privacy is justified, it is constitutionally reasonable to require that citizen to remain while officers of the law execute a valid warrant to search his home.").

[365] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 30 (1968).

[366] United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 230, 232 (1985). The Court expressed no view on whether Terry stops to investigate all past crimes, however serious, are permitted.

[367] Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 51–52 (1979).

[368] Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 360 (1983).

[369] Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004). The Court noted, inter alia, that "Obtaining a suspect's name in the course of a Terry stop serves important government interests. Knowledge of identity may inform an officer that a suspect is wanted for [G146] Because of the public interest in suppressing illegal drug transactions and other serious crimes, a temporary detention for questioning in the case of an airport search may be justified without a showing of "probable cause" if "there is articulable suspicion that a person has committed or is about to commit a crime."[370] In Sokolow, respondent was stopped by Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents upon his arrival at Honolulu International Airport. The agents found 1,063 grams of cocaine in his carry-on luggage. When respondent was stopped, the agents knew, inter alia, that he had traveled under an assumed name, paid for an airline ticket in cash with a number of small bills, traveled from Miami, a source city for illicit drugs, stayed in Miami for only 48 hours, even though a round-trip flight from Honolulu to Miami takes 20 hours, and appeared nervous during his trip. These factors, taken together, justified the suspicion that Sokolow was a "drug courier."[371] In Reid, four facts, encoded in a "drug courier profile," were alleged in support of the DEA's detention of a suspect at the Atlanta Airport. First, Reid had arrived from Fort Lauderdale, Florida, a source city for cocaine. Second, he arrived in the early morning, when law enforcement activity is diminished. Third, he and his companion appeared to have no luggage other than their shoulder bags. And fourth, he and his companion appeared to be trying to conceal the fact that they were traveling together. This collection of facts, the Court held, was inadequate to support a finding of reasonable suspicion. All but the last of these facts "describe a very large category of presumably innocent travelers, who would be subject to virtually random seizures were the Court to conclude that as little foundation as there was in this case could justify a seizure." The sole fact that suggested criminal activity was that Reid preceded another person and occasionally looked backward at him as they proceeded through the concourse. This observation did not, of itself, provide a reasonable basis for suspecting wrongdoing, for inferring criminal activity from such evidence reflected no more than "an inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or 'hunch.'"[372] another offense, or has a record of violence or mental disorder. On the other hand, knowing identity may help clear a suspect and allow the police to concentrate their efforts elsewhere. Identity may prove particularly important in cases . . . where the police are investigating what appears to be a domestic assault. Officers called to investigate domestic disputes need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Id. at 186. The Court concluded that the request for identification at issue in this case was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances justifying the stop.

[G147] In Dunaway, the Court refused to extend Terry to authorize investigative interrogations at police stations on less than probable cause, even though proper warnings under Miranda had been given.[373] Detention at the police station for investigative purposes, whether for interrogation or fingerprinting, is "in important respects indistinguishable from a traditional arrest."[374] Hence, in the absence of probable cause or a warrant, it cannot be squared with the Fourth Amendment.[375]

---

The Court noted a similar limitation in Hayes, where it suggested that Terry may permit an officer to determine a suspect's identity by compelling the suspect to submit to fingerprinting only if there is "a reasonable basis for believing that fingerprinting will establish or negate the suspect's connection with that crime." See Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 817 (1985).

370 Florida v. Rodriguez, 469 U.S. 1, 5 (1984) (per curiam).

371 United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 8–9 (1989).

372 Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438, 440–41 (1980) (per curiam).

373 Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 213–16 (1979).

374 Id. at 212.

375 Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 815–16 (1985). See also para. G156.

[G148] Brief Detentions of Property. "Given the fact that seizures of property can vary in intrusiveness, some brief detentions of property may be so minimally intrusive of Fourth Amendment interests that strong countervailing governmental interests will justify a seizure based only reasonable, articulable suspicion that the property contains contraband or evidence of criminal activity. [For instance,] when an officer's observations lead him reasonably to believe that a traveler is carrying luggage that contains narcotics, the principles of Terry and its progeny would permit the officer to detain the luggage briefly to investigate the circumstances that aroused his suspicion, provided that the investigative detention is properly limited in scope."[376] And postal officers may seize a "suspicious" package and detain it briefly, until they secure a search warrant.[377] Similarly, if the police have probable cause to believe that a home contains contraband, which is evidence of a crime, they may temporarily keep the resident from entering his home unaccompanied by an officer, so as to prevent the loss of evidence, while they diligently obtain a warrant in a reasonable period of time.[378]

[G149] Time Limits. "[T]he brevity of the invasion of the individual's Fourth Amendment interests is an important factor in determining whether the seizure is so minimally intrusive as to be justifiable on reasonable suspicion."[379] However, the Court has rejected "hard-and-fast" time limits; "authorities must be allowed 'to graduate their response to the demands of any particular situation.'"[380] "In assessing whether a detention is too long in duration to be justified as an investigative stop, [the Court] consider[s] it appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly, during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant. . . . A court making this assessment should take care to consider whether the police are acting in a swiftly developing situation, and in such cases the court should not indulge in unrealistic second-guessing. . . . A creative judge engaged in post hoc evaluation of police conduct can almost always imagine some alternative means by which the objectives of the police might have been accomplished. But the fact that the protection of the public might, in the abstract, have been accomplished by 'less intrusive' means does not, by itself, render the search unreasonable. . . . The question is not simply whether some other alternative was available, but whether the police acted unreasonably in failing to recognize or to pursue it."[381]

[G150] In Sharpe, the Court rejected the contention that a 20-minute stop is unreasonable when the police have acted diligently, and a suspect's actions contribute to the added delay about which he complains. There, a DEA agent, while patrolling a highway in an area under surveillance for suspected drug trafficking, noticed an apparently overloaded pickup truck with an attached camper traveling in tandem with a Pontiac. Respondent Savage was driving the truck, and respondent Sharpe was driving the Pontiac. When they attempted to stop the vehicles, the Pontiac pulled over to the side of the road, but the truck continued on, pursued by a state Highway Patrol officer. The DEA agent was unable to contact the state officer to see if he had stopped the truck, so he radioed the local police for help. In the meantime, the state officer had stopped the

---

376 United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 706 (1983).

377 See United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U.S. 249, 251–53 (1970).

378 Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 334, 337 (2001).

379 United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 709 (1983).

380 United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 542 (1985), quoting United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 709, n.10 (1983).

381 United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675, 686–87 (1985).

truck, questioned Savage, and told him that he would be held until the DEA agent arrived. The agent, who had left the local police with the Pontiac, arrived at the scene approximately 15 minutes after the truck had been stopped. After confirming his suspicion that the truck was overloaded and upon smelling marihuana, the agent opened the rear of the camper without Savage's permission and observed a number of bales of marihuana. The agent then placed Savage under arrest and, returning to the Pontiac, also arrested Sharpe. Under these circumstances, the Court held that there had been no delay unnecessary to the legitimate investigation of the law enforcement officers; except for Savage's maneuvers, only a short and certainly permissible pre-arrest detention would likely have taken place.[382]

[G151] In McArthur, police officers, with probable cause to believe that respondent had hidden marijuana in his home, prevented him from entering the home unaccompanied by an officer for about two hours, while they obtained a search warrant. In upholding the seizure of the premises, the Court noted, inter alia, that the two-hour period was "no longer than reasonably necessary for the police, acting with diligence, to obtain the warrant."[383]

[G152] "[A]limentary canal smuggling cannot be detected in the amount of time in which other illegal activity may be investigated through brief Terry-type stops. It presents few, if any, external signs; a quick frisk will not do, nor will even a strip search."[384] In Montoya de Hernandez, the inspectors had available, as an alternative to simply awaiting respondent's bowel movement, an x-ray. They offered her the alternative of submitting herself to that procedure. But when she refused that alternative, the customs inspectors were left with only two practical alternatives: detain her for such time as necessary to confirm their suspicions, a detention that would last much longer than the typical Terry stop, or turn her loose into the interior carrying the reasonably suspected contraband drugs. The inspectors, in this case, followed the former procedure. They no doubt expected that respondent, having recently disembarked from a ten-hour direct flight with a full and stiff abdomen, would produce a bowel movement without extended delay. But her visible efforts to resist the call of nature, which were "heroic," disappointed this expectation and, in turn, caused her great discomfort. Although respondent's detention was long, and, indeed, humiliating, both its length and its discomfort resulted solely from the method by which she had chosen to smuggle illicit drugs into the country. Considering that the police are not to be charged "with delays in investigatory detention attributable to the suspect's evasive actions," and that the challenged detention had occurred at the international border, where the Fourth Amendment balance of interests leans heavily to the government, the Court concluded that the 16-hour detention, in that case, was not unreasonably long.[385]

[G153] "The person whose luggage is detained is technically still free to continue his travels or carry out other personal activities pending release of the luggage. Moreover, he is not subjected to the coercive atmosphere of a custodial confinement or to the public indignity of being personally detained. Nevertheless, such a seizure can effectively restrain the person, since he is subjected to the possible disruption of his travel plans

---

382 Id. at 677–79, 687–88.

383 Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 332 (2001).

384 United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 543 (1985).

385 Id. at 543–44.

in order to remain with his luggage or to arrange for its return. . . . At least when the authorities do not make it absolutely clear how they plan to reunite the suspect and his possessions at some future time and place, seizure of the object is tantamount to seizure of the person. This is because that person must either remain on the scene or else seemingly surrender his effects permanently to the police. . . . Therefore, when the police seize luggage from the suspect's custody, . . . the limitations applicable to investigative detentions of the person should define the permissible scope of an investigative detention of the person's luggage on less than probable cause."[386] Under this standard, the Court found in Place that the 90-minute detention of respondent's luggage, suspected of containing narcotics, was sufficient to render the seizure unreasonable.[387]

[G154] Protective Frisks and Searches. Terry further held that, "[w]hen an officer is justified in believing that the individual whose suspicious behavior he is investigating at close range is armed and presently dangerous to the officer or to others," the officer may conduct a patdown search to determine whether the person is in fact carrying a weapon.[388]

---

[386] United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 708–09, n.8 (1983).

[387] Id. at 709–10. Moreover, in assessing the effect of the length of the detention, the Court noted that the police knew of respondent's arrival time for several hours beforehand; hence, the police could have arranged for a trained narcotics dog in advance and thus avoided the necessity of holding respondent's luggage for 90 minutes. Furthermore, the violation was exacerbated by the failure of the agents to accurately inform respondent of the place to which they were transporting his luggage, of the length of time he might be dispossessed, and of what arrangements would be made for return of the luggage if the investigation dispelled the suspicion.

In Van Leeuwen, the defendant had voluntarily relinquished two packages of coins to the postal authorities. Several facts aroused the suspicion of the postal officials, who detained the packages, without searching them, for about 29 hours while certain lines of inquiry were pursued. The information obtained during this time was sufficient to give the authorities probable cause to believe that the packages contained counterfeit coins. After obtaining a warrant, the authorities opened the packages, found counterfeit coins therein, resealed the packages, and sent them on their way. Expressly limiting its holding to the facts of the case, the Court concluded that the 29-hour detention of the packages on reasonable suspicion that they contained contraband did not violate the Fourth Amendment. See United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U.S. 249, 251–53 (1970). This was not a difficult case, because the defendant was unable to show that the invasion intruded upon either a privacy interest in the contents of the packages or a possessory interest in the packages themselves. See United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 705, n.6 (1983).

[388] Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 24 (1968). There, a Cleveland detective, in a neighborhood that he had been patrolling for many years, observed two strangers on a street corner. He saw them proceed alternately back and forth along an identical route, pausing to stare in the same store window, which they did for a total of about 24 times. Each completion of the route was followed by a conference between the two on a corner, at one of which they were joined by a third man (Katz) who left swiftly. Suspecting the two men of "casing a job, a stick-up," the officer followed them and saw them rejoin the third man a couple of blocks away in front of a store. The officer approached the three, identified himself as a policeman, and asked their names. The men "mumbled something," whereupon the officer spun petitioner around, patted down his outside clothing, and found a pistol in his overcoat pocket. Terry was convicted of carrying concealed weapons. The Court found that the officer had performed a legitimate function of investigating suspicious conduct, and that the officer's protective seizure of petitioner and the limited search that he had made were reasonable, both at their inception and as conducted. Consequently, the Court upheld the conviction.

"The purpose of this limited search is not to discover evidence of crime, but to allow the officer to pursue his investigation without fear of violence."[389] "Rather, a protective search—permitted without a warrant and on the basis of reasonable suspicion less than probable cause—must be strictly 'limited to that which is necessary for the discovery of weapons which might be used to harm the officer or others nearby.' . . . If the protective search goes beyond what is necessary to determine if the suspect is armed, it is no longer valid under Terry and its fruits will be suppressed."[390] However, tactile discoveries of other contraband may be made in the course of a Terry search. "If a police officer lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object whose contour or mass makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons; if the object is contraband, its warrantless seizure is justified by the same practical considerations that inhere in the plain view context."[391]

[G155] Although Terry involved the stop and subsequent patdown search for weapons of a person suspected of criminal activity, it did not restrict the preventive search to the person of the detained suspect. "[P]rotection of police and others can justify protective searches when police have a reasonable belief that the suspect poses a danger. . . . [R]oadside encounters between police and suspects are especially hazardous, and danger may arise from the possible presence of weapons in the area surrounding a suspect. [Thus,] . . . the search of the passenger compartment of an automobile, limited to those areas in which a weapon may be placed or hidden, is permissible if the police officer possesses a reasonable belief based on 'specific and articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant' the officer to believe that the suspect is dangerous and the suspect may gain immediate control of weapons. . . . If, while conducting a legitimate Terry search of an automobile's interior, the officer . . . [discovers] contraband other than weapons," he may seize them, under the "plain view" doctrine.[392]

iii. Fingerprinting

[G156] Detentions for the sole purpose of obtaining fingerprints are subject to the constraints of the Fourth Amendment; hence, fingerprints obtained during the brief

---

[389] Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 146 (1972).

[390] Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 65–66 (1968).

[391] Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375–76 (1993) (emphasis added). There, the officer never thought that the lump that he felt in respondent's jacket was a weapon, but he did not immediately recognize it as cocaine. Rather, he determined that it was contraband only after he squeezed, slid, and otherwise manipulated the pocket's contents. As the Court held, while Terry entitled the officer to place his hands on respondent's jacket and to feel the lump in the pocket, his continued exploration of the pocket, after he concluded that it contained no weapon, was unrelated to the sole justification for the search under Terry. Because this further search was constitutionally invalid, the seizure of the cocaine that followed was likewise unconstitutional. Id. at 377–79.

[392] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049–50 (1983). In that case, police approached a man who had driven his car into a ditch and who appeared to be under the influence of some intoxicant. As the man moved to re-enter the car from the roadside, police spotted a knife on the floorboard. The officers stopped the man, subjected him to a patdown search, and then inspected the interior of the vehicle for other weapons. During the search of the passenger compartment, the police discovered an open pouch containing marijuana and seized it. The Court upheld the validity of the search and seizure under Terry and the "plain view" doctrine.

detention of persons seized in a police dragnet procedure, without probable cause, are inadmissible in evidence. "It is arguable, however, that, because of the unique nature of the fingerprinting process, detentions for obtaining fingerprints might, under narrowly defined circumstances, be found to comply with the Fourth Amendment even though there is no probable cause. . . . Detention for fingerprinting may constitute a much less serious intrusion upon personal security than other types of police searches and detentions. Fingerprinting involves none of the probing into an individual's private life and thoughts that marks an interrogation or search. Nor can fingerprint detention be employed repeatedly to harass any individual, since the police need only one set of each person's prints. Furthermore, fingerprinting is an inherently more reliable and effective crime-solving tool than eyewitness identifications or confessions, and is not subject to such abuses as the improper line-up. Finally, because there is no danger of destruction of fingerprints, the limited detention need not come unexpectedly or at an inconvenient time. For this same reason, the general requirement that the authorization of a judicial officer be obtained in advance of detention would seem not to admit of any exception in the fingerprinting context."[393]

iv. Hot Pursuit[394]

[G157] "The Fourth Amendment does not require police officers to delay in the course of an investigation, if to do so might result in destruction of evidence or would gravely endanger their lives or the lives of others." In Hayden, the Court recognized the right of police, who had probable cause to believe that an armed robber had entered a house a few minutes before, to make a warrantless entry to arrest the robber and to search for weapons.[395]

---

[393] Davis v. Mississipi, 394 U.S. 721, 727–28 (1969). The Court had no occasion, in this case, to determine whether the requirements of the Fourth Amendment could be met by narrowly circumscribed procedures for obtaining, during the course of a criminal investigation, the fingerprints of individuals for whom there is no probable cause to arrest. For it was clear that no attempt had been made there to employ procedures that might comply with the requirements of the Fourth Amendment: the detention at police headquarters of petitioner and other young African-Americans had not been authorized by a judicial officer; petitioner had been unnecessarily required to undergo two fingerprinting sessions, and he had also been subjected to interrogation. See also Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 817 (1985), where the Court stated that "there is . . . support in our cases for the view that the Fourth Amendment would permit seizures for the purpose of fingerprinting, if there is reasonable suspicion that the suspect has committed a criminal act, if there is a reasonable basis for believing that fingerprinting will establish or negate the suspect's connection with that crime, and if the procedure is carried out with dispatch. . . . Of course, neither reasonable suspicion nor probable cause would suffice to permit the officers to make a warrantless entry into a person's house for the purpose of obtaining fingerprint identification. . . . We also do not abandon the suggestion . . . that, under circumscribed procedures, the Fourth Amendment might permit the judiciary to authorize the seizure of a person on less than probable cause and his removal to the police station for the purpose of fingerprinting."

[394] "Hot pursuit" means some sort of a chase, but it need not be an extended hue and cry "in and about the public streets." See United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 43 (1976).

[395] Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 298–99 (1967). Warden was based upon the "exigencies of the situation" and did not use the term "hot pursuit" or even involve a "hot pursuit" in the sense that that term would normally be understood. That phrase first appears in Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 16 n.7 (1948), where it was recognized that some element of a chase will usually be involved in a "hot pursuit" case.

[G158] Santana was suspected of having in her possession marked money used to make a heroin "buy" arranged by an undercover agent. Police officers went to Santana's house, where she was standing in the doorway, holding a paper bag, but, as the officers approached, she retreated into the vestibule of her house, where they caught her. By retreating into a private place, the Court held, Santana could not "defeat an arrest that ha[d] been set in motion in a public place." Since there was a need to act quickly to prevent destruction of evidence, there was a true "hot pursuit," and thus a warrantless entry to make the arrest was justified.[396]

[G159] In Welsh, the Court found that petitioner's warrantless arrest in the privacy of his own bedroom for a non-jailable traffic offense could not be justified on the basis of the "hot pursuit" doctrine, because there was no immediate or continuous pursuit of the petitioner from the scene of a crime. Nor could the arrest be justified as necessary to preserve evidence of petitioner's blood alcohol level, given the fact that the state had chosen to classify the offense for driving while intoxicated as a non-criminal, civil forfeiture offense for which no imprisonment was possible.[397]

v. Search Incident to Lawful Arrest

[G160] Under Chimel, "[w]hen an arrest is made, it is reasonable for the arresting officer to search the person arrested in order to remove any weapons that the latter might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape. Otherwise, the officer's safety might well be endangered, and the arrest itself frustrated. In addition, it is entirely reasonable for the arresting officer to search for and seize any evidence on the arrestee's person in order to prevent its concealment or destruction. And the area into which an arrestee might reach in order to gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence must be governed by a like rule."[398] Therefore, the police cannot conduct a full-blown search of a suspect's house simply because the police had arrested him at home. However, drawers within the arrestee's reach can be searched because of the danger their contents might pose to the police.[399]

[G161] Moreover, as an incident to a valid arrest, the officers can, "as a precautionary matter and without probable cause or reasonable suspicion, look in closets and other spaces immediately adjoining the place of arrest from which an attack could be immediately launched. Beyond that, however, . . . there must be articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene. . . . [S]uch a protective sweep, . . . if justified by the circumstances, is nevertheless not a full search of the premises, but may extend only to a cursory inspection of those spaces where a person may be found. The sweep lasts no longer than is necessary to dispel the reasonable suspicion of danger and in any event no longer than it takes to complete the arrest and depart the premises."[400]

[G162] "A police officer's determination as to how and where to search the person of a suspect whom he has arrested is necessarily a quick ad hoc judgment which the Fourth Amendment does not require to be broken down in each instance into an analysis of

---

396 United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 43 (1976).

397 Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 753–54 (1984).

398 Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 762–63 (1969).

399 Id. at 763.

400 Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 334–36 (1990).

each step in the search."[401] "The potential dangers lurking in all custodial arrests make warrantless searches of items within the 'immediate control' area reasonable without requiring the arresting officer to calculate the probability that weapons or destructible evidence may be involved."[402] The Court has rejected the suggestion that "there must be litigated in each case the issue of whether or not there was present one of the reasons supporting the authority for a search incident to a lawful arrest. . . . The authority to search incident to a lawful custodial arrest, while based upon the need to disarm and to discover evidence, does not depend on what a court may later decide was the probability in a particular arrest situation that weapons or evidence would, in fact, be found upon the person of the suspect [or in the area within his immediate control]. A custodial arrest of a suspect based on probable cause is a reasonable intrusion under the Fourth Amendment; that intrusion being lawful, a search incident to the arrest requires no additional justification."[403]

[G163] "[A]rticles inside the relatively narrow compass of the passenger compartment of an automobile are . . . generally, even if not inevitably, within 'the area into which an arrestee might reach in order to grab a weapon or evidentiary item.' . . . Accordingly, . . . when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search the passenger compartment of that automobile. . . . [T]he police may also examine the contents of any open or closed containers found within the passenger compartment, for if the passenger compartment is within reach of the arrestee, so also will containers in it be within his reach."[404] These rules are not limited to situations where the officer makes contact with the occupant while the occupant is inside the vehicle, but they also apply "when the officer first makes contact with the arrestee after the latter has stepped out of his vehicle."[405]

---

[401] United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218, 235 (1973).

[402] United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 14–15 (1977).

[403] United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218, 235 (1973). See also New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 459, 461 (1981). It is of no constitutional significance that police regulations do not establish the conditions under which a full-scale body search of an arrestee should be conducted, nor is it relevant that the arresting officer had no subjective fear of the arrestee or suspicion that he was armed. See Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260, 264–66 (1973).

[404] New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 460 (1981).

[405] Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615, 617 (2004). As the Court noted, "the span of the area generally within the arrestee's immediate control is [not] determined by whether the arrestee exited the vehicle at the officer's direction, or whether the officer initiated contact with him while he was in the car. . . . In all relevant aspects, the arrest of a suspect who is next to a vehicle presents identical concerns regarding officer safety and evidence destruction as one who is inside." Id. at 620–21. The Court rejected a "contact initiation" rule, under which officers, who decide that it may be safer and more effective to conceal their presence until a suspect has left his car, "would be unable to search the passenger compartment in the event of a custodial arrest, potentially compromising their safety and placing incriminating evidence at risk of concealment or destruction. The Fourth Amendment does not require such a gamble. . . . Belton allows police to search a car's passenger compartment incident to a lawful arrest of both 'occupants and 'recent occupants.' . . . [W]hile an arrestee's status as a 'recent occupant' may turn on his temporal or spatial relationship to the car at the time of the arrest and search, it certainly does not turn on whether he was inside or outside the car when the officer first initiated contact with him. [Although] not all contraband in the passenger compartment is likely to be accessible to a 'recent occupant, . . . the need for a clear rule, readily understood by police and [G164] Once an accused is under arrest and in custody, then a search made at another place, without a warrant, is simply not incident to the arrest.[406] Warrantless searches of luggage or other property seized at the time of an arrest cannot be justified as incident to that arrest, if the "search is remote in time or place from the arrest."[407] However, "once the accused is lawfully arrested and is in custody, the effects in his possession at the place of detention that were subject to search at the time and place of his arrest may lawfully be searched and seized without a warrant, even though a substantial period of time has elapsed between the arrest and subsequent administrative processing, on the one hand, and the taking of the property for use as evidence, on the other. This is true where the clothing or effects are immediately seized upon arrival at the jail, held under the defendant's name in the 'property room' of the jail, and at a later time searched and taken for use at the subsequent criminal trial. The result is the same where the property is not physically taken from the defendant until sometime after his incarceration."[408] In the same context, the Court has held that "it is not 'unreasonable' for police, as part of the routine procedure incident to incarcerating an arrested person, to search any container or article in his possession, in accordance with established inventory procedures."[409]

[G165] A reasoning that justifies an arrest by a search, and at the same time the search by the arrest, cannot be sustained;[410] "an incident search may not precede an arrest and serve as part of its justification."[411] However, where the police clearly have probable cause to place an individual under arrest, but his "formal arrest follow[s] quickly on the heels of the search of [his] person, . . . it is [not] particularly important that the search precede[s] the arrest, rather than vice versa."[412] Similarly a suspect of murder, detained upon probable cause at the station house, without being formally arrested, can be subjected to the "very limited search necessary to preserve the highly evanescent evidence that [may be] found under his fingernails," which he has taken immediate steps to destroy.[413]

vi. The "Plain View" Doctrine

[G166] Under the "plain view" doctrine, "if police are lawfully in a position from which they view an object, if its incriminating character is immediately apparent, and if the officers have a lawful right of access to the object, they may seize it without a warrant."[414] not depending on differing estimates of what items were or were not within an arrestee's reach at any particular moment, justifies the sort of generalization which Belton enunciated." Id. at 621–23.

---

406 Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364, 367 (1964).

407 United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 15 (1977). There, the Court held that a search conducted more than an hour after federal agents had gained exclusive control of a container and long after the suspects had been in custody could not be viewed as incidental to the arrest.

408 United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800, 807–08 (1974).

409 Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 648 (1983).

410 Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 16–17 (1948).

411 Smith v. Ohio, 494 U.S. 541, 543 (1990) (per curiam), quoting Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 63 (1968).

412 Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 111 (1980).

413 Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291, 296 (1973).

414 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993), citing Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 136–37 (1990). The doctrine can legitimate action beyond that scope of the primary search or seizure. See Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 325–26 (1987). Moreover, it applies even if the discovery of the evidence was not inadvertent. See Horton v. California, supra, at 136–41.

If, however, the police lack probable cause to believe that an object in plain view is contraband, without conducting some further search of the object, the plain view doctrine cannot justify its seizure or search.[415]

[G167] The rationale of this doctrine is that, "if contraband is left in open view and is observed by a police officer from a lawful vantage point, there has been no invasion of a legitimate expectation of privacy, and thus no 'search' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment—or at least no search independent of the initial intrusion that gave the officers their vantage point."[416] "The warrantless seizure of contraband that presents itself in this manner is deemed justified by the realization that resort to a neutral magistrate under such circumstances would often be impracticable, and would do little to promote the objectives of the Fourth Amendment."[417]

[G168] "The same can be said of tactile discoveries of contraband. If a police officer lawfully pats down a suspect's outer clothing and feels an object whose contour or mass makes its identity immediately apparent, there has been no invasion of the suspect's privacy beyond that already authorized by the officer's search for weapons; if the object is contraband, its warrantless seizure would be justified by the same practical considerations that inhere in the plain view context."[418]

vii. Technological Surveillance

[G169] Electronic surveillance that constitutes Fourth Amendment "search" is subject to the usual requirement of advance authorization by a magistrate, upon a showing of probable cause.[419] The warrant authorizing a wiretap must, inter alia, specify the offenses that justify the intrusion, describe "with particularity" the communications or conversations sought to be seized and order the termination of the eavesdrop once the conversation sought is seized.[420] By contrast, a bugging order need not include a specific authorization to enter, covertly, the premises described in the order.[421]

[G170] The Fourth Amendment equally requires prior judicial approval for domestic security surveillances. Nevertheless, this type of search "may involve different policy and practical considerations from the surveillance of 'ordinary crime.' The gathering of security intelligence is often long range and involves the interrelation of various sources and types of information. The exact targets of such surveillance may be more difficult to identify. . . . Often, too, the emphasis of domestic intelligence gathering is on the prevention of unlawful activity or the enhancement of the Government's preparedness for some possible future crisis or emergency. Thus, the focus of domestic surveillance may be less precise than that directed against more conventional types of crime."[422]

---

415 Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 326–28 (1987).

416 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993), citing Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765, 771 (1983).

417 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993), citing Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 326–27 (1987) and Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 467–70 (1971).

418 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375–76 (1993).

419 Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 358 (1967).

420 Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41, 56, 59–60 (1967).

421 Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 254–59 (1979).

422 United States v. United States Dist. Court for the E. Dist. of Michigan, 407 U.S. 297, 321–22 (1972).

viii. Drug and Alcohol Testing

[G171] In Schmerber, the Court held that a state could direct that a blood sample be withdrawn from a motorist suspected of driving while intoxicated. Schmerber was hospitalized following an accident involving an automobile that he had apparently been driving. A police officer, who smelled liquor on petitioner's breath and noticed other symptoms of drunkenness at the accident scene and at the hospital, placed him under arrest. At the officer's direction, a physician took a blood sample from petitioner despite his refusal to consent thereto. A report of the chemical analysis of the blood indicated intoxication. The Court found that the attempt to secure evidence of blood alcohol content in this case was an appropriate incident to petitioner's arrest, considering that the percentage of alcohol in the blood begins to diminish shortly after drinking stops and, therefore, the officer might reasonably have believed that the delay necessary to obtain a warrant threatened the destruction of evidence. Moreover, the test chosen to measure Schmerber's blood alcohol level was a reasonable one. The intrusion occasioned by a blood test is not significant, since such tests "are a commonplace in these days of periodic physical examinations, and experience with them teaches that the quantity of blood extracted is minimal, and that, for most people, the procedure involves virtually no risk, trauma, or pain." And the test was performed in a reasonable manner, as the motorist's blood was taken by a physician in a hospital environment according to accepted medical practices.[423]

[G172] "The possession of unlawful drugs is a criminal offense that the Government may punish, but it is a separate and far more dangerous wrong to perform certain sensitive tasks while under the influence of those substances."[424] Skinner concerned Federal Railroad Administration (FRA) regulations that required blood and urine tests of rail employees involved in train accidents; the regulations also authorized railroads to administer breath and urine tests to employees who violated certain safety rules. The FRA adopted the drug testing program in response to evidence of drug and alcohol abuse by some railroad employees, the obvious safety hazards posed by such abuse, and the documented link between drug- and alcohol-impaired employees and the incidence of train accidents. Recognizing that the urine analysis tests, most conspicuously, raised evident privacy concerns, the Court noted two off-setting considerations. First, the regulations reduced the intrusiveness of the collection process: the sample was collected in a medical environment, by personnel unrelated to the railroad employer, without the direct observation of a monitor. Second, and more important, railway employees, by reason of their participation in an industry that is regulated pervasively to ensure safety, had diminished expectations of privacy. Surpassing safety interests, the Court concluded, warranted the FRA testing program. The drug tests could deter illegal drug use by railroad employees, workers positioned to cause great human loss before any signs of impairment become noticeable to supervisors. The program also helped railroads to obtain invaluable information about the causes of major train accidents. Testing without a showing of individualized suspicion was essential, the Court explained, if these vital interests were to be served. Employees could not forecast the timing of an accident or a safety violation, events that would trigger testing. The employee's inability to avoid detection simply by staying drug-free at a prescribed test time significantly enhanced the deterrent effect of the program. Furthermore, imposing an individualized suspicion

---

423 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 770–72 (1966).

424 Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 633 (1989).

requirement for a drug test in the chaotic aftermath of a train accident would seriously impede an employer's ability to discern the cause of the accident; indeed, waiting until suspect individuals could be identified likely would result in the loss or deterioration of the evidence furnished by the tests.[425]

[G173] In Von Raab, the Court sustained a U.S. Customs Service program that made drug tests a condition of promotion or transfer to positions directly involving drug interdiction or requiring the employee to carry a firearm. The regime was developed for an agency with an almost unique mission, as the "first line of defense" against the smuggling of illicit drugs into the United States. "Work directly involving drug interdiction and posts that require the employee to carry a firearm pose grave safety threats to employees who hold those positions, and also expose them to large amounts of illegal narcotics and to persons engaged in crime; illicit drug users in such high-risk positions might be unsympathetic to the Service's mission, tempted by bribes, or even threatened with blackmail."[426] Furthermore, "the public should not bear the risk that employees who may suffer from impaired perception and judgment will be promoted to positions where they may need to employ deadly force."[427] Thus, the government has a compelling interest in assuring that employees placed in these positions would not include drug users. Individualized suspicion would not work in this setting, because it is "not feasible to subject these employees and their work product to the kind of day-to-day scrutiny that is the norm in more traditional office environments."[428] And while the Service's regime was not prompted by a demonstrated drug abuse problem, the need to prevent its occurrence furnished an ample justification for reasonable searches calculated to advance the government's goal.[429] The Court also held that employees who sought promotions to positions where they would handle sensitive information could be required to submit to a urine test under the Service's screening program, especially if the positions covered under this category required background investigations, medical examinations, or other intrusions that might be expected to diminish their expectations of privacy in respect of a urinalysis test.[430]

---

[425] Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n, 489 U.S. 602, 618–34 (1989). The Court rejected the court of appeal's conclusion that the regulations were unreasonable, because the tests in question could not measure current impairment. Even if urine test results disclosed nothing more specific than the recent use of controlled substances, this information would provide the basis for a further investigation, and might allow the FRA to reach an informed judgment as to how the particular accident occurred. More importantly, the regulations were designed not only to discern impairment, but to deter it. Id. at 631–32.

[426] See Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305, 316 (1997), referring to Nat'l Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656, 668–71 (1989).

[427] Nat'l Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656, 670–71 (1989).

[428] Id. at 674.

[429] Id. at 674–75. The Court rejected the argument that the Service's testing program was ineffective because employees might attempt to deceive the test by a brief abstention before the test date. First, "addicts may be unable to abstain even for a limited period of time, or may be unaware of the 'fade-away effect' of certain drugs. . . . More importantly, a particular employee's pattern of elimination for a given drug cannot be predicted with perfect accuracy, and, in any event, this information is not likely to be known or available to the employee." Id. at 676.

[430] Id. at 677. The Service's program also required tests for individuals promoted or transferred to positions in which they would handle "classified" material. However, the Court did not rule on this aspect of the program, because the record did not clarify whether the category

[G174] In Chandler, the Court upset Georgia's requirement that candidates for state office pass a drug test. The state's defense of the statute rested primarily on the incompatibility of unlawful drug use with holding high state office. However, Georgia's testing prescription, the record showed, responded to "no concrete danger," was supported by no evidence of a particular problem, and targeted a group not involved in "high-risk, safety-sensitive tasks." The Court stressed that "[a] demonstrated problem of drug abuse, while not in all cases necessary to the validity of a testing regime, . . . would shore up an assertion of special need for a suspicionless general search program. Proof of unlawful drug use may help to clarify—and to substantiate—the precise hazards posed by such use."[431] Moreover, candidates for public office "are subject to relentless scrutiny—by their peers, the public, and the press. Their day-to-day conduct attracts attention notably beyond the norm in ordinary work environments." From this aspect, there was a critical difference between Von Raab and Georgia's candidate drug testing program. In addition, Georgia's certification requirement was not well designed to identify candidates who violated anti-drug laws, and it was not a credible means to deter illicit drug users from seeking state office. The test date was selected by the candidate, and, thus, all but the prohibitively addicted could abstain for a pre-test period sufficient to avoid detection. And the Court was offered no reason why ordinary law enforcement methods would not suffice to apprehend those unable so to abstain, should they appear in the limelight of a public stage.[432]

[G175] Ferguson concerned a city policy, developed by representatives of the municipal hospital, police, and local officials, which set forth procedures for identifying and testing pregnant patients suspected of drug use; required that a chain of custody be followed when obtaining and testing patients' urine samples, presumably to make sure that the results could be used in subsequent criminal proceedings; provided for education and treatment referral for patients testing positive; contained police procedures and criteria for arresting patients who tested positive; and prescribed prosecutions for drug offenses and/or child neglect, depending on the stage of the defendant's pregnancy. The document codifying the policy incorporated the police's operational guidelines and devoted its attention to the chain of custody, the range of possible criminal charges, and the logistics of police notification and arrests. Moreover, throughout the development and application of the policy, the city prosecutors and police were extensively involved in the day-to-day administration of the policy. Thus, the Court found it clear from the record that an initial and continuing focus of the policy was on the arrest and prosecution of drug-abusing mothers. "While the ultimate goal of the program [might] well have been to get the women in question into substance abuse treatment and off of drugs, the immediate objective of the searches was to generate evidence for law enforcement purposes in order to reach that goal. . . . Given the primary purpose of the . . . program, which was to use the threat of arrest and prosecution in order to force women into treatment, and given the extensive involvement of law enforcement officials at every stage of the policy, this case simply [did] not fit within the closely guarded category of 'special needs'" that may justify the absence of a warrant or individualized suspicion.[433] defined by the regulation encompassed only those Customs employees likely to gain access to sensitive information. Id. at 678.

---

[431] Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305, 319 (1997).

[432] Id. at 319–22.

[433] Ferguson v. City of Charleston, 532 U.S. 67, 82–84 (2001).

[G176] Finally, the Court has sustained drug tests for school students participating in interscholastic sports.[434]

ix. Administrative Inspections[435]

[G177] Government inspectors cannot generally make warrantless non-consensual entries into premises not open to the public. In Camara and See, the Court held that a warrant was required to effect an unconsented administrative entry into and inspection of private dwellings or commercial premises to ascertain health or safety conditions. To protect the privacy interests of building owners from the unbridled discretion of municipal inspectors, the Court held that administrative searches had to be conducted pursuant to an "area" warrant. The Court emphasized that the practical effect of the then-existing warrantless search procedures had been "to leave the occupant subject to the discretion of the official in the field," since "when [an] inspector demand[ed] entry, the occupant ha[d] no way of knowing whether enforcement of the municipal code involved require[d] inspection of his premises, no way of knowing the lawful limits of the inspector's power to search, and no way of knowing whether the inspector himself [wa]s acting under proper authorization."[436] However, in light of the important public interest in abating public health hazards, the relatively limited invasion of privacy inhering in administrative searches, and the essentially non-criminal focus of the inspection, probable cause to issue this kind of warrant does not sound, in terms of suspicion of criminal activity, but in terms of reasonable legislative or administrative standards governing the decision to search a particular building.[437]

[G178] Nevertheless, "where the privacy interests of the owner are weakened and the government interests in regulating particular businesses are concomitantly heightened, a warrantless inspection of commercial premises may well be reasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. This warrantless inspection, . . . even in the context of a pervasively regulated business, will be deemed to be reasonable only so long as three criteria are met. First, there must be a 'substantial' government interest that informs the regulatory scheme pursuant to which the inspection is made, . . . [such as the government interest in improving the health and safety conditions in the country's underground and surface mines.] Second, the warrantless inspections must be 'necessary to further the regulatory scheme;' . . . For example, [the Court has] recognized that forcing mine inspectors to obtain a warrant before every inspection might alert mine owners or operators to the impending inspection, thereby frustrating the purposes of the Mine Safety and Health Act—to detect and thus to deter safety and health violations. . . . Finally, 'the statute's inspection program, in terms of the certainty and regularity of its application, must provide a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.' . . . In other words, the regulatory statute must perform the two basic functions of a warrant: it must advise the owner of the commercial premises that the search

---

[434] Bd. of Educ. of Indep. Sch. Dist. No 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002). See, in extenso, para. G135.

[435] See also para. G127, regarding the inspection of a vessel's manifest and other documents, and paras. G102 et seq., regarding inspections of fire-damaged buildings. An administrative inspection is the inspection of premises conducted by authorities responsible for enforcing a pervasive regulatory scheme. See Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 811, n.2 (1996).

[436] Camara v. Mun. Court of the City & County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523, 532 (1967).

[437] Id. at 535–40; See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541 (1967). Camara overruled Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360 (1959).

is being made pursuant to the law and has a properly defined scope, and it must limit the discretion of the inspecting officers. . . . To perform this first function, the statute must be 'sufficiently comprehensive and defined that the owner of commercial property cannot help but be aware that his property will be subject to periodic inspections undertaken for specific purposes.' . . . [And] in defining how a statute limits the discretion of the inspectors, [the Court has] observed that it must be 'carefully limited in time, place, and scope.'"[438]

[G179] Furthermore, it has been made clear that a state can address a major social problem both by way of an administrative scheme and through penal sanctions. In Burger, the Court relied on the "plain administrative purposes" of the scheme to reject the contention that the statute was in fact "designed to gather evidence to enable convictions under the penal laws." The discovery of evidence of other violations would have been merely incidental to the purposes of the administrative search. And there was no constitutional significance in the fact that police officers, rather than "administrative" agents, are permitted to conduct administrative inspections. "So long as a regulatory scheme is properly administrative, it is not rendered illegal by the fact that the inspecting officer has the power to arrest individuals for violations other than those created by the scheme itself."[439]

[G180] In Colonnade Catering, the Court recognized the reasonableness of a statutory authorization to inspect the premises of a caterer dealing in alcoholic beverages, noting that Congress has broad power to design such powers of inspection under the liquor laws as it deems necessary to meet the evils at hand.[440]

[G181] Biswell sustained the authority to conduct warrantless searches of firearm dealers under the Gun Control Act of 1968. Federal regulation of the inter-state traffic in firearms is not as deeply rooted in history as is governmental control of the liquor industry, but close scrutiny of this traffic is undeniably an "urgent federal interest." When a dealer chooses to engage in this pervasively regulated business and to accept a federal license, he does so with the knowledge that his business records, firearms, and ammunition will be subject to "effective inspection." Moreover, "if inspection is to be effective and serve as a credible deterrent, unannounced, even frequent, inspections are essential. In this context, the prerequisite of a warrant could easily frustrate inspection; and if the necessary flexibility as to time, scope, and frequency is to be preserved, the protections afforded by a warrant would be negligible."[441]

[G182] In Barlow's, Inc., the Court declared unconstitutional the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, which authorized inspectors to enter an employer's premises without a warrant to conduct inspections of work areas. That statute imposed health and safety standards on all businesses engaged in or affecting inter-state commerce that had employees, and it authorized representatives of the Secretary of Labor to conduct inspections to ensure compliance with the Act. However, the Act failed "to tailor the scope and frequency of such administrative inspections to the particular health and safety concerns posed by the numerous and varied businesses regulated by the statute. Instead, the Act flatly authorize[d] administrative inspections of 'any fac-

438 New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 702–03 (1987).

439 Id. at 715–17.

440 Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States, 397 U.S. 72, 76–77 (1970).

441 United States v. Biswell, 406 U.S. 311, 315–17 (1972).

tory, plant, establishment, construction site, or other area, workplace, or environment where work was performed by an employee of an employer,' and empowered inspectors conducting such searches to investigate 'any such place of employment and all pertinent conditions, structures, machines, apparatus, devices, equipment, and materials therein, and to question privately any such employer, owner, operator, agent, or employee.' . . . Similarly, the Act [did] not provide any standards to guide inspectors either in their selection of establishments to be searched or in the exercise of their authority to search. The statute instead simply provide[d] that such searches should be performed 'at reasonable times, and within reasonable limits and in a reasonable manner.' In assessing this regulatory scheme, th[e] Court found that the provisions authorizing administrative searches 'devolve[d] almost unbridled discretion upon executive and administrative officers, particularly those in the field, as to when to search and whom to search.' . . . Accordingly, [the Court] concluded that a warrant was constitutionally required to assure a non-consenting owner, who might have little real expectation that his business would be subject to inspection, that the contemplated search was 'authorized by statute, and . . . pursuant to an administrative plan containing specific neutral criteria.' However, [the Court] expressly limited its holding to the inspection provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, noting that the 'reasonableness of a warrantless search . . . will depend upon the specific enforcement needs and privacy guarantees of each statute and that some statutes apply only to a single industry, where regulations might already be so pervasive that a Colonnade-Biswell exception to the warrant requirement could apply.'"[442]

[G183] Indeed, in Dewey, the Court held that warrantless, unannounced inspections of underground and surface mines, pursuant to Federal Mine Safety and Health Act of 1977, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. First, there is a substantial federal interest in improving the health and safety conditions in the country's underground and surface mines. Second, a warrant requirement clearly might impede the specific enforcement needs of the Act at issue. This Act mandated inspection of all mines, defined the frequency of inspection (at least twice annually for surface mines, four times annually for underground mines, and irregular six-, ten-, or 16-day intervals for mines that generated explosive gases), mandated follow-up inspections where violations had been found, and immediate inspection upon notification by a miner or miner's representative that a dangerous condition existed, required compliance with elaborate standards set forth in the Act, and required individual notification to mine operators of all standards proposed pursuant to the Act. Under these circumstances, the Court found it difficult to see what additional protection a warrant requirement would provide. The Act itself clearly notified the operator that inspections would be performed on a regular basis. Moreover, the Act and the regulations issued pursuant to it informed the operator of what health and safety standards should be met in order to be in compliance with the statute. The discretion of government officials to determine what facilities to search and what violations to search for was thus directly curtailed by the regulatory scheme. Finally, the Act provided a specific mechanism for accommodating any special privacy concerns that a specific mine operator might have. The Act prohibited forcible entries, and it instead required the Secretary of Labor, when refused entry onto a mining facility, to file a civil action in federal court to obtain an injunction against future refusals. This proceeding provided an adequate forum for the mine owner to show that a specific search was outside the federal regulatory authority or to seek from the district court an order accommodating any unusual privacy interests that the mine owner might have.[443]

---

[442] See Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594, 601–02 (1981), discussing Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 321–23 (1978).

[G184] Burger concerned a New York statute authorizing police officers to carry out warrantless administrative inspections of vehicle dismantling businesses, which are part of the junk industry, as well as part of the auto industry. In light of the state regulatory framework governing vehicle dismantlers and the history of regulation of related industries, the Court found that an operator of a junkyard engaging in vehicle dismantling had a reduced expectation of privacy in this "closely regulated" business. The state had a substantial interest in regulating the vehicle dismantling and automobile junkyard industry, because motor vehicle theft had increased in the state and because the problem of theft was associated with this industry. Besides, regulation of the vehicle dismantling industry reasonably served the state's substantial interest in eradicating automobile theft. And a warrant requirement would interfere with the statute's purpose of deterring automobile theft accomplished by identifying vehicles and parts as stolen and shutting down the market in such items. "Because stolen cars and parts often pass quickly through an automobile junkyard, 'frequent' and 'unannounced' inspections are necessary in order to detect them."[444] Moreover, the statute informed the operator of a vehicle dismantling business that inspections would be made on a regular basis. Thus, "the vehicle dismantler [knew] that the inspections to which he [wa]s subject [did] not constitute discretionary acts by a government official, but were conducted pursuant to statute, . . . [which also] notifie[d] the operator as to who [wa]s authorized to conduct an inspection, . . . se[t] forth the scope of the inspection and, accordingly, place[d] the operator on notice as to how to comply with the statute."[445] Under the statute, inspecting officers were allowed to conduct an inspection only during the regular and usual business hours. And the permissible scope of these searches was narrowly defined: the inspectors could examine the records, as well as any vehicles or parts of vehicles that were subject to the record-keeping requirements of the statute and that were on the premises. Finally, the statute did not violate the Fourth Amendment on the ground that it was designed simply to give the police an expedient means of enforcing penal sanctions for possession of stolen property. The Court noted that the statute was designed to contribute to the regulatory goals of ensuring that vehicle dismantlers were legitimate businesspersons, and that stolen vehicles and vehicle parts passing through automobile junkyards could be identified. Nor was the administrative scheme unconstitutional simply because, in the course of enforcing it, an inspecting officer might discover evidence of crimes, besides violations of the scheme itself. In addition, there was no constitutional significance in the fact that police officers, rather than "administrative" agents, were permitted to conduct the administrative inspection. Moreover, taking into account that many states do not have the resources to assign the enforcement of a particular administrative scheme to a specialized agency, the Court declined to impose upon the states the burden of requiring the enforcement of their regulatory statutes to be carried out by specialized agents rather than police officers.[446]

---

443 Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594, 602–04 (1981).

444 New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 710 (1987).

445 Id. at 711.

446 Id. at 711–18.

x. Caseworkers' Home Visits

[G185] Wyman v. James presented the issue whether respondent, a beneficiary of the program for Aid to Families with Dependent Children, could refuse a periodic home visit by a caseworker without risking the termination of benefits. The emphasis of the program was upon "assistance and rehabilitation" and upon "maximum self-support and personal independence consistent with the maintenance of continuing parental care and protection." Even assuming that the home visit had some of the characteristics of a traditional search,[447] the Court found that the visit was not unreasonable, under the Fourth Amendment, because, inter alia, it served the paramount needs of the dependent child; enabled the state to determine that state funds were being properly used; and provided essential information not obtainable through secondary sources. And the fact that respondent had received advance notice that she would be visited by a welfare caseworker minimized the intrusion on privacy occasioned by the visit.[448]

xi. Inventory Searches

[G186] The policies behind the warrant requirement, and the related concept of probable cause, are not implicated in an inventory search.[449] When vehicles are impounded, police routinely follow caretaking procedures by securing and inventorying the cars' contents. These procedures have been sustained as reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, since they serve three distinct needs: "the protection of the owner's property while it remains in police custody; the protection of the police against claims or disputes over lost or stolen property; and the protection of the police from potential danger."[450] Evidence found during such inventory searches may be lawfully seized, under the "plain view" doctrine.

[G187] Similarly, at the station house, "it is entirely proper for police to remove and list or inventory property found on the person or in the possession of an arrested person who is to be jailed. . . . [Such a procedure] not only deters false claims but also inhibits theft or careless handling of articles taken from the arrested person. Arrested persons have also been known to injure themselves—or others—with belts, knives, drugs, or other items on their person while being detained. Dangerous instrumentalities—such as razor blades, bombs, or weapons—can be concealed in innocent-looking articles taken from the arrestee's possession. The bare recital of these mundane realities justifies reasonable measures by police to limit these risks either while the items are in police possession or at the time they are returned to the arrestee upon his release. Examining all the items removed from the arrestee's person or possession and listing or inventorying them is an entirely reasonable administrative procedure. It is immaterial whether the police actually fear any particular package or container; the need to protect against such risks arises independently of a particular officer's subjective concerns. . . . Finally, inspection of an arrestee's personal property may assist the police in ascertaining or verifying his identity. . . . [Hence,] every consideration of orderly police administration benefiting both police and the public points toward the appropriate-

---

447 See para. G9.

448 Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309, 318–24 (1971).

449 Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 371 (1987).

450 S. Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364, 369 (1976) (inventory search of the glove compartment in an abandoned automobile, impounded by the police).

ness" of an inventory search of the shoulder bag in the possession of an individual being taken into custody.[451]

[G188] "[]The fact that the protection of the public might, in the abstract, have been accomplished by 'less intrusive' means does not, by itself, render [an inventory] search unreasonable." In Cady, the police had a car towed to a garage, because it constituted a hazard on the highway. In upholding the inventory search of the trunk of the car, the Court rejected the contention that the public could equally well have been protected by the posting of a police guard over the automobile.[452]

[G189] There is no merit to the contention that the search of an impounded van is unconstitutional, because departmental regulations give the police discretion to choose between impounding the van and parking and locking it in a public parking place. The exercise of police discretion is not prohibited "so long as that discretion is exercised according to standard criteria and on the basis of something other than suspicion of evidence of criminal activity."[453]

[G190] Police, before inventorying a container, are not required to weigh the strength of the individual's privacy interest in the container against the possibility that the container might serve as a repository for dangerous or valuable items.[454] "[S]tandardized criteria, . . . or established routine, . . . must regulate the opening of containers found during inventory searches. . . . [This view] is based on the principle that an inventory search must not be a ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence. The policy or practice governing inventory searches should be designed to produce an inventory. The individual police officer must not be allowed so much latitude that inventory searches are turned into a purposeful and general means of discovering evidence of crime. . . . But in forbidding uncanalized discretion to police officers conducting inventory searches, there is no reason to insist that they be conducted in a totally mechanical "all or nothing" fashion. . . . A police officer may be allowed sufficient latitude to determine whether a particular container should or should not be opened in light of the nature of the search and characteristics of the container itself. Thus, while policies of opening all containers or of opening no containers are unquestionably permissible, it would be equally permissible, for example, to allow the opening of closed containers whose contents officers determine they are unable to ascertain from examining the containers' exteriors. The allowance of the exercise of judgment based on concerns related to the purposes of an inventory search does not violate the Fourth Amendment."[455]

xii. Consent Searches[456]

[G191] The Court has long approved consensual searches "because it is no doubt reasonable for the police to conduct a search once they have been permitted to do so."[457] It is well settled that "one of the specifically established exceptions to the requirements of both a warrant and probable cause is a search that is conducted pursuant to con-

---

451 Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 646–47 (1983).
452 Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 447 (1973).
453 Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 375 (1987).
454 Id. at 374–75.
455 Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1, 4 (1990).
456 See also para. G227 (consent as "fruit of the poisonous tree").
457 Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 250–51 (1991).

sent."[458] "In situations where the police have some evidence of illicit activity, but lack probable cause to arrest or search, a search authorized by a valid consent may be the only means of obtaining important and reliable evidence."[459] "When a prosecutor seeks to rely upon consent to justify the lawfulness of a search, he has the burden of proving that the consent was, in fact, freely and voluntarily given."[460] The Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments require that "a consent not be coerced, by explicit or implicit means, by implied threat or covert force."[461] "'Consent' that is the product of official intimidation or harassment is not consent at all."[462]

[G192] "[T]he question whether a consent to a search was in fact, 'voluntary' or was the product of duress or coercion, is a question of fact to be determined from the totality of all the circumstances."[463] In this context, "account must be taken of subtly coercive police questions, as well as the possibly vulnerable subjective state of the person who consents. . . . While knowledge of the right to refuse consent is one factor to be taken into consideration, the government need not establish such knowledge as the sine qua non of an effective consent."[464] The Court has specifically rejected the suggestion that police officers must always inform citizens of their right to refuse when seeking permission to conduct a warrantless consent search.[465]

[G193] In Davis, federal agents, enforcing wartime gasoline rationing regulations, arrested a filling station operator and asked to see his rationing coupons. He eventually unlocked a room where the agents discovered the coupons that formed the basis for his conviction. "The public character of the property, the fact that the demand was made during business hours at the place of business where the coupons were required to be kept, the existence of the right to inspect, the nature of the request, the fact that the initial refusal to turn the coupons over was soon followed by acquiescence in the demand—these circumstances all support[ed] the conclusion" that the consent given was not the result of coercion.[466]

[G194] A Drug Enforcement Administration agent asked Mendenhall if she would accompany him to the airport DEA office, and Mendenhall did so. Once in the office, Mendenhall was asked to consent to a search of her person and her handbag and was advised of her right to decline. In a private room, following further assurance from Mendenhall that she consented to the search, a policewoman began the search of [458] Schneckcloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 219 (1973), citing Davis v. United States, 328 U.S. 582, 593–94 (1946) and Zap v. United States, 328 U.S. 624, 630 (1946). The issue of consensual encounters between police and citizens is discussed in paras. G19 et seq.

---

[459] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 227 (1973).

[460] Bumper v. N. Carolina, 391 U.S. 543, 548 (1968).

[461] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 228 (1973).

[462] Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 438 (1991).

[463] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 227 (1973). The fact of custody alone is not enough in itself to demonstrate a coerced consent to search. See United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 424 (1976).

[464] Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 229, 227 (1973).

[465] See Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39–40 (1996) (the Fourth Amendment does not require that a lawfully seized individual be advised that he is "free to go," before his consent to search may be deemed voluntary); United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 206–08 (2002) (a bus passenger need not be informed of his right to withhold permission to search).

[466] Davis v. United States, 328 U.S. 582, 593–94 (1946).

Mendenhall's person by requesting that Mendenhall disrobe. As she began to undress, Mendenhall removed two concealed packages that appeared to contain heroin and handed them to the policewoman. Mendenhall's consent was found valid. First, Mendenhall, who was 22 years old and had an 11th-grade education, was plainly capable of a knowing consent. Second, she was twice expressly told that she was free to decline to consent to the search and only thereafter explicitly consented to it. Moreover, her statement, made when she was told that the search would require the removal of her clothing, that "she had a plane to catch," could be viewed as simply an expression of concern that the search be conducted quickly. She had twice unequivocally indicated her consent to the search, and when assured by the police officer that there would be no problem if nothing were turned up by the search, she began to undress without further comment. And since her presence in the DEA office was voluntary, the fact that she was there was little or no evidence that she was in any way coerced.[467]

[G195] However, there is no valid consent, in case of "mere submission to a claim of lawful authority."[468] In Bumper, a 66-year-old African-American widow, who lived in a house located in a rural area at the end of an isolated mile-long dirt road, allowed four Caucasian law enforcement officials to search her home after they asserted they had a warrant to search the house. The Court held the alleged consent to be invalid, noting that, "[w]hen a law enforcement officer claims authority to search a home under a warrant, he announces, in effect, that the occupant has no right to resist the search."[469] Similarly, a person working at an "adult" bookstore, who is placed under arrest and is aware of the presumed authority of the warrant to search the store, cannot be deemed as complying freely and voluntarily with official requests.[470]

[G196] Even when officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may request consent to search luggage, provided they "do not convey a message that compliance with their requests is required."[471] A police officer, seeking permission to search the luggage of bus passengers, conveys no such message when he does not brandish a weapon or make any intimidating movements, speaks to bus passengers one by one and in a polite, quiet voice, and leaves the aisle free, so passengers can exit from the bus.[472]

[G197] The touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness. "The standard for measuring the scope of a suspect's consent under the Fourth Amendment is that of 'objective' reasonableness—what would the typical reasonable person have understood by the exchange between the officer and the suspect?"[473] In Jimeno, respondent granted a police officer permission to search his car and did not place any explicit limitation on the scope of the search. The officer had informed respondent that he believed respondent was carrying narcotics, and that he would be looking for narcotics in the car. The Court faced the question whether it was reasonable for the officer to consider a sus-

---

467 United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 558–59 (1980).

468 Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497 (1983) (plurality opinion).

469 Bumper v. N. Carolina, 391 U.S. 543, 550 (1968).

470 Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 329 (1979).

471 Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 435 (1991).

472 United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 204–06 (2002). There, the Court also observed that "where the question of voluntariness pervades both the search and seizure inquiries, the respective analyses turn on very similar facts." Id. at 206.

473 Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 251 (1991).

pect's general consent to a search of his car to include consent to examine a paper bag lying on the floor of the car. The Court held that it was objectively reasonable for the police to conclude that the general consent to search respondent's car included consent to search containers within that car that might bear drugs. A reasonable person may be expected to know that narcotics are generally carried in some form of a container. The authorization to search in this case, therefore, extended beyond the surfaces of the car's interior to the paper bag lying on the car's floor. Conversely, it is very likely unreasonable to think that a suspect, by consenting to the search of his trunk, has agreed to the breaking open of a locked briefcase within the trunk.[474]

[G198] "[W]hen the prosecution seeks to justify a warrantless search by proof of voluntary consent, it is not limited to proof that consent was given by the defendant, but may show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that permission to search was obtained from a third party who possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected."[475] "Common authority is, of course, not to be implied from the mere property interest a third party has in the property."[476] A landlord cannot validly consent to the search of a house he had rented to another.[477] "The authority which justifies the third-party consent . . . rests rather on mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes."[478]

[G199] In Stoner, the Court held that the police had improperly entered the defendant's hotel room based on the consent of a hotel clerk, since there was nothing in the record to indicate that the police had any basis whatsoever to believe that the night clerk had been authorized by the petitioner to permit the police to search the petitioner's room. The Court noted that "the rights protected by the Fourth Amendment are not to be eroded by strained applications of the law of agency or by unrealistic doctrines of 'apparent authority.'"[479]

[G200] In Frazier, the Court dismissed the contention that the consent of the petitioner's cousin to the search of a duffel bag, which was being used jointly by both men and had been left in the cousin's home, would not justify the seizure of petitioner's clothing found inside; joint use of the bag rendered the cousin's authority to consent to its search clear. Indeed, the Court was unwilling to engage in the "metaphysical subtleties" raised by Frazier's claim that his cousin only had permission to use one com-

---

[474] Id. at 250–52 (1991). The Court also stressed that there is no basis for adding to the Fourth Amendment's basic test of objective reasonableness a requirement that, if police wish to search closed containers within a car, they must separately request permission to search each container.

[475] United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 (1974). See also id. at 177, n.14.

[476] Id. at 171, n.7.

[477] Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610, 616–17 (1961). The search was held violative of the tenant's Fourth Amendment rights, even though the owner of the house had actual authority to enter the house for some purposes, such as to "view waste." The Court pointed out that the officers' purpose in entering was not to view waste, but to search for distilling equipment, and concluded that to uphold such a search without a warrant would "leave tenants' homes secure only in the discretion of their landlords."

[478] United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 n.7 (1974) (joint occupancy of a bedroom by a man and a woman representing themselves as husband and wife).

[479] Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483, 488 (1964).

partment within the bag. By allowing the cousin the use of the bag, and by leaving it in his house, Frazier was held to have assumed the risk that his cousin would allow someone else to look inside.[480]

[G201] "[I]n order to satisfy the 'reasonableness' requirement of the Fourth Amendment, what is generally demanded of the many factual determinations that must regularly be made by agents of the government . . . is not that they always be correct, but that they always be reasonable."[481] "[S]ufficient probability, not certainty, is the touchstone of reasonableness" under this Amendment.[482] There is "no reason to depart from this general rule with respect to facts bearing upon the authority to consent to a search. . . . Even when a person's invitation to enter premises is accompanied by an explicit assertion that the person lives there, the surrounding circumstances could conceivably be such that a reasonable man would doubt its truth and not act upon it without further inquiry. As with other factual determinations bearing upon search and seizure, determination of consent to enter must be judged against an objective standard: would the facts available to the officer at the moment 'warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief' that the consenting party had authority over the premises? . . . If not, then warrantless entry without further inquiry is unlawful unless authority actually exists. But if so, the search is valid."[483]

3. Effecting a Search or Seizure

a. Executing a Warrant

[G202] Warrants need not "include a specification of the precise manner in which they are to be executed. On the contrary, it is generally left to the discretion of the executing officers to determine the details of how best to proceed with the performance of a search or seizure authorized by warrant—subject, of course, to the general Fourth Amendment protection 'against unreasonable searches and seizures.'"[484]

[G203] But "the Fourth Amendment does require that police actions in execution of a warrant be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion."[485] "[T]he purposes justifying a police search strictly limit the permissible extent of the search."[486] "If the scope of the search exceeds that permitted by the terms of a validly issued warrant, the subsequent seizure is unconstitutional,"[487] provided that the "plain view" doctrine does not come into play.

[G204] "[A]n arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within."[488] And a warrant to search for contraband, founded on probable cause, implies the limited authority "to detain the occupants of the premises

---

480 Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731, 740 (1969).
481 Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 185 (1990).
482 Id. at 185, quoting Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 804 (1971).
483 Id. at 186, 188–89.
484 Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 257 (1979).
485 Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 611 (1999).
486 Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 87 (1987).
487 Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 140 (1990).
488 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 602–03 (1980).

while a proper search is conducted;" "preventing flight in the event that incriminating evidence is found," "minimizing the risk of harm" both to the officers and the occupants, and "orderly completion of the search" are law enforcement interests important enough to justify such a temporary detention.[489] By contrast, a search warrant for a tavern and its bartender does not permit body searches of all the bar's patrons.[490]

b. Traffic Stops

[G205] The Fourth Amendment does not preclude enforcement of minor traffic laws by plainclothes police in unmarked vehicles. "The making of a traffic stop out of uniform does not remotely qualify as an extreme practice, unusually harmful to an individual's privacy interests, and so is governed by the usual rule that probable cause to believe the law has been broken 'outbalances' private interest in avoiding police contact."[491]

[G206] "Keeping the driver of a vehicle in the car during a routine traffic stop is probably the typical police practice. . . . Nonetheless, out of a concern for the safety of the police, the Court has held that officers may, consistent with the Fourth Amendment, exercise their discretion to require a driver who commits a traffic violation to exit the vehicle."[492] In so holding, the Court noted that, since the driver's car has already been validly stopped for a traffic infraction, the additional intrusion of asking him to step outside his car is "de minimis." Moreover, the Court observed that the danger to the officer of standing by the driver's door and in the path of oncoming traffic might also be "appreciable."[493]

[G207] "[T]he same weighty interest in officer safety is present regardless of whether the occupant of the stopped car is a driver, or a passenger. . . . [Indeed, the] danger to an officer from a traffic stop is likely to be greater when there are passengers in addition to the driver in the stopped car. . . . On the personal liberty side of the balance between the public interest and the individual's right to personal security, the case for passengers is stronger than that for the driver, in the sense that there is probable cause to believe that the driver has committed a minor vehicular offense, but there is no such reason to stop or detain passengers. But, as a practical matter, passengers are already stopped by virtue of the stop of the vehicle, so that the additional intrusion upon them is minimal. . . . [Hence,] an officer making a traffic stop may order passengers to get out of the car pending completion of the stop."[494]

---

[489] Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 705, 702–03 (1981). "Inherent in Summers' authorization to detain is the authority to use reasonable force to effectuate the detention." See Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 98–99 (2005), where the Court held that the police officers' use of force in the form of handcuffs to effectuate Mena's detention, as well as the detention of the three other occupants, was reasonable because the governmental interest in minimizing the risk of harm to both officers and occupants, which is at its maximum when, as in this case, a warrant authorizes a search for weapons and a wanted gang member resides on the premises, outweighed such a marginal intrusion.

[490] Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 90–92 (1979).

[491] Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 818 (1996).

[492] New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106 (1986), citing Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 108–11 (1977) (per curiam).

[493] Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 111 (1977) (per curiam).

[494] Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 413–15 (1997).

c. Use of Excessive Force

[G208] All claims that law enforcement officials have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other seizure of a free citizen are properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment's "objective reasonableness" standard, rather than under a "substantive due process" standard.[495] "Because the Fourth Amendment provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection against this sort of physically intrusive governmental conduct, that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of 'substantive due process' must be the guide for analyzing these claims."[496]

[G209] "Determining whether the force used to effect a particular seizure is 'reasonable' under the Fourth Amendment requires a careful balancing 'of the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests' against the countervailing governmental interests at stake. . . . [T]he right to make a seizure necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it. . . . Because 'the test of reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment is not capable of precise definition or mechanical application,' . . . its proper application requires careful attention to the facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight."[497] "The 'reasonableness' of a particular use of force must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. . . . Not every push or shove, even if it may later seem unnecessary in the peace of a judge's chambers, violates the Fourth Amendment. The calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation. As in other Fourth Amendment contexts, however, the 'reasonableness' inquiry in an excessive force case is an objective one: the question is whether the officers' actions are 'objectively reasonable. in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them, without regard to their underlying intent or motivation. . . . An officer's evil intentions will not make a Fourth Amendment violation out of an objectively reasonable use of force; nor will an officer's good intentions make an objectively unreasonable use of force constitutional." Hence, a test that requires consideration of whether the individual officers acted in "good faith" or "maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm," is incompatible with a proper Fourth Amendment analysis.[498]

[G210] Rochin, a hypothetical drug dealer, swallowed two capsules at the time of his arrest. After an unsuccessful struggle to extract them by force, the arresting officers took petitioner to a hospital, where an emetic was forced into his stomach against his will. He vomited two capsules that were found to contain morphine. These were admitted in evidence over his objection, and he was convicted in a state court of violating a state law forbidding possession of morphine. The Court reversed the conviction, noting that

---

[495] The Due Process Clause protects a pre-trial detainee from the use of excessive force that amounts to punishment. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535–39 (1979).

[496] Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989).

[497] Id. at 396.

[498] Id. at 396–97.

the Constitution does not "legalize force so brutal and so offensive to human dignity in securing evidence" as revealed by the record of that case.[499]

[G211] With regard to deadly force, it is unreasonable for an officer to "seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead." But "[w]here the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force. Thus, if the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given."[500] For example, it is not reasonable for an officer to believe that a young, slight, and unarmed suspect of burglary poses any threat. Nor does the fact that an unarmed suspect has broken into a dwelling at night automatically mean he is dangerous.[501]

d. High-Speed Automobile Chases—Roadblocks

[G212] A police pursuit in attempting to seize a person does not amount to a "seizure" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.[502] However, it may be conducted in a manner harmful to the individual and offensive to substantive due process. "A police officer deciding whether to give chase must balance, on one hand, the need to stop a suspect and show that flight from the law is no way to freedom, and, on the other, the high-speed threat to everyone within stopping range, be they suspects, their passengers, other drivers, or bystanders."[503] "In such a case, where unforeseen circumstances may demand an officer's instant judgment, "only a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of arrest will satisfy the element of arbitrary conduct shocking to the conscience necessary for a due process violation."[504]

[G213] "A roadblock is not just a significant show of authority to induce a voluntary stop, but is designed to produce a stop by physical impact if voluntary compliance does not occur." Thus, a roadblock involves a "seizure;" it makes no difference whether a roadblock is designed to give the oncoming driver the option of a voluntary stop (e.g., one at the end of a long straightaway) or is designed precisely to produce a collision (e.g., one located just around a bend).[505] This is not to say that the precise character of the roadblock is irrelevant to its "reasonableness." Hence, a roadblock may be unreasonable if it is set up in such manner as to be likely to kill the oncoming driver. By contrast, if the suspect has the opportunity to stop voluntarily at the roadblock, but negligently or intentionally drives into it, then, because of lack of proximate causality, the police are not liable for his death.[506]

---

499 Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 174 (1952).

500 Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1985).

501 Id. at 20–22.

502 See para. G10.

503 County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 853 (1998).

504 Id. at 836. Hence, "high-speed chases with no intent to harm suspects physically or to worsen their legal plight, do not give rise" to substantive due process liability." Id. at 854.

505 Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 598 (1989).

506 Id. at 599.

e. Compelled Surgical Intrusion

[G214] A compelled surgical intrusion into an individual's body for evidence implicates expectations of privacy and security of such magnitude that the intrusion may be "unreasonable." "The reasonableness of surgical intrusions beneath the skin depends on a case-by-case approach, in which the individual's interests in privacy and security are weighed against society's interests in conducting the procedure to obtain evidence for fairly determining guilt or innocence. . . . A crucial factor in analyzing the magnitude of [such an intrusion] is the extent to which the procedure may threaten the safety or health of the individual. . . . Another factor is the extent of intrusion upon the individual's dignitary interests in personal privacy and bodily integrity."[507]

[G215] In Schmerber, the Court held that a state may, over the suspect's protest, have a physician extract blood from a person suspected of drunken driving. The Court emphasized that "[t]he interests in human dignity and privacy which the Fourth Amendment protects forbid any [intrusion beyond the body's surface] on the mere chance that desired evidence might be obtained. In the absence of a clear indication that, in fact, such evidence will be found, these fundamental human interests require law officers to suffer the risk that such evidence may disappear."[508] As explained later, the words in Schmerber "were used to indicate the necessity for particularized suspicion that the evidence sought might be found within the body of the individual, rather than as enunciating still a third Fourth Amendment threshold between 'reasonable suspicion' and 'probable cause.'"[509]

[G216] In Winston v. Lee, the Court concluded that it would be "unreasonable" to search for evidence by means of surgical removal of a bullet from a murder suspect. In reaching that conclusion, the Court took into account that (1) "the medical risks of the operation, although not extremely severe, [we]re a subject of considerable dispute;" (2) the intrusion on respondent's privacy interests entailed by the operation could only be characterized as "severe," since surgery without the patient's consent, performed under a general anesthetic to search for evidence of a crime, "involves a virtually total divestment of the patient's ordinary control over surgical probing beneath his skin;" and (iii) the fact that the state had available substantial evidence that respondent was the murderer restricted the need for the state to compel respondent to undergo the contemplated surgery.[510]

f. Entry—The "Knock and Announce" Requirement

[G217] Absent a warrant or exigent circumstances, police cannot enter a home to make an arrest. Nevertheless, "an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within."[511] But, absent exigent circumstances or

---

507 Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 760–61 (1985) (emphasis added).

508 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 769–70 (1966). See, in extenso, para. G171.

509 See United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 540 (1985) (emphasis added).

510 Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 765–66 (1985).

511 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 603 (1980).

consent, the police cannot search for the subject of an arrest warrant in the home of a third party without first obtaining a search warrant directing entry.[512]

[G218] As the Court held in Wilson v. Arkansas, the Fourth Amendment incorporates the common law requirement that police officers entering a dwelling[513] must "knock on the door and announce their identity and purpose before attempting forcible entry."[514] Nevertheless, countervailing law enforcement interests—including, e.g., the threat of physical harm to police, the fact that an officer is pursuing a recently escaped arrestee, and the existence of reason to believe that evidence would likely be destroyed if advance notice were given—may establish the reasonableness of an unannounced entry.[515] Under Richards, a "no-knock" entry is justified when the police "have a reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing their presence, under the particular circumstances, would be dangerous or futile, or that it would inhibit the effective investigation of the crime, by, for example, allowing the destruction of evidence. This standard—as opposed to a probable cause requirement—strikes the appropriate balance between the legitimate law enforcement concerns at issue in the execution of warrants and the individual privacy interests affected by no-knock entries."[516] The same criteria bear on how much time police officers have to wait after knocking and before making a forcible entry.[517] "Whether such a 'reasonable suspicion' exists does not depend on whether police must destroy property in order to enter. . . . [However,] [e]xcessive or unnecessary destruction of property in the course of a search may violate the Fourth Amendment, even though the entry itself is lawful and the fruits of the search not subject to suppression."[518]

g. Presence of Third Parties—Media Ride-Alongs

[G219] The Fourth Amendment requires that "police actions in execution of a warrant be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion."[519] The presence of reporters, who do not engage in the execution of the warrant or assist the police in their task, is not related to the objective of the authorized search or seizure. Publicizing the government's efforts to combat crime, facilitating accurate reporting on law enforcement activities, minimizing police abuses, and protecting suspects and the officers cannot justify media ride-alongs. Therefore, "it is a violation of the Fourth Amendment for

---

[512] Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 211–22 (1981).

[513] Intrusion into a dwelling includes opening a closed but unlocked door. See Sabbath v. United States, 391 U.S. 585, 590 (1968).

[514] Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 387 (1997), discussing Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995).

[515] Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927, 934, 936 (1995). The Fourth Amendment does not prohibit per se a covert entry performed for the purpose of installing otherwise legal electronic bugging equipment. See Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 248 (1979).

[516] Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 394 (1997) (the Fourth Amendment does not permit a blanket exception to the "knock and announce" requirement for felony drug investigations).

[517] United States v. Banks, 540 U.S. 31, 36–37 (2003). There the Court found that, after 15 to 20 seconds without a response, the officers could fairly have suspected that Banks (suspected of selling cocaine at home) would flush away the cocaine if they remained reticent. Id. at 38–40.

[518] United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65, 71 (1998).

[519] Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 611 (1999).

police to bring members of the media or other third parties into a home during the execution of a warrant when the presence of the third parties in the home is not in aid of the execution of the warrant."[520] For example, where the police enter a home under the authority of a warrant to search for stolen property, the presence of third parties for the purpose of identifying the stolen property would be permissible.[521]

h. Reasonable Mistakes

[G220] The Court has recognized "the need to allow some latitude for honest mistakes that are made by officers in the dangerous and difficult process of making arrests and executing search warrants."[522] "But the mistakes must be those of reasonable men, acting on facts leading sensibly to their conclusions of probability;"[523] "simple 'good faith on the part of the . . . officer is not enough.'"[524]

[G221] In Garrison, a warrant supported by probable cause with respect to one apartment was erroneously issued for an entire floor that was divided (though not clearly) into two apartments. The Court observed that the validity of the search of respondent's apartment, pursuant to a warrant authorizing the search of the entire floor, depended on "whether the officers' failure to realize the overbreadth of the warrant was objectively understandable and reasonable." The Court held that it was, since the objective facts available to the officers at the time suggested no distinction between the suspect's apartment and the third-floor premises, and the officers' conduct was consistent with "a reasonable effort to ascertain and identify the place intended to be searched."[525]

[G222] In Hill, the Court considered the validity of the arrest of a man named Miller based on the mistaken belief that he was Hill. The police had probable cause to arrest Hill, and they believed, in good faith, that Miller was Hill, since Miller was found in Hill's apartment and matched Hill's description. Although subjective good-faith belief would not, in itself, justify either the arrest or the subsequent search, "the officers' mistake was understandable and the arrest a reasonable response to the situation facing them at the time."[526]

D. REMEDIES FOR FOURTH AMENDMENT VIOLATIONS

1. The Exclusionary Rule

[G223] The exclusionary rule is "a judicially created means of effectuating the rights secured by the Fourth Amendment."[527] Prior to the Court's decisions in Weeks[528] and

---

[520] Id. at 614. In that case, the Court had no occasion to decide whether the exclusionary rule would apply to any evidence discovered or developed by the media representatives. Id. at 614, n.2.

[521] Id. at 611–12.

[522] Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 87 (1987).

[523] Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 186 (1990), quoting Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 176 (1949).

[524] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 915 (1984), quoting Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89, 97 (1964).

[525] Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 88 (1987).

[526] Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 804 (1971).

[527] Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 482 (1976). See also United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 348 (1974).

[528] Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914). The roots of the Weeks decision lay in an

Gouled,[529] there existed no barrier to the introduction in criminal trials of evidence obtained in violation of the Amendment.[530] In Weeks, the Court held that the defendant could petition before trial for the return of property secured through an illegal search or seizure conducted by federal authorities. In Gouled, the Court held broadly that such evidence could not be introduced in a federal prosecution. Thirty-five years after Weeks, the Court held in Wolf[531] that the right to be free from arbitrary intrusion by the police that is protected by the Fourth Amendment is implicit in the concept of ordered liberty and, as such, enforceable against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. The Court concluded, however, that the Weeks exclusionary rule would not be imposed upon the states as "an essential ingredient" of that right. The full force of Wolf was eroded in subsequent decisions,[532] and, a little more than a decade later, the exclusionary rule was held applicable to the states in Mapp.[533]

[G224] The government's use of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment does not itself violate the Constitution; rather, a Fourth Amendment violation is "fully accomplished" by the illegal search or seizure, and no exclusion of evidence from a judicial or administrative proceeding can cure the invasion of the defendant's rights that he has already suffered.[534] The exclusionary rule is, instead, a judicially created means of deterring police misconduct that violates Fourth Amendment rights;[535] judicial officers, court employees, and legislators are not the focus of the rule.[536] As such, the rule does not "proscribe the introduction of illegally seized evidence in all proceedings or against all persons,"[537] but it applies only in contexts "where its remeearly decision, Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886), where the Court held that the compulsory production of a person's private books and papers for introduction against him at trial violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments.

---

529 Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921).

530 See Adams v. New York, 192 U.S. 585 (1904).

531 Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 27–29 (1949).

532 See Rea v. United States, 350 U.S. 214 (1956); Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206 (1960).

533 Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

534 United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 906 (1984).

535 United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 348 (1974).

536 See, respectively, United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 916 (1984); Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S., 1, 14–16 (1995); Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340, 350 (1987). In Leon, the Court determined that there was no sound reason to apply the exclusionary rule as a means of deterring misconduct on the part of judicial officers who are responsible for issuing warrants. This conclusion was based on three factors. First, the exclusionary rule was historically designed to deter police misconduct rather than to punish the errors of judges and magistrates. Second, there was no evidence suggesting that judges and magistrates are inclined to ignore or subvert the Fourth Amendment, or that lawlessness among these actors requires the application of the extreme sanction of exclusion. Third, and of greatest importance, there was no basis for believing that exclusion of evidence seized pursuant to a warrant would have a significant deterrent effect on the issuing judge or magistrate. For similar reasons, the Evans Court held that the exclusionary rule does not require suppression of evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment, where the erroneous information resulted from clerical errors of court employees. Moreover, as the Court recognized in Krull, the application of the exclusionary rule to suppress evidence obtained by an officer acting in objectively reasonable reliance on a statute would have as little deterrent effect on the officer's actions, as would the exclusion of evidence when an officer acts in objectively reasonable reliance on a warrant.

537 Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 486 (1976).

dial objectives are thought most efficaciously served."[538] Moreover, "because the rule is prudential, rather than constitutionally mandated, [the Court has] held it to be applicable only where its deterrence benefits outweigh its 'substantial social costs.'"[539] Indeed, "[b]ecause the exclusionary rule precludes consideration of reliable, probative evidence, . . . it undeniably detracts from the truthfinding process, and allows many who would otherwise be incarcerated to escape the consequences of their actions."[540]

[G225] Recognizing these costs, the Court has repeatedly declined to extend the exclusionary rule to proceedings other than criminal trials. In Calandra, the Court held that the exclusionary rule does not apply to grand jury proceedings; in so doing, it "emphasized that such proceedings play a special role in the law enforcement process, and that the traditionally flexible, nonadversarial nature of those proceedings would be jeopardized by application of the rule."[541] Likewise, in Janis, the Court held that the exclusionary rule did not bar the introduction of unconstitutionally obtained evidence in a civil tax proceeding, "because the costs of excluding relevant and reliable evidence would outweigh the marginal deterrence benefits, which would be minimal because the use of the exclusionary rule in criminal trials already deterred illegal searches."[542] In Lopez-Mendoza, the Court refused to extend the exclusionary rule to civil deportation proceedings, "citing the high social costs of allowing an immigrant to remain illegally in this country and noting the incompatibility of the rule with the civil administrative nature of those proceedings."[543] Finally in Scott, the Court decided that the exclusionary rule is inapplicable to parole revocation hearings, since it would provide only minimal deterrence benefits in this context and would be incompatible with the traditionally flexible, non-adversarial character of these procedures.[544]

[G226] In addition, the Court has significantly limited the application of the exclusionary rule even in the context of criminal trials. First, there is a "good faith" exception to that rule. The Court has held that the rule does not apply when the police officer reasonably relied on a statute later held unconstitutional,[545] on a search warrant that was later deemed invalid,[546] or on erroneous information provided by court employ-

---

[538] United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 348 (1974).

[539] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 363 (1998), citing United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 907 (1984).

[540] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 364 (1998).

[541] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 364 (1998), discussing United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 343–46, 349–50 (1974).

[542] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 364 (1998), discussing United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433, 448, 454 (1976).

[543] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 364 (1998), discussing INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032, 1050 (1984).

[544] Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357, 365–68 (1998).

[545] Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340, 349–50 (1987) ("[u]nless a statute is clearly unconstitutional, an officer cannot be expected to question the judgment of the legislature that passed the law").

[546] United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 920–22 (1984). See also Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984). Suppression remains an appropriate remedy "if the magistrate or judge in issuing a warrant was misled by information in an affidavit that the affiant knew was false or would have known was false except for his reckless disregard of the truth," or "if the issuing magistrate wholly abandoned his detached and neutral judicial role." Id. at 923. "Finally, depending on the circumstances of the particular case, a warrant may be so facially deficient—i.e., in failing to particularize the place to be searched or the things to be seized—that the executing officers cannot reasonably presume it to be valid." Id. at 923.

ees.[547] The exclusionary rule is equally inapplicable when the illegally obtained evidence is used to impeach a defendant's testimony.[548] The Court also has decided that "where the State has provided an opportunity for full and fair litigation of a Fourth Amendment claim, a state prisoner may not be granted federal habeas corpus relief on the ground that evidence obtained through an unconstitutional search and seizure was introduced at his trial."[549]

[G227] "[T]he exclusionary rule reaches not only primary evidence obtained as a direct result of an illegal search or seizure, . . . but also evidence later discovered and found to be derivative of an illegality or 'fruit of the poisonous tree.'"[550] "The question to be resolved when it is claimed that evidence subsequently obtained is 'tainted' or is 'fruit of a prior illegality is whether the challenged evidence was 'come at by exploitation of the [initial] illegality, or instead by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint.'"[551] Hence, evidence is not to be excluded "if police had an 'independent source' for discovery of the evidence."[552] For example, in Segura, agents unlawfully entered the defendant's apartment and remained there until a search warrant was obtained. The evidence found for the first time during the execution of the search warrant was held admissible, because the information on which the warrant was secured came "from sources wholly unconnected with the entry, and was known to the agents well before the initial entry."[553] But "if the agents' decision to seek the warrant was prompted by what they had seen during the initial entry, or if information obtained during that entry was presented to the Magistrate and affected his decision to issue the warrant," the independent source doctrine should not apply.[554]

---

[547] Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S., 1, 14–16 (1995). The policies underlying the exclusionary rule do not require retroactive application of a new Fourth Amendment rule announced by the Court where the agents were acting in reliance upon a federal statute supported by longstanding administrative regulations and continuous judicial approval. See Unites States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 535–42 (1975).

[548] Walder v. United States, 347 U.S. 62, 65 (1954); United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620, 626 (1980) ("when defendants testify, they must testify truthfully, and a false testimony may not be permitted to go unchallenged").

[549] Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 494 (1976). "In this context, the contribution of the exclusionary rule, if any, to the effectuation of the Fourth Amendment is minimal, and the substantial societal costs of application of the rule persist with special force." Id. at 494–95. "Resort to habeas corpus, especially for purposes other than to assure that no innocent person suffers an unconstitutional loss of liberty, results in serious intrusions on values important to our system of government. They include (i) the most effective utilization of limited judicial resources, (ii) the necessity of finality in criminal trials, (iii) the minimization of friction between our federal and state systems of justice, and (iv) the maintenance of the constitutional balance upon which the doctrine of federalism is founded. . . . [I]n the case of a typical Fourth Amendment claim, asserted on collateral attack, a convicted defendant is usually asking society to redetermine an issue that has no bearing on the basic justice of his incarceration." Id. at 491, n.31.

[550] Segura v. United States, 468 U.S. 796, 804 (1984), citing Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338, 341 (1939). If a person is being illegally detained when he consents to the search of his luggage, such consent is tainted by the illegal detention, and hence is ineffective to justify the search. See Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 501–09 (1983).

[551] Segura v. United States, 468 U.S. 796, 804–05 (1984), quoting Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 488 (1963) (emphasis added).

[552] Segura v. United States, 468 U.S. 796, 805 (1984).

[553] Id. at 814.

[554] Murray v. United States, 487 U.S. 533, 542 (1988). In Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 443 (1984), the Court adopted the "inevitable discovery" doctrine, which is "an extrapolation from [G228] A confession "obtained by exploitation of an illegal arrest" may not be used against a criminal defendant.[555] Suppression of such a confession, even though voluntary under the Fifth Amendment, is required, "unless that confession is 'an act of free will [sufficient] to purge the primary taint of the unlawful detention.'"[556] "Demonstrating such purgation is a function of circumstantial evidence, with the burden of persuasion on the state. . . . Relevant considerations include observance of Miranda, 'the temporal proximity of the arrest and the confession, the presence of intervening circumstances, and particularly the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct.'"[557] However, "Miranda warnings, alone and per se, cannot always . . . break, for Fourth Amendment purposes, the causal connection between the illegality and the confession."[558]

2. Bivens Actions[559]

[G229] Bivens allows a plaintiff to seek money damages from federal agents who have violated his Fourth Amendment rights.[560] "But government officials performing discretionary functions generally are granted a qualified immunity and are 'shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'"[561] "The purpose of Bivens is to deter individual federal officers from committing constitutional violations. Meyer made clear that the threat of litigation and liability will adequately deter federal officers for Bivens purposes no matter that they may enjoy qualified immunity, . . . are indemnified by the employing agency or entity, . . . or are acting pursuant to the agency's policy. . . . Meyer also made clear that the threat of suit against a federal agency is not the kind of deterrence contemplated by Bivens."[562]

---

the 'independent source' doctrine: since the tainted evidence would be admissible if in fact discovered through an independent source, it should be admissible if it inevitably would have been discovered." See Murray, supra, at 539.

555 Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 603 (1975).

556 Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 632 (2003) (per curiam), quoting Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 486 (1963).

557 Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 633 (2003) (per curiam), quoting Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 603–04 (1975).

558 Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 633 (2003) (per curiam), quoting Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 603 (1975). "[T]he controlling burden of proof at suppression hearings should impose no greater burden than proof by a preponderance of the evidence." See United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 178, n.14 (1974) (emphasis added), citing Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477, 488–89 (1972).

559 See, in extenso, paras. B90 et seq.

560 Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 397 (1971). Bivens actions constitute a judicially fashioned remedy, based on federal law.

561 Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 609 (1999), quoting Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982) (emphasis added).

562 Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 70 (2001), discussing Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 473–74, 484–86 (1994).

CHAPTER 8

FREEDOMS OF CONSCIENCE, THOUGHT, AND BELIEF—RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

A. FREEDOMS OF CONSCIENCE, THOUGHT, AND BELIEF

1. In General

[H1] The Court has "identified the individual's freedom of conscience as the central liberty that unifies the various Clauses in the First Amendment."[1] This Amendment "gives freedom of mind the same security as freedom of conscience."[2] The right of freedom of speech and press includes the freedoms "of inquiry [and] thought; . . . [w]ithout those peripheral freedoms, the specific righ[t] would be less secure."[3] Furthermore, the freedom of thought and speech is "the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom."[4] Thus, freedom of conscience and thought, which includes freedom of religious belief, is "basic in a society of free men."[5]

[H2] "[A]t the heart of the First Amendment is the notion that an individual should be free to believe as he will, and that, in a free society, one's beliefs should be shaped by his mind and his conscience, rather than coerced by the State."[6] "[T]he assertion that the State has the right to control the moral content of a person's thoughts . . . is wholly inconsistent with the philosophy of the First Amendment."[7] "If there is any fixed star in the constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."[8]

[H3] However, the Court's cases "do not, at their farthest reach, support the proposition that a stance of conscientious opposition relieves an objector from any colliding duty fixed by a democratic government."[9] "While the freedom of belief and thought is

---

1 Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 50 (1985).

2 Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 531 (1945).

3 Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482–83 (1965).

4 Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 327 (1937).

5 United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 86 (1944). General statutory expressions should not be so construed as to circumscribe liberty of conscience and political thought. See Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 132 (1943) (involving a naturalization Act).

6 Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 234–35 (1977).

7 Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 565–66, 568 (1969) (the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit making mere private possession of obscene material a crime). "Stanley's emphasis was on the freedom of thought and mind in the privacy of the home." See United States v. 12 200-Ft. Reels of Super 8mm. Film No. 72, 413 U.S. 123, 128 (1973).

8 W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943).

9 See Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 461 (1971) (military conscription laws).

absolute, the freedom of individual conduct is not."[10] "The absolute protection afforded belief by the First Amendment suggests that a court should be cautious in expanding the scope of that protection, since to do so might leave government powerless to vindicate compelling state interests."[11]

[H4] "[B]eliefs are personal, and not a matter of mere association. . . . [I]n adhering to a political party or other organization, . . . [an individual does] not subscribe unqualifiedly to all of its platforms or asserted principles."[12] "Thus, mere Party membership, even with knowledge of the Party's unlawful goals, . . . may [not] warrant a finding of moral unfitness justifying disbarment."[13]

2. Compelled Expression of Objectionable Ideas

[H5] One is free "to express himself in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience."[14] "[T]he freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes the right to refrain from speaking. . . . A system which secures the right to proselytize religious, political, and ideological causes must also guarantee the concomitant right to decline to foster such concepts. . . . [When] a state measure . . . forces an individual, as part of his daily life . . . to be an instrument for fostering public adherence to an ideological point of view he finds unacceptable, . . . the State invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to reserve from all official control."[15] Thus, in Barnette, the Court struck down a state statute that required public school students to participate in daily public ceremonies by honoring the flag both with words and traditional salute gestures. In doing so, the Court stressed that "a ceremony so touching matters of opinion and political attitude may not be imposed upon the individual by official authority under powers committed to any political organization under the Constitution."[16] In Wooley, the Court invalidated a statute requiring the official slogan "Live Free or Die" to be displayed on all license plates to protect the individual interest in "freedom of mind."[17] Similarly, Abood held that a pub-

---

[10] See Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303–04 (1940); Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 699 (1986).

[11] McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 627, n.7 (1978).

[12] Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 136 (1943).

[13] Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of New York, 385 U.S. 589, 607 (1967), citing Schware v. Bd. of Bar Exam'rs of New Mexico, 353 U.S. 232. 243–46 (1957).

[14] Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 49 (1985).

[15] Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714–15 (1977).

[16] W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 636 (1943), overruling Minersville Sch. Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940). The Court rejected the argument that compulsory flag salute is a permissible means for the attainment of national unity, which is the basis of national security, noting, inter alia, that "to believe that patriotism will not flourish if patriotic ceremonies are voluntary and spontaneous, instead of a compulsory routine, is to make an unflattering estimate of the appeal of our institutions to free minds." Id. at 641.

A fortiori, the Constitution "prohibits the imposition of punishment for urging and advising that, on religious grounds, citizens refrain from saluting the flag." See Taylor v. Mississippi, 319 U.S. 583, 589 (1943).

[17] Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714–17 (1977). In reaching that conclusion, the Court found that the state's countervailing interests were not sufficiently compelling to justify requiring appellees to display the state motto on their license plates. The two interests advanced by the state were that display of the motto (1) facilitated the identification of passenger vehilic school teacher cannot be required to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding his job.[18]

3. Compulsory Disclosure of Beliefs

[H6] Compelled disclosure of political beliefs, in itself, can seriously infringe on the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. "The right to privacy in one's political associations and beliefs will yield only to a subordinating interest of the State that is compelling, . . . and then only if there is a substantial relation between the information sought and an overriding and compelling state interest."[19]

[H7] Nixon v. Administrator of General Services involved the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act of 1974, which created a centralized custodian for the preservation and orderly processing of Nixon's historical materials (an estimated 42 million pages of documents and 880 tape recordings) and mandated protection of the former President's right against infringement by the processing itself or, ultimately, by public access to the materials retained. The Act aimed to guarantee the availability of evidence for use at criminal trials and to preserve monuments and records of historical value to national heritage. Nixon claimed, inter alia, that the Act invaded the private formulation of his political thought. The Court stressed that "a compelling public need that cannot be met in a less restrictive way" overrides a person's interests in privacy of association and belief guaranteed by the First Amendment, "particularly when the free functioning of . . . national institutions is involved." Accordingly, Nixon's allegation was rejected, because (1) it was clearly outweighed by the important governmental interests promoted by the Act, (2) no less restrictive way than archival screening had been suggested as a means for identification of materials to be returned to Nixon, and (3) the Act protected Nixon from improper public disclosures of his Presidential materials and guaranteed him full judicial review before any public access was permitted.[20]

[H8] A number of cases involved the refusal of states to admit applicants to practice law, because they declined to answer questions relating to their beliefs about government and their affiliations with organizations suspected of advocating the overthrow of government by force. These cases were relics of a turbulent period known as the "McCarthy era," which drew its name from Senator Joseph McCarthy, who had stirred up anti-Communist feelings and fears by his "investigations" in the early 1950s. The Court's opinions in this constitutional field are characterized by sharp conflicts and close divisions.[21] In Baird, the Court held by a five-to-four vote that a person could not cles, and (2) promoted appreciation of history, individualism, and state pride. The Court noted that, in any case, there were less drastic means for achieving the first end, and that the second interest could not outweigh an individual's First Amendment right to avoid becoming the courier for such message.

---

18 Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 235 (1977).

19 Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Comm., 459 U.S. 87, 91–92 (1983).

20 Nixon v. Adm'r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 467 (1977).

21 In Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 353 U.S. 252, 258–74 (1957) (Konigsberg I), the Court was "concerned solely with the question whether the balance between the favorable and unfavorable evidence as to Konigsberg's qualifications had been struck in accordance with the requirements of due process. It was there held, first, that Konigsberg had made out a prima facie case of good character and of non-advocacy of violent overthrow, and, second, that the other evidence in the record could not, even with the aid of all reasonable inferences flowing there-be kept out of the state bar for refusing to answer whether he had ever been a member of the Communist Party or any organization that advocated overthrow of the U.S. government by force or violence. This question was treated as an inquiry into political beliefs. A four-member plurality noted that "[w]hen a State seeks to inquire about an individual's beliefs and associations, a heavy burden lies upon it to show that the inquiry is necessary to protect a legitimate state interest." The plurality recognized that the state had a legitimate interest in determining whether petitioner had the qualities of character and the professional competence requisite to the practice of law. But, there, petitioner had already supplied the Bar Committee with extensive personal and professional information to assist its determination. In reversing the denial of petitioner's admission to the bar, the plurality concluded that, "whatever justification may be offered, a State may not inquire about a man's views or associations solely for the purpose of withholding a right or benefit because of what he believes."[22] Another member of the Court, in his concurring opinion, also emphasized that "the First and Fourteenth Amendments bar a State from acting against any person merely because of his beliefs."[23] from, cast such doubts upon petitioner's prima facie case as to justify any finding other than that these two California qualification requirements had been satisfied. In assessing the significance of Konigsberg's refusal to answer questions as to Communist Party membership, the Court dealt only with the fact that this refusal could not provide any reasonable indication of a character not meeting these two standards for admission." See Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36, 42 (1961), discussing Konigsberg I. See also Schware v. Bd. of Bar Exam'rs of New Mexico, 353 U.S. 232, 243–46 (1957). However, in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36, 44–56 (1961) (Konigsberg II), the Court found it not constitutionally impermissible for a state "to adopt a rule that an applicant will not be admitted to the practice of law if, and so long as, by refusing to answer material questions, he obstructs a bar examining committee in its proper functions of interrogating and cross-examining him upon his qualifications. . . . [Moreover, the Court] held that the State's interest in enforcing such a rule, as applied to refusals to answer questions about membership in the Communist Party, outweigh[ed] any deterrent effect upon freedom of speech and association." See In re Anastaplo, 366 U.S. 82, 88–89 (1961), discussing Konigsberg II.

---

[22] Baird v. State Bar of Arizona, 401 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1971). The four dissenters noted, inter alia, that (1) "a belief, firm enough to be carried over into advocacy, in the use of illegal means" to change the form of the state or federal government is an important consideration in determining the fitness of applicants for membership in a profession "in whose hands so largely lies the safekeeping of the country's legal and political institutions;" (2) the question at issue was not unreasonable or irrelevant to the state's legitimate interest in determining whether the applicant had the "qualities of character" requisite for the practice of law. Id. at 12–13, 21–22.

[23] Id. at 9–10. In addition, Justice Stewart observed that "mere membership in an organization can never, by itself, be sufficient ground for a State's imposition of civil disabilities," since "[s]uch membership can be quite different from knowing membership in an organization advocating the overthrow of the Government by force or violence, on the part of one sharing the specific intent to further the organization's illegal goals." See also para. H4.

See also Law Students Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 161–63 (1971). In that case the Court faced a state rule directing the Bar Committees on Character and Fitness not to certify an applicant for admission "unless he believed in the form of the government of the United States and was loyal to such government." The state authorities interpreted the statute in the following way: (1) the rule placed upon applicants no burden of proof; (2) "the form of the government of the United States" and the "government" referred solely to the Constitution; and (3) "belief" and "loyalty" meant no more than willingness to take the oath to support the federal and state Constitutions and ability to do so in good faith. Accepting this construction, the Court found no constitutional invalidity in the rule. There was no showing of an intent to [H9] Nevertheless, "it cannot be thought that, as a general principle of law, a citizen has a privilege to answer fraudulently a question that the Government should not have asked. [The] legal system provides methods for challenging the Government's right to ask questions, but lying is not one of them. A citizen may decline to answer the question, or answer it honestly, but he cannot with impunity knowingly and willfully answer with a falsehood."[24]

4. Freedom of Thought in Schools

[H10] "The vigilant protection of [the freedom of thought] is nowhere more vital than in the community of American schools. . . . '[I]n view of the nature of the teacher's relation to the effective exercise of the rights which are safeguarded by the [First and Fourteenth Amendments,] inhibition of freedom of thought, and of action upon thought, in the case of teachers brings the safeguards of those amendments vividly into operation. Such unwarranted inhibition upon the free spirit of teachers . . . has an unmistakable tendency to chill that free play of the spirit which all teachers ought especially to cultivate and practice.'"[25] Academic freedom "is therefore a special concern of the First Amendment, which does not tolerate laws that cast a pall of orthodoxy over the classroom."[26]

5. Exclusion from a Profession or Public Employment on the Basis of Political Beliefs or Association

[H11] The First Amendment "prohibits a State from excluding a person from a profession solely because . . . he holds certain beliefs."[27] As a matter of principle, public employees cannot be fired on the basis of their political beliefs. In Elrod the Court held that a newly elected Democratic Sheriff had violated the constitutional rights of certain non-civil-service employees by discharging them, because they did not support and were not members of the Democratic Party and had failed to obtain the sponsorship of one of its leaders. Noting that, in order to retain their jobs, the Sheriff's employees were required to pledge their allegiance to the Democratic Party, work for or contribute to the party's candidates, or obtain a Democratic sponsor, a three-member plurality "concluded that the inevitable tendency of such a system was to coerce employees into compromising their true beliefs. That conclusion . . . brought the practice within the rule of . . . Barnette, condemning the use of governmental power to prescribe what the citizenry must accept as orthodox opinion."[28] penalize political beliefs, and the rule performed only the function of ascertaining that an applicant was not one who swore to an oath pro forma while declaring or manifesting his disagreement with or indifference to the oath.

---

[24] Bryson v. United States, 396 U.S. 64, 72 (1969), relying on Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 867 (1966).

[25] Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 487 (1960) (statute compelling teachers to disclose their associational ties), quoting Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 195 (1952) (concurring opinion of Justice Frankfurter).

[26] Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 603 (1967).

[27] Ibanez v. Florida Dep't of Bus. and Prof'l Regulation, 512 U.S. 136, 144 (1994), quoting Baird v. State Bar of Arizona, 401 U.S. 1, 6 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[28] See Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 513–14 (1980), discussing Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S.

[H12] In Branti, the Court emphasized that, "unless the government can demonstrate an overriding interest . . . of vital importance, . . . requiring that a person's private beliefs conform to those of the hiring authority, his beliefs cannot be the sole basis for depriving him of continued public employment."[29] Accordingly, it decided that the First Amendment prohibits a newly appointed public defender, who is a Democrat, from discharging assistant public defenders, because they do not have the support of the Democratic Party. The Court rejected an attempt to distinguish the case from Elrod, deciding that it was immaterial whether the public defender had attempted to coerce employees to change political parties or had only dismissed them on the basis of their private political beliefs. It explained that conditioning continued public employment on an employee's having obtained support from a particular political party violates the First Amendment because of "the coercion of belief that necessarily flows from the knowledge that one must have a sponsor in the dominant party in order to retain one's job." In sum, the Court said, "there is no requirement that dismissed employees prove that they, or other employees, have been coerced into changing, either actually or ostensibly, their political allegiance;" to prevail, public employees need show only that they were discharged, because they were not affiliated with or sponsored by the Democratic Party.[30] Branti also refined the exception created by Elrod for certain employees. In Elrod, the majority suggested that policy-making and confidential employees probably could be dismissed on the basis of their political views.[31] In Branti, the Court said that a state demonstrates a compelling interest in infringing First Amendment rights only when it can show that "party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved."[32]

[H13] In Rutan, the Court extended Elrod and Branti to public employment promotion, transfer, recall, and hiring decisions based on political beliefs and affiliation. Rutan provided that the government can justify patronage employment practices only if it proves that such patronage is "narrowly tailored to further vital governmental interests. . . . A government's interest in securing effective employees can be met by discharging, demoting or transferring staff members whose work is deficient. A government's interest in securing employees who will loyally implement its policies can be adequately served by choosing or dismissing certain high-level employees on the basis of their political views."[33]

[H14] O'Hare held that the protections of Elrod and Branti are also applicable to an independent contractor, who, in retaliation for refusing to comply with demands for political support, has a government contract terminated or is removed from an official list of contractors authorized to perform public services. As the Court pointed out, "[g]overnment officials may terminate at-will relationships, unmodified by any legal con-

---

347, 355–59 (1976). The Elrod plurality also stated that the practice had the effect of imposing an unconstitutional condition on the receipt of a public benefit and therefore came within the rule of cases like Perry (see para. B68). Another two Justices, agreed that, under Perry, "a nonpolicymaking, nonconfidential government employee [cannot] be discharged or threatened with discharge from a job that he is satisfactorily performing upon the sole ground of his political beliefs." Id. at 375.

29 Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 515–16 (1980).

30 Id. at 516–17.

31 Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 367, 375 (1976).

32 Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 518 (1980).

33 Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62, 74 (1990).

straints, without cause; but it does not follow that this discretion can be exercised to impose conditions on expressing, or not expressing, specific political views."[34]

6. Oaths of Office

[H15] The Court has "made clear that neither federal nor state government may condition employment on taking oaths that impinge on rights guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, respectively, as . . . those relating to political beliefs."[35] Article VI, Clause 3, of the Constitution, explicitly prohibits any religious test as a qualification for any office or public trust in the United States.

[H16] Article VI, Clause 3, also provides that all state and federal officers "shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution." Obviously, the Framers of the Constitution thought that the exaction of an affirmation of loyalty to the Constitution was worth the price of whatever deprivation of individual freedom of conscience was involved.[36] Hence, the Constitution permits an oath that requires an individual assuming public responsibilities to affirm that he will endeavor to perform his public duties lawfully, pursuant to "constitutional processes of government," and that he will not use illegal and constitutionally unprotected force to change the constitutional system.[37]

7. Conscientious Objection to Military Service or Instruction

[H17] "Government, federal and state, each in its own sphere, owes a duty to the people within its jurisdiction to preserve itself in adequate strength to maintain peace and order and to assure the just enforcement of law. And every citizen owes the reciprocal duty, according to his capacity, to support and defend government against all enemies."[38] In Gillette, the petitioners, conscientious objectors to particular wars, argued that Section 6(j) of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, which limited an exemption from military service to those who conscientiously objected to "participation in war in any form," infringed their rights under the Free Exercise Clause by requiring them to abandon their religious beliefs and participate in what they deemed an unjust war or go to jail. In rejecting this allegation, the Court noted that "the impact of conscription on objectors to particular wars is far from unjustified. The conscription laws, applied to such

---

[34] O'Hare Truck Serv., Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 725–26 (1996).

[35] Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676, 680 (1972), citing Law Students Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154 (1971) and Baird v. State Bar of Arizona, 401 U.S. 1 (1971). "An underlying, seldom articulated concern running throughout the oath cases in the Court is that the oaths under consideration often required individuals to reach back into their past to recall minor, sometimes innocent, activities, [and] put the government into the censorial business of investigating, scrutinizing, interpreting, and then penalizing or approving the political viewpoints and past activities of individuals." See Cole v. Richardson, supra, at 681.

[36] Cf. Am. Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 415 (1950).

[37] See Cole v. Richardson, 405 U.S. 676, 682–84 (1972); Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116, 135 (1966).

[38] Hamilton v. Regents of Univ. of California, 293 U.S. 245, 262–63 (1934). In that case, the Court held that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment does not confer upon a conscientious and religious objector to war and military training the right to attend a state university without taking a course in military "science" required by the state as part of the curriculum.

persons as to others, are not designed to interfere with any religious ritual or practice, and do not work a penalty against any theological position. The incidental burdens felt by [these persons] are strictly justified by substantial governmental interests that relate directly to the very impacts questioned. And, more broadly, of course, there is the Government's interest in procuring the manpower necessary for military purposes, pursuant to the constitutional grant of power to Congress to raise and support armies."[39]

[H18] Similarly, in In re Summers, the Court upheld the refusal of a state supreme court to admit to membership of its bar an otherwise qualified person on the sole ground that he had conscientious scruples against war and would not use force to prevent wrong under any circumstances. Since the applicant could not swear in good faith to uphold the state Constitution, which required service in the militia in time of war, it was decided that refusal to permit him to practice law did not violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments.[40] In addition, the federal government can bar from national citizenship an alien who refuses to pledge military service.[41]

[H19] Robison, who had been exempted from military service as a conscientious objector but who had performed required alternative civilian service, after being denied educational benefits under the Veterans' Readjustment Benefits Act of 1966, brought a class action for a declaratory judgment that the provisions of the Act making him and his

---

[39] Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 462 (1971). Apart from the government's need for manpower, the Court also noted "the importance of fair, evenhanded, and uniform decisionmaking" in this field, since "opposition to a particular war may more likely be political and nonconscientious than otherwise." Moreover, "the belief that a particular war at a particular time is unjust is, by its nature, changeable and subject to nullification by changing events." Hence, a program of excusing objectors to particular wars may be "impossible to conduct with any hope of reaching fair and consistent results." Id. at 455–56.

See also Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 378, 389–90 (1918), where the Court upheld the Draft Act of 1917, including its conscientious objector provisions, noting, among other things, that "the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the duty of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right of the government to compel it." Id. at 378.

Section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended in 1948, exempted from combatant service in the armed forces those who were conscientiously opposed to participation in war by reason of their "religious training and belief." This term was defined in the Act as "an individual's belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but [not including] essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code." As the Court held in Seeger, within that phrase would come "a sincere and meaningful belief which occupies in the life of its possessor a place parallel to that filled by the God of those admittedly qualifying for the exemption. . . . This construction avoid[ed] imputing to Congress an intent to classify different religious beliefs, exempting some and excluding others, and [wa]s in accord with the well established congressional policy of equal treatment for those whose opposition to service [wa]s grounded in their religious tenets." See United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 176 (1965). See also Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333, 344 (1970), where a four-member plurality admitted that Section 6(j) exempted from military service "all those whose consciences, spurred by deeply held moral, ethical, or religious beliefs, would give them no rest or peace if they allowed themselves to become a part of an instrument of war."

[40] In re Summers, 325 U.S. 561, 572–73 (1945).

[41] United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 623–24 (1931); United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644, 650 (1929).

class ineligible for such benefits violated the First Amendment's guarantee of religious freedom, by increasing the price he and the other members of his class should pay for adherence to their religious beliefs. The Court observed that the withholding of educational benefits involved only an incidental burden upon Robison's free exercise of religion. The Act had been enacted pursuant to Congress' Article I, Section 8, powers "to advance the neutral, secular governmental interests of enhancing military service and aiding the readjustment of military personnel to civilian life." Appellee and his class were not included in this class of beneficiaries, "not because of any legislative design to interfere with their free exercise of religion, but because to do so would not rationally promote the Act's purposes." Thus, in light of Gillette, the government's substantial interest in raising and supporting armies was "of a kind and weight clearly sufficient" to sustain the challenged legislation.[42]

8. Beliefs of the Defendant in the Sentencing Context

[H20] "Traditionally, sentencing judges have considered a wide variety of factors in addition to evidence bearing on guilt in determining what sentence to impose on a convicted defendant. . . . The defendant's motive for committing the offense is one important factor. . . . But it is equally true that a defendant's abstract beliefs, however obnoxious to most people, may not be taken into consideration by a sentencing judge."[43] In Dawson, the state introduced evidence at a capital sentencing hearing that the defendant was a member of a white supremacist prison gang. Because the evidence proved nothing more than the defendant's abstract beliefs, the Court held that its admission violated the defendant's First Amendment rights. In so holding, however, the Court emphasized that "the Constitution does not erect a per se barrier to the admission of evidence concerning one's beliefs and associations at sentencing simply because those beliefs and associations are protected by the First Amendment."[44] Thus, in Barclay, the Court allowed the sentencing judge to take into account the defendant's racial animus towards his victim. The evidence in that case showed that the defendant's membership in the Black Liberation Army and desire to provoke a "race war" were related to the murder of a white man for which he had been convicted. Because "the elements of racial hatred in [the] murder" were relevant to several aggravating factors, the plurality held that the trial judge had permissibly taken this evidence into account in sentencing the defendant to death.[45] Similarly, in Wisconsin v. Mitchell, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to a state statute that enhanced a penalty based on the defendant's racial motive, noting, inter alia, that the state could "singl[e] out for enhancement bias-inspired conduct because this conduct [wa]s thought to inflict greater individual and societal harm,"[46] and that the First Amendment "does not prohibit the evidentiary use of speech to establish the elements of a crime or to prove motive or intent."[47]

---

42 Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 385 (1974).

43 Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476, 485 (1993).

44 Dawson v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159, 165–67 (1992).

45 Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939, 949 (1983), (plurality opinion of four Justices); id. at 970, and n.18 (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment).

46 Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476, 487–88 (1993).

47 Id. at 489.

B. FREEDOM OF RELIGION

1. The Free Exercise Clause

a. In General

[H21] The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, which has been made applicable to the states by incorporation into the Fourteenth Amendment,[48] provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Hence, "[m]an's relation to his God [is] made no concern of the State."[49] "Only beliefs rooted in religion are protected by the Free Exercise Clause."[50] "Purely secular views do not suffice."[51]

[H22] The determination of what is a "religious" belief or practice may be a difficult and delicate task.[52] However, "the resolution of that question is not to turn upon a judicial perception of the particular belief or practice in question; religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent, or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection."[53] Although one can "imagine an asserted claim so bizarre, so clearly nonreligious in motivation, as not to be entitled to protection under the Free Exercise Clause,"[54] "[g]iven the historical association between animal sacrifice and religious worship, . . . [a person's] assertion that animal sacrifice is an integral part of [his] religion cannot be deemed bizarre or incredible."[55]

[H23] "Men may believe what they cannot prove."[56] "In applying the Free Exercise Clause, courts may not inquire into the truth, validity, or reasonableness of a claimant's religious beliefs."[57] But they can determine whether an individual's beliefs are truly held. Since the "States are entitled to assure themselves that there is an ample predicate for invoking the Free Exercise Clause," they may require that a professed belief be sincerely held.[58] The relevant determination may be far from easy to make. In that context, "[c]ourts should not undertake to dissect religious beliefs because the believer admits that he is 'struggling' with his position or because his beliefs are not articulated with the clarity and precision that a more sophisticated person might employ."[59] And "[i]t is

---

48 See Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940).

49 United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 87 (1944).

50 Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 713 (1981).

51 Frazee v. Illinois Dep't of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 833 (1989), citing Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215–16 (1972).

52 In United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 633–34 (1931), Chief Justice Hughes said, in his dissent, that "the essence of religion is belief in a relation to God involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation." See also para. H17, n.39.

In Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989), the Court implicitly recognized the Church of Scientology as a religious organization.

53 Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 714 (1981).

54 Id. at 715.

55 Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 531 (1993).

56 United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 86 (1944).

57 Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136, 144, n.9 (1987), citing United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 87 (1944). See also Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 449 (1988).

58 Frazee v. Illinois Dep't of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 833 (1989).

59 Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 715 (1981).

not within the judicial ken to question the 'centrality' of particular beliefs or practices to a faith."[60]

[H24] "Undoubtedly, membership in an organized religious denomination . . . [may] simplify the problem of identifying sincerely held religious beliefs."[61] Nevertheless, the Court has rejected the notion that, "to claim the protection of the Free Exercise Clause, one must be responding to the commands of a particular religious organization."[62] "Intrafaith differences . . . are not uncommon among followers of a particular creed. . . . [T]he guarantee of free exercise is not limited to beliefs which are shared by all of the members of a religious sect. Particularly in this sensitive area, it is not within the judicial function and judicial competence to inquire whether a person has correctly perceived the commands of his faith. Courts are not arbiters of scriptural interpretation."[63]

[H25] "If judicial inquiry into the truth of one's religious beliefs would violate the free exercise clause, an inquiry into one's reasons for adopting those beliefs is similarly intrusive. So long as one's faith is religiously based at the time it is asserted, it should not matter, for constitutional purposes, whether that faith derived from revelation, study, upbringing, gradual evolution, or some other source."[64]

[H26] "The free exercise of religion means, first and foremost, the right to believe and profess whatever religious doctrine one desires."[65] The freedom to hold religious beliefs and opinions is absolute.[66] "The door of the Free Exercise Clause stands tightly closed against any governmental regulation of religious beliefs as such. . . . Government may [not] compel affirmation of a repugnant belief."[67] Thus, in Torcaso, the Court struck down a state provision requiring public officials to declare a "belief in the existence of God."[68]

[H27] "The First Amendment prohibits misuse of secular governmental programs to impede the observance of one or all religions or to discriminate invidiously against some or all religious beliefs."[69] In Fowler, the Court found that a municipal ordinance was applied in an unconstitutional manner when interpreted to prohibit preaching in a public park by a Jehovah's Witness but to permit preaching in the same park during the course of a Catholic mass or Protestant church service.[70] The free exercise of religion

---

60 Hernandez v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680, 699 (1989).

61 Frazee v. Illinois Dep't of Employment Sec., 489 U.S. 829, 834 (1989).

62 Id. at 834.

63 Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 715–16 (1981).

64 Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136, 144, n.9 (1987).

65 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 877 (1990).

66 Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940).

67 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 402 (1963).

68 Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 492–95 (1961).

69 Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 462 (1971). See also Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 532 (1993).

"[T]he Free Exercise Clause does not require an exemption from a governmental program unless, at a minimum, inclusion in the program actually burdens the claimant's freedom to exercise religious rights." For example, statutory minimum wage provisions do not interfere with the religious freedom of a religious organization's employees, whose beliefs preclude them from accepting the statutory amount, if the law does not prevent them from returning the amounts to the foundation. See Tony and Susan Alamo Found. v. Sec'y of Labor, 471 U.S. 290, 303–04 (1985).

70 Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67 (1953).

"unquestionably encompasses the right to preach, proselyte, and perform other similar religious functions, or, in other words, to be a minister" of a religious faith.[71] The government cannot impose special disabilities on the basis of one's status as a "minister" or "priest." Thus, in McDaniel, the Court invalidated a state law that disqualified members of the clergy from holding certain public offices.[72] Furthermore, the state may not employ the taxing power to inhibit the dissemination of religious views.[73]

[H28] "[N]either a State nor a municipality can completely bar the distribution of literature containing religious ideas on its streets, sidewalks and public places or make the right to distribute dependent on a flat license tax or permit to be issued by an official who could deny it at will."[74] Moreover, a municipality cannot, without jeopardizing the vital freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment, prohibit door-to-door distribution of religious literature.[75] Of course, reasonable regulations of time and manner of distribution are permissible.[76]

[H29] In addition, the Court has held "that indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion, not just outright prohibitions, are subject to scrutiny under the First Amendment."[77] Thus, for example, "ineligibility for unemployment benefits, based solely on a refusal to violate the Sabbath, has been analogized to a fine imposed on Sabbath worship."[78]

[H30] On the other hand, "the Court has rejected challenges under the Free Exercise Clause to governmental regulation of certain overt acts prompted by religious beliefs or principles, for 'even when the action is in accord with one's religious convictions, [it] is not totally free from legislative restrictions.'"[79] For instance, "[w]hen followers of a particular sect enter into commercial activity as a matter of choice, the limits they accept on their own conduct as a matter of conscience and faith are not to be superimposed on the statutory schemes which are binding on others in that activity."[80]

[H31] "Conscientious scruples have not, in the course of the long struggle for religious toleration, relieved the individual from obedience to a general law not aimed at the promotion or restriction of religious beliefs. The mere possession of religious convictions which contradict the relevant concerns of a political society does not relieve the

---

71 McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 626 (1978).

72 Id. at 626–27.

73 See Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943). See, in extenso, paras. H48–H49.

Some of the Court's cases prohibiting compelled expression, decided exclusively upon free speech grounds, have also involved freedom of religion. See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977) (invalidating compelled display of a license plate slogan that offended individual religious beliefs); W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) (invalidating compulsory flag salute statute challenged by religious objectors).

74 Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 504 (1946).

75 Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 146–47 (1943).

76 The relevant issues pertain to the freedom of speech and are discussed, in extenso, in paras. I377 et seq.

77 Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 450 (1988) (emphasis added).

78 Id. at 450, referring to Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 404 (1963).

79 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403 (1963), quoting Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 603 (1961).

80 United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 261 (1982).

citizen from the discharge of political responsibilities."[81] The Court first had occasion to assert that principle in Reynolds, where it rejected the claim that criminal laws against polygamy could not be constitutionally applied to those whose religion commanded the practice.[82] Prince held that a mother could be prosecuted under the child labor laws for using her children to dispense literature in the streets, her religious motivation notwithstanding.[83] In Braunfeld, the Court upheld Sunday closing laws against the claim that they burdened the religious practices of persons whose religions compelled them to refrain from work on other days.[84] In Gillette, the Court sustained the military selective service system against the claim that it violated free exercise by conscripting persons who opposed a particular war on religious grounds.[85] In Lee, an Amish employer, on behalf of himself and his employees, sought exemption from collection and payment of Social Security taxes on the ground that the Amish faith prohibited participation in governmental support programs. The Court rejected the claim that an exemption was constitutionally required, observing, inter alia, that "there would be no way . . . to distinguish the Amish believer's objection to Social Security taxes from the religious objections that others might have to the collection or use of other taxes."[86] "The only decisions in which [the Court has] held that the First Amendment bars application of a neutral, generally applicable law to religiously motivated action have involved not the Free Exercise Clause alone, but the Free Exercise Clause in conjunction with other constitutional protections,"[87] such as freedom of speech and of the press,[88] or the right of parents to direct the education of their children.[89]

[H32] Sherbert established a balancing test, under which "governmental actions that substantially burden a religious practice must be justified by a compelling governmental interest."[90] Applying that test, on three occasions, the Court invalidated state unemployment compensation rules that conditioned the availability of benefits upon an applicant's willingness to work under conditions forbidden by his religion.[91] The Court "never invalidated any governmental action on the basis of the Sherbert test except the denial of unemployment compensation. Although [it] sometimes purported to apply

---

81 Minersville Sch. Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586, 594–95 (1940).

82 Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879).

83 Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944).

84 Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 (1961) (plurality opinion).

85 Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 461 (1971).

86 See Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 880 (1990), discussing United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 260 (1982).

87 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 881 (1990).

88 Id. at 881, citing Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 307 (1940) (invalidating a licensing system for religious and charitable solicitations under which the administrator had discretion to deny a license to any cause he deemed nonreligious); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 112 (1943) (invalidating a flat tax on solicitation as applied to the dissemination of religious ideas); Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573 (1944) (same).

89 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 881 (1990), citing Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 233 (1972) (invalidating compulsory school attendance laws as applied to Amish parents who refused on religious grounds to send their children to school).

90 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 883 (1990), citing Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 402–03 (1963).

91 See paras. H42–H43.

the Sherbert test in contexts other than that, [it] always found the test satisfied."[92] Eventually, Smith and Lukumi established that that "a law that is neutral and of general applicability need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest, even if the law has the incidental effect of burdening a particular religious practice."[93] "The application of the Sherbert test, the Smith decision explained, would have produced an anomaly in the law, a constitutional right to ignore neutral laws of general applicability:"[94] "[t]o make an individual's obligation to obey such a law contingent upon the law's coincidence with his religious beliefs, except where the State's interest is 'compelling'—permitting him, by virtue of his beliefs, 'to become a law unto himself' . . .—contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense."[95] Moreover, it would not be possible to require a "compelling state interest" only when the conduct prohibited is "central" to the individual's religion, since "[j]udging the centrality of different religious practices is akin to the unacceptable business of evaluating the relative merits of differing religious claims."[96] The four dissenters in the Smith case concluded that the compelling interest test "reflects the First Amendment's mandate of preserving religious liberty to the fullest extent possible in a pluralistic society."[97]

[H33] "Neutrality and general applicability are interrelated, and failure to satisfy one requirement is a likely indication that the other has not been satisfied. A law failing to satisfy these requirements must be justified by a compelling governmental interest, and must be narrowly tailored to advance that interest. . . . Although a law targeting religious beliefs as such is never permissible, . . . if the object of a law is to infringe upon or restrict practices because of their religious motivation, the law is not neutral, . . . and it is invalid unless it is justified by a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to advance that interest. There are . . . many ways of demonstrating that the object or purpose of a law is the suppression of religion or religious conduct. To determine the object of a law, courts must begin with its text, for the minimum requirement of neutrality is that a law not discriminate on its face. A law lacks facial neutrality if it refers to a religious practice without a secular meaning discernable from the language or context. [But] the Free Exercise Clause . . . extends beyond facial discrimination. The Clause forbids 'subtle departures from neutrality' . . . and 'covert suppression of particular religious beliefs.' . . . [It] protects against governmental hostility which is masked, as well as overt."[98] As to the question of general applicability, the Court has pointed out that "[a]ll laws are selective to some extent, but categories of selection are of paramount concern when a law has the incidental effect of burdening religious practice. The Free Exercise Clause 'protect[s] religious observers against unequal treatment,' . . . and inequality results when a legislature decides that the governmental interests it seeks to advance are worthy of being pursued only against conduct with a religious motivation. The principle that government, in pursuit of legitimate interests, cannot in a selective

---

92 See Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 883 (1990), citing United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982); Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971).

93 Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 531 (1993), citing Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 885–86 (1990).

94 See City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 513 (1997).

95 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 885 (1990).

96 Id. at 887.

97 Id. at 903.

98 Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 531–34 (1993).

manner impose burdens only on conduct motivated by religious belief is essential to the protection of the rights guaranteed by the Free Exercise Clause."[99]

[H34] In Lukumi, petitioner church and its congregants practiced the Santeria religion, which employs animal sacrifice as one of its principal forms of devotion (the animals are killed by cutting their carotid arteries, and are cooked and eaten following all Santeria rituals except healing and death rites). After the church leased land in the city of Hialeah and announced plans to establish a house of worship and other facilities there, the city council held an emergency public session and passed, among other enactments (1) Resolution 87-66, which noted city residents' "concern" over religious practices inconsistent with public morals, peace, or safety, and declared the city's "commitment" to prohibiting such practices; (2) Ordinance 87-40, which incorporated the Florida animal cruelty laws and broadly punished whoever unnecessarily or cruelly killed any animal and was interpreted to reach killings for religious reasons; (3) Ordinance 87-52, which defined "sacrifice" as "to unnecessarily kill an animal in a ritual not for the primary purpose of food consumption," and prohibited the "possession, sacrifice, or slaughter" of an animal if it was killed in "any type of ritual" and there was an intent to use it for food, but exempted "any licensed [food] establishment" if the killing was otherwise permitted by law; (4) Ordinance 87-71, which prohibited the sacrifice of animals and defined "sacrifice" in the same manner as Ordinance 87-52; and (5) Ordinance 87-72 which defined "slaughter" as "the killing of animals for food" and prohibited slaughter outside of areas zoned for slaughterhouses, but included an exemption for "small numbers of hogs and/or cattle" when exempted by state law. The Court held that the laws in question had been enacted contrary to free exercise principles. The ordinances' texts and operation demonstrated that they were not neutral, but had as their object the suppression of the central element of the Santeria worship service. This conclusion was supported by the use of the words "sacrifice" and "ritual" in Ordinances 87-40, 87-52, and 87-71 and by Resolution 87-66's statements of "concern" and "commitment." Moreover, the design of the regulations at issue accomplished a "religious gerrymander." Almost the only conduct subject to Ordinances 8740, 87-52, and 87-71 was the religious exercise of Santeria church members; their definitions excluded almost all killings of animals except for religious sacrifice, and the primary purpose requirement narrowed the proscribed category even further, in particular by exempting Kosher slaughter. Their drafting ensured that, although Santeria sacrifice was prohibited, killings that were no more necessary or humane in almost all other circumstances were unpunished. The Court also find significant evidence of the ordinances' improper targeting of Santeria sacrifice in the fact that they proscribed more religious conduct than was necessary to achieve their stated ends. The legitimate governmental interests in protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals could be addressed by restrictions stopping far short of a flat prohibition of all Santeria sacrificial practice. If improper disposal, not the sacrifice itself, was the harm to be prevented, the city could have imposed a general regulation on the disposal of organic garbage. With regard to the city's interest in ensuring the adequate care of animals and in prohibiting cruel methods of killing, regulation of conditions and treatment, regardless of why an animal was kept, and of the method of slaughter, would be the logical response to the city's concern, not a prohibition on possession for the purpose of sacrifice. Ordinance 87-72—unlike the three other ordinances—appeared to apply to substantial non-religious conduct and not to be overbroad. However, since it had been passed the same day as Ordinance 87-71, and had been enacted, as were the three others, in direct response to the opening of the Church, the four substantive ordinances were treated by the Court as a group for neutrality purposes. Hence, it was considered as functioning, with the rest of the enactments in question, to suppress Santeria religious worship. Furthermore, each of the ordinances burdened only conduct motivated by religious belief and, hence, violated the requirement that laws burdening religious practice must be of general applicability. The four ordinances were substantially underinclusive, for they failed to prohibit non-religious conduct that endangered the city's interests in protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals in a similar or greater degree than Santeria sacrifice did. In sum, the ordinances had every appearance of a prohibition that society was prepared to impose upon Santeria worshippers but not upon itself. This precise evil is what the requirement of "general applicability" is designed to prevent. In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that the ordinances at issue could not withstand the strict scrutiny that was required upon their failure to meet the Smith standard. Even if the asserted governmental interests were compelling, the ordinances were not narrowly tailored to accomplish these interests. All four were overbroad or underinclusive in substantial respects, because the proffered objectives were not pursued with respect to analogous non-religious conduct, and those interests could be achieved by narrower ordinances that would burden religion to a far lesser degree.[100]

[99] Id. at 542–43.

b. Ecclesiastical Administration

[H35] Legislation, which determines ecclesiastical administration or the appointment of the clergy or transfers control of churches from one group to another, interferes with the free exercise of religion contrary to the Constitution. Kedroff grew out of a dispute between the Moscow-based general Russian Orthodox Church and the Russian Orthodox churches located in North America over an appointment to St. Nicholas Cathedral in New York City. The North American churches declared their independence from the general church, and the New York legislature enacted a statute recognizing their administrative autonomy. The New York courts sustained the constitutionality of the statute and held that the North American churches' elected hierarchy had the right to use the cathedral. The Court reversed, finding that the Moscow church had not acknowledged the schism and holding the statute unconstitutional. The Court stressed that, under the First Amendment, religious organizations have the power to decide for themselves, free from secular control or manipulation, "matters of church government." "Freedom to select the clergy, where no improper methods of choice are proven, . . . [has] constitutional protection as a part of the free exercise of religion against state interference." The New York statute displaced one church administrator with another. "It passe[d] the control of matters strictly ecclesiastical from one church authority to another. It thus intrude[d] for the benefit of one segment of a church the power of the state into the forbidden area of religious freedom contrary to the principles of the First Amendment."[101] This holding invalidating legislative action was extended to judicial action in Kreshik, where the Court held that the constitutional guarantees of religious liberty required the reversal of a judgment of the New York courts

---

[100] Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 534–40, 543–46 (1993).

[101] Kedroff v. Saint Nicholas Cathedral, 344 U.S. 94, 116, 119 (1952).

that transferred control of St. Nicholas Cathedral from the central governing authority of the Russian Orthodox Church to the independent Russian Church of America.[102]

[H36] "[T]he First and Fourteenth Amendments permit hierarchical religious organizations to establish their own rules and regulations for internal discipline and government, and to create tribunals for adjudicating disputes over these matters. When this choice is exercised and ecclesiastical tribunals are created to decide disputes over the government and direction of subordinate bodies, the Constitution requires that civil courts accept their decisions as binding upon them."[103] Milivojevich involved a protracted dispute over the control of the Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese for the United States and Canada. During the course of this dispute, the Holy Assembly of Bishops and the Holy Synod of the Serbian Orthodox Church (Mother Church) suspended and ultimately removed and defrocked the bishop, Dionisije, and appointed another person as Administrator of the diocese, which the Mother Church then reorganized into three dioceses. The Serbian Orthodox Church was a hierarchical church, and the sole power to appoint and remove its bishops rested in the Holy Assembly and Holy Synod. The supreme court of Illinois held that Dionisije's removal and defrockment had to be set aside as "arbitrary," because the proceedings against him had not, in its view, been conducted in accordance with the Church's constitution and penal code, and that the diocesan reorganization was invalid, because it exceeded the scope of the Mother Church's authority to effectuate such changes without diocesan approval. The Court reversed the above decision. The fallacy fatal to the judgment of the Illinois supreme court was that it rested "upon an impermissible rejection of the decisions of the highest ecclesiastical tribunals of this hierarchical church upon the issues in dispute, and impermissibly substitute[d] its own inquiry into church polity and resolutions based thereon of those disputes."[104]

c. Internal Government Affairs

[H37] In Roy, the Court stressed that "the Free Exercise Clause is written in terms of what the government cannot do to the individual, not in terms of what the individual can extract from the government. . . . [This] Clause affords an individual protection from certain forms of governmental compulsion; it does not afford an individual a right to dictate the conduct of the Government's internal procedures. . . . [T]he First Amendment [does not] require the Government itself to behave in ways that the indi-

---

[102] Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 363 U.S. 190 (1960) (per curiam).

[103] Serbian E. Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, 426 U.S. 696, 724–25 (1976).

[104] Id. at 708. The Court noted that, "whether or not there is room for 'marginal civil court review' under the narrow rubrics of 'fraud' or 'collusion' when church tribunals act in bad faith for secular purposes, no 'arbitrariness' exception—in the sense of an inquiry whether the decisions of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of a hierarchical church complied with church laws and regulations—is consistent with the constitutional mandate that civil courts are bound to accept the decisions of the highest judicatories of a religious organization of hierarchical polity on matters of discipline, faith, internal organization, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law. For civil courts to analyze whether the ecclesiastical actions of a church judicatory are in that sense "arbitrary" must inherently entail inquiry into the procedures that canon or ecclesiastical law supposedly requires the church judicatory to follow, or else into the substantive criteria by which they are supposedly to decide the ecclesiastical question. But this is exactly the inquiry that the First Amendment prohibits." Id. at 713.

vidual believes will further his or her spiritual development or that of his or her family. The Free Exercise Clause simply cannot be understood to require the Government to conduct its own internal affairs in ways that comport with the religious beliefs of particular citizens. Just as the Government may not insist that one engage in any set form of religious observance, so one may not demand that the Government join in his chosen religious practices by refraining from using a number to identify" him or the members of his family.[105] In Lyng the Court held that the building of a road or the harvesting of timber on publicly owned land, used for religious purposes by Indian tribes, could not meaningfully be distinguished from the use of a Social Security number in Roy. "In both cases, the challenged Government action would interfere significantly with private persons' ability to pursue spiritual fulfillment according to their own religious beliefs. In neither case, however, would the affected individuals be coerced by the Government's action into violating their religious beliefs; nor would either governmental action penalize religious activity by denying any person an equal share of the rights, benefits, and privileges enjoyed by other citizens. . . . The First Amendment must apply to all citizens alike, and it can give to none of them a veto over public programs that do not prohibit the free exercise of religion. . . . [G]overnment simply could not operate if it were required to satisfy every citizen's religious needs and desires."[106]

d. Polygamy

[H38] Marriage, while from its very nature a sacred obligation, is nevertheless, in most civilized nations, a civil contract, regulated by law. Criminal laws against polygamy are constitutionally applicable to those whose religion commands the practice. In Reynolds, the Court upheld the polygamy conviction of a member of the Mormon faith despite the fact that an accepted doctrine of his church then imposed on its male members the duty to practice polygamy. In doing so, the Court noted that polygamy, which had always been an offense against society in every state of the union, "le[d] to the patriarchal principle, and . . . fetter[ed] the people in stationary despotism."[107] Similarly, Davis upheld against a free exercise challenge a law denying the right to vote or hold public office to members of organizations that practiced or encouraged polygamy.[108]

---

[105] Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 699–700 (1986). There the Court rejected a free exercise challenge to a federal statute that required the states to use Social Security numbers in administering certain welfare programs. Moreover, in applying the test later set forth in Smith, a three-member plurality concluded that the statutory requirement that applicants provide a Social Security number as a condition of eligibility for welfare benefits did not violate the Free Exercise Clause, because that requirement was facially neutral in religious terms, applied to all applicants for the benefits involved, clearly promoted a legitimate public interest (prevention of fraud in these benefit programs), and the Social Security number requirement was a reasonable means of promoting that goal. Id. at 701–08.

[106] Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 449, 452 (1988).

[107] Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 166 (1879). Cf. Cleveland v. United States, 329 U.S. 14, 18–19 (1946).

[108] Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890).

e. Religious Upbringing of Children

[H39] "[A] State's interest in universal education . . . is not totally free from a balancing process when it impinges on fundamental rights and interests, such as those specifically protected by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, and the traditional interest of parents with respect to the religious upbringing of their children so long as they . . . 'prepare [them] for additional obligations.' . . . It follows that, in order for [a state] to compel school attendance beyond the eighth grade against a claim that such attendance interferes with the practice of a legitimate religious belief, it must appear either that the State does not deny the free exercise of religious belief by its requirement or that there is a state interest of sufficient magnitude to override the interest claiming protection under the Free Exercise Clause."[109] In Yoder, Amish parents challenged a state statute requiring all children within the state to attend school until the age of 16. The parents' claim was that this compulsion interfered with Amish religious teachings emphasizing informal "learning through doing;" a life of "goodness," rather than a life of intellect; wisdom, rather than technical knowledge; community welfare, rather than competition; separation from, rather than integration with, contemporary worldly society; and avoidance of materialistic goals. In sustaining the parents' claim under the Free Exercise Clause, the Court found it necessary to balance the importance of the secular values advanced by the statute, the closeness of the fit between those ends and the means chosen, and the impact an exemption on religious grounds would have on the state's goals, on the one hand, against the sincerity and centrality of the objection to the state's goals to the sect's religious practice, and the extent to which the governmental regulation interfered with that practice, on the other hand. The Court stressed that, in view of their long history as an identifiable religious sect and as a successful and self-sufficient segment of American society, the Amish had demonstrated the sincerity of their religious beliefs, the interrelationship of belief with their mode of life, the vital role that belief and daily conduct play in the continuing survival of Old Order Amish communities, and the hazards presented by the state's enforcement of a statute generally valid as to others. Beyond this, the Amish carried the "difficult burden of demonstrating the adequacy of their alternative mode of continuing informal vocational education in terms of . . . [the] overall interest that the State advance[d] in support of its program of compulsory high school education." The Court noted that when the interests of parenthood are combined with a free exercise claim of the nature revealed by the record of that case, more than merely a "reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State" is required to sustain the validity of the state's requirement under the First Amendment. But the state failed to show, with sufficient particularity, how its admittedly strong interest in compulsory education would be adversely affected by granting an exemption to the Amish. In affirming the reversal of Yoder's conviction, the Court concluded that the record strongly indicated that "accommodating the religious objections of the Amish by forgoing one, or at most two, additional years of compulsory education [would] not impair the physical or mental health of the child or result in an inability to be self-supporting or to discharge the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, or in any other way materially detract from the welfare of society."[110]

---

[109] Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 214 (1972).

[110] Id. at 234–36.

[H40] However, "[t]he right to practice religion freely does not include liberty to expose the child to death, ill health, communicable disease, or other dangerous situations."[111] The zealous though lawful exercise of the right to engage in propagandizing the community, in religious matters, may create situations involving emotional excitement and psychological or physical injury. Hence, a mother may be prosecuted under the child labor laws for using her children to dispense literature in the streets, her religious motivation notwithstanding.[112] Moreover, the state may curtail parental authority to withhold necessary medical treatment for the child, even if the treatment violates the parent's and child's religion.[113]

f. Sunday Closing Laws

[H41] Braunfeld upheld a Sunday-closing law against the claim that it burdened the religious practices of persons whose religions compelled them to refrain from work on other days. In that case, appellants, Orthodox Jewish retailers, argued that, by compelling the Sunday closing of retail stores and thus making unavailable for business and shopping uses one-seventh part of the week, the challenged statute forced them either to give up the Sabbath observance—an essential part of their faith—or to forego advantages enjoyed by the non-Sabbatarian majority of the community. They pointed out, moreover, that, because of the prevailing five-day working week of a large proportion of the population, Sunday was a day peculiarly profitable to retail sellers. A four-member plurality noted that the statute did not make unlawful any religious practices of Sabbatarians; it simply made the practice of their religious beliefs more expensive. On the other hand, the state had a strong interest in improving the health, morals, and general well-being of the citizens, by establishing a day of community tranquillity, respite, and recreation, a day when the atmosphere would be one of calm and relaxation, rather than one of commercialism. This objective could be achieved, the Court found, only by declaring Sunday to be that day of rest. "People of all religions and people with no religion regard Sunday as a time for family activity, for visiting friends and relatives, for late sleeping, for passive and active entertainments, for dining out, and the like. . . . It would seem unrealistic for enforcement purposes and perhaps detrimental to the general welfare to require a State to choose a common day of rest other than that which most persons would select of their own accord."[114] Requiring exemptions for Sabbatarians, while theoretically possible, would present great enforcement problems, since there would be two or more days to police, rather than one, and it would be more difficult to observe whether violations occur. Moreover, to allow only people who rest on a day other than Sunday to keep their businesses open on that day may well provide these people with an economic advantage over their competitors who must remain closed on that day; this might cause the Sunday observers to complain that their religions are being discriminated against. Finally, administration of such a provision might make necessary a state-conducted inquiry into religious belief. Therefore, requiring exemptions for Sabbatarians appeared to present an administrative problem of such magnitude, or to

---

111 Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166–67 (1944).

112 Id. at 165–71. The Court found no constitutional infirmity in excluding these children from doing there what no other children could do.

113 See Jehovah's Witnesses v. King County Hosp., 278 F. Supp. 488 (W.D. Wash. 1967), aff'd, 390 U.S. 598 (1968).

114 See McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 451–52 (1961).

afford the exempted class so great a competitive advantage, that such a requirement would have rendered the entire statutory scheme unworkable.[115]

g. Denial of Government Benefits Because of Conduct Mandated by Religious Belief[116]

[H42] Under Sherbert, Thomas, and Hobbie, "where the state conditions receipt of an important benefit upon conduct proscribed by a religious faith, or where it denies such a benefit because of conduct mandated by religious belief, thereby putting substantial pressure on an adherent to modify his behavior and to violate his beliefs, a burden upon religion exists, . . . [which can be justified only by a] showing that it is the least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest."[117] However, this test was later abandoned. As the Court held in Smith, these cases stand only for "the proposition that where the State has in place a system of individual exemptions, it may not refuse to extend that system to cases of religious hardship without compelling reason."[118] A statute providing that a person is not eligible for unemployment compensation benefits if, "without good cause," he quit work or refused available work, creates a mechanism for individualized exemptions. When a state creates such a mechanism, its refusal to extend an exemption to an instance of religious hardship suggests a discriminatory intent. Thus, to consider an employee's religiously motivated resignation to be "without good cause," or to constitute "misconduct connected with his work," "tends to exhibit hostility, not neutrality, towards religion. . . . [Therefore, in such cases, it is] appropriate to require the State to demonstrate a compelling reason for denying the requested exemption."[119]

[H43] In Sherbert, the Court considered South Carolina's denial of unemployment compensation benefits to a Sabbatarian who refused to work on Saturdays. The Court held that the state's disqualification of Sherbert forced her to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand. Governmental imposition of such a choice put "the same kind of burden upon the free exercise of religion as would a fine imposed against" her for her Saturday worship. Moreover, the Court found that no compelling state interest, enforced in the eligibility provisions of the South Carolina statute, justified the substantial infringement of Sherbert's free exercise rights. The state suggested no more than a possibility that the filing of fraudulent claims by unscrupulous claimants feigning religious objections to Saturday work might not only dilute the unemployment compensation fund but also hinder the scheduling by employers of necessary Saturday work. In rejecting the argu-

---

115 Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 602–09 (1961) (plurality opinion of four members of the Court). In advancing similar arguments, another two Justices rejected appellants' claim under the Free Exercise Clause. See Braunfield, supra, at 610 (separate opinion of Justices Frankfurter and Harlan in McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 459, 495–522 (1961)).

116 See also paras. H19, H52–H53.

117 Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 717–18 (1981). See also Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 402–04 (1963); Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136, 141–42 (1987).

118 Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 884 (1990) (emphasis added).

119 See Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 708 (1986) (plurality opinion of three Justices, discussing Sherbert and Thomas).

ment, the Court noted, inter alia, that, "even if the possibility of spurious claims did threaten to dilute the fund and disrupt the scheduling of work, it would plainly be incumbent upon [the state] to demonstrate that no alternative forms of regulation would combat such abuses without infringing First Amendment rights."[120]

[H44] In Thomas, too, the Court held that Indiana's denial of unemployment benefits unlawfully burdened an employee's right to free exercise of religion. Thomas, a Jehovah's Witness, held religious beliefs that forbade his participation in the production of armaments. He was forced to leave his job when the employer closed his department and transferred him to a division that fabricated turrets for tanks. Indiana then denied Thomas unemployment compensation benefits. The Court found that the employee had been "put to a choice between fidelity to religious belief or cessation of work," and that the coercive impact of the forfeiture of benefits in this situation was undeniable. The state argued that the disqualifying provisions of its unemployment compensation scheme aimed (1) to avoid the widespread unemployment and the consequent burden on the fund resulting if people were permitted to leave jobs for "personal" reasons; and (2) to avoid a detailed probing by employers into job applicants' religious beliefs. Although these were not unimportant considerations, the Court concluded that the interests advanced by the state did not justify the burden placed on free exercise of religion. First, there was no evidence in the record to indicate that the number of people who found themselves in the predicament of choosing between benefits and religious beliefs was large enough to create widespread unemployment, or even to seriously affect unemployment. Second, although detailed inquiry by employers into applicants' religious beliefs was undesirable, there was no evidence in the record to indicate that such inquiries would occur in Indiana, or that they had occurred in any of the states that extended benefits to people in the petitioner's position. Nor was there any reason to believe that the number of people terminating employment for religious reasons would be so great as to motivate employers to make such inquiries.[121]

[H45] In Hobbie, Florida's denial of unemployment compensation benefits to an employee discharged for her refusal to work on her Sabbath, because of religious convictions adopted subsequent to employment, was also declared to be a violation of the Free Exercise Clause. In Sherbert and Thomas, the employees held their respective religious beliefs at the time of hire; subsequent changes in the conditions of employment made by the employer caused the conflict between work and belief. In that case, Hobbie's beliefs changed during the course of her employment, creating a conflict between job and faith that had not previously existed. The state contended that it would be unfair for an employee to adopt religious beliefs that conflict with existing employment and expect to continue the employment without compromising those beliefs, and that this intentional disregard of the employer's interests constituted misconduct. In effect, the state asked the Court "to single out the religious convert for different, less favorable treatment than that given an individual whose adherence to his or her faith

---

[120] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 404, 407 (1963).

[121] Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Sec. Div., 450 U.S. 707, 717–19 (1981). Similarly, in Frazee v. Illinois Department of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 835 (1989), the Court held that the fact that Sunday work had become a way of life did not constitute a state interest sufficiently compelling to override a legitimate free-exercise claim, since there was no evidence that there would be a mass movement away from Sunday employment if appellant succeeded on his claim.

precede[d] employment." The Court declined to do so, noting that "[t]he First Amendment protects the free exercise rights of employees who adopt religious beliefs or convert from one faith to another after they are hired."[122]

[H46] "[I]f a State has prohibited through its criminal laws certain kinds of religiously motivated conduct without violating the First Amendment, it certainly follows that it may impose the lesser burden of denying unemployment compensation benefits to persons who engage in that conduct."[123] In Smith II, the Court considered a Free Exercise Clause claim brought by members of the Native American Church who were denied unemployment benefits when they lost their jobs, because they had used peyote. Their practice was to ingest peyote for sacramental purposes, and they challenged an Oregon statute of general applicability that made use of the drug criminal. In rejecting the claim, the Court declined to apply the balancing test set forth in Sherbert, and held that neutral, generally applicable laws may be applied to religious practices even when not supported by a compelling governmental interest. The Court concluded that if peyote use is prohibited under state law, and because that prohibition is constitutional, a state can, consistent with the Free Exercise Clause, deny an individual unemployment compensation when his dismissal results from use of the drug.[124]

h. Exclusion of the Pursuit of a Devotional Theology Degree from a Scholarship Aid Program

[H47] Davey held that Washington, pursuant to its own Constitution, prohibiting even indirectly funding religious instruction that would prepare students for the ministry, could deny them such funding without violating the Free Exercise Clause. In reaching this conclusion, the Court rejected the contention that the challenged scholarship program—under which students might not use the scholarship to pursue a devotional theology degree—was presumptively unconstitutional because it was not facially neutral with respect to religion. The Court, first, noted that the state imposed neither criminal nor civil sanctions on any type of religious service or rite. It did not deny to ministers the right to participate in the political affairs of the community. And it did not require students to choose between their religious beliefs and receiving a government benefit. The state had "merely chosen not to fund a distinct category of instruction." Second, "[t]raining someone to lead a congregation is an essentially religious endeavor. Indeed, majoring in devotional theology is akin to a religious calling as well as an academic pursuit. . . . And the subject of religion is one in which both the United States and state constitutions embody distinct views—in favor of free exercise, but opposed to establishment—that find no counterpart with respect to other callings or professions. That a State would deal differently with religious education for the ministry than with education for other callings is a product of these views, not evidence of hostility toward religion."[125] Far from evincing the hostility toward religion, the scholarship program went a long way toward including religion in its benefits. The program permitted students

---

[122] Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136, 144 (1987).

[123] Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of the State of Oregon v. Smith, 485 U.S. 660, 670 (1988) (Smith I).

[124] Employment Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 884, 890 (1990) (Smith II).

[125] Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 721 (2004).

to attend pervasively religious schools, so long as they were accredited, and to take devotional theology courses. In short, the Court found neither in the history or text of the Washington Constitution, nor in the operation of the scholarship program, anything that suggested animus towards religion. Given the historic and substantial interest of the state in avoiding an establishment of religion, the Court therefore could not conclude that the denial of funding for vocational religious instruction alone was inherently constitutionally suspect. Without a presumption of unconstitutionality, the Court found no violation of the Free Exercise Clause, considering that "the State's interest in not funding the pursuit of devotional degrees [wa]s substantial and the exclusion of such funding place[d] a relatively minor burden on" students. For the same reasons, the Court decided that the program was not a violation of the Equal Protection Clause or of the Establishment Clause.[126]

i. Taxation

[H48] "The exaction of a tax as a condition to the exercise of religious freedom is as obnoxious . . . as the imposition of a censorship or a previous restraint. For . . . 'the power to tax the exercise of a constitutional privilege is the power to control or suppress its enjoyment.'"[127] In Murdock, the Court ruled that a city could not impose a flat fee payable by "all persons canvassing for or soliciting orders for goods, paintings, pictures, wares, or merchandise of any kind" on Jehovah's Witnesses who went about from door to door distributing literature and soliciting people to purchase certain religious books and pamphlets. The Court noted that the charge was "not a nominal fee imposed as a regulatory measure to defray the expense of policing the activities in question" and was in no way apportioned to the realized revenues, but constituted "a flat license tax." To the extent this license tax was levied and collected as a condition to the pursuit of activities whose enjoyment was guaranteed by the First Amendment, it was impermissible, since it "restrain[ed] in advance the constitutional liberties of press and religion and inevitably tend[ed] to suppress their exercise."[128] The Court extended Murdock the following term by invalidating, as applied to one who earned his livelihood as an evangelist or preacher in his home town, an ordinance that required all booksellers to pay a flat fee to procure an occupational license to sell books.[129]

[H49] Hence, "[t]he constitutional rights of those spreading their religious beliefs through the spoken and printed word are not to be gauged by standards governing retailers or wholesalers of books."[130] Nevertheless, as the Court pointed out in the Murdock case, "the distinction between 'religious' activity and 'purely commercial' activity would at times be 'vital' in determining the constitutionality of flat license taxes."[131] "[W]hen a religious sect uses ordinary commercial methods of sales of articles to raise

---

[126] Id. at 724–25.

[127] Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 577 (1944), quoting Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 112 (1943).

[128] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 113–14 (1943), overruling Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942).

[129] Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 576–77 (1944).

[130] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 111 (1943).

[131] Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 576 (1944), discussing Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 110 (1943).

propaganda funds, it is proper for the state to charge reasonable fees for the privilege of canvassing. Situations will arise where it will be difficult to determine whether a particular activity is religious or purely commercial."[132] But preachers of religious faiths "are not engaged in commercial undertakings because they are dependent on their calling for a living."[133] "[T]he mere fact that the religious literature is 'sold' by itinerant preachers, rather than 'donated,' does not transform evangelism into a commercial enterprise. If it did, then the passing of the collection plate in church would make the church service a commercial project."[134]

[H50] "The exemption from a license tax of a preacher who preaches or a parishioner who listens does not mean that either is free from all financial burdens of government, including taxes on income or property."[135] The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment does not prohibit a state from imposing a generally applicable sales and use tax on the distribution of religious materials by a religious organization. Thus, in Jimmy Swaggart, the Court upheld a California law requiring retailers to pay a 6-percent sales tax on in-state sales of tangible personal property and to collect from state residents a 6-percent use tax on such property purchased outside the state. In so concluding, the Court observed that it would be "possible to imagine that a more onerous tax rate, even if generally applicable, might effectively choke off an adherent's religious practices."[136]

[H51] "The tax system could not function if denominations were allowed to challenge the tax system because tax payments were spent in a manner that violates their religious belief. . . . If, for example, a religious adherent believes war is a sin, and if a certain percentage of the federal budget can be identified as devoted to war-related activities, such individuals would have a valid claim to be exempt from paying that percentage of the income tax. . . . [F]urthermore, the obligation to pay the social security tax is not fundamentally different from the obligation to pay income taxes."[137] Subsequently, members of the Old Order Amish, who believe that there is a religiously based obligation to provide for their fellow members the kind of assistance contemplated by the Social Security system, cannot claim that the Free Exercise Clause commands their exemption from Social Security tax obligations. Indeed, "it would be very difficult to accommodate the comprehensive social security system with myriad exceptions flowing from a wide variety of religious beliefs."[138] Besides, granting such an exemption would impose the employer's religious faith on the employees.[139]

[H52] Hernandez held that the government's disallowance of a tax deduction for religious "auditing" and "training" services did not violate the Free Exercise Clause. The

---

[132] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 110 (1943).

[133] Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 576 (1944).

[134] Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 111 (1943).

[135] Follett v. McCormick, 321 U.S. 573, 577–78 (1944).

[136] Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Bd. of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378, 392 (1990). See also Texas Monthly Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 21–25 (1989) (three-Justice plurality).

[137] United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 260 (1982).

[138] Id. at 259–60.

[139] Id. at 261. The Court also noted that the statute at issue did not compel anyone to accept benefits; hence, it would be possible for an Amish member, upon qualifying for Social Security benefits, to receive and pass them along to an Amish fund having parallel objectives. Id. at 261, n.12.

Court reasoned that "[a]ny burden imposed on auditing or training derive[d] solely from the fact that, as a result of the deduction denial, adherents ha[d] less money to gain access to such sessions. This burden [wa]s no different from that imposed by any public tax or fee; indeed, the burden imposed by the denial of the 'contribution or gift' deduction would seem to pale by comparison to the overall federal income tax burden on an adherent." And the fact that Congress had already crafted some deductions and exemptions in the Internal Revenue Code was of no consequence, "for the guiding principle is that a tax must be uniformly applicable to all, except as Congress provides explicitly otherwise."[140]

[H53] In Bob Jones, the Court upheld an IRS ruling that revoked the tax-exempt status of private schools practicing racial discrimination, on the basis of religious beliefs. As the Court noted, although denial of tax benefits would "inevitably have a substantial impact on the operation of private religious schools, . . . [it] would not prevent those schools from observing their religious tenets." In addition, the government had a fundamental, overriding interest in eradicating racial discrimination in education. Thus, the ruling at issue was upheld against a free exercise challenge.[141]

j. Military Regulations

[H54] To accomplish its mission, "the military must foster instinctive obedience, unity, commitment, and esprit de corps. . . . The essence of military service 'is the subordination of the desires and interests of the individual to the needs of the service.' . . . These aspects of military life do not, of course, render entirely nugatory in the military context the guarantees of the First Amendment. . . . But 'within the military community, there is simply not the same individual autonomy as there is in the larger civilian community.' . . . [Hence,] when evaluating whether military needs justify a particular restriction on religiously motivated conduct, courts must give great deference to the professional judgment of military authorities concerning the relative importance of a particular military interest."[142] Goldman involved military dress regulations that forbade the wearing of a yarmulke (and similar religiously motivated headcoverings), while on duty. Petitioner contended that the Free Exercise Clause required the Air Force to make an exception to its uniform dress requirements for religious apparel unless the accouterments created a "clear danger" of undermining discipline and esprit de corps. This argument was rejected. The Court noted that "the First Amendment does not require the military to accommodate such religious practices in the face of its view that they would detract from the uniformity sought by the dress regulations." Consequently, the challenged regulations were upheld, "as reasonably and evenhandedly regulating dress in the interest of the military's perceived need for uniformity."[143]

k. Prison Regulations

[H55] "Inmates clearly retain protections afforded by the First Amendment, . . . including its directive that no law shall prohibit the free exercise of religion."[144] Hence,

---

140 Hernandez v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680, 699–700 (1989).

141 Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 603–04 (1983).

142 Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 507 (1986).

143 Id. at 509–10.

144 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 348 (1987).

a state violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments when it denies a Buddhist prisoner a reasonable opportunity to pursue his religious faith, comparable to that offered other prisoners adhering to conventional religious precepts.[145]

[H56] However, lawful incarceration brings about the necessary limitation of religious freedom that is justified by the considerations underlying the penal system. When a prison regulation impinges on inmates' free exercise rights, the regulation is valid if it is "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests." In O'Lone, the Court refused to apply a "least restrictive alternative" standard for regulation of prisoner work rules having an impact on religious observance. There, prisoners in a state prison, members of the Islamic faith, challenged policies adopted by prison officials that resulted in their inability to attend Jumu'ah, a weekly Muslim congregational service regularly held in the main prison building and in a separate facility known as "the Farm" (Jumu'ah is commanded by the Koran, and must be held every Friday after the sun reaches its zenith and before the Asr, or afternoon prayer). The first such policy, Standard 853, required inmates in respondents' custody classifications to work outside the buildings in which they were housed and in which Jumu'ah was held, while the second, a policy memorandum, prohibited inmates assigned to outside work from returning to those buildings during the day. The Court found that both policies had a logical connection to the legitimate governmental interests in institutional order and security invoked to justify them. Standard 853 was a response to critical overcrowding and was designed to ease tension and drain on the facilities during that part of the day when the inmates were outside the confines of the main buildings. The policy memorandum was necessary, since returns from outside work details generated congestion and delays at the main gate, a high-risk area, and since the need to decide return requests placed pressure on guards supervising outside work details. Rehabilitative concerns also supported the policy memorandum, for corrections officials sought thereby to simulate working conditions and responsibilities in society. In addition, although the policies at issue might prevent some Muslim prisoners from attending Jumu'ah, their reasonableness was supported by the fact that respondents were not deprived of all forms of religious exercise but instead freely observed a number of their religious obligations. Finally, the case for the validity of these regulations was strengthened by examination of the impact that accommodation of respondents' asserted right would have on other inmates, on prison personnel, and on allocation of prison resources generally. Each of respondents' suggested accommodations—including placing all Muslim inmates in one or two inside work details or providing weekend labor for Muslim inmates—would, in the judgment of prison officials, have adverse effects on the institution. Inside work details for gang minimum inmates would be inconsistent with the legitimate concerns underlying Standard 853, and the district court had found that the extra supervision necessary to establish weekend details for Muslim prisoners would be a drain on scarce human resources at the prison. Prison officials determined that the alternatives would also threaten prison security by allowing "affinity groups" in the prison to flourish. Finally, the officials determined that special arrangements for one group would create problems, as other inmates would see that a certain segment was escaping a rigorous work detail and perceive favoritism. These concerns of prison administrators provided adequate support for the conclusion that accommodations of respondents' request to attend Jumu'ah would have undesirable results in the institution. These difficulties also made clear that there were no "obvious, easy alternatives" to the policy adopted by the prison administration.[146]

---

[145] Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972) (per curiam).

2. The Establishment Clause

a. In General

[H57] The First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." This provision is operative against the states by virtue of the Fourteenth Amendment.[147] The first and most immediate purpose of the Establishment Clause "rested on the belief that a union of government and religion tends to destroy government and to degrade religion. The history of governmentally established religion, both in England and in [the United States,] showed that whenever government had allied itself with one particular form of religion, the inevitable result had been that it had incurred the hatred, disrespect and even contempt of those who held contrary beliefs. That same history showed that many people had lost their respect for any religion that had relied upon the support of government to spread its faith. The Establishment Clause thus stands as an expression of principle on the part of the Founders of the Constitution that religion is too personal, too sacred, too holy, to permit its 'unhallowed perversion' by a civil magistrate."[148]

[H58] In the absence of precisely stated constitutional prohibitions, the Court has drawn lines with reference to the three main evils against which the Establishment Clause was intended to afford protection: "sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity."[149] The "establishment of religion" Clause "means at least this: neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or to remain

---

146 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 350–53 (1987). The four dissenters noted that the majority's analysis ignored the fact that Jumu'ah is the central religious ceremony of Muslims, comparable to the Saturday service of the Jewish faith and the Sunday service of the various Christian sects. And "to deny the opportunity to affirm membership in a spiritual community [might] extinguish an inmate's last source of hope for dignity and redemption." Id. at 368. Moreover, the fact that Muslim inmates were able to participate in Jumu'ah throughout the entire federal prison system suggested that the practice was, under normal circumstances, compatible with the demands of prison administration. Hence, a reasonableness test in this case demanded at least minimal substantiation by prison officials that alternatives that would permit participation in Jumu'ah were infeasible. Therefore, the dissenters would require prison officials to demonstrate that the restrictions they had imposed were necessary to further an important government interest, and that these restrictions were no greater than necessary to achieve prison objectives. Id. at 354.

See also para. H61, n.160 (federal law prohibiting substantial burdens on the religious exercise of prisoners, unless the burden furthers a compelling governmental interest, by the least restrictive means, is not barred by the Establishment Clause).

147 See, e.g., Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 49–50 (1985) (the Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibits any state from depriving any person of liberty without due process of law, imposes the same substantive limitations on the states' power to legislate that the First Amendment has always imposed on the Congress' power).

148 Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 431–32 (1962).

149 Walz v. Tax Comm'n of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

away from church against his will or force him to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or non-attendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups, and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect 'a wall of separation between church and State.'"[150] "The First Amendment, however, does not say that, in every and all respects, there shall be a separation of Church and State. Rather, it . . . defines the manner, the specific ways, in which there shall be no concert or union or dependency one on the other."[151] The First Amendment "requires the state to be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and nonbelievers; it does not require the state to be their adversary. State power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions than it is to favor them."[152]

b. Relation Between the Two Religious Clauses

[H59] The Court has "said that 'there is room for play in the joints' between [the two religious clauses.] . . . In other words, there are some state actions permitted by the Establishment Clause but not required by the Free Exercise Clause."[153] In this context, the Court has held, for example, that, given the historic and substantial anti-establishment interest of a state, the denial of state funding for vocational religious instruction alone does not amount to hostility toward religion and is not a violation of the Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses.[154]

[H60] "The principle that government may accommodate the free exercise of religion does not supersede the fundamental limitations imposed by the Establishment Clause. It is beyond dispute that, at a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise, or otherwise act in a way which establishes a state religion or religious faith, or tends to do so."[155] Hence, the Free Exercise Clause does not mean "that a majority [can] use the machinery of the State to practice its beliefs."[156] Nor does it mean that government may grant an employee a right not to work on his Sabbath.[157]

[H61] Nevertheless, "[t]he limits of permissible state accommodation to religion are by no means coextensive with the noninterference mandated by the Free Exercise Clause."[158] "The Government's rights to the use of its own land, for example, need not

---

150 Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 15–16 (1947).

151 Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 312 (1952).

152 Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 18 (1947).

153 Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712, 718–19 (2004).

154 Id. at 720–25. See, in extenso, para. H47.

155 Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 587 (1992).

156 Sch. Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 226 (1963) (invalidating a state practice of permitting public schools to read Bible verses at the opening of each school day).

157 Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 472 U.S. 703, 709–10 (1985).

158 Walz v. Tax Comm'n of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 673 (1970) (a state tax exemption for church property does not violate the Establishment Clause). See, in extenso, para. H107.

and should not discourage it from accommodating religious practices" engaged in by members of certain Indian tribes.[159] Further, religious exercise may be accorded heightened protection from government-imposed lawful burdens, for example, in the prison context.[160] Religious organizations may be exempted from a statutory prohibition of religious discrimination in employment.[161] Moreover, the state may encourage religious instruction or cooperate with religious authorities by adjusting the schedule of public events to sectarian needs, "[f]or it then respects the religious nature of [the American] people and accommodates the public service to their spiritual needs. To hold that it may not would be to find in the Constitution a requirement that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups. That would be preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe."[162] Thus, in Zorach, the Court found no constitutional objection to a municipal program permitting public school children to absent themselves one hour a week for religious observance and education outside the school grounds.[163]

[H62] The Court has recognized that the government sometimes must accommodate religious practices, and that such accommodations do not violate the Establishment Clause.[164] In Yoder, involving a judicial exemption of Amish children from compulsory attendance at high school, the Court noted that "[t]he purpose and effect of such an exemption [we]re not to support, favor, advance, or assist the Amish, but to allow their centuries-old religious society to survive free from the heavy impediment compliance with the [state] compulsory education law would impose."[165] And, in Sherbert, the Court disapproved a state's attempt to deny unemployment compensation benefits to a member of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church who declined to work on Saturday, stressing that such an accommodation "reflects nothing more than the governmental obligation

---

159 Lyng v. Nw. Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 454 (1988).

160 See Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709 (2005). This case involved Section 3 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, providing in part: "No government shall impose a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person residing in or confined to an institution," unless the burden furthers "a compelling governmental interest," and does so by "the least restrictive means." The Court held that the foregoing provision is, on its face, compatible with the Establishment Clause, because "it alleviates exceptional government-created burdens on private religious exercise," without elevating accommodation of religious observances over an institution's need to maintain order and safety. Id. at 720, 722. In this regard, the Court stressed that "an accommodation must be measured so that it does not override other significant interests." Id. at 722 (emphasis added). Moreover, it observed that, while the Act adopts a "compelling interest" standard, context matters in the application of that standard, and that lawmakers anticipated that courts would apply the Act's standard with due deference to prison administrators' experience and expertise. Finally, the Court rejected the argument that the Act was invalid "as impermissibly advancing religion by giving greater protection to religious rights than to other constitutionally protected rights," noting, in particular, that "religious accommodations need not come packaged with benefits to secular entities or with additional protections for other fundamental rights." Id. at 724 (emphasis added).

161 Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 334–40 (1987). See, in extenso, para. H137.

162 Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314 (1952).

163 Id. at 313–15.

164 See Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136, 144–45 (1987); Bd. of Educ. of Kiryas Joel Vill. Sch. Dist. v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687, 705–06 (1994).

165 Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 234, n.22 (1972).

of neutrality in the face of religious differences, and does not represent that involvement of religious with secular institutions which it is the object of the Establishment Clause to forestall."[166]

c. Applicable Standards of Review

[H63] Under Lemon, a statute or practice that touches upon religion, if it is to be permissible under the Establishment Clause, "must have a secular purpose; it must neither advance nor inhibit religion in its principal or primary effect; and it must not foster an excessive entanglement with religion."[167] The Court has recognized that these "are no more than helpful signposts."[168] For example, Marsh ignored the Lemon framework entirely and was decided by reference to historical practices and understandings.[169] The Court's decision in Lee conspicuously avoided using the Lemon test, but also declined the invitation to repudiate it.[170] Nevertheless, during recent years, a majority of the members of the Court has disapproved the Lemon test.[171]

[H64] Lemon's first prong focuses on the purpose that animated adoption of the challenged law. The purpose prong of the Lemon test asks whether government's actual predominant purpose is "to endorse or disapprove of religion."[172] "This does not mean that the law's purpose must be unrelated to religion—that would amount to a requirement 'that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups,' . . . and the Establishment Clause has never been so interpreted. Rather, Lemon's 'purpose' requirement aims at preventing the relevant governmental decisionmaker . . . from abandoning neutrality and acting with the intent of promoting a particular point of view in religious matters."[173] This intention may be evidenced by promotion of religion, in gen-

---

166 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 409 (1963).

167 Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612–13 (1971).

168 Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 741 (1973).

169 See Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983) (upholding state legislative chaplains).

170 Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 568–567 (1992).

171 See Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 398–400 (1993) (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., concurring in judgment); Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 655–57 (1989) (Kennedy, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part); Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 346–49 (1987) (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 107–13 (1985) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

According to Justice O'Connor, the inquiry framed by the Lemon test should be "whether government's purpose is to endorse or disapprove of religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement or disapproval." See Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 69 (1985).

172 See Edward v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 585 (1987), in conjunction with McCreary County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005).

173 Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 335 (1987) ("it is a permissible legislative purpose to alleviate significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions"). See also McCreary County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005) ("[T]he First Amendment mandates governmental neutrality between religion and religion, and between religion and nonreligion. . . . When the government acts with the ostensible and predominant purpose of advancing religion, it violates that central Establishment Clause value of official religious neutrality, there being no neutrality when the government's ostensible object is to take sides.").

eral,[174] or by advancement of a particular religious belief.[175] While the Court is normally deferential to a state's articulation of a secular purpose, it is required that the statement of such purpose be sincere and not a sham.[176] For example, in Stone, the Court held that a statute requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public schools violated the Establishment Clause, even though the Kentucky legislature asserted that its goal was educational.[177] If a statute does not have a clearly secular purpose, no consideration of the second or third criteria of Lemon is necessary. For even though a statute, which is motivated in part by a religious purpose, may satisfy the first criterion, the First Amendment requires that a statute must be invalidated if it is entirely or predominantly motivated by a purpose to advance religion.[178]

[H65] "A law is not unconstitutional simply because it allows churches to advance religion, which is their very purpose. For a law to have forbidden 'effects' under Lemon, it must be fair to say that the government itself has advanced religion through its own activities and influence."[179] In assessing a law's "effect," the Court examines the character of the institutions benefited or prejudiced (e.g., whether the institutions were predominantly religious)[180] and the nature of the challenged government action (e.g., whether

---

[174] See Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 52–53 (1985) (the Establishment Clause protects individual freedom of conscience "to select any religious faith or none at all"). See also McCreary County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005) ("Manifesting a purpose to favor one faith over another, or adherence to religion generally, clashes with the understanding, reached after decades of religious war, that liberty and social stability demand a religious tolerance that respects the religious views of all citizens. . . . By showing a purpose to favor religion, the government sends the message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members.").

[175] See, e.g., Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41 (1980) (per curiam) (invalidating a statute requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public school rooms).

[176] See Edward v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 586–87 (1987).

[177] Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41–42 (1980).

[178] See Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 56 (1985); McCreary County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005). In the latter case, the Court explicitly rejected the County's request to abandon Lemon's purpose test. In doing so, the Court stated, inter alia: "[S]crutinizing purpose does make practical sense, as in Establishment Clause analysis, where an understanding of official objective emerges from readily discoverable fact, without any judicial psychoanalysis of a drafter's heart of hearts. . . . The eyes that look to purpose belong to an 'objective observer,' one who takes account of the traditional external signs that show up in the text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute, or comparable official act. . . . [O]ne consequence of the corollary that Establishment Clause analysis does not look to the veiled psyche of government officers could be that in some of the cases in which establishment complaints failed, savvy officials had disguised their religious intent so cleverly that the objective observer just missed it. But that is no reason for great constitutional concern. If someone in the government hides religious motive so well that the 'objective observer, acquainted with the text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute,' cannot see it, then without something more the government does not make a divisive announcement that in itself amounts to taking religious sides. A secret motive stirs up no strife and does nothing to make outsiders of nonadherents, and it suffices to wait and see whether such government action turns out to have (as it may even be likely to have) the illegitimate effect of advancing religion." Id.

[179] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 337 (1987).

[180] See Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 232 (1997), citing Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 363–64 (1975).

it was neutral and non-ideological).[181] "In recent years, [the Court] has paid particularly close attention to whether the challenged governmental practice has the effect of 'endorsing' religion. . . . Of course, the word 'endorsement' is not self-defining. Rather, it derives its meaning from other words that th[e] Court has found useful over the years in interpreting the Establishment Clause."[182] Thus, it has been noted that the prohibition against governmental endorsement of religion "precludes government from conveying or attempting to convey a message that religion or a particular religious belief is favored or preferred."[183] "Moreover, the term 'endorsement' is closely linked to the term 'promotion,'"[184] and the Court has held that government "may not promote one religion or religious theory against another or even against the militant opposite."[185] "Whether the key word is 'endorsement,' 'favoritism,' or 'promotion,'[186] the essential principle remains the same. The Establishment Clause, at the very least, prohibits government from appearing to take a position on questions of religious belief or from 'making adherence to a religion relevant in any way to a person's standing in the political community.'"[187]

[H66] "[T]he First Amendment rests upon the premise that both religion and government can best work to achieve their lofty aims if each is left free from the other within its respective sphere."[188] "When the state becomes enmeshed with a given denomination in matters of religious significance, the freedom of religious belief of those who are not adherents of that denomination suffers, even when the governmental purpose underlying the involvement is largely secular. In addition, the freedom of even the adherents of the denomination is limited by the governmental intrusion into sacred matters."[189] In Agostini, "the Court folded the entanglement inquiry into the primary effect inquiry. This made sense because both inquiries rely on the same factors, . . . and the degree of entanglement has implications for whether a statute advances or inhibits religion."[190] Indeed, "[e]ntanglement must be 'excessive' before it runs afoul of the Establishment Clause."[191]

---

[181] Cf. Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 232 (1997), citing Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 18 (1947). A law does not have the primary effect of advancing religion merely because it happens to coincide with the tenets of some religions. See Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 613 (1988).

[182] Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 592–93 (1989) (emphasis added).

[183] Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 70 (1985) (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment) (emphasis added).

[184] Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 593 (1989).

[185] Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104 (1968).

[186] See Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 59–60 (1985), using the concepts of "endorsement," "promotion," and "favoritism" interchangeably.

[187] Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 593–94 (1989) (emphasis added). In that case, five Justices found the likely reaction of a "reasonable observer" relevant for purposes of determining whether an endorsement was present. Id. at 620 (opinion of Blackmun, J.); id. at 635–36 (opinion of O'Connor, J.); id. at 642–43 (opinion of Brennan, J. joined by Marshall and Stevens, JJ.).

[188] McCollum v. Bd. of Educ., 333 U.S. 203, 212 (1948).

[189] Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 409–10 (1985).

[190] See Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 668–69 (2002), citing Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 232–33 (1997).

[191] Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 233 (1997), citing Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 615–17 (1988) (no excessive entanglement where government reviews the adolescent counseling program set up by the religious institutions that are grantees, reviews the materials used by such grantees, and monitors the program by periodic visits); Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of

[H67] What is crucial to a non-entangling aid program is the ability of the state to identify and subsidize separate secular functions carried out at the religious institution, without on-site inspections and government analysis of the institution's expenditures on secular, as distinguished from religious, activities being necessary to prevent diversion of the funds to sectarian purposes;[192] "[t]he prospect of church and state litigating in court about what does or does not have religious meaning touches the very core of the constitutional guarantee against religious establishment."[193] Such "pervasive monitoring by public authorities may infringe precisely those Establishment Clause values at the root of the prohibition of excessive entanglement."[194] By contrast, under the Court's current Establishment Clause understanding, the considerations whether a government aid program requires "administrative cooperation" between the government and sectarian institutions, and whether such a program might increase the dangers of "political divisiveness" are deemed insufficient to create an "excessive entanglement."[195] Moreover, "generally applicable administrative and recordkeeping regulations may be imposed on religious organizations without running afoul of the Establishment Clause."[196] "[R]outine regulatory interaction, [such as application of neutral tax laws,] which involves no inquiries into religious doctrine, . . . no delegation of state power to a religious body, . . . and no detailed monitoring, . . . does not of itself violate the nonentanglement command."[197]

[H68] In cases "where a statute is neutral on its face and motivated by a permissible purpose of limiting governmental interference with the exercise of religion, [the Court has seen] no justification for applying strict scrutiny to a statute that passes the Lemon test. The proper inquiry is whether [the legislature] has chosen a rational classification to further a legitimate end."[198]

[H69] The Lemon test is "intended to apply to laws affording a uniform benefit to all religions and not to provisions . . . that discriminate among religions."[199] Larson held that a statute granting denominational preferences must be treated as suspect, and strict scrutiny must be applied in adjudging its constitutionality. A statute that facially exempts from state registration and reporting requirements only those religious organizations that derive more than half their funds from members clearly grants denominational preferences and, consequently, is invalid, "unless it is justified by a compelling governmental interest . . . and unless it is closely fitted to further that interest."[200]

Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 764–65 (1976) (no excessive entanglement where state conducts annual audits to ensure that categorical state grants to religious colleges are not used to teach religion).

192 See Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 765 (1976); Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 688 (1971) (plurality opinion).

193 New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 133 (1977).

194 Sch. Dist. of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 413 (1985).

195 See Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 234 (1997).

196 Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Bd. of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378, 395 (1990).

197 Hernandez v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680, 696–97 (1989). See also Tony and Susan Alamo Found. v. Sec'y of Labor, 471 U.S. 290, 305–06 (1985) (the non-entanglement principle does not exempt religious organizations from such secular governmental activity as fire inspections and building and zoning regulations).

198 Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 339 (1987).

199 Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 252 (1982).

200 Id. at 245–47. Appellants asserted that the state had a significant interest in protecting

d. Aid to Religion and Religious Institutions

i. In General

[H70] The Establishment Clause prohibits government-financed indoctrination into the beliefs of a particular religious faith.[201] For example, a tax levied for the direct support of a church or group of churches would run contrary to the First Amendment.[202]

[H71] But "religious institutions need not be quarantined from public benefits that are neutrally available to all."[203] For instance, a state university does not violate the Establishment Clause, when it exacts a student fee for the purpose of funding the whole spectrum of student speech, whether it manifests a religious view, an anti-religious view, or neither.[204]

[H72] "The Court has not been blind to the fact that, in aiding a religious institution to perform a secular task, the State frees the institution's resources to be put to sectarian ends. If this were impermissible, however, a church could not be protected by the police and fire departments, or have its public sidewalk kept in repair. The Court never has held that religious activities must be discriminated against in this way."[205] Hence, the argument that all aid to religious institutions is forbidden, because aid to one aspect of an institution frees it to spend its other resources on religious ends, cannot stand.[206]

[H73] In Agostini, the Court articulated three primary criteria to guide the determination whether a government aid program impermissibly advances religion: "(1) whether the aid results in governmental indoctrination; (2) whether the aid program defines its recipients by reference to religion; and (3) whether the aid creates an excessive entanglement between government and religion. . . . [T]he same criteria [can] be reviewed to determine whether a program constitutes an endorsement of religion."[207] its citizens from abusive practices in the solicitation of funds for charity, and that this interest retained importance when the solicitation was conducted by a religious organization. The Court assumed, arguendo, that the Act at issue generally was addressed to a sufficiently "compelling" governmental interest. However, it concluded that appellants had not demonstrated that the challenged 50-percent rule was closely fitted to further the interest. More specifically, appellants' arguments (1) that members of a religious organization could exercise supervision and control over the solicitation activities of the organization when membership contributions exceeded 50 percent; (2) that membership control was an adequate safeguard against abusive solicitations of the public; and (3) that the need for public disclosure rose in proportion with the percentage of non-member contributions, found no substantial support in the record of the case.

---

[201] Sch. Dist. of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 385 (1985).

[202] Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 840 (1995).

[203] Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 746 (1976) (plurality opinion).

[204] Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 840–41 (1995). As the Court noted, the school's adherence to a rule of viewpoint neutrality in administering its student fee program would prevent any mistaken impression that the student newspapers speak for the university.

[205] Comm. for Pub. Educ. and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646, 658, n.6 (1980), quoting Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 750 (1976) (plurality opinion).

[206] See Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 743 (1973).

[207] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 845 (2000), citing Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 234–35 (1997). Valid aid to non-public, non-sectarian institutions can provide no basis, under

ii. Aid to Religious Schools or to Their Students[208]

[H74] "[P]arents may, in the discharge of their duty under state compulsory education laws, send their children to a religious, rather than a public, school, if the school meets the secular educational requirements which the state has power to impose."[209] "The question whether governmental aid to religious schools results in governmental indoctrination is ultimately a question whether any religious indoctrination that occurs in those schools could reasonably be attributed to governmental action."[210] In distinguishing between indoctrination that is attributable to the state and indoctrination that is not, neutrality is an important factor to be taken into consideration. Indeed, "where the aid is allocated on the basis of neutral, secular criteria, . . . and is made available to both religious and secular beneficiaries on a nondiscriminatory basis," the aid is less likely to have the effect of advancing religion by creating a financial incentive to undertake religious indoctrination.[211] However, a government aid program does not pass constitutional muster solely because of the generality of the aid and the evenhandedness of its distribution.[212]

[H75] "At least three main lines of enquiry addressed particularly to school aid have emerged to complement evenhandedness neutrality. First, [the Court has] noted that two types of aid recipients heighten Establishment Clause concern: pervasively religious schools and primary and secondary religious schools. Second, [the Court has] identified two important characteristics of the method of distributing aid: directness or indirectness of distribution and distribution by genuinely independent choice. Third, [the Court has] found relevance in at least three characteristics of the aid itself: its religious content; its cash form; and its diversion to religious support."[213]

[H76] "Two types of school aid recipients have raised special concern. First, [the Court has] recognized the fact that the overriding religious mission of certain schools, those sometimes called 'pervasively sectarian,' is not confined to a discrete element of the cur-the Equal Protection Clause, for sustaining aid to sectarian establishments that is violative of the Establishment Clause. See Sloan v. Lemon, 413 U.S. 825, 833–34 (1973).

---

[208] See also para. H107 (tax exemptions).

[209] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 18 (1947), citing Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534–35 (1925).

[210] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 809 (2000), citing Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 226 (1997).

[211] Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 231 (1997). In that case, the Court declined to conclude that the constitutionality of an educational aid program depends on the number of sectarian school students who happen to receive the otherwise neutral aid. Id. at 229. See also Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 658 (2002) ("The constitutionality of a neutral educational aid program simply does not turn on whether and why, in a particular area, at a particular time, most private schools are run by religious organizations, or most recipients choose to use the aid at a religious school.").

[212] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 838–39 (2000) (O'Connor and Breyer. JJ., concurring in the judgment); id. at 883–84 (Souter, Stevens and Ginsburg, JJ., dissenting). The four-Justice plurality held that government aid to religious schools does not have the effect of advancing religion, so long as the aid is offered on a neutral basis and the aid is secular in content. Id. at 809–10, 829–35. Hence, the plurality appeared to promote evenhandedness neutrality to a single and sufficient test for constitutionality of school aid under the Establishment Clause.

[213] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 885 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting).

riculum, . . . but permeates their teaching."[214] "Based on record evidence and long experience, [the Court has] concluded that religious teaching in such schools is at the core of the instructors' individual and personal obligations."[215] Although the Court does not assume that public school teachers assigned to religious schools for limited purposes will teach religiously,[216] it presumes that individual religious teachers will teach that way.[217] "As religious teaching cannot be separated from secular education in such schools or by such teachers, direct government subsidies to such schools are prohibited because they will inevitably and impermissibly support religious indoctrination."[218] "Second, [the Court has] expressed special concern about aid to primary and secondary religious schools. . . . On the one hand, . . . the youth of the students in such schools makes them highly susceptible to religious indoctrination."[219] "On the other, . . . the religious element in the education offered in most sectarian primary and secondary schools is far more intertwined with the secular than in university teaching, where the natural and academic skepticism of most older students may separate the two."[220] "Thus, government benefits accruing to these pervasively religious primary and secondary schools raise special dangers of diversion into support for the religious indoctrination of children and the involvement of government in religious training and practice."[221]

[H77] "[The Court has] also evaluated the portent of support to an organization's religious mission that may be inherent in the method by which aid is granted, finding pertinence in at least two characteristics of distribution. First, [the Court has] asked whether aid is direct or indirect, observing distinctions between government schemes with individual beneficiaries and those whose beneficiaries in the first instance might be religious schools."[222] Direct aid obviously raises greater concerns,[223] "although recent cases have discounted this risk factor, looking to other features of the distribution mechanism."[224]

---

[214] Id. at 885–86 (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Walz v. Tax Comm'n of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 671 (1970); Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 636–37 (1971).

[215] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 886 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting).

[216] Id. at 886, n.7, citing Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 223–28 (1997).

[217] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 886, n.7 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 615–20 (1971); Levitt v. Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty, 413 U.S. 472, 480 (1973); Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 369–71 (1975); Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 249–50 (1977).

[218] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 887 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 12 (1993).

[219] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 887 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 616 (1971).

[220] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 887 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 685–89 (1971) (plurality opinion); Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 750 (1976) (plurality opinion).

[221] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 887 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting).

[222] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 888 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 18 (1947) (bus fare supports parents and not schools); Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 243–44, n.6 (1968) (textbooks go to benefit children and parents, not schools); Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 621 (1971) (invalidating direct aid to schools, for teachers' salaries); Levitt v. Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty, 413 U.S. 472, 480, 482 (1973) (invalidating direct testing aid to schools).

[223] See Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 747 (1976); Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 679–80 (1971).

[224] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 888 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 225–26 (1997).

Second, indirect aid that reaches religious schools only incidentally, a result of numerous individual choices, does not contravene the Establishment Clause. Thus, the Court has "declared the constitutionality of programs providing aid directly to parents or students as scholarship money or tax deductions, where such aid may pay for education at some sectarian institutions, . . . but only as the result of 'genuinely independent and private choices' of aid recipients."[225]

[H78] "In addition to the character of the school to which the benefit accrues and its path from government to school, a number of features of the aid itself have figured in the classifications [the Court has] made. First, the First Amendment bars aid with actual religious content, which would obviously run afoul of the ban on the government's participation in religion."[226] "In cases where [the Court has] permitted aid, it has regularly characterized it as 'neutral,' in the sense of being without religious content."[227] Second, direct monetary government aid, which makes its way into the coffers of religious schools, is constitutionally suspect, since it falls precariously close to the original object of the Establishment Clause's prohibition.[228] In this context, lack of a secular content restriction is of decisive importance.[229] Third, government aid is invalid when it is diverted to religious education.[230] For example, in upholding a scheme to provide stu-

---

[225] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 889 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), quoting Witters v. Washington Dep't of Servs. for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481, 487 (1986). See also Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1993); Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 651 (2002). Cf. Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388, 399 (1983).

[226] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 889–90 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 16 (1947); Walz v. Tax Comm'n of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

[227] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 890 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting), citing Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 688 (1971) (characterizing buildings as "religiously neutral"); Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 10 (1993) (describing translator as "neutral service"); Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 232 (1997) (discussing need to assess whether nature of aid was "neutral and nonideological").

[228] See especially Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 619 (1971) (noting that paying salaries of parochial school teachers creates too much of a risk that such support will aid the teaching of religion, and striking down such programs because of the need for pervasive monitoring that would be required). See also Levitt v. Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty, 413 U.S. 472, 480, 482 (1973) (striking down direct money grant for testing expenses).

[229] See Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 762, 774 (1973) (striking down direct money grants for maintaining and repairing buildings, because there was no attempt to restrict payments to those expenditures related exclusively to secular purposes). See also Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971), where the Court considered a federal statute that authorized grants to universities for the construction of buildings and facilities to be used exclusively for secular educational purposes. The statute was held unconstitutional only to the extent that a university's obligation not to use the facility for sectarian instruction or religious worship appeared to expire at the end of 20 years. The plurality opinion emphasized that limiting the prohibition for religious use of the structure to 20 years obviously opened the facility to use for any purpose at the end of that period, and, in that event, the original federal grant would, in part, have the effect of advancing religion. Id. at 683. See also id. at 659–61 (separate opinion of Justice Brennan) and id. at 665, n.1 (Justice White, concurring in judgment), 692 (Justice Douglas, dissenting in part). In Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 856–57 (2000), Justice O'Connor noted that "to hold a statute unconstitutional because it lacks a secular content restriction is quite different from resting on a divertibility rationale."

[230] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 840 (2000) (O'Connor and Breyer, JJ., concurring

dents with secular textbooks, the Court emphasized that nothing in the record supported the proposition that such textbooks were, in fact, used by the parochial schools to teach religion.[231] In Agostini, the Court upheld a city program under which public school teachers were sent into parochial schools to provide remedial education to disadvantaged children, taking into account that there was no evidence that any public instructor teaching on parochial school premises had attempted to inculcate religion in students.[232] Diversion also was the issue in an order remanding an "as-applied" challenge to a grant supporting counseling on teenage sexuality for findings that the aid had not been used to support religious education.[233]

[H79] At issue in Lemon I were two state-aid plans, a Rhode Island program to grant a 15-percent supplement to the salaries of private, church-related school teachers teaching secular courses, and a Pennsylvania program to reimburse private church-related schools for the entire cost of secular courses also offered in public schools. The statutes had a secular purpose: they were intended to enhance the quality of the secular education in all schools covered by the compulsory attendance laws. Nevertheless, both of them fostered "excessive entanglement" of church schools and state. In reviewing the Rhode Island program, the Court found that the aided schools, elementary and secondary, were characterized by substantial religious activity and purpose. They were located near parish churches. Religious instruction was considered part of the total educational process. Religious symbols and religious activities abounded. Two-thirds of the teachers were nuns, and their operation of the schools was regarded as an integral part of the religious mission of the Catholic Church. The schooling came at an impressionable age. The form of aid also cut against the programs. Unlike the textbooks in Allen[234] and the bus transportation in Everson,[235] the services of the state-supported teachers could not be counted on to be purely secular: "in terms of potential for involving some aspect of faith or morals in secular subjects, a textbook's content is ascertainable, but a teacher's handling of a subject is not." The teachers were bound to mix religious teachings with secular ones, not by conscious design, perhaps, but because the mixture was inevitable when teachers (themselves usually Catholics) were "employed by a religious organization, subject to the direction and discipline of religious authorities, and work[ed] in a system dedicated to rearing children in a particular faith." The state had to be certain, given the Religion Clauses, that subsidized teachers did not inculcate religion. Indeed, the state there had undertaken to do so. To ensure that no trespass occurred, the state had carefully conditioned its aid with pervasive restrictions. An eli-in the judgment); id. at 890, 909 (Souter, Stevens, and Ginsburg, JJ., dissenting). The four-Justice plurality held that so long as the governmental aid is not itself unsuitable for use in the public schools because of religious content, and eligibility for aid is determined in a constitutionally permissible manner, any use of that aid to indoctrinate cannot be attributed to the government and is thus not of constitutional concern. Id. at 820, 834. The two Justices who concurred in the judgment held that to establish a First Amendment violation, plaintiffs must prove that the aid in question actually is, or has been, used for religious purposes. Id. at 857. The three dissenters adopted a divertibility rationale, considering that a substantial risk of diversion suffices to invalidate a government aid program on establishment grounds. Id. at 909.

---

231 Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 248 (1968).

232 Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 226–27 (1997).

233 Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 621 (1988).

234 See para. H87.

235 See para. H85.

gible recipient should teach only those courses that were offered in the public schools and use only those texts and materials that were found in the public schools. In addition, the teacher should not engage in teaching any course in religion. "A comprehensive, discriminating, and continuing state surveillance [would] inevitably be required to ensure that these restrictions [we]re obeyed and the First Amendment otherwise respected. . . . [Such] prophylactic contacts [would] involve excessive and enduring entanglement between state and church."[236] The Pennsylvania program, which provided state financial aid directly to church-related schools, foundered for similar reasons. In particular, the government's post-audit power to inspect and evaluate a church-related school's financial records and to determine which expenditures were religious and which were secular would create "an intimate and continuing relationship between church and state."[237] The Court also pointed to another kind of church-state entanglement threatened by the Rhode Island and Pennsylvania programs, namely, their "divisive political potential." They represented successive and, very likely, permanent annual appropriations that benefited relatively few religious groups. Political factions, supporting and opposing the programs, were bound to divide along religious lines. This was one of the principal evils against which the First Amendment was intended to protect.[238]

[H80] Lemon II posed the question of the appropriate relief to be ordered in light of Lemon I's invalidation of the Pennsylvania private school aid statute. Future payments under that statute were enjoined by the district court. The statute's challengers, however, also sought to enjoin the payment of funds intended to reimburse aided schools for expenses incurred in reliance on the statute prior to its invalidation in Lemon I. The Court affirmed the denial of the injunction, "reasoning that the payments would not substantially undermine constitutional interests, and that there had been reasonable reliance by the schools on receipt of the funds, especially since the challengers, although they had filed suit before the expenses were incurred, had dropped an attempt to enjoin payments pending the outcome of the litigation."[239]

[H81] "The primary constitutional evil that the Lemon II injunction was intended to rectify was the excessive governmental entanglement inherent in Pennsylvania's elaborate procedures for ensuring that 'educational services to be reimbursed by the State were kept free of religious influences.' . . . The payments themselves were assumed to be constitutionally permissible, since they were not to be directly supportive of any sectarian activities. Because the State's supervision had long since been completed with respect to expenses already incurred, the proposed payments were held to pose no continued threat of excessive entanglement."[240] Unlike the constitutional defect in the state

---

[236] Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 617–19 (1971) (Lemon I).

[237] Id. at 620–22.

[238] Id. at 622–23. The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether the programs were constitutionally infirm on the additional ground that the "primary effect" of any state payments to church-related schools would be to promote the cause of religion in contravention of the Establishment Clause. Subsequent to Lemon I, Pennsylvania enacted a statute providing funds to reimburse parents for a portion of tuition expenses incurred in sending their children to non-public schools. This statute was not much different from the program involved in Nyquist (see para. H102) and was invalidated on similar grounds. See Sloan v. Lemon, 413 U.S. 825, 828–33 (1973).

[239] See Roemer v. Bd. of Pub. Works of Maryland, 426 U.S. 736, 745, n.11 (1976), discussing Lemon v. Kurtzman, 411 U.S. 192 (1973) (Lemon II).

[240] See New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 129 (1977).

law reviewed in Lemon I, the constitutional invalidity of the New York statute examined in Levitt[241] was "in the payment itself, rather than in the process of its administration. The New York statute was held to be constitutionally invalid because 'the aid that [would] be devoted to secular functions [wa]s not identifiable and separable from aid to sectarian activities.' . . . This was so both because there was no assurance that the lump-sum payments reflected actual expenditures for mandated services, and because there was an impermissible risk of religious indoctrination inherent in some of the required services themselves."[242] Under these considerations, the Court held, in Cathedral Academy, that a New York statute, which had been enacted in response to a district court's order, enjoining any payments under the Act found unconstitutional in Levitt, and authorized payments for the identical services that were to be reimbursed, under the latter Act, amounted to "a new and independently significant infringement of the First and Fourteenth Amendments" and was for the same reasons invalid.[243] The Academy argued, however, that the new statute required a detailed audit in the Court of Claims to establish whether or not the amounts claimed for mandated services constituted a furtherance of the religious purposes of the claimant. The argument was rejected, since, "even if such an audit were contemplated, this sort of detailed inquiry into the subtle implications of in-class examinations and other teaching activities would itself constitute a significant encroachment on First Amendment guarantees. In order to prove their claims for reimbursement, sectarian schools would be placed in the position of trying to disprove any religious content in various classroom materials. In order to fulfill its duty to resist any possibly unconstitutional payment, . . . the State as defendant would have to undertake a search for religious meaning in every classroom examination offered in support of a claim. And to decide the case, the Court of Claims would be cast in the role of arbiter of the essentially religious dispute." Subsequently, the new statute was declared unconstitutional, because it would either have the primary effect of aiding religion or would result in excessive state involvement in religious affairs.[244] [H82] In 1970, the New York legislature appropriated public funds to reimburse both church-sponsored and secular non-public schools for performing various services mandated by the state. The most expensive of these services was the administration, grading, and the compiling and reporting of the results of tests and examinations. Covered tests included both state-prepared examinations and the more common and traditional teacher-prepared tests. Although the legislature prohibited any payment for religious worship or instruction, the statute did not provide for any state audit of school financial records that would ensure that public funds were used only for secular purposes. In Levitt, the Court struck down this enactment as violative of the Establishment Clause. The majority focused its concern on the statute's reimbursement of funds spent by schools on traditional teacher-prepared tests. "[D]espite the obviously integral role of such testing in the total teaching process, no attempt [wa]s made under the statute, and no means [we]re available, to assure that internally prepared tests [we]re free of religious instruction."[245] "Thus, the inherent teacher discretion in devising, presenting, and grading traditional tests, together with the failure of the legislature to provide for a

---

241 See para. H82.

242 See New York v. Cathedral Acad., 434 U.S. 125, 131 (1977).

243 Id. at 134.

244 Id. at 132–33.

245 Levitt v. Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty, 413 U.S. 472, 480 (1973). See also para. H81.

method of auditing to ensure that public funds would be spent exclusively on secular services, disabled the enactment from withstanding constitutional scrutiny."[246]

[H83] In Wolman, the Court sustained, in relevant part, an Ohio statutory scheme that authorized, inter alia, the expenditure of state funds to supply, for use by pupils attending non-public schools, such standardized tests and scoring services as were in use in the public schools of the state. The Court held that this provision, which was aimed at providing the young with an adequate secular education, reflected a secular state purpose. As the Court's opinion stated, "[t]he State may require that schools that are utilized to fulfill the State's compulsory education requirement meet certain standards of instruction, and may examine both teachers and pupils to ensure that the State's legitimate interest is being fulfilled." The Court further explained that, under the Ohio provision, the non-public school did not control the content of the test or its result. This served to prevent the use of the test as a part of religious teaching and thus avoided that kind of direct aid to religion found present in Levitt. The provision of testing services, hence, did not have the primary effect of aiding religion. Moreover, the inability of the school to control the test eliminated the need for the supervision that might give rise to excessive entanglement. The Court, thus, concluded that the Ohio statute, insofar as it concerned examinations, passed constitutional muster.[247]

[H84] In Regan, the Court upheld a New York program whereby private schools were reimbursed for the actual cost of administering state-required tests, which addressed secular academic subjects. Although the Ohio statute, under review in Wolman, and the New York statute, involved in Regan, were not identical, the differences were not of constitutional dimension. In both cases, the tests were prepared by the state; the non-public school, thus, had no control whatsoever over the content of the tests. But the New York statute, unlike the Ohio statute at issue in Wolman, provided for direct cash reimbursement to the non-public school for administering the state-prescribed examinations and for grading two of them. However, the Court declined to draw a formalistic constitutional distinction "between paying the nonpublic school to do the grading and paying state employees or some independent service to perform that task," noting that "the grading function is the same regardless of who performs it and would not have the primary effect of aiding religion whether or not performed by nonpublic school personnel." Furthermore, in view of the nature of the tests, the Court found that the grading of the examinations by non-public school employees afforded no control to the school over the outcome of any of the tests. The tests that were graded by non-public school employees consisted largely or entirely of objective, multiple-choice questions, which could be graded by machine and, even if graded by hand, afforded the schools no more control over the results than if the tests were graded by the state. Even though some of the tests might include an essay question or two, the Court found that the chance that grading the answers to state-drafted questions in secular subjects could or would be used to gauge a student's grasp of religious ideas was minimal, especially in light of the state procedures designed to guard against serious inconsistencies in grading and any misuse of essay questions. These procedures included the submission of completed and graded comprehensive tests to the state department of education for review off the school premises. Hence, there was no substantial risk that the examinations could be used for religious educational purposes. In addition, under the New York law, each year, private schools should submit to the state a report containing information with respect to the student body, faculty, support staff, physical facilities, and curriculum of each school. This reporting function was ministerial and lacking ideological content or use. Reimbursement for the costs of so complying with state law, therefore, had primarily a secular, rather than a religious, purpose and effect. Finally, the plan, on its face, did not violate the non-entanglement command, since the services for which the private schools would be reimbursed were "discrete and clearly identifiable," and the reimbursement process was straightforward and incorporated an extensive auditing system, safeguarding against excessive or misdirected reimbursement.[248]

---

[246] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646, 650 (1980), discussing Levitt.

[247] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 240 (1977).

[H85] Everson sustained a statute authorizing repayment to parents of their children's transportation expenses to public and Catholic schools. The Court recognized that children were helped to get to church schools. But it found that the purpose and effect of the statute in question was general "public welfare legislation:" to protect all school children from the "very real hazards of traffic." Hence, the expenditure of public funds for school transportation, to religious schools or to any others, was like the expenditure of public funds to provide policemen to safeguard these same children or to provide "such general government services as ordinary police and fire protection, connections for sewage disposal, public highways and sidewalks."[249]

[H86] By contrast, Wolman struck down the employment of publicly funded buses for field trips controlled by parochial school teachers. First, the Court noted that the nonpublic school controlled the timing of the trips and, within a certain range, their frequency and destinations. Thus, the schools, rather than the children, truly were the recipients of the service. Second, although a trip might be to a location that would be of interest to those in public schools, it was the individual teacher who made a field trip meaningful. The field trips were an integral part of the educational experience and, where the teacher worked within and for a sectarian institution, an unacceptable risk of fostering of religion was an inevitable byproduct. Moreover, the public school authorities would be unable adequately to insure secular use of the field trip funds without close supervision of the nonpublic teachers. This would create excessive entanglement.[250]

[H87] In Allen, a state program, whereby secular textbooks were loaned to all children in accredited schools, was approved as consistent with the Establishment Clause, even though the Court recognized that free books made it more likely that some children would choose to attend a sectarian school. The Court focused on the fact that the textbooks lent out were secular and approved by secular authorities, and assumed that the secular textbooks and the secular elements of education they supported were not so intertwined with religious instruction as in fact to be instrumental in the teaching of religion. Furthermore, it emphasized that no funds or books were furnished to parochial schools, and that, therefore, the financial benefit was to parents and children, not to schools.[251]

[H88] In Meek and Wolman, the Court adhered to Allen, holding that the textbook lending programs at issue in each case did not violate the Establishment Clause.[252] At [248] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646, 654–61 (1980).

---

[249] Everson v. Bd. of Educ., 330 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1947).

[250] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 253–54 (1977).

[251] Bd. of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 243–48 (1968).

[252] Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 359–62, 388 (1975); Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 236–38, 255 (1977).

the same time, however, the Court invalidated a direct loan to non-public schools of instructional material and equipment, despite the apparent secular nature of the goods.[253] The Court "reasoned that, because the religious schools receiving the materials and equipment were pervasively sectarian, any assistance in support of the schools' educational missions would inevitably have the impermissible effect of advancing religion."[254] For example, in Meek the Court explained: "[I]t would simply ignore reality to attempt to separate secular educational functions from the predominantly religious role performed by many of Pennsylvania's church-related elementary and secondary schools and to then characterize [the statute] as channeling aid to the secular without providing direct aid to the sectarian. Even though earmarked for secular purposes, 'when it flows to an institution in which religion is so pervasive that a substantial portion of its functions are subsumed in the religious mission,' state aid has the impermissible primary effect of advancing religion."[255] Thus, the Court held that the aid program "necessarily result[ed] in aid to the sectarian school enterprise as a whole," and "inescapably result[ed] in the direct and substantial advancement of religious activity."[256] Similarly, in Wolman, the Court concluded that, "[i]n view of the impossibility of separating the secular education function from the sectarian, the state aid inevitably flow[ed] in part in support of the religious role of the schools."[257]

[H89] Meek's and Wolman's holding regarding direct loans to religious schools of instructional material and equipment was explicitly overruled in Mitchell v. Helms.[258] There the Court considered a program of distribution of federal funds to state and local governmental agencies, which in turn would lend educational, secular materials, and equipment—such as library and media materials and computer software or hardware—to public and private schools, with the enrollment of each participating school determining the amount of aid that it received. In applying the Agostini criteria, the Court upheld the program, as applied to religiously affiliated schools in a certain district. In so concluding, a majority of the members of the Court relied primarily on the fact that the aid was allocated on the basis of neutral, secular criteria,[259] and rejected the allegation that the implementation and administration of the aid program violated the Establishment Clause.[260]

---

[253] See Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 362–66 (1975); Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 248–51 (1977).

[254] See Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 850 (2000) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[255] Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 365–66 (1975).

[256] Id. at 366.

[257] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 250 (1977).

[258] Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793, 835–36 (2000) (plurality opinion of four members of the Court); id. at 837 (O'Connor and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment).

[259] Id. at 829–31 (plurality opinion); id. at 845–48 (O'Connor and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment).

[260] There were three statutory safeguards against diversion of the government aid to religious objectives: (1) signed assurances that the aid would be used only for secular, neutral, and non-ideological purposes; (2) monitoring visits; and (3) the requirement that equipment be labeled as government property. Seven Justices found that these safeguards were too weak to prevent and detect diversion, and that there was evidence of actual diversion. Id. at 833, 903–09. However, a four-member plurality held that these considerations were not relevant to the Establishment Clause inquiry. Id. at 822–24, 833–34. The plurality also stressed that scattered de minimis statutory violations, discovered and remedied by the relevant authorities themselves prior to any litigation, should not be elevated to such a level as to convert an otherwise unob-

[H90] The aid challenged in Tilton was in the form of federal grants for the construction of academic facilities at private colleges, some of them church-related, with the restriction that the facilities not be used for any sectarian purpose. Applying Lemon's three-part test, the Court found the purpose of the federal aid program there under consideration to be secular (expansion of college and university facilities to meet the sharply rising number of young people demanding higher education). Its primary effect was not the advancement of religion, for sectarian use of the facilities was prohibited. "Enforcement of this prohibition was made possible by the fact that religion did not so permeate the defendant colleges that their religious and secular functions were inseparable. On the contrary, there was no evidence that religious activities took place in the funded facilities. Courses at the colleges were 'taught according to the academic requirements intrinsic to the subject matter,' and 'an atmosphere of academic freedom, rather than religious indoctrination,' was maintained."[261] Turning to the problem of excessive entanglement, the four-Justice plurality first stressed the character of the aided institutions. "It pointed to several general differences between college and pre-college education: college students are less susceptible to religious indoctrination; college courses tend to entail an internal discipline that inherently limits the opportunities for sectarian influence; and a high degree of academic freedom tends to prevail at the college level. It found no evidence that the colleges [at issue] varied from this pattern. Though controlled and largely populated by Roman Catholics, the colleges were not restricted to adherents of that faith. No religious services were required to be attended. Theology courses were mandatory, but they were taught in an academic fashion, and with treatment of beliefs other than Roman Catholicism. There were no attempts to proselytize among students, and principles of academic freedom prevailed. With colleges of this character, there was little risk that religion would seep into the teaching of secular subjects, and the state surveillance necessary to separate the two, therefore, was diminished. The [plurality] next looked to the type of aid provided, and found it to be neutral and non-ideological in nature. Like the textbooks and bus transportation in Allen and Everson, but unlike the teachers' services in Lemon I, physical facilities were capable of being restricted to secular purposes. Moreover, the construction grant was a one-shot affair, not involving annual audits and appropriations."[262] Consequently, the Court upheld the grant of federal financial assistance to church-related colleges for secular purposes.[263]

[H91] However, in Tilton, the Court circumscribed the terms of the grant to ensure its constitutionality. Although Congress had provided that federally subsidized buildings could not be used for sectarian or religious worship for 20 years, the Court con-jectionable aid program into a law that had the effect of advancing religion. Id. at 835. Justice O'Connor concurred in the judgment, dismissing, as de minimis, the evidence of actual diversion and statutory violations. Id. at 864–65, 866.

---

[261] See Roemer v. Maryland Pub. Works Bd., 426 U.S. 736, 750 (1976), discussing and quoting Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 680–82 (1971) (plurality opinion).

[262] See Roemer v. Maryland Pub. Works Bd., 426 U.S. 736, 750–51 (1976), discussing Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971).

[263] Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 689 (1971) (plurality opinion); id. at 665, n.1 (White, J., concurring in judgment). On similar grounds, a three-member plurality in Roemer approved state grants to religiously affiliated institutions of higher learning. Two Justices concurred in the judgment, finding that there was a secular legislative purpose and that the primary effect of the legislation was neither to advance nor inhibit religion. See Roemer v. Maryland Pub. Works Bd., 426 U.S. 736, 754–70 (1976).

sidered this restriction insufficient: if, at the end of 20 years, the building would be, for example, converted into a chapel or otherwise used to promote religious interests, the original federal grant would, in part, have the constitutionally impermissible effect of advancing religion.[264] Similarly, Nyquist invalidated direct money grants to non-public schools for maintaining and repairing buildings, because there was no attempt to restrict payments to those expenditures related to the upkeep of facilities used exclusively to secular purposes.[265]

[H92] In Hunt, the challenged aid was also for the construction of secular college facilities, the state plan being one to finance the construction by revenue bonds issued through the medium of a state authority. In effect, the college serviced and repaid the bonds but at the lower cost resulting from the tax-free status of the interest payments. The Court upheld the program on reasoning analogous to that in Tilton. In applying the second of the Lemon I's three-part test, that concerning "primary effect," the following refinement was added: "[a]id normally may be thought to have a primary effect of advancing religion when it flows to an institution in which religion is so pervasive that a substantial portion of its functions are subsumed in the religious mission or when it funds a specifically religious activity in an otherwise substantially secular setting."[266] Although the college that Hunt concerned was subject to substantial control by its sponsoring Baptist Church, it was found to be similar to the colleges in Tilton, and not "pervasively sectarian." As in Tilton, state aid went to secular facilities only, and thus not to any specifically religious activity.[267]

[H93] "[P]roviding diagnostic services on the nonpublic school premises [does] not create an impermissible risk of fostering ideological views. . . . Diagnostic services, unlike teaching or counseling, have little or no educational content, and are not closely associated with the educational mission of the non-public school. Accordingly, any pressure on the public diagnostician to allow the intrusion of sectarian views is greatly reduced. [In addition,] the diagnostician has only limited contact with the child, and that contact involves chiefly the use of objective and professional testing methods to detect students in need of treatment. [Hence,] [t]he nature of the relationship between the diagnostician and the pupil does not provide the same opportunity for the transmission of sectarian views as attends the relationship between teacher and student or that between counselor and student. . . . It follows that, in that context, there is no need for excessive surveillance, and there will not be impermissible entanglement."[268]

[H94] Meek invalidated a Pennsylvania program in which full-time public employees provided supplemental "auxiliary services"—remedial and accelerated instruction, guidance counseling and testing, and speech and hearing services—to non-public school

---

[264] Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 680–89 (1971) (plurality opinion of four Justices). See also id. at 692 (Douglas, dissenting in part); id. at 659–61 (separate opinion of Brennan, J.); id. at 665, n.1 (White, J., concurring in judgment).

[265] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 762, 774 (1973).

[266] Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 743 (1973).

[267] See Roemer v. Maryland Pub. Works Bd., 426 U.S. 736, 752 (1976), discussing Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734 (1973).

[268] Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 244 (1977). In that case, the Court also held that providing therapeutic and remedial services at a neutral site off the premises of the non-public schools does not have the impermissible effect of advancing religion, and since such services are administered by public employees, no excessive entanglement is created. See id. at 247–48.

children at their schools. Although the auxiliary services themselves were secular, they were mostly dispensed on the premises of parochial schools, where an atmosphere dedicated to the advancement of religious belief was constantly maintained. Instruction in that atmosphere was sufficient to create the potential for impermissible fostering of religion. "The danger existed there not because the public employee was likely deliberately to subvert his task to the service of religion, but rather because the pressures of the environment might alter his behavior from its normal course."[269]

[H95] In Ball, the Court evaluated two programs implemented by the school district of Grand Rapids, Michigan. The district's Shared Time program provided remedial and "enrichment" classes, at public expense, to students attending non-public schools. The classes were taught during regular school hours by publicly employed teachers, using materials purchased with public funds, on the premises of non-public schools. The Shared Time courses were in subjects designed to supplement the "core curriculum" of the non-public schools. The community education program was offered throughout the Grand Rapids community in schools and on other sites, for children as well as adults. The classes at issue in Ball were taught in the non-public elementary schools and commenced at the conclusion of the regular schoolday. Among the courses offered were Arts and Crafts, Home Economics, Spanish, Gynmastics, Drama, Newspaper, Humanities, Chess, Model Building, and Nature Appreciation. Although certain community education courses offered at non-public school sites were not offered at the public schools on a community education basis, all community education programs were otherwise available at the public schools, usually as a part of their more extensive regular curriculum. Community education teachers were part-time public school employees. Because well-known teachers were necessary to attract the requisite number of students, the school district accorded a preference in hiring to instructors already teaching within the school. Thus, virtually every community education course conducted on facilities leased from non-public schools had an instructor otherwise employed full time by the same non-public school. The Court found that both programs had the primary effect of impermissibly promoting religion in three ways. First, "[t]he state-paid teachers, influenced by the pervasively sectarian nature of the religious schools in which they work[ed], [might] subtly or overtly indoctrinate the students in particular religious tenets at public expense. [Second,] the symbolic union of church and state inherent in the provision of secular state-provided public instruction in the religious school buildings threaten[ed] to convey a message of state support for religion to students and to the general public. [Third,] the programs in effect subsidize[d] the religious functions of the parochial schools by taking over a substantial portion of their responsibility for teaching secular subjects."[270]

[H96] In Aguilar, the Court held that the Establishment Clause barred the city of New York from sending public school teachers into parochial schools to provide remedial education to disadvantaged children pursuant to a congressionally mandated program. The New York City program closely resembled the Shared Time program struck down in Ball, but the Court found fault with an aspect of the program not present in Ball: the Board of Education had "adopted a system for monitoring the religious content of publicly funded classes in the religious schools." Even though this monitoring system might prevent the program from being used to inculcate religion, the Court concluded that the level of monitoring necessary to be "certain" that the program had an exclusively secular effect would inevitably result in the excessive entanglement of church and state. In the majority's view, the program suffered from the same critical elements of entanglement present in Lemon and Meek: because the assistance was provided in a pervasively sectarian environment, in the form of teachers, ongoing inspection was required to ensure the absence of a religious message. The Court noted two further forms of entanglement inherent in the program: the "administrative cooperation" required to implement the plan and the "dangers of political divisiveness" along religious lines that might grow out of the day-to-day decisions public officials would have to make in order to provide services under the program.[271]

---

[269] See Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 247 (1977), discussing Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349 (1975).

[270] Sch. Dist. of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 397 (1985).

[H97] Aguilar and the portion of Ball addressing the Shared Time program were overruled in Agostini, where the Court reconsidered the constitutionality of the program invalidated in Aguilar. On remand, following the Court's decision in Aguilar, the District Court for the Eastern District of New York had entered a permanent injunction reflecting the Court's ruling. Twelve years later, the parties bound by that injunction sought relief from its operation, maintaining that Aguilar could not be squared with the Court's intervening Establishment Clause jurisprudence and asked for an explicit recognition that Aguilar was no longer good law. A five-member majority agreed that Aguilar was not consistent with the Court's subsequent Establishment Clause decisions in Witters[272] and Zobrest.[273] These decisions had abandoned "the presumption erected in Meek and Ball that the placement of public employees on parochial school grounds inevitably results in the impermissible effect of state-sponsored indoctrination or constitutes a symbolic union between government and religion."[274] Furthermore, they had departed "from the rule relied on in Ball that all government aid that directly assists the educational function of religious schools is invalid."[275] In all relevant respects, the provision of the instructional services under the New York City program at issue in Aguilar was indistinguishable from the provision of a sign language interpreter in Zobrest. New York City's program did not give aid recipients any financial incentive to undertake religious indoctrination, since the aid was "allocated on the basis of neutral, secular criteria that neither favor[ed] nor disfavor[ed] religion, and [wa]s made available to both religious and secular beneficiaries on a nondiscriminatory basis."[276] Hence, Zobrest and Witters had made clear that the Shared Time program in Ball and New York City's program could not, as a matter of law, be deemed to have the effect of advancing religion through indoctrination. Moreover, the Aguilar Court had erred in concluding that New York City's program resulted in an excessive entanglement between church and state. The finding had rested on three grounds: (1) the program would require "pervasive monitoring by public authorities" to ensure that city employees did not inculcate religion; (2) the program required "administrative cooperation" between the government and parochial schools; and (3) the program might increase the dangers of "political divisiveness." The Agostini Court noted that the last two considerations were insufficient to create an excessive 271 Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402, 408–14 (1985), discussed in Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 221–22 (1997).

---

272 Witters v. Washington Dep't of Servs. for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481 (1986). See para. H99.

273 Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1 (1993). See para. H100.

274 Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 223 (1997).

275 Id. at 225.

276 Id. at 231.

entanglement, because they were present no matter where program services were offered (no court had held that program services could not be offered off-campus). Further, the first consideration had been undermined by Zobrest. Since Zobrest had abandoned the presumption that public employees would inculcate religion simply because they happened to be in a sectarian environment, there was no longer any need to assume that pervasive monitoring of public teachers was required.[277] And there was no suggestion in the record that the system New York City had in place to monitor its employees was insufficient to prevent or to detect inculcation.[278] The Court concluded that "a federally funded program providing supplemental, remedial instruction to disadvantaged children on a neutral basis is not invalid, under the Establishment Clause, when such instruction is given on the premises of sectarian schools by government employees, under a program containing safeguards such as" those present in New York City's program.[279]

[H98] The Court has repeatedly rejected Establishment Clause challenges to neutral government programs that provide aid directly to a broad class of individuals, who, in turn, direct the aid to religious schools or institutions of their own choosing. Mueller involved a Minnesota program authorizing tax deductions for various educational expenses, including private school tuition costs, even though the great majority of the program's beneficiaries (96 percent) were parents of children in religious schools. The Court began by focusing on the class of beneficiaries, finding that because the class included "all parents," including parents with children who attended non-sectarian private schools or sectarian private schools, the program was "not readily subject to challenge under the Establishment Clause." Then, viewing the program as a whole, the Court emphasized the principle of private choice, noting that public funds were made available to religious schools "only as a result of numerous, private choices of individual parents of school-age children; . . . no imprimatur of state approval [could] be deemed to have been conferred on any particular religion, or on religion generally."[280] Moreover, the Court found it irrelevant to the constitutional inquiry that the vast majority of beneficiaries were parents of children in religious schools. "That the program was

---

[277] Id. at 234.

[278] Before any public employee could provide instruction at a private school, he or she would be given a detailed set of written and oral instructions emphasizing the secular purpose of the program and setting out the rules to be followed to ensure that this purpose was not compromised. Specifically, employees would be told that (1) they were employees of the Board and accountable only to their public school supervisors; (2) they had exclusive responsibility for selecting students for the program and could teach only those children who met the eligibility criteria for the program; (3) their materials and equipment would be used only in the program; (4) they could not engage in team teaching or other cooperative instructional activities with private school teachers; and (5) they could not introduce any religious matter into their teaching or become involved in any way with the religious activities of the private schools. All religious symbols were to be removed from classrooms used for program services. The rules acknowledged that it might be necessary for public teachers to consult with a student's regular classroom teacher to assess the student's particular needs and progress, but the rules admonished instructors to limit those consultations to mutual professional concerns regarding the student's education. To ensure compliance with these rules, a publicly employed field supervisor was to attempt to make at least one unannounced visit to each teacher's classroom every month. Id. at 211–12.

[279] Id. at 234–35.

[280] Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388, 399–400 (1983).

one of true private choice, with no evidence that the State deliberately skewed incentives toward religious schools, was sufficient for the program to survive scrutiny under the Establishment Clause."[281]

[H99] In Witters, the Court used identical reasoning to reject an Establishment Clause challenge to a vocational rehabilitation program that provided tuition aid to a student studying at a religious institution to become a pastor. Looking at the program as a whole, the Court observed that "[a]ny aid . . . that ultimately flow[ed] to religious institutions [did] so only as a result of the genuinely independent and private choices of aid recipients." The Court further remarked that the program was "made available generally without regard to the sectarian-nonsectarian, or public-nonpublic nature of the institution benefited."[282] In light of these factors, the Court held that the program was not inconsistent with the Establishment Clause.

[H100] Zobrest concerned a federal program that permitted sign-language interpreters to assist deaf children enrolled in religious schools. The program distributed benefits neutrally to any child qualifying as disabled; its "primary beneficiaries," the Court observed, were disabled children, not sectarian schools. "Because the program ensured that parents were the ones to select a religious school as the best learning environment for their handicapped child, the circuit between government and religion was broken, and the Establishment Clause was not implicated."[283]

[H101] In Zelman, the Court faced an Ohio scholarship program providing tuition aid for students to attend participating public or private schools of their parent's choosing. The program was part of a general and multi-faceted undertaking by the state of Ohio to provide educational opportunities to the children of a failed school district. Both religious and non-religious schools in the district could participate. Tuition aid was distributed to parents according to financial need, and where the aid was spent depended solely upon where parents chose to enroll their children. Reviewing its earlier decisions in Mueller, Witters, and Zobrest, the Court announced that "where a government aid program is neutral with respect to religion, and provides assistance directly to a broad class of citizens who, in turn, direct government aid to religious schools wholly as a result of their own genuine and independent private choice, the program is not readily subject to challenge under the Establishment Clause. A program that shares these features permits government aid to reach religious institutions only by way of the deliberate choices of numerous individual recipients. The incidental advancement of a religious mission, or the perceived endorsement of a religious message, is reasonably attributable to the individual recipient, not to the government, whose role ends with the disbursement of benefits."[284] The Ohio program at issue was "entirely neutral with respect to religion. It provide[d] benefits directly to a wide spectrum of individuals, defined only by financial need and residence in a particular school district. It permit[ted] such individuals to exercise genuine choice among options public and private, secular and religious." The program was, therefore, upheld, as one of "true private choice."[285]

---

[281] See Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 650 (2002), discussing Mueller.

[282] Witters v. Washington Dep't of Servs. for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481, 487 (1986).

[283] See Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 652 (2002), discussing Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills Sch. Dist., 509 U.S. 1, 10–12 (1993).

[284] Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 652 (2002).

[285] Id. at 662.

[H102] Nyquist involved a New York program that established a tuition reimbursement plan for parents of children attending non-public elementary or secondary schools and gave tax relief to parents failing to qualify for tuition reimbursement. The fact that public assistance was provided only to parents of children in non-public schools had considerable bearing on the Court's decision striking down the statute. Although the program had been enacted for ostensibly secular purposes (to perpetuate a pluralistic educational environment and to preserve the fiscal integrity and educational quality of overburdened public schools), the Court found that its "function" was "unmistakably" to "offe[r] . . . an incentive to parents to send their children to sectarian schools" and "to provide desired financial support for nonpublic, sectarian institutions." And the tax relief program was essentially "the same form of encouragement and reward" for sending children to non-public schools. "The amount of the tax deduction [wa]s unrelated to the amount of money actually expended by any parent on tuition, but [wa]s calculated on the basis of a formula . . . [that was] apparently the product of a legislative attempt to assure that each family would receive a carefully estimated net benefit, and that the tax benefit would be comparable to, and compatible with, the tuition grant for lower income families."[286]

iii. Funding for Services Relating to Pregnancy and Parenthood

[H103] In McRae, the Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to a federal statute that severely limited the use of any federal funds to reimburse the cost of abortions under the Medicaid program. In so concluding, the Court noted that the fact that the funding restrictions at issue might coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church did not, without more, contravene the Establishment Clause.[287]

[H104] Bowen involved the Adolescent Family Life Act (AFLA), a federal grant program providing funds to institutions for counseling and educational services related to adolescent sexuality and pregnancy. The Act provided, inter alia, that the complexity of the problem required the involvement of religious and charitable organizations, voluntary associations, and other groups in the private sector, as well as governmental agencies; and grantees might not use funds for certain purposes, including family planning services and the promotion of abortion. Federal funding under the Act had gone to a wide variety of recipients, including organizations with institutional ties to religious denominations. With regard to the first factor of the Lemon test, the Court found that the AFLA had a valid secular purpose, since it "was motivated primarily, if not entirely, by the legitimate purpose—the elimination or reduction of social and economic problems caused by teenage sexuality, pregnancy, and parenthood." Although the Act, in amending its predecessor, increased the role of religious organizations in programs sponsored by the Act, the challenged provisions were "also motivated by other, entirely legitimate secular concerns," such as attempting to enlist the aid of not only religious organizations, but also family members, charitable organizations, voluntary associations, and other groups in the private sector, in addressing the problems associated with adolescent sexuality, which reflected "the appropriate aim of increasing broad-based community involvement." The Court further held that the Act did not have the primary

---

[286] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 783, 786, 790–91 (1973). In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639, 662 (2002), the Court also made clear that Nyquist "does not govern neutral educational assistance programs that offer aid directly to a broad class of individual recipients defined without regard to religion."

[287] Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 319–20 (1980).

effect of advancing religion. It authorized grants to institutions that were capable of providing certain services to adolescents, and required that potential grantees describe how they would involve other organizations, including religious organizations, in the funded programs. However, there was no requirement that grantees be affiliated with any religious denomination, and the services to be provided under the Act were not religious in character. The Act's approach toward dealing with adolescent sexuality and pregnancy was "not inherently religious, although it [might] coincide with the approach taken by certain religions." The provisions expressly mentioning the role of religious organizations reflected, at most, Congress' considered judgment that religious organizations could help solve the problems to which the Act was addressed. Since Congress had found that prevention of adolescent sexual activity and pregnancy depended primarily upon developing strong family values and close family ties, "it seem[ed] quite sensible for Congress to recognize that religious organizations can influence values, and can have some influence on family life, including parents' relations with their adolescent children. To the extent that this congressional recognition ha[d] any effect of advancing religion, the effect [was,] at most, 'incidental and remote.'" Moreover, the Act's face was neutral with respect to the grantee's status as a sectarian or purely secular institution. And "the possibility that AFLA grants [might] go to religious institutions that [could] be considered 'pervasively sectarian' [was not] sufficient to conclude that no grants whatsoever [could] be given under the statute to religious organizations." In addition, the Court rejected the presumption adopted by the district court that religiously affiliated AFLA grantees were not capable of carrying out their functions under the AFLA in a lawful, secular manner. The Court also disagreed with the district court's conclusion that the AFLA was invalid because it authorized "teaching" by religious grant recipients on matters that were fundamental elements of religious doctrine, such as the harm of pre-marital sex and the reasons for choosing adoption over abortion. "[T]he possibility, or even the likelihood, that some of the religious institutions which received AFLA funding [would] agree with the message that Congress intended to deliver to adolescents through the AFLA [wa]s insufficient to warrant a finding that the statute, on its face, ha[d] the primary effect of advancing religion. . . . Nor [did] the alignment of the statute and the religious views of the grantees run afoul of [the] proscription against 'funding a specifically religious activity in an otherwise substantially secular setting.' . . . The facially neutral projects authorized by the AFLA—including pregnancy testing, adoption counseling and referral services, prenatal and postnatal care, educational services, residential care, child care, and consumer education—[we]re not themselves 'specifically religious activities' and they [we]re not converted into such activities by the fact that they [we]re carried out by organizations with religious affiliations." Moreover, whatever "symbolic link" might, in fact, be created by the AFLA's disbursement of funds to religious institutions was not sufficient to justify striking down the statute on its face. Indeed, if the contrary reasoning was to be adopted, "it could be argued that any time a government aid program provides funding to religious organizations in an area in which the organization also has an interest, an impermissible 'symbolic link' could be created, no matter whether the aid was to be used solely for secular purposes." Finally, although there was no express statutory limitation on religious use of funds, a Senate Report on the AFLA stated that the use of AFLA funds to promote religion, or to teach the religious doctrines of a particular sect, was contrary to the intent of this legislation. In addition, the Act required each grantee to undergo evaluations of the services it provided, and it also required grantees to make such reports concerning its use of federal funds as the Secretary of Health and Human Services might require. These provisions, taken together, created a mechanism whereby the Secretary could police the grants that were given out under the Act to ensure that federal funds were not used for impermissible purposes. Hence, the programs established under the authority of the AFLA could be monitored to determine whether the funds were, in effect, being used by the grantees in such a way as to advance religion. "Given this statutory scheme, [the Court did] not think that the absence of an express limitation on the use of federal funds for religious purposes mean[t] that the statute, on its face, ha[d] the primary effect of advancing religion." Turning to the third prong of the Lemon test, the Court noted that, unquestionably, the Secretary would review the programs set up and run by the AFLA grantees, and undoubtedly this would involve a review of, for example, the educational materials that a grantee proposed to use. The Secretary might also wish to have government employees visit the clinics or offices where AFLA programs were being carried out to see whether they were, in fact, being administered in accordance with statutory and constitutional requirements. But "this type of grant monitoring does not amount to 'excessive entanglement,' at least in the context of a statute authorizing grants to religiously affiliated organizations that are not necessarily 'pervasively sectarian.'" For the foregoing reasons, the Court concluded that the AFLA did not violate the Establishment Clause on its face.[288]

e. Taxation—Tax Exemptions or Deductions

[H105] "[A] generally applicable tax, [like a sales and use tax,] has a secular purpose and neither advances nor inhibits religion, for the very essence of such a tax is that it is neutral and nondiscriminatory on questions of religious belief. . . . [Moreover, such a tax] threatens no excessive entanglement between church and state. . . . Even assuming that the tax imposes substantial administrative burdens on [a religious institution,] such administrative and recordkeeping burdens do not rise to a constitutionally significant level. . . . [And the fact that the religious establishment] must bear the cost of collecting and remitting a generally applicable sales and use tax does not enmesh government in religious affairs, . . . [as long as] the statutory scheme requires neither the involvement of state employees in, nor on-site continuing inspection of, [the establishment's] day-to-day operations. . . . Most significantly, the imposition of [a] sales and use tax without an exemption for [sectarian institutions] does not require the State to inquire into the religious content of the items sold or the religious motivation for selling or purchasing the items, because the materials are subject to the tax regardless of content or motive."[289]

[H106] In Hernandez, the Court held that taxpayers may not deduct, as "charitable contributions" under 26 U.S.C. Section 170, payments made to branch churches of the

---

[288] Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589, 602–18 (1988). Although there was no dispute that the record contained evidence of specific incidents of impermissible behavior by AFLA grantees, the Court felt that the case should be remanded to the district court for consideration of the evidence presented by appellees insofar as it shed light on the manner in which the statute was being administered. Should the court conclude that the Secretary had wrongfully approved certain AFLA grants, an appropriate remedy would require the Secretary to withdraw such approval. Id. at 620–22.

[289] Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Bd. of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378, 394–96 (1990).

Church of Scientology, in order to receive services known as "auditing" and "training." In doing so, the Court found that disallowance of such deductions does not violate the Establishment Clause. The argument that Section 170 created an unconstitutional denominational preference, by according disproportionately harsh tax status to those religions that raised funds by imposing fixed costs for participation in certain religious practices, was found unpersuasive. Section 170 passed constitutional muster, since it did not facially differentiate among religious sects but applied to all religious entities, and since it satisfied the Lemon test. First, the Court noted that the section was "neutral both in design and purpose," there being no allegation that it had been born of animus to religion in general or to Scientology in particular. Second, "its primary effect"—encouraging gifts to charitable entities, including, but not limited to, religious organizations—did not advance religion, there being no allegation that it involved direct governmental action endorsing religion or a particular religious practice. Its primary secular effect was not rendered unconstitutional merely because it happened to harmonize with the tenets of religions that raised funds primarily by soliciting unilateral donations. Third, the section threatened no excessive entanglement between church and state. "To be sure, ascertaining whether a payment to a religious institution [wa]s part of a quid pro quo transaction [might] require the IRS to ascertain from the institution the prices of its services and commodities, the regularity with which payments for such services and commodities [we]re waived, and other pertinent information about the transaction. But routine regulatory interaction which involves no inquiries into religious doctrine, . . . no delegation of state power to a religious body, . . . and no 'detailed monitoring and close administrative contact' between secular and religious bodies, . . . does not of itself violate the nonentanglement command. . . . Nor [did] the application of [Section] 170 require the Government to place a monetary value on particular religious benefits. . . . [T]he need to ascertain what portion of a payment was a purchase and what portion was a contribution [did] not ineluctably create entanglement problems. In cases where the economic value of a good or service [wa]s elusive—where, for example, no comparable good or service is sold in the marketplace—the IRS ha[d] eschewed benefit-focused valuation. Instead, it ha[d] often employed as an alternative method of valuation an inquiry into the cost (if any) to the donee of providing the good or service. This valuation method, while requiring qualified religious institutions to disclose relevant information about church costs to the IRS, involve[d] administrative inquiries that, as a general matter, 'bear no resemblance to the kind of government surveillance the Court has . . . held to pose an intolerable risk of government entanglement with religion.'"[290]

[H107] Property tax exemptions for religious institutions historically reflect the concern of authors of constitutions and statutes as to dangers of government hostility toward religion inherent in the imposition of property taxes; "exemption constitutes a reasonable and balanced attempt to guard against those dangers."[291] Property tax exemptions for religious bodies have been in place for over 200 years without disruption to the interests represented by the Establishment Clause. Taking into account this historical consideration, the Court held in Walz that New York's tax exemption for "religious organizations for religious properties used solely for religious worship," as part of a general exemption for non-profit institutions, did not violate the Establishment Clause. The legislative purpose of the property tax exemption was neither the advancement nor the

---

290 Hernandez v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680, 695–98 (1989).

291 Walz v. Tax Comm'n of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 673 (1970).

inhibition of religion; it was neither sponsorship nor hostility. "New York, in common with the other States, ha[d] determined that certain entities that exist[ed] in a harmonious relationship to the community at large, and that foster[ed] its 'moral or mental improvement,' should not be inhibited in their activities by property taxation or the hazard of loss of those properties for nonpayment of taxes. It ha[d] not singled out one particular church or religious group, or even churches as such; rather, it ha[d] granted exemption to all houses of religious worship within a broad class of property owned by nonprofit, quasi-public corporations which included hospitals, libraries, playgrounds, scientific, professional, historical, and patriotic groups." Consequently, the Court could not read New York's statute as attempting to establish religion; it was "simply sparing the exercise of religion from the burden of property taxation levied on private profit institutions."[292] The Court further found that the exemption did not have the primary effect of sponsoring religious activity. The Court noted that, although tax exemptions may have the same economic effect as state subsidies, "the grant of a tax exemption is not sponsorship, since the government does not transfer part of its revenue to churches, but simply abstains from demanding that the church support the state; . . . there is no genuine nexus between tax exemption and establishment of religion."[293] Moreover, "the exemption create[d] only a minimal and remote involvement between church and state, and far less than taxation of churches. It restrict[ed] the fiscal relationship between church and state, and tended to complement and reinforce the desired separation insulating each from the other."[294]

[H108] In Texas Monthly, the Court struck down a state tax exemption benefiting only religious periodicals. Even though the statute in question worked no discrimination among sects, a majority of the Court found that its preference for religious publications, over all other kinds, "effectively endorse[d] religious belief."[295]

[H109] Nyquist invalidated a statute that gave tax relief to parents of children in nonpublic schools, insofar as it had the impermissible effect of advancing the sectarian activities of religious schools.[296] By contrast, Mueller upheld a general tax deduction available to parents of all schoolchildren for school expenses, including tuition to religious schools.[297]

f. Government Sponsorship of Religion

i. In the Public School Context

[H110] A state cannot, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, utilize its public school system to aid any or all religious faiths or sects in the dissemination of their doctrines and ideals. Hence, a public school may not permit part-time

---

[292] Id. at 672–73.

[293] Id. at 675.

[294] Id. at 676.

[295] Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1, 14–17 (1989), (plurality opinion of three Justices); id. at 28 (Blackmun and O'Connor, JJ., concurring in judgment and stating that "a statutory preference for the dissemination of religious ideas offends the most basic understanding of what the Establishment Clause is all about, and hence is constitutionally intolerable").

[296] Comm. for Pub. Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 790–91 (1973). See, in extenso, para. H102.

[297] Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1983). See, in extenso, para. H98.

religious instruction on its premises as a part of the school program, even if participation in that instruction is entirely voluntary and even if the instruction itself is conducted only by non-public school personnel. McCollum concerned the action of a board of education permitting religious instruction—by religious teachers who were employed at no expense to the school authorities, but were subject to the approval and supervision of the superintendent of schools—during school hours, in public school buildings, and requiring those children who chose not to attend to remain in their classrooms. Thus, "[t]he operation of the State's compulsory education system . . . assist[ed] and [wa]s integrated with the program of religious instruction carried on by separate religious sects. . . . This [wa]s beyond all question a utilization of the tax-established and tax-supported public school system to aid religious groups to spread their faith. And it [fell] squarely under the ban of the First Amendment."[298]

[H111] However, "[w]hen the state encourages religious instruction or cooperates with religious authorities by adjusting the schedule of public events to sectarian needs, it follows the best of [the American] traditions. For it then respects the religious nature of [the American] people and accommodates the public service to their spiritual needs. To hold that it may not would be to find in the Constitution a requirement that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups. That would be preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe."[299] In light of these considerations, the Zorach Court found no constitutional objection to a New York City program permitting public schoolchildren to absent themselves one hour a week for religious observance and education outside the school grounds.

[H112] "[T]he First Amendment does not permit the State to require that teaching and learning must be tailored to the principles or prohibitions of any religious sect or dogma."[300] Epperson involved a facial challenge to a statute regulating the teaching of Darwin's theory of evolution. In that case, the Court struck down an Arkansas statute that made it unlawful for an instructor to teach evolution or to use a textbook that referred to this scientific theory. Although the Arkansas anti-evolution law did not explicitly state its predominate religious purpose, the Court could not ignore that the statute "was a product of the upsurge of 'fundamentalist' religious fervor" that had long viewed this particular scientific theory as contradicting the literal interpretation of the Bible. And since there was no suggestion Arkansas' law might be justified by considerations of state policy other than the religious views of some of its citizens, the Court determined that the motivation for the challenged statute was "to suppress the teaching of a theory which, it was thought, 'denied' the divine creation of man." Because there can be no legitimate state interest in "protecting any or all religions from views distasteful to them," the law was held violative of the First and Fourteenth Amendments.[301]

[H113] Edwards invalidated Louisiana's "Creationism Act," which forbade the teaching of the theory of evolution in public elementary and secondary schools unless accompanied by instruction in the theory of "creation science." The Court noted that "teaching a variety of scientific theories about the origins of humankind to schoolchildren might be validly done with the clear secular intent of enhancing the effectiveness of science instruction." But if the Act's purpose "was solely to maximize the comprehensive-

---

298 Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Bd. of Educ., 333 U.S. 203, 209–10 (1948).

299 Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 313–14 (1952).

300 Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106 (1968).

301 Id. at 106–09.

ness and effectiveness of science instruction, it would have encouraged the teaching of all scientific theories about the origins of humankind." The statute failed even to ensure that creationism would be taught, but instead required the teaching of this theory only when the theory of evolution was taught. Thus, the law did "not serve to protect academic freedom, but ha[d] the distinctly different purpose of discrediting evolution by counterbalancing its teaching at every turn with the teaching of creationism. . . . [Its purpose] was to restructure the science curriculum to conform with a particular religious viewpoint. Out of many possible science subjects taught in the public schools, the legislature ha[d] chose[n] to affect the teaching of the one scientific theory that historically has been opposed by certain religious sects. As in Epperson, the legislature [had] passed the Act to give preference to those religious groups which ha[d] as one of their tenets the creation of humankind by a divine creator. . . . [The Act was] designed either to promote the theory of creation science, which embodies a particular religious tenet, by requiring that creation science be taught whenever evolution [wa]s taught, or to prohibit the teaching of a scientific theory disfavored by certain religious sects, by forbidding the teaching of evolution when creation science [wa]s not also taught." In either case, the Act endorsed religion in violation of the First Amendment.[302]

[H114] Abington involved state rules requiring the selection and reading at the opening of the school day of verses from the Holy Bible and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer by the students in unison. Although this requirement might serve secular purposes, such as "the promotion of moral values, the contradiction to the materialistic trends of our times, . . . and the teaching of literature," the Court stressed that, even if the purpose of the foregoing exercises was not strictly religious, it was "sought to be accomplished through readings, without comment, from the Bible, . . . an instrument of religion." Moreover, these exercises were prescribed as part of the curricular activities of students who were required by law to attend school. And they were held in the school buildings under the supervision and with the participation of teachers employed in those schools. Consequently, the Court held that the schools' opening exercises were government-sponsored religious ceremonies and had the impermissible primary effect of advancing religion; the fact that individual students might absent themselves upon parental request was irrelevant. Nevertheless, the Court specifically noted that nothing in its holding was intended to indicate that "such study of the Bible or of religion, when presented objectively as part of a secular program of education, [might] not be effected consistently with the First Amendment."[303]

[H115] In Stone, the Court held that a statute requiring the posting of a copy of the Ten Commandments on public classroom walls violated the Establishment Clause. While the state legislature required the notation in small print at the bottom of each display that "the secular application of the Ten Commandments is clearly seen in its adoption as the fundamental legal code of Western Civilization and the Common Law of the United States," such an "avowed" secular purpose was not sufficient to avoid conflict with the First Amendment. The preeminent purpose of the statute was plainly religious in nature. As the Court emphasized, the Ten Commandments are "a sacred text in the Jewish and Christian faiths. . . . The Commandments do not confine themselves to arguably secular matters, such as honoring one's parents, killing or murder, adultery, stealing, false witness, and covetousness. Rather, the first part of the Commandments concerns the religious duties of believers: worshipping the Lord God alone, avoiding idolatry, not using the Lord's name in vain, and observing the Sabbath Day. . . . [The Ten Commandments can be] integrated into the school curriculum, where the Bible may constitutionally be used in an appropriate study of history, civilization, ethics, comparative religion, or the like. . . . [But] [p]osting of religious texts on the wall serves no such educational function. If the posted copies of the Ten Commandments [we]re to have any effect at all, it [would] be to induce the schoolchildren to read, meditate upon, perhaps to venerate and obey, the Commandments." This was not a permissible state objective under the Establishment Clause. And that the posted copies were financed by voluntary private contributions was immaterial, for the mere posting under the auspices of the legislature provided the state support prohibited by the First Amendment.[304]

---

302 Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 588–89, 593–94 (1987).

303 Sch. Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 223–25 (1963).

[H116] In Engel, the Court considered, for the first time, the constitutionality of prayer in a public school. Students said aloud a short prayer selected by the State Board of Regents. The Court, made clear that the First Amendment forbids the use of the power or prestige of the government to control, support, or influence the religious beliefs and practices of the American people. Although the prayer was denominationally neutral and its observance on the part of the students was voluntary, the Court found that it violated this essential precept of the Establishment Clause.[305]

[H117] In Wallace, the Court held unconstitutional Alabama's moment-of-silence statute because it had been enacted "for the sole purpose of expressing the State's endorsement of prayer activities for one minute at the beginning of each schoolday." Although the state characterized its law as one designed to provide a one-minute period for meditation, the Court rejected that stated purpose as insufficient, taking into account that a previously adopted Alabama law already provided for such a one-minute period.[306]

[H118] In Lee v. Weisman, state officials directed the performance and the content of a formal religious exercise at secondary schools' promotional and graduation ceremonies. As the Court stressed, "prayer exercises in elementary and secondary schools carry a particular risk of indirect coercion. . . . What to most believers may seem nothing more than a reasonable request that the nonbeliever respect their religious practices, in a school context may appear to the nonbeliever or dissenter to be an attempt to employ the machinery of the State to enforce a religious orthodoxy. . . . [T]he school district's supervision and control of a high school graduation ceremony place[d] subtle and indirect public and peer pressure on attending students to stand as a group or maintain respectful silence during the invocation and benediction." A "reasonable dissenter" of high school age could believe that standing or remaining silent signified her own participation in, or approval of, the group exercise, rather than her respect for it. And the state might not place the student objector in the dilemma of participating or protesting. "Research in psychology supports the common assumption that adolescents are often susceptible to pressure from their peers towards conformity, and that the influence is strongest in matters of social convention. . . . To recognize that the choice imposed by the State constitutes an unacceptable constraint only acknowledges that the government may no more use social pressure to enforce orthodoxy than it may use more

---

304 Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41–42 (1980) (per curiam).

305 Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 429–30 (1962). A year later, the Court again invalidated government-sponsored prayer in public schools in School District of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 223–26 (1963). See, in extenso, para. H114.

306 Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 58–60 (1985).

direct means." Furthermore, the argument that the option of not attending the ceremony excused any inducement or coercion in the ceremony itself was rejected. The Court noted that high school graduation is one of life's most significant occasions, and a student is not free to absent herself from the exercise in any real sense of the term "voluntary." "The Constitution forbids the State to exact religious conformity from a student at the price of attending his own high school graduation." Also not dispositive was the contention that prayers are an essential part of these ceremonies because, for many persons, the occasion would lack meaning without the recognition that human achievements cannot be understood apart from their spiritual essence. This position failed to acknowledge that what, for many, was a spiritual imperative was, for the Weismans, religious conformance compelled by the state. Hence, the Court held that a prayer delivered by a rabbi at a middle school graduation ceremony violated the Establishment Clause.[307]

[H119] In Santa Fe, the Court held that a school's policy of permitting prayer at school-sponsored football games contravened the First Amendment. Prior to 1995, a student, elected as Santa Fe High School's student council chaplain, delivered a prayer over the public address system before each home varsity football game. This practice was challenged in district court as a violation of the Establishment Clause. While the suit was pending, the school district adopted a different policy, which authorized two student elections, the first to determine whether "invocations" should be delivered at games and the second to select the spokesperson to deliver them. The Court decided that such student-led invocations should not be regarded as "private speech." "These invocations [we]re authorized by a government policy and occurr[ed] on government property at government-sponsored, school-related events." The school district had attempted to disentangle itself from the religious messages by developing the two-step student election process. However, the elections would take place only because "the school board ha[d] chosen to permit students to deliver a brief invocation;" and they would be conducted by the high school student council and upon advice and direction of the high school principal. "In addition to involving the school in the selection of the speaker, the policy, by its terms, invite[d] and encourage[d] religious messages, . . . [since it] state[d] that the purpose of the message was 'to solemnize the event.'" The actual or perceived endorsement of the message, moreover, was established by factors beyond just the text of the policy. The invocation was "delivered to a large audience assembled as part of a regularly scheduled school-sponsored function conducted on school property. The message [wa]s broadcast over the school's public address system, which remain[ed] subject to the control of school officials. . . . In this context, the members of the listening audience must perceive the pre-game message as a public expression of the views of the majority of the student body delivered with the approval of the school administration. . . . Regardless of the listener's support for, or objection to, the message, an objective Santa Fe High School student [would] unquestionably perceive the inevitable pre-game prayer as stamped with her school's seal of approval."[308]

---

[307] Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 592–96 (1992). The Court distinguished this case from Marsh, which approved legislative prayers (see para. H132), observing that "[t]he atmosphere at a state legislature's opening, where adults are free to enter and leave with little comment and for any number of reasons, cannot compare with the constraining potential of the one school event most important for the student to attend." See id. at 597.

[308] Santa Fe Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290, 302, 306–08 (2000).

ii. Display of Religious Symbols by the Government—Religious Speech on Public Property

[H120] The Establishment Clause prohibits the government from appearing to take a position on questions of religious belief. The government's use of religious symbolism is unconstitutional if its purpose is to advance religion or if it has the effect of endorsing religious beliefs, in view of its context.[309] In Stone, for example, the Court invalidated a state statute requiring the posting of a copy of the Ten Commandments in public schools, pointing out that the Commandments were posted as a religious admonition, and were not integrated into the school curriculum, where the Bible may constitutionally be used in an appropriate study of history, civilization, ethics, or comparative religion.[310]

[H121] In Lynch, the Court held that a city's display of a creche did not violate the Establishment Clause because, in context, the display did not endorse religion. The city of Pawtucket annually erected a Christmas display in a park owned by a non-profit organization and located in the heart of the city's shopping district. The display included such objects as a Santa Claus house, a Christmas tree, a banner that read "SEASONS GREETINGS," and a creche or Nativity scene, which had been part of this annual display for 40 years. The Court noted that the display was sponsored by the city "to celebrate the Holiday and to depict the origins of that Holiday." These were legitimate secular purposes. Furthermore, although the creche was identified with one religious faith, display of the creche was no more an advancement or endorsement of religion than the congressional and executive recognition of the origins of the holiday itself as "Christ's Mass" or the exhibition of literally hundreds of religious paintings in governmentally supported museums. Whatever benefit there was to one faith or religion was "indirect, remote, and incidental." The creche, like a painting, was "passive." Even the traditional, purely secular displays extant at Christmas, with or without a creche, would inevitably recall the religious nature of the holiday. The Court concluded that "[i]t would be ironic, . . . if the inclusion of a single symbol of a particular historic religious event, as part of a celebration acknowledged in the Western World for 20 centuries, and in [the United States] by the people, by the Executive Branch, by the Congress, and the courts for two centuries, would so 'taint' the city's exhibit as to render it violative of the Establishment Clause."[311]

[H122] Allegheny concerned the constitutionality of two recurring holiday displays located on public property in downtown Pittsburgh. The first, a creche depicting the Christian nativity scene, was placed on the Grand Staircase of the Allegheny County Courthouse. The creche had been donated by a Roman Catholic group and bore a sign

---

309 See Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 597 (1989). See also Capitol Square Review and Advisory Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753, 773–82 (1995) (O'Connor, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment); id. at 797–16 (Stevens, J., dissenting); id. at 817–18 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

310 Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 42 (1980). See, in extenso, para. H115.

311 Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 681–86 (1984). The Court also noted that the creche did not create excessive entanglement between religion and government. The four dissenters concluded that the other elements of the Pawtucket display did not negate the endorsement of Christian faith caused by the presence of the creche. They viewed the inclusion of the creche in the city's overall display as placing "the government's imprimatur of approval on the particular religious beliefs exemplified by the creche." Id. at 701.

to that effect. Its manger had at its crest an angel bearing a banner proclaiming "Gloria in Excelsis Deo," meaning "Glory to God in the Highest." The Court held that the creche display, viewed in its overall context, violated the Establishment Clause. The creche angel's words endorsed "a patently Christian message:" Glory to God for the birth of Jesus Christ. Moreover, in contrast to Lynch, "nothing in the context of the display detract[ed] from the creche's religious message. The Lynch display comprised a series of figures and objects, each group of which had its own focal point. Santa's house and his reindeer were objects of attention separate from the creche, and had their specific visual story to tell. Similarly, whatever a 'talking' wishing well may be, it obviously was a center of attention separate from the creche. [In Allegheny], in contrast, the creche [stood] alone: it [wa]s the single element of the display on the Grand Staircase. The floral decoration surrounding the creche [could] not be viewed as somehow equivalent to the secular symbols in the overall Lynch display. . . . Nor did the fact that the creche [wa]s the setting for the county's annual Christmas carol program diminish its religious meaning. . . . Furthermore, the creche [sat] on the Grand Staircase, the main and most public part of the building that [wa]s the seat of county government. No viewer could reasonably think that it occupie[d] this location without the support and approval of the government. Thus, by permitting the display of the creche in this particular physical setting, . . . the county sent an unmistakable message that it support[ed] and promote[d] the Christian praise to God that [wa]s the creche's religious message. The fact that the creche [bore] a sign disclosing its ownership by a Roman Catholic organization [did] not alter this conclusion. On the contrary, the sign simply demonstrate[d] that the government [wa]s endorsing the religious message of that organization, rather than communicating a message of its own." The Court concluded that "[t]he government may acknowledge Christmas as a cultural phenomenon, but, under the First Amendment, it may not observe it as a Christian holy day by suggesting that people praise God for the birth of Jesus." The display of the creche in this context, therefore, should be permanently enjoined.[312]

[H123] The second of the holiday displays at issue in Allegheny was an 18-foot Chanukah menorah or candelabrum, which was placed just outside the City-County Building next to the city's 45-foot decorated Christmas tree. At the foot of the tree was a sign bearing the mayor's name and containing text declaring the city's "salute to liberty." The menorah was owned by a Jewish group, but was stored, erected, and removed each year by the city. A majority of the Court decided that the menorah did not violate the Establishment Clause. The two Justices who provided the decisive votes to distinguish this situation relied on the presence of the tree and the sign to find that the menorah, in context, could not be interpreted by a reasonable observer as an endorsement of Judaism or Christianity or disapproval of alternative beliefs.[313]

---

[312] Allegheny County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573, 598–601 (1989).

[313] Id. at 613–21 (opinion of Blackmun, J., who noted that the menorah's display with a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty simply recognized that both Christmas and Chanukah were part of the same winter holiday season); id. at 632–37 (opinion of O'Connor, J., who found that, in this particular physical setting, the city conveyed a message of pluralism and freedom of belief during the holiday season); id. at 663–67 (opinion of Kennedy, J., joined by Renquist, C.J., White, and Scalia, JJ., who thought that the creche and the menorah were purely passive symbols of religious holidays and, thus, permissible, under Lynch).

[H124] In Capitol Square, Ohio denied, on Establishment Clause grounds, the application of the Ku Klux Klan to place, during the Christmas season, an unattended cross on the Statehouse plaza in Columbus, a forum for discussion of public questions and for public activities, situated close to the seat of state government. The Klan filed a suit, and the district court entered an injunction requiring issuance of the requested permit. The Court affirmed this judgment. The display was private religious speech and, therefore, protected under the Free Speech Clause. Because Capitol Square was a traditional public forum, the state could regulate the content of the Klan's expression there only if such a restriction was necessary, and narrowly drawn, to serve a compelling state interest. The Court further noted that "compliance with the Establishment Clause may be a state interest sufficiently compelling to justify content-based restrictions on speech."[314] However, such an interest was not implicated in that case. A four-Justice plurality noted the difference between "government speech endorsing religion, which the Establishment Clause forbids, and private speech endorsing religion, which the Free Speech and Free Exercise Clauses protect." As to the argument that "that distinction disappears when the private speech is conducted too close to the symbols of government," the plurality observed that the proposition "that the distinction disappears whenever private speech can be mistaken for government speech . . . cannot be accepted at least where, as here, the government has not fostered or encouraged the mistake." Thus, the plurality denied to apply the so-called "endorsement test," considering that where the Court had tested for endorsement, the subject of the test had been either expression by the government itself or government action alleged to discriminate in favor of private religious expression or activity. Subsequently, the plurality held that "[r]eligious expression cannot violate the Establishment Clause where it (1) is purely private and (2) occurs in a traditional or designated public forum, publicly announced and open to all on equal terms." Those conditions were satisfied there.[315] By contrast, five other members of the Court held that the "endorsement test" is applicable, even where a neutral state policy toward private religious speech in a public forum is at issue.[316] Three of these Justices decided that, on the facts of this case, a reasonable observer would not fairly interpret the state's tolerance of the Klan's religious display as an endorsement of religion: such an observer would view the Klan's cross display fully aware that Capitol Square was a public space in which a multiplicity of groups, both secular and religious, engaged in expressive conduct, and would certainly be able to read and understand an adequate disclaimer, which the Klan had informed the state it would include in the display. Furthermore, the same Justices observed that Ohio's denial of the Klan's application was not a narrowly tailored response necessary to ensure that the state did not appear to take a position on questions of religious belief: Ohio could have either required a sufficiently large and clear disclaimer or instituted a policy of restricting all private, unattended displays to one area of the square, with a permanent sign marking the area as a forum for private speech carrying no state endorsement.[317]

---

[314] Capitol Square Review and Advisory Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753, 761–62 (1995). See also Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271 (1981). However, it is not clear whether a state's interest in avoiding an Establishment Clause violation would justify viewpoint discrimination. See Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 113 (2001).

[315] Id. at 765–70.

[316] Id. at 773–78 (O'Connor, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment); id. at 799–800 (Stevens, J., dissenting); id. at 817–18 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

[317] Id. at 778–82, 792–94 (O'Connor, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., concurring in the judgment).

[H125] In McCreary, executives of two counties posted a version of the Ten Commandments on the walls of their courthouses. After suits were filed charging violations of the Establishment Clause, the legislative body of each county adopted a resolution calling for a more extensive exhibit meant to show that the Commandments are Kentucky's "precedent legal code." The result, in each instance, was a modified display of the Commandments surrounded by texts containing religious references as their sole common element. After changing counsel, the counties revised the exhibits again by eliminating some documents, quoting the Ten Commandments at greater length, and adding some new ones, such as the Star Spangled Banner's lyrics and the Declaration of Independence, accompanied by statements about their historical and legal significance. After stating that its inquiry should look to the historical context of the counties' actions at issue, the Court noted that the first display in question "set out a text of the Commandments as distinct from any traditionally symbolic representation, and . . . stood alone, not part of an arguably secular display. . . . [The Commandments are] a central point of reference in the religious and moral history of Jews and Christians. They proclaim the existence of a monotheistic god (no other gods). They regulate details of religious obligation (no graven images, no sabbath breaking, no vain oath swearing). And they unmistakably rest even the universally accepted prohibitions (as against murder, theft, and the like) on the sanction of the divinity proclaimed at the beginning of the text. Displaying that text is thus different from a symbolic depiction, like tablets with ten roman numerals, which could be seen as alluding to a general notion of law, not a sectarian conception of faith." "In the second display, unlike the first, the Commandments were not hung in isolation, merely leaving the Counties' purpose to emerge from the pervasively religious text of the Commandments themselves. Instead, the second version was required to include the statement of the government's purpose expressly set out in the county resolutions, and underscored it by juxtaposing the Commandments to other documents with highlighted references to God as their sole common element. The display's unstinting focus was on religious passages, showing that the Counties were posting the Commandments precisely because of their sectarian content. That demonstration of the government's objective was enhanced by serial religious references and the accompanying resolution's claim about the embodiment of ethics in Christ." After the counties changed lawyers, they mounted a third display, without a new resolution or repeal of the old one. The result was the "Foundations of American Law and Government" exhibit, which placed the Commandments in the company of other documents the counties thought especially significant in the historical foundation of American government. In trying to persuade the district court to lift its preliminary injunction, ordering the removal of the display at issue, the counties cited several new purposes for the third version, including a desire "to educate the citizens of the county regarding some of the documents that played a significant role in the foundation of our system of law and government." However, the Court held that these "new statements of purpose were presented only as a litigating position, there being no further authorizing action by the counties' governing boards." In addition, this third display quoted more of the purely religious language of the Commandments than the first two displays had done. Hence, "[n]o reasonable observer could swallow the claim that the Counties had cast off the objective so unmistakable in the earlier displays." "Nor did the selection of posted material suggest a clear theme that might prevail over evidence of the continuing religious object." As the Court pointed out, in a collection of documents said to be "foundational" to American government, it is, at least, odd to include a patriotic anthem, but to omit the Fourteenth Amendment, or to leave out the original Constitution of 1787. Under these considerations, the Court did not disturb the challenged conclusions of the lower courts, which had been unable to find a legitimizing secular purpose in the third version of the display.[318]

[H126] Van Orden involved the display of a monument inscribed with the Ten Commandments on the Texas State Capitol grounds. The 22 acres surrounding the Texas State Capitol contained 17 monuments and 21 historical markers commemorating the "people, ideals, and events that compose Texan identity." The monolith challenged in that case stood six-feet high and three-feet wide. It was located to the north of the Capitol building, between the Capitol and the Supreme Court building. Its primary content was the text of the Ten Commandments. An eagle grasping the American flag, an eye inside of a pyramid, and two small tablets with what appeared to be an ancient script were carved above the text of the Ten Commandments. Below the text were two Stars of David and the superimposed Greek letters Chi and Rho, which represent Christ. The bottom of the monument bore the inscription "PRESENTED TO THE PEOPLE AND YOUTH OF TEXAS BY THE FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES OF TEXAS," a national social, civic, and patriotic organization. The Court held that the Establishment Clause allowed the display of this monument. In so concluding, a four-member plurality held that the Lemon test is not useful in dealing with such a passive monument and based its analysis on the nature of the monument and on the nation's history, noting, in particular, that (1) the Ten Commandments have an "undeniable historical meaning," and that such acknowledgments of the role played by the Ten Commandments in the nation's heritage are common throughout America; (2) the text of the Ten Commandments was used in a "passive" way, which was demonstrated by the fact that the petitioner apparently walked by the monument for a number of years before bringing a lawsuit; (3) Texas "treated [its] Capitol grounds monuments as representing the several strands in the State's political and legal history."[319] Justice Breyer concurred in the judgment, stressing that "[t]he circumstances surrounding the display's placement on the capitol grounds and its physical setting suggest[ed] that the State itself intended the . . . nonreligious aspects of the tablets' message to predominate," and that the fact that the display had stood apparently uncontested for nearly two generations suggested that "the public visiting the capitol grounds . . . considered the religious aspect of the tablets' message as part of a broader moral and historical message reflective of a cultural heritage."[320]

---

[318] McCreary County v. Am. Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005) (opinion of Souter, J., in which Stevens, O'Connor, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., joined). In holding the preliminary injunction adequately supported by evidence that the counties' purpose had not changed at the third stage, the Court emphasized that it did not decide that the counties' past actions would forever taint any effort on their part to deal with the subject matter. Nor did the Court hold that a sacred text can never be integrated constitutionally into a governmental display on the subject of law, or American history. In this regard, the Court observed that its own courtroom frieze was deliberately designed in the exercise of governmental authority so as to include the figure of Moses holding tablets exhibiting a portion of the Hebrew text of the later, secularly phrased Commandments. However, the Court added, in the company of 17 other lawgivers, most of them secular figures, "there is no risk that Moses would strike an observer as evidence that the National Government violates neutrality in religion."

[319] Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677 (2005) (opinion of Rehnquist, C.J., in which Justices Scalia, Kennedy and Thomas joined).

[320] Id.

[H127] In Widmar, the Court examined a public university's exclusion of a student religious group from facilities available to other student groups. The state claimed that its compelling interest in complying with the Establishment Clause justified the content-based restriction of access to a public forum. The Court rejected the defense. An open-forum policy, including non-discrimination against religious speech, would have a secular purpose, and would in fact avoid entanglement with religion.[321] The Court further held that an "equal access" policy would provide only incidental benefit to religion. Two factors were especially relevant. First, a university's forum did not confer any "imprimatur of state approval on religious sects or practices." Second, the university's provision of benefits to a broad spectrum of groups was "an important index of secular effect." In addition, the Court stressed that the state's interest in achieving greater separation of church and state, than was already ensured under the Establishment Clause, was limited by the Free Exercise and Free Speech Clauses and was not sufficiently "compelling" to justify content-based discrimination against religious speech of the student group in question.[322]

[H128] In 1984, Congress extended the reasoning of Widmar to public secondary schools. Under the Equal Access Act, a public secondary school with a "limited open forum" was prohibited from discriminating against students who wished to conduct a meeting within that forum on the basis of the "religious, political, philosophical, or other content of the speech at such meetings." In Mergens, the Court upheld the Act on its face. A four-Justice plurality thought that the logic of Widmar applied with equal force to the Equal Access Act. First, the Act's prohibition of discrimination on the basis of "political, philosophical, or other" speech, as well as religious speech, was a sufficient basis for meeting the secular purpose prong of the Lemon test. Second, the Act did not have the primary effect of advancing religion. As the plurality noted, there is a crucial difference between government and private speech endorsing religion, and high school students "are mature enough and are likely to understand that a school does not endorse or support student speech that it merely permits on a nondiscriminatory basis." Moreover, the Act expressly limited participation by school officials at student religious group meetings and required that such meetings be held during "noninstructional time;" thereby the Act avoided the problems of "the students' emulation of teachers as role models" and "mandatory attendance requirements" that might otherwise indicate official endorsement or coercion. Moreover, the Act created no risk of excessive entanglement between government and religion, since it prohibited faculty monitors from participating in, non-school persons from directing, controlling, or regularly attending, and school "sponsorship" of, religious meetings.[323]

[H129] In Lamb's Chapel, a school district allowed private groups to use school facilities during off-hours for a variety of civic, social, and recreational purposes, excluding,

---

[321] Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271–72, n.11 (1981). The Court noted that "the University would risk greater 'entanglement' by attempting to enforce its exclusion of 'religious worship' and 'religious speech.' . . . Initially, the University would need to determine which words and activities fall within 'religious worship and religious teaching.' This alone could prove an impossible task in an age where many and various beliefs meet the constitutional definition of religion. . . . There would also be a continuing need to monitor group meetings to ensure compliance with the rule."

[322] Id. at 274–76.

[323] Bd. of Educ. of Westside Cmty. Sch. v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 248–53 (1990) (plurality opinion).

however, religious purposes. Under "public forum" analysis, "control over access to a limited public forum or to a nonpublic forum can be based on subject matter and speaker identity so long as the distinctions drawn are reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum and are viewpoint-neutral."[324] The Court decided that the school district violated an applicant's free speech rights by denying it use of the facilities solely because of the religious viewpoint of the films that the applicant wished to present and that dealt with an otherwise permissible subject under the school board's regulations. As the Court stressed, "it discriminates on the basis of viewpoint to permit school property to be used for the presentation of all views about family issues and childrearing except those dealing with the subject matter from a religious standpoint."[325] Further, the Court found that because the films would not have been shown during school hours, would not have been sponsored by the school, and would have been open to the public, not just to church members, there was "no realistic danger that the community would think" that the district was endorsing religion. Hence, the Establishment Clause could not justify the viewpoint-based exclusion of religious speech from the school grounds, after hours.[326]

[H130] Good News Club struck down a school policy, similar to the one at issue in Lamb's Chapel. The parties agreed, and the Court assumed, that the school operated a limited public forum. The Court rejected the school's attempt to distinguish Lamb's Chapel by emphasizing that its policy involved elementary schoolchildren, who would perceive that the school was endorsing religion and would feel coerced to participate, because the religious club's activities would take place on school grounds, even though they would occur during non-school hours. That argument was found unpersuasive, mainly because (1) "allowing the club to speak on school grounds would ensure neutrality [toward religion,] not threaten it;" (2) as to the question whether the community would feel coercive pressure to engage in the club's activities, "the relevant community would be the parents" who chose whether their children would attend club meetings, not the children themselves; and (3) in any event, the danger that children would misperceive the endorsement of religion was no greater than the danger that they would perceive a hostility toward the religious viewpoint if the club were excluded from the public forum. The Court concluded that there was not any significance in this case to the possibility that elementary schoolchildren might witness the club's activities on school premises.[327]

