[H131] In Rosenberger, a public university declined to authorize disbursements from its student activities fund, a limited public forum, to finance the printing of a Christian student newspaper. Relying on Lamb's Chapel, the Court held that the university's refusal

---

[324] Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 392–93 (1993) (emphasis added), quoting Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. and Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 806 (1985). In Lamb's Chapel, supra, at 391–92, the Court declined to decide whether the school district's opening of its facilities created a limited or a traditional public forum.

[325] Lamb's Chapel v. Ctr. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 393 (1993).

[326] Id. at 395.

[327] Good News Club v. Milford Cent. Sch., 533 U.S. 98, 114–19 (2001). The Court also noted that (1) there was no evidence that young children were permitted to loiter outside classrooms after the school day had ended; (2) the meetings were held in a combined high school resource room and middle school special education room, not in an elementary school classroom; (3) the instructors were not schoolteachers; and (4) the children in the group were not all the same age as in the normal classroom setting. These circumstances simply did not support the theory that small children would perceive endorsement in that case.

to fund the student publication, because it addressed issues from a religious perspective constituted viewpoint discrimination and transgressed the Free Speech Clause. Besides, to obey the Establishment Clause, it was not necessary for the university to deny eligibility to student publications because of their religious viewpoint. Rosenberger reaffirmed that "[i]t does not violate the Establishment Clause for a public university to grant access to its facilities on a religion-neutral basis to a wide spectrum of student groups, including groups which use meeting rooms for sectarian activities, accompanied by some devotional exercises." As the Court noted, "[t]his is so even where the upkeep, maintenance, and repair of the facilities attributed to those uses is paid from a student activities fund to which students are required to contribute." And "[t]here is no difference in logic or principle, and no difference of constitutional significance, between a school's using its funds to operate a facility to which students have access and a school's paying a third-party contractor to operate the facility on its behalf." Consequently, since printing is "a routine, secular, and recurring attribute of student life," a state university may authorize payments from its student activities fund to outside contractors for the printing costs of a variety of student publications, including publications that address issues from a religious perspective. In such a case, any benefit to religion is incidental to the government's provision of secular services for secular purposes on a religion-neutral basis. Were the contrary view to become law, the university could only avoid a constitutional violation by scrutinizing the content of student speech, lest it contain too great a religious message. Such censorship "would be far more inconsistent with the Establishment Clause's dictates than would governmental provision of secular printing services on a religion-blind basis."[328]

g. Permissible Forms of "Ceremonial Deism" (Legislative Prayers—National Motto—Pledge of Allegiance)

[H132] In Marsh, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Nebraska state legislature's practice of opening each of its sessions with a prayer offered by a chaplain paid out of public funds. In doing so, the Court relied primarily on the fact that the First Congress had authorized the appointment of paid chaplains for its own proceedings at the same time that it had produced the Bill of Rights, and that the practice of opening sessions of Congress with prayer had continued without interruption for almost 200 years. Hence, the practice of opening legislative sessions with prayer had become part of the fabric of the American society. In addition, the particular chaplain had removed all references to Christ, and there was no indication that the prayer opportunity had been exploited to proselytize or advance any one, or to disparage any other, faith or belief. The Court also rejected the suggestion that choosing a clergyman of one denomination advanced the beliefs of a particular church. Absent proof that the chaplain's reappointment stemmed from an impermissible motive, his long tenure did not, in itself, conflict with the Establishment Clause. The Court concluded that "to invoke Divine guidance" on a public body entrusted with making the laws was not, in those circumstances, an establishment of religion or a step toward establishment; it was simply "a tolerable acknowledgment of beliefs widely held among the American people."[329]

---

[328] Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 830–31, 842–45 (1995).

[329] Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 787–95, n.14 (1983). Justice Brennan emphasized, [H133] The Court has considered in dicta the national motto ("In God We Trust") and the Pledge of Allegiance (with the phrase "under God," added in 1954), characterizing them as consistent with the proposition that government may not communicate an endorsement of religious belief. In Lynch, four members of the Court found that such practices as the designation of "In God We Trust" as the national motto, or the references to God contained in the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag, can best be understood as a form a "ceremonial deism," protected from Establishment Clause scrutiny chiefly because they have "lost through rote repetition any significant religious content. . . . [In addition,] these references are uniquely suited to serve such wholly secular purposes as solemnizing public occasions, or inspiring commitment to meet some national challenge in a manner that simply could not be fully served if government were limited to purely nonreligious phrases. . . . [T]hat necessity, coupled with their long history, gives those practices an essentially secular meaning."[330] Moreover, in the same case, Justice O'Connor noted that such governmental "acknowledgments" of religion, as legislative prayers of the type approved in Marsh, printing of "In God We Trust" on coins, and opening court sessions with "God save the United States and this honorable court," serve "the legitimate secular purposes of solemnizing public occasions, expressing confidence in the future, and encouraging the recognition of what is worthy of appreciation in society. For that reason, and because of their history and ubiquity, those practices are not understood as conveying government approval of particular religious beliefs."[331]

h. Delegation of Governmental Authority

[H134] In Grendel's Den, the Court struck down a Massachusetts statute granting religious bodies veto power over applications for liquor licenses. Under the statute, the governing body of any church, synagogue, or school located within 500 feet of an applicant's premises could, simply by submitting written objection, prevent the Alcohol Beverage Control Commission from issuing a license. In spite of the state's valid interest in protecting churches, schools, and like institutions from "the hurly-burly" associated with liquor outlets, the Court found that, in two respects, the statute violated the very neutrality the Establishment Clause requires. The Act brought about "a fusion of governmental and religious functions," by delegating important, discretionary governmental powers to religious bodies, thus impermissibly entangling government and religion. And it lacked "any effective means of guaranteeing that the delegated power would be used exclusively for secular, neutral, and nonideological purposes." This, along with the "significant symbolic benefit to religion" associated with "the mere appearance of a joint in his dissent, that "Prayer is religion in act. . . . Praying means to take hold of a word, the end, so to speak, of a line that leads to God." Id. at 811.

---

330 Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 716–17 (1984), (dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan, in which Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens joined).

331 Id. at 692–93 (concurring opinion of Justice O'Connor). See also Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 31 (2004), where three members of the Court (Rehnquist, C.J., O'Connor, and Thomas, JJ.) in their concurring opinion, held that the phrase "under God" in the Pledge is not a prayer, nor an endorsement of any religion, but a simple recognition of the fact that from the time of the nation's earliest history, the people and the country's institutions have reflected the traditional concept that the nation was founded on a fundamental belief in God. In that case, the majority did not reach the foregoing constitutional issue.

exercise of legislative authority by Church and State," led the Court to conclude that the statute had a primary and principal effect of advancing religion.[332]

[H135] Comparable constitutional problems inhered in the statute at issue in Kiryas Joel. In that case, a special state statute carved out a separate school district, following village lines, to serve the distinctive population of the Village of Kiryas Joel, which was a religious enclave of Satmar Hasidim, practitioners of a strict form of Judaism. Since the district's creation ran uniquely counter to state practice, following the lines of a religious community where the customary and neutral principles would not have dictated the same result, a four-member plurality treated this district "as the reflection of a religious criterion for identifying the recipients of civil authority." Hence, this unusual law was "tantamount to a forbidden allocation of political power on a religious criterion."[333]

i. Exemption from Military Service

[H136] Gillette rejected an Establishment Clause attack upon Section 6(j) of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, which afforded "conscientious objector" status to any person who, "by reason of religious training and belief," was "conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." The statute, on its face, simply did not discriminate on the basis of religious affiliation or religious belief, apart, of course, from beliefs concerning war. Section 6(j) served "a number of valid purposes having nothing to do with a design to foster or favor any sect, religion, or cluster of religions. There [we]re considerations of a pragmatic nature, such as the hopelessness of converting a sincere conscientious objector into an effective fighting man, but the section also reflect[ed] as well the view that, 'in the forum of conscience, duty to a moral power higher than the State has should be maintained.' . . . These affirmative purposes are neutral in the sense of the Establishment Clause. . . . The relevant individual belief [wa]s simply objection to all war, not adherence to any extraneous theological viewpoint. And while the objection [should] have roots in conscience and personality that were 'religious' in nature, this requirement ha[d] never been construed to elevate conventional piety or religiosity of any kind above the imperatives of a personal faith."[334] Furthermore, the Court held that valid neutral reasons existed for limiting the exemption to objectors to all war, and that the section, therefore, could not be said "to reflect a religious preference." Apart from the government's need for manpower, the Court noted the importance of "fair, evenhanded, and uniform decisionmaking" in this context. This interest would be jeopardized by expansion of Section 6(j) to include conscientious objection to a particular war; "[w]hile the danger of erratic decisionmaking exists in any system of conscription that takes individual differences into account, no doubt the dangers would be [332] Larkin v. Grendel's Den, Inc., 459 U.S. 116, 125–27 (1982).

---

[333] Bd. of Educ. of Kiryas Joel Vill. Sch. Dist. v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687, 690, 702 (1994). Justice Kennedy agreed that the Kiryas Joel Village School District violated the Establishment Clause, finding that the school district's vice was that New York had created it by drawing political boundaries on the basis of religion. See id. at 728–30. The Court also noted that there were several alternatives for providing bilingual and bicultural special education to Satmar children that would not implicate the Establishment Clause; for example, the state could offer an educationally appropriate program at one of its public schools or at a neutral site near one of the village's parochial schools. See id. at 705–08.

[334] Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 452–54 (1971).

enhanced if a conscientious objection of indeterminate scope were honored in theory." The Court concluded that there were neutral, secular reasons for the lines Congress had drawn, and, therefore, the Establishment Clause was not violated.[335]

j. Labor Legislation[336]

[H137] In McGowan, the Court upheld mandatory Sunday closing laws, finding that the statutes' purpose and primary effect was not to aid religion but "to set aside one day apart from all others as a day of rest, repose, recreation and tranquility." The Court stressed that obviously "a State is empowered to determine that a 'rest one day in seven' statute would not accomplish this purpose; that it would not provide for a general cessation of activity, a special atmosphere of tranquility, a day which all members of the family or friends and relatives might spend together." Besides, "the problems involved in enforcing such a provision would be exceedingly more difficult than those in enforcing a 'common day of rest' provision." Moreover, as the Court noted, "[p]eople of all religions and people with no religion regard Sunday as a time for family activity, for visiting friends and relatives, for late sleeping, for passive and active entertainments, for dining out, and the like. . . . Sunday is a day apart from all others. The cause is irrelevant; the fact exists." Hence, "[I]t would seem unrealistic for enforcement purposes and perhaps detrimental to the general welfare to require a State to choose a common day of rest other than that which most persons would select of their own accord." For these reasons, the Court held that the challenged statutes were not laws respecting an establishment of religion.[337]

[H138] In Caldor, the Court struck down a Connecticut statute prohibiting an employer from requiring an employee to work on a day designated by the employee as his Sabbath. "In essence, the Connecticut statute impose[d] on employers and employees an absolute duty to conform their business practices to the particular religious practices of an employee by enforcing observance of the Sabbath the employee unilaterally designated. The State thus command[ed] that Sabbath religious concerns automatically control over all secular interests at the workplace; the statute [took] no account of the convenience or interests of the employer or those of other employees who [did] not observe a Sabbath. . . . There [wa]s no exception under the statute for special circumstances, such as the Friday Sabbath observer employed in an occupation with a Monday through Friday schedule, a school teacher, for example; the statute provide[d] for no special consideration if a high percentage of an employer's workforce assert[ed] rights to the same Sabbath. Moreover, there was no exception when honoring the dictates of Sabbath observers would cause the employer substantial economic burdens or when the employer's compliance would require the imposition of significant burdens on other employees required to work in place of the Sabbath observers. Finally, the statute

---

335 Id. at 454–60. The Draft Act of 1917 exempted ministers of religion and theological students, under certain conditions, and relieved from strictly military service members of certain religious sects whose tenets denied the moral right to engage in war. These provisions were upheld in the Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366, 389–90 (1918), at an early stage in the development of First Amendment doctrine, against an Establishment Clause attack. The Court reached its conclusion essentially without supporting reasoning.

336 See also paras. H60–H62.

337 McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 450–52 (1961).

allow[ed] for no consideration as to whether the employer . . . made reasonable accommodation proposals." Hence, in granting "unyielding weighting in favor of Sabbath observers over all other interests," the statute had a "primary effect that impermissibly advance[d] a particular religious practice."[338]

[H139] Amos concerned a legislative exemption of religious organizations from a statutory prohibition of religious discrimination in employment. There, the Court held that application of the exemption to the secular non-profit activities of religious institutions did not violate the Establishment Clause. First, this exemption served the legitimate purpose of "alleviating significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions." The Court assumed, for the sake of argument, that an exemption only with respect to employment involving religious activities would be adequate in the sense that the Free Exercise Clause required no more. Nonetheless, it would be "a significant burden on a religious organization to require it, on pain of substantial liability, to predict which of its activities a secular court [would] consider religious." Fear of potential liability might affect the way an organization would carry out what it would understand to be its religious mission. Second, by the challenged statute, the government did not advance religion "through its own activities and influence;" it simply "allow[ed] churches to advance religion, which is their very purpose." Finally, the statute did not impermissibly entangle church and state; rather, it effectuated "a more complete separation of the two."[339]

k. Church Property Disputes[340]

[H140] There can be no doubt "about the general authority of civil courts to resolve church property questions. The State has an obvious and legitimate interest in the peaceful resolution of property disputes, and in providing a civil forum where the ownership of church property can be determined conclusively. . . . It is also clear, however, that 'the First Amendment prohibits civil courts from resolving church property disputes on the basis of religious doctrine and practice.' . . . As a corollary to this commandment, the Amendment requires that civil courts defer to the resolution of issues of religious doctrine or polity by the highest court of a hierarchical church organization."[341]

[H141] Presbyterian Church in U.S. (PCUS) was a property dispute between the PCUS and two local Georgia churches that had withdrawn from the PCUS. The Georgia supreme court resolved the controversy by applying a theory of implied trust, whereby the property of a local church affiliated with a hierarchical church organization was deemed to be held in trust for the general church, provided the general church had not "substantially abandoned" the tenets of faith and practice as they existed at the time of affiliation. The Court reversed, holding that Georgia would have to find some other [338] Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 472 U.S. 703, 709–10 (1985).

---

[339] Corp. of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 336–39 (1987). The Court also found that the exemption did not violate the Equal Protection Clause, because it was rationally related to the legitimate purpose of alleviating significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions.

[340] See also para. H36.

[341] Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 602 (1979).

way of resolving church property disputes that did not draw the state courts into religious controversies.[342]

[H142] "[T]he First Amendment does not dictate that a State must follow a particular method of resolving church property disputes. . . . [However,] there are neutral principles of law, developed for use in all property disputes, which can be applied without 'establishing' churches to which property is awarded. . . . The primary advantages of the 'neutral principles' approach are that it is completely secular in operation, and yet flexible enough to accommodate all forms of religious organization and polity. The method relies exclusively on objective, well-established concepts of trust and property law familiar to lawyers and judges. It thereby promises to free civil courts completely from entanglement in questions of religious doctrine, polity, and practice. Furthermore, the neutral principles analysis shares the peculiar genius of private law systems in general—flexibility in ordering private rights and obligations to reflect the intentions of the parties. Through appropriate reversionary clauses and trust provisions, religious societies can specify what is to happen to church property in the event of a particular contingency, or what religious body will determine the ownership in the event of a schism or doctrinal controversy. In this manner, a religious organization can ensure that a dispute over the ownership of church property will be resolved in accord with the desires of the members. This is not to say that the application of the neutral principles approach is wholly free of difficulty. The neutral principles method . . . [may] requir[e] a civil court to examine certain religious documents, such as a church constitution, for language of trust in favor of the general church. In undertaking such an examination, a civil court must take special care to scrutinize the document in purely secular terms, and not to rely on religious precepts in determining whether the document indicates that the parties have intended to create a trust. In addition, there may be cases where the deed, the corporate charter, or the constitution of the general church incorporates religious concepts in the provisions relating to the ownership of property. If, in such a case, the interpretation of the instruments of ownership would require the civil court to resolve a religious controversy, then the court must defer to the resolution of the doctrinal issue by the authoritative ecclesiastical body. . . . On balance, however, the promise of nonentanglement and neutrality inherent in the neutral principles approach more than compensates for what will be occasional problems in application." Therefore, a state is constitutionally entitled to adopt neutral principles of law as a means of adjudicating a church property dispute.[343]

---

[342] Presbyterian Church in United States v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem'l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 445–52 (1969).

[343] Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 599, 602–04 (1979).

CHAPTER 9

FREEDOMS OF SPEECH, PRESS, ASSEMBLY, AND ASSOCIATION

PART I: FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND OF THE PRESS

A. INTRODUCTION

[I1] The First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." These freedoms secured by the First Amendment against abridgment by the United States are similarly secured to all persons by the Fourteenth Amendment against abridgment by a state.[1]

[I2] "As a general principle, the First Amendment bars the government from dictating what [the people] see or read or speak or hear."[2] The constitutional guarantee of free speech "'serves significant societal interests' wholly apart from the speaker's interest in self-expression."[3] "By protecting those who wish to enter the marketplace of ideas from government attack, the First Amendment protects the public's interest in receiving information."[4] This constitutional provision embodies a "profound national commitment to the free exchange of ideas,"[5] to the principle that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open."[6] "'The very purpose of the First Amendment is to foreclose public authority from assuming a guardianship of the public mind through regulating speech and the press. . . . In this field, every person must be his own watchman for truth, because the forefathers did not trust any government to separate the true from the false for [the people.]'"[7] Indeed, "[u]nder the First Amendment, there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, one must depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries, but on the competition of other ideas."[8] Hence, the protection of the First Amendment

---

1 See, e.g., Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 160 (1939). In addition, the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment fully applies to Puerto Rico. See Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 314 (1922); El Vocero de Puerto Rico v. Puerto Rico, 508 U.S. 147, 149, n.1 (1993).

2 Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 245 (2002).

3 Pac. Gas & Electric Co. v. Pub. Util. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 8 (1986), quoting First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 776 (1978).

4 Pac. Gas & Electric Co. v. Pub. Util. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 8 (1986), citing Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 (1940).

5 Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 686 (1989).

6 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

7 Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414, 419–20 (1988), quoting Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 545 (1945) (Jackson, J., concurring).

8 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 339–40 (1974).

is not dependent on "the truth, popularity, or social utility of the ideas and beliefs which are offered."[9] However, "there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact."[10]

[I3] A wide range of expressive activities are within the protections of the First Amendment. This Amendment covers not only "pure speech," but also "expressive conduct." For example, a march of protest against racial segregation, if peaceful and orderly, falls well within the sphere of conduct protected by the First Amendment.[11] "[T]he Constitution looks beyond written or spoken words as medi[a] of expression."[12] Noting that "[s]ymbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas,"[13] the Court has recognized that the First Amendment shields such acts as wearing an armband to protest a war[14] or displaying a red flag as a sign of peaceful and orderly opposition to government by legal means.[15] "Entertainment, as well as political and ideological speech, is protected; motion pictures, programs broadcast by radio and television, and live entertainment, such as musical and dramatic works, fall within the First Amendment guarantee."[16] "[S]peech does not lose its First Amendment protection because money is spent to project it, as in a paid advertisement of one form or another."[17] "Speech likewise is protected even though it is carried in a form that is 'sold' for profit,"[18] and "even though it may involve a solicitation to purchase or otherwise pay or contribute money."[19] Indeed, the First Amendment's safeguards are not inapplicable to business or economic activity[20] and to commercial speech.[21]

[I4] "[A] private speaker does not forfeit constitutional protection simply by combining multifarious voices, or by failing to edit their themes to isolate an exact message as the exclusive subject matter of the speech. Nor, . . . does First Amendment protection require a speaker to generate, as an original matter, each item featured in the com-

---

9 NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 445 (1963).

10 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 340 (1974).

11 Gregory v. Chicago, 394 U.S. 111, 112 (1969).

12 Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 569 (1995).

13 W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 632 (1943).

14 Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 505–506 (1969).

15 Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369 (1931).

16 Schad v. Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61, 65 (1981). See also Kaplan v. California, 413 U.S. 115, 119–20 (1973), with regard to artistic expression ("pictures, films, paintings, drawings, and engravings . . . have First Amendment protection").

17 Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 761 (1976), citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 35–59 (1976); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 266 (1964).

18 Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 761 (1976), citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 150 (1959) (books); Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 501 (1952) (motion pictures); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 111 (1943) (religious literature).

19 Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 761 (1976), citing Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 306–07 (1940); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 266 (1964).

20 Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 531 (1945).

21 Virginia Bd. Of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 762–63 (1976) (the fact that the advertiser's interest in a commercial advertisement is purely economic does not disqualify him from protection under the First and Fourteenth Amendments).

munication. Cable operators, for example, are engaged in protected speech activities even when they only select programming originally produced by others. . . . For that matter, the presentation of an edited compilation of speech generated by other persons is a staple of most newspapers' opinion pages, which, of course, fall squarely within the core of First Amendment security, . . . as does even the simple selection of a paid noncommercial advertisement for inclusion in a daily paper. . . . The selection of contingents to make a parade is entitled to similar protection."[22]

[I5] "The identity of the speaker is not decisive in determining whether speech is protected. Corporations and other associations, like individuals, contribute to the 'discussion, debate, and the dissemination of information and ideas' that the First Amendment seeks to foster."[23] Similarly, First Amendment rights are available to teachers and students,[24] public employees,[25] and prisoners.[26] Freedom of speech and of press is also accorded aliens residing in the United States.[27]

[I6] "[A]s a general matter, 'the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content.'"[28] "All ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance—unorthodox ideas, controversial ideas, even ideas hateful to the prevailing climate of opinion—have the full protection of the Constitution, unless excludable because they encroach upon the limited area of more important interests."[29] Indeed, certain "utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."[30] These categories of speech include "defamation, incitement to imminent lawless action, 'fighting words,' obscenity, and pornography produced with real children."[31]

[I7] Even in the area of protected expression, the Court has recognized that "not all speech is of equal First Amendment importance."[32] It is speech on matters of public concern that is at the heart of the First Amendment's protection.[33] "Public concern is something that is a subject of legitimate news interest—that is, a subject of general interest and of value and concern to the public at the time of publication."[34] This special concern for speech on public issues is no mystery. The First Amendment was "fashioned

---

[22] Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557, 569–70 (1995).

[23] Pac. Gas & Electric Co. v. Pub. Util. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 8 (1986), quoting First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 783 (1978).

[24] See paras. I211 et seq.

[25] See paras. I198 et seq.

[26] See paras. I217 et seq.

[27] Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 148 (1945). See also paras. I236 et seq., with respect to anonymous speech.

[28] Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 65 (1983), quoting Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972).

[29] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957).

[30] Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 (1942).

[31] Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 246 (2002).

[32] Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 758 (1985).

[33] First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 776 (1978), citing Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 101 (1940).

[34] City of San Diego v. Roe, 543 U.S. 77, 83–84 (2004) (per curiam).

to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people."[35] "[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government."[36] Accordingly, the Court has emphasized that "speech on public issues occupies 'the highest rung of the hierarchy of First Amendment values' and is entitled to special protection."[37] In contrast, "speech on matters of purely private concern is of less First Amendment concern."[38] Another prominent example of reduced protection concerns commercial speech. Such speech occupies a "subordinate position in the scale of First Amendment values"[39] and is "more easily verifiable and less likely to be deterred by proper regulation."[40] Accordingly, "it may be regulated in ways that might be impermissible in the realm of noncommercial expression."[41]

[I8] Generally applicable statutes that purport to regulate non-speech have been struck down if they unduly penalize speech, political or otherwise.[42] The Court has held that a criminal or civil regulation of general application having some incidental effect on First Amendment activities is subject to First Amendment scrutiny "only where it was conduct with a significant expressive element that drew the legal remedy in the first place, as in [United States v.] O'Brien, [that involved symbolic draft card burning,] or where a statute based on a nonexpressive activity has the inevitable effect of singling out those engaged in expressive activity, as in Minneapolis Star" [striking down a tax imposed on the sale of large quantities of newsprint and ink because the tax had the effect of singling out newspapers to shoulder its burden].[43] For example, "[t]he First Amendment

---

[35] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957).

[36] Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74–75 (1964).

[37] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 145 (1983), quoting NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 913 (1982).

[38] Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 759 (1985), citing Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 146–47 (1983). Whether speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the expression's "content, form, and context, as revealed by the whole record." See Connick, supra, at 147–48. Private remarks may also touch on matters of public concern. See Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U. S. 378 (1987), where one co-worker commented to another co-worker on an item of political news (attempted murder of the President of the United States).

[39] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978).

[40] Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 758, n.5 (1985), citing Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 771–72 (1976).

[41] Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 758, n.5 (1985), citing Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978). There are numerous examples of communications that are regulated without offending the First Amendment, such as the exchange of information about securities, corporate proxy statements, the exchange of price and production information among competitors, and employers' threats of retaliation for the labor activities of employees. See Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978).

[42] See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946) (trespass in order to distribute religious literature); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940) (breach of peace prosecution based upon distribution of religious literature). Nevertheless, "it has never been deemed an abridgment of freedom of speech or press to make a course of conduct illegal merely because the conduct was in part initiated, evidenced, or carried out by means of language, either spoken, written, or printed." See Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 502 (1949).

[43] See Arcara v. Cloud Books, Inc., 478 U.S. 697, 706–07 (1986). Applying that standard, the Court held that prostitution and lewdness, the criminal conduct at issue in Arcara, involved has never been construed to require heightened scrutiny of any financial burden that has the incidental effect of constraining the size of a firm's advertising budget. The fact that an economic regulation may indirectly lead to a reduction in a handler's individual advertising budget does not itself amount to a restriction on speech."[44]

[I9] "[T]he government need not exempt speech from a generally applicable tax."[45] Moreover, "a tax scheme does not become suspect simply because it exempts only some speech."[46] Legislatures have especially broad latitude in creating classifications and distinctions in tax statutes and "the presumption of constitutionality of such laws can be overcome only by a demonstration that a classification is a hostile and oppressive discrimination against particular persons and classes."[47] Hence, "[d]ifferential taxation of First Amendment speakers is constitutionally suspect when it threatens to suppress the expression of particular ideas or viewpoints. Absent a compelling justification, the government may not exercise its taxing power to single out the press. . . . The press plays a unique role as a check on government abuse, and a tax limited to the press raises concerns about censorship of critical information and opinion. A tax is also suspect if it targets a small group of speakers. . . . Again, the fear is censorship of particular ideas or viewpoints. Finally, for reasons that are obvious, a tax will trigger heightened scrutiny under the First Amendment if it discriminates on the basis of the content of taxpayer speech."[48]

[I10] The history of the Court's First Amendment jurisprudence is one of continual development, as the constitutional guarantee of the freedom of speech, or of the press, has been applied to new circumstances requiring different adaptations of prior principles and precedents. "The essence of that protection is that Congress may not regulate speech except in cases of compelling need and with the exercise of a degree of care that [the Court has] not elsewhere required. . . . Over the years, th[e] Court has restated and refined these basic First Amendment principles, adopting them more particularly to the balance of competing interests and the special circumstances of each field of application. . . . [Thus, the] Court, in different contexts, has consistently held that the Government may directly regulate speech to address grave problems, where its regulations are appropriately tailored to resolve those problems without imposing an unnecessarily great restriction on speech."[49] Both the content and the context of speech are critical elements of neither situation, and thus concluded that the First Amendment was not implicated by the enforcement of a general health regulation resulting in the closure of an adult bookstore. Id. at 707.

---

[44] Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc., 521 U.S. 457, 470 (1997).

The power to prohibit or to regulate particular conduct (e.g., gambling) does not necessarily include the power to prohibit or regulate speech about that conduct (e.g., advertisements of lawful casino gambling). See Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 193 (1999).

[45] Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 451 (1991), citing Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959).

[46] Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 451 (1991), citing Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 547 (1983).

[47] Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 547 (1983).

[48] Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 447 (1991).

[49] See Denver Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 518 U.S. 727, 740–41 (1996) (plurality opinion) (emphasis added).

First Amendment analysis.[50] Additionally, each mode of expression has its own unique characteristics, and each "must be assessed for First Amendment purposes by standards suited to it;"[51] "[t]he economics and the technology of each medium affect both the burden of a speech restriction and the Government's interest in maintaining it."[52]

[I11] When the government restricts speech, the government bears the burden of proving the constitutionality of its actions.[53] Content-based regulations and prior restraints are presumptively invalid, and the government bears the burden to rebut that presumption.[54] "Deference to a legislative finding cannot limit judicial inquiry when

---

"A rule governing speech, even speech entitled to full constitutional protection, need not use the words 'clear and present danger' in order to pass constitutional muster." See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1036 (1991). The Court has stated that the "clear and present danger" test, devised by Justice Holmes in Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 49–51 (1919), with respect to convictions for subversive speech, "was never intended to express a technical legal doctrine or to convey a formula for adjudicating cases. This test, properly applied, requires a court to make its own inquiry into the imminence and magnitude of the danger said to flow from the particular utterance, and then to balance the character of the evil, as well as its likelihood, against the need for free and unfettered expression. The possibility that other measures will serve the State's interests should also be weighed." See Landmark Communications Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829, 843 (1978).

In borderline cases, the scales must be tipped in favor of protecting free speech. Cf. Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 347 (1946); Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767, 776 (1986). See also United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, 529 U.S. 803, 819 (2000) ("a tie goes to free expression").

[50] See Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 744 (1978) (plurality opinion). "Illicit legislative intent is not a 'sine qua non' of a violation of the First Amendment." See Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 592 (1983).

[51] Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 557 (1975).

[52] Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 595 (2002) (Kennedy, J., concurring).

[53] See, e.g., Illinois ex rel. Madigan v. Telemarketing Assocs., Inc., 538 U.S. 600, 620, n.9 (2003) ("[th]e Court has long cautioned that, to avoid chilling protected speech, the Government must bear the burden of proving that the speech it seeks to prohibit is unprotected"), citing Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 525–26 (1958) and Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58 (1965); Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 183 (1999) ("the Government bears the burden of identifying a substantial interest and justifying the challenged restriction"); Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761, 770–71 (1993) ("a governmental body seeking to sustain a restriction on commercial speech must demonstrate that the harms it recites are real and that its restriction will in fact alleviate them to a material degree"); Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 879 (1997) ("the breadth of this content-based restriction of speech imposes an especially heavy burden on the Government to explain why a less restrictive provision would not be as effective"); United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 816 (2000) ("when a plausible, less restrictive alternative is offered to a content-based speech restriction, it is the Government's obligation to prove that the alternative will be ineffective to achieve its goals"); Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 509 (1969) ("in order for the State . . . to justify prohibition of a particular expression of opinion, it must be able to show that its action was caused by something more than a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint").

[54] See United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 817 (2000) (content-based restrictions); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 714 (1971) (prior restraints).

First Amendment rights are at stake."[55] Further, "in cases raising First Amendment issues, an appellate court has an obligation to 'make an independent examination of the whole record,' in order to make sure that 'the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression.'"[56]

B. PRIOR RESTRAINTS

1. In General

[I12] "The presumption against prior restraints is heavier—and the degree of protection broader—than that against limits on expression imposed by criminal penalties. Behind the distinction is a theory deeply etched in the American law: a free society prefers to punish the few who abuse rights of speech after they break the law than to throttle them and all others beforehand. It is always difficult to know in advance what an individual will say, and the line between legitimate and illegitimate speech is often so finely drawn that the risks of freewheeling censorship are formidable."[57] "A prior restraint . . . has an immediate and irreversible sanction. If it can be said that a threat of criminal or civil sanctions after publication 'chills' speech, prior restraint 'freezes' it, at least for the time."[58] Thus, it has been clearly established that a prior restraint on expression comes to the Court with "a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity."[59] The government carries a heavy burden of showing justification for the imposition of such a restraint.[60] This most extraordinary measure is permissible "only where the gravity of the evil sought to be prevented by the restriction, discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger."[61] And even where this presumption might otherwise be overcome—for example when a publication would present a serious threat to national security[62]—the Court has insisted upon careful procedural provisions, designed to assure the fullest presentation and consideration of the matter which the circumstances permit. A non-criminal process of prior restraints upon expression "avoids constitutional infirmity only if it takes place under procedural safeguards designed to obviate the dangers of a censorship system."[63]

[I13] The term prior restraint is used "to describe administrative and judicial orders forbidding certain communications when issued in advance of the time that such com-

---

55 Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829, 843 (1978).

56 Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc. 466 U.S. 485, 499 (1984), quoting New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 284–86 (1964).

57 Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 558–59 (1975).

58 Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 559 (1976).

59 See, e.g., Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963).

60 Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 419 (1971).

61 Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 562 (1976).

62 See Near v. Minnesota, Inc., 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931). In New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971) (per curiam), the Court specifically addressed the scope of the "military security" exception alluded to in Near. There, the government sought to enjoin the publication of excerpts from a massive, classified study of the country's involvement in the Vietnam conflict, going back to the end of the Second World War. The dispositive opinion of the Court simply concluded that the government had not met its heavy burden of showing justification for the prior restraint. Each of the six concurring Justices and the three dissenting Justices expressed his views separately.

63 Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58 (1965).

munications are to occur."[64] A state court's decision, which, pursuant to a criminal statute, finds that certain booklets displayed for sale are obscene and enjoins their further distribution and orders their destruction does not amount to a prior restraint, since, in this situation, the law moves after publication and a provision for the seizure and destruction of the instruments of ascertained wrongdoing expresses resort to a legal remedy sanctioned by the long history of Anglo-American law.[65] Likewise, if an individual is convicted under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), forfeiture of his "adult entertainment" businesses, pursuant to this Act, is a form of criminal monetary punishment and not a prior restraint. Indeed, a RICO forfeiture order does not forbid the convicted person from engaging in any expressive activities in the future, nor does it require him to obtain prior approval for any expressive activities; it only deprives him of specific assets that were found to be related to his previous racketeering violations.[66] Arcara sustained a court order, issued under a general nuisance statute, that closed down an adult bookstore that was being used as a place of prostitution and lewdness. In rejecting out-of-hand a claim that the closure order amounted to an improper prior restraint on speech, the Court pointed out that the closure order differed from a prior restraint in two significant respects. "First, the order would impose no restraint at all on the dissemination of particular materials, since respondents were free to carry on their bookselling business at another location, even if such locations were difficult to find. Second, the closure order sought would not be imposed on the basis of an advance determination that the distribution of particular materials was prohibited—indeed, the imposition of the closure order had nothing to do with any expressive conduct at all."[67]

[I14] "A licensing system need not effect total suppression in order to create a prior restraint."[68] In Interstate Circuit, it was observed that the evils attendant on prior restraint "are not rendered less objectionable because the regulation of expression is one of classification, rather than direct suppression."[69] In that case, the Court held that a prior restraint was created by a system whereby an administrative board in Texas classified films as "suitable for young persons" or "not suitable for young persons." The "not suitable" films were not suppressed, but exhibitors were required to have special licenses and to advertise their classification in order to show them. Similarly, in Southeastern Promotions, a municipal board classified a rock musical as unfit for showing in municipal facilities. The Court found that denying use of the municipal facility constituted a prior restraint, notwithstanding that the board's decision might not have had the effect of total suppression of the musical in the community.[70]

---

64 Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544, 550 (1993).

65 Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436, 442–444 (1957).

66 Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544, 550–51 (1993). As the Court noted, "[t]he RICO forfeiture statute calls for the forfeiture of assets because of the financial role they play in the operation of the racketeering enterprise. The statute is oblivious to the expressive or non-expressive nature of the assets forfeited; books, sports cars, narcotics, and cash are all forfeitable alike under RICO. Indeed, a contrary scheme would be disastrous from a policy standpoint, enabling racketeers to evade forfeiture by investing the proceeds of their crimes in businesses engaging in expressive activity." Id. at 551–52.

67 Arcara v. Cloud Books, Inc., 478 U.S. 697, 705–06, n.2 (1986).

68 Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 556, n.8 (1975).

69 Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 688 (1968).

70 Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 555–56 (1975).

[I15] In Bantam Books, the Court decided that a system of "informal censorship" working by exhortation and advice sufficiently inhibited expression to constitute a prior restraint and warrant injunctive relief. There, the Court held unconstitutional a system in which a commission was charged with reviewing material "manifestly tending to the corruption of the youth." "[T]hough the [c]ommission [wa]s limited to informal sanctions—the threat of invoking legal sanctions and other means of coercion, persuasion, and intimidation—the record amply demonstrate[d] that the Commission deliberately set about to achieve the suppression of publications deemed 'objectionable,' and succeeded in its aim."[71]

[I16] "[S]eizing films to destroy them or to block their distribution or exhibition is a very different matter from seizing a single copy of a film for the bona fide purpose of preserving it as evidence in a criminal proceeding, particularly where . . . there is no showing or pretrial claim that the seizure of the copy prevented continuing exhibition of the film."[72] In Heller, state authorities seized a copy of a film, temporarily, in order to preserve it as evidence. The Court held that the film had not been subjected to any form of "final restraint," in the sense of being enjoined from exhibition or threatened with destruction.[73]

[I17] Ward v. Rock Against Racism involved a city's control over sound amplification at musical concerts performed in a city park. The sound amplification regulation granted no authority to forbid speech, but it merely permitted the city to regulate volume to the extent necessary to avoid excessive noise. It was true that "the city's sound technician theoretically possesse[d] the power to shut off the volume for any particular performer, but that hardly distinguishe[d] this regulatory scheme from any other; government will always possess the raw power to suppress speech through force, and indeed it [wa]s in part to avoid the necessity of exercising its power to 'pull the plug' on the volume that the city [had] adopted the sound amplification guideline. The relevant question was whether the challenged regulation authorize[d] suppression of speech in advance of its expression, and the challenged regulation [did] not." Under these considerations, the Court rejected the suggestion that the regulation at issue constituted a prior restraint.[74]

2. Licensing

[I18] "Generally, speakers need not obtain a license to speak."[75] In Lovell, the Court invalidated an ordinance that "prohibited the distribution of literature of any kind at any time, at any place, and in any manner without a permit from the city manager, thus striking at the very foundation of the freedom of the press by subjecting it to license and censorship."[76] Murdock struck down a flat license tax imposed on religious colpor-

---

71 Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 67 (1963).

72 Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483, 492 (1973).

73 Id. at 490.

74 Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 795, n.5 (1989).

75 Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n. of Blind of N.C., Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 802 (1988).

76 See Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 577 (1941), discussing Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 450–52 (1938). In the latter case, the Court noted, inter alia, that the ordinance was "not limited to ways which might be regarded as inconsistent with the maintenance of public order or as involving disorderly conduct, the molestation of the inhabitants, or the misuse or littering of the streets." Id. at 451.

teurs as a condition to the pursuit of their activities.[77] And in Thomas v. Collins, the Court held that the First Amendment barred enforcement of a state statute requiring a permit before soliciting membership in any labor organization.[78] Nevertheless, the foregoing principle is not absolute. For example, Cox upheld a licensing requirement for parades through city streets, recognizing that the regulation, which was based on time, place, or manner criteria, served the municipality's legitimate interests in regulating traffic, securing public order, and insuring that simultaneous parades did not prevent all speakers from being heard.[79]

[I19] The Court's cases addressing prior restraints have identified two evils that will not be tolerated in licensing schemes. First, a licensing scheme that places "unbridled discretion in the hands of a government official or agency constitutes a prior restraint and may result in censorship."[80] There are two major First Amendment risks associated with unbridled licensing schemes that have not been given a narrow and precise scope by well-established practice or judicial construction: "self-censorship by speakers in order to avoid being denied a license to speak, and the difficulty of effectively detecting, reviewing, and correcting content-based censorship 'as applied' without standards by which to measure the licensor's action."[81] Second, "a prior restraint that fails to place limits on the time within which the decisionmaker must issue the license is impermissible. . . . The failure to confine the time within which the licensor must make a decision 'contains the same vice as a statute delegating excessive administrative discretion.' . . . Where the licensor has unlimited time within which to issue a license, the risk of arbitrary suppression is as great as the provision of unbridled discretion. A scheme that fails to set reasonable time limits on the decision maker creates the risk of indefinitely suppressing permissible speech."[82]

[I20] Lakewood was a facial challenge against a city ordinance, which vested in the mayor authority to grant or deny a newspaper's application for a newsrack permit, but

---

77 Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 113–16 (1943).

78 Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 540–541 (1945). Solicitation and speech were deemed to be so intertwined that a prior registration could not be required. The Court conceded that the collection of funds might be subject to reasonable regulation, but it concluded that such regulation should be done, and the restriction applied, in such a manner as not to intrude upon the rights of free speech and free assembly.

79 See Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574–76 (1941).

80 FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 225–26 (1990) (principal opinion), quoting City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publ'g Co., 486 U.S. 750, 757 (1988) (four-Justice majority opinion).

81 City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publ'g Co., 486 U.S. 750, 759 (1988) (four-Justice majority opinion). For example in Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948), the Court "held that an ordinance prohibiting the use of sound trucks without permission from the Chief of Police was unconstitutional because the licensing official was able to exercise unbridled discretion in his decision making, and therefore could, in a calculated manner, censor certain viewpoints." See City of Lakewood, supra, at 764, discussing Saia. Just seven months later, the Court held, in Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), that a city could absolutely ban the use of sound trucks. "The plurality distinguished Saia precisely on the ground that, there, the ordinance constituted censorship by allowing some to speak, but not others; in Kovacs, the statute barred a particular manner of speech for all" and, hence, did not afford the kind of potential for censorship condemned in Saia. See City of Lakewood, supra, at 764, discussing Kovacs.

82 FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 226–27 (1990) (principal opinion).

contained no explicit limit on the scope of the mayor's discretion. A four-Justice majority held that when a licensing statute vests unbridled discretion in a government official over whether to permit or deny expressive activity, one who is subject to the law may challenge it facially without first submitting to the licensing process; "a facial challenge lies whenever a licensing law gives a government official or agency substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech by suppressing disfavored speech or disliked speakers. This is not to say that the press or a speaker may challenge as censorship any law involving discretion to which it is subject. The law must have a close enough nexus to expression, or to conduct commonly associated with expression, to pose a real and substantial threat of the identified censorship risks."[83] "Laws of general application which are not aimed at conduct commonly associated with expression and do not permit licensing determinations to be made on the basis of ongoing expression or the words about to be spoken, carry with them little danger of censorship. For example, a law requiring building permits is rarely effective as a means of censorship. To be sure, on rare occasion, an opportunity for censorship will exist, such as when an unpopular newspaper seeks to build a new plant. But such laws provide too blunt a censorship instrument to warrant judicial intervention prior to an allegation of actual misuse. And if such charges are made, the general application of the statute to areas unrelated to expression will provide the courts a yardstick with which to measure the licensor's occasional speech-related decision."[84] The regulatory scheme at issue in Lakewood contained two features that, at least in combination, justified the allowance of a facial challenge. First, Lakewood's ordinance required annual permit applications. "When such a system is applied to speech, or to conduct commonly associated with speech, the licensor does not necessarily view the text of the words about to be spoken, but can measure their probable content or viewpoint by speech already uttered. . . . [A] multiple or periodic licensing requirement is sufficiently threatening to invite judicial concern. [Second, the challenged licensing system was] directed narrowly and specifically at expression or conduct commonly associated with expression: the circulation of newspapers. Such a framework creates an agency that might tend to favor censorship over speech. [W]ithout standards to bound the licensor, speakers denied a license [would] have no way of proving that the decision [wa]s unconstitutionally motivated, and, faced with that prospect, they [would] be pressured to conform their speech to the licensor's unreviewable preference. . . . The Constitution require[d] that the city establish neutral criteria to insure that the licensing decision is not based on the content or viewpoint of the speech being considered."[85] The ordinance's minimal requirement that the Mayor state his reasons for denying a permit could not provide the standards necessary to insure constitutional decisionmaking, nor would it, of necessity, provide a solid foundation for eventual judicial review, since the Mayor's statement could be made without any degree of specificity, nor were there any limits as to what reasons he might give.[86] In light of these considerations, the Court held those portions of the Lakewood ordinance giving the Mayor unfettered discretion to deny a permit application and unbounded authority to condition the permit on any additional terms he deemed "necessary and reasonable" to be unconstitutional.

---

[83] City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publ'g Co., 486 U.S. 750, 759 (1988).

[84] Id. at 761.

[85] Id. at 759–61.

[86] Id. at 771.

[I21] A licensing law that is unconstitutional on its face is as though it does not exist and, therefore, there can be no offense in violation of such a law.[87] A law subjecting the right of free expression in publicly owned places to the prior restraint of a license, without narrow, objective, and definite standards is unconstitutional, and "a person faced with such a law may ignore it" and exercise his First Amendment rights.[88] But where a licensing ordinance is valid on its face and prohibits certain conduct unless the person has a license, one who without a license engages in that conduct can be criminally prosecuted without being allowed to show that his application for a license was rejected in violation of the principles of the First Amendment, at least when there is appropriate remedial state procedure for the correction of the error.[89]

[I22] The power of government to regulate the professions is not lost whenever the practice of a profession entails speech. In Lowe, three members of the Court addressed the question whether any given legislation restrains speech, and, hence, must survive the level of scrutiny demanded by the First Amendment, or is merely a permissible regulation of a profession. They analyzed the issue as follows: "One who takes the affairs of a client personally in hand and purports to exercise judgment on behalf of the client in the light of the client's individual needs and circumstances is properly viewed as engaging in the practice of a profession. Just as offer and acceptance are communications incidental to the regulable transaction called a contract, the professional's speech is incidental to the conduct of the profession. If the government enacts generally applicable licensing provisions limiting the class of persons who may practice the profession, it cannot be said to have enacted a limitation on freedom of speech or the press subject to First Amendment scrutiny. Where the personal nexus between professional and client does not exist, and a speaker does not purport to be exercising judgment on behalf of any particular individual with whose circumstances he is directly acquainted, government regulation ceases to function as legitimate regulation of professional practice with only incidental impact on speech; it becomes regulation of speaking or publishing as such, subject to" the First Amendment."[90]

[I23] A municipality is not precluded from controlling "the location of theaters as well as the location of other commercial establishments, either by confining them to certain specified commercial zones or by requiring that they be dispersed throughout the city. The mere fact that the commercial exploitation of material protected by the First Amendment is subject to zoning and other licensing requirements is not a suffi-

---

87 Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395, 414 (1953).

88 Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, 151 (1969).

89 Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395, 414 (1953).

90 Lowe v. Sec. & Exch. Comm'n, 472 U.S. 181 (1985), at 232 (opinion of White, J., joined by Burger, C.J., and Rehnquist, J.). These Justices concluded that, "[a]s applied to limit entry into the profession of providing investment advice tailored to the individual needs of each client, the Investment Advisers Act is not subject to scrutiny as a regulation of speech—it can be justified as a legitimate exercise of the power to license those who would practice a profession, and it is no more subject to constitutional attack than state-imposed limits on those who may practice the professions of law and medicine. The application of the Act's enforcement provisions to prevent unregistered persons from engaging in the business of publishing investment advice for the benefit of any who would purchase their publications, however, is a direct restraint on freedom of speech and of the press subject to the searching scrutiny called for by the First Amendment." Id. at 233.

cient reason for invalidating such city ordinances as impermissible prior restraints on free speech."[91]

[I24] The Court has refused to strike down, against a broad and generalized attack, a prior restraint requirement that motion pictures be submitted to censors in advance of exhibition.[92] However, precision of regulation must be the touchstone in this area. "[T]o the extent that vague standards do not sufficiently guide the censor, the problem is not cured merely by affording de novo judicial review. Vague standards, unless narrowed by interpretation, encourage erratic administration whether the censor be administrative or judicial."[93] In Joseph Burstyn, the Court dealt with a film licensing standard of "sacrilegious," which was found to have such an all-inclusive definition as to result in substantially unbridled censorship.[94] Following Burstyn, the Court held the following film licensing standards to be unconstitutionally vague: "of such character as to be prejudicial to the best interests of the people of said City;"[95] "moral, educational or amusing and harmless;"[96] "approve such films . . . [as] are moral and proper; . . . disapprove such as are cruel, obscene, indecent or immoral, or such as tend to debase or corrupt morals."[97]

[I25] In Freedman, the Court struck down a state scheme for administrative licensing of motion pictures, holding that, "because only a judicial determination in an adversary proceeding ensures the necessary sensitivity to freedom of expression, only a procedure requiring a judicial determination suffices to impose a valid final restraint."[98] "To insure that a judicial determination occurs promptly so that administrative delay does not, in itself, become a form of censorship, [the Court] further held, (1) there must be assurance, 'by statute or authoritative judicial construction, that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film;' (2) '[a]ny restraint imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must similarly be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution;' and (3) 'the procedure must also assure a prompt final judicial decision' to minimize the impact of possibly erroneous administrative action."[99] Similar cases followed. For example, Blount invalidated postal rules permitting restrictions on the use of the mails for allegedly obscene materials, because the

---

91 Young v. Am. Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50, 62 (1976).

92 See Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43, 44–50 (1961).

93 Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 682, 685 (1968).

94 Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502 (1952).

95 Gelling v. Texas, 343 U.S. 960 (1952).

96 Superior Films, Inc. v. Dep't of Educ., 346 U.S. 587 (1954).

97 Holmby Prods., Inc. v. Vaughn, 350 U.S. 870 (1955).

98 Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58 (1965).

99 United States v. Thirty-seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 367 (1971), quoting Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58–59 (1965).

The would-be "censor . . . must bear the burden of proof once in court." See Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 321 (2002), quoting FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 227 (1990) (principal opinion), citing, in turn, Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 58–60 (1965).

The requirement of prompt judicial review means a prompt judicial determination (a prompt final judicial decision), not merely a prompt commencement of judicial proceedings. Indeed, "[a] delay in issuing a judicial decision, no less than a delay in obtaining access to a court, can prevent a license from being issued within a reasonable period of time." See City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, 541 U.S. 774, 781 (2004).

rules lacked the procedural safeguards required under Freedman.[100] In Vance, the Court held that a general public nuisance statute could not be applied to enjoin a motion picture theater's future exhibition of films for a year, based on a presumption that such films would be obscene merely because prior films had been, when such a determination could be constitutionally made only in accordance with Freedman procedures.[101] Teitel held that a motion picture censorship ordinance allowing 50 to 57 days to complete the administrative process before initiation of the judicial proceeding does not satisfy the standard that the procedure must assure "that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film."[102]

[I26] "Like a censorship system, a licensing scheme creates the possibility that constitutionally protected speech will be suppressed where there are inadequate procedural safeguards to ensure prompt issuance of the license."[103] Southeastern Promotions found unconstitutional a city's refusal to rent municipal facilities for a musical because of its content, absent Freedman procedures.[104] In Riley, the Court applied Freedman to a professional licensing scheme, because the professionals involved, charity fundraisers, were engaged in First Amendment-protected activity. The Court held that, even if North Carolina's interest in licensing fundraisers was sufficient to justify such a regulation, the state should set a time limit for actions on license applications. The North Carolina statute did not so provide, and the Court struck it down.[105] In FW/PBS a three-Justice plurality applied the last two of the Freedman standards to a municipal ordinance conditioning the operation of sexually oriented businesses on receipt of a license.[106] Three other members of the Court believed that all three of the procedural safeguards specified in Freedman should be applied.[107]

---

100 Blount v. Rizzi, 400 U.S. 410 (1971).

101 Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., 445 U.S. 308, 315–17 (1980) (per curiam).

102 Teitel Film Corp. v. Cusack, 390 U.S. 139, 141–42 (1968) (per curiam). A state court's decision that certain magazines are obscene does not bind a bookstall operator who had not been given notice of or made a party to the relevant civil adjudication, at least when the respondents in that action were not in privity with the bookstall operator, and cannot be presumed to have had interests sufficiently identical to those of the bookstall operator as adequately to protect his First Amendment rights, which he had a right to assert in his own behalf in a proceeding to which he was a party. See McKinney v. Alabama, 424 U.S. 669, 673–76 (1976).

103 FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 226 (1990) (principal opinion).

104 Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975).

105 Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of Blind of N.C., Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 802 (1988). The Court noted that the state could not assert that its history of issuing licenses quickly constituted a practice effectively constraining the licensor's discretion, since such history related to a time (prior to amendment of the challenged Act) when professional fundraisers were permitted to solicit as soon as their applications were filed. Id. at 803.

106 FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 229–30 (1990) (opinion of Justice O'Connor, joined by Justices Stevens and Kennedy). Justice O'Connor based her disinclination to require the first Freedman procedure on two grounds: the Dallas licensing scheme did not involve an administrator's passing judgment on whether the content of particular speech was protected or not; and the Dallas scheme licensed entire businesses, not just individual films. O'Connor found the first distinction significant, considering that suppression of speech on the ostensible ground of content is presumptively invalid. She found the second significant, because it anticipated that applicants with an entire business at stake would pursue their interests in court rather than abandon them.

107 Id. at 238–42 (opinion of Brennan, J., joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun). Justice Brennan stressed that the danger posed by a license that prevents a speaker from speaking at all [I27] Nevertheless, the Court has "never required that a content-neutral permit scheme regulating speech in a public forum adhere to the procedural requirements set forth in Freedman. 'A licensing standard which gives an official authority to censor the content of a speech differs toto coelo from one limited by its terms, or by nondiscriminatory practice, to considerations of public safety and the like.' . . . Regulations of the use of a public forum that ensure the safety and convenience of the people are not 'inconsistent with civil liberties but . . . [are] one of the means of safeguarding the good order upon which [civil liberties] ultimately depend.'" Such a traditional exercise of authority does not raise the grave dangers of a censorship system.[108]

3. Injunctions

[I28] In Near, Minnesota had "empowered its courts to enjoin the dissemination of future issues of a publication because its past issues had been found offensive."[109] The

---

is not derived from the basis on which that license was purportedly denied. The danger posed is the unlawful stifling of speech that results. It is the transcendent value of speech that places the burden of persuasion on the state. The heavy presumption against prior restraints requires no less. In distributing the burdens of initiating judicial proceedings and proof, the courts are obliged to place them such that they err on the side of speech, not on the side of silence.

City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, 541 U.S. 774 (2004), involved a city's "adult business license" ordinance. There, the Court held that Colorado's ordinary "judicial review" rules sufficed to assure a prompt judicial decision, as long as the courts remained sensitive to the need to prevent First Amendment harms and administered those procedures accordingly. And whether the courts did so was a matter normally fit for case-by-case determination rather than a facial challenge. Four considerations supported this conclusion. First, ordinary court procedural rules and practices in Colorado gave reviewing courts judicial tools sufficient to avoid delay-related First Amendment harm. Indeed, courts could arrange their schedules to "accelerate" proceedings, and higher courts could grant expedited review. Second, there was no reason to doubt state judges' willingness to exercise these powers wisely so as to avoid serious threats of delay-induced First Amendment harm. And federal remedies would provide an additional safety valve in the event of any such problem. Third, the typical First Amendment harm at issue in Littleton differed from that at issue in Freedman, diminishing the need in the typical case for procedural rules imposing special decision-making time limits. Freedman considered a Maryland statute that created a Board of Censors, which had to decide whether a film was "pornographic," "tended to "debase or corrupt morals," and lacked "whatever other merits." If so, it denied the permit, and the film could not be shown. Thus, Freedman addressed a scheme with "rather subjective standards and where a denial likely meant complete censorship." In contrast, the Littleton ordinance did not "seek to censor material." And its licensing scheme applied "reasonably objective, nondiscretionary criteria unrelated to the content of the expressive materials that an adult business [might] sell or display." Those criteria were "simple enough to apply and their application simple enough to review that their use [wa]s unlikely in practice to suppress totally any specific item of adult material in the community. . . . Nor should zoning requirements suppress that material, for a constitutional zoning system seeks to determine where, not whether, protected adult material can be sold. . . . The upshot [wa]s that Littleton's 'adult business' licensing scheme [did] not present the 'grave dangers of a censorship system.' . . . And the simple objective nature of the licensing criteria means that in the ordinary case, judicial review, too, should prove simple, hence expeditious." Finally, nothing in Freedman required a city or state to place judicial review safeguards all in the city ordinance that sets forth a licensing scheme.

[108] Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 322–23 (2002).

[109] See Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436, 445 (1957), discussing Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

Court found that the scheme embodied "the essence of censorship" and constituted impermissible prior restraint.[110] Similarly, Vance struck down a Texas statute that authorized courts, upon a showing that obscene films had been shown in the past at an adult theater, to issue an injunction of indefinite duration prohibiting the future exhibition of films not yet found to be obscene.[111] In Keefe, the Court vacated an order enjoining petitioners from distributing leaflets of any kind anywhere in the town of Westchester. In so holding, the Court noted that the interest of an individual in being free from public criticism of his business practices in pamphlets or leaflets does not warrant the use of the injunctive power of a court.[112]

[I29] "Respect for judicial process is a small price to pay for the civilizing hand of law, which alone can give abiding meaning to constitutional freedom. . . . An injunction duly issuing out of a court of general jurisdiction with equity powers upon pleadings properly invoking its action, and served upon persons made parties therein and within the jurisdiction, must be obeyed by them however erroneous the action of the court may be, even if the error be in the assumption of the validity of a seeming but void licensing law going to the merits of the case. It is for the court of first instance to determine the question of the validity of the law, and until its decision is reversed for error by orderly review, either by itself or by a higher court, its orders based on its decision are to be respected, and disobedience of them" constitutes punishable contempt of its lawful authority, at least where the injunction is not "transparently invalid" or does not have only "a frivolous pretense to validity."[113]

[I30] A content-neutral injunction that may incidentally affect expression is not treated as a prior restraint. Madsen held that an injunction preventing picketing around an abortion clinic was not subject to "prior restraint" analysis, since alternative channels of communication were left open to the protesters, and the injunction had been issued not because of the content of the protesters' expression, but because of their prior unlawful conduct.[114]

---

[110] Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 713 (1931).

[111] Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., 445 U.S. 308, 311 (1980) (per curiam).

[112] Org. for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 419–20 (1971). Respondent was a real estate broker who, allegedly, aroused the fears of the local white residents that black people were coming into the area and then, exploiting the reactions and emotions so aroused, was able to secure listings and sell homes to African-Americans.

[113] Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 314–15, 321 (1967). There the Court held that demonstrators, who had proceeded with their protest march in face of the prohibition of an injunctive order against such a march, could not defend contempt charges by asserting the unconstitutionality of the injunction.

In this context the Court has disapproved the issuance of ex parte restraining orders. In Carroll v. President and Commissioners of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175, 179–85 (1968), the Court found it clear that the failure to give notice, formal or informal, and to provide an opportunity for an adversary proceeding, before the holding of a rally was restrained by court order, was incompatible with the First Amendment. At the same time, the Court reserved the question whether an ex parte restraining order for a minimum period may be justified because of the unavailability of the adverse parties or their counsel, or perhaps for other reasons.

[114] Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 764, n.2 (1994). See also Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of W. N.Y., 519 U.S. 357, 374, n.6 (1997).

C. VAGUENESS AND OVERBREADTH

[I31] In the First Amendment area, government may regulate "only with narrow specificity."[115] In addition to problems that arise when any statute fails to provide people of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to understand what conduct it prohibits, or authorizes arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement, a vague statute in the areas of speech and press creates a second level of difficulty, because of its obvious chilling effect on protected expression. Hence, "the general test of vagueness applies with particular force in review of laws dealing with speech."[116]

[I32] The plaintiff generally must assert his own legal rights and interests, and he cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. "The reason for this rule is twofold. The limitation 'frees the Court not only from unnecessary pronouncement on constitutional issues, but also from premature interpretations of statutes in areas where their constitutional application might be cloudy,' . . . and it assures the court that the issues before it will be concrete and sharply presented."[117] The seminal cases in which the Court held unconstitutional "on its face" state legislation restricting speech did not involve any departure from the general rule that a litigant only has standing to vindicate his own constitutional rights. In Stromberg[118] and Lovell,[119] the statutes were unconstitutional as applied to the defendants' conduct, but they were also unconstitutional on their face, because it was apparent that any attempt to enforce such legislation would create an unacceptable risk of the suppression of ideas.[120] "In cases of this character, a holding of facial invalidity expresses the conclusion that the statute could never be applied in a valid manner. Such holdings invalidated entire statutes, but did not create any exception from the general rule that constitutional adjudication requires a review of the application of a statute to the conduct of the party before the Court. Subsequently, however, the Court did recognize an exception to this general rule for laws that are written so broadly that they may inhibit the constitutionally protected speech of third parties. . . . The Court has repeatedly held

---

115 NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963).

116 See, e.g., Hynes v. Mayor of Oradell, 425 U.S. 610, 620 (1976). See, in extenso, paras. E66 et seq. ("void for vagueness" doctrine).

The need for clarity and definiteness in the determination of standards for selective government funding of speech is rather weak. See Nat'l Endowment for Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 588–89 (1998) (see, in extenso, para. I343).

117 Sec'y of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 955 (1984), quoting United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 22 (1960).

118 Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369–70 (1931). Stromberg was a supervisor at a summer camp for children. The camp's curriculum stressed class consciousness and the solidarity of workers. Each morning at the camp, a red flag was raised and the children recited a pledge of allegiance to the "workers' flag." The statute under which Stromberg was convicted prohibited peaceful display of a symbol of opposition to organized government.

119 Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 451–52 (1938). Lovell was convicted of distributing religious pamphlets without a license. A local ordinance required a license to distribute any literature, and it gave the chief of police the power to deny a license in order to abate anything he considered to be a "nuisance."

120 In Stromberg, the only justification for the challenged statute was the suppression of ideas. In Lovell, since no attempt was made to tailor the licensing requirement to a substantive evil unrelated to the suppression of ideas, the statute created an unacceptable risk that it would be used to suppress.

that such a statute may be challenged on its face even though a more narrowly drawn statute would be valid as applied to the party in the case before it."[121] This exception from the general rule is predicated on "a judicial prediction or assumption that the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression. . . . In such cases, . . . the possible harm to society in permitting some unprotected speech to go unpunished is outweighed by the possibility that protected speech of others may be muted and perceived grievances left to fester because of the possible inhibitory effects of overly broad statutes."[122]

[I33] "In the development of the overbreadth doctrine, the Court has been sensitive to the risk that the doctrine itself might sweep so broadly that the exception to ordinary standing requirements would swallow the general rule. In order to decide whether the overbreadth exception is applicable in a particular case, [the Court has] weighed the likelihood that the statute's very existence will inhibit free expression."[123] "Thus, the Court has permitted a party to challenge an ordinance under the overbreadth doctrine in cases where every application creates an impermissible risk of suppression of ideas, such as an ordinance that delegates overly broad discretion to the decisionmaker,"[124] "and in cases where the ordinance sweeps too broadly, penalizing a substantial amount of speech that is constitutionally protected."[125]

---

[121] Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 797–99 (1984). A representative statement of the "overbreadth" doctrine is found in Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518, 520–21 (1972): "At least when statutes regulate or proscribe speech and when no readily apparent construction suggests itself as a vehicle for rehabilitating the statutes in a single prosecution, the transcendent value to all society of constitutionally protected expression is deemed to justify allowing attacks on overly broad statutes with no requirement that the person making the attack demonstrate that his own conduct could not be regulated by a statute drawn with the requisite narrow specificity. This is deemed necessary because persons whose expression is constitutionally protected may well refrain from exercising their rights for fear of criminal sanctions provided by a statute susceptible of application to protected expression."

Where the parties challenging the statute are those who desire to engage in protected speech that the overbroad statute purports to punish, or who seek to publish both protected and unprotected material, there is "no want of a proper party to challenge the statute, no concern that an attack on the statute will be unduly delayed or protected speech discouraged. The statute may forthwith be declared invalid to the extent that it reaches too far, but otherwise left intact." See Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc. 472 U.S. 491, 504 (1985).

[122] Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973). The overbreadth doctrine applies to both expressive conduct and pure speech. Moreover, it applies to statutory challenges that arise in defense of a criminal prosecution, as well as civil enforcement or actions seeking a declaratory judgment. See New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 771–73 (1982).

[123] Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 799 (1984).

[124] Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 129 (1992), citing Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 97 (1940); Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56 (1965).

[125] Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 130 (1992) (emphasis added), citing Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973); Bd. of Airport Comm'rs of Los Angeles v. Jews for Jesus, Inc. 482 U.S. 569, 574–75 (1987).

"The requirement that a statute be 'substantially overbroad' before it will be struck down on its face is a 'standing' question only to the extent that, if the plaintiff does not prevail on the merits of its facial challenge and cannot demonstrate that, as applied to it, the statute is unconstitutional, it has no 'standing' to allege that, as applied to others, the statute might be unconstitutional." See Sec'y of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 959

[I34] "At the root of [the first line of cases] is the time-tested knowledge that, in the area of free expression, a licensing statute placing unbridled discretion in the hands of a government official or agency constitutes a prior restraint and may result in censorship. . . . And these evils engender identifiable risks to free expression that can be effectively alleviated only through a facial challenge. First, the mere existence of the licensor's unfettered discretion, coupled with the power of prior restraint, intimidates parties into censoring their own speech, even if the discretion and power are never actually abused. . . . Self-censorship is immune to an 'as applied' challenge, for it derives from the individual's own actions, not an abuse of government power. . . . Second, the absence of express standards makes it difficult to distinguish, 'as applied,' between a licensor's legitimate denial of a permit and its illegitimate abuse of censorial power. Standards provide the guideposts that check the licensor and allow courts quickly and easily to determine whether the licensor is discriminating against disfavored speech. Without these guideposts, post hoc rationalizations by the licensing official and the use of shifting or illegitimate criteria are far too easy, making it difficult for courts to determine in any particular case whether the licensor is permitting favorable, and suppressing unfavorable, expression. . . . Further, the difficulty and delay inherent in the "as applied" challenge can itself discourage litigation."[126] Hence, when a licensing statute vests unbridled discretion in a government official over whether to permit or deny expressive activity, one who is subject to the law may challenge it facially without first submitting to the licensing process.[127]

[I35] "The requirement of substantial overbreadth is directly derived from the purpose and nature of the doctrine. While a sweeping statute has the potential to repeatedly chill the exercise of expressive activity by many individuals, the extent of deterrence of protected speech can be expected to decrease with the declining reach of the regulation."[128] "The concept of substantial overbreadth is not readily reduced to an exact definition. It is clear, however, that the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge. . . . [Instead,] there must be a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court for it to be facially challenged on overbreadth grounds."[129] "[H]owever, there comes a point at which the chilling effect of an overbroad law, significant though it may be, cannot justify prohibiting all enforcement of that law—particularly a law that reflects 'legitimate state interests in maintaining comprehensive controls over harmful,

---

(1984). Hence, the question whether the claimed overbreadth of a statute is sufficiently "substantial" to produce facial invalidity involves the determination of a First Amendment challenge on the merits. See Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 120 (2003).

126 City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publ'g Co., 486 U.S. 750, 758–59 (1988) (4-to-3 decision).

127 Id. at 755.

128 New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 772 (1982).

129 Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 800–01 (1984). For example, in Board of Airport Commissioners of Los Angeles v. Jews for Jesus, Inc., 482 U.S. 569 (1987), the Court unanimously invalidated on its face a regulation that prohibited "all First Amendment activities" in the Los Angeles International Airport. And in City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 461–63 (1987), the Court held that a municipal ordinance, which makes it unlawful to interrupt a police officer in the performance of his duty, is substantially overbroad and, therefore, invalid on its face under the First Amendment, which "protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers."

constitutionally unprotected conduct.' . . . For there are substantial social costs created by the overbreadth doctrine when it blocks application of a law to constitutionally unprotected speech, or especially to constitutionally unprotected conduct. To ensure that these costs do not swallow the social benefits of declaring a law 'overbroad,' [the Court has] insisted that a law's application to protected speech be 'substantial,' not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the scope of the law's plainly legitimate applications, . . . before applying the 'strong medicine' of overbreadth invalidation."[130]

---

[130] Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 119–20 (2003), quoting and citing Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973). See also United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548, 580–81 (1973) (facial invalidation is inappropriate in cases where, despite some possibly impermissible application, "the remainder of the statute covers a whole range of easily identifiable and constitutionally proscribable conduct").

Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113 (2003), provides a good example. There, the Richmond Redevelopment and Housing Authority (RRHA), a political subdivision of Virginia, owned and operated Whitcomb Court, a low-income housing development. In 1997, the Richmond City Council conveyed Whitcomb Court's streets to the RRHA, in an effort to combat crime and drug dealing by non-residents. In accordance with the terms of conveyance, the RRHA enacted a policy—in accordance with the foregoing decision of the Richmond City Council—authorizing the Richmond police to serve notice on any person lacking "a legitimate business or social purpose" for being on the premises and to arrest for trespassing any person who remained or returned after having been so notified. The RRHA gave respondent Hicks, a non-resident, written notice barring him from Whitcomb Court. Subsequently, he trespassed there and was arrested and convicted. At trial, he claimed that RRHA's policy was, among other things, unconstitutionally overbroad. The Court rejected this contention, holding that, even assuming the invalidity of the policy's "unwritten" requirement that demonstrators and leafleters obtain advance permission, Hicks had not shown that the RRHA policy prohibited a substantial amount of protected speech in relation to its many legitimate applications. Both the notice-barment rule and the "legitimate business or social purpose" rule applied to all persons entering Whitcomb Court's streets, not just to those seeking to engage in expression. Further, neither the basis for the barment sanction (a prior trespass) nor its purpose (preventing future trespasses) implicated the First Amendment. As the Court pointed out, "[r]arely if ever will an overbreadth challenge succeed against a law or regulation that is not specifically addressed to speech or to conduct necessarily associated with speech (such as picketing or demonstrating)." Id. at 124 (emphasis added). Under these considerations, the Court concluded that the RRHA's policy was not facially invalid under the overbreadth doctrine, and that any applications of the policy that violated the First Amendment could be remedied through as-applied litigation.

Overbreadth claims, "if entertained at all, have been curtailed when invoked against ordinary criminal laws that are sought to be applied to protected expressive conduct." See Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973) (emphasis added). For example, in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308–311 (1940), a Jehovah's Witness, was convicted of common law breach of the peace for playing a phonograph record attacking the Catholic Church before two Catholic men on a New Haven street. The Court reversed the judgment affirming Cantwell's conviction but only on the ground that his conduct, considered in the light of the First Amendment guarantees, could not be punished under the common law offense in question. "The Court did not hold that the offense 'known as breach of the peace' must fall in toto because it was capable of some unconstitutional applications, and, in fact, the Court seemingly envisioned its continued use against 'a great variety of conduct destroying or menacing public order and tranquility.'" See Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 614 (1973), discussing Cantwell.

Considering the necessity for imposition of discipline within the military, the Court has held that Congress is permitted "to legislate both with greater breadth and with greater flexibility when the statute governs military society." Accordingly, "the weighty countervailing policies . . . which permit the extension of standing in First Amendment cases involving civilian society, must be accorded a good deal less weight in the military context." See Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 756, 760 (1974).

[I36] "The showing that a law punishes a 'substantial' amount of protected free speech, . . . suffices to invalidate all enforcement of that law, 'until and unless a limiting construction or partial invalidation so narrows it as to remove the seeming threat or deterrence to constitutionally protected expression.'"[131] A statute as construed to obviate overbreadth may be applied to conduct occurring before the construction, provided such application affords fair warning to the defendant.[132] By contrast, the overbreadth defense is available when the statute alleged to run afoul of that doctrine has been amended to eliminate the basis for the overbreadth challenge. In Oakes, five Justices emphasized that "[t]he overbreadth doctrine serves to protect constitutionally legitimate speech not merely ex post that is, after the offending statute is enacted, but also ex ante that is, when the legislature is contemplating what sort of statute to enact. If the promulgation of overbroad laws affecting speech was cost free, . . . that is, if no conviction of constitutionally proscribable conduct would be lost so long as the offending statute was narrowed before the final appeal, then legislatures would have significantly reduced incentive to stay within constitutional bounds in the first place. When one takes account of those overbroad statutes that are never challenged, and of the time that elapses before the ones that are challenged are amended to come within constitutional bounds, a substantial amount of legitimate speech would be 'chilled.'"[133] "In other words, five of the Oakes Justices feared that, if [the Court] allowed a legislature to correct its mistakes without paying for them (beyond the inconvenience of passing a new law), [it] would decrease the legislature's incentive to draft a narrowly tailored law in the first place."[134]

[I37] The overbreadth doctrine does not apply to commercial speech. Considering that the overbreadth doctrine derives from the recognition that unconstitutional restric-

---

[131] Virginia, v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 118–19 (2003), quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973). "[W]hen a state law has been authoritatively construed so as to render it constitutional, or a well understood and uniformly applied practice has developed that has virtually the force of a judicial construction, the state law is read in light of those limits. That rule applies even if the face of the statute might not otherwise suggest the limits imposed. . . . Further, th[e] Court will presume any narrowing construction or practice to which a state law is 'fairly susceptible.'" See City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publ'g Co., 486 U.S. 750, 770, n.11 (1988). Nevertheless, a federal litigant does not have to await a state court construction or the development of an established practice before bringing the federal suit. Id. at 770, n.11, citing City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451 (1987) (declining to abstain or order certification to allow the state courts to construe a criminal statute where the statute was not fairly susceptible to a narrowing construction).

[132] See Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 115–22 (1990). Where a state supreme court narrows an unconstitutionally overbroad statute, the state must ensure that defendants are convicted under the statute, as it is subsequently construed, and not as it was originally written. See Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 382 U.S. 87, 91–92 (1965).

[133] Massachusetts v. Oakes, 491 U.S. 576, 586 (1989). In that case, the petitioner challenged a Massachusetts pornography statute as overbroad; since the time of the defendant's alleged crime, however, the state had substantially narrowed the statute through a subsequent legislative enactment—an amendment to the statute. Five Justices agreed that the state legislature could not cure the potential overbreadth problem through the subsequent legislative action; the statute was void as written.

[134] Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 121 (1990).

tion of expression may deter protected speech by parties not before the court and thereby escape judicial review, the Court has found that "[t]his restraint is less likely where the expression is linked to 'commercial wellbeing,' and therefore is not easily deterred by 'overbroad regulation.'"[135]

[I38] "Overbreadth" is not used only to describe the doctrine that allows a litigant who has engaged in no constitutionally protected activity to assert the rights of third parties to challenge a statute. "Overbreadth" has also been used to describe a challenge to a statute that directly restricts the litigant's protected First Amendment activities and does not employ means narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. Quite obviously, the rule that a statute regulating protected speech must be "narrowly tailored" prevents a statute from being overbroad. The overbreadth doctrine differs from that rule principally in this: "[w]here an overbreadth attack is successful, the statute is invalid in all its applications, since every person to whom it is applied can defend on the basis of the same overbreadth. A successful attack upon a speech restriction on narrow-tailoring grounds, by contrast, does not assure a defense to those whose own [speech] can be constitutionally [regulated.]"[136] Nevertheless, "the rationale of the narrow-tailoring holding may be so broad as to render the statute effectively unenforceable."[137]

D. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN CONTENT-BASED AND CONTENT-NEUTRAL REGULATION OF SPEECH

1. General Considerations

[I39] "At the heart of the First Amendment lies the principle that each person should decide for him or herself the ideas and beliefs deserving of expression, consideration, and adherence. [The American] political system and cultural life rest upon this ideal. . . . Government action that stifles speech on account of its message, or that requires the utterance of a particular message favored by the Government, contravenes this essential right. Laws of this sort pose the inherent risk that the Government seeks not to advance a legitimate regulatory goal, but to suppress unpopular ideas or information or manipulate the public debate through coercion, rather than persuasion. These restrictions 'rais[e] the specter that the Government may effectively drive certain ideas or viewpoints from the marketplace.' . . . For these reasons, the First Amendment, subject only to narrow and well-understood exceptions, does not countenance governmental control over the content of messages expressed by private individuals."[138] Hence, "[c]ontent-based regulations are presumptively invalid."[139] For [135] Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 565, n.8 (1980), citing Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 381 (1977) (since overbreadth is "strong medicine," which "has been employed sparingly and only as a last resort," the Court declines to apply it to commercial speech, "a context where it is not necessary to further its intended objective").

---

[136] See Bd. of Trs. of State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 483 (1989).

[137] Id. at 483, citing Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 565, n.8, 569–71 (1980). See also Vill. of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 444 U.S. 620, 637–39 (1980).

[138] Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 641 (1994), quoting Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 116 (1991).

[139] R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 382 (1992). "[A] regulation that 'does not favor either instance, a government determination of the publishability of photographic reproductions of U.S. currency, based on whether the message of the photographs is "newsworthy or educational," constitutes a content-based discrimination transgressing the First Amendment.[140] "When the government targets not subject matter but particular views taken by speakers on a subject, the violation of the First Amendment is all the more blatant. . . . Viewpoint discrimination is thus an egregious form of content discrimination. The government must abstain from regulating speech when the specific motivating ideology or the opinion or perspective of the speaker is the rationale for the restriction."[141] For example, in Lamb's Chapel, the Court held that a school district violated the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment when it excluded a private group from presenting films at the school based solely on the films' discussions of family values from a religious perspective.[142]

[I40] Deciding whether a particular regulation is content-based or content-neutral is not always a simple task. "The principal inquiry in determining content-neutrality . . . is whether the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of agreement or disagreement with the message it conveys. The government's purpose is the controlling consideration. A regulation that serves purposes unrelated to the content of expression is deemed neutral, even if it has an incidental effect on some speakers or messages, but not others. . . . Government regulation of expressive activity is content-neutral so long as it is 'justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech.'"[143] "The purpose, or justification, of a regulation will often be evident on its face. . . . But while a content-based purpose may be sufficient in certain circumstances to show that a regulation is content-based, it is not necessary to such a showing in all cases. . . . Nor will the mere assertion of a content-neutral purpose be enough to save a law which, on its face, discriminates based on content. . . . As a general rule, laws that, by their terms, distinguish favored speech from disfavored speech on the basis of the ideas or views expressed are content-based. . . . By contrast, laws that confer benefits or impose burdens on speech without reference to the ideas or views expressed are, in most instances, content-neutral."[144]

[I41] The Court applies "the most exacting scrutiny to regulations that suppress, disadvantage, or impose differential burdens upon speech because of its content."[145] Such a statute "must be narrowly tailored to promote a compelling Government interest; . . . [i]f a less restrictive alternative would serve the Government's purpose, the legislature side of a political controversy' is nonetheless impermissible because the 'First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends . . . to prohibition of public discussion of an entire subject and topic.'" See Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 319 (1998), quoting Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530, 537 (1980).

---

140 Regan v. Time, Inc. 468 U.S. 641, 648–49 (1984).

141 Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 829 (1995).

142 Lamb's Chapel v. Cent. Moriches Union Free Sch. Dist., 508 U.S. 384, 393–95 (1993). The constitutionality of restrictions on religious speech in public fora, is discussed, in extenso, in paras. H124 et seq.

143 Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989), quoting Clark v. Cmty. for Creative NonViolence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984). A statute that "suppresses expression out of concern for its likely communicative impact" is content-based. See United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310, 317–18 (1990) (flag burning) (emphasis added).

144 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 642–43 (1994).

145 Id. at 642.

must use that alternative."[146] "Laws that compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message are subject to the same rigorous scrutiny."[147] In contrast, regulations that are unrelated to the content of speech "pose a less substantial risk of excising certain ideas or viewpoints from the public dialogue,"[148] and, consequently, are subject to an intermediate level of scrutiny: restrictions of this kind are valid, provided that they are "justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information."[149] However, injunctions "carry greater risks of censorship and discriminatory application than do general ordinances." Hence, in evaluating a content-neutral injunction, the governing standard is whether the injunction's challenged provisions "burden no more speech than necessary to serve a significant government interest."[150] [I42] "A statute is presumptively inconsistent with the First Amendment if it imposes a financial burden on speakers because of the content of their speech."[151] As the Court emphasized in invalidating a content-based magazine tax, "official scrutiny of the content of publications as the basis for imposing a tax is entirely incompatible with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press."[152] In Simon & Schuster, the Court evaluated the constitutionality of New York's "Son of Sam" law,[153] which required "that an accused or convicted criminal's income from works describing his crime be deposited in an escrow account;" these funds were then made available to the victims of the crime and the criminal's other creditors. The statute broadly defined "person convicted of a crime" to include "any person convicted of a crime in this state either by entry of a plea of guilty or by conviction after trial and any person who has voluntarily and intelligently admitted the commission of a crime for which such person is not prosecuted." The Court noted that the law implicated First Amendment concerns, because it imposed a financial disincentive only on speech of a particular content. Further the Court held that the state's interest in compensating victims from the fruits of crime was a compelling one, but the Son of Sam law was not narrowly tailored to advance that objective. The law was significantly overinclusive, since it applied to works on any subject provided that they expressed the author's thoughts or recollections about his crime, "however tangentially or incidentally," and since its broad definition of "person convicted of a

---

146 United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000). When a plausible, less restrictive alternative is offered to a content-based speech restriction, it is the government's obligation to prove that the alternative will be ineffective to achieve its goals; a court should not assume a plausible less restrictive alternative would be ineffective. Id. at 816, 824.

147 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994), citing Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n for Blind of N.C., 487 U.S. 781, 798 (1988).

148 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994).

149 Clark v. Cmty. for Creative NonViolence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984). "A statute is narrowly tailored if it targets and eliminates no more than the exact source of the 'evil' it seeks to remedy." See Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 485 (1988) (emphasis added).

150 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 764–65 (1994). See also Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of W. New York, 519 U.S. 357, 371–74 (1997).

151 Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. New York Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 115 (1991).

152 Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 230 (1987). The Court also observed that, while the state certainly has an important interest in raising revenue through taxation, that interest hardly justified selective taxation of the press, as it was completely unrelated to a press/non-press distinction. Id. at 238.

153 The statute had been named after a serial killer popularly known as the "Son of Sam."

crime" enabled the state to escrow the income of an author who admitted in his work to having committed a crime, whether or not he had ever actually been accused or convicted. These two provisions combined to encompass a wide range of literature that did enable a criminal to profit from his crime while a victim remained uncompensated. For example, should a prominent figure write his autobiography at the end of his career, and include in an early chapter a brief recollection of having stolen (in New York) a nearly worthless item as a youthful prank, the Board would control his entire income from the book for five years and would make that income available to all of the author's creditors, despite the fact that the statute of limitations for this minor incident had long since run.[154]

[I43] "The Court long has recognized that, by limiting the availability of particular means of communication, content-neutral restrictions can significantly impair the ability of individuals to communicate their views to others."[155] "Although prohibitions foreclosing entire media may be completely free of content or viewpoint discrimination and narrowly tailored,[156] the danger they pose to the freedom of speech is readily apparent—by eliminating a common means of speaking, such measures can suppress too much speech."[157] For example, in City of Ladue, the Court invalidated an ordinance banning almost all residential signs, including signs protesting an imminent governmental decision to go to war, finding that the local government had "almost completely foreclosed a venerable means of communication that is both unique and important."[158]

[I44] "[T]he notion that a regulation of speech may be impermissibly underinclusive is firmly grounded in basic First Amendment principles. Thus, an exemption from an otherwise permissible regulation of speech may represent a governmental 'attempt to give one side of a debatable public question an advantage in expressing its views to the people.' . . . Alternatively, through the combined operation of a general speech restriction and its exemptions, the government might seek to select the 'permissible subjects for public debate,' and thereby to 'control . . . the search for political truth.'"[159]

[I45] Although the First Amendment generally prevents government from proscribing speech, or even expressive conduct, because of disapproval of the ideas expressed, the Court has permitted restrictions upon the content of speech in a few lim-

---

154 Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of New York State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 115–23 (1991). The Court also noted that the state did not have a legitimate interest in suppressing descriptions of crime out of solicitude for the sensibilities of readers. Id. at 118.

155 See City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 55, n.13 (1994).

156 "A complete ban can be narrowly tailored, but only if each activity within the proscription's scope is an appropriately targeted evil." See Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 485 (1988). For example, in City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 808–10 (1984), the Court upheld an ordinance that banned all signs on public property, because the interest supporting the regulation, an esthetic interest in avoiding visual clutter and blight, rendered each sign an evil; complete prohibition was necessary because "the substantive evil—visual blight—[wa]s not merely a possible byproduct of the activity, but [wa]s created by the medium of expression itself." Id. at 810.

157 City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 55 (1994) (emphasis added).

158 Id. at 54.

159 Id. at 51. "Like other classifications, regulatory distinctions among different kinds of speech may fall afoul of the Equal Protection Clause." Id. at 51, n.9 (emphasis added), citing Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 98–102 (1972) (an ordinance that forbids certain kinds of picketing but exempts labor picketing violates the Equal Protection Clause).

ited areas, like obscenity, defamation, or incitement to lawless action, which are "of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality."[160] The fact that these areas of speech, which embody "a particularly intolerable (and socially unnecessary) mode of expressing whatever idea the speaker wishes to convey,"[161] can, "consistently with the First Amendment, be regulated because of their constitutionally proscribable content" does not mean that they constitute "categories of expression entirely invisible to the Constitution, so that they may be made the vehicles for content discrimination unrelated to their distinctively proscribable content." The Court has rejected the "proposition that the First Amendment imposes no obstacle whatsoever to regulation of particular instances of such proscribable expression, so that the government may regulate them freely. That would mean that a city council could enact an ordinance prohibiting only those legally obscene works that contain criticism of the city government or, indeed, that do not include endorsement of the city government. Such a simplistic, all-or-nothing-at-all approach to First Amendment protection is at odds with common sense."[162]

[I46] The Court has emphasized that the prohibition on content-based regulations "applies differently in the context of proscribable speech than in the context of fully protected speech. The rationale of the general prohibition [of content-based regulations,] after all, is that content discrimination 'rais[es] the specter that the Government may effectively drive certain ideas or viewpoints from the marketplace.' . . . But content discrimination among various instances of a class of proscribable speech often does not pose this threat. When the basis for the content discrimination consists entirely of the very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable, no significant danger of idea or viewpoint discrimination exists. Such a reason, having been adjudged neutral enough to support exclusion of the entire class of speech from First Amendment protection, is also neutral enough to form the basis of distinction within the class. To illustrate: a State might choose to prohibit only that obscenity which is the most patently offensive in its prurience—i.e., that which involves the most lascivious displays of sexual activity. But it may not prohibit, for example, only that obscenity which includes offensive political messages. . . . And the Federal Government can criminalize only those threats of violence that are directed against the President, . . . since the reasons why threats of violence are outside the First Amendment (protecting individuals from the fear of violence, from the disruption that fear engenders, and from the possibility that the threatened violence will occur) have special force when applied to the person of the President. . . . But the Federal Government may not criminalize only those threats against the President that mention his policy on aid to inner cities. And to take a final example, . . . a State may choose to regulate price advertising in one industry, but not in others, because the risk of fraud (one of the characteristics of commercial speech that justifies depriving it of full First Amendment protection), . . . is in its view greater there. But a State may not prohibit only that commercial advertising that depicts men in a demeaning fashion."[163]

---

[160] R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 383 (1992), quoting Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 (1942).

[161] R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 393 (1992).

[162] Id. at 383–84.

[163] R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 387–89 (1992). That case involved a First Amendment challenge to a municipal ordinance prohibiting the use of "fighting" words that "insult, or pro-

[I47] "Another valid basis for according differential treatment to even a content-defined sub-class of proscribable speech is that the subclass happens to be associated with particular 'secondary effects' of the speech, so that the regulation is justified without reference to the content of the speech."[164] In Renton, a zoning regulation explicitly treated "adult" movie theaters differently from other theaters and defined "adult" theaters solely by reference to the content of their movies. The Court nonetheless treated the regulation as content-neutral, because the ordinance was aimed at the secondary effects of adult theaters in the surrounding community (i.e., prevention of crime, maintenance of property values, and protection of the city's retail trade and residential neighborhoods), a justification unrelated to the content of the adult movies themselves.[165] But in Alameda Books, a case involving a similar adult theater zoning ordinance, five members of the Court deviated from this view of Renton. Justice Kennedy thought that such an ordinance is content-based but is subject to intermediate rather than strict scrutiny, since it is "more in the nature of a typical land use restriction and less in the nature of a law suppressing speech;" the ordinance "may be a covert attack on speech, but [the courts] shouldn't presume it to be so," for it has "the prima facie legitimate purpose" of "limit[ing] the negative externalities of land use."[166] Four other Justices char-voke violence, on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender." Because the ordinance only proscribed a class of fighting words deemed particularly offensive by the city—i.e., those that contained messages of bias-motivated hatred, the Court held that it violated the rule against content-based discrimination. See id. at 392–94. In the same case, Justice White conceded that a city council cannot prohibit only those legally obscene works that contain criticism of the city government but asserted that, to be the consequence not of the First Amendment but of the Equal Protection Clause; such content-based discrimination would not, he said, "be rationally related to a legitimate government interest." Id. at 406. Nevertheless, as the majority pointed out, "the only reason that government interest is not a 'legitimate' one is that it violates the First Amendment. See id. at 384, n.4 (emphasis added).

---

The Court itself has occasionally fused the First Amendment into the Equal Protection Clause in this fashion but with the acknowledgment that the First Amendment underlies its analysis. See Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972), where an ordinance prohibiting only non-labor picketing was held violative of the Equal Protection Clause, because there was no "appropriate governmental interest" supporting the distinction, inasmuch as "the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content."

164 R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 389 (1992).

165 Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. 475 U.S. 41, 47–48 (1986). There "the Court distinguished the inquiry into whether such a zoning ordinance is content neutral from the inquiry into whether it is designed to serve a substantial government interest and does not unreasonably limit alternative avenues of communication. The former requires courts to verify that the predominate concerns' motivating the ordinance 'were with the secondary effects of adult [speech], and not with the content of adult [speech].' . . . The latter inquiry goes one step further and asks whether the municipality can demonstrate a connection between the speech regulated by the ordinance and the secondary effects that motivated the adoption of the ordinance. Only at this stage did Renton contemplate that courts would examine evidence concerning regulated speech and secondary effects." See City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S. 425, 440–41 (2002) (plurality opinion), discussing Renton, supra, at 47, 50–52.

The emotive impact of speech on its audience is not a "secondary effect." As the Court noted in Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 321 (1988), "[l]isteners' reactions to speech are not the type of 'secondary effects' . . . referred to in Renton."

166 City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S 425, 447, 449 (2002). See also para. I149, note 342.

acterized the ordinance as "content correlated" and would also apply a more relaxed standard of review than strict scrutiny.[167]

2. Particular Categories of Content-Based Regulations[168]

a. Advocacy of the Use of Force or of Law Violation

i. The World War I Cases

[I48] No important case involving free speech was decided by the Court prior to Schenck. That case involved a conviction under the Criminal Espionage Act, which prohibited conspiracies and attempts to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service. The objectionable document denounced conscription, and its most inciting sentence was "[y]ou must do your share to maintain, support and uphold the rights of the people of this country." Fifteen thousand copies were printed, and some were circulated. The First Amendment was tendered as a defense. Writing for a unanimous Court, Justice Holmes stated that "[t]he question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree."[169] When "the words used had as their natural tendency and reasonably probable effect to obstruct the recruiting service," and "the defendant had the specific intent to do so in his mind," conviction in wartime is not prohibited by the Constitution.[170] Schenck's insubstantial gesture toward insubordination in 1917 during World War I was held to be a clear and present danger of bringing about the evil of military insubordination.[171]

[I49] In several later cases involving convictions under the Criminal Espionage Act, the nub of the evidence the Court held sufficient to meet the "clear and present danger" test enunciated in Schenck was as follows: publication of 12 newspaper articles attacking the war;[172] one speech attacking U.S. participation in the war;[173] circulation of copies of two different socialist circulars attacking the war and calling for a general strike in protest;[174] publication of a German language newspaper with false articles, which had the tendency to weaken zeal and patriotism, and thus hamper the United States in raising armies and conducting the war;[175] circulation of copies of a four-page pamphlet written by a clergyman, which belittled Allied war aims and criticized conscription in strong terms.[176] Justice Holmes and Justice Brandeis dissented in the last three cases. The basis of these dissents was that the evidence in each case was insufficient to show that the defendants had created the requisite danger under Schenck. The dissenters noted that "[i]t is only the present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about that warrants Congress in setting a limit to the expression of opinion where pri-

---

167 See, in extenso, para. I149, note 342.

168 See also para. I12 (threat to national security).

169 Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919) (emphasis added).

170 Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211, 216 (1919).

171 Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 51–53 (1919).

172 Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919).

173 Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919).

174 Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919).

175 Schaefer v. United States, 251 U.S. 466 (1920).

176 Pierce v. United States, 252 U.S. 239 (1920).

vate rights are not concerned. . . . Congress certainly cannot forbid all effort to change the mind of the country. . . . [N]obody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so." Justices Holmes and Brandeis thought that the "poor and puny anonymities" at issue were impotent to produce the evil against which the Criminal Espionage Act aimed and that, from them, the specific intent required by the statute could not reasonably be inferred.[177]

ii. State Sedition Laws—Anti-Communist Legislation[178]

[I50] In Gitlow, New York had made it a crime to advocate "the necessity or propriety of overthrowing . . . organized government by force." The evidence showed that the defendant was an official of the Left Wing Section of the Socialist Party, and that he was responsible for publication of a Left Wing Manifesto. This document repudiated "moderate Socialism," and urged the necessity of a militant "revolutionary Socialism," based on class struggle and revolutionary mass action. No evidence of the effect of the Manifesto was introduced, but the jury were instructed that they could not convict unless they found that the document advocated employing unlawful acts for the purpose of overthrowing organized government. The conviction was affirmed. The question, the Court held, was entirely different from that involved in Schenck, where the statute prohibited certain acts involving the danger of substantive evil, without any reference to language itself, and the issue was merely one of sufficiency of evidence under an admittedly constitutional statute. By contrast, in Gitlow, "the legislative body ha[d] determined generally, in the constitutional exercise of its discretion, that utterances of a certain kind involve[d] such danger of substantive evil that they [might] be punished. The statute was a reasonable exercise of legislative judgment, and hence "the question whether any specific utterance coming within the prohibited class [wa]s likely, in and of itself, to bring about the substantive evil [wa]s not open to consideration."[179]

[I51] This principle was also applied in Whitney, to sustain a conviction under a state criminal syndicalism statute. That statute made it a felony to assist in organizing a group assembled to advocate the commission of crime, sabotage, or unlawful acts of violence as a means of effecting political or industrial change. The defendant was found to have assisted in organizing the Communist Labor Party of California, an organization found to have the specified character. It was held that the legislature was not unreasonable in believing organization of such a party involved such danger to the public peace and the security of the state that these acts should be penalized in the exercise of its police power.[180]

[I52] In neither of these cases did Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis accept the reasoning of the Court. They insisted that, wherever speech was the evidence of the violation, it was necessary to show that the speech created the "clear and present dan-

---

177 See Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 628–29 (1919).

178 See also para. H8 (compelled disclosure of political beliefs); para. H73 (void for vagueness doctrine); paras. H74–H75 (loyalty oaths); para. I413 (guilt by association); paras. I419 et seq. (compulsory disclosure of associational ties); para. D22 (passport revocation).

179 Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 670–71 (1925).

180 Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 371 (1927). Whitney was expressly overruled in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969) (per curiam).

ger" of the substantive evil that the legislature had the right to prevent. Thus, they made no distinction between a federal statute that made certain acts unlawful, the evidence to support the conviction being speech, and a statute that made speech itself the crime. Since the manifesto circulated by Gitlow had no chance of starting a present conflagration, they dissented from the affirmance of his conviction.[181] And in Whitney, they repeated that, even though the legislature had designated certain speech as criminal, this could not prevent the defendant from showing that there was no danger that the substantive evil would be brought about. There they concurred in the result reached by the Court, but only because the record contained some evidence that organization of the Communist Labor Party might further a conspiracy to commit immediate serious crimes, and the credibility of the evidence was not put in question by the defendant.[182]

[I53] Subsequent opinions discredited Whitney and distorted the "clear and present danger" test. In Dennis, leaders of the Communist Party, were indicted in a federal district court, under the Smith Act, for willfully and knowingly conspiring to advocate and teach the duty and necessity of overthrowing and destroying the government of the United States by force and violence. The trial judge instructed the jury that they could not convict unless they found that the defendants intended to overthrow the government as speedily as circumstances would permit. The Court sustained convictions under that charge, construing it to mean a determination of "whether the gravity of the evil, discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger."[183]

[I54] In Yates, the Court made it clear that a distinction had to be drawn between advocacy of abstract doctrine and advocacy directed at promoting unlawful action. There the government sought to use the Communist Party, or at least the California branch of the Party, as the conspiratorial nexus between various individuals charged, among other things, with a conspiracy to engage in illegal advocacy. The Court stated that the government's "Party conspiratorial nexus" theory was unavailing, because the evidence fell short of establishing that the Party's advocacy constituted "a call to forcible action" for the accomplishment of immediate or future overthrow, in contrast to the teaching of mere "abstract doctrine" favoring that end.[184]

iii. The Modern "Incitement" Test

[I55] In Brandenburg, a Ku Klux Klan leader threatened "revengeance" if the "suppression" of the white race continued. Subsequently he was convicted for advocating unlawfulness as a means of political reform. The Court reversed the conviction, relying

---

[181] Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 672–73 (1925).

[182] Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 373–79 (1927). In Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 258–61 (1937), the defendant had solicited members for the Communist Party, but there was no proof that he had urged or even approved those of the Party's aims that were unlawful. The Court reversed a conviction obtained under a statute prohibiting an attempt to incite to insurrection by violence on the ground that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited conviction where, on the evidence, a jury could not reasonably infer that the defendant had violated the statute the state sought to apply.

[183] Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 510 (1951) (plurality opinion).

[184] Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 329 (1957). See also Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290, 297–98 (1961), where the Court stated that "the mere abstract teaching . . . of the moral propriety or even moral necessity for a resort to force and violence is not the same as preparing a group for violent action and steeling it to such action."

on "the principle that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action."[185] When a speaker incites an immediate lawless reaction, one cannot rely on public debate to eliminate such potentially harmful speech. Brandenburg is consistent with the "profound national commitment" that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open."[186] It does not seem to apply outside this context.

[I56] The principle announced in Brandenburg requires "careful consideration of the actual circumstances surrounding" the expression at issue.[187] In Hess, the appellant, was arrested during an anti-war demonstration on a college campus for loudly stating, "We'll take the f___ street later (or again)," and was subsequently convicted for violating the Indiana disorderly conduct statute. Hess' statement was not directed to any person or group of persons. Moreover, his statement amounted, at worst, to nothing more than advocacy of illegal action at some indefinite future time. For these reasons, Hess' words could not be punished by the state on the ground that they had a tendency to lead to violence.[188]

[I57] In NAACP v. Claiborne, a local chapter of the NAACP, rebuffed by public officials of Port Gibson and Claiborne County in its request for redress of various forms of racial discrimination, began a boycott of local businesses. During the boycott, a young black man was shot and killed in an encounter with Port Gibson police, and sporadic acts of violence ensued. The following day, boycott leader Charles Evers told a group that boycott violators would be disciplined by their own people, and warned that the Sheriff "could not sleep with boycott violators at night." He stated at a second gathering that "If we catch any of you going in any of them racist stores, we're gonna break your damn neck." "Store watchers" were posted outside boycotted stores to identify those who traded, and their names were read aloud at meetings of the Claiborne County NAACP and published in a mimeographed paper. Those persons were branded traitors,

---

185 Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969) (per curiam) (emphasis added). There, appellant was convicted under the Ohio Criminal Syndicalism statute for "advocat[ing] . . . the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform and for voluntarily assembl[ing] with any society, group or assemblage of persons formed to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." Neither the indictment nor the trial judge's instructions refined the statute's definition of the crime in terms of mere advocacy not distinguished from incitement to imminent lawless action.

In the incitement context, a state may not apply to a legislator a First Amendment standard stricter than that applicable to a private citizen. See Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116, 132–36 (1966).

In the context of the special characteristics of the school environment, the power of the government to prohibit "lawless action" is not limited to acts of a criminal nature; "[a]lso prohibitable are actions which materially and substantially disrupt the work and discipline of the school." See Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 189 (1972). Likewise, in the military context, the government may prohibit the distribution of literature that constitutes "a clear danger to military loyalty, discipline, or morale." See Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 840 (1976).

186 See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

187 Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 409 (1989).

188 Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 108–09 (1973).

called demeaning names, and socially ostracized. Some had shots fired at their houses, a brick was thrown through a windshield, and a garden damaged. Other evidence showed that persons refusing to observe the boycott were beaten, robbed, and publicly humiliated (by spanking). The merchants brought suit against, inter alios, Evers. The Court first noted that, while many of the comments in Evers' speeches might have contemplated "discipline" in the permissible form of social ostracism, it could not be denied that references to the possibility that necks would be broken and to the fact that the Sheriff could not sleep with boycott violators at night implicitly conveyed a sterner message. In the passionate atmosphere in which the speeches were delivered, they might have been understood as inviting an unlawful form of discipline. Nevertheless, the Court held that the emotionally charged rhetoric of Charles Evers' speeches did not transcend the bounds of protected speech set forth in Brandenburg. The lengthy addresses generally contained an impassioned plea for black citizens to unify, to support and respect each other, and to realize the political and economic power available to them. In the course of those pleas, strong language was used. As the Court noted, "[a]n advocate must be free to stimulate his audience with spontaneous and emotional appeals for unity and action in a common cause. When such appeals do not incite lawless action, they must be regarded as protected speech." If Evers' language had been followed by acts of violence, a substantial question would be presented whether he could be held liable for the consequences of that unlawful conduct. In the specific case, however, acts of violence occurred weeks or months after Evers' speeches. For these reasons, the Court concluded that Evers could not be held liable for the unlawful conduct of others.[189]

b. Injury to Reputation or Privacy

i. Defamation

[I58] Basic Principles. The Court has emphasized that "there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact. Neither the intentional lie nor the careless error materially advances society's interest in 'uninhibited, robust and wide-open' debate on public issues. . . . They belong to that category of utterances which 'are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.' . . . Although the erroneous statement of fact is not worthy of constitutional protection, it is nevertheless inevitable in free debate. . . . 'Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of every thing; and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press.' . . . And punishment of error runs the risk of inducing a cautious and restrictive exercise of the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of speech and press. [The Court's] decisions recognize that a rule of strict liability that compels a publisher or broadcaster to guarantee the accuracy of his factual assertions may lead to intolerable self-censorship. Allowing the media to avoid liability only by proving the truth of all injurious statements does not accord adequate protection to First Amendment liberties. . . . 'Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred.' The First Amendment requires that some falsehood be protected in order to protect speech that matters. The need to avoid self-censorship by the news media is, however, not the only societal value at issue. . . . The legitimate state interest underlying the law of libel is the compensation of individuals for the harm inflicted on them by defamatory falsehood. . . . [T]he individual's right to the protection of his own good name 'reflects no more than the basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty. The protection of private personality, like the protection of life itself, is left primarily to the individual States under the Ninth and Tenth Amendments. But this does not mean that the right is entitled to any less recognition by the Court as a basic of [the American] constitutional system.' . . . Some tension necessarily exists between the need for a vigorous and uninhibited press and the legitimate interest in redressing wrongful injury. . . . [S]ome antithesis between freedom of speech and press and libel actions persists, for libel remains premised on the content of speech and limits the freedom of the publisher to express certain sentiments, at least without guaranteeing legal proof of their substantial accuracy.' . . . In [its] continuing effort to define the proper accommodation between these competing concerns, [the Court has] been especially anxious to assure to the freedoms of speech and press that 'breathing space' essential to their fruitful exercise. . . . To that end, th[e] Court has extended a measure of strategic protection to defamatory falsehood."[190] One can discern in the Court's decisions two forces that have reshaped the state law landscape to conform to the First Amendment. The first is whether the plaintiff is a public official or figure, or is instead a private figure. The second is whether the speech at issue is of public concern.[191]

[189] NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 928 (1982).

[I59] "Until New York Times v. Sullivan, the law of defamation was almost exclusively the business of state courts and legislatures. Under the then prevailing state libel law, the defamed individual had only to prove a false written publication that subjected him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Truth was a defense; but given a defamatory false circulation, general injury to reputation was presumed; special damages, such as pecuniary loss and emotional distress, could be recovered; and punitive damages were available if common law malice were shown. General damages for injury to reputation were presumed and awarded because the judgment of history was that, 'in many cases, the effect of defamatory statements [wa]s so subtle and indirect that it [wa]s impossible directly to trace the effects thereof in loss to the person defamed.' . . . The defendant was permitted to show that there was no reputational injury; but . . . the prevailing rule was that at least nominal damages were to be awarded for any defamatory publication actionable per se. This rule performed 'a vindicatory function by enabling the plaintiff publicly to brand the defamatory publication as false.' . . . Similar rules applied to slanderous statements that were actionable per se."[192]

[I60] In New York Times v. Sullivan, the Court determined for the first time the extent to which the constitutional protections for speech and press limit a state's power to award damages in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct. The state's trial court in that case believed the statements tended to injure the plaintiff's reputation or bring him into public contempt and were therefore libelous per se. The trial court, therefore, instructed the jury that it could presume falsity, malice, and some damage to reputation, as long as it found that the defendant had published

---

190 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 339–42 (1974).

191 See Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986).

192 See Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc. 472 U.S. 749, 765 (1985) (White, J., concurring).

the statements, and that the statements concerned the plaintiff. The trial court also instructed the jury that an award of punitive damages required "malice" or "actual malice." The jury found for the plaintiff and made an award of damages that did not distinguish between compensatory and punitive damages. The Alabama supreme court upheld the judgment of the trial court in all respects. The Court reversed, holding that "libel can claim no talismanic immunity from constitutional limitations." Relying on "the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks,"[193] the Court noted that "[a] rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions—and to do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount—leads to . . . 'self-censorship.' Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so."[194] The Court therefore held that the Constitution "prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."[195]

[I61] Three years later, in Curtis, a majority of the Court determined that the New York Times test should apply to criticism of "public figures" as well as "public officials." The Court extended the constitutional privilege announced in that case to protect defamatory criticism of non-public persons "who are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large."[196] As Chief Justice Warren noted, the "citizenry has a legitimate and substantial interest in the conduct of such persons, and freedom of the press to engage in uninhibited debate about their involvement in public issues and events is as crucial as it is in the case of 'public officials.'"[197]

[I62] The next step in this constitutional evolution was the Court's consideration of a private individual's defamation actions involving statements of public concern. Although the issue was initially in doubt,[198] the Court concluded, in Gertz, that the New York Times malice standard was inappropriate for a private person attempting to prove he was defamed on matters of public interest. As the Court explained, "[p]ublic officials and public figures usually enjoy significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence have a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals normally enjoy. Private individuals are therefore more vulnerable to injury, and the state interest in protecting them is correspondingly greater. More important, . . . [public officials and public figures] must accept certain

---

193 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

194 Id. at 279.

195 Id. at 279–80.

196 Curtis Publ'g Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 162–65 (1967) (Warren, C.J., concurring in result); id. at 170 (opinion of Justices Black and Douglas); id. at 172 (opinion of Justices Brennan and White). See also Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 343 (1974); Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157, 163–69 (1979); Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 666 (1989).

197 Curtis Publ'g Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 164 (1967).

198 See Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 (1971).

necessary consequences of their involvement in public affairs. [They] ru[n] the risk of closer public scrutiny than might otherwise be the case. . . . [And] the communications media are entitled to act on the assumption that public officials and public figures have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehood concerning them. No such assumption is justified with respect to a private individual. . . . Thus, private individuals are not only more vulnerable to injury than public officials and public figures; they are also more deserving of recovery."[199] In light of the above, the Court held that the Constitution "allows the States to impose liability on the publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood on a less demanding showing than that required by New York Times."[200] Nonetheless, the Court believed that certain significant constitutional protections are warranted in this area. First, the states cannot impose liability without requiring some showing of fault, at least negligence.[201] Second, the states may not permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages[202] on less than a showing of New York Times malice. "Under the traditional rules pertaining to actions for libel, the existence of injury is presumed from the fact of publication and juries may award substantial sums as compensation for supposed damage to reputation without any proof that such harm actually occurred. The largely uncontrolled discretion of juries to award damages where there is no loss unnecessarily compounds the potential of any system of liability for defamatory falsehood to inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Additionally, the doctrine of presumed damages invites juries to punish unpopular opinion, rather than to compensate individuals for injury sustained by the publication of a false fact. . . . Like the doctrine of presumed damages, jury discretion to award punitive damages unnecessarily exacerbates the danger of media self-censorship, but, unlike the former rule, punitive damages are wholly irrelevant to the state interest that justifies a negligence standard for private defamation actions, [since] [t]hey are not compensation for injury . . . [but] private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence."[203]

[I63] In sharp contrast to New York Times, Dun & Bradstreet involved not only a private-figure plaintiff but also speech of purely private concern. Five members of the Court found that, in a case with such a configuration of speech and plaintiff, the showing of actual malice, needed to recover presumed or punitive damages under either New York Times or Gertz, is unnecessary. As the plurality noted, in light of the reduced constitutional value of speech involving no matters of public concern, the state interest in preserving private reputation adequately supports awards of presumed and punitive damages, even absent a showing of actual malice.[204] In the same case, at least five Justices agreed that, in the context of defamation law, "the rights of the institutional media are no greater and no less than those enjoyed by other individuals or organizations engaged in the same activities."[205]

---

[199] Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 344–45 (1974).

[200] Id. at 348.

[201] Id. at 347–48.

[202] Actual injury is not limited to out-of-pocket loss but also includes impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering.

[203] Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 349–50 (1974).

[204] Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 761 (1985) (opinion of Powell, J., joined by Rehnquist and O'Connor, JJ.); id. at 764 (Burger, C.J., concurring in judgment): id. at 774 (White, J., concurring in judgment).

[205] Id. at 784 (Brennan, J., dissenting, joined by Marshall, Blackmun and Stevens. JJ.); id. at 773 (opinion of White, J.).

[I64] False Statements of Fact. The Court has recognized constitutional limits on the type of speech that may be the subject of state defamation actions. In Greenbelt, a real estate developer had engaged in negotiations with a local city council for a zoning variance on certain of his land, while simultaneously negotiating with the city on other land the city wished to purchase from him. A local newspaper published certain articles stating that some people had characterized the developer's negotiating position as "blackmail," and the developer sued for libel. Rejecting a contention that liability could be premised on the notion that the word "blackmail" implied the developer had committed the actual crime of blackmail, the Court held that the imposition of liability on such a basis was constitutionally impermissible—that as a matter of constitutional law, the word "blackmail" in these circumstances was not slander when spoken, and not libel when reported in the Greenbelt News Review. Noting that the published reports "were accurate and full," the Court reasoned that "even the most careless reader should have perceived that the word was no more than rhetorical hyperbole, a vigorous epithet used by those considering [the developer's] negotiating position extremely unreasonable."[206]

[I65] In Milkovich, the Court refused to create a wholesale defamation exemption for anything that might be labeled "opinion." In doing so, the Court stressed that "expressions of 'opinion' may often imply an assertion of objective fact." For example if a speaker says, "In my opinion John Jones is a liar," he implies a knowledge of facts that lead to the conclusion that Jones told an untruth. And such a statement can cause as much damage to reputation as the statement, "Jones is a liar." Indeed, "it would be destructive of the law of libel if a writer could escape liability for accusations of defamatory conduct simply by using, explicitly or implicitly, the words I think.'" Subsequently, the Court allowed the defamation action to go forward in that case, holding that a reasonable trier of fact could find that the so-called expressions of opinion could be interpreted as including false assertions as to factual matters.[207]

[I66] The Court also has considered the concept of falsity. In Time v. Pape, the Court reversed a libel judgment that arose out of a magazine article summarizing a report by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights discussing police civil rights abuses. The article quoted the Commission's summary of the facts surrounding an incident of police brutality, but it failed to include the Commission's qualification that these were allegations taken from a civil complaint. The Court noted that the attitude of the Commission toward the factual verity of the episodes recounted was anything but straightforward and distinguished between a "direct account of events that speak for themselves" and an article descriptive of what the Commission had reported. In taking into account the difficult choices that confront an author who departs from direct quotation and offers his own interpretation of an ambiguous source, the Court found that the defendant had not published a falsification sufficient to sustain a finding of actual malice.[208]

---

[206] Greenbelt Coop. Publ'g Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6, 13–14 (1970). See also Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 284–86 (1974) (use of the word "traitor" in literary definition of a union "scab" not basis for a defamation action under federal labor law, since used "in a loose, figurative sense" and was "merely rhetorical hyperbole, a lusty and imaginative expression of the contempt felt by union members"); Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 50 (1988) (First Amendment precluded recovery under state emotional distress action for ad parody that could not reasonably have been interpreted as stating actual facts about the public figure involved).

[207] Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1, 18–20 (1990).

[208] Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279, 285–92 (1971), discussed in Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc., 501 U.S. 496, 518 (1991).

[I67] In Bose, a Consumer Reports reviewer had attempted to describe in words the experience of listening to music through a pair of loudspeakers, and the Court concluded that the result was not an assessment of "events that speak for themselves," but "one of a number of possible rational interpretations of an event that bristled with ambiguities and descriptive challenges for the writer." Hence, the Court refused to permit recovery for choice of language that, though perhaps reflecting a misconception, represented "the sort of inaccuracy that is commonplace in the forum of robust debate to which the New York Times rule applies."[209]

[I68] "The protection for rational interpretation serves First Amendment principles by allowing an author the interpretive license that is necessary when relying upon ambiguous sources. Where, however, a writer uses a quotation, and where a reasonable reader would conclude that the quotation purports to be a verbatim repetition of a statement by the speaker, the quotation marks indicate that the author is not involved in an interpretation of the speaker's ambiguous statement, but attempting to convey what the speaker said. This orthodox use of a quotation is the quintessential 'direct account of events that speak for themselves.' . . . More accurately, the quotation allows the subject to speak for himself. . . . In some sense, any alteration of a verbatim quotation is false. But writers and reporters, by necessity, alter what people say, at the very least to eliminate grammatical and syntactical infelicities. . . . [And] [a]n interviewer who writes from notes often will engage in the task of attempting a reconstruction of the speaker's statement. . . . Even if a journalist has tape-recorded the spoken statement of a public figure, the full and exact statement will be reported in only rare circumstances. The existence of both a speaker and a reporter; the translation between two media, speech and the printed word; the addition of punctuation; and the practical necessity to edit and make intelligible a speaker's perhaps rambling comments, all make it misleading to suggest that a quotation will be reconstructed with complete accuracy. The use or absence of punctuation may distort a speaker's meaning, for example, where that meaning turns upon a speaker's emphasis of a particular word. In other cases, if a speaker makes an obvious misstatement, for example by unconscious substitution of one name for another, a journalist might alter the speaker's words but preserve his intended meaning. And conversely, an exact quotation out of context can distort meaning, although the speaker did use each reported word. . . . If every alteration constituted the falsity required to prove actual malice, the practice of journalism, which the First Amendment standard is designed to protect, would require a radical change, one inconsistent with . . . First Amendment principles."[210] For these reasons, "a deliberate alteration of the words uttered by a plaintiff does not equate with knowledge of falsity for purposes of New York Times and Gertz, unless the alteration results in a material change in the meaning conveyed by the statement. The use of quotations to attribute words not in fact spoken bears in a most important way on that inquiry, but it is not dispositive in every case."[211]

[I69] Actual Malice. The question whether the evidence in the record in a defamation case is sufficient to support a finding of actual malice is a question of law.[212] The

---

[209] Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 512–13 (1984), discussed in Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc., 501 U.S. 496, 519 (1991).

[210] Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc., 501 U.S. 496, 514–15, 519 (1991).

[211] Id. at 517. In that case, the Court found that five of the six published passages in question differed materially in meaning from the tape recorded statements so as to create an issue of fact for a jury as to falsity. Id. at 521–25.

[212] Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 685 (1989).

"actual malice" standard is not satisfied merely through a showing of ill-will or "malice" in the ordinary sense of the term.[213] Nor can the fact that the defendant published the defamatory material in order to increase its profits suffice to prove actual malice.[214] Although the mental element of "knowing or reckless disregard" required under the New York Times test is not readily captured in one infallible definition, the Court has made clear that the defendant "must have entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication."[215] The standard is a subjective one: there must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant actually had a "high degree of awareness of probable falsity."[216] "As a result, failure to investigate before publishing, even when a reasonably prudent person would have done so, is not sufficient to establish reckless disregard."[217] In a case involving the reporting of a third party's allegations, "recklessness may be found where there are obvious reasons to doubt the veracity of the informant or the accuracy of his reports."[218]

[I70] Public Officials or Figures. The "public official" designation, under New York Times, applies, "at the very least, to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs. . . . Where a position in government has such apparent importance that the public has an independent interest in the qualifications and performance of the person who holds it, beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees, . . . the New York Times malice standards apply. . . . The employee's position must be one which would invite public scrutiny and discussion of the person holding it, entirely apart from the scrutiny and discussion occasioned by the particular charges in controversy."[219]

[I71] In Gertz, the Court identified two ways in which a person may become a "public figure" for purposes of the First Amendment. "For the most part, those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved."[220]

---

[213] See Beckley Newspapers Corp. v. Hanks, 389 U.S. 81 (1967) (per curiam); Henry v. Collins, 380 U.S. 356 (1965) (per curiam).

[214] Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 667 (1989).

[215] St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, 730–31 (1968).

[216] Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74 (1964).

[217] Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 688 (1989). In Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), a four-Justice plurality suggested that a public figure need only make a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers. Id. at 155. This proposed standard, however, was emphatically rejected by a majority of the Court in favor of the stricter New York Times actual malice rule. See id. at 162 (opinion of Warren, C.J.); id. at 170 (opinion of Justices Black and Douglas); id. at 172 (opinion of Justices Brennan and White). Today, there is no question that public figure libel cases are controlled by the New York Times standard and not by the professional standards rule, which never commanded a majority of the Court. See Harte-Hanks Communications, supra, at 666.

[218] St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, 732 (1968).

[219] Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 85–86, n.13 (1966). Whether a person is a "public official," within New York Times, is not determined under state law standards. Id. at 84.

[220] Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345 (1974). "Clearly, those charged with

[I72] "A private individual is not automatically transformed into a public figure just by becoming involved in or associated with a matter that attracts public attention."[221] Gertz held that an attorney was not a public figure even though he voluntarily associated himself with a case that was certain to receive extensive media exposure. Gertz had served as an officer of local civic groups and of various professional organizations and had published several books and articles on legal subjects. Although he was consequently well known in some circles, he had achieved no general fame or notoriety in the community. As the Court emphasized, "[a]bsent clear evidence of general fame or notoriety in the community, and pervasive involvement in the affairs of society, an individual should not be deemed a public personality for all aspects of his life. [A court must focus on] the nature and extent of an individual's participation in the particular controversy giving rise to the defamation."[222] In Gertz, the attorney took no part in the criminal prosecution, never discussed the litigation with the press, and limited his participation in the civil litigation solely to his representation of a private client. "He plainly did not thrust himself into the vortex of this public issue, nor did he engage the public's attention in an attempt to influence its outcome." Hence, he could not be properly characterized as a "public figure."[223]

[I73] Firestone involved a Time report of the factual and legal basis for the divorce of a wealthy person. The Court noted that dissolution of a marriage through judicial proceedings is not the sort of "public controversy" referred to in Gertz, even though the marital difficulties of extremely wealthy individuals may be of interest to some portion of the reading public. Nor had respondent freely chosen to publicize issues as to the propriety of her married life. Hence, she was not a "public figure."[224]

[I74] The Court has rejected the proposition that "any person who engages in criminal conduct automatically becomes a public figure for purposes of comment on a limited range of issues relating to his conviction."[225] In Wolston, petitioner failed to respond to a grand jury subpoena, concerning a major investigation into the activities of Soviet intelligence agents in the United States, and then pleaded guilty to a contempt charge. However, neither the mere fact that petitioner voluntarily chose not to appear before the grand jury, knowing that this might be attended by publicity, the citation for contempt, nor the simple fact that his failure to appear and the contempt citation attracted media attention, rendered him such a public figure. His failure to appear was in no way calculated to draw attention to himself in order to invite public comment or influence the public with respect to any issue but rather appeared simply to have been the result of his poor health. And there was no evidence that his failure to appear was intended to have, or in fact had, any effect on any issue of public concern.[226] defamation cannot, by their own conduct, create their own defense by making the claimant a public figure." Regular and continuing access to the media is one of the accouterments of having become a public figure. But the fact that some media reported one's response to an alleged libel does not demonstrate that this individual was a public figure prior to the controversy. See Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 135–36 (1979).

---

221 Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157, 167 (1979).

222 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 352 (1974).

223 Id. at 352.

224 Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448, 454–55 (1976).

225 Wolston v. Reader's Digest Ass'n, 443 U.S. 157, 168 (1979).

226 Id. at 165–68.

[I75] Concern about general public expenditures is shared by most, and it relates to most public expenditures. Therefore, it is not sufficient to make everyone receiving or benefiting from the myriad public grants for research a public figure.[227]

[I76] Matters of Public Concern. "Public concern is something that is a subject of legitimate news interest; that is, a subject of general interest and of value and concern to the public at the time of publication."[228] Whether speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the expression's "content, form, and context."[229]

[I77] The Court has held that the public's interest extends to "anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office. . . . Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character. . . . [Hence,] [t]he New York Times rule is not rendered inapplicable merely because an official's private reputation, as well as his public reputation, is harmed."[230] The same is true with respect to candidates for public office. A charge of criminal conduct against an official or a candidate, no matter how remote in time or place, is always relevant to his fitness for office.[231]

[I78] In Dun & Bradstreet, a credit-reporting agency had sent a report to five subscribers indicating that a construction contractor had filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy. Five members of the Court found that the credit report concerned no public issue.[232] Justice Powell, speaking for a three-member plurality, relied primarily on the fact that the speech at issue was solely in the individual interest of the speaker and its specific business audience and also appeared to rely in part on the fact that communication was limited and confidential.[233]

[I79] Standard and Burden of Proof. The Court has determined that, both for public officials and public figures, a showing of New York Times malice is subject to a "clear and convincing" standard of proof.[234] Moreover, the Court has held that "the common law presumption that defamatory speech is false cannot stand when a plaintiff seeks damages against a media defendant for speech of public concern." The Court, thus, has fashioned "a constitutional requirement that the plaintiff bear the burden of showing

---

227 Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 135 (1979).

228 City of San Diego v. Roe, 543 U.S. 77, 83–84 (2004) (per curiam).

229 Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147 (1983).

230 Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 77 (1964).

231 Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 274, 277 (1971). As the Court noted, "[g]iven the realities of [the] political life, it is by no means easy to see what statements about a candidate might be altogether without relevance to his fitness for the office he seeks." Id. at 275.

232 Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 762 (1985) (opinion of Powell, J., joined by Rehnquist and O'Connor, JJ.); id. at 774 (White, J., concurring in judgment); id. at 764 (concurring opinion of C.J. Burger, who said that the expression in question there "related to a matter of essentially private concern").

233 Id. at 762. The four dissenters noted that credit reports constitute "commercial speech," are part of the fabric of national commercial communication, and facilitate, through the price system, the improvement of human welfare. Further, the assertion that the limited and confidential circulation might make the expression less a matter of public concern was dubious on its own terms and flatly inconsistent with Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410 (1979). Id. at 791–95, n.18.

234 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 344–45 (1974); Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc., 501 U.S. 496, 510 (1991).

falsity, as well as fault, before recovering damages." Although "requiring the plaintiff to show falsity will insulate from liability some speech that is false, but unprovably so," this result is justified on the grounds that "placement by state law of the burden of proving truth upon media defendants who publish speech of public concern deters such speech because of the fear that liability will unjustifiably result."[235] But "according an absolute privilege to the editorial process of a media defendant in a libel case is not required, authorized, or presaged by [the Court's] cases, and would substantially enhance the burden of proving actual malice, contrary to the expectations of New York Times" and its progeny.[236]

[I80] Appellate Review. In determining whether the New York Times standard has been satisfied, "the reviewing court must consider the factual record in full," in order to make sure that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression. "Although credibility determinations are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard because the trier of fact has had the opportunity to observe the demeanor of the witnesses, . . . the reviewing court must 'examine [for itself] the statements in issue and the circumstances under which they were made to see . . . whether they are of a character which the principles of the First Amendment . . . protect.'"[237] The requirement of independent appellate review "reflects a deeply held conviction that judges—and particularly Members of th[e] Court—must exercise such review in order to preserve the precious liberties established and ordained by the Constitution."[238]

[I81] Group Libel. In Beauharnais, a case decided by the narrowest of margins, the Court upheld a criminal group libel law, as applied to a publication held to be defamatory of a racial group, because of the "social interest in order and morality."[239] More specifically, Beauharnais sustained the conviction of a man who had circulated a petition calling on the Mayor and City Council of Chicago "to halt the further encroachment, harassment and invasion of white people, their property, neighborhoods and persons, by the Negro" with the statement added that "if persuasion and the need to prevent the white race from becoming mongrelized by the negro will not unite us, then the aggressions, rapes, robberies, knives, guns and marijuana of the negro, surely will." In doing so, the Court noted that, in the face of a long history of extreme racial and religious propaganda, Illinois could conclude that "willful purveyors of falsehood concerning racial and religious groups promote[d] strife and tend[ed] powerfully to obstruct the manifold adjustments required for free, ordered life in a metropolitan, polyglot community."[240]

---

[235] Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767, 776–78 (1986).

[236] Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 169 (1979).

[237] Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc. v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657, 688 (1989), quoting New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 285 (1964).

[238] Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 499, 510–11 (1984).

[239] Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 257 (1952).

[240] Id. at 259. In Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197, 1204 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, Smith v. Collin 439 U.S. 916 (1978), the Seventh Circuit observed that it might be questioned, after cases such as Cohen v. California, Gooding v. Wilson, and Brandenburg v. Ohio, whether the tendency to induce violence approach sanctioned implicitly in Beauharnais would still pass constitutional muster.

[I82] Libel on Government. "[A]n otherwise impersonal attack on governmental operations cannot be utilized to establish a libel of those administering the operations, . . . in the absence of sufficient evidence that the attack focused on the plaintiff." The plaintiff in New York Times was one of the three elected Commissioners of the City of Montgomery, Alabama. His duties included the supervision of the police department. The statements in the advertisement upon which he principally relied as referring to him were that "truckloads of police ringed the Alabama State College Campus" after a demonstration on the State Capitol steps, and that Dr. Martin Luther King had been "arrested seven times." These statements were false in that, although the police had been "deployed near the campus," they had not actually "ringed" it, and had not gone there in connection with a State Capitol demonstration, and in that Dr. King had been arrested only four times. The Court held that evidence that Sullivan, as Police Commissioner, was the supervisory head of the Police Department was constitutionally insufficient to show that the statements about police activity were "of and concerning" him. In reaching this conclusion, the Court rejected as inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments the proposition followed by the Alabama supreme court in the case that, "[i]n measuring the performance or deficiencies of . . . groups, praise or criticism is usually attached to the official in complete control of the body." "To allow the jury to connect the statements with Sullivan on that presumption alone was . . . to invite the spectre of prosecutions for libel on government, which the Constitution does not tolerate in any form."[241]

[I83] Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress. In Hustler, the Court considered whether a public figure may recover damages for emotional harm caused by the publication of an ad parody offensive to him and gross and repugnant in the eyes of most. The cartoon in question portrayed respondent—a nationally known minister and commentator on politics and public affairs—as having engaged in a drunken incestuous rendezvous with his mother in an outhouse. The parody suggested that respondent was a hypocrite who preached only when he was drunk. In small print at the bottom of the page, the ad contains the disclaimer, "ad parody—not to be taken seriously." The jury found against respondent on his libel claim when it decided that the Hustler ad parody could not "reasonably be understood as describing actual facts about [respondent] or actual events in which [he] participated." The Court stressed that "the State's interest in protecting public figures from emotional distress is not sufficient to deny First Amendment protection to speech that is patently offensive and is intended to inflict emotional injury when that speech could not reasonably have been interpreted as stating actual facts about the public figure involved." Further, it rejected respondent's argument that the caricature at issue was "outrageous." As the Court pointed out, "'[o]utrageousness' in the area of political and social discourse has an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors' tastes or views, or perhaps on the basis of their dislike of a particular expression. [Such a standard would be inconsistent with the Court's] longstanding refusal to punish speech because the speech in question may have an adverse emotional impact on the audience." The Court concluded that "public figures and public officials may not recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress by reason of publications such as the one there at issue without showing, in addition, that the publication contains a false statement of fact which was made with 'actual malice,' i.e., with knowledge that the statement was false or with reckless disregard as to whether or not it was true."[242]

---

[241] See Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 81 (1966), discussing New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 273–76, 290–92 (1964).

[I84] The Petition Clause. The First Amendment right to petition does not "include an unqualified right to express damaging falsehoods in exercise of that right." Although the values in the right of petition as an important aspect of self-government are beyond question, it does not follow that the Petition Clause provides absolute immunity from damages for libel.[243]

[I85] The Speech or Debate Clause. Hutchinson held that a member of Congress is not protected by the Speech or Debate Clause of the Constitution (Article I, Section 6) against suits for allegedly defamatory statements made by the member in press releases and newsletters. Literal reading of the Clause would, of course, confine its protection narrowly to a "Speech or Debate in either House." But the Court has given the Clause a practical, rather than a strictly literal, reading that would limit the protection to utterances made within the four walls of either Chamber. "Insofar as the Clause is construed to reach other matters, they must be an integral part of the deliberative and communicative processes by which Members participate in committee and House proceedings with respect to the consideration and passage or rejection of proposed legislation or with respect to other matters which the Constitution places within the jurisdiction of either House."[244] Thus, committee hearings are protected, even if held outside the Chambers, and committee reports are also protected.[245] The gloss going beyond a strictly literal reading of the Clause has not, however, departed from the objective of protecting only legislative activities. "Whatever imprecision there may be in the term 'legislative activities,' it is clear that nothing in history or in the explicit language of the Clause suggests any intention to create an absolute privilege from liability or suit for defamatory statements made outside the Chamber."[246] Neither newsletters nor press releases issued by members of Congress are part of the legislative process nor an essential part of that deliberative process by which members participate in committee and House proceedings. Moreover, they are not privileged as part of the "informing function" of members of Congress to tell the public about their activities. In contrast to voting and preparing committee reports, which are part of Congress' function to inform itself, newsletters and press releases are primarily means of informing those outside the legislative forum and represent the views and will of a single member.[247]

[I86] Official Immunity Doctrine. The official immunity doctrine, which has, in large part, been of judicial making, confers immunity on government officials of suitable rank for the reason that "officials of government should be free to exercise their duties unembarrassed by the fear of damage suits in respect of acts done in the course of those duties—suits which would consume time and energies which would otherwise be devoted to governmental service and the threat of which might appreciably inhibit the

---

[242] Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 50, 55–56 (1988).

[243] McDonald v. Smith, 472 U.S. 479, 484–85 (1985).

[244] Gravel v. United States, 408 U.S. 606, 625 (1972). The shield does not extend beyond what is necessary to preserve the integrity of the legislative process. See United States v. Brewster, 408 U.S. 501, 517 (1972).

[245] See Doe v. McMillan, 412 U.S. 306 (1973).

[246] Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 127 (1979).

[247] Id. at 130–33.

fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government."[248] Barr determined that the scope of immunity from defamation suits should be determined by the relation of the publication complained of to the duties entrusted to the officer. In that case, the Court immunized the acting director of the Office of Rent Stabilization from liability for an alleged libel contained in a press release announcing the director's intention to suspend subordinate officials of the same Office because of the part they had played in formulating a plan for the utilization of certain agency funds. In doing so, the Court noted that "a publicly expressed statement of the position of the agency head, announcing personnel action which he planned to take in reference to the charges . . . widely disseminated to the public, was an appropriate exercise of the discretion which an officer of that rank must possess if the public service is to function effectively," and found that the fact that the action there taken was "within the outer perimeter" of Barr's line of duty was enough to render the privilege applicable.[249]

ii. Information Privacy

[I87] "False Light" Invasion of Privacy. Publicity that places the plaintiff in a false light in the public eye is generally recognized as one of the several distinct kinds of invasions actionable under the privacy rubric. "The interest protected in permitting recovery for placing the plaintiff in a false light 'is clearly that of reputation, with the same overtones of mental distress as in defamation.'"[250] Time v. Hill involved a claim under the New York "Right of Privacy" statute that Life Magazine, in the course of reviewing a new play, had connected the play with a long-past incident involving petitioner and his family and had falsely described their experience and conduct at that time. The complaint sought damages for humiliation and suffering flowing from these non-defamatory falsehoods that allegedly invaded Hill's privacy. The Court found, however, that the opening of a new play linked to an actual incident was a matter of public interest. Further, the Court, guided by its decision in New York Times v. Sullivan, held that the constitutional protections for speech and press precluded the application of the New York statute to allow recovery for false reports of matters of public interest in the absence of proof that the defendant had published the report with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth.[251]

---

[248] Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 571 (1959).

[249] Id. at 573–75 (plurality opinion). See also id. at 576–78 (concurring opinion of Black, J.).

[250] Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broad. Co., 433 U.S. 562, 572 (1977).

[251] Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388–89 (1967). Although the jury could have reasonably concluded from the evidence in the Hill case that Life had engaged in knowing falsehood or had recklessly disregarded the truth in stating in the article that "the story re-enacted" the Hill family's experience, the Court concluded that the trial judge's instructions had not confined the jury to such a finding as a predicate for liability as required by the Constitution. Id. at 394. See also Cantrell v. Forest City Publ'g Co., 419 U.S. 245 (1974).

The Court's holding in Time v. Hill was not an extension of New York Times, but rather a parallel line of reasoning applying that standard to this discrete context. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 336, n.6 (1974).

In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 498, n.2 (1975), Justice Powell noted that the Gertz Court's "abandonment of the 'matter of general or public interest' standard as the determinative factor for deciding whether to apply the New York Times malice standard to defamation litigation brought by private individuals . . . calls into question the conceptual basis of Time v. Hill. In neither Gertz nor . . . Cantrell . . . [did the Court consider] whether a State may constitutionally apply a more relaxed standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of false

[I88] Publication of Truthful Information—Generally. The Court's decisions establish that, "absent exceptional circumstances, reputational interests alone cannot justify the proscription of truthful speech."[252] Under Daily Mail, "if a newspaper lawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance," such as the commission, and investigation, of a violent crime that had been reported to authorities, or the name of an alleged criminal, "then state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need . . . of the highest order."[253]

[I89] In Florida Star, a newspaper had been found civilly liable for publishing the name of a rape victim that it had obtained from a publicly released police report. The Court decided that this result did not comport with the First Amendment. Although the interests in protecting the privacy and safety of sexual assault victims and in encouraging them to report offenses without fear of exposure are highly significant, imposing liability on the Star in that case was too precipitous a means of advancing those interests to convince the Court that there was a "need," within the meaning of the Daily Mail formulation for Florida to take this extreme step. As the Court noted, "[w]here information is entrusted to the government, a less drastic means than punishing truthful publication almost always exists for guarding against the dissemination of private facts. . . . The government may classify certain information, establish and enforce procedures ensuring its redacted release, and extend a damages remedy against the government or its officials where the government's mishandling of sensitive information leads to its dissemination. . . . [In addition,] punishing the press for its dissemination of information which is already publicly available is relatively unlikely to advance the interests in the service of which the State seeks to act." And that Star had gained access to the information in question through a government news release made it "especially likely that, if liability were to be imposed, self-censorship would result. Reliance on a news release 'is a paradigmatically routine newspaper reporting technique.' . . . The government's issuance of such a release, without qualification, could only convey to recipients that the government considered dissemination lawful, and indeed expected the recipients to disseminate the information further." A second problem was that liability followed automatically from publication. This was so regardless of whether the identity of the victim was already known throughout the community; whether the victim had voluntarily called public attention to the offense; or whether the identity of the victim had otherwise become a reasonable subject of public concern—because, perhaps, questions had arisen whether the victim fabricated an assault by a particular person.

---

statements injurious to a private individual under a false light theory of invasion of privacy," or whether the constitutional standard announced in Time v. Hill applies to all false light cases. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 348 (1974); Cantrell v. Forest City Publ'g Co., 419 U.S. 245, 250–51 (1974).

[252] Butterworth v. Smith, 494 U.S. 624, 634 (1990).

[253] Smith v. Daily Mail Publ'g Co., 443 U.S. 97, 103 (1979). See also Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 534 (1989). In the latter case, the Court pointed out the "timidity and self-censorship" that may result from allowing the media to be punished for publishing certain truthful information. For example, a rule "depriving protection to those who rely on the government's implied representations of the lawfulness of dissemination, would force upon the media the onerous obligation of sifting through government press releases, reports, and pronouncements to prune out material arguably unlawful for publication. This situation could inhere even where the newspaper's sole object is to reproduce, with no substantial change, the government's rendition of the event in question." Id. at 535–36.

Nor was there a scienter requirement of any kind under state law, engendering the perverse result that truthful publications challenged pursuant to this cause of action were less protected by the First Amendment than even the least protected defamatory falsehoods involving purely private figures, where liability is evaluated under a standard of ordinary negligence, under Gertz. Finally the facial underinclusiveness of Florida's statute—which prohibited publication only by an "instrument of mass communication" and did not prohibit the spread of victims' names by other means—raised serious doubts about whether Florida was in fact serving the interests invoked in support of the imposition of liability on the Star. Indeed, "[w]hen a State attempts the extraordinary measure of punishing truthful publication in the name of privacy, it must demonstrate its commitment to advancing this interest by applying its prohibition evenhandedly, to the small-time disseminator as well as the media giant."[254]

[I90] In Bartnicki, the Court considered what degree of protection, if any, the First Amendment provides to speech that discloses the contents of an illegally intercepted communication. A federal criminal statute, aimed to protect effectively the privacy of wire and oral communications, applied, inter alios, to any person who "willfully intercepts . . . any wire or oral communication" or "willfully discloses or endeavors to disclose to any other person the contents of any wire or oral communication, knowing or having reason to know that the information was obtained through the interception of a wire or oral communication in violation of this subsection." The case involved the repeated intentional disclosure of an illegally intercepted cellular telephone conversation about a public issue, more specifically about collective bargaining negotiations between a teachers' union and a school board. The radio commentator who made the disclosures did not participate in the interception, but he did know—or at least had reason to know—that the interception was unlawful. The Court began its analysis by stressing that the statutory prohibition of interception of oral communications was a content-neutral provision of general applicability. On the other hand, the naked prohibition against disclosures was a regulation of pure speech. The government identified two interests served by the prohibition of disclosures. First it invoked the interest in removing an incentive for parties to intercept private conversations. However, as the Court noted, "[t]he normal method of deterring unlawful conduct is to impose an appropriate punishment on the person who engages in it. . . . I[t] would be quite remarkable to hold that speech by a law-abiding possessor of information can be suppressed in order to deter conduct by a non-law-abiding third party. Although there are some rare occasions in which a law suppressing one party's speech may be justified by an interest in deterring criminal conduct by another" (see, e.g., New York v. Ferber, regarding a ban of distribution of child pornography), this was not such a case.[255] There was no evidence that Congress viewed the prohibition against disclosures as a response to the difficulty of identifying persons making improper use of scanners and other surveillance devices and accordingly of deterring such conduct, and there was no empirical evidence to support the assumption that the prohibition against disclosures would reduce the number of illegal interceptions. Accordingly, the government's first suggested justification for applying the challenged prohibition to an otherwise innocent disclosure of public information was plainly insufficient. The government's second asserted interest—minimizing the harm to persons whose conversations had been illegally intercepted—was considerably stronger. "Privacy of communication is an important interest," and the statute's restrictions were intended to protect that interest, thereby "encouraging the uninhibited exchange of ideas and information among private parties. . . . Moreover, the fear of public disclosure of private conversations might well have a chilling effect on private speech."[256] Hence, the case presented "a conflict between interests of the highest order—on the one hand, the interest in the full and free dissemination of information concerning public issues, and, on the other hand, the interest in individual privacy and, more specifically, in fostering private speech."[257] In considering that balance, the Court acknowledged that "some intrusions on privacy are more offensive than others, and that the disclosure of the contents of a private conversation can be an even greater intrusion on privacy than the interception itself. As a result, there is a valid independent justification for prohibiting such disclosures by persons who lawfully obtained access to the contents of an illegally intercepted message, even if that prohibition does not play a significant role in preventing such interceptions from occurring in the first place."[258] Nevertheless, the Court did not have to decide whether that interest was strong enough to justify the application of the provision at issue to disclosures of trade secrets or domestic gossip or other information of purely private concern. The enforcement of the provision in that case implicated "the core purposes of the First Amendment because it impose[d] sanctions on the publication of truthful information of public concern. In this case, privacy concerns gave way when balanced against the interest in publishing matters of public importance, . . . [since] [o]ne of the costs associated with participation in public affairs is an attendant loss of privacy."[259] The profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide open had supported the Court's holding, in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, that factual error and defamatory content do not suffice to remove the First Amendment shield from criticism of official conduct. The Court concluded that parallel reasoning required the holding that "a stranger's illegal conduct does not suffice to remove the First Amendment shield from speech about a matter of public concern."[260]

---

254 Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 534–35, 539–40 (1989).

255 Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514, 530 (2001).

[I91] Privacy Interests in Judicial Proceedings.[261] In the criminal trial context, when a state attempts "to inhibit the disclosure of sensitive information, it must be shown that the denial is necessitated by a compelling governmental interest, and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest."[262] The compelling state interest in safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of minors cannot justify a statute mandating exclusion of the press and public during the testimony of a minor victim in a sex-offense trial. It is "clear that the circumstances of the particular case may affect the significance of that interest," which can be served just as well by requiring the trial court to determine on a case-by-case basis whether the state's legitimate concern for the well-being of the minor victim necessitates closure. "Among the factors to be weighed are the minor victim's

---

256 Id. at 532–33.

257 Id. at 518.

258 Id. at 533.

259 Id. at 533–34.

260 Id. at 535.

261 See also para. I259 (grand jury proceedings).

262 Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court for Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 606–07 (1982).

age, psychological maturity and understanding, the nature of the crime, the desires of the victim, and the interests of parents and relatives."[263]

[I92] "By placing . . . information in the public domain on official court records, the State must be presumed to have concluded that the public interest is thereby being served. Public records, by their very nature, are of interest to those concerned with the administration of government, and a public benefit is performed by the reporting of the true contents of the records by the media. . . . [Hence,] the First and Fourteenth Amendments [do] not allow exposing the press to liability for truthfully publishing information released to the public in official court records. If there are privacy interests to be protected in judicial proceedings, the States must respond by means which avoid public documentation or other exposure of private information."[264] Under these considerations, Cox Broadcasting found unconstitutional a civil damages award entered against a television station for broadcasting the name of a rape-murder victim, which the station had obtained from courthouse records.

[I93] "Those who see and hear what transpired [in the courtroom] can report it with impunity."[265] In Oklahoma Publishing, the Court struck down a state court's pre-trial order enjoining the media from publishing the name or photograph of an 11-year-old boy who was being tried before a juvenile court. The juvenile court judge had permitted reporters and other members of the public to attend a hearing in the case notwithstanding a state statute closing such trials to the public. The court then attempted to halt publication of the information obtained from that hearing. But since the name and picture of the juvenile had been publicly revealed in connection with the prosecution of the crime, the state court's order abridged the freedom of the press in violation of the Constitution.[266]

[I94] In Smith v. Daily Mail, the Court found unconstitutional the indictment of two newspapers for violating a state statute forbidding newspapers to publish, without written approval of the juvenile court, the name of any youth charged as a juvenile offender. The papers had learned about a shooting by monitoring a police band radio frequency, and had obtained the name of the alleged juvenile assailant from witnesses, the police, and a local prosecutor. The sole interest advanced by the state to justify its criminal statute was to protect the anonymity of the juvenile offender. The Court held that the magnitude of the state's interest in this statute was not sufficient to justify application of a criminal penalty to respondents. Moreover, the statute did not restrict the electronic media or any form of publication, except "newspapers," from printing the names of youths charged in a juvenile proceeding. Thus, even assuming the statute served a state interest of the highest order, it did not accomplish its stated purpose. In addition, there was no evidence to demonstrate that the imposition of criminal penalties was necessary to protect the confidentiality of juvenile proceedings.[267]

[I95] "The jury selection process may, in some circumstances, give rise to legitimate privacy interests of a prospective juror when interrogation touches on deeply personal matters that person has legitimate reasons for keeping out of the public domain." For

---

263 Id. at 607–08.

264 Cox Broad. Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 495–96 (1975).

265 Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 374 (1947).

266 Oklahoma Publ'g Co. v. District Court, 430 U.S. 308, 311–12 (1977) (per curiam).

267 Smith v. Daily Mail Publ'g Co., 443 U.S. 97, 103–05 (1979).

example, a prospective juror in a rape case may have been raped or declined to seek prosecution because of the embarrassment and emotional trauma from the very disclosure of the episode. The privacy interests of such a prospective juror must be balanced against the need for openness of the voir dire process. "To preserve fairness and at the same time protect legitimate privacy, a trial judge must at all times maintain control of the process of jury selection, and should inform the array of prospective jurors, once the general nature of sensitive questions is made known to them, that those individuals believing public questioning will prove damaging because of embarrassment, may properly request an opportunity to present the problem to the judge in camera but with counsel present and on the record. By requiring the prospective juror to make an affirmative request, the trial judge can ensure that there is in fact a valid basis for a belief that disclosure infringes a significant interest in privacy. This process will minimize the risk of unnecessary closure. The exercise of sound discretion by the court may lead to excusing such a person from jury service. When limited closure is ordered, the constitutional values sought to be protected by holding open proceedings may be satisfied later by making a transcript of the closed proceedings available within a reasonable time, if the judge determines that disclosure can be accomplished while safeguarding the juror's valid privacy interests. Even then a valid privacy right may rise to a level that part of the transcript should be sealed, or the name of a juror withheld, to protect the person from embarrassment."[268]

[I96] "[P]retrial discovery by depositions and interrogatories has a significant potential for abuse. This abuse is not limited to matters of delay and expense; discovery also may seriously implicate privacy interests of litigants and third parties. . . . There is an opportunity . . . for litigants to obtain—incidentally or purposefully—information that not only is irrelevant but, if publicly released, could be damaging to reputation and privacy. The government clearly has a substantial interest in preventing this sort of abuse of its processes." In light of these considerations, the Court held in Seattle Times that a newspaper, which was itself a defendant in a libel action, could be restrained from publishing material about the plaintiffs and their supporters to which it had gained access through court-ordered discovery.[269]

---

[268] Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 464 U.S. 501, 511–12 (1984). In Capital Cities Media, Inc. v. Toole, 463 U.S. 1303, 1306–307 (1983), Justice Brennan granted a stay of a trial court judge's order prohibiting publication of the names or addresses of jurors who served in a homicide trial. The order, entered after the jurors had been selected in open voir dire proceedings at which their names were not kept confidential, was not restricted to the time during which the trial was conducted, but, on its face, it permanently prohibited publishing the jurors' names or addresses. The jury ultimately returned a guilty verdict and was discharged. As Brennan noted, "the State's interest . . . in shielding jurors from pressure during the course of the trial, so as to ensure the defendant a fair trial, . . . becomes attenuated after the jury brings in its verdict and is discharged. . . . As for the State's concern for the jurors' privacy, [the Court does not permit] restrictions on the publication of information that would have been available to any member of the public who attended an open proceeding. In an extraordinary case, such a restriction might be justified, but the justifications must be adduced on a case-by-case basis, with all interested parties given the opportunity to participate, and less restrictive alternatives must be adopted if feasible." However, the order at issue had been entered without a hearing and without findings of fact that would justify it.

[269] Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, 467 U.S. 20, 34–35 (1984).

[I97] Appropriation of a Right of Publicity—Copyright. The "actual malice" standard does not apply to the tort of "appropriation of a right of publicity." In Zacchini, a performer sued a news organization for appropriation of his right to the publicity value of his performance, after it broadcast the entirety of his act on local television. The Court held that the First Amendment did not bar such a suit for damages. The state's decision to protect petitioner's right of publicity "rest[ed] on more than a desire to compensate the performer for the time and effort invested in his act; the protection provide[d] an economic incentive for him to make the investment required to produce a performance of interest to the public." This same consideration underlies the patent and copyright laws long enforced by the Court. Nor did the Court think that a state law damages remedy against respondent would represent a species of liability without fault contrary to the letter or spirit of Gertz. Respondent knew that petitioner objected to televising his act but, nevertheless, displayed the entire film. However, at the same time, the Court made clear that its holding did not extend to the reporting of information about an event of public interest. As the Court noted, "if . . . respondent had merely reported that petitioner was performing at the fair and described or commented on his act, with or without showing his picture on television, [it would be] a very different case." The Court concluded that, although the state might, as a matter of its own law, privilege the press in the circumstances of this case, the First and Fourteenth Amendments did not require it to do so.[270]

[I98] The Copyright Clause (U. S. Constitution, Article I, Section 8, Clause 8) provides that "Congress shall have Power . . . [t]o promote the Progress of Science . . . by securing [to Authors] for limited Times . . . the exclusive Right to their . . . Writings." The Copyright Clause and First Amendment were adopted close in time. "This proximity indicates that, in the Framers' view, copyright's limited monopolies are compatible with free speech principles. Indeed, copyright's purpose is to promote the creation and publication of free expression."[271] As Harper & Row observed, "the Framers intended copyright itself to be the engine of free expression. By establishing a marketable right to the use of one's expression, copyright supplies the economic incentive to create and disseminate ideas."[272]

[I99] "In addition to spurring the creation and publication of new expression, copyright law contains built-in First Amendment accommodations."[273] First, the Copyright Act distinguishes between ideas and expression and makes only the latter eligible for copyright protection: "In no case does copyright protection for an original work of authorship extend to any idea, procedure, process, system, method of operation, concept, principle, or discovery, regardless of the form in which it is described, explained, illustrated, or embodied in such work." This "idea/expression dichotomy strikes a definitional balance between the First Amendment and the Copyright Act by permitting free communication of facts while still protecting an author's expression."[274] Second,

---

[270] Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broad. Co., 433 U.S. 562, 569, 576–79 (1977).

[271] Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 219 (2003).

[272] Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enters., 471 U.S. 539, 558 (1985).

[273] Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 219 (2003).

[274] Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enters., 471 U.S. 539, 556 (1985). Due to this distinction, every idea, theory, and fact in a copyrighted work becomes instantly available for public exploitation at the moment of publication. See Feist Publ'ns v. Rural Tel. Serv. Co., 499 U.S. 340, 349–50 (1991).

under the federal legislation, "[T]he fair use of a copyrighted work, including such use by reproduction in copies . . . , for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching (including multiple copies for classroom use), scholarship, or research, is not an infringement of copyright." Hence, "the 'fair use' defense allows the public to use not only facts and ideas contained in a copyrighted work, but also expression itself in certain circumstances;"[275] it affords considerable "latitude for scholarship and comment"[276] "and even for parody."[277] "In view of the First Amendment protections already embodied in the Copyright Act's distinction between copyrightable expression and uncopyrightable facts and ideas, and the latitude for scholarship and comment traditionally afforded by fair use," the Court has seen "no warrant for expanding the doctrine of fair use to create what amounts to a public figure exception to copyright."[278]

[I100] Eldred emphasized that, "when speakers assert the right to make other people's speeches," the foregoing statutory free speech safeguards are generally adequate to address First Amendment concerns. Copyrights are not "categorically immune from challenges under the First Amendment," but when "Congress has not altered the traditional contours of copyright protection, further First Amendment scrutiny is unnecessary."[279]

c. Unwelcome and Offensive Speech[280]

i. In General

[I101] A principal "function of free speech . . . is to invite dispute. It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with

---

[275] Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 219 (2003).

[276] Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enters., 471 U.S. 539, 560 (1985).

[277] Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 220 (2003), citing Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music, 510 U.S. 569 (1994) (rap group's musical parody of Roy Orbison's "Oh, Pretty Woman" may be fair use).

The 1998 Copyright Term Extension Act supplemented these traditional First Amendment safeguards. First, it allowed libraries, archives, and similar institutions to "reproduce" and "distribute, display, or perform in facsimile or digital form" copies of certain published works "during the last 20 years of any term of copyright . . . for purposes of preservation, scholarship, or research" if the work was not already being exploited commercially and further copies were unavailable at a reasonable price. Second, it exempted small businesses, restaurants, and like entities from having to pay performance royalties on music played from licensed radio, television, and similar facilities.

[278] Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enters., 471 U.S. 539, 556 (1985). The Court concluded that "[w]hether verbatim copying from a public figure's manuscript in a given case is or is not fair must be judged according to the traditional equities of fair use." Id. at 560. In that case, the Court found that a weekly magazine of political commentary had infringed former President Ford's copyright in the unpublished manuscript of his memoirs by verbatim excerpting of some 300 words from the work. The Court rejected the argument that the excerpting constituted fair use, noting the significance of the quotations, which amounted to "the heart of the book," the part most likely to be newsworthy and important in licensing serialization. The Court also pointed out that President Ford could not prevent others from copying bare historical facts from his autobiography, but that he could prevent others from copying his "subjective descriptions and portraits of public figures."

[279] Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 221 (2003).

[280] See also paras. I58 et seq. (defamation); paras. I123 et seq. (sexually explicit speech); paras. I213, I214 (offensive speech in public schools).

conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger."[281] "If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable."[282] And the state "has no legitimate interest in protecting any or all religions from views distasteful to them."[283] "Thus, the First Amendment ordinarily denies a State the power to prohibit dissemination of social, economic and political doctrine which a vast majority of its citizens believes to be false and fraught with evil consequence."[284]

ii. Breach of Peace—"Fighting" Words[285]

[I102] The Court has "not permitted the government to assume that every expression of [an offensive or] a provocative idea will disturb the peace, but ha[s] instead required careful consideration of the actual circumstances surrounding such expression, asking whether the expression 'is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action.'"[286] Under Chaplinsky, a state may punish those words that "by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace."[287] Indeed, the Court has held that "'fighting words,' those personally abusive epithets that, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction," are generally proscribable under the First Amendment.[288] However, the Court's "fighting words" cases have made clear that "[t]he mere fact that expressive activity causes hurt feelings, offense, or resentment does not render the expression unprotected;"[289] "[a]s a general matter, [the Court has] indicated that in public debate citizens must tolerate insulting, and even outrageous, speech in order to provide adequate breathing space to the freedoms protected by the First Amendment."[290] The reason why fighting words are categorically excluded from the protection of the First Amendment is that "their content embodies a particularly intolerable (and socially unnecessary) mode of expressing whatever idea the speaker wishes to convey."[291] Similarly, words that create an immediate panic are not entitled to constitutional protection.[292]

---

281 Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 4 (1949).

282 Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 317, 414 (1989).

283 Joseph Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 505 (1952). As the Court emphasized, "it is not the business of government . . . to suppress real or imagined attacks upon a particular religious doctrine." See also Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308–11 (1940).

284 Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 358 (2003).

285 See also paras. E68–E69 (void for vagueness doctrine).

286 Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 317, 409 (1989), quoting Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969).

287 Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 (1942).

288 Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971). A statement that is not directed to any person or group in particular does not fall within the category of "fighting words." See Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 107 (1973).

289 R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 414 (1992) (White, J., concurring), citing United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310, 319 (1990); Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 409, 414 (1989); Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 55–56 (1988); Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105, 107–08 (1973); Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971); Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576, 592 (1969).

290 Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of W. N.Y., 519 U.S. 357, 383 (1997).

291 R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 386, 393 (1992).

292 NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 927 (1982), citing Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919) ("the most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic").

[I103] In Chaplinsky, the Court sustained a conviction under a state statute that provided: "No person shall address any offensive, derisive or annoying word to any other person who is lawfully in any street or other public place, nor call him by any offensive or derisive name." Chaplinsky was convicted for addressing to a local marshal on a public sidewalk the words, "You are a God damned racketeer," and "a damned Fascist and the whole government of Rochester are Fascists or agents of Fascists." Long before the words for which Chaplinsky was convicted, the state supreme court had sharply limited the statutory language "offensive, derisive or annoying word" to words that had a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the person to whom, individually, the remark was addressed. In view of that authoritative construction, the Court held that the statute was sufficiently definite and specific to comply with the requirements of due process of law, and, as applied to Chaplinsky's utterances, did not unduly impair liberty of expression.[293]

[I104] Since Chaplinsky, the Court has consistently construed the "fighting words" exception narrowly. In Gooding, the defendant was convicted under a Georgia statute, which provided that any person "who shall, without provocation, use to or of another, and in his presence . . . opprobrious words or abusive language, tending to cause a breach of the peace . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The Court found the proscription of the use of "opprobrious or abusive language," embraced words "conveying or intended to convey disgrace," and included "harsh insulting language." Georgia appellate decisions had construed the statute to apply to utterances that, although within these definitions, were not words, "which by their very utterance tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." For example, a conviction under the statute had been sustained for awakening ten women scout leaders on a camp-out by shouting "Boys, this is where we are going to spend the night. Get the God damn bed rolls out." Accordingly, the Court held that the statute was impermissibly overbroad and vague.[294]

[I105] Lewis and Hill made clear that the First Amendment "protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers."[295] In Lewis, the appellant was found to have yelled obscenities and threats at an officer who had asked appellant's husband to produce his driver's license. Appellant was convicted under a municipal ordinance that made it a crime "for any person wantonly to curse or revile or to use obscene or opprobrious language toward or with reference to any member of the city police while in the actual performance of his duty." The Court vacated the conviction and invalidated the ordinance as facially overbroad. Critical to the Court's decision was the fact that the ordinance punished only "spoken words," and was not limited in scope to fighting words that "by their very utterance, inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace."[296] Moreover, in a concurring opinion in Lewis, Justice Powell suggested that the "fighting words" exception may require a narrower application in cases involving words addressed to a police officer, because "a properly trained officer may reasonably be expected to 'exercise a higher degree of restraint' than the average citizen, and thus be less likely to respond belligerently to 'fighting words.'"[297] The Houston ordinance at issue in Hill was much more sweeping than the municipal ordinance struck down in Lewis. It was not limited to fighting words nor even to obscene or opprobrious language, and was not narrowly tailored to ban only disor-

---

293 Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 573–74 (1942).

294 Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518, 520–21 (1972)

295 City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 461(1987).

296 Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130, 133–34 (1974).

297 Id. at 135.

derly conduct but prohibited speech that "in any manner . . . interrupt[ed]" a police officer during an investigation. In invalidating the ordinance as substantially overbroad, the Court emphasized that "the freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state."[298]

[I106] In Cohen, a sharply divided Court upheld the right to express an anti-draft viewpoint in a public place, albeit in terms highly offensive to most citizens. That case arose when Paul Cohen entered a Los Angeles courthouse wearing a jacket emblazoned with the words "F__ the Draft." After entering the courtroom, he took the jacket off and folded it. That portion of the statute upon which Cohen's conviction rested indiscriminately swept within its prohibitions all "offensive conduct" disturbing the peace of "any neighborhood or person." In holding that criminal sanctions could not be imposed on Cohen for his political statement in a public place, the Court rejected the argument that his speech would offend unwilling viewers. As the Court noted, while "government may properly act in many situations to prohibit intrusion into the privacy of the home of unwelcome views and ideas which cannot be totally banned from the public dialogue, . . . [people are] often 'captives' outside the sanctuary of the home and subject to objectionable speech. . . . The ability of government, consonant with the Constitution, to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Any broader view of this authority would effectively empower a majority to silence dissidents simply as a matter of personal predilections. In this regard, persons confronted with Cohen's jacket were in a quite different posture than those subjected to the raucous emissions of sound trucks blaring outside their residences. Those in the Los Angeles courthouse could effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes."[299] Moreover, there was no evidence that persons powerless to avoid appellant's conduct did, in fact, object to it. In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that the fact that some unwilling "listeners" in the courthouse might have been briefly exposed to Cohen's message couldn't serve to justify this breach of the peace conviction.

[I107] In Rosenfeld, appellant appeared and spoke at a public school board meeting that was held in an auditorium and was attended by more than 150 men, women, and children of mixed ethnic and racial backgrounds. It was estimated that there were approximately 40 children and 25 women present at the meeting. During his speech, appellant used the adjective "M__ f__" on four different occasions while concluding his remarks. Testimony varied as to what particular nouns were joined with this adjective, but they were said to include teachers, the community, the school system, the schoolboard, the country, the county, and the town. Rosenfeld was convicted under a New Jersey statute that provided: "Any person who utters loud and offensive or profane or indecent language in any public street or other public place, public conveyance or place to which the public is invited . . . is a disorderly person." The New Jersey Supreme Court, had placed the following limiting construction on the New Jersey statute: "[T]he words must be spoken loudly, in a public place and must be of such a nature as to be likely to incite the hearer to an immediate breach of the peace or to be likely, in the light of the gender and age of the listener and the setting of the utterance, to affect the sensibilities of a hearer. The words must be spoken with the intent to have the above effect or with a reckless disregard of the probability of the above consequences." The Court summarily vacated and remanded the case for reconsideration in the light of Cohen v. California and Gooding v. Wilson.[300]

---

[298] City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 462–63 (1987). At the same time, the Court admitted that a municipality constitutionally may punish, under a properly tailored statute, an individual who chooses to stand near a police officer and persistently attempt to engage the officer in conversation while the officer is directing traffic at a busy intersection. See id. at 462, n.11.

[299] Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 21 (1971).

[I108] In Street, the defendant had been convicted for shouting "we don't need no damned flag." The Court reversed the conviction, noting, inter alia, that the public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers, and that Street's remarks "were not so inherently inflammatory as to come within that small class of 'fighting words' which are 'likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace.'"[301] Similarly, in Johnson, the Court held that that Texas' interest in maintaining order did not justify respondent's conviction for flag desecration, since this interest was not implicated on the facts and circumstances of the case, under which no disturbance of the peace had actually occurred or threatened to occur because of Johnson's generalized expression of dissatisfaction with the policies of the federal government.[302]

iii. Hostile Audiences

[I109] Terminiello grew out of an address petitioner delivered in an auditorium in Chicago under the auspices of the Christian Veterans of America. The meeting commanded considerable public attention. The auditorium was filled to capacity, with over 800 persons present. Others were turned away. Outside of the auditorium, a crowd of about 1,000 persons gathered to protest against the meeting. A cordon of policemen was assigned to the meeting to maintain order, but they were not able to prevent several disturbances. The crowd outside was angry and turbulent. Petitioner, in his speech, condemned the conduct of the crowd outside and vigorously, if not viciously, criticized various political and racial groups whose activities he denounced as inimical to the nation's welfare. Subsequently, Terminiello was convicted under a city ordinance that, as construed by the state court, punished an utterance as a breach of the peace "if it stirs the public to anger, invites dispute, brings about a condition of unrest, or creates a disturbance." The Court set aside the conviction, saying: "Speech is often provocative and challenging. It may strike at prejudices and preconceptions and have profound unsettling effects as it presses for acceptance of an idea. That is why freedom of speech, though not absolute, . . . is nevertheless protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest."[303] The Chicago ordinance, as construed by the trial court, seriously invaded this province.

---

[300] Rosenfeld v. New Jersey, 408 U.S. 901 (1972). The dissenters noted that the exception to First Amendment protection recognized in Chaplinsky extends to "the willful use of scurrilous language calculated to offend the sensibilities of an unwilling audience" and that "a verbal assault on an unwilling audience may be so grossly offensive and emotionally disturbing as to be the proper subject of criminal proscription." Id. at 905–06.

[301] Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576, 592 (1969).

[302] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 317, 408–10 (1989).

[303] Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 4 (1949).

[I110] In Feiner, petitioner made an inflammatory speech to a mixed crowd of 80 black and white people on a city street. He made derogatory remarks about President Truman, the American Legion, and local political officials, endeavored to arouse the blacks against the whites, and urged that African-Americans rise up in arms and fight for equal rights. The crowd, which blocked the sidewalk and overflowed into the street, became restless; its feelings for and against the speaker were rising, there was some pushing, shoving, and milling around, and there was at least one threat of violence. After observing the situation for some time without interference, police officers, in order to prevent a fight, thrice requested petitioner to get off the box and stop speaking. After his third refusal, and after he had been speaking over 30 minutes, they arrested him, and he was convicted of disorderly conduct. The Court acknowledged that "the ordinary murmurings and objections of a hostile audience cannot be allowed to silence a speaker." Nevertheless, it sustained the conviction, stressing that "when the speaker passes the bounds of argument or persuasion and undertakes incitement to riot, [the police are not] powerless to prevent a breach of the peace."[304]

[I111] Forsyth County involved an assembly and parade ordinance that authorized a county official to exercise discretion in setting the amount of the permit fee. In order to assess accurately the cost of security for parade participants, the administrator should "necessarily examine the content of the message . . . conveyed, . . . estimate the response of others to that content, and judge the number of police necessary to meet that response. The fee assessed [would] depend on the administrator's measure of the amount of hostility likely to be created by the speech based on its content." The Court invalidated this content-based ordinance, stressing, inter alia, that "[s]peech cannot be financially burdened, any more than it can be punished or banned, simply because it might offend a hostile mob."[305]

iv. Captive Audiences[306]

[I112] "In our pluralistic society, constantly proliferating new and ingenious forms of expression, 'we are inescapably captive audiences for many purposes.' . . . Much that we encounter offends our esthetic, political or moral sensibilities."[307] The unwilling listener's interest in avoiding unwanted communication is an aspect of the broader "right to be let alone."[308] But the Constitution does not permit government to decide which types of otherwise protected speech are sufficiently offensive to require protection for the unwilling listener or viewer. Rather, the burden normally falls upon the individual simply to avoid unwelcome speech.[309] "The First Amendment permits the government to prohibit offensive speech as intrusive only when the 'captive' audience cannot avoid the objectionable speech;"[310] "[a] less stringent analysis would permit the government to slight the First Amendment's role 'in affording the public access to discussion, debate, and the dissemination of information and ideas.'"[311]

---

304 Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315, 320–21 (1951).

305 Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 134–35 (1992).

306 See also paras. I347 et seq. (anti-noise regulations).

307 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 210 (1975).

308 Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 716 (2000).

309 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 210–11 (1975).

310 Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 487 (1988), citing Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530, 542 (1980).

311 Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530, 541 (1980), quoting First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 783 (1978).

[I113] The Court has held that the government may make every householder "the final judge of what will cross his threshold" and may permit him "to exercise control over unwanted mail."[312] Nevertheless, the Court has "never held that the Government itself can shut off the flow of mailings to protect those recipients who might potentially be offended."[313] The occupants of a household receiving mailings are not a captive audience. All the recipient of objectionable mailings need do is to take "the short, though regular, journey from mail box to trash can. . . . [This] is an acceptable burden at least so far as the Constitution is concerned."[314]

[I114] In public locations, unwilling viewers may avert their eyes in order to avoid a visual message. Even in a public forum, one of the reasons the Court tolerates a protester's right to wear a jacket expressing his opposition to government policy in vulgar language is because offended viewers can "effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes."[315] Similarly, a court may not enjoin the pickets of an abortion clinic from using images observable by patients inside the clinic, because even if the patients find the expression contained in such images disagreeable, it is easy for the clinic "to pull its curtains."[316]

[I115] "The right to avoid unwelcome speech has special force in the privacy of the home, . . . and its immediate surroundings."[317] The target of a focused residential picketing is a "captive." "The resident is figuratively, and perhaps literally, trapped within the home, and, because of the unique and subtle impact of such picketing, is left with no ready means of avoiding the unwanted speech."[318] Thus, the government may prohibit picketing focused on, and taking place in front of, a particular residence.[319]

[I116] "[B]roadcasting is 'uniquely pervasive,' can intrude on the privacy of the home without prior warning as to program content, and is 'uniquely accessible to children, even those too young to read.'"[320] Hence, patently offensive radio broadcasts may be prohibited.[321]

[I117] The right to avoid unwanted communication can also be protected in confrontational settings. A speaker does not have "an unqualified constitutional right to follow and harass an unwilling listener, especially one on his way to work or to receive

---

312 Rowan v. Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728, 736 (1970).

313 Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 72 (1983).

314 Id. at 72. There the Court found that the government may not ban potentially "offensive" and "intrusive" direct mail advertisements for contraceptives. See also Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530 (1980), where the Court invalidated an order that prohibited the inclusion by a public utility company in monthly bills of inserts discussing controversial issues of public policy.

315 Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 21–22 (1971). See also Erznoznik v. Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 210–11, n.6 (1975), where the Court invalidated a prohibition on the showing of films containing nudity on screens visible from the street.

316 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 773 (1994).

317 Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 717 (2000).

318 Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 487 (1988).

319 Id. at 487–88.

320 Sable Communications of California v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 492 U.S. 115, 127 (1989), quoting Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 748–49 (1978).

321 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 750–51 (1978).

medical services."[322] Thus, the Court has held that a state may make it unlawful for any person within 100 feet of a health care facility's entrance to knowingly approach within eight feet of another person, without that person's consent, in order to pass a leaflet or handbill to, display a sign to, or engage in oral protest, education, or counseling with that person.[323]

[I118] Bus and streetcar passengers constitute a captive audience; they are "there as a matter of necessity, not of choice."[324] Visual messages in municipal streetcars are "constantly before the eyes of [commuters] to be seen without the exercise of choice or volition on their part."[325] Hence, under Lehman, a city is not required to accept or permit any political advertising in its vehicles.[326] However, Pollak explicitly rejected a claim that the broadcasting of radio programs in streetcars violated the First and Fifth Amendment rights of passengers who did not wish to listen to those programs. In so holding, the Court noted, inter alia, that the radio programs had not been used for objectionable propaganda but consisted generally of 90 percent music, 5 percent commercial advertising, and 5 percent announcements explanatory and commendatory of streetcar services, and that the broadcasts did not interfere with the general public convenience, comfort, and safety.[327]

v. Threats of Violence—Hate Speech[328]

[I119] The First Amendment permits a state to ban true threats of violence. "'True threats' encompass those statements where the speaker means to communicate a serious expression of an intent to commit an act of unlawful violence to a particular individual or group of individuals."[329] Hence, a "political hyperbole" is not a true threat. In Watts, the petitioner had been convicted of violating a 1917 statute prohibiting any person from "knowingly and willfully . . . [making] any threat to take the life of or to inflict bodily harm upon the President of the United States." During a public rally at the Washington Monument, petitioner stated in a small discussion group: "If they ever make me carry a rifle, the first man I want to get in my sights is L.B.J." The Court found that the statute under which petitioner had been convicted was constitutional on its face, for it furthered the overwhelming government interest in protecting the safety of the Chief Executive and in allowing him to perform his duties without interference from threats of physical violence. Nevertheless, a statute such as that one, which made criminal a form of pure speech, should be interpreted with the commands of the First Amendment clearly in mind. Subsequently, the Court held that petitioner's statement, even if willfully and knowingly made, did not fit within the statutory term of "threat," since it was not a "true threat," but merely "a kind of very crude offensive method of stating a political opposition to the President."[330]

---

[322] Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 781 (1994) (Stevens, J., concurring and dissenting).

[323] Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 717–18 (2000).

[324] Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298, 302 (1974) (plurality opinion).

[325] Id. at 307–08 (Douglas, J., concurring).

[326] Id. at 302–04 (plurality opinion); id. at 305–08 (Douglas, J., concurring).

[327] Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451, 463–66 (1952).

[328] See also para. I81 (criminal group libel statute).

[329] Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 359 (2003).

[330] Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705, 707–08 (1969) (per curiam). Cf. Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 387 (1987) (see para. I204).

[I120] "[A] prohibition on true threats 'protect[s] individuals from the fear of violence' and 'from the disruption that fear engenders,' in addition to protecting people 'from the possibility that the threatened violence will occur;' [hence,] [t]he speaker need not actually intend to carry out the threat [of violence.] . . . Intimidation in the constitutionally proscribable sense of the word is a type of true threat, where a speaker directs a threat to a person or group of persons with the intent of placing the victim in fear of bodily harm or death."[331] Burning a cross in the United States is inextricably intertwined with the history of the Ku Klux Klan. The Klan has often used cross burnings as a tool of intimidation and a threat of impending violence, although such burnings have also remained potent symbols of shared group identity and ideology, serving as a central feature of Klan gatherings. "To this day, regardless of whether the message is a political one or is also meant to intimidate, the burning of a cross is a 'symbol of hate.' . . . [W]hile cross burning does not inevitably convey a message of intimidation, often the cross burner intends that the recipients of the message fear for their lives. And when a cross burning is used to intimidate, few if any messages are more powerful."[332] Under these considerations, Virginia v. Black upheld a Virginia statute making it a felony "for any person, with the intent of intimidating any person or group, to burn a cross on the property of another, a highway or other public place," noting that, "[i]nstead of prohibiting all intimidating messages, [a state] may choose to regulate this subset of intimidating activities, in light of cross burning's long and pernicious history as a signal of impending violence."[333]

[I121] Unlike the statute at issue in Virginia v. Black, the provision invalidated in R.A.V. singled out for opprobrium only hate speech directed toward one of the statutorily specified disfavored topics. More specifically R.A.V. involved a local ordinance, which pro-

---

[331] Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 360 (2003), quoting R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 388 (1992).

[332] Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 357 (2003).

[333] Id. at 363. The Virginia statute at issue also provided that "[a]ny such burning shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to intimidate a person or group." The state court had instructed the jury that the provision meant: "The burning of a cross, by itself, is sufficient evidence from which you may infer the required intent." A four-Justice plurality held that the foregoing provision, as interpreted by the state court, would create an unacceptable risk of the suppression of ideas and, therefore, was unconstitutional on its face, mainly because it permitted the state to arrest, prosecute, and convict a person based solely on the fact of cross burning itself, regardless of the particular facts of the case. As the plurality noted, "[t]he act of burning a cross may mean that a person is engaging in constitutionally proscribable intimidation, or it may mean only that the person is engaged in core political speech. . . . As the history of cross burning indicates, a burning cross is not always intended to intimidate. Rather, sometimes the cross burning is a statement of ideology, a symbol of group solidarity. . . . [O]ccasionally a person who burns a cross does not intend to express either a statement of ideology or intimidation. Cross burnings have appeared in movies such as Mississippi Burning. . . . The prima facie provision makes no effort to distinguish among these different types of cross burnings." Id. at 365–66.

In Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197, 1202–03 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, Smith v. Collin, 439 U.S. 916 (1978), the Seventh Circuit held that the asserted falseness of Nazi dogma, and, indeed, its general repudiation, do not justify its suppression, and that an ordinance prohibiting the dissemination of materials that would promote hatred against people of Jewish faith or Jewish origin could not constitutionally be applied to criminalize the display of swastikas and Nazi uniforms during a proposed demonstration by members of the National Socialist Party in a predominately Jewish village.

hibited the use of symbols (including but not limited to a burning cross) that amounted to "fighting words," but applied only when the symbol was provocative "on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender." The Court held that the ordinance did not pass constitutional muster, because it discriminated on the basis of content by targeting only those individuals who provoked violence on a basis specified in the law. The ordinance did not cover "[t]hose who wish[ed] to use fighting words in connection with other ideas—to express hostility, for example, on the basis of political affiliation, union membership, or homosexuality." Selectivity of this sort allowed the city "to impose special prohibitions on those speakers who express[ed] views on disfavored subjects, and hence was presumptively unconstitutional."[334] Although the city asserted that the ordinance helped to ensure the basic human rights of members of groups that had historically been subjected to discrimination, including the right of such group members to live in peace where they wished, the Court stressed that the danger of censorship presented by a facially content-based statute, requires that this weapon be employed only where it is necessary to serve the asserted compelling interest. The existence of adequate content-neutral alternatives thus undercuts significantly any defense of such a statute. In the specific case, "[a]n ordinance not limited to the favored topics . . . would have precisely the same beneficial effect. In fact, the only interest distinctively served by the content limitation [wa]s that of displaying the city council's special hostility towards the particular biases thus singled out. . . . [The city was] entitled to express that hostility—but not through the means of imposing unique limitations upon speakers who (however benightedly) disagree[d]."[335]

[I122] Whereas the ordinance struck down in R.A.V. was explicitly directed at expression, the statute at issue in Wisconsin v. Mitchell was aimed at conduct unprotected by the First Amendment and provided for an increase in a convicted defendant's punishment if the defendant intentionally selected the victim of the crime because of that victim's race. In a unanimous decision upholding the statute, the Court observed that the defendant's motive is a factor traditionally considered by sentencing judges, and that a state may consider "bias-motivated crimes as more likely to provoke retaliatory crimes, inflict distinct emotional harms on their victims, and incite community unrest." Moreover, the Court rejected the argument that the statute impermissibly chilled free expression with respect to racial matters by those concerned about the possibility of enhanced sentences if they should, in the future, commit a criminal offense covered by the statute, reasoning that the prospect of a citizen suppressing his bigoted beliefs for fear that evidence of those beliefs would be introduced against him at trial, if he committed a serious offense against person or property, was too speculative a hypothesis to support this overbreadth claim, and that the First Amendment permits the admission of a defendant's previous declarations or statements to establish the elements of a crime or to prove motive or intent, subject to evidentiary rules dealing with relevancy, reliability, and the like.[336]

---

334 R.A.V. v. St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 391 (1992).

335 Id. at 396.

336 Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476, 488–89 (1993).

d. Sexually Explicit Expression

i. Obscenity[337]

[I123] Generally. "Sexual expression which is indecent but not obscene is protected by the First Amendment."[338] By contrast, "obscenity is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech or press; . . . 'lewd and obscene' [utterances] . . . are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.'"[339] In this context, the Court has often pointedly recognized the high importance of the state interest in regulating the exposure of obscene materials to juveniles and unconsenting adults.[340] But these are not the only legitimate state interests permitting regulation of obscene material. "[T]here are also legitimate state interests at stake in stemming the tide of commercialized obscenity, even assuming it is feasible to enforce effective safeguards against exposure to juveniles and to passersby. . . . These include the interest in the quality of life and the total community environment, the tone of commerce in the great city centers, and, possibly, the public safety itself."[341] "A State [can] reasonably regard [obscene material] as capable of encouraging or causing antisocial behavior, especially in its impact on young people. States need not wait until behavioral experts or educators can provide empirical data before enacting controls of commerce in obscene materials unprotected by the First Amendment or by a constitutional right to privacy."[342]

[I124] "[D]eterrence of the sale of obscene materials is a legitimate end of state anti-obscenity laws. [The Court has] recognized the practical reality that any form of criminal obscenity statute applicable to a bookseller will induce some tendency to self-censorship and have some inhibitory effect on the dissemination of material not obscene. . . . [However,] the mere assertion of some possible self-censorship resulting from a statute is not enough to render an anti-obscenity law unconstitutional." Moreover a state is not required to fire "warning shots," in the form of misdemeanor prosecutions, before it may bring felony charges for distributing obscene materials.[343]

[I125] Under Stanley, a state cannot criminalize the mere private possession of obscene material—with the exception of child pornography.[344] Although the states retain broad

---

[337] See also paras. E71 (void for vagueness doctrine), G130–G131 (seizure of allegedly obscene materials), I 24, I 25 (prior restraints).

[338] Sable Communications of California v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 492 U.S. 115, 126 (1989).

[339] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 485 (1957), quoting Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 (1942). In Roth, the Court recognized that "rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance" was implicit in the history of the First Amendment, since the original states provided for the prosecution of libel, blasphemy, and profanity. Moreover, the Court noted that the universal judgment that obscenity should be restrained was reflected in the international "Agreement for the Suppression of the Circulation of Obscene Publications," in the obscenity laws of all of the states, and in the 20 obscenity laws enacted by Congress from 1842 to 1956. See id. at 484–85.

[340] See, e.g., Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767, 769 (1967); Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 567 (1969); Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 18–19 (1973).

[341] Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 57–58 (1973).

[342] Kaplan v. California, 413 U.S. 115, 120 (1973).

[343] Fort Wayne Books, Inc. v. Indiana, 489 U.S. 46, 60–61 (1989).

[344] Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 111 (1990).

power to regulate obscenity, that power simply does not reach into the privacy of one's own home. "If the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch."[345] Nevertheless, the Court has negated the idea "that some zone of constitutionally protected privacy follows obscene material when it is moved outside the home area protected by Stanley."[346] In Reidel, the Court expressly held that the government may constitutionally prohibit the distribution of obscene materials through the mails, even to willing recipients who state that they are adults, and, further, that the constitutional right of a person to possess obscene material in the privacy of his own home, as expressed in the Stanley case, does not carry with it the right to sell and deliver such material.[347]

[I126] The legitimate state interest in preventing the dissemination of material deemed harmful to children "does not justify a total suppression of such material, the effect of which would be 'to reduce the adult population . . . to reading only what is fit for children.'"[348] Hence, a statute that makes it a misdemeanor to sell or make available to the general reading public any book containing obscene language "tending to the corruption of the moral of youth" is unconstitutional.[349]

[I127] The Standards for Assessing Obscenity. Obscenity can "manifest itself in conduct, in the pictorial representation of conduct, or in the written and oral description of conduct."[350] Sex and obscenity are not synonymous. The Court defined obscenity in Roth in the following terms: "[W]hether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest."[351] Nine years later, in Memoirs, the Court veered sharply away from the [345] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 565 (1969). The Court noted, inter alia, that, "[I]f a State is concerned about printed or filmed materials inducing antisocial conduct, in the context of private consumption of ideas and information we should adhere to the view that '[a]mong free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law.' . . . Given the present state of knowledge, the State may no more prohibit mere possession of obscene matter on the ground that it may lead to antisocial conduct than it may prohibit possession of chemistry books on the ground that they may lead to the manufacture of homemade spirits." Id. at 566–67. Moreover, the Court rejected the argument that prohibition of possession of obscene materials was a necessary incident to statutory schemes prohibiting distribution. That argument was based on alleged difficulties of proving an intent to distribute or in producing evidence of actual distribution. The Court was not convinced that such difficulties existed. In any event, the Court stressed, "[an individual's] right to read or observe what he pleases [in the privacy of his home], . . . is so fundamental to our scheme of individual liberty, [that] its restriction may not be justified by the need to ease the administration of otherwise valid criminal laws." Id. at 568.

---

[346] United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139, 141–42 (1973).

[347] United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351, 354–56 (1971).

[348] Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 195 (1964), quoting Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380, 383 (1957).

[349] Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380, 383–84 (1957).

[350] Kaplan v. California, 413 U.S. 115, 119 (1973) (obscene material in book form is not entitled to First Amendment protection merely because it has no pictorial content).

[351] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 485 (1957). Roth recognized that "rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance" was implicit in the history of the First Amendment, since the original states provided for the prosecution of libel, blasphemy, and profanity. Id. at 484–85.

Roth concept and, with only three Justices in the plurality opinion, articulated a new test of obscenity. The plurality held that, under the Roth definition, as elaborated in subsequent cases, "three elements must coalesce: it must be established that (a) the dominant theme of the material, taken as a whole, appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value."[352] "While Roth presumed 'obscenity' to be 'utterly without redeeming social importance,' Memoirs required that to prove obscenity it must be affirmatively established that the material is 'utterly without redeeming social value.' Thus, even as they repeated the words of Roth, the Memoirs plurality produced a drastically altered test that called on the prosecution to prove a negative, i.e., that the material was 'utterly without redeeming social value'—a burden virtually impossible to discharge under the criminal standards of proof."[353] In light of these considerations, the Miller Court reformulated the test for the determination of obscenity. The Miller test asks "(a) whether 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards,' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; . . . (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."[354]

[I128] The Court has defined "material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest" as "material having a tendency to excite lustful thoughts;"[355] the words "lustful thoughts" refer to "sexual responses over and beyond those that would be characterized as normal."[356] The Court "adjust[s] the prurient appeal requirement to social realities by permitting the appeal of allegedly obscene material to be assessed in terms of the sexual interests of its intended and probable recipient group. . . . [Hence,] [w]here the material is designed for and primarily disseminated to a clearly defined deviant sexual group, rather than the public at large, the prurient appeal requirement . . . is satisfied if the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to the prurient interest in sex of the members of that group."[357] The kinds of conduct that may be labeled as "patently offensive" are "the 'hard core' types of conduct suggested by the examples given in Miller:"[358] "(a) [p]atently offensive representations or descriptions of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated; (b) [p]atently offensive representations or descriptions of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals."[359] The first and second prongs of the Miller

---

[352] Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 418 (1966).

[353] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 21–22 (1973).

[354] Id. at 24. Hence, the third test announced in Miller—whether the work "lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value"—expanded criminal liability under Memoirs. See Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193–95 (1977).

In United States v. 12 200-ft. Reels of Film, 413 U.S. 123, 129–30 (1973), a federal obscenity case decided with Miller, the Court held that the Miller standards, including the "contemporary community standards" formulation, apply equally to federal legislation.

[355] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 487, n.20 (1957).

[356] Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491, 498–99 (1985).

[357] Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502, 508–09 (1966).

[358] Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 301, n.8 (1977).

[359] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 25 (1973).

In Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153, 161 (1974), the Court noted that, while the subject matter of the film at issue in that case was, in a broader sense, sex, and there were scenes in which test—appeal to prurient interest and patent offensiveness—are "issues of fact for the jury to determine applying contemporary community standards."[360]

[I129] "Under a National Constitution, fundamental First Amendment limitations on the powers of the States do not vary from community to community, but this does not mean that should be fixed uniform national standards of precisely what appeals to the 'prurient interest' or is 'patently offensive.' . . . It is neither realistic nor constitutionally sound to read the First Amendment as requiring that the people of Maine or Mississippi accept public depiction of conduct found tolerable in Las Vegas, or New York City. . . . People in different States vary in their tastes and attitudes, and this diversity is not to be strangled by the absolutism of imposed uniformity. . . . [And] in terms of danger to free expression, the potential for suppression seems at least as great in the application of a single nationwide standard as in allowing distribution in accordance with local tastes."[361] "The fact that distributors of allegedly obscene materials may be subjected to varying community standards in the various federal judicial districts into which they transmit the materials does not render a federal statute unconstitutional because of the failure of application of uniform national standards of obscenity."[362] "[T]he 'community standards' criterion as applied to the Internet means that any communication available to a nationwide audience will be judged by the standards of the community most likely to be offended by the message."[363] This proposition, however, has raised serious First Amendment concerns.[364]

[I130] While the Court has rejected the view that the First and Fourteenth Amendments require that the proscription of obscenity be based on uniform nationwide standards of what is obscene, the Court has not required "as a constitutional matter the substitution of some smaller geographical area into the same sort of formula."[365] Thus, it is "constitutionally permissible to permit juries to rely on the understanding of the community from which they come as to 'contemporary community standards.' . . . A State may choose to define an obscenity offense in terms of contemporary community standards as defined in Miller without further specification, . . . or it may choose to define the standards in more precise geographic terms."[366] For example it can proscribe obscenity in terms of a "state-wide" standard.[367] However, a state law regulating distribution of obscene material cannot define contemporary community standards.[368] "A juror is entitled to draw on his own knowledge of the views of the average person in the sexual conduct including "ultimate sexual acts" were to be understood to be taking place, the camera did not focus on the bodies of the actors at such times, and there was no exhibition whatever of the actors' genitals, lewd or otherwise, during these scenes. Hence, the picture was not the "public portrayal of hard core sexual conduct for its own sake, and for the ensuing commercial gain" and could not, as a matter of constitutional law, be found to depict sexual conduct in a patently offensive way.

---

360 Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497, 500 (1987).

361 Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24, 30–33, n.13 (1973).

362 Sable Communications of California v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 492 U.S. 115, 125 (1989), quoting Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 106 (1974).

363 Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 877–78 (1997).

364 See para. I158.

365 Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 104 (1974).

366 Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153, 157 (1974).

367 See Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24, 30–34 (1973).

368 Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 302–04 (1977).

community or vicinage from which he comes for making the required determination, just as he is entitled to draw on his knowledge of the propensities of a 'reasonable' person in other areas of the law."[369] But "juries must be instructed properly, so that they consider the entire community and not simply their own subjective reactions, or the reactions of a sensitive or of a callous minority."[370] "[T]he primary concern with requiring a jury to apply the standard of 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards"' is to be certain that, so far as material is not aimed at a deviant group, it will be judged by its impact on an average person, rather than a particularly susceptible or sensitive person, or indeed a totally insensitive one."[371] This does not mean "that 'sensitive' and 'insensitive' persons, however defined, are to be excluded from the community as a whole for the purpose of deciding if materials are obscene."[372] The Court also has held that children are not to be included as part of the "community," as that term relates to the "obscene materials" proscribed by a statute declaring that such materials are non-mailable, at least when children are not the intended recipients of the materials. In so holding, the Court has pointed out that "a jury conscientiously striving to define such community, the 'average person,' . . . by whose standards obscenity is to be judged, might very well reach a much lower 'average' when children are part of the equation than it would if it restricted its consideration to the effect of allegedly obscene materials on adults."[373]

[I131] By contrast, "the value of an allegedly obscene work is [not] to be determined by reference to community standards. '[T]he First Amendment protects works which, taken as a whole, have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, regardless of whether the government or a majority of the people approve of the ideas these works represent.'"[374] "Just as the ideas a work represents need not obtain majority approval to merit protection, neither, insofar as the First Amendment is concerned, does the value of the work vary from community to community based on the degree of local acceptance it has won. . . . [Hence,] [t]he proper inquiry [with respect to the third prong of the Miller test] is not whether an ordinary member of any given community would find serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value in allegedly obscene material, but whether a reasonable person would find such value in the material, taken as a whole. . . . Of course, the mere fact that only a minority of a population may believe a work has serious value does not mean the 'reasonable person' standard would not be met."[375] This determination is particularly amenable to appellate review.[376]

[I132] "The Constitution requires proof of scienter to avoid the hazard of self-censorship of constitutionally protected material and to compensate for the ambiguities inherent in the definition of obscenity."[377] With respect to that requirement, "[i]t is constitutionally sufficient that the prosecution show that a defendant had knowledge of the

---

369 Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S 87, 104–05 (1974).

370 Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 305 (1977).

371 Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24, 33 (1973).

372 Pinkus v. United States, 436 U.S. 293, 300 (1978).

373 Id. at 298.

374 Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497, 500 (1987), quoting Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24, 34 (1973).

375 Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497, 500–501, n.3 (1987).

376 Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 305 (1977).

377 Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502, 511 (1966).

contents of the materials he distributed, and that he knew the character and nature of the materials. To require proof of a defendant's knowledge of the legal status of the materials would permit the defendant to avoid prosecution by simply claiming that he had not brushed up on the law. Such a formulation of the scienter requirement is . . . [not] required by the Constitution."[378]

[I133] Pandering is "the business of purveying textual or graphic matter openly advertised to appeal to the erotic interest of the customers."[379] "[A]s a matter of First Amendment obscenity law, evidence of pandering to prurient interests in the creation, promotion, or dissemination of material is relevant in determining whether the material is obscene. . . . This is so mainly because the fact that the accused made such an appeal has a bearing on the ultimate constitutional tests for obscenity: 'The deliberate representation of certain publications as erotically arousing, for example, stimulates the reader to accept them as prurient; he looks for titillation, not for saving intellectual content. Similarly, such representation would tend to force public confrontation with the potentially offensive aspects of the work; the brazenness of such an appeal heightens the offensiveness of the publications to those who are offended by such material. And the circumstances of presentation and dissemination of material are equally relevant to determining whether social importance claimed for material in the courtroom was, in the circumstances, pretense or reality—whether it was the basis upon which it was traded in the marketplace or a spurious claim for litigation purposes.'"[380]

[I134] Expert testimony as to obscenity is not necessary when the materials at issue are themselves placed in evidence.[381] And "the mere fact that materials similar to the ones at issue are for sale and purchased at stores around the country does not make them witnesses of virtue. . . . Mere availability of similar material, by itself, means nothing more than that other persons are engaged in similar activities."[382] Moreover, it is always appropriate for the appellate court to review the sufficiency of the evidence.[383]

[I135] Obscenity as to Minors. The Court has rejected the proposition that the scope of the constitutional freedom of expression secured to a citizen to read or see material concerned with sex cannot be made to depend on whether the citizen is an adult or a minor. Ginsberg upheld a New York statute that made it unlawful "knowingly to sell to a minor under 17 (a) any picture . . . which depicts nudity . . . and which is harmful to minors, and (b) any . . . magazine . . . which contains [such pictures] and which, taken as a whole, is harmful to minors;" hence, the statute prohibited selling to minors under 17 years of age material that was considered obscene as to them even if not obscene as to adults. The Court emphasized that a state may "adjust[t] the definition of obscenity

---

[378] Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 123–24 (1974).

[379] Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463, 467 (1966).

[380] Splawn v. California, 431 U.S. 595, 598–99 (1977), quoting Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463, 470 (1966).

[381] Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49, 56 (1973).

[382] Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 126 (1974).

[383] Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 306 (1977). The Court has never required the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard to be applied in a civil case. Thus, while a state may require proof beyond reasonable doubt in a civil obscenity case, that choice is solely a matter of state law. The First and Fourteenth Amendments do not require such a standard. See California ex rel. Cooper v. Mitchell Bros.' Santa Ana Theater, 454 U.S. 90, 93–94 (1981) (per curiam).

'to social realities by permitting the appeal of this type of material to be assessed in terms of the sexual interests' of . . . minors." That the state has power to make that adjustment is clear, for, "even where there is an invasion of protected freedoms, 'the power of the state to control the conduct of children reaches beyond the scope of its authority over adults.' . . . 'While the supervision of children's reading may best be left to their parents, the knowledge that parental control or guidance cannot always be provided and society's transcendent interest in protecting the welfare of children justify reasonable regulation of the sale of material to them. It is, therefore, altogether fitting and proper for a State to include in a statute designed to regulate the sale of pornography to children special standards, broader than those embodied in legislation aimed at controlling dissemination of such material to adults.'" In this context, state power to exclude material statutorily defined as obscenity is sustained "if it was not irrational for the legislature to find that exposure to material condemned by the statute is harmful to minors." This was the case with the New York statute.[384] "It is clear, however, that, under any test of obscenity as to minors not all nudity may be proscribed. Rather, to be obscene, 'such expression must be, in some significant way, erotic.'"[385]

ii. Child Pornography

[I136] "The prevention of sexual exploitation and abuse of children constitutes a government objective of surpassing importance. . . . The distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual activity by juveniles is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children in at least two ways. First, the materials produced are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. . . . Pornography poses an even greater threat to the child victim than does sexual abuse or prostitution. Because the child's actions are reduced to a recording, the pornography may haunt him in future years, long after the original misdeed took place. . . . Second, the distribution network for child pornography must be closed if the production of material which requires the sexual exploitation of children is to be effectively controlled. While the production of pornographic materials is a low profile, clandestine industry, the need to market the resulting products requires a visible apparatus of distribution. The most expeditious, if not the only practical, method of law enforcement may be to dry up the market for this material by imposing severe criminal penalties on persons selling, advertising, or otherwise promoting the product."[386] "There are, of course, limits on the category of child pornography which, like obscenity, is unprotected by the First Amendment. As with all legislation in this sensitive area, the conduct to be prohibited must be adequately defined by the applicable state law, as written or authoritatively construed. . . . [T]he nature of the harm to be combated requires that the state offense be limited to works that visually depict sexual conduct by children below a specified age.

---

[384] Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 638, 640–41 (1968).

[385] Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 213, n.10 (1975), quoting Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 20 (1971). "Speech that is neither obscene as to youths nor subject to some other legitimate proscription cannot be suppressed solely to protect the young from ideas or images that a legislative body thinks unsuitable for them." See Erznoznik, supra, at 213–14.

A statute prohibiting the sale of "magazines . . . which would appeal to the lust of persons under the age of eighteen years or to their curiosity as to sex or to the anatomical differences between the sexes" is unconstitutionally vague. See Rabeck v. New York, 391 U.S. 462 (1968) (per curiam).

[386] New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 757–60, n.10 (1982).

The category of 'sexual conduct' proscribed must also be suitably limited and described. . . . [And] [a]s with obscenity laws, criminal responsibility may not be imposed without some element of scienter on the part of the defendant."[387] In light of these considerations, Ferber upheld a state prohibition on the distribution and sale of child pornography, as well as its production. In so doing, the Court emphasized that the test for child pornography is separate from the obscenity standard enunciated in Miller[388] and adjusted the Miller formulation in the following respects: "a trier of fact need not find that the material appeals to the prurient interest of the average person; it is not required that sexual conduct portrayed be done so in a patently offensive manner; and the material at issue need not be considered as a whole."[389]

[I137] In Osborne, the Court ruled that the interests identified in Ferber justify a ban on the possession or viewing of pornography produced by using children. Given the fact that much of the child pornography market has been driven underground, and therefore it is difficult, if not impossible, to solve the child pornography problem by only attacking production and distribution, a state "may attempt to stamp out this vice at all levels in the distribution chain. . . . It is surely reasonable for the State to conclude that it will decrease the production of child pornography if it penalizes those who possess and view the product, thereby decreasing demand. . . . [Moreover, a] State's ban on possession and viewing encourages the possessors of such materials to destroy them. . . . [E]ncouraging the destruction of these materials is also desirable because pedophiles use child pornography to seduce other children into sexual activity."[390]

---

[387] Id. at 754–65.

[388] See para. I127.

[389] Id. at 364. The New York law at issue in that case criminalized the use of a child in a "sexual performance," defined as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a child less than sixteen years of age." "Sexual conduct" was in turn defined as "actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sadomasochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals." The Court decided that, although it might be necessary to employ children to engage in conduct clearly within the reach of the statute in order to produce educational, medical, or artistic works, these arguably impermissible applications of the statute did not amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute's reach. The Court therefore found that the statute was not substantially overbroad, and it could be constitutionally applied to a bookstore proprietor who sold films depicting young boys masturbating. Id. at 773–74.

[390] Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 109–11 (1990). The state statute at issue in that case prohibited any person from possessing or viewing any material or performance showing a minor who was not his child or ward in a state of nudity unless (1) the material or performance was presented for a bona fide artistic, medical, scientific, educational, religious, governmental, judicial, or other proper purpose by or to a person having a proper interest therein, or (2) the possessor knew that the minor's parents or guardian had consented in writing to such photographing or use of the minor. Although, on its face, the statute purported to prohibit constitutionally protected depictions of nudity, it was not found to be substantially overbroad, in light of the statutory exemptions and "proper purposes" provisions. In any event, the statute, as construed by the Ohio supreme court, plainly survived overbreadth scrutiny. By limiting the statute's operation to nudity that constituted lewd exhibition or focused on genitals, that court had avoided penalizing persons for viewing or possessing innocuous photographs of naked children and thereby had rendered the "nudity" language permissible. Moreover, the statute's failure, on its face, to provide a mens rea requirement was cured by the state court's conclusion that the state should establish scienter under the Ohio default statute specifying that recklessness applied absent a statutory intent provision. Id. at 112–15.

[I138] By contrast, "virtual child pornography" is constitutionally protected. Free Speech Coalition invalidated the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 (CPPA), which expanded the federal prohibition on child pornography to include not only pornographic images made using actual children, but also "any visual depiction, including any photograph, film, video, picture, or computer or computer-generated image or picture" that "is, or appears to be, of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," and any sexually explicit image that "is advertised, promoted, presented, described, or distributed in such a manner that conveys the impression 'it depicts' a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct." Thus, the statute banned a range of sexually explicit images, which appeared to depict minors but had been produced by means other than using real children, such as through the use of youthful-looking adults or computer-imaging technology. The Court, first, found that the CPPA was inconsistent with Miller. Materials needed not appeal to the prurient interest under the CPPA, which proscribed any depiction of sexually explicit activity, no matter how it was presented. It was not necessary, moreover, that the image be patently offensive. "Pictures of what appear to be 17-year-olds engaging in sexually explicit activity do not in every case contravene community standards."[391] Under the CPPA, images were prohibited so long as the persons appeared to be under 18 years of age. This was higher than the legal age for marriage in many states, as well as the age at which persons might consent to sexual relations. The CPPA prohibited speech despite its serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. The statute proscribed "the visual depiction of an idea—that of teenagers engaging in sexual activity—that is a fact of modern society and has been a theme in art and literature throughout the ages."[392] Under the CPPA, if movies contained a single graphic depiction of sexual activity within the statutory definition, their possessor would be subject to severe punishment without inquiry into the literary value of the work. This would be "inconsistent with the essential First Amendment rule that a work's redeeming value does not depend on the presence of a single explicit scene, . . . [but is] judged by considering the work as a whole."[393] Moreover, the CPPA found no support in Ferber. In contrast to the speech in Ferber, speech that itself was the record of sexual abuse, the CPPA prohibited speech that "record[ed] no crime and create[d] no victims by its production. Virtual child pornography is not 'intrinsically related' to the sexual abuse of children, as were the materials in Ferber."[394] While the government asserted that the images could lead to actual instances of child abuse, the Court found that the causal link was contingent and indirect: "[t]he harm [did] not necessarily follow from the speech, but depend[ed] upon some unquantified potential for subsequent criminal acts."[395] Relatedly, the Court rejected the argument that the CPPA was necessary, because pedophiles might use virtual child pornography to seduce children. As the Court noted, "[t]here are many things innocent in themselves, such as cartoons, video games, and candy, that might be used for immoral purposes, yet such things may not be prohibited because they can be misused. . . . [S]peech within the rights of adults to hear may not be silenced completely in an attempt to shield children from it. . . . The evil in question depend[ed] upon the actor's unlawful conduct, conduct defined as criminal quite apart from any link to the speech in question. This establishe[d] that the speech ban

391 Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coal., 535 U.S. 234, 246 (2002).

392 Id.

393 Id. at 248.

394 Id. at 250.

395 Id.

[wa]s not narrowly drawn."[396] The argument that virtual child pornography whetted pedophiles' appetites and encouraged them to engage in illegal conduct was also unavailing, since "[t]he government may not prohibit speech because it increases the chance an unlawful act will be committed at some indefinite future time."[397] Moreover, the argument that eliminating the market for pornography produced using real children necessitated a prohibition on virtual images as well was somewhat implausible. If virtual images were identical to illegal child pornography, the illegal images would be driven from the market by the indistinguishable substitutes; few pornographers would risk prosecution by abusing real children, if fictional, computerized images would suffice.[398] Finally, the Court held that the statutory provision banning depictions of sexually explicit conduct that were "advertised, promoted, presented, described, or distributed in such a manner that conveys the impression that the material is or contains a visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" was substantially overbroad. The "conveys the impression" provision required little judgment about the work's content. Even if a film contained no sexually explicit scenes involving minors, it could be treated as child pornography if the title and trailers conveyed the impression that such scenes would be found in the movie. "The determination turn[ed] on how the speech [wa]s presented, not on what [wa]s depicted."[399] Furthermore, proscribed material was tainted and unlawful in the hands of all who received it, though they bore no responsibility for how it was marketed, sold, or described. The provision criminalized possession of material pandered as child pornography by someone earlier in the distribution chain, as well as a sexually explicit film that contained no youthful actors but had been packaged to suggest a prohibited movie. Possession was a crime even when the possessor knew the movie had been mislabeled. The Court concluded that the First Amendment required a more precise restriction.[400]

iii. Pornography and Sexism

[I139] In American Booksellers, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit invalidated a city ordinance prohibiting pornography that portrayed women submissively or in a degrading manner.[401] The ordinance did not refer to the prurient interest, to offensiveness, or to the standards of the community. It demanded attention to particular depictions, not to the work judged as a whole. And it was irrelevant under the ordinance whether the work had literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. The city pointed to

---

396 Id. at 251–52.

397 Id. at 253.

398 Id. at 254.

399 Id. at 257.

400 Id. at 258.

401 "Pornography" under the ordinance was "the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women, whether in pictures or in words, that also includes one or more of the following: (1) Women are presented as sexual objects who enjoy pain or humiliation; or (2) Women are presented as sexual objects who experience sexual pleasure in being raped; or (3) Women are presented as sexual objects tied up or cut up or mutilated or bruised or physically hurt, or as dismembered or truncated or fragmented or severed into body parts; or (4) Women are presented as being penetrated by objects or animals; or (5) Women are presented in scenarios of degradation, injury abasement, torture, shown as filthy or inferior, bleeding, bruised, or hurt in a context that makes these conditions sexual; or (6) Women are presented as sexual objects for domination, conquest, violation, exploitation, possession, or use, or through postures or positions of servility or submission or display."

these omissions as virtues. It maintained that pornography influenced attitudes, and the statute was a way to alter the socialization of men and women rather than to vindicate community standards of offensiveness. It argued that the ordinance would play an important role in reducing the tendency of men to view women as sexual objects, a tendency that led to both unacceptable attitudes and discrimination in the workplace and violence away from it. The court rejected this argument. Under the ordinance, graphic, sexually explicit speech was "pornography" or not depending on the perspective the author adopted. Speech that "subordinated" women and also, for example, presented women as enjoying pain, or even simply presented women in "positions of servility or submission or display," was forbidden, no matter how great the literary or political value of the work taken as a whole. Speech that portrayed women in positions of equality was lawful, no matter how graphic the sexual content. This was thought control. It established an "approved" view of women, of how they might react to sexual encounters, of how the sexes might relate to each other. Of course "[d]epictions of subordination tend to perpetuate subordination. . . . [And] [p]ornography may be a systematic practice of exploitation and subordination based on sex which differentially harms women. . . . Yet this simply demonstrates the power of pornography as speech. All of these unhappy effects depend on mental intermediation. Pornography affects how people see the world, their fellows, and social relations. . . . If pornography is what pornography does, so is other speech. . . . Sexual responses often are unthinking responses, and the association of sexual arousal with the subordination of women therefore may have a substantial effect. But almost all cultural stimuli provoke unconscious responses. Religious ceremonies condition their participants. Teachers convey messages by selecting what not to cover; the implicit message about what is off limits or unthinkable may be more powerful than the messages for which they present rational argument. Television scripts contain unarticulated assumptions. People may be conditioned in subtle ways." As the court emphasized, "[i]f the fact that speech plays a role in a process of conditioning were enough to permit governmental regulation, that would be the end of freedom of speech."[402]

iv. Public Nudity Bans

[I140] "Clearly all nudity cannot be deemed obscene, even as to minors."[403] "Nudity alone does not place otherwise protected material outside the mantle of the First Amendment. . . . [A]n entertainment program [may not] be prohibited solely because it displays the nude human figure."[404]

[I141] In Erznoznik, an ordinance purporting to prevent a nuisance, prohibited the showing of films containing nudity by drive-in theaters when the screens were visible from a public street or place. The governmental interests advanced as justifying the ordinance were three: (1) to protect citizens from unwilling exposure to possibly offensive materials; (2) to protect children from such materials; and (3) to prevent the slowing of passing traffic and the likelihood of resulting accidents. The Court found the ordinance, on its face, either overbroad or underinclusive with respect to each of these asserted purposes. As to the first purpose, the ordinance was overbroad because it pro-

---

[402] Am. Booksellers Ass'n v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323, 325–30 (7th Cir. 1985); aff'd without opinion, 475 U.S. 1001 (1986).

[403] Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 213 (1975).

[404] Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61, 66 (1981).

scribed the showing of any nudity "however innocent or educational." Moreover, potential viewers who deemed particular nudity to be offensive were not captives; they had only to look elsewhere. As to minors, the Jacksonville ordinance was overbroad because it was "not directed against sexually explicit nudity nor [wa]s it otherwise limited. Rather, it sweepingly forb[ade] display of all films containing any uncovered buttocks or breasts, irrespective of context or pervasiveness." Thus, it would bar a film containing a picture of a baby's buttocks, the nude body of a war victim, or scenes from a culture in which nudity was indigenous. The ordinance also might prohibit newsreel scenes of the opening of an art exhibit, as well as shots of bathers on a beach. Finally, the ordinance was not rationally tailored to support its asserted purpose as a traffic regulation. By proscribing even the most fleeting and innocent glimpses of nudity, it was strikingly underinclusive, since it omitted a wide variety of other scenes "in the customary screen diet" that would be no less distracting to the passing motorist. In sum, the ordinance was a misconceived attempt directly to regulate content of expression.[405]

[I142] Nude dancing is not without its First Amendment protections from official regulation. Schad struck down a zoning ordinance that did not permit "live entertainment," including non-obscene nude dancing, in the Borough of Mount Ephraim. By excluding live entertainment throughout the Borough, the Mount Ephraim ordinance prohibited a wide range of expression that was within the protections of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Moreover, Mount Ephraim had not adequately justified its substantial restriction of protected activity. Its asserted justification that permitting live entertainment would conflict with its plan to create a commercial area catering only to the residents' "immediate needs" was patently insufficient, since no evidence had been introduced to support this assertion, and it was difficult to reconcile this characterization of the Borough's commercial zones with the provisions of the ordinance, which purposed to provide areas for local and regional commercial operations. As to its asserted justification that live entertainment might be selectively excluded from the permitted commercial uses to avoid problems associated with live entertainment, such as parking, trash, police protection, and medical facilities, the Borough had presented no evidence, and it was not immediately apparent as a matter of experience, that live entertainment posed problems of this nature more significant than those associated with various permitted uses; nor did it appear that the Borough's zoning authority had arrived at a defensible conclusion that unusual problems were presented by live entertainment. Further, the ordinance was not narrowly drawn to respond to what might be the distinctive problems arising from certain types of live entertainment, and it was not clear that a more selective approach would fail to address those unique problems if any there were. Finally, as to the claimed justification that the ordinance in question was a reasonable "time, place, and manner" restriction, the Borough did not identify its interests, making it reasonable to exclude all live entertainment but to allow a variety of other commercial uses, and had presented no evidence that live entertainment was incompatible with the permitted uses. Besides, the ordinance did not leave open adequate alternative channels of communication, since it totally excluded all live entertainment, including non-obscene nude dancing.[406]

[I143] In Erie, the Court upheld a city ordinance banning public nudity, including totally nude erotic dancing performed by women at adult entertainment establishments.

---

405 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 211–15 (1975).

406 Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61, 65, 72–76 (1981).

To comply with the ordinance, these dancers should wear at a minimum, "pasties" and a "G-string." Five Justices held that Erie's ordinance was a content-neutral regulation of expressive conduct that should be considered under the test set forth in United States v. O'Brien. Speaking for a four-member plurality, Justice O'Connor reasoned as follows. "Being 'in a state of nudity' is not an inherently expressive condition. [However,] nude dancing of the type at issue in that case is expressive conduct, [though] fall[ing] only within the outer ambit of the First Amendment's protection." Government restrictions on public nudity, such as the ordinance at issue there, should be evaluated under the framework set forth in O'Brien for content-neutral restrictions on symbolic speech. The challenged ordinance was, on its face, a general prohibition on public nudity. "By its terms, the ordinance regulate[d] conduct alone. It [did] not target nudity that contain[ed] an erotic message; rather, it ban[ned] all public nudity, regardless of whether that nudity [wa]s accompanied by expressive activity. . . . [T]he ordinance [wa]s aimed at combating crime and other negative secondary effects caused by the presence of adult entertainment establishments, . . . not at suppressing the erotic message conveyed by this type of nude dancing. Put another way, the ordinance [did] not attempt to regulate the primary effects of the expression, i.e., the effect on the audience of watching nude erotic dancing, but rather the secondary effects, such as the impacts on public health, safety, and welfare, which . . . [we]re caused by the presence of even one such establishment. . . . Even if Erie's public nudity ban ha[d] some minimal effect on the erotic message by muting that portion of the expression occurring when the last stitch [wa]s dropped, the dancers . . . [we]re free to perform wearing pasties and G-strings. Any effect on the overall expression was de minimis. . . . If States are to be able to regulate secondary effects, then de minimis intrusions on expression, such as those at issue [t]here, cannot be sufficient to render the ordinance content-based."[407] Justice Souter agreed with the analytical approach that the plurality employed in deciding this case. He recognized that Erie's stated interest in combating the secondary effects associated with nude dancing establishments was an interest unrelated to the suppression of expression under O'Brien, and that the city's regulation was thus properly considered under the O'Brien standards.[408]

[I144] Further, the same plurality found that Erie's ordinance was justified under O'Brien. First, the ordinance was within Erie's constitutional power to enact, because the city's efforts to protect public health and safety were clearly within its police powers. Second, the ordinance furthered the important government interests of regulating conduct through a public nudity ban and of combating the harmful secondary effects associated with nude dancing. In terms of demonstrating that such secondary effects posed a threat, the city did not need to conduct new studies or produce evidence independent of that already generated by other cities, so long as the evidence relied on was reasonably believed to be relevant to the problem addressed. Erie could reasonably rely on the evidentiary foundation set forth in Renton and Young v. American Mini Theatres,[409] to the effect that secondary effects were caused by the presence of even one adult entertainment establishment in a given neighborhood. In any event, the ordinance's preamble also relied on the city council's express findings that certain lewd, immoral

---

[407] Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 289–91, 294 (2000) (opinion of O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Kennedy and Breyer, JJ.) (emphasis added).

[408] Id. at 310.

[409] See paras. I147, I148.

activities, carried on in public places for profit, were highly detrimental to the public health, safety, and welfare. The council members, familiar with commercial downtown Erie, were the individuals who would likely have had first-hand knowledge of what took place at and around nude dancing establishments there and could make particularized expert judgments about the resulting harmful secondary effects. Moreover, although requiring dancers to wear pasties and G-strings might not greatly reduce these secondary effects, O'Brien required only that the regulation further the interest in combating such effects. The ordinance also satisfied O'Brien's third factor, since the government interest was unrelated to the suppression of free expression, as discussed above. The fourth O'Brien factor—that the restriction is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of the government interest—was satisfied as well. The ordinance regulated conduct, and any incidental impact on the expressive element of nude dancing was de minimis. The pasties and G-string requirement was a minimal restriction in furtherance of the asserted government interests, and the restriction left ample capacity to convey the dancer's erotic message. Finally the plurality rejected the argument that zoning was an alternative means of addressing this problem, noting that it was far from clear that zoning would impose less of a burden on expression than the minimal requirement implemented there, and that, in any event, since this was a content-neutral restriction, least restrictive means analysis was not required.[410] Two other members of the Court held that the statute was constitutional not because it survived some lower level of First Amendment scrutiny, but because, as a general law regulating conduct and not specifically directed at expression, it was not subject to First Amendment scrutiny at all.[411]

[I145] In LaRue, five members of the Court relied on the Twenty-first Amendment to buttress the conclusion that the First Amendment did not invalidate California's prohibition of certain grossly sexual exhibitions in premises licensed to serve alcoholic beverages. Specifically, the opinion stated that the Twenty-first Amendment required that the prohibition be given an "added presumption in favor of [its] validity."[412] The cases following LaRue similarly approved the regulation of nude dancing in establishments licensed to serve alcohol.[413] But Liquormart disavowed LaRue's reasoning insofar as it relied on the Twenty-first Amendment. As the Court explained, "although the Twenty-first Amendment limits the effect of the dormant Commerce Clause on a State's regulatory power over the delivery or use of intoxicating beverages within its borders, 'the Amendment does not license the States to ignore their obligations under other provisions of the Constitution.'"[414] Accordingly, the Court held that "the Twenty-first Amendment does not qualify the constitutional prohibition against laws abridging the freedom of speech embodied in the First Amendment."[415]

---

[410] Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 296–302 (2000) (opinion of O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Kennedy, and Breyer, JJ.). Justice Souter concluded that the record before the Court did not permit the conclusion that Erie's ordinance was reasonably designed to mitigate real harms. Id. at 317.

[411] Id. at 307–10 (opinion of Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J.). These Justices concluded that "[t]he traditional power of government to foster good morals, . . . and the acceptability of the traditional judgment . . . that nude public dancing itself is immoral, have not been repealed by the First Amendment." Id. at 310.

[412] California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109, 118–19 (1972).

[413] New York State Liquor Auth. v. Bellanca, 452 U.S. 714 (1981) (per curiam); Newport v. Iacobucci, 479 U.S. 92 (1986) (per curiam).

[414] 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 516 (1996), quoting Capital Cities Cable v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691, 712 (1984).

[415] 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 516 (1996).

v. Zoning Legislation Dealing with Adult Entertainment Uses[416]

[I146] "The power of local governments to zone and control land use is undoubtedly broad, and its proper exercise is an essential aspect of achieving a satisfactory quality of life in both urban and rural communities. But the zoning power is not infinite and unchallengeable; it 'must be exercised within constitutional limits.' . . . [W]hen a zoning law infringes upon freedom of speech, it must be narrowly drawn and must further a sufficiently substantial government interest."[417]

[I147] In Young v. American Mini Theatres, the Court held that the city of Detroit's zoning ordinance, which prohibited locating an adult theater within 1,000 feet of any two other "regulated uses," or within 500 feet of any residential zone, did not violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Essential to the plurality's holding was the fact that the ordinance was "nothing more than a limitation on the place where adult films [might] be exhibited." There were myriad locations in the city of Detroit that should be over 1,000 feet from existing regulated establishments. This burden on First Amendment rights was slight. The city's determination had been that a concentration of "adult" movie theaters caused the area to deteriorate and become a focus of crime, effects that were not attributable to theaters showing other types of films. It was this secondary effect that the zoning ordinance attempted to avoid, not the dissemination of "offensive" speech. The city's interest "in the present and future character of its neighborhoods" adequately justified its classification of motion pictures. And the record disclosed a factual basis for the city's conclusion that this kind of restriction would have the desired effect; the ordinance, which was designed to disperse adult theaters throughout the city, was supported by the testimony of urban planners and real estate experts regarding the adverse effects of locating several adult entertainment establishments in the same neighborhood.[418]

[I148] In Renton, the Court considered the validity of a municipal ordinance that prohibited any adult movie theater from locating within 1,000 feet of any residential zone, family dwelling, church, park, or school. The Court's analysis of the ordinance proceeded in three steps. First, the Court found that the ordinance did not ban adult theaters altogether, but it merely required that they be distanced from certain sensitive locations. The ordinance was properly analyzed, therefore, as a time, place, and manner regulation. The Court next considered whether the ordinance was content-neutral or content-based. If the regulation were content based, it would be considered presumptively invalid and subject to strict scrutiny. The Court held, however, that the Renton ordinance was aimed not at the content of the films shown at adult theaters but rather at the secondary effects of such theaters on the surrounding community, namely at crime rates, property values, and the quality of the city's neighborhoods. Since the "predom-

---

416 See also para. I142.

417 Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61, 68 (1981).

418 Young v. Am. Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50, 55, 63, n.18, 70–73 (1976) (plurality opinion). Similarly, Justice Powell, in his concurring opinion, emphasized that, at most, the impact of the ordinance on the First Amendment interests was incidental and minimal. Further he examined the city's justification for the restriction before he concluded that the ordinance was valid. Id. at 78–82. The plurality held that non-obscene, erotic materials may be treated differently under First Amendment principles from other forms of protected expression, because "society's interest in protecting this type of expression is of a wholly different, and lesser, magnitude than the interest in untrammeled political [or philosophical] debate." Id. at 70. Justice Powell was not inclined to agree with that position. Id. at 73, n.1.

inate concerns" motivating the ordinance were with the secondary effects of adult speech, and not with the content of the speech, the ordinance was deemed content-neutral. Finally, given this finding, the Court stated that the ordinance would be upheld so long as the city of Renton showed that its ordinance was "designed to serve a substantial government interest" and that "reasonable alternative avenues of communication" remained available.[419] Renton met this burden. The ordinance was designed to serve the city's interest in attempting to preserve the quality of urban life; this interest was vital and should be accorded high respect. Although the ordinance had been enacted without the benefit of studies specifically relating to Renton's particular problems, Renton was entitled to rely on the experiences of, and studies produced by, the nearby city of Seattle and other cities. "The First Amendment does not require a city, before enacting such an ordinance, to conduct new studies or produce evidence independent of that already generated by other cities, so long as whatever evidence the city relies upon is reasonably believed to be relevant to the problem that the city addresses."[420] That was the case there. The Court also found no constitutional defect in the method chosen by Renton to further its substantial interests. As the Court pointed out, "[c]ities may regulate adult theaters by dispersing them, . . . or by effectively concentrating them," as in Renton.[421] Moreover, the ordinance was not underinclusive for failing to regulate other kinds of adult businesses, since there was no evidence that any other adult business were located in, or were contemplating moving into, Renton. In addition, the ordinance allowed for reasonable alternative avenues of communication, since it left some 520 acres, or more than 5 percent of the entire land area of Renton, open to use as adult theater sites. Although respondents argued that, in general, there were no "commercially viable" adult theater sites within the limited area of land left open for such theaters by the ordinance, the fact that respondents should fend for themselves in the real estate market, on an equal footing with other prospective purchasers and lessees, did not give rise to a violation of the First Amendment, which does not compel the government "to ensure that adult theaters, or any other kinds of speech-related businesses, will be able to obtain sites at bargain prices. . . . [T]he First Amendment require[d] only that Renton refrain from effectively denying respondents a reasonable opportunity to open and operate an adult theater within the city," and the challenged ordinance easily met this requirement.[422]

[I149] Alameda Books addressed a Los Angeles ordinance, enacted in 1978, which prohibited not only adult entertainment enterprises within 1,000 feet of each other or within 500 feet of a religious institution, but also "more than one adult entertainment business in the same building." Hence, under the ordinance, an adult bookstore and an adult video arcade could not operate in the same building. The ordinance was based on a study conducted by the City of Los Angeles in 1977. The 1977 study's central component was a Los Angeles Police Department report indicating that, from 1965 to 1975, crime rates for, e.g., robbery and prostitution had grown much faster in Hollywood, which had the city's largest concentration of adult establishments, than in the city as a whole. Relying on the Renton analysis, a four-Justice plurality found that the city could reasonably rely on the police department's conclusions regarding crime patterns to over-419 Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41, 50 (1986).

420 Id. at 51–52.
421 Id. at 52.
422 Id. at 54.

come summary judgment. As the plurality noted, "a municipality may rely on any evidence that is 'reasonably believed to be relevant' for demonstrating a connection between speech and a substantial, independent government interest. . . . [But] [t]his is not to say that a municipality can get away with shoddy data or reasoning. The municipality's evidence must fairly support its rationale for its ordinance. If plaintiffs fail to cast direct doubt on this rationale either by demonstrating that the municipality's evidence does not support its rationale or by furnishing evidence that disputes the municipality's factual findings, the municipality meets the standard set forth in Renton. If plaintiffs succeed in casting doubt on a municipality's rationale in either manner, the burden shifts back to the municipality to supplement the record with evidence renewing support for a theory that justifies its ordinance."[423] While the 1977 study revealed that areas with high concentrations of adult establishments were associated with high crime rates, such areas were also areas with high concentrations of adult operations, albeit each in separate establishments. It was therefore consistent with the 1977 study's findings and thus reasonable for the city to infer that reducing the concentration of adult operations in a neighborhood, whether within separate establishments or in one large establishment, would reduce crime rates.[424]

---

[423] City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S. 425, 438–39 (2002) (plurality opinion of Justice O'Connor, joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Scalia, and Thomas, JJ.).

[424] Justice Scalia joined the plurality opinion because it represented a correct application of the Court's jurisprudence concerning regulation of the "secondary effects" of pornographic speech. However, he stressed that, in a case such as this, the First Amendment made "secondary effects" analysis quite unnecessary. In his view, "the Constitution does not prevent a community that wishes to do so from regulating, or indeed entirely suppressing, the business of pandering sex." Id. at 443–44. Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment. Although he characterized the ordinance as content-based he said that the central holding of Renton was sound: "a zoning restriction that is designed to decrease secondary effects and not speech should be subject to intermediate rather than strict scrutiny." He reasoned that "zoning regulations do not automatically raise the specter of impermissible content discrimination, even if they are content based, because they have a prima facie legitimate purpose: to limit the negative externalities of land use." Further he noted that "the necessary rationale for applying intermediate scrutiny is the promise that zoning ordinances like [the one at issue] may reduce the costs of secondary effects without substantially reducing speech. For this reason, it does not suffice to say that inconvenience will reduce demand and fewer patrons will lead to fewer secondary effects. . . . The premise . . . must be that businesses—even those that have always been under one roof—will for the most part disperse rather than shut down." Id. at 448–51. Kennedy concluded that in that case the above proposition was adequately supported by the 1977 study and common experience.

The dissenters noted, inter alia: "It would make sense to give this kind of zoning regulation a First Amendment label of its own, and if we called it content correlated, we would not only describe it for what it is, but keep alert to a risk of content-based regulation that it poses. The risk lies in the fact that when a law applies selectively only to speech of particular content, the more precisely the content is identified, the greater is the opportunity for government censorship. Adult speech refers not merely to sexually explicit content, but to speech reflecting a favorable view of being explicit about sex and a favorable view of the practices it depicts; a restriction on adult content is thus also a restriction turning on a particular viewpoint, of which the government may disapprove. This risk of viewpoint discrimination is subject to a relatively simple safeguard, however. If combating secondary effects of property devaluation and crime is truly the reason for the regulation, it is possible to show by empirical evidence that the effects exist, that they are caused by the expressive activity subject to the zoning, and that the zoning can be

vi. Sexually Explicit Expression on Communications Media

[I150] Sexually Explicit Speech on the Radio or Television. In Pacifica, the Court considered a governmental ban of a radio broadcast of "indecent" materials, defined in part to include "language that describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities and organs at times of the day when there is a reasonable risk that children may be in the audience." The Court found this ban constitutionally permissible, for two reasons. "First, the broadcast media have established a uniquely pervasive presence in the lives of all Americans. Patently offensive, indecent material presented over the airwaves confronts the citizen not only in public, but also in the privacy of the home, where the individual's right to be left alone plainly outweighs the First Amendment rights of an intruder. . . . Because the broadcast audience is constantly tuning in and out, prior warnings cannot completely protect the listener or viewer from unexpected program content. . . . Second, broadcasting is uniquely accessible to children, even those too young to read."[425] And children were likely listeners to the program there at issue—an afternoon radio broadcast entitled "Filthy Words.[426] expected either to ameliorate them or to enhance the capacity of the government to combat them (say, by concentrating them in one area), without suppressing the expressive activity itself. This capacity of zoning regulation to address the practical problems without eliminating the speech is, after all, the only possible excuse for speaking of secondary-effects zoning as akin to time, place, or manner regulations. . . . In this case, however, the government has not shown that bookstores containing viewing booths, isolated from other adult establishments, increase crime or produce other negative secondary effects in surrounding neighborhoods, and we are thus left without substantial justification for viewing the city's First Amendment restriction as content correlated but not simply content based. By the same token, the city has failed to show any causal relationship between the breakup policy and elimination or regulation of secondary effects." Id. at 457–60 (emphasis added).

[I151] Sexually Explicit Material on Cable Television. Playboy presented a challenge to Section 505 of the Telecommunications Act of 1996, which required cable television operators who provided channels "primarily dedicated to sexually oriented programming" either to "fully scramble or otherwise fully block" those channels or to limit their transmission to hours when children were unlikely to be viewing, set by administrative regulation as the time between ten p.m. and six a.m.. Even before enactment of the statute, signal scrambling was already in use. Cable operators used scrambling in the regular course of business, so that only paying customers had access to certain programs. Scrambling could be imprecise, however; and either or both audio and visual portions of the scrambled programs might be heard or seen, a phenomenon known as "signal bleed." The purpose of Section 505 was to shield children from hearing or seeing images resulting from signal bleed. To comply with the statute, the majority of cable operators

---

425 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 748–49 (1978). The Court also noted that adults who feel the need may purchase tapes and records or go to theaters and nightclubs to hear similar performances. Id. at 750, n.28.

426 In conclusion, the Court emphasized the narrowness of its holding, by saying, inter alia: "The Commission's decision rested entirely on a nuisance rationale under which context is all-important. The concept requires consideration of a host of variables. The time of day was emphasized by the Commission. The content of the program in which the language is used will also affect the composition of the audience, and differences between radio, television, and perhaps closed-circuit transmissions, may also be relevant." Id. at 750.

adopted the second, or "time channeling," approach. The effect of the widespread adoption of time channeling was to eliminate altogether the transmission of the targeted programming outside the safe harbor period in affected cable service areas. In other words, for two-thirds of the day, no household in those service areas could receive the programming, whether or not the household or the viewer wanted to do so. The Court began its analysis by making two remarks. First, it assumed that many adults themselves would find the material "highly offensive;" and since the material came unwanted into homes where children might see or hear it against parental wishes or consent, there were "legitimate reasons for regulating it." Second Playboy's programming had First Amendment protection. "It [wa]s not alleged to be obscene; adults ha[d] a constitutional right to view it; the Government disclaim[ed] any interest in preventing children from seeing or hearing it with the consent of their parents; and Playboy ha[d] concomitant rights under the First Amendment to transmit it." The Court next pointed out that the speech in question was defined by its content; and the statute that sought to restrict it was content-based. Besides, the effect of the statute on the protected speech was substantial, since 30 to 50 percent of all adult programming was viewed by households prior to ten p.m.. This content-based burden could stand only if it satisfied strict scrutiny. Hence, it should be "narrowly tailored to promote a compelling Government interest. . . . If a less restrictive alternative would serve the Government's purpose, the legislature must use that alternative." Section 504 of the Act required a cable operator "upon request by a cable service subscriber . . . without charge, [to] fully scramble or otherwise fully block" any channel the subscriber did not wish to receive. Cable systems had the capacity to block unwanted channels on a household-by-household basis. The corollary, of course, was that targeted blocking enabled the government to support parental authority without affecting the First Amendment interests of speakers and willing listeners. Simply put, targeted blocking was less restrictive than banning, and the government could not ban speech if targeted blocking were a feasible and effective means of furthering its compelling interests. Since a plausible, less restrictive alternative was offered to this content-based speech restriction, it was the government's obligation to prove that the alternative would be ineffective to achieve its goals. But the government failed to meet that burden. In support of its position, the government cited empirical evidence showing that Section 504 had generated few requests for household-by-household blocking. The district court had explored three explanations for the lack of individual blocking requests: (1) individual blocking might not be an effective alternative, due to technological or other limitations; (2) although an adequately advertised blocking provision might have been effective, Section 504, as written, did not require sufficient notice to make it so; (3) the actual signal bleed problem might be far less of a concern than the government at first had supposed. To sustain its statute, the government should have shown that the first was the right answer. According to the district court, however, the first and third possibilities were "equally consistent" with the record before it. As for the second, the record was "not clear" as to whether enough notice had been issued to give Section 504 a fighting chance. The case, then, was at best a draw. Since the district court's findings were not clearly erroneous, "the tie [went] to free expression." With regard to signal bleed itself, there was little hard evidence of how widespread or how serious the problem was. Indeed, there was no proof as to how likely any child was to view a discernible explicit image, and no proof of the duration of the bleed or the quality of the pictures or sound. Under Section 505, sanctionable signal bleed could include instances as fleeting as an image appearing on a screen for just a few seconds. "The First Amendment requires a more careful assessment and characterization of an evil in order to justify a regulation as sweeping as this." The government failed to establish a pervasive, nationwide problem justifying its nationwide daytime speech ban. The government also failed to prove Section 504, with adequate notice, would be ineffective. There was no evidence that a well-promoted voluntary blocking provision would not be capable at least of informing parents about signal bleed (if they were not yet aware of it) and about their rights to have the bleed blocked (if they considered it a problem and had not yet controlled it themselves). Correlatively, the court noted that it was no response that voluntary blocking required a consumer to take action, or might be inconvenient, or might not go perfectly every time. "A court should not assume a plausible, less restrictive alternative would be ineffective; and a court should not presume parents, given full information, [would] fail to act." Moreover, the Court rejected the argument that society's independent interests would be unserved if parents failed to act on that information. Even upon the assumption that the government had an interest in substituting itself for informed and empowered parents, its interest was not sufficiently compelling to justify this widespread restriction on speech. The government's argument stemmed from the idea that parents did not know their children were viewing the material on a scale or frequency to cause concern, or if so, that parents did not want to take affirmative steps to block it, and their decisions were to be superseded. These assumptions had not been established; and, in any event, the assumptions applied only in a regime where the option of blocking had not been explained. The whole point of a publicized Section 504 would be to advise parents that indecent material might be shown and to afford them an opportunity to block it at all times, even when they were not at home and even after ten p.m.. Time channeling did not offer this assistance. The regulatory alternative of a publicized Section 504, which had the real possibility of promoting more open disclosure and the choice of an effective blocking system, would provide parents the information needed to engage in active supervision. The government did not show that this alternative, a regime of added communication and support, would be insufficient to secure its objective, or that any overriding harm justified its intervention.[427]

[I152] Telecommunications Consortium presented First Amendment challenges to three provisions of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, which sought to regulate the broadcasting of "patently offensive" sex-related material on cable television. Section 10(a) of the Act permitted cable system operators to prohibit "patently offensive" (or "indecent") programming transmitted over "leased access channels" reserved under federal law for commercial lease by parties unaffiliated with the cable television system operator. This provision was declared constitutional. "The importance of the interest at stake there—protecting children from exposure to patently offensive depictions of sex; the accommodation of the interests of programmers in maintaining access channels and of cable operators in editing the contents of their channels; the similarity of the problem and its solution to those at issue in Pacifica;[428] and the flexibility inherent in an approach that permits private cable operators to make editorial decisions," led four Justices to conclude that Section 10(a) was "a sufficiently tailored response to an extraordinarily important problem."[429] Three other members of the Court noted that "cable operators are generally entitled to much the same First Amendment protection as the print media" and that, therefore, the cable operator's editorial rights have "general primacy" under the First Amendment over the rights of programmers to transmit and of viewers to watch.[430]

[427] United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, 529 U.S. 803, 811–26 (2000).

[428] See para. I150.

[429] Denver Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 518 U.S. 727, 743 (1996) (opinion of Breyer, J., joined by Stevens, O'Connor and Souter, JJ.).

[I153] Section 10(c) of the Act permitted a cable operator to prevent transmission of "patently offensive" programming on public access channels. This provision was invalidated. Three Justices found that Section 10(c), was different from Section 10(a) for four reasons. First, cable operators had not historically exercised editorial control over public access channels; hence, the government had no interest in restoring a cable operator's First Amendment right of editorial discretion. Second, programming on those channels was normally subject to complex supervisory systems composed of both public and private elements, and Section 10(c) was therefore likely less necessary to protect children. Third, the existence of a system that encouraged and secured programming, which the community considered valuable, strongly suggested that a "cable operator's veto" was more likely to erroneously exclude borderline programs, which should be broadcast, than to achieve the statute's basic objective of protecting children. Finally, the examination of the legislative history and the record of the case was consistent with what common sense suggested, namely that the public/non-profit programming control systems in place would normally avoid, minimize, or eliminate any child-related problems concerning "patently offensive" programming; the government had not shown that there was a significant enough problem of patently offensive broadcasts to children, over public access channels, which justified the restriction imposed by Section 10(c). Consequently, the plurality concluded that the government could not sustain its burden of showing that Section 10(c) was necessary to protect children or that it was appropriately tailored to secure that end.[431] Two other Justices concurred in this judgment. They held that, because the public access channels regulated by Section 10(c) were required by local cable franchise authorities, those channels were "designated public fora." Section 10(c) vested the cable operator with a power under federal law, defined by reference to the content of speech, to undercut the public forum. The provision was not narrowly tailored to serve the compelling government interest in protecting children from indecent speech, mainly because, to the extent some operators might allow indecent programming, children in localities those operators served would be left unprotected. "Partial service of a compelling interest is not narrow tailoring. . . . Put another way, the interest in protecting children from indecency only at the caprice of the cable operator is not compelling."[432]

[I154] Section 10(b) of the Act required cable system operators to place "patently offensive" leased channel programming on a separate channel; to block that channel; to unblock the channel within 30 days of a subscriber's written request for access; and to reblock the channel within 30 days of a subscriber's request for reblocking. Also, leased channel programmers should notify cable operators of an intended "patently offensive" broadcast up to 30 days before its scheduled broadcast date. These requirements had obvious restrictive effects. The several up-to-30-day delays, along with single channel segregation, meant that a subscriber could not decide to watch a single program without considerable advance planning and without letting the "patently offensive" channel in

---

430 Id. at 815, 817 (opinion of Thomas, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Scalia, J.).

431 Id. at 760–66 (plurality opinion of Breyer, J., joined by Stevens and Souter, JJ.).

432 Id. at 781–83, 791–94, 806–07 (opinion of Kennedy, J., joined by Ginsburg, J.).

its entirety invade his household for days, perhaps weeks at a time. These restrictions would prevent programmers from broadcasting to viewers who would like to select programs day by day (or, through "surfing," minute by minute); to viewers who would like occasionally to watch a few, but not many, of the programs on the "patently offensive" channel; and to viewers who simply tended to judge a program's value through channel reputation. The "written notice" requirement would further restrict viewing by subscribers who feared for their reputations in case the operator, advertently or inadvertently, disclosed the list of those who wished to watch the "patently offensive" channel. In addition, the added costs and burdens that these requirements imposed upon a cable system operator might encourage that operator to ban programming that the operator would otherwise permit to run, even if only late at night. Moreover, the "segregate and block" restrictions on speech were not a narrowly, or reasonably, tailored effort to protect children. Under federal law, cable operators should scramble or block sexually explicit material on any unleased channel "primarily dedicated to sexually oriented programming;" they had to honor a subscriber's request to block any, or all, programs on any channel to which he or she did not wish to subscribe; and they were required to provide upon the request of a subscriber, a device by which the subscriber could prohibit viewing of a particular cable service during periods selected by the subscriber. These provisions were significantly less restrictive than Section 10(b). And the record of the case did not explain why blocking alone—without written access requests—adequately protected children from exposure to regular sex-dedicated channels, but could not adequately protect those children from programming on similarly sex-dedicated channels that were leased. Section 10(b) was, thus, "overly restrictive, sacrificing important First Amendment interests for too speculative a gain."[433]

[I155] Obscene or Indecent Telephone Messages. In Sable, a company engaged in the business of offering sexually oriented prerecorded telephone messages (popularly known as "dial-a-porn") challenged the constitutionality of a federal statute that imposed a blanket prohibition on indecent as well as obscene inter-state commercial telephone messages. The Court held that the statute, which did not establish a "national standard" of obscenity, was constitutional insofar as it applied to obscene messages. In so holding, the Court emphasized that "[t]here is no constitutional barrier . . . to prohibiting communications that are obscene in some communities under local standards, even though they are not obscene in others. . . . Sable [wa]s free to tailor its messages, on a selective basis, if it so [chose], to the communities it [chose] to serve. While Sable [might] be forced to incur some costs in developing and implementing a system for screening the locale of incoming calls, there [wa]s no constitutional impediment to enacting a law which [might] impose such costs on a medium electing to provide these messages. . . . If Sable's audience [wa]s comprised of different communities with different local standards, Sable ultimately [bore] the burden of complying with the prohibition on obscene messages."[434]

[I156] In attempting to justify the complete ban and criminalization of indecent commercial telephone messages, the government relied on Pacifica,[435] arguing that the ban was necessary to prevent children from gaining access to such messages. The Sable Court agreed that there was a compelling interest in protecting the physical and psychologi-

---

[433] Id. at 753–60.

[434] Sable Communications of California v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 492 U.S. 115, 125–26 (1989).

[435] See para. I150.

cal well-being of minors, which extended to shielding them from indecent messages that are not obscene by adult standards. The challenged ban, however, "was not only a total governmentally imposed ban on a category of communications, but also involved a communications medium, telephone service, that was significantly less likely to expose children to the banned material, was less intrusive, and allowed for significantly more control over what comes into the home than broadcasting."[436] As the Court explained, "the dial-it medium requires the listener to take affirmative steps to receive the communication; . . . callers will generally not be unwilling listeners. . . . Unlike an unexpected outburst on a radio broadcast, the message received by one who places a call to a dial-a-porn service is not so invasive or surprising that it prevents an unwilling listener from avoiding exposure to it."[437] Further, the Court set aside the ban on indecent dial-a-porn messages mainly because the FCC had previously imposed certain default rules—credit card payment, access code use, or message scrambling and use of a descrambler, the sale of which would be limited to adults—intended to prevent access by minors, and there was no evidence that those rules were ineffective. Since the record of the case showed that "the FCC's technological approach to restricting dial-a-porn messages to adults who [sought] them would be extremely effective, and that only a few of the most enterprising and disobedient young people would manage to secure access to such messages," the Court concluded that the provision was not a narrowly tailored effort to serve the compelling interest of preventing minors from being exposed to indecent telephone messages.[438]

[I157] Obscene or Indecent Material on the Internet. "The Web contains a wide array of sexually explicit material, including hardcore pornography. . . . Because navigating the Web is relatively straightforward, . . . and access to the Internet is widely available in homes, schools, and libraries across the country, . . . children may discover this pornographic material either by deliberately accessing pornographic Web sites or by stumbling upon them."[439] Congress first attempted to protect children from exposure to pornographic material on the Internet by enacting the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA). The CDA prohibited the knowing transmission over the Internet of "obscene or indecent" messages to any recipient under 18 years of age. It also forbade any individual from knowingly sending over or displaying on the Internet certain "patently offensive" material in a manner available to persons under 18 years of age. The prohibition specifically extended to "any comment, request, suggestion, proposal, image, or other communication that, in context, depict[ed] or describ[ed], in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs." The CDA provided two affirmative defenses to those prosecuted under the statute. The first protected individuals who took "good faith, reasonable, effective, and appropriate actions" to restrict minors from accessing obscene, indecent, and patently offensive material over the Internet. The second shielded those who restricted minors from accessing such material by requiring use of a verified credit card, debit account, adult access code, or adult personal identification number. Notwithstanding these affirmative defenses, in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, the

---

436 See Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 518 U.S. 727, 748 (1996) (plurality opinion), discussing Sable.

437 Sable Communications of California v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 492 U.S. 115, 127–28 (1989).

438 Id. at 130–31.

439 Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 566–67 (2002).

Court held that the CDA's regulation of indecent transmissions, and the display of patently offensive material, ran afoul of the First Amendment. The Court concluded that the CDA lacked the precision that the First Amendment requires when a statute regulates the content of speech because, "[i]n order to deny minors access to potentially harmful speech, the CDA effectively suppress[ed] a large amount of speech that adults ha[d] a constitutional right to receive and to address to one another."[440] This holding was based on three crucial considerations. First, "existing technology did not include any effective method for a sender to prevent minors from obtaining access to its communications on the Internet without also denying access to adults. . . . Given the size of the potential audience for most messages, in the absence of a viable age verification process, the sender [should] be charged with knowing that one or more minors [would] likely view it. Knowledge that, for instance, one or more members of a 100-person chat group [would] be minor—and therefore that it would be a crime to send the group an indecent message—would surely burden communication among adults. . . . [And] [a]s a practical matter, . . . it would be prohibitively expensive for noncommercial—as well as some commercial—speakers who ha[d] Web sites to verify that their users [we]re adults. . . . These limitations [would] inevitably curtail a significant amount of adult communication on the Internet."[441] Second, "[t]he breadth of the CDA's coverage [wa]s wholly unprecedented. . . . [T]he scope of the CDA [wa]s not limited to commercial speech or commercial entities. Its open-ended prohibitions embrace[d] all nonprofit entities and individuals posting indecent messages or displaying them on their own computers in the presence of minors. The general, undefined terms 'indecent' and 'patently offensive' cover[ed] large amounts of nonpornographic material with serious educational or other value. Moreover, the 'community standards criterion as applied to the Internet mean[t] that any communication available to a nationwide audience [would] be judged by the standards of the community most likely to be offended by the message. [As a result, regulated subject matter under the CDA extended] to discussions about prison rape or safe sexual practices and artistic images that included nude subjects."[442] Third, the government failed to explain why a less restrictive provision would not be as effective as the CDA. The arguments in the Court referred to possible alternatives "such as requiring that indecent material be 'tagged' in a way that facilitate[d] parental control of material coming into their homes, making exceptions for messages with artistic or educational value, providing some tolerance for parental choice, and regulating some portions of the Internet—such as commercial Web sites—differently than others, such as chat rooms. Particularly in the light of the absence of any detailed findings by the Congress, or even hearings addressing the special problems of the CDA, [the Court was] persuaded that the CDA [wa]s not narrowly tailored."[443] Relatedly the Court found that neither affirmative defense set forth in the CDA constituted the sort of narrow tailoring that would save an otherwise patently invalid unconstitutional provision. The government's argument that transmitters might take protective "good faith action" by "tagging" their indecent communications in a way that would indicate their contents, thus permitting recipients to block their reception with appropriate software, was illusory, given the requirement that such action be "effective:" the proposed screening software did not then-currently exist, but, even if it did, there would be no way of

[440] Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 874 (1997).

[441] Id. at 876–77.

[442] Id. at 877–78.

[443] Id. at 879.

knowing whether a potential recipient would actually block the encoded material. And as to the defense covering those who restricted access to covered material by requiring certain designated forms of age proof, such as a verified credit card or an adult identification number or code, the Court noted that, such verification, though actually being used by some commercial providers of sexually explicit material, was not economically feasible for most non-commercial speakers.[444] Consequently, only the CDA's ban on the knowing transmission of obscene messages survived scrutiny.[445]

[I158] After Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, Congress passed the Child Online Protection Act (COPA). COPA prohibited any person from "knowingly and with knowledge of the character of the material, in inter-state or foreign commerce by means of the World Wide Web, mak[ing] any communication for commercial purposes that is available to any minor and that includes any material that is harmful to minors." "Apparently responding to [the Court's] objections to the breadth of the CDA's coverage, Congress limited the scope of COPA's coverage in at least three ways. First, while the CDA applied to communications over the Internet as a whole, including, for example, e-mail messages, COPA applie[d] only to material displayed on the World Wide Web. Second, unlike the CDA, COPA cover[ed] only communications made 'for commercial purposes.' . . . And third, while the CDA prohibited 'indecent' and 'patently offensive' communications, COPA restrict[ed] only the narrower category of material that was 'harmful to minors.'"[446] Drawing on the three-part test for obscenity set forth in Miller, COPA defined "material that is harmful to minors" as "any communication, picture, image, graphic image file, article, recording, writing, or other matter of any kind that is obscene or that—(A) the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, taking the material as a whole and with respect to minors, is designed to appeal to, or is designed to pander to, the prurient interest; (B) depicts, describes, or represents, in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, an actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual act, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast; and (C) taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value for minors." Like the CDA, COPA also provided affirmative defenses to those subject to prosecution under the statute. An individual might qualify for a defense if he, "in good faith, has restricted access by minors to material that is harmful to minors—(A) by requiring the use of a credit card, debit account, adult access code, or adult personal identification number; (B) by accepting a digital certificate that verifies age; or (C) by any other reasonable measures that are feasible under available technology." Persons violating COPA were subject to both civil and criminal sanctions. The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit found that COPA's use of "contemporary community standards" to identify material that was harmful to minors rendered the statute substantially overbroad. Because Web publishers were without any means to limit access to their sites based on the geographic location of particular Internet users, the court of appeals reasoned that COPA would require any material that might be deemed harmful by the most puritan of communities in any state to be placed behind an age or credit card verification system. Hypothesizing that this step would require Web publishers to shield vast amounts of material, the court of appeals was persuaded that this aspect of COPA leaded inexorably

---

444 Id. at 881–82.

445 Id. at 883.

446 Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 569–70 (2002) (Ashcroft I).

to a holding of a likelihood of unconstitutionality of the entire COPA statute. The Court disagreed. In Ashcroft I, the Court held that COPA's reliance on community standards to identify "material that is harmful to minors" did not by itself render the statute substantially overbroad for purposes of the First Amendment.[447] Justice Thomas, in his opinion joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Scalia, J., noted that "community standards need not be defined by reference to a precise geographic area" and found that the Internet's unique characteristics do not justify adopting a different approach than that set forth in Hamling and Sable.[448] While the Reno Court had stressed that the "community standards" criterion, as applied to the Internet, meant that any communication available to a nationwide audience would be judged by the standards of the community most likely to be offended by the message, the CDA's use of community standards to identify patently offensive material was particularly problematic in light of that statute's unprecedented breadth and vagueness. COPA, by contrast, did not appear to suffer from the same flaw, because it applied to significantly less material than did the CDA and defined the harmful-to-minors material restricted by the statute in a manner parallel to the Miller definition of obscenity. In that respect, COPA's exclusion of material with serious value for minors was of great importance. This was because, unlike the "patently offensive" and "prurient interest" criteria, the "serious value" requirement is not judged by contemporary community standards, for "the value of [a] work [does not] vary from community to community based on the degree of local acceptance it has won."[449] Thus, the serious value requirement allowed courts "to impose some limitations and regularity on the definition by setting, as a matter of law, a national floor for socially redeeming value."[450] Justice O'Connor agreed with the plurality that, "even under local community standards, the variation between the most and least restrictive communities [wa]s not so great with respect to the narrow category of speech covered by COPA as to, alone, render the statute substantially overbroad, . . . given respondents' failure to provide examples of materials that lacked literary, artistic, political, and scientific value for minors, which would nonetheless result in variation among communities judging the other elements of the test." At the same time, O'Connor pointed out that respondents' failure to prove substantial overbreadth on a facial challenge in that case still left open the possibility that the use of local community standards would cause problems for regulation of obscenity on the Internet, for adults as well as children, in future cases. In an as-applied challenge, for instance, individual litigants might still dispute that the standards of a community more restrictive than theirs should apply to them. And in future facial challenges to regulation of obscenity on the Internet, litigants could make a more convincing case for substantial overbreadth. Moreover, "given Internet speakers' inability to control the geographic location of their audience, expecting them to bear the burden of controlling the recipients of their speech, . . . [might] be entirely too much to ask, and would potentially suppress an inordinate amount of expression." For these reasons, O'Connor held that "adoption of a national standard is necessary for any reasonable regulation of Internet obscenity."[451] Justice Breyer found that, in light of COPA's [447] Id. at 585. The Court did not express any view as to whether COPA suffered from substantial overbreadth for other reasons, whether the statute was unconstitutionally vague, or whether the statute likely would not survive strict scrutiny analysis.

---

[448] See para. I155.

[449] See para. I131.

[450] Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 578–79 (2002) (plurality opinion), quoting Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 873 (1997).

[451] Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 586–87 (2002).

legislative history, the statutory word "community" referred to the nation's adult community taken as a whole, not to geographically separate local areas; this view of the statute avoided the need to examine the serious First Amendment problem that would otherwise exist.[452] Justices Kennedy, Souter, and Ginsburg recognized that the national variation in community standards constitutes a particular burden on Internet speech. They would not assume that the Act was narrow enough to render the national variation in community standards unproblematic. Further, they would have remanded the case, because, in order to discern whether the variation created substantial overbreadth, it was necessary to clarify what speech COPA regulated and what community standards it invoked.[453] Justice Stevens dissented, noting, inter alia, that, "within the subset of images deemed to have no serious value for minors, the decision whether minors and adults throughout the country [would] have access to that speech [would] still be made by the most restrictive community. . . . [And] [b]ecause communities differ widely in their attitudes toward sex, particularly when minors are concerned, . . . applying community standards to the Internet [would] restrict a substantial amount of protected speech that would not be considered harmful to minors in many communities."[454]

[I159] Ashcroft I decided that the community-standards language did not, standing alone, make COPA unconstitutionally overbroad. The Court emphasized, however, that its decision was limited to that narrow issue. In Ashcroft II, the Court held that the lower courts had been correct in enjoining the enforcement of COPA, because the statute likely violated the First Amendment.[455] Respondents had proposed that blocking and filtering software was a less restrictive alternative available for the government to serve the interest of preventing minors from using the Internet to gain access to materials harmful to them, and the government had not shown it would be likely to disprove that contention at trial. The Court stressed that filters were less restrictive than COPA. They imposed "selective restrictions on speech at the receiving end, not universal restrictions at the source." Under a filtering regime, adults without children might gain access to speech they had a right to see without having to identify themselves or provide their credit card information. Even adults with children could obtain access to the same speech on the same terms simply by turning off the filter on their home computers. "Above all, promoting filter use [would] not condemn as criminal any category of speech, and so the potential chilling effect [would be] eliminated, or at least much diminished." Filters, moreover, might well be more effective than COPA. First, the record demonstrated that a filter could prevent minors from seeing all pornography, not just pornography posted to the Web from America. That COPA did not prevent minors from accessing foreign harmful materials "alone ma[de] it possible that filtering software might be more effective in serving Congress' goals." COPA's effectiveness was "likely to diminish even further if COPA [we]re upheld, because providers of the materials covered by the statute simply could move their operations overseas." In addition, the district court had found that verification systems might be subject to evasion and circumvention, e.g., by minors having their own credit cards. Finally, filters also might be more effective because they could be applied to all forms of Internet communica-

---

[452] Id. at 590.

[453] Id. at 597–602.

[454] Id. at 609, 611.

[455] The Court applies the "abuse of discretion" standard on the review of a preliminary injunction. "If the underlying constitutional question is close, therefore, [the Court] should uphold the injunction and remand for trial on the merits." See Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 542 U.S. 656, 664–65 (2004) (Ashcroft II).

tion, including e-mail, not just the World Wide Web. Although filtering software would not be a perfect solution because it might block some materials not harmful to minors and fail to catch some that were, the government had not satisfied its burden to introduce specific evidence proving that filters were less effective. The argument that filtering software was not an available alternative, because Congress could not require its use, carried "little weight," since Congress might "act to encourage the use of filters" by giving "strong incentives" to schools and libraries, and by promoting the development of filters by industry and their use by parents.[456]

[I160] In American Library Association, the Court upheld on its face a provision of the Children's Internet Protection Act, which forbade public libraries from receiving federal financial assistance for Internet access unless they installed software to block obscene or pornographic images and to prevent minors from accessing material harmful to them. A four-member plurality found that, because public libraries' use of Internet filtering software did not violate their patrons' First Amendment rights, the statute did not induce libraries to violate the Constitution and was a valid exercise of Congress' spending power. As the plurality noted, "the government has broad discretion to make content-based judgments in deciding what private speech to make available to the public. . . . [And] public libraries must have broad discretion to decide what material to provide to their patrons," in order to fulfill their traditional missions of facilitating learning and cultural enrichment. Further, "Internet access in public libraries is neither a 'traditional' nor a 'designated' public forum. . . . A public library does not acquire Internet terminals in order to create a public forum for Web publishers to express themselves, any more than it collects books in order to provide a public forum for the authors of books to speak. It provides Internet access not to 'encourage a diversity of views from private speakers,' . . . but for the same reasons it offers other library resources: to facilitate research, learning, and recreational pursuits by furnishing materials of requisite and appropriate quality." The fact that a library reviews and affirmatively chooses to acquire every book in its collection but does not review every Web site that it makes available, is not a constitutionally relevant distinction. "Most libraries already exclude pornography from their print collections because they deem it inappropriate for inclusion. [The Court does] 456 Ashcroft v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 542 U.S. 656, 667–70 (2004). "Important practical reasons" also supported letting the injunction stand pending a full trial on the merits. "First, the potential harms from reversal outweigh[ed] those of leaving the injunction in place by mistake. Where a prosecution is a likely possibility, yet only an affirmative defense is available, speakers may self-censor rather than risk the perils of trial. There is a potential for extraordinary harm and a serious chill upon protected speech. . . . The harm done from letting the injunction stand pending a trial on the merits, in contrast, [would] not be extensive. No prosecutions ha[d] yet been undertaken under the statute, . . . [and the Government could] enforce obscenity laws already on the books. Second, there [we]re substantial factual disputes remaining in the case, [including] a serious gap in the evidence as to the filtering software's effectiveness. . . . By allowing the preliminary injunction to stand and remanding for trial, [the Court] require[d] the Government to shoulder its full constitutional burden of proof respecting the less restrictive alternative argument, rather than excuse it from doing so. Third, . . . [the Court] allow[ed] the parties to update and supplement the factual record to reflect current technological realities. [Finally the district court could also] take account of the changed legal landscape, . . . [since, during the intervening time,] Congress ha[d] passed at least two further statutes that might qualify as less restrictive alternatives to COPA—a prohibition on misleading domain names, and a statute creating a minors-safe 'dot Kids' domain." Id. at 670–72.

---

not subject these decisions to heightened scrutiny; it would make little sense to treat libraries' judgments to block online pornography any differently when these judgments are made for just the same reason. Moreover, because of the vast quantity of material on the Internet and the rapid pace at which it changes, libraries cannot possibly segregate, item by item, all the Internet material that is appropriate for inclusion from all that is not. While a library could limit its Internet collection to just those sites it found worthwhile, it could do so only at the cost of excluding an enormous amount of valuable information that it lacks the capacity to review. Given that tradeoff, it is entirely reasonable for public libraries to reject that approach and instead exclude certain categories of content, without making individualized judgments that everything they do make available has requisite and appropriate quality." Finally, concerns over filtering software's tendency to erroneously "overblock" were dispelled by the ease with which patrons might have the filtering software disabled.[457] Two other Justices concurred in the judgment, finding that the provision served the compelling government interest in protecting young library users from material inappropriate for minors and imposed only a small burden upon library patrons seeking legitimate Internet materials, since it allowed libraries to unblock filtered material or disable the Internet software filter on an adult user's request or for bona fide research purposes.[458]

e. Commercial Speech[459]

i. Generally

[I161] Commercial speech is "usually defined as 'speech which does no more than propose a commercial transaction.'"[460] Speech is not rendered commercial by the mere fact that it is labeled as an "advertisement," such as a paid political advertisement; it is carried in a form that is "sold" for profit, like books and motion pictures; the speaker's interest is a primarily economic one (e.g., speech of labor disputants); it involves a solicitation to purchase (e.g., religious literature) or otherwise pay or contribute money (e.g., to a campaign committee); it refers to a specific product.[461] The combination of all these characteristics, however, may provide support for the conclusion that certain types of expression are properly characterized as commercial speech.[462] A company's monopoly position does not alter the First Amendment's protection for its commercial speech.[463] On the other hand, "advertising which links a product to a current public debate is not thereby entitled to the constitutional protection afforded noncommercial speech. . . . A company has the full panoply of protections available to its direct comments on public issues, so there is no reason for providing similar constitutional protection when such statements are made in the context of commercial transactions."[464]

---

457 United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. 194, 204, 206–09 (2003) (plurality opinion).

458 Id. at 214–15 (opinion of Justice Kennedy); id. at 215–20 (opinion of Justice Breyer).

459 See also paras. I241, I242 (government compulsion to finance objectionable advertising).

460 United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405, 409 (2001), quoting Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 762 (1976).

461 See Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 761 (1976), in conjunction with Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 66–67 (1983).

462 Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 67 (1983).

463 See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 567–68 (1980).

464 See Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 68 (1983), citing Cent. Hudson

[I162] Constitutional protection for commercial speech is of recent vintage. Until the mid-1970s, the Court adhered to the broad rule laid out in Chrestensen, that, while the First Amendment guards against government restriction of speech in most contexts, "the Constitution imposes no such restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising."[465] In 1976, the Court changed course. In Virginia Pharmacy Board, the Court reviewed a state statute barring pharmacists from advertising prescription drug prices. Striking the ban as unconstitutional, the Court rejected the argument that such speech is so removed from "any exposition of ideas" and from "truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of Government" that it lacks all protection. As the Court stressed, a "particular consumer's interest in the free flow of commercial information may be as keen, if not keener by far, than his interest in the day's most urgent political debate. Generalizing, society also may have a strong interest in the free flow of commercial information. Even an individual advertisement, though entirely 'commercial,' may be of general public interest: [e.g.,] advertisements stating that referral services for legal abortions are available; . . . that a manufacturer of artificial furs promotes his product as an alternative to the extinction by his competitors of fur-bearing mammals; . . . or that a domestic producer advertises his product as an alternative to imports that tend to deprive American residents of their jobs. . . . It is a matter of public interest that [economic] decisions, in the Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 563, n.5 (1980). See also Bd. of Trs. of State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 474–75 (1989).

---

Riley involved a state law requirement that, in conducting fundraising for charitable organizations (which is fully protected speech) professional fundraisers must insert in their presentations a statement setting forth the percentage of charitable contributions collected during the previous 12 months that were actually turned over to charities (instead of retained as commissions). In response to the state's contention that the statement was merely compelled commercial speech, the Court said that, if so, it was "inextricably intertwined with otherwise fully protected speech," and that the level of First Amendment scrutiny must depend upon "the nature of the speech taken as a whole and the effect of the compelled statement thereon." Therefore, the Court applied the test for fully protected expression. See Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of the Blind of N. Carolina, Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 796 (1988) (emphasis added). In Riley, the commercial speech (if it was that) was "inextricably intertwined" because "the state law required it to be included." By contrast, there was nothing whatever "inextricable" about the non-commercial aspects of the presentations at issue in Fox, where the Court noted that "no law of man or of nature makes it impossible to sell housewares without teaching home economics, or to teach home economics without selling housewares." See Bd. of Trs. of State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 474 (1989).

[465] Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52, 54 (1942). That construction of the First Amendment was severely cut back in Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975). There, the Court reversed a conviction for violation of a Virginia statute that made the circulation of any publication to encourage or promote the processing of an abortion in Virginia a misdemeanor. The defendant had published in his newspaper the availability of abortions in New York. The advertisement in question, in addition to announcing that abortions were legal in New York, offered the services of a referral agency in that state. The Court rejected the contention that the publication was unprotected, because it was commercial. Chrestensen's continued validity was questioned, and its holding was described as "distinctly a limited one" that merely upheld "a reasonable regulation of the manner in which commercial advertising could be distributed." The Court concluded that the Virginia courts had erred in their assumptions that advertising, as such, was entitled to no First Amendment protection, and observed that the "relationship of speech to the marketplace of products or of services does not make it valueless in the marketplace of ideas." Id. at 819, 825–26.

aggregate, be intelligent and well informed. To this end, the free flow of commercial information is indispensable."[466] Indeed, "[t]he commercial marketplace, like other spheres of our social and cultural life, provides a forum where ideas and information flourish. Some of the ideas and information are vital, some of slight worth. But the general rule is that the speaker and the audience, not the government, assess the value of the information presented."[467] In applying the First Amendment to this area, the Court has rejected the highly paternalistic approach that what people may hear is generally suspect, noting that "people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication, rather than to close them."[468] "Even when advertising communicates only an incomplete version of the relevant facts, the First Amendment presumes that some accurate information is better than no information at all."[469] Nevertheless, there are "common sense" differences between speech proposing a commercial transaction, which occurs in an area traditionally subject to government regulation, and other varieties of speech. These differences "suggest that a different degree of protection is necessary to insure that the flow of truthful and legitimate commercial information is unimpaired."[470] "Because it relates to a particular product or service, commercial speech is more objective, hence more verifiable, than other varieties of speech. Commercial speech, because of its importance to business profits, and because it is carefully calculated, is also less likely than other forms of speech to be inhibited by proper regulation."[471] Attributes such as these "may make it less necessary to tolerate inaccurate statements for fear of silencing the speaker. . . . They may also make it appropriate to require that a commercial message appear in such a form, or include such additional information, warnings, and disclaimers, as are necessary to prevent its being deceptive. . . . They may also make inapplicable the prohibition against prior restraints."[472] "The Constitution therefore accords a lesser protection to commercial speech than to other constitutionally guaranteed expression."[473]

[I163] "The protection available for particular commercial expression turns on the nature both of the expression and of the governmental interests served by its regulation."[474] In Central Hudson, the Court articulated a test for determining whether a particular commercial speech regulation is constitutionally permissible. Under that test,

---

[466] Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 761–65 (1976).

[467] Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761, 767 (1993).

[468] Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 770 (1976).

[469] Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 562 (1980), citing Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 374 (1977).

[470] Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 772, n.24 (1976).

[471] Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1, 10 (1979).

[472] Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 772, n.24 (1976).

[473] Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 562 (1980), citing Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 456–57 (1978). Since there is a constitutional right to advertise, "there is a reciprocal right to receive the advertising." See Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 757 (1976).

[474] Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 563 (1980).

the courts ask, as a threshold matter, whether the commercial speech concerns unlawful activity or is misleading. If so, then the speech is not protected by the First Amendment. If the speech concerns lawful activity and is not misleading, however, the courts next ask "whether the asserted governmental interest is substantial." If it is, then it must be determined "whether the regulation directly advances the governmental interest asserted," and, finally, "whether it is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest."[475] Each of these latter three inquiries must be answered in the affirmative for the regulation to be found constitutional.[476] "The party seeking to uphold a restriction on commercial speech carries the burden of justifying it."[477] Relatedly, the Court also has held that the power to prohibit a particular commercial activity does not necessarily include the power to prohibit advertising about such lawful activity.[478]

[I164] The third step of Central Hudson concerns the relationship between the harm that underlies the state's interest and the means identified by the state to advance that interest. It requires that the speech restriction directly advance the asserted governmental interest. "This burden is not satisfied by mere speculation or conjecture; rather, a governmental body seeking to sustain a restriction on commercial speech must demonstrate that the harms it recites are real and that its restriction will in fact alleviate them to a material degree."[479] The Court does not, however, require "empirical data, . . . accompanied by a surfeit of background information;" litigants may justify speech restrictions "by reference to studies and anecdotes pertaining to different locales altogether, . . . or even, . . . based solely on history, consensus, and simple common sense."[480]

[I165] The last step of the Central Hudson analysis "complements" the third step, asking whether the speech restriction is not more extensive than necessary to serve the interests that support it. What the Court requires "is a 'fit' between the legislature's ends and the means chosen to accomplish those ends . . .—a fit that is not necessarily perfect, but reasonable; that represents not necessarily the single best disposition, but one whose scope is 'in proportion to the interest served;' . . . that employs not necessarily the least restrictive means but . . . a means narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objec-

---

475 Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 566 (1980). Several members of the Court have expressed doubts about the Central Hudson analysis and whether it should apply in particular cases. See, e.g., 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 501, 510–14 (1996) (opinion of Stevens, J., joined by Kennedy and Ginsburg, JJ.); id. at 517 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); id. at 518 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). Nevertheless, Central Hudson remains good law. See Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 554–55 (2001) and Thompson v. W. States Med. Ctr., 535 U.S. 357, 367–68 (2002).

476 See Thompson v. W. States Med. Ctr., 535 U.S. 357, 367 (2002). The Court "review[s] with special care regulations that entirely suppress commercial speech in order to pursue a non-speech-related policy. In those circumstances, a ban on speech could screen from public view the underlying governmental policy." See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 566, n.9 (1980).

477 Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 71, n.20 (1983). When the possibility of deception is self-evident, the Court does not require the state to conduct a survey of the public before it may determine that an advertisement has a tendency to mislead. See Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 652–53 (1985).

478 See Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 193 (1999).

479 Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761, 770–771 (1993).

480 Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 628 (1995).

tive."[481] On the whole, then, the challenged regulation should indicate that its proponent "carefully calculated the costs and benefits associated with the burden on speech imposed by its prohibition."[482] The validity of the restriction is judged "by the relation it bears to the general problem the government seeks to correct, not by the extent to which it furthers the Government's interest in an individual case."[483]

[I166] There are "material differences between disclosure requirements and outright prohibitions on advertising. . . . Because the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides, . . . [one's] constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal. . . . [Certainly,] unjustified or unduly burdensome disclosure requirements might offend the First Amendment by chilling protected commercial speech. But . . . an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers."[484]

ii. Specific Types of Advertising

[I167] Advertising of Legal or Other Professional Services.[485] "In addition to its general interest in protecting consumers and regulating commercial transactions, the State bears a special responsibility for maintaining standards among members of the licensed professions."[486] "The public's comparative lack of knowledge, the limited ability of the professions to police themselves, and the absence of any standardization in the 'product' renders advertising for professional services especially susceptible to abuses that the States have a legitimate interest in controlling. . . . Commercial speech doctrine, in the context of advertising for professional services, may be summarized generally as follows: truthful advertising related to lawful activities is entitled to the protections of the First Amendment. But when the particular content or method of the advertising suggests that it is inherently misleading, or when experience has proved that, in fact, such advertising is subject to abuse, the States may impose appropriate restrictions. Misleading advertising may be prohibited entirely. But the States may not place an absolute prohibition on certain types of potentially misleading information, e.g., a listing of areas of practice, if the information also may be presented in a way that is not deceptive. . . . Although the potential for deception and confusion is particularly strong in the context of advertising professional services, restrictions upon such advertising may be no broader than reasonably necessary to prevent the deception. Even when a communi-

---

[481] Bd. of Trs. of State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 480 (1989). The Court observed that, since the validity of time, place, or manner restrictions is determined under standards very similar to those applicable in the commercial speech context, it would be incompatible with the subordinate position of commercial speech in the scale of First Amendment values to apply a more rigid standard to commercial speech than is applied to fully protected speech. Id. at 477–78.

[482] Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 410, 417 (1993).

[483] United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 430–31 (1993). The Court has emphasized "[t]here is no de minimis exception for a commercial speech restriction that lacks sufficient tailoring or justification." See Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 567 (2001).

[484] Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 650–51 (1985).

[485] See also para. I430.

[486] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 460 (1978).

cation is not misleading, the State retains some authority to regulate. But the State must assert a substantial interest and the interference with speech must be in proportion to the interest served. . . . Restrictions must be narrowly drawn, and the State lawfully may regulate only to the extent regulation furthers the State's substantial interest."[487]

[I168] Bates held that lawyer advertising is a form of commercial speech, protected by the First Amendment, and that advertising by attorneys may not be subjected to blanket suppression. More specifically, the Bates Court held that lawyers must be permitted to advertise not only their name, address, telephone number, office hours, and the like, but also the fees they charge for certain "routine" legal services, such as uncontested divorces, uncontested adoptions, simple personal bankruptcies, and changes of name. The Court recognized, of course, "the spirit of public service with which the profession of law is practiced and to which it is dedicated," but also noted "the real-life fact that attorneys earn their livelihood at the bar." Considering that "the belief that lawyers are somehow 'above' trade has become an anachronism," the Court rejected the claim that price advertising would undermine the professionalism of attorneys. Moreover, the Court stressed that advertising legal services is not inherently misleading. "Although many services performed by attorneys are indeed unique, it is doubtful that any attorney would or could advertise fixed prices for services of that type. The only services that lend themselves to advertising are the routine ones. Although the precise service demanded in each task may vary slightly, and although legal services are not fungible, these facts do not make advertising misleading so long as the attorney does the necessary work at the advertised price. . . . [And] [a]lthough the client may not know the detail involved in performing a specific task, he no doubt is able to identify the service he desires at the level of generality to which advertising lends itself. . . . [Though] [a]dvertising does not provide a complete foundation on which to select an attorney, . . . it would be peculiar to deny the consumer at least some of the relevant information needed for an informed decision on the ground that the information is incomplete. . . . [In addition,] [a]dvertising by attorneys is not an unmitigated source of harm to the administration of justice. It may offer great benefits. Although advertising might increase the use of the judicial machinery, . . . it is [not] always better for a person to suffer a wrong silently than to redress it by legal action. . . . A rule allowing restrained advertising would be in accord with the bar's obligation to 'facilitate the process of intelligent selection of lawyers, and to assist in making legal services fully available.'" Moreover, advertising is more likely to reduce, not advance, the cost of legal services to the consumer, and it may well aid new attorneys in entering the market. Besides, an attorney who is inclined to cut quality will do so regardless of the rule on advertising, the restraints on which are an ineffective way of deterring shoddy work. In holding that advertising by attorneys may not be subjected to blanket prohibition, the Court was careful to point out that, "because the public lacks sophistication concerning legal services, misstatements that might be overlooked or deemed unimportant in other advertising may be found quite inappropriate in legal advertising. For example, advertising claims as to the quality of services are not susceptible of measurement or verification; accordingly, such claims may be so likely to be misleading as to warrant restriction."[488]

---

[487] In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 202–03 (1982). In Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Comm'n of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91, 108 (1990), a four-Justice plurality held that whether the inherent character of a statement places it beyond the protection of the First Amendment is a question of law over which the Court should exercise de novo review.

[488] Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 368–78, 383–84 (1977). In that case, the

[I169] In In re R.M.J., an attorney had been disciplined by the state bar (1) for advertising the areas of his practice in language other than that specified in a state rule; (2) for advertising that he was licensed to practice in both Illinois and Missouri and before the United States Supreme Court, in violation of a state rule; and (3) for mailing announcement cards to persons other than those permitted by a state rule, under which a lawyer could send professional cards announcing a change of address or firm name, or similar matters, only to lawyers, clients, former clients, personal friends, and relatives. The Court decided that none of these three restrictions upon appellant's First Amendment rights could be sustained in the circumstances of that case. Because the listing of areas of practice published by appellant—e.g., "real estate" instead of "property law" as specified by the state rule, and "contracts" and "securities," which were not included in the rule's listing—had not been shown to be misleading, and the state suggested no substantial interest promoted by the restriction, the portion of the state rule specifying the areas of practice that might be listed was held to be an invalid restriction upon speech, as applied to appellant's advertisements. Nor did the state identify any substantial interest in prohibiting a lawyer from identifying the jurisdictions in which he was licensed to practice. Such information was not misleading on its face. Appellant was licensed to practice in both Illinois and Missouri. This was factual and highly relevant information, particularly in light of the geography of the region in which appellant practiced. Somewhat more troubling was appellant's listing, in large capital letters, that he was a member of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Court found that the emphasis of this relatively uninformative fact was at least bad taste. Indeed, such a statement could be misleading to the general public unfamiliar with the requirements of admission to the Bar of the Court. Yet there was nothing in the record to indicate that the inclusion of this information was misleading. Nor did the state rule specifically identify this information as potentially misleading or, for example, place a limitation on type size or require a statement explaining the nature of the Supreme Court Bar. Finally, though mailings and handbills might be more difficult to supervise than newspapers, there was no indication that an inability to supervise was the reason the state restricted the potential audience of announcement cards. Nor was it clear that an absolute prohibition was the only solution; for example, by requiring a filing of a copy of all general mailings, the state might be able to exercise reasonable supervision over such mailings.[489]

[I170] "Much like a trademark, the strength of a certification is measured by the quality of the organization for which it stands. . . . [I]f the certification has been issued by an organization that has made no inquiry into a lawyer's fitness, or by one that issues certificates indiscriminately for a price, . . . statement[s] [made in such certifications,] even if true, could be misleading."[490] Peel involved a state rule that permitted a lawyer to designate any area or field of law in which he concentrated, but prohibited any lawyer from holding himself out as "certified" or a "specialist." There, the Court held that an

---

Court found that the term "legal clinic," included in the advertisement at issue, would be understood to refer to an operation like appellants' that was "geared to provide standardized and multiple services." Moreover, appellants' failure to disclose that a name change might be accomplished by the client without an attorney's aid was not misleading, since most legal services may be performed legally by the citizen for himself. Id. at 381–82.

[489] In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 205–06 (1982).

[490] Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Comm'n of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91, 102 (1990) (plurality opinion).

attorney's use of the designation "Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy" (NBTA) was protected by the First Amendment. NBTA had developed a set of standards and procedures for periodic certification of lawyers with experience and competence in trial work. Those standards, which had been approved by a board of judges, scholars, and practitioners, were objective and demanding. They required specified experience as lead counsel in both jury and non-jury trials, participation in approved programs of continuing legal education, a demonstration of writing skills, and the successful completion of a day-long examination. Certification expired in five years unless the lawyer again demonstrated his or her continuing qualification. The plurality, first, underlined "the distinction between statements of opinion or quality and statements of objective facts that may support an inference of quality. A lawyer's certification by NBTA is a verifiable fact, as are the predicate requirements for that certification. Measures of trial experience and hours of continuing education, like information about what schools the lawyer attended or his or her bar activities, are facts about a lawyer's training and practice. A claim of certification is not an unverifiable opinion of the ultimate quality of a lawyer's work or a promise of success, . . . but is simply a fact, albeit one with multiple predicates from which a consumer may or may not draw an inference of the likely quality of an attorney's work in a given area of practice." Moreover, as the plurality noted, "the public understands that licenses . . . are issued by governmental authorities and that a host of certificates . . . are issued by private organizations," and it seemed "unlikely that petitioner's statement about his certification as a 'specialist' by an identified national organization necessarily would be confused with formal state recognition." Hence, the advertisement in question was neither actually nor inherently misleading.[491] Further, the Court found that the state's interest in avoiding any potential that such advertisements may mislead is insufficient to justify a categorical ban on their use. To the extent that such statements can confuse consumers, the state may, for example, require a disclaimer about the certifying organization or the standards of a specialty.[492]

[I171] Zauderer involved three separate forms of regulation Ohio imposed on advertising by its attorneys: prohibitions on soliciting legal business through advertisements containing advice and information regarding specific legal problems; restrictions on

---

[491] Id. at 101, 103–05, 110 (plurality opinion); id. at 111 (Marshall, J. concurring).

[492] Id. at 110 (plurality opinion) ("[a] State may not . . . completely ban statements that are not actually or inherently misleading"); id. at 111 (Marshall, J. concurring) (a state "may enact regulations other than a total ban to ensure that the public is not misled by [potentially misleading] representations").

See also Ibanez v. Florida Dep't of Bus. and Prof'l Regulation, 512 U.S. 136, 142–49 (1994). There, a member of the Florida Bar, who was also a Certified Public Accountant (CPA) licensed by the Florida Board of Accountancy (Board), and was authorized by the Certified Financial Planner Board of Standards (CFPBS), a private organization, to use the designation "Certified Financial Planner" (CFP), referred to these credentials in her advertising and other communication with the public concerning her law practice, placing CPA and CFP next to her name in her yellow pages listing and on her business cards and law offices stationery. Notwithstanding the apparent truthfulness of the communication, the Board reprimanded Ibanez for engaging in deceptive and misleading advertising. However, the Board did not demonstrate with sufficient specificity that any member of the public could have been misled by Ibanez's constitutionally protected speech or that any harm could have resulted from allowing that speech to reach the public's eyes. The Court therefore held that the Board's decision censuring Ibanez was incompatible with First Amendment restraints on official action.

the use of illustrations in advertising by lawyers; and disclosure requirements relating to the terms of contingent fees. In that case, an attorney practicing law in Ohio ran a newspaper advertisement advising readers that his firm would represent defendants in drunken driving cases, and that his clients' full legal fee would be refunded if they were convicted of drunk driving. Later, appellant ran another newspaper advertisement publicizing his willingness to represent women who had suffered injuries resulting from their use of a contraceptive known as the Dalkon Shield Intrauterine Device. The advertisement featured an accurate line drawing of the device and stated, inter alia, that cases were handled on a contingent fee basis and that, if there was no recovery, no legal fees would be owed by the clients. The Court held that the reprimand of Zauderer violated his First Amendment rights, to the extent that it was based on appellant's use of an illustration in his advertisement and his offer of legal advice. The state's interest in preserving the dignity of the legal profession was insufficient to justify the categorical ban on illustrations in advertising. Nor could the rule be sustained on unsupported assertions that the use of illustrations in attorney advertising created unacceptable risks that the public would be misled, manipulated, or confused, or that, because illustrations could produce their effects by operating on a subconscious level, it would be difficult for the state to point to any particular illustration and prove that it was misleading or manipulative. Moreover, acceptance of such contentions "would be tantamount to adoption of the principle that a State may prohibit the use of pictures or illustrations in connection with advertising of any product or service simply on the strength of the general argument that the visual content of advertisements may, under some circumstances, be deceptive or manipulative." The Court was "not persuaded that identifying deceptive or manipulative uses of visual media in advertising is so intrinsically burdensome that the State is entitled to forgo that task in favor of the more convenient but far more restrictive alternative of a blanket ban on the use of illustrations."[493] Furthermore, the Court held that "[a]n attorney may not be disciplined for soliciting legal business through printed advertising containing truthful and nondeceptive information and advice regarding the legal rights of potential clients."[494] Print advertising "poses no substantial risk of overreaching or undue influence. [It] may convey information and ideas more or less effectively, but in most cases, it will lack the coercive force of the personal presence of a trained advocate. In addition, a printed advertisement, unlike a personal encounter initiated by an attorney, is not likely to involve pressure on the potential client for an immediate yes-or-no answer to the offer of representation. Thus, a printed advertisement is a means of conveying information about legal services that is more conducive to reflection and the exercise of choice on the part of the consumer than is personal solicitation by an attorney."[495] In this context, the Court found unpersuasive the state's contention that a prophylactic rule was necessary because the regulatory problems in distinguishing deceptive and non-deceptive legal advertising were different in kind from the problems presented by the advertising of other types of goods and services.[496] By

---

[493] Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 649 (1985) (plurality opinion); id. at 656 (Brennan, J., concurring); cf. id. at 673 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[494] Id. at 647 (plurality opinion); id. at 656 (Brennan, J., concurring); id. at 673 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[495] Id. at 642.

[496] Id. at 644–46 ("assessment of the validity of legal advice and information contained in attorneys' advertising is not necessarily a matter of great complexity; nor is assessing the accu-contrast, the state's decision to discipline Zauderer for his failure to include in the Dalkon Shield advertisement the information that clients might be liable for litigation costs even if their lawsuits were unsuccessful did not violate the First Amendment. "[A]n advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers" and the above-mentioned requirement did not seem "intrinsically burdensome" or "unreasonable, as applied to" Zauderer. Appellant's advertisement made no mention of the distinction between "legal fees" and "costs," and, to a layman not aware of the meaning of these terms of art, the advertisement would suggest that employing appellant would be a no-lose proposition in that his representation in a losing cause would come entirely free of charge. "The State's position that it is deceptive to employ advertising that refers to contingent fee arrangements without mentioning the client's liability for costs is reasonable enough to support a requirement that information regarding the client's liability for costs be disclosed."[497]

[I172] Under Shapero, a state may not, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, categorically prohibit lawyers from soliciting business for pecuniary gain by sending truthful and non-deceptive letters to potential clients known to face particular legal problems. A particular potential client may feel equally overwhelmed by his legal troubles, and he may have the same impaired capacity for good judgment regardless of whether a lawyer mails him an untargeted letter or exposes him to a newspaper advertisement or instead mails a targeted letter. "The relevant inquiry is not whether there exist potential clients whose 'condition' makes them susceptible to undue influence, but whether the mode of communication poses a serious danger that lawyers will exploit any such susceptibility."[498] Like print advertising, targeted, direct-mail solicitation generally "'poses much less risk of overreaching or undue influence' than does in-person solicitation. Neither mode of written communication involves 'the coercive force of the personal presence of a trained advocate' or the 'pressure on the potential client for an immediate yes-or-no answer to the offer of representation.' . . . Unlike the potential client with a badgering advocate breathing down his neck, the recipient of a letter and 'the reader of an advertisement . . . can effectively avoid further bombardment of his sensibilities simply by averting his eyes.' . . . A letter, like a printed advertisement (but unlike a lawyer), can readily be put in a drawer to be considered later, ignored, or discarded. . . . Nor does a targeted letter invade the recipient's privacy any more than does a substantively identical letter mailed at large. The invasion, if any, occurs when the lawyer discovers the recipient's legal affairs, not when he confronts the recipient with the discovery. Admittedly, a letter that is personalized (not merely targeted) to the recipient presents an increased risk of deception, intentional or inadvertent. It could, in certain circumstances, lead the recipient to overestimate the lawyer's familiarity with the case, or could implicitly suggest that the recipient's legal problem is more dire than it really is. . . . Similarly, an inaccurately targeted letter could lead the recipient to believe [he or] she has a legal problem that she does not actually have or, worse yet, could offer erroneous legal advice. . . . But merely because targeted, direct-mail solicitation presents lawyers with opportunities for isolated abuses or mistakes does not justify a total ban on that mode of protected commercial speech. . . . The State can regulate such racy or capacity to deceive of other forms of advertising the simple process the State makes it out to be").

---

497 Id. at 651–53, n.15 (plurality opinion); id. at 673 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

498 Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 486 U.S. 466, 474 (1988).

abuses and minimize mistakes through far less restrictive and more precise means, the most obvious of which is to require the lawyer to file any solicitation letter with a state agency, . . . giving the State ample opportunity to supervise mailings and penalize actual abuses. . . . [S]crutiny of targeted solicitation letters will [not] be appreciably more burdensome or less reliable than scrutiny of advertisements. As a general matter, evaluating a targeted advertisement does not require specific information about the recipient's identity and legal problems, any more than evaluating a newspaper advertisement requires like information about all readers. If the targeted letter specifies facts that relate to particular recipients, . . . the reviewing agency has innumerable options to minimize mistakes. It might, for example, require the lawyer to prove the truth of the fact stated (by supplying copies of the court documents or material that led the lawyer to the fact); it could require the lawyer to explain briefly how he discovered the fact and verified its accuracy; or it could require the letter to bear a label identifying it as an advertisement, . . . or directing the recipient how to report inaccurate or misleading letters. To be sure, a state agency or bar association that reviews solicitation letters might have more work than one that does not. But . . . 'the free flow of commercial information is valuable enough to justify imposing on would-be regulators the costs of distinguishing the truthful from the false, the helpful from the misleading, and the harmless from the harmful.'"[499]

[I173] In Went For It, the Court upheld a state rule prohibiting personal injury lawyers from sending targeted direct mail solicitations to victims and their relatives for 30 days following an accident or disaster. The principal purpose of the ban was to protect the personal privacy and tranquility of Florida's citizens from crass commercial intrusion by attorneys upon their personal grief in times of trauma. This substantial state interest obviously factored into the Florida Bar's paramount objective of curbing activities that negatively affected the administration of justice. The fact that the harms targeted by the ban were quite real was demonstrated by a Bar study, which contained extensive statistical and anecdotal data suggesting that the Florida public viewed direct mail solicitations in the immediate wake of accidents as an intrusion on privacy that reflected poorly upon the profession. These harms could not be eliminated by "a brief journey to the trash can," since "[t]he purpose of the 30-day targeted direct mail ban [wa]s to forestall the outrage and irritation with the state-licensed legal profession that the practice of direct solicitation only days after accidents ha[d] engendered." Further, the Bar's rule was reasonably well tailored to its stated objective. The Court found no constitutional deficiency in the ban's failure to distinguish among injured Floridians by the severity of their pain or the intensity of their grief. "Rather than drawing difficult lines on the basis that some injuries [we]re 'severe' and some situations appropriate for grief, anger, or emotion," the Florida Bar had crafted a ban applicable to all post-accident or disaster solicitations for a brief 30-day period. There were no obvious less burdensome

---

[499] Id. at 475–78. This case involved a letter that would be sent "to potential clients who have had a foreclosure suit filed against them" and would, inter alia, advise the client that "you may be about to lose your home," that "federal law may allow you to . . . ORDER your creditor to STOP," that "you may call my office for FREE information," and that "it may surprise you what I may be able to do for you." A four-member plurality found that, although the letter's liberal use of underscored, uppercase letters and its inclusion of subjective predictions of client satisfaction might catch the recipient's attention more than would a bland statement of purely objective facts in small type, the letter presented no risk of overreaching comparable to that of a lawyer engaged in face-to-face solicitation. Id. at 479.

alternatives to Florida's short temporal ban. Besides, Florida lawyers could advertise on prime-time television and radio as well as in newspapers and in the Yellow Pages of Florida telephone directories; they could rent space on billboards; and they might send untargeted letters to the general population, or to discrete segments thereof. These alternative channels for communicating necessary information about the availability of legal representation during the 30-day period following accidents were sufficient.[500]

[I174] Ohralik held that a state may categorically ban all in-person solicitation by lawyers. This decision turned on two factors. First, in-person solicitation by a lawyer is "a practice rife with possibilities for overreaching, invasion of privacy, the exercise of undue influence, and outright fraud."[501] "[T]he potential for overreaching is great when a lawyer, a professional trained in the art of persuasion, personally solicits an unsophisticated, injured, or distressed lay person. Such an individual may place his trust in a lawyer, regardless of the latter's qualifications or the individual's actual need for legal representation, simply in response to persuasion under circumstances conducive to uninformed acquiescence. . . . [T]he very plight a victim of misfortune not only makes him more vulnerable to influence but also may make advice all the more intrusive. . . . [And] the target of the solicitation may have difficulty avoiding being importuned and distressed even if the lawyer seeking employment is entirely well meaning. . . . Thus, under these adverse conditions the overtures of an uninvited lawyer may distress the solicited individual simply because of their obtrusiveness and the invasion of the individual's privacy, even when no other harm materializes. Under such circumstances, it is not unreasonable for the State to presume that in-person solicitation by lawyers more often than not will be injurious to the person solicited."[502] Second, in-person solicitation presents unique regulatory difficulties, because it is "not visible or otherwise open to public scrutiny. Often there is no witness other than the lawyer and the lay person whom he has solicited, rendering it difficult or impossible to obtain reliable proof of what actually took place. This would be especially true if the lay person were so distressed at the time of the solicitation that he could not recall specific details at a later date."[503] These unique features of in-person solicitation by lawyers, along with "the State's strong interest in regulating members of the Bar in an effective, objective, and self-enforcing manner," justify a prophylactic rule prohibiting lawyers from engaging in such solicitation for pecuniary gain.[504]

[I175] Ohralik did not hold that all personal solicitation is without First Amendment protection. In Edenfield, the Court invalidated a Florida ban on in-person solicitation by certified public accountants (CPAs). Although the state's asserted interests—protecting consumers from fraud or overreaching by CPAs and maintaining CPA independence and ensuring against conflicts of interest—were substantial, the state presented no studies suggesting personal solicitation of prospective business clients by CPAs created the dangers of fraud, overreaching, or compromised independence that the state claimed to fear. And the record did not disclose any anecdotal evidence that validated the state's suppositions. Moreover, the ban could not be justified as a prophylactic rule, because

---

[500] Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 624–34 (1995).

[501] Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 641 (1985).

[502] Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 465–66, n.25 (1978).

[503] Id. at 466.

[504] Id. at 467.

the circumstances of CPA solicitation in the business context are not inherently conducive to overreaching and other forms of misconduct. As the Court noted, "[u]nlike a lawyer, a CPA is not 'a professional trained in the art of persuasion.' A CPA's training emphasizes independence and objectivity, not advocacy." Furthermore, "[t]he typical client of a CPA is far less susceptible to manipulation than the young accident victim in Ohralik. [A CPAs'] prospective clien[t] [is a] sophisticated and experienced business executive[e] who understand[s] well the services that a CPA offers, . . . has an existing professional relation with an accountant, and so has an independent basis for evaluating the claims of a new CPA seeking professional work," selects the time and place for their meeting, and for whom there is no expectation or pressure to retain the CPA on the spot.[505]

[I176] Friedman upheld a Texas ban on practice of optometry under a trade name as a permissible requirement that commercial information "appear in such a form . . . as [is] necessary to prevent its being deceptive."[506] The Court noted that "[a] trade name conveys no information about the price and nature of the services offered by an optometrist until it acquires meaning over a period of time by associations formed in the minds of the public between the name and some standard of price or quality. Because these ill-defined associations of trade names with price and quality information can be manipulated by the users of trade names, there is a significant possibility that trade names will be used to mislead the public. The possibilities for deception are numerous. The trade name of an optometrical practice can remain unchanged despite changes in the staff of optometrists upon whose skill and care the public depends when it patronizes the practice. Thus, the public may be attracted by a trade name that reflects the reputation of an optometrist no longer associated with the practice. A trade name frees an optometrist from dependence on his personal reputation to attract clients, and even allows him to assume a new trade name if negligence or misconduct casts a shadow over the old one. By using different trade names at shops under his common ownership, an optometrist can give the public the false impression of competition among the shops. The use of a trade name also facilitates the advertising essential to large-scale commercial practices with numerous branch offices, conduct the State rationally may wish to discourage while not prohibiting commercial optometrical practice altogether."[507] In addition, the Court emphasized that the restriction on the use of trade names had only "the most incidental effect on the content of the commercial speech of Texas optometrists. As noted above, a trade name conveys information only because of the associations that grow up over time between the name and a certain level of price and quality of service. Moreover, . . . the factual information associated with trade names may be communicated freely and explicitly to the public. An optometrist may advertise the type of service he offers, the prices he charges, and whether he practices as a partner, associate, or employee with other optometrists."[508] In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that, "[r]ather than stifling commercial speech, [the challenged statute ensured] that information regarding optometrical services [would] be communicated more fully and accurately to consumers than it had been in the past, when

---

505 Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761, 774–76 (1993).

506 Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1, 10 (1979).

507 Id. at 12–13.

508 Id. at 16.

optometrists [could] convey the information through unstated and ambiguous associations with a trade name."[509]

[I177] Drug Advertising. In Virginia Pharmacy Board, the Court considered the validity under the First Amendment of a Virginia statute declaring that a pharmacist was guilty of "unprofessional conduct" if he advertised prescription drug prices. Central among the proffered justifications for the advertising ban "were claims that the ban was essential to the maintenance of professionalism among licensed pharmacists. It was asserted that advertising would create price competition that might cause the pharmacist to economize at the customer's expense. He might reduce or eliminate the truly professional portions of his services: the maintenance and packaging of drugs so as to assure their effectiveness, and the supplementation on occasion of the prescribing physician's advice as to use. Moreover, it was said, advertising would cause consumers to price-shop, thereby undermining the pharmacist's effort to monitor the drug use of a regular customer so as to ensure that the prescribed drug would not provoke an allergic reaction or be incompatible with another substance the customer was consuming. Finally, it was argued that advertising would reduce the image of the pharmacist as a skilled and specialized craftsman—an image that was said to attract talent to the profession and to reinforce the good habits of those in it—to that of a mere shopkeeper. . . . Although acknowledging that the State had a strong interest in maintaining professionalism among pharmacists, the Court concluded that the proffered justifications were inadequate to support the advertising ban."[510] High professional standards were assured in large part by the close regulation to which pharmacists in Virginia were subject. And, as the Court observed, "the State's protectiveness of its citizens rest[ed] in large measure on the advantages of their being kept in ignorance" of the entirely lawful terms that competing pharmacists were offering.[511]

[I178] Drug compounding is a process by which a pharmacist or doctor combines, mixes, or alters ingredients to create a medication tailored to the needs of an individual patient (e.g., of a patient who is allergic to an ingredient in a mass-produced product). The Food and Drug Administration Modernization Act of 1997 (FDAMA) exempted "compounded drugs" from the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) standard drug approval requirements under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FDCA), so long as the providers of the compounded drugs abided by several restrictions, including that the prescription be "unsolicited," and that the providers "not advertise or promote the compounding of any particular drug, class of drug, or type of drug." The pharmacy, licensed pharmacist, or licensed physician might, however, advertise and promote the compounding service. The government asserted that three substantial interests underlay the FDAMA: (1) preserving the effectiveness and integrity of the FDCA's new drug approval process and the protection of the public health it provided; (2) preserving the availability of compounded drugs for patients who, for particularized medical reasons, could not use commercially available products approved by the FDA; and (3) achieving the proper balance between those two competing interests. As the Court noted, "[p]reserving the effectiveness and integrity of the FDCA's new drug

---

509 Id.

510 See Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), discussing Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976).

511 Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 768–69 (1976).

approval process [wa]s clearly an important governmental interest, and the Government ha[d] every reason to want as many drugs as possible to be subject to that approval process. The Government also ha[d] an important interest, however, in permitting the continuation of the practice of compounding so that patients with particular needs [might] obtain medications suited to those needs. And it would not make sense to require compounded drugs created to meet the unique needs of individual patients to undergo the testing required for the new drug approval process. . . . [Hence,] the Government need[ed] to be able to draw a line between small-scale compounding and large-scale drug manufacturing. That line [should] distinguish compounded drugs produced on such a small scale that they could not undergo safety and efficacy testing from drugs produced and sold on a large enough scale that they could undergo such testing and therefore [should] do so." The government argued that the FDAMA's speech-related provisions provided just such a line, by using advertising as the trigger for requiring FDA approval, and that Congress' decision to limit the FDAMA's compounding exemption to pharmacies not engaging in promotional activity was "rationally calculated" to avoid creating a loophole that would allow unregulated drug manufacturing to occur under the guise of pharmacy compounding. However, even assuming that the FDAMA's prohibition on advertising compounded drugs directly advanced the government's asserted interests, the Court found that the government had failed to demonstrate that the speech restrictions were "not more extensive than [wa]s necessary to serve those interests." "Several non-speech-related means of drawing a line between compounding and large-scale manufacturing might be possible [in that case.] . . . [T]he Government could ban the use of commercial scale manufacturing or testing equipment for compounding drug products. . . . It could prohibit pharmacists from compounding more drugs in anticipation of receiving prescriptions than in response to prescriptions already received. . . . It could prohibit pharmacists from offering compounded drugs at wholesale to other state licensed persons or commercial entities for resale. . . . Alternately, it could limit the amount of compounded drugs, either by volume or by numbers of prescriptions, that a given pharmacist or pharmacy might sell out of State. . . . Another possibility would be capping the amount of any particular compounded drug, either by drug volume, number of prescriptions, gross revenue, or profit that a pharmacist or pharmacy might make or sell in a given period of time. It might even be sufficient to rely solely on the non-speech-related provisions of the FDAMA, such as the requirement that compounding only be conducted in response to a prescription or a history of receiving a prescription, and the limitation on the percentage of a pharmacy's total sales that out-of-state sales of compounded drugs might represent. The Government ha[d] not offered any reason why these possibilities, alone or in combination, would be insufficient to prevent compounding from occurring on such a scale as to undermine the new drug approval process." Moreover, even if the government had argued (as did the dissent) "that the FDAMA's speech-related restrictions were motivated by a fear that advertising compounded drugs would put people not needing such drugs at risk by causing them to convince their doctors to prescribe the drugs anyway, that fear would fail to justify the restrictions." This concern rested on the questionable assumption that doctors would prescribe unnecessary medications and amounted to a fear that people would make bad decisions if given truthful information, a notion that the Court rejects as a justification for an advertising ban. And even if the government had asserted an interest in preventing people not needing compounded drugs from obtaining those drugs, the statute did not directly advance that interest. The statute did not directly forbid such sales; it instead restricted advertising, of course not just to those who did not need compounded drugs, but also to individuals needing compounded drugs and their doctors. Although the advertising ban might reduce the demand for compounded drugs from those who did not need the drugs, it did nothing to prevent such individuals from obtaining compounded drugs other than requiring prescriptions. Finally, the FDAMA's advertising provisions were unconstitutional because of the amount of beneficial speech that they prohibited. Forbidding the advertisement of compounded drugs would prevent pharmacists with no interest in mass-producing medications, but who served clienteles with special medical needs, from telling the doctors treating those clients about the alternative drugs available through compounding. The fact that the FDAMA would prohibit such seemingly useful speech, even though doing so did not appear to directly further any asserted governmental objective, confirmed that the prohibition was unconstitutional.[512]

[I179] Birth Control Advertising.[513] In Carey v. Population Services International, the Court held that the prohibition of any advertisement or display of contraceptives cannot be justified on the ground that advertisements of contraceptive products would offend and embarrass those exposed to them, and that permitting them would legitimize sexual activity of young people. Such advertisements, which state the availability of products and services that are not only entirely legal, but also constitutionally protected, cannot be totally banned—at least where obscenity is not involved—even if they offend many people, as long as they are not directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and are not likely to incite or produce such action.[514]

[I180] In Bolger, the Court rejected the federal government's paternalistic effort to ban potentially "offensive" and "intrusive" direct mail advertisements for contraceptives. Minimizing the government's allegations of harm, the Court reasoned that recipients of objectionable mailings might effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes. Consequently, the Court found that the "short, though regular, journey from mail box to trash can is an acceptable burden, at least so far as the Constitution is concerned." The second interest asserted by the government—aiding parents' efforts to discuss birth control with their children—was undoubtedly substantial. As a means of effectuating this interest, however, the challenged statute failed to withstand scrutiny. To begin with, such a prohibition provided only "the most limited incremental support for this interest." As the Court assumed, most parents already exercised substantial control over the disposition of mail once it entered their mailboxes. Moreover, under the statute, parents could also exercise control over information that flowed into their mailboxes. And parents should "already cope with the multitude of external stimuli that color[ed] their children's perception of sensitive subjects." Under these circumstances, a ban on unsolicited advertisements served "only to assist those parents who desire[d] to keep their children from confronting such mailings, who [we]re otherwise unable to do so, and whose children ha[d] remained relatively free from such stimuli. This marginal degree of protection [wa]s achieved by purging all mailboxes of unsolicited material that [wa]s entirely suitable for adults." The Court emphasized that "the level of discourse reaching a mailbox simply cannot be limited to that which would be suitable for a sandbox." The prohibition was also defective, because it denied to parents "truthful information bearing on their ability to 512 Thompson v. W. States Med. Ctr., 535 U.S. 357, 369–77 (2002).

---

513 See also para. I162, n.465.

514 Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 701 (1977).

discuss birth control and to make informed decisions in this area." Considering that the proscribed information might "bear on one of the most important decisions parents have a right to make," the Court concluded that such a restriction of the free flow of truthful information constituted a "'basic' constitutional defect, regardless of the strength of the government's interest."[515]

[I181] Advertising of Alcohol or Tobacco Products. In Rubin, the Court struck down a statute prohibiting beer labels from displaying alcohol content. The Court admitted that the government had "a significant interest in protecting the health, safety, and welfare of its citizens by preventing brewers from competing on the basis of alcohol strength, which could lead to greater alcoholism and its attendant social costs." Nevertheless, the Court concluded that the statute could not "directly and materially advance its asserted interest because of the overall irrationality of the Government's regulatory scheme." First, "[t]he failure to prohibit the disclosure of alcohol content in beer advertising, which would seem to constitute a more influential weapon in any strength war than labels, ma[de] no rational sense if the government's true aim [wa]s to suppress strength wars." And while the statute banned the disclosure of alcohol content on beer labels, it allowed the exact opposite in the case of wines and spirits; "[i]f combatting strength wars were the goal, . . . Congress would regulate disclosure of alcohol content for the strongest beverages as well as for the weakest ones." Moreover, the government permitted brewers to signal high alcohol content through use of the term "malt liquor." Hence, other provisions of the same Act directly undermined and counteracted the effects of the challenged prohibition. The statute's defects were further highlighted by the availability of alternatives that would prove less intrusive to the First Amendment's protections for commercial speech, "such as directly limiting the alcohol content of beers, prohibiting marketing efforts emphasizing high alcohol strength, . . . or limiting the labeling ban only to malt liquors."[516]

[I182] 44 Liquormart involved Rhode Island laws banning the advertisement of retail liquor prices except at the place of sale. The state justified the ban on the ground that it was intended to keep alcohol prices high as a way to keep consumption low. By preventing sellers from informing customers of prices, the regulation prevented competition from driving prices down and required consumers to spend more time to find the best price for alcohol. The higher cost of obtaining alcohol, the state argued, would lead to reduced consumption. A majority of the members of the Court agreed that the ban was more extensive than necessary to serve its stated interest, since the state had other methods at its disposal—e.g., "establishing minimum prices and/or increasing sales taxes on alcoholic beverages"—that "would more directly accomplish [its] stated goal without intruding on sellers' ability to provide truthful, nonmisleading information to customers."[517] The Court also found that the Twenty-first Amendment could not save Rhode Island's price advertising ban, because this Amendment "does not license the States to ignore their obligations under other constitutional provisions," including the First Amendment.[518]

---

[515] Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 72–75 (1983).

[516] Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476, 485, 488–91 (1995).

[517] 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 507, 530 (1996). Four Justices also held that the advertising ban did not directly advance the state's substantial interest in promoting temperance, finding that the state had presented no evidence to suggest that its speech prohibition would significantly reduce alcohol consumption. Id. at 505–06.

[518] Id. at 516.

[I183] "[T]obacco use, particularly among children and adolescents, poses perhaps the single most significant threat to public health in the United States."[519] However, the First Amendment "constrains state efforts to limit advertising of tobacco products, because so long as the sale and use of tobacco is lawful for adults, the tobacco industry has a protected interest in communicating information about its products and adult customers have an interest in receiving that information."[520] In Lorillard Tobacco, the Court invalidated Massachusetts' regulations that (1) prohibited smokeless tobacco or cigar advertising within a 1,000-foot radius of a school or playground, and (2) prohibited indoor, point-of-sale advertising of smokeless tobacco and cigars lower than five feet from the floor of a retail establishment located within 1,000 feet of a school or playground. Although the state provided ample documentation of the problem with underage use of smokeless tobacco and cigars, the first prohibition, did not satisfy Central Hudson's fourth prong. The record indicated that the regulations prohibited advertising in a substantial portion of Massachusetts' major metropolitan areas; in some areas, they would constitute nearly a complete ban on the communication of truthful information. This "substantial geographical reach" was compounded by other factors. "Outdoor" advertising included not only advertising located outside an establishment, but also advertising inside a store if visible from outside. Moreover, the regulations restricted advertisements of any size, and the term advertisement also included oral statements. The Court stressed that the governmental interest in preventing underage tobacco use is substantial, and even compelling, but it is no less true that the sale and use of tobacco products by adults is a legal activity. "The breadth and scope of [the challenged] regulations [did] not demonstrate a careful calculation of the speech interests involved. "First, "[t]he uniformly broad sweep of the geographical limitation demonstrate[d] a lack of tailoring. In addition, the range of communications restricted seem[ed] unduly broad. For instance, it [wa]s not clear from the regulatory scheme why a ban on oral communications [wa]s necessary to further the State's interest. Apparently that restriction mean[t] that a retailer [wa]s unable to answer inquiries about its tobacco products if that communication occur[red] outdoors. Similarly, a ban on all signs of any size seem[ed] ill suited to target the problem of highly visible billboards, as opposed to smaller signs. To the extent that studies ha[d] identified particular advertising and promotion practices appealing to youth, tailoring would involve targeting those practices while permitting others. As crafted, the regulations ma[de] no distinction among practices on this basis."[521] Moreover, "[i]n some instances, Massachusetts' outdoor advertising regulations would impose particularly onerous burdens on speech. . . . For example, if some retailers ha[d] relatively small advertising budgets and use[d] few avenues of communication, then the . . . outdoor advertising regulations potentially place[d] a great burden on those retailers' speech. . . . In addition, a retailer in Massachusetts [might] have no means of communicating to passersby on the street that it sold tobacco products because alternative forms of advertisement, like newspapers, [did] not allow that retailer to propose an instant transaction in the way that on-site advertising does. The ban on any indoor advertising that [wa]s visible from the outside also present[ed] problems in establishments like convenience stores, which have unique security concerns that counsel in favor of full visibility of the store from the outside."[522]

---

519 Food & Drug Admin. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 529 U.S. 120, 161 (2000).

520 Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 571 (2001).

521 Id. at 562–63.

522 Id. at 564–65.

Subsequently, the Court concluded that the state had failed to show that the outdoor advertising regulations for smokeless tobacco and cigars were not more extensive than necessary to advance the state's substantial interest in preventing underage tobacco use. The second prohibition failed both the third and fourth steps of the Central Hudson analysis. The five-foot rule did not seem to advance the goals of preventing minors from using tobacco products and curbing demand for that activity by limiting youth exposure to advertising, for not all children are less than five feet tall, and those who are can look up and take in their surroundings. Moreover, the restriction did not constitute a reasonable fit with these goals.[523]

[I184] Massachusetts had also promulgated regulations requiring retailers to place tobacco products behind counters and requiring customers to have contact with a salesperson before they would be able to handle such a product. The Court found that the state had "demonstrated a substantial interest in preventing access to tobacco products by minors and ha[d] adopted an appropriately narrow means of advancing that interest." Because unattended displays of such products presented an opportunity for access without the proper age verification required by law, the state prohibited self-service and other displays that would allow an individual to obtain tobacco without direct contact with a salesperson. Further, the regulations left open ample communication channels. They did "not significantly impede adult access to tobacco products," and retailers had "other means of exercising any cognizable speech interest in the presentation of their products." The Court presumed that vendors might place empty tobacco packaging on open display, and display actual tobacco products so long as that display would only be accessible to sales personnel. As for cigars, there was no indication that a customer was unable to examine a cigar prior to purchase, so long as that examination could take place through a salesperson.[524]

[I185] Advertising of Gambling and Lottery Activities.[525] Posadas involved a Puerto Rico statute that permitted certain forms of casino gambling in licensed places in order to promote the development of tourism, but also provided that "[n]o gambling room shall be permitted to advertise or otherwise offer their facilities to the public of Puerto Rico." Based on this view of the legislature's intent, a state court had issued a narrowing construction of the statute, declaring that advertisements of the casinos in Puerto Rico were prohibited in the local publicity media addressed to inviting the residents of Puerto Rico to visit the casinos. The Court held that the statute, as construed by the state court, was not unconstitutionally vague and passed muster under the Central Hudson test. First, the particular kind of commercial speech at issue concerned a lawful activity and was not misleading or fraudulent, at least in the abstract. Second, the Puerto Rico legislature's interest in promoting the "health, safety, and welfare" of its citizens, by reducing their demand for gambling, provided a sufficiently "substantial" governmental interest to justify the regulation of gambling advertising. Third, the restrictions on commercial speech directly advanced the government's asserted interest. The Court rejected the argument that the challenged advertising restrictions were underinclusive, because other kinds of gambling, such as horse racing, cockfighting, and the lottery, might be adver-

---

523 Id. at 566–67.

524 Id. at 569–70.

525 Gambling "implicates no constitutionally protected right; rather, it falls into a category of 'vice' activity that can be, and frequently has been, banned altogether." See United States v. Edge Broad. Co., 509 U.S. 418, 426 (1993).

tised to the residents of Puerto Rico, noting that the legislature's interest was not necessarily to reduce demand for all games of chance but to reduce demand for casino gambling. According to the state court, horse racing, cockfighting, or small games of chance at fiestas and the lottery had been "traditionally part of the Puerto Rican's roots," so that "the legislator could have been more flexible than in authorizing more sophisticated games which were not so widely sponsored by the people. . . . In other words, the legislature [had] felt that, for Puerto Ricans, the risks associated with casino gambling were significantly greater than those associated with the more traditional kinds of gambling in Puerto Rico." And fourth, the restrictions were no more extensive than necessary to serve the government's interest since, as construed by the state court, they did not affect advertising aimed at tourists but applied only to advertising aimed at Puerto Rico residents. Relatedly, the Court rejected the contention that the First Amendment required the Puerto Rico legislature to reduce demand for casino gambling among the residents of Puerto Rico not by suppressing commercial speech, which might encourage such gambling, but by promulgating additional speech designed to discourage it. In doing so, the Court said that "it is up to the legislature to decide whether or not such a 'counterspeech' policy would be as effective in reducing the demand for casino gambling as a restriction on advertising. The legislature could conclude . . . that residents of Puerto Rico [we]re already aware of the risks of casino gambling, yet would nevertheless be induced by widespread advertising to engage in such potentially harmful conduct."[526]

[I186] In Edge, the Court confronted a federal statute that generally prohibited the broadcast of any lottery advertisements but allowed broadcasters to advertise state-run lotteries on stations licensed to a state that conducted such lotteries. This exemption had been enacted to accommodate the operation of legally authorized state-run lotteries consistent with continued federal protection to non-lottery states' policies. North Carolina was a non-lottery state, while Virginia sponsored a lottery. Edge Company owned and operated a radio station licensed by the Federal Communications Commission to serve a North Carolina community, and it broadcasted from near the Virginia-North Carolina border. Over 90 percent of its listeners were in Virginia, but the remaining listeners lived in nine North Carolina counties. Wishing to broadcast Virginia lottery advertisements, Edge filed an action, alleging that, as applied to it, the restriction violated the First Amendment. The Court noted, first, that Congress had opted to support the anti-gambling policy of a state like North Carolina by forbidding stations in such a state from airing lottery advertising. At the same time, it had sought not to unduly interfere with the policy of a lottery-sponsoring state, such as Virginia. Congress had made "the common-sense judgment that each North Carolina station would have an audience in that State, even if its signal reached elsewhere, and that enforcing the statutory restriction would insulate each station's listeners from lottery ads, and hence advance the governmental purpose of supporting North Carolina's laws against gambling." This congressional policy of balancing the interests of lottery and non-lottery states constituted a substantial governmental interest, directly served by applying the statutory restriction to all stations in North Carolina. Moreover, the Court held that, in this case, the "fit" between the challenged restriction and the aforesaid government interest was a "reasonable" one. The validity of the restriction at issue should be judged "by the relation it [bore] to the general problem of accommodating the policies of both lottery and non-lottery States, not by the extent to which it further[ed] the Government's interest in an individual case." Because Edge's signals with lottery ads would be heard in the nine counties in North Carolina that its broadcasts reached, this would be in derogation of the substantial federal interest in supporting North Carolina's laws making lotteries illegal. Applying the restriction to a broadcaster, such as Edge, directly advanced the governmental interest in enforcing the restriction in non-lottery states, while not interfering with the policy of lottery states like Virginia. Further, the restriction, as applied to Edge, gave sufficient support to the government's interest. The exclusion of gambling invitations from an estimated 11 percent of the radio listening time in the nine-county area could hardly be called "ineffective." And the restriction was not made ineffective by the fact that Virginia radio and television stations with lottery advertising could be heard in North Carolina. Finally, the Court observed that the government could advance its purpose "by substantially reducing lottery advertising, even where it would not be wholly eradicated."[527]

---

[526] Posadas de Puerto Rico Assocs. v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328, 340–44 (1986).

[I187] In Greater New Orleans Broadcasting, the Court decided that a federal statute prohibiting radio and television broadcasters from carrying advertising about privately operated commercial casino gambling, regardless of the station's or casino's location, could not constitutionally be applied to advertisements of lawful private casino gambling that were broadcast by radio or television stations located in a state where such gambling was legal. The interests asserted by the government were substantial: "(1) reducing the social costs associated with casino and other forms of gambling; and (2) assisting States that restrict[ed] or prohibit[ed] casino and other forms of gambling." However, the Court emphasized that the characterization of these interests as "substantial" was by no means self-evident, since, "in the judgment of both Congress and many state legislatures, the social costs that support the suppression of gambling are offset, and sometimes outweighed, by countervailing policy considerations, primarily in the form of economic benefits." Hence, the Court could not ignore "Congress' unwillingness to adopt a single national policy that consistently endorse[d] either interest asserted" by the government. Considering both the quality of the asserted interests and the information sought to be suppressed, the cross-currents in the scope and application of the challenged statute became more difficult to defend. Consequently, the Court found that the provision in question, as applied to petitioners' case, did not satisfy the third and fourth parts of the Central Hudson test. With regard to the government's first asserted interest, the operation of the statute was so pierced by exemptions and inconsistencies that the government could not hope to exonerate it. While federal law prohibited a broadcaster from carrying advertising about privately operated commercial casino gambling regardless of the station's or casino's location, it exempted advertising about state-run casinos, certain occasional commercial casino gambling, and tribal casino gambling even if the broadcasters were located in or broadcasted to a jurisdiction with the strictest of anti-gambling policies. "To the extent that federal law distinguishe[d] among information about tribal, governmental, and private casinos based on the identity of their owners or operators, the Government present[ed] no sound reason why such lines [bore] any meaningful relationship to the Government's asserted interest." The government's second asserted interest provided no more convincing basis for upholding the regulation than the first. As the Court noted, "even assuming that the state policies on which the Federal Government [sought] to embellish [we]re more coherent and pressing than their federal counterpart, [the challenged statute] sacrifice[d] an intolerable amount of truthful speech about lawful conduct when compared to the diverse policies at stake and the social ills that one could reasonably hope such a ban to eliminate."[528]

---

[527] United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 428–34 (1993).

[I188] Advertising that Promotes Energy Consumption. Central Hudson considered a regulation completely banning all promotional advertising by electric utilities. The Court found that the state's interest in energy conservation was substantial, in view of the "country's dependence on energy resources beyond [its] control." Further, the Court held that this state interest was directly advanced by the challenged regulation, noting that there was "an immediate connection between advertising and demand for electricity." Nevertheless, it concluded that the ban could not be sustained, because it was more extensive than necessary to further the state's interest in energy conservation. The order reached "all promotional advertising, regardless of the impact of the touted service on overall energy use. But the energy conservation rationale, as important as it was, [could not] justify suppressing information about electric devices or services that would cause no net increase in total energy use. In addition, no showing ha[d] been made that a more limited restriction on the content of promotional advertising would not serve adequately the State's interests; . . . for example, [the state might] require that the advertisements include information about the relative efficiency and expense of the offered service, both under current conditions and for the foreseeable future."[529]

[I189] Outdoor Advertising Displays[530]—Commercial Newsracks. Linmark involved a township ordinance prohibiting the posting of real estate "For Sale" and "Sold" signs, for the purpose of stemming what the township had perceived as the flight of Caucasian homeowners from a racially integrated community. The Court did not doubt the importance of this goal, recognizing that "substantial benefits flow" to both Caucasians and African-Americans "from interracial association." Nevertheless, it did not appear that the ordinance was needed to achieve that objective. The evidence did not support the township's apparent fears that it was experiencing a substantial incidence of panic selling by Caucasian homeowners; did not establish that "For Sale" signs in front of 2 percent of the township's homes were a major cause of panic selling; and did not confirm the township's assumption that proscribing such signs would reduce public awareness of realty sales and thereby decrease public concern over selling. More fundamentally, the township had proscribed particular types of signs based on their content, because it feared their "primary" effect—"the substance of the information communicated to its citizens." The Court emphasized that "[i]f dissemination of this information [could] be restricted, then every locality in the country [could] suppress any facts that reflect[ed] poorly on the locality, so long as a plausible claim [might] be made that disclosure would cause the recipients of the information to act 'irrationally.'" Virginia Pharmacy disapproved such

---

[528] Greater New Orleans Broad. Ass'n v. United States, 527 U.S. 173, 185–87, 193–94 (1999).

[529] Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 568–71 (1980). The state's laudable concern over the equity and efficiency of appellant's rates did not provide a constitutionally adequate reason for restricting protected speech, because the link between the advertising prohibition and appellant's rate structure was found to be, at most, tenuous. Id. at 569.

[530] See also para. I183.

sweeping powers. In addition, the ordinance did not leave open ample alternative channels for communication. "Although, in theory, sellers remain[ed] free to employ a number of different alternatives, . . . the options to which sellers realistically [we]re relegated—primarily newspaper advertising and listing with real estate agents—involve[d] more cost and less autonomy than 'For Sale' signs; . . . [we]re less likely to reach persons not deliberately seeking sales information; . . . and [might] be less effective media for communicating the message conveyed by a 'For Sale' sign in front of the house to be sold." These alternatives were far from satisfactory. Subsequently, the Court concluded that the ordinance violated the First Amendment.[531]

[I190] In Metromedia, the Court reviewed an ordinance imposing substantial prohibitions on outdoor advertising displays within the City of San Diego in the interest of traffic safety and aesthetics. The ordinance permitted on-site commercial advertising (a sign advertising goods or services available on the property where the sign was located), but forbade other commercial advertising using fixed-structure signs, unless permitted by one of the ordinance's 12 specified exceptions, such as "for sale" signs. First, the Court noted that the twin governmental goals that the ordinance sought to further were substantial. Then, it rejected the claim that the ordinance was broader than necessary and, therefore, failed the fourth part of the Central Hudson test. "If the city ha[d] a sufficient basis for believing that billboards constitute[d] traffic hazards and [we]re unattractive, then obviously the most direct, and perhaps the only, effective approach to solving the problems they create[d] [wa]s to prohibit them. [And] [t]he city ha[d] gone no further than necessary in seeking to meet its ends. . . . [It] ha[d] not prohibited all billboards, but allow[ed] on-site advertising and some other specifically exempted signs." The more serious question, concerned the third of the Central Hudson criteria: did the ordinance "directly advance" governmental interests in traffic safety and in the appearance of the city? The Court did not disagree with "the accumulated, common sense judgments of local lawmakers and of the many reviewing courts that billboards [we]re real and substantial hazards to traffic safety." Similarly, it was "not speculative to recognize that billboards, by their very nature, wherever located and however constructed, [could] be perceived as an 'esthetic harm.'" It was nevertheless argued that the city denigrated its interest in traffic safety and beauty and defeated its own case by permitting on-site advertising and other specified signs. The Court rejected the argument. In the first place, whether on-site advertising was permitted or not, the prohibition of off-site advertising was directly related to the stated objectives of traffic safety and esthetics. This was not altered by the fact that the ordinance was underinclusive, because it permitted on-site advertising. Second, "the city [might] believe that off-site advertising, with its periodically changing content, present[ed] a more acute problem than d[id] on-site advertising." Third, San Diego had obviously chosen to value one kind of commercial speech—on-site advertising—more than another kind of commercial speech—off-site advertising. The ordinance reflected a decision by the city that the former interest, but not the latter, was stronger than the city's interests in traffic safety and esthetics. As the Court noted, "the city could reasonably conclude that a commercial enterprise—as well as the interested public—has a stronger interest in identifying its place of business and advertising the products or services available there than it has in using or leasing its available space for the purpose of advertising commercial enterprises located elsewhere." In light of the above analysis, the Court could not conclude that the ordinance was broader than was necessary to meet its interests, or that it failed directly to advance substantial government interests.[532]

---

[531] Linmark Assocs. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85, 93–97 (1977).

[I191] In Discovery Network, the Court held that a city's categorical ban on commercial newsracks attached too much importance to the distinction between commercial and non-commercial speech. Concerned about the safety and esthetics of its streets and sidewalks, the city of Cincinnati decided to do something about the proliferation of newsracks on its street corners. Pursuant to an existing ordinance prohibiting the distribution of "commercial handbills" on public property, the city ordered Discovery Network to remove its newsracks from its sidewalks within 30 days. Discovery published and distributed free of charge magazines that consisted principally of commercial advertisements. These publications accounted for 62 of the 1,500–2,000 newsracks that cluttered Cincinnati's street corners. The Court first found that the city did not meet its burden to establish a "reasonable fit" between its legitimate interests in safety and esthetics and its choice of a limited and selective prohibition of newsracks as the means chosen to serve those interests. The ordinance on which it relied was an outdated prohibition against the distribution of any commercial handbills on public property. It had been enacted long before any concern about newsracks had developed. "Its apparent purpose was to prevent the kind of visual blight caused by littering, rather than any harm associated with permanent, freestanding dispensing devices. . . . The fact that the city ha[d] failed to address its recently developed concern about newsracks by regulating their size, shape, appearance, or number indicate[d] that it ha[d] not 'carefully calculated' the costs and benefits associated with the burden on speech imposed by its prohibition. [And] [t]he benefit to be derived from the removal of 62 newsracks, while about 1,500–2,000 remained in place, was . . . minute." Further, the Court rejected the city's argument that, because every decrease in the overall number of newsracks on its sidewalks necessarily effected an increase in safety and an improvement in the attractiveness of the cityscape, there was a close fit between its ban on newsracks dispensing "commercial handbills" and its interests in safety and esthetics. The Court accepted the validity of the city's proposition, but considered it "an insufficient justification for the discrimination against [Discovery's] use of newsracks that [we]re no more harmful than the permitted newsracks, and ha[d] only a minimal impact on the overall number of newsracks on the city's sidewalks." The major premise supporting the city's argument was the proposition that commercial speech had only a low value. Based on that premise, the city contended that the fact that assertedly more valuable publications were allowed to use newsracks did not undermine its judgment that its esthetic and safety interests were stronger than the interest in allowing commercial speakers to have similar access to the reading public. The Court did not agree and observed that the city's argument "seriously underestimate[d] the value of commercial speech." Moreover, because the ban was predicated on the content of the publications distributed by the subject newsracks, it could not qualify as a valid time, place, or manner restriction on protected speech. For these reasons, the Court held that Cincinnati's categorical ban on the distribution, via newsrack, of "commercial handbills" could not be squared with the dictates of the First Amendment.[533]

---

[532] Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego, 453 U.S. 490, 507–12 (1981) (plurality opinion); id. at 541 (opinion of Stevens, J.).

[533] City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, 507 U.S. 410, 417–29 (1993). The Court noted, however, that its holding was narrow. It did not reach "the question whether, given certain facts

iii. Trade Names[534]

[I192] The Court "has recognized that words are not always fungible, and that the suppression of particular words 'run[s] a substantial risk of suppressing ideas in the process.'"[535] "Yet this recognition always has been balanced against the principle that, when a word acquires value 'as the result of organization and the expenditure of labor, skill, and money' by an entity, that entity constitutionally may obtain a limited property right in the word."[536] In San Francisco Arts & Athletics, the Court held that Congress could grant exclusive use of the word "Olympic" to the U.S. Olympic Committee (USOC). To the extent that the challenged statute applied to uses "for the purpose of trade [or] to induce the sale of any goods or services," its application was to commercial speech. One reason for Congress to grant the USOC exclusive control of the word "Olympic," as with other trademarks, was to ensure that the USOC received the benefit of its own efforts, so that the USOC would have "an incentive to continue to produce a 'quality product' that, in turn, benefit[ed] the public." But in the special circumstance of the USOC, Congress had "a broader public interest in promoting, through the activities of the USOC, the participation of amateur athletes from the United States in . . . the Olympic Games." The USOC's goal, under the Olympic Charter, was to further the Olympic movement, purposed "to promote the development of those physical and moral qualities which are the basis of sport;" "to educate young people through sport in a spirit of better understanding between each other and of friendship, thereby helping to build a better and more peaceful world;" and "to spread the Olympic principles throughout the world, thereby creating international goodwill." The statute "directly advance[d] these governmental interests by supplying the USOC with the means to raise money to support the Olympics and encourage[d] the USOC's activities by ensuring that it [would] receive the benefits of its efforts." Moreover, the statutory restrictions were not broader than Congress reasonably could have determined to be necessary to further these interests. The statute primarily applied to all uses of the word "Olympic" to induce the sale of goods or services. Congress reasonably could conclude that "most commercial uses of the Olympic words and symbols [we]re likely to be confusing." It also could determine that "unauthorized uses, even if not confusing, nevertheless [might] harm the USOC by lessening the distinctiveness and thus the commercial value of the marks." "Even though this protection could exceed the traditional rights of a trademark owner in certain circumstances," the application of the statute to commercial speech at issue (title "Gay Olympic Games" on T-shirts, buttons, bumper stickers, and other items for sale) was not broader than necessary to protect the legitimate congressional interest, and therefore did not violate the First Amendment.[537] and under certain circumstances, a community might be able to justify differential treatment of commercial and non-commercial newsracks." The Court simply held that, on the record of the case, Cincinnati had failed to make such a showing. Id. at 428.

---

534 See also para. I176.

535 San Francisco Arts & Athletics v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 532 (1987), quoting Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 26 (1971).

536 San Francisco Arts & Athletics v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 532 (1987), quoting Int'l News Serv. v. Associated Press, 248 U.S. 215, 239 (1918), and citing Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U.S. 82, 92 (1879).

537 San Francisco Arts & Athletics v. United States Olympic Comm., 483 U.S. 522, 532–541 (1987).

f. Campaign-Related Speech[538]—Lobbying[539]

[I193] "Discussion of public issues and debate on the qualifications of candidates are integral to the operation of the system of government established by [the] Constitution. The First Amendment affords the broadest protection to such political expression in order 'to assure [the] unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people.'"[540] "This no more than reflects [the] 'profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.'"[541] "[I]t can hardly be doubted that the constitutional guarantee has its fullest and most urgent application precisely to the conduct of campaigns for political office and issue-based elections."[542] "When a law burdens core political speech, [the Court] appl[ies] 'exacting scrutiny,' and [it] uphold[s] the restriction only if it is narrowly tailored to serve an overriding state interest,"[543] such as protecting "the integrity and reliability" of the election process.[544]

[I194] Meyer struck down Colorado's prohibition of payment for the circulation of ballot initiative petitions. Petition circulation, the Court held, is core political speech, because it involves "interactive communication concerning political change." Such a prohibition burdens political expression in two ways. "First, it limits the number of voices who will convey the [initiative proponents'] message and the hours they can speak and, therefore, limits the size of the audience they can reach. Second, it makes it less likely that [the proponents of a new law] will garner the number of necessary signatures, thus limiting their ability to make the matter the focus of statewide discussion. . . . [This prohibition] restricts access to the most effective, fundamental, and perhaps economical avenue of political discourse, direct one-on-one communication. That it leaves open other avenues of communication, does not relieve its burden on First Amendment expression, . . . [for this] Amendment protects the [right of the proponents of an initiative measure] not only to advocate their cause, but also to select what they believe to be the most effective means for so doing."[545] Further, the state's claimed interest in protecting the integrity of the initiative process did not justify the prohibition, because the state had failed to demonstrate that it was necessary to burden one's ability to communicate his message in order to meet its concerns. The state argued that the petition circulator had the duty to verify the authenticity of signatures on the petition, and that compensation might provide the circulator with a temptation to disregard that duty. Nevertheless, no evidence had been offered to support that speculation, and the Court

---

538 See also para. I247 (prohibition of election-day editorial endorsements); para. I317 (election-day "campaign-free zone" around polling places); para. I238 (ban on anonymous campaign literature); para. I459 (ban of primary endorsements by political parties); paras. I483 et seq. (campaign financing laws); para. I482 (campaign activities of government employees).

539 See also para. I230 (provision of the Internal Revenue Code depriving an otherwise eligible organization of its tax-exempt status and its right to receive tax-deductible contributions if it engaged in lobbying).

540 Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 14 (1976) (per curiam), quoting Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957).

541 Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 14 (1976) (per curiam), quoting New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

542 Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 272 (1971)

543 McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 347 (1995).

544 Buckley v. Am. Constitutional Law Found., Inc., 525 U.S. 182, 191 (1999).

545 Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414, 422–24 (1988).

was "not prepared to assume that a professional circulator—whose qualifications for similar future assignments may well depend on a reputation for competence and integrity—is any more likely to accept false signatures than a volunteer who is motivated entirely by an interest in having the proposition placed on the ballot."[546] Besides, other provisions of the Colorado statute dealt expressly with the potential danger that circulators might be tempted to pad their petitions with false signatures. It was a crime to forge a signature on a petition, to make false or misleading statements relating to a petition, or to pay someone to sign a petition. In addition, the top of each page of the petition should bear a statement printed in red ink warning potential signatories that it was a felony to forge a signature on a petition or to sign the petition when not qualified to vote. These provisions seemed "adequate to the task of minimizing the risk of improper conduct in the circulation of a petition, especially since the risk of fraud or corruption, or the appearance thereof, is more remote at the petition stage of an initiative than at the time of balloting."[547]

[I195] ACLF invalidated Colorado's requirement that initiative petition circulators be registered voters. This provision produced "a speech diminution of the very kind produced by the ban on paid circulators at issue in Meyer." Colorado acknowledged that the registration requirement limited speech, but not severely, the state asserted, because it was exceptionally easy to register to vote. The ease with which qualified voters might register to vote, however, did not lift the burden on speech at petition circulation time, since the choice not to register could be a "form of private and public protest." The state's dominant justification appeared to be its strong interest in policing lawbreakers among petition circulators. This interest, however, was served by the requirement that each circulator submit an affidavit setting out, among several particulars, the address at which he or she resided. "This address attestation ha[d] an immediacy, and corresponding reliability, that a voter's registration [might] lack." Hence, the state failed to justify the challenged burden on political expression.[548]

[I196] In White, a sharply divided Court, struck down a Minnesota rule that prohibited a candidate for a judicial office from "announcing his or her views on disputed legal or political issues." The rule "cover[ed] much more than promising to decide an issue a particular way. The prohibition extend[ed] to the candidate's mere statement of his current position, even if he d[id] not bind himself to maintain that position after election," given that the Minnesota Code contained a so-called "pledges or promises" clause, which separately prohibited judicial candidates from making "pledges or promises of conduct in office other than the faithful and impartial performance of the duties of the office,"—a prohibition on which the Court expressed no view. The Court found it clear that the challenged rule prohibited a judicial candidate from stating his views on any specific non-fanciful legal question within the province of the court for which he was running, except in the context of discussing past decisions—and in the latter context as well, if he expressed the view that he was not bound by stare decisis. Hence, it prohibited speech based on its content and burdened a category of speech "at the core" of First Amendment freedoms—"speech about the qualifications of candidates for public office." The Eighth Circuit had concluded, and the parties did not dispute, that the proper test to be applied to determine the constitutionality of such a restriction was

---

546 Id. at 426.

547 Id. at 427.

548 Buckley v. Am. Constitutional Law Found., Inc., 525 U.S. 182, 194–96 (1999).

strict scrutiny, under which the state had the burden to prove that the rule was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. The state claimed that its interests in preserving the state judiciary's impartiality and preserving the appearance of that impartiality were sufficiently compelling to justify the rule, arguing that the first protected the due process rights of litigants, and that the second preserved public confidence in the judiciary. The Court rejected this argument. First, the rule was not narrowly tailored to serve impartiality (or its appearance) in the traditional sense of the word, i.e., as a lack of bias for or against either party to a judicial proceeding. Indeed, the rule was barely tailored to serve that interest at all, inasmuch as it did "not restrict speech for or against particular parties, but rather speech for or against particular issues." Second, it was possible to use the term "impartiality" in the judicial context to mean lack of preconception in favor of or against a particular legal view. This sort of impartiality "would be concerned, not with guaranteeing litigants equal application of the law, but rather with guaranteeing them an equal chance to persuade the court on the legal points in their case." Although "impartiality" in this sense might well be an interest served by the rule, pursuing this objective, the Court held, "is not a compelling state interest," since it "is neither possible nor desirable . . . to find a judge who does not have preconceptions about the law;" indeed, even if it were possible to select judges who would not have preconceived views on legal issues, "[p]roof that a Justice's mind at the time he joined the Court was a complete tabula rasa in the area of constitutional adjudication would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias." A third possible meaning of "impartiality" might be described as open-mindedness. "This quality in a judge demands, not that he have no preconceptions on legal issues, but that he be willing to consider views that oppose his preconceptions, and remain open to persuasion, when the issues arise in a pending case. This sort of impartiality seeks to guarantee each litigant, not an equal chance to win the legal points in the case, but at least some chance of doing so." However, the Court pointed out, "statements in election campaigns are such an infinitesimal portion of the public commitments to legal positions that judges (or judges-to-be) undertake, that this object of the prohibition was implausible. Before they arrive on the bench (whether by election or otherwise) judges have often committed themselves on legal issues that they must later rule upon. . . . More common still is a judge's confronting a legal issue on which he has expressed an opinion while on the bench. [And] [j]udges often state their views on disputed legal issues outside the context of adjudication—in classes that they conduct, and in books and speeches." The short of the matter was this: in Minnesota, a candidate for judicial office might not say "I think it is constitutional for the legislature to prohibit same-sex marriages," although he could say the very same thing up until the very day before he declared himself a candidate, and he might say it repeatedly (until litigation was pending) after he was elected. Hence, as a means of pursuing the objective of open-mindedness, the rule was "so woefully underinclusive as to render belief in that purpose a challenge to the credulous."[549]

[I197] Lobbying constitutes a traditional avenue of political expression and an important aspect of the right of petition. It is thus protected by the First Amendment.[550] Harriss

---

[549] Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 770–81 (2002). The dissenters noted, inter alia, that uncoupled from the rule at issue, the ban on pledges or promises could be easily circumvented, and that, no less than the pledges or promises clause itself, the rule was an indispensable part of Minnesota's effort to protect litigants' due process rights and to preserve the public's confidence in the integrity and impartiality of its judiciary. Id. at 816–21.

[550] See, e.g., E. R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, involved a federal statute that required any person receiving any contributions or expending any money for the purposes of influencing the passage or defeat of legislation by Congress to file with the Clerk of the House quarterly statements that set out the name and address of each person who had made a contribution of $500 or more not mentioned in the preceding report. It also required that any person who engaged himself for pay for the purpose of attempting to influence the passage or defeat of legislation, before doing anything in furtherance of that objective, register with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, and state in writing, inter alia, his name and address and the name and address of the person by whom he was employed and in whose interest he worked. These paid lobbyists should file quarterly reports of all money received and expended in carrying on their work, to whom paid, for what purposes, the names of publications in which they had caused any articles to be published, and the proposed legislation they were employed to support or oppose; this information was to be printed in the Congressional Record. The Court held that the First Amendment did not prohibit the criminal prosecutions charging violation of the foregoing registration and reporting statutory provisions. As the Court said, "legislative complexities are such that individual members of Congress cannot be expected to explore the myriad pressures to which they are regularly subjected. Yet full realization of the American ideal of government by elected representatives depends to no small extent on their ability to properly evaluate such pressures. Otherwise, the voice of the people may all too easily be drowned out by the voice of special interest groups seeking favored treatment while masquerading as proponents of the public weal. This [wa]s the evil which the [statute] was designed to help prevent. Toward that end, Congress ha[d] not sought to prohibit these pressures. It ha[d] merely provided for a modicum of information from those who, for hire, attempt[ed] to influence legislation or who collect[ed] or spen[t] funds for that purpose."[551]

E. SPEECH IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

1. Speech of Government Employees or Contractors[552]

a. In General

[I198] Public employees—even if they do not have tenure[553]—may not "be compelled to relinquish the First Amendment rights they would otherwise enjoy as citizens to comment on matters of public interest."[554] And a public employee does not forfeit his First Amendment protection against governmental abridgment of freedom of speech when he "arranges to communicate privately with his employer, rather than to spread his views before the public."[555] However, the government "may impose restraints on the job-related speech of public employees that would be plainly unconstitutional if applied to 137–38 (1961). In that case, the Court decided that the Sherman Act should not be construed to forbid joint efforts by railway companies seeking legislation that would disadvantage the trucking industry.

551 United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 625 (1954).

552 See also paras. H11–H14, I482.

553 See Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 596–98 (1972); Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 283–84 (1977).

554 Pickering v. Bd. of Educ., 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968).

555 Givhan v. W. Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410, 414–15 (1979).

the public at large."[556] "[T]he government's interest in achieving its goals as effectively and efficiently as possible is elevated from a relatively subordinate interest when it acts as sovereign to a significant one when it acts as employer. The government cannot restrict the speech of the public at large just in the name of efficiency. But where the government is employing someone for the very purpose of effectively achieving its goals, such restrictions may well be appropriate."[557] Pickering held that when a court is required to determine the validity of such a restraint, it must "arrive at a balance between the interests of the [employee,] as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees."[558] "Underlying the decision in Pickering is the recognition that public employees are often the members of the community who are likely to have informed opinions as to the operations of their public employers, operations which are of substantial concern to the public. Were they not able to speak on these matters, the community would be deprived of informed opinions on important public issues. . . . The interest at stake is as much the public's interest in receiving informed opinion as it is the employee's own right to disseminate it."[559]

[I199] Under Connick, the foregoing balancing test applies only when the employee spoke "as a citizen upon matters of public concern" rather than "as an employee upon matters only of personal interest." "When employee expression cannot be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community, government officials should enjoy wide latitude in managing their offices, without intrusive oversight by the judiciary in the name of the First Amendment." Even where a public employee's speech does not touch upon a matter of public concern, that speech is not totally beyond the protection of the First Amendment, but, "absent the most unusual circumstances, a federal court is not the appropriate forum in which to review the wisdom of a personnel decision taken by a public agency allegedly in reaction to the employee's behavior."[560] "Thus, private speech that involves nothing more than a complaint about a change in the employee's own duties may give rise to discipline without imposing any special burden of justification on the government employer."[561] But "if the speech does involve a matter of public concern, the Government bears the burden of justifying its adverse employment action."[562]

---

[556] United States v. Nat'l Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454, 465 (1995).

[557] Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661, 675 (1994) (plurality opinion). The Court has, therefore, "consistently given greater deference to government predictions of harm used to justify restriction of employee speech than to predictions of harm used to justify restrictions on the speech of the public at large." See Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668, 676 (1996), quoting Waters v. Churchill, supra, at 673.

[558] Pickering v. Bd. of Educ., 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968).

[559] City of San Diego v. Roe, 543 U.S. 77, 82 (2004) (per curiam).

[560] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 146–47 (1983).

[561] United States v. Nat'l Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454, 466 (1995), citing Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 148–49 (1983). As the Court noted in the latter case, "[t]o presume that all matters which transpire within a government office are of public concern would mean that virtually every remark—and certainly every criticism directed at a public official—would plant the seed of a constitutional case. While, as a matter of good judgment, public officials should be receptive to constructive criticism offered by their employees, the First Amendment does not require a public office to be run as a roundtable for employee complaints over internal office affairs." See Connick, supra, at 149.

[562] United States v. Nat'l Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454, 466 (1995), citing

[I200] "The inquiry into the protected status of speech is one of law, not fact. . . . Whether an employee's speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the content, form, and context of a given statement, as revealed by the whole record."[563] "In performing the balancing, the statement will not be considered in a vacuum; the manner, time, and place of the employee's expression are relevant, as is the context in which the dispute arose. . . . [The Court has] recognized as pertinent considerations whether the statement impairs discipline by superiors or harmony among coworkers, has a detrimental impact on close working relationships for which personal loyalty and confidence are necessary, or impedes the performance of the speaker's duties or interferes with the regular operation of the enterprise."[564]

Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 388 (1987). See also Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661, 674 (1994).

563 Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 147–48, n.7 (1983). "The inappropriate or controversial character of a statement is irrelevant to the question whether it deals with a matter of public concern." See Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 387 (1987).

In Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661 (1994), a four-Justice plurality rejected the proposition that the relevant factual inquiry must turn on what the speech actually was, not on what the employer reasonably thought it was. The plurality found that such an approach gives insufficient weight to the government's interest in efficient employment decisionmaking and would force the government employer to come to its factual conclusions through procedures that substantially mirror the evidentiary rules used in court. "But employers, public and private, often do rely on hearsay, on past similar conduct, on their personal knowledge of people's credibility, and on other factors that the judicial process ignores. Such reliance may sometimes be the most effective way for the employer to avoid future recurrences of improper and disruptive conduct." On the other hand, the plurality did not believe that the courts "must apply the Connick test only to the facts as the employer thought them to be, without considering the reasonableness of the employer's conclusions. . . . If an employment action is based on what an employee supposedly said, and a reasonable supervisor would recognize that there is a substantial likelihood that what was actually said was protected, the manager must tread with a certain amount of care. This need not be the care with which trials, with their rules of evidence and procedure, are conducted. It should, however, be the care that a reasonable manager would use before making an employment decision—discharge, suspension, reprimand, or whatever else—of the sort involved in the particular case." Although "such care is normally not constitutionally required unless the employee has a protected property interest in her job," the plurality stressed that "the possibility of inadvertently punishing someone for exercising her First Amendment rights makes such care necessary." The plurality concluded that employer decisionmaking is not unduly burdened by having courts look to the facts as the employer reasonably found them to be. See id. at 675–78 (opinion of O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ.). Three other Justices considered that a government employer's First Amendment liability with respect to "public concern" speech is only liability for intentional wrong (retaliation for the employee's speech), not for mere negligence. Hence, they thought that there is no constitutional requirement that the employer conduct an investigation before taking disciplinary action in certain circumstances. See id. at 686–94 (concurring opinion of Scalia, J., joined by Kennedy and Thomas, JJ.). Justices Stevens and Blackmun held that the governing version of the facts in public employment free speech cases is not "what the government employer thought was said," but "what the trier of fact ultimately determines to have been said," since a First Amendment violation does not vanish merely because the firing was based upon a reasonable mistake about what the employee said. See id. at 697–98.

564 Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 388 (1987), citing Pickering v. Bd. of Educ., 391 U.S. 563, 570–73 (1968). "Where . . . an employee serves no confidential, policymaking, or public contact role, the danger to the agency's successful functioning from [employee's statements

[I201] In Pickering, the Court held impermissible, under the First Amendment, the dismissal of a high school teacher for openly criticizing the Board of Education on its allocation of school funds between athletics and education and its methods of informing taxpayers about the need for additional revenue. Pickering's subject was a matter of legitimate public concern. Although some of the teacher's public statements were erroneous, these statements were neither shown nor could be presumed to have in any way "either impeded the teacher's proper performance of his daily duties in the classroom, or to have interfered with the regular operation of the schools generally." Further, there was no proof that the statements at issue had been made either with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard for their truth or falsity. The Court concluded that, under the circumstances of that case, "the interest of the school administration in limiting teachers' opportunities to contribute to public debate [wa]s not significantly greater than its interest in limiting a similar contribution by any member of the general public."[565]

[I202] In Mt. Healthy, a public school teacher was not rehired, in part because of his exercise of First Amendment rights and in part because of permissible considerations. The teacher had relayed to a radio station the substance of a memorandum relating to teacher dress and appearance that the school principal had circulated to various teachers. The memorandum was apparently prompted by the view of some in the administration that there was a relationship between teacher appearance and public support for bond issues, and, indeed, the radio station promptly announced the adoption of the dress code as a news item. The Court accepted that the communication involved a matter of public concern. Further, the Court rejected a rule of causation that would focus solely on whether protected conduct played a part, "substantial" or otherwise, in a decision not to rehire, on the grounds that such a rule could make the employee better off by exercising his constitutional rights than by doing nothing at all. Instead, the Court outlined the following approach. First, "the plaintiff had to show that the employer's disapproval of his First Amendment protected expression played a role in the employer's decision to discharge him. If that burden of persuasion were carried, the burden would be on the defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that he would have reached the same decision even if, hypothetically, he had not been motivated by a desire to punish plaintiff for exercising his First Amendment rights."[566]

[I203] In Connick v. Myers, the Court upheld the dismissal of an Assistant District Attorney for circulating among her co-workers a questionnaire implicitly criticizing her superiors. In reaching this conclusion, the Court viewed "the questions pertaining to the confidence and trust that Myers' coworkers possessed in various supervisors, the level of office morale, and the need for a grievance committee as mere extensions of Myers' dispute over her transfer to another section of the criminal court. Unlike the dissent, [the majority did] not believe these questions [we]re of public import in evaluating the performance of the District Attorney as an elected official. Myers did not seek to inform the public that the District Attorney's Office was not discharging its governmental responsibilities in the investigation and prosecution of criminal cases. Nor that are made in a private conversation with another employee] is minimal." See Rankin, supra, at 389–91.

---

565 Pickering v. Bd. of Educ., 391 U.S. 563, 572–73 (1968).

566 See Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Transp. Mgmt. Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 403 (1983), discussing Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 285–87 (1977).

did Myers seek to bring to light actual or potential wrongdoing or breach of public trust on the part of the District Attorney and others. Indeed, the questionnaire, if released to the public, would convey no information at all other than the fact that a single employee [wa]s upset with the status quo. While discipline and morale in the workplace are related to an agency's efficient performance of its duties, the focus of Myers' questions [wa]s not to evaluate the performance of the office, but rather to gather ammunition for another round of controversy with her superiors. These questions reflect[ed] one employee's dissatisfaction with a transfer and an attempt to turn that displeasure into a cause celebre." Although one of Myers' questions—dealing with pressure in the office to participate in political campaigns—did touch upon a matter of public concern, Myers' survey, and especially the question that asked whether or not the Assistants had confidence in and relied on the word of five named supervisors, "carr[ied] the clear potential for undermining office relations." Moreover, the questionnaire had been prepared and distributed at the office; the manner of distribution required not only Myers to leave her work but others to do the same in order that the questionnaire be completed. This fact supported Connick's fears that "the functioning of his office was endangered." Finally, the context of the dispute was also significant. As the Court pointed out, "[w]hen employee speech concerning office policy arises from an employment dispute concerning the very application of that policy to the speaker, additional weight must be given to the supervisor's view that the employee has threatened the authority of the employer to run the office." Since "Myers' questionnaire touched upon matters of public concern in only a most limited sense [and was] most accurately characterized as an employee grievance concerning internal office policy, . . . [t]he limited First Amendment interest involved [t]here d[id] not require that the District Attorney tolerate action which he reasonably believed would disrupt the office, undermine his authority, and destroy close working relationships." Myers' discharge therefore did not offend the First Amendment.[567] [I204] In Rankin v. McPherson, a data-entry employee in a county Constable's office, was discharged for remarking to a co-worker, after hearing of an attempt on the President's life, "if they go for him again, I hope they get him." Satisfied that the statement was not a threat to kill the President, which the First Amendment would not have protected, the Court concluded that the statement involved a matter of public concern, and that the firing violated the First Amendment. While McPherson's statement had been made at the workplace, there was no evidence that "it interfered with the efficient functioning of the office." Moreover, her discharge was not based on any assessment by the Constable that "the remark demonstrated a character trait that made [McPherson] unfit to perform her work," which involved no confidential or policy-making role. And "McPherson's employment-related interaction with the Constable was apparently negligible." "Given the function of the agency, McPherson's position in the office, and the nature of her statement," the Court was not persuaded that the Constable's interest in discharging her outweighed her rights under the First Amendment.[568] [I205] Government employees are protected from undue burdens on their expressive activities created by a prohibition against accepting honoraria. Treasury Employees invalidated a federal Act prohibiting government employees from accepting an honorarium for making an appearance or speech or writing an article, to the extent that the prohibition was applied to federal employees below grade GS-16. The challenged provision unquestionably imposed a significant burden on expressive activity. "Publishers compensate authors because compensation provides a significant incentive toward more expression. By denying federal employees that incentive, the honoraria ban induce[d] them to curtail their expression if they wish[ed] to continue working for the Government." Moreover, this "large-scale disincentive to expression impose[d] a significant burden on the public's right to read and hear what [government] employees would otherwise have written and said." "Because the vast majority of the speech at issue . . . d[id] not involve the subject matter of government employment and [took] place outside the workplace," the government could not justify the ban on the grounds of "immediate workplace disruption" asserted in Pickering and its progeny. Instead, the government submitted that the ban comported with the First Amendment, because the prohibited honoraria had been reasonably deemed by Congress to interfere with the efficiency of the public service. The government's underlying concern was that federal officers might misuse or appear to misuse power by accepting compensation for their unofficial and non-political writing and speaking activities. This interest was undeniably powerful, but the government cited no evidence of misconduct related to honoraria in the vast rank and file of federal employees below grade GS-16. The limited evidence of actual or apparent impropriety by members of Congress and high-level executives could not justify extension of the honoraria ban to all federal employees below grade GS-16, "an immense class of workers with negligible power to confer favors on those who may pay to hear them speak or to read their articles." Moreover, while "operational efficiency is undoubtedly a vital governmental interest," several features of the text of the ban and of the pertinent regulations "cast serious doubt on the Government's submission that Congress perceived honoraria as so threatening to the efficiency of the entire federal service as to render the ban a reasonable response to the threat." First, the provision excluded "a series of appearances, speeches, or articles" from the prohibited category, unless the subject matter was directly related to the individual's official duties, or the payment was made because of the individual's status with the government. In other words, accepting pay for a series of articles was prohibited if, and only if, a nexus existed between the author's employment and either the subject matter of the expression or the identity of the payor. For an individual article or speech, in contrast, pay was taboo even if neither the subject matter nor the payor bore any relationship at all to the author's duties. Second, the statute restricted only expressive activities and did not prohibit compensation for other services that a government employee might perform in his spare time, such as "consulting, professional or similar fees; payments for serving on boards; travel; sport, or other entertainment expenses not reasonably necessary for the appearance involved; or any other benefit that [would] be the substantial equivalent of an honorarium." The Court concluded that "the speculative benefits the honoraria ban

---

[567] Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 148, 153–54 (1983). In City of San Diego v. Roe, 543 U.S. 77 (2004) (per curiam), the city terminated a police officer for selling videotapes that showed him stripping off a police uniform and engaging in sexually explicit acts. The Court rejected respondent's allegation that the termination violated his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to freedom of speech, noting that (1) "Roe's expression was widely broadcast, linked to his official status as a police officer, and designed to exploit his employer's image;" (2) the speech in question was "detrimental to the mission and functions of the employer;" and (3) there was "no basis for finding that it was of concern to the community." Id. at 82.

[568] Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 386–92 (1987).

[might] provide the Government [we]re not sufficient to justify this crudely crafted burden" on First Amendment rights of federal employees below grade GS-16.[569]

[I206] In Umbehr, the Court found no difference, of constitutional magnitude, between independent contractors and employees in the context of freedom of speech. "Independent government contractors are similar in most relevant respects to government employees, although both the speaker's and the government's interests are typically—though not always—somewhat less strong in the independent contractor case." Hence, the Court's framework for government employee cases also applies to independent contractors. Accordingly, under Mt. Healthy, the government may not terminate contracts "in retaliation for protected First Amendment activity." And Pickering requires "a fact-sensitive and deferential weighing of the government's legitimate interests as contractor." To prevail, an independent contractor "must show that the termination [or non-renewal] of his contract was motivated by his speech on a matter of public concern. . . . If he can make that showing, the [government] will have a valid defense if it can show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that, in light of [its] knowledge, perceptions and policies at the time of the termination, [it] would have terminated the contract regardless of the contractor's speech. The [government] will also prevail if it can persuade the [courts] that [its] legitimate interests as contractor, deferentially viewed, outweigh the free speech interests at stake."[570]

b. Military Personnel

[I207] "While the members of the military services are entitled to the protections of the First Amendment, the different character of the military community and of the military mission requires a different application of those protections."[571] "The rights of military men must yield somewhat 'to meet certain overriding demands of discipline and duty.'"[572] "Speech likely to interfere with these vital prerequisites for military effectiveness therefore can be excluded from a military base."[573] In light of these considerations, the Court has found no facial constitutional infirmity in a provision of the Uniform Code of Military Justice punishing any person, subject to the Code, for conduct that is "directly and palpably prejudicial to good order and discipline" in the armed forces[574] and in regulations that allow a commander to determine, before distribution, whether

---

569 United States v. Nat'l Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454, 468–77 (1995).

570 Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668, 677–78, 684–85 (1996). If the contractor prevails, evidence that the government discovered facts after termination that would have led to a later termination anyway, and evidence of mitigation of his loss by means of his subsequent government contracts, would be relevant in assessing what remedy is appropriate. Id. at 685.

571 Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 758 (1974).

572 Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 354 (1980), quoting Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 744 (1974).

573 Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 354 (1980).

574 Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974). In that case, the Court also upheld, on its face, a provision of the Uniform Code of Military Justice punishing a commissioned officer for "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" which offends "so seriously against law, justice, morality or decorum as to expose to disgrace, socially or as a man, the offender, and at the same time is of such a nature or committed under such circumstances as to bring dishonor or disrepute upon the military profession which he represents." See, in extenso, para. E85.

particular materials pose a clear danger to the loyalty, discipline, readiness, or morale of his troops.[575]

c. Disclosure of Confidential Information

[I208] Government officials in sensitive confidential positions may have special duties of non-disclosure. "As to one who voluntarily assumed a duty of confidentiality, governmental restrictions on disclosure are not subject to the same stringent standards that would apply to efforts to impose restrictions on unwilling members of the public." Hence, a public official may be criminally punished for disclosing a wiretap, even after its authorization expires.[576]

[I209] "The Government has a compelling interest in protecting both the secrecy of information important to [the] national security [of the United States] and the appearance of confidentiality so essential to the effective operation of [its] foreign intelligence service."[577] Employment with the CIA entails a high degree of trust that is perhaps unmatched in government service. Thus, a former CIA agent does not have a First Amendment right to make public statements about Agency matters without prior clearance by the Agency.[578]

2. Legislators' Speech[579]

[I210] "The manifest function of the First Amendment in a representative government requires that legislators be given the widest latitude to express their views on issues of policy. . . . Legislators have an obligation to take positions on controversial political questions so that their constituents can be fully informed by them, and be better able to assess their qualifications for office. . . . The interest of the public in hearing all sides of a public issue is hardly advanced by extending more protection to citizen critics than to legislators." Hence, a state may not apply to a legislator a First Amendment standard stricter than that applicable to a private citizen.[580]

3. Speech in Public Schools[581]

[I211] Education "is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment."[582] "[P]ublic schools are vitally important 'in the preparation of individuals for participation as citizens,' and as vehicles for 'inculcating fundamental 575 Brown v. Glines, 444 U.S. 348, 354–58 (1980); Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 837–40 (1976).

---

576 United States v. Aguilar, 515 U.S. 593, 605–06 (1995).

577 Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507, 509, n.3 (1980) (per curiam).

578 Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 308–09 (1981).

579 See also para. I85 (Speech or Debate Clause).

580 Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116, 135–36 (1966).

581 See also para. H10 (freedom of thought); paras. H127–H131 (establishment clause); paras. E86, I55 (school disciplinary rules); para. I107 (offensive speech at a public school board meeting); para. I243 (mandatory student activity fee).

582 Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 347 U.S. 483, 493 (1954).

values necessary to the maintenance of a democratic political system.'"[583] Public education is committed to the control of state and local authorities,[584] and the Court has long recognized that local school boards have broad discretion in the management of school affairs.[585] At the same time, however, the Court has emphasized that the discretion of the states and local school boards in matters of education must be exercised in a manner that comports with the transcendent imperatives of the First Amendment. Hence, a student in a public school cannot be compelled to salute the flag.[586] And a state law that prohibits the teaching of the Darwinian theory of evolution in any state-supported school is unconstitutional.[587]

[I212] Students in the public schools do not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate."[588] They cannot be punished merely for expressing their personal views, even on controversial subjects, on the school premises—whether "in the cafeteria, or on the playing field, or on the campus during the authorized hours"—unless such speech "for any reason—whether it stems from time, place, or type of expression—materially disrupts classwork or involves substantial disorder or invasion of the rights of others."[589] Under these considerations, Tinker held that a schoolchild's First Amendment freedom of expression entitled him, contrary to school policy, to attend school wearing a black armband as a silent protest against American military involvement in Vietnam.[590]

[I213] Nonetheless, the First Amendment rights of students in the public schools "are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings."[591] While the use of an offensive form of expression may not be prohibited to adults making what the speaker considers a political point, it does not follow that the same latitude must be permitted to children in a public school. "The schools, as instruments of the state, [may take into consideration the sensibilities of students, and] may determine that the essential lessons of civil, mature conduct cannot be conveyed in a school that tolerates lewd [and vulgar] speech. . . . Indeed, the fundamental values necessary to the maintenance of a democratic political system disfavor the use of terms of debate highly offensive or highly threatening to others."[592] Accordingly, the Court held in Fraser that a student could be disciplined for having delivered a speech that was "sexually explicit," but not legally obscene, at an official school assembly, because "the school was entitled to 'disassociate itself' from the speech in a manner that would demonstrate to others that such vulgarity is 'wholly inconsistent with the fundamental values of public school education.'"[593]

---

583 Bd. of Educ., Island Trees Union Free Sch. Dist. No. 26 v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 864 (1982) (plurality opinion), quoting Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 76–77 (1979).

584 Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104 (1968).

585 See, e.g., Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 402 (1923); Pierce v. Soc'y of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534 (1925).

586 W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943). See para. H5.

587 Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968). See para. H112.

588 Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 506 (1969).

589 Id. at 512–13.

590 Id. at 514.

591 Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 682 (1986).

592 Id. at 681, 683.

593 See Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 266–67 (1988), quoting Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 685–86 (1986).

[I214] Papish involved the expulsion of a graduate student for lewd expression in an off-campus "underground" newspaper that she sold on campus pursuant to university authorization. The particular newspaper issue in question was found to be unacceptable for two reasons. First, on the front cover, the publishers had reproduced a political cartoon previously printed in another newspaper depicting policemen raping the Statue of Liberty and the Goddess of Justice. The caption under the cartoon read: "With Liberty and Justice for All." Secondly, the issue contained an article entitled "M___f___ Acquitted," which discussed the trial and acquittal on an assault charge of a New York City youth who was a member of an organization known as "Up Against the Wall, M___f___." The Court noted that petitioner had been expelled because of the disapproved content of the newspaper, rather than the time, place, or manner of its distribution. In the absence of any disruption of campus order or interference with the rights of others, the sole issue was whether the state university could proscribe this form of expression. Emphasizing that "dissemination of ideas—no matter how offensive to good taste—on a state university campus may not be shut off in the name alone of 'conventions of decency,'" the Court held that the state university's action violated the First Amendment.[594]

[I215] "The question whether the First Amendment requires a school to tolerate particular student speech . . . is different from the question whether the First Amendment requires a school affirmatively to promote particular student speech. The former question addresses educators' ability to silence a student's personal expression that happens to occur on the school premises. The latter question concerns educators' authority over school-sponsored publications, theatrical productions, and other expressive activities that students, parents, and members of the public might reasonably perceive to bear the imprimatur of the school. These activities may fairly be characterized as part of the school curriculum, whether or not they occur in a traditional classroom setting, so long as they are supervised by faculty members and designed to impart particular knowledge or skills to student participants and audiences. Educators are entitled to exercise greater control over this second form of student expression to assure that participants learn whatever lessons the activity is designed to teach, that readers or listeners are not exposed to material that may be inappropriate for their level of maturity, and that the views of the individual speaker are not erroneously attributed to the school. Hence, a school may, in its capacity as publisher of a school newspaper or producer of a school play, 'disassociate itself' . . . not only from speech that 'would substantially interfere with [its] work . . . or impinge upon the rights of other students,' but also from speech that is, for example, ungrammatical, poorly written, inadequately researched, biased or prejudiced, vulgar or profane, or unsuitable for immature audiences. A school must be able to set high standards for the student speech that is disseminated under its auspices—standards that may be higher than those demanded by some newspaper publishers or theatrical producers in the 'real' world—and may refuse to disseminate student speech that does not meet those standards. In addition, a school must be able to take into account the emotional maturity of the intended audience in determining whether to disseminate student speech on potentially sensitive topics, which might range from the existence of Santa Claus in an elementary school setting to the particulars of teenage sexual activity in a high school setting. A school must also retain the authority to refuse to sponsor student speech that might reasonably be perceived to advocate drug or alcohol use, irresponsible sex, or conduct otherwise inconsistent with 'the shared values of a civilized social order,' . . . or to associate the school with any position other than neutrality on matters of political controversy."[595] Accordingly, "the standard articulated in Tinker for determining when a school may punish student expression need not also be the standard for determining when a school may refuse to lend its name and resources to the dissemination of student expression." Instead, Hazelwood held that "educators do not offend the First Amendment by exercising editorial control over the style and content of student speech in school-sponsored expressive activities, so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."[596] And school officials are permitted to exercise this kind of control even without specific written regulations, for "[t]o require such regulations in the context of a curricular activity could unduly constrain the ability of educators to educate."[597]

---

[594] Papish v. Univ. of Missouri Bd. of Curators, 410 U.S. 667, 670–71, n.6 (1973) (per curiam).

---

[595] Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 270–72 (1988).

[596] Id. at 272–73. This case arose out of the deletion from a certain issue of a school's newspaper of two pages that included an article describing school students' experiences with pregnancy and another article discussing the impact of divorce on students at the school. The initial paragraph of the pregnancy article declared that all names had been changed to keep the identity of these girls a secret. The principal concluded that the students' anonymity was not adequately protected, however, given the other identifying information in the article and the small number of pregnant students at the school. The principal therefore could reasonably have feared that the article violated whatever pledge of anonymity had been given to the pregnant students. In addition, he could reasonably have been concerned that the article was not sufficiently sensitive to the privacy interests of the students' boyfriends and parents, who were discussed in the article but who had been given no opportunity to consent to its publication or to offer a response. Further, since girls commented in the article concerning their sexual histories and their use or non-use of birth control, it was not unreasonable for the principal to have concluded that such frank talk was inappropriate in a school-sponsored publication distributed to 14-year-old freshmen and presumably taken home to be read by students' even younger brothers and sisters. Moreover, the student who was quoted by name in the version of the divorce article seen by the principal made comments sharply critical of her father. Hence, the principal could reasonably have concluded that an individual publicly identified as an inattentive parent—indeed, as one who chose "playing cards with the guys" over home and family—was entitled to an opportunity to defend himself as a matter of journalistic fairness. Finally, the Court held that the principal's decision to delete two pages of the newspaper, rather than to delete only the offending articles or to require that they be modified, was reasonable, given the particular circumstances of this case, which included the pressure felt by the principal to make an immediate decision so that students would not be deprived of the newspaper altogether. See id. at 274–76.

As a number of lower federal courts have recognized, educators' decisions with regard to the content of school-sponsored newspapers, dramatic productions, and other expressive activities are entitled to substantial deference. The Court did not decide whether the same degree of deference is appropriate with respect to school-sponsored expressive activities at the college and university level. See id. at 273, n.7.

[597] Id. The Court did not decide whether specific written regulations are required before school officials may censor publications not sponsored by the school that students seek to distribute on school grounds. Moreover, there was no need for the Court to decide whether the court of appeals had correctly construed Tinker as precluding school officials from censoring student speech to avoid "invasion of the rights of others," except where that speech could result in tort liability to the school. Id. at 273, n.5.

[I216] In Island Trees, the Court addressed the question whether, and to what extent, the First Amendment imposes limitations upon the exercise by a local school board of its discretion to remove library books from high school and junior high school libraries. There, a Board of Education had removed from the library shelves certain books characterized as "anti-American, anti-Christian, anti-Semitic, and just plain filthy." Four Justices stressed that "local school boards may not remove books from school library shelves simply because they dislike the ideas contained in those books and seek by their removal to 'prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion.'" The plurality thus held that, if a school board "intended by its removal decision to deny [students] access to ideas with which [it] disagreed, and if this intent was the decisive factor in [its] decision," then the board exercised its significant discretion to determine the content of its school libraries in violation of the Constitution. But "if it were demonstrated that the removal decision was based solely upon the 'educational suitability' of the books in question, then their removal would be 'perfectly permissible.'"[598] All members of the Court, otherwise sharply divided, acknowledged that a school board has the authority to remove books that are vulgar.[599] The dissenters noted, inter alia, that, "[u]nlike university or public libraries, elementary and secondary school libraries are not designed for freewheeling inquiry, [but] they are tailored, as the public school curriculum is tailored, to the teaching of basic skills and ideas. . . . [Hence,] [w]ith respect to the education of children in elementary and secondary schools, the school board may properly determine in many cases that a particular book, a particular course, or even a particular area of knowledge is not educationally suitable for inclusion within the body of knowledge which the school seeks to impart. Without more, this is not a condemnation of the book or the course." Further, the dissent rejected plurality's motive test and found a far more satisfactory basis for addressing the question at issue in Tinker' holding that "prohibition of expression of one particular opinion, at least without evidence that it is necessary to avoid material and substantial interference with schoolwork or discipline, is not constitutionally permissible." In the specific case, the board had simply ordered the removal of books containing vulgarity and profanity, but it had not attempted to preclude discussion about the themes of the books or the books

---

598 Bd. of Educ., Island Trees Union Free Sch. Dist. No. 26 v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 871–72 (1982) (opinion of Brennan, J., joined by Marshall and Stevens, JJ.); id. at 879–80, 882 (Blackmun J., concurring in part). Brennan acknowledged that "local school boards have a substantial legitimate role to play in the determination of school library content," but observed that "students must always remain free to inquire, to study and to evaluate, to gain new maturity and understanding," and that "[t]he school library is the principal locus of such freedom." Id. at 868–69. Blackmun noted that school officials must be able to choose one book over another, without outside interference, when the first book is deemed more relevant to the curriculum, or better written, or when one of a host of other "politically neutral" reasons is present. Further, he found that even absent space or financial limitations, First Amendment principles would allow a school board to refuse to make a book available to students, because it is psychologically or intellectually inappropriate for the age group, or even, perhaps, because the ideas it advances are "manifestly inimical to the public welfare." And school officials may choose one book over another, because they believe that one subject is more important or is more deserving of emphasis. Id. at 880. Justice White concurred in the judgment of affirmance, without reaching the constitutional question. Id. at 884.

599 Id. at 871 (plurality opinion); id. at 879–81 (Blackmun, J., concurring); id. at 883 (White, J., concurring); id. at 918–20 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

themselves. Such a decision, on the board's version of the facts, was sufficiently related to "educational suitability" to pass muster under the First Amendment.[600]

4. Speech Rights in the Prison Context[601]

[I217] "[C]hallenges to prison restrictions that are asserted to inhibit First Amendment speech interests must be analyzed in terms of the legitimate policies and goals of the corrections system, to whose custody and care the prisoner has been committed in accordance with due process of law."[602] Turner adopted a standard of review that focuses on the reasonableness of prison regulations: the relevant inquiry is whether the actions of prison officials were "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests." Under this standard, four factors are relevant. First and foremost, the governmental objective underlying the regulations at issue must be legitimate and "neutral,"[603] and the regulations must be "rationally related" to that objective. In addition, courts should consider three other factors: the existence of alternative means of exercising the right available to inmates; the impact accommodation of the asserted constitutional right will have on guards and other inmates and on the allocation of prison resources generally; and the absence of ready alternatives available to the prison for achieving the governmental objectives.[604]

[I218] Martinez was the Court's first significant decision regarding First Amendment rights in the prison context. There, the Court invalidated California regulations concerning personal correspondence between inmates and non-inmates, regulations that provided for censorship of letters that "unduly complain," "magnify grievances," or "express inflammatory political, racial, religious or other views or beliefs." In that case, the Court determined that the proper standard of review for prison restrictions on correspondence between prisoners and members of the general public could be decided without resolving the broad questions of prisoners' rights, and it based its ruling striking down the content-based regulation on the First Amendment rights of those who are not prisoners. The Court held that constitutional challenges to censorship of prisoner mail are reviewed under the following standard. "First, the regulation or practice in question should further an important or substantial governmental interest unrelated to the suppression of expression. Prison officials . . . must show that a regulation authorizing mail censorship furthers one or more of the substantial governmental interests of security, order, and rehabilitation. Second, the limitation of First Amendment freedoms must be no greater than is necessary or essential to the protection of the particular governmental interest involved. Thus, a restriction on inmate correspondence that furthers an important or substantial interest of penal administration will nevertheless be invalid if its sweep is unnecessarily broad." On the basis of this standard, the Court found that the challenged regulations were not valid, for they authorized censorship of prisoner

---

600 Id. at 915, 919–20 (dissenting opinion of Rehnquist, J., joined by Burger, C.J., and Powell, J.).

601 See also paras. I274, I275, I321.

602 Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822 (1974).

603 The regulation in question "must further an important or substantial governmental interest unrelated to the suppression of expression." Where prison administrators draw distinctions between communications solely on the basis of their potential implications for prison security, the regulations are "neutral." See Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 416 (1989).

604 Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–90 (1987). See, in extenso, para. B80.

mail far broader than any legitimate interest of penal administration demanded. In so holding, the Court acknowledged that the legitimate governmental interest in the order and security of penal institutions justifies the imposition of certain restraints on inmate correspondence. "Perhaps, the most obvious example of justifiable censorship of prisoner mail would be refusal to send or deliver letters concerning escape plans or containing other information concerning proposed criminal activity, whether within or without the prison. Similarly, prison officials may properly refuse to transmit encoded messages." Further, the Court stressed that, under the Due Process Clause, the decision to censor or withhold delivery of a particular letter must be accompanied by minimum procedural safeguards: "an inmate [is to] be notified of the rejection of a letter written by or addressed to him; . . . the author of that letter [must] be given a reasonable opportunity to protest that decision; [and] complaints [must] be referred to a prison official other than the person who originally disapproved the correspondence."[605]

[I219] Martinez's holding turned on the fact that the challenged regulation caused a consequential restriction on the First and Fourteenth Amendment rights of those who were not prisoners. In Turner, the Court declined to apply the Martinez standard in "prisoners' rights" cases because, Martinez could be read to require a strict "least restrictive alternative" analysis, "without sufficient sensitivity to the need for discretion in meeting legitimate prison needs."[606] Turner held that restrictions on inmate-to-inmate communications pass constitutional muster if the restrictions are "reasonably related to legitimate penological objectives." That case involved a regulation that permitted correspondence between immediate family members, who were inmates at different institutions within the state's jurisdiction, and between inmates concerning legal matters, but it allowed other inmate correspondence only if each inmate's classification/treatment team deemed it in the best interests of the parties. Trial testimony indicated that, as a matter of practice, the determination whether to permit inmates to correspond was based on team members' familiarity with the progress reports, conduct violations, and psychological reports in the inmates' files, rather than on individual review of each piece of mail. The Court found that the regulation was "logically connected to [the] legitimate security concerns" of prison officials, who had testified that mail between prisons facilitated the development of informal organizations that threatened safety and security at penal institutions, and could be used to communicate escape plans, to arrange violent acts, and to foster prison gang activity. Moreover, the regulation did not deprive prisoners of all means of expression, but simply barred communication "with a limited class of people—other inmates—with whom authorities had particular cause to be concerned." Nor was there an obvious, easy alternative to the regulation, since "monitoring inmate correspondence clearly would impose more than a de minimis cost on the pursuit of legitimate corrections goals" and would create "an appreciable risk of missing dangerous messages," for it would be impossible for the prison officials to read every piece of inmate-to-inmate correspondence, and, in any event, prisoners could easily write in jargon or codes to prevent detection of their real messages. Considering that the regulation was "content-neutral, it logically advance[d] the goals of institutional security and safety, . . . and it [wa]s not an exaggerated response to those objectives," the Court concluded that the challenged restrictions did not unconstitutionally abridge the First Amendment rights of prison inmates.[607]

---

[605] Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 413–18 (1974). Martinez was overruled by Turner and Thornburgh (see para. I220), insofar as it concerned incoming mail.

[606] Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 410 (1989), discussing Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89–90 (1987).

[I220] Thornburgh dealt with incoming publications, material requested by an individual inmate but targeted to a general audience. "Once in the prison, material of this kind reasonably may be expected to circulate among prisoners, with the concomitant potential for coordinated disruptive conduct. Furthermore, prisoners may observe particular material in the possession of a fellow prisoner, draw inferences about their fellow's beliefs, sexual orientation, or gang affiliations from that material, and cause disorder by acting accordingly. . . . In the volatile prison environment, it is essential that prison officials be given broad discretion to prevent such disorder." In light of these considerations, Thornburgh held that regulations affecting the sending of a publication to a prisoner must be analyzed under the Turner reasonableness standard—and not under the less deferential standard of Martinez, whereby prison regulations authorizing mail censorship must be "generally necessary" to protect legitimate governmental interests. At the same time, the Thornburgh Court limited Martinez to regulations concerning outgoing correspondence. In doing so, the Court stressed that "[t]he implications of outgoing correspondence for prison security are of a categorically lesser magnitude than the implications of incoming materials. Outgoing correspondence that magnifies grievances or contains inflammatory racial views cannot reasonably be expected to present a danger to the community inside the prison. . . . In addition, the implications for security are far more predictable. Dangerous outgoing correspondence is more likely to fall within readily identifiable categories, [such as] escape plans, plans relating to ongoing criminal activity, and threats of blackmail or extortion." Accordingly, Thornburgh expressly overruled Martinez to the extent that it might support the drawing of a categorical distinction between incoming correspondence from prisoners (to which Turner applied its reasonableness standard) and incoming correspondence from non-prisoners.[608] Further, Thornburgh upheld on its face a regulation that generally permitted prisoners to receive publications from the "outside," but authorized wardens, pursuant to specified criteria, to reject an incoming publication if it was found "to be detrimental to the security, good order, or discipline of the institution or if it might facilitate criminal activity." Its underlying objective of protecting prison security was undoubtedly legitimate and was neutral with regard to the content of the expression regulated. Also, the broad discretion the regulation accorded wardens was rationally related to security interests; "a more closely tailored standard could result in admission of publications which, even if they did not lead directly to violence, would exacerbate tensions and lead indirectly to disorder." Moreover, alternative means of expression remained open to the inmates, since the regulation permitted "a broad range of publications to be sent, received, and read." Finally, the regulation was not an exaggerated response to the problem at hand, since no obvious, easy alternative had been established.[609]

[I221] Bell v. Wolfish concerned a First Amendment challenge to a rule restricting inmates' receipt of hardback books unless mailed directly from publishers, book clubs, or bookstores. Hardback books "are especially serviceable for smuggling contraband into an institution; money, drugs, and weapons easily may be secreted in the bindings. . . . They also are difficult to search effectively." The rule was "a rational response" to a clear secu-

---

607 Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 85–93 (1987).

608 Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 411–14 (1989).

609 Id. at 415–18.

rity problem. Because there was no evidence that prison officials had "exaggerated their response to the security problem and to the administrative difficulties posed by the necessity of carefully inspecting each book mailed from unidentified sources," the considered judgment of these experts should control in the absence of prohibitions far more sweeping than those involved there. Moreover, the rule operated "in a neutral fashion, without regard to the content of the expression." And there were alternative means of obtaining reading material that had not been shown to be "burdensome or insufficient." The restriction allowed soft-bound books and magazines to be received from any source and hardback books to be received from publishers, bookstores, and book clubs. To the limited extent the rule might possibly increase the cost of obtaining published materials, the Court noted that, "where other avenues remain available for the receipt of materials by inmates, the loss of cost advantages does not fundamentally implicate free speech values." In addition, the prison had a relatively large library for use by inmates. In light of these considerations, the Court sustained the challenged rule.[610]

[I222] Wolff dealt, inter alia, with the opening of incoming mail from attorneys, in the presence of the prisoners-clients. As the Court noted, "[i]f prison officials had to check in each case whether a communication was from an attorney before opening it for inspection, a near-impossible task of administration would be imposed. [Hence, it is] entirely appropriate that the State require any such communications to be specially marked as originating from an attorney, with his name and address being given, if they are to receive special treatment. It would also certainly be permissible that prison authorities require that a lawyer desiring to correspond with a prisoner, first identify himself and his client to the prison officials, to assure that the letters marked privileged are actually from members of the bar. As to the ability to open the mail in the presence of inmates, this could in no way constitute censorship, since the mail would not be read. Neither could it chill such communications, since the inmate's presence insured that prison officials would not read the mail. [And] [t]he possibility that contraband will be enclosed in letters, even those from apparent attorneys, surely warrants prison officials' opening the letters." This need not only be done in "appropriate circumstances;" "a rule whereby the inmate is present when mail from attorneys is inspected, [is] all, and perhaps even more than, the Constitution requires."[611]

[I223] Pell involved a constitutional challenge to a prison regulation prohibiting face-to-face media interviews with specific prisoners. The regulation limited visitations to individuals who had either a personal or professional relationship to the inmate family, friends of prior acquaintance, legal counsel, and clergy. In the judgment of the state corrections officials, this visitation policy would permit "inmates to have personal contact with those persons who [would] aid in their rehabilitation, while keeping visitations at a manageable level that [would] not compromise institutional security." The Court noted that "[s]uch considerations are peculiarly within the province and professional expertise of corrections officials, and, in the absence of substantial evidence in the record to indicate that the officials have exaggerated their response to these considerations, courts should ordinarily defer to their expert judgment in these matters." Moreover, alternative means of communication remained open to the inmates: they could correspond by mail with persons, including media representatives; they had rights of visitation with family, clergy, attorneys, and friends of prior acquaintance; and they had unrestricted opportunity to communicate with the press or public through their prison visitors. For these reasons, the Court rejected the inmates' First Amendment challenge to the ban on media interviews.[612]

---

610 Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 550–52 (1979).

611 Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 576–77 (1974).

[I224] Inmates "have a right to receive legal advice from other inmates only when it is a necessary 'means for ensuring a reasonably adequate opportunity to present claimed violations of fundamental constitutional rights to the courts.'"[613] In Johnson v. Avery, an inmate was disciplined for violating a prison regulation that prohibited inmates from assisting other prisoners in preparing habeas corpus petitions. The Court held that, "unless and until the State provides some reasonable alternative to assist inmates in the preparation of petitions for post-conviction relief," inmates could not be barred from furnishing assistance to each other.[614] The Court extended the holding of Johnson in Wolff, where it struck down a similar regulation that prevented inmates from assisting one another in the preparation of civil rights complaints—i.e., actions under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 to vindicate fundamental constitutional rights.[615] These holdings were premised on prisoners' right of access to the courts, which is founded in the Due Process Clause. In Shaw, the Court decided that inmates do not "possess a special First Amendment right to provide legal assistance to fellow inmates that enhances the protections otherwise available under Turner." "Augmenting First Amendment protection for inmate legal advice would undermine prison officials' ability to address the 'complex and intractable' problems of prison administration. . . . Although supervised inmate legal assistance programs may serve valuable ends, it is indisputable that inmate law clerks 'are sometimes a menace to prison discipline' and that prisoners have 'an acknowledged propensity . . . to abuse both the giving and the seeking of legal assistance.' . . . Prisoners have used legal correspondence as a means for passing contraband and communicating instructions on how to manufacture drugs or weapons. . . . The legal text also could be an excuse for making clearly inappropriate comments, which 'may be expected to circulate among prisoners,' . . . despite prison measures to screen individual inmates or officers from the remarks." Shaw thus declined "to cloak the provision of legal assistance with any First Amendment protection above and beyond the protection normally accorded prisoners' speech."[616]

5. Government Funding of Speech[617]—Tax Exemptions or Deductions

[I225] The Constitution empowers Congress "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States" (Article I, Section 8, Clause 1). "Congress has wide latitude to attach conditions to the receipt of federal assistance in order to further its policy objec-

---

612 Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 823–28 (1974). The Court also rejected the reporters' assertion of a special right of access to prisons. See para. I274.

613 Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 231, n.3 (2001), quoting Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 350–51 (1996).

614 Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483, 489–90 (1969).

615 Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 577–80 (1974).

616 Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 225, 231 (2001).

617 See also paras. I215 (school-sponsored expressive activities); I515 (campaign funding); I160 (public libraries receiving federal funds), I244 (compelled funding of government speech).

tives."[618] But other constitutional provisions, apart from the Spending Clause, may provide an independent bar to the conditional grant of federal funds.[619] Indeed, the First Amendment certainly has application in the subsidy context.[620]

[I226] In Rust, Congress established program clinics to provide subsidies for doctors to advise patients on a variety of family planning topics. Congress did not consider abortion to be within its family planning objectives, however, and it forbade doctors employed by the program from discussing abortion with their patients. Recipients of funds challenged the Act's restriction, which provided that none of the federal funds appropriated for family planning services could be used in programs where abortion was a method of family planning. The recipients argued that the regulations constituted impermissible viewpoint discrimination favoring an anti-abortion position over a pro-abortion approach in the sphere of family planning. They also asserted that Congress had imposed an unconstitutional condition on recipients of federal funds by requiring them to relinquish their right to engage in abortion advocacy and counseling in exchange for the subsidy. The Court upheld the law, reasoning that Congress had "merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of the other." The restrictions were designed "to ensure that the limits of the federal program [we]re observed." The government did not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint, but simply "refus[ed] to fund activities, including speech, which [we]re specifically excluded from the scope of the project funded."[621]

[I227] "The Court in Rust did not place explicit reliance on the rationale that the counseling activities . . . amounted to governmental speech; when interpreting the holding in later cases, however, [the Court] explained Rust on this understanding."[622] The Court has said that "viewpoint-based funding decisions can be sustained in instances in which the government is itself the speaker,"[623] "or instances, like Rust, in which the government 'used private speakers to transmit information pertaining to its own program.'"[624] "When the government disburses public funds to private entities to convey a governmental message, it may take legitimate and appropriate steps to ensure that its message is neither garbled nor distorted by the grantee."[625] "The latitude which may exist for restrictions on speech where the government's own message is being delivered flows in part from [the Court's] observation that '[w]hen the government speaks, for instance to promote its own policies or to advance a particular idea, it is, in the end, accountable to the electorate and the political process for its advocacy. If the citizenry objects, newly elected officials later could espouse some different or contrary position.'"[626]

---

618 United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. 194, 203 (2003), citing S. Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203, 206 (1987).

619 S. Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203, 208 (1987). Under the "independent constitutional bar" limitation on the spending power, Congress may not "induce" the recipient to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional. Id. at 210.

620 Nat'l Endowment for Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 587 (1998).

621 Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 193–95 (1991).

622 Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 541 (2001).

623 Id., citing Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 229, 235 (2000).

624 Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 541 (2001), quoting Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 833 (1995).

625 Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 833 (1995).

626 Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 541–42 (2001), quoting Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 235 (2000).

[I228] Nevertheless, "[n]either the latitude for government speech nor its rationale applies to subsidies for private speech in every instance."[627] "[V]iewpoint-based restrictions [may not] be proper when the [government] does not itself speak or subsidize transmittal of a message it favors, but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers."[628] Legal Services Corporation involved a federal subsidy program (LSC), which provided financial support for legal assistance to indigent persons in, inter alia, welfare benefits claims, but prohibited funding of any organization that represented clients in an effort to amend or otherwise challenge existing welfare law. Hence, the restriction prevented an attorney from arguing to a court that a state statute conflicted with a federal statute or that either a state or federal statute, by its terms or in its application, was violative of the U.S. Constitution. Further, upon determining a question of statutory validity was present in any anticipated or pending case or controversy, the LSC-funded attorney should cease the representation at once. A five-Justice majority held that the foregoing funding condition was invalid. The program was "designed to facilitate private speech, not to promote a governmental message," since LSC-funded attorneys represented the interests of indigent clients and spoke on the behalf of their clients in a claim against the government for welfare benefits. "By providing LSC subsidies, the Government [sought] to facilitate suits for benefits by using the State and Federal courts and the independent bar on which those courts depend[ed] for the proper performance of their duties and responsibilities. [But] [r]estricting LSC attorneys in advising their clients and in presenting arguments and analyses to the courts distort[ed] the legal system by altering the traditional role of the attorneys. . . . [The government] may not design a subsidy to effect this serious and fundamental restriction on advocacy of attorneys and the functioning of the judiciary. . . . An informed, independent judiciary presumes an informed, independent bar." However, the restriction at issue prevented LSC attorneys from advising the courts of serious statutory validity questions. It also threatened "severe impairment of the judicial function" by "sift[ing] out cases presenting constitutional challenges in order to insulate the Government's laws from judicial inquiry. . . . In cases where LSC counsel were attorneys of record, there would be lingering doubt whether the truncated representation had resulted in complete analysis of the case, full advice to the client, and proper presentation to the court. The courts and the public would come to question the adequacy and fairness of professional representations when the attorney, either consciously to comply with this statute or unconsciously to continue the representation despite the statute, avoided all reference to questions of statutory validity and constitutional authority. A scheme so inconsistent with accepted separation of powers principles is an insufficient basis to sustain or uphold the restriction on speech. . . . Where private speech is involved, Congress' antecedent funding decision cannot be aimed at the suppression of ideas thought inimical to the Government's own interest."[629]

[I229] "[A] discriminatory denial of a tax exemption for engaging in speech is a limitation on free speech."[630] In Speiser, the Court invalidated a state program under which taxpayers applying for a certain tax exemption bore the burden of proving that they did not advocate the overthrow of the U.S. government. Noting that "[t]o deny an exemption to claimants who engage in certain forms of speech is, in effect, to penalize

---

627 Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 542 (2001),

628 Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 834 (1995).

629 Legal Servs. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 542, 544–46, 548–49 (2001).

630 Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 518 (1958).

them for such speech," and that the program was "aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas," the Court held that the presumption against the taxpayer was unconstitutional because the state had "no such compelling interest at stake as to justify a short-cut procedure which [would] inevitably result in suppressing protected speech."[631]

[I230] By contrast, "[n]ondiscriminatory denial of deduction from gross income to sums expended to promote or defeat legislation is plainly not aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas."[632] In Taxation With Representation, the Court found that Congress could, in the exercise of its spending power, reasonably refuse to subsidize the lobbying activities of tax-exempt charitable organizations by prohibiting such organizations from using tax-deductible contributions to support their lobbying efforts. In so holding, the Court explained that such organizations remained free "to receive [tax-]deductible contributions to support nonlobbying activit[ies]." Thus, under the Internal Revenue Code, a charitable organization could create an affiliate to conduct its nonlobbying activities using tax-deductible contributions, and, at the same time, establish a separate affiliate to pursue its lobbying efforts without such contributions. Given that statutory alternative, the Court concluded that Congress had "not infringed any First Amendment rights or regulated any First Amendment activity[; it] ha[d] simply chosen not to pay for [appellee's] lobbying."[633]

[I231] Indeed, "even where the Constitution prohibits coercive governmental interference with specific individual rights, it 'does not confer an entitlement to such funds as may be necessary to realize all the advantages of that freedom.'"[634] In Lyng v. Automobile Workers, the Court rejected a First Amendment attack on an amendment to the Food Stamp Act providing that no household could become eligible for benefits while a household member was on strike. The statute "require[s] no exaction from any individual; it d[id] not 'coerce' belief; and it d[id] not require appellees to participate in political activities or support political views with which they disagree[d]. It merely decline[d] to extend additional food stamp assistance to striking individuals simply because the decision to strike inevitably [led] to a decline in their income."[635]

[I232] In League of Women Voters, the Court invalidated a federal law providing that non-commercial television and radio stations receiving federal grants might not engage in editorializing. This funding restriction was "specifically directed at a form of speech—the expression of editorial opinions—that lies at the heart of First Amendment protection," and was defined solely on the basis of the content of the suppressed speech. Thus, the law singled out non-commercial broadcasters and denied them the right to address their chosen audience on matters of public importance. Such a restriction could

---

631 Id. at 518–19, 529.

632 Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498, 513 (1959).

633 Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 545–46 (1983).

634 Lyng v. Auto. Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 369 (1988), quoting Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 550 (1983), quoting, in turn, Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 318 (1980).

635 Lyng v. Auto. Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 369 (1988). Moreover, the statute did not infringe the associational rights of the individual appellees and their unions. It did not "directly and substantially interfere" with the workers' ability to combine together to assert their lawful rights. Even if isolated instances might be found in which a striking individual might have left his union, in order to obtain food stamps, in the overwhelming majority of cases, it was exceedingly unlikely that the provision would have any effect at all. Id. at 366.

be upheld only if it were "narrowly tailored to further a substantial governmental interest, such as ensuring adequate and balanced coverage of public issues." The government claimed that the ban was necessary, first, to protect non-commercial educational broadcasting stations from being coerced, as a result of federal financing, into becoming vehicles for government propagandizing or the objects of governmental influence; and, second, to keep these stations from becoming convenient targets for capture by private interest groups wishing to express their own partisan viewpoints. Nevertheless, this contention could not stand. Various statutory provisions substantially reduced the risk of governmental interference with the editorial judgments of local stations without restricting those stations' ability to speak on matters of public concern. In addition, an underlying supposition of the government's argument in this regard was that individual non-commercial stations were likely to speak so forcefully on particular issues that Congress, the ultimate source of the stations' federal funding, would be tempted to retaliate against these individual stations by restricting appropriations for all of public broadcasting. But the character of public broadcasting suggested that such a risk was speculative, at best. There were literally hundreds of public radio and television stations in communities scattered throughout the United States and its territories. Given that central fact, it seemed reasonable to infer that the editorial voices of these stations would prove to be as distinctive, varied, and idiosyncratic as the various communities they represented. More importantly, the editorial focus of any particular station could fairly be expected to focus largely on issues affecting only its community. Accordingly, "absent some showing by the Government to the contrary, the risk that local editorializing [would] place all of public broadcasting in jeopardy [wa]s not sufficiently pressing to warrant [the statute's] broad suppression of speech." Indeed, what was far more likely than local station editorials to pose the kinds of dangers hypothesized by the government were the wide variety of programs addressing controversial issues produced, often with substantial federal funding, for national distribution to local stations. The challenged ban, however, was "plainly not directed at the potentially controversial content of such programs; it [wa]s, instead, leveled solely at the expression of editorial opinion by local station management, a form of expression that is far more likely to be aimed at a smaller local audience, to have less national impact, and to be confined to local issues." Besides, the proscription was not sufficiently tailored to the harms it sought to prevent. The prohibition included within its grip "a potentially infinite variety of speech, most of which would not be related in any way to governmental affairs, political candidacies, or elections. Indeed, the breadth of editorial commentary is as wide as human imagination permits." Further, the public's interest in preventing public broadcasting stations from becoming fora for lopsided presentations of narrow partisan positions was already secured by a variety of other regulatory means—like the FCC's fairness doctrine—that intruded far less drastically upon the "journalistic freedom" of non-commercial broadcasters. Relatedly, the statute did not prevent the use of non-commercial stations for the presentation of partisan views on controversial matters; instead, it merely barred a station from specifically communicating such views on its own behalf or on behalf of its management. Moreover, "the public's paramount right to be fully and broadly informed on matters of public importance through the medium of noncommercial educational broadcasting [wa]s not well served by the restriction, for its effect [wa]s plainly to diminish, rather than augment, the volume and quality of coverage of controversial issues." Finally, the Court rejected the argument that Congress had, in the proper exercise of its spending power, simply determined that it would not subsidize public broadcasting station editorials. Under the challenged statute, a recipient of federal funds was barred absolutely from all editorializing, because it was "not able to segregate its activities according to the source of its funding," and thus had "no way of limiting the use of its federal funds to all noneditorializing activities." The effect of the law was that a non-commercial educational station that received only 1 percent of its overall income from federal grants was barred absolutely from all editorializing and was barred from using even wholly private funds to finance its editorial activity. The Court expressly recognized, however, that were Congress to permit the recipient stations to establish "affiliate" organizations, which could then use the station's facilities to editorialize with non-federal funds, such a statutory mechanism would plainly be valid. Such a scheme would permit the station to make known its views on matters of public importance, through its non-federally funded, editorializing affiliate, without losing federal grants for its non-editorializing broadcast activities.[636]

[I233] The subsidy at issue in Rosenberger was available to all student organizations that were related to the educational purpose of the University of Virginia. There, a private student newspaper, which had an avowed religious perspective, sought funding from a student activity fund on the same basis as its secular counterparts. The Court held that, by subsidizing the student activities fund, the University had created a "limited public forum" from which it impermissibly excluded all publications with "religious editorial viewpoints."[637]

[I234] In National Endowment for the Arts (NEA), the Court upheld, on its face, an art funding program that required the NEA to use content-based criteria in making funding decisions. More specifically, the statute vested the NEA with substantial discretion to award financial grants to support the arts and identified only the broadest funding priorities, including "artistic and cultural significance, giving emphasis to creativity and cultural diversity," "professional excellence," and the encouragement of "public education and appreciation of the arts." A 1990 amendment to the statute directed the NEA to ensure that "artistic excellence and artistic merit are the criteria by which [grant] applications are judged, taking into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public." The Court rejected the claim that the provision was facially unconstitutional, because the "decency and respect" criteria were sufficiently subjective that the agency could utilize them to engage in viewpoint discrimination. Given the varied interpretations of the criteria and the vague exhortation to "take them into consideration," the Court did "not perceive a realistic danger" that the amendment would compromise First Amendment values and was reluctant to invalidate the provision on the basis of its "hypothetical application to situations not before the Court." At the same time, the Court stressed that "[a]ny content-based considerations that may be taken into account in the grantmaking process are a consequence of the nature of arts funding. . . . [Indeed,] it would be impossible to have a highly selective grant program without denying money to a large amount of constitutionally protected expression. . . . In the context of arts funding, in contrast to many other subsidies, the Government does not indiscriminately encourage a diversity of views from private speakers."[638] Consequently, the Court expressly declined to apply "public forum" analysis. "The NEA's mandate [wa]s to make aesthetic judgments, and the inher-

---

[636] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 380–400 (1984).

[637] Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 828–32 (1995).

[638] Nat'l Endowment for Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 585–86 (1998).

ently content-based 'excellence' threshold for NEA support se[t] it apart from the subsidy at issue in Rosenberger, . . . and from comparably objective decisions on allocating public benefits."[639] Relatedly, the Court noted that it had no occasion there to address an as-applied challenge in a situation where the denial of a grant might be shown to be the product of invidious viewpoint discrimination. If the NEA were to leverage its power to award subsidies on the basis of subjective criteria into a penalty on disfavored viewpoints, then it would be a different case, for, "even in the provision of subsidies, the Government may not aim at the suppression of dangerous ideas," and "if a subsidy were 'manipulated' to have a 'coercive effect,' then relief could be appropriate."[640] Further, the Court stressed that "[i]n the context of selective subsidies, it is not always feasible for Congress to legislate with clarity. Indeed, if [the challenged] statute [were] unconstitutionally vague, then so too [we]re all government programs awarding scholarships and grants on the basis of subjective criteria such as 'excellence.'" Hence, to accept respondents' vagueness argument "would be to call into question the constitutionality of these valuable government programs and countless others like them."[641] The Court concluded that unless and until the provision was applied in a manner raising concern about the suppression of disfavored viewpoints, its constitutionality should be upheld.

F. THE RIGHT NOT TO SPEAK

1. Generally[642]

[I235] Just as the First Amendment may prevent the government from prohibiting speech, the Amendment may prevent the government from compelling individuals to speak. "'Since all speech inherently involves choices of what to say and what to leave unsaid' . . . one important manifestation of the principle of free speech is that one who chooses to speak may also decide 'what not to say.'"[643] "Mandating speech that a speaker would not otherwise make necessarily alters the content of the speech."[644] Hence, a regulation compelling speech is content-based and subject to "exacting First Amendment scrutiny."[645] Although the state may at times "prescribe what shall be orthodox in commercial advertising, by requiring the dissemination of purely factual and uncontroversial information,"[646] outside that context it may not, as a matter of principle, require persons to "repeat an objectionable message out of their own mouths,"[647] compel them to pay subsidies for speech to which they object,[648] "require them to use their own prop-

639 Id. at 586.

640 Id. at 587.

641 Id. at 589.

642 See also para. H5 (freedom of mind).

643 Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 573 (1995), quoting Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 11, 16 (1986) (plurality opinion).

644 Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of the Blind of N. Carolina, Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 795 (1988).

645 Id. at 798.

646 Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 651 (1985). See also Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. 425 U.S. 748, 772, n.24 (1976).

647 Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc. 521 U.S. 457, 471 (1997), citing W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 632 (1943).

648 Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 234–235 (1977); United States v. United

erty to convey an antagonistic ideological message,"[649] "force them to respond to a hostile message when they would prefer to remain silent,"[650] or "require them to be publicly identified or associated with another's message."[651] The general rule "that the speaker has the right to tailor the speech, applies not only to expressions of value, opinion, or endorsement, but equally to statements of fact the speaker would rather avoid."[652]

2. Anonymous Speech—Compelled Disclosure of the Speaker's Identity[653]

[I236] "'Anonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind.' . . . Great works of literature have frequently been produced by authors writing under assumed names. Despite readers' curiosity and the public's interest in identifying the creator of a work of art, an author generally is free to decide whether or not to disclose his true identity. The decision in favor of anonymity may be motivated by fear of economic or official retaliation, by concern about social ostracism, or merely by a desire to preserve as much of one's privacy as possible. Whatever the motivation may be at least in the field of literary endeavor, the interest in having anonymous works enter the marketplace of ideas unquestionably outweighs any public interest in requiring disclosure as a condition of entry. Accordingly, an author's decision to remain anonymous, like other decisions concerning omissions or additions to the content of a publication, is an aspect of the freedom of speech protected by the First Amendment."[654]

Foods, Inc., 533 U.S. 405 (2001). However, "[t]he government, as a general rule, may support valid programs and policies by taxes or other exactions binding on protesting parties." See Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 229 (2000).

See also Johanns v. Livestock Mktg. Ass'n, 544 U.S. 550, 562 (2005), where the Court made clear that citizens "have no First Amendment right not to fund government speech," and that "this is no less true when the funding is achieved through targeted assessments devoted exclusively to the program to which the assessed citizens object." There, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to a federal program that financed generic advertising to promote an agricultural product, finding that (1) the message of the promotional campaign at issue was effectively controlled by the federal government, since the compelled subsidy funded communicative activities were prescribed by law and developed under official government supervision; and (2) the record did not show that individual beef advertisements were attributed to respondents. Id. at 560–62, 565.

649 Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc. 521 U.S. 457, 471 (1997), citing Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), and Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 18 (1986) (plurality opinion).

650 Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc. 521 U.S. 457, 471 (1997).

651 Id., citing PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 87 (1980). See also Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 580–81 (1995).

652 Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 573 (1995), citing McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 341–42 (1995); Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of the Blind of N. Carolina, Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 797–98 (1988).

653 See also paras. I509 et seq. (campaign expenditures); paras. I380, I390, I391 (identification permit requirement for canvassing or soliciting from house to house), para. I197 (lobbying activities), I330 (dissemination of political propaganda by an agent of a foreign principal); paras. I414 et seq. (associational privacy).

654 McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 341–42 (1995), quoting Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64 (1960).

[I237] In Talley, the Court held that the First Amendment protects the distribution of unsigned handbills urging readers to boycott certain merchants allegedly engaging in discriminatory employment practices. In so holding, the Court noted that "[p]ersecuted groups and sects from time to time throughout history have been able to criticize oppressive practices and laws either anonymously or not at all," and reminded that even the arguments favoring the ratification of the Constitution advanced in the Federalist Papers were published under fictitious names.[655]

[I238] "On occasion, quite apart from any threat of persecution, an advocate may believe [his] ideas will be more persuasive if [his] readers are unaware of [his] identity. Anonymity thereby provides a way for a writer who may be personally unpopular to ensure that readers will not prejudge [his] message simply because they do not like its proponent. The specific holding in Talley related to advocacy of an economic boycott, but the Court's reasoning embraced a respected tradition of anonymity in the advocacy of political causes."[656] McIntyre reviewed an Ohio law that prohibited the distribution of anonymous campaign literature. The writing in question was a handbill urging voters to defeat a ballot issue. The Court considered that the law was a regulation of core political speech and, hence, subject to "exacting scrutiny." The state argued that the challenged disclosure requirement was justified by its important and legitimate interests in preventing fraudulent and libelous statements and in providing the electorate with relevant information. The Court disagreed. First, it noted that "the identity of the speaker is no different from other components of the document's content that the author is free to include or exclude. . . . Moreover, in the case of a handbill written by a private citizen who is not known to the recipient, the name and address of the author adds little, if anything, to the reader's ability to evaluate the document's message."[657] Thus, Ohio's informational interest was plainly insufficient to support the constitutionality of its disclosure requirement. Further, Ohio's election code included detailed and specific prohibitions against making or disseminating false statements during political campaigns. Thus, Ohio's prohibition of anonymous leaflets plainly was not its principal weapon against fraud. Rather, it served as "an aid to enforcement of the specific prohibitions and as a deterrent to the making of false statements by unscrupulous prevaricators." Although these "ancillary benefits [we]re assuredly legitimate," the Court was not persuaded that they justified the extremely broad prohibition in question. The challenged ban "encompasse[d] documents that [we]re not even arguably false or misleading. It appl[ied] not only to the activities of candidates and their organized supporters, but also to individuals acting independently and using only their own modest resources. It appl[ied] not only to elections of public officers, but also to ballot issues that present neither a substantial risk of libel nor any potential appearance of corrupt advantage. It appl[ied] not only to leaflets distributed on the eve of an election, when the opportunity for reply [would be] limited, but also to those distributed months in advance. It appl[ied] no matter what the character or strength of the author's interest in anonymity. [In addition,] the absence of the author's name on a document [did] not necessarily protect either that person or a distributor of a forbidden document from being held responsible for compliance with the election code. Nor ha[d] the State explained why it [could] more easily enforce the direct bans on disseminating false doc-

---

655 Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64–65 (1960).

656 McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 342–43 (1995).

657 Id. at 348–49.

uments against anonymous authors and distributors than against wrongdoers who might have used false names and addresses in an attempt to avoid detection. [The Court recognized] that a State's enforcement interest might justify a more limited identification requirement, but Ohio ha[d] shown scant cause for inhibiting the leafletting at issue [t]here."[658]

[I239] ACLF struck down a state provision requiring ballot initiative petition circulators to wear identification badges. The state urged that the badge enabled the public to identify, and the state to apprehend, petition circulators who engaged in misconduct. However, the statutory requirement that to each petition section be attached a signed, notarized, and dated affidavit executed by the circulator, which should include, among several particulars, his or her name and address, was responsive to the state's concern. "Unlike a name badge worn at the time a circulator [wa]s soliciting signatures, the affidavit [wa]s separated from the moment the circulator [spoke.] . . . [T]he name badge requirement force[d] circulators to reveal their identities at the same time they deliver[ed] their political message; . . . it operate[d] when reaction to the circulator's message [wa]s immediate, and [might be] intense, emotional, and unreasoned. . . . The affidavit, in contrast, d[id] not expose the circulator to the risk of 'heat of the moment' harassment. . . . [T]he badge requirement compel[led] personal name identification at the precise moment when the circulator's interest in anonymity [wa]s greatest. . . . For this very reason, it d[id] not qualify for inclusion among the 'more limited [election process] identification requirements,' . . . alluded in McIntyre. . . . In contrast, the affidavit requirement, . . . which [should] be met only after circulators ha[d] completed their conversations with electors, exemplifie[d] the type of regulation for which McIntyre left room."[659]

[I240] "Corporate [political] advertising, unlike some methods of participation in political campaigns, is likely to be highly visible. Identification of the source of advertising may be required as a means of disclosure, so that the people will be able to evaluate the arguments to which they are being subjected."[660] Moreover, when an agent of a foreign principal disseminates political materials in the United States, Congress may require the disseminators to label that material with certain information, the agent's identity, and the identity of the principal for whom he acts, "so that the Government and the people of the United States . . . may appraise the statements and actions of such persons in the light of their associations and activities."[661]

3. Compelled Contributions to Objectionable Speech[662]

[I241] The First Amendment does not forbid all compelled financial contributions to fund advertising. Glickman rejected a First Amendment challenge to the constitu-

---

[658] Id. at 350–53. The Court distinguished Buckley, noting that (1) required disclosures about the level of financial support a candidate has received from various sources are supported by an interest in preventing the actual or apparent corruption of candidates, which had no application to that case; (2) "even though money may 'talk,' its speech is less specific, less personal, and less provocative than a handbill—and, as a result, when money supports an unpopular viewpoint, it is less likely to precipitate retaliation." See id. at 354–55.

[659] Buckley v. Am. Constitutional Law Found., Inc., 525 U.S. 182, 198–200 (1999).

[660] First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 792, n.32 (1978).

[661] See Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 469, 477–81 (1987).

[662] See also paras. I444 et seq.

tionality of a series of agricultural marketing orders that, as part of a larger regulatory marketing scheme, required producers of certain California tree fruit to pay assessments for product advertising. In deciding that case, the Court emphasized the importance of the statutory context in which it arose. The California tree fruits were marketed "pursuant to detailed marketing orders that ha[d] displaced many aspects of independent business activity." Indeed, the marketing orders "displaced competition" to such an extent that they were expressly exempted from the anti-trust laws. The market for the tree fruit regulated by the program was characterized by "[c]ollective action, rather than the aggregate consequences of independent competitive choices." The producers of tree fruit who were compelled to contribute funds for use in cooperative advertising "d[id] so as a part of a broader collective enterprise in which their freedom to act independently [wa]s already constrained by the regulatory scheme."[663] "The opinion and the analysis of the Court proceeded upon the premise that the producers were bound together and required by the statute to market their products according to cooperative rules. To that extent, their mandated participation in an advertising program with a particular message was the logical concomitant of a valid scheme of economic regulation."[664] [I242] United Foods involved a federal law mandating that fresh mushroom handlers pay assessments used primarily to fund advertisements promoting mushroom sales. Respondent wanted to convey the message that its brand of mushrooms was superior to those grown by other producers. It objected to being charged for the message that mushrooms were worth consuming whether or not they were branded. In the government's view, the assessment was permitted by Glickman. However, the Court disagreed. The features of the marketing scheme found important in Glickman were not present in that case. "Almost all of the funds collected under the mandatory assessments [we]re for one purpose: generic advertising. Beyond the collection and disbursement of advertising funds, there [we]re no marketing orders that regulate[d] how mushrooms might be produced and sold, no exemption from the antitrust laws, and nothing preventing individual producers from making their own marketing decisions. . . . The cooperative marketing structure relied upon by a majority of the Court in Glickman to sustain an ancillary assessment [found] no corollary [t]here; the expression respondent [wa]s required to support [wa]s not germane to a purpose related to an association independent from the speech itself."[665] For these reasons, the assessments were not permitted under the First Amendment.

[I243] Southworth addressed the question whether the First Amendment permits a public university to charge its students an activity fee used to fund a program to facilitate extracurricular student speech. The Court decided that the standard of germane speech, set forth in Abood and Keller,[666] is unworkable as applied to student speech at a university and "gives insufficient protection both to the objecting students and to the University program itself."[667] First, where a State University "undertakes to stimulate the whole universe of speech and ideas, . . . [t]o insist upon asking what speech is 'germane would be contrary to the very goal the University seeks to pursue. It is not for the Court

---

663 Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc., 521 U.S. 457, 461, 469 (1997).

664 See United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405, 412 (2001), discussing Glickman.

665 United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405, 412, 415 (2001).

666 See paras. I446, I453.

667 Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 231 (2000).

to say what is or is not germane to the ideas to be pursued in an institution of higher learning."[668] Further, "[j]ust as the vast extent of permitted expression makes the test of germane speech inappropriate for intervention, so too does it underscore the high potential for intrusion on the First Amendment rights of the objecting students. It is all but inevitable that the fees will result in subsidies to speech which some students find objectionable and offensive to their personal beliefs. If the standard of germane speech is inapplicable, then it might be argued the remedy is to allow each student to list those causes which he or she will or will not support. If a university decided that its students' First Amendment interests were better protected by some type of optional or refund system, it would be free to do so. . . . [A] system of that sort [is not] a constitutional requirement, however. The restriction could be so disruptive and expensive that the program to support extracurricular speech would be ineffective. The First Amendment does not require the University to put such a program at risk."[669] "The University may determine that its mission is well served if students have the means to engage in dynamic discussions of philosophical, religious, scientific, social, and political subjects in their extracurricular campus life outside the lecture hall. If the University reaches this conclusion, it is entitled to impose a mandatory fee to sustain an open dialogue to these ends. The University must provide some protection to its students' First Amendment interests, however. The proper measure, and the principal standard of protection for objecting students," the Court concluded, "is the requirement of viewpoint neutrality in the allocation of funding support. . . . When a university requires its students to pay fees to support the extracurricular speech of other students, all in the interest of open discussion, it may not prefer some viewpoints to others. . . . [V]iewpoint neutrality is the justification for requiring the student to pay the fee in the first instance, and for ensuring the integrity of the program's operation once the funds have been collected."[670] And to the extent a student referendum "substitutes majority determinations for viewpoint neutrality, it would undermine the constitutional protection such a program requires."[671]

4. Compelled Access for the Speech of Others[672]

[I244] "[W]hen dissemination of a view contrary to one's own is forced upon a speaker intimately connected with the communication advanced, the speaker's right to autonomy over the message is compromised."[673] In Pacific Gas & Electric, the Court inval-

668 Id. at 232.

669 Id.

670 Id. at 233.

671 Id. at 235. The Court made no distinction between campus activities and the off-campus expressive activities of objectionable student organizations. "Universities possess significant interests in encouraging students to take advantage of the social, civic, cultural, and religious opportunities available in surrounding communities and throughout the country. Universities, like all of society, are finding that traditional conceptions of territorial boundaries are difficult to insist upon in an age marked by revolutionary changes in communications, information transfer, and the means of discourse." The Court concluded that "[i]f the rule of viewpoint neutrality is respected, [its] holding affords the University latitude to adjust its extracurricular student speech program to accommodate these advances and opportunities." Id. at 234.

672 See also paras. I281, I288–I291, I296, I297 (mandatory access to the print and electronic media); para. H5 (state mottos on license plates of private motor vehicles).

673 Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 576 (1995).

idated a rule requiring a privately owned utility, on a quarterly basis, to include with its monthly bills an editorial newsletter published by a consumer group critical of the utility's ratemaking practices. The regulation conferred benefits to speakers based on viewpoint, and "impermissibly require[d] appellant to associate with speech with which appellant [might] disagree" and "to enhance the relative voice of its opponents." Hence, the utility would "be forced either to appear to agree [with the intruding leaflet] or to respond. . . . This kind of forced response, is antithetical to the free discussion the First Amendment seeks to foster."[674] Appellees argued that the order furthered the state's interest in effective rate-making proceedings. However, that interest could be served through means that would not violate appellant's First Amendment rights, such as awarding costs and fees. The Court also rejected the contention that the order furthered the state's interest in promoting speech by making a variety of views available to appellant's customers. This interest was not furthered by an order that was not content-neutral. Moreover, the means chosen to advance variety "tend[ed] to inhibit expression" of the utility's views. Therefore, the regulation was not a narrowly tailored means of furthering a compelling state interest.[675]

[I245] In Hurley, the South Boston Allied War Veterans Council ran a privately operated St. Patrick's Day parade. Respondent, an organization known as "GLIB," represented a contingent of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals who sought to march in the petitioners' parade, behind a GLIB banner, as a way to express pride in their Irish heritage as openly gay, lesbian, and bisexual individuals. When the parade organizers refused GLIB's admission, GLIB brought suit under a Massachusetts' statute that prohibited discrimination on account of sexual orientation in any place of public accommodation, which the state courts interpreted to include the parade. Petitioners argued that forcing them to include GLIB in their parade would violate their free speech rights. The Court agreed. The St. Patrick's Day parade was an expressive undertaking. GLIB's marching in the parade would be an expressive act suggesting the view "that people of their sexual orientations have as much claim to unqualified social acceptance as heterosexuals." "The parade's organizers [might] not believe these facts about Irish sexuality to be so, or they [could] object to unqualified social acceptance of gays and lesbians or have some other reason for wishing to keep GLIB's message out of the parade. But, whatever the reason, it boil[ed] down to the choice of a speaker not to propound a particular point of view, and that choice is presumed to lie beyond the government's power to control."[676] Applying the Massachusetts' public accommodation law in such circumstances "would require speakers to modify the content of their expression to whatever extent beneficiaries of the law [chose] to alter it with messages of their own. But in the absence of some further, legitimate end, this [would] merely allow exactly what the general rule of speaker's autonomy forbids."[677]

---

[674] Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 14–16 (1986) (plurality opinion).

[675] Id. at 19–20 (plurality opinion). Justice Marshall concurred in the judgment, finding that the state (1) had "redefined a property right in the extra space in appellant's billing envelope in such a way as to achieve a result—burdening the speech of one party in order to enhance the speech of another—that the First Amendment disallows"; (2) had sanctioned a substantial intrusion into appellant's property. Id. at 25.

[676] Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 574–75 (1995).

[677] Id. at 578.

[I246] In PruneYard, a shopping center owner sought to deny access to a group of students who wished to hand out pamphlets in the shopping center's common area. The California supreme court held that the students' access was protected by the state Constitution; the shopping center owner argued that this ruling violated his First Amendment rights. The Court rejected this claim, noting that the proprietors were running "a business establishment that [wa]s open to the public" at large, that the solicitations would "not likely be identified with those of the owner," and that the proprietors could "expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs in the area where the speakers or hand-billers [stood.]"[678] "Notably absent from PruneYard was any concern that access to this area might affect the shopping center owner's exercise of his own right to speak: the owner did not even allege that he objected to the content of the pamphlets; nor was the access right content-based."[679] The principle of speaker's autonomy was simply not threatened in that case.[680]

G. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

1. General Principles

[I247] The First Amendment, which applies to the states through the Fourteenth, prohibits laws abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press. "An untrammeled press is a vital source of public information, . . . and an informed public is the essence of working democracy."[681] "The Constitution specifically selected the press, which includes not only newspapers, books, and magazines, but also humble leaflets and circulars . . . [as well as the electronic media,] to play an important role in the discussion of public affairs. Thus, the press serves and was designed to serve as a powerful antidote to any abuses of power by governmental officials, and as a constitutionally chosen means for keeping officials elected by the people responsible to all the people whom they were selected to serve. Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticize governmental agents and to clamor and contend for or against change . . . muzzles one of the very agencies the Framers of the Constitution thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve the American society and keep it free."[682] Accordingly, the Court has held that a state cannot make it a crime for the editor of a daily newspaper to write and publish an editorial on election day urging people to vote a certain way on issues submitted to them.[683]

---

678 PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 87 (1980).

679 See Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 12 (1986) (plurality opinion).

680 See Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 580 (1995).

681 Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983).

682 Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219 (1966).

683 Id. at 220. The Alabama supreme court had sustained the law on the ground that it protected the public "from confusive last-minute charges and countercharges and the distribution of propaganda in an effort to influence voters on an election day, when, as a practical matter, because of lack of time, such matters [could] not be answered or their truth determined until after the election [wa]s over." But this argument, "even if it were relevant to the constitutionality of the law, ha[d] a fatal flaw." The state statute left "people free to hurl their campaign charges up to the last minute of the day before election." The law then went on "to make it a crime to answer those 'last-minute' charges on election day, the only time they [could] be effectively answered. Because the law prevent[ed] any adequate reply to these charges, it [wa]s wholly ineffective in protecting the electorate 'from confusive last-minute charges and countercharges.'" Id. at 219–20.

[I248] However, the constitutional protection of the press, even as to previous restraint, is not absolutely unlimited. Indeed, liberty of the press is "not an absolute right, and the State may punish its abuse."[684] "[T]he press is not free to publish with impunity everything and anything it desires to publish. [For example,] [a]lthough it may deter or regulate what is said or published, the press may not circulate knowing or reckless falsehoods damaging to private reputation without subjecting itself to liability for damages, including punitive damages, or even criminal prosecution."[685]

[I249] "[G]enerally applicable laws do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news. . . . The press may not with impunity break and enter an office or dwelling to gather news. Neither does the First Amendment relieve a newspaper reporter of the obligation shared by all citizens to respond to a grand jury subpoena and answer questions relevant to a criminal investigation, even though the reporter might be required to reveal a confidential source."[686] The press, like others interested in publishing, may not publish copyrighted material without obeying the copyright laws.[687] Similarly, the media must obey the National Labor Relations Act[688] and the Fair Labor Standards Act;[689] may not restrain trade in violation of the anti-trust laws;[690] must pay non-discriminatory taxes;[691] and may be held liable for compensatory damages under a state law doctrine that, in the absence of a contract, creates obligations never explicitly assumed by the parties.[692] It is therefore beyond dispute that "[t]he publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others."[693] Accordingly, "enforcement of such general laws against the press is not subject to stricter scrutiny than would be applied to enforcement against other persons or organizations."[694]

---

[684] Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 708 (1931).

[685] Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 683 (1972).

[686] Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 669 (1991). See, in extenso, para. I282.

[687] Cf. Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broad. Co., 433 U.S. 562, 576–79 (1977).

[688] Associated Press v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 301 U.S. 103, 129–32 (1937). There, provisions of the National Labor Relations Act empowering the National Labor Relations Board, in protection of inter-state commerce, to require that employees discharged for union activities and advocacy of collective bargaining be restored to employment and their losses of pay made good were upheld, against a First Amendment challenge, as applied to an employee of the Associated Press.

[689] Oklahoma Press Publ'g Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 192–93 (1946).

[690] Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 6–7, 19–20 (1945).

[691] Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 229 (1987).

[692] Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 668–672 (1991).

[693] Associated Press v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 301 U.S. 103, 132–33 (1937).

[694] Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 670 (1991). Although the press' unique societal role may not entitle the press to greater protection under the Constitution, it does provide a compelling reason for the state to exempt media corporations from the scope of political expenditure limitations. See Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 667–68 (1990).

[I250] The First Amendment does not "mandate strict scrutiny for any speech regulation that applies to one medium (or a subset thereof) but not others. In Leathers v. Medlock, for example, [the Court] upheld against First Amendment challenge the application of a general state tax to cable television services, even though the print media were exempted from taxation. As Leathers illustrates, the fact that a law singles out a certain medium, or even the press as a whole, 'is insufficient by itself to raise First Amendment concerns.' . . . Rather, laws of this nature are 'constitutionally suspect only in certain circumstances.'"[695] The taxes invalidated in Minneapolis Star and Arkansas Writers' Project,[696] for instance, "targeted a small number of speakers, and thus threatened to 'distort the market for ideas.' . . . Although there was no evidence that an illicit governmental motive was behind either of the taxes, both were structured in a manner that raised suspicions that their objective was, in fact, the suppression of certain ideas. . . . But such heightened scrutiny is unwarranted when the differential treatment is 'justified by some special characteristic of' the particular medium being regulated."[697]

[I251] As a general matter, "state action to punish the publication of truthful information seldom can satisfy constitutional standards."[698] More specifically, Daily Mail held that "if a newspaper lawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance, then state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need . . . of the highest order."[699] "According the press the ample protection provided by that principle is supported by at least three separate considerations, in addition to, of course, the overarching 'public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth.' . . . First, because the Daily Mail formulation only protects the publication of information which a newspaper has 'lawfully obtain[ed],' the government retains ample means of safeguarding significant interests upon which publication may impinge. . . . To the extent sensitive information rests in private hands, the government may under some circumstances forbid its nonconsensual acquisition, thereby bringing outside of the Daily Mail principle the publication of any information so acquired. To the extent sensitive information is in the government's custody, it has even greater power to forestall or mitigate the injury caused by its release. The government may classify certain information, establish and enforce procedures ensuring its redacted release, and extend a damages remedy against the government or its officials where the government's mishandling of sensitive information leads to its dissemination. Where information is entrusted to the government, a less drastic means than punishing truthful publication almost always exists for guarding against the dissemination of private facts."[700] "A second consideration undergirding the Daily Mail principle is the fact that punishing the press for its dissemination of information which is already publicly available is relatively unlikely to advance the interests in the service of which the State seeks to act. It is not, of course, always the case that information lawfully acquired by the press is known, or accessible, to others. But where the government

---

695 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 660 (1994) (Turner I), quoting Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 444, 452 (1991).

696 See paras. I278, I279.

697 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 660–61 (1994), quoting Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983).

698 Smith v. Daily Mail Publ'g Co., 443 U.S. 97, 102 (1979).

699 Id. at 103.

700 Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 534 (1989).

has made certain information publicly available, it is highly anomalous to sanction persons other than the source of its release."[701] "A third and final consideration is the 'timidity and self-censorship' which may result from allowing the media to be punished for publishing . . . truthful information . . . released, without qualification, by the government. A contrary rule, depriving protection to those who rely on the government's implied representations of the lawfulness of dissemination, would force upon the media the onerous obligation of sifting through government press releases, reports, and pronouncements to prune out material arguably unlawful for publication. This situation could inhere even where the newspaper's sole object is to reproduce, with no substantial change, the government's rendition of the event in question."[702]

[I252] In this context, the Court has decided that where the punished publisher of information has obtained the information in question in a manner lawful in itself but from a source who has obtained it unlawfully, the government may not punish the ensuing publication of that information based on the defect in a chain.[703] Nevertheless, the Court has not resolved the question whether, in cases where information has been acquired unlawfully by a newspaper, the government may ever punish not only the unlawful acquisition but the ensuing publication as well.[704] The Court also has declined to "hold broadly that truthful publication may never be punished consistent with the First Amendment."[705] Relatedly, the Court has hypothesized that government might prevent "publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops."[706]

2. Newsgathering

a. In General

[I253] "There is an undoubted right to gather news 'from any source by means within the law,' . . . but that affords no basis for the claim that the First Amendment compels others—private persons or government—to supply information to the press."[707] Indeed, "the First Amendment generally does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of

---

[701] Id. at 535.

[702] Id. at 535–36.

[703] Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001). See, in extenso, para. I90.

[704] This issue was raised, but not definitively resolved, in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), and reserved in Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829, 837 (1978). See Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 535, n.8 (1989).

[705] Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 533 (1989).

[706] See Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931). In Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 670–71 (1991), the Court held, by a five-to-four vote, that the First Amendment does not prohibit a plaintiff from recovering compensatory damages, under state promissory estoppel law, for a newspaper's breach of a promise of confidentiality given to the plaintiff in exchange for information. The Court reasoned that the state doctrine of promissory estoppel—a law doctrine that, in the absence of a contract, creates obligations never explicitly assumed by the parties—was generally applicable to the daily transactions of all the citizens of the state. Moreover the majority noted, in response to arguments advanced by the dissenters, that (1) compensatory damages are not a form of punishment; (2) it was not at all clear that respondents had obtained Cohen's name "lawfully," for they had been informed of Cohen's identity only by making a promise which they did not honor.

[707] Houchins v. KQED, 438 U.S. 1, 11 (1978) (plurality opinion).

special access to information not available to the public;" for example, "[n]ewsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime [or to public records] when the general public is excluded."[708]

b. Justice and the Press[709]

i. Access to Judicial Proceedings and Records—Free Press and Fair Trial

[I254] The Court's decision in Richmond Newspapers "firmly established for the first time that the press and general public have a constitutional right of access to criminal trials. Although there was no opinion of the Court in that case, seven Justices recognized that this right of access is embodied in the First Amendment, and applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment."[710] "Underlying the First Amendment right of access to criminal trials is the common understanding that 'a major purpose of that Amendment was to protect the free discussion of governmental affairs.' . . . [Thus, the right of access to criminal trials ensures] that the constitutionally protected 'discussion of governmental affairs' is an informed one. Two features of the criminal justice system together serve to explain why a right of access to criminal trials in particular is properly afforded protection by the First Amendment. First, the criminal trial historically has been open to the press and general public. . . . Second, the right of access to criminal trials plays a particularly significant role in the functioning of the judicial process and the government as a whole. Public scrutiny of a criminal trial enhances the quality and safeguards the integrity of the fact finding process, with benefits to both the defendant and to society as a whole."[711] "The value of openness lies in the fact that people not actually attending trials can have confidence that standards of fairness are being observed; the sure knowledge that anyone is free to attend gives assurance that established procedures are being followed and that deviations will become known. Openness thus enhances both the basic fairness of the criminal trial and the appearance of fairness so essential to public confidence in the system."[712]

[I255] "Although the right of access to criminal trials is of constitutional stature, it is not absolute. . . . But the circumstances under which the press and public can be barred from a criminal trial are limited; the State's justification in denying access must be a weighty one."[713] "The presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values, [such as the defendant's right to a fair trial or the government's interest in inhibiting disclosure of sensitive information,] and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest. The inter-

---

[708] Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 684–85 (1972). See also Nixon v. Warner Communications, 435 U.S. 589, 609 (1978).

[709] See also paras. I91 et seq. (privacy interests in judicial proceedings).

[710] See Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court for Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 603 (1982), citing Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 558–81 (1980) (three-member plurality); id. at 584–98 (Brennan and Marshall, JJ., concurring in judgment); id. at 598–601 (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment); id. at 601–04 (Blackmun, J., concurring in judgment).

[711] Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court for Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 604–06 (1982).

[712] Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 464 U.S. 501, 508 (1984) (Press-Enterprise I).

[713] Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court for Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 606 (1982).

est is to be articulated along with findings specific enough that a reviewing court can determine whether the closure order was properly entered."[714]

[I256] "The need for an open proceeding may be particularly strong with respect to suppression hearings. A challenge to the seizure of evidence frequently attacks the conduct of police and prosecutor. . . . The public in general . . . has a strong interest in exposing substantial allegations of police misconduct to the salutary effects of public scrutiny."[715] However, "[p]ublicity concerning pretrial suppression hearings . . . poses special risks of unfairness. The whole purpose of such hearings is to screen out unreliable or illegally obtained evidence and insure that this evidence does not become known to the jury. . . . Publicity concerning the proceedings at a pretrial hearing . . . could influence public opinion against a defendant and inform potential jurors of inculpatory information wholly inadmissible at the actual trial."[716] "But this risk of prejudice does not automatically justify refusing public access to hearings on every motion to suppress. Through voir dire, cumbersome as it is in some circumstances, a court can identify those jurors whose prior knowledge of the case would disable them from rendering an impartial verdict."[717] Hence, "the party seeking to close the hearing must advance an overriding interest that is likely to be prejudiced, the closure must be no broader than necessary to protect that interest, the trial court must consider reasonable alternatives to closing the proceeding, and it must make findings adequate to support the closure."[718]

[I257] The guarantees of open public proceedings in criminal trials cover proceedings for the voir dire examination of potential jurors. In Press-Enterprise I, the state court had asserted two interests in support of its closure order and orders denying a transcript: the right of the defendant to a fair trial, and the right to privacy of the prospective jurors, for any whose special experiences in sensitive areas did not appear to be appropriate for public discussion. Nevertheless, the California court's conclusion that Sixth Amendment and privacy interests were sufficient to warrant prolonged closure was unsupported by findings showing that an open proceeding in fact threatened those interests. Moreover, the trial court's orders denying access to voir dire testimony had failed to consider whether alternatives were available to protect the privacy interests of the prospective jurors. Absent consideration of alternatives to closure, the trial court could not constitutionally close the voir dire.[719]

[I258] Press-Enterprise II addressed a California law that allowed magistrates to close preliminary hearings, if it was reasonably likely that the defendant's ability to obtain a fair hearing would be prejudiced. Applying the "tests of experience and logic," the Court struck down the law on the grounds that preliminary criminal hearings of the type conducted in California had traditionally been public, and because the hearings at issue were "sufficiently like a trial" that public access was "essential to the proper functioning

---

714 Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 464 U.S. 501, 510 (1984).

715 Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39, 47 (1984).

716 Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 377–378 (1979).

717 Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California 478 U.S. 1, 15 (1986) (Press-Enterprise II).

718 Waller, v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39, 48 (1984). The decision was based on the Sixth Amendment's right of the accused to insist upon a public trial. The Court noted, inter alia, that this right is no less protective of a public trial than the implicit First Amendment right of the press and public. Id. at 46.

719 Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 464 U.S. 501, 508 (1984) (Press-Enterprise I).

of the criminal justice system." Several features were cited in support of the finding that California's preliminary hearings were "sufficiently like a trial" to require public access; hearings were held before a neutral magistrate; the accused was afforded the rights to counsel, to cross-examination, to present exculpatory evidence and to suppress illegally seized evidence; the accused was bound over for trial only upon the magistrate's finding probable cause; such a finding led to a guilty plea in the majority of cases; and "[b]ecause of its extensive scope, the preliminary hearing [wa]s often the final and most important step in the criminal proceeding." In addition, "the absence of a jury, long recognized as 'an inestimable safeguard against the corrupt or overzealous prosecutor and against the compliant, biased, or eccentric judge,' . . . ma[de] the importance of public access to a preliminary hearing even more significant." Since a qualified First Amendment right of access attaches to such preliminary hearings, "the proceedings cannot be closed unless specific, on-the-record findings are made demonstrating that closure is essential to preserve higher values, and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest. . . . If the interest asserted is the right of the accused to a fair trial, the preliminary hearing shall be closed only if specific findings are made demonstrating that, first, there is a substantial probability that the defendant's right to a fair trial will be prejudiced by publicity that closure would prevent and, second, reasonable alternatives to closure cannot adequately protect the defendant's fair trial rights."[720]

[I259] By contrast, "the proper functioning of [the] grand jury system depends upon the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. [The Court has] noted several distinct interests served by safeguarding the confidentiality of grand jury proceedings. First, if preindictment proceedings were made public, many prospective witnesses would be hesitant to come forward voluntarily, knowing that those against whom they testify would be aware of that testimony. Moreover, witnesses appearing before the grand jury would be less likely to testify fully and frankly, as they would be open to retribution as well as to inducements. There also would be the risk that those about to be indicted would flee, or would try to influence individual grand jurors to vote against indictment. Finally, . . . persons who are accused but exonerated by the grand jury will not be held up to public ridicule."[721] Nevertheless, these interests do not "warrant a permanent ban on the disclosure by a witness of his own testimony once a grand jury has been discharged." Such a ban does serve a state's interest in seeing that "persons who are accused but exonerated by the grand jury will not be held up to public ridicule," although "it would have the opposite effect if applied to a witness who was himself a target of the grand jury probe and desired to publicize this testimony by way of exonerating himself. But even in those situations where the disclosure by the witness of his own testimony could have the effect of revealing the names of persons who had been targeted by the grand jury but exonerated, [the Court's] decisions establish that, absent exceptional circumstances, reputational interests alone cannot justify the proscription of truthful speech."[722]

[I260] "Where . . . the State attempts to deny the right of access in order to inhibit the disclosure of sensitive information, it must be shown that the denial is necessitated

---

[720] Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 478 U.S. 1, 10–14 (1986) (Press-Enterprise II). See also El Vocero de Puerto Rico v. Puerto Rico, 508 U.S. 147 (1993) (per curiam).

[721] Douglas Oil Co. v. Petrol Stops Nw., 441 U.S. 211, 218 (1979), cited with approval in Press-Enter. Co. v. Superior Court of California, 478 U.S. 1, 9 (1986).

[722] Butterworth v. Smith, 494 U.S. 624, 632–34 (1990).

by a compelling governmental interest, and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest."[723] Globe Newspaper involved a rule barring press and public access to criminal sex-offense trials during the testimony of minor victims. The state interests asserted to support the statutory provision were two: the protection of minor victims of sex crimes from further trauma and embarrassment; and the encouragement of such victims to come forward and testify in a truthful and credible manner. The Court recognized that the first interest was a compelling one. Nevertheless, "the circumstances of the particular case may affect the significance of [that] interest, . . . [which] could be served just as well by requiring the trial court to determine on a case-by-case basis whether the State's legitimate concern for the wellbeing of the minor victim necessitate[d] closure. Such an approach ensures that the constitutional right of the press and public to gain access to criminal trials will not be restricted except where necessary to protect the State's interest."[724] Hence, the provision at issue could not be viewed as a narrowly tailored means of accommodating the state's interest in safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of minors. Nor could the rule be justified on the basis of the state's second asserted interest. Not only was the claim "speculative in empirical terms," but it was also "open to serious question as a matter of logic and common sense." Although the statute barred the press and general public from the courtroom during the testimony of minor sex victims, the press was "not denied access to the transcript, court personnel, or any other possible source that could provide an account of the minor victim's testimony." Thus, the rule could not "prevent the press from publicizing the substance of a minor victim's testimony, as well as his or her identity." If the state's interest in encouraging minor victims to come forward depended on keeping such matters secret, the rule "hardly advance[d] that interest in an effective manner." In any event, it was "doubtful that the interest would be sufficient to overcome the constitutional attack, for that same interest could be relied on to support an array of mandatory closure rules designed to encourage victims to come forward: surely it cannot be suggested that minor victims of sex crimes are the only crime victims who, because of publicity attendant to criminal trials, are reluctant to come forward and testify. The State's argument based on this interest therefore prove[d] too much, and [ran] contrary to the very foundation of the right of access."[725]

[I261] "The First Amendment generally grants the press no right to information about a trial superior to that of the general public. 'Once beyond the confines of the courthouse, a news-gathering agency may publicize, within wide limits, what its representatives have heard and seen in the courtroom. But the line is drawn at the courthouse door, and within, a reporter's constitutional rights are no greater than those of any other member of the public.' . . . [W]hile the constitutional guarantee of a public trial, is 'a safeguard against any attempt to employ [the] courts as instruments of persecution,' . . . it confers no special benefit on the press. . . . Nor does the Sixth Amendment require that the trial—or any part of it—be broadcast live or on tape to the public. The requirement of a public trial is satisfied by the opportunity of members of the public and the press to attend the trial and to report what they have observed."[726]

---

[723] Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court for Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 606–07 (1982).

[724] Id. at 608–09.

[725] Id. at 609–10.

[726] Nixon v. Warner Communications, 435 U.S. 589, 609–10 (1978). There, the Court rejected respondents' claim that they had a First Amendment right to access to copies of White

[I262] "[T]he public has the right to be informed as to what occurs in its courts. [And] reporters of all media, including television, . . . are plainly free to report whatever occurs in open court through their respective media."[727] But "[l]egal trials are not like elections, to be won through the use of the meeting-hall, the radio, and the newspaper."[728] Freedom of discussion "must not be allowed to divert the trial from 'the very purpose of a court system . . . to adjudicate controversies, both criminal and civil, in the calmness and solemnity of the courtroom according to legal procedures.' . . . Among these 'legal procedures' is the requirement that the jury's verdict be based on evidence received in open court, not from outside sources," whether of private talk or public print.[729]

[I263] No one may be punished for a crime without "a charge fairly made and fairly tried in a public tribunal free of prejudice, passion, excitement, and tyrannical power."[730] "Due process requires that the accused receive a trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences. . . . [Hence,] [t]he presence of the press at judicial proceedings must be limited when it is apparent that, [under the 'totality of circumstances,'] the accused might otherwise be prejudiced or disadvantaged."[731] Sheppard focused sharply on the impact of extensive pre-trial publicity and a trial court's duty to protect the defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial. As the Court emphasized, "given the pervasiveness of modern communications and the difficulty of effacing prejudicial publicity from the minds of the jurors, the trial courts must take strong measures to ensure that the balance is never weighed against the accused. Of course, there is nothing that proscribes the press from reporting events that transpire in the courtroom. But where there is a reasonable likelihood that prejudicial news prior to trial will prevent a fair trial, the judge should continue the case until the threat abates, or transfer it to another county not so permeated with publicity. In addition, sequestration of the jury is something the judge may raise sua sponte with counsel. If publicity during the proceedings threatens the fairness of the trial, a new trial should be ordered. But reversals are but palliatives; the cure lies in those remedial measures that will prevent the prejudice at its inception. The courts must take such steps by rule and regulation that will protect their processes from prejudicial outside interferences. Neither prosecutors, counsel for defense, the accused, witnesses, court staff nor enforcement officers coming under the jurisdiction of the court should be permitted to frustrate its function. Collaboration between counsel and the press as to information affecting the fairness of a criminal trial is not only subject to regulation, but is highly censurable and worthy of disciplinary measures."[732]

House tapes—to which the public had never had physical access—admitted into evidence at the trial of Nixon's former advisers. In doing so, the Court noted that the case presented no question of a truncated flow of information to the public, since the media had been furnished transcripts of the tapes.

727 Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 541–42 (1965).

728 Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 271 (1941).

729 Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 350–51 (1966).

730 Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 236–37 (1940).

731 Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 362, 358 (1966).

732 Id. 362–63 (emphasis added). The community from which the jury was drawn in that case had been inundated by publicity hostile to the defendant. The trial could only be described as a circus, with the courtroom taken over by the press and jurors turned into media stars. Since the trial judge had not fulfilled his duty to protect the defendant from the inherently prejudicial publicity that had saturated the community and to control disruptive influences in the court-

[I264] Nebraska Press struck down a direct prior restraint imposed by a trial judge on the members of the press, prohibiting them from publishing or broadcasting accounts of confessions or admissions made by the accused or facts "strongly implicative" of the accused in a widely reported murder of six persons. Although the trial judge had rea-room, the Court vacated the judgment of conviction and a new trial followed, in which the accused was acquitted.

---

KPNX Broadcasting Co. v. Arizona Superior Court, 459 U.S. 1302 (1982), involved an application of a broadcasting company and several reporters and courtroom sketch artists to stay orders of a state trial court that (1) prohibited court personnel, counsel, witnesses, and jurors in a murder case from speaking directly with the press, and (2) directed that all sketches of jurors be reviewed by the court before being broadcast on television. Relying in part on Sheppard, Justice Rehnquist denied the application.

"[A]dverse pretrial publicity may create such a presumption of prejudice in a community that the jurors' claims that they can be impartial should not be believed." See Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1031 (1984) (emphasis added).

In Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 (1961), the Court held that pre-trial publicity in connection with a capital trial had so tainted the jury pool in Gibson County, Indiana, that the defendant was entitled, as a matter of federal constitutional law, to a change of venue to another county. The defendant there was convicted of murder following intensive and hostile news coverage. The trial judge had granted a defense motion for a change of venue, but only to an adjacent county, which had been exposed to essentially the same news coverage: "[A] barrage of newspaper headlines, articles, cartoons and pictures was unleashed against [the defendant] during the six or seven months preceding his trial. . . . [T]he newspapers in which the stories appeared were delivered regularly to approximately 95 percent of the dwellings in Gibson County, and . . . the Evansville radio and TV stations, which likewise blanketed that county, also carried extensive newscasts covering the same incidents." At trial, 430 persons were called for jury service; 268 were excused because they had fixed opinions as to guilt. Two-thirds of the jurors actually seated had formed an opinion that the defendant was guilty, and acknowledged familiarity with material facts and circumstances of the case. Although each of these jurors said that he could be impartial, the Court concluded: "With his life at stake, it is not requiring too much that petitioner be tried in an atmosphere undisturbed by so huge a wave of public passion and by a jury other than one in which two-thirds of the members admit, before hearing any testimony, to possessing a belief in his guilt." Id. at 725–28.

Similarly, in Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, 724–27 (1963), the Court presumed community prejudice mandating a change in venue when petitioner's filmed confession obtained during a police interrogation was broadcast on local television (in a community of 150,000) over three consecutive days.

Nevertheless, "juror exposure to information about a . . . defendant's prior convictions or to news accounts of the crime with which he is charged [do not] alone presumptively deprive[e] the defendant of due process." See Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 799 (1975) (emphasis added). There, the Court reviewed a trial in which many jurors had heard of the defendant through extensive news coverage. Characterizing Irvin, Rideau and Sheppard as cases involving "a trial atmosphere that had been utterly corrupted by press coverage," the Court recognized: "Qualified jurors need not, however, be totally ignorant of the facts and issues involved. 'To hold that the mere existence of any preconceived notion as to the guilt or innocence of an accused, without more, is sufficient to rebut the presumption of a prospective juror's impartiality would be to establish an impossible standard. It is sufficient if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court.'" Id. at 799–800, quoting Irvin, supra, at 723. The Court concluded that the petitioner in Murphy had failed to show that the trial setting was inherently prejudicial, or that the jury selection process permitted an inference of actual prejudice, noting, inter alia, that the extensive publication of news articles about Murphy largely had ceased some seven months before the jury was selected. Id. at 802.

sonably concluded there would be intense and pervasive pre-trial publicity concerning this case, and that publicity might impair the defendant's right to a fair trial, there was no finding—and no evidence to support the conclusion—that alternative measures, such as change of trial venue, or postponement of the trial to allow public attention to subside, would not have protected the defendant's rights. Moreover, it was far from clear that prior restraint on publication would have effectively protected the accused's rights, in view of such practical problems as the limited territorial jurisdiction of the trial court issuing the restraining order, the difficulties inherent in predicting what information would in fact undermine the jurors' impartiality, and the fact that in that case, the events had taken place in a small community where rumors would have traveled swiftly by word of mouth. In addition, to the extent that the order prohibited the reporting of evidence adduced at the open preliminary hearing held to determine whether the accused should

---

Likewise, in Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025 (1984), the record showed that prejudicial publicity was greatly diminished and community sentiment had softened when the jury for the second trial was selected four years later. The passage of time between the first and second trials clearly rebutted any presumption of partiality or prejudice that existed at the time of the initial trial. Potential jurors who had retained fixed opinions as to respondent's guilt were disqualified, and the fact that the great majority of veniremen "remembered the case," without more, was essentially irrelevant; the relevant question was whether the jurors at respondent's second trial had such fixed opinions that they could not judge impartially respondent's guilt. The Court thus concluded that the trial court had not committed manifest error in finding that the jury as a whole was impartial.

In Mu'Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415 (1991), the community had been subjected to a barrage of publicity prior to Mu'Min's trial for capital murder. News stories appeared over a course of several months and included, in addition to details of the crime itself, numerous items of prejudicial information inadmissible at trial. In distinguishing Irvin, the Court stated: "[T]he cases differ both in the kind of community in which the coverage took place and in extent of media coverage. Unlike the community involved in Irvin, the county in which petitioner was tried, Prince William, had a population in 1988 of 182,537, and this was one of nine murders committed in the county that year. It is a part of the metropolitan Washington statistical area, which has a population of over 3 million, and in which, unfortunately, hundreds of murders are committed each year. In Irvin, news accounts included details of the defendant's confessions to 24 burglaries and six murders, including the one for which he was tried, as well as his unaccepted offer to plead guilty in order to avoid the death sentence. They contained numerous opinions as to his guilt, as well as opinions about the appropriate punishment. While news reports about Mu'Min were not favorable, they did not contain the same sort of damaging information. Much of the pretrial publicity was aimed at the Department of Corrections and the criminal justice system in general, criticizing the furlough and work release programs that made this and other crimes possible. Any killing that ultimately results in a charge of capital murder will engender considerable media coverage, and this one may have engendered more than most because of its occurrence during the 1988 Presidential campaign, when a similar crime committed by a Massachusetts inmate became a subject of national debate. But while the pretrial publicity in this case appears to have been substantial, it was not of the same kind or extent as that found to exist in Irvin." Id. at 429–30. Eight of the 12 individuals seated on Mu'Min's jury admitted some exposure to pre-trial publicity. None of those who had read or heard something indicated that they had formed an opinion based on the outside information, or that it would affect their ability to determine petitioner's guilt or innocence based solely on the evidence presented at trial. Petitioner contended, however, that his Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury and his right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment were violated because the trial judge refused to question further prospective jurors about the specific contents of the news reports to which they had been exposed. The Court rejected petitioner's submission. Id. at 417.

be bound over for trial, it violated the settled principle that "there is nothing that proscribes the press from reporting events that transpire in the courtroom." And finally, the prohibition regarding "implicative" information was too vague and too broad to survive the scrutiny given to restraints on First Amendment rights.[733]

[I265] The Court has rejected the proposition that all photographic or broadcast coverage of criminal trials is inherently a denial of due process. "An absolute constitutional ban on broadcast coverage of trials cannot be justified simply because there is a danger that, in some cases, prejudicial broadcast accounts of pretrial and trial events may impair the ability of jurors to decide the issue of guilt or innocence uninfluenced by extraneous matter. The risk of juror prejudice in some cases does not justify an absolute ban on news coverage of trials by the printed media; so also the risk of such prejudice does not warrant an absolute constitutional ban on all broadcast coverage. A case attracts a high level of public attention because of its intrinsic interest to the public and the manner of reporting the event. The risk of juror prejudice is present in any publication of a trial, but the appropriate safeguard against such prejudice is the defendant's right to demonstrate that the media's coverage of his case—be it printed or broadcast—compromised the ability of the particular jury that heard the case to adjudicate fairly. . . . Alternatively, a defendant might show that broadcast coverage of his particular case had an adverse impact on the trial participants sufficient to constitute a denial of due process."[734]

ii. Sanctions for Out-of-Court Publications that Comment upon a Pending Case

[I266] "The operations of the courts and the judicial conduct of judges are matters of utmost public concern. 'A responsible press has always been regarded as the handmaiden of effective judicial administration. . . . The press does not simply publish information about trials, but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism.' . . . Although it is assumed that judges will ignore the public clamor or media reports and editorials in reaching their decisions, and, by tradition, will not respond to public commentary, the law gives judges as persons, or courts as institutions no greater immunity from criticism than other persons or institutions."[735]

---

[733] Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 562–68 (1976).

[734] Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560, 574–75, 581 (1981). Appellants in that case were convicted of various theft crimes at a jury trial that was partially televised under a new Canon of Judicial Ethics promulgated by the Florida Supreme Court. They claimed that the unusual publicity and sensational courtroom atmosphere created by televising the proceedings had influenced the jurors and had precluded a fair trial. However, they failed to show with any specificity that the presence of cameras had impaired the ability of the jurors to decide the case on only the evidence before them, or that their trial had been affected adversely by the impact on any of the participants of the presence of cameras and the prospect of broadcast. For that reason, the Court refused to set aside their conviction.

In Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965), the Court held that the defendant had not been afforded due process where the volume of trial publicity, the judge's failure to control the proceedings, and the telecast of a hearing and of the trial itself inherently prevented a sober search for the truth. "The trial in Estes had been conducted in a circus atmosphere, due in large part to the intrusions of the press, which was allowed to sit within the bar of the court and to overrun it with television equipment." See Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 799 (1975).

[735] Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829, 838–39 (1978), quoting Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 350 (1966).

[I267] The "inherent tendency" or "reasonable tendency" of an out-of-court publication to cause disrespect for the judiciary or interfere with the orderly administration of justice in a pending case is not sufficient to establish punishable contempt.[736] Bridges "fixed reasonably well marked limits around the power of courts to punish newspapers and others for comments upon or criticism of pending litigation. The case placed orderly operation of courts as the primary and dominant requirement in the administration of justice. . . . This essential right of the courts to be free of intimidation and coercion was held to be consonant with a recognition that freedom of the press must be allowed in the broadest scope compatible with the supremacy of order. A theoretical determinant of the limit for open discussion was adopted from experience with other adjustments of the conflict between freedom of expression and maintenance of order. This was the clear and present danger rule. . . . The evil consequence of comment must be 'extremely serious, and the degree of imminence extremely high, before utterances can be punished.'"[737] The Court thus held that the compulsion of the First Amendment forbade the punishment by contempt for comment on pending cases in the absence of a showing that the utterances created a clear and present danger to the orderly and fair administration of justice. Consequently, it reversed two convictions for contempt of court. The first one concerned an editorial comment of a powerful newspaper that failure of an elected judge to impose a severe sentence would be a "serious mistake." The second one involved the publication of a telegram from the president of an important union who threatened a damaging strike in the event of an adverse decision.[738]

[I268] "Freedom of discussion should be given the widest range compatible with the essential requirement of the fair and orderly administration of justice. . . . In the borderline instances where it is difficult to say upon which side the alleged offense falls, . . . the . . . freedom of public comment should weigh heavily against a possible tendency to influence pending cases."[739] Pennekamp involved two newspaper editorials and a cartoon criticizing certain actions taken by a state trial court of general jurisdiction in pending non-jury proceedings as being too favorable to defendants. The Court concluded that, on the record of the case, the danger to fair judicial administration had not the clearness and immediacy necessary to close the door of permissible public comment. Since the publications concerned the attitude of the judges toward those charged with crime, not comments on evidence or rulings during a jury trial, their effect on juries that might eventually try the alleged offenders was too remote to be considered a clear and present danger to justice. And this criticism of the judges' inclinations or actions in pending non-jury proceedings could not directly affect the fair administration of justice. Furthermore, the Court rejected the contention that a judge might "be influenced by a desire to placate the accusing newspaper to retain public esteem and secure reelection at the cost of unfair rulings against an accused," noting that "too many fine-drawn assumptions against the independence of judicial action should be made to call such a possibility a clear and present danger to justice."[740]

---

[736] See Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 272 (1941).

[737] Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 334 (1946), discussing and quoting Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263 (1941).

[738] Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263–78 (1941).

[739] Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 347 (1946).

[740] Id. at 347–50. The Court also noted that when the newspaper statements amount to defamation, a judge has such remedy in damages for libel as do other public servants. Id. at 348–49.

[I269] "[T]he law of contempt is not made for the protection of judges who may be sensitive to the winds of public opinion. Judges are supposed to be men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate. . . . [In addition,] [t]he vehemence of the language used or inaccuracies in reporting are not alone the measure of the power to punish for contempt. The fires which an article kindles must constitute an imminent, not merely a likely, threat to the administration of justice. The danger must not be remote or even probable; it must immediately imperil."[741] Under these considerations, the Court decided, in Craig v. Harney, that the publication of news articles unfairly reporting events in a case pending in a state court, and an editorial strongly attacking the trial judge (a layman elected for a short term) while a motion for a new trial was pending, did not, in the circumstances of this case, constitute a clear and present danger to the administration of justice.

[I270] "[T]he limitations on free speech assume a different proportion when expression is directed toward a trial, as compared to a grand jury investigation. . . . Particularly in matters of local political corruption and investigations is it important that freedom of communication be kept open, and that the real issues not become obscured to the grand jury. . . . When the grand jury is performing its investigatory function into a general problem area, without specific regard to indicating a particular individual, society's interest is best served by a thorough and extensive investigation, and a greater degree of disinterestedness and impartiality is assured by allowing free expression of contrary opinion."[742] In light of these considerations, and in the absence of any showing of an actual interference with the undertakings of the grand jury, Wood held a court might not punish a sheriff for publicly criticizing a judge's charges to a grand jury, regarding black voting practices.[743]

[I271] "[L]awyers in pending cases [may be] subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be."[744] In Sawyer, the Court had before it an order affirming the suspension of an attorney from practice because of her attack on the fairness and impartiality of a judge. The plurality opinion, which found the discipline improper, concluded that the comments had not, in fact, impugned the judge's integrity. Justice Stewart, who provided the fifth vote for reversal of the sanction, said that "[o]bedience to ethical precepts may require abstention from what in other circumstances might be constitutionally protected speech."[745] The four dissenting Justices, who would have sustained the discipline, pointed out that "[a] lawyer actively participating in a trial, particularly an emotionally charged criminal prosecution, is not merely a person, and not even merely a lawyer. . . . He is an intimate and trusted and essential part of the machinery of justice, an 'officer of the court' in the most compelling sense."[746]

---

741 Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 376 (1947).

742 Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390, 392 (1962).

743 Id. at 390–94. Although the sheriff was technically an "officer of the court" by virtue of his position, the Court determined that his statements were made in his capacity as a private citizen. And, in any event, there was no evidence that the publications interfered with the performance of his duties as sheriff or with his duties, if any he had, in connection with the grand jury's investigation. Id. at 393.

744 See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071 (1991), discussing In re Sawyer, 360 U.S. 622 (1959).

745 In re Sawyer, 360 U.S. 622, 646–47 (1959).

746 Id. at 666, 668 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting, joined by Clark, Harlan, and Whittaker, JJ.).

[I272] Under Gentile, the speech of lawyers representing clients in pending cases may be regulated under a less demanding standard than the "clear and present danger" of actual prejudice or imminent threat standard established for regulation of the press during pending proceedings. "Lawyers representing clients in pending cases are key participants in the criminal justice system, and the State may demand some adherence to the precepts of that system in regulating their speech, as well as their conduct. . . . '[A]s officers of the court, court personnel and attorneys have a fiduciary responsibility not to engage in public debate that will redound to the detriment of the accused or that will obstruct the fair administration of justice. . . . Because lawyers have special access to information through discovery and client communications, their extrajudicial statements pose a threat to the fairness of a pending proceeding since lawyers' statements are likely to be received as especially authoritative."[747] Subsequently, the Court held that a state may prohibit a lawyer from making extra-judicial statements to the press that he knows or reasonably should know will have a "substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" an adjudicative proceeding. Such a prohibition, which is aimed at comments that are likely to influence a trial's outcome or prejudice the jury venire, even if an untainted panel is ultimately found, is constitutional, for it is designed to protect the integrity and fairness of a state's judicial system, and it imposes only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech.[748]

iii. Judicial Disciplinary Proceedings

[I273] The operation of the judicial system itself is a matter of public interest. And reporting judicial disciplinary proceedings "lies near the core of the First Amendment."[749] In Landmark Communications, a Virginia statute made it a crime to divulge information regarding proceedings before the state judicial review commission. A newspaper publisher was convicted of violating the statute after publishing an article accurately reporting on a pending inquiry by the commission and identifying the state judge under investigation. The Court held that the conviction violated the First Amendment. While assuming that the confidentiality of the judicial review proceedings served legitimate state interests, the Court observed that the state had "offered little more than assertion and conjecture to support its claim that without criminal sanctions the objectives of the statutory scheme would be seriously undermined." Relatedly, the Court noted that over 40 states with similar judicial review procedures had found it unnecessary to criminalize the type of conduct at issue in order to preserve the integrity of their proceedings. Moreover, injury to the reputation of judges or the institutional reputation of courts was an insufficient reason for repressing speech that would otherwise be free; "speech cannot be punished when the purpose is simply 'to protect the court as a mystical entity or the judges as individuals or as anointed priests set apart from the community and spared the criticism to which, in a democracy, other public servants are exposed.'" Although some risk of injury to the judge under inquiry, to the system of justice, or to the operation of the Judicial Inquiry and Review Commission might be posed by premature disclosure, the danger should be "clear and present," and, in the Court's view, the risk in that case fell far short of that requirement. Moreover, "much of the risk could be eliminated through careful internal procedures to protect the confidentiality of Commission proceedings."[750]

---

747 Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1074 (1991).

748 Id. at 1074–76.

749 Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829, 838 (1978).

750 Id. at 841–45.

c. Access to Prisons

[I274] The conditions in American prisons are a matter that is both newsworthy and of great public importance. Pell and Saxbe sustained prison regulations prohibiting face-to-face media interviews with specific prisoners. Inmates' families, their attorneys, and religious counsel were accorded liberal visitation privileges. Even friends of inmates were allowed to visit, although their privileges appeared to be somewhat more limited. Other than members of these limited groups with personal and professional ties to the inmates, members of the general public were not permitted to enter the prisons and interview consenting inmates. This policy was applied with an even hand to all prospective visitors, including newsmen, who, like other members of the public, might enter the prisons to visit friends or family members. But, again like members of the general public, they might not enter the prison and insist on visiting an inmate with whom they had no such relationship. There was no indication on the record of the case that the policy was applied to prohibit a person, who was otherwise eligible to visit and interview an inmate, from doing so merely because he was a member of the press. Furthermore, the regulation of pre-arranged inmate press interviews was imposed only after experience revealed that such interviews posed disciplinary problems and was not part of an attempt by the State to conceal the conditions in its prisons or to frustrate the press' investigation and reporting of those conditions. Indeed, press representatives were permitted to tour the prisons and to conduct brief interviews with any inmates they might encounter during such tours. In addition, newsmen and inmates were permitted written correspondence with each other. In light of the foregoing considerations, and relying on the premise that "newsmen have no constitutional right of access to prisons or their inmates beyond that afforded the general public," the Court rejected the contention that the challenged regulations amounted to unconstitutional state interference with a free press.[751]

[I275] In Houchins v. KQED, supervised tours of prison facilities were permitted, but the tours would not allow any use of cameras or communication with inmates and would not include the cell portions of the jail where a prisoner's suicide reportedly had occurred and where conditions were assertedly responsible for prisoners' problems (Little Greystone). The district court preliminarily enjoined the supervisor of the jail from denying KQED news personnel and responsible news media representatives reasonable access to the jail, including Little Greystone, and from preventing their using photographic or sound equipment or from conducting inmate interviews. The court of appeals affirmed. A four-Justice majority of the Court, relying on the "no greater access" doctrine of Pell and Saxbe, reversed this judgment and remanded the case. In doing so, a three-member plurality emphasized that the prison officials could not "prevent respondents from learning about jail conditions in a variety of ways, albeit not as conveniently as they might prefer. Respondents ha[d] a First Amendment right to receive letters from inmates criticizing jail officials and reporting on conditions. . . . [They we]re free to interview those who rendered the legal assistance to which inmates [we]re entitled. . . . They [we]re also free to seek out former inmates, visitors to the prison, public officials, and institutional personnel. . . . Moreover, [state] statutes provided for a prison Board of Corrections that had the authority to inspect jails and prisons and [should] provide a public report at regular intervals. . . . Health inspectors [we]re required to inspect prisons and provide reports to a number of officials, including the State Attorney General and the Board of Corrections. . . . Grand juries, with the potent subpoena power—not available to the media—traditionally concern themselves with conditions in public institutions. [And] a prosecutor or judge could initiate similar inquiries. . . . [Hence, a] number of alternatives [we]re available to prevent problems in penal facilities from escaping public attention."[752] Justice Stewart agreed that "[t]he Constitution does no more than assure the public and the press equal access once government has opened its doors," but he believed that "the concept of equal access must be accorded more flexibility in order to accommodate the practical distinctions between the press and the general public," and that "terms of access that are reasonably imposed on individual members of the public may, if they impede effective reporting without sufficient justification, be unreasonable as applied to journalists who convey to the general public what the visitors see." Under these principles, KQED was clearly entitled to some form of preliminary injunctive relief. In his view, although the district court's preliminary injunction was overbroad, insofar as it ordered the Sheriff to permit reporters into the Little Greystone facility, and it required him to let them interview randomly encountered inmates, the elements of the court's order that allowed press access to the jail "at reasonable times and hours," without causing undue disruption, and permitted the press to use cameras and recording equipment for effective presentation to the viewing public of the conditions at the jail seen by individual visitors, were both sanctioned by the Constitution and amply supported by the record.[753] The three dissenters stressed that "[a]n official prison policy of concealing knowledge from the public by arbitrarily cutting off the flow of information at its source abridges the freedom of the press," and they found that the record demonstrated that both the public and the press had been consistently denied any access to the inner portions of the jail, that there had been excessive censorship of inmate correspondence, and that there was no valid justification for these broad restraints on the flow of information.[754]

---

[751] Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 834–35 (1974); Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843, 846–50 (1974).

3. Taxation of the Press

[I276] "[A] genuinely nondiscriminatory tax on the receipts or income of newspapers is constitutionally permissible."[755] But discriminatory taxation of the press burdens rights protected by the First Amendment and poses a particular danger of abuse by the state. "A power to tax differentially, as opposed to a power to tax generally, gives a government a powerful weapon against the taxpayer selected. . . . When the State singles out the press, the political constraints that prevent a legislature from passing crippling taxes of general applicability are weakened, and the threat of burdensome taxes becomes acute."[756] "The press plays a unique role as a check on government abuse, and a tax limited to the press raises concerns about censorship of critical information and opinion."[757] Selective taxation of the press—either singling out the press as a whole or targeting indi-

---

752 Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1, 12–16 (1978) (opinion of Burger, C.J., joined by White and Rehnquist, JJ.).

753 Id. at 16–18.

754 Id. at 38 (opinion of Stevens, J., joined by Brennan and Powell, JJ.).

755 Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 229 (1987).

756 Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983).

757 Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 447 (1991).

vidual members of the press—"unless justified by some special characteristic of the press, suggests that the goal of the regulation is not unrelated to suppression of expression, and such a goal is presumptively unconstitutional."[758] Hence, "a tax that singles out the press, or that targets individual publications within the press, places a heavy burden on the State to justify its action:"[759] "the State must show that its regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest, and is narrowly drawn to achieve that end."[760]

[I277] In Grosjean, the state of Louisiana imposed a license tax of 2 percent of the gross receipts from the sale of advertising on all newspapers with a weekly circulation above 20,000. Out of at least 124 publishers in the state, only 13 were subject to the tax. After noting that the tax was "single in kind," and that keying the tax to circulation curtailed the flow of information, the Court held the tax invalid as an abridgment of the freedom of the press. Both the brief and the argument of the publishers in the Court emphasized the events leading up to the tax and the contemporary political climate in Louisiana. All but one of the large papers subject to the tax had "ganged up" on Senator Huey Long, and a circular distributed by Long and the governor to each member of the state legislature described "lying newspapers" as conducting "a vicious campaign" and the tax as "a tax on lying, 2 cent a lie." Although the Court's opinion did not describe this history,[761] it invalidated the tax, "because, in the light of its history and of its setting, it [wa]s seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information,"[762] "an explanation that suggests that the motivation of the legislature [might] have been significant."[763]

[I278] Minneapolis Star resolved any doubts about whether direct evidence of improper censorial motive is required in order to invalidate a differential tax on First Amendment grounds. As the Court emphasized, "[i]llicit legislative intent is not the sine qua non of a violation of the First Amendment."[764] At issue in that case, was a Minnesota special use tax on the cost of paper and ink consumed in the production of publications. The tax exempted the first $100,000 worth of paper and ink consumed annually. Eleven publishers, producing only 14 of the state's 388 paid circulation newspapers, incurred liability under the tax in its first year of operation. The Minneapolis Star was responsible for roughly two-thirds of the total revenue raised by the tax. The following year, 13 publishers, producing only 16 of the state's 374 paid circulation papers, paid the tax. Again, the Star bore roughly two-thirds of the tax's burden. The Court found no evidence of impermissible legislative motive in the case apart from the structure of the tax itself. It nevertheless held the Minnesota tax unconstitutional for two reasons. First, the tax sin-

---

[758] Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585 (1983).

[759] Id. at 592–93.

[760] Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 231 (1987). Since such tax systems directly implicate freedom of the press, the Court analyzes the problem primarily in First Amendment terms, although it is obviously intertwined with interests arising under the Equal Protection Clause. See Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585, n.7 (1983); Arkansas Writers' Project, supra, at 227, n.3.

[761] See Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 579–80 (1983).

[762] Grosjean v. Am. Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936).

[763] Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 580 (1983).

[764] Id. at 592.

gled out the press for special treatment, and Minnesota offered no adequate justification for the special treatment of newspapers. Its interest in raising revenue, standing alone, could not justify such treatment, for the alternative means of taxing businesses generally was clearly available. Further, the Court was "hesitant to fashion a rule that automatically allowed the State to single out the press for a different method of taxation as long as the effective burden was no different from that on other taxpayers or the burden on the press was lighter than that on other businesses. One reason for this reluctance [wa]s that the very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. Thus, even without actually imposing an extra burden on the press, the government might be able to achieve censorial effects, for the threat of sanctions may deter the exercise of First Amendment rights almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions."[765] Second, the Minnesota tax targeted a small group of newspapers—those so large that they remained subject to the tax despite its exemption for the first $100,000 of ink and paper consumed annually. The state explained this exemption as part of a policy favoring an "equitable" tax system. Nevertheless, even if large businesses were more profitable, and therefore better able to bear the burden of the tax, the state's commitment to this "equity" was "questionable, for the concern ha[d] not led the State to grant benefits to small businesses in general. And when the exemption selects such a narrowly defined group to bear the full burden of the tax, the tax begins to resemble more a penalty for a few of the largest newspapers than an attempt to favor struggling smaller enterprises."[766]

[I279] Arkansas Writers' Project reaffirmed the rule that selective taxation of the press through the narrow targeting of individual members offends the First Amendment. In that case, Arkansas Writers' Project sought a refund of state taxes it had paid on sales of the Arkansas Times, a general interest magazine, under Arkansas' Gross Receipts Act of 1941. Exempt from the sales tax were receipts from sales of religious, professional, trade and sports magazines. The Court held that Arkansas' magazine exemption, which meant that only a few Arkansas magazines paid any sales tax, operated in much the same way as did the $100,000 exemption in Minneapolis Star, and therefore suffered from the same type of discrimination identified in that case. Moreover, the basis on which the tax differentiated among magazines depended entirely on their subject matter. In order to determine whether a magazine was subject to sales tax, Arkansas' enforcement authorities should necessarily examine the content of the message that was conveyed. "Such official scrutiny of the content of publications as the basis for imposing a tax is entirely incompatible with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press."[767]

[I280] The foregoing cases "demonstrate that differential taxation of [members of the press] is constitutionally suspect when it threatens to suppress the expression of particular ideas or viewpoints."[768] In Leathers, the Court upheld the application of a general state tax—tax on receipts from the sale of all tangible personal property and a broad range of specified services—to cable television services, even though the print media were exempted from taxation. The tax did "not single out the press, and [thereby] threaten to hinder it as a watchdog of government activity." Arkansas had "not selected

---

765 Id. at 588.

766 Id. at 592.

767 Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 229–30 (1987).

768 Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 447 (1991).

a narrow group to bear fully the burden of the tax," since the challenged law extended the tax uniformly to the approximately 100 cable systems operating in the state. In addition, the tax was not content-based, since there was nothing in the statute's language that referred to the content of mass media communications, and since the record contained no evidence that the variety of programming cable television offered subscribers differed systematically in its message from that communicated by newspapers or magazines. Nothing about the state's choice had ever suggested an interest in censoring the expressive activities of cable television; and the tax was not structured so as to raise suspicion that it was intended to do so. Nor did anything in the record indicate that Arkansas' broad-based, content-neutral sales tax was likely to stifle the free exchange of ideas. Consequently, the Court concluded that the provision at issue did not violate the First Amendment.[769]

4. Government-Enforced Access to the Press[770]

[I281] "Tornillo affirmed an essential proposition: the First Amendment protects the editorial independence of the press."[771] That case involved a challenge to Florida's right-of-reply statute. The Florida law provided that, if a newspaper assailed a political candidate's character or record, the candidate could demand that the newspaper print a reply of equal prominence and space. The Court "found that the statute directly interfered with the newspaper's right to speak in two ways. . . . First, the newspaper's expression of a particular viewpoint triggered an obligation to permit other speakers, with whom the newspaper disagreed, to use the newspaper's facilities to spread their own message. The statute purported to advance free discussion, but its effect was to deter newspapers from speaking out in the first instance: by forcing the newspaper to disseminate opponents' views, the statute penalized the newspaper's own expression"[772] on the basis of its content, by imposing additional printing, composing, and materials costs and by taking up space that could be devoted to other material the newspaper might have preferred to print.[773] The Court, therefore, concluded that a "[g]overnment-enforced right of access inescapably 'dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate.'"[774] Second, the Court emphasized that "[t]he choice of material to go into a new paper, and the decisions made as to limitations on the size and content of the paper, and treatment of public issues and public official—whether fair or unfair—constitute the exercise of editorial control and judgment. . . . Even if a newspaper would face no additional costs to comply with a compulsory access law and would not be forced to forgo publication of news or opinion by the inclusion of a reply, the Florida statute fail[ed] to clear the barriers of the First Amendment because of its intrusion into the function of editors."[775]

---

769 Id. at 447–53.

770 See also paras. I288–I291, I 296, I297 (mandatory access to the electronic media).

771 See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 653 (1994).

772 See Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n of California, 475 U.S. 1, 10 (1986), discussing Miami Herald Publ'g Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974).

773 Miami Herald Publ'g Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241, 256 (1974).

774 Id. at 257, quoting New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279 (1963).

775 Miami Herald Publ'g Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241, 258 (1974). The Court rejected the claim that the newspaper could permissibly be made to serve as a public forum. It also flatly rejected the argument that the newspaper's alleged media monopoly could justify forcing the paper to speak in contravention of its own editorial discretion.

5. Governmental Demand of Information from the Press[776]

[I282] Branzburg held that the First Amendment does not relieve a newspaper reporter of the obligation shared by all citizens to respond to a grand jury subpoena and answer questions relevant to a good faith criminal investigation, even though the reporter might be required to reveal a confidential source. The Court there could "perceive no basis for holding that the public interest in law enforcement and in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings is insufficient to override the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering that is said to result from insisting that reporters, like other citizens, respond to relevant questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial."[777] Nevertheless, four dissenting Justices in Branzburg discerned at least some protection in the First Amendment for confidences garnered during the course of news-gathering.[778] And Justice Powell, who joined the Court in Branzburg, wrote separately to emphasize that requests for reporter's documents should be carefully weighed with due deference to the vital constitutional and societal interests at stake.[779] Consequently, the Court seems not to have foreclosed news reporters from resisting a subpoena on First Amendment grounds.[780]

6. The Electronic Media

a. Radio—Television[781]

[I283] Radio and television are engaged in "speech" under the First Amendment, and are part of the "press."[782] "When a public broadcaster exercises editorial discretion in the selection and presentation of its programming, it engages in speech activity. . . . Although programming decisions often involve the compilation of the speech of third parties, the decisions nonetheless constitute communicative acts."[783] However, there is no "unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish."[784] "The fundamental distinguishing characteristic" of radio and television broadcasting that requires some adjustment in First Amendment analysis is "that broadcast frequencies are a scarce and valuable resource that must be portioned out among applicants."[785] "Congress unquestionably has the [776] See also para. G132 (search of newspaper offices for evidence of crime reasonably believed to be on the premises).

---

[777] Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 690–91 (1972).

[778] Id. at 721 (Douglas, J., dissenting); id. at 744–47 (dissenting opinion of Stewart, J., joined by Brennan and Marshall, JJ., who held that the government must be required to show probable cause that the newsman has information that is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of criminal law).

[779] Id. at 710.

[780] See In re Roche, 448 U.S. 1312, 1315 (1980) (Brennan, J., in chambers) (application for stay).

[781] See also para. I150 (sexually explicit speech); paras. I261, I165 (broadcast coverage of trials); para. I232 (conditional federal grants).

[782] See United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948); Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 444 (1991).

[783] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 674 (1998).

[784] Red Lion Broad. Co. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 395 U.S. 367, 388 (1969).

[785] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 377 (1984).

power to grant and deny licenses and to eliminate existing stations. . . . No one has a First Amendment right to a license or to monopolize a radio frequency; to deny a station license because 'the public interest' requires it 'is not a denial of free speech.' . . . By the same token, as far as the First Amendment is concerned, those who are licensed stand no better than those to whom licenses are refused. A license permits broadcasting, but the licensee has no constitutional right to be the one who holds the license or to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves."[786] "Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the Government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio [and television] and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. . . . It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by the Government itself or a private licensee. . . . It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial [in this context.] . . . That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the [Federal Communications Commission.]"[787] And if this interest is to be fully served, broadcasters must be "entitled, under the First Amendment, to exercise the widest journalistic freedom consistent with their public duties."[788] "As a general rule, the nature of editorial discretion counsels against subjecting broadcasters to claims of viewpoint discrimination. . . . To comply with their obligation to air programming that serves the public interest, broadcasters must often choose among speakers expressing different viewpoints. 'That [broadcast] editors . . . can and do abuse this power is beyond doubt,' . . . but '[c]alculated risks of abuse are taken in order to preserve higher values.'"[789]

[I284] Hence, "the broadcasting industry plainly operates under restraints not imposed upon other media. . . . But . . . these restrictions are upheld only when they are narrowly tailored to further a substantial governmental interest, such as ensuring adequate and balanced coverage of public issues. . . . Making that judgment requires a critical examination of the interests of the public and broadcasters in light of the particular circumstances of each case."[790]

[I285] In NBC, the Court upheld a delegation to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) granting it the authority to promulgate regulations in accordance with its view of the "public interest." Further, it sustained FCC regulations governing

---

[786] Red Lion Broad. Co. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 395 U.S. 367, 389 (1969).

[787] Id. at 390.

[788] Columbia Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 453 U.S. 367, 395 (1981).

[789] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 673–74 (1998), quoting Columbia Broad. Sys. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 124–25 (1973).

[790] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 380–81 (1984).

relations between broadcast stations and network organizations for the purpose of preserving the stations' ability to serve the public interest through their programming.[791]

[I286] National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting involved FCC regulations, adopted after a lengthy rule-making proceeding, that prospectively barred formation or transfer of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations. Existing combinations were generally permitted to continue in operation. However, in communities in which there was common ownership of the only daily newspaper and the only broadcast station, or (where there was more than one broadcast station) of the only daily newspaper and the only television station, divestiture of either the newspaper or the broadcast station was required within five years, unless grounds for waiver were demonstrated. The Court noted that, far from seeking to limit the flow of information, the FCC had acted "to enhance the diversity of information heard by the public without on-going government surveillance of the content of speech." And the limited divestiture requirement "reflect[ed] a rational weighing of competing policies." The FCC had rationally concluded that forced dissolution of all existing co-located combinations, though fostering diversity, would disrupt the industry and cause individual hardship, and it would or might harm the public interest in several respects, especially in light of the fact that the number of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations was already on the decline as a result of natural market forces and would decline further as a result of the prospective rules. Hence, the regulations were "a reasonable means of promoting the public interest in diversified mass communications" and did not violate the First Amendment rights of those who would be denied broadcast licenses pursuant to them.[792]

[I287] Metro Broadcasting was an equal protection challenge against two minority preference policies adopted by the FCC. The policies in question were (1) a program awarding an enhancement for minority ownership in comparative proceedings for new licenses, and (2) the minority "distress sale" program, which permitted a limited category of existing radio and television broadcast stations to be transferred only to minority-controlled firms. The Court upheld the policies, finding that they were substantially related to the achievement of the important governmental interest in diversity of views and information over the airwaves.[793]

---

[791] Nat'l Broad. Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 198–227 (1943). There, the Court upheld, against a First Amendment challenge, inter alia, regulations providing that no license would be granted: (1) to a standard broadcast station having any contract, arrangement, or understanding with a network organization under which the station was prevented or hindered from, or penalized for, broadcasting the programs of any other network organization; (2) to a standard broadcast station having any contract, etc., with a network organization that prevented or hindered another station serving substantially the same area from broadcasting the network's programs not taken by the former station, or which prevented or hindered another station serving a substantially different area from broadcasting any program of the network organization; (3) to a standard broadcast station having any contract, etc., with a network organization that provided for the affiliation of the station with the network organization for a period longer than two years; (4) to a standard broadcast station having any contract, etc., with a network organization under which the station was prevented or hindered from, or penalized for, fixing or altering its rates for the sale of broadcast time for other than the network's programs.

[792] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Nat'l Citizens Comm. for Broad., 436 U.S. 775, 800–04 (1978).

[793] Metro Broad. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 497 U.S. 547, 563–600 (1990). See also para. K20.

[I288] Red Lion upheld the FCC's "fairness doctrine"—which required broadcasters to provide adequate coverage of public issues and to ensure that this coverage fairly and accurately reflected the opposing views[794]—"because the doctrine advanced the substantial governmental interest in ensuring balanced presentations of views in [radio and television,] and yet posed no threat that a broadcaster would be denied permission to carry a particular program or to publish his own views."[795] However, at the same time, the Court noted that if experience with the administration of that doctrine indicated that it had the net effect of reducing, rather than enhancing, the volume and quality of coverage, it would then be forced to reconsider the constitutional implications.[796] The FCC repealed the fairness doctrine in 1987.[797]

[I289] "[I]n most cases, the First Amendment of its own force does not compel public broadcasters to allow third parties access to their programming."[798] In CBS v. Democratic National Committee, the Court held that, assuming governmental action is involved, the First Amendment does not require broadcasters to accept paid editorial advertisements from citizens at large. Although it was argued that such a requirement

---

[794] Under the fairness doctrine the FCC's responsibility was to judge whether a licensee's overall performance indicated a sustained good faith effort to meet the public interest in being fully and fairly informed.

[795] See Fed. Communications Comm'n v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 378 (1984), discussing Red Lion Broad. Co. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 395 U.S. 367, 386–400 (1969). In the latter case, the Court sustained the "political editorial" and "personal attack" portions of the FCC's fairness doctrine. The "personal attack" rule provided that when, during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack was made upon the honesty, character, integrity, or like personal qualities of an identified person, the licensee should notify the person attacked and offer him an opportunity to respond. The "political editorializing" rule provided that, when a licensee endorsed a candidate for political office, it should give other candidates or their spokesmen an opportunity to respond. The fairness doctrine did not require that a broadcaster provide "common carriage;" it contemplated a wide range of licensee discretion. See Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Midwest Video Corp., 440 U.S. 689, 795, n.14 (1979).

[796] Red Lion Broad. Co. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 395 U.S. 367, 393 (1969).

[797] See Syracuse Peace Council, 2 F.C.C. Rec. 5043 (1987), aff'd, 867 F.2d 654 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1019 (1990). The FCC found that the doctrine produced chilling effects by placing burdens on stations that chose to air numerous programs on controversial issues—including the fear of denial of license renewal due to fairness doctrine violations, the cost of defending fairness doctrine attacks and of providing free air time to opposing views if a fairness violation were found, and the reputational harm resulting from even a frivolous fairness challenge. Therefore, in net effect the fairness doctrine often discouraged the presentation of controversial issue programming. Furthermore, since the doctrine compelled coverage only of "major" or "significant" opinions, the FCC claimed that in assessing fairness doctrine compliance, the Commission was called upon to evaluate broadcasters' decisions concerning the importance of given viewpoints. The fairness doctrine thus had the potential to interject the government, even unintentionally, into the position of favoring one type of opinion over another. The FCC also noted that the growth in the number of broadcast outlets reduced any need for the doctrine; since there were so many more stations, it was likely that all sides of issues would be covered one place or another. The court of appeals concluded that the FCC's decision that the fairness doctrine no longer served the public interest was neither arbitrary, capricious nor an abuse of discretion. Accordingly it upheld the decision without reaching the constitutional issues.

[798] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 675 (1998).

would serve the public's First Amendment interest in receiving additional views on public issues, the Court rejected this approach. "The public interest in providing access to the marketplace of 'ideas and experiences' would scarcely be served by a system so heavily weighted in favor of the financially affluent, or those with access to wealth. . . . [This] [p]roblem would not necessarily be solved by applying the Fairness Doctrine . . . to editorial advertising. If broadcasters were required to provide time, free when necessary, for the discussion of the various shades of opinion on the issue discussed in the advertisement, the affluent could still determine in large part the issues to be discussed. . . . If the Fairness Doctrine were applied to editorial advertising, there [wa]s also the substantial danger that the effective operation of that doctrine would be jeopardized. To minimize financial hardship and to comply fully with its public responsibilities, a broadcaster might well be forced to make regular programming time available to those holding a view different from that expressed in an editorial advertisement. . . . The result would be a further erosion of the journalistic discretion of broadcasters in the coverage of public issues, and a transfer of control over the treatment of public issues from the licensees, who [we]re accountable for broadcast performance, to private individuals, who [we]re not. The public interest would no longer be 'paramount,' but, rather, subordinate to private whim, especially since . . . a broadcaster would be largely precluded from rejecting editorial advertisements that dealt with matters trivial or insignificant or already fairly covered by the broadcaster. . . . [And] [i]f the Fairness Doctrine were suspended . . . to alleviate these problems, . . . the congressional objective of balanced coverage of public issues would be seriously threatened."[799] Besides, under a constitutionally commanded and government supervised right-of-access system, the FCC "would be required to oversee far more of the day-to-day operations of broadcasters' conduct, deciding such questions as whether a particular individual or group ha[d] had sufficient opportunity to present its viewpoint and whether a particular viewpoint ha[d] already been sufficiently aired," which would create "the risk of an enlargement of Government control over the content of broadcast discussion of public issues."[800]

[I290] Although public broadcasting, as a general matter, does not lend itself to scrutiny under the "public forum" doctrine, candidate debates present the narrow exception to the rule.[801] Of course, "in many cases, it is not feasible for the broadcaster to allow unlimited access to a candidate debate. Yet . . . a broadcaster cannot grant or deny access to a candidate debate on the basis of whether it agrees with a candidate's views. Viewpoint discrimination in this context would present not a 'calculated risk,' . . . but an inevitability of skewing the electoral dialogue."[802] To be consistent with the First Amendment, the exclusion of a speaker from a debate, which is a "nonpublic forum," must be a "reasonable, viewpoint-neutral exercise of [the broadcaster's] journalistic discretion."[803] For example, it is reasonable for a broadcaster to exclude from a debate a candidate who has "generated no appreciable public interest."[804]

[I291] In CBS v. FCC, the Court upheld a statute allowing the FCC to revoke any broadcasting station license for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to

---

799 Columbia Broad. Sys. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 123–24 (1973).

800 Id. at 126–27.

801 See, in extenso, para. I345.

802 Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 676 (1998).

803 Id.

804 Id. at 682.

broadcast airtime for candidates seeking federal elective office. The provision made "a significant contribution to freedom of expression by enhancing the ability of candidates to present, and the public to receive, information necessary for the effective operation of the democratic process." In addition, it defined a sufficiently limited right of "reasonable access," so that "the discretion of broadcasters to present their views on any issue or to carry any particular type of programming" was not impaired.[805]

[I292] In McConnell, the Court upheld, on their face, the provisions of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA) that required broadcasters to keep publicly available records of politically related broadcasting requests. The provision, which called for broadcasters to keep records of broadcast requests "made by or on behalf of any candidate," imposed upon a licensee a small administrative burden. And it was supported by significant governmental interests in verifying that licensees complied with their statutory obligations to allow political candidates "equal time" and to sell such time at the "lowest unit charge;" in evaluating whether they processed candidate requests in an evenhanded fashion to help assure broadcasting fairness; in making the public aware of how much candidates spent on broadcast messages; and in providing an independently compiled set of data for verifying candidates' compliance with statutory disclosure requirements and source limitations. The provision requiring broadcasters to keep records of requests (made by anyone) to broadcast messages referring either to a "legally qualified candidate" or to "any election to Federal office," served similar governmental interests and imposed only a small incremental burden. Finally the "issue request" requirements—which called for broadcasters to keep records of requests (made by anyone) to broadcast messages related to a "national legislative issue of public importance," or a "political matter of national importance"—seemed likely to help determine whether broadcasters were fulfilling their obligations under the FCC's regulations to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on important public issues or whether they too heavily favored entertainment, discriminating against public affairs broadcasts. Whether these requirements imposed disproportionate administrative burdens would depend on how the FCC would interpret and apply them. Hence, without the greater information any such challenge would likely provide, the Court could not say that the provisions' administrative burdens were so great, or their justifications so minimal, as to warrant finding them facially unconstitutional.[806]

b. Cable TV[807]

[I293] Cable television[808] provides to its subscribers news, information, and entertainment. Through "original programming or by exercising editorial discretion over which stations or programs to include in its repertoire," cable programmers and oper-

---

[805] Columbia Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 453 U.S. 367, 396–97 (1981).

[806] McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 235–38, 240–46 (2003).

[807] See also paras. I151 et seq. (sexually explicit speech on cable television).

[808] "Cable systems rely upon a physical, point-to-point connection between a transmission facility and the television sets of individual subscribers. Cable systems make this connection much like telephone companies, using cable or optical fibers strung above-ground or buried in ducts to reach the homes or businesses of subscribers." See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 627–28 (1994).

ators[809] "see[k] to communicate messages on a wide variety of topics and in a wide variety of formats."[810] Hence, "[c]able programmers and cable operators engage in and transmit speech, and they are entitled to the protection of the speech and press provisions of the First Amendment."[811]

[I294] The rationale for applying a less rigorous standard of First Amendment scrutiny to broadcast regulation does not apply in the context of cable regulation, which "does not suffer from the inherent limitations that characterize the broadcast medium. Indeed, given the rapid advances in fiber optics and digital compression technology, there is no practical limitation on the number of speakers who may use the cable medium. Nor is there any danger of physical interference between two cable speakers attempting to share the same channel. In light of these fundamental technological differences between broadcast and cable transmission, application of the more relaxed standard of scrutiny adopted in Red Lion and the other broadcast cases [of the Court] is inapt when determining the First Amendment validity of cable regulation. . . . [Hence,] the physical characteristics [of cable systems] do not require the alteration of settled principles of the First Amendment jurisprudence."[812]

[I295] "This is not to say that the unique physical characteristics of cable transmission should be ignored when determining the constitutionality of regulations affecting cable speech."[813] "Although a daily newspaper and a cable operator both may enjoy monopoly status in a given locale, the cable operator exercises far greater control over access to the relevant medium. . . . When an individual subscribes to cable, the physical connection between the television set and the cable network gives the cable operator bottleneck, or gatekeeper, control over most (if not all) of the television programming that is channeled into the subscriber's home. Hence, simply by virtue of its ownership of the essential pathway for cable speech, a cable operator can prevent its subscribers from obtaining access to programming it chooses to exclude. A cable operator, unlike speakers in other media, can thus silence the voice of competing speakers with a mere flick of the switch. The potential for abuse of this private power over a central avenue of communication cannot be overlooked. . . . The First Amendment's command that government not impede the freedom of speech does not disable the government from taking steps to ensure that private interests not restrict, through physical control of a critical pathway of communication, the free flow of information and ideas."[814] "Cable televi-

---

[809] "The cable television industry includes both cable operators (those who own the physical cable network and transmit the cable signal to the viewer) and cable programmers (those who produce television programs and sell or license them to cable operators). . . . Although cable operators may create some of their own programming, most of their programming is drawn from outside sources. These outside sources include not only local or distant broadcast stations, but also many national and regional cable programming networks." See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 628–29 (1994).

[810] Los Angeles v. Preferred Communications, 476 U.S. 488, 494 (1986).

[811] Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 636 (1994) (Turner I), citing Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439, 444 (1991).

[812] Turner Broad Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 639 (1994). The Court also found that the mere assertion of dysfunction or failure in the cable market, without more, was not sufficient to shield a speech regulation from the First Amendment standards applicable to non-broadcast media. Id. at 639–40.

[813] Id., at 639.

[814] Id., at 656–57.

sion, like broadcast media, presents unique problems, which inform [the Court's] assessment of the interests at stake, and which may justify restrictions that would be unacceptable in other contexts."[815] [I296] Congress enacted the 1992 Cable Act after conducting three years of hearings on the structure and operation of the cable television industry. Congress found that the physical characteristics of cable transmission, compounded by the increasing concentration of economic power in the cable industry, endangered the ability of over-the-air broadcast television stations to compete for a viewing audience, and thus for necessary operating revenues. At issue in Turner I was the constitutionality of the so-called "must-carry" provisions, contained in Sections 4 and 5 of the Cable Act, which required cable operators to carry the signals of a specified number of local broadcast television stations.[816] "The must-carry provisions ha[d] the potential to interfere with protected speech in two ways. First, the provisions restrain[ed] cable operators' editorial discretion in creating programming packages 'by reduce[ing] the number of channels over which they exercise[d] unfettered control.' Second, the rules 'render[ed] it more difficult for cable programmers to compete for carriage on the limited channels remaining.'"[817] Turner I found that these provisions did not distinguish favored speech from disfavored speech on the basis of the ideas or views expressed, but it was a content-neutral regulation designed "to prevent cable operators from exploiting their economic power to the detriment of broadcasters" and "to ensure that all Americans, especially those unable to subscribe to cable, ha[d] access to free television programming—whatever its content."[818] Further, the Court held that, under the intermediate level of scrutiny applicable to content-neutral regulations, "must-carry" would be sustained if it were shown to further an important or substantial governmental interest unrelated to the suppression of free speech, provided the incidental restrictions did not "burden substantially more speech than [wa]s necessary to further those interests." Must-carry provisions were designed to "serve three interrelated interests: (1) preserving the benefits

---

[815] United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000).

[816] Section 4 required carriage of "local commercial television stations," defined to include all full power television broadcasters, other than those qualifying as "non-commercial educational" stations under section 5, that operated within the same television market as the cable system. Cable systems with more than 12 active channels, and more than 300 subscribers, were required to set aside up to one-third of their channels for commercial broadcast stations that requested carriage. Cable systems with more than 300 subscribers, but only 12 or fewer active channels, should carry the signals of three commercial broadcast stations. Subject to a few exceptions, a cable operator could not charge a fee for carrying broadcast signals in fulfillment of its must-carry obligations. Section 5 of the Act imposed similar requirements regarding the carriage of local public broadcast television stations, referred to in the Act as local "non-commercial educational television stations." Taken together, thus, Sections 4 and 5 subjected all but the smallest cable systems nationwide to must-carry obligations, and they conferred must-carry privileges on all full power broadcasters operating within the same television market as a qualified cable system. See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 632 (1994) Turner I).

[817] See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 520 U.S. 180, 214 (1997) (Turner II), quoting Turner Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 637 (1994) (Turner I). "Given cable's long history of serving as a conduit for broadcast signals, there appears little risk that cable viewers would assume that the broadcast stations carried on a cable system convey ideas or messages endorsed by the cable operator." See Turner I, supra, at 655.

[818] Turner Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 649 (1994) (Turner I).

of free, over-the-air local broadcast television; (2) promoting the widespread dissemination of information from a multiplicity of sources; and (3) promoting fair competition in the market for television programming."[819] Although these interests were important in the abstract, a four-Justice plurality concluded genuine issues of material fact remained regarding whether "the economic health of local broadcasting [wa]s in genuine jeopardy and need of the protections afforded by must-carry" and whether must-carry burdened substantially more speech than was necessary to further the government's legitimate interests.[820]

[I297] In Turner II, the Court reaffirmed that must-carry served the above important governmental interests. Forty percent of American households continued to rely on over-the-air signals for television programming. Despite the growing importance of cable television and alternative technologies, broadcasting was "demonstrably a principal source of information and entertainment for a great part" of the population. The Court identified a corresponding "governmental purpose of the highest order" in ensuring public access to "a multiplicity of information sources." Moreover, the Court noted that government has an interest in "eliminating restraints on fair competition . . . , even when the individuals or entities subject to particular regulations are engaged in expressive activity protected by the First Amendment."[821] Considering the expanded record of the case, the Court found that the must-carry provisions served the aforesaid governmental interests in a direct and effective way. Congress had reasonably concluded from the substantial body of evidence before it that attaining cable carriage would be of increasing importance to ensuring broadcasters' economic viability, and that, absent legislative action, the free local off-air broadcast system was endangered. Such evidence amply indicated that a broadcast station's viability depended, to a material extent, on its ability to secure cable carriage; broadcast stations had fallen into bankruptcy, curtailed their operations, and suffered serious reductions in operating revenues as a result of adverse carriage decisions by cable systems; and stations without carriage encountered severe difficulties obtaining financing for operations. Further, the Court held that the must-carry provisions were narrowly tailored to preserve a multiplicity of broadcast stations for the 40 percent of American households without cable. Evidence adduced on remand indicated the vast majority of cable operators had not been affected in a significant manner by must-carry. Cable operators were able to satisfy their must-carry obligations 87 percent of the time using previously unused channel capacity; 94.5 percent of the 11,628 cable systems nationwide did not have to drop any programming in order to fulfill their must-carry obligations; the remaining 5.5 percent had to drop an average of only 1.22 services from their programming; and cable operators nationwide carried 99.8 percent of the programming they had carried before enactment of must-carry. And the possibilities that must-carry would prohibit dropping a broadcaster even if the cable operator had no anti-competitive motives or if the broadcaster would survive without cable access were not "so prevalent as to render must-carry substantially overbroad." In addition, given "the considerable expense and delay inherent in antitrust litigation,

---

819 Id. at 662–63.

820 Id. at 665. Justice Stevens would have found the statute valid on the record then before the Court, but he agreed to remand the case to ensure a judgment of the Court. Id. at 674. Accordingly, the case was returned to the district dourt for further proceedings.

821 Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 520 U.S. 180, 190 (1997) (Turner II), quoting Turner Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 663 (1994) (Turner I).

and the great disparities in wealth and sophistication between the average independent broadcast station and average cable system operator, . . . a system of antitrust enforcement or an administrative complaint procedure to protect broadcasters from cable operators' anticompetitive conduct . . . would [be an] inadequate substitute[e] for guaranteed carriage."[822]

c. Internet[823]

[I298] The Internet, an international network of interconnected computers, is a unique and wholly new medium of worldwide human communication. "It is the outgrowth of what began in 1969 as a military program called 'ARPANET,' which was designed to enable computers operated by the military, defense contractors, and universities conducting defense-related research to communicate with one another by redundant channels even if some portions of the network were damaged in a war. . . . Individuals can obtain access to the Internet from many different sources, generally hosts themselves or entities with a host affiliation. . . . Anyone with access to the Internet may take advantage of a wide variety of communication and information retrieval methods. . . . [The main ones] are electronic mail ('e-mail'), automatic mailing list services ('mail exploders'), 'newsgroups,' 'chat rooms,' and the 'World Wide Web.' All of these methods can be used to transmit text; most can transmit sound, pictures, and moving video images. Taken together, these tools constitute a unique medium—known as 'cyberspace'—located in no particular geographical location but available to anyone, anywhere in the world, with access to the Internet."[824] "The best known category of communication over the Internet is the World Wide Web, which allows users to search for and retrieve information stored in remote computers, as well as, in some cases, to communicate back to designated sites. In concrete terms, the Web consists of a vast number of documents stored in different computers all over the world. . . . Navigating the Web is relatively straightforward. A user may either type the address of a known page or enter one or more keywords into a commercial 'search engine' in an effort to locate sites on a subject of interest. . . . Access to most Web pages is freely available, but some allow access only to those who have purchased the right from a commercial provider. The Web is thus comparable, from the readers' viewpoint, to both a vast library including millions of readily available and indexed publications and a sprawling mall offering goods and services. From the publishers' point of view, it constitutes a vast platform from which to address and hear from a worldwide audience of millions of readers, viewers, researchers, and buyers. Any person or organization with a computer connected to the Internet can 'publish' information. . . . No single organization controls any membership in the Web, nor is there any centralized point from which individual Web sites or services can be blocked from the Web."[825] "The Internet is not as 'invasive' as radio

---

[822] Turner Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 520 U.S. 180, 208–25 (1997) (Turner II). The Court also found that other suggestions—such as a leased-access regime requiring cable operators to set aside channels for both broadcasters and cable programmers to use at a regulated price or subsidies for broadcasters—were not adequate alternatives to must-carry for achieving the government's aims.

[823] Sexually explicit speech on the Internet is discussed in paras. I157 et seq.

[824] Reno v. Am. Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 849–51 (1997).

[825] Id. at 852–53.

or television. . . . [C]ommunications over the Internet do not 'invade' an individual's home or appear on one's computer screen unbidden. Users seldom encounter content 'by accident.'"[826] Moreover, "unlike the conditions that prevailed when Congress first authorized regulation of the broadcast spectrum, the Internet can hardly be considered a 'scarce' expressive commodity. It provides relatively unlimited, low-cost capacity for communication of all kinds."[827] Hence, the Court has found "no basis for qualifying the level of First Amendment scrutiny that should be applied to this medium."[828]

[826] Id. at 869.
[827] Id. at 870.
[828] Id.

PART II: FREE SPEECH PLUS CONDUCT

A. IN GENERAL

[I299] "The government generally has a freer hand in restricting expressive conduct than it has in restricting the written or spoken word. . . . It may not, however, proscribe particular conduct because it has expressive elements. '[W]hat might be termed the more generalized guarantee of freedom of expression makes the communicative nature of conduct an inadequate basis for singling out that conduct for proscription. A law directed at the communicative nature of conduct must, like a law directed at speech itself, be justified by the substantial showing of need that the First Amendment requires.'"[829]

[I300] In United States v. O'Brien, the Court established the standard for judging the validity of content-neutral restrictions on expressive conduct. Under O'Brien, such a regulation will be sustained "if it furthers an important governmental interest [that is] unrelated to the suppression of free expression, and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest."[830]

B. TIME, PLACE, OR MANNER RESTRICTIONS

[I301] The First Amendment does not guarantee the right to communicate one's views at all times and places or in any manner that may be desired. "[E]ven in a public forum, the government may impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, or manner of protected speech, provided the restrictions 'are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.'"[831]

[I302] "The principal inquiry in determining content-neutrality, in speech cases generally and in time, place, or manner cases in particular, is whether the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of disagreement with the message it conveys. . . . The government's purpose is the controlling consideration. A regulation that serves purposes unrelated to the content of expression is deemed neutral, even if it has an incidental effect on some speakers or messages, but not others. . . . Government regulation of expressive activity is content-neutral so long as it is justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech."[832]

---

[829] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 406 (1989).

The line distinguishing "expressive conduct" from "pure speech" is sometimes hazy. In Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514, 527 (2001), the Court noted that the acts of "disclosing" and "publishing" information fall within the category of "speech," as distinct from the category of expressive conduct, and, subsequently, it held that the delivery of a tape recording is the kind of "speech" that the First Amendment protects, since the purpose of such a delivery is to provide the recipient with the text of recorded statements.

[830] United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 377 (1968).

[831] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989), quoting Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984).

[832] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989). See, in extenso, paras. I39 et seq.

[I303] "[A] regulation of the time, place, or manner of protected speech must be narrowly tailored to serve the government's legitimate, content-neutral interests, but . . . it need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of doing so. Rather, the requirement of narrow tailoring is satisfied 'so long as the . . . regulation promotes a substantial government interest that would be achieved less effectively absent the regulation.'"[833] "[T]his standard does not mean that a time, place, or manner regulation may burden substantially more speech than is necessary to further the government's legitimate interests. Government may not regulate expression in such a manner that a substantial portion of the burden on speech does not serve to advance its goals. . . . So long as the means chosen are not substantially broader than necessary to achieve the government's interest, however, the regulation will not be invalid simply because a court concludes that the government's interest could be adequately served by some less-speech-restrictive alternative. 'The validity of [time, place, or manner] regulations does not turn on a judge's agreement with the responsible decision maker concerning the most appropriate method for promoting significant government interests' or the degree to which those interests should be promoted. . . . [Moreover,] the validity of [such a] regulation depends on the relation it bears to the overall problem the government seeks to correct, not on the extent to which it furthers the government's interests in an individual case."[834] Further, "even regulations that do not foreclose an entire medium of expression, but merely shift the time, place, or manner of its use, must 'leave open ample alternative channels for communication.'"[835]

[I304] "Of course even content-neutral time, place, and manner restrictions can be applied in such a manner as to stifle free expression. [For instance, where, under a content-neutral permit scheme,] the licensing official enjoys unduly broad discretion in determining whether to grant or deny a permit, there is a risk that he will favor or disfavor speech based on its content."[836] The Court has "thus required that a time, place, and manner regulation contain adequate standards to guide the official's decision and render it subject to effective judicial review."[837] That a municipal ordinance describes grounds on which the city "may" deny a permit does not mean that it allows the city to waive requirements for some favored speakers; such a waiver would be unconstitutional, but an abuse of this kind "must be dealt with if and when a pattern of unlawful favoritism appears," rather than by insisting upon a rigid, no-waiver application of the permit requirements.[838]

---

[833] Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 798–99 (1989), quoting United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675, 689 (1985).

[834] Ward, id. at 799–801, quoting Albertini, id. at 689. In the latter case, the Court stated that "[t]he First Amendment does not bar application of a neutral regulation that incidentally burdens speech merely because a party contends that allowing an exception in the particular case will not threaten important government interests. . . . Regulations that burden speech incidentally or control the time, place, and manner of expression, . . . must be evaluated in terms of their general effect." See Albertini, supra, at 688–89.

[835] City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 56 (1994), quoting Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984).

[836] Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 323 (2002), citing Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 131 (1992).

[837] Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 323 (2002), citing Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 271 (1951).

[838] Thomas v. Chicago Park Dist., 534 U.S. 316, 324–25 (2002).

[I305] The Court has pointed out that there are essential differences between an injunction and a generally applicable time, place, or manner ordinance. "Ordinances represent a legislative choice regarding the promotion of particular societal interests. Injunctions, by contrast, are remedies imposed for violations (or threatened violations) of a legislative or judicial decree."[839] "Injunctions . . . can be tailored by a trial judge to afford more precise relief than a statute where a violation of the law has already occurred. . . . [However,] [i]njunctions also carry greater risks of censorship and discriminatory application than do general ordinances."[840] Considering these differences, the Court has held that, "when evaluating a content-neutral injunction, the standard time, place, and manner analysis is not sufficiently rigorous. [Instead the Court asks] whether the challenged provisions of the injunction burden no more speech than necessary to serve a significant government interest."[841]

C. EXPRESSIVE ACTIVITY ON PROPERTY OWNED OR CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT (THE "PUBLIC FORUM" DOCTRINE)

1. Types of Fora—Standards of Review

[I306] "[T]he First Amendment does not guarantee access to property simply because it is owned or controlled by the government."[842] "Nothing in the Constitution requires the Government freely to grant access to all who wish to exercise their right to free speech on every type of government property without regard to the nature of the property or to the disruption that might be caused by the speaker's activities."[843] The government, "no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated."[844] But that "does not mean that it can restrict speech in whatever way it likes."[845] "The Government, even when acting in its proprietary capacity, does not enjoy absolute freedom from First Amendment constraints."[846] For example, in Jews for Jesus, the Court unanimously struck down a regulation that prohibited "all First Amendment activities" in the Los Angeles International Airport, because no conceivable governmental interest would justify such a sweeping ban.[847]

[I307] "[T]he Court has adopted a forum analysis as a means of determining when the Government's interest in limiting the use of its property to its intended purpose outweighs the interest of those wishing to use the property for other purposes.

---

[839] Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 764 (1994). Under general equity principles, an injunction issues only if there is a showing that the defendant has violated, or imminently will violate, some provision of statutory or common law, and that there is a "cognizable danger of recurrent violation." See United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633 (1953).

[840] Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 764–65 (1994).

[841] Id. at 765.

[842] United States Postal Serv. v. Council of Greenburgh Civic Ass'ns, 453 U.S. 114, 129 (1981).

[843] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 799–800 (1985).

[844] Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 836 (1976), quoting Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 47 (1966).

[845] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 682 (1998).

[846] United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 725 (1990) (plurality opinion).

[847] Bd. of Airport Comm'rs of Los Angeles v. Jews for Jesus, Inc., 482 U.S. 569, 575 (1987).

Accordingly, the extent to which the Government can control access depends on the character of the property at issue."[848] In Perry, the Court announced a tripartite framework for determining how First Amendment interests are to be analyzed with respect to government property. There, the Court identified three types of fora: the traditional public forum, the public forum created by government designation, and the non-public forum.[849]

[I308] Traditional public fora are those places that, "by long tradition or by government fiat, have been devoted to assembly and debate."[850] Public streets, sidewalks, and parks fall into this category.[851] "In these quintessential public for[a], the government may not prohibit all communicative activity."[852] "Because a principal purpose of traditional public fora is the free exchange of ideas, speakers can be excluded from [such fora] only when the exclusion is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and the exclusion is narrowly drawn to achieve that interest."[853] "The State may also enforce regulations of the time, place, and manner of expression which are content-neutral, are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication."[854]

[I309] Second, "a public forum may be created by government designation of a place or channel of communication for use by the public at large for assembly and speech, for use by certain speakers, or for the discussion of certain subjects."[855] "Publicly owned or operated property does not become a 'public forum' simply because members of the public are permitted to come and go at will."[856] "The government does not create a public forum by inaction or by permitting limited discourse, but only by intentionally opening a nontraditional forum for public discourse. . . . Accordingly, the Court has looked to the policy and practice of the government to ascertain whether it intended to designate a place not traditionally open to assembly and debate as a public forum. . . . The

---

[848] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985).

[849] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 44–46 (1983).

[850] Id. at 45.

[851] A public street or sidewalk does not lose its status as a traditional public forum simply because it runs through a residential neighborhood. See Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 480 (1988). Similarly, public streets and sidewalks around an abortion clinic are traditional public fora. See Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 764 (1994).

[852] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 45 (1983).

[853] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985).

[854] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 45 (1983).

The suggestion that the government has a high burden in justifying speech restrictions relating to traditional public fora made its first appearance in Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 U.S. 496, 515–16 (1939). Justice Roberts, concluding that individuals have a right to use "streets and parks for communication of views," reasoned that such a right flowed from the fact that "streets and parks . . . have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions." The Court has rejected "the view that traditional public forum status extends beyond its historic confines;" the doctrines surrounding traditional public fora may not be extended to situations where such history is lacking. See Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 678 (1998).

[855] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 802 (1985).

[856] United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 177 (1983), citing Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 836 (1976).

Court has also examined the nature and location of the property and its compatibility with expressive activity to discern the government's intent."[857] For instance, Widmar held that "a state university that had an express policy of making its meeting facilities available to registered student groups had created a public forum for their use. . . . The policy evidenced a clear intent to create a public forum, not withstanding the University's erroneous conclusion that the Establishment Clause required the exclusion of groups meeting for religious purposes."[858] Similarly, the Court found a public forum where a municipal auditorium and a city-leased theater were "designed for and dedicated to expressive activities."[859] Moreover, "[t]o create a forum of this type, the government must intend to make the property 'generally available' . . . to a class of speakers."[860] In Widmar, for example, a state university created a public forum for registered student groups by implementing a policy that expressly made its meeting facilities "generally open" to such groups.[861] "A designated public forum is not created when the government allows selective access for individual speakers rather than general access for a class of speakers."[862] In Perry, for instance, the Court held a school district's internal mail system was not a designated public forum, even though selected speakers were able to gain access to it.[863] Indeed, the Court has clearly distinguished "between 'general access,' . . . which indicates the property is a designated public forum, and 'selective access,' . . . which indicates the property is a nonpublic forum. On one hand, the government creates a designated public forum when it makes its property generally available to a certain class of speakers. . . . On the other hand, the government does not create a designated public forum when it does no more than reserve eligibility for access to the forum to a particular class of speakers, whose members must then, as individuals, 'obtain permission.' . . . [This] distinction between general and selective access furthers First Amendment interests. By recognizing the distinction, [the Court] encourage[s] the government to open its property to some expressive activity in cases where, if faced with an all-or-nothing choice, it might not open the property at all. That this distinction turns on governmental intent does not render it unprotective of speech. Rather, it reflects the reality that, with the exception of traditional public fora, the government retains the choice of whether to designate its property as a forum for specified classes of speakers."[864]

[I310] "Although a State is not required to indefinitely retain the open character of a designated public forum, as long as it does so, it is bound by the same standards as [857] Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 802 (1985). "In cases where the principal function of the property would be disrupted by expressive activity, the Court is particularly reluctant to hold that the government intended to designate a public forum." Id. at 804. "[T]he location of property has bearing, because separation from acknowledged public areas may serve to indicate that the separated property is a special enclave, subject to greater restriction." See Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 680 (1992), citing United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 179–80 (1983).

---

[858] See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 802–03 (1985), discussing Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 267 (1981).

[859] Se. Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546, 555 (1975).

[860] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 678 (1998).

[861] Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 267 (1981).

[862] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 679 (1998).

[863] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37 (1983).

[864] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 679–80 (1998).

apply in a traditional public forum. Reasonable time, place, and manner regulations are permissible, and a content-based prohibition [of access to a designated public forum open for indiscriminate public use for communicative purposes] must be narrowly drawn to effectuate a compelling state interest."[865] In a case involving a limited public forum, "[t]he necessities of confining the forum to the limited and legitimate purposes for which it was created may justify the State in reserving it for certain groups or for the discussion of certain topics. . . . Once it has opened a limited forum, however, the State must respect the lawful boundaries it has itself set. The State may not exclude speech where its distinction is not 'reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum,' . . . nor may it discriminate against speech on the basis of its viewpoint. Thus, in determining whether the State is acting to preserve the limits of the forum it has created so that the exclusion of a class of speech is legitimate, the Court has observed a distinction between, on the one hand, content discrimination, which may be permissible if it preserves the purposes of that limited forum, and, on the other hand, viewpoint discrimination, which is presumed impermissible when directed against speech otherwise within the forum's limitations."[866] Relatedly, the Court also has held that the constitutional right of access to a limited public forum, reserved to a specific class of speakers, extends only to "other entities of similar character."[867]

[I311] Finally, other government properties are either non-public fora or not fora at all. Limitations on expressive activity conducted on non-public fora must survive only a much more limited review. The government can restrict access to a non-public forum "as long as the restrictions are reasonable and [are] not an effort to suppress expression merely because public officials oppose the speaker's view."[868] The restriction "need only be reasonable; it need not be the most reasonable or the only reasonable limitation."[869] The Court has said that a restriction on speech in a non-public forum is "reasonable" when it is consistent with the government's "legitimate interest in preserving the property for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated."[870] Moreover, the Court has

---

[865] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 46 (1983).

[866] Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 829–30 (1995).

[867] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 48 (1983).

[868] Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 677–78 (1998), quoting Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985).

[869] Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 683 (1992).

[870] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 48 (1983). The Court does not require that proof be present to justify the denial of access to a non-public forum on grounds that the proposed use may disrupt the property's intended function. Id. at 52, n.12. Nevertheless, the Court has required some explanation as to why certain speech is inconsistent with the intended use of the forum. In Cornelius, for example, the Court held that it was reasonable to exclude political advocacy groups from a fundraising campaign targeted at federal employees in part because "the record amply support[ed] an inference" that the participation of those groups would have jeopardized the success of the campaign. See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 810 (1985).

"Implicit in the concept of the nonpublic forum is the right to make distinctions in access on the basis of subject matter and speaker identity. These distinctions may be impermissible in a public forum, but are inherent and inescapable in the process of limiting a nonpublic forum to activities compatible with the intended purpose of the property." See Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 49 (1983). "[C]ontrol over access to a nonpublic forum can be based on subject matter and speaker identity so long as the distinctions drawn emphasized that the non-public-forum analysis "concerns government's authority to provide assistance to certain persons in communicating with other persons who would not, as listeners, be acting for the government;" one's claim that government is constitutionally obliged to listen to him involves entirely different considerations from those on which resolution of non-public-forum cases turn.[871]

[I312] "In summary, traditional public fora are open for expressive activity regardless of the government's intent. The objective characteristics of these properties require the government to accommodate private speakers. The government is free to open additional properties for expressive use by the general public or by a particular class of speakers, thereby creating designated public fora. Where the property is not a traditional public forum and the government has not chosen to create a designated public forum, the property is either a nonpublic forum or not a forum at all."[872] Regulation of speech activity on public fora is examined under strict scrutiny. "[C]onsideration of a forum's special attributes is relevant to the constitutionality of a regulation, since the significance of the governmental interest must be assessed in light of the characteristic nature and function of the particular forum involved."[873] "[R]egulation of speech activity where the Government has not dedicated its property to First Amendment activity is examined only for reasonableness."[874] Thus, "the government may—without further justification—restrict use to those who participate in the forum's official business."[875] are reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum and are viewpoint-neutral." See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 806 (1985).

[I313] "[A]s an initial matter, a speaker must seek access to public property or to private property dedicated to public use to evoke First Amendment concerns. [However,] forum analysis is not completed merely by identifying the government property at issue. Rather, in defining the forum, [the Court] focuse[s] on the access sought by the speaker. When speakers seek general access to public property, the forum encompasses that property. . . . In cases in which access to a particular means of communication is sought, [the Court has] taken a more tailored approach to ascertaining the perimeters of a forum within the confines of the government property."[876] For example, in Lehman, where petitioners sought to compel the city to permit political advertising on city-owned buses, the Court treated the advertising spaces on the buses as the forum.[877] And Rosenberger found a university's student activity fund, a non-tangible channel of communication, to be a limited public forum.[878]

---

871 Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 282 (1984).

872 Arkansas Educ. Television Comm. v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 678 (1998).

873 Heffron v. Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, 452 U.S. 640, 650–51 (1981).

874 United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 727 (1990) (plurality opinion), citing Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 46 (1983).

875 Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 53 (1983).

876 Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 801 (1985) (emphasis added).

877 Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298, 300 (1974).

878 Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 829–30 (1995). Generally the Court has been quite reluctant to find even limited public fora in non-tangible channels of communication. See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 804 (1985) (a charity drive aimed at federal employees is not a limited public forum); Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 47–48 (1983) (a school's internal mail system is not a limited public forum).

2. Permit Requirement

[I314] A statute requiring a permit and a fee before authorizing public speaking, parades, or assemblies in public fora is a prior restraint on speech. "Although there is a 'heavy presumption' against the validity of a prior restraint, . . . the Court has recognized that government, in order to regulate competing uses of public for[a], may impose a permit requirement on those wishing to hold a march, parade, or rally."[879] Such a scheme, however, must meet certain constitutional requirements. "[A]ny permit scheme controlling the time, place, and manner of speech must not be based on the content of the message, must be narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and must leave open ample alternatives for communication. . . . [Further,] [i]t may not delegate overly broad licensing discretion to a government official. . . . A government regulation that allows arbitrary application is 'inherently inconsistent with a valid time, place, and manner regulation because such discretion has the potential for becoming a means of suppressing a particular point of view.' . . . To curtail that risk, 'a law subjecting the exercise of First Amendment freedoms to the prior restraint of a license' must contain 'narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide the licensing authority.' . . . The reasoning is simple: if the permit scheme 'involves appraisal of facts, the exercise of judgment, and the formation of an opinion' . . . by the licensing authority, 'the danger of censorship and of abridgment of . . . precious First Amendment freedoms is too great' to be permitted."[880]

[I315] In exercise of its power to license parades on public streets, a state may charge a license fee, reasonably adjusted to the occasion, for meeting administrative and police expenses.[881] But a statutory scheme under which the decision how much to charge for police protection or administrative time—or even whether to charge at all—is left to the unbridled discretion of the administrator, who is not required to rely on objective, reasonable, and definite standards or provide any explanation for his decision, is unconstitutional.[882]

---

[879] Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 130 (1992), citing Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574 (1941).

[880] Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 130–31 (1992). See, in extenso, paras. I12 et seq., I18 et seq.

[881] Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 576–77 (1941).

[882] Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 130–33 (1992). See also para. I111. In Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197, 1208 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, Smith v. Collin, 439 U.S. 916 (1978), the Seventh Circuit held that a village ordinance requiring a parade or public assembly applicant to obtain $300,000 in public liability insurance and $50,000 in property damage insurance could not constitutionally be applied to prohibit a demonstration by members of the National Socialist party in a predominately Jewish village. In so holding, the court noted that the requirement was subject to discretionary waiver explicitly or by village co-sponsorship, and that appellees had proved in the district court that they could not obtain the requisite insurance, which would typically be unavailable to those very controversial groups as to which the village's interest in having insurance would presumably be the greatest.

3. Particular Applications

a. Court Grounds and Adjacent Sidewalks[883]

[I316] Grace held that the Supreme Court building and grounds fit within the description of non-public forum property. "Although the property is publicly owned, it has not been traditionally held open for the use of the public for expressive activities. . . . [And] the property is not transformed into 'public forum' property merely because the public is permitted to freely enter and leave the grounds at practically all times and the public is admitted to the building during specified hours."[884] However, the public sidewalks surrounding the Court are "indistinguishable from any other sidewalks in Washington, D.C.," and constitute public fora, given that there is "no fence, and no indication whatever to persons stepping from the street to the curb and sidewalks that serve as the perimeter of the Court grounds that they have entered some special type of enclave."[885] In Grace, the Court examined the constitutionality of a federal statute, as applied to the public sidewalks surrounding the Supreme Court, that prohibited among other things, the "display [of] any flag, banner, or device designed or adapted to bring into public notice any party, organization, or movement" in the U.S. Supreme Court building and on its grounds. The Court held that the ban on the specified communicative activity, on the public sidewalks around the Court grounds, could not be justified as a reasonable place restriction, because it had an insufficient nexus with any of the public interests that might be thought to undergird the provision. The Court did not "denigrate the necessity to protect persons and property or to maintain proper order and decorum within the Supreme Court grounds," but it was not convinced that "a total ban on carrying a flag, banner, or device on the public sidewalks substantially serve[d] these purposes." There was no suggestion, for example, that peaceful picketing or leafletting "in any way obstructed the sidewalks or access to the building, threatened injury to any person or property, or in any way interfered with the orderly administration of the building or other parts of the grounds." A total ban on such expressive conduct was "no more necessary for the maintenance of peace and tranquility on the public sidewalks surrounding the [Court] building than on any other sidewalks in the city." Nor did the challenged prohibition sufficiently serve the averred purpose of protecting the Court from outside influence or preventing it from appearing to the public that the Court was subject to such influence, since, as noted above, the public sidewalks surrounding the Court grounds are no different than other public sidewalks in the city.[886]

b. "No-Campaign Zone" Around Polling Places

[I317] Burson sustained a state statute, applied only on election day, that prohibited the solicitation of votes and the display or distribution of campaign materials within 100 feet of the entrance to a polling place. Both the plurality and dissent applied strict scrutiny, because the law was a facially content-based restriction on political speech in a public forum. In light of the logical connection between electioneering and the state's compelling interest in preventing voter intimidation and election fraud—an inherent

---

883 See also paras. I357, I364.

884 United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 178 (1983).

885 Id. at 179–80.

886 Id. at 182–83.

connection borne out by a long history and a widespread and time-tested consensus among the 50 states—a four-Justice plurality found that it was faced with one of those rare cases in which the use of a facially content-based restriction was justified by interests unrelated to the suppression of ideas. The plurality concluded that the legislation survived strict scrutiny because it served the above compelling state interest, and it was narrowly tailored to accomplish that goal, since the minor geographic limitation prescribed by the statute did not constitute a significant impingement on First Amendment rights.[887]

c. Military Bases—Streets and Sidewalks Located Within Military Reservations

[I318] Military bases generally are not public fora. In Flower, the Court summarily reversed the conviction of a civilian for entering a military reservation after his having been ordered not to do so. At the time of his arrest, the petitioner had been quietly distributing leaflets on New Braunfels Avenue, within the limits of Fort Sam Houston. No sentry was posted anywhere along the street, which was open to unrestricted civilian traffic 24 hours a day. The Court determined New Braunfels Avenue was "a completely open street," and that the military had "abandoned any claim that it ha[d] special interests in who walk[ed], talk[ed], or distribute[d] leaflets on the avenue." Under those circumstances, the base commandant could "no more order [Flower] off this public street because he was distributing leaflets than could the city police order any leafleteer off any public street."[888]

---

[887] Burson v. Freeman, 504 U.S. 191, 198–211 (1992). Relatedly, the plurality noted that the Court "never has held a State 'to the burden of demonstrating empirically the objective effects on political stability that [are] produced' by the voting regulation in question. . . . Elections vary from year to year, and place to place. It is therefore difficult to make specific findings about the effects of a voting regulation. Moreover, the remedy for a tainted election is an imperfect one. Rerunning an election would have a negative impact on voter turnout. Thus, requiring proof that a 100-foot boundary is perfectly tailored to deal with voter intimidation and election fraud 'would necessitate that a State's political system sustain some level of damage before the legislature could take corrective action. Legislatures [. . .] should be permitted to respond to potential deficiencies in the electoral process with foresight, rather than reactively, provided that the response is reasonable and does not significantly impinge on constitutionally protected rights.'" Id. at 208–09, quoting Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 195–96 (1986). Justice Scalia concurred in the judgment, reasoning that the statute, though content-based, was constitutional was a reasonable, viewpoint-neutral regulation of a non-public forum. Id. at 214–16.

The three dissenters noted, inter alia, that the statute was underinclusive, because it did not restrict other types of speech, such as charitable and commercial solicitation or exit polling, within the 100-foot zone, which "presents at least as great a potential interference with orderly access to the polls as does the distribution of campaign leaflets, the display of campaign posters, or the wearing of campaign buttons." See id. at 223–24. The plurality rejected this position, saying that "there is ample evidence that political candidates have used campaign workers to commit voter intimidation or electoral fraud. In contrast, there is simply no evidence that political candidates have used other forms of solicitation or exit polling to commit such electoral abuses. States adopt laws to address the problems that confront them. The First Amendment does not require States to regulate for problems that do not exist." Id. at 207.

[888] Flower v. United States, 407 U.S. 197, 198 (1972) (per curiam).

[I319] Greer clarified that the significance of the opinion in Flower was limited by the unusual facts underlying the earlier decision. Greer made clear that there is "no generalized constitutional right to make political speeches or distribute leaflets" on military bases, even if they are open to the public. In that case, the Court held that, even though certain parts of the Fort Dix were open to the public (civilian vehicular traffic was permitted on paved roads within the reservation, and civilian pedestrian traffic was permitted on both roads and footpaths), they still did not constitute a public forum in light of the "historically unquestioned power of [a] commanding officer summarily to exclude civilians from the area of his command." And "[t]he fact that other civilian speakers and entertainers had sometimes been invited to appear at Fort Dix did not, of itself, serve to convert Fort Dix into a public forum or to confer upon political candidates a First Amendment right to conduct their campaigns there. The decision of the military authorities that a civilian lecture on drug abuse, a religious service by a visiting preacher at the base chapel, or a rock musical concert would be supportive of the military mission of Fort Dix surely did not leave the authorities powerless thereafter to prevent any civilian from entering Fort Dix to speak on any subject whatever." The Court then proceeded to uphold a regulation banning the distribution of literature without the prior approval of the base commander. In so doing, the Court emphasized that the regulation on leafletting did not authorize the Fort Dix authorities to prohibit the distribution of "conventional political campaign literature." Rather, the only publications that a military commander might disapprove were those that he found to constitute "a clear danger to [military] loyalty, discipline, or morale."[889]

[I320] Albertini considered respondent's conviction for re-entering a military base (Hickam), during the base's annual open house for Armed Forces Day, after being subject to an order barring him from entering that establishment based on his previous improper conduct on the base (respondent had destroyed secret Air Force documents by pouring animal blood on them). The Court first noted that Hickam did not constitute a public forum merely because the base was used to communicate ideas or information during the open house. Further, it held that, whether or not Hickam constituted a public forum on the day of the open house, the exclusion of respondent did not violate the First Amendment. Respondent conceded that the commander of Hickam could exclude him from the closed base, but contended this power was extinguished when the public was invited to enter on Armed Forces Day. The Court did not agree that "the historically unquestioned power of [a] commanding officer to exclude civilians from the area of his command" should be analyzed in the same manner as government regulation of a traditional public forum simply because an open house was held at Hickam. "The fact that respondent had previously received a valid bar letter distinguished him from the general public and provided a reasonable grounds for excluding him from the base. That justification did not become less weighty when other persons were allowed to enter. Indeed, given the large number of people present during an open house, the need to preserve security by excluding those who ha[d] previously received bar letters could become even more important, because the military [might] be unable to monitor closely who [came] and [went.]" Under these considerations, the Court said that, "[w]here a bar letter is issued on valid grounds, a person may not claim immunity from its prohibition on entry merely because the military has temporarily opened a military facility to the public." Nor did the general exclusion of recipients of bar letters from military open houses violate the First Amendment. The relevant regulation was content-neutral and served a significant government interest by barring entry to a military base by persons whose previous conduct demonstrated that they were a threat to security. And "nothing in the First Amendment requires military commanders to wait until persons subject to a valid bar order have entered a military base to see if they will conduct themselves properly during an open house."[890]

---

[889] Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 838–40, n.10 (1976).

d. Prisons

[I321] Jailhouse grounds do not constitute public fora. Adderley held that "demonstrators could be barred from jailhouse grounds not ordinarily open to the public, at least where the demonstration obstructed the jail driveway and interfered with the functioning of the jail."[891] In Jones, prisoners challenged the constitutionality of prison regulations prohibiting prisoners from soliciting other inmates to join a prisoners' labor union and barring union meetings and bulk mailings concerning the union from outside sources. The Court upheld the regulations in the face of a First Amendment challenge on the basis that the First Amendment activity was incompatible with reasonable considerations of penal management. The Court also rejected the claim that the grant of access to the Jaycees and Alcoholics Anonymous had transformed the prison into a public forum. The Court analogized a prison to a military base, stating that a "prison may be no more easily converted into a public forum than a military base," and found that prison officials could treat the union differently from other organizations such, as the Jaycees and Alcoholics Anonymous, for meetings and for bulk mailing purposes, because the union had "the avowed intent to pursue an adversary relationship with the prison officials," and its chartered purpose was illegal under state law. The Court concluded that "[t]here is nothing in the Constitution which requires prison officials to treat all inmate groups alike where differentiation is necessary to avoid an imminent threat of institutional disruption or violence."[892]

e. Public Libraries

[I322] Brown v. Louisiana held that the First Amendment protected the use of a public library as a site for a silent and peaceful protest by five young black men against discrimination. There was no finding by the Court that the library was a public forum. Nevertheless, the Court pointed out that state regulation of libraries and other public facilities must be reasonable and non-discriminatory, and may not be used as a pretext for punishing those who exercise their constitutional rights.[893]

[I323] Internet access in public libraries is neither a "traditional" nor a "designated" public forum. First, this resource did not exist until quite recently. Second, "[a] public library does not acquire Internet terminals in order to create a public forum for Web publishers to express themselves, any more than it collects books in order to provide a

---

890 United States v. Albertini, 472 U.S. 675, 686–89 (1985).

891 See Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 121, n.49 (1972), discussing Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 41–42 (1966).

892 Jones v. N. Carolina Prisoners' Union, 433 U.S. 119, 132–36 (1977).

893 Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131, 143 (1966).

public forum for the authors of books to speak. It provides Internet access, not to 'encourage a diversity of views from private speakers,' . . . but for the same reasons it offers other library resources: to facilitate research, learning, and recreational pursuits by furnishing materials of requisite and appropriate quality."[894]

f. Airport Terminals

[I324] Jews for Jesus struck down a resolution banning all "First Amendment activities" within the Central Terminal Area at Los Angeles International Airport. The resolution "reache[d] the universe of expressive activity . . . [and did] not merely regulate expressive activity in the Central Terminal Area that might create problems such as congestion or the disruption of the activities of those who used [the airport.] . . . [I]t prohibit[ed] even talking and reading, or the wearing of campaign buttons or symbolic clothing. Under such a sweeping ban, virtually every individual who enter[ed the airport] might be found to violate the resolution by engaging in some 'First Amendment activit[y].'" The Court thought it obvious that, even if the airport were a non-public forum, "no conceivable governmental interest would justify such an absolute prohibition of speech."[895]

[I325] International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee involved a regulation forbidding, inter alia, the repetitive solicitation of money within the terminal buildings of the three major airports in the New York City area. The Court held that an airport terminal operated by a public authority is a non-public forum, and thus a ban on solicitation need only satisfy a reasonableness standard. "Reflecting the general growth of the air travel industry, airport terminals have only recently achieved their contemporary size and character. . . . Moreover, even within the rather short history of air transport, it is only in recent years that it has become a common practice for various religious and non-profit organizations to use commercial airports as a forum for the distribution of literature, the solicitation of funds, the proselytizing of new members, and other similar activities. . . . Thus, the tradition of airport activity does not demonstrate that airports have historically been made available for speech activity." Nor had the particular New York terminals "been intentionally opened by their operators to such activity."[896] Moreover, the argument that speech activities historically occurred at "transportation nodes," such as rail and bus stations, wharves, and Ellis Island, was of little import for two reasons. First, many of these sites traditionally have had private ownership. Second, "the relevant unit for [the Court's] inquiry [wa]s an airport, not 'transportation nodes' generally." As the Court stressed, "[w]hen new methods of transportation develop, new methods for accommodating that transportation are also likely to be needed. And with

---

[894] United States v. Am. Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. 194, 206 (2003).

[895] Bd. of Airport Comm'rs of Los Angeles v. Jews for Jesus, Inc., 482 U.S. 569, 574–75 (1987). Additionally, the Court found no apparent saving construction of the resolution. The suggestion that the resolution was not substantially overbroad because it was intended to reach only expressive activity unrelated to airport-related purposes was unpersuasive. "Much nondisruptive speech . . . may not be 'airport related,' but is still protected speech even in a nonpublic forum." Moreover, the vagueness of the suggested construction—which would result in giving airport officials the power to decide in the first instance whether a given activity was airport-related—presented serious constitutional difficulty. Id. at 575–76.

[896] Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 680 (1992).

each new step, it therefore will be a new inquiry whether the transportation necessities are compatible with various kinds of expressive activity. To make a category of 'transportation nodes,' therefore, would unjustifiably elide what may prove to be critical differences of which the courts should rightfully take account. The 'security magnet' for example, is an airport commonplace that lacks a counterpart in bus terminals and train stations. . . . To blithely equate airports with other transportation centers, therefore, would be a mistake."[897] Further, the Court held that the challenged ban on solicitation was reasonable. "'Solicitation requires action by those who would respond: the individual solicited must decide whether or not to contribute (which itself might involve reading the solicitor's literature or hearing his pitch), and then, having decided to do so, reach for a wallet, search it for money, write a check, or produce a credit card.' . . . Passengers who wish to avoid the solicitor may have to alter their path, slowing both themselves and those around them. The result is that the normal flow of traffic is impeded. . . . This is especially so in an airport, where air travelers, who are often weighted down by cumbersome baggage may be hurrying to catch a plane or to arrange ground transportation. . . . Delays may be particularly costly in this setting, as a flight missed by only a few minutes can result in hours' worth of subsequent inconvenience."[898] "In addition, face-to-face solicitation presents risks of duress that are an appropriate target of regulation. The skillful, and unprincipled, solicitor can target the most vulnerable, including those accompanying children or those suffering physical impairment and who cannot easily avoid the solicitation. . . . The unsavory solicitor can also commit fraud through concealment of his affiliation or through deliberate efforts to shortchange those who agree to purchase. . . . Compounding this problem is the fact that, in an airport, the targets of such activity frequently are on tight schedules. This in turn makes such visitors unlikely to stop and formally complain to airport authorities. As a result, the airport faces considerable difficulty in achieving its legitimate interest in monitoring solicitation activity to assure that travelers are not interfered with unduly."[899] The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey had decided that its interest in monitoring such activities could best be accomplished by limiting solicitation and distribution to the sidewalk areas outside the terminals. "Thus the resulting access of those who would solicit the general public [wa]s quite complete." The Court concluded that "[t]he inconveniences to passengers and the burdens on Port Authority officials flowing from solicitation activity [might] seem small, but, viewed against the fact that pedestrian congestion is one of the greatest problems facing the three [New York] terminals, . . . the Port Authority could reasonably worry that even such incremental effects would prove quite disruptive."[900]

[I326] The companion case, Lee v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, invalidated the leafletting ban in the interior of New York airport terminals. Justice O'Connor held that the regulation banning the "continuous or repetitive distribution of printed or written material" could not be upheld as reasonable on the record of the case. As O'Connor noted, "leafletting does not entail the same kinds of problems presented by face-to-face solicitation. Specifically, 'one need not ponder the contents of a leaflet or pamphlet in order mechanically to take it out of someone's hand. The distribution of

[897] Id. at 681–82.
[898] Id. at 683–84.
[899] Id. at 684.
[900] Id. at 685.

literature does not require that the recipient stop in order to receive the message the speaker wishes to convey; instead the recipient is free to read the message at a later time.'"[901] Moreover, the Port Authority had not offered any justifications or record evidence to support its ban on the distribution of pamphlets alone. Relatedly, Justice O"Connor pointed out that it was still open for the Port Authority to promulgate regulations of the time, place, and manner of leafletting. For example such activity could restricted to a "relatively uncongested part of the airport terminals."[902] For similar reasons, four other members of the Court, who held that the airport terminals are public fora, had no difficulty deciding that the regulation could not survive strict scrutiny, since it was not drawn in narrow terms, and it did not leave open ample alternative channels for communication.[903]

g. Property Owned or Controlled by the U.S. Postal Service

i. Mail Boxes—Mail Regulations[904]

[I327] The Constitution provides Congress the power "To establish Post Offices and post Roads" and "To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper" for executing this task (Article I, Section 8). This provision authorizes "not merely the designation of the routes over which the mail shall be carried, and the offices where letters and other documents shall be received to be distributed or forwarded, but the carriage of the mail, and all measures necessary to secure its safe and speedy transit, and the prompt delivery of its contents. . . . [The postal power of Congress includes] [t]he right to designate what shall be carried[, which] necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded."[905] However broad this power may be, it may not, nevertheless, be exercised by Congress in a manner that abridges the freedom of speech or of the press protected by the First Amendment.[906] "The United States may give up the post office when it sees fit, but, while it carries it on, the use of the mails is [a] part of free speech."[907]

[I328] In Greenburgh, the Court sustained a federal statute making it unlawful for persons to deposit unstamped "mailable matter" in a letterbox approved by the U.S. Postal Service as an "authorized depository" of the mail. "[W]hen a letterbox is so designated, it becomes an essential part of the Postal Service's nationwide system for the delivery and receipt of mail. In effect, the postal customer, although he pays for the physical components of the 'authorized depository,' agrees to abide by the Postal Service's regulations in exchange for the Postal Service agreeing to deliver and pick up his mail. "The Court held that "a letterbox, once designated an 'authorized depository,' does not at the same time undergo a transformation into a 'public forum' of some limited nature

---

901 Lee v. Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, 505 U.S. 830 (1992) (per curiam), in conjunction with Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 690 (1992), quoting United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 734 (1990) (plurality opinion).

902 Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 692 (1992).

903 Id. at 703.

904 See also paras. G37, G111, G154 (search of mail); para. I25 (prior restraints); paras. I125, I 136 (ban on the distribution of obscene materials or child pornography through the mails); para. I180 (prohibition on the mailing of unsolicited advertisements for contraceptives).

905 Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727, 732 (1878).

906 United States Postal Serv. v. Greenburgh Civic Ass'ns, 453 U.S. 114, 126 (1981).

907 Lamont v. Postmaster Gen., 381 U.S. 301, 305 (1965).

to which the First Amendment guarantees access to all comers," noting that the government "has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated." Moreover, the prohibition at issue was reasonable, for it "protect[ed] mail revenues while at the same time facilitating the secure and efficient delivery of the mails."[908]

[I329] "Use of the postal power to regulate material that is not fraudulent or obscene raises grave constitutional questions."[909] Hannegan involved a statute providing that, in order to be admitted as second class mail, a publication "must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts." The Court held that, under the foregoing provision, the Postmaster General could not deny subsidies to certain periodicals on the ground that they were "morally improper and not for the public welfare and the public good." The provision should be taken as establishing standards that related "to the format of the publication and to the nature of its contents, but not to their quality, worth, or value."[910]

[I330] In Lamont, the Court held that a statute permitting the government to hold "communist political propaganda" arriving in the mails from abroad, unless the addressee affirmatively requested in writing that it be delivered to him, placed an unjustifiable burden on the addressee's First Amendment right. This requirement was "almost certain to have a deterrent effect, especially with respect to those who ha[d] sensitive positions. . . . Public officials like schoolteachers who ha[d] no tenure might think they would invite disaster if they read what the Federal Government [said] contain[ed] the seeds of treason. Apart from them, any addressee [wa]s likely to feel some inhibition in sending for literature which federal officials ha[d] condemned as 'communist political propaganda.'" [Such a] regime is at war with the uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate and discussion that are contemplated by the First Amendment."[911] By contrast, when an agent of a foreign principal in the United States mails any "political propaganda," a statutory term defined in a broad and neutral, rather than pejorative, manner as including misleading advocacy, as well as advocacy materials that are completely accurate and merit the closest attention and the highest respect, he may be required to make certain disclosures, regarding the source of such materials, which would better enable the public to evaluate the import of the propaganda.[912]

[I331] Given the right of every person "to be let alone," a vendor does not have a constitutional right to send unwanted material into someone's home, and "a mailer's right to communicate must stop at the mailbox of an unreceptive addressee." Thus, in Rowan, a unanimous Court upheld the statutory right of a homeowner to direct the local post office to stop delivery of unwanted materials that the householder viewed as "erotically arousing or sexually provocative."[913]

[I332] In Consolidated Edison, the Court invalidated a state order prohibiting a privately owned utility company from discussing controversial political issues in its billing

---

908 United States Postal Serv. v. Council of Greenburgh Civic Ass'ns, 453 U.S. 114, 128–30 (1981).

909 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Pacifica Found., 438 U.S. 726, 741, n.17 (1978).

910 Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146, 153–58 (1946).

911 Lamont v. Postmaster Gen., 381 U.S. 301, 307 (1965).

912 Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 477–81 (1987).

913 Rowan v. United States Post Office Dep't, 397 U.S. 728, 736–38 (1970).

envelopes. The order was content-based, since it prohibited public discussion of an entire topic. Further, it was not a narrowly drawn means of serving a compelling state interest. The prohibition could not be justified as being necessary to avoid forcing the company's views on a captive audience, since customers might escape exposure to objectionable material simply by throwing the bill insert into a wastebasket. Nor was the prohibition warranted as being necessary to allocate, in the public interest, the limited space in the billing envelope, there being nothing in the record to show that the bill inserts at issue would preclude the inclusion of other inserts that the utility company might be ordered lawfully to include in the billing envelope. Finally, the prohibition was not necessary to ensure that ratepayers did not subsidize the cost of the bill inserts, since there was no basis on the record to assume that the state could not exclude the cost of the inserts from the utility's rate base.[914]

ii. Postal Sidewalks

[I333] In Kokinda, the Court upheld a regulation banning solicitation on a sidewalk near the entrance to a U.S. Post Office. The sidewalk was the sole means by which customers might travel from the parking lot to the post office building and lay entirely on Postal Service property. A four-Justice plurality decided that the postal sidewalk was a non-public forum. The sidewalk at issue did not have the characteristics of public sidewalks traditionally open to expressive activity. It was not a public passageway; rather, it led only from the parking area to the front door of the post office. Thus, it had been "constructed solely to provide for the passage of individuals engaged in postal business." Nor had the Postal Service "expressly dedicated its sidewalk to any expressive activity." No postal service regulation opened postal sidewalks to any First Amendment activity. Although individuals or groups had been permitted to leaflet, speak, and picket on postal premises, "a regulation prohibiting disruption . . . and a practice of allowing some speech activities on postal property do not add up to the dedication of such property to speech activities, [since] '[t]he government does not create a public forum by . . . permitting limited discourse, but only by intentionally opening a nontraditional forum for public discourse.'"[915] Further, it was not unreasonable for the Postal Service to prohibit solicitation on the ground that it was disruptive of business. "Solicitation impedes the normal flow of traffic. . . . Solicitors can achieve their goal only by stopping a passerby momentarily or for longer periods as money is given or exchanged for literature or other items."[916] Moreover, the categorical ban of solicitation on postal premises was based on the Postal Service's long, real-world experience, which showed that, because of continual demands from a wide variety of groups, administering a program of permits and approvals had distracted postal facility managers from their primary jobs. In short, the Postal Service reasonably "prohibited the use of its property and resources where the intrusion create[d] significant interference with Congress' mandate to ensure the most effective and efficient distribution of the mails."[917]

---

914 Consol. Edison Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530, 537–43 (1980).

915 United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720, 730 (1990) (plurality opinion), quoting Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 802 (1985).

916 Id. at 733–34.

917 Id. at 735. Justice Kennedy, agreed that the regulation did not violate the First Amendment, but he concluded that it was unnecessary to determine whether the sidewalk was a non-public forum, since the regulation met the traditional standards applied to time, place, and manner restrictions of protected expression. Id. at 737–39.

h. School Newspaper—School Facilities [918]

[I334] "The public schools do not possess all of the attributes of streets, parks, and other traditional public for[a] that 'time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions.' . . . Hence, school facilities may be deemed to be public for[a] only if school authorities have 'by policy or by practice' opened those facilities 'for indiscriminate use by the general public,' or by some segment of the public, such as student organizations. . . . If the facilities have instead been reserved for other intended purposes, communicative or otherwise, then no public forum has been created, and school officials may impose reasonable restrictions on the speech of students, teachers, and other members of the school community."[919] In light of these considerations, Hazelwood held that a school-sponsored newspaper, the production of which was part of the educational curriculum and a regular classroom activity under the journalism teacher's control as to almost every aspect of publication, did not constitute a public forum, since the school officials did not evince any intent to open the paper's pages to indiscriminate use by its student reporters and editors or by the student body generally. Instead, they reserved the forum for its intended purpose, "as a supervised learning experience for journalism students." Accordingly, "school officials were entitled to regulate the [paper's] contents in any reasonable manner."[920]

i. School's Internal Mail System

[I335] In Perry, the Court upheld a school board's contractual agreement allowing the union representing its teachers to make use of the school mail system in connection with the discharge of the union's exclusive representative duties without providing equal access to rival unions. The school mailboxes and inter-school delivery system were not open for use by the general public. Permission to use the system to communicate with teachers should be secured from the individual building principal. There was no evidence in the record demonstrating that this permission was granted as a matter of course to all who sought to distribute material. The schools did allow some outside organizations such as the YMCA, Cub Scouts, and other civic and church organizations, to use the facilities. However, this type of selective access does not transform government property into a public forum. In light of these considerations, the Court held that the school district's internal mail system was a non-public forum. Further, the preferential treatment of the union that represented the district's teachers was justified by reference to the collective bargaining process. And exclusion of rival unions could "reasonably be considered a means of insuring labor peace within the schools. The policy served to prevent the District's schools from becoming a battlefield for inter-union squabbles." Finally, the reasonableness of the limitations on a rival union's access to the school mail system was also supported by the substantial alternative channels that remained open for union-teacher communication to take place. These means ranged "from bulletin boards to meeting facilities to the United States mail." Moreover, under [918] See also paras. H127 et seq. (religious speech).

---

[919] Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 267 (1988).

[920] Id. at 270.

state law, a rival teacher group was assured of equal access to all modes of communication while a representation election was in progress.[921]

j. School Administration Meetings

[I336] Knight involved a statute granting state employees, such as college faculty, the right to "meet and confer" with their employers on matters related to employment that were outside the scope of mandatory bargaining. However, if state employees forming an appropriate bargaining unit selected an exclusive representative for mandatory bargaining, their employer could "meet and confer" on non-mandatory subjects only with that representative. Twenty Minnesota community college faculty instructors challenged the constitutionality of the latter provision. Appellees' principal claim was that they had a right to force officers of the state, acting in an official policy-making capacity, to listen to them in this particular formal setting. The Court rejected the claim. It held that a "meet and confer" session was not a public forum, noting that "college administration meetings convened to obtain faculty advice on policy questions have neither by long tradition nor by government designation been open for general public participation." Moreover, the non-public-forum analysis was largely irrelevant to assessing appellees' constitutional claim, since the non-public-forum cases "concern government's authority to provide assistance to certain persons in communicating with other persons who would not, as listeners, be acting for the government." Further, the Court stressed that "[t]he Constitution does not grant to members of the public generally or to any specially affected class of citizens a right to be heard by public bodies making decisions of policy." Finally the Court found that appellees' exclusion from "meet and confer" sessions did not deny them equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, for "[t]he State has a legitimate interest in ensuring that its public employers hear one, and only one, voice presenting the majority view of its professional employees on employment-related policy questions," and permitting selection of "meet and confer" representatives to be made by the exclusive representative is a rational means of serving that interest.[922]

[I337] The rights at issue in Knight were wholly unlike those at stake in Madison, where the Court held that a public forum for citizen involvement had been created by a state statute providing for open school board meetings. There, the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission had ordered a school board to prohibit school employees, other than union representatives, from speaking at its meetings on matters subject to collective bargaining between the board and the union. While recognizing the power of a state to limit school board meetings to certain subject matter, the Court held it could not confine the forum "to one category of interested individuals." The Court concluded that, "[w]hatever its duties as an employer, when a school board sits in public meetings to conduct public business and hear the views of citizens, it may not be required to discriminate between speakers on the basis of their employment, or the content of their speech."[923]

---

[921] Perry Educ. Ass'n v. Perry Local Educators' Ass'n, 460 U.S. 37, 47–53 (1983).

[922] Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 280–83, 291 (1984).

[923] Madison Joint Sch. Dist. No. 8 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Comm'n, 429 U.S. 167, 174–76, n.6 (1976).

k. Charity Drive in the Federal Workplace

[I338] In Cornelius, the Court held the Combined Federal Campaign (CFC), a charity drive aimed at federal employees, was not a designated public forum, principally because "[t]he Government's consistent policy ha[d] been to limit participation in the CFC to 'appropriate' [i.e., charitable, rather than political] voluntary agencies and to require agencies seeking admission to obtain permission from federal and local [CFC] officials." In addition, the historical background of the FCC indicated that the Campaign was designed to minimize the disruption to the workplace that had resulted from unlimited ad hoc solicitation activities by lessening the amount of expressive activity occurring on federal property. "In light of the Government policy in creating the CFC and its practice in limiting access," the Court found that the CFC was a non-public forum.[924] The Court then held government's reasons for excluding the "National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—Legal Defense and Educational Fund Inc." from the CFC satisfied the reasonableness standard. The government "could reasonably conclude that a dollar directly spent on providing food and shelter to the needy is more beneficial than a dollar spent on litigation that might or might not result in aid to the needy. Moreover, avoiding the appearance of political favoritism is a valid justification for limiting speech in a non-public forum."[925] And the record supported the position that respondents' participation in the CFC would be detrimental to the CFC and disruptive of the federal workplace. The Court concluded that "[t]he First Amendment does not forbid a viewpoint-neutral exclusion of speakers who would disrupt a non-public forum and hinder its effectiveness for its intended purpose."[926]

l. Public Fairgrounds

[I339] A state fair is "a limited public forum, in that it exists to provide a means for a great number of exhibitors temporarily to present their products or views, be they commercial, religious, or political, to a large number of people in an efficient fashion."[927] "[T]here are significant differences between a street and state fairgrounds. A street is continually open, often uncongested, and constitutes not only a necessary conduit in the daily affairs of a locality's citizens, but also a place where people may enjoy the open air or the company of friends and neighbors in a relaxed environment. A state fair is a temporary event attracting great numbers of visitors who come to the event for a short period to see and experience the host of exhibits and attractions at the fair. The flow of the crowd and demands of safety are more pressing in the context of the fair."[928] Considering that "a State's interest in protecting the 'safety and convenience' of persons using a public forum is a valid governmental objective,"[929] Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) upheld a regulation prohibiting the sale or distribution on the state fairgrounds of any merchandise, including printed or written material, except from fixed locations (in that case, booths), because that served "the

---

924 Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 804–06 (1985) (four-to-three decision).

925 Id. at 809.

926 Id. at 811.

927 Heffron v. Int'l Soc'y for Krishna Consciousness, 452 U.S. 640, 655 (1981).

928 Id. at 651.

929 Id. at 650.

State's interest in avoiding congestion and maintaining the orderly movement of fair patrons on the fairgrounds."[930] In so holding, the Court noted that the justification for the regulation could not be measured solely on the basis of the disorder that would result from granting members of a particular religious group an exemption from the prohibition, for "church members do not have solicitation rights in a public forum superior to those of members of other religious groups or other social, political, or charitable organizations seeking to distribute information, sell wares, or solicit funds at a state fair." Hence, any such exemption could not be meaningfully limited to a particular religious group, and, as applied to similarly situated groups, would prevent the state from furthering its important concern with managing the flow of the crowd. Further, alternative fora for the expression of respondents' protected speech existed, since the regulation did not prevent ISKCON from distributing religious literature anywhere outside the fairgrounds, nor did it exclude ISKCON from the fairgrounds. Its members might mingle with the crowd and orally propagate their views, and ISKCON could also arrange for a booth and distribute and sell literature and solicit funds from that location on the fairgrounds. Hence, the regulation was a permissible restriction on the place and manner of ISKCON's distribution, sales, and solicitation activities.[931]

m. Advertising Space

i. Advertising on City Buses

[I340] Lehman upheld a city policy that permitted commercial advertising, but prohibited political advertising, on city buses. The evidence revealed that during the 26 years of public operation, the municipal transit system, pursuant to city council action, had not accepted or permitted any political or public issue advertising on its vehicles. A four-Justice plurality concluded that the advertising spaces in the city transit system was not a First Amendment forum, because "the city's use of the property as a commercial enterprise was inconsistent with an intent to designate the car cards as a public forum."[932] Further, the challenged city policy was reasonable, since it sought "to minimize chances of ause, the appearance of favoritism, and the risk of imposing upon a captive audience."[933]

ii. Advertising on Utility Poles

[I341] In Vincent, the Court approved a municipal prohibition on signs attached to utility poles. In doing so, it declined to apply "public forum" analysis. First, appellees failed to demonstrate the existence of a traditional right of access to utility poles for pur-

---

[930] Id. at 652.

[931] Id. at 652–55.

[932] See Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 804 (1985), discussing Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974).

[933] Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298, 304 (1974). Justice Douglas concurred in the judgment on the narrow ground that petitioner had no constitutional right to force his message upon a captive audience. Id. at 308. Four members of the Court dissented on the ground that since the city had created a forum for the dissemination of information and expression of ideas by accepting and displaying commercial and public service advertisements on its rapid transit vehicles, the city was barred by the First and Fourteenth Amendments from discriminating among forum users solely on the basis of message content. Id. at 310.

poses of their communication comparable to that recognized for public streets and parks. Further, the Court noted that lampposts can, of course, be used as signposts, but "the mere fact that government property can be used as a vehicle for communication does not mean that the Constitution requires such uses to be permitted." Given the city's legitimate interest in eliminating visual clatter, the viewpoint neutrality of the regulation in question, and the availability of alternative channels of communication, the prohibition was constitutional under the standard or review applicable to non-public fora.[934]

n. Government Funding of Expressive Activities

[I342] In Rosenberger, a student organization at the University of Virginia was denied funding from a Student Activity Fund (SAF) for printing expenses, because its publication, Wide Awake, offered a Christian viewpoint. The purpose of the SAF was to support a broad range of extracurricular student activities that were related to the educational purpose of the University. The class of its beneficiaries included "student news, information, opinion, entertainment, or academic communications media groups." The Court noted that the SAF was "a forum more in a metaphysical than in a spatial or geographic sense, but the same principles [we]re applicable."[935] Considering that speech discussing otherwise permissible subjects cannot be excluded from a limited public forum on the ground that the subject is discussed from a religious viewpoint, the Court held that the denial of funding was unconstitutional.[936]

[I343] In National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) v. Finley, the Court entertained a facial challenge to a content-based program of public arts funding. In doing so, the Court declined to apply "limited public forum" analysis in this specific context. "Although the scarcity of NEA funding d[id] not distinguish this case from Rosenberger, . . . the competitive process according to which the grants [we]re allocated d[id.]" The Court stressed that, "[i]n the context of arts funding, in contrast to many other subsidies, the Government does not indiscriminately encourage a diversity of views from private speakers. . . . The NEA's mandate [wa]s to make aesthetic judgments, and the inherently con-

---

[934] Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 814–15 (1984).

[935] Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 830 (1995).

[936] Id. at 829–32. The University feared that any association with a student newspaper advancing religious viewpoints would violate the Establishment Clause. The Court rejected the argument, holding that the school's adherence to a rule of viewpoint neutrality in administering its student fee program would prevent any mistaken impression that the student newspapers speak for the University. Id. at 841.

While Rosenberger was concerned with the rights a student has to use an extracurricular speech program already in place, Southworth considered the antecedent question whether a public university may require its students to pay a fee that creates the mechanism for the extracurricular speech in the first instance. There the Court held that, "[w]hen a university requires its students to pay fees to support the extracurricular speech of other students, all in the interest of open discussion, it may not prefer some viewpoints to others. . . . [V]iewpoint neutrality is the justification for requiring the student to pay the fee in the first instance, and for ensuring the integrity of the program's operation once the funds have been collected. [Hence, a state university] may sustain the extracurricular dimensions of its programs by using mandatory student fees with viewpoint neutrality as the operational principle." See Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Wisconsin Sys. v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 233–34 (2000).

tent-based 'excellence' threshold for NEA support se[t] it apart from the subsidy at issue in Rosenberger—which was available to all student organizations that were 'related to the educational purpose of the University' . . .—and from comparably objective decisions on allocating public benefits, such as access to a school auditorium or a municipal theater."[937] Subsequently, the Court held that the challenged provision, as long as it was applied on a viewpoint-neutral basis, did not violate the First Amendment.[938]

o. Broadcasting Stations

[I344] Claims of access to a broadcasting station under the "public forum" doctrine "could obstruct the legitimate purposes of television or radio broadcasters. Were the doctrine given sweeping application in this context, courts 'would be required to oversee far more of the day-to-day operations of broadcasters' conduct, deciding such questions as whether a particular individual or group has had sufficient opportunity to present its viewpoint and whether a particular viewpoint has already been sufficiently aired.' . . . 'The result would be a further erosion of the journalistic discretion of broadcasters,' transferring 'control over the treatment of public issues from the licensees who are accountable for broadcast performance to private individuals' who bring suit under [the forum cases.] . . . In effect, we would 'exchange public trustee broadcasting, with all its limitations, for a system of self-appointed editorial commentators.'"[939]

[I345] "This is not to say the First Amendment would bar the legislative imposition of neutral rules for access to public broadcasting. Instead, [the Court has said] that, in most cases, the First Amendment of its own force does not compel public broadcasters to allow third parties access to their programming. Although public forum principles do not generally apply to a public television station's editorial judgments regarding the private speech it presents to its viewers, candidate debates present the narrow exception to the rule. For two reasons, a candidate debate is different from other programming. First, unlike . . . other broadcasts, the debate [i]s by design a forum for political speech of the candidates. Consistent with the long tradition of such debates, the implicit representation of the broadcaster [i]s that the views expressed [a]re those of the candidates, not its own. The very purpose of the debate [i]s to allow the expression of those views with minimal intrusion by the broadcaster. . . . Second, . . . candidate debates are of exceptional significance in the electoral process. . . . Deliberation on the positions and qualifications of candidates is integral to [the democratic] system of government, and electoral speech may have its most profound and widespread impact when it is disseminated through televised debates."[940] The Court has held that a candidate debate is a non-public forum, when it does "not have an open microphone format," but the public broadcaster makes "candidate-by-candidate determinations as to which of the eligible candidates would participate in the debate." Indeed, "'[s]uch selective access, unsupported by evidence of a purposeful designation for public use, does not create a public forum.'"[941] Hence, a broadcaster's decision to exclude a candidate from a debate

---

937 Nat'l Endowment for Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 586 (1998).

938 Id. at 587.

939 Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 674–75 (1998), quoting Columbia Broad. Sys. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 124–25, 127 (1973).

940 Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666, 675–76 (1998).

941 Id. at 680, quoting Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985).

is consistent with the First Amendment, if it is a reasonable, viewpoint-neutral exercise of journalistic discretion. A general lack of public support for a candidate is a reasonable, viewpoint-neutral criterion for the exercise of journalistic discretion in the debate context.[942]

p. Camping in Parks

[I346] In Clark, the Court held that a National Park Service regulation prohibiting camping in certain parks did not violate the First Amendment when applied to prohibit demonstrators from sleeping in Lafayette Park and the Mall in Washington, D.C., in connection with a demonstration intended to call attention to the plight of the homeless. Assuming, arguendo, that sleeping can be expressive conduct, the Court concluded that the content-neutral regulation forbidding sleeping was defensible either as a time, place, or manner restriction or as a regulation of symbolic conduct, for it "narrowly focuse[d] on the Government's substantial interest in maintaining the parks in the heart of [the country's] Capital in an attractive and intact condition, readily available to the millions of people who wished to see and enjoy them by their presence. To permit camping—using these areas as living accommodations—would be totally inimical to these purposes."[943]

q. Anti-Noise Regulations

[I347] In Kovacs, "the Court rejected the notion that a city is powerless to protect its citizens from unwanted exposure to certain methods of expression which may legitimately be deemed a public nuisance. In upholding an ordinance that prohibited loud and raucous sound trucks, the Court held in that case that the state had a substantial interest in protecting its citizens from unwelcome noise."[944]

[I348] "[T]he nature of a place [and] the pattern of its normal activities" are important in reviewing the constitutionality of anti-noise regulations. Madsen held that protestors could be prohibited from using sound amplification equipment within 300 feet of the residences of an abortion clinic staff. In reaching this conclusion, the Court noted that the government might simply demand that picketers turn down the volume if the protests overwhelmed the neighborhood.[945]

[I349] Noise control is particularly important not only in residential areas but also around hospitals and medical facilities, where patients and their relatives "need a restful, uncluttered, relaxing, and helpful atmosphere." And the First Amendment "does not demand that patients at a medical facility undertake Herculean efforts to escape the cacophony of political protests." Hence, in response to high noise levels outside an abortion clinic, a state court may restrain protestors from "singing, chanting, whistling,

---

942 Id. at 682–83.

943 Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 296 (1984).

944 Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 805 (1984), discussing Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 87–89, 97–98 (1949). The Kovacs plurality also rejected a vagueness claim, noting that the words "loud and raucous," though abstract, "have through daily use acquired a content that conveys to any interested person a sufficiently accurate concept of what is forbidden." Id. at 79.

945 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 772, 774 (1994).

shouting, yelling, using bullhorns, auto horns, sound amplification equipment or other sounds . . . within earshot of the patients inside the clinic, during the hours of 7:30 a.m. through noon, on Mondays through Saturdays, during surgical procedures and recovery periods." Such restrictions burden no more speech than necessary to ensure the health and well-being of the patients at the clinic.[946]

[I350] "Noisy demonstrations that disrupt or are incompatible with normal school activities" may be prohibited.[947] An ordinance prohibiting a person, while on grounds adjacent to a building in which a school is in session, from willfully making a noise or diversion that disturbs or tends to disturb the peace or good order of the school session is not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad.[948]

[I351] Ward v. Rock Against Racism arose from a New York City's regulation that required the city to control the sound level of musical concerts in Central Park. More specifically the regulation required performers to use sound amplification equipment and a sound technician provided by the city. The city's justification was to make the performances satisfactory to the audience without intruding upon those who used the park or lived in its vicinity. This justification was content-neutral. Although "[a]ny governmental attempt to serve purely aesthetic goals by imposing subjective standards of acceptable sound mix on performers would raise serious First Amendment concerns," the city had "disclaimed in express terms any interest in imposing its own view of appropriate sound mix on performers. To the contrary [it] require[d] its sound technician to defer to the wishes of event sponsors concerning sound mix. . . . [T]he city's concern with sound quality extend[ed] only to the clearly content-neutral goals of ensuring adequate sound amplification and avoiding the volume problems associated with inadequate sound mix." Further, the regulation was narrowly tailored to serve significant governmental interests. The city had a substantial interest in protecting citizens from unwelcome noise. And it had a substantial interest in ensuring the sufficiency of sound amplification at musical events in order to allow citizens to enjoy the performances in the park. The city's substantial interests in limiting sound volume was "served in a direct and effective way by the requirement that its technician control the mixing board. . . . Absent this requirement, this interest would have been served less well, as [wa]s evidenced by the excessive noise complaints generated by . . . past concerts." Furthermore, in the absence of evidence that the guideline had a substantial deleterious effect on the ability of performers to achieve the quality of sound they desired, there was no merit to the allegation that the guideline was substantially broader than necessary to achieve the city's legitimate ends. Finally, the regulation left open ample alternative channels of communication, since it continued to permit musical concerts in the park and had "no effect on the quantity or content of that expression beyond regulating the extent of amplification." And "[t]hat the city's limitations on volume [might] reduce to some degree the potential audience for respondent's speech [wa]s of no consequence, for there ha[d] been no showing that the remaining avenues of communication [we]re inadequate." Subsequently, the Court held that the regulation was a reasonable regulation of the place and manner of protected speech.[949]

---

946 Id. at 772–73.

947 Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 120 (1972).

948 Id. at 107–21.

949 Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 792–93, 796–97, 800, 802–03 (1989). The Court also rejected the suggestion that the sound amplification regulation constituted a prior

r. Religious Speech on Public Property

[I352] The interest of the state in avoiding an Establishment Clause violation may be a compelling one, justifying a prohibition of religious speech in public fora.[950] Nevertheless, the Court has held, on various occasions, that permitting use of public property for religious purposes would not be incompatible with the Establishment Clause.[951]

D. PARTICULAR TYPES OF EXPRESSIVE CONDUCT

1. Assembly[952]

[I353] The right "peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances" is specifically protected by the First Amendment. "From the outset, the right of assembly was regarded not only as an independent right, but also as a catalyst to augment the free exercise of the other First Amendment rights with which it was deliberately linked by the draftsmen."[953] "The right of peaceable assembly is a right cognate to those of free speech and free press, and is equally fundamental."[954] "People assemble in public places not only to speak or to take action, but also to listen, observe, and learn; indeed, they may 'assembl[e] for any lawful purpose.'"[955]

[I354] As a matter of principle, the government has no power to restrict assembly activities, such as marching, parading, or picketing, because of their message. The Court's cases "make equally clear, however, that reasonable 'time, place and manner' regulations may be necessary to further significant governmental interests, and are permitted. For example, two parades cannot march on the same street simultaneously, and government may allow only one. . . . A demonstration or parade on a large street during rush hour might put an intolerable burden on the essential flow of traffic, and for that reason [may] be prohibited. . . . If over-amplified loudspeakers assault the citizenry, government may turn them down. . . . [And] where demonstrations turn violent, they lose their protected quality as expression under the First Amendment."[956]

[I355] Hague struck down a city ordinance that required a license from a local official for a public assembly on the streets or highways or in the public parks or public buildings. The official was empowered to refuse the permit if, in his opinion, the refusal would prevent "riots, disturbances or disorderly assemblage." The ordinance was void, on its face, because it could be made the instrument of arbitrary suppression of free restraint (see, in extenso, para. I17), and that it placed unbridled discretion in the hands of city officials charged with enforcing it.

---

950 See Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263, 271 (1981); Capitol Square Review and Advisory Bd. v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753, 760–62 (1995).

951 See, in extenso, paras. H127 et seq.

952 See also para. E72 ("void for vagueness" doctrine); paras. I301 et seq. (time, place, or manner restrictions); paras. I306 et seq. ("public forum" doctrine); paras. I18 et seq. (permit requirement); para. I111 (permit fee); paras. I101, I109 et seq. (unwelcome speech, hostile audiences); para. I120, n.333 (nazi demonstrations).

953 Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 577 (1980) (plurality opinion).

954 De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364 (1937).

955 Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 578 (1980) (plurality opinion), citing Hague v. Comm. for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 519 (1939) (opinion of Stone, J.).

956 Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 115–16 (1972).

expression of views on public affairs; "uncontrolled official suppression of the privilege [of peaceable assembly] cannot be made a substitute for the duty to maintain order in connection with the exercise of the right."[957] Similarly, Shuttlesworth invalidated a municipal ordinance that conferred upon a city commission the power to refuse a parade permit if it believed "the public welfare, peace, safety, health, decency, good order, morals or convenience" required that it be refused. The Court ruled that "a law subjecting the exercise of the freedom of assembly to the prior restraint of a license, without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide the licensing authority, is unconstitutional."[958]

[I356] "Peaceable assembly for lawful discussion cannot be made a crime. The holding of meetings for peaceable political action cannot be proscribed. Those who assist in the conduct of such meetings cannot be branded as criminals on that score. The question, if the rights of free speech and peaceable assembly are to be preserved, is not as to the auspices under which the meeting is held, but as to its purpose; not as to the relations of the speakers, but whether their utterances transcend the bounds of the freedom of speech which the Constitution protects. If the persons assembling have committed crimes elsewhere, if they have formed or are engaged in a conspiracy against the public peace and order, they may be prosecuted for their conspiracy or other violation of valid laws. But it is a different matter when the State, instead of prosecuting them for such offenses, seizes upon mere participation in a peaceable assembly and a lawful public discussion as the basis for a criminal charge." Under these considerations, De Jonge held that, on stipulated facts that the Communist Party advocated criminal syndicalism, a Communist addressing a Communist rally could be found guilty of no offense so long as no violence or crime was urged at the meeting.[959]

[I357] "[M]ere public intolerance or animosity cannot be the basis for abridgment" of the constitutional freedom of assembly.[960] Edwards v. South Carolina reversed the convictions of civil rights demonstrators who had assembled on the grounds of the South Carolina State House, an area of two city blocks not lawfully proscribed by state law. In reaching that conclusion, the Court held that the state could not define a criminal offense so as to permit conviction of the petitioners if their speech "stirred people to anger, invited public dispute, or brought about a condition of unrest."[961] Likewise, in Cox v. Louisiana, the Court ruled that a state could not infringe the right of free speech and free assembly by convicting demonstrators under a "disturbing the peace" ordinance where all that the students in that case did was to protest segregation and discrimination against blacks by peaceably assembling and marching to a courthouse where they sang, prayed, and listened to a speech urging a "sit in" at segregated lunch counters.[962]

---

957 Hague v. Comm. for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 516 (1939) (opinion of Roberts, J.).
958 Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, 150–51 (1969).
959 De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365–66 (1937).
960 Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611, 615 (1971).
961 Edwards v. S. Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 238 (1963).
962 Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 544–52 (1965).

2. Picketing

a. In General

[I358] Like so many other kinds of expression, picketing is "a mixture of conduct and communication."[963] "Picketing by an organized group is more than free speech, since it involves patrol of a particular locality and since the very presence of a picket line may induce action of one kind or another, quite irrespective of the nature of the ideas which are being disseminated. Hence, those aspects of picketing may make it the subject of restrictive regulation."[964]

b. Residences or Dwellings

[I359] In Carey v. Brown, the Court examined a state statute that generally barred picketing of residences or dwellings but exempted from its prohibition "the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute." Noting that public streets and sidewalks in residential neighborhoods are public fora, the Court concluded that the statute violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because it discriminated between lawful and unlawful conduct based on the content of the picketers' messages. That discrimination was impermissible, because it accorded preferential treatment to expression concerning one particular subject matter—labor disputes—while prohibiting discussion of all other issues. The Court recognized the state's interest in preserving privacy by prohibiting residential picketing, but this interest could not sustain the statute, for the challenged provision made "no attempt to distinguish among various sorts of nonlabor picketing on the basis of the harms they would inflict on the privacy interest," and, more fundamentally, "nothing in the content-based labor-nonlabor distinction ha[d] any bearing whatsoever on privacy."[965]

[I360] Frisby upheld a content-neutral municipal ordinance prohibiting picketing focused on, and taking place in front of, a particular residence. The ordinance served the significant government interest in the protection of residential privacy. As the Court stressed, "'[t]he State's interest in protecting the wellbeing, tranquility, and privacy of the home is certainly of the highest order in a free and civilized society.' . . . [And] [o]ne important aspect of residential privacy is protection of the unwilling listener."[966]

---

963 Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 580 (1988), quoting Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Retail Store Employees, 447 U.S. 607, 619 (1980) (concurring opinion of Stevens, J.).

964 Teamsters Union v. Vogt, 354 U.S. 284, 289 (1957), quoting Bakery and Pastry Drivers Local v. Wohl, 315 U.S. 769, 776–77 (1942) (concurring opinion of Douglas, J.). For example, in the labor context, it is the conduct element, rather than the particular idea being expressed, that "often provides the most persuasive deterrent to third persons about to enter a business establishment." See Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 580 (1988), quoting Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Retail Store Employees, 447 U.S. 607, 619 (1980) (concurring opinion of Stevens, J.).

965 Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 460–61, 465 (1980). Similarly, the state's interest in providing special protection for labor protests could not, without more, justify the labor picketing exemption, since labor picketing is no more deserving of First Amendment protection than are public protests over other issues. Id. at 466–67.

966 Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 484 (1988), quoting Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 471 (1980).

Moreover, the statute was narrowly tailored to serve that interest, since, although its ban was complete, it targeted and eliminated no more than the exact source of the "evil" it sought to remedy: offensive and disturbing picketing focused on a "captive" home audience. The ordinance also left open ample alternative channels of communication. Protestors could enter residential neighborhoods, alone or in groups, even marching; they might go door-to-door to proselytize their views or distribute literature; and they might contact residents through the mails or by telephone, short of harassment. The residential picketing ordinance, the Court concluded, permitted the more general dissemination of a message to the targeted audience.[967]

[I361] Madsen struck down a state court order that prohibited picketing or demonstrating within 300 feet of the residences of an abortion clinic staff. In so holding, the Court noted that the record of the case did not contain sufficient justification for this broad ban; it appeared that "a limitation on the time, duration of picketing, and number of pickets outside a smaller zone could have accomplished the desired result" of protecting residential privacy. By contrast, the Court upheld the portion of the injunction that prohibited picketers from using sound amplification equipment within 300 feet of the residences of clinic staff.[968]

c. Schools

[I362] Mosley arose out of a challenge to a Chicago ordinance that prohibited picketing in front of any school other than one "involved in a labor dispute." The Court held that this content-based ordinance violated the Equal Protection Clause, because it impermissibly distinguished between labor picketing and non-labor peaceful picketing, without any showing that the latter was "clearly more disruptive" than the former.[969] Moreover, Grayned upheld a statutory ban on willful making, on grounds adjacent to a school, of any noise disturbing the good order of the school session.[970]

d. Courthouses [971]

[I363] In Cox II, the Court held that persons could be constitutionally prohibited from picketing "in or near" a courthouse "with the intent of interfering with, obstructing, or impeding the administration of justice." In reaching this conclusion, the Court noted, inter alia, that "[a] State may adopt safeguards necessary and appropriate to assure that the administration of justice at all stages is free from outside control and influence."[972]

[I364] In Cameron, the Court upheld a statute prohibiting picketing "in such a manner as to obstruct or unreasonably interfere with free ingress or egress to and from any . . . county . . . courthouses." The Court concluded that the statute clearly and precisely delineated its reach in words of common understanding and was not impermissibly over-

---

967 Id. at 484–88.

968 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 774–75 (1994).

969 Police Dep't of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 100 (1972).

970 Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 107–21 (1972).

971 See also para. I316.

972 Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 562 (1965) (Cox II). The Court also found that the statutory provision at issue was not impermissibly vague (see para. E72).

broad, since prohibition of expressive conduct, which had the above effect, bore "no necessary relationship to the freedom to distribute information or opinion."[973]

e. Embasssies

[I365] In Boos, the Court considered the constitutionality of a District of Columbia law making it unlawful, within 500 feet of a foreign embassy, either to display any sign tending to bring the foreign government into "public odium" or "public disrepute" (display clause), or to congregate and refuse to obey a police dispersal order (congregation clause). The display clause was invalidated as facially violative of the First Amendment, since it was a content-based restriction on political speech in a public forum, which was not narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. Assuming, without deciding, that protecting the dignity of foreign diplomats by shielding them from speech critical of their governments was a "compelling" interest, for First Amendment purposes, the Court found that the ready availability of a significantly less restrictive alternative—18 U.S.C. Section 112, which subjected to criminal punishment willful acts or attempts to "intimidate, coerce, threaten, or harass a foreign official or an official guest or obstruct a foreign official in the performance of his duties"—demonstrated that the display clause was not sufficiently narrowly tailored to withstand exacting scrutiny. In so holding, the Court noted that it could rely on the judgment of Congress, "the body primarily responsible for implementing [international law] obligations," that Section 112 adequately satisfied the government's interest in protecting diplomatic personnel.[974] Further, the congregation clause, standing alone, was problematic both because it applied "to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason, and because it appear[ed] to place no limits at all on the dispersal authority of the police." These difficulties, however, had been alleviated by the court of appeals' narrowing construction that the clause permitted dispersal only of congregations that were directed at an embassy and only when the police reasonably believed that the embassy's "security or peace" was threatened. So narrowed, the congregation clause withstood First Amendment overbreadth scrutiny. It did "not reach a substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct; it merely regulate[d] the place and manner of certain demonstrations. . . . [It was] site-specific . . . [and did] not prohibit peaceful congregations." Nor was the clause, as narrowed, impermissibly vague simply because the court of appeals had not defined or limited the word "peace." Given the "particular context" for which the clause had been crafted, it was "apparent that the 'prohibited quantum of disturbance' [wa]s determined by whether normal embassy activities ha[d] been or [we]re about to be disrupted."[975]

f. Abortion Clinics—Health Care Facilities

[I366] Public streets and sidewalks around a clinic are traditional public fora. In Madsen, a Florida state court had issued a permanent injunction enjoining specified organizations and individuals from blocking or interfering with clinic access and from 973 Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 616–17 (1968).

---

974 Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 324–29 (1988).

975 Id. at 330–32.

physically abusing people entering or leaving the abortion clinic. Six months after the injunction issued, the court found that protesters still impeded access by demonstrating on the street and in the driveways, and that sidewalk counselors approached entering vehicles in an effort to hand literature to the occupants. In the face of this evidence, the court issued a broader injunction that enjoined the defendant protesters from "physically abusing, grabbing, intimidating, harassing, touching, pushing, shoving, crowding or assaulting" anyone entering or leaving the clinic; from "congregating, picketing, patrolling, demonstrating or entering that portion of public right-of-way or private property within 36 feet of the property line of the Clinic;" from approaching anyone "seeking the services of the Clinic who is within 300 feet of the clinic, unless the person indicates a desire to communicate;" and from making any noise or displaying any image that could be heard or seen inside the clinic. After determining that the injunction was not a prior restraint[976] and was content-neutral, the Court held that the proper test for evaluating content-neutral injunctions under the First Amendment was "whether the challenged provisions of the injunction burden no more speech than necessary to serve a significant government interest."[977] The Florida supreme court had concluded that the injunction was based on a number of governmental interests: protecting a woman's freedom to seek pregnancy-related services, ensuring public safety and order, promoting the free flow of traffic on streets and sidewalks, protecting property rights, and protecting the medical privacy of patients whose psychological and physical well-being were threatened as they were held "captive" by medical circumstance. The Court held that the combination of these interests was "quite sufficient to justify an appropriately tailored injunction" to protect unimpeded access to the clinic by way of public streets and sidewalks. Further, the Court found that some of the injunction's provisions burdened more speech than necessary to serve these interests, and that others did not. First, the Court upheld the 36-foot buffer zone as applied to the street, sidewalks, and driveways as a way of ensuring access to the clinic and the free flow of traffic. It explained that the trial court had few other options to protect access to the clinic: allowing protesters to remain on the sidewalks and in the clinic driveway was not a valid option because of their past conduct, and allowing them to stand in the street would obviously block vehicular traffic. Relatedly, it stated that, even under heightened review, "some deference must be given to the state court's familiarity with the facts and the background of the dispute between the parties." However, the inclusion of private property on the back and side of the clinic in the 36-foot buffer zone raised different concerns. "Absent evidence that petitioners standing on the private property ha[d] obstructed access to the clinic, blocked vehicular traffic, or otherwise unlawfully interfered with the clinic's operation, this portion of the buffer zone fail[ed] to serve the significant government interests relied on by the Florida Supreme Court." Moreover, the Court struck down the 300-foot no-approach zone around the clinic, stating that it was "difficult to justify a prohibition on all uninvited approaches, regardless of how peaceful the contact [might] be. . . . Absent evidence that the protesters' speech [wa]s independently proscribable (i.e., "fighting words" or threats), or [wa]s so infused with violence as to be indistinguishable from a threat of physical harm, this provision [could] not stand," since, as a general matter, in public debate, citizens must tolerate offensive speech. Similarly, the broad prohibition on all "images observable" by patients inside the clinic burdened more speech than necessary to achieve the purpose of "limiting threats to clinic patients or their families." And if this blanket ban "was intended to reduce the level of anxiety and hypertension suffered by the patients inside the clinic, it would still fail. The only plausible reason a patient would be bothered by 'images observable' inside the clinic would be if the patient found the expression contained in such images disagreeable. But it [wa]s much easier for the clinic to pull its curtains than for a patient to stop up her ears, and no more [wa]s required to avoid seeing placards through the windows of the clinic."[978] By contrast, the noise restrictions imposed by the state court order burdened no more speech than necessary to ensure the health and well-being of the patients at the clinic.[979]

976 See para. I30.
977 See para. I41.

[I367] Schenck, a case factually similar to Madsen, involved an injunction that banned "demonstrating within 15 feet . . . of . . . doorways or doorway entrances, parking lot entrances, driveways and driveway entrances of [abortion clinic] facilities ('fixed buffer zones'), or within 15 feet of any person or vehicle seeking access to or leaving such facilities ('floating buffer zones')". The Court upheld the fixed buffer zones, finding that they were "necessary to ensure that people and vehicles trying to enter or exit the clinic property or clinic parking lots [could] do so." As in Madsen, the record showed that protesters purposefully or effectively blocked or hindered people from entering and exiting the clinic doorways, from driving up to and away from clinic entrances, and from driving in and out of clinic parking lots. Based on this conduct the district court "was entitled to conclude that the only way to ensure access was to move back the demonstrations away from the driveways and parking lot entrances." Similarly, sidewalk counselors followed and crowded people right up to the doorways of the clinics (and sometimes beyond) and then tended to stay in the doorways, shouting at the individuals who had managed to get inside. In addition, defendants' harassment of the local police made it far from certain that the police would be able to quickly and effectively counteract protesters who blocked doorways or threatened the safety of entering patients and employees. For these reasons a prophylactic measure was appropriate. "Although one [might] quibble about whether 15 feet [wa]s too great or too small a distance if the goal [wa]s to ensure access, [the Court] defer[red] to the District Court's reasonable assessment of the number of feet necessary to keep the entrances clear."[980] By contrast, the floating buffer zones were struck down, because they burdened more speech than was necessary to serve the governmental interests identified in Madsen. Such zones around people prevented defendants—except for sidewalk counselors tolerated by the targeted individual—"from communicating a message from a normal conversational distance or handing out leaflets on the public sidewalks. This [wa]s a broad prohibition, both because of the type of speech restricted and the nature of the location. Leafletting and commenting on matters of public concern are classic forms of speech that lie at the heart of the First Amendment, and speech in public areas is at its most protected on public sidewalks." The Court held that the fact that this broad speech prohibition "floated" rendered it unsustainable on the record of the case. Protesters on the public sidewalks who wished to communicate their message to a targeted individual and to remain as close as possible (while maintaining an acceptable conversational distance) should move as the individual moved, maintaining 15 feet of separation. But this would be difficult to accomplish at, e.g., one of the respondent clinics that was bordered by a 978 Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 762–74 (1994).

979 See para. I349.

980 Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of W. New York, 519 U.S. 357, 380–82 (1997).

17-foot-wide sidewalk. This meant that protesters who wished to walk alongside an individual entering or leaving the clinic were pushed into the street, unless the individual walked a straight line on the outer edges of the sidewalk. Protesters could presumably walk 15 feet behind the individual, or 15 feet in front of the individual, while walking backwards. But then they would be faced with the problem of watching out for other individuals entering or leaving the clinic and heading the opposite way from the individual they had targeted. "With clinic escorts leaving the clinic to pick up incoming patients and entering the clinic to drop them off, it would be quite difficult for a protester who wishe[d] to engage in peaceful expressive activities to know how to remain in compliance with the injunction. This lack of certainty le[d] to a substantial risk that much more speech [would] be burdened than the injunction by its terms prohibit[ed.]" Likewise the Court struck down the floating buffer zones around vehicles. Nothing in the record contradicted "the common sense notion that a more limited injunction— . . . keep[ing] protesters away from driveways and parking lot entrances (as the fixed buffer zones d[id]) and off the streets, for instance—would be sufficient to ensure that drivers [would] not be confused about how to enter the clinic and [would] be able to gain access to its driveways and parking lots safely and easily. In contrast, the 15-foot floating buffer zones would restrict the speech of those who simply line[d] the sidewalk or curb in an effort to chant, shout, or hold signs peacefully."[981]

[I368] Hill v. Colorado sustained a state statute making it unlawful for any person within 100 feet of a health care facility's entrance to "knowingly approach" within eight feet of another person, without that person's consent, in order to pass "a leaflet or handbill to, display a sign to, or engage in oral protest, education, or counseling with [that] person." First, the Court noted that the state's interest in protecting its citizens' health and safety "may justify a special focus on unimpeded access to health care facilities and the avoidance of potential trauma to patients associated with confrontational protests. . . . Moreover, as with every exercise of a State's police powers, rules providing specific guidance to enforcement authorities serve the interest in evenhanded application of the law."[982] Also, the statute dealt not with restricting a speaker's right to address a willing audience, but with protecting listeners from unwanted communication. Further, the Court found that the challenged provision was a content-neutral time, place, and manner regulation. First, it was "a regulation of the places where some speech [might] occur, . . . not a regulation of speech." Second, as the state supreme court had held, the statute's restrictions applied equally to all demonstrators, regardless of viewpoint, and the statutory language made no reference to the content of the speech. Third, "the State's interests in protecting access and privacy, and providing the police with clear guidelines, [we]re unrelated to the content of the demonstrators' speech." In addition, the regulation was narrowly tailored to serve the state's significant and legitimate governmental interests, and it left open ample alternative communication channels. The three types of communication regulated by the statute were the display of signs, leafletting, and oral speech. "The 8-foot separation between the speaker and the audience should not have any adverse impact on the readers' ability to read signs displayed by demonstrators. In fact, the separation might actually aid the pedestrians' ability to see the signs by preventing others from surrounding them and impeding their view. [Besides,] the statute place[d] no limitations on the number, size, text, or images of the placards. And . . . the 8-foot zone d[id] not affect demonstrators with signs who remain[ed] in place." With respect to oral statements, "the distance certainly [could] make it more difficult for a speaker to be heard, particularly if the level of background noise [wa]s high and other speakers [we]re competing for the pedestrian's attention." Nevertheless, the statute did not suffer from the failings of the "floating buffer zone" rejected in Schenck, since the eight-foot zone allowed the speaker to communicate "at a normal conversational distance." Additionally, the statute allowed the speaker to remain in one place, and other individuals could pass within eight feet of the protester without causing the protester to violate the statute. Finally, there was a "knowing" requirement that protected speakers who thought they were keeping pace with the targeted individual at the proscribed distance from inadvertently violating the statute. The burden on the ability to distribute handbills was more serious because "it seem[ed] possible that an 8-foot interval could hinder the ability of a leafletter to deliver handbills to some unwilling recipients. The statute d[id] not, however, prevent a leafletter from simply standing near the path of oncoming pedestrians and proffering his or her material, which the pedestrians [could] easily accept." Hence, the Colorado statute adequately protected the right of leafletters to win the attention of passersby and to "reach the minds of willing listeners."[983]

---

981 Id. at 377–80.

982 Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 715 (2000).

g. Business Places—Labor Picketing

[I369] Government may not ban all picketing of places of lawful business.[984] A municipal ordinance making it unlawful for any person to carry or display any sign, banner, or badge in the vicinity of any place of business for the purpose of inducing others to refrain from buying or working there or for any person to picket in the vicinity of any place of business for such purpose is unconstitutional.[985] Nor may a court enjoin peaceful labor picketing, based on a state's common law policy against picketing when there is no immediate dispute between employer and employee.[986]

[I370] Nevertheless, a series of cases have established "a broad field in which a State, in enforcing a [valid economic or social] policy, whether of its criminal or its civil law, and whether announced by its legislature or its courts, c[an] constitutionally enjoin peaceful labor picketing aimed at preventing effectuation of that policy."[987] In Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice, a union, seeking to organize peddlers, picketed a wholesale dealer to induce it to refrain from selling to non-union peddlers. The state courts, finding that such an agreement would constitute a conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of the state anti-trust laws, enjoined the picketing. The Court affirmed unanimously, rejecting

---

983 Id. at 716, 719–20, 725–28. The Court also held that the statute was not impermissibly vague and overbroad. Id. at 730–33.

984 See Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 96–106 (1940).

985 Carlson v. California, 310 U.S. 106, 111–13 (1940).

986 Am. Fed'n of Labor v. Swing, 312 U.S. 321, 323–26 (1941). By contrast, a state may make it unlawful "for any person acting in concert with one or more other persons, to assemble at or near any place where a labor dispute exists and by force or violence prevent or attempt to prevent any person from engaging in any lawful vocation." See Cole v. Arkansas, 338 U.S. 345, 353–54 (1949) (emphasis added).

987 Am. Radio Ass'n v. Mobile S.S. Ass'n, 419 U.S. 215, 230 (1974), quoting Teamsters Union v. Vogt, 354 U.S. 284, 293 (1957).

the claim that the foregoing injunction was an unconstitutional abridgment of free speech, because the picketers were attempting peacefully to publicize truthful facts about a labor dispute. In so doing, the Court noted that the record of the case did "not permit this publicizing to be treated in isolation, [f]or . . . the sole immediate object of the publicizing adjacent to the premises of Empire, as well as the other activities of the appellants and their allies, was to compel Empire to agree to stop selling ice to nonunion peddlers. Thus, all ofappellants' activities . . . constituted a single and integrated course of conduct, which was in violation of Missouri's valid law." The Court therefore concluded that it was clear that appellants "were doing more than exercising a right of free speech or press. . . . They were exercising their economic power, together with that of their allies, to compel Empire to abide by union, rather than by state, regulation of trade."[988]

[I371] The following term, the Court decided a group of cases applying and elaborating on the theory of Giboney. In Hughes v. Superior Court, the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not bar a state court from using the injunction to prohibit picketing of a place of business, where the picketing was aimed solely at securing compliance with a demand that the employees of the enterprise concerned be hired in proportion to the racial origins of its customers. In so holding, the Court stated that it could not "construe the Due Process Clause as prohibiting California from securing respect for its policy against involuntary employment on racial lines by prohibiting systematic picketing that would subvert such policy." The Court also found it immaterial that the state policy had been expressed by the judiciary, rather than by the legislature.[989]

[I372] On the same day, the Court decided Teamsters Union v. Hanke, holding that a state was not restrained by the Fourteenth Amendment from enjoining picketing of a business, conducted by the owner himself without employees, in order to secure compliance with a demand to become a union shop. Although there was no one opinion for the Court, its decision was another instance of the affirmance of an injunction against picketing, because it directed against a valid public policy of the state.[990]

[I373] A third case, Building Service Employees v. Gazzam, was decided the same day. Following an unsuccessful attempt at unionization of a small hotel and refusal by the owner to sign a contract with the union as bargaining agent, the union began to picket the hotel with signs stating that the owner was unfair to organized labor. The state, finding that the object of the picketing was in violation of its statutory policy against employer coercion of employees' choice of bargaining representative, enjoined picketing for such purpose. The Court affirmed, noting that the unlawful objective of the picketing was an adequate basis for the decree in question.[991]

[I374] In Plumbers Union v. Graham, a state court had enjoined, as a violation of its "Right to Work" law, picketing that advertised that non-union men were being employed on a building job. The Court found that there was evidence in the record supporting a conclusion that a substantial purpose of the picketing was to put pressure on the general contractor to eliminate non-union men from the job, and held that the injunction

---

988 Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 497–98, 503 (1949).

989 Hughes v. Superior Court, 339 U.S. 460, 466 (1950).

990 Teamsters Union v. Hanke, 339 U.S. 470 (1950).

991 Bldg. Serv. Employees v. Gazzam, 339 U.S. 532, 539 (1950).

was not in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment.[992] Similarly, Teamsters Union v. Vogt held that, consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may enjoin peaceful picketing the purpose of which is to coerce an employer to put pressure on his employees to join a union in violation of the declared policy of the state.[993]

[I375] Under Retail Store Employees, Congress may constitutionally "prohibit secondary picketing calculated to persuade the customers of the secondary employer to cease trading with him in order to force him to cease dealing with, or to put pressure upon, the primary employer." The plurality reasoned that "[s]uch picketing spreads labor discord by coercing a neutral party to join the fray."[994]

[I376] In Mobile, a state court had issued an injunction against picketing of a foreign-flag ship by maritime unions that were protesting, as sub-standard, the wages paid the foreign crewmen who manned the ship. The Court held that the state could ban such "efforts by third parties to induce employees to cease performing services essential to the conduct of their employer's business." In reaching that conclusion, the Court indicated that the state policy against "wrongful interference" with respondents' businesses was "quite analogous to the federal policy of prohibiting secondary boycotts, and [wa]s based on similar considerations." Moreover, the state's policy appeared "to be based on the state interest in preserving its economy against the stagnation that could be produced by pickets' disruption of the businesses of employers with whom they ha[d] no primary dispute."[995]

3. Leafletting[996]

[I377] Pamphlets have proved most effective instruments in the dissemination of opinion. The freedom of speech and press embraces the right to distribute literature[997] and necessarily protects the right to receive it.[998] Hence, an ordinance forbidding the distribution of literature of any kind, without the written permission of a city official, is unconstitutional.[999] The privilege may not be withdrawn even in the interest of minimizing litter or in preventing fraud. As Schneider v. State explained, punishing those who actually litter or perpetrate frauds is an adequate and much less intrusive means to serve those significant interests.[1000]

---

992 Plumbers Union v. Graham, 345 U.S. 192, 193–201 (1953).

993 Teamsters Union v. Vogt, 354 U.S. 284, 294–95 (1957).

994 Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Retail Store Employees Union, 447 U.S. 607, 616 (1980), (plurality opinion); cf. id. at 617–18 (Blackmun, J., concurring); id. at 619 (Stevens, J., concurring).

995 Am. Radio Ass'n v. Mobile S.S. Ass'n, 419 U.S. 215, 230–31 (1974).

996 See also paras. I386 et seq. (door-to-door pamphleteering); para. I326 (leafleting in airport terminals); para. I368 (leafleting around health care facilities).

997 Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 452 (1938).

998 Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 143 (1943).

999 Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 450–52 (1938). The Court's opinion pointed out that the ordinance was not limited to literature that was obscene or offensive to public morals or that advocated unlawful conduct, placed no limit on the privilege of distribution in the interest of public order, was not aimed to prevent molestation of inhabitants or misuse or littering of streets, and was without limitation as to time or place of distribution. Id. at 451.

1000 Schneider v. State (Town of Irvington), 308 U.S. 147, 162, 164 (1939).

[I378] Yet the peace, good order, and safety of the community may require regulation of the time, place, and manner of distribution.[1001] "For example, a person may not exercise this liberty by taking his stand in the middle of a crowded street, contrary to traffic regulations, and maintain his position to the stoppage of all traffic; a group of distributors cannot not insist upon a constitutional right to form a cordon across the street and to allow no pedestrian to pass who do not accept a tendered leaflet; nor does the guarantee of freedom of speech or of the press deprive a municipality of power to enact regulations against throwing literature broadcast in the streets. Prohibition of such conduct would not abridge the constitutional liberty, since such activity bears no necessary relationship to the freedom to speak, write, print or distribute information or opinion."[1002] And no one supposes that "a city need permit a man with a communicable disease to distribute leaflets on the street or to homes, or that the First Amendment prohibits a state from preventing the distribution of leaflets in a church against the will of the church authorities."[1003]

4. Financial Solicitation[1004]

[I379] The First Amendment protects the right to engage in charitable solicitation. "[C]haritable appeals for funds involve a variety of speech interests—communication of information, the dissemination and propagation of views and ideas, and the advocacy of causes—that are within the protection of the First Amendment. Soliciting financial support is undoubtedly subject to reasonable regulation, but the latter must be undertaken with due regard for the reality that solicitation is characteristically intertwined with informative and perhaps persuasive speech seeking support for particular causes or for particular views on economic, political, or social issues, and for the reality that, without solicitation, the flow of such information and advocacy would likely cease. . . . Furthermore, because charitable solicitation does more than inform private economic decisions and is not primarily concerned with providing information about the characteristics and costs of goods and services, it has not been dealt with as a variety of purely commercial speech."[1005]

[I380] Cantwell struck down a state statute forbidding the solicitation of contributions of anything of value by religious, charitable, or philanthropic causes without obtaining official approval. As the Court recognized, "a State may protect its citizens from fraudulent solicitation by requiring a stranger in the community, before permitting him publicly to solicit funds for any purpose, to establish his identity and his authority to act for the cause which he purports to represent. The State is likewise free to regulate the time, place and manner of solicitation generally, in the interest of public safety, peace, comfort or convenience." However, the Court could not sustain a licensing system for reli-

---

[1001] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 304 (1940).

[1002] Schneider v. State (Town of Irvington), 308 U.S. 147, 160–61 (1939).

[1003] Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 143 (1943).

[1004] See also paras. I386 et seq. (door-to-door solicitation); para. I325 (ban on solicitation of funds in airport terminals); para. I333 (prohibition of solicitation on a postal sidewalk); para. I338 (exclusion from participation in an annual charitable fundraising drive conducted in the federal workplace); para. I502 (corporate solicitation of contributions to a segregated fund established for the purpose of contributing to candidates for public office); paras. I167 et seq. (solicitation of business).

[1005] Vill. of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 444 U.S. 620, 632 (1980).

gious and charitable solicitations under which the administrator had discretion to deny a license to any cause he deemed non-religious.[1006]

[I381] The Court has three times considered prophylactic statutes designed to combat fraud by imposing prior restraints on solicitation when fundraising fees exceeded a specified reasonable level. Each time, the Court held the prophylactic measures unconstitutional. In Schaumburg, the Court invalidated a village ordinance that prohibited charitable organizations from soliciting contributions unless they used at least 75 percent of their receipts directly for the charitable purpose of the organization. The ordinance defined "charitable purposes" to exclude salaries and commissions paid to solicitors, and the administrative expenses of the charity, including salaries. Because the percentage limitation restricted the ways in which charities might engage in solicitation activity, the Court concluded that it was a "direct and substantial limitation on protected activity that [could not] be sustained unless it serve[d] a sufficiently strong, subordinating interest that the Village [wa]s entitled to protect" and constituted a "narrowly drawn regulatio[n] designed to serve [such an] interes[t] without unnecessarily interfering with First Amendment freedoms."[1007] Although the Court recognized that the village had legitimate interests "in protecting the public from fraud, crime, and undue annoyance," it rejected the limitation because it was not a precisely tailored means of accommodating those interests. The village of Schaumburg's principal justification for the ordinance was fraud prevention. Any organization using more than 25 percent of its receipts on fundraising, salaries, and overhead, Schaumburg submitted, was not a charitable, but a commercial, for-profit enterprise; to permit such an organization to represent itself as a charity, the village urged, was fraudulent. The Court agreed with Schaumburg that fraud prevention ranks as a substantial governmental interest, but concluded that the 75-percent requirement promoted that interest "only peripherally." Spending more than 25 percent of an organization's receipts on fundraising, salaries, and overhead, the Court explained, does not reliably indicate that the enterprise is commercial rather than charitable. Such spending may be altogether appropriate for "organizations . . . primarily engaged in research, advocacy, or public education . . . that use their own paid staff to carry out these functions as well as to solicit financial support." Moreover, the village's legitimate interest in preventing fraud could be better served by measures less intrusive than a direct prohibition on solicitation. For instance, the village could punish fraud directly and could require disclosure of the finances of a charitable organization so that a member of the public could make an informed decision about whether to contribute. The Court also found little connection between the percentage limitation and the protection of public safety or residential privacy. Both goals were better furthered by provisions addressed directly to the asserted interest—such as a prohibition on the use of convicted felons as solicitors and a provision allowing homeowners to post signs barring solicitors from their property.[1008]

[I382] Four years later, in Munson, the Court invalidated a Maryland law that prohibited charitable organizations from soliciting if they paid or agreed to pay, as expenses, more than 25 percent of the amount raised. Unlike the inflexible ordinance in Schaumburg, the Maryland law authorized a waiver of the 25-percent limitation "where [it] would effectively prevent the charitable organization from raising contributions."

[1006] Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 306–07 (1940).

[1007] Vill. of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 444 U.S. 620, 636–37 (1980).

[1008] Id. at 636–39.

The Court held that the waiver provision did not save the statute. No reason other than financial necessity warranted a waiver. The statute provided no shelter for a charity that incurred high solicitation costs, because it chose to disseminate information as part of its fundraising. Nor did it shield a charity whose high solicitation costs stemmed from the unpopularity of its cause. The statute's fatal flaw was that "it operate[d] on the fundamentally mistaken premise that high solicitation costs are an accurate measure of fraud." The possibility of a waiver might decrease the number of impermissible applications of the statute, but it did nothing to remedy the statute's fundamental defect.[1009]

[I383] The North Carolina charitable solicitation controls at issue in Riley directly regulated professional fundraisers. North Carolina's law prohibited professional fundraisers from retaining an "unreasonable" or "excessive" fee. Fees up to 20 percent of the gross receipts collected were deemed reasonable; fees between 20 percent and 35 percent were deemed unreasonable if the state showed that the solicitation did not involve advocacy or dissemination of information. Fees exceeding 35 percent were presumed unreasonable, but the fundraiser could rebut the presumption by showing either that the solicitation involved advocacy or information dissemination, or that, absent the higher fee, the charity's ability to raise money or communicate would be significantly diminished. Relying on Schaumburg and Munson, the Court's decision in Riley invalidated North Carolina's endeavor to rein in charitable solicitors' fees. The Court stressed, once again, that "the solicitation of charitable contributions is protected speech, and that using percentages to decide the legality of the fundraiser's fee is not narrowly tailored to the State's interest in preventing fraud." Moreover, the Court noted that, "[e]ven if [it] agreed that some form of a percentage-based measure could be used, in part, to test for fraud, [it] could not agree to a measure that requires the speaker to prove 'reasonableness' case by case based upon what is at best a loose inference that the fee might be too high." Under the state statute in question, once a prima facie showing of unreasonableness was made, the fundraiser should rebut the showing. Proof that the solicitation involved the advocacy or dissemination of information was not alone sufficient; it was merely a factor added to the calculus submitted to the factfinder, who might still decide that the costs incurred or the fundraiser's profit were excessive. Similarly, the statute was "impermissibly insensitive to the realities faced by small or unpopular charities, which must often pay more than 35% of the gross receipts collected to the fundraiser due to the difficulty of attracting donors." Again, the burden was placed on the fundraiser in such cases to rebut the presumption of unreasonableness. Hence, fundraisers would "be faced with the knowledge that every campaign incurring fees in excess of 35%, and many campaigns with fees between 20% and 35%, [would] subject them to potential litigation over the 'reasonableness' of the fee. And, of course, in every such case, the fundraiser [should] bear the costs of litigation and the risk of a mistaken adverse finding by the factfinder, even if the fundraiser and the charity believe[d] that the fee [wa]s in fact fair. This scheme [would] necessarily chill speech in direct contravention of the First Amendment's dictates. . . . This chill and uncertainty might well drive professional fundraisers out of North Carolina, or at least encourage them to cease [1009] Sec'y of State of Maryland v. Joseph H. Munson Co., 467 U.S. 947, 963–68 (1984). The Court rejected the state's argument that restraints on the relationship between the charity and the fundraiser were mere "economic regulations" free of First Amendment implication. Rather, it viewed the law as "a direct restriction on the amount of money a charity can spend on fundraising activity" and, therefore, "a direct restriction on protected First Amendment activity." Id. at 967, and n.16.

engaging in certain types of fundraising (such as solicitations combined with the advocacy and dissemination of information) or representing certain charities (primarily small or unpopular ones), all of which [would] ultimately reduce the quantity of expression."[1010] The Riley Court also found that "the State's generalized interest in unilaterally imposing its notions of fairness on the fundraising contract [wa]s both constitutionally invalid and insufficiently related to a percentage-based test." The state's additional interest in regulating the fairness of the fee could rest on either of two positions: (1) that charitable organizations were economically unable to negotiate fair or reasonable contracts without governmental assistance; or (2) that charities were incapable of deciding for themselves the most effective way to exercise their First Amendment rights. The Court rejected the first argument, because it was based on the erroneous premise that the challenged provision was simply an economic regulation, with no First Amendment implication, and therefore should be tested only for rationality. The state's remaining justification was equally unsound. "'The very purpose of the First Amendment is to foreclose public authority from assuming a guardianship of the public mind through regulating the press, speech, and religion.' . . . To this end, the government, even with the purest of motives, may not substitute its judgment as to how best to speak for that of speakers and listeners; free and robust debate cannot thrive if directed by the government."[1011] The Court perceived no reason to engraft an exception to this settled rule for charities. In addition, there were several legitimate reasons why a charity might reject the state's overarching measure of a fundraising drive's legitimacy—the percentage of gross receipts remitted to the charity. "For example, a charity might choose a particular type of fundraising drive, or a particular solicitor, expecting to receive a large sum as measured by total dollars, rather than the percentage of dollars remitted. Or, a solicitation may be designed to sacrifice short-term gains in order to achieve long-term, collateral, or non-cash benefits. To illustrate, a charity may choose to engage in the advocacy or dissemination of information during a solicitation, or may seek the introduction of the charity's officers to the philanthropic community during a special event (e.g., an awards dinner). Consequently, even if the State had a valid interest in protecting charities from their own naivete or economic weakness, the statute would not be narrowly tailored to achieve it."[1012]

[I384] Riley presented a further issue. North Carolina law required professional fundraisers to disclose to potential donors, before asking for money, the percentage of the prior year's charitable contributions the fundraisers had actually turned over to charity. This provision was a content-based regulation, subject to exacting First Amendment scrutiny. The state defended this disclosure requirement as a proper means to dispel public misperception that the money donated were going in greater-than-actual proportion to benefit charity. However, the Court condemned the measure as an "unduly burdensome" prophylactic rule. The state's rule, Riley emphasized, presumed that "the charity derives no benefit from funds collected but not turned over to it. Yet this is not necessarily so. For example, . . . where the solicitation is combined with the advocacy and dissemination of information, the charity reaps a substantial benefit from the act of solicitation itself." Relatedly, the Court also noted that North Carolina required professional fundraisers to disclose their professional status. That disclosure effectively

---

[1010] Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of the Blind of N. Carolina, Inc., 487 U.S. 781, 789, 793–94 (1988).
[1011] Id. at 791, quoting Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 545 (1945) (Jackson, J., concurring).
[1012] Id. at. 791–92.

notified contributors that a portion of the money they donated would underwrite solicitation costs. A concerned donor could ask how much of the contribution would be turned over to the charity, and under North Carolina law, fundraisers would be obliged to provide that information. The compelled disclosure, thus, would "almost certainly hamper the legitimate efforts of professional fundraisers to raise money for the charities they represent. First, this provision necessarily discriminate[d] against small or unpopular charities, which must usually rely on professional fundraisers. Campaigns with high costs and expenses carried out by professional fundraisers must make unfavorable disclosures, with the predictable result that such solicitations will prove unsuccessful. . . . Second, in the context of a verbal solicitation, if the potential donor is unhappy with the disclosed percentage, the fundraiser will not likely be given a chance to explain the figure; the disclosure will be the last words spoken as the donor closes the door or hangs up the phone." However, "more benign and narrowly tailored options," which would not chill solicitation altogether, were available. For example, the Court suggested, the state might "itself publish the detailed financial disclosure forms it require[d] professional fundraisers to file," and it could "vigorously enforce its antifraud laws to prohibit professional fundraisers from obtaining money on false pretenses or by making false statements."[1013]

[I385] The Court's opinions in Schaumburg, Munson, and Riley took care to leave a corridor open for fraud actions to guard the public against false or misleading charitable solicitations. "In contrast to the prior restraints inspected in those cases, a properly tailored fraud action targeting specific fraudulent representations . . . falls on the constitutional side of the line between regulation aimed at fraud and regulation aimed at something else in the hope that it would sweep fraud in during the process. . . . Of prime importance, and in contrast to a prior restraint on solicitation, or a regulation that imposes on fundraisers an uphill burden to prove their conduct lawful, in a properly tailored fraud action the State bears the full burden of proof." A state statute under which, in order to prove a defendant liable for fraud, the complainant must show by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant knowingly made a false representation of a material fact, that such representation was made with the intent to mislead the listener, and that the representation succeeded in doing so, is consistent with the Constitution, since proof requirements of this order provide sufficient breathing room for protected speech. While the percentage of fundraising proceeds turned over to a charity is not an accurate measure of the amount of funds used "for" a charitable purpose, a fundraiser may be prohibited from attracting donations "by misleading potential donors into believing that a substantial portion of their contributions would fund specific programs or services, knowing full well that is not the case." Hence, a fundraiser, who is to retain 85 percent of the proceeds of his fundraising endeavors, may be held liable for defrauding members of the public by falsely representing that a "significant amount of each dollar donated will be paid over to a charitable nonprofit organization for its charitable purposes," while in fact the fundraiser knows that 15 cents or less of each dollar will be available for those purposes.[1014]

[1013] Id. at 795–800.

[1014] Illinois ex rel. Madigan v. Telemarketing Assocs., Inc., 538 U.S. 600, 619–22 (2003).

5. Door-to-Door Canvassing, Pamphleteering, and Soliciting

[I386] "While door-to-door distributors of literature may be either a nuisance or a blind for criminal activities, they may also be useful members of society engaged in the dissemination of ideas in accordance with the best tradition of free discussion. The widespread use of this method of communication by many groups espousing various causes attests its major importance. . . . [Many] religious organizations have used this method of disseminating their doctrines, and laboring groups have used it in recruiting their members. . . . [D]oor-to-door campaigning is one of the most accepted techniques of seeking popular support, while the circulation of nominating papers would be greatly handicapped if they could not be taken to the citizens in their homes. Door-to-door distribution of circulars is essential to the poorly financed causes of little people."[1015]

[I387] In Schneider v. State, a canvasser for a religious society, who passed out booklets from door to door and asked for contributions, was arrested and convicted under an ordinance that prohibited canvassing, soliciting, or distribution of circulars from house to house without a permit, the issuance of which rested much in the discretion of public officials. The state courts thought that the ordinance was valid as a protection against fraudulent solicitations. The Court disagreed, noting that the ordinance applied not only to religious canvassers but also to one who wished to present his views on political, social, or economic questions, and holding that the city could not, in the name of preventing fraudulent appeals, subject door-to-door advocacy and the communication of views to the discretionary permit requirement.[1016]

[I388] In Martin v. Struthers, a municipal ordinance that made it a crime for a solicitor or canvasser to knock on the front door of a resident's home, or ring the doorbell, was held invalid as applied to the free distribution of dodgers advertising a religious meeting. The Court recognized peaceful enjoyment of the home and crime prevention as legitimate interests served by the ordinance, noting that "burglars frequently pose as canvassers, either in order that they may have a pretense to discover whether a house is empty and hence ripe for burglary, or for the purpose of spying out the premises in order that they may return later." However, these justifications for the challenged prohibition were not deemed sufficient, since the city could punish those who called at a home after having been warned by the occupant to keep off, and, in addition, could, "by identification devices, control the abuse of the privilege by criminals posing as canvassers." Such a regulation would "respect the constitutional rights of those desiring to distribute literature and those desiring to receive it, as well as those . . . choos[ing] to exclude such distributors from the home."[1017]

[I389] Breard involved an ordinance making it criminal to enter premises without an invitation to sell goods, wares, and merchandise. The ordinance was sustained as applied to door-to-door solicitation of magazine subscriptions. In so holding, the Court noted that the sale of literature introduced "a commercial feature," that the householder's interest in privacy outweighed any rights of the publisher to distribute magazines by uninvited entry on private property, and that subscriptions might be made by anyone interested in receiving the magazines without the annoyances of house-to-house canvassing. Although Martin v. Struthers had struck down a similar ordinance as applied to

---

[1015] Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 145–46 (1943).

[1016] Schneider v. State (Town of Irvington), 308 U.S. 147, 163–64 (1939).

[1017] Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 144, 148–49 (1943).

the distribution of free religious literature, the Breard Court distinguished that case on the ground that the information distributed there was religious in nature, and that the distribution was non-commercial.[1018]

[I390] Hynes invalidated a city ordinance requiring advance notice to be given to the local police department by "[a]ny person (including representatives of Borough Civic Groups and Organizations) desiring to canvass, solicit or call from house to house . . . for a recognized charitable cause . . . or . . . political campaign or cause . . . in writing, for identification only." Based on its review of prior cases, the Court held that soliciting and canvassing from door to door were subject to reasonable regulation so as to protect the citizens against crime and "undue annoyance," but that the First Amendment required such controls to be drawn with "narrow specificity." The Court found it intolerably unclear what "Civic Groups and Organizations" were encompassed, what was meant by a "recognized charitable cause," and what was required by way of "identification." Further, "[t]o the extent that these ambiguities and the failure to explain what 'identification' [wa]s required [ga]ve police the effective power to grant or deny permission to canvass for political causes, the ordinance suffer[ed] in its practical effect from the vice condemned" in Schneider.[1019]

[I391] Watchtower Bible & Tract Society dealt with a village ordinance that, inter alia, prohibited "canvassers" from "going in and upon" private residential property to promote any "cause" without first obtaining a permit from the mayor's office by completing and signing a registration form. The Court admitted that the interests the ordinance assertedly served—the prevention of fraud and crime and the protection of residents' privacy—were "important and that the Village may seek to safeguard them through some form of regulation of solicitation activity. However, the amount of speech covered by the ordinance raised serious concerns. Had its provisions been construed to apply only to commercial activities and the solicitation of funds, arguably the ordinance would have been tailored to the Village's interest in protecting its residents' privacy and preventing fraud." Yet, the village's administration of its ordinance unquestionably demonstrated that it applied to a significant number of non-commercial "canvassers" promoting a wide variety of "causes," such as "Camp Fire Girls," "Political Candidates," "Jehovah's Witnesses," and "Persons Affiliated with Stratton Church." As the Court stressed, "[e]ven if the issuance of permits by the mayor's office is a ministerial task that is performed promptly and at no cost to the applicant, a law requiring a permit to engage in such speech constitutes a dramatic departure" from First Amendment principles. "Three obvious examples illustrate the pernicious effect of such a permit requirement. First, . . . there are a significant number of persons who support causes anonymously. 'The decision to favor anonymity may be motivated by fear of economic or official retaliation, by concern about social ostracism, or merely by a desire to preserve as much of one's privacy as possible.' . . . The requirement that a canvasser must be identified in a permit application filed in the mayor's office and available for public inspection necessarily results in a surrender of that anonymity. . . . [Such a requirement] may well be justified in some situations—for example, by the special state interest in protecting the integrity of a ballot-initiative process, or by the interest in preventing fraudulent commercial [1018] Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622, 642–45 (1951). This case was decided at a time when commercial advertisement was not constitutionally protected. Hence, it is doubtful if it is still good law.

---

[1019] Hynes v. Mayor of Oradell, 425 U.S. 610, 616–22 (1976).

transactions [—but may preclude circulators from canvassing for] unpopular causes unrelated to commercial transactions or to any special interest in protecting the electoral process."[1020] "Second, requiring a permit as a prior condition on the exercise of the right to speak imposes an objective burden on some speech of citizens holding religious or patriotic views. . . . [Indeed,] there are a significant number of persons whose religious scruples will prevent them from applying for such a license. There are no doubt other patriotic citizens, who have such firm convictions about their constitutional right to engage in uninhibited debate in the context of door to door advocacy, that they would prefer silence to speech licensed by a petty official."[1021] "Third, there is a significant amount of spontaneous speech that is effectively banned by such a permit scheme. A person who made a decision on a holiday or a weekend to take an active part in a political campaign could not begin to pass out handbills until after he or she obtained the required permit. Even a spontaneous decision to go across the street and urge a neighbor to vote against the mayor could not lawfully be implemented without first obtaining the mayor's permission."[1022] The breadth and unprecedented nature of the challenged regulation did not alone render the ordinance invalid. Also central to the Court's conclusion that the ordinance at issue did not pass First Amendment scrutiny was that it was not tailored to the village's stated interests. "Even if the interest in preventing fraud could adequately support the ordinance insofar as it applie[d] to commercial transactions and the solicitation of funds, that interest provide[d] no support for its application to Jehovah's Witnesses, to political campaigns, or to enlisting support for unpopular causes." The village's argument that the ordinance was nonetheless valid because it served the two additional interests of protecting residents' privacy and the prevention of crime was unpersuasive. As to the former, an unchallenged ordinance section authorizing residents to post "No Solicitation" signs, coupled with their unquestioned right to refuse to engage in conversation with unwelcome visitors, provided ample protection for unwilling listeners. As to the latter, it seemed "unlikely that the lack of a permit would preclude criminals from knocking on doors and engaging in conversations not covered by the ordinance," for example, by asking for directions or permission to use the telephone, or posing as surveyors, and, in any event, there was no evidence in the record of "a special crime problem related to door to door solicitation."[1023] Under these considerations, the Court held that the village regulation, as applied to religious proselytizing, anonymous political speech, and the distribution of handbills, transgressed the First Amendment.

6. Display of Signs[1024]

[I392] "While signs are a form of expression protected by the Free Speech Clause, they pose distinctive problems that are subject to municipalities' police powers. Unlike oral speech, signs take up space and may obstruct views, distract motorists, cause visual clutter, displace alternative uses for land, and pose other problems that legitimately call for regulation."[1025] "[The Court's] decisions identify two analytically distinct grounds

---

[1020] Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y of New York, v. Vill. of Stratton, 536 U.S. 150, 166–67 (2002).

[1021] Id. at 167.

[1022] Id.

[1023] Id. at 168–69.

[1024] See also para. I189 ("for sale" signs); para. I368 (display of signs near health care facilities).

[1025] City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 48 (1994).

for challenging the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance regulating the display of signs. One is that the measure in effect restricts too little speech because its exemptions discriminate on the basis of the signs' messages. . . . Alternatively, such provisions are subject to attack on the ground that they simply prohibit too much protected speech."[1026]

[I393] Metromedia involved a San Diego ordinance that imposed substantial prohibitions on the erection of outdoor advertising displays within the city. The stated purpose of the ordinance was "to eliminate hazards to pedestrians and motorists brought about by distracting sign displays" and "to preserve and improve the appearance of the city." The ordinance permitted on-site commercial advertising, but forbade other commercial advertising and non-commercial advertising using fixed-structure signs, unless permitted by one of the ordinance's 12 specified exceptions, such as temporary political campaign signs. The Court concluded that the City's interest in traffic safety and its aesthetic interest in preventing "visual clutter" could justify a prohibition of off-site commercial billboards, even though similar on-site signs were allowed.[1027] Nevertheless, the Court's judgment, supported by two different lines of reasoning, invalidated the city's general ban on signs carrying non-commercial advertising. According to a four-member plurality, the ordinance impermissibly discriminated on the basis of content by permitting on-site commercial speech while broadly prohibiting non-commercial messages; a "city may not conclude that the communication of commercial information concerning goods and services connected with a particular site is of greater value than the communication of noncommercial messages." Furthermore, the ordinance contained exceptions permitting various kinds of non-commercial signs, whether on property where goods and services were offered or not, which would otherwise be within the general ban. "Although the city may distinguish between the relative value of different categories of commercial speech, the city does not have the same range of choice in the area of noncommercial speech to evaluate the strength of, or distinguish between, various communicative interests. . . . With respect to noncommercial speech, a city may not choose the appropriate subjects for public discourse. . . . Because some noncommercial messages [might] be conveyed on billboards throughout the commercial and industrial zones, San Diego [should] similarly allow billboards conveying other noncommercial messages throughout those zones."[1028] On the other hand, Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Blackmun, concluded that the practical effect of the San Diego ordinance was to eliminate the billboard as an effective medium of communication for noncommercial messages, and that the city had failed to make the strong showing needed to justify such content-neutral prohibitions of particular media of communication.[1029]

[I394] Vincent upheld a Los Angeles ordinance that prohibited all signs on public property in the interest of avoiding visual clutter. The Court noted that a "city's inter-

---

[1026] Id. at 51–52.

[1027] See, in extenso, para. I190.

[1028] Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490, 513–15 (1981). The plurality also noted that the ordinance could not be appropriately characterized as a reasonable "time, place, and manner" restriction, because (1) it distinguished in several ways between permissible and impermissible signs at a particular location by reference to their content; (2) it did not leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information, given that many businesses and politicians and other persons relied upon outdoor advertising because other forms of advertising were insufficient, inappropriate and prohibitively expensive. Id. at 515–16.

[1029] Id. at 525–27.

est in attempting to preserve or improve the quality of urban life is one that must be accorded high respect," and that visual blight was created by the medium of expression itself. The Court rejected the argument that the validity of the city's aesthetic interest had been compromised by failing to extend the ban to private property, reasoning that the "private citizen's interest in controlling the use of his own property justifie[d] the disparate treatment." And even if some visual blight remained, a partial, content-neutral ban might nevertheless enhance the city's appearance. Moreover, the Court found that the category of speech in question was not "a uniquely valuable or important mode of communication," and that there were ample alternative modes of communication in Los Angeles.[1030]

[I395] In City of Ladue v. Gilleo, the Court held that Ladue could not prohibit homeowner Gilleo's display of a small sign, on her lawn or in a window, opposing war in the Persian Gulf. This case involved a city ordinance that prohibited homeowners from displaying any signs on their property except "residence identification" signs, "for sale" signs, and signs warning of safety hazards. The ordinance also permitted commercial establishments, churches, and non-profit organizations to erect certain signs that were not allowed at residences. Although the ordinance was supported by the city's interest in minimizing the visual clutter associated with signs, it was invalidated, because the local government had "almost completely foreclosed a venerable means of communication that is both unique and important." As the Court pointed out, "residential signs have long been an important and distinct medium of expression. . . . Displaying a sign from one's own residence often carries a message quite distinct from placing the same sign someplace else, or conveying the same text or picture by other means. Precisely because of their location, such signs provide information about the identity of the 'speaker,' . . . [which] is an important component of many attempts to persuade. A sign advocating 'Peace in the Gulf' in the front lawn of a retired general or decorated war veteran may provoke a different reaction than the same sign in a ten-year-old child's bedroom window or the same message on a bumper sticker of a passing automobile. . . . [In addition,] [r]esidential signs are an unusually cheap and convenient form of communication. Especially for persons of modest means or limited mobility, a yard or window sign may have no practical substitute. . . . Even for the affluent, the added costs in money or time of taking out a newspaper advertisement, handing out leaflets on the street, or standing in front of one's house with a hand-held sign may make the difference between participating and not participating in some public debate. Furthermore, a person who puts up a sign at her residence often intends to reach neighbors, an audience that could not be reached nearly as well by other means. [Additionally, the principle of] individual liberty in the home . . . has special resonance when the government seeks to constrain a person's ability to speak there. . . . Whereas the government's need to mediate among various competing uses, including expressive ones, for public streets and facilities is constant and unavoidable, . . . its need to regulate temperate speech from the home is surely much less pressing."[1031] In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that more temperate measures could, in large part, satisfy Ladue's stated regulatory needs without harm to the First Amendment rights of its citizens. In so holding, [1030] Members of City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 805–12 (1984). The Court also rejected as misplaced respondents' reliance on public forum principles. Id. at 813–15.

[1031] City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 55–58 (1994).

the Court noted that "different considerations might well apply in the case of signs (whether political or otherwise) displayed by residents for a fee, or in the case of off-site commercial advertisements on residential property."[1032]

7. Symbolic Conduct[1033]

a. In General

[I396] The First Amendment affords protection to symbolic or expressive conduct. "Symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas."[1034] The Court has acknowledged that "conduct may be 'sufficiently imbued with elements of communication to fall within the scope of the First Amendment.' In deciding whether particular conduct possesses sufficient communicative elements to bring the First Amendment into play, [the Court asks] whether '[a]n intent to convey a particularized message was present, and [whether] the likelihood was great that the message would be understood by those who viewed it.'"[1035] For example, the Court has recognized the expressive nature of a sit-in by blacks in a "whites only" area to protest segregation;[1036] of students' wearing of black armbands to protest American involvement in Vietnam;[1037] of the wearing of American military uniforms in a dramatic presentation criticizing the country's military presence in Vietnam;[1038] of taping a peace sign to an American flag, triggered by the Cambodian incursion;[1039] of picketing about a wide variety of causes;[1040] of a St. Patrick's Day-Evacuation Day parade;[1041] and even marching, walking, or parading in uniforms displaying the swastika.[1042]

[I397] "When 'speech' and 'non-speech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms."[1043] Under O'Brien, government regulation of expressive conduct "is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest."[1044] The O'Brien test "is little, if any, different from the standard applied to time, place, or man-

---

[1032] Id. at 58, n.17.

[1033] See also paras. I143, I 144 (nude dancing); para. I346 (sleeping in parks).

[1034] W. Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 632 (1943).

[1035] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 404 (1989), quoting Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405, 409–11 (1974) (per curiam).

[1036] Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131, 141–42 (1966).

[1037] Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 505 (1969). See para. I212.

[1038] Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58, 62–63 (1970).

[1039] Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405, 409–10 (1974) (per curiam).

[1040] See, e.g., Amalgamated Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308, 313–14 (1968); United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 176 (1983).

[1041] Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 569 (1995).

[1042] Id. at 569, citing Nat'l Socialist Party of Am. v. Skokie, 432 U.S. 43, 44 (1977) (per curiam).

[1043] United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376 (1968).

[1044] Id. at 377.

ner restrictions."[1045] "Reasonable time, place, or manner restrictions are valid even though they directly limit oral or written expression. It would be odd to insist on a higher standard for limitations aimed at regulable conduct and having only an incidental impact on speech."[1046] In so holding, the Court has "highlighted the requirement that the governmental interest in question be unconnected to expression in order to come under O'Brien's less demanding rule."[1047]

[I398] Arcara involved a statute authorizing closure of an adult bookstore found to be used as a place for prostitution and lewdness. The state court had held that the O'Brien test was applicable to this case, because such a closure order would also impose an incidental burden upon bookselling activities. Noting that the sexual activity carried on in that case "manifest[ed] absolutely no element of protected expression," the Court made clear that O'Brien has no relevance to a statute directed at imposing sanctions on nonexpressive activity. "[T]he enforcement of a public health regulation of general application against the physical premises in which [one] happen[s] to sell books . . . [is] directed at unlawful conduct having nothing to do with books or other expressive activity. Bookselling in an establishment used for prostitution does not confer First Amendment coverage to defeat a valid statute aimed at penalizing and terminating illegal uses of premises." The Court concluded that the statute in question "properly sought to protect the environment of the community by directing the sanction at premises knowingly used for lawless activities."[1048]

[I399] O'Brien addressed a defendant's claim that the First Amendment prohibited his prosecution and conviction for burning his draft card, because his act was "symbolic speech" engaged in as a demonstration against the war in Vietnam and against the draft. Even on the assumption that the alleged communicative element in O'Brien's conduct was sufficient to bring into play the First Amendment, the Court sustained the conviction. The Court found that the government regulation prohibiting the destruction of draft cards was aimed at maintaining the integrity of the Selective Service System. "[T]he continuing availability to each registrant of his Selective Service certificates substantially further[ed] the smooth and proper functioning of the system that Congress ha[d] established to raise armies." Thus the regulation at issue served the governement's "vital interest in having a system for raising armies that would function with maximum efficiency and would be capable of easily and quickly responding to continually changing circumstances." Moreover, there was no alternative means that "would more precisely and narrowly assure the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates than a law [prohibiting] their willful mutilation or destruction." Hence, O'Brien had been constitutionally convicted for the non-communicative impact of his conduct.[1049]

[I400] The O'Brien case is therefore "unlike one where the alleged governmental interest in regulating conduct arises in some measure because the communication allegedly

---

[1045] Clark v. Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 298 (1984).

[1046] Id. at 298, n.8.

[1047] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 407 (1989). If the government interest is related to the content of the expression, then the regulation of communicative conduct falls outside the scope of the O'Brien test and must be justified under a more demanding standard. See Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 403 (1989).

[1048] Arcara v. Cloud Books, Inc. 478 U.S. 697, 705, 707 (1986).

[1049] United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 381–82 (1968).

integral to the conduct is itself thought to be harmful."[1050] In Stromberg, for example, the Court struck down a statutory phrase that punished people who expressed their "opposition to organized government" by displaying "any flag, badge, banner, or device." "Since the statute there was aimed at suppressing communication, it could not be sustained as a regulation of noncommunicative conduct."[1051]

[I401] Schacht invalidated a federal statute permitting actors to wear an American military uniform portraying a member of an armed force in a theater or motion picture production only "if the portrayal does not tend to discredit that armed force." The street skit in which Schacht wore the Army uniform as a costume was designed, in his view, to expose the evil of the American presence in Vietnam and was part of a larger, peaceful anti-war demonstration. The Court found that, although a statute making it an offense to wear American military uniforms without authority would be valid, the challenged prohibition, sensitive to the viewpoint of speech, could not stand.[1052]

b. Contemptuous Treatment of the American Flag[1053]

[I402] In Street, the Court held that a state may not criminally punish a person for uttering words critical of the American flag. Rejecting the argument that the conviction could be sustained on the ground that Street had failed to show the respect for the national symbol, which may properly be demanded of every citizen, the Court concluded that the constitutionally guaranteed "freedom to be intellectually diverse or even contrary," and the "right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order," encompass "the freedom to express publicly one's opinions about [the American] flag, including those opinions which are defiant or contemptuous."[1054]

[I403] In Spence, the Court reversed the conviction of a college student who had displayed the flag with a peace symbol affixed to it by means of removable black tape from the window of his apartment. The Court found that this was a pointed expression of anguish by appellant about the then-current domestic and foreign affairs of his government. "Given the protected character of [Spence's] expression, and in light of the fact that no interest the State may have in preserving the physical integrity of a privately owned flag was significantly impaired," the conviction could not stand.[1055]

[I404] In Texas v. Johnson, the Court held, by a five-to-four vote, that a Texas statute criminalizing the desecration of venerated objects, including the U.S. flag, was unconstitutional as applied to an individual who had set such a flag on fire as a means of political protest. The Texas statute provided that "[a] person commits an offense if he intentionally or knowingly desecrates . . . [a] national flag," where "desecrate" meant to "deface, damage, or otherwise physically mistreat in a way that the actor knows will

---

[1050] Id. at 382.

[1051] Id. at 382, discussing Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

[1052] Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58, 61–63 (1970).

[1053] See also para. E67 ("void for vagueness" doctrine); para. H5 (refusal to salute the flag).

[1054] Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576, 593 (1969). There, appellant, having heard a news broadcast of the shooting of James Meredith, a civil rights leader, had said "We don't need no damn flag. If they let that happen to Meredith, we don't need an American flag."

[1055] Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405, 415 (1974) (per curiam). Appellant had been convicted under a law that forbade the public exhibition of a flag that was distorted or marked.

seriously offend one or more persons likely to observe or discover his action." The state asserted an interest "in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity." The Court pointed out that "the government's interest in preserving the flag's special symbolic value [wa]s directly related to expression" in the case of Johnson's burning of the flag. The state, apparently, was concerned that such conduct would "lead people to believe either that the flag d[id] not stand for nationhood and national unity, but instead reflect[ed] other, less positive concepts, or that the concepts reflect[ed] in the flag d[id] not in fact exist." As the Court stressed, "[t]hese concerns blossom only when a person's treatment of the flag communicates some message, and thus are related 'to the suppression of free expression' within the meaning of O'Brien." Hence, the Court rejected the state's contention that it ought to apply the O'Brien test. Further, it held that the state's legitimate interest in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity did not justify Johnson's conviction. Texas conceded that the law was not aimed at protecting the physical integrity of the flag in all circumstances, but it reached only those severe acts of physical abuse of the flag carried out in a way likely to be offensive. "Whether Johnson's treatment of the flag violated Texas law thus depended on the likely communicative impact of his expressive conduct." This restriction on Johnson's political expression was content-based and therefore subject to "the most exacting scrutiny." The Court stressed that the "government may not prohibit the expression of an idea merely because society finds the idea offensive or disagreeable," even where the American flag is involved. The principle that "the government may not prohibit expression simply because it disagrees with its message, is not dependent on the particular mode in which one chooses to express an idea." A state may not foster its own view of the flag by prohibiting expressive conduct relating to it, since "the government may [not] permit designated symbols to be used to communicate a limited set of messages." The Court declined, therefore, to create for the flag an exception to these principles protected by the First Amendment. In so doing, the Court noted that the flag's special role and deservedly cherished place in the American society would be strengthened, not weakened, by its decision, which was "a reaffirmation of the principles of freedom and inclusiveness that the flag best reflects, and of the conviction that . . . toleration of criticism such as Johnson's is a sign and source of [the country's] strength."[1056] [I405] Eichman involved the Flag Protection Act of 1989, which criminalized the conduct of anyone who "knowingly mutilates, defaces, physically defiles, burns, maintains on the floor or ground, or tramples upon" a U.S. flag, except conduct related to the disposal of a "worn or soiled" flag. Appellees were prosecuted for violating the Act—some for knowingly burning several flags while protesting various aspects of the government's policies and others, in a separate incident, for knowingly burning a flag while protesting the Act's passage. The Court found that appellees' prosecution was inconsistent with the First Amendment. The Court first declined to reconsider its rejection in Johnson of the claim that flag-burning, as a mode of political expression, does not enjoy the First Amendment's full protection. The government contended the Flag Protection Act was constitutional, because, unlike the statute addressed in Johnson, the Act did not target expressive conduct on the basis of the content of its message. The [1056] Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 410–19 (1989). Chief Justice Rehnquist noted, in his dissenting opinion, that the American flag "has occupied a unique position as the symbol of [the American] Nation, a uniqueness that justifies a governmental prohibition against flag burning," considering that such a form of political expression is "no essential part of any exposition of ideas." Id. at 422, 430.

---

government asserted an interest in "protect[ing] the physical integrity of the flag under all circumstances" in order to safeguard the flag's identity "as the unique and unalloyed symbol of the Nation." The Court rejected this argument. Although the Act, unlike the Texas law, contained no explicit content-based limitation on the scope of prohibited conduct, the government's asserted interest was "related to the suppression, and concerned with the content, of free expression." The government's interest in protecting the "physical integrity" of a privately owned flag rested upon "a perceived need to preserve the flag's status as a symbol of [the] Nation and certain national ideals." This interest was "implicated only when a person's treatment of the flag communicate[d] a message to others that [wa]s inconsistent with those ideals." Moreover, the precise language of the Act's prohibitions suggested "a focus on those acts likely to damage the flag's symbolic value." Thus, the Act suffered from the same fundamental flaw as the Texas law, and, for the reasons stated in Johnson, the government's asserted interest could not justify its infringement on First Amendment rights.[1057]

8. Access to Private Property for Speech Activities[1058]

[I406] Many people in the United States live in company-owned towns, which are freely accessible and open to the people in the area and those passing through and do not function differently from any other town. These people, just as residents or visitors of municipalities, retain a strong interest "in the functioning of the community in such manner that the channels of communication remain free." The managers appointed by the corporation that owns or possesses a town cannot curtail the liberty of speech and press of these people consistently with the purposes of the constitutional guarantees, and a state statute, which enforces such action by criminally punishing those who attempt to distribute literature, clearly violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. Under these considerations, Marsh v. Alabama struck down a state trespass law insofar as the state had attempted to impose penal sanctions on those distributing religious literature on the streets of a company town, contrary to regulations of the town's management.[1059]

[1057] United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310, 315–19 (1990). The four dissenters first noted that "certain methods of expression may be prohibited if (a) the prohibition is supported by a legitimate societal interest that is unrelated to suppression of the ideas the speaker desires to express; (b) the prohibition does not entail any interference with the speaker's freedom to express those ideas by other means; and (c) the interest in allowing the speaker complete freedom of choice among alternative methods of expression is less important than the societal interest supporting the prohibition." Further, they said that the federal government has a legitimate interest in protecting the symbolic value of the American flag, which has "at least these two components: in times of national crisis, it inspires and motivates the average citizen to make personal sacrifices in order to achieve societal goals of overriding importance; at all times, it serves as a reminder of the paramount importance of pursuing the ideals that characterize of [the American] society, . . . the ideas of liberty, equality, and tolerance." The dissent concluded that the government may "protect the symbolic value of the flag without regard to the specific content of the flag burners' speech." Id. at 319–21.

[1058] See also para. I281 (access to the press); paras. I288–I291, I296, I297 (access to the electronic media).

[1059] Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 507–09 (1946). See also Tucker v. Texas, 326 U.S. 517 (1946), involving the distribution of religious literature in a village owned by the United States under a congressional program designed to provide housing for workers engaged in national

[I407] Logan Valley extended Marsh to a shopping center situation, in a context where the First Amendment activity was related to the shopping center's operations. In so doing, the Court stressed, inter alia, that the general public had unrestricted access to the mall.[1060] Nevertheless, four years later, Lloyd substantially repudiated the rationale of Logan Valley, which was eventually overruled in Hudgens. Lloyd dealt with the question whether, under the federal Constitution, a privately owned shopping center may prohibit the distribution of handbills on its property when the handbilling is unrelated to the shopping center's operations. The shopping center had adopted a strict policy against the distribution of handbills within the building complex and its malls, and it made no exceptions to this rule. Respondents in Lloyd argued that, because the shopping center was open to the public, the First Amendment prevented the private owner from enforcing the handbilling restriction on shopping center premises. In rejecting this claim, the Court stated that "property [does not] lose its private character merely because the public is generally invited to use it for designated purposes," and that "[t]he essentially private character of a store and its privately owned abutting property does not change by virtue of being large or clustered with other stores in a modern shopping center." At the same time, the Court distinguished Marsh by noting that the basis on which the Marsh decision rested was that "the property involved encompassed an area that, for all practical purposes, . . . had all the attributes of a town, and was exactly like any other town in Alabama."[1061] Further, Hudgens concluded that the reasoning of Lloyd could not be squared with the reasoning of Logan Valley, and held that union representatives may not trespass on privately owned areas of shopping centers to engage in protected activities such as peaceful picketing.[1062]

[I408] The Court's reasoning in Lloyd, however, "does not, ex proprio vigore, limit the authority of the State to exercise its police power or its sovereign right to adopt in its own Constitution individual liberties more expansive than those conferred by the Federal Constitution."[1063] PruneYard illustrated the point in a case where the state of California had interpreted its own Constitution to afford a right of access to private defense activities, where the village was freely accessible and open to the public and had all the characteristics of a typical American town.

---

[1060] Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308, 316–25 (1968). The case involved labor picketing of a supermarket located in a large shopping center complex.

[1061] Lloyd Corp. Ltd. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551, 563, 569 (1972). In this opinion the Court "did not say that it was overruling the Logan Valley decision. Indeed, a substantial portion of the Court's opinion in Lloyd was devoted to pointing out the differences between the two cases, noting particularly that, in contrast to the handbilling in Lloyd, the picketing in Logan Valley had been specifically directed to a store in the shopping center, and the pickets had had no other reasonable opportunity to reach their intended audience." See Hudgens v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 424 U.S. 507, 517–18 (1976).

[1062] Hudgens v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 424 U.S. 507, 518–21 (1976). The Court emphasized that, if a large self-contained shopping center were the functional equivalent of a municipality, as Logan Valley had held, then the First and Fourteenth Amendments would not permit control of speech within such a center to depend upon the speech's content. Consequently, if the respondents in the Lloyd case did not have a First Amendment right to enter that shopping center to distribute handbills concerning Vietnam, then the pickets in Hudgens did not have a First Amendment right to enter the shopping center for the purpose of advertising their strike in front of their employer's store located in the mall.

[1063] PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 81, 81 (1980).

shopping centers for the reasonable exercise of speech and petitioning. While acknowledging that the First Amendment does not itself grant a right of access to private fora, the Court upheld the state-created right against a First Amendment challenge. It reasoned that Wooley[1064] does not prohibit such a right of access, because the views of those taking advantage of the right would not likely be identified with those of the owners, the State was not dictating any specific message, and the owners were free to disavow any connection to the message by posting disclaimers. The Court similarly distinguished Barnette,[1065] stating that the right of access did not compel the owners to affirm their belief in government orthodoxy, and left them free to publicly dissociate themselves from the views of the speakers. Finally, it distinguished Tornillo,[1066] on the ground that the right of access did not constitute a content-based penalty that would dampen the vigor and limit the variety of public debate.[1067]

[1064] See para. H5.
[1065] See para. H5.
[1066] See para. I281.
[1067] PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 81, 85–88 (1980).

PART III: FREEDOM OF EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS[1068]

[I409] In NAACP v. Alabama, the Court recognized a First Amendment right "to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas[;] . . . it is immaterial whether the beliefs sought to be advanced by association pertain to political, economic, religious or cultural matters."[1069] "While the freedom of association is not explicitly set out in the Amendment, it has long been held to be implicit in the freedoms of speech, assembly, and petition."[1070] "That right is protected because it promotes and may well be essential to the '[e]ffective advocacy of both public and private points of view, particularly controversial ones' that the First Amendment is designed to foster."[1071] And "[i]t is beyond debate that freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect of the 'liberty' assured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which embraces freedom of speech."[1072] However, the freedom of expressive association is not absolute; it can be overridden by "regulations adopted to serve compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms."[1073]

[I410] "To determine whether a group is protected by the First Amendment's expressive associational right, [it must be determined] whether the group engages in 'expressive association. The First Amendment's protection of expressive association is not reserved for advocacy groups. . . . Associations do not have to associate for the 'purpose' of disseminating a certain message in order to be entitled to the protections of the First Amendment."[1074] "But, to come within its ambit, a group must engage in some form of expression, whether it be public or private. . . . 'Even the training of outdoor survival skills or participation in community service might become expressive when the activity is intended to develop good morals, reverence, patriotism, and a desire for self-improvement.'"[1075] By contrast, the opportunities of adults and minors to dance with one another, which might be described as "associational" in common parlance, do not involve the sort of "expressive association" that the First Amendment protects. Moreover, [1068] As to the distinction between freedom of expressive association and freedom of commercial association, see Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 634–38 (1984) (concurring opinion of Justice O'Connor, finding "only minimal constitutional protection of the freedom of commercial association" and that an association whose "activities are not predominantly of the type protected by the First Amendment" is subject to "rationally related state regulation of its membership and other associational activities;" these positions were cited with approval in Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliott, Inc., 521 U.S. 457, 473, n.16 (1997)).

---

[1069] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 460 (1958).

[1070] Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 181 (1972).

[1071] Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 175 (1976), quoting Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 460 (1958).

[1072] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 460 (1958).

[1073] Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 623 (1984).

[1074] Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 648, 655 (2000).

[1075] Id. at 648, 650, quoting Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 636 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

the Constitution does not recognize a generalized right of "social association" that includes chance encounters in dancehalls.[1076]

[I411] Moreover, the Court has stressed that "the First Amendment does not require that every member of a group agree on every issue in order for the group's policy to be expressive association.'"[1077] Nor is it "the role of the courts to reject a group's expressed values because they disagree with those values or find them internally inconsistent."[1078]

[I412] "[G]roups which themselves are neither engaged in subversive or other illegal or improper activities nor demonstrated to have any substantial connections with such activities are to be protected in their rights of free and private association."[1079] Denial of official recognition, without justification, to such organizations may abridge the First Amendment guarantees.[1080] "But the First Amendment does not impose any affirmative obligation on the government to listen, to respond or, in [the context of collective bargaining,] to recognize [any] association and bargain with it."[1081] Nor does the Constitution require the government to furnish funds to maximize the exercise of the right of association or to minimize any resulting economic hardship.[1082]

B. GUILT OR LIABILITY BY ASSOCIATION

[I413] "The right to associate does not lose all constitutional protection merely because some members of the group may have participated in conduct or advocated doctrine that itself is not protected."[1083] Men or women, "in adhering to a political party

---

[1076] City of Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 24–25 (1989). Regarding the right to "intimate association," see para. F3.

[1077] Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 655 (2000).

[1078] Id. at 651.

[1079] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 557–58 (1963). The freedom of association protected by the First Amendment does not extend to joining with others for the purpose of depriving third parties of their lawful rights. See Madsen v. Women's Health Ctr., Inc., 512 U.S. 753, 776 (1994).

[1080] Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 181–84 (1972). There, the Court found that a state college's denial of recognition to a student organization was a form of prior restraint, denying to the organization the use of campus facilities for meetings and other appropriate purposes, as well as the use of campus bulletin boards and the school newspaper.

[1081] Smith v. Arkansas State Highway Employees, 441 U.S. 463, 465 (1979) (per curiam). There, the Court rejected a public employees' union argument that its First Amendment rights were abridged, because the public employer required employees' grievances to be filed directly with the employer and refused to recognize the union's communications concerning its members' grievances. See also Minnesota Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 286–87 (1984).

Similarly the Constitution does not afford labor unions the right to compel private employers to engage in a dialogue, or even to listen. See Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l Union, 442 U.S. 289, 313 (1979).

[1082] See Lyng v. Automobile Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 368 (1988), involving Congress' refusal to extend food stamp benefits to those on strike. Denying such benefits made it harder for strikers to maintain themselves and their families during the strike and exerted pressure on them to abandon their union. Exercising the right to strike inevitably risked economic hardship, but the Court was not inclined to hold that the right of association required the government to minimize that result by qualifying the striker for food stamps.

[1083] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 908 (1982).

or other organization, . . . do not subscribe unqualifiedly to all of its platforms or asserted principles."[1084] "[A] blanket prohibition of association with a group having both legal and illegal aims [would pose] a real danger that legitimate political expression or association would be impaired."[1085] Besides, "membership [in an association] may be innocent. A [person] may have joined a proscribed organization unaware of its activities and purposes. . . . [And] [a]t the time of affiliation, a group itself may be innocent, only later coming under the influence of those who would turn it toward illegitimate ends."[1086] Under these considerations, the Court has consistently disapproved governmental action imposing criminal sanctions or denying rights and privileges solely because of a citizen's association with an unpopular organization.[1087] "'[G]uilt by association' alone, without [establishing] that an individual's association poses the threat feared by the Government," is inconsistent with the First Amendment.[1088] "[L]egislation which sanctions membership unaccompanied by specific intent to further the unlawful goals of the organization or which is not active membership violates constitutional limitations."[1089] "The government has the burden of establishing a knowing affiliation with an organization possessing unlawful aims and goals, and a specific intent to further those illegal aims."[1090] Similarly, "[c]ivil liability may not be imposed merely because an individual belonged to a group, some members of which committed acts of violence. For liability to be imposed by reason of association alone, it is necessary to establish that the group itself possessed unlawful goals and that the individual held a specific intent to further those illegal aims."[1091]

C. ASSOCIATIONAL PRIVACY

[I414] The Court has recognized the vital relationship between freedom to associate and privacy in one's associations. "Inviolability of privacy in group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association, particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs."[1092] At the same time, however, the government has power adequately to inform itself in order to act and protect its legiti-

---

[1084] Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 136 (1943).

[1085] Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 229 (1961).

[1086] Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 190–91 (1952) (indiscriminate classification of innocent with knowing activity must fall as an assertion of arbitrary power).

[1087] See, e.g., Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 606–08 (1967); Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 15–19 (1966); Aptheker v. Sec'y of State, 378 U.S. 500, 509–11 (1964); Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203, 222, 229–30 (1961); Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290, 299–300 (1961).

[1088] United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 265–266 (1967).

[1089] Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 608 (1967).

[1090] Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 186 (1972). In Dawson v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159, 165 (1992), the Court held that the Constitution does not erect a per se barrier to the admission of evidence concerning one's beliefs and associations at sentencing simply because those beliefs and associations are protected by the First Amendment (see, in extenso, para. H20).

[1091] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 920 (1982). In that case, African-American citizens boycotted Caucasian merchants in Claiborne County, Mississippi, and the merchants sued under state law to recover losses from the boycott.

[1092] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958).

mate and vital interests. Government intrusion into the area of constitutionally protected associational privacy is valid if the government "convincingly show[s] a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling [governmental] interest."[1093]

[I415] Compelled disclosure of affiliation with groups engaged in advocacy may constitute an effective restraint on freedom of association. Compelled disclosure of an organization's membership is "likely to affect adversely the ability of [the association] and its members to pursue their collective effort to foster beliefs which they have the right to advocate, in that it may induce members to withdraw from the [a]ssociation and dissuade others from joining it because of fear of exposure of their beliefs shown through their associations and of the consequences of this exposure."[1094] The Court has held that an organization can raise the privacy rights of its members, because litigation initiated by those members would disclose their identity and destroy the very privacy they seek to protect.[1095]

[I416] In National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) v. Alabama, the Attorney General of Alabama had brought an equity suit to enjoin NAACP from conducting further activities within, and to oust it from, the state on the grounds of its non-compliance with Alabama's foreign corporation registration statute. The Attorney General sought, and the state court ordered, production of lists of the Association's rank-and-file members as pertinent to the issues whether the NAACP was conducting intra-state business in violation of the statute and whether the extent of that business justified its permanent ouster from the state. Noting that NAACP had admitted its presence and conduct of activities in Alabama during almost 40 years, and that it had offered to comply in all respects with the qualification statute, the Court found itself unable to perceive that the disclosure of the names of NAACP's rank-and-file members had a substantial bearing upon any issue presented to the Alabama courts.[1096]

[I417] Bates involved the conviction of custodians of records of branches of the NAACP for failure to comply with provisions of local regulations that required organizations operating within the municipality to file with a municipal official, inter alia, financial statements showing the names of all their members and contributors. These regulations were amendments to ordinances levying license taxes on persons engaging in businesses, occupations, or professions within municipal limits. Finding that the occupation taxes were based on the nature of the activity or enterprise conducted, not upon earnings or income, and, moreover, that there had been no showing that the NAACP branches were engaged in activity taxable under the ordinances or had ever been

---

[1093] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 546 (1963). See also California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 55 (1974).

A citizen does not have the right to answer fraudulently a question about his associational ties that the government should not have asked. See Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 866–67 (1966); Bryson v. United States, 396 U.S. 64, 72 (1969).

[1094] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462–63 (1958). For instance, revelation of the identity of an association's members may expose them "to economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion, and other manifestations of public hostility." Id. at 462.

[1095] Id. at 459–60.

[1096] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 464–65 (1958).

regarded by tax authorities as subject to taxation under the ordinances, the Court concluded that it could find no relevant correlation between the power of the municipalities to impose occupational license taxes and the compulsory disclosure and publication of the membership lists of the local branches of the NAACP.[1097]

[I418] Shelton involved an Arkansas statute that, as an incident of the state's attempt to control the activities of a class of individuals (the teachers in its public schools and publicly supported institutions of higher learning), required the individuals to disclose the associations to which they belonged. The statute's purported justification lay in its furtherance of the state's effective selection of teaching personnel; to subserve this end, it attempted to ask every one of its teachers to disclose every single organization with which he or she had been associated over a five-year period. The ratio decidendi of the Court's decision was the absence of substantial connection between the breadth of disclosure demanded and the purpose that disclosure was asserted to serve. The Court struck the legislation down, finding that "[m]any such associational relationships could have no possible bearing upon the teacher's occupational competence or fitness," and hence that "[t]he statute's comprehensive interference with associational freedom [went] far beyond what might be justified in the exercise of the State's legitimate inquiry into the fitness and competency of its teachers."[1098]

[I419] Communist Party differed from NAACP, Bates, and Shelton in the magnitude of the public interests that the registration and disclosure provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950 were designed to protect and in the pertinence that disclosure bore to the protection of those interests. Congress had found that there existed a world Communist movement, foreign controlled, whose purpose it was, by whatever means necessary, to establish Communist totalitarian dictatorship in the countries throughout the world and that had already succeeded in supplanting governments in other countries. Hence, secrecy or the concealment of foreign-dominated organizations, which worked primarily to advance the objectives of the Communist movement, was considered to be a threat to public safety and to the effective, free functioning of the national institutions of the United States. These legislative findings were the product of extensive investigation by committees of Congress over more than a decade and a half; they could not be dismissed as unfounded or irrational imaginings. These considerations led the Court to uphold the Act insofar as it required Communist action organizations to file a registration statement containing the names and addresses of its officers and members and a listing of their aliases. In addition, the Court found that disclosure both of the financial transactions of a Communist action organization and of the identity of the organs of publication that it controlled might not unreasonably have been regarded by Congress as necessary to the objective which the Act sought to achieve: "to bring foreign-dominated organizations out into the open, where the public [could] evaluate their activities informedly against the revealed background of their character, nature, and connections."[1099]

[1097] Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 525–27 (1960).

[1098] Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 488–90 (1960). See also Schneider v. Smith, 390 U.S. 17, 22–27 (1968), where the Court, in order to avoid constitutional questions concerning the associational freedom, held that the statutory phrase "to safeguard . . . from sabotage or other subversive acts" referred only to actions and did not authorize an unlimited and indiscriminate search of the employee's associational past.

[1099] Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 93–104 (1961).

[I420] "[A]s regards the questioning of public employees relative to Communist Party membership, it has . . . been held that the interest in not subjecting speech and association to the deterrence of subsequent disclosure is outweighed by the State's interest in ascertaining the fitness of the employee for the post he holds, and hence that such questioning does not infringe constitutional protections."[1100] Likewise, "Bar examiners may ask about Communist affiliations as a preliminary to further inquiry into the nature of the association, and may exclude an applicant for refusal to answer."[1101] "[T]he State's interest in having lawyers who are devoted to the law in its broadest sense, including not only its substantive provisions, but also its procedures for orderly change, [is] clearly sufficient to outweigh the minimal effect upon free association occasioned by compulsory disclosure" of Communist Party membership.[1102]

[I421] Considering that Congress has wide power to legislate in the field of communist activity concerning advocacy of or preparation for violent overthrow of the government, and to conduct appropriate investigations in aid thereof, the Court has held that a congressional investigation of communist infiltration into educational institutions or basic industries embraces the right of a congressional investigating committee to ask a witness questions about his membership in the Communist Party. And a witness who refuses to answer such questions may be indicted and convicted for contempt of Congress; these questions are certainly pertinent to the investigatory inquiry, since a member of the Communist Party might possess information that would substantially aid a congressional committee in its legislative investigation.[1103]

[I422] "The prior holdings that governmental interest in controlling subversion and the particular character of the Communist Party and its objectives outweigh the right of individual Communists to conceal party membership or affiliations by no means require the wholly different conclusion that other groups—concededly legitimate—automatically forfeit their rights to privacy of association simply because the general subject matter of the legislative inquiry is Communist subversion or infiltration."[1104] In Gibson, the president of the Miami Branch of the NAACP, was adjudged in contempt and sentenced to fine and imprisonment for refusing to divulge contents of the membership records of that branch to a committee created by the Florida legislature, which was investigating the infiltration of Communists into various organizations and sought to ascertain whether 14 persons previously identified as Communists or members of Communist front or affiliated organizations were members of the Miami Branch of the NAACP. The Court found that, in essence, there was "merely indirect, less than unequivocal, and mostly hearsay testimony" that, in years past, some 14 people, who had been asserted to be, or to have been, Communists or members of Communist front or "affiliated organizations" had attended occasional meetings of the Miami branch of the

---

[1100] Konigsberg v. State Bar, 366 U.S. 36, 52 (1961), citing Garner v. Bd. of Public Works of Los Angeles, 341 U.S. 716, 720 (1951); Beilan v. Bd. of Educ., 357 U.S. 399, 405–06 (1958).

[1101] Law Students Research Council v. Wadmond, 401 U.S. 154, 165–66 (1971), citing Konigsberg v. State Bar, 366 U.S. 36, 46–47 (1961).

[1102] Konigsberg v. State Bar, 366 U.S. 36, 52 (1961). See also para. I413 (guilt by association). The fact that there is no independent evidence that an applicant to practice law has ever been a member of the Communist Party does not prevent the state, acting in good faith, from making this inquiry in an investigation of this kind. See In re Anastaplo, 366 U.S. 82, 89–90 (1961).

[1103] See Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 125–34 (1959); Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U.S. 399, 413–15 (1961); Braden v. United States, 365 U.S. 431, 433–35 (1961).

[1104] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 544–57 (1963).

NAACP "and/or" had been members of that branch, which had a total membership of about 1,000. Concluding that the record of the case was insufficient to demonstrate the existence of any substantial relationship between the NAACP and subversive or Communist activities, the Court vacated the challenged conviction as violative of the constitutional right of free and private association.[1105]

[I423] However, in Uphaus, the Court upheld the right of the state of New Hampshire, in connection with an investigation of whether "subversive" persons were within the state, to obtain a list of guests who had attended a "World Fellowship" summer camp located in the state. The Court found that there was demonstrated a sufficient connection between subversive activity and the World Fellowship, itself, to justify discovery of the guest list.[1106] By contrast, no such "nexus" between appellant and subversive activities was found in DeGregory. This case stemmed from an investigation by the Attorney General of New Hampshire, under a statute enacted in 1957, authorizing him to investigate whenever he had information he deemed reasonable relating to "violations" covering a wide range of "subversive" activities designed to overthrow the constitutional form of the state's government. DeGregory testified that he had not been involved with the Communist Party since 1957 and had no knowledge of Communist activities during that period, but he refused to disclose information relating to his political associations of an earlier day. The Court noted that the record of the case was devoid of any evidence that there was any Communist movement in New Hampshire. There was "no showing whatsoever of present danger of sedition against the State itself, the only area to which the authority of the State extend[ed.]" Hence, New Hampshire's interest was held to be "too remote and conjectural to override" the guarantees of the First Amendment.[1107] [I424] In Bryant v. Zimmerman, Court held that Bryant's alleged right of membership in the Ku Klux Klan was not offended by a state statute requiring filing with the Secretary of State of the constitution and bylaws, rules and regulations, membership oath, roster of members and list of officers of every association of 20 or more members having as a condition of membership an oath. The statute made it unlawful to become or remain a member of such an association with knowledge that it had failed to comply with the filing requirement. Exceptions for labor unions and benevolent orders indicated that the measure was directed primarily at the Ku Klux Klan. Compelling disclosure of membership lists and other information by organizations of the character of the Klan, the Court found, was reasonable both as a means for providing the state with knowledge of the activities of those organizations within its borders and because "requiring this information to be supplied for the public files [would] operate as an effective or substantial deterrent from the violations of public and private right to which the association might be tempted if such a disclosure were not required."[1108] Thus, the decision was based "on

---

[1105] Id. at 544–57.

[1106] Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72, 78–81 (1959). Moreover, the claim to associational privacy was held to be "tenuous, at best," since the disputed list was already a matter of public record by virtue of a generally applicable New Hampshire law requiring that places of accommodation, including the camp in question, maintain a guest register open to public authorities.

[1107] DeGregory v. Attorney Gen. of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829–30 (1966).

[1108] New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U.S. 63, 72–73 (1928).

the particular character of the Klan's activities, involving acts of unlawful intimidation and violence,"[1109] and on the danger involved in the Klan's covert operation.[1110]

[I425] The Court also has upheld statutory reporting provisions with respect to lobbying expenses,[1111] campaign financing,[1112] and dissemination of foreign political propaganda.[1113]

D. RESTRICTIONS ON PARTICULAR ASSOCIATIONAL ACTIVITIES

1. Boycott [1114]

[I426] "The right of the States to regulate economic activity [cannot] justify a complete prohibition against a nonviolent, politically motivated boycott designed to force governmental and economic change and to effectuate rights guaranteed by the Constitution itself."[1115] NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware arose after African-American citizens boycotted Caucasian merchants in Claiborne County, Mississippi. These citizens "banded together and collectively expressed their dissatisfaction with a social structure that had denied them rights to equal treatment and respect." The boycott was launched at a meeting of a local branch of the NAACP attended by several hundred persons. Its acknowledged purpose was to secure compliance by both civic and business leaders with a lengthy list of demands for equality and racial justice. The boycott was supported by speeches and non-violent picketing. Non-participants repeatedly were urged to join the common cause, both through public address and through personal solicitation. The Court noted that through exercise of these First Amendment rights, petitioners had "sought to bring about political, social, and economic change" and concluded that the non-violent elements of petitioners' activities were entitled to the protection of the Constitution.[1116]

[I427] Nevertheless, "[a] nonviolent and totally voluntary boycott may have a disruptive effect on . . . economic conditions. Th[e] Court has recognized the strong governmental interest in certain forms of economic regulation, even though such regulation may have an incidental effect on rights of speech and association. . . . [Hence,] as part of Congress' striking of the delicate balance between union freedom of expression and the ability of neutral employers, employees, and consumers to remain free from coerced participation in industrial strife," a labor union may be prohibited from inducing employees to refuse to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on goods with the object of forcing any person to cease doing business with any other person.[1117]

[1109] See Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 465 (1958).

[1110] See Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Bd., 367 U.S. 1, 101 (1961).

[1111] See para. I197.

[1112] See paras. I509 et seq.

[1113] See para. I330.

[1114] See also para. I375 (secondary labor picketing).

[1115] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 914 (1982).

[1116] Id. at 907–15.

[1117] Id. at 912, citing Int'l Longshoremen's Ass'n, AFL-CIO v. Allied Int'l, Inc., 456 U.S. 212, [I428] In Superior Court Trial Lawyers Association, the Court held that a boycott by a group of lawyers, whose members had collectively refused to represent indigent criminal defendants without greater compensation, was not immunized from anti-trust regulation by the First Amendment. The Court noted that "the association's efforts to publicize the boycott, to explain the merits of its cause, and to lobby District officials to enact favorable legislation—like similar activities in Claiborne Hardware—were of course activities fully protected by the First Amendment." However, the boycott at issue in Claiborne Hardware, differed in a decisive respect; although the boycotters there "intended to inflict economic injury on the merchants, the boycott was not motivated by any desire to lessen competition or to reap economic benefits, but by the aim of vindicating constitutional rights of equality and freedom," which "are preconditions of the free market, not commodities to be haggled over within it." The same could not be said of attorney's fees. "No matter how altruistic the motives of the lawyers' association [might] have been, [its] immediate objective [wa]s to increase the price that they would be paid for their services. Such an economic boycott is well within" the government's power to regulate.[1118]

2. Litigation

[I429] That the states have broad power to regulate the practice of law is beyond question. "Without denying the power of the State to take measures to correct the substantive evils of undue influence, overreaching, misrepresentation, invasion of privacy, conflict of interest, and lay interference that potentially are present in solicitation of prospective clients by lawyers, [the Court has stressed] that 'broad rules framed to protect the public and to preserve respect for the administration of justice' must not work a significant impairment of 'the value of associational freedoms,'"[1119] which encompasses the right of individuals "to act collectively to obtain affordable and effective legal representation."[1120]

[I430] In NAACP v. Button, the supreme court of appeals of Virginia had held that the activities of members and staff attorneys of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) constituted "solicitation of legal business" in viola-

---

222–23, n.20 (1982). In the latter case, petitioner (ILA), as a protest against the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, refused to handle cargoes arriving from, or destined for, the Soviet Union. As a result, respondent's shipments and business were disrupted completely. The Court held that petitioner's boycott was an illegal secondary boycott under the National Labor Relations Act, the application of which to the ILA's activity in this case would not infringe upon the First Amendment rights of the ILA and its members. See id. at 226–27.

[1118] Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Superior Court Trial Lawyers Ass'n, 493 U.S. 411, 426–28, n.10 (1990). The lawyers' association contended that, just as the Claiborne Hardware boycott sought to secure constitutional rights to equality and freedom, its boycott sought to vindicate the Sixth Amendment rights of indigent defendants. In rejecting this argument, the Court pointed out that Claiborne Hardware did not, and could not, "establish a rule immunizing from prosecution any boycott based upon sincere constitutional concerns, [given that] such an exemption would authorize the government's contractors in nearly all areas to circumvent antitrust law on the basis of their own theory of the government's obligations." See id. at 427, n.11.

[1119] In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412, 426 (1978), quoting United Mine Workers of Am., v. Illinois Bar Ass'n, 389 U.S. 217, 222 (1967).

[1120] United Transp. Union v. Michigan Bar, 401 U.S. 576, 584 (1971), citing United Mine Workers of Am., v. Illinois Bar Ass'n, 389 U.S. 217 (1967).

tion of state law. Although the NAACP representatives and staff attorneys were held to have "a right to peaceably assemble with the members of the branches and other groups to discuss with them and advise them relative to their legal rights in matters concerning racial segregation," the state court found no constitutional protection for efforts to solicit prospective litigants to authorize the filing of suits by NAACP-compensated attorneys. The Court reversed, holding that "the activities of the NAACP, its affiliates and legal staff shown on the record of the case [we]re modes of expression and association protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments which Virginia [could] not prohibit, under its power to regulate the legal profession, as improper solicitation of legal business." The solicitation of prospective litigants, many of whom were not members of the NAACP, for the purpose of furthering the civil rights objectives of the organization and its members, was held to come within the right "to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas." Accordingly, the Button Court emphasized that government might regulate in the area "only with narrow specificity." The Attorney General of Virginia had argued, inter alia, that the law aimed to prevent the evils traditionally associated with common law maintenance, champerty, and barratry. The Court rejected the analogy to the common law offenses because of an absence of proof that malicious intent to stir up litigation or the prospect of pecuniary gain inspired the NAACP-sponsored litigation. The Court concluded that the state had "failed to advance any substantial regulatory interest, in the form of substantive evils flowing from [the NAACP's] activities, which could justify the broad prohibitions which it ha[d] imposed."[1121]

[I431] Subsequent decisions held that the First and Fourteenth Amendments prevent state proscription of a range of solicitation activities by labor unions seeking to provide low-cost, effective legal representation to their members.[1122] Button and its progeny thus establish the principle that "collective activity undertaken to obtain meaningful access to the courts is a fundamental right within the protection of the First Amendment."[1123] And lawyers accepting employment under such constitutionally protected plans have a like protection that the state cannot abridge.[1124]

[1121] Nat'l Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 428–44 (1963).

[1122] See Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1, 5–8 (1964); United Mine Workers of Am., v. Illinois Bar Ass'n, 389 U.S. 217, 221–25 (1967); United Transp. Union v. State Bar of Michigan, 401 U.S. 576, 581–86 (1971).

[1123] United Transp. Union v. State Bar of Michigan, 401 U.S. 576, 585 (1971); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 376, n.32 (1977). Nevertheless, this principle does not apply to an organization that is a mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than an attempt by a group of attorneys to evade a valid state rule against solicitation for pecuniary gain. See In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412, 428, n.20 (1978).

Such an associational activity is not taken outside of the protection of Button because of the non-profit organization's policy of requesting an award of counsel fees destined to go to the central fund of the organization. "Counsel fees are awarded in the discretion of the court, are not drawn from the plaintiff's recovery, and are usually premised on a successful outcome. . . . [Moreover,] [a]lthough such benefit to the organization may increase with the maintenance of successful litigation, the same situation obtains with voluntary contributions and foundation support, which also may rise with the victories of the association in important areas of the law. That possibility, standing alone, offers no basis for equating the work of lawyers associated with the organization with that of a group that exists for the primary purpose of financial gain through the recovery of counsel fees." See In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412, 429–31 (1978).

[1124] Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1, 8 (1964).

3. In the Prison Context

[I432] In a prison context, an inmate does not retain those First Amendment rights that "are inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system."[1125] "Perhaps the most obvious of the First Amendment rights that are necessarily curtailed by confinement are those associational rights that the First Amendment protects outside of prison walls. The concept of incarceration itself entails a restriction on the freedom of inmates to associate with those outside of the penal institution. Equally as obvious, the inmate's 'status as a prisoner' and the operational realities of a prison dictate restrictions on the associational rights among inmates."[1126] "These rights may be curtailed whenever the institution's officials, in the exercise of their informed discretion, reasonably conclude that such associations, whether through group meetings or otherwise, possess the likelihood of disruption to prison order or stability, or otherwise interfere with the legitimate penological objectives of the prison environment. . . . The case of a prisoners' labor union, where the focus is on the presentation of grievances to, and encouragement of adversary relations with, institution officials surely would rank high on anyone's list of potential trouble spots."[1127] In light of the foregoing considerations, Jones upheld prison regulations that prohibited prisoners from soliciting other inmates to join a prisoners' labor union and barred union meetings and bulk mailings concerning the Union from outside sources.[1128]

E. THE RIGHT NOT TO ASSOCIATE[1129]

1. Generally

[I433] Freedom of association plainly presupposes a freedom not to associate. But this freedom is not absolute; it may be overridden by "regulations adopted to serve compelling government interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms."[1130]

2. Compelled Membership

[I434] "Freedom of association would prove an empty guarantee if associations could not limit control over their decisions to those who share the interests and persuasions that underlie the association's being."[1131] A regulation that forces a group to accept

---

[1125] Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822 (1974).

[1126] Jones v. N. Carolina Prisoners' Labor Union, 433 U.S. 119, 125–26 (1977).

[1127] Id. at 132–33.

[1128] The Court also noted that losing the cost advantages of bulk mailing did not fundamentally implicate free speech values. Id. at 131.

[1129] See also paras. I461 et seq. (political party's right to exclude).

[1130] See Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 623 (1984). A state may take positive steps to protect the individual right not to associate. In Lincoln Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U.S. 525, 529–31 (1949), for example, the Court held that, where a state forbids employers to restrict employment to members of a union, in order to give equal opportunities for remunerative work to union and non-union members, enforcement of that state policy does not abridge the associational rights of unions or their members, despite their claim that a closed shop was indispensable to the right of self-organization and the association of workers into unions.

[1131] Democratic Party v. Wisconsin ex rel. La Follette, 450 U.S. 107, 122, n.22 (1981).

members it does not desire constitutes a substantial intrusion into the internal structure of the association and "may impair the ability of [its] original members to express those views that brought them together."[1132] Nevertheless, a state's anti-discrimination law does not violate a group's right to associate simply because the law conflicts with that group's exclusionary membership policy. Indeed, the right to associate does not mean that "in every setting in which individuals exercise some discrimination in choosing associates, their selective process of inclusion and exclusion is protected by the Constitution."[1133] "The forced inclusion of an unwanted person in a group infringes the group's freedom of expressive association if the presence of that person affects in a significant way the group's ability to advocate public or private viewpoints."[1134]

[I435] In Railway Mail Association, the refusal to admit an applicant to membership in a labor union on account of race was involved. Admission had been refused, in violation of a state statute prohibiting discrimination in membership or union services on account of race, creed, or color. The union claimed that the prohibition offended the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as an interference with its right of selection to membership. However, the Court saw no constitutional basis for the contention that a state cannot protect workers from exclusion solely on the basis of race, color, or creed by an organization, "functioning under the protection of the state, which holds itself out to represent the general business needs of employees."[1135]

[I436] Runyon v. McCrary rejected an "as applied" First Amendment challenge to a federal statute providing that "all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State . . . to make and enforce contracts . . . as is enjoyed by white citizens" and prohibiting private schools from excluding qualified children solely because they were blacks. In doing so, the Court stressed that, while "it may be assumed that parents have a expressive associational right to send their children to educational institutions that promote the belief that racial segregation is desirable, and that the children have an equal right to attend such institutions, . . . it does not follow that the practice of excluding racial minorities from such institutions is also constitutionally protected." In any event, the Court added, there was "no showing that discontinuance of the discriminatory admission practices would inhibit in any way the teaching in these schools of any ideas or dogma."[1136]

[I437] In Hishon v. King & Spalding, the Court rejected a large commercial law firm's claim to First Amendment protection for alleged gender-based discriminatory partnership decisions for associates of the firm. Although the Court recognized that "the activities of lawyers may make a distinctive contribution . . . to the ideas and beliefs of [the American] society," it found that the firm had "not shown how its ability to fulfill such

---

[1132] Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 623 (1984).

[1133] New York State Club Ass'n v. New York City, 487 U.S. 1, 13 (1988). See also Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 78 (1984), quoting Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 70 (1973) ("[i]nvidious private discrimination may be characterized as a form of exercising freedom of association protected by the First Amendment, but it has never been accorded affirmative constitutional protections").

[1134] Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 648 (2000). A political party has the right to exclude non-members from participating in the process of selecting its nominees for public offices. See, in extenso, paras. I456 et seq.

[1135] Ry. Mail Ass'n v. Corsi, 326 U.S. 88, 93–94 (1945).

[1136] Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 176 (1976).

a function would be inhibited by a requirement that it consider petitioner for partnership on her merits."[1137]

[I438] United States Jaycees involved a non-profit membership organization "designed to inculcate in the individual membership a spirit of genuine Americanism and civic interest, and to provide an avenue for intelligent participation by young men in the affairs of their community." The organization was divided into local chapters, described as "young men's organizations," in which regular membership was restricted to males between the ages of 18 and 35. But Minnesota's Human Rights Act, which applied to the Jaycees, made it unlawful to "deny any person the full and equal enjoyment of a place of public accommodation because of sex." The Jaycees claimed that applying the law to it violated its right to associate—in particular its right to maintain its selective membership policy. The Court rejected that claim, finding that the state's purpose of eliminating discrimination is a compelling state interest that is unrelated to the suppression of ideas, and that Minnesota's law was the least restrictive means of achieving that interest. Jaycees failed to demonstrate that the Act imposed any serious burdens on the male members' freedom of expressive association. Though the Jaycees had taken public positions on a number of diverse issues, and regularly engaged in a variety of activities worthy of constitutional protection under the First Amendment, there was "no basis in the record for concluding that admission of women as full voting members would impede the organization's ability to engage in these protected activities or to disseminate its preferred views." The Act, the Court held, required "no change in the Jaycees' creed of promoting the interest of young men, and it impose[d] no restrictions on the organization's ability to exclude individuals with ideologies or philosophies different from those of its existing members." Moreover, the Jaycees already invited women to share the group's views and philosophy and to participate in much of its training and community activities. Accordingly, "any claim that admission of women as full voting members [would] impair a symbolic message conveyed by the very fact that women [we]re not permitted to vote [wa]s attenuated, at best." And "even if enforcement of the Act cause[d] some incidental abridgment of the Jaycees' protected speech, that effect [wa]s no greater than [wa]s necessary to accomplish the State's legitimate purposes."[1138]

[I439] The Court took a similar approach in Rotary. Rotary International, a non-profit corporation, was founded as "an organization of business and professional men united worldwide who provide humanitarian service, encourage high ethical standards in all vocations, and help build goodwill and peace in the world." It admitted a cross-section of worthy business and community leaders, but refused membership to women. As the group's General Secretary explained, the exclusion of women resulted in an aspect of fellowship that was enjoyed by the male membership. That policy also allowed the organization to operate effectively in foreign countries with varied cultures and social mores. Though California's Civil Rights Act, which applied to Rotary International, prohibited discrimination on the basis of sex, the organization claimed a right to associate, including the right to select its members. As in Jaycees, the Court rejected the claim, holding that the evidence failed to demonstrate that admitting women to Rotary Clubs would "affect in any significant way the existing members' ability to carry out their various purposes." Rotary Clubs engaged in a variety of commendable service activities that were protected by the First Amendment. But California's Civil Rights Act did "not require the clubs to abandon or alter any of these activities. It d[id] not require them to abandon their basic goals of humanitarian service, high ethical standards in all vocations, goodwill, and peace. Nor d[id] it require them to abandon their classification system or admit members who did not reflect a cross-section of the community. Indeed, by opening membership to leading business and professional women in the community, Rotary Clubs [we]re likely to obtain a more representative cross-section of community leaders with a broadened capacity for service." Finally, even if California's law worked "some slight infringement on Rotary members' right of expressive association, that infringement [wa]s justified because it serve[d] the State's compelling interest in eliminating discrimination against women."[1139]

---

[1137] Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 78 (1984).

[1138] Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 623–28 (1984).

[I440] In New York State Club Association, the Court turned back a facial challenge to a state anti-discrimination statute on the assumption that the expressive associational character of a dining club with over 400 members could be sufficiently attenuated to permit application of the law even to such a private organization. However, the Court also recognized the state did not prohibit exclusion of those whose views were at odds with positions that the club's members wished to promote. Instead, the law "merely prevent[ed] an association from using race, sex, and the other specified characteristics as shorthand measures in place of what the city consider[ed] to be more legitimate criteria for determining membership." But it was conceivable that "an association might be able to show that it [wa]s organized for specific expressive purposes, and that it [would] not be able to advocate its desired viewpoints nearly as effectively if it could not confine its membership to those who share[d] the same sex, for example, or the same religion."[1140]

[I441] In Dale, an adult's position as assistant scoutmaster of a New Jersey troop was revoked when the Boy Scouts learned that he was an avowed homosexual and gay rights activist. Dale filed suit, alleging, inter alia, that the Boy Scouts had violated the state statute prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in places of public accommodation. The Court, by a five-to-four vote, held that application of that law would violate the Boy Scouts' First Amendment right of expressive association. The Court gave deference to the Boy Scouts assertions that homosexual conduct was inconsistent with the values embodied in the Scout Oath and Law, particularly those represented by the terms "morally straight" and "clean," and that the organization did not want to promote homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior. And "Dale's presence in the Boy Scouts would, at the very least, force the organization to send a message both to the youth members and the world that the Boy Scouts accept[ed] homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior." Consequently, the Court found that a state requirement that the Boy Scouts retain Dale "would significantly burden the organization's right to oppose or disfavor homosexual conduct," and concluded that the state interests embodied in New Jersey's public accommodations law did not justify such a severe intrusion on the freedom of expressive association.[1141]

[I442] A statute that mandates exclusive union representation in collective bargaining proceedings does not contravene the Constitution.[1142] And it is rational for a state to give the exclusive representative a unique role in a "meet and negotiate" process.

[1139] Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 548–49 (1987).

[1140] New York State Club Ass'n v. New York City, 487 U.S. 1, 13 (1988).

[1141] Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 650–59 (2000).

[1142] See also para. I446.

"The goal of reaching agreement makes it imperative for an employer to have before it only one collective view of its employees when 'negotiating.'" Furthermore, it is rational for the state to do the same in "meet and confer" sessions on employment-related questions not subject to mandatory bargaining. "[T]he goal of basing policy decisions on consideration of the majority view of its employees makes it reasonable for an employer to give only the exclusive representative a particular formal setting in which to offer advice on policy." Employees "may well feel some pressure to join the exclusive representative in order to give them the opportunity to serve on the 'meet and confer' committees or to give them a voice in the representative's adoption of positions on particular issues. That pressure, however, is no different from the pressure they may feel to join [the exclusive representative] because of its unique status in the 'meet and negotiate' process. Moreover, the pressure is no different from the pressure to join a majority party that persons in the minority always feel. Such pressure is inherent in [the American] system of government; it does not create an unconstitutional inhibition on associational freedom."[1143]

[I443] In Keller, the Court upheld against a First Amendment challenge a statute compelling membership in a state bar.[1144] The Court has also approved a federal law authorizing a "union shop" agreement,[1145] in light of the fact that the compulsory enrollment at issue imposed only the duty to pay dues.[1146]

3. Compulsory Fees

a. Compelled Contributions to Trade Unions

i. In General

[I444] In a series of cases, the Court has dealt with the constitutional validity of compelled contributions by employees to trade unions. The Court first addressed the question in Hanson, where it recognized the validity of a "union shop" agreement authorized by the Railway Labor Act (RLA). The challenged provision authorized an agreement that compelled union membership, rather than simply the payment of a service fee by a non-member employee. Finding that the concomitants of compulsory union membership authorized by the Act extended only to financial support of the union in its collective bargaining activities, the Court decided that the challenged arrangement did not offend First or Fifth Amendment values. Since, under the Commerce Clause, Congress had the power to identify "[t]he ingredients of industrial peace and stabilized labor-management relations," Congress could determine that it would promote peaceful labor relations to permit a union and an employer to conclude an agreement requiring employees, who obtained the benefit of union representation, to share its cost. The record in Hanson contained no evidence that union dues were used to force ideologi-[1143] Minnesota State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 290–92 (1984). In light of these considerations, the Court also rejected appellees' contention that their exclusion from "meet and confer" sessions denied them equal protection of the laws.

---

[1144] See para. I453.

[1145] Under a union shop agreement, an employee should become a member of the union within a specified period of time after hire and must, as a member, pay whatever union dues and fees are uniformly required.

[1146] See para. I444.

cal conformity or otherwise to impair the free expression of employees, and the Court noted that, "[i]f 'assessments' are in fact imposed for purposes not germane to collective bargaining, a different problem would be presented." But the Court squarely concluded that "the requirement for financial support of the collective bargaining agency by all who receive the benefits of its work does not violate the First Amendment."[1147]

[I445] Hanson did not directly concern the extent to which union dues collected under a governmentally authorized union-shop agreement may be utilized in support of ideological causes or political campaigns to which reluctant union members are opposed. The Court addressed that issue, under the RLA, in Street. Unlike Hanson, the record in Street was replete with detailed information and specific factual findings that the union dues of dissenting employees had been used to finance the campaigns of candidates for federal and state offices whom the plaintiffs opposed and to promote the propagation of political and economic doctrines, concepts, and ideologies with which they disagreed. The Court recognized that these findings presented constitutional questions of the utmost gravity, not decided in Hanson, and therefore considered whether the Act could fairly be construed to avoid these constitutional issues. The Court concluded that the Act could be so construed, since only "the expenses of the negotiation or administration of collective agreements, or the expenses entailed in the adjustment of grievances and disputes [fell within] the reasons . . . accepted by Congress why authority to make union shop agreements was justified."[1148]

[I446] It was not until the decision in Abood that the Court addressed the constitutionality of union security provisions in the public employment context. There, some non-union public school teachers challenged an agreement requiring them, as a condition of their employment, to pay a service fee equal in amount to union dues. The objecting teachers alleged that the union's use of their fees to engage in political speech violated their freedom of association guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Court agreed, and held that objecting teachers could "prevent the Union's spending a part of their required service fees to contribute to political candidates and to express political views unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representative."[1149] In so doing, the Court set out several important propositions. First, it recognized that "[t]o compel employees financially to support their collective bargaining representative has an impact upon their First Amendment interests."[1150] "Unions traditionally have aligned themselves with a wide range of social, political, and ideological viewpoints, any number of which might bring vigorous disapproval from indi-

---

[1147] Ry. Employees v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225, 233–38 (1956).

[1148] Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740, 768 (1961). As the Court made clear, this construction involved "no curtailment of the traditional political activities of the railroad unions. It mean[t] only that those unions [should] not support those activities, against the expressed wishes of a dissenting employee, with his exacted money." Id. at 770.

Two years later, in Railway Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 118 (1963), another RLA case, the Court reaffirmed that holding. It emphasized the important distinction between a union's political expenditures and "those germane to collective bargaining," with only the latter being properly chargeable to dissenting employees under the statute. Similarly, in Communications Workers v. Beck, 487 U.S. 735, 762–63 (1988), the Court held that the National Labor Relations Act authorized the exaction of only those fees and dues necessary to "performing the duties of an exclusive representative of the employees in dealing with the employer on labor-management issues."

[1149] Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 234 (1977).

[1150] Id. at 222.

vidual employees. To force employees to contribute, albeit indirectly, to the promotion of such positions implicates core First Amendment concerns."[1151] Second, the Court in Abood determined that, as in the private sector, compulsory affiliation with, or monetary support of, a public employment union does not, without more, violate the First Amendment rights of public employees. "The principle of exclusive union representation . . . is a central element in the congressional structuring of industrial relations. . . . The designation of a single representative avoids the confusion that would result from attempting to enforce two or more agreements specifying different terms and conditions of employment. It prevents inter-union rivalries from creating dissension within the workforce and eliminating the advantages to the employee of collectivization. It also frees the employer from the possibility of facing conflicting demands from different unions, and permits the employer and a single union to reach agreements and settlements that are not subject to attack from rival labor organizations. . . . The designation of a union as exclusive representative carries with it great responsibilities. The tasks of negotiating and administering a collective bargaining agreement and representing the interests of employees in settling disputes and processing grievances are continuing and difficult ones. They often entail expenditure of much time and money. . . . The services of lawyers, expert negotiators, economists, and a research staff, as well as general administrative personnel, may be required. Moreover, in carrying out these duties, the union is obliged 'fairly and equitably to represent all employees, . . . union and nonunion,' within the relevant unit. . . . A union shop arrangement distributes fairly the cost of these activities among those who benefit, and it counteracts the incentive that employees might otherwise have to become 'free riders'—to refuse to contribute to the union while obtaining benefits of union representation that necessarily accrue to all employees."[1152] Subsequently, the Court held that compelled contributions to support activities related to collective bargaining are "constitutionally justified by the legislative assessment of the important contribution of the union shop to labor relations established by Congress."[1153] In this connection, the Court indicated that the above considerations, which justify the union shop in the private context, are equally important in the public sector workplace. Consequently, the use of dissenters' assessments "for the purposes of collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance adjustment," approved under the RLA, was equally permissible when authorized by a state vis-à-vis its own workers.[1154] "The Court in Abood did not attempt to draw a precise line between permissible assessments for public sector collective bargaining activities and prohibited assessments for ideological activities. It did note, however, that, while a similar line must be drawn in the private sector under the RLA, the distinction in the public sector may be 'somewhat hazier.' . . . This is so because the 'process of establishing a written collective bargaining agreement prescribing the terms and conditions of public employment may require not merely concord at the bargaining table, but subsequent approval [1151] Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 516 (1991).

---

[1152] Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 220–22 (1977).

[1153] Id. at 222.

[1154] Id. at 224–26. The Court also established that the constitutional principles that prevent a state from conditioning public employment upon association with a political party similarly prohibit a public employer "from requiring [an employee] to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding a job as a public educator." Id. at 235.

by other public authorities; related budgetary and appropriations decisions might be seen as an integral part of the bargaining process.'"[1155] [I447] In Ellis, the Court examined the legality of burdening objecting employees with six specific union expenses that fell between the extremes identified in Hanson and Street: a quadrennial convention, litigation not involving the negotiation of agreements or settlement of grievances, union publications, social activities, and general organizing efforts. Construing the Railway Labor Act, the Court held that "when employees such as petitioners object to being burdened with particular union expenditures, the test must be whether the challenged expenditures are necessarily or reasonably incurred for the purpose of performing the duties of an exclusive representative of the employees in dealing with the employer on labor-management issues. Under this standard, objecting employees may be compelled to pay their fair share of not only the direct costs of negotiating and administering a collective bargaining contract and of settling grievances and disputes, but also the expenses of activities or undertakings normally or reasonably employed to implement or effectuate the duties of the union as exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit."[1156] Under this standard, the Court had little trouble in holding that petitioners should help defray the costs of the national conventions at which "the members elect[ed] officers, establish[ed] bargaining goals and priorities, and formulate[d] overall union policy." "Surely," the Court noted, "if a union is to perform its statutory functions, it must maintain its corporate or associational existence, must elect officers to manage and carry on its affairs, and may consult its members about overall bargaining goals and policy. Conventions such as those at issue are normal events . . . [and] essential to the union's discharge of its duties as bargaining agent."[1157] "Like conventions, social activities at union meetings are a standard feature of union operations. . . . While these affairs are not central to collective bargaining, they are sufficiently related to it to be charged to all employees; . . . these small expenditures are important to the union's members because they bring about harmonious working relationships, promote closer ties among employees, and create a more pleasant environment for union meetings."[1158] In addition, a magazine "is important to [a] union in carrying out its representational obligations, and a reasonable way of reporting to its constituents. . . . [But] [i]f the union cannot spend dissenters' funds for a particular activity, it has no justification for spending their funds for writing about that activity. By the same token, [the union might charge, under the Act,] objecting employees for reporting to them about those activities it could charge them for doing."[1159] Furthermore, the Court held that organizing expenses could not be charged to objecting employees, noting, inter alia, that "[u]sing dues exacted from an objecting employee to recruit members among workers outside the bargaining unit can afford only the most attenuated benefits to collective bargaining on behalf of the dues payer."[1160] By contrast, "[t]he expenses of litigation incident to negotiating and administering the contract or to settling grievances and disputes arising in the bargaining unit are clearly chargeable to [dissenters] as a normal incident of the duties of the exclusive

---

[1155] Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 517–18 (1991), quoting Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 236 (1977).

[1156] Ellis v. Ry. Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 448 (1984).

[1157] Id. at 448–49.

[1158] Id. at 449–50.

[1159] Id. at 451.

[1160] Id. at 452.

representative. The same is true of fair representation litigation arising within the unit, of jurisdictional disputes with other unions, and of any other litigation before agencies or in the courts that concerns bargaining unit employees and is normally conducted by the exclusive representative. [But] [t]he expenses of litigation not having such a connection with the bargaining unit are not to be charged to objecting employees."[1161] Finally, in Ellis, the Court also rejected a First Amendment challenge to the use of dissenters' funds for union conventions, publications, and social events. Recognizing that, "by allowing the union shop at all, [it] necessarily countenanced a significant burdening of First Amendment rights," the Court limited its inquiry to "whether the expenses at issue involve[d] additional interference with the First Amendment interests of objecting employees, and, if so, whether they [we]re nonetheless adequately supported by a governmental interest."[1162] Applying that standard to the challenged expenses, the Court found all three to be properly supportable through mandatory assessments. "The dissenting employees in Ellis objected to charges relating to union social functions, not because those activities were inherently expressive or ideological in nature, but purely because they were sponsored by the union. Because employees may constitutionally be compelled to affiliate with a union, the Court found that forced contribution to union social events open to all imposed no additional burden on their First Amendment rights. [Moreover,] [a]lthough the challenged expenses for union publications and conventions were clearly communicative in nature, the Court found them to entail little additional infringement of First Amendment rights 'and none that is not justified by the governmental interests behind the union shop itself.'"[1163]

[I448] In Lehnert, the Court relied on both public sector and RLA cases to hold that agency fees may be constitutionally assessed by public employee unions, if the chargeable activities "(1) [are] 'germane' to collective bargaining activity; (2) [are] justified by the government's vital policy interest in labor peace and avoiding 'free riders;' and (3) [do] not significantly add to the burdening of free speech that is inherent in the allowance of an agency or union shop."[1164] In the same case, a majority of the Court

---

[1161] Id. at 453. Although Ellis was a statutory case, it must be treated as reflecting the constitutional rule suggested in Hanson and later confirmed in Abood. See Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 555 (1991) (opinion of Scalia, J.).

[1162] Ellis v. Ry. Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 456 (1984).

[1163] See Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 518 (1991), discussing Ellis v. Ry. Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 456 (1984).

[1164] Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, 500 U.S. 507, 519 (1991). Four Justices held that, to be constitutional, a charge must at least be incurred in performance of the union's statutory duties. Id. at 557–58 (opinion of Scalia, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). Justice Scalia said: "The first part of the test that the Court announces—that the activities for which reimbursement is sought must be germane to collective bargaining activity—could, if properly elaborated, stand for the proposition set forth above. But it is not elaborated, and the manner in which the Court applies it to the expenditures before us here demonstrates that the Court considers an expenditure 'germane' to collective bargaining not merely when it is reasonably necessary for the very performance of that collective bargaining, but whenever it is reasonably designed to achieve a more favorable outcome from collective bargaining (e.g., expenditures for strike preparations). That, in my view, is wrong. The Court adds two further tests, which apparently all expenditures that pass the first one must also meet, but neither of them compensates for the overly broad concept of germaneness. I think that those two additional tests, which are seemingly derived from Part VI of the Ellis opinion, represent a mistaken reading of that case, but since they make no difference to my analysis of the expenditures at issue here, I need not contest them."

concluded that a teachers' union (Ferris Faculty Association (FFA), which was an affiliate of the Michigan Education Association (MEA) and the National Education Association (NEA)), could not constitutionally charge objecting employees for lobbying, electoral, and other union political activities outside the limited context of contract ratification or implementation;[1165] and for a public relations campaign meant to raise the esteem for teachers in the public mind and so increase the public's willingness to pay for public education.[1166] Conversely, the Court decided that a local bargaining representative may charge objecting employees for their pro rata share of the costs associated with otherwise chargeable activities of its state and national affiliates, even if those activities are not performed for the direct benefit of the objecting employees' bargaining unit. "The essence of the affiliation relationship is the notion that the parent union will bring to bear its often considerable economic, political, and informational resources when the local is in need of them. Consequently, that part of a local's affiliation fee which contributes to the pool of resources potentially available to it is assessed for the bargaining unit's protection, even if it is not actually expended on that unit in any particular membership year."[1167] The Court also found that the following union activities could constitutionally be supported through objecting employees' funds:

(1) NEA "program expenditures" destined for States other than Michigan and the expenses of an MEA publication, the Teacher's Voice, listed as "Collective Bargaining;"[1168]

(2) information services such as portions of the Teacher's Voice that concerned teaching and education generally, professional development, unemployment, job opportunities, MEA award programs, and other miscellaneous matters, since these services were neither political nor public in nature, were for the benefit of all, and were comparable to the de minimis social activity charges approved in Ellis;[1169]

(3) participation by FFA delegates in the MEA and NEA conventions and in the Coordinating Council meeting, an event at which bargaining strategies and representational policies were developed for bargaining units, since

---

[1165] Id. at 519–22, 527 (four-Justice plurality); id. at 559 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). The plurality stressed, inter alia, that charging dissenters for such activities would compel them to engage in core political speech with which they disagree, thus placing a burden upon their First Amendment rights that extends far beyond acceptance of the agency shop.

[1166] Id. at 528–29 (plurality opinion); id. at 559 (opinion of Scalia, J.). The plurality noted that "the public relations activities at issue entailed speech of a political nature in a public forum [and] public speech in support of the teaching profession generally is not sufficiently related to the union's collective bargaining functions to justify compelling dissenting employees to support it."

[1167] Id. at 523. This does not give the local union carte blanche, since there "must be some indication that the payment is for services that may ultimately enure to the benefit of the local's members by virtue of their membership in the parent organization," and since "the union bears the burden of proving the proportion of chargeable expenses to total expenses." Id. at 524.

[1168] Id. at 527. The Court's conclusion that unions may bill dissenting employees for their share of general collective bargaining costs of the state or national parent union was dispositive as to the bulk of the NEA expenditures.

[1169] Id. at 529. The dissenters noted that the newsletter was inherently communicative; hence the fact that what it communicated might be "for the benefit of all" did not lessen the First Amendment injury to those who did not agree. See id. at 560.

such conventions were essential to the union's discharge of its bargaining agent duties even though they were not solely devoted to FFA activities;[1170]

(4) expenses incident to preparation for a strike, since such expenditures fell within the range of reasonable bargaining tools available to a public sector union during contract negotiations and enured to the direct benefit of members of the dissenters' unit.[1171]

[I449] Finally, the Court has acknowledged that "[i]t would be impracticable to require a dissenting employee to allege and prove each distinct union political expenditure to which he objects; it is enough that he manifests his opposition to any political expenditures by the union."[1172] But that dissent "is not to be presumed—it must affirmatively be made known to the union by the dissenting employee,"[1173] who may first make known his objection to the union's political expenditures in his complaint filed in the court action.[1174] Although "the nonunion employee has the burden of raising an objection, . . . the union retains the burden of proof."[1175] "Since the unions possess the facts and records from which the proportion of political to total union expenditures can reasonably be calculated, basic considerations of fairness compel that they, not the individual employees, bear the burden of proving such proportion."[1176]

ii. Procedural Safeguards

[I450] In Hudson, a public sector case, the Court determined that the First Amendment requires unions and employers to provide procedural protections for non-union workers who object to the calculation of the agency fee. "[T]he objective must be to devise a way of preventing compulsory subsidization of ideological activity by employees who object thereto without restricting the union's ability to require every employee to contribute to the cost of collective bargaining activities."[1177] "Procedural safeguards are necessary to achieve this objective for two reasons. First, although the government interest in labor peace is strong enough to support an 'agency shop,' notwithstanding its limited infringement on nonunion employees' constitutional rights, the fact that those rights are protected by the First Amendment requires that the procedure be carefully tailored to minimize the infringement. Second, the nonunion employee—the individual whose First Amendment rights are being affected—must have a fair opportunity to identify the impact of the governmental action on his interests and to assert a meri-

---

[1170] Id. at 529–30.

[1171] Id. at 531–32.

[1172] Ry. Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 118 (1963). See also Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 241 (1977) ("To require greater specificity would confront an individual employee with the dilemma of relinquishing either his right to withhold his support of ideological causes to which he objects or his freedom to maintain his own beliefs without public disclosure. It would also place on each employee the considerable burden of monitoring all of the numerous and shifting expenditures made by the union that are unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representative.").

[1173] Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740, 774 (1961).

[1174] See Ry. Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 119, n.6 (1963).

[1175] Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 306 (1986).

[1176] Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 239, n.40 (1977), quoting Ry. Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 122 (1963).

[1177] Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 302 (1986), quoting Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Educ., 431 U.S. 209, 237 (1977).

torious First Amendment claim."[1178] Under Hudson, "employees must receive 'sufficient information to gauge the propriety of the union's fee;' . . . the union must give objectors 'a reasonably prompt opportunity to challenge the amount of the fee before an impartial decisionmaker;' . . . and any amount of the objector's fee 'reasonably in dispute' must be held in escrow while the challenge is pending."[1179] The Court also has held that when a union adopts an arbitration process to comply with Hudson's "impartial decisionmaker" requirement, agency fee objectors who have not agreed to the procedure may not be required to exhaust the arbitral remedy before challenging the union's calculation in a federal court action.[1180]

iii. Appropriate Remedies

[I451] If employees have made known to their respective unions their objection to the use of their money for the support of political causes, unions are without power to use payments thereafter tendered by them for such causes. However, the union shop agreement itself is not unlawful. Hence, to enjoin its enforcement would sweep too broadly.[1181] Moreover, an injunction prohibiting the union from expending dues for political purposes would be inappropriate, mainly because those union members who do wish part of their dues to be used for political purposes have a right to associate to that end, "without being silenced by the dissenters." "To attain the appropriate reconciliation between majority and dissenting interests in this area, courts should select remedies which protect both interests to the maximum extent possible without undue impingement of one on the other."[1182] As the Court suggested in Street, among the permissible remedies for dissenting employees are, first, "an injunction against expenditure for political causes opposed by each complaining employee of a sum, from those moneys to be spent by the union for political purposes, which is so much of the moneys exacted from him as is the proportion of the union's total expenditures made for such political activities to the union's total budget," and, second, "restitution to each individual employee of that portion of his money which the union expended, despite his notification, for the political causes to which he had advised the union he was opposed."[1183] The Court in Allen suggested, in addition, a "practical decree" that could properly be entered, providing for the refund of a portion of the exacted funds in the proportion that union political expenditures bear to total union expenditures and for the reduction of future exactions by the same proportion.[1184] Moreover, in Ellis, the

---

[1178] Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 302–03 (1986).

[1179] Air Line Pilots Ass'n v. Miller, 523 U.S. 866, 874 (1998), discussing and quoting Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 306, 310 (1986).

[1180] Air Line Pilots Ass'n v. Miller, 523 U.S. 866, 875–80 (1998). As the Court pointed out, the purpose of Hudson's "impartial decisionmaker" requirement is "to advance the swift, fair, and final settlement of objectors' rights," not to compel objectors to pursue arbitration. Id. at 877.

[1181] See Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740, 771 (1961).

[1182] Id. at 773.

[1183] Id. at 744–75. In proposing a restitution remedy, the Street opinion made clear that "[t]here should be no necessity, however, for the employee to trace his money up to and including its expenditure; if the money goes into general funds and no separate accounts of receipts and expenditures of the funds of individual employees are maintained, the portion of his money the employee would be entitled to recover would be in the same proportion that the expenditures for political purposes which he had advised the union he disapproved bore to the total union budget." Id. at 775.

[1184] Ry. Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113, 122 (1963).

Court determined that, under the Railway Labor Act, a "pure rebate approach" is inadequate. The Court explained that, under such an approach, in which the union refunds to the non-union employee any money to which the union was not entitled, "the union obtains an involuntary loan for purposes to which the employee objects."[1185] "[A] remedy which merely offers dissenters the possibility of a rebate does not avoid the risk that dissenters' funds may be used temporarily for an improper purpose."[1186]

b. Compulsory Dues to State Bars

[I452] In Lathrop, a Wisconsin lawyer claimed that he could not constitutionally be compelled to join and financially support a state bar association that expressed opinions on, and attempted to influence, legislation. Six members of the Court, relying on Hanson,[1187] rejected this claim. A four-member plurality noted that a state, in order to further its "legitimate interests in raising the quality of professional services, may constitutionally require that the costs of improving the profession in this fashion should be shared by the subjects and beneficiaries of the regulatory program, the lawyers, even though the organization created to attain the objective also engages in some legislative activity. Given the character of the integrated [state] bar [of Wisconsin,] . . . [which it purposed to serve the function] of elevating the educational and ethical standards of the Bar to the end of improving the quality of the legal service available to the people of the State, without any reference to the political process, . . . and in the light of the limitation of the membership requirement to the compulsory payment of reasonable annual dues," the plurality was "unable to find any impingement upon protected rights of association."[1188] Two other members of the Court concluded that "a State may constitutionally condition the right to practice law upon membership in an integrated bar association, a condition fully as justified by state needs as the union shop is by federal needs."[1189] The Lathrop plurality emphasized, however, that the Court was confronted, as in Hanson, only with a question of compelled financial support of group activities, not with involuntary membership in any other aspect.[1190]

[I453] The question expressly reserved in Lathrop was answered in Keller. There, the Court held that "the compelled association and integrated bar are justified by the State's interest in regulating the legal profession and improving the quality of legal services. The State Bar may therefore constitutionally fund activities germane to those goals out of the mandatory dues of all members. It may not, however, in such manner fund activities of an ideological nature which fall outside of those areas of activity. . . . [T]he guiding standard must be whether the challenged expenditures are necessarily or reasonably incurred for the purpose of regulating the legal profession or improving the quality of the legal service available to the people of the State."[1191] Hence, compulsory dues may not be expended to endorse or advance a gun control or nuclear weapons freeze ini-

---

[1185] Ellis v. Ry. Clerks, 466 U.S. 435, 443–44 (1984).

[1186] Chicago Teachers Union v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292, 305 (1986).

[1187] See para. I444.

[1188] Lathrop v. Donohue, 367 U.S. 820, 842–43 (1961).

[1189] Id. at 849 (opinion of Harlan, J., concurring in judgment).

[1190] Id. at 828–29. Justice Harlan would have reached this claim and decided that it lacked merit. Id. at 848–65.

[1191] Keller v. State Bar of California, 496 U.S. 1, 14 (1990).

tiative; but compulsory dues may be spent for activities connected with disciplining members of the bar or proposing ethical codes for the profession.[1192]

F. FREEDOM OF POLITICAL ASSOCIATION

1. General Considerations

[I454] "The freedom of association protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments includes partisan political organization."[1193] Thus, the Constitution guarantees "the right of citizens to associate and to form political parties for the advancement of common political goals and ideas."[1194] The freedom to join together in furtherance of common political beliefs "necessarily presupposes the freedom to identify the people who constitute the association, and to limit the association to those people only."[1195]

[I455] On the other hand, it is also clear that government "may, and inevitably must, enact reasonable regulations of parties, elections, and ballots to reduce election- and campaign-related disorder."[1196] In this context, "[r]egulations that impose severe burdens on associational rights must be narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. . . . However, when regulations impose lesser burdens, 'a State's important regulatory interests will usually be enough to justify reasonable, nondiscriminatory restrictions.'"[1197]

2. Organization and Internal Affairs of Political Parties—Selection of Party Nominees

[I456] "[P]olitical parties' government, . . . and activities enjoy constitutional protection."[1198] A party's "determination of the boundaries of its own association, and of the structure which best allows it to pursue its political goals, is protected" by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.[1199] And "the processes by which political parties select their nominees are . . . [not] wholly public affairs that States may regulate freely."[1200]

[I457] In Eu, the California Elections Code provided that the "official governing bodies" for a "ballot-qualified" party were its "state convention," "state central committee," and "county central committees," and that these bodies were responsible for conducting the party's campaigns. Separate statutory provisions dictated the size and composition of the state central committees (for example, the Code dictated the precise mix of [1192] Id. at 15–16. The Court also noted that an integrated bar can certainly meet its Abood obligation by adopting the sort of procedures described in Hudson (see para. I450). Id. at 17.

---

[1193] Tashjian v. Republican Party of Connecticut, 479 U.S. 208, 214 (1986).

[1194] See, e.g., Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 357 (1997).

[1195] Democratic Party of United States v. Wisconsin ex rel. La Follette, 450 U.S. 107, 122 (1981).

[1196] Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 358 (1997).

[1197] Clingman v. Beaver, 544 U.S. 581, 586–87 (2005), citing and quoting Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 358 (1997). "Any interference with the freedom of a party is simultaneously an interference with the freedom of its adherents." See Tashijian v. Republican Party of Connecticut, 479 U.S. 208, 215 (1986), quoting Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 250 (1957).

[1198] Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 358 (1997).

[1199] Tashijian v. Republican Party of Connecticut, 479 U.S. 208, 224 (1986).

[1200] California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 572–73 (2000).

elected officials, party nominees, and party activists who were members of the state central committees of the parties, as well as who might nominate the various committee members); set forth rules governing the selection and removal of committee members; fixed the maximum term of office for the chair of the state central committee (the Code limited the term of office of the chair of the state central committee to two years, and prohibited successive terms); required that the chair rotate between residents of northern and southern California; and specified the time and place of committee meetings. These laws directly burdened the associational rights of a party and its members by limiting "the party's discretion in how to organize itself, conduct its affairs, and select its leaders." Moreover, the laws did not serve a compelling state interest. As the Court emphasized, "a State cannot justify regulating a party's internal affairs without showing that such regulation is necessary to ensure an election that is orderly and fair."[1201] The state's claim that it had a compelling interest in the "democratic management of the political party's internal affairs" was without merit, since this was not a case where intervention was "necessary to prevent the derogation of the civil rights of party adherents," and since a state "has no interest in protecting the integrity of the [p]arty against the [p]arty itself."[1202] Nor were the restrictions justified by the state's claim that limiting the term of the state central committee chair and requiring that the chair rotate between northern and southern California helped to "prevent regional friction from reaching a critical mass," since a state "cannot substitute its judgment for that of the party as to the desirability of a particular internal party structure."[1203] In the same case, the Court also struck down a state rule that prohibited political parties from endorsing, supporting, or opposing any candidate in primary elections for partisan offices. Such a ban "directly hampers the party's ability to spread its message and hamstrings voters seeking to inform themselves about the candidates and issues" and thereby burdens the freedom of political speech of the party and its members. It also infringes a party's associational rights "to identify the people who constitute the association and to select a standard-bearer who best represents the party's ideology and preferences," by preventing the party from promoting candidates at the crucial primary election juncture. Moreover, the challenged ban did not serve a compelling governmental interest. The state's explanation that the ban advanced its claimed interest in party stability was untenable. "[T]he proposition that a State may enact election laws to mitigate intraparty factionalism during a primary campaign" [cannot stand.] To the contrary, . . . contending forces within the party can employ the primary campaign and the primary election to finally settle their differences. . . . [A] State may enact laws to prevent disruption of political parties from without, but not

---

[1201] Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Cent. Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 233 (1989).

[1202] Id. at 232.

[1203] Id. at 232–33. As the Court noted, Marchioro v. Chaney, 442 U.S. 191 (1979), was "not to the contrary. There [the Court] upheld a Washington statute mandating that political parties create a state central committee, to which the Democratic Party, not the State, had assigned significant responsibilities in administering the party, raising and distributing funds to candidates, conducting campaigns, and setting party policy. . . . The statute only required that the state central committee perform certain limited functions such as filling vacancies on the party ticket, nominating Presidential electors and delegates to national conventions, and calling statewide conventions. The party members did not claim that these statutory requirements imposed impermissible burdens on the party or themselves, so [the Court] had no occasion to consider whether the challenged law burdened the party's First Amendment rights, and, if so, whether the law served a compelling state interest." See Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Cent. Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 232 n.22 (1989), citing Marchioro, supra, at 197, n.12.

. . . laws to prevent the parties from taking internal steps affecting their own process for the selection of candidates." The state's additional claim that the ban was necessary to protect primary voters from confusion and undue influence was also rejected. "While a State may regulate the flow of information between political associations and their members when necessary to prevent fraud and corruption," the Court found no evidence that California's ban on party primary endorsements served that purpose.[1204]

[I458] In Tashjian, the Court struck down, as inconsistent with the First Amendment, a closed primary system that prevented a political party from inviting independent voters—registered voters not affiliated with any party—to vote in the party's primary. The state thus limited the party's "associational opportunities at the crucial juncture at which the appeal to common principles [might] be translated into concerted action, and hence to political power in the community."[1205] The interests asserted by the state as justification for the statute were judged insubstantial. "While the State [wa]s of course entitled to take administrative and financial considerations into account in choosing whether or not to have a primary system at all, . . . the possibility of future increases in the cost of administering the election system [wa]s not a sufficient basis" for infringing the party's First Amendment rights.[1206] The interest in curtailing raiding, a practice whereby voters in sympathy with one party designate themselves as voters of another party so as to influence or determine the results of the other party's primary, was not implicated, since the statute did not impede a raid on the party by independent voters who could register as party members and vote in the primary.[1207] Furthermore, "the State's legitimate interests in preventing voter confusion and providing for educated and responsible voter decisions in no respect ma[de] it necessary to burden the party's rights. . . . By inviting independents to assist in the choice at the polls between primary candidates selected at the party convention, the party . . . intended to produce the candidate and platform most likely to . . . appeal to the independent voter. The state statute [wa]s said to decrease voter confusion, yet it deprive[d] the party and its members of the opportunity to inform themselves as to the level of support for the party's candidates among a critical group of electors."[1208] Finally, even if the state were correct in arguing that the statute was designed to save the party from undertaking conduct destructive of its own interests, the state could not constitutionally substitute its judgment for that of the party, regarding the boundaries of the party's association.[1209]

[I459] Clingman presented a question that Tashjian had left open—whether a state may prevent a political party from inviting registered voters of other parties to vote in its primary. In that case, when the Libertarian Party of Oklahoma (LPO) notified the state Election Board it wanted to open its upcoming primary to all registered voters regardless of party affiliation, the Board agreed as to independents, but not as to other parties' members, for, under Oklahoma's semi-closed primary law, a political party could invite only its own registered members and voters registered as independents to vote in its primary. The Court first found that the law at issue did not severely burden associational rights, since (1) the law did "not regulate the LPO's internal processes, its author-

---

[1204] Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Cent. Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 222–29 (1989).
[1205] Tashjian v. Republican Party of Connecticut, 479 U.S. 208, 216 (1986).
[1206] Id. at 218.
[1207] Id. at 219.
[1208] Id. at 221–22.
[1209] Id. at 224.

ity to exclude unwanted members, or its capacity to communicate with the public," and (2) party disaffiliation was not difficult, and voters would have to make a minimal effort to reregister as independents or libertarians. Further, Oklahoma's primary advanced a number of important regulatory interests. It "preserve[d] political parties as viable and identifiable interest groups;" "enhance[d] parties' electioneering and party-building efforts;" and "guard[ed] against party raiding and 'sore lose'" candidacies by spurned primary contenders. Under these considerations, the Court concluded that Oklahoma's semi-closed primary system did not violate the right to freedom of association.[1210]

[I460] "A political party's choice among the various ways of determining the makeup of a State's delegation to the party's national convention is protected by the Constitution."[1211] In Cousins, the Court reviewed the decision of an Illinois court holding that state law exclusively governed the seating of a state delegation at the 1972 Democratic National Convention and enjoining the Democratic Party from refusing to seat delegates selected in a manner in accord with state law, although contrary to party rules, regarding participation of minorities, women, and young people, as well as other matters. The Court found that "Illinois' interest in protecting the integrity of its electoral process cannot be deemed compelling in the context of the selection of delegates to the National Party Convention." Subsequently, it held that the appellate court had erred in according primacy to state law over the party's rules in the determination of the qualifications and eligibility of delegates to the party's national convention.[1212]

[I461] A corollary of the freedom of political association is the right not to associate.[1213] Under Rodriguez, a state may vest in a political party the initial authority to appoint an interim replacement for one of its members who vacates a position as a district senator or representative. In such a case, the party is entitled to adopt its own procedures to select this replacement. Non-members' exclusion from this election does not violate their rights of association, nor does it deprive them of equal protection of the laws.[1214]

[I462] "In no area is the political [party's] right to exclude more important than in the process of selecting its nominee. That process often determines the party's positions on the most significant public policy issues of the day, and even when those positions are predetermined it is the nominee who becomes the party's ambassador to the general electorate in winning it over to the party's views."[1215]

[I463] In La Follette, the state of Wisconsin conducted an open presidential preference primary.[1216] Although the voters did not select the delegates to the Democratic Party's National Convention directly—they were chosen later at caucuses of party members—Wisconsin law required these delegates to vote in accord with the primary results. Thus, allowing non-party members to participate in the selection of the party's nominee conflicted with the Democratic Party's rules. The Court noted that "the inclusion

---

[1210] Clingman v. Beaver, 544 U.S. 581, 590–91, 594 (2005).

[1211] Democratic Party of United States v. Wisconsin ex rel. La Follette, 450 U.S. 107, 124 (1981).

[1212] Cousins v. Wigoda, 419 U.S. 477, 490–91 (1975).

[1213] See California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 574 (2000).

[1214] Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party, 457 U.S. 1, 14 (1982).

[1215] California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 575 (2000).

[1216] An "open" primary differs from a "blanket" primary in that, although as in the blanket primary any person, regardless of party affiliation, may vote for a party's nominee, his choice is limited to that party's nominees for all offices.

of persons unaffiliated with a political party may seriously distort its collective decisions—thus impairing the party's essential functions—and that political parties may accordingly protect themselves from intrusion by those with adverse political principles." Hence, the Court held that, whatever the strength of the state interests supporting the open primary itself, they could not justify this substantial intrusion into the associational freedom of members of the Democratic Party.[1217]

[I464] Similarly, Jones struck down a California statute that provided for a blanket primary, in order to favor nominees with "moderate" positions.[1218] Under this statute, each voter's ballot listed every candidate regardless of party affiliation and allowed the voter to choose freely among them, although the California Democratic Party, the California Republican Party, and other California parties had rules prohibiting persons not members of the party from voting in the party's primary. The candidate of each party who won the most votes was that party's nominee for the general election. Thus, the statute "force[d] political parties to associate with—to have their nominees, and hence their positions, determined by—those who at best ha[d] refused to affiliate with the party, and at worst ha[d] expressly affiliated with a rival. . . . In any event, the deleterious effects of [the statute] [we]re not limited to altering the identity of the nominee. Even when the person favored by a majority of the party members prevail[ed,] he [would] have prevailed by taking somewhat different positions—and, should he be elected, [would] continue to take somewhat different positions in order to be renominated. . . . Such forced association ha[d] the likely outcome—indeed, in this case the intended outcome—of changing the parties' message."[1219] The statute imposed a very heavy burden on a political party's associational freedom and was therefore unconstitutional unless it was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. However, none of California's proffered state interests—producing elected officials who would better represent the electorate, expanding candidate debate beyond the scope of partisan concerns, ensuring that disenfranchised persons would enjoy the right to an effective vote, promoting fairness, affording voters greater choice, increasing voter participation, and protecting associational privacy—was a compelling interest justifying California's intrusion into the parties' associational rights.[1220] Furthermore, the Court observed that even if all these state interests were compelling ones, the statute was not a narrowly tailored means of furthering them. The state "could protect them all by resorting to a nonpartisan blanket primary. Generally speaking, under such a system, the State determines what qualifications it requires for a candidate to have a place on the primary ballot—which may include nomination by established parties and voter petition requirements for independent candidates. Each voter, regardless of party affiliation, may then vote for any candidate, and the top two vote-getters (or however many the State prescribes) then move on to the general election. This system has all the characteristics of the partisan

---

[1217] Democratic Party of United States v. Wisconsin ex rel. La Follette, 450 U.S. 107, 122, 126 (1981).

[1218] California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 577–85 (2000).

[1219] Id. at 577, 579–81.

[1220] With respect to the confidentiality of one's party affiliation, the Court noted that "[e]ven if (as seem[ed] unlikely) a scheme for administering a closed primary could not be devised in which the voter's declaration of party affiliation would not be public information, . . . the State's interest in assuring the privacy of this piece of information in all cases [could not] conceivably be considered a 'compelling' one. If such information were generally so sacrosanct, federal statutes would not require a declaration of party affiliation as a condition of appointment to certain offices." Id. at 585.

blanket primary, save the constitutionally crucial one: primary voters are not choosing a party's nominee. Under a nonpartisan blanket primary, a State may ensure more choice, greater participation, increased 'privacy,' and a sense of 'fairness'—all without severely burdening a political party's First Amendment right of association."[1221]

[I465] Nevertheless, "a State may require parties to use the primary (or the convention) format for selecting their nominees, in order to assure that intra-party competition is resolved in a democratic fashion."[1222] And "[w]here the state law has made the party primary an integral part of the procedure of choice, or where in fact the primary effectively controls the choice" of government officials, the Fifteenth and Fourteenth Amendments apply to primaries.[1223]

[I466] Finally, "in order to prevent 'party raiding'—a process in which dedicated members of one party formally switch to another party to alter the outcome of that party's primary—a State may require party registration a reasonable period of time before a primary election."[1224] Rosario dealt with a New York statutory provision that, to vote in a party primary, the voter should have registered as a party member 30 days prior to the previous general election, a date eight months prior to the presidential primary and 11 months prior to the non-presidential primary. Those failing to meet this deadline, with some exceptions, were barred from voting at either primary. The Court found that, although the period between the enrollment deadline and the next primary election was lengthy, that period was "not an arbitrary time limit unconnected to any important state goal." The purpose of New York's delayed-enrollment scheme was to inhibit party raiding, a matter that bore on "the integrity of the electoral process." In the service of this legitimate and valid state goal, New York had adopted its delayed-enrollment scheme, and an integral part of that scheme was that, in order to participate in a primary election, a person should enroll before the preceding general election. Since "[a]llowing enrollment any time after the general election would not have the same deterrent effect on raiding, for it would not put the voter in the unseemly position of asking to be enrolled in one party while at the same time intending to vote immediately for another," the resulting time limitation for enrollment was in no sense invidious or arbitrary.[1225]

[I467] By contrast, Kusper struck down similar Illinois provisions aimed at the same evil, where the deadline for changing party registration was 23 months prior to the primary date. One consequence was that a voter wishing to change parties could not vote in any primary that occurred during the waiting period. "The Court did not retreat from Rosario or question the recognition in that case of the States' strong interest in maintaining the integrity of the political process by preventing inter-party raiding. Although the 11-month requirement imposed in New York had been accepted as necessary for an effective remedy, the Court was unconvinced that the 23-month period established in Illinois was an essential instrument to counter the evil at which it was aimed."[1226]

[1221] Id. at 585–86.

[1222] Id. at 572, citing Am. Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. 767, 781 (1974).

[1223] See United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 318 (1941); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 659–60 (1944); Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953). See, in extenso, paras. B15, B16 (state action).

[1224] California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 572 (2000).

[1225] Rosario v. Rockefeller, 410 U.S. 752, 760–62 (1973).

[1226] See Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 730, 731–32 (1974), discussing Kusper v. Pontikes, 414 U.S. 51, 60–61 (1973).

3. Ballot Access[1227]

[I468] "Restrictions upon the access of political parties and independent candidates to the ballot impinge upon the rights of individuals to associate for political purposes, as well as the rights of qualified voters to cast their votes effectively."[1228] "These associational rights, however, are not absolute, and are necessarily subject to qualification if elections are to be run fairly and effectively."[1229] "[T]o subject every voting regulation to strict scrutiny and to require that the regulation be narrowly tailored to advance a compelling state interest, would tie the hands of States seeking to assure that elections are operated equitably and efficiently."[1230] Thus, "[w]hen deciding whether a state election law violates First and Fourteenth Amendment associational rights, [the Court] weigh[s] the 'character and magnitude' of the burden the State's rule imposes on those rights against the interests the State contends justify that burden, and consider the extent to which the State's concerns make the burden necessary. . . . Regulations imposing severe burdens on parties' and candidates' rights must be narrowly tailored and advance a compelling state interest. Lesser burdens, however, trigger less exacting review, and a State's 'important regulatory interests' will usually be enough to justify 'reasonable, nondiscriminatory restrictions.'"[1231] "[E]laborate empirical verification of the weightiness of the State's asserted justifications" is not required.[1232]

[1227] See also paras. K152–K154.

[1228] Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 193 (1986). "The exclusion of candidates also burdens voters' freedom of association, because an election campaign is an effective platform for the expression of views on the issues of the day, and a candidate serves as a rallying point for likeminded citizens." See Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 787–88 (1983).

[1229] Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 193 (1986), citing Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 730 (1974).

[1230] Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 433 (1992).

[1231] Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 358 (1997), quoting Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 434 (1992). See also Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 288–89 (1992), requiring "a corresponding interest sufficiently weighty to justify the limitation."

Applying this test, Burdick sustained Hawaii's prohibition on write-in voting, finding that the state's asserted interests in avoiding the possibility of unrestrained factionalism at the general election and in guarding against "party raiding" during the primaries were legitimate, and sufficient to outweigh the "limited burden" that the write-in voting ban imposed upon voters' freedom of choice and association. In so holding, the Court rejected the petitioner's argument that the ban "deprive[d] him of the opportunity to cast a meaningful ballot," emphasizing that "the function of the election process is to winnow out and finally reject all but the chosen candidates," and that "attributing to elections a more generalized expressive function would undermine the ability of States to operate elections fairly and efficiently." See Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 438 (1992).

[1232] Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 364 (1997), citing Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 195–96 (1986). In the latter case, the Court said: "To require States to prove actual voter confusion, ballot overcrowding, or the presence of frivolous candidacies as a predicate to the imposition of reasonable ballot access restrictions would invariably lead to endless court battles over the sufficiency of the 'evidence' marshaled by a State to prove the predicate. Such a requirement would necessitate that a State's political system sustain some level of damage before the legislature could take corrective action. Legislatures, we think, should be permitted to respond to potential deficiencies in the electoral process with foresight, rather than reactively, provided that the response is reasonable and does not significantly impinge on constitutionally protected rights."

[I469] "A burden that falls unequally on new or small political parties or on independent candidates impinges, by its very nature, on associational choices protected by the First Amendment. It discriminates against those candidates and—of particular importance—against those voters whose political preferences lie outside the existing political parties. . . . By limiting the opportunities of independent-minded voters to associate in the electoral arena to enhance their political effectiveness as a group, such restrictions threaten to reduce diversity and competition in the marketplace of ideas."[1233] Furthermore, in the context of a Presidential election, state-imposed restrictions[1234] "implicate a uniquely important national interest. For the President and the Vice President of the United States are the only elected officials who represent all the voters in the Nation. Moreover, the impact of the votes cast in each State is affected by the votes cast for the various candidates in other States. Thus, in a Presidential election, a State's enforcement of more stringent ballot access requirements, including filing deadlines, has an impact beyond its own borders."[1235]

[I470] In Williams v. Rhodes, the Court was confronted with a state electoral structure that favored the two major particular parties—the Republicans and the Democrats—and, in effect, tended to give them a complete monopoly. The Court held unconstitutional the election laws of Ohio insofar as, in combination, they made it "virtually impossible" for a new political party, even though it had hundreds of thousands of members, or an old party, which had a very small number of members, to be placed on the state ballot, in the 1968 presidential election. The challenged laws made no provision for ballot position for independent candidates, as distinguished from political parties, and a new political party, in order to be placed on the ballot, had to obtain petitions signed by qualified electors totaling 15 percent of the number of ballots cast in the last preceding gubernatorial election. But this requirement was only a preliminary. For, although the Ohio American Independent Party in the first six months of 1968 had obtained more than 450,000 signatures (well over the 15-percent requirement), Ohio had nonetheless denied the party a place on the ballot by reason of other statutory burdensome procedures, requiring extensive organization and other election activities by a very early date, including the early deadline for filing petitions (February 7, 1968), and the requirement of a primary election conforming to detailed and rigorous standards. Because these restrictions, which were challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, severely burdened the right to associate for political purposes and the right to vote effectively, the Court ruled that the discriminations against new parties and their candidates had to be justified by compelling state interests. However, the state interests in "encourag[ing] compromise and political stability," and "in attempting to see that the election winner be the choice of a majority" of the state's voters were deemed insufficient to warrant such restrictions on voting and associational rights.[1236] [I471] Anderson v. Celebrezze involved an Ohio statute that required an independent candidate for President to file a statement of candidacy and nominating petition in

---

[1233] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 793–94 (1983).

[1234] The Constitution expressly delegates authority to the States to regulate the selection of Presidential electors (Article II, Section 1). But the Court has rejected the notion that Article II, Section 1, gives the states power to impose burdens on the right to vote, where such burdens are expressly prohibited in other constitutional provisions. See Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 29 (1968).

[1235] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 794–95 (1983).

[1236] Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 30–34 (1968).

March in order to appear on the general election ballot in November. The Court found that none of the three interests that Ohio sought to further by its early filing deadline justified the challenged provision and concluded that the statute imposed an unconstitutional burden on voters' freedom of choice and freedom of association.[1237] As to the state's asserted interest in voter education, the Court noted, inter alia, that "[i]n the modern world, it is somewhat unrealistic to suggest that it takes more than seven months to inform the electorate about the qualifications of a particular candidate simply because he lacks a partisan label." "The state's asserted interest in equal treatment for partisan and independent candidates was not achieved by imposing the early filing deadline on both, since, although a candidate participating in a primary election should declare his candidacy on the same date as an independent, both the burdens and benefits of the respective requirements were materially different, and the reasons for early filing for a primary candidate were inapplicable to independent candidates in the general election."[1238] Moreover, the state's asserted interest in political stability amounted to a desire to protect existing political parties from competition generated by independent candidates who had previously been affiliated with a party, an interest that conflicted with First Amendment values.[1239]

[1237] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 796–806 (1983). The Court based its decision directly on the First and Fourteenth Amendments and did not engage in a separate Equal Protection Clause analysis. Id. at 786–77, n.7.

[1238] Id. at 799. "The early filing deadline for a candidate in a party's primary election [wa]s adequately justified by administrative concerns. Seventy-five days appeared to be a reasonable time for processing the documents submitted by candidates and preparing the ballot. . . . The primary date itself [should] be set sufficiently in advance of the general election; furthermore, a Presidential preference primary [had] to precede the national convention, which [wa]s regularly held during the summer. Finally, the successful participant in a party primary generally acquire[d] the automatic support of an experienced political organization. . . . Neither the administrative justification nor the benefit of an early filing deadline [wa]s applicable to an independent candidate. Ohio d[id] not suggest that the March deadline was necessary to allow petition signatures to be counted and verified or to permit November general election ballots to be printed. In addition, the early deadline d[id] not correspond to a potential benefit for the independent, as it d[id] for the party candidate. After filing his statement of candidacy, the independent d[id] not participate in a structured intraparty contest to determine who [would] receive organizational support; he [should] develop support by other means." Id. at 800–01.

[1239] Ohio's challenged restriction was substantially different from the California provisions upheld in Storer (see para. I476). The filing deadline was "neither a 'sore loser' provision nor a disaffiliation statute." Furthermore, Storer upheld the state's interest in avoiding political fragmentation in the context of elections wholly within the boundaries of California. "The State's interest in regulating a nationwide Presidential election is not nearly as strong; no State could singlehandedly assure 'political stability' in the Presidential context. The Ohio deadline d[id] not serve any state interest in 'maintaining the integrity of the various routes to the ballot' for the Presidency, because Ohio's Presidential preference primary d[id] not serve to narrow the field for the general election. A major party candidate who los[t] the Ohio primary, or who d[id] not even run in Ohio, [might] nonetheless appear on the November general election ballot as the party's nominee. In addition, the national scope of the competition for delegates at the Presidential nominating conventions assure[d] that 'intraparty feuding' [would] continue until August. More generally, the early filing deadline [wa]s not precisely drawn to protect the parties from 'intraparty feuding,' whatever legitimacy that state goal [might] have in a Presidential election. . . . [T]he early deadline applie[d] broadly to independent candidates who ha[d] not been affiliated in the recent past with any political party. On the other hand, . . . Ohio did not prohibit independent candidacies by persons formerly affiliated with a political party." Id. at 804–05.

[I472] States may condition access to the general election ballot by a minor party or independent candidate upon "a preliminary showing of substantial support" among the potential voters for the office.[1240] In Jenness, the Court unanimously rejected a challenge to Georgia's election statutes that required independent candidates and minor party candidates, in order to be listed on the general election ballot, to submit petitions signed by at least 5 percent of the voters eligible to vote in the last election for the office in question. Primary elections were held only for those political organizations whose candidate received 20 percent or more of the vote at the last gubernatorial or Presidential election. The Court's opinion stressed that the system did not operate to freeze the political status quo, and observed that "there is surely an important state interest in requiring some preliminary showing of a significant modicum of support before printing the name of a political organization's candidate on the ballot—the interest, if no other, in avoiding confusion, deception, and even frustration of the democratic process at the general election."[1241]

[I473] In American Party of Texas v. White, candidates of minor political parties in Texas were required to demonstrate support by persons numbering at least 1 percent of the total vote cast for governor at the last preceding general election (in that instance, 22,000 signatures). Candidates could secure the requisite number of petition signatures at precinct nominating conventions and by supplemental petitions following the conventions. Voters signing these supplemental petitions had to swear under oath that they had not participated in another party's primary election or nominating process. In rejecting a First Amendment challenge to the 1-percent requirement, the Court asserted that the state's interest in preserving the integrity of the electoral process and in regulating the number of candidates on the ballot was compelling and reiterated the holding in Jenness that a state may require a preliminary showing of significant support before placing a candidate on the general election ballot.[1242] The Court also decided that a state "may determine that it is essential to the integrity of the nominating process to confine voters to supporting one party and its candidates in the course of the same nominating process," noting that, "[a]t least where the political parties had access to the entire electorate and an opportunity to commit voters on primary day, [there is] nothing invidious in disqualifying those who have voted at a party primary from signing petitions for another party seeking ballot position for its candidates for the same offices."[1243] Moreover, the Court considered that a period of 55 days, after the general May primary election, was not an unduly short time for circulating supplemental petitions, with the purpose to secure the entire 22,000 signatures.[1244] Finally the Court

---

[1240] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 789, n.9 (1983).

[1241] Jenness v. Fortson, 403 U.S. 431, 439, 442 (1971). The Court also rejected appellants' claim under the Equal Protection Clause, finding that it was not inherently more burdensome for a candidate to gather the signatures of 5 percent of the total eligible electorate than it was to win the votes of a majority in a party primary. Id. at 440–41.

[1242] Am. Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. 767, 782–83, n.14 (1974). The Court first held that the Equal Protection Clause did not forbid the requirement that small parties proceed by convention, rather than primary election, noting that the convention process had not been shown to be "invidiously more burdensome than the primary election, followed by a runoff election where necessary, particularly where the major party, in addition to the elections, must also hold its precinct, county, and state conventions to adopt and promulgate party platforms and to conduct other business." Id. at 781.

[1243] Id. at 786.

[1244] Id. at 786–87.

upheld the statutory requirement that all signatures evidencing support for the party be notarized, since the party had failed to demonstrate its impracticability or that it was unusually burdensome.[1245]

[I474] The principle set forth in Jenness and American Party of Texas was reaffirmed in Munro. There, the Court upheld a Washington statute requiring that a minor party candidate for office receive at least 1 percent of all votes cast for that office in the state's primary election before the candidate's name would be placed on the general election ballot. "Because Washington provide[d] a 'blanket primary,' minor party candidates [could] campaign among the entire pool of registered voters. Effort and resources that would otherwise be directed at securing petition signatures [could] instead be channeled into campaigns to 'get the vote out,' foster candidate name recognition, and educate the electorate." Consequently, the Court found no differences of constitutional dimension between requiring primary votes to qualify for a position on the general election ballot and requiring signatures on nominating petitions.[1246]

[I475] Nevertheless, a statute that furthers the legitimate state's interest in restricting the ballot to parties with demonstrated public support contravenes the Constitution, if it is not narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objective. If a state has determined that a specific number of signatures in a larger political unit adequately serves its interest in regulating the number of candidates on the ballot, more stringent signature requirements for new political parties and independent candidates seeking offices in a smaller political subdivision are clearly not the least restrictive means of advancing the aforesaid interest.[1247] Thus a "State's requirements for access to the statewide ballot become criteria in the first instance for judging whether rules of access to local ballots are narrow enough to pass constitutional muster."[1248]

[I476] In Storer, the Court faced a constitutional challenge to provisions of the California Elections Code that regulated the procedures by which independent candidates could obtain ballot position in general elections. The Code required candidates affiliated with a qualified party to win a primary election, but it required independents to make timely filing of nomination papers signed by at least 5 percent of the entire vote cast in the last general election. This percentage, as such, did not appear to be excessive, in light of the Court's holding in Jenness. However, in order to assess realistically whether the law imposed excessively burdensome requirements upon independent candidates, the Court found it necessary to know other critical facts that did not appear from the evidentiary record in this case. It was necessary in the first instance to know the "entire vote" in the last general election. The Court assumed that 325,000 signatures were required in total and also knew that this requirement should be satisfied within a period of 24 days between the primary and the general election. But it did not

---

[1245] Id. at 787.

[1246] Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 197 (1986). The Court also rejected appellees' argument that, since voter turnout at primary elections is generally lower than the turnout at general elections, the statute reduced the pool of potential supporters from which appellee party candidates could secure one percent of the vote, noting, inter alia, that "States are not burdened with a constitutional imperative to reduce voter apathy." Id. at 198.

[1247] Illinois Elections Bd. v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173, 185–86 (1979); Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 293–94 (1992).

[1248] Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 294 (1992). In that case, the Court also sustained a 25,000 signature rule, requiring the support of only slightly more than 2 percent of an electoral district's voters. Id. at 295.

know the number of qualified voters from which the requirement should be satisfied within this period of time. California law disqualified from signing the independent's petition all registered voters who had voted in the primary. In theory, it could be that voting in the primary was so close to 100 percent of those registered, and new registrations since closing the books before primary day were so low that eligible signers of an unaffiliated candidate's petition would number less than the total signatures required. This was unlikely, for it is usual that a substantial percentage of those eligible do not vote in the primary, and there were undoubtedly millions of voters qualified to vote in the 1972 primary. But it was not at all unlikely that the available pool of possible signers, after eliminating the total primary vote, would be substantially smaller than the total vote in the last general election, and that it would require substantially more than 5 percent of the eligible pool to produce the necessary 325,000 signatures. This would be in excess, percentage-wise, of anything the Court had approved as a pre-condition to an independent's securing a place on the ballot and in excess of the 5 percent in the Jenness case, which was higher than the requirement imposed by most state election codes. Therefore, further proceedings should be had in the district court to permit further findings with respect to the extent of the burden imposed on independent candidates for President and Vice President under California law. "Standing alone, gathering 325,000 signatures in 24 days would not appear to be an impossible burden. Signatures at the rate of 13,542 per day would be required, but 1,000 canvassers could perform the task if each gathered 14 signers a day. On its face, the statute would not appear to require an impractical undertaking for one who desired to be a candidate for President. But it [wa]s a substantial requirement. . . . [Hence,] it should be determined whether the available pool [wa]s so diminished in size by the disqualification of those who [had] voted in the primary that the 325,000 signature requirement, to be satisfied in 24 days, [wa]s too great a burden on the independent candidates for the offices of President and Vice President."[1249]

[I477] In the same case, the state contended that the signature requirements for independent candidates were of no consequence, because California had provided a valid way for new political parties to qualify for ballot position, an alternative that appellant could have pursued, since, under the Code, new political parties could be recognized and qualify their candidate for ballot position if, 135 days before a primary election, it appeared that voters equal in number to at least 1 percent of the entire vote of the state, at the last preceding gubernatorial election, had declared to the county clerks their intention to affiliate with the new party. The Court rejected the claim, emphasizing that "the political party and the independent candidate approaches to political activity are entirely different, and neither is a satisfactory substitute for the other. A new party organization contemplates a state-wide, ongoing organization with distinctive political character. Its goal is typically to gain control of the machinery of state government by electing its candidates to public office. From the standpoint of a potential supporter, affiliation with the new party would mean giving up his ties with another party or sacrificing his own independent status, even though his possible interest in the new party centered around a particular candidate for a particular office. For the candidate himself, it would mean undertaking the serious responsibilities of qualified party status under [state] law, such as the conduct of a primary, holding party conventions, and the promulgation of party platforms. But more fundamentally, the candidate, who was, by definition, an independent and desired to remain one, should surrender his independent status." The Court concluded that it could perceive "no sufficient state interest in conditioning ballot position for an independent candidate on his forming a new political party as long as the State is free to assure itself that the candidate is a serious contender, truly independent, and with a satisfactory level of community support."[1250]

[1249] Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 738–40 (1974). The Court also noted that, while the district court had taken the view that California law disqualified anyone who had voted in the primary from signing an independent's petition, whether or not the vote had been confined to non-partisan offices and propositions, it would be difficult on the record before the Court to ascertain any rational ground, let alone a compelling interest, for disqualifying non-partisan primary voters at the primary. See id. at 741. Furthermore, the Court observed that the district court, in determining whether, in the context of California politics, a "reasonably diligent" independent candidate could be expected to satisfy the signature requirements or would only rarely succeed in securing ballot placement, should consider not only past experience but also "the relationship between the showing of support through a petition requirement and the percentage of the vote the State can reasonably expect of a candidate who achieves ballot status in the general election." See id. at 742–43.

[I478] Storer also upheld California's statutory provisions that denied ballot access to an independent candidate, if the candidate had been affiliated with any political party within one year prior to the immediately preceding primary election. These laws were expressive of a general state policy aimed at maintaining the integrity of various routes to the ballot and discouraging "independent candidacies prompted by short-range political goals, pique, or personal quarrel." In recognizing the legitimacy of the state's interest in preventing "splintered parties and unrestrained factionalism," the Court sustained the provisions, in the face of a First Amendment challenge, as furthering the compelling state interest in maintaining the integrity of its political processes.[1251]

[I479] A party is not "absolutely entitled to have its nominee appear on the ballot as that party's candidate. A particular candidate might be ineligible for office, unwilling to serve, or another party's candidate."[1252] Timmons sustained Minnesota's ban of multiple-party, or "fusion," candidacies for elected office. As the Court emphasized, "[t]hat a particular individual may not appear on the ballot as a particular party's candidate does not severely burden that party's association rights. . . . [A 'fusion' ban] does not restrict the ability of [that] party and its members to endorse, support, or vote for anyone they like or directly limit the party's access to the ballot. . . . Instead, [such a provision only] reduce[s] the universe of potential candidates who may appear on the ballot as the party's nominee . . . [and] limit[s,] slightly, the party's ability to send a message to the voters and to its candidates. . . . [However,] [b]allots serve primarily to elect candidates, not as fora for political expression."[1253] Furthermore, since Minnesota's fusion ban did not impose a severe burden on a party's rights, the state was required to show not that the ban was narrowly tailored to serve compelling state interests, but that the state's asserted regulatory interests were sufficiently weighty to justify the challenged limitation on associational freedom. "States certainly have an interest in protecting the integrity, fairness, and efficiency of their ballots and election processes as means for

---

[1250] Id. at 745–46.

[1251] Id. at 735–36. See also Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 439 (1992) ("the State is within its rights to reserve the general election ballot for major struggles and not a forum for continuing intraparty feuds").

[1252] Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 359 (1997).

[1253] Id. at 359, 363.

electing public officials." Minnesota feared that "a candidate or party could easily exploit fusion as a way of associating his or its name with popular slogans and catchphrases, transforming the ballot from a means of choosing candidates to a billboard for political advertising." It was also concerned that "fusion would enable minor parties, by nominating a major party's candidate, to bootstrap their way to major party status in the next election and circumvent the State's nominating petition requirement for minor parties. . . . The State surely has a valid interest in making sure that minor and third parties who are granted access to the ballot are bona fide and actually supported, on their own merits, by those who have provided the statutorily required petition or ballot support." In addition, the Court stressed that the Constitution permits a state "to decide that political stability is best served through a healthy two party system. . . . States have a strong interest in the stability of their political systems. . . . This interest does not permit a State to completely insulate the two party system from minor parties' or independent candidates' competition and influence, . . . nor is it a paternalistic license for States to protect political parties from the consequences of their own internal disagreements. . . . [But] the States' interest permits them to enact reasonable election regulations that may, in practice, favor the traditional two party system, . . . and that temper the destabilizing effects of party-splintering and excessive factionalism. . . . And while an interest in securing the perceived benefits of a stable two party system will not justify unreasonably exclusionary restrictions, States need not remove all of the many hurdles third parties face in the American political arena." Under these considerations, the Court concluded that the burdens Minnesota's fusion ban imposed on a party's associational rights were justified by correspondingly weighty valid state interests in ballot integrity and political stability.[1254]

[I480] "To prevent misrepresentation and electoral confusion, [a state] may . . . prohibit candidates running for office in one [political] subdivision from adopting the name of a party established in another if they are not in any way affiliated with the party. The State's interest is particularly strong where the party and its self-described candidates coexist in the same geographical area." However, a statute that prohibits candidates running for office and seeking to expand an established party to another political district from adopting the established party's name "sweeps broader than necessary to advance electoral order, and accordingly violates the First Amendment right of political association." In such a case, the state can avoid the above-mentioned ills "merely by requiring the candidates to get formal permission to use the name from the established party they seek to represent, a simple expedient for fostering an informed electorate without suppressing the growth of small parties."[1255]

4. Freedom of Political Association of Public Employees

[I481] Subjecting a non-confidential, non-policy-making public employee to penalty for exercising rights of political association is tantamount to an unconstitutional condition. Elrod and Branti decided that the First Amendment forbids government officials to discharge or threaten to discharge public employees solely for not being supporters of the political party in power, unless party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the position involved.[1256] Rutan held that promotion, transfer, recall, and hiring deci-

---

[1254] Id. at 364–70.

[1255] Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 290 (1992).

[1256] Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976); Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980). See, in extenso, paras. H11–H12.

sions involving low-level public employees may not be constitutionally based on party affiliation and support.[1257] And O'Hare declined to draw a line excluding independent government contractors from the First Amendment safeguards of political association afforded to government employees.[1258]

[I482] Nevertheless, the government may restrict the political activities of civil servants. Under Mitchell, Congress has the power to prevent federal employees from holding a party office, working at the polls, and acting as party paymaster for other party workers.[1259] CSC v. Letter Carriers reaffirmed Mitchell and held that Congress can also constitutionally forbid federal employees from engaging in "plainly identifiable acts of political management and political campaigning, . . . such as organizing a political party or club; actively participating in fund-raising activities for a partisan candidate or political party; becoming a partisan candidate for, or campaigning for, an elective public office; actively managing the campaign of a partisan candidate for public office; initiating or circulating a partisan nominating petition or soliciting votes for a partisan candidate for public office; or serving as a delegate, alternate, or proxy to a political party convention."[1260] The Court found that these limitations on partisan political activities by federal employees were justified, because they insured that the government and its employees in fact "enforce the law and execute the programs of the Government without bias or favoritism for or against any political party or group or the members thereof" execute the laws impartially, and that "they appear to the public to be [doing so,] if confidence in the system of representative Government is not to be eroded to a disastrous extent."[1261] Moreover, the Court emphasized that the limitations were narrowly drawn, leaving federal employees free to vote as they chose and to express their opinions on political subjects and candidates.[1262] Similarly, Broadrick upheld a statute providing that no classified service employee "shall directly or indirectly, solicit, receive, or in any manner be concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment or contribution for any political organization, candidacy or other political purpose" and prohibiting any state classified employee from being an officer or member of a "partisan political club" or a candidate for "any paid public office" or from taking part "in the management or affairs of any political party or in any political campaign."[1263] And Clements rejected First and Fourteenth Amendment challenges to Texas' so-called "resign-to-run" provision. That provision treated an elected state official's declaration of candidacy for another elected office as an automatic resignation from the office then held. As the Court noted, the regulation represented a far more limited restriction on partisan political activity of state officeholders than the Court had upheld with regard to civil servants in Mitchell, Letter Carriers, and Broadrick.[1264] [1257] Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990). See, in extenso, para. H13.

[1258] O'Hare Truck Serv., Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712, 726 (1996).

[1259] United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 99–102 (1947). The Court noted, inter alia, that the challenged Act—which applied to both administrative employees of the government and industrial workers in its employ—proscribed only "active participation in political management and political campaigns" and relied on Congress' judgment that efficiency in public service might be best obtained by prohibiting active participation by classified employees in politics as party officers or workers.

[1260] United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, AFL-CIO, 413 U.S. 548, 556, 567 (1973).

[1261] Id. at 565.

[1262] Id. at 575–76.

[1263] Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 607–08 (1973).

[1264] Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. 957, 972 (1982). A four-member plurality noted that (1)

5. Campaign Finance

a. Contributions or Expenditures Limitations

i. In General

[I483] The giving and spending of money in political campaigns is intertwined with political expression and association. "Some forms of communication made possible by the giving and spending of money involve speech alone, some involve conduct primarily, and some involve a combination of the two. Yet, . . . the dependence of a communication on the expenditure of money [does not] operat[e] itself to introduce a nonspeech element or to reduce the exacting scrutiny required by the First Amendment."[1265]

[I484] "A restriction on the amount of money a person or group can spend on political communication during a campaign necessarily reduces the quantity and diversity of expression by restricting the number of issues discussed, the depth of their exploration, and the size of the audience reached. This is because virtually every means of communicating ideas in today's mass society requires the expenditure of money."[1266] "By contrast with a limitation upon expenditures for political expression, a limitation upon the amount that any one person or group may contribute to a candidate or political committee entails only a marginal restriction upon the contributor's ability to engage in free communication. A contribution serves as a general expression of support for the candidate and his views, but does not communicate the underlying basis for the support. The quantity of communication by the contributor does not increase perceptibly with the size of his contribution, since the expression rests solely on the undifferentiated, symbolic act of contributing. At most, the size of the contribution provides a very rough index of the intensity of the contributor's support for the candidate. A limitation on the amount of money a person may give to a candidate or campaign organization thus involves little direct restraint on his political communication, for it permits the symbolic expression of support evidenced by a contribution, but does not in any way infringe the contributor's freedom to discuss candidates and issues. While contributions may result in political expression if spent by a candidate or an association to present views to the voters, the transformation of contributions into political debate involves speech by someone other than the contributor."[1267]

---

candidacy is not a "fundamental right" that itself requires departure from traditional equal protection principles under which state law classifications need only be drawn in such a manner as to bear some rational relationship to a legitimate state end; (2) the challenged provision placed a de minimis burden on the political aspirations of an officeholder; (3) the provision furthered Texas' legitimate interests in maintaining the integrity of its Justices of the Peace by ensuring that they would neither abuse their position nor neglect their duties because of aspirations for higher office and, in discouraging its Justices of the Peace from vacating their terms of office, thereby avoiding the difficulties accompanying interim elections and appointments; (4) the provision was not invalid in that it burdened only those officeholders who desired to run for the legislature or on the ground that it applied only to certain elected officials and not to others. Id. at 962–71.

[1265] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 16 (1976) (per curiam). There, in addressing the speech claim, the Court explicitly rejected both O'Brien intermediate scrutiny for communicative action (see para. I300) and the similar standard applicable to merely time, place, and manner restrictions (see para. I301).

[1266] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 19 (1976) (per curiam) (emphasis added).

[1267] Id. at 20–21 (emphasis added).

[I485] The Court has flagged a similar difference between expenditure and contribution limitations in their impacts on the association right.[1268] While an expenditure limit "precludes most associations from effectively amplifying the voice of their adherents," the contribution limits "leave the contributor free to become a member of any political association and to assist personally in the association's efforts on behalf of candidates" and allow associations "to aggregate large sums of money to promote effective advocacy."[1269] The "overall effect" of dollar limits on contributions is "merely to require candidates and political committees to raise funds from a greater number of persons."[1270]

[I486] Hence, restrictions on campaign expenditures are subjected to closer scrutiny than limits on campaign contributions.[1271] Thus, "a contribution limit involving even significant interference with associational rights is nevertheless valid if it satisfies the lesser demand of being closely drawn to match a sufficiently important interest,"[1272] "though the dollar amount of the limit need not be 'fine tun[ed].'"[1273] In this context, a statute's tailoring is not constitutionally adequate, if the contribution limits imposed are "so low as to impede the ability of candidates 'to amass the resources necessary for effective advocacy.'"[1274]

ii. Contribution Restrictions[1275]

[I487] Congress' concern over the political potentialities of wealth and their untoward consequences for the democratic process led it to enact the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA). As amended in 1974, this statute, among other provisions, limited political contributions to candidates for federal elective office or to their authorized political committees, by an individual or a group, to $1,000 and, by a political committee,[1276] to $5,000 to any single candidate per election, with an overall annual [1268] "Contribution limits may bear more heavily on the associational right than on freedom to speak, . . . since contributions serve 'to affiliate a person with a candidate' and 'enable like-minded persons to pool their resources'" in furtherance of common political goals. See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 135 (2003), quoting Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 22 (1976).

---

[1269] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 22 (1976).

[1270] Id. at 21–22 (1976).

[1271] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U.S. 238, 259–60 (1986); McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 134 (2003).

[1272] McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 136 (2003). This less rigorous standard of review "shows proper deference to Congress' ability to weigh competing constitutional interests in an area in which it enjoys particular expertise. It also provides Congress with sufficient room to anticipate and respond to concerns about circumvention of regulations designed to protect the integrity of the political process." Id. at 137.

[1273] Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Gov't PAC, 528 U.S. 377, 388 (2000), quoting Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 30 (1976). A contribution limitation surviving a claim of associational abridgment would survive a speech challenge as well. See id. at 388.

[1274] Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Gov't PAC, 528 U.S. 377, 387 (2000), quoting Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 21 (1976).

[1275] A regulation restricting donations to a federal candidate, regardless of the ends to which those funds are ultimately put, qualifies as a contribution limit. See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 182 (2003).

[1276] The term "political committee" was defined to mean "any committee, club, association, or other group of persons which received contributions or made expenditures during a calendar year in an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000."

limitation of $25,000 by an individual contributor.[1277] In Buckley, the Court found that the government interest in preventing the actual or apparent corruption of federal candidates and officeholders constituted a constitutionally sufficient justification for the $1,000 contribution limitation.[1278] As the Court emphasized, "[t]o the extent that large contributions are given to secure a political quid pro quo from current and potential office holders, the integrity of [the American] system of representative democracy is undermined."[1279] The Court expressly rejected the argument that anti-bribery laws provided a less restrictive alternative to FECA's contribution limits, noting that such laws "deal with only the most blatant and specific attempts of those with money to influence government action."[1280] "Of almost equal concern as the danger of actual quid pro quo arrangements is the impact of the appearance of corruption stemming from public awareness of the opportunities for abuse inherent in a regime of large individual financial contributions. . . . [T]he avoidance of the appearance of improper influence 'is also critical . . . if confidence in the system of representative Government is not to be eroded to a disastrous extent.'"[1281] The Court also rejected the claim that the contribution lim-

---

[1277] The limitation reached "a gift, subscription, loan, advance, deposit of anything of value," or promise to give a contribution, made for the purpose of influencing a primary election, a Presidential preference primary, or a general election for any federal office. All contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions that were in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to such candidate, would be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate. The Act provided for a functional, not formal, definition of "contribution," which included "expenditures made by any person in cooperation, consultation, or concert, with a candidate." See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 222–23 (2003) (emphasis added).

[1278] As a general matter, "[t]he quantum of empirical evidence needed to satisfy heightened judicial scrutiny of legislative judgments will vary up or down with the novelty and plausibility of the justification raised. Buckley demonstrate[d] that the dangers of large corrupt contributions and the suspicion that large contributions [we]re corrupt [we]re neither novel nor implausible." Although mere conjecture is not adequate to carry a First Amendment burden, the Court has not required that governments enacting contribution limits must "demonstrate that the recited harms are real, not merely conjectural." See Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Gov't PAC, 528 U.S. 377, 391–92 (2000).

[1279] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 26–27 (1976).

[1280] Id. at 28. Thus, "[i]n speaking of 'improper influence' and 'opportunities for abuse' in addition to quid pro quo arrangements, [the Court has] recognized a concern not confined to bribery of public officials, but extending to the broader threat from politicians too compliant with the wishes of large contributors." See Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 528 U.S. 377, 389 (2000). See also Fed. Election Comm'n v. Colorado Republican Fed. Campaign Comm., 533 U.S. 431, 441 (2001) (acknowledging that corruption extends beyond explicit cash-for-votes agreements to "undue influence on an officerholder's judgment").

[1281] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 27 (1976), quoting United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. Nat'l Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548, 565 (1973). Cf. McCollum v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93 (2003) (see paras. I497–I498), where the Court upheld new FECA Section 323(e), which, with many exceptions, forbade federal candidates and officeholders to solicit, receive, direct, transfer, or spend "soft money" in connection with federal elections and limited their ability to do so for state and local elections.

Hence, the "speech by proxy" that is achieved through contributions to a political campaign committee is not the sort of political advocacy that is entitled to full First Amendment protection. And "[i]f the First Amendment rights of a contributor are not infringed by limitations on the amount he may contribute to a campaign organization which advocates the views itations in themselves discriminated against major party challengers to incumbents (because major party candidates receive far more money in large contributions), noting that the limitations might have "a significant effect on particular challengers or incumbents," but the record provided "no basis for predicting that such adventitious factors [would] invariably and invidiously benefit incumbents as a class." "Since the danger of corruption and the appearance of corruption apply with equal force to challengers and to incumbents, Congress had ample justification for imposing the same fundraising constraints upon both."[1282] And "any attempt to exclude minor parties and independents en masse from the Act's contribution limitations [would] overloo[k] the fact that minor party candidates [might] win elective office or have a substantial impact on the outcome of an election."[1283]

[I488] FECA excluded from the definition of contribution the value of services provided without compensation by individuals who volunteered a portion or all of their time on behalf of a candidate or political committee. Certain expenses incurred by persons in providing volunteer services to a candidate were exempt from the $1,000 ceiling only to the extent that they did not exceed $500. These expenses were expressly limited to (1) the use of real or personal property and the cost of invitations, food, and beverages, voluntarily provided by an individual to a candidate in rendering voluntary personal services on the individual's residential premises for candidate-related activities; (2) the sale of any food or beverage by a vendor for use in a candidate's campaign at a charge at least equal to cost but less than the normal comparable charge; and (3) any unreimbursed payment for travel expenses made by an individual who on his own behalf volunteered his personal services to a candidate. The Court held that these provisions were "a constitutionally acceptable accommodation of Congress' valid interest in encouraging citizen participation in political campaigns while continuing to guard against the corrupting potential of large financial contributions to candidates. The expenditure of resources at the candidate's direction for a fundraising event at a volunteer's residence or the provision of in-kind assistance in the form of food or beverages to be resold to raise funds or consumed by the participants in such an event provides material financial assistance to a candidate. The ultimate effect is the same as if the person had contributed the dollar amount to the candidate and the candidate had then used the contribution to pay for the fundraising event or the food. Similarly, travel undertaken as a volunteer at the direction of the candidate or his staff is an expense of the campaign and may properly be viewed as a contribution if the volunteer absorbs the fare. Treating these expenses as contributions when made to the candidate's campaign or at the direction of the candidate or his staff foreclosed an avenue of abuse without limiting actions voluntarily undertaken by citizens independently of a candidate's campaign."[1284]

[I489] FECA permitted "multi-candidate political committees" to contribute up to $5,000 to any candidate with respect to any election for federal office. In order to qualand candidacy of a particular candidate, the rights of a contributor are similarly not impaired by limits on the amount he may give to a multicandidate political committee," which advocates the views and candidacies of a number of candidates. See California Med. Ass'n v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 453 U.S. 182, 196–97 (1980) (four-Justice plurality).

---

[1282] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 32–33 (1976) (per curiam).

[1283] Id. at 34–35. See also McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 159 (2003).

[1284] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 36–37 (1976) (per curiam).

ify for the higher contribution ceiling, a group should have been registered as a political committee for not less than six months, have received contributions from more than 50 persons, and, except for state political party organizations, have contributed to five or more candidates for federal office. The Court found that, "[r]ather than undermining freedom of association," these provisions "enhance[d] the opportunity of bona fide groups to participate in the election process, and the registration, contribution, and candidate conditions serve[d] the permissible purpose of preventing individuals from evading the applicable contribution limitations by labeling themselves committees."[1285]

[I490] In addition to the $1,000 limitation on the non-exempt contributions that an individual might make to a particular candidate for any single election, the Act contained an overall $25,000 limitation on total contributions by an individual during any calendar year (a contribution made in connection with an election was considered to be made in the year the election was held). This ceiling imposed an ultimate restriction upon the number of candidates and committees with which an individual could associate himself by means of financial support. "But this quite modest restraint upon protected political activity serve[d] to prevent evasion of the $1,000 contribution limitation by a person who might otherwise contribute massive amounts of money to a particular candidate through the use of unearmarked contributions to political committees likely to contribute to that candidate, or huge contributions to the candidate's political party. The limited, additional restriction on associational freedom imposed by the over-all ceiling [wa]s thus no more than a corollary of the basic individual contribution limitation, . . . found to be constitutionally valid."[1286]

iii. Expenditure Restrictions[1287]

[I491] Buckley also examined the constitutionality of expenditure ceilings imposed by the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA). First, the Act prohibited any person, on pain of criminal sanctions, from making "any expenditure . . . relative to a clearly identified candidate during a calendar year which, when added to all other expenditures made by such person during the year advocating the election or defeat of such candidate, exceeds $1,000." In order to preserve the provision against invalidation on vagueness grounds, the Court construed the foregoing provision to apply only to expenditures for "communications that, in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate for federal office;" this construction would restrict the application of the provision to "communications containing express words of advocacy of election or defeat, such as 'vote for,' 'elect,' 'support,' 'cast your ballot for,' 'Smith for Congress,'

[1285] Id. at 35–36.

[1286] Id. at 38.

[1287] Congress may constitutionally provide that campaign expenditures that are coordinated with a candidate or party will be treated as contributions to, and expenditures by, that candidate or party. See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 202–03 (2003), and paras. I495–I496. Cf. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 46 (1976) (per curiam). Relatedly, the Court has rejected the contention that the presence of a pre-existing agreement marks the dividing line between expenditures that are coordinated—and therefore may be regulated as indirect contributions—and expenditures that truly are independent. As the Court noted, "expenditures made after a 'wink or nod' often will be as useful to the candidate as cash;" and "[a] supporter easily could comply with a candidate's request or suggestion without first agreeing to do so, and the resulting expenditure would be virtually indistinguishable from a simple contribution." See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 221–22 (2003).

'vote against,' 'defeat,' 'reject.'"[1288] Turning to the basic First Amendment question, the Court found that the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption was inadequate to justify the statutory ceiling on independent expenditures, which heavily burdened core First Amendment expression. The Court noted that, even if large independent expenditures posed the same dangers of actual or apparent quid pro quo arrangements as did large contributions, the challenged provision did "not provide an answer that sufficiently relate[d] to the elimination of those dangers." Unlike the contribution limitations' total ban on the giving of large amounts of money to candidates, the provision at issue prevented only some large expenditures. "So long as persons and groups eschew[ed] expenditures that, in express terms advocate[d] the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, they [we]re free to spend as much as they want[ed] to promote the candidate and his views. The exacting interpretation of the statutory language necessary to avoid unconstitutional vagueness thus undermine[d] the limitation's effectiveness as a loophole-closing provision by facilitating circumvention by those seeking to exert improper influence upon a candidate or officeholder. It would naively underestimate the ingenuity and resourcefulness of persons and groups desiring to buy influence to believe that they would have much difficulty devising expenditures that skirted the restriction on express advocacy of election or defeat, but nevertheless benefited the candidate's campaign. Yet no substantial societal interest would be served by a loophole-closing provision designed to check corruption that permitted unscrupulous persons and organizations to expend unlimited sums of money in order to obtain improper influence over candidates for elective office."[1289] "Second, quite apart from the shortcomings of the provision in preventing any abuses generated by large independent expenditures, the independent advocacy restricted by the provision d[id] not appear to pose dangers of real or apparent corruption comparable to those identified with large campaign contributions. The parties defending [the provision] contend[ed] that it [wa]s necessary to prevent would-be contributors from avoiding the contribution limitations by the simple expedient of paying directly for media advertisements or for other portions of the candidate's campaign activities. They argue[d] that expenditures controlled by or coordinated with the candidate and his campaign might well have virtually the same value to the candidate as a contribution and would pose similar dangers of abuse. Yet such controlled or coordinated expenditures [we]re treated as contributions, rather than expenditures under the Act. [FECA's] contribution ceilings, rather than [its] independent expenditure limitation, prevent[ed] attempts to circumvent the Act through prearranged or coordinated expenditures amounting to disguised contributions. . . . [And] [u]nlike contributions, . . . independent expenditures [might] well provide little assistance to the candidate's campaign, and indeed [might] prove counterproductive. The absence of prearrangement and coordination of an expenditure with the candidate or his agent [1288] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 44, n.52 (1976) (per curiam). "[A] plain reading of Buckley makes clear that the express advocacy limitation [there] was the product of statutory interpretation rather than a constitutional command." See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 191–92 (2003).

---

In McConnell, supra, at 193, the Court made clear that the First Amendment erects no "rigid barrier between express advocacy and so-called issue advocacy," noting that "the presence or absence of magic words," such as "Elect John Smith," "cannot meaningfully distinguish electioneering speech from a true issue ad."

[1289] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 45 (1976) (per curiam).

not only undermine[d] the value of the expenditure to the candidate, but also alleviate[d] the danger that expenditures [would] be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate. Rather than preventing circumvention of the contribution limitations, [the provision] severely restrict[ed] all independent advocacy despite its substantially diminished potential for abuse."[1290] Furthermore, the Court rejected the contention that "the ancillary governmental interest in equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections serve[d] to justify the limitation on express advocacy of the election or defeat of candidates imposed" by the challenged expenditure ceiling. As the Court stressed, "the concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of the American society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment, which is designed to secure the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources, and to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people."[1291] For these reasons, the Court concluded that FECA's independent expenditure limitation was unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

[I492] FECA set limits on expenditures by a candidate "from his personal funds, or the personal funds of his immediate family, in connection with his campaigns during any calendar year." These ceilings varied from $50,000 for Presidential or Vice Presidential candidates to $35,000 for senatorial candidates, and $25,000 for most candidates for the House of Representatives. The ceiling on personal expenditures by candidates on their own behalf, imposed a "substantial restraint" on the ability of persons to engage in protected First Amendment expression. "The candidate, no less than any other person, has a First Amendment right to engage in the discussion of public issues and vigorously and tirelessly to advocate his own election and the election of other candidates. Indeed, it is of particular importance that candidates have the unfettered opportunity to make their views known so that the electorate may intelligently evaluate the candidates' personal qualities and their positions on vital public issues before choosing among them on election day." The primary governmental interest served by the Act—the prevention of actual and apparent corruption of the political process—did not support the limitation on the candidate's expenditure of his own personal funds. "Indeed, the use of personal funds reduce[d] the candidate's dependence on outside contributions, and thereby counteract[ed] the coercive pressures and attendant risks of abuse to which the FECA's contribution limitations [we]re directed. The ancillary interest in equalizing the relative financial resources of candidates competing for elective office, therefore, provide[d] the sole relevant rationale for the ceiling on a candidate's personal expenditures. But this interest [wa]s clearly not sufficient to justify the provision's infringement of fundamental First Amendment rights. First, the limitation [might] fail to promote financial equality among candidates. A candidate who spends less of his personal resources on his campaign may nonetheless outspend his rival as a result of more successful fundraising efforts. Indeed, a candidate's personal wealth may impede his efforts to persuade others that he needs their financial contributions or volunteer efforts to conduct an effective campaign. Second, and more fundamentally, the First Amendment simply cannot tolerate [such a] restriction upon the freedom of a candidate to speak without legislative limit on behalf of his own candidacy." In light of these considerations, the Court struck down FECA's limitation on a candidate's personal expenditures.[1292] [I493] Buckley also invalidated FECA's limitations on overall campaign expenditures by candidates seeking nomination for election and election to federal office,[1293] since no governmental interest advanced in support of this provision was sufficient to justify "the restriction on the quantity of political expression imposed" by these limitations. "The major evil associated with rapidly increasing campaign expenditures [wa]s the danger of candidate dependence on large contributions. The interest in alleviating the corrupting influence of large contributions [wa]s served by the Act's contribution limitations and disclosure provisions, rather than by [the Act's] campaign expenditure ceilings. The . . . assertion that the expenditure restrictions [we]re necessary to reduce the incentive to circumvent direct contribution limits [wa]s not found persuasive. . . . There [wa]s no indication that the substantial criminal penalties for violating the contribution ceilings, combined with the political repercussion of such violations, [would] be insufficient to police the contribution provisions. Extensive reporting, auditing, and disclosure requirements applicable to both contributions and expenditures by political campaigns [we]re designed to facilitate the detection of illegal contributions. Moreover, the Act permit[ted] an officeholder or successful candidate to retain contributions in excess of the expenditure ceiling, and to use these funds for 'any other lawful purpose.' This provision undercu[t] whatever marginal role the expenditure limitations might otherwise play in enforcing the contribution ceilings."[1294] "The interest in equalizing the financial resources of candidates competing for federal office [wa]s no more a convincing justification for restricting the scope of federal election campaigns. Given the limitation on the size of outside contributions, the financial resources available to a candidate's campaign, like the number of volunteers recruited, [would] normally vary with the size and intensity of the candidate's support. There [wa]s nothing invidious, improper, or unhealthy in permitting such funds to be spent to carry the candidate's message to the electorate. Moreover, the equalization of permissible campaign expenditures might serve not to equalize the opportunities of all candidates, but to handicap a candidate who lacked substantial name recognition or exposure of his views before the start of the campaign."[1295] "The campaign expenditure ceilings appear[ed] to be designed primarily to serve the governmental interests in reducing the allegedly skyrocketing costs of political campaigns. . . . [However] the mere growth in the cost of federal election campaigns, in and of itself, provide[d] no legitimate basis for governmental restrictions on the quantity of campaign spending and the resulting limitation on the scope of federal campaigns. The First Amendment denies government the power

[1290] Id. at 45–47.
[1291] Id. at 48–49.

---

[1292] Id. at 51–54.

[1293] Presidential candidates could spend $10,000,000 in seeking nomination for office, and an additional $20,000,000 in the general election campaign. The ceiling on senatorial campaigns was pegged to the size of the voting-age population of the state, with minimum dollar amounts applicable to campaigns in states with small populations. The Act imposed blanket $70,000 limitations on both primary campaigns and general election campaigns for the House of Representatives. These ceilings were to be adjusted upwards at the beginning of each calendar year by the average percentage rise in the consumer price index for the 12 preceding months.

[1294] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 55–56 (1976) (per curiam).

[1295] Id. at 56–57.

to determine that spending to promote one's political views is wasteful, excessive, or unwise. In the free society ordained by [the] Constitution, it is not the government, but the people—individually, as citizens and candidates, and collectively, as associations and political committees—who must retain control over the quantity and range of debate on public issues in a political campaign."[1296]

[I494] The Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act (Fund Act) offered the Presidential candidates of major political parties the option of receiving public financing for their general election campaigns. Under the statute, if a candidate elected public financing, it would be a criminal offense for an independent political committee to expend more than $1,000 to further that candidate's election. Relying on Buckley and considering that independent expenditures (not made at the request of, or in coordination with, the candidate's election campaign committee or any of its agents) by political committees produce speech at the core of the First Amendment, the Court held in National Conservative Political Action Committee that the foregoing provision was constitutionally infirm, since it found "no tendency in such expenditures . . . to corrupt or to give the appearance of corruption." The Court noted that it was of course "hypothetically possible . . . that candidates might take notice of and reward those responsible for such expenditures by giving official favors to the latter in exchange for the supporting messages. [Nevertheless,] the absence of prearrangement and coordination undermine[d] the value of the expenditure to the candidate, and thereby alleviate[d] the danger that expenditures [would] be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate. [On the record of the case,] such an exchange of political favors for uncoordinated expenditures remain[ed] a hypothetical possibility, and nothing more. [In any case, even if] the large pooling of financial resources by [independent political committees] did pose a potential for corruption or the appearance of corruption, [the challenged provision wa]s a fatally overbroad response to that evil. It [wa]s not limited to multimillion dollar war chests; its terms appl[ied] equally to informal discussion groups that solicit[ed] neighborhood contributions to publicize their views about a particular Presidential candidate."[1297]

iv. Party Contributions and Expenditures

[I495] As observed above,[1298] the Federal Election Campaign Act treated coordinated expenditures as contributions. This functional treatment "prevent[ed] attempts to circumvent the Act through prearranged or coordinated expenditures amounting to disguised contributions."[1299] Colorado I was a challenge to FECA's provision, which imposed

---

[1296] Id. at 57.

[1297] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Nat'l Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U.S. 480, 497–98 (1985). The Court pointed out that it was not free to adopt a limiting construction that might isolate wealthy political committees, even if such a construction might save the statute. First, Congress plainly had intended to prohibit independent expenditures over $1,000 by all political committees, large and small. And even if it had not intended to cover small neighborhood groups, there was also no evidence in the statute or the legislative history that it would have looked favorably upon a construction of the statute limiting the provision only to very successful political committees. Secondly, the Court could not distinguish in principle between a political committee that had solicited 1,000 $25 contributions and one that had solicited 100,000 $25 contributions. Id. at 498–99.

[1298] See para. I491.

[1299] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 47 (1976).

dollar limits upon political party expenditures in connection with the general election campaign of a congressional candidate. This case arose as a result of the Federal Election Commission's enforcement action against the Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee (Party) for exceeding the campaign spending limit through its payments for radio advertisements attacking a Democratic congressman and senatorial candidate. The Party defended in part with the claim that the party expenditure limitations violated the First Amendment. The principal opinion in Colorado I observed that "[t]he independent expression of a political party's views is 'core' First Amendment activity no less than is the independent expression of individuals, candidates, or other political committees"[1300] and concluded that the limitations were unconstitutional as applied to the advertising expenditures at issue. The members of the Court who joined the principal opinion thought the payments were "independent expenditures," owing to the facts that the Party had spent the money before selecting its own senatorial candidate and without any arrangement with potential nominees.[1301] "The principal opinion found no reason to see these expenditures as more likely to serve or be seen as instruments of corruption than independent expenditures by anyone else. So there was no justification for subjecting party election spending across the board to the kinds of limits previously invalidated when applied to individuals and nonparty groups."[1302]

[I496] Nevertheless, the Party's broader claim remained: although prior decisions of the Court had upheld the constitutionality of limits on coordinated expenditures by political speakers other than parties, the congressional campaign expenditure limitations on parties themselves were facially unconstitutional, and so were incapable of reaching Party spending even when coordinated with a candidate. This claim was rejected in Colorado II. "The Party's argument that its coordinated spending, like its independent spending, should be left free from restriction under the Buckley line of cases boil[ed] down to this: because a party's most important speech is aimed at electing candidates and is itself expressed through those candidates, any limit on party support for a candidate imposes a unique First Amendment burden, . . . that justifies a stricter level of scrutiny than has been applied to analogous limits on individuals or nonparty groups, . . . [and, in any case,] reflects a fatal mismatch between the effects of limiting coordinated party expenditures and the prevention of corruption or its appearance."[1303]

[1300] Colorado Republican Fed. Campaign Comm. v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 518 U.S. 604, 616 (1996) (Colorado I) (opinion of Breyer, J., joined by O'Connor and Souter, JJ.).

[1301] Id. at 613–14.

[1302] See Fed. Election Comm'n v. Colorado Republican Fed. Campaign Comm., 533 U.S. 431, 444 (2001) (Colorado II), discussing Colorado I.

In McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 217–19 (2003), the Court invalidated new FECA Section 315(d)(4), under which a party that made any independent expenditure expressly advocating the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate was barred from making any expenditure in coordination with its nominee. In so holding, the Court noted that (1) under the foregoing provision, a political party's exercise of its constitutionally protected right to engage in core First Amendment expression "result[ed] in the loss of a valuable statutory benefit that ha[d] been available to parties for many years;" (2) "[t]o survive constitutional scrutiny, a provision that has such consequences must be supported by a meaningful governmental interest;" (3) the interest in requiring political parties to avoid engaging independently in express advocacy is not such an interest.

[1303] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Colorado Republican Fed. Campaign Comm., 533 U.S. 431, 445–46 (2001) (Colorado II).

However, this argument did not prevail. The Party's contention that "coordinated relationship between a party and a candidate so defines a party that it cannot function as such without coordinated spending, the object of which is a candidate's election," was belied by political history and political reality.[1304] This assertion was at odds with the history of nearly 30 years under FECA. The Party's claim amounted implicitly to saying that, for almost three decades, political parties had not been functional or had been functioning in systematic violation of the law; the Court could not accept either implication. Furthermore, the Court pointed out that when one looks "directly at a party's function in getting and spending money, it would ignore reality to think that the party role is adequately described by speaking generally of electing particular candidates. The money parties spend comes from contributors with their own personal interests. . . . Parties are thus necessarily the instruments of some contributors whose object is not to support the party's message or to elect party candidates across the board, but rather to support a specific candidate for the sake of a position on one, narrow issue, or even to support any candidate who will be obliged to the contributors. Parties thus perform functions more complex than simply electing candidates; whether they like it or not, they act as agents for spending on behalf of those who seek to produce obligated officeholders. It [wa]s this party role, which functionally unite[d] parties with other self-interested political actors, that [FECA's] Party Expenditure Provision target[ed.] This party role, accordingly, provide[d] good reason to view limits on coordinated spending by parties through the same lens applied to such spending by donors, like [political action committees,] that [could] use parties as conduits for contributions meant to place candidates under obligation."[1305] Subsequently, the Court concluded that a party's coordinated spending limitation should be subject to the same scrutiny applied to the other political actors—that is, scrutiny appropriate for a contribution limit, enquiring whether "the restriction is 'closely drawn' to match . . . the 'sufficiently important' government interest in combating political corruption."[1306] Noting that "circumvention is a valid theory of corruption,"[1307] the Court found that adequate evidentiary grounds existed to sustain the limit under the foregoing standard, on the theory that unlimited coordinated spending by a party raised the risk of corruption (and its appearance) through circumvention of valid contribution limits. Under the Act, a donor was limited to $2,000 in contributions to one candidate in a given election cycle. The same donor might give as much as another $20,000 each year to a national party committee supporting the candidate. "What a realist would expect to occur had occurred. Donors [were giving] to the party with the tacit understanding that the favored candidate [would] benefit. . . . [Hence, i]f suddenly every dollar of spending could be coordinated with the candidate, the inducement to circumvent would almost certainly intensify."[1308] Finally, the Court rejected the Party's claim that even if there was a circumvention threat, the First Amendment demanded a response better tailored to that threat than a limitation on coordinated spending. First, the Party's suggestion that better crafted safeguards were already in place in another FECA provision, under which contributions directed through an intermediary to a candidate should be treated as contributions to the candidate, ignored "the practical difficulty of identifying and directly combating circumvention

[1304] Id. at 449.
[1305] Id. at 450–52.
[1306] Id. at 456.
[1307] Id.
[1308] Id. at 458, 460.

under actual political conditions."[1309] The Party's second preferred prescription for the threat of an end run called for replacing limits on coordinated expenditures by parties with limits on contributions to parties, the latter supposedly imposing a lesser First Amendment burden. "The Party thus invoke[d] the general rule that contribution limits take a lesser First Amendment toll, expenditure limits a greater one. That was one strand of the reasoning in Buckley itself, which rejected the argument that limitations on independent expenditures by individuals, groups, and candidates were justifiable in order to avoid circumvention of contribution limitations. . . . It was also one strand of the logic of the Colorado I principal opinion in rejecting the Party Expenditure Provision's application to independent party expenditures. . . . In each of those cases, however, the Court's reasoning contained another strand. The analysis ultimately turned on the understanding that the expenditures at issue were not potential alter egos for contributions, but were independent and therefore functionally true expenditures, qualifying for the most demanding First Amendment scrutiny employed in Buckley."[1310] But in Colorado II just the opposite was true. "There [wa]s no significant functional difference between a party's coordinated expenditure and a direct party contribution to the candidate, and there [wa]s good reason to expect that a party's right of unlimited coordinated spending would attract increased contributions to parties to finance exactly that kind of spending and undermine contribution limits. Therefore the choice [t]here [wa]s not, as in Buckley and Colorado I, between a limit on pure contributions and pure expenditures. The choice [wa]s between limiting contributions and limiting expenditures whose special value as expenditures [wa]s also the source of their power to corrupt. Congress [wa]s entitled to its choice."[1311] For these reasons, the Court concluded that "a party's coordinated expenditures, unlike expenditures truly independent, may be restricted to minimize circumvention of contribution limits."[1312]

[I497] FECA's disclosure requirements and source and amount limitations extended only to so-called "hard money" contributions made for the purpose of influencing an election for federal office. Political parties were able to circumvent FECA's limitations by accepting contributions of "soft money," used for activities intended to influence state or local elections; for mixed-purpose activities, such as get-out-the-vote drives and generic party advertising; and for legislative advocacy advertisements, even if they mentioned a federal candidate's name, so long as the ads did not expressly advocate the candidate's election or defeat.[1313] In enacting the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), which amended FECA, Congress primarily sought to plug the soft-money loophole. The cornerstone of this effort, was new FECA Section 323(a), which prohibited national party committees and their agents from soliciting, receiving, directing, or spending any soft money.[1314] The remaining provisions of new FECA Section 323 largely rein-

---

[1309] Id. at 462.

[1310] Id. at 463.

[1311] Id. at 464–65.

[1312] Id. at 465. The four dissenters stressed that "it makes no sense to contravene a political party's core First Amendment rights because of what a third party might unlawfully try to do" and that, "[i]nstead of broadly restricting political parties' speech, the Government should have pursued better-tailored alternatives for combating the alleged corruption," such as lowering the statutory cap for donations to the national committee of a political party. Id. at 482.

[1313] See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 122–24 (2003).

[1314] Under this provision, "national committee[s] of a political party . . . may not solicit, receive, or direct to another person a contribution, donation, or transfer of funds or any other forced the restrictions in Section 323(a). New FECA Section 323(b) prevented the wholesale shift of soft-money influence from national to state party committees by prohibiting state and local party committees from using such funds for (mixed-purpose) activities that affected federal elections. New FECA Section 323(d) reinforced these soft-money restrictions by prohibiting political parties from soliciting and donating funds to tax-exempt organizations that engaged in electioneering activities. New FECA Section 323(e) restricted federal candidates and officeholders from receiving, spending, or soliciting soft money in connection with federal elections and limited their ability to do so in connection with state and local elections. Finally, new FECA Section 323(f) prevented circumvention of the restrictions on national, state, and local party committees by prohibiting state and local candidates from raising and spending soft money to fund advertisements and other public communications that promoted or attacked federal candidates.[1315] In McConnell, the Court emphasized that, like the contribution limits upheld in Buckley, Section 323's restrictions had "only a marginal impact on the ability of contributors, candidates, officeholders, and parties to engage in effective political speech. . . . Complex as its provisions [might] be, § 323, in the main, d[id] little more than regulate the ability of wealthy individuals, corporations, and unions to contribute large sums of money to influence federal elections, federal candidates, and federal officeholders." The contention that strict scrutiny should be applied to Section 323, because many of its provisions restricted not only contributions but also the spending and solicitation of funds raised outside of FECA's contribution limits, could not prevail. As the Court pointed out, "for purposes of determining the level of scrutiny, it was irrelevant that Congress chose in § 323 to regulate contributions on the demand, rather than the supply, side. The relevant inquiry [wa]s whether the mechanism adopted to implement the contribution limit, or to prevent circumvention of that limit, burdened speech in a way that a direct restriction on the contribution itself would not. . . . [W]hile § 323(a) prohibit[ed] national parties from receiving or spending nonfederal money, and § 323(b) prohibit[ed] state party committees from spending nonfederal money on federal election activities, neither provision in any way limit[ed] the total amount of money parties [could] spend. . . . Rather, they simply limit[ed] the source and individual amount of donations. That they d[id] so by prohibiting the spending of soft money d[id] not render them expenditure limitations."[1316] "Similarly, the solicitation provisions of § 323(a) and § 323(e), which restrict[ed] the ability of national party committees, federal candidates, and federal officeholders to solicit nonfederal funds, [left] open ample opportunities for soliciting federal funds on behalf of entities subject to FECA's source and amount restrictions. Even §323(d), which on its face enact[ed] a blanket ban on party solicitations of funds to certain tax-exempt organizations, nevertheless allow[ed parties to solicit funds to the organizations' federal [political action committees]. . . . And as with §323(a), §323(d) place[d] no limits on other means of endorsing tax-exempt organizations or any restrictions on solicitations by party officers acting in their individual capacities."[1317] Subsequently, the Court applied the less rig-thing of value, or spend any funds, that are not subject to the limitations, prohibitions, and reporting requirements of this Act." The prohibition extended to "any officer or agent acting on behalf of such a national committee, and any entity that is directly or indirectly established, financed, or maintained, or controlled by such a national committee."

---

[1315] See McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 133–34 (2003).

[1316] Id. at 138–39.

[1317] Id. at 139.

orous scrutiny standard applicable to contribution limits to evaluate the constitutionality of new FECA Section 323.

[I498] In this context, the Court, first, reiterated that the governmental interest in preventing the actual or apparent corruption of federal candidates and officeholders constitutes a sufficiently important interest to justify not only contribution limits themselves but also laws preventing the circumvention of such limits, such as Section 323(a).[1318] Next it rejected the claim that Section 323(a) was impermissibly overbroad, because it subjected all funds raised and spent by national parties to FECA's hard-money source and amount limits, including funds spent on purely state and local elections in which no federal office was at stake. "As the record demonstrate[d], it [wa]s the close relationship between federal officeholders and the national parties, as well as the means by which parties ha[d] traded on that relationship, that ha[d] made all large soft money contributions to national parties suspect," regardless of how those funds were ultimately used. . . . The Government's strong interests in preventing corruption, and particularly its appearance, [we]re thus sufficient to justify subjecting all donations to national parties to FECA's source, amount, and disclosure limitations."[1319] Furthermore the prohibition's reach was "limited," since it barred only soft-money solicitations by national party committees and party officers acting in their official capacities. "The committees remain[ed] free to solicit hard money on their own behalf, as well as to solicit hard money on behalf of state committees and state and local candidates. They also [could] contribute hard money to state committees and to candidates. In accordance with FEC regulations, furthermore, officers of national parties [we]re free to solicit soft money in their individual capacities, or, if they [we]re also officials of state parties, in that capacity."[1320] Plaintiffs argued unpersuasively that the solicitation ban's overbreadth was demonstrated by Section 323(e), which allowed federal candidates and officeholders to solicit limited amounts of soft money from individual donors under certain circumstances. "The differences between §§ 323(a) and 323(e), however, [we]re without constitutional significance," since they "reflect[ed] Congress' reasonable and expert judgments about national committees' functions and their interactions with officeholders."[1321] Nor was Section 323(a) substantially overbroad with respect to the speech and associational rights of minor parties. As the Court noted, "the relevance of the interest in avoiding actual or apparent corruption is not a function of the number of legislators a given party manages to elect. It applies as much to a minor party that manages to elect only one of its members to federal office as it does to a major party whose members make up a majority of Congress. It is therefore reasonable to require that all parties and all candidates follow the same set of rules designed to protect the integrity of the electoral process."[1322] [I499] "[G]iven the close ties between federal candidates and state party committees, BCRA's restrictions on national committee activity [c]ould rapidly become ineffective if state and local committees remained available as a conduit for soft-money donations. Section 323(b) [wa]s designed to foreclose wholesale evasion of § 323(a)'s anti-corruption measures by sharply curbing state committees' ability to use large soft-money

[1318] Id. at 144.
[1319] Id. at 154, 156.
[1320] Id. at 157.
[1321] Id. at 158.
[1322] Id. at 159.

contributions to influence federal elections. The core of § 323(b) [wa]s a straightforward contribution regulation: it prevent[ed] donors from contributing nonfederal funds to state and local party committees to help finance 'Federal election activity.'"[1323] This term encompassed four distinct categories of electioneering: (1) voter registration activity during the 120 days preceding a regularly scheduled federal election; (2) voter identification, "get-out-the-vote," and generic campaign activity that was conducted in "connection with an election in which a candidate for Federal office appears on the ballot;" (3) any "public communication that refers to a clearly identified candidate for Federal office" and "promotes," "supports," "attacks," or "opposes" a candidate for that office; and (4) the services provided by a state committee employee who dedicated more than 25 percent of his or her time to "activities in connection with a Federal election." The Act explicitly excluded several categories of activity from this definition: public communications that referred solely to non-federal candidates; contributions to nonfederal candidates; state and local political conventions; and the cost of grassroots campaign materials like bumper stickers that referred only to state candidates. All activities that fell within the statutory definition should be funded with hard money. The Levin amendment carved out an exception to this general rule, allowing state and local party committees to pay for certain federal election activities—namely, activities falling within categories (1) and (2) above that either did not refer to a clearly identified candidate for federal office or, if they involved broadcast communications, referred solely to a clearly identified candidate for state or local office—with an allocated ratio of hard money and funds raised within an annual limit of $10,000 per person.[1324] The Court found Section 323(b) served the "important governmental interest" in "[p]reventing corrupting activity from shifting wholesale to state committees and thereby eviscerating FECA."[1325] In addition, it rejected the claim that Section 323(b) represented a pervasive federal regulation of state-focused electioneering activities that could not possibly corrupt or appear to corrupt federal officeholders. By limiting its reach to "Federal election activities," Section 323(b) was "narrowly focused on regulating contributions that pose the greatest risk of . . . corruption: those contributions to state and local parties that can be used to benefit federal candidates directly. Further, these regulations all [we]re reasonably tailored, with various temporal and substantive limitations designed to focus the regulations on the important anti-corruption interests to be served."[1326] The first two categories of "Federal election activity" clearly captured activities that conferred a substantial benefit on federal candidates. And if a voter registration drive did not specifically mention a federal candidate, state committees could take advantage of the Levin amendment's higher contribution limits and relaxed source restrictions.[1327] As regards the third category of "Federal election activity," because the record demonstrated abundantly that public communications promoting or attacking a federal candidate directly affected the election in which that candidate was participating, application of Section 323(b)'s contribution caps to such communications was closely drawn to the anti-corruption interest it was intended to address. Finally, Congress' interest in preventing circumvention of Section 323(b)'s other restrictions justified the requirement of the fourth category of "Federal election activity" that federal funds be

[1323] Id. at 161–62.
[1324] See id. at 162–64.
[1325] Id. at 165–66.
[1326] Id. at 167.
[1327] Id. at 167–69.

used to pay any state or local party employee who spent more than 25 percent of his or her compensated time on activities connected with a federal election. "In the absence of this provision, a party might use soft money to pay for the equivalent of a full-time employee engaged in federal electioneering, by the simple expedient of dividing the federal workload among multiple employees."[1328]

[I500] New FECA Section 323(d), which forbade national, state, and local party committees and their agents to "solicit any funds for, or make or direct any donations" to tax-exempt organizations making expenditures in connection with a federal election, and to political organizations other than a political committee, a state, district, or local committee of a political party, or the authorized campaign committee of a candidate for state or local office, was upheld as a valid anti-circumvention measure.[1329] Absent such a provision, "national, state, and local party committees would have significant incentives to mobilize their formidable fundraising apparatuses, including the peddling of access to federal officeholders, into the service of like-minded tax-exempt organizations that conducted activities benefiting their candidates" and to launder large sums of soft money through tax-exempt organizations engaging in federal election activities. Moreover, Section 323(d)'s solicitation restriction was "closely drawn to prevent political parties from using tax-exempt organizations as soft-money surrogates. Though phrased as an absolute prohibition, the restriction d[id] nothing more than subject contributions solicited by parties to FECA's regulatory regime, leaving open substantial opportunities for solicitation and other expressive activity in support of these organizations."[1330] And in order to avoid overbreadth problems, the Court construed Section 323(d)'s restriction on donations to apply only to donations of funds not raised in compliance with FECA.[1331]

[I501] New FECA Section 323(f) prohibited state and local candidates or officeholders from raising and spending soft money to fund ads and other public communications promoting or attacking federal candidates. Exempted from this restriction were communications made in connection with an election for state or local office that referred only to the state or local candidate or officeholder making the expenditure or to any other candidate for the same state or local office. The section placed no cap on the funds that such candidates could spend on any activity, but, rather, it "limit[ed] only the source and amount of contributions that [they could] draw on to fund expenditures that directly impacted federal elections. And, by regulating only contributions used to fund public communications, § 323(f) focuse[d] narrowly on those soft-money donations with the greatest potential to corrupt or give rise to the appearance of corruption of federal candidates and officeholders." Section 323(f) was thus sustained as a valid anti-circumvention provision.[1332]

[1328] Id. at 170–71.

[1329] Id. at 174–84.

[1330] Id. at 175, 177.

[1331] Id. at 179–81.

[1332] Id. at 184–85. The Court also rejected the argument that Section 323 violated the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment by discriminating against political parties in favor of special interest groups, which remained free to raise soft money to fund voter registration, "get-out-the-vote" activities, mailings, and broadcast advertising. In doing so, the Court noted not only that BCRA actually favored political parties in many ways (e.g., party committees were entitled to receive individual contributions that substantially

v. Corporate Financing

[I502] "State law grants corporations special advantages—such as limited liability, perpetual life, and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets—that enhance their ability to attract capital and to deploy their resources in ways that maximize the return on their shareholders' investments. These state-created advantages not only allow corporations to play a dominant role in the [American] economy, but also permit them to use resources amassed in the economic marketplace to obtain an unfair advantage in the political marketplace."[1333] "Hence, the public interest in 'restrict[ing] the influence of political war chests funneled through the corporate form.'"[1334] A statute that prohibits corporations from using treasury funds to make an expenditure in connection with any federal or state election is not only intended to prevent corruption or the appearance of corruption. It also protects "the individuals who have paid money into a corporation or union for purposes other than the support of candidates from having that money used to support political candidates to whom they may be opposed."[1335] "Quite aside from war-chest corruption and the interests of contributors and owners, another reason for regulating corporate electoral involvement has emerged with restrictions on individual campaign contributions. [The Court has] recognized that restricting contributions by various organizations hedges against their use as conduits for circumvention of valid contribution limits. . . . To the degree that a corporation could contribute to political candidates, the individuals who created it, who own it, or whom it employs . . . could exceed the bounds imposed on their own contributions by diverting money through the corporation."[1336] A statute that prohibits corporations from making contributions or expenditures in connection with federal or state elections, but allows such organizations to establish "separate segregated funds" that may be used for political purposes during elections, is sufficiently tailored to achieve the foregoing goals and does not violate, on its face, the First Amendment,[1337] even if a corporation is prohibited from soliciting contributions to its separate fund from persons who do not have some relatively enduring and independently significant financial or organizational attachment to the corporation.[1338] exceed FECA's limits on contributions to nonparty political committees), but also that "Congress is fully entitled to consider the real-world differences between political parties and interest groups when crafting a system of campaign finance regulation. . . . Interest groups do not select slates of candidates for elections. Interest groups do not determine who will serve on legislative committees, elect congressional leadership, or organize legislative caucuses. Political parties have influence and power in the legislature that vastly exceeds that of any interest group. As a result, it is hardly surprising that party affiliation is the primary way by which voters identify candidates, or that parties in turn have special access to and relationships with federal officeholders." See id. at 187–88.

---

[1333] Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 658–59 (1990).

[1334] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146, 154 (2003), quoting Fed. Election Comm'n v. Nat'l Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U.S. 480, 500–01 (1985).

[1335] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146, 154 (2003), quoting Fed. Election Comm'n v. Nat'l Right to Work Committee, 459 U.S. 197, 208 (1982).

[1336] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146, 155 (2003).

[1337] Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 657–61 (1990); McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 203 (2003).

[1338] See Fed. Election Comm'n v. Nat'l Right to Work Committee, 459 U.S. 197, 204–11 (1982).

[I503] Nevertheless, in Massachusetts Citizens for Life (MCFL), involving an "as applied" challenge to such a statute, the Court held that the non-profit organization there had "features more akin to voluntary political associations than business firms, and therefore should not have to bear burdens on independent spending solely because of their incorporated status." In reaching that conclusion, the Court enumerated three characteristics of the corporation that were "essential to [its] holding." First, MCFL had been "formed for the express purpose of promoting political ideas, and [could not] engage in business activities. . . . This ensure[d] that political resources reflect[ed] political support." Second, it had "no shareholders or other persons affiliated so as to have a claim on its assets or earnings. This ensure[d] that persons connected with the organization [would] have no economic disincentive for disassociating with it if they disagree[d] with its political activity." Third, MCFL had not been "established by a business corporation or a labor union, and it [wa]s its policy not to accept contributions from such entities. This prevent[ed] MCFL from serving as conduit for the type of direct spending that creates a threat to the political marketplace."[1339] Furthermore, MCFL would face certain organizational and financial hurdles in establishing and administering a segregated political fund. For example, the statute required the corporation to appoint a treasurer for its segregated fund, keep records of all contributions, file a statement of organization containing information about the fund, and update that statement periodically. In addition, the corporation was permitted to solicit contributions to its segregated fund only from "members," which did not include persons who merely contributed to or indicated support for the organization. These hurdles "impose[d] administrative costs that many small entities [might] be unable to bear" and "create[d] a disincentive for such organizations to engage in political speech."[1340] Hence, the challenged statutory restriction was found unconstitutional, as applied to MCFL.

[I504] Michigan Chamber of Commerce rejected a similar "as applied" challenge. The Court found that the Chamber did not exhibit the crucial features identified in MCFL, which would require the state to exempt it from independent spending burdens as a non-profit corporation more akin to a voluntary political association than a business firm. MCFL's narrow political focus ensured that its resources reflected political support, while the Chamber's bylaws set forth more varied purposes, several of which are not inherently political. Additionally, although the Chamber also lacked shareholders, "many of its members [might] be similarly reluctant to withdraw as members even if they disagree[d] with the Chamber's political expression, because they wish[ed] to benefit from the Chamber's nonpolitical programs and to establish contacts with other members of the business community." Also in contrast to MCFL, more than three-quarters of the Chamber's members were business corporations, whose political contributions and expenditures were permissibly regulated by the state, and who thus could [1339] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U.S. 238, 264 (1986).

---

[1340] Id. at 254–55 (four-Justice plurality); see id. at 265–66 (Justice O'Connor concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). Justice O'Connor wrote separately, because she was concerned that the Court's discussion of the statute's disclosure requirements might be read as moving away from the teaching of Buckley (see para. I509). In her view, the significant burden on MCFL came not from the disclosure requirements that it should satisfy but from the additional organizational restraints imposed upon it by the statute. These additional requirements did not further the government's informational interest in campaign disclosure.

circumvent the relevant statutory restrictions by funneling money through the Chamber's general treasury.[1341]

[I505] Beaumont held that applying a direct contribution prohibition to non-profit advocacy corporations is consistent with the First Amendment. As the Court noted, "concern about the corrupting potential underlying the corporate ban may . . . be implicated by advocacy corporations. They, like their for-profit counterparts, benefit from significant 'state-created advantages,' . . . and may well be able to amass substantial political 'war chests.' . . . Nonprofit advocacy corporations substantial resources are, moreover, no less susceptible than traditional business companies to misuse as conduits for circumventing the contribution limits imposed on individuals."[1342]

[I506] In Michigan Chamber of Commerce, which involved a state law prohibiting corporations from using general treasury funds for independent expenditures in connection with state candidate elections, the Chamber attacked the statute as underinclusive, because it did not regulate the independent expenditures of unincorporated labor unions. In rejecting the claim, the Court reasoned that, "[w]hereas unincorporated unions, and indeed individuals, may be able to amass large treasuries, they do so without the significant state-conferred advantages of the corporate structure; corporations are by far the most prominent example of entities that enjoy legal advantages enhancing their ability to accumulate wealth. . . . The desire to counterbalance those advantages unique to the corporate form is the State's compelling interest in this case; thus, excluding from the statute's coverage unincorporated entities that also have the capacity to accumulate wealth does not undermine its justification for regulating corporations."[1343] Moreover, because members who disagreed with a union's political activities could decline to contribute to them without giving up other membership benefits,[1344] a union's political funds more accurately reflected members' support for the organization's political views than did a corporation's general treasury.[1345] Similarly, the exemption of media corporations from the expenditure restrictions did not render the statute unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause. "[M]edia corporations differ significantly from other corporations in that their resources are devoted to the collection of information and its dissemination to the public. . . . The Act's definition of 'expenditure' . . . conceivably could be interpreted to encompass election-related news stories and editorials. The Act's restrictions on independent expenditures therefore might discourage incorporated news broadcasters or publishers from serving their crucial societal role. The media exception ensure[d] that the Act d[id] not hinder or prevent the institutional press from reporting on and publishing editorials about newsworthy events."[1346]

vi. Contributions by Minors

[I507] The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 prohibited individuals "17 years old or younger" from making contributions to candidates and contributions or donations to political parties. In McConnell, the government asserted that the provision pro-

---

[1341] Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 662–64 (1990).

[1342] Fed. Election Comm'n v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146, 159–60 (2003).

[1343] Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 665 (1990).

[1344] See paras. I444 et seq.

[1345] Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 665–66 (1990).

[1346] Id. at 667–68. See also McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 207–09 (2003).

tected against corruption by conduit—namely, donations by parents through their minor children to circumvent contribution limits applicable to the parents. However, the government offered scant evidence of this form of evasion. "Absent a more convincing case of the claimed evil," the Court found that this interest was "simply too attenuated for the ban to withstand heightened scrutiny." And even assuming, arguendo, that the government advanced an important interest, the provision was overinclusive. As the Court noted, the states had adopted "a variety of more tailored approaches—e.g., counting contributions by minors against the total permitted for a parent or family unit, imposing a lower cap on contributions by minors, and prohibiting contributions by very young children." Without deciding whether any of these alternatives would be sufficiently tailored, the Court held that the provision swept too broadly. For these reasons, the prohibition was struck down, as violative of the First Amendment rights of minors.[1347]

vii. Referenda[1348]

[I508] "Placing limits on contributions to a committee advocating a position on a ballot measure, which, in turn, limits expenditures, plainly impairs freedom of expression."[1349] "Referenda are held on issues, not candidates for public office. The risk of corruption perceived in cases involving candidate elections . . . simply is not present in a popular vote on a public issue." Consequently, the Court held in Bellotti that a state cannot prohibit corporations from making contributions or expenditures advocating views on ballot measures.[1350]

[1347] McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 207–09 (2003).

[1348] See also paras. I194, I513 (restrictions on paid circulation of ballot initiative petitions).

[1349] Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290, 299 (1981).

[1350] First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 790 (1978). The asserted justifications for the challenged statute did not survive the exacting scrutiny required when the legislative prohibition is directed at speech itself and speech on a public issue. The argument that, since corporations are wealthy and powerful, corporate participation in discussion of a referendum issue would exert an undue influence on the outcome of a referendum vote, and—in the end—destroy the confidence of the people in the democratic process and the integrity of government, was not supported by record or legislative findings that corporate advocacy threatened imminently to undermine democratic processes, thereby denigrating, rather than serving, First Amendment interests. Nor could the statute be justified on the asserted ground that it protected the rights of shareholders whose views differed from those expressed by management on behalf of the corporation, for the statute was both underinclusive and overinclusive in serving this purpose. Corporate expenditures, with respect to a referendum, were prohibited, while corporate activity, with respect to the passage or defeat of legislation, was permitted. And the statute did not prohibit a corporation from expressing its views, by the expenditure of corporate funds, on any public issue until it became the subject of a referendum, though the displeasure of disapproving shareholders was unlikely to be any less. The overinclusiveness of the statute was demonstrated by the fact that it would prohibit a corporation from supporting or opposing a referendum proposal even if its shareholders unanimously authorized the contribution or expenditure. "Acting through their power to elect the board of directors or to insist upon protective provisions in the corporation's charter, shareholders normally are presumed competent to protect their own interests. [And] shareholders generally have access to the judicial remedy of a derivative suit to challenge corporate disbursements alleged to have been made for improper corporate purposes or merely to further the personal interests of management." Id. at 788–95.

b. Record-Keeping and Disclosure Requirements [1351]

[I509] Unlike limitations on contributions and expenditures, disclosure requirements impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities. However, compelled disclosure, in itself, can seriously infringe on privacy of association and belief guaranteed by the First Amendment.[1352] The Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) required political committees and candidates to keep detailed records of contributions and expenditures, including the name and address of each individual contributing in excess of $10, and his occupation and principal place of business if his contribution exceeded $100, and to file quarterly reports with the Federal Election Commission disclosing the source of every contribution exceeding $100 and the recipient and purpose of every expenditure over $100, and also required every individual or group, other than a candidate or political committee, making contributions or expenditures exceeding $100, other than by contribution to a political committee or candidate, to file a statement with the Commission. In Buckley, the Court upheld against a First Amendment challenge to these record-keeping, reporting, and disclosure requirements. The Court found three government interests sufficient in general to justify requiring disclosure of information concerning campaign contributions and expenditures. "First, disclosure provides the electorate with information as to where political campaign money comes from and how it is spent by the candidate in order to aid the voters in evaluating those who seek federal office. It allows voters to place each candidate in the political spectrum more precisely than is often possible solely on the basis of party labels and campaign speeches. The sources of a candidate's financial support also alert the voter to the interests to which a candidate is most likely to be responsive, and thus facilitate predictions of future performance in office. Second, disclosure requirements deter actual corruption and avoid the appearance of corruption by exposing large contributions and expenditures to the light of publicity. . . . Third, [such] requirements are an essential means of gathering the data necessary to detect violations of . . . contribution limitations."[1353] Moreover, the Act's primary disclosure provisions, which imposed reporting obligations on political committees and candidates, appeared—certainly in most applications—to be the least restrictive means of curbing the evils of campaign ignorance and corruption that Congress had found to exist.[1354] The Court stressed, however, that, in certain circumstances, the balance of interests requires exempting minor political parties from compelled disclosures. The government's interests in compelling disclosures are diminished[1355] in the case of minor parties, with little chance of winning an election. At the same time, the potential for impairing First Amendment interests is substantially greater. "[T]he damage done by disclosure to the associational interests of the minor parties and their members and to supporters of independents may be significant. These movements are less likely to have a sound financial base, and thus are more vulnerable to fall-offs in contributions. In some instances, fears of reprisal may deter contributions to the point where the movement cannot survive. The public interest also suffers if that

---

[1351] See also para. I292.

[1352] See paras. I414 et seq.

[1353] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 66–68 (1976) (per curiam).

[1354] Id. at 68.

[1355] Still, they are existent. As the Court noted, "a minor party sometimes can play a significant role in an election. Even when a minor party candidate has little or no chance of winning, he may be encouraged by major party interests in order to divert votes from other major party contenders." See id. at 70.

result comes to pass, for there is a consequent reduction in the free circulation of ideas both within and without the political arena."[1356] Thus, in some circumstances, the diminished government interests furthered by compelling disclosures by minor parties does not justify the greater threat to First Amendment values. Buckley set forth the following test for determining when the First Amendment requires exempting minor parties from compelled disclosures: "[t]he evidence offered need show only a reasonable probability that the compelled disclosure of a party's contributors' names will subject them to threats, harassment, or reprisals from either Government officials or private parties."[1357]

[I510] In Buckley, the provision for disclosure by individuals and groups making independent contributions and expenditures[1358] was construed narrowly to apply only to those who (1) made contributions earmarked for political purposes or authorized or requested by a candidate or his agent to some person other than a candidate or political committee; or (2) made an expenditure for a communication that expressly advocated the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate. As narrowed, this provision could not be considered unconstitutionally vague. Moreover, it was upheld, primarily because it served an "informational interest" by "increas[ing] the fund of information concerning those who support the candidates." As the Court concluded, the above burden constituted "a reasonable and minimally restrictive method of furthering First Amendment values by opening the basic processes of [the] federal election system to public view."[1359]

[1356] Id. at 71.

[1357] Id. at 74. The Court acknowledged that "unduly strict requirements of proof can impose a heavy burden on minor parties." Accordingly, the Court emphasized that "[m]inor parties must be allowed sufficient flexibility in the proof of injury. . . . The proof may include, for example, specific evidence of past or present harassment of members due to their associational ties, or of harassment directed against the organization itself. A pattern of threats or specific manifestations of public hostility may be sufficient. New parties that have no history upon which to draw may be able to offer evidence of reprisals and threats directed against individuals or organizations holding similar views." Id. at 74.

The test announced in Buckley, for safeguarding the First Amendment interests of minor parties and their members and supporters, applies not only to the compelled disclosure of campaign contributors but also to the compelled disclosure of recipients of campaign disbursements. "Expenditures by a political party often consist of reimbursements, advances, or wages paid to party members, campaign workers, and supporters, whose activities lie at the very core of the First Amendment. Disbursements may also go to persons who choose to express their support for an unpopular cause by providing services rendered scarce by public hostility and suspicion. Should their involvement be publicized, these persons would be as vulnerable to threats, harassment, and reprisals as are contributors whose connection with the party is solely financial. Even individuals who receive disbursements for 'merely' commercial transactions may be deterred by the public emnity attending publicity, and those seeking to harass may disrupt commercial activities on the basis of expenditure information. Because an individual who enters into a transaction with a minor party purely for commercial reasons lacks any ideological commitment to the party, such an individual may well be deterred from providing services by even a small risk of harassment. Compelled disclosure of the names of such recipients of expenditures could therefore cripple a minor party's ability to operate effectively, and thereby reduce the free circulation of ideas both within and without the political arena." See Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Comm., 459 U.S. 87, 97–98 (1983).

[1358] The provision which defined "expenditures" to include the use of money or other assets "for the purpose of . . . influencing" a federal election. The Court found that the "ambiguity of this phrase" posed "constitutional problems."

[1359] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 80–82 (1976) (per curiam).

[I511] Finally, the Court also upheld the $10 and $100 thresholds.[1360] Since disclosure served informational functions, as well as the prevention of corruption and the enforcement of the contribution limitations, "Congress [wa]s not required to set a threshold that [wa]s tailored only to the latter goals. In addition, the enforcement goal [could] never be well served if the threshold [wa]s so high that disclosure [became] equivalent to admitting violation of the contribution limitations. The $10 recordkeeping threshold . . . facilitate[d] the enforcement of the disclosure provisions by making it relatively difficult to aggregate secret contributions in amounts that surpass[ed] the $100 limit." On the bare record of the case, the Court could not say that "the limits designated [we]re wholly without rationality."[1361]

[I512] The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), which amended FECA, required political committees to file detailed periodic financial reports with the Federal Election Commission. The amendment coined a new term, "electioneering communication," to replace the narrowing construction of FECA's disclosure provisions adopted by the Court in Buckley. As discussed above,[1362] that construction limited the coverage of FECA's disclosure requirement to communications expressly advocating the election or defeat of particular candidates. By contrast, the term "electioneering communication" applied to a broadcast clearly identifying a candidate for federal office, aired within a specific time period (60 days before a general, special, or runoff election for the office sought by the candidate or 30 days before a primary or preference election, or a convention or caucus of a political party having authority to nominate a candidate, for the office sought by the candidate), and targeted to an identified audience of at least 50,000 viewers or listeners. BCRA's amendment to FECA also specified significant disclosure requirements for persons who funded electioneering communications. The Court found that the definition of "electioneering communication" raised no vagueness concerns.[1363] Moreover, it rejected the contention that the amendment unnecessarily required disclosure of the names of persons who had contributed $1,000 or more to the individual or group paying for a communication and unnecessarily mandated disclosure of executory contracts for communications that had not yet aired. Because the "important state interests" identified in Buckley—"providing the electorate with information, deterring actual corruption and avoiding its appearance, and gathering data necessary to enforce more substantive electioneering restrictions—appl[ied] in full to BCRA, . . . Buckley amply support[ed] application of FECA's . . . disclosure requirements to the entire range of 'electioneering communications.'"[1364] Buckley also foreclosed a facial attack on the new provision that required disclosure of the names of persons who contributed $1,000 or more to segregated funds, and the Court agreed with the district court's conclusion that there was no evidence establishing the requisite reasonable probability of harm to any plaintiff group or its members resulting from compelled disclosure.[1365] With respect to executory contracts, the new provision mandated disclosure only if and when a person made disbursements totaling more than $10,000 in any calendar year to pay for electioneering communications. Plaintiffs did not take issue with the use of a dollar

---

[1360] See para. I509.

[1361] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 83–84 (1976) (per curiam).

[1362] See para. I510.

[1363] McConnell v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 194 (2003).

[1364] Id. at 196.

[1365] Id. at 197–99.

amount, rather than the number or dates of the ads, to identify the time when a person paying for electioneering communications should make disclosures to the FEC. The Court stressed that, "[g]iven the relatively short timeframes in which electioneering communications are made, the interest in assuring that disclosures are made promptly and in time to provide relevant information to voters is unquestionably significant. Yet fixing the deadline for filing disclosure statements based on the date when aggregate disbursements exceeded $10,000 would open a significant loophole if advertisers were not required to disclose executory contracts. In the absence of that requirement, political supporters could avoid pre-election disclosures concerning ads slated to run during the final week of a campaign simply by making a pre-election downpayment of less than $10,000, with the balance payable after the election. Indeed, if the advertiser waited to pay that balance until the next calendar year, then, as long as the balance did not itself exceed $10,000, the advertiser might avoid the disclosure requirements completely."[1366] Furthermore, the record contained little evidence identifying any harm that might flow from the enforcement of the "advance" disclosure requirement. The district court had speculated that disclosing information about contracts that had not been performed, and might never be performed, could lead to confusion and an unclear record upon which the public would evaluate the forces operating in the political marketplace. However, "without evidence relating to the frequency of nonperformance of executed contracts, such speculation cannot outweigh the public interest in ensuring full disclosure before an election actually takes place."[1367]

[I513] ACLF involved a Colorado statute requiring ballot initiative proponents, who paid circulators to file both a final report, when the initiative petition was submitted to the Secretary of State, and monthly reports, during the circulation period. More specifically, the statute required that initiative proponents disclose (1) at the time they filed their petition, the name, address, and county of voter registration of all paid circulators, the amount of money proponents paid per petition signature, and the total amount paid to each circulator, and (2) on a monthly basis, the names of the proponents, the name and address of each paid circulator, the name of the proposed ballot measure, and the amount of money paid and owed to each circulator during the month. Relying on Buckley, the Court did not upset Colorado's disclosure requirements as a whole. The Court upheld the state's requirements for disclosure of payors, in particular, proponents' names and the total amount they had spent to collect signatures for their petitions. These requirements responded to Colorado's important interest in controlling "domination of the initiative process by affluent special interest groups." By contrast, the state failed to demonstrate the added benefit of revealing the names of paid circulators and amounts paid to each circulator. Hence, Colorado's reporting requirements, to the extent that they targeted paid circulators, could not pass constitutional muster.[1368]

[I514] In Citizens Against Rent Control, the Court invalidated a municipal ordinance placing a limitation of $250 on contributions to committees formed to support or oppose ballot measures submitted to a popular vote. The Court noted that, "[w]hatever may be the state interest, or degree of that interest, in regulating and limiting contributions to or expenditures of a candidate or a candidate's committees, there is no significant state or public interest in curtailing debate and discussion of a ballot

---

[1366] Id. at 200.

[1367] Id. at 201.

[1368] Buckley v. Am. Constitutional Law Found., Inc., 525 U.S. 182, 202–04 (1999).

measure. . . . The integrity of the political system [may] be adequately protected if contributors to a committee advocating a position on a ballot measure are identified in a public filing revealing the amounts contributed; if it is thought wise, legislation can outlaw anonymous contributions."[1369]

c. Government Funding

[I515] The Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (IRC), as amended in 1974, provided for public financing of presidential nominating conventions and general election and primary campaigns from general revenues and allocated such funding to conventions and general election campaigns by establishing three categories: (1) "major" parties (those whose candidate had received 25 percent or more of the vote in the most recent election), which received full funding; (2) "minor" parties (those whose candidate had received at least 5 percent but less than 25 percent of the votes at the last election), which received only a percentage of the funds to which the major parties were entitled; and (3) "new" parties (all other parties), which were limited to receipt of post-election funds or were not entitled to any funds if their candidate received less than 5 percent of the vote. In Buckley, the Court held that these provisions did not violate the First Amendment. Rather than abridging, restricting, or censoring speech, they represented an effort "to use public money to facilitate and enlarge public discussion and participation in the electoral process. Thus, [they] further[ed,] not abridge[d,] pertinent First Amendment values."[1370] The same provisions were sustained against a due process (equal protection) challenge, under the Fifth Amendment. First, the Court pointed out that "public financing, as a means of eliminating the improper influence of large private contributions, furthers a significant governmental interest. In addition, the limits on contributions [imposed by FECA] necessarily increase[d] the burden of fundraising, and Congress properly regarded public financing as an appropriate means of relieving major party Presidential candidates from the rigors of soliciting private contributions." Relatedly, the Court pointed out that, while "[p]ublic funding for candidates of major parties [wa]s intended as a substitute for private contributions, . . . for minor party candidates such assistance [might] be viewed as a supplement to private contributions since these candidates [could] continue to solicit private funds up to the applicable spending limit." Moreover, "Congress' interest in not funding hopeless candidacies with large sums of public money, . . . necessarily justifie[d] the withholding of public assistance from candidates without significant public support. Thus, Congress [could] legitimately require 'some preliminary showing of a significant modicum of support.' . . . This requirement also served the important public interest against providing artificial incentives to 'splintered parties and unrestrained factionalism.'"[1371] Under these considerations and in light of Jenness,[1372] the Court found that the challenged funding system did not work an invidious discrimination against candidates of non-major parties.

[1369] Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290, 299–300 (1981).

[1370] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 92–93 (1976) (per curiam).

[1371] Id. at 96, 99.

[1372] See para. I472.

CHAPTER 10

SUBSTANTIVE PROTECTION OF PROPERTY RIGHTS AND ECONOMIC INTERESTS

A. THE TAKINGS CLAUSE [1]

1. Introduction

[J1] The Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment,[2] provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. This guarantee is "designed to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole."[3]

2. The "Public Use" Requirement [4]

[J2] The scope of the "public use" requirement of the Takings Clause is "coterminous with the scope of a sovereign's police powers,"[5] defined as the authority to provide for the health, safety, morals, and general welfare of the citizenry.[6] "The concept of the public welfare is broad and inclusive. . . . The values it represents are spiritual as well as physical, aesthetic as well as monetary."[7]

[J3] There is, of course, a role for courts to play in reviewing a legislature's judgment of what constitutes a public use, but it is an extremely narrow one.[8] The Court has made clear that it will not substitute its judgment for a legislature's judgment as to what constitutes a public use "unless the use be palpably without reasonable foundation."[9] Hence, "the Court will not strike down a condemnation on the basis that it lacks a public use so long as the taking is 'rationally related to a conceivable public pur-

---

1 See also paras. C29–C30 (procedural due process).

2 Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R.R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226 (1897).

3 Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 49 (1960).

4 See also paras. J21–J22 (land use restrictions).

5 Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 240 (1984).

6 See, e.g., Vill. of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365, 395 (1926).

7 Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 33 (1954) (a statute providing both for the comprehensive use of the eminent domain power to redevelop slum areas and for the possible sale or lease of the condemned lands to private interests authorizes takings for a "public use").

The Court has recognized "the principle of the supremacy of a federal public use over all other uses in a clearly designated field, such as that of establishing post offices." See United States v. Carmack, 329 U.S. 230, 242 (1946) (emphasis added).

8 See Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32 (1954).

9 Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 241 (1984), quoting United States v. Gettysburg Elec. R. Co., 160 U.S. 668, 680 (1896).

pose.'"[10] "Judicial deference is required because, in [the American] system of government, legislatures are better able to assess what public purposes should be advanced by an exercise of the taking power."[11]

[J4] "[O]ne person's property may not be taken for the benefit of another private person without a justifying public purpose, even though compensation be paid."[12] But "[t]he mere fact that property taken outright by eminent domain is transferred in the first instance to private beneficiaries does not condemn that taking as having only a private purpose. The Court [has] rejected the notion that a use is a public use only if the property taken is put to use for the general public."[13] Indeed, "it is only the taking's purpose, and not its mechanics, that must pass scrutiny under the Public Use Clause."[14] "So long as the taking has a conceivable public character, 'the means by which it will be attained is . . . for the legislature to determine.'"[15] In light of these considerations, Midkiff upheld land reform legislation that authorized condemnations for the specific purpose of transferring ownership to another private party, in order to eliminate a land oligopoly and the socioeconomic evils associated with it.[16] Boston & Maine Corporation held that the Interstate Commerce Commission was not irrational in determining that the condemnation of property owned by freight railroads would serve a public purpose, by facilitating Amtrak's rail passenger service.[17] In Berman, the Court permitted land condemnations that contemplated reselling the land to redevelopers as part of a plan to restore dilapidated sections of the District of Columbia.[18] Moreover Kelo held that,

---

[10] Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Boston & Maine Corp., 503 U.S. 407, 422 (1992), quoting Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 240–41 (1984).

[11] Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 240, 244 (1984). See also United States ex rel. TVA v. Welch, 327 U.S. 546, 552 (1946), which emphasized that "any departure from this judicial restraint would result in courts deciding on what is and is not a governmental function and in their invalidating legislation on the basis of their view on that question at the moment of decision, a practice which has proved impracticable in other fields."

If the condemnation of property serves legitimate public interests, it is constitutionally irrelevant that other purposes also may be advanced. See United States v. Twin City Power Co., 350 U.S. 222, 224 (1956).

[12] Thompson v. Consol. Gas Corp., 300 U.S. 55, 80 (1937).

[13] Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 243–44 (1984).

[14] Id. at 244.

[15] Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1014 (1984), quoting Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 33 (1954). "The comparative desirability and necessity for the site are matters for legislative or administrative determination, rather than for a judicial finding." See United States v. Carmack, 329 U.S. 230, 247 (1946).

[16] Hawaii Hous. Authority v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 239–44 (1984). As the Court noted, "[t]he land oligopoly ha[d,] according to the Hawaii Legislature, created artificial deterrents to the normal functioning of the State's residential land market and forced thousands of individual homeowners to lease, rather than buy, the land underneath their homes. . . . Redistribution of fees simple to correct deficiencies in the market determined by the state legislature to be attributable to land oligopoly was found to be a rational exercise of the eminent domain power." Id. at 242–43.

[17] Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Boston & Maine Corp., 503 U.S. 407, 422 (1992). Amtrak is a private corporation.

[18] Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 28–36 (1954). The Court emphasized that "[m]iserable and disreputable housing conditions may do more than spread disease and crime and immorality. They may also suffocate the spirit by reducing the people who live there to the status of cat-since "[p]romoting economic development is a traditional and long accepted governmental function," a city could use the power of eminent domain to acquire, through its development agent, property in the context of the implementation of comprehensive development plan that it had approved and that was "projected to create in excess of 1,000 jobs, to increase tax and other revenues, and to revitalize an economically distressed city, including its downtown and waterfront areas."[19]

[J5] Courts are "to examine the operative provisions of a statute, not just its stated purpose, in assessing its true nature."[20] "But whether in fact the provision will accomplish its objectives is not the question."[21] "When the legislature's purpose is legitimate and its means are not irrational, [the Court's] cases make clear that empirical debates over the wisdom of takings, including the amount and character of land to be taken for the project at issue and the need for a particular tract to complete the plan—no less than debates over the wisdom of other kinds of socioeconomic legislation—are not to be carried out in the federal courts."[22]

---

tle. They may indeed make living an almost insufferable burden. They may also be an ugly sore, a blight on the community which robs it of charm, which makes it a place from which men turn. The misery of housing may despoil a community as an open sewer may ruin a river. . . . It is within the power of the legislature to determine that the community should be beautiful as well as healthy, spacious as well as clean, well balanced as well as carefully patrolled." Id. at 32–33. Further, the Court held that "the amount and character of the land to be taken for the project and the need for a particular tract to complete the integrated plan rests in the discretion of the legislature." Id. at 35–36.

[19] Kelo v. City of New London, 545 U.S. 469 (2005).

Due process does not prohibit allowing private persons to initiate the taking process. See New Motor Vehicle Bd. v. Fox Co., 439 U.S. 96, 108–09 (1978); Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 243, n.6 (1984).

The Court has suggested that delegations of eminent domain power to private entities are of a limited nature, for "[t]hey do not include sovereign powers greater than those expressed or necessarily implied, especially against others exercising equal or greater public powers." See United States v. Carmack, 329 U.S. 230, 243, n.13 (1946), cited in Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Boston & Maine Corp., 503 U.S. 407, 421 (1992).

In Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1014–15 (1984), the Court found that the "public use" requirement was not violated by giving effect to the government's announcement that application for the right to the valuable government benefit of obtaining registration of an insecticide would confer upon the government a license to use the trade secrets contained in the application, even though subsequent applicants might be the most direct beneficiaries. In reaching that conclusion, the Court noted, inter alia, that "[a]llowing applicants for registration, upon payment of compensation, to use data already accumulated by others, rather than forcing them to go through the time-consuming process of repeating the research, would eliminate a significant barrier to entry into the pesticide market, thereby allowing greater competition among producers of end-use products," and that such a pro-competitive purpose was within Congress' police power.

[20] Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 487, n.16 (1987).

For example, in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 413–14 (1922), that inquiry led the Court to reject the Pennsylvania legislature's stated purpose for the statute. See, in extenso, para. J29.

[21] W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 451 U.S. 648, 671–72 (1981).

[22] Hawaii Hous. Authority v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 242–43 (1984). See also Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Boston & Maine Corp., 503 U.S. 407, 422–23 (1992).

In Kelo v. City of New London, 545 U.S. 469 (2005), where the Court held that a city's deci-

3. What Constitutes "Property"

[J6] "Because the Constitution protects, rather than creates, property interests, the existence of a property interest is determined by reference to 'existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law.'"[23] The "notion of 'property' extends beyond land and tangible goods and includes the products of an individual's 'labour and invention;'" indeed, intangible property rights protected by state law are deserving of the protection of the Takings Clause.[24] The "private property"[25] upon which the Clause focuses is a specific right or interest in physical or intellectual property; takings analysis does not apply to a statute that imposes retroactive financial liability to a former mine owner.[26] And "a mere unilateral expectation or an abstract need is not a property interest entitled to protection."[27] "[P]roperty is more than economic value; . . . it also consists of 'the group of rights which the so-called owner exercises in his dominion of the physical thing,' such 'as the right to possess, use and dispose of it.'"[28] Consequently, the fact that a physical item lacks a positive economic or market value does not exclude the thing from the scope of the Takings Clause.[29]

[J7] In view of these considerations, the Court has applied the Takings Clause, inter alia, to the following property rights or interests: right to sell personal property;[30] right to pass on valuable property to one's heirs;[31] right to exclude others from one's property;[32]

---

sion to take property for the purpose of economic development satisfied the "public use" requirement of the Fifth Amendment, the Court rejected the argument that, for takings of this kind, it should require a "reasonable certainty" that the expected public benefits will actually accrue. Id.

[23] Phillips v. Washington Legal Found., 524 U.S. 156, 164 (1998), quoting Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 577 (1972). See also United States v. Willow River Power Co., 324 U.S. 499, 503 (1945) ("economic uses are [property] rights only when they are legally protected interests").

As a general proposition, the United States, as opposed to the several states, is not "possessed of residual authority that enables it to define 'property' in the first instance." See PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 84 (1980).

[24] Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1003 (1984).

[25] The reference to "private property" in the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment has been construed as encompassing the property of state and local governments when it is condemned by the United States. See United States v. 50 Acres of Land, 469 U.S. 24, 31, n.15 (1984), citing United States v. Carmack, 329 U.S. 230, 242 (1946) ("When the Federal Government takes for a federal public use the independently held and controlled property of a State or of a local subdivision, . . . the Federal Government must pay just compensation for the land condemned.").

[26] See E. Enters. v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498, 540–47 (1998) (Kennedy, J., concurring in the judgment and dissenting in part); id. at 554–58 (dissenting opinion of Breyer, J., with whom Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg joined). By contrast, a four-Justice plurality applied takings analysis; id. at 522–37 (opinion of Justice O'Connor). See also paras. J126, J128.

[27] Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 U.S. 155, 161 (1980).

[28] Phillips v. Washington Legal Found., 524 U.S. 156, 170 (1998), quoting United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 380 (1945).

[29] See Phillips v. Washington Legal Found., 524 U.S. 156, 170 (1998). For example, "[t]he government may not seize rents received by the owner of a building simply because it can prove that the costs incurred in collecting the rents exceed the amount collected." Id. at 170.

[30] Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51 (1979).

[31] Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704, 715 (1987).

[32] Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 179–80 (1979).

right to build;[33] air rights for high-rise buildings;[34] right to mine coal[35] or to extract mineral deposits;[36] water rights;[37] agricultural value of land;[38] an air easement[39] or a flowage easement;[40] liens on real property;[41] contract rights,[42] including a leasehold interest;[43] stock and undelivered dividends;[44] interest income generated by funds deposited in the registry of a court[45] or held in trust accounts;[46] possession

---

[33] Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992).

[34] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 136 (1978).

[35] Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 413 (1922); Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470 (1987).

[36] United States v. Cent. Eureka Mining Co., 357 U.S. 155 (1958); Goldblatt v. Hempstead, 369 U.S. 590 (1962).

[37] Dugan v. Rank, 372 U.S. 609, 620 (1963).

[38] United States v. Kansas City Life Ins. Co., 339 U.S. 799, 810 (1950).

[39] Griggs v. Allegheny County, 369 U.S. 84 (1962).

[40] United States v. Virginia Elec. & Power Co., 365 U.S. 624, 627 (1961).

[41] Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40 (1960).

[42] Omnia Commercial Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 502, 508 (1923); United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 19, n.16 (1977). See also Lynch v. United States, 292 U.S. 571, 579 (1934) ("Valid contracts are property, whether the obligor be a private individual, a municipality, a state, or the United States. . . . When the United States enters into contract relations, its rights and duties therein are governed generally by the law applicable to contracts between private individuals.").

[43] United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 375–77 (1945); First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 319 (1987).

[44] Standard Oil Co. v. New Jersey, 341 U.S. 428, 439 (1951).

[45] Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, v. Beckwith, 449 U.S. 155, 162 (1980), addressed a state statute providing that interest accruing on an interpleader fund deposited in the registry of the court "shall be deemed income of the office of the clerk of the circuit court." The appellant in that case filed an interpleader action in Florida state court and tendered the sum at issue, nearly $2 million, into court. In addition to deducting $9,228.74 from the interpleader fund as a fee "for services rendered," the clerk of the court also retained more than $100,000 in interest income generated by the deposited funds. The Court held that the statute authorizing the clerk to confiscate the earned interest violated the Takings Clause. As the Court explained, "a State by ipse dixit, may not transform private property into public property without compensation" simply by legislatively abrogating the traditional rule that "earnings of a fund are incidents of ownership of the fund itself and are property, just as the fund itself is property." Id. at 164. The state argued that, since the clerk's authority to invest deposited funds was a statutorily created right, any interest income generated by the funds was not private property. The Court rejected this argument, explaining that "the State's having mandated the accrual of interest does not mean the State or its designate is entitled to assume ownership of the interest." Id. at 162.

[46] Phillips v. Washington Legal Found., 524 U.S. 156, 160–72 (1998). Under Texas' Interest on Lawyers Trust Account (IOLTA) program, an attorney who received client funds should place them in a separate, interest-bearing, federally authorized account upon determining that the funds could not reasonably be expected to earn interest for the client or that the interest that might be earned was not likely to be sufficient to off-set the cost of establishing and maintaining the account, service charges, accounting costs and tax reporting costs, which would be incurred in attempting to obtain the interest. IOLTA interest income was paid to the Texas Equal Access to Justice Foundation, which financed legal services for low-income persons. The Court found that interest earned on client funds held in IOLTA accounts was the "private property" of the client for Takings Clause purposes. The general rule that "interest follows principal" applied in Texas. And regardless of whether the owner of the principal had a constitutionally cognizable interest in the anticipated generation of interest by his funds, any of a business enterprise;[47] or trade secrets.[48] By contrast, the Clause does not cover, for example, a contractual arrangement that may be altered or repealed at will by the sovereign that is a party of the agreement;[49] Indian occupancy of land not specifically recognized as ownership by action authorized by Congress;[50] a mere expectation of renewal of a lease;[51] the loss of a prospective business opportunity;[52] or the interest of the owner of a hydroelectric plant in high-water level of the river.[53]

4. What Amounts to a "Taking" of Property

a. Formal Condemnation

[J8] In the context of condemnation proceedings, a taking does not generally occur until compensation is determined and paid.[54] "The mere enactment of legislation interest that did accrue attached as a property right incident to the ownership of the underlying principal. Moreover, while IOLTA interest income might have no economically realizable value to its owner (since the client funds could not generate net interest), its possession, control, and disposition were nonetheless valuable rights. Finally, the Court noted that the interest income generated by IOLTA accounts was not transferred to the state as payment "for services rendered" by the state, and added that its holding did "not prohibit a State from imposing reasonable fees it incurs in generating and allocating interest income." Id. at 171.

---

47 Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 6–20 (1949).

48 Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986 (1984).

49 Alamo Land & Cattle Co. v. Arizona, 424 U.S. 295, 304 (1976) (lease of land revocable at will by the state that owns the land); Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 54–56 (1986) (no "vested rights" under federal statute, which allegedly gave states flexibility to include or withdraw certain employees from a federal social security program, but expressly reserved to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal any of the statute's provisions).

50 Tee-Hit-Ton Indians v. United States, 348 U.S. 272, 285, 288–89 (1955). By contrast, where Congress, by treaty or other agreement, declared that, thereafter, Indians were to hold lands permanently, compensation must be paid for subsequent taking. Id. at 277–78. See also United States v. Sioux Nation, 448 U.S. 371, 415, n.29 (1980).

51 United States v. Petty Motor Co., 327 U.S. 372, 380–81 (1946).

52 United States v. Grand River Dam Auth., 363 U.S. 229, 236 (1960) (frustration of plans to develop hydroelectric power on a river). See also Omnia Commercial Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 502 (1923). In that case, the claimant stood to make large profits from a contract it had with a steel company, but the United States, pursuant to the war power, requisitioned the company's entire steel production. The Court noted that, there, the government did not appropriate what the claimant owned but only ended his opportunity to exploit a contract and pointed out that "frustration and appropriation are essentially different things." Id. at 513.

"The interest in anticipated gains has traditionally been viewed as less compelling than other property-related interests." See Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51, 66 (1979).

53 United States v. Willow River Power Co., 324 U.S. 499, 507–10 (1945).

54 See First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 320 (1987), citing Danforth v. United States, 308 U.S. 271, 284–85 (1939). The United States may institute condemnation proceedings under various Acts of Congress providing authority for such takings. These statutes either require the government to pay over the judicially determined compensation, before it can enter upon the land, or enable it to take immediate possession upon order of the court before the amount of just compensation has been ascertained. Although title to the property passes to the government only when the owner receives compensation, or when the compensation is deposited into court pursuant to the Taking authorizing condemnation of property cannot constitute a taking. Such legislation may be repealed or modified, or appropriations may fail."[55] A reduction or increase in the value of property may occur during the process of governmental decisionmaking, but, "absent extraordinary delay," such changes in value are "incidents of ownership [and] cannot be considered as a 'taking' in the constitutional sense."[56]

b. Physical Intrusions and Regulatory Restrictions

i. General Considerations

[J9] Although the typical taking occurs when the government acts to condemn property in the exercise of its power of eminent domain, a taking may occur without such formal proceedings. The Court has recognized that a landowner is entitled to bring an action in "inverse condemnation," in order to recover the value of property that has been "taken in fact" by the governmental defendant, even though no formal exercise of the power of eminent domain has been attempted by the taking agency.[57] "A landowner is entitled to bring such an action as a result of the self-executing character of the constitutional provision with respect to compensation."[58]

[J10] While the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against uncompensated takings "was designed to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole,"[59] the Court "has been unable to develop any 'set formula' for determining when 'justice and fairness' require that economic injuries caused by public action be compensated by the Government, rather than remain disproportionately concentrated on a few persons."[60] But this inquiry is not standardless. "The economic impact of the regulation on the claimant and, particularly, the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations are, of course, relevant considerations. . . . So, too, is the character of the governmental action. A 'taking' may more readily be found when the interference with property can be characterized as a physical invasion by government, . . . than when interference arises from some public program adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good. 'Government hardly could go on if, to some extent, values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every such change in the general law,' . . . and th[e] Court has accord-

---

Act, the passage of title does not necessarily determine the date of "taking." "[I]f the United States has entered into possession of the property prior to the acquisition of title, it is the former event which constitutes the act of taking." Moreover, "[t]he owner at the time the Government takes possession rather than the owner at an earlier or later date, is the one who has the claim and is to receive payment." See United States v. Dow, 357 U.S. 17, 21–22 (1958).

55 Danforth v. United States, 308 U.S. 271, 286 (1939).

56 Agins v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255, 263, n.9 (1980).

57 See United States v. Clarke, 445 U.S. 253, 257 (1980). "Such a taking thus shifts to the landowner the burden to discover the encroachment and to take affirmative action to recover just compensation." Id.

58 Id.

59 Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 49 (1960).

60 Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 124 (1978).

ingly recognized, in a wide variety of contexts, that government may execute laws or programs that adversely affect recognized economic values."[61]

[J11] "The text of the Fifth Amendment itself provides a basis for drawing a distinction between physical takings and regulatory takings. Its plain language requires the payment of compensation whenever the government acquires private property for a public purpose, whether the acquisition is the result of a condemnation proceeding or a physical appropriation. But the Constitution contains no comparable reference to regulations that prohibit a property owner from making certain uses of her private property. [The Court's] jurisprudence involving condemnations and physical takings is as old as the Republic and, for the most part, involves the straightforward application of per se rules. [Its] regulatory takings jurisprudence, in contrast, is of more recent vintage and is characterized by 'essentially ad hoc, factual inquiries,' . . . designed to allow 'careful examination and weighing of all the relevant circumstances.'"[62]

ii. Physical Takings

[J12] The Court has long considered a physical intrusion by government to be a property restriction of an unusually serious character for purposes of the Takings Clause. When the physical intrusion reaches the extreme form of a permanent physical occupation, the Court has found "a taking to the extent of the occupation, without regard to whether the action achieves an important public benefit or has only minimal economic impact on the owner."[63] "In such a case, the character of the government action not only is an important factor in resolving whether the action works a taking, but also is determinative."[64] As early as 1872, in Pumpelly, the Court held that the defendant's construction, pursuant to state authority, of a dam which permanently flooded plaintiff's property constituted a taking. A unanimous Court stated, without qualification, that "where real estate is actually invaded by super-induced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed on it, so as to effectually destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a taking, within the meaning of the Constitution."[65] In Western Union Telegraph, a telegraph company constructed and operated telegraph lines over a railroad's right of way. In holding that federal law did not grant the company the right of eminent domain or the right to operate the lines absent the railroad's consent, the Court found that the invasion of the telephone lines would be a compensable taking.[66] And Loretto determined that a state law requiring landlords to allow tel-

---

61 Id. at 25. Zoning laws are the classic example, "which have been viewed as permissible governmental action even when prohibiting the most beneficial use of the property." Id. at 25. See, e.g., Vill. of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365, 390 (1926) (residential zoning—prohibition of industrial uses); Welch v. Swasey, 214 U.S. 91 (1909) (height restriction); Gorieb v. Fox, 274 U.S. 603, 608 (1927) (requirement that portions of parcels be left unbuilt); Agins v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255 (1980) (development of between one and five single-family residences on a five-acre tract).

62 Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 321–22 (2002). See also Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 523 (1992) ("The first category of cases requires courts to apply a clear rule; the second necessarily entails complex factual assessments of the purposes and economic effects of government actions.").

63 Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 426, 434–35 (1982).

64 Id. at 426.

65 Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 166, 181 (1872).

66 W. Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 195 U.S. 540, 570 (1904).

evision cable companies to emplace cable facilities in their apartment buildings constituted a taking, even though the facilities occupied, at most, only one and a half cubic feet of the landlords' property.[67]

[J13] Temporary physical seizure of private property is no different in kind from permanent physical occupation of land.[68] Thus, compensation is mandated when a leasehold is taken and the government occupies the property for its own purposes, even though that use is temporary.[69] In Pewee, the Court unanimously held that the government's seizure and direction of operation of a coal mine during a five-month period, undertaken to prevent a national strike of coal miners, constituted a taking.[70] "There are, however, unusual circumstances in which governmental occupation does not amount to a taking. For example, the entry by firemen upon burning premises cannot be said to deprive the private owners of any use of the premises."[71]

[J14] A physical invasion short of an occupation amounts to a "taking," "if its effects are so complete as to deprive the owner of all or most of his legally protected interests in the subject matter."[72] For example, military installations' repeated firing of guns over a summer resort constitutes a taking.[73] Property owners whose lands adjoin a railroad line, while not entitled to compensation for damages resulting from the usual noise, vibrations, smoke, and the like, incidental to the proper operation of the trains, are entitled to compensation for such direct, peculiar and substantial damages as specially affect his property and diminish its value.[74] When the government takes part of a tract of land by flooding, it must pay for the damage caused by resulting erosion to the remainder of the tract.[75]

---

[67] Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 435–38, n.16 (1982). A law requiring that the interest on certain private funds be transferred to a person other than the owner of the principal mandates a per se taking of the interest income. See Brown v. Legal Found. of Washington, 538 U.S. 216 (2003).

[68] Cf. First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 318 (1987).

[69] See United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373 (1945); United States v. Petty Motor Co., 327 U.S. 372 (1946).

[70] United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U.S. 114 (1951). The plurality noted that, because there had been an "actual taking of possession and control," the taking was as clear "as if the Government held full title and ownership." Id. at 116 (opinion of Black, J., with whom Frankfurter, Douglas, and Jackson, JJ., joined).

[71] Nat'l Bd. of Young Men's Christian Ass'ns v. United States, 395 U.S. 85, 93 (1969). In that case, the physical occupation by troops did not deprive petitioners of any use of their buildings, since at the time the troops entered, a riot was well under way, and petitioners' buildings were already under heavy attack. Hence, throughout the period of occupation, the buildings could not have been used by petitioners in any way. See also Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 335 (2002) (orders temporarily prohibiting access to crime scenes, businesses that violate health codes, or fire-damaged buildings have long been considered permissible exercises of the police power).

[72] United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 378 (1945).

[73] Portsmouth Harbor Land & Hotel Co. v. United States, 260 U.S. 327, 329–30 (1922). Mere occasional acts of gun fire do not amount to an appropriation if there is no proof that government has the intent to repeat firing whenever it sees fit. See Peabody v. United States, 231 U.S. 530 (1913); Portsmouth Harbor Land & Hotel Co. v. United States, 250 U.S. 1, 2 (1919).

[74] Richards v. Washington Terminal Co., 233 U.S. 546, 553–57 (1914).

[75] United States v. Dickinson, 331 U.S. 745, 750–51 (1947).

[J15] "The airspace, apart from the immediate reaches above the land, is part of the public domain. Flights over private land are not a taking, unless they are so low and so frequent as to be a direct and immediate interference with the enjoyment and use of the land."[76] In Causby, the Court ruled that the United States, by low and frequent flights of its military planes over a chicken farm, made the property unusable for that purpose, and that therefore there had been a "taking," in the constitutional sense, of an air easement for which compensation must be made.[77]

[J16] "The government effects a physical taking of land only where it requires the landowner to submit to the physical occupation of his property. This element of required acquiescence is at the heart of the concept of occupation. . . . [Thus, the Takings Clause comes into play if] the government authorizes a compelled physical invasion of property."[78] In Yee v. City of Escondido, the Court held that a rent control scheme authorized no such thing and did not constitute a physical taking. Under this scheme, the bases upon which a park owner could terminate a mobile home owner's tenancy were limited to, inter alia, non-payment of rent and the park owner's desire to change the use of his land. The park owner might not require the removal of a mobile home when it was sold and might neither charge a transfer fee for the sale nor disapprove of a purchaser who was able to pay rent. The state law did not limit the rent the park owner could charge, but Escondido had a rent control ordinance setting mobile home rents back to their 1986 levels and prohibiting rent increases without the City Council's approval. The Court decided that the rent control scheme did not authorize an unwanted physical occupation of petitioners' property and, thus, did not amount to a per se taking. Petitioners' argument that the scheme authorized a physical taking, because it increased a mobile home's value by giving the homeowner the right to occupy the pad indefinitely at a sub-market rent, was rejected. Petitioners had voluntarily rented their land to mobile home owners, and were not required to continue to do so; to the contrary, state law provided that a park owner who wished to change the use of his land could evict his tenants, albeit with six or 12 months notice. On their face, the laws at issue "merely regulate[d] petitioners' use of their land by regulating the relationship between landlord and tenant." Any transfer of wealth from park owners to incumbent mobile home owners in the form of sub-market rent did not, in itself, convert regulation into physical invasion. Similarly, the contention that the scheme deprived petitioners of the ability to choose their incoming tenants might have some bearing on whether the statutes in question caused a regulatory taking, but it had nothing to do with whether it caused a physical taking.[79]

---

[76] United States v. Causby, 328 U.S. 256, 266 (1946).

[77] Id. at 261–67. The Court emphasized that the government had "not merely destroyed property" but "was using a part of it for the flight of its planes." Id. at 262, n.7. See also Griggs v. Allegheny County, 369 U.S. 84 (1962) (over-flights held a taking of residential property).

[78] Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 527 (1992).

[79] Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 527–32 (1992). See also Fed. Communications Comm. v. Florida Power Corp., 480 U.S. 245, 252–53 (1987). In that case, the respondent had voluntarily leased space on its utility poles to a cable television company for the installation of cables. The federal government, exercising its statutory authority to regulate pole attachment agreements, substantially reduced the annual rent. The Court rejected the respondent's claim that the challenged government action constituted a per se taking, noting that "it is the invitation, not the rent, that makes the difference. The line which separates [this case] from Loretto is the unambiguous distinction between a . . . lessee and an interloper with a government license."

iii. Regulatory Takings

[J17] Generally. It was Pennsylvania Coal v. Mahon that gave birth to the Court's regulatory takings jurisprudence. In that case, the Court recognized that there will be instances when government actions do not encroach upon or occupy the property yet still affect and limit its use to such an extent that a taking occurs. In Justice Holmes' well-known, if less than self-defining, formulation, "while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if a regulation goes too far, it will be recognized as a taking."[80] Since Mahon, the Court has given some, but not too specific, guidance to courts confronted with deciding whether a particular government action goes too far and effects a regulatory taking. First, under Lucas, a regulation that "denies all economically beneficial or productive use" of land will require compensation under the Takings Clause.[81] Second, under Penn Central, where a regulation places limitations on land that fall short of eliminating all economically beneficial use, a taking nonetheless may have occurred, depending on "a complex of factors including the regulation's economic effect on the landowner, the extent to which the regulation interferes with reasonable investment-backed expectations, and the character of the government action"[82]—for instance whether it amounts to a physical invasion or instead merely affects property interests through "some public program adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good."[83]

[J18] Even though multiple factors are relevant in the analysis of regulatory takings claims, in such cases "the aggregate must be viewed in its entirety."[84] "[W]here an owner

---

[80] Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 415 (1922).

[81] Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1015 (1992). This categorical rule is limited to "the extraordinary circumstance when no productive or economically beneficial use of land is permitted;" it would not apply if the diminution in value were 95 percent instead of 100 percent. Anything less than a "complete elimination of value," or a "total loss," the Court acknowledged, would require the kind of analysis applied in Penn Central. See Lucas, supra, at 1017, 1019, n.8. For example, in Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 631 (2001), the Court held that a regulation permitting a landowner to build a substantial residence on an 18-acre parcel did not leave the property "economically idle."

[82] See Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 617 (2001) (emphasis added), discussing Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104 (1978).

[83] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 124 (1978). See also Kirby Forest Indus., Inc. v. United States, 467 U.S. 1, 14 (1984): "[A] radical curtailment of a landowner's freedom to make use of or ability to derive income from his land may give rise to a taking within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment, even if the Government has not physically intruded upon the premises or acquired a legal interest in the property. . . . The principle that underlies this doctrine is that, while most burdens consequent upon government action undertaken in the public interest must be borne by individual landowners as concomitants of the advantage of living and doing business in a civilized community, some are so substantial and unforeseeable, and can so easily be identified and redistributed, that justice and fairness require that they be borne by the public as a whole. These considerations are as applicable to the problem of determining when in a condemnation proceeding the taking occurs as they are to the problem of ascertaining whether a taking has been effected by a putative exercise of the police power." (Emphasis added.)

The rule applied in Dolan (see para. G37) considers whether dedications demanded as conditions of development are proportional to the development's anticipated impacts. It is not designed to address, and is not readily applicable to, the much different questions arising where the landowner's challenge is based not on excessive exactions but on denial of development. See City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes at Monterey, Ltd., 526 U.S. 687, 703 (1999).

[84] Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51, 66 (1979).

possesses a full 'bundle' of property rights, the destruction of one 'strand' of the bundle is not a taking," even when this strand constitutes the most beneficial use of the property.[85] That explains why, for example, a regulation that prohibits commercial transactions in eagle feathers, but does not bar other uses or impose any physical invasion or restraint upon them, is not a taking.[86] Moreover, the regulatory takings jurisprudence "does not divide a single parcel into discrete segments and attempt to determine whether rights in a particular segment have been entirely abrogated. In deciding whether a particular governmental action has effected a taking, th[e] Court focuses rather both on the character of the action and on the nature and extent of the interference with rights in the parcel as a whole."[87]

[J19] "An interest in real property is defined by the metes and bounds that describe its geographic dimensions and the term of years that describes the temporal aspect of the owner's interest. . . . Both dimensions must be considered if the interest is to be viewed in its entirety. Hence, a permanent deprivation of the owner's use of the entire area is a taking of 'the parcel as a whole,' whereas a temporary restriction that merely causes a diminution in value is not."[88] An "extreme categorical rule that any deprivation of all economic use, no matter how brief, constitutes a compensable taking cannot be sustained. [Such a] broad submission would apply to numerous 'normal delays in obtaining building permits, changes in zoning ordinances, variances, and the like,' . . . as well as to orders temporarily prohibiting access to crime scenes, businesses that violate health codes, or fire-damaged buildings. . . . [Consequently it] would . . . require changes in numerous practices that have long been considered permissible exercises of the police power. . . . A rule . . . requir[ing] compensation for every delay in the use of property would render routine government processes prohibitively expensive or encourage hasty decision making."[89] Moreover, interference with investment-backed expectations is one of a number of factors to be examined under the Penn Central framework. Under these considerations, the Court has held that the proper "approach to claims that a regulation has effected a temporary taking requires careful examination and weighing of all the relevant circumstances," only one of which is the length of the delay; "the duration of the restriction is one of the important factors that a court must con-

---

[85] Id. at 65–66.

[86] Id. at 64–68.

[87] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 130–31 (1978). The "deprivation of all economically feasible use" rule does not make clear the "property interest" against which the loss of value is to be measured. "When, for example, a regulation requires a developer to leave 90% of a rural tract in its natural state, it is unclear whether the Court would analyze the situation as one in which the owner has been deprived of all economically beneficial use of the burdened portion of the tract, or as one in which the owner has suffered a mere diminution in value of the tract as a whole. . . . The answer to this difficult question may lie in how the owner's reasonable expectations have been shaped by the State's law of property—i.e., whether and to what degree the State's law has accorded legal recognition and protection to the particular interest in land with respect to which the takings claimant alleges a diminution in (or elimination of) value." In any event, a court may not examine the diminution in a particular parcel's value produced by a municipal ordinance in light of the total value of the taking claimant's other holdings in the vicinity. See Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1016, n.7 (1992).

[88] Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 331–32 (2002).

[89] Id. at 534–35.

sider in the appraisal of a regulatory takings claim, but with respect to that factor as with respect to other factors, the temptation to adopt what amount to per se rules in either direction must be resisted."[90]

[J20] In Lucas, "the Court observed that a landowner's ability to recover for a government deprivation of all economically beneficial use of property is not absolute, but instead is confined by limitations on the use of land which 'inhere in the title itself.' . . . This is so, the Court reasoned, because the landowner is constrained by those 'restrictions that background principles of the State's law of property and nuisance already place upon land ownership.'"[91] "A law or decree with such an effect must, in other words, do no more than duplicate the result that could have been achieved in the courts—by adjacent landowners (or other uniquely affected persons) under the State's law of private nuisance, or by the State under its complementary power to abate nuisances that affect the public generally, or otherwise. On this analysis, the owner of a lakebed, for example, would not be entitled to compensation when he is denied the requisite permit to engage in a land-filling operation that would have the effect of flooding others' land. Nor the corporate owner of a nuclear generating plant, when it is directed to remove all improvements from its land upon discovery that the plant sits astride an earthquake fault. Such regulatory action may well have the effect of eliminating the land's only economically productive use, but it does not proscribe a productive use that was previously permissible under relevant property and nuisance principles."[92] Palazzolo made clear that "a regulation that otherwise would be unconstitutional absent compensation is not transformed into a 'background principle of the State's law' by mere virtue of the passage of title. [The foregoing concept] is explained in terms of those common, shared understandings of permissible limitations derived from a State's legal tradition. . . . A regulation or common law rule cannot be a background principle for some owners, but not for others. The determination whether an existing, general law can limit all economic use of property must turn on objective factors, such as the nature of the land use proscribed. [Hence, a] law does not become a background principle for subsequent owners by enactment itself."[93]

[J21] Zoning and Land Use Restrictions—In General. Agins held that a use restriction on real property "effects a taking if [it] does not substantially advance legitimate state interests . . . or denies an owner economically viable use of his land."[94] "Because this statement was phrased in the disjunctive, Agins' 'substantially advances' language was read to announce a stand-alone regulatory takings test that was wholly independent of Penn Central or any other test."[95]

---

[90] Id. at 535, 542.

[91] Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 629 (2001), quoting Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1015, 1029 (1992).

[92] Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1015, 1029–30 (1992). As the Court noted, common law principles "rarely support prohibition of the 'essential use' of land." Moreover, the fact that a particular use has long been engaged in by similarly situated owners ordinarily imports a lack of any common law prohibition (though changed circumstances or new knowledge may make what was previously permissible no longer so). So also does the fact that other landowners, similarly situated, are permitted to continue the use denied to the claimant. Id. at 1031.

[93] Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 629–30 (2001).

[94] Agins v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255, 260 (1980).

[95] Lingle v. Chevron, 544 U.S. 528, 540 (2005). Although the Court did not provide a [J22] In Lingle v. Chevron, the Court held that that the above formula, adopted in Agins, prescribes an inquiry in the nature of a due process, not a takings, test, and that it is "not a valid method of discerning whether private property has been 'taken' for purposes of the Fifth Amendment, . . . [since it] reveals nothing about the magnitude or character of the burden a particular regulation imposes upon private property rights. Nor does it provide any information about how any regulatory burden is distributed among property owners. In consequence, this test does not help to identify those regulations whose effects are functionally comparable to government appropriation or invasion of private property; it is tethered neither to the text of the Takings Clause nor to the basic justification for allowing regulatory actions to be challenged under the Clause."[96] In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that "a plaintiff seeking to challenge a government regulation as an uncompensated taking of private property may proceed by alleging a 'physical' taking, a Lucas-type 'total regulatory taking,' a Penn Central taking, or a land-use exaction violating the standards set forth in Nollan and Dolan."[97] thorough explanation of the nature or applicability of the requirement that a regulation "substantially advance legitimate public interests" outside the context of required dedications or exactions, it made clear that this standard was not the same as those applied to due process or equal protection claims: the Court required that the regulation "substantially advance" the "legitimate state interest" sought to be achieved, not that the state "could rationally have decided" that the measure adopted might achieve the state's objective. See Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 U.S. 825, 834, n.3 (1987), discussing Agins.

---

This requirement did not mean that courts had "a license to judge the effectiveness of legislation," or that courts were to undertake "least restrictive alternative" analysis in deciding whether a state regulatory scheme was designed to remedy a public harm or was instead intended to provide private benefits. "That a land use regulation might be somewhat overinclusive or underinclusive is, of course, no justification for rejecting it." See Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 487, n.16 (1987).

96 Lingle v. Chevron, 544 U.S. 528, 542 (2005).

97 Id. at 548. Relatedly, the Court emphasized:

> Our holding today—that the "substantially advances" formula is not a valid takings test—does not require us to disturb any of our prior holdings. To be sure, we applied a "substantially advances" inquiry in Agins itself, . . . and arguably also in Keystone Bituminous Coal Assn. v. DeBenedictis. . . . But in no case have we found a compensable taking based on such an inquiry. Indeed, in most of the cases reciting the 'substantially advances' formula, the Court has merely assumed its validity when referring to it in dicta.
>
> [Further] . . . [a]lthough Nollan and Dolan quoted Agins' language, . . . the rule those decisions established is entirely distinct from the "substantially advances" test we address today. Whereas the "substantially advances" inquiry before us now is unconcerned with the degree or type of burden a regulation places upon property, Nollan and Dolan both involved dedications of property so onerous that, outside the exactions context, they would be deemed per se physical takings. In neither case did the Court question whether the exaction would substantially advance some legitimate state interest. . . . Rather, the issue was whether the exactions substantially advanced the same interests that land-use authorities asserted would allow them to deny the permit altogether. As the Court explained in Dolan, these cases involve a special application of the doctrine of "unconstitutional conditions," which provides that the government may not require a person to give up a constitutional right . . . in exchange for a discretionary benefit conferred by the government where the benefit has little or no relationship to the property. . . . That is worlds apart from a rule that says a regulation

[J23] "A requirement that a person obtain a permit before engaging in a certain use of his or her property does not itself 'take' the property in any sense: after all, the very existence of a permit system implies that permission may be granted, leaving the landowner free to use the property as desired. Moreover, even if the permit is denied, there may be other viable uses available to the owner. Only when a permit is denied and the effect of the denial is to prevent economically viable use of the land in question can it be said that a taking has occurred."[98]

[J24] The Ripeness Requirement. A takings claim challenging the application of land use regulations "is not ripe unless the government entity charged with implementing the regulations has reached a final decision regarding the application of the regulations to the property at issue."[99] "A final decision by the responsible state agency informs the affecting property constitutes a taking on its face solely because it does not substantially advance a legitimate government interest. In short, Nollan and Dolan cannot be characterized as applying the "substantially advances" test we address today, and our decision should not be read to disturb these precedents.

---

Id. at 545–48.

"[I]n evaluating most generally applicable zoning regulations, the burden properly rests on the party challenging the regulation to prove that it constitutes an arbitrary regulation of property rights. . . . [By contrast, where a city has] made an adjudicative decision to condition one's application for a building permit on an individual parcel, the burden properly rests on the city." See Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374, 391, n.8 (1994).

Under the due process clause, the legislature may not delegate, without proper guideline or check, zoning power to a narrow segment of the community. In Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U.S. 137 (1912), the Court invalidated a city ordinance that conferred the power to establish building setback lines upon the owners of two-thirds of the property abutting any street. Similarly, in Washington ex rel. Seattle Title Trust Co. v. Roberge, 278 U.S. 116 (1928), the Court struck down an ordinance that permitted the establishment of philanthropic homes for the aged in residential areas but only upon the written consent of the owners of two-thirds of the property within 400 feet of the proposed facility.

"[T]he standardless delegation of zoning power to a limited group of property owners condemned by the Court in Eubank and Roberge is not to be equated with decision making by the people through the referendum process. . . . 'A referendum is far more than an expression of ambiguously founded neighborhood preference; it is the city itself legislating through its voters—an exercise by the voters of their traditional right through direct legislation to override the views of their elected representatives as to what serves the public interest.'" See City of Eastlake v. Forest City Enters., Inc., 426 U.S. 668, 678–79 (1976).

In Thomas Cusack Co. v. Chicago, 242 U.S. 526 (1917), the Court upheld a neighborhood consent provision that permitted property owners to waive a municipal restriction prohibiting the construction of billboards. In that case, the Court distinguished Eubank in the following way: "[The ordinance in Eubank] left the establishment of the building line untouched until the lot owners should act, and then . . . gave to it the effect of law. The ordinance in the case at bar absolutely prohibits the erection of any billboards . . . , but permits this prohibition to be modified with the consent of the persons who are to be most affected by such modification." Since the property owners could simply waive an otherwise applicable legislative limitation, the Court in Cusack determined that the provision did not delegate legislative power at all. Id. at 531.

98 United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes Inc., 474 U.S. 121, 127 (1985). There, the Court upheld a regulation requiring landowners to obtain permits from the Army Corps of Engineers before discharging fill material into wetlands adjacent to navigable bodies of water and their tributaries.

99 Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473

constitutional determination whether a regulation has deprived a landowner of 'all economically beneficial use' of the property, . . . or defeated the reasonable investment-backed expectations of the landowner to the extent that a taking has occurred."[100] These matters cannot be resolved in definitive terms until a court knows the nature and extent of permitted development on the land in question.[101]

[J25] Agins is the first case in which the Court employed a notion of ripeness in declining to reach the merits of an as-applied regulatory taking claim. In Agins, the landowners, who challenged zoning ordinances restricting the number of houses they could build on their property, sued without seeking approval for any particular development on their land. The Court held that the only issue justiciable at that point was whether mere enactment of the statute amounted to a taking. Without employing the term "ripeness," the Court explained that, because the owners "ha[d] not submitted a plan for development of their property as the [challenged] ordinances permitted, there [wa]s as yet no concrete controversy regarding the application of the specific zoning provisions."[102]

[J26] Hodel toughened the ripeness requirement. There, coal producers and landowners challenged the enactment of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 as a taking of their property. As in Agins, the Court concluded that an as-applied challenge was unripe, reasoning that "[t]here [wa]s no indication in the record that appellees ha[d] availed themselves of the opportunities provided by the Act to obtain administrative relief by requesting . . . a variance from the [applicable provisions of the Act.]"[103] The Court thus "held that, where the regulatory regime offers the possibility of a variance from its facial requirements, a landowner must go beyond submitting a plan for development and actually seek such a variance to ripen his claim."[104]

[J27] Williamson County confirmed Hodel's holding. In that case, a developer's plan to build a residential complex was rejected by the local Planning Commission as inconsistent with zoning ordinances and subdivision regulations in eight different respects. The Court acknowledged that respondent had submitted a plan for developing its prop-

---

U.S. 172, 186 (1985). The Court has noted that the ripeness doctrine is drawn both from Article III limitations on judicial power and from prudential reasons for refusing to exercise jurisdiction. See, e.g., Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 733, n.7 (1997). See also para. A7.

100 Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 618 (2001).

101 Id. at 618, citing MacDonald, Sommer & Frates v. Yolo County, 477 U.S. 340, 351 (1986). Facial challenges to land use regulation "are generally ripe the moment the challenged regulation or ordinance is passed, but face an uphill battle, . . . since it is difficult to demonstrate that 'mere enactment' of a piece of legislation 'deprived [the owner] of economically viable use of [his] property.'" See Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 736, n.10 (1997), quoting Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 297 (1981).

The ripeness doctrine has also been applied with respect to a rent control ordinance, under which a landlord may automatically raise the annual rent of a tenant in possession by as much as 8 percent, but if a tenant objects to a higher increase, a hearing is required to determine whether the landlord's proposed increase is "reasonable under the circumstances," and the hearing officer is directed to consider specified factors, including "the hardship to a tenant." See Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1988).

102 Agins v. City of Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255, 260 (1980).

103 Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 297 (1981).

104 See Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 736–37 (1997).

erty, and thus had passed beyond the Agins threshold, but nonetheless held the taking challenge unripe, reasoning that, "among the factors of particular significance in the [taking] inquiry are the economic impact of the challenged action and the extent to which it interferes with reasonable investment-backed expectations, . . . factors [that] simply cannot be evaluated until the administrative agency has arrived at a final, definitive position regarding how it will apply the regulations at issue to the particular land in question."[105] Thus, a developer must at least "resort to the procedure for obtaining variances . . . [and obtain] a conclusive determination by the [administrative agency] whether it would allow" the proposed development, in order to ripen his taking claim.[106] Further, MacDonald "suggested that the Williamson County 'final decision' requirement might sometimes require multiple proposals or variance applications before a landowner's case will be considered ripe."[107] "Leaving aside the question of how definitive a local zoning decision must be to satisfy Williamson County's demand for finality, two points about the requirement are clear: it applies to decisions about how a taking plaintiff's own land may be used, and it responds to the high degree of discretion characteristically possessed by land use boards in softening the strictures of the general regulations they administer."[108]

[J28] Landmark Laws. The Court has recognized that "States and cities may enact land use restrictions or controls to enhance the quality of life by preserving the character and desirable aesthetic features of a city."[109] Penn Central involved the New York City Landmarks Preservation Commission's denial of permission to construct an office building in excess of 50 stories above the Grand Central Terminal, an eight-story structure used as a railroad station and for a variety of other commercial purposes, which had been designated as a "landmark." The city had not prohibited any new construction but had announced that whether any construction would be allowed depended on

---

[105] Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 191 (1985).

[106] Id. at 193.

[107] See Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 738, n.12 (1997), discussing MacDonald, Sommer & Frates v. Yolo County, 477 U.S. 340, 353, n.9 (1986) ("[r]ejection of exceedingly grandiose development plans does not logically imply that less ambitious plans will receive similarly unfavorable reviews").

"Government authorities, of course, may not burden property by imposition of repetitive or unfair land use procedures in order to avoid a final decision." See Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 621 (2001).

[108] Suitum v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 520 U.S. 725, 738 (1997). If the administrative agency has no discretion to exercise over one's right to use his land, no occasion exists for applying Williamson County's requirement that a landowner take steps to obtain a final decision about the use that will be permitted on a particular parcel. The same is true when no discretionary decision must be made by any agency official for the landowner to obtain "Transferable Development Rights" or to offer them for sale. Id. at 739–40.

See also Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 620 (2001) ("While a landowner must give a land use authority an opportunity to exercise its discretion, once it becomes clear that the agency lacks the discretion to permit any development, or the permissible uses of the property are known to a reasonable degree of certainty, a takings claim is likely to have ripened.").

[109] See Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 129 (1978), citing New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297 (1976) (New Orleans ordinance prohibiting pushcart food sales in the Vieux Carre); Young v. Am. Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976) (city ordinance prohibiting two or more adult theaters within a specified area).

whether the proposed addition would harmonize in scale, material, and character with the Terminal. Moreover, the Court remarked that, because the rights to develop the airspace above Grand Central Terminal had been made transferable to other parcels in the vicinity (some of which the owners of the terminal themselves owned), it was not accurate to say that the owners had been denied all use of their pre-existing air rights, and that, even if the Transferable Development Rights were inadequate to constitute just compensation if a taking had occurred, they could nonetheless be taken into account in considering the impact of regulation. Under these considerations, the Court concluded that the application of New York City's Landmarks Law had not effected a "taking" of appellants' property; the restrictions imposed were substantially related to the promotion of the general welfare, and "not only permit[ted] reasonable beneficial use of the landmark site, but also afford[ed] appellants opportunities further to enhance not only the Terminal site proper but also other properties."[110]

[J29] Mining Regulations. In Mahon, the Pennsylvania Coal Company had served notice on Mr. and Mrs. Mahon that the company's mining operations beneath their premises would soon reach a point that would cause subsidence to the surface. The Mahons filed a bill in equity seeking to enjoin the coal company from removing any coal that would cause "the caving in, collapse or subsidence" of their dwelling. The bill acknowledged that the Mahons owned only the surface or right of soil in the lot, and that the coal company had reserved the right to remove the coal without any liability to the owner of the surface estate. Nonetheless, the Mahons asserted that Pennsylvania's then recently enacted Kohler Act, which prohibited mining that caused subsidence under certain structures, entitled them to an injunction. After initially having entered a preliminary injunction pending a hearing on the merits, the Chancellor soon dissolved it, observing that the plaintiffs' bill contained no averment on which to base, by implication or otherwise, any finding of fact that any interest, public or private, was involved in the defendant's proposal to mine the coal, except the private interest of the plaintiffs in the prevention of private injury. The Pennsylvania supreme court reversed, concluding that the Kohler Act was a proper exercise of the police power. One Justice dissented, arguing that the Kohler Act was not actually intended to protect lives and safety, but rather it was special legislation enacted for the sole benefit of the surface owners who had released their right to support. The Court accepted this argument. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Holmes first decided the specific case at hand in a single, terse paragraph: "This is the case of a single private house. No doubt there is a public interest even in this, as there is in every purchase and sale and in all that happens within the commonwealth. . . . But usually, in ordinary private affairs, the public interest does not warrant much of this kind of interference. A source of damage to such a house is not a public nuisance, even if similar damage is inflicted on others in different places. The damage is not common or public. . . . The extent of the public interest is shown by the statute to be limited, since the statute ordinarily does not apply to land [110] Penn Cent. Transp. Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 129–38 (1978). The Court also noted that, although landmark laws apply only to selected parcels, they are not, as a matter of principle, like discriminatory, or "reverse spot," zoning—that is, a land use decision that arbitrarily singles out a particular parcel for different, less favorable treatment than the neighboring ones. In contrast to discriminatory zoning, which is the antithesis of land use control as part of some comprehensive plan, a municipal landmark law normally embodies a comprehensive plan to preserve structures of historic or aesthetic interest wherever they might be found in the city. Id. at 132.

when the surface is owned by the owner of the coal. Furthermore, it is not justified as a protection of personal safety. That could be provided for by notice. Indeed, the very foundation of this bill is that the defendant gave timely notice of its intent to mine under the house. On the other hand, the extent of the taking is great. It purports to abolish what is recognized in Pennsylvania as an estate in land—a very valuable estate—and what is declared by the Court below to be a contract hitherto binding the plaintiffs. If we were called upon to deal with the plaintiffs' position alone, we should think it clear that the statute does not disclose a public interest sufficient to warrant so extensive a destruction of the defendant's constitutionally protected rights."[111] Then, the Court discussed the general validity of the Act. In this portion of the Court's opinion, Justice Holmes rested on two propositions, both critical to the Court's decision. First, because it served only private interests, not health or safety, the Kohler Act could not be sustained as an exercise of the police power. Second, the statute made it "commercially impracticable" to mine "certain coal" in the areas affected by the Kohler Act.[112]

[J30] Keystone Bituminous Coal involved Section 4 of Pennsylvania's Bituminous Mine Subsidence and Land Conservation Act (Act), which prohibited coal mining causing subsidence damage to preexisting public buildings, dwellings, and cemeteries. Implementing regulations issued by Pennsylvania's Department of Environmental Resources (DER) required 50 percent of the coal beneath Section 4-protected structures to be kept in place to provide surface support and extend Section 4's protection to watercourses. Section 6 of the Act authorized the DER to revoke a mining permit if the removal of coal caused damage to a Section 4-protected structure or area, and the operator did not within six months repair the damage, satisfy any claim arising therefrom, or deposit the sum that repairs would reasonably cost as security. Unlike the statute considered in Mahon, the Subsidence Act did not merely involve a balancing of the private economic interests of coal companies against the private interests of the surface owners, but it served legitimate public interests in health, safety, the environment, and the fiscal integrity of the area by minimizing damage to surface areas. None of the indicia of a statute enacted solely for the benefit of private parties identified in Mahon were present in Keystone. First, the Kohler Act was a "private benefit" statute, since it ordinarily did not apply to land when the surface was owned by the owner of the coal. The Subsidence Act, by contrast, had no such exception. The current surface owner could only waive the protection of the Act if the DER consented. Moreover, the Court was forced to reject the Commonwealth's safety justification for the Kohler Act, because it found that the Commonwealth's interest in safety could as easily have been accomplished through a notice requirement to landowners. The Subsidence Act, by contrast, was designed to accomplish a number of widely varying interests, with reference to which Keystone had not suggested alternative methods through which the Commonwealth could proceed. Petitioners' argument that Section 6's remedies were unnecessary to satisfy the Act's public purposes, because of the Commonwealth's insurance program that reimbursed repair costs, was not persuasive, since the public purpose was served by deterring mine operators from causing damage in the first place by making them assume financial responsibility. Thus, the Commonwealth had merely exercised its police power to prevent activities that were tantamount to public nuisances. Further, petitioners failed to show that the mere enactment of the Act made it impossible for petitioners to profitably engage in their business, or that there had been undue interference with their investment-backed expectations. The only relevant evidence was testimony indicating that Section 4 required petitioners to leave 27 million tons (less than 2 percent) of their coal in place. Petitioners' argument that the Commonwealth had effectively appropriated this coal was rejected, because the 27 million tons did not constitute a separate segment of property for "taking" law purposes.[113]

---

111 Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 413–14 (1922).

112 Id. at 414–15.

[J31] In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining, the Court upheld, on its face, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977, a comprehensive statute designed to establish a nationwide program to protect society and the environment from the adverse effects of surface coal mining operations. The district court had held that two of the Act's provisions violated the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment: first, a provision that required operators to perform the task of restoring steep slope surface mines to their approximate original contour; second a provision expressly prohibiting mining in certain locations. The Court held that the mere enactment of these provisions did not constitute a taking, for it did not deny an owner economically viable use of his land. First, the Act did not, on its face, prevent beneficial use of coal-bearing lands. Except for the proscription of mining near certain locations (national parks and forests, or where mining would adversely affect publicly owned parks or places included in the National Register of Historic Sites, or areas within 100 feet of a cemetery or the right-of-way of a public road, and within 300 feet of an occupied dwelling, public building, school, church, community or institutional building, or public park), the Act did not categorically prohibit surface coal mining; it merely regulated the conditions under which such operations might be conducted. Second, the prohibition of mining in certain locations, did not, on its face, deprive owners of land within its reach of economically viable use of their land, since it did not proscribe non-mining uses of such land. Finally, the Act did not purport to regulate alternative uses to which coal-bearing lands might be put.[114]

[J32] In Goldblatt, a city safety ordinance banned any excavations below the water table and effectively prohibited the claimant from continuing a sand and gravel mining business that had been operated on the particular parcel since 1927. The Court upheld the ordinance against a "taking" challenge, although the ordinance prohibited the present and presumably most beneficial use of the property and had severely affected a particular owner. The Court assumed that the ordinance did not prevent the owner's reasonable use of the property, since the owner made no showing of an adverse effect on the value of the land. Because the restriction served a substantial public purpose, the Court thus held no taking had occurred.[115]

[J33] Moratoria. Moratoria are "an essential tool of successful development." "The interest in facilitating informed decisionmaking by regulatory agencies counsels against adopting a per se rule that would . . . treat these interim measures as takings regardless of the planners' good faith, the landowners' reasonable expectations, or the moratorium's actual impact on property values. . . . Otherwise the financial constraints of compensating property owners during a moratorium may force officials to rush through the

---

[113] Keystone Bituminous Coal Ass'n v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 485–502 (1987).

[114] Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 295–96 (1981). See also Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 335 (1981).

[115] Goldblatt v. Town of Hempstead, 369 U.S. 590 (1962).

planning process or to abandon the practice altogether."[116] And "the interest in protecting the decisional process is even stronger when an agency is developing a regional plan than when it is considering a permit for a single parcel. . . . Moreover, with a temporary ban on development there, is a lesser risk that individual landowners will be 'singled out' to bear a special burden that should be shared by the public as a whole."[117] For these reasons, although it may be true "that a moratorium lasting more than one year should be viewed with special skepticism," a 32-month moratorium on development imposed during the process of devising a comprehensive land-use plan does not constitute a per se taking of property.[118]

[J34] Restrictions on Housing Arrangements. In Belle Terre, the Court considered an unusual regulation enacted by a small Long Island community in an apparent effort to avoid some of the unpleasantness of urban living. It restricted land use within the village to single-family dwellings, and it defined "family" in such a way that no more than two unrelated persons could inhabit the same house. The Court upheld this ordinance, noting that desires to avoid congestion and noise from both people and vehicles were "legitimate guidelines in a land use project addressed to family needs" and that it was quite within the village's power to "make the area a sanctuary for people."[119] Moore, like Belle Terre, involved an ordinance that limited the occupancy of each dwelling to a single family. Unlike the ordinance challenged in Belle Terre, however, this ordinance defined "family" in a manner that prevented certain relatives from living together, and it therefore intruded on choices concerning family living arrangements. Although the ordinance was supported by the legitimate state interests in avoiding overcrowding, traffic congestion, and an undue financial burden on the school system, the ordinance's relation to those state interests was too "tenuous" to satisfy constitutional standards.[120]

[J35] Required Dedications and Other Development Conditions. Under the doctrine of "unconstitutional conditions," the government may not require a person to give up the constitutional right to receive just compensation when property is taken for a public use in exchange for a discretionary benefit conferred by the government "where the property sought has little or no relationship to the benefit."[121]

[J36] Nollan set forth the "essential nexus" standard for reviewing development exactions. There, the Court recognized that a state agency may condition the grant of a land use permit on the dedication of a property interest, if the dedication substantially furthers a legitimate police power purpose that would justify a refusal to issue the permit.[122] At the same time, however, it held that such a condition is unconstitutional, if the condition "utterly fails" to further a goal that would justify the refusal.[123] In that case, the California Coastal Commission demanded a lateral public easement across the Nollan's

---

116 Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 338–39 (2002).

117 Id. at 340–41.

118 Id. at 341–42.

119 Vill. of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1, 9 (1974).

120 Moore v. E. Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 498–506 (1977) (plurality opinion). Justice Stevens found that the zoning ordinance was unreasonable as having no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. Id. at 513–521.

121 Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374, 385 (1994).

122 Nollan v. California Coastal Comm'n, 483 U.S. 825, 836–37 (1987).

123 Id. at 837.

beachfront lot in exchange for a permit to demolish an existing bungalow and replace it with a three-bedroom house. The public easement was designed to connect two public beaches that were separated by the Nollan's property. The Coastal Commission asserted that the public easement condition was imposed to promote the legitimate state interests of protecting the public's ability to see the beach, assisting the public in overcoming the "psychological barrier" to using the beach created by a developed shorefront and preventing congestion on the public beaches. Assuming, without deciding, that this was so, the Court admitted that "if the Commission attached to the permit some condition that would have protected the public's ability to see the beach notwithstanding construction of the new house—for example, a height limitation, a width restriction, or a ban on fences—so long as the Commission could have exercised its police power to forbid construction of the house altogether, imposition of the condition would also be constitutional. Moreover the condition would be constitutional even if it consisted of the requirement that the Nollans provide a viewing spot on their property for passersby with whose sighting of the ocean their new house would interfere. Although such a requirement, constituting a permanent grant of continuous access to the property, would have to be considered a taking if it were not attached to a development permit, the Commission's assumed power to forbid construction of the house in order to protect the public's view of the beach must surely include the power to condition construction upon some concession by the owner, even a concession of property rights, that serves the same end."[124] The Court resolved, however, that the Coastal Commission's regulatory authority was set completely adrift from its constitutional moorings when it claimed that a nexus existed between visual access to the ocean and a permit condition requiring lateral public access along the Nollan's beachfront lot. How enhancing the public's ability to "traverse to and along the shorefront" served the same governmental purpose of "visual access to the ocean" from the roadway was beyond the Court's ability to countenance. It was also impossible to understand how the challenged exaction lowered any "psychological barrier" to using the public beaches or how it helped to remedy any additional congestion on them caused by construction of the Nollans' new house. The absence of a nexus meant that the building restriction in question was not a valid regulation of land use but "an out-and-out plan of extortion."[125]

[J37] Dolan resolved the question of what is the required degree of connection between the exactions imposed by a city and the projected impacts of the proposed development. The Court held there that, in addition to showing a rational nexus to a public purpose that would justify an outright denial of the permit, the city must also demonstrate "rough proportionality" between the harm caused by the new land use and the benefit obtained by the condition. "No precise mathematical calculation is required, but the city must make some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development."[126] In that case, the city Planning Commission had conditioned approval of Dolan's application to expand her store and pave her parking lot upon her compliance with dedication of land (1) for a public greenway along a creek to minimize flooding that would be exacerbated by the increases in impervious surfaces associated with her development, and (2) for a pedestrian/bicycle pathway intended to relieve traffic con-

---

[124] Id. at 836.

[125] Id. at 837.

[126] Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374, 391 (1994).

gestion in the city's central business district. The Court found that preventing flooding along the creek and reducing traffic congestion in the district were legitimate public purposes; and a nexus existed between the first purpose and limiting development within the creek's floodplain and between the second purpose and providing for alternative means of transportation. Nevertheless, the findings upon which the city relied, did not show the required reasonable relationship between the floodplain easement and Dolan's proposed building. The Community Development Code already required that Dolan leave 15 percent of her property as open space, and the undeveloped floodplain would have nearly satisfied that requirement. However, the city had "never said why a public, as opposed to a private, greenway was required in the interest of flood control," and had "not attempted to make any individualized determination to support this part of its request." The city had also "not met its burden of demonstrating that the additional number of vehicle and bicycle trips generated by Dolan's development reasonably relate[d] to the city's requirement for a dedication of the pedestrian/bicycle pathway easement. The city simply [had] found that the creation of the pathway 'could offset some of the traffic demand . . . and lessen the increase in traffic congestion.' . . . [T]he city must make some effort to quantify its findings in support of the dedication for the pedestrian/bicycle pathway beyond the conclusory statement that it could offset some of the traffic demand generated."[127]

[J38] Rent Regulations.[128] "[S]tatutes regulating the economic relations of landlords and tenants are not per se takings."[129] "When a landowner decides to rent his land to tenants, the government may place ceilings on the rents the landowner can charge, . . . or require the landowner to accept tenants he does not like, . . . without automatically having to pay compensation. . . . Such forms of regulation are analyzed by engaging in the 'essentially ad hoc, factual inquiries' necessary to determine whether a regulatory taking has occurred."[130]

[J39] Public Utility Rate Regulation. The main reason for the regulation of private utility rates is "the inevitability of a monopoly that requires price control to take the place of price competition."[131] Public utilities are under a state statutory duty to serve the public. "Although their assets are employed in the public interest, . . . they are owned and operated by private investors. This partly public, partly private status of utility property creates its own set of questions under the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment. The guiding principle has been that the Constitution protects utilities from being limited to a charge for their property serving the public which is so 'unjust' as to be confiscatory."[132] "If the rate does not afford sufficient compensation, the State has taken the use of utility property without paying just compensation, and so violated the Fifth and

---

127 Id. at 393, 395–96.

128 See also para. J24 (ripeness requirement).

129 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Florida Power Corp., 480 U.S. 245, 252 (1987).

130 Yee v. City of Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 529 (1992). See, in extenso, para. J16.

131 Cantor v. Detroit Edison Co., 428 U.S. 579, 596 (1976).

132 Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 307 (1989), citing Covington & Lexington Tpk. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U.S. 578, 597 (1896) (a rate is too low if it is "so unjust as to destroy the value of [the] property for all the purposes for which it was acquired," and in so doing "practically deprive[s] the owner of property without due process of law"); Fed. Power Comm'n v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., 315 U.S. 575, 585 (1942) ("by longstanding usage in the field of rate regulation, the lowest reasonable rate is one which is not confiscatory in the constitutional sense"); Fed. Power Comm'n v. Texaco Inc., 417 U.S. 380, 391–92 (1974) ("all that Fourteenth Amendments. Nevertheless, how such compensation may be ascertained, and what are the necessary elements in such an inquiry, will always be an embarrassing question."[133]

[J40] "At one time, it was thought that the Constitution required rates to be set according to the actual present value of the assets employed in the public service. This method, known as the 'fair value' rule, is exemplified by the decision in Smyth v. Ames. Under the fair value approach, a 'company is entitled to ask . . . a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience,' while, on the other hand, 'the public is entitled to demand . . . that no more be exacted from it for the use of [utility property] than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.'"[134] "In theory, the Smyth v. Ames fair value standard mimics the operation of the competitive market. To the extent utilities' investments in plants are good ones (because their benefits exceed their costs), they are rewarded with an opportunity to earn an 'above-cost' return, that is, a fair return on the current 'market value' of the plant. To the extent utilities' investments turn out to be bad ones (such as plants that are canceled and so never used and useful to the public), the utilities suffer because the investments have no fair value, and so justify no return."[135] "Although the fair value rule gives utilities strong incentive to manage their affairs well and to provide efficient service to the public, it suffered from practical difficulties which ultimately led to its abandonment as a constitutional requirement. Perhaps the most serious problem associated with the fair value rule was 'the laborious and baffling task of finding the present value of the utility.' . . . The exchange value of a utility's assets, such as power plants, could not be set by a market price, because such assets were rarely bought and sold. Nor could the capital assets be valued by the stream of income they produced, because setting that stream of income was the very object of the rate proceeding."[136] "In response to these problems, Justice Brandeis . . . advocated an alternative approach as the constitutional minimum, what has become known as the 'prudent investment' or 'historical cost' rule. He accepted the Smyth v. Ames eminent domain analogy, but concluded that what was 'taken' by public utility regulation is not specific physical assets that are to be individually valued, but the capital prudently devoted to the public utility enterprise by the utilities' owners."[137] "Under the prudent investment rule, the utility is compensated for all prudent investments at their actual cost when made (their 'historical' cost), irrespective of whether individual investments are deemed necessary or beneficial in hindsight. The utilities is protected against, in a constitutional sense, is that the rates fixed by the Commission be higher than a confiscatory level").

---

"When rates fixed for a public service corporation by an administrative body are alleged to be confiscatory, the Federal Constitution requires that fair opportunity be afforded for submitting the controversy to a judicial tribunal for determination upon its own independent judgment both as to law and facts." See United Gas Pub. Serv. Co. v. Texas, 303 U.S. 123, 154 (1938) (separate opinion of McReynolds and Butler, JJ.), citing Ohio Valley Co. v. Ben Avon Borough, 253 U.S. 287, 289 (1920).

133 Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 308 (1989).

134 Id. at 308, quoting Smyth v. Ames, 169 U.S. 466, 547 (1898).

135 Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 308–09 (1989).

136 Id. at 309, n.5.

137 Id. at 309, discussing Missouri ex rel. Sw. Bell Tel. Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 262 U.S. 276, 291 (1923) (dissenting opinion).

incur fewer risks, but are limited to a standard rate of return on the actual amount of money reasonably invested."[138]

[J41] Hope Natural Gas abandoned the rule of Smyth v. Ames, and held that the "fair value" rule is not the only constitutionally acceptable method of fixing utility rates. Hope ruled that historical cost was a valid basis on which to calculate utility compensation. As the Court stated "[r]ates which enable [a] company to operate successfully, to maintain its financial integrity, to attract capital, and to compensate its investors for the risk assumed certainly cannot be condemned as invalid, even though they might produce only a meager return on the so called 'fair value' ratebase."[139] The Court also acknowledged in that case "that all of the subsidiary aspects of valuation for ratemaking purposes could not properly be characterized as having a constitutional dimension, despite the fact that they might affect property rights to some degree:"[140] "It is not theory, but the impact, of the rate order which counts. If the total effect of the rate order cannot be said to be unreasonable, judicial inquiry . . . is at an end. The fact that the method employed to reach that result may contain infirmities is not then important."[141]

[J42] The Court reaffirmed these teachings in Duquesne. There, the Court emphasized that "[t]he designation of a single theory of ratemaking as a constitutional requirement would unnecessarily foreclose alternatives which could benefit both consumers and investors. The Constitution within broad limits leaves the States free to decide what rate-setting methodology best meets their needs in balancing the interests of the utility and the public."[142] "The Constitution protects the utility from the net effect of the rate order on its property. Inconsistencies in one aspect of the methodology have no constitutional effect on the utility's property if they are compensated by countervailing factors in some other aspect. . . . Admittedly, the impact of certain rates can only be evaluated in the context of the system under which they are imposed. One of the elements always relevant to setting the rate under Hope is the return investors expect given the risk of the enterprise. . . . The risks a utility faces are in large part defined by the rate methodology, because utilities are virtually always public monopolies dealing in an essential service, and so relatively immune to the usual market risks. Consequently, a State's decision to arbitrarily switch back and forth between methodologies in a way which would require investors to bear the risk of bad investments at some times while denying them the benefit of good investments at others would raise serious constitutional questions."[143]

[J43] Regulation Against Multiple Ownership of Single Parcels of Indian Land. In 1983, Congress adopted the Indian Land Consolidation Act (ILCA) in part to reduce fractionated ownership of allotted lands. Section 207 of the Act—the "escheat" provision—prohibited the descent or devise of small fractional interests in allotments. Instead of passing to heirs, such fractional interests would escheat to the tribe, thereby consolidating the ownership of Indian lands. Congress defined the targeted fractional interest as one that both constituted 2 percent or less of the total acreage in an allotted tract

---

138 Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 309 (1989).

139 Fed. Power Comm'n v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591, 605 (1944).

140 See Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 310 (1989).

141 Fed. Power Comm'n v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591, 602 (1944).

142 Duquesne Light Co. v. Barasch, 488 U.S. 299, 316 (1989).

143 Id. at 314–15.

and had earned less than $100 in the preceding year. Section 207 made no provision for the payment of compensation to those who held such interests. In Hodel v. Irving, the Court invalidated Section 207 on the ground that it effected a taking of property without just compensation, in violation of the Fifth Amendment. The appellees in that case were, or represented, heirs or devisees of members of the Oglala Sioux Tribe. "But for Section 207, the appellees would have received 41 fractional interests in allotments; under Section 207, those interests would escheat to the Tribe." The Court "tested the legitimacy of § 207 by considering its economic impact, its effect on investment-backed expectations, and the essential character of the measure. . . . Turning first to the economic impact of § 207, the Court observed that the provision's income generation test might fail to capture the actual economic value of the land. . . . The Court next indicated that § 207 likely did not interfere with investment-backed expectations. . . . Key to the decision in Irving, however, was the 'extraordinary' character of the Government regulation. . . . As the Court noted, § 207 amounted to the 'virtua[l] abrogation of the right to pass on a certain type of property.' . . . Such a complete abrogation of the rights of descent and devise could not be upheld."[144]

[J44] Navigational Servitude. Though the Court "has never held that the navigational servitude creates a blanket exception to the Takings Clause whenever Congress exercises its Commerce Clause authority to promote navigation,"[145] there can be no doubt that "the Commerce Clause confers a unique position upon the Government in connection with navigable waters."[146] It gives to the federal government "a 'dominant servitude,' . . . which extends to the entire stream and the streambed below ordinary high-water mark. The proper exercise of this power is not an invasion of any private property rights in the stream or the lands underlying it, for the damage sustained does not result from taking property from riparian owners, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment, but from the lawful exercise of a power to which the interests of riparian 144 See Babbitt v. Youpee, 519 U.S. 234, 239–40 (1997), discussing and quoting Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704, 714–17 (1987). While Irving was pending in the court of appeals, Congress amended Section 207. Amended Section 207 differed from the original provision in three relevant respects: it looked back five years instead of one to determine the income produced from a small interest, and it created a rebuttable presumption that this income stream would continue; it permitted devise of otherwise escheatable interests to persons who already owned an interest in the same parcel; and it authorized tribes to develop their own codes governing the disposition of fractional interests. Babbitt v. Youpee held that the amended Section 207 did not cure the constitutional deficiency identified in the original version of Section 207. First, the new provisions "still train[ed] on income generated from the land, not on the value of the parcel." Second, amended Section 207 "severely restrict[ed] the right of an individual to direct the descent of his property" by "shrink[ing] drastically the universe of possible successors." And "the very limited group of permissible devisees [wa]s unlikely to contain any lineal descendants." Moreover, amended Section 207 continued to restrict devise "even in circumstances when the governmental purpose sought to be advanced, consolidation of ownership of Indian lands, d[id] not conflict with the further descent of the property." Giving effect to Youpee's directive bequeathing each fractional interest to one heir would not further fractionate Indian land holdings. The third alteration made in amended Section 207 also failed to bring the provision outside the reach of the Court's holding in Irving, since tribal codes governing disposition of escheatable interests had apparently not been developed. See Babbitt v. Youpee, 519 U.S. 234, 244–45 (1997).

---

145 Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 172 (1979).

146 United States v. Rands, 389 U.S. 121, 122 (1967).

owners have always been subject."[147] "The application of these principles to interference with streambed interests has not depended on balancing this valid public purpose in light of the intended use of those interests by the owner."[148] Thus, in Lewis Blue Point, the Court decided that no taking occurred where dredging carried out under the direction of the United States destroyed oysters that had been cultivated on privately held lands under the waters of the Great South Bay in New York. "The decision rested on the view that the dominant right of navigation 'must include the right to use the bed of the water for every purpose which is in aid of navigation.' The Court did not rely on the particular use to which the private owners put the bed, but rather observed that their very title to the submerged lands 'is acquired and held subject to the power of Congress to deepen the water over such lands or to use them for any structure which the interest of navigation, in its judgment, may require.'"[149]

[J45] "High-water mark bounds the bed of the river. Lands above it are fast lands, and to flood them is a taking for which compensation must be paid."[150] Hence, when a navigable stream is raised by the government to its ordinary high-water mark and maintained continuously at that level in the interest of navigation, the government is liable for the destruction of the agricultural value of the land beyond the bed of the stream.[151]

---

147 Id. at 123. See also Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U.S. 141, 163 (1900): "The primary use of the waters and the lands under them is for purposes of navigation, and the erection of piers in them to improve navigation for the public is entirely consistent with such use, and infringes no right of the riparian owner. Whatever the nature of the interest of a riparian owner in the submerged lands in front of his upland bordering on a public navigable water, his title is not as full and complete as his title to fast land which has no direct connection with the navigation of such water. It is a qualified title, a bare technical title, not at his absolute disposal, as is his upland, but to be held at all times subordinate to such use of the submerged lands and of the waters flowing over them as may be consistent with or demanded by the public right of navigation."

148 United States v. Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, 480 U.S. 700, 704 (1987).

149 Id. at 705, discussing and quoting Lewis Blue Point Oyster Cultivation Co. v. Brigggs, 229 U.S. 82, 87–88 (1913). "[J]ust as the navigational privilege permits the Government to reduce the value of riparian lands by denying the riparian owner access to the stream without compensation for his loss, . . . it also permits the Government to disregard the value arising from this same fact of riparian location in compensating the owner when fast lands are appropriated." See United States v. Virginia Elec. & Power Co., 365 U.S. 624, 629 (1961). Therefore, "when the Government acquires fast lands to improve navigation, it is not required under the Takings Clause to compensate landowners for certain elements of damage attributable to riparian location, such as the land's value as a hydroelectric site, . . . or a port site." See Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 177 (1979), citing United States v. Twin City Power Co., 350 U.S. 222, 226 (1956) and United States v. Rands, 389 U.S. 121, 123 (1967).

150 United States v. Willow River Power Co., 324 U.S. 499, 509 (1945).

151 See United States v. Kansas City Life Ins. Co., 339 U.S. 799, 800–01 (1950). In United States v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 365 U.S. 624 (1961), the United States acquired by condemnation a flowage easement over a tract of fast land adjacent to one of its navigable tributaries. That tract included a smaller tract of fast land over which respondent owned a perpetual and exclusive flowage easement, which was destroyed by the government's appropriation. The Court held that respondent was entitled to compensation for the value of its easement which was "attributable not to the water power, but to the depreciative impact of the easement upon the nonriparian uses of the property." Id. at 630. The value of respondent's easement was "the nonriparian value of the servient land discounted by the improbability of the easement's exercise," and, "in assessing this improbability, no weight should be given to the prospect of governmental appropriation." Id. at 635–36.

[J46] Kaiser Aetna was a case in which the owners of a private pond had invested substantial amounts of money in dredging the pond, developing it into an exclusive marina, and building a surrounding marina community. The federal government sought to compel free public use of the private marina on the ground that the marina became subject to the federal navigational servitude, because the owners had dredged a channel connecting it to navigable water. The Court noted that the government "could have refused to allow such dredging on the ground that it would have impaired navigation in the bay, or could have conditioned its approval of the dredging on petitioners' agreement to comply with various measures that it deemed appropriate for the promotion of navigation." But petitioners had a body of water that was private property under state law, linked to navigable water by a channel dredged by them with the consent of the government. Hence, the government's attempt to create a public right of access to the improved pond interfered with Kaiser Aetna's "reasonable investment backed expectations" and went "so far beyond ordinary regulation or improvement for navigation as to amount to a taking."[152]

[J47] Liens. In Armstrong, materialmen delivered materials to a prime contractor for use in constructing Navy personnel boats. Under state law, they obtained liens in the vessels. The prime contractor defaulted on his obligations to the United States, and the government took title to and possession of the uncompleted hulls and unused materials, thus making it impossible for the materialmen to enforce their liens. The Court held that "[t]he total destruction by the Government of all value of these liens, which constitute compensable property, has every possible element of a Fifth Amendment 'taking,' and is not a mere 'consequential incidence' of a valid regulatory measure." Therefore, government had the obligation to pay just compensation for the value of the liens the petitioners had lost.[153]

[J48] Under the bankruptcy power, Congress may discharge the debtor's personal obligation, but it cannot take for the benefit of the debtor rights in specific property acquired by the creditor prior to Congress' intervention. "If the public interest . . . permits the taking of property of individual mortgagees in order to relieve the necessities of individual mortgagors, resort must be had to proceedings by eminent domain, so that, through taxation, the burden of the relief afforded in the public interest may be borne by the public."[154] In Radford, a bank acquired a mortgage, which, under state law, constituted a lien enforceable by suit to foreclose. Subsequently, Congress amended the Bankruptcy Act so as to deprive mortgagees of substantial incidents of their rights to resort to mortgaged property. The Court held that the bank's property had been taken without just compensation in violation of the Fifth Amendment.[155] [J49] Prohibition of Trade in Certain Goods. Regulations that bar trade in certain goods have been upheld against claims of unconstitutional taking. For example, the Court has sustained regulations prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages despite the fact that individuals were left with previously acquired stocks. Everard's Breweries involved a federal statute that forbade the sale of liquors manufactured before passage of the statute. The claim of a taking in violation of the Fifth Amendment was tersely rejected.[156] Similarly, in Jacob Ruppert, the Court upheld a federal law that extended a domestic sales ban from intoxicating to non-intoxicating alcoholic beverages on hand at the time of the passage of the act, stating that there was "no appropriation of private property, but merely a lessening of value due to a permissible restriction imposed upon its use."[157] And Haberle Brewing broadly stated that "when a business is extin-

---

[152] Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 178–79 (1979).

[153] Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 48–49 (1960). International Harvester Credit Corp. v. Goodrich, 350 U.S. 537 (1956), involved a highway use tax, computed by the weight-distance principle, and imposed by New York upon motor carriers operating heavy vehicles on the state's highways. The tax owed by a carrier was a statutory lien upon all motor vehicles operated by the carrier within the state, and the lien was paramount to all prior liens or encumbrances. Many such vehicles were purchased and operated under conditional sales agreements, and certain conditional vendors, who had sold trucks to a carrier more than a year after the statute had become effective, questioned the extent to which the state could subordinate the vendors' security interests to the state's lien for taxes owed by the carrier. The Court held that the lien was reasonable and sustained the state's priority, noting (1) "the action of the vendors in yielding control of the trucks to the carrier, thus enabling the carrier to operate them on the State's highways;" (ii) that New York had "an unquestionable right to regulate the use of conditional sales agreements within the State;" and (iii) that vendors of trucks, as well as carriers, derived "substantial benefits from the State's costly construction and maintenance of its highways for heavy traffic." Id. at 544–46.

---

[154] Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555, 589–90, 601–02 (1935).

[155] Id. at 590–602. Congress' enactment, which by its terms applied only retrospectively, permitted the debtor, if the mortgagee assented, to purchase the property at its then-appraised value on a deferred payment plan. If the mortgagee refused to assent, the court was required to stay all proceedings for five years, during which time the debtor could retain possession by paying a reasonable rent. During that period, the bankrupt had an option to purchase the farm at any time at its appraised, or reappraised, value. The mortgagee was not only compelled to submit to the sale to the bankrupt but to a sale made at such time as the latter might choose. The Court found that the Act had taken from the bank the following property rights recognized under state law governing mortgages: "(1) The right to retain the lien until the indebtedness thereby secured is paid. (2) The right to realize upon the security by a judicial public sale. (3) The right to determine when such sale shall be held, subject only to the discretion of the court. (4) The right to protect its interest in the property by bidding at such sale whenever held, and thus to assure having the mortgaged property devoted primarily to the satisfaction of the debt, either through receipt of the proceeds of a fair competitive sale or by taking the property itself. (5) The right to control meanwhile the property during the period of default, subject only to the discretion of the court, and to have the rents and profits collected by a receiver for the satisfaction of the debt." Id. at 594–95.

In United States v. Security Industrial Bank, 459 U.S. 70, 78–79 (1982), the Court considered a Takings Clause challenge to a Bankruptcy Code provision permitting debtors to avoid certain liens, possibly including those pre-dating the statute's enactment. The Court expressed "substantial doubt whether the retroactive destruction of the appellees' liens . . . comport[ed] with the Fifth Amendment," and therefore construed the statute as applying only to lien interests vesting after the legislation took effect.

The Court has upheld, against a due process challenge, a federal statute giving a court of bankruptcy the power to stay the enforcement of the remedy under a real estate mortgage. See Continental Illinois Nat'l Bank v. Chicago, R.I. & P. R. Co., 294 U.S. 648, 680–81 (1935).

[156] Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U.S. 545, 563 (1924). It is not significant that the statute considered in that case had been passed under the Eighteenth (Prohibition) Amendment. "The Court did not suggest that the Amendment gave Congress a special prerogative to override ordinary Fifth Amendment limitations." See Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51, 67, n.23 (1979).

[157] Jacob Ruppert, Inc. v. Caffey, 251 U.S. 264, 303 (1920). For example, the beverage owner in that case retained the ability to export his product or to sell it domestically for purposes other than consumption.

guished as noxious under the Constitution, the owners cannot demand compensation from the government."[158]

[J50] Andrus v. Allard addressed the validity of regulations that prohibited commercial transactions in parts of birds legally killed before the birds came under the protection of federal statutes designed to prevent the destruction of certain species of birds. In sustaining the challenged prohibition against a takings claim, the Court stressed that the regulations did not compel the surrender of pre-existing artifacts consisting in part of protected bird products, and there was no physical invasion or restraint upon them. In this case, it was crucial that traders of avian artifacts retained the rights to possess and transport their property and to donate or devise the protected birds. Besides, it was not clear that appellees would be unable to derive economic benefit from the artifacts; for example, they might exhibit the artifacts for an admissions charge. The Court concluded that, although appellees should bear the costs of the regulations at issue, this was "a burden borne to secure the advantage of living and doing business in a civilized community."[159]

[J51] Regulations Regarding Trade Secrets. In Monsanto, the respondent had submitted health, safety, and environmental data to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) for the purpose of obtaining registration of certain pesticides. The company claimed that the agency's use and disclosure of certain data in accordance with the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) constituted a taking. The Court conceded that the data in question constituted property under state law. It also found, however, that certain of the data had been submitted to the agency after Congress had made clear that only limited confidentiality would be given data submitted for registration purposes. The Court observed that the statute served to inform Monsanto of the various conditions under which data might be released, and stated that since, "despite the data-consideration and data-disclosure provisions in the statute, Monsanto chose to submit the requisite data in order to receive a registration, it can hardly argue that its reasonable investment-backed expectations are disturbed when EPA acts to use or disclose the data in a manner that was authorized by law at the time of the submission." The Court rejected respondent's argument that the requirement that it relinquish some confidentiality imposed an unconstitutional condition on receipt of a government benefit, noting that "as long as [an applicant] is aware of the conditions under which the data are submitted, and the conditions are rationally related to a legitimate Government interest, a voluntary submission of data by an applicant in exchange for the economic advantages of a registration can hardly be called a taking."[160]

---

158 Clarke v. Haberle Brewing Co., 280 U.S. 384, 386 (1930). If a state legislature makes the mere possession of certain articles illegal, and such a prohibition is constitutional, the seizure and destruction, without compensation, of these articles does not violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See Samuels v. McCurdy, 267 U.S. 188, 194–98 (1925) (intoxicating liquors).

159 Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51, 65–67 (1979).

160 Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1006–07 (1984). See also Corn Prods. Ref. Co. v. Eddy, 249 U.S. 427, 431–32 (1919) ("The right of a manufacturer to maintain secrecy as to his compounds and processes must be held subject to the right of the State, in the exercise of its police power and in promotion of fair dealing, to require that the nature of the product be fairly set forth.").

[J52] Prior to its amendment in 1972, FIFRA was silent with respect to EPA's authorized use and disclosure of data submitted to it in connection with an application for registration. Although the Trade Secrets Act provided a criminal penalty for a government employee who disclosed, in a manner not authorized by law, any trade secret information revealed to him during the course of his official duties, this statute was not a guarantee of confidentiality to submitters of data, and, "absent an express promise, Monsanto had no reasonable, investment-backed expectation that its information [submitted to EPA before 1972] would remain inviolate in the hands of EPA." By contrast, under the statutory scheme in effect between 1972 and 1978, a submitter was given an opportunity to protect its trade secrets from disclosure by designating them as trade secrets at the time of submission. The Court held that the explicit governmental guarantee to registration applicants of confidentiality and exclusive use with respect to trade secrets during this period formed the basis of a reasonable investment-backed expectation. Hence, if the EPA, consistent with the data-consideration and data-disclosure provisions enacted in 1978, were to disclose such trade secret data or consider those data in evaluating the application of a subsequent applicant in a manner not authorized by the version of FIFRA in effect between 1972 and 1978, its actions would amount to a taking.[161]

[J53] Limitations on the "Right to Exclude." The Court has repeatedly held that, as to property reserved by its owner for private use, "the right to exclude [others is] 'one of the most essential sticks in the bundle of rights that are commonly characterized as property.'"[162] In Kaiser Aetna, the Court held that the government's imposition of a navigational servitude requiring public access to a pond was a taking where the landowner had reasonably relied on government consent in connecting the pond to navigable water. As the Court explained, "[t]his is not a case in which the Government is exercising its regulatory power in a manner that will cause an insubstantial devaluation of petitioner's private property; rather, the imposition of the navigational servitude in this context will result in an actual physical invasion of the privately owned marina." The Court concluded that even if the government physically invades only an easement in property, it must nonetheless pay compensation.[163]

[J54] By contrast PruneYard upheld a state constitutional requirement that shopping center owners permit individuals to exercise free speech and petition rights on their property, to which they had already invited the general public. As the Court noted, there was nothing to suggest that preventing mall owners from prohibiting this sort of activity would "unreasonably impair the value or use of their property as a shopping center."[164] Moreover, the state Constitution did not prevent the owners from restricting expressive activities by imposing reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions to minimize interference with their commercial functions. "Since the invasion was temporary and limited in nature, and since the owner had not exhibited an interest in excluding all persons from his property, 'the fact that [the solicitors] may have physically invade [the owners'] property cannot be viewed as determinative.'"[165]

---

161 Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1008–14 (1984).

162 Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 433 (1982), quoting Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 176 (1979).

163 Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 180 (1979).

164 PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 83 (1980).

165 Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 434 (1982), discussing

[J55] The Court also has sustained labor laws requiring companies to permit access to union organizers. The Court, in Babcock, stated: "Organization rights are granted to workers by the same authority, the National Government, that preserves property rights. Accommodation between the two must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other. The employer may not affirmatively interfere with organization; the union may not always insist that the employer aid organization. But when the inaccessibility of employees makes ineffective the reasonable attempts by non-employees to communicate with them through the usual channels, the right to exclude from property has been required to yield to the extent needed to permit communication of information on the right to organize."[166] Moreover, the Court held, in Central Hardware, that "[t]he allowed intrusion on property rights is limited to that necessary to facilitate the exercise of employees' § 7 rights [to organize under the National Labor Relations Act]. After the requisite need for access to the employer's property has been shown, the access is limited to (i) union organizers; (ii) prescribed non-working areas of the employer's premises; and (iii) the duration of the organization activity. In short, the principle of accommodation announced in Babcock is limited to labor organization campaigns, and the 'yielding' of property rights it may require is both temporary and limited."[167]

c. Destruction of Property in Emergency Situations[168]

[J56] A state may not be held liable for the destruction of real and personal property, "'in cases of actual necessity, to prevent the spreading of a fire' or to forestall other grave threats to the lives and property of others."[169] For example, in Miller v. Schoene, the Court held that the Fifth Amendment did not require Virginia to pay compensation to the owner of cedar trees ordered destroyed to prevent a disease from spreading to nearby apple orchards, which represented a far more valuable resource.[170] In such as case, due process of law, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, does not require previous notice and opportunity to be heard.[171] and quoting PruneYard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 84 (1980). The Court, in PruneYard, distinguished Kaiser Aetna on the basis that, there, the government's attempt to create a public right of access to the improved pond interfered with Kaiser Aetna's "reasonable investment backed expectations." Id. at 84.

---

166 Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 112 (1956).

167 Central Hardware Co. v. Nat'l Labor Relations Bd., 407 U.S. 539, 545 (1972). See also Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419, 434, n. 11 (1982).

168 See also para. B48 (destruction of property in wartime).

169 Lucas v. S. Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1029, n.16 (1992), quoting and citing Bowditch v. Boston, 101 U.S. 16, 18–19 (1880).

170 Miller v. Schoene, 276 U.S. 272, 279–80 (1928). The Court stated: "It will not do to say that the case is merely one of a conflict of two private interests, and that the misfortune of apple growers may not be shifted to cedar owners by ordering the destruction of their property; for it is obvious that there may be, and that here there is, a preponderant public concern in the preservation of one interest over the other. And where the public interest is involved, preferment of that interest over the property interest of the individual, to the extent even of its destruction, is one of the distinguishing characteristics of every exercise of the police power which affects property."

171 See N. Am. Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U.S. 306, 315–19 (1908).

d. Government Liability for Property Damage Caused by Others

[J57] "The Constitution does not require compensation every time violence aimed against government officers damages private property. . . . [W]here government action is causally related to private misconduct which leads to property damage, . . . a determination must be made whether the government involvement in the deprivation of private property is sufficiently direct and substantial to require compensation under the Fifth Amendment."[172] In YMCA, the Court held that the temporary, unplanned occupation by troops of petitioners' buildings, in the course of battle against rioters, did not constitute direct and substantial enough government involvement to warrant compensation under the Fifth Amendment.[173]

e. Forfeiture of Property Used Illegally

[J58] The Court has repeatedly held that an owner's interest in property may be forfeited by reason of the unlawful use to which the property is put, even though the owner did not know that it was to be put to such use. Forfeiture serves not only to punish the owner[174] but also a distinct deterrent purpose: it "prevents illegal uses 'both by preventing further illicit use of the [property] and by imposing an economic penalty, thereby rendering illegal behavior unprofitable.'"[175] "To the extent that such forfeiture provisions are applied to lessors, bailors, or secured creditors who are innocent of any wrongdoing, confiscation may have the desirable effect of inducing them to exercise greater care in transferring possession of their property."[176]

---

[172] Nat'l Bd. of Young Men's Christian Ass'ns v. United States, 395 U.S. 85, 93 (1969).

[173] Id. The Court had no occasion to decide whether compensation may be required where the government makes private property a particular target for destruction by private parties. Id. at 94.

[174] See Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 618 (1993). "There is no constitutional objection to enforcing a penalty by forfeiture of an offending article." See United States v. One Ford Coupe, 272 U.S. 321, 329 (1926).

[175] Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442, 446, 452 (1996), quoting Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 687 (1974).

[176] Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 668, 688 (1974). For example, in Van Oster v. Kansas, 272 U.S. 465, 467–68 (1926), the Court upheld the forfeiture of a purchaser's interest in a car misused by the seller. Van Oster purchased an automobile from a dealer but agreed that the dealer might retain possession for use in its business. The dealer allowed an associate to use the automobile, and the associate used it for the illegal transportation of intoxicating liquor. Kansas brought a forfeiture action pursuant to a state statute, Van Oster defended on the ground that the transportation of the liquor in the car was without her knowledge or authority. The Court rejected Van Oster's claim, noting that "statutory forfeitures of property entrusted by the innocent owner or lienor to another who uses it in violation of the revenue laws . . . is not a violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment."

Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 689 (1974), held that the interest of a yacht rental company in one of its leased yachts could be forfeited because of its use for transportation of controlled substances, even though the company was "in no way . . . involved in the criminal enterprise carried on by [the] lessee," and "had no knowledge that its property was being used in connection with or in violation of [Puerto Rican Law]."

In Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442, 446–53 (1996), petitioner was a joint owner, with her husband, of an automobile in which her husband engaged in sexual activity with a prostitute.

[J59] Calero-Toledo held that the government could seize a yacht subject to civil forfeiture without affording prior notice or hearing. Central to the Court's analysis in Calero-Toledo was the fact that a yacht was the "sort [of property] that could be removed to another jurisdiction, destroyed, or concealed, if advance warning of confiscation were given." "The ease with which an owner could frustrate the Government's interests in the forfeitable property created a 'special need for very prompt action' that justified the postponement of notice and hearing until after the seizure."[177] The same considerations do not apply to the forfeiture of real property, which, by its very nature, can be neither moved nor concealed. Hence, absent exigent circumstances, the Due Process Clause requires the government to afford notice and a meaningful opportunity to be heard before seizing real property subject to civil forfeiture.[178] "[W]hen law enforcement agents seize property pursuant to warrant, due process requires them to take reasonable steps to give notice that the property has been taken so the owner can pursue available remedies for its return."[179]

f. Abandoned Property

[J60] From an early time, the Court has recognized that states have the power to permit unused or abandoned interests in property to revert to another after the passage of time. In Hawkins, the Court upheld a state statute that prevented a landowner from recovering property on which the defendant had resided for more than seven years under a claim of right.[180] Similarly, in Wilson v. Iseminger, the Court sustained a statute that provided for the extinguishment of a reserved interest in ground rent if the owner collected no rent and made no demand for payment for a period of 21 years. The Court also held that the statute could apply to interests created before the enactment of the statute, since the statute contained a reasonable grace period in which owners could protect their rights, noting that "statutes of limitation affecting existing rights are not unconstitutional, if a reasonable time is given for the commencement of an action before the bar takes effect."[181]

A Michigan court ordered the automobile forfeited as a public nuisance, with no off-set for her interest, notwithstanding her lack of knowledge of her husband's activity. The Court held that the Michigan court order did not offend the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, noting, inter alia, that "the government may not be required to compensate an owner for property which it has already lawfully acquired under the exercise of governmental authority other than the power of eminent domain."

177 United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 52 (1993), discussing and quoting Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 678 (1974).

178 United States v. James Daniel Good Real Prop., 510 U.S. 43, 52–53 (1993).

179 City of W. Covina v. Perkins, 525 U.S. 234, 240 (1999).

180 Hawkins v. Barney's Lessee, 5 Pet. 457, 466 (1831). The Court said: "What right has anyone to complain, when a reasonable time has been given him, if he has not been vigilant in asserting his rights?"

181 Wilson v. Iseminger, 185 U.S. 55, 59–63 (1902). "In these early cases, the Court often emphasized that the statutory 'extinguishment' properly could be viewed as the withdrawal of a remedy, rather than the destruction of a right." See Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 528, n.22 (1982), citing Wilson v. Iseminger, 185 U.S. 55, 61 (1902). It subsequently "made clear, however, that, when the practical consequences of extinguishing a right are identical to the consequences of eliminating a remedy, the constitutional analysis is the same." See Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 528 (1982), citing El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 506–07 (1965).

[J61] "[S]tock certificates and undelivered dividends thereon may . . . be abandoned property subject to the disposition of the domiciliary state of the corporation when the whereabouts of the owners are unknown for such lengths of time, and under such circumstances, as permit the declaration of abandonment."[182] In such cases, notice given by publication and identifying the property and the last-known owners is adequate to bind interested persons.[183]

[J62] Unclaimed property at the disposal of the state may also include deposits in banks doing business in the particular state. "The deposits are debtor obligations of the bank, incurred and to be performed in the state where the bank is located, and hence are subject to the state's dominion."[184] Anderson National Bank sustained a Kentucky statute setting up a comprehensive scheme for the administration of abandoned bank deposits. Upon a report by the bank and notice to the depositor (by the sheriff's posting on the courthouse door or bulletin board, for a period of six weeks, a copy of the bank's report of deposits presumed abandoned), and with an opportunity for either to be heard, the state could take into its protective custody bank accounts that, having been inactive for at least ten years if demand accounts or for at least 25 years if non-demand, the statute declared to be presumptively abandoned. The bank was relieved of its liability to the depositor, who received instead a claim against the state, enforceable at any time until the deposit was judicially found to be abandoned and for five years thereafter. The Court held that the statutory rebuttable presumption of abandonment of demand deposits after inactivity of ten years, and of non-demand deposits after inactivity of 25 years, was reasonable, and that in requiring payment of the deposit accounts to the state on the prescribed notice, without recourse to judicial proceedings or any court order or judgment, the statute did not deprive the depositor or the bank of property without due process of law.[185]

[J63] Texaco v. Short involved an Indiana statute pursuant to which a severed mineral interest that had not been used for a period of 20 years automatically lapsed and reverted to the current surface owner of the property, unless the mineral owner, prior to the end of the 20-year period or within a two-year grace period after the effective date of the statute, filed a statement of claim in the local county recorder's office. The "use" of a mineral interest sufficient to preclude its extinction included actual or attempted production of the minerals, payment of rents or royalties, and payment of taxes. In upholding the statute, the Court emphasized that a state has the power "to condition the retention of a property right upon the performance of an act within a limited period of time," and that Indiana had not exercised this power "in an arbitrary manner." "Each of the actions required by the state to avoid an abandonment of a mineral estate further[ed] a legitimate state goal. Certainly the State may encourage own-

---

[182] Standard Oil Co. v. New Jersey, 341 U.S. 428, 442 (1951). Moneys owed by foreign insurance companies, doing business in a state, on life policies issued on the lives of residents of that state and remaining unclaimed for an adequate period, are also subject to the state's disposition. See Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Moore, 333 U.S. 541 (1948).

[183] Standard Oil Co. v. New Jersey, 341 U.S. 428, 432–35 (1951).

[184] Anderson Nat'l Bank v. Luckett, 321 U.S. 233, 241 (1944).

[185] Id. at 240–47. The Court did not decide whether the procedure for determining abandonment in fact conformed to due process, but it noted that, if the notice to depositors were adequate, the period of five years, after the judicial decree of actual abandonment, within which a claimant might demand payment of his deposit, did not infringe constitutional rights. Id. at 241–42.

ers of mineral interests to develop the potential of those interests; similarly, the fiscal interest in collecting property taxes is manifest. The requirement that a mineral owner file a public statement of claim further[ed] both of these goals by facilitating the identification and location of mineral owners, from whom developers [might] acquire operating rights and from whom the county [might] collect taxes." Noting that the state is not required to compensate an owner for the consequences of his own neglect, the Court concluded that Indiana surely had the power "to condition the ownership of property on compliance with conditions that impose such a slight burden on the owner, while providing such clear benefits to the State." Moreover, the two-year grace period included in the statute foreclosed any argument that mineral owners did not have an adequate opportunity to familiarize themselves with the terms of the legislation and to comply with its provisions before their mineral interests were extinguished.[186]

[J64] In Locke, the Court recognized that "[l]egislatures can enact substantive rules of law that treat property as forfeited under conditions that the common law would not consider sufficient to indicate abandonment. . . . As long as proper notice of these rules exists, and the burdens they impose are not so wholly disproportionate to the burdens other individuals face in a highly regulated society that some people are being forced 'alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, must be borne by the public as a whole,' . . . the burden imposed is a reasonable restriction on the property right."[187] That case involved a federal statute establishing a federal recording system designed to rid federal lands of stale mining claims and to provide federal land managers with up-to-date information that would allow them to make informed land management decisions. The statute required that mining claims, located prior to its enactment, be initially recorded with the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) within three years of the enactment, and that the claimant, in the year of initial recording and "prior to December 31" of every year after that, file with state officials and the BLM a notice of intention to hold a claim, an affidavit of assessment work performed on the claim, or a detailed reporting form. The statute also provided that failure to comply with either of these requirements would be deemed conclusively to constitute an abandonment of the claim. The Court found that "Congress ha[d] chosen to redefine the way in which an unpatented mining claim [could] be lost through imposition of a filing requirement that serve[d] valid public objectives, impose[d] minimal burdens on property holders, and [took] effect only after appellees ha[d] had sufficient notice of their need to comply and a reasonable opportunity to do so." Hence, the filing requirement constituted a reasonable restriction on the continued retention of the property right.[188]

5. Just Compensation—Remedial Questions[189]

[J65] "The Fifth Amendment does not proscribe the taking of property; it proscribes taking without just compensation."[190] "Such compensation is for the property, not to the owner, and "must be a full and perfect equivalent [in money] for the property

---

186 Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 528–33 (1982).

187 United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 106, n.15 (1985).

188 Id. at 106–09, n.15.

189 See also para. J9 (inverse condemnation action); paras. J39–J42 (fixing of utility rates).

190 Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 194 (1985).

taken."[191] In giving content to the just compensation requirement, the Court has sought to put the owner of condemned property "in as good a position pecuniarily as if his property had not been taken."[192] "However, this principle of indemnity has not been given its full and literal force. Because of serious practical difficulties in assessing the worth an individual places on particular property at a given time, [the Court has] recognized the need for a relatively objective working rule. . . . The Court therefore has employed the concept of fair market value to determine the condemnee's loss. Under this standard, the owner is entitled to receive 'what a willing buyer would pay in cash to a willing seller' at the time of the taking."[193] Thus, "fair market value does not include the special value of property to the owner arising from its adaptability to his particular use."[194] In short, "the concept of fair market value has been chosen to strike a fair 'balance between the public's need and the claimant's loss' upon condemnation of property for a public purpose."[195] But while the indemnity principle must yield to some extent before the need for a practical general rule, the Court has refused to designate [191] Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 326 (1893).

---

[192] Olson v. United States, 292 U.S. 246, 255 (1934). See also Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. United States, 261 U.S. 299, 304 (1923); United States v. Reynolds, 397 U.S. 14, 16 (1970). "The constitutional requirement of just compensation derives as much content from the basic equitable principles of fairness, . . . as it does from technical concepts of property law." See United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488, 490 (1973).

"[T]he legislature [can]not, by setting either a fixed amount to be paid for property condemned or a principle for arriving at that amount, settle the constitutional right to just compensation." See Reg'l R.R. Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102 (1974), citing Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 327 (1893).

[193] United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506, 510–11 (1979) (Lutheran Synod) (emphasis added), quoting United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 374 (1943); Almota Farmers Elevator & Warehouse Co. v. United States, 409 U.S. 470, 474 (1973). The Court has suggested that "consideration other than cash—for example, special benefits to a property owner's remaining properties—may be counted in the determination of just compensation." See Reg'l R.R. Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 144 (1974) (emphasis added), citing Bauman v. Ross, 167 U.S. 548, 584 (1897).

[194] United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506, 511 (1979), citing United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 374–75 (1943). By contrast, "[t]he special value of land due to its adaptability for use in a particular business is an element which the owner of land is entitled, under the Fifth Amendment, to have considered in determining the amount to be paid as the just compensation upon a taking by eminent domain." See Mitchell v. United States, 267 U.S. 341, 344–45 (1925).

As the Court said in Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 5 (1949), "[t]he value of property springs from subjective needs and attitudes; its value to the owner may therefore differ widely from its value to the taker. Most things, however, have a general demand which gives them a value transferable from one owner to another. As opposed to such personal and variant standards as value to the particular owner whose property has been taken, this transferable value has an external validity which makes it a fair measure of public obligation to compensate the loss incurred by an owner as a result of the taking of his property for public use. In view, however, of the liability of all property to condemnation for the common good, loss to the owner of nontransferable values deriving from his unique need for property or idiosyncratic attachment to it, like loss due to an exercise of the police power, is properly treated as part of the burden of common citizenship." (Emphasis added.)

[195] United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506, 512 (1979), quoting United States v. Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Navigation Co., 338 U.S. 396, 402 (1949).

market value as the sole measure of just compensation. For there are situations where this standard is inappropriate: "when market value has been too difficult to find, or when its application would result in manifest injustice to owner or public," other standards have been fashioned and applied.[196]

[J66] "The instances in which market value is too difficult to ascertain generally involve property of a type so infrequently traded that [the courts] cannot predict whether the prices previously paid, assuming there have been prior sales, would be repeated in a sale of the condemned property. . . . This might be the case, for example, with respect to public facilities such as roads or sewers."[197] "[W]hen the property is of a kind seldom exchanged, it has no 'market price,' and then recourse must be had to other means of ascertaining value, including even value to the owner as indicative of value to other potential owners enjoying the same rights."[198] "But that does not put out of hand the bearing which the scattered sales may have on what an ordinary purchaser would have paid for the claimant's property. [The courts] simply must be wary that they give these sparse sales less weight than they accord 'market' price, and take into consideration those special circumstances in other sales which would not have affected their hypothetical buyer."[199]

[J67] "The concept of just compensation is comprehensive, and includes all elements, and no specific command to include interest is necessary when interest or its equivalent is a part of such compensation. The owner is not limited to the value of the property at the time of the taking; he is entitled to such addition as will produce the full equivalent of that value paid contemporaneously with the taking."[200] "This additional element of compensation has been measured in terms of reasonable interest. Thus, 'just compensation' in the constitutional sense, has been held, absent a settlement between the parties, to be fair market value at the time of taking plus 'interest' from that date to the date of payment."[201] This formula does not fit contractual arrangements for compensation.[202]

---

196 United States v. Commodities Trading Corp., 339 U.S. 121, 123 (1950). See also Kirby Forest Indus., Inc. v. United States, 467 U.S. 1, 10, n.14 (1984). For example, in case of damage to land due to erosion resulting from flooding, the Court has held that, if the erosion was in fact preventable by prudent measures, the cost of that prevention is a proper basis for determining the damage. See United States v. Dickinson, 331 U.S. 745, 751 (1947) (per curiam).

197 United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506, 513 (1979) (Lutheran Synod).

198 Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 6 (1949). These considerations have special relevance where "property" is "taken" not in fee but for an indeterminate period.

199 United States v. Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Navigation Co., 338 U.S. 396, 402 (1949). In this context, past earnings "are significant only when they tend to reflect future returns." Id. at 403.

Since the market value standard was developed in the context of a market largely free from government controls, prices rigidly fixed by law raise questions concerning whether a "market value" so fixed can be a measure of "just compensation." The Court has held that the necessities of a wartime economy require that ceiling prices be accepted as the measure of "just compensation" so far as that can be done consistently with the objectives of the Fifth Amendment. See United States v. Commodities Trading Corp., 339 U.S. 121, 123–25 (1950); United States v. John J. Felin & Co., 334 U.S. 624, 629–42 (1948). In this context, the Fifth Amendment does not require the government to compensate an owner of requisitioned goods for potential profits lost because of war and the consequent price controls. See Commodities Trading, supra, at 130.

200 Jacobs v. United States, 290 U.S. 13, 16–17 (1933).

201 Albrecht v. United States, 329 U.S. 599, 602 (1949).

202 Id. at 604.

[J68] Incidental damages or indirect costs to the property owner caused by the taking of his land are generally not part of the just compensation to which he is constitutionally entitled. Thus, damages resulting from a loss or destruction of business incidental to a taking of land are not recoverable as part of the compensation for the land taken.[203] Additionally, attorneys' fees and expenses[204] or expenses in securing appraisals of the land involved in the condemnation action[205] are not embraced within just compensation.

[J69] In view of the principle that "just compensation must be measured by an objective standard that disregards subjective values which are only of significance to an individual owner," and considering that "the Fifth Amendment does not require any award for consequential damages arising from a condemnation," the Court has held that fair market value constitutes "just compensation" even for those private citizens "who must replace their condemned property with more expensive substitutes."[206] Further, a city's legal obligation to maintain public services that are interrupted by a federal condemnation does not justify a distinction between public and private condemnees for the purpose of measuring just compensation. Hence, the Fifth Amendment does not require that the United States pay a public condemnee compensation measured by the cost of acquiring a substitute facility that the condemnee has a duty to acquire, when the market value of the condemned property is ascertainable and when there is no showing of manifest injustice.[207]

[J70] "When there is an entire taking of a condemnee's property, whether that property represents the interest in a leasehold or a fee, the expenses of removal or of relocation are not to be included in valuing what is taken."[208] This is an application of the general rule against allowance for consequential losses in condemnation proceedings. However, the foregoing rule is inapplicable where what is to be valued is "a right of temporary occupancy of a building equipped for the condemnee's business, filled with his commodities, and presumably to be reoccupied and used, as before, to the end of the lease term on the termination of the Government's use."[209] General Motors "held that, when such occupancy is for a period less than an outstanding term, removal costs may be considered in the award of 'just compensation' to the temporarily ejected tenant—not as an independent item of damage, but as bearing on the rental value such premises would have on a voluntary sublease by a long-term tenant to a temporary

---

[203] See Mitchell v. United States, 267 U.S. 341, 344 (1925).

[204] See Dohany v. Rogers, 281 U.S. 362, 368 (1930).

[205] See United States v. Bodcaw Co., 440 U.S. 202, 203–04 (1979) (per curiam). There, the Court emphasized that the reimbursement of such costs is a matter of legislative grace, not constitutional entitlement.

[206] United States v. 50 Acres of Land, 469 U.S. 24, 33, 35 (1984), discussing United States v. 564.54 Acres of Land, 441 U.S. 506, 513–17 (1979) (Lutheran Synod).

[207] See United States v. 50 Acres of Land, 469 U.S. 24, 31–36 (1984). The risk that a private condemnee might receive a "windfall," if its compensation were measured by the cost of a substitute facility that was never acquired or was later sold or converted to another use, is not avoided by a city's obligation to replace the facility. "If the replacement facility is more costly than the condemned facility, it presumably is more valuable, and any increase in the quality of the facility may be as readily characterized as a 'windfall' as the award of cash proceeds for a substitute facility that is never built." Id. at 34–35.

[208] United States v. Westinghouse Elec. & Mfg. Co., 339 U.S. 261, 264 (1950).

[209] United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 380 (1945).

occupier."[210] Petty Motor made clear that the taking of the whole of a tenant's lease does not fall within the General Motors doctrine.[211]

[J71] "The valuation of property which has been taken must be calculated as of the time of the taking. . . . [D]epreciation in value of the property by reason of preliminary government activity [such as legislation for or the beginning of the project] is not chargeable to the government."[212] Moreover, "the Government, as a condemnor, may not be required to compensate a condemnee for elements of value that the Government itself has created." Hence, "the increment of fair market value represented by knowledge of the Government's plan to construct the project for which the land is taken is not included within the constitutional definition of 'just compensation.'"[213] Nevertheless, "just compensation" does include the increment of value resulting from the completed project to neighboring lands, originally outside the project limits, but later brought within them.[214] And "the Government may not demand that a jury be arbitrarily precluded from considering as an element of value the proximity of a parcel to a post office building simply because the Government, at one time, built the post office."[215]

[J72] The Court "has held that, generally, the highest and best use of a parcel may be found to be a use in conjunction with other parcels, and that any increment of value resulting from such combination may be taken into consideration in valuing the parcel taken."[216] Similarly, "[i]f only a portion of a single tract is taken, the owner's compensation for that taking includes any element of value arising out of the relation of the part taken to the entire tract. . . . On the other hand, if the taking has in fact benefited the remainder, the benefit may be set off against the value of the land taken."[217]

[J73] "The 'just compensation' required by the Fifth Amendment is measured by the property owner's loss rather than the government's gain."[218] For example, a state

---

[210] See United States v. Westinghouse Elec. & Mfg. Co., 339 U.S. 261, 263–64 (1950), discussing United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 383 (1945).

[211] See United States v. Petty Motor Co., 327 U.S. 372, 379–80 (1946). Where the government initially takes an occupancy for less than the outstanding term of a lease with an option for extension, so as to exhaust the entire lease, an award based on removal costs should be delayed until it is known whether the government's occupancy has exhausted the tenant's leasehold. See United States v. Westinghouse Elec. & Mfg. Co., 339 U.S. 261, 265–68 (1950).

[212] First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 320 (1987).

[213] United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488, 491–92 (1973). See also United States v. Cors, 337 U.S. 325, 334 (1949), where the Court held that the just compensation required to be paid to the owner of a tug requisitioned by the government in October 1942, during the Second World War, could not include the appreciation in market value for tugs created by the government's own increased wartime need for such vessels. See also New York v. Sage, 239 U.S. 57, 61 (1915) (city need not pay for value added by unifying parcels where unification impracticable absent eminent domain).

[214] See United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 374–76 (1943). The crucial question is whether the lands at issue "were probably within the scope of the project from the time the Government was committed to it." Id. at 377 (emphasis added).

[215] United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488, 492–93 (1973).

[216] Olson v. United States, 292 U.S. 246, 256 (1934). Nevertheless, this rule does not apply where the parcels to be aggregated with the land taken are themselves owned by the condemnor and used by the condemnee only under revocable permit from the condemnor. See United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488, 490–92 (1973).

[217] United States v. Miller, 317 U.S. 369, 376 (1943).

[218] Brown v. Legal Found. of Washington, 538 U.S. 216, 235–36 (2003).

law requiring a lawyer's client funds (held by an attorney in connection with his practice of law) that could not otherwise generate net earnings for the client to be deposited in an "interest on lawyers' trust account" and that the interest on those funds be transferred to a different owner for a legitimate public use, such as the payment of legal services for the needy, does not violate the Just Compensation Clause, since the owner's pecuniary loss is zero whenever the state law is obeyed.[219]

[J74] "[O]nce a court finds that a police power regulation has effected a 'taking,' the government entity must pay just compensation for the period commencing on the date the regulation first effected the 'taking,' and ending on the date the government entity chooses to rescind or otherwise amend the regulation."[220] Hence, "where the government's activities have already worked a taking of all use of property, no subsequent action by the government can relieve it of the duty to provide compensation for the period during which the taking was effective."[221]

[J75] The holder of an unexpired leasehold interest in land is entitled to just compensation for the value of that interest when it is taken upon condemnation by the government.[222] In this case, "[t]he measure of damages is the value of the use and occupancy of the leasehold for the remainder of the tenant's term, plus the value of the right to renew, . . . less the agreed rent which the tenant would pay for such use and occupancy."[223] The fair rental value of the land may increase during the term of the lease. "If this takes place, the increase in fair rental value operates to create a compensable value in the leasehold interest."[224] In case of improvements on leased land, the concept of "just compensation" is measured by what a willing buyer would have paid for "the improvements in place over their useful life—taking into account the possibility that the lease might be renewed as well as the possibility that it might not."[225]

[J76] Ordinarily, fair compensation for a temporary possession of a business enterprise is "the rental that probably could have been obtained," not the difference between the market value of the fee on the date of the taking and its market value on the date of its return.[226] In such a case, the award for damage to the plant and machinery beyond

---

[219] Id. at 235–41.

[220] San Diego Gas & Elec. Co. v. San Diego, 450 U.S. 621, 658 (1981) (Brennan, J., dissenting). This rule was endorsed by the Court in First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 315, 318, 321 (1987). See Tahoe-Sierra Pres. Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Reg'l Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302, 328 (2002).

[221] First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304, 321 (1987).

[222] See Alamo Land & Cattle Co. v. Arizona, 424 U.S. 295, 303 (1976). Nevertheless, there is no compensable value in the leasehold interest, if the lease of land is revocable at will by the state which owns the land. Cf. id. at 304; United States v. Fuller, 409 U.S. 488, 490–92 (1973).

[223] United States v. Petty Motor Co., 327 U.S. 372, 380–381 (1946).

[224] Alamo Land & Cattle Co. v. Arizona, 424 U.S. 295, 305 (1976).

[225] Almota Farmers Elevator & Warehouse Co. v. United States, 409 U.S. 470, 474 (1973). As the Court noted, if there had been no condemnation, the lessee "would have continued to use the improvements during a renewed lease term, or if he sold the improvements to the fee owner or to a new lessee at the end of the lease term, [he] would have been compensated for the buyer's ability to use the improvements in place over their useful life."

[226] Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 7 (1949). See also United States v. Pewee Coal Co., 341 U.S. 114, 117 (1951) (plurality opinion); id. at 122 (dissenting opinion). The latter case concerned a losing operation in a temporary taking of a coal mine. The members of the Court differed over which losses suffered during the period of government control ordinary wear and tear may "be justified on the theory that such indemnity would be payable by an ordinary lessee, though not fixed in advance as part of his rent because not then capable of determination."[227]

[J77] If there is a demonstrable loss of "going concern" value, the government must pay compensation for "whatever transferable value the temporary use" of trade routes may have had. In this context, the courts should consider "any evidence which would have been likely to convince a potential purchaser as to the presence and amount" of the enterprise's going concern value, including the record of past earnings and expenditures for soliciting business.[228] were compensable. The plurality held that the Fifth Amendment requires the United States to bear operating losses incurred during the period the government operates private property in the name of the public without the owner's consent, noting that it was immaterial that governmental operation had resulted in a smaller loss than Pewee would have sustained if there had been no seizure of the mines. Id. at 117–18. Justice Reed said in his concurring opinion that the "Government's supervision of a losing business for a temporary emergency ought not to place upon the Government the burden of the losses incurred during that supervision unless the losses were incurred by governmental acts, e.g., if the business would not have been conducted at all but for the Government, or if extra losses over what would have been otherwise sustained were occasioned by Government operations. Where the owner's losses are what they would have been without the taking, the owner has suffered no loss or damage for which compensation is due." Id. at 121. The four dissenters found that there was no showing that anything of compensable value had been taken by the government from the company, or that the government had subjected the company to any pecuniary loss. Id. at 122.

---

[227] Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 7 (1949). See also United States v. Gen. Motors Corporation, 323 U.S. 373, 383 (1945) (the businessman is entitled to compensation for the destruction, damage, or depreciation in value of fixtures and permanent equipment, not as part of, but in addition to, the value of the occupancy).

[228] Kimball Laundry Co. v. United States, 338 U.S. 1, 16–20 (1949). In that case, the United States, on November 21, 1942, petitioned the district court to condemn the temporary use of a laundry, for a term ending June 30, 1943, subject to renewal annually. The government took possession of the property on November 22, 1942, and the term was renewed annually until June 30, 1946. Meanwhile the laundry suspended service to its regular customers. The district court awarded no compensation for diminution in the value of the business due to the destruction of "trade routes," a term that served as a general designation both for the lists of customers built up by solicitation over the years and for the continued hold of the Laundry upon their patronage. The Court reversed, saying, inter alia:

> The market value of land as a business site tends to be as high as the reasonably probable earnings of a business there situated would justify, and the value of specially adapted plant and machinery exceeds its value as scrap only on the assumption that it is income-producing. And income, in the case of a service industry, presupposes patronage. Since petitioner has been fully compensated for the value of its physical property, and separate value that its trade routes may have must therefore result from the contribution to the earning capacity of the business of greater skill in management and more effective solicitation of patronage than are commonly given to such a combination of land, plant, and equipment. The product of such contributions is an intangible which may be compendiously designated as "going concern value," but this is a portmanteau phrase that needs unpacking.
>
> Though compounded of many factors in addition to relations with customers, that element of going concern value which is contributed by superior management may be transferable to the extent that it has a momentum likely to be felt even after a new [J78] The Fifth Amendment does not require that "just compensation be paid in advance of, or contemporaneously with, the taking; all that is required is that a 'reasonable, certain and adequate provision for obtaining compensation' exist at the time of owner and new management have succeeded to the business property. But because this momentum can be maintained only by the application of continued energy and skill, it would gradually spend itself if the effort and skill of the new management were not, in its turn, expended. Only that exercise of managerial efficiency, however, which has contributed to the future profitability of the business will have a transferable momentum that may give it value to a potential purchaser—that which has had only the effect of increasing current income of reducing expenses of operation has spent itself from year to year. The value contributed by the expenditure of money in soliciting patronage, although likewise of limited duration, differs from managerial efficiency in that it derives not merely from the contribution of personal qualities, but from original investment or the plowing back of income. As such, it may sometimes be more readily recognized as an asset of the business. It is clear, at any rate, that the value of both these elements, in combination, must be regarded as identical with the value alleged to inhere in the trade routes.

---

Assuming, then, that petitioner's business may have going concern value as defined above, the question arises whether the intangible character of such value alone precludes compensation for it. The answer is not far to seek. The value of all property . . . is dependent upon and inseparable from individual needs and attitudes, and these, obviously, are intangible. As fixed by the market, value is no more than a summary expression of forecasts that the needs and attitudes which made up demand in the past will have their counterparts in the future. . . . The only distinction to be made, therefore, between the attitudes which generate going concern value and those of which tangible property is compounded is as to the tenacity of the past's hold upon the future: in the case of the latter, a forecast of future demand can usually be made with greater certainty, for it is more probable on the whole that people will continue to want particular goods or services than that they will continue to look to a particular supplier of them. It is more likely, in other words, that people will persist in wanting to have their laundry done than that they will keep on sending it to a particular laundry. But, as the probability of continued patronage gains strength, this distinction become obliterated and the intangible acquires a value to a potential purchaser no different from the value of the business' physical property. Since the Fifth Amendment requires compensation for the latter, the former, if shown to be present and to have been "taken," should also be compensable. . . . 'In determining the value of a business as between buyer and seller, the goodwill and earning power due to effective organization are often more important elements than tangible property. Where the public acquires the business, compensation must be made for these, at least under some circumstances.' . . .

What, then, are the circumstances under which the Fifth Amendment requires compensation for such an intangible? Not, indeed, those of the usual taking of fee title to business property, but the denial of compensation in such circumstances rests on a very concrete justification: the going concern value has not been taken. Such are all the cases, most of them decided by State courts under constitutions with provisions comparable to the Fifth Amendment, in which only the physical property has been condemned, leaving the owner free to move his business to a new location. . . . In such a situation, there is no more reason for a taker to pay for the business' going concern value than there would be for a purchaser to pay for it who had not secured from his vendor a covenant to refrain from entering into competition with him. It is true that there may be loss to the owner because of the difficulty of finding other premises suit-the taking."[229] "If the government has provided an adequate process for obtaining compensation, and if resort to that process 'yield[s] just compensation,' then the property owner 'has no claim against the Government' for a taking."[230] Thus, the Court has held that taking claims against the federal government are premature until the property owner has availed itself of the process provided by the Tucker Act.[231] If one has valid property rights, which have been interfered with or partially taken, his remedy is not the stoppage of the government project but a suit against the United States under the Tucker Act for damages.[232] Similarly, "if a State provides an adequate procedure for seeking just com-ably situated for the transfer of his goodwill, and that such loss, like the cost of moving, is denied compensation as consequential. See Joslin Mfg. Co. v. Providence, 262 U.S. 668, 676. But such value as the goodwill retains the owner keeps, and the remainder dissipated by removal would not contribute to the value paid for by a transferee of the vacated premises, except perhaps to the extent that the prospect of its loss would induce the owner to hold out for a higher price for his land and building. . . . When a condemnor has taken fee title to business property, there is reason for saying that the compensation due should not vary with the owner's good fortune or lack of it in finding premises suitable for the transference of going concern value. In the usual case, most of it can be transferred; in the remainder, the amount of loss is so speculative that proof of it may justifiably be excluded. By an extension of that reasoning, the same result has been reached even upon the assumption that no other premises whatever were available. . . . The situation is otherwise, however, when the Government has condemned business property with the intention of carrying on the business, as where public utility property has been taken over for continued operation by a governmental authority. If, in such a case, the taker acquires going concern value, it must pay for it. Omaha v. Omaha Water Co., 218 U.S. 180. See Denver v. Denver Union Water Co., 246 U.S. 178, 191. . . . Since a utility cannot ordinarily be operated profitably except as a monopoly, investment by the former owner of the utility in duplicating the condemned facilities could have no prospect of a profitable return. The taker has thus, in effect, assured itself of freedom from the former owner's competition. The owner retains nothing of the going concern value that it formerly possessed; so far as control of that value is concerned, the taker fully occupies the owner's shoes.

---

But the public utility cases plainly cannot be explained by the fact that the taker received the benefit of the utility's going concern value. If benefit to the taker were made the measure of compensation, it would be difficult to justify higher compensation for farm land taken as a firing range than for swamp or sandy waste equally suited to the purpose. . . . It would be equally difficult to deny compensation for value to the taker in excess of value to the owner. . . . The rationale of the public utility cases, as opposed to those in which circumstances have brought about a diminution of going concern value although the owner remained free to transfer it, must therefore be that an exercise of the power of eminent domain which has the inevitable effect of depriving the owner of the going concern value of his business is a compensable "taking" of property. . . . If such a deprivation has occurred, the going concern value of the business is at the Government's disposal, whether or not it chooses to avail itself of it.

Id. at 8–13.

[229] Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 194 (1985), quoting Reg'l R.R. Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 124–25 (1974).

[230] Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 194–95 (1985), quoting Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1013, 1018 n.21 (1984).

[231] Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 195 (1985), citing Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986, 1016–20 (1984).

[232] Dugan v. Rank, 372 U.S. 609, 623–26 (1963).

pensation, the property owner cannot claim a violation of the Just Compensation Clause until it has used the procedure and been denied just compensation."[233]

[J79] Finally, it must be noted that the Fifth Amendment does not prohibit landowners and the government from agreeing between themselves as to what is just compensation for property taken.[234] In addition, Congress has the power to authorize compensation greater than the constitutional minimum.[235]

6. Standing—Recipient of the Compensation

[J80] In a direct condemnation action, or when a state has physically invaded the property without filing suit, the fact and extent of the taking are known. "In such an instance, it is a general rule of the law of eminent domain that any award goes to the owner at the time of the taking, and that the right to compensation is not passed to a subsequent purchaser."[236] Relatedly, the Court has rejected the suggestion that the total compensation should be divided between the first and second owners of the property (the former taking that portion of the award attributable to the government's use of the property until the passage of title and the latter receiving the balance), noting that "[t]o require the Government to deal with more than one party, particularly when division of the condemnation award would entail a complex apportionment, might severely impede the orderly progress of condemnation proceedings."[237]

[J81] By contrast, the Court has rejected a sweeping rule that a purchaser or a successive title holder is deemed to have notice of an earlier-enacted restriction and is barred from claiming that it effects a regulatory taking. Were the Court to accept that rule, "the post-enactment transfer of title would absolve the State of its obligation to defend any action restricting land use, no matter how extreme or unreasonable. A State would be allowed, in effect, to put an expiration date on the Takings Clause. . . . Future generations, too, have a right to challenge unreasonable limitations on the use and value of land. . . . [Moreover,] [s]hould an owner attempt to challenge a new regulation, but not survive the process of ripening his or her claim, under [such a] rule, the right to compensation may not by asserted by an heir or successor, and so may not be asserted at all. [Consequently the] rule would work a critical alteration to the nature of property, as the newly regulated landowner would be stripped of the ability to transfer the interest which was possessed prior to the regulation. . . . It would therefore be illogical and unfair to bar a regulatory takings claim because of the post-enactment transfer of ownership where the steps necessary to make the claim ripe were not taken, or could not have been taken, by a previous owner."[238]

---

[233] Williamson County Reg'l Planning Comm'n v. Hamilton Bank of Johnson City, 473 U.S. 172, 195 (1985).

[234] See Albrecht v. United States, 329 U.S. 599, 603 (1947).

[235] See United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 382 (1945).

[236] Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 628 (2001), citing Danforth v. United States, 308 U.S. 271, 284 (1939).

[237] United States v. Dow, 357 U.S. 17, 26 (1958).

[238] Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 627–28 (2001). Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987), presented the question whether it was consistent with the Takings Clause for a state regulatory agency to require oceanfront landowners to provide lateral beach access to the public as the condition for a development permit. The principal dissenting opinion observed it was a policy of the California Coastal Commission to require the [J82] The plaintiff generally must assert his own legal rights and interests. Nevertheless, since it has long been recognized that the surviving claims of a decedent must be pursued by a third party, one may assert that his decedents' right to pass the property at death has been taken.[239]

B. OTHER LIMITS ON ECONOMIC REGULATIONS[240]

1. In General—Substantive Economic Due Process

[J83] Due Process does place a limit, albeit a broad one, on legislative power to enact social and economic laws. The test traditionally applied in this area is whether the law has a rational relation to a valid state objective.[241] Economic and social legislation "carries with it a presumption of rationality that can only be overcome by a clear showing of arbitrariness and irrationality."[242]

[J84] However, there was a time when the Due Process Clause was used by the Court to invalidate laws that were unwise or incompatible with some particular economic or social philosophy. Lochner, and the era to which that case gave its name, is now famous for striking down as arbitrary various sorts of economic regulations that post-New Deal courts have uniformly thought constitutionally sound. In Lochner, the Court held that a law providing that no laborer shall be required or permitted to work in bakeries more condition, and that the Nollans, who purchased their home after the policy went into effect, were "on notice that new developments would be approved only if provisions were made for lateral beach access." Id. at 860 (Brennan, J., dissenting). A majority of the Court rejected the proposition. "So long as the Commission could not have deprived the prior owners of the easement without compensating them," the Court reasoned, "the prior owners must be understood to have transferred their full property rights in conveying the lot." Id. at 834, n.2.

---

239 See Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704, 711–12 (1987).

240 See also paras. I 161 et seq. (commercial speech); paras. K173 et seq. (equal protection).

241 See, e.g., Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 491 (1955).

242 Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 331–32 (1981); Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Sch., 487 U.S. 450, 462 (1988). See also Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15 (1976) ("legislative Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality . . . and the burden is on one complaining of a due process violation to establish that the legislature has acted in an arbitrary and irrational way").

"[U]nder the deferential standard of review applied in substantive due process challenges to economic legislation, there is no need for mathematical precision in the fit between justification and means." See Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 639 (1993).

Under the same standard of review, the ultimate economic efficacy of the challenged statute is not examined by the Court. See, e.g., Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117, 124–25 (1978). Due Process is satisfied if the legislature "rationally could have believed that the [statute] would promote its objective." See Hawaii Hous. Auth. v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229, 242–43 (1984), quoting W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 451 U.S. 648, 671–72 (1981).

A non-contractual claim to receive funds from the public treasury enjoys no constitutionally protected status. See Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749, 767, 772 (1975).

"A welfare recipient is not deprived of due process when the legislature adjusts benefit levels. [In such a case,] the legislative determination provides all the process that is due." See Atkins v. Parker, 472 U.S. 115, 129–30 (1985), quoting Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 432–33 (1982). See also United States R.R. Ret. Bd. v. Fritz, 449 U.S. 166, 174 (1980) (welfare benefits "are not contractual, and may be altered or even eliminated at any time").

than sixty hours in a week or ten hours in a day was not, as to men, a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state but an unreasonable, unnecessary, and arbitrary interference with the right and liberty of the individual to contract in relation to his labor.[243] In Adair, an act of Congress prohibiting inter-state carriers from requiring one seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into an agreement not to become or remain a member of a labor organization was declared in conflict with the Fifth Amendment.[244] Similarly, in Coppage, a state statute, which declared it unlawful to require one to agree not to be a member of a labor association as a condition of securing employment, was held invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment.[245] Adkins held it to be an infringement of constitutionally protected liberty of contract to require the employers of adult women to satisfy minimum wage standards.[246] Due process was also used to deny a state the right to fix the price of gasoline[247] and even the right to prevent bakers from palming off smaller for larger loaves of bread.[248] While the cases in the Lochner line routinely invoked a correct standard of constitutional arbitrariness review, they harbored the spirit of laissez faire economics in their absolutist implementation of the standard they espoused.

[J85] In the early 1930s "the Depression had come and, with it, the lesson . . . that the interpretation of contractual freedom protected in [Lochner and] Adkins rested on fundamentally false factual assumptions about the capacity of a relatively unregulated market to satisfy minimal levels of human welfare."[249] The Court, beginning at least as early as 1934, when the Nebbia case was decided, has steadily rejected the due process philosophy enunciated in the Lochner line of cases. It is now settled that "[l]egislative bodies have broad scope to experiment with economic problems," and that states "have power to legislate against what are found to be injurious practices in their internal commercial and business affairs, so long as their laws do not run afoul of some specific federal constitutional prohibition, or of some valid federal law."[250] "The due process clause is no longer to be so broadly construed that the Congress and state legislatures are put in a straitjacket when they attempt to suppress business and industrial conditions which they regard as offensive to the public welfare."[251] Hence, "certain kinds of business may be prohibited;[252] the right to conduct a business, or to pursue a calling, may be conditioned; [and] statutes prescribing the terms upon which those conducting certain businesses may contract, or imposing terms if they do enter into agreements, are within the state's competency."[253] Similarly, states are empowered to regulate business activities, in 243 ochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 62 (1905).

---

244 Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161 (1908).

245 Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915).

246 Adkins v. Children's Hosp. of D.C., 261 U.S. 525, 559 (1923).

247 Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 235 (1929).

248 Jay Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504 (1924).

249 Planned Parenthood of Se. Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 861–62 (1992)

250 Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 730 (1963).

251 New Motor Vehicle Bd. of California v. Orrin W. Fox Co., 439 U.S. 96, 107 (1978), quoting Lincoln Union v. Nw. Co., 335 U.S. 525, 536–37 (1949).

252 For instance, a state may prohibit casino gambling altogether. See Posadas de Puerto Rico Assocs. v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328, 346 (1986).

253 New Motor Vehicle Bd. of California v. Orrin W. Fox Co., 439 U.S. 96, 107 (1978), quoting Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 528 (1934).

order to prevent "unfair or oppressive trade practices."[254] Moreover, states may, through general ordinances, restrict the commercial use of property,[255] and the geographical location of commercial enterprises.[256]

[J86] Nebbia affirmed the power of a state to fix a minimum price for milk in order to save producers, and with them the consuming public, from price-cutting so destructive as to endanger the supply. In so doing, the Court declared that if economic regulations "have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied" and that "with the wisdom of the policy adopted, with the adequacy or practicability of the law enacted to forward it, the courts are both incompetent and unauthorized to deal."[257] West Coast Hotel signaled the demise of Lochner, by overruling Adkins, and approving a minimum wage law on the principle that "regulation which is reasonable in relation to its subject and is adopted in the interests of the community is due process."[258] In Olsen, the Court upheld a Nebraska statute, which limited the amount of the fee that could be charged by private employment agencies, noting that it was not concerned "with the wisdom, need, or appropriateness of the legislation."[259] Carolene Products sustained a federal law forbidding shipment in inter-state commerce of milk "to which has been added, or which has been blended or compounded with, any fat or oil other than milk fat, so that the resulting product is in imitation or semblance of milk," on the basis of Congress' findings that filled milk was indistinguishable in the eyes of the average purchaser from the condensed or evaporated natural product, in spite of proper labeling.[260] Lincoln Union held that a state could legislate that no person should be denied the opportunity to obtain or retain employment, because he was or was not a member of a labor union.[261] And Exxon held that a state could enact a law prohibiting producers and refiners from operating their own stations, in response to evidence that producers and refiners were favoring company-operated stations in the allocation of gasoline, and that this would eventually decrease the competitiveness of the retail market.[262]

2. Restrictions on Professional Freedom

[J87] The liberty guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments encompasses "the right of the individual to engage in any of the common occupations of life."[263] A

---

254 New Motor Vehicle Bd. of California, 439 U.S. 96, 107 (1978). See also Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 495 (1949) ("States have constitutional power to prohibit competing dealers and their aiders and abettors from combining to restrain freedom of trade. . . . Agreements and combinations not to sell to or buy goods from particular persons or to dictate the terms under which transportation will be supplied are well recognized trade restraint practices which both state and national legislation can and do prohibit.").

A businessman may be prohibited from selling at retail any items of merchandise at prices less than statutory cost, even if his competitors sell below cost, in violation of state law. See Safeway Stores, Inc. v. Oklahoma Retail Grocers Ass'n, Inc., 360 U.S. 334 (1959).

255 See Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926).

256 See Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 491 (1955).

257 Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 537 (1934).

258 W. Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 391 (1937).

259 Olsen v. Nebraska ex rel. W. Reference & Bond Ass'n, 313 U.S. 236, 246 (1941).

260 Carolene Prods. Co. v. United States, 323 U.S. 18, 31 (1944).

261 Lincoln Union v. Nw. Co., 335 U.S. 525, 531–37 (1949).

262 Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117, 124 (1978).

263 Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923).

state cannot exclude a person from any occupation "by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State to effect."[264] Meyer held that the Fourteenth Amendment liberty included a teacher's right to teach and the rights of parents to direct their children's education without unreasonable interference by the states, with the result that Nebraska's prohibition on the teaching of foreign languages in the lower grades was arbitrary and without reasonable relation to any end within the competency of the state.[265]

[J88] As a matter of principle, the government may restrict entry into professions and vocations through licensing schemes. For example, it is within the power of the state to require licenses and reasonable license fees or non-excessive bonds for employment agencies,[266] private detectives,[267] or resellers of theater tickets.[268] Moreover, a state may require "high standards of qualification" before it admits an applicant to a profession, but "any qualification must have a rational connection with the applicant's fitness or capacity to practice" the profession.[269]

[J89] However, judicial deference to legislative judgment is appropriate with respect to regulations on entry into a profession. Emphasizing that "for protection against abuses by legislatures, the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts," Lee Optical decided that an Oklahoma statute making it unlawful for any person not a licensed optometrist or ophthalmologist to fit lenses to a face or to duplicate or replace into frames lenses or other optical appliances, except upon written prescriptive authority of an Oklahoma licensed ophthalmologist or optometrist, was not invalid under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[270] In Ferguson v. Skrupa, the Court sustained the constitutionality of a state law prohibiting persons, other than lawyers, from engaging in the business of debt adjusting and debt pooling. The Court concluded that "the Kansas legislature was free to decide for itself that legislation was needed to deal with the business of debt adjusting. Unquestionably, there [we]re arguments showing that the business of debt adjusting had social utility, but such arguments [we]re properly addressed to the legislature." The Due Process Clause did not empower the judiciary to sit as "a superlegislature to weigh the wisdom of the law."[271] Similarly, Snyder's Drug Stores upheld a state statute requiring that an applicant for such a pharmacy operating permit be "a registered pharmacist in good standing" or "a corporation or association, the majority stock in which is owned by registered pharmacists in good standing, actively and regu-

---

[264] Id. at 400.

[265] Id. at 400–03.

[266] Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U.S. 340 (1916).

[267] Lehon v. Atlanta, 242 U.S. 53 (1916).

[268] Weller v. New York, 268 U.S. 319 (1925).

[269] See Schware v. Bd. of Bar Exam'rs of New Mexico, 353 U.S. 232, 239 (1957). There the Court held that a state can require good moral character and proficiency in its law, before it admits an applicant to the Bar.

[270] Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, Inc. 348 U.S. 483, 484–88 (1955).

[271] Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 731 (1963). The Court also rejected the contention that the statute's exception of lawyers was a denial of equal protection of the laws to non-lawyers, reasoning that "[t]he business of debt adjusting gives rise to a relationship of trust in which the debt adjuster will, in a situation of insolvency, be marshalling assets in the manner of a proceeding in bankruptcy. The debt adjuster's client may need advice as to the legality of the various claims against him remedies existing under state laws governing debtor-creditor relationships, or provisions of the Bankruptcy Act—advice which a non-lawyer cannot lawfully give him." Id. at 732.

larly employed in and responsible for the management, supervision, and operation of such pharmacy."[272]

3. Restrictions on Freedom of Contract

a. Generally

[J90] "[T]he right to make contracts about one's affairs is a part of the liberty protected by the due process clause."[273] However, freedom of contract is a qualified right. "There is no absolute freedom to do as one wills or to contract as one chooses. . . . Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community."[274]

b. Impairment of Contracts

i. Federal Legislation and Due Process

[J91] "To prevail on a claim that federal economic legislation unconstitutionally impairs a private contractual right, the party complaining of unconstitutionality has the burden of demonstrating, first, that the statute alters contractual rights or obligations. . . . If an impairment is found, the reviewing court next determines whether the impairment is of constitutional dimension. If the alteration of contractual obligations is minimal, the inquiry may end at this stage . . . ; if the impairment is substantial, a court must look more closely at the legislation. . . . [This last] inquiry is especially limited, and the judicial scrutiny quite minimal. The party asserting a Fifth Amendment Due Process violation must overcome a presumption of constitutionality and 'establish that the legislature has acted in an arbitrary and irrational way.'"[275] Hence, federal economic legislation is not subject to constraints co-extensive with those imposed upon the states by the Contract Clause of Article I, Section 10 of the Constitution.[276]

[J92] "When the United States enters into contract relations, its rights and duties therein are governed generally by the law applicable to contracts between private individuals."[277] For example, "Congress does not have the power to repudiate its own debts, which constitute 'property' to the lender, simply in order to save money."[278] While the

---

[272] N. Dakota Pharmacy Bd. v. Snyder's Drug Stores, Inc. 414 U.S. 156 (1973).

[273] Morehead v. New York ex rel. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587, 610 (1936), citing Adkins v. Children's Hosp. of D.C., 261 U.S. 525, 545–46 (1923).

[274] W. Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 392 (1937), quoting Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R.R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U.S. 549, 567 (1911).

[275] Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 470 U.S. 451, 472 (1985). In that case, the Court held that Congress did not violate the Due Process Clause by requiring private railroads to reimburse the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) for rail travel privileges that Amtrak provided to the railroads' employees and former employees.

[276] See Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. R. A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 733 (1984); Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 640 (1993). See also paras. J125 et seq. (retroactive imposition of liability).

[277] Mobil Oil Exploration, Inc. v. United States, 530 U.S. 604, 607 (2000).

[278] Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 55 (1986), citing Perry v. United States, 294 U.S. 330, 350–51 (1935).

federal government, as sovereign, has the power to enter contracts that confer vested rights, and the concomitant duty to honor those rights, the Court has declined in the context of commercial contracts to find that "a sovereign forever waives the right to exercise one of its sovereign powers unless it expressly reserves the right to exercise that power in the contract."[279] Rather, it has emphasized that, "[w]ithout regard to its source, sovereign power, even when unexercised, is an enduring presence that governs all contracts subject to the sovereign's jurisdiction, and will remain intact unless surrendered in unmistakable terms."[280] Therefore, "contractual arrangements, including those to which a sovereign itself is party, 'remain subject to subsequent legislation' by the sovereign."[281]

---

[279] Merrion v. Jicarilla Apache Tribe, 455 U.S. 130, 148 (1982); Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 52 (1986). Under the "reserved powers" doctrine, developed in the course of litigating claims that states had violated the Contract Clause, the government may not contract away "an essential attribute of its sovereignty." See, in extenso, para. J105.

[280] Merrion v. Jicarilla Apache Tribe, 455 U.S. 130, 148 (1982).

[281] Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 52 (1986), quoting Merrion v. Jicarilla Apache Tribe, 455 U.S. 130, 147 (1982). Merrion held that long-term oil and gas leases to private parties from an Indian tribe, providing for specific royalties to be paid to the tribe, did not limit the tribe's sovereign prerogative to tax the proceeds from the lessees' drilling activities. Because the lease made no reference to the tribe's taxing power, the Court held simply that a waiver of that power could not be "inferred . . . from silence," since the taxing power of any government remains "unless it is has been specifically surrendered in terms which admit of no other reasonable interpretation." Id. at 148.

In Bowen v. Public Agencies Opposed to Social Society Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 52 (1986), the Court confronted a state claim that Section 103 of the Social Security Amendments Act of 1983 was unenforceable to the extent it was inconsistent with the terms of a prior agreement with the national government. Under the law before 1983, a state could agree with the Secretary of Health and Human Services to cover the state's employees under the social security scheme subject to a right to withdraw them from coverage later. When the 1983 Act eliminated the right of withdrawal, the state of California and related plaintiffs sought to enjoin application of the new law to them or to obtain just compensation for loss of the withdrawal right. Although the Court read the terms of a state-federal coverage agreement to reserve the government's right to modify its terms by subsequent legislation, and emphasized that, absent an "unmistakable" provision to the contrary, "contractual arrangements, including those to which a sovereign itself is a party, remain subject to subsequent legislation by the sovereign." Id. at 52.

In United States v. Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma, 480 U.S. 700, 704–07 (1987), the Court refused to infer a waiver of federal sovereign power from silence. There, an Indian tribe with property rights in a river bed derived from a government treaty sued for just compensation for damage to its interests caused by the government's navigational improvements to the Arkansas river. The claim for compensation presupposed, and was understood to presuppose, that the government had conveyed to the tribe its easement to control navigation; absent that conveyance, the tribe's property included no right to be free from the government's river bed improvements. The Court found, however, that the treaty said nothing about conveying the government's navigational easement, which was an aspect of sovereignty. This, the Court said, could be surrendered only in unmistakable terms.

Regarding the scope of the unmistakability doctrine, see United States v. Winstar Corp., 518 U.S. 839 (1996). The issue in that case was the enforceability of contracts between the government and participants in a regulated industry, according them favorable accounting treatment in exchange for their assumption of liabilities, which threatened to produce claims against the government as insurer. Although Congress subsequently changed the relevant law, and thereby barred the government from specifically honoring its agreements, the Court held that the terms

ii. State Legislation and the Contract Clause

[J93] General Principles. The language of the Contract Clause appears unambiguously absolute: "No State shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts." (U.S. Constitution Article I, Section 10).[282] The purpose of the Clause is to "enable individuals to order their personal and business affairs according to their particular needs and interests."[283] Although it was perhaps the strongest single constitutional check on state legislation during the early years of the Republic,[284] the Contract Clause receded into comparative desuetude with the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment and particularly with the development of the large body of jurisprudence under the Due Process Clause of that Amendment in modern constitutional history.[285] Nonetheless, the Contract Clause remains part of the Constitution. It is not a dead letter. And its basic contours are brought into focus by several of the Court's 20th-century decisions.

[J94] Generally, the Court first asks whether the change in state law has operated as a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship. "This inquiry has three components: whether there is a contractual relationship, whether a change in law impairs that contractual relationship, and whether the impairment is substantial."[286]

[J95] "The question whether a contract was made is a federal question for purposes of Contract Clause analysis. . . . [W]hether it turns on issues of general or purely local law, . . . [the Court is] bound to decide for [itself this question, although it] accord[s] respectful consideration and great weight to the relevant views of the State's highest court."[287] "[A]ll state regulations [cannot be considered] as implied terms of every contract entered into while they are effective, especially when the regulations themselves cannot be fairly interpreted to require such incorporation. . . . [Such a construction]

---

assigning the risk of regulatory change to the government were enforceable, and that the government was therefore liable in damages for breach. A four-Justice plurality noted that government agreements to insure private parties against the costs of subsequent regulatory change do not directly impede the exercise of sovereign power and do not implicate the unmistakability doctrine. Pursuant to this opinion, the unmistakability doctrine will apply where a plaintiff either seeks injunctive relief to hold the government to its alleged surrender of sovereign authority (which generally means granting the plaintiff an exemption to the changed law) or seeks a damage award, which would be the equivalent of such an injunction or exemption. Id. at 878–80 (principal opinion of Justice Souter, in which Stevens, O'Connor, and Breyer, JJ. joined). Nevertheless, five members of the Court held that the doctrine will also apply where a plaintiff seeks an award for damage caused by the exercise of that sovereign authority. Id. at 924–31 (dissenting opinion of Rehnquist, C.J., in which Ginsburg, J. joined); id. at 920–21 (concurring opinion of Scalia, J., in which Kennedy and Thomas, JJ., joined).

[282] A simple breach of contract by a municipality is not a "law impairing the obligation of the contract" to which the Clause would apply. See Shawnee Sewerage & Drainage Co. v. Stearns, 220 U.S. 462, 471 (1911).

[283] Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 245 (1978).

[284] Perhaps the best known of all Contract Clause cases of that era was Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 675 (1819). In that case, the Court held that a corporate charter was a contract within the meaning of Article I, Section 10, of the Constitution, so that a state law altering such a charter in a material respect, without the consent of the corporation, was unconstitutional and void.

[285] See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 241 (1978).

[286] Gen. Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 186 (1992).

[287] Id. at 187.

would expand the definition of contract so far that the constitutional provision would lose its anchoring purpose, . . . [and] would severely limit the ability of state legislatures to amend their regulatory legislation."[288] Hence, as a matter of principle, "state laws are implied into private contracts regardless of the assent of the parties only when those laws affect the validity, construction, and enforcement of contracts."[289]

[J96] "The severity of the impairment measures the height of the hurdle the state legislation must clear. Minimal alteration of contractual obligations may end the inquiry at its first stage. Severe impairment, on the other hand, will push the inquiry to a careful examination of the nature and purpose of the state legislation."[290] "Total destruction of contractual expectations is not necessary for a finding of substantial impairment. . . . On the other hand, state regulation that restricts a party to gains it reasonably expected from the contract does not necessarily constitute a substantial impairment."[291] In determining the extent of the impairment, the courts are to consider, inter alia, whether the industry the complaining party has entered has been regulated in the past.[292] The Court long ago observed: "One whose rights, such as they are, are subject to state restriction, cannot remove them from the power of the State by making a contract about them."[293]

[J97] "Although the language of the Contract Clause is facially absolute, its prohibition must be accommodated to the inherent police power of the State 'to safeguard the vital interests of its people.'"[294] The Court "has long recognized that a statute does not violate the Contract Clause simply because it has the effect of restricting, or even barring altogether, the performance of duties created by contracts entered into prior to its enactment."[295] If the law were "[o]therwise, one would be able to obtain immunity from state regulation by making private contractual arrangements."[296]

[J98] "If the state regulation constitutes a substantial impairment, the State, in justification, must have a significant and legitimate public purpose behind the regulation, . . . such as the remedying of a broad and general social or economic problem. . . . The requirement of a legitimate public purpose guarantees that the State is exercising its police power, rather than providing a benefit to special interests."[297] "Once a legitimate public purpose has been identified, the next inquiry is whether the adjustment of 'the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties [is based] upon reasonable conditions

---

288 Id. at 189–90.

289 Id. at 189.

290 Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 245 (1978).

291 Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 411 (1983), citing United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 26–27, 31 (1977) (four–three decision).

292 See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 242, n.13 (1978), citing Veix v. Sixth Ward Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 310 U.S. 32, 38 (1940) ("When [the petitioner] purchased into an enterprise already regulated in the particular to which he now objects, he purchased subject to further legislation upon the same topic.").

293 Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U.S. 349, 357 (1908).

294 Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 410 (1983), quoting Home Building & Loan Assn. v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 434 (1934).

295 See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 241–42, n.13 (1978).

296 United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22 (1977).

297 Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 410 (1983).

and [is] of a character appropriate to the public purpose justifying [the legislation's] adoption.'"[298] "Unless the State itself is a contracting party, . . . '[a]s is customary in reviewing economic and social regulation, . . . courts properly defer to legislative judgment as to the necessity and reasonableness of a particular measure.'"[299]

[J99] The Contract Clause does not deprive the states "of their broad power to adopt general regulatory measures without being concerned that private contracts will be impaired, or even destroyed, as a result."[300] As state rule that imposes a generally applicable rule of conduct is sharply distinguishable from measures directly adjusting the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties. Hence, a "state [economic] regulation is permissible under the Contract Clause notwithstanding its incidental effect on preexisting contracts."[301]

[J100] Particular Applications. The landmark case of Blaisdell addressed a Contract Clause attack against a mortgage moratorium law that Minnesota had enacted to provide relief for homeowners threatened with foreclosure. The statute, enacted in 1933, during the depth of the Depression and when that state was under severe economic stress, was a temporary measure that allowed judicial extension of the time for redemption; a mortgagor who remained in possession during the extension period was required to pay a reasonable income or rental value to the mortgagee. In upholding the statute, "the Court found five factors significant. First, the state legislature had declared in the Act itself that an emergency need for the protection of homeowners existed. . . . Second, the state law was enacted to protect a basic societal interest, not a favored group. . . . Third, the relief was appropriately tailored to the emergency that it was designed to meet. . . . Fourth, the imposed conditions were reasonable. . . . And, finally, the legislation was limited to the duration of the emergency."[302] East New York Savings Bank upheld a moratory statute, in post-depression times, suspending, for the tenth year in succession, the mortgagee's right of foreclosure. The Court found that "[t]he whole course of the New York moratorium legislation show[ed] the empiric process of legislation at its fairest: frequent reconsideration, intensive study of the consequences of what ha[d] been done, readjustment to changing economic conditions, and safeguarding the future on the basis of responsible forecasts."[303]

---

[298] Id. at 412, quoting United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22 (1977).

[299] Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 412–13 (1983) quoting United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22–23 (1977). This principle does not apply when the state is a party to the contract. See United States Trust Co., supra, at 26.

[300] United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22 (1977).

[301] Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176, 194 (1983). That case involved an Alabama statute that increased the severance tax on oil and gas extracted from Alabama wells and prohibited producers from passing on the increase to their purchasers. The Court upheld the statute against a Contract Clause challenge. In doing so, the Court emphasized that the prohibition imposed a generally applicable rule of conduct, the main effect of which was to shield consumers from the burden of the tax increase; its effect on existing contracts permitting producers to pass the increase through to consumers was only incidental.

[302] See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 242 (1978), discussing Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 444–47 (1934).

[303] E. New York Sav. Bank v. Hahn, 326 U.S. 230, 234–35 (1945). In W. B. Worthen Co. v. Thomas, 292 U.S. 426, 434 (1934), the Court struck down an Arkansas law that exempted the [J101] In Allied Structural Steel, the Court invalidated a Minnesota statute requiring a private employer that had contracted with its employees to provide pension benefits to pay additional benefits (a "pension funding charge" if its pension fund at the time was insufficient to provide full benefits for all employees with at least ten years' seniority) beyond those it had agreed to provide, if it terminated the pension plan or closed a Minnesota office. The Minnesota pension law severely impaired established contractual relations between employers and employees and invaded an area never before subject to regulation by the state. Moreover, it had not even purportedly been enacted to deal with a broad, generalized economic or social problem, but it had an extremely narrow proceeds of a life insurance policy from collection by the beneficiary's judgment creditors. The Court found that the relief sought to be afforded was neither temporary nor conditional: in placing insurance moneys beyond the reach of existing creditors, the Act contained no limitations as to time, amount, circumstances, or need. However, later decisions, such as East New York Savings Bank and Veix, abandoned these limitations as absolute requirements.

---

In Veix v. Sixth Ward Bldging & Loan Association of Newark, 310 U.S. 32, 38 (1940), the Court upheld a state statute that restricted the contractual rights of investors in a building and loan association to withdraw and recover by suit the amount of their investment. The Court noted that the contract was with a financial institution of major importance to the credit system of the state, and held that the obligation of the association to respond to an application for withdrawal was subject to the paramount police power.

In Richmond Mortgage & Loan Corp. v. Wachovia Bank & Trust Co., 300 U.S. 124, 129–31 (1937), a North Carolina statute, enacted after the execution of notes secured by a deed of trust, provided that, where a mortgagee caused the sale of mortgaged property by a trustee and, becoming the purchaser for a sum less than the amount of the debt, thereafter brought an action for a deficiency, the defendant was entitled to show, by way of defense and set-off, that the property sold was fairly worth the amount of the debt, or that the sum bid was substantially less than the true value of the property, and thus defeated the claim in whole or in part. Under the former law of that state, when the mortgagee became the purchaser at the trustee's sale under a power in the deed of trust, he might thereafter, in an action at law, recover the difference between the price he had bid and the amount of the indebtedness. The Court found that the other remedy by bill in equity to foreclose the mortgage was still available. And that, in such a proceeding, the chancellor could set aside the sale if the price bid was inadequate, and, in addition, he might award a money decree for the amount by which the avails of the sale fell below the amount of the indebtedness, but that his decree in that behalf would be governed by well-understood principles of equity. The Court was of the opinion that the statute modifying one of the existing remedies for realizing the value of the security could not "fairly be said to do more than restrict the mortgagee to that for which he contracted—namely, payment in full." The Act recognized the obligation of his contract and his right to its full enforcement, but it limited that right so as to prevent his obtaining more than his due. The new law as to proceedings for a deficiency judgment, after the exercise of a power of sale, merely restricted the exercise of the contractual remedy to provide a procedure that, to some extent, rendered the remedy by a trustee's sale consistent with that in equity. And that did not impair the obligation of the contract.

In Honeyman v. Jacobs, 306 U.S. 539, 543–45 (1939), a state statute providing that a mortgagee who bid at a foreclosure sale could not obtain a deficiency judgment if the value of the property equaled or exceeded the amount of the debt plus costs and interest. Relying on Richmond Mortgage, the Court said that the mortgagee under this law received all the compensation to which his contract entitled him, and that the statute merely restricted the exercise of the contractual remedy. This holding was reaffirmed by a unanimous Court in Gelfert v. National City Bank, 313 U.S. 221, 235 (1941), which sustained a New York law that redefined fair market value of property purchased by mortgagees at foreclosure sales.

focus: it applied only to private employers who had at least 100 employees, at least one of whom worked in Minnesota, who had established voluntary private pension plans, and only when such an employer closed its Minnesota office or terminated its pension plan. Hence, the presumption favoring legislative judgment as to the necessity and reasonableness of a particular measure simply could not stand in this case.[304]

[J102] In Energy Reserves the Court rejected a Contract Clause challenge against a Kansas regulation of the price of natural gas sold at wellhead in the intra-state market. First, the Court noted, the Kansas statute had not substantially impaired appellant's contractual rights. The parties were operating in a heavily regulated industry. "Price regulation existed and was foreseeable as the type of law that would alter contract obligations." Second, to the extent, if any, the Kansas Act impaired appellant's contractual interests, it rested on significant state interests in protecting consumers from the escalation of natural gas prices caused by deregulation and in correcting the imbalance between the inter-state and intra-state markets. Nor were the means chosen to implement these purposes deficient, particularly in light of the deference to which the Kansas legislature's judgment was entitled.[305]

[J103] Keystone Bituminous upheld a Pennsylvania regulation of bituminous coal mining. Petitioners claimed that the statute violated the Contracts Clause by not allowing them to hold the surface owners to their contractual waiver of liability for surface damage. The Court agreed that the statute operated as a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship. However, the statute plainly survived scrutiny under the Court's standards for evaluating impairments of private contracts. "The Commonwealth ha[d] determined that, in order to deter mining practices that could have severe effects on the surface, it [wa]s not enough to set out guidelines and impose restrictions, but that imposition of liability [wa]s necessary. By requiring the coal companies either to repair the damage or to give the surface owner funds to repair the damage, the Commonwealth accomplishe[d] both deterrence and restoration of the environment to its previous condition. [The Court] refuse[d] to second-guess the Commonwealth's determinations that these [we]re the most appropriate ways of dealing with the problem. [It] conclude[d,] therefore, that the impairment of petitioners' right to enforce the damages waivers [wa]s amply justified by the public purposes served by the state statute."[306]

[J104] States' Contracts. When a state itself enters into a contract,[307] "it cannot simply

---

304 Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 244–50 (1978).

305 Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 413–19 (1983).

306 Keystone Bituminous Coal Assn. v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470, 506 (1987).

307 "In general, a statute is itself treated as a contract when the language and circumstances evince a legislative intent to create private rights of a contractual nature enforceable against the State. . . . In addition, statutes governing the interpretation and enforcement of contracts may be regarded as forming part of the obligation of contracts made under their aegis." See United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 17, n.14 (1977). "The presumption is that 'a law is not intended to create private contractual or vested rights but merely declares a policy to be pursued until the legislature shall ordain otherwise.' . . . This . . . presumption is grounded in the elementary proposition that the principal function of a legislature is not to make contracts, but to make laws that establish the policy of the state. . . . Thus, the party asserting the creation of a contract must overcome this well-founded presumption, and [the Court] proceed[s] cautiously both in identifying a contract within the language of a regulatory statute and in defining the contours of any contractual obligation." See Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 470 U.S. 451, 466 (1985).

walk away from its financial obligations."[308] When the state is a party to the contract, "complete deference to a legislative assessment of reasonableness and necessity is not appropriate because the State's self-interest is at stake."[309]

[J105] When a state impairs the obligation of its own contract, "[t]he initial inquiry concerns the ability of the State to enter into an agreement that limits its power to act in the future. As early as Fletcher v. Peck, the Court considered the argument that 'one legislature cannot abridge the powers of a succeeding legislature.'"[310] In this regard, it has been stated that "the legislature cannot bargain away the police power of a State."[311] "This doctrine requires a determination of the State's power to create irrevocable contract rights in the first place, rather than an inquiry into the purpose or reasonableness of the subsequent impairment. In short, the Contract Clause does not require a State to adhere to a contract that surrenders an essential attribute of its sovereignty."[312]

[J106] "Whatever the propriety of a State's binding itself to a future course of conduct in other contexts, the power to enter into effective financial contracts cannot be questioned."[313] The Court has regularly held that the states are bound by their debt con-

---

[308] Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 412, n.14 (1983).

[309] United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 26 (1977) (four–three decision).

[310] Id. at 23, quoting Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 135 (1810).

[311] Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814, 817 (1880). In that case, the Court sustained the state's revocation of a 25-year charter to operate a lottery. Other cases similarly have held that a state is without power to enter into binding contracts not to exercise its police power in the future. E.g., Pierce Oil Corp. v. City of Hope, 248 U.S. 498, 501 (1919); Atl. Coast Line R. Co. v. Goldsboro, 232 U.S. 548, 558 (1914); Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U.S. 488, 502–05 (1897). See Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 436–37 (1934).

[312] United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 23 (1977). "In deciding whether a State's contract was invalid ab initio under the reserved powers doctrine, earlier decisions relied on distinctions among the various powers of the State. Thus, the police power and the power of eminent domain were among those that could not be 'contracted away,' but the State could bind itself in the future exercise of the taxing and spending powers. In New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch 164 (1812), the Court held that a State could properly grant a permanent tax exemption, and that the Contract Clause prohibited any impairment of such an agreement. This holding has never been repudiated, although tax exemption contracts generally have not received a sympathetic construction. . . . By contrast, the doctrine that a State cannot contract away the power of eminent domain has been established since W. River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 507 (1848). . . . The doctrine that a State cannot be bound to a contract forbidding the exercise of its police power is almost as old. See [Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814 (1880)]." See United States Trust Co. of New York, supra, at 23–24, n.21.

In this context, the Court has adopted a canon of construction disfavoring implied governmental obligations in public contracts. Under the rule that "[a]ll public grants are strictly construed," the Court has insisted that "nothing can be taken against the state by presumption or inference," and that "neither the right of taxation, nor any other power of sovereignty, will be held . . . to have been surrendered, unless such surrender has been expressed in terms too plain to be mistaken." See Delaware R.R. Tax, 18 Wall. 206, 225 (1874); Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black 436, 446 (1862). Hence, "sovereign power . . . governs all contracts subject to the sovereign's jurisdiction, and will remain intact unless surrendered in unmistakable terms." See Bowen v. Pub. Agencies Opposed to Soc. Sec. Entrapment, 477 U.S. 41, 52 (1986). See also para. J92, n.280–281.

[313] United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 24 (1977).

tracts. "States and cities, when they borrow money and contract to repay it with interest, are not acting as sovereignties. They come down to the level of ordinary individuals. Their contracts have the same meaning as that of similar contracts between private persons. Hence, instead of there being in the undertaking of a State or city to pay, a reservation of a sovereign right to withhold payment, the contract should be regarded as an assurance that such a right will not be exercised."[314]

[J107] State laws authorizing the impairment of municipal bond contracts have been held unconstitutional.[315] Similarly, a tax on municipal bonds was held unconstitutional, because its effect was to reduce the contractual rate of interest.[316] And a state may not authorize a municipality to borrow money and then restrict its taxing power so that the debt cannot be repaid.[317] Nevertheless, Faitoute sustained an alteration of a municipal bond contract. That case involved the New Jersey Municipal Finance Act, which provided that a bankrupt local government could be placed in receivership by a state agency. A plan for the composition of creditors' claims was required to be approved by the agency, the municipality, and 85 percent of the creditors. The plan would be binding on non-consenting creditors after a state court conducted a hearing and found that the municipality could not otherwise pay off its creditors, and that the plan was in the best interest of all creditors. Under the specific composition plan at issue in Faitoute, the holders of revenue bonds received new securities bearing lower interest rates and later maturity dates. The Court, however, rejected the dissenting bondholders' Contract Clause objections. "The reason was that the old bonds represented only theoretical rights; as a practical matter, the city could not raise its taxes enough to pay off its creditors under the old contract terms. The composition plan enabled the city to meet its financial obligations more effectively."[318] "The necessity compelled by unexpected financial conditions to modify an original arrangement for discharging a city's debt is implied in every such obligation for the very reason that thereby the obligation is discharged, not impaired." Thus, the Court found that the composition plan was adopted with the purpose and effect of protecting the creditors, as evidenced by their more than 85 percent approval; indeed, the market value of the bonds increased sharply as a result of the plan's adoption.[319]

---

[314] Murray v. Charleston, 96 U.S. 432, 445 (1878).

[315] In W. B. Worthen Co. v. Kavanaugh, 295 U.S. 56, 60–62 (1935), the Court was confronted with a state law that diluted the rights of mortgage bondholders. As a relief measure for financially depressed local governments, Arkansas enacted a statute that greatly diminished the remedies available to creditors under their bonds. This resulted in a remedial scheme whereby creditors were without an effective remedy for a minimum of six and a half years, during which time the government's obligation to pay principal or interest was suspended. The Court invalidated the statute, concluding: "[w]ith studied indifference to the interests of the mortgagee or to his appropriate protection [the state has] taken from the mortgage the quality of an acceptable investment for a rational investor. . . . So viewed, [the state's action is] seen to be an oppressive and unnecessary destruction of nearly all the incidents that give attractiveness and value to collateral security."

[316] Murray v. Charleston, 96 U.S. 432, 443–46 (1878).

[317] Louisiana ex rel. Hubert v. New Orleans, 215 U.S. 170, 175–78 (1909); Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U.S. 358, 365–68 (1881).

[318] See United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 28 (1977).

[319] Faitoute Iron & Steel Co. v. City of Asbury Park, 316 U.S. 502, 511–13 (1942).

[J108] United States Trust Co. "indicated that impairments of a State's own contracts would face more stringent examination under the Contract Clause than would laws regulating contractual relationships between private parties."[320] There, a 1962 statutory covenant between New Jersey and New York limited the ability of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to subsidize rail passenger transportation from revenues and reserves pledged as security for consolidated bonds issued by the Port Authority. A 1974 New Jersey statute, together with a concurrent and parallel New York statute, retroactively repealed the 1962 covenant. The Court held that New Jersey could not retroactively alter the statutory bond covenant relied upon by bond purchasers, noting that "a State cannot refuse to meet its legitimate financial obligations simply because it would prefer to spend the money to promote the public good, rather than the private welfare of its creditors." The outright repeal of the 1962 covenant totally eliminated an important security provision for the bondholders and thus impaired the obligation of the states' contract. Further, the Court stressed that the repeal of the 1962 covenant could be sustained only if "that impairment was both reasonable and necessary to serve the admittedly important purposes claimed by the State." However, the impairment was neither necessary to achieve the states' plan to encourage private automobile users to shift to public transportation nor reasonable in light of changed circumstances. Total repeal of the 1962 covenant was not essential, since the states' plan could have been implemented with a less drastic modification of the covenant, and since, without modifying the covenant at all, the states could have adopted alternative means of achieving their twin goals of discouraging automobile use and improving mass transit. Nor could the repeal be claimed to be reasonable on the basis of the need for mass transportation, energy conservation, and environmental protection, since these concerns were not unknown in 1962, and the subsequent changes were of degree and not of kind.[321]

[J109] El Paso v. Simmons concerned a 1941 Texas statute that limited, to a five-year period, the reinstatement rights of an interest-defaulting purchaser of land from the state. For many years prior to the enactment of that statute, such a defaulting purchaser, under Texas law, could have reinstated his claim to the land upon written request and payment of delinquent interest, unless rights of third parties had intervened. The program adopted at the turn of the century for the sale, settlement, forfeiture, and reinstatement of land was not wholly effectual to serve the objectives of the state's land program many decades later. The Texas statute of repose served significant state objectives: clarification of land titles, elimination of massive litigation over titles, and effective utilization of property. The measure taken to induce defaulting purchasers to comply with their contracts, requiring payment of interest in arrears within five years, was a mild one, hardly burdensome to the purchaser, who wanted to adhere to his contract of purchase, but nonetheless an important one to the state's interest. Consequently, the Court concluded that the Contract Clause did not forbid such a measure.[322]

---

[320] See Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 244, n.15 (1978), citing United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 22–23 (1977).

[321] United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey, 431 U.S. 1, 29–32 (1977) (four-to-three decision).

[322] City of El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 515–17 (1965).

4. Utility Regulation[323]

[J110] Public utilities, "from the public nature of the business by them carried on and the interest which the public have in their operation, are subject . . . to state regulation, which may be exerted either directly by the legislative authority or by administrative bodies endowed with power to that end. . . . [However, since the right of ownership of public utility] property finds protection in constitutional guaranties, . . . wherever the power of regulation is exerted in such an arbitrary and unreasonable way as to cause it to be in effect not a regulation, but an infringement upon the right of ownership, such an exertion of power is void because repugnant to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment."[324]

[J111] If a railroad devotes its property to a use in which the public has an interest, it, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use. So long as it maintains the use, it must submit to government control for the common good, but it may withdraw its grant by discontinuing the use when that use can be kept up only at a loss.[325] At the same time, a railroad estate may be required "to suffer interim losses for a reasonable period pending good faith efforts to develop a feasible reorganization plan, if the public interest in continued rail service justifies the requirement."[326]

[J112] "Enforcement of uncompensated obedience to a regulation passed in the legitimate exertion of the police power is not a taking of public utility property without due process of law."[327] For example, a state or its subdivisions may require a railroad to make certain improvements, in the interest of public safety and convenience, made necessary by the rapid growth of the communities. In such circumstances, the Court has held that the cost of such improvements may be allocated all to the railroads.[328] Of course, there is the proper limitation that "such allocation of costs must be fair and reasonable."[329]

---

[323] See also paras. J39 et seq. (public utility rate regulation).

[324] Atl. Coast Line v. N. Carolina Corp. Comm'n, 206 U.S. 1, 19–20 (1907).

[325] See Brooks-Scanlon Co. v. R.R. Comm'n of Louisiana, 251 U.S. 396, 399 (1920); Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 126 (1876).

[326] Reg'l R.R. Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 122–23 (1974), citing Continental Illinois Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, R.I. & P. R. Co., 294 U.S. 648, 677 (1935).

[327] New Orleans Pub. Serv., Inc. v. New Orleans, 281 U.S. 682 (1930)

[328] See, e.g., Erie R.R. Co. v. Bd. of Pub. Util. Comm'rs, 254 U.S. 394, 409–11 (1921); Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Omaha, 235 U.S. 121, 127 (1914).

For example, when a viaduct has long been in use, has become inadequate, and is also unsafe and in need of extensive repairs, the railroad company may be required to remove it and to construct in its place double tracks at street level crossing the railroad. See New Orleans Pub. Serv., Inc. v. New Orleans, 281 U.S. 682 (1930).

[329] See Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 346 U.S. 346, 352 (1953), citing Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry. v. Walters, 294 U.S. 405, 415 (1935). See also Erie R.R. Co. v. Bd. of Pub. Util. Comm'rs, 254 U.S. 394, 411 (1921) ("if the burdens imposed are so great that the road cannot be run at a profit, it can stop, whatever the misfortunes the stopping may produce"); Lehigh Valley Ry. Co. v. Pub. Util. Comm'rs, 278 U.S. 24, 34 (1928) (danger to the public will not ". . . justify great expenditures, unreasonably burdening the railroad, when less expenditure can reasonably accomplish the object of the improvements and avoid the danger. If the danger is clear, reasonable care must be taken to eliminate it, and the police power may be exerted to that end.").

In Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway v. Walters, 294 U.S. 405, 415 (1935), the railroad's share of the cost was fixed at 50 percent by a Tennessee statute. The grade separation

But the railroads are "in no position to complain because their share in the cost . . . is not based solely on the special benefits accruing to them from the improvements."[330]

5. Governmental Price Control[331]

[J113] "Price control is one of the means available to the states . . . and to the Congress . . . in their respective domains, for the protection and promotion of the welfare of the economy"[332] and of consumers.[333] For example, the government may intervene in the marketplace to regulate rates or prices that are artificially inflated as a result of the existence of a monopoly or near monopoly[334] or a discrepancy between supply and demand in the market for a certain product.[335] However, a price control regulation may properly be attacked as confiscatory and unconstitutional, if it is "arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt."[336] ordered in that case was located in the rural community of Lexington, Tennessee, which had a population in 1910 of 1,497, in 1920 of 1,792, and in 1930 of 1,823. The improvement was not required to meet the transportation needs of Lexington and was being constructed without regard to that community's growth or to considerations of public safety and convenience resulting from such growth. The highway under improvement was part of the state highway system, and the grade was to be removed primarily as part of economic and engineering planning and to qualify the improvement of the highway for federal aid. Other facts pointed principally to the state and nationwide nature of the highway system and the particular highway involved, the competition afforded railroads by the users of such highways and the effect of such competition on the revenues of the railroads, and the increasing importance of grade separations as a means of assuring rapid movement of motor vehicles rather than as an exclusively safety measure. Under these circumstances, the judgment of the supreme court of Tennessee was reversed, and the case remanded thereto, because that court had refused to consider whether the special facts shown were of such persuasiveness as to have required the state court to hold that the statute and order complained of were arbitrary and unreasonable.

---

In Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. v. Holmberg, 282 U.S. 162 (1930), the Court held that an order directing a railroad company to provide an underground cattle-pass across its right of way partly at the expense of the company, not as a safety measure but merely to save a farmer, owning the land on both sides of the railroad, from inconvenience attendant upon the use of an existing grade crossing that was otherwise adequate, had taken the company's property for a private use and without due process of law.

[330] Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 346 U.S. 346, 352–53 (1953).

[331] See also para. B48 (wartime regulations); para. C13 (limitations on attorney fees); paras. J39 et seq. (public utility rate regulation).

[332] Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U.S. 381, 394 (1940).

[333] See Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 769–70 (1968); Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 13 (1988).

[334] See, e.g., Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Florida Power Corp., 480 U.S. 245, 250–54 (1987) (approving limits on rates charged to cable companies for access to telephone poles); Fed. Power Comm'n v. Texaco Inc., 417 U.S. 380, 397–98 (1974) (recognizing that federal regulation of the natural gas market was in response to the threat of monopoly pricing).

[335] See, e.g., Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 530, 538 (1934) (allowing a minimum price for milk to off-set a "flood of surplus milk"); Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 12 (1988) (recognizing that a rent control ordinance, aimed at preventing excessive and unreasonable rent increases caused by the growing shortage of and increasing demand for housing in the city, is a legitimate exercise of municipal police power).

[336] Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 11 (1988), quoting Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502,

[J114] No constitutional objection arises from the imposition of maximum prices merely because the value of regulated property is reduced as a consequence of regulation.[337] Regulation "may, consistently with the Constitution, limit stringently the return recovered on investment, for investors' interests provide only one of the variables in the constitutional calculus of reasonableness."[338]

[J115] A state "has power to annul and supersede rates previously established by contract between utilities and their customers."[339] The Constitution does not prohibit the determination of rates through group or class proceedings. Although high cost operators may be more seriously affected by price control than others, it has not been thought that price-fixing, otherwise valid, is improper because it is on a class, rather than an individual, basis.[340] The Court has "recognized that legislatures and administrative agencies may calculate rates for a regulated class without first evaluating the separate financial position of each member of the class; it has been thought to be sufficient if the agency has before it representative evidence, ample in quantity to measure with appropriate precision the financial and other requirements of the pertinent parties."[341]

[J116] A legitimate and rational goal of rent control regulations is the protection of tenants.[342] Pennell involved a rent control ordinance, under which a landlord could automatically raise the annual rent of a tenant in possession by as much as 8 percent, but if a tenant objected to a higher increase, a hearing was required to determine whether the landlord's proposed increase was "reasonable under the circumstances," and the hearing officer was directed to consider specified factors, including the history of the premises, the landlord's costs, the market for comparable housing, financial evidence regarding the landlord's own financial status, and "the hardship to a tenant." The Court found that the ordinance, which so carefully considered both the individual circumstances of the landlord and the tenant before determining whether to allow an additional increase in rent over and above certain amounts that were deemed reasonable, did not, on its face, violate the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, for it "represent[ed] a rational attempt to accommodate the conflicting interests of protecting

---

539 (1934). In several early cases, the constitutional validity of price-fixing legislation, at least in the absence of a so-called emergency, was dependent on whether or not the business in question was "affected with a public interest." It was said to be so affected if it had been "devoted to the public use" and if "an interest in effect" had been granted "to the public in that use." See Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U.S. 350, 355 (1928). That test, was discarded in Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 531–39 (1934). It was there stated that such criteria "are not susceptible of definition and form an unsatisfactory test of the constitutionality of legislation directed at business practices or prices," and that the phrase "affected with a public interest" can mean "no more than that an industry, for adequate reason, is subject to control for the public good." Id. at 536.

337 Fed. Power Comm'n v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591, 601 (1944).

338 Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 769 (1968), citing Covington & Lexington Tpk. Co. v. Sandford, 164 U.S. 578, 596 (1896).

339 Midland Realty Co. v. Kansas City Power & Light Co., 300 U.S. 109, 113 (1937).

340 See Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 518 (1944).

341 Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 769 (1968), citing Tagg Bros. v. United States, 280 U.S. 420 (1930); Acker v. United States, 298 U.S. 426 (1936).

342 Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 13 (1988). See also Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 513, n.9 (1944) (one purpose of rent control is "to protect persons with relatively fixed and limited incomes, consumers, wage earners . . . from undue impairment of their standard of living").

tenants from burdensome rent increases while at the same time ensuring that landlords [we]re guaranteed a fair return on their investment."[343]

6. Liability Limitation

[J117] Duke Power involved a federal Act that imposed a $560 million limitation on liability for nuclear accidents resulting from the operation of federally licensed private nuclear power plants, required those indemnified by the $560 million fund established under the Act to waive all legal defenses in the event of a substantial nuclear accident, and further provided that, in the event of a nuclear accident involving damages in excess of the amount of aggregate liability, Congress "will take whatever action is deemed necessary and appropriate to protect the public from the consequences of a disaster of such magnitude." Congress' purpose was to remove the economic impediments in order to stimulate the private development of electric energy by nuclear power, while simultaneously providing the public compensation in the event of a catastrophic nuclear incident. The liability limitation provision thus emerged as a classic example of an economic regulation—a legislative effort to structure and accommodate the burdens and benefits of economic life. Hence, the Court found that it should defer to the congressional judgment unless it was demonstrably arbitrary or irrational. The Act passed constitutional muster, under this standard of review. The record of the case supported the need for the imposition of a statutory limit on liability to encourage private industry participation, and, consequently, the Act bore a rational relationship to Congress' concern for stimulating private industry's involvement in the production of nuclear electric energy. Moreover, assuming, arguendo, that the $560 million fund would not insure full recovery in all conceivable circumstances, it did not follow that the liability limitation was therefore irrational and violative of due process. When appraised in light of the extremely remote possibility of an accident in which liability would exceed the statutory limit and the strong likelihood that Congress would enact extraordinary relief provisions to provide additional relief, in accord with prior practice, the congressional decision to fix a $560 million ceiling was within permissible limits and not violative of due process. The district court's finding that the Act tended to encourage irresponsibility in matters of safety and environmental protection could not withstand careful scrutiny, since nothing in the liability limitation provision undermined or altered the rigor and integrity of the process involved in the review of applications for a license to construct or operate a nuclear power plant, and since, in the event of a nuclear accident, the utility itself would probably suffer the largest damages.[344]

---

[343] Pennell v. San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 13 (1988). Statutes regulating the economic relations of landlords and tenants are not per se takings, but they may constitute regulatory takings. See Pennell, supra, at 12, n.6; Yee v. Escondido, 503 U.S. 519, 532–34 (1992).

[344] Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Group, Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 83–87 (1978). The Act also provided a reasonably just substitute for the common law or state tort law remedies it replaced, and nothing more was required by the Due Process Clause. The congressional assurance of a $560 million fund for recovery, accompanied by the statutory commitment to "take whatever action is deemed necessary and appropriate to protect the public from the consequences of" a nuclear accident, was a fair and reasonable substitute for the uncertain recovery of damages of this magnitude from a utility or component manufacturer whose resources might well be exhausted at an early stage. And, at the minimum, the statutorily mandated waiver of defenses established, at the threshold, the right of injured parties to compensation without

7. Retroactive Economic Legislation

a. In General[345]

[J118] "[L]egislation readjusting rights and burdens is not unlawful solely because it upsets otherwise settled expectations. . . . This is true even though the effect of the legislation is to impose a new duty or liability based on past acts. [Even though prospective economic legislation carries with it the presumption of constitutionality, it] does not follow, however, that what Congress can legislate prospectively it can legislate retrospectively. The retrospective aspects of legislation, as well as the prospective aspects, must meet the test of due process [—i.e., a legitimate legislative purpose furthered by rational means—] and the justifications for the latter may not suffice for the former."[346] Indeed, "[r]etroactive economic legislation presents problems of unfairness that are more serious than those posed by prospective legislation, because it can deprive citizens of legitimate expectations and upset settled transactions."[347]

b. Retroactive Taxation

[J119] The validity of a retroactive tax provision under the Due Process Clause depends upon whether "retroactive application is so harsh and oppressive as to transgress the constitutional limitation."[348] "The 'harsh and oppressive' formulation 'does not differ from the prohibition against arbitrary and irrational legislation' that applies generally to enactments in the sphere of economic policy."[349] "In each case, it is necessary to consider the nature of the tax and the circumstances in which it is laid before it can be said that its retroactive application is so harsh and oppressive as to transgress the constitutional limitation."[350] "One of the relevant circumstances is whether, without notice, a statute gives a different and more oppressive legal effect to conduct undertaken before enactment of the statute."[351]

[J120] In Untermyer, the Court held invalid the taxation of gifts made and completely vested before the enactment of the taxing statute. As the Court explained in a later case, this holding "was rested on the ground that the nature or amount of the tax could not reasonably have been anticipated by the taxpayer at the time of the particular voluntary act which the statute later made the taxable event. . . . Since . . . the donor might freely have chosen to give or not to give, the taxation, after the choice was made, of a gift proof of fault and eliminated the burden of delay and uncertainty that would follow from the need to litigate the question of liability after an accident. Id. at 88–93.

---

In the course of adjudicating a similar challenge to the Workmen's Compensation Act in New York Central Railroad Co. v. White, 243 U.S. 188, 201 (1917), the Court observed that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was not violated simply because an injured party would not be able to recover as much under the Act as before its enactment.

345 See also para. E57 (retroactive civil penalties).

346 Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15–17 (1976).

347 Gen. Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 191 (1992).

348 Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 147 (1938).

349 United States v. Carlton, 512 U.S. 26, 30 (1994), quoting Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. R. A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 733 (1984).

350 Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 147 (1938).

351 United States v. Hemme, 476 U.S. 558, 569 (1986).

which he might well have refrained from making had he anticipated the tax was thought to be so arbitrary and oppressive as to be a denial of due process."[352]

[J121] In Milliken, the Court upheld the application of an early "gift in contemplation of death" statute, enacted in 1918, to draw into the estate of a decedent who died in 1920 a gift given in 1916, before enactment of the statute. In that case, the equities were especially favorable to the taxpayer, because the gift in question was stock that had appreciated substantially following the gift, and inclusion in the estate occasioned taxation of the higher amount. "Nevertheless, th[e] Court reasoned that the validity of the tax depended not upon its retroactive feature, but upon its nature and that of the gift. The Court upheld the levy of estate tax upon the gift on the ground that the notion of taxing gifts made in contemplation of death as part of the estate was not new, and that the donor should have known that there was a chance of increased tax burden if he chose to make what amounted to a testamentary gift during his lifetime."[353]

[J122] The Court consistently has held that the application of an income tax statute to the entire calendar year in which enactment took place does not, per se, violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[354] In Darusmont, the Court held that the 1976 amendments of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, which increased the rate of the minimum tax and decreased the allowable exemption as to enumerated items of tax preference, including the deduction for 50 percent of any net long-term capital gain, and made the amendments effective for the taxable years beginning after December 31, 1975, might be applied to appellee taxpayers' sale of a house, resulting in a long-term capital gain, which had taken place in 1976 prior to the enactment of the amendments, without violating the Due Process Clause.[355]

[J123] Welch upheld against a due process attack a state statute enacted in 1935 taxing 1933 dividend income that the 1933 taxing statute had explicitly exempted. Adopting the view that a stockholder would have continued to receive corporate dividends even if he knew that the dividends would subsequently be taxed, the Court distinguished Untermyer on the ground that the donor might have refrained from making the gift had he anticipated the tax.[356]

[J124] Carlton involved a 1987 amendment to the federal estate tax statute, limiting the availability of a then recently added deduction for the proceeds of sales of stock to employee stock ownership plans. Congress provided that the amendment would apply

---

[352] See Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 147 (1938), discussing Untermyer v. Anderson, 276 U.S. 440, 445 (1928). At the same time, the Court explicitly recognized a distinction between retroactive taxation of genuine gifts and that of gifts made in contemplation of death.

[353] See United States v. Hemme, 476 U.S. 558, 568 (1986), discussing Milliken v. United States, 283 U.S. 15, 24 (1931).

[354] See, e.g., Brushaber v. Union Pac. R. Co., 240 U.S. 1, 20 (1916); Reinecke v. Smith, 289 U.S. 172, 175 (1933); Fernandez v. Wiener, 326 U.S. 340, 355 (1945).

[355] United States v. Darusmont, 449 U.S. 292, 299–300 (1981) (per curiam). Assuming, arguendo, that personal notice of tax changes was relevant, the Court found that appellee could not claim surprise, since the proposed increase in the minimum tax rate had been under public discussion for almost a year before its enactment. Moreover, the amendments to the minimum tax did not create a "new tax," since the minimum tax provision was imposed in 1969, and one of the original items of tax preference subjected to the minimum tax was the untaxed portion of any net long-term capital gain.

[356] Welch v. Henry, 305 U.S. 134, 147–48 (1938).

retroactively, as if incorporated in the original deduction provision, which had been adopted in October 1986. The Court decided that the retroactive application of the amendment did not violate due process. The Court began its analysis by noting that a tax statute's retroactive application must be "supported by a legitimate legislative purpose furthered by rational means." Congress' purpose in enacting the 1987 amendment was neither illegitimate nor arbitrary. The relevant provision was originally intended to create an incentive for stockholders to sell their companies to their employees, but the absence of a decedent stock ownership requirement resulted in the deduction's broad availability to virtually any estate at an estimated loss to the government of up to $7 billion in anticipated revenues. Thus, Congress undoubtedly had intended the amendment to correct what it reasonably viewed as a mistake in the original provision. Moreover, the amendment's retroactive application was rationally related to its legitimate purpose, since Congress had acted "promptly" in proposing the amendment within a few months of the original enactment and had established a "modest" retroactivity period that extended only slightly longer than one year. Finally, the Court did not consider Carlton's lack of advance notice regarding the 1987 amendment to be dispositive.[357]

c. Imposition of Retroactive Liability

[J125] In Turner Elkhorn, the Court reviewed provisions of the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972, which required coal operators to compensate certain miners and their survivors for death or disability due to black lung disease caused by employment in coal mines. Coal operators challenged the provisions of the Act relating to miners who were no longer employed in the industry, arguing that those provisions violated substantive due process by imposing an unexpected liability for past, completed acts that were legally proper and, at least in part, unknown to be dangerous at the time. In rejecting the operators' challenge, the Court noted that "legislative Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality, and . . . the burden is on one complaining of a due process violation to establish that the legislature has acted in an arbitrary and irrational way." The Court observed that stricter limits may apply to Congress' authority when legislation operates in a retroactive manner, but concluded that the assignment of liability for black lung benefits was "justified as a rational measure to spread the costs of the employees' disabilities to those who had profited from the fruits of their labor—the operators and the coal consumers."[358]

[J126] Several years later, the Court confronted a due process challenge to the Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act of 1980 (MPPAA). The MPPAA was enacted to supplement the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA), which established the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC) to administer an insurance program for vested pension benefits. For a temporary period, the PBGC had discretionary authority to pay benefits upon the termination of multi-employer pension plans, after which insurance coverage would become mandatory. If the PBGC exercised that authority, employers who had contributed to the plan during the five years before its termination faced liability for an amount proportional to their share of contributions to the plan during that period. Despite Congress' effort to insure multi-employer plan benefits through ERISA, many multi-employer plans were in a precarious financial position as the date for mandatory coverage approached. After a series of hearings and debates, Congress passed the MPPAA, which imposed a payment obligation upon any employer withdrawing from a multi-employer pension plan, the amount of which depended on the employer's share of the plan's unfunded vested benefits. The MPPAA applied retroactively to withdrawals within the five months preceding the statute's enactment. In R.A. Gray, an employer that had participated in a multi-employer pension plan brought a due process challenge to the statutory liability stemming from its withdrawal from the plan four months before the MPPAA was enacted. Relying on Turner Elkhorn, the Court rejected the employer's claim. It was rational, the Court determined, for Congress to impose retroactive liability "to prevent employers from taking advantage of a lengthy legislative process [by] withdrawing while Congress debated necessary revisions in the statute." In addition, as the MPPAA "progressed through the legislative process, Congress advanced the effective date chosen so that it would encompass only that retroactive time period that Congress believed would be necessary to accomplish its purposes." Accordingly, the Court concluded that the MPPAA exemplified the "customary congressional practice" of enacting "retroactive statutes confined to short and limited periods required by the practicalities of producing national legislation."[359]

---

357 United States v. Carlton, 512 U.S. 26, 30–35 (1994).

358 Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15–18 (1976).

[J127] The Court again considered the constitutionality of the MPPAA in Connolly, which presented the question whether the Act's withdrawal liability provisions effected an unconstitutional taking. The action was brought by trustees of a multi-employer pension plan that, under collective bargaining agreements, received contributions from employers on the basis of the hours worked by their employees. The Court agreed that the liability imposed by the MPPAA constituted a permanent deprivation of assets, but it rejected the notion that "such a statutory liability to a private party always constitutes an uncompensated taking prohibited by the Fifth Amendment." "In the course of regulating commercial and other human affairs," the Court explained, "Congress routinely creates burdens for some that directly benefit others." Consistent with Gray and Turner Elkhorn, the Court reasoned that legislation "is not unlawful solely because it upsets otherwise settled expectations." Moreover, given its holding in Gray that the MPPAA did not violate due process, the Court emphasized that "it would be surprising indeed to discover" that the statute effected a taking. Although the employers in Connolly had contractual agreements expressly limiting their contributions to the multi-employer plan, the Court observed that "the fact that legislation disregards or destroys existing contractual rights does not always transform the regulation into an illegal taking." Focusing on the three factors of "particular significance"—the economic impact of the regulation, the extent to which the regulation interferes with investment-backed expectations, and the character of the governmental action—it determined that the MPPAA did not violate the Takings Clause. The governmental action at issue was not a physical invasion of employers' assets; rather, it safeguarded the participants in multi-employer pension plans by requiring a withdrawing employer to fund its share of the plan obligations incurred during its association with the plan. In addition, although the amounts assessed under the MPPAA were substantial, the Court found it important that "[t]he assessment of withdrawal liability [wa]s not made in a vacuum, but directly depend[ed] on the relationship between the employer and the plan to which it had made contributions."

---

[359] Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. R. A. Gray & Co., 467 U.S. 717, 720–31 (1984).

Further, a significant number of provisions in the Act moderated and mitigated the economic impact of an individual employer's liability. Accordingly, the Court found "nothing to show that the withdrawal liability actually imposed on an employer [would] always be out of proportion to its experience with the plan." Nor did the MPPAA interfere with employers' reasonable investment-backed expectations, for, by the time of the MPPAA's enactment, "[p]rudent employers . . . had more than sufficient notice not only that pension plans were currently regulated, but also that withdrawal itself might trigger additional financial obligations." For those reasons, the Court determined that "fairness and justice" did not require anyone, other than the withdrawing employers and the remaining parties to the pension agreements, to bear the burden of funding employees' vested benefits.[360]

[J128] The Court once more faced challenges to the MPPAA under the Due Process and Takings Clauses in Concrete Pipe. There, the Court first rejected the employer's substantive due process challenge. Since the withdrawing employer's liability to the plan was based on the proportion of the plan's contributions (and coincident service credits) provided by the employer during the employer's participation in the plan, the imposition of withdrawal liability was clearly rational. Further, relying on Connolly, the Court rejected petitioner's takings claim. In doing so, it noted, inter alia, that, although the employer's liability under the MPPAA exceeded ERISA's original cap on withdrawal liability, there was "no reasonable basis to expect that [ERISA's] legislative ceiling would never be lifted."[361]

[J129] In Eastern Enterprises, the Court considered a challenge under the Due Process and Takings Clauses to the Coal Industry Retiree Health Benefit Act of 1992 (Coal Act), which established a mechanism for funding health care benefits for retirees from the coal industry and their dependents. In 1946, a labor agreement between coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America (UMWA) led to the creation of benefit funds that provided for the medical expenses of miners and their dependents, with the precise benefits determined by UMWA-appointed trustees. Those trusts served as the model for the United Mine Workers of America Welfare and Retirement Fund (1947 W&R Fund), which was established by the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1947 (1947 NBCWA). The Fund used proceeds of a royalty on coal production to provide benefits to miners and their families, and trustees determined benefit levels and other matters. The 1950 NBCWA created a new fund (1950 W&R Fund), which used a fixed amount of royalties for benefits, gave trustees the authority to establish and adjust benefit levels so as to remain within the budgetary restraints, and did not guarantee lifetime health benefits for retirees and their dependents. The 1950 W&R Fund continued to operate with benefit levels subject to revision until the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) introduced specific funding and vesting requirements for pension plans. To comply with ERISA, the UMWA and the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association entered into the 1974 NBCWA, which created four new trusts. It was the first agreement to expressly establish health benefits for retirees, but it did not alter the employers' obligation to contribute a fixed amount of royalties, nor did it extend employers' liability beyond the life of the agreement. Miners who retired before 1976 were covered by the 1950 Benefit Plan and Trust (1950 Benefit Plan), and those retiring after 1975 were covered by the 1974 Benefit Plan and Trust (1974 Benefit Plan).

---

[360] Connolly v. Pension Benefit Guar. Corp., 475 U.S. 211, 222–27 (1986).

[361] Concrete Pipe & Prods. of California, Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Trust for S. California, 508 U.S. 602, 636–47 (1993).

The increase in benefits and other factors—the decline in coal production, the retirement of a generation of miners, and rapid acceleration in health care costs—quickly caused financial problems for the 1950 and 1974 Benefit Plans. To ensure the Plans' solvency, the 1978 NBCWA obligated signatories to make sufficient contributions to maintain benefits as long as they were in the coal business. As the Plans continued to suffer financially, employers began to withdraw, leaving the remaining signatories to absorb the increasing cost of covering retirees left behind. Ultimately, Congress passed the Coal Industry Retiree Health Benefit Act of 1992 (Coal Act) to stabilize funding and provide for benefits to retirees by merging the 1950 and 1974 Benefit Plans into a new fund (Combined Fund) that provided substantially the same benefits as provided by the 1950 and 1974 Plans and was funded by premiums assessed against coal operators that had signed any NBCWA or other agreement requiring contributions to the 1950 or 1974 Benefit Plans. The Court decided that it was unconstitutional for Congress to require Eastern Enterprises to pay the health care costs of retired miners who worked for Eastern before 1965, when Eastern stopped mining coal. A four-Justice plurality found that the Coal Act's allocation of liability to Eastern violated the Takings Clause. The plurality noted that legislation may be unconstitutional "if it imposes severe retroactive liability on a limited class of parties that could not have anticipated the liability, and if the extent of that liability is substantially disproportionate to the parties' experience." The Coal Act's allocation scheme, as applied to Eastern, presented such a case. As to the economic impact, Eastern's Coal Act liability was substantial, and the company was clearly deprived of the $50 to $100 million it should pay to the Combined Fund. Moreover, Eastern's statutory liability for multi-employer plan benefits should reflect some proportionality to its experience with the plan. Eastern had contributed to the 1947 and 1950 W&R Funds, but it had ceased its coal mining operations in 1965 and had neither participated in negotiations nor agreed to make contributions in connection with the Benefit Plans established under the 1974, 1978, or subsequent NBCWAs. It was the latter agreements, however, that first suggested an industry commitment to funding lifetime health benefits for retirees and their dependents. During the years that Eastern employed miners, such benefits were far less extensive than under the 1974 NBCWA, were unvested, and were fully subject to alteration or termination. For similar reasons, the Coal Act substantially interfered with Eastern's reasonable investment-backed expectations. It operated retroactively, reaching back 30 to 50 years to impose liability based on Eastern's activities between 1946 and 1965. Thus, the Coal Act's scheme for allocating Combined Fund premiums was "not calibrated either to Eastern's past actions or to any agreement—implicit or otherwise—by the company. Nor would the pattern of the Federal Government's involvement in the coal industry have given Eastern 'sufficient notice' that lifetime health benefits might be guaranteed to retirees several decades later." Although, under Turner Elkhorn, Eastern might be responsible for employment-related health problems of all former employees, whether or not the cost was foreseen at the time of employment, there was no such connection in that case. Since the Coal Act "single[d] out certain employers to bear a burden that [wa]s substantial in amount, based on the employers' conduct far in the past, and unrelated to any commitment that the employers [had] made or to any injury they [had] caused, the [challenged] governmental action implicate[d] fundamental principles of fairness underlying the Takings Clause."[362] Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment, concluding, on similar grounds, [362] E. Enters. v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498, 528–37 (1998), (opinion of Justice O'Connor, in which Rehnquist, C.J., and Scalia, and Thomas, JJ., joined).

that application of the Coal Act to Eastern would violate the Due Process Clause.[363] The four dissenters agreed with Justice Kennedy that the Takings Clause did not apply, because the case did not implicate a "specific interest in physical or intellectual property" but held that the statute was not repugnant to the Due Process Clause.[364]

[J130] In 1980, the Michigan legislature raised maximum weekly workers' compensation benefits and provided an annual supplemental adjustment to workers injured before 1980. The following year, it enacted a statute allowing employers to decrease workers' compensation benefits to those disabled employees eligible to receive wage-loss compensation from other employer-funded sources. Some employers, including General Motors, took the position that the 1981 law's "benefit coordination" provision allowed them to reduce workers' compensation benefits to workers injured before the statute's effective date, who were receiving benefits from other sources. The state supreme court ultimately accepted this interpretation. In 1987, the Michigan legislature enacted a statute that had the effect of requiring General Motors to repay workers' compensation benefits it had withheld in reliance on a 1981 workers' compensation statute. The purpose of this statute was to correct the unexpected results of the Michigan supreme court's opinion. "The retroactive repayment provision of the 1987 statute was a rational means of meeting this legitimate objective: it preserved the delicate legislative compromise that had been struck by the 1980–1981 laws—giving workers injured before 1982 their full benefits without coordination, but not the greater increases given to subsequently injured workers. Also, it equalized the payments made by employers who had gambled on the [state supreme court's] decision with those made by employers who had not." Under these considerations, the Court held that the 1987 statute did not violate the Due Process Clause.[365]

8. Limitations on Fiscal Powers[366]

[J131] "A tax, in the general understanding of the term, and as used in the Constitution, signifies an exaction for the support of the Government."[367] Congress may spend money in aid of the "general welfare" (Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution). In drawing the line between what is "general" welfare, and what is particular, the determination of Congress must be respected by the courts, unless it is "clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment." Moreover, the concept of "general

---

[363] Id. at 539–50.

[364] Id. at 553–67 (dissenting opinion of Justice Breyer, in which Stevens, Ginsburg, and Souter, JJ., joined). The dissenters reasoned that (1) for many years, Eastern benefited from the labor of miners; (2) Eastern helped to create conditions that led the miners to expect continued health care benefits for themselves and their families after they retired; (3) Eastern, until 1987, continued to draw sizable profits from the coal industry though a wholly owned subsidiary.

[365] Gen. Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 191 (1992).

[366] See also paras. J119 et seq. (retroactive taxation); paras. J140 et seq. (Dormant Commerce Clause); paras. K181 et seq. (Equal Protection Clause); paras. I8, I9, I18, I229, I230 (freedom of speech); paras. I276 et seq. (taxation of the press); paras. H48 et seq. (free exercise of religion); paras. H105 et seq. (establishment of religion).

[367] United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 61 (1936). If an exaction is clearly a penalty for an unlawful act, it cannot be converted into a tax by calling it such. See United States v. La Franca, 282 U.S. 568, 572 (1931). See, in extenso, para. E12.

welfare" is not static but adapts itself to the necessities of the times.[368] Similarly, under the Fourteenth Amendment, "state taxing power can be exerted only to effect a public purpose, and does not embrace the raising of revenue for private purposes. . . . [However,] the requirements of due process leave free scope for the exercise of a wide legislative discretion in determining what expenditures will serve the public interest."[369] The requirement that a tax shall be for a public purpose "has regard to the use to be made of the revenue derived from the tax, and not to any ulterior motive or purpose which may have influenced the Legislature in passing the tax statute. And a tax designed to be expended for a public purpose does not cease to be one levied for that purpose because it has the effect of imposing a burden upon one class of business enterprises in such a way as to benefit another class."[370] [J132] "[T]he appropriate level or rate of taxation is essentially a matter for legislative, and not judicial, resolution."[371] In this context, the Due Process Clause is applicable to a taxing statute if the act is "so arbitrary as to compel the conclusion that it does not involve an exertion of the taxing power, but constitutes, in substance and effect, the direct exertion of a different and forbidden power, as, for example, the confiscation of property. . . . Collateral purposes or motives of a Legislature in levying a tax of a kind within the reach of its lawful power are matters beyond the scope of judicial inquiry. . . . Nor may a tax within the lawful power of a state be judicially stricken down under the Due Process Clause simply because its enforcement may or will result in restricting or even destroying particular occupations or businesses, . . . unless . . . its necessary interpretation and effect be such as plainly to demonstrate that the form of taxation was adopted as a mere disguise, under which there was exercised, in reality, another and different power denied by the Federal Constitution to the state."[372] A tax statute does not lose its character as a tax or revenue-raising measure, and may not be invalidated as too burdensome under the Due Process Clause, merely because "the taxing authority, directly or through an instrumentality enjoying various forms of tax exemption, competes with the taxpayer in a manner thought to be unfair by the judiciary. This approach would demand not only that the judiciary undertake to separate those taxes that are too burdensome from those that are not, but also would require judicial oversight of the terms and circumstances under which the government or its tax-exempt instrumentalities may undertake to compete with the private sector."[373] "Moreover, there is

---

368 See Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619, 640–41 (1937).

369 Carmichael v. S. Coal Co., 301 U.S. 495, 514 (1937).

370 Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U.S. 40, 43 (1934).

371 Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana, 453 U.S. 609, 627 (1981).

372 Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U.S. 40, 44–45 (1934). In that case, the Court sustained against due process attack a state excise tax of 1 cent per pound on all butter substitutes sold in the state, although the tax might result in destroying the intra-state business of appellant. See also Alaska Fish Salting & By-Products Co. v. Smith, 255 U.S. 44, 48–49 (1921), where the Court said: "Even if the tax should destroy a business, it would not be made invalid or require compensation upon that ground alone. Those who enter upon a business take that risk. . . . We know of no objection to exacting a discouraging rate as the alternative to giving up a business, when the legislature has the full power of taxation."

373 City of Pittsburgh v. Alco Parking Corp., 417 U.S. 369, 376–77 (1974). There, the Court sustained a city ordinance imposing an increased 20-percent tax on the gross receipts from parking or storing automobiles at non-residential parking places. In doing so, the Court rejected the proposition that the tax was so unreasonably high and burdensome that, in the context of no requirement under the Due Process Clause that the amount of general revenue taxes collected from a particular activity must be reasonably related to the value of the services provided to the activity."[374]

[J133] The Due Process Clause "requires some definite link, some minimum connection, between a state and the person, property or transaction it seeks to tax."[375] However, it requires no physical presence in a state for the imposition of duty to collect a use tax; "if a foreign corporation purposefully avails itself of the benefits of an economic market in a State, it may subject itself to the State's" taxing power.[376] Hence, the Due Process Clause does not preclude a state from requiring an out-of-state mail-order house, with neither outlets nor sales representatives in the state, to collect and pay a use tax on goods purchased for use in the state. "Such a corporation clearly has fair warning that its activity may subject it to the jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign."[377]

[J134] Moreover, the Due Process Clause requires that "the income attributed to the State for tax purposes must be rationally related to values connected with the taxing State."[378] "[T]he proper inquiry looks to 'the underlying unity or diversity of business enterprise,' . . . not to whether the non-domiciliary parent derives some economic benefit—as it virtually always will—from its ownership of stock in another corporation."[379] "Because of the complications and uncertainties in allocating the income of multi-state businesses to the several States, [the Court] permit[s] States to tax a corporation on an apportionable share of the multi-state business carried on in part in the taxing State."[380] That is the unitary business principle. The unitary business rule "is a recognition of two imperatives: the States' wide authority to devise formulae for an accurate assessment of a corporation's intra-state value or income and the necessary limit on the States' authority to tax value or income which cannot in fairness be attributed to the taxpayer's activities within the State."[381] "A State may tax a proportionate share of the income of a competition from public lots operated by the city parking authority, which enjoyed certain tax exemptions and other advantages, the ordinance was contrary to the Due Process Clause. The parking tax ordinance recited that "[n]on-residential parking places for motor vehicles, by reason of the frequency rate of their use, the changing intensity of their use at various hours of the day, their location, their relationship to traffic congestion and other characteristics, present problems requiring municipal services and affect the public interest, differently from parking places accessory to the use and occupancy of residences." The Court concluded that "[b]y enacting the tax, the city insisted that those providing and utilizing non-residential parking facilities should pay more taxes to compensate the city for the problems incident to off-street parking. The city was constitutionally entitled to put the automobile parker to the choice of using other transportation or paying the increased tax." Id. at 378–79.

---

374 Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana, 453 U.S. 609, 622 (1981).

375 Miller Bros. Co. v. Maryland, 347 U.S. 340, 344–45 (1954).

376 Quill Corp. v. N. Dakota, 504 U.S. 298, 307 (1992).

377 Id. at 308. However, the Commerce Clause requires a taxpayer's "physical presence" in the taxing jurisdiction before that jurisdiction can constitutionally impose a sales or use tax. Id. at 317–18. See also para. J142, n.420.

378 Moorman Mfg. Co. v. Bair, 437 U.S. 267, 273 (1978).

379 F.W. Woolworth Co. v. Taxation and Revenue Dep't of New Mexico, 458 U.S. 354, 363–64 (1982), quoting Mobil Oil Corp. v. Comm'r of Taxes of Vermont, 445 U.S. 425, 440 (1980).

380 Allied-Signal, Inc. v. Dir., Div. of Taxation, 504 U.S. 768, 778 (1992).

381 Id. at 780.

non-domiciliary corporation that carries out a particular business both inside and outside that State. . . . The State, however, may not tax income received by a corporation from an 'unrelated business activity' which constitutes a 'discrete business enterprise.'"[382]

---

[382] Hunt-Wesson, Inc. v. Franchise Tax Bd. of California, 528 U.S. 458, 460 (2000), quoting Allied-Signal, Inc. v. Dir., Div. of Taxation, 504 U.S. 768, 773 (1992). "[T]his 'nonunitary' income may not constitutionally be taxed by a State other than the corporation's domicile, unless there is some other connection between the taxing state and the income." See Hunt-Wesson, supra, at 464.

On the determination whether a business is "unitary," see Barclays Bank PLC v. Franchise Tax Board of California, 512 U.S. 298, 304, n.1 (1994), citing Allied-Signal, supra, at 781–82 ("business may be treated as unitary, compatibly with constitutional limitations, if it exhibits functional integration, centralization of management, and economies of scale") (emphasis added); Edison California Stores, Inc. v. McColgan, 30 Cal.2d 472, 481, 183 P.2d 16, 21 (1947) ("If the operation of the portion of the business done within the state is dependent upon or contributes to the operation of the business without the state, the operations are unitary."); Butler Bros. v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 664, 678, 111 P.2d 334, 341 (1941), aff'd, 315 U.S. 501 (1942) (A business is unitary if there is "unity of ownership; unity of operation as evidenced by central purchasing, advertising, accounting and management divisions; and unity of use of its centralized executive force and general system of operation."). "[A] unitary business may exist without a flow of goods between the parent and subsidiary if, instead, there is a flow of value between the entities." See Allied-Signal, supra, at 783, citing Container Corp. of Am. v. Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. 159, 178 (1983).

In ASARCO Inc. v. Idaho State Tax Commission, 458 U.S. 307 (1982), and F.W. Woolworth Co. v. Taxation and Revenue Department of New Mexico, 458 U.S. 354 (1982), the Court struck down a state attempt to include in the apportionable tax base income not derived from the unitary business. In those cases the states sought to tax unrelated business activity.

The principal question in ASARCO concerned Idaho's attempt to include in the apportionable tax base of ASARCO certain dividends received from, among other companies, the Southern Peru Copper Corporation. ASARCO was one of four of Southern Peru's shareholders, owning 51.5 percent of its stock. Under an agreement with the other shareholders, ASARCO was prevented from dominating Southern Peru's board of directors. ASARCO had the right to appoint six of Southern Peru's 13 directors, while eight votes were required for the passage of any resolution. Southern Peru was in the business of producing unrefined copper (a non-ferrous ore), some of which it sold to its shareholders. ASARCO purchased approximately 35 percent of Southern Peru's output, at average representative trade prices quoted in a trade publication and over which neither Southern Peru nor ASARCO had any control. The Court concluded that ASARCO's Idaho silver mining and Southern Peru's autonomous business were insufficiently connected to permit the two companies to be classified as a unitary business. See Allied-Signal, Inc. v. Dir., Div. of Taxation, 504 U.S. 768, 780–81 (1992), discussing ASARCO Inc. v. Idaho State Tax Comm'n, 458 U.S. 307 (1982).

In Woolworth, the taxpayer company was domiciled in New York and operated a chain of retail variety stores in the United States. In the company's apportionable state tax base, New Mexico sought to include earnings from four subsidiaries operating in foreign countries. The subsidiaries also engaged in chain-store retailing. The Court "observed that, although the parent company had the potential to operate the subsidiaries as integrated divisions of a single unitary business, that potential was not significant if the subsidiaries in fact comprise discrete business operations." See Allied-Signal, Inc. v. Dir., Div. of Taxation, 504 U.S. 768, 780–81 (1992), discussing Woolworth. The Court inquired whether any of the three objective indicia of a unitary business were present. The Court found that, "except for the type of occasional oversight—with respect to capital structure, major debt, and dividends—that any parent gives to an investment in a subsidiary," none of these factors was present. The subsidiaries were found not to be part [J135] The Sixteenth Amendment, ratified in 1913, states: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration." "While it is true that economic gain is not always taxable as income, it is settled that the realization of gain need not be in cash derived from the sale of an asset. Gain may occur as a result of exchange of property, payment of the taxpayer's indebtedness, relief from a liability, or other profit realized from the completion of a transaction."[383] Indeed, the Court "has recognized that 'income' may be realized by a variety of indirect means."[384] For example, payment of an employee's income taxes by an employer constitutes income to the employee.[385] Noting that "the substance, not the form, of the agreed transaction controls,"[386] Diedrich held that "a donor who makes a gift of property on condition that the donee pay the resulting gift taxes realizes taxable income to the extent that the gift taxes paid by the donee exceed the donor's adjusted basis in the property."[387]

[J136] The Uniformity Clause conditions Congress' power to impose indirect taxes. It provides that "all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" (Article I, Section 8, Clause 1 of the Constitution). The general purpose of the Clause was to limit the exercise of the federal power over commerce to the disadvantage of particular states.[388] The Court has held that a "tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found."[389] The

---

of a unitary business. See F.W. Woolworth Co. v. Taxation and Revenue Dep't of New Mexico, 458 U.S. 354, 369 (1982).

In Container Corporation of America v. Franchise Tax Board, 463 U.S. 159 (1983), the taxpayer was a vertically integrated corporation that manufactured custom-ordered paperboard packaging. California sought to tax income it received from its wholly owned and mostly owned foreign subsidiaries, each of which was in the same business as the parent. The foreign subsidiaries were given a fair degree of autonomy: they purchased only 1 percent of their materials from the parent, and personnel transfers from the parent to the subsidiaries were rare. The Court recognized, however: "In certain respects, the relationship between appellant and its subsidiaries was decidedly close. For example, approximately half of the subsidiaries' long-term debt was either held directly, or guaranteed, by appellant. Appellant also provided advice and consultation regarding manufacturing techniques, engineering, design, architecture, insurance, and cost accounting to a number of its subsidiaries, either by entering into technical service agreements with them or by informal arrangement. Finally, appellant occasionally assisted its subsidiaries in their procurement of equipment, either by selling them used equipment of its own or by employing its own purchasing department to act as an agent for the subsidiaries." Based on these facts, the Court found that the taxpayer had not met its burden of showing by "clear and cogent evidence" that the state sought to tax extra-territorial values. Id. at 171–75.

383 Helvering v. Bruun, 309 U.S. 461, 469 (1940).

384 Diedrich v. Comm'r, 457 U.S. 191, 195 (1982).

385 See Old Colony Trust Co. v. Comm'r, 279 U.S. 716, 729 (1929).

386 Diedrich v. Comm'r, 457 U.S. 191, 195 (1982).

387 Id. at 199–200.

388 See United States v. Ptasynski, 462 U.S. 74, 81 (1983).

389 Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 594 (1884). In that case, the Court recognized that, in imposing a head tax on persons coming into the country, Congress could choose to tax those persons, who immigrated through the ports, but not those who immigrated at inland cities. As the Court explained, "the evil to be remedied by this legislation has no existence on our inland borders, and immigration in that quarter needed no such regulation." The tax applied to all ports alike, and the Court concluded that "there is substantial uniformity within the meaning and purpose of the Constitution." Id. at 595.

Clause does not prevent Congress "from defining the subject of a tax by drawing distinctions between similar classes."[390] Moreover, the Clause does not preclude "all geographically defined classifications. . . . The Uniformity Clause gives Congress wide latitude in deciding what to tax and does not prohibit it from considering geographically isolated problems. . . . But where Congress does choose to frame a tax in geographic terms, the Court will examine the classification closely to see if there is actual geographic discrimination."[391]

9. The Commerce Clause

a. Federal Commerce Power

[J137] The Constitution delegates to Congress the power "to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" (Article I, Section 8, Clause 3). The commerce power "is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, . . . is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution. . . . [But it does not concern that commerce,] which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States."[392]

[J138] In United States v. Lopez, the Court has identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate under its commerce power. "First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce."[393] "Second, Congress is empowered

---

Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 83–106 (1900), represents the Court's most detailed consideration of the Uniformity Clause. The issue in Knowlton presented a variation on the question addressed in the Head Money Cases. Rather than distinguishing between port and inland cities, the statute at issue in Knowlton imposed a progressive tax on legacies and varied the rate of the tax among classes of legatees. The argument was that Congress could not distinguish among legacies or people receiving them; it was required to tax all legacies at the same rate or none. In rejecting this argument, the Court reaffirmed its conclusion in the Head Money Cases that Congress may distinguish between similar classes in selecting the subject of a tax.

390 United States v. Ptasynski, 462 U.S. 74, 82 (1983).

391 Id. at 84–85. That case involved a provision of The Crude Oil Windfall Profit Tax Act of 1980 that exempted from the tax imposed by the Act domestic crude oil produced from wells located north of the Arctic Circle or on the northerly side of the divide of the Alaska-Aleutian Range and at least 75 miles from the nearest point on the Trans-Alaska Pipeline system. Noting that nothing in the Act's legislative history suggested that Congress intended to grant Alaska an undue preference at the expense of other oil-producing states, and that there was ample evidence of the disproportionate costs and difficulties—the fragile ecology, the harsh environment, and the remote location—associated with extracting oil from Alaska, the Court held that Congress could not be faulted for determining, based on neutral factors, that "exempt Alaskan oil" required separate favorable treatment. Such determination reflected "Congress' considered judgment that unique climatic and geographic conditions require[d] that oil produced from this exempt area be treated as a separate class of oil. . . . Accordingly, Congress chose to exempt oil produced in the defined region from the windfall profit tax. It determined that imposing such a tax would discourage exploration and development of reservoirs in areas of extreme climatic conditions.'" Id. at 78–79.

392 Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 194–96 (1824).

393 United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 558 (1995), citing Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 256 (1964) ("The authority of Congress to keep the channels of to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities."[394] "Finally, Congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce,"[395] even if they "may not be regarded as commerce,"[396] i.e., "those activities that exert a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce."[397] When Congress has determined that an activity affects inter-state commerce, the courts need inquire only whether the finding is rational. "This established, the only remaining question for judicial inquiry is whether the means chosen by Congress are reasonably adapted to the end permitted by the Constitution. . . . The judicial task is at an end once the court determines that Congress acted rationally in adopting a particular regulatory scheme."[398] interstate commerce free from immoral and injurious uses has been frequently sustained, and is no longer open to question.").

---

394 United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 558 (1995), citing S. Ry. Co. v. United States, 222 U.S. 20 (1911) (upholding amendments to Safety Appliance Act, as applied to vehicles used in intra-state commerce, which aimed to avoid danger to persons and property moving in interstate commerce).

395 United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 558–59 (1995).

396 Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 125 (1942).

397 Id. (emphasis added). "[T]he scope of the interstate commerce power 'must be considered in the light of the dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon inter-state commerce so indirect and remote that to embrace them, in view of the complexity of the modern society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government.'" See United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 557 (1995), quoting Nat'l Labor Relations Bd. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 37 (1937) (emphasis added). Congress therefore may not "regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on the conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce." See United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 608, 617 (2000).

398 Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 276 (1981). See also Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 22 (2005) (in assessing the scope of Congress' Commerce Clause authority, the Court need not determine whether the activities at issue, "taken in the aggregate, substantially affect interstate commerce in fact, but only whether a 'rational basis' exists for so concluding").

In this context, the Court has "never required Congress to legislate with scientific exactitude. When Congress decides that the 'total incidence' of a practice poses a threat to a national market, it may regulate the entire class." See Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 17 (2005), citing Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 154–55 (1971), quoting, in turn, Westfall v. United States, 274 U.S. 256, 259 (1927) ("[W]hen it is necessary in order to prevent an evil to make the law embrace more than the precise thing to be prevented it may do so."). In this vein, the Court has not declared "that Congress may use a relatively trivial impact on commerce as an excuse for broad general regulation of state or private activities. . . . [t]he Court has said only that where a general regulatory statute bears a substantial relation to commerce, the de minimis character of individual instances arising under that statute is of no consequence." See Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 196, n.27 (1968).

Not-for-profit institutions are subject to laws regulating commerce. In Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U.S. 103 (1937), for example, the Court held the National Labor Relations Act, as applied to the Associated Press' (A.P.) newsgathering activities, to be an enactment entirely within Congress' Commerce Clause power, despite the fact that the A.P. did not sell news and did not operate for a profit. Noting that the A.P.'s activities "involve[d] the constant use of channels of interstate and foreign communication," the Court concluded that its operations "amount[ed] to commercial intercourse, and such intercourse was commerce within the meaning of the Constitution." Id. at 128–129.

[J139] The Court has upheld a wide variety of congressional Acts regulating intra-state economic activity where it has concluded that the activity substantially affected inter-state commerce. Examples include the regulation of intra-state coal mining;[399] intra-state extortionate credit transactions;[400] restaurants utilizing substantial inter-state supplies,[401] inns and hotels catering to inter-state guests;[402] production and consumption of home-grown wheat;[403] and local cultivation and use of marijuana in compliance with state law.[404] However, congressional authority under the Commerce Clause cannot be converted "to a general police power of the sort retained by the States."[405] A federal law making it an offense "for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone" exceeds the authority of Congress to regulate inter-state commerce, for it "neither regulates a commercial activity nor contains a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce."[406] Similarly, the Commerce Clause does not give Congress the authority to enact a statute providing a federal civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence.[407]

Likewise, in Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison, 520 U.S. 564, 573 (1997), the Court held that, even though petitioner's church camp for children did not make a profit, it was "unquestionably engaged in commerce, not only as a purchaser, . . . but also as a provider of goods and services."

399 Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, 452 U.S. 264, 275–83 (1981).

400 Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 155–56 (1971).

401 Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 299–301 (1964).

402 Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 252–53 (1964).

403 Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 128 (1942).

404 Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 22 (2005). There, "[g]iven the enforcement difficulties that attend distinguishing between marijuana cultivated locally and marijuana grown elsewhere, and concerns about diversion into illicit channels, [the Court had] no difficulty concluding that Congress had a rational basis for believing that failure to regulate the intra-state manufacture and possession of marijuana would leave a gaping hole in" the Controlled Substances Act.

405 United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 567 (1995).

406 Id. at 551. The Court also observed that the link between gun possession and a substantial effect on inter-state commerce was attenuated. The United States argued that the possession of guns may lead to violent crime, and that violent crime "can be expected to affect the functioning of the national economy in two ways. First, the costs of violent crime are substantial, and, through the mechanism of insurance, those costs are spread throughout the population. Second, violent crime reduces the willingness of individuals to travel to areas within the country that are perceived to be unsafe." The government also argued that the presence of guns at schools poses a threat to the educational process, which, in turn, threatens to produce a less efficient and productive workforce, which will negatively affect national productivity and thus inter-state commerce. The Court rejected these "costs of crime" and "national productivity" arguments, because they would permit Congress to "regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to inter-state commerce." Id. at 564. The Court noted that, under this reasoning "Congress could regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens: family law (including marriage, divorce, and child custody), for example. Under these theories . . . , it is difficult to perceive any limitation on federal power, even in areas such as criminal law enforcement or education where States historically have been sovereign." Id. at 564.

407 United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 608–19 (2000). Congress "has the power to authorize state regulations that burden or discriminate against interstate commerce, . . . but [the Court] will not assume that it has done so unless such an intent is clearly expressed." See Hillside Dairy Inc. v. Lyons, 539 U.S. 59, 66 (2003).

b. Restrictions on State Regulatory Powers

[J140] The constitutional provision of power "to regulate Commerce . . . among the several States" has also been seen as a limitation on state regulatory powers, even without implementing legislation by Congress. In its negative aspect, the Commerce Clause prohibits "economic protectionism—that is, regulatory measures designed to benefit in-state economic interests by burdening out-of-state competitors."[408] This reading effectuates the Framers' purpose to prevent a state "from retreating into economic isolation or jeopardizing the welfare of the Nation as a whole, as it would do if it were free to place burdens on the flow of commerce across its borders that commerce wholly within those borders would not bear."[409] Hence, the dormant Commerce Clause prevents "state taxes and regulatory measures impeding free private trade in the national marketplace."[410]

[J141] The Court has generally distinguished between two types of impermissible state regulations under the Commerce Clause. "[W]here the statute regulates evenhandedly to effectuate a legitimate local public interest, and its effects on interstate commerce are only incidental, it will be upheld unless the burden imposed on such commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits."[411] Where, however, "a state statute clearly discriminates against interstate commerce,"[412] "either on its face or in prac-

---

[408] Associated Indus. of Missouri v. Lohman, 511 U.S. 641, 647 (1994) (emphasis added). "It is not a purpose of the Commerce Clause to protect state residents from their own state taxes." See Goldberg v. Sweet, 488 U.S. 252, 266 (1989).

[409] Oklahoma Tax Comm'n v. Jefferson Lines, Inc. 514 U.S. 175, 180 (1993). See also Hunt v. Washington State Apple Adver. Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 350 (1977), referring to the Commerce Clause's overriding requirement of a national "common market."

[410] Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429, 437 (1980). "[I]f a State is acting as a market participant, rather than as a market regulator, the dormant Commerce Clause places no limitation on its activities." See S.-Cent. Timber Dev., Inc. v. Wunnicke, 467 U.S. 82, 93 (1984).

From 1919 until 1933, the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution totally prohibited "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors" in the United States and its territories. Section 1 of the Twenty-first Amendment repealed that prohibition, and Section 2 delegated to the states the power to prohibit commerce in, or the use of, alcoholic beverages. "The aim of the Twenty-first Amendment was to allow States to maintain an effective and uniform system for controlling liquor by regulating its transportation, importation, and use. The Amendment did not give States the authority to pass non-uniform laws in order to discriminate against out-of-state goods, a privilege they had not enjoyed at any earlier time." See Granholm v. Heald, 544 U.S. 460, 484–85 (2005) (per curiam), where the Court held that two state laws which allowed in-state wineries to sell wine directly to consumers in that state but prohibited out-of-state wineries from doing so, or, at the least, made direct sales impractical from an economic standpoint, violated the Commerce Clause and were neither authorized nor permitted by the Twenty-first Amendment.

[411] Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142 (1970). See also Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. v. New York State Liquor Auth., 476 U.S. 573, 579 (1986). Indeed, "the States retain authority under their general police powers to regulate matters of legitimate local concern, even though interstate commerce may be affected." See Lewis v. BT Inv. Managers, Inc., 447 U.S. 27, 36 (1980).

In Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona ex rel. Sullivan, 325 U.S. 761 (1945), the Court struck down a state statute limiting passenger trains to 14 cars and freight trains to 70 cars. In so doing, the Court noted that the statute afforded "at most slight and dubious advantage, if any" with respect to safety, and concluded that the state safety interest was "outweighed by the interest of the nation in an adequate, economical and efficient railway transportation service."

[412] Wyoming v. Oklahoma, 502 U.S. 437, 454 (1992).

tical effect,"[413] it will be struck down, unless "it serves a legitimate local purpose, [which] could not be served as well by available nondiscriminatory means."[414] Of course, there is no clear line separating these categories. "In either situation the critical consideration is the overall effect of the statute on both local and interstate activity."[415] "[F]acial discrimination invokes the strictest scrutiny of any purported legitimate local purpose and of the absence of nondiscriminatory alternatives."[416] "The burden to show discrimination rests on the party challenging the validity of the statute,[417] but, when discrimination against inter-state commerce is demonstrated, "the burden falls on the State to justify it both in terms of the local benefits flowing from the statute and the unavailability of nondiscriminatory alternatives adequate to preserve the local interests at stake."[418] "Furthermore, when considering the purpose of a challenged statute, th[e] Court is not bound by '[the name, description or characterization given it by the legislature or the courts of the State,' but will determine for itself the practical impact of the law."[419]

[J142] With respect to state taxes, the Court considers "not the formal language of the tax statute, but rather its practical effect, and sustains a state tax against Commerce Clause challenge when the tax is applied to an activity with a substantial nexus with the taxing State, is fairly apportioned, does not discriminate against interstate commerce, and is fairly related to the services provided by the State."[420] A discriminatory tax will

---

413 Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322, 337 (1979).

414 Maine v. Taylor, 477 U.S. 131, 138 (1986).

415 Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. v. New York State Liquor Auth., 476 U.S. 573, 579 (1986).

416 Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322, 337 (1979)

417 Id. at 336.

418 Hunt v. Washington Apple Adver. Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 353 (1977)

419 Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322, 336 (1979), quoting Lacoste v. Louisiana Dep't of Conservation, 263 U.S. 545, 550 (1924).

420 Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274, 279 (1977). In Baldwin v. G.A.F. Seelig, Inc., 294 U.S. 511 (1935), the state of New York attempted to protect its dairy farmers from the adverse effects of Vermont competition by establishing a single minimum price for all milk, whether produced in New York or elsewhere. The Court decided to strike it down, reasoning that "[n]either the power to tax nor the police power may be used by the state of destination with the aim and effect of establishing an economic barrier against competition with the products of another state or the labor of its residents. Restrictions so contrived are an unreasonable clog upon the mobility of commerce. They set up what is equivalent to a rampart of customs duties designed to neutralize advantages belonging to the place of origin." Id. at 527. "Thus, because the minimum price regulation had the same effect as a tariff or customs duty—neutralizing the advantage possessed by lower cost out-of-state producers—it was held unconstitutional." See W. Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy, 512 U.S. 186, 194 (1994), discussing Complete Auto Transit.

In a number of cases involving the application of state taxing statutes to out-of-state sellers, the Court has relied on both the Due Process Clause and the Commerce Clause. Although the two claims are closely related, the clauses pose distinct limits on the taxing powers of the States. The Due Process Clause and the Commerce Clause reflect different constitutional concerns. "Due process centrally concerns the fundamental fairness of governmental activity. Thus, at the most general level, the due process nexus analysis requires that [the Court] ask whether an individual's connections with a State are substantial enough to legitimate the State's exercise of power over him. [The Court has,] therefore, often identified 'notice' or 'fair warning' as the analytic touchstone of due process nexus analysis. In contrast, the Commerce Clause, and its nexus requirement, are informed not so much by concerns about fairness for the individual defendant as by structural concerns about the effects of state regulation on the national economy. . . . Thus, the 'substantial-nexus' requirement is not, like due process' 'minimum-connot be invalidated if the state shows that "it advances a legitimate local purpose, which cannot be adequately served by reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives."[421] The Court has also recognized, that "a facially discriminatory tax may still survive Commerce Clause scrutiny if it is a truly 'compensatory tax designed simply to make interstate commerce bear a burden already borne by intrastate commerce.'"[422] The Court's cases have distilled three conditions necessary for a valid compensatory tax. First, a state "must identacts' requirement, a proxy for notice, but rather a means for limiting state burdens on interstate commerce. Accordingly, . . . a corporation may have the 'minimum contacts' with a taxing State as required by the Due Process Clause, and yet lack the 'substantial nexus' with that State as required by the Commerce Clause." See Quill Corp. v. N. Dakota, 504 U.S. 298, 312–13, (1992). For example, while the Due Process Clause does not prohibit a state from imposing the duty of use tax collection and payment upon a seller whose only connection with the state is through common carrier or the United States mail, the Commerce Clause requires a taxpayer's "physical presence" in the taxing jurisdiction before that jurisdiction can constitutionally impose a use tax. See id. at 305–18.

---

When a court examines whether a state tax violates the Foreign Commerce Clause, "[i]n addition to answering the nexus, apportionment, and nondiscrimination questions posed in Complete Auto, a court must also inquire, first, whether the tax, notwithstanding apportionment, creates a substantial risk of international multiple taxation, and, second, whether the tax prevents the Federal Government from 'speak[ing] with one voice when regulating commercial relations with foreign governments.'" See Japan Line, Ltd. v. County of Los Angeles, 441 U.S. 434, 451 (1979). See also Container Corp. of Am. v. Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. 159 (1983).

421 See, e.g., New Energy Co. of Indiana v. Limbach, 486 U.S. 269, 278 (1988). "A pure subsidy funded out of general revenue ordinarily imposes no burden on interstate commerce, but merely assists local business." Nevertheless when a non-discriminatory state tax on products is coupled with a subsidy to local producers hurt by the tax, the State violates the cardinal principle that it may not "benefit in-state economic interests by burdening out-of-state competitors." See W. Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy, 512 U.S. 186, 199 (1994) (emphasis added).

Although "[d]irect subsidization of domestic industry does not ordinarily run afoul of the [dormant Commerce Clause,] discriminatory taxation of out-of-state manufacturers does." See New Energy Co. of Indiana v. Limbach, 486 U.S. 269, 278 (1988), where the Court found unconstitutional, under the Commerce Clause, an Ohio tax scheme that provided a sales tax credit for ethanol produced in state or manufactured in another state, to the extent that state gave similar tax advantages to ethanol produced in Ohio. Similarly, in Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison, 520 U.S. 564 (1997), the Court held that an otherwise generally applicable state property tax violates the Commerce Clause, if its exemption for property owned by charitable institutions excludes organizations operated principally for the benefit of non-residents.

In Great A&P Tea Co. v. Cottrell, 424 U.S. 366, 378–79 (1976), the Court struck down a Mississippi "reciprocity clause," holding that a "reciprocity" requirement cannot be justified as a response to another state's unreasonable burden on commerce. The regulation at issue in Cottrell permitted milk from out of state to be sold in Mississippi, only if the state of origin accepted Mississippi milk on a reciprocal basis. Mississippi put forward, among other arguments, the assertion that the reciprocity requirement was in effect a free-trade provision, advancing the identical national interest served by the Commerce Clause. In response, the Court said that "Mississippi may not use the threat of economic isolation as a weapon to force sister States to enter into even a desirable reciprocity agreement." In New Energy Co. of Indiana v. Limbach, 486 U.S. 269, 275 (1988), the Court made clear that it makes no difference for purposes of Commerce Clause analysis whether "the effect of a State's refusal to accept the offered reciprocity is not total elimination of all transport of the subject product into or out of the offering State, [or] the only effect of refusal is that the out-of-state product is placed at a substantial commercial disadvantage through discriminatory tax treatment."

422 Fulton Corp. v. Faulkner, 516 U.S. 325, 331 (1996), quoting Associated Indus. of Missouri v. Lohman, 511 U.S. 641, 647 (1994).

tify the intrastate tax for which it seeks to compensate, and . . . this intrastate tax must serve some purpose for which the State may otherwise impose a burden on interstate commerce."[423] "Second, 'the tax on interstate commerce must be shown roughly to approximate—but not exceed—the amount of the tax on intra-state commerce.'"[424] "Finally, the events on which the interstate and intrastate taxes are imposed must be 'substantially equivalent;' that is, they must be sufficiently similar in substance to serve as mutually exclusive prox[ies] for each other."[425]

[J143] "[A] charge designed only to make the user of state-provided facilities pay a reasonable fee to help defray the costs of their construction and maintenance may constitutionally be imposed on interstate and domestic users alike."[426] In Evansville, the Court held that the Commerce Clause does not prohibit states or municipalities from charging commercial airlines a "head tax" on passengers boarding flights at airports within the jurisdiction, to defray the costs of airport construction and maintenance. There, the Court stated: "At least so long as the toll is based on some fair approximation of use or privilege for use, . . . and is neither discriminatory against interstate commerce nor excessive in comparison with the governmental benefit conferred, it will pass constitutional muster, even though some other formula might reflect more exactly the relative use of the state facilities by individual users."[427] Hence, "a levy is reasonable under Evansville if it (1) is based on some fair approximation of use of the facilities; (2) is not excessive in relation to the benefits conferred; and (3) does not discriminate against interstate commerce."[428]

---

[423] Fulton Corp. v. Faulkner, 516 U.S. 325, 334 (1996).

[424] Id. at 332–33, quoting Oregon Waste Sys., Inc. v. Dep't of Envtl. Quality of Oregon, 511 U.S. 103 (1994).

[425] Fulton Corp. v. Faulkner, 516 U.S. 325, 333 (1996), quoting Oregon Waste Sys., Inc. v. Dep't of Envtl. Quality of Oregon, 511 U.S. 103 (1994). In Fulton, the Court struck down a state regime that taxed stock held by in-state shareholders only to the degree its issuing corporation participated in inter-state commerce.

In Henneford v. Silas Mason Co., 300 U.S. 577 (1937), the Court upheld the state of Washington's tax on the privilege of using any article of tangible personal property within the state. The statute exempted the use of any article that had already been subjected to a sales tax equal to the use tax or greater, so that the use tax effectively applied only to goods purchased out of state. Although the use tax was itself facially discriminatory, the Court held that the combined effect of the sales and use taxes was to subject intra-state and inter-state commerce to equivalent burdens.

[426] Evansville-Vanderburgh Airport Auth. Dist. v. Delta Airlines, Inc., 405 U.S. 707, 714 (1972).

[427] Id. at 716–17.

[428] See Nw. Airlines, Inc. v. County of Kent, 510 U.S. 355, 369 (1994).

The charges at issue in Evansville-Vanderburgh met those standards. First, the fees did not discriminate against inter-state commerce and travel. "While the vast majority of passengers who board[ed] flights at the airports involved [we]re traveling interstate, both interstate and intrastate flights [we]re subject to the same charges. Furthermore, there [wa]s no showing of any inherent difference between these two classes of flights, such that the application of the same fee to both would amount to discrimination against one or the other. . . . Second, the charges reflect[ed] a fair, if imperfect, approximation of the use of facilities for whose benefit they [we]re imposed." See Evansville-Vanderburgh Airport Auth. Dist. v. Delta Airlines, Inc., 405 U.S. 707, 717 (1972). The challenged measures exempted in whole or part non-passenger users and certain classes of passengers, such as active members of the military and temporary layovers, deplaning commercial passengers, and passengers on non-commercial flights, non-scheduled commercial flights, and commercial flights on light aircraft. Nevertheless, these exceptions were

10. The Bankruptcy Clause [429]

[J144] Article I, Section 8, Clause 4, of the United States Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to "establish . . . uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." Distinguishing a congressional exercise of power under not unreasonable. Third, the airlines did not show these fees to be excessive in relation to costs incurred by the taxing authorities. Id. at 718–19.

---

"Even if the revenues in any one year excee[d] the outlays, it would not follow that the charge is invalid as applied. . . . [T]he validity of the tax is determined by comparing total revenue with total outlays: i.e., a surplus of revenue over outlays in any one year can be off-set against actual deficits of past years, and perhaps against projected deficits of future years." See Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444, 470, n.25 (1978).

As the Court noted in Evansville-Vanderburgh Airport Authority District v. Delta Airlines, Inc., 405 U.S. 707, 715–16 (1972), its earlier decisions concerning highway tolls had established that the states are empowered to develop "uniform, fair and practical" standards for this type of fee. See, in particular, Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U.S. 610, 624 (1915). While the Court invalidated, as wholly unrelated to road use, a toll based on the carrier's seating capacity (see Interstate Transit, Inc. v. Lindsey, 283 U.S. 183 (1931); Sprout v. S. Bend, 277 U.S. 163 (1928)), and the amount of gasoline over 20 gallons in the carrier's gas tank (see McCarroll v. Dixie Greyhound Lines, Inc., 309 U.S. 176 (1940)), the Court sustained numerous tolls based on a variety of measures of actual use, including:

(1) horsepower (Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U.S. 610 (1915); Kane v. New Jersey, 242 U.S. 160 (1916));
(2) number and capacity of vehicles (Clark v. Poor, 274 U.S. 554 (1927));
(3) mileage within the state (Interstate Busses Corp. v. Blodgett, 276 U.S. 245 (1928));
(4) gross-ton mileage (Continental Baking Co. v. Woodring, 286 U.S. 352 (1932));
(5) carrying capacity (Hicklin v. Coney, 290 U.S. 169 (1933)); and
(6) manufacturer's rated capacity and weight of trailers (Dixie Ohio Express Co. v. State Revenue Comm'n, 306 U.S. 72 (1939)).

The Court had also held that a state may impose a flat fee for the privilege of using its roads, without regard to the actual use by particular vehicles, so long as the fee was not excessive (see Aero Mayflower Transit Co. v. Georgia Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 295 U.S. 285 (1935); Aero Mayflower Transit Co. v. Bd. of R.R. Comm'rs, 332 U.S. 495 (1947)). Nevertheless, this holding was overruled by American Trucking Associaions, Inc. v. Scheiner, 483 U.S. 266, 290–96 (1987), where the Court found that a flat tax on trucks for the privilege of using Pennsylvania's roads, which largely helped to raise revenue to improve and maintain the state's highways and bridges—thereby helping to cover costs likely to vary significantly with truck-miles traveled—discriminated against inter-state travel, by imposing a cost per mile upon out-of-state trucks far exceeding the cost per mile borne by local trucks that generally traveled more miles on Pennsylvania roads and did not even purport to approximate fairly the cost or value of the use of Pennsylvania's roads.

In American Trucking Associations, Inc. v. Michigan Public Service Commission, 545 U.S. 429, 434–37 (2005), the Court upheld a state's flat $100 annual fee imposed on trucks engaged in intra-state commercial hauling, since (1) the fee did not facially discriminate against inter-state or out-of-state activities or enterprises; (2) the record showed no special circumstances suggesting that the fee operated as anything other than an unobjectionable exercise of the state's police power; (3) the record showed that the flat assessment unfairly discriminated against inter-state truckers, because the costs the fee sought to defray, e.g., those of regulating vehicular size and weight, would seem more likely to vary per-truck or per-carrier than per-mile traveled, a per-truck, rather than a per-mile, assessment was likely fair; (4) petitioners provided no details of their preferred alternative miles-traveled system and failed to point to record evidence showing its practicality. In light of these considerations, the Court found no reason to infer that the state's lump-sum levy on purely local activity erected an impermissible discriminatory road block.

[429] See also para. J48.

the Commerce Clause from an exercise under the Bankruptcy Clause is admittedly not an easy task, for the two Clauses are closely related. Although the Court has noted that "[t]he subject of bankruptcies is incapable of final definition," it has defined "bankruptcy" as the "subject of the relations between an insolvent or nonpaying or fraudulent debtor and his creditors, extending to his and their relief."[430] Congress' power under the Bankruptcy Clause "extends to all cases where the law causes to be distributed the property of the debtor among his creditors. . . . [It] includes the power to discharge the debtor from his contracts and legal liabilities, as well as to distribute his property. The grant to Congress involves the power to impair the obligation of contracts, and this the states [a]re forbidden to do."[431]

[J145] "Unlike the Commerce Clause, the Bankruptcy Clause itself contains an affirmative limitation or restriction upon Congress' power: bankruptcy laws must be uniform throughout the United States. Such uniformity in the applicability of legislation is not required by the Commerce Clause."[432] "[T]he Bankruptcy Clause's uniformity requirement was drafted in order to prohibit Congress from enacting private bankruptcy laws" to relieve individual debtors.[433] This requirement "is not a straitjacket that forbids Congress to distinguish among classes of debtors, nor does it prohibit Congress from recognizing that state laws do not treat commercial transactions in a uniform manner. A bankruptcy law may be uniform and yet 'may recognize the laws of the State in certain particulars, although such recognition may lead to different results in different States.' . . . Thus, uniformity does not require the elimination of any differences among the States in their laws governing commercial transactions."[434] The uniformity requirement, moreover, permits Congress to treat "railroad bankruptcies as a distinctive and special problem," and "does not deny Congress power to take into account differences that exist between different parts of the country, and to fashion legislation to resolve geographically isolated problems."[435]

---

[430] Wright v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 304 U.S. 502, 513–14 (1938).

[431] Hanover Nat'l Bank v. Moyses, 186 U.S. 181, 186, 188 (1902).

[432] Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457, 468 (1982).

[433] Id. at 472.

[434] Id. at 469. There, the Court held that a statute designed to aid one bankrupt railroad violated the uniformity provision of the Bankruptcy Clause. The Court stated: "The conclusion is . . . inevitable that [the statute] is not a response either to the particular problems of major railroad bankruptcies or to any geographically isolated problem: it is a response to the problems caused by the bankruptcy of one railroad." Id. at 470.

[435] Reg'l R.R. Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 159 (1974) (3R Act Cases). In Reconstruction Finance Corp. v. Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Co., 328 U.S. 495 (1946), the Court sustained the a provision of the Bankruptcy Act authorizing a reorganization court to confirm a plan despite its rejection by creditors. The Court said: "[T]he provisions for confirmation by the courts over the creditors' objection are within the bankruptcy powers of Congress. Those powers are adequate to eliminate claims by administrative valuations with judicial review and they are adequate to require creditors to acquiesce in a fair adjustment of their claims, so long as the creditor gets all the value of his lien and his share of any free assets." Id. at 533. See also Regional Railroad Reorganization Act Cases, supra, at 152–55.

In the same context, the Court has held that bondholders "cannot be called upon to sacrifice their property so that a depression-proof railroad system might be created. But they invested their capital in a public utility that does owe an obligation to the public. . . . [B]y their entry into a railroad enterprise, [they] assumed the risk that, in any depression or any reorganization, the interests of the public would be considered, as well as theirs." See Reconstruction Finance Corp., supra, at 535–36.

11. The Patent and Copyright Clause [436]

[J146] The Patent and Copyright Clause of the Constitution, Article I, Section 8, Clause 8, empowers Congress "to promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries." "The monopoly privileges that Congress may authorize are neither unlimited nor primarily designed to provide a special private benefit. Rather, the limited grant is a means by which an important public purpose may be achieved. It is intended to motivate the creative activity of authors and inventors by the provision of a special reward, and to allow the public access to the products of their genius after the limited period of exclusive control has expired."[437]

[J147] As the text of the Constitution makes plain, "it is Congress that has been assigned the task of defining the scope of the limited monopoly that should be granted to authors or to inventors in order to give the public appropriate access to their work product."[438] "Within the limits of the constitutional grant, the Congress may, of course, implement the stated purpose of the Framers by selecting the policy which in its judgment best effectuates the constitutional aim."[439] "[T]his task involves a difficult balance between the interests of authors and inventors in the control and exploitation of their writings and discoveries on the one hand, and society's competing interest in the free flow of ideas, information, and commerce on the other hand."[440] Hence, in considering whether copyright and patent legislation is a rational exercise of the authority conferred by the Clause, courts should defer substantially to the judgment of Congress.[441]

"While the rights of the bondholders are entitled to respect, they do not command Procrustean measures. They certainly do not dictate that rail operations vital to the Nation be jettisoned despite the availability of a feasible alternative. The public interest is not merely a pawn to be sacrificed for the strategic purposes or protection of a class of security holders." See Penn Cent. Merger Cases, 389 U.S. 486, 510–11 (1968).

436 See also paras. I98–I100 (copyright legislation and freedom of expression); paras. J51–J52 (regulatory takings and trade secrets).

437 Sony Corp. of Am. v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 429 (1984). "[T]he Patent and Copyright Clauses do not, by their own force or by negative implication, deprive the States of the power to adopt rules for the promotion of intellectual creation within their own jurisdictions." See Bonito Boats, Inc. v. Thunder Craft Boats, Inc., 489 U.S. 141, 165 (1989), citing Goldstein v. California, 412 U.S. 546, 552–61 (1973). "Thus, where 'Congress determines that neither federal protection nor freedom from restraint is required by the national interest,' the States remain free to promote originality and creativity in their own domains." See Bonito Boats, Inc. v. Thunder Craft Boats, Inc., 489 U.S. 141, 165 (1989), quoting Goldstein v. California, 412 U.S. 546, 559 (1973).

438 Sony Corp. of Am. v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 429 (1984).

439 Graham v. John Deere Co. of Kansas City, 383 U.S. 1, 6 (1966).

440 Sony Corp. of Am. v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 429 (1984).

441 Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 212–13 (2003). There, the Court sustained the 1998 Copyright Term Extension Act (CTEA), which enlarged the duration of copyrights by 20 years and provided for application of the enlarged terms to existing and future copyrights alike. In so doing, the Court rejected the proposition that "extending the duration of existing copyrights is categorically beyond Congress' Copyright Clause authority." Id. at 204. Further, the Court decided that the CTEA was a rational exercise of the authority conferred by the Copyright Clause: in addition to international concerns (a 1993 European Union directive instructing EU members to establish a baseline copyright term of life plus 70 years and to deny this longer term to the works of any non-EU country whose laws did not secure the same extended term), [J148] "The sine qua non of copyright is originality, . . . [which] is a constitutional requirement."[442] "Original . . . means only that the work was independently created by the author (as opposed to copied from other works), and that it possesses at least some minimal degree of creativity. . . . To be sure, the requisite level of creativity is extremely low; even a slight amount will suffice. The vast majority of works make the grade quite easily, as they possess some creative spark, 'no matter how crude, humble or obvious' it might be. . . . Originality does not signify novelty; a work may be original even though it closely resembles other works, so long as the similarity is fortuitous, not the result of copying."[443]

[J149] "'No matter how much original authorship the work displays, the facts and ideas it exposes are free for the taking. The very same facts and ideas may be divorced from the context imposed by the author, and restated or reshuffled by second comers, even if the author was the first to discover the facts or to propose the ideas.' . . . It may seem unfair that much of the fruit of the compiler's labor may be used by others without compensation. . . . [However, this is] the essence of copyright, . . . and a constitutional requirement. The primary objective of copyright is not to reward the labor of authors, but 'to promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts.' . . . To this end, copyright assures authors the right to their original expression, but encourages others to build freely upon the ideas and information conveyed by a work. . . . This principle, known as the idea/expression or fact/expression dichotomy, applies to all works of authorship. As applied to a factual compilation, assuming the absence of original written expression, only the compiler's original selection and arrangement may be protected; the raw facts may be copied at will. This result is neither unfair nor unfortunate. It is the means by which copyright advances the progress of science and art."[444]

[J150] "The Congress in the exercise of the patent power may not overreach the restraints imposed by the stated . . . purpose [of Article I, Section 8, Clause 8, of the Constitution.] Nor may it enlarge the patent monopoly without regard to the innovation, advancement or social benefit gained thereby. Moreover, Congress may not authorize the issuance of patents whose effects are to remove existent knowledge from the public domain, or to restrict free access to materials already available. Innovation,

---

Congress passed the CTEA "in light of demographic, economic, and technological changes, . . . and rationally credited projections that longer terms would encourage copyright holders to invest in the restoration and public distribution of their works." Id. at 206–07.

"[T]he protection given to copyrights [or patents] is wholly statutory. . . . The remedies for infringement are only those prescribed by Congress. . . . In a case . . . in which Congress has not plainly marked the course to be followed by the judiciary, courts must be circumspect in construing the scope of rights created by a statute that never contemplated such a calculus of interests. . . . [Ambiguities in the law of copyright (or patent) are to be resolved in light of the basic purpose of the Copyright Clause, which is] 'to stimulate artistic and scientific creativity for the general public good.'" See Sony Corp. of Am. v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 431–32 429 (1984), quoting Twentieth Century Music Corp. v. Aiken, 422 U.S. 151, 156 (1975).

442 Feist Publ'ns, Inc. v. Rural Tel. Serv. Co., 499 U.S. 340, 345–46 (1991).

443 Id. at 345.

444 Id. at 349–350. In that case, the Court held that copyright protection is not available to typical telephone directory white pages. Noting that, "[a]s a constitutional matter, copyright protects only those constituent elements of a work that possess more than a de minimis quantum of creativity," the Court concluded that "Rural's white pages, limited to basic subscriber information and arranged alphabetically, [fe]ll short of the mark." Id. at 363.

advancement, and things which add to the sum of useful knowledge are inherent requisites in a patent system which, by constitutional command, must 'promote the Progress of . . . useful Arts.' This is the standard expressed in the Constitution, and it may not be ignored."[445] In Hotchkiss, the Court posited the condition that a patentable invention evidenced "more ingenuity and skill" than that "possessed by an ordinary mechanic acquainted with the business."[446]

[445] Graham v. John Deere Co., 383 U.S. 1, 5–6 (1966).

[446] Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. 248, 267 (1851). There, the patent involved a mere substitution of materials—porcelain or clay for wood or metal in doorknobs—and the Court condemned it.

CHAPTER 11

EQUAL PROTECTION

A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

[K1] The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution says: "Nor shall any state . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Although the Fifth Amendment, unlike the Fourteenth, does not contain an equal protection clause, "the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment contains an equal protection component prohibiting the United States from invidiously discriminating between individuals."[1] "Although both Amendments require the same type of analysis, . . . the two protections are not always coextensive. Not only does the language of the two Amendments differ, but more importantly, there may be overriding national interests which justify selective federal legislation that would be unacceptable for an individual State. On the other hand, when a federal rule is applicable to only a limited territory, such as the District of Columbia, or an insular possession, and when there is no special national interest involved, the Due Process Clause has the same significance as the Equal Protection Clause."[2]

[K2] The equal protection guarantee "creates no substantive rights. . . . Instead, it embodies a general rule that [government] must treat like cases alike but may treat unlike cases accordingly."[3] The equal protection guarantee "does not prohibit legislation merely because it is special, or limited in its application to a particular geographical or political subdivision of the state."[4] If a legislative classification neither burdens a fundamental right, such as the right to travel, nor is drawn upon inherently suspect distinctions,[5] such as race or religion, it is accorded a strong presumption of validity, and

---

[1] Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 239 (1976), citing Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954). "[T]he Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution protect persons, not groups." See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227 (1995).

[2] Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 100 (1976).

[3] Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793, 799 (1997).

[4] Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa, 439 U.S. 60, 70–71 (1978), quoting Fort Smith Light Co. v. Paving Dist., 274 U.S. 387, 391 (1927).

[5] In San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 28 (1973), the Court identified the "traditional indicia of suspectness:" whether a group has been "saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." (Emphasis added.)

In Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 216, n.14 (1982), the Court stated: "Several formulations might explain our treatment of certain classifications as suspect. Some classifications are more likely than others to reflect deep-seated prejudice, rather than legislative rationality in pursuit of some legitimate objective. Legislation predicated on such prejudice is easily recognized as incompatible with the constitutional understanding that each person is to be judged individually and the Court will uphold it so long as it bears a rational relation to some legitimate end.[6] "By requiring that the classification bear a rational relationship to an independent and legitimate legislative end, [the Court] ensure[s] that classifications are not drawn for the purpose of disadvantaging the group burdened by the law."[7] That rational basis review in equal protection analysis is not a license for courts to judge the wisdom, desirability, or fairness of legislative choices.[8] Further, a legislature need not "actually articulate at any time the purpose or rationale supporting its classification."[9] Instead, a classification "must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification;"[10] it is "constitutionally irrelevant [what] reasoning in fact underlay the legislative decision."[11] Thus, "the burden is on the one attacking the legislative arrangement to negative every conceivable basis which might support it,"[12] and "to convince the court that the legislative facts on which the classification is apparently based could not reasonably be conceived to be true by the governmental decisionmaker."[13] In this context, the defender of the classification "has no obligation to produce evidence to sustain the is entitled to equal justice under the law. Classifications treated as suspect tend to be irrelevant to any proper legislative goal. Finally, certain groups, indeed largely the same groups, have historically been relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." (Emphasis added.) Further the Court noted: "We reject the claim that 'illegal aliens' are a 'suspect class.' . . . Unlike most of the classifications that we have recognized as suspect, entry into this class, by virtue of entry into this country, is the product of voluntary action. Indeed, entry into the class is itself a crime. In addition, it could hardly be suggested that undocumented status is a 'constitutional irrelevancy.'" Id. at 219, n.19.

---

See also Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc. 473 U.S. 432, 440 (1985): "These factors are so seldom relevant to the achievement of any legitimate state interest that laws grounded in such considerations are deemed to reflect prejudice and antipathy." (Emphasis added.)

In New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer, 440 U.S. 568 (1979), the Transit Authority had a policy against employing persons using narcotic drugs, including those receiving methadone maintenance treatment for curing heroin addiction. The Court noted that the challenged exclusionary line "is not one which is directed 'against' any individual or category of persons, but rather it represents a policy choice. . . . Because it does not circumscribe a class of persons characterized by some unpopular trait or affiliation, it does not create or reflect any special likelihood of bias on the part of the ruling majority. Id. at 592–93 (emphasis added).

In Lyng v. Castillo, 477 U.S. 635, 638 (1986), the Court said: "Close relatives are not a suspect or quasi-suspect class. As a historical matter, they have not been subjected to discrimination; they do not exhibit obvious, immutable, or distinguishing characteristics that define them as a discrete group; and they are not a minority or politically powerless."

6 See, e.g., Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 631 (1996); Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 319–20 (1993); Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Schs., 487 U.S. 450, 462 (1988).

7 Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 633 (1996). "[A] bare . . . desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest." See United States Dep't of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528, 534 (1973).

8 See, e.g., New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 303 (1976) (per curiam).

9 Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 11 (1992).

10 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Beach Commc'n, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 313 (1993).

11 United States R.R. Ret. Bd. v. Fritz, 449 U.S. 166, 179 (1980).

12 Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 320 (1993), quoting Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co., 410 U.S. 356, 364 (1973).

13 Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 111 (1979).

rationality of a statutory classification;"[14] "a legislative choice is not subject to courtroom factfinding and may be based on rational speculation unsupported by evidence or empirical data."[15] But "even the standard of rationality . . . must find some footing in the realities of the subject addressed by the legislation."[16] In addition, "courts are compelled under rational basis review to accept a legislature's generalizations even when there is an imperfect fit between means and ends. A classification does not fail rational basis review because it 'is not made with mathematical nicety or because, in practice, it results in some inequality.'"[17] Finally, a legislature need not "strike at all evils at the same time or in the same way;"[18] [l]egislatures may implement their program step by step, . . . adopting regulations that only partially ameliorate a perceived evil and deferring complete elimination of the evil to future regulations."[19]

[K3] Hence, "[i]n the ordinary case, a statutory classification will be sustained if it can be said to advance a legitimate government interest, even if the law seems unwise or works to the disadvantage of a particular group, or if the rationale for it seems tenuous."[20] Classifications based on race or national origin, and classifications affecting fundamental rights, are given the most exacting scrutiny. Such classifications are valid if the government demonstrates that they have been "precisely tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest."[21] "Between these extremes of rational basis review and strict scrutiny lies a level of intermediate scrutiny, which generally has been applied to discriminatory classifications based on sex or illegitimacy. . . . To withstand intermediate scrutiny, a statutory classification must be substantially related to an important governmental objective."[22]

[K4] This equal protection guarantee applies as well to a facially "neutral law [that] has a disproportionately adverse effect upon a [certain group,] . . . if that impact can be traced to a discriminatory purpose."[23] "[W]hen a neutral federal statute is challenged on equal protection grounds, it is incumbent upon the challenger to prove that [the legislature] 'selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part because of, not merely in spite of, its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.'"[24]

---

[14] Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 320 (1993).

[15] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Beach Commc'n, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 315 (1993).

[16] Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 321 (1993).

[17] Id. at 321, quoting Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 485 (1970).

[18] Semler v. Oregon State Bd. of Dental Exam'rs, 294 U.S. 608, 610 (1935).

[19] New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 303 (1976) (per curiam), citing Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 488–89 (1955).

[20] See Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 632 (1996), citing New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297 (1976) (tourism benefits justified classification favoring pushcart vendors of certain longevity); Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, Inc., 348 U.S. 483 (1955) (assumed health concerns justified law favoring optometrists over opticians); Ry. Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106 (1949) (potential traffic hazards justified exemption of vehicles advertising the owner's products from general advertising ban); Kotch v. Bd. of River Port Pilot Comm'rs for Port of New Orleans, 330 U.S. 552 (1947) (licensing scheme that disfavored persons unrelated to current river boat pilots justified by possible efficiency and safety benefits of a closely knit pilotage system).

[21] See, e.g., Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 217 (1982).

[22] See, e.g., Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 461 (1988).

[23] Personnel Adm'r of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 272 (1979).

[24] Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 324, n.26 (1980), quoting Personnel Adm'r of [K5] Finally, it must be noted that "[t]he Equal Protection Clause has never been regarded as a bludgeon with which to compel a State to violate other provisions of the Constitution. [For example, if] tuition reimbursements for the benefit of sectarian schools violate the Establishment Clause, nothing in the Equal Protection Clause will suffice to revive that program."[25]

B. CLASSIFICATIONS BASED ON RACE OR ETHNIC ANCESTRY[26]

1. Historical Development

a. The Fourteenth Amendment and the "Separate but Equal" Doctrine

[K6] In the first cases in the Court construing the Fourteenth Amendment, decided shortly after its adoption, the Court interpreted it as proscribing all state-imposed discriminations against African-Americans.[27] In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Court announced the doctrine of separate but equal facilities for whites and blacks.[28] Under that doctrine, equality of treatment was accorded when the races were "provided substantially equal facilities, even though these facilities be separate."[29] In the decisions leading up to Brown I, the Court had attempted to curtail the ugly legacy of Plessy, by insisting on a searching inquiry into whether "separate" African-American schools were genuinely "equal" to white schools in terms of physical facilities, curricula, quality of the faculty and certain "intangible" considerations.[30] In Brown I, the Court finally liberated the Equal Protection Clause from the doctrinal tethers of Plessy, declaring that, "in the field of public education, the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal."[31] The Court based this conclusion on its recognition of the particular social harm that racially segregated schools inflicted on African-American children: "To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone."[32]

Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279 (1979) (internal quotation marks omitted). See, in extenso, paras. K26 et seq. (racial discrimination); paras. K94–K95 (sex discrimination).

25 Sloan v. Lemon, 413 U.S. 825, 834 (1973).

26 See also paras. F12, F35 (statutes outlawing miscegenation and inter-racial cohabitation); paras. K167 et seq. (racial gerrymandering).

27 See Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 67–72 (1873); Strauder v. W. Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 307–08 (1880).

28 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896). There, the Court held that legislatively mandated racial segregation in public transportation worked no denial of equal protection, rejecting the argument that racial separation enforced by the legal machinery of American society treated the black race as inferior. The Plessy Court considered "the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it." Id. at 551.

29 Brown v. Bd. of Educ. of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483, 488 (1954).

30 See, e.g., Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950); Sipuel v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of Oklahoma, 332 U.S. 631 (1948).

31 Brown v. Bd. of Educ. of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483, 495 (1954).

32 Id. at 494.

Subsequent cases confirmed that a state may not constitutionally require segregation of public facilities,[33] and stressed that, "because the core of the Fourteenth Amendment is the prevention of meaningful and unjustified official distinctions based on race," such classifications must be subject to the most rigid scrutiny.[34]

b. The Fifth Amendment and Anti-Japanese Measures During World War II

[K7] Through the 1940s, the Court had routinely taken the view in non-race-related cases that, unlike the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fifth Amendment contained no equal protection clause, and it provided no guaranty against discriminatory legislation by Congress.[35] When the Court first faced a Fifth Amendment equal protection challenge to a federal racial classification, it adopted a similar approach, with most unfortunate results. In Hirabayashi, the Court considered a curfew applicable only to persons of Japanese ancestry. The Court observed—correctly—that "[d]istinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are, by their very nature, odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality," and that "racial discriminations are in most circumstances irrelevant and therefore prohibited." But it also cited Detroit Bank for the proposition that the Fifth Amendment "restrains only such discriminatory legislation by Congress as amounts to a denial of due process," and it upheld the curfew, because "circumstances within the knowledge of those charged with the responsibility for maintaining the national defense afforded a rational basis for the decision which they made."[36]

[K8] Eighteen months later, the Court again approved wartime measures directed at persons of Japanese ancestry. Korematsu concerned an order that completely excluded such persons from particular areas. The Court did not address the view, expressed in cases like Hirabayashi and Detroit Bank, that the federal government's obligation to provide equal protection differed significantly from that of the states. Instead, it began by noting that "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect . . . [and] courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny." But in spite of the "most rigid scrutiny" standard it had just set forth, the Court then inexplicably relied on "the principles announced in the Hirabayashi case" to conclude that, although "exclusion from the area in which one's home is located is a far greater deprivation than constant confinement to the home from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.," the racially discriminatory order was nonetheless within the federal government's power.[37]

[K9] In Bolling, the Court, for the first time, explicitly questioned the existence of any difference between the obligations of the federal government and the states to avoid racial classifications. Bolling did note that "the 'equal protection of the laws' is a more

---

[33] See, e.g., Johnson v. Virginia, 373 U.S. 61, 62 (1963) (courtrooms); Turner v. Memphis, 369 U.S. 350, 353 (1962) and Lombard v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 267 (1963) (restaurants); Wright v. Georgia, 373 U.S. 284 (1963), and Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526 (1963) (parks); Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City v. Dawson, 350 U.S. 877 (1955) (beaches); Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903 (1956) (buses).

[34] Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 391–92 (1969); James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137, 141 (1971).

[35] See, e.g., Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U.S. 329, 337 (1943).

[36] Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100–02 (1943). See also para. B46.

[37] Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216–18 (1944). See also para. B46.

explicit safeguard of prohibited unfairness than 'due process of law,'" but then stressed that "that the Constitution of the United States . . . forbids, so far as civil and political rights are concerned, discrimination by the General Government, or by the States, against any citizen because of his race," and concluded that, "in view of [the] decision that the Constitution prohibits the states from maintaining racially segregated public schools, it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government."[38] Later cases in contexts other than school desegregation continued to treat the equal protection obligations imposed by the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments as indistinguishable. Finally, in 1976, the Court stated explicitly that "equal protection analysis in the Fifth Amendment area is the same as that under the Fourteenth Amendment."[39]

2. Applicable Standard of Review

[K10] It is now settled that racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are constitutionally suspect and must be strictly scrutinized. Laws classifying citizens on the basis of race cannot be upheld unless they are "narrowly tailored to achieving a compelling state interest. . . . This rule obtains with equal force regardless of the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification."[40] "The purpose of the narrow tailoring requirement is to ensure that the means chosen 'fit' the compelling goal so closely that there is little or no possibility that the motive for the classification was illegitimate racial prejudice or stereotype. . . . Narrow tailoring does not require exhaustion of every conceivable race-neutral alternative. Narrow tailoring does, however, require serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives that will achieve the [goal sought.]"[41]

[K11] "When racial classifications are explicit, no inquiry into legislative purpose is necessary. . . . A facially neutral law, on the other hand, warrants strict scrutiny only if it can be proved that the law was 'motivated by a racial purpose or object,' or if it is 'unexplainable on grounds other than race.' . . . The task of assessing a jurisdiction's motivation . . . is an inherently complex endeavor, one requiring the trial court to perform a 'sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence of intent as may be available.'"[42]

3. Racial Information

[K12] Anderson v. Martin held that a Louisiana statute requiring the designation of a candidate's race on the ballot violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Court reasoned: "In the abstract, Louisiana imposes no restriction upon anyone's candidacy, nor upon an elector's choice in the casting of his ballot. But, by placing a racial label on a candidate at the most crucial stage in the electoral process—the instant before the vote is cast—the State furnishes a vehicle by which racial prejudice may be so aroused as to operate against one group because of race and for another. This is true because, by 38 Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499–500 (1954).

---

39 Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 93 (1976).

40 Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 904 (1995) (emphasis added).

41 Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 333, 339 (2003).

42 Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 546 (1999).

directing the citizen's attention to the single consideration of race or color, the State indicates that a candidate's race or color is an important—perhaps paramount—consideration in the citizen's choice, which may decisively influence the citizen to cast his ballot along racial lines."[43]

4. Differential Treatment of Indian Tribes

[K13] "[F]ederal legislation with respect to Indian tribes, although relating to Indians as such, is not based upon impermissible racial classifications. Quite the contrary, classifications expressly singling out Indian tribes as subjects of legislation are expressly provided for in the Constitution"[44] (Article I, Section 8, gives Congress power "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes") and "supported by the ensuing history of the Federal Government's relations with Indians."[45] "Indian tribes are unique aggregations possessing attributes of sovereignty over both their members and their territory;"[46] they are "a separate people" possessing "the power of regulating their internal and social relations."[47] As the Court has established in a series of cases, "Congress may fulfill its treaty obligations and its responsibilities to the Indian tribes by enacting legislation dedicated to their circumstances and needs."[48]

[K14] Mancari presented the issue of a preference in hiring and promoting at the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA), a preference that favored individuals who were "'one-fourth or more degree Indian blood and member[s] of a Federally-recognized tribe." Although the classification had a racial component, the Court found it important that the preference was not directed towards a "racial" group consisting of "Indians" but rather "only to members of "federally recognized" tribes. In this sense, the Court held, "the preference [wa]s political rather than racial in nature;" "the preference, as applied, [wa]s granted to Indians not as a discrete racial group, but, rather, as members of quasi-sovereign tribal entities whose lives and activities [we]re governed by the BIA in a unique fashion." Because the BIA preference "could be tied rationally to the fulfillment of Congress' unique obligation toward the Indians," and was "reasonably and rationally designed to further Indian self-government," the Court held that it did not offend the Constitution. The opinion was careful to note, however, that the case was confined to the authority of the BIA, an agency described as "sui generis."[49]

---

43 Anderson v. Martin, 375 U.S. 399, 402 (1964).

44 United States v. Antelope, 430 U.S. 641, 645 (1977).

45 Id.

46 Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. 515, 557 (1832).

47 United States v. Mazurie, 419 U.S. 544, 557 (1975).

48 See Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 519 (2000), citing Washington v. Washington State Commercial Passenger Fishing Vessel Ass'n, 443 U.S. 658, 673, n.20 (1979) (treaties securing preferential fishing rights); United States v. Antelope, 430 U.S. 641, 645–47 (1977) (exclusive federal jurisdiction over crimes committed by Indians in Indian country); Delaware Tribal Bus. Comm. v. Weeks, 430 U.S. 73, 84–85 (1977) (distribution of tribal property); Moe v. Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes of Flathead Reservation, 425 U.S. 463, 479–80 (1976) (Indian immunity from state taxes); Fisher v. Dist. Court of Sixteenth Judicial Dist. of Montana, 424 U.S. 382, 390–91 (1976) (per curiam) (exclusive tribal court jurisdiction over tribal adoptions).

49 Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 553–55, n.24 (1974). It does not follow from Mancari, however, that Congress may authorize a state to establish a voting scheme that limits the elec-

5. Affirmative Action—Benign or Remedial Racial Discrimination[50]

[K15] In 1978, the Court confronted for the first time the question whether race-based governmental action designed to benefit groups that have suffered discrimination in the American society should be subject to "the most rigid scrutiny." The landmark Bakke case involved a racial quota employed by the University of California at Davis Medical School. Under the plan, 16 out of 100 seats in each entering class at the school were reserved exclusively for certain minority groups. The petitioners argued that "strict scrutiny" should apply only to classifications that disadvantage discrete and insular minorities. Bakke did not produce an opinion for the Court, but Justice Powell's opinion announcing the Court's judgment rejected the argument. Justice Powell wrote that "[t]he guarantee of equal protection cannot mean one thing when applied to one individual and something else when applied to a person of another color,"[51] and concluded that "racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect, and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination."[52] On the other hand, four Justices in Bakke would have applied a less stringent standard of review to racial classifications designed to further remedial purposes.[53] And four Justices thought the case should be decided on statutory grounds.[54] Among the justifications offered in support of the plan were the desire to reduce the historic deficit of traditionally disfavored minorities in medical school and the medical profession and the need to counter the effects of societal discrimination. Five members of the Court determined that none of these interests could justify a plan that completely eliminated non-minorities from consideration for a specified percentage of opportunities.[55]

[K16] Two years after Bakke, the Court faced another challenge to remedial race-based action, this time involving action undertaken by the federal government. In Fullilove, the Court upheld Congress' inclusion of a 10-percent set-aside for minority-owned businesses in the Public Works Employment Act of 1977. A majority of the Court did not apply strict scrutiny to the race-based classification at issue. Three members inquired "whether th[e] objectives of the legislation are within the power of Congress" and "whether the limited use of racial and ethnic criteria . . . is a constitutionally permissible means for achieving the congressional objectives." They then upheld the program under that test, adding at the end of the opinion that the program also would survive judicial review under either test articulated in the several Bakke opinions.[56] Three other torate for its public officials to a class of tribal Indians, to the exclusion of all non-Indian citizens. See Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 520–22 (2000).

---

50 See also para. K168 (racial gerrymandering).

51 Regents of the Univ. of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 289–90 (1978).

52 Id. at 291.

53 Id. at 359 (Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun, JJ., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part, and concluding that racial classifications designed to further remedial purposes "must serve important governmental objectives, and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives").

54 Id. at 411–12, 421 (Stevens, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Stewart, and Rehnquist, JJ., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part).

55 Id. at 271–72 (Powell, J.) (addressing constitutionality of Davis plan); id. at 408 (Stevens, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Stewart, and Rehnquist, JJ., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part) (addressing only legality of Davis admissions plan under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964).

56 Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 473–92 (1980) (principal opinion of Burger, C.J.,

members would have upheld benign racial classifications that "serve important governmental objectives and are substantially related to achievement of those objectives," and concluded that, judged under this standard, the 10-percent minority set-aside provision of the 1977 Act was plainly constitutional, the racial classifications being substantially related to the achievement of the important and congressionally articulated goal of remedying the then-present effects of past racial discrimination.[57]

[K17] Wygant considered a Fourteenth Amendment challenge to another form of remedial racial classification. The issue in that case was whether a school board could adopt race-based preferences in determining which teachers to lay off. Justice Powell's plurality opinion observed that "the level of scrutiny does not change merely because the challenged classification operates against a group that historically has not been subject to governmental discrimination," and it stated the two-part inquiry as "whether the layoff provision is supported by a compelling state purpose and whether the means chosen to accomplish that purpose are narrowly tailored."[58] The lower courts had upheld the challenged scheme, based on the theory that minority students were in need of "role models" to alleviate the effects of prior discrimination in society. The Court reversed. A four-Justice plurality pointed out that "[s]ocietal discrimination, without more, is too joined by White and Powell, JJ.). On the issue of congressional power, the Chief Justice found that Congress' commerce power was sufficiently broad to allow it to reach the practices of prime contractors on federally funded local construction projects. Congress could mandate state and local government compliance with the set-aside program under its Section 5 power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. The Chief Justice next turned to the constraints on Congress' power to employ race-conscious remedial relief. His opinion stressed two factors in upholding the provision at issue. First was the unique remedial powers of Congress under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Because of these powers, the Chief Justice held that "Congress not only may induce voluntary action to assure compliance with existing federal statutory or constitutional antidiscrimination provisions, but also, where Congress has authority to declare certain conduct unlawful, it may authorize and induce state action to avoid such conduct." Id. at 483–84. Further, the principal opinion found that Congress had an abundant historical basis from which it could conclude that traditional procurement practices, when applied to minority businesses, could perpetuate the effects of prior discrimination. The second factor was the flexible nature of the 10-percent set-aside. Two "congressional assumptions" underlay the program: first, that the effects of past discrimination had impaired the competitive position of minority businesses, and second, that "adjustment for the effects of past discrimination" would assure that at least 10 percent of the funds from the federal grant program would flow to minority businesses. The Chief Justice noted that both of these "assumptions" could be "rebutted" by a grantee seeking a waiver of the 10-percent requirement. Thus, a waiver could be sought where minority businesses were not available to fill the 10-percent requirement or, more importantly, where a minority business attempted "to exploit the remedial aspects of the program by charging an unreasonable price, i.e., a price not attributable to the then-present effects of prior discrimination." Id. at 488. The Chief Justice indicated that, without this fine tuning to remedial purpose, the statute would not have passed muster.

---

The principal opinion in Fullilove also found that Congress had carefully examined and rejected race-neutral alternatives before enacting the MBE set-aside. See id. at 463–67. See also id. at 511 (Powell, J., concurring) ("by the time Congress enacted [the MBE set-aside] in 1977, it knew that other remedies had failed to ameliorate the effects of racial discrimination in the construction industry").

[57] Id. at 517–21 (concurring opinion of Marshall, J., joined by Brennan and Blackmun, JJ.).

[58] Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 273–74 (1986) (opinion of Powell, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Rehnquist, and O'Connor, JJ.).

amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy" working against innocent people, and insisted instead that, before a public employer embarks on an affirmative action program, it must have sufficient evidence to justify the conclusion that there has been prior discrimination.[59] No such finding had been made there. Justice White concurred only in the judgment, although he agreed that the school board's asserted interests could not justify the racially discriminatory layoff policy.[60]

[K18] The Court's failure to produce a majority opinion in Bakke, Fullilove, and Wygant left unresolved the proper analysis for remedial race-based governmental action. The Court resolved the issue at least in part, in 1989. Richmond v. Croson concerned a city's plan requiring prime contractors awarded city construction contracts to sub-contract at least 30 percent of the dollar amount of each contract to one or more "Minority Business Enterprises" (MBE), which the plan defined to include a business from anywhere in the country at least 51 percent of which was owned and controlled by black, Spanish-speaking, Oriental, Indian, Eskimo, or Aleut citizens. A majority of the Court held that the standard of review under the Equal Protection Clause is not dependent on the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification, and that the single standard of review for racial classifications should be strict scrutiny.[61] As to the classification before the Court, the plurality agreed that a state or local subdivision has the authority to eradicate the effects of public and private discrimination within its own legislative jurisdiction,[62] but the Court thought that the factual predicate supporting the plan did not establish the type of identified past discrimination in the city's construction industry that would authorize race-based relief under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause.[63] The Court emphasized that "a generalized assertion that there has been past discrimination in an entire industry provides no guidance for a legislative body to determine the precise scope of the injury it seeks to rem-

---

[59] Id. at 276.

[60] Id. at 295.

[61] Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493–94 (1989) (opinion of O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., White, and Kennedy, JJ.); id. at 520 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment).

[62] Id. at 491–92 (opinion of O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and White, J.); id. at 518 (concurring opinion of Kennedy, J.). As Justice O'Connor noted, "if the city could show that it had essentially become a passive participant in a system of racial exclusion practiced by elements of the local construction industry, . . . the city could take affirmative steps to dismantle such a system. It is beyond dispute that any public entity, state or federal, has a compelling interest in assuring that public dollars, drawn from the tax contributions of all citizens, do not serve to finance the evil of private prejudice."

[63] For the state's interest in remedying the effects of past or present racial discrimination "to rise to the level of a compelling state interest, it must satisfy two conditions. First, the discrimination must be 'identified discrimination.' . . . 'While the States and their subdivisions may take remedial action when they possess evidence' of past or present discrimination, "they must identify that discrimination, public or private, with some specificity before they may use race-conscious relief." . . . A generalized assertion of past discrimination in a particular industry or region is not adequate because it 'provides no guidance for a legislative body to determine the precise scope of the injury it seeks to remedy.' . . . Accordingly, an effort to alleviate the effects of societal discrimination is not a compelling interest. . . . Second, the institution that makes the racial distinction must have a 'strong basis in evidence' to conclude that remedial action was necessary, 'before it embarks on an affirmative action program'." See Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 909–10

edy. It 'has no logical stopping point.'"[64] Moreover, none of the "facts" cited by the city provided a basis for a prima facie case of a constitutional or statutory violation by anyone in the city's construction industry. Reliance on the disparity between the number of prime contracts awarded to minority businesses and the city's minority population was misplaced, since the proper statistical evaluation would compare the percentage of MBE's in the relevant market that were qualified to undertake city sub-contracting work with the percentage of total city construction dollars that were awarded to minority subcontractors, neither of which was known to the city. The fact that MBE membership in local contractors' associations was extremely low was also not probative, absent some link to the number of MBE's eligible for membership, since there were numerous explanations for the dearth of minority participation, including past societal discrimination in education and economic opportunities, as well as both black and white career and entrepreneurial choices. Congress' finding in connection with the set-aside approved in Fullilove that there had been nationwide discrimination in the construction industry also had extremely limited probative value, since, by including a waiver procedure in the national program, Congress had explicitly recognized that the scope of the problem would vary from market area to market area. Besides, the city's history of school desegregation and numerous congressional reports did little to define the scope of any injury to minority contractors in the city or the necessary remedy and could justify a preference of any size or duration. Finally, the majority rejected the suggestion that discrimination findings may be "shared" from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.[65] The Court also thought it obvious that the program was not narrowly tailored to remedy the effects of prior discrimination, since it entitled a black, Hispanic, or Oriental entrepreneur from anywhere in the country to an absolute preference over other citizens based solely on their race. "First, there d[id] not appear to have been any consideration of the use of race-neutral means to increase minority business participation in city contracting. . . . Many of the barriers to minority participation in the construction industry relied upon by the city to justify a racial classification appear[ed] to be race-neutral. If MBE's disproportionately lack[ed] capital or [could not] meet bonding requirements, a race-neutral program of city financing for small firms would, a fortiori, lead to greater minority participation. . . . Second, the 30% quota . . . rest[ed] upon the completely unrealistic assumption that minorities would choose a particular trade in lockstep proportion to their representation in the local population."[66] Moreover, unlike the program upheld in Fullilove, the Plan's waiver system focused upon the availability of MBE's, and it did not inquire whether the particular MBE seeking a racial preference had suffered from the effects of past discrimination by the city or prime contractors. Given the fact that the city should already consider bids and waivers on a case-by-case basis, the city's only interest in maintaining a quota system, rather than investigating the need for remedial action in particular cases, would seem to be simply administrative convenience, which cannot justify the use of a suspect classification under equal protection strict scrutiny.[67]

[K19] With Croson, the Court finally agreed that the Fourteenth Amendment requires strict scrutiny of all race-based action by state and local governments. But Croson had (1996) (Shaw II), citing and quoting Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 498–500, 504, 505, 507, 509 (1989) and Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 273–77 (1986).

---

64 Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 498 (1989), quoting Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 275 (1986).

65 Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 499–506 (1989).

66 Id. at 507.

67 Id. at 508.

no occasion to declare what standard of review the Fifth Amendment requires for such action taken by the federal government. Croson observed simply that the Court's treatment of an exercise of congressional power in Fullilove could not be dispositive there, because Croson's facts did not implicate Congress' broad power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.[68]

[K20] A year later, however, Metro Broadcasting held that "benign" federal racial classifications need only satisfy intermediate scrutiny, noting that the Court owed appropriate deference to the Congress, in light of Congress' institutional competence as the national legislature, charged by the Constitution with the power "to provide for the . . . general Welfare of the United States" and "to enforce, by appropriate legislation," the equal protection guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. Benign federal racial classifications mandated by Congress, the Court said, "even if those measures are not 'remedial' in the sense of being designed to compensate victims of past governmental or societal discrimination—are constitutionally permissible to the extent that they serve important governmental objectives within the power of Congress and are substantially related to achievement of those objectives." The Court did not explain how to tell whether a racial classification should be deemed "benign" other than to express confidence that an examination of the legislative scheme and its history would separate benign measures from other types of racial classifications. Applying this test, the Court first noted that the Federal Communications Commission's minority preference policies at issue—a program awarding an enhancement for minority ownership in comparative proceedings for new licenses, and the minority "distress sale" program, which permitted a limited category of existing radio and television broadcast stations to be transferred only to minority-controlled firms—did not serve as a remedy for past discrimination. Proceeding on the assumption that the policies were nonetheless "benign," it concluded that they served the important governmental objective of enhancing broadcast diversity, and that they were substantially related to that objective. It therefore upheld the policies.[69]

---

[68] Id. at 491 (plurality opinion); id. at 522 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment).

[69] Metro Broad., Inc. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 497 U.S. 547, 563–601, n.12 (1990). The Court relied upon the following grounds for holding that the minority ownership policies were substantially related to the achievement of the government's interest in broadcast diversity:

(1) The FCC's conclusion that there was an empirical nexus between minority ownership and greater diversity, which was consistent with its longstanding view that ownership was a prime determinant of the range of programming available, was a product of its expertise and was entitled to deference.

(2) By virtue of a long history of support for minority participation in the broadcasting industry, Congress had also made clear its view that the minority ownership policies advanced the goal of diverse programming.

(3) The judgment that there was a link between expanded minority ownership and broadcast diversity did not rest on impermissible stereotyping. Rather Congress and the FCC maintained simply that expanded minority ownership of broadcast outlets would, in the aggregate, result in greater broadcast diversity. This judgment was corroborated by a host of empirical evidence suggesting that an owner's minority status influenced the selection of topics for news coverage and the presentation of editorial viewpoint, especially on matters of particular concern to minorities, and had a special impact on the way in which images of minorities were presented. In addition, studies showed that a minority owner was more likely to employ minorities in managerial and other important roles where they could [K21] By adopting intermediate scrutiny as the standard of review for congressionally mandated "benign" racial classifications, Metro Broadcasting departed from prior cases in two significant respects.[70] First it repudiated the long-held notion that "it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government" than it does on a state to afford equal protection of the laws.[71] Second, Metro Broadcasting turned its back on Croson's explanation of why strict scrutiny of all governmental racial classifications is essential: "Absent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for such race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining what classifications are 'benign' or 'remedial' and what classifications are in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics. Indeed, the purpose of strict scrutiny is to 'smoke out' illegitimate uses of race by assuring that the legislative body is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant use of a highly suspect tool. The test also ensures that the means chosen 'fit' this compelling goal so closely that there is little or no possibility that the motive for the classification was illegitimate racial prejudice or stereotype."[72] The Court adhered to that view in Adarand, which overruled Metro Broadcasting, in relevant part, and stressed that "all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests."[73]

[K22] Bakke was the first case in which the Court addressed the constitutionality of race-based affirmative action programs in public higher education. As noted above, there the Court reviewed a racial set-aside program that reserved 16 out of 100 seats in a medical school class for members of certain minority groups. The decision produced have an impact on station policies. The FCC's policies were thus a product of analysis, rather than a stereotyped reaction based on habit.

---

(4) The FCC had adopted and Congress had endorsed minority ownership preferences only after long study, painstaking consideration of all available alternatives, and the emergence of evidence demonstrating that race-neutral means had not produced adequate broadcasting diversity.

(5) The policies were appropriately limited in extent and duration and subject to reassessment and reevaluation before renewal.

(6) Finally, the policies imposed only slight burdens on non-minorities. Award of a preference contravened no legitimate, firmly rooted expectation of competing applicants, since the limited number of frequencies available means that no one has First Amendment right to a license, and the granting of licenses requires consideration of public interest factors. Nor did the distress sale policy impose an undue burden on non-minorities, since it could be invoked only with respect to a small fraction of broadcast licenses—those designated for revocation or renewal hearings to examine basic qualification issues—and only when the licensee chose to sell out at a distress price rather than to go through with the hearing, and no competing application for the station in question had been filed. The distress sale policy was not a quota or fixed quantity set-aside, and non-minorities were free to compete for the vast remainder of other available license opportunities.

70 See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 226 (1995).

71 See Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 500 (1954); Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 638, n.2 (1975).

72 Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493 (1989) (plurality opinion).

73 Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227 (1995).

six separate opinions, none of which commanded a majority of the Court. Four Justices would have upheld the program against all attack on the ground that the government can use race to remedy disadvantages cast on minorities by past racial prejudice.[74] Four other Justices avoided the constitutional question altogether and struck down the program under Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.[75] Justice Powell provided a fifth vote not only for invalidating the set-aside program but also for reversing the state court's injunction against any use of race whatsoever. The only holding for the Court was that a "State has a substantial interest that legitimately may be served by a properly devised admissions program involving the competitive consideration of race and ethnic origin."[76] Thus, the Court reversed that part of the lower court's judgment that enjoined the university from any consideration of the race of any applicant.

[K23] Justice Powell's opinion announcing the judgment of the Bakke Court has served as the touchstone for constitutional analysis of race-conscious university admissions policies. In Justice Powell's view, when governmental decisions "touch upon an individual's race or ethnic background, he is entitled to a judicial determination that the burden he is asked to bear on that basis is precisely tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest."[77] Under this exacting standard, only one of the interests asserted by the university survived Justice Powell's scrutiny. First, Powell rejected an interest in reducing the historic deficit of traditionally disfavored minorities in medical schools and in the medical profession as an unlawful interest in racial balancing. Second, he rejected an interest in remedying societal discrimination, indicating that for the governmental interest in remedying past discrimination to be triggered, "judicial, legislative, or administrative findings of constitutional or statutory violations" must be made. In the absence of such findings, legislative mandates and legislatively determined criteria, the university could not justify a classification that imposed disadvantages upon persons who bore no responsibility for whatever harm the beneficiaries of the special admissions program were thought to have suffered. Third, he rejected an interest in increasing the number of physicians who would practice in communities currently underserved, concluding that, even if such an interest could be compelling in some circumstances, the program under review was not geared to promote that goal.[78] Justice Powell approved the university's use of race to further only one interest: "the attainment of a diverse student body."[79] He emphasized that nothing less than the "nation's future depends upon leaders trained through wide exposure' to the ideas and mores of students as diverse as this Nation of many peoples," and held that, in seeking the "right to select those students who will contribute the most to the robust exchange of ideas," a university seeks "to achieve a goal that is of paramount importance in the fulfillment of its mission."[80] Justice Powell was, however, careful to emphasize that race "is only one element in a range of factors a university properly may consider in attaining the goal

---

74 Regents of the Univ. of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 325 (1978) (joint opinion of Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun, JJ., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part).

75 Id. at 408 (Stevens, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Stewart, and Rehnquist, JJ., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part) (addressing only legality of Davis admissions plan).

76 Id. at 320.

77 Id. at 299.

78 Id. at 306–10.

79 Id. at 311 (emphasis added).

80 Id. at 313.

of a heterogeneous student body." For him, "[i]t is not an interest in simple ethnic diversity, in which a specified percentage of the student body is in effect guaranteed to be members of selected ethnic groups," which can justify the use of race; rather, "[t]he diversity that furthers a compelling state interest encompasses a far broader array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important element."[81]

[K24] In 2003, Grutter endorsed Justice Powell's view that student body diversity is a compelling state interest that can justify the use of race in university admissions. That case involved an official admissions policy followed by the University of Michigan Law School, which sought to achieve student body diversity through compliance with Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke. Focusing on students' academic ability coupled with a flexible assessment of their talents, experiences, and potential, the policy required admissions officials to evaluate each applicant based on all the information available in the file, including a personal statement, letters of recommendation, an essay describing how the applicant would contribute to Law School life and diversity, and the applicant's undergraduate grade point average (GPA) and Law School Admissions Test (LSAT) score. Additionally, officials should look beyond grades and scores to so-called "soft variables," such as recommenders' enthusiasm, the quality of the undergraduate institution and the applicant's essay, and the areas and difficulty of undergraduate course selection. The policy did not define diversity solely in terms of racial and ethnic status and did not restrict the types of diversity contributions eligible for "substantial weight," but it did reaffirm the Law School's commitment to diversity with special reference to the inclusion of African-American, Hispanic, and Native-American students, who otherwise might not be represented in the student body in meaningful numbers. By enrolling a "critical mass" of underrepresented minority students, the Law School sought "ensure their ability to make unique contributions to the character of the Law School." The policy was aimed at guiding admissions officers in "producing classes both diverse and academically outstanding, classes made up of students who promise[d] to continue the tradition of outstanding contribution by Michigan Graduates to the legal profession." The Court noted that "attaining a diverse student body [wa]s at the heart of the Law School's proper institutional mission, and that 'good faith' on the part of a university [wa]s 'presumed' absent 'a showing to the contrary.'"[82] Enrolling a "critical mass" of minority students simply to assure some specified percentage of a particular group merely because of its race or ethnic origin would be patently unconstitutional. But "the Law School's concept of critical mass [wa]s defined by reference to the educational benefits that diversity [wa]s designed to produce," including "cross-racial understanding" and the breaking down of racial stereotypes.[83] The Law School's claim was further bolstered by numerous expert studies and reports showing that such diversity would promote learning outcomes and better prepare students for an increasingly diverse workforce, for society, and for the legal profession. Moreover, "law schools cannot be effective in isolation from the individuals and institutions with which the law interacts. . . . Access to legal education (and thus the legal profession) must be inclusive of talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity, so that all members of the American heterogeneous society may participate in the educational institutions that provide the

---

81 Id. at 314–15.

82 Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 329 (2003).

83 Id. at 330.

training and education necessary to succeed in" the United States.[84] Thus, the Law School had a compelling interest in attaining a diverse student body. Second, the Law School's admissions program was narrowly tailored to accomplish that purpose. The Court stressed that "[t]o be narrowly tailored, a race-conscious admissions program cannot use a quota system—it cannot 'insulat[e] each category of applicants with certain desired qualifications from competition with all other applicants.' . . . Instead, a university may consider race or ethnicity only as a 'plus in a particular applicant's file,' without 'insulat[ing] the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats.' In other words, an admissions program must be 'flexible enough to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight.'"[85] The challenged program satisfied these requirements. The Law School was engaging in a highly individualized, holistic review of each applicant's file, giving serious consideration to all the ways an applicant might contribute to a diverse educational environment. There was no policy of automatic acceptance or rejection based on any single "soft" variable. The Law School did not limit, in any way, the broad range of qualities and experiences that could be considered valuable contributions to student body diversity, and it was actually giving substantial weight to diversity factors besides race; indeed, it frequently accepted non-minority applicants with grades and test scores lower than underrepresented minority applicants (and other non-minority applicants) who were rejected. Relatedly, the Court rejected the argument that the Law School should have used other race-neutral means to obtain the educational benefits of student body diversity, e.g., a lottery system or decreasing the emphasis on GPA and LSAT scores. These alternatives would require a dramatic sacrifice of diversity, the academic quality of all admitted students, or both. The Court emphasized that "[n]arrow tailoring does not require exhaustion of every conceivable race-neutral alternative. Nor does it require a university to choose between maintaining a reputation for excellence or fulfilling a commitment to provide educational opportunities to members of all racial groups."[86] Moreover, the program did not unduly harm non-minority applicants. Finally, the Court observed that "race-conscious admissions policies must be limited in time. . . . [This] durational requirement can be met by sunset provisions in race-conscious admissions policies and periodic reviews to determine whether racial preferences are still necessary to achieve student body diversity."[87] As the Court noted, it expected that 25 years from its decision, the use of racial preferences would no longer be necessary to further this interest.[88]

[K25] In Gratz, the University of Michigan's College of Literature, Science, and the Arts was considering a number of factors in making admissions decisions, including high school grades, standardized test scores, high school quality, curriculum strength, geography, alumni relationships, leadership, and race. The University considered African-Americans, Hispanics, and Native Americans to be "underrepresented minorities," and it was using a selection method under which every applicant from an underrepresented racial or ethnic minority group was automatically awarded 20 points of the

---

84 Id. at 332–33.

85 Id. at 334, quoting Regents of the Univ. of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 315, 317 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.).

86 Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 339 (2003).

87 Id. at 342.

88 Id. at 343.

100 needed to guarantee admission. As a consequence, the university admitted virtually every qualified applicant from these groups. The Court held that the university's use of race in its freshman admissions policy violated the Equal Protection Clause, because it was not narrowly tailored to achieve its asserted interest in educational diversity. In reaching this conclusion, the Court stressed "the importance of considering each particular applicant as an individual, assessing all of the qualities that individual possesses, and in turn, evaluating that individual's ability to contribute to the unique setting of higher education," without automatically considering any single characteristic as "a specific and identifiable contribution to a university's diversity."[89] The challenged policy did not provide such an individualized consideration. The only consideration that accompanied the 20-point automatic distribution to all applicants from underrepresented minorities was a factual review to determine whether an individual was a member of one of these minority groups. Moreover, the 20-point distribution had the effect of making the factor of race decisive for virtually every minimally qualified underrepresented minority applicant.[90]

6. De Jure/De Facto Racial Discrimination

a. Generally

[K26] Washington v. Davis stressed that "[a] statute, otherwise neutral on its face, must not be applied so as invidiously to discriminate on the basis of race."[91] But, in this case, the Court also made it clear that "a law, neutral on its face and serving ends otherwise within the power of government to pursue, is [not] invalid under the Equal Protection Clause simply because it may affect a greater proportion of one race than of another. Disproportionate impact is not irrelevant, but it is not the sole touchstone of an invidious racial discrimination forbidden by the Constitution."[92] In this context, proof of racially discriminatory intent or purpose is required to show a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.[93] "'Discriminatory purpose' . . . implies more than intent as volition

---

89 Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 271 (2003).

90 Id. at 272.

91 Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 241 (1976).

92 Id. at 242. That case involved a verbal skill test administered to prospective public employees. A far greater proportion of blacks—four times as many—failed the test than did whites. But the successful test takers included members of both races, as did the unsuccessful examinees. Disproportionate impact, standing alone, the Court held, was insufficient to prove unconstitutional racial discrimination. As the Court pointed out, "[a] rule that [state action] designed to serve neutral ends is nevertheless invalid, absent compelling justification, if in practice it benefits or burdens one race more than another would be far-reaching, and would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to the poor and to the average black than to the more affluent white." Id. at 248. Moreover, the Court found that the Constitution does not prevent "the Government from seeking, through the test at issue, modestly to upgrade the communicative abilities of its employees, rather than to be satisfied with some lower level of competence, particularly where the job requires special abilities to communicate orally and in writing." Id. at 246.

93 See id. at 241. The holding in Davis reaffirmed a principle well established in a variety of contexts. See, e.g., Keyes v. Sch. Dist. No. 1, Denver, Colorado, 413 U.S. 189, 208 (1973) (schools: "The differentiating factor between de jure segregation and so-called de facto segrega-or intent as awareness of consequences. . . . It implies that the decisionmaker . . . selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects upon an identifiable group."[94] "With a prima facie case [of discriminatory purpose] made out, 'the burden of proof shifts to the State to rebut the presumption of unconstitutional action by showing that permissible racially neutral selection criteria and procedures have produced the monochromatic result.'"[95]

[K27] Arlington Heights "set out a checklist of considerations for assessing evidence going to discriminatory intent: the historical background of a challenged decision, its relative impact on minorities, specific antecedent events, departures from normal procedures, and contemporary statements of decision makers."[96] As the Court pointed out, in that case, "Davis does not require a plaintiff to prove that the challenged action rested solely on racially discriminatory purposes. Rarely can it be said that a legislature or administrative body operating under a broad mandate made a decision motivated solely by a single concern, or even that a particular purpose was the 'dominant' or 'primary' one. In fact, it is because legislators and administrators are properly concerned with balancing numerous competing considerations that courts refrain from reviewing the merits of their decisions, absent a showing of arbitrariness or irrationality. But racial discrimination is not just another competing consideration. When there is a proof that a discriminatory purpose has been a motivating factor in the decision, this judicial deference is no longer justified."[97] "Determining whether invidious discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor demands a sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence of intent as may be available. The impact of the official action—'whether it bears more heavily on one race than another' . . . —may provide an important starting point. Sometimes a clear pattern, unexplainable on grounds other than race, emerges from the effect of the state action even when the governing legislation appears neutral on its face. . . . The evidentiary inquiry is then relatively easy. But such cases are rare. Absent a stark pattern, . . . impact alone is not determinative, and the Court must look to other evidence. . . . This is not to say that a consistent pattern of official racial discrimination is a necessary predicate to a violation of the Equal Protection guarantee. A single invidiously discriminatory governmental act . . . would not necessarily be immution . . . is purpose or intent to segregate"); Jefferson v. Hackney, 406 U.S. 535, 548 (1972) (welfare benefits: there, the Court rejected allegations of racial discrimination based solely on the statistically disproportionate racial impact of various provisions of the Social Security Act, because "the acceptance of appellants' constitutional theory would render suspect each difference in treatment among the grant classes, however lacking in racial motivation and however otherwise rational the treatment might be"); Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 56–58 (1964) (election districting: the challengers there did not prevail, because they failed to prove that the New York legislature "was either motivated by racial considerations or in fact drew the districts on racial lines"); Akins v. Texas, 325 U.S. 398, 403–04 (1945) (jury selection: "A purpose to discriminate must be present which may be proven by systematic exclusion of eligible jurymen of the proscribed race or by unequal application of the law to such an extent as to show intentional discrimination").

---

[94] Personnel Adm'r of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279 (1979). See also McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 298 (1987).

[95] Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 241 (1976), quoting Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625, 632 (1972).

[96] See Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd., 528 U.S. 320, 343 (2000) (opinion of Souter, J.), discussing Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266–68 (1977).

[97] Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265–66 (1977).

nized by the absence of such discrimination in the making of other comparable decisions."[98] "The historical background of the decision is another evidentiary source, particularly if it reveals a series of official actions taken for invidious purposes. The specific sequence of events leading up to the challenged decision also may shed some light on the decision maker's purposes. . . . Departures from the normal procedural sequence also might afford evidence that improper purposes are playing a role. Substantive departures too may be relevant, particularly if the factors usually considered important by the decision maker strongly favor a decision contrary to the one reached."[99] "The legislative or administrative history may be highly relevant, especially where there are contemporary statements by members of the decision making body, minutes of its meetings, or reports."[100]

[K28] In Hunter, the Court invalidated an Alabama law disenfranchising persons convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude. There was indisputable evidence that the law had a discriminatory effect on blacks as compared to similarly situated whites: blacks were, by even the most modest estimates, at least 1.7 times as likely as whites to suffer disfranchisement under the law in question. Moreover, there was convincing direct evidence that the law had been motivated, at least in part, by a desire to disenfranchise blacks.[101]

b. Selective Prosecution

[K29] In the American criminal justice system, "the Government retains 'broad discretion' as to whom to prosecute."[102] "[S]o long as the prosecutor has probable cause

---

[98] Id. at 266, n.14.

[99] Id. at 267.

[100] Id. at 268. There, the Court upheld a zoning board decision that tended to perpetuate racially segregated housing patterns, since, apart from its effect, the board's decision was shown to be nothing more than an application of a constitutionally neutral zoning policy.

In Mayor of Philadelphia v. Educational Equality League, 415 U.S. 605, 616–21 (1974), the mayor was empowered by the city charter to appoint a nominating panel, which, in turn, submitted to him nominees to fill vacancies on the school board. The panel consisted of 13 members. The mayor should appoint four members from the citizenry at large; each of the remaining nine would be the highest ranking officer of one of nine designated categories of city-wide organizations. Respondents charged that mayor Tate had violated the Equal Protection Clause by discriminating against blacks in appointments to the 1971 panel. The Court rejected the claim, for the record was devoid of reliable proof of racial discrimination. In reaching this conclusion, the Court held, inter alia, that (1) it was unable to conclude that an ambiguous statement purportedly made in 1969 with regard to the racial composition of the then school board proved anything with regard to the mayor's motives two years later in appointing the 1971 nominating panel; (2) racial-composition percentage comparisons were not appropriate in the context of the specific case, where it could be assumed that all citizens were fungible for purposes of determining whether members of a particular class had been unlawfully excluded, since, at least with regard to nine seats on the panel and assuming, arguendo, that percentage comparisons would be meaningful in a case involving discretionary appointments, the relevant universe for comparison purposes should consist of the highest ranking officers of the categories of organizations and institutions specified in the city charter, not the population at large.

[101] Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222, 227–29 (1985). The provision had been enacted by the Alabama Constitutional Convention of 1901, the president of which had stated that the purpose of the convention was the establishment of white supremacy in this state.

[102] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985), quoting United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 380, n.11 (1982).

to believe that the accused committed an offense defined by statute, the decision whether or not to prosecute, and what charge to file or bring before a grand jury, generally rests entirely in his discretion."[103] "This broad discretion rests largely on the recognition that the decision to prosecute is particularly ill-suited to judicial review. Such factors as the strength of the case, the prosecution's general deterrence value, the Government's enforcement priorities, and the case's relationship to the Government's overall enforcement plan are not readily susceptible to the kind of analysis the courts are competent to undertake."[104] "As a result, '[t]he presumption of regularity supports . . . prosecutorial decisions.'"[105] However, "although prosecutorial discretion is broad, it is not 'unfettered. Selectivity in the enforcement of criminal laws is . . . subject to constitutional constraints.'"[106] "In particular, the decision to prosecute may not be 'deliberately based upon an unjustifiable standard such as race, religion, or other arbitrary classification,' . . . including the exercise of protected statutory and constitutional rights."[107] "It is appropriate to judge selective prosecution claims according to ordinary equal protection standards. . . . [T]hese standards require petitioner to show, through clear evidence, both that the passive enforcement system had a discriminatory effect and that it was motivated by a discriminatory purpose."[108] "To establish a discriminatory effect in a race case, the claimant must show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted."[109]

---

[103] Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978).

[104] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985).

[105] United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 464 (1996), quoting United States v. Chem. Found., Inc., 272 U.S. 1, 14 (1926).

[106] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 608 (1985), quoting United States v. Batchelder, 442 U.S. 114, 125 (1979).

[107] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 608 (1985), quoting Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978).

[108] Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 608 (1985).

[109] United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 465 (1996).

The requirement that the claimant show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted has been established in the Court's case law since Ah Sin v. Wittman, 198 U.S. 500 (1905). Ah Sin, a subject of China, petitioned a California state court for a writ of habeas corpus, seeking discharge from imprisonment under a San Francisco County ordinance prohibiting persons from setting up gambling tables in rooms barricaded to stop police from entering. He alleged in his habeas petition "that the ordinance is enforced solely and exclusively against persons of the Chinese race, and not otherwise." The Court rejected his contention that this averment made out a claim under the Equal Protection Clause, because it did not allege "that the conditions and practices to which the ordinance was directed did not exist exclusively among the Chinese, or that there were other offenders against the ordinance than the Chinese as to whom it was not enforced." Id. at 507–08.

The similarly situated requirement does not make a selective prosecution claim impossible to prove. Twenty years before Ah Sin, the Court invalidated an ordinance, also adopted by San Francisco, that prohibited the operation of laundries in wooden buildings. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 374 (1886). The plaintiff in error successfully demonstrated that the ordinance was applied against Chinese nationals but not against other laundry shop operators. The authorities had denied the applications of 200 Chinese subjects for permits to operate shops in wooden buildings, but they granted the applications of 80 individuals who were not Chinese subjects to operate laundries in wooden buildings under similar conditions.

c. Jury Selection

[K30] The Court "has made clear that the Constitution prohibits all forms of purposeful racial discrimination in selection of jurors."[110] "Purposeful racial discrimination in selection of jurors violates a defendant's right to equal protection, because it denies him the protection that a trial by jury is intended to secure."[111] Moreover, considering that "[c]ompetence to serve as a juror ultimately depends on an assessment of individual qualifications and ability impartially to consider evidence presented at a trial," the Court has recognized that, "by denying a person participation in jury service on account of his race, the State unconstitutionally discriminates against the excluded juror."[112] Finally, "[t]he harm from discriminatory jury selection touch[es] the entire community," for such discrimination "undermine[s] public confidence in the fairness of [the American] system of justice."[113]

[K31] In Strauder, the Court invalidated a state statute providing that only white men could serve as jurors. While stating that a defendant has no right to a "petit jury composed in whole or in part of persons of his own race," the Court held that a defendant does have the right to be tried by a jury whose members are selected by non-discriminatory criteria.[114]

[K32] The Constitution requires, however, that courts "look beyond the face of the statute defining juror qualifications, and also consider challenged selection practices to afford 'protection against action of the State through its administrative officers in effecting the prohibited discrimination.'"[115] Thus, "the Court has found a denial of equal protection where the procedures implementing a neutral statute operated to exclude persons from the venire on racial grounds."[116]

[K33] The Court has explained that its "cases concerning selection of the venire reflect the general equal protection principle that the 'invidious quality' of governmental action claimed to be racially discriminatory 'must ultimately be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose.'"[117] The burden is, of course, on the defendant who alleges discriminatory selection of the venire to prove the existence of purposeful discrimination.[118] The Court has recognized that a "defendant alleging that members of his race have been impermissibly excluded from the venire may make out a prima facie case of purposeful discrimination, by showing that the totality of the relevant facts gives rise to an inference of discriminatory purpose."[119] "The defendant initially must show

---

110 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 88 (1986).

111 Id. at 86.

112 Id. at 87.

113 Id.

114 Strauder v. W. Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 305 (1880).

115 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 88 (1986), quoting Norris v. Alabama, 294 U.S. 587, 589, 599 (1935) (a state cannot exclude African-Americans from jury venire on the false assumption that they, as a group, are not qualified to serve as jurors).

116 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 88 (1986), citing Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. 404, 407 (1967) (per curiam); Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545, 548–49 (1967); Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559, 561 (1953).

117 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 93 (1986), quoting Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 240 (1976).

118 Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545, 550 (1967).

119 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 93–94 (1986), citing Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 239–42 (1976).

that he is a member of a racial group capable of being singled out for different treatment. . . . In combination with that evidence, a defendant may then make a prima facie case by proving that, in the particular jurisdiction, members of his race have not been summoned for jury service over an extended period of time. . . . Proof of systematic exclusion from the venire raises an inference of purposeful discrimination, because the result bespeaks discrimination.'"[120] "Since the ultimate issue is whether the State has discriminated in selecting the defendant's venire, however, the defendant may establish a prima facie case 'in other ways than by evidence of long-continued unexplained absence' of members of his race 'from many panels.'"[121] The Court also has found "a prima facie case on proof that members of the defendant's race were substantially underrepresented on the venire from which his jury was drawn, and that the venire was selected under a practice providing the 'opportunity for discrimination.'"[122] "This combination of factors raises the necessary inference of purposeful discrimination because the Court has declined to attribute to chance the absence of black citizens on a particular jury array where the selection mechanism is subject to abuse."[123] In this context, the Court "has never announced mathematical standards, . . . but has, rather, emphasized that a factual inquiry is necessary in each case that takes into account all possible explanatory factors."[124] Once the defendant makes the requisite showing, the burden shifts to the state to explain adequately the racial exclusion. The state must demonstrate that "permissible racially neutral selection criteria and procedures have produced the monochromatic result. . . . [A]ffirmations of good faith in making individual selections are insufficient to dispel a prima facie case of systematic exclusion."[125]

[K34] "While decisions of th[e] Court have been concerned largely with discrimination during selection of the venire, the principles announced there also forbid dis-

---

[120] Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 94 (1986), quoting Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475, 482 (1954).

[121] Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 95 (1986), quoting Cassell v. Texas, 339 U.S. 282, 290 (1950) (plurality opinion).

[122] Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 95 (1986), quoting Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545, 552 (1967). In the latter case, the Court reversed the conviction of a defendant who had been tried before an all-white petit jury. Jurors had been selected from a one-volume tax digest divided into separate sections of blacks and whites; black taxpayers also had a "(c)" after their names, as required by Georgia law at the time. The jury commissioners testified that they were not aware of the "(c)" appearing after the names of the Negro taxpayers; that they had never included or excluded anyone because of race; that they had placed on the jury list only those persons whom they knew personally; and that the jury list they compiled had had no designation of race on it. The county from which jury selection was made was 42 percent black, and 27 percent of the county's taxpayers were blacks. Of the 33 persons drawn for the grand jury panel, three (9 percent) were blacks, while, on the 19-member grand jury, only one was black; on the 90-man venire from which the petit jury was selected, there were seven blacks (8 percent), but no blacks appeared on the actual jury that tried petitioner. The Court held that this combination of factors constituted a prima facie case of discrimination.

Similarly, the Court found that the proof offered by the defendant was sufficient to demonstrate a prima facie case of intentional discrimination in Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 495 (1977) (two-to-one disparity between Mexican-Americans in county population and those summoned for grand jury duty), and in Turner v. Fouche, 396 U.S. 346, 369 (1970) (1.6–to-1 disparity between blacks in county population and those on grand jury lists).

[123] See Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 95 (1986).

[124] Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625, 630 (1972).

[125] Id. at 632.

crimination on account of race in selection of the grand and petit jury. Since the Fourteenth Amendment protects an accused throughout the proceedings bringing him to justice, . . . the State may not draw up its jury lists pursuant to neutral procedures, but then resort to discrimination at 'other stages in the selection process.'"[126]

[K35] In Swain, the Court was confronted with the question whether an African-American defendant was denied equal protection by the state's exercise of peremptory challenges to exclude members of his race from the petit jury. The Court declined to permit an equal protection claim premised on a pattern of jury strikes in a particular case, but it acknowledged that proof of systematic exclusion of black persons through the use of peremptories over a period of time might establish an equal protection violation.[127]

[K36] Batson discarded Swain's evidentiary formulation. The Batson Court held that "a defendant may establish a prima facie case of purposeful discrimination in selection of the petit jury based solely on the prosecutor's exercise of peremptory challenges at the defendant's trial. To establish such a case, the defendant first must show that he is a member of a cognizable racial group, . . . and that the prosecutor has exercised peremptory challenges to remove from the venire members of the defendant's race. Second, the defendant is entitled to rely on the fact, as to which there can be no dispute, that peremptory challenges constitute a jury selection practice that permits 'those to discriminate who are of a mind to discriminate.' . . . Finally, the defendant must show that these facts and any other relevant circumstances raise an inference that the prosecutor used that practice to exclude the veniremen from the petit jury on account of [126] Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 88 (1986), quoting Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559, 562 (1953). The rule requiring reversal of the conviction of a defendant indicted by a grand jury from which members of his own race were systematically excluded is not to be abandoned on the theory that discrimination in the grand jury amounted to harmless error, and that the defendant's conviction after a fair trial purged any taint attributable to the grand jury process. Intentional discrimination in the selection of grand jurors is a grave constitutional trespass. "[E]ven if the grand jury's determination of probable cause to believe that a defendant has committed a crime is confirmed in hindsight by a conviction on the indicted offense, that confirmation does not suggest that discrimination did not impermissibly infect the framing of the indictment and, consequently, the nature or existence of the proceedings to come." And "[j]ust as a conviction is void under the Equal Protection Clause if the prosecutor deliberately charged the defendant on account of his race, . . . a conviction cannot be understood to cure the taint attributable to a grand jury selected on the basis of race." See Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 263–64 (1986).

---

In Hobby v. United States, 468 U.S. 339 (1984), the Court acknowledged that discriminatory selection of grand jury foremen violated the Constitution, but it concluded that reversing the petitioner's conviction was an inappropriate remedy for the violation, since grand jury foremen played a minor part ("essentially clerical in nature") in federal prosecutions. Id. at 344–45.

In Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474 (1990), the Court held that a defendant could not rely on the Sixth Amendment to object to the exclusion of members of any distinctive group at the peremptory challenge stage. The Court noted that the peremptory challenge procedure has acceptance in the American legal tradition. On this reasoning, it declined to permit an objection to the peremptory challenge of a juror on racial grounds as a Sixth Amendment matter. As the Holland Court made explicit, however, racial exclusion of prospective jurors violates the overriding command of the Equal Protection Clause, and "race-based exclusion is no more permissible at the individual petit jury stage than at the venire stage." Id. at 479.

[127] Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, 224–28 (1965).

their race. This combination of factors in the empaneling of the petit jury, as in the selection of the venire, raises the necessary inference of purposeful discrimination."[128] "In deciding whether the defendant has made the requisite showing, the trial court should consider all relevant circumstances. For example, a 'pattern' of strikes against black jurors included in the particular venire might give rise to an inference of discrimination. Similarly, the prosecutor's questions and statements during voir dire examination and in exercising his challenges may support or refute an inference of discriminatory purpose."[129] "Once the defendant makes a prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the State to come forward with a neutral explanation for challenging black jurors. Though this requirement imposes a limitation in some cases on the full peremptory character of the historic challenge, the Court has emphasized that the prosecutor's explanation need not rise to the level justifying exercise of a challenge for cause. . . . But the prosecutor may not rebut the defendant's prima facie case of discrimination by stating merely that he challenged jurors of the defendant's race on the assumption—or his intuitive judgment—that they would be partial to the defendant because of their shared race. . . . Just as the Equal Protection Clause forbids the States to exclude black persons from the venire on the assumption that blacks as a group are unqualified to serve as jurors, . . . so it forbids the States to strike black veniremen on the assumption that they will be biased in a particular case simply because the defendant is black. . . . Nor may the prosecutor rebut the defendant's case merely by denying that he had a discriminatory motive or 'affirm[ing] [his] good faith in making individual selections.' . . . The prosecutor therefore must articulate a neutral explanation related to the particular case to be tried. The trial court then will have the duty to determine if the defendant has established purposeful discrimination."[130]

---

[128] Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 96 (1986).

[129] Id. at 96–97.

[130] Id. at 97–98. The trial court's decision on the ultimate question of discriminatory intent represents a finding of fact of the sort accorded appropriate deference on appeal. Id. at 98, n.21. The Court reviews for "clear error" the trial court's finding as to discriminatory intent. See Hernandez v. New York, 500 U.S. 352, 364 (1991) (plurality opinion); id. at 372 (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment).

The prosecutor must give a "clear and reasonably specific" explanation of his "legitimate reasons" for exercising the challenges. See Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 98, n.20 (1986), quoting Texas Dep't of Cmty. Affairs v. Burdine, 450 U.S. 248, 258 (1981).

Under Batson, "once the opponent of a peremptory challenge has made out a prima facie case of racial discrimination (step one), the burden of production shifts to the proponent of the strike to come forward with a race-neutral explanation (step two). If a race-neutral explanation is tendered, the trial court must then decide (step three) whether the opponent of the strike has proved purposeful racial discrimination." See Purkett v. Elem, 514 U.S. 765, 767 (1995) (per curiam).

Batson does not permit a state to require at step one that the objector show that it is "more likely than not" the other party's peremptory challenges, if unexplained, were based on impermissible group bias. "Instead, a defendant satisfies Batson's first step by producing evidence sufficient to permit the trial judge to draw an inference that discrimination has occurred." See Johnson v. California, 545 U.S. 162, 170 (2005).

At the second step of the inquiry, "the issue is the facial validity of the prosecutor's explanation. Unless a discriminatory intent is inherent in the prosecutor's explanation, the reason offered will be deemed race-neutral. . . . [Hence,] [i]t is not until the third step that the persuasiveness of the justification becomes relevant—the step in which the trial court determines whether the opponent of the strike has carried his burden of proving purposeful discrimina-

[K37] In the early 1990s, the Court applied the Batson framework in three other contexts. In Powers v. Ohio, it held that, in the trial of a white criminal defendant, a prosecutor is prohibited from excluding African-American jurors on the basis of race. Bearing in mind that racial discrimination in jury selection harms the excluded jurors and "casts doubt on the integrity of the judicial process," the Court announced that racial identity between the objecting defendant and the excluded jurors does not constitute a relevant pre-condition for a Batson challenge, and would, in fact, contravene the substantive guarantees of the Equal Protection Clause.[131] Further, McCollum held that the Constitution prohibits a criminal defendant from engaging in purposeful discrimination on the ground of race in the exercise of peremptory challenges. In so holding, the Court observed, inter alia, that racially discriminatory challenges harm the individual juror by subjecting him to "open and public racial discrimination" and harm the community by undermining public confidence in this country's system of justice.[132] On similar grounds, Edmonson decided that in a civil case, private litigants cannot exercise their peremptory strikes in a racially discriminatory manner.[133]

d. Capital Sentencing

[K38] A criminal defendant alleging an equal protection violation "must prove that the purposeful discrimination had a discriminatory effect on him." Thus, to prevail under the equal protection guarantee, one who received the death penalty "must prove that the decisionmakers in his case acted with discriminatory purpose."[134] The nature of the capital sentencing decision, and the relationship of the statistics to that decision, are fundamentally different from the corresponding elements in other contexts, where the Court has accepted statistics as proof of intent to discriminate, such as the venire selection. "Most importantly, each particular decision to impose the death penalty is made by a petit jury selected from a properly constituted venire. Each jury is unique in its composition, and the Constitution requires that its decision rest on consideration of innumerable factors that vary according to the characteristics of the individual defendant and the facts of the particular capital offense. . . . Thus, the application of an infertion. At that stage, implausible or fantastic justifications may (and probably will) be found to be pretexts for purposeful discrimination. But to say that a trial judge may choose to disbelieve a silly or superstitious reason at step three is quite different from saying that a trial judge must terminate the inquiry at step two when the race-neutral reason is silly or superstitious. The latter violates the principle that the ultimate burden of persuasion regarding racial motivation rests with, and never shifts from, the opponent of the strike." See Purkett v. Elem, 514 U.S. 765, 768 (1995) (per curiam).

---

131 Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 406 (1991). A criminal defendant has standing to raise the third-party equal protection claims of jurors excluded by the prosecution because of their race. See, in extenso, para. A26.

132 Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 49–50 (1992). The Court also pointed out that removing a juror whom the defendant believes harbors racial prejudice is different from exercising a peremptory challenge to discriminate invidiously against jurors on account of race. Id. at 59.

133 Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991). A private civil litigant may raise the equal protection claim of a person whom the opposing party has excluded from jury service on account of race. See, in extenso, para. A26.

134 McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 292 (1987).

ence drawn from the general statistics to a specific decision in a trial and sentencing simply is not comparable to the application of an inference drawn from general statistics to a specific venire-selection."[135] Another important difference between the cases in which statistics are proof of discriminatory intent and a capital sentencing case is that, in the former cases, the decisionmaker has an opportunity to explain the statistical disparity. By contrast, controlling considerations of public policy, dictate that jurors "'cannot be called . . . to testify to the motives and influences that led to their verdict.' . . . Similarly, the policy considerations behind a prosecutor's traditionally 'wide discretion' suggest the impropriety of requiring prosecutors to defend their decisions to seek death penalties, often years after they were made. . . . Because discretion is essential to the criminal justice process, exceptionally clear proof [is required before the Court will] infer that the discretion has been abused."[136]

---

[135] Id. at 294.

[136] Id. at 296–97. In that case, an African-American, argued that the Georgia capital sentencing scheme was administered in a racially discriminatory manner, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, he offered no evidence specific to his own case that would support an inference that racial considerations had played a part in his sentence; instead, he relied solely on a statistical study (the Baldus study). In addition, there was no evidence that the legislature had either enacted the statute to further a racially discriminatory purpose or maintained the statute, because of the racially disproportionate impact, suggested by the Baldus study. Hence, the Court rejected the allegation.

The Court also found that the Baldus study did not demonstrate that the Georgia capital sentencing system violated the Eighth Amendment. First, McCleskey could not successfully argue that the sentence in his case was disproportionate to the sentences in other murder cases. On the one hand, he could not base a constitutional claim on an argument that his case differed from other cases in which defendants had received the death penalty. The Georgia supreme court had found that his death sentence was not disproportionate to other death sentences imposed in the state. On the other hand, absent a showing that the Georgia capital punishment system operated in an arbitrary and capricious manner, he could not prove a constitutional violation by demonstrating that other defendants who might be similarly situated had not received the death penalty. The opportunities for discretionary leniency under state law do not render the capital sentences imposed arbitrary and capricious. Because petitioner's sentence had been imposed under Georgia sentencing procedures that focused discretion "on the particularized nature of the crime and the particularized characteristics of the individual defendant," it might be presumed that his death sentence had not been "wantonly and freakishly" imposed, and, thus, the sentence was not disproportionate within any recognized meaning under the Eighth Amendment. Further, the Court rejected the contention that the Baldus study showed that Georgia's capital punishment system was arbitrary and capricious in application. The statistics did not prove that race entered into any capital sentencing decisions or that race had been a factor in petitioner's case. At most, the Baldus study indicated a discrepancy that appeared to correlate with race, but this discrepancy did not constitute a major systemic defect. Any mode for determining guilt or punishment has its weaknesses and the potential for misuse. Despite such imperfections, constitutional guarantees are met when the mode for determining guilt or punishment has been surrounded with safeguards to make it as fair as possible. The Court emphasized that "where the discretion that is fundamental to our criminal process is involved, we decline to assume that what is unexplained is invidious," and it concluded that the Constitution "does not require that a State eliminate any demonstrable disparity that correlates with a potentially irrelevant factor in order to operate a criminal justice system that includes capital punishment." Id. at 292–319.

e. In the School Context[137]

[K39] A "finding that the pupil population in [a school district] is not homogeneous, standing by itself, is not a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in the absence of a showing that this condition resulted from intentionally segregative actions on the part of the [School] Board."[138] "[E]xisting policy and practice with regard to faculty, staff, transportation, extracurricular activities, and facilities [a]re among the most important indicia of a segregated system."[139] Keyes, the first case that involved a school system without a history of statutorily mandated racial assignment, held that proof of "intentionally segregative school board actions in a meaningful portion of a school system . . . creates a presumption that other segregated schooling within the system is not adventitious. It establishes, in other words, a prima facie case of unlawful segregative design on the part of school authorities, and shifts to those authorities the burden of proving that other segregated schools within the system are not also the result of intentionally segregative actions."[140]

7. Remedying Segregation

a. Public Schools and Universities

[K40] On May 17, 1954, Brown I decided that segregation of the races in the public schools was unconstitutional.[141] In that case, the Court left undecided the manner in which the transition from segregated to unitary school systems would be achieved, and set the case down for another hearing, inviting the Attorney General of the United States and the Attorneys General of the states providing for racial segregation in the public schools to present their views on the best ways to implement and enforce the judgment. The Court devoted four days to the argument on this single problem, and all the affected parties were given the opportunity to present their views at length. After careful consideration of the many viewpoints so fully aired by the parties, the Court announced its decision in Brown II. There, the Court "held that the primary responsibility for abolishing the system of segregated schools would rest with the local school authorities. In some of the States that [had] argued before [the Court,] the laws permitted, but did not require, racial segregation, and, in some of these States, 'substantial steps to eliminate racial discrimination in public schools ha[d] already been taken.'

---

137 See also para. K42, n.149.

138 Dayton Bd. of Educ. v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 413 (1977) (Dayton I).

139 Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 1, 18 (1971).

140 Keyes v. Sch. Dist. No. 1, Denver, Colorado, 413 U.S. 189, 201, 208 (1973). See also Columbus Bd. of Educ. v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 467–68 (1979) ("[P]urposeful discrimination in a substantial part of a school system furnishes a sufficient basis for an inferential finding of a system-wide discriminatory intent unless otherwise rebutted, and . . . given the purpose to operate a dual school system, one could infer a connection between such a purpose and racial separation in other parts of the school system.").

In Keyes, supra, at 197–98, the Court also held that though of different origins, African-Americans and Latinos in Denver suffered identical discrimination in treatment when compared with the treatment afforded Caucasian students. Hence, petitioners were entitled to have schools with a combined predominance of blacks and Hispanics included in the category of "segregated" schools.

141 Brown v. Bd. of Educ. of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) (Brown I).

. . . Many other States had for many years maintained a completely separate system of schools for whites and nonwhites, and the laws of these States, both civil and criminal, had been written to keep this segregated system of schools inviolate. The practices, habits, and customs had for generations made this segregated school system a fixed part of the daily life and expectations of the people. Recognizing these indisputable facts, [the Court] neither expected nor ordered that a complete abandonment of the old and adoption of a new system be accomplished overnight. The changes were to be made 'at the earliest practicable date,' and with 'all deliberate speed.' . . . [The Court was] not content, however, to leave this task in the unsupervised hands of local school authorities, trained as most would be under the old laws and practices, with loyalties to the system of separate white and [black] schools. . . . The problem of delays by local school authorities during the transition period was therefore to be the responsibility of courts, local courts so far as practicable, those courts to be guided by traditional equitable flexibility to shape remedies in order to adjust and reconcile public and private needs."[142] These courts were charged in the Brown II opinion with a duty to: "require that the defendants [local school authorities] make a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with [the Court's] May 17, 1954, ruling. Once such a start has been made, the courts may find that additional time is necessary to carry out the ruling in an effective manner. The burden rests upon the defendants to establish that such time is necessary in the public interest and is consistent with good faith compliance at the earliest practicable date. To that end, the courts may consider problems related to administration arising from the physical condition of the school plant, the school transportation system, personnel, revision of school districts and attendance areas into compact units to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis, and revision of local laws and regulations which may be necessary in solving the foregoing problems. They will also consider the adequacy of any plans the defendants may propose to meet these problems and to effectuate a transition to a racially nondiscriminatory school system."[143] [K41] In this context, federal courts are required "to focus upon three factors. In the first place, like other equitable remedies, the nature of the desegregation remedy is to be determined by the nature and scope of the constitutional violation. . . . The remedy must therefore be related to 'the condition alleged to offend the Constitution.' . . . Second, the decree must indeed be remedial in nature, that is, it must be designed as nearly as possible 'to restore the victims of discriminatory conduct to the position they

---

[142] See United States v. Montgomery County Bd. of Educ., 395 U.S. 225, 226–27 (1969), discussing and quoting Brown v. Bd. of Educ. of Topeka, 349 U.S. 294, 299–301 (1955) (Brown II).

[143] Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 349 U.S. 294, 300–01 (1955).

Whether the action affecting dismantling of a dual school system is initiated by the legislature or by the school board is immaterial; the criterion is whether the process of school desegregation. See United States v. Scotland Neck Bd. of Educ., 407 U.S. 484, 488–89 (1972).

Recognition of the possible need for delay was not extended to desegregation of state colleges or universities in which like problems were not presented. See, e.g., Florida ex rel. Hawkins v. Board of Control, 350 U.S. 413, 414 (1956), where, in remanding on the authority of Brown, the Court said that, "[a]s this case involves the admission of a Negro to a graduate professional school, there is no reason for delay. He is entitled to prompt admission under the rules and regulations applicable to other qualified candidates."

In Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 16 (1958), the Court declared that "[t]he constitutional rights of [black students] are not to be sacrificed or yielded to [interracial] violence and disorder."

would have occupied in the absence of such conduct.' . . . Third, the federal courts, in devising a remedy, must take into account the interests of state and local authorities in managing their own affairs, consistent with the Constitution."[144]

[K42] "In considering whether the vestiges of de jure segregation had been eliminated as far as practicable, the District Court should look not only at student assignments, but 'to every facet of school operations—faculty, staff, transportation, extracurricular activities and facilities.'"[145] The earliest post-Brown school cases in the Court only intimated that a transition to a racially nondiscriminatory school system required adoption of a policy of non-discriminatory admission.[146] It was not until the 1967 Term that the Court indicated that school systems with a history of statutorily mandated separation of the races would have to do more than simply permit black students

---

[144] Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 280–81 (1977) (Milliken II), quoting Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 738, 746 (1974). See also Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70, 89 (1995) ("Proper analysis of the District Court's orders challenged . . . must rest upon their serving as proper means to the end of restoring the victims of discriminatory conduct to the position they would have occupied in the absence of that conduct and their eventual restoration of state and local authorities to the control of a school system that is operating in compliance with the Constitution.").

"The concept of unitariness has been a helpful one in defining the scope of the district courts' authority, for it conveys the central idea that a school district that was once a dual system must be examined in all of its facets, both when a remedy is ordered and in the later phases of desegregation when the question is whether the district courts' remedial control ought to be modified, lessened, or withdrawn. But . . . the term 'unitary' is not a precise concept, . . . [and] does not confine the discretion and authority of the District Court in a way that departs from traditional equitable principles." See Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 486–87 (1992).

In Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 420 (1977), the Court said: "If . . . violations are found, the District Court in the first instance, subject to review by the Court of Appeals, must determine how much incremental segregative effect these violations had on the racial distribution of the . . . school population as presently constituted, when that distribution is compared to what it would have been in the absence of such constitutional violations. The remedy must be designed to redress that difference, and only if there has been a systemwide impact may there be a systemwide remedy."

[145] Bd. of Educ. of Oklahoma City v. Dowell, 498 U.S. 237, 250 (1991), quoting Green v. New Kent County Sch. Bd., 391 U.S. 430, 435 (1968).

[146] See Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958); Goss v. Bd. of Educ., 373 U.S. 683 (1963); Griffin v. Sch. Bd., 377 U.S. 218 (1964). In discussing the Brown II mandate, the Court in Cooper v. Aaron, supra, at 7, observed: "Of course, in many locations, obedience to the duty of desegregation would require the immediate general admission of Negro children, otherwise qualified as students for their appropriate classes, at particular schools. On the other hand, a District Court, after analysis of the relevant factors (which, of course, excludes hostility to racial desegregation), might conclude that justification existed for not requiring the present nonsegregated admission of all qualified Negro children. In such circumstances, however, the Court should scrutinize the program of the school authorities to make sure that they had developed arrangements pointed toward the earliest practicable completion of desegregation, and had taken appropriate steps to put their program into effective operation." A similar limited expectation pervades Goss v. Board of Education, 373 U.S. 683, 687 (1963), where the Court invalidated court-ordered desegregation plans that permitted transfers on the basis of race. Specifically, the desegregation plan called for the redrawing of school districts without reference to race, but explicitly authorized transfers by students of one race from a school where their race was a minority to a school where their race was a majority. There was no provision for majority-to-minority school transfers. The Court objected to the explicit racial character of the transfer program.

to attend white schools and vice versa. In Green, the Court had before it a "freedom of choice" plan, put forward as a desegregation remedy, under which individual students could specify which of two local schools they would attend. The Court held that adoption of a freedom of choice plan did not, by itself, satisfy a school district's mandatory responsibility to eliminate all vestiges of a dual system. As the Court pointed out, school boards operating such systems were "clearly charged with the affirmative duty to take whatever steps might be necessary to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch."[147] Green was a turning point in the Court's law in a further respect. Concerned by more than a decade of inaction, the Court stated that "the time for mere 'deliberate speed' has run out."[148] The Court added that the obligation of school districts, once segregated by law, was to come forward with a plan that "promises realistically to work, and promises realistically to work now . . . until it is clear that state-imposed segregation has been completely removed."[149] [147] Green v. New Kent County Sch. Bd., 391 U.S. 430, 437–38 (1968) (emphasis added).

---

[148] Id. at 438.

[149] Id. at 439. The Court found that the challenged plan had proved to be ineffective, since the school system remained a dual system. In the three years following court approval of the "freedom of choice" plan in the county, not a single white child had chosen to attend the historically black school, which continued to serve 85 percent of the county's black schoolchildren. The Green Court concluded that, in the absence of other efforts at desegregation, the plan was not sufficient to provide the remedy mandated by Brown II. Id. at 441.

In Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, 443 U.S. 526, 538 (1979) (Dayton II) (emphasis added), the Court made clear that the measure of the post-Brown I conduct of a school board under an unsatisfied duty to liquidate a dual system is "the effectiveness, not the purpose, of the actions in decreasing or increasing the segregation caused by the dual system." Hence, the board had "to do more than abandon its prior discriminatory purpose." The board had "an affirmative responsibility to see that pupil assignment policies and school construction and abandonment practices 'are not used and do not serve to perpetuate or re-establish the dual school system,' . . . and the Board has a heavy burden of showing that actions that increased or continued the effects of the dual system serve important and legitimate ends."

Monroe v. Board of Commissioners, 391 U.S. 450 (1968) was handed down on the same day as Green. At issue in that case was a "free transfer," rather than "freedom of choice" plan. The "free transfer" provisions were part of a court-ordered plan that essentially instituted a neighborhood school policy for the three junior high schools in the system. Any child could transfer to another school if space was available, i.e., if there were no neighborhood zone residents to fill the spaces. No bus service was provided. The Court did not object to the neighborhood school policy as part of a remedy, even though some neighborhoods were racially identifiable, but it found that the effect of the free transfer policy was to maintain the racial characters of the three junior high schools. One remained all black, and another 99 percent white. Since it had not been shown that the "free-transfer" plan would further, rather than delay conversion to a unitary nonracial system, it was found to be unacceptable, and the school board should formulate a new plan promising realistically to convert promptly to a system without a "white" school and a "black" school, but just schools.

Bazemore v. Friday, 478 U.S. 385, 407 (1986) "raised the issue whether the financing and operational assistance provided by a state university's extension service to voluntary 4-H and Homemaker Clubs was inconsistent with the Equal Protection Clause because of the existence of numerous all-white and all-black clubs. Though, prior to 1965, the clubs were supported on a segregated basis, the District Court had found that the policy of segregation had been completely abandoned, and that no evidence existed of any lingering discrimination in either services or membership; any racial imbalance resulted from the wholly voluntary and unfettered [K43] That brings the history of school desegregation litigation to Swann, which permitted federal courts to order busing, to set racial targets for school populations, and to alter attendance zones. Swann stated that, "[i]n devising remedies for legally imposed segregation, the responsibility of the local authorities and district courts is to ensure that future school construction and abandonment are not used and do not serve to perpetuate or re-establish the dual school system."[150] The Court identified four essential problem areas with respect to student assignments:

> (1) to what extent racial balance or racial quotas may be used as an implement in a remedial order to correct a previously segregated system;
>
> (2) whether every all-Negro and all-white school must be eliminated as an indispensable part of a remedial process of desegregation;
>
> (3) what the limits are, if any, on the rearrangement of school districts and attendance zones, as a remedial measure; and
>
> (4) what the limits are, if any, on the use of transportation facilities to correct state-enforced racial school segregation.[151]

As to the first question, the Court stressed that "[t]he constitutional command to desegregate schools does not mean that every school in the community must always reflect the racial composition of the system as a whole. . . . [However,] [a]wareness of the racial composition of the whole school system is likely to be a useful starting point in shaping a remedy to correct past constitutional violations. [Hence, a] limited use made of mathematical ratios was within the equitable remedial discretion of the District Court."[152] Second, the Court held that, while "the existence of some small number of one-race, or virtually one-race, schools within a district is not, in and of itself, the mark of a system that still practices segregation by law, [district courts] or school authorities should make every effort to achieve the greatest possible degree of actual desegregation, and will thus necessarily be concerned with the elimination of one-race schools. No per se rule can adequately embrace all the difficulties of reconciling the competing interests involved; but, in a system with a history of segregation, the need for remedial criteria of sufficient specificity to assure a school authority's compliance with its constitutional duty warrants a presumption against schools that are substantially disproportionate in their racial composition. Where the school authority's proposed plan for conversion from a dual to a unitary system contemplates the continued existence of some schools choice of private individuals. . . . In this context, the Court held inapplicable the Green Court's judgment that a voluntary choice program was insufficient to dismantle a de jure dual system in public primary and secondary schools, but only after satisfying itself that the State had not fostered segregation by playing a part in the decision of which club an individual chose to join." See United States v. Fordice, 505 U.S. 717, 730 (1992).

---

There were two school desegregation cases heard in the Court in the years between Green and Swann. Alexander v. Holmes County Board of Education, 396 U.S. 19 (1969), reiterated that the era of "all deliberate speed" had ended. United States v. Montgomery County Board of Education, 395 U.S. 225 (1969), allowed federal courts to desegregate faculty and staff according to specific mathematical ratios, with the ultimate goal that each school in the system would have roughly the same proportions of white and black faculty.

150 Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 1, 21 (1971).

151 Id. at 22.

152 Id. at 24–25.

that are all or predominately of one race, they have the burden of showing that such school assignments are genuinely nondiscriminatory."[153] In this context, "[a]n optional majority-to-minority transfer provision constitutes a useful part of every desegregation plan. Provision for optional transfer of those in the majority racial group of a particular school to other schools where they will be in the minority is an indispensable remedy for those students willing to transfer to other schools in order to lessen the impact on them of the state-imposed stigma of segregation. In order to be effective, such a transfer arrangement must grant the transferring student free transportation and space must be made available in the school to which he desires to move."[154] Third, the Court decided that the remedial altering of attendance zones is not, "as an interim corrective measure, . . . beyond the remedial powers of a court."[155] "'Racially neutral' assignment plans proposed by school authorities to a district court may be inadequate; such plans may fail to counteract the continuing effects of past school segregation resulting from discriminatory location of school sites or distortion of school size in order to achieve or maintain an artificial racial separation. When school authorities present a district court with a 'loaded game board,' affirmative action in the form of remedial altering of attendance zones is proper to achieve truly nondiscriminatory assignments. In short, an assignment plan is not acceptable simply because it appears to be neutral."[156] "[T]he pairing and grouping of noncontiguous school zones is a permissible tool, and such action is to be considered in light of the objectives sought. . . . Maps do not tell the whole story, since noncontiguous school zones may be more accessible to each other in terms of the critical travel time, because of traffic patterns and good highways, than schools geographically closer together. Conditions in different localities will vary so widely that no rigid rules can be laid down to govern all situations."[157] As to transportation of students, the remedial technique of requiring bus transportation as a tool of school desegregation is within a district court's power to provide equitable relief. "An objection to transportation may have validity when the time or distance of travel is so great as to risk either the health of the children or significantly impinge on the educational process."[158] Finally, the Swann Court noted that "[n]either school authorities nor district courts are constitutionally required to make year-by-year adjustments of the racial composition of student bodies once the affirmative duty to desegregate has been accomplished and racial discrimination through official action is eliminated from the system."[159]

---

153 Id. at 26.

154 Id. at 26–27.

155 Id. at 27.

156 Id. at 28.

157 Id. at 28–29.

158 Id. at 30–31.

159 Id. at 31–32. In Pasadena City Board of Education v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424 (1976), held that a district court had exceeded its remedial authority in requiring annual readjustment of school attendance zones in the Pasadena school district when changes in the racial makeup of the schools were caused by demographic shifts "not attributed to any segregative acts on the part of the [school district]." Id. at 436.

North Carolina Board of Education v. Swann, 402 U.S. 43 (1971), invalidated a state law that flatly forbade assignment of any student on account of race or for the purpose of creating a racial balance or ratio in the schools and that prohibited busing for such purposes. As the Court noted, "[j]ust as the race of students must be considered in determining whether a constitutional violation has occurred, so also must race be considered in formulating a remedy. To for-[K44] Substantial local control of public education in the United States is a deeply rooted tradition. Hence, "school district lines may [not] be casually ignored or treated as a mere administrative convenience."[160] In Milliken I, the Court determined that a desegregation remedy that would require mandatory inter-district reassignment of students throughout the Detroit metropolitan area was an impermissible inter-district response to the intra-district violation identified. In that case, the lower courts had ordered an inter-district remedy, because "any less comprehensive a solution than a metropolitan area plan would result in an all black school system immediately surrounded by practically all white suburban school systems, with an overwhelmingly white majority population in the total metropolitan area." The Court held that, before a district court can order an inter-district remedy, there must be a showing that "there has been a constitutional violation within one district that produces a significant segregative effect in another district. Specifically, it must be shown that racially discriminatory acts of the state or local school districts, or of a single school district have been a substantial cause of inter-district segregation. Thus, an inter-district remedy might be in order where the racially discriminatory acts of one or more school districts caused racial segregation in an adjacent district, or where district lines have been deliberately drawn on the basis of race."[161] Because the record contained evidence of de jure segregated conditions only in the Detroit schools, and there had been no showing of significant violation by the 53 outlying school districts and no evidence of inter-district violation or effect, the Court reversed the district court's grant of inter-district relief.[162]

[K45] A formerly de jure segregated school district has to provide its victims with "make whole" relief. A school desegregation decree must "restore the victims of discriminatory conduct to the position they would have occupied in the absence of such conduct."[163] Children who have been educationally and culturally set apart from the larger community may acquire habits of speech, conduct, and attitudes reflecting their cultural isolation. In light of the above, Milliken II upheld remedial education programs and other measures (such as guidance and counseling programs) for schoolchildren who had been subjected to past acts of de jure segregation.[164] bid . . . all assignments made on the basis of race would deprive school authorities of the one tool absolutely essential to fulfillment of their constitutional obligation to eliminate existing dual school systems. . . . [L]ikewise an absolute prohibition against transportation of students assigned on the basis of race, or for the purpose of creating a balance or ratio, will similarly hamper the ability of local authorities to effectively remedy constitutional violations." Id. at 46.

---

160 Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 741 (1974) (Milliken I).

161 Id. at 745.

162 Justice Stewart provided the Court's fifth vote and wrote separately to underscore his understanding of the decision. In describing the requirements for imposing an "inter-district" remedy, Justice Stewart stated: "Were it to be shown, for example, that state officials had contributed to the separation of the races by drawing or redrawing school district lines; by transfer of school units between districts; or by purposeful, racially discriminatory use of state housing or zoning laws, then a decree calling for the transfer of pupils across district lines or for restructuring of district lines might well be appropriate. In this case, however, no such interdistrict violation was shown." Id. at 755 (concurring opinion). Justice Stewart concluded that the Court properly rejected the district court's interdistrict remedy because "[t]here were no findings that the differing racial composition between schools in the city and in the outlying suburbs was caused by official activity of any sort." Id. at 757.

163 Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 746 (1974).

164 Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 280, n.15, 287–88 (1977) (Milliken II).

[K46] Federal court injunctions entered in school desegregation cases are not intended to operate in perpetuity; "federal supervision of local school systems always was intended as a temporary measure to remedy past discrimination. . . . The legal justification for displacement of local authority by an injunctive decree in a school desegregation case is a violation of the Constitution by the local authorities. Dissolving a desegregation decree after the local authorities have operated in compliance with it for a reasonable period of time" is proper.[165] Among the factors that must inform the court's discretion to order the incremental withdrawal of its supervision in an equitable manner are the following: "whether there has been full and satisfactory compliance with the decree in those aspects of the system where supervision is to be withdrawn; whether retention of judicial control is necessary or practicable to achieve compliance with the decree in other facets of the school system; and whether the school district has demonstrated, to the public and to the parents and students of the once disfavored race, its good faith commitment to the whole of the court's decree and to those provisions of the law and the constitution that were the predicate for judicial intervention in the first instance."[166] "In considering these factors, a court should give particular attention to the school system's record of compliance. A school system is better positioned to demonstrate its good faith commitment to a constitutional course of action when its policies form a consistent pattern of lawful conduct directed to eliminating earlier violations. And with the passage of time, the degree to which racial imbalances continue to represent vestiges of a constitutional violation may diminish, and the practicability and efficacy of various remedies can be evaluated with more precision."[167]

[K47] In Fordice, the Court decided what standards to apply in determining whether a state has met its affirmative obligation to dismantle its prior de jure segregated system in the university context. There, the Court held that "[i]f the State perpetuates policies and practices traceable to its prior system that continue to have segregative effects—whether by influencing student enrollment decisions or by fostering segregation in other facets of the university system—and such policies are without sound educational justification and can be practicably eliminated, the State has not satisfied its burden of proving that it has dismantled its prior system. Such policies run afoul of the Equal Protection Clause, even if the State has abolished the legal requirement that whites and blacks be educated separately and has established racially neutral policies not animated by a discriminatory purpose."[168]

b. Desegregation and Private Schools that Discriminate Racially [169]

[K48] "Racial discrimination in state-operated schools is barred by the Constitution and it is also axiomatic that a state may not induce, encourage or promote private per-

---

165 Bd. of Educ. of Oklahoma City v. Dowell, 498 U.S. 237, 247–48 (1991).

166 Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 491 (1992).

167 Id. at 491–92.

168 United States v. Fordice, 505 U.S. 717, 731–32 (1992). Applying this legal standard, the Court found that "there [we]re several surviving aspects of Mississippi's prior dual system which [we]re constitutionally suspect; for even though such policies [might] be race-neutral on their face, they substantially restrict[ed] a person's choice of which institution to enter, and they contribute[d] to the racial identifiability of the eight public universities. Mississippi [should] justify these policies or eliminate them." Id. at 733.

169 See also paras. H53, I436.

sons to accomplish what it is constitutionally forbidden to accomplish."[170] Norwood considered a Mississippi program that provided textbooks to students attending both public and private schools, without regard to whether any participating school had racially discriminatory policies. The Court emphasized that "the Constitution does not permit the State to aid discrimination, even when there is no precise causal relationship between state financial aid to a private school and the continued wellbeing of that school."[171] "[A]ny tangible state assistance, outside the generalized services government might provide to private segregated schools in common with other schools, and with all citizens, is constitutionally prohibited if it has 'a significant tendency to facilitate, reinforce, and support private discrimination.'"[172]

[K49] Griffin involved a situation where a county's school system literally closed down its schools, rather than desegregate, and, at the same time, it assumed "responsibility for furnishing free lunches, transportation, and grants-in-aid to the children" attending private segregated schools. The Court found that the county's school children were treated differently from those of other counties, since they should go to private schools or none at all. Moreover, the plan was aimed at "the perpetuation of racial segregation by closing public schools and operating only segregated schools supported directly or indirectly by state or county funds." The decree endorsed by the Court was an order enjoining the county officials from paying county tuition grants or giving tax exemptions and from processing applications for state tuition grants so long as the county's public schools remained closed. Relatedly, the Court noted that "the District Court may, if necessary to prevent further racial discrimination, require the Supervisors to exercise the power that is theirs to levy taxes to raise funds adequate to reopen, operate, and maintain without racial discrimination a public school system" in the county like that operated in other counties in Virginia.[173]

[K50] In Gilmore, the plaintiffs alleged that a city was violating the Equal Protection Clause by permitting racially discriminatory private schools and other groups to use the public parks. The Court found that permitting exclusive use by school groups was unlawful, because it violated the city's constitutional obligation, spelled out in an outstanding school desegregation order, to take no action that would impede the integration of the public schools. Exclusive availabililty of the public parks significantly "enhanced the attractiveness of segregated private schools, formed in reaction against the federal court school order, by enabling them to offer complete athletic programs. The city's provision of stadiums and recreational fields resulted in capital savings for those schools and enabled them to divert their own funds to other educational programs. It also provided the opportunity for the schools to operate concessions that generated revenue. . . . [T]his assistance significantly tended to undermine the federal court order mandating the establishment and maintenance of a unitary school system in the city. It therefore [170] Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 465 (1973). See also Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 19 (1958) ("State support of segregated schools through any arrangement, management, funds, or property cannot be squared with the [Fourteenth] Amendment's command that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.").

---

[171] Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 465–66 (1973).

[172] Gilmore v. City of Montgomery, 417 U.S. 556 (1974), quoting Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 466 (1973).

[173] Griffin v. Sch. Bd., 377 U.S. 218, 230–33 (1964).

was wholly proper for the city to be enjoined from permitting exclusive access to public recreational facilities by segregated private schools and by groups affiliated with such schools."[174]

c. Public Parks and Other Recreational Facilities[175]

[K51] "Desegregation of [public] parks and other recreational facilities did not present the same kinds of cognizable difficulties inhering in elimination of racial classification in schools at which attendance was compulsory, the adequacy of teachers and facilities crucial, and questions of geographic assignment often of major significance."[176] Watson thus held that delay in desegregating recreational facilities could not be upheld "except upon the most convincing and impressive demonstration by the local authorities that such delay [wa]s manifestly compelled by constitutionally cognizable circumstances warranting the exercise of an appropriate equitable discretion by a court."[177]

[K52] In Palmer, the city of Jackson, Mississippi, following a court decree to this effect, desegregated all of its public facilities save five swimming pools that had been operated by the city and that, following the decree, were closed by ordinance pursuant to a determination by the city council that closure was necessary to preserve peace and order, and that integrated pools could not be economically operated. "Accepting the finding that the pools were closed to avoid violence and economic loss, th[e] Court rejected the argument that the abandonment of this service was inconsistent with the outstanding desegregation decree, and that the otherwise seemingly permissible ends served by the ordinance could be impeached by demonstrating that racially invidious motivations had prompted the city council's action."[178]

d. Prisons

[K53] In Lee v. Washington, the practice of racial segregation of prisoners was justified by the state as necessary to maintain good order and discipline. The Court held, however, that the practice was constitutionally prohibited, although it was careful to point

---

[174] Gilmore v. City of Montgomery, 417 U.S. 556, 569 (1974). The Court also held that, on the record of the case, it was not possible to determine whether the use of the city's recreational facilities by private school groups in common with others, and by private non-school organizations, involved the city so directly in the action of those users as to warrant court intervention on constitutional grounds. Id. at 570.

[175] See also para. K50.

[176] Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526, 532 (1963).

[177] Id. at 533. There, the Court rejected the city's contention that gradual desegregation on a facility by facility basis was necessary to prevent interracial disturbances, violence, riots, and community confusion and turmoil. Id. at 535.

[178] See Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 242–43 (1976), discussing Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217 (1971). "The holding was that the city was not overtly or covertly operating segregated pools, and was extending identical treatment to both whites and [blacks.] The opinion warned against grounding decision on legislative purpose or motivation. But the holding of the case was that the legitimate purposes of the ordinance—to preserve peace and avoid deficits—were not open to impeachment by evidence that the councilmen were actually motivated by racial considerations. . . . [T]he decision did not involve, much less invalidate, a statute or ordinance having neutral purposes but disproportionate racial consequences." See Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 243 (1976).

out that the order of the district court, which it affirmed, made "allowance for the necessities of prison security and discipline."[179] In Johnson v. California, the Court made clear that strict scrutiny is the proper standard of review for an equal protection challenge to a state's policy of racially segregating prisoners. In so holding, the Court noted, inter alia, that "racial classifications 'threaten to stigmatize individuals by reason of their membership in a racial group and to incite racial hostility.' . . . Indeed, by insisting that inmates be housed only with other inmates of the same race, it is possible that prison officials will breed further hostility among prisoners and reinforce racial and ethnic divisions. By perpetuating the notion that race matters most, racial segregation of inmates 'may exacerbate the very patterns of [violence that it is] said to counteract.'"[180] "[C]ompliance with the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on racial discrimination is not only consistent with proper prison administration, but also bolsters the legitimacy of the entire criminal justice system. Race discrimination is 'especially pernicious in the administration of justice.' . . . When government officials are permitted to use race as a proxy for gang membership and violence without demonstrating a compelling government interest and proving that their means are narrowly tailored, society as a whole suffers."[181] In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that "the necessities of prison security and discipline . . . are a compelling government interest justifying only those uses of race that are narrowly tailored to address those necessities."[182]

e. Housing

[K54] In Hills v. Gautreaux, the Federal Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) was found to have participated, along with a local housing agency, in establishing and maintaining a racially segregated public housing program. After the court of appeals ordered the adoption of a "comprehensive metropolitan area plan," the Court granted certiorari to consider the permissibility, in the light of Milliken I,[183] of inter-district relief for discrimination in public housing in the absence of a finding of an inter-district violation. The Court's opinion made clear that the authority of the HUD extended beyond the Chicago city limits, and that HUD's own administrative practice treated the Chicago metropolitan area as an undifferentiated whole. Because "[t]he relevant geographic area for the purposes of the respondents' housing options [wa]s the Chicago housing market, not the Chicago city limits," the Court concluded that a metropolitan area remedy was not impermissible as a matter of law.[184]

---

[179] Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 334 (1968) (per curiam). Three members of the Court, in their concurring opinion, made explicit what was left to be gathered only by implication from the Court's opinion: "This is that prison authorities have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails." Id. at 334. See also Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 321 (1972) ("racial segregation is unconstitutional within prisons, save for the necessities of prison security and discipline").

[180] Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 507 (2005), quoting Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643, 648 (1993).

[181] Id. at 510–11.

[182] Id. at 512.

[183] See para. K44.

[184] Hills v. Gautreaux, 425 U.S. 284, 298–300, 306 (1976). The Court distinguished Milliken I, in part, because prior cases had established that racial segregation in schools is to be dealt with in terms of "an established geographic and administrative school system," and because "the

8. Repeal of Remedies and Restructuring of the Political Process[185]

[K55] In Reitman, California had repealed two laws relating to racial discrimination in the sale of housing by passing a constitutional amendment establishing the right of private persons to discriminate on racial grounds in real estate transactions. In finding a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court accepted what it designated as the holding of the supreme court of California, namely that the constitutional amendment was an official authorization of racial discrimination that encouraged and significantly involved the state in the discriminatory acts of private parties.[186]

[K56] "[T]he Equal Protection Clause is not violated by the mere repeal of race-related legislation or policies that were not required by the Federal Constitution in the first place; . . . the simple repeal or modification of desegregation or anti-discrimination laws, without more, never has been viewed as embodying a presumptively invalid racial classification."[187] But "if the purpose of repealing [anti-discrimination] legislation is to disadvantage a racial minority, the repeal is unconstitutional for this reason."[188] If the mere repeal of race-related legislation were unconstitutional, the authority of states to deal with the problems of a heterogeneous population would be seriously limited. "States would be committed irrevocably to legislation that has proved unsuccessful in practice. And certainly the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment would not be advanced by an interpretation . . . discourag[ing] the States from providing greater protection to racial minorities. Nor would the purposes of the Amendment be furthered by requiring the States to maintain legislation designed to ameliorate race relations or to protect racial minorities, but which has produced just the opposite effects. Yet these would be the results of requiring a State to maintain legislation that has proved unworkable or harmful when the State was under no obligation to adopt the legislation in the first place."[189]

State's educational structure vested substantial independent control over school affairs in the local school districts." In Gautreaux, by contrast, "a metropolitan area remedy involving HUD need not displace the rights and powers accorded suburban governmental entities under federal or state law." Id. at 298, n.13.

In Gautreaux, the Court did not obligate the district court to subject HUD to measures going beyond the geographical or political boundaries of its violation. Instead, it cautioned that its holding should not be interpreted as requiring a metropolitan area order. Id. at 306.

185 See also para. K128.

186 Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 376–81 (1967).

187 Crawford v. Bd. of Educ. of Los Angeles, 458 U.S. 527, 538–39 (1982).

188 Id. at 539, n.21.

189 Id. at 539–40. The California Constitution prohibited de jure as well as de facto segregation. Crawford upheld an amendment to the California Constitution, which provided that state courts would not order mandatory pupil assignment or transportation unless a federal court "would be permitted under federal decisional law" to do so to remedy a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. First, the Court noted that the amendment did not embody a racial classification. It neither said nor implied that persons were to be treated differently on account of their race. It simply forbade state courts to order pupil school assignment or transportation in the absence of a Fourteenth Amendment violation. "The benefit it [sought] to confer—neighborhood schooling—[wa]s made available regardless of race in the discretion of school boards. Indeed, even if [the amendment] ha[d] a racially discriminatory effect, in view of the demographic mix of the District, it [wa]s not clear

[K57] "Laws structuring political institutions or allocating political power according to 'neutral principles'—such as the executive veto, or the typically burdensome requirements for amending state constitutions—are not subject to equal protection attack, though they 'may make it more difficult for minorities to achieve favorable legislation.' . . . Because such laws make it more difficult for every group in the community to enact comparable laws, they 'provid[e] a just framework within which the diverse political groups in the American society may fairly compete.' . . . Thus, the political majority may generally restructure the political process to place obstacles in the path of everyone seeking to secure the benefits of governmental action. But a different analysis is required when the State allocates governmental power nonneutrally, by explicitly using the racial nature of a decision to determine the decisionmaking process. State action of this kind . . . 'places special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process,' thereby 'making it more difficult for certain racial minorities [than for other members of the community] to achieve legislation that is in their interest.' . . . Such a structuring of the political process [i]s 'no more permissible than [is] denying [members of a racial minority] the vote, on an equal basis with others."[190]

[K58] These principles received their clearest expression in Hunter. There the citizens of Akron had amended the city charter to require that any ordinance regulating real estate on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin could not take effect without approval by a majority of those voting in a city election. The charter amendment was not a simple repeal of the existing ordinance forbidding housing discrimination, but it also required the approval of the electors before any future anti-discrimination ordinance could take effect. The Court held that the amendment created a classification based upon race, because it required that laws dealing with racial housing matters could take effect only if they survived a mandatory referendum, while other housing ordinances took effect without any such special election. The Court concluded that Akron had advanced no sufficient reasons to justify this racial classification, and, hence, that it was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment.[191] which race or races would be affected the most, or in what way." Id. at 537. Moreover, the amendment was less than a "repeal" of the California Equal Protection Clause, since, even after its enactment, the state Constitution still placed upon school boards a greater duty to desegregate than did the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor could it be said that the amendment "distort[ed] the political process for racial reasons, or that it allocate[d] governmental or judicial power on the basis of a discriminatory principle." Id. at 541. "A 'dual court system'—one for the racial majority and one for the racial minority—is not established simply because civil rights remedies are different from those available in other areas. Surely it was constitutional for the California Supreme Court to caution that, although, 'in some circumstances, busing will be an appropriate and useful element in a desegregation plan,' in other circumstances, 'its costs, both in financial and educational terms, will render its use inadvisable.' . . . It was equally constitutional for the people of the State to determine that the standard of the Fourteenth Amendment was more appropriate for California courts to apply in desegregation cases than the standard repealed by" the constitutional amendment. Id. at 542. Finally, even if it could be assumed that the amendment had a disproportionate adverse effect on racial minorities, its purposes—chief among them the educational benefits of neighborhood schooling—were legitimate, non-discriminatory objectives. Id. at 545.

---

190 Washington v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 470 (1982), quoting Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 391, 393–95 (1969).

191 Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 389–393 (1969). In James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137 (1971), it was contended that a California referendum requirement violated the Fourteenth [K59] In Washington v. Seattle School District, a statewide ballot initiative, passed at general election, terminated the use of mandatory busing for purposes of racial integration in the public schools of the state of Washington. The initiative prohibited school boards from requiring any student to attend a school other than the one geographically nearest or next nearest to his home. It set out a number of broad exceptions to this requirement, however: a student could be assigned beyond his neighborhood school if he required special educational programs, or if the nearest or next nearest school was overcrowded or unsafe, or if it lacked necessary physical facilities. These exceptions permitted school boards to assign students away from their neighborhood schools for virtually all of the non-integrative purposes required by their educational policies. The Court held that the initiative should "fall because it d[id] not attempt to allocate governmental power on the basis of any general principle," but, instead, "it use[d] the racial nature of an issue to define the governmental decisionmaking structure, thus imposing substantial and unique burdens on racial minorities."[192] "Those favoring the elimination of de facto school segregation [should thereafter] seek relief from the state legislature, or from the statewide electorate."[193] The initiative "worked a major reordering of the State's educational decisionmaking process. . . . By placing power over desegregative busing at the state level, then, [the] [i]nitiative . . . plainly differentiate[d] between the treatment of problems involving racial matters and that afforded other problems in the same area."[194] The initiative "work[ed] something more than the 'mere repeal' of a desegregation law by the political entity that [had] created it. It burden[ed] all future attempts to integrate Washington schools by lodging decisionmaking authority over the question at a different and remote level of government."[195] This made "the enactment of racially beneficial legislation difficult, . . . [and] impose[d] direct and undeniable burdens on minority interests."[196]

Amendment, because it imposed a mandatory referendum in the case of an ordinance authorizing low-income housing, while referenda with respect to other types of ordinances had to be initiated by the action of private individuals. The Court responded: "a lawmaking procedure that 'disadvantages' a particular group does not always deny equal protection. Under any such holding, presumably a State would not be able to require referendums on any subject unless referendums were required on all, because they would always disadvantage some group. And this Court would be required to analyze governmental structures to determine whether a gubernatorial veto provision or a filibuster rule is likely to 'disadvantage' any of the diverse and shifting groups that make up the American people." Id. at 142. See, in extenso, para. K204.

192 Washington v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 470 (1982).

193 Id. at 474.

194 Id. at 479–80.

195 Id. at 483.

196 Id. at 483–84. The Court rejected the state's argument that the statewide initiative prohibiting mandatory student assignment had no "racial overtones" simply because it did not mention the words "race" or "integration." The Court found it "beyond reasonable dispute . . . that the initiative was enacted because of, not merely in spite of, its adverse effects upon busing for integration." Moreover, the Court rejected the contention that "busing for integration . . . is not a peculiarly racial issue at all." While not discounting the value of an integrated education to non-minority students, the Court concluded that "desegregation of the public schools . . . , at bottom, inures primarily to the benefit of the minority, and is designed for that purpose," thereby bringing it within the Hunter doctrine. Id. at 471–72.

C. GENDER CLASSIFICATIONS

1. In General—Standard of Review

[K60] The Court's "skeptical scrutiny of official action denying rights or opportunities based on sex responds to volumes of history. . . . [The American] Nation has had a long and unfortunate history of sex discrimination. . . . Through a century plus three decades and more of that history, women did not count among voters composing 'We the People;' not until 1920 did women gain a constitutional right to the franchise. . . . And, for a half century thereafter, it remained the prevailing doctrine that government, both federal and state, could withhold from women opportunities accorded men so long as any 'basis in reason' could be conceived for the discrimination."[197] In 1971, for the first time, the Court ruled in favor of a woman who complained that her State had denied her the equal protection of its laws. In Reed, the Court struck down an Idaho probate code provision that gave men a mandatory preference over women, in the same degree of relationship to the decedent, in the administration of the decedent's estate. The Court reasoned that, by providing dissimilar treatment for men and women who are thus similarly situated, the challenged provision violated the Equal Protection Clause.[198] "Since Reed, the Court has repeatedly recognized that neither federal nor state government acts compatibly with the equal protection principle when a law or official policy denies to women, simply because they are women, full citizenship stature—equal opportunity to aspire, achieve, participate in and contribute to society based on their individual talents and capacities."[199]

[K61] Without equating gender classifications, for all purposes, to classifications based on race or national origin,[200] the Court has held that party who seeks to defend a statute that classifies individuals on the basis of sex must carry the burden of showing an "exceedingly persuasive justification" for the classification. The burden of justification is demanding and it rests entirely on the party defending the classification. The defender of the classification meets this burden only by showing at least that the classification serves "important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed" are "substantially related to the achievement of those objectives."[201]

[K62] "The justification must be genuine, not hypothesized or invented post hoc in response to litigation;"[202] "the mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose is not an automatic shield which protects against any inquiry into the actual purposes underlying a statutory scheme."[203] Further, "it must not rely on overbroad generaliza-

---

197 See United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 531 (1996), citing Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464, 467 (1948) (rejecting a challenge of a female tavern owner and her daughter to Michigan law denying bartender licenses to females—except for wives and daughters of male tavern owners; the Court would not "give ear" to the contention that "an unchivalrous desire of male bartenders to . . . monopolize the calling" prompted the legislation).

198 See Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 77 (1971).

199 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 532 (1996)

200 The Court has thus far reserved most stringent judicial scrutiny for classifications based on race or national origin.

201 See Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724 (1982); United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996).

202 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996).

203 Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 648 (1975).

tions about the different talents, capacities, or preferences of males and females,"[204] even if such generalizations enjoy empirical support.[205] "'Inherent differences' between men and women, . . . remain cause for celebration, but not for denigration of the members of either sex or for artificial constraints on an individual's opportunity."[206] Sex classifications may be used to compensate women "for particular economic disabilities [they have] suffered,"[207] and to "promot[e] equal employment opportunity;"[208] but they may not be used "to create or perpetuate the legal, social, and economic inferiority of women."[209]

[K63] Under the heightened scrutiny with which the Court has approached gender-based discrimination, a sufficiently tight fit between means and ends is required. Hence, the availability of sex-neutral alternatives to a sex-based classification is often highly probative of the validity of the classification.[210]

2. Particular Applications

a. Family Law [211]

i. Distinctions Between Unwed Mothers and Fathers

[K64] Parental Rights. Stanley addressed the constitutionality of an Illinois statute that conclusively presumed every father of a child born out of wedlock to be an unfit person to have custody of his children. The father in that case had lived with his children all their lives and had lived with their mother for 18 years. There was nothing in the record to indicate that Stanley had been a neglectful father who had not cared for his children. Under the statute, however, the nature of the actual relationship between parent and child was completely irrelevant. Once the mother died, the children were automatically made wards of the state. By contrast, the state assumed custody of the children of married parents, divorced parents, and unmarried mothers only after a hearing on their fitness and proof of neglect. The Court found that denying such a hearing to Stanley and those like him, while granting it to other Illinois parents, was contrary to the Equal Protection Clause.[212]

[K65] Caban involved the conflicting claims of two natural parents who had lived together out of wedlock for several years and had maintained joint custody of their two children from the time of their birth until they were, respectively, two and four years

---

[204] United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996).

[205] See, e.g., Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 199 (1976); J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127, 139, n.11 (1994).

[206] United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996).

[207] Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 320 (1977) (per curiam).

[208] See California Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Guerra, 479 U.S. 272, 289 (1987).

[209] United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996).

[210] See, e.g., Wengler v. Druggist Mut. Ins. Co., 446 U.S. 142, 151 (1980) (invalidating a sex-based classification where a sex-neutral approach would completely serve the needs of both classes: "the needs of surviving widows and widowers would be completely served either by paying benefits to all members of both classes or by paying benefits only to those members of either class who can demonstrate their need"); Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268, 281 (1979) (finding "no reason, therefore, to use sex as a proxy for need" where the alimony statute already provided for individualized hearings that took financial circumstances into account).

[211] See also para. K93 (alimony).

[212] Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 658 (1972).

old. The father challenged the validity of an order authorizing the mother's new husband to adopt the children. The Court held that it violated the Equal Protection Clause to grant the mother a veto over the adoption of the children—aged four and six at the time of the adoption proceedings—but not to grant a veto to their father, who had admitted paternity and had participated in their rearing. In so holding, the Court rejected the claim that the broad, gender-based distinction in question was required by any universal difference between maternal and paternal relations at every phase of a child's development. "Even if unwed mothers as a class were closer than unwed fathers to their newborn infants, this generalization concerning parent-child relations would become less acceptable as a basis for legislative distinctions as the age of the child increased. . . . [A]n unwed father may have a relationship with his children fully comparable to that of the mother."[213] "Even if the special difficulties attendant upon locating and identifying unwed fathers at birth would justify a legislative distinction between mothers and fathers of newborns, these difficulties need not persist past infancy."[214]

[K66] However, "the existence or nonexistence of a substantial relationship between parent and child is a relevant criterion in evaluating both the rights of the parent and the best interests of the child."[215] "[W]here the father never has come forward to participate in the rearing of his child, nothing in the Equal Protection Clause precludes the State from withholding from him the privilege of vetoing the adoption of that child."[216] Quilloin upheld a Georgia statute that always required a mother's consent to the adoption of a child born out of wedlock, but required the father's consent only if he had legitimated the child, as applied to a putative father, who "ha[d] never shouldered any significant responsibility with respect to the daily supervision, education, protection, or care of the child, . . . d[id] not complain of his exemption from these responsibilities and, indeed, d[id] not even . . . seek custody of his child."[217] Lehr involved a New York law that automatically provided mothers of "illegitimate" children with prior notice of an adoption proceeding and the right to veto an adoption, but it only extended those rights to unmarried fathers whose claim of paternity was supported by some formal public act, such as a court adjudication, the filing of a notice of intent to claim paternity, or written acknowledgment by the mother. The petitioner in that case, an unmarried putative father, need only have mailed a postcard to the state's "putative father registry" to enjoy the same rights as the child's undisputed mother, yet he argued that this gender-based requirement violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Court rejected that argument, noting that Lehr had "never established any custodial, personal, or financial relationship with [his daughter]."[218]

[K67] In Parham, the Court rejected a challenge to a Georgia law that denied fathers (but not mothers) of out-of-wedlock children the right to sue for their children's wrongful death, unless they had legitimated them. Four Justices took the view that the statute did not invidiously discriminate on the basis of sex, and therefore evaluated the statute under rational basis review. Justifying its application of the rational basis test, that four-Justice plurality concluded that the statutory classification did not discriminate against

---

213 Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380, 389 (1979).

214 Id. at 392.

215 Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 266–267 (1983).

216 Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380, 392 (1979).

217 Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246, 256 (1978).

218 Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 267 (1983).

fathers as a class, but instead it distinguished between fathers who had legitimated their children and those who had not. Further, the plurality held that the statutory classification was a rational means for dealing with the problem of proving paternity after the death of an illegitimate child, noting that "[i]f paternity has not been established before the commencement of a wrongful death action, a defendant may be faced with the possibility of multiple lawsuits by individuals all claiming to be the father of the deceased child."[219] Justice Powell, concurring in the judgment, believed that the statute should be reviewed under intermediate scrutiny, since it drew a gender-based distinction, and, applying that standard, he agreed with the plurality that the statute passed constitutional muster.[220] The four dissenters also thought that the statute embodied a gender-based discrimination. Nevertheless, they found that "any interest the State conceivably has in simplifying the determination of liability in wrongful death actions . . . are not sufficient to justify foreclosing suit by the many, many fathers like Parham, about whose parenthood there is very little doubt indeed."[221]

[K68] Acquisition of Citizenship-Immigration. Tuan Anh Nguyen addressed the constitutionality of statutory provisions governing the acquisition of citizenship at birth by children born out of wedlock and outside of the United States. The specific challenge was to the distinction drawn between the child of an alien father and a citizen mother, on the one hand, and the child of an alien mother and a citizen father, on the other. Subject to residence requirements for the citizen parent, the citizenship of the former was established at birth; the citizenship of the latter was not established unless and until either the father or his child took one of three affirmative steps to create or confirm their relationship before the child turned 18: legitimization, a declaration of paternity under oath by the father, or a court order of paternity.[222] The Court determined that, even under heightened review,[223] Congress' decision to impose different requirements for the child's acquisition of citizenship depending upon whether the citizen parent was the mother or the father did not violate the equal protection guarantee embedded in the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. The Court found that "Congress' decision to impose requirements on unmarried fathers that differed from those on unmarried mothers [wa]s based on the significant difference between their respective relationships to the potential citizen at the time of birth. Specifically, the imposition of the requirement for a paternal relationship, but not a maternal one, [wa]s justified by [219] Parham v. Hughes, 441 U.S. 347, 357 (1979).

---

[220] Id. at 359–61.

[221] Id. at 364, 366. The dissent noted, inter alia, that even "[a]ssuming that there might be a few occasions where multiple recoveries are threatened, steps could be taken to settle liability in one proceeding." Id. at 366.

[222] The constitutionality of this distinction was argued for the first time in Miller v. Albright, 523 U.S. 420 (1998), but a majority of the Court did not resolve the issue. Four Justices, in two different opinions, rejected the challenge to the gender-based distinction, two finding the statute consistent with the Fifth Amendment, and two concluding that the court could not confer citizenship as a remedy even if the statute violated equal protection. Three Justices reached a contrary result and would have found the statue violative of equal protection. Finally, two Justices did not reach the issue as to the father, having determined that the child, the only petitioner in Miller, lacked standing to raise the equal protection rights of his father.

[223] Given that determination, the Court did not decide whether some lesser degree of scrutiny pertained, because the statute implicated Congress' immigration and naturalization power. See Tuan Anh Nguyen v. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 533 U.S. 53, 61 (2001).

two important governmental objectives."[224] The first such interest was the importance of assuring that a biological parent-child relationship existed. As the Court pointed out, the mother's relation is verifiable from the birth itself and is documented by the birth certificate or hospital records and the witnesses to the birth. However, a father need not be present at the birth, and his presence is not incontrovertible proof of fatherhood. Because "[f]athers and mothers are not similarly situated with regard to proof of biological parenthood, . . . [t]he imposition of different rules for [each] . . . is neither surprising nor troublesome from a constitutional perspective."[225] The statutory provision of three options was designed to ensure acceptable documentation of paternity. Petitioners argued that the requirement that a father provide clear and convincing evidence of parentage was sufficient to achieve the end of establishing paternity, given the sophistication of modern DNA tests. However, the provision did not mandate DNA testing. Moreover, the Constitution "does not require that Congress elect one particular mechanism from among many possible methods of establishing paternity, even if that mechanism arguably might be the most scientifically advanced method. With respect to DNA testing, the expense, reliability, and availability of such testing in various parts of the world may have been of particular concern to Congress. . . . [Hence,] [t]he requirement . . . represent[ed] a reasonable conclusion by the legislature that the satisfaction of one of several alternatives [would] suffice to establish the blood link between father and child required as a predicate to the child's acquisition of citizenship."[226] The second governmental interest furthered by the provision at issue was "the determination to ensure that the child and citizen parent ha[d] some demonstrated opportunity to develop a relationship that consisted of real, everyday ties providing a connection between child and citizen parent and, in turn, the United States."[227] That interest's importance was too profound to be satisfied by a DNA test, because scientific proof of biological paternity did not, by itself, ensure father-child contact during the child's minority. "Congress [wa]s well within its authority in refusing, absent proof of at least the opportunity for the development of a relationship between citizen parent and child, to commit th[e] country to embracing a child as a citizen entitled as of birth to the full protection of the United States, to the absolute right to enter its borders and to full participation in the political process."[228] And there was "nothing irrational or improper in recognizing that at the moment of birth—a critical event in the statutory scheme and tradition of citizenship law—the mother's knowledge of the child and the fact of parenthood are established in a way not guaranteed to the unwed father."[229] Further, the means chosen by Congress substantially related to its interest in facilitating a parent-child relationship. Although Congress could have chosen to advance the interest of ensuring a meaningful relationship in every case, it had the power to enact instead "an easily administered scheme to promote the different but still substantial interest of ensuring an opportunity for that relationship to develop." Even if one conceived of Congress' real interest as the establishment of a meaningful relationship, "a policy seek[ing] to foster the opportunity for meaningful parent-child bonds to develop has a close and substantial bearing on the governmental interest in that bond's formation." Congress' [224] Tuan Anh Nguyen v. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 533 U.S. 53, 62 (2001).

---

[225] Id. at 63.

[226] Id. at 63.

[227] Id. at 64–65.

[228] Id. at 67.

[229] Id. at 68.

means were in substantial furtherance of an important governmental objective, and the fit between the means and that end was "exceedingly persuasive."[230]

[K69] The Court has emphasized that "'over no conceivable subject is the legislative power of Congress more complete than it is over' the admission of aliens."[231] Fiallo upheld a sex-based statutory classification under which an illegitimate child could not seek special preference immigration status by virtue of relationship with its citizen or resident father, nor could an alien father seek preference based on his illegitimate child's citizenship or residence. Noting that Congress' choice not to provide preferential immigration status by virtue of the relationship between an illegitimate child and his or her natural father was just one of many drawn by Congress pursuant to its determination to provide some—but not all—families with relief from various immigration restrictions that would otherwise hinder reunification of the family in the country, the Court said that these were policy questions entrusted exclusively to the political branches of the government. "Congress obviously ha[d] determined that preferential status [wa]s not warranted for illegitimate children and their natural fathers, perhaps because of a perceived absence in most cases of close family ties, as well as a concern with the serious problems of proof that usually lurk in paternity determinations." The Court concluded that "[i]n any event, it is not the judicial role in cases of this sort to probe and test the justifications for the legislative decision."[232]

ii. Management of Joint Property of Spouses

[K70] In Kirchberg, the Court invalidated a statute that gave husband, as "head and master" of property jointly owned with his wife, the unilateral right to dispose of such property without his spouse's consent. In so doing, the Court rejected the argument that the wife could have made a "declaration by authentic act" prohibiting her husband from executing a mortgage on her home without her consent, noting that the "absence of an insurmountable barrier will not redeem an otherwise unconstitutionally discriminatory law."[233]

iii. Child Support

[K71] Stanton invalidated a state statute that specified a greater age of majority for males than for females and thereby affected the period during which a divorced parent was responsible for supporting his children. The Court did not question the importance or validity of the state's interest in defining parents' obligation to support children during their minority. On analysis, however, it determined that the purported relationship between that objective and the gender-based classification was based upon traditional assumptions that "the female [is] destined solely for the home and the rearing of the family, and only the male for the marketplace and the world of ideas. . . . If a specified age of minority is required for the boy in order to assure him parental support while he attains his education and training, so, too, is it for the girl." Once those traditional notions were abandoned, no basis for finding a substantial relationship between classification and objective remained.[234]

---

230 Id. at 69–70.

231 Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977), quoting Oceanic Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320, 339 (1909)

232 Id. at 797–99.

233 Kirchberg v. Feenstra, 450 U.S. 455, 461 (1981).

234 Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 14–15 (1975).

b. Pregnancy Classifications

[K72] In Geduldig, the Court faced the question whether a state's disability insurance system (funded entirely from contributions deducted from the wages of participating employees, at a rate of 1 percent of the employee's salary up to an annual maximum of $85) violated the Fourteenth Amendment by excluding benefits for normal pregnancy. A majority of the Court held that the system did not constitute discrimination on the basis of sex prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause. As the Court pointed out, the program did "not exclude anyone from benefit eligibility because of gender, but merely remove[d] one physical condition—pregnancy—from the list of compensable disabilities. . . . The program divide[d] potential recipients into two groups—pregnant women and nonpregnant persons. While the first group [wa]s exclusively female, the second include[d] members of both sexes. . . . Normal pregnancy is an objectively identifiable physical condition with unique characteristics. Absent a showing that distinctions involving pregnancy are mere pretexts designed to effect an invidious discrimination against the members of one sex or the other, lawmakers are constitutionally free to include or exclude pregnancy from the coverage of legislation such as this on any reasonable basis, just as with respect to any other physical condition."[235] However, no semblance of such a showing had been made. "There [wa]s no evidence in the record that the selection of the risks insured by the program worked to discriminate against any definable group or class in terms of the aggregate risk protection derived by that group or class from the program. There [wa]s no risk from which men [we]re protected and women [we]re not. Likewise, there [wa]s no risk from which women [we]re protected and men [we]re not."[236]

---

[235] Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484, 496, n.20 (1974).

[236] Id. at 496–97. Cf. also Gen. Elec. Co. v. Gilbert, 429 U.S. 125, 136 (1976) (upholding a similar plan against a challenge under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964).

The dissenters in Geduldig noted, inter alia, that "by singling out for less favorable treatment a gender-linked disability peculiar to women, the State has created a double standard for disability compensation: a limitation is imposed upon the disabilities for which women workers may recover, while men receive full compensation for all disabilities suffered, including those that affect only or primarily their sex, such as prostatectomies, circumcision, hemophilia, and gout. In effect, one set of rules is applied to females and another to males. Such dissimilar treatment of men and women, on the basis of physical characteristics inextricably linked to one sex, inevitably constitutes sex discrimination." See Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484, 501 (1974). In General Electric Co. v. Gilbert, 429 U.S. 125, 161, n.5 (1976), Justice Stevens observed in his dissenting opinion: "It is not accurate to describe the program as dividing 'potential recipients into two groups—pregnant women and nonpregnant persons.' . . . Insurance programs, company policies, and employment contracts all deal with future risks, rather than historic facts. The classification is between persons who face a risk of pregnancy and those who do not."

Congress, by enacting in 1978 the Pregnancy Discrimination Act, unambiguously expressed its disapproval of both the holding and the reasoning of the Court in the Gilbert decision. See Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. v. Equal Employment Opportunity Comm'n, 462 U.S. 669, 678 (1983).

In Nashville Gas Co. v. Satty, 434 U.S. 136, 139–43 (1977), the Court held that a policy of denying employees returning from pregnancy leave their accumulated seniority acted both to deprive them "of employment opportunities" and to "adversely affect [their] status as an employee" because of their sex, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. While the policy was facially neutral in that both male and female employees retained accumulated seniority while on leave for non-occupational disabilities other than pregnancy, seniority was divested if the employee took a leave for any other reason, including pregnancy. The Court [K73] In LaFleur, the Court held that a school board's mandatory maternity leave rule, which required pregnant schoolteachers to take unpaid leave beginning five months before their expected due date and prohibited their return to work until three months after childbirth violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Noting that "freedom of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life is one of the liberties protected by the Due Process Clause," the Court decided that the Constitution required a more individualized approach to the question of the teacher's physical capacity to continue her employment during pregnancy, "since the ability of any particular pregnant woman to continue at work past any fixed time in her pregnancy is very much an individual matter."[237] The three-month return provision, which created an irrebuttable presumption that the mother was not fit to resume work, was also invalidated, on similar grounds. "While it might be easier for the school boards to conclusively presume that all pregnant women [we]re unfit to teach past the fourth or fifth month of pregnancy, or during the three-month period following childbirth, administrative convenience alone [wa]s insufficient to make valid what otherwise [wa]s a violation of due process of law. The Fourteenth Amendment require[d] the school boards to employ alternative administrative means, which [would] not so broadly infringe upon basic constitutional liberty, in support of their legitimate goals." The requirement of a physician's certificate or a medical examination could fully protect the school's interests in this regard.[238] Likewise, Turner found that a state statute making pregnant women ineligible for unemployment compensation for a period extending from 12 weeks before the expected date of childbirth until six weeks after childbirth was violative of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as incorporating a conclusive presumption that women were unable to work during the 18-week period because of pregnancy and childbirth.[239]

c. Welfare Benefits [240]

[K74] The Court has rejected the proposition that welfare benefits are a "privilege" not subject to the guarantee of equal protection. The Constitution is not indifferent to emphasized that the employer had not merely refused to extend to women a benefit that men could not and did not receive, but had "imposed on women a substantial burden that men [did not have to] suffer." While Title VII did not require that greater economic benefits be paid to one sex or the other because of their different roles, Title VII should not be read so as "to permit an employer to burden female employees in such a way as to deprive them of employment opportunities because of their different role." Id. at 142.

---

237 Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632, 639, 645 (1974).

238 Id. at 647, n.14. At the same time, the Court emphasized that "[t]his is not to say that the only means for providing appropriate protection for the rights of pregnant teachers is an individualized determination in each case and in every circumstance. We are not dealing in these cases with maternity leave regulations requiring a termination of employment at some firm date during the last few weeks of pregnancy. We therefore have no occasion to decide whether such regulations might be justified by considerations not presented in these records—for example, widespread medical consensus about the 'disabling' effect of pregnancy on a teacher's job performance during these latter days, or evidence showing that such firm cutoffs were the only reasonable method of avoiding the possibility of labor beginning while some teacher was in the classroom, or proof that adequate substitutes could not be procured without at least some minimal lead time and certainty as to the dates upon which their employment was to begin." Id. at 647, n.13.

239 Turner v. Dep't of Employment Sec. of Utah, 423 U.S. 44 (1975) (per curiam).

240 See also para. K72 (disability benefits for pregnant women); para. K73 (unemployment benefits a statute that conditions the availability of welfare benefits (even "noncontributory") on the basis of gender.[241]

[K75] Frontiero involved federal statutes that provided the wife of a male serviceman with dependents' benefits (increased quarters allowance and medical and dental benefits) but not the husband of a servicewoman, unless she proved that she supplied more than one-half of her husband's support. The assumption was that "female spouses of servicemen would normally be dependent upon their husbands, while male spouses of servicewomen would not. . . . [This classification was] premised on overbroad generalizations that could not be tolerated under the Constitution."[242] The Court held that, "by according such differential treatment to male and female members of the uniformed services, for the sole purpose of achieving administrative convenience," the statutory scheme violated the right to equal protection secured by the Fifth Amendment.[243]

[K76] At issue in Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, was a provision in the Social Security Act that granted survivors' benefits based on the earnings of a deceased husband and father covered by the Act both to his widow and to the couple's minor children in her care, but that granted benefits based on the earnings of a covered deceased wife and mother only to the minor children and not to the widower. The assumption was that "male workers' earnings [we]re vital to the support of their families, while the earnings of female wage earners d[id] not significantly contribute to their families' support." In concluding that the provision violated the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment, the Court stressed that, while "the notion that men [we]re more likely than women to be the primary supporters of their spouses and children [wa]s not entirely without empirical support, . . . such a gender-based generalization [could not] suffice to justify the denigration of the efforts of women who d[id] work and whose earnings contribute[d] significantly to their families' support." And since, as was apparent from the statutory scheme itself and from the relevant legislative history, the statute's purpose in providing benefits to young widows with children "was not to provide an income to women who were, because of economic discrimination, unable to provide for themselves" but "to provide children deprived of one parent with the opportunity for the personal attention of the other," it could not serve to justify the gender-based distinction at issue.[244] for pregnant women); para. K90 (retirement benefits and remedial gender-discrimination); para. K175 (protection of reasonable reliance on prior law, which has been found unconstitutional).

---

[241] See Califano v. Westcott, 443 U.S. 76, 85 (1979).

[242] See Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498, 507 (1975), discussing Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973).

[243] Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 690–91 (1973).

[244] Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 643, 645, 648–49 (1975). Similarly, in Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977), the Court invalidated a Social Security Act provision providing survivors' benefits to a widow, regardless of dependency, but providing the same benefits to a widower only if he had been receiving at least half of his support from his deceased wife. A four-Justice plurality pointed out that, under the challenged section, "female insureds received less protection for their spouses solely because of their sex" and that, as in Wiesenfeld, the provision disadvantaged women as compared to similarly situated men by providing the female wage earner with less protection for her family than it provided the family of the male wage earner, even though the family needs might be identical. Further, it appeared from the provision's phrasing and legislative history, as well as from the general scheme of the Old-Age, Survivors, and Disability Insurance benefits program, that "the differential treatment of nondependent widows and widowers result[ed] not . . . from a deliberate congressional intention to remedy

[K77] Likewise, in Wengler, the Court struck down a provision of the Missouri workers' compensation laws denying a widower benefits on his wife's work-related death, unless he either was mentally or physically incapacitated or proved dependence on his wife's earnings, but granting a widow death benefits without her having to show that she was incapacitated or to prove dependence on her husband's earnings. The Court found that the statute discriminated against both men and women. It "discriminate[d] against a woman covered by the Missouri workers' compensation system, since, in the case of her death, benefits [we]re payable to her spouse only if he [wa]s mentally or physically incapacitated or was to some extent dependent upon her," whereas a widow "would have been conclusively presumed to be dependent, and would have been paid the statutory amount for life or until she remarried. . . . The benefits, therefore, that the working woman [could] expect to be paid to her spouse in the case of her work-related death [we]re less than those payable to the spouse of the deceased male wage earner."[245] And the statute discriminated against a man who survived his wife's dying in a work-related accident, because, to receive benefits he, in contrast to a widow, should prove incapacity or dependency. The only justification offered by the state court or appellees for not treating males and females alike, whether viewed as wage earners or survivors of wage earners, was the assertion that most women were dependent on male wage earners, and that it was more efficient to presume dependency in the case of women than to engage in case-to-case determination, whereas individualized inquiries in the postulated few cases in which men might be dependent were not prohibitively costly. The Court rejected this justification, concluding that, although "[i]t may be that there are levels of administrative convenience that will justify discriminations that are subject to heightened scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause, . . . the requisite showing ha[d] not been made [t]here by the mere claim that it would be inconvenient to individualize determinations about widows as well as widowers."[246]

[K78] Califano v. Westcott invalidated a section of the Social Security Act, as amended in 1968, which provided benefits to families whose dependent children had been deprived of parental support because of the unemployment of the father, but did not provide such benefits when the mother became unemployed. Initially the provision was gender-neutral. The gender qualification was part of the general objective of the 1968 amendments to tighten standards for eligibility and reduce program costs. Congress was concerned that certain states were making assistance available to families where the

---

the arguably greater needs of the former, but rather from an intention to aid the dependent spouses of deceased wage earners, coupled with a presumption that wives [we]re usually dependent. . . . The only conceivable justification for writing the presumption of wives' dependency into the statute [wa]s the [unverified] assumption . . . that it would save the Government time, money, and effort simply to pay benefits to all widows, rather than to require proof of dependency of both sexes." However, the plurality concluded, such an assumption does "not suffice to justify a gender-based discrimination in the distribution of employment-related benefits." Id. at 216–17. Justice Stevens, concurring, found that the relevant discrimination was "against surviving male spouses, rather than against deceased female wage earners," that such discrimination was "merely the accidental byproduct of a traditional way of thinking about females," and that something more than accident was necessary to justify, under the Fifth Amendment, the disparate treatment of persons who had as strong a claim to equal treatment as did similarly situated surviving spouses. Id. at 218, 223.

[245] Wengler v. Druggists Mut. Ins. Co., 446 U.S. 142, 147 (1980).

[246] Id. at 152.

mother was out of work, but the father remained fully employed and able to support the family. "Apparently, Congress was not similarly concerned about states making benefits available where the father was out of work, but the mother remained fully employed. From all that appear[ed,] Congress, with an image of the 'traditional family' in mind, simply assumed that the father would be the family breadwinner, and that the mother's employment role, if any, would be secondary."[247] First, the Court rejected the contention that even if the statute was gender-based, it was not "gender-biased" and did not discriminate against women as a class, since the grant or denial of aid based on the father's unemployment necessarily affected, to an equal degree, one man, one woman, and one or more children. As the Court pointed out, "[f]or mothers who [we]re the primary providers for their families, and who [we]re unemployed, . . . the provision [wa]s obviously gender-biased, for it deprive[d] them and their families of benefits solely on the basis of their sex." Although the impact of the gender qualification was felt by family units, rather than individuals, "the statute discriminate[d] against one particular category of family—that in which the female spouse [wa]s a wage earner."[248] Second, the distinction was not substantially related to achievement of an important governmental objective. It did not serve the statutory goal of providing aid for needy children, for families where the mother was the principal wage earner and was unemployed were often in as much need of benefits as families where the father was unemployed. Nor was it substantially related to achieving the alleged objective of reducing the incentive for fathers to desert, or to pretend to desert, in order to make their families eligible for assistance. "There [wa]s no evidence, in the legislative history or elsewhere, that a father ha[d] less incentive to desert in a family where the mother [wa]s the breadwinner and bec[ame] unemployed, than in a family where the father [wa]s the breadwinner and bec[ame] unemployed. In either case, the family's need [would] be equally great, and the father [would] be equally subject to pressure to leave the home to make the family eligible for benefits. . . . Congress may not legislate 'one step at a time' when that step is drawn along the line of gender, and the consequence is to exclude one group of families altogether from badly needed subsistence benefits."[249]

---

[247] Califano v. Westcott, 443 U.S. 76, 88 (1979).

[248] Id. at 84.

[249] Id. at 88–89. The district court, finding the gender-based classification, had determined that extension of the benefits program to all families with needy children where either parent was unemployed, rather than nullification of the program, was the proper remedial course. Moreover, it had declined to modify its order so as to permit the state of Massachusetts to pay benefits only to those families where needy children had been deprived of parental support by the unemployment of the family's "principal wage-earner." The Court found that the foregoing remedial order was proper. The question presented by the state's appeal concerned not the merits of extension versus nullification but rather the form that extension should take. The state agreed that either the mother's or the father's unemployment should be able to qualify a needy family for benefits, but proposed to award them only if the parent in question could show that he or she was both unemployed and the family's "principal wage-earner." Citing the legislative history of the program, the state argued that its proposed remedy comported with Congress' intent to aid families made needy by their breadwinner's unemployment. The Court assumed arguendo that, if Congress had known in 1968 that the gender-based distinction at issue violated the Constitution, it might well have adopted the "principal wage-earner" model. "But this d[id] not mean that the . . . program should be restructured along these lines by a federal court." First, the state's proposed remedy would have the effect of terminating benefits to many families then-currently receiving them. Second, the extension ordered by the district court possessed "the

d. Higher Education

[K79] In Mississippi University for Women, the Court held that the exclusion of men from a state-supported professional nursing school violated the Equal Protection Clause. In so holding, the Court rejected the argument that the single-sex admissions policy constituted educational affirmative action.[250] Similarly, in United States v. Virginia, the Court decided that the Constitution's equal protection guarantee precluded Virginia from reserving exclusively to men the unique educational opportunities the state military college afforded.[251]

e. Athletic Programs

[K80] In O'Connor v. Board of Education, the Court denied an application to vacate the court of appeals' stay pending appeal of the district court's preliminary injunction requiring respondent school officials to allow plaintiff applicant, a female junior high school student, to try out for the boys' basketball teams. Justice Stevens said that the question whether the discrimination was justified could not "depend entirely on whether the girls' program would offer [O'Connor] opportunities that [we]re equal in all respects to the advantages she would gain from the higher level of competition in the boys' program. The answer must depend on whether it [wa]s permissible for the defendants to structure their athletic programs by using sex as one criterion for eligibility. If the classification is reasonable in substantially all of its applications, . . . the general rule [could not] be said to be unconstitutional simply because it [would] appea[r] arbitrary in an individual case." Justice Stevens concluded that there could be "little question about the validity of the classification in most of its normal applications. Without a gender-based classification in competitive contact sports, there would be a substantial risk that boys would dominate the girls' programs and deny them an equal opportunity to compete in interscholastic events."[252]

f. Prohibition of Liquor Sales

[K81] Craig v. Boren held that an Oklahoma statutory scheme prohibiting the sale of "nonintoxicating" 3.2 percent beer to males under the age of 21 and to females under the age of 18 constituted a gender-based discrimination that denied to males 18–20 virtue of simplicity: by ordering that 'father' be replaced by its gender-neutral equivalent, the court [had] avoided disruption of the . . . program, for benefits simply [would] be paid to families with an unemployed parent on the same terms that benefits ha[d] long been paid to families with an unemployed father. The 'principal wage-earner' solution, by contrast, would introduce a term novel in the [statutory scheme,] and would pose definitional and policy questions best suited to legislative or administrative elaboration." In addition, the Court was "ill-equipped both to estimate the relative costs of various types of coverage and to gauge the effect that different levels of expenditures would have upon the alleviation of human suffering. Under these circumstances, any fine-tuning of the benefits along 'principal wage-earner' lines should be properly left to the democratic branches of the Government." Id. at 92–93.

---

[250] Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982). See, in extenso, para. K92.

[251] United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996). See, in extenso, para. K86 and para. K92, n.289.

[252] O'Connor v. Bd. of Educ., 449 U.S. 1301, 1306–07 (1980).

years of age the equal protection of the laws. Oklahoma claimed that the gender-based distinction was substantially related to the enhancement of traffic safety. However, the statistics introduced by the state showed only that 0.18 percent of females and 2 percent of males in the 18–20-year-old age group had been arrested for driving while under the influence of liquor. "While such a disparity [wa]s not trivial in a statistical sense, it hardly [could] form the basis for employment of a gender line as a classifying device. Certainly if maleness [wa]s to serve a proxy for drinking and driving, a correlation of 2% [should] be considered an unduly tenuous 'fit.'"[253] Besides, none of the proposed surveys purported to measure the use and dangerousness of 3.2 percent beer, as opposed to alcohol generally, a detail that was of particular importance since, in light of its low alcohol level, Oklahoma apparently considered the 3.2 percent beverage to be "nonintoxicating." Hence, the evidentiary record of the case did not warrant the conclusion that sex represented an "accurate proxy for the regulation of drinking and driving."[254] Further, the Court unequivocally rejected the Twenty-first Amendment as a basis for sustaining state liquor regulations otherwise violative of the Equal Protection Clause.[255]

g. Statutory Rape

[K82] A state may prohibit a male from having sexual intercourse with a minor female. In Michael M. the Court upheld, against an equal protection challenge, the California "statutory rape" law, criminalizing "an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, where the female is under the age of 18 years." A four-Justice plurality found that the state had a strong interest in preventing illegitimate teenage pregnancies and their "significant social, medical, and economic consequences for both the mother and her child, and the State" itself.[256] The statute protected women from sexual intercourse and pregnancy at an age when the physical, emotional, and psychological consequences were particularly severe. And "[b]ecause virtually all of the significant harmful and identifiable consequences of teenage pregnancy fall on the female, a legislature acts well within its authority when it elects to punish only the participant who, by nature, suffers few of the consequences of his conduct."[257] Relatedly, the plurality rejected the contention that the statute was impermissibly underinclusive and should, in order to pass judicial scrutiny, be broadened so as to hold the female as criminally liable as the male. The relevant inquiry was not whether the statute was drawn as precisely as it might have been, but whether the line chosen by the California legislature was within constitutional limitations. In any event, a gender-neutral statute would frustrate the state's interest in effective enforcement, since a female would be less likely to report violations of the statute if she herself would be subject to prosecution. "In an area already fraught with prosecutorial dificulties, [the Court] decline[d] to hold that the Equal Protection Clause require[d] a legislature to enact a statute so broad that it may well be incapable of enforcement."[258] Nor was the statute impermissibly overbroad because it made unlawful sexual intercourse with pre-[253] Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 201–02 (1976).

---

[254] Id. at 204.

[255] Id. at 208–09.

[256] Michael M. v. Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464, 470 (1981) (opinion of Rehnquist, J., joined by Burger, C.J., Stewart, and Powell, JJ.).

[257] Id. at 473.

[258] Id. at 474.

pubescent females incapable of becoming pregnant. "Quite apart from the fact that the statute could well be justified on the grounds that very young females [we]re particularly susceptible to physical injury from sexual intercourse," the Constitution did not require the California legislature to limit the scope of the statute to older teenagers and exclude young girls.[259] Finally the statute was not unconstitutional as applied to petitioner who, like the girl involved, was under 18 at the time of sexual intercourse, on the asserted ground that the statute presumed in such circumstances that the male was the culpable aggressor. The statute did not rest on such an assumption, but instead was an attempt "to prevent illegitimate teenage pregnancy by providing an additional deterrent for men. The age of the man [wa]s irrelevant, since young men [we]re as capable as older men of inflicting the harm sought to be prevented."[260]

h. Employment as a Prison Guard

[K83] Dothard sustained a state regulation establishing gender criteria for assigning prison guards to maximum security institutions for "contact positions," i.e., positions requiring continual close physical proximity to inmates of the institution. The Court first took note of the actual conditions of the prison environment: "[i]n a prison system where violence is the order of the day, where inmate access to guards is facilitated by dormitory living arrangements, where every institution is understaffed, and where a substantial portion of the inmate population is composed of sex offenders mixed at random with other prisoners, there are few visible deterrents to inmate assaults on women custodians." Further, the Court stressed that more was at stake than a risk to individual female employees. "The likelihood that inmates would assault a woman because she was a woman would pose a real threat not only to the victim of the assault but also to the basic control of the penitentiary and protection of its inmates and the other security personnel." Under those circumstances, the Court concluded that "[t]he employee's very womanhood would directly undermine her capacity to provide the security that is the essence" of a prison guard's responsibility.[261] Nevertheless, at the same time, the Court refused to allow employers to use sex as a proxy for strength.[262]

---

[259] Id. at 475.

[260] Id. at 475. Justice Blackmun concurred in the judgment, finding that the law was a sufficiently reasoned and constitutional effort to control at its inception the problem of teenage pregnancies and to protect all minors from the problems and risks attendant upon adolescent sexual activity. Id. at 482–83. Justice Brennan, in dissent, noted that (1) "the experience of other jurisdictions, and California itself, belie[d] the plurality's conclusion that a gender-neutral statutory rape law 'may well be incapable of enforcement;'" (2) "even assuming that a gender-neutral statute would be more difficult to enforce, the State ha[d] still not shown that those enforcement problems would make such a statute less effective than a gender-based statute in deterring minor females from engaging in sexual intercourse. Common sense, however, suggests that a gender-neutral statutory rape law is potentially a greater deterrent of sexual activity than a gender-based law, for the simple reason that a gender-neutral law subjects both men and women to criminal sanctions, and thus arguably has a deterrent effect on twice as many potential violators." Id. at 492–94.

[261] Dothard v. Rawlinson, 433 U.S. 321, 335–36 (1977). Consequently, the Court held that the regulation in question fell within the narrow ambit of the "bona fide occupational qualification" exception for employment discrimination on the basis of sex, under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

[262] Id. at 331–32. See, in extenso, para. K95, n.299.

i. In the Military Context

[K84] In Schlesinger, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a federal statute, which provided that male naval officers who were not promoted within a certain length of time were subject to mandatory discharge, while female naval officers who were not promoted within the same length of time could continue as officers. Because of restrictions on women officers' participation in combat and in most sea duty, their opportunities to compile records entitling them to promotion were more limited than were those of their male counterparts. Thus, the different treatment reflected "not archaic and overbroad generalizations, but, instead, the demonstrable fact that male and female line officers in the Navy [we]re not similarly situated with respect to opportunities for professional service."[263]

[K85] The constitutional power of Congress to raise and support armies (Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution) is broad. "The complex, subtle, and professional decisions as to the composition, training, equipping, and control of a military force are essentially professional military judgments, subject always to civilian control of the Legislative and Executive Branches."[264] Hence, courts owe deference to legislative and executive judgments in the area of military affairs.[265] In 1981, the Court held that the Military Selective Service Act did not violate the Fifth Amendment in authorizing the President to require the registration of males and not females. The purpose of registration was to prepare for a draft of combat troops. Women as a group, however, unlike men as a group, were excluded from combat service by statute or military policy, and, therefore, men and women were "not similarly situated for purposes of a draft or registration for a draft." Moreover, Congress had reasonably concluded that "whatever the need for women for noncombat roles during mobilization, . . . it could be met by volunteers," and that "staffing noncombat positions with women during a mobilization would be positively detrimental to the important goal of military flexibility."[266]

[K86] In 1996, the Court held that Virginia violated the Equal Protection Clause by maintaining the Virginia Military Institute's (VMI's) male-only admission policy, and that establishing the Virginia Women's Institute for Leadership (VWIL) program did not remedy that violation. First, the Court rejected the state's argument that VMI's adversative method of training provided educational benefits that could not be made available, unmodified, to women, and that alterations to accommodate women would necessarily be so drastic as to destroy VMI's program. It was uncontested that women's admission to VMI would require accommodations, primarily in arranging housing assignments and physical training programs for female cadets. However, "neither the goal of producing citizen soldiers, VMI's raison d' être, nor VMI's implementing methodology [wa]s inherently unsuitable to women."[267] "The notion that admission of women would downgrade VMI's stature, destroy the adversative system and, with it, even the school, [wa]s a judgment hardly proved," and it reflected generalizations about "typically female 'tendencies.'"[268] "Women's successful entry into the federal military academies, and their 263 Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498, 508 (1975).

---

264 Gilligan v. Morgan, 413 U.S. 1, 10 (1973).
265 See Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 66 (1981).
266 Id. at 78, 81–82.
267 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533, 541 (1996).
268 Id. at 541–42.

participation in the Nation's military forces, indicate[d] that Virginia's fears for VMI's future [might] not be solidly grounded." In any event, the state's justification for excluding all women from "citizen soldier" training for which some were qualified, fell far short of establishing the "exceedingly persuasive justification," that must be the base for any gender-defined classification.[269] Further, the remedy proffered by Virginia—maintain VMI as a male-only college and create VWIL as a program for women—did not cure the constitutional violation, for it left untouched VMI's exclusionary policy, and proposed for women only "a separate program, different in kind from VMI and [substantially] unequal in tangible and intangible facilities."[270] The Court concluded that "[w]omen seeking and fit for a VMI-quality education cannot be offered anything less, under the State's obligation to afford them genuinely equal protection."[271]

j. Jury Selection

[K87] In Taylor v. Louisiana, the Court held that systematic exclusion of women during the jury selection process, resulting in jury pools not "reasonably representative" of the community, denies a criminal defendant his right, under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments, to a petit jury selected from a fair cross-section of the community.[272] Under the system invalidated in Taylor, women were exempted from mandatory jury service and could not serve on a jury unless they filed a written declaration of their willingness to do so. As a result, although 53 percent of the persons eligible for jury service were women, less than 1 percent of the 1,800 persons whose names were drawn from the jury wheel during the year in which Taylor's jury was chosen were female. Similarly, in Duren, the Court invalidated Missouri's constitutional and statutory provisions allowing women to claim automatic exemption from jury service, since they resulted in underrepresentation (less than 15 percent) of women at the venire stage and were justified only by the stereotype that most women would be unable to serve because of their domestic responsibilities.[273]

[K88] Taylor and Duren relied on Sixth Amendment principles, but the opinions' approach is consistent with the heightened equal protection scrutiny afforded gender-based classifications.[274] Sex discrimination in jury selection "causes harm to the litigants, the community, and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process. The litigants are harmed by the risk that the prejudice which motivated the discriminatory selection of the jury will infect the entire proceedings. . . . The community is harmed by the State's participation in the perpetuation of invidious group stereotypes and the inevitable loss of confidence in the judicial system that state-sanctioned discrimination in the courtroom engenders."[275] And "individual jurors themselves have a right to non-discriminatory jury selection procedures. . . . Striking individual jurors on the assumption that they hold particular views simply because of their gender is 'practically a brand upon them, affixed by law, an assertion of their infe-

---

269 Id. at 544–45.
270 Id. at 547.
271 Id. at 557.
272 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 531, 538 (1975).
273 Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357, 363–79 (1979).
274 See J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127, 135 (1994).
275 Id. at 140.

riority.' . . . It denigrates the dignity of the excluded juror, and, for a woman, reinvokes a history of exclusion from political participation. The message it sends to all those in the courtroom, and all those who may later learn of the discriminatory act, is that certain individuals, for no reason other than gender, are presumed unqualified by state actors to decide important questions upon which reasonable persons could disagree."[276] Under these considerations, the Court held in J.E.B.—a case involving an all-female jury in a paternity and child support trial, where the state had used nine of its ten peremptory challenges to remove male jurors—that "the Equal Protection Clause prohibits discrimination in jury selection on the basis of gender, or on the assumption that an individual will be biased in a particular case for no reason other than the fact that the person happens to be a woman or happens to be a man."[277] Nevertheless, the fact that "litigants may not strike potential jurors solely on the basis of gender does not imply the elimination of all peremptory challenges. Neither does it conflict with a State's legitimate interest in using such challenges in its effort to secure a fair and impartial jury. Parties still may remove jurors whom they feel might be less acceptable than others on the panel; gender simply may not serve as a proxy for bias. Parties may also exercise their peremptory challenges to remove from the venire any group or class of individuals normally subject to 'rational basis' review. . . . Even strikes based on characteristics that are disproportionately associated with one gender could be appropriate, absent a showing of pretext. . . . For example, challenging all persons who have had military experience would disproportionately affect men at this time, while challenging all persons employed as nurses would disproportionately affect women. Without a showing of pretext, however, these challenges may well not be unconstitutional, since they are not gender- or race-based."[278] "As with race-based Batson claims, a party alleging gender discrimination must make a prima facie showing of intentional discrimination before the party exercising the challenge is required to explain the basis for the strike. . . . When an explanation is required, it need not rise to the level of a 'for cause' challenge; rather, it merely must be based on a juror characteristic other than gender, and the proffered explanation may not be pretextual."[279]

3. Benign or Compensatory Gender Discrimination[280]

[K89] "In limited circumstances, a gender-based classification favoring one sex can be justified if it intentionally and directly assists members of the sex that is disproportionately burdened. . . . However, [the Court has] consistently emphasized that 'the mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose is not an automatic shield which protects against any inquiry into the actual purposes underlying a statutory scheme.'"[281] "[A] State can evoke a compensatory purpose to justify an otherwise discriminatory classification only if members of the gender benefited by the classification have actually suffered a disadvantage related to the classification."[282] Further, "even statutes purportedly

---

[276] Id. at 140–42.

[277] Id. at 146.

[278] Id. at 143 and n.16.

[279] Id. at 144–45.

[280] See also para. K76.

[281] Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 728 (1982), quoting Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 648 (1975).

[282] Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 728 (1982). See also Orr v. Orr, designed to compensate for and ameliorate the effects of past discrimination must be carefully tailored. Where . . . the State's compensatory and ameliorative purposes are as well served by a gender-neutral classification as one that gender classifies, and therefore carries with it the baggage of sexual stereotypes, the State cannot be permitted to classify on the basis of sex. And this is doubly so where the choice made by the State appears to redound—if only indirectly—to the benefit of those without need for special solicitude."[283]

[K90] "Reduction of the disparity in economic condition between men and women caused by the long history of discrimination against women has been recognized as an important governmental objective."[284] In Kahn v. Shevin, the Court upheld a Florida annual $500 real estate tax exemption for all widows in the face of an equal protection challenge. The Court believed that statistics established a lower median income for women than men, a discrepancy that justified "a state tax law reasonably designed to further the state policy of cushioning the financial impact of spousal loss upon the sex for which that loss imposed a disproportionately heavy burden."[285] Califano v. Webster involved a challenge to a statutory classification that allowed women to eliminate more low-earning years than men for purposes of computing Social Security retirement benefits. Although the effect of the classification was to allow women higher monthly benefits than were available to men with the same earning history, the Court upheld the statutory scheme, noting that it took into account that women "as such ha[d] been unfairly hindered from earning as much as men," and "work[ed] directly to remedy" the resulting economic disparity.[286]

[K91] A similar pattern of discrimination against women influenced the decision in Schlesinger. There, the Court considered a federal statute that granted female naval officers a 13-year tenure of commissioned service before mandatory discharge, but accorded male officers only a nine-year tenure. The Court "recognized that, because women were barred from combat duty, they had had fewer opportunities for promotion than had their male counterparts. By allowing women an additional four years to reach a particular rank before subjecting them to mandatory discharge, the statute directly compensated for other statutory barriers to advancement."[287]

[K92] In Mississippi University for Women, the Court held that the university's policy of denying otherwise qualified males the right to enroll in its school of nursing was not consistent with the Equal Protection Clause. The state's primary justification for maintaining this policy was that it compensated for discrimination against women. However, 440 U.S. 268, 281 (1979) (the Court approaches "the 'compensation' rationale by asking whether women have, in fact, been significantly discriminated against in the sphere to which the statute applies a sex-based classification").

---

283 Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268, 283 (1979).

284 Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 317 (1977) (per curiam).

285 Kahn v. Shevin, 416 U.S. 351, 355 (1974).

286 Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 318 (1977) (per curiam). The Court "did not require proof that each woman so benefited had suffered discrimination; it was sufficient that even under the former congressional scheme 'women on the average received lower retirement benefits than men.'" See United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 573 (1996) (opinion of Justice Scalia), quoting Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 318, n.5 (1977) (emphasis added).

287 See Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 728–29 (1982), discussing Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498 (1975).

Mississippi made "no showing that women lacked opportunities to obtain training in the field of nursing or to attain positions of leadership in that field when the MUW School of Nursing opened its door, or that women [then] currently [we]re deprived of such opportunities." Rather than compensating for discriminatory barriers faced by women, MUW's policy "tend[ed] to perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively woman's job."[288] Thus, the Court concluded that the state had failed to establish that the alleged objective was the actual purpose underlying the discriminatory classification. Moreover, the state had not shown that the gender-based classification was substantially and directly related to its proposed compensatory objective.[289]

[K93] Orr struck down Alabama statutes, which provided that husbands, but not wives, might be required to pay alimony upon divorce. Though it could be argued that the Alabama statutory scheme was designed "to provide help for needy spouses, using sex as a proxy for need," and to compensate women "for past discrimination during marriage, which assertedly ha[d] left them unprepared to fend for themselves in the working world following divorce," these considerations would not justify that scheme, because, under the Alabama statutes, "individualized hearings at which the parties' relative financial circumstances [we]re considered already occur[red.] . . . In such circumstances, not even an administrative convenience rationale exist[ed] to justify operating by generalization or proxy."[290] "Moreover, use of a gender classification actually produce[d] perverse results in this case. As compared to a gender-neutral law placing alimony obligations on the spouse able to pay, the . . . Alabama statutes [gave] an advantage only to the financially secure wife whose husband [wa]s in need. . . . Thus, the wives who benefit[ed] from the disparate treatment [we]re those who were . . . nondependent on their husbands."[291]

4. De Jure/De Facto Gender Discrimination[292]

[K94] "[T]he Fourteenth Amendment guarantees equal laws, not equal results."[293] "When a statute gender-neutral on its face is challenged on the ground that its effects upon women are disproportionably adverse, a twofold inquiry is . . . appropriate. The first question is whether the statutory classification is indeed neutral in the sense that it is not gender-based. If the classification itself, covert or overt, is not based upon gender, the second question is whether the adverse effect reflects invidious gender-based discrimination. . . . In this second inquiry, impact provides an 'important starting point,'

---

288 Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 729 (1982).

289 Id. at 730. Pursuing a similar inquiry, the Court rejected in United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 535–40 (1996), a case involving the categorical exclusion of women from a military college (VMI), the state's contention that single-sex education yielded important educational benefits, and that provision of an option for such education fostered diversity in educational approaches. Virginia did not show that the college had been established, or maintained, with a view to diversifying, by its categorical exclusion of women, educational opportunities within the state. A purpose genuinely to advance an array of educational options was not served by VMI's historic and constant plan to afford a unique educational benefit only to males.

290 Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268, 280–81 (1979).

291 Id. at 282.

292 See also paras. K87–K88 (jury selection); para. K72 (pregnancy classifications).

293 Pers. Adm'r of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 273 (1979).

. . . but purposeful discrimination is 'the condition that offends the Constitution.'"[294] "'Discriminatory purpose' . . . implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. . . . It implies that the decisionmaker selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects upon [a sex group.]"[295] "This is not to say that the inevitability or foreseeability of consequences of a neutral rule has no bearing upon the existence of discriminatory intent. Certainly, when the adverse consequences of a law upon an identifiable group are inevitable, . . . a strong inference that the adverse effects were desired can reasonably be drawn. But in this inquiry an inference is a working tool, not a synonym for proof."[296] "Proof of discriminatory intent must necessarily usually rely on objective factors. . . . The inquiry is practical. What a legislature or any official entity is 'up to' may be plain from the results its actions achieve, or the results they avoid. Often it is made clear from 'the give and take of the situation.'"[297] "Sometimes a clear pattern, unexplainable on grounds other than gender, emerges from the effect of the state action even when the governing legislation appears neutral on its face."[298]

[K95] Feeney sustained against an Equal Protection Clause challenge a Massachusetts law giving state employment preference to military veterans, a class that, in Massachusetts, was over 98 percent male. The Massachusetts statute was not a pretext for gender discrimination. Apart from the facts that the definition of "veterans" in the statute had always been neutral as to gender, and that Massachusetts had consistently defined veteran status in a way inclusive of women who had served in the military, this was not a law that could rationally be explained as a gender-based classification. "[S]ignificant numbers of nonveterans were men, and all nonveterans—male as well as female—[we]re placed at a disadvantage." The distinction made by the Massachusetts statute was quite simply between veterans and non-veterans, not between men and women. Nothing in the record demonstrated that the preference for veterans was originally devised or subsequently re-enacted, because it would accomplish the collateral goal of keeping women in a stereotypic and pre-defined place in the Massachusetts civil service. Although the substantial edge granted to veterans by the Massachusetts statute might reflect unwise policy, Feeney had simply failed to demonstrate that the law in any way reflected a purpose to discriminate on the basis of sex.[299]

---

294 Id. at 274.

295 Id. at 279.

296 Id. at 279, n.25.

297 Id. at 279, n.24.

298 Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266 (1977).

299 Pers. Adm'r of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 275, 281 (1979). Dothard v. Rawlinson, 433 U.S. 321 (1977), involved an Alabama statute pursuant to which one who sought state employment as a prison guard should cover the minimum height and weight requirements of five feet, two inches, and 120 pounds. The five feet, two inches requirement would operate to exclude 33.29 percent of the women in the United States between the ages of 18–79, while excluding only 1.28 percent of men between the same ages. The 120-pound weight restriction would exclude 22.29 percent of the women and 2.35 percent of the men in this age group. When the height and weight restrictions were combined, Alabama's statutory standards would exclude 41.13 percent of the female population, while excluding less than 1 percent of the male population. Besides, a statistical showing of disproportionate impact based on analysis of the characteristics of actual applicants was not necessary, since qualified people might be discouraged from applying because of a self-recognized inability to meet the very standards challenged

D. CLASSIFICATIONS BASED ON ILLEGITIMACY[300]

[K96] "[T]he legal status of illegitimacy, however defined, is, like race or national origin, a characteristic determined by causes not within the control of the illegitimate individual, and bears no relation to the individual's ability to participate in and contribute to society."[301] The Court recognized in Weber that visiting condemnation upon the child in order to express society's disapproval of the parents' liaisons "is illogical and unjust. Moreover, imposing disabilities on the illegitimate child is contrary to the basic concept . . . that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility or wrongdoing. Obviously, no child is responsible for his birth and penalizing the illegitimate child is an ineffectual—as well as an unjust—way of deterring the parent."[302] Nevertheless, the Court has rejected the proposition that classifications based on illegitimacy are "suspect," so that any justifications must survive "strict scrutiny." Considering that discrimination against illegitimates "has never approached the severity or pervasiveness of the historic legal and political discrimination against women and [blacks,] . . . perhaps in part because illegitimacy does not carry an obvious badge, as race or sex do,"[303] the Court has adopted an intermediate standard of scrutiny in this context: classifications based on illegitimacy are constitutionally "invalid if they are not substantially related to permissible state interests."[304]

[K97] Thus, Levy held that a state may not create a right of action in favor of children for the wrongful death of a parent and exclude illegitimate children from the benefit of such a right, noting that "[l]egitimacy or illegitimacy of birth ha[d] no relation to the nature of the wrong allegedly inflicted on" the parent.[305] In Weber, the Court held that, under the Equal Protection Clause, a state may not exclude unacknowledged ille-

---

as being discriminatory. For these reasons, the Court accepted the district court's holding that the statutory height and weight standards had a discriminatory impact on women applicants. Id. at 329–31. The state argued that the height and weight requirements had a relationship to strength, a sufficient but unspecified amount of which was essential to effective job performance as a prison guard. Nevertheless, it had produced no evidence correlating the height and weight requirements with the requisite amount of strength thought essential to good job performance. Indeed, it had failed to offer evidence of any kind in specific justification of the statutory standards. The Court noted that "if the job-related quality [identified by the State] is bona fide, their purpose could be achieved by adopting and validating a test for applicants that measures strength directly." Such a test, fairly administered, would "measure the person for the job, and not the person in the abstract." Hence, the Court found that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—which required the removal of artificial, arbitrary, and unnecessary barriers to employment when the barriers operated invidiously to discriminate on the basis of sex—prohibited application of the statutory height and weight requirements to women. Id. at 332.

300 See also paras. K67–K69, K202.

301 Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495, 505 (1976).

302 Weber v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 406 U.S. 164, 175 (1972).

303 Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495, 506 (1976).

304 Lalli v. Lalli, 439 U.S. 259, 265 (1978) (plurality opinion), quoted in Pickett v. Brown, 462 U.S. 1, 8 (1983). Cf. Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495, 505–06 (1976); Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 767 (1977); Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 465 (1988).

305 Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 68, 70–72 (1968). Similarly, a wrongful death statute, barring recovery for damages to the parent of an illegitimate child while allowing such recovery to the parent of a legitimate child, violates the Equal Protection Clause, there being no rational basis for the distinction. See Glona v. Am. Guarantee & Liab. Ins. Co., 391 U.S. 73 (1968).

gitimate children from sharing equally with other children in the recovery of workmen's compensation benefits for the death of their parent.[306] Under these decisions, "a State may not invidiously discriminate against illegitimate children by denying them substantial benefits accorded children generally."[307] Gomez v. Perez therefore held that, "once a State posits a judicially enforceable right on behalf of children to needed support from their natural fathers, there is no constitutionally sufficient justification for denying such an essential right to a child simply because its natural father has not married its mother."[308] And Cahill found that a state statute limiting benefits of the "Assistance to Families of the Working Poor" program to those households in which the parents were ceremonially married and had at least one minor child of both, the natural child of one and adopted by the other, or a child adopted by both, denied equal protection to illegitimate children, for "the benefits extended under the program [we]re as indispensable to the health and wellbeing of illegitimate children as to those who [we]re legitimate."[309]

[K98] Jimenez struck down a statute granting social security benefits to a disabled worker's legitimate children born after the onset of disability but not to after-born illegitimate children, except under certain limited circumstances (those illegitimate solely on account of a non-obvious defect in their parents' marriage or those who could inherit from the wage-earner parent under state law). Finding a legislative purpose to aid children with needs demonstrated by a dependency relationship to a disabled worker, the Court held that equal protection was offended by the statute's denial to a sub-class of illegitimates of any opportunity to establish their dependency.[310]

[K99] In Mathews v. Lucas, the Court sustained provisions of the Social Security Act governing the eligibility for surviving children's insurance benefits. One of the statutory conditions of eligibility was dependency on the deceased wage earner. A child was considered dependent for this purpose if the insured father was living with or contributing to the child's support at the time of death. Certain children, however, were relieved of the burden of such individualized proof of dependency. Unless adopted by some other individual, a child who was legitimate, or a child who would be entitled to inherit personal property from the insured parent's estate under the applicable state intestacy law, was considered dependent at the time of the parent's death. Even lacking this relationship under state law, a child, unless adopted by some other individual, was entitled to a presumption of dependency if the decedent, before death, (1) had gone through a marriage ceremony with the other parent, resulting in a purported marriage between them that, but for a non-obvious legal defect, would have been valid, or (2) in writing had acknowledged the child to be his, or (3) had been decreed by a court to be the child's father, or (4) had been ordered by a court to support the child because the child was his. The remaining illegitimate children were required to prove actual dependency. The Court upheld the statutory classifications, finding them "reasonably related 306 Weber v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 406 U.S. 164, 167–76 (1972). Without questioning Louisiana's interest in protecting legitimate family relationships, the Court rejected the argument that "persons will shun illicit relations because the offspring may not one day reap the benefits of workmen's compensation." Id. at 173.

---

307 Gomez v. Perez, 409 U.S. 535, 538 (1973) (per curiam).

308 Id. at 538.

309 New Jersey Welfare Rights Org. v. Cahill, 411 U.S. 619, 621 (1973) (per curiam).

310 Jimenez v. Weinberger, 417 U.S. 628, 636–37 (1974).

to the likelihood of dependency at death."[311] "Congress' purpose in adopting the statutory presumptions of dependency [wa]s obviously to serve administrative convenience. While Congress was unwilling to assume that every child of a deceased insured was dependent at the time of death, by presuming dependency on the basis of relatively readily documented facts, such as legitimate birth, or existence of a support order or paternity decree, which could be relied upon to indicate the likelihood of continued actual dependency, Congress was able to avoid the burden and expense of specific case-by-case determination in the large number of cases where dependency [wa]s objectively probable. Such presumptions in aid of administrative functions, though they may approximate, rather than precisely mirror, the results that case-by-case adjudication would show, are permissible under the Fifth Amendment, so long as that lack of precise equivalence does not exceed the bounds of substantiality tolerated by the applicable level of scrutiny."[312] Under the intermediate standard of review applicable in that case, "the materiality of the relation between the statutory classifications and the likelihood of dependency they assertedly reflect[ed] [did not have to] be 'scientifically substantiated.' . . . [Nor was Congress] required in this realm of less than strictest scrutiny to weigh the burdens of administrative inquiry solely in terms of dollars ultimately spent, ignoring the relative amounts devoted to administrative rather than welfare uses. . . . [T]he burden remain[ed] upon the appellees to demonstrate the insubstantiality of that relation."[313] Applying these principles, the Court held that the challenged classifications were justified as "reasonable empirical judgments that [we]re consistent with a design to qualify entitlement to benefits upon a child's dependency at the time of the parent's death."[314]

[K100] The Court has developed a particular framework for evaluating equal protection challenges to statutes of limitations that apply to suits to establish paternity and thereby limit the ability of illegitimate children to obtain support. "First, the period for obtaining support . . . must be sufficiently long in duration to present a reasonable opportunity for those with an interest in such children to assert claims on their behalf. Second, any time limitation placed on that opportunity must be substantially related to the State's interest in avoiding the litigation of stale or fraudulent claims."[315] Mills held that Texas' one-year statute of limitations failed both steps of the analysis. The Court "explained that paternity suits typically will be brought by the child's mother, who might not act swiftly amidst the emotional and financial complications of the child's first year. And it is unlikely that the lapse of a mere 12 months will result in the loss of evidence or appreciably increase the likelihood of fraudulent claims."[316]

[K101] In Pickett, the Court unanimously struck down Tennessee's two-year statute of limitations for paternity and child support actions brought on behalf of certain illegitimate children. Adhering to the analysis developed in Mills, the Court first considered whether two years afforded a reasonable opportunity to bring such suits. The Tennessee statute was relatively more generous than the Texas statute considered in Mills, because

---

311 Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495, 509 (1976).

312 Id. at 509.

313 Id. at 510.

314 Id. at 510.

315 Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 U.S. 91, 99–100 (1982).

316 See Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 462 (1988), discussing Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 U.S. 91, 100–01 (1982).

it did not limit actions against a father who had acknowledged his paternity in writing or by furnishing support; nor did it apply if the child was likely to become a public charge. Nevertheless, the Court concluded that the two-year period was too short. The mother's "financial difficulties caused by the child's birth, . . . [the] loss of income attributable to the need to care for the child, . . . 'continuing affection for the child's father, a desire to avoid family and community disapproval, or the emotional strain and confusion that often attend the birth of an illegitimate child,' . . . might inhibit a mother from filing a paternity suit within two years after the child's birth."[317] Proceeding to the second step of the analysis, the Court decided that the two-year statute of limitations was not substantially related to Tennessee's asserted interest in preventing stale and fraudulent claims. The period during which suit could be brought was only a year longer than the period considered in Mills, and this incremental difference would not create substantially greater proof and fraud problems. Furthermore, Tennessee tolled most other actions during a child's minority, and even permitted a support action to be brought on behalf of a child up to 18 years of age if the child was or was likely to become a public charge. Finally, scientific advances in blood testing had alleviated some problems of proof in paternity actions. For these reasons, the Tennessee statute failed to survive heightened scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause.[318]

[K102] In light of this authority, Clark v. Jeter concluded that Pennsylvania's six-year statute of limitations violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Court first noted that even six years do "not necessarily provide a reasonable opportunity to assert a claim on behalf of an illegitimate child. 'The unwillingness of the mother to file a paternity action on behalf of her child, which could stem from her relationship with the natural father or from the emotional strain of having an illegitimate child, or even from the desire to avoid community and family disapproval, may continue years after the child is born. The problem may be exacerbated if, as often happens, the mother herself is a minor.' . . . Not all of these difficulties are likely to abate in six years. A mother might realize only belatedly a loss of income attributable to the need to care for the child. . . . Furthermore, financial difficulties are likely to increase as the child matures and incurs expenses for clothing, school, and medical care."[319] Second, the six-year period was not substantially related to an interest in avoiding the litigation of stale or fraudulent claims. In a number of circumstances, Pennsylvania permitted the issue of paternity to be litigated more than six years after the birth of an illegitimate child. In addition, Congress had "recognized that increasingly sophisticated tests for genetic markers permit[ted] the exclusion of over 99% of those who might be accused of paternity, regardless of the age of the child."[320]

[K103] Trimble addressed the constitutionality of an Illinois statute providing that a child born out of wedlock could inherit from his intestate father only if the father had "acknowledged" the child and the child had been legitimated by the inter-marriage of the parents. The appellant in Trimble was a child born out of wedlock whose father had neither acknowledged her nor married her mother. He had, however, been found to

---

317 Pickett v. Brown, 462 U.S. 1, 12–13 (1983), quoting Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 U.S. 91, 100 (1982).

318 Pickett v. Brown, 462 U.S. 1, 13–18 (1983).

319 Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 463–64 (1988), quoting Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 U.S. 91, 105, n.4 (1982) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

320 Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 464–65 (1988).

be her father in a judicial decree ordering him to contribute to her support. When the father died intestate, the child was excluded as a distributee, because the statutory requirements for inheritance had not been met. The Court concluded that the Illinois statute discriminated against illegitimate children in a manner prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause. The state argued that the statute furthered its interest in safeguarding "the orderly disposition of property at death." The Court recognized that devising an appropriate legal framework in the furtherance of that interest is "a matter particularly within the competence of the individual States."[321] "An important aspect of that framework is a response to the often difficult problem of proving the paternity of illegitimate children and the related danger of spurious claims against intestate estates."[322] These difficulties, the Court said, "might justify a more demanding standard for illegitimate children claiming under their fathers' estates than that required either for illegitimate children claiming under their mothers' estates or for legitimate children generally."[323] The Illinois statute, however, was constitutionally flawed, because it excluded "at least some significant categories of illegitimate children of intestate men [whose] inheritance rights [could] be recognized without jeopardizing the orderly settlement of estates or the dependability of titles to property passing under intestacy laws."[324] As the Court pointed out, difficulties of proving paternity in some situations do not justify the total statutory disinheritance of illegitimate children whose fathers die intestate. Since, in that case, the deceased had been found to be the father of appellant in a state court paternity action prior to his death, that adjudication should be equally sufficient to establish appellant's right to claim a child's share of her father's estate, "for the State's interest in the accurate and efficient disposition of property at death would not be compromised in any way by allowing her claim in these circumstances."[325]

[K104] "[S]tatutory provisions that have an evident and substantial relation to the State's interest in providing for the orderly and just distribution of a decedent's property at death" are to be sustained.[326] "After an estate has been finally distributed, the interest in finality may provide an additional, valid justification for barring the belated assertion of claims, even though they may be meritorious and even though mistakes of law or fact may have occurred during the probate process."[327]

---

[321] Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 771 (1977).

[322] Lalli v. Lalli, 439 U.S. 259, 265 (1978).

[323] Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 770 (1977).

[324] Id. at 771.

[325] Id. at 772.

[326] Reed v. Campbell, 476 U.S. 852, 855 (1986), citing Lalli v. Lalli, 439 U.S. 259 (1978). Considering the problem of proving the paternity of illegitimate children and the related danger of spurious claims against intestate estates, Lalli upheld the requirement imposed by state law for an illegitimate child to inherit from its natural father that the paternity of the father be declared in a judicial proceeding sometime before his death. The dissent noted, inter alia, that "the state interest in the accurate and efficient determination of paternity can be adequately served by requiring the illegitimate child to offer into evidence a formal acknowledgment of paternity" or by requiring "illegitimates to prove paternity by an elevated standard of proof, e.g., clear and convincing evidence, or even beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. at 277, 279.

[327] Reed v. Campbell, 476 U.S. 852, 855–56 (1986).

E. ALIENAGE CLASSIFICATIONS

1. Federal Regulation

[K105] Federal authority to regulate the status of aliens derives from various sources, including the federal government's power "[t]o establish [a] uniform Rule of Naturalization" (U.S. Constitution, Article I, Section 8, Clause 4), its power "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations" (Article I, Section 8, Clause 3), and its broad authority over foreign affairs.[328] "The Federal Government has broad constitutional powers in determining what aliens shall be admitted to the United States, the period they may remain, regulation of their conduct before naturalization, and the terms and conditions of their naturalization."[329] As the Court has pointed out, it is "a routine and normally legitimate part of the business of the Federal Government to classify on the basis of alien status" and "to take into account the character of the relationship between the alien and the United States."[330]

[K106] In Mathews v. Diaz, the Court applied relaxed scrutiny in upholding the validity of a federal statute that conditioned an alien's eligibility for participation in a federal medical insurance program on continuous residence in the United States for a five-year period and admission for permanent residence, but it imposed no similar burden on citizens. The Court reasoned:

> The fact that all persons, aliens and citizens alike, are protected by the Due Process Clause does not lead to the further conclusion that all aliens are entitled to enjoy all the advantages of citizenship or, indeed, to the conclusion that all aliens must be placed in a single homogeneous legal classification. For a host of constitutional and statutory provisions rest on the premise that a legitimate distinction between citizens and aliens may justify attributes and benefits for one class not accorded to the other; and the class of aliens is itself a heterogeneous multitude of persons with a wide-ranging variety of ties to this country. . . .
>
> In particular, the fact that Congress has provided some welfare benefits for citizens does not require it to provide like benefits for all aliens. Neither the overnight visitor, the unfriendly agent of a hostile foreign power, the resident diplomat, nor the illegal entrant, can advance even a colorable constitutional claim to a share in the bounty that a conscientious sovereign makes available to its own citizens and some of its guests. The decision to share that bounty with our guests may take into account the character of the relationship between the alien and this country: Congress may decide that, as the alien's tie grows stronger, so does the strength of his claim to an equal share of that munificence. . . .
>
> Since it is obvious that Congress has no constitutional duty to provide all aliens with the welfare benefits provided to citizens, the party challenging the constitutionality of the particular line Congress has drawn has the burden of advancing principled reasoning that will at once invalidate that line and yet tolerate a different line separating some aliens from others. In this case, the appellees have challenged two requirements—first, that the alien be admitted

---

328 See Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 10 (1982).

329 Takahashi v. Fish and Game Comm'n, 334 U.S. 410, 419 (1948).

330 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 225 (1982), quoting Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 80, 85 (1976).

as a permanent resident, and, second, that his residence be of a duration of at least five years. But if these requirements were eliminated, surely Congress would at least require that the alien's entry be lawful; even then, unless mere transients are to be held constitutionally entitled to benefits, some durational requirement would certainly be appropriate. In short, it is unquestionably reasonable for Congress to make an alien's eligibility depend on both the character and the duration of his residence. . . .

[T]hose who qualify under the test Congress has chosen may reasonably be presumed to have a greater affinity with the United States than those who do not. In short, citizens and those who are most like citizens qualify. Those who are less like citizens do not.[331]

2. State Legislation

a. The Supremacy Clause[332]

[K107] The Court has long recognized the preeminent role of the federal government with respect to the regulation of aliens within the borders of the United States.[333] Not surprisingly, therefore, its cases have also been at pains to note the substantial limitations upon the authority of the states in making classifications based upon alienage. In Takahashi, the Court considered a California statute that precluded aliens who were "ineligible for citizenship under federal law" from obtaining commercial fishing licenses, even though they "met all other state requirements" and were lawful inhabitants of the state. In seeking to defend the statute, the state argued that it had "simply followed the Federal Government's lead" in classifying certain persons as ineligible for citizenship. The Court rejected the argument, stressing the delicate nature of the federal-state relationship in regulating aliens: "[the states] can neither add to nor take from the conditions lawfully imposed by Congress upon admission, naturalization and residence of aliens in the United States or the several states. State laws which impose discriminatory burdens upon the entrance or residence of aliens lawfully within the United States conflict with this constitutionally derived federal power to regulate immigration."[334]

[K108] The decision in Graham v. Richardson, followed directly from Takahashi. Graham held that a state may not withhold welfare benefits from resident aliens "merely because of their alienage." Such discrimination, the Court concluded, would not only violate

---

[331] Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67, 78–83 (1976). In Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 101, 105 (1976), the Court held unlawful a Civil Service Commission regulation prohibiting the hiring of aliens on the ground that the Commission lacked the requisite authority. However, the Court accepted the position that "overriding national interests may provide a justification for a citizenship requirement in the federal service." Id. at 101 (emphasis added). Moreover, the Court was willing to "assume . . . that, if the Congress or the President had expressly imposed the citizenship requirement, it would be justified by the national interest in providing an incentive for aliens to become naturalized, or possibly even as providing the President with an expendable token for treaty negotiating purposes." Id. at 105.

[332] In those areas where the Constitution grants the federal government the power to act, the Supremacy Clause (U.S. Const., art. VI, cl. 2) dictates that federal enactments will prevail over competing state exercises of power. See, e.g., United States v. Gillock, 445 U.S. 360, 370 (1980).

[333] See, e.g., Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33, 42 (1915).

[334] Takahashi v. Fish and Game Comm'n, 334 U.S. 410, 418–19 (1948).

the Equal Protection Clause but would also encroach upon federal authority over lawfully admitted aliens. In support of the latter conclusion, the Court noted that Congress had "not seen fit to impose any burden or restriction on aliens who become indigent after their entry into the United States," but rather had chosen to afford "lawfully admitted resident aliens . . . the full and equal benefit of all state laws for the security of persons and property." The states had thus imposed an "auxiliary burde[n] upon the entrance or residence of aliens" that was never contemplated by Congress.[335]

[K109] "Read together, Takahashi and Graham stand for the broad principle that 'state regulation not congressionally sanctioned that discriminates against aliens lawfully admitted to the country is impermissible if it imposes additional burdens not contemplated by Congress.'"[336] Accordingly, Toll held that a state university's policy of categorically denying domiciled non-immigrant aliens holding G-4 visas (visas issued to non-immigrant aliens who were officers or employees of certain international organizations and to members of their immediate families) in-state status, under which preferential treatment was given to domiciled citizen and immigrant alien students for purposes of tuition and fees, was invalid under the Supremacy Clause, for, in light of Congress' explicit decision in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 not to bar G-4 aliens from acquiring domicile in the United States, the state's decision to deny "in-state" status to G-4 aliens, solely on account of such aliens' immigration status, amounted to an ancillary burden not contemplated by Congress in admitting these aliens to the United States, and it frustrated the federal policies embodied in the special tax exemptions afforded G-4 aliens by various treaties, international agreements, and it federal statutes.[337] Conversely, De Canas held that a California statute, making it unlawful in some circumstances to employ illegal aliens, was not invalid under the Supremacy Clause, because Congress intended that the states be allowed, "to the extent consistent with federal law, [to] regulate the employment of illegal aliens."[338]

b. The Equal Protection Clause

i. Generally—Standard of Review

[K110] The decisions of the Court regarding the permissibility of state classifications involving aliens have not formed an unwavering line over the years. In Yick Wo, the Court held both that resident aliens fall within the protection of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that the state could not deny to aliens the right to carry on a "harmless and useful occupation" available to citizens.[339] "Although Yick Wo proclaimed that hostility toward aliens was not a permissible ground for a discriminatory classification, it dealt only with a situation in which government had actively intervened in the sphere of private employment. In a series of later cases, it became clear that Yick Wo did not mean that the State had to be strictly neutral as between aliens and

---

335 Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 377–79 (1971).

336 Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 12–13 (1982), quoting De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 358, n.6 (1976). However, "when Congress has done nothing more than permit a class of aliens to enter the country temporarily, the proper application of this principle is likely to be a matter of some dispute. See Toll, supra, at 13.

337 Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1, 13–17 (1982).

338 De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351, 361 (1976).

339 Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373–74 (1886).

citizens: the Court continued to uphold the right of the State to withhold from aliens public benefits and public resources."[340] "This distinction between government distribution of public resources and intervention in the private market was clearly established as the principle by which state regulations of aliens were to be evaluated in Truax, . . . which struck down a state statute requiring all employers of more than five workers to employ 'not less than eighty per cent qualified electors or native born citizens of the United States.'"[341] There the Court permitted states to exclude aliens from various activities when the restriction pertained to "the regulation or distribution of the public domain, or of the common property or resources of the people of the State."[342]

[K111] This public/private distinction, the "special public interest" doctrine, was challenged in Takahashi, which held that California could not bar lawfully resident aliens from obtaining commercial fishing licenses: "[t]o whatever extent the fish in the three-mile belt off California may be 'capable of ownership' by California, we think that 'ownership' is inadequate to justify California in excluding any or all aliens who are lawful residents of the State from making a living by fishing in the ocean off its shores while permitting all others to do so."[343] As the principle governing analysis of state classifications of aliens, who are lawful residents, the distinction was further eroded in Graham v. Richardson, which read Takahashi as "cast[ing] doubt on the continuing validity of the special public interest doctrine in all contexts,"[344] and held that a state could not distinguish between lawfully resident aliens and citizens in the distribution of welfare benefits.

[K112] Noting that "[a]liens as a class are a prime example of a 'discrete and insular' minority," Graham announced that classifications by a state that are based on alienage are "inherently suspect [under the Equal Protection Clause,] and subject to close judicial scrutiny."[345] In order to withstand strict scrutiny, alienage classifications by a state "must advance a compelling state interest by the least restrictive means available."[346]

ii. Economic Benefits

[K113] Graham invalidated an Arizona statute that imposed a durational residency requirement for welfare benefits on aliens but not on citizens. In so doing, the Court noted that "the justification of limiting expenses is particularly inappropriate and unreasonable when the discriminated class consists of aliens. Aliens, like citizens, pay taxes, and may be called into the armed forces. . . . [A]liens may live within a state for many years, work in the state and contribute to the economic growth of the state."[347]

---

[340] Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 436–37 (1982), citing Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197 (1923) (ownership of land); Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U.S. 138 (1914) (harvesting wildlife); Heim v. McCall, 239 U.S. 175 (1915) (employment on public works projects).

[341] See Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 437 (1982), discussing Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915).

[342] Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33, 39 (1915).

[343] Takahashi v. Fish and Game Comm'n, 334 U.S. 410, 421 (1948).

[344] Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 374 (1971).

[345] Id. at 372.

[346] Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 219 (1984). Cf. Examining Bd. of Engineers, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 605 (1976) ("the governmental interest claimed to justify the discrimination is to be carefully examined in order to determine whether that interest is legitimate and substantial, and inquiry must be made whether the means adopted to achieve the goal are necessary and precisely drawn").

[347] Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 374 (1971).

[K114] Similarly, in Nyquist, the Court held that a New York statutory provision barring certain resident aliens from state financial assistance for higher education violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The statute was subject to strict scrutiny, since it was directed at aliens, and only aliens were harmed by it, even though its bar against them was not absolute, in that an alien who had applied for citizenship or one not qualified to apply who had filed a statement of intent to become a citizen might participate in the assistance programs. Further, the Court found that the purpose of creating "an incentive for aliens to become naturalized . . . is not a permissible one for a State," since "[c]ontrol over immigration and naturalization is entrusted exclusively to the Federal Government, and a State has no power to interfere."[348] Moreover, the asserted justification that the financial assistance program was confined to actual or potential voters, thus enhancing the educational level of the electorate, could not be deemed adequate to support the statute's ban. "If the encouragement of naturalization through these programs were seen as adequate, then every discrimination against aliens could be similarly justified. The exception would swallow the rule." And the claimed interest in educating the electorate would not be frustrated by including resident aliens in the assistance program.[349]

iii. Occupational Activity—The "Public Function" Exception

[K115] Applying strict scrutiny, the Court has invalidated an array of state statutes that denied aliens the right to pursue various occupations. In Examining Board v. Flores de Otero, the Court voided a Puerto Rico statute that excluded aliens from the practice of civil engineering. Puerto Rico offered three justifications for its ban. The first was to prevent the "uncontrolled" influx of Spanish-speaking aliens into the field in Puerto Rico. In rejecting the contention, the Court emphasized that "[o]nce an alien is lawfully admitted, a State may not justify the restriction of the alien's liberty on the ground that it wishes to control the impact or effect of federal immigration laws." The second was to raise the prevailing low standard of living. Although this justification "ha[d] elements of substance and legitimacy, the means drawn to achieve the end were neither necessary nor precise. To uphold the statute on the basis of broad economic justification of this kind would permit any State to bar the employment of aliens in any or all lawful occupations."[350] Finally, the asserted purpose to assure responsibility for negligent workmanship swept too broadly. "United States citizenship [wa]s not a guarantee that a civil engineer would continue to reside in Puerto Rico, or even in the United States, and it [bore] no particular or rational relationship to skill, competence, or financial responsibility. . . . Puerto Rico ha[d] available to it other ample tools to achieve the goal of an engineer's financial responsibility without indiscriminately prohibiting the private practice of civil engineering by a class of otherwise qualified professionals."[351]

[K116] In re Griffiths nullified a state law excluding aliens from eligibility for membership in the state Bar. First, the state did not meet its burden of showing the classification to have been necessary to vindicate the state's undoubted interest in maintaining

---

[348] Nyquist v. Mauclet, 432 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1977).

[349] Id. at 11. Since the Court held that the challenged statute violated the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantee, it did not reach appellees' claim that it also intruded upon Congress' comprehensive authority over immigration and naturalization. Id. at 12.

[350] Examining Bd. of Eng'rs, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 605–06 (1976).

[351] Id. at 606.

high professional standards. Moreover, the Court pointed out that "the powers to sign writs and subpoenas, take recognizances, and administer oaths hardly involve matters of state policy or acts of such unique responsibility as to entrust them only to citizens."[352] "Lawyers do indeed occupy professional positions of responsibility and influence that impose on them duties correlative with their vital right of access to the courts. . . . Yet they are not officials of government."[353]

[K117] In this context, the Court has developed a narrow exception to the rule that discrimination based on alienage triggers strict scrutiny. This exception has been labeled the "political function" exception, and it applies to laws that exclude aliens from positions "intimately related to the process of democratic self-government."[354] "The rationale behind the political function exception is that, within broad boundaries, a State may establish its own form of government and limit the right to govern to those who are full-fledged members of the political community. Some public positions are so closely bound up with the formulation and implementation of self-government that the State is permitted to exclude from those positions persons outside the political community, hence persons who have not become part of the process of democratic self-determination."[355] To determine whether a restriction based on alienage fits within the narrow political function exception, Cabell devised a two-part test. "First, the specificity of the classification will be examined: a classification that is substantially over-inclusive or under-inclusive tends to undercut the governmental claim that the classification serves legitimate political ends. . . . Second, even if the classification is sufficiently tailored, it may be applied in the particular case only to 'persons holding state elective or important non-elective executive, legislative, and judicial positions,' those officers 'who participate directly in the formulation, execution, or review of broad public policy,' and hence 'perform functions that go to the heart of representative government.'"[356]

[K118] Hence, Foley held that a state may require police to be citizens, because, in performing a "fundamental obligation of government," police are "clothed with authority to exercise an almost infinite variety of discretionary powers . . . often in the most sensitive areas of daily life."[357] Under Ambach, "a State may bar aliens who have not declared their intent to become citizens from teaching in the public schools because teachers, like police, possess a high degree of responsibility and discretion in the fulfillment of a basic governmental obligation. They have direct, day-to-day contact with students, exercise unsupervised discretion over them, act as role models, and influence their students about the government and the political process."[358] Cabell held that "a State may bar aliens from positions as probation officers because they, like police and teachers, routinely exercise discretionary power, involving a basic governmental function, that places them in a position of direct authority over other individuals."[359]

---

[352] In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717, 724 (1973).

[353] Id. at 729.

[354] Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 220 (1984).

[355] Id. at 221.

[356] Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432, 440 (1982), quoting Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 646 (1973).

[357] Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291, 297 (1978).

[358] See Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 220 (1984), discussing Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 75–79 (1979).

[359] See Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 220 (1984), discussing Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432 (1982).

[K119] By contrast, Bernal held that Texas could not require that a notary public be a U.S. citizen. Under state law, a notary public had the power to authenticate written instruments, administer oaths, and take out-of-court depositions. The Court found that, although there was "a critical need for a notary's duties to be carried out correctly and with integrity," those duties were "essentially clerical and ministerial."[360] Texas notaries were not invested with "policymaking responsibility or broad discretion in the execution of public policy . . . requir[ing] the routine exercise of authority over individuals."[361] Further, Texas maintained that the challenged statute served its "legitimate concern that notaries be reasonably familiar with state law and institutions," and "that notaries may be called upon years later to testify to acts they have performed." However, both of these asserted justifications utterly failed to meet the stringent requirements of strict scrutiny. "[I]f the State's concern with ensuring a notary's familiarity with state law were truly 'compelling,' one would expect the State to give some sort of test actually measuring a person's familiarity with the law. The State, however, administer[ed] no such test." The second justification was similarly inadequate, because the state had "failed to advance a factual showing that the unavailability of notaries' testimony presented a real, as opposed to a merely speculative, problem to the State. Without a factual underpinning, the State's asserted interest lack[ed] the weight required of interests properly denominated as compelling."[362]

[K120] Sugarman struck down a state statute barring aliens from employment in permanent positions in the competitive class of the state civil service. The challenged statute was "neither narrowly confined nor precise in its application. Its imposed ineligibility [might] apply to the 'sanitation man,' . . . to the typist, and to the office worker, as well as to the person who directly participate[d] in the formulation and execution of important state policy. The citizenship restriction [swept] indiscriminately." Besides, the state legislation relating generally to persons holding elective and high appointive offices, contained no citizenship restrictions.[363] The state asserted that when aliens left their positions, the state had the expense of hiring and training replacements. The Court rejected the argument, noting that, "[e]ven if [it] could accept the premise underlying this argument—that aliens [we]re more likely to leave their work than citizens—and assuming that this rationale could be logically confined to the competitive civil service, . . . 'the justification of limiting expenses is particularly inappropriate and unreasonable when the discriminated class consists of aliens,' . . . [in view of] the general identity of an alien's obligations with those of a citizen."[364]

iv. Illegal Aliens

[K121] In De Canas, the Court recognized that "the States do have some authority to act with respect to illegal aliens, at least where such action mirrors federal objectives and furthers a legitimate state goal."[365] Plyler v. Doe held that states cannot deny to illegal aliens the free public education they provide to citizens and legally documented

---

360 Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 225 (1984).

361 Id. at 226.

362 Id. at 227–28.

363 Sugarman v. Dougall, 413 U.S. 634, 643 (1973).

364 Id. at 646, quoting Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 376 (1971).

365 See Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 225 (1982), discussing De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351 (1976). In the latter case, the state's program reflected Congress' intention to bar from employment all aliens except those possessing a grant of permission to work in this country. Id. at 361.

aliens. There, the Court reiterated that education is not a fundamental right, and it stressed that undocumented aliens are not a "suspect class." Nevertheless, appearing to apply a heightened level of equal protection scrutiny,[366] it concluded that the justifications for the discrimination offered by the state were wholly insubstantial in light of the costs involved to these children, the state, and the nation. Quoting from earlier opinions, the Court emphasized that public education is not > merely some governmental "benefit" indistinguishable from other forms of social welfare legislation. Both the importance of education in maintaining [the] basic institutions [of the nation] and the lasting impact of its deprivation on the life of the child mark the distinction. . . . "[T]he public schools [are] a most vital civic institution for the preservation of a democratic system of government," . . . and . . . the primary vehicle for transmitting "the values on which [the American] society rests." . . . In addition, education provides the basic tools by which individuals might lead economically productive lives to the benefit of . . . all.

>
> In addition, . . . denial of education to some isolated group of children poses an affront to one of the goals of the Equal Protection Clause: the abolition of governmental barriers presenting unreasonable obstacles to advancement on the basis of individual merit. . . . [B]y depriving the children of any disfavored group of an education, [a state] foreclose[s] the means by which that group might raise the level of esteem in which it is held by the majority. But more directly, "education prepares individuals to be self-reliant and self-sufficient participants in society." . . . The inability to read and write handicaps the individual deprived of a basic education each and every day of his life. The inestimable toll of that deprivation on the social, economic, intellectual, and psychological wellbeing of the individual, and the obstacle it poses to individual achievement, make it most difficult to reconcile the cost or the principle of a status-based denial of basic education with the framework of equality embodied in the Equal Protection Clause. . . .
>
> [A state statute denying children of illegal aliens the free public education made available to other residents] imposes a lifetime hardship on a discrete class of children not accountable for their disabling status. . . .
>
> [Indeed, these children] can affect neither their parents conduct nor their own status, . . . [and] legislation directing the onus of a parent's misconduct against his children does not comport with fundamental conceptions of justice.[367]

Under these considerations, the Court held that such a statutory classification "can hardly be considered rational unless it furthers some substantial goal of the State."[368] But no such showing had been made in that case. "[T]he undocumented status of these children vel non [did not] establis[h] a sufficient rational basis for denying them benefits that a State might choose to afford other residents. . . . Faced with an equal protection challenge respecting the treatment of aliens, . . . the courts must be attentive to congressional policy; the exercise of congressional power might well affect the State's

---

366 See Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Schs., 487 U.S. 450, 459 (1988).

367 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 221–23, 220 (1982).

368 Id. at 224.

prerogatives to afford differential treatment to a particular class of aliens. But [the Court was] unable to find in the congressional immigration scheme any statement of policy that might weigh significantly in arriving at an equal protection balance concerning the State's authority to deprive these children of an education."[369] And "[i]n light of the discretionary federal power to grant relief from deportation, a State cannot realistically determine that any particular undocumented child will in fact be deported, until after deportation proceedings have been completed."[370] Further, "[w]hile a State might have an interest in mitigating the potentially harsh economic effects of sudden shifts in population, [the challenged distinction] hardly offer[ed] an effective method of dealing with an urgent demographic or economic problem. There [wa]s no evidence in the record suggesting that illegal entrants impose[d] any significant burden on the State's economy. To the contrary, the available evidence suggest[ed] that illegal aliens underutilize[d] public services, while contributing their labor to the local economy and tax money to the state fisc. . . . Thus, even making the doubtful assumption that the net impact of illegal aliens on the economy of the State [wa]s negative, . . . it [wa]s clear that charging tuition to undocumented children constitute[d] a ludicrously ineffectual attempt to stem the tide of illegal immigration, at least when compared with the alternative of prohibiting the employment of illegal aliens."[371] Moreover, the record in no way supported the claim that exclusion of undocumented children was likely to improve the overall quality of education in the state. The state had failed to offer any "credible supporting evidence that a proportionately small diminution of the funds spent on each child, which might result from devoting some state funds to the education of the excluded group, would have a grave impact on the quality of education." And "even if improvement in the quality of education were a likely result of barring some number of children from the schools of the State, the State [should] support its selection of this group as the appropriate target for exclusion. In terms of educational cost and need, however, undocumented children [we]re basically indistinguishable from legally resident alien children."[372] Finally, the Court rejected the argument that "undocumented children [we]re appropriately singled out because their unlawful presence within the United States render[ed] them less likely than other children to remain within the boundaries of the State, and to put their education to productive social or political use within the State. Even assuming that such an interest [wa]s legitimate, it [wa]s an interest most difficult to quantify. The State ha[d] no assurance that any child, citizen or not, [would] employ the education provided by the State within the confines of the State's borders. In any event, the record [wa]s clear that many of the undocumented children disabled by the classification at issue [would] remain in the country indefinitely, and that some [would] become lawful residents or citizens of the United States. It [wa]s difficult to understand precisely what the State hope[d] to achieve by promoting the creation and perpetuation of a subclass of illiterates within [the country's] boundaries, surely adding to the problems and costs of unemployment, welfare, and crime."[373]

---

369 Id. at 224–25.

370 Id. at 226.

371 Id. at 228–29.

372 Id. at 229.

373 Id. at 229–30.

F. AGE CLASSIFICATIONS[374]

[K122] "Age classifications, unlike governmental conduct based on race or gender, cannot be characterized as 'so seldom relevant to the achievement of any legitimate state interest that laws grounded in such considerations are deemed to reflect prejudice and antipathy.'"[375]

> Older persons, again, unlike those who suffer discrimination on the basis of race or gender, have not been subjected to a "history of purposeful unequal treatment." . . . Old age also does not define a discrete and insular minority because all persons, if they live out their normal life spans, will experience it. . . . Accordingly, . . . age is not a suspect classification under the Equal Protection Clause.
>
> States may discriminate on the basis of age without offending the Fourteenth Amendment if the age classification in question is rationally related to a legitimate state interest. . . . Under the Fourteenth Amendment, a State may rely on age as a proxy for other qualities, abilities, or characteristics that are relevant to the State's legitimate interests. The Constitution does not preclude reliance on such generalizations. That age proves to be an inaccurate proxy in any individual case is irrelevant. . . . Finally, because an age classification is presumptively rational, the individual challenging its constitutionality bears the burden of proving that "the facts on which the classification is apparently based could not reasonably be conceived to be true by the governmental decisionmaker."[376]

[K123] "[G]overnmental employment is not a fundamental right and those who are mandatorily retired are not a suspect class."[377] Murgia upheld, against an equal protection challenge, a Massachusetts statute requiring uniformed state police officers to retire at age 50. The state justified the provision on the ground that the age classification assured the state of the physical preparedness of its uniformed police. Although Officer Murgia himself was in excellent physical health and could still perform the duties of a state police officer, the Court found that the statute clearly met the requirements of the Equal Protection Clause. "That the State [had chosen] not to determine fitness more precisely through individualized testing after age 50 [wa]s not to say that the objective of assuring physical fitness [wa]s not rationally furthered by a maximum age limitation."[378]

[K124] In Bradley, the Court rejected an equal protection challenge to a federal statute requiring Foreign Service officers to retire at age 60, though no mandatory retirement age was established for Civil Service employees, including those who served abroad. The Court held that the early retirement provision was justified in view of its function of "stimulating the highest performance in the ranks of the Foreign Service by assuring 374 See also para. K81 (prohibition of liquor sales); para. K82 (statutory rape); para. K179 (ordinance restricting admission to certain dancehalls to persons between the ages of 14 and 18).

---

375 Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 83 (2000), quoting Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc., 473 U.S. 432 (1985).

376 Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 83–84 (2000), quoting Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 111 (1979).

377 Equal Employment Opportunity Comm'n v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226, 260 (1983) (opinion of Burger, C.J.).

378 Massachusetts Bd. of Ret. v. Murgia, 427 U.S. 307, 316 (1976) (per curiam).

that opportunities for promotion would be available despite limits on the number of personnel classes and on the number of positions in the Service." Moreover, the provision was justified by Congress' perception of a need "to assure the high quality of those occupying positions critical to the conduct of [the country's] foreign relations," and to "minimize[e] the risk of less than superior performance by reason of poor health or loss of vitality."[379] Another reason for not equating the situation with respect to Civil Service employees serving overseas with that of the Foreign Service was that about 60 percent of the relatively small group in the latter category served in overseas posts at any one time, whereas only about 5 percent of Civil Service employees were in overseas service at any one time, and such service was mainly on a voluntary basis. And even if the classification at issue was to some extent both underinclusive and overinclusive, "perfection [wa]s by no means required" to satisfy equal protection standards. "If increasing age [brought] with it increasing susceptibility to physical difficulties, . . . the fact that individual Foreign Service employees [might] be able to perform past age 60 d[id] not invalidate [the provision.] Because Congress desired to maintain the competence of the Foreign Service, the mandatory retirement age of 60 rationally further[ed] its legitimate objective, and it ma[de] no difference that some Foreign Service personnel [might] not be subject to the rigors of overseas service or that some Civil Service employees serve[d] in various hardship positions in foreign lands."[380] The Court accepted such imperfection, because it was, "in turn, rationally related to the secondary objective of legislative convenience. The Foreign Service retirement system and the Civil Service retirement system [we]re packages of benefits, requirements, and restrictions serving many different purposes. . . . Congress was entitled to conclude that certain groups of employees share[d] more characteristics with Foreign Service officers than with Civil Service personnel, even though not serving for as long in as important overseas posts, and that other employees share[d] more characteristics with Civil Service personnel than with Foreign Service officers, even though serving some time in some overseas positions. Congress chose not to examine exactly which individual employees [we]re likely to serve long enough in important enough positions in demanding enough locales to warrant mandatory early retirement. Rather than abandoning its primary end completely, or unnecessarily including all federal employees within the means, it drew a line around those groups of employees it thought most generally pertinent to its objective. Whether . . . Congress was unwise in not choosing a means more precisely related to its primary purpose [wa]s irrelevant."[381] Finally, the Court noted that appellees had failed to demonstrate that Congress had "no reasonable basis for believing that conditions overseas generally [we]re more demanding than conditions in the United States and that, at age 60 or before, many persons begin something of a decline in mental and physical reliability."[382]

[K125] Gregory upheld a provision of the Missouri Constitution that required judges to retire at age 70. The Court stressed that the people of Missouri had a "legitimate, indeed compelling, interest in maintaining a judiciary fully capable of performing the demanding tasks that judges must perform. It is an unfortunate fact of life that physical and mental capacity sometimes diminish with age. . . . The people [might] there-

379 Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 101, 103–04 (1979).
380 Id. at 108–09.
381 Id. at 109.
382 Id. at 111.

fore wish to replace some older judges. . . . Voluntary retirement [would] not always be sufficient. Nor [might] impeachment—with its public humiliation and elaborate procedural machinery—serve acceptably the goal of a fully functioning judiciary."[383] "The election process [might] also be inadequate. . . . Most voters never observe[d] judges in action nor read their opinions. . . . State judges serve[d] longer terms than other officials, making them—deliberately—less dependent on the people's will. . . . The people of Missouri rationally could conclude that retention elections—in which state judges run unopposed at relatively long intervals—[would] not serve as an adequate check on judges whose performance [wa]s deficient. Mandatory retirement [wa]s a reasonable response to this dilemma."[384] That other state officials were not subject to mandatory retirement was rationally explained by the facts that their performance was subject to greater public scrutiny, that they were subject to more standard elections, that deterioration in their performance was more readily discernible, and that they were more easily removed than judges. Moreover, although the Missouri provision was based on a generalization about the effect of old age on the ability of individuals to serve as judges, and although it was probably not true that most judges suffered significant deterioration in performance at age 70, nevertheless, because Missouri's age classification was subject only to rational basis review, the Court held that the state's reliance on such imperfect generalizations was entirely proper under the Equal Protection Clause.[385]

G. CLASSIFICATIONS BASED ON MENTAL RETARDATION[386]

[K126] Cleburne considered an equal protection challenge to a city ordinance requiring a special use permit for the operation of a group home for the mentally retarded. The court of appeals had held that mental retardation qualified as a "quasi-suspect" classification under the Equal Protection Clause. The Court did not accept this proposition, and it concluded instead that legislation "singling out the retarded for special treatment reflects the real and undeniable differences between the retarded and others"[387] and incurs only the minimum "rational basis" review applicable to general social and economic legislation. As the Court explained, > if the large and amorphous class of the mentally retarded were deemed quasi-suspect, it would be difficult to find a principled way to distinguish a variety of other groups who have perhaps immutable disabilities setting them off from others, who cannot themselves mandate the desired legislative responses, and who can claim some degree of prejudice from at least part of the public at large. One need mention in this respect only the aging, the disabled, the mentally ill, and the infirm. . . .

>
> Because mental retardation is a characteristic that the government may legitimately take into account in a wide range of decisions, and because both State and Federal Governments have recently committed themselves to assisting the retarded, we will not presume that any given legislative action, even one 383 Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 472 (1991).

---

384 Id. at 472.

385 Id. at 473.

386 See also para. D47 (applicable burden of proof in mental retardation commitment proceedings lower than the standard of proof for the institutionalization of the mentally ill).

387 Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 444 (1985).

> that disadvantages retarded individuals, is rooted in considerations that the Constitution will not tolerate. . . .
>
> To withstand equal protection review, legislation that distinguishes between the mentally retarded and others must be rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. This standard affords government the latitude necessary both to pursue policies designed to assist the retarded in realizing their full potential, and to freely and efficiently engage in activities that burden the retarded in what is essentially an incidental manner. The State may not rely on a classification whose relationship to an asserted goal is so attenuated as to render the distinction arbitrary or irrational.[388]

[K127] Further, the Court found that the city's purported justifications for the ordinance at issue made no sense in light of how the city treated other groups similarly situated in relevant respects. Although the group home for the mentally retarded was required to obtain a special use permit, apartment houses, other multiple-family dwellings, retirement homes, nursing homes, sanitariums, hospitals, boarding houses, fraternity and sorority houses, and dormitories were not subject to the ordinance. The mentally retarded, as a group, were different from those who occupied other facilities permitted in the zoning area in question without a special permit, but such difference was "largely irrelevant unless the [proposed group home] would threaten the city's legitimate interests in a way that [the] permitted uses . . . would not."[389] The record did not reveal any rational basis for believing that the proposed group home would pose any special threat to the city's legitimate interests. The city council's insistence on the permit rested on several factors. First, the council was concerned with the negative attitude of the majority of property owners located within 200 feet of the proposed facility, as well as with the fears of elderly residents of the neighborhood. However, "mere negative attitudes, or fear, unsubstantiated by factors . . . properly cognizable in a zoning proceeding, [we]re not permissible bases for treating a home for the mentally retarded differently from apartment houses, multiple dwellings, and the like. . . . 'Private biases may be outside the reach of the law, but the law cannot, directly or indirectly, give them effect.'"[390] Second, the council was concerned that the facility was across the street from a junior high school, and it feared that the students might harass the occupants of the home. But the school itself was attended by about 30 mentally retarded students, and "denying a permit based on such vague, undifferentiated fears [wa]s again permitting some portion of the community to validate what would otherwise be an equal protection violation."[391] Moreover, the council had doubts about the legal responsibility for actions that the mentally retarded might take. Nevertheless, since there was no concern about legal responsibility with respect to other uses that would be permitted in the area, such as boarding and fraternity houses, it was difficult to believe that the groups of 388 Id. at 445–46. "[T]he result of Cleburne is that States are not required by the Fourteenth Amendment to make special accommodations for the disabled so long as their actions towards such individuals are rational. They could quite hard-headedly hold to job qualification requirements which do not make allowance for the disabled. If special accommodations for the disabled are to be required, they have to come from positive law, and not through the Equal Protection Clause." See Bd. of Trs. of Univ. of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 367–68 (2001).

---

389 Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 448 (1985).

390 Id. at 448, quoting Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 433 (1984).

391 Id. at 449.

mildly or moderately mentally retarded individuals who would live there "would present any different or special hazard."[392] Fourth, the council was concerned with the size of the home and the number of people that would occupy it. But there would be no restrictions on the number of people who could occupy the home as a boarding house, nursing home, family dwelling, fraternity house, or dormitory. "The question [wa]s whether it [wa]s rational to treat the mentally retarded differently. It [wa]s true that they suffer[ed] disability not shared by others, but why this difference warrant[ed] a density regulation that others [did not have to] observe [wa]s not at all apparent. [The] record of the case d[id] not clarify how, in this connection, the characteristics of the intended occupants of the proposed home rationally justif[ied] denying to those occupants what would be permitted to groups occupying the same site for different purposes."[393] The Court concluded that the insubstantiality of each of the city's asserted justifications for the ordinance at issue suggested that the ordinance in fact rested on "an irrational prejudice against the mentally retarded, including those who would occupy the [proposed] facility and who would live under the closely supervised and highly regulated conditions expressly provided for by state and federal law."[394]

H. CLASSIFICATIONS BASED ON SEXUAL ORIENTATION

[K128] Romer struck down a Colorado constitutional amendment prohibiting special protection for homosexuals. The state's principal argument in defense of the amendment was that it put gays and lesbians in the same position as all other persons. So, the state said, the measure merely denied homosexuals special rights. However, the Court found that this reading of the amendment's language was implausible. The extent of the change in legal status effected by the amendment was evident from the authoritative construction of Colorado's supreme court—which established that the amendment's immediate effect was to repeal all existing statutes, regulations, ordinances, and policies of state and local entities barring discrimination based on sexual orientation, and that its ultimate effect was to prohibit any governmental entity from adopting similar, or more protective, measures in the future absent state constitutional amendment—and from a review of the terms, structure, and operation of the ordinances that would be repealed and prohibited by the amendment. "In any event, even if . . . homosexuals could find some safe harbor in laws of general application, . . . the amendment impose[d] a special disability upon those persons alone. Homosexuals [we]re forbidden the safeguards that others enjoy[ed] or [might] seek without constraint. They [could] obtain specific protection against discrimination only by enlisting the citizenry of Colorado to amend the state constitution or perhaps, on the state's view, by trying to pass helpful laws of general applicability. This [wa]s so no matter how local or discrete the harm, no matter how public and widespread the injury. [There was] nothing special in the protections [the amendment] withh[eld]. These [we]re protections taken for granted by most people either because they already ha[d] them or d[id] not need them; these [we]re protections against exclusion from an almost limitless number of transactions and endeavors that constitute ordinary civic life in a free society."[395] Further, the challenged classification could not pass constitutional master. If a law neither bur-

[392] Id. at 449.
[393] Id. at 449–50.
[394] Id. at 450.
[395] Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 631 (1996).

dens a fundamental right nor targets a suspect class, the legislative classification is upheld so long as it bears a rational relation to some independent and legitimate end. The amendment failed even this conventional inquiry. "First, the amendment ha[d] the peculiar property of imposing a broad and undifferentiated disability on a single named group."[396] "A law declaring that in general it shall be more difficult for one group of citizens than for all others to seek aid from the government is itself a denial of equal protection of the laws in the most literal sense."[397] Second, the amendment "raise[d] the inevitable inference that the disadvantage imposed [wa]s born of animosity toward the class of persons affected."[398] The primary rationale the state offered for the amendment was respect for other citizens' freedom of association and, in particular, the liberties of landlords or employers who had personal or religious objections to homosexuality. Colorado also cited its interest in conserving resources to fight discrimination against other groups. Nevertheless, "the breadth of the [a]mendment [wa]s so far removed from these particular justifications that [the Court found] it impossible to credit them. [The Court could not] say that [the amendment] [wa]s directed to any identifiable legitimate purpose or discrete objective. It [wa]s a status-based enactment divorced from any factual context from which [it] could be discerned a relationship to legitimate state interests; it [wa]s a classification of persons undertaken for its own sake, something the Equal Protection Clause does not permit."[399]

I. ELECTORAL FRANCHISE

1. The Right to Vote

a. In General—Standard of Review

[K129] The Constitution "does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one,"[400] and "the right to vote, per se, is not a constitutionally protected right."[401] However, when a state has provided that its representatives be elected, "a citizen has a constitutionally protected right to participate in elections on an equal basis with other citizens in the jurisdiction."[402] Likewise, although "[t]he individual citizen has no federal constitutional

---

396 Id. at 632.

397 Id. at 633.

398 Id. at 634.

399 Id. at 635.

400 Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party, 457 U.S. 1, 9 (1982), quoting Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 178 (1875).

401 Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party, 457 U.S. 1, 9 (1982), quoting San Antonio Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 35, n.78 (1973).

402 Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 336 (1972). The Court has rejected claims that the Constitution compels a fixed method of choosing state or local officers or representatives. In Sailors v. Board of Education, 387 U.S. 105, 107–11 (1967), the Court found no constitutional reason why non-legislative state or local officials may not be chosen otherwise than by elections. Consequently, the Court upheld a statute authorizing appointment, rather than election, of the members of a county school board, the functions of which were essentially administrative. At the same time, it expressly left open the question "whether a State may constitute a local legislative body through the appointive, rather than the elective, process." Id. at 109–10. In Fortson v. Morris, 385 U.S. 231, 234 (1966), the Court said that "[t]here is no provision of the United States Constitution or any of its amendments which either expressly or impliedly dictates the right to vote for electors for the President of the United States unless and until the state legislature chooses a statewide election as the means to implement its power to appoint members of the Electoral College" (U.S. Constitution, Article II, Section 1), "[w]hen the state legislature vests the right to vote for President in its people, the right to vote as the legislature has prescribed is fundamental," and the equal protection guarantee is applicable.[403]

[K130] "With respect to suffrage, [the Court has] explained the need for close scrutiny as arising from the significance of the franchise as the guardian of all other rights."[404] Hill v. Stone held that, "as long as the election in question is not one of special interest, any classification restricting the franchise on grounds other than residence, age, and citizenship cannot stand unless the district or State can demonstrate that the classification serves a compelling state interest."[405] In Burdick, the Court made clear that when voting rights "are subjected to 'severe' restrictions, the regulation must be 'narrowly drawn to advance a state interest of compelling importance.' . . . But when a state election law provision imposes only 'reasonable, nondiscriminatory restrictions' upon the First and Fourteenth Amendment rights of voters, 'the State's important regulatory interests are generally sufficient to justify' the restrictions."[406]

[K131] "The right to vote is protected in more than the initial allocation of the franchise. Equal protection applies as well to the manner of its exercise. Having once granted the right to vote on equal terms, the State may not, by later arbitrary and disparate treatment, value one person's vote over that of another."[407]

b. Voter Residency and Registration Requirements [408]

[K132] The Court has "recognized that a government unit may legitimately restrict the right to participate in its political processes to those who reside within its borders. . . . Bona fide residence alone, however, does not automatically confer the right to vote on all matters, for at least in the context of special interest elections the State may constitutionally disfranchise residents who lack the required special interest in the subject matter of the election."[409] method a State must use to select its Governor." The Court thus sustained a Georgia constitutional provision empowering the state legislature to elect a governor from the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes cast in the general election, in the event neither received a majority.

---

403 Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 104 (2000) (per curiam).

404 See Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 217, n.15 (1982), citing Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 667 (1966); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 562 (1964); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 370 (1886).

405 Hill v. Stone, 421 U.S. 289, 297 (1975).

406 Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428, 434 (1992). Applying this test, the Burdick Court sustained as reasonable Hawaii's prohibition on write-in voting, holding that it imposed "only a limited burden" upon the constitutional rights of voters. Id. at 439.

407 Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 104–05 (2000) (per curiam).

408 In Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970), the Court upheld an Act of Congress that forbade states from disqualifying voters in presidential elections for failure to meet state residency requirements.

409 Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa, 439 U.S. 60, 68–69 (1978).

[K133] Carrington involved a provision of the Texas Constitution that prohibited any member of the armed forces, who entered the service as a resident of another state and then moved his home to Texas during the course of his military duty, from ever satisfying the residence requirement for voting in Texas elections, so long as he remained a member of the armed forces. First, the state argued that it had a legitimate interest in immunizing its elections from the concentrated balloting of military personnel, whose collective voice might overwhelm a small local civilian community. In rejecting this contention, the Court stressed that "'[f]encing out' from the franchise a sector of the population because of the way they may vote is constitutionally impermissible. . . . [If servicemen were] in fact residents, with the intention of making Texas their home indefinitely, they, as all other qualified residents, ha[d] a right to an equal opportunity for political representation."[410] Secondly, the state said it had a valid interest in protecting the franchise from infiltration by transients, and it could reasonably assume that those servicemen who fell within the constitutional exclusion would be within the state for only a short period of time. The Court rejected this "conclusive presumption" approach, pointing out that Texas could not conclusively presume that members of a particular profession were transient inhabitants but should instead apply "more precise tests to determine the bona fides of an individual claiming to have actually made his home in the State long enough to vote," just as it applied those tests to all others seeking to vote in the state. Thus, Texas could not casually deprive a class of individuals of the vote because of some remote administrative benefit to the state.[411]

[K134] In Evans v. Cornman, the permanent board of registry of Montgomery County, Maryland, ruled that persons living on the grounds of the National Institutes of Health (NIH), a federal enclave located within the geographical boundaries of the state, did not meet the residency requirement of the Maryland Constitution. Accordingly, NIH residents were denied the right to vote in Maryland elections. The Court rejected the notion that persons living on NIH grounds were not residents of Maryland: "Appellees clearly live within the geographical boundaries of the State of Maryland, and they are treated as state residents in the census and in determining congressional apportionment. They are not residents of Maryland only if the NIH grounds ceased to be a part of Maryland when the enclave was created. However, that 'fiction of a state within a state' was specifically rejected by this Court in Howard v. Commissioners of Louisville, 344 U.S. 624, 627 (1953)."[412] Thus, because inhabitants of the NIH enclave were residents of Maryland and were "just as interested in and connected with electoral decisions as they were prior to [the time that the area had come] under federal jurisdiction, and as their neighbors who live[d] off the enclave," the state could not deny them the equal right to vote in Maryland elections.[413]

[K135] In relation to durational residency requirements for exercising the right to vote, the Court also has invoked the freedom to travel. Dunn v. Blumstein examined the constitutionality of a Tennessee law, which provided that registration books closed 30 days before an election but required residence in the state for one year and in the county for three months as prerequisites for registration to vote. After noting that a durational residence requirement for voting "penalize[s] . . . only those persons who 410 Carrington v. Rash, 380 U.S. 89, 94 (1965).

---

411 Id. at 95–96.

412 Evans v. Cornman, 398 U.S. 419, 421–22 (1970).

413 Id. at 426.

have exercised their constitutional right of interstate migration . . . [and] may withstand constitutional scrutiny only upon a clear showing that the burden imposed is necessary to protect a compelling and substantial governmental interest,"[414] the Court struck down the statute, because the state of Tennessee failed to meet this heavy burden. Tennessee claimed that its durational residence requirements were necessary to serve two basic purposes. First, it insured purity of ballot, protection against fraud through "dual voting" and "colonization" (voting by non-residents). The Court acknowledged that the prevention of such fraud was surely a legitimate and compelling government goal; yet it found impossible to view durational residence requirements as necessary to achieve that state interest. On the one hand, the measure at issue was overbroad, since it "bar[red] newly arrived residents from the franchise along with nonresidents." On the other hand, "as long as the State relie[d] on the oath-swearing system to establish qualifications, a durational residence requirement add[ed] nothing to a simple residence requirement in the effort to stop fraud," for "[t]he nonresident intent on committing election fraud [would] as quickly and effectively swear that he ha[d] been a resident for the requisite period of time as he would swear that he [wa]s simply a resident."[415] Besides, "[t]o prevent dual voting, state voting officials simply ha[d] to cross-check lists of new registrants with their former jurisdictions. . . . Objective information tendered as relevant to the question of bona fide residence under Tennessee law—places of dwelling, occupation, car registration, driver's license, property owned, etc.—[wa]s easy to double-check, especially in light of modern communications."[416] And Tennessee "ha[d] at its disposal a variety of criminal laws more than adequate to detect and deter whatever fraud [might] be feared." Subsequently, the Court concluded that "the waiting period [wa]s not the least restrictive means necessary for preventing fraud."[417] The second argument advanced by the state referred to the interest to knowledgeable voters: the restriction aimed to afford some surety that the voter had, in fact, become a member of the community, and that, as such, he had a common interest in all matters pertaining to its government and was, therefore, more likely to exercise his right more intelligently. The Court rejected this position as well. "[W]ithout deciding as a general matter the extent to which a State can bar less knowledgeable or intelligent citizens from the franchise," it concluded that "durational residence requirements cannot be justified on this basis."[418] "The classifications created by durational residence requirements obviously permit any long-time resident to vote regardless of his knowledge of the issues—and obviously many long-time residents do not have any. On the other hand, the classifications bar from the franchise many other, admittedly new, residents who have become at least minimally, and often fully, informed about the issues. . . . Given modern communications, and given the clear indication that campaign spending and voter education occur largely during the month before an election, the State [could not] seriously maintain that it [wa]s 'necessary' to reside for a year in the State and three months in the county in order to be knowledgeable about congressional, state, or even purely local elections."[419]

---

414 Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 341 (1972).

415 Id. at 345–46.

416 Id. at 348.

417 Id. at 353.

418 Id. at 356–57.

419 Id. at 358.

[K136] "The judgment in Dunn v. Blumstein invalidated the Tennessee one-year residence requirement for voting, but it agreed that the state's interest was obviously sufficient to limit voting to residents, to require registration for voting, and to close the registration books at some point prior to the election, a deadline that every resident must meet if he is to cast his vote at the polls."[420] Subsequently, district courts differed over the validity of a requirement that voters be registered for 50 days prior to election. The Court, although divided, sustained the provisions.[421] In so doing, the Court noted that, although the 50-day registration period "approache[d] the outer constitutional limits in this area,"[422] there was a "recent and amply justifiable legislative judgment that 50 days . . . [wa]s necessary to promote the State's important interest in accurate voter lists."[423]

[K137] No decision of the Court has extended the right to vote to individuals residing beyond the geographic confines of the governmental entity concerned, be it the state or its political subdivisions. In Holt Civic Club, residents of Holt, a small unincorporated community outside the corporate limits of the City of Tuscaloosa but within three miles thereof challenged the constitutionality of "police jurisdiction" statutes that extended municipal police, sanitary, and business licensing powers over those residing within three miles of certain corporate boundaries without permitting such residents to vote in municipal elections. The Court held that the statutes did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. First, the Court emphasized that "a government unit may legitimately restrict the right to participate in its political processes to those who reside within its borders." Thus, stripped of its voting rights attire, the equal protection issue presented by the residents of Holt became whether the state statutes giving extraterritorial force to certain municipal ordinances and powers bore some rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose. The Court found that they did. The statutory scheme at issue was "a rational legislative response to the problems faced by the State's burgeoning cities," and the legislature had a legitimate interest in ensuring that residents of areas adjoining city borders be provided "basic municipal services, such as police, fire, and health protection." Nor was it unreasonable for the legislature to require police jurisdiction residents to contribute through license fees to the expense of such services.[424]

c. Poll Taxes—Property Qualifications

[K138] In the seminal case Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, the Court invalidated, under the Equal Protection Clause, a $1.50 poll tax imposed as a pre-condition to voting. Subjecting the Virginia poll tax to close scrutiny, the Court determined that "the right to vote is too precious, too fundamental to be so burdened or conditioned."[425]

[K139] In a variety of contexts, the Court has invalidated discriminatory election schemes limiting the franchise, in whole or in part, to property owners. The appellant

---

420 See Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 730–31 (1974).

421 Marston v. Lewis, 410 U.S. 679 (1973) (per curiam); Burns v. Fortson, 410 U.S. 686 (1973) (per curiam).

422 Burns v. Forston, 410 U.S. 686, 687 (1973).

423 Marston v. Lewis, 410 U.S. 679, 681 (1973); Burns v. Forston, 410 U.S. 686, 687 (1973).

424 Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa, 439 U.S. 60, 68–69, 74–75 (1978).

425 Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 670 (1966).

in Kramer challenged a New York statute that limited eligibility to vote in local school board elections to persons who owned or leased taxable real property in the school district, or who had children enrolled in the public schools. The Court expressed no opinion whether a state might, in some circumstances, limit the franchise to those "primarily interested" in the election, but it held that the New York statute had impermissibly excluded many persons with "a distinct and direct interest in" the decisions of the school board, while at the same time including others who had, "at best, a remote and indirect interest in school affairs."[426] "The fact that the school district was supported by a property tax did not mean that only those subject to direct assessment felt the effects of the tax burden, and the inclusion of parents would not exhaust the class of persons interested in the conduct of local school affairs."[427]

[K140] Cipriano invalidated a Louisiana statute limiting the franchise in local revenue bond elections to the "property taxpayers" of the district. "As in Kramer, the city had failed to prove that, under its classification all those excluded from voting were, in fact, substantially less interested or affected than those permitted to vote. . . . The bonds in Cipriano were intended to finance extension and improvement of the city's utility system. [The Court] pointed out that the operation of a utility system affects property owners and nonproperty owners alike, and, since those not included among the eligible voters often use the utility services, they might well feel the effect of outstanding revenue bonds through the utility rates they would be required to pay."[428]

[K141] In Phoenix v. Kolodziejski, the Court ruled unconstitutional a similar restriction of the franchise to real property taxpayers in a general obligation bond issue. "The interests of property owners and nonproperty owners in a general obligation bond issue, [the Court] held, were not sufficiently disparate to justify excluding those owning no real property. The residents of the city, whether property owners or not, had a common interest in the facilities that the bond issue would make available, and they would all be substantially affected by the outcome of the election, both in terms of the benefits provided and the obligations incurred. Under the Phoenix bond arrangement, some of the debt service would be paid out of revenues other than property tax receipts, so nonproperty owners would be directly affected to some extent. [The Court] added, however, that even where the municipality looks only to property tax revenues for servicing general obligation bonds, the franchise cannot legitimately be restricted to real property owners: 'Property taxes may be paid initially by property owners, but a significant part of the ultimate burden of each year's tax on rental property will very likely be borne by the tenant, rather than the landlord, since . . . the landlord will treat the property tax as a business expense, and normally will be able to pass all or a large part of this cost on to the tenants in the form of higher rent.' In addition, [the Court] noted that property taxes on commercial property would normally be treated as a cost of doing business, and would 'be reflected in the prices of goods and services purchased by nonproperty owners and property owners alike.'"[429]

---

[426] Kramer v. Union Free Sch. Dist., 395 U.S. 621, 632 (1969).

[427] See Hill v. Stone, 421 U.S. 289, 295 (1975).

[428] See Hill v. Stone, 421 U.S. 289, 296 (1975), discussing Cipriano v. City of Houma, 395 U.S. 701, 704–05 (1969).

[429] See Hill v. Stone, 421 U.S. 289, 296–97 (1975), discussing and quoting Phoenix v. Kolodziejski, 399 U.S. 204, 210–11 (1970).

[K142] Similarly, Hill v. Stone found invalid statutory provisions tying voting eligibility to property ownership in elections to approve issuance of bonds to finance a city library. Relying on the Phoenix case, the Court noted that "[e]ven under a system in which the responsibility of retiring the bonded indebtedness falls directly on property taxpayers, all members of the community share in the cost in various ways." Moreover, the Court rejected the argument that the challenged qualification furthered the state interest in encouraging prospective voters to render their property and thereby helped enforce the state's tax laws. In so doing, the Court emphasized that "[t]he use of the franchise to compel compliance with other, independent state objectives is questionable in any context." And it seemed "particularly dubious there, since, under the State's construction of the rendering requirement, an individual [would] be given the right to vote if he render[ed] any property at all, no matter how trivial. . . . The rendering requirement thus seem[ed] unlikely to have any significant impact on the asserted state policy of encouraging each person to render all of his property."[430]

[K143] However, the Court has held that "the electorate of a special purpose unit of government, may be apportioned to give greater influence to the constituent groups found to be most affected by the governmental unit's functions."[431] Salyer approved limiting the vote to landowners in electing the board of directors of a water storage district. The decision resulted from the Court's examination of the nature of the services provided by the water district in that case, and its conclusion that, "by reason of its special limited purpose and of the disproportionate effect of its activities on landowners as a group," the state could constitutionally disfranchise residents of the district who lacked the required special interest in the subject matter of the election.[432]

d. Literacy Tests

[K144] A state may constitutionally impose upon its citizens voting requirements reasonably "designed to promote intelligent use of the ballot."[433] Although literacy and intelligence are not synonymous, "[t]he ability to read and write . . . has some relation to standards designed to promote intelligent use of the ballot. . . . [In a] society where newspapers, periodicals, books, and other printed matter canvass and debate campaign issues, a State [may] conclude that only those who are literate should exercise the franchise."[434] Under these considerations, Lassiter held that the use of a literacy test that is fair on its face and is not employed in a discriminatory fashion violates neither the Fourteenth nor the Fifteenth Amendment.[435]

[K145] In Louisiana v. United States, a state constitution required every voter who applied to register to "be able to understand" as well as "give a reasonable interpreta-

---

[430] Hill v. Stone, 421 U.S. 289, 299–300 (1975).

[431] See Lockport v. Citizens for Cmty. Action, 430 U.S. 259, 266 (1977), citing Salyer Land Co. v. Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage Dist., 410 U.S. 719 (1973).

[432] Salyer Land Co. v. Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage Dist., 410 U.S. 719, 728 (1973). See, in extenso, para. K160. See also Ball v. James, 451 U.S. 355 (1981) (para. K160, n.491).

[433] Lassiter v. Northampton County Bd. of Elections, 360 U.S. 45, 51 (1959).

[434] Id. at 51–52.

[435] Id. at 53. There, the Court upheld on its face a state statute requiring that the prospective voter "be able to read and write any section of the Constitution of North Carolina in the English language."

tion" of any section of the state or federal Constitution "when read to him by the registrar." The test gave voting registrars "a virtually uncontrolled discretion as to who should vote and who should not" and had been used to deter blacks from voting. Accordingly, the Court struck it down as a violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.[436]

e. The Fifteenth Amendment

[K146] The purpose and command of the Fifteenth Amendment, enacted in the wake of the Civil War, are set forth in language both explicit and comprehensive. The national government and the states may not violate a fundamental principle: they may not deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race, color, and previous condition of servitude. The Amendment applies to "any election in which public issues are decided or public officials selected."[437]

[K147] The course of Fifteenth Amendment litigation in the Court demonstrates the variety and persistence of techniques designed to deprive blacks of the right to vote. A "grandfather clause" was invalidated in Guinn.[438] Procedural hurdles were struck down in Lane v. Wilson.[439] The white primary was outlawed in Smith v. Allwright, and Terry v. Adams.[440] Racially discriminatory registration challenges were nullified in United States v. Thomas.[441] Racial gerrymandering was forbidden by Gomillion.[442] Finally, discriminatory application of voting tests was condemned in Louisiana v. United States.[443]

---

[436] Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145, 150 (1965). The Court has upheld a suspension of literacy tests and similar voting requirements under Congress' power to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, as a measure to combat racial discrimination in voting, despite the facial constitutionality of the tests under Lassiter. See S. Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966); Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970).

[437] Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 468 (1953).

[438] Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347 (1915). There, the Court invalidated a statute that imposed a literacy requirement on voters but contained a "grandfather clause" applicable to individuals and their lineal descendants entitled to vote "on [or prior to] January 1, 1866." The determinative consideration for the Court was that the law, though ostensibly race-neutral, on its face "embod[ied] no exercise of judgment and rest[ed] upon no discernible reason" other than to circumvent the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment. Id. at 363.

[439] Lane v. Wilson, 307 U.S. 268 (1939). In that case, Oklahoma statutes made registration prerequisite to voting, and provided generally that all citizens qualified to vote in 1916 who failed to register between April 30 and May 11, 1916, should be perpetually disfranchised, excepting those who had voted in 1914. The effect was that white people who were on the lists in 1914 in virtue of the provision of the Oklahoma Constitution called the "grandfather clause" which the Court adjudged unconstitutional in Guinn were entitled to vote; whereas colored people kept from registering and voting by that clause would remain forever disfranchised unless they applied for registration during the limited period of not more than 12 days.

[440] Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944); Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953). See, in extenso, paras. B15–B16.

[441] United States v. Thomas, 362 U.S. 58 (1960) (per curiam).

[442] Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960) ("uncouth 28-sided" municipal boundary line, allegedly drawn to exclude blacks). In subsequent cases involving racial gerrymandering, the Court relied on the Fourteenth Amendment.

[443] Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145 (1965).

[K148] "Ancestry can be a proxy for race."[444] Rice v. Cayetano addressed a Hawaiian statutory scheme that used ancestry to restrict the right to vote in the election for the governing authority of a state agency that administered programs designed for the benefit of two sub-classes of Hawaiian citizenry, "Hawaiians" and "native Hawaiians." State law defined "native Hawaiians" as descendants of not less than one-half part of the races inhabiting the Islands before 1778, and "Hawaiians"—a larger class that included "native Hawaiians"—as descendants of the peoples inhabiting the Hawaiian Islands in 1778. The trustees composing the governing authority of the agency were chosen in a statewide election in which only "Hawaiians" could vote. The Court noted that the very object of the foregoing statutory definition was "to treat the early Hawaiians as a distinct people, commanding their own recognition and respect." The history of the state's definition also demonstrated that the state had "used ancestry as a racial definition and for a racial purpose."[445] In addition, the Court rejected the state's argument that the restriction was race neutral, since it differentiated even among Polynesian people based on the date of an ancestor's residence in Hawaii, pointing out that "[s]imply because a class defined by ancestry does not include all members of the race does not suffice to make the classification race neutral."[446] Thus, the state's electoral restriction enacted a race-based voting qualification. Further, the Court rejected the defenses advanced by the state in support of its voting law. First, the Court held that, even if Congress had the authority, delegated to the state, to treat Hawaiians or native Hawaiians as tribes, Congress could not authorize a state to create a voting scheme of the sort created there.[447] Moreover, the Court rejected Hawaii's argument that the voting restriction did no more than ensure an alignment of interests between the fiduciaries and the beneficiaries of a trust. In so doing, the Court stated: "All citizens, regardless of race, have an interest in selecting officials who make policies on their behalf, even if those policies will affect some groups more than others. Under the Fifteenth Amendment, voters are treated not as members of a distinct race, but as members of the whole citizenry. Hawaii may not assume, based on race, that petitioner or any other of its citizens will not cast a principled vote. To accept the position advanced by the State would give rise to the same indignities, and the same resulting tensions and animosities, the Amendment was designed to eliminate."[448] In light of these considerations, the Court struck down the restriction as violative of the Fifteenth Amendment.

f. Absentee Voting

[K149] In McDonald, a state statute provided for absentee voting by persons "medically incapacitated" and for pre-trial detainees who were incarcerated outside their county of residence. Appellants were a class of pre-trial detainees in Cook County, Illinois, already registered to vote, who sought to vote only by absentee ballot. Nevertheless, there was "nothing in the record to show that appellants [we]re, in fact, absolutely prohibited from voting by the State," since there was the possibility that the state might furnish some other alternative means of voting. Indeed, the record was "barren of any 444 Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 514 (2000).

445 Id. at 515.
446 Id. at 516.
447 Id. at 519.
448 Id. at 523–24.

indication that the state might not, for instance, possibly furnish the jails with special polling booths or facilities on election day, or provide guarded transportation to the polls themselves for certain inmates, or entertain motions for temporary reductions in bail to allow some inmates to get to the polls on their own."[449] In light of these considerations, the Court concluded that the Illinois absentee ballot provisions were to be tested by the traditional standards for evaluating equal protection claims, and that, under those standards, the provisions could not be said to be arbitrary or unreasonable. Since there was nothing to show that a judicially incapacitated, pre-trial detainee was absolutely prohibited from exercising the franchise, it seemed "quite reasonable for Illinois' Legislature to treat differently the physically handicapped who [should,] after all, present affidavits from their physicians attesting to an absolute inability to appear personally at the polls in order to qualify for an absentee ballot." Similarly, "the different treatment accorded unsentenced inmates incarcerated within and those incarcerated without their resident counties [might] reflect a legislative determination that, without the protection of the voting booth, local officials might be too tempted to try to influence the local vote of in-county inmates. Such a temptation, with its attendant risks to prison discipline would, of course, be much less urgent with prisoners incarcerated out of state or outside their resident counties."[450]

[K150] Nevertheless, "permitting absentee voting by some classes of voters and denying the privilege to other classes of otherwise qualified voters in similar circumstances, without affording a comparable alternative means to vote, is an arbitrary discrimination violative of the Equal Protection Clause."[451] In O'Brien v. Skinner, New York awarded absentee registration privileges to eligible citizens who were unable to appear personally because of "illness or physical disability" and to citizens required to be outside their counties of residence on normal registration days because of their "duties, occupation or business." In addition, New York extended absentee voting privileges to those voters unable to get to the polls because of illness or physical disability, to those who were inmates of veterans' bureau hospitals, and to those who were absent from their home county on election day either because of "duties, occupation or business" or vacation. Indeed, those held in jail awaiting trial in a county other than their residence were also permitted to register by mail and vote by absentee ballot. Yet, persons confined for the same reason in the county of their residence were completely denied the ballot. The Court found that the New York statutes denied the latter category of qualified voters the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.[452]

g. Disenfranchisement of Convicted Felons

[K151] In Richardson v. Ramirez, the Court held that a state may disenfranchise "convicted felons who have completed their sentences and paroles." The Court found support in Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which exempts from the sanction of reduced congressional representation resulting from the denial of citizens' right to vote the denial of such right for "participation in rebellion, or other crime."[453]

---

449 McDonald v. Bd. of Election Comm'rs, 394 U.S. 802, 808, nn.6–7 (1969).

450 Id. at 809–10.

451 Am. Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. 767, 795 (1974).

452 O'Brien v. Skinner, 414 U.S. 524, 530–31 (1974).

453 Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24, 54–56 (1974).

2. Candidacy Qualifications[454]

[K152] Noting that "the rights of voters and the rights of candidates do not lend themselves to neat separation,"[455] the Court has required states to provide substantial justification for any requirement that prevents a class of citizens from gaining ballot access. The Court has recognized that "the State's interest in keeping its ballots within manageable, understandable limits is" of fundamental importance.[456] "A procedure inviting or permitting every citizen to present himself to the voters on the ballot without some means of measuring the seriousness of the candidate's desire and motivation would make rational voter choices more difficult, because of the size of the ballot, and hence would tend to impede the electoral process."[457] "Filing fees, however large, do not, in and of themselves, test the genuineness of a candidacy or the extent of the voter support of an aspirant for public office. A large filing fee may serve the legitimate function of keeping ballots manageable but, standing alone, it is not a certain test of whether the candidacy is serious or spurious. A wealthy candidate with not the remotest chance of election may secure a place on the ballot by writing a check. Merchants and other entrepreneurs have been known to run for public office simply to make their names known to the public. [Moreover,] prohibitive filing fees . . . can effectively exclude serious candidates. Conversely, if the filing fee is more moderate, . . . impecunious but serious candidates may be prevented from running. Even in this day of high-budget political campaigns, . . . direct contact with thousands of voters by 'walking tours' [may be] a route to success [for a candidate.]"[458] Under such considerations, the Court has held unconstitutional state laws requiring candidates to pay prohibitively large filing fees as a condition to having their names placed on primary election ballots[459] or requiring the payment of even moderate fees by indigent candidates.[460]

---

454 See also paras. I468 et seq., I482. The power granted by the Constitution to each House of Congress to judge the "Qualifications of its own Members" (art. I, § 5, cl. 1) does not include the power to alter or add to the qualifications set forth in the Constitution's text. So too, the federal Constitution prohibits states from imposing congressional qualifications additional to those specifically enumerated in its text. See United States Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995).

455 Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 143 (1972).

456 See Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 715 (1974), citing Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 143–44 (1972).

457 Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 715 (1974).

458 Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 717 (1974).

459 Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 141–47 (1972) (fees as high as $8,900). The Court also found that the filing fees required by the challenged statute were not necessary to provide a means for financing state-mandated party primaries, noting, inter alia, that "it seems appropriate that a primary system designed to give the voters some influence at the nominating stage should spread the cost among all of the voters in an attempt to distribute the influence without regard to wealth." Id. at 147–48.

460 Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 715–18 (1974) (filing fee of $701). In so holding, the Court noted that "there are obvious means of testing the 'seriousness' of a candidacy which do not measure the probability of attracting significant voter support solely by the neutral fact of payment of a filing fee. States may, for example, impose on minor political parties the precondition of demonstrating the existence of some reasonable quantum of voter support by requiring such parties to file petitions for a place on the ballot signed by a percentage of those who voted in a prior election. . . . Similarly, a candidate who establishes that he cannot pay the filing fee required for a place on the primary ballot may be required to demonstrate the 'seri-

[K153] In Turner v. Fouche, the Court applied the Equal Protection Clause to a requirement that members of a local school board own real property, and it held the requirement unconstitutional, because it was not rationally related to any legitimate state interest. As the Court noted, "[i]t cannot be seriously urged that a citizen in all other respects qualified to sit on a school board must also own real property if he is to participate responsibly in educational decisions, without regard to whether he is a parent with children in the local schools, a lessee who effectively pays the property taxes of his lessor as part of his rent, or a state and federal taxpayer contributing to the . . . annual school budget derived from sources other than the board of education's own levy on real property."[461] "Nor does the lack of ownership of realty establish a lack of attachment to the community and its educational values. However reasonable the assumption that those who own realty do pose such an attachment, [a state] may not rationally presume that that quality is necessarily wanting in all citizens of the county whose estates are less than" real property.[462]

[K154] In Moore v. Ogilvie, the Court struck down, on equal protection grounds, Illinois' requirement that the nominating petition of a candidate for statewide office include the signatures of at least 200 qualified voters from at least 50 counties. The statute applied "a rigid, arbitrary formula to sparsely settled counties and populous counties alike." Under this Illinois law, "the electorate in 49 of the counties which contain[ed] 93.4 percent of the registered voters [could] not form a new political party and place its candidates on the ballot. Yet 25,000 of the remaining 6.6 percent of registered voters properly distributed among the 53 remaining counties [might] form a new party to elect candidates to office. Th[e] law thus discriminate[d] against the residents of the populous counties of the State in favor of rural sections. It, therefore, lack[ed] the equality to which the exercise of political rights is entitled under the Fourteenth Amendment."[463]

3. The "One-Person, One-Vote" Principle—Apportionment

a. Congressional Elections

[K155] Wesberry held that the command of Article I, Section 2, of the Constitution that Representatives be chosen "by the People of the several States" means that, "as nearly as is practicable, one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as ousness' of his candidacy by persuading a substantial number of voters to sign a petition in his behalf." Id. at 718–19.

---

461 Turner v. Fouche, 396 U.S. 346, 363–64 (1970).

462 Id. at 364. Subsequently, the Court applied the holding in Turner to strike down a requirement of local property ownership for membership on a local airport commission. See Chappelle v. Greater Baton Rouge Airport Dist., 431 U.S. 159 (1977) (per curiam).

In Quinn v. Millsap, 491 U.S. 95, 107–09 (1989), the Court held that it is a form of invidious discrimination to require land ownership of all appointees to a body authorized to propose reorganization of local government. The Court noted, inter alia, that the mere fact that the board considered land use issues could not suffice to sustain a land ownership requirement in that case, since "the scope of the board's mandate [wa]s far more encompassing: it ha[d] the power to draft and submit a plan to reorganize the entire governmental structure of St. Louis city and county. The work of the board thus affect[ed] all citizens of the city and county, regardless of land ownership." Id. at 109.

463 Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814, 818–19 (1969).

another's."[464] As the Court explained further in Kirkpatrick, the "as nearly as practicable" standard "requires that the State make a good faith effort to achieve precise mathematical equality. . . . Unless population variances among congressional districts are shown to have resulted despite such effort, the State must justify each variance, no matter how small."[465] Article I, Section 2, therefore, "permits only the limited population variances which are unavoidable despite a good faith effort to achieve absolute equality, or for which justification is shown."[466] "Thus, two basic questions shape litigation over population deviations in state legislation apportioning congressional districts. First, the court must consider whether the population differences among districts could have been reduced or eliminated altogether by a good faith effort to draw districts of equal population. Parties challenging apportionment legislation must bear the burden of proof on this issue, and if they fail to show that the differences could have been avoided, the apportionment scheme must be upheld. If, however, the plaintiffs can establish that the population differences were not the result of a good faith effort to achieve equality, the State must bear the burden of proving that each significant variance between districts was necessary to achieve some legitimate goal."[467] "Any number of consistently applied legislative policies might justify some variance, including, for instance, making districts compact, respecting municipal boundaries, preserving the cores of prior districts, and avoiding contests between incumbent Representatives. As long as the criteria are nondiscriminatory, . . . these are all legitimate objectives that, on a proper showing, could justify minor population deviations. . . . The State must, however, show with some specificity that a particular objective required the specific deviations in its plan, rather than simply relying on general assertions. The showing required to justify population deviations is flexible, depending on the size of the deviations, the importance of the State's interests, the consistency with which the plan as a whole reflects those interests, and the availability of alternatives that might substantially vindicate those interests yet approximate population equality more closely."[468]

---

[464] Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1964). Because of this requirement, the Court struck down a Georgia statute that allowed glaring discrepancies among the populations in that state's congressional districts.

[465] Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, 394 U.S. 526, 530–31 (1969).

[466] Id. at 531. The redistricting statute invalidated there contained total percentage deviations of 5.97 percent, which the state failed to justify. The Court held, inter alia, that (1) "to accept population variances, large or small, in order to create districts with specific [economic and social] interest orientations" is unconstitutional; (2) "[p]roblems created by partisan politics cannot justify an apportionment which does not otherwise pass constitutional muster;" (3) where population shifts can be predicted "with a high degree of accuracy," states may properly consider them and apply them, throughout the state, in a systematic manner. Id. at 533–35.

[467] Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 730–31 (1983).

[468] Id. at 740–41. The Court also noted that (1) "there are no de minimis population variations, which could practicably be avoided, that may be considered as meeting the standard of Art. I, § 2, without justification;" (2) the census count provides "the only reliable—albeit less than perfect—indication of the districts' 'real' relative population levels," and furnishes "the only basis for good faith attempts to achieve population equality." Id. at 734, 738.

In Wells v. Rockefeller, 394 U.S. 542 (1969), the Court held that an attempt to maintain existing county lines was insufficient justification for a 12.1-percent variance. In explanation, the Court stated that an attempt "to keep regions with distinct interests intact" was insufficient because to accept such a justification "would permit groups of districts with defined interest orientations to be overrepresented at the expense of districts with different interest orientations."

[K156] In Department of Commerce v. Montana, the state of Montana, several state officials, and Montana's members of Congress brought suit against the federal government, challenging as unconstitutional the method used to determine the number of representatives to which each state was entitled. The Court noted that the Wesberry line of cases all involved intra-state disparities in the population of voting districts that had resulted from a state's redistricting decisions, whereas Montana had challenged interstate disparities resulting from the actions of Congress. The Court "found this difference to be significant beyond the simple fact that Congress was due more deference than the States in this area. . . . While [the Kirkpatrick] standard could be applied easily to intrastate districting because there was no 'theoretical incompatibility entailed in minimizing both the absolute and the relative differences' in the sizes of particular voting districts, [the Court] observed that it was not so easily applied to interstate districting decisions where there was a direct trade-off between absolute and relative differences in size."[469] Finding that Montana demanded from the Court to choose between several measures of inequality—absolute difference in district size, absolute difference in share of a representative, relative difference in district size or share—in order to hold the Wesberry standard applicable to congressional apportionment decisions, the Court stated that "[n]either mathematical analysis nor constitutional interpretation provide[d] a conclusive answer" upon which to base that choice.[470] The Court further found that the Constitution itself, by guaranteeing a minimum of one representative for each state, made it virtually impossible in inter-state apportionment to achieve the standard imposed by Wesberry.[471] In conclusion, the Court emphasized that Congress' "good faith choice of a method of apportionment of Representatives among the several States 'according to their respective Numbers' commands far more deference than a state districting decision that is capable of being reviewed under a relatively rigid mathematical standard."[472]

Id. at 546. But in Abate v. Mundt, 403 U.S. 182 (1971), an apportionment for a county legislature having a maximum deviation from equality of 11.9 percent was upheld in the face of an equal protection challenge, in part because New York had a long history of maintaining the integrity of existing local government units within the county.

[469] See Wisconsin v. City of New York, 517 U.S. 1, 14 (1996), discussing Dep't of Commerce v. Montana, 503 U.S. 442, 461–62 (1992).

[470] Dep't of Commerce v. Montana, 503 U.S. 442, 463 (1992).

[471] Id. at 463.

[472] Id. at 464. The number of persons in each state is to be calculated by "actual Enumeration" conducted every ten years, "in such Manner as [Congress] shall by Law direct" (U.S. Const., art. I, § 2, cl. 3). "Because the Constitution provides that the number of Representatives apportioned to each State determines in part the allocation to each State of votes for the election of the President, the decennial census also affects the allocation of members of the electoral college." See Wisconsin v. City of New York, 517 U.S. 1, 5 (1996) (emphasis added). "The text of the Constitution vests Congress with virtually unlimited discretion in conducting the decennial 'actual Enumeration.' . . . Hence, so long as the conduct of the . . . census is consistent with the constitutional language and the constitutional goal of equal representation, . . . it is within the limits of the Constitution." See Wisconsin v. City of New York, 517 U.S. 1, 19–20 (1996). See also Franklin v. Massachusetts, 505 U.S. 788, 803–06 (1992) (holding that allocation of overseas federal employees to their home states is consistent with the constitutional language and goal of equal representation).

b. State Elections

[K157] "[R]epresentative government is, in essence, self-government through the medium of elected representatives of the people, and each and every citizen has an inalienable right to full and effective participation in the political processes of his State's legislative bodies. . . . Full and effective participation by all citizens in state government requires, therefore, that each citizen have an equally effective voice in the election of members of his state legislature."[473] "[A]pportionment schemes which give the same number of representatives to unequal numbers of constituents, . . . dilute the value of the votes in the larger districts."[474] In Reynolds v. Sims, the Court held that "the Equal Protection Clause requires that the seats in both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis,"[475] noting that "[d]iluting the weight of votes because of place of residence impairs basic constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment just as much as invidious discriminations based upon factors such as race, . . . or economic status."[476] This holding requires only "that a State make an honest and good faith effort to construct districts . . . as nearly of equal population as is practicable."[477]

---

[473] Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 565 (1964).

[474] Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 141 (1971).

[475] Id. at 568.

[476] Id. at 566.

[477] Id. at 577. Although total population figures were, in fact, the basis of comparison in Reynolds, the Court's opinion carefully left open the question what population was being referred to. At several points, the Court discussed substantial equivalence in terms of voter population or citizen population, making no distinction between the acceptability of such a test and a test based on total population. Thus, it spoke of "[t]he right of a citizen to equal representation, and to have his vote weighted equally with those of all other citizens." Id. at 576. The Court also said: "[I]t is a practical impossibility to arrange legislative districts so that each one has an identical number of residents, or citizens, or voters." Id. at 577. "[T]he overriding objective must be substantial equality of population among the various districts, so that the vote of any citizen is approximately equal in weight to that of any other citizen in the State." Id. at 579.

In Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 91 (1966), the Court held that "the Equal Protection Clause does not require the States to use total population figures derived from the federal census as the standard by which this substantial population equivalency is to be measured." Burns stressed that neither in Reynolds v. Sims nor in any other decision had the Court "suggested that the States are required to include aliens, transients, short-term or temporary residents, or persons denied the vote for conviction of crime in the apportionment base by which their legislators are distributed and against which compliance with the Equal Protection Clause is to be measured. The decision to include or exclude any such group involves choices about the nature of representation with which we have been shown no constitutionally founded reason to interfere. Unless a choice is one the Constitution forbids, . . . the resulting apportionment base offends no constitutional bar, and compliance with the rule established in Reynolds v. Sims is to be measured thereby. Use of a registered voter or actual voter basis presents an additional problem. Such a basis depends not only upon criteria such as govern state citizenship, but also upon the extent of political activity of those eligible to register and vote. Each is thus susceptible to improper influences by which those in political power might be able to perpetuate under-representation of groups constitutionally entitled to participate in the electoral process or perpetuate a 'ghost of prior malapportionment.' Moreover, 'fluctuations in the number of registered voters in a given election may be sudden and substantial, caused by such fortuitous factors as a peculiarly controversial election issue, a particularly popular candidate, or even weather conditions.' . . . Such effects must be particularly a matter of concern where registration figures [K158] "Fair and effective representation may be destroyed by gross population variations among districts, but it is apparent that such representation does not depend solely on mathematical equality among district populations. There are other relevant factors to be taken into account and other important interests that States may legitimately be mindful of. . . . An unrealistic overemphasis on raw population figures, a mere nose count in the districts, may submerge these other considerations and itself furnish a ready tool for ignoring factors that in day-to-day operation are important to an acceptable representation and apportionment arrangement."[478] Indeed, some deviations from population equality may be necessary to permit the states to pursue other legitimate objectives, such as "maintain[ing] the integrity of various political subdivisions . . . and provid[ing] for compact districts of contiguous territory."[479] In view of these considerations, the Court has held that "minor deviations from mathematical equality among state legislative districts are insufficient to make out a prima facie case of invidious discrimination under the Fourteenth Amendment so as to require justification by the State."[480] The Court's cases "have established, as a general matter, that an apportionment plan with a maximum population deviation under 10 percent falls within this category of minor deviations."[481] "A plan with larger disparities in population, however, creates a prima facie case of discrim-derived from a single election are made controlling for as long as 10 years." Id. at 92–93. In view of these considerations, the Court held that the Hawaii's registered voters basis satisfied the Equal Protection Clause "only because it was found to have produced a distribution of legislators not substantially different from that which would have resulted from the use of a permissible population basis." Id. at 93. Moreover, Hawaii's special population problems, including large concentrations of military and tourists in Oahu, suggested that state citizen population, rather than total population, was the appropriate basis for comparison. Id. at 94–95.

---

In the vote dilution context, Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), was a pathmarker. There, the city of Tuskegee redrew its boundaries to exclude black voters. This apportionment was unconstitutional not simply because it was motivated by race, but notably because it had a dilutive effect: it disenfranchised Tuskegee's black community: "The essential inevitable effect of this redefinition of Tuskegee's boundaries is to remove from the city all save only four or five of its 400 Negro voters while not removing a single white voter or resident. The result of the Act is to deprive the Negro petitioners discriminatorily of the benefits of residence in Tuskegee, including, inter alia, the right to vote in municipal elections." Id. at 341.

Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963) addressed the operation of a county unit system under which state officials were elected by a majority of counties voting as units instead of by a majority of individual voters. The result was that the number of votes of persons living in large counties was given no more weight in electing state officers than was given to a far fewer number of votes of persons residing in small counties. This discrimination against large county voters was held to deny them the equal protection of the laws. The Court noted the county unit system would have been defective, even if unit votes were allocated strictly in proportion to population. If a candidate received 60 percent of the votes cast in a particular county, he would receive that county's entire unit vote, the 40 percent cast for the other candidates being discarded. Id. at 381, n.12. "The defect, however, continued to be geographic discrimination. Votes for the losing candidates were discarded solely because of the county where the votes were cast. Indeed, votes for the winning candidate in a county were likewise devalued, because all marginal votes for him would be discarded and would have no impact on the state-wide total." See Gordon v. Lance, 403 U.S. 1, 5 (1971).

478 Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 748–49 (1973).

479 Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 578 (1964).

480 Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 745 (1973).

481 Brown v. Thomson, 462 U.S. 835, 842 (1983), citing Connor v. Finch, 431 U.S. 407, 418 (1977), and White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 764 (1973).

ination, and therefore must be justified by the State."[482] The ultimate inquiry is "whether the legislature's plan 'may reasonably be said to advance [a] rational state policy' and, if so, 'whether the population disparities among the districts that have resulted from the pursuit of this plan exceed constitutional limits.'"[483]

[K159] Avery v. Midland County held that the Reynolds "one-person, one-vote" rule is applicable to the election of officials of a county government, if the elected officials exercise "general governmental powers over the entire geographic area served by the body."[484] In Hadley, the Court extended Reynolds to the election of trustees of a community college district "because those trustees 'exercised general governmental powers' and 'perform[ed] important governmental functions' that had significant effect on all citizens residing within the district."[485] But, in that case, the Court stated: "It is, of course, possible that there might be some case in which a State elects certain functionaries whose duties are so far removed from normal governmental activities and so disproportionately affect different groups that a popular election in compliance with Reynolds . . . might not be required."[486]

[K160] The Court found such a case in Salyer. The Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage District involved there encompassed 193,000 acres, 85 percent of which were farmed by one or another of four corporations. Under California law, public water districts could acquire, store, conserve, and distribute water, and though the Tulare Lake Basin Water

---

[482] Brown v. Thomson, 462 U.S. 835, 842–43 (1983).

[483] Id. at 843, quoting Mahan v. Howell, 410 U.S. 315, 328 (1973). See also Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 161 (1993).

The issue in Brown v. Thomson was whether the state of Wyoming had violated the Equal Protection Clause by allocating one of the 64 seats in its House of Representatives to a county the population of which was considerably lower than the average population per state representative. A 1981 Wyoming statute reapportioned the House of Representatives and provided for 64 representatives. Based on the 1980 census placing Wyoming's population at 469,557, the ideal apportionment would have been 7,337 persons per representative. Niobrara County, the state's least populous county, had been given one representative, even though its population was only 2,924. The Court found that the case presented "an unusually strong example of an apportionment plan the population variations of which were entirely the result of the consistent and nondiscriminatory application of a legitimate state policy." Wyoming, since statehood, had followed a constitutional policy "of using counties as representative districts and ensuring that each county ha[d] one representative." Moreover, Wyoming had applied the factor of preserving political subdivisions "free from any taint of arbitrariness or discrimination." Further, the Court held that Wyoming's policy of preserving county boundaries justified the additional deviations from population equality resulting from the provision of representation for Niobrara County, mainly because considerable population variations would remain even if Niobrara county's representative were eliminated. Id. at 843–47.

Mahan v. Howell, 410 U.S. 315 (1973), sustained a legislative reapportionment plan for the Virginia House of Delegates in which the maximum variation was 16.4 percent. The Court held that this deviation was justified by the state's policy of maintaining the integrity of political subdivision lines. This objective was rational, since it furthered the legislative purpose of facilitating enactment of statutes of local concern and preserved for the voters in the political subdivisions a voice in the state legislature on local matters. Id. at 325–28.

[484] Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474, 485 (1968).

[485] See Ball v. James, 451 U.S. 355, 363 (1981), quoting Hadley v. Junior Coll. Dist., 397 U.S. 50, 53–54 (1970).

[486] Hadley v. Junior Coll. Dist., 397 U.S. 50, 56 (1970).

Storage District had never chosen to do so, it could generate and sell any form of power it saw fit to support its water operations. The costs of the project were assessed against each landowner according to the water benefits the landowner received. At issue in the case was the constitutionality of the scheme for electing the directors of the district, under which only landowners could vote, and voting power was apportioned according to the assessed valuation of the voting landowner's property. The Court recognized that the Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage District did exercise "some typical governmental powers," including the power to hire and fire workers, contract for construction of projects, condemn private property, and issue general obligation bonds.[487] Nevertheless, the Court concluded that the district had "relatively limited authority," because "its primary purpose, indeed the reason for its existence, was to provide for the acquisition, storage, and distribution of water for farming in the Tulare Lake Basin."[488] The Court also noted that the financial burdens of the district fell on the landowners in proportion to the benefits they received from the district, and that the district's actions therefore disproportionately affected the voting landowners.[489] The Salyer Court thus held that the strictures of Reynolds did not apply to the Tulare District, and it proceeded to inquire simply whether the statutory voting scheme based on land valuation at least bore some relevancy to the statute's objectives.[490] In this regard, the Court found that "[t]he California Legislature could quite reasonably have concluded that the number of landowners and owners of sufficient amounts of acreage whose consent was necessary to organize the district would not have subjected their land to the lien of its possibly very substantial assessments unless they had a dominant voice in its control."[491]

In New York City Board of Estimate v. Morris, 489 U.S. 688 (1989), the board consisted of three members elected citywide, plus the elected presidents of each of the city's five boroughs. "New York law assign[ed] to the board a significant range of functions common to municipal governments. Fiscal responsibilities include[d] calculating sewer and water rates, tax abatements, and property taxes on urban development projects. The board manage[d] all city property; exercise[d] plenary zoning authority; dispense[d] all franchises and leases on city property; fixe[d] generally the salaries of all officers and persons compensated through city moneys; and grant[ed] all city contracts." In addition, "the board share[d] legislative functions with the city council with respect to modifying and approving the city's capital and expense budgets." Id. at 694–96. Under these circumstances, the Court held that the board's selection process should comply with the "one-person, one-vote" requirement. Further, the city's proffered governmental interests—that the board, as structured, was essential to the successful government of New York City, was effective, and accommodated natural and political boundaries, as well as local interests—did not suffice to justify a 78-percent deviation from the one-person, one-vote ideal, in part because the city could be served by alternative ways of constituting the board that would minimize the discrimination in voting power.

[487] Salyer Land Co. v. Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage Dist., 410 U.S. 719, 728, n.7 (1973).

[488] Id. at 728.

[489] Id. at 729.

[490] Id. at 730.

[491] Id. at 731. The exclusion of lessees from voting did not violate the Equal Protection Clause, since the short-term lessee's interest might be substantially less than that of a landowner and, the franchise being exercisable by proxy, other lessees might negotiate to have the franchise included in their leases. Id. at 731–33.

Ball v. James, 451 U.S. 355, 365–71 (1981), involved the Salt River Project Agricultural Improvement and Power District, a governmental entity that was delivering untreated water to the owners of 236,000 acres of land in central Arizona, and, to subsidize its water operations, it was selling electricity to hundreds of thousands of people in an area including a large part [K161] Gordon v. Lance upheld West Virginia's constitutional and statutory requirement that political subdivisions might not incur bonded indebtedness or increase tax rates beyond those established by the State Constitution without the approval of 60 percent of the voters in a referendum election. Although "any departure from strict majority rule gives disproportionate power to the minority," the Court found that, "so long as such provisions do not discriminate against or authorize discrimination against any identifiable class, they do not violate the Equal Protection Clause."[492]

[K162] Lockport involved a New York law providing that a new county charter would go into effect only if it was approved in a referendum election by separate majorities of the voters who lived in the cities within the county, and of those who lived outside the cities. The "separate voter approval requirements [we]re based on the perception that the real and long-term impact of a restructuring of local government [wa]s felt quite differently by the different county constituent units that in a sense compete[d] to provide similar governmental services. Voters in these constituent units [we]re directly and differentially affected by the restructuring of county government, which [might] make of metropolitan Phoenix. Under state law, the system for electing the District's directors limited voting eligibility to landowners and apportioned voting power according to the number of acres owned. "[T]he services provided by the Salt River District [we]re more diverse and affect[ed] far more people than those of the Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage District involved in Salyer. Whereas the Tulare District included an area entirely devoted to agriculture and populated by only 77 persons, the Salt River District include[d] almost half the population of the state, including large parts of Phoenix and other cities. Moreover, the Salt River District, unlike the Tulare District, ha[d] exercised its statutory power to generate and sell electric power, and ha[d] become one of the largest suppliers of such power in the State. Further, whereas all the water delivered by the Tulare District went for agriculture, roughly 40% of the water delivered by the Salt River District [went] to urban areas or [wa]s used for nonagricultural purposes in farming areas. Finally whereas all operating costs of the Tulare District were born by the voting landowners through assessments apportioned according to land value, most of the capital and operating costs of the Salt River District ha[d] been met through the revenues generated by the selling of electric power. Nevertheless, a careful examination of the Salt River District reveal[ed] that, under the principles of the Avery, Hadley, and Salyer cases, these distinctions d[id] not amount to a constitutional difference." Id. at 365–66. The Salt River District did "not exercise the sort of governmental powers that invoke the strict demands of Reynolds. It [could not] impose ad valorem property taxes or sales taxes" or "enact any laws governing citizens' conduct." Nor did "it administer such normal government functions as the maintenance of streets, the operation of schools, or sanitation, health, or welfare services." Id. at 366. Second, the District's water functions, which constituted its "primary and originating purpose," were "relatively narrow." Although as much as 40 percent of the water delivered by the District went for non-agricultural, urban purposes, "[t]he constitutionally relevant fact [wa]s that all water . . . [wa]s distributed according to land ownership," and the District could not control the use to which the water was put by the landowners. Id. at 367–68. Nor was the provision of electricity, "in itself, the sort of general or important governmental function that would make the government provider subject to the Reynolds doctrine." And, in any event, the District's electric power functions were only incidental to, and thus could not change the character of, its water functions. Id. at 368. Finally, the District's functions bore a disproportionate relationship to the specific class of people whom the system made eligible to vote. Voting landowners were the only residents of the District whose lands were subject to liens to secure District bonds, who were subject to the District's acreage-based taxing power, and who committed capital to the District. Id. at 370.

---

[492] Gordon v. Lance, 403 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1971).

the provider of public services more remote and less subject to the voters' individual influence," and these differing interests of city and non-city voters in the adoption of a new county charter were sufficient under the Equal Protection Clause to justify the classifications made under the law.[493]

[K163] Multi-member districts, that is, districts that are represented by two or more legislators elected at large by the voters of the district, "are not per se unconstitutional, nor are they necessarily unconstitutional when used in combination with single member districts in other parts of the State. But [multi-member districts may not be] used invidiously to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of racial groups. . . . To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiffs' burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice."[494]

[K164] Mobile v. Bolden involved the at-large election system in Mobile, Alabama. Mobile was governed by three commissioners who exercised all legislative, executive, and administrative power in the municipality. Each candidate for the city Commission would run for one of three numbered posts in an at-large election and could only be elected by a majority vote. Plaintiffs brought a class action on behalf of all black citizens of Mobile alleging that the at-large scheme diluted their voting strength in violation of the [493] Lockport v. Citizens for Cmty. Action, 430 U.S. 259, 271–73 (1977).

---

[494] White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 765–66 (1973). In Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124 (1971), the Court observed that there was no proof that blacks were not allowed to register or vote, to choose the political party they desired to support, to participate in its affairs or to be equally represented on those occasions when candidates were chosen, or to be included among the candidates slated by the Democratic Party. Id. at 150–51. Against this background, the Court concluded that the failure of the minority to have legislative seats in proportion to its population "emerge[d] more as a function of losing elections than of built-in bias against poor [blacks.]" Id. at 153. Whitcomb accordingly rejected a challenge to multi-member districts in Marion County, Indiana.

A similar challenge was sustained in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766–67 (1973). There, the district court took into account (1) the history of official racial discrimination in Texas, which at times touched the right of blacks to register and vote and to participate in the democratic processes; (2) the Texas rule requiring a majority vote as a prerequisite to nomination in a primary election and to the so-called "place" rule limiting candidacy for legislative office from a multi-member district to a specified "place" on the ticket, with the result being the election of representatives from the Dallas multi-member district reduced to a head-to-head contest for each position. These characteristics of the Texas electoral system, neither in themselves improper nor invidious, enhanced the opportunity for racial discrimination, the district court thought. The district court also found that Dallas Committee for Responsible Government, a white-dominated organization, which was in effective control of Democratic Party candidate slating in Dallas County, was relying upon racial campaign tactics in white precincts to defeat candidates who had the overwhelming support of the black community. Based on the evidence before it, the district court concluded that the black community had been effectively excluded from participation in the Democratic primary selection process and was therefore generally not permitted to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner. The Court held that these findings and conclusions were sufficient to sustain the district court's judgment with respect to the Dallas multi-member district.

Constitution. A four-Justice plurality noted that, to prevail in their contention that the at-large voting system violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, plaintiffs had to prove the system was "conceived or operated as [a] purposeful device to further racial . . . discrimination."[495] Rogers v. Lodge confirmed that a determination of discriminatory intent is a requisite to a finding of unconstitutional vote dilution under the Fourteenth Amendment.[496]

c. Judicial Redistricting

[K165] "[R]eapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State through its legislature or other body, rather than of a federal court."[497] "Absent evidence that these state branches will fail timely to perform that duty, a federal court must neither affirmatively obstruct state apportionment nor permit federal litigation to be used to impede it."[498] Hence, "state redistricting responsibility should be accorded primacy to the extent possible when a federal court exercises remedial power. . . . A State should be given the opportunity to make its own redistricting decisions so long as that is practically possible and the State chooses to take the opportunity. . . . When it does take the opportunity, the discretion of the federal court is limited except to the extent that the plan itself runs afoul of federal law."[499] "When faced with the necessity of drawing district lines by judicial order, a court, as a general rule, should be guided by the legislative policies underlying the existing plan, to the extent those policies do not lead to violations of the Constitution or the Voting Rights Act."[500]

[K166] "A court-ordered plan should 'ordinarily achieve the goal of population equality with little more than de minimis variation.'"[501] "Slight deviations are allowed under certain circumstances."[502] Moreover, a court-ordered reapportionment plan of a state legislature must avoid use of multi-member districts, unless "important and significant state considerations rationally mandate departure" from this principle.[503]

4. Racial Gerrymandering

[K167] In Shaw I, the Court considered whether plaintiffs' factual allegation—that the legislature had drawn the former district's boundaries for race-based reasons—if true,

---

495 Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 66, 73 (1980).

496 Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 621–22 (1982). See also Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 481 (1997).

497 Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 27 (1975).

498 Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 34 (1993).

499 Lawyer v. Dep't of Justice, 521 U.S. 567, 576–77 (1997).

500 Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 79 (1997).

501 Id. at 98, quoting Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 26–27 (1975).

502 Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 98 (1997), citing Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 26 (1975) ("With a court plan, any deviation from approximate population equality must be supported by enunciation of historically significant state policy or unique features."); Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 740 (1983) ("Any number of consistently applied legislative policies might justify some variance, including, for instance, making districts compact, respecting municipal boundaries, preserving the cores of prior districts, and avoiding contests between incumbent[s].").

503 Chapman v. Meir, 420 U.S. 1, 26–27 (1975).

could underlie a legal holding that the legislature had violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Court held that it could, writing that "a plaintiff challenging a reapportionment statute under the Equal Protection Clause may state a claim by alleging that the legislation, though race-neutral on its face, rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to separate voters into different districts on the basis of race, and that the separation lacks sufficient justification."[504] Shaw I "recognized a claim 'analytically distinct' from a vote dilution claim. . . . Whereas a vote dilution claim alleges that the State has enacted a particular voting scheme as a purposeful device 'to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities,' . . . an action disadvantaging voters of a particular race, the essence of the equal protection claim recognized in Shaw [I] is that the State has used race as a basis for separating voters into districts."[505] "When the State assigns voters on the basis of race, it engages in the offensive and demeaning assumption that voters of a particular race, because of their race, 'think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls.' . . . Race-based assignments 'embody stereotypes that treat individuals as the product of their race, evaluating their thoughts and efforts—their very worth as citizens—according to a criterion barred to the Government by the Constitution.' . . . They also cause society serious harm."[506] As the Court concluded in Shaw I, "[r]acial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions; it threatens to carry us further from the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters—a goal that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments embody, and to which the Nation continues to aspire. It is for these reasons that race-based districting by our state legislatures demands close judicial scrutiny."[507]

[K168] A racially gerrymandered districting scheme, like all laws that classify citizens on the basis of race, is, thus, constitutionally suspect. "This is true whether or not the reason for the racial classification is benign or the purpose remedial."[508] However, "[s]trict scrutiny does not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race. . . . Electoral district lines are 'facially race neutral.'"[509] "[T]he courts, in assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan, must be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus. Redistricting legislatures will almost always be aware of racial demographics; but it does not follow that race predominates in the redistricting process. . . . The distinction between being aware of racial considerations and being motivated by them may be difficult to make. This evidentiary difficulty, together with the sensitive nature of redistricting and the presumption of good faith that must be accorded legislative enactments, requires courts to exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a state has drawn district lines on the basis of race. The plaintiff's burden is to show, either through circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics or more direct evidence going to legislative purpose, that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district. To make this showing, a plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, contiguity, respect

---

504 Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649 (1993) (Shaw I).

505 See Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911 (1995).

506 Id. at 911–12.

507 Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 657 (1993).

508 Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 904–05 (1996) (Shaw II).

509 Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 958 (1996).

for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests, to racial considerations. Where these or other race-neutral considerations are the basis for redistricting legislation, and are not subordinated to race, a state can 'defeat a claim that a district has been gerrymandered on racial lines.'"[510]

[K169] Shaw II reversed a district court's holding that the boundary-drawing law in question did not violate the Constitution. The Court found that "the district's 'unconventional,' snake-like shape, the way in which its boundaries split towns and counties, its predominately African-American racial make-up, and its history, together demonstrated a deliberate effort to create a 'majority-black' district."[511] "Race was the criterion that, in the State's view, could not be compromised; respecting communities of interest and protecting Democratic incumbents had come into play only after the race-based decision had been made."[512] Further, the Court held that the state had failed to show not only that its redistricting plan was in pursuit of a compelling state interest, but also that its districting legislation was narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. "A State's interest in remedying the effects of past or present racial discrimination may in the proper case justify a government's use of racial distinctions."[513] But in this case, the district court had found that an interest in ameliorating past discrimination had not actually precipitated the use of race in the redistricting plan. Moreover, the district, as drawn, was not a remedy narrowly tailored to the state's professed interest in avoiding liability under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which, inter alia, prohibited dilution of the voting strength of members of a minority group. Assuming, arguendo, that compliance

---

[510] Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915–16 (1995) (emphasis added). In that case, Georgia contended that its redistricting plan was necessary to meet the Justice Department's pre-clearance demands, under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (which requires that states obtain prior federal approval before changing any voting practice or procedure and seeks to prevent voting procedure changes leading to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise). The Justice Department had interposed an objection to a prior plan that created only two majority-minority districts. The Court held that the challenged plan was not required by a correct reading of Section 5, and therefore compliance with that law could not justify race-based districting. Id. at 921 ("[C]ompliance with federal antidiscrimination laws cannot justify race-based districting where the challenged district was not reasonably necessary under a constitutional reading and application of those laws"). The Court, thus, did not reach the question whether compliance with the Act, on its own, can be a compelling state interest under the proper circumstances.

United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737 (1995), recognized that a plaintiff who resides in a district that is the subject of a racial gerrymander claim has standing to challenge the legislation that created that district, but that a plaintiff from outside that district lacks standing, absent specific evidence that he has personally been subjected to a racial classification. A plaintiff's failure to show the requisite injury is not changed by the fact that the racial composition of his own district might have been different had the legislature drawn the adjacent majority-minority district (a district in which a majority of the population was a member of a specific minority group) another way. And evidence sufficient to support a racial gerrymandering claim with respect to a majority-minority district does not prove anything with respect to a neighboring majority-white district in which the plaintiff resides. Id. at 745–46. See also Sinkfield v. Kelley, 531 U.S. 28 (2000) (per curiam).

[511] See Easley (Hunt) v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 238 (2001), discussing Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899 (1996).

[512] Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 907 (1996) (Shaw II).

[513] Id. at 909.

with Section 2 might be a compelling interest, the Court decided that the district at issue could not remedy any potential Section 2 violation, since the minority group should be shown to be "geographically compact" to establish Section 2 liability, and it could not reasonably be suggested that the district contained a "geographically compact" population of any race. Relatedly, the Court rejected the argument that a majority-minority district (that is, a district in which a majority of the population is a member of a specific minority group) might be drawn anywhere if there was a strong basis in evidence for concluding that a Section 2 violation existed somewhere in the state, noting that Section 2 targeted vote dilution injury to individuals in a particular area, not to the minority as a group.[514]

---

[514] Id. at 915–17. See also Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952 (1996), where the Court struck down congressional districts crafted by Texas. This was a "mixed motive" case. Findings that Texas had substantially neglected traditional districting criteria such as compactness, that it had been committed from the outset to creating majority-minority districts, and that it had manipulated district lines to exploit unprecedentedly detailed racial data, taken together, weighed in favor of the application of strict scrutiny. Further, although factors other than race, particularly incumbency protection, had clearly influenced the legislature, the Court sustained the district court's conclusion that race had been the predominant factor motivating the drawing of district lines. Moreover, the Court found that the districts in question had not been narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest in complying with Sections 2 and 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

In Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541 (1999) (Hunt I), a district court had granted summary judgment in favor of those challenging a district's boundaries. The court based its holding upon "uncontroverted material facts" showing that the boundaries created an unusually shaped district, split counties and cities, and, in particular, placed almost all heavily Democratic-registered, predominantly African-American voting precincts inside the district, while locating some heavily Democratic-registered, predominantly white precincts outside the district. This latter circumstance, said the court, showed that the legislature was trying to maximize new district's African-American voting strength, not the district's Democratic voting strength. The Court reversed. It "agreed with the District Court that the new district's shape, the way in which it split towns and counties, and its heavily African-American voting population all helped the plaintiffs' case. . . . But neither that evidence by itself, nor when coupled with the evidence of Democratic registration, was sufficient to show, on summary judgment, the unconstitutional race-based objective that plaintiffs claimed. That [wa]s because there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the evidence also was consistent with a constitutional political objective, namely, the creation of a safe Democratic seat. . . . [The Court] pointed to the affidavit of an expert witness for defendants, [who] had offered to show that because North Carolina's African-American voters were overwhelmingly Democratic voters, one could not easily distinguish a legislative effort to create a majority African-American district from a legislative effort to create a safely Democratic district. . . . And he had also provided data showing that registration did not indicate how voters would actually vote. [The Court] agreed that data showing how voters actually behave, not data showing only how those voters are registered, could affect the outcome of this litigation. It concluded that the case was 'not suited for summary disposition' and reversed the District Court." See Easley (Hunt) v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 238–39 (2001), discussing Hunt I.

On remand the district court again held that the legislature had unconstitutionally drawn the district's new boundaries. In Easley (Hunt) v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234 (2001) (Hunt II), the Court held that the district court's was based on clearly erroneous findings. The modicum of evidence supporting the district court's conclusion taken together did not show that racial considerations predominated in the boundaries' drawing, because race in this case correlated closely with political behavior. The Court stressed that, "where majority-minority districts (or the approximate equivalent) are at issue and where racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation, the party

5. Political Gerrymandering

[K170] Davis v. Bandemer recognized that political gerrymandering claims are justiciable under the Equal Protection Clause, although the members of the Court were not in agreement as to the standards that would govern such a claim. A four-Justice plurality concluded that a political gerrymandering claim could succeed only where plaintiffs showed "both intentional discrimination against an identifiable political group and an actual discriminatory effect on that group."[515] As to the intent element, the plurality acknowledged that "[a]s long as redistricting is done by a legislature, it should not be very difficult to prove that the likely political consequences of the reapportionment were intended."[516] "However, the effects prong was significantly harder to satisfy. Relief could not be based merely upon the fact that a group of persons banded together for political purposes had failed to achieve representation commensurate with its numbers, or that the apportionment scheme made its winning of elections more difficult. . . . Rather, it would have to be shown that, taking into account a variety of historic factors and projected election results, the group had been 'denied its chance to effectively influence the political process' as a whole, which could be achieved even without electing a candidate. . . . It would not be enough to establish, for example, that Democrats had been 'placed in a district with a supermajority of other Democratic voters' or that the district 'departs from preexisting political boundaries.' Rather, in a challenge to an individual district the inquiry would focus 'on the opportunity of members of the group to participate in party deliberations in the slating and nomination of candidates, their opportunity to register and vote, and hence their chance to directly influence the election returns and to secure the attention of the winning candidate.' A statewide challenge, by contrast, would involve an analysis of 'the voters' direct or indirect influence on the elections of the state legislature as a whole.'"[517] Justice Powell suggested an alternative method for evaluating equal protection claims of political gerrymandering. In his view, courts should look at a number of factors in considering these claims: the nature of the legislative procedures by which the challenged redistricting was accomplished and the intent behind the redistricting; the shapes of the districts and their conformity with political subdivision boundaries; and evidence concerning population disparities and statistics tending to show vote dilution.[518]

[K171] Nevertheless, in Vieth, a majority of the Court found that Bandemer provided no clear and manageable standards for measuring the burden a given partisan classification imposes on representational rights.[519] A four-member plurality held that political gerrymandering claims are non-justiciable, because no judicially discernible and attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance." Id. at 258 (emphasis added). Because appellees had failed to make any such showing in that case, the district court's contrary findings were clearly erroneous.

---

515 Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 127 (1986).

516 Id. at 129.

517 See Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 281–82 (2004), discussing and quoting Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 132–33, 140–41 (1986) (emphasis added).

518 Id. at 173 (Powell, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

519 Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 282–83 (2004) (plurality opinion); id. at 306–08 (Kennedy, J., concurring in judgment).

manageable standards for adjudicating such claims exist.[520] But five members of the Court were convinced that the plurality's position was erroneous.[521]

---

[520] Id. at 281 (opinion of Scalia, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., O'Connor, and Thomas, JJ.). Appellants proposed a standard that retained the two-pronged framework of the Bandemer plurality—intent plus effect—but modified the type of showing sufficient to satisfy each. To satisfy appellants' intent standard, a plaintiff should "show that the mapmakers acted with a predominant intent to achieve partisan advantage," which could be shown "by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence that other neutral and legitimate redistricting criteria were subordinated to the goal of achieving partisan advantage." The Court found that appellants' proposed two-pronged standard based on Article I, Section 2, and the Equal Protection Clause was neither discernible nor manageable. The plurality noted that appellants were mistaken when they contended that their intent prong ("predominant intent") was no different from that which the Court had applied in racial gerrymandering cases. In those cases, the predominant intent test had been applied to the challenged district in which the plaintiffs voted. There, however, since "it would be quixotic to attempt to bar state legislatures from considering politics as they redraw district lines," appellants proposed a test that would be satisfied only when "partisan advantage was the predominant motivation behind the entire statewide plan." The plurality noted that "[v]ague as the 'predominant motivation' test might be when used to evaluate single districts, it all but evaporates when applied statewide. Does it mean, for instance, that partisan intent should outweigh all other goals—contiguity, compactness, preservation of neighborhoods, etc.—statewide? And how was the statewide 'outweighing' to be determined?" Id. at 285. Moreover, as the plurality pointed out, "[t]he Constitution clearly contemplates districting by political entities, see Article I, § 4, and unsurprisingly that turns out to be root-and-branch a matter of politics. . . . By contrast, the purpose of segregating voters on the basis of race is not a lawful one, and is much more rarely encountered. Determining whether the shape of a particular district is so substantially affected by the presence of a rare and constitutionally suspect motive as to invalidate it is quite different from determining whether it is so substantially affected by the excess of an ordinary and lawful motive as to invalidate it. Moreover, the fact that partisan districting is a lawful and common practice means that there is almost always room for an election-impeding lawsuit contending that partisan advantage was the predominant motivation; not so for claims of racial gerrymandering." Id. at 285–86. The effects prong of appellants' proposal required (1) that the plaintiffs show that the rival party's voters were systematically "packed" or "cracked;" and (2) that the court be persuaded from the totality of the circumstances that the map could thwart the plaintiffs' ability to translate a majority of votes into a majority of seats. But this standard was not discernible. As the plurality noted, "a person's politics is rarely as readily discernible—and never as permanently discernible—as a person's race. Political affiliation is not an immutable characteristic, but may shift from one election to the next; and even within a given election, not all voters follow the party line." Id. at 287. Even if the standard were discernible, it was not judicially manageable. The plurality said that there is no effective way to ascertain a party's majority status, and, in any event, majority status in statewide races does not establish majority status for particular district contests. Id. at 288.

[521] Justice Kennedy concluded that all possibility of judicial relief should not be foreclosed in such cases, because a limited and precise rationale might yet be found to correct an established constitutional violation. Justice Kennedy noted, inter alia, that courts confront two obstacles when presented with a claim of injury from partisan gerrymandering. "First is the lack of comprehensive and neutral principles for drawing electoral boundaries. No substantive definition of fairness in districting commands general assent. Second is the absence of rules to limit and confine judicial intervention." Id. at 306–07. Justice Kennedy further noted:

> That courts can grant relief in districting cases where race is involved does not answer our need for fairness principles here. Those controversies implicate a different inquiry. They involve sorting permissible classifications in the redistricting context from impermissible ones. Race is an impermissible classification. . . .

6. Equality in the Counting and Recounting of Votes

[K172] On November 8, 2000, the day following the Presidential election, the Florida division of elections reported that Bush had received 2,909,135 votes, and Gore, had received 2,907,351 votes, a margin of 1,784 for Governor Bush. Because Bush's margin

---

> A determination that a gerrymander violates the law must rest on something more than the conclusion that political classifications were applied. It must rest instead on a conclusion that the classifications, though generally permissible, were applied in an invidious manner or in a way unrelated to any legitimate legislative objective.
>
> The object of districting is to establish 'fair and effective representation for all citizens. . . . At first it might seem that courts could determine, by the exercise of their own judgment, whether political classifications are related to this object or instead burden representational rights. The lack, however, of any agreed upon model of fair and effective representation makes this analysis difficult to pursue.
>
> [However,] the more abstract standards that guide analysis of all Fourteenth Amendment claims suffic[e] to assure justiciability of such claims.
>
> That no [workable] standard has emerged in this case should not be taken to prove that none will emerge in the future.

Id. at 307–08, 310–11.

Under Justice Souter's proposed standard, in order to challenge a particular district, a plaintiff must show

(1) that he is a member of a "cohesive political group;"
(2) "that the district of his residence . . . paid little or no heed" to traditional districting principles;
(3) that there were "specific correlations between the district's deviations from traditional districting principles and the distribution of the population of his group;"
(4) that a hypothetical district exists, which includes the plaintiff's residence, remedies the packing or cracking of the plaintiff's group, and deviates less from traditional districting principles; and
(5) that "the defendants acted intentionally to manipulate the shape of the district in order to pack or crack his group."

When those showings have been made, the burden would shift to the defendants to justify the district "by reference to objectives other than naked partisan advantage." Id. at 347–51 (dissenting opinion of Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg).

In evaluating a challenge to a specific district, Justice Stevens would apply the standard set forth in the racial gerrymandering cases and ask "whether the legislature allowed partisan considerations to dominate and control the lines drawn, forsaking all neutral principles." Under this analysis, "if no neutral criterion can be identified to justify the lines drawn, and if the only possible explanation for a district's bizarre shape is a naked desire to increase partisan strength, then no rational basis exists to save the district from an equal protection challenge." Id. at 339.

Justice Breyer's proposal focused on "the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power." By entrenchment he meant "a situation in which a party that enjoys only minority support among the populace has nonetheless contrived to take, and hold, legislative power." By unjustified entrenchment he meant that "the minority's hold on power is purely the result of partisan manipulation and not other factors. These 'other' factors that could lead to 'justified' (albeit temporary) minority entrenchment would include sheer happenstance, the existence of more than two major parties, the unique constitutional requirements of certain representational bodies such as the Senate, or reliance on traditional (geographic, communities of interest, etc.) districting criteria." Id. at 360–61.

of victory was less than one-half of a percent of the votes cast, an automatic machine recount was conducted under the election code, the results of which showed Bush still winning the race but by a diminished margin. Gore then sought manual recounts in four counties, pursuant to Florida's election protest provisions. A dispute arose concerning the deadline for local county canvassing boards to submit their returns to the Secretary of State (Secretary). The Secretary declined to waive the November 14 deadline imposed by statute. The Florida supreme court, however, set the deadline at November 26. The Court granted certiorari and vacated the Florida supreme court's decision, finding considerable uncertainty as to the grounds on which it was based.[522] On December 11, the Florida supreme court issued a decision on remand reinstating that date. On November 26, the Florida elections canvassing commission certified the results of the election and declared Bush the winner of Florida's 25 electoral votes. On November 27, Gore, pursuant to Florida's contest provisions, filed a complaint in Leon County circuit court contesting the certification. He sought relief pursuant to a state statute providing that "[r]eceipt of a number of illegal votes or rejection of a number of legal votes sufficient to change or place in doubt the result of the election" would be grounds for a contest. The Florida supreme court held that Gore had satisfied his burden of proof with respect to his challenge to Miami-Dade County's failure to tabulate, by manual count, 9,000 ballots on which the machines had failed to detect a vote for President ("under-votes"). A "legal vote," as determined by the state supreme court, was one in which there was "a clear indication of the intent of the voter." The Florida supreme court therefore ordered a hand recount of the 9,000 ballots in Miami-Dade County. The Court found that the recount procedures the Florida supreme court had adopted were not "consistent with its obligation to avoid arbitrary and disparate treatment of the members of its electorate."[523] Much of the controversy revolved around ballot cards designed to be perforated by a stylus but that, either through error or deliberate omission, had not been perforated with sufficient precision for a machine to count them. In some cases a piece of the card—a chad—was hanging, say by two corners. In other cases, there was no separation at all, just an indentation. "The Florida Supreme Court ha[d] ordered that the intent of the voter be discerned from such ballots. . . . This [wa]s unobjectionable as an abstract proposition and a starting principle. The problem inhere[d] in the absence of specific standards to ensure its equal application. The formulation of uniform rules to determine intent based on these recurring circumstances [wa]s practicable and . . . necessary."[524] However, the record showed that the standards for accepting or rejecting contested ballots might vary not only from county to county but, indeed, within a single county from one recount team to another. Moreover, "the actual process by which the votes were to be counted raise[d] further concerns [because the court's order] did not specify who would recount the ballots. The county canvassing boards were forced to pull together ad hoc teams comprised of judges from various Circuits who had no previous training in handling and interpreting ballots. Furthermore, while others were permitted to observe, they were prohibited from objecting during the recount." Such a recount process was "inconsistent with the minimum procedures necessary to protect the fundamental right of each voter in the special instance of a statewide recount under the authority of a single state judicial offi-

---

522 Bush v. Palm Beach County Canvassing Bd., 531 U.S. 70, 78 (2000) (per curiam).

523 Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 105 (2000) (per curiam).

524 Id. at 105–06.

cer."[525] "When a court orders a statewide remedy, there must be at least some assurance that the rudimentary requirements of equal treatment and fundamental fairness are satisfied."[526] The state had not shown that its procedures included the necessary safeguards. Upon due consideration of these difficulties, the Court found it "obvious that the recount [could not] be conducted in compliance with the requirements of equal protection and due process without substantial additional work." Finally, since federal law required that any controversy or contest designed to lead to a conclusive selection of electors be completed by December 12, since that date was upon the Court, and since there was no recount procedure in place under the State supreme court's order that comported with minimal constitutional standards, it was evident that any recount seeking to meet the December 12 date would be unconstitutional for the reasons discussed above. Hence, the Court reversed the judgment of the supreme court of Florida ordering a recount to proceed.[527]

J. ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL LEGISLATION[528]

1. In General

[K173] "Social and economic legislation . . . that does not employ suspect classifications or impinge on fundamental rights must be upheld against equal protection attack when the legislative means are rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose."[529] As the Court pointed out in Vance, social and economic legislation is valid "unless the varying treatment of different groups or persons is so unrelated to the achievement of any combination of legitimate purposes that can only conclude that the legislature's actions were irrational."[530] Classifications in such legislation come to the Court "bearing a strong presumption of validity," and "those attacking the rationality of the legislative classification have the burden 'to negative every conceivable basis which might support it.'"[531]

2. Protection of Legitimate Expectations[532]

[K174] The Court has acknowledged that "classifications serving to protect legitimate expectation and reliance interests serve a legitimate governmental objective and do not

---

525 Id. at 109.

526 Id. at 109.

527 Id. at 110.

528 See also paras. D11 et seq. (residency requirements); paras. F73–F76 (abortion funding).

529 Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 331 (1981).

530 Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 97 (1979).

531 Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314–15 (1993), quoting Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co., 410 U.S. 356, 364 (1973). The fact that a member of the class, which is regulated, may suffer economic losses not shared by others is not a barrier to economic legislation. See Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 260 (1964), citing Bowles v. Willingham, 321 U.S. 503, 518 (1944).

The Court has recognized repeatedly that a legislature constitutionally may prohibit a convicted felon from engaging in certain activities. See Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55, 66 (1980) (firearms disability); Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24 (1974) (disenfranchisement); De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144 (1960) (proscription against holding office in a waterfront labor organization); Hawker v. New York, 170 U.S. 189 (1898) (prohibition against the practice of medicine).

532 See also para. K185.

deny equal protection of the laws."[533] In Fritz, the Court determined that a denial of dual "windfall" retirement benefits to some railroad workers but not others did not violate the Equal Protection Clause, because "Congress could properly conclude that persons who had actually acquired statutory entitlement to windfall benefits while still employed in the railroad industry had a greater equitable claim to those benefits than the members of appellee's class who were no longer in railroad employment when they became eligible for dual benefits."[534] In New Orleans v. Dukes, the Court held that an ordinance banning certain street vendor operations, but grandfathering existing vendors who had been in operation for more than eight years, did not violate the Equal Protection Clause, mainly because the city "could reasonably decide that newer businesses were less likely to have built up substantial reliance interests in continued operation."[535] In Kadrmas, the Court decided that a prohibition on user fees for bus service in "reorganized" school districts, but not in "non-reorganized" school districts, did not violate the Equal Protection Clause, inter alia, because "the legislature could conceivably have believed that such a policy would serve the legitimate purpose of fulfilling the reasonable expectations of those residing in districts with free busing arrangements imposed by reorganization plans."[536] [K175] Prior to 1977, spousal benefits under the Social Security Act were payable only to husbands or widowers who could demonstrate dependency on their wives for one-half of their support, whereas wives and widows were entitled to benefits without any such showing of dependency on their husbands. In March, 1977, Califano v. Goldfarb held that the gender-based dependency requirement for widowers violated the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Thereafter, while repealing the dependency requirement for widowers and husbands, Congress, in order to avoid a fiscal drain on the Social Security trust fund, enacted a "pension off-set" provision that generally required the reduction of spousal benefits by the amount of federal or state government pensions received by the Social Security applicant. However, in order to protect the interests of those individuals who had retired or were about to retire and who had planned their retirements in reliance on their entitlement, under pre-1977 law, to spousal benefits unreduced by government pension benefits, Congress exempted from the pension off-set requirement those spouses who were eligible to receive pension benefits prior to December 1982, and who would have qualified for unreduced spousal benefits under the Act as administered in January 1977. In Heckler v. Mathews, the Court found that the gender-based classification of the pension off-set exception was constitutional. Although temporarily reviving the gender-based classification invalidated in Goldfarb, the off-set exception furthered the "legitimate and important" governmental objective of protecting individuals who had planned their retirements in reasonable reliance on the law in effect prior to that decision under which they could receive spousal benefits unreduced by the amount of government pensions to which they were also entitled. This objective provided an "exceedingly persuasive justification" for the gender-based classification incorporated in the off-set exception.[537] And "[a]lthough an unconstitutional scheme could not be retained for an unduly prolonged period in the name of protecting reliance interests, . . . there [wa]s

---

533 Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 13 (1992).

534 United States R.R. Ret. Bd. v. Fritz, 449 U.S. 166, 178 (1980).

535 New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 305 (1976) (per curiam).

536 Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Schs., 487 U.S. 450, 465 (1988).

537 Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728, 745–48 (1984).

no indication that the off-set exception suffered from [such a flaw.]"[538] Moreover, the means employed by the statute was "substantially related" to the achievement of that objective. "By reviving for a 5-year period the eligibility criteria in effect in January, 1977, the exception [wa]s narrowly tailored to protect only those individuals who [had] made retirement plans prior to the changes in the law that occurred after that date. Individuals who were eligible for spousal benefits before the law changed and who retire[d] within five years of the statute's enactment [might] reasonably be assumed to have begun planning for their retirement prior to the adoption of the offset provision. . . . Such persons, men as well as women, [could] receive spousal benefits unreduced by their government pensions, while those persons, men as well as women, who first became eligible for benefits after January, 1977, [could] not."[539]

3. Regulation of Economic Activities

[K176] Railway Express involved a New York city traffic regulation that forbade the operation of any advertising vehicle on the streets, but it excepted vehicles that had upon them business notices or advertisements of the products of the owner and that were not used merely or mainly for advertising. The city had found that advertising on vehicles using the streets of New York city constituted a distraction to vehicle drivers and to pedestrians alike and therefore affected the safety of the public in the use of the streets. The Court held that the classification at issue had relation to the purpose for which it had been made, and did not transgress the Equal Protection Clause. The local authorities might "well have concluded that those who advertised their own wares on their trucks d[id] not present the same traffic problem in view of the nature or extent of the advertising which they use[d]." And the fact that the city had seen "fit to eliminate from traffic advertising vehicles, but d[id] not touch what [could] be even greater distractions in a different category, such as the vivid displays on Times Square, [wa]s immaterial," for "[i]t is no requirement of equal protection that all evils of the same genus be eradicated or none at all."[540]

[K177] In Lee Optical, the Court dealt with a claim that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was violated by an Oklahoma statute that subjected opticians to a system of detailed regulation but that exempted sellers of ready-to-wear glasses. In sustaining the statute, the court noted that "[e]vils in the same field may be of different dimensions and proportions, requiring different remedies," and that "the ready-to-wear branch of this business [might] not loom large in Oklahoma or [might] present problems of regulation distinct from the other branch."[541]

[K178] In New Orleans v. Dukes, a city ordinance that, to preserve the character of a historic area, prohibited the sale of food from pushcarts unless the vendor had been in business for at least eight years was challenged under the Equal Protection Clause. Noting that the city could reasonably decide that "newer businesses were less likely to have built up substantial reliance interests in continued operation" in the French Quarter, and that the vendors who qualified under the "grandfather clause" had themselves "become part of the distinctive character and charm that distinguish[ed]" the

---

538 Id. at 746.

539 Id. at 749.

540 Ry. Express Agency v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 110 (1949).

541 Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955).

French Quarter, the Court held that the city could rationally choose to eliminate vendors of more recent vintage.[542]

[K179] Stanglin involved a city ordinance restricting admission to certain dancehalls to persons between the ages of 14 and 18. Considering that the Constitution does not recognize "a generalized right of 'social association' that includes chance encounters in dancehalls," the Court decided that the ordinance implicated no suspect class and impinged on no constitutionally protected right. Moreover, there was a rational relationship between the age restriction at issue and the city's interest in promoting the welfare of teenagers. The city "could reasonably conclude . . . that teenagers might be susceptible to corrupting influences if permitted, unaccompanied by their parents, to frequent a dancehall with older persons," and "that limiting dancehall contacts between juveniles and adults would make less likely illicit or undesirable juvenile involvement with alcohol, illegal drugs, and promiscuous sex. It [wa]s true that the city allow[ed] teenagers and adults to rollerskate together, but skating involves less physical contact than dancing. The differences between the two activities may not be striking, but differentiation need not be striking in order to survive rational basis scrutiny."[543]

[K180] Beach Communications involved a federal statute drawing a distinction between cable and satellite television facilities that served separately owned and managed buildings and those that served one or more buildings under common ownership or management. Facilities in the latter category were exempt from regulation as long as they provided services without using public rights-of-way. The Court found that there were at least two possible rational bases for the distinction. First, "common ownership was thought to be indicative of those systems for which the costs of regulation would outweigh the benefits to consumers." A legislator might rationally assume that such systems "would typically be limited in size, or would share some other attribute affecting their impact on the welfare of cable viewers such that regulators could 'safely ignore' these systems." Moreover, subscribers who could negotiate with one voice through a common owner or manager might have greater bargaining power relative to the cable or satellite TV operator and therefore less need for regulatory protection. A second conceivable basis for the statutory distinction was concern over the "potential for effective monopoly power." The first satellite television operator to gain a foothold by installing a dish on one building in a block of separately owned buildings would have a significant cost advantage in competing for the remaining subscribers, because it could connect additional buildings for the cost of a length of cable, while its competitors would have to recover the cost of their own satellite facilities. Thus, the first operator could charge rates well above its cost and still undercut the competition.[544]

---

[542] New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 305 (1976) (per curiam). Dukes overruled Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457 (1957), where the Court had invalidated, as violative of the Equal Protection Clause, a provision in the Illinois Community Currency Exchanges Act, excepting money orders of the American Express Company an old, established, worldwide enterprise of unquestioned solvency and high financial standing, from the requirement that any firm selling or issuing money orders in the state must secure a license and submit to state regulation.

[543] Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 25, 27–28 (1989).

[544] Fed. Communications Comm'n v. Beach Communications, Inc. 508 U.S. 307, 317–20 (1993).

4. State Taxation[545]

[K181] "The States . . . have broad powers to impose and collect taxes. A State may divide different kinds of property into classes and assign to each class a different tax burden, so long as those divisions and burdens are reasonable."[546] "The provision in the Fourteenth Amendment that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws was not intended to prevent a State from adjusting its system of taxation in all proper and reasonable ways."[547] "The Equal Protection Clause does not mean that a State may not draw lines that treat one class of individuals or entities differently from the others. The test is whether the difference in treatment is an invidious discrimination. . . . Where taxation is concerned and no specific federal right, apart from equal protection, is imperiled, the States have large leeway in making classifications and drawing lines which, in their judgment, produce reasonable systems of taxation."[548] As stated in Allied Stores, "[t]he States have a very wide discretion in the laying of their taxes. When dealing with their proper domestic concerns, and not trenching upon the prerogatives of the National Government or violating the guaranties of the Federal Constitution, the States have the attribute of sovereign powers in devising their fiscal systems to ensure revenue and foster their local interests. Of course, the States, in the exercise of their taxing power, are subject to the requirements of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But that clause imposes no iron rule of equality, prohibiting the flexibility and variety that are appropriate to reasonable schemes of state taxation. The State may impose different specific taxes upon different trades and professions and may vary the rate of excise upon various products. It is not required to resort to close distinctions or to maintain a precise, scientific uniformity with reference to composition, use or value. . . . 'To hold otherwise would be to subject the essential taxing power of the State to an intolerable supervision, hostile to the basic principles of government and wholly beyond the protection which the general clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to assure.'"[549] In each case,

---

[545] See also paras. J140 et seq. (dormant Commerce Clause). "The Commerce Clause, unlike the Equal Protection Clause, is integrally concerned with whether a state purpose implicates local or national interests. The Equal Protection Clause, in contrast, is concerned with whether a state purpose is impermissibly discriminatory; whether the discrimination involves local or other interests is not central to the inquiry to be made. Thus, the fact that promotion of local industry is a legitimate state interest in the Commerce Clause context says nothing about its validity under equal protection analysis." See Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869, 876, n.6 (1985).

"[I]n some peculiar circumstances, state tax classifications facially discriminating against inter-state commerce may violate the Equal Protection Clause even when they pass muster under the Commerce Clause." See Gen. Motors Corp. v. Tracy, 519 U.S. 278, 311 (1997). Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869 (1985), involved an Alabama statute that facially discriminated against inter-state commerce by imposing a lower gross premiums tax on in-state than out-of-state insurance companies. The case did not present a Commerce Clause violation only because Congress, in enacting the McCarran-Ferguson Act, intended to authorize states to impose taxes that burden inter-state commerce in the insurance field. Id. at 880. The Court nonetheless invalidated Alabama's classification, because neither of the two purposes furthered by the statute was legitimate under the Equal Protection Clause. Id. at 883.

[546] Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co v. Webster, 488 U.S. 336, 344 (1989).

[547] Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U.S. 232, 237 (1890).

[548] Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co., 410 U.S. 356, 359 (1973).

[549] Allied Stores of Ohio v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 522, 526–27 (1959), quoting Ohio Oil Co. v. Conway, 281 U.S. 146, 159 (1930). In the former case, the Court used the phrase "palpably arbi-

"[i]f the selection or classification is neither capricious nor arbitrary, and rests upon some reasonable consideration of difference or policy, there is no denial of the equal protection of the law."[550]

[K182] The Court has "declined to hold that narrow exemptions from a general scheme of taxation necessarily render the overall scheme invidiously discriminatory."[551] "For purposes of rational basis review, 'the latitude of discretion is notably wide in . . . the granting of partial or total exemptions upon grounds of policy.'"[552]

[K183] "When it comes to taxes on corporations and taxes on individuals, great leeway is permissible so far as equal protection is concerned."[553] Hence, a state may decide to tax property held by corporations at a different rate than property held by individuals. Lehnhausen upheld, for example, an Illinois provision subjecting corporations and similar entities, but not individuals, to ad valorem taxes on personalty.[554]

[K184] At issue in Allegheny Pittsburgh was the practice of a West Virginia county tax assessor of assessing recently purchased property on the basis of its purchase price, while making only minor modifications in the assessments of property that had not recently been sold. As the Court noted, "[t]he use of a general adjustment as a transitional substitute for an individual reappraisal violates no constitutional command. As long as general adjustments are accurate enough over a short period of time to equalize the differences in proportion between the assessments of a class of property holders, the Equal Protection Clause is satisfied. Just as that Clause tolerates occasional errors of state law or mistakes in judgment when valuing property for tax purposes, . . . it does not require immediate general adjustment on the basis of the latest market developments. In each case, the constitutional requirement is the seasonable attainment of a rough equality in tax treatment of similarly situated property owners."[555] However, the challenged practice was "not an example of transitional delay in adjustment of assessed value resulting in inequalities in assessments of comparable property." Properties sold recently had been reassessed and taxed at values between eight and 35 times that of comparable neighboring properties that had not been sold, and these discrepancies had continued for more than ten years with little change. "The county's adjustments to the assessments of property not recently sold [we]re too small to seasonably dissipate the remaining disparity between these assessments and the assessments based on a recent trary" or "invidious" as defining the limits placed by the Equal Protection Clause on state power. Id. at 530.

---

[550] Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co v. Webster, 488 U.S. 336, 344 (1989), quoting Brown-Forman Co. v. Kentucky, 217 U.S. 563, 573 (1910).

[551] See Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 16–17 (1992), citing Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 550–51 (1983) (denial of a tax exemption to nonprofit lobbying organizations, but with an exception for veterans' groups, does not violate equal protection, for veterans have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation, subjecting themselves to the mental and physical hazards, as well as the economic and family detriments that are peculiar to military service and that do not exist in normal civilian life).

[552] Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 17 (1992), quoting F. S. Royster Guano Co. v. Virginia, 253 U.S. 412, 415 (1920).

[553] Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co., 410 U.S. 356, 360 (1973).

[554] Id. at 359–65.

[555] Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co v. Webster County, 488 U.S. 336, 343 (1989).

purchase price." Accordingly, the Court determined that the unequal assessment practice violated the Equal Protection Clause.[556]

[K185] Nordlinger addressed a California provision that embodied an "acquisition value" system of taxation, whereby property was reassessed up to current appraised value upon new construction or a change in ownership. Exemptions from this reassessment provision existed for two types of transfers: exchanges of principal residences by persons over the age of 55 and transfers between parents and children. Over time, the acquisition-value system created dramatic disparities in the taxes paid by persons owning similar pieces of property. Longer-term owners paid lower taxes reflecting historic property values, while newer owners had to pay higher taxes reflecting more recent values. The Court found that the foregoing acquisition value assessment scheme did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. The scheme rationally furthered at least two legitimate state interests. "First, the State ha[d] a legitimate interest in local neighborhood preservation, continuity, and stability. . . . The State therefore legitimately [could] decide to structure its tax system to discourage rapid turnover in ownership of homes and businesses, for example, in order to inhibit displacement of lower income families by the forces of gentrification or of established, 'mom-and-pop' businesses by newer chain operations."[557] "Second, the State legitimately [could] conclude that a new owner, at the point of purchasing his property, d[id] not have the same reliance interest warranting protection against higher taxes as d[id] an existing owner. The State [might] deny a new owner at the point of purchase the right to 'lock in' to the same assessed value as [wa]s enjoyed by an existing owner of comparable property, because an existing owner rationally [might] be thought to have vested expectations in his property or home that [we]re more deserving of protection than the anticipatory expectations of a new owner at the point of purchase. A new owner ha[d] full information about the scope of future tax liability before acquiring the property, and if he [thought] the future tax burden [wa]s too demanding, he [could] decide not to complete the purchase at all. By contrast, the existing owner, already saddled with his purchase, d[id] not have the option of deciding not to buy his home if taxes bec[ame] prohibitively high. To meet his tax obligations, he might be forced to sell his home or to divert his income away from the purchase of food, clothing, and other necessities."[558] The two exemptions at issue also rationally furthered legitimate purposes. California "reasonably could have concluded that older persons in general should not be discouraged from moving to a residence more suitable to their changing family size or income," and that "the interests of family and neighborhood continuity and stability [we]re furthered by, and warrant an exemption for, transfers between parents and children."[559]

[K186] Racing Association involved an Iowa tax scheme under which adjusted revenues from slot machines on excursion riverboats were taxed at a maximum rate of 20 percent, while adjusted revenues from slot machines at racetracks were subject to a maximum tax rate of 36 percent. The Iowa supreme court had found that the 20 percent/36

---

[556] Id. at 344–45.

[557] Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 12 (1992).

[558] Id. at 12–13. The Court distinguished Allegheny Pittsburgh, noting the absence of any indication in Allegheny Pittsburgh that the policies underlying an acquisition-value taxation scheme could conceivably have been the purpose for the Webster County tax assessor's unequal assessment scheme. Id. at 15.

[559] Id. at 17.

percent tax rate differential violated the federal Constitution's Equal Protection Clause, because, in its view, that difference "frustrated" what it saw as the law's basic objective, namely, rescuing the racetracks from economic distress. The Court disagreed with this holding. As the Court noted, "the Iowa law, like most laws, might predominately serve one general objective, say, helping the racetracks, while containing subsidiary provisions that sought to achieve other desirable (perhaps even contrary) ends as well, thereby producing a law that balanced objectives but still served the general objective when seen as a whole. After all, if every subsidiary provision in a law designed to help racetracks had to help those racetracks and nothing more, then there could be no taxation of the racetracks at all."[560] Moreover, the Iowa legislation, seen as a whole, could "rationally be understood . . . to advance the racetracks' economic interests. Its grant to the racetracks of authority to operate slot machines should help the racetracks economically to some degree—even if its simultaneous imposition of a tax on slot machine adjusted revenue mean[t] that the law provide[d] less help than [the Racing Association] might like. At least a rational legislator might so believe. And the Constitution grants legislators, not courts, broad authority (within the bounds of rationality) to decide whom they wish to help with their tax laws and how much help those laws ought to provide."[561] "Once one realize[d] that not every provision in a law must share a single objective, one ha[d] no difficulty finding the necessary rational support for the 20 percent/36 percent differential at issue. That difference, harmful to the racetracks, [wa]s helpful to the riverboats, which [we]re also facing financial peril. . . . [A]side from simply aiding the financial position of the riverboats, the legislators [might] have wanted to encourage the economic development of river communities or to promote riverboat history, say, by providing incentives for riverboats to remain in the State, rather than relocate to other States. . . . Alternatively, they [might] have wanted to protect the reliance interests of riverboat operators, whose adjusted slot machine revenue had previously been taxed at the 20 percent rate. All these objectives [we]re rational ones, which lower riverboat tax rates could further and which suffice[d] to uphold the different tax rates."[562]

[K187] "[A] State may not constitutionally favor its own residents by taxing foreign corporations at a higher rate solely because of their residence."[563] In Western & Southern, the Court explicitly held that the Equal Protection Clause imposes limits upon a state's power to condition the right of a foreign corporation to do business within its borders. As the Court stated, "whatever the extent of a State's authority to exclude foreign corporations from doing business within its boundaries, that authority does not justify imposition of more onerous taxes or other burdens on foreign corporations than those imposed on domestic corporations, unless the discrimination between foreign and domestic corporations bears a rational relation to a legitimate state purpose."[564] Western & Southern rejected an equal protection challenge to a California statute imposing a California tax on foreign insurance companies doing business within the state, when the home states of those companies imposed a similar tax on California insurers entering their borders. The Court held that California's purpose in enacting the retaliatory tax—"to promote the interstate business of domestic insurers by deterring other States

---

560 Fitzgerald v. Racing Ass'n of Cent. Iowa, 539 U.S. 103, 108 (2003) (emphasis added).

561 Id. at 108.

562 Id. at 109.

563 Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869, 878 (1985).

564 W. & S. Life Ins. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization of California, 451 U.S. 648, 667–68 (1981).

from enacting discriminatory or excessive taxes"—was a legitimate one. Moreover, the California legislature "rationally could have believed" that the retaliatory tax would promote that purpose.[565] By contrast, Metropolitan Life held that, under the circumstances of this case, encouraging the formation of new domestic insurance companies within Alabama and encouraging capital investment in the state's assets and governmental securities were not, standing alone, legitimate state purposes that could permissibly be furthered by imposing discriminatorily higher taxes on non-resident corporations.[566]

[K188] In Northeast Bancorp, Massachusetts and Connecticut were not favoring local corporations at the expense of out-of-state corporations, but they were favoring out-of-state corporations domiciled within the New England region over out-of-state corporations from other parts of the country. That case involved substantially similar Connecticut and Massachusetts statutes providing that an out-of-state bank holding company with its principal place of business in one of the other New England states could acquire an in-state bank, provided that the other state accorded equivalent reciprocal privileges to the enacting state's banking organizations. The Court held that the statutes in question did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. It found that Connecticut and Massachusetts, in enacting their statutes, had considered that "interstate banking on a regional basis . . . combine[d] the beneficial effect of increasing the number of banking competitors with the need to preserve a close relationship between those in the community who need[ed] credit and those who provid[ed] credit," and that "immediate acquisition of [in-state] banks by holding companies headquartered outside the New England region would threaten the independence of local banking institutions." Noting that "banking and related financial activities are of profound local concern," the Court concluded that these concerns met the traditional rational basis for judging equal protection claims.[567]

[K189] In Allied Stores, a domestic merchandiser challenged, on equal protection grounds, an Ohio statute that exempted foreign corporations from a tax on the value of merchandise held for storage within the state. The Court upheld the tax, finding that the purpose of encouraging foreign companies to build or lease and operate warehouses within Ohio, with the attendant benefits to the state's economy, was a legitimate state purpose.[568]

[K190] "[E]qual treatment for in-state and out-of-state taxpayers similarly situated is the condition precedent for a valid use tax on goods imported from out-of-state."[569] In Williams v. Vermont, the Court invalidated a state's residency restriction on the availability of a sales tax credit for use tax paid to another state. Vermont collected a use tax when cars were registered with it, but the tax was not imposed if the car had been purchased in Vermont and a sales tax had been paid. The tax was also reduced by the amount of any sales or use tax paid to another state if that state would afford a credit for taxes paid to Vermont in similar circumstances. The credit was available, however, only if the registrant was a Vermont resident at the time he had paid the taxes. Moreover, a Vermont

---

565 Id. at 668, 671–72. The Privileges and Immunities Clause (Art. IV, Sect. 2) is inapplicable to corporations. Id. at 656.

566 Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869, 876–83 (1985).

567 Ne. Bancorp, Inc. v. Bd. of Governors, Fed. Reserve Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 177–78 (1985).

568 Allied Stores of Ohio v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 522, 529 (1959).

569 Halliburton Oil Well Co. v. Reily, 373 U.S. 64, 70 (1963).

resident enjoyed a credit for any sales taxes paid to a reciprocating state, even if he had registered and used the car there before registering it in Vermont. The Court decided that no legitimate purpose was furthered by the foregoing discriminatory exemption. "[R]esidence at the time of purchase [wa]s a wholly arbitrary basis on which to distinguish among Vermont registrants—at least among those who [had] used their cars elsewhere before coming to Vermont. . . . The distinction between them b[ore] no relation to the statutory purpose [of raising revenue] . . . for the maintenance and improvement of Vermont roads." The customary rationale for a use tax—relating to "protect[ing] local merchants from out-of-state competition which, because of its lower or nonexistent tax burdens, can offer lower prices"—had "no application to purchases made out-of-state by those who were not residents of the taxing State at the time of purchase." Nor could the distinction be justified by a state policy of making those who used the highways contribute to their maintenance and improvement, for this policy did "not explain the exemption for a resident who [had] bought a car elsewhere and [had] paid a tax to another State, which, . . . [wa]s directly contrary to the user-pays principle." Finally the Court rejected the justification that the exemption was designed to encourage inter-state commerce by enabling Vermont residents, faced with limited automobile offerings at home, to shop outside the state without penalty. The credit might "rationally further Vermont's legitimate interest in facilitating Vermonters' out-of-state purchases, but this interest d[id] not extend to the facilitation of Vermonters' out-of-state use. Vermont [could] choose not to penalize old residents who [had] used their cars in other States, but it [could not] extend that benefit to old residents and deny it to new ones."[570]

5. Welfare Benefits[571]

[K191] "Governmental decisions to spend money to improve the general public welfare in one way and not another are not confided to the courts. The discretion belongs to the legislature unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment."[572] This standard of review is premised on the legislature's "plenary power to define the scope and the duration of the entitlement to . . . benefits, and to increase, to decrease, or to terminate those benefits based on its appraisal of the relative importance of the recipients' needs and the resources available to fund the program."[573] Hence, despite recognition that laws and regulations allocating welfare funds involve "the most basic economic needs of impoverished human beings," the Court has held that, if the relevant classifications have some "reasonable basis," they do not offend the Constitution simply because they are "not made with mathematical nicety or because, in practice, [they] resul[t] in some inequality."[574]

---

[570] Williams v. Vermont, 472 U.S. 14, 23–27 (1985).

[571] See also paras. D12–D16 (durational residency requirements); para. D25 (statute providing that benefits are not to be paid for any month that the recipient spends entirely outside of the United States); paras. K74 et seq., K90 (gender discrimination); paras. K98–K99 (illegitimacy classifications); paras. K106, K108, K113 (alienage classifications).

[572] Bowen v. Owens, 476 U.S. 340, 345 (1986), quoting Mathews v. De Castro, 429 U.S. 181, 185 (1976).

[573] Atkins v. Parker, 472 U.S. 115, 129 (1985).

[574] Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 485 (1970).

[K192] Dandridge involved an equal protection attack upon Maryland's Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program (a federal-state cooperative welfare program) that provided aid in accordance with the family's standard of need, but that limited the maximum grant to $250 per family, regardless of size, thereby reducing the per capita allowance for children of large families. The Court held that the state's maximum grant regulation for welfare recipients did not unconstitutionally discriminate between children in large and small families, finding a solid foundation for the regulation in "the State's legitimate interest in encouraging employment and in avoiding discrimination between welfare families and the families of the working poor." Although "in some AFDC families there [might] be no person who [wa]s employable," and although "with respect to AFDC families whose determined standard of need [wa]s below the regulatory maximum the employment incentive [wa]s absent, the Equal Protection Clause did not require the State to "choose between attacking every aspect of a problem or not attacking the problem at all. . . . It is enough that the State's action be rationally based and free from invidious discrimination."[575]

[K193] In Jefferson v. Hackney, recipients of AFDC challenged the system, whereby Texas, in order to allocate its fixed pool of welfare money among persons with acknowledged need, applied a percentage reduction factor to arrive at a reduced standard of need, the factor being lower for AFDC than for other categorical assistance programs (the AFDC was funded at 75 percent of recognized need, whereas the state paid 100 percent of recognized need to the aged, and 95 percent to the disabled and the blind). The Court found that Texas' decision to provide somewhat lower welfare benefits for AFDC recipients was not invidious or irrational. "Since budgetary constraints d[id] not allow the payment of the full standard of need for all welfare recipients, the State [could] have concluded that the aged and infirm [we]re the least able of the categorical grant recipients to bear the hardships of an inadequate standard of living. While different policy judgments [we]re, of course, possible, it [wa]s not irrational for the State to believe that the young [we]re more adaptable than the sick and elderly, especially because the latter ha[d] less hope of improving their situation in the years remaining to them. Whether or not one agree[d] with this state determination, there [wa]s nothing in the Constitution that forb[ade] it."[576]

[K194] Bowen v. Gilliard involved an amendment to the statute authorizing Federal Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), which required that a family's eligibility for benefits take into account, with certain specified exceptions, the income of all parents, brothers, and sisters living in the same home. There, the Court held that the above requirement did not violate Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection principles, when it was applied to require a family wishing to receive AFDC benefits to [575] Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 486–87 (1970). The Court concluded: "We do not decide today that the [state law] is wise, that it best fulfills the relevant social and economic objectives that [the State] might ideally espouse, or that a more just and humane system could not be devised. Conflicting claims of morality and intelligence are raised by opponents and proponents of almost every measure, certainly including the one before us. But the intractable economic, social, and even philosophical problems presented by public welfare assistance programs are not the business of this Court. . . . The Constitution does not empower this Court to second-guess state officials charged with the difficult responsibility of allocating limited public welfare funds among the myriad of potential recipients." Id. at 487.

---

[576] Jefferson v. Hackney, 406 U.S. 535, 549 (1972).

include, within its unit, a child for whom child support payments were being made by a non-custodial parent. The amendment rationally served both "Congress' goal of decreasing federal expenditures," and "the Government's separate interest in distributing benefits among competing needy families in a fair way." It was also rational for Congress "to adjust the AFDC program to reflect the fact that support money generally provides significant benefits for entire family units. This conclusion [wa]s not undermined by the fact that there [we]re no doubt many families in which some—or perhaps all—of the support money [wa]s spent in a way that d[id] not benefit the rest of the family. In determining how best to allocate limited funds among the extremely large class of needy families eligible for AFDC benefits, Congress [wa]s entitled to rely on a class-wide presumption that custodial parents ha[d] used, and [might] legitimately use, support funds in a way that [wa]s beneficial to entire family units."[577]

[K195] The federal food stamp program was established in 1964 for the twin purposes of promoting the agricultural economy and alleviating hunger and malnutrition among the needy members of "the other America." The program determined eligibility and benefit levels on a "household," rather than an individual, basis. Under this program, needy households, whose members complied with a work requirement, were entitled to purchase enough food stamps to provide those households with nutritionally adequate diets. The challenged provision in Murry was a section of the Food Stamp Act that rendered ineligible for food stamps any household that included a member over 18 years of age who had been claimed as a tax dependent by a taxpayer who was not himself eligible for the stamps. The legislative history suggested that the sole reason for enactment of this section was to prevent the receipt of food stamps by the children of more affluent families. However, "[t]ax dependency in a prior year seem[ed] to have no relation to the 'need' of the dependent in the following year." The Court, thus, held that the tax "deduction taken for the benefit of the parent in a prior year [wa]s not a rational measure of the need of a different household with which the child of the tax deducting parent live[d.]" In addition, the administration of the Act allowed no hearing to show that the tax deduction was irrelevant to the need of the household. For these reasons, the provision violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.[578]

[K196] Moreno held that a statutory definition of "household," which excluded any living group containing an individual unrelated to any other member of the group, did not rationally further the government's interest in preventing fraud or any other legitimate purpose of the food stamp program. First, the Court noted, the Food Stamp Act contained other, independent provisions, aimed specifically at the problems of fraud and of the voluntarily poor. Moreover, in practical operation, the foregoing definition excluded from participation in the food stamp program "not those persons who [we]re likely to abuse the program but, rather, only those persons who [we]re so desperately in need of aid that they [could not] even afford to alter their living arrangements so as to retain their eligibility."[579]

[K197] In Lyng v. Castillo, the Court considered a constitutional challenge to the definition of "household" in the Food Stamp Act, as amended in 1981, which treated parents, siblings, and children who lived together, but not more distant relatives or 577 Bowen v. Gilliard, 483 U.S. 587, 599–600 (1987).

---

578 United States Dep't of Agric. v. Murry, 413 U.S. 508, 513–14 (1973).

579 United States Dep't of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528, 536–38 (1973).

unrelated persons who did so, as a single household for purposes of defining eligibility for food stamps. The disadvantaged class was that comprised by parents, children, and siblings. However, "[c]lose relatives are not a 'suspect' or 'quasi-suspect' class." Nor did "the statutory classification 'directly and substantially' interfere with family living arrangements, and thereby burden a fundamental right." As the Court explained, the challenged definition did "not order or prevent any group of persons from dining together. Indeed, in the overwhelming majority of cases, it probably ha[d] no effect at all. It [wa]s exceedingly unlikely that close relatives would choose to live apart simply to increase their allotment of food stamps, for the costs of separate housing would almost certainly exceed the incremental value of the additional stamps."[580] Judged under the "rational basis" standard of review, the provision did not violate the constitutional guarantee of equal treatment. "As a general matter, the economies of scale that [might] be realized in group purchase and preparation of food surely justified Congress in providing additional food stamp benefits to households that could not achieve such efficiencies. Moreover, the Legislature's recognition of the potential for mistake and fraud and the cost-ineffectiveness of case-by-case verification of claims that individuals ate as separate households unquestionably warrant[ed] the use of general definitions in this area."[581] Further, "Congress could reasonably determine that close relatives sharing a home tend[ed] to purchase and prepare meals together, while distant relatives and unrelated individuals might not be so inclined. In that event, even though close relatives [we]re undoubtedly as honest as other food stamp recipients, the potential for mistaken or misstated claims of separate dining would be greater in the case of close relatives than would be true for those with weaker communal ties, simply because a greater percentage of the former category in fact prepare[d] meals jointly than the comparable percentage in the latter category. The additional fact that close relatives represent[ed] by far the largest proportion of food stamp recipients might well have convinced Congress that limited funds would not permit the accommodation given distant relatives and unrelated persons to be stretched to embrace close relatives as well. Finally, Congress might have reasoned that it would be somewhat easier for close relatives—again, almost by definition—to accommodate their living habits to a federal policy favoring common meal preparation than it would be for more distant relatives or unrelated persons to do so. Because of these differences, . . . Congress could rationally conclude that the two categories merited differential treatment."[582] [K198] In Lyng v. Automobile Workers, the Court rejected an equal protection attack on an amendment to the Food Stamp Act providing that no household could become eligible for benefits while a household member was on strike or receive an increase in the allotment of food stamps it was already receiving because the income of the striking member had decreased. The Court decided that the amendment did not violate the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, since it was "rationally related to the legitimate governmental objective of avoiding undue favoritism to one side or the other in private labor disputes." In addition, the amendment furthered the legitimate purpose of protecting "the fiscal integrity of Government programs, and of the Government as a whole." Congress had already found it necessary to restrict eligibility in the food stamp program and to reduce the amount of deductions that were allowed to recipients. Rather than undertaking further budget cuts in 580 Lyng v. Castillo, 477 U.S. 635, 638 (1986).

---

581 Id. at 640–41.

582 Id. at 642–43.

these or other areas, and in order to avoid favoritism in labor disputes, Congress had determined that it would do better to pass the challenged statute. The Constitution did not permit the Court to disturb that judgment.[583]

[K199] In Hodory, the Court upheld a statute that denied unemployment compensation benefits to workers who were thrown out of work as a result of a labor dispute other than a lockout. The complaining worker there was a non-striking employee of a parent company that had found it necessary to close, because its subsidiary was on strike. The Court held that the statute did not involve any discernible fundamental interest or affect with particularity any protected class, and the test of constitutionality, therefore, was whether the statute had a rational relation to a legitimate state interest. The unemployment compensation statute touched upon more than just the recipient. It provided for the creation of a fund produced by contributions from private employers. The disqualification was triggered by "a labor dispute other than a lockout." In other words, if a union went on strike, the employer's contributions were not increased, but if the employer locked employees out, all his employees thus put out of work were compensated and the employer's contributions accordingly were increased. "Although one might say that this system provide[d] only 'rough justice,' its treatment of the employer [wa]s far from irrational. . . . [And] [t]he rationality of this treatment [wa]s . . . independent of any 'innocence' of the workers collecting compensation."[584]

[K200] Weinberger v. Salfi sustained a nine-month duration-of-relationship eligibility requirement for the wife and stepchildren of a deceased wage earner. The stated purpose of the requirement was to prevent the use of sham marriages to secure Social Security payments. "While it [wa]s possible to debate the wisdom of excluding legitimate claimants in order to discourage sham relationships, and of relying on a rule which [might] not exclude some obviously sham arrangements, [the Court thought] it clear that Congress could rationally choose to adopt such a course. Large numbers of people [we]re eligible for the program, and [we]re potentially subject to inquiry as to the validity of their relationships to wage earners. . . . Not only d[id] the prophylactic approach thus obviate the necessity for large numbers of individualized determinations, but it also protect[ed] large numbers of claimants who satisfy[ied] the rule from the uncertainties and delays of administrative inquiry into the circumstances of their marriages."[585]

[K201] Mathews v. De Castro involved a statutory classification of the Social Security Act, whereby a married woman under 62 whose husband retired or became disabled was granted monthly benefits under the Act if she had a minor or other dependent child in her care, but a divorced woman under 62 whose ex-husband retired or became disabled did not receive such benefits. In concluding that the classification did not deny equal protection, the Court observed: "Divorce, by its nature, works a drastic change in the economic and personal relationship between a husband and wife. . . . Congress could have rationally assumed that divorced husbands and wives depend less on each

---

[583] Lyng v. Auto. Workers, 485 U.S. 360, 371, 373 (1988). The Court also found that the statute did not infringe the individual appellees' right to associate with their families, or the associational rights of the individual appellees and their unions, or the workers' right to express themselves about union matters free of coercion by the government. Id. at 364–69.

[584] Ohio Bureau of Employment Servs. v. Hodory, 431 U.S. 471, 489, 491 (1977).

[585] Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749, 767, 781–82 (1975).

other for financial and other support than do couples who stay married. The problems that a divorced wife may encounter when her former husband becomes old or disabled may well differ in kind and degree from those that a woman married to a retired or disabled husband must face. . . . She may not feel the pinch of the extra expenses accompanying her former husband's old age or disability. . . . It was not irrational for Congress to recognize this basic fact in deciding to defer monthly payments to divorced wives of retired or disabled wage earners until they reach the age of 62."[586]

[K202] Califano v. Boles held that a section of the Social Security Act restricting "mother's insurance benefits" to widows and divorced wives of wage earners did not violate the equal protection component of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment by thus denying such benefits to the mother of an illegitimate child, because she was never married to the wage earner who fathered the child. Such denial bore a rational relation to the government's desire "to limit the category of beneficiaries to those who actually suffer[ed] economic dislocation upon the death of a wage earner and [we]re likely to be confronted at that juncture with the choice between employment or the assumption of full-time child care responsibilities." Congress "could reasonably conclude that a woman who ha[d] never been married to the wage earner [wa]s far less likely to be dependent upon the wage earner at the time of his death. He was never legally required to support her, and therefore was less likely to have been an important source of income. Thus, the possibility of severe economic dislocation upon his death [wa]s more remote." Besides, "the incidental and, to a large degree, speculative impact of the provision at issue on illegitimate children as a class [wa]s not sufficient to treat the denial of 'mother's insurance benefits' to unwed mothers as discrimination against the children." The focus of these benefits was on the economic dilemma of the surviving spouse or former spouse, whereas the needs, as such, of the minor children of the deceased wage earner were addressed through the separate "child's insurance benefits" provided by the Act.[587]

6. Wealth Discrimination[588]

[K203] The Court has "rejected the suggestion that statutes having different effects on the wealthy and the poor should on that account alone be subjected to strict or heightened equal protection scrutiny."589 Financial need alone does not identify a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis.[590]

[K204] In James v. Valtierra, it was contended that a California referendum requirement violated the Fourteenth Amendment, because it imposed a mandatory referendum in the case of an ordinance authorizing low-income housing, while referenda with respect to other types of ordinances had to be initiated by the action of private individuals. The Court rejected the claim. California's entire history demonstrated the repeated use of 586 Mathews v. De Castro, 429 U.S. 181, 188–89 (1976).

---

587 Califano v. Boles, 443 U.S. 282, 289, 296 (1979).

588 See also paras. C62 et seq. (access to courts); paras. F73–F76 (abortion funding); paras. K191 et seq. (welfare benefits); paras. K139 et seq., K152–K153 (voting or candidacy qualifications); paras. D19, K121, K209–K210 (education).

589 See Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Schs., 487 U.S. 450, 458 (1988), citing Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 322–23 (1980); Ortwein v. Schwab, 410 U.S. 656, 660 (1973).

590 See Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 471 (1977).

referenda to give citizens a voice on questions of public policy. Moreover, "an examination of California law reveal[ed] that persons advocating low income housing ha[d] not been singled out for mandatory referenda while no other group [should] face that obstacle." Mandatory referenda were required for approval of state constitutional amendments, for the issuance of general obligation long-term bonds by local governments, and for certain municipal territorial annexations, for amendments on laws first enacted by voter initiative, or for alienation of municipal parks. Finally, the challenged procedure "ensure[d] that all the people of a community [would] have a voice in a decision which [might] lead to large expenditures of local governmental funds for increased public services and to lower tax revenues. It [gave] them a voice in decisions that [would] affect the future development of their own community." This procedure for democratic decisionmaking did not violate the Equal Protection Clause.[591]

[K205] On several occasions, the Court has held that a person's inability to pay money demanded by the state does not justify the total deprivation of a constitutionally or statutorily protected right or interest. The Court first began looking closely at discrimination against the poor in the criminal area. Griffin established the principle that "there can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has."[592] In Griffin, and its progeny,[593] the Court invalidated state laws that prevented an indigent criminal defendant from acquiring a transcript, or an adequate substitute for a transcript, for use at several stages of the trial and appeal process. The payment requirements in each case were found to occasion de facto discrimination against those who, because of their indigency, were totally unable to pay for transcripts. In Douglas v. California, and in Halbert v. Michigan, relying on "that equality demanded by the Fourteenth Amendment," the Court held that denial of counsel to indigents on first appeal amounted to unconstitutional discrimination against the poor.[594]

[K206] In Williams v. Illinois, Williams, convicted of petty theft, received the maximum sentence of one year's imprisonment and a $500 fine. As permitted by Illinois statute, the judgment provided that, if, when the one-year sentence expired, Williams did not immediately pay the fine and court costs, he was to remain in jail a length of time sufficient to satisfy the total debt, calculated at the rate of $5 per day. The Court held that "the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment require[d] that the statutory ceiling placed on imprisonment for any substantive offense be the same for all defendants irrespective of their economic status." Therefore, the Illinois statute, as applied to Williams, who was too poor to pay the fine, violated the Equal Protection Clause. However, at the same time, the Court was careful to observe that "the State is 591 James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137, 141–43 (1971).

---

592 Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 19 (1956).

593 See Eskridge v. Washington Prison Bd., 357 U.S. 214 (1958); Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963); Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367 (1969).

Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226 (1971), involved trials taken place in a small town before the same judge and with the same counsel and court reporter, who was well known to defense counsel and other local lawyers and would have read back his notes to defense counsel before the second trial had he been asked to do so. Since petitioner "had available an informal alternative which appear[ed] to be substantially equivalent to a transcript," the Court concluded that, in the narrow circumstances of this case, a transcript was not needed for petitioner' defense.

594 Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 358 (1963); Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. 605 (2005).

not powerless to enforce judgments against those financially unable to pay a fine; indeed, a different result would amount to inverse discrimination, since it would enable an indigent to avoid both the fine and imprisonment for nonpayment, whereas other defendants must always suffer one or the other conviction."[595]

[K207] Tate v. Short, involved an indigent defendant incarcerated for non-payment of fines imposed for violating traffic ordinances. Under Texas law, traffic offenses were punishable only by fines, not imprisonment. When Tate could not pay $425 in fines imposed for nine traffic convictions, he was jailed pursuant to the provisions of another Texas statute and a municipal ordinance that required him to remain in jail a sufficient time to satisfy the fines, again calculated at the rate of $5 per day. The Court reversed on the authority of Williams v. Illinois, saying: "Since Texas has legislated a 'fines only' policy for traffic offenses, that statutory ceiling cannot, consistently with the Equal Protection Clause, limit the punishment to payment of the fine if one is able to pay it, yet convert the fine into a prison term for an indigent defendant without the means to pay his fine. Imprisonment in such a case is not imposed to further any penal objective of the State. It is imposed to augment the State's revenues, but obviously does not serve that purpose; the defendant cannot pay, because he is indigent, and his imprisonment, rather than aiding collection of the revenue, saddles the State with the cost of feeding and housing him for the period of his imprisonment."[596] The Court also pointed out that there are "other alternatives to which the State may constitutionally resort to serve its valid interest in enforcing payment of fines," such as a procedure for collecting fines through installment plans.[597]

[K208] But criminal procedure has not defined the boundaries within which wealth discriminations have been struck down. Indeed, the Court has scrutinized wealth discrimination in a wide variety of areas. For example, in Shapiro v. Thompson, the Court found that deterring indigents from migrating into a state was not a constitutionally permissible state objective.[598] Turner v. Fouche found that Georgia could not constitutionally require ownership of land as a qualification for membership on a county board of education, since the requirement was not rationally related to any legitimate state interest. As the Court explained, an ability to understand the issues concerning one's community does not depend on ownership of real property, and the lack of ownership does not establish a lack of attachment to the community.[599] In Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, the Court found a state poll tax violative of equal protection because of the burden it placed on the poor's exercise of the franchise.[600] In Bullock v. Carter, it invalidated a state law requiring the payment of prohibitively large filing fees by candidates in primary elections, noting that such a system "falls with unequal weight on voters, as well as candidates, according to their economic status."[601] And Lubin held that, "in the

---

595 Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235, 244 (1970).

596 Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395, 399 (1971).

597 Id. at 399, 400, n.5.

598 Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 633 (1969).

599 See Turner v. Fouche, 396 U.S. 346, 363–64 (1970). See also Quinn v. Millsap, 491 U.S. 95, 107 (1989) ("it is a form of invidious discrimination to require land ownership of all appointees to a body authorized to propose reorganization of local government").

600 Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 668–70 (1966).

601 Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 144 (1972).

absence of reasonable alternative means of ballot access, a State may not, consistent with constitutional standards, require from an indigent candidate filing fees he cannot pay."[602]

7. Education[603]

[K209] "[A] State may 'not . . . reduce expenditures for education by barring [some arbitrarily chosen class of] children from its schools.'"[604] But the undisputed importance of education has not caused the Court to depart, as a matter of principle, from the usual standard for reviewing a state's social and economic legislation. Rodriguez held that education is not a right protected by the Constitution,[605] and that "a State may constitutionally vary the quality of education which it offers its children in accordance with the amount of taxable wealth located in the school districts within which they reside."[606] In that case, the Court upheld against an equal protection challenge Texas' system of financing its public schools, under which almost half of the revenues for funding elementary and secondary schools came from a large state-funded program designed to provide a basic minimal education in every school, while most of the remainder of the funds came from local sources—in particular, local property taxes. Hence, school districts with a low property tax base, from which they could raise only meager funds, offered a lower quality of education to their students than the wealthier districts. In examining the equal protection status of these disparities, the Court declined to apply any heightened scrutiny based either on wealth as a suspect classification or on education as a fundamental right. The majority stressed that the system allegedly discriminated "against a large, diverse, and amorphous class, unified only by the common factor of residence in districts that happen[ed] to have less taxable wealth than other districts," and it did "not operate to the peculiar disadvantage of any suspect class."[607] Nor did the Texas school financing system impermissibly interfere with the exercise of a "fundamental" right or liberty, since education is not within the limited category of rights recognized by the Court as guaranteed by the Constitution. "Even if it were conceded that some identifiable quantum of education is a constitutionally protected prerequisite to the meaningful exercise of [other constitutional rights, there was] no indication that the . . . levels of educational expenditures in Texas provide[d] an education that [fell] short."[608] In light of the above, it was concluded that the state's school financing scheme would be constitutional if it bore "some rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose."[609] Applying this standard, the dual Texas system was deemed reasonably structured to accommodate two separate forces: "the desire by members of society to have educational opportunity for all children, and the desire of each family to provide the

---

602 Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 718 (1974).

603 See also para. D19 (bona fide residency requirements for free primary and secondary schooling); paras. K6, K15, K17, K22–K25, K39–K50 (racial discrimination); paras. K79, K86, K92 (access to higher education and gender discrimination); para. K121 (free schooling for children of illegal aliens).

604 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 229 (1982), quoting Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 633 (1969).

605 San Antonio Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 18–55 (1973).

606 Id. at 70 (Marshall, J. dissenting).

607 Id. at 28.

608 Id. at 36–37.

609 Id. at 44.

best education it [could] afford for its own children. . . . While assuring a basic education for every child in the State, [the system] permit[ted] and encourage[d] a large measure of participation in and control of each district's schools at the local level."[610] In view of this rational basis, the Court concluded that the mere "happenstance" that the quality of education might vary from district to district, because of varying property values within the districts, did not render the system "so irrational as to be invidiously discriminatory." In particular, the Court found that "any scheme of local taxation—indeed the very existence of identifiable local governmental units—requires the establishment of jurisdictional boundaries that are inevitably arbitrary."[611]

[K210] Kadrmas involved a North Dakota statutory scheme, dated back to 1947, under which thinly populated school districts were authorized to "reorganize" themselves into larger districts, so that education could be provided more efficiently, and reorganization plans, which obviously would contemplate an increase in the distance that some children would travel to school, should include provisions for transporting students back and forth from their homes. The details of these provisions might vary from district to district, but once a reorganization plan was adopted, the transportation provisions could be changed only with the approval of the voters. In 1979, the state enacted a statute expressly indicating that non-reorganized school districts could charge a fee for transporting students to school, and that such fees might not exceed the estimated cost to the school district of providing the service. The statute was challenged by the Kadrmas family, which refused to agree to the busing fee. At the outset, the Court remarked that the 1979 statute discriminated against no suspect class and interfered with no fundamental right, noting, inter alia, that the Kadrmas family could find—and, indeed, had found—a private alternative to the public school bus service for which it had to pay a fee. Applying the rational relation test, the Court then held that a state's decision to allow school boards of non-reorganized districts the option of charging patrons a user fee for bus service was constitutionally permissible. "The Constitution does not require that such service be provided at all, and . . . choosing to offer the service [does not] entail a constitutional obligation to offer it for free. . . . [E]ncouraging local school districts to provide bus service is a legitimate state purpose, . . . [and it] is rational for the State to refrain from undermining its objective with . . . a rule . . . requiring that general revenues be used to subsidize an optional service that will benefit a minority of the district's families."[612] Moreover, the challenged distinction between reorganized and non-reorganized school districts did not create an equal protection violation, for it was purposed to encourage school district reorganization and a more effective school system. The legislation provided incentive for the people to approve school district reorganization by alleviating parental concerns regarding the cost of student transportation in the reorganized district.[613] Besides, the requirement that reorganized school districts furnish or pay for transportation for students living far away from school was not imposed directly by statute but rather by the reorganization plans that were statutorily required in the reorganization process. "Thus, the one definitely established difference between reorganized and nonreorganized districts [wa]s this: in the latter, local school boards [could] impose a bus service user fee on their own authority, while the

610 Id. at 49.

611 Id. at 53–54.

612 Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Schs., 487 U.S. 450, 462 (1988).

613 Id. at 463.

direct approval of the voters would be required in reorganized districts. That difference, however, simply reflect[ed] voluntary agreements made during the history of North Dakota's reorganization process, and it could scarcely be thought to make the State's laws arbitrary or irrational."[614] Besides, even assuming, that the state had forbidden reorganized school districts to charge user fees for bus service under any circumstances, it was evident that the legislature "could conceivably have believed that such a policy would serve the legitimate purpose of fulfilling the reasonable expectations of those residing in districts with free busing arrangements imposed by reorganization plans. Because this purpose could have no application to nonreorganized districts, the legislature could just as rationally conclude that those districts should have the option of imposing user fees on those" who would take advantage of the schoolbus service.[615]

K. GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT[616]

[K211] Governmental employment is not a fundamental right for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause.[617] In Harrah, a school board had found that the persistent noncompliance of a teacher with the continuing education requirement incorporated into her employment contract constituted "willful neglect of duty" under a state statute and had refused to renew her contract. Since the teacher had neither asserted nor established the existence of any suspect classification or the deprivation of any fundamental constitutional right, the only inquiry was whether the state's classification was rationally related to the state's objective. The challenged action met this test. "The School Board's concern with the educational qualifications of its teachers [could not,] under any reasoned analysis, be described as impermissible, and [it was not contended] that the Board's continuing-education requirement [bore] no rational relationship to that legitimate governmental concern." Moreover, the sanction of contract non-renewal, imposed uniformly on the "class" of teachers who refused to comply with the continuing education requirement, was quite rationally related to the board's objective of enforcing the continuing education obligation of its teachers.[618]

---

614 Id. at 465.

615 Id. at 465.

616 See also paras. K123–K125 (mandatory retirement age).

617 See Massachusetts Bd. of Ret. v. Murgia, 427 U.S. 307, 313 (1976) (per curiam).

618 Harrah Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Martin, 440 U.S. 194, 199, 201 (1979) (per curiam). That the board, having been deprived by the legislature of the sanction previously employed to enforce the continuing education requirement (denial of salary increases), had substituted in its place another, albeit more onerous, sanction in no way altered the equal protection analysis of the teacher's claim.

New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer, 440 U.S. 568 (1979), involved a policy barring the hiring of methadone users as transit employees. The district court had concluded that employment in non-sensitive jobs could not be denied to methadone users who had progressed satisfactorily with their treatment for one year, and who, when examined individually, satisfied the Transit Authority's employment criteria. The Court rejected this position. First, it pointed out "an employment policy that postpones eligibility until the treatment program has been completed, rather than accepting an intermediate point on an uncertain line, is rational. It is neither unprincipled nor invidious in the sense that it implies disrespect for the excluded subclass." Id. at 591–92. Moreover, even assuming that the challenged policy was broader than necessary to exclude those methadone users who were not actually qualified to work for the Transit Authority, and that it was probably unwise for a large employer like the Transit Authority to rely on a gen-

L. REMEDIAL ISSUES[619]

[K212] "A remedial decree . . . must closely fit the constitutional violation; it must be shaped to place persons unconstitutionally denied an opportunity or advantage in 'the position they would have occupied in the absence of [discrimination.]'"[620] "A proper remedy for an unconstitutional exclusion . . . aims to 'eliminate [so far as possible] the discriminatory effects of the past' and to 'bar like discrimination in the future.'"[621]

[K213] Where a statute is defective because of underinclusion, there exist "two remedial alternatives: [a] court may either declare [the statute] a nullity and order that its benefits not extend to the class that the legislature intended to benefit, or it may extend the coverage of the statute to include those who are aggrieved by the exclusion."[622] In this regard, the legislature's overall purpose is given due consideration.[623] In cases involving "equal protection challenges to underinclusive federal benefits statutes, th[e] Court has suggested that extension, rather than nullification, is the proper course,"[624] mainly because "an injunction suspending the programs' operation would impose hardship on beneficiaries whom Congress plainly meant to protect."[625]

---

eral rule, instead of individualized considerations of every job applicant, such "assumptions concern[ed] matters of personnel policy that d[id] not implicate the principle safeguarded by the Equal Protection Clause. [The challenged classification] served the general objectives of safety and efficiency. . . . Because it d[id] not circumscribe a class of persons characterized by some unpopular trait or affiliation, it d[id] not create or reflect any special likelihood of bias on the part of the ruling majority. Under these circumstances, it [wa]s of no constitutional significance that the degree of rationality [wa]s not as great with respect to certain ill-defined subparts of the classification as it [wa]s with respect to the classification as a whole." Id. at 592–93.

619 See also para. A29 (standing); paras. K40 et seq. (remedying racial segregation); para. K78 (welfare benefits); para. K86 (military education and sex discrimination).

620 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 547 (1996), quoting Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 280 (1977).

621 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 547 (1996), quoting Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145, 154 (1965). In Miller v. Albright, 523 U.S. 420, 452–59 (1998), Justices Scalia and Thomas held that the complaint should be dismissed, because the Court had no power to provide the relief requested: conferral of citizenship on a basis other than that prescribed by Congress. The two Justices noted that, even if the Court "were to agree that the difference in treatment between the illegitimate children of citizen-fathers and citizen-mothers [wa]s unconstitutional, [it] could not, consistent with the extremely limited judicial power in this area, remedy that constitutional infirmity by declaring petitioner to be a citizen or ordering the State Department to approve her application for citizenship." Id. at 454–55.

622 Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728, 738 (1984).

623 Cf. Wengler v. Druggists Mut. Ins. Co., 446 U.S. 142, 153 (1980).

624 See Califano v. Westcott, 443 U.S. 76, 89 (1979), citing Jimenez v. Weinberger, 417 U.S. 628, 637–38 (1974). Indeed, the Court regularly has affirmed district court judgments ordering that welfare benefits be paid to members of an unconstitutionally excluded class. See, e.g., Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977), aff'g 396 F. Supp. 308, 309 (E.D.N.Y. 1975); Califano v. Silbowitz, 430 U.S. 924 (1977), summarily aff'g 397 F. Supp. 862, 871 (S.D. Fla.1975); Jablon v. Califano, 430 U.S. 924 (1977), summarily aff'g 399 F. Supp. 118, 132–33 (D. Md. 1975); Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636 (1975), aff'g 367 F. Supp. 981, 991 (D.N.J. 1973); United States Dep't of Agric. v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528 (1973), aff'g 345 F. Supp. 310, 315–16 (D.D.C. 1972); Richardson v. Griffin, 409 U.S. 1069 (1972), summarily aff'g 346 F. Supp. 1226, 1237 (D. Md. 1972).

625 Califano v. Westcott, 443 U.S. 76, 90 (1979).

M. STATE LAWS AGAINST PRIVATE DISCRIMINATION[626]

[K214] States have the power "to pursue the . . . important goal of ensuring nondiscriminatory access to commercial opportunities in the society."[627] "At common law, innkeepers, smiths, and others who 'made profession of a public employment' were prohibited from refusing, without good reason, to serve a customer."[628] "The duty was a general one and did not specify protection for particular groups. The common law rules, however, proved insufficient in many instances, and it was settled early that the Fourteenth Amendment did not give Congress a general power to prohibit discrimination in public accommodations."[629] In consequence, most states chose to counter discrimination by enacting detailed statutory schemes. State public accommodations laws were originally enacted to prevent discrimination in traditional places of public accommodation—like inns and trains. Over time, the public accommodations laws have expanded to cover places and entities beyond those covered by the common law. Public accommodations laws have also broadened in scope to protect more groups; they have expanded beyond those groups that have been given heightened equal protection scrutiny under the Court's cases. Thus, they set forth a wide variety of traits that cannot be the basis for discrimination, including age, military status, marital status, pregnancy, parenthood, custody of a minor child, political affiliation, physical or mental disability of an individual or of his or her associates, and sexual orientation.[630] "Provisions like these are well within the State's usual power to enact when a legislature has reason to believe that a given group is the target of discrimination, and they do not, as a general matter, violate the First or Fourteenth Amendments."[631]

---

626 See also paras. F20, K48–K50 (racial discrimination in private schools); para. H139 (religious discrimination in private employment); paras. K55–K58, K128 (repeal of anti-discrimination legislation); para. K18 (remedial discrimination).

627 See Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 632 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

628 Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557, 571 (1995).

629 Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 627–28 (1996), citing Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 25 (1883). However, under the Commerce Clause, Congress may regulate economic activity in a clearly defined group of public accommodations that substantially affects inter-state commerce. See, in particular, Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964) (sustaining civil rights laws forbidding discrimination at local motels, and holding that such laws do not violate the Fifth Amendment as being a deprivation of property or liberty without due process of law); Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964) (same for restaurants).

630 See Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 629 (1996).

631 See Hurley v. Irish-Am. Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557, 572 (1995), citing New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 11–16 (1988); Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int'l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 548–49 (1987); Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 624–26 (1984). In those associational freedom cases, after finding a compelling state interest in eradicating discrimination based on sex, race, or other grounds, the Court went on to examine whether or not the application of the state law would impose any "serious burden" on the organization's rights of expressive association, and concluded that it would not. See, in extenso, paras. I438–I440.

By contrast, in Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515 U.S. 557 (1995), the Court held that the application of the Massachusetts public accommodations law to a parade violated the First Amendment rights of the parade organizers. Likewise in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), the Court decided that New Jersey's public [K215] New York State Club Association involved New York City's Human Rights Law that forbade discrimination based on race, creed, sex, and other grounds by any "place of public accommodation, resort or amusement" but specifically exempted "any institution, club or place of accommodation which is in its nature distinctly private." A 1984 amendment provided that any "institution, club or place of accommodation," other than a benevolent order or a religious corporation, "shall not be considered in its nature distinctly private" if it "has more than four hundred members, provides regular meal service and regularly receives payment . . . directly or indirectly from or on behalf of nonmembers for the furtherance of trade or business." A non-profit association, consisting of a consortium of 125 other private New York clubs and associations, attacked on its face, as violative of the Equal Protection Clause, the amendment's exemption deeming benevolent orders and religious corporations to be "distinctly private." However, it was "plausible that these associations differ[ed] in their practices and purposes from other private clubs." And the city council could have reasonably believed that the exempted organizations were different in kind from appellant's members, "at least in the crucial respect of whether business activity [wa]s prevalent among them." In addition, appellant had failed to carry its considerable burden of showing that the foregoing view was erroneous, since there was no evidence that "a detailed examination of the practices, purposes, and structures of the exempted organizations would show them to be identical in this and other critical respects to the private clubs" that were covered under the city's anti-discrimination provisions. Without any such showing, appellant's facial attack on the Law under the Equal Protection Clause should founder.[632] accommodations law, to the extent that required the Boy Scouts to admit a homosexual as a scoutmaster, violated the Boy Scouts' First Amendment right of expressive association. See, in extenso, paras. I245, I441.

[632] New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 16, 18 (1988).

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

The Constitution of the United States was drawn up by the Federal Convention of 1787 to create the system of Federal Government, which began to function in America in 1789. Since then, twenty-seven amendments have been added. The first ten, called the Bill of Rights, were adopted in 1791. The twenty-seventh amendment was ratified in 1992.

PREAMBLE

WE THE PEOPLE of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE ONE

Section 1. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of Impeachment.

Section 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

Section 4. The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 5. Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each house may provide.

Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Neither house, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office.

Section 7. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections to that house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that house, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Section 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

To establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current Coin of the United States;

To establish post-offices and post-roads;

To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;

To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;

To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations;

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;

To provide and maintain a navy;

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful Buildings; and

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Section 9. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

No capitation, or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another: nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince or foreign State.

Section 10. No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection laws: and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE TWO

Section 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President chosen for the same term, be elected, as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not lie an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice-President.

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States, at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services, a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section 2. The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Section 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

Section 4. The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE THREE

Section 1. The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Section 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

Section 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.

ARTICLE FOUR

Section 1. Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

Section 2. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, But shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

Section 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new States shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

ARTICLE FIVE

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of it's equal suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE SIX

All debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE SEVEN

The ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

Done in Convention by the unanimous consent of the States present the seventeenth day of September in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the twelfth, in witness whereof we have hereunto subscribed our Names,

GEO. WASHINGTON—President and deputy from Virginia

New Hampshire
JOHN LANGDON
NICHOLAS GILMAN

Massachusetts
NATHANIEL GORHAM
RUFUS KING

Connecticut
WM SAML JOHNSON
ROGER SHERMAN

New York
ALEXANDER HAMILTON

New Jersey
WIL. LIVINGSTON
DAVID BREARLEY
WM PATERSON
JONA. DAYTON

Pennsylvania
B FRANKLIN
THOMAS MIFFLIN
ROBT MORRIS
GEO CLYMER
THOS FITZSIMONS
JARED INGERSOLL
JAMES WILSON
GOUV. MORRIS

Delaware
GEO READ
GUNNING BEDFORD JUN.
JOHN DICKINSON
RICHARD BASSETT
JACO. BROOM

Maryland
JAMES McHENRY
DAN of ST THO JENIFER
DANL CARROLL

Virginia
JOHN BLAIR
JAMES MADISON JR.

North Carolina
WM BLOUNT
RICHD DOBBS SPAIGHT
HU WILLIAMSON

South Carolina
J. RUTLEDGE
CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY
CHARLES PINCKNEY
PIERCE BUTLER

Georgia
WILLIAM FEW
ABR BALDWIN

Attest
William Jackson

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS, AND RATIFIED BY THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENT ONE (1791)

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

AMENDMENT TWO (1791)

A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

AMENDMENT THREE (1791)

No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

AMENDMENT FOUR (1791)

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT FIVE (1791)

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

AMENDMENT SIX (1791)

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

AMENDMENT SEVEN (1791)

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

AMENDMENT EIGHT (1791)

Excessive bail shall not lie required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

AMENDMENT NINE (1791)

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

AMENDMENT TEN (1791)

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

AMENDMENT ELEVEN (1798)

The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.

AMENDMENT TWELVE (1804)

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

AMENDMENT THIRTEEN (1865)

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT FOURTEEN (1868)

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of Electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

AMENDMENT FIFTEEN (1870)

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this AMENDMENT by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT SIXTEEN (1913)

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

AMENDMENT SEVENTEEN (1913)

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

AMENDMENT EIGHTEEN (1919)

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by Congress.

AMENDMENT NINETEEN (1920)

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any States on account of sex.

The Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of this article.

AMENDMENT TWENTY (1933)

Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice-President shall end at noon on the twentieth day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the third day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Section 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the third day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President-elect shall have died, the Vice-President-elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President-elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice-President-elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice-President shall have qualified.

Section 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice-President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

Section 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

Section 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-ONE (1933)

Section 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

Section 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Section 3. The article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-TWO (1951)

Section 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who May be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Section 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-THREE (1960)

Section 1. The District constituting the seat of government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of President and Vice-President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous State; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the States, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice-President, to be electors appointed by a State; and they shall meet in the district and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-FOUR (1964)

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice-President, for electors for President or Vice-President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-FIVE (1967)

Section 1. In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice-President shall become President.

Section 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice-President, the President shall nominate a Vice-President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

Section 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice-President as Acting President.

Section 4. Whenever the Vice-President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice-President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice-President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four day to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice-President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-SIX (1971)

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT TWENTY-SEVEN (1992)

No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

TABLE OF CASES

(References are to paragraphs.)

SUBJECT MATTER INDEX

(References are to paragraphs)