About the Editor

Jodi O'Brien is the Louis B. Gaffney Professor of Arts and Sciences and chair of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology at Seattle University. Her work focuses on social differences and inequality with an emphasis on gender, race/ethnicity, social class, sexuality, and religion. Her books include Everyday Inequalities (1998), Social Prisms: Reflections on Everyday Myths and Paradoxes (1999), and The Production of Reality (2006). Her most recent articles focus on religion and sexuality and the politics of same-gender marriage. She is currently working on a research project exploring the experiences of transgender inmates in California prisons. She is a founding member and past chair (2001–2002) of the American Sociological Association's Section on Sexualities and recently completed a term as the president of the Pacific Sociological Association (2007–2008).

Introduction

We are continually and inescapably immersed in gender, so much so that we take it for granted without fully realizing its impact on our lives. As gender scholar Judith Lorber once remarked, talking about gender is like fish talking about water. When a child is born, the first question we ask is, "What is it?" We expect that everyone understands that the question is about the baby's gender. When we do pause to consider what gender is and how it affects us, we may be surprised at the extent to which gender is everywhere and influences every aspect of society. For decades, scholars of gender have been documenting and analyzing the various ways in which gender shapes individual lives, cultural beliefs and practices, and social and economic organization. Once they become aware of its significance, students of gender find themselves thinking about everything from why the labels "men" and "women" on public restrooms evoke such a sense of forbidden territory (we don't have similar separation in our homes), to why banks and funding agencies prefer to lend money to women rather than men in developing countries.

The Field

Gender scholarship is based on the premise that gender is one of the primary organizational categories of human social life (other significant and interrelated categories of social organization include economic class, race/ethnicity, age, and nationality). In addition to its importance as the central aspect of personal experience and identity, gender can be studied as a social factor that has tremendous impact on economic, cultural, religious, legal, and political institutions. Gender scholars explore questions ranging from the ways in which individual lives are shaped by gender (our ideas about who we think we can be and what we think we should do) to ways in which social institutions reflect gender patterns (for instance, why are women and men concentrated in different employment sectors, why do men suffer different kinds of disease and depression than women do, and how are women and men affected differently by globalization).

Organization of the Encyclopedia

Gender is so significant in the ways it shapes individuals and societies that it isn't possible to cover every aspect of gender scholarship in a single venue. Our intent with this encyclopedia is to provide users with a "gender lens" on society by focusing on significant gender scholarship within commonly recognized areas of social research. Accordingly, the material in this encyclopedia focuses on basic aspects of social life from the most individual (self and identity) to the most global (transnational economics and politics).

The specific categories covered in the encyclopedia include the following:

- Art, Popular Culture, and Sports
- Associations and Organizations
- Biographies
- Body Image, Health, and Illness
- Crime and Criminal Justice
- Economics, Environment, and Ecology
- Gender Identities and Roles
- International Development and Human Rights
- Politics, Public Policy, and Social Movements
- Race and Ethnicity
- Relationships, Marriage, and the Family
- Religion, Mythology, and Spirituality
- Science, Research, Education, and Technology
- Sexuality and Reproduction

Together, these categories encompass the most commonly understood aspects of social life. Within each category, the user will find new information on well-known subjects, surprising information that may counter common assumptions, and information on areas of study in which the impact of gender has been traditionally overlooked. For example, the entries on Cheerleading and GI Joe provide both a history of these gender stereotypical subjects and a framework that allows the reader to view the subjects in novel ways. The entry on Fetal Rights/Public Fetus describes the ways in which medical technology has broadened our knowledge of fetal development, resulting in an emphasis on fetal personhood and, consequently, a greater involvement of the public in determining fetal rights. The entry on Global Care Chain Work reveals the ways in which women working as nannies from developing countries import love and care to wealthy nations but leave a nurturing gap at home. Contemporary scholarship on topics such as the Death Penalty, Microlending, and Cancer indicates ways in which these areas reflect gender differences that have a significant impact.

We have also included several "framing" essays representing the organizing categories listed earlier. These essays are longer entries that provide an overview of the area and summarize commonly used concepts and directions of research. These framing essays can be used as a basis for reading related topics and understanding how they fit in contemporary gender scholarship.

The material in the encyclopedia reflects the most cutting-edge discussion and scholarship on contemporary issues and debates regarding gender and society. For instance, gender scholars widely accept that the nature-nurture debate is a false dichotomy. The most up-to-date knowledge on gender identities and expression, as well as sexual practices and forms of family organization, indicate that biology, culture, and environment (e.g., diet, medical care, housing, economic stability) are interconnected in complex ways that defy simple explanations. The complexity and nuances of these contemporary frameworks are reflected in many of the entries dealing with topics of sexuality and gender identity.

Gender and society is a complex subject. One of the central contributions of the encyclopedia is the framework of analysis that can be seen when reading across several areas and topics. These frameworks reflect an emerging consensus on both the significance of the various areas covered and increasing sophistication in addressing the complexities of gender in ways that are comprehensible, relevant, and useful. This consensus does not necessarily mean complete agreement on how gender influences self and society, but it does reflect cumulative knowledge among scholars on the necessity of a "gender lens" in understanding human development and social life.

How the Encyclopedia Was Created

The encyclopedia was developed in six steps.

Step 1. We knew from the outset that it would not be possible to provide a comprehensive compendium of all the scholarship on gender and society. Accordingly, we assembled a panel of advisory experts to develop an organizational plan for the encyclopedia. This advisory team consisted of senior gender scholars, all of whom have published several books and articles in the field, edited major journals in the field, held positions of leadership in the gender-related professional organizations of their discipline, and trained at least one generation of graduate students in areas related to gender and society.

Step 2. A planning meeting was convened at Sage and all members of the advisory team attended. During this meeting we articulated the following as a basis for organizing the encyclopedia:

- Provide users with a "gender lens" on significant topics dealing with the individual and society.
- Identify the most commonly recognized aspects of social life to serve as the basis for organizing the selection of topics (this became the Reader's Guide).
- Identify "area experts" for each of the areas of organization.

Step 3. We then contacted the people who had been identified as area experts and asked them to suggest topics that they thought should be included in the list of entries (i.e., the headword list). We also asked them to suggest possible contributors to write the suggested entries. The initial headword list, consisting of approximately 570 anticipated entries, was created through this process. It's noteworthy that during this phase, an initial "buzz" began to develop about the encyclopedia, and we received several helpful emails from people around the world with suggestions for entries that might otherwise have gone overlooked.

Step 4. The advisory team and the area experts compiled lists of first-choice contributors to author the entries, and we began the massive task of contacting these people. The initial rate of acceptance was very high and when authors were unavailable to write the entry themselves, they graciously suggested colleagues with similar training and expertise or volunteered to supervise senior-level graduate students in writing the entry. As a result, we are confident that the entries in this encyclopedia represent the most up-to-date, cutting-edge scholarship in each of the various areas covered. Most contributors are at academic institutions in the United States and the United Kingdom, but several come from other countries.

Creating the headword list and selecting contributors presented considerable challenges in that we wanted to be as comprehensive as possible but do so within the limits of reason given the enormity of our topic. Our method, as reflected in steps 1 through 4, was to make use of the "weak ties" theory of social networks. In other words, we began with an initial team of advisors whose expertise was known to us and then made use of their networks of expertise, thus ensuring a broad reach among scholars working on gender and society around the world. The result is a list of contributors who are sources of the most up-to-date knowledge and training in the field and who share a common understanding of contemporary issues and debates in a way that may be the closest approximation to date of a cumulative, collaborative understanding of gender and society. In short, one of the central contributions of the encyclopedia is the list of contributors and the collective voice reflected here in framing the future of this area of scholarship.

Step 5. Contributors were provided with basic guidelines and instructions for writing their entries. In particular, they were encouraged to write in a manner that was thorough and accurate but nontechnical and accessible to general readers. Throughout each step, some headwords were either dropped or combined because of redundancy.

Step 6. The editor and the associate editors reviewed all entries and requested revisions as necessary to complete the final manuscript.

Acknowledgments

The scope of this project has been immense. Its completion reflects the combined efforts of many people who were instrumental at various stages throughout the process. Rolf Janke and Jerry Westby envisioned the possibility of this encyclopedia and convinced me that it was doable. Their enthusiasm and encouragement has been unwavering. Diana Axelsen is an editor par excellence and her expertise and insights have been invaluable. I owe much to her keen editorial sensibilities. Kate Schroeder (production editor) and Sara Tauber (developmental editor) have been wonderfully helpful and professional in overseeing the final production of the manuscript. The editorial team, including Carla Freeman and Robin Gold (copy editors), Sally Jaskold and Anne Rogers (proofreaders), and Joan Shapiro (indexer) have done an incredible job attending to the myriad details of this project. In working with them, I have been constantly amazed at all the little, but significant, things they suggest to improve the quality of the encyclopedia. Michele Thompson (assistant to the publisher) and Leticia Gutierrez (systems coordinator) have responded to all of my queries and concerns (and there have been many) with grace and efficiency. Many thanks to all of you on the Sage production team.

From the beginning, Judy Howard, Nancy Naples, Peter Nardi, and Mary Romero have been superb colleagues. As advisory editors, they deserve credit for envisioning the working format of the project and assembling the impressive list of contributors represented here. The day-to-day work that has been foundational in completing the project has been handled by the associate editors, Eve Shapiro and Jessica Fields, and the managing editors, Shasti Conrad and Carly Chillmon. This encyclopedia would not have been possible without them. Thanks team!

George Ritzer is to blame for talking me into considering this project in the first place, and the following friends, colleagues, and confidantes have each contributed tremendously through pep talks, brainstorms, and ongoing support: Michele Berger, Margaret Breen, Maria Bullon, Wendy Chapkis, Maggie Chon, Sarah Fenstermaker, Gabriella Gutierrez Muhs, Nalini Iyer, Val Jenness, Peter Kollock, Katerina Liskova, Christopher McAuley, Ken Plummer, Jeanette Rodriguez, Leila Rupp, Beth Schneider, Arlene Stein, Verta Taylor, and Yvette Taylor.

Seattle University supported the project with funding for research and travel. I am grateful to my colleagues there and especially to the students I teach who remind me continuously of the importance of a gender lens for understanding the complex world in which we live.

My parents also deserve a special note of recognition for showing me, perhaps unintentionally, how to navigate the constraints and limitations imposed by gendered expectations. They really believed that their six daughters (and one son) could be and do anything. I can't thank them enough for their ongoing and affirming support.

The information and ideas provided here are inspired by the countless women and men who everyday and throughout history challenge systems of inequality and discrimination. This spirit of education, justice, and humanity is reflected in the energy and dedication of the contributors. It has been an honor to collaborate with them in this endeavor.

Finalmente, mi gratitud profunda para mi compañera hermosa. Gracias por compartir conmigo esta experiencia de vida y siempre inspirarme para seguir hacia el nivel más alto como ser humano.

Eres una nepantlera divina. Contigo y caminando de tu mano.

Jodi O'Brien

ABANTU FOR DEVELOPMENT

ABANTU for Development, established in 1991 in London by African women, is an international non-governmental organization. Abantu means "people" in several African languages, and this aptly named title captures the essence of the organization's people-centric philosophy for participation and involvement to positively effect change. ABANTU's vision statement focuses on recognizing gender discrimination as the key obstacle to sustainable development and social justice.

ABANTU is an African- and gender-focused organization whose desired outcome is to empower African people, especially women, to participate at all levels, be it local, national, regional, or international, in policy making and decision making that ultimately impacts their lives both socially and economically. ABANTU maintains four key areas of focus: gender and poverty, gender and conflict, gender and governance, and gender and ICTs (information and communication technologies). The organization's main goal is to ensure the advancement of women's interests in a way that is equally beneficial to men and women, using three primary modes of exposure.

Training and Capacity Building

Through utilization of adult learning techniques and recognition of learning differences between genders, ABANTU trainers strive to simultaneously educate and solicit participant contribution. Examples of past workshops include 1-day sessions that focus on gender and social change, providing participants with a basic understanding of gender concepts, and HIV/AIDS in the Workplace, a longer, 9-day program that serves to promote nondiscriminatory policy development for the protection and support of HIV-infected workers.

Research, Publication, and Communications

ABANTU provides an assortment of reports and activities derived from its research and publishes a quarterly newsletter. ABANTU News imparts additional tools for empowerment and includes a wide variety of topics, including impact on women's issues during upcoming elections and openly reporting on sexual assault awareness to promoting good health practices.

Advocacy, Public Awareness, and Networking

Seminars, public policy forums, and consultations with policymakers and other women's groups provide content for advocacy campaigns. Various forms of media are enlisted, including ABANTU's own radio program, called Gender Forum.

ABANTU has successfully collaborated with other African and international nongovernmental organizations in various issues concerning gender development, including the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) and the Organization of African Unity (OAU), and is currently the only African non-governmental organization to have gained the United Nations Special Consultative Status with the Economic and Social Commission (ECOSOC). This special status allows ABANTU to attend all United Nations meetings.

ABANTU's main offices are located in the United Kingdom, Kenya, and Tanzania. Additional regional offices include the United Kingdom, covering activities in Europe, and an office in Nairobi, covering activities in East and South Africa. In 1997, an additional regional office opened in Accra, Ghana, to further the focus in West Africa. ABANTU (ROWA) also has a presence in Nigeria.

ABORTION

The term abortion is defined as an induced or spontaneous expulsion of an embryo or fetus from the uterus of a pregnant woman. In the United States, abortion refers to a medical procedure that terminates a pregnancy, while spontaneous abortions are more commonly called miscarriages. This entry explores the procedures and political controversies of abortion and the abortion debate as generally understood in the United States.

In 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court granted women the right to obtain "safe and legal abortions" in the landmark case, Roe v. Wade. A woman's right to abort a pregnancy was designated a right to privacy protected under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Under Roe v. Wade, women may seek legal abortions at any time during the first and second trimester of pregnancy, and in the third trimester (or after a fetus becomes viable) only if the life or health of a woman or fetus is in danger. Thirty-five years after Roe v. Wade, abortion remains a divisive issue in present-day politics and society. Contemporary women's rights advocates often focus energies on the preservation of abortion rights, while politically conservative—and often religious—groups work to hinder access of abortion services available to women. Political parties and government officials commonly run campaigns that include speaking out in support of or in opposition to legal abortion.

The National Abortion Federation estimates that annually, 1.3 million U.S. women terminate their pregnancies through surgical or medical abortion and approximately 35 percent of American women will have an abortion in their lifetimes. The World Health Organization estimates that 50 million abortions are performed globally each year. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reports that about 88 percent of abortions occur during the first trimester and approximately 98 percent of abortions take place in the first half of a woman's pregnancy.

Surgical Abortions

Surgical abortions are the safest and most common type of abortion procedure. Surgical abortions, known to medical professionals as dilation and extraction (D&X) or dilation and evacuation (D&E) abortions, are performed by using a series of dilators to open the cervix and inserting a small tube or curette attached to a vacuum aspirator, which removes the contents of the uterus. Surgical abortions can be performed at any time during a woman's pregnancy. The CDC maintains that surgical abortions are safe and effective medical procedures, safer even than giving birth after carrying a pregnancy to term. They state that "less than one in 100 abortions results in serious complications, and less than one in 100,000 abortions have complications that result in death." Common complications following surgical abortions include infections (typically treated with antibiotics), incomplete abortions or the formation of blood clots requiring follow-up aspiration procedures, and perforation of the uterine wall.

D&X procedures and "intact" D&E procedures performed during the late-second and third trimesters are best known in contemporary culture as partial-birth abortions, a term coined by abortion opponents. Such procedures require a doctor to collapse the head of a fetus before bringing it into the birth canal for aspiration. Though abortion doctors have argued this to be the safest procedure for women undergoing late-second and third trimester abortions, abortion foes maintain that the procedure is inhumane. In 2000, the Supreme Court heard arguments in Stenberg v. Carhart to review a partial-birth abortion ban proposed in Nebraska and found it unconstitutional, as it lacked exceptions for cases in which a woman's health or life was in danger. Despite this, President George W. Bush signed the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban of 2003 without provisions for health exceptions. In 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the updated ban in Gonzales v. Carhart and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., making the procedure illegal in the United States.

Medical Abortions

Medical abortions were approved in the United States by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in September 2000 and are generally known as the abortion pill, or RU-486. The clinical name for a medical abortion is Mifeprex. In medical abortions, women ingest pills containing mifepristone and misoprostol to induce an abortion, resembling a spontaneous miscarriage. Though women must take the pills over a series of days and may be required to make three or more doctor's office visits, many women prefer this less invasive procedure, most of which takes place at home. Medical abortions have been approved by the FDA only through the first 9 weeks of pregnancy. Complications from medical abortions occur in less than 0.5 percent of women, the most common being an incomplete abortion or excessive bleeding, requiring a follow-up surgical aspiration procedure. Other common complications can result in uterine infections and are easily treated with antibiotics.

The Abortion Debate:
Pro-Choice Versus Pro-Life

Pro-choice is a term adopted by supporters of legal abortion, inferring that women should have the right to choose abortion, carry a pregnancy to term, and make other choices regarding their reproductive health. Pro-choice individuals commonly support initiatives to make birth control and safer-sex education and funding available to mass populations to help prevent unplanned pregnancy, thus ultimately lowering the number of necessary abortions. Supporters of abortion also contend that if abortion were outlawed, women would continue to seek illegal abortion services, leading to serious health and fatality risks. In the years before Roe v. Wade, many women died as a result of illegal abortions. The World Health Organization estimates that 68,000 women die annually in regions without access to safe and legal procedures.

Pro-life is a term adopted by those who oppose abortion. Pro-life individuals acknowledge an embryo or fetus as a life developing within a pregnant woman. Many pro-life individuals claim their stance as a moral or religious one and view abortions as murderous acts. They frequently argue that adoption and parenthood are alternatives to abortion that can be chosen to protect the life of an unborn child, and they speak out against birth control and safer-sex education in favor of abstinence-only education by promoting virginity until marriage. They contend that a culture promoting abstinence-only education will decrease the number of sexually active individuals, thus contributing to a decrease of unplanned pregnancies and abortions.

It is important to note that pro-choice and pro-life are propaganda terms that have been successfully utilized to imply a certain message or political stance. Though some pro-choice individuals refer to abortion opponents as "anti-choice" or "anti-woman," abortion opponents claim that women have more choices than abortion, such as adoption or parenthood, and that their concern is for the mental and physical health of women. Similarly, pro-life individuals often claim that supporters of abortion are "anti-life" or "pro-abortion," though most pro-choice advocates argue that they support the right of women to choose among parenthood, abortion, or adoption and are not advocating one over another. Instead, they believe women should make their own health-related decisions.

Limitations on Obtaining Abortions

Though Roe v. Wade granted women legal access to abortion, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed states to place their own various restrictions on abortion services. In 1992, the Supreme Court decided in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey that states may place restrictions on abortion as long as it does not place "undue burdens" on women seeking abortions. The case responded to Pennsylvania's 1989 Abortion Control Act that required women to receive state-issued materials on fetal viability and abortion, submit to a 24-hour waiting period before obtaining abortions, and inform their husbands of their decision to abort, and women under 18 were required to obtain the consent of a parent or guardian unless they acquired a judicial bypass. The Supreme Court found all requirements constitutional except the one that women must inform their husbands of their intent to abort. Since then, a number of states have enacted 24-hour waiting periods, parental consent and notification laws, laws prohibiting escorting minors across state lines, informed consent mandates, imposed restrictions on specific procedures, and other laws to which women and abortion providers must adhere. Abortion opponents often view these restrictions as protections for women who they claim could be harmed physically or psychologically by abortion, whereas abortion supporters find such laws unnecessary, unconstitutional, and impeding women's reproductive freedom.

Abortion and Government Funding

In 1973, after the decision of Roe v. Wade, Senator Jesse Helms introduced the Helms Amendment, prohibiting the U.S. government from funding abortions overseas. This amendment was later named the Mexico City Policy, now known as the Global Gag Rule. The Global Gag Rule, first imposed by President Ronald Reagan in 1984, lifted under President Bill Clinton in 1993, and reestablished by President George W. Bush in 2001, denies research funding and family planning funds to foreign nongovernmental organizations that provide abortion services and abortion counseling (including abortion referrals), even if abortion is legal in that region.

The Global Gag Rule has implications for funding abortion supporters and providers overseas, while the Hyde Amendment, passed by Congress in 1976, bans the provision of federal funds in the United States for "abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered if the fetus were carried to term." Abortion supporters claim the Hyde Amendment violates rights of low-income women utilizing governmental health coverage, as Medicaid recipients are denied federal funds to help pay for abortions they often cannot afford.

Abortion and Violence

Most opponents of abortion do not resort to violence to fight for their cause. Still, many acts of violence have been committed against abortion clinics, doctors, and staff. Since 1973, abortion clinics have faced harassment from picketers, arson and bombings, anthrax threats, and various types of vandalism, including butyric acid attacks. Extreme violence has resulted in shootings and injuries of abortion doctors, police officers, and staff. In 1993, Dr. David Gunn was the first abortion doctor to be shot and murdered by anti-abortion extremists; his death was followed by the murders of Dr. John Bayard Britton in 1994 and Dr. Barnett Slepian in 1998.

After the murder of Dr. Gunn in 1993, coupled with the frequency of anti-abortion protestors forming blockades to prevent abortion providers and patients from entering clinics, Congress passed the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act (FACE). Enacted by President Clinton in 1994, FACE laws protect providers and recipients of abortion services by forbidding the use of "force, threat of force, or physical obstruction" of picketers for people entering abortion clinics.

Conclusion

While abortion remains controversial in political and social circles, most regard abortion and sexual activity as personal and private matters. The above positions are well-known to the general U.S. public, with most claiming to fall somewhere between pro-choice and pro-life, and do not view abortion as a black-and-white issue. Reasoning supporting one's stance often changes based on one's religion, political affiliation, and circumstances of pregnancy. For example, many who claim to be pro-life support the right of incest and rape victims to have abortions. Pro-choice individuals often contend that there should be limitations on the number of abortions a woman can have and the time span after which pregnant women should no longer be able to have abortions, for instance, related to the viability of the fetus, the week when brainwaves or a heartbeat develops, or other aspects.

Regardless of the side on which we stand, most would probably agree that the ultimate goal should be to create a culture in which all pregnancies are wanted and children are provided with a solid quality of life. It is possible that comprehensive sex education (incorporating abstinence, birth control, and safer-sex education) in schools and increased communication between parents and teenagers and men and women can accomplish this goal.

Abzug, Bella (1920–1998)

Bella Abzug was a famous politician and lawyer who battled for the rights of women, working people, and overall civil rights concerns throughout her life. She had a career first as a labor and civil rights activist and peace activist, before being elected in New York 1970 to the U.S. House of Representatives. She was the first Jewish woman elected to Congress, and when she was elected became one of only 12 female members of Congress. By the time of her election, she became known for her fiery support of the underdog and her activist and feminist politics. In addition, she became a symbol of the outspoken feminist, well-known for her raspy voice and her trademark hats. In Congress, she became a strong opponent of the Vietnam War and was an important advocate for civil rights and feminist concerns. In her initial campaign, she used a slogan that became famous: "This woman's place is in the House—the House of Representatives." She served three terms in Congress and left to run in the New York U.S. Senate race in 1976, a campaign in which she lost the Democratic nomination to Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who went on to win the seat. Although she later tried to return to electoral politics, she was unsuccessful in campaigns to become the New York City mayor and two efforts to return to Congress.

She was born as Bella Savitsky in New York City in 1920 to Russian immigrant parents who owned a butcher shop, and she grew up in the Bronx. She graduated from Hunter College and afterward from Columbia Law School in 1947, at a time when only 2 percent of lawyers were women. Her early law career focused on battling for the rights of the underdog. She worked at institutions such as the Civil Rights Congress and the American Civil Liberties Union. She defended victims of Senator Joseph McCarthy in his witch hunt against suspected Communists in the 1950s. She was also the chief consul in the unsuccessful appeal of Willie McGee, a black man from Mississippi who was accused of raping a white woman. She combined a successful professional and personnel life, marrying Martin Abzug in 1944 and having two daughters. She died in 1998.

The major contributions for which Abzug is remembered are to feminism and the women's movement and her antiwar activism and stand against Richard Nixon. She tried but failed at a bill for troop withdrawal, was a leader in trying to force President Nixon to surrender the Pentagon Papers, and was the first congressional member to call for the impeachment of Nixon. Within the women's movement, while many leaders began their political activism in that movement, Abzug came to the movement from many years of involvement in progressive politics. She was seen as able to speak to the needs and concerns of blue-collar women, not just women with high levels of education and professional achievements.

Access to Justice

Access to justice refers to the ability to receive, mobilize for, and be informed about social practices and procedures that reinforce certain ideals of accountability, fairness, equality, civil liberties, and human rights. The concept of justice presumes that there is at least a minimally agreed upon moral and/or legal code that affords the opportunity to seek redress when individuals or groups have been victimized (whether through physical or social hostilities and marginalization). However straightforward this may appear at first glance, the process of defining what is "just," who gets to decide how justice is enacted—formally (e.g., through courts or other state-sanctioned systems of punishment) or informally (e.g., through family responses to a particular event or exclusion from a specific social group)—and how information about systems of justice are disseminated, are complicated and frequently highly contested issues. In relation to gender in particular, definitions of justice and the possibility of monitoring and penalizing unjust practices have been crucial components of addressing concerns such as sex discrimination in national and international legal frameworks, gender-related violence, gender-related stereotyping (e.g., in education and discussions around "appropriate" careers for women versus men), and gender inequalities in general.

To examine these issues in greater depth, the following discussion draws on a range of brief case studies, including concepts of justice; the accessibility of justice in relation to gender; marital rape; and activism addressing aspects of gender inequalities, civil liberties, and human rights. These examples highlight the varied ways in which access to justice has been, and continues to be, tied to a diversity of social contexts in which gender relations play a key role.

Concepts of Justice

As suggested at the outset, the concept of justice encompasses various social and political perspectives, some of which reflect competing notions of acceptable behavior and suitable punishments for practices that are viewed as immoral, unacceptable, and/or illegal. Moral judgments and public discussions about what is considered right or wrong may be informed by cultural, religious, spiritual, and political beliefs and can be enforced through various institutions, policies, and discourses (commonly agreed upon ways of speaking and representing ideas)—for example, church-sanctioned policies, state laws, neighborhood gossip, and gang codes of honor. Ideas of what constitutes just practices and how these are defined are dynamic; they are reflective of and also influence the geographical and historical contexts of which they are a part. Indeed, an issue of contention in debates about establishing systems of justice has been the issue of the "naturalness" of the concept and to what extent concepts of justice can be revised and enforced. For some, justice is seen as part of a natural order that is grounded in a relatively strict set of beliefs—which may be the case in certain religious and political traditions, for example—and as such it is sometimes viewed as a concept that is less open to negotiation. For others, justice is seen as being representative and adaptable to a combination of individual and collective goals that are guided by changing secular values and needs.

Although frequently represented otherwise, neither of the aforementioned understandings of justice is neutral in their construction and implementation: Religious tenets are interwoven with changing political and economic contexts even if these human-based activities are minimized in broader discussions of spirituality; and state-run legislative systems and judicial processes are often reflective of attitudes held by dominant social groups. In other words, regardless of the specific concept or system of enforcement, the cornerstones of justice are decision making (what form and application justice takes) and power (who is afforded the privilege of making decisions determining the goals and implementation of justice), both partial (to varying degrees) and often controversial, as the following examples below highlight.

Gender and Accessing Justice

Historically and in the contemporary context, gender roles and relations have been key factors utilized in the determination of who has the power to define and enact justice, as well as the manner in which it has been put into practice. While gender may not be referred to explicitly in judicial decisions, closer scrutiny of popular discussions of justice and specific case studies of decision-making procedures and punishments frequently reveal deep-seated assumptions that produce differential representations and experiences of justice for women, men, and children of different social identities and backgrounds (as can be seen in the disproportionate presence of economically deprived and socially marginalized youths and adults in the U.S. justice system). Given the presence of patriarchal relationships—where males are granted greater power and status than females—in numerous locations around the world, women in particular have felt the brunt of, and have sought to challenge, their marginalization and underrepresentation in popular conceptions and practices of justice.

In the same way that feminist scholars and social activists have argued that gender roles—behaviors and practices differentially assigned to women and men—are socially constructed (i.e., they are not biologically determined, but are produced through social practices and discourses), researchers and social advocates have attempted to highlight the ways in which many dominant notions of justice reflect gender inequalities and sexist attitudes about fairness, accountability, and crime. For example, up until 1976, no states in the United States categorized rape in marriage (also known as spousal rape) as a criminal offense. Now it is considered a crime throughout the United States, but some states differentiate rape by spouses from rape by strangers (with the latter being seen as the more serious offense and the former being minimized in certain instances due to the existence of legal exemptions). In addition, while several countries now have legislation outlawing spousal rape and the United Nations General Assembly categorizes the act as a crime under international law, there are still many states that do not recognize this view. These legislative guidelines for addressing sexual assault within marriage are significant in that the majority of victims are women and the legal codes have been shaped by social attitudes that have historically stated that once married, women relinquish the right to refuse consent to sexual intercourse.

Because of the trauma and stigma associated with rape in general—and spousal rape in particular—combined with the complexity of the related legal processes, it has proven to be extremely difficult for rape survivors to file charges or to ultimately successfully achieve a conviction against their attackers. The historical notion (embedded in many religious guidelines, for example) that not only a woman's monetary assets but also her physical being becomes a shared "property" between the woman and her spouse has meant that until recent decades, the possibility of receiving some form of legal recourse and social support has been extremely difficult. This is an example in which access to justice has been central but also remote: Unofficially, women may find themselves shunned by family members or local communities if they pursue a charge of spousal rape, while officially, women may be intimidated by the lengthy and complicated judicial system that reduces charges against spouses and in which female judges and legislators are often underrepresented. Attitudes surrounding privacy and the body—in this case in association with sexual relations and violence toward a spouse—are publicly monitored in ways that, ironically, work against the ability to receive public protection and accountability and instead largely remain the concern and struggle of the individuals immediately involved.

From the previous example, it can be noted that access to justice cuts across a range of scales: from the body, to the household, neighborhood, city, nation, and international arenas. These different levels of conceptualization and implementation are rarely discrete and frequently intersect in ongoing debates about how justice can be realized and what impacts are produced in different contexts. Another useful example of the multiscalar nature of justice is that of sex work, where the public policing of sexuality, female and male bodies, paid-for sex practices, workers unions, the built environment, and city and national policies focusing on prostitution and economic activity intersect to produce lengthy discussions about the commodification of sexuality, the legality of sex work, appropriate legal and social support networks for sex workers, discriminatory practices against sex workers, and urban planning and policing programs.

Political Activism, Space, and Justice

While the accessibility of justice is challenging for many social groups (particularly low-income women and men, ethnic and sexual minorities, and children), several individuals and organizations have galvanized around the concept and successfully worked toward creating more inclusive systems of accountability and representation. This activism has involved addressing accessibility in terms of (a) physically being able to seek redress in cases of inequity (e.g., being able to attend court hearings, having community advocacy groups based in local neighborhoods or easily accessible locations); (b) improved availability and dissemination of information related to justice (e.g., having materials related to human rights and legal processes clearly written and available in libraries, public offices, and online and the availability of affordable legal advice); and (c) increased social awareness, a broadening of what justice means, and context-sensitive policies (e.g., public campaigns about relevant issues in local and national media and schools).

This activism has come in several forms: For some, it has involved reformulating practices of justice from more punitive processes in which retribution for unjust actions is integral toward processes of reconciliation through which perpetrators of crimes and socially exclusionary practices publicly recognize and accept responsibility for their actions at village, city, national, and international gatherings (as can be seen in recent truth and reconciliation hearings addressing past events; e.g., widespread political imprisonments, assault, murder, and rape during the apartheid regime in South Africa; ethnic conflicts in Rwanda in the 1990s; and in relation to the last 40 years of the civil conflict in Colombia). For others, this reconceptualization has involved redefining concepts of citizenship to be more socially inclusive in terms of gender, sexuality, race, nationality, and age (e.g., antislavery and emancipation campaigns, early 20th century campaigns for a woman's right to vote in the suffragette movements of the United Kingdom and United States, lesbian and gay rights movements challenging homophobia and sexist legislation, civil rights campaigns, antiracist advocacy organizations and Black nationalism during the 1960s, and current [and past] opposition to anti-immigrant legislation and discriminatory treatment of migrants in a range of international setting.

Finally, broader issues of human rights—from the local to the international levels—have been challenged by community organizations highlighting the intersections of personal, emotional, economic, and political impacts of discrimination, violence, and unaccountability, as can be seen in the long-standing marches of remembrance held by the Madres de (Mothers of the) Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires. This group has been protesting against, and seeking state redress for, the disappearance of relatives—particularly daughters and sons—during Argentina's "Dirty War" (1976–1983). Wearing white head scarves (symbolizing peace) and holding regular weekly walks around the Plaza de Mayo, this diverse collective has highlighted how the more abstract concept of justice can be located and challenged in specific sites. By focusing their calls for justice through a range of legislative and protest activities, the Madres de Plaza de Mayo have very effectively highlighted the connections between place, emotions, media representations, and national politics to illustrate the complex and challenging roles that justice—and the ability to access it—plays.

ACTIVO/PASSIVO SEX ROLES

Activo/passivo sex roles, or active/passive sex roles, describes a gender-stratified form of male homosexual behavior common throughout Latin America. Rooted in expectations of appropriate gender behavior for males and females in general, the activo/passivo model of homosexuality defines one's sexuality according to the gender demeanor of participants in homosexual sex, which is understood as complementary to and coinciding with the sexual role taken. Activo and passivo sex roles closely mirror the dominant construction of normative sex roles for men and women within the context of heterosexual relations, which presumes male dominance and female submission.

Activo/passivo sex roles are understood as somehow reflective of "natural" or inborn differences between "normal" men and women and between "normal" men and homosexual men. According to this construction of homosexuality, "normal" men are masculine and take the active role sexually, while homosexual men, much like heterosexual women, are effeminate and take the passive role sexually. In terms of homosexual sex, activos penetrate passivos during anal sex, and passivos perform oral sex on activos.

Since these sex roles are understood to be reflective of natural differences between the sexes as evidenced by gender demeanor, they are thought to be both permanent throughout one's life and mutually exclusive. That is, activos are understood to always take the active role sexually and never the passive role, while conversely, passivos are understood to always take the passive role sexually and never the active role. Thus, within this model, the possibility of role switching with the same partner does not exist, nor does the possibility of playing different sexual roles with different partners.

According to this model, only the passive sexual partner considers himself or is considered by society at large as homosexual, since he is the one who enacts feminine behavior and is the one whose sexual role deviates from the normative male sex role. Conversely, the active partner's sexual identity is considered "normal," since his behavior does not deviate from expectations of masculinity as the penetrator in sexual relations. Further, it is expected that the activo partner will also engage in heterosexual sex with females, since his sexuality is understood as flowing from his gender, which is presumably normative and masculine.

The activo/passivo model of homosexuality has been the dominant form of homosexuality in many different societies at various time periods. In the contemporary moment, the activo/passivo framework coexists along with an object-choice model of homosexuality—which defines one's sexuality according to the biological sex of sexual partners, not their gender—in several cultures throughout the world, including many Latin American, Caribbean, Asian, African, and Mediterranean societies.

ACT UP

The AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP), an organization committed to using civil disobedience, direct action, and other forms of confrontational protest to fight the AIDS crisis, emerged out of the lesbian and gay community in New York City in March 1987. ACT UP chapters and affiliated groups across the country soon formed a locally autonomous but nationally networked street AIDS activist movement. Using dramatic tactics, including street protests, die-ins, office takeovers, disruptions, and guerrilla theater, ACT UP targeted all levels of government, the scientific-medical establishment, the insurance and pharmaceutical industries, the media, the Catholic Church, and other institutions seen as hindering the fight against AIDS. ACT UP was also famous for its visually striking graphics—such as the "SILENCE = DEATH" emblem—and for its sex-radical, queer-positive sexual politics. In addition to its many significant AIDS-related victories, ACT UP inaugurated a new queer era in which anger, defiant street activism, and sex-radical politics became normative and valued among lesbians, gay men, and other sexual and gender minorities, many of whom began identifying as "queer."

Early AIDS Activism

From the beginning of what soon became known as the AIDS epidemic, lesbian and gay communities responded to the crisis, establishing means for caretaking and providing much-needed services to people with HIV/AIDS. In contrast, the federal government's response to the crisis was close to nonexistent in those early years, in large part because the onset of the AIDS epidemic in 1981 coincided with the start of the Reagan administration. President Ronald Reagan, ideologically committed to shrinking government and indebted to the religious right who had helped to elect him, did not mention the word AIDS in public until 1985, 4 years and 10,000 deaths into the epidemic, and then only in response to a reporter's question. Reagan did not give a policy speech on AIDS until 1987, at which point he advocated a punitive, mandatory HIV testing policy. Paralleling Reagan's near silence, his administration did almost nothing to deal with the exploding epidemic. Indeed, the chairman and vice-chairman of the Reagan-appointed commission on AIDS (formed in June 1987) resigned in October 1987, citing lack of support from the White House. Meanwhile, right-wing politicians and pundits used AIDS to build a grassroots base and to solicit donations, citing the epidemic as proof that homosexuality was abnormal and sinful. In this hostile context, the political work of caretaking and service provision was vital.

The Shift to Confrontational Street AIDS Activism

By the mid-1980s, the government's continuing failure to address the AIDS crisis and widespread homophobic hysteria about AIDS in the media were generating anger and frustration among growing numbers of lesbians and gay men. A few AIDS activists began to try more confrontational tactics. In late 1985, two gay men with AIDS chained themselves to San Francisco's old Federal Office Building to protest the government's failure to respond to the crisis and to demand an increase in federal AIDS funding; their action marked the beginning of the San Francisco AIDS/ARC Vigil. Around the same time in New York, activists formed an organization that eventually became the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation (GLAAD). In December 1985, 800 people joined GLAAD in a demonstration that targeted the New York Post for its sensationalized AIDS coverage. This more oppositional activism was not yet widespread, but its occurrence indicated the beginnings of a shifting emotional and political climate within lesbian and gay communities with regard to AIDS. The U.S. Supreme Court's Bowers v. Hardwick (1986) decision upholding Georgia's antisodomy statute marked a turning point in the history of AIDS activism. Occurring in the context of government negligence regarding the AIDS crisis, growing calls for quarantine of people with AIDS, and ever-increasing deaths, the ruling spurred a more dramatic and far-reaching turn toward angry, defiant activism, fueling the emergence of ACT UP.

Street AIDS activist groups that formed in the wake of the Hardwick decision (prior to ACT UP) included Citizens for Medical Justice (CMJ), a San Francisco–based group of lesbians and gay men whose first action was to take over California Governor George Deukmejian's office to protest his AIDS policies; the Lavender Hill Mob, a New York lesbian and gay direct action group that focused much of its activism on the AIDS crisis; and the Silence = Death Project, a group of gay activist artists who designed the famous "SILENCE = DEATH" poster and wheatpasted them across lower Manhattan, encouraging lesbians and gay men to "turn anger, fear, and grief into action." These last two groups helped to found ACT UP/NY in March 1987.

Acting Up

ACT UP/NY burst onto the public scene 2 weeks after its founding, with a protest on Wall Street that targeted the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) sluggish drug approval process as well as the profiteering of pharmaceutical companies. Protesters tied up traffic for hours, and 17 were arrested. As a national movement with chapters in over 80 cities and towns across the United States, ACT UP focused on numerous issues and engaged in hundreds of protest actions, including a daylong shutdown of the FDA to demand an expedited drug approval process; a national demonstration in Chicago that focused on the failings of the public health system and demanded national health insurance; a storming of the National Institutes of Health to demand more AIDS research and the inclusion of women and people of color in clinical trials; demonstrations at the Centers for Disease Control to demand that the organization define AIDS to include the infections commonly affecting HIV-positive women and poor people; numerous political funerals; and many other actions focused on issues like safe-sex education, needle exchange programs, housing for people with AIDS, holistic and alternative treatments, increased AIDS funding, safe-sex information and AIDS drugs for prisoners, social security benefits, media coverage of AIDS, and AIDS drug prices.

Driven by a sense of urgency, ACT UP embraced a model of activism that, rather than demanding ideological unity among all members and chapters, undertook any tactical battle that might help save lives. Committed to democratic practices, ACT UP had a structure of caucuses and committees that maximized input from everyone involved. The movement's adoption of an affinity group model also advanced ACT UP's democratic character. Groups of people who wanted to engage in civil disobedience or direct action together organized themselves into groups that typically were nonhierarchical in nature and operated relatively autonomously from the larger group. This cellular structure engendered creative, exciting, and mediagenic demonstrations. More than that, because affinity groups had great latitude in designing actions and projecting messages, that structure allowed for difference within the movement—in terms of priorities, tactics, and demeanor, for example. Different caucuses and committees within ACT UP initiated many of ACT UP's actions: caucuses of people of color, women, and people with immune system disorders (PISD) and committees like New York's Treatment and Data Committee (which focused on AIDS drugs) and Majority Action Committee (which focused on AIDS issues of concern to people of color).

ACT UP meetings were emotionally intense, filled with heady political discussions about issues with life-and-death stakes. The atmosphere was also erotically charged and frequently playful and fun as well, brimming with flirtation, sexiness, socializing, and campy humor. ACT UP was a space in which people could express their outrage about the AIDS crisis, engage in defiant street activism to fight AIDS, become queer and reclaim queer sexuality, connect with like-minded others, and gain a sense of belonging. Also, it allowed individuals to engage in projects of world making that both challenged the institutions that had allowed AIDS to become a crisis and offered alternative ways of living that drew attention to queer liberation and broader social transformation in society.

ACT UP was a strikingly successful movement. Its victories included forcing the FDA to expedite the drug approval process and to expand access to experimental drugs, obtaining increased government AIDS funding, preventing the passage of many repressive legislative measures, forcing pharmaceutical companies to lower AIDS drug prices, forcing the CDC to expand the definition of AIDS to include infections and diseases commonly occurring in HIV-infected women, and successfully arguing that people with AIDS should be consulted about and their expertise inform AIDS drug trial designs.

The Decline of ACT UP

Although a few individual chapters persisted, ACT UP declined as a national movement in the mid-1990s—before the arrival of a new generation of anti-HIV drugs called protease inhibitors that have prolonged the lives of many people with AIDS in the United States. Reasons for ACT UP's decline are multiple, but three of the most important were (1) heightened conflicts and declining feelings of solidarity within ACT UP; (2) a growing despair within ACT UP due to the accumulated losses, the continuing deaths, the lack of effective treatments, and the sense that, victories notwithstanding, ACT UP would not be able to stop AIDS; and (3) political and cultural openings within dominant society that led to waning support for ACT UP from the broader mainstream lesbian and gay community.

ACT UP's legacy persists in that groups like Housing Works and Treatment Action Group (TAG) that grew out of ACT UP continue to do important AIDS work. ACT UP has also been credited with inspiring and helping to shape other movements, including the breast cancer and global justice movements. As well, ACT UP's confrontational style and sex-positive politics persisted as historical memories that informed the next generation of activists fighting for queer and transgender liberation, even in the face of the larger mainstreaming of the lesbian and gay movement.

ADDAMS, JANE (1860–1935)

Feminist pragmatist, social settlement leader, and Nobel laureate, Jane Addams was a charismatic world leader with an innovative intellectual and political legacy. She is one of the most important women in American history. From 1890 to 1935, she led dozens of women in sociology, although after 1920, most of these women were forced out of sociology and into other fields, especially social work.

Addams was born on September 6, 1860, in Cedarville, Illinois. She was profoundly influenced by her father, John Addams, a Hicksite Quaker and state senator, but her mother, Sarah Weber, died when Addams was 2 years old. In 1877, Addams entered Rockford Female Seminary, in Rockford, Illinois. Graduating in 1881, she entered the Women's Medical College in Philadelphia, but she fell ill and returned home. In 1883, she traveled to Europe but remained frustrated until she returned in 1887 with her college friend Ellen Gates Starr. After visiting the social settlement Toynbee Hall in London, they found a direction for their lives, and in 1889, they cofounded their social settlement, Hull House, in Chicago.

Addams became a significant figure in an international social movement organized to bring together all classes; social groups; ages, especially the young and the elderly; and the oppressed to form a democratic community of individuals able to articulate and enact their ideals and needs. She powerfully described life in Twenty Years at Hull House (1910) and The Second Twenty Years at Hull House (1930). Hull House residents published a groundbreaking sociological text, Hull House Maps and Papers in 1895, predating and establishing the interests of Chicago sociologists, especially in urban sociology.

Addams's combined thought and practice is called feminist pragmatism: an American theory uniting liberal values and a belief in a rational public with a cooperative, nurturing, and liberating model of the self, the other, and the community. In this view, education and democracy are significant mechanisms to organize and improve society, to learn about one's community, participate in group decisions, and become a "citizen." Women in public life utilize their cooperative worldview to implement democracy. The female world is based on the unity of the female self, the home, the family, and face-to-face interactions with neighbors. Women can lead a new "social consciousness" organized through "social movements in labor, social science, and women," usually in the modern city. Because women are not full members of the male world, they can, ideally, "challenge war, disturb conventions, integrate industry, react to life, and transform the past." The modern woman's family claim is built on a "consumer role" that should critique and change industry. These concepts were discussed in several books, including Democracy and Social Ethics (1902), Newer Ideals of Peace (1907), The Spirit of Youth and the City Streets (1909), A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil (1912), The Long Road of Woman's Memory (1916), and Peace and Bread in Time of War (1922). Addams's ideas were implemented through social organizing, protests, and legislation, resulting in the feminist pragmatist state.

After World War I started in Europe in 1914, Addams publicly chose nonviolence over other values and was publicly shunned. The culmination of her ostracism occurred in 1919, when she was targeted by the U.S. government as the most dangerous person in America.

Addams gradually resumed her pubic leadership and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1931. She spoke for many values and policies adopted during the New Deal, especially Social Security and other government programs that altered American capitalism. Upon her death in 1935, she was mourned worldwide as a great leader and interpreter of American thought.

ADULTERY

Adultery, also commonly referred to as infidelity, or "cheating," traditionally involves a person willingly engaging in sexual physical activity with a person other than one's spouse or committed relationship partner. The concept of infidelity has been broadened to include emotional behaviors (i.e., activities that are nonphysical and not overtly sexual). Such behaviors typically involve establishing an emotional connection, falling in love, or extensive self-disclosure with a person other than one's spouse. More recently, online forms of communication, such as chat rooms, instant messaging, and e-mail, have provided new ways to pursue outside relationships that may constitute adultery.

Prevalence

Research on the prevalence of adultery has focused almost exclusively on the rate at which people engage in sexual behavior outside of the primary relationship. Estimates vary from study to study, but the general finding is that approximately 20 percent of women (about 1 in 5) and approximately 30 percent of men (about 1 in 3) have committed sexual infidelity. While the exact rates of infidelity vary, studies consistently show that men report a greater rate of sexual infidelity than do women. However, due to the socialization of men and women, men may be prone to overreport their rates of infidelity (or at least report the actions accurately) in order to appear macho, while women may be prone to underreport their actions in order to appear chaste. Regardless, adultery violates the norm of sexual exclusivity. As a result, it is widely disapproved of in American society and is the most commonly cited reason for divorce in over 150 cultures.

Predictors

Despite strong societal disapproval, people may commit adultery due to social, relationship, situational, and individual factors. At the social level, a study by Judith Treas and Deirdre Giesen in 2000 found that those with less religious involvement and a higher acceptance of cohabitation as an alternative to marriage were more likely to commit adultery. The study also found that at the relationship level, those who were unhappy with their marriages were more likely to commit adultery. Unhappiness in the relationship may result from any number of factors, such as emotional or sexual incompatibility or boredom. Thus, if the primary relationship is not able to fulfill one's needs for excitement or general affection, adultery is more likely. It is unclear, however, whether adultery is the result of a floundering primary relationship heading toward divorce or whether adultery leads a stable relationship toward divorce. Denise Prevati and Paul Amato in 2004 examined data from couples over 17 years as part of a longitudinal design to determine whether adultery was the result of a poor relationship or led to a poor relationship. Their analysis suggested that happiness by itself did not predict adultery but that those who felt divorce was likely were more likely to commit adultery. Further, adultery also decreased existing relationship satisfaction and increased perceived likelihood of divorce. These processes were similar for men and women.

Situational factors may also lead to adultery. On a more malicious level, a person may engage in adultery out of anger or as a means of retribution for the partner's bad behavior or for the emotional pain the partner has caused. While this is a possibility, adultery is also the result of comparatively innocent processes, such as when an attractive person notices or comments on another person in a flattering way. This situation has the potential to lead to thoughts of adultery among people in the most stable, happy, and successful relationships. Similarly, adultery may result from falling in love with another person. For example, this can occur in the context of a long-term friendship or acquaintance that has evolved into something more substantial for situational reasons (perhaps the dissolution of the other person's relationship). Alternately, a person may fall in love suddenly with a new person. In any of these cases, it may not be that adultery is purely the result of flattery or falling in love, but instead could be the result of one's own desire to end the primary relationship. Thus, due to the widespread disapproval of adultery, engaging in such behavior could be used as a way to expeditiously end a relationship that encourages one's partner to take the initiative to ultimately end the relationship.

Finally, at the individual level, several differences have emerged as predictors of infidelity. One notable line of research by Jeff Simpson and Steve Gangestad in 1991 focused on how comfortable a person was with "casual sex," also referred to as sociosexuality. Their findings revealed that those with unrestricted sociosexuality who need less closeness and commitment before engaging in sexual behavior were more likely to commit infidelity. Further, men tend to be more unrestricted in their sociosexuality than women and perhaps as a result have higher rates of adultery. Research also shows that women tend to commit adultery due to dissatisfaction in their relationships whereas men commit adultery regardless of their satisfaction level. Adultery also differs by gender depending on relationship length. Women tend to commit less adultery as the length of their marriage increases. However, men show a U-shaped pattern, such that their adultery rates are higher early and later in marriage but are lower in the middle.

Conclusion

Adultery most commonly involves sexual behavior outside the primary relationship and has been found to occur at different rates. However, men are consistently shown to engage in adultery at higher rates than women. The reasons for adultery include variables at the social, relationship, situational, and individual levels. Regardless of the reasons, adultery still remains a socially unacceptable behavior.

Advertising, Gender Images in

It is estimated that the average American is exposed to over 40,000 television commercials per year. When the even larger amount of print advertisements are considered, it is easy to understand why so many scholars of gender and media studies are concerned about the omnipresent effect of media advertisements on gender stereotyping. Because of the limited amount of time allocated to television commercials and the short attention span of the audience, advertisers often rely on highly visual and easily recognizable images and situations to promote their products and services. Often, these messages contain gender, class, and racial stereotypes that reinforce social perceptions of already marginalized groups by the use of widely held inaccurate and overly simplified images and conceptions.

Social learning theory best explains the impact of advertisements on audiences and suggests that audiences are more likely to identify with an advertisement's preferred meaning and persuaded to purchase a product or service if the narrative is easily recognizable and often repeated. Gender portrayals in mainstream advertisements therefore tend to reflect hegemonic, unquestioned gender roles that are easily recognizable and widely accepted in society. While stereotypical gender portrayals may help advertisers to sell products, such portrayals also negatively influence self-perceptions of audiences. In fact, media effects theories often see a correlation between exposure to gender stereotypes in advertising and female levels of self-consciousness and social anxiety.

How do media messages influence people's self-perceptions? Direct effects media scholars suggest that people copy and adjust their behaviors and thinking according to the volume and content of media messages they encounter on a daily basis. Therefore, for instance, if mass media systematically portray men as physically and emotionally aggressive, audiences may begin to believe that such dominant behavior is gender appropriate. This problem becomes more acute with audience members whose access to information is limited to these advertisement sources. Media critics, however, have noted that direct effects models are rather one-dimensional, discounting various manners and social contexts in which audiences watch and interpret media messages. Direct effects models, they argue, tend to ignore the transforming effects of individuals' agency or institutionalized social inequalities on message-decoding processes. Media effects, then, are not embedded in the messages themselves or even in the medium through which these are spread, but rather in what audiences do with these messages. The ways in which individuals interpret the ideologies embedded in advertisements depends on the social and physical environments in which these are viewed. This interpretation also depends on personal characteristics and social identifications of the audience, as well as the social networks in which the ideologies are discussed.

Whether one believes in direct or indirect media effects, concerns about the effects of sexist media portrayals on self-perceptions of audiences are grounded in the belief that people use media messages and information to construct their social realities and self-perceptions, which helps them understand the world around them and their place in it. When individuals give meaning to the world, they do so through a framework of interpretation. This framework organizes information based on previously held beliefs and shaped patterns of interpretation. The information that people encounter on a daily basis is positioned within such existing frameworks, thereby constructing individuals' social realities.

Gender in Advertising in the 20th Century

Media messages provide a wealth of information about society and the ideologies that are at the base of its structure. In their quest to attract consumers, advertisers tend to stay within the social status quo, so as not to alienate potential buyers. Since advertisements spread cultural values about women, men, consumerism, and power, it is important to discuss gender representations in mainstream advertisements within historical and social contexts. Noted sociologist Erving Goffman stated in his 1976 study of gender stratification that advertising essentially involves the ritualization of the social world. He suggested that advertisements contribute to a distorted social reality in which women are white, middle-class caregivers and men are dominant, independent, white, middle-class providers. These distortions ignore the social realities that economic and political inequality has created in U.S. society. In the three decades since Goffman's observations, despite increasing variety in gender portrayals in advertisements, most advertisements continue to construct a distorted view of the social world in which women rule the home, are the glue that holds the nuclear family together, and are from a narrowly defined class and racial/ethnic group.

Most studies examining gender portrayals in advertisements use some form of qualitative or quantitative content analysis. Quantitative content analysis uses statistical formulas to draw inferences from collected data, for example, by counting the number of women that appear in television commercials. Qualitative content analysis, particularly frame analysis, examines the contexts, or frames, in which women or men are represented in advertisements. Such frames are often ideological, such as showing women predominantly in unpaid work environments, but also visual, as in the systematic positioning of women as smaller than men in advertisements.

Not surprisingly, content analysis studies that have looked at mainstream media advertisements starting with the 1940s have found that most advertisements reinforced prevalent gender, class, and racial hierarchies in society, thereby constructing the distorted social realities Goffman wrote about. The print advertisements of the 1940s and 1950s, for instance, overwhelmingly showed women as white, middle-class caregivers in domestic settings, surrounded by household or food products. During this same time period, men in advertisements also tended to be overwhelmingly white and middle class—but were predominantly shown in paid professional work environments. While women were portrayed as dependent and in need of male guidance, men appeared knowledgeable, independent, and dominant, often paired with "masculine" products, such as cars and technical devices or in financial service roles. Despite such media-constructed realities of the nuclear family and appropriate gender roles, most women in the 1940s and 1950s lived simply on strict budgets, often forced to work outside the home in addition to their roles as caregivers. Unlike the happily smiling women in advertisements, real working-class women often did not have the luxury or the energy of looking well rested and contented while cleaning the house. Furthermore, few advertisements portrayed men in manual labor environments, thus promoting a decidedly middle-class masculinity.

African American women and men faired even worse in 1940s and 1950s advertisements. Due to limited employment opportunities, not only were most working class, but unless portrayed in the stereotypical roles of domestic servants, they were often absent all together from mainstream advertisements. Like women, African Americans were generally portrayed in roles that advertisers felt were appropriate of their social status, thus justifying and reinforcing their marginalization while simultaneously reinforcing whites' perceived sense of superiority. African Americans were seldom used as main characters, but if they were, they tended to be shown in the context of social problems, such as poverty, the family, or while undertaking menial work. However, there were some exceptions to this rule, "Aunt Jemima" and "Uncle Ben" being the most notable. To this day, both are the faces of major mainstream brands. Aunt Jemima has been used to sell breakfast products since the late 19th century, and Uncle Ben has been used to sell rice since the 1940s. Yet, despite their visible and well-respected public profiles, the Aunt Jemima and Uncle Ben imageries were very much reflective of the stereotypical perceptions of African Americans as mammies, domestic servants, or agrarian laborers. Their popularity with white Americans rested in large part in the nostalgia these images evoked to past times, yet these were the very times during which African Americans were denied basic civil rights. Since advertisements spread cultural values about women and African Americans, their systematic portrayal as passive, indecisive, and dependent on white middle-class men reinforced their status as socially second- and third-rate citizens.

Stereotypical representations of African American women and men did change in the 1960s, largely due to pressures from the civil rights movement. Similarly, in the 1970s, the women's movement was successful in demanding more diversity in advertisers' portrayals of women. As a result, between the 1960s and 1980s, the occupational level of African Americans in print and television advertisements, particularly for men, became much more diverse. However, while African American men were increasingly shown in paid professional work environments, women continued to be predominantly shown within the context of the home and often as sole head of the family, reinforcing the stereotype of the strong African American woman, the superwoman myth, and the fractured African American family. While relatively more diverse, African Americans seldom appeared in mainstream advertisements for luxury goods and were often portrayed as athletes, entertainers, or laborers. African American women, both in mainstream and African American media advertisements, overwhelmingly reflected mainstream society's European standards of beauty: light eyes and skin, straight hair, narrow nose and lips, and a thin body. In fact, until the 1980s, there were hardly any ethnic minority fashion models shown in mainstream fashion magazines; those who were, often were of mixed-racial descent.

Reflective of their numerical minority status in society at the time, until the late 1980s and 1990s, Latinas and Asian American women (and men) were largely absent from mainstream media advertisements. In the late 20th century and especially the early 21st century, with Americans of Latin descent becoming the largest ethnic minority group in the United States, advertisers started to take notice of their growing market potential, and mainstream advertisements became much more inclusive of Latina and Latino faces. However, like the images of African American women, these faces overwhelmingly were light skinned. Asian Americans, as reflective of their mythical model minority status in society, were less often typecast. Yet, while African Americans and whites were seldom portrayed in black-white interracial relationship contexts, Asian American women were often paired with white men. Asian American men tended to be portrayed as working professionals in technological or academic fields but, like Asian American women, were seldom shown within domestic (all-Asian) family settings.

By the 1970s, the symbolic representation of women and men in print and television advertisements had changed very little. Most advertisements continued to pair women with household products and show them within domestic or other unpaid work settings. Although since the 1950s, the number of women portrayed as housewives had declined, the woman-as-housewife role remained one of the most common ways to portray women in mainstream as well as women-targeted media advertisements. For most of the 1970s and 1980s, portrayals of men did not change. Advertisers continued portraying them as independent and dominant working professionals whose main roles in society were that of providers, not caregivers. It wasn't until the mid-1990s that the concept of the "new man" was introduced. This new man, unlike his old counterpart, was not afraid to take care of his appearance and show his softer, "feminine" side to the outside world. Cashing in on this trend, particularly for products marketed toward women, advertisers increasingly showed men within non-stereotypical masculine contexts: cooking food or taking care of small children. New-man masculinity juxtaposed men's physical muscularity with an emotional sensibility. Such contrasts deviated significantly from portrayals of men in the past. In earlier advertisements, masculinity had been predominantly defined in middle-class terms, with less emphasis on a working-class physical muscularity or attractiveness and more focus on a man's social and financial responsibility and ambition. However, since new-man imageries in advertisements were targeted largely toward women, their representations seemed more of a marketing ploy rather than reflective of actual changes in hegemonic masculinity.

While the new-man concept in the 1990s focused on men's physical attraction to sell products, women's sexuality had been a consistent element in advertisements for several decades. Up until the 1970s, the image of femininity was largely portrayed as sexually nonthreatening. In the 1970s, in part due to the "sexual revolution," advertisers started to use women's sexuality in a much more blatant manner to promote products. Such advertisements framed women as sexual beings whose main role was to fulfill men's sexual desires. Like the new men imagery of the 1990s, women's bodies in the 1970s became fragmentized, with camera's zooming in on breasts, legs, or buttocks. Though 1970s women had started to make significant advances in the employment market and (relatively successful) attempts to break free from the chains of domesticity, their objectification in popular culture in many ways kept them under men's control. Portraying women as objects rather than human beings reinforced their inferior social status and, by making them absent referents, placed them in positions of powerlessness. Objectification thus permitted men to ultimately consume the female body and to deny women social autonomy.

The sexualization and objectification of the female and male bodies also established standards of beauty that excluded most women and men in society. Because of the power inequalities in society, this exclusion had different consequences for women and men of different racial and social class backgrounds. In U.S. society, men were predominantly judged in terms of their social and financial success and ambition, qualities that are associated with rationality rather than the body. Women, however, have always been judged on their physical appearance. While a curvaceous man may have to conform to the bodily ideal of new-man masculinity, his "mind," social class, and race can still place him close to the top of the gender hierarchy. A woman's inability to live up to hegemonic standards of beauty significantly diminishes her social status, even if she is white or financially successful. According to some media scholars, distorted realities of beauty as constructed by the media have contributed to eating disorders and low self-esteem among women and some men. These portrayals have made female sexuality and beauty reflective of race and class privilege, excluding women of certain racial groups and social classes who historically have not been considered physically attractive by these standards.

Social Consequences

By the end of the 20th century and the early 21st century, significant advances had been made in the ways in which women and men of all races were portrayed in advertisements. Today, in mainstream and women-targeted media advertisements, women are often portrayed as independent and successful in both paid and nonpaid working environments. Men are more often shown in domestic environments. While at face value, such developments are promising, a closer examination shows that gender (and class) stereotypes, rather than disappearing, have become more subtle. For example, men who are portrayed in domestic or caregiving contexts are often shown within "comedic" contexts that tend to reinforce traditional gender roles. Their inability to successfully complete domestic chores, such as cleaning or diaper changing, the "Where is your mother?" formula, reinforces a deterministic notion of domestic work and child rearing. It assumes that, essentially, such caregiving tasks come more naturally to women than to men, rather than these being traits women are socialized into. Furthermore, the increasing number of women shown in boardrooms, pricing cars, or dealing with financial services is balanced by the many advertisements that continue to frame men in terms of power, ambition, aggression, dominance, and rationality.

How little has changed in terms of stereotypical gender portrayals in advertisements is particularly evident in advertisements targeted at young children. Advertisements for toys, candies, or sugared cereals, for example, show that gender role socialization starts at an early age. Girls are most often shown in commercials for dolls, jewelry making or kitchen toys, while boys are shown playing with science- and math-based toys, action figures, or cars. Girls are framed within intimate interpersonal relationship contexts and shown inside domestic settings, sharing secrets or giggling with their girlfriends, while boys are often seen playing outside, roughhousing with other boys. Boys are seldom framed within caregiving or intimate personal relationship contexts; similarly, girls are not often portrayed in physically active or dominant positions.

Although today's advertisements seem to stay clear from the overt stereotypical representations of women and men of the 1950s, 1960s, or 1970s and are more inclusive of social diversity, the images shown are still biased toward middle-class nuclear family structures. Portrayals of African American women especially continue to revolve around child rearing and the family. While mainstream advertisements have become more racially diverse, inclusive of Asian Americans and Latinas/os, they rarely seem to include (white) working-class women or men. For instance, though the working-class male physique has been co-opted by middle- and upper-middle-class men, physically muscular men in professional, paid working environments (a leftover of the new-man fad), working-class men themselves remain conspicuously absent from representations of masculinity. Also, despite rather one-dimensional, physique-oriented representations of masculinity, this depiction is still much more diverse than media constructions of femininity. Regardless of the environments women are framed in, constructions of femininity continue to be rooted in women's physical attractiveness, with definitions of beauty for women of all cultural backgrounds overwhelmingly being determined by European standards.

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

The term affirmative action refers to an organization's explicit efforts to ensure that people are not discriminated against on the basis of race or gender. Affirmative action policies have led to greater representation of women and minorities across all levels of employment and in higher education. Attitudes toward affirmative action are generally positive, especially when policies are correctly understood. The positive effects of affirmative action include reducing unintended discrimination and increasing diversity. Negative effects are also possible, but can be prevented.

Why Is Affirmative Action Necessary?

Although explicit measures indicate that sexism and racism are in decline, subtle forms of bias continue to persist. These subtle biases may take the form of unintended preferences for white males. Indeed, white males continue to earn more and are more often promoted compared with women and minorities. One way affirmative action reduces the impact of unintended bias is by implementing monitoring systems within organizations. Monitoring involves examining organizational data (i.e., hiring decisions) on the basis of race and gender as a way to identify inequality before problems arise.

Attitudes Toward Affirmative Action

Attitudes toward affirmative action vary based on individual differences and conceptualizations of the policy. Perhaps not surprisingly, race, gender, and prejudice level affect attitudes toward affirmative action: Whites, males, and those high in racism and sexism tend to oppose affirmative action. Attitudes also vary based on definitions of the policy: People who view affirmative action as unfair preferential treatment of women and minorities are more negative toward the policy, whereas people who have a more accurate understanding of affirmative action generally have more positive attitudes. Overall though, public opinion polls indicate general support for affirmative action programs.

Effects of Affirmative Action

Affirmative action has had its intended effect: More women and minorities are participating in the workforce and higher education, leading to increased diversity in our society's institutions. Empirical evidence suggests diversity benefits all—not just women and minorities. Diversity exposes people to new perspectives and can facilitate creative problem solving. Perhaps most importantly, diverse settings give people practice with intergroup interactions—which can often be anxiety provoking—and consequently increase the likelihood of future intergroup interactions.

There are potential costs to affirmative action, most notably, the potential for others to view beneficiaries of affirmative action as incompetent. Laboratory research suggests that this may occur only when beneficiaries are believed to have been selected solely on their race or gender. In reality, race and gender are considered in conjunction with merit. Perhaps as a reflection of this, surveys conducted in workplace settings suggest coworkers do not view affirmative action hires negatively. Together, research suggests that organizations can diminish potential negative effects by educating their employees and dispelling myths about affirmative action polices.

AGEISM

The term ageism was coined by Robert Butler, a medical doctor, in 1969. It refers to systematic prejudice and discrimination against people based on their age, particularly the elderly. Like other prejudices, ageism is premised on the belief that all older people are essentially alike—though they actually become more diverse as they age. The question of gender is particularly important with respect to ageism. Nonetheless, until recently, those who studied aging ignored gender, while those who studied gender ignored aging. In the last 20 years, people have realized that women and men experience ageism in gendered ways. This entry explores the issues related to ageism and sexism that women experience, the sources of gendered ageism, menopause and ageism, appearance norms and gender, the gendered language of ageism, and how ageism and hegemonic masculinity combine to affect men.

As women get older, they experience the effects of both ageism and sexism. Double jeopardy refers to the combination of these two fundamental areas of prejudice and discrimination. The term triple or multiple jeopardy refers to how women of color or other minority groups, for example, widows, experience aging. There is some evidence to show that the sense of well-being in older women is not as affected as one might expect by ageism and sexism, perhaps because they have low expectations about their lives and how others should treat them. Women also tend to experience freedom from the need to please others as they advance in years.

The source of this prejudice goes back to Ancient Greece, where both older women and men were seen as "ugly" and "used up." In the Middle Ages, aging women were characterized as witches. As many as 2 million women were executed during this period. The 19th century saw the beginning of the medicalization of old age, and experts began to target women as consumers for products designed to ward off visible signs of aging. The desire to defy aging has accelerated throughout the 20th and the beginning of the 21st century. However, although women remain the primary target of youthful-appearance norms, the use of age-concealing products by men is becoming more accepted.

Appearance norms in modern society provide a double standard of aging based on gender. According to these norms, women are more accountable than men when they show their age. On a man, wrinkles or lines may be considered an indication of character or experience. Men may look older without sexual penalty, while for women, every appearance of aging, for example, wrinkles, gray hair, and teeth that are not sparkling white, is a desexualizing stigma. In other words, women are expected to delay signs of ageing for as long as possible. For women, there is only one standard of beauty, the girl, while for men there are two, the boy and the man. That is, for a woman to remain beautiful, she must look like a juvenile, a teenager. In recent years, the standards of looking young have become more stringent. Women in the United States spend more money on cosmetics and personal care merchandise than on any other group of products.

The pressure on men to stay young looking is also increasing, perhaps because the women's market has been saturated. Men have begun to dye their hair and are resorting to cosmetic surgery in much greater numbers than in the past. Nonetheless, whereas a woman may find it complimentary to be told she looks as young as a girl, a man is not likely to feel complimented if told he looks like a boy.

Although women live longer, they are often considered to be old at a younger age than men. For a female actor, "old" may be as young as 35, though menopause usually is considered the entrance to old age for women. Some believe that a postmenopausal woman is no longer a "real woman." This normal process is often treated as a medical problem, and doctors routinely prescribe medication so that women can stay "feminine forever." Many doctors believe that menopause is directly linked to late-life mental illness.

Another indication of ageism is the preponderance of both euphemisms and derogatory terms to refer to older people. Diminutive words such as cute or sweet are desexualizing and imply that old people are like children. Others tend not to be gendered, for example, senior. The pejorative terms, however, are often gender specific. Words that refer to older men tend to imply uselessness or being out-of-date (e.g., codger, geezer), while terms for older women connote someone who is repugnant or disgusting (e.g., crone, hag). Some women have attempted to rehabilitate such terms, for example, performing "croning rituals" to celebrate the wisdom that comes with age.

Although ageism is more severe for women, older men do find their masculinity to be in question. Some suggest that both men and women become androgynous when they age. Women become more assertive, while men become more nurturing. Whether or not this is the case, older men, particularly when they are retired and/or widowers, do not have a masculinity script to fit their situation. They may resort to representations of masculinity from their youth. Thus, widowers may refer to themselves as "bachelors," describing the freedom associated with youth, because there is no acceptable image of the reality of their stage in life they can claim for themselves.

AIDS AND INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S HEALTH

Women's health in the international context exists within a global context of significant inequities between geographic regions that leave some poor countries with a significantly disproportionate burden of disease. According to the 2007 World Health Report, from the World Health Organization (WHO), 1.1 billion people live without access to clean water, and 2.6 billion people live without access to proper sanitation. One measurable impact of these social conditions is a daily death rate of 4,500 children under 5 years old from diseases that are easily preventable. Women in particular experience the impacts of these social deficiencies more than their male counterparts because of the gender inequities that exist in most societies across the world. Nevertheless, globally on average, women's life expectancy at birth is 4.3 years more than that of men. This entry discusses the leading issues in women's health globally, including interpersonal and other violence, mental health, reproductive health, and HIV/AIDS.

Gender and Health

Gender refers to the socially constructed roles, behavior, activities, and attributes that are assigned to men and women in a society. Biological and social differences between men and women are responsible for differences in health status between the two. Gender affects the health of both men and women, but the discrimination that women experience in almost all cultures has a negative impact on their health that is evidenced by inequities in health status between women and their male peers. Gender norms and values in most cultures result in women having access to less resources and power than men. This gives men more influence in economic, education, and political spheres and also in health care. Women's health therefore receives less resources and attention. The factors that most influence the lower health status of women include poverty, lower rates of education, and unequal power relationships between men and women that favor men, and these factors influence their access and utilization of health care services, which results in barriers to achieving and maintaining health.

Gender Violence

Gender violence is a significant factor in the gender inequities experienced by girls and women. According to the WHO, between 10 percent and 69 percent of women report experiencing violence at the hands of an intimate partner at some point in their lives. Between 6 percent and 47 percent report being sexually assaulted by an intimate partner in their lifetimes, and between 7 percent and 48 percent of girls and young women age 10 to 24 years report that their first sexual encounter was coerced. Female genital mutilation can also be considered to be violence against girls and young women.

Gender Violence and HIV/AIDS

According to WHO, gender violence and HIV/AIDS are two key factors that impact women's health that are not sufficiently addressed by the discourse in women's health. Although globally, of the 40 million people infected with HIV, women and men have approximately equal rates of HIV/AIDS, due to gender inequities and biological factors, women are more susceptible to HIV infection and to the impacts of that infection than are men. For example, in sub-Saharan Africa, more than 75 percent of those age 15 to 24 years who are infected by HIV are women. The link between gender violence and HIV/AIDS is both direct and indirect.

In many cultures, men have multiple concurrent sexual partners. This puts women, particularly young women, at high risk of infection, and their lower status presents significant barriers to being successful at asking their male partners to use condoms. The threat of intimate partner violence (physical, sexual, and psychological) also decreases the likelihood that women will ask men to use condoms, especially in the context of having less access than their male partners to the economic resources on which they and their children depend. Other forms of violence against women that put them at higher risk for HIV include trafficking in women and girls, violence against sex workers, and rape. In the latter case, coercive sex presents a direct biological risk due to vaginal trauma and lacerations. Because of lack of access to education and other resources, many women, especially young women orphaned by AIDS, participate in transactional sex for the basic necessities of life. In this context, they lack the power to demand that their partners use condoms. These women have been shown to have a 50 percent-higher risk of HIV infection than women who do not participate in transactional sex.

Last, women are exposed to violence when they seek or receive HIV-related health care services. Many women are afraid to ask their husbands for money to access testing services and are afraid to report their status once they find out they are HIV-positive. This violence leads to less-than-optimal use of HIV testing and counseling services and HIV/AIDS treatment. Because of the widespread incidence of violence against women and legal and social barriers to equitable distribution of property should women decide to leave, many of the world's women are caught in a web of gender inequity and violence that leaves them vulnerable to situations in which they are at high risk for HIV and other sexually transmitted infections.

The recognition that societal and interpersonal violence against women, along with social gender inequities, contributes to the risk of HIV among women has led international health organizations, national governments, and nongovernmental organizations to take steps to address the problem as a public health issue that impacts women's health beyond their experience of HIV. Awareness campaigns, girls'/women's education, entrepreneurial opportunities for women, and legislative changes are some of the strategies being used to address this very significant issue that impacts the lives of women around the globe.

HIV, Breastfeeding, and Opportunistic Infections

The risk of transmission from mother to child during pregnancy and breastfeeding increases the significance of HIV/AIDS in the life of women. Furthermore, as the role of primary caretaker traditionally falls on women, their role as caretaker of family and community members living with HIV/AIDS increases the burden of HIV/AIDS on women across the world. This caretaking role and HIV-positive status also lead to significant barriers to participation in the labor market, which further reinforces their lower status and lower access to resources.

HIV/AIDS is a viral infection that lowers the immune system, therefore leaving those with the disease open to infections such as tuberculosis. Because nutrition is an integral part of a strong immune system, poverty and low access to nutritious foods leave women and children more susceptible to the opportunistic infections that accompany HIV/AIDS.

Reproductive Health

Reproductive health refers to the reproductive processes at all stages of life. It includes issues of fertility, pregnancy, and the birth of a healthy infant. Maternal health and mortality are key measures of reproductive health, and the differentials across developed and developing countries are a stark reminder of how far there is to go in improving reproductive health in poor countries. According to the WHO, every year approximately 210 million women become pregnant worldwide, and 130 million of them go on to deliver live infants. The remaining 80 million infants end in stillbirth or spontaneous or induced abortion.

Maternal Mortality

According to the Safe Motherhood initiative, a woman dies from pregnancy and childbirth complications every minute of every day, and 99 percent of these deaths occur in developing countries. This equals 1,600 women each day and makes pregnancy-related complications one of the leading causes of death and disability for women age 15 to 49. Major causes of maternal mortality include hemorrhage, infection, hypertensive disorders, unsafe abortion, and obstructed labor. Major causes of maternal morbidity (complications) include anemia, sexually transmitted diseases and HIV, malaria, diabetes, and obstetric fistula. Reducing maternal and infant mortality and morbidity are two United Nations Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) that are often linked with poverty reduction, which is another of the eight MDGs. Although improvement in immunizations and general health care delivery services can lead to an improvement in infant mortality rates, these MDGs have little chance of being achieved even under the most optimistic scenarios due to inadequate human, fiscal, and material resources in many of the developing countries, especially those in sub-Saharan Africa. For example, in Africa, less than 50 percent of births are attended by a skilled health worker, and the MDG is for 90 percent of all births to be attended by a skilled health worker by the year 2015.

According to the WHO, the estimated average maternal mortality rate (MMR), or death during child-birth, in developing countries in 2005 was 450 per 100,000 births, and in developed countries the rate was 9 per 100,000 births. Among the developing regions, sub-Saharan Africa had the highest rates in 2005 at 900 per 100,000 births, followed by South Asia at 450 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births, with Eastern Asia having the lowest rates among developing countries at 50 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births. The variation between individual countries is much more striking, with 14 countries having MMRs of more than 1,000 deaths per 100,000 live births. For example, Sierra Leone had an MMR of 2,100; Afghanistan had an MMR of 1,800; and in contrast, Ireland had an MMR of about 2 per 100,000. In poor countries, the primary reasons for these high rates are low levels of health care personnel, low levels of access to care with regard to locally based centers where safe delivery can occur, disease during pregnancy, and low utilization rates of prenatal care.

The reduction of maternal mortality is an MDG, requiring reduction of 5.5 percent annually in order for the goal of 75 percent reduction from 1990 rates to be reached by 2015. However, MMRs have been decreasing by an average of only 1 percent per annum globally. This means that much more needs to be done to save the lives of pregnant women in poor countries. In sub-Saharan Africa, for example, the rate has been decreasing at only .1 percent per year. It should also be noted that progress on these measures is hampered by unreliable maternal mortality data, especially in locales where most women give birth at home or outside of the formal health care system.

Newborn health is also linked closely to the health of the mother during the prenatal period, labor and birth, and postpartum. The death of a woman impacts families and communities given her caregiving and economic responsibilities, especially in low-resource settings. In the past 10 years, research has shown that small-scale, cost-efficient interventions can significantly reduce the health risks of pregnancy, childbirth, and the postpartum period, with the key ingredients being access to health care during pregnancy, childbirth, and the postnatal period; a skilled birth attendant; and emergency obstetrical services.

Unsafe Abortion

It is estimated by the WHO that 40 percent of pregnancies worldwide (about 80 million women) are unplanned due to nonuse, misuse, or failure of contraception, with an estimated 123 million women worldwide having an unmet need for contraception. Many of these pregnancies end in abortion. Unsafe abortion is a very significant factor in the risk of maternal morbidity and mortality, accounting for 13 percent of maternal deaths and 20 percent of the total mortality and disability burden due to pregnancy and childbirth. Unsafe abortion is mostly a problem in countries with restrictive abortion laws. In most of these countries, there is low access to modern, reversible methods of contraception and high levels of unmet need for contraception.

According to the WHO, in 2003, nearly 20 million unsafe abortions occurred worldwide, 98 percent of them in developing countries with restrictive abortion laws. Sometimes even in countries where abortion is legal, poor, uneducated, and rural women are often unaware that they can have a safe, legal abortion and often seek out more than one unskilled provider to get an abortion. These unsafe abortions are performed in unhygienic conditions or by untrained personnel. Unskilled personnel include traditional birth attendants, homeopaths, herbalists, religious healers, village doctors, and relatives. Approximately one quarter of all women who undergo unsafe abortions are likely to experience serious complications, which can cause death. Many women who seek unsafe abortions have unsuccessful abortions. The implications from both successful and failed attempts in unsafe conditions by unskilled personnel puts a heavy burden on already strained health care systems, and by the time many women access care, it is too late to save their lives.

In countries with legal, safe abortions, the risk of death is very low. For example, in the United States, the death rate from abortion is .6 per 100,000 procedures, whereas the death rate following an unsafe abortion is up to several hundred times that. A recent study estimated that annually 5 million women in developing countries are admitted to hospital due to complications from unsafe abortions. Worldwide estimates of morbidity and mortality due to unsafe abortion show that there are 65,000 to 70,000 deaths and approximately 5 million women with temporary or permanent disability due to unsafe abortion. These 5 million women include 3 million with reproductive tract infections, and 1.7 million suffer secondary infertility. Currently, there are a total of 24 million women worldwide who experience secondary infertility as a result of unsafe abortions.

Adolescent Pregnancy

In the next decade, 100 million girls will marry before their 18th birthday. Fourteen million adolescent girls become mothers every year, more than 90 percent of them in developing countries. These data have significant implications for maternal health, because early birth brings with it risks to both mother and child. It also means that for most girls, whatever education they were receiving comes to an end and the likelihood of practicing health behaviors that reduce their future risk of maternal morbidity and mortality is significantly decreased. One truism in development is that the more education a woman has achieved, the less children she is likely to have, and this gives her more of an opportunity to maintain income-generating activities that can lift and keep her family out of poverty. She is also more likely to practice reproductive health behaviors, such as child spacing, that reduce her risk of complications.

Cancer

According to the WHO, breast cancer kills approximately a half million women each year, mostly in developed countries. Cervical cancer kills about a quarter of a million women each year, 80 percent of these cases in developing countries, where cervical cancer is the most common cancer in women. Ninety-nine percent of all cervical cancers are caused by the human papilloma virus (HPV), which is the most common infection of the reproductive tract. As with many other reproductive-health-related conditions, women who die of cervical cancer are in the prime of their lives, and the social costs of their loss include families who have to go forward without their primary caretakers. Most women living in developing countries do not have access to cervical cancer screening programs that could save their lives through early diagnosis of precancerous conditions.

Mental Health

Overall, rates of psychiatric illness are similar among men and women, but there are gender-related patterns in mental illness. Because of the differential power between men and women and their different experiences based on gender, there are related differences in their exposure to mental health risks. These risks include gender roles, stressors, and negative life experiences. Gender-specific risk factors that place women at higher risk for some forms of mental illness include sexual violence, economic disparity, low social status, and the burden of being the primary caretaker.

Women are more likely to experience depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder, and somatic complaints. In particular, women are twice as likely as men to experience unipolar depression, which is predicted to be the second-leading cause of disease burden in 2020. However, there are no marked differences in the rates of severe mental disorders such as schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. Other illnesses, such as alcohol dependence, are much more likely to be experienced by men than by women. Depression can be triggered by severe life events that cause a sense of loss, inferiority, humiliation, or entrapment. With women and children making up 80 percent of the 50 million people affected by civil wars, violent conflicts, disasters, and displacement, it is expected that they will be at high risk for trauma-related mental illnesses, though in these contexts they are not likely to be diagnosed and/or treated.

In the treatment of mental illness, women are more likely to seek help for mental distress and are more likely to receive psychotropic drugs. However, men are more likely to report problems with alcohol. Gender stereotypes and the experience of stigma also influence help-seeking behaviors and treatment related to mental illness.

Respiratory Health

Indoor air pollution is responsible for 1.5 million deaths each year, most of these among women and children who are often exposed to fumes from fires for cooking and heat for longer periods than are men, who are more likely to spend their days outside the confines of the home.

Conclusion

Although generally women outlive men, women's health risks are strongly linked to their secondary social status and the disproportionate social burdens they bear, especially in countries with low social, health, and economic resources. Much of women's health burden can be relieved not only through more access to health resources, but through social and legal improvements that increase their access to education, money, and social power and will protect them from some of the impacts of poverty, conflict, social dislocation, and illness.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN

Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) was a program that provided cash support to single parents, usually mothers, with children under the age of 18 whose assets and income were below a specified level. AFDC originated in the 1935 Social Security Act as the Aid to Dependent Children (ADC) program, which was intended to provide cash benefits for poor widows with children. The program was renamed AFDC in 1962. Along with the monthly cash benefit, families who received AFDC were also eligible for Medicaid. After the passage of the Family Support Act of 1988, participation in a job opportunities and basic skills training program (JOBS) was mandatory for women with children age 3 years or older. The AFDC program was abolished in 1996 and replaced with the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program (TANF).

While AFDC was indeed a vital resource for some women, it has also been criticized on numerous grounds. First, there was debate within society regarding divorced and never-married women staying at home and receiving monthly grants while their married counterparts were active in the labor force. In an attempt to deal with this criticism, limited programs for married couples were created after 1988. Second, the program itself was very bureaucratic and had disincentives to leaving built in. AFDC had very detailed income stipulations regarding unearned income, earned income, and assets. For example, while the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (OBRA) of 1981 and 1984 and the Family Support Act of 1988 brought about major changes in the earnings disregards, there was still an inherent earnings disincentive to obtaining employment. Third, the benefit levels varied by state and were not indexed to inflation. For example, in 1994, in comparing the highest and lowest grant states in the lower 48, recipients in Connecticut received a monthly grant of $680, while recipients in Mississippi received a monthly grant of $120. Fourth, there was also a child support disincentive built into the program. For women to obtain AFDC, they had to cooperate with welfare officials in establishing the paternity of their children and in obtaining support payments from the fathers. However, the mother would see only the first $50 of each month's child support payment, and for every dollar above that, the state would reduce the mother's AFDC grant by an equal amount.

This deduction by the state provided a disincentive for fathers to pay more than $50 a month in child support, as their children would not see that money. The requirement to establish paternity also made some women who were escaping domestic violence fearful that obtaining child support would result in physical violence against them. It is also important to note that many women who were eligible for the program chose not to receive it due to the stigmatization of the program and hassles involved with participation.

ALL-CHINA WOMEN'S FEDERATION

The All-China Women's Federation (ACWF) (or "Women's Federation," known as Fulian in Chinese) is the official state-sponsored organization representing women's interests in the People's Republic of China (PRC). Founded in April 3, 1949, its basic mission is to represent and safeguard the rights and interests of women and promote gender equality. The Women's Federation has advocated policy changes on behalf of women and also played a role in responding to women's issues at a local level. Among its current tasks are to promote and increase literacy rates, technical skills, employment opportunities, and the political participation of women.

The umbrella organization consists of the national and local women's federations, whose administrative structure parallels that of the PRC's political administrative divisions: the national, provincial, prefectural, county, town/township, and village levels. Each tier of the Women's Federation is under the direct supervision of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) committee at its own level. The Women's Federation thus plays a dual role of transmitting and implementing state policy, along with representing women's interests to the state. At present, there are more than 60,000 branches at or above the township level and 980,000 committees at the grassroots level.

The Women's Federation was initially established as a mass organization to support the CCP. Women were mobilized as a force to forward the goals of the CCP and also to further women's interests and rights. While both goals were seen as complementary, the mission of the party took precedence over women's issues. Developments after the post-Mao era, along with 1980s economic reforms, however, have led to many transformations. These include the emergence of other women's organizations, formation of women's studies as a discipline, introduction of issues of global feminism to the PRC, along with the Women's Federation's changing relationship to the state. One of the key transitional moments came in 1995, when China hosted the United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women and the NGO (nongovernmental organizations) Forum in Beijing. The international stature of the conference brought the Women's Federation funding and publicity, and more attention to women's issues. It also exposed members to global gender issues and international women's NGOs. Around this time, the Women's Federation began referring to itself as an NGO. This gesture can be seen as a measure to acquire legitimacy as a body representing women's rights, to gain international recognition and funding, and to enable ties with other NGOs. As its Web site reads, the Women's Federation "is the largest women's NGO in China promoting women's rights."

The Women's Federation's adoption of NGO status, however, has been widely contested and debated, given its close relationship with the state. Balancing the dual role of the Women's Federation as a state-funded and state-supervised entity with its identity as an organization actively advocating for women's issues still remains a challenge.

ALL INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

The All India Women's Conference (AIWC) was created for the purpose of improving women's education in India. Today, it is one of the oldest women's organizations in the country. The AIWC currently has 100,000 members in 500 branches throughout India, engaged in work on a range of issues, including education, development, economic empowerment, and social welfare. The organization also runs 150 educational institutions, and its headquarters are located in New Delhi, India.

Background

In 1926, at the suggestion of the organization's founder, Margaret Cousins, a number of regional conferences were held throughout the country to discuss specific local issues regarding educational reform. In January 1927, delegates from these regional conferences were invited to attend the first official AIWC. Approximately 2,000 people attended this national gathering, which took place in Poona, India. The conference and the participation of women from a range of communities and backgrounds signified an important chapter in the development of the women's movement in India. During this time, a number of resolutions were adopted aimed at enriching the content of primary education, vocational training, and collegiate-level programs. The AIWC was critical in helping to increase societal acceptance of women's education and in working toward increasing women's literacy rates.

During subsequent conferences and following significant debate on the issue, the organization decided to expand the scope of its work beyond its educational focus to include a social reform agenda. The organization became actively involved in legislative advocacy aimed at ending the practice of child marriage and securing women's rights to divorce and inheritance. The group also participated in efforts to improve women's working conditions and to secure women's right to vote. Several members of the AIWC participated in the framing of the constitution following India's independence, and many of the organization's past presidents went on to hold significant political positions. The AIWC also worked to expand its visibility and build connections beyond India. The group participated in several international conferences and serves as a consultant to several international agencies on economic and social issues impacting women.

Contemporary Work

The AIWC's current work involves a range of activities and projects aimed at improving educational opportunities and increasing women's workforce participation. The group utilizes a range of strategies, including public awareness campaigns, protest meetings, leadership training, and legislative advocacy. The organization works on issues such as health and family welfare, women's labor, trafficking, disaster relief, developing rural energy, and microcredit programs. The AIWC has also initiated several projects aimed at training and employing women in fields ranging from computing to textile weaving to hair and skin care.

ALPHA MALE

An alpha male is a high-ranking member of a group or pack. He is aggressive and dominates the other beta males, lower-ranking, weaker members of the group, usually through force and intimidation. Members of a group often defer to the alpha male, bestowing upon him authority, decision-making power, and privilege. The alpha male is often larger, stronger, and more intelligent than the other males in the group. As a result, he has the greatest choice of and success with the females. His size, strength, and status are often appealing to the female members of the group, as these characteristics are predictors of desirable genes that may be passed down to their offspring. The alpha male also denies the other males' access to the females. The alpha male is therefore more often reproductively successful, repeatedly spawning and caring for a greater number of offspring than the other beta males. From an evolutionary perspective, this ensures the "survival of the fittest," as the stronger, more dominant alpha male attempts to guarantee that his genes are passed down to the next generation.

Alpha male is a term that describes a set of characteristics displayed by males within a particular group, characteristics that ensure domination over other males and access to the females' sexuality and reproductive capabilities. It is a term that is most often and more traditionally used to describe hierarchy along the lines of gender within a particular harem of the animal kingdom. However, alpha male has more recently been used within popular culture linguistics to describe the characteristics of and relationship between human males. It is increasingly applied as a descriptor to men who exhibit particular characteristics that correspond to a specific idea of model manhood in Western society. As a result, there is a pecking order or hierarchy among the males that grants one status and authority over the others. The alpha male man is most known for his strength, intelligence, wealth, and sexual prowess. As a result, the term is popularly used to describe high-ranking competitive bodybuilders, football players, businessmen, and the like. However, it is perhaps the sexual prowess of a man that most notably marks him as an alpha male.

Both animal and human alpha males derive status within their male peer groups from having access to and engaging in sexual intercourse with a number of females. However, whereas sex for the animal alpha male is rooted in reproduction and evolution, the alpha male man is interested in his ability to flirt with and persuade numerous women to have sex with him for recreational purposes. Women often find the alpha male attractive as a partner, and other beta males often do not attempt to challenge him. Sexual promiscuity reinforces his sexual desirability and status as alpha male among other men. These alpha men conform to a particular culturally dependent ideal of masculinity, one that is rooted in sexual promiscuity, female objectification, and emotional removal from intimate encounters and relationships.

American Birth Control League

The American Birth Control League (ABCL) was founded on April 26, 1923, by Margaret Sanger. The ABCL's issues included legalizing birth control in the United States as well as other global issues, such as world population growth, disarmament, and world famine. Sanger gave the American birth control movement a jump start in 1916, when she opened the first birth control clinic in the United States in Brooklyn, New York. Sanger and her collaborators were arrested and indicted under the Comstock law, which defined contraceptive information and materials as being obscene. Sanger's establishment of the ABCL in 1923 led to the opening of the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau that same year in New York City. Here, licensed physicians prescribed contraceptives and studied their effects on women's health in hopes of broadening the interpretation of the Comstock law.

Sanger has been quoted as saying, "No woman can call herself free who does not own and control her own body." Upon establishing the ABCL, she also created a set philosophy of principles and goals. The ABCL stated that a woman's right to control her own body is central to her human rights, that every woman should have the right to choose when or whether to have children, that every child should be wanted and loved, and that women are entitled to sexual pleasure and fulfillment.

In 1925, the first manufacturing of diaphragms in the United States occurred when Sanger's second husband, J. Noah Slee, aided in financing the manufacturing of the contraceptive devices. The following year, Sanger, serving as president of the ABCL, joined forces with Sir Bernard Mallet, the Secretary of the International Federation of Birth Control Leagues, to organize the first World Population Conference at Geneva, Switzerland. In 1929, the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau was raided by police due to direct violation of the Comstock law. The bureau's physicians and nurses were arrested, and all confidential medical records and documents were seized by the police. Outrage and protest followed the defendants' discharge from authorities. Sanger fought back and founded the National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control in order to overturn the Comstock law.

The ABCL's efforts and influence proved to produce a real successful change in 1936, when a judge liberalized the Comstock laws in New York, Connecticut, and Vermont. The following year, the American Medical Association recognized birth control as being an integral part of medical practice and education. In 1939, the ABCL came together with the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau to form the Birth Control Federation of America. The Birth Control Federation of America became the Planned Parenthood Federation of America in 1942 and today operates more than 850 high-quality medical service establishments nationwide.

American Civil Liberties Union

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization advocating for the individual rights and liberties guaranteed under the U.S. Constitution. It was founded in 1920 by a group of political activists, including Roger Baldwin, Crystal Eastman, and Jane Addams, as a lobbying group against government repression of free speech, and it focused on supporting conscientious objectors from World War I. Since then, in its efforts to protect civil liberties impartially, the organization has represented a diverse clientele, including groups the majority of society has disfavored, such as the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) and Communist Party. The ACLU has gained significant recognition as a pivotal force of social change for society's most oppressed groups. It has contributed to developing new legislation and has litigated at both the state and federal levels.

As part of its commitment to defend the rights of traditionally subordinate groups, the ACLU has supported women's reproductive rights since the 1920s, when it was the only public interest group to support sex education in schools. Later, the ACLU played a significant role in the debates over rights to privacy and contraceptive use in Poe v. Ullman (1961) and Griswold v. Connecticut (1965). By the mid-1960s, the organization firmly supported a woman's right to choose abortion. At the state level, the ACLU contributed greatly to the reversal of Georgia's abortion laws in Doe v. Bolton (1973). In efforts to ensure the legal precedent of Doe and Roe v. Wade (1973), the ACLU founded its Reproductive Freedom Project in 1974, which was involved in every Supreme Court abortion case until the early 1990s.

Similar to its targeted activism on abortion, the ACLU was also a leader in the movement for gender equality. Following its legal involvement in several sex discrimination cases, the organization founded a committee on discrimination against women in 1944 that advocated for women's equal pay in the workplace. By the 1970s, the ACLU fully endorsed the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), which would constitutionally guarantee protection against sex discrimination, though in previous decades it rejected such a bill under the belief that it would undo the organization's many gains in protective legislation for women. Amid this fight, Ruth Bader Ginsburg successfully litigated for the ACLU in Reed v. Reed (1971) and Frontiero v. Richardson (1973), both breakthrough cases for the protection of women's rights. Ginsburg also helped organize the ACLU's Women's Rights Project in 1971, which participated in more gender discrimination cases in the Supreme Court than any other women's rights group until the 1980s.

The ACLU continues to focus on personal freedom and cases where constitutional rights may be at risk. In recent years, the organization has expanded its scope to include contested civil liberties violations resulting from the agenda for national and world security of the administration of President George W. Bush. Since September 11, 2001, the ACLU has challenged measures including the untried detainment of enemy combatants residing both abroad and in the United States and the government's covert wiretapping of private phone conversations.

AMERICAN MEN'S STUDIES ASSOCIATION

The American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) describes itself as an independent organization of scholars, practitioners, teachers, and students with a common goal of advancing the critical studies of men and masculinities. The organization was formed in 1991 after branching off from the Men's Studies Association in order to expand the scope of their work. AMSA is distinguished from other men's group sites in that it strongly emphasizes the academic perspective of men's studies while also maintaining a personal access point for those affected by such issues. AMSA remains active primarily through an annual conference held on men and masculinities, which addresses issues including professional and personal research topics on how men's studies and masculinity fit into the paradigms of emotional, cultural, and social ideologies. AMSA's early pioneers include Martin Acker, Shepherd Bliss, Harry Brod, Sam Femiano, Martin Fiebert, and Mike Messner. The philosophical roots of AMSA originated in the 1980s and first began as the Men's Studies Task Groups, which was based on a collective organization of people with similar professional and/or personal interests.

AMSA presents a very formal and well-iterated description of the organization through its Web site mission statement. The organization gives a historical and reflective analysis of the evolution of its field of masculinities studies, along with a detailed statement of purpose. This development includes the change in aspects of power, patriarchy, and hierarchy from a more rigid historical definition of these theories to an emphasis on their contemporary application.

AMSA strives to maintain relationships with both an audience of scholarly expertise in the field of men's studies and an audience experiencing men's issues and masculinity in a more personal manner. As AMSA describes the organization based on its purpose, mission, and history, the format changes in the flow from a more academic prose to a more informal and personal prose. This is accomplished through use of explicit language. The Web site displays this academic stance through its mission statement, conferences, and overall description of the organization. The links to resources and related issues reveal a side of AMSA based more on personal experience. To cover the range of men and masculinity, ASMA must ensure an atmosphere of safety in order to cover all issues within the study of gender. This is done to maintain relationships with both the academic and more-personal communities, while also avoiding accusation of antifeminist principles. AMSA repeatedly refers to the relevance of feminism to their mission but asserts that feminism is not the foundation of the organization. AMSA primarily works toward a future of ending the perception that men's studies is a threat to women's studies.

AMSA organization encourages and projects the development of men's studies and masculinities to a broad audience in the academic field as well as those who are affected on a more personal level.

AMERICAN WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION

The America Woman Suffrage Association (AWSA) was founded in 1869 in Boston, Massachusetts, by Lucy Stone, Julia Ward Howe, and Josephine Ruffin. The AWSA focused changing legislation in order to give women the right to vote. The AWSA was not alone in fighting for women's right to vote. AWSA as well as the National Women's Suffrage Movement (NWSA) competed as the two main factions fighting for the same cause. The AWSA was concerned only with the issue of women's right to vote, as opposed to NWSA's larger and more liberal platform that also included other issues of the day, such as organizing working women and women's divorce rights and laws.

The AWSA was larger, better-organized, and more conservative than the NWSA. Their chief concern was achieving success for their cause through state-by-state campaigns. The NWSA differed not only in their platform of issues but also in the strategy in achieving success. The organization fought for a federal constitutional amendment rather than a change in individual state legislature to give women the right to vote. After years of struggling against each other in regard to the issues as well as strategy, the AWSA and the NWSA ended their rivalry and organized together to form the National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA). The leaders of the NAWSA included Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Chapman

Catt, Frances Willard, Mary Church Terrell, and Anna Howard Shaw, among others.

The AWSA came into conflict not only with the NAWSA but also with antisuffragists throughout the United States. The most liberal of males still considered women to be second-class citizens. In addition, an antisuffragist movement of women began to surface. This conservative group of women, called "antis," accused the suffragists of the AWSA of being disloyal to their sex and ignoring the war effort. The antisuffragists' platform was social rather than political, stating that the right to vote was a burden that would cause the end of family life.

Despite harsh criticism from conservative groups, as well as combating the negative press that the Women's Party attracted due to their radical picketing of the White House, in January of 1918, Congress passed the Woman's Suffrage Amendment. In June 1919, the Senate, in turn, passed the bill, which left the question of women's right to vote up to the states. Thirty-six state votes were needed for ratification, and that was achieved with Tennessee's ratification in August 1920. The AWSA was able to achieve its goal of obtaining the right to vote for American women by cooperating with the National Woman Suffrage Association and is still considered one of the foremothers of the women's rights movement in America.

Androcentrism

Androcentrism is a worldview that positions males, male bodies, and male traits and achievements at the center of social, historical, and scientific value, while positioning those of females in the margins, rendering them invisible or deviant from what is considered normal. This occurs when male experiences are considered universal rather than characteristic of the male gender and has serious implications in the lives of women. The term androcentric is widely attributed to Charlotte Perkins Gilman, a 19th-century American feminist writer, who first observed that most recorded human experience is, in actuality, male experience.

Social Structures

In an androcentric worldview, male behaviors and characteristics are considered normal and thus more highly valued, while those of females' are devalued. For example, aggression and competition (strength) are assigned higher value than compromise and cooperation (weakness). Furthermore, male qualities are more socially acceptable if possessed by males. Males and females are taught two differing sets of values along gender lines from a young age, and more emphasis is placed on the importance of male qualities. Young females who aspire to these male qualities may be labeled "tomboys." These transgressions, while acceptable to a certain degree, are ones girls are expected to outgrow during adolescence. Androcentric social order has implications beyond childhood behavior: Adult female behavior or pursuits considered more appropriate for men are regarded as atypical and even deviant, limiting women's social participation, for example, in positions of leadership or scholarship or as initiators in intimate relationships.

The social organization of labor along gender lines also places more value on work done by men. Public work (outside the home) is thought of as more important than private work (labor performed in the home, such as child rearing and cleaning). Although the advent of the women's liberation movement has made varying types of work outside the home more accessible to women, the reverse has not occurred; men are still considered unusual or less masculine if they choose to be homemakers. Similarly, expectations of women in the workforce conform to normative work habits and success patterns traditionally appropriate for males. Habits considered normal and desirable for all employees, such as full-time availability and uninterrupted commitment, have not changed as women enter the workforce. Although women continue to bear the majority of domestic responsibilities, they are still expected to be model employees in a workforce with androcentric values.

Scholarship, Religion, and Language

In androcentric accounts of history, that is, human history, male experiences are considered universal and noteworthy. Women as historical figures are depicted as silent onlookers, stereotypical characters, or are simply absent. This approach has rendered women nearly invisible in the annals of history, underscoring the androcentric viewpoint of females and female activity as supplementary or less important. Additionally, due to social limitations placed on the female gender, women were once restricted from participating in scholarship, or knowledge making.

Androcentric cultures throughout the world have social mores (customs) based on patriarchal rule and religion (founded on paternity, or leadership through the lineage of the male parent). Like histories, texts of patriarchal faiths often record the commandments, deeds, and wisdom of prominent male figures, and these texts are revealed to/recorded by males. Despite this, the truths of these texts are assumed to be universal. Men tend to serve as clergy or interpreters of truths, and women are actively encouraged to serve in subordinate positions rather than those of authority. Laws based on religious doctrine either directly or indirectly tend to favor men and more harshly punish women who transgress.

Androcentric language is also assumed to be universal, although it places limits upon social roles and attitudes about women by shaping perceptions of normalcy. For example, vocations traditionally held by men (fireman, chairman) may seem closed to women or absurd for women to occupy unless truly universal language is used (firefighter, chairperson). Language may also be used to reinforce gender roles that men and women are assumed to occupy exclusively (female doctor, househusband, Mr. Mom). Androcentric language is generally applied to women in ways that point out deviation from the male norm and objectify that difference. For example, women are often referred to in terms that describe physical characteristics, such as blond or redhead; it would be unusual or seemingly inappropriate to refer to males in a similar fashion.

Science and Health

An androcentric approach to studies of nature, notably the body, assumes the male body is the normal standard. From this standpoint, average female bodies appear weaker and less able to perform tasks that androcentric cultures value, such as certain types of athletics that emphasize strength (feats at which men excel) rather than flexibility (feats at which women excel). Medical research may be considered applicable to female bodies though conducted exclusively on male bodies, or health problems that afflict women may be ignored by researchers altogether. For example, recent developments in heart disease research demonstrate that symptoms, treatment, and diagnosis of female heart attacks are not the same as for men and that risk for heart attacks is much higher for women than supposed.

Furthermore, from an androcentric perspective, ordinary functions of the female body seem pathological. Menstruation, pregnancy, and childbirth appear to be conditions that are problematic or routinely require treatment.

Feminist scientists have theorized that the basis of science, the claim of objectivity, is itself impossible. For example, they point out that androcentric science has been shown to attribute the gendered social behavior of human males and females to cellular organisms (for example, active sperm, passive egg) in ways that bias research. They have called for new perspectives in the way scientific research is conducted and analyzed.

ANDROGEN INSENSITIVITY SYNDROME

The term Androgen insensitivity syndrome (AIS) refers to an X-chromosome-linked recessive mutation resulting in undervirilization of male external genitalia. The degree to which external genitalia are "feminized" is dependent on the functionality of the androgen receptor. Deletion of its gene results in *complete AIS (*CAIS). In CAIS, an individual's external genitalia appear female. Reduction in androgen receptor functionality results in partial AIS (PAIS). PAIS is graded on the extent of feminization of external genitalia, which can be ambiguous at birth. Most individuals with AIS are infertile but face virtually no other morbidity or mortality. Treatment includes extended psychological support and hormone therapy. The overall incidence of AIS is 5 in 100,000 live male births. CAIS is slightly more common than PAIS.

Pathophysiology

Between the 8th and 10th week of gestation, male gonads begin producing testosterone, dihydrotestosterone (DHT), and Müllerian inhibiting factor (MIF), which are hormones critical to male development. In AIS, normal amounts of hormones are produced, but properly functioning androgen receptors for testosterone and DHT are absent. While MIF causes internal male development, unopposed testicular estrogen causes external female genital development.

Presentation

All individuals with AIS lack internal female reproductive organs and do not menstruate, though the conversion of testosterone to estradiol enhances breast development. Only individuals with the mildest forms of PAIS are fertile. Most individuals have sparse armpit and pubic hair.

In CAIS, individuals have labia, a clitoris, and at most, the distal two thirds of the vagina, though sometimes only a dimple is present. Because individuals with CAIS look female, they are rarely diagnosed in childhood unless a mass in the lower abdomen or groin is felt and imaging or surgery reveals an undescended testis. More often, CAIS individuals present to a physician during puberty when they fail to menstruate.

In PAIS, there may be undescended testes, a small penis, placement of the urethal opening on the underside of the penis, an enlarged clitoris or fused labia. Due to ambiguity, PAIS is often diagnosed in childhood. Otherwise, individuals will present to a clinician during puberty. If male identified, they are often concerned about breast development. If female identified, they are often concerned about the lack of menstruation.

Diagnosis and Treatment

Diagnosis is confirmed by the presence of a Y chromosome, male levels of testosterone and DHT, and, on imaging, intra-abdominal testes or an absent uterus.

In addition to long-term counseling for individuals and families, support groups play a significant role in treatment. Gender-appropriate hormone therapy is usually started at puberty. Eventually, testes are surgically removed to prevent intra-abdominal testicular cancer that could be missed on physical examination.

Optional, cosmetic treatments include nonsurgical lengthening of the vagina, vaginal construction, or clitoral reduction. Breast reduction and repositioning of the urethral opening are surgical options in male-identifying AIS patients. It is recommended by clinicians, ethicists, and patient advocates that surgery occur only when a patient can give full and informed consent.

ANDROGYNY

Some individuals, known as androgynous, exhibit high levels of both masculine and feminine traits. In the last 40 years, research has determined how to define and measure androgyny and whether it has psychological or relational benefits.

History of Masculinity and Femininity

Research on masculinity and femininity has been conducted for decades. In most psychological literature, the most accepted definitions of masculinity and femininity have stemmed from a trait-based perspective on men and women. In other words, masculinity is defined as having traits reflecting agency or instrumentality. Agentic, and therefore masculine, individuals easily act upon their environments. They take control and have power. Other traits commonly associated with masculinity are assertiveness and self-protection. Conversely, femininity is associated with communal traits. Communal individuals are other oriented and enjoy group interaction. They are social caretakers who are sensitive and helpful.

Early conceptualizations of masculinity and femininity tagged them as opposite ends of a one-dimensional concept known as sex role orientation. Masculinity and femininity were seen as interrelated constructs such that if one were masculine, it would be impossible to be feminine, and vice versa. In 1973, Anne Constantinople published a critique questioning the unidimensionality of masculinity and femininity. In response to this critique, new sex role orientation measures were developed that redefined the way masculinity and femininity were conceptualized.

Definition and Measurement of Androgyny

If masculinity and femininity are separate, unipolar constructs, measures of masculinity and femininity should assess the constructs in this manner. Two popular measures of sex role orientation emerged during the 1970s: the Bem Sex Role Inventory (BSRI) and the Personal Attributes Questionnaire (PAQ). The BSRI was initially designed by having undergraduates rate how desirable it is for males and females to have each of 400 attributes. Traits that were rated as more desirable for a male were labeled masculine, and those that were labeled as more desirable for a female were labeled feminine. The final BSRI consisted of 60 traits: 20 masculine (including aggressive, independent and competitive), 20 feminine (including sympathetic, warm, and nurturing), and 20 neutral traits. To complete this questionnaire, participants indicate how descriptive each trait is of them. Those who score more highly on the masculine traits (compared with the feminine traits) are labeled as masculine. Feminine individuals score more highly on the feminine traits than the masculine traits. Androgynous individuals score highly on both masculinity and femininity. Undifferentiated individuals do not score highly on either masculinity or femininity.

Spence and Helmreich's PAQ is similar to the BSRI in that it includes gender-related traits on which participants rate themselves. The PAQ was designed by having participants indicate which, out of a series of traits, were more likely to be present in males or females. This is in contrast to the BSRI's design, which focused upon the desirability of the traits for each gender. Though the PAQ is shorter than the BSRI at only 16 items (8 masculine, 8 feminine), the scoring is similar in that participants who align themselves more closely with masculine traits are masculine, participants who align themselves more closely with feminine traits are feminine, and participants who align themselves with both masculine and feminine traits are androgynous. Despite the age of these inventories, the BSRI and PAQ are still the most widely used assessments of sex role orientation.

The Effects of Androgyny

Once the measurement of androgyny was honed, research on the construct exploded. The large-scale assumption guiding this research was that androgynous people are more psychologically adjusted than those who are only masculine or feminine. After all, if androgynous people possess agency and communality-related traits, they should be better able to adapt to diverse types of settings. When in an agency-related situation, a feminine individual cannot draw upon agentic traits, but an androgynous person can. Similarly, that same androgynous individual may appear socially adept in communality-oriented situations. For example, managers must both construct a game plan for their teams (which requires agency) and console upset coworkers (which requires communality); thus, androgynous individuals, because they have both sets of traits, might enjoy a greater breadth of understanding and skill in a managerial role than someone possessing only stereotypically masculine or feminine traits. Though this explanation for why androgyny may be beneficial is intuitive, the research in this area has shown mixed results. In some studies, androgyny is linked to beneficial outcomes, but in others, there is no relationship between androgyny and advantageous psychological and behavioral manifestations.

Androgyny and Psychological Well-Being

To determine the relation between sex role orientation and psychological well-being, Whitley reviewed 35 studies. In this meta-analysis, three models were tested: (1) the congruence model, which states that well-being would be most beneficially influenced when sex role orientation matches biological sex;

(2) the androgyny model, which states that well-being is maximized when individuals possess both masculine and feminine characteristics, regardless of biological sex; and (3) masculinity model, which states that well-being is maximized when individuals possess only masculine traits, regardless of their biological sex. This review of the literature concluded quite convincingly that the masculinity model was the best explanation for the data; when either males or females possess masculine qualities, they have the highest levels of psychological well-being. This review provided initial evidence that androgyny was not clearly linked to psychological well-being. Later studies showed some link between androgyny and psychological adjustment, but upon further investigation, it was determined that the true impetus for this link was the presence of masculine characteristics, thus rendering this research consistent with Whitley's meta-analysis.

Despite the lack of evidence for a conclusive link between androgyny and well-being, research has demonstrated that androgynous individuals are more likely to attribute their successes to internal characteristics (e.g., intellectual ability, effort) and their failures to external characteristics (e.g., unfair exam, boss overly critical), which has, overall, been linked to increased perseverance.

Another aspect of psychological well-being is emotional expression. Individuals who can readily express emotions (instead of repressing them) are consistently happier and healthier. In general, androgynous individuals have been found to be more willing than masculine individuals to express happiness, sadness, love, and hate/anger; and feminine individuals fell in-between these two groups. These findings are readily understandable given that different emotions are associated with femininity (e.g., happiness, sadness, and love) and masculinity (e.g., hate/anger), and androgynous individuals possess characteristics of each gender.

Relational Implications of Androgyny

Research has also examined the extent to which androgynous people enjoy relational benefits. One study examined whether androgynous men help more around the house and found that, indeed, androgyny was linked to the performance of household tasks. In this study, participants were asked (1) who performed domestic tasks in their households and why and (2) the amount of conflict this set-up generated.

Overall, women performed more household tasks than men, but androgynous and feminine participants completed more tasks than masculine participants, regardless of sex. Androgynous participants also reported the least amount of conflict over domestic tasks. In couples where the male was androgynous or feminine, more tasks were completed by both couple members.

In other research that more directly examined the link between androgyny and relationship status, androgynous women reported closer relationships with both parents while growing up. In addition, androgynous women were less likely to be married and more likely to have children than masculine women. Last, research demonstrated that androgynous individuals typically have superior social support networks via an enhancement of same-sex friendships for males and cross-sex friendships for females.

Referring back to the manager/employee relationship mentioned earlier, research indicates that it is not the case that androgynous managers, whom one might expect to be better prepared and better skilled, enjoy more on-the-job success or benefits. Powell and Butterfield have conducted a few studies in this area, all of which have conclusively demonstrated that despite a considerable increase in the proportion of female managers, employees still perceive that the "best" manager is masculine, not androgynous or feminine, in sex role orientation. This appears to be the case despite the finding that androgynous individuals tend to have a more "self-and-other" orientation when dealing with relational dilemmas. Thus, it appears that across relationship type, there are complex interactions among sex role orientation and relational well-being.

Conclusion

In sum, when Sandra Bem proposed the concept of androgyny, many expected that androgynous people would be the most behaviorally flexible and psychologically well-adjusted. However, subsequent research demonstrated at least in part that masculine traits are actually more closely related to well-being and adjustment. More-current research has suggested that one limitation of the study of androgyny to date is that the stereotypic feminine characteristics that have been paired with the masculine characteristics (which then, together, make up androgyny) are not as societally valued. In other words, one would not expect stereotypically feminine characteristics like naiveté to predict positive psychological and behavioral well-being as readily as stereotypically masculine characteristics like assertiveness. Researchers have called for a restructuring of androgyny such that future conceptualizations include equally positive (and perhaps even negative) stereotypically masculine and feminine traits. Because of this limitation, it has been difficult to fully ascertain the utility that an androgynous sex role orientation can offer an individual.

Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906)

Susan B. Anthony was born into a Quaker family near Adams, Massachusetts, in 1820. Her formal schooling was cut short by the bankruptcy of her father's cotton mill. Anthony spent years teaching and earning wages, which cemented her belief in the importance of women's economic independence. The efforts of Anthony's family to free slaves through the Underground Railroad allowed her to meet abolitionists such as Frederick Douglass, fueling her antislavery sentiments. Despite several suitors, Anthony never married and did not regret it. Throughout her years as a reformer, she would lament the valuable time that she felt her compatriots wasted on child rearing.

After being barred from speaking at a temperance meeting because of her sex, Anthony met feminist activist Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and the two formed the New York State Woman's Temperance Society. Stanton's radical views convinced Anthony that female equality necessitated suffrage. Anthony's meticulous planning and limitless energy made her a tireless reformer, willing to travel, lecture, and petition for the causes of temperance, abolition, and suffrage. In 1854, Anthony and others gathered thousands of signatures to petition the legislature to expand the Married Woman's Property Act. After personally addressing the Judiciary Committee in Albany in 1860, the act was expanded to allow women to own property, keep their earnings, share custody of their children, and sue in a court of law.

Meanwhile, Anthony had continued to travel and speak against slavery, becoming the New York State agent for the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1856. After the Civil War, feminists were aware that the lack of suffrage placed blacks and women in a position of liminal citizenship, and they decided that universal suffrage was essential for equality. In 1866, Anthony, Stanton, and other feminists formed the American Equal Rights Association to agitate for universal suffrage. After the Fourteenth Amendment passed without giving women the vote, a bitter split occurred between feminists. Those led by Anthony and Stanton refused to wait any longer for full suffrage for black men before women, while others demanded that women must be patient. Many feminists accused Stanton and Anthony of racism. In response, they formed the National Woman Suffrage Association (NWSA) in 1869. The NWSA called for woman's suffrage first, as well as fair divorce laws and workers' rights. In 1870 and 1871, Anthony urged hundreds of women to cast ballots illegally. She was arrested for voting and forced to pay a fine.

In 1890, the National American Woman Suffrage Association was formed when the NWSA and its rival group merged, and in 1892, Anthony was named president. She campaigned through Colorado in 1893 at the age of 74, after which the state passed a referendum allowing women the right to vote. Anthony stepped down as president of the NAWSA in 1900 and died in 1906. She is remembered for her never-ceasing activism and resolute leadership during the first wave of the campaign for female suffrage.

Anti-Miscegenation Laws

Anti-miscegenation laws are legislative acts designed to prohibit sex and marriage between persons whom a given society regards as belonging to different racial groups. Within the United States, few topics have fused issues of sexual inequality with issues of racial inequality as thoroughly or as passionately as has miscegenation.

A Brief History of Anti-Miscegenation Laws in the United States

At the federal level, no law ever banned interracial sex or marriage. However, 37 of the 50 states included anti-miscegenation laws among their statutes at some point in their history. Moreover, anti-miscegenation laws were part of state statutes in the North, South, East, and West.

In Loving v. Virginia (1967), the U.S. Supreme Court declared that all existing state anti-miscegenation laws were null and void. By that time, nearly all of the remaining anti-miscegenation laws were confined to former states of the Confederacy. One state, Alabama, held onto its anti-miscegenation law until 2000. Alabama's reluctance to let go of a law that could no longer be enforced stands as a testament to the potency of the miscegenation issue in the United States, especially in the Deep South.

Understanding the Origins of Anti-Miscegenation Laws in the United States

To understand how anti-miscegenation laws arose in the United States, one must acknowledge the impact of slavery and its aftermath on interpersonal and intergroup relations. Until slavery was institutionalized, sexual and marital relations between persons of different races were not typically prohibited in the colonies that eventually formed the United States. In fact, prior to the entrenchment of slavery, the concept of race was not nearly as codified as it is in modern-day America. Once the African slave trade was established, not only did race become central to the American psyche, but miscegenation became outlawed throughout most of the United States.

Soon after the end of slavery, the Reconstruction-era U.S. Congress added the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution to protect the civil rights of all American citizens. Nevertheless, as the post-Reconstruction, Jim Crow era descended upon the United States, some state legislatures rescinded their anti-miscegenation laws, whereas other state legislatures continued to enact anti-miscegenation laws with impunity. It was not until the United States Supreme Court explicitly invoked the Fourteenth Amendment in Loving v. Virginia that all state anti-miscegenation laws were officially declared unconstitutional.

The Connection Between Anti-Miscegenation Laws and Gender

In theory, anti-miscegenation laws were supposed to be applied equally, regardless of the specific race/gender pairings in question. However, in practice, anti-miscegenation laws often were enforced more vigorously when the "violators" were black male/white female pairs than when the "violators" were white male/black female pairs. The selective enforcement of anti-miscegenation laws as a function of specific race/gender pairings may help explain why white male/black female marriages outnumbered black male/white female marriages in the United States prior to the 1960s.

Despite the current controversy over the prevalence of black male/white female marriages over white male/black female marriages, it was not until the 1970s—the first full decade after Loving v. Virginia was rendered—that black male/white female marriages outnumbered white male/black female marriages in the United States. To the extent that Loving v. Virginia paved the way for a dramatic increase in black male/white female marriages, it might seem ironic that Richard Loving and Mildred, the protagonists in Loving v. Virginia, were a white male/black female couple. Then again, when one considers the depth of public resentment that has been directed toward black male/white female sexual unions throughout the history of the United States, it comes as no surprise that a court decision involving a white male/black female pair would lead to the end of all legal barriers against interracial marriages in the United States.

Lingering Support for Anti-Miscegenation Laws in the Post–Civil Rights Era

Loving v. Virginia was one of a series of cases that the U.S. Supreme Court rendered in favor of civil rights for American citizens. Even in the post–civil rights era, though, more than 20 percent of white Americans express support for anti-miscegenation laws, and more than 60 percent of white Americans oppose the idea of their close relatives marrying black Americans. White Americans' opposition to miscegenation contrasts sharply with black Americans' lack of opposition to miscegenation. At no time has a majority of black Americans expressed support for anti-miscegenation laws or opposed the idea of their close relatives marrying white Americans.

As has been the case with so many race-related issues, miscegenation generally has been treated as a black-and-white issue in the United States. Public opinion polls rarely solicit the views of Latinas/os, Asian Americans, or Native Americans on anti-miscegenation laws or on close relatives marrying someone from a different race. Suffice it to say that the most consistently documented support for anti-miscegenation laws, as well as the most consistently documented opposition to close relatives marrying someone from a different race, has been voiced by white Americans.

Rates of Interracial Marriage in the United States

Among Western nations, the United States consistently ranks at or near the bottom in terms of the percentage of marriages that are classified as interracial. Fewer than 5 percent of all marriages in the United States are interracial; this percentage is considerably lower for white persons than for persons of color. In turn, among persons of color, black persons are considerably less likely to marry outside their race than are Native Americans, Asian Americans, or nonwhite, nonblack Latinas/os.

Even though they are no longer part of state statutes, the fact that anti-miscegenation laws ever existed in the United States undoubtedly has helped stigmatize interracial marriage. Although black-white marriages often were targeted, various other interracial marriages were banned by anti-miscegenation laws. Native Americans constitute the only racial group in which outmarriage, rather than inmarriage, is the norm.

Conclusion

Throughout the present entry, the concept of race has not been challenged directly. However, as social scientists across many disciplines have acknowledged, the concept of race is socially constructed and has little basis in biological reality. Not all social scientists have been equally enlightened regarding race: Anthropologists have been relatively willing and psychologists relatively unwilling to renounce the concept of race.

Given that 75 percent of black Americans possess European ancestry and 25 percent of white Americans possess African ancestry, it is obvious that the assumption of racial purity underlying anti-miscegenation laws was flawed. Indeed, the existence of such genetic diversity among so-called racial groups is evidence of the prevalence of miscegenation throughout American history despite laws to the contrary. Anti-miscegenation laws never were consistent with the ideals of romantic love and personal freedom that are part of American mythology. With the nullification of anti-miscegenation laws, Americans gradually have become more accepting and less intolerant of sexual and marital relations across racial lines.

ANZALDÚA, GLORIA (1942–2004)

Gloria Evangelina Anzaldúa is one of the most globally eminent and controversial Chicana writers and theorists of the 20th century. She was born on September 26, 1942, into extreme poverty in the Rio Grande Valley of South Texas, where she experienced sexism, racism, and classism while growing up as a Mexican American. She died on May 15, 2004, at age 62, in Santa Cruz, California. Gloria Anzaldúa obtained her BA from Pan American University and her MA from the University of Texas at Austin and worked as a teacher prior to receiving her MA in Austin and moving to California to live for the rest of her life.

Anzaldúa worked at universities throughout California as a visiting professor or invited guest speaker during most of her career. She often taught classes at the University of California in Santa Cruz for Women's Studies and other departments. As a Chicana lesbian feminist, she transformed and multiplied subjectivity for women of color, while challenging the way in which race and race relations between women of color and white women should be analyzed through her evolving notion of the "New Mestiza." Her theories and observations about race and ethnicity have impacted many academic fields and led to the evolution of other paradigms and theories. She coedited along with Cherrie Moraga This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color in 1981 (another major Chicana lesbian writer critic and activist).

Anzaldúa wrote the revolutionizing Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza (1987), which single-handedly changed the way in which subjectivity and identity are viewed in America and the world at large, particularly underlining issues of classism and gender and controversially highlighting and embracing her American identity. She poetically and philosophically united women of color and white feminists in her discussion about "The New Mestiza," expanding the notion of sisterhood to a new level. She also quite successfully edited one of the most popular anthologies for women of color in 1990, Making Face, Making Soul/Haciendo Caras: Creative and Critical Perspectives by Women of Color (1990), and coedited along with Analouise Keating This Bridge We Call Home: Radical Visions for Transformation (2002). She was also a prolific writer of books for children. Her children's books include Prietita Has a Friend (1991), Friends from the Other Side—Amigos del Otro Lado (1993), and Prietita y La Llorona (1996).

Anzaldúa is one of the most renowned and anthologized poets and creative writers in the United States. Her quotes about "the border" are ubiquitous and recognized widely, in particular her discussion about the land between the United States and Mexico being an open wound that continually rubs against the other side. Her use of the Spanish and English languages is both creative and sophisticated, inventing neologisms and Spanish words for nonexistant theoretical notions that define identity, particularly for Chicana women.

Although she was one of the most quoted American intellectuals of the 20th century, Anzaldúa died of complications from her diabetes and without institutional health insurance in 2004, on the verge of receiving her PhD from the University of California in Santa Cruz. After her passing, various Chicano organizations, such as MALCS (Mujeres Activas en Letras y Cambio Social), dedicated conferences and altars to her.

ARAB FEMINIST UNION

During the 1940s, Arab women organized themselves across various colonial and national boundaries into the Arab Feminist Union (AFU) (also known as the All-Arab Feminist Union, General Arab Feminist Union, and Arab Women's Union), which is an alliance of feminist associations from Arab countries. This organization focuses on achieving social and political gender equality while promoting pan-Arab nationalism. The Egyptian Feminist Union, and particularly its founder, Huda Shaarawi, played a critical role in founding and organizing the AFU.

History

The seeds of pan-Arab feminism were sown in 1938, during the Eastern Women's Conference for the Defense of Palestine. Egyptian Feminist Union founder Huda Shaarawi was elected president of the organization that came out of this conference, and she suggested that the individual countries establish feminist unions. Shaarawi later traveled to meet with women's organizations in a few Arab countries, and delegates of these organizations met in Lebanon to discuss a feminist conference.

In December 1944, the Egyptian Feminist Union convened the Arab Feminist Congress in Cairo. This progressive conference established the AFU, which brought together diverse women's organizations to promote both feminism and pan-Arab unity. However, from 1950 to 1960, several totalitarian regimes took over many of the newly independent Arab countries and cracked down on feminist organizing. At one point, the organization was forced to change its name to the Arab Women's Union, and many of the country's sections were forced to limit their work to providing social services or alter their focus from feminism to women's status within the ruling political party of the state.

Organizational Structure and Activities

The AFU was headquartered in Egypt, while the Egyptian Feminist Union administered the organization, and Huda Shaarawi was the first president. Initially, two other Egyptian women were elected treasurer and secretary. Each of the other member countries, Trans-Jordan, Iraq, Syria, Palestine, and Lebanon, had two representatives on the board. Huda Shaarawi drafted a constitution for the organization in 1945.

This organization brought together feminist unions from Arab countries that were each made up of the various women's organizations within that country. The AFU discussed feminism and women's roles as citizens within the constructs of nationalism and pan-Arab struggles. In addition, these feminists focused on the rights accorded to women under Islam, and they sought to affect the personal status laws of their countries. AFU also addressed issues such as the use of Arab women as prostitutes by Western militaries and the gendered nature of the Arabic language. The AFU also began the first journal focused on Arab women.

Today

The AFU is still in existence today, having been revived during increased feminist activism at the end of the 20th century, and it now includes countries from the Arabian Peninsula. Additionally, the goals of AFU live on in other organizations, like the Arab Women's Solidarity Association.

Arranged Marriages

Marriages arranged by parents or elders in the family were the worldwide norm until the 18th century. While such marriages have declined in the West concomitant to the ascendancy of individualism and the nuclear family, vestiges are still visible among aristocrats, royalties, and minority religious groups. The practice is prevalent in many countries of Asia, the Middle East, and sub-Saharan Africa. For example, until the mid-1990s, nearly 80 percent of all marriages in India were arranged by family elders. Communities that have migrated to the West from these countries have imported the custom with them, thus converting certain pockets of Europe and North America into populations that practice arranged marriage.

Definition and Salient Features

Arranged marriage may be defined as a marital union in which intended spouses are selected by parents or respected elders of the bride and groom. However, the system is not homogenous and can be complex in its variations and in different social contexts. In the best of circumstances, an arranged marriage meets with the approval of all involved parties, and in the worst, it may be forced on one or both intended spouses. Arranged marriage is ubiquitously contrasted to marriage based on romantic love. As globalization of goods, information, and media affects nations, arranged marriages are transitioning to various forms of quasi-arranged marriages. Therefore, rather than viewing marriage as a dichotomy between arranged marriage and one based on romantic/passionate love, it might be more meaningful to understand it in terms of the degree of control allowed to intended spouses. Accordingly, the marriage system may be categorized as follows: (a) The bride and groom have no say in the matter; (b) the bride and groom have the power to refuse; (c) the bride and groom make the choice, but parents/elders have the power to reject; and (d) parents/elders have no say in the matter.

The evolution of the arranged marriage system may methodically occur in the above order. However, the changes in the process might not be gender symmetric; that is, the control that intended spouses are able to wield over the selection of partners might not be equal for men and women. The intended groom may be allowed to veto his elders' selection and even choose and/or express interest in a particular woman, while the intended bride may be expected to obediently and silently accept the arrangement made by her parents and elders.

Societies that practice arranged marriage believe marriage to be an alliance between families and not an individual enterprise; hence, the intended spouses have little to contribute to the decision. Concurrently, these societies make distinctions between premarital romantic and postmarital conjugal love, and the former is generally derided as selfish and imprudent. Cultures that endorse arranged marriage also emphasize familial and social obligations and collective identities and have strong prohibitions against divorce. In arranged marriages, familial relationship is given higher priority than the conjugal bond, and duties within a marriage are stressed much more than any love that might develop between the couple. For example, a couple's strength of partnership is socially judged not by their love for each other, but by their steadfastness in taking care of elderly family members, financially supporting poorer siblings, and raising children with unwavering devotion.

Cultures that defend arranged marriages believe that such unions are stronger than "love" marriages. The low divorce rate in these societies is usually cited to substantiate the point. Proponents presume that when parents and elders select partners for their children, they are calculative and clear-sighted regarding the compatibility of intended spouses. Various social and economic features, such as caste, class, age, education, income, personality, religion, and family background, are examined and compared in negotiating a match. In addition, some families may appraise horoscopes of the intended partners to get a peek at the level of long-term success of the marriage. These advocates believe that young individuals smitten with someone of the opposite sex are hormone driven and are oblivious to the nuances of decision making, and consequently make mistakes in judgment. Thus, it is best to leave these important decisions to the worldly wise parents and elders in the family.

However, it may not be that arranged marriages endure due to infallible assessments of older decision makers. The cultures that sponsor arranged marriage also stigmatize divorce and make it nearly universally inaccessible. Even when marriages do not work, partners are expected to compromise and cooperate for the sake of the family. However, with the increase in young people's engagement in activities outside the home, such as the job market and entertainment, arranged marriages are dwindling in many traditional cultures, such as Korea and China. Simultaneously, divorces among young couples are mounting at an alarming rate; for example, in China, divorces have increased 500 percent since the late 1980s.

Marital Satisfaction and Conjugality

Individuals in arranged marriage nations tend to begin their lives with little or no expectations of their partners and view this as the key to lasting marital unions. They attest that in premarriage romance, partners have high expectations of each other that often lead to disenchantment after marriage and result in divorce. A common saying is that "in romantic marriages love comes before the marriage, and in arranged marriages it comes after." Studies of marital satisfaction yield ambiguous results as to which is more conducive to contentment and happiness, "love" or arranged marriage. Couples in successful arranged marriages are as delighted with their partners as couples who have fallen in love and then married. In cases in which satisfaction is mediocre, men do not seem to find any difference between love and arranged marriages, but women in arranged marriages tend to blame their dissatisfaction on the type of marriage. Although arranged marriage is routinely assumed in the West to be an underlying reason for domestic violence, there is no verifiable connection between the two. Despite imbalanced gender dynamics often visible in arranged marriages, such marriages do not seem to cause intimate violence—nor are "love" marriages immune to it.

Historically, arranged marriages occurred within a family's relational networks and through known matchmakers. Pictures of intended spouses and information about families were exchanged and investigated before agreements were authorized. These processes may be continuing in rural regions, but people in urban areas have long been utilizing the print media, professional matchmaking services, video, and the Internet to advertise for their sons' and daughters' matrimonials. Global labor migration has also made it necessary for communities that practice arranged marriage to innovate new and hi-tech ways of reaching pools of potential spouses from afar. In the arranged-marriage enclaves in Western countries, the system continues to undergo modifications in response to ever-greater demands of autonomy from the current generation. In many groups, arranged marriage now takes the form of suggested marriage, in which parents introduce their children to each other, hoping for them to click; short-listing of potential spouses, in which the sons/daughters make the final decision; and community-wide parties, in which youngsters of marriageable age meet each other. Most of these adjustments tend to favor men, while women's choices and conduct are policed more stringently.

Immigration and Marriage Arrangements

In immigrant communities in the West, arranged marriage is often taken as a symbol of traditional values that are at risk of obliteration by the dominant society's encroachment. Thus, many immigrant groups spend serious efforts to instill respect for the custom of arranged marriage in their children. Besides, many find the precursor of "love" marriage—dating—unacceptable. First-generation immigrants who are unfamiliar with dating seem to conflate it with sexual promiscuity and accordingly deter their children from engaging in it. As children of immigrants raised in the West reach marriageable ages, intergenerational conflicts around dating and marriage become prominent. However, in contrast to their parents' interests, most second-generation youngsters state that romantic love is the most important factor in their deliberation of marriage.

Arranged and forced marriages are closely linked. In countries where arranged marriage is the norm, women and men are frequently coerced to marry according to their families' decisions. In cultures that regard girls and women as parental and paternal property, daughters are routinely compelled to marry according to their fathers' and brothers' wishes. These marriages may be determined by the "bride price" the family would receive, whether a profitable marriage swap could be agreed upon for men in the family, and the exchange of debts and penalties that a girl's family might owe the potential groom's family. In highly patriarchal social structures, girls and women are socialized to obey their parents and men in the family; but they also may be physically and emotionally abused to comply. A rebellious daughter may even be killed to protect the "honor" of the family that has been tarnished by her defiance. However, women are not the only victims of forcible arranged marriages. In cultures and religions that do not recognize same-sex attraction, homosexual men may be forced to marry against their will as a cure or to save face for their families.

Human Survival and Arranged Marriage

During times of war, ethnic massacre, social unrest, and crushing poverty, marriages have been arranged between displaced and refugee women and men who were living in safe and prosperous countries. With the survival of cultures and ethnicities at stake, many marriages were arranged by friends, relatives, and matchmakers and confirmed even before the potential spouses had a chance to meet each other. For example, an aftermath of the Armenian genocide in 1915 to 1923 was the pervasive "picture bride" marriages for Armenian men living in North America. Between 1908 and 1924, 20,000 Japanese and Korean picture brides arrived in Hawaii and the United States to be married to immigrant men who could not take time off to return to their countries to get married. A different version of this practice is continuing today in the practice of "mail-order bride," whereby women who wish to move to developed countries through marriage are listed in catalogs circulated in North America and Europe by matchmaking/marriage agencies. Both the picture bride and mail-order bride practices have gained notoriety because of the many abuses women have suffered in these unions.

Art, Gender Images in

It is difficult to imagine visual representations that do not evoke gender: Portrayals of human beings and their interaction would be obvious examples of gender images in art, but landscape and still life also involve gendered positions, as embodied perspectives of gender-specific cultural experience, a gendered way of viewing the world, and possibly, a gendered aesthetic approach to its representation. The analysis of gender images in the visual arts and media has been a major concern in feminist and queer approaches to art history and cultural studies and has shaped the practice of artists whose work is informed by gender politics. The following sections highlight some key moments in the history of gender-inflected discussions of visual representation and examine how these have influenced feminist and queer strategies in the production of images.

Images of Beauty: The Nude and the Naked

Most university courses in art history at least until the 1970s began with a lengthy exposition of classical Greek and Roman art, primarily sculpture, as if art had suddenly sprung into being in the 5th century BC and was limited, at that time at least, to the southern tip of Europe. When acknowledged, non-European artistic traditions were either evoked as terms of comparison for Western aesthetic strands or reconfigured under the guise of "primitivism" as stylistic sources for artistic movements, such as cubism. However, a feminist analysis of the conventional Eurocentric origins of art exposes the ideological assumptions, workings, and silences of "traditional" art.

In his influential study of The Nude, Kenneth Clark also limits his scope to Europe, from the classical era to Picasso, because according to his definition, the nude is not merely a subject, that is, the portrayal of the human body unclothed, but a form of art that was invented in Greece in 5th century BC. In this new form, the representation of the naked body was merely the pretext for allegorically conveying a series of culturally important ideas, such as harmony, ecstasy, and humility. Although erotic, religious, or mythological images of nakedness can be found across the globe through the ages, only in the European tradition was the naked metaphorized as the nude—namely, nakedness invested with meaning. In the nude, the human body is found in its most overdetermined state, simultaneously containing the ideal of physical beauty and exemplifying the highest aesthetic achievement of its cultural setting. Clark privileges sculpture over Greek vase painting because the naturalism and sexual explicitness of (often male same-sex) sexual encounters that are found in the latter do not support his argument.

Critiquing his position from a feminist perspective, Lynda Nead notes that despite refusing to explicitly gender the nude as form, Clark mostly discusses female nudes from the point of view of a male spectator. Nead interprets this implicit gendering as a manifestation of a pervasive sexual division of labor in visual culture, including fine art, which places femininity on the side of the model, the embodiment of ideals and the aesthetic object of contemplation, while masculinity is identified with the artist, connoisseur (expert), and consumer of representations and their pleasures. Furthermore, Nead claims, the process by which the naked is turned into the nude has a special affinity to notions of femininity: The nude represents flesh tamed by culture and reshaped through aesthetic ideals into lithe and contained form. Clark alludes to prehistoric statuettes of corpulent female fertility figures as out of control and undisciplined bodies that were gradually contoured and framed in the idealized Venuses of classical antiquity and the Renaissance. Women's bodies—in but also beyond their representations—are suited to the nude not because they are naturally predisposed to the aesthetic contours of the genre, but precisely because they are not. The female nude, more than the male, embodies the taming of the naked, nature disciplined into culture, because it requires much more disciplining to become idealized.

If Clark's interpretation reinforced the passive-active division of labor between the maker/consumer and model/object of art, it did so only in a highly sublimated manner, that is, by concentrating on the nude as pure aesthetic form, carefully distancing it from sexuality, albeit with only partial success. According to the active/passive heterosexual division of labor, a phrase coined by Laura Mulvey to describe the gender dynamics of vision and desire, men look, women are looked at, and analogically, masculinity is the subject desire, while femininity is confined to being its object. In the latter half of the 20th century, the nude erupts back into the naked: In popular visual culture (film, print advertising, etc.) as well as art, the passive-active division of labor acquires the sexual dimension previously suppressed by aesthetic form, and this newly exposed sexuality throws a new light on the power structures underlying representation.

The Gaze

Mulvey, filmmaker and theorist, pioneered a new feminist approach to visual culture, in which Marxist and psychoanalytic theory were critically combined. Mulvey developed an extremely influential and often misused model of interpretation of patriarchal representations broadly defined, including public spectacles such as the Miss World contest, pop art, and narrative film. In this model, the psychological, aesthetic, and political workings of the objectification of women are carefully interrogated. Mulvey coined the term scopophilia to describe the mutual implication of the attraction exercised by images in art, film, and advertising, on one hand, and the pleasure that heterosexual men take in looking at beautiful women, on the other. According to Mulvey, the two are never found wholly distinct within patriarchal visual culture. In narrative film, the beautiful face of an actress fills the screen and arrests the flow of the plot, until it gets replaced by the active bodies of men and the narrative speeds up again. In Women as Furniture, by pop artist Allen Jones, life-sized statues of women in S&M outfits are contorted to the shape of a table, chair, and similar items; while their bodies suggest sexual promise, their function indicates domesticity, thus synthesizing the two extremes of the patriarchal fantasy of femininity: the virgin and the whore. Representations are shaped by the expected mode of their consumption, Mulvey argues: As long as pleasurable looking is the primary mode of consuming art and visual culture, the active/passive heterosexual division of labor will remain unchallenged. Women are so pervasively conditioned to be the passive object of the male active gaze that even when alone, they visualize themselves being looked at from outside, by invisible yet omnipresent desiring (or dismissive) eyes.

However, the passivity imposed on femininity is double-edged: if women in representation are relegated to the position of servitude (providing visual pleasure and being perceived as promising other pleasures as well), then real women spectators are actually not involved in either the propagation nor the consumption of such imagery. Their lack of involvement may be approached in two diametrically opposed ways: Whereas it is virtually annihilating of female agency, it can also have a potentially liberating effect. It may be interpreted as annihilating, because the woman spectator is left with two equally compromising options: to either narcissistically identify with the woman portrayed, this strange "narcissism" refers to one trait only—the ability to attract and satisfy masculine "scopophilia"—or to adopt the male gaze as her own, which would not only be politically problematic but, in a sense, impossible. The scopophilic gaze is not one that simply takes woman as its object, but it does so in a specifically male heterosexual way, which does not accommodate lesbian desire. On the other hand, this lack of involvement can also be liberating, because real women are not implicated in this economy of looking and being looked at, even though they do suffer its effects. Mulvey points out that representations of women manipulate but do not exhaust the meanings of lived femininity. Art and visual culture might be a reflection of their cultural and social contexts, not in the realist sense of displaying social realities in visual form, but as virtual sites where desires, fears, and anxieties are expressed and worked through. Finally, since art and visual culture are not merely reflections but also sites of construction of gender identities, they make an apt site for feminist and queer interventions through the production of alternative representations.

Feminist Strategies in Art Theory and Practice

Although almost no feminists involved in the visual arts explicitly promoted a single type of representation and art practice over others, few chose to sit on the fence in their evaluation of feminist art. The good intentions of artists involved in or sympathetic toward the women's movements were rarely in doubt, but the potential effects of their work were a matter for open and at times fervent debate: The key question was whether and how easily feminist artwork could be misinterpreted and co-opted by established phallocentric perspectives. Many existing classifications of feminist art practice point in the direction of a binary division, between often conceptualist art practice informed by deconstruction and psychoanalytic theory, on one hand, and humanist, celebratory art that is normally figurative and inclusive of wide audiences, on the other. Janet Wolff has argued that this division condenses many disparate differences and antagonisms, including "scriptovisual" work (comprising both visual material and text) versus painting, conceptualism versus figurative representation, deconstruction versus celebration, emphasis on theory versus experience, and elitism versus accessibility and inclusiveness. Wolff concludes that despite the dangers involved in co-opting feminism into a purely academic field, there is a pressing need for intellectual work that does not, however, lose its organic links to art practice and social activism. Although the accuracy of the binary divisions she discusses has been persuasively challenged (e.g., much celebratory work is also theoretically sophisticated), their influence still informs the interpretation and classification of second-wave feminist art.

Best known for leading the team responsible for the installation The Dinner Party (1974–1979), Judy Chicago has been a prominent artist, theorist, and educator whose work is considered emblematic of the celebratory strand of feminist art. She targets long-standing taboos of female experience, such as menstruation (for example, in the print Red Flag, 1971, she depicts the removal of a used tampon) and explores the form of female genitalia both through explicit imagery and in more-abstract formats. The Dinner Party drew on the crafts skills of many female volunteers, while evoking the iconography of the Last Supper. It was an imaginary celebration of women's achievements, with three tables arranged in a triangle, including 39 settings for historical and mythological female personages and additional names inscribed within the triangle. Each setting consisted of a painted and sculpted variation on female anatomy and a dedication. Chicago's work has been dismissed as kitsch or even obscene by conservative commentators but has also been met with criticism from feminist circles: Despite celebrating the female form, it also seems to reduce or at least anchor femininity to biology. Although it inverts the chastity of the female nude, it also comes dangerously close to pornography.

Sylvia Sleigh is a figurative painter who inverted the gendered dynamic between painter/spectator and model/object in a series of beautiful male nudes. The Turkish Bath (1973) is a clear reference and commentary on the orientalism of Ingres, replacing the exotic and seductive white slaves of the original with trendy young men who, albeit naked, retain much of their individuality in their expression and comportment. Philip Golub Reclining (1971) is a gender-inverted revision of Velasquez's Rokeby Venus (c. 1650), in which the reclining nude gazes at herself/himself in a cleverly positioned mirror, thus offering both the front and back view to the spectator. Sleigh uses the device of the mirror to put herself into the picture, upright, caught in the act of painting, in the background of an idle unclothed man. Yet, as Rozsika Parker and Griselda Pollock have noted, despite its incisive critique of the tradition of depersonalized nudes, Sleigh's inversion almost comes full circle: Having replaced women with men, these paintings still highlight that even when placed on the side of femininity, men fail to assume its passive character in the sexual division of labor within representation by remaining obstinately individual and self-possessed.

Based on a profound awareness of the problematic status of the female body as spectacle and object, some feminist artists chose to elide its representation altogether. In her major installation work Post-Partum Document (1973–1978), Mary Kelly attempts to reconcile the culturally opposed roles of mother and artist, procreator and creator. By declining to depict the sacred dyad of mother and child and so participate in long-standing conventional representations of woman as mother/Madonna, the installation consists of a scriptovisual documentation of the evolving mother-child relationship. The work documents the preordained separation of the male child from the mother through a combination of meticulous collection and detailed production of documentation in six parts, ranging from analyzed fecal stains and feeding charts (I) to the child's first attempts to form letters, accompanied by the mother's diary and exergue (VI). In collecting and manufacturing this material and by, significantly, transforming it into a work of art, Kelly probes the tensions and cultural contradictions between the roles of mother and artist, the occupation of child care and artistic or intellectual endeavors. Interestingly, the great conceptual sophistication of the work has been cited against it as well: Despite its evocation of common female experience, Kelly's approach to her material has been deemed mystifying and alienating for a big part of the audience of feminist art. All the same, not only does the Post-Partum Document represent a highly evolved theoretical engagement with gender in art and visual culture but it also exemplifies how intricately involved feminist art theory and practice have been.

Queer Perspectives

As in the case of feminism, the critique of existing representations and the creation of alternatives from queer perspectives are closely linked and inform one another. One of the most prominent targets of queer art history and theory has been the desexualized, sublimated nude. Not only did Kenneth Clark's nude disavow the sexual underpinnings of looking and being looked at, he also suppressed a variety of overtly sexual and quite often homosexual representations, in which the sensual body was far from allegorical, standing for nothing more than its own fleshly lust. Unearthing the sexual and specifically the homosexual aspects of classical antiquity unsettled many of the most fundamental assumptions around the foundations of Western aesthetics, let alone sexual mores. Mythological representations of masculinity were reread against the grain, even in the aesthetically and politically conservative neoclassicism. Art historians such as Whitney Davis point to disjunctions between pro-revolutionary politics and radical sexual politics of representation in 18th-century France. Davis reinterprets Girodet's Sleep of Endymion against Marxist readings of the painting that operate on a very narrow definition of politics as a distinct level of culture belonging to the public rather than private sphere and having little if anything to do with sexuality. For Davis, Girodet's passive and decadent Endymion represents not the fall of the old regime, but a moment of doubt and opportunity in the formation of gender positions and oppositions before they solidify into rigid binaries.

One of most successful and controversial gay artists of the late 20th century was American photographer Robert Mapplethorpe. His glossy and highly stylized black-and-white nudes are in an interesting relationship to Clark's definition of the nude, both evoking it and revising it, although perhaps not very radically. Nead argues that his portraits of female body builder Lisa Lyon do challenge and blur the boundaries between conventional definitions of femininity and masculinity. At the same time, however, Mapplethorpe's portrayal of Lyon reinforces the idea of the unruly female body tamed through and within the genre of the nude, contoured through a strict body-building regime and further contained within the formal parameters of the photographer's signature style. Even more politically problematic is Mapplethorpe's series of Black Males, in which the lean bodies of young black men are simultaneously portrayed as erotic and, arguably, depersonalized, with their faces often hidden or left out of the frame. To reduce the black body to form and accentuated sexuality is an extremely controversial act that has been deemed racist by some critics. In Mapplethorpe's defense, Kobena Mercer emphasizes that the white male queer gaze through which black men are framed does not represent a dominant or even powerful position in the cultural context of Western imperialism. Hence, Mapplethorpe's pictures do not impose colonial fantasies on the portrayed black bodies, as has been suggested, because gay masculinity is not endowed with such power; instead, they produce a visual language for same-sex desire within the genre of the nude, chipping away at its repressive sublimations and radically revising its cultural politics.

Asaf Ali, Aruna (1909–1996)

Aruna Asaf Ali was an important figure in 20th-century Indian history. As a nationalist who fought against British imperialism, as a socialist and member of the Communist Party of India, and as an ardent feminist, she made significant contributions to Indian political life. This entry presents her biography and assesses her contribution to Indian politics.

Aruna Asaf Ali was born in a Bengali Hindu family on July 16, 1909. Her father, Upendranath Ganguly, was a hotelier, and her mother, Ambalika, a home-maker. Educated in a Catholic boarding school, she fell in love with English literature and wanted to go to college, but her family pressured her to marry. She rejected arranged marriages and instead opted for a "self-arranged" marriage to a Muslim lawyer and anti-colonial nationalist, Asaf Ali, who was 21 years older than Aruna. The couple faced major opposition from their families, but they did marry in September 1928 and gradually won the support of both their families. In her personal life, Aruna Asaf Ali sought to maintain her individuality. Several of her personal choices, including her marriage to a Muslim, her choice not to have children, and her romantic relationship with Edatata Narayanan after her husband's death, all defied Indian middle-class social conventions.

Asaf Ali contributed to Aruna's intellectual development by introducing her to Gandhi and Nehru and their political struggle against the British. He also broadened her reading interests beyond literature to include works on socialism, feminism, and Indian nationalism. Aruna Asaf Ali came to the forefront of politics when she unfurled the Indian flag at a political gathering in Bombay in August 1942, thus inaugurating the "Quit India Movement" in that city. Because that rally was banned by the British and many political leaders had been jailed in anticipation of the rebellion, her defiant act propelled her to the center of Indian politics. She went underground during the movement and challenged Gandhi's creed of nonviolence by supporting necessary acts of violence against British authorities. She exchanged several letters with Gandhi in which she discussed her choice of going underground, which was contrary to Gandhi's principle of openness in the rebellion. She also refused to surrender to British authorities despite Gandhi's suggestion she do so, because she felt surrender was morally weak. Despite their differences, Gandhi and Aruna Asaf Ali respected each other's political philosophies.

Asaf Ali aligned herself with the socialist wing of the Congress Party and was drawn to Nehru's ideas of industrialization as a means to social justice and equity. After independence, she joined the Congress Socialist Party and soon also found them not radical enough. Eventually, she joined the Communist Party of India (CPI). She was invited to Russia to study Communist society and was given full access by the Soviet government. Following her husband's death in 1953, she continued her political activism. She was elected New Delhi's first mayor in 1958 and ran as an independent candidate. That same year, she established Link, a socialist weekly that sought to support Nehru's socialist economic agenda.

Asaf Ali also actively supported women's issues. She worked with Sarojini Naidu and Rameshwari Nehru and became secretary of the Delhi Women's League, established by Rameshwari Nehru. She worked to increase women's participation in politics and also to promote social change with regard to women's roles in society. She attended the 1932 All India Women's Conference in Lahore and worked through it until the founding of the Communist-led National Federation of Indian Women in 1954.

Aruna Asaf Ali was an independent thinker. All her life, she was engaged in public life. She questioned Gandhian nationalism, Russian communism, and Western feminism. She emphasized the need for an Indian form of feminism that would not simply emphasize middle-class concerns and rejected simplistic adaptations of Western values in the name of feminism. She dedicated herself to public service and humanitarian causes in India and championed social justice. After her death, she was awarded the Bharat Ratna, India's highest award.

Assertiveness Training

Assertiveness includes (a) open expression of thoughts and feelings, (b) expressions uninfluenced by emotion, (c) flexible reactions based on consideration for others and the situation, and (d) independent judgment of behavior. Analysis shows that most assertiveness inventories as well as trainings focus on behavioral aspects.

Assertive behavior is related to healthy self-esteem and is the basis for building stable relationships. It is neither aggressive nor insecure. An assertive person sees interaction partners as equals and feels neither superior nor inferior. Twin studies show that there is a biological component in assertiveness, but other factors such as reliable and supportive relationships are important, too. Problems with assertiveness are attributed to lack of models and lack of opportunities to practice assertiveness.

Assertiveness training uses relaxation exercises to cope with emotional distress. Typical cognitive elements are stopping dysfunctional automatic thoughts, disputing irrational beliefs, and practicing alternative interpretations. Behavioral elements include video feedback, modeling, and role-play. Relevant elements include social skills, including reactions to criticism or rejection, being able to say no, and being able to demand one's right. In some programs, a distinction is made between several types of assertive behavior: (a) asking a favor in situations with strangers; (b) balancing relationships with family, romantic, partners, or friends; and (c) demanding one's right in public and formal interactions.

Assertiveness trainings have been conceptualized for various specific groups, such as children, adolescents, ethnic minorities, women, and people who are at risk of being bullied, abusing drugs, or having problems with anger control or aggression. In other words, the target audience of such trainings may be shy as well as aggressive people. Both shy behavior and aggressive behavior are considered inappropriate. The purpose of assertiveness training is to enable participants to replace these behaviors with assertive acts.

Gender Aspect

More women than men have problems with being assertive. A meta-analysis by Jean Twenge compared assertiveness scores in men and women historically and showed that women's assertiveness covaries with their social status and educational attainment.

What is regarded as appropriate and assertive is also related to gender roles. Behavior that is seen as assertive in men is often regarded as arrogant or aggressive in women. This is true of observer perception as well as self-perception. Assertive behavior is more likely to be seen as inappropriate with females, for it clashes with traditional role expectations. Women in high-status positions often experience a dilemma between appearing likable and being effective.

Societal Aspect

Nonviolent social movements have sometimes been sparked by individual acts of assertiveness, such as civil disobedience. In 1955, Rosa Parks, an African American citizen of Alabama, refused to vacate her seat in a public bus for a white passenger and was arrested. That event sparked the Montgomery Bus Boycott, which is considered one of the starting points of the civil rights movement in the United States.

ASSOCIATION OF COMMUNITY ORGANIZATIONS FOR REFORM NOW (ACORN)

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN) began as a membership-building project of the National Welfare Rights Organization (NWRO) in 1970, in Little Rock, Arkansas. ACORN developed a model of community organizing that worked one-on-one with people to build large membership organizations directed by their low-income, mainly female membership bases. The group has pursued a holistic view of community organizing and has advocated for living-wage legislation, affordable housing, fair lending, rape prevention, and day care and workfare worker organizing.

ACORN grew rapidly. Today, it boasts more than 220,000 members in more than 100 chapters in 38 states, the District of Columbia, Canada, Mexico, Peru, Argentina, and the Dominican Republic. ACORN has developed into both a locally effective advocate for low- and moderate-income communities and a nationally important group that is consulted on legislation dealing with a wide variety of issues that affect the group's low- and moderate-income constituents.

ACORN's efforts to expand the supply of affordable housing have included housing takeovers and squatting campaigns in vacant, government-foreclosed housing in the 1980s. A nonprofit housing development and management organization (ACORN Housing Corporation) to manage housing soon branched off. It also was a leader in efforts to pass national legislation against redlining and has worked against predatory lending in low-income areas.

ACORN has led efforts to organize workers in non-standard labor contracts. In the 1990s, ACORN was among the first groups to organize welfare recipients who were compelled to work outside the home as a condition of receiving welfare grants. Since welfare work requirements meant that mothers on welfare had to find child care, the informal and state-funded family day care sector expanded. ACORN began to organize day care workers and has led campaigns in Los Angeles and New York. ACORN has also worked with the Service Employees International Union to organize health care workers and has several affiliated local chapters. It has thus been at the forefront of putting care work into the spotlight as real work, deserving of respect and fair compensation. It has also been a leader in many local battles to implement living-wage ordinances.

In line with the group's ethos of developing campaigns through the concerns of its members, ACORN has also been a leader in urban education reform, both by leading fights against public school privatization and by opening community-oriented charter schools in low- and moderate-income neighborhoods. It has worked to enhance neighborhood safety by getting local governments to provide more recreational opportunities and by pressing police departments to increase patrols and to respond more effectively to rape. ACORN has also set up rape prevention programs in several cities.

ACORN has become one of the principal advocates for the poor residents of New Orleans and has advocated for their inclusion in post–Hurricane Katrina redevelopment plans.

BACHELORS AND SPINSTERS

The terms bachelor and spinster refer to the civic status of never being married, though they have more commonly been used to describe those remaining unmarried beyond the conventional marriage age. Representations of bachelors and spinsters are indicative of the important status of marriage as a political, economic, and social institution in most cultures throughout history. Declining marriage rates across industrialized countries might suggest the waning importance of marriage; nevertheless, research indicates that marital status continues to be an important category of "difference" shaping individuals' lives.

The English word bachelor, found since the 14th century, comes from the Old French term for a young knight in training. The term spinster, literally "one who spins," relates to the expected task of the unmarried women of Anglo-Saxon households, that of spinning yarn. The word came to signify unmarried women in legal documents from the 17th century. In 2004, the use of these terms on marriage certificates was rescinded in the United Kingdom as part of legislation introducing civil partnership.

Stereotypes attached to bachelorhood and spinsterhood vary in relation to particular historical and cultural contexts. The many negative synonyms used historically for spinsters, such as "odd," "redundant," and "old maid," are indicative of the different significance marriage has held for women and men. "Eligible bachelor" typically denotes an attractive man worthy of choice; men who remain unmarried, however, risk being represented as either unwilling or incapable of taking on the responsibilities of a family. Historically, the spinster was depicted as a pitiable victim of circumstance, "on the shelf" due to a shortage of men following war or having to care for parents. The modern spinster is more often depicted as pursuing a career at the expense of marriage and motherhood. Both, however, are represented as ultimately unfulfilled. Nevertheless, there is some indication the term is being reclaimed, exemplified by the phrase "leather spinster."

The proportion of the population that never marries has varied according to time and place and in particular epochs could be a significant minority. In contrast to popular images of spinsterhood as a negative state, historical research identifies the positive roles played by never-married women and their invaluable contributions to wider social change. For example, one third of women in early modern England did not marry; typically living in the households of employers or other family members, their contributions were critical to the maintenance of supposedly self-sufficient nuclear families. In parts of the United States and Europe during the 19th century, remaining never married was a respectable alternative to marriage for women who devoted their lives to the service of others, albeit often within a narrow range of acceptable occupations and behavior. A significant number of never-married women were also active in philanthropic and social reform movements, as well as being the backbone of the first wave of feminism.

Periods of higher rates of spinsterhood have been variously ascribed to demographic factors, such as a relative shortage of men, for example, as a result of the Crusades in the late Middle Ages, or of emigration, as in 19th-century Britain. Other explanations focus on socioeconomic factors; higher rates of bachelorhood and spinsterhood among African Americans, for example, have been related to persistent racism, alongside increased opportunities for women, impacting on the relative status of black men and women. Declining marriage rates across industrialized nations have been attributed in part to increasing educational and employment opportunities, with more women now having access to the means to live independently. Other explanations analyze these changes in terms of consequent shifts in gender relations. Feminist explanations have interpreted a rise in spinsterhood as a manifestation of female autonomy and relate this to wider societal changes, giving rise to an expansion of female identities beyond marriage and motherhood. Here, remaining unmarried is understood as a positive, chosen status, rather than the outcome of circumstance.

Much research argues that the married are generally healthier, wealthier, and happier. However, the comparison is frequently with "the unmarried," a category including the separated, divorced, and widowed, as well as the never married. Conflating these categories risks overlooking distinctions between these groups as well as overlooking the different characteristics of never-married women and men. Previous research distinguishing the never married shows an association with higher-educational and higher-occupational status for women, compared with both married women and never-married men. The causal relationship is unclear; singleness for women necessitated financial self-sufficiency; however, further research is necessary to elucidate whether this is an outcome or enabler of singleness.

There is an emerging body of empirical research that focuses on individuals' own understandings and experiences, to date mainly looking at women. This research challenges popular understandings of spinsterhood, for example, as associated with isolation and loneliness; rather, it demonstrates that intimacy does not reside exclusively in marriage or with one's own children. Furthermore, this research also indicates contentment with the never-married status that belies representations of spinsterhood as a source of emotional difficulty. However, there is some indication that persistent stigmatizing may impact negatively on individuals' self-perceptions and well-being.

Bachelor and spinster may appear somewhat outmoded concepts in a contemporary context of considerable social transition, including an increase in cohabitation and turnover in relationships, which might suggest a waning of the salience of marital status over time. Nevertheless, marriage remains a materially and culturally privileged status in most societies, a phenomenon academic Bella de Paulo describes as "singleism."

Balch, Emily Greene (1867–1961)

Feminist pragmatist, social settlement leader, and Nobel laureate, Emily Greene Balch was a world leader with an innovative intellectual and political legacy. She is one of the most important female sociologists of the early years of the discipline. From 1897 to 1919, she taught sociology at Wellesley College and devoted the rest of her life to world peace.

Balch was born in 1867, in Boston, a descendant of distinguished American ancestors. Her father, Francis Vernies Balch, was a notable lawyer, and her mother, Ellen Maria Noyes, came from an affectionate, large family. Emily's mother died when she was 17, and she then turned primarily to her father. Balch graduated in 1889 from Bryn Mawr College in its first matriculated class and received its highest academic honor, the Bryn Mawr Fellowship for European Study. Balch began a close friendship with Jane Addams in 1892 at the Summer School of Applied Ethics at Plymouth, Massachusetts. With Helena Dudley, a college classmate, Balch cofounded a social settlement in Boston, Denison House, in 1892.

Balch joined the faculty at Wellesley College in 1897 and taught courses in socialism, statistics, social economics, labor, and sociology. She became a feminist pragmatist, advocating democracy and education to help form an articulate citizenry with equal rights and opportunities for all. Her most significant book was Our Slavic Fellow Citizen, the first major sociological analysis of immigration, based on her rigorous field studies. She spent 1905 studying emigration in Austria-Hungary and a year visiting Slavic colonies across the United States. She compared the lives of people in Europe with those of immigrants in the United States. This provided excellent preparation for working with different ethnic groups during and after World War I.

In 1915, Balch, Addams, and Alice Hamilton led a worldwide delegation of women to organize for peace through the International Congress of Women (ICW). Following a wartime meeting with almost 2,000 women, they published Women at The Hague. They also met with heads of state, including war nations, to plead for peace.

From 1916 to 1917, Balch took a sabbatical from Wellesley and extended it the following year, while her pacifism and employability were debated at the college. In 1918, she published a pacifist volume, Approaches to the Great Settlement. Balch increasingly became the target of virulent attacks after the armistice in November 1918. In 1919, Balch was fired for her radical politics and pacifism: After 20 years of exemplary teaching and scholarship, at 52 years of age, her academic career was over.

A "Red Scare" in 1919 decreed that Addams and Balch were the "two most dangerous people in America," and their names topped a long list of government "conspirators." They were ostracized into the late 1920s, a financially harsh period for Balch.

The ICW met again in 1919 and formed the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF). Balch became its international secretary-treasurer and dedicated the rest of her life to its message of peace. She edited the organization's congress reports for 1919, 1921, and 1924. In 1927, as the leader of a delegation selected by WILPF, she edited and largely wrote Occupied Haiti. Its forceful, reasonable arguments led to their adoption by President Herbert Hoover in 1930, including the withdrawal of American military forces from Haiti. Balch was elected cochair of WILPF in 1929.

Balch worked closely with the League of Nations as well as its subsequent organization, the United Nations, as a citizen and WILPF representative. Many of her writings on peace were compiled in Beyond Nationalism, but their contextual, organizational networks were never analyzed. Balch lived intermittently in Geneva, Switzerland, from 1920 to 1939, where she labored on behalf of all these organizations. In July 1937, Balch succeeded Addams as honorary international president of WILPF, and her work was recognized with the Nobel Peace Prize in 1946. She died peacefully on January 9, 1961, in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Barbie

"Barbie" was created by Ruth Handler, wife of Elliot Handler, one of the cofounders of Mattel. While watching her daughter, Barbara, play with her dolls, Handler realized that other than paper dolls, there were no three-dimensional adult dolls for young girls to play with. Handler thought that producing this type of doll would allow young girls to explore the roles and professions that would be available to them as adult women. When Handler presented her idea to Mattel executives, it was met with considerable resistance due to the projected production costs and the fact that some were wary of producing a doll for young girls that had such explicit adult features. On a trip to Switzerland in 1956, Ruth Handler saw a doll in a toy shop that mirrored what she envisioned for the doll she pitched to Mattel. The doll in the Switzerland toy shop was named "Lilli" and stood 11½ inches tall, had blond hair, long limbs, and a shapely body. Lilli was targeted for an adult audience and was not intended for children. On her vacation, Handler purchased several different Lilli dolls to bring back to Mattel. Mattel secured the patent and rights for the Barbie doll, and in March 1959, at the American Toy Fair in New York City, the first "Barbie doll" made her debut.

The Evolution of Barbie

Her full name was "Barbie Millicent Roberts," the daughter of Robert and Margaret Roberts, and she was a teenage fashion model. The first Barbie dolls were 11½ inches tall and were available with either blond or brunette hair. The doll was dressed in a black-and-white bathing suit, white sunglasses, black high heels, and gold hoop earrings. She also was packaged with a catalogue showing other models that could be purchased. When she first came on the scene, Barbie was not immediately embraced by the American public; many had never seen a doll with adult features that was designed for young girls. However, in 1959, Mattel sold over 351,000 Barbie dolls.

Since her inception in 1959, Barbie has been transformed and reworked many times to reflect the changes that have occurred in society. Beyond changes in her appearance, Barbie has held over 60 careers, including fashion model, doctor, pilot, athlete, veterinarian, teacher, and fast-food worker. Additionally, Barbie began to reflect other cultures and countries outside of the United States, beginning in 1964 with the introduction of Barbie's and her boyfriend "Ken's" travel costumes. Clothing in this line reflected the dress in Japan, Mexico, Switzerland, and Holland. Beginning in 1980, Mattel marketed a collectors set, Dolls of the World Collection, which contained over 40 different dolls representing countries around the world. Barbie has also been adapted to be more marketable in certain countries. In Japan, for instance, Barbie's expression was toned down, her eyes were brown, her skin pale, and her chest smaller than her American counterpart. Her feet were molded to fit flat shoes, and her accessories were more domestic—pots, pans, baby bottles, shopping bags, and simple dresses like those worn by Japanese housewives. Likewise, Barbie dolls sold in Middle Eastern countries have also been toned down to reflect the modest dress of Middle Eastern women.

Commentary From Critics and Fans

Despite Barbie's popularity worldwide, many feminists have criticized Barbie as an unattainable ideal for young girls and women and argue that she promotes an unrealistic body image for females. Many of these criticisms focus on Barbie's body measurements. They point out that if Barbie were a "real" woman, her measurements would be 39–21–33, something that only 1 in 100,000 women could actually attain. Likewise, she would lack the necessary 17 to 22 percent body fat needed to menstruate. When confronted with Barbie's unattainable body style, creator Ruth Handler remarked that the doll's clothing would not hang correctly if her measurements were not exaggerated. Feminists also argue that instead of presenting a wide range of careers and interests for girls to pursue, Barbie presents a limited number of stereotypic options. The most outspoken criticism came in 1994, when Mattel produced a "Teen Talk Barbie" who proclaimed, "Math is hard."

Others argue that Barbie can be read as a liberated woman. While she has held numerous careers, she remains self-sufficient and supports herself. Ken entered the scene in 1961 as Barbie's boyfriend, but the two have never married, and in February 2004, a story appeared on CNN and other news networks stating that Barbie and Ken had officially broken up in order to spend quality time apart. Fans use this as evidence of Barbie as a female who does not need a man to be successful or complete.

Still others question whether Barbie is actually female and heterosexual at all. Some scholars argue that Barbie is open to multiple and even conflicting interpretations. One of these alternate interpretations is that Barbie reflects the ultrafeminine persona that drag queens strive to emulate. Others argue that Barbie and her world are also open to nonstraight readings, such as Barbie as lipstick lesbian or closeted lesbian; as bisexual, pursuing a relationship with Ken but breaking it off to pursue other options; or even as asexual. Those who read Barbie in these ways also point to the number of nonnormative occupations that Barbie has had over the years as evidence of the transgressive properties of Barbie.

Regardless of how she is viewed in society, Barbie is a cultural icon that is a staple in American culture. Her popularity has lasted for 50 years and continues as she is transformed to reflect the culture in which she circulates. As long as she is around, Barbie will continue to attract attention from fans and critics alike.

BEARS

Bears refers to a subculture of the gay men's community that celebrates being large and hairy, though many of its members suggest that bearness is more a state of mind characterized by friendliness, a down-to-earth attitude, and sex positivity. The idea of a bear as a certain type of gay man was influenced by "chubs" and "chaser" groups, such as Girth and Mirth, and homo-masculine working-class gay icons, such as leather-men, bikers, and cowboys, but also the radical "faerie" subculture that advocated gender ambiguity and a resistance to commodified notions of sex and masculinity.

What began to congeal from these eclectic influences was that a bear man was all or some of the following: bulky, bearded, hirsute, and usually middle-aged. Thus, the more of those qualities any one man had, the more likely it would be that he would be called a bear, but the relationship to masculinity has always been harder to characterize.

Bear has also been defined by what it is not: the idealized gay man put forth in most gay pornography and other gay media, basically a young, fit, and smooth-skinned club-hopping guy who looks like a Calvin Klein model. These types are referred to as "WeHo boys" in Los Angeles and "Chelsea boys" in New York, "twinks" when they are particularly young, and "circuit boys" if they are part of the traveling dance parties known as "circuit parties." Bear has always been somewhat of an umbrella term, and the bear scene has been a meeting place for iconic bears and their admirers but also a space where older men, working-class men, large men, hirsute men, bearded men, and their admirers have felt welcome. Admirers have generally been considered part of the community, and the line between bear and admirer is more blurry than the lines between members of other sexual subcultures, such as chubs and their admirers.

Les Wright is generally regarded as the first writer to document the history of the bear scene. He has edited two volumes on bear identity and bear culture, The Bear Book, published in 1997, and The Bear Book II, published in 2001. He places the origins of bear identity around 1980, when men in San Francisco and a few other U.S. cities began to place little teddy bears in the pockets of their jeans or on their knapsacks. He states that this was in reaction to the practice of placing handkerchiefs in one's pocket to signify sexual roles or fetishes and signified an interest in cuddling.

The bear community started to come together in the mid-1980s as a significant number of self-identified bears and bear admirers began interacting on early computer bulletin boards and having parties. In 1986, Bear Magazine, a homemade magazine that would later become more polished, debuted in San Francisco, and a few years later, "The Lone Star Saloon" opened in San Francisco's SOMA (South of Market) district; it not only became a home for bear culture, but attracted many tourists as a sort of bear mecca. Gay bars across the country began to feature "bear nights," and a listserv has continued until the present, the "Bears Mailing List."

By the early 1990s, bear had become not only a way to describe certain gay men, but a vibrant subculture within gay culture. For some, it was primarily a way to meet men, but for others, it had a more political aspect that involved a resistance to the "body fascism" or "lookism" of the gay community. Even those who were less politically inclined would often refer to it as the "bear movement" and say that it had a philosophy of inclusivity, friendliness, and camaraderie. One way this philosophy was put into practice was through the development of bear clubs, which became widespread and popular. Most clubs were organized as nonprofits and raised money for charity, as well as organizing social activities for their members. During this time, there were bear contests (alternative beauty contests or parodies of beauty contests) and bear "runs" (large gatherings of bears), such as Bear Pride in Chicago, Texas Bear Round-Up in Houston, and International Bear Rendezvous in San Francisco. Several more bear pornographic magazines emerged during the 1990s, and as Internet usage increased, many Web sites appeared where men could meet for dates and friendship. During this time, the community named various subtypes, such as "cubs" (younger or not quite as bearish), "daddy bears" (older men or father figure types), "otters" (hairy but slim), "musclebears" (more muscular than chubby), and "leatherbears" (involved in the "leather scene").

In the last 10 years, the bear community has grown and matured even more, and it continues to be a big part of many men's lives, but some in the community worry that it has changed and lost its vision, becoming somewhat of a marketing niche (e.g., the Internet offers many pay sites that promise pornography involving "hot hairy" masculine men). Ray Kampf's The Bear Handbook (2000) affectionately satirizes this in the vein of the 1984 book The Preppie Handbook, and discussions about this have occurred online and in Bears on Bears (2002), edited by Ron Jackson Suresha.

These discussions tell us much about differences and struggles the bear community has always exhibited. Some criticisms have maintained that it is a subculture mainly about sex and that it has a depoliticized individualist emphasis. It is also criticized for being mostly white, for still being too caught up in hegemonic notions of masculinity, and for romanticizing the working class and therefore failing to connect to struggles against economic, racial, and gender inequalities.

Criticism of the rituals of the community and the individuals that make up the community are that contests have lost their initial purpose (to present an alternative icon of attractiveness) and become beauty contests and that some have come to participate in many of the same behaviors that bears came together to oppose, such as shunning others and creating hierarchies. Many bears are trying to address these issues, while some are claiming "post-bear" identities. Undoubtedly, the bear community provides a fascinating case study of how subcultures work and how the larger culture changes.

BEAUTY PAGEANTS

A beauty pageant or contest is a competition manifestly based on an evaluation of contestants' appearance, and contestants are typically, although not invariably, for girls or women. There is an implicit and obvious feminist criticism of the beauty pageant, which is most often a pyramidal contest that pits one woman against another and evaluates all in a series of eliminations. Uneasy at rewarding "superficial" appearance alone, U.S. beauty pageants have claimed to also judge character and achievement, by adding evaluations of qualities or abilities like "personality," "poise," "character," "intelligence," and "talent." Only one individual emerges victorious, but runners-up are commonly named, and sometimes other qualities of achievement, like the ability to get along with other contestants, are valorized but have no formal reward. In the United States, the Miss America Pageant has always been the premier contest. This pageant's origins are found in the first U.S. beauty contest in 1880, in Rehoboth Beach, Delaware, which evolved into the venerable Atlantic City, New Jersey, contest. Atlantic City was the home of the Miss America Pageant from 1921 to 2005. In 2006, the pageant moved to Las Vegas, Nevada.

Such U.S. competitions were first promoted by entrepreneur P. T. Barnum in the mid-19th century. In addition to originating widely advertised contests that judged babies, flowers, and dogs, Barnum promoted "feminine beauty" contests. These contests appealed to the American value of competition, and they gained popularity thanks to the rise of the mass distribution newspaper and the technology of the daguerreotype. Looking back further, the origins of beauty pageantry in general can be found in the widespread European carnivale and in seasonal celebrations like May Day, when the Queen of the May was crowned.

Nations from Tonga to Guatemala have taken up the practice of pageants, often modeled explicitly on the Miss America Pageant. National or ethnic pageants have been used to build political solidarity through the use of a feminine body as evocative symbol. Pageants have also been used to advertise political plights, as in former Yugoslavia, where contestants held banners saying, "Please don't let us die," or to advertise political victory, as in the contest for Miss Tibet that featured contestants of Chinese origin—in a Chinese-occupied Tibet.

Practices idealizing some women's appearance suggest, by contrast, social categories whose appearance should go unrewarded, or overlooked, or excluded from participation. Therefore, members of some social categories had, and some still have, their own pageants. For example, when African Americans were explicitly excluded from the Miss America Pageant by the infamous "Rule Seven" of the pageant handbook, contests like Miss Bronze, Miss Black America, and Miss Fine Brown Frame arose. The ineligibility of contestants with visible or stigmatizing disabilities merits no written rule. For a long time, even Americans with invisible disabilities were tacitly excluded from Miss America and many other U.S. pageants. For some such aspiring contestants, pageants like Miss Deaf America and Ms. Wheelchair America existed.

Twentieth- and 21st-century beauty queens are the ostensible "queens," "princesses," "courtiers" or the "Miss," "Ms.," or "Mrs." governing and representing very different kinds of realms. Their rule is described as extending over specific events (e.g., a state fair or a race like the Indianapolis 500), geographical regions (e.g., city, region, nation, world, or universe), brands of commercial products (e.g., Miss Budweiser), special constituencies (e.g., Miss Black Deaf America), and farmers' or other workers' associations (e.g., Dairy Queen). No matter what social category is being contested, most beauty contests are expressly for girls and women, and most require of them something that is not required of boys and men who are in the same social category, namely, demonstrable good character and sexual inexperience or, for married contests, at least modesty and concentration on maternity and good works. In this way, it is unsurprising that the rules for entering many contests, like the Miss Black America pageant, specify that not only should a contestant not be married or have children, but she must never have been married or pregnant; while she may have been convicted of a minor traffic violation, she may not have been convicted of any other crime or misdemeanor. Likewise, Miss Deaf America's talent contributions will "help us elevate the image and self-concept of deaf ladies throughout the United States." Contestants thereby uphold the respectable character of the entire social category.

While beauty contests have been analyzed as being based on the performance of "doing gender" for women, pageants are also held for transvestite and transgendered individuals. In these pageants, individuals are also judged on the basis of performative gender, not chromosomal sex. Although men have kindred contests, like the "Mr. Universe" competition, almost invariably such contests center on adjudged success in bodybuilding rather than appearance, poise, personality, or talent. The winner of a beauty contest is termed a "beauty queen." Notably, there is a lack of a comparable term like "beauty king."

Much feminist research has emphasized the beauty pageant's commodification and visual objectification of contestants. Also noted is the election of a feminine body to stand as a symbol of a nation—and a nation's statement of what its citizens are meant to be. In 1945, Bess Myerson, the first Jewish Miss America, embodied postwar equality, or at least religious equality; deaf since she was 18 months old, Heather Whitestone was voted the first Miss America with a disability in 1995. For both, taken and touted as symbols of diversity, their actual diversity distinguished them minimally from other contestants: Myerson willingly worked with the Anti-Defamation League, but she was not religiously observant and took pains to emphasize the lack of all differences between Jews and non-Jews. Whitestone did not use sign language, had been brought up to blend in with the numerical majority of hearing citizens, and chose as her talent dancing to music; reportedly, the judges were impressed with her ability to speak clearly when she replied to their questions. Scholars of the contest suggest that the Miss America Pageant's brand of diversity requires assimilation to the mainstream and minimization of any distinctive attributes the "diverse" could claim.

Also significant is the rigid middle-class morality of many pageants, like that which led to the resignation of the 1983 Miss America, Vanessa Williams. Williams was the first African American Miss America, and her ascension had originally been hailed as the embodiment of U.S. egalitarianism. Some complained that the fair-skinned, light-eyed, straight-haired Williams was also in the tradition of minimally distinctive diversities or that she was not representative of a more genuine African American beauty. There was little time to complain, for Williams's reign was brief and there were other causes for complaint. Photos of a nude Williams in a lesbian scene with a white woman surfaced in a pornography magazine in 1984. Amid criticism, Williams resigned, yielding the crown to the first runner-up, also an African American woman. Williams was undone by the pageant's emphasis on middle-class respectability and a stated emphasis on "character" that can be considered narrow and unrealistic. In the end, Williams's undeniable talents in singing and acting allowed her to achieve a distinguished professional career.

The age of beauty pageant contestants has sometimes been the cause for indignation, especially in the case of child beauty pageants for little-girl contestants, whose age ranges from a few days old to teenage. U.S. awareness of child beauty pageants was raised by the murder of 6-year-old JonBenet Ramsey, in 1996, in Boulder, Colorado. While apparently unrelated to the child's still unsolved murder, photographs of her success on the child pageant circuit introduced many Americans to a type of beauty pageant that shocked them. Child pageants began to receive attention that took the form of outrage at what is seen as the premature sexualization of small girls in the hands of an allegedly overcontrolling mother, whose motives are suspect, and the suspicion usually is that the mother is living vicariously through her daughter's pageant activities.

Examinations of beauty pageants have been both scholarly, as exemplified by the work of Banet-Weiser (1999) and Craig (2002) and the anthology of Cohen, Wilk, and Stoeltje (1996), and popular, as evident in U.S. film in documentaries like Living Dolls (2001), about child beauty pageants, and satires like Drop Dead Gorgeous (1999), an explicit send-up of America's Junior Miss Contest, and Miss Congeniality (2000). The latter film has many touches, both broad and subtle, that reflect currently conflicted U.S. attitudes toward beauty pageants. A middlebrow spectacle, pageant "glamour," and competitiveness among women once drew faithful national attention as a television event. In the 21st century, the character of Miss Congeniality says snidely, "If I only had a brain" and wears a stunning dress made from rubber bands. Some lines in Miss Congeniality repeat the faux pas of real-life beauty contestants: Asked to name "the perfect date," a contestant responds, "I would have to say April 25th. Because it's not too hot, not too cold, all you need is a light jacket." Those very words were once spoken by a state beauty queen.

Beauty pageants developed as elaborately as the Miss America Pageant have had a relatively short lifetime in the United States. Nonetheless, many other pageants have arisen that similarly perpetuate the ideal embodiment of not only femininity, but of a product, business, or nation. In these idealizations, pageant winners relieve the rest in their social category from having to uphold such inviolable standards.

Bem Sex Role Inventory

The Bem Sex Role Inventory (BSRI) is a tool used to measure individuals' femininity and masculinity. Researchers noted in 1973 that the dominant tests measuring masculinity and femininity had artificially constructed masculinity and femininity existing at the ends of one continuum rather than two separate components of personality and/or identity. It is against this backdrop that Sandra L. Bem constructed her Sex Role Inventory in 1974. Bem intended her inventory to represent two fully independent scales of culturally defined masculinity and culturally defined femininity. The BSRI is the most frequently used measure in sex role research and is used as a standard against which other instruments are compared.

Construction of the BSRI

In 1974, Bem and her students compiled a list of 200 personality characteristics that seemed positively valued and stereotypically masculine or feminine, as well as 200 other characteristics that seemed neither masculine nor feminine. Of those other characteristics, half were positively valued, and half were negatively valued. Bem and her students distributed the list of 400 items to two samples of Stanford University's undergraduates. In each sample, half of the subjects of each sex rated each characteristic in terms of its sex-typed social desirability for a man, and the other half of the subjects rated each characteristic in terms of its desirability for a woman. The rating scale ranged from "Not at all desirable" to "Extremely desirable." Personality characteristics that were judged as more desirable for a man than for a woman or more desirable for a woman than for a man qualified for inclusion in the masculinity and femininity scales, respectively. Of those eligible items, 20 were selected for each scale. Personality characteristics that were judged as no more desirable for one sex than the other qualified for inclusion in the social desirability scale. Of those, 10 positive and 10 negative characteristics were chosen. The final lists of the items included in each of the scales are presented in Table 1.

Table 1   Items on the Masculinity, Femininity, and Social Desirability Scales of the Bem Sex Role Inventory

Masculine items	Feminine items	Neutral items
Acts as a leader	Affectionate	Adaptable
Aggressive	Cheerful	Conceited
Ambitious	Childlike	Conscientious
Analytical	Compassionate	Conventional
Assertive	Does not use harsh language	Friendly
Athletic	Eager to soothe hurt feelings	Happy
Competitive	Feminine	Helpful
Defends own beliefs	Flatterable	Inefficient
Dominant	Gentle	Jealous
Forceful	Gullible	Likeable
Has leadership abilities	Loves children	Moody
Independent	Loyal	Reliable
Individualistic	Sensitive to the needs of others	Secretive
Makes decisions easily	Shy	Sincere
Masculine	Soft spoken	Solemn
Self-reliant	Sympathetic	Tactful
Self-sufficient	Tender	Theatrical
Strong personality	Understanding	Truthful
Willing to take a stand	Warm	Unpredictable
Willing to take risks	Yielding	Unsystematic

The BSRI takes about 15 minutes to complete. Respondents indicate how well each item describes themselves, from 1 ("Never or almost never true") to 7 ("Always or almost always true"). The masculinity score is the average of the ratings on the 20 masculine items, and the femininity score is the average of the ratings on the 20 feminine items. The scoring of the BSRI by design does not treat the masculine and feminine items as clustering at opposite ends of a linear continuum, but instead as measures of two independent scales. Subsequent analyses by Bem and others have supported the claim that masculinity and femininity are logically and empirically independent.

In addition to noting that some individuals were exclusively feminine or masculine, Bem also found that some individuals have balanced levels of traits from both scales. She termed these individuals androgynous. Despite subsequent usage, Bem's original definition of androgyny was that androgynous persons possess relatively equal levels of masculinity and femininity as measured by the BSRI, not that they possess high scores on both scales.

Technical Critiques

Although the BSRI is considered the "gold standard" among sex-typed personality instruments, several other researchers have criticized it on technical and theoretical grounds. Specifically, Janet Spence argued that the terms masculinity and femininity are inappropriate for labeling the scales, as they assess only instrumentality and expressiveness. Masculinity and femininity as concepts are much more complex and include many components not measured by the BSRI, including attitudes toward women and men and actual behaviors.

Further, while Bem intended to measure two distinct factors, Spence argued that in reality, Bem's measures yielded one continuum. In this continuum, those who are strongly sex typed in their self-images and role identification (masculine men and feminine women) are clustered at one extreme. At the other end of the continuum are those who are not sex typed, identifying with neither the masculine nor the feminine characteristics measured by the BSRI. In addition, Spence argued that the use of characteristics "typical" of women and men to construct inventories to measure femininity and masculinity reified perceived differences between women and men, in that the use of the scales masks the fact that few women or men actually exhibit all or most of the characteristics within each of the respective scales.

Uses in Gender Research

Even two decades after its construction and published scholarly critiques, the BSRI continues to be a mainstay in the social psychological literature. Recent literature searches note the use of the BSRI as a predictor of adult mental health, parental behaviors, marital intimacy, marital satisfaction, and division of household behavior, and several studies argue not only for the continued use of the BSRI in research, but for the continued development of research utilizing this scale. Research modeling the extent to which individuals engage in stereotypically feminine and masculine behaviors has also incorporated the BSRI scales as part of the measurement schema. In addition, Bem utilized the BSRI in the construction of her gender schema theory, which proposes that sex typing results in part from the adaptation of one's self-concept to the gender schema. The gender schema is the structure of spontaneously sorting people, characteristics, and behaviors into feminine and masculine categories. The BSRI measures the extent to which individuals spontaneously organize information, especially about the self, on the basis of gender and thus is a key component of gender schema theory.

BENEDICT, RUTH (1887–1948)

Ruth Fulton Benedict was one of the best-known American anthropologists of her generation. Her book Patterns of Culture (1934) made the ideas of anthropologists available to a wide general audience, and in The Chrysanthemum and the Sword (1946), she attempted to explain Japanese culture to Americans after World War II. Ruth was married to chemist Stanley Benedict, but both had affairs, she with other women as well as one man. After their divorce, Benedict's relationships were all with other women. Lesbianism was seen in society as pathological then, but Benedict saw herself and her circle of friends as normal, and she explored this paradox twice in her scholarly work.

In the 1930s, when most social scientists saw homosexuality as an abnormal and dysfunctional innate trait, Benedict pioneered the idea that homosexuality might instead be a cultural trait and that at certain times and in certain places, it had been considered normal.

Benedict's article "Anthropology and the Abnormal," published in Journal of General Psychology in 1934, aimed at influencing the ideas of psychologists as a profession. The article invited her readers to rethink what was abnormal and what was normal, through examples of activities like trance, cataleptic states, and homosexuality. She gave examples of societies in which each of these, considered abnormal in Western culture, were part of normal life. Concerning homosexuality, she used as an example Ancient Greek and Native American cultures, which allowed what anthropologists called berdache, or cross-gender living. Although scholars have since discovered women among many Native American peoples who had similar roles, Benedict talked of men who assumed the dress and occupations of women and sometimes had relationships with other men.

In modern society, according to Benedict, internal conflict over being perceived as deviant, not homosexuality itself, caused psychological problems for individuals. In places where homosexuality had not been perceived as deviant in the past, homosexuals had lived honorable lives and were accepted by society. Normality, she concluded, was what a culture decided to accept as normal. Since American society had categorized homosexuals as abnormal, she suggested that psychologists be more tolerant with disturbed homosexual patients and help them to resolve their internal conflicts so they could see themselves more positively, not as pathological, but merely as out of step with their cultures in a certain place and time.

A short time after the appearance of this article, Benedict's book Patterns of Culture (1934) was published. Written for a general audience, the book again presented homosexuality as a cultural trait rather than innate and as something that historically had been accepted as normal by certain cultures. Benedict suggested the need to educate society to tolerance and to educate homosexuals to self-acceptance through the knowledge that within themselves they were not abnormal though they were perceived so in the culture within which they lived.

Within Patterns of Culture, Benedict also suggested that male traits and female traits were cultural rather than biological. Through examples, she showed that male dominance and female subordination were not innate traits. Among the Dobu in the Pacific, she wrote, families lived alternate years with the wife's and husband's clan, and in any given year, that person was considered the head of the family, regardless of gender. Among the Zuni in the American Southwest, women owned the fields and the houses, and their husbands worked the land. By showing that other peoples had expectations of men and women that were different from those in American society, she undermined the idea that American ways were the only ways men and women could relate to each other, stressing the relativity of gender traits across cultures.

BENJAMIN, HARRY (1885–1986)

Harry Benjamin was born in Berlin in 1885. He trained in Germany as an endocrinologist. A disciple of Magnus Hirschfeld, one of the founding fathers of sexology, Benjamin was a staunch advocate of sexual freedom. Relocating to New York to open a private practice in 1913, his politics brought him into the circle of sexual radicals, including Margaret Sanger and Alfred Kinsey. In the early 1940s, he helped found the Society for the Scientific Study of Sexuality, an organization still in existence.

The Transsexual Phenomenon

In 1949, Alfred Kinsey recommended a patient to Benjamin. Born male, the patient expressed an acute desire to become a woman. At the time, the recommended treatment for individuals like Benjamin's patient was psychoanalytic therapy aimed at making the mind fit the body. Benjamin, however, was unconvinced of the effectiveness of this approach. Like Hirschfeld, he ascribed to a theory of human bisexuality, which at the time meant that all individuals contain a blend of male and female. Seeing gender identity on a continuum, he believed that some people could be born male but feel female. He ultimately gained a reputation among people seeking to change their sex as a medical expert sympathetic to their plight.

Drawing on his work with clients with a variety of "sexual disorders," Benjamin published his book The Transsexual Phenomenon in 1966. He argued that transsexuals were a group distinct from transvestites (heterosexual men who derived sexual pleasure from dressing in women's clothing but who did not wish to become women) and homosexuals. While overlap between groups was certainly possible, he argued against collapsing them into one category of "sexual pathology," as each condition required a different treatment approach.

Benjamin and Psychoanalysis

In The Transsexual Phenomenon, Benjamin challenged the dominant psychological treatment of transsexuality. He argued that psychoanalysis did not lessen the desire to change sex; it simply forced patients to go underground with their desires and lead miserable lives. Benjamin instead advocated that transsexuals should be given hormones for the sex they wished to become in an attempt to fit the body with the mind. Benjamin also advocated surgery for patients deemed by medical experts to fit the diagnostic criteria for transsexuals. Benjamin's views positioned him as a maverick in the medical community. However, his treatment approach to transsexuality eventually gained precedence over psychoanalysis.

HBIGDA Lives On

In the 1970s, Benjamin formed what later became the Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association (HBIGDA). An association of therapists and psychologists, HBIGDA devised a set of "standards of care," largely derived from Benjamin's case studies, that sanctioned the criteria and diagnostic procedure for transsexuality. Though Harry Benjamin died in 1986 at the age of 101, HBIGDA still exists. While HBIGDA's care standards have come under fire in recent years by transgender activists who see them as creating regulatory systems of gender, they continue to be considered the legitimate guidelines for the treatment of gender identity disorder, the current psychological diagnosis for transsexuals.

Berdache (Two-Spirit)

Early Europeans used the term berdache for Native Americans/First Nations peoples who did not conform to Western gender and sexual norms. This term held negative implications for a variety of sexual behavior, gender practices, and various physical sex characteristics. Since then, it has been utilized in anthropology and other disciplines to define Native American/First Nations homosexuality, transgenderism, and intersexuality. The term berdache is considered by many to be offensive, and in 1990, the term "two-spirit" emerged and is now used to distinguish people who embody characteristics of multiple genders, sexes, or sexualities.

Historical Development of the Term Berdache

The term berdache was first published in The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, Volume 59, published between 1667 and 1669. The Jesuits recorded the observations of numerous missionaries and traders who had witnessed men in women's clothing, work roles, and sexual roles. The current English term berdache originates from the Arabic word bardaj (slave or kept boy). This word spread into Western Europe, as a result of contact with the Muslim world, and became the Spanish term bardaxa/bardaje (person engaging in sodomy) and then the French term bardache (catamite or a young man/boy who has sex with men). While the Spanish and French originally used the term in referencing men who wore women's clothing and/or had sex with men, anthropologists later adapted the term berdache and applied it to Native American/First Nations people who were gender variant, sexually variant, and/or anatomically (sex) variant.

History of Berdache

The arrival of Europeans and introduction of Christianity had a marked effect on "berdache" traditions and acceptance. Europeans held the belief that biological sex and gender were dichotomous and "naturally" related: biological sex was male or female; gender was man or woman; and male equated man, while female equated woman. Gender variation outside of this binary was viewed as deviant. Sexuality held a similar dichotomous conception; although the term homosexual did not come into existence until 1870, sexual practices or behavior outside of culturally accepted relations between biological men and biological women were also considered deviant. Europeans were not open to the idea of gender roles beyond that of man or woman. In addition, the Christian concept of sodomy ("abnormal" sexual practice) was associated with "uncivilized" cultures.

The term berdache was one of judgment, one that damned individuals who occupied these roles, as well as the cultures that accepted them. As colonization continued, "berdache" people and traditions were pushed out. Christianity and the assimilation of Native American/First Nations peoples into Western culture brought homophobia and the enforcement of Western gender roles into communities.

Individuals labeled as "berdache" occupied what the Europeans considered to be sexually deviant roles. There was no distinction between gender and sexuality, as they were viewed as being intertwined and inseparable. Initially, only biological men were labeled as berdache, and they were seen as occupying women's social status, dress, and sexual roles. Although they were viewed as effeminate men, the focus was on sexual acts, which Europeans labeled as deviant and abnormal. Female "berdache" existed; however, they were not acknowledged and were later often overlooked by anthropologists.

The term berdache was also applied to individuals who appeared anatomically different, such that their (biological) sex did not fit the European definition of male or female. They were judged as freaks of nature, monsters, and deviants, often sanctioning the Western notion that Natives were "savages" and therefore less than human. This classification of Native Americans/First Nations peoples who were what would now be considered intersexed (previously known as hermaphrodite) was continued by anthropologists.

In Native American/First Nations cultures, many nations accepted the practice of multiple sex and gender roles. According to Serena Nanda, Native American/First Nations cultures generally did not use sexuality in their definition of gender roles, unlike the Europeans and, later, anthropologists. Individuals were accepted within their communities and conformed to various culturally accepted roles within their tribes, including warriors, healers, tribal leaders, medicine people, religious ceremonial figures, and visionaries. Acceptance varied from tribe to tribe, however; while some gender-variant individuals were culturally integrated and held roles that contributed to their communities, others were rejected and ostracized by their communities.

Europeans and, later, Euro-Americans (Americans of Western European descent) prohibited and attempted to erase Native American/First Nations cultures, languages, and religious/spiritual beliefs and practices, including gender and sexual variance. With the forced Christian education of Native children, cultural and religious/spiritual believes were enforced as evil and ungodly, including the roles of "two-spirited" peoples.

This "education" resulted in the loss of languages, cultures, and religious/spiritual beliefs. As with the reclaiming of language, culture, and religion in the American Indian Movement (beginning in the late 1960s), two-spirited peoples are beginning to reclaim their history within the context of Native traditions.

With the urbanization and assimilation of Native peoples, individuals began utilizing Western terms, concepts, and identities, such as gay, lesbian, transgender, and intersex. These terms separated Native cultural identity from sexuality and gender identity, furthering a disconnect felt by many Native Americans/First Nations peoples in negotiating the boundaries of life between two worlds (Native and non-Native/Western). The term two-spirited was created to reconnect one's gender or sexual identity with her or his Native identity and culture.

Redefining "Two-Spirit"

In 1990, at the third annual Native American/First Nations gay and lesbian conference in Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, the term two-spirit was designated as a replacement for berdache. It was specifically chosen to distinguish and distance Native American/First Nations peoples from non-Native peoples. Two-spirit serves as a self-identifying term in place of Western concepts and identities such as gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, intersex, queer, cross-dresser, and so on.

The term two-spirit is translated from the words niizh manidoowag, from Ojibwa, a subgroup of the Algonquian language spoken in the Manitoba area. The concept and word two-spirit has no traditional cultural significance, and the Ojibwa words were not combined to create the term niizh manidoowag, or two-spirit, until this conference. Because this term was recently created, it has no linguistic equivalent or meaning in other nations and tribes. It does not serve as a replacement for the historical and traditional terms already in use or available in other nations and tribes.

Criticisms of the Term Two-Spirit

Various criticisms have arisen around the use of the term two-spirit. The term emphasizes a Western idea that gender, sex, and sexuality are binaries. It implies that the individual is both male and female and that these aspects are intertwined within them. The term moves away from traditional Native American/First Nations cultural identities and meanings of sexuality and gender variance. It does not take into account the terms and meanings from individual nations and tribes (see Roscoe, 1998, for a list of terms utilized by various nations and tribes).

Nations and tribes used various words to describe various genders, sexes, and sexualities. Many had separate words for the Western constructs of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, intersex individuals, cross-dressers, transgenders, gender-variant individuals or "changing ones," third genders (men who live as women), and fourth genders (women who live as men). Even these categories are limiting, because they are based on Western language and ideas rooted in a dichotomous relationship between gender, sex, and sexuality. This language barrier limits our understanding of the traditional roles within Native American/First Nations cultures. However, the two-spirit serves as an umbrella term that encompasses these multiple gender and sexual identities. One criticism of this concept is that its meaning is limited to Western constructs and provides an identity label for those living in urban and rural areas rather than on reservations.

Some Native Americans/First Nations peoples that hold to more traditional religious and cultural values view two-spirit as a cultural and social term, rather than one with any religious or spiritual meaning. Although two-spirit implies to some a spiritual nature, that one holds the spirit of two, both male and female, traditional Native Americans/First Nations peoples view this as a Western concept. Since historically, many "berdache/two-spirit" individuals held religious or spiritual roles, the term two-spirit creates a disconnection from the past. The terms used by other tribes currently and historically do not translate directly into the English form of two-spirit or the Ojibwa form of niizh manidoowag.

Two-spirit does not acknowledge either the traditional acceptance or the nonacceptance of individuals in various nations and tribes. The idea of gender and sexuality variance being universally accepted among Native American/First Nations peoples has become romanticized. Accordingly, the change from berdache to two-spirit is most accurately understood as a non-Native idealization of the social acceptance of gender variance, idealizing a romanticized social acceptance of gender variance.

Conclusion

Berdache is a derogatory term created by Europeans and perpetuated by anthropologists and others to define Native American/First Nations people who varied from Western norms that perceive gender, sex, and sexuality as binaries and inseparable. The term two-spirit was developed and chosen by Native American/First Nations peoples as a replacement for berdache. Although some maintain that the term two-spirit does not refer to the Western concept of individuals crossing gender roles, as if there were only two, traditionalists point to the duality inherent in the term. It may be beneficial to consider two-spirit as an umbrella term with many meanings, referencing multiple genders, sexes, and sexualities, as well as a self-identity label used by Native American/First Nations peoples as a way of reconnecting their gender and sexual variance with Native culture and religion/spirituality.

BIFURCATED CONSCIOUSNESS

In the 1970s, Dorothy E. Smith wrote about women's "bifurcated consciousness," a distinctive subjectivity produced by women's household or reproductive work and the supporting and applied tasks assigned to them, historically, in the occupational division of labor. She argued that women's everyday activities—as paid or unpaid caregivers, support workers, volunteers, and so on—positioned them to engage with people where and as they actually live and, further, that women's activities often involved "working up" the particularities of individual lives so as to fit them to the more abstract frameworks that organize institutional activity—as when mothers prepare children for attendance at school or nurses prepare patients to be attended by physicians. Women who work in these locations, at the juncture of embodied specificity and ideological abstraction, hold in their consciousness both ways of seeing and thinking; as expert practitioners of these everyday tasks, they move from one to the other framework, usually without conscious thought. The disjuncture between the two modes of knowing provides an opening for analysis of objectified knowledge and its production in people's activities. Working from that disjuncture, Smith argued that "women's perspective" could provide "a radical critique of sociology."

In a series of essays, later collected in The Everyday World as Problematic: A Feminist Sociology (1987), Smith developed the implications of this idea. In this book, she sketched an experience and knowledge associated with single motherhood—the experience of sole responsibility for children combined with an awareness that she and her children were seen, institutionally, as a "defective" family. This example provides a basis for discovering how embodied knowing, grounded in people's activities, is set aside in favor of abstracted concepts or ideological codes, such as the "standard North American family." While some critics have read the analysis as being limited because of the reliance on a particular experience of mothering, Smith explains that her aim is not to identify a determinate womanly "experience" with specific content, but rather to direct thought to actual sites of everyday living as "points of entry" for empirical inquiry, with the experiences of single mothers providing just one example.

Dorothy Smith was an immigrant to the United States from Britain and then Canada, where she taught in British Columbia and at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, in Toronto, an important site for feminist scholarship. She was also a lifelong activist, in labor, antiwar, feminist, and environmental movements. Her early sociological writing dealt with the sociology of mental illness, family and class, and the social organization of knowledge. The new scholarly networks and constituencies that grew out of the women's movement of the 1970s provided a rich context for the development of her critique, along with a mode of inquiry designed to produce a "sociology for women" (rather than about them) that she labeled "institutional ethnography." Since the 1980s, a growing network of scholars in North America and elsewhere has taken up her approach, which Smith now considers "a sociology for people" and which she views as neither method nor theory, but as "an alternative sociology."

Like other North American feminists of her time, Smith was writing against the male-centered foundations of the academic disciplines, considering how one might build knowledge that would be based in women's experiences of social life. At its starting point, in "women's experience," her thinking parallels other socialist feminists of the period, such as Sheila Rowbotham, Sandra Harding, and Donna Haraway, as well as Patricia Hill Collins's account of a "Black feminist thought" tied to a position as "outsider within." Although these writers are often grouped together as "standpoint feminists," Smith resists that categorization and the flattening of differences among these writers it implies. For Smith, it is important to note that a "standpoint" is not a specific perspective whose content can be defined or achieved, but merely a location that provides an anchor for social inquiry.

The idea of a bifurcated consciousness relies on insights from the materialist method of Marx, the social psychology of George Herbert Mead, and the phenomenology of Alfred Schutz. One might also identify related formulations developed earlier around other kinds of oppression, such as the idea of home and school languages of working-class children, W. E. B. DuBois's account of African Americans' "double consciousness," or Frantz Fanon's writing of the "masks" worn by the colonized. Smith was certainly influenced by these works. However, she wanted to insist on the specificities of consciousness associated with distinctive positions in social formations and the ways in which subjugated and dominant consciousnesses are fostered, nurtured, and inhibited in each situation. Indeed, she analyzed the "ruling relations" as a specific historical formation, and she wrote about the particular ways that women's participation in ruling relations was organized in different historical periods.

BIOLOGICAL DETERMINISM

A derivative of the philosophical viewpoint, determinism, biological determinism is the perspective that all human behavior can be reduced to biological antecedents. That is, behavior is a direct expression of biological origins above and beyond the influence of social, contextual, or environmental factors. As such, due to the forces of natural law, accurate predictions of human behavior are possible at time 2 based on biological information at time 1. This perspective is often viewed in opposition to social determinism, which contends that human behavior is the outcome of social forces, for example, culture, class, race, and education.

Within the context of gender, biological determinism offers the perspective that sexually dimorphic behaviors, or behaviors believed different in men and women, are the result of innate biological differences between the sexes. Because of the perspective's emphasis on the physical and anatomical differences between the sexes, theoretical and empirical contributions are dominated by a gender binary lens, in that any form of deviation from the natural states of masculinity and femininity in men and women, respectively, is interpreted in terms of the biological mapping of the opposite sex. To elaborate further, femininity is the natural expression of being a woman, and masculinity is the natural expression of being a man because gender is rooted in the biology of men and women. Thus, for example, from a strict biological determinist perspective, a woman whose menstrual cycle is irregular or who does not possess fully developed sexual characteristics would be assumed to possess male-typical or masculine personality traits, like dominance and aggression. Biological determinism gained momentum in the late 1800s, and its influence is still evident in some contemporary biological theories of gender, sex differences in behavior, sexuality, and sexual orientation.

The Influence of Biological Determinism

Early discussions around gender (mid- to late 1800s) focused on intelligence and the intellectual superiority of men over women. During this period, theories that promoted biological determinist perspectives were widely accepted. Of particular popularity was the study of craniometry, or the comparative measurement of the bones of the skull. According to craniometrists, size was directly related to intelligence: A large brain was associated with high intelligence, whereas a small brain was associated with low intelligence. Drawing from this approach, Havelock Ellis, in his book Man and Woman, argued that the size differences between men's and women's heads (with men's being larger than women's), was a direct reflection of differences in brain size, which provided support for men's intellectual superiority over women. It should be noted that craniometry was also extended to the study of racial differences in intelligence and was accepted as scientific proof for the intellectual inferiority of African Americans, which eventually fueled the social segregation of races in the United States. Noteworthy are the more contemporary perspectives in this regard: J. Philippe Rushton, in his book Race, Evolution, and Behavior, argued that there is a pattern of decreasing brain size across racial groups, from East Asian to European to African. In a similar vein, The Bell Curve, written by Richard Herrnstein and Charles Murray, argued that because intelligence is innate, real differences between racial groups on standardized tests of intelligence exist.

The discovery of sex hormones in the 1930s marked a shift in attention away from craniometry to the role of biochemical forces of the endocrine system on sexually dimorphic behavior. A great deal of attention has been directed to investigating the role of prenatal hormones on the development of sex-typical behaviors. Of specific interest has been the role of androgens (male sex hormones), primarily testosterone, in masculinizing the brain and nervous system of a developing fetus. Relying on animal studies, researchers have shown that experimentally altered levels of prenatal androgens affect the display of male- and female-typed behaviors in adulthood. For example, prenatal female rats exposed to high levels of androgens show increased probability of masculine-typed behaviors, like sexual mounting (a male sexual position), whereas prenatal male rats who experience a cessation of androgen production show greater probability of lordosis (a female sexual position). Due to the ethical limitations of this type of research on human samples, other researchers have focused on populations of individuals born with hormonal imbalances, for example, women with congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH). In CAH, the developing fetus is exposed to very high levels of androgens, and as a result, most CAH females display masculinized genitalia, while their internal reproductive organs are female. Due to the higher levels of androgens in the bloodstream, researchers look for differences in personality and behavior between CAH and non-CAH females. Research has found that CAH females tend to be more likely than control groups to engage in masculine-typed activities (e.g., athletic activity) and less interested in feminine-typed activities (e.g., playing with dolls). Furthermore, there is some evidence for CAH females to possess stronger visual spatial ability (male-typed behavior) than non-CAH females.

In an influential study, Richard Udry examined the relationship between prenatal hormones and gender indirectly, by measuring the levels of testosterone in mothers' bloodstreams and their developing fetuses' expressions of masculinity and femininity in later adolescence and adulthood. He found that female children of mothers with higher levels of testosterone were more interested in male-typed behaviors (e.g., rough-and-tumble play) and scored higher on personality indicators of masculinity (e.g., agency and instrumentality) and lower on indicators of femininity (e.g., expressiveness) compared with female children of mothers with lower levels of testosterone.

Of other interest is the relationship between adult levels of sex hormones in the bloodstream and the expression of behaviors associated with masculinity and femininity. To illustrate, researchers point to higher levels of testosterone in prison population samples compared with the general population for both men and women, with individuals charged with more violent crimes exhibiting the highest levels of testosterone. Other research has shown that males with low levels of testosterone show female-typical impairments on tests of visual spatial ability and that females with low levels of estrogen (female sex hormone) show male-typical or enhanced performance on these tests.

Sexual orientation has also been a topic of interest to biological determinists, who endorse the perspective that homosexual orientation is the expression of hormonal and anatomical correlates. As CAH females are exposed to high levels of prenatal androgens, biological determinists draw attention to the greater incidence of sexual attraction to females in CAH compared with non-CAH female samples. Others point at the relationship between early androgen exposure, physical attributes, and sexual orientation. Drawing from research on finger length and prenatal exposure to androgen, these researchers focus on finger ratios. Finger ratio is the length of the index finger divided by the length of the ring finger. On average, heterosexual men tend to have larger ratios, while heterosexual women tend to have smaller ratios. Research has found that homosexual women tend to have finger ratios more similar to men's finger ratios than to heterosexual women's ratios. For homosexual men, this relationship is more complicated and contingent upon number of male siblings: Homosexual men who have two or more older male siblings tend to have smaller ratios, similar to that of heterosexual women.

Other researchers working from a biological perspective have focused on the relationship between brain anatomy and homosexuality. Focusing on males, Simon LeVay found one node of the hypothalamus smaller in homosexual compared with heterosexual men, although this work has yet to be replicated. More current research trends are interested in behavioral genetics and have found homosexuality is moderately heritable, suggesting both genetic and environmental factors.

Reactions to Biological Determinism

Although research from a biological deterministic perspective suggests a link between biology and certain sex-typed behavior, it remains quite contentious, namely because claims are based on correlations between varying levels of hormones and varying patterns of behavior and thus are not causal in nature. Furthermore, proponents of social learning theories argue that data are confounded with social and environmental factors, like parental and peer influences, and cultural expectations. Thus, for example, even when sex hormonal imbalances are accounted for in the expression of behavior, the unique social and cultural treatment of individuals who appear physically different from the typical male or female cannot be ignored. Finally, sociologists argue that biological determinism overlooks historical cultural influences on the expression of gender within sex, drawing attention to the fact that in various cultures, from time to time, social trends influence the expression of gender in highly significant ways. For example, during the 1700s in Europe, men of great physical prowess donned makeup, stockings, and high heels, which in present time would be considered a violation of the masculine gender role. Thus, more contemporary biological determinists have drifted from the argument of a direct biological influence on the development of sexually dimorphic behavior, contending that biological influences are subtle and are vulnerable to the effects of culture and the socialization process.

Bisexuality

Definitions of bisexuality have varied over time, and there is no single widely accepted meaning for the term. At present, it is commonly defined as a sexual preference/orientation or sexual identity in which an individual's sexual, romantic, and/or emotional attraction is not limited to one sex/gender (i.e., categories such as female or male). This entry focuses broadly on bisexuality as a sexual identity or sexual preference as it has developed in the United States and will review differing definitions of bisexuality among scholars and bisexuals themselves. There is limited research on the number of people who behave bisexually and/or identify as bisexual, in part due to varying conceptualizations of bisexuality as well as the stigma surrounding bisexuality. Since the 1970s, there has been increasing activism by bisexuals who seek to affirm their sexual orientation and dispel negative stereotypes about bisexuals.

Defining Bisexuality

The meaning of bisexuality has developed within various academic disciplines, such as psychology, psychoanalysis, biology, and sexology, as well as within sexual identity politics or identity activism. Bisexual scholar and activist Clare Hemmings has noted three primary usages of the term "bisexuality": (1) bisexuality as synonymous with hermaphroditism, the presence of male and female characteristics in one organism; (2) bisexuality as the coexistence in a human individual of both "masculine" and "feminine" psychological dispositions or personal characteristics; (3) and bisexuality as sexual attraction to both men and women.

History of Bisexuality in Psychiatry, Psychoanalysis, and Sexology

Social scientists have used the term bisexuality to refer to varying social phenomena involving human biology and sexuality. In the late 19th century, German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing identified "psychosexual hermaphroditism" as the condition of patients in whom he observed desire for both women and men. British sexologist Havelock Ellis initially adopted this same terminology in his own work. Yet Ellis later began to use bisexuality to refer to sexual dimorphism, the simultaneous presence of female and male sex characteristics in one individual, as well as to sexual desire for both women and men.

Sigmund Freud puzzled over the role and meaning of bisexuality in his psychoanalytic theories of human psychosexual development. Freud continued to develop and redefine his understanding of bisexuality throughout his work on sexuality, which included theories of the origins of homosexuality and the development of masculinity and femininity. Freud initially referred to bisexuality as hermaphroditism but also came to view a bisexual potential in all individuals in terms of the possibility for desire toward females or males.

Freud postulated that before girls and boys experience the Oedipal conflict, they do not yet have a solid gender disposition as feminine or masculine. Accordingly, their sexual object-choice, or preference for female or male sexual partners, has not yet been established. Freud explained that pre-Oedipal females and males experience a bisexual potential before the cementing of a feminine or masculine disposition that directs desire toward one sex/gender. This bisexual potential is supposedly resolved for both girls and boys during the Oedipal conflict, when they cease to desire one or the other parent and repress one side of their bisexual disposition in accord with heterosexual social norms. Freud did not see bisexuality as a stable sexuality in healthy, mature adults.

In the late 1940s and early 1950s, the research findings of Alfred Kinsey and his collaborators presented a new model of sexuality in the United States. The group of researchers found that most individuals are not exclusively heterosexual or homosexual in their desires or sexual behaviors over the life span. From their national research on sexual behavior, the team of sexologists created the Kinsey Scale, or Continuum of Sexuality. The 7-point scale ranges from 0 to 6, with 0 representing exclusive heterosexuality and 6 representing exclusive homosexuality. Kinsey's research found that the desires and sexual behaviors of most people range between these extremes and often vary throughout the life course. Some bisexuals interpret Kinsey's work as the first scientific recognition of bisexuality as dual attraction for women and men and suggest that bisexuality encompasses all 5 points on the scale between 0 and 6. Kinsey himself sought to clarify understandings of bisexuality and, referencing his training as a biologist, scientifically rejected the notion of bisexuality as an anatomical condition wherein a person has both female and male anatomies. Kinsey also resisted the popular trend of labeling persons according to their sexuality, such as homosexuals, due to his observation of vast fluidity in individuals' sexual behaviors. Yet the team's research findings did recognize bisexuality in humans as desire for both females and males.

Bisexual Identity

In addition to psychological and sexological theories on bisexuality, there are also theories of bisexual identity. As with scholars and researchers of bisexuality, there is a lack of agreement among self-identified bisexual individuals as to what it means to be bisexual. As a sexual identity label, bisexuality is highly contested. Some bisexuals argue that bisexuality is a stable sexual orientation and identity and that bisexuals do not choose to be bisexual any more than homosexuals or heterosexuals choose to be oriented toward partners of one or the other sex/gender. No matter whether a bisexual chooses monogamy or non-monogamy, or marriage or celibacy, they are still bisexual. Other bisexuals assert that bisexuality is a behavior, not an identity, and in this way claim that bisexuality is much more pervasive than those who identify as bisexual. For example, if a woman who self-identifies as a lesbian has sex with men, some would argue that she is actually bisexual.

There is great variation among those who adopt a bisexual identity. Some individuals identify as bisexual without engaging in relationships or sexual activity with more than one sex/gender, or even without any sexual or relationship experience at all. Some individuals identify as bisexual on the basis of their desires or fantasies, with or without acting upon them. Many self-identified bisexuals have greater preference for partners of one sex/gender. Some bisexuals may continue to identify as bisexual while in long-term monogamous relationships, whereas others in that situation may take on homosexual or heterosexual identities. Some individuals experience their bisexuality as a stage between other sexual identities, such as when changing from a heterosexual identity to a homosexual identity.

In their study on self-identified bisexual, homosexual, and heterosexual adults in San Francisco, Weinberg, Williams, and Pryor observed that bisexuals tend to identify as heterosexual and to recognize heterosexual desires before homosexual desires. Bisexuals tend to take on an identity as bisexual at ages later than individuals who first identify as homosexual or heterosexual. It is difficult for many bisexuals to come out as bisexual and establish a stable sexual identity, since there is a great amount of social stigma and misunderstanding about bisexuality and also because many regions lack bisexual support groups or social networks. Bisexuals also experience great variability in their self-identification over time, a trend that may reflect shifts in greater preference or involvement with partners of one sex/gender. Paula Rodríguez Rust found in her research on lesbians and bisexual women that the women who currently identified as bisexual were much more likely than women who identified as lesbian to have changed their sexual self-identities multiple times.

Identity in the Era of HIV/AIDS

At present, defining sexual identity and sexual practice has become a crucial health concern in the era of HIV/AIDS. A significant amount of research has shown that there are more people who behave bisexually, that is, who engage in sexual activity with multiple sex/genders, than there are individuals who identify as bisexual. This poses a significant stumbling block in attempts to stop the spread of HIV/AIDS, and the early focus on "gay" men has been reconceptualized. HIV/AIDS prevention efforts have begun to target "MSMs," or men who have sex with men, as well as "WSWs," or women who have sex with women. Such terminology seeks to avoid neglecting at-risk individuals by focusing on behaviors rather than identities or types of persons, as sexual behavior and sexual identity do not necessarily correlate.

Biphobia and Stereotyping

Like other nonheterosexuals, bisexuals may face social discrimination and negative stereotyping. Bisexual scholar and activist Robyn Ochs argues that bisexuals experience a unique form of discrimination called biphobia. Whereas homosexuals may experience homophobia, a fear or aversion of homosexuals by heterosexuals, bisexuals experience double discrimination: homophobia from the heterosexual community and hostility from homosexuals. For example, heterosexuals may stigmatize or devalue bisexuals as homosexuals. However, homosexuals may accuse bisexuals of concealing their same-sex desires and relationships to gain the social privilege of heterosexuals. Additionally, both homosexuals and heterosexuals may deny the existence of bisexuals by arguing, for instance, that bisexuals are just in an experimental phase or are denying their true homosexuality.

Several negative stereotypes about bisexuals reveal the tensions between bisexuals and homosexuals and between bisexuals and heterosexuals. A stereotype is a false generalization that is applied to all members of a social group. Bisexuals are stereotyped as "fence-sitters" who cannot make up their minds between homosexuality and heterosexuality. This is particularly argued in the case of previously lesbian-feminist-identified bisexual women who "sleep with the enemy" and take on male partners; lesbians may see them as "traitors" to their movement. Bisexual men, in particular, have also been stereotyped as sexually voracious "disease carriers," indiscriminate in their insatiable sexual desires and spreading HIV/AIDS between the heterosexual and homosexual communities. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the bisexual label for these reasons but also because of the stigma and misunderstanding that many bisexuals perceive comes along with the identity label. Some use alternative labels for their sexuality, such as queer, pansexual, or open.

Research on the Prevalence of Bisexuality

Estimates of the prevalence of bisexuality are complicated by the lack of an accepted precise definition of bisexuality and the stigma surrounding same-sex sexual behavior. Who is counted or considered to be bisexual depends on how bisexuality is defined. Also, most research on sexuality does not differentiate bisexuals from homosexuals or does not include bisexuals at all.

Kinsey et al.'s national research on adult sexual behavior reported an unexpected amount of same-sex sexual behavior in Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (1948) and Sexual Behavior in the Human Female (1953). Bisexual behavior was, according to their data, more common than exclusively homosexual or heterosexual behavior. Kinsey et al. reported that 25 percent to 28 percent of women and 46 percent of men had been erotically responsive to or sexually active with both women and men.

However, Kinsey's research has met with criticism, as the individuals who participated in the research (including volunteers, students, and prisoners) were not representative of the general American population. The 1994 National Health and Social Life Survey (NHSLS) is regarded as a much more scientifically sound study of sexuality in the United States. In this survey, 3.9 percent of males and 4.1 percent of women reported sexual attractions to persons of both genders. This study also reported that 2.0 percent of men identify as gay, 0.9 percent of women identify as lesbian, 0.8 percent of men identify as bisexual, and 0.5 percent of women identify as bisexual.

Bisexual Movement

The modern bisexual movement in the United States originated during the lesbian-feminist, gay, and sexual liberation movements of the 1970s. Bisexuals participated in these movements and also created exclusive bisexual organizations, which were initially social or informal support groups. As bisexuality became increasingly more invisible as well as stigmatized, some social groups became increasingly political. Bisexual activists seek to increase the visibility of bisexuals as a sexual minority identity and to decrease social discrimination and the negative stereotyping of bisexuals.

Bisexual activists do not agree on whether or not to form coalitions and work within existing gay and lesbian activist agendas. Some bisexuals think it is necessary to organize separately from "monosexuals," or heterosexuals and homosexuals, who are attracted to one sex/gender. Propelled by increasing tension between, especially, bisexual women and lesbian feminists, some bisexual activists sought the formation of exclusive bisexual organizations. In 1983, the first political bisexual organization, BiPOL, was formed by bisexual feminists in San Francisco. Other bisexual activists work within and alongside lesbian and gay groups, and efforts began in the 1980s to change the names of many lesbian and gay organizations and events to formally include bisexuals. For example, a 1993 political rally was renamed "March on Washington for Lesbian, Gay, and Bi Equal Rights and Liberation," a change toward greater inclusion that many bisexual activists perceived as crucial to success.

Bisexual activism began to spread during the 1980s from the United States to other regions, such as Canada, the United Kingdom, Europe, and New Zealand. The bisexual movement in the United States began to solidify with the start of regional conferences in the mid-1980s, followed by the first national bisexual conference in 1990. The first international conference on bisexuality was held in 1991. Also in the 1990s, some bisexual activists formed coalitions with the transgender movement. There has been increasing inclusion of "B" (bisexual) and "T" (transgender) into "LGBT" (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender) activism. Since the 1990s, some bisexuals have been involved in activism under the "queer" umbrella, a movement that seeks to eradicate all sexual identity labels.

Conclusion

The meaning of bisexuality was once contested within the scientific community, and now bisexuality is a controversial sexual identity. Debates about the meaning of bisexuality do not seem likely to be resolved in the near future. There exists only a small body of literature and academic research on bisexuals. Research on bisexuality is complicated by the challenges of acquiring a representative sample of bisexuals from which findings can be applied to a general bisexual population. Yet the bisexual movement is growing, and the social visibility and representation of bisexuals is increasing over time.

BLACKBURN, MOLLY (1930–1985)

Born November 12, 1930, in Port Elizabeth, South Africa, Molly Blackburn was introduced at an early age to liberal and progressive ideals by her father, a chairman of the Progressive Party of Port Elizabeth. That early orientation was to become a central focus and driving force of Blackburn's life. In addition to tending to seven children and her husband, Blackburn passionately committed much of her life to relentlessly fighting racial discrimination and injustice toward black individuals in South Africa. She was consistently active in numerous civil rights campaigns and served as a key member of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa. Blackburn also served as a member of the provincial legislature for the Progressive Federal Party during the 1980s, among other accomplishments.

Also of note is Blackburn's participation in the Black Sash, a grassroots, nonviolent organization made up of white South African women who shared the purpose of combating apartheid legislation. At one time acting as the Port Elizabeth Black Sash leader, she later rejected the organization when she began to feel the members were becoming sedentary. Blackburn has been referred to as Black Sash's most legendary member. Throughout her life, Blackburn persistently made clear her opposition to the government's perspective and legislation on issues of race and, consequently, was repeatedly arrested for integrating with black individuals, against government regulations. Blackburn's dedication to the movement was further evidenced by her frequent appearances in two controversial and public arenas; she was often the only white individual to attend rallies favoring the rights of black individuals, and she was regularly seen at funerals of black citizens who had died as a result of racial violence.

Blackburn did not limit her fight against injustice solely to civilian civil rights; she also helped investigate corrupt law enforcement occurrences. She was particularly active in investigating a number of police shootings in a black Cape Town township in March 1985. In addition, Blackburn was consistently invited by other black townships to assist in their particular battles toward gaining equal human and civil rights enjoyed by white South African citizens.

On December 28, 1985, at age 55, Blackburn was killed in a head-on car collision. The accident occurred when she was returning from a black township, where she had been assisting parents of children enduring human rights abuses by security forces. Some antiapartheid activists questioned whether white individuals, who considered her a traitor, had planned her death. Blackburn, as well as a number of other anti-apartheid advocates, had, in fact, received numerous death threats. Whether an accident or not, Blackburn's death was viewed as a tremendous loss for the apartheid opposition movement.

BLACK FEMINIST THOUGHT

A shared experience of the oppressive forces encountered by black women is the hallmark of Black feminism and, more specifically, Black feminist thought. This entry provides an overview of the origins, evolution, and central themes of Black feminist thought. Throughout much of their existence in the Western Hemisphere, black women have been forced to engage in the day-to-day struggles against myriad social injustices. The pervasive and persistent nature of these social injustices (such as racism, sexism, classism, and heterosexism) has inspired a shared consciousness or reality among black women that is grounded in their lived experiences and informed by a worldview that is shaped by their particular sociohistorical location.

Retracing the Roots of Black Feminist Thought

Black feminist thought is a framework that recognizes that all black women develop a distinct standpoint and strategies that enable their survival as a marginalized and maligned social group in an unjust society—a society, more specifically, that is entrenched in what Black feminist intellectual and cultural critic bell hooks has termed "imperialist white supremacist capitalist patriarchy." Even though this framework is informed by black women's distinct yet interrelated standpoints, lived experiences, and day-to-day struggles, Black feminist thought emerged from the writings and discourse of a burgeoning community of Black feminist intellectuals or academics throughout the last quarter of the 20th century. Many of the core assumptions of Black feminist thought date back to the writings, speeches, organizing, and political activism of a "privileged" community of black women associated with the abolitionist, antiracist, woman's suffrage, and black women's club movements.

Early Black feminist consciousness emerged during an era (1830s–1900) in U.S. history that is marked by two sociopolitical movements. On one hand, scholars and activists confronted the "race question" or issues concerning the discriminatory treatment of nonwhite U.S. citizens (primarily [enslaved] blacks) as well as the systemic inequalities that resulted. On the other hand, social activism and critical discourse centered on the "woman question" or issues relating to women's suffrage, equal rights, and sexual freedom.

Black feminists (such as Ida B. Wells-Barnett, Pauline Hopkins, Maria Stewart, Fannie Barrier Williams, and Mary Church Terrell) were fully committed to both causes but also found themselves torn between these two movements. These early Black feminists recognized and criticized the one-dimensional nature of each movement's political objectives (i.e., race centered or gender centered). The lived experiences of these Black feminist foremothers, like that of all black women, facilitated an awareness or level of sociopolitical consciousness that was perceptive of the interconnectedness or interlocking nature of these oppressions.

For these early Black feminists, any struggle for social justice that ignored or dismissed the interplay between racial and sex oppression was futile. In both their personal and political lives, early Black feminists, and black women in general, were incapable of isolating or separating the oppression they faced as black persons from the oppression they faced as women. As a result of this shared social reality, early Black feminists were the first public intellectuals and social activists to develop and articulate a holistic and humanist approach to combating social injustice in the United States. These relatively well-educated and politically astute black women drew on their perspectives as blacks to forge a sociopolitical consciousness that problematized a one-dimensional response to oppression. Early black feminists were the embodiment of multiple oppressions, and they challenged the movement politics of their day to recognize that the multiple oppressions black women inescapably confront are neither mutually exclusive nor separable. This reality was central to the writings and discourse of these women; it was a guiding principle behind their sociopolitical organizing and activism and it inspired Black feminist thought.

The Evolution of Black Feminist Thought

Although the writings and activism of early Black feminists introduced a black woman's standpoint into the social movements against various oppressions, the formulation of Black feminist thought—as an academic project—evolved throughout the last quarter of the 20th century from the diverse experiences of and critical dialogue between Black feminist academics and social activists. Contemporary Black feminists remain committed to developing a Black feminist consciousness centered around the plight and agency of black women by illuminating the interconnectedness of systems of oppression (for example, race, class, gender, sexuality, and nationality/citizenship). This interconnectedness has been variously described as what Black feminist legal scholar Kimberlé Crenshaw refers to as "intersectionality," or what Black feminist sociologist Patricia Hill Collins coined the "matrix of domination," or what Black feminist sociologist Deborah King characterizes as an "interstructure of oppressions."

Like their foremothers, many Black feminists during the 1960s and 1970s (for example, Angela Davis, June Jordan, bell hooks, Barbara Smith, and Audre Lorde) had to create organizational spaces and discursive communities that acknowledge and resisted the multiple and interlocking systems of oppression that dominated and repressed black women. The often one-dimensional agendas and racist and/or sexist practices of various liberation movements during this era (for example, civil rights movement, Black nationalist movement, and mainstream [white] feminist movement) necessitated that Black feminists for the most part develop a sociopolitical movement organized around empowering and liberating black women. Between 1960 and 1974, Black feminist activists as well as an increasing number of Black feminist scholars were fairly successful in forming Black feminist organizations that were either affiliated with or removed from activist organizations associated with the aforementioned movements: The Black Women's Liberation Group of Mount Vernon/New Rochelle (1960), Third World Women's Alliance (1968), the National Back Feminist Organization (1973), Black Women Organized for Action (1973), Combahee River Collective (1974), and the National Alliance of Black Feminists (1975). While building on a legacy of Black feminist activism and political resistance, the creation of Black feminist organizations helped to nurture the evolution or social construction of Black feminist thought.

The Fundamentals of Black Feminist Thought

For contemporary Black feminists, Black feminist thought represents more than a historical account or sociological description of black women's worldviews and life experiences. Black feminist thought represents a collective, sociopolitical consciousness that emerged from the shared standpoints and collective lived experiences of black women. As a theoretical framework, Black feminist thought provides a black woman's analysis or discourse about black women's oppression in an unjust society. Further, Black feminist thought allows for the development of alternative and distinct knowledge claims that emerge from and are grounded in a tradition of black women struggling against interlocking systems of oppression and their quest for self-determination and self-valuation. The theoretical and epistemological assumptions that characterize Black feminist thought go beyond the key writings of Black feminist intellectuals. The essence of Black feminist thought lies in its ability to empower and equip black women collectively to resist repressive and inhumane social, political, and economic forces in society. Across much of the published scholarship either by Black feminist intellectuals or regarding Black feminism, one may surmise three fundamental or key principles that constitute Black feminist thought: (1) the interdependence of black women's standpoint, lived experience, and collective consciousness; (2) the interlocking nature of systems of oppression; and (3) black women's struggle for empowerment and universal social justice.

The Interdependence of Black Women's Standpoint, Lived Experience, and Collective Consciousness

At the core of Black feminist thought is the standpoint of black women. For Black feminists, this standpoint goes beyond any individualistic assumptions of voice. A black woman's standpoint emerges from a sociopolitical reality that has been transmitted to, or shared among, black women throughout history. The collective experience of black women in an unjust and oppressive society is informed by a historical legacy of black women's struggle. This experience or standpoint is also constantly developing and transforming based on black women's status within a given social order or hierarchical power relations.

Black women's shared or collective lived experiences are at the center of black women's sociopolitical consciousness. Since black women's daily lived experiences or their level of awareness regarding their oppression within a given social milieu may vary along lines of class, sexuality, and nationality, Black feminist thought acknowledges a myriad of what Patricia Hill Collins labels as core themes in the lived experiences of all black women: exploitation of black women's labor; shifts and trends in black women's labor market status; interrelationship between black women's social roles in the public (e.g., paid labor) and private (i.e., the family) spheres; and the significance of mothering, sisterhood, family, and community in the lives of black women. These core themes represent a thread within Black feminist thought that illustrates the interconnectedness of black women's distinct social standpoint and their shared lived experiences, and they inspire a collective consciousness in most black women.

The Interlocking Nature of Systems of Oppression

Because Black feminist scholars and activists have consistently advanced a critique of social inequalities that is informed by the standpoints and shared lived experiences of black women, Black feminist thought—as a theoretical or ideological framework—is the first to articulate how multiple systems of oppression intersect or interlock to create a matrix of domination for black women in particular, and other oppressed and marginalized social groups. Further, this theoretical framework also highlights how the intersection of systems of oppression creates social privileges for the dominant group(s). In their quest to develop an intellectual understanding of and critical response to black women's peculiar struggles in an unjust society, Black feminists have long identified what Barbara Smith has referred to the "simultaneity of oppression." The holistic approach of Black feminist thought to understanding and addressing systems of oppression, moreover, is in opposition to what bell hooks has noted as a more entrenched and Westernized way of conceptualizing: "either/or dualistic thinking." Such thinking about or conceptualizing of social inequalities results in the perception of systems of oppression as a series of isolated or detached social phenomenon. This mode of thinking, however, is largely rooted in a Western intellectual tradition that values or privileges linear reductionism or causal analyses—or what Black feminists Deborah King and Patricia Hill Collins have identified as additive approaches to social inequalities.

Black feminist thought recognizes that the interlocking nature of systems of oppression is neither static nor unique to black women's lived experiences. The intersections and links that connect these multiple systems of oppression are constantly shifting and therefore must be assessed and challenged relative to a specific sociohistorical context. For example, assessing black women's labor history, as found in the writings of Jacqueline Jones and Judith Rollins, reveals that the intersections of racist, patriarchal, and capitalist forces have differentially impacted black women's experiences in the paid labor force at distinct historical and economic junctures in the United States. The complexity of the interlocking nature of systems of oppression must also be explored in the context of the different social locations that individuals must exist within and often transition between. While black women's shifting social locations within an unjust society is central to Black feminist thought, any assessment of these interlocking and multiple systems of oppression should go beyond, but not be detached from, the lived experiences of black women to include analyses of other oppressed as well as privileged social locations.

The Struggle for Black Women's Empowerment and Universal Social Justice

The intellectual or scholarly significance of Black feminist thought cannot be isolated from black women's day-to-day struggles against systems of oppression. From these struggles, there has emerged a commonly shared knowledge and core set of life experiences that have sustained black women across time and various social locations.

Black feminist thought—as an epistemology and activist framework—captures black women's agency and provides a guide for black women's empowerment and liberation. While black women's (collective) struggle against multiple systems of oppression is vital to their existence, their survival is also dependent on their resistance to cultural forces and practices that seek to dominate, suppress, and contain black women.

Black feminist thought and Black feminist scholars have given voice to black women's agency by rearticulating and redefining a dominant ideology that devalues and derogates black women's bodies, womanhood, and basic humanity, or what Patricia Hill Collins discusses as "the controlling images of black women." While black women have never been passive or complicit in their oppression and domination, Black feminist thought encourages black women to resist their domination by adopting alternative knowledge claims that promote self-valuation and self-determination.

For black women—as a collectivity—to be empowered, Black feminist thought argues that black women's struggle against or resistance to interlocking systems of oppression must become universal or extended beyond the lived experiences of black women. The interlocking systems of oppression do not only impact the lived experiences and collective consciousness of black women. These multiple and intersecting social forces organize the entire society and shape the material conditions and social interactions of everyone within society. While the elucidation of black women's relationship to these interlocking systems of oppression is central to a Black feminist critique of social inequalities and social privilege, such analyses are not intended to be exclusive to black women; therefore, the empowerment and liberation of black women is inextricably liked to the necessity that all social groups, across diverse social locations within the hierarchical power relations, engage in sociopolitical actions that seek to dismantle or eliminate all oppressive forces. It is this holistic or comprehensive response to systems of oppression that both underlies many of the key tenets of Black feminist thought and connects this specialized body of knowledge to a universal commitment to social justice.

Conclusion

Black feminist thought represents both the day-to-day struggles and acts of resistance by black women within an unjust society. This theoretical, epistemological, and activist framework is underscored by three fundamental themes. First, black women's distinct standpoint, lived experiences, and resulting collective consciousness are interrelated and constructed within a given sociohistorical context. Second, the oppressions faced by black women are interlocking or interconnected, which demands that any response to these oppressive forces employ a more holistic or humanist approach. Finally, Black feminist thought creates a framework for black women's social resistance and empowerment, hence encouraging a more just and human society.

BLOOMSBURY GROUP

The Bloomsbury Group was an informal salon for British intellectuals of diverse disciplines who shared common philosophical and political viewpoints and collaborated on creative and critical projects. It also doubled as a countercultural social circle within the late-Edwardian, World War I, and interwar years. The Bloomsbury Group is of particular interest to students of gender and sexuality because (a) its members wrote literary and nonfiction works that pose diverse challenges to gender-related hierarchies and other normative standards and (b) the group constituted a social support system for unconventional sexualities and polyamorous (open) relationships. The achievements of Bloomsbury members extend into fields such as literature, biography, art, philosophy, and economics and include the work of luminary figures such as writers Virginia Woolf and E. M. Forster, biographer Lytton Strachey, and artist Duncan Grant.

The Bloomsbury Group originated in the association of several of its male members through an unsanctioned intellectual society at the University of Cambridge, though it quickly expanded to include female relatives of some of the male members, including sisters Virginia Woolf and Vanessa Bell. During the peak years of the group's activity, most members lived and worked in London's Bloomsbury District, the group's namesake. The members shared a modernist sensibility that questioned traditional British cultural mores and idealistically elevated both humanistic and instrumentalist understandings of life, death, time, and reality.

Much Bloomsbury work attacks gender role ideology and social systems such as capitalism, imperialism, and militarism. The work of people loosely associated with the group, such as John Maynard Keynes and G. E. Moore, radically transformed theory in fields such as economics and philosophy and greatly influenced the group's core members. Strachey is renowned for innovating in the writing of biography by incorporating a psychological, inward-looking approach (following the contemporaneous work of Freud, whose earliest publications in English translation came from the Bloomsbury-run Hogarth Press). Grant's postimpressionist, figurative art addressed themes of social relevance, including homosexual desire; likewise, Forster is remembered most for Maurice (1971), a gay coming-of-age novel written around 1914 but published only posthumously.

Virginia Woolf was perhaps the most influential Bloomsbury member. Her works, including nonfiction, such as A Room of One's Own (1929) and Three Guineas (1938), and novels, such as Mrs. Dalloway (1925), To the Lighthouse (1927), and Orlando: A Biography (1928), directly challenge gender inequality and other social problems. Orlando is widely read as a fictionalization of Vita Sackville-West (one of Woolf's romantic partners) and traces the "biography" of a protagonist who lives across multiple centuries and undergoes a sort of mystical sex change at midlife. In many ways, the novel captures the radical spirit of the Bloomsbury Group, reaching its hopeful climax in an early 20th century free of the pretenses and many of the social and intellectual problems of earlier ages.

BLUESTOCKING SOCIETY

The Bluestocking Society, also referred to as the "Bluestocking Circle" or merely "the bluestockings," was a group of women intellectuals in England during the late 18th and early 19th century. Some of the more well-known members in the first generation of the bluestockings included Elizabeth Montagu, Catherine Talbot, Hester Chapone, and Elizabeth Carter.

The term bluestocking was coined by Elizabeth Montagu and originally referred to one who dressed according to lower-class sensibilities. Montagu's "conversation parties," an alternative to the cardplaying popular at the time, often included one bluestocking, Benjamin Stillingfleet, a highly educated man. Due to the attendance of Stillingfleet, the group began to be referred to as the Bluestocking Society. Soon, Montagu and her friends began using it to describe the learned men they knew, and eventually the term was used by the women to describe themselves and not the men they were friends with. The term has a historical reputation for being used as a derogatory term for women who "overstep their bounds" and become "too intelligent."

The bluestockings in England are often discussed in conjunction with the French salons (meetings to discuss art, politics, and other intellectual topics), but the two have as many differences as similarities. For example, the bluestockings published their work, something the salonnières (women who hosted the salons) never did. In addition, bluestocking groups were held together by friendship, and they met whenever they had the time, as opposed to the strict weekly meetings of the French salons. Furthermore, although the bluestockings valued their relationships with men, both romantic and otherwise, they did not share the French need to include men in their groups.

What afforded the bluestockings the social sanction to pursue intellectual interests was a combination of their virtue and the men who were included in their groups. Their virtue was important because it was not uncommon for people to associate education with sexual promiscuity during the time the bluestockings existed. The men they included in their groups served as a support system for the women and furthered their ability to publish their work.

The bluestockings challenged the societal beliefs of their time regarding the education of women. Through their intellectual pursuits, they proved that not only were women capable of learning but that women were capable of being men's intellectual equals. They did not, however, consider themselves feminists. Although they believed in educational equality for women, political and economic equality were not among the social changes they wished to achieve. Their self-identification, however, did not stop feminists in the 1970s from using the group as inspiration to form feminist organizations, such as the Redstockings, a group whose name comes from a Marxist reclaiming of the term bluestocking.

BODYBUILDING

Bodybuilding is the practice of building large, defined muscles, often for competition. When competing, bodybuilders show their bodies to various judges, who award points based on aesthetic appearance. Men are typically associated with this sport, and becoming a male bodybuilder is consistent with ideals of masculinity. Judging focuses on the definition and symmetry of the muscles. Conversely, women who enter this realm contradict traditional ideals of femininity. Traditionally, judges evaluated women less on their musculature and more on their ability to provide a feminine appearance, although these criteria are changing. Therefore, when women do successfully enter this domain, they often encounter much conflict with the feminine ideal both upon their entry and in judging processes.

This entry will focus on female bodybuilding. More specifically, it attends to the historical context of bodybuilding and women's entry into this domain. Also, this entry addresses how women engage in "gender-bending" and discuss the challenges that women have faced in bodybuilding. Last, it will provide some general conclusions and possible future directions of female bodybuilding.

Historical Context and Female Bodybuilding

The sport of bodybuilding has historically been a male domain, where men can build and display their ultra-muscular and ultramasculine bodies. In this regard, bodybuilding has served to reify gender roles of men and women. Highly valued characteristics, such as aggression, domination, and power, are reinforced when men participate in bodybuilding. In contrast, women historically have not been included in this domain. Women were not seen fit for this realm due to their "weak" and "vulnerable" feminine bodies. Nonetheless, women's bodybuilding came to existence in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Any competitions prior to 1980 were typically physique contests that deemphasized musculature and focused on a feminine physique. Women in these contests wore bikinis and high heels. They were not encouraged to flex their muscles like their male counterparts. Women began to challenge popular perceptions regarding gender norms when physique contests became national bodybuilding competitions, such as the prestigious Ms. Olympia Competition, which started in 1980.

Along with the lack of emphasis on muscularity in the early contests devoted to female bodybuilders, women also were not expected to train at an intense level. As the sport grew, training was valued, and women were encouraged to develop more muscular physiques. However, even today, a female body with "overdeveloped" muscles is seen as a negative characteristic, both in society and within the sport of bodybuilding. There is still emphasis on symmetry, face, healthy appearance, and makeup. Therefore, it is obvious that although the sport has evolved significantly, there are still boundaries of femininity set in place, usually by men.

Gender-Bending and Challenges

Women bodybuilders are seen as gender-benders, or female athletes who stretch and/or cross boundaries of "natural" femininity. Traditionally, lifting weights and building muscle was not acceptable for women because of perceptions of the possibility of impairing their reproductive organs and processes. Female bodybuilders have broken gender barriers regarding frailty and "soft" bodies. They have shown that strength and power are not characteristics only for men. Women in this realm have found a sense of empowerment through building their bodies to be strong and muscular. However, they have encountered much resistance and scrutiny as well. Although women bodybuilders are pushing boundaries and disproving traditional notions of "natural" femininity, many people are determined to keep this from happening.

Definitions of femininity are constantly changing. Because of these changing interpretations, it is difficult to find the "right equation" for the "ideal" female bodybuilder. Judges continually have to establish a balance between the criteria of muscularity and femininity. To satisfy these demands, women bodybuilders often wear bikini posing suits in neon colors, have their fingernails and toenails polished, dye their hair blond, and wear earrings and excessive makeup for competitions. In addition, they often shave all their body hair, and some women have plastic surgery performed on their faces and bodies to improve them aesthetically. These practices reinforce their femininity and contradict their muscular development, allowing them to find a balance between femininity and muscularity.

It is obvious that women have broken into the bodybuilding realm and challenged traditional notions of gender roles. They have found success in this domain and have been empowered through the sport of bodybuilding. However, because they often feel compelled to continue to display dominant forms of femininity, female bodybuilders are still faced with constraints regarding traditional definitions and perceptions of how a woman's body should look.

Despite the challenges that women have faced in the bodybuilding subculture, they have paved a path for other women to enter this realm. Also, they have found great sources of personal empowerment through building their bodies to be strong and muscular. Women will continue to challenge these gender roles and create more opportunities for other women through their participation in bodybuilding.

Conclusion

Many women reject the possibility of becoming a bodybuilder due to the contradictions of femininity that female bodybuilders encounter. Much of society is not comfortable seeing women develop their bodies in such a muscular manner. However, as women train and compete in the bodybuilding subculture, they are forcing a reconsideration of traditional definitions of femininity. Although judges still evaluate competitors on certain "feminine" features, they are becoming more aware of the muscular capabilities of women. Women are breaking boundaries and creating empowering experiences for themselves and for generations of women to come—not only by establishing themselves in the highly male-dominated domain of bodybuilding, but in the sports world in general.

BODY HAIR

In some cultures, the presence or absence of body hair differentiates between men and women and reflects social codes and expectations to which men and women are expected to adhere. Though biologically hair is important as a part and extension of the skin that covers almost all of the human body, the distinct cultural meanings of body and head hair have become more important than biological functions. Whereas people tend to celebrate and adorn head hair, they more often remove or hide body hair to reflect gender and cultural norms. When people speak of body hair—itself a rare occurrence—they often apply one of four (contradictory) interpretations: body hair as a problematic excess, as a monstrosity (or as evidence of monstrousness), as a trivial matter, or as a form of political protest.

Freud's essay "The Medusa's Head" provides the most famous critical reading of body hair. Freud suggested that the Medusa's snakes symbolize female pubic hair. Much anthropological writing on the subject of hair begins with Freud's essay, although Freud focuses on head hair while ignoring the significance of body hair.

Removal and Modification

Though some may consider the study of hair to be merely trivial, its position in the marketplace suggests otherwise. For instance, it has been estimated that hair removal in Britain alone is annually worth £280 million. The removal of women's body hair has replaced body hair as a fetishistic discourse that must be reiterated; such a reiteration is good news for those who sell hair removal products. Where body hair has a cultural presence, it is almost always concerned with body modification practices, including its removal or alteration. Indeed, until the recent publication of The Last Taboo: Women and Body Hair, edited by Karin Lesnik-Oberstein, contemporary writing on body hair has been almost exclusively about its removal.

Sarah Hildebrandt's detailed account of normative body hair practices among North American women builds on the work of Michel Foucault and suggests that for men as well as women, certain parts of the body become available for public display through the modification of body hair. Therefore, body hair is never so much evident as is its removal. When head hair has a historical presence, as in The History of Hair: The First Five Thousand Years, by Richard Corson, for instance, this history concerns its modification or a crisis produced by a problem associated with it: Hair in general becomes that which is modified or in need of modification.

As a review of the literature demonstrates, much current writing on body hair focuses on hair modification by women, or rather the production of "woman" and "women's bodies" via body hair modification. In such formulations, the modification of hair somehow defines what a woman might be. Research into the production of the male body challenges notions of that body as somehow stable and assumptions of a simplistic heterosexist dyad. A recent experiment by Michael Boroughs, documented in the paper "Male Body Depilation: Prevalence and Associated Features of Body Hair Removal," further complicates the issue, demonstrating that so-called normative female responses to body hair can also be understood as male behaviors and that depilation itself can be read as that which blurs the boundaries between what is considered male and female. All the same, one can see historically reiterated a trope that seeks to give a presence to certain kinds of male body hair and to make invisible certain kinds of female body hair. Such a trope functions not only to differentiate between men and women but also as a political device.

The Research Literature

It is interesting to draw together some of the writing on women's body hair modification in sociology, anthropology, psychology, and related disciplines as a way of understanding both women's body hair and the study of body hair. One useful place to find a general survey of the meanings attributed to hair is Victoria Sherrow's An Encyclopedia of Hair: A Cultural History. Broadly speaking, writing on women's body hair modification generally follows one of two directions. First, hirsutism is read as a specifically female condition, in which hair appears in places where its presence is considered masculine. The study of hirsutism is of concern to medics, psychologists, sociologists, and cultural theorists, due to the problematic definition of the pathology of hirsutism itself. There is no agreement on what might be considered a "normal" distribution of visible body hair and therefore no agreement on what might deviate from the norm.

The second kind of writing on women's body hair modification explores normative modification behaviors. Whereas some texts deal primarily with the medicalization of so-called superfluous hair and focus on "masculine" body hair on the "female body" and its psychological and pathological implications, other texts discuss the apparent normativity of its removal among women in particular countries, even though the medical languages applied to hirsutism are also applied to "normative body hair removal." For example, Toerien and Wilkinson's article "Gender and Body Hair: Constructing the Feminine" draws together a variety of studies of body hair removal and analyzes how the feminine woman is produced through a range of practices. Other papers document experiments involving the study of participants' body hair behaviors. They include Susan Basow's work on body hair removal; Joan Ferrante's work on perceptions of abnormality and hirsutism; and Keegan, Liao, and Boyle's report on psychological implications of hirsutism. Marika Tiggemann and Christine Lewis's work on the relationship between body hair and disgust explores how hair relates to Julia Kristeva's work on the abject. Sarah Hildebrandt and Penny Jolly, in independent work, draw together and contextualize the history of women's body hair removal practices in the United States.

One such practice began in America with the marketing of the Gillette safety razor to women. Though this practice began to influence European women, the influence has been slow and uneven. Body hair modification has fluctuated over time and is certainly not universal across cultures. Such evidence can be found in various texts. For instance, Anne Hollander discusses the issue in relation to art history in "Seeing Through Clothes" and draws our attention to a work by John Baptista Porta that contains recipes for depilatory preparations and engravings and paintings by Watteau that show women in the process of modifying their pubic hair.

Politics and the Workplace

Consistently, researchers seem to find it difficult to discuss the issues that arise in a scholarly examination of body hair, perhaps because body hair on women has been understood within some cultures to be a horror. The idea of a hairy woman is for some a contradiction in terms—the one excludes the other. As a result, body hair has also been a political tool to lampoon politicized women. For instance, in a text cited by Naomi Wolf, 19th-century feminists were satirized via an association with hirsutism; and in January 1978, Spare Rib magazine described an article in a women's magazine in which a medic maintained that certain women attending his clinic were becoming more masculinized—and therefore more hirsute—the more they went out to work.

When one considers, for instance, that as many as 25 percent of women could exhibit the symptoms of polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS), one of which is hirsutism, the assertion that men are hairy and women are not becomes difficult to maintain. Gendered perceptions of hair on the body are difficult if they mean that certain bodies will therefore be excluded because they violate what is considered to be the norm. This has a pragmatic implication, too. There is evidence from the courts, for instance, that some women have been fired from their jobs for excess facial hair. Sometimes, in homophobic environments, terms such as feminist, ugly, hairy, and lesbian are conflated. Within such an environment, it is not easy to have a debate about the meanings of hair as they relate to the gendered body.

Critical conversations about body hair involve more than a debate about whether or not women should or should not remove hair from their underarms and their legs. The debate about body hair also asks us to think about how gender is socially constructed and calls the boundaries of the body into question.

BODY IMAGE

The human body is understood as both a physiological creation and a social construct. Individuals experience their bodies through a web of interconnected meaning and practices defined by the societies in which they live. Bodies are reflections of social norms, cultural practices, identity, and self-expression. The organization of gender within a society (e.g., male, female, transgender, and intersex) and the socialization of individuals into the expected roles and behaviors disparately associated with each gender inform how we manage perceptions of bodies. Individuals follow these norms of gendered behavior because their identities and self-esteem are determined by the extent to which they meet social expectations. There are high social rewards for women and men performing their gender roles according to socially acceptable norms. Social relationships, familial ties, and upward social mobility are all connected to how well individuals perform gender roles. For those that fall outside of the traditional Western cultural binary of male and female—transgender and intersex just to name a few—social consequences are high, including alienation from both formal and informal social and familial networks and discrimination in the public sphere.

Discussions on body image include a close examination of the connection between sex and gender, body ideals and societal standards of beauty, and the perpetuation of a culture of thinness. Cultural and ethnic differentiation also impact how these ideals are negotiated. Individuals, particularly women but increasingly men, fall prey to these ideals, which are promoted through manufactured body images in popular culture. Methods of controlling body weight are used to meet these beauty ideals through eating-disordered behaviors, dieting, and cosmetic surgeries.

Sex and Gender

Sociologists of gender argue that differences between men and women that have historically been thought of as biological or natural are actually produced through social practices that persuade men and women to use their bodies differently. Sex and gender are two social categories that are often intertwined. Sex is a category of self-identification and presentation that is assumed to be congruent with biological criteria for classification as female or male. These biological criteria include chromosomes, hormones, genitalia, and procreative organs. Gender is a category based on the sex assigned at birth, which produces patterns of social expectations for bodies, behavior, emotions, and family and work roles.

Gender display refers to the ways that individuals manage their presentation of self as a gendered body through the use of symbols, attitudes, and physical activities appropriate to one's sex category. Men are often expected to be confident, rational actors, while women are expected to be nurturing and obedient. Gender also determines social roles, like that of mother and father, and the type of worker one is, like domestic caregiver (female) versus corporate executive (male). Gender behaviors are valued differently and produce different social outcomes for men and women. While women have entered the workforce at varying positions en masse in the latter part of the 20th century, they are still overwhelmingly in positions that earn wages significantly lower than men's wages. Thus, men and women have different relationships with their bodies, which has direct implications on how men and women are situated within the domestic sphere and the labor force.

In terms of body norms, there is a double standard of beauty for men and women. Men and women relate to their bodies differently, and while men are socialized to be concerned with their bodies, physical appearance plays a greater role in societal perceptions and treatment of women. In Western cultures, women have been associated with nature—body, land, childbirth, caregiving—while men have been associated with culture—the mind, abstract reason. Human dominion over nature and the mind's domination over the body are embodied in the male/female dichotomy. Ideas about women and the body shape gender ideologies and reinforce what is called biological determinism, or the tendency to see women in terms of their reproductive and biological selves. Gender studies scholars incorporate nuanced analyses of the social construction of gender and the impact of stereotypical roles on both male and female perceptions of body ideals. However, feminist scholars emphasize the disparate relations of power between men and women and that the body and its expression have stronger repercussions for women's lives.

Body and Beauty Ideals

Norms and ideals about standard body shapes are culturally expressed in intentional and unintentional ways. Boys and girls learn these standards from a young age through the types of toys and play activity that is encouraged by adults. Females are represented in the tall, busty image of "Barbie." Although the doll has morphed into many identities that represent women of varying employment status and ethnicities, her basic body frame remains a constant illustration of the ideal that girls should strive for. Boys learn their place in society through the buff, tanned, militarily trained action figures that symbolize strength, endurance, and courage. They are socialized to be the protector of both society and home. Boys often develop a connected relationship with their bodies because they learn that it is through physical strength and intellectual development that masculinity is defined. Girls often develop a negative association with their bodies because it is through physical beauty and deference to male authority that femininity is defined.

Beauty ideals reflect various relations of power in society. American beauty ideals are connected to the production and consumption of products that enhance body aesthetics and morph phenotype. The industries of fashion, cosmetics, hair, diet and exercise, food, entertainment, advertising, and plastic surgery profit from maintaining the beauty myth. Popular media reinforce the myth by recycling images of tough, virile men juxtaposed with petite, demure women, whose role is to be rescued by the former.

Consumers also internalize these norms and receive positive and negative reinforcement for conforming to or resisting them. People engage in what are called disciplinary practices, or the taken-for-granted routinized behaviors that involve social control in that we spend time, money, and effort and instill meaning in the practices. These practices include shaving, applying makeup, and altering hair by using any number of chemical products and electric hardware. For women, these practices are tied to staying thin, petite, and young.

The Culture of Thinness

Western cultural standards of beauty and attractiveness promote an unhealthy body ideal for women to be thin. The physical body has become a measure of value for women. Signs of this "culture of thinness" are visible in popular media, including magazines, television, film, and music. These outlets encourage women to be thin through the use of unhealthy diet and weight control methods in order to feel good about themselves, be successful at work and school, and attract friends and romantic partners. Research suggests that exposure to computer-modified images of young, thin women is linked to depression, a significant decrease in self-esteem, and the development of unhealthy diet practices in women and girls.

Advertising and the fashion industry have been targets of severe scrutiny for maintaining unrealistic standards of beauty. The average model today weighs 23 percent less than the average woman, compared with 20 years ago, when models weighed 8 percent less. Women's high-end fashion brands rarely produce clothing larger than a size 12. The average American woman is a size 14. While the demand for plus-size clothing has significantly increased in recent years, there is still a perception among the fashion elite that smaller sizes are more desirable.

Associated with the positive reinforcement of thinness is the related stigma associated with fat. A survey conducted by the Alliance for Eating Disorders Awareness reports that women age 18 to 25 would rather be hit by a truck than be fat. Two thirds surveyed also reported that they would rather be stupid or mean than be fat. Being overweight is often used to judge a woman's limited worth. Perceived as incapable of living up to society's attractiveness standard, overweight women are subject to increased forms of shame and ridicule, as evidenced by their harsh treatment in film and television. The obsession to be thin leads women to turn to harmful eating-disordered behavior and to develop an unrealistic sense of self.

Eating-Disordered Behavior and Body Dysmorphia

While eating disorders function on an individual level, they are culturally mediated through environmental conditions associated with the politics of gender and sexuality. Scholars think about this behavior in two ways. The first set of behaviors are referred to as eating disorders, including anorexia nervosa (self-starvation), bulimia nervosa (binge eating with vomiting and/or laxative use), compulsive eating (uncontrolled eating) and muscle dysmorphia (fear of being not sufficiently muscled). The second set of behaviors are known as general eating-disordered behaviors and include occasional binging, fasting, compulsive food habits, obsessive dieting, and overexercising.

Eating-disordered behavior typically stems from individual body dysmorphia, or an excessive preoccupation with perceived flaws in appearance. Researchers suggest that this behavior is directly associated with societal pressure, primarily for women to live up to the standards of beauty set by a culture obsessed with being thin. Body manipulation also symbolizes the value of women and girls in society, which affects self-esteem and the mental and physical health of women.

Eating disorders affect primarily young women. According to the National Association of Anorexia Nervosa and Associated Disorders (ANAD), the age of the onset of eating disorders is getting younger; age 11 to 17 is identified as the time of increased vulnerability. For adults, the approximate ratio of eating disorders among men to women is 1:10. About 20 to 30 percent of younger anorexics are male. Up to 20 percent of individuals with serious eating disorders die as a result of the disorder, as a result of complications associated with heart problems and chemical imbalances, and suicide.

Diet Industries and Cosmetic Surgery

Societal pressures to be thin have increased the demand for products and services in the weight control industries. These industries range from diet, fitness, and supplements to cosmetic and bariatric (weight loss) surgery. It is estimated that weight control products and services generate $50 to $100 billion per year. Women are a major target for marketing by weight control industries. According to the American Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery, in 2006, women accounted for 92 percent of all cosmetic procedures. Since 1997, surgical procedures (e.g., liposuction, breast augmentation, breast reduction) have increased 123 percent, while nonsurgical procedures (e.g., Botox injection, microdermabrasion, laser hair removal) increased 749 percent.

Surgical procedures have increased as a method of managing weight. One third of American adults are classified as obese based on a body mass index of 30 or higher. A study from the University of Michigan Health System found that between 1996 and 2002, the rate of bariatric surgeries performed in the United States increased sevenfold. Women make up 80 percent of all cases. Bariatric surgery comes with severe health risks. Researchers at the University of Washington report that the death rate is 1 in 50 within 30 days after a gastric bypass surgery. However, researchers have also found that the long-term risk of death due to weight-related health conditions is significantly lower among those who had the surgery compared with obese persons who did not. The National Institutes of Health reports that U.S. spending for weight-related conditions and their associated economic losses is at minimum $117 billion per year. Weight-related health conditions include heart disease, diabetes, hypertension, and sleep apnea.

Intersection of Race, Ethnicity, Sexual Orientation, and Gender

The intersection of race, ethnicity, gender, class, and sexual orientation also plays a role in how individuals experience their bodies. Body dissatisfaction is often attributed to societal standards of thinness and an ideal body type that privileges fair skin, light hair, and other European-descended features. Mainstream Western media imagery tends to homogenize female beauty, which becomes the ideal against which women measure and discipline their bodies. Women of color are significantly impacted by this. While their representation in beauty and fashion magazines is increasing, such publications often reinforce prevailing stereotypes of lighter skin and European-descended features.

Research suggests that sociocultural influences, environmental stress, and the process of acculturation impact the development of eating disorders for women of color. Black women and Latinas are on average heavier than white women. While white women and women of higher socioeconomic status tend to suffer from eating disorders at a higher rate, these rates are increasing for women of color. Women of color who are most vulnerable to eating-disordered behavior include those who have been separated from their primary cultural groups for a significant period of time; women who have internalized the dominant, Eurocentric cultural perception of beauty; and those acclimating to a different culture. According to ANAD, eating disorders in the United States appear to be as common among Hispanic as among Caucasian women. Black women are more prone to bulimia nervosa and abuse of laxatives.

Women of color tend to frame the discussion around body image in terms of body ethics, a set of values and beliefs regarding care and presentation of the body (as opposed to body aesthetics ideals). These include cultural values regarding body care and presentation and personal and political commitments. Women of color also develop strategies of resistance for identifying affirming images of themselves and fostering positive self-image. Scholars acknowledge the importance of culture and ethnicity in shaping how women develop positive ways of experiencing their bodies through cultural norms and practices.

A central theme in multiracial feminist perspectives, including Black feminism, womanism, and Chicana feminism, is the internalization of body image ideals for women of color. The politics of cultural representation as racialized and resistance through cultural affirmation is evidenced in the activism and discourse of feminist women of color of the late 20th century.

Men and Masculinity

While body image and associated stigmas are commonly linked to women, the pressure to achieve a particular body ideal for men has significantly increased in recent decades. The ideal for men is a muscular body type, or the mesomorphic ideal, associated with physical strength, power, and dominance. Images of this ideal permeate sports culture as well as film, television, and men's magazines. Men are pressured to build physical prowess as a measure of success, power, dominance, and an ability to protect women. In the past 25 years, the average Playgirl magazine centerfold man has decreased in body fat by approximately 12 pounds, while putting on approximately 27 pounds of muscle. Action figures, like "GI Joe," represent this increase in body mass for men. Since 1960, GI Joe has increased in chest size by 10 inches, and his biceps have increased by 3 inches.

Some researchers suggest that increased rates of women in the workforce have amplified the pressure for men to be more physically attractive, since women have a larger dating pool. Changing power dynamics among men and women in society compel men to exert power and dominance through the increase of their physical form.

Male body dissatisfaction has increased as the prevalence of the mesomorphic ideal has increased. Eating-disordered behaviors for men begin as a means of promoting positive health. These behaviors often turn excessive due to an increased perception of competitiveness among men to be more muscular.

Health risks for men include depression, low self-esteem, and excessive weight lifting, as well as those associated with the consumption of performance-enhancing supplements, such as creatine and anabolic steroids. Bulimia nervosa is also an increasingly common form of eating disorder for men. In 2007, researchers at the Harvard University Medical School report that men make up 25 percent of all adults with eating disorders. According to Anorexia Nervosa and Related Eating Disorders, Inc., men are less likely to seek treatment for eating disorders because they are commonly understood as a women's problem.

Gay men face an increased level of pressure to conform to the mesomorphic ideal. Minority stress factors such as internalized homophobia, expected stigma for being gay, and experiences of physical attack are associated with increased body image dissatisfaction and masculine body ideal distress for gay men. In 2007, researchers at Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health found that the risk for eating-disordered behavior among gay and bisexual men is 3 times greater than for heterosexual men. The study also found that even with slightly elevated eating disorders among men who were active in gay recreational groups, men who reported having a close connection to the gay community and participated in a range of gay and bisexual organizations did not have higher rates of eating disorders than men who were not as closely affiliated with the community. Rates of eating disorders among lesbian and bisexual women do not differ significantly from gay and bisexual men.

Conclusion

Coupled with the pressure to conform to beauty ideals is the anxiety of performing normative gender roles. These roles are associated with the requisite thinness and fragility linked to femininity for women and the lean, muscular body type symbolizing masculinity for men. Campaigns to promote healthy body images have increased in popularity in recent years. These campaigns include featuring plus-size women in advertising to encouraging exercise and healthy eating habits, particularly among adolescents. In addition, increased representation of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender individuals in popular culture has provided new illustrations of gendered bodies. Bending the rules of gender performance has opened the door for increased representation of different body types and, in turn, for a broader social discussion of gender, sex, sexuality, and difference.

Body Politics

The term body politics refers to academic and social controversies surrounding the significance of the body. Since the 1960s, feminist social scientists and other academics have focused intently on understanding the existing cultural differentiation of male and female bodies and, subsequently, analyzing the real-world ramifications of gendered body norms. Academics engage in examining body politics in a multitude of areas; two important arenas include theorizing the body and analyzing embodied appearance.

Theorizing the Body

Academics have long debated the body's significance. To some theorists, the body is a mere physical, biological being of little social importance; this is largely a perspective taken by many medical researchers. Sociobiologists, in contrast, see the body as a necessary precursor to social relations: They assume that the body shapes social interaction. Sociobiologists have contended that dysfunctional bodies produce deviant behavior; for example, women's dysfunctional bodies have been thought to cause hysteria and hypersexuality.

Many sociologists view the body as affected by social location. Sociologists frequently assert that cultural, economic, and political factors are literally visible on the bodies of society members. On a basic level, social location affects what people do with their bodies: whether they use their bodies for physical labor or leisure and the types of food, shelter, goods, and services they can access. Social location impacts individuals' access to and quality and scope of health care. Sociological research has demonstrated that economically disadvantaged people are more likely to have poor health than the well-to-do.

While positivist sociologists frequently analyze impacts of large-scale social factors, poststructuralists and postmodernists reveal the influence of social norms and values upon individuals' body consciousness. Michel Foucault, the influential French theorist, argued that people and their bodies are continually observed and closely controlled. Individuals' bodies are "disciplined" by social structures, others, and even themselves. Consequently, people engage in body modification practices, such as dieting and exercise programs, to bring their bodies into alignment with dominant social standards.

Feminist poststructural scholars have extended Foucault by arguing that bodily regulation affects women differently and more strongly than men. While both women and men are told how to act, modify, and carry their bodies, men are permitted more freedom, space, and body leniency. Women, in contrast, are especially encouraged to discipline their bodies through feminized comportment and restricted movement and to minimize their bodies' size.

Embodied Appearance

Gender-differentiated body conceptions reflect a popular—and sometimes scholarly—conception of men and women as essentially different. Historical and contemporary social divisions in the United States portray males and females as the only acceptable sexes and men and women as the only accepted gender designations. Moreover, Western conceptions of gender and sex assume symmetry between maleness/ men and femaleness/women categories. This binary system imposes limitations on gender and sex variance and frequently compels people to alter bodies and behaviors that are not perfectly attuned to dominant gender/sex categories. In actuality, human bodies can vary in many ways that negate the absolutist classifications of dominant sex/gender understandings: Intersexuals complicate the conventional sex binary through containing phenotype and/or genotype characteristics of males and females; transgender and transsexual people disentangle normative assumptions of sex and gender correspondence. Social constructionist feminists have refuted essentialist conceptions by revealing varying definitions of appropriate sex and gender categories throughout history and between geographically disparate locales.

Sociologists have shown that sex and gender classifications at birth set precedents for lifelong behavior. People are expected to tailor their appearance, comportment, and activities to be in alignment with gender category norms. In the mid-20th century, men were thought to be judged more by their actions and intelligence than by their beautified bodies. Although the male body is increasingly commodified and objectified, men's body norms center mainly upon hygienic grooming and athleticism. In contrast, women have been evaluated by their beautified bodies and feminine mannerisms. Women have been instructed to pay special attention to their hairstyles and makeup. They are supposed to act in a "ladylike" fashion, monitor their weight, and engage in weight reduction when needed. Though body ideals have varied according to race, class, social location, and historical period, women's attractiveness is continually portrayed as relevant in judging one's worthiness. Feminist sociologists have noted that women are cast as commodities and objects. Women similarly report feeling pressure—from themselves and/or others—to meet gendered embodiment ideals. Many women engage in bodywork, such as exercise, dieting, or carefully selecting clothing, to feel better about their bodies.

The early 1990s was an important moment for analyzing gendered appearance norms. Feminist academics Susan Bordo and Judith Butler and popular writers Susan Faludi and Naomi Wolf argued for the dilution and transformation of restrictive, gendered body standards. Body expectations promoted by advertising, media, and the beauty industry were discussed as objectifying and oppressive. The objectification of the culturally mediated body applied to all individuals but was thought to be especially significant for women.

Since the early 1990s, both popular and academic feminist works have occasionally assumed that individuals who participate in bodywork are "cultural dopes," who mindlessly engage in the reproduction of oppressive, divisive norms. This critique of social norms is a key component of feminist methodology; feminists look at how normative standards are situated and how they reify repressive social relationships. However, another hallmark of feminist research is respecting the voices and experiences of research respondents—and such respect is contrary to etically evaluating bodywork participants as "dopes." Some feminist sociologists actively refute the opinion that bodywork participants merely enact and reproduce cultural standards. These authors have demonstrated that engagement in bodywork does not equate to being a cultural dope, but rather reflects an intricate negotiation of identity, structural location, and cultural standards.

BOSTON MARRIAGES

The term Boston marriage was used in New England in the late 19th century to refer to a long-standing and intimate monogamous relationship between two women who typically were not heterosexually affianced or wed at the time of their relationship, though they may have been so before or after the relationship. Another term for Boston marriage is Wellesley marriage, in tribute to both the New England origins and the value of academic achievement attributed to the partners. A Boston marriage may or may not have sexual overtones; if not, lesbian bed death is the current evocative term for those nonsexual unions of past years. In considering whether these lesbian partnerships were "closeted" in the current sense of the term, the answer is unclear. Some seem to have been, but others were undoubtedly open, as autobiographies and memoirs of the time reveal.

The state of Massachusetts made same-sex unions legal in 2004, leading some to believe that the term Boston marriage is a new usage. In fact, it dates back at least as far as its first literary appearance in the 19th century.

The literary origin and history of usage for Boston marriage begins by citing Henry James's characters Olive and Verena, from the novel The Bostonians, written in 1885. James applied the term to those relationships, which he depicted as common in New England, in which two women formed a long-term relationship, shared financial obligations, shared personal regard, might identify themselves as advocates of women's rights in that time ("New Women"), and may or may not have been sexual partners.

A literary contrast is David Mamet's all-woman play Boston Marriage (2000). Its title is only an homage to James's usage, and Mamet's play was much criticized when first performed. In Mamet's usage, there is no doubt that sexual intimacy is a feature of the Boston marriage.

Social historians suggest that the Boston marriage is best understood as a regional American phenomenon, and a phenomenon limited by era. Thus, the term is most accurately applied to the New England relationships between women in the Victorian America of the 19th century, reflecting the particularly "Yankee" American values of independent thinking, especially as demonstrated through work motivated by social conscience and resulting from academic or other formal training and achievement; self-reliance, in the sense that the relationship between two women involved in a Boston marriage, and often their circle of similarly involved friends, was completely satisfying; and hard work, indeed, the feeling that work outside the home was a sine qua non.

Other analysts point out the strength of feelings and intimacy of two women involved in a Boston marriage as recalling the bonds of mother and daughter. It is also often mentioned that women involved in Boston marriages had a high regard for scholarship and the intellectual life, so much so that the term also connotes the partners as white women of wealth and social class able to attend the few women's colleges of the day. In examining the memoirs of those involved in the Boston marriages during the Victorian period, it is clear that such relationships often involved a network of couples who were mutually supportive.

Some social historians and literary analysts argue that Boston marriages, as portrayed in autobiographical and fictional accounts, supplied a discourse contrary to that of an increasingly heteronormative nation. Instead of locating Boston marriages within a discourse that labeled them products of "inversion" and "arrested development," the popular psychological explanations of the time for both female and male homosexuality, this discourse emphasized the serious nature and longevity of Boston marriages and the integrity of the partners.

The commitment and longevity implied in Boston marriages has, for example, been contrasted to the fleeting boarding school "crush," known in its day as a "smash" or "rave." The traditionally romantic smash was said to be typical of young women schooled away from home, and the crush often focused on a teacher who was herself involved in a Boston marriage.

Brazilian Federation for the Advancement of Women

The Federação Brasileira para o Progresso Feminino (FBPF) (Brazilian Federation for the Advancement of Women) was a national organization that successfully fought for women's suffrage in Brazil. Due to FBPF efforts, a 1932 civil code extended the vote to women under the same conditions as men, making Brazil the fourth country in the Western Hemisphere to franchise women.

FBPF was founded in 1922 by Bertha Maria Julia Lutz, a biologist and the daughter of European-born parents in the medical profession. Inspired by the English suffrage movement while studying in Europe, Lutz returned to Brazil and founded the Ligação para o Emacipação Intelectual da Mulher (the Organization for the Intellectual Emancipation of Women), which emphasized scientific and rational study as key to women's liberation. In 1922, she served as Brazil's official delegate for the first Pan American Conference of Women, held in Baltimore under sponsorship of the National League of Women Voters. Upon returning to Brazil, Lutz transformed the Ligação into FBPF, which quickly became the largest women's organization in Brazil.

Although mainly founded and run by professional women, FBPF attracted members from various classes. FBPF leaders connected women's political rights with their economic independence, supporting issues such as living wages, equal pay for equal work, and paid maternity leave. However, leaders primarily focused organizational efforts on voting rights, actively challenging the idea that politics was a dishonorable realm for women. Drawing upon the country's desire to be a modern nation, FBPF publicized their voting efforts as within the national interest and drew upon personal political contacts to try to pass a bill for women's suffrage.

FBPF efforts were met with resistance until an economic slump divided the country's elites and led to the 1930 presidency of Getúlio Vargas through a nonviolent coup. Vowing to prevent another monopoly of power, Vargas began drafting a new electoral code. Sensing their opportunity, FBPF leaders stepped up their franchise efforts, and in 1932, a civil code extended the vote to women who were literate, the same requirement as men.

After female franchisement was written into the new Constitution of 1934, FBPF lost its main issue and began fragmenting. Many leaders focused on running female candidates for congressional elections, with Lutz serving in the Chamber of Deputies in 1936. The organization's efforts were shattered with Vargas's formation of the Estado Novo (New State) in 1937, a corporatist state that regarded women as wives and mothers rather than political allies. After the fall of the Estado Novo in 1945, women's right to vote remained intact, although women's roles in Brazil would not be significantly challenged until the new feminist movement of the late 1970s and 1980s.

Breastfeeding

For most of human history, feeding infants at the breast was a fact of life. Although cross-cultural feeding practices varied widely with regard to the timing of weaning and the extent and variety of supplementary foods, infants depended on breast milk (maternal or of a wet nurse) for survival in their first several months, and usually years, of life. With the introduction of safe breast milk alternatives (infant formula) in the 20th century, breastfeeding has become an option framed by access to resources; corporate interests; public policy; competing ideas about science, motherhood, and standards of infant care; and global inequalities. In the process, breastfeeding has also become a matter of political controversies, national and international public health campaigns that target worldwide declining breastfeeding rates, and grassroots activism. Focusing on breastfeeding in Western nations, this entry examines how the practice of breastfeeding is shaped at the intersection of historical-cultural norms and customs, economic disparities, and beliefs about gender, race, and science.

Breastfeeding as a Socially Constructed Practice

The World Health Organization (WHO) recommends that infants be exclusively breastfed without any supplementary foods (including breast milk alternatives) during their first 6 months, followed by a combination of breastfeeding and complementary foods (excluding breast milk alternatives) up to age 2. The recommendations of national medical associations, such as the American Academy of Pediatrics, and international breastfeeding advocacy organizations, such as the World Alliance for Breastfeeding Advocacy (WABA), echo these guidelines. Breastfeeding advocacy rests on the premises that the "breast is best" and that breastfeeding is natural. Social scientists demonstrate that far from being "natural," breastfeeding decisions, practices, and experiences are shaped by historical, cultural, and social norms and customs. These norms and customs govern feeding decisions for infants: breast milk or breast milk alternatives; who may feed the child at the breast, the mother, a paid wet nurse, or another mother involved in a network of mutual child care; where breastfeeding is to occur, in public, at the workplace, in the presence of family members, or in the privacy of one's home; how often breastfeeding should occur, according to a fixed schedule or "on demand," in response to infant cues; how long breastfeeding should last, through early infancy or well into toddlerhood; how breastfeeding is to be learned, within the mother's informal kin and social networks or through specialized professionals; and how breastfeeding is experienced, as pleasurable and empowering or as a burden.

Breastfeeding Trends

When breast milk alternatives were first introduced in the late 1800s, results were disastrous. High mortality and morbidity rates of infants whose diets were supplemented in the early weeks of life spurred breastfeeding campaigns in the United States and in Britain. These campaigns encouraged women to breastfeed longer and to avoid unsafe supplements and alternatives.

When safer alternatives became widely available in the 1920s, breastfeeding rates began to decline worldwide, and by the 1930s, infant feeding methods were viewed as a matter of choice in Western nations. Promoted as more convenient and later as more nutritious than human milk, formula was perceived as an equivalent alternative to breast milk, sometimes even touted as a superior alternative. As part of the process that brought reproduction and parenting under the purview of experts, infant feeding came under scrutiny in the 1950s. Rima Apple, in Mothers and Medicine, informs that during this period, American physicians and public health officials began to promote formula as the modern, responsible, scientific, and "American" method to feed one's child. Pam Carter makes a similar observation in the British context. Combined with practices that interfered with lactation mechanisms, such as maternal-infant separation in hospitals following childbirth and the promotion of strict infant feeding schedules (as opposed to breastfeeding infants on demand), many mothers were diagnosed with insufficient milk syndrome and subsequently advised to discontinue breastfeeding. Amidst this culture of scientific motherhood, a group of women in Chicago founded a breastfeeding advocacy and support organization in the 1950s, La Leche League.

By the early 1970s, breastfeeding initiation rates in the United States dropped to an all-time low of 25 percent, coinciding with the large-scale entry of mothers of young children into the workforce. Initially, breastfeeding rates declined most rapidly among privileged mothers, but by the 1970s, all demographic groups exhibited low breastfeeding rates. In a trend that continues into the 21st century, low-income, uneducated, and African American mothers exhibited the sharpest declines in breastfeeding rates, although interventions have partially reversed these trends.

Breastfeeding rates rebounded since the late 1970s, and by the early 2000s, 70 percent of mothers were initiating breastfeeding and about 35 percent of infants were receiving some breast milk at 6 months. Both rates are short of the goals of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and of the WHO.

However, breastfeeding has become stratified. Once associated with poor, immigrant, and unsophisticated mothers, breastfeeding has become a marker of privileged motherhood. In Western nations, higher breastfeeding rates are associated with class privilege: White, middle-class, educated, heterosexually partnered, and older mothers are more likely to initiate breastfeeding, continue breastfeeding beyond the first few days and upon return to paid employment, and breastfeed exclusively.

These disparities are a product of two intersecting processes. First, public policies that privatize child-rearing responsibilities offer little support to mothers whose short maternity leaves, inflexible schedules, and work environments interfere with breastfeeding routines and are inhospitable to establishing pumping as an alternative. Mothers who take longer maternity leaves, work part-time or on a flexible schedule, and pump their breasts regularly while separated from their infants are able to breastfeed their infants longer. Countries that offer more generous support to new mothers, such as New Zealand, Australia, and Canada, exhibit higher breastfeeding rates across the population and less significant racial and socioeconomic disparities.

These disparities are also a product of racialized and sexualized moralizing public discourses. Linda M. Blum found that the "breast is best" frame creates a standard of good mothering that faults mothers who are not able to comply with this standard or do not wish to comply with it. These mothers are usually poor, uneducated, and minority women. Blum adds that the "breast is best" frame itself is a construction.

The Benefits of Breastfeeding and Public Health Campaigns

Oblivious to breast milk and breastfeeding throughout much of the 20th century, in the mid-1970s, medical and nutrition scientists and practitioners began to investigate breast milk composition, lactation physiology, and the correlation between breast milk and a range of medical and psychological conditions and diseases, including ear infections, asthma, gastrointestinal ailments, diabetes, allergies, intelligence, obesity, autism, and infant death syndrome. The cumulative data suggest that breast milk has a positive effect on various health conditions. This evidence is captured by the now axiomatic notion that "the breast is best" for infants, mothers, families, populations, and the environment. On the heels of this evidence, and in an effort to increase breastfeeding initiation rates, extend the duration of breastfeeding across the population, and reduce instances of nonexclusive breastfeeding before 6 months (when breast milk is to be supplemented but not replaced by other foods), national and international medical associations and public health officials began to promote breastfeeding as the primary infant feeding method in the 1980s. These campaigns that frame breastfeeding as a rational and responsible parenting choice have been supported by grassroots anticorporate activists, advocates of natural parenting methods, and most recently, feminist "lactivists" (lactation activists).

Critics of the science of human lactation caution that the data are not unequivocal, especially with regard to the benefits of breastfeeding beyond the first few months and exclusive breastfeeding. Some scholars argue that when formula feeding is sanitary and breastfeeding rates mirror class disparities, these benefits may be the product of confounding socioeconomic effects. Some critics also caution that the extent, effects, and relative risks of breast milk contamination by infectious hazards such as the AIDS virus and hepatitis and environmental toxicants are little understood.

Critics further charge that contemporary breastfeeding campaigns that are framed by privatized risk, choice, and moralism are divorced from the cultural and institutional realities that structure breastfeeding in Western nations that offer little support to parents and sexualize women's breasts. These critics attribute the failures of these programs to achieve dramatic increases in breastfeeding rates to the fact that they do little to address these realities. Some breastfeeding advocates who find the science of human lactation convincing retort that breastfeeding activism can and should embrace the science of human lactation and address structural barriers to breastfeeding, thus transforming breastfeeding advocacy to a social movement.

The Medicalization and Commercialization of Breastfeeding

The science of human lactation also addresses the production and secretion of breast milk. Attempts to decode the complex physiology of lactation have yielded a barrage of advice to mothers about establishing and maintaining an adequate milk supply and delivering breast milk to their infants. Studies have identified nutrition, hydration, rest, emotional tranquility, and frequent breastfeeding as crucial for achieving and maintaining adequate milk supplies. These requirements shed further light on the socioeconomic disparities noted above and on the constructed nature of breastfeeding.

The commericalization of breastfeeding in Western nations, which has increasingly targeted white, middle-class women, and the increasingly scientific frame through which human reproduction is discussed and experienced have also given rise to a new type of medical professional: the lactation consultant. Initially trained informally by La Leche League, in the 1980s, lactation consultation became a formal, certified, and paid profession that operates within a clinical frame. While these professionals support mothers, their existence further places lactation and breastfeeding under the purview of medical experts.

Breastfeeding is also supported by a vast market of goods and services, including lactation classes and books, nursing clothes, bras, pillows, chairs, and breast pumps and related paraphernalia. Numerous Web sites also provide breastfeeding advice, support, and merchandise. Commercialization and medicalization further underscore that breastfeeding is a socially constructed practice.

Feminist Approaches to Breastfeeding and Lactation Activism

Feminists maintain a strained relationship with the practice of breastfeeding. Jacqueline Wolf notes that although feminists have been at the forefront of women's health reform, they have refrained from scrutinizing the medicalization and commercialization of infant feeding. Linda M. Blum attributes this reluctance to the fact that breastfeeding seems more optional than pregnancy and childbirth. Breast milk alternatives also symbolically sever the ties that bind mothers as primary caretakers, while breastfeeding defies the sensibilities of autonomy, independence, and equality of second-wave feminism.

More recently, some feminists have embraced breastfeeding as an empowering, countercultural, and anticorporate practice and as a women's rights issue. "Lactivists" join forces with the more politically conservative La Leche League to ensure women's right to breastfeed in public places, demand legal protections and workplace accommodations for nursing mothers, provide support and information, and portray breastfeeding as a pleasurable and self-affirming experience and a valid lifestyle choice.

Conclusion

Advocacy narratives, along with scientific, moralizing, and rationalizing discourses, shape cultural ideas about and individual experiences of breastfeeding. In Western nations, these ideas and experiences are shaped by the sexualization of the breast, consumerism, the privatization of child rearing, and the reliance on experts. Examination of these contexts suggests that breastfeeding is not a "natural" parenting or reproductive practice and that the claim that the "breast is best" is not an axiomatic premise.

Breast Implants

In 2006, 329,000 women underwent breast augmentation with either silicone or saline breast implants in the United States alone. In the same year, over 42,000 women underwent breast implant surgery after mastectomy in the United States. Despite considerable controversy surrounding the safety of breast implants, particularly silicone-gel-filled implants, breast augmentation is the most common cosmetic surgical procedure among women, increasing more than eightfold between 1992 and 2006. In 1992, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) restricted the use of silicone breast implants to mastectomy patients and a limited number of augmentation patients enrolled in clinical studies. Although the ban was lifted in 2006, women's health advocacy groups continue to raise questions about the safety of silicone implants. The silicone breast implant controversy has prompted debate among feminist scholars and advocates over issues of choice and informed consent, as well as socio-medico-legal disputes due to the different, often competing, evidentiary standards of safety and risk across scientific, legal, and lay communities.

Types of Breast Implants

Over the past 100 years, various materials have been implanted in patients seeking to augment their breast size and shape, including ivory, glass, rubber, sponges, paraffin, Teflon, and silicone. Most patients receiving breast implants fall into two groups: women seeking augmentation for cosmetic reasons and women seeking reconstruction following mastectomy. Other patients include girls or women with congenital "deformities" and patients seeking male-to-female gender reassignment surgery. Breast implants are soft sacs with a silicone shell, filled with either saline liquid or silicone gel, which are surgically implanted into the breast. Women undergoing breast reconstruction after mastectomy may choose among these manufactured implants or can use their own body tissue to reconstruct a breast via either TRAM flap or free flap methods. In the first technique, skin and fat from the lower abdomen is moved to the chest to create a breast shape. In the latter approach, abdominal tissue is surgically removed and then reattached via microsurgery to create a breast.

A Brief History of Silicone Breast Implants

The use of silicone to enlarge women's breast size originated in Japan, shortly after World War II, when Japanese prostitutes, seeking to meet American servicemen's reputed preference for larger breasts, used injections of liquid silicone (among other substances) to augment their breast size. Women who underwent silicone breast injections experienced serious complications, including scarring, infections, disfigurement, and migration of the injected silicone to other body parts. The first contemporary breast implant was created in 1961 by two plastic surgeons, Frank Gerow and Thomas Cronin, by encasing silicone gel inside a thin silicone envelope, thereby preventing migration and its associated problems. In 1962, Timmie Jean Lindsay became the first woman to receive a silicone-gel-filled implant. Silicone was already used in other medical devices without evidence of serious risks and thus was well received by plastic surgeons. The "Cronin Implant" was patented, albeit without formal clinical trials or safety testing, with rights assigned to the Dow Corning Corporation.

As silicone-filled implants gained popularity among women in the 1970s and 1980s as a way of augmenting breast size, they also came under increasing public scrutiny. In 1976, the Medical Device Amendment (MDA) to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act was passed, giving the FDA authority to regulate medical devices, including implants. Already on the market for 15 years, breast implants were "grandfathered" in under the amendment, such that manufacturers were not required to provide the FDA with scientific evidence of product safety and effectiveness, and the devices remained available to women without restriction. However, the 1980s and early 1990s were marked by increasing concern about potential health risks associated with silicone breast implants. Sidney Wolfe of the Public Citizen's Health Research Group began raising concerns about connections between breast implants and cancer risk and accused Dow Corning Corporation, a leading breast implant manufacturer, of withholding and suppressing information regarding potential leaks and ruptures of their implants. In December 1990, the news show Face to Face With Connie Chung aired a program about the possible dangers of silicone breast implants, and by June 1992, a total of 14,259 adverse reactions were reported to the FDA by breast implant recipients. Thousands of lawsuits were filed against Dow Corning, including one by Marcia Stern in 1984 and one by Mariann Hopkins in 1991, both of whom won claims that silicone breast implants cause systemic autoimmune disease. These lawsuits eventually resulted in a $4.3 billon global settlement against implant manufacturers to offer compensation to any woman with diseases or symptoms associated with breast implants. As a result of this settlement, Dow Corning Corporation filed bankruptcy in 1995.

Newer generations of implants were developed over the years to address problems with existing models, but these new designs were rarely subject to formal clinical testing and often created new problems for patients. For example, a polyurethane-foam-coated implant designed to reduce capsular contracture was introduced in the 1970s. It was later found to disintegrate, causing pain, fluid accumulation, and infection, and it was difficult to remove. An estimated 110,000 women received this type of implant before it was discontinued in 1991. More recently, the soy-bean-oil-filled Trilucent implant, marketed primarily in Europe as a safer, natural alternative to silicone, was removed from the market in 2000, when it was found to break down into genotoxic components. Women receiving this implant were advised to have it removed before childbearing and breastfeeding.

In January 1992, the FDA asked manufacturers and physicians to voluntarily halt the sale of silicone implants, following health and safety concerns including implant ruptures, breast pain, capsular contraction, suicide, and claims that implants were related to connective-tissue diseases, neurological diseases, and cancer. From April 1992 through November 2006, silicone-gel-filled implants were restricted to cancer patients seeking breast reconstruction, women with broken implants, and those participating in clinical trials through a "compassionate need" exemption policy. In 1997, Congress commissioned the Institute of Medicine (IOM) to carry out a comprehensive evaluation of studies examining associations of silicone breast implants with health conditions. The IOM's report, released in 1999, found no evidence that silicone breast implants contribute to an increase in cancer, autoimmune diseases, neurological diseases, or other systemic conditions.

The report also found no evidence of elevated silicone in breast milk and recommended that mothers with implants attempt breastfeeding if they are able to produce an adequate milk supply. Approximately two thirds of women were found to be very satisfied with their implants. Critics of the report argue that the studies included did not have adequate statistical power to draw meaningful conclusions about long-term safety and efficacy based on the lack of extended follow-up data and high drop-out rates in the extant studies. The IOM report highlighted extensive local complications and called for further studies of the physical and chemical characteristics of silicone breast implants, local complications, and impact on mammography screening and recommended accumulation of more data on the safety and efficacy of saline implants.

In November 2006, the FDA lifted its 14-year ban on silicone breast implants, approving their use for breast reconstruction and cosmetic breast augmentation among women over age 22.

Complications and Health Risks

Although the IOM report found no definitive evidence that silicone breast implants are associated with serious disease, a large number of women experience significant complications and side effects. The most common complications include breast pain, changes in or loss of nipple sensation, rupture, migration of silicone gel, and capsular contracture, a hardening of the area around the implant caused when scar tissue tightens and squeezes the implant. Whereas saline implants deflate when ruptured, silicone-gel-filled implant ruptures may go unnoticed. Studies indicate considerable variability in the frequency of rupture in gel-filled implants, ranging from 0.3 to 77 percent, depending on type and model of the implant, groups of women studied, and length of implantation, among other factors. Ruptures may be caused by capsular contracture, compression during mammography screening, and aging, among other factors.

The FDA now recommends that patients undergo an MRI within 3 years of implant surgery and every 2 years thereafter to identify possible ruptures in silicone-gel-filled implants. Rates of reoperations (including removal) due to complications are quite high, with studies finding that approximately 24 percent of women experience complications resulting in reoperation within 5 years of their initial implant surgeries and that reconstruction patients have higher rates of reoperation than do augmentation patients. The FDA warns women that breast implants do not last forever and that the rates of complications increase with subsequent surgeries. In addition, implants may affect a woman's ability to breastfeed, either by reducing or eliminating milk production. More research is needed to determine whether implants may also interfere with mammography screening.

Feminist Debates and Socio-Medico-Legal Concerns

The regulation of silicone breast implants has been a contested issue among feminist scholars, women's health advocates, and bioethicists. Among the most debated are concerns about choice and informed consent. Scholars such as Kathy Davis have argued that the decision to undergo breast augmentation (or other cosmetic procedures) can be a reasonable and reasoned choice for a woman in some circumstances.

Others have questioned the possibility of choice in a culture where "perfect" breasts (i.e., round, large, "perky") are normalized and fetishized, encouraging women, especially small-breasted women, to view their natural breasts as inadequate or defective.

Informed-consent procedures are designed to allow patients to weigh the risk and benefits of a procedure and make health care decisions that are consistent with their own values and preferences. An editorial published in the Journal of the American Medical Women's Association argues that in the case of breast augmentation, informed consent does not adequately protect patients. The authors contend that the powerful influence of cosmetic surgery advertisements, which promise results without mention of adverse outcomes, combined with physician's conflict of interest in presenting risks and benefits of a procedure they are essentially "selling" to their patients, undermine informed consent.

In contrast, bioethicist Lisa Parker has contended that overly restricting and regulating access to breast implants demeans women by suggesting that they are incapable of making decisions in their own interest. Parker described the policy that limited access to silicone implants to reconstruction patients as paternalistic, deciding "for their own good" which women really need implants, thereby undermining women's autonomy, ability to exercise control over their own bodies, and capacity to make their own risk-benefit analysis that is consonant with their values, preferences, and subjective experience of their bodies. Her argument is supported by data suggesting that although the IOM report put to rest many of the concerns regarding breast implants, long-term studies of safety and efficacy are still needed. Debates regarding informed consent, both within and beyond the feminist community, will likely evolve as data regarding risk and benefits emerge.

BRIDAL INDUSTRY

The bridal industry is economically and culturally powerful, as it is a wide-ranging, multibillion-dollar-a-year industry that supports one of the most salient rites of passage. In so doing, it is connected with gendered divisions of labor and gendered family arrangements, while it also serves to sustain cultural ideas supporting these phenomena. The bridal industry is composed of some businesses that cater exclusively to customers planning weddings and many businesses that plan weddings in addition to other events/purposes.

The former category includes bridal consultants (wedding planners), wedding chapels, bridal salons, bridal magazines, advice books, and bridal Web sites and others that provide more specific services and products directed at brides. While other businesses specialize in weddings, their services can be applied more broadly. These include photographers/videographers; florists; clothing designers, manufacturers, and retailers (for bridal gowns, tuxedos, and attire for attendants and family members); beauticians and beauty suppliers; caterers; ceremony, reception, and prewedding party venues; jewelers; musicians and disk jockeys; religious and secular officiants; travel agencies; rental suppliers; paper/invitation suppliers; and various businesses that offer favors for ceremony guests and gifts for attendants.

Bridal consultants are independent professionals who attend to every detail of planning the event, coordinating the services of other vendors from the time of engagement to the honeymoon. The Association of Bridal Consultants is the professional organization for the wedding industry. Started in 1981, it is an international association with several thousand members and offers seminars, conferences, and training materials in addition to local networks. Association membership requirements include successful completion of their professional development program, coursework, and apprentice experience. Bridal professionals may also have taken other independent coursework and be members of event-planning organizations that do not specialize in weddings. These associations are important as networking resources for bridal professionals; referrals are vital in this industry because there is relatively little repeat business.

Because many of the businesses that are part of the bridal industry do not exist exclusively within this realm, it is difficult to estimate its size. Industry associations and census data suggest more than 2.2 million couples wed each year and spend an average of $20,000 to $30,000 on their ceremonies and receptions. This figure, approaching 50 percent of the annual household income of newly married couples, includes an average of $1,000 for a cake and $2,000 each for attire, flowers, photography, and jewelry. The industry is also supported by guests who purchase gifts for the couple and the common practice (99 percent of couples) of taking a honeymoon after the ceremony. These two practices, respectively, contribute an additional $19 billion and $8 billion dollars annually. Although there are significant regional differences in the cost of items and services, these figures combine to create a $70 to $80 billion per year industry.

Recently, several additions to the bridal industry have begun to change its landscape. Lower-end bridal shops, such as the national chain David's Bridal, offer bridal gowns, bridesmaids' dresses, accessories, and tuxedo rental for far lower prices than traditional salons. Another example is the destination wedding, popularized by couples looking for an alternative to the traditional ceremony. All-in-one packages to vacation destinations offered by travel agencies and resorts include an officiant, minimal accessories, and group discounts for wedding guests. Alternatively, in the context of a rising divorce rate and sensational popular press stories of jilted brides and grooms, the industry also offers wedding and divorce insurance.

Perhaps the most notable change to the bridal industry in recent years is the rise of online planning resources, including TheKnot.com and TheWeddingChannel.com. TheKnot.com boasts 3.2 million unique visitors to its site each month, with 3,000 new members every day. It features a wide array of planning resources, virtual shopping, local vendor information, message boards, an online television channel, and wedding registries. These are in addition to its popular personalized Web pages, where couples provide details of their ceremonies for their guests. Internet resources such as these serve to consolidate bridal resources and the industry, making it easier for planners to find the information they are looking for without having to contact and pay for a professional.

Gender, the Bridal Industry, and Wedding Planning

The bridal industry can be said to be gendered in several ways: Most bridal consultants are women, the industry caters to women, and some of the work required by the profession is of a traditionally feminine nature. Weddings are referred to as the "bride's day," as the woman is the one primarily responsible for planning the event (like many other consumer rituals). The bridal industry, as the name suggests, caters to women in this role. Brides spend more time doing more legwork than do grooms, often beginning a year in advance of the wedding date. Women usually investigate possible vendors and venues, call to inquire about availability, and visit the sites before making decisions about the event. They also take action to care for family members and guests during planning and the days surrounding the event. This work is easily overlooked and underappreciated, similar to other women's labor, such as housework. Men's role in planning is often one of decision making, in which they contribute to or veto the final decisions presented by the bride. When men do participate in planning, their involvement is often overestimated, which might be expected when compared with the hypothetical uninterested and uninvolved groom. Nevertheless, this pattern persists even as couples are more likely than in the past to emphasize equality in their relationships.

Finally, the bridal industry is gendered because of the work required. In addition to organizing, negotiating logistics, and decorating (a broad category that includes many feminine tasks), bridal professionals have to do "emotion work" with their clients. This refers to actions that one takes to maintain appropriate emotions. The importance of emotion work in this case is heightened by the aura of love and romance surrounding the products and services. Brides and their families are invested in the emotions surrounding the event, and establishing a relationship that acknowledges this helps the professional best serve clients. At the same time, professionals often have to mediate between the bride and groom, or the bride and her family or other guests, and must also deal with brides who might be difficult to work with in what can be very stressful situations. It can be a challenge to manage these negative emotions without threatening the romantic and loving emotional overtone of the event.

The Bridal Industry as a Carrier of Culture

Most bridal industry clients are unfamiliar with their role—they do not understand what is expected of them, what options they have, or what their preferences are. Because of this, bridal professionals have great influence over definitions of the situation and their clients. Part of the professional role is to make sure brides understand the wedding ritual: why certain products are necessary, how to use them appropriately, and how to play the bridal role. This serves both the client and the professional, as brides desire this information so that they meet social expectations, and having brides who perform appropriately makes the work of the professional easier. It also serves to maintain wedding culture, as it is passed verbally, through products and encouragement to include rituals in the ceremony that highlight the products.

Conveying bridal ideals reinforces images of romance and childhood feminine dreams of a "fairy-tale wedding." Chrys Ingraham argues that the focus on romance in the bridal industry perpetuates normative heterosexuality. In supporting traditional marriage rituals, the bridal industry prepares people, namely women, for their roles in heterosexual nuclear family relationships. Thus, it has an important role in creating and sustaining the conventional family form. Moreover, the feminine images of romance associated with the transition are widespread in popular culture. Desire for the lavish wedding is evident in the scope of the industry and the fact that it is replicated, to varying degrees, among all classes.

The industry also affects a bride's sense of self, as women undergo an identity transformation when learning the bridal role. The experience of shopping for the bridal gown exemplifies how an item used in the ceremony aids the woman as she takes the role of bride in this rite of passage. Through choosing "the" perfect gown, learning about its features, and how to wear it, the woman begins to identify with her new role and becomes comfortable in it. Each step is aided by bridal professionals, who explain the importance of the gown, imbue it with magical qualities, and teach the woman how to carry herself in it.

Bridal professionals who are involved during the event also maintain wedding culture. Photographers, for instance, often dictate behavior of the wedding party and guests to achieve a desired image. The result, very similar images for most couples, reinforces notions of what a wedding "should" be like. Ironically, images captured in this way might be even more "ideal" than the event was, because it was staged as such.

While it often serves to uphold traditions, the bridal industry also has the power to change them. Industry constituents can devise new "traditions" in order to sell more products, as evidenced in the invention of the diamond engagement ring and the double-ring ceremony. They also have proliferated some conventions due to popular opinion about them, as was the case when the white gown was preferred by women after it was worn by Queen Victoria. Or etiquette can be rewritten in bridal books and magazines to accommodate concerns for efficiency, such as allowing the bride and groom to see each other before the ceremony so that pictures can be taken without guests having to wait. Each of these is common in contemporary weddings, though they were not two centuries ago.

Conclusion

The bridal industry is of interest to scholars of gender and society because it caters to women and supports and provides for marriage celebrations. Not only are these celebrations of a particular family form (legally sanctioned heterosexuality) with implications for gender roles, but many rituals within weddings are gendered, and the work of wedding planning is feminine and done almost entirely by women.

Buffy the Vampire Slayer

Buffy the Vampire Slayer (BtVS) refers to a 1992 film and also to a television show that ran from March 10, 1997, to May 20, 2003. Creator Joss Whedon sought to create a hero(ine) who subverted gendered expectations. He is often quoted for his aim to have "the blond girl in the dark alley" turn out to be a fighter and hero rather than victim. Although the show was deliberately titled to seem silly and easy to dismiss, it drew a diverse array of devoted fans, including numerous academics who have built up what is now referred to as "Buffy Studies."

Details of the Show

The 1992 movie, starring Kristy Swanson, was alternately criticized and appreciated for its "B-movie" status. Though dismissed by Whedon and many fans of the television show as less exceptional than the series, it set the stage: A blond high school cheerleader in Los Angeles discovers that she is "the Chosen One," The Vampire Slayer. Under the tutelage of her Watcher, an older man qualified to train her in her slayer duties, she first resists, but eventually accepts her duty, learning to recognize and slay vampires, simultaneously alienating her popular friends, and eventually bringing the fight to a high school dance. Along the way, Merrick, her first Watcher, dies.

When the television series begins, Buffy Summers (played by Sarah Michelle Gellar) and her newly divorced mother have relocated to fictional Sunnydale, California, north of Los Angeles. Having been kicked out of school for burning down the gymnasium (the story was changed slightly from the film), Buffy is hoping to leave her slaying behind and return to a "normal" life. However, she discovers in the first episode that Sunnydale is actually situated on a Hellmouth, where demonic energy is high and regularly interferes with the everyday lives of its inhabitants. Aided by her new Watcher, Rupert Giles, and a mysterious stranger named Angel, she is reabsorbed into her slayer life, particularly when her potential friends Willow and Xander become endangered. As the season unfolds, Buffy again finds herself labeled a "freak" by the popular students, but this time she has her band of outsiders, the self-proclaimed "Scoobies" (referring to the animated television show, Scooby-Doo), including Giles, Willow, and Xander.

In establishing this group, a supportive community that aids her calling, Buffy breaks from the traditions of both the slayer and the cinematic lone hero. As we later learn from slayers Kendra and Faith, the slayer is expected to fight alone. Buffy is at first still a young girl under the direction of the patriarchal Watcher's Council; they expect her to die young but maintain the line. She resists the council and succeeds where previous slayers failed. BtVS challenges hero genre conventions through similar means, using her nontraditional, communitarian methods. Over the course of seven seasons (144 episodes), Buffy graduates from high school; goes to college; loses her mother to a natural death; acquires a younger sister, Dawn, via mystical means; and saves the world many times.

Buffy has a series of genre-busting relationships, defying the usual depiction of teenage girls as romantic, mature, and/or purely sexual. Her first and perhaps most significant relationship is with Angel, the 240-year-old "vampire with a soul." Theirs is the storybook, star-crossed romance: He may keep his soul unless he experiences one moment where he ceases to be plagued by the horrible acts he committed as the soul-less Angelus. In Season 2, after he and Buffy consummate their relationship, his soul is mystically torn from his body, setting the stage for a demonically dramatized version of the "boyfriend-turned-jerk-after-sex." He wreaks havoc before getting his soul back, 1 minute too late, forcing Buffy to slay him in order to save the world. Thus, their relationship is typical of the hero romances, where they often must sacrifice love for duty and the safety of those around them. Throughout her adventures, Buffy breaks with hero genre traditions by relying on the Scoobies, a cast of additional members, and eventually an entire "army" of slayers. This hero is not alone, and this is where her greatest strength lies—even saving her from death and keeping her committed as the slayer.

"Buffy Studies"

Academics weigh in with a variety of perspectives on how progressive or complicit BtVS is in relation to feminism and patriarchy. One view is that it pushes the boundaries in some ways but as popular culture it also necessarily exists within these boundaries. Thus, the show is sometimes disappointing in its maintenance of the status quo. The very premise of the show is defined by Whedon as feminist—as a subversion of our expectations of victimhood. When Buffy has sexual relations, the traditional consequences are problematized, and she ultimately is "allowed" a range of sexual behavior. Willow eventually comes out as a lesbian and enjoys some of the more explicit representations of queer sexuality portrayed network television (though her first female partner, Tara, is killed in Season 6, following a long cinematic tradition of gay romance being doomed or tragic). With important female characters (Willow and Faith), the show depicts women "behaving badly," but they are ultimately redeemed. Furthermore, through the male characters—Giles, Xander, Angel, and Spike—the show presents a complex masculinity, problematizing traditional "masculine" behavior and attitudes (the eventual spin-off, Angel, continued to explore this theme).

BtVS nonetheless often caters to traditional ideals of femininity, even with its lesbian characters. The show has been heavily criticized for its limited inclusion of people of color and the almost inevitable deaths of those who do appear. Although it is not a perfect show, BtVS presents more challenging and complex portrayals of gender and sexuality than had previously been evident on network television.

BUTCH/FEMME

Sex and love between masculine and feminine women has occurred for centuries. It was not until the 1950s and 1960s, however, that the term butch/femme was popularized among lesbians as a way to describe such relationships. During this period, butch/femme not only described masculine/feminine lesbian couples but also commonly referred to some lesbians' choices to adopt traditional masculine or feminine gender roles, including clothing styles, romantic and sexual scripts, and a gendered division of labor (e.g., mowing the lawn versus washing the dishes). Though some still adhere to these roles, conceptualizations of butch/femme have evolved and expanded in the last 50 years, especially in relation to feminist, queer, and transgender political developments. For some lesbians, butch and femme are no longer useful categories; for others, they are simply aesthetic distinctions that are unrelated to one another or to traditional gender roles. And some have suggested that at the political level, the "butch/femme dynamic" represents a campy critique and reworking of heterosexual masculinity and femininity. Though the concept of butch/femme is still widely observed among lesbians, its meaning has become increasingly complex and contested since its emergence.

It is important to note that lesbians are not the only group to take up the concept of butch/femme. Some gay men use the term butch to describe masculine men; however, gay men have not drawn upon the term femme, or the notion of butch/femme relationships, to nearly the same extent as has occurred within lesbian subculture.

History of Butch/Femme

Over the past several decades, butch/femme has fallen in and out of favor in response to sociopolitical currents affecting lesbian communities. In the 1950s, butch/femme was popular among lesbians, especially among lesbians of color and working-class lesbians, for whom gay bars and clubs were an important site for "coming out" and establishing social ties. Just as the performance of gender roles has been a defining feature of heterosexual courtship and public culture, butch/femme roles offered lesbians a system of social organization and a means of public recognition. Butch/femme subculture included clear "rules" about how to dress, behave, speak, and have sex in ways appropriate for either butches or femmes. Some lesbian bars went so far as to reinforce the butch/femme binary by designating different restrooms for butches and femmes. Many lesbians enjoyed what they understood to be a unique and playful gender dynamic between butches and femmes in the 1950s; however, others felt pressured to conform to butch/femme subculture even when they found these roles ill-fitting and uncomfortably similar to heterosexual gender roles. Yet the rejection of butch/femme was a privilege often available only to upper-middle-class lesbians who found the butch aesthetic "mannish" and unattractive, opting instead for a "classic" or "elegant" androgyny that had broader appeal in mainstream culture.

In the 1970s, at the height of the second-wave feminist movement, greater numbers of lesbians began to reject butch/femme on the grounds that it was modeled after heterosexuality. Lesbian feminists embraced a more androgynous and ostensibly "natural" aesthetic and advocated for the importance of being "woman identified" and creating "women-only" space. Though this trend infused lesbian subculture with vital feminist politics, it also alienated many butches and femmes who saw both personal and political value in challenging essentialist notions of womanhood and in bending gender and sexual rules. As a result, at the same time that a widespread backlash against the feminist movement occurred in the broader culture in the 1980s, lesbians also reacted against the rigidity of lesbian feminism. The 1980s and 1990s were witness to the emergence of lesbian S/M (sadomasochism) groups, the rise of a new and "raunchy" lesbian sex radicalism (characterized by the lesbian sex magazine On Our Backs), growing public interest in "lipstick lesbianism," and the revitalization of butch/femme.

Many of the early conflicts over butch/femme—including socioeconomic class and age divisions, feminist debates regarding sex and gender, differing opinions about whether butch/femme is heterosexist or uniquely lesbian—have continued into the present. However, these conflicts have also taken on new form in response to the development of queer and transgender politics in the 1990s and 2000s. By emphasizing the social construction of gender and sexuality, the queer movement promoted the idea that no particular gender expression (either femininity, masculinity, or androgyny) is more natural or liberated than another. Building upon this logic, many transgender and genderqueer activists in the 2000s advocated for people's rights to change their genders, embody multiple genders, or live "in between" genders.

On one hand, these developments gave new legitimacy to butch and femme as simply two of the options in a rich and multiplying menu of genders and sexualities. On the other hand, in some circles, the visibility of transgender politics also rendered butch/femme—and even lesbian identity itself—seemingly outmoded and conventional. In recent years, many previously butch-identified lesbians have "come out" as transgendered men, while others have defended butch femaleness as an important, albeit "endangered," identity option. In the midst of these debates about butch and transgender masculinity, femme identity and experience has taken a backstage role. Yet, as the last 60 years suggest, it is likely that debates over masculinity and femininity with lesbian subculture will continue to evolve, producing more gender and sexual identity options.

Butch/Femme Subculture

Remarkably little has been written about butch/femme, though a handful of classic texts provide a foundation for understanding the meaning and diversity of butch and femme subcultures. For instance,

Leslie Feinberg's 1993 novel Stone Butch Blues traces the life of a white, working-class butch lesbian and is one of the most well-known works of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) fiction. The novel helped to depathologize butch sexuality by pointing to the sexist underpinnings of 1950s culture and its discomfort with masculine and sexually aggressive women, including "stone butches," or butch lesbians who refuse sexual penetration. Numerous accounts of discrimination against butch lesbians illustrate the ways in which masculine women pose challenges to the binary gender system, as well as to men's ownership of masculinity and the norms regulating women's behavior. For example, as a result of the expectation that all women should appear feminine, butch lesbians are frequently perceived as men and therefore harassed while attempting to use women's bathrooms.

Academic writing on female masculinity also has pointed to the diverse and multiple ways that women, particularly lesbians, produce masculinity. While the terms stone butch or butch dyke have currency within white lesbian subculture, lesbians of color have used other terms, such as aggressive or macha, to describe masculine women. The visual cues that signify masculinity or femininity, such as hair length and style of dress, also vary across socioeconomic and racial/ethnic groups, as well as across time and place. In the 1998 book Female Masculinity, queer theorist Judith Halberstam cataloged different butch "types" that fall within a continuum of female masculinity. Rather than viewing "butch" as one of two relatively narrow options available only to lesbians, recent queer theorizing suggests that butchness—or female masculinity more broadly—has a significant presence in the lives of all women, even if only as a symbol of what women are taught to avoid (by shaving, having long hair, etc.).

Femme lesbians face a different set of gender-related challenges than those encountered by butches. Femmes are frequently presumed to be heterosexual (by both LGBT and straight people alike) and are subjected to the stereotype that they are less radical or transgressive than butch lesbians or are attempting to disguise their lesbianism by "passing" as straight. As a result, influential anthologies on femme identity, such as the 1997 book Femme and the 2002 book Brazen Femme, have placed particular emphasis on the contributions femmes have made to queer and feminist politics. While heterosexual women often view their femininity as a "natural" consequence of being female, many femmes assert that they are feminine by "choice" or by social construction. By embracing racial diversity, fat bodies, punk styles, sex work, S/M, disability, and aging, many femme activists have defied the rules associated with traditional femininity.

In addition, femmes have actively resisted sexist currents within butch/femme culture itself, including the ways in which femmes have been called upon to affirm the masculinity of butches by amplifying their feminine appearance or embodying idealized feminine archetypes (e.g., the maternal caretaker, the seductress, etc.). While femininity carries many privileges in the broader culture, it is often assigned less overall social value than masculinity—a disparity that is present within butch/femme culture as well. For instance, in response to the explosion of books, films, performances, and clubs focused on female masculinity in the late 1990s and 2000s, femme activists in the mid-2000s began to organize conferences and other events designed to explore the previously unexamined theoretical and political implications of "queering femininity."

Conclusion

Although early butch/femme may have manifested as a fairly rigid and interdependent system of masculine and feminine gender roles, butch and femme identities—and their relationship to one another—are continually evolving in response to changes in the political environment and internal challenges to lesbian culture. As gender theorist and activist Kate Bornstein has argued, butch and femme can be reconceptualized as more than a reference to lesbian "role-play"; they can also be used to symbolize a continuum of gender identity options available to all women and men.

CALL OFF YOUR OLD TIRED ETHICS (COYOTE)

Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics (COYOTE) is a prostitutes' rights organization founded in 1973 by ex-prostitute Margo St. James. During the early 1970s, second-wave feminism was a strong movement in the United States, but no organization dedicated itself solely to prostitutes' issues. Indeed, feminists were increasingly divided over matters of sex and sexuality. Some feminists were uncomfortable with lesbians (the so-called lavender menace), and others believed that pornography, prostitution, and indeed any sex with men perpetuated women's sexual subordination. Sex-positive feminists advocated women's choice in sexual partners, believing that all women deserved free access to sexual pleasure with whomever, whenever they desired. They further believed that consenting adults should be free to exchange sex for money. Sex-positive feminists worked against negative perceptions of prostitution, referring to it instead as "sex work" and to its practitioners as "sex workers," and advocating for decriminalization and even regulation of the sex trade.

As part of this shift in thinking about sex work, organizations such as COYOTE formed to advocate for prostitutes' rights and to give voice to the prostitute's point of view. From its founding, COYOTE has worked to repeal prostitution laws and to end the stigma associated with sex work. COYOTE calls for complete abolition of laws against sex workers of all genders and persuasions, including strippers, phone sex operators, prostitutes, and porn actresses. They advocate abolishing laws against pimps and panderers but argue that the state must regulate the prostitute-pimp relationship as it does any other contractual labor agreement. Prostitutes' rights advocates clearly distinguish between voluntary and forced prostitution, and they adamantly decry the use of children or unwilling individuals in sex work. However, they argue, adult women who choose to sell sex for money should be accorded the same rights as other service workers, including health and safety regulations and the right to organize. COYOTE believes that mandatory health checkups are a violation of prostitutes' rights but also urges local, state, and federal governments to provide prostitutes free or inexpensive access to health care and insurance.

Some cities have had very active chapters of COYOTE, especially San Francisco, where the organization was founded, and Atlanta. But many chapters folded within a couple years of their establishment when founding members, usually one or two outspoken prostitutes or ex-prostitutes, turned to other work or another cause. Lack of consistent and substantial funding for the work blocked prostitutes' rights organizations from either longevity or success, as did the danger inherent in coming out in public as a prostitute. Also problematic in prostitutes' rights groups has been the ongoing hierarchy among supporters and founding members, who are often educated and/or come from the upper echelon of sex workers. This stratification has decreased organizers' abilities to communicate with prostitutes of lower status.

COYOTE published a newsletter from 1974 to 1979. The Hooker's Ball became a popular event, attracting as many as 20,000 people in 1978. By the mid-1980s, COYOTE had hosted a hooker's convention and drafted a bill of rights. This statement underpinned the International Committee for Prostitutes' Rights, which St. James and Gail Peterson founded in 1985, and served as a model for the World Whores' Charter. Despite the strong conservative turn in both mainstream and feminist politics since the 1990s, COYOTE has found many supporters around the world.

CAMP

Camp refers to styles, attitudes, and behaviors that are exaggerated, overstated, and ironic. Originally used in relation to the behavior of homosexual men, the term now refers to self-conscious acts of subversion and parody in the context of society's gender norms. The significance of camp to the study of gender surrounds the ways in which it can undermine social structures of domination and power. Camp performances in social spaces can often destabilize norms and beliefs surrounding the regulations that govern masculinity and femininity. To the extent that they have increasingly been associated with acts and performances that have questioned the sociocultural constructions of sexuality and gender, camp constitutes both a personal and political act. Explanations of the key definitions and contexts of camp draw on theories and illustrations to show how its complexities point to the social and political dimensions in which gender and sexuality are performed.

Disco; art nouveau; television shows Dynasty (U.S.), Prisoner Cell Block H (Australia), and The Avengers (U.K.); dramatist Oscar Wilde; the films of John Waters and Hollywood musicals of the 1930s; singers Diana Ross and Barry Manilow; entertainers Divine, Bette Midler, Grace Jones, and Barbra Streisand; actors Dirk Bogard, Mae West, and Judy Garland; the work of Andy Warhol and David Hockney; and productions such as The Rocky Horror Picture Show and the music and lyrics of Cole Porter all share one thing in common: They have all been defined or discussed in relation to camp style and aesthetics.

First cited in the Oxford English Dictionary in 1909, the term camp refers to behavior thought to be characteristic of male homosexuals. From the early 20th century, words such as affected, inauthentic, exaggerated, ostentatious, and theatrical have also been used to define camp, meaning that homosexuality is not the only context in which the word is used. Throughout the 20th century, camp has taken its many meanings from both high and popular culture. Historically, one aspect of camp is its relation to gender and sexuality via drag, in which male impersonators of women exaggerate the culture's construction of female behavior. In addition, the cultural domains of ballet, opera, and literature, on one hand, and those of soap opera, drag shows, and film melodramas, on the other, have all contributed to the ways in which camp has been articulated and defined.

At once a performance and a style, a way of acting and a mode of seeing, camp continues to inflect how culture is both produced and consumed today, though taking its meanings from the cultural contingencies and conditions that have shaped gender behavior in different historical periods. In the 1890s, for example, Oscar Wilde's inflection of camp, in his plays and his own life, was performed during a period in which certain gender behavior was considered unacceptable. Conversely, the camp style associated with the life and work of dramatist Joe Orton was self-consciously enacted in the 1960s to provoke moral outrage and unease.

These aforementioned listings are not intended as a definitive chronicle of camp genres or people. Rather, the list reflects the uneven and disparate features associated with camp stylizations. Camp does not privilege one style over another so much as it enables a multiplicity of unrelated aesthetic forms to intervene in and subvert the dominant culture. Today, the popular band The Scissor Sisters, for example, is self-consciously camp in ways that previous musical figures were not. Their work assimilates yet at the same time mocks earlier moments of popular camp seen in the performances of Elton John and David Bowie in the 1970s.

Drawing on Susan Sontag's seminal essay of 1964, camp can also be defined as a specific mode of aestheticism as well as a way of perceiving the world in aesthetic terms. There is no one object, performance, or style that is essentially camp; it is more concerned with moments of stylization and excess and a way of reconfiguring the meanings attached to genre or performance, one that relishes irony, parody, and satire. In that sense, camp is almost always intentional, premeditated, and deliberately overstated, and the trappings of style are additionally marked by exaggeration, artifice, and outrageousness. Since Sontag's essay, camp has been cited as a manner of stylization and, more recently in light of Judith Butler's work (1990), as a mode of performance.

Camp, then, refers to a specific if rather diffuse aesthetic. It can be used to refer to a way of looking as well as performing or to an aspect of a subject's personality. Making the camp aspects of marginal subjectivities visible to the wider society has also been one way in which those excluded from the mainstream have been able to give voice to forms of oppression and marginalization. Camp aesthetics rely on the existence of, yet subsequent challenge to, the cultural mainstream. As a consequence, a camp aesthetic is intentionally short-lived, coming to an end once it has exposed the socially contrived status of that which appears normal. Camp exposes the seams and fissures of a culture that attempts to conceal its very own lack of authenticity. Camp style thus affords excluded subjects a space and voice in which to act and speak. The Stonewall riots of 1969, for instance, illustrate the extent to which butch women, effeminate men, and transgendered people used camp as a political intervention to confront a culture that refused to recognize its own prejudices surrounding gender, sexuality, and civil rights.

The Stonewall riots make clear that camp, while it refers to styles and codes, is also associated with moments of social displacement. Camp performances, through dress, mannerism, or comportment, are connected to the construction of a sensibility that, while it appropriates mainstream styles and identities, nonetheless seeks to dislocate these identities and expose their very own constructed, unnatural status.

In the instances outlined so far, it can be seen that camp style is both attitudinal and relational, pointing to those social contexts and intersubjective moments when the cultural norms that serve to structure and determine gender behavior are self-consciously resisted. Such resistance does not take place through direct political engagement or along party-political alliances, but via the appurtenances of style, manner, and modes of bodily performance.

Cultural theory of the last 20 years observes how camp invades and subverts other sensibilities, working through pastiche, parody, and exaggeration. While some have suggested that camp typifies a male homosexual ontology, recent work in queer theory concludes that camp extends far beyond the remit of some imagined gay sensibility. Judith Butler has suggested that all gender behavior is constructed in relation to a copy for which there is no original. Thus, gay or straight men who define themselves in relation to hypermacho, straight-acting, metrosexual paradigms are as camp as gay men who self-consciously copy femininity and lesbians who enact masculinity. Judith Halberstam's work, for instance, has shown how not all drag is a parody of women and not all drag is necessarily undertaken in camp ways or with the aim of undermining heteronormativity. Camp, therefore, is paradoxically serious and playful, vulgar and refined, silent and outspoken, and always in the shadow of a melancholic search for the lost subject to take the place of the other object.

Camp is a behavioral and textual response, then, to a set of circumstances in which some groups—originally homosexual men—faced hostility. Camp in this mode is attitudinal, a reaction that is attentive to cultural convention but seeks to be free of its restrictions. Yet camp has to do with the style that governs the specific response. The stress on style is one that also has the effect of undermining essence. Parody and mimicry operate to challenge that which is constructed as original and thus authentic. In particular, as Butler has shown, drag and cross-dressing have served to question forms of heterosexual essentialism. Camp style appropriates the imagined essence (of heterosexuality or femininity, for example) and performs it to excess.

While camp aesthetics are undoubtedly associated with transgressive or subversive acts, there are no guarantees that they will always be used in ways that challenge gender and sexual norms. For instance, the transgression of the norm actually requires the norm. In addition, the transgression of one norm makes way for the construction of new ones. Camp aesthetics on their own, therefore, can only ever be one element in a much wider gender politics, one that is attentive to the economic and social conditions in which gender is constructed. However, there is little doubt that camp aesthetics have proved a valuable resource that has enabled many marginal groups to find a stage on which to exercise agency and a voice that can be heard.

Cancer

Cancer is the second-leading cause of death among both men and women in the United States. It is estimated that over 1.4 million U.S. men and women are diagnosed with cancer and over 550,000 die from it annually since 2000. According to the American Cancer Society, over 10.7 million Americans are currently living with or have survived cancer, and cancer survivorship continues to increase. While the term cancer describes a biomedical disease process—namely, the uncontrolled growth and spread of abnormal cells—it also conjures a set of social and culturally embedded meanings. Like all illnesses, cancer emerges within a larger social and cultural milieu, and its meanings are culture bound. A great deal has been written about the meanings and metaphors ascribed to cancer in Western culture, including ways cancer has been construed as a "gendered" illness. Throughout much of history, cancer was associated with women and the female body. While biomedical advances since the 19th century have challenged this association in the public imagination—overall, men are actually more likely to both develop and to die from cancer—gender continues to be an important lens through which cancer is understood and treated. We review how gender (among other cultural factors) shapes lay and professional understandings of cancer and, in turn, affects cancer risk and prevention, detection, treatment, and psychological adjustment among affected individuals.

Gender and Ethnicity in Cancer Incidence and Mortality

Although cancer is a leading cause of death and disability for both men and women, important gender differences exist. Whereas women are more likely than men to develop cancer younger (before age 60), men are overall more likely to develop and die from cancer over the course of their lifetimes. In the United States, men have approximately a 1 in 2 lifetime risk of developing cancer; for women, the risk is 1 in 3. Overall, African Americans are more likely to develop and die from cancer than any other U.S. racial/ethnic group. Across ethnic groups, prostate, lung, and colorectal cancers are the most prevalent cancers among men. Breast, lung, and colorectal cancers are most prevalent among women. Lung cancer is the leading cause of death for both genders, followed by colorectal and prostate cancer among men and breast and colorectal cancer among women. Specific ethnic groups are at higher risk for certain cancers. For example, Asian Americans have a markedly higher incidence of stomach cancer, cervical cancer rates are highest among Latina women, and breast cancers rates are highest among white women.

Sex, Gender, and Cancer Risk

Sex and gender are important determinants of cancer risk and mortality, operating separately and interactively to produce differential risk for men and women. Sex-linked factors are those related to biological differences between men and women, including hormonal and genetic differences. In contrast, gender-linked factors are socioculturally determined, including lifestyle and behavioral factors (e.g., diet, smoking), exposure to carcinogens in the home or workplace, access to medical and support services, and psychological and social responses to cancer risk, diagnosis, and treatment.

Men and Cancer

Men have higher cancer-related morbidity and mortality. However, relatively little is known about the contribution of gender-related social factors to men's risk of or experience with cancer. There is considerable evidence suggesting that men are more likely to engage in behaviors associated with increased cancer risk (e.g., alcohol use, poor diet, tobacco use) and less likely to take part in regular health screenings and preventive care, including routine skin inspections and testicular self-examination. This often results in delayed diagnosis and treatment and sometimes disability or fatality that could have been prevented. For instance, on average, men delay medical evaluation for symptoms of testicular cancer 26 weeks after experiencing symptoms including pain, swelling, and detection of a mass. There is increasing theoretical and empirical evidence to suggest that gender socialization and norms regarding the masculine gender role likely account for some of these gender-related differences and influence men's behaviors associated with cancer risk, medical care utilization, and psychological adjustment.

In relation to cancer, the male gender role has been largely examined as a constellation of gender-based attributes, such as strength, control, independence, risk taking, and emotional inhibition. This approach has led to a focus primarily on the potentially harmful aspects of the male gender role by parsing out negative traits such as hostility, self-absorption, and cynicism from perhaps more positive traits such as independence and autonomy. As an example, researchers such as Helgeson and Fritz have found that unmitigated agency, or the focus on oneself to the exclusion of others, has been found to be associated with physical and psychological difficulties associated with cancer, including impaired coping, constrained social support, and poorer physician-patient communication. From this perspective, gender socialization encourages men to maintain behaviors less consistent with cancer prevention, screening, and higher quality of life following diagnosis or risk interpersonal or intrapersonal sanction when norms are breached.

Traditional male gender schemas have been associated with a general reluctance to seek medical care and expectations to be self-reliant. Perceived stigmatization of help seeking and fear of negative social evaluation may explain low utilization of services. For men, cancer has been associated with perceived threats to one's masculine identity, such as feared loss of virility, role fulfillment, and even castration. In addition, many men believe that seeking help for mental and physical conditions might signify weakness to others and oneself and instead should be able to be handled independently. Such beliefs often result in disengagement from physical symptoms through mechanisms such as avoidance, denial, and rationalization, thus encouraging men to distance themselves from their bodies and abandon self-care practices.

Such dynamics may be particularly detrimental immediately following a cancer diagnosis, when emotions such as sadness, fear, uncertainty, diminished control, and vulnerability may be normative. At the same time, men often attribute psychological distress associated with their cancer experience to losses in physical function or lack of information and, as a result, overrely on action-oriented or avoidant coping strategies, rendering a potential mismatch between effective coping efforts and masculine gender norms. Other researchers have posited that because of strong expectations regarding restrictive emotionality, many men have become grossly out of touch with their own emotions, impairing their ability to identify an emotional crisis or leaving them overwhelmed and unable to effectively cope with a health threat. Regardless, men have been grossly underrepresented in research studies on the effectiveness of psychosocial coping interventions, and outcomes from studies that adequately represent men have been less consistent compared with those observed with women.

More recent efforts that attempt to address methodological shortcomings in this literature seek to identify who is most and least likely to benefit from such interventions. For example, research with prostate cancer patients suggests that men with lower self-esteem, lower prostate-specific self-efficacy, and higher depressive symptoms may be particularly likely to benefit from intervention. Also, social support may be of particular importance to psychological adjustment for men with cancer. Konski and colleagues found a significant disadvantage for men who were unpartnered and living alone, even after controlling for disease and other demographic variables. It is also likely that the experience of cancer influences interpersonal functioning and relationships, often changing the manner in which one accesses and receives social support. Attributes associated with the male gender role, such as those of unmitigated agency, may ultimately result in constriction or constraints in utilizing interpersonal resources. Interpersonal environments receptive to men expressing difficult cancer-related emotions are associated with salutary psychological outcomes for men with cancer.

Women and Cancer

Gender can be understood as a set of roles, norms, and expectations that boys and girls and men and women are socialized toward in terms of identity and behavior. As reviewed above, examining gender from this perspective provides insight into men's increased cancer morbidity and mortality, as well as their psychological and social adjustment to cancer. Gender can also be construed as a set of power relations that structure social institutions within which men and women operate, including the medical establishment where cancer is treated and researched. From this perspective, gender operates as a social structure that affects the quality of health care that men and women receive, both independently and as it intersects with other social structures, such as race, class, and sexuality. Both perspectives are relevant to understanding gender influences on women and cancer.

Female gender role norms may contribute to women's somewhat lower cancer morbidity and mortality, as many positive health beliefs and behaviors, including eating a healthy diet and seeking regular health care, cohere with dominant constructions of femininity. However, such broad assessments of gender norms can also be misleading, obscuring the tremendous diversity among women. Gender-based norms and values may vary among women of different ethnic groups, leading to differential cancer risk. For example, African American women are more likely to be classified as overweight or obese, perhaps reflecting their general preference for a larger body ideal, as well as socioeconomic factors that are linked with obesity. Overweight and obesity are risk factors for colorectal cancers, of which African American women evidence higher morbidity and mortality. Thus, the influence of gender norms on cancer-related dietary risk may vary across women of different ethnic and socioeconomic groups. Similarly, women's adherence to cancer screening recommendations may be influenced by cultural, educational, and economic factors as well as gender norms. For example, overall, women generally adhere to Pap test guidelines. However, Latinas have relatively low rates of Pap testing, despite relatively high rates of cervical cancer. Studies suggest that Latinas may hold different causal models of cervical cancer than white women, emphasizing physical traumas or sexual practices over biomedical explanations. Studies linking culture-specific beliefs and acculturation to screening adherence have produced inconsistent results. Other factors, such as lack of insurance or lack of physician referral, are also important predictors of Pap test use.

Gender/power relations between and among men and women can affect the quality and accessibility of women's cancer care. Several studies have found that male physicians are less likely than female physicians to make referrals for mammograms and Pap smears. Moreover, African American and Latina women are less likely than white women to receive such recommendations, and bias has been identified as a likely contributor to lower rates of screening for breast and gynecologic cancer among lesbians and bisexual women as well. These findings are especially important, because across studies, physician recommendation has been identified as the most important determinant of cancer screening for women. Gender biases are also evident in the treatment of women's cancer, with male physicians more likely than female physicians to treat breast cancer patients with mastectomy rather than lumpectomy and less likely to refer patients for breast reconstruction following mastectomy.

In addition to physician biases in clinical care, there is increasing evidence that gender-based assumptions have limited research on women's cancers. Meyerowitz and Hart's review of medical and psychological literatures found that studies of breast and reproductive organ cancers are overrepresented relative to the proportion of women affected, whereas studies examining gender-nonspecific cancers were underrepresented. Notably, men's reproductive organ cancers were underrepresented relative to the proportion of men affected. Psychological studies more often focus on women, especially breast cancer, examining topics such as body image, emotions, and relationships. In contrast, studies of men more often examine functional and occupational capacities. These findings suggest that oncology research among women focuses on breast and genital issues, perhaps reflecting society's views of women's bodies as sexual objects.

According to the American Cancer Society, increased awareness of breast cancer combined with improvements in screening, detection, and treatment have significantly improved breast cancer survival for women, with overall 5-year survival rates at 88%, up from 75% in 1974 to 1976. However, the underrepresentation of gender-nonspecific cancers relative to breast cancer in both research and the media may affect women's perceptions of their actual cancer risk and their cancer screening behavior. Studies suggest that a majority of women significantly overestimate their risk of developing breast cancer and may underestimate their risk for other cancers. In a recent national survey, two thirds of women inaccurately described breast cancer as the leading cause of cancer death among women, with only 30% correctly indicating lung cancer. Similarly, studies suggest that women may view colorectal cancer as a male disease and thus feel less vulnerable to it despite it being the third most common cancer in incidence and mortality among women. Several feminist health advocates argue that the recent proliferation of breast cancer awareness campaigns, such as the countless opportunities for women to "Shop for the Cure," may be misguided, with corporate sponsors exploiting breast cancer to boost profits, obscuring important political issues such as potential environmental causes and unequal access to health care.

Conclusion

Gender is a powerful lens through which meaning about cancer and the cancer experience is created. Socially determined gender roles and gendered beliefs about cancer appear to affect the scientific research agenda, clinical intervention, interpersonal dynamics, and psychosocial adjustment related to cancer. Although such constructions and beliefs clearly impact both women and men, their consequences may be somewhat varied by gender.

CAREGIVING

Caregiving is gendered, and gendered caregiving contributes to gender inequality. In this entry, caregiving is defined as affect and actions that are responsive to an individual's needs and well-being within a face-to-face relationship. Issues treated here are the emergence of modern ideas of caring; how caregiving is gendered; the relationship between unpaid and paid care work, including why caregiving jobs are underpaid and whether payment undermines care; and how affluent democracies support caregiving.

In the past few decades, philosophers, historians, social scientists, and scholars of "social politics" and "social care" have theorized and researched caregiving in relation to gender inequality. This literature frequently uses the term care work to describe the time-consuming, effortful labor that caregivers invest in relations of care. The definition in this entry does not include the sustaining activities of economic provision and other feelings and actions that Nell Noddings labels "caring about" though not "caring for" those in need of care, which is how men have more traditionally cared for dependent others. This division of taking care by earning or authorizing the giving of care service originated in 19th-century changes in gendered divisions of labor and identities.

Care and the Emergence of Private Life

The association of women with caregiving as an affective individual-oriented relationship is a historically recent idea. In most preindustrial societies, the demands of work and the communal, rather than individual, orientation of family economies constrained sentimental and attentive care. After infancy, children, especially boys, were under the daily supervision of their fathers, so the basic care of children was not a sharply gendered activity. In the 19th century, when the rise of market economies created "separate spheres" of home and work, new ideas about men and women associated their natures with the spheres of responsibility to which they were assigned. Women became "angels of the hearth," whose newly conceived pure and tender natures made them caring and nurturant mothers and consoling partners for husbands who sought refuge from the cold and competitive world of work.

The organizations and institutions of the modern Western world built in the transition to urban industrial society institutionalized the "separate spheres" attribution of care to women. The concept of worker that became embedded in the modern workplace involved an individual who was freed of care during a long work day because his private needs and family were in the care of a domestic wife and mother. Correspondingly, only women who did not have to contribute wages to their families could be recognized as good, caring mothers. The concept of citizen centered on independence through paid work or property; the citizen's children were socialized for adult citizenship (and either work or care) by a domestic caregiver. Worker and citizen were formally gender-neutral concepts, but the roles were accessible only to providers whose partners were caregivers. In the 19th-century foundations of modern organizations and institutions, the association of women with attentive and nurturing care was sturdily and restrictively built.

A Caring Sex?

Are women naturally more caring? In societies in which infants can be fed only by breast or in which agricultural labor requires large numbers of children's and men's greater physical strength can be put to great economic advantage, the division of labor by sex appears natural. Nevertheless, wide historical and cross-cultural variation in women's roles in divisions of labor and ideas about women's dispositions are evidence that biology has very limited effects on care.

Psychologists who study sex differences often claim that if gender differences are not biological, then they are taught so early and so well that they become lifelong personality traits. But Hyde's 2005 meta-analysis (a systematic synthesis of findings in the best research) of psychological trait studies show few sex differences in traits relevant to caregiving, excluding care orientation in moral reasoning among adolescents and adults, helping behavior, affiliative (relational) speech, aggression under provocation, and various job orientations. Social psychological research suggests personalities and identities are not as permanently established as psychologists once thought; rather, they change over the life cycle and are shaped by influential experiences. A pattern that emerges across qualitative studies in sociology is that practices of caregiving generate feelings of and dispositions and orientations to care. For example, men who become custodial single fathers or primary parents because of unemployment often develop the habits, feelings, and orientations of "mothering."

The Gender Gap in Caregiving

As divorce and childbearing outside of marriage have grown, the gender gap in child care has widened in terms of the amount of time men spend on caregiving. Over time, fathers who do not live with their children see them less and less; only a small percentage see their children weekly or more often. On the other hand, in two-parent households, father involvement in care has increased. This increase in father involvement suggests a narrowing of the gender gap in child care in two-parent households, although mothers on average devote twice as much time to child care as fathers do. As women's participation in the workforce has increased and women's work hours and interruptions become more similar to men's, the gender gap in child care has closed substantially. Fathers who live with their children have increased their time in child care (including routine care, not just playing or teaching). Nonetheless, although the gender gap in child care has narrowed, women's time in child care, including employed mothers' time, also has increased— less dramatically than men's.

Gender differences in time spent in child care are greater for care of infants and become less as children age. The reasons for men's increases in child care have not been definitively identified, but the late 20th century was characterized by changes in women's economic and educational resources, increasing their bargaining power vis à vis their partners'; emerging ideals of fatherhood that emphasize nurturing involvement; and ideals of nurturing mothering that intensified at the same time that the employment of mothers became a dominant family pattern. The impact of cultural ideas about fatherhood may be seen by comparing changes in men's housework and child care in the period of women's increasing employment and education: Although men's participation in child care has increased steadily over the past 30 years, after a 10-year increase, men's participation in housework leveled out and has remained constant for the past 20 years, with the result that men are much more likely to participate in child care than in housework.

Regarding care for adults, including elders, women are twice as likely as men to give care. The majority of primary caregivers for frail elders are women. The broader the definition of caring (to include helping tasks, like shopping) and the older the caregivers, the more gender similarity researchers find. Broader definitions, however, tend to tap caregiving that is likely to be reciprocated, rather than performed for someone who is dependent. When care is defined narrowly to asymmetric giving, gender differences persist even when men and women are employed full-time and are similar in other structural characteristics that constrain one's time for care.

Gender differences are less when caregiving is for spouses and greater when care is for other adults, especially those living outside one's home. Since a growing number of adults live alone in middle- and old age, gender differences in adult caregiving potentially could increase over time even as women and men become more similar in employment patterns. Despite gender differences in the likelihood of caring for adults, among those who are caregivers, men and women spend similar amounts of time. Once one is a caregiver, the care receiver's needs, rather the caregiver's dispositions, become important. Nonetheless, women begin contributing to care many years before men do, which means that over the life course, women's child care and adult care careers begin earlier than men's, consuming more time and displacing more alternate choices over the long run.

A variety of social explanations can account for the persistence of gendered patterns of unpaid care, despite increasing similarities in men's and women's education, employment patterns, wages, and life course transitions. As mentioned above, some emphasize internalized dispositions formed by the incorporation of an outside gendered culture in an individual's personality traits, identity, cognitive schema, or habitus. Others posit less deeply entrenched cultural learning or socialization models, emphasizing childhood training, role-modeling, and adult socialization. Interactional social psychologists show how gender stereotypes are cued by interactions to produce gender-differentiated behaviors. Structural explanations emphasize women's and men's different positions in social structures, like the economy or the legal system. Structural theorists would expect that change in caregiving would respond to changes in incentives for and constraints on care. For example, relative wages should affect couples' bargaining over care for aging parents, and paid work hours should limit one's availability for child care. Structures constrain and enable cultural conformity, as when one's densely knitted social network enforces gender norms among its members or when the number of nearby daughters or adult children of the same sex as the elder parent affect who gives care.

Studies designed to gauge the contribution of structural and dispositional factors in gendered care usually find evidence of both dynamics. For example, Scott Coltrane shows that flexible jobs and unemployment lead to involved fathering, as do men's less rigidly gendered identities. While studies sometimes find culture and socialization forces sufficient to account for patterns of care, they less often find that structural constraints outweigh socialization. The opposite is true for gender patterns in helping or housework, where men's and women's structural resources matter more.

Why Are Caregiving Jobs Paid Less?

The naturalization and devaluation of unpaid care fostered both the entry of educated women into paid work and the devaluation of paid care work. The 19th-century "separate spheres" idea that women were naturally suited for care in the home, which justified the exclusion of women from the work world, was also used by women to justify their suitability for paid care work as nurses. Women's presumed natural mothering inclinations, rather than expert skill, justified the formation of the nursing profession. Ideals of "natural nurturing" also serve as justification for the idea that nurses should be supervised by doctors as subordinate assistants, rather than be considered interdependent practitioners, like general physicians and specialists. Correspondingly, claims of professional expertise by nurses enabled them to draw boundaries between their jobs and those of lower-tier female caregivers, thereby protecting nurses from competition for jobs and wages. For the most part, jobs identified as centered on caregiving, like elementary school teacher, nurse assistant, or child care provider, are paid significantly less than their required skills would predict. The low wages of care work have created labor shortages and a transnational labor market of women who leave caregiving employment or leave their children in others' care in their home countries to provide paid care in the richer nations of the world.

There are a few possible explanations for the wage penalty on care work. One focuses on the devaluation of women's domestic work and the way paid care work is viewed as an extension of unpaid women's work. The devaluation of women's unpaid labor applies to care jobs generally and also applies specifically to the job performances on which care workers are evaluated. For example, certified nursing assistants (CNAs) provide most of the hands-on care in nursing homes and so are frequently able to see early signs of changes in residents' health. Yet CNA training does not include this kind of attentiveness. CNAs chart only tasks like feeding and toileting, and few nursing homes have systems for CNAs to report their observations of residents' health to nurse supervisors. The standards of performance ignore the skills CNA work cultivates and on which good care depends.

Paula England and Nancy Folbre identify two other theories of the care wage penalty. The "compensating differentials" explanation used by economists attributes the lower wages of care workers to the gratifications of caregiving and the ways its personal rewards attract large enough labor pools to care work to suppress the wage levels required to recruit and retain workers. A second theory, also from economics, is that caregiving produces "public goods," that is, benefits to a much wider group than the care receivers. For example, children in child care and adult women freed of elder care become productive adults who boost the gross national product (GNP) and refill Social Security coffers. Public goods may benefit society, but they do not figure in employers' decisions, so wages do not reflect the full worth of the work. There is little evidence of which, if any, of these explanations are more important in explaining the wage penalty for care work. All of them can explain why women as well as male care workers may incur a wage penalty.

Moral Issues in Paying for Care

Some people explain the persistent low wages of paid care workers as the result of a society's commitment to preserving the altruistic character of caregiving. Selfless motives are seen as enriching caregiving and helping to sustain it as a moral good in society. In this view, paying for care crowds out and corrupts the altruistic motives, moral meanings, and responsiveness of caregiving by appealing to self-interest in payment. Arguments about altruistic care lie behind program rules against paying low-income family members to provide care that home health aides can be paid for and for providing foster parents more than token reimbursement. A parallel argument cautions that the feelings of attachment in a relationship of care threaten the rationality, efficiency, and fairness of workplace operations.

Economic sociologists have addressed this concern about mixing love and money by showing that economic and intimate transactions intertwine in private life and that social relationships also underlie supposedly impersonal market processes. This perspective suggests that rigid moral oppositions of private and public, sentiment and rationality, and love and money are not a useful way to resolve issues of public and workplace caregiving or conserve the social value of unpaid care. Viviana Zelizer acknowledges that giving up these dualisms still leaves moral issues in resolving how to best support caregiving. Her answer is to discover how different kinds of valuation, economic and otherwise, affect care relationships and the availability of caregiving, taking account of the setting and context of care, as well as how people negotiate the meanings and boundaries of different kinds of care. The difficulty of capturing this approach in brief description here indicates the challenge of translating it into a public discussion.

Unpaid Care, Paid Work, and Polity

Women's disproportionate responsibility for unpaid care at home has been linked to a number of disequalizing gender patterns in paid work. Research in the past decade has shown the gender gap in wages to be largely a "mommy gap." Mothers of young children are especially likely to work part-time, while the same is not true of fathers. Taking leave from work to rear children and working part-time are important sources of unequal employment experience that disadvantages mothers in pay and promotion. Still, these experience factors explain only a part of the "mommy gap." Though male and female workers do not differ in measured work commitment, mothers and others may differ in productivity, and consequently pay, because of energy consumed by care, though no research has shown this. Or the gap may be widened by employers' prejudices and practices that discriminate against mothers because of beliefs about their commitment and productivity.

The devaluation of gendered unpaid work has also shaped gendered polities. Citizenship in the United States has been defined in terms of independence and paid work, which marginalizes the productivity and social good created by unpaid care and the forms of economic dependence incurred through responsibility for the care of dependent others. Thus, in the United States, Social Security benefits pass through breadwinners to spouses who were caregivers, rather than directly to former caregivers in recognition of how caregiving, as well as breadwinning, improves society. Those who withdraw from the labor force to give care to children or elders cannot receive unemployment insurance. Single mothers raising children in poverty are mandated to find employment in order to claim safety-net support as productive poor citizens rather than as people rearing good citizens.

In Europe, though workers have citizen rights and benefits as workers, people who care rather than earn are also entitled to citizen supports, for example, through government-created and subsidized day care, child allowances, job retraining subsidy, and old-age benefits (including an array of paid home care programs). Even more significant to the goal of gender equality, European nations also provide supports for workers who are simultaneously caregivers. Far more women and men in Europe than in the United States care full-time for infants or elders at home because governments mandate and subsidize parental leave (a large majority of Norwegian men now use "daddy leave"), sick care leave, rights to resume jobs after care ends, and expanded day care benefits for workers. These citizen supports have made it possible for women and men to be workers and caregivers. Even so, European family-friendly regimes have not encouraged fathers to take caregiving roles comparable to those of mothers.

Social recognition of the productivity and value of caregiving, citizen supports for caregiving, the expansion of social care, and efforts to improve the wages of caregivers will improve the lives of caregivers and lessen gender inequality. Recognition and rewards can recruit and sustain care commitment. At best, they provide incentives to men as well as women. Yet as long as care work, whether paid or unpaid, remains primarily women's work, caregiving will remain an ingredient of gender inequality. To the extent that a society values intensive care of dependents and that we believe that communal bonds create the most continuous and deepest commitments to provide care, large quantities of care will be unpaid. This is because unpaid and selfless caregiving will remain a value in itself and also because state fiscal capacity will limit the extent of subsidized care. In general, the fiscal rewards of unpaid care work will not, and probably should not, equal those of paid work. In that context, social support for care can lessen, without removing, the cultural polarities of gender and gendered economic advantage. Even if moderated, gendered conceptions of care work and women's labor market disadvantage are likely to re-create a gendered balance of unpaid care and perpetuate beliefs about women's disposition to care, and both of these will sustain gendered market disadvantage for caregivers.

In sum, social strategies that preserve a gendered sphere of care will not produce gender equality as long as caregiving in families and close communities retains its social value. That value might be undermined by continuing market pressures that squeeze time for care out of private life, and in that context, the gender gap could close as women's lives become more similar to men's and less care is given. That model is increasingly being pressed on poor single mothers by policies that mandate work. If that distopic vision sparks a political and cultural focus on time for care in families and close communities, then "un-gendering" care depends on a wide range of strategies, well beyond care politics, that augment women's social power and individual women's bargaining power in couples. Aside from this broad and indirect route to fair divisions of informal caregiving, policies that limit work hours and those that in some way sanction the choice of freedom from caregiving (for example, in child support and custody law) may be another route to "un-gendering" and expanding care.

CASTE

Caste is a form of social organization that is unique to India and is based on Hindu religious belief. This essay defines the meaning of the caste system and describes the ways in which it has been used to control sexuality, marital status, and economic and social life among women in India.

Definition

Sociologists have found the caste system a very difficult and complex phenomenon to describe because the idea of caste has evolved over time and functions differently in various parts of India. However, there are some common features to caste that are easily identified. These include the concepts of purity and pollution that govern interpersonal relationships, including occupation, food, kinship, marriage, and religious rituals. Certain castes are considered more pure than others, and Hindus are obligated to confine their relationships, especially those pertaining to marriage and food, to their particular caste groups. Although the caste system derives from Hinduism, it also informs the social organization of other religious groups in India, including Jains, Christians, and Muslims.

Indians use two terms, varna (color) and jati (kind), to describe the caste system. Varna refers to the ancient textual system of classifying individuals according to four groups: Brahmin (priests and scholars), Kshatriyas (warriors and soldiers), Vaisyas (traders), and Sudras (servants of the other three castes). Of these varnas, the first three are referred to as "twice-born" because the men undergo an initiation ceremony that grants them membership to their group. The jati system divides humans into different groups and enforces rules of endogamy, food, and occupation (although in contemporary India, people experience occupational mobility and are not always circumscribed by jati). While there are just four varnas, there are thousands of jatis in India.

History and Origins

Historians believe that the caste system came with the Aryans in the second millennium before Christ. The Aryans had three social groupings, the military, the priests, and the commoners, and struggles between the Aryans and the non-Aryans led to the latter being designated as belonging to the lowest (Shudra) caste or to the untouchable/Dalit (Ati-Shudra) castes. The rules of endogamy helped preserve distinctions between the social groups. At first, the military held the highest rank, but the growth of priestly power through ritual and knowledge changed the caste hierarchies. About 550 BC, the emergence of Buddhism challenged Brahmanical supremacy because Buddha preached that it was virtue, not birth, that determined one's place in society. The Brahmins struggled with the Buddhists for 12 centuries and regained their power only after the Kshatriyas were depleted by war and the Brahmins had accepted Buddhist principles into their philosophy.

The Rig Veda, an oral text of the Aryans considered sacred to all Hindus, created a myth of origin that helped script Brahminical supremacy. According to the Rig Veda, Brahmins came from the mouth of Purusa (cosmic man) and held authority for teaching, receiving alms, and performing sacrifices; the Kshatriyas came from the arms and had the duty to protect others; the Vaisyas came from the thighs and were to be engaged in trading and cultivation; and the Shudras emerged from the feet and were to serve all other castes. This mythical, textual description created a theory of social organization that in practice was much more complicated, with over a thousand jatis, each of which had its own rules.

During the period of British imperialism in India, the British took advantage of the caste system to consolidate their position in India. Their policies favored the upper castes, and they did very little to reform the caste system. Bureaucratic tools such as the census helped reify the caste system and clustered certain jatis under one label. In addition, because of the economic and social advantages of caste, several lower castes adopted norms of the upper castes (a process referred to as Sanskritization), which led to many shifts in regional perceptions and practices of caste.

Although the Indian nationalists pursued social reform and intellectuals like Gandhi actively sought to abolish the discriminatory practices against the Dalits (whom Gandhi called harijan, or "children of God"), the caste system persists in India. Also during the nationalist period, Dalit reformers like Dr. Ambedkar, Jotiba Phule, and E. V. R. Periyar fought against both English imperialism and Hindu hegemony in nationalist politics. Ambedkar converted to Buddhism, and Periyar espoused atheism as an alternative to the problems of Hinduism.

Gender and Caste

Although there have been numerous studies of gender in India and also of the caste system, only in recent years have scholars begun to study the interrelationship between the two. Uma Chakravarti argues that the most important factor in the subordination of upper-caste women was sexual control. This control maintained both caste purity and patrilineal succession and was achieved among the upper castes through practices that included prepubertal marriage of girls and closely negotiated endogamous marriages, and rejected widow remarriage. The Manusmriti (Laws of Manu), which codified Hindu cultural practice around 1500 BC, prescribed that women were dependent on their fathers before marriage, their husbands during marriage, and their sons in widowhood.

Because fathers and other males negotiated a woman's marriage and controlled her sexuality, the purity of caste lines could be maintained.

Women are not allowed to have sexual relationships with men of a lower caste, as this is viewed as contaminating the purity of castes. Men, however, are allowed relationships with lower-caste women, as this supposedly elevates women's caste status. Although Brahmins, particularly in Southern India, had very rigid rules of purity and pollution, lived in exclusively Brahmin streets, and prevented even the shadow of a Dalit from falling on them, they still maintained sexual liaisons with women of lower castes. When a woman engaged in a cross-caste sexual liaison, she was considered internally and permanently polluted, but a man's cross-caste sexual liaison was considered external and temporary pollution that could be fixed with cleansing baths and changing of the sacred thread.

Women's work plays an important part in maintaining occupational continuity for castes. Because households are often units of production, women and children in potters' households may support the work of the men by cultivating clients in the marketplace, or women in barbers' families may cater to the personal needs of women in upper-caste homes. Food is also an important factor in caste identity, as rules of food preparation and preservation articulate the caste's idea of purity and pollution. Women are in charge of not only cooking in households but also preparing ritual foods. For example, Brahmin women in Southern India follow certain rules regarding cleanliness and food preparation in order to provide meals for the men and also for rituals in temples and home worship spaces. These Brahmins often will not eat food prepared by members of other castes, nor will they offer food at temples not prepared in a ritually clean manner.

Resistance to the Caste System

Such a rigid and coercive social system historically experienced serious challenges. The rise of Buddhism mentioned above was one such challenge to Brahminical authority. Similarly, the Bhakti movement in the medieval period allowed people to break caste rules in the pursuit of salvation through music and poetry. Salvation did not require the intervention of Brahmins, and the Bhaktas attacked ritualism and used vernacular (instead of Sanskrit) as the language of devotion, and thus the movement opened up spaces for women. Such women included Meerabai in Rajasthan, Andal in Tamil Nadu, and Akka Mahadevi in Karnataka.

The emergence of the Dalit movement for caste reform in the 20th century is also very important. Hindu social reform of the 19th century focused on issues such as age of consent in marriage, widow rehabilitation, and the abolishment of sati (widow burning), all of which were problems faced by upper-caste women. Dalit reformers focused on abolishing caste issues, but it was the work of Dalit feminists that focused on the multiple forms of discrimination Dalit women faced. For Dalit women, oppression came from the caste system, from patriarchy within their own castes, and also from economic disempowerment. Dalit feminists changed the landscape of both social reform and feminism in India. Dalit women have fought for land reform to better their economic condition and for greater control of their sexuality, and they have also produced numerous autobiographical works (such as Bama's Karukku or the narrative of Viramma), which function as testimonials and seek to record Dalit women's experiences and to raise consciousness about their struggles for autonomy.

Although India today is a secular democratic republic that has constitutionally abolished untouchability, the caste system has not been eradicated. Since independence from the British in 1947, the Indian government has pursued affirmative action (referred to as the "reservation system") to enable members of economically underprivileged castes to have better access to education and government jobs. The reservation system has been attacked by upper castes as propagating reverse discrimination. Although the caste system has evolved over time and continues to change, it still holds enormous power in daily social life, politics (caste-based parties, voting blocs), and economics in contemporary India.

Castration

The term castration refers to any surgical or chemical procedure resulting in the loss or severe impairment of testicular function in men or ovarian function in women. The practice of castration on humans predates recorded history and has had a wide variety of cultural significations, moral justifications, and social functions, including punitive; religious; administrative/bureaucratic, such as the use of eunuchs as harem guards; and even artistic, as in the case of castrati opera singers, whose testes were removed before puberty to ensure a higher vocal range. In recent years, chemical castration is often employed as part of the rehabilitation of sexual offenders.

In terms of psychoanalysis, it is more accurate to refer to the castration complex, as in this context, castration should not be mistaken for a description of real events or situations, but refers to fantasies that do have a distinct and shaping impact on reality. Fantasy and reality are not as diametrically opposed in psychoanalysis as in other systems of thought. The castration complex is simultaneously one of the most significant, conceptually problematic and politically contested breakthroughs in Freudian psychoanalysis. It guides the transition from the pleasurable lawlessness of infancy and childhood to full participation in society and ushers in the voluntary subjection of the individual to the moral rules and restrictions of her or his culture. Moreover, the castration complex throws into relief Freud's understanding of sexual difference and highlights the constitutional asymmetries between femininity and masculinity. Feminist theorists have criticized psychoanalysis as being a product of its patriarchal cultural context, consistently reproducing gender inequalities in its elaborately theoretical models. Yet although this might render some of its conclusions outdated, it also means that psychoanalysis can be interpreted at the very least as a historically valuable analysis of the social and personal vicissitudes of gender and sexuality for the European middle classes at the dawn of the 20th century.

Freud first articulated his theory of the castration complex in The Sexual Theories of Children (1908), proposing that infants hold the belief that every human being has a penis and that, crucially, the penis is disproportionately invested with the idea of completeness and self-validation (primary narcissism). The discovery that not all humans possess a penis throws the child into crisis (Oedipus complex), which is handled differently by boys and girls. Boys interpret girls' lack of a penis as the result of a punitive castration perpetrated by the father and fear such punishment themselves; they reinterpret their premature sexual activity and longing for the mother as a transgression against the father and all that he symbolically represents (the law, morality, social norms) and decide to renounce their desires by internalizing paternal authority (formation of the superego).

Conversely, girls are faced with the devastating reality that they are already "castrated" and are left with three options, all disappointing in their own way: the mentally unhealthy (neurotic) choice, which is to despise the feminine body and reject femininity as a social position; the sexually deviant choice, which is to refuse to give up their investment in the clitoris, as a mini–feminine penis, and remain entrenched in the pre-Oedipal position, before proper gender differentiation; and, finally, the only "healthy" resolution, which requires girls to acknowledge their "castration," shift their desire from mother to father, and adopt the feminine position of wanting and accepting the phallus from a man, in lovemaking, by having a baby, but also in terms of social status always through their association with and in reference to men.

In addition to its blatant phallocentrism, Freud's theory of the castration complex is guilty of a continuous slippage between the penis and the phallus, namely, the symbolic power wielded by masculinity and embodied by men in patriarchal cultures. Soon after its original formulation, its flaws were noted even by Freud's followers, who attempted to address them in different ways, most of which aimed to metaphorize castration by shifting the focus away from the threat of genital mutilation. August Stärke proposed the separation from the mother's breast during weaning as the primary model of traumatic loss, while Otto Rank suggested that the infant's tumultuous parting from the maternal body during birth constituted the original trauma in the image of which all future anxieties would be shaped.

One of the most influential reformulations of the castration complex was offered by French psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan, who redefined the phallus by further removing it from its underlying associations with anatomy and penis envy. The Lacanian phallus is not an object, but an organizing principle, the "master signifier" representing the function of signification on which language and culture rely. For Lacan, each person acquires her or his position in the sexual economy within the sphere of the symbolic, that is, in language broadly defined as all systems of signification, cultural codes, and the law. Sexual difference is not already inscribed on the body, but is produced through a constitutional alienation in language, to which the subject gains access only by giving up her or his infantile intimacy with the mother.

Castration thus permeates all prohibition, separation, and loss for both men and women: No one is in possession of the phallus; all are subject to language and culture—not in mastery of them, as thinkers of the Enlightenment proffered, but ruled by them. Nevertheless, the Lacanian version of castration is not free from drawing gender hierarchies either, since masculinity and femininity are in a revealingly disparate relation to the phallus. While the male child is enticed to accept prohibition in exchange for the promise of future reparation (e.g., the benefits of hegemonic masculinity), the female child will have to give it up only in the hope of receiving it in the future from a man, normally in the shape of a child of her own.

Lacan painstakingly detaches sexual difference from biological essentialism yet in the end replicates Freud's gender asymmetry in reference to castration. The crucial difference between the two models lies in Lacan's recognition that lack is constitutive of all subjects in culture, whether male or female, and that gender is a wholly cultural construct and hence, in theory at least, open to change.

CELIBACY

Celibacy is abstinence from marriage and sexual relations. Most common in religion, celibacy is the gateway to sacred roles in Buddhism and Roman Catholicism. In a religious context, a person embracing celibacy often takes a vow.

Understandings and experiences of celibacy are evolving. Until relatively recently in Western societies, celibacy was equated with the unmarried state. But with sexual activity no longer confined solely to marriage, unmarried people are often sexually active. Perhaps viewing celibacy as less interesting than the widening range of sexual activities available for study, social scientists have rarely examined the topic.

In the ancient world, celibacy was often advocated or sex recommended only sparingly because loss of seminal fluids was thought detrimental to (men's) health. For many today, celibacy requires total abstention from genital pleasure, but others see masturbation as acceptable. Although many consider celibacy synonymous with sexual abstinence and chastity, there are differences. Celibacy has more-positive, volitional, and long-term connotations than abstinence.

Contemporary sexual abstinence movements, like True Love Waits, persuade young people to save sex for marriage. Some young people who pledge to abstain embrace celibacy as a positive stage in their lives. Others struggle to adhere to their celibate ideal: Researchers studying abstinence movements have found that although pledging abstinence delays the age of first sex, pledges are frequently broken. Celibacy as an ideal and celibacy as a practice are often different.

In institutions like prisons and hospitals, where there is limited contact with outsiders and limited opportunities to engage in a sexual relationship, celibacy is often enforced. Even in contexts that are integrated with general social life, there are people who wish to find sexual partners but cannot. They are sometimes called "involuntary celibates."

Chastity, another term associated with celibacy, does not necessarily mean sexual abstinence. Its original meaning was "moral purity," and this was interpreted as conserving sexual activity to monogamous heterosexual marriage. A married, sexually active person could thus be chaste but could not be celibate or abstinent. Virginity is not required for celibacy, although some celibates have never engaged in sex. Celibacy is normally a subcategory of singleness.

However, married or partnered people sometimes become celibate while remaining with their partners, perhaps for a defined period.

Motivations for Celibacy

People choose celibacy for different reasons. The religious dimension is uppermost. Altruism is another motivation: Celibacy enables people to devote themselves to caring for others. In the absence of adequate state welfare provision, an adult may remain celibate to look after aging parents. The Indian political and spiritual leader Mahatma Gandhi thought procreation a distraction from the needs of the community and recommended celibacy to aid self-discovery and public service. Some, like those with anorexia, rarely desire sex. Celibacy can also improve employment opportunities, for example, for religious professionals economically supported by their communities. The (female) Albanian "sworn virgins" who adopt male attire are able to access better-paid male occupations. People may espouse celibacy to enhance autonomy or personal growth or foster non-kin communities. Ideological commitments are another motivating reason for celibacy. Some feminists have rejected sexual activity to promote female friendship; as will be argued, the gender dimension of celibacy is, along with religion, its other most significant feature.

Religion

Celibacy is a feature of Buddhism, Christianity, and to a lesser extent Hinduism but is disdained by Jews and Muslims, for whom marriage and family life are central. Celibacy is practiced in some of the smaller religious groups, most of them newer offshoots from the major religions. These include the Jains and the neo-Hindu movement, the Brahma Kumaris. The Brahma Kumaris advocate celibacy within marriage, with sexual activity engaged in only for procreation and without undue pleasure.

Within Buddhism, sexual self-control through celibacy is normally required only of clergy (generally men), not of laity. Celibacy is adopted by a minority of Buddhists in the East and West, although in certain strands (notably Theravada Buddhism), most adherents are advised to take vows for short periods. Some commit to becoming nuns and monks. The code Buddhist monks and nuns follow, the Vinaya, prohibits sexual activity, including masturbation, and sexual desire is seen as an obstacle to liberation. Celibacy has always been valued more highly for monks, for it is seen as being more compatible with masculinity, and monks have a higher status than their female counterparts.

The Roman Catholic branch of Christianity continues the tradition of celibacy first expressed in the New Testament. Jesus remained single and advocated that those who are called by God to do so renounce marriage for the kingdom of heaven, while St. Paul regarded singleness as a divine gift to be accepted if possible. Celibacy would enable believers to serve God with undivided attention and would act as a symbol of the life to come, where marriage would not exist, Paul argued. Celibacy grew in popularity through the early Christian centuries. By the third century, groups like the Syrians saw celibacy as a precondition for baptism. Theologians including Augustine, Jerome, and Benedict advocated communal celibacy. Monasteries and convents developed. By the 4th century, celibacy was increasingly required of priests and bishops, even those already married, particularly in the Western church, whose strict views on clerical celibacy were at odds with the Eastern churches. From the 8th to the 10th centuries, attempts to Christianize marriage largely replaced efforts to impose celibacy on priests, until the reform movement in the 11th century revived the call for clerical celibacy. Roman Catholicism has continued to require celibacy of its priests.

During the 16th-century Reformation, the celibate tradition was fiercely challenged. Protestants instead advocated marriage and childbearing, and celibate communities were closed, with many former inhabitants marrying. Academic theologian and former celibate monk Martin Luther married a former nun. Luther estimated that the sexual desire of women was so intense that only 1 in 1,000 (later revised to 1 in a 100,000) would be able to lead a pure celibate life; for him, celibacy was unnatural, threatening, and impure. While women gained affirmation as wives and mothers in the transition from woman-as-nun to woman-as-wife, many lost the status the convent had given them as spiritual leaders, workers, and members of a sisterhood. Today, Protestants usually favor marriage but have begun to accept celibate singleness as a viable alternative.

A series of sex abuse scandals has rocked contemporary Catholicism, leading onlookers to ask whether celibacy inclines priests to abuse children. Although some in the church were reluctant to take the issue seriously, the church dismissed some priests for misconduct. Defense of celibacy has continued. Many Catholics argue that celibacy does not cause abuse, since most priests do not abuse, but the celibate priesthood's hierarchies, rituals, and lack of openness about sex may provide a hiding place for men harboring desires toward children.

In Hinduism, brahmacharya, often translated as "celibacy," is practiced alongside diet and meditation by ascetics seeking spiritual liberation. Celibacy is less prominent in Hinduism than in Christianity and Buddhism. Although it has been more common among (higher-caste) men, brahmacharya is also practiced by women. The meanings of celibacy can differ between the sexes. While men fear that losing semen risks polluting them and impairing their spiritual capabilities, for women, celibacy is more a temporary and involuntary abstinence before and after marriage. While the ideal, the four-stage life cycle for high-caste men, as traditionally understood, has a significant place for celibacy (abstinence is necessary in three out of the four stages), celibacy is considered powerful in only one of women's (less-codified) three life stages, her premarital girlhood. A minority of women, however, take a vow to become a sannyasini (female renouncer). Those who do, concentrate on developing emotional detachment through brahmacharya.

Celibacy and Gender

Celibacy is a gendered phenomenon and does not always benefit women. Some feminists think it signifies rejection of the female sexual body; celibacy, they argue, is a front for misogyny. Most scholarly attention goes to male celibates, who have attained higher status roles than females. Celibate women are often subject to patriarchy. Buddhist nuns are subordinate to Buddhist monks, Catholic nuns to male priests. Religious donors tend to give more to male celibate communities than female communities, so celibate women are more likely to face poverty. While financial security enables monks to travel to study holy texts, nuns often forego study for menial labor to sustain themselves. The notion prevalent in religion that celibate communities must be single sex has been criticized, especially by feminists. They point out that the single-sex requirement often comes from fear that women's sexuality will lead men astray and that women would gain from sharing opportunities for study and conversation with monks.

On balance, celibacy aids more than hinders gender equality. In enabling women to step outside roles as wives and mothers, celibacy challenges gender norms. Early Christian teachings on celibacy contrasted with the Jewish preference for family and with prevailing household structures that saw women only through their relationships to male family members, and enabled women to join the traveling company of disciples. Contemporary Asian Buddhist nuns testify that celibacy brings relief from looking after husbands, pleasureless sex, and bearing many children. South Asian female renouncers can sidestep cultural hierarchies of gender and caste that often disadvantage them. Those who live as wandering ascetics visiting holy places of pilgrimage have more mobility in public than most women. For the female-majority movement the Brahma Kumaris, there is a connection between sex, the fall of humanity, and the oppression of women, and one purpose of celibacy is to promote the equality of women.

Perhaps because of its positive effects on gender equality, some regard celibacy as a feminist position. Unmarried women formed the backbone of the feminist movement in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Feminist Sally Cline argues that women are pressurized into feeling that they must engage in sexual activity. Celibacy enables them to reject this myth and brings a new freedom and autonomy.

In destabilizing gender roles, celibacy undermines the gendered, partnered, and childbearing foundation of most societies. This is a key argument advanced by Sally Kitch, whose study of three religious celibate communities in late-19th-century America (the Shakers, the Koreshans, and the Sanctificationists) demonstrates how celibacy promotes the unity and spiritual equality of men and women. She argues that celibacy eliminates the need for opposition of the sexes. The opposition of the sexual bond is replaced by a brother-sister relationship and shared, ungendered characteristics. Instead of the pattern of male worker and female domestic, the sexes work together in the household. The blood family and religious community no longer conflict, as the celibate community becomes a spiritual family. These findings are consistent with those of other anthropologists who have noted that societies who support celibacy tend to be more egalitarian than those that do not.

Conclusion

In sum, celibacy involves abstaining from sexual relations. In its prototypical form, it is voluntarily chosen, often for spiritual reasons, and lasts for a significant length of time. It may also be involuntary, and it is not always possible to differentiate between voluntary and involuntary celibacy. Celibacy has important gendered dimensions. While female celibates often endure more difficulties than males, celibacy remains key to the promotion of gender equality and women's freedom. Thus, it is worthy of further scholarly examination.

Cervical Cancer Vaccination

Cervical cancer is an aggressive and often deadly cancer caused by cell dysplasia (mutation) of the cervix. Recent studies have linked cervical cancer to HPV (human papillomavirus), a sexually transmitted infection. Two vaccines were developed in 2006 to prevent some types of HPV, but controversy has erupted over suggestions that the vaccine be made mandatory for preadolescent girls.

Cervical Cancer

An estimated 4,000 women die annually in the United States from cervical cancer, where it is the eighth leading cause of cancer deaths among women. Hispanic and African American women are affected in higher numbers than whites. Worldwide, cervical cancer ranks fifth in the cause of cancer deaths, a difference attributed to better preventative testing and treatment in the United States. While smoking, use of oral contraceptives, and family history of cancer are among additional risks factors, HPV has been linked to cervical cancer as the factor of highest risk. In some studies, statistics of HPV presence in DNA testing of cervical cancers is as high as 99%. HPV can also affect men's health, and it has been linked to penile, throat, and anal cancer.

Human Papillomavirus (HPV)

HPV is the most common STI (sexually transmitted infection) in the United States. It is not a single virus, but a family of over 100 viruses that result in a host of symptoms, from common warts to genital warts (low risk) to the types that cause cancer (high risk). The viruses are spread by skin-to-skin contact that cannot always be prevented by the use of barrier contraceptives. Some of these types are harmless, and many patients have reported that symptoms clear up on their own with no medical intervention. Removal treatments for noncancerous types include medicated creams, liquid nitrogen, and laser removal. Statistics on the prevalence of genital HPV infection vary widely, with studies indicating that as few as 30% to as many as 80% of the adult population of the United States are infected with at least one type of genital HPV. Routine Pap testing is recommended for women to detect abnormal cells in the cervix that may develop into cancer if left untreated. There are currently no federally approved tests for HPV in men.

Vaccines

In 2006, the FDA approved Gardasil, a vaccine for four types of HPV, including types 16 and 18, which are known to cause cervical cancer. As of 2007, another vaccine, Cervarix, is under consideration. While Gardasil protects against two additional types of HPV known to cause genital warts, Cervarix is designed to vaccinate against types 16 and 18 only. Merck & Co., the developer of Gardasil, recommends its three-dose vaccination for females age 9 to 26. Gardasil's recommendations have received CDC (Centers for Disease Control) endorsement. Gardasil studies have suggested that the vaccine protects against the four HPV strains for up to 5 years. Studies to determine the vaccine's effectiveness beyond 5 years and for male subjects are ongoing. The current cost of the vaccination series is $360.

Controversy

After FDA approval in 2006, Merck & Co. launched a vigorous marketing campaign, urging state lawmakers to require the vaccinations for girls as part of routine vaccine series administered to school-age children. Several states considered or approved such a measure. Some states considering the measure sought to include parental objection options, or "opt out." This was due in part to an immediate outcry from parent and conservative groups who felt that such a measure would encourage premarital sexual activity. Controversy also arose about the use of public funding for mandated vaccinations and the aggressiveness of Merck's lobbying tactics. Others objected to the short length of medical studies and questioned the safety of the vaccines. At the time of this publication, the debate has yet to be resolved.

CHASTITY

Chastity is a virtue in which purity is maintained by abstaining from sexual activity outside of marriage. In its religious connotations, it is distinct from the concept of virginity in that married partners are considered chaste as long as they remain faithful to one another. Whereas virginity might be considered a temporary identity, something to be lost, gifted, or exchanged with another person, chastity is a moral state of being historically linked to other virtues such as temperance and thrift. While the doctrine of chastity in most Western religions applies to both men and women, in practice, expectations of chastity have been unevenly applied throughout modern history. With the advent of abstinence-only sex education as the national standard for sex education in the United States, discussions of chastity have a new contemporary relevance.

Chastity in U.S. History

While our understandings of sexuality and sexual behavior have changed over time, sexuality has always had a major role in the maintenance of social hierarchies. In particular, behavioral norms and standards historically have been stratified by gender, social class, and race. Ideals of chastity functioned as an important regulatory device in directly managing women's sexuality and indirectly to control male sexual behavior through expectations of female restraint.

According to D'Emilio and Freedman's provocative history of sexuality in America, it was not until the postcolonial period that women were thought to possess the innate qualities of purity and chastity. During this period, female chastity was linked with the absence of sexual desire. Prior to this, chastity had been seen as a form of self-control and not as biologically female.

While young women were expected to abstain from sexual behavior due to a lack of desire, expectations were different for young men, for whom concerns centered around excessive masturbation. Masturbation among males was not only said to lead to disease and insanity but it was also thought that the loss of sperm depleted the energy system, leaving them less economically productive. Masturbation was also linked to intellectual inferiority, a particular concern among the middle classes. Writing at the turn of the 20th century, G. Stanley Hall, the psychologist credited with the identification of adolescence as a developmental stage, contended that adolescent chastity (meaning the maintenance of chastity between the time of puberty and marriage) separated the civilized from the savage. He and other experts recognized that for men, abstinence from sexual activity, including masturbation, was a struggle—a tacit acknowledgment of the perceived differences in sexual interest between men and women. According to Hall, this period of prolonged chastity both marked and created the distance between whites and other races.

In a movement led largely by women to battle prostitution and other urban vices, the sexual virtue of women was increasingly pressed into service as a moral reform device for men. Women reformers called for a single standard of morality for both men and women, to be based on sexual chastity outside of marriage. Rather than changing standards of male purity, the early decades of the 20th century witnessed shifting notions of appropriate female sexuality. Formal courtship rituals gave way to a more peer-directed system of social organization between the sexes. Dating sometimes led to premarital sexuality, but this typically was limited to likely marital partners, and if pregnancy resulted, marriage was quick to follow. Chastity remained the ideal for young women, but there was a less rigorous social infrastructure to enforce female chastity. Beginning in the 1950s, the ideological underpinnings that supported ideals of extramarital chastity were breaking down as sex educators, other social scientists, and adolescents began to question what they saw as an outdated moral order. There was no longer a clear moral consensus on form and function of sexual activity.

As romantic notions of marriage emphasized intimacy through sexual expression and connectivity, the procreative definition of sex and marriage was displaced. By the late 1960s, the "pleasure principal" was becoming normative, particularly as birth control gained wider acceptance and was made available to single, unmarried adults. This effectively separated sex from reproduction. Rather than expectations of chastity, concerns regarding premarital sex shifted to the pragmatics of pregnancy and disease prevention in efforts led by professional sex educators and family planning clinics.

Chastity in the Contemporary United States

Social conservatives have long agreed that parents should control the sexual education of children, arguing that sex educators' emphasis on contraceptive education violates the personal beliefs of many. Beginning in the late 1970s, various conservative groups (known collectively as the "Religious Right" or the "New Right") challenged the professional co-optation of sex education. However, it proved impossible to recork the sex education bottle, a notion that was publicly unpopular as well (most Americans support sex education in public schools). Conservatives instead championed a new model of public sex education known as the "abstinence-only-until-married" model. Beginning in 1981, the U.S. federal government began funding abstinence-only sex education programs both in and out of public schools through the Adolescent Family Life Act (AFLA). This program was explicit in its purpose to promote "chastity and self-discipline" among adolescents. AFLA was relatively small, both in terms of its funding and scope, and abstinence-only education remained under the public radar. This changed in 1996, when the federal government included significant funding for abstinence-only education in a landmark welfare reform bill. Programs funded under this legislation are held to a strict eight-point set of guidelines, stating among other things that sexual activity outside of marriage is likely to cause physical and psychological harms and that abstinence from sex outside of marriage is the expected standard of human behavior. Funding for abstinence-only education has increased from approximately $13 million in 1995 to over $170 million in 2007. A third stream of abstinence-only funding, Community Based Abstinence Education (CBAE), was introduced in 2001.

The ideal of chastity is being repackaged for new generations through movements such as the Silver Ring Thing, which popularized the virginity pledge. In this subset of abstinence-only education programs, young people vow chastity until marriage and wear a "purity ring" to demonstrate a commitment to sexual abstinence. Also known as "character education," abstinence proponents see sexual purity as essential to moral character and link it to a host of other values, such as respect, honesty, and patriotism. In addition to fears of the general inefficacy of these programs, opponents of abstinence-only sex education argue that this new brand of chastity targeted at adolescents has particularly deleterious effects on young women. A report prepared for Congress in 2004 found several examples of gender stereotyping among the most widely used abstinence-only curricula. Other research has found that like the purity movements of the early 20th century, abstinence programs feminize sexual responsibility.

Cheerleading

Cheerleading has long been considered an iconic American activity symbolizing school spirit, leadership, popularity, youthfulness, and sex appeal. Practiced primarily by girls and young women of the white middle class, it has also represented mainstream notions of "ideal" femininity in the United States. Societal proscriptions about gender are not static, however, and neither is cheerleading. Once an exclusively sideline activity geared toward supporting school sports, cheerleading is now gaining recognition as a sport in its own right, often operating outside the school context altogether. This entry charts the growth and changes in cheerleading over time and explores the gender politics at play in the various types of cheerleading that currently exist. It suggests that cheerleading is best understood not simply as an instance of popular culture but also as an important barometer of popular ideas about gender and gender difference in U.S. society.

History and Background

Despite the association of cheerleading with femininity, the original cheerleaders were men. Cheerleading was connected to the emergence of college football in the Ivy Leagues in the mid-1800s, and the growth and formalization of cheerleading paralleled that of football. Over the latter half of the 19th century, as attendance at college games grew, large stadiums were constructed, and spectators were distanced from the playing field. Cheerleaders—or "yell leaders," as they were then called—led cheers from the sidelines to both encourage and control crowd involvement. By the 1920s, cheerleading was a formal, extracurricular activity for boys of the middle and upper classes in high schools, colleges, and communities across the country, related to but distinct from other spirit programs such as marching bands, drum corps, and drill teams. As high-profile ambassadors for their schools and communities, cheerleaders were associated with such character-building traits as discipline, cooperation, leadership, and sportsmanship.

White women and women and men of color were initially excluded from the private, all-male academies where student-led athletics first developed, but many state-supported institutions shifted to coed enrollment at the turn of the century, and white women began joining cheer squads during the 1920s and 1930s as collegiate sports proliferated and men and women began socializing more in public. A separate cheerleading tradition evolved within black educational institutions during the same period, with a similar emphasis on character building and leadership. Overall, however, cheerleading remained an overwhelmingly white enterprise, and evidence suggests that it became even "whiter" after desegregation because the total number of black schools diminished and black students were rarely elected as cheerleaders in the newly integrated, predominantly white schools. It was not until the 1960s and 1970s, well after scholastic athletic programs had diversified, that cheer squads began to reflect the ethnic and racial composition of schools. This shift was in part the result of protest activity on the part of black and Latino students. Regardless of these demographics, cheerleading is still largely associated with whiteness, both because of its representation in mainstream media and because the "bubbly enthusiasm" so fundamental to its expression since feminization is linked to a white middle-class aesthetic.

The 1960s and 1970s was the period in which the shift toward "feminization" was more or less complete, with girls constituting roughly 95% of cheerleaders at this time. World War II played a significant role in this transition because the wartime mobilization of men opened up new opportunities for women in sports and cheerleading, just as it did for women in the labor force. Female involvement changed the nature of cheerleading, spurring greater emphasis on physical attractiveness and sex appeal, which, in turn, led to the trivialization and devaluation of cheerleading. Their status as icons of popularity notwithstanding, female cheerleaders have long been stereotyped as dumb and/or sexually promiscuous, while male cheerleaders are generally assumed to be gay—also a response to the feminine character of cheerleading insofar as homosexuality is largely perceived as a form of gender nonconformity.

Not surprisingly, cheerleading experienced a decline in the late 1970s and 1980s in the wake of second-wave feminism and the passage of Title IX, when traditional ideas about gender underwent significant challenge and girls' access to sports in public schools dramatically increased. Since that time, cheerleading has been criticized for its supportive, auxiliary role, which is said to perpetuate gender inequality: In cheerleading, as in life, men occupy center stage while women support their endeavors from the sidelines. The emergence of professional cheerleading (the Dallas Cowboy Cheerleaders, the Laker Girls, etc.), although technically closer to dance than cheerleading per se, has only fueled the criticism.

The Cheerleading Renaissance

The decline was short-lived, however, for cheerleading is currently undergoing a renaissance and is now more popular and profitable than ever before, with an estimated 4 million participants nationwide. Although still predominantly female, the activity is attracting increasing numbers of men to coed teams, particularly at the college level. The southern United States (including Texas) is considered the heart of modern cheerleading, although the activity is well established throughout the United States and even abroad, having gained a foothold in countries such as Taiwan, Japan, Norway, Finland, Sweden, Australia, Canada, Mexico, and the Philippines. The reasons for the renaissance are multiple and interrelated. Most important is the increased athleticism of cheerleading today and the adoption of sportlike elements such as competitions, summer training camps, and rigorous practice schedules. Most cheer squads no longer simply lead cheers or dance on the sidelines. They also throw stunts and basket tosses, build pyramids, and execute elaborate tumbling passes, whether on the sidelines or the competition mat.

These changes serve both to "remasculinize" cheerleading for men and to maintain its market appeal for a new generation of girls and women who have more options for athletic involvement than they did in the past. The 1980s is generally recognized as the decade in which stunts and pyramids grew more complex and advanced gymnastics skills began figuring more prominently; along with these changes came more elaborate judging criteria and more rigorous safety guidelines. The first college cheer championship was televised in 1978, with several more following in the early 1980s. Since then, cable networks have broadcast a wide range of cheer championships to national and international audiences, and competitive cheerleading has been the focus of Hollywood films, reality TV shows, and news reports. Cheerleaders now call themselves "cheer athletes," the term team is used interchangeably with squad, and some schools offer partial athletic scholarships for cheerleaders. According to the National Center for Catastrophic Sport Injury Research, cheerleading is the leading cause of serious sports injuries to women, ahead of gymnastics and track. In 2003, the University of Maryland was the first school to use its all-female competition cheer team for the purpose of demonstrating Title IX compliance. Other university teams have since followed suit.

None of this could have happened without the growth and involvement of the modern cheerleading industry. In all parts of the country, squads are affiliated with different cheerleading companies, or associations, which run competitions, summer camps, coaching clinics, safety certification seminars, and their own product lines for uniforms and apparel. The "founding father" of this industry, Lawrence Herkimer, was himself a cheerleader at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. In 1948, Herkimer started the National Cheerleading Association (NCA), which is headquartered in Dallas, while the younger but larger Universal Cheerleading Association (UCA) is based in Memphis. The same parent corporation, Varsity Brands, owns both companies as well as the United Spirit Association (USA), which has a substantial presence in California and the Southwest. A multimillion dollar corporation, Varsity Brands now controls 90% of the cheer-wear market as well as the largest camps and most prestigious competitions for both scholastic and all-star cheerleading. Because the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) does not recognize cheerleading as an official sport and only half of the nation's high school athletic associations do, cheerleading companies cultivate and maintain close working relationships with school coaches and administrators. These companies by and large oppose the official classification of cheerleading as a sport, for both financial and ideological reasons.

Although the notion of competition is itself not new—interscholastic high school contests were organized as early as 1944—the last two decades have witnessed an increasing emphasis on competition relative to other dimensions of the cheerleading experience. The rapid rise of all-star gyms in the late 1990s is both a cause and consequence of this development. All-star clubs are private, for-profit programs where children as young as 6 years old receive intensive instruction in cheerleading, including gymnastics. They exist solely to compete with other all-star cheer clubs within their own extensive network of competitions. As a nonscholastic site for learning cheerleading skills, all-star programs initially served as a training ground for high school and college cheer programs but are now popular in their own right.

All-star participants have a more singular identity compared with competitive school cheerleaders, who support athletic competition and engage in competition themselves—a duality reflected in the competition setting when school teams are required to incorporate a sideline ("spirit") component into their routines, judged according to its own subset of criteria. (A competition routine typically lasts 2 1/2 minutes; set to popular music, it is a choreographed blend of stunting, pyramid building, tumbling, dancing, and/or cheering.) The ideological tension between the sideline and competitive facets of cheerleading is heightened by the rise of the all-star phenomenon, with proponents of one side laying claim to authenticity and tradition and proponents of the other side laying claim to innovation and change. Currently, all-star cheer is the fastest-growing segment of the industry and, because of its exclusive focus on competition, is more likely than school cheerleading to be considered a "real" sport.

The Gender Politics of Contemporary Cheerleading

The athleticism of modern cheerleading has given the activity new status. The sport classification is attractive to participants more for the respect and recognition that goes with the label than for the official designation per se. Indeed, at the college level, there are benefits to being exempt from NCAA guidelines and eligibility rules, as collegiate cheerleaders currently are. Historically, sports have been a male preserve, and they command respect because they are associated with "masculine" ideals of strength, skill, competitiveness, and aggression. Women—particularly white, middle-class women—are often channeled into "gender-appropriate" sports such as gymnastics or figure skating, which are trivialized by the sports establishment. When women participate in traditionally masculine sports, they risk being branded "mannish" and "unfeminine" (implying "lesbian"). In the case of cheerleading, the sportlike elements have combined with, not replaced, the stereotypically feminine elements, making the gender politics of the activity complex, particularly in the coed context.

Cheerleading remains "feminine" not only in terms of its supportive, sideline function, but also in the performance and appearance demands placed on women: short skirts, hair ribbons, and makeup and the expectation to smile constantly and express enthusiasm. Competitive cheer is even more highly feminized than sideline cheer insofar as there is a heightened emphasis on showmanship and performativity for both male and female participants. Although there are stylistic variations among the cheerleading companies that oversee competitions, competition routines are typically loud, fast, and energetic. They exude glitz, glamour, and glitter, particularly in the all-star context: Bows are extra large, makeup is extra sparkly, and dance moves are brash and sexy. For males, too, the performance demands are heightened; depending on the company sponsoring the competition, they might be expected to dance, smile, and "work the audience" right along with their female counterparts, in addition to tumbling and throwing impressive stunts. Some all-star competitions even permit men to "fly"—be thrown in the air or held aloft in a stunt—which in scholastic cheerleading is a role restricted to female cheerleaders. Generally speaking, scholastic cheerleading takes a more conservative approach to the male role than all-star cheerleading, and within the college scene, the UCA is more conservative than the NCA.

In the larger culture, the feminine elements of cheerleading undermine its status as a sport and expose male participants to homophobia, because these elements are at odds with conventional notions of heterosexual masculinity. Cheerleading deals with the tension between performativity and masculinity by having clearly differentiated male and female uniforms and a gendered division of labor on coed teams: Men base, women fly; in sideline contexts, men wield flags and megaphones, and women wield smiles and pom-poms. Cheerleading also muddies gender distinctions when, in certain competition settings, boys/men are permitted to dance and "fly" and be as spirited as girls/women. Moreover, regardless of their specific actions, by becoming cheerleaders, men are participating in a traditionally "feminine" arena.

Cheerleading appears less iconoclastic when it comes to female participants, since this arena is largely consistent with mainstream ideas about heterosexual femininity. In a postfeminist era, it is permissible, even expected, for women to be tough and physically fit as well as sexy. Like figure skating, cheerleading affords women the status of "athlete" but in a relatively "safe" context, because the question of sexuality is seemingly resolved in the "right" direction. This is true even for female bases on all-female teams, since they are subject to the same feminine performance and appearance demands as flyers. In this way, cheerleading is not more or less progressive or conservative than other forms of popular culture in the United States, but rather serves as an important barometer of the gender politics at play in society at large.

For this reason, "alternative" forms of cheerleading have emerged in recent years alongside the mainstream variants discussed above. An extensive national network of adult LBGTI (lesbian, bisexual, gay, transsexual, and intersexed) teams (modeled after Cheer San Francisco, the oldest and largest) perform at community and gay pride events; and "radical cheerleaders," groups of young feminist activists, use cheerleading as a vehicle for protesting social injustice. Instead of performing traditional cheers on the sidelines of a sporting event, radical cheerleaders attend rallies and marches armed with their own cheers opposing poverty, racism, gender discrimination, and environmental degradation. Although less popular and less visible than mainstream cheerleading, these alternative groups similarly use the energy, spirit, and performativity of cheerleading to communicate with and influence audiences. If scholastic and all-star cheerleading by and large sustain and reproduce conventional gender arrangements, "alternative" forms of cheerleading help make the conventions visible and therefore more amenable to change.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE, GENDER IMAGES IN

As an adult enterprise, children's literature socializes the child to accept the values and symbolic structures of society. Through the power of story, the young reader is allowed to explore but always for the purpose of accepting or rejecting social communities that adults desire or fear. European settlers brought to North America a long tradition of European book culture, including the Bible, but they neglected or rejected the oral traditions of Native Americans or enslaved Africans. A specifically American children's literature developed very gradually in the colonies and through the first half century of the republic. "The golden age of children's literature" began to flourish only after the Civil War. Continuity and change in social expectations and values marked each stage. Even in the taboo-breaking narratives of the 1960s and 1970s, we find themes and motifs of earlier stories. Because the child continually moves toward becoming an adult, depictions of gender socializations are considered especially formative in children's literature. As historical contexts and social needs change, so do gender roles; and therefore definitions of childhood, children's literature, and gender identity are fluid and indeterminate.

Early Settlers and Colonists

Two contrasting traditions shaped early American perceptions of children and their reading material: the Calvinist Puritan tradition and rationalist Lockean psychology. Puritans perceived the child as being born sinful. Childhood gender socialization was not important to Calvinist Protestants; instead, all children were to be literate in order to be able to read the Bible and safeguard their immortal souls. Titles such as John Cotton's Milk for Babes, Drawn Out of the Breasts of Both Testaments (1646) and Spiritual Milk for Boston Babes in Either England (1656) and Cotton Mather's A Token for the Children of New England. Or Some Examples of Children to Whom the Fear of God Was Remarkably

Budding Before They Dyed (1700) were gender inclusive and implied that hortatory religious instruction, the state of grace, and an early death might guarantee salvation.

In Some Thoughts Concerning Education (1693), the English philosopher John Locke claimed that the child's mind at birth is a blank slate and that the right sensations and thoughts inscribed upon it would shape an adult with rational behavior patterns and moral character. Stories could teach boys and girls through precept and example to be reasonable and civil human beings who could distinguish right from wrong.

John Newbery, an English publisher, greatly influenced early childhood reading in England and North America. Newbery combined Lockean philosophy with a modicum of fantasy and clever marketing skills by publishing A Little Pretty Pocketbook (1744), a miscellany of rhymes and fables for boys and girls. Its fictional preface, a letter from "Jack the Giant Killer," addressed the child as "Master Tommy" or "Miss Polly," assuming that both genders would be loving and kind to their playfellows, keep clean, do their reading, and apologize when they had committed a wrong. Newbery's advertising ploy marks the first recorded gender differentiation in children's literature. Today, Newbery's influence extends to the annual Newbery Award given by the American Library Association to the best narrative for children.

The New Republic, 1790–1860

Protestant Christianity continued its influence on 19th century American children's literature but was tempered by the Enlightenment. By the time the colonies became the United States, gender differentiations had become part of childhood reading and prepared the young to accept the "two spheres": Boys were to become men engaged in matters of public life, and girls were taught to be republican wives and mothers who taught virtue and morality to the next generation in the safe harbor of the home.

There was no surge of creativity in children's literature as the young republic constituted itself; instead, Noah Webster devised a "Federal Catechism," and for inspiration, Parson Mason Locke Weems offered The Life and Memorable Actions of George Washington (1800) and The Life of Washington the Great (1806), which included the cherry tree story and foreshadowed the divinely ordained destiny of the republic's secular saint. Christianity affirmed itself through "The Great Awakening" and through the Sunday school movement, so influential for stories about good girls and good boys.

The abolitionist movement had a significant moral impact on childhood reading. Boys saw themselves as agents of change, but girls had the power of pathos, especially when near death, as in Anna Richardson's Little Laura: The Kentucky Abolitionist (1859). The girl as teacher and redeemer reaches an apotheosis in the death of Little Eva in Harriet Beecher Stowe's immensely influential Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852). Considered family reading by the author, the story sold 1.5 million copies the first year before it became a global best seller. Little Eva is the golden-haired "savior" and Tom is "her faithful bearer," who knew her best. Uncle Tom's Cabin is crossover literature between generations and genders; it is against the institution of slavery but does not advocate racial equality.

The Golden Age of Children's Literature, 1868–1914

Commissioned as a novel for girls, Louisa May Alcott's Little Women (1868) survived its predecessors because of its literary qualities and psychological realism. The education of the young March girls still involves Christian and republican values, but the four sisters assert their individuality and question conventional gender roles with their author's progressive ideas on women's education, career desires, and civil rights. As women of their time, however, they must compromise and learn to accept conventional roles. Critics have observed that young women's aspirations are often subtly undermined by rituals of humiliation, for pride in achievements would not make them acceptant of their destined roles. Nowhere is this more evident than in the gender ambivalence of Jo March. High spirited, intelligent, and attractive, the budding author has her long hair cut for money to provide for her father's comfort. She eventually avoids becoming a "literary spinster, with a pen for a spouse" by marrying a widowed German professor. In Jo's Boys (1886), she and her husband open a boarding school for boys, where she can fulfill her roles as wife and teacher.

Freed of sentimental pieties, postbellum boys enjoyed a more adventurous life and made their fortunes, as did Raggedy Dick in Horatio Alger's stories (1867–1870). The mischievous but good-natured all-American boy made his debut in Samuel Clemens's (a.k.a. Mark Twain) The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876) and was superseded by the more complex and problematical Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), whose orphaned adolescent male narrator is a prototype of unattached adolescents in the American experience. Huck says of himself, "I felt so lonesome I most wished I was dead." The boy believes that he has broken the law by helping Jim escape from slavery and does not care if he goes to hell for lying to the slave hunters. Yet his youthful quest does not enable him to mature. By the end of the story, he still refuses to be civilized and will "light out for the territory ahead," unencumbered by kin or possessions. He is a lost boy who fails to acknowledge the pain of the past through self-reflection and remains the perpetually uncommitted male adolescent or young adult who continues to haunt much of adult and juvenile American literature, including Salinger's Catcher in the Rye (1951).

Unlike the boys and girls contextualized in the abolitionist movement, Huck cannot imagine a society without slaves. He can only escape the violent oppression of the patriarchal society, though his author is well aware that slaves have been emancipated and the Western destiny has been manifested. Clemens seemingly could not bring himself to raise Huck's problematical self into self-awareness and instead had him resort to pranks and slapstick humor to avoid insight and maturation. Inadvertently perhaps, Clemens contributed to our understanding of a fundamental problem of the socialization of the American male.

That same year, Frances Hodgson Burnett published her very successful Little Lord Fauntleroy (1884), the antithesis of Huckleberry Finn. With his cascading curls, velvet suit, and lace collar, Cedric seems a feminized boy child. His image was so desirable that it inspired a fashion trend, to the delight of American mothers and the resentment of their sons. Emphasizing the traditional connectedness of England and United States, Burnett had Cedric inherit the name and wealth of a British aristocratic line. Cedric is still "little" and can afford his feminized appearance. His self-confident persona barely conceals a democrat and future leader who believes in equality and rights. Scholars have offered various interpretations of Burnett's "gender-blending," including the argument that the feminization of the little boy at a time of very empowered "masculinity" is actually a respite from the pressures of the patriarchal cultures in the United States and Britain.

Modern American Children's and Young Adult Literature

The forms, contents, and themes in children's literature proliferated in the 20th century and continue to do so today. Taboos were overcome as young readers sought answers to personal and social problems that family and school refused to address. The pressures of censorship became intense, teachers and librarians were dismissed, and some books such as Alice Childress's A Hero Ain't Nothin but a Sandwich even reached U.S. Supreme Court. The young can turn to depictions of the human "heart of darkness" or empower themselves with the magic of J. K. Rowling's Harry Potter. Gender issues have continued to occupy readers, publishers, social scientists, and critics.

Gender socialization made it easier for girls to read boys' stories than the other way around. One constant remained in that children's literature was primarily a middle-class product for the socialization of young readers and maintained the separation between genders.

After 1910, when the Stratemeyer publishing syndicate launched the "Automobile Girl" series, it became evident that the automobile would emancipate the American girl. The successful mystery series of the Hardy Boys (1927) prompted the syndicate to combine automobile stories with the mystery genre in 1930 in the series "Nancy Drew Girl Detective." The Secret of the Old Clock introduced Nancy Drew as "an attractive girl of eighteen . . . driving home along a country road in her new, dark blue convertible. She had just delivered some legal papers for her father." By 1934, the series had outsold every other children's book. American girls may have conformed to gender expectations, but to be free like Nancy Drew became a secret desire of young female readers. Author Mildred Wirt Benson went on to write the first 23 books of the series, under the pseudonym Carolyn Keene.

Laura Ingalls Wilder's fictional memoirs, "The Little House Books" (1932–1943), were written in collaboration with her daughter Rose Wilder Lane and followed the theme of growing up on the frontier. From Little House in the Woods to These Happy Golden Years, youngsters learned much about Western expansion; recent scholarship, however, not only has focused on Laura Ingalls's development as a child and young woman but has also explored the sociopolitical subtext of the books. Laura's mother and sisters are conventional in their gender socialization, but Laura is her father's daughter in that she absorbs and accepts the patriarchal order of things, especially her father's belief that self-reliance and self-sufficiency is the American way and that it is wrong for the government to interfere with the settlers. Charles Ingalls, Laura's father, easily uproots the family and moves to "the territory ahead." The girls and their mother struggle throughout the series with gender issues, primarily with the tension between the freedom of rugged individualism and the need for relations in a settled community. As author and character, Laura is feminine in her appearance and masculine in accepting her father's rugged individualism.

Because its characters are prepubescent, E. B. White's pastoral Charlotte's Web (1952) appeals to both sexes. Gender socialization is gradual and natural as Fern Arable rehearses for motherhood by caring for Wilbur, the runt pig, while her brother displays himself as a coltish boy with wooden sword. Fern is a daydreamy silent observer of the barnyard fantasy of talking animals. Wilbur is the self-indulgent, insecure, and tantrum-prone boy pig. As she matures, Fern loses interest in the barnyard, joins Henry Fussy for a Ferris wheel ride, and experiences the cycle of the seasons. It is Charlotte, the spider, good friend, and writer, who supervises Wilbur's growing emancipation.

Judy Blume's Are You There, God? It's Me, Margaret (1970) and Forever (1975) were guides for young boys and girls to learn about menstruation, first sexual experiences, and birth control. Though not a feminist writer, Blume liberated young heterosexuality—as long as it was unambiguous. In Forever, the character of Artie is unsure of his sexuality. He is interested in drama, attempts suicide, and is institutionalized, all reminiscent of the punitive tradition in sexual nonconformity.

Since the 1880s, girls have been consistently defined as readers. They read books about both genders and therefore generally are much more informed about boys than boys are about girls. While girls play a range of role models in fictional narratives that sometimes sound like case studies, stories for boys have a more limited range. Cultural pressures, argues critic Yoshida Junko in her discussion of Cormier's The Chocolate War (1974), force boys to conceal their anxiety and emotion for the sake of appearing cool and in control. Whatever the needs of growing boys may be, cultural norms discourage the young, white, middle-class, heterosexual male from reading about girls. The Chocolate War presents the dark side of the masculine order that its antagonist and victim, Jerry Renault, dares to challenge. He pays a high price through ostracism and physical and psychological injury. The adolescent as isolate, foreshadowed by Huck Finn, is here defined as the abject who has values unacceptable to a difference-intolerant male gang culture. Cormier shows that this dehumanization of the male victim and the male perpetrator limits our understanding of the relation between genders and generations.

Gender socialization in contemporary literature for young readers presents the problems of modern life, where traditional definitions of family and personal individuation have been decentered. The two-spheres narratives encouraged in the new republic persist, though the goals of that gender socialization have changed. The divide between boys' stories and girls' stories is both deeper and wider today because of the emphasis on peer culture over integration of the youngster with adult relations, public or private. The privileging of the first-person narrative point of view has encouraged an additional divide, a generational divide between the adult project of children's literature and its young consumers.

CHILD SUPPORT

Child support is a financial obligation that noncustodial parents must uphold for their dependent children. Support payments reinforce the biological connection between parent and child, regardless of residence or the existence of a social tie. The enforcement and calculation of child support varies from state to state, but all states agree that noncustodial parents, regardless of their gender, have an individual responsibility to provide for their children.

Brief History of Child Support

The obligation of child support is not a new policy initiative. Centuries ago, the first child support enforcement began in England in an effort to hold unwed parents accountable for their careless behavior. English taxpayers did not see supporting children born out of wedlock as their responsibility; thus, mothers were pressured to name the fathers of their children. Fathers, in turn, were expected to marry the mother, pay child support, or serve time in prison. The preferred option was for couples to marry.

Throughout the history of child support, the emphasis placed on individual responsibility for children has remained consistent. At the beginning of the 20th century, most U.S. states made financial support available for dependent children, but for the most part, children born outside of marriage were not eligible for this assistance, and mothers who claimed abandonment were often not believed. The solution to this problem was to make fathers accountable for supporting their children. As a result, 46 states passed laws criminalizing desertion and nonsupport. Unfortunately, these laws were ineffective, and a number of children became wards of the state.

In 1935, Aid to Dependent Families, which later became Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC), was developed to support families whose fathers had died. By the 1960s, the agency responsible for administering this program made aid eligible to virtually all children who did not have fathers present in the home. While the government assisted these children financially, the ultimate goal was to locate absent fathers and hold them accountable for support. This goal of personal responsibility was reminiscent of early Anglo-American law.

These early measures were important for establishing a precedent that encouraged parental responsibility, but these efforts were not always effective. Fathers often could not be located and when located, still failed to pay support. It was not until the 1980s that mothers' groups and New Right conservatives joined forces to reiterate the need for noncustodial fathers to provide financial support for their children. Specific legislation was passed during this time that stipulated how support awards were determined and allocated. The Family Support Act of 1988 required states to develop guidelines that determined the amount of support a noncustodial parent had to pay, implement automatic deduction of support payments from wages, and create and operate a computerized system that tracked and monitored support payments. These changes were made to ensure that custodial parents (usually mothers) would receive an adequate amount of money to support their children and that delinquent noncustodial parents would be held accountable. These modifications made in the 1980s were directly related to the high level of arrearages in the 1970s and early 1980s.

Throughout the history of child support policy, it has been assumed that mothers receive custody of children and that fathers are responsible for payment of child support. Today, this is not always the case. The number of custodial fathers has more than doubled since the 1980s. This increase is due in part to the emphasis placed on gender neutrality in the family courts. Both mothers and fathers are seen as viable candidates for custody until proven otherwise. Regardless of who has custody of children, some form of financial support is expected, and often mandated, from the noncustodial parent. Scholars are divided as to whether the receipt and payment of support is connected to the gender of the noncustodial parent or if this is a gender-neutral issue.

Demographics of Receipt and Payment of Support

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, an estimated 14 million parents had custody of 21.6 million children under the age of 21 in 2004; 83% of these parents were mothers, and 16% were fathers. Of this 14 million, 60% (8.4 million) had a court-mandated child support order, yet 83% of these individuals had not received the full amount of support ordered. On average, custodial mothers were less likely than custodial fathers to receive support. More specifically, statistics indicated that 9 out of 10 parents not receiving support were mothers. This has been the trend since early in the history of child support.

Child support orders may be drafted through formal or informal channels. Generally speaking, parents utilize family court services to create formal agreements that stipulate visitation and financial support of children. Statistics indicate that custodial mothers are more likely to receive formal support awards than custodial fathers and when support is paid, mothers tend to receive higher amounts of money than do fathers.

Previous marital status, race, education, and number of children are other factors that affect child support orders. More specifically, custodial parents who never marry or are separated, are black or Hispanic, have less than a high school education, or have only one child are less likely to have a formal child support order in place. Even when a formal order exists, support payment is influenced by custody arrangement as well as the relationship between the parents.

Gender and Child Support

Given the large number of custodial mothers in the United States, fathers typically are the parents held responsible for providing child support. Despite governmental attempts to hold fathers accountable for paying support, some fathers are still able to slip under the radar and avoid payment. In fact, when children are born outside of marriage, fathers are less likely to have formal child support orders and if mandated to pay support generally do not follow through with this financial responsibility.

When this happens, both women and children suffer, as they are often in financially precarious positions. Previously married mothers may have spent most of their married lives as stay-at-home moms, compromising their ability to find gainful employment after divorce. Even mothers who were employed during their marriages suffer hardships as they transition from dual-earner to single-earner homes. This is especially true when mothers earned significantly less than their husbands. Never-married mothers face the same dilemmas: a labor market that does not provide equitable job opportunities for mothers with dependent children. Thus, mothers rely on child support as supplemental income to meet children's needs.

Children of single mothers are much more likely to be poor than children in other living arrangements. An increase in mothers' income through child support payments leads to better life chances for children and for ameliorating delinquency, poor health, and low educational attainment. In addition to alleviating these negative affects, evidence also indicates that fathers who pay child support are more likely to visit their children. Thus, children's financial and socioemotional lives are much improved when child support is paid.

Given the lower numbers of noncustodial mothers in our society, research on this population is scant. The little research that does exist indicates that support orders for noncustodial mothers are lower than those for noncustodial fathers and that they also fail to pay support. These findings have led scholars to question whether lack of payment is a gender issue or a noncustodial-parent issue.

Some scholars point to the gendered nature of noncustodial mothers' experiences with paying support. On average, men earn more money than women. When calculating child support payments, men's higher earnings lead to higher support amounts. In contrast, the lower earnings of noncustodial mothers result in lower support orders. Their lower standards of living also contribute to the likelihood that mothers may not be able to simultaneously support themselves while paying child support. Higher levels of income for custodial fathers has led some to argue that receipt of child support is not as vital for the support of children in these cases as it is for custodial mothers.

Contrary to this position, other scholars have argued that child support is important for children's well-being, regardless of which parent is making the payments. These individuals do not see nonpayment of support as a gender issue. Although mothers may earn less than fathers, child support is partially calculated using the income of the parent. Thus, theoretically, a parent will pay only what he or she can afford when all other financial obligations are taken into consideration. These scholars argue that it is not the gender of the parent that leads to nonpayment of support; it is the structure of noncustodial parenting. Some gender-neutral factors cited as contributing to nonpayment include inability to visit children, not having control over how support payments are used, and general animosity between parents.

Conclusion

Historical shifts have brought interesting changes to the landscape of child custody and support. Today, mothers and fathers are viewed as equals in custody cases, but primary custody of children is still most often awarded to mothers, and fathers generally are ordered to pay child support. Policy advocates and some scholars argue that payment of support is important for children's well-being regardless of the gender of the noncustodial parent. Given the poor financial circumstances of single custodial mothers when compared with custodial fathers, it becomes apparent that payment of support is of particular importance to children in these homes, as it ameliorates poor living conditions. To date, policies continue to be restructured in attempts to encourage noncustodial parents to financially support their children. What is missing from our understanding of child support is an in-depth examination of payment of support by noncustodial mothers. Research of this nature would inform the current gender versus noncustodial parent debate.

CHIVALRY

In the Middle Ages, chivalry was a synonym of knighthood, describing either the reality of being a knight or the virtues associated with idealized portrayals of knights in medieval literature and culture. Thus, the degree of a man's chivalry was measured by his adherence to codes of behavior that might vary with time and place but would always include skill and bravery in battle ("prowess"), personal responsibility and dignity ("honor"), and a reverent and protective stance toward women, translated into direct action to help a woman in need or in danger ("service"). This last aspect of chivalry, which is most commonly referenced today when a man is called "chivalrous," usually consists of a man's willingness to inconvenience himself for the benefit of a woman, for example, by opening a door for a female companion or by stopping on the highway to assist a stranded motorist. Such chivalry continues to be perceived as a masculine quality: A woman performing these same actions might be praised as "considerate" or even as "courteous," but not as "chivalrous."

The cultural resonances of the term chivalry have changed repeatedly since its medieval origins, but chivalry as a collective ideal has been closely associated with issues of gender and power. Originally denoting an entirely masculine sphere of operations, chivalry later became a word associated with particular dysfunctions in male-female relationships, then an ideal designed to remedy those dysfunctions by promoting a masculine identity centered on devotion to women. More recently, in the often-quoted phrase "Chivalry is dead," this ideal is preserved in a nostalgic reference to positive aspects of male-female relations that the speaker believes to have been extinguished by transformative modern forces such as democratization, industrialization, and the feminist movement.

Chivalry in the Middle Ages

The English word chivalry was derived directly from the French word chevalerie, meaning literally "exploits on horseback." When French first became a written language (10th and 11th centuries), the connotations of this word were military: It emphasized the great difference in status between low-ranking members of the infantry and men from the nobility, who alone were trained to ride into battle on costly warhorses. In French texts from this early period, one already finds the superlative description of a few noble warriors as "flowers of chivalry," a metaphor suggesting their fully developed embodiment of collective ideals: Those ideals were entirely military, however, having to do with how a mounted warrior interacted with men rather than with women.

Just as a man called a chevalier was being distinguished from a warrior who fought on foot, this term also distinguished him from other members of the nobility, those who had become priests or whose primary occupation was the governing of their families' ancestral lands. Landowners did go to war on horseback, but a man whose primary title was chevalier was likely to be a younger son from a noble family, someone who fought to defend his family's claim to a certain piece of land but who could not expect to inherit or govern that piece of land and thus whose access to wealth and power would always be limited. In a time when many legal matters were decided by combat or by a judge, rather than by written laws and contracts, ambitious younger sons could acquire their own territories by military conquest, especially if they could kidnap and/or marry by force a woman for whom such territories had been designated as a marriage dowry. During this period, therefore, apprehension arose about the tendency among some younger sons to leave their families' lands and move about the countryside alone or in bands of mounted warriors, seeking opportunities for such unauthorized plunder and for the social climbing that could result from it.

Beginning in the 12th century, it became a deliberate strategy of the dominant culture to promote a new definition of chivalry that went beyond military strength to encompass ethical personal conduct, especially toward women. Yet the gradual development of certain prominent feudal lands into nations during this same period (12th and 13th centuries) meant that a young knight without land could gain great wealth and influence through loyal service to a king: That is, he could do so if he were able to prove his own trustworthiness. Therefore, what the new, idealized chivalry offered to the young knight was a new measure of dignity and a new and easier path toward worldly success.

The new phenomenon of written literature in languages other than Latin (particularly Old French, which was the language of the dominant culture in both France and England from the 11th to the 14th centuries) provided an appropriate arena in which to promote this redefinition of chivalry. Texts recounting the legends of King Arthur, in particular, lent themselves well to this project. For instance, Arthur was represented as a powerful but wise king reigning over a vast territory by delegating power to a select group of younger knights whose military strength would allow them to excel at the king's missions and eventually be rewarded with wealth and power of their own. The drive toward personal excellence among the sympathetic knights in these stories was explicitly shown to have replaced the drive toward simple dominance by any means necessary or available, which continued to motivate the villains of Arthurian literature. Because noble women were important patrons of such chivalric literature, they helped to set its agenda and also made up a significant proportion of its audience, which ensured that romantic episodes and those promoting ethical conduct toward women would receive consistent attention in literary dramatizations of the new chivalry. Since this was a competitive model in which the goal for each knight was to be perceived as the best man in every respect, a tendency toward inflation was built into it: The most successful of the resulting literary texts thus featured knights such as Lancelot, who were simultaneously the best fighters and the most passionate and respectful lovers that the world had ever known.

Chivalry as a collective ideal continued to dominate the literary and social culture of the late Middle Ages and beyond (14th to 16th centuries) and took on some new forms: guidebooks for chivalrous conduct proliferated, debates were held about how a virtuous knight might resolve various ethical dilemmas, and new orders of knighthood were founded to garner the support of noble men for particular beliefs, virtues, or military projects. Literary texts also adopted new attitudes toward chivalry: Alongside new versions of traditional legends, now sometimes adapted for wider, nonnoble audiences, texts appeared featuring parodies of chivalric conduct, the best of which served as perceptive social commentaries and thus remain classics of world literature (such as Cervantes's Don Quixote or Ariosto's Orlando Furioso).

Chivalry in the Modern Era

In the16th through 18th centuries, political and economic changes made knighthood obsolete as a primary occupation, but chivalry remained a significant cultural ideal, and some noble men continued to belong to chivalric orders as a way of enhancing their political or social affiliations. Beginning in the late 18th century, as democracy became the new cultural ideal of many, chivalry was increasingly associated with political and cultural conservatism or even nostalgia. It was in this context that Edmund Burke, in a 1790 commentary on the French Revolution, wrote a famous passage on the demise of chivalry, which is believed to be the source of today's expression "Chivalry is dead," even though those precise words appear nowhere in it.

Burke's formulation is simple: Manliness is the heart of chivalry, and chivalry underpins aristocratic hegemony, which, in turn, is the source and essence of European "glory." Burke's statement was a harbinger of a nostalgia for chivalry which found its fullest expression in the "Arthurian revival" in European literature of the early 19th century. In particular, novels by Sir Walter Scott, such as Ivanhoe (1819), fostered among members of the ruling elite a longing to live by an idealized chivalric code. Toward the end of the century, Alfred Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1885) and the paintings of the pre-Raphaelite artists reframed the Arthurian legend for Victorian audiences. Literary and film versions of the Arthurian and other chivalric legends continue to proliferate to this day and may seek to express a variety of ideological viewpoints, usually with an emphasis on masculine identity and/or gender relations (e.g., the films The Fisher King, 1991, or First Knight, 1995).

Leading up to the American Civil War, the dominant classes of the southern states defended the legitimacy of a social order based on what they insisted were chivalric principles. This conception of social order found support in European literature of preceding decades. Its romantic viewpoint was opposed to the perceived soullessness of the republican egalitarianism and common sense of the North. In Life on the Mississippi, Mark Twain claimed that Sir Walter Scott should be held responsible for the Civil War, since his novels had so influenced the ideals and behavior of generations of Southern men and women. Mark Twain's Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889) was an Arthurian novel with both comic and political twists, serving as a defense of republican common sense against what he saw as a willful return to medieval backwardness. Twain notwithstanding, chivalric romanticism survived the Civil War in the South. As an ideology, it was openly propagated in the notorious classic film Birth of a Nation. The Ku Klux Klan, especially in its second (20th-century) manifestation, draped itself in outward symbols of knighthood. This pseudo-chivalry was not fully discredited as a viable political course at a mainstream level until the time of the civil rights movement. Until that time, hate crimes were committed with some frequency against blacks by whites, including members of the Ku Klux Klan, ostensibly in defense of (white) womanly virtue. An ideology that originated in part as a means of limiting violence against women had thus become a justification for terrorizing a subordinate population.

Two Sides to Chivalry

On one hand, chivalry originated as a code of the ruling class and has been used in various ways to justify privilege and oppression since. In particular, it has served the institutions of aristocracy, gender-exclusive suffrage, and slavery. On the other hand, chivalry also originated as a means of establishing social order and protecting the vulnerable, especially women, and in its long history, it has undeniably been useful in this way on many occasions. For example, until 1998, the Geneva Conventions treated rape as a "crime against honor," alluding to a code of chivalry in providing some limited protection against rape during wartime. Now rape is considered by international law as a form of torture and an issue of universal human rights rather than one of personal honor. Undoubtedly, this change is for the better, but its recent date is a reminder of the previously crucial role of chivalry in preventing some abuses of power.

CHRISTIAN COALITION

The Christian Coalition (CC) is a conservative, Protestant, grassroots movement, heavily dependent upon the financial backing and time of thousands of supporters. It differs from its predecessor, the Moral Majority, because it seeks to effect local and state politics as well as national politics. By taking on local and school board elections, education systems have been significantly affected in many states, particularly in regard to sex education, homosexuality, "humanist" values, and creationism in the classroom. The CC was formed in 1989 by Pat Robertson, a Pentecostal minister. Despite a failed presidential run, Robertson found huge pockets of support for the organization through his television show, The 700 Club, and his creation, The Family Channel. At the height of the organization's power, it took center stage in the Christian Right. The CC believes that America has backslid from its Christian values and that issues such as abortion, feminism, and gay rights further detract from the nation's potential to reclaim its Christian heritage. The organization also takes a strong stance in support of Israel and lower taxes. The mission of the CC is as follows:

> Represent the pro-family point of view before local councils, school boards, state legislatures and Congress; Speak out in the public arena and in the media; Train leaders for effective social and political action; Inform pro-family voters about timely issues and legislation; Protest anti-Christianity bigotry and defend the rights of people of faith. (http://www.cc.org/about.cfm)

During the organization's high point, it claimed 2.8 million members and 2,000 local chapters nationwide. As of 2006, the organization boasted 2 million members, though critics say the number is, in fact, far less. To date, each election year, the CC mounts major campaigns to promote traditional family values platforms. In 2004, the group distributed approximately 30 million voter guides in targeted states and congressional districts deemed politically competitive.

The organization has faced slumping membership and some controversy since 1997, when Ralph Reed, a key political strategist, left the CC. Pat Robertson resigned in December 2001, and Roberta Combs assumed the presidency of the organization. In 2002, the CC settled a lawsuit with African American staff, who charged that the organization discriminated against them, making them use back entrances while white staff utilized front entrances. In the last 5 years, the CC has faced increasing debt and numerous lawsuits from creditors. To date, only seven states hold chapters of the CC. In 2006, Joel Hunter was elected president of the organization. Hunter resigned his spot soon after, noting that his desire that the CC focus on issues such as AIDS, poverty, and the environment conflicted with priorities of the board of the CC.

CHRISTIANITY, STATUS OF WOMEN IN

With more than 2 billion adherents, Christianity has become one of the largest religions in recorded human history. Christianity exerts considerable sociopolitical influence in many societies, especially the specific roles that have been prescribed for women.

Constructing the Christian Woman

From Mary Magdalene to Mother Theresa, women have maintained prominent positions both in the New Testament and subsequent Christian movements. The vast majority of biblical and religious scholars agree that Jesus treated women as equals and had intimate friendships with them. Likewise, in Paul's epistle to the Romans, he positively addresses a colleague named Phoebe and identifies her as a minister from Cenchrea. In Galatians 3:28, according to the New Revised Standard Version of the New Testament, Paul writes, "There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus." Although it was long believed that Paul penned the texts prohibiting women from a variety of leadership positions in the early church, including Ephesians and 1 Timothy, most experts now believe these letters were not written by Paul. Rather, these books of the New Testament were created after Paul's execution and during a time when early Christianity was debating the role and place of women. Jesus's message of gender equality often fell upon deaf ears, including his disciples.' Indeed, the patriarchal culture from which Christianity emerged and grew championed scriptural references to the inferior status of women and minorities over themes of equality and social justice.

The consequences of male domination for Christian women have been felt since the first years after the death of Jesus. Images and stories of Mary Magdalene morphed from a vocal leader of early Christian communities to a passively repentant prostitute. For the vast majority of the past two millennia, Christian women have been forbidden from joining the priesthood and from becoming high-ranking clergy officials within the hierarchy of denominational administrations. In addition to scriptural interpretation, the church has argued that since Jesus was a man, it is impossible for a woman to fully emulate his intellect, authority, and spirituality. Only recently, in light of feminist theologies and the historic discovery of the Gospel of Mary, have scholars begun to reassess the role of women during and immediately after the ministry of Jesus. This has had profound implications for shattering the "stain-glassed ceiling" that kept women from becoming clergy.

Consecrating the Christian Woman

A clear measure of women's status in contemporary Christianity is whether they are permitted to become ordained leaders of faith communities. Beginning with Roman Catholicism and its 1 billion members, women are barred from the priesthood. Although they can enter holy orders and take vows as nuns, women are forbidden from performing the sacraments, including the Eucharist, confession/reconciliation, and baptism. The Eastern Orthodox churches are very much like Roman Catholicism. For Protestants, many denominations and congregations continue to deny women the right to become priests, pastors, and ministers. They include but are not limited to the Southern Baptist Convention, the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, and most conservative evangelical and fundamentalist congregations. To be sure, change has occurred slowly, and the likelihood of policy changes in the near future is slim at best.

Mainstream Protestant denominations, for the most part, have been ordaining women for at least the past three decades. The Evangelical Lutheran Church, Presbyterian Church, Anglican/Episcopal Church, United Methodist Church, United Church of Christ, and American Baptist churches are among these traditions. Women are now serving as bishops and heading pastoral religious organizations. This is especially true of North America and Western Europe. There are segments of the Protestant population across the globe, however, mostly in the third world, that do not ordain women and have threatened to remove themselves from communion with any denomination that does. In general, religious groups having strong conservative and fundamentalist leanings are most likely to hold restrictive views on women's participation in running the church regardless of geographic or economic locations. In short, where patriarchal cultures persist, women endure subordinate positions in both the public and private sectors of religious existence.

Theologians, philosophers, and social scientists alike expect that as gender discrimination education and awareness continues to proliferate around the world, women will increasingly be included in all aspects of Christianity. Even for entities in Christianity that welcome women into leadership positions, progress has been sluggish, and women have often felt rejected, overlooked, and at times assaulted for aspiring to become religious leaders. This varies by race, socioeconomic status, age, sexual orientation, and so forth. These inequities are considered by many to be the growing pains in the body of Christ as Christianity enters its third millennium. As progress is made toward full inclusion of women and other oppressed groups, the global church is a more effective witness to the vision of social equality once promoted by its founder.

CHRISTIANITY AND HOMOSEXUALITY

The latter part of the 20th century has seen an increasing awareness of the intersection between gender identity and matters of religion and spirituality. As the social-scientific awareness of sexual "orientation" has increased, particularly among Western industrialized nations, the ambivalence with which Christian institutions approach homosexual persons and same-gendered relationships has also increased. In fact, it is virtually impossible to articulate a single Christian position on homosexuality at any point in history. Currently, however, in the first decade of the 21st century, the religious, moral, and social tensions between Christianity and homosexual persons have never been greater. Yet the complexity of the issue is often over-simplified either because of an inadequate appreciation for the diversity of positions promulgated about homosexuality among Christian denominations today or because of long-held cultural taboos and religious biases about the root "causes" of homosexuality. However, historical-critical interpretations of the Christian Bible are beginning to affect a paradigm shift in Christianity's approach to homosexuality, and many homosexual Christians who have often felt alienated by their respective traditions are discovering new ways to interpret the Bible and reclaim their faith. This essay traces some of these historically complex discussions.

A Diversity of Christian Perspectives

Some Christian institutions regard the mere fact of being homosexual as antithetical to authentic Christian life because acknowledging one's homosexual identity is misunderstood as a conscious choice against a presumed "natural" heterosexual orientation. Thus, more often than not, the conservative Christian debate on homosexuality is limited to questions of morals and ethics focused on homosexual "acts," rather than evaluating the broader context of interpersonal relationships. By contrast, more intellectually astute Christian denominations broaden the discussion beyond mere "acts" to include the nature and quality of the relationships in which sexual intimacy takes place. These more theologically progressive churches advocate for a contextually nuanced understanding of homosexuality, one that recognizes, first, that sexual orientation is not chosen, but "discovered" in an individual and, second, that there can be no meaningful discussion of moral culpability apart from the mitigating relational context in which such sexual activity takes place.

Not surprisingly, the spectrum of positions argued among Christians on homosexual relations is rooted in varying interpretive approaches to the Bible.

Primarily, two major distinctions can be observed: those churches that take a more literalist approach and those that have embraced historical-critical methods of interpretation. Literalist approaches have the benefit of appealing to the masses. A given passage is taken to mean precisely what it says, without questioning the historical context in which it was said, the original language in which it was written, the original audience to whom it was addressed, or the limitations of the author who originally wrote it. From this perspective, any biblical verse can be dislocated from its literary and historical context and used as a proof text to argue virtually any given ethical position. By contrast, the historical-critical approach to interpreting the Bible employs interpretive methods that necessarily take into account the historical development of each book within the Bible and do so in an analytical (i.e., "critical") manner. Questions about oral tradition, authorship, audience, history, linguistics, literary genre, translation, and transmission, among others, are systematically addressed in order to accurately determine the meaning of a biblical text. This approach is therefore far less accessible to the masses and has the disadvantage of requiring highly specialized historical, linguistic, and theological skills.

The Impact of Historical Criticism

The implications for interpreting the Bible from a historical-critical perspective can be illustrated through a brief examination of the first biblical reference to homosexuality, found in Genesis 19:1–11, the passage from which the term sodomy derived. The central importance of this passage revolves around the text of Genesis 19:5: "And they [the townsmen of Sodom] called to Lot, 'Where are the men who came to you tonight? Bring them out to us, so that we may know them'" (New Revised Standard Version).

When this narrative is situated in its proper cultural and historical context, two significant questions immediately present themselves. First, what precisely is the sin of Sodom? What did the townsmen of Sodom intend to do with Lot's visitors, and what was their motivation? Second, if Lot is being rescued from the destruction of Sodom because of his "righteousness" before God (Genesis 19:29), how is that reconciled with the fact the he was willing to offer up his own two daughters to the townsmen (Genesis 19:8)? If these women had been raped and survived the brutality, they would have forever remained social outcasts and unmarriageable for having lost their virginity beforehand (cf. Judges 19). How then is Lot's behavior excusable, much less exemplary? Contemporary Christian ethics could hardly condone his willingness to hand over his daughters to such a fate.

Historical-Critical Assessment

A historical-critical reading of the text will afford some answers. Of the 943 times that the Hebrew phrase to know appears in the Old Testament, the present context represents 1 of only 10 occasions in which the term carries a clear sexual implication, meaning "to have intercourse with." However, the story of Sodom is not about sexual ethics (as Lot's willingness to give up his daughters makes clear), but rather inhospitality to strangers, intensified by a most reprehensible form of sexually abusive behavior: gang rape. An examination of the social inequality between men and women reveals that the townsmen's motivation for wanting to "sodomize" the three male visitors was to humiliate them by treating them like women, whose social status in the ancient Near East was limited to that of being merely the "property" of men. Often, defeated soldiers were similarly raped by their victors, not merely to denigrate them but also to demonstrate that they were now the "property" of their aggressors, reduced to the subservient social status of a woman. In marriage, a woman was redeemed (literally "purchased") by her husband, whose property she then became. In view of this pervasive cultural perception, ancient Israelite society maintained a covenantal code of "sacred hospitality" that was extended to strangers, widows, and orphans because of the fact that these three classes of people were the most vulnerable to poverty, abuse, and harm (cf. Isaiah 1:10–11, 16–17). It is for this reason that in the narrative presently under consideration, Lot is regarded as righteous. He honors the sacred covenantal code of hospitality with the strangers whom he encounters, unaware that he was entertaining angels (cf. Hebrews 13:2).

Thus, Genesis 19:1–11, interpreted in its original historical context, cannot be so clearly cited as providing a sanction against homosexuality. It is certainly a clear and unequivocal condemnation of abusive and denigrating behavior toward another human person, which in this case takes the form of attempted gang rape. As such, from a historical-critical perspective, the Genesis 19 narrative condemns that which amounts to a grave breach of the covenantal code in which Israel came to understand its relationship with God and humanity.

Transcending Biblical Cultural Trappings

Even this brief historical-critical analysis of Genesis 19 suggests that although contemporary Christian ethics are at once rooted in Scripture, those ethics must also transcend that which is contained in the biblical texts themselves. If this were not so, Christians would still by and large regard Lot's willingness to offer his daughters to the mob as morally acceptable. As this is clearly not the case, the Genesis 19 narrative represents a case in point, whereby Christianity ultimately transcended the historical limitations of its own biblical canon, demanding that the contemporary reader acquire a higher ethical standard than the biblical characters themselves possess. The same development has occurred frequently within the past century, whereby, for example, despite biblical support for slavery (cf. Ephesians 6:5–9; Colossians 3:22–4:1; 1 Timothy 6:1–2; 1 Peter 2:18), no Christian church today would argue the ethical merits of possessing slaves.

Thus, with similar historical-critical arguments proposed for respective biblical passages, more churches today than ever before are beginning to conclude that the Bible offers no condemnation of homosexuality expressed within committed unions. In reaction, equally as many churches are entrenching themselves deeper into a rejection of homosexuals and same-gendered relationships altogether. Ironically, many churches that have enthusiastically embraced historical-critical methods of interpreting the Bible are nevertheless slow to accept the subsequent conclusions to which these methodologies invariable point. That is, the Bible is virtually silent about the issue of homosexuality as it is understood psychologically, sociologically, and biologically today. The authors of these texts never knew of a "homosexual orientation," nor does the Bible offer condemnation of intimacy between two people expressing a bond of mutual love. To the contrary, many scriptural books attest to the value of loving relationships, mutual fidelity, and emotional intimacy, all of which speak to the ideal sought after among Christians in homosexual unions (cf. 1 Samuel 18:1–4; 20:41–42; 2 Samuel 1:23–26; Ruth 1:16–17). One does find, however, condemnation of rape, sexual abuse and exploitation, and hypocrisy and oppression, all of which are clearly contrary to the Christian gospel and none of which have any relation to same-gendered relationships. Homosexual Christians would caution their respective churches that it is not sex that most centrally defines their relationships, but love.

Queering Christianity

In recognition of this expressed love, some Christian denominations have begun to condone, bless, and celebrate same-gendered relationships. Moreover, in reaction to what has been traditionally a condemnatory attitude, many specifically gay-friendly churches have been founded in large part by gay men and lesbians in response to the alienation they have experienced from their communities of origin.

Indeed, it is this general experience of alienation among homosexual Christians that has helped pave the way for what has become a specifically gay Christian spirituality. As such, it is not uncommon to hear of such endeavors as "queering the Bible" or "queering Christ" as the means by which gay Christians do not merely attempt to defend themselves against a presumed biblical condemnation (as we saw in our historical-critical analysis of Genesis 19), but to reevaluate the liberating and affirming senses of Scripture that emerge in and through gay Christian experience. One such interpretation emphasizes a theology of liberation whereby the biblical character of Moses is endowed with archetypal significance, serving as a paradigm for the gay community as a whole. From this hermeneutical perspective, the Exodus narrative becomes a powerful witness for understanding alienation as an opportunity for prophetic witness.

Moses, born a Hebrew, had been secretly raised in the court of Pharaoh, but through an altercation with Egyptian authorities, he was eventually forced into exile. For a time, he accepts his fate, until a mysterious encounter with God, manifested through a perpetually burning bush (Exodus 3), empowers him to return to Egypt as a prophetic voice demanding the liberation of his people from the oppression imposed by Pharaoh. Thus, exile, as it is experienced by the gay and lesbian community, is reinterpreted as a place of divine encounter, whereby gay Christians might discover their collective prophetic voice and, like Moses, find themselves empowered by God to return to their communities of faith demanding liberation from what is experienced as oppressive and erroneous interpretations of Scripture and tradition.

Such "queer" perspectives on the Bible indicate that there is a paradigm shift taking place among homosexual Christians whereby many are reclaiming their Christian faith by approaching entrenched authority, long-standing precritical tradition, and literalist biblical interpretations not simply from a defensive posture, but with a prophetic voice of urgency that presumes a context of faith. While media sound bytes may continue to give the impression that the homosexual and Christian communities are forcefully opposed, a closer look will readily demonstrate that this apparent opposition masks the truth that there has never been a time when homosexual men and women did not count themselves among the Christian community.

Chromosome Disorders

We are often taught that what makes us male or female is our genetics, particularly our chromosomes. Typically, a person has 23 pairs of chromosomes; one half comes from the egg, and the other half from the sperm. The sex chromosomes are the 23rd pair, and they direct the development of the genitalia. That is, what sex chromosomes our body contains determines our sex. Although other aspects of prenatal development, such as hormones, also influence the development of our genitalia, the sex chromosomes often guide that development. The 23rd pair contains an X from the egg, and the sperm provides either an X or Y chromosome. A typical female has the pattern XX. A typical male has the pattern XY. Though most individuals have either the XX or XY pattern, occasionally individuals are born with different sex chromosome patterns. Sometimes, there are extra or missing sex chromosomes; over 70 types of sex chromosome variants have been discovered. Errors are rare but revealing. Atypical development demonstrates the complexities of defining man and woman.

Turner's (Turner) Syndrome

Turner's syndrome (also called Turner syndrome) occurs when there is only one X chromosome, and the pattern is designated X0, with a zero standing in for the missing chromosome. At least one X chromosome is necessary for an embryo to be viable. An embryo with only one Y for the sex chromosome will not survive. Turner's syndrome is estimated to occur in about one of every 2,500 to 4,000 female births, with the infant appearing female at birth. The average age of diagnosis is 6.6 years, although it may not be diagnosed until much later in life. The ovaries do not fully develop and thus do not produce a normal level of estrogen. This lack of estrogen means that the individual will not go through puberty and menstruate. A female with Turner's syndrome is short, usually less than 5 feet tall, and has immature breasts. She is also likely to suffer some degree of mental retardation and be hyperactive. The person with Turner's syndrome often experiences social isolation because of her body image and poor self-concept. She may receive estrogen and progesterone during puberty to enhance sex characteristics. and this can produce a menstrual flow, as the uterus is fully formed. Androgens may also be given at this time to promote height. The earlier Turner's syndrome is detected, the more likely treatments will be effective. The Turner's syndrome female usually has a strong feminine gender identity and a strong interest in motherhood. Although she is infertile due to the lack of functioning ovaries, she can become pregnant through in vitro fertilization and deliver via cesarean section.

Klinefelter's Syndrome

The most common sex chromosome disorder is Klinefelter's syndrome, in which the male has an extra X chromosome and is designated XXY. It is estimated to occur in 1 out of every 500 to 1,000 male births. While the Y triggers the development of male genitalia, the extra X prevents full development. Internally, the genitalia of individuals are like a normal male's, though the testes and penis are small. They cannot produce sperm and are sterile. Individuals also have low testosterone levels and low sexual desire. They may have gynecomastia (abnormal breast development in a male), a feminized body shape, be tall, and lack fully developed secondary sex characteristics, such as facial and body hair. Testosterone therapy can help develop the secondary sex characteristics, especially during puberty. With Klinefelter's syndrome, there is an increased chance of developmental disabilities and mental retardation, particularly speech and language difficulties. As with Turner's syndrome, treatment is usually most successful when started early. The individual with Klinefelter's syndrome typically has a male gender identity.

Other Sex-Chromosomal Abnormalities

A female with an extra X chromosome, designated XXX, occurs in about one of every 1,000 female births. This individual will appear female at birth, may or may not have menstrual irregularities, and may be fertile or sterile. She may also be of average intelligence or have developmental disabilities and some mental retardation. This individual may grow up as a normal female with no outward signs of having an extra chromosome. There is no treatment for this condition.

When there is an extra Y chromosome, the individual is designated XYY. This occurs in about one in every 1,000 male births. They may grow up as a normal male. They are tall and may be fertile or may have reproductive abnormalities and fertility problems. They are marked by impulsive behavior and lower intelligence. These characteristics cause them to be more likely to be convicted and imprisoned for nonviolent crimes, as they are identifiable and often inept criminals. They are not more aggressive or violent than the average population. There is no treatment for this condition.

Some individuals may have several X chromosomes, such as XXXX, XXXXX, XXXY, and XXXXY conditions. Some may also have an extra Y, such as XXYY. These patterns tend to be accompanied by more severe developmental disabilities and physical irregularities, such as skeletal problems. In general, as the number of sex chromosomes increases, the severity of mental retardation and reproductive difficulties also increases. Individuals with these sex chromosome patterns are likely to be sterile. Diagnosis of any of these chromosome disorders will be most reliable with karyotype testing.

Clergy Sex Scandals

Clergy sex abuse scandals within the Catholic Church in the United States have involved decades of internally reported and documented sexual abuse perpetrated by Catholic priests and deacons against minors. The Catholic Church as an institution and the bishops as its agents have been viewed as avoiding their responsibility in handling these disclosures, both with the offending clergy and traumatized victims. These incidents were known to those immediately impacted and involved throughout the United States, and collective societal anger and outrage reached a tipping point in early 2002, when demands for review and action were widespread. In addition, given this history, there was skepticism from within and outside the Catholic Church regarding the capability of the all-male governance structure, which insulated itself from lay influence and contemporary scientific advancements in the field of sexual abuse and treatment of offenders that would have promoted an accurate and informed assessment of the scope of the problem and meaningful reforms to tackle this issue effectively.

The perpetration of sexual abuse and the clear and persistent failure of the Catholic Church as an organization to address clergy abuse in a systematic manner is significant in the context of gender and society for several reasons. First, Catholic priests and their bishop superiors live, work, and participate in a community that is closed and cultivates internally loyalty. Catholic clergy are all male and take a vow of celibacy. Thus, their primary experience of family and familyhood is constructed in the context of their own families of origin and the community of "brother" priests or clerical culture within which they live. It is allegiance to this latter family that is thought to have overridden the needs of victims of sex abuse.

Second, the Catholic Church, and within that the priests and orders of religious men, has its own legal process and procedures defined by canon law that ultimately are heard and acted upon by the Pope in Rome. Most state statutes regarding the mandatory reporting of child sexual abuse exempts clergy, thus allowing clergy to operate outside of common societal laws.

Third, the pervasive absence of nonreligious persons and, in particular, women's voices and involvement within Catholic Church governance created a climate that was disconnected from best practices of organizational policy, procedures, and treatment protocols regarding preventing, reporting, and handling incidents of sexual exploitation. In its totality, these variables based on gender and separation from contemporary society contributed to an insensitivity toward responding to allegations, a lack of accountability, and a proclivity to protect fellow priests despite their actions being against the law. The inherent power and privilege afforded priests based on gender and their stature as spiritual leaders created a climate impenetrable for victims and their families, a culture that operated in secrecy and seemingly above the law.

Finally, and perhaps most significant, is the resilient role that victims, survivors, faith communities, and the larger society played in successfully exercising pressure and collectively advocating for organizational change and reform within the institution of the Catholic Church.

Definition

Sexual abuse is defined as any sexual contact with minors (children/youth under the age of 18 years of age). Sexual exploitation is initiated and maintained for adult sexual gratification. Sexual abuse is most often perpetuated by an adult known to the victim and her or his family. A process of grooming typically characterizes the abuse. This is the deliberate sexualization of a relationship over time, while simultaneously cultivating an atmosphere of secrecy, indebtedness, and mutuality with the victim. The feelings of entrapment often coerce the minor to comply with demands and not disclose abuse. The perpetrator will position herself or himself in authority over the minor to ensure compliance and at times cultivates a persona inconsistent with that of harming children so as to go undetected and undermine the credibility of a potential report. Until recently, most abuse was not disclosed, and if it was, the disclosure was delayed, sometimes many years.

Prevalence

The prevalence of sexual abuse in the general population has been difficult to assess due to vast underreporting. A national survey (1990) found that 27% of women and 16% of men experienced sexual abuse by the age of 18. The incidence of sexual abuse as defined by substantiated reports to child protective services has declined annually, leading researchers to believe that the sexual abuse of children has decreased. Advancements in educational prevention efforts, diagnosis and treatment of adult mental disorders, successful prosecution, aggressive sentencing, and increased incarceration of offenders have been suggested as factors that have lowered incidents of sexual abuse.

In an attempt to gain information on the scope of abuse by clergy, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB) commissioned the John Jay College of Criminal Justice to conduct a study, which would survey dioceses around the country about reported abuse. Ninety-three percent of the dioceses and 60% of the religious orders participated. Church archival records submitted for the John Jay report totaled 10,667 reported minor victims of clergy abuse between 1950 and 2002. While these data are helpful to further the understanding of the incidence of abuse, it represents only the number of children who came forward and that the diocese recorded; thus, the actual number of victims may be higher. Incidence of priest-perpetrated abuse peaked in the late 1970s and has declined since then.

In examining the incidence of clergy sexual abuse as reported by dioceses, there are similarities and differences from the general population. For example, clergy victimized parish members and others connected by their faith and were therefore known to the priests. As distinct from victimization by clergy, in the general population, most perpetrators are male and their victims female. Clergy perpetrated sexual abuse was approximately 81% committed against boys and thus male to male.

Of the approximately 75,694 diocesan priests working between 1950 and 2002, allegations were made against 3,265, or 4.3%, similar to the prevalence in the general population. The types of abuse included fondling as well as very "grave" abuse (i.e., acts of oral sex, 27%, and intercourse, 25%). During the span of time the abuse was recorded and its frequency peaked, a significant number of priests were found to have entered the priesthood as older adolescents or young adults. It is hypothesized that by entering early in their lives, they may have truncated normative sexual development and were therefore ill-prepared and not adequately supported to live under the requirement of celibacy. In addition, men with personality problems may have sought out the protected confines of the priesthood at a time when there was not adequate screening.

Impact on Victims

It is known that sexual abuse impacts people differently based on several factors, including the type of abuse, length of time exposed to abuse, frequency of abuse, relationship to the offender, length of time the victim lives with the secret of abuse unassisted, and families' beliefs and support of disclosure. Revealing abuse or disclosure is often inhibited due to the grooming process, relationship to the perpetrator, societal taboos and discomfort about talking about sexual matters, limited language to describe the sexual abuse, and added stigma if male-to-male abuse.

Sexual abuse committed by clergy and religious leaders is particularly devastating given their moral authority and spiritual roles in people's lives. Victims and their families who came forward and reported abuse but were not believed or ignored felt abandoned by an unresponsive church. As in families when incest is disclosed, members can be discounted, discredited, ostracized, and pressured to recant the abuse. Clergy abuse victims additionally report having a crisis of faith that is long-lasting, with reverberating repercussions. Often, victims have come forward only as adults, meaning they have lived with the secret of being abused for years without therapeutic support or legal assistance. Secondary difficulties, including depression, relational problems, substance abuse, and a sense of being "damaged goods," often occur. In addition, given that most victims were boys entering or during puberty, the added stigma and impact on their evolving sexual identities of involuntary sexual exploitation cannot be underestimated.

Historical Institutional Response

A climate of avoidance, secrecy, and denial and a culture of arrogant infallibility prevailed within the Catholic Church's handling of the sex abuse scandals for decades. Very few cases of clergy abuse have been criminally prosecuted. While every state in the country has had existing laws that mandate professionals (e.g., teachers, nurses, doctors, day care providers, etc.) to report suspected sexual abuse of minors, clergy have remained exempt. Catholic clergy and bishops in most instances were not compelled and therefore did not report disclosed and known sex abuse to the civil authorities, opting to handle cases internally. Further complicating matters, there is a legally defined window of time, the statue of limitations, in which sexual abuse may be criminally prosecuted, and in numerous cases of clergy abuse, this time had expired, leaving only the option of a suit in civil court. Compounding the issue, "problem" priests were transferred to unknowing dioceses, only to reoffend. If action was taken, the behavior was approached from a repentance stance or ill-conceived treatment approaches, resulting in dioceses allowing priests to be placed again in churches and have access to children.

Confronting Institutional Denial

Jason Berry's landmark book Lead Us Not Into Temptation, published in 1992, chronicles known and reported occurrences of priest-perpetrated sexual abuse of minors, which had spanned several decades. Berry's work is often credited with breaking open this institutionally known but unspoken secret. However, it was approximately another decade before enough disclosures, requests for justice, and finally litigation would created a watershed moment that forced the Catholic Church governance structure, via the USCCB, to meaningfully examine and address the issue as an institution. As adult survivors increasingly gained strength to come forward to tell, or in many instances retell, their stories of past abuse and their dioceses' handling of such disclosures (which rarely included notifying the civil authorities to report the abuse and in the most basic sense believing the victim), dioceses across the country were confronted with the reality of the damage done, mounting scandal, and increasing civil suits for negligence as an institution in their oversight of priests. For many persons of faith, the spiritual damage by this profound betrayal of trust was unfathomable. In response to the church's stance of denial and minimizing alleged abuse, many survivors gained strength and a voice through connecting with each other via mutual aid and advocacy groups, as organized in the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests (SNAP).

At the June 2002 Annual Conference of Catholic Bishops in Dallas, Texas, the bishops for the first time addressed the issue directly by inviting and receiving numerous impact statements and testimonials from abuse survivors, therapists, and researchers, among others. An outcome of the conference was the creation and adoption of the Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, which was reviewed and reaffirmed by the bishops in 2005.

The charter defines a comprehensive compilation of policies and procedures for dioceses to address the handling of allegations, accountability, and prevention. It also created the Office of Child and Youth Protection within the USCCB and the National Review Board, made up of lay experts in the field. The 17 articles of the charter include mandates for dioceses to reach out to victims and their families, employ a competent person to provide victim assistance; report abuse and cooperate with civil authorities investigations; and create a local review board made up primarily of lay persons not employed by the diocese, who consult with the bishop regarding cases of abuse. The charter specifically restates a quote from Pope John Paul II: "There is no place in the priesthood or religious life for those who would harm the young." Thus, what is known as the "zero tolerance" policy for priest abuse was established, meaning any priest found to have abused a child would be permanently barred from ministry and potentially dismissed from the clerical state.

The responsibility of the Office of Child and Youth Protection is to provide leadership and direction for the ongoing efforts within the church to protect minors. The organization also performs compliance audits and supports dioceses in their charge to comply with the charter. The audit is published annually in a public report.

The National Review Board was charged with commissioning reports to study sexual abuse, and the John Jay College of Criminal Justice was asked to examine the nature and scope of abuse from 1950 through 2002. All dioceses were asked to cooperate by submitting several surveys designed to gather descriptive information from their records of disclosed abuse. While the review process depended on individual dioceses records and reporting, it yielded significant information to gain a greater understanding of this issue. The National Review Board also published a report, A Report on the Crisis in the Catholic Church in the United States, summarizing its findings to date and making recommendations.

Conclusion

Clergy sex abuse within the Catholic Church in the United States is significant to the discussion of gender and society. The perpetration of sexual abuse of minors by priests and the resulting response to victims and offending priests by the governance structure of the Catholic Church highlight the traumatic and catastrophic results when power is afforded, distributed, and unchecked based on gender and is insulated from societal input and laws. This tragic episode does, however, speak to the fierce resilience and determination of survivors and the power of collective advocacy to challenge injustice and influence structures for change for the common societal good.

COALITION ON VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN (KENYA)

The Coalition on Violence Against Women (COVAW), Kenya, is a women's human rights organization established in 1995. Committed to the "eradication of all forms of violence against women and the promotion of women's human rights," COVAW believes all women have the right to freedom from violence and the right to self-defense, and the organization develops its programs and interventions around the faith that people have the capacity to learn and change.

Domestic violence is a serious and hidden issue in Kenya, women and children being the main victims. The organization focuses energy on raising public awareness to this hidden issue, providing safe and friendly spaces for women, enabling counseling services to survivors, working to protect and acknowledge the reproductive rights of women, and lobbying on behalf of survivors. Originally established as a membership group, COVAW relied on volunteerism for operationalizing its three working groups: counseling, outreach, and advocacy. Today, COVAW enjoys a managing board and full-time staff members who work alongside volunteers and interns. In accordance with this framework, there are several programs managed by COVAW to reach their desired outcomes.

The Outreach and Training Program delivers training workshops, produces easy-to-read handbooks about violence against women, enacts drama performances depicting gender-based violence, and encourages participation of youth through contests for essays and posters.

The Counseling Program provides professional counseling in both one-on-one and group settings. Information and materials are made available to women, as are referrals. In the case of underprivileged women, emergency funds are available to supplement or extend support of survivors, and COVAW manages a hotline for reporting violence against women. The overall goal of this program is to ensure that women feel safe and can come to a place knowing they can share their experiences.

The Advocacy Program works at both the local and national levels to advance public debate and policy development and to provide access to justice for women. Public Interest Litigation and Legal Aid work with women to advise on legal and human rights and use mobile clinics to reach outliers, ensuring accessibility to all women and selecting cases for litigation that promote women's rights movements. COVAW's Advocacy Program has been recognized as achieving considerable success by virtue of the Kenyan government, recently passing the Children's Act, the Criminal Law (Amendment) Bill, and the Domestic Violence (Family Protection) Bill.

Several annual activities are coordinated to remind the community about violence against women and the continuing need to maintain open dialogue about this violation of human rights:

- International Women's Day: March 8
- St. Kizito Commemoration: July 13
- Sixteen Days of Violence Against Women: November 25 to December 10.

A variety of publications are available from COVAW, the most recent being Breaking the Cycle of Violence. Local partners include ABANTU for Development and the Association of Media Women of Kenya, and Amnesty International serves as a partner on a global scale.

COHABITATION

Once unheard of, cohabitation has become an increasingly popular living arrangement for romantically involved couples as a precursor or alternative to marriage. While cohabitation can also refer to the living arrangements of married and same-sex couples, the term commonly refers to an unmarried heterosexual couple who shares a household.

In the past, cohabitation was rarely seen except among some low-income families who had no strong economic incentives to marry. Often viewed as "living in sin," cohabitation was not an accepted option for most couples. However, the sexual revolution and feminist movement provided increasing acceptance of cohabiting unions in the United States. In the mid-1960s though the mid-1970s, approximately 11% of never-married couples cohabitated prior to marriage. During the 1980s, this rate increased dramatically to approximately 44% of couples before first marriages. The 1990s brought a slight increase to this figure, placing the cohabitation rate at 50%, where it has remained since. Today, over half of marriages start as cohabiting unions in both the United States and in most European nations.

Types of Cohabiters

Sociologists have noted that couples choose to cohabit for a variety of reasons, which shape their relationships in unique ways. Among these, couples may choose to cohabit as a precursor to marriage or as an alternative to marriage. Many young couples hesitate to marry because they feel they are "too young" or that they would like to reach certain life goals prior to marrying, which makes cohabitation a popular choice. It allows a serious continuation of the relationship without having the connotations of marriage attached to it. For most couples, cohabitation is a short-term union. Couples who cohabit generally marry or separate within the first 5 years.

Cohabitation as Precursor to Marriage

For many young couples, cohabitation is a part of the marriage process. Many couples who decide to move in together have talked about becoming engaged, and many have definite plans to marry each other. Many individuals in this group, particularly women, want their partners to be committed to the future of the relationship before living together and often view their cohabitation as a step toward engagement and marriage. These couples tend to cohabit for the shortest periods of time, generally 1 to 2 years before they transition into marriage.

Cohabitation as Alternative to Marriage

Couples who cohabit as an alternative to marriage appear to do so for two distinct reasons. Among low-income couples, socioeconomic considerations cause many to postpone marriage. These couples do not reject marriage. Many of them cohabit, start having families, and desire marriage, but they want to wait to marry until they have achieved certain financial goals, such as having steady employment, a home, or money to host a proper wedding. Some low-income women choose to cohabit instead of rushing into marriage to make sure their partners are committed to the relationships, and raising children if that is the case, for the long term. They view cohabitation as an important way of testing the durability of the relationship and want to avoid the legal ties marriage involves until they are certain of it.

The second group of couples rejects marriage and chooses to cohabit instead. Little research has been done examining long-term cohabiting unions like these in the United States, but it appears to be more prominent among couples who have political and/or feminist objections to marriage as an institution. For example, some couples may not marry because they do not approve of the government's stance banning same-sex unions.

Currently, it appears that only a small percentage of couples cohabit for long periods of time, such as would be the case for couples cohabiting as an alternative to marriage. After 5 years, only 10% of couples remain in a cohabiting relationship. Part of this may be related to the fact that long-term cohabiters have less institutional support for their unions, since marriage, at least in the United States, is for the most part still seen as the most ideal and only legal form of union.

Economic situations play a major factor in whether or not a couple cohabits or transitions into marriage. For some, their economic situations may interplay with their age and school or work histories, creating a desire to delay marriage until they have accomplished certain goals in life, such as finishing school or finding stable employment. As a result, those who are economically unstable but do not want to delay building more permanent relationships may cohabit prior to marrying, until their economic situations improve. In addition, the drop in real-wage levels for men and the increased participation of women in the workforce may be influencing many couples to work together (through cohabitation) to build a financially secure relationship instead of depending on a male-breadwinner model.

Cohabitation and Gender

Many differences have been noted between men and women in cohabiting relationships versus marital unions. Cohabitation tends to be more egalitarian; research shows that women in cohabiting unions perform less housework, are more involved in the paid labor force, and have more economic equality in the relationship. Couples who premaritally cohabit tend to have more-egalitarian marriages on several measures compared with couples who do not premaritally cohabit. This is partly related to the fact that couples with more-liberal ideologies concerning marriage and gender are more likely to cohabit and have more egalitarian relationships compared with those who have more-conservative ideologies.

COLORISM

The term colorism refers to the biased treatment of individuals based on their skin color and can occur interracially (similar to race bias) or intraracially (with members of the same race expressing bias against fellow members based on skin color). Colorism also refers to other identifiable racial features, such as hair texture, lip shape, nose shape, eye shape, and eye color. Like gender, skin color and related phenotypical features are readily visible traits that designate minority or majority status. Other minority statuses are not necessarily visible and thus not immediately identifiable: ableism, lesbianism, religious affiliation, social class, criminal status, and so on. The visibility of a minority trait, racial identity in this case, is key since it almost automatically invites a public response that can be experienced as bias. This entry explores the compounded effects of colorism and sexism.

Colorism: Past and Present

Historically, colorism derives from notions of supremacy, with white Northern European standards being the "ideal" against which all others are measured. For the most part, white Northern European features have been and are favored over "colored" (e.g., African, Asian, Indian) features. In short bursts, as in the 1960s and 1970s, darker skin color was revered among some progressive Americans in movements celebrating ethnic identity, as seen in the "Black is Beautiful" and "la Raza" movements. This cohesiveness, evident in prideful movements, served to unify ethnic groups, sometimes to the degree that light-skinned coethnics were viewed by some as inferior, their skin color being evidence of mixed-race ancestry. This type of intraracial colorism, as with interracial colorism, is also a form of racial bias.

With regard to women of color specifically and the effects of intraracial colorism, Margaret Hunter examines the advantages and disadvantages of light skin. Although light skin is considered a social advantage, Hunter explains the obscure disadvantages of light skin among colored peoples, with such skin tones representing a suspected absence of racial consciousness. Lighter-colored African Americans and Mexican Americans are often rejected by their own ethnic communities. Valid or not, a judgment of ethnic inauthenticity prevails, resulting in attitudes that the lighter-colored ethnic members are not "Chicano enough" or "black enough."

In some respects, colorism in the United States may be seen as having "come a long way" and in some ways not. In the early 20th century, the United States experienced a eugenics movement that sought to eliminate people of color largely by denying them reproduction. Prejudicial strategies such as eugenics have been replaced by subtler forms of colorism. For example, for as long as it has existed, the Miss America beauty pageant has been viewed by some as principally having to do with race, gender, and the U.S. national culture as a "commodity culture." More recently, overtones of objectification and exploitation of women, racism, and reactionary nationalism represented in the pageant have become complicated by the participation of increasing numbers of nonwhite contestants. In an increasingly multiethnic and multiracial society such as the United States, beauty pageants may be seen as enforcing dominant, universal norms of beauty, juxtaposing white women against "the other" (nonwhite) women. African American women did not participate in the pageant until 1970 and did not win until 1984. In the meantime, they straightened their hair and tried to "pass" for white. Some critical observers have suggested that the inclusion of women of color into beauty pageants creates an idea of tolerance while simultaneously underscoring white beauty standards. In other words, by allowing participants of color, the contest appears to observe equal opportunity; nonetheless, minority participants are most likely to qualify if they have European facial features and "good hair" (meaning straight and smooth).

Colorism and Social Prospects: The Impact of Color on Social Opportunity

Marriage is one means, in addition to employment, of advancing oneself socially and gaining access to social power. As will be discussed, Asian women, more than men, undergo leg-lengthening and eyelid surgeries to be taller and more Caucasian looking. Women of color are more likely to lighten their skin to attract a financially secure marriage and a good job. Iranian, African American, Jewish, and Asian women have their noses reshaped to land better jobs and marriage partners. African American women have their lips reshaped for greater acceptability.

Marriage Market

Color is a stronger predictor of social placement than is parental socioeconomic status. In other words, gradations in skin color affect the socioeconomic status of African Americans as strongly as does race itself. Several studies show that, as a way of advancing oneself via the marriage market, lighter-skinned African Americans are more likely than darker-skinned African Americans to marry and to marry higher-earning, better financially endowed spouses. In terms of gender and skin tone, skin color influences the attractiveness ratings assigned to African American men far less than it does the attractiveness rating for African American women. The same is true for Asian Indians, who are found to use skin color as a marriage (and employment) preference criterion and to show bias against darker-skinned Indians.

Education and Employment Markets

Herring, Keith, and Horton conclude that skin color is a strong predictor of educational attainment, occupational status, and income, with lighter skin color consistently influencing opportunities for higher social and economic status among African Americans. For example, darker-skinned African American men are 52 percent less likely to be employed than their lighter-skinned counterparts.

More broadly, Herring et al.'s studies of job discrimination found that Hispanics and Asians with darker skin are also more likely to face job discrimination. In Latin American societies, natives with darker skin and more-indigenous native Indian features are more severely socially disadvantaged than those with lighter complexions and more-European features. Regarding income, Mexican Americans and First Nation Peoples (Native Americans) with darker complexions and nonwhite phenotypic characteristics earn significantly lower earnings than those with lighter color and more-European features. The lighter-colored Mexican Americans and those with more-European features receive more education than do their darker and more "Indian-looking" counterparts.

Nancy Etcoff, a writer on the topic of beauty, notes that light skin is universally preferred by men in African, Japanese, and other societies. In response to this cultural preference, as discussed below, Japanese women use light-colored makeup, and African women bleach their skin. Light skin for women grants privileges and rights. White skin represents power. Etcoff echoes many other authors when she observes that those who "pass" or look most like members of the group in power are more likely to be considered attractive by that society's standards and therefore have more social power.

However, she noted a change in the willingness of African American women to appear white, dependent upon their social mobility. African American women and men continued to straighten their hair during the 1960s, and 75% of African American women still process their hair with straightening combs and chemical relaxers. But upper-middle-class African American women with long hair are more likely to wear their hair in ethnic styles (dreadlocks, twists, and Afros), suggesting that with increased economic power, African American women are more likely to display their ethnicity and reject pressures to appear white. Those who are less advantaged economically and who hope to rise to the middle class, however, still succumb to social pressure to conform and thus straighten their hair.

Race-Denying Changes and Altering Looks for Social Advancement

Most people engage to some extent in physical alterations to make themselves socially acceptable or desirable. Such changes are made in order to gain access to beneficial employment opportunities, marriage arrangements, club memberships, and educational entry. Some of them are meant purely for beautification (such as hair coloring, dieting, and plastic surgery), while other alterations (such as hair straightening, skin bleaching, and leg lengthening) frequently are for the combined purpose of beautification as well as adopting a more Caucasian appearance. The now-defunct practice of footbinding and the current practice of leg-lengthening surgery are specific almost exclusively to a particular race and gender, Chinese women, undertaken to gain advantageous marriages as well as better employment. On the whole, these procedures are expected to bring upward mobility.

Feminists for the most part, but not entirely, adopt the attitude that women should not endanger their health by engaging in looks-altering procedures, such as dieting and surgery, and they should not support a male-dominated system of forcing women to appear sexually attractive to men. Looks alterations have also been criticized for preoccupying women with frivolities instead of more meaningful political pursuits demanding equality regardless of our appearance. On the other hand, empirical research suggests that it is still the case that to be socially powerful and economically competitive, women must appear a certain way.

Women of color have undergone and still do undergo race-denying changes. The leg-lengthening surgery mentioned above involves a gruesome procedure of breaking the long bones in the legs, then placing the legs in "fixator devices" until the space between the bones knits to create longer bones, thus adding a few inches of height. As racially "wrong" as this may seem, Chinese women do this to be competitive in the marriage and employment market.

Worldwide, there has been a phenomenal growth in the availability and number of skin-lightening products used in India, Africa, Asia, and the United States, the result of a social pairing of fairer complexions with beauty and success. For example, until recently an advertisement appeared in India that pictured a young, dark-skinned woman whose father lamented that he had no son to provide for him and his daughter was not earning enough salary. The daughter, it was suggested, could not get a better job or marry unless she lightened her dark skin. She used the skin lightener and secured a well-paying position as a flight attendant, which made her father very happy. The ad met with considerable social protest, leading to its removal.

Kenya provides similar examples of both acceptance and resistance to the idea that lighter skin means greater beauty. Skin lighteners are robustly marketed to African women as part of their beauty routine. In response, African social critics state that skin lighteners are a negative legacy of white colonialism. Unfortunately, there is plenty of evidence that light skin does indeed lead to greater chances of success. In addition to the racism involved in the pressure to be white, skin-lightening products, which often contain mercury, pose risks of disfigurement and skin cancer. Yet despite these problems (racism, disfigurement, and illness), African women remain economically dependent on men, meaning that they need to "marry well," due to the same gender-dependent economic disparity that many cultures face.

Virginia Blum observes that Jewish girls often undergo nose reduction surgery in order to marry successful Jewish men. In this intriguing case of colorism, Jewish men prefer to marry Jewish women with small, WASP-like noses. In other words, Jewish women who alter their looks this way are redesigning themselves in the conventional WASP image—not for a gentile market of prospective husbands, but rather to please men of their own ethnicity. Asian Americans report a similar cultural schism. Asian American teenage girls undergo surgery on the epicanthal fold to gain the effect of the "Caucasian double lid" so prized among the Asian community as the preeminent sign of beautiful eyes. It is noteworthy that this surgery is intended to appeal to the aesthetic taste of young Asian men, who presumably share the same racial traits Asian women want to change.

Sander Gilman addresses surgery to "correct" ethnic features, such as "ethnic noses" (the Irish pug nose, the African nose, the Asian nose, the Jewish nose), "bat" or "jug" ears thought to be common to the Irish, and "Asian eyelids." Disguising the nose through rhinoplasty and thinning the lips through plastic surgery, for instance, along with skin lightening and hair straightening, became a massive concern among African Americans in the past century. The intent was not to "pass" or to be "invisible." Rather, the intent was to not be too visibly black or too visibly ethnic, however these are defined. Even in cultures such as Iran and Turkey, where the bodies of women, including faces, are mostly covered, there are growing numbers of Westernizing nose jobs.

Gilman notes that body imagery reflects the preferences of those with cultural and political power. For example, during the Vietnam War, Vietnamese women underwent Westernizing surgeries (breast implants, eyelid surgeries). After the war, there was a backlash against such surgeries. As time passed and the war faded from memory, Vietnamese women returned to Europeanizing surgeries: increasing the size of the nose and rounding out the eyes. In the People's Republic of China, after Mao Tse-tung's death and the liberalization that followed, eyelid surgery boomed as a sign of the increasing affluence of the general population. The reason for these Westernizing cosmetic surgical procedures was and is the ability to increase one's income or marriageability. Overall, skin lightening, nose lengthening, and eye reshaping in present-day Asia (predominantly Japan and Vietnam) reflect the globalization of beauty standards rooted in European American stereotypes. People of color continue to be pressured to not be "too Asian," "too African," or otherwise "too nonwhite."

The feminist argument that women should not alter their physical appearance in order to accommodate an antiegalitarian patriarchal and white supremacist system is very similar to the argument against ethnic cosmetic surgery. Some see such surgery as denying one's identity and see those who engage in it as race traitors. Women of minority ethnic status, however, engage in looks alteration for the same reasons most others do: to advance socially and to be accepted. Since the turn of the 20th century, people in the United States and Europe have used cosmetic surgery to reduce or alter physical signs that they believe mark them as nonwhite or "Other."

Conclusion

Colorism continues to be a significant social phenomenon. It affects access to social power and denies equality to those who are nonwhite. Because of the visibility of racial and ethnic markers, people of color are pressured to appear as members of the powerful group, which then encourages a continuation of colorism.

COMFORT WOMEN

Comfort women, or military comfort women, is a euphemistic term (translated from jugun ianfu in Japanese) used to describe females who were forced into sexual slavery to provide "comfort" in the form of sexual services to Japanese Imperial Army troops during World War II. Estimates of the number of women involved range from 80,000 to 200,000, with the majority being from Korea. Women from Japan, Taiwan, and other Asian countries were also used as comfort women. The Japanese government has not offered an official apology or compensation, though surviving comfort women and their supporters have mobilized in a quest for justice.

From 1932 until the end of the war, comfort women were held in "comfort stations" established by the Japanese military. Women were lured by false promises of employment or were kidnapped by the Japanese. They were subjected to continual rapes and were beaten or murdered if they resisted. At the end of World War II, many were executed.

In anticipation of soldiers committing random sexual assaults, government officials set up the comfort stations to enhance the morale of Japanese soldiers. The government also had an interest in keeping soldiers healthy and wanted sexual services under controlled conditions. The women serving as sexual slaves were regularly tested for sexually transmitted diseases and infections.

The women who survived suffered physical maladies, psychological illnesses, and rejection from their families and communities. The Korean government set up the Korean Council for the Women Drafted for Military Sexual Slavery by Japan after initial Japanese denial of responsibility. The council asked for an admittance, an apology, a memorial, and financial compensation and that Japanese textbooks be appropriately altered to reflect the realities of the sexual slavery. The Japanese government denied evidence of coercing comfort women and rejected calls for compensation, saying that the 1965 treaty between Japan and South Korea settled all outstanding matters.

The issue of comfort women gained international awareness in 1991, when the surviving women filed a class action lawsuit against the Japanese government. The women and their supporters sued for compensation on the grounds of human rights violations. The lawsuit is not yet resolved.

In 1993, the Japanese government unofficially admitted to deception in the recruitment of comfort women. While to date, the Japanese government denies any legal responsibility for the sexual assaults and other crimes it perpetrated against these women and refuses to compensate the survivors, it set up the Asian Women's Fund as an attempt at resolution. This fund, however, is sustained from donations from private citizens, not government monies. Today, comfort women continue to gain support and fight for compensation and an official apology from the Japanese government.

COMMITMENT CEREMONIES

A commitment ceremony, also known as a union ceremony, is an intimate or romantic couple's public or private declaration of their intimate union. In the contemporary United States, commitment ceremonies are most often performed for same-sex or same-gender couples, who cannot legally marry under state or federal law. Such ceremonies are performed in a ritualized way and function to consecrate or celebrate the union of two individuals. Commitment ceremonies can be performed in a public fashion with other couples, family, and friends present or more privately in a ceremony with a chosen officiator.

Although commitment ceremonies in the United States are often conceptualized as symbolically similar to legal marriage ceremonies, gay and lesbian unions are not legally binding. Scholars and activists have argued that denying same-gender couples the right to legal marriage is illegal discrimination based on gender and sexual orientation and thus should be outlawed. For over 10 years, numerous states, including Hawai'i and Massachusetts, have been in hotly contested legal battles over same-sex marriage. Currently, Massachusetts and California (as of May 2008) are the only states where same-sex marriage is legal. Regardless of legal standing, commitment ceremonies have important consequence and meaning for the couples, families, and friends who participate in them. The need and use for nonlegal union ceremonies highlights the historical legacy of inequality faced by gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender (GLBT) individuals in same-sex relationships.

Historical Background

Accounts of same-sex or same-gender ceremonies in the contemporary United States are found as early as the 1970s. However, it was not until the mid-1990s that such ceremonies became overtly visible in the media and in GLBT communities. Since their increased popularity, a large number of couples have participated in union ceremonies. However, same-sex unions may have roots prior to the 20th century. For example, scholars have documented that same-sex unions took place among early Christians in medieval Europe. Further, researcher Evelyn Blackwood reports that among some Native Americans, cross-gender females—women who take on the role of men in social, communal, and familial settings—had sanctioned relationships with other biological women. Similar accounts of same-sex relationships, often characterized by the union of a transgender male or female and a traditionally gendered male or female, have been documented throughout the world.

There is no national data that report how many individuals have participated in commitment ceremonies in the United States. This is primarily because there are no national registries or regulations, as there are with legal marriage or civil partnerships. However, there is considerable evidence that female same-sex couples are more likely than male couples to participate in such ceremonies. For example, research shows that women outnumber men in obtaining marriage licenses in Massachusetts. Similarly, more same-gender female couples have participated in civil unions in Vermont.

Meanings of Commitment Ceremonies

Marriagelike Commitment

Ceremonies are viewed differently by gay and lesbian individuals and couples, GLBT activists, and academic scholars. For couples, ceremonies are often seen as a way to express long-term commitment to their intimate relationships. This is typified by a marriagelike union that is celebrated in a highly ritualistic way. The symbolism of marriage is evoked in order to convey lifelong commitment. For many, this type of ceremony is tied to religious affiliation and beliefs, and while some religious organizations staunchly oppose same-gender unions, other organizations support same-gender couples and perform ceremonies.

Celebration of Union

For some couples, commitment ceremonies are a way to affirm their already committed relationships. Because ceremonies have only recently become popular, many same-sex couples who have been together before the recognition of such ceremonies may not participate in one in order to form a union. Instead, long-term couples often have ceremonies to celebrate anniversaries or the longevity of their unions.

Subversive Act of Rebellion

Some scholars, activists, and same-gender couples see ceremonies as subversive acts of rebellion that challenge social norms. Because same-gender couples cannot participate in legal marriages, producing a ceremony that is similar to a marriage but is creatively different can be a powerfully moving protest. Others argue that the visibility of GLBT individuals in the media may act to normalize GLBT individuals and therefore eradicate stigma associated with a non-heterosexual identity.

Assimilation

Because commitment ceremonies are often conceptualized as "marriagelike," many members of the GLBT community criticize such ceremonies as conforming to the mainstream and heterosexual model of relationships. Others suggest that gaining legal rights, such as marriage, will not bring about full equality, since discrimination against GLBT individuals is culturally pervasive. The debate of assimilation versus protest continues to be played out in personal relationships, as well as in political and activist communities.

Conclusion

Commitment ceremonies, dependent on social, economic, and ethnic context, contain a variety of complicated meanings. The use of commitment ceremonies in lieu of access to marriage highlights the inequality same-gender couples continue to face in the United States today. Same-gender couples continue to use alternative forms of commitment making, such as union ceremonies, but the lack of legal rights and benefits associated with legal marriage is widely contested and protested among the GLBT community.

COMMITTEE ON WOMEN, POPULATION, AND THE ENVIRONMENT

The Committee on Women, Population, and Environment (CWPE) is an organization that provides an umbrella for scholars, policymakers, and activists who work toward eliminating poverty, racism, inequality, and environmental degradation and promote the economic and social empowerment of women.

Central Issues

CWPE maintains a central concern with the ways in which race and class intersect with gender in terms of population and environmental issues. As such, it is positioned quite differently than more-mainstream population control or environmental organizations, which have been criticized for their inability or reluctance to connect dynamics associated with racism and economic exploitation to environmental and population issues. CWPE challenges the notion that "overpopulation" can be causally linked to environmental degradation, poverty, and political instability. Instead, CWPE argues that the relationship between these factors is far more complex.

CWPE keeps race and economic exploitation front and center in their mission and agenda by highlighting concerns about the militarism that upholds global inequalities and patriarchal relations. Through this mission, CWPE not only diverges from the concerns of traditional population control or environmental organizations but also supports the work of a wide range of scholars and community activists—work that, at first glance, may seem to be unrelated to population or environmental concerns. For example, CWPE supports the work of "Critical Resistance," a campaign that opposes the prison industrial complex in the United States. The scholars and community activists involved in the organizations that do their work in relation to the central issues that concern the CWPE address these issues in a manner that retains a concern for the ways in which global economic and racial inequalities provide a context for environmental and population policies and issues.

Actions and Activities

While CWPE operates as a central location where feminist scholars and community activists can find support and information regarding relevant and parallel work being done by other scholars and activists, it also taps into various policy-making processes. As a nongovernmental organization (NGO), CWPE has been involved in policy-making processes that take place under the auspices of the United Nations, such as the Fourth World Conference on Women, which took place in 1995 in Beijing, China. After its inception in 1992, CWPE organized much of its work around responding to the development and environment linkages that were being made through the UN conferences that shaped international policy-making in the 1990s. A large degree of this work involved advocating for women's fertility choices and opposing population control policies. While these are still key issues for the organization, CWPE has in the 21st century begun to more centrally include the concerns of immigration rights activists. Some current (2007) programs and campaigns in which the CWPE is engaging include campaigns in opposition to the ways in which environmental movements have coalesced with anti-immigration movements in the United States. CWPE refers to this dynamic as "the greening of hate," whereby environmental and anti-immigrant organizations see their larger interests, in terms of monitoring and controlling the population of the United States, as being aligned. Likewise, while they support the ability of women everywhere to freely make their own fertility decisions, CWPE is actively working against population control policies that target particular communities or that provide cash (and other incentives) for sterilization. Again, as with CWPE's critique of the coalition of environmental and anti-immigration organizations, CWPE makes the argument that such population control policies are, in effect, racist and, more specifically, that they serve to exaggerate the exploitation and oppression of poor women and women of color.

COMPARABLE WORTH

Comparable worth is a social and legal issue attempting to right past wrongs of gender discrimination in the labor market. Prior to the 1963 Equal Rights Act, women historically were paid less than men. Now this practice is illegal, although it still occurs today. Female-dominated jobs are paid at lower rates than male-dominated jobs of comparable worth or value. Often called pay equity, comparable worth is "comparable pay for comparable work." This is not to be confused with "equal pay for equal work." The latter assumes that men and women are working the exact same jobs. The former is attempting to make comparisons between different jobs that have comparable levels of seniority, education, tasks, and so on. This is important because men and women are distributed in different occupations. An example of gender discrimination in pay that comparable worth policies attempted to ameliorate took place in Denver, Colorado. Nurses in Denver were paid considerably less than janitors, despite the education required to become a nurse. The local courts ruled that the pay of nurses must be raised due to the human capital involved. Major debate surrounds the idea of comparable worth. Opponents claim that women choose their jobs or that the market, not discrimination, fixes the wages. Advocates state that women historically have been devalued and that to compensate for the devaluation, comparable worth should be instituted. This entry examines different theoretical perspectives on comparable worth.

Theoretical Explanations

Neoclassical Economic Views

In neoclassical economics, the definition of the "worth" of a job reflects individual values that are expressed in the market. The concept of worth comes from the market price itself. Therefore, endowments and tastes are assumed to be exogenous from the model. This means that biology or a person's interests are not taken into consideration when determining the "value" of the job. The market is meant to erode any discrimination, particularly a competitive market. Employers are assumed to pay the market wage, so discrimination in the market is seen as an anomaly. Accordingly, the value of labor is determined at the intersection of the supply-and-demand curves of the market. Neoclassical perspectives have become the dominant argument against comparable worth policies.

Human Capital and Comparable Worth

Human capital theory posits that the difference between male and female wages relate to varying levels of education, training, experience, and so on. From the neoclassical perspective, for comparable worth to be operating, economists must ensure that the wage differences between jobs are not explained by human capital differences. The problem is that economists believe that not all human capital is measurable; therefore, it is assumed that some of the wage differences are due to unmeasured human capital and discrimination is not the main reason for such differences in compensation between women and men. This would render comparable worth policies useless in repairing the gender wage gap.

Compensating Differentials and Comparable Worth

Some jobs have disamenities that others do not. These jobs may be dangerous or unfavorable to the majority of the population. Consequently, according to this theory, these jobs are paid at a higher wage than other jobs. For example, construction and secretarial work may take similar amounts of education and training, but construction is viewed as a dangerous job, and according to compensating differentials, wages should be higher for that type of work. From this perspective, male-dominated careers are more likely to have disamenities, which is why they result in higher wages than female-dominated jobs. Human capital economists claim that the gender wage gap reflects real differences in types of jobs rather than direct discrimination; hence, comparable worth would not solve the gap.

Effects of Comparable Worth Policies From a Neoclassical Perspective

Some economists are weary of comparable worth policies because they believe that raising the wages in female jobs will cause disemployment. From an economic standpoint, the number of workers employed in a job is negatively related to the wage the employer must pay. Economists postulate that if employers are forced to pay higher wages to women, employers will either lay off workers or hire fewer workers than they otherwise would have. Men might also start to move into these jobs, further decreasing the demand for workers in female-dominated occupations. This would result in an imbalance between the amount of labor demanded and the amount of female labor in supply.

Other economists worry that comparable worth policies will lower some women's wages while increasing others. This would occur if comparable worth policies covered some firms but not all, for instance, if they covered only public organizations and not private ones or if they covered large organizations but not smaller ones.

Sociological Perspectives

The sociological perspectives discussed below support different aspects of comparable worth. While the perspectives differ due to their main tenets, they each help explain different aspects of why comparable worth is necessary. No one perspective below completely explains why male-dominated jobs command higher pay than female-dominated jobs, but they all acknowledge a certain level of discrimination.

Functionalism

Functionalism, derived from Émile Durkheim, argues that societies should give higher rewards to jobs that are more important to that particular society. Higher rewards are necessary so that people will fill these jobs. When Durkheim discussed jobs that are important for a society, he meant jobs that will help society function better, not those that increase profit margins. According to Paula England, a top researcher on comparable worth, job evaluation shares certain assumptions with functionalism. The value of a job to a particular society is important, and value is used to assess the worth of a job by its particular aspects, such as experience, education, and so on. If two jobs are considered to have comparable value, then according to comparable worth, the two should be compensated by a comparable wage. The use of job evaluations by firms often result in lower wages for jobs performed by females, since the type of skills necessary to perform the jobs are often seen as less relevant.

Institutionalist Economics

Institutionalist economics emphasizes consensual cultural values. This perspective ascribes greater values to the instrumental parts of society over the ceremonial. The instrumental includes knowledge, skills, and technology and is considered as the economic side of life. Jobs involving instrumentality are more valued, and jobs that are considered ceremonial are less valued. Female-dominated jobs tend more toward the ceremonial/expressive aspects of life, including secretarial work, child care labor, and counseling. Ceremonial jobs are less likely to create profits in the economy, which is why they do not pay wages comparable to those for male-dominated jobs.

Conflict Theory

Conflict theory is in direct opposition to functionalism. Its basic tenets are that there is no consensus in society and that different social groups are constantly in conflict with each other. The values to which individuals prescribe are those of the elites in power. Accordingly, since women are not the ones in power, female-dominated jobs are devalued and hence pay less than male-dominated jobs. England suggests using Bourdieu's concept of cultural capital. She suggests that since cultural capital is transmitted through the class and gender systems, men's cultural capital is arbitrarily rewarded more highly in the labor market. Again, the skills and interests of women are devalued.

Structuralism

Structuralists examine the structural positions within labor markets and how these positions affect rewards. Women's lower wages are due in part to women's concentration in marginal/devalued jobs. Therefore, structuralists focus on the differential placement of women and men across industries. Structuralists understand that men and women are not working in the same jobs and that comparable worth may be necessary due to the devaluation of women's jobs.

Conclusion

Comparable worth policies attempt to quantify the inherent worth of distinct jobs in an attempt to decrease income inequality between men and women. The income inequality is largely a result of occupational segregation among the sexes. Men and women work in different jobs, industries, and occupations. Women's work becomes devalued simply because it is women's work. Supporters of comparable worth claim that each job has inherent worth independent of market forces. Therefore, comparable worth would be a form of labor market regulation because evidence supports the notion that female-dominated jobs are paid less not because of their intrinsic value, but because women dominate them.

Opponents of comparable worth policies suggest that the market sets the wage and the wage gap is not due to gender discrimination. Concerns over the actual measurement of the value of a job are under considerable debate as well. Experiments have demonstrated that evaluators of job worth do not rank jobs the same way, leaving questions as to the objectivity in defining job worth. If job worth is something that is measured, it must be objective and quantifiable. Opponents argue that inherent job worth is not easily definable and the outcome of any attempt of comparable worth will depend on who the evaluators are.

While comparable worth has been an issue for over 20 years, very few attempts to implement it have occurred, with the exception of Washington State in the early 1980s and a few others. The debate continues, but it appears unlikely that a uniform comparable worth policy will be implemented in the United States anytime soon. In a country of laissez-faire economics, the wage gap is often explained by choice or taste for particular jobs, and inherent worth is measured by profit within the economy. Though discrimination exists in female-dominated jobs, the extent to which employers and legislators are willing to go to repair this problem is questionable at best.

COMPULSORY HETEROSEXUALITY

First coined by Adrienne Rich (1980), the term compulsory heterosexuality refers to the idea that heterosexuality is constructed, institutionalized, and reinforced as not only a universal, but the only "normal" and "acceptable" form of sexuality. One idea behind compulsory heterosexuality is that heterosexuality is not a freely made choice for most people and for women in particular: Heterosexuality is not simply one option among many. Rather, it is a pervasive, powerful, and coercive social and political institution that depends on other powerful social institutions to maintain its dominance. From this perspective, heterosexuality is imposed upon people as natural and inevitable by peers, parents, schools, media, and other social institutions such as law and religion.

Rich originally conceived of compulsory heterosexuality as an institution forced upon women in the service of patriarchy and male dominance. Heterosexuality thus ultimately devalues all women. Women, she argues, have been both "forcibly" and "subliminally" coerced into heterosexual unions to survive economically, in order to have children and to provide for those children. Compliance with compulsory heterosexuality is also necessary to avoid social ostracism and in more extreme cases, imprisonment, torture, or psychosurgery. Rich argues that through the idealization of heterosexual romance and the invisibility of other forms of sexual expression, such as lesbianism, as well as through pervasive societal antigay attitudes and behaviors, compulsory heterosexuality thus forces male sexuality upon women and denies women their own sexuality.

Rich argues that because heterosexuality is imposed and forced upon women, women's true sexuality cannot be identified. Women have a fundamental attraction to other women, according to Rich, because like all individuals, their first bonding experience is with their mothers. Lesbianism, then, is a real possibility for many women, and heterosexuality is neither necessarily natural nor inevitable. Yet because of the compulsory nature of heterosexuality, many possibilities for a lesbian existence, including social and political ties and alliances with other women, are closed off, as they are seen as unnatural, immoral, and sometimes illegal. Instead, women are forced into traditional family lives.

Since Rich's original work, other scholars have looked to ways in which heterosexuality is not only compulsory for women, but for men as well. Deborah L. Tolman and her coauthors, for example, show how the sexual expression of adolescent boys is constrained by compulsory heterosexuality. Boys recognize that homosexuality is met with social ostracism and violence and are thus coerced into entering into heterosexual relationships characterized by male dominance and sexual aggression.

Many lesbian, bisexual, gay, and transsexual (LGBT) activists have found the concept of compulsory heterosexuality useful in advancing their cause of eliminating institutional heterosexism and homophobia, as it draws attention to the ways in which heterosexuality is socially constructed as the only normal form of sexual expression and the ways in which it reinforces traditional gender roles. Thus, through an articulation of compulsory heterosexuality, some LGBT groups are able to gain allies in the straight community by showing how the institutionalization of heterosexuality creates a power imbalance not only between homosexuals and heterosexuals but also between men and women.

Concerned Women for America

Concerned Women for America (CWA) is a right-wing Christian women's public policy organization, founded in 1979 by Beverly LaHaye, in San Diego, California. It is one of the largest and most influential Christian Right organizations, alongside the Christian Coalition and the Family Research Council. CWA, currently led by President Wendy Wright, has since grown to 500,000 members and is headquartered in Washington, D.C. Although primarily a women's organization, CWA welcomes support from men who share the organization's values. CWA's Web site states that its mission is "to protect and promote Biblical values among all citizens—first through prayer, then education, and finally by influencing our society—thereby reversing the decline in moral values in our nation." To this end, CWA focuses upon six core issues that they consider to be of high significance to American citizens: family, sanctity of human life, education, pornography, religious liberty, and national sovereignty.

These core issues are reflected in CWA's campaigns and lobbying. CWA advocates the heterosexual nuclear family as the ideal environment in which to raise children and is therefore strongly opposed to gay marriage. Consequently, CWA has placed great emphasis upon upholding the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA). CWA believes that men and women are naturally destined to adopt different roles in the family, and they express concern about attempts that have been made to challenge these natural roles. Because of these views, CWA is concerned about the threat that radical feminism poses to traditional family values, and they oppose the promotion of radical feminist perspectives, particularly among young women. CWA campaigns against any attempts to intervene with natural human life and is therefore opposed to abortion and euthanasia. CWA also campaigns against representations of sex and violence on television and promotes the rights of parents to determine what kind of education their children receive, particularly with respect to their exposure to sex education. CWA especially condemns organizations such as Planned Parenthood that provide safer-sex advice and make contraception accessible to teenagers. Instead, they advocate abstinence-only sex education programs.

CWA produces the magazine Family Voice for its members, in addition to hosting a daily radio show called Concerned Women Today. Through these media, members of CWA and those who share similar values are urged to lobby senators. The high rates of response that these calls for action receive mean that CWA's influence should not be underestimated when it comes to its capacity to influence law and policy.

Consciousness-Raising

Consciousness-raising is the term used by second-wave feminists for their efforts to develop a heightened understanding of the difficulties facing them as women. Their primary method was to meet as a group—in the absence of men and with various ground rules (e.g., no interrupting). In these groups, they discussed jobs, parenthood, and other topics relevant to their lives. The goal was to produce new knowledge about women's lives as a basis for activism. This knowledge was to be based on their personal experiences. Consciousness-raising techniques became very specialized and methodical, and the knowledge generated has been very influential on feminist thought, research, and practice. Although one does not hear about consciousness-raising groups as much today, they had a profound influence upon radical feminist theorizing at the time, and many of the works produced by group participants (e.g., The Dialectic of Sex, by Shulamith Firestone) are still very well-known.

Origins

At one point in the film Malcolm X, Malcolm is in prison, reading a dictionary with a fellow inmate. The inmate points out to Malcolm that the dictionary associates positive ideas with the word white but negative ideas with the word black. Malcolm notes that the dictionary was written by white people, and this is an important incident in his move toward a Black nationalist ideology. Many advocates of oppressed groups have held the idea that people in these groups (and other groups) are unconscious, or falsely conscious, about social reality and the need to gain a true consciousness.

This notion of "false consciousness" is most famous among Marxists, who believe that the working classes exist in this state. Georg Lukács was concerned about the class consciousness of the proletariat and the effects of bourgeois ideology on this class of individuals. According to Lukács, bourgeois ideology was a form of false consciousness inasmuch as it concealed the "true" nature of social relations for the proletariat, and true consciousness would come to the proletariat as this class moved through history. Louis Althusser proposed that society was composed of "Ideological State Apparatus" and the "Repressive State Apparatus." The Ideological State Apparatuses included institutions such as religion, education, and government, which promoted beliefs and ideas supportive of the status quo and even dictated people's very identities to an extent. For Althusser, science was an alternative to ideology. Finally, Paulo Freire believed that oppressed persons are often subjected to ideas that cause them to see their oppression through the eyes of the oppressors— or as something ordained by God. Many second-wave feminists developed their own political consciousness through participation in these debates over ideology and false consciousness.

Practice and Method

According to Kathie Sarachild, consciousness-raising began among radical feminist women who wanted to develop a greater understanding of the social status and oppression of women. However, they did not want to depend on formal research and literature because they believed better information could come from the everyday lives and experiences of women themselves. This information could then be applied to their activism and political activity as had been done in other movements. This is similar to the Marxist idea of praxis: an interplay of theory and practice in everyday life. Some women felt that men's objections to consciousness-raising activities were indicative of their political potential. Men often dismissed the choice of discussion topics as "personal" and "not political." These groups formed the basis for much theory and activism for second-wave radical feminists.

The consciousness-raising method was based upon the idea of women meeting to discuss issues relevant to their everyday lives, and the practice was connected with the common belief that "the personal is political."

That is, women's personal experiences are often intricately connected with the political fact of men's societal power over women. The actual groups often had a number of rules and guidelines to promote consciousness-raising groups and make them places where women felt safe and free to speak. A leaflet by the Chicago Women's Liberation Union advises holding informal weekly meetings with more than 12 women and discussing a different topic each week, with the aim of later building them into action projects. Another set of guidelines suggests that group size should generally be limited to 8 women and suggests a number of ideas, including but not limited to the following: no men present, no women excluded, nonhierarchical, open discussion, and a positive attitude toward other women in the group. At the same time, it is stressed that these are guidelines and not rules, so they may be "bent" or changed if the situation demands, although the general spirit is meant to be maintained. Marge Piercy and Jane Freeman have stressed the importance of maintaining the group as a safe, trustworthy, and nonthreatening space, so that participants will feel comfortable and unrestrained.

Importance

Consciousness-raising was an explicit and central practice within second-wave radical feminism, and although one does not hear about consciousness-raising groups as much today, the phrase is recognizable and the practice is within memory. Much of radical feminist theory has been attributed to this practice. Catharine MacKinnon argues that radical feminist analyses of the position of women in society are formed by elaborating on women's experiences— comparing the experiences and fostering connection between women themselves. Even small or personal issues are up for analysis, and consciousness becomes directly related to women's everyday lives such that it becomes possible to analyze patriarchal power relations in all forms, both overt and hidden/subtle. Consciousness-raising activities have contributed substantially to a unique radical feminist paradigm that identifies sexism and patriarchy in all areas of life and offers possibilities for radical change.

CONTRACEPTION

Contraception (sometimes known as birth control) is an umbrella term that refers to any attempt to reduce the possibility of conception as the result of heterosexual intercourse. It may be carried out by chemical, surgical, mechanical, or behavioral methods, including but not limited to synthetic hormones, sterilization, physical barriers (impeding the movement of sperm), and nonpenetrative sex. Contraception is part of the practice of family planning, which is the deliberate control of population growth by various means to reduce the birthrate, either on an individual level (to plan the timing and spacing of births) or a societal level. As with any issue linked to women's sexuality, the family, or population growth or decline, the availability and use of contraception inspires a great deal of discussion, debate, and controversy.

Contraceptive Methods

With the exception of the male condom, male sterilization (vasectomy), and withdrawal (coitus interruptus), contraceptive methods rely primarily upon the female partner's high motivation, and women generally assume most of the responsibility for their successful use. Contraceptive methods available for women vary widely and range in terms of ease of access and availability, reliability, and level of medical intervention. They consist of behavioral methods such as abstinence, fertility awareness (practices that revolve around ovulation cycles, including periodic abstinence, calendar charting, cervical mucus monitoring, basal body temperature reading, and cervical observation), and the lactational amenorrhea method (used solely by women who have recently given birth and are breastfeeding); surgical methods such as female sterilization (involving surgery in the form of either tubal libation or the considerably more invasive hysterectomy); and mechanical and chemical methods, such as vaginal barriers (diaphragm, cervical cap, sponge) inserted prior to intercourse and requiring the use of a spermicide (a chemical that kills or immobilizes sperm), intrauterine devices (IUDs) (variously shaped objects medically inserted into the uterus to alter its lining and prevent conception), and hormonal methods (the contraceptive patch or implant, oral contraception, and the vaginal ring), which work through the addition of synthetic hormones to interrupt the process of ovulation.

The female condom, a barrier contraceptive controlled by women created as an alternative to the male condom, exists as the only female-initiated means to prevent both pregnancy, sexually transmitted infections (STIs), and the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). Lauded as a method that would provide women with greater control over their own sexuality, health, and fertility, the female condom developed from a broader understanding of gender-based inequalities that often make it difficult for women to negotiate (much less insist on) male condom use. Approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in the United States in 1993 (and revamped to a "new and improved" version in 2005), worldwide adoption of this barrier method has been slow in part because of its higher learning curve and elevated cost.

Introduced in North America in the 1960s, the oral contraceptive pill (commonly known as simply "the Pill") had enormous social impact. Utilizing a combination of one or two hormones (both estrogen and progesterone together or in the case of the "mini-pill" progesterone alone), it prevented ovulation and was considered to be 95% to 99% effective if used correctly. Initially made (legally) available to married women only, it was considered to be the most effective method of contraception to date, and it was promoted as a "worry-free" way for couples to determine the size and spacing of their offspring and to help them preserve (or improve) their standards of living. For women, it provided unprecedented control over their fertility, and its management was separate from sexual activity, effectively eliminating the difficulties of negotiation with a male partner and allowing for spontaneity. However, its most significant impact lay in the public understanding of a contraceptive method that successfully divorced reproduction from sexual activity. The Pill's enormous popularity and rapid adoption in the Western world amplified debates surrounding women's sexuality, promiscuity, and the moral ramifications of premarital sex.

Conclusion

Contraception likely dates to the moment humanity first understood the link between fertilization and pregnancy, and evidence of the use of contraceptive methods date back to antiquity. By the mid-20th century, however, scientific and medical advancements led to a more widespread public acceptance of their use. Despite the remarkable progress in contraceptive technologies in recent years, there is no single method considered to be simple, easy to use, comfortable, and problem-free. Contraception is not only an individual matter: Social institutions such as the church (in particular Roman Catholicism) and the state have intervened at various times, inciting debates regarding the proper role of sexuality and its relationship to procreation as well as its role in the provision or prohibition of contraceptive methods. Women's right to contraception has been a central concern for women's movements since the turn of the 20th century and remains at the forefront of feminist platforms for gender equity in the home, at work, and in heterosexual relations. Despite technological and medical advances, contraceptive use is not equally distributed, and in many instances, choice is limited and access is difficult, resulting in an unmet need for contraception throughout the world.

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women

The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) is the principal human rights treaty derived from the United Nations to define discrimination against women. Adopted in 1979, the treaty consists of 30 articles and includes an Optional Protocol (OP). The purpose of the OP is to provide an alternative mechanism to hold governments accountable to a respective treaty or to further elaborate on any substantive topic within the treaty itself. In the case of CEDAW, the OP consists of the Communications Procedure, which enables people to complain directly to the CEDAW monitoring committee, and the Inquiry Procedure, which empowers the CEDAW monitoring committee to investigate systematic forms of discrimination against women. Known as the International Bill of Rights for Women, CEDAW had been ratified by 84 countries as of August 2006. As of this date, the United States was the only industrialized country not to have ratified the treaty. Furthermore, the United States has inserted more reservations to CEDAW than to any other major human rights treaty. Reservations curtail the legal obligation to the treaty.

Once governments ratify the convention, they are obligated to report to the CEDAW monitoring committee regarding their compliance. The initial report is due 1 year following ratification and 4 years thereafter. This reporting process then essentially requires states to adopt concrete actions to eradicate gender-based discrimination. Failure to do so results in noncompliance and a violation of international law.

Article 1 defines discrimination against women as follows:

> Any distinction, exclusion or restriction made on the basis of sex which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by women, irrespective of their marital status, on a basis of equality of men and women, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field.

This definition provides the basis for the remainder of the treaty. CEDAW proposes the incorporation of affirmative action policies and the reenvisioning of education for women and girls to move beyond educational access, and it is the only international treaty to protect reproductive rights. Other topics discussed in CEDAW include sex trafficking and exploitation; political and civil rights, such as the right to vote; health, employment, and marriage; and specific issues impacting rural women, such as access to agricultural credit and loans. Criticisms of CEDAW include its failure to integrate discrimination based on sexual orientation and race/ethnicity.

COOPER, ANNA JULIA (1858–1964)

Author, community leader, and educator Anna Julia Haywood Cooper was the daughter of Hannah Stanley, a slave, and a male slave owner. Her mother's sacrifices inspired her throughout her life. Anna tutored other students beginning in 1867, when she was only 9 years old, at St. Augustine's Normal and Collegiate Institute, and remained there until 1881. Thus, her interests in black women, democracy, and education started early.

On June 21, 1877, Hannah married George A. G. Cooper, from Nassau, British West Indies. He was a minister in the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina, but he soon died, on September 27, 1879. Cooper entered Oberlin College, in Ohio, where she studied with Mary Church Terrell and Ida A. Gibbs (Hunt), who also became community leaders. Cooper completed both a BA and an MA at Oberlin and was recruited shortly thereafter in 1887 to teach at the Washington High School (later M Street School), where for many years she was the only African American on the faculty of the all-black school.

In 1892, Cooper published her most important book, A Voice From the South. These compiled speeches and papers, starting in 1884, discussed race, womanhood, education, and community activism. In this era, most African Americans lived in the South, with little participation in American politics and civil society. Women's voices were particularly absent, and Cooper displayed their unique contributions. Cooper's idea that only black women can announce "when and where I enter" with dignity and nonviolence and represent the "whole Negro race" that "enters with me" is a rallying call for black women today. Cooper defended higher education for black women, a cause to which she devoted much of her life. She called for a free womanhood for all women and a literature that reflected the life and times of everyone.

The following year, Cooper discussed the groundbreaking paper of Fannie Barrier Williams presented at the World's Columbian Exhibition in Chicago. Frederick Douglass was so moved by the black woman's eloquence at this session that he claimed it was a higher achievement than he had hoped to see in his lifetime.

Cooper taught math and science at M Street Colored High School (renamed "Paul Laurence Dunbar") in Washington, D.C., from 1887 to 1901. From 1901 to 1906, she became the school's principal. In 1904 and 1905, a political controversy waged over her leadership, and she was criticized for her "radical" teaching philosophy that black students should be held to the same high standards as white students. Her contract was not renewed in 1906. For the next 4 years, she taught at Lincoln University, in Jefferson City, Missouri.

Cooper was the only woman in the American Negro Academy, founded in 1897 by Alexander Crummell, and was a member of the Southern Sociological Congress in 1913. She cofounded the Colored Women's League in 1894, served as a trustee of the Colored Settlement House, and addressed the first pan-African conference in London in 1900.

Over the course of her life, Cooper adopted seven children, including five great-nieces and great-nephews, ranging from 6 months to 12 years. As they matured, Cooper periodically continued her graduate studies, and in 1923, she began full-time studies at the Sorbonne University, in Paris. In 1925, she completed her doctoral dissertation on "The Attitude of France Toward Slavery During the Revolution" and earned her PhD in literature. Cooper was the fourth African American women to receive a PhD.

In 1930, during the Great Depression, Cooper was appointed the second president of Frelinghuysen University, in Washington, D.C. Founded in 1907 to educate the neglected "colored working people," the university offered many night classes and established a law school. Severe financial difficulties developed during Cooper's administration, and the university lost the law school and its charter in 1937.

Cooper's great-niece, whom she had hoped would continue her work for many years, died in 1939. In 1951, Cooper privately published Personal Recollections of the Grimke Family and the Life and Writings of Charlotte Forten Grimke, in honor of her lengthy friendship and intellectual alliance with the Grimkes.

Cooper died peacefully at the age of 105, having achieved many of her goals as a community leader, educator, activist, wife, mother, and scholar.

COSMETIC SURGERY

Cosmetic, or aesthetic, surgery is a medical procedure that a person undergoes with the objective of altering her or his appearance. Cosmetic surgery differs from rehabilitative or reconstructive surgery, in which the surgeon seeks to repair a damaged feature of the body. With regard to function, the body, which is to be manipulated through cosmetic surgery, is not usually impaired. Cosmetic surgery, which falls under the larger category of plastic surgery, is usually an elective procedure that patients seek to undertake, and therefore health insurance providers infrequently cover its costs. However, some countries' basic health insurance plans (such as the Netherlands) will recompense the costs of aesthetic surgery if a physician deems it to be necessary.

Although the origins of cosmetic surgery reach back over 100 years, the growth in its popularity in the past two decades has been phenomenal. As technologies progress, negative health implications are reduced, surgical options expand, and the number of surgeons who perform these procedures increase, cosmetic surgery has become an expansive, lucrative industry. While no official comprehensive governmental statistics are collected on cosmetic surgery patients, the dramatic increase in the number of procedures has been documented by formal cosmetic surgery organizations. Whereas in the early 1980s, only a few hundred thousand cosmetic procedures had been completed, the number of surgeries has risen substantially to over 11 million in 2005, according to the National Clearinghouse of Plastic Surgery Statistics by the American Society of Plastic Surgeons (ASPS).

Even though cosmetic surgery is still a costly endeavor, with fees ranging from a few hundred dollars for less invasive surgery to several thousands of dollars for extensive surgeries, decreasing costs across the board have led to a democratization of cosmetic surgery, as it has become a more realistic option for people of diverse socioeconomic backgrounds. According to the American Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery, Americans spent over $12 billion on cosmetic procedures in 2005. Women have accounted for the vast majority of cosmetic surgery patients (approximately 90%), and the distribution of women and men within specific kinds of surgical procedures is evident as well. Additionally, racial minorities obtained approximately 20% of all cosmetic procedures, which is a recent development. An overview of the history of cosmetic surgery and the cultural ideologies of appearance suggests that cosmetic surgery both reflects and perpetuates gender ideals about what is considered normal and attractive.

History of Cosmetic Surgery

The origins of cosmetic surgery demonstrate the collusion that once existed between reconstructive and aesthetic procedures. The earliest forms of plastic surgery date back to the 14th century in Italy and reemerged in India in the late 1700s, where doctors were able to successfully graph skin for the purpose of reconstructing facial deformities due to congenital defects and disfiguring diseases. In fact, the syphilis epidemic of late 16th century has been named as sparking the rise in aesthetic surgeries. Likewise, the necessity of repairing soldiers' injuries in World War I is attributed as the true beginning of modern plastic surgery. With the help of surgeons, diseased and wounded faces could pass as healthy and normal. Additionally, people of marginalized backgrounds (racial, ethnic, and religious minorities) were able to utilize plastic surgery in some cases to alleviate discrimination. In particular, some found relief in altering easily recognizable racial features (particularly the nose) for the purpose of "passing" as a member of the dominant group. The ability of surgeons to help patients join social groups from which they were previously excluded due to physical reasons became apparent and demanded.

Surgical alteration of the body became a way for people to transcend categories of sex, race, and age, although the larger population did not greet this transformation so readily, as it was thought to be devious to hide the signs of illness or low status. From reconstruction, it was only a small step to offer cosmetic procedures to those who judged their physical appearance to be substandard. While plastic surgery saw its roots in the restoration of health, its usefulness spread to encompass a larger group of consumers, including those who were simply unsatisfied with their levels of attractiveness. In effect, unattractiveness became pathologized, and aesthetic surgeries could still be viewed through a medicalized lens.

Cosmetic procedures were still considered to be controversial because for many people, the permanent alteration of the body remained a religious and moral question not to be handled by doctors. Cosmetic surgeons, or "beauty doctors," as they were sometimes referred to, were criticized and demeaned for their practice. They were accused of quackery because their certification system was not formalized, the procedures were experimental, and they were operating on physically healthy people, which was unheard of at the time. However, the goal of surgeons was a utilitarian form of happiness for their patients by giving them the ability to transform into more accepted members of the community. Still, the aesthetic and reconstructive fields began to separate from one another as cosmetic surgery became popularly associated with a wider assortment of (needless) customers, advertisement of a product, excessive fees, and lower levels of professionalism than in the reconstructive field. Even so, the field of cosmetic surgery was too vast and further divided among itself into specialties that were overseen by many emerging governing bodies. These organizations served to standardize training and requirements across the field. The first organization, the American Association of Plastic Surgeons, was developed in 1921, the same year that the first beauty pageant, Miss America, was held in Atlantic City, New Jersey.

The evolution of cosmetic surgery has not been without tribulations. Over the years, recipients of cosmetic surgery have endured a variety of adverse side effects. In addition to the standard risks (infection, blood clots, aspiration, and low blood pressure) and consequences (pain, bruising, and nausea) associated with general surgery and anesthesia, errors in technique or choice of materials have occurred. Notably, the injection of paraffin into wrinkles, cheeks, and women's breasts proved to have poor health implications, as the substance tended to migrate to other areas of the body, causing paraffinomas, or wax cancers. Likewise, the use of silicone or sponges in breast implants (first procedure done in 1963) resulted in hematomas, migration, leakage, and rupture. Although these instances did not improve the status of cosmetic surgeons, failures such as these are not average.

Doctors in the aesthetic surgery field have regained much respect and have, in effect, become experts in beauty standards. Cosmetic surgeons have great authority in their interactions with patients, particularly in deciding which patients/features are worthy of cosmetic surgery (what is considered a "defect" or "unattractive"). In screening patients, they seek patients with the "correct" motivations and expectations. In most cases, the surgeon has the ability to deny patients the procedures that they seek or persuade patients into additional or alterative procedures. The resulting power dynamic between surgeon and patient may be quite imbalanced.

In recent years, cosmetic procedures have become routine and normalized. Ironically, the natural process of aging has become pathologized and treated as a medical defect, while doctors refer to plastic surgery as if it were the normal and natural thing to do to prevent aging. Surgery has become a form of self-care or upkeep.

Changing Beauty Ideals

Beauty in the 19th century referred primarily to internal traits, such as purity, piety, and self-denial. Toward the end of the century, the idea of beauty also began to include some outward characteristics, such as clothing. Changes in the 20th-century social climate, such as the invention of print media and the growth of commercial industries, put an emphasis on external characteristics, leading many people to begin to judge beauty by these features. New behaviors such as exposing previously covered parts of the body, bleaching and dying hair, and shaping bodies into the fashionable curvatures of the time came into popularity, as well as the invention of numerous products that aided consumers in improving their appearance. Dr. Charles C. Miller, known as the father of modern cosmetic surgery, recognized the value that would be placed on appearance in modern society. He understood that the process of aging could be very detrimental for women's social positions and mental states. This stood particularly for women whose marriageability was necessary for their livelihood, as appearance became recognized as an important asset to earning a living.

Although the 1980s and 1990s placed an increasing emphasis on transforming bodily physique through activity (exercise and diet), approval of cosmetic surgery to enhance the appearance continued to climb steadily. The advent of print media in the early 1900s has been attributed with the commercializing of beauty and the popularizing of cosmetic surgery, and this continues today. Analyses of female-targeted magazines (and a growing proportion of male-oriented magazines as well) have shown particular emphasis on the body and ideal appearances that many scholars regard as a homogenization of appearance standards. These scholars claim that an ideal appearance (thin, young, soft featured, Caucasian) is largely recognizable as ideal and pursued by members of the society as an image that they would like to achieve. Magazines, in addition to other forms of media that promote a culture of celebrity, have been implicated in the creation of unobtainable ideal appearances for men and women. Those who wish to emulate these attractive appearances may endlessly find themselves with perceptions of bodily imperfections, which may drive them toward cosmetic surgery. However, it should be noted that several scholars who have researched cosmetic surgery hopefuls have recognized that many women who seek surgery for their looks do not wish to obtain the ideal beauty, but instead they desire to be normal. The question of what a "normal appearance" is in a society where the ideal is atypical has yet to be defined.

Popular Types of Cosmetic Surgery

The list of popular cosmetic surgeries is ever expanding as medical technologies improve. They range from noninvasive to extremely invasive procedures. Some less invasive, nonsurgical procedures include botulinum toxin (Botox) injections (a substance injected in areas of deep wrinkles to relax the contraction of muscles), laser hair removal (elimination of unwanted hair on the body by causing thermal and/or mechanical damage to the follicle), hyaluronic acids (a "derma filler" such as Restylane injected into wrinkles and folds), microdermabrasion (resurfacing of the skin with an exfoliant for the purpose of rejuvenation), chemical peels (chemicals applied to the skin to promote peeling of old skin so new skin can be exposed), collagen and fat injections (inserted into skin to smooth wrinkles), and sclerotherapy (treatment for varicose veins). Nonsurgical procedures account for the vast majority of cosmetic surgeries.

More invasive surgical procedures include lipectomy (or liposuction, the removal of unwanted fat from various parts of the body), mammoplasty (or breast augmentation, the enlargement, reduction, or other reshaping of the breasts), blepharoplasty (removal of excess fat and skin from the eyelid), rhinoplasty (or nose job, the increase, decrease, or reshaping of the nose), abdominoplasty (or the "tummy tuck," the reshaping and firming of the abdomen), and rhytidectomy (or face-lift, the removal of excess facial skin). As of 2005, the most popular surgical procedures among women were lipoplasty, breast augmentation, blepharoplasty, abdominoplasty, and breast-lift. For men, the top five procedures were lipoplasty, rhinoplasty, blepharoplasty, male breast reduction and face-lift.

While noting that racial minorities have seen rapid increases in the number of those who elect for cosmetic procedures, there is also a variation in types of cosmetic surgeries chosen by different racial and ethnic groups. On the top of the list for Caucasian women are liposuction, breast augmentation, and wrinkle reduction. Hispanic Americans find nose reshaping, breast augmentation, and liposuction to be most desirable. For Asian Americans, the most popular surgeries are double-eyelid creation and rhinoplasty. Liposuction, tummy tucks, breast augmentation, lip augmentation, and rhinoplasty are among the most common surgical procedures for African Americans. Surgeries that are recently increasing in popularity include labiaplasty (reducing or reshaping female external genitalia), penile augmentation (penis enlargement) and implants of the calf, pectoral, bicep, buttocks, and cheeks.

Cosmetic Surgery as an Accomplishment of Gender

In an appearance-centered culture, cosmetic surgery can be advantageous to those who wish to climb the social and economic ladder. In fact, studies have documented that being attractive awards one with many social benefits, including higher pay, better grades, and better outcomes in the courtroom and the job and dating markets. Often, an attractive appearance has a halo effect; that is, people with attractive appearances are thought to have better social characteristics than those deemed unattractive. A further examination of the underlying and embedded ideology regarding gender, attractiveness, and success suggests that appearance matters more for women; that is, women are expected and promoted to maintain a high level of attractiveness to succeed as women in society. In this way, the use of cosmetic surgery has also been acknowledged as an accomplishment of gender.

Cosmetic surgery is primarily viewed as a women's issue to such a degree that it is thought to be natural or normal for women to pursue it. This is not the case for men, who are perceived as more instrumental than ornamental in their characteristics. Thus, women's intrinsic quest for beauty (or narcissism) is popularly believed to be the motivation for cosmetic surgery. Because the beauty ideals are not as strict for men, surgery is less necessary, as they are able to "get away with" more abnormal features. When men do decide to undergo cosmetic surgery, their motivations are more likely to be rooted in moving up the corporate ladder. Through the gender lens, we can see the differential way in which male and female surgery-goers are perceived.

Naomi Wolf, author of the book titled The Beauty Myth: How Images of Beauty Are Used Against Women, addresses the oppressive nature of beauty expectations largely targeted at women. Just as Betty Freidan referred to the feminine mystique as a method to keep "women in their place" by reducing them to domestic servitude, Wolf asserts that the "beauty myth" is undermining women's advancement by reducing them to beauties instead of serious competitors in the social arena. Even in the face of economic and professional advancement, women's self-worth may be wrapped up in their appearances, and thus they are compelled to purchase and use cosmetics, visit beauty salons, restrict their caloric intake, and perhaps undergo cosmetic surgery. Wolf argues that some cosmetic surgeries, such as breast augmentation, are forms of sexual control of women and that the pain and danger women endure is often for the sake of male approval. She makes a case that choosing to undergo cosmetic surgery is not actually a choice: When the options are perishing in a society where one's appearance is not valued or surviving by altering the body through cosmetic surgery, it is a false choice. Women make the choice for surgery under duress because they wish to keep their jobs and continue to be accepted members of the community. Furthermore, Wolf describes women's obsession with appearance as a backlash against the women's movement and claims that nothing short of a third-wave feminist movement will remedy the ills caused by this objectification of women.

Conclusion

Many social researchers on the topic of cosmetic surgery have addressed the degree to which women are agents in their pursuit of aesthetic procedures. However, interpretations of how active women are in decision making are quite different from one another. Some scholars look at those who partake in cosmetic seen by many feminist critics as objectifying in the extreme. Many contemporary critics point out that the lady in courtly love texts is either present only as an addressee or object to be worshipped or she exists as a stern and capricious mistress—demanding that her lover perform superhuman feats in order to win as little as a glance from her eyes.

Courtly love is characterized in remarkably similar ways across texts and cultures in the Middle Ages. Most notable is the male lover's physical suffering in response to his love for his lady. Though many of the descriptions of such somatic longing have become clichés today (images of burning hearts, being pierced by the arrows of love, withering away when love is denied), many of the texts from the 12th through the 15th centuries depict male lovers whose suffering quite literally showed on their bodies. Paradoxically, the courtly lady is both the cause of such suffering (the piercing arrows are often described as coming from her eyes) and the healing balm for her constricted admirers. Capellanus outlines many of the "rules" of proper courtly love in his text: To be counted as true courtly love, the love must remain secret; exist outside of marriage; inspire the male lover to act more nobly, valorously, and bravely; cause both lovers to become jealous (jealously increases love); and never be consummated. The interdiction against sex helps us to realize the presence of idealized values in courtly love texts. In fact, it is a prohibition that is not followed in many romance texts from the period. However, even in those texts in which the lovers do enjoy a physical relationship, the woman continues to occupy her elevated or spiritualized position.

Because of its very specific resonance with court culture in the Middle Ages, courtly love is often difficult to separate from the discourse of chivalry. Specifically, the male lover is expected to pledge himself to his lady using terms borrowed from chivalric practices and texts: He "becomes her man"; he pledges loyalty to her alone; he kneels before her, head bowed; he fights for her in jousts and tournaments; and he promises to protect her reputation and good name from any detractors. The love of a lady was said to inspire more noble actions from male lovers, making them better knights. However, there were those in the period who argued that the love of a lady distracted a knight from his chivalric responsibilities. Equally, there were those who argued that a knight should be chaste—because he was a representative of Christian values—and so earthly love was considered a temptation to be avoided. Interestingly, there are many devotional texts from the period that praise the Virgin Mary in the language of courtly love, suggesting that the knight devote himself to her (beautiful, pure, capable of providing the healing balm of salvation to her devotees) as opposed to the women he might encounter in medieval court culture.

Despite its contradictions and complexities, the idea of courtly love (the idea of a heterosexual relationship based on idealization and suffering) has been noted by many scholars as being deeply entwined in our current understanding of love and of gender relations. The figure of the "damsel in distress" or the beautiful woman who must be rescued by a knight in shining armor finds current articulation not only in Disney films, but in romantic comedies, sitcoms, and musical lyrics, to name only a few. Some scholars argue that the courtly love relationship gives power to the woman (she can both harm and save the male lover), but such power remains in the service of patriarchal ends (the making of "better" men).

Courtship

Courtship, or the ritualistic ways in which individuals seek partners, has changed much over the course of American history. Changes in marriage, gender relations, and intimacy over time have impacted the ways individuals find partners and spouses. In the United States, courtship can be understood as moving through three distinct phases: courting/keeping company, traditional dating, and contemporary dating culture. Within each of these periods, gender has played an important role in both how individuals meet partners and who is in charge of different aspects of courtship. These periods are also reflective of and overlap with changing attitudes about love and marriage in American culture.

Courting and Keeping Company

Courting was the predominate way in which middle- and upper-class men and women sought partners during the middle to late 1800s. The goal of courting was to find a partner for marriage. During this period, ideologies of spiritual love were common. The ideal marriage partner was seen as a partner and companion who could help provide for the other as a stable, reliable spouse. Sex was desexualized and seen as appropriate only within spiritual/marital unions. Relationships based in lust or pleasure were seen as troublesome in that these characteristics were not legitimate measures of the appropriateness of a union.

During this period, women met potential partners at social events, church, or through friends and relatives. Young women invited different male suitors to call on them or to visit them at their homes during pre-arranged hours. The couple then sat and visited with one another, often in the company of the woman's mother. Once invited to visit, men were free to visit the home during calling hours. If a woman was not interested in visiting him, her mother or other relative would inform him that she was unavailable. After visiting a woman who was "unavailable" a few times, men were expected to understand that she was no longer interested in seeing him. After courting several young men over a period of time, a woman found a man she was interested in marrying. At this point, the young couple stopped courting and started "keeping company," or visiting each other exclusively in hopes that they would be good marriage partners. The couple was given more privacy when they visited so that they could get to know each other better.

There were three key features of courtship at this time. First, it was controlled by women. Young women and their mothers often invited men over to visit and controlled many aspects of courtship, such as what the couple did while visiting and who was allowed to visit. While a bold young man could ask whether he may visit, it was not a commonly accepted practice. In addition, courting and keeping company was done predominantly in private. Couples did not go out into public in order to engage in activities as a couple, but instead generally courted within the women's home or visited at community social events. Finally, ideologies of spiritual love promoted marriage as a rational institution, in which being compatible partners was favored over sexual attractions.

Dating Culture

Courtship shifted to dating, when couples would go out together to public places to have fun, during the late 1800s and early 1900s. Changes in women's gender expectations and industrialization provided a bulk of the movement behind this shift. Higher education, service sector work, and other opportunities allowed women to develop identities apart from being wives and mothers. In addition, the shift to a consumer and paid-work-based culture provided young adults with new opportunities to spend money, such as restaurants, dance halls, movies, and theaters. Different institutions were becoming more prominent in the lives of young men and women, such as school, college, and workplaces, which exposed them to a large pool of potential dating partners. As a result, the purpose of dating was primarily to have fun, not to find a marriage partner. However, couples would form after several dates if they were interested in having more-exclusive relationships.

Dating was based primarily on couples going out together and engaging in public activities that generally involved spending money. The availability of disposable income and increased leisure time allowed both men and woman to invest money in dating. However, the way money was used to obtain dates varied for men and women. Men were in control of dates and were expected to ask women out. In addition, men were also mostly responsible for planning and paying for the date. In exchange, men were granted increased status among their peers. Providing a date with flowers and an exciting evening made men attractive partners for women to go on dates with, since dating was generally understood as a form of leisure.

Women were also expected to spend money on dates, but in a dramatically different way. Since having many dates with different men provided women with increased status, women spent time and money to make themselves attractive to men. They spent money on clothing, cosmetics, and other personal care items that would help increase their sex appeal to men. In exchange for the money they spent to be attractive and secure dates, women experienced an increase in status from being popular but also enjoyed participating with men in activities that they were not expected to pay for.

These highly differentiated gender roles constructed dating as an activity that actively reproduced gender differences between men and women. Dating culture was essentially male controlled; while women may provide some input into what would happen on a date, men were ultimately responsible for putting the date into place. This, in addition to how men and women used money to secure dates, helped support a gender ideology whereby men were financially responsible for women, who, in turn, would be sexually attractive to men and provide entertainment and comfort for them. This dichotomization of gender in dating helped maintain an ideology of separate spheres, such that men's lives were based in the public working world and women's lives were based in the private home-based world. This separation of gender roles went as far as some couples needing to project these images on dates. For instance, if a man was unable to pay for a date, many felt that he should not ask a woman out. However, if his date was sympathetic and willing to help pay, it was considered proper etiquette for her to give him the money privately prior to the date so that it would appear as if he were paying for her. This maintained a public image of the gendered roles on which dating culture relied.

Contemporary Dating Culture

During the 1960s and 1970s, courtship patterns started to shift toward being less ritualized and more gender balanced. The women's movement challenged previously taken-for-granted assumptions about the socially constructed nature of male/female relationships and encouraged women to take more active roles in both the public world and in terms of owning their sexuality. In addition, ethnic and gay/lesbian rights movements challenged dominant ideologies of how people's lives were structured, including private life. These two movements have led to an increase over time in the visibility of both interracial and same-sex relationships.

Economic transitions have also helped facilitate the shift to a less formal dating culture. Young adults have increased their attendance of higher education, which caused an increase in the age of first marriage and an extension of the time people have to look for partners. These changes have led to dramatic increases in the number of couples who premaritally cohabit; couples are able to form semiformal unions as they continue to learn about their potential marriage partners. The final outcome of the weakening of previous courtship patterns is a shift toward more loosely defined gender roles. While this trend still has not produced egalitarian gender relations in courtship, both men and women today are able to take active roles in seeking partners and starting relationships.

One trend that is appearing among younger adults is "hooking up," in which a couple engages in some kind of sexual activity, usually outside of a romantic relationship and without necessarily having had a formal date first. Couples who hook up generally meet up with each other at a social event, such as a party, bar, or gathering of friends. However, for some, a series of hookups provides a basis for the couple to seek to establish a more exclusive relationship with one another. As with dating culture, hooking up is not necessarily oriented toward finding a long-term romantic partner. Instead, it is the outcome of people who do not wish to postpone sexual gratification but are not seeking to marry. The loosening of sexual norms has especially benefited women, who are allowed to explore their sexuality without the social stigma that was once attached to sexually active, unmarried women.

Today, technology such as the Internet continues to transform the way people seek partners; Web sites and telephone hotlines are dedicated to help match up singles. These technologies provide links to individuals who may be separated geographically and those who want to find partners outside of traditional networks. In addition, these services can help facilitate the courtship process by providing individuals specific information about potential matches, such as marital status, religion, and education, that can help individuals narrow down potential partners to those who have characteristics they desire.

While social changes have affected courtship, there remain many similarities over time in how individuals find partners. Family, friends, and social events have always provided young adults with opportunities to meet potential romantic partners. Dating culture continues to provide individuals opportunities to meet others for fun, friendship, and long-term relationships.

CRIME AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE, GENDER AND

Gender is associated with crime in the eye of the public primarily to the extent that it is viewed as a male-dominated activity. It is well documented throughout history and cross-culturally, whether from victim surveys or police reports, that men commit the majority of crimes and that women experience crime much more in the victim role. Until recently, both theory and policy in crime and criminal justice have been driven by the near monopoly men hold on criminal activity. However, in the last 20 years, the rate of female offenders has grown more rapidly than the rate of male offenders. Data from the FBI Uniform Crime Reports show an overall increase in crime rates for women of 15% and a decrease of 2% for men from 1992 to 2001. In addition, even though crime rates have been on the decline in the last few years, the rate of decline for female offenders is substantially less than that for male offenders. Thus, renewed attention to the female experience as criminal and victim has fueled significant theory and research related to the ongoing debate about gender distinctions and crime. This entry examines gender differences in crime and the criminal justice system—specifically, gender differences in past and present crime trends, gendered crime theory, developments in feminine crime theory, and gendered variations experienced by offenders and workers in the police, courts, corrections, and broader criminal justice systems.

Crime Trends

Trends in crime rates as they relate to women can largely be linked to their social and economic status. According to the FBI, women accounted for only 21.4% of all arrests in 2002. Overwhelmingly, when women are arrested and prosecuted, it involves a narrow area of petty criminal activity, namely, larceny and drug offenses. As discussed below, marginalization is key to understanding women's crime trends.

Historical Trends in Women as Criminal Offenders

Race, class, and sexuality play an integral role in female crime trends. Over time, crime trends come to represent not only the particular type and status of the women who commit these crimes but also what type of person and behavior society has deemed criminal. For instance, if society views prostitution as being especially egregious, crime rates will reflect a high number of arrests of women engaged in sex work. Throughout history, crime rates among women indicate that simply being poor was enough to be considered a criminal. Overwhelmingly, women in 14th-century England who were arrested held marginal jobs such as servants and laundresses. They were consistently arrested or accused of crimes like stealing.

Five hundred years later, in 19th-century United States, again the majority of women arrested were poor black and poor white women. Furthermore, women who deviated from the gendered norms of the day were more likely to be sanctioned. For example, the first three people charged in the Salem witchcraft trials were women of low economic and low racial status; some women breached gendered norms by marrying inappropriately or not attending church. As the country became increasingly urbanized, crimes like drunkenness and vagrancy joined theft and shoplifting as those most commonly attributed to women offenders. Finally, marginalized women who violated sexual mores by having children out of wedlock (whether as a result of consensual sex or rape), engaging in prostitution, or having lesbian relationships found themselves severely sanctioned. Such criminalization was part of a broad, ongoing attempt to control women's sexuality.

Throughout history, violent crime has made up a small percentage of female criminal activity. On the relatively rare occasions that women have engaged in violent crime, such as murder or infanticide, their actions reflect the limited options available to them in society. For example, worldwide, many women who engage in infanticide have done so because of the extreme social and economic costs of having a child produced by a rape or forced marriage. When a woman commits murder, the victim is most often a male with whom she has a domestic relationship. Brutality experienced at the hands of husbands, partners, and fathers is the leading motivation for women's violence.

Current Trends in Women Criminal Offenders

While gender-related crimes are more likely to be committed by one sex over another, males and females alike can commit gender-neutral crimes. However, the criminal justice system does not enforce even gender-neutral crimes in a neutral manner, making it difficult to distinguish whether changes in crime trends reflect changes in behavior or changes in enforcement. For example, prostitution, though formally a gender-neutral crime, is the one crime in which women consistently outpace men, outnumbering men almost 2 to 1 in number of arrests. In 2002, women accounted for 63.2% of prostitution arrests, in large part because of the double sexual standards for women and men. In addition, economic marginalization of women on a global scale leaves many women few options for survival other then sex work.

Social and economic marginalization of women is also reflected in the increased arrests of women on alcohol and drug and charges. Drug arrests now surpass fraud and larceny as the most common type of arrest for women. Indeed, the war on drugs has been assessed by some as largely a war against women, as reflected in the greater increase in arrests for women than for men. While women and men are just as likely to engage in initial drug use out of curiosity, women stay involved for a different range of reasons. Research shows that women are more likely than men to respond to strain with self-directed emotions and more likely to self-medicate as a way to treat depression or respond to a crisis. In addition, women with limited skills and opportunities often engage in drug selling as one of the few ways to earn the money necessary to meet their economic needs. Finally, women are pressured to engage in drug marketing by male partners who threaten their well-being. Women make more frequent sales for smaller amounts of illicit substances, thus exposing themselves to greater risk of arrest.

Closely connected with drug use are arrest trends for women driving under the influence (DUI) of alcohol. This is another area in which there appears to be gender bias in arrest and enforcement. The FBI found in 2002 that 10% of all female arrests were for DUI, a 2% increase from 10 years earlier, compared with an 18% decrease for men. Analysts have suggested that arrest trends for this crime have increased for women as a result of greater political outrage about women's consumption of alcohol, not necessarily a result of an actual increase in the women's abuse of alcohol. As in the case of drug use, women's motivation for and ways of drinking also reflect their social class, with lower-social-class behaviors placing women at greater risk for arrest.

Overwhelmingly, women engage in minor, nonviolent crimes, whether drug or property offenses. Property crimes like theft, shoplifting, and fraud make up 20% of female arrests, compared with 8% for men. The concentration of property crime as largely a female offense is associated with their gendered occupations in the workplace. For example, embezzlement has increased significantly for women, but the nature of the crime reflects the disparate positions women and men hold, even as white-collar workers. Female embezzlers are represented in 60% of bank teller positions, compared with 50% of male embezzlers who are represented in professional or managerial positions. Furthermore, men garnered 10 times more financial resources than women through this crime. Finally, consistent with prior observations, men tend to embezzle for personal gain and do so in networks, whereas women are more likely to embezzle alone, to meet family needs. Both gendered behavior and enforcement may explain arrest rates. As women have moved into occupations in the financial world, some have also taken advantage of the opportunity to embezzle. However, because occupational structures tend to be gendered, with women working under greater oversight, it is easier to enforce embezzlement laws against them. Likewise, women are more likely to engage in forgery than burglary, for example, because their employment in retail stores provides them with the information needed to carry out such crimes.

Shoplifting represents yet another area where a gender-neutral crime is enforced along gender lines. While studies dispute whether men shoplift as much or more than women, there is some consensus that women steal more items of lesser value than do men. As in drug transactions, women's increased engagement in visible illicit activity means greater opportunity for arrest. Similarly, motivations for shoplifting differ according to gender. Men tend to shoplift larger-ticket items as a part of larger commercial enterprises, while women shoplift more personal products to meet the needs or perceived needs of their families. Again, economic and social status permeate gendered differences in shoplifting trends. As women are expected to shop as part of their overall managerial domestic duties, stores also expect them to shoplift. Overall, the roles and economic marginality of women inform the motivations and types of crimes they engage in, more often rendering women the targets of inventory control.

Trends in violent crime arrest rates appear relatively stable for women. They consistently make up a small percentage, 17%, of the total number of arrests for violent crimes like murder, assault, robbery, and forcible rape. While research suggests little gendered difference in the motives for robbery, women who commit murder and assault seem to act in response to the victims' aggression. Women more often find themselves in threatening situations and respond in a more aggressive manner. Overall, research shows that the increases in female assault arrest rates reflect the same circumstances that motivate male assault rates: the devolution of inner-city neighborhood social structures combined with economic disruption, drug trade, and peer pressure.

Likewise, of the small percentage of women arrested for homicide, a greater proportion of these murders involve intimate partners. Domestic violence and self-defense are key factors in female-perpetrated murder: When they kill, women are more likely to be defending themselves against a batterer, and most often, they use firearms that their partners previously used to threaten them. In these cases, too, economic marginality is related to female trends in violent crime. Female homicides and assaults are disproportionately located in areas with high concentrations of poverty and economic inequality.

Female homicides are also more likely than male homicides to include a child or stepchild as a victim. In addition, the motivations for these murders differ according to gender. Cross-culturally, female-dominated parental killings occur primarily because the child was unwanted or the mother believes the killing to be in the child's best interest. On the other hand, fathers are more likely to kill out of discipline, jealousy, rejection, or retaliation. Women's economic marginality remains an issue in violent crime: Female homicides and assaults are disproportionately located in areas characterized by poverty.

Crime Theories and Gender

Women and girls have largely been ignored in the field of criminology because female crime has not been defined as a broad social problem. In addition, research on female offenders has been met with obstacles as women and girl offenders are devalued or analyzed through a stereotypical lens. In this section, we examine male-oriented criminological thought and end with feminist theories. Feminist theorists have worked to challenge the dominant, male-oriented theories of crime.

Structural Strain and Subcultures Theories

In the late 1930s, ideas on the etiology of crime moved away from physiological explanations to structural ones. Theory and research focusing on structural strain examined the effect of blocked economic opportunities and the strain to find legitimate ways of achieving the "American dream." Researchers failed to explore the application of this theory to girls. When finally applied to girls, the theory found its limits. In every part of the world, girls experience poverty more acutely than boys, but they do not commit crimes at nearly the same rate. More recent research testing strain theory with girls and women has led to inconsistent results. By focusing on strain caused by blocked economic opportunities, traditional models have excluded the strain caused by abuse, racism, sexism, and acute poverty.

Differential Association

Differential association theory approaches criminal behavior as learned behavior. While girls were initially ignored in the research testing differential association, more recent work suggests that it offers valid explanations for gender differences in crime. First, girls commit less crime because they are socialized and sanctioned differently than boys. Thus, gender expectations limit girls' opportunities to learn crime from their peers. Second, as girls have been given more freedom in society, they have more time to experience delinquent behaviors, and this has led to an increase in female juvenile delinquency. Research shows that a girl is likely to engage in crime if she perceives her female peers as supporting such behavior.

Labeling Theory

Labeling theory examines the consequences of labeling individuals as deviant. According to labeling theorists, certain characteristics—for example, race, sex, gender, and sexual orientation—make people more likely to be labeled as deviant. Once a label has been applied, some individuals take on the deviant identity and commit more crimes. In this theory, the focus is on the type of individual who is labeled. Once again, initial research in this area ignored women or treated them as peripheral concerns. At times, labeling theory has seemed to celebrate the deviant behavior of men and boys. Contemporary research examining gender differences in how labels are applied shows inconsistent results. Nonetheless, labeling theorists have observed that women over time tend to have their behaviors labeled as deviant or a result of mental illness, while male behaviors are labeled as purely bad. Others argue that informal social controls are so effective on women that formal criminal labels are not needed as means of social control.

Social Control Theory

In the 1990s, social control theory turned prior theoretical assumptions on their heads by asking why people do not engage in deviant behavior. In early work, boys' behavior appears to have been celebrated again—this time for their lack of deviance—while girls' conforming behavior was disregarded. Social control research shows remarkable consistency in explaining not only the causes for delinquency for both boys and girls but also the factors that explain different rates of crime among boys and girls. However, it doesn't go far enough in illuminating crime rate differences between boys and girls.

By examining social relationships, social control theory can explain why certain individuals do not commit crimes. Furthermore, by looking at the key social relationship, the family, social control theory asserts that it can explain why girls commit less crimes than boys. Within the family, socialization serves to control girls more so than boys. Boys, not girls, are rewarded for being risk takers.

Marxist/Radical Theories

Critical criminology is based on the tenets of Karl Marx's work on class struggle within the capitalist economic structure. Within this school of thought, crime is analyzed not from the behavior of the offender, but from the behavior of the power elite, which creates and enforces laws that reinforce their interests at the expense of the powerless. Regrettably, critical criminologists also routinely ignore women's crime, despite what some believe is the great potential of sexual stratification in explaining gender differences in crime, victimization, and justice production.

Biosocial and Psychological Evolutionary Theories

Efforts to explain male aggression though biology have proved futile, and some have argued dangerous. Instead, studies in the last decade propose that disparities in aggression are informed by biology in a limited way, if at all. Playing a much more significant role are situational characteristics like prior experience and attitudes toward aggression, culturally gendered scripts, and social learning.

Feminist and Pro-Feminist Theories

In response to established crime theories that either ignored, stereotyped, or inadequately addressed women and crime, a number of theories have emerged to give voice to female victimization and to account for gendered differences in the causes and rates of crime and judicial processing. Feminist theory found its way into criminology during the second and third waves of feminism. Liberal feminism explained differences in crime by examining gender socialization and limited opportunities to commit crime, while radical feminism focused on paternalism and oppression of women in society to explore women's victimization and their transition to offender status. Marxist feminists saw the limited economic opportunities available to women and the feminization of poverty as the main reasons women and girls engage in property crimes.

Women's Liberation/Emancipation Theory

The first theory to expressly speak to women's crime trends emerged in the mid-1970s. Theorists in this arena predicted that the gender equality that the feminist movement brought about would open up women's opportunities for crime and increase female crime rates. Research testing these hypotheses has led to stern criticism of the "liberation theory"; indeed, many argue that it has done more harm than good in understanding feminine crime. The rate of female violent crime has remained stable since the women's movement of the 1970s. Many researchers argue that rates of female property crimes have increased despite the women's movement, not because of it, since the feminist movement primarily benefited white middle-class women and not poor minority women. Specifically, the absence of economic prospects and the "feminization" of poverty have led to the increase in property crimes; and the increased rates of arrest for prostitution and overall increasing rates of incarceration of women and girls suggest that women's liberation did not benefit all equally.

Social Power Theory

Social power theory builds on social control theory and incorporates work and family gender power relations as a way of explaining gender differences in crime rates. Social power theorists assert that as women gain more positions of power in the workplace, they will hold more power in family relationships. Therefore, girls raised in households where mothers hold more power than they do in patriarchal households are more likely to be risk takers. As risk-taking behavior is associated with delinquency, these girls' rates of delinquency would likely be greater than those of girls raised in less egalitarian families. Unfortunately, research has not supported this explanation with any reliability, particularly as applied to women, largely because social ties alone cannot explain gender differences in delinquency rates.

Masculinities Theory

More recently, researchers have moved toward intersectional analyses (incorporating race, class, and sexuality in theoretical models) and away from essentialism (viewing all women as the same). Theories of masculinities are just one product of this third-wave shift in feminist thought. Exploring the gendered division of labor, relations of power, and sexuality as they intersect with structures of race, class, and gender has generated effective explanations of gender disparities in the causes of crime, crime rates, and processing. For example, according to masculinities studies of crime, men have a greater need than do women to express power as part of the social definitions of masculinity. Indeed, white men have access to economic social structures like the job market and education in which to express power. African American men, on the other hand, do not have equal access to these resources and are more likely to use violence to articulate their power and, in turn, their masculinity.

Feminist criminological theories look at the effects of inequality as it relates to crime, not just through a gendered lens but also through other social locations of oppression. Toward that end, feminist criminologists argue that research requires at least a mixed-methodological approach that employs both quantitative and qualitative tools. Qualitative methodologies supplement more conventional quantitative strategies by giving greater voice to offenders and offering insight into experiences of marginalized social locations.

Recent Research Contributions to Gender and Crime

Pathways or whole-life models of research examine the increasingly clear link between childhood victimization and later criminal activity—a trajectory to which socially marginalized individuals are particularly vulnerable. In addition, abuse, neglect, victimization, family disruption, and homelessness lead to increased risk of drug and alcohol abuse, violent and property crime, and prostitution. With low self-esteem and limited cognitive abilities with which to cope with crises, offenders hold few survival skills to successfully manage the transition to adulthood. Drug use becomes a way to cope, and prostitution and property crimes are ways to survive and support addictions. Educational structures that ignore the signs of abuse and victimhood also reinforce the belief of many female offenders that the future has little to offer them. Neglect at school means that they often drop out with limited skills, further restricting legitimate opportunities for economic security.

The combination of childhood abuse and limited education puts many vulnerable women in abusive and/or exploitative relationships as adults. Often single parents, some women resort to crime as a way of caretaking; others act under duress from their abusive partners to protect their well-being as well as their children's. Women who have been victimized suffer violence at the hands of abusers, as well as gender, class, and racial oppression, which only exacerbates feelings of powerlessness.

Gender and Crime Processing

Three hypotheses of crime processing have emerged to explain women's experiences: "evil women," "chivalrous or paternalistic," and "equal treatment." All three models reflect the power that men hold in the criminal justice system. While historically, most laws have been gender neutral (with the remaining few revised in the 1970s), their enforcement has not. Each of these crime-processing models shows up at varying stages in the criminal justice system; and each model is informed by an offender's class, race, and sexuality. In general, women who are poor and are members of racial minority groups and those who breach gender norms receive harsher treatment.

The "evil-women model" reveals itself during police decision making. Women and girls are sanctioned more harshly than boys and men for not only breaking the law but also violating gender roles. Police interrogate women and girls in non-sex-related crimes about their sexual behavior and add nonconforming behavior to the list of offenses. This is particularly true for female juvenile runaways. The "equal-treatment model" is evident in the pretrial and trial decision-making stages, in which decisions to allow for bail, plea bargains, dismissing a case, and convictions seem to allow for equal treatment among the sexes, with a few exceptions. The chivalry model is most common in the sentencing phase. For example, women who are married, caring for dependents, and homemakers receive lighter sentences. Men who are employed and supporting their families also receive lighter sentences. Overall, cross-culturally, women are more likely to be the primary caretakers and thus receive the lightest sentences.

Gender and Criminal Processing Employment

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and affirmative action laws led to an increase in women attending law school and becoming police and correction officers. However, women still make up only 10% of police and corrections employees. Women in law have achieved considerably better inroads: As many as 37% of lawyers are women, and 26% of judges are female. Despite these numbers, women in all aspects of the criminal justice system report experiencing a culture of resistance to their entry in a male-dominated field. They face exclusion and sometimes hostility from male coworkers and supervisors, sexist assignments, gender-segregated duties, stress associated with their tokenism, and lack of support and recognition for family responsibilities. These factors have led to higher turnover rates, particularly for women police officers, and lower pay for women lawyers.

Conclusion

Women's experiences in crime reflect the status they hold in society. For the most part, their motivations and rates of crime differ from those of men because of gender expectations. While theory and research have long ignored female offenders and victims, in the last decade, researchers have made significant progress toward developing intersectionalist models of crime that explain both male and female offending patterns. Finally, both female offenders and female employees in the criminal justice system experience the hostility of a male-dominated culture that devalues women and resists their entrance into the field. Policy experts assert that until movement toward economic equality occurs, little improvement will be seen for women in the criminal justice system.

CROSS-DRESSING

When men wear women's clothes and/or attempt to impersonate what the culture considers to be a woman, and vice versa, this action is often referred to as cross-dressing. Acts of cross-dressing stress the nature of gender more than sexual pleasure or sexuality. Although the boundaries between sex and gender are never clear, cross-dressing can also pertain to gender performances associated with transvestites, transsexuals, and drag kings and drag queens. While male-to-female cross-dressers were common in Shakespearean theater, music hall, and melodrama, today, drag kings and queens are increasingly visible in urban bar subcultures in the United States and Britain, as well as Asia, Australasia, South Africa, and South America. Cross-dressers and cross-dressing are broad, encompassing terms. Cross-dressers are to be differentiated from transgendered persons whose actions and intentions much of the time run counter to those who cross-dress. No specific gender identity or identification is privileged in the process of cross-dressing, which is not the case with regard to transgender and transsexual practices. The psychic and social dimensions of gender identity are exposed in acts of cross-dressing, though such acts are to be understood more in relation to parody and satire than a desire to be or become a man or a woman.

Cross-dressing, however, may also be differentiated from drag and transvestite performances, something that is aptly exemplified in Sarah Waters's novel (1998) and subsequent primetime drama Tipping the Velvet (BBC, U.K., 2002). The two women protagonists, Kitty Butler and Nan Astley, both cross-dress as men. Kitty, a popular male impersonator in 19th-century London, poses as a man on the music hall stage and convinces audiences of both her masculinity and her femininity. Nan, an oyster girl who arrives in London and needs to earn a living, cross-dresses as a man to make money by having sex with men. Nan's and Kitty's performances as men are convincing because of the persuasive appeal of their clothes and stylization. Nan desires Kitty because of what she imagines to be male and female. Nan is desired by other men because of her "girlish" boy qualities. Cross-dressing, then, allows for a number of identities and identifications to function at the same time. This is because it is often difficult to distinguish between authentic femininity and femininity as masquerade.

As early as 1929, Joan Rivière, the feminist psychoanalyst, contended, in her ground-breaking "Womanliness As Masquerade" that notions of femininity were little more than a succession of masks donned by women in order to endure patriarchy. The core of Rivière's arguments has been reiterated by key feminists since that time and endorses claims that point to the constructed, mediated, and culturally specific nature of gender categories. Recent theory in gender and sexuality studies, as well as activist campaigns from the 1960s onward, suggest that there are uneven yet nonetheless politically significant relationships between gender appearance and clothing and the negotiation of identity in the social sphere. The fact that women can dress as men and can convincingly appear as men, and vice versa, suggests that there is no essential gendered self prior to the construction of masculine or feminine identities via the agency of representation or the trappings of apparel. Subjects come to know the other gendered subject on the basis of an encounter whose dimensions include voice, behavior, look, and dress.

Male and female acts of cross-dressing expose the ways in which gender identities are externalized, constructed via the culture's norms. One norm concerns fashion and clothing, so that men and women are expected to dress differently. Cross-dressing brings into relief the extent to which bodies are made to wear certain clothes and not others. Clothes adorn the body and signal to the observer a specific gender identity. When men wear women's clothes, the act of cross-dressing underlines the ways in which clothes function as masks: They can be assumed and then disavowed. However, because clothes are culturally contingent, gender can be understood as something that one does or that one wears. The doing of gender, through the requirement to wear gendered clothes, serves to stress performative over constative or fixed notions of identity. One of the upshots of such performances (which are also requirements) is that they expose how gender is shaped partly on the basis of dress and on particular ways of stylizing the body. If women wear what are thought to be men's clothes, or vice versa, then women are not only able to provide the illusion of a male gender. They are also able to generate the impression that a gendered sense of self-hood is not as stable as some (essentialist) theories of gender might suggest.

Cross-dressing, regardless of the intention that motivates the act, implies that gender and sexual identities are provisional. If the reality of gender comes about on the basis of a repeated and sustained performance, of which clothes form a necessary performative element, then the notion of an enduring sense of masculinity or femininity is only as permanent as the culture's encodings of gender via clothes and fashion.

Judith Butler's work on parody and gender performance and Judith Halberstam's research into drag kings show how the apparent facticity of gender is not only susceptible to the threat of dissolution, but is problematically positioned in relation to the recovery of prior gendered acts. The cross-dressing subject, in Butler's argument, while its constitutivity ensures that it is open to scrutiny, also means that it is potentially fragmented. The political potential of such fragmentation is not automatic. Perhaps, as Butler proposes, it might establish that the political takes place via the very acts of cross-dressing through which identity is articulated. By focusing on the reiterative status of gender, Butler also points to the regulations, norms, and divisions within which the subject is constituted. Cross-dressing thus shows how gender performances point to the very regulatory regimes that imply and compel gendered enactments in the first instance.

CYBERSEX

Cybersex (also known as computer sex, Internet sex, mudsex, net sex, and cybering) refers to a sexual encounter in which two or more participants who are connected via a computer network engage in sexual activity. In its most common form, participants exchange sexually explicit messages describing physical acts through Internet chat rooms or on instant messaging systems. Usually, the participants are describing acts they are performing or wish to perform with the other individual(s) involved. One of the precursors to the popularity of cybersex is phone sex, or teledildonics, although the latter is usually commercially driven and does not offer the degree of anonymity or the ease of access that cybersex possesses. Cybersex has traditionally been text based, with participants using the written word to describe the sexual activity, whether in chat rooms or through exchanging sexually explicit email or SMS (short message service). Cybersexual encounters have adapted to the technological innovations available as the Internet has evolved. Cybersex can now involve a webcam, allowing individuals to expose themselves visually to their online partners. There are a number of commercial sites that cater to this activity, allowing individuals to masturbate on camera for an audience. The most recent incarnation of cybersex takes place using avatars in multiuser software environments.

The nature of the cybersexual encounter depends on the ability of the participants to be able to describe convincingly and erotically sexual activity for those involved in the exchange. One way of understanding cybersex is as a form of largely synchronous role-playing in which the participants pretend that they are having sexual relations with one another. The only physical sexual activity that takes place, however, is masturbation, whether on the part of those reading/ watching the sexual activity or on the part of individuals who use webcams to film themselves masturbating for the viewing pleasure of others. While cybersex can occur within the context of existing off-line relationships or within the plotlines of online role-playing games, its most common enactment is as the sole contact between individuals who meet only in cyberspace and who often remain anonymous. Opinion is divided as to the impact of the emotional repercussions of cybersex. One view is that cybersex is an insignificant act that possesses no emotional impact in the real world. Another is that it is merely an instance of masturbation assisted by interactive pornography. Yet another is that the emotional feeling contained in a cybersexual encounter is just as significant as that which occurs during face-to-face sexual intercourse.

What is crucial to cybersex and people's attitudes to it is how the relationship between the body, embodiment, and cyberspace is understood. If one is playing a character in an online MMPORG (massive multiplayer online role-playing game) and it is part of the plot that two characters have sex, for example, then is this cybersexual encounter the same as meeting someone in the real world and engaging in sexual activity? Is meeting a stranger in a chat room for a (prearranged or spontaneous) cybersexual encounter the same as picking up someone in a bar for sex? In short, is the body that is enacted (textually or through an avatar) the same as the body that is sitting in front of the computer striking keys? Questions of cyberembodiment are key to these debates. To change one's identity online is only a question of editing one's description—or multiple identities. Is that identity, then, the same as the identity we possess in real life? These are the sorts of questions at the heart of debates about cybersex. More generally, cybersex is often understood as an act of infidelity and has served as the grounds for divorce. This implies that many understand the body that takes part in cybersex as being the same as the body at the keyboard.

It is difficult to identify precisely how cybersexual encounters take place, how often they lead to real-life relationships, and how participants in cybersexual encounters understand the physical and emotional implications of the act. This is because there is a lack of statistical data about cybersex and an unwillingness among participants to discuss their cybersexual encounters. What is undeniable is that cybersex allows for sexual desire to be acted upon without the risk of sexually transmitted disease or pregnancy. It also allows real-life partners who are geographically separated to continue their sex lives. Cybersexual engagement has also been used in some therapy circles to help those who have difficulties with face-to-face sexual intimacy. What some fear is that the relative anonymity of Internet communication allows for children to engage in cybersexual activity, possibly leading to real-life sexual experiences with adults. This has resulted in some citizens' groups patrolling chat rooms, seeking to protect children. Cybersex has received some attention from those working in cybertheory, but the majority of scholarly work on the field comes from those working on Internet and sexual addictions. Technological developments will enable new forms of cybersex to take place, and it is indisputable that cybersex will remain an important component of cybercommunication.

CYBORG MANIFESTO

In 1985, the Socialist Review published the "Manifesto for Cyborgs: Science, Technology, and Socialist Feminism in the 1980s," an article authored by feminist theorist Donna Haraway. A fundamental contribution to the technoscientific turn in feminist theories, Haraway's watershed essay has been reprinted in at least 16 journals and anthologies around the globe. Often referred to simply as the "Cyborg Manifesto," its impact on the feminist study of gender is profound. Following its publication, the cyborg, a fusion of machine and organism, has become the center of a number of approaches to the study of gender relations. Indeed, an entire body of "cyborg feminism" has consequently emerged as an interdisciplinary project that focuses on how technological and scientific (technoscientific) transformations are restructuring gendered power relations in contemporary societies. This entry describes the cyborg and examines the theoretical and political project of the Manifesto.

Haraway draws the image of the cyborg creature from contemporary science fiction. The cyborg, a "cybernetic organism," is a hybrid entity, or a fusion of machine and organism. It is an intermediary entity made possible by transformations in science and technology. As an intermediary, it disrupts the purity of previous separations between machines and humans, fact and fiction, natural and artificial, and pure and impure. It is, therefore, always a partial being with a dual nature. Paradoxically, the cyborg is always simultaneously two seemingly opposite things. It is in this disruption of polarized binaries and in its partial state of being that Haraway sees possibility and revolutionary potential. Therefore, the cyborg's duality and disruption of dualisms is centered in the Manifesto as a metaphor that if applied to socialist feminism can allow for a re-visioning of a feminist socialist politics.

The Cyborg Manifesto constitutes a theoretical intervention and attempt at reinvigorating socialist, materialist feminist approaches to understanding gender in contemporary society. Haraway argues that existing feminist socialist paradigms do not take into account the emerging technoscientific era, an era that she calls the "informatics of domination." The "informatics of domination" is described as the late phase of capitalist expansion that follows the white, capitalist, patriarchal domination of the previous era. In this new era, Haraway argues that patriarchy is equally as pervasive and problematic; however, it is more deeply embedded and covert and therefore more dangerous. Technoscience plays a key role in reconfiguring the way in which the intersecting dimensions of race, class, and gender operate in this late capitalist era. The Manifesto seeks to conceptualize how gender and other relations of power operate in light of this contextual shift. In other words, Haraway argues that the rising centrality of science and technology in everyday life is also changing the way in which patriarchal (and racist, classist, heterosexist) power relationships play out.

Haraway's goal is not merely to describe these changes but also to construct possibilities for dismantling patriarchy and other modes of domination in the emerging technoscientific era. Yet Haraway finds feminist political practice unsuited for this task. She argues that feminist scholarship has either tended to ignore the different experiences of women across various dimensions of power and difference, particularly race and class, or it has fallen into the trap of essentialism. That is, she contends with perspectives that focus too much on the differences between people and argue that coalition can come only through similar biological, racial, and class identities. The contradictory positionality of the cyborg serves as a metaphor for feminist unity in the informatics of domination. It is the common goal of maneuvering in oppositional ways through the new social order that can bring people together, not necessarily identity. In other words, coalition need not be based upon one's race, class, sexuality, gender, or any other natural identification. The goal of opposition to the informatics of domination, not essential sameness, should serve as the basis for coalition. The cyborg, like Haraway's vision of coalition, is filled with difference. This need to push beyond unification based on identity is urgent in the informatics of domination because oppression extends (although differentially) to all women and men regardless of one's gender, race, and class identity.

In a discussion of the global economy, Haraway describes this democratization of oppression. She offers several examples of how, in the global economy of the informatics of domination, capitalism is being restructured through new technologies and how these processes are impacting multiple groups of people globally. For example, in advanced industrial societies, blue-collar working men are increasingly vulnerable to the loss of privileged, unionized jobs as their labor is replaced by machine technology. Additionally, many of these jobs are undergoing rapid feminization and are being outsourced largely to third-world countries to be performed under exploitative conditions by third-world women. Through this global, gendered division of labor, both first- and third-world women and men across racial divides are grappling with the loss of the male wage and global male unemployment. In conjunction with the international, gendered division of labor is the loss of the welfare state in advanced industrial societies, which further exacerbates the poverty produced by structural unemployment of blue-collar working men. Haraway argues that as technology and the economy continue to restructure, many more men and women will face the negative consequences of these transformations.

In light of this, the need for cross-gender and interracial alliances is necessary and urgent for addressing basic issues of survival. In this era, all oppressions are connected to the global capitalist economy, and the reconfigurations of power will increasingly affect even the more privileged (white middle-class men and women) as well. Despite the contradictory and differentially privileged locations, more groups of people have stakes in these new power arrangements. Thus, it is affinity, not identity, that should be the basis of political coalition. The cyborg, argues Haraway, provides a metaphor for this new socialist feminist politics of science and technology—a science that constructs resistance through contradictory hybridic fusions.

While the new economy is producing new forms of exploitation and the democratization of poverty and exploitation, it is also making possible a context in which new collectivities can emerge across the boundaries of gender and race. The image of the cyborg serves as a metaphor for how this boundary breaking can occur. Duality, contradiction, partiality, and difference can and must be transcended through unity around a common goal of resistance in the emerging technoscientific era of global capitalism. Like the cyborg, individuals can also be brought together despite their contradictions and differences. This is the fundamental project of the "Cyborg Manifesto."

Daughters of Bilitis

Daughters of Bilitis (DOB), founded in San Francisco in 1955, was one of the first lesbian organizations to be established worldwide. The organization began as a small, secret social club for lesbians, starting with just eight members. During the late 1950s, other DOB chapters were founded across America and in Australia too, although membership numbers remained relatively small. When DOB was established, there were few opportunities for lesbians to meet, and lesbians were subject to much discrimination and public hostility. The organization took its name from a poem written by Pierre Louÿs called "Songs of Bilitis," where Bilitis was a female character who was romantically associated with Sappho. Among the founding members of DOB were long-standing couple Del Martin and Phyllis Lyon. Martin and Lyon have been key speakers for lesbian rights and authored Lesbian/Woman, the first book to be published by lesbians about life as a lesbian.

Early in the development of DOB, its role and membership criteria came under scrutiny, especially with respect to whether or not heterosexual women should be allowed to join. Conflicting views led some of the original founding members to leave DOB. These changes contributed to redefining DOB as a political organization focused on lesbian rights, rather than as a purely social organization. This was a radical development, given the social stigma of homosexuality at the time.

In October 1956, DOB published the first issue of The Ladder, edited by Lyon, initially under the pen name of Ann Ferguson. The Ladder is usually regarded as the first lesbian serial in America, although an earlier short-lived publication titled Vice Versa had existed in the late 1940s. DOB ceased publication of The Ladder in 1972, following the secret takeover of the magazine by a separatist feminist DOB chapter. This event reflects one of the core tensions that surrounded DOB: whether it should align itself with male-dominated gay rights groups such as its ally, the Mattachine Society, or whether it should identify itself with lesbian separatist feminists. These conflicting perspectives led to DOB's dissolution in the 1970s.

Although plagued by tensions that reflect the difficult and politically loaded social climate, DOB can boast numerous achievements. Socially, DOB facilitated one of the first opportunities for lesbians to meet and share their everyday struggles. Politically, DOB began the long quest to achieve visibility and acceptance for lesbians and to place lesbian rights on the civil rights agenda.

DAY, DOROTHY (1897–1981)

Dorothy Day, cofounder of the Catholic Worker movement, was born in Brooklyn, New York, on November 8, 1897. The Catholic Worker movement centers on the idea of providing hospitality for the homeless and needy while remaining committed to the values of poverty, prayer, fighting injustice, and most importantly, nonviolence.

Day was baptized into the Episcopalian Church, but was not heavily involved in the church during her younger years. She received a scholarship to attend the University of Illinois and studied there for 2 years where she became extremely interested in issues of social justice and grew disenfranchised with organized religions. She explained her disenfranchisement with the Church by stating, "Where were the saints to try to change the social order, not just to minister to the slaves but to do away with slavery?" Day was concerned with ministering to the poor, but she also was tremendously involved with writing and speaking about the need to change society and the social order so that the issue of poverty could be eradicated. After Day left college, she moved to New York and began reporting for The Call, which was New York City's socialist newspaper, though throughout her life she never claimed any particular political party.

An important turning point in her life was the birth of her daughter, Tamar, in 1927. Day decided to baptize Tamar into the Catholic Church because "if belonging to a Church would give her so inestimable a grace as faith in God, and the companionable love of the Saints, then the thing to do was to have her baptized a Catholic." Day felt that her pregnancy with Tamar was a miracle because she had experienced an abortion in the past, which left her unsure if she would be able to conceive a child again. Following Tamar's baptism, Day was also baptized into the Catholic Church.

On December 9, 1932, Day met Peter Maurin, who was a former Christian Brother. Maurin convinced Day to begin a newspaper that would help others see how society could be transformed through nonviolence. On May 1, 1933, the first issue of The Catholic Worker, which numbered 2,500 copies, was distributed in Union Square. Shortly thereafter, Catholic Worker communities began in various cities. The goal of a Catholic Worker house is to promote nonviolence and to provide the poor with shelter, food, and a community. Once, when asked how long individuals were able to stay at a Catholic Worker house, Day responded, "Once they are taken in, they become members of the family. Or rather they always were members of the family. They are our brothers and sisters in Christ" and therefore there is no limit to how long they can stay. This helps illustrate the never-ending hospitality and Christian values present in the Catholic Worker philosophy. More than 180 Catholic Worker communities thrive today.

Day passed away in 1981. Her autobiography, The Long Loneliness, and numerous other works on her life have been published and widely read. Her impact on society through the Catholic Worker movement and the numerous individual lives that she touched through her speeches, writings, and encounters is extraordinary.

DEADBEAT DADS

Deadbeat dads refers to men who contribute to the birth of a child, but neglect to pay child support despite being ordered to do so by a court of law. Another expression sometimes used is deadbeat moms, an equivalent term that refers to mothers who do not provide child support. These terms have most recently been replaced by the phrase deadbeat parents, a gender-neutral term that refers to any parent who is obligated to provide child support but fails to fulfill that obligation.

Children's well-being may be harmed when fathers fail to contribute financially to their offspring. As a result, there are often vigorous campaigns to track down alleged deadbeat dads and compel them to pay child support. For instance, legislators have enacted tighter laws, police departments have conducted large-scale "round-ups," and citizen activists have formed community groups; these efforts, and many others like them, have recently been aimed at bringing deadbeat dads to justice. Alleged deadbeat dads confront many penalties in the legal system, including possible prison sentences and salary deductions to recoup the child support. In addition, they face intense public shame and prejudice from highly public attempts to collect financial assistance for their children. For example, their identities may be splashed across a newspaper page, publicized on a highway billboard, revealed in a television show, or highlighted on an Internet Web page. Indeed, deadbeat dads are the targets of negative treatment in current society.

This intense negative attention has likely further reinforced people's negative views of deadbeat dads, which are also probably supported and strengthened by widespread negative stereotypes of men in society. For instance, one common stereotype—that men are less nurturing than women—may reinforce the image of deadbeat dads as uncaring and ignores the possibility that men may be financially unable to pay child support to the extent required by a legal order.

Recently, some men's rights groups have responded fiercely to this negative societal treatment. Arguing that women have more options than men when an unintended pregnancy occurs, these activists have suggested that men should also be afforded additional legal options. Indeed, they are currently engaged in legal battles to provide men with such options, including the right to opt out of financial responsibility for an unplanned child.

Deadbeat dads are fathers who do not pay child support. However, many mothers today also do not pay the required child support. Regardless of their gender, these deadbeat parents face intense negative prejudice and stereotypes from society.

Death Penalty, Gender and the

According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, 38 states and the federal government currently hold statutes allowing for capital punishment. At the end of fiscal year 2005, there were 3,254 prisoners under the sentence of death, 66 fewer prisoners than at the end of fiscal 2004. This entry discusses the crimes that could warrant the death penalty, the current statistics surrounding the death penalty, and the demographics of those who are under the sentence of death. Special attention is paid to the historical background of capital punishment, the characteristics of those on death row, and the plight of women on death row.

Crimes That Could Warrant the Death Penalty

The 38 states that allow capital punishment sentences have some similarities and difference about which crimes could warrant the death penalty. Most states require that the crime be a homicide committed in the first degree. However, some state statues do indicate that a death sentence could be pursued against a person who has committed, for example, treason, sexual assault, and aircraft hijacking. Each state differs in the number of aggravating factors that are required for a prosecutor to seek a death sentence. For instance, some states require that one of eighteen aggravating factors be present for a death sentence to be considered. Other states may require that one of only eight aggravating factors be considered when the death sentence is sought. Examples of aggravating factors include solicitation of murder, murder for hire, murder of more than one victim, victim was a police officer or another public official such as a judge, victim was a reporter, and the murder was committed in the course of another crime. When prosecutors are deciding whether to pursue a death sentence, they will also examine mitigating factors. Examples of mitigating factors include no significant prior record of the defendant, the defendant possesses an extreme mental or emotional deficit, or the defendant was a minor participant in the crime. Thus, even if a defendant meets one of the aggravating criteria for capital punishment in her or his state, that prosecutor may decide not to pursue a death sentence against the defendant because of one or more mitigating factors.

Current Statistics

The Bureau of Justice Statistics reported in 2005 that 16 states executed 60 prisoners, and those executed in 2005 spent an average of 12 years on death row before the capital punishment sentence was imposed. In 2005, Texas executed the most prisoners at 19; Indiana, Missouri, and North Carolina were the next most prevalent states to execute prisoners, at 5 each. Currently, California has the most prisoners under the sentence of death (646) with Texas being the state with the next highest number of prisoners on death row (411). The five methods of execution allowed in the United States are lethal injection, electrocution, lethal gas, hanging, and the firing squad. Of those states that allow capital punishment, most authorized only lethal injection in their statutes. In 2005, all 60 executions were carried out by lethal injection.

In 2005, the minimum age for capital punishment varied by state with some states allowing 14 as the minimum age and other states requiring 18. During fiscal year 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court abolished capital punishment for juveniles, stating that the use of the death penalty for minors is cruel and unusual.

Of those with death sentences in 2005, the racial composition was as follows: 56 percent were Caucasian, 42 percent were African American, and 2 percent were of other races. Forty-one Caucasians and 19 African Americans were put to death in 2005. African Americans represent approximately 12 percent of the U.S. population; however, this racial group represents almost half of those sentenced to death. In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Furman v. Georgia that the death penalty violated the Eighth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court stated that the death penalty was cruel and unusual because of the arbitrary manner in which it was applied to African Americans and abolished it. In 1976, however, the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the use of the death penalty in the ruling Gregg v. Georgia.

Women on Death Row

Historically, women have not received death sentences or been executed at the same rate as have men. From 1632 to 2005, 568 women were executed. During the past 100 years, 40 women have been executed, 11 of them since 1976. Thus, executions of females are rare, representing only approximately 0.6 percent of all executions between 1900 and 2005. The first woman executed in the United States was Jane Champion in 1632 in Virginia. She was hanged for an unknown offense. More recently, Frances Newton was executed by lethal injection in Texas in 2005 for killing her husband and two children in 1987. She was the first African American female to be executed in Texas since executions resumed in that state in 1982.

Overall, women are executed at lower rates than are their male counterparts on death row. Additionally, women are underrepresented on death row compared with their actual arrests for murder. Researchers have reported that women account for approximately 13 percent of those arrested for murder; however, women received only 1.9 percent of death sentences for the murders. Researchers have offered two explanations to address this phenomenon. The first hypothesis is referred to as the chivalry hypothesis. According to this theory, authorities and the public are reluctant to take actions against a woman because of the general benevolent attitudes that exist toward women in U.S. culture. For instance, police may be less apt to arrest females, juries may be less likely to convict a female or sentence her to death, and judges may be less likely to incarcerate or sentence a female to death. The opposing hypothesis, the evil woman hypothesis, contends that women who violate gender-role expectations and norms such as committing murder are punished harshly for stepping outside of both cultural and gender norms. Based on the current statistics, more support appears for the chivalry hypothesis for female commission of homicide.

Facts

Those sentenced to death in 2005 were predominately male with only 52 of the 3,254 prisoners under the sentence of death being female. As of 2007, there are 35 Caucasian and 14 African American females on death row, and female African Americans are overrepresented on death row compared with their representation in U.S. society. California has the largest number of women on death row with 14, followed by Texas, which has 9 women sentenced to death. The Bureau of Justice Statistics reports that the average time that a female spends on death row before her execution is 7 years and 9 months. In comparison, males sentenced to death row spend 10 years and 9 months on death row before their execution. Of those 60 persons executed in 2005, only 1 was female.

Compared with their male counterparts on death row, female offenders who are sentenced to capital punishment are more likely to have committed murders intra-racially (i.e., between the same race) and are more likely to have murdered significant others such as family members or close intimates. Approximately 50 percent of women on death row have killed significant others such as their husbands or boyfriends. Some researchers have stated that the murdering of close intimates by females is the result of suffering from battered women's syndrome. In fact, roughly 50 percent of those on death row have stated that they had been victims of childhood abuse, partner abuse, or both. Another 25 percent of those on death row had killed their children. Many female offenders on death row stated that they were addicted to drugs or alcohol or both at the time of their offenses. Researchers have found that women on death row typically do not have extensive criminal histories. Finally, researchers have reported that approximately 50 percent of women on death row committed the crime with another person, typically a male, and the co-defendant received a sentence other than death. This difference in sentencing occurred in cases where both defendants appeared to be equally guilty.

Adaptation to Death Row

Similarly to male offenders on death row, female offenders can experience difficulty in adjusting to life on death row. Female offenders who are sentenced to death are housed in one correctional facility in separate cells. They are often part of an existing operating correctional facility for other female offenders with the exception that they are housed in a separate unit from other female offenders at that institution. Being housed in single cells, and apart from the general inmate population, results in many female offenders experiencing isolation. This isolation is further exacerbated because female correctional institutions are often located far from family and friends, and inmates may not receive the emotional support they need to adapt to life on death row. Additionally, prison policies regarding phone calls and visitation are even more restrictive for women on death row than for women prisoners generally. Because 75 percent of all women who are on death row are mothers, the failure to be able to connect with their children further fosters their isolation. The isolation that women experience on death row is a risk factor for developing a mental illness or further exacerbating an existing mental condition.

Conclusion

Even with the increasing number of women receiving capital punishment sentences in the United States, scant attention has been paid to this group by researchers. Thus, much research is still needed on the intellectual, educational, and psychological histories of these women. Policymakers need to continue to examine how the death penalty is being applied to the genders and those of different races and develop policies to ensure that one gender or racial group is not receiving this sentence in greater abundance than another. Additionally, policies must be implemented at the correctional level to assist these offenders in adapting to life on death row.

DE BEAUVOIR, SIMONE (1908–1986)

Simone de Beauvoir was born in Paris, France, on January 9, 1908. De Beauvoir was educated at the Cours Désir, a private Catholic school; the Institut Sainte-Marie, a well-respected women's school to prepare her for her university entrance exams; and the prestigious Sorbonne where she studied philosophy. She excelled in her studies starting as a young girl and continued to excel during her days at the Sorbonne by accelerating through her program of study, achieving high marks, and passing her examinations with the highest honors. Through a natural intellect and thirst for knowledge, she became one of the most important philosophers of the 20th century and a central participant of the French Existentialist movement, along with Jean-Paul Sartre and Maurice Merleau-Ponty.

At the Sorbonne, she first met Merleau-Ponty and Sartre, developing life-long, intellectual friendships with them both, as well as a romantic relationship with Sartre. Her relationship with Sartre is noted to be one of much complexity, partly because they were intellectual equals. In fact, Sartre finished first in the program of philosophy, and de Beauvoir finished second. Some believe that de Beauvoir would have finished first had she been a man, rather than a woman. Her complex relationship with Sartre and her ideas about her so-called egalitarian relationships with him and other intellectual men, prompted her to write about these experiences.

De Beauvoir wrote many books, including The Coming of Age, published in 1970; A Very Easy Death, published in 1964; and All Men Are Mortal, published in 1946, among many others. Perhaps one of her best-known works, particularly among feminists, is Le Deuxième Sexe or The Second Sex, published in France in 1949. In The Second Sex, de Beauvoir took an existentialist approach to defining and describing the plight of women. Based on her own experiences of being an intellectual equal among Sartre and other great men, she questioned her role within this circle. Further, in researching women's roles in history, she found that they were notably absent. Through the writing of The Second Sex, she began to formulate the ideas that women were seen as not being equal to men. She formulated the concept of the woman as Other; man is the norm, the primary reference, whereas woman is abnormal, secondary to man. Thus, women are seen only as in relation to men, rather than as autonomous beings, while being subjugated into secondary, inferior roles.

The significance of de Beauvoir's concept of woman as Other contributed to women challenging their positions within a patriarchal society, and she spearheaded the creation of feminist studies and feminist movements around the world. Through her writings and participation in feminist causes, de Beauvoir was unquestionably one of the major contributors to the feminist movements of the 1960s and 1970s.

De Beauvoir died April 14, 1986, at the age of 78, leaving behind a legacy and reputation as a great philosopher and as a major contributor to feminist studies and movements.

DECLARATION OF SENTIMENTS

The Declaration of Sentiments is a document that emerged from the Seneca Falls Convention in 1848. Three days before the convention, Lucretia Mott, Martha C. Wright, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Mary Ann McClintock met to assemble the agenda for the meeting along with the speeches that would be made. During this meeting, the women, outraged at the lack of equal rights for women, began to draft a document outlining the rights that women should be entitled to as citizens. The women based this document, the Declaration of Sentiments, on the Declaration of Independence.

The Declaration of Sentiments begins by stating that "all men and women are created equal" and "that they are endowed with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." It continues, arguing that women are being oppressed by the government and the patriarchal society of which they are a part: "The history of mankind is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations on the part of man toward woman, having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over her." Following this statement are sixteen facts submitted to illustrate the extent to which women were oppressed by men in the society. Included were the following: Women were not permitted to vote and therefore could not participate in the government and were not represented in the government, women did not have property rights of their own in marriage, a woman gives up her own rights and promises obedience to her husband, and in the case of divorce a woman is subjected to the laws and decisions of men. Single, propertied women paid taxes on their property to the government, but were not allowed to participate otherwise in that same government. Also, women had avenues of wealth closed to them because educational institutions were closed to women and those jobs that were open to them paid low wages. The last fact listed is the heart of the entire document: "He has endeavored, in every way that he could to destroy her confidence in her own powers, to lessen her self-respect, and to make her willing to lead a dependent and abject life."

Following the listing of facts, the document insists that women be viewed as full citizens of the United States and as such be granted all the same rights and privileges that were granted to men. The women also acknowledge in the document that they will be ridiculed for making this declaration and that obtaining these rights will be difficult. Finally, the Declaration of Sentiments concludes with a statement of action, "We shall use every instrumentality within our power to effect our object. We shall employ agents, circulate tracts, petition the State and national Legislatures, and endeavor to enlist the pulpit and the press on our behalf."

The Declaration of Sentiments was read by Stanton at the Seneca Falls Convention, and following the reading, 12 resolutions related to the rights that should be granted to women were passed. Interestingly, the only resolution that did not pass unanimously was the ninth resolution that called for giving women the right to vote. After the passage of the resolutions, 100 men and women who were in attendance at the convention signed the Declaration of Sentiments. Once the Declaration was made public, it faced ridicule in the press, and among Church and government officials. In the face of these events, many of the original signers withdrew their names from the document.

DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN

The Declaration of the Rights of Women was written in France in 1791 by Olympe de Gouges. Modeled on the 1789 document, the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, the Declaration of the Rights of Women stated that women were equal to men in society and as such were entitled to the same citizenship rights. The preamble emphasized that the women need to be included among those considered part of the national assembly. It continues in stating that women, like their male counterparts, have natural, inalienable, and sacred rights. These rights, as well as the related duties and responsibilities to the society are outlined in the remainder of the document. Following the preamble, de Gouges included 17 articles that outlined the basic rights that should be extended to women. These rights included the right to liberty, property, and security; the right to participate fully in the making of laws that they were to abide by; the right to participate at all levels of government; and the right to voice opinions in public. More radically, Article XI gives a woman the right to publicly name the father of her children and to be entitled to pass along property to these children. This was one of the controversial elements of this document because it proclaims that men who father children outside of marriage should be held accountable for those children in the same ways that they would be accountable to children fathered within marriage. Article XV gives women, who were for tax purposes counted as part of a male headed household, the right to ask public officials about the finances of the household, and Article XVII extends property rights to both men and women regardless of whether they are married or not. Following the articles, the document contains a postscript that calls women to recognize the unequal ways that they are treated in society and to take action to remedy these injustices. The document also includes a Form for a Social Contract Between Man and Woman. In this contract, a man and a woman agree to unite in an equal partnership. Within this partnership, wealth is communal, belonging to both parties, and, as such, can be divided among all children belonging to either member of the partnership. Furthermore, according to the contract, in the event of a separation of the two parties, that wealth will be set aside for any and all children of either party. Finally, the Declaration outlines measures that should be taken to provide for widows and young girls who were deceived by false promises. Two years after the publication of the Declaration of the Rights of Women, de Gouges was tried for and found guilty of treason and was executed in November of 1793.

DEFENSE OF MARRIAGE ACT

The Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) is the informal name of U.S. Public Law 104–199. Similar to other federal policies such as welfare reform and the Marriage Promotion Act, DOMA privileges and encourages some relationships and families while stigmatizing and constraining others, in this case based on sexual orientation. Although representative of the political attention paid to marriage as well as gay and lesbian rights in the United States, DOMA is at odds with trends in other parts of the world.

DOMA mandates that states do not have to recognize same-sex marriages from other states and that for the purposes of federal law, marriage occurs only between one man and one woman. DOMA was introduced with overwhelming support in Congress amid speculation suggesting Hawai'i would soon legalize same-sex marriage, thereby forcing other states to recognize Hawai'i's interpretation of marriage. President Bill Clinton signed DOMA into law on September 21, 1996. Since then, approximately 40 states have enacted explicit bans on same-sex marriage. Only six states recognize same-sex marriages or civil unions.

Under DOMA, gay and lesbian couples are denied more than 1,000 federal protections and privileges available to heterosexual married couples such as legal recognition of relationships, access to a partner's employment benefits, rights of inheritance, joint tax returns and tax exemptions, immigration or residency for noncitizen partners, next-of-kin status, protection from domestic violence, and the right to live together in military or college housing. In many states, a parent in a same-sex couple cannot establish a legal relationship with her or his children unless he or she is the biological parent; take family medical leave to care for such nonbiological children or same-sex partners; adopt children; or petition the court for child support, visitation, or custody if the relationship ends.

Proponents of DOMA see heterosexual marriage as the appropriate context for procreation and family formation. According to this view, same-sex marriage would validate alternative family formations, destabilize heterosexual marriage and monogamy, and encourage incestuous relationships and polygamous marriage. Opponents argue such narrow definitions of marriage and family devalue all other types of relationships and families, discriminate on the basis of sex, and conflate homosexuality with incest and polygamy. DOMA stands in stark contrast with policies in other parts of the world, including the European Union, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and parts of Latin America, South Africa, and Eastern Europe, which decriminalized sexual contact between same-sex persons much earlier than the United States did and prohibit sexual orientation discrimination. Most notable is the European Union's Charter of Fundamental Rights guaranteeing marriage and family rights to gays and lesbians.

DEITIES, GENDER IMAGES AND

Most human societies make a distinction between the sacred and the ordinary. The notion of sacredness expresses a sense that the deepest levels of reality—the core and origin of existence—are mysterious and unknown. In many spiritual traditions, deity, or god, is a term for sacred reality. People's beliefs concerning the nature of deity constitute one aspect of a complex sociocultural system referred to as religion. Images, as a form of material expression, are evocative visual metaphors that convey ideas about the sacred. Images of the sacred explain, illustrate, and embody beliefs, worldviews, and cultural visions. Thus, scholars across a wide range of disciplines study religious thought and culture to gain insight into human social behavior. Because gender is such an intrinsic part of being human, religions are an important source of ideas about what is male and what is female, including expectations of how men and women should behave and their roles in society. Images of deities reflect and shape understandings of sexual difference and the cultural meanings attached to biological sex. This entry describes views of world religions toward deities and images, issues of deities and gender, and religious feminism.

Deities and Images in World Religions

Anthropomorphic myths and images provide a way for people to think of and talk about the sacred, which is viewed as ineffable and beyond human understanding. Deities are conceived of in myriad ways. Social location and experience also determine how one envisions the concept of deity. In general, a deity, or god, is the conceptualization of the sacred as a powerful, divine, and supernatural being that is highly regarded and venerated. In polytheistic religions, multiple deities are worshipped and are often imaged as human-like or as personifications of cosmic and natural forces. In monotheistic religions, deity is imaged as a singular transcendent and Supreme Being who created the universe. In atheistic religions, such as Buddhism, the sacred is not conceived as a deity but, rather, as an abstract principle or as a state of heightened consciousness and enlightenment. Deities may be imaged in human or animal form or in symbolic and iconic forms. Deities have various symbolic associations that, through iconic images, visually describe their qualities. For example, in the Christian trinity, a dove signifies the Holy Spirit, one of three aspects of a singular God. The dove also signifies breath, wind, and ascent—all visual metaphors that express the nature of deity as transcendent and enlivening.

Deities often serve as guideposts for acting and relating in the world. In some traditions, deities are imaged with human qualities and personalities possessing consciousness, emotions, and desires. Some deities are thought to be distant and inaccessible to humans, but others are believed to be invisible but omnipresent. Some believe that deities reveal themselves to people or manifest in human form. In many religions, people feel obligated to deities and believe that the purpose of life is to serve them. Deities can be peaceful and auspicious or menacing and wrathful, and they are often portrayed as engaged in a battle for supremacy. The battle between deities is a metaphor for the human inner struggle to conquer ego and selfish desire. However deities are envisaged, gender is an integral part of the way people construct sacred reality and identities.

Deities and Gender

Images of deities and social structure go together and reinforce cultural values. Therefore, images and myths have important social purposes. Sacred imagery functions as socially constructed and instructive illustrations of expected gender roles and behaviors. In an androcentric culture, conceptions of deities will reflect men's power, experience, and position in society. For example, in patriarchal monotheistic religions, traditions that are part of a male-dominated society and conceive of deity as a singular male God, the divine is often imaged as king and ruler. This image of God as a male monarch legitimates male domination and the subordination of women and helps sustain a hierarchal society based on domination and subjection. In this model, images of deities as male and the exclusion of female images of the divine elevate men both spiritually and socially and justify the subordinate position of women in both church and society. Imaging deity as a male king god is important for maintaining a male-ruled society. Men and masculinity are privileged and women and femininity devalued. In both monotheistic and polytheistic religions, gender inequality is reflected in the relationship between male and female deities or in the absence of a female deity altogether.

In polytheistic religions, deities are imaged in both male and female forms but reflect a clear sexual division in the divine world. Where multiple deities of both sexes are worshipped, there is usually a preeminent male figure and female deities are the subordinate partners of the lesser gods. Images of deities are based on and reinforce patriarchal gender constructions, and the gender characteristics and roles of deities will mirror those of men and women. Female deities will act the way that society expects women to behave, and they will possess ideal feminine qualities that women should emulate. Further, female deities are typically worshipped as life-givers and sustainers and revered for their regenerative power. In this view of gender, women are associated with fertility, matter, embodiment, and feeling, whereas men are connected with the spirit, action, mind, and reason. Images of deities reflect a gender ideology based on sexual difference that views male-female as mutually exclusive polarities where men are associated with the sacred realm and women with the world of nature—women are closer to earth and men are closer to God.

Images of deities teach social lessons about what it means to be a man or a woman, and in a powerful way, people learn what is sacred and, hence, what is valued. In traditions where deities are imaged in female form, they are usually not role models that women devise themselves, but are patriarchal constructions designed to reinforce the belief that men are closer to the sacred and have authority over women. This also suggests that to truly experience the divine, femaleness is something to overcome. In religions where female deities are venerated, women often turn to goddesses as role models for their own lives and derive a sense of pride and empowerment in the celebration of women as mothers and homemakers. In patriarchal monotheistic religions where there is no female image of the sacred, women draw from cultural and spiritual traditions throughout the world in search of female deities whose images can serve as a source of personal and social transformation.

Religious Feminism and Re-Imaging the Sacred

Just as sacred images are used to reinforce patriarchal gender constructions, they are also reconfigured and used to challenge them. Feminist theologians and religious scholars have written extensively on the consequences of exclusively male God language, as well as the cultural impact of patriarchal monotheism that legitimate systems of oppression and the subjugation of women. These scholars have demonstrated that the conceptualization of deity as male-only has significant effects on women's self-esteem and sense of self-worth. Images of God have also been implicated in arguments about gender roles and women's exclusion from religious activities. Spiritual feminists have resisted religious hegemony by creating woman-centered counter-imagery and are demanding gender-sensitive or gender-neutral God-language.

Women continue to create new spiritualities that re-imagine the divine as complementary male-female partners or as principally female in an effort to restore a female aspect of deity to their spirituality—one that places women's experiences at the center. For spiritual feminists, goddess imagery is a source of alternative values and ethics grounded in a relational worldview and a notion of power as with and not over. The female deity, as goddess, is an important symbol that revalues women and femininity. Through the process of re-imaging the sacred, the concept of gender is transformed. Feminist re-imaginings include redefining what are typically viewed as "masculine" attributes as "feminine," thus creating more options for women's spiritual identities. Other sacred images draw from existing gender constructions and affirm masculinity and femininity as two complementary, equivalent essences of the human person. This conception is based on the belief that each aspect completes the other in human and sacred fullness and wholeness and on a perception of society as dangerously unbalanced and overtaken by masculine energy without the feminine to temper it. Both conceptions celebrate and sanctify women and femininity and attempt to shift the image of the sacred from hierarchal to relational.

Feminist theology, which has become a part of Western religious heritage, is an approach to challenging and revising androcentric theology. In practice, liturgy and text are revised and adapted to be more gender-inclusive. However, many spiritual feminists resist the idea that gender-neutral language is an effective or desirable means of addressing gender inequality in church and society. Efforts to use inclusive language in liturgy have been met with resistance, and feminist theologians note that the reluctance of clergy to include feminine imagery and language indicates a resistance to women's spiritual emancipation. Most monotheistic religions assert that God transcends gender or is genderless. This de-gendering is viewed by feminist theologians as an attempt to mask sexism and dismiss gender as irrelevant. They argue that if gender is not important or not an essential part of God's nature, then it should be acceptable to refer to God as female, which is still not allowed in most religions, even the most progressive. The ambivalence is the result of re-imagining deity as both sexes fundamentally revise the image of God and, for Christians, of Jesus. A gender-inclusive image of God disrupts the cosmic and social order and threatens male supremacy because the image of God as male has upheld men's authority and justified the subordination of women.

DEPRESSION

Depression is an emotionally crippling disorder that can be a gateway for a host of medical problems. Each year, more than 25 million people in the United States are diagnosed with depression, and almost 10 percent of those diagnosed commit suicide. Moreover, people experience depression across ethnic groups, socioeconomic levels, marital status, and education levels. Nonetheless, two to three times as many women and girls compared with men and boys experience depression. Not to be confused with being in a sad mood or having a few blue days, depression can be long-lasting, severely impairing a person's day-to-day functioning and resulting in unrelenting mental and emotional anguish. This entry describes types, variations, causes, prevention, and treatment of depression.

Types of Depression

Major depressive disorder and bipolar disorder are two types of clinically recognized depression.

Major Depressive Disorder

Persons with major depressive disorder (MDD) present at least five of the following symptoms for 2 weeks or more: dysphoria (feeling unwell or unhappy), anhedonia (inability to experience pleasure), sleep disturbances, appetite changes, excessive or unreasonable guilt, irritability, concentration difficulties, low energy, and suicidal ideation. These symptoms must not be attributable to substance dependence or abuse, other concurrent diseases or disorders, or normal grief.

Bipolar Disorder

Bipolar disorder is characterized by severe depression and by periods of elevated or irritable moods. Approximately 2.6 percent of U.S. adults have bipolar disorder. Previously known as manic-depressive illness, bipolar I is characterized by recurrent manic and depressive episodes.

Manic episodes in bipolar I are characterized by elevated or irritable moods with three or more of the following symptoms most of the day, nearly every day for at least one week: increased energy, racing thoughts, concentration difficulties, decreased need for sleep, irritability, increased sex drive, unrealistic beliefs in one's abilities, poor judgment, aggression, spending sprees, substance abuse, and denial of the illness. Alternating with mania, bipolar I depression is characterized by five or more of the same symptoms as MDD for nearly every day for 2 or more weeks.

Characterized by fewer severe manic symptoms, bipolar II involves recurrent hypomania (mild to moderate mania) alternating with depression. Although bipolar I occurs equally in men and women, women are more likely to suffer from bipolar II. Additionally, women report more depressive lifetime episodes, but men report more manic lifetime episodes. Moreover, women report more mixed episodes (simultaneous mania and depression) and more rapid cycling.

Variability of Depression

Across numerous cultures and ethnic groups, women are twice as likely to develop major depression as males are. One explanation for this difference may be that women are more likely to report their symptoms and seek treatment, artificially inflating their depression rates. Conversely, men tend to mask their symptoms with alcohol or drug abuse rather than seeking help. However, community-based epidemiological and clinical studies using self-reports and informant reports consistently reveal a greater prevalence of major depression among women, indicating the gender gap is not an artifact of self-reporting symptoms.

The experience of depression is also different for women and men. Women report higher levels of anxiety, sleep troubles, and physical problems; additionally, they develop the disorder earlier, experience more chronic and recurrent depression, and suffer greater severity and increased functional impairment than men do. Contrastingly, men are more likely to ignore depressive symptoms, engage in more enjoyable activities, suppress depressive moods and thoughts, or abuse substances to escape depression. Although women attempt suicide three times more frequently, men are more likely to complete the act.

Whereas depression exists in all countries and cultures investigated to date, research shows a wide cultural dissimilarity of depressive symptoms, experiences, likelihood of reporting, and treatment responses. One difference relates to symptoms. For example, Middle Eastern populations describe depression as heart problems, whereas Asian and Chinese populations report feeling unbalanced. Latinos and Mediterraneans present symptoms of nervousness, whereas Hopi populations complain of being heartbroken.

Moreover, frequency reports also vary across cultures. Feeling guilty is the most reported symptom of depression in northern Switzerland (68 percent) contrasted with Iran (32 percent). Suicidal ideation also fluctuates depending on culture: Tokyo has 41 percent reported occurrence but Nagasaki and Montreal report 70 percent of people who suffer from depression. Incidence rates also vary; for example, less than 1 percent in Taiwan compared with 6 percent in Christchurch, New Zealand. Divergence in lifetime depression rates is also evident: 3 percent in Japan contrasts with 17 percent in the United States.

Furthermore, dissimilarities are exhibited among cultural subgroups. For example, African Americans have lower depression rates than do Caucasian or Asian Americans, whereas U.S. immigrants from Mexico tend to be more depression prone than do Mexicans of Indian descent. In the United Kingdom, Punjabi immigrants have higher depression incidence levels than the British do; contrastingly, South Asian immigrants in the United Kingdom report lower depression levels than do UK citizens.

Causes of Depression

Although depression is quite prevalent, its causes remain largely unknown. Various factors trigger depression, including stressors, substance abuse, and biological components. The diathesis-stress model, also known as the biopsychosocial model, emphasizes an interplay between social, cognitive, and biological components that increase a person's vulnerability to depression.

The interaction of social, cognitive, and biological factors that cause depression can increase negative cognition and poor coping strategies that in turn exacerbate depressive symptoms. Low self-esteem and poor-quality social support are two of many social factors predicting depression. Furthermore, the link between predictors and outcomes appears to be bidirectional. Indeed, depressed adolescents often experience future adjustment problems—for example, unemployment, substance abuse, and suicide.

During late adolescence, gender differences emerge. Poor eating, lack of energy, and feeling sad and worthless are predictive of boys' depression, but sleeping problems best predict girls' depression. Depressed adolescent girls also demonstrate differences in social interactions by engaging in less eye contact and gazing when interacting than do nondepressed girls. For both boys and girls, depressive symptoms increase as they mature.

Gender differences also inform people's experiences of rumination. Compared with boys, girls are more likely to overanalyze pessimistically as a coping mechanism. Moreover, at 9 years old, girls are more likely to experience anxiety, a precursor to depression. Genetics research has also found that recurrent depression in girls occurs three times as often if they had a parent with recurring depression, but this pattern does not hold true for boys. Interestingly, depressed mothers respond with more anxiety, fear, and petulance when interacting with daughters (but not sons) compared with nondepressed mothers. These episodes of negative interactions between mothers and daughters may breed negative affect in daughters, making them more susceptible to depression than sons are.

Depression can also stem from brain neurotransmitter dysfunction, medications, and substance use. Specifically, depression is associated with reuptake and absorption problems of norepinephrine, serotonin, and dopamine and, in turn, cerebral dysfunction. After the onset of pubescence, psychosocial and neuroendocrine differences emerge. Moreover, monthly fluctuations of estrogen and progesterone in females may directly change neurotransmitter functioning linked to depression.

Most theories suggest that bipolar disorder has a biological cause, specifically problems in the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis, protein malfunctions, calcium level abnormalities, and inability to maintain homeostasis. Evidence points to a genetic link for both bipolar and major depressive disorders. Specifically, individuals with first-degree biological relatives with MDD are 1.5 to 3 times more likely to have MDD themselves than is the general population. This is especially true of women in their childbearing years.

Preventions and Treatments of Depression

One prevention method for childhood depression is training young people how to handle affective problems. Limited evidence suggests that equipping youth with effective coping techniques and a strong, high-quality support network may reduce the risk of depressive disorders developing later. Some investigators posit that the sexes should receive distinctive treatments because of differences in their symptomology, comorbidity, and experience of depression. For example, pregnancy, menstrual cycle, and menopause often initiate or exacerbate female depression vulnerability, presenting unique challenges in treatment options for some women.

Not all individuals suffering with depression are aware that they are experiencing this disorder; as a result, some persons never pursue or receive professional care. In the United States, only one in three people experiencing major depression for a short period seek treatment; however, 80 percent of those treated find relief. Antidepressants, the primary strategy for treating depression worldwide, have helped millions of depressed individuals lead satisfying lives. Psychiatrists most often prescribe selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs) for MDD and lithium for bipolar disorder. For individuals who do not recover with pharmaceutical treatment alone, professionals in many countries, including the United States, combine psychotherapy with pharmacotherapy, resulting in successful outcomes. In some cultures, however, being treated with psychotherapeutic medication is unacceptable. For example, Southeastern Asians in U.S.

clinics often refuse to take medications, perhaps because of the stigma of drug dependency.

Another leading treatment for depression is cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT), which targets maladaptive cognitions and poor coping strategies to alleviate depressive symptoms. After identifying distorted and unrealistic perceptions affecting specific behaviors, therapists work with patients to evaluate these cognitions and adjust them to better reflect reality. In addition, maladaptive coping behaviors are replaced with more effective coping strategies. Therapists give patients homework assignments that reinforce thoughts and behaviors learned during sessions. Often effectively used in combination with medication, CBT focuses on the current situation rather than past thoughts and behaviors and is equally effective in men and women. One challenge, though, for CBT is the lack of validation of measures for minority groups, especially given the link between language and perception. For example, Cantonese terms for dysphoric affect are not only different than English terms, but may evoke entirely different perceptions.

Interpersonal psychotherapy (IPT) is another approach in treating depression. Using this methodology, clients deal with depression via an "interpersonal inventory" in which they describe past and present relationships and then relate depression to current situations. After identifying areas to change, therapists assist clients in outlining strategies and treatments unique to their immediate social contexts. Efficacious in the United States, IPT has also been successfully adapted to other cultures, including Uganda.

In Buddhist-based cultures, specifically India, mindfulness training is preferred. Mindfulness is a cognitive retraining method based on Buddhist principles of living in the present, empowering patients to decrease negative thoughts about the past and focus on the "now." Additional treatments that have successfully reduced depression include exercise, electroconvulsive therapy (ECT), light therapy, repetitive vagus nerve stimulation, and transcranial magnetic stimulation. As a last resort, depressed individuals may choose psycho-surgery.

Conclusion

Depression is the second most debilitating mental disorder worldwide. Although a "cure" has not been found, individuals experiencing depression have various treatment options. Furthermore, researchers are adapting pharmacological and psychotherapeutic treatments to compliment gender and cultural differences. These treatments promise to be successful among diverse populations, enabling depressed individuals to lead satisfying, productive lives.

Development Alternatives With Women in a New Era

Development Alternatives With Women in a New Era (DAWN) is a global network of scholars, activists, and policymakers dedicated to improving the lives of poor women in countries collectively known as the economic South (Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, Latin America, and the Pacific). DAWN formed in 1984 amid a startling decline in poor women's standard of living. Initially, the network focused on understanding why poor women were getting poorer and why their basic survival needs were neglected in global development policy and practice. Currently, DAWN continues its commitment to ending poverty, violence, and inequalities based on class, gender, and race by advancing gender justice, economic justice, and democracy.

DAWN undertakes feminist research and analysis across four interrelated areas: political economy of globalization, sexual reproductive health and rights, political restructuring and social transformation, and sustainable livelihoods. DAWN integrates all areas of women's lives into development policy. Women's daily lives will be improved, DAWN argues, only if they have equal access to decision making and control over resources and their own bodies, and therefore, the starting point for development policy must be the interests of poor women, who are responsible for the reproduction and care of families. DAWN advocates for redistribution of resources toward improving women's lives because gender subordination has disadvantaged women within existing political, economic, and social structures. DAWN also collaborates with other networks to monitor and make recommendations for restructuring global development institutions toward these ends.

DAWN rejects the idea that women's health and welfare can be secondary to the needs of the global economic interests of developed countries and links sexual reproductive health and rights to economic development on the belief that without these rights, sexual violence can deny women access to land, resources, and public spaces, which further constrains women's ability to work for wages, attend school, or obtain basic health services. DAWN's analysis in the area of political restructuring and social transformation shows how new changes to the global economy, which necessitate a reduced role for the state in distributing resources for development, are tied into the struggle for gender justice. For example, DAWN argues that development must be sustainable to ensure women's continued access to resources, especially water, public lands, and sanitation. Destruction of these resources places additional burdens on women because they supply the family's food, water, and firewood.

DAWN's holistic approach has shifted development policy toward women's empowerment in all facets of their lives. Similarly, DAWN's training activities assist and encourage young activists, who engage in global advocacy work for social, economic, and gender justice, to design alternative development frameworks. DAWN conducts advocacy training programs at its Training Institute and regional training centers to prepare young feminists for the challenge of working toward gender justice. In so doing, DAWN continues to broaden the network of women working to empower poor women across the globe.

DIARIES

The diary is a literary genre that reports and chronicles the experiences and events of a particular day in the life of one individual. The account is usually written in the form of a first-person narrative and provides subjective reflections covering a wide range of topics. The diary, which can be distinguished from the genre of autobiography, usually refers to a given period in the diarist's life. The account can be highly subjective and is often written in direct response to events that highlight some of the conflicts of living public and private lives. In relation to gender and society, the diary is an important genre, and although men have been central to its construction and history, women have been significant contributors in the shaping and evolution of diary writing.

It is useful to situate the diary genre in relation to notions of history, on the one hand, and literary form, on the other. If official, dominant versions of social and economic history have traditionally been written by men, then diaries, as unofficial histories, provide a way of interpreting the past in terms of femininity as well as a dialogic perspective built around, and in response to, gender construction. If official history serves as a grand narrative, often written from a male viewpoint, then the diary functions as a micro narrative, emphasizing its complementary status as a form in which women have been able to situate their sense of subjectivity. Genealogies of the kind represented by the diary constitute a version of the past written from the point of view of the marginal other, particularly women, gay men, and people of color. Illustrations of this genealogical response begin with those written by Japanese women. More recently, women's diary writing reflects the diverse situations in which women have found themselves in the last 150 years. Diaries written by figures such as Marie Bashkirtseff, Anne Frank, Sylvia Plath, Frida Kahlo, Alice Walker, and Virginia Woolf highlight ways in which the diary form can be manipulated according to social and cultural context.

The important links between diaries and gender can be traced back to those written by Japanese women in the 10th century. The diaries recount everyday changes in women's relations with each other as well as with men. Additionally, these diaries document the transitions, anxieties, and desires of women whose accounts might otherwise have been ignored by the wider society and its official history. These insights into the history of Japanese culture might otherwise have gone unnoticed had it not been for the memoirs that the diaries contain. More contemporary examples illustrate women's relationships to struggles faced in the public sphere. From age 13, for example, the journal written by Russian painter Marie Bashkirtseff, I Am the Most Interesting Book of All, chronicled the personal struggles faced by women, and women painters in particular, in pre-revolutionary Russia. In contrast, The Diary of Virginia Woolf allows later readers to understand something of the dimensions of Woolf's psychological pain, which is partly constructed around the cultural requirement to perform gender identity in one way rather than not another.

Diaries, then, can be read as records that recount details of subjective histories and hidden subcultures. To the extent that the dominant culture traditionally legitimizes versions of the nation, politics, and the economy, in the name of men, so diaries written by women and other excluded groups provide insights into relationships constructed in the context of the family, domesticity, and desire. Official history often neglects the subjective and personal dimensions of the past and effectively marginalizes those narratives articulated by groups excluded from the dominant discourse. The diary, as a discourse about subjectivity and selfhood, exposes the ways in which the self, rather than being pre-packaged at birth, is something constructed in narrative, literary form, performance, and the psychological. The diary additionally reveals the extent to which the self is a social rather than simply an individual construct, in that the diary always has a public context in which readers can make sense of the narrated, first-person account around which the genre is shaped.

In Michel Foucault's work, the act of writing—or the entry into discourse—is an important step in the construction of a sense of subjectivity. However, discourse is double-edged. The diary appears to provide a space in which the self can exercise degrees of autonomy and agency. Yet the subject is limited by the self that the diary form appears to construct in that it is a way of disciplining the self and regulating desire. Diaries, then, are as much a facility for the self as they are a form that forecloses and structures it. Women in the 19th century, and particularly girls, were encouraged to write diaries. The effects of this moment in the history of diary writing support Foucault's theory of the genealogical, disciplinary nature of discourse in that diaries have the paradoxical effect of encouraging conformity as much as resistance.

Since the 1990s, individuals and groups have mobilized around public acts of resistance by taking advantage of the technologies afforded by the Internet and e-mail. The emergence of online diaries suggests that diary writing is being be reshaped by computers, mobile telephones, and digital tools. Online diaries are not simply spaces in which to construct a personal record of events and experiences. They are also forms, because of the Internet, that are immediately public, available to a virtual as much as an actual community of users. Today, online diaries and blogs serve as immediate, rapid social commentaries on popular culture, media celebrities, world conflict, poverty, and international relations. Diaries from 10th-century Japan reflect the individual and subjective nature of the self, whereas more recent, online diaries indicate the extent to which the genre is also intersubjective, global, and dialogic.

DIETING

Dieting is the practice of intentionally limiting food intake. Although some diets are undertaken for increased athletic performance or routine religious observance, dieting is primarily thought of as a mechanism for weight loss. Dieting has increased in popularity in the United States throughout the 20th century, as food has become routinely available and aesthetic body preferences have privileged slenderness. Sociological analyses have frequently examined the relationship between dieting and gender, which is a highly gendered phenomenon: most dieters are women and the majority of women report high levels of body dissatisfaction. More recently, as described in this entry, sociologists have begun to examine connections between dieting culture and the multibillion-dollar dieting industry.

The Development of Dieting

Dieting is conventionally understood as either an aesthetic activity aimed at reducing body weight or as a health activity aimed at improving physiological health conditions. In the earliest reports of dieting that date back to Greek Antiquity and early Christianity, however, the practice was portrayed as a moral task. The philosopher Aristotle claimed that unrestrained eating interfered with the search for an honorable, truth-seeking life. Early Christianity similarly portrayed dieting and fasting as body purification rituals: deeply religious individuals could avoid the sins of greed or gluttony through restraining their food consumption and, consequently, become closer to God. Dieting was an atypical action during these times. The few people who were likely to engage in dieting as part of larger religious or philosophical crusades were also likely to be members of elite groups. Further, they were likely to be in the enviable and rare position of having excess food to turn away from.

For most human history and in most places, the average person has not had sufficient access to food. Rather than facing the moral burden of debating the merits of large meals versus piety or enlightenment, most people have had to continually struggle to alleviate their body's hunger. People frequently and successfully met their daily calorie needs through farming and animal care; such success has been mitigated, though, by the appearance of famines, natural disasters, and food-tainting epidemics. Governments, religious authorities, property owner/managers, and other powerful groups have also been able to effectively control food dispersal.

In countries and in periods where food has been scarce, groups that have had dependable access to food have also had access to social power. Regular access to inadequate foodstuffs has indicated high social status; highly ranked people have been better able to acquire food and their bodies are, frequently, taller and heavier than are those of their lower-class counterparts. During these times, fatness has been positively lauded as a robust and attractive demonstration of wealth. Alternately, fatness has been occasionally decried as a symbol of overindulgence and greed during times of food shortages; however, it is rare for people with insufficient food resources to engage in willful dieting.

Food supplies grew tremendously during the 19th and 20th centuries, especially within North America and Western Europe, because of a number of factors: the industrialization and mechanization of agriculture, improvements in refrigeration and food preservation, and improvements in food transportation and disbursement. Each of these innovations has helped to make food widely and routinely available. As the food supply has grown sharply, people have been able to meet their food needs easily and affordably. Furthermore, the transition to industrial and postindustrial work has lessened bodies' calorie needs. The average person's body size has grown as a consequence of these social changes. The large body size that had been a symbol of rare wealth became increasingly common, and the high status of large bodies soon faded. This changing conception of socially preferred body types was exemplified by the 1863 publication of England's first popular diet book, William Banting's A Letter on Corpulence.

Aesthetic Body and Health Ideals

The relatively new preference for trim bodies has not been a universal goal of all Westerners. Indeed, although trim bodies have been increasingly socially desirable in the past 150 years, this body type has been especially embraced as a beauty ideal both by and for white, middle-class, heterosexual women. Beauty norms aimed at—and often embraced by—these women conflate thinness with physical attractiveness. Such aesthetic standards are frequently internalized as personal goals that require regular dieting to attain an ever-thinner cultural ideal. In the last decades of the 20th-century, athletic fitness joined slenderness as a body goal for white women—social ideals assert that women should be both strong and slim.

Throughout the 20th century, alternate body weight ideals and goals have existed for other groups of women. However, recent evidence indicates that slimmer, trimmer body ideals are increasingly dominant regardless of race, gender, and sexuality status. For instance, Chicana/Latina and African American women typically have lower rates of dieting than do white women and profess higher levels of body satisfaction. The embrace of a large posterior ("booty") is further evidence of alternate body size norms. However, some recent studies have indicated that Chicana/Latina and African American women are under increased pressure to become slim. Similarly, lesbian and bisexual women in the United States report less pressure to meet beauty standards; they are more likely to decry fat stigmatization and disavow less extreme ideal weights. However, many lesbian and bisexual women still find extremely high weights problematic.

Feminist sociologists have regularly noted that the media idealizes the weight standards and bodywork practices of white, heterosexual women. Furthermore, the media depicts whiteness, heterosexuality, and slenderness as beauty goals for all women. Women who do not meet this cultural ideal are often held in lower esteem than are their counterparts. Most women differ from the archetype; more than 60 percent of U.S. women are classified as overweight. Regardless of women's actual appearance, more than 75 percent of women habitually report personal body dissatisfaction and more than 84 percent report having dieted at some point in their lives.

Men have been largely exempted from the social demand for slim bodies. Instead, men's body ideals center on the goals of increased musculature, strength, and fitness. Men diet less frequently than women, and when men do start an organized diet, they are typically much heavier than their female counterparts. Heterosexual men who diet primarily cite health-improvement motives rather than slimness for the sake of beauty; this is seen among men of varying racial groups. Homosexual men are more likely to additionally cite aesthetics a motivational factor for weight loss. Although, on average, men are less likely than women to feel pressure to be slim, more than 30 percent of men report body dissatisfaction and 58 percent report having previously dieted.

Regardless of social location, the thin body is often assumed to be a healthy body. Whether thin bodies are athletic or sedentary, slenderness is frequently conflated with good health. This attitude is exemplified through the extensive use of the weight-based body mass index (BMI). Individuals who are "overweight" according to BMI are frequently advised by physicians and diet programs to lose weight to improve health. As a result, the heavy body is often depicted as unhealthy, unvalued, unattractive, and, sometimes, diseased. The portrayal of fatness as a medical and aesthetic failure helps to both create and reinforce fat stigmatization. This, in turn, influences many people to watch their bodies continually and diet persistently. There are, however, pro-fat social movement organizations, such as the National Association to Advance Fat Acceptance, that function as a small countertrend to obesity prejudice.

Diets and the Diet Industry

In conjunction with the heightened importance of the slim body and increased body dissatisfaction, dieting has become increasingly common. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control found that 34 percent of men and 48 percent of women reported dieting in 2001 and 2002. A wide variety of diets—both homespun and corporate—have risen in response to individuals' desire to slim the body. And, like other culinary and social trends, different diets have grown and receded in popularity. For instance, in the 1930s, the Hollywood Diet, also known as the Grapefruit Diet, recommended eating half of a grapefruit with each meal. This diet declined in use during the mid-century and reappeared in the 1970s. Other noteworthy diets fads include the Scarsdale Diet in the 1970s, the Cabbage Soup Diet in 1996, and the Blood Type Diet and Zone Diet in the 1990s. The South Beach Diet and the Atkins Diet, which advocate a low-carbohydrate, high protein intake, enjoyed widespread success in the early 2000s; even fast-food restaurants joined the craze by selling bun-less, low-carbohydrate burgers.

In addition to personal diet plans, a number of for-profit dieting programs arose during the 20th century, including Weight Watchers, Slim-Fast, and Jenny Craig. These companies assert that dieters should follow a corporate program to lose weight most effectively. And, if all of that does not work, a variety of prescription and nonprescription diet pills have cropped up since the 1950s to "aid" dieters. These pills have sometimes contained amphetamines or have been associated with extreme side effects: the popular drug Fen-Phen was discontinued in 1997 for its association with increased occurrences of heart disease and hypertension, and the dietary supplement Ephedra was prohibited in 2003 for raising blood pressure and stressing the circulatory system. Although these pills have been taken off the market, new diet medications, such as Meridia and TRIMSPA, have taken their place. Collectively, the diet industry is worth more than $40 billion. This wealth is particularly interesting when contrasted with the long-term success of diets: between just 5 percent and 20 percent of dieters are able to successfully reach their goals and keep their newly slender physiques.

Sociological Examinations of Dieting

Sociological examinations of dieting have frequently looked at the extent to which girls and women, compared with boys and men, become anxious about their body weight and engage in dieting behavior. More recently, sociologists and other social scientists have debated dieting meanings and asked if dieting can ever be a feminist activity. At the root of many sociological examinations is the question of whether dieting, as a primarily female activity, reinforces unattainable ideals of women's slenderness. Finally, sociologists have begun examining the connection between the for-profit weight loss industry and individuals' dieting behavior.

DISABILITY

Disability touches everyone. People encounter disability through personal connections with relatives, friends, and family members or as our own bodies encounter pain and restriction, limiting the ability to be independent and autonomous. Despite this common experience, people with disabilities commonly report feeling marginalized, a group set apart, the "other." They encounter a world designed by and for those without disabilities with a presumption of able-bodiedness at its core. Laws, policies, beliefs, and practices contour the daily lives of women, but when disability enters the frame, these processes become increasingly complicated, as described in this entry. More women than men experience disability, so any analysis of disability needs to consider the significance of gendered difference in disabled women's lives.

Gender and Disability as Social Experiences

Three famous Canadian examples illustrate how disability and gender intersect to create a distinct social experience: activist mothers, Tracy Latimer, and Leilani Muir.

During the 1970s, grassroots groups of disability activists formed coalitions and founded legal advocacy centers to advance important changes in disability policy that established rights of access to education, employment, health services, transportation, and public space. These activists found allies in parent-led disability organizations, including the March of Dimes and Associations for Community Living and Mental Health. The reference to "parent" obscures the gendered nature of the role: mothers led the way when advocacy for their own disabled children brought them into a broader political struggle for social justice and equality. Activist mothers were not feminists seeking equality with men or a challenge to patriarchy; they acted out of a sense of gendered obligation as wives and mothers. In trying to raise their children, they encountered a cultural ethos of ableism and discrimination, and their sense of powerlessness politicized them.

In 1993, Robert Latimer, a farmer in Wilkie, Saskatchewan, put his young daughter Tracy in a truck and piped poisonous carbon monoxide from the vehicle's exhaust into the cab. Tracy died. Because she had a physical and mental disability, her father defended his actions as a mercy killing, an act of kindness committed out of love. Latimer received a conviction of murder and was imprisoned, but thousands of people signed a petition urging leniency and calling for a reduced sentence. As discussed later, Tracy's death at the hands of a family member who believed he was being merciful reflects broader experiences of gender, violence, and disability.

In 1996, a Canadian legal decision on the sterilization of Leilani Muir brought to light the damaging legacy of the Sexual Sterilization Act of the Alberta Government. Muir discovered in 1989 at the age of 25 that she could never have children because she had been sexually sterilized at 14 on the orders of the Alberta Eugenics Board. The doctors kept the nature of the surgery from Muir; they told her only that her appendix was removed. After years of futile attempts to correct the surgery, she began legal action that culminated in a court awarding her $740,000 for wrongful sterilization. The medicalizing and intrusive response to Muir's disability is emblematic of a long history of eugenic sterilization.

Beliefs of biological inferiority have long been applied to devalued groups, including women. Like gender, disability is not a biological given but is instead socially constructed from a biological reality. Just as the second-wave feminists in the 1970s differentiated gender from sex (the social from the biological) to counter the arguments that women are essentially weak and inferior, so too have disability theorists separated disability from impairment (the social from the biological) to counter assumptions that biology is destiny. Central to this argument are explanations about difference that take as their starting point ideas of social construction—rather than the essential nature—of socially significant difference.

Disability is a form of social oppression experienced by people with perceived impairments and manifested in discriminatory practices. This framing of disability, generally referred to as the "social model," finds its roots in the 1960s and 1970s. Influenced by the civil rights movement and the women's movement, disabled people began to recognize themselves as a legitimately entitled minority group. In so doing, they laid the groundwork for a dramatic revision of the way disability is understood. Disabled academics and activists began to place disability in a social, political, and cultural context to examine the structural dimensions of the experience. This shifted the focus away from the more traditional emphasis on individual deviancy and pathology and toward an exploration of the socially constructed barriers (inaccessible architecture, exclusionary policies and practices, prejudice) as the "real" or sociological problems of disability. These activists interpreted impairment not as an individual experience, but as a socially structured pattern of exclusion. Thus, the social model is distinct from the more traditional emphasis on biological impairment. This conventional "medical model" of disability individualizes and pathologizes the disability as a deficit residing within the person.

One impact of this paradigm shift has been to frame an understanding of disability as a dynamic rather than static condition. The social model conceptualizes disabilities as social and transitional phenomena, instead of traditional diagnostic categories. This dynamic is evident as growing numbers of elderly people encounter a range of disabling conditions and illnesses in later life; as familiar conditions gain prominence in new forms of disability, such as autism; and as improved medical interventions result in more individuals surviving conditions such as spinal cord injuries. As this more fluid approach gains credence, it is unlikely that clear definitions of disability will ever be solidified, despite popular demands for consensual definitions.

An overemphasis on the medical model has detracted from full citizenship for disabled people. Historically, medical science has dominated the study of disability by enacting and imposing definitions, categorizing differences, and allocating resources to alter biological conditions. Rehabilitation science, with its focus on increasing functional skills to approach a normative able-bodied standard, is rooted in the same biomedical model. When intervention is medical and rehabilitative, the impact of environmental and structural factors is often overlooked. The process of redefining the social "problem" of disability has been as potent for disability theorists and activists as it has been for other minority groups; confusing illness with disability has been likened to confusing gynecology with the study of women and dermatology with the study of racism.

Although disabled feminist researchers and activists acknowledge the significance of social model analysis, many have contested the "maleness" of this approach. Especially inadequate is the social model's tendency to deny the personal experiences of disability. Feminist activists have argued it initially made good political sense to marginalize the "embodied" experiences of disability because biological arguments have traditionally been used to legitimate social exclusion. But they have urged disability researchers and activists to learn from feminist methodology, to locate movement politics in the famous feminist principle that "the personal is political," to give voice to the subjective experiences of disability ("what it feels like here") rather than exclusively in objective barriers and structures. Disability scholars have in turn enriched feminist theory. Claiming disability, they have strengthened and transformed feminist analysis of embodiment and bodily variations, discovered the relationship between bodies and environments, and exposed the inherent instability of the embodied self.

Scientific Rationalism and Eugenics

Scientific rationalism is the bedrock on which disabled feminists and researchers have analyzed social and embodied experiences of disability. The adoption of science as truth in the 18th century stimulated the development of various forms of measurements. Notably, the distinction between subjects (who do) from objects (who are done to) led to a proliferation of means to quantify the objects to be studied. Such objects included women who were characterized often by professional men, as "the other." Women came to be equated with nature on which basis they were assumed to be less evolved and less intellectual. They were equated with emotionality and therefore viewed as being prone to promiscuity and irrationality. They were presumed to be lacking in morals and, as such, regarded as a social danger. In short, women, by their very nature, were perceived as being of lesser value, hence, defective.

The enthusiasm for scientific classification spawned theatrical exhibitions of exotic forms of nature perceived to deviate from an accepted norm. Humans and animals were combined in various performance genres, giving rise to the "freak show," a powerful cultural phenomenon that has endured in media, literature, and film reinforcing prejudice against disabled people. Scientific evolutionary theory in the late 1800s assigned more categories of people to the status of "other." Eugenicists were medical scientists who believed it was possible to improve the quality of the human race by preventing the births of disabled infants.

These scientists were convinced that survival of the fittest meant the unfit were to be bred out of existence. Eugenicists found scales measuring intelligence quotient (IQ) encouraging because they established disability as a scientific category. Though originally intended to positively identify students needing extra attention, ultimately IQ tests were administered to categorize more and more people as "feebleminded" and to legitimate the social Darwinist response of sterilization.

Feebleminded became a widely used term in the 19th and 20th centuries to describe those with perceived social, mental, or physical disabilities. Involuntary sterilization, legalized in 1920 by 16 U.S. states and performed in western Canada between 1929 and 1972, was used to control the presumed proliferation of those presumed to be unfit. Many more women than men were sterilized.

Legislative changes suggest this practice has been abolished, yet real-life situations appear that suggest otherwise. In January 2007, news of a 9-year-old Seattle child named Ashley made headlines. Ashley has significant physical and intellectual impairment as a result of a brain injury. When she was 6, her parents sought a medical procedure, a growth attenuation treatment that would keep their daughter an infant forever making it easier to care for her. With the approval of the hospital medical ethics committee, Ashley underwent a hysterectomy to remove her uterus and ovaries, a radical mastectomy to remove her breast buds, and an appendectomy. She was also infused with high doses of estrogen to stop her bones from growing. Ashley's parents maintain they undertook these treatments for the sole purpose of improving Ashley's quality of life. The publication of the procedure—a case that hearkens to the dark days of eugenic sterilization—in a medical journal triggered serious ethical questions about the controversial use of a technological response to a social concern. Ashley is believed to be the first child in the world to receive this treatment. Growth attenuation therapy by high-dose estrogen treatment, however, had been performed on teenage girls in the 1960s and 1970s when it was considered undesirable for girls to be tall.

Women's Experiences of Disability

In communities around the world, disabled people are among the poorest and most vulnerable of all groups; globally, 300 million women and girls live with disabilities. In Canada, 3.6 million people or an eighth of the population report living with a disability. Among Canadians, the disability rate is higher for women (13.3 percent) than men (11.5 percent), except among children between 0 and 14 years where boys have a higher rate of "activity limitations" (4.0 percent) compared with girls (2.5 percent). The overall higher percentage among women increases with age and can be explained partly by women's longer life expectancy and their tendency to report disability more frequently.

Despite the dramatic changes in women's work and family roles during the past decades, disabled women have not participated because they have been disadvantaged in a number of ways. Living with a disability makes it difficult to complete secondary and postsecondary education yet having an academic credential is key to securing employment. More disabled women than men are unemployed, and disabled women are less likely to have access to health care. When they are employed, they are more likely to work on an intermittent basis. Earning less income, they are more likely to receive fewer and less generous benefits that are often correlated to earnings.

Personal assistance services are widely regarded as the most critical individualized support necessary for disabled women and men to enjoy a meaningful engagement in society. Yet within the disability rights movement, the demand for flexible and transportable support has split along gendered lines; assistance for employment and supports outside the home have been emphasized, but women's domestic and familial responsibility inside the home have not.

Disabled women are extremely vulnerable to violence and sexual abuse. Because they are socially isolated, the ordinary checks and balances that detect abuse are often absent. Stereotypes that suggest disabled women would not be harmed by abuse or would not be found attractive makes them easy targets. Their unequal social and economic position and their reliance on others for intimate, personal care places them at greater risk. Incident reporting is low because the abuser is often known to the victim. The abuser is also more likely to be a family member, friend, caregiver, or service provider than a stranger, as the Latimer case reveals. Many are simply unable to leave an abusive situation.

Though disabled feminists have long called for an integration of the women's movement with the disability rights movement, little progress is evident. This may be explained partly by the debates about two key issues: reproductive rights and community-based care.

For feminists, reproductive rights has meant liberating women from traditional roles as wives and mothers and enabling them to make choices about having children; it means having access to birth control. Disabled women's sexuality is often questioned as is their capacity to be wives and mothers in a dominantly able-bodied culture. Thus, their reproductive rights often entail asserting their rights to bear children and having access to practical child-rearing supports. More controversial is the matter of screening for disability with a view toward termination through abortion. Feminists argue that women have the right to an abortion because it is a decision about their bodies and how they will live their lives and that this includes the right to abort a fetus when it appears through prenatal screening to have an "abnormality." Disabled women activists protest when screening is permitted on the basis of impairment; that practice, they suggest, represents an unspoken judgment about whose lives are worth living.

Questions of independence and dependency emerge in discussions of community-based care in which disabled women are often the recipients of care from others. Disability activists have long advocated the closure of large congregate-care institutional facilities and their replacement with new opportunities for social and communal participation. Nondisabled feminists, sensitive to the burden that such policy shifts place on women's unpaid caregiving in the home, have been more critical. Determined both to challenge the stereotypical portrayal of disabled people as having status only as passive and dependent recipients of care by others and to offer an alternative to the pervasive cultural obsession with independence, disabled feminists have embraced an ethics of care based on a model of reciprocity. This, they argue, opens the door for disabled women and those who support them to ask for and receive help from one another.

Resistance and Activism

The development of disability activism that is based on the social model and characterized by the identification of disabling barriers and creation of enabling environments allows for an analysis of, on the one hand, structural factors and, on the other hand, the agency of disabled people and their allies in changing those structures. In the 1950s, telethons featuring disabled children were devised by charity organizations to inspire donations. Most famous of these were Easter Seals' annual Timmy and Tammy. When these "poster children" grew into adulthood, many began to criticize the pity approach to fundraising because it stigmatized disabled people and negatively influenced public attitudes. As other social movements have shown, stereotypes, when they are embraced, can generate resistance and self-affirmation. Disability activism takes many creative forms: protests against charity telethons, archives collecting the artifacts and experiences of psychiatric survivors, university courses taught from the perspective of people labeled "mad," and festivals celebrating disability culture. Disability activism has also stimulated interest in the academic field of disability studies, as demonstrated by the surge of courses, programs of study, research, and scholarship in universities throughout the world.

Sophisticated forms of exclusion represent new threats to the lives of disabled people. Scientists and physicians in the Genome Project, an international research initiative launched in the 1990s, are developing the capacity to detect disability and disease prenatally. Genetic research can lead to preventing disability and disease and ease its impact on individuals and families. However, it raises important moral and ethical dilemmas by reinforcing a belief that disabled individuals are undesirable and should be prevented from coming into the world. Disabled people and their allies are alarmed at renewed assumptions about human perfection, normality, and abnormality; at the deepening medicalization of disability; and at the massive resources dedicated to new technologies at the expense of investments in health, nutrition, environment, and education that could extend and improve lives.

DISCURSIVE THEORIES OF GENDER

Discursive theories of gender see gender as something that is enacted on a daily basis through discourse. This understanding is in contrast to seeing gender as a property of persons or a set of adjectives associated with a person. Discursive theories of gender are part of wider approaches that see gender as a social construction, and they are thus central to understanding gender and society. What is unique about discursive approaches to gender is that discourses are seen as producing certain gendered subjects.

Discourse is a contested term, and many approaches lay claim to the term. The term discourse comes from the Latin word discurrere, which literally means to run to or through without objective. Discourse can refer to a poststructural definition often linked to Foucauldian theories and to a more linguistic understanding of language in use. In the Foucauldian understanding, discourse refers to the regulatory system that creates the order of things in a society through distinctions such as right/wrong, masculine/feminine, and so on. Discourse is here seen as a large sum of statements that regulate what is accepted as knowledge in a given society. Discourse can also be seen in a more linguistic version as language in use. This means that spoken and written texts can be subjected to an analysis of what is said when and how. Through this analysis, it is possible to analyze how the societal order is re-established through the use of language. Discursive theories of gender draw on Foucauldian as well as linguistic definitions of discourse to theorize gender as something that is performed.

Judith Butler is one of the most prominent thinkers who uses Foucauldian approaches to theorize gender. For Butler, gender is something that is done. This is in contrast to other understandings of gender where gender is seen as a property of persons or a set of adjectives. Drawing on Foucault, Butler argues that discourses, as large sums of statements, make certain subject positions available. Subject positions are the basis on which gender identities are formed. Discourse is thus powerful in defining what one understands to be gender and what it means to be a man or a woman in a given society. Gendered subjects are created through responding to or enacting these discourses. Although there are multitudes of discourses, certain discourses are more dominant than others, which makes them hegemonic. These hegemonic discourses determine how the ideal man or woman is supposed to be and oppresses other ways of enacting gender.

Another approach to gender as discourse is to understand discourses as the spoken word and as embedded in conversations. Various researchers have explored how gender is enacted through talk. For instance, Deborah Tannen believes that men and women have different talking styles and that this becomes evident in everyday life, with women more often using "we," and men using "I" more often. Other researchers have studied micro-interactions to explore how gender is created in a situation. Don Zimmerman and Candace West found that patients are more likely to interrupt female medical doctors than male medical doctors. This study highlights how societal gender assumptions are embedded in and perpetuated through spoken discourse. Such studies are based on the insight that gender is created through everyday interactions and that talk can be easily accessed to study these mechanisms and show how gender is enacted.

Although Butler regards discursive theories of gender as large sums of statements, other discursive theories have focused more on the fine detail of talk. Some researchers have recognized that wider and smaller discourses also interact to produce gender. Wendy Hollway analyzes how gender-differentiated meaning is (re)produced in unconscious dynamics between people. She shows how gender splitting works in the relationship between "Will" and "Beverly" to position Beverly as the one who does the "feeling" and Will as the one who does the "coping." This splitting of characteristics functions as a way to construct Will's masculine gender subjectivity and Beverly's feminine gender subjectivity. Other research has explored how young women made sense of their class and gender position in society and how young men position themselves in relation to such discourses as feminism and fatherhood. Studies in this vein show that discourses open subject positions that individuals adopt and that this often but not exclusively happens through talk.

Discursive approaches to gender are a useful approach for exploring the social construction of gender. The micro analysis of talk provides insight into how gender is produced in specific interactions. An awareness of large discourses is useful for showing which subjects can be formed based on these discourses. Discursive theories of gender can either refer to large discourses or more micro discourses, and some research has combined both views of discourse. By adopting discursive theories of gender, it is possible to show how the availability and desirability of discourses in society is linked to the subject positions people adopt in talk. The strength of discursive theories of gender is that they are useful for learning how gender is created through talk and the availability of subject positions. Through discursive theories of gender, it is thus possible to show how gender is performed in society through discourse.

Divine Feminine Spirituality

Divine Feminine spirituality refers broadly to a socio-spiritual movement centered on re-imagining the sacred as female or as a male-female dyad and on the veneration of the Divine Feminine. The term Divine Feminine generally refers to the archetypal feminine symbolized by or embodied in a female deity often but not always called goddess. The concept suggests that some qualities or essences are characteristically feminine and some are masculine. When the Divine Feminine is pictured as one aspect of a male-female pair, these qualities complement and balance each other. Divine Feminine spirituality emerged in resistance to patriarchal, male-centered religions, as well as from women's spiritual experience and from the work of feminist religious scholars. Divine Feminine spirituality is also concerned with the historical recovery of women's spiritual history and heritage.

In the United States, Divine Feminine spirituality took form during the women's spirituality movement, an offshoot of the women's movement's second wave. In the 1970s, Jewish and Christian women were challenging patriarchal religious structures and chauvinistic theology. Others were demonstrating the psychological and social consequences of male-only God language and imagery. Spiritual feminists were creating new women-centered religions and imagining female symbols of power to counter the symbol of God as male. Because of its radical approach, neo-pagan goddess worship and feminist witchcraft are usually thought of as the primary forms of Divine Feminine spirituality. However, multiple expressions cut across spiritual traditions. Feminist reformers within the Jewish and Christian traditions, for example, have been mining these traditions for liberating and affirming sources and integrating Divine Feminine imagery into their religions. Divine Feminine spirituality continues to evolve. Various groups disagree about how the goals of the movement should be realized, and bonds are being forged across religious lines with efforts toward a spirituality that reflects their values and vision.

Women of all spiritual backgrounds are creating new woman-centered sacred imagery and ritual traditions rooted in women's experience and the sacred feminine—a process of awakening the Divine Feminine in human consciousness and raising awareness of her presence in the world. In a male-dominated society, this process has become a source of affirmation and empowerment for women. Divine Feminine consciousness is believed to be necessary to heal and strengthen male-female relationships that have been damaged because of the devaluation and oppression of women. Only as equal partners can men and women work together in the image of God/dess and usher in a new age of peace and harmony. Thus, Divine Feminine spirituality is as much a social movement as a spiritual one. It challenges gender inequality both in religion and society at large and demands radical social change.

The concept of the Divine Feminine has provided a common language by which to challenge dominant ideologies and systems of oppression and to discuss potential solutions to pressing social problems. The Divine Feminine also functions as symbol and metaphor for peaceful and harmonious relationships and a vision for a better world. By re-imagining the divine, power and human purpose are also re-imagined. The Divine Feminine can be viewed as a wellspring of new ways of living and relating. Many see the Divine Feminine movement as a feminist project, and from its beginnings, pioneering spiritual feminists have been at the forefront. Misconceptions about feminism have led many to resist a feminist label on their spirituality. However, the aims of gender equality and social justice are based on feminist principles, so many see Divine Feminine spirituality as feminist spirituality.

The Divine Feminine is clearly a complex multivalent symbol that is culturally specific and is expressed and experienced in symbolic, metaphoric, and iconic forms. In general, Divine Feminine spirituality involves re-envisioning God as both male and female or emphasizes divinity as principally female. The meanings given to the Divine Feminine reflect each person's unique experience and relationship with the sacred. For some, she may represent creative potential and the life-generating power of Mother Nature. For others, she may be revealed in a saintly and enlightened woman such as Teresa of Avila who experienced the ecstasy of spiritual union. Still others may recognize the Divine Feminine in male-God traditions, such as the grace-filled presence of the Virgin Mary. Some are inspired by ancient goddess religions or discover her in other world spiritual traditions like the Dark Mother, Kali, of Hinduism. However the Divine Feminine is imagined, she is seen as a powerful and empowering force—one that endures despite negative patriarchal manipulation and active suppression.

Spiritual practice is oriented toward re-imaginings of the sacred that include women and the Divine Feminine. Spiritual activities foster transformational embodied experiences of goddess consciousness and an inner awakening of sacred female power. The metaphor of "awakening" is a common conceptual expression used to describe experiences of the Divine Feminine, and these experiences are the catalyst for personal and planetary healing. Practices are directed toward uncovering the Divine Feminine presence in the individual and in the world and include ritual, group engagement, personal exploration, storytelling, myth, poetry, and art, as well as techniques such as meditation, sacred dance, music, and chant.

Divorce

Divorce represents the official end or dissolution of a legally recognized marriage. It is widely cited that 50 percent of present marriages will eventually end in divorce and that the chances of a second marriage ending in divorce are even more likely. During World War II, divorce rates were elevated, but stabilized during the 1950s and early 1960s. Divorce rates increased through the late 1960s and 1970s in the United States and cross-culturally. In the United States, divorce reached its all-time high in 1980. The rate has leveled off since that time but remains high compared with the 1950s. The divorce rate in the United States is high in historical terms and is significantly higher than in other industrialized countries such as Mexico, Japan, the United Kingdom, and Canada. Although the divorce rate is high for married couples, the rate at which other romantic relationships dissolve, such as those who cohabitate, is even greater. This is likely the result of the less committed nature of cohabitation. This entry describes predictors, research on outcomes, and the influence on children of divorce.

Several social factors within the United States account for the high divorce rate. One of the primary changes has been in the economics of marriage. Traditional households in the 1950s used a division of labor such that the husband was the primary breadwinner, while the wife stayed at home to manage the house and children. During the past several decades, women have increasingly pursued careers of their own, and as a result, many households now rely on salaries from both partners. This shift has influenced divorce rates, especially from the perspective of women. In the past, traditional division of labor forced women to be financially dependent on their husbands, resulting in a barrier to divorce. Stacy Rogers examined the impact of wives' financial contributions on divorce in a 2004 study that used data from a 17-year longitudinal study. Wives' financial contributions were measured by dollars contributed, as well as by percentage of family income. Results indicated a positive correlation between wives' dollars earned and divorce such that as income increased, likelihood of divorce increased. However, when percentage of the wife's contribution was examined, an inverted U pattern emerged such that divorce was most likely when the husband and wife each contributed approximately 50 percent of the family income. According to Rogers, this situation represents equal economic dependence in which neither partner depends on the marriage for financial stability. Rogers also reports that women, and to a lesser extent men, are more likely to initiate divorce under these circumstances.

Perhaps as a result of less financial dependence, expectations have increased concerning the qualities a good marriage and good marriage partner should provide. Some of the increased expectations are the result of a more transient lifestyle. That is, people move more frequently and are less likely to become engaged in their community. As a result, social support structures are not as strong and lead people to rely more on their marriage for support. Marriage is also viewed as more of a choice than a requirement. For this reason, people expect more than minimal effort from their partners. Whereas in the past it may have been sufficient for the husband to provide financial security, expectations now include emotional support and an equal sharing of household responsibilities. According to a 2003 study based on national survey data from Paul Amato and colleagues, wives' increasing job demands and hours of work were associated with decreased marital quality, whereas nontraditional gender attitudes and increased economic resources increased marital quality. Further, sharing in household tasks increased wives' marital quality, but decreased husbands' marital quality. As partners' expectations in these areas increase, marital quality is ultimately affected. These shifts in marital quality inevitably influence the likelihood of divorce. As a result of these factors, the range of possible reasons for divorce has been greatly expanded. Thus, the stigma that had been formerly attached to divorce and divorcees has faded substantially. The decrease in negative attitudes toward divorce, paired with streamlined legal procedures, has made divorce an easier remedy to an undesirable marriage.

Predictors

Most previous research on divorce focused on identifying factors within a marriage that help determine the marriages that are likely to end in divorce. The range of possible predictors is vast, but generally falls into two main categories: preexisting factors and relationship factors. Preexisting factors include such things as social conditions and previous experiences. Terri Orbuch, Joseph Veroff, and colleagues examined several factors that lead to divorce as part of a large-scale longitudinal study called the Early Years of Marriage Project. In a 2002 study, they focused specifically on identifying who would divorce during a 14-year period. Their results show that two key social factors, race and education, predicted divorce such that African American couples and those with less education were more likely to divorce. Income does not significantly predict divorce when controlling for other variables such as race and education. Interestingly, other research finds that socioeconomic status does not predict who will divorce, but does relate to the reasons divorcees give for the divorce. Those with a lower socioeconomic status mention substance abuse and concerns about money, whereas those with a higher socioeconomic status mention incompatibility and problems with the relationship. Other preexisting conditions such as previous experiences are predictive of divorce as well. Each of the following have been identified as predictors of divorce in previous research: having a previous marriage, having divorced parents, having a child before marriage, cohabitating before marriage, having low religiosity, and getting married before age 25.

Not surprisingly, dynamics within the relationship itself can also predict divorce. At the most basic level, the likelihood of divorce increases as the length of the relationship increases. However, a longitudinal study by Ted Huston and colleagues known as the Processes of Adaptation in Intimate Relationships (PAIR) project shows that the first few years are crucial. By following more than 150 couples since 1981, Huston and colleagues were able to look at three competing models for why marriages ended. Models included enduring dynamics (i.e., problems that couples bring with them to the marriage), emergent distress (i.e., stresses and strains the couple experiences while married), and disillusionment (i.e., couples start out idealizing marriage, but realize it is not as perfect as they thought). The data show that disillusionment predicted divorce best. Couples who experienced the greatest declines in satisfaction, love, and affection over the first year were more likely to divorce.

Other research has identified several additional relationship factors that predict divorce. Each of the following has been identified as a predictor of divorce in previous research: having low relationship satisfaction, having low sexual satisfaction, having dissimilar attitudes, having negative interactions, spending little amounts of time together, having high amounts of conflict, and using negative communication strategies. Also, research shows that divorce is more likely if one partner has high levels of neuroticism, or is uncomfortable with intimacy.

Because of the large number of divorce predictors, it is useful to have an overarching framework to help understand how the various factors relate to each other. In 1995, Benjamin Karney and Thomas Bradbury proposed the vulnerability-stress-adaptation model to account for many of the factors that predict divorce. In this model, marital stability is determined by marital quality, which is the result of the interaction of several factors. First, the model states that people bring preexisting factors to their marriage (e.g., demographic variables, previous experiences, personality), known as enduring vulnerabilities. The second factor involves the experiences the couple has together (e.g., unemployment, loss of a family member, parenting, health problems), known as stressful events. Enduring vulnerabilities and stressful events influence how couples cope with issues (e.g., how problems are assessed, quality of communication, quality of support) known as adaptive processes. If the adaptive processes are sufficient, the impact of stressful events and enduring vulnerabilities are minimized and result in marital quality and stability. However, if adaptive processes are insufficient, marital quality suffers and divorce is more likely.

Outcomes

Research on divorce outcomes has largely focused on the negative consequences of divorce. Compared with married individuals, those who experience divorce have lower well-being, more health problems, greater mortality risk, smaller social networks, and lower standards of living. Women, however, are worse off economically, whereas men's economic condition improves slightly. Despite the disadvantaged financial state, women generally experience better adjustment to divorce compared with men. Women's successful adjustment is the result of their more developed social support networks and to their propensity for initiating the divorce. Because women are aware of the relationship problems and can begin thinking about divorce earlier, they are better prepared for life after divorce. In contrast, men are less prepared and more likely to cope ineffectively (e.g., engage in substance abuse) upon divorce. Finally, because of the typical unfair distribution of labor in households, divorce brings new desirable roles to women (e.g., head of household) and less desirable roles to men (e.g., household chores).

Influence on Children

Divorce influences children as well as the former spouses. In a 2000 review of thousands of divorce studies conducted in the 1990s, Amato identified the main ways divorce influences children. Generally, divorce has a small negative effect on children such that children of divorce have worse school performance, more behavioral problems, and lower well-being. Some positives, such as increased closeness between mother and daughter, have also been noted. Some research also notes that divorce is a more desirable alternative to a child experiencing a high conflict intact marriage. High levels of conflict pre- or post-divorce have been associated with children's poor school performance, poor relationships with peers, aggression, and emotional insecurity. Divorce may also influence children's subsequent romantic relationships. Compared with children from intact marriages, children of divorce are more wary about commitment, more likely to view divorce as a viable option, more emotionally involved in their romantic relationships, more likely to have earlier sexual experiences, and have less idealistic views of marriage.

DOMESTIC LABOR

Domestic labor refers to all of the work that is done to keep people healthy and productive. People need to be fed, clothed, cleaned up after, and cared for to remain productive members of our society. Economists estimate that as a society we spend as much time doing domestic labor as we spend in the paid labor force. Despite the importance of this labor to our economy and survival, it is typically overlooked and undervalued because most of it is done outside of the paid labor force and primarily by women.

The division of domestic labor within families remains deeply gendered. Even as women have made gains toward equality in the political realm and in the labor market, they continue to be responsible for most domestic labor. There is, however, significant variation in how families divide domestic labor, and scholars have developed competing theories to explain the allocation of domestic labor within families, as described in this entry.

The Gendered Division of Domestic Labor

On average, married women today spend approximately 19 hours per week doing domestic labor, compared with 10 hours done on average by married men. This division is in some ways an improvement since 1965, when married women averaged 34 hours and men averaged 5 hours per week. In the intervening years, when record numbers of married women entered the paid labor force, the primary change was a reduction in women's time in domestic labor, accompanied by a somewhat less drastic increase in men's domestic labor. Men's reluctance to do more work inside the home, despite women's increasing hours in paid labor, has helped stall equality inside and outside the home for women because the demands of domestic labor can impede women's ability to participate and excel in the paid labor market.

The overall decrease in the number of hours spent on domestic labor certainly reflects some amount of work that is not getting done and is often considered a part of a crisis for family care that rises from increased paid work hours for both men and women. Some affluent families, however, have the resources to buy domestic labor on the market, in the forms of housecleaning services, prepared foods, and restaurant meals. Even when buying domestic labor, the gendered division remains, with women primarily responsible for the purchasing, supervision, and management of these services. Furthermore, those who do paid housework are predominantly women of color who receive low pay and meager benefits, leading scholars to note that the freedom from housework for affluent women is often gained on the backs of less privileged women.

Aside from differences in the hours of domestic labor, men and women also tend to do different types of tasks. Core domestic labor tasks, those that are the most time consuming and frequently done, such as cooking meals, meal cleanup, housecleaning, and laundry, make up about two-thirds of hours spent in domestic labor, and women do the overwhelming amount of this work. Men invest most of their housework hours doing tasks that are more discretionary and less time consuming, including outdoor chores, repairs, gardening, pet care, and bill paying.

Variation in Allocation of Domestic Labor

Although the strongest predictor of time in domestic labor is gender, other characteristics are related to variation in housework and the gendered division of housework. Women's hours in paid employment is the strongest predictor; as women work more outside the home, they do fewer hours of unpaid domestic labor. Women with higher levels of education also do fewer hours of domestic labor on average. Employment hours have a weaker effect on men's housework time, although more work hours for men are related to a higher concentration of time in noncore housework tasks.

The division of labor is also influenced by family characteristics. Marriage has been found to increase women's hours in domestic labor, and decrease men's hours. Having children increases housework hours for both women and men, but much more so for women.

Researchers have also investigated the effect of social position on time spent in domestic labor. Despite stereotypes about traditional gender attitudes among the working class, there is little evidence that socioeconomic class has a significant effect on husbands' domestic labor.

African American men have been found to spend more time doing domestic labor than have other men, but still only about half as much as African American women. Researchers have found mixed results regarding Latinos, with some studies finding that Latino men do less housework than Latinas do and some finding that men do more than women.

The division of domestic labor has also been found to be shaped by attitudes about gender and housework, although not as strongly as one might expect. Women who believe strongly that housework should be shared have more equal divisions of domestic labor. Men who say that housework should be shared equally do perform more housework, but still perform much less housework than their wives do. The strongest effects are seen among spouses who have similar attitudes, when both husband and wife believe in an equal division of domestic labor.

The importance of gender in the division of domestic labor has prompted scholars to investigate the phenomenon among same-sex couples. Although some scholars have found more egalitarian divisions of labor among gay and lesbian couples, others have found patterns of inequality similar to those of heterosexual couples. In these couples, often the partner who works fewer hours or has a lower income takes on more domestic labor.

Competing Explanations for Gender Inequality in Domestic Labor

Scholars have used three major theories to attempt to explain gender inequalities in domestic labor: time availability, relative resources, and gender role theory. Each of these theories shows some strengths and weakness in explaining the division of domestic labor.

Time availability theories suggest that couples divide domestic labor rationally based on the amount of time they are spending in the paid labor market. This theory is supported by the strong correlation between women's employment hours and their housework time. However, others point out that this relationship is less consistent among men. Furthermore, some women change their hours in the paid labor force to accommodate their responsibility for domestic work.

The relative resources approach suggests that those with more power in a household will do less domestic labor. Power is often equated with status, position in the labor market, and income. According to this theory, men do less housework because they typically make more money than their spouses do. Furthermore, relative resources theorists argue that individuals within a household choose to specialize in either paid work or domestic work to maximize efficiency. In other words, the spouse who is "better" at paid labor (has higher occupational status and income) will specialize in market work, and the spouse who is "better" at domestic labor will specialize in that. Relative resources theory has been criticized for justifying inequalities that may disadvantage women in the workforce. In addition, it has been inadequate to explain persistent inequality even among couples where women are out-earning their husbands.

Critics of these first two perspectives often suggest that domestic labor is influenced as much by ideology about gender and appropriate responsibilities as it is by more structural concerns. They suggest that women and men use domestic labor (or the avoidance of it) as a way to display or perform masculinity or femininity. The successful performance of gender may ease marital interactions and provide feelings of satisfaction for the individuals.

Conclusion

The critical importance of unpaid domestic labor makes the allocation of this labor a vital issue for study. Most individuals, however, minimize the importance of this work and the division of it within their families. Even though most women do the majority of the housework, only about one-third of them rate their housework division as "unfair." Some suggest that traditional ideas about gender shape this evaluation, and others suggest that women will only rate the division as unfair when they have more power and alternatives available to them.

Even if individual women do not perceive inequality in housework as a problem, research has documented negative outcomes related to this division. High amounts of repetitive housework are associated with depression for both women and men. Furthermore, when men perform a greater share of the housework, their wives are less depressed and report higher marital satisfaction. The centrality of this labor for our society, families, and individual well-being challenges us to explore ways to share this labor fairly.

DOMESTIC PARTNERS/CIVIL UNIONS

During the last decade, several state governments and local municipalities within the United States have passed laws and enacted policies that provide protections for gay and lesbian couples, including domestic partnership, civil union, and most recently in the state of Massachusetts, same-sex marriage. Although domestic partnership and civil union often provide comparable rights and benefits to same-sex couples, significant variation exists from one context to the next, making it difficult to distinguish the terms precisely. One key difference is that domestic partnership is open to opposite-sex individuals and involves a contractual agreement that applies to specific statutes, whereas civil union, at least in the United States, is limited to same-sex couples, and represents a separate but parallel institution to that of (heterosexual) marriage. In contrast, same-sex marriage entails the removal of gender-exclusive language in the legal definition of marriage, broadening the institution of marriage to include both same and opposite-sex couples. This entry describes domestic partnership and civil unions in the United States, especially as they relate to family and gender.

Considering the controversy that surrounds same-sex marriage and the range of political contexts in which official recognition of homosexual relationships is pursued, it is not surprising that governmental action has proceeded in such different directions. Many existing domestic partnership and civil union laws are the result of attempts to achieve same-sex marriage. By January 2007, some form of legal recognition for same-sex couples had been implemented in the states of California, New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, Hawai'i, and Maine and in the District of Columbia. Efforts in these states proceeded through the courts or the legislature. Although organized opposition to domestic partnership, civil union, and same-sex marriage has often been pronounced—and even legally enforced, as in the case of Defense of Marriage Amendment (DOMA) legislation—legal recognition lends legitimacy to untraditional families, thus contributing to the transformation of gender and family politics.

Domestic Partnership and Civil Unions in the United States

The earliest form of legal recognition available to same-sex partners in the United States, domestic partnership, was created to provide some of the basic contractual entitlements of marriage, such as those involving property rights and support obligations. Although the first domestic partner policy was created in 1983 and 1984 in Berkeley, California, by the city's Human Relations and Welfare Commission, a domestic partnership registry, allowing couples to formally record their relationships within the municipality, was not implemented until 1991. In September 2003, a statewide domestic partnership bill was drafted and passed by the California legislature. One year later, in April 2004, Maine's legislature followed suit, implementing its own domestic partnership law (effective July 2004). These bills are more comprehensive in scope than the earlier domestic partnership registries, conferring nearly all of the rights and responsibilities associated with marriage. However, because domestic partnership is not federally recognized, the jurisprudence of individual states applies, meaning that couples' rights are not recognized or upheld beyond state lines.

In the early 1990s, the state of Hawai'i became one of the first battlegrounds in the United States where the issue of same-sex marriage was taken up by courts. Although a similarly timed injunction in Washington, D.C., gained some public attention, litigation efforts were ultimately unsuccessful, and the Hawai'i case, which generated widespread national attention, witnessed affirmative outcomes for gay and lesbian couples handed down from the state's supreme court. In May 1991, three couples filed a complaint with Hawai'i's first circuit court alleging discriminatory treatment and violation of the state's equal rights amendment by the Department of Health, which refused to grant marriage licenses to same-sex couples. The case of Baher v. Lewin was taken up by the Hawai'i supreme court shortly thereafter, and in 1993, the court ruled that denying same-sex couples marriage licenses constituted gender discrimination, a breech of Hawai'i's constitutional rights protections. The state government was subsequently challenged to provide evidence to the contrary in the form of a "compelling interest" why the ban on same-sex marriage should stand.

As a result of the Baher v. Lewin ruling, a same-sex marriage bill was debated during the 1994 legislative session, but the issue was met with overall opposition from Hawai'i's House and Senate judiciary committees, which halted its progression with the passage of an amendment defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman. In an attempt at compromise, members of the Senate proposed a domestic partnership bill, but it failed to move beyond the judiciary committee. Although the debate over same-sex marriage in Hawai'i is perhaps less notable for its legal outcomes and more for the wave of national reaction it generated, it stands as a major milestone in the legal recognition of same-sex relationships.

The first civil union law in the United States was enacted in 2000 in Vermont. As with the Hawai'i case, efforts were initially organized around same-sex marriage and were similarly channeled through the courts. In the case of Baker v. State of Vermont (1999), three couples sued the state of Vermont for denying them marriage licenses. In court, arguments made on behalf of the state denounced same-sex marriage on the grounds that it did not support a civil interest in procreation and child rearing. However, the supreme court justices, headed by Chief Justice Jeffrey Amestoy, disagreed with this reasoning, and in 1999, Vermont's supreme court deemed the exclusion of same-sex couples from the institution of marriage unconstitutional and mandated that the legislature consider same-sex marriage, or an alternative, domestic partnership. In contrast to Hawai'i, the Vermont legislature, which maintained a tradition of progressive politics, responded more favorably to the court's decision, proposing civil union as a middle ground between domestic partnership and full marriage rights. Vermont was the first U.S. state to pass a civil union law. In 2006, New Jersey followed a similar path. The New Jersey supreme court ordered lawmakers to broaden the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples, or to propose and draft a comparable alternative. On December 14, the legislature passed a civil union bill, effective February 2007.

The state of Connecticut also has a civil union law on the books, but the path to this form of recognition shares similarities with, and diverges from that of Hawai'i, Vermont, and New Jersey. As in other cases where civil union has been implemented, hope of achieving same-sex marriage was an impetus for pursuing legal action. In contrast to Hawai'i, Vermont, and New Jersey, however, Connecticut's struggle over the recognition of same-sex couples did not proceed through the state's courts but directly through its legislature. Although a same-sex marriage bill was drafted and debated during Connecticut's 2005 legislative session, it failed to garner majority vote. Judiciary committee members hastily drafted a civil union bill, which proved to be a palatable alternative for lawmakers, who quickly passed it through the House and Senate. The bill was signed by Republican Governor Jodi Rell, and in October 2006, the town clerk's office opened its doors to same-sex couples.

Family and Gender

Organized objection to the legal recognition of same-sex couples, often referred to as the "pro-family" movement, has arisen everywhere that domestic partnership, civil union, and same-sex marriage have been debated, demonstrating the power of traditionally held beliefs and attitudes about appropriate gender behavior. In numerous instances, these efforts have focused on the passage of state-level DOMAs, which redefine marriage as a union between one man and one woman. Primarily in response to the prospect of same-sex marriage in Hawai'i, a federal-level DOMA was touted by conservative groups and ultimately signed into law by President Bill Clinton in 1996. Thus, even as Massachusetts became the first state in the United States to extend full marriage rights to same-sex couples, the resulting unions are not recognized by the federal government and are therefore not protected beyond state lines, an issue referred to as "transferability." Currently, more than half of the United States, including most midwestern and southern states, has passed constitutional amendments banning same-sex union.

On the other hand, for many supporters of same-sex marriage, official recognition stands as a marker of equality under the law and holds the promise of more egalitarian familial arrangements, fluidity of gender roles in interpersonal relationships, and generally represents a move toward greater gender equality. In particular, families headed by same-sex couples disrupt the traditional nuclear family model comprising a male "breadwinner," a female "homemaker," and their dependent children. Opponents of same-sex unions often defend the link between gender and procreation, arguing that only heterosexual couples can procreate, or should rear children. Yet the formation of families headed by same-sex couples challenges taken-for-granted assumptions about gender, biological reproduction, and family organization. Legal recognition of these unions provides protections for an already existing family form. At the same time, laws that acknowledge and protect same-sex families help to legitimate their existence.

Conclusion

Although the notion of same-sex marriage is not new to the United States, the country has witnessed a flurry of legal activity surrounding the recognition of same-sex couples in recent years. Taking stock of the range of laws passed in the United States alone reveals considerable differentiation in the types of strategies that are used, the role of the courts and legislatures, and the level and type of opposition that is encountered. The outcomes are even more diverse. Generally, protections and benefits become more comprehensive moving from domestic partnership to civil union to marriage. Often, activists view domestic partnership and civil union as stepping-stones toward marriage. Although opposition to these laws has often been pronounced, the ways that families are recognized is changing. As the recognition of same-sex relationships becomes an increasingly international issue among industrialized nations as diverse as Germany, France, Portugal, Hungary, the United Kingdom, Mexico, and Switzerland, the debate over how, when, and under what conditions to legalize same-sex relationships is an issue that will become even more salient.

Domestic Technology

Domestic technology encompasses a wide range of home appliances and household techniques and practices related to cleaning, cooking, and child care. The development and use of modern domestic technologies was spurred by urbanization and the rise of science. Their proliferation in Western households has significantly affected the organization of the home with implications for race, class, gender, and global stratification.

In the early 1800s, more than 90 percent of the U.S. population lived in rural areas. The preindustrial home was the center of production for daily life. Family members helped with the production of vegetables, bread, clothing, soap, candles, and even medicines. The industrial revolution and urbanization shifted many types of production outside the home. The vacuum in home production generated debate about expectations for home life and women's responsibilities to private and public life. The debates were driven partly by the development of the domestic science movement. A stream of advice manuals and books such as Lydia Maria Child's American Frugal Housewife (1828) and Catherine Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe's The American Woman's Home (1869) became household manuals.

Given the elimination of many home production activities, such feminists as Oliver Schreiner and Charlotte Perkins Gilman advocated that women join men in the public sphere. Yet theirs was radical thought amid the fledgling, yet clearly patriarchal, institutions of postcolonial America. Precolonial and postcolonial America witnessed a growing emphasis on public education and literacy unmatched elsewhere in the world. Yet women's education was legitimized by emphasizing their responsibility in training their sons for entrance into civil society.

The lifework of Ellen Swallow Richards and her commitment to domestic science were a more palatable match for the given systems of patriarchy. In 1871, Richards became the first female student and then faculty member at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Having trained at Vassar in laboratory techniques then in their infancy, Richards found that her love for science found greater acceptance among men and women when directed toward the female domain of home. Ironically, Richards's focus on the home was more of a concession than a driving vision. She trained secondary education teachers to make a place for herself and other women in science and the academy.

Richards applied laboratory techniques, epidemiology, and germ theory to social problems connected with the home. The American city of the late 1800s was rife with health and safety issues driven by growing urbanization and overcrowding. Richards engineered systemic and home sanitation standards, product testing, food science, ventilation, and hygienic cleaning techniques.

Richards believed that domestic science provided an opportunity to elevate women's status. The care of family and home were not just a vocation, but now a profession based on specialized training. Proper homemaking required formal education in domestic science. As with the rationale for women's literacy in earlier times, the rationale for women's training in the principles of science was legitimized through their responsibility to home life. Cleaning and sanitation became a moral responsibility of every good homemaker.

Although key scientific contributions such as water sanitation, waste management, and immunizations improved public health, many other elements of the domestic science movement contributed to greater social stratification. Domestic education applied "Taylorism," the scientific management techniques used in factories to increase efficiency and production, to home life. Rather than freeing women for leisure or paid work, time "saved" was used to prepare more elaborate meals and scrub floors and walls on a regular basis. The focus on in-home production also created economic opportunity for technological innovation. Yet, many appliances labeled "time saving" actually increased the amount of time that women spent on household labor. "Wash day" became every day, instead of once a month as when laundry was done by hand.

Domestic science home visits became a method for assimilating urban poor families into middle-class American desires, if not luxuries of life. A new sense of order for family was conveyed: family schedules, cleanliness standards, food choice, and food preparation were framed in the vision of "right living." Poor women still labored in factories or did piece work in their homes. Material and time resources restricted their ability to conform to middle-class standards. Rising expectations for the ideal home further challenged the moral and feminine identities of the working poor.

Test kitchens such as the "Good Housekeeping Experiment Station," established in 1900, put the science of food chemistry into corporate practice. Yet, the influence of these kitchens was as much about marketing and sales, with the "Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval," as it was about science. Photos of female home economists dressed in lab coats in kitchens gave scientific credibility to products such as Corning Ware and helped convince homemakers to use them in their own kitchens.

The influence of the domestic science movement reached beyond women's in-home labor: it also affected changes in women's participation in the public sphere. For example, domestic science provided a discourse that allowed women to retain their femininity and accept the new scientific training requirements infused into the field of nursing in the late 19th century.

The foundations of domestic science are retained in home and work organization of modern Western societies. Although men are now more likely to participate in child care responsibilities, women still perform about twice as much routine housework as men do. In all wealthy nations such as the United States, women now represent almost half the paid labor force. Yet middle- and upper-class men and women's labor force participation is often supported by the home labor of poor and working-class women. Many of these women are immigrants who tend to the housekeeping and child care needs of a family. The home and markers of proper living today exist at the intersections of racial, gender, social class, and global stratification.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Domestic violence—also known as "interpersonal violence," "battering" and "family violence"—is a widespread and serious public health problem, in the United States and internationally. The United Nations Development Fund for Women estimates that one in three women around the world will be beaten, coerced into sex, or otherwise abused in her own lifetime. This entry looks at definitions of domestic violence, historical perspectives, domestic violence statistics, causes of batter, effects of domestic violence, children of battered women, and response and prevention.

Definitions

The notion of a "battered woman" derives from the criminal violation known as "battery" or the willful or intentional touching of a person against that person's will by another person, or by an object or substance put in motion by that other person. The notion of "battered women," with its emphasis on physical violence, fails to entirely capture the various ways in which intimate partners of either gender can be manipulated and abused and as a consequence, the term has been largely replaced by domestic violence (DV), intimate partner violence (IPV), and the more generic family violence.

During the past 15 years, there has been a growing recognition that IPV is a highly prevalent public health problem with devastating effects on individuals, families, and communities. The term family violence has been used to describe acts of violence between family members, including adult and adolescent partners, between a parent and a child (including adult children), between caretakers or partners against elders, and between siblings. Although sometimes used interchangeably, the term domestic violence is generally seen as a subset of family violence between intimates so that the term intimate partner violence appears to be replacing domestic violence for the sake of definitional clarity.

The Family Violence Prevention Fund defines IPV as a pattern of assaultive and coercive behaviors that may include inflicted physical injury; psychological abuse; sexual assault; progressive social, physical, or financial isolation; stalking; deprivation; extreme jealousy and possessiveness; and intimidation and threats perpetrated by someone who is, was, or wishes to be involved in an intimate or dating relationship with an adult or adolescent, and are aimed at establishing control by one partner over the other. Threats may be directed at the partner, her or his friends, family members, pets, or property. This term also includes children who are used by the perpetrator to intimidate and abuse the adult victim, as well as those who are forced by the perpetrator to participate in the abuse of an adult victim.

Legal definitions and remedies of IPV vary from state to state but generally refer specifically to threats or acts of physical or sexual violence including forced rape, stalking, harassment, certain types of psychological abuse, and other crimes where civil or criminal justice remedies apply. Violence between intimates is notoriously difficult to measure largely because it usually occurs in private, and victims are often reluctant to report incidents to anyone because of shame, guilt, or fear of reprisal.

Historical Perspectives

The battering of women is best understood within a sociopolitical context that explores the status of women's rights throughout time. Women in the United States did not acquire significant legal rights until the mid- to late-19th century and could not even vote until 1920. Before women achieved suffrage, married women were largely considered to be a form of marital property, and separated and divorced women were even more vulnerable to the whims of male authority figures. The battering of women, when publicly noticed, was largely attributed to the vagaries of unusually violent men or the pathology of the women involved.

Until the feminist movement of the 1960s and 1970s, DV was attributed to individual pathology, rather than as an extremely common and significantly destructive social problem. As a result of the women's liberation movement, battered women came to be understood as the most extreme victims of a universal and systematic oppression of women that extends far back into recorded history. In 1979, psychologist Lenore Walker interviewed 1,500 women who were victims of abuse perpetrated by their spouse and noticed that they all described a similar pattern that she called battered woman syndrome, in which the severity of the abuse escalates over time while both partners deny the severity of the abuse and are both convinced that each episode is a separate and isolated event. In such cases, as the abuse escalates, the husband stops apologizing for the behavior and becomes increasingly violent while his partner becomes increasingly depressed, fatalistic, self-blaming, helpless, and hopeless, developing a sense of personal entrapment and rejecting help from others. It became clear that the victim's preexisting personality was not a major factor in the development of battered woman syndrome and was not dissimilar to the adaptation that hostages make to their captors, also known as the Stockholm syndrome.

The first responses to victims of battering originated as the grassroots efforts of women to help and support each other through the development of DV shelters and other services, including political and social advocacy. The criminal justice responses to battering, although far from perfect, have included model police protocols, significant changes in prosecution and legal defense, and judicial education. Efforts to train health care professionals, mental health care professionals, child care workers, child protective services, and other social services are still in their formative stages.

Domestic Violence: The Statistics

DV is the leading cause of injury to women. U.S. government surveys on violence against women show that at some point in their lifetimes, more than a quarter of women in the United States are physically assaulted, stalked, or undergo one or more attempted or actual rapes by a current or former spouse, cohabiting partner or date and one-third of all murdered women are killed by intimate partners. Around the world, studies have shown that 10 percent to 69 percent of women reported being physically assaulted by an intimate male partner at some point in their lives; intimate partners commit 40 percent to 70 percent of homicides of women; and one in three women has been beaten, coerced into sex, or otherwise abused in her lifetime. Most often, the abuser is a family member.

The National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) gathers data about crimes using an ongoing, nationally representative sample of households in the United States. NCVS data include information about crime victims (age, gender, race, ethnicity, marital status, income, and educational level), criminal offenders (gender, race, approximate age, and victim-offender relationships), and the nature of the crime (for example, time and place of occurrence, use of weapons, and nature of injury). NCVS victimization data include incidents reported and not reported to police. The experiences and estimates of IPV reflect those of the individuals residing in households but do not capture the experiences of homeless individuals or those living in institutional settings such as shelters for homeless or battered persons. In 2005, 77,200 households and 134,000 individuals age 12 and older were interviewed. Between 1993 and 2005, response rates varied between 91 percent and 96 percent of eligible households and between 84 percent and 93 percent of eligible individuals. According to this survey, nonfatal IPV has declined since 1993. The rate of nonfatal IPV victimization for females was about 4 victimizations per 1,000 persons age 12 or older in 2005, down from about 10 in 1993. For females of most age categories, nonfatal IPV victimization declined over time.

Research has shown that victimized females are 2.5 times more costly to the health care system than are women who have never been the victims of abuse. Three-quarters of employed battered women were harassed at work, and DV is estimated to cost companies at least $73 million a year in lost productivity.

Gender as a Factor

According to the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, nonfatal IPV is most frequently committed by individuals of opposite genders. Females are more likely than are males to experience nonfatal IPV. Most victims of IPV are women. On average from 2001 to 2005, about 96 percent of females experiencing nonfatal IPV were victimized by a male, and about 3 percent reported that the offender was another female, whereas about 82 percent of males experiencing nonfatal IPV were victimized by a female and about 16 percent of males reported that the offender was another male. For homicides, intimate partners committed 30 percent of homicides of females, 5 percent of homicides of males. One of 14 men has been physically assaulted by a current or former spouse, cohabiting partner, boyfriend, girlfriend, or date at some time in their lives, and 86 percent of adult men who were physically assaulted were physically assaulted by a man and in only 56 percent of the times were these assaults by a stranger.

Sexual Orientation as a Factor

In a report describing incidents of DV against people of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) experience that were reported during the year 2006 to community-based anti-violence organizations in 12 regions throughout the United States, approximately 50 percent of the lesbian population had experienced or will experience DV in their lifetimes. In one year, 44 percent of victims in LGBT DV cases identified as men and 36 percent identified as women, and 78 percent of lesbians report that they have either defended themselves or fought back against an abusive partner. Gay and bisexual men experience abuse in intimate partner relationships at a rate of 2 in 5, which is comparable to the amount of DV experienced by heterosexual women; 40 percent of gay and bisexual men will experience abuse at the hands of an intimate partner.

Age as a Factor

In general, males ages 12 to 15 and age 65 or older experienced the lowest rates of nonfatal IPV. Although in general, females ages 12 to 15 and age 50 or older were at the lowest risk of nonfatal IPV, battering may start when women are still quite young. Recent surveys show that 20 percent of teenagers and young women have already been exposed to some form of dating violence defined as controlling, abusive, and aggressive behavior in a romantic relationship. Females ages 20 to 24 were at the greatest risk of nonfatal IPV.

Ethnicity as a Factor

Battering appears to occur within every culture, and every religious orientation and all races are equally vulnerable. Similar to other types of nonfatal violent victimization, nonfatal IPV is primarily intra-racial in nature. About 84 percent of white victims are victimized by white offenders and about 93 percent of black victims are victimized by black offenders. Between 1993 and 2005, rates of nonfatal IPV decreased for white females, white males, and black females. During the same period, intimate homicide rate fell for blacks in every relationship category, whereas the rate for whites remained unchanged for all categories. The average annual rate of nonfatal IPV from 2001 to 2005 was generally higher for American Indian and Alaskan Native females and similar for black females and white females. Between 1993 and 2005, the rate of nonfatal IPV victimizations declined for Hispanic females by two-thirds.

Pregnancy as a Factor

Twenty-three percent of pregnant women seeking prenatal care are battered. In a survey of pregnant low-income women, 65 percent of the women had experienced either verbal abuse or physical violence during their pregnancies.

Income as a Factor

From 2001 to 2005, females living in households with lower annual incomes experienced the highest average annual rates of nonfatal IPV. Females remained at greater risk than males within each income level.

Children's Exposure

On average between 2001 and 2005, children were residents of the households experiencing IPV in 38 percent of the incidents involving female victims and 21 percent of the incidents involving male victims.

Where and When

Males and females living in urban areas reported the highest levels of nonfatal IPV, and males and females residing in rural and suburban areas were equally likely to experience nonfatal IPV. Nonfatal IPV is more likely to occur between the hours of 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. Females and males experienced nonfatal IPV at similar times during the day and night. On average between 2001 and 2005, the majority of nonfatal IPV victimizations occurred at home; approximately two-thirds of females and males were victimized at home, and about 11 percent of female and 10 percent of male victims of nonfatal IPV were victimized at a friend's or neighbor's home.

Substance Use

On average between 2001 and 2005, victims reported the presence of any alcohol or drugs in about 42 percent of all nonfatal IPV, and victims reported that approximately 8 percent of all nonfatal IPV victimizations occurred when a perpetrator was under the influence of both alcohol and drugs. Female and male victims of nonfatal IPV were equally likely to report the presence of alcohol during their victimization. Female and male victims of nonfatal IPV both reported their attacker was under the influence of drugs in about 6 percent of all victimizations.

Weapons

On average between 2001 and 2005, for nonfatal IPV male victims were more likely than female victims were to face an offender armed with a weapon, but female victims were more likely than were male victims to face an offender armed with a firearm. About 6 percent of female and 10 percent of male victims faced an offender armed with a sharp weapon, such as a knife. The number of female and male IPV victims killed with guns has fallen. For females, the number of IPV victims killed by other weapons has remained stable.

Injuries

Thirty-two percent of all women who seek emergency room care for violence-related injuries were injured by an intimate partner. On average between 2001 and 2005, half of all females experiencing nonfatal IPV suffered an injury from their victimization; about 5 percent of female victims and 4 percent of male victims were seriously injured. Less than one-fifth of victims reporting an injury seek treatment following the injury. Females experiencing an injury are more likely than are their male counterparts to seek treatment at a hospital.

Reporting to Police

Between 1994 and 2005, reporting to police of nonfatal IPV increased for female victims. For 2001 to 2005, the percentage of nonfatal intimate partner victimizations reported to the police was higher for black females than for white females, higher for black females than for black males, and about the same for black and white males. Private or personal matter was the most frequent reason given for not reporting nonfatal IPV to police. On average between 2001 and 2005, almost 40 percent of male and 22 percent of female victims gave this reason. The reasons stated for not notifying police about the nonfatal IPV were fear of reprisal for 12 percent of female victims, to protect the offender for 14 percent of female and 16 percent of male victims, and because the police would not do anything for 8 percent of female victims.

Causes of Battering

As is the case for all complex social phenomena, there is no single cause of battering. The first—and perhaps the most important influence—is learning. The vast preponderance of violent acts in our culture are perpetrated by males and acted out against women, children, and other men. In about 95 percent of the cases of DV, the perpetrator is male, and even in situations where women are violent, the violence tends to be less damaging and far less lethal than when men are violent.

The dominant influence on male behavior is social expectation. Children learn the basics about how to relate to other people within the context of their own families. When they witness violence being used as a method for resolving problems, they learn violence as a fundamental intervention with other people. Boys are expected to both give and take physical violence as part of routine male conditioning. As adults, men are expected to control their violence; the amount of control that is expected has varied by time and historical period, but nonviolence has never been the social norm.

In the large Adverse Childhood Experiences (ACEs) study, the greater the likelihood that children were exposed to IPV, the greater the likelihood that they were also physically, sexually, or emotionally abused. Among women, the ACEs study found a strong graded relationship between the number of adverse experiences they had survived as children and the risk of becoming a battering victim. Similarly, among men, the study found a strong graded relationship between the number of these types of experiences as children and the risk of subsequently becoming a batterer.

It has been repeatedly substantiated that children who are exposed to violence are far more likely to become violent themselves. Exposure to violence in childhood is a serious risk factor for adolescent and adult violent and criminal behavior. Over many studies, the most consistent risk factor for men becoming abusive to their own female partners is growing up in a home where their mother was beaten by their father.

Although substance abuse does not cause DV, it can play a role in exacerbating battering incidents. Reportedly, one-fourth to one-half of men who commit acts of DV also have substance abuse problems. Women who abuse alcohol or drugs are more likely to be victims of battering, and victims of DV are more likely to receive prescriptions for and become dependent on tranquilizers, sedatives, stimulants, and painkillers and are more likely to abuse alcohol.

Poverty, homelessness, and racism are all stressors that in and of themselves do not cause violence but alone and in combination, they put enormous stress on families. Families that are stressed, isolated, and socially unsupported are more likely to be violent. Many women and children are made homeless as a result of DV when they flee the perpetrator. The system of DV shelters and services was initially created largely by and for white, middle-class women. As a result, the issue of systematic oppression based not just on gender but also on race and class has not necessarily informed services for battered women. Women from lower socioeconomic classes have far fewer opportunities to leave abusive partners because they have less available resources to support themselves and their children.

Effects of Domestic Violence

There are immediate, short-term, and long-term effects of being battered, and many studies connect a wide variety of physical, psychological, social, and existential problems with DV. Typically, a woman who is battered lives with constant terror and anxiety with fears of imminent doom. To others, she may appear passive and lacking in energy, seemingly helpless to take charge of her own life. She may suffer from chronic depression, exhibit suicidal behavior, and develop overt post-traumatic stress disorder. She may turn to the use of drugs and alcohol to afford herself some relief, thus compounding existing problems. She is likely to feel hopeless and powerless to make any significant changes, fearing that anything she does will lead to something worse. She may be unable to relax and have difficulty sleeping. Her sleep may be interrupted by violent nightmares.

The manner in which a battered woman will be individually affected by battering will be determined by a number of interactive factors, including her previous exposure to violence as a child and adolescent; genetic, constitutional, and psychobiological factors; the presence of coexisting physical, psychological, or social problems; the presence of substance abuse; her belief systems as well as the belief system(s) of her family, ethnic group, religious affiliation; and the supports that exist within the community.

The Children of Battered Women

Children exposed to DV show many different responses that negatively affect their physical and mental health, their social adjustment, and their school performance. For children, the more severe the violence, the more severe their problems are likely to be. Childhood exposure to violence also has serious consequences for adult physical health as well as mental health and social adjustment. When compared with people who had safe and secure childhoods, people who had experienced four or more categories of childhood adversity—including witnessing DV—had 4- to 12-fold increased health risks for alcoholism, drug abuse, depression, and suicide attempts; 2- to 4-fold increases in smoking, poor self-rated health, sexual promiscuity, and sexually transmitted disease; and 1.4- to 1.6-fold increases in physical inactivity and severe obesity. The number of categories of adverse childhood exposures showed a graded relationship to the presence of adult diseases including ischemic heart disease, cancer, chronic lung disease, skeletal fractures, and liver disease. The seven categories of adverse childhood experiences were strongly interrelated, and persons with multiple categories of childhood exposure were likely to have multiple health risk factors later in life.

Response and Prevention

A problem cannot be solved until it is properly recognized. During the last 30 years, public awareness of battering as a significant social problem has radically increased. Nonetheless, a great deal of work is yet to be done in educating health care and mental health care providers, social service workers, educators, criminal justice officials, and the general public about the reality of DV, including the costs to society of failing to adequately address the problem. Adequate responses require that the community provide sufficient legal, health, mental health, and other community resources to protect victims and ensure that they receive the services that lead to healing and recovery. This includes sufficient resources to treat the physical, emotional, and social consequences of battering in the victim, the child witnesses, and the perpetrators. To efficiently deliver these resources, research is needed to discover those interventions that are the most effective. Ultimately, although individual suffering must be addressed, the solution to the problem of battering resides in cultural transformation so that intimate violence and all forms of interpersonal violence are no longer considered acceptable.

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell"

The military policy "Don't Ask, Don't Tell, Don't Pursue, Don't Harass" was established by Congress in 1993. The Department of Defense policy is the result of President Bill Clinton's campaign promise to eliminate the ban on homosexual and bisexual personnel in the U.S. military. The policy states that members of the military can no longer be asked to divulge their sexual orientation and that the military cannot actively seek out homosexual or bisexual members.

Before this policy was adopted, people seeking to join the military were asked to report any homosexual behavior, and anyone who was in the Armed Forces who was discovered to be engaged in same-sex acts was discharged from the service. Policy does not always match practice. Studies have documented that in times of great need, gay and lesbian personnel were often allowed to enlist or serve but most of these people were dishonorably discharged once the military felt they were no longer needed.

Clinton's proposal represented a cultural shift in the United States, where same-sex relationships were gaining widespread acceptance. His initial proposal garnered intense opposition by some members in Congress. The "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy is the result of a compromise between forces on both sides. The goal of the policy is to provide an opportunity for gays and lesbians to serve, but they can only do so if they do not reveal their sexual orientation. Additionally, it was believed that the history of "witch hunts" that previously occurred would be reduced. In 2005, the Government Accounting Office (GAO) reported that approximately 9,500 members had been discharged between 1993 and 2003. Because of the costs involved with training, discharging, and replacing these service members, the government estimates this cost to be almost $95 million. The report also documented a steady increase in discharges since the policy took effect.

Supporters of the policy often focus on two areas. The first is on the basis of civil rights, stating that whoever wants to serve and meets the basic requirements, should be allowed to serve. Supporters refute arguments about lack of morale and cohesiveness as being grounded in homophobia, myths, and stereotypes. If all conduct themselves in a professional and appropriate manner, then one's sexuality does not affect the effectiveness of the unit. Another position is based on defining homosexuality or bisexuality as a sexual orientation and defining sexuality as inherent to an individual's identity. Therefore, people are being discriminated against not because of certain assumed behaviors but instead because of their identities.

Those opposing establishment of the policy use more traditional arguments of exclusion. Although some cite objections based on religious beliefs, most believe that having homosexuals or bisexuals serving reduces the morale of a military unit. This is because heterosexual members are uncomfortable because of the physical closeness of living and training conditions. The basis for most of these arguments run along behavioral lines, that homosexuals choose to live a particular lifestyle that is contrary to the lifestyle of the military. Interestingly, heterosexuals are not presumed to be living a particular "heterosexual lifestyle." Another basis is tied into beliefs surrounding sexuality, masculinity, and femininity. For example, some argue that homosexual men are more feminine and therefore weaker, which makes them poor soldiers. Others oppose the policy with the argument that the military should return to its original position of banning all homosexuals and bisexuals. Often the foundation for each of these points rests in religious beliefs. A new oppositional argument has recently emerged, one that opposes the policy in favor of allowing gays and lesbians to serve openly.

Another area of debate resides in the safety of homosexual and bisexual service members. Some argue that the policy has increased sexual harassment, assault, and murder. Cases have been cited where supervisors were aware of anti-gay harassment but they chose to ignore rather than stop the behavior. Others speak of a general culture of homophobia that exists within the military structure, which fuels anti-gay behavior and attitudes. Beginning in the late 1980s, a series of incidents brought increased attention to sexual harassment and assault that many women face by males, but only recently have studies been conducted focusing on documenting current incidents of anti-homosexual or bisexual bias and violence. Many incidents of anti-gay behavior are based on a perception of homosexuality, which is largely shaped by myths and stereotypes. Some countries, such as Britain, have eliminated their ban on gays and lesbians and have found a dramatic decrease in anti-gay violence.

One unanticipated result of this policy is that after the events of September 11, 2001, there was an increased need for personnel who were fluent in a host of languages, such as Arabic, Farsi, and Korean. While the government appealed for people with these language skills to join the military, more than 300 service members with these skills were discharged because of issues related to homosexuality or bisexuality. Debates continue surrounding the effectiveness and need for the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy.

"Down Low," The

The down low, or DL, is a term used to refer primarily to black men who are secretly having sex with other men while maintaining heterosexual relationships or marriages. Included within this concept is a racialized depiction of men who have sex with men (MSM), as well as an understanding of masculinity because these men are assumed to not be effeminate and may perhaps be portraying hyper-masculine depictions such as the "homothug." Another significant aspect of the DL is that these men do not construct themselves as gay or bisexual, but as heterosexual men. In recent times, there has been increasing research about black MSM who are on the DL, particularly regarding high-risk sexual behavior and sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). The research regarding STD transmission has been of particular concern because DL men are not likely to inform their female sex partners that they are sexually active with men and may not be employing safer sex practices.

Although the DL is being constructed as a new phenomenon within the media, MSM behavior has always existed. The term down low has been part of black vernacular since at least the early 1990s, with the initial meaning of secrecy or discretion. Initially, the DL was tied to sexuality by men who were having sex with women other than their girlfriends or wives, but over time, it has evolved to refer primarily to sex with men. The current connection of the DL to MSM emerged in the early 2000s with the publication of books addressing the "new" phenomenon. Socially, the DL has often been framed as the immoral behavior of black men and the implications this behavior has for "innocent" black women.

Although men on the DL are not likely to identify as homosexual or bisexual, this does not dismiss the possibility of long-term relationships or connections between men. Many men who are on the DL may seek to establish long-term quasi-monogamous relationships with a male partner with the expectation of it being safer. However, many men on the DL may also seek sex with men in situations that may ensure anonymity, such as pornographic theaters, cruising parks, public restrooms, and most recently, via the Internet.

In one survey, when contrasting DL-identified MSM with gay or bisexual identified men, DL men are approximately 8 to 10 times more likely to report having a female sexual partner in the past 6 months. Among all men surveyed, the median number of male sexual partners in the prior 6 months was seven. Significant numbers of men surveyed had had sex with men whose HIV status was unknown, with more than one-third of the men reporting unprotected receptive anal intercourse. Among the DL men, one in four reported unprotected vaginal sex during the last 6 months. Thus, among DL men, there is a significant level of unprotected sexual behavior occurring with both male and female sexual partners. One author suggests this may occur because the use of condoms, particularly while having sex with men, would demonstrate forethought and intent to have sex with men and reduce the ability for these men to argue that "it just happened" or "it was the alcohol," thus forcing these men to recognize their same-sex desire. DL men demonstrate significantly higher levels of internalized homophobia than do gay or bisexual identified men.

In the United States, blacks and Hispanics are disproportionately affected by HIV and AIDS. The degree to which DL behavior affects this is unclear. Among HIV positive men, 77 percent of whites and 49 percent of blacks acquired HIV via MSM behavior. Further affiliated with the risks of HIV, black men are less likely to be tested or know their serostatus. Among HIV positive women, 67 percent of whites and 80 percent of blacks acquired HIV via heterosexual sex. In general, black women have 23 times greater risk of contracting HIV than do white women. White men who have sex with men are far more likely to identify as homosexual or bisexual than are Black men. The social privilege of race may be functioning in the ability to identify as nonheterosexual and may enable greater access to HIV testing. The connections of the DL to HIV have often disregarded the issues of poverty that many racial minority groups face.

Although the DL has most commonly been affiliated with black men, men of other racial groups and women also participate in secretive sex with same-sex partners. In recent years, high-profile politicians such as Governor James McGreevy of New Jersey and Congressman Michael Huffington of California have brought increasing attention to the DL behavior of white men. Women on the DL have been understudied partly because of the current eroticization of pseudo-lesbians, as well as sexism placing attention on male sexual behavior.

Environments such as the military also encourage MSM to be on the DL. If same-sexual behavior or identities are discovered, individuals may face significant levels of discrimination, as well as dismissal from service.

A significant level of MSM occurs in prisons; however, most of these men do not identify as homosexual or bisexual and may construct their behavior as "doing what they have to do." It has been suggested that MSM (both forced and consensual) along with drug use in prisons may be significantly affecting HIV rates among black men. However, condoms are currently regarded as contraband in nearly all prisons, disallowing safer sex practices.

DOWRY/DAAJ

The dowry system is most notably recognized as particular to India, although it has existed in some forms in various other countries, including some related practices noted by anthropologists in Europe and Africa. However, giving and receiving dowry appears to be a complex system in its variations in meanings and practices among families in various parts of India. The system has been undergoing numerous changes and legal reforms although some of its practices still exist even among affluent and educated people.

A dowry (called daaj in Panjabi and dahej in Hindi) is a form of a "gift" given by the bride's family to the groom's family (usually to his father) at the time of marriage but may be given even after the marriage on various occasions. Dowry is generally found to be an involuntary system and an established tradition, expected, and sometimes even demanded as a right or a claim made by the groom's family. The amount of dowry expected and given generally depends on the relative economic as well as the caste status of the bride's family among, for example, Hindus and Sikhs. Generally though, it consists of cash amounts and items such as jewelry, clothing, furnishings, appliances, or a car for bride and groom and his family members. Among the Muslims in India, Pakistan, and in several parts of the Middle East, however, the custom of dowry is almost the reverse. In this case, dowry (called "Mehr") is fixed at the time of marriage by the family of the bride in terms of a cash amount that would be socially sanctioned as a claim to be made by her in case she is divorced by her husband. The amount is usually higher if the bride belongs to an above-average social class and is a virgin or had not previously been married and divorced.

Although the dowry system has been outlawed since the enactment of the 1961 Dowry Prohibition Act in India's Penal Code (amended in 1984 and 1986), it is still socially and informally sanctioned, particularly in business castes and in rural communities. Raj argues that the dowry system has had both advantages and disadvantages for people. Its supporters claim that it used to be fair practice in the past because a woman could not inherit parents' land and other property. In that case, the dowry financially compensated her and her husband's family. Some even argue that by giving an attractive amount of dowry, the parents could find a suitable match for unattractive and uneducated daughters. Also, the dowry system has been an essential part of hypergamy (upward status mobility through marriage), particularly among relatively higher-status families who generally tend to use arranged marriages to consolidate or enhance their social status.

The dowry system in India has become a major problem and a hotly debated topic, however, particularly among many educated people as well as among Indian feminists. Jane Rudd demonstrates that the inability of a prospective bride and her family to meet the increasingly difficult dowry demands of the groom and his family is responsible for much of the domestic violence, including the neglect of daughters, female infanticide, sex-selective abortion, and harassment. Thousands of dowry-related murders and suicides, known as "dowry deaths" or "bride burning," have been reported. Incidents of this type of violence against women generated a great deal of media publicity during the 1980s. Many reports indicated that a woman's value or worth is judged at her husband's home by the dowry she brings. Sometimes the husband's family is not satisfied with the amount of dowry his wife brings in as a marriage payment. As a result, soon after the marriage, the husband and his parents start demanding additional money or property. If the woman and her parents resist the additional demands, she may be beaten, psychologically tortured, murdered, or burnt to death by the so-called mysterious "kitchen fires." There is evidence of women being set alight in kitchens often with their husbands and their in-laws (usually mothers-in-law) actively participating in the crime. So dowry, a cultural practice, is coming to be recognized as a criminal offense and strict penalties have been enacted for such offenses by the government of India.

The dowry system in general demonstrates the socially lower and financially dependent status of women. For example, families that consider male children as economic assets and female children as liabilities demonstrate a cultural mentality that produces a secondary status for women. In many parts of India, women are virtually denied their legal inheritance rights because their brothers often manipulate the system in their own favor and sisters do not claim their rights because "they had received dowry." Overall, a father "giving away" his daughter in an "arranged" marriage implies that a woman is a sort of commodity that can be traded off.

Originally perhaps, the dowry system was designed as a safety net for the woman. The money, gifts, property, and other belongings given to the woman by her parents at the time of marriage were meant to exclusively remain with the woman. Under the spell of greed, however, the original intention of the dowry has been abused to the extent that it has become a price tag for the groom and a possible death sentence for the bride. Depending on the qualifications, profession, education, and income of the groom, the price tag skyrockets. With higher education (doctors, engineers, etc.), some consider it their divine right to receive a large dowry. High expectations of dowry have led to abortions of female fetuses and many poor families resorting to female infanticide for the fear of not being able to provide dowry.

Present in all levels of Indian society, the dowry system has exacerbated the historically lower status of women. In addition to the inequities of the dowry system, women in India have been systematically downgraded in other ways for centuries. For example, they have been deprived of education (secular and spiritual) and have been subjected to the limitations of the caste system. The dowry system is likely to finally go away. Many in the new generation of Indians seem to be moving away from the parental controls in the arranged marriage system. During the past few years, mass media have been reporting incidents when grooms and their accomplices are beaten up and police had to arrest them for demanding dowry during marriage ceremonies. In a recent study, however, Mary Shenk concludes, "Attempts to deal with dowry problems have resulted in virtually no diminution of either dowry or violence against women." The rate of education and employment among girls has been steadily increasing during the past few decades, and attitudes toward dowry are becoming more negative. For example, studies are increasingly showing a highly negative perception of the dowry system among high school and college students in India.

DOWRY PROHIBITION ACT

The Dowry Prohibition Act enacted on July 1, 1961, in India prohibits the giving or receiving of a dowry. The law defines a dowry as property or valuable security given by either party to the marriage, or by the parents of either party, or by anyone else, in connection with the marriage. The original text of the Dowry Prohibition Act was found to be ineffective in curbing the practice of dowry. In addition specific forms of violence against women, linked to a failure to meet dowry demands, created a need for more stringent prohibitions than those available under existing law. As a result, legislative advocacy changes were made to the language of the Dowry Prohibition Act and other important sections of the Indian Penal Code to protect female victims of dowry-related violence. Despite these laws, the practice of dowry persists in India today and can be found in varying degrees within several communities and socioeconomic groups.

The Dowry Prohibition Act of 1961 applies to people of all religions in India. Under the law, a distinction is made between dowry, which refers to property that is obtained by force or coercion as part of a marital agreement, and stridhan, or property that a woman's family gives her voluntarily at the time of her marriage. Stridhan can also include the separate property a woman brings to a marriage. A 1984 amendment to the act specifies that presents given to a bride or groom at the time of a wedding are allowed but the law requires that a list be maintained describing each gift, its value, the identity of the person giving it, and the person's relation to either party to the marriage. The original language of the act prohibited only dowry given "in consideration of marriage," which was limited in scope and left unregulated a range of dowry-related transactions. In 1984, the language was amended to prohibit dowry given "in connection with the marriage," with the hope that the change would encompass a broader range of agreements. Revisions of the original act also established minimum and maximum punishments for giving and receiving dowry and created a penalty for demanding dowry or advertising offers of money or property in connection with a marriage. The Indian Penal Code was also modified in 1983 to establish specific crimes of dowry-related cruelty, dowry death, and abetment of suicide. These enactments punish violence against women by their husbands or their relatives when proof of dowry demands or dowry harassment can be shown.

DRAG KING

Drag kings are (usually) female performers who parody masculinity in a variety of theatrical acts. Drag kings and their performances are mostly found in venues within the gay and lesbian subculture because these spaces provide safe environments for gender play and have maintained historical traditions of queer and culturally subversive performance. Drag kings further emerged through the engagement of women in gender workshops and in response to the introduction of gender studies in academia during the 1980s and 1990s. However, drag kings have more recently transcended their subcultural roots and can be found performing in popular theatrical sites such as in Shakespearean productions, musicals, opera, and film and television productions. Drag kings and their performances contribute to gender and social discourses, including Judith Butler's theory on the performativity of gender, as well as sexual, queer, cultural, and feminist discourses.

Exactly when and where drag kings first emerged is unknown. Rumors have described the first introduction of the term drag king originating as a response to their male counterpart, the drag queen (men performing femininity), and drag queen's influence on popular culture. Another rumor is that the word was coined by Diane Torr, a self-proclaimed performance artist who runs drag king workshops internationally. However the name was created, drag kings have emerged as interesting and prolific queer performers during the last 2 decades.

Many kings emerged, flourished, and influenced future performers by attending masculinity and women-only workshops. These gender workshops were some of the first safe spaces in which women could experiment with masculinity: to slip behind a male façade made up of spirit gum and moustaches to play with hegemonic social structures. These workshops became popular as women from all walks of life strutted their stuff in public; they were literally walking in men's shoes and donning the accoutrements of masculinity completely undetected. From many accounts, however, these workshops seemed to have served as more of a social experiment than as a performance site because the emphasis of the experience was placed on teaching women to "pass" (being perceived as the opposite sex) as men rather than to theatrically "perform" as men, removing the essential elements of drag from the gender play. Some of the participants, however, appropriated masculinity as a site for performance and continued to develop their newly acquired social performance of masculinity into drag acts that became the hallmark of the drag king.

A drag king is a drag artist. A performance convention, drag is essentially the hyper-performance of the socially prescribed performance of gender within cultural axioms. A drag king's purpose is to enact masculine axioms and highlight their absurdity. Drag performance is immersed in gender and predicated upon an assumption of a "fixed" sexed body and its prescriptive social attributions wherein sex and gender performance are normative and congruent; that is, men are masculine, women feminine and heteronormative. Drag interrogates this assumption by revealing the performance as a performance through an absurd theatrical enactment that re-renders gender, sex, and sexuality beyond prescriptive terms.

A drag king is not, as the misconception usually is, a cross-dressed, transgendered, or transsexual person. Drag uses cross-dressing within its acts, but this is fundamentally different. Also, a transgendered or transsexual performer may be a drag king, but it must not be assumed that if a woman wears male attire, she is a drag king. If she wears male attire in a performance highlighting the absurd modes of masculinity set against the backdrop of a "revealed" or "perceived" female body, then she is a woman performing masculinity and, thus, a drag king. This is not to say that only biological women can be drag kings. Some drag king performers are men, men identified as women, and women identified as men who also use masculinity in performance.

Drag kings have many theatrical varieties: from the simply costumed male parody to the full super-performer using many engaging forms of theatricality to costume the king. Another important aspect of drag king performances is the relationship between the king and her audience. For the most part, drag kings emerged as a form of entertainment within the lesbian and gay subculture primarily because the community creates a safe and supportive environment for these types of performances to be staged and received. Within the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender audience, queer erotic discourse set against heteronormative hegemonies in performance are celebrated. Yet even within their own community, drag kings still lack notoriety and popularity compared with their drag queen sisters.

Drag kings and their communities can be found in most large cities. Each city has different drag king standards and aesthetics, which can be made especially apparent when comparing performances or attending drag king contests. In some cities, "believability" and "passing" is key to a drag king's talent, whereas theatricality and entertainment are idealized in other communities. And although drag kings are found predominately in the West and in larger populations, their influence is spreading as new venues and communities arrive on the scene globally and locally. Drag kings are found on the world's stages, reciting Shakespeare, emceeing the Tony awards, appearing in episodes of Sex and the City, in The L Word, and in classic and modern films. Although seemingly a new performance art, drag kings have historical roots that can be traced back to the male impersonators of vaudeville and the music hall era, to Panto and Italian commedia, and to the breeches roles of the Victorian era, among others.

Drag Queen

The drag queen, who is a fundamentally theatrical figure, relishes the prospect of playing the woman. Drag shows (typically staged in nightclubs and Gay Pride festivals) are largely a subcultural phenomenon. Though drag has never enjoyed mainstream appeal, drag queen is a common enough term in popular culture, partly because of recording-artist RuPaul, who hit the charts with her hit-song "Super Model (You Better Work)" in 1992. Such hit films as The Birdcage (1996), and the recent popularity of movie-musicals such as Rent and Hairspray have also made the image of the drag queen a familiar cultural icon.

By definition, a drag queen is distinct from a cross-dresser (sometimes called a transvestite) because the motivation of dragging is typically not sexual. Although the two are often conflated in popular cultural representation, cross-dressing commonly involves a high degree of secrecy and is associated with sexual or gender-related fetishes. Both drag queens and cross-dressers have experienced a history of persecution, as has the drag queen's antonym (the drag king), which refers to a woman in man's clothing, or a male impersonator. Unlike the secrecy of cross-dressing, in which the attempt is often to pass as a woman, dragging involves outlandish performance whereby the intent is an undoing of gender norms through doing (or dressing) the part of the opposite sex. However entertaining it might be, this flamboyance can also be difficult to accomplish in a culture of homophobia. In 1810, for example, members of the White Swan (a house of ill repute in London's West End) wound up in the pillory, where they were then pummeled with rocks and excrement. The group's performances included an athletic bargeman posing as "Fanny Murray," a brawny coal-heaver as "Lucy Cooper," a butcher as "Pretty Harriet," a waiter as "Lady Godiva," a country grocer as "Miss Sweet Lips," even a police officer as "Miss Selina." Most Londoners were outraged by the apparent mismatch between the men's private and public selves. One pamphleteer (who excoriated the White Swan's patrons as "reptiles" and "wretches") gives us a glimpse into drag queen culture in early 19th-century England: living in fear of police raids and state surveillance, men in drag shut themselves in the closet.

There is a rich literary tradition of men taking stage in women's clothing. In this sense, drag is as old as Shakespeare's romantic comedy As You Like It, in which Rosalind disguises herself as Ganymede to woo Orlando, and by doing so, she gets to know him "man" to man. One can draw a "straight" line from Shakespeare's gender-swapping to the 1959 hit comedy Some Like It Hot, in which Jack Lemmon and Tony Curtis disguise themselves as "Daphne" and "Josephine" and join a traveling, all-girl jazz band to escape the mob. The film also features, as the band's singer, Marilyn Monroe, an icon of femininity whom many drag queens emulate, alongside Cher, Madonna, Aretha, Dolly, Bette, and other show-biz queens. That Lemmon and Curtis did drag on-screen hardly makes them drag queens, though the effect is the same: gender norms are radically undone when drag takes place. As with Tootsie (1982), one Hollywood theme that allowed for the popularization of drag queens is the idea that dudes only dress like ladies to get the girl. In contrast, a film like Hitchcock's Dial M for Murder (1954) reminds us that drag remains, in many circles, no laughing matter. The chief inspector in that film sends his underling out of Grace Kelly's apartment with a piece of evidence (her handbag), only after warning that the underling will be arrested if he walks out in the open looking like that.

There are three components of doing drag. First, every drag queen has to assume a stage-name. A 1996 guide, The Drag Queens of New York: An Illustrated Field Guide, likens the cult-followings of Manhattan drag queens to bird-watching, and lists such mainstays as Hedda Lettuce, Miss Understood, Mighty Afrodite, Mona Foot (a.k.a. Glamazon), and Perfidia ("The Sultan of Switch"). Most drag queens will tell you that their alter-egos were born at some point during childhood (in an early raid, for example, on mother's closet). One drag queen, for example, at the 801 Cabaret in Key West describes dressing in his mother's clothes as a young boy, even donning her slippers, necklaces, and ostrich feather plumes. In a metropolitan milieu, the stage-name guarantees the drag queen the status of a minor celebrity. This reinvention of one's identity through naming (or renaming) relates to the second part of doing drag: taking stage. The drag queen again owes something to As You Like It in terms of Jaques' famous declaration, "All the world's a stage." Hedda Lettuce, for example, cites wigs, garish dresses, and perfect makeup as prerequisites for drag. Not known for understatement, the drag queen strives for overkill through the use of heavy makeup, "falsies," and a gender-bending technique known as "tucking." The authenticity of femininity is always undermined by a drag queen's roughness, which often includes a vulgar stage presence and desire to shock. The third aspect of drag is premised on the belief in gender fluidity. Dragging is intended to make this fluidity visible through performance.

Historically, gay men in the United States have expressed prejudice against drag queens for appearing "too gay," or for giving gays a "bad name." Yet, it is also widely accepted that gay and lesbian social movements in the United States can be traced to the night of June 28, 1969, when the Stonewall Riots in the Greenwich Village section of Manhattan began when a group of drag queens actively resisted arrest. Arrests of drag queens were common pre-Stonewall. Tired of routine harassment and police surveillance, these original "village people" were drag queens, and they are credited with being on the front lines fighting for gay and lesbian liberation.

Drag queen performances highlight the social construction of sex and gender. The drag queen may use conventional gender and sexual categories in a performance, but the drag queen also problematizes these categories and identities through performance. Consequently, drag queen performances are a cultural entity that mocks the rigidities inherent in modern notions of sexual difference.

EARHART, AMELIA MARY (1897–C. 1937)

Amelia Earhart was the world's most famous woman pilot. During her life, Earhart broke numerous aviation records and was actively involved in the advancement of women aviators. She was known for courage and determination. While attempting to circumnavigate the globe, Earhart and her navigator Fred Noonan disappeared when they were unable to spot their landing site because of poor weather conditions. What happened to Earhart and Noonan is unknown, but her achievements in aviation will not be forgotten.

Amelia Earhart was born July 24, 1897, to Stanley "Edwin" Earhart and Amy Otis Earhart in Atchison, Kansas. Amelia's childhood was not a stable one because her father's job as a lawyer for the railroad company was an unsteady one and her family shifted between wealth and poverty. In 1907, her family moved to Des Moines, Iowa, where her father was offered a job with a steady salary. The family was happy in Des Moines, until Edwin started drinking. Eventually, he lost his job because of alcoholism. Following another botched job attempt, the family was forced to split up. Edwin moved back to Kansas, and Amy and the girls moved to Chicago where they lived with an old family friend. After Amelia graduated from high school, she went to Ogontz College and then to Columbia University, where she was a pre-medicine major. It wasn't long before Amelia realized that medicine wasn't for her, and she joined her parents who had reconnected and moved to California.

Shortly after arriving in California, Amelia and her father went to Daugherty Field in Long Beach to see an aerial meet. At that aerial meet, Amelia developed a desire to fly, and she inquired about taking flying lessons. The next morning, Edwin accompanied Amelia to Rogers Field where he paid ten dollars for a ten-minute flight. Amelia fell in love with flying and was determined to take flying lessons even though they were expensive. Amelia got a job so that she could pay for the lessons.

When her father saw his daughter's dedication, he helped Amelia pay for the lessons, but was leery about his daughter spending a lot of time with a male instructor. Fortunately, Amelia found a female pilot, Miss Anita "Neta" Snook, who offered flying lessons and gave Amelia her first lesson on January 3, 1921. During the next 2 months, Amelia learned the principles of flying while logging four hours of flight. Amelia soon purchased her first plane, then broke the female altitude record by reaching 14,000 feet on October 22, 1922. Her record only stood for a few weeks before it was broken, but this feat gave Amelia confidence. On May 16, 1923, Amelia applied for and became the first woman to receive a flying certificate from the Fédération Aéronautique Internationale.

In 1924, Earhart took a break from flying when her parents divorced and she moved with her mother to Boston. Earhart's break from flying was short-lived, however, as she joined the Boston chapter of the National Aeronautic Association and invested in Harold T. Dennison's new airport near Quincy, Massachusetts. In April 1928, she got a call on behalf of New York publisher George Palmer Putnam about being on a flight across the Atlantic Ocean. Following an interview, Earhart was chosen for the flight and was the first woman to be flown across the Atlantic.

After that flight, Earhart wanted to break a record on her own. She started competitive flying, and in 1931, flying a Pitcairn PCA-2 autogiro, Earhart set a world altitude record of 18,415 feet. Amelia also became associated with and was eventually the president of the Ninety Nines, an organization of female pilots who advanced the cause of women in aviation.

During this time, Earhart and Putnam started spending a lot of time together. George divorced his wife and started to pursue Earhart. Though initially reluctant to enter a relationship with Putnam, Earhart eventually changed her mind, and the two were married February 7, 1931.

Earhart and Putnam planned her flight across the Atlantic Ocean, and on May 20, 1932, she succeeded in becoming the first woman to fly solo across the Atlantic. For this feat, she received a gold medal from the National Geographic Society and the Distinguished Flying Cross from Congress, making her the first woman to receive this award. In the following years, Earhart continued to break records. She was the first woman to fly nonstop coast to coast; the first person to fly the 2,408-mile distance across the Pacific Ocean on January 11, 1935; the first person to fly solo from Los Angeles to Mexico City on April l9–20, 1935; and the first person to fly from Mexico City to Newark, New Jersey, on May 8, 1935.

In 1937, Earhart decided that she wanted to be the first woman to fly around the world. Her first attempt in March was unsuccessful because of plane damage. Before attempting this flight for the second time, Earhart said that she felt that she only had one good flight left in her and hoped that this is the one. Determined to fly across the world, she had her plane rebuilt, and on June 1, Earhart and navigator Fred Noonan departed from Miami to begin the 29,000-mile flight. By June 29, Earhart and Noonan were in New Guinea and only 7,000 miles away from completing her task. Her next flight to Howland Island required that she and Noonan remove all the equipment from the plane besides the essentials to give the plane approximately 274 extra miles of fuel. On July 2, 1937, Earhart and Noonan flew into bad weather. Earhart couldn't see her landing spot and constantly radioed the coast guard ship Itasca, which was near the island to help her find the island. Amelia had problems with her radio and was last heard from when she only had two hours left of fuel and could not see the island. Earhart and Noonan were never heard from again. The government spent $4 million and searched 250,000 square miles of ocean before calling off the search in 1938. Though what happened to Amelia Earhart is not known, her advancements in flights will not be forgotten.

EATING DISORDERS

Eating disorders (EDs) are unhealthy fixations on food that are potentially life threatening. Common behaviors include the cessation of caloric intake until one starves, the ingestion of food that is well beyond what is considered normal for one person, and eating vast amounts of food and then vomiting. Many individuals diagnosed with an ED experience extremes in their emotions, attitudes, and behaviors, feeling distressed and concerned about their body shape or weight. On the other hand, most mental health professionals state that the problem is not food; rather, the "real" issue is an acute insecurity about one's self, and the fixation upon food is a means of compensating for feelings or emotions that are overwhelming. Specifically, some individuals may begin dieting, bingeing, and purging as a means of coping with life, but eventually, the ED grows deadly. This entry discusses the causes, patterns and prevalence, types, health consequences, and treatment of EDs.

EDs affect women and girls more than men and boys. Statistically, 90 to 95 percent of anorexia nervosa patients are female, as are 80 percent of bulimia nervosa sufferers. A related issue is body image. In the United States, many women accept the thesis that the only attractive body shape is "thin"; likewise, thin is also considered to be more feminine and more attractive in men's eyes. Body ideals have consequences for eating habits: to achieve the ideal shape, women think eating less is better, whereas men hold that eating more is better. In addition, women are more likely to feel the need to fit certain expectations, such as commanding respect from their peers and wanting an attractive appearance for men. According to the feminist literature, EDs are a sign of power loss: (a) women lose power when their bodies become thinner, and (b), an ED helps women gain power by moving their body shapes toward more constrained potential. Men with EDs follow different trajectories to the disorder. Male patients are more likely to have a history of obesity with their ED commencing at an older age, and their ED occurs with a comorbid problem such as alcoholism or drug abuse. Gay men are more likely to suffer EDs than are their heterosexual counterparts because of an emphasis in the gay community that "thin" is beautiful.

Causes

An ED is combination of behavioral, biological, emotional, psychological, interpersonal, and social factors—there is no single reason regarding why someone develops an ED. Strong self-criticism coupled with negative opinions about one's weight and body shape are typical. Researchers have identified several contributory factors, almost all falling within the purview of genetics and environment. Psychological issues such as low self-esteem, feeling a lack of control of one's life, depression, and an inability to handle life's daily stress and anxieties are possible causations. Interpersonal factors—for example, difficulties with family, friends, and employment—also play a role in developing an ED.

Compared with others, people with EDs eagerly seek approval to gain self-affirmation in their personal relationships; that is, they feel "good" if a friend is supportive. They also tend to have a history of physical or sexual abuse compared with the general population. Social factors also contribute to EDs. For example, some cultures glorify thinness and place great value on attaining a perfect body, and thus, the idea that one must have a specific body shape to be beautiful is prevalent. Biological factors also play a role: A small percentage of people lack the neurotransmitters that control hunger, digestion, and appetite. Another culprit may be genetics because it is common in some families for the members, especially females, to be obese. Some research indicates that genetics contributes significantly to the contraction of EDs.

Patterns and Prevalence

In the United States, approximately 80 percent of American women are dissatisfied with their appearance, primarily with their weight and shape. As many as 10 million females and 1 million males fight daily with anorexia nervosa or bulimia nervosa. Furthermore, roughly 25 million more struggle with binge eating disorder. EDs, in comparison with other mental illnesses, are more likely to be underreported because of the shame and secretiveness associated with them. Some researchers state that EDs occurs in approximately 1 percent (anorexia nervosa) and 3 percent (bulimia nervosa) of women at some point during their lives, whereas men have one-tenth the prevalence that women have.

Though EDs occurs across the lifespan, they usually begin in puberty and continue into adulthood. Teenagers, after puberty, experience dramatic biological changes that, combined with social expectations of how one should look, leave adolescents with a strong incentive to begin dieting. A study published in 2001 revealed that 35 percent of third-grade girls and 26 percent of third-grade boys want to be thinner, with 24 percent of girls and 17 percent of boys dieting. Half of 9- and 10-year-old girls feel better about themselves if they are on diet, and half are "sometimes" or "very often" on diets. On any given day, half of U.S. girls and a quarter of U.S. boys are on a diet.

Gender, diagnosis, and treatment are entangled in EDs. EDs are often perceived as a problem that affects women alone, primarily because males are less likely to seek treatment. However, the rough estimate of male ED patients ranges between 5 and 15 percent of all people diagnosed with anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa. The basic ED systems for diagnosis are the same for males as for females. Most ED patients receive inadequate mental health care, and only one-third of anorexics and 6 percent of bulimics receive proper psychotherapy. Among female anorexia nervosa patients aged 15 to 24, the mortality rate is 12 times higher than the all other causes of death. Moreover, less research money is spent treating ED patients than treating any other mental illness. For instance, on average, $159.00 is spent for each schizophrenia client, but only $1.2 dollars is spent per each ED client.

Eating Disorder Types

According to the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual, Fourth Edition, Text Revision (DSM-IV-TR), the two primary diagnoses of ED are anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa. A third ED—binge eating disorder—has not yet been approved as a formal diagnosis. Anorexia nervosa is a serious, potentially life-threatening ED characterized by a refusal to maintain a minimally normal body weight, with self-starvation being the central maladaptive eating behavior causing the excessive weight loss. Anorexics starve themselves to fit their idea of "thin." To attain this goal, patients restrict either food intake, or they vomit the already ingested food. They experience excessive weight loss; when the individual's weight is 15 percent below normal for one's height and age, the anorexia nervosa diagnosis is applicable.

Several symptoms of anorexia nervosa include intense fear of gaining weight or being seen as "fat"; showing extreme concern about weight and shape; refusing to maintain body weight at or above a minimal normal weight for height, body type, age, and activity level; cessation of menstrual periods; feeling fat or overweight even after dramatic weight loss; preferring to eat alone; continual dieting although thin; a preoccupation with food, calories, or nutrition; and a compulsion to exercise strenuously. Additional significant warning signs include denial of hunger, withdrawal from social life and activities, frequent comments about gaining weight, and avoiding mealtimes or events involving food.

Between 5 percent and 20 percent of anorexics die as a result of anorexia. Compared with other mental health conditions, anorexia has the highest death rate, with the probability of death depending on the length of time one has it. In the United States, approximately 0.5 to 1 percent of American women are anorexic, and approximately 90 to 95 percent of anorexia nervosa patients are female. Individuals are more likely to be diagnosed with it during early to mid-adolescence.

Anorexics starve themselves until their bodies are forced to slow down all processes to conserve energy, with the heightened possibility of incurring serious medical consequences, including slow heart rate, low blood pressure, reduction of bone density, muscle loss, weakness, fainting, fatigue, dry hair and skin, hair loss, and severe dehydration. In addition to the physical symptoms, anorexics also exhibit emotional and mental difficulties such as social isolation, a strong need for control, low self-esteem, an obsession for perfection, and depression.

The psychiatric community first recognized bulimia nervosa as a disorder in 1979. Bulimia is characterized by a cycle of bingeing and compensatory eating behaviors, such as self-induced vomiting with the intention to compensate for the food intake. Bulimia nervosa has three primary symptoms: (1) the regular intake of large amounts of food accompanied by sense of loss of control over eating behavior; (2) the regular use of inappropriate compensatory behaviors such as self-induced vomiting, laxative or diuretic abuse, or compulsive exercise, all with the same purpose of avoiding weight gain from the binge behavior; and (3) extreme concern with body weight and shape. The classical process involves binge eating, vomiting, and then eating again, and because the entire process can be repeated over several hours, it is not uncommon for a bulimics to engage in this process repeatedly—as many as 24 times per day.

The binge-purge process is conducted in secret, and patients usually feel guilty, shame, self-disgust, and little to no self-control. Patients often cannot remember the taste of food, which provides a sedation that helps them relieve stress. Unlike those with anorexia nervosa, bulimics tend to remain close to or maintain normal weight for their age and height, and often appear perfectly healthy. Thus, it is essential for a patient's family to pay attention and observe the patient's behavior to detect any signs of ED.

To prevent bulimia, family members should be on the lookout for telltale signs. These include (a) evidence of binge eating, such as large amounts of food disappearing in a short period of time; (b) evidence of purging behaviors, such as making frequent trips to bathroom during or after meals or signs of vomiting (stains on clothes, bad breath, etc.); (c) withdrawal from usual social activities; (d) great concern about dieting, weight loss and control food consumption; (e) excessive exercise, often despite bad weather or illness; and (f) physical or emotional problems such as swelling of the cheeks, dental problems, or mood swings. In addition, patients frequently evidenced symptoms of depression and social life changes. Approximately 80 percent of bulimics are female, and it affects 1 to 2 percent of adolescents and young adult women. Unlike other types of EDs, bulimics acknowledge that their behavior is dysfunctional and may have a potentially lethal effect on their health.

Binge eating disorder, the third type of ED, is also known as compulsive overeating. Although not yet recognized by the most recent diagnostic manual, the DSM-IV-TR, research indicates that binging eating disorder is associated with obesity and other major health conditions. Patients with this type of disorder tend to experience periods of uncontrolled, impulsive, or continuous eating behavior. In addition, they often secretly consume large amounts of food over a short period, regardless of whether they are hungry or full. The major difference between binge eaters and bulimics is that the former do not purge to restrict food ingestion, nor do they exercise heavily to burn off the extra calories. Although they do not purge, they might conduct sporadic fasts or diet repetition. Psychologically, their compulsive overeating behavior often results in great anxiety, depression, loneliness, and shame. Their body weight varies from normal to mild, moderate, and up to severely obese. The National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Disease (NIDDK) revealed that approximately 4 million (2 percent) people in the United States suffer from binge eating disorder. This research also revealed that women are more likely to experience this disorder.

Health Consequences

The more prevalent physical consequences of EDs include osteoporosis (thinning of the bones), heart problems from an electrolyte imbalance, kidney problems (resulting from repeated dehydration from starvation or purge behavior), and brain abnormalities (enlarged spaces in the brain). Gastrointestinal problems such as constipation, diarrhea, acid reflux, nausea, and heartburn are also common. Despite the wide array of physical symptoms and mental illness associated with EDs, patients often experience great pain and discomfort related to dental complications—one of the first symptoms causing patients or their families to consult mental health professionals. Research has shown that as many as 89 percent of bulimics have tooth erosion. ED patients also exhibit other mental illnesses; for example, obsessive-compulsive disorder, anxiety, depression, social phobias, trauma, and chemical dependencies.

Treatment

Although males with EDs suffer the same symptoms and mental disorders as females do, they are less likely to seek professional help. One potential explanation this phenomenon is that men might perceive an EDs as "female diseases." There is no difference, however, regarding one specific treatment that works better with males than with females. The most effective ED treatment should combine psychotherapy with careful attention to medical and nutritional needs. In addition, the treatment needs to be individualized to meet each patient's particular problems and needs. Before the implementation of treatment, however, a complete assessment should be obtained so that any mental health or physical problems can be appropriately diagnosed. A complete assessment includes (a) a careful medical evaluation to rule out any symptoms that could arise from other physical problems, (b) the impact the illness has caused, and (c) the determination whether the patient needs an immediate medical intervention.

Psychological Treatment

Psychotherapy has the greatest influence in successfully treating EDs. Patients can choose from three primary types of therapeutic options: individual psychotherapy, family therapy, and group therapy. Individual therapy consists of one-on-one individual counseling sessions, with the therapist and patient meeting at least once a week (depending upon the treatment program). The therapist may choose from a number of theoretical orientations. To uphold ethical standards, the therapist should use an approach that is based on empirical study results because the client's behavior is potentially life threatening.

Two commonly used approaches are cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT), and psychoanalysis. CBT has been widely used as the key ED treatment since the 1970s, and a substantial body of scientific evidence supports its therapeutic effectiveness. CBT therapists believe patients' irrational beliefs cause their unhealthy emotions and behavior; thus, therapists focus on challenging irrational beliefs to develop a more healthy coping strategy for dealing with daily demands of life. In other words, CBT therapists help their patients identify their irrational beliefs, such as "I am too fat" or "I am ugly because of my weight," so their behavior will change. For example, patients may begin to eat healthily, instead of self-starving, binging, or purging.

Family therapy has proven to be highly effective, especially in treatment of adolescents. The typical family therapy session involves the patient and her or his family. The overall goals of family therapy are similar to other counseling therapies, involving the change of any behavior patterns that could potentially play a role in causing or maintaining an ED. Another unique goal of family therapy involves opening the communication between the teenager and her or his family members. This is accomplished by teaching each family member strategies with which to cope with the ED. Because the family is the vital component of the treatment, the therapist helps reduce the conflict between family members, thus improving empathy and strengthening family bonds. Gender should be an integral part of family therapy. For instance, family members of the other gender should help the ED sufferer change the way he or she perceives their body image, as well as amending what is, or is not, physically attractive.

One relatively new technique for treating EDs is called the Maudsley Method, which specifically aims at treating adolescents diagnosed with an ED. This specific system is quite different from others because it focuses on addressing eating problems and behavioral change instead of delving into the psychological reasons behind EDs. Likewise, the method emphasizes family participation as the imperative factor; otherwise, the treatment will fail. This approach focuses on two areas—the first is aimed at weight restoration, which is achieved by having patients transfer their eating behavior into their parents' hands. During this treatment phase, the family will have a meal during the session, with the therapist asking questions such as who prepared the food, who bought the groceries, and so on. At the end of the session, the therapist provides feedback regarding the family's communication style, their level of socialization with each other, and any other related issues concerning food and behavior. The purpose is to help parents understand their adolescent child better. During the second part of the treatment, therapy focuses on both individual and family concerns. The therapist teaches problem-solving skills to the patients and their families to prevent any ED from reoccurring.

Group therapy, another common therapeutic approach, is the therapy of choice in many intensive treatment centers. Group therapy allows patients to share their feelings with people experiencing the same problems and facilitates members supporting one another in the daily trials of fighting EDs. During group therapy, each member is encouraged to discuss topics related to body image, social problems, the importance of food, or other ED-related issues. A lack of empirical evidence supports the effectiveness of group therapy; thus, it is primarily a support treatment, rather than a primary therapy.

Medication

During the past few decades, researchers started paying more attention to gender-related and gender bias issues regarding medication. For instance, researchers found that female and male patients do not receive the same treatment in both quality and quantity. As a result, women are less satisfied with their health care. Physicians are more likely to prescribe medication to their female patients than they would for male patients.

Among the most common medications prescribed for ED patients are antidepressants (including Prozac, selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors [SSRIs], Anafranil, and Elavil). Antidepressants are often effective because most ED patients exhibit other psychological conditions, such as depression and anxiety, as well as EDs. In addition, scientific evidence exists that indicates antidepressants help bulimics control their binge eating and purging behavior. Although there is not enough evidence to make a clear statement regarding which medication is the most effective, in general, SSRIs have the fewest side effects. However, some researchers believe the effectiveness of antidepressants depends upon the patient's weight; that is, the lighter the patient's weight, the less effective the drug is, especially for anorexics.

Atypical antipsychotic drugs are also used to treat acute anorexia because of their association with weight gain. Some studies have shown improvement of anorexia when the client used olanzapine (Zyprexa). Overall, many of the medications need more studies before they are prescribed to adolescents because of the uncertain pharmacological reactions their still-maturing minds and bodies might have. Thus, it is imperative for parents to monitor their children' behavior after taking medication.

ECONOMY: HISTORY OF WOMEN'S PARTICIPATION

Women have always participated in economic activity, across time and space, albeit to varying degrees. However, if one defines participation in the economy as participation in a labor market, where labor is traded for pay, then one of the most striking social changes during the past century has been the large increase in women's participation in the economy.

Figure 1 shows U.S. male and female labor force participation rates spanning the past 205 years, as well as the percentage female for the labor force as a whole. Three distinct periods in female labor force participation and percentage female can be seen: a period of gradual rise during the 19th century, followed by a plateau or even a slight drop in the early 20th century (1910 to 1940), followed by a sharp rise since World War II. Male participation rose until 1910 (with a dip following the Civil War), dipped during the Depression years, rose in the mid-20th century, and has been declining since 1950. The proportion of women in the labor force has risen from 4 percent of workers in 1800 to 46 percent in 2005.

Most other societies have experienced a rise in women's participation similar to that seen in the United States during the 20th century. And thus it is instructive to consider the U.S. case in some detail, keeping in mind that it is broadly indicative of the phases that women have gone through in participation in other countries, but not identical in the details.

The remainder of this entry characterizes women's economic participation in the economy for seven periods in U.S. history, divided roughly by stage of industrialization: (a) the preindustrial period, from precolonial and colonial times until 1820; (b) the introduction of industrialization, 1820 to 1860; (c) the transitional period, 1860 to 1890; (d) the period of full-fledged industrialization, 1890 to 1939; (e) the World War II years, 1939 to 1945; (f) the postwar period, 1946 to 1975; and (g) the postindustrial era, 1975 to the present.

Preindustrialization: Precolonial and Colonial Times to 1820

Largely because of its heavy reliance on quantitative data, economic history only comes into being as an industrial—or, at least, a market—economy emerges. Understanding of the precolonial period suffers from a general lack of written documentation and hard data, though historians and anthropologists have much to say regarding the gender division of labor in Native American societies. And much of the economic history of colonial women and men before industrialization concerns the discussion and description of their roles in an agricultural economy. Although earlier writers extolled the colonial period as a "Golden Age" for women, stressing their economic importance to a farm-based economy both as agricultural labor and in maintaining the household through a wide array of nonmarket activities, this characterization has been increasingly debunked. The newer view is that women's economic contribution was not sufficient to guarantee them equal political and social status.

Few data exist from the 17th century concerning such factors as earnings and the occupational composition of those women who did do market-oriented work. Quantitative data from the 18th century are also rare, although some evidence exists on occupations of widows and their late husbands from the late-18th century that implies that widows often took over their husbands' occupations, such as various retail and craft occupations. Other countries register a similar lack of

Introduction of Industrialization: 1820 to 1860

The period from 1820 to 1860 marked the U.S. evolution toward an industrial economy. In 1820, 28 percent of the workforce was in manufacturing; by 1860, 41 percent was in manufacturing. Women were increasingly drawn into manufacturing industries, reflecting the increased value of their labor in these enterprises, and they quickly developed a wide occupational representation. While visiting the United States in 1836, writer Harriet Martineau supposedly remarked that there were only seven occupations open to women: teaching, needlework, keeping boarders, work in cotton mills, typesetting, bookbinding, and domestic service. In response to this remark, economist Edith Abbott has shown that women were represented in more than 100 different industrial occupations before 1837 (using data back to 1822), citing long lists of occupations from New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts documents. Shoemaking was an important industry for female employment, as was hatmaking.

The textile industry, which also marked the beginning of the Industrial Revolution in England, was the major manufacturing industry in early-19th-century

America. In the early 1800s, the textile factories in Lowell, Waltham, and other New England towns located on rivers were staffed primarily by women. Young women poured off New England farms into boarding houses in these towns, where they lived in close quarters with each other, worked 12- to 14-hour days 6 days a week, and saved their wages to generate a dowry or to pay for a male family member's college education. Their pattern was to stay a few years before returning home and marrying. Rising worker militancy, along with the increased availability of immigrants of both sexes, led to a shift in the 1840s by factory owners toward using immigrant labor to run the mills. Working conditions and wages deteriorated, and the New England farm girls left the mills. A study of one Lowell mill found that whereas in July 1836, 97 percent of the employed women were native-born, by August 1850, 41 percent of the women were immigrants.

Prostitution in cities, particularly New York City, appears to have risen substantially during this period. As the number of young women drawn to cities in search of jobs increased, they were drawn into this activity largely because of economic causes, including the low wages for female labor in other activities. Both nondomestic and domestic labor in cities were low-paying, and some young women worked part-time as prostitutes to supplement their meager earnings as servants or seamstresses.

Transition: 1860 to 1890

During the transition from initial industrial development to full-fledged capitalism, several major social shifts occurred: the westward push, the Civil War, and changing antebellum roles, particularly in the South, as regions that had lagged in industrialization began to catch up.

The pronounced depression following the Civil War pushed many westward in search of economic opportunities. Migrants being primarily male—at least, in the early phase—caused gender ratios to be skewed, particularly in frontier areas. Still, there was a relative shortage of young women in both the East and West—because of high maternal mortality rates, for one thing. Young women in both the East and West had relatively little time before marriage to work in paid labor and seek higher education.

Civil War casualties increased women's employment participation by reducing both the supply of men for the labor force and the male source of income for women. The war's aftermath also increased the number of black women and men available for industrial labor as freed slaves moved northward.

After the Civil War, there was a notable rise in the size of the urban working class in Northern cities such as Pittsburgh, as industrialization continued in such industries as steel. Unionism rose during this period, but did not prove particularly helpful to women in getting higher wages, and the male-dominated unions generally viewed women as low-wage competition. In 1867, the Cigarmakers Union made history by becoming the first national union to allow women to become members on an equal basis with men. Still unable to get into most unions, women began to form their own, including the Collarmakers and Laundry Workers Union, and the Daughters of St. Crispin, a shoemakers' union.

The demand for teachers accelerated in the 1880s and 1890s, increasing the demand for female labor, as the benefits of formal education for individual and social economic progress increased and became more obvious. However, most nonagricultural jobs for women (and men) were still found in the manufacturing sector.

In the early 20th century, University of Chicago–educated economist Edith Abbott churned out articles on female earnings and employment in different industries. She concentrated on the 19th-century industries in which women were found in the greatest numbers: cotton, boots and shoes, cigarmaking, clothing, and printing. Her discussions of shoemaking and cigarmaking considered whether the introduction of machinery in particular industries displaced male/skilled labor, while proving complementary to female and unskilled labor. In shoemaking, sewing and stitching machines proved to be critical innovations. Shoe production switched from an at-home to a factory system. However, women did not enter the male jobs in the manufacturing process; it remained a male-dominated, native-dominated industry. The cigarmaking industry provides a contrast to this tale of industry evolution: here, women constituted 9 percent of employees in 1860, but 40 percent in 1900, with an even greater proportion of women in large factories. However, no gain in weekly median wages for women appears; rather, the reverse: In 1890, men earned $11.00 and women $6.00, but in 1900, men earned $11.50 and women $5.50.

This period also marks the beginning of improved status for women under the law, a process that continued through emancipation in 1920 and through the passage of the equal pay initiatives in the 1960s. Of particular significance during this period was the expansion of married women's rights to their own earnings and estates. None of the 27 states allowed these rights in 1840, but by 1880, 36 of 38 states allowed separate estates for married women, and 31 of 38 states granted women control of their own earnings.

Full-Fledged Industrialization: 1890 to 1939

Starting at the beginning of the 20th century, the United States embarked on a period of continued industrialization, punctuated by business upturns and downturns, World War I, and waves of immigrants. Along with a general rise in literacy and affluence, concern about social differences—including gender differences—became widespread. This era marked the development of more concern about fair labor practices and a greatly increased number of labor regulations, leading to the use of the term Progressive Era.

Although discussion of economic gender issues—for example, the "Woman Question"—is found in the writings of earlier authors such as John Stuart Mill and Harriet Martineau (in the early 19th century), this period witnessed increased discussion of such issues by economists and other commentators, both in England and the United States. Debates about equal pay for equal work started in 1890 and continued into the early 1920s. Extensive occupational gender segregation hindered the development of equal work comparisons. Writing in 1891, Sidney Webb surveyed a variety of data on men and women workers in Great Britain and the United States and noted the difficulty of making "equal work" comparisons because of the rarity of occupations that contained both sexes, but he found women workers making less anyway. Progressive Era writers had many of the same explanations for low female wages still used: an oversupply of women to some occupations; geographical and other immobilities, leading to relatively inelastic labor supply; gender discrimination; a lack of skill and education; intermittent work experience; lack of physical strength; relative youth and inexperience; and low unionism rates.

The era also marked the beginning of the phenomenon of populist feminist writers on economic issues, of which Charlotte Perkins Gilman is the best known today. These writers were concerned that the middle-class phenomenon of constraining women to the domestic sphere was both harmful to their mental and physical health and wasteful of their potential public contributions.

The service sector became an increasingly important employer of women workers during this period, and by the 1920s, a larger percentage of employed women were in service-sector jobs than in manufacturing. Prostitution became a less attractive earnings option for many women as female wages and working conditions improved in both manufacturing and the service sector.

World War II: 1939 to 1945

The scale of World War II and the extent of U.S. involvement led to a large shift in employment patterns during the war. As men were conscripted and production of war-related goods increased, women entered manufacturing in large numbers, both to fill the slack in labor supply left by the men and as a response to both reduced income and reduced nonmarket work responsibilities. War industries hired 1.3 million women of the 2.5 million who entered the labor force for the first time, as well as hiring about 700,000 from other industries. Nonfamily child care became available for the first time on a widespread basis, as factories producing war-related products set up 24-hour child care centers so that women could work full time, including swing shifts. Female wages rose relative to male wages, and gender segregation diminished temporarily as women took on higher-paid manufacturing jobs. Women also found increased work opportunity in the increased number of military support positions.

Feminist commentators were concerned by both the example of gender relations set by Hitler's Germany and the possibility of reversion in the gains made by women after the war ended. The end of the war did lead to wholesale reduction of female industrial employment, both voluntary and involuntary, as men returned from their wartime roles, but in states with greater mobilization of men, women continued to work more after the war than they had before.

The Postwar Period: 1946 to 1975

Although the late 1940s and early 1950s marked social reversion in some measures, such as the drop in age at first marriage and rise in fertility, other trends that had been present before the war's onset continued and even accelerated, including the rises in divorce and married women's employment. Although most wartime labor force entrants exited between 1944 and 1950, half of all married women who were working in 1950 had also been working in 1940, and half of the 1940s married women labor force entrants joined after the war. Thus, the view of this period as a watershed in gender relations has been challenged, with other commentators contending that the rise in women's labor supply after World War II is primarily the result of longer-run factors, including increased clerical employment and female education.

Since 1946, the labor force participation rates for women and men have been converging as the male rate declined and the female rate rose steadily, although the male rate is remained substantially higher than the female rate (see Figure 1). Women's representation increased in practically all occupations and industries and they were well represented in the government sector. Although women were particularly concentrated in clerical occupations, their biggest percentage rise during this period was in the managerial occupations.

Women continued to enter the workforce, in part attracted by an increase in the number of part-time positions. Women were much more likely than men to work part-time (defined here as averaging less than 35 hours per week): about a quarter of all employed women worked part-time, but only slightly more than 10 percent of men. However, they still often left the workforce for prolonged periods after marrying and having children, even as they often reentered later following divorce or children's becoming school age. A drop in the age at first marriage and a rise in childbirth made this period a notable standout from the long-term trend of rising age at first marriage and dropping birthrates. Thus, women's attachment to the labor force remained low relative to men, and few women attained positions with high pay or power.

Postindustrialization: 1975 to the Present

The mid-1970s recession marked the true end of a long peacetime expansion and signaled the beginning of a new era of increased equality between women and men in the labor force. Structural trends in the U.S. economy that began in the mid-1970s have tended to favor women relative to men. Manufacturing went into a prolonged downsizing that continues, and the economy has shed many of the high-paid male-dominated unionized jobs that had led to higher rates of employment and pay for men relative to women. Simultaneously, employment opportunities expanded in the female-dominated clerical and service occupations. One result has been that during the most recent three decades, male and female unemployment patterns have converged, whereas before the early 1980s, women experienced a higher unemployment rate than men did.

In the mid-1970s, elite colleges and universities began increasing entry opportunities for women, and graduate schools in law, business, medicine, and other fields expanded their admissions of women as well. Other social trends, including rising divorce rates, dropping birthrates, and postponement of marriage, increased both the attachment of women to the labor force (leading to increases in average years of work experience relative to men) and the number of women in the labor force. Thus, women have made increasing inroads into the high-education, high-work-attachment jobs, such as managerial and professional occupations, and the female-to-male earnings ratio has risen substantially, starting in the early 1980s. Although recently there has been concern that the female labor force participation rate is leveling off or even declining slightly, it is highly unlikely that there will be a wholesale retreat of women from the labor market.

Conclusion

Although women have always participated in economic activity, they are increasingly participating in the paid labor market and have expanded their range of occupations, with many more occupations having substantial representation rather than token membership of women. These trends appear unlikely to reverse, although women continue to exhibit lower lifetime attachment to the labor force than do men, thus making it unlikely that full gender equality will be reached in the labor market in either relative employment or earnings.

EDUCATION: CHILLY CLIMATE IN THE CLASSROOM

In 1982, the Association of American Colleges studied the status of women in higher education and released the report, The Classroom Climate: A Chilly One for Women? The book defined the chilly environment as one inhospitable to women in higher education classrooms resulting from both deliberate and unconscious discrimination by professors, fellow students, and by past socialization in K–12 education. Instructors' chilling behaviors include ignoring of the contributions of women to the discipline, use of male-specific pronouns and language, sexist humor, and stereotypical examples of women's and men's roles. More subtle forms of chilling behavior include preferential treatment of male students, such as calling on them more often, making eye contact more frequently with them, praising their comments, and elaborating more on their comments than on comments made by female students. The "chilly" environment is linked with unpleasant experiences for women in college and prevents them from fully participating in classes.

The instructor's gender has not been found to influence students' perceptions of learning or willingness to participate in class. Rather, the instructor's verbal and nonverbal indicators of availability for communication solicit participation from students. Instructor gender does influence teaching style and availability for communication. On average, female instructors tend to lecture less and ask more questions than male instructors do, resulting in a more interactive and comfortable environment for students. However, male instructors concerned with gender equity in the classroom were more likely to have classes that are interactive and discussion-based. Discipline also plays a role in class design. Classes in the natural sciences tend to be lecture format, whereas arts and humanities tend toward more interaction, with social sciences incorporating the two styles.

Students perceive male instructors as sexist more often than female instructors. Students slightly prefer same-gendered instructors, and female students generally perceive male instructors as less encouraging and view their classes less positively. However, observations in college classrooms have not evidenced that either male or female instructors call on male students more frequently. Both male and female students evaluated professors similarly, and the specific behaviors of the instructor that may contribute to the chilly climate were not reported.

Structural elements such as class size and proportion of female students strongly influence on students' perceptions of their instructors and of the class environment. More than the instructor's gender, large class size inhibits student participation across genders. The ratio of men to women in a class is the strongest predictor of a negative classroom experience. For both male and female students, a higher proportion of female students in class results in higher comfort levels, greater participation, and a more positive experience. Females tend to participate less, and they report negative experiences in classes with a disproportionate number of male students. Although they participate at equal levels in coeducational classes, in single-gender classrooms, women tend to initiate the participation more often, whereas in coeducational classes, the professor usually must initiate the discussion.

Although female students report having experienced sexist behavior by professors and other students, they rate their overall experiences in college higher than do male students. Women reported more frequent interactions with faculty and higher participation rates in class as well as gaining more personally and intellectually from their overall experience, but they did not report gaining as much as men in the specific fields of science, technology, and quantitative skills.

At the graduate level, women are less satisfied with their overall experiences and more conscious of sexist behaviors and discrimination. Women's emotional response to perceived sexism was greater than was men's. Those for whom gender is a salient issue felt distracted by sexist behavior of professors, but their class performance did not suffer nor did perceived sexism inhibit their class participation. Men doctoral students were more satisfied with their faculty supervision than were women.

In secondary schools, ongoing discrimination against female students takes the form of gender reinforcement, embedded discrimination, gender-role stereotypes, gender domination, and active discrimination. Instructors in coeducational schools exhibited active discrimination against females, particularly in chemistry classes. Males received preferential treatment and praise, and unlike in college classrooms, they participated more in class discussions. Though they avoid active discrimination and gender domination, single-gender schools are not free of sexism. All-male schools reinforce gender roles by creating an environment of competition. Sexual objectification of women frequently occurs in all-male schools. All-female schools have embedded discrimination because the curriculum is made less rigorous, and students are not encouraged to be competitive. Overall, coeducational classrooms that have an equal distribution of males and females have the least frequency of sexist behaviors by students and professors.

Since the publication of the original Chilly Climate report, the college environment has improved for women. Scholars attribute this change to intense efforts by universities to rectify the problems revealed in the 1982 report. Chilling practices still occur in K–12 education and some graduate programs. Sexism in K–12 schools advantages males and prepares them to be more interactive and aggressive in college. Professors are more likely to respond to students who appear eager to participate rather than based on the gender of the student.

EDUCATION: GENDER DIFFERENCES

Since the publication of the 1992 American Association of University Women (AAUW) landmark report, How Schools Shortchange Girls, researchers, educators, and policymakers have paid more attention to the effects of gender on education in the United States. The AAUW produced a follow-up report in 1998, Gender Gaps: Where Schools Still Fail Our Children, which revisited issues addressed in the 1992 study and highlighted new challenges to gender and equity in K–12 education. Each report analyzed and synthesized more than 1,000 research articles and highlighted key factors in the area including educational standards and assessments; the unequal attention given to girls, especially in science and math classes; a chilly climate in the classroom that contributes to girls' lower self-esteem; increasing levels of sexual harassment of girls by boys in schools; inequalities of race and class as factors that have detrimental consequences for girl's education; the rise of technology; and an "evaded" curriculum that ignores the contribution of women and provides inadequate education on sexuality and health. In addition to these central factors, more recent attention has focused on higher education and extracurricular activities. This entry provides an overview of these issues, contributing factors, and extracurricular activities.

Overview

Test performance is an important component of the education process because it often serves as an indication of scholastic and intellectual capabilities. In addition, strong performance on high-stakes tests may affect college and career prospects. Given that test performance is heavily weighted as a predictor of academic value and future success, parity between the test scores of boys and girls is important. Nevertheless, research indicates that gender disparities in test achievement put girls at a disadvantage.

One of the most troubling trends is that girls' scores on standardized tests in math and science seem to confirm the stereotype that these fields are reserved for boys. For example, Gender Gaps maintains that boys consistently outperformed girls on the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP) exam in the areas of math and science in the 4th, 8th, and 12th grades. These findings also suggest that the gender gap in math and science achievement scores increases with age. Further research has alleged that the achievement gap in math and science scores at the high school has been shrinking over time, but that the disparity is far from being eradicated.

Some studies have demonstrated that the type of test administered may influence the gender gap in test performance. More specifically, the way that the test format presents the material may influence gendered patterns in achievement. Boys are expected to do better on standardized tests in general, especially those that include multiple-choice items. Conversely, girls are expected to outperform boys on curriculum-based tests and tests that include essays. Boys' higher scores on standardized math tests may be more a function of testing format than a result of outstanding math skills relative to girls.

The test performance gap is especially pronounced in SAT scores. Boys tend to outperform girls on both the verbal and math portions of this exam. The gap in achievement becomes particularly consequential when SAT scores become a basis for allocating "merit-based" rewards. For example, girls, who have lower combined scores on average, may be less likely to qualify for scholarship money or admission into more exclusive colleges. The conflation of SAT scores with overall student potential is risky, especially given that performance on the SAT does not accurately predict women's performance in college.

Race and class divisions may represent an exception to the advantage boys have in the testing arena. For example, African American girls tend to outscore African American boys at almost every assessment point in math and science. Also, though high-income boys usually outperform high-income girls, evidence indicates that low-income girls outperform low-income boys in the lower grades. The field of the test (for example, math, science, or language arts) may also complicate these outcomes.

Gender-segregated enrollment and performance in subject-specific areas are major concerns in the gender equity agenda for education reform. For example, math and science have traditionally been considered male-dominated fields in which girls have difficulty competing. However, recent evidence suggests that the gap between girls' and boys' math achievement is declining. Equity in girls' and boys' enrollment in basic math and science courses has also improved, although girls are still less likely than boys are to enroll in higher level and Advanced Placement (AP) math and science courses. Boys are also more likely to have preexisting scientific knowledge that they gained outside the classroom. Overall, even when girls are as successful as boys in math and science, they are still less likely than boys to pursue science and technology careers. Gender difference in subject-specific performance also varies according to grade level. For example, at the elementary level, there is little difference between boys' and girls' overall math and science performance. Differences tend to emerge as girls progress through school and lose confidence in their abilities.

According to some researchers, the concern with how girls are being shortchanged has obscured the unique academic challenges that boys face. For instance, boys exhibit markedly lower achievement in the language arts, especially in the areas of reading and writing, beginning at the elementary level and continuing into high school. Boys are more likely than girls are to end up in remedial English courses, whereas girls are overrepresented in AP English courses. Girls also characterize a majority in other subject-specific areas such as sociology, psychology, fine arts, AP biology, and AP foreign language courses. Given this evidence, it appears that both boys and girls face disadvantages at some point during their academic careers. Race and class distinctions likely further influence these outcomes.

Examining the gender differences in advanced courses further highlights the gender gaps in course-work. Overall, gender differences exist in the kind of courses that girls and boys take. A 1998 study identified the following findings on gender and advanced courses in K–12 education: Girls' enrollment in AP and honors classes had increased, making girls' and boys' enrollment in AP and honors courses comparable in every area other than physics; the gender gap narrowed in math and science, but girls still lagged behind in advanced courses in science and computer sciences. The report demonstrated that although girls were similar to boys in taking advanced courses, there is was still a significant gap in traditionally male-dominated disciplines.

Gender Gaps explored a growing area of concern in relation to gender and equity in education: technology. In a synthesis of research articles, the author identified several trends in relation to technology: Girls represented a small percentage of computer science students; computer usage outside of school was lower for girls than boys, and overall, boys expressed a more positive attitude about computers than did girls.

Numerous studies have addressed gender differences in usage, perception, and knowledge of computer technology. Boys have an advantage over girls when learning about computers or learning about other things while using computers. The problem stems from computer anxiety, which has its roots in the stereotype of computers as toys for boys and gender socialization that encourages and provides positive feedback for males' knowledge and usage of computers rather than for females.

Another more recent area of concern and research is gender and higher education. Experiences of higher education have particular consequences for career choice. How Schools Shortchange Girls cited a study of high school seniors in which 64 percent of the boys who had taken physics and calculus were planning to major in science and engineering in college, compared with only 19 percent of the girls who had taken the same subjects. In 2005, however, the National Center for Educational Statistics (NCES) produced a report that found some promising findings on gender and higher education. From a study examining two cohorts of students in 1982 and 1992, researchers found that the number of women enrolled in post-secondary education increased faster than the number of men did. In addition, women have narrowed the gender gap in academic preparation. Among students most prepared for college in the second cohort, women were more likely than men were to attain a bachelor's degree. The NCES study highlights that, although women have surpassed men in aspects of academic preparation and college achievement, as of 2001, full-time wages of women remained lower than men's earnings. Research also demonstrates that even though women constitute more than half the students in colleges and universities, they are overrepresented in the humanities and social sciences and sparsely represented in the natural sciences. Also, significant gender inequalities remain in salary, rank, and tenure between female and male faculty.

Contributing Factors to Differential Performance

A variety of variables shape the gender gaps present in K–12 and higher education, including early socialization, curriculum content, race and class, sexual harassment of girls and women, teacher-student interactions, teacher training, and gendered attitudes and perceptions of education.

Research consistently demonstrates that the contributions and experiences of girls and women are marginalized in textbooks. Furthermore, race and class only exacerbate this problem. One study observed that with each additional year of education, women and African Americans have decreased test score improvement. The sources of these disparities are unclear, but past research suggests that the "hidden curriculum" plays a major role in continued educational disparities found along lines of race, class, gender, and sexuality. For example, African American girls have fewer interactions with teachers than do white girls, despite the frequency with which all girls initiate such interactions. Black girls and women must contend with sexism and with experiences of "otherness" and discrimination in institutions that frequently marginalize and discriminate against black students. Similarly, girls and women from low-income families struggle with the dual problems and realities associated with gender and class, including poverty, pregnancy, and substance abuse. Overall, girls from low-income families and minority girls face severe obstacles to equitable education.

Students develop gender-segregated perceptions and attitudes about their academic experiences at an early age. At the elementary level, girls appear to blend comfortably into the school setting, whereas boys often tend to suffer more academically and behaviorally. These differences, however, tend to change during the academic career. The literature suggests that girls increasingly lose self-confidence as they move into adolescence, which may interfere with academic performance. Boys may also withdraw from academics because of the perception of an unsupportive learning environment.

Gendered differences in academic self-confidence in particular may affect school performance. For example, gifted white girls are more likely to underestimate their academic abilities than are gifted white boys, which may explain the decline in girl's self-confidence over time relative to that of boys. It is unclear how race and class influence these attitudes. Girls tend to exhibit more math anxiety than boys do, and boys often have a lower verbal self-concept than girls. Poor academic self-concept may lead to avoidant behavior toward a particular subject that further polarizes boys and girls into gender-segregated fields. For example, girls may experience a decline in math and science self-concept in the early years, which may ultimately prevent them from seeking careers in nontraditional fields in the future.

A lack of gender equity in teacher training may provide a partial explanation for the maintenance of the gender gap in education. Educators must learn to be aware of the subtle ways that gender-bias manifests itself in the classroom as a preliminary step to solving gender inequities in education. For instance, teachers often unknowingly cater to boys by selecting subject material that appeals to boys' interests, especially in math and science.

Another serious problem for girls and women in educational settings is sexual harassment. The AAUW found that sexual harassment of girls by boys was increasing in U.S. schools. In an AAUW poll, 4 out of 5 girls reported that they had experienced sexual harassment. Overall, the realities of sexual harassment undermine the value of girls and women in education.

Extracurricular Activities

Extracurricular activity participation in K–12 education is anything but "extra." For example, the extracurriculum stands as an important consideration in college admissions decisions. Although these programs remain an integral component of suburban and private schooling, high schools in large urban districts must increasingly rely on the goodwill of their teachers, lose activities, or rely on external and private funding to support this component of schooling. Moreover, school social life, shaping of identity, and development of interpersonal skills—all addressed in extracurricular activities—are critical components of the high school experience. Numerous studies on the relationship between adolescents' participation in activities and their social and academic development point to the importance of the role that activities play in girls' and boys' experiences of school.

Early-20th-century goals for the implementation of school-sponsored activities included integrating and assimilating heterogeneous populations of students, socializing students for participation in a democratic society, fostering both cooperation and competition, teaching students self-direction in social and academic responsibilities, and instilling a commitment to the concept of equality of opportunity. Contemporary justifications remain much the same with the added purpose of focusing attention on the relations between participation and individual student academic achievement.

Student choices in activity participation reflect a variety of factors, including family background, social class, ethnicity, gender, and sexuality. For instance, parents who have a history of extracurricular activity participation will be more likely to encourage and assist their children in participation in school-sponsored activities. Their own participation experiences help these parents foster in their children an appreciation of the value of the perceived social development gained through participation. Such parents may also help their children recognize the link between participation and college admissions and therefore regard extracurricular activities as an important part of the schooling experience.

All extracurricular activities are not equal. Core activities are those activities that have become institutionalized within the high school and that receive support from the local school community, student population, or even the state; examples of core activities include certain sports, yearbook, newspaper, and drama. Attempts to eliminate these activities often spark resistance from any or all of the supporting constituencies that consider the activities necessary component to the high school experience. For instance, schools that compete interscholastically or athletically with other schools can produce rivalries that pull communities into the experience.

Therefore, each year the school produces athletes, student government leaders, cheerleaders, and band members who become loyal supporters of the extracurricular activity.

Peripheral activities are temporal in nature, often subject to fluctuations in funding, sponsorship, or student interest. These activities are tied to particular fads or trends and include, for example, the Rollerblading Club or the "Dr. Who" Club. Such peripheral activities may appear intermittently in the extracurriculum as interest waxes and wanes because of student, staff, or school needs and interest. Peripheral activities tend to lack widespread or sustained organizational and community support, are typically smaller in membership, and seldom receive school funding.

Research suggests that students who were unpopular in middle school were able to change social statuses in high school by participating in school-sponsored activities. Extracurricular activity participation in high school can be a tool for enhancing identity. Girls are more involved in non-sports activities, whereas boys more often engage in sports activities. Students participating in sport activities (particularly core sports) have a higher likelihood of exhibiting homophobic behavior, and students participating in non-sports activities tend to exhibit less homophobic attitudes than does the general student population. Students from lower socioeconomic backgrounds and students of color are as a whole less involved in activity participation. Race and ethnicity play a role in extracurricular activity participation, as do socioeconomic status and academic abilities.

ELDERCARE

During the past 20 years, research on eldercare has come to dominate the study of intergenerational family relations. When the term eldercare was first used, it referred specifically to helping people suffering from Alzheimer's disease and other types of dementia. Over time, eldercare has come to refer to almost any help that adult children give to their parents. As with any activity that takes place within families, the nature of eldercare varies depending on the gender of both the providers and receivers of assistance. As with widowhood, gender stereotyping has led to women's ways of caring being seen as the standard against which the caring that men give is measured.

This entry discusses the type of research that has been done, explores the gender makeup of those giving and receiving care, discusses the differences in care provided by women and men, summarizes the limited research on the experience of receiving care, discusses the differences in the way women and men experience providing care, and provides a gender analysis of policies related to caregiving.

Until 20 years ago, research on caregiving was almost nonexistent. More recently, there has been an explosion of such literature that encourages an image of old people as infirm care recipients who are dependent. This literature often examines eldercare in situations where the recipient suffers from Alzheimer's disease or other kinds of dementia, emphasizes the stress and burden of caregiving rather than the satisfaction derived from the task, and focuses only on a primary caregiver rather than on the web of carers that may include a spouse, children, friends, and paid home-care workers.

Most literature on eldercare discusses the experience of women carers. It usually ignores the reciprocity involved in family relationships and often sees the care recipient as a passive object rather than an active participant in her or his own life. This literature also often uses the term caregiver to refer to people who do not refer to or think of themselves using that term. Rather, they see their actions as an extension of their roles as family members.

Although the term eldercare may imply that taking care of an older person and child care are similar, there are important differences between the two. Child care has a predictable trajectory, but there are likely to be unpredictable crises as well as improvements in helping older relatives. As well, that someone is old does not tell us much about whether that person needs assistance, whereas we have a good idea, enacted in law, about how much care children need at a particular age. In addition, we do not expect children to be able to make decisions about their own care. Older people, on the other hand, have the right to make decisions about care.

The early literature on caregiving sounded an alarm about the burdens of the "sandwich generation" or "generation in the middle." This warning envisioned that many women would need to take care of their aging parents at the same time that they were caring for their own small children. Although some women may be in this situation, it is more likely that their children will be grown before their own parents might need care. Therefore, the concept of serial caregiving is more appropriate. As well, many older parents do not require care. Thus, those who have the structural potential to become caregivers, that is who have parents who are old, do not necessarily need to provide care for them.

Those involved in the provision of care or assistance as well as those who receive that care are predominantly women. The categories of people involved in the caregiving triangle are the person who needs help; the "informal" helper who is unpaid and most often a family member, usually a spouse or a daughter; and the "formal" caregiver who is paid. Women are likely to occupy all the roles of the triangle.

Women are likely to be recipients of care because they live longer than men, are more likely to suffer from chronic ailments, and are less likely to have a spouse with whom to share complementary tasks of everyday life. Because women often marry men who are older than them, they are less likely to have a spouse available than men have.

Unpaid carers provide about 90 percent of the total assistance, and about 75 percent of these helpers are women. Spouses are equally likely to care for each other when needed and spend similar amounts of time caring. When husbands care for wives, this can mark a definite shift in their activity. These husbands may need to learn skills that challenge traditional views of masculinity.

Daughters are far more likely to assist a parent or parents than are sons. When children are caring for parents, their assistance reflects a gendered division of labor. Daughters and daughters-in-law are more likely to provide personal care, known as activities of daily living (ADLs), which include feeding, dressing, and bathing; perform a wider range of activities; and spend more time providing care than sons do. This work tends to be daily and inflexible.

Sons, however, are more likely to provide care management and to be involved with instrumental tasks, referred to as instrumental activities of daily living (IADLs). IADLs, which include—among other things, providing transportation, yard work, and household repairs—are less likely to require daily work and are more easily planned. Sons are more likely to receive help from their wives when they provide care than daughters receive from their husbands.

Daughters and sons are likely to take different approaches to addressing their parents' needs. Daughters monitor their parents' needs and volunteer their help, but sons often wait until their parents ask for help. Sons are more likely to see their helping in terms of promoting their parents' independence, whereas daughters are apt to accept their parents' dependence. Finally, sons are likely to think about their help in terms of being an adult child as distinct from being a sibling, whereas daughters are more likely to think in terms of a network of siblings.

When men provide care for either their wives or their parents, they are taking on tasks that are unusual, highly visible, and seen as heroic. They experience a sense of accomplishment, the admiration of others, and, for husbands, grateful spouses. As well, men are offered assistance from formal services (i.e., those that involve paid workers) more often than are women.

Men tend to organize their caring to resemble work roles; they use the language of occupations and carry out the work in a systematic manner. Some research has found that men often set up offices or filing systems to manage their wife's or parents' care.

Daughters are more likely than are sons to adjust their work and family commitments to provide assistance. Daughters may cut back on hours of paid employment. Women see caregiving as more stressful and burdensome than men do. Men, however, report feeling a sense of accomplishment in carrying out the tasks of caring, whereas women focus more on their inability to maintain the marriage or intergenerational relationship especially if their husband or parent suffers from some form of dementia.

Although little research has explored what it is like to be a care receiver, evidence indicates that the experience of receiving care is gendered. Wife-receivers tend to feel guilty when their husbands carry out traditionally female household tasks, whereas husband-receivers see household tasks and personal care as part of the marital relationship. When mothers receive care, they may attempt to retain their identities as mothers by protecting their (usually) daughters by minimizing their requests, doing some cooking, or babysitting to help their child, and by not complaining.

Recent work has shown that when spouses care for one another, they make efforts to maintain the care receiver's gender identity. Women focus on masculine aspects of their husband's identity. For example, they may ensure that their husband keeps his driver's license, feels he is still in charge of finances, and has money or a wallet on him all the time. Men, on the other hand, may work to maintain their wife's gendered appearance by learning to apply her make up and ensuring she is wearing cleaned and pressed clothing.

The third point on the eldercare triangle is formal or paid home care. These services include personal care, housekeeping, case management, and respite for family carers. The typical paid carer is female, a member of a racial or ethnic minority (especially in urban centers), middle-aged, poorly educated, and the primary wager-earner in her household. Many policymakers believe that if homecare were provided by the state, family and friends would withdraw from providing assistance. There is, however, no evidence that this is the case.

The salary for home care workers reflects a societal belief that women are naturally suited to carry out care work, which is, therefore, seen as unskilled. As a result, many home care workers experience low wages, poor working conditions, and high turnover.

The arrangements of eldercare that exist today reflect an underestimate of the skills involved in providing care, particularly personal care, the low value of older people, and the belief that caring for an older person is intrinsically burdensome. Hospitals today are discharging patients "quicker and sicker" than in the past. Therefore, care provided at home, by both paid and unpaid caregivers, now often includes work formerly carried out by trained health care professionals. Such work may include changing dressings after surgery and administering complicated drug regimes. Even so, the old who need help are often active participants in their lives and contributing members of their family and community.

Ellis, Havelock (1859–1939)

Henry Havelock Ellis, known as Havelock Ellis, was a British doctor, sexual psychologist, and social reformer. He was born February 2, 1859, in Croydon, England. Ellis's family had strong connections to the sea. His mother Susannah Wheatley Ellis's father was a sea captain, as was his father, Edward Peppen Ellis. After being educated in England, Ellis moved to Sydney, Australia, in 1875. He worked at a variety of private schools, but found this life to be isolating and unfulfilling. Ellis returned to England in 1879 for medical training at St. Thomas' Hospital. Since the age of 16, he had wanted to study sex and obtaining a medical degree was the best means to pursue this goal. Ellis married writer Edith Lees in 1891. They had an unusual marriage for the period; although intellectually and emotionally close, both had romantic partners outside of the marriage partially because of Ellis's difficulties with physical intimacy and because Lees was a lesbian.

Ellis's early writings primarily consist of essays in arts, literature, and philosophy. After completing his medical training, Ellis devoted his life to the study of sex. His exploration of sexuality centered on studying the biological, intellectual, and emotional components of men and women. He believed that sexuality was natural for men and woman and that both sexes were capable of having fulfilling sexual lives. Ellis's approach to studying sex signified a cultural shift in how society understood sexuality and sexual behavior. He approached the subject scientifically, without moral judgment. Part of his intellectual circle included reformers Edward Carpenter and Margaret Sanger, John Addington Symonds, and Sigmund Freud. Ellis was a proponent of Freud's theories and was instrumental in popularizing Freud's work. Ellis was also a strong advocate of eugenics.

Ellis differed from early sexologists such as Richard von Krafft-Ebing, who believed that sexual behavior was acquired. Ellis believed that one's sexuality was part of someone's biology, a congenital condition. One of his first medical studies, Sexual Inversion, was written in collaboration with Symonds. They theorized that homosexuality or "sexual inversion" is simply an inborn abnormality that turns a person's sexual instinct toward members of the same sex. Ellis believed this condition naturally occurs in all species. Any attempt at finding a cure is futile because it goes against the nature of the invert. Eventually this piece became part of a larger collection of research, Studies in the Psychology of Sex, published in 1910, where Ellis also introduced research on autoeroticism, narcissism, and connections of pain with sexual behavior and concepts of love.

Ellis died July 8, 1939. He is widely recognized as a pioneer in the development of modern conceptions of sexuality. Although he faced challenges in having his work published, Ellis is widely studied today, providing a foundation for contemporary research on sexuality and gender.

Emotion Work

Emotion work, or emotion management as it is often called, means that each encounter with others receives its expected and appropriate amount of feeling.

According to Arlie Russell Hochschild, emotions are managed based on an individual's or individuals' understanding of situational and cultural feeling rules (normative ideas about how one should or should not feel in a given situation). For example, one might say, "I tried hard to cry and feel sad when my father died," or "I just don't think I can feel any sympathy for her even though I should."

As emphasized by Hochschild, emotion work is the intrapersonal management of one's emotions in both private and public contexts. Consequently, the personal use value of emotion work lies in the efforts of an individual to evoke, transform, or suppress one's feelings through surface acting (purposeful management or alignment of behavioral expression with social expectations or feeling rules) and deep acting (purposeful alignment of one's "genuine" or "natural" emotion with the behavioral expressions; a cognitive strategy). In a paid work context, this emotion work (emotional labor) may be an expected aspect of one's labor power or has exchange value. In other words, in a paid work context, one might be evaluated (get paid, earn tips) according to her or his ability to smile for the customers even if the feeling typically attached to smiling is not felt or remain calm in the face of an angry client even if anger is justified as a response. Emotional labor can be thought of as emotion work with market value or as a commodity. Other researchers have noted that besides being intrapersonal, emotion work may also include the management of others' emotions, which is the interpersonal management of emotions. Consequently, emotion work includes the management of self-feeling and others' feelings in a variety of situations.

Of particular interest to the study of emotion work and gender is the point that emotional labor is a critical component of the service economy and that this economy has been deeply entrenched in the cultural beliefs that suggest women are more naturally suited to this emotion work than are men. Given U.S. cultural assumptions about women's emotionality, women have historically shouldered the burden of emotion work in the work force as well as in the household. Consequently, as deep-acting (a significant aspect of emotional labor) has the greatest potential of being alienating in that it is as much about deceiving self as deceiving others, women may disproportionately face the costs of emotional inauthenticity. A great deal of research is seeking to understand whether and to what extent women are disadvantaged in this sense in the service economy and to what extent emotion work in all of its complexity is gendered—experienced differently by males or females, or for those perceived to be feminine or masculine.

Current research on emotion work can be organized into the following categories: (a) a particular emotion (i.e., anger, ambivalence, anxiety, envy, guilt, jealousy, remorse, shame, or sympathy) and its management in given situations (i.e., during an illness or the illness of others, as an aspect of or response to terrorism, or during trials and jury deliberation); (b) women, men, and emotions; (c) emotion work within many widely varying paid work situations (i.e., among paralegals, lawyers, paramedics and firefighters, midwives, medical residents, models, academics, and Wal-Mart greeters) and social movement activism (i.e., animal rights, among hate groups, environmental rights, self-help groups, and in recruitment efforts for activists); and (d) emotion work in families or in close relational partnerships. This entry provides a brief discussion of these combined areas as they particularly relate to gender in society.

A Particular Emotion, its Management and Gender

In U.S. culture, it is commonly accepted that women are more emotional than men, are more emotionally expressive than men, experience different emotions, and experience those emotions differently than men do. Research, though, has challenged the validity of these assumptions. Researchers have found, for example, that women report greater intensity of anger than do males, but that there is little difference in the reported frequency of feeling angry or feeling emotional at all. Regarding anger, women do differ in that they are more likely to manage their anger verbally—do emotion work—by talking with others or seeking social support, whereas men are more likely to manage anger behaviorally by taking a pill or a drink. Men and women do seem to differ in their reporting of positive and negative emotions. Women report more negative emotions, and men report more positive. Research suggests that this difference is likely caused by social positions rather than by any inherent or innate differences. In other words, being in a position of less power, authority, and autonomy is likely to produce more negativity among females—and males, for that matter—than what is produced in higher social positions.

Affect control theory further supports the relationship between social position and emotion work because it postulates that occupying a social position that is devalued or thought to be deviant gives rise to negative emotions. These negative emotions may then set in motion emotion work to reassert self-worth or change how self is characterized. Of particular relevance here is the emotion work within self-help movements, which through solidarity creates joy and pride instead of shame, anger, or depression. Feminist self-help groups such as those constructed in response to obesity, sexual orientation, and postpartum depression in which women and men do caring for others, may also serve as ways to organize against gendered oppression and to cultivate the legitimacy of open displays of emotion and empathy.

Doing Emotional Labor

In the workplaces of the 1980s and 1990s, feminists, among others, continued to challenge the long-held assumption that the way to the top for women was through displaying shyness and doing deference emotional labor in reference to those above them. Shyness gave way to assertiveness and empathetic listening. Doing emotion work through empathetic listening was thought to equally benefit men and women, but this equality was not realized. As long as empathy was assumed to be a feminine quality and one closely tied to caregiving, women gained less than men did from doing empathetic listening and were more harshly judged when doing it poorly. Similarly, Jennifer Pierce's study of paralegals demonstrated how a profession characterized by deference and caretaking was feminized not so much because women were doing the emotion work, but because caretaking is constructed as something women do well. Further emotion work is then required to manage the feelings of injustice.

Doing Emotion Work and Doing Gender

Emotional experience and expression are integral aspects of close relationships. Hence, interpersonal emotion work is also integral, particularly to family relations. Researchers of the family have found that biological sex is the most important predictor of the division of labor within these relations, but that people's construction of gender is the most important predictor of the performance of interpersonal emotion work. And men's performance of emotion work is a critical component of women's perceptions of marital quality. Males who construct gender in more feminine-expressive terms are more likely to do emotion work, but women are more likely to do emotion work whether they construct gender in more feminine or masculine-instrumental terms. Further, studies have also shown that when couples agree on a more traditional gender approach, men do more emotion work and women are happier about the marital quality. But if women are dissatisfied with the division of labor, they are also more critical of men's emotion work and less happy with the marital quality. These studies demonstrate the importance of including an examination of gender constructions and of emotion work to understanding the creation and maintenance of families and marriages.

Researching Emotion Work

As emotion work is primarily an interactive process, most research is qualitative in nature, including participant observation, ethnography, narrative, in-depth interviewing, or focus groups. However, a significant body of research based in affect control theory draws on survey research and mathematical models to predict emotions called forth in particular situations and hence, an examination of the likelihood and extent of emotion work.

A great deal of research on emotions and emotion work has been conducted during the past 30 years that indicate their significance in understanding social interaction, relationships, and structure. Particularly important is the impact of gender or the expectations concerning masculinity and femininity in this understanding. One final note is that the empirical study of gender and emotion work is continuing to expand into the examination of other social positions such as sexual orientation and race, emphasizing human agency rather than a model of cultural norms. In the final analysis, people's constructions about what is feminine and what is masculine affect emotion work more than does biological sex. Women, as they are more likely characterized as feminine, do more and are expected to do more emotion work, and hence, women are held to a different standard of caring (particularly in reference to emotional labor) than are men.

EQUAL PAY ACT OF 1963

Legislation calling for equal pay for equal work was first proposed in Congress in 1945. The Equal Pay Act of 1963 (EPA) was finally signed into law on June 10, 1963, by President John F. Kennedy—18 years after the National War Labor Board mandated equal pay for equal work in 1942. However, the act was controversial because of the objections of numerous members of the business community.

Numerous reasons were given during congressional testimony about why women should be paid less than men. First, employers cited the higher turnover rates of working women because of family obligations as a valid reason for paying women lower hourly wages. Employers also cited state laws that prohibited women from working at night, laws that limited the actual number of hours worked and the amount of weight a woman could lift. There was also the historical bias in the system of compensation in the United States during that period; in the 1950s, two-thirds of families had a bread-winning husband and a stay-at-home wife. Many women workers at this time were viewed as working for "pin money"—income not vital to the survival of the household. Through the combination of these reasons, many in the business community as well as in society stood against equal pay for equal work.

The EPA requires, as a general rule, that men and women who work in jobs that are substantively equal in terms of skill, effort, responsibility, and working conditions shall receive the same pay. The original bill that was proposed required equal pay for "comparable work." However, this stipulation was changed before the passage of the bill to "equal work." The EPA permits differences in wages based on seniority, merit, quality, or quantity of production, or other differentials not based on gender. In EPA cases, plaintiffs have the burden of proof to show that women were paid less than men and that the work involved was "substantively equal." Also, until the passage of the Educational Amendments in 1972, those employed in an executive, administrative, or professional capacities were excluded from the protection of the EPA as a consequence of the EPA being bundled into the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The EPA was enacted as an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, which regulates minimum wages, overtime, and child labor, because it was politically expedient to have the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor oversee the enforcement of the EPA rather than push for the development of a new administrative body. As a result of the Reorganization Act of 1977, the enforcement of the EPA shifted to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) in 1979, where it remains.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT (ERA)

The Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) is a proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution that would prevent the denial or abridgement of legal protection on the basis of gender. The ERA was passed by Congress in 1972, but failed to achieve full ratification. The controversy that arose surrounding the ERA exemplified contemporary debates regarding the equality of the sexes and became a major focal point of the woman's movement of the late 20th century. The ERA was most recently introduced before Congress on March 27, 2007, as S.J. Res. 10 (Sen. Edward M. Kennedy) and H.J. Res. 40 (Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney). Renamed the "Women's Equality Amendment," these resolutions adopt similar language to the ERA, but fail to specify a deadline for ratification. This entry describes the history of the ERA, as well as the controversies surrounding it.

History

Drafted by suffragette Alice Paul, founder of the National Woman's Party, the ERA was first put before Congress in 1923. Paul envisioned a bill that would extend women's rights following the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment. But early opponents of the legislation, including Florence Kelly and the League of Women Voters, feared that it would end protective labor laws. Following endorsement by both Republican and Democratic parties in the 1940s, the ERA was modified to include a rider that exempted women's labor protection laws. But addition of the rider failed to resolve debates surrounding the amendment, and the ERA remained stymied in Congressional committee sessions for another two decades. In 1972, Congress approved a rider-free version of the ERA submitted by Representative Martha Griffith (D-MI). With the 1967 endorsement of the National Organization for Women (NOW) and the rise of the second wave of the women's movement following the 1963 publication of Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique, ERA proponents were confident the legislation would be fully ratified. The political climate of the early 1970s was less amenable then perceived, however, and conservative activists, led by Phyllis Schlafly, raised powerful opposition to the amendment. Schlafly's "STOP the ERA" movement argued that the bill would end the legal privileges and protections granted to women and lead to a host of unanticipated outcomes, from women's participation in the military draft to unisex public bathrooms.

In the face of a unified opposition movement, the ratification process slowed and Indiana became the 35th, and final, state to ratify the ERA in 1977. Between 1973 and 1979, five states rescinded ratification (or let it lapse), raising important questions about the amendment process and the legality of state rescission bills. Despite a 3-year extension of the 7-year deadline for ratification, the ERA failed to secure further endorsement and was defeated in 1982. Although the ERA has been reintroduced to every Congress since 1983, support for the bill waned as it became increasingly associated with debates regarding abortion rights and funding.

Beginning in the mid-1990s, ERA proponents pursued the "three-state strategy," which argues that the 1982 ratification deadline should be nullified and the ERA passed once three more states approve ratification. The "three-state strategy" was adopted following the 1992 passage of the Twenty-seventh Amendment (the "Madison Amendment"), after a ratification period of 203 years. ERA supporters argue that the Madison Amendment establishes precedent for Congress to amend previously established legislative deadlines. Following this interpretation, Congress could validate the 35 existing ERA ratifications and add the amendment to the Constitution following its approval by three more states. Opponents argue that the Madison Amendment fails to establish precedent because it was proposed in 1789 without a deadline, and that the ERA only secured the approval of 30 states, following its rescission by five ratifying states in the 1970s. In 2007, ERA proponents pursued this strategy by introducing ratification bills in legislative sessions of eight unratified states. To date, no further ratifications have been secured. The 2007 Women's Equality Amendment adopts the language of the ERA without specifying a deadline for its ratification. The Women's Equality Amendment would need to need to secure independent ratification by 38 states for congressional approval and enactment. With more than 200 congressional co-sponsors, the Women's Equality Amendment is supported by both the National Organization for Women (NOW) and the League of Women Voters.

Controversy

The concise and broad language of the ERA has prompted heated debate and speculation about its purpose, goals, and possible outcomes. Debates surrounding the ERA have generally paralleled those regarding gender equality throughout the 20th century. Early supporters of the amendment included radical feminists who demanded an end to legal sexual discrimination practices that lent women inferior property, contract, and guardianship rights. Opponents included conservative feminists who tied the ERA to social issues of women's family role and argued that the amendment's provision of equal legal protection would strip women of labor restrictions. Where proponents of the bill felt that sexual equality should be secured regardless of social status, opponents argued that equality needed to be tempered by women's need for legal protection as second-class citizens. These debates were tied to contemporary disputes regarding participation of women in the workforce and the role of men as household breadwinners.

By the time the ERA came before Congress in 1972, women played an active role in the workforce and concerns regarding the protection of women's labor were no longer prominent. At that time, the Amendment was associated with contentious gender-related issues including reproductive rights and women's participation in military combat. Schlafly's STOP the ERA movement mobilized significant opposition that drew upon fear that passage of the amendment would legalize public funding of abortion. This group found influential collaborators among conservative religious and pro-life groups, including the National Right to Life Committee, which lobbied heavily at the state level against passage of the amendment. Schlafly and other anti-ERA enthusiasts maintain their active opposition to the latest version of the amendment, arguing that its passage will lead to the loss of women's right to alimony, spousal support, and social security benefits, as well as the legalization of same-sex marriage. Despite substantial opposition, amendment sponsors maintain hope that Congress will fully ratify the ERA and guarantee equal legal protection to women.

ERICKSON, REED (1917–1992)

Reed Erickson was an influential wealthy transsexual man who contributed to funding early research on transsexual issues and increasing the visibility of transsexuality in the United States. Erickson was born October 13, 1917, as Rita Erickson in El Paso, Texas. Shortly after taking over his father's prosperous lead smelting business after his father's death in 1962, Erickson began the process of masculinization under the supervision of Dr. Harry Benjamin. Erickson was crucial for the growth of transsexual medical services and education because of his extensive philanthropic endeavors.

In 1964, Erickson founded the Erickson Educational Foundation (EEF), an organization through which he funneled philanthropic personal donations. The EEF donations proclaimed that goals included support for controversial and cutting-edge research that was currently unfunded. Through EEF, Erickson supported significant early research on transsexualism by scholars and doctors such as Dr. Harry Benjamin, an endocrinologist who created the first medical standard of care for transsexuals, and many researchers at the Johns Hopkins and Stanford University Gender Clinics. In the 1960s and early 1970s, the EEF donated more than $250,000 to the study of and improvement of medical services for transsexuals. The EEF also promoted education on transsexuality through coordinating medical referrals among transsexuals, sponsoring public educational opportunities, and financially supporting early books about transsexuality. The most significant contribution of the EEF was supporting the growth and development of the Harry Benjamin International Dysphoria Association through both general financial support and sponsorship of the first three international symposia on gender identity in 1969, 1971, and 1973.

Other activities funded by Erickson included the financial support of the Los Angeles homophile organization ONE Inc., which is one of the oldest gay organizations in the United States. ONE Inc. has operated as a central historical archive and educational facility since 1952 and has received more than $2 million dollars worth of support from EEF. This funding was used to purchase a community center, which was critical for gay activist organizing during this period before the gay and lesbian rights movement (sometimes referred to as the "pre-Stonewall period"). Erickson's substantial funding for ONE Inc. gave him significant influence over ONE Inc. educational and business endeavors. Erickson also funded New Age exploratory research on dolphin communications, acupuncture, and dream research. After transitioning, Erickson married three different women and fathered two children. Erickson died in 1992 in Mexico, a fugitive from United States drug indictments because of his addiction to illegal drugs.

ETHICS AND MORAL DEVELOPMENT, GENDER DIFFERENCES IN

The history of reflection on ethics and moral development is inseparable from the history of speculation about gender differences. This entry will outline some of the most historically influential accounts of the nature of ethics and of the presumed differences between women's and men's ethical development and then turn to more contemporary debates on the topic.

Historical Views of Gender and Moral Development

Questions about the nature of moral decision making have been addressed in religious, philosophical, and scientific traditions. In each of these traditions, it has often been claimed that compared with men, women are inferior in respect to their moral characters, reasoning abilities, and capacity for self-control. The explanations for this presumed inferiority have varied, and although claims that women are morally inferior have predominated in the Western intellectual tradition, voices critical of the dominant account may also be found throughout this history. In Plato's Republic, for example, Socrates (469–399 BCE) described the just man as one whose reason directs his spirit or passions as well as his appetites. Those who are best able to exercise rational self-control, whether they are men or women, are best suited to become members of the state's guardian or ruling group. By arguing that some women were capable of rational self-control and that they could become rulers, Plato (c. 427–347 BCE) ran counter to prevailing Greek views. However, he qualifies this view by having Socrates argue that within the guardian class, the women's abilities would be inferior to those of the men. Plato presents a further account of the differences between men and women in a mythological story in the Timaeus. In this dialogue, Timaeus, describing a cycle of the birth and rebirth of souls, says that men who failed to control their passions and physical sensations would, after death, be reborn as women.

Plato's view of the relationship of gender to moral development is thus a complex one. Although he is the earliest major Western philosopher to challenge the belief that women as a group are incapable of rational self-control, and though he promoted education for capable women, he nevertheless reserved to men the highest level of rational and moral ability.

Aristotle (384–322 BCE) had a more pronounced view of the moral differences between men and women than did Plato. Parallel to his belief that female bodies produced less heat than male bodies and were therefore less perfect, Aristotle viewed women as lacking in the capacity to exercise practical reason and the other moral virtues such as courage and temperance. Because of this defect, women's excellence or virtue, for Aristotle, was to be ruled by men. Aristotle's view of women largely dominated medieval Christian, Islamic, and Jewish philosophy. St. Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) adopted Aristotle's view that in the natural realm, women ought to accept the rule of men because of women's weaker rational powers. However, he believed that women, as much as men, could achieve perfection in the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity by means of a gift of divine grace. An exception to the general medieval adoption of Aristotle's position was Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), an author and teacher who in her writings questioned the passive moral role generally assigned to women and who attributed to women both self-control and intelligence.

In the late medieval and early Renaissance period, exaggerated satirical accounts of women's vices became popular in Europe. These included the Malleus maleficarum (Witches' Hammer), a 15th-century work that portrayed women as susceptible to profound spiritual corruption because of their inherent moral weakness. Although women were popularly satirized and even demonized during this period, there were also authors who challenged the inherited Aristotelian view of women's characters. Christine de Pizan (c. 1363–1430), a prolific Venetian author, disputed the prevailing view that women were defective in virtue. In The Book of the City of Ladies (1405), Pizan described the building of a city of virtuous women guided by Lady Reason, Lady Rectitude, and Lady Justice. Through examples and arguments, Pizan challenged the view that women were weak, inconstant, jealous, deceitful, and so on. In addition to Pizan, other thinkers during the Renaissance period questioned Aristotelian science and philosophy, opening the door to questions regarding women's virtue and women's education.

Enlightenment and 19th-Century Views of Gender and Moral Development

Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778) argued that men and women were equally perfect and saw their abilities as complementary to one another. He promoted women's education but claimed that it ought to focus on developing those attributes that enabled women to please and inspire men. Women, for Rousseau, would find their proper role within the private or familial sphere. Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797) criticized Rousseau's educational program, claiming that to educate women to please men corrupted women's characters and rendered them idle and frivolous. Viewing women as potentially independent of men and as possessing reason in their own right would lead, according to Wollstonecraft, to women developing a greater range of virtues.

Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) developed a powerful ethical theory whose influence extends to the present day. Kant represents a movement away from traditional virtue ethics, which emphasized the development of excellent character, toward an account of what makes particular decisions ethical or unethical. Kant's ethical theory is deontological or duty-based rather than consequentialist or based on the outcomes of actions. For Kant, moral rules should be acknowledged as applying universally; thus, a person who behaves unethically is one who applies one set of rules to herself or himself while applying another set of rules to others. The person who behaves ethically is rationally consistent because that person follows only those rules of behavior that he or she would be able to consistently wish others to follow as well. Kant's ethics places fundamental importance on human dignity and on the principle that human beings should be seen as ends in themselves, never merely as instruments to be used.

Kant's view of women's moral capacity shows the influence of Rousseau. Kant described men as having a noble nature and a deep understanding, whereas women had a beautiful nature as well as a beautiful understanding. Men, according to Kant, should develop their intellectual capacities and moral reasoning but women should develop their feelings of appreciation for the beautiful. In the realm of ethics, women would learn to recognize unethical actions because of their ugliness rather than because such actions violated rules of rational consistency. They would be guided in ethical decision making by their husbands' understanding, and they would guide their husbands in matters of taste. Whereas Kant did not deny that women have rational capacities, he considered it inappropriate for women to develop those capacities fully, either in the sciences or in the study of ethics because to do so might compromise women's ability to be charming to men and thus to fulfill the purpose of procreation. As Nancy Tuana has pointed out in Woman and the History of Philosophy, Kant's belief that women should forgo the development of their rational capacities for the sake of social ends is in tension with his belief that rational beings have an imperfect duty of self-development as well as with his fundamental principle that human beings should be treated as ends and not as mere means to the ends either of others or of themselves.

John Stuart Mill (1806–1873) was one of the founders of the utilitarian philosophy that, like Kantian ethics, still exercises a profound influence on moral philosophy today. Like Kantian deontology, utilitarianism develops criteria for determining whether an action can be considered ethically permitted or even ethically required. Unlike Kant, utilitarians look to the consequences of an action to make such judgments. Actions are judged right to the extent that they produce the greatest happiness for the greatest number of people, with each person's interests counting no more than anyone else's. Although it may seem that, according to utilitarian reasoning, individual rights and freedoms could be sacrificed to the interests of a social majority, Mill himself was a strong defender of the principle that a society that fails to protect individual freedom would be unable to promote the well-being of any of its citizens.

In 19th-century Britain, utilitarians championed a number of social reforms on the grounds that existing social arrangements failed to set a priority on human happiness, which was often sacrificed to tradition and to class interests. Mill, along with his wife Harriet Taylor (1807–1858), publicly advocated the enfranchisement of women and the abolishment of the practice of couverture whereby women lost their rights to hold property if they married. In 1869, he published The Subjection of Women, which made a case for women's political and social equality. In this work, Mill argued that, although it is often claimed that women are naturally inferior to men, the true nature of women will never be known until they are given equal opportunities and the freedom to develop their capabilities. Regarding the moral development of men and women, Mill made a number of claims. He argued that the family is the first school of justice and virtue and that when the family has at its heart a relationship of inequality between the sexes, children learn to be unjust rather than just. He pointed out that, though it is commonly claimed that women are a refining or civilizing influence and are in that sense better than men, it is inconsistent to believe that women therefore should be men's subordinates. Under the present system of social inequality, he argued, women were poorly educated and as a result they tended to corrupt their husbands by espousing common beliefs and stifling original and critical thought. Finally, Mill argued that men who were raised from childhood in the belief that they were inherently superior to all women became morally corrupted as a result. To educate both men and women to their fullest intellectual and moral capacities could transform the moral character of the family and make available the talents and intellect of women in the public sphere.

The views of Mill and Taylor constituted a minority compared with the prevailing 19th-century view of women. Scientists in this period contributed to the dominant view by offering biological justifications for the presumed fact that women's moral choices were made under the influence of sympathy and emotion (as opposed to the choices made by men, who were more rational and dispassionate). In this view, women's sympathetic nature was an evolutionary adaptation that fitted them for their nurturing role; in addition, it was argued that the physical energy required for pregnancy and childbirth ought not to be diverted into women's own intellectual or moral development.

Freud and Women's Moral Development

Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) developed a profoundly influential account of human psychological development that further reinforced the view that women's moral capacities were inferior to those of men. For Freud, the human psyche has three parts: the ego (the "I" or conscious self), the id (the "it" or instinctual self), and the superego (the "over-I" or conscience). In early childhood, according to Freud, boys and girls took different paths to develop the superego and thus different paths to moral maturity. Boys, according to Freud, experience an Oedipal complex consisting of sexual desire for their mothers. They abandon this desire because of fear of castration, and their psyches develop an internal, powerful father figure (the superego) to keep them from straying again into forbidden desires or actions. Girls experience the Oedipal stage differently. They experience envy of boys' penises and wish they had one. They abandon their initial attachment to their mothers because the mother is, like the girl, lacking a penis. They develop an attachment to their fathers because a father can give them a baby to substitute for the penis. Eventually, girls abandon the Oedipal stage, but because they cannot be threatened with castration, their growth beyond the Oedipal stage and the formation of their superegos is incomplete and their superegos lack the intense motivating power of those of boys. As a result, women possess a weaker sense of justice than do men and are more influenced by their emotions.

Carol Gilligan: In a Different Voice

The 20th century saw the development of a number of feminist responses to the historical views of women's moral development. The best-known and most influential work in this area is Carol Gilligan's 1982 book, In a Different Voice. Gilligan's work on moral development arose as a response to the work of psychologist Lawrence Kohlberg (1927–1987). Kohlberg, inspired by the work of cognitive development theorist Jean Piaget (1896–1980), argued that there were six stages of moral development, divided into three levels (preconventional, conventional, and postconventional). At the first stage, actions are judged right or wrong according to whether or not they are punished; at the second, they are judged according to the self-interest of the subject. At the third stage, actions are judged by whether they fulfill interpersonal expectations; at the fourth, actions are expected to conform to laws. At the postconventional fifth stage, a social contract or a set of human rights is believed to determine what is ethical, and at the sixth stage, actions are judged right or wrong in light of universal principles of justice (e.g., using Kantian reasoning).

Gilligan pointed out that although Kohlberg's conclusions were assumed to apply to everyone, all 84 of the subjects in his initial study were male. She noted that in several studies using Kohlberg's methods, the women subjects failed to advance beyond his stage three. In response to these findings, Gilligan undertook her own research into the moral reasoning of both males and females. She found that a significant number of subjects, particularly women, articulated an ethical approach characterized by concern for interpersonal relationships and responsibility toward others. Gilligan came to call this approach a care perspective, which she distinguished from Kohlberg's justice perspective. Rather than accept the view that a care perspective was a stage along the way to full moral maturity, Gilligan proposed the voice of care as a viable alternative to the voice of justice. Rather than beginning with human rights or universal principles, the care perspective arose from a sense of human connection, responsibility, and interdependence. Gilligan outlined a set of stages of development within the care perspective: first, a preconventional focus on individual survival that is transcended by a concern not to be selfish. This stage is followed by a conventional stage focused first on pleasing others and then on questioning the demand to care only for others at the expense of caring for oneself. At the postconventional level, the ideal of self-sacrifice is replaced by recognition of the mutuality of relationships, and eventually care is extended to encompass a universal rejection of harm to self or others.

Responses to Gilligan

Responses to Gilligan's work have been wide ranging. A number of studies were undertaken to substantiate or disprove the existence of a care orientation in ethics as well as to test the association of the care approach with women. On the basis of such studies, Kohlberg and others have argued that the care orientation is associated, not with women, but with subjects having less extensive education than others and with those (such as housewives) without experience of participation in the workplace. Some feminist thinkers have responded to this suggestion by developing theories of ethics centered on the virtues that arise from the practice of nurturing children and caring for the dependent. A number of feminists have been wary of the care approach, seeing in it a potential return of historically dominant stereotypes of women, with their claims that women were dominated by emotion and incapable of understanding principles of justice. Along these lines, some have argued that the primary task of feminist ethics is not to develop a critique of principles of justice but, rather, to use those principles of justice to address the moral wrongs that have been done to women.

Moral philosophers have sometimes assimilated the care approach to existing positions within philosophical ethics. Thus, the ethics of care has been understood variously as a theory of supererogatory actions (actions that go beyond the strict demands of obligation), a theory of imperfect duties (those duties that are generally required but not in every case, such as the duty to assist the less fortunate), a theory of moral sentiments, a kind of virtue ethics, or an account of ethical principles to be used among loved ones and in the private sphere of the family. Others have viewed the care approach as a way to criticize the limits of abstract principles in ethics, seeing care as a salutary balance to the strict impartiality of both deontological and consequentialist ethical systems. In addition, care ethics has provided a basis on which to criticize the assumption, prevalent within social contract theories, that the subject of ethics is a rational, independent adult rather than being, for example, a dependent, vulnerable child, an elderly person, or someone suffering from a developmental disability.

Conclusion

Notions about differences in the ethical development of women and men have long played a central, if often hidden, role in the development of moral theories. Although it is impossible to say where this history will lead, the active participation of feminist theorists, and the attention paid to actual women who make ethical choices, is likely to have a profound effect on the future of ethical thought.

Ethnic Cleansing

The term ethnic cleansing was introduced into the lexicon of public discourse on war and international law during the conflict in the former Yugoslavia (Bosnia) in the early 1990s. Although there is no general agreement on a precise definition for ethnic cleansing, the broad outlines include an ideologically driven state policy designed to forcibly remove a group from a given territory. This entry will focus on the historical changes to the targets of cleansing and how rape became a tool for ethnic cleansing in Bosnia.

Ethnic Cleaning: A Historical Overview

Ethnic cleansing has been a feature of social and state relations since antiquity. In practice, though, it is difficult to distinguish ethnic cleansing from other types of removal that were not attempts to remove a clearly defined group from a specific territory. Further, when cleansing has been accompanied by extensive massacres, it often crosses the threshold from cleansing to genocide, which is the attempt to destroy in whole or in part a group of people based on the group's racial, ethnic, or national identity. Thus, the lines between cleansing and genocide, even though analytically discrete, blur in practice because both events can include degrees of violence and massacre accompanying forced removals.

Forced deportations and enslavement characterized ethnic cleansing until the Middle Ages. The target groups were the conquered peoples of wars. In the Middle Ages, the targets of ethnic cleansing were religious minorities. For example, Christians were deported from Muslim territories and vice versa. By the 19th century, the ideological motivation for ethnic cleansing shifted again. This time, in addition to religious groups, racial and ethnic minorities also became the targets of cleansing. One example is the U.S. Federal Removal Act of 1830, which forced the removal of various groups of Indian people from their ancestral lands.

Ethnic Cleaning in the 20th Century

In the 20th century, ethnic cleansing continued to be related to military operations, planned, and directed by political leaders of states. The campaigns for ethnic cleansing included nonviolent and violent measures. Nonviolent measures, which were more or less administrative, included policies such as dismissal from work, removal of medical care, or forced labor or other measures that incited violence such as racist propaganda, death threats, or publication of citizens according to ethnic origins intended to marginalize and isolate target groups.

More violent tactics were either part of the lead up to cleansing campaigns or accompanied ethnic cleansing. These tactics were carried out by citizens, paramilitary, and military personnel, working together or separately, although military personnel usually were responsible for summary executions, the blocking of humanitarian aid, targeting citizens for bombing, taking and exchanging hostages, running detention centers, using civilians as human shields, attacking refugee camps, and so forth. Unlike some administrative measures, military measures, as well as violent tactics and policies that incited violence, violate international law. These tactics and policies included robbery, physical intimidation, shootings, destruction of homes and other personal property, leading to mass displacement and mass deportations. Ethnic cleansing was extended beyond the physical removal of bodies to removing all traces of an ethnic group's existence by destroying places of worship, changing of street names, and the like.

In the 20th century, ethnic cleansing increasingly combined group removal with escalating levels of violence: Cleansing became synonymous with the removal and extermination of groups. Some examples include the Armenians (also victims of genocide), Christian Lebanese, and Kurds from the Ottoman empire during World War I; the cleansing of groups accompanying the consolidation of the Soviet Union and its satellite territories in the Balkans between 1929 and 1945; and the forced removal of Germans from former Nazi German occupied territories at the end of World War II.

Since World War II, ethnic cleansing has become associated with regions of the Global South (Africa, Asia, Caribbean, Latin America, and the Pacific). Specifically, the process of ending colonization engendered attempts by dominant groups within the new states to expel groups from within newly drawn state boundaries. Thus, in places like Nigeria and the Sudan, attempts were made to remove groups perceived as threats to the integrity of newly emerging political states. The linking of ethnic cleansing to postcolonial states was attributed, incorrectly in many cases, to the eruption of age-old ethnic hatreds. By the late 20th century, it was apparent that ethnic cleansing was not always associated with primordial tensions, not was it fair or accurate to link ethnic cleansing exclusively to states in the Global South.

Regardless of where it has occurred, post–World War II ethnic cleansing has occurred in contravention of international humanitarian law and international human rights. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the 1977 Additional Protocols, constructed to provide laws for war fighting, to make it a war crime to target civilians for violence or to remove them from their homes by force, and to make ethnic cleansing a crime against humanity because civilian populations cannot be murdered, tortured, raped, exterminated, enslaved, or imprisoned on the basis of political, religious, or racial grounds. In the United Nations General Assembly in 1992, ethnic cleansing was identified as a form of genocide. And in the case of ethnic cleansing in Bosnia, systematic rape was elevated to a genocidal act.

Systematic Rape: The Bosnian Case

Until Bosnia, rape was largely ignored as a war crime—an invisible crime thought to be related to the excesses of war. The Geneva Conventions considered rape a form of torture. Yet it remained unpunished because the prosecution had to rely on physical evidence to prove that the rape had occurred. And, although women were protected against forced prostitution and indecent assault in the Geneva Conventions, which protected both women and men equally, rape continued to be ignored. In 2001, however, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) convicted three Bosnian Serb soldiers of crimes against humanity for rape and sexual enslavement of Muslim women. This was the first time that a UN criminal tribunal focused solely on sexual assault and rape as war crimes. The ICTY argued that rape and torture are separate: Rape is a crime in its own right because of the way it violates our humanity. Therefore, and again for the first time, women in particular needed protection against rape and indecent assault with special protection for their young children also.

The ICTY decision was in response to the situation in Bosnia in the early 1990s when the Bosnian Serbs targeted mainly Muslim women and girls for systematic rape in advance of and as part of a military plan to cleanse the former Yugoslavia of Muslims from what Serb political leaders saw as their rightful territory. Their plan to rape Muslim women and girls went beyond the physical act and the terror and shame it instilled. Serb political leaders marked women's bodies as symbols of the honor of the Muslim community more generally. An attack on Muslim women was designed, by implication, to weaken and attack Muslim men because any attack would show that Muslim men had failed to protect their own women and girls, and subsequently the Muslim community. Moreover, Serbs considered Muslim women and girls, in their reproductive role, as the bearers of future generations and therefore sought to destroy women's reproductive power and the threat of Muslim expansion within their bodies. Thus, in some senses, the Serb political leader's policy of systematic rape was a demented form of nation building. It should be noted that the mass rape strategy included men and boys, who were raped and, in some cases, forced to rape each other.

The Serbs, in targeting Muslim women and girls, introduced a tactic unique to 20th-century cleansing campaigns because women's bodies were used as tools for ethnic destruction. Rape was used in at least four ways for ethnic cleansing. First, women and girls were raped, often in front of their families, to force families and communities to leave. In this case, civilians or paramilitary forces would arrive in a town, rape and pillage—in other words, terrorize a community—then leave, only to be followed a few days later by the arrival of military forces who offered safe passage, sometimes after extorting Muslims' personal property. Second was the random rape of women and girls in concentration camps and in refugee collection camps. Third was the systematic rape of women and girls over extended periods in rape camps located in abandoned buildings, schools, and the like. Torture and death often accompanied the rapes. Fourth was the use of women in bordello-type camps, where women were forced to engage in sexual relations with soldiers returning from the front. Most were murdered afterward.

Rape, however, was also part of a larger strategy aimed at impregnating Muslim women and girls—to literally cleanse them of their Muslim faith and produce Serbian babies. Women, who were held in rape camps until impregnated, were not permitted to leave until after such time that their pregnancies could no longer be aborted.

Conclusion

Ethnic cleansing is an historical feature of state actions that seeks to remove a group from a defined territory on the basis of the group's race, ethnicity, or national origin. The targets have changed over time, but the specific targeting of women and girls as a tool of ethnic cleansing is unique to the 20th century. In the Bosnian genocide, the systematic rape of women and girls for the purpose of forced removal resulted in the international community's recognition of rape and sexual assault as a crime against humanity.

EUGENICS

Eugenics, a term derived from "eugenes," Greek for "well-born," was coined in 1883 by Charles Darwin's first cousin Francis Galton to provide a succinct way of characterizing the science of "improving the stock." This entry will discuss the social and theoretical applications, the main problems, and the resurgence of eugenics.

Social and Theoretical Applications of Eugenics

Drawing upon recent discoveries that showed that Mendel's laws of inheritance could be applied to such human physical traits as eye color, scientists sought to apply Mendelian principles more broadly. If human traits could be sorted into eugenic (good) and bad (dysgenic) ones, then "eugenic science" could be used to frame social policy. The proportion of individuals with good traits could be increased by encouraging "fit" individuals to have more children (so-called positive eugenics) and discouraging "unfit" people to have fewer children ("negative eugenics"). Eugenic thinking was widely embraced, and quickly enshrined both in public policy and in academia in the United States. "Fitter family competitions" were held to encourage the "right people" to reproduce, and sterilization laws were enacted to prevent the "wrong people" from reproducing. By the early 1930s, more than half the states had implemented sterilization laws. More than 30,000 "eugenic sterilizations" had been performed in California.

Scientists were interested in more than merely social applications. Eugenics also had theoretical attractions. It seemed to allow the extension of mechanistic and reductionist principles to even broader swaths of human life. The transformations wrought by industrialization and increased scientific knowledge both fostered eugenicists' confidence in humans' capacity to control "nature" and seemed to vindicate the belief that scientifically based social policy was the best way to achieve progress. If social problems were not relevantly different from more obviously biologically based human diseases and dysfunctions, then they could be addressed in similar ways. Pervasive interference with people's freedom could be justified, and such restrictions could be touted as rational and disinterested. Though eugenicists in the United States had often been the impetus for eugenic policies that were reckless, scientifically flawed, and repressive, it took revelation of the horrors of Nazi eugenics to deflate public support for eugenics in the United States, England, and Germany. (Eugenic sterilization laws remained on the books for more than three decades after the end of World War II.)

Main Problems of Eugenics

As many commentators have pointed out, eugenics has serious internal flaws, not merely politically unpalatable consequences. Three families of problems are especially noteworthy. First, the hereditarian views that early-20th-century eugenicists drew upon were unsound. Patterns of inheritance do not exhibit the simple Mendelian logic that early eugenicists conjectured they did. Most inherited conditions are recessive rather than dominant, so individuals who did not manifest an allegedly dysgenic trait could nevertheless pass it on to their offspring. Because they misconstrued the relationship between an observed trait (or an individual's phenotype) and the individual's potential hereditary legacy (or an individual's genotype), eugenicists' observations and predictions were seriously inaccurate. Second, many of the traits that were taken to be genetic or narrowly biological in origin were not. Often—as was the case with such allegedly dysgenic traits as "feeblemindedness," pauperism, alcoholism, and "drapetomania" (the mental defect allegedly exhibited by slaves who sought to escape)—the traits were not really traits, or biologically based at all, as much as ad hoc inventions or reifications of racial, ethnic, or gender bias. In the early 20th century, many WASP nativists sought to cloak their anti-immigration views in scientifically respectable garb by alleging that there was scientific evidence that supported their claims that the "races" of Eastern and Southern Europe were biologically inferior. But what was adduced was neither scientific nor evidence: Allegations of the inherent "weakness of mind" of non-English-speaking immigrants were often based on such things as poor performance on culturally biased intelligence tests. Similarly flawed reasoning was used to justify claims that African Americans were intellectually inferior or otherwise "defective," and that sexually active nonmarried women were "morons."

Resurgence of Eugenics

Neither popular awareness of the outrages perpetrated by the Nazi racial hygienists nor revelation of the dark history of American eugenics has brought a permanent end to people's enthusiasm for eugenics. Within the past 25 years, eugenic views have experienced a renaissance. This has been facilitated by dehistoricization, distraction, and repackaging: by the dearth of general awareness of the extensive connections between American and British eugenicists and the Nazi scientists who embraced doctrines of "racial hygiene," and because the racism and classism of Progressive Era reformers such as Margaret Sanger have often been deemphasized in favor of scripts that emphasized her feminism. In addition, the rise of genomic medicine and the implementation of profound legal and regulatory changes converged to foster the emergence of what is sometimes characterized as "the new eugenics" or—in Edwin Black's felicitous phrase—"newgenics." (It has also been called "free-market eugenics" and "liberal eugenics.") On the heels of the development of recombinant DNA techniques, in the Diamond v. Chakrabarty decision of 1980, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed for the patenting of forms of life. This paved the way for greater commercialization of biomedical technology. The passage of Bayh-Dole Act in the same year expanded the scope of biotechnology companies' proprietary reach and greatly enhanced their economic and political influence by actively fostering "partnerships" between universities and corporations.

What has emerged in the wake of Chakrabarty and Bayh-Dole is what might be called the "biomedical technology-industrial complex": a deep and far-reaching collaboration between genomic medicine, biotechnology, nanotechnology, industry, finance, and marketing. The scientific implications of the exponential increase in the scope of knowledge are both broad and deep, and the economic implications of the forging of new super-institutions that combine medical, biotechnical, and corporate concerns have been staggering. There has been unprecedented capital investment in research and development, and investors, shareholders, and biomedical researchers (who have morphed into "bioentrepreneurs") have reaped huge profits from the applications of their research. Nor have the conceptual and moral implications of these changes been simpler or more easily comprehensible: There has been widespread blurring of categories in ethics, policy, and law. Both the pace of change and the potential irrevocability of policies that focus on genomic control raise ethical and epistemological questions that are difficult to the point of intractability. Nevertheless, despite unease in the face of increasingly complex regulation and intellectual property laws, increased ambiguities of application and assessment, and uncertainty about further consequences of the implementation of new biotechnologies, eugenics has emerged as a subtext, and eugenic "human improvement" is again being cast as an icon of progress.

Scientists have come to need ever-greater amounts of money to pursue their research. As commentators have pointed out, this has generated serious and systematic conflicts of interest. Scientists have been eager to communicate information about the multitude of new instruments, procedures, and tests they have developed and about their enormous potential to facilitate the prediction and prevention of an increasing range of ills. But the ethos of the market often shapes and sometimes dominates researchers' communiqués. Without always realizing that they have been doing so, many biomedical researchers have silently begun to shade the communication of information into aggressive marketing of their discoveries. The more money they can generate through licensing and patenting fees and collaborations with private industry, the more likely researchers are to be able to secure continued funding. In such a context, the temptation to increase "consumer demand" by making representations that are both hyperbolic and frankly eugenic has often been irresistible: People should avail themselves of the new biomedical techniques, tests, and procedures because, by using them, they can identify their own genetic vulnerabilities and forestall "genetic defects" in their children. Screening and testing are touted as empowering people and enabling them to prevent at least some suffering that would otherwise have been unavoidable. These procedures have thus been represented as progressive and noble. Would-be parents have been subject to enormous pressure to embrace the new technologies as reliable ways to reduce the likelihood that their children will be born with "genetic defects," a notion that rapidly shed its Mendelian past and morphed into the broader and more ill-formed notion of "genetic disease." Increasingly, among the things that parents were urged to test for are slender possibilities of slightly augmented risk of not being healthy in later life, and "defects" that are cosmetic rather than health-related.

Because "newgenics" does not involve centralized state control or overt coercion, many commentators have supposed it to be largely morally unproblematic, if not morally splendid. Many scholars have argued that these commentators have failed to recognize either that this new eugenics embodies much of the scientific naiveté of the old eugenics, or that the uncritical embrace of the rhetoric of progress involves the same hubris: Those who endorse the newgenics have been overconfident in the assessment of the soundness of current knowledge and reckless in their efforts to try to control nature by orchestrating the biological details of human life. Like the old eugenics, newgenics is essentially deterministic, and it paints biology as destiny: The role of environmental factors in trait-formation and disease etiology is deemphasized, and the complexities of gene/gene and gene/environment interactions in human development—things that remain true mysteries—are largely overlooked. Because newgenics has often been defended as consonant with and expressive of individualism and consistent with liberal political ideology, advocates have touted it as expanding the realm of informed individual choice. Eugenic decisions have thus been treated as paradigm cases of prudence and beneficence, and the market has been invoked both as model and metaphor. Newgenics is thus thought by defenders to have escaped the evils of the old eugenics, and its morality has been taken to be self-evident.

Conclusion

Importantly, neither the absence of centralized state control nor the absence of overtly coercive policies of implementation provides grounds for thinking that the new eugenics can evade the charges of coercion and bias that were made against early-20th-century eugenics. As disability scholars and activists have made especially clear, people who embrace eugenic policies cannot finesse profound and pivotal questions about justice, value, and the human good. Once it becomes possible to screen for condition x, x is likely to come to be viewed as a liability, and as a preventable disability. The temptations to devalue the lives of those who have condition x may thus be insurmountable.

It is thus reasonable to worry that individuals who have condition x—because their mothers chose not to screen for x or could not afford to screen for it, because the test was inaccurate, or because the etiology of x proved to be far more complex than people supposed—may become pariahs. It is reasonable to worry whether they will be denied access to medical resources and insurance coverage and that they will have their access to the world of "normal" people and employment impeded. As was true of the old eugenics, economics always looms as subtext. Because the argument can be made that it will be cheaper for "us" to reduce suffering by preventing the birth of those who will suffer impairment or hereditary disease, the allocation of resources to prevention rather than treatment can thus be touted as prudent, progressive, and morally defensible. But, as many scholars and activists have argued, there are good reasons to doubt these claims. What can be learned from studying the "old eugenics" is both that human beings are vulnerable to vicious racial, gender, ableist, and class prejudices, and that they are strongly tempted to cloak such prejudices in the rhetoric of science and progress. Hence, it appears that the differences between the old and the new eugenics are more a matter of style than substance.

Exercise and Fitness

Exercise and fitness are integral components of health for both men and women. The benefits of exercise are well documented. Regular participation reduces the risk of premature death, coronary heart disease, diabetes, and high blood pressure and is important for building and maintaining healthy bones, muscles, and joints. Regular exercise is tied to mental health, including improved symptoms associated with depression and anxiety and overall improved mood. Among adolescents, participation in physical activities and sports even promotes social well-being. Youths who participate in sports are less likely to smoke and use drugs and are more likely to stay in school, have good conduct, and high academic achievement. Physical activity programs also teach, among other valued characteristics, teamwork, self-discipline, and leadership.

Lack of exercise or physical activity, combined with a poor diet, contributes to the conditions of being overweight and obese. Today the federal government estimates, using the body mass index (BMI), that two-thirds of Americans are overweight and a third are obese. These conditions account for more than 100,000 annual premature deaths in the United States. Increasing rates of obesity are observed in all U.S. states, in both sexes, and across all age groups, races, and educational levels. Although rates of overweight persons are higher for men (57 percent vs. 43 percent women), rates of obesity are significantly higher for women (54 percent vs. 46 percent men).

The surgeon general's report on physical activity and health lays out exercise guidelines for the public. It recommends that children and adolescents engage in at least 60 minutes of moderate physical activity on most days of the week, preferably daily, and adults engage in at least 30 minutes. Examples of moderate physical activity include walking, hiking, and yoga. Examples of vigorous physical activity include jogging, bicycling, and most competitive sports. Although greater health benefits can be achieved with longer duration and more vigorous activity, even moderate activity levels can lead to improved health and quality of life.

Despite common knowledge that exercise is good for one's health, most Americans do not regularly exercise. More than 60 percent of American adults are not physically active on a regular basis, and 25 percent of all adults are not active at all. Physical inactivity is more prevalent among women (compared with men), blacks and Hispanics (compared with whites), and individuals of lower socioeconomic status (SES) (compared with those of higher SES). Physical activity also declines with age, declining dramatically during adolescence. Similar levels of inactivity are observed in American youths. Only about 50 percent of U.S. young people, ages 12 to 21, regularly participate in vigorous physical activity, while 14 percent report no recent vigorous or light-to-moderate physical activity. Inactivity is higher among females (compared with males) and among black and Hispanic females (compared with white females). Positive experience with physical activity at a young age is important because it instills the foundation for regular exercise habits throughout life. Physical activity in childhood is a strong predictor of adult lifestyle.

Social structural factors, individual-level variables, and gender socialization can account for varying levels of exercise participation. Social environments play a key role in encouraging or discouraging exercise. Community design centered around the automobile discourages walking and bicycling. Many communities do not adequately provide safe, accessible, and affordable public facilities such as recreation centers and parks. These safety issues notably affect women and young children. Additionally, societal changes in technology—such as the widespread accessibility of television, computer games, and the Internet—promote sedentary lifestyles. Larger institutional decisions also affect exercise opportunities. Across America, states and school districts are reducing the amount of time students spend in physical education (PE) classes—an irony because some report cards are now indicating students' BMI.

Individual-level variables affecting participation include, among others, self-efficacy beliefs, physical illness or ailment, economic constraints, physical tiredness, and lack of time. However, these individual level explanations are sometimes gendered. For example, although exercise benefits everyone, including pregnant and working women, the effects of marriage, parenthood, and employment affect women more profoundly. Research on heterosexual couples indicates that women's second shift takes a more significant toll on her exercise time than it does on her husband's exercise time.

This is closely tied to gender ideology and gender socialization. Traditional gender socialization equates strength and athleticism with men, defining exercise and sport as unfeminine. Sports and physical activities are constructed as manly and are associated with masculinity. Historically, sport and exercise were also thought to exert undue strain on women's bodies and their yet-to-be born children. The implicit assumption is that women's place is in the home as child bearers and nurturers. Today, women's bodies continue to be subject to ongoing surveillance and the hegemonic male gaze.

Gender socialization encourages girls and women to avoid exercise because it is seen as unfeminine. Socialization agents such as parents, teachers, and peers play an important role in reinforcing participation or nonparticipation based on gender views. Given that athleticism is often considered masculine behavior, girls may be deterred from participation because they fear being labeled "dykes." Today, despite the dismantling of traditional gender roles, the opening of doors through Title IX, and the increasing number of popular female athletes such as Kathy Smith (aerobics), Venus and Serena Williams (tennis), and Annika Sorenstam (golf), remarkable gender differences in exercise participation still remain.

Finally, exercise motivation as well as participation is gendered. In a culture that places extraordinary value on women's appearance, girls and women often feel pressure to be thin. Thus, unlike men who exercise for health and fitness purposes, girls and women often exercise to control weight. So exercise and fitness are less about health and enjoyment than they are about changing body shape, weight control, and toning. Anxiety about social physique is a key correlate of exercise for many women. Given the health benefits and improved quality of life associated with exercise, it should be encouraged for all, in an enjoyable manner, regardless of gender, race, or age.

EXTENDED FAMILIES

The shape, purpose, and form of the family continues to be documented and debated, informing social policy, whether that be in policies that legitimize "new" family formations through, for example, the rights of lesbians and gay men to marry, adopt, and access new reproductive technologies, or in measures that supposedly alleviate the dual and gendered burden of combining employment and care. The family is variously represented as a state in crisis, a pessimistic portrayal that often points to the decline of somewhat mythical and romanticized familial ties, duties and obligations, as against the rise of individualism, single-hood, and childless, career-oriented women. In contrast, others view familial changes more optimistically, contesting notions of crisis, replacing such with a sense of positive agency, choice, and transformation as family formations disrupt traditional and endorsed nuclear family ideals. Many researchers have charted the changes to seemingly coherent and completed family units: members can enter and exit post-divorce and individuals may get a sense of who counts as family by combining and explaining across households, time and place, and their own life courses.

The term extended families highlights the changes and challenges to the often still promoted nuclear family ideal, as a difference between rhetoric and reality. Feminist theorists have long problematized the family as a site of gender inequality and exploitation, rather than as a site of social transformation. However, changes in family compositions and practices have resulted in some commentators viewing the extended, indeed ever-extending, family as a potential site of equality and change. Nonetheless, it is important to consider the historically and culturally specific nature of the family compared with supposedly new alterations; the nuclear family unit was created and consolidated via industrialization, as a site of securing labor. Actually, the idealized nuclear family has had a relatively short history.

Demographic figures collected by official bodies such as governments provide an administrative gauge on what families are and the ways that they are changing. Data often reflect, for example, the number of dependent children as well as other dependents, such as grandparents who increasingly and enduringly feature in everyday conceptualizations, even residences, of immediate family as a result of increased life expectancy. Parental separation and repartnering may mean that siblings do not live with their full, biological siblings and may instead co-reside with, for example, step-siblings and stepparents. Such technical facts and demographic possibilities, however, do not in themselves answer the social issues of family formation, the socially constructed nature of families beyond biological facts. The traditional view that blood is thicker than water, that family ties are obvious, inherent, genetic, and more binding than friendship ties is contested by many studies that highlight social bases underpinning relationships. Rosalind Edwards's account explores family transformations and reconstitutions through the eyes of children, revealing the ways in which understandings of the reality, worth, and validity of their family relations differed by degrees of certainty and uncertainty, as informed by social affirmation and denigration of specific family types. Specifically, children still referenced "proper" families—compared with seemingly depleted single-parent families, or excessive, disproportionate extended families, which were both classed and radicalized. An increasingly common phrase that points to more fluid family compositions is that of "families of choice," used by Kath Weston and Jeffrey Weeks, Brian Heaphy, and Catherine Donovan.

Sociological depictions of lives filled with choices, of actors choosing to live the way they want to live outside of traditional nuclear family units, choosing to create autonomous, equal, "pure relationships," are widespread. Studies document the changing expectations of personal and family life, across generations, relationships, households, and the life course. Anthony Giddens's "pure relationship" conveys an optimistic portrayal of family reconstitutions, viewing changes as indicative of the ways that relationships are entered into and exited from for their own sake, free of the constraint of obligation and traditional ties. The pure relationship can be terminated at will, by any participant at any point, and in such circumstances family may be seen to mirror friendship, blurring the lines between the two. Various studies of lesbian relationships have suggested that this group most typically achieves the pure relationship exemplifying new forms of intimacy whereby intimacy is not sought through couple relationships alone but rather through their "family of friends." There may be painful as well as creative reasons why this is so, with familial rejection necessitating the formation of alternative support structures. Replacing biological family with chosen friends may be seen as an extension or an erasure of the family.

Weeks and colleagues explored narratives and experiences of alternative families, using in-depth interviews with 96 self-identified nonheterosexuals in the United Kingdom and suggested that a transformation is underway signified by new families of choice based on democratic, egalitarian relationships. The argument of multiplicity and fluidity in intimate and familial relationships put forward by Giddens and Weeks takes as evidence liberal discourses of greater tolerance and recognition for lesbians and gay men. Many have documented a reorientation of lesbian and gay politics away from issues of sexual liberation and community building toward creating and protecting lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transsexual (LGBT) families, which arguably reinvokes borders and boundaries; a protective, even if extended, "privatized" sphere. Much feminist research contends that intimate relationships still do not transcend structural inequalities and, as such, cannot be thought of as undergoing radical alterations. In reviewing academic research on personal relationships across Europe, North America, Australia, and New Zealand, Lynn Jamieson's account suggests a more complex and contradictory tale of transformations in intimacy. A major criticism of Giddens's work is that much feminist scholarship on gender inequalities within intimate relations and family structures, as relating to wider societal inequalities, is sidelined. Although Giddens talks about sharing thoughts and feelings, a "mutual disclosure" of talking and listening within intimate relationships, Jamieson contends that intimacy can only take on this character if participants can remove social barriers and transcend structural inequalities. Though noting that stories of equality and "disclosing intimacy" may be popular, Jamieson suggests that these are matched by more conventional tales based on gender inequality and conventional heterosexual practices. Thus, reports of transformations in intimacy and increasing queer tendencies may be contrasted with the perpetual dominance of heterosexuality as a disguised and neutral identity and practice, yet one that potentially consolidates gender inequalities and structures other outsider sexualities by their distance from its normative position.

Discourses of resistance and self-invention in contemporary stories of intimacy identified by Weeks may be linked with new reproductive technologies as a form of family-making available to lesbians and gay men. Yet the controversies aroused here demonstrate the gap between creating, even extending, families and choices, as against criticisms of "selling out" to nuclear family norms or, conversely, making a mockery of such "proper," socially legitimated, families. Although such technologies exist on the marketplace, their (unequal) availability raises questions about the commodification of bodies, their component, reproductive parts, and the continued dichotomy between supposedly real, authentic families, heterosexually created, versus "fake" and "bought" families. Practices such as adoption also complicate and clarify the biological and social nature of families and lesbians and gay men's access to such services underscores continued linkages between the family and the marketplace, a relation that exists, but is often disguised and naturalized, in conventional family formations.

Actual family formations may well be changing and extending, encompassing, for example, immediate biological family, grandparents, friends, and stepsiblings, diversified by sexuality, class, and "race." However, extensions in the definitions, practices, and realities of families can still coexist with the promotion of a particular familial ideal. Much research has focused on the demographics and employment patterns of lone mothers. In the United States, there is increasing concern about teen moms, given the country's high standing in Western teenage pregnancy rates: Young women's material and affective locations are often solely examined through this lens. Often the actuality of lone motherhood is seen a problematic one, something to be challenged and added to, whether this be via education, by employment, or in the reinsertion of missing fathers. The absence of gender-binary, supposedly complimentary, role models is often viewed negatively in single-parent and lesbian and gay households, whereby the transmission of resources, responsibilities, and behaviors via the family is viewed as under threat. Families act as important transmitters of resources and values; women in particular are positioned as responsible for caring in as well as providing for the family, given the widespread displacement of the male breadwinner father figure. As families extend across generations, their shifting compositions and memberships may work as an extended burden for women with continued demarcations between good and bad forms of motherhood.

According to Frank Furedi, the current anxieties in child rearing are shaped by changing societal expectations; no longer is a child simply raised, parents are also educators, even chauffeurs, as children are invested in and resourced. Youth is increasingly being extended as young people rely on their families to facilitate transitions to and existence within post-compulsory education. Similarly, dependency may be extended through residing in or purchasing property. Sue Heath and Elizabeth Cleaver explored solo living and social networks among young people, noting eventual long-term desires to settle down and conform to normative expectations of property buying and family building. Alongside developing notions of extended families, families are simultaneously seen as individual autonomous units, which is a major theme of "good parenting"; a form of "individualism-in-action" whereby family responsibilities are prioritized over any public ones. The possibility of being and becoming a "better parent" though seemingly open to all is a classed discourse and strategy. Middle-class parents may give their children as many social and educational experiences as possible for the benefit of later life, framing these as private, family, individual concerns. Those dependent on benefits fall under the gaze of the state. Different family formations are not equally validated and the notions of choice and transformation, suggested by Giddens and Weeks perhaps sit uncomfortably with the classing of choice and forms of delegitimation applicable to certain families. The valued model of self-hood in Western societies, as economically and emotionally autonomous, even efficient and self-disciplined, is culturally specific and profoundly classed. Family extensions and even transformations also require considerations of dual and opposing processes of individualization.

FAMILY, ORGANIZATION OF

American families have undergone tremendous changes since the 1960s. Recent demographic trends—such as increases in cohabitation, divorce, and women's (especially mothers') labor force participation, and a growing cultural emphasis on self-fulfillment—have combined to create a wide variety of family forms. The households and daily lives of contemporary women, men, and children differ considerably from those of previous eras, as a result. This entry describes family formation changes and how they affect work and family life.

Union Formation and Dissolution

Families form in a myriad of ways. The traditional concept of a two-parent home with two children is no longer the most common family structure in the United States. Rather, it is quite common for two unmarried adults to live together (cohabitate) and consider each other a part of the same family. Also, households that consist of a single parent with children, stepfamilies, and gay and lesbian families are in some ways becoming the norm. These changes in family structures and union formation also lead to new complications when it comes to union dissolution. The following section details these changes.

Cohabitation

Cohabitation, where couples live together without being married, used to be quite uncommon and mainly reserved for the poor. Today, most couples who marry for the first time have cohabited before doing so. Cohabitation is even more common before remarriage. Especially for the middle class, cohabitation has become an acceptable state of trial marriage, where couples live together and share financial duties in preparation for married life. Cohabitation is also done in place of marriage. The marriage rate has declined in recent decades, especially among the poor, and the remarriage rate has dropped. The increase in cohabitation largely accounts for these decreases.

Many reasons have been cited for the momentous increase in cohabitation. For those who have never married, cohabitation offers the economic and emotional benefits of household-sharing without the risks of long-term commitment. With the later age at first marriage comes more time to experiment with different options before marrying. Americans are also more accepting of premarital sex than in the past, and this can lower the incentive to marry. Both those who have never married and those who have been divorced are less confident about marital stability, and cohabitation allows them to be coupled without being married.

Divorce

Divorce is also more common than in previous eras. The divorce rate rose particularly from the early 1960s through the 1970s. It has since leveled off, with recent data showing approximately 18 of 1,000 married women divorcing in a year, resulting in a 50 percent lifetime probability of divorce for those marrying today. The increase in divorce has caused a lot of concern and controversy, both in its causes and its consequences.

In reference to causes, the concomitant rise in women's employment is commonly stated. Before the 1960s, women were a distinct numerical minority in the paid labor force. As their numbers grew, so did the likelihood of their financial independence. This removed a previous impediment to leaving unhappy marriages. During this time, the employment opportunities for men without college educations have been declining since the early 1970s. A husband's unemployment is also a risk factor for divorce, so this further contributes to the higher rate (and the greater likelihood of divorce among the poor). In addition, beginning in California in 1970 and since spreading to every other state, divorce legislation became more lenient. Couples can divorce because of "irreconcilable differences," rather than having to blame a spouse for adultery, desertion, violence, or some other allowable "fault."

How Marriage Has Changed

Another likely reason for the higher divorce rate is that marriage itself has changed. In previous eras, marriage was more of a duty to be fulfilled. People married for more practical reasons than in contemporary times and were largely discouraged from divorcing. Male authority largely went unquestioned. The community and the state were united in their support of this normative system.

Marriage today, though largely expected, is not the obligation it once was. Marriages have undergone a shift toward egalitarianism, where people embrace greater flexibility of roles and more open communication about thoughts and feelings. People also feel entitled to be personally fulfilled throughout the course of their marriage. This has increased the expectations of the spousal role. Spouses are expected to be emotionally connected, and to support each other's self-development, to share financial responsibilities, and to remain open to change. Contemporary Americans are likely to have fewer close friends than in previous eras, and increasingly expect their spouses to fulfill that role for them.

Single-Parent Families and Stepfamilies

With the increased expectations of marriage and the relatively high probability of divorce have come increases in both single-parent families and stepfamilies, so that most children spend some part of their childhoods outside of a married-parent family structure.

Single parents are much more likely to be mothers than fathers, although the latter are increasing in proportion. Single parenthood occurs both through divorce and through births to unmarried women. In 2005, 4 of every 10 births were to women unmarried at the time of birth, an all-time high. Many of these women were in relationships, some cohabiting, and some will eventually marry. Change in household and family structure is common, after all, perhaps especially among the poor, who are more likely to give birth out-of-wedlock than other social classes.

Compared with other racial-ethnic groups, African Americans have a higher percentage of households headed by one parent, their rate of marriage is lower, and their likelihood of having children out-of-wedlock is higher. Evidence suggests that African Americans consider their economic situations more than other groups do when determining whether and when they should marry. And African American men in particular have been negatively affected by recent changes in the economy. The movement of manufacturing jobs out of the central city (and out of the United States), combined with an increase in minimum educational requirements for work, have lowered many black men's job opportunities. Black women therefore have less economic incentive to marry in comparison with women in other racial or ethnic groups.

In an effort to increase the marriage rates of the poor, the U.S. government has included marriage promotion funding as part of its ongoing welfare reform package. Major welfare changes began in 1996 with the passage of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA). This law eliminated the former cash welfare system, referred to as Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), replacing it with Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF). Whereas AFDC was an entitlement program, meaning that as long as people met the criteria they would be guaranteed benefits, under TANF, the federal government pays states a fixed amount of money in block grants. As long as families continued to qualify under AFDC, they could receive funds for an unlimited amount of time. There is now a lifetime limit of 60 months, and some states have shorter limits. Also, adult cash welfare recipients are now required to find work within 24 months of receiving assistance.

In addition to encouraging the poor to find jobs, U.S. welfare policy is trying to persuade the poor to marry. In 2006, Congress allocated as much as $100 million a year to activities that promote marriage. Funding recipients include organizations, researchers, and individual states, with allowable activities such as premarital education, marriage skills training, and public advertising campaigns. Supporters of this legislation believe that marriage is good for children and good for society, and that marriage is one path out of poverty. Detractors emphasize structural causes of poverty, such as limited job opportunities, and worry about the potential promotion of unhealthy or violent marriages.

Much research has compared the children of single parents to those living with two married parents, most of it cross-sectional. Single-parent households are likely to have a lower standard of living than are two-parent households; this is related to a higher probability of behavioral and psychological problems in children, as well as lower academic achievement. However, this does not account for all of the difference between the children in these family structures. Parental absence appears to be detrimental: two stable adults in children's lives are better than one. This is why practitioners recommend joint physical custody after divorce, if the ex-spouses get along. Conflict between parents is damaging to children and may be worse than divorce. Major changes are common following divorce, but to the extent that divorcing parents can minimize disruptions in their children's lives, such as moving or the swift introduction of another adult into the household, their children benefit.

Only recently has divorce replaced death as the cause of a marriage ending. Remarriage after divorce, rather than remarriage after widowhood, adds (at least) a third adult into the mix, further complicating the family structure. Though it has been commonly predicted that children in stepfamilies would fare better than those in single-parent families, research findings have shown there to be no significant difference. It appears as though the potential benefits of added income and increased availability of supervision are offset by the challenges of adjusting to having a new parent in the household. The role of stepparent has not yet been institutionalized in U.S. culture, leaving individuals to define it for themselves. As a result, stepparents vary widely in the roles they play for children, with some being much like a parent, others acting more as friends, and still others remaining more distant.

Gay and Lesbian Families

Although most Americans do marry at some point in their lives, gays and lesbians do not have that option. In 2007, one state—Massachusetts—allowed same-sex marriage. However, as of May 2008 the California Supreme Court voted (4–3) to ban marriage discrimination against gays and lesbians. Thus, as this encyclopedia goes to press, California becomes the second state (along with Massachusetts) in the United States to legitimate same-sex marriages through the courts. Three other states—Connecticut, Vermont, and New Jersey—offer civil unions, granting the rights and responsibilities of marriage to same-sex couples without the term marriage. Most states have laws that restrict marriage to those of the opposite sex, and more than half have amended their state constitutions to say so. The Defense of Marriage Act, signed into law in 1996, asserts that the federal government as well as individual states need not recognize a same-sex marriage authorized by another state. Therefore, same-sex couples married in Massachusetts are not necessarily entitled to the benefits of marriage offered by the federal government, or by another state, if they go outside the state boundaries. This also leads to much legal wrangling in the case of union dissolution.

In addition to public commitments between same-sex partners, an increasing number of gay and lesbian couples are raising children, although lesbians are more likely than gay men to do so. This can occur through a number of routes. Some children are born to married parents who then divorce after the mother comes out as gay, with the mother gaining custody. Others are conceived through donor insemination or surrogate motherhood, and still others are adopted, often through the foster care system. Those partners who are biologically related to their children have a legal advantage, in that not all states allow second-parent or stepparent adoption by same-sex partners. Biological parents have the custody edge, for example, when same-sex couples with children want to end their relationships.

Paid Work, Unpaid Work, and Family Life

A major change in family life since the 1960s has been the increase in women's—especially married women's and mothers'—labor force participation. The causes and consequences of this change are numerous. Men have also had to adjust to these changes, which has affected the general makeup of families. The rearing of children has also been affected by changes in labor force participation by both men and women.

Women's Employment

Many economic factors encourage women into paid employment. For one, men's real wages began a sharp decline in 1973. This has encouraged wives to help rescue families financially. There has also been a major shift in U.S. economy from one based on manufacturing to one focused more on services. This means that the kinds of jobs that tend to be more appealing to men have been decreasing in number, whereas the kinds of jobs that appeal to women have become more prevalent. Women have therefore experienced both "push" and "pull" factors in this regard. The second wave of the women's movement also helped increase opportunities for women in the workplace, particularly in more professional arenas. As a result, women are now more entitled to the kind of personal fulfillment that comes with rewarding employment.

Men and Workplaces, in Response

Though the majority of mothers are currently employed, there has not been a commensurate change in men and workplaces in response. Women do spend less time doing housework than in previous eras, but men have only slightly increased their contributions in this regard. It appears as though women have become more efficient at housework, doing more multitasking than before, and have lowered their standards over time. In addition, women continue to be much more likely to shoulder the responsibility for domestic tasks. Much of this work is invisible—planning meals, coordinating schedules, corresponding with family and friends—and therefore, largely unacknowledged. As gender ideologies grow more egalitarian over time, men's contributions will likely continue to increase. However, the management of the household has been seen as "women's work" since the dawn of the industrial era; it is so entrenched in U.S. culture that it will likely be much more difficult to change.

Evidence indicates that fathers are spending significantly more time with their children than in the past, and that men generally want to have an even greater opportunity to do so. But though women do share the breadwinning responsibility with men, most fathers are in the paid labor force. The substantial growth of dual-earner households has not led to such major changes in the workplace, however, as limited parental leave, job flexibility, and child care availability.

The United States is one of a few industrialized countries that does not mandate paid parental leave for its employees. The Family Medical Leave Act, passed in 1993, requires all public employers, and private employers with 50 or more employees, to offer 12 weeks unpaid, job-protected leave for those workers who have worked for an employer for 1250 hours during the last year, and who are ill or need to care for a direct family member (including a newborn child). A significant minority of employees are not covered by even this legislation, however, because they work for private companies with fewer than 50 employees. Evidence shows that even when this leave is offered, it is not frequently taken, most likely because it is unpaid. And though more employers are offering flex-time and the option to do work from home, these options are still relatively rare. The assumption of workers as single earners with homemaker partners remains well established in American workplaces.

Child Care and Parenting

This means that families with children are largely on their own in managing their household and breadwinning responsibilities. Increasing numbers of couples use the option of split schedules, so that one parent is always home with the children. Though this saves money on child care and allows the children the benefits of time with their parents, it can be hard on marriages because of the shortage of time available for communication. Most families use a patchwork of care for their children, combining family care with institutional care, with frequent changes over time. This is true of both preschool-aged children and school-aged ones. The school day and school year do not coincide with the typical worker's schedule, leaving parents to fill in the gaps.

In another contemporary phenomenon, declines in mortality have resulted in more time for grandparent-hood. Grandparents range in the amount of interaction they have with their children and grandchildren. An increasing, though still small, proportion of children live with their grandparents, whether there is a parent present or not. This is more common among the poor, but also occurs after divorce for some middle-class mothers. For the middle class, there is a greater tendency for parents and children to live at a geographical distance from grandparents, resulting in less frequent contact. Grandparents and parents of adult children are likely to provide financial and other assistance regardless.

Styles of parenting are also influenced by social factors. Children in working-class and poor families are likely to be encouraged to fill their leisure time themselves, but more affluent children's time is frequently scheduled in costly structured activities. And whereas middle-class parents promote wordplay and other educational games, working-class and poor parents are less likely to do so. In addition, the latter tend to feel less comfortable with people in positions of authority and model constraint in such interactions, whereas middle-class parents demonstrate comfort, and a feeling of equality with other professionals. This has been said to perpetuate the reproduction of inequality, in that middle class children learn to navigate institutions to their advantage, and generate a sense of entitlement as a result. This adds to the economic resource limitations already experienced by less affluent parents and children.

Conclusion

Family formation, dissolution, and division of work in the United States has always been, and continues to be, profoundly influenced by larger social processes. Contemporary women, men, and children weave their ways through different household types, work, and leisure arrangements throughout their lives, in their ongoing efforts to find balance and fulfillment.

FAMILY LAW

Family law is the body of law that governs the relationships between individuals involved in long-term, intimate relationships. The central relationships of concern are those of parent and child and spouse and partner. Although the law does not create these relationships, legal recognition of some relationships and the corresponding nonrecognition of others have enormous consequences. For example, a woman may give birth to a child and, by virtue of having given birth, she may be recognized as the legal mother of that child. Through specified actions, her legal rights can be terminated and another person may be assigned those rights. This is what happens in adoption. After the adoption is completed, the law recognizes the adoptive parent or parents as the legal parents of the child. The original mother's legal relationship with the child is no longer recognized.

People may establish relationships that closely resemble legally significant relationships, but the law may not recognize those relationships. For example, a person may raise a child and be, for all social purposes, the parent of that child. But the person may not have the legal status of a parent and is therefore, in the eyes of the law, a stranger to the child. In other words, legal status does not necessarily follow from social status.

In any given society, family law reflects both the reality of the human relationships common in that place and time and the ideal relationships the society wants to promote. Thus, current law typically recognizes the status of unmarried fathers as parents (a reflection of reality) but also privileges marital parenthood (a reflection of the ideal marital family). Family law is thus both pragmatic and idealistic and, accordingly, is both influenced by and influences gender relationships. This entry provides an overview of the structure of family law, its connection to primary relations including intimate couples and parents and children, and current trends in family law.

The Structure of Family Law

Historically, U.S. family law has exclusively been a creature of the states. Each state, whether through legislative action or judicial decisions, has developed its own body of law governing the formation, recognition, and dissolution of families. It has been seen as "local" law, with variation among the states deemed to be desirable.

State Versus Federal Law

As the current discussions around access to marriage for lesbian and gay couples demonstrate, family law can vary significantly from state to state. Laws governing entrance into and exit from marriage, the existence of parent-child relationships, entitlement to custody, the treatment of unmarried couples, and so on differ from state to state. The variations in state treatment create complex problems for families who move during family relationships. This variation among the states is not a modern phenomenon. The variation in state law regarding interracial marriages was equally, if not more, profound and endured for a hundred years.

Application of federal law frequently requires assessment of family status. For example, a surviving spouse may be entitled to receive Social Security benefits. For the most part, where family status is relevant to some federal law, family status is determined by reference to state law. Thus, one is a surviving spouse if one would be deemed a surviving spouse by the law of the state in which the couple lived. There is, generally speaking, no federal family law.

One exception to this general rule deserves discussion. As a part of the recent controversy about access to marriage for those of the same gender, the U.S. Congress enacted legislation, the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), that specifies that a marriage between individuals of the same gender will not be recognized under federal law. Thus, although a lesbian couple may be lawfully married under Massachusetts law, federal law prohibits recognition of the marriage and, hence, for the purposes of federal law, the couple is considered unmarried.

Constitutionalization

Within the past 40 years, courts have recognized rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution that establish boundaries for state family law. For example, in 1965, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Connecticut statute that restricted the right of a married couple to use birth control (Griswold v. Connecticut). In doing so, the Court recognized a right to marital privacy. Although the right has a long and well-documented history in family law generally, locating the right within the U.S. Constitution represented a significant development. States cannot easily enact laws that diminish constitutional rights.

That 1967 opinion represented the beginning of a new era in family law. Since then, other rights have been constitutionalized. The courts have considered and limited the ability of states to restrict abortion (e.g., Roe v. Wade, 1973). A separate line of cases has considered the constitutional rights of unmarried fathers. The Court has affirmed the existence of constitutional protections for parental rights, leading to an extensive overhaul of statutes providing for third-party or grandparent visitation. And most recently, many cases around the country have challenged the constitutionality of restrictions on access to marriage.

A distinct body of constitutional law regulates discrimination based on gender. Historically, family law both recognized and cemented specific gender roles within the family. Thus, husbands were responsible for providing economic support and wives were responsible for keeping the home. But changes wrought by modern feminism are reflected in the law. Courts now view gender specific statutes with some suspicion. This does not always advantage women because many aspects of family life, most significantly care of children, are still organized in gendered patterns.

Primary Relationships

Family law is organized around two sets of relationships—those between adults and those between adults and children. The former is primarily characterized by marriage and the latter by the parent-child relationship.

Dyadic Couples

Although subject to feminist critique, marriage can be described as the central organizing principle of modern family law. When a couple enters into a legal marriage, the parties become subject to an extensive web of legal regulations.

Recognition of Relationship

Some of these legal regulations confer benefits on the parties, and others impose obligations. Some of the regulations are optional, and the marrying couple can, at its election, "opt out" of the prescribed arrangement. But other regulations are mandatory and cannot be altered. For example, a married couple must file taxes as a married couple (though the parties can file jointly or separately). Similarly, a surviving spouse receives social security benefits that the parties cannot direct to anyone else. By contrast, in the absence of a will, a surviving spouse typically inherits from the estate, but the parties to a marriage may be able to write wills that direct the resources to others.

Typically, legislatures determine the range of obligations and benefits bundled together in marriage. Inclusion of various provisions is variously thought to encourage marriage, to promote equity, or to reflect social norms regarding how married couples should behave. Often individuals entering into marriage are unaware of the benefits and obligations they will acquire by marrying.

Treatment of unmarried couples in family law has become increasingly important because the incidence of unmarried cohabitation has risen dramatically. Here again, the states are widely divergent. Historically, unmarried couples that were in long-term and seemingly stable relationships were sometimes deemed to be married, via the doctrine of common law marriage. However, since the middle of the 19th century, common law marriage has become increasingly unpopular and is now recognized by a dwindling number of states.

Generally speaking, states profess an interest in encouraging unmarried couples to wed. Marriage is seen as having a stabilizing influence, and it simplifies administrative matters. It is also a bright line rule, at least in the absence of common law marriage. It is not difficult to tell who is married and who is not and therefore on whom to bestow all of the benefits and obligations of marriage.

Legal response to these relationships most frequently occurs at the relationship's end. Where one party to the relationship dies or where the relationship dissolves, a court may be called upon to adjudicate rights to property accumulated during the relationship. This can be particularly important to women at the end of long-term heterosexual relationships because property is often accumulated in the name of the male partner.

Curiously, the desire to encourage marriage may lead courts to treat unmarried couples in dramatically different ways. Thus, one state may completely deny any relief to a party seeking an award of property after the end of a nonmarital relationship, on the theory that in the future, similarly situated parties will be encouraged to marry lest they meet a similar fate. Another state might extend some of the benefits or obligations of marriage to an unmarried couple, on the theory that this might diminish the resistance of the obliged party to marriage because the obligation will arise anyway.

Although states use a great range of approaches, the major divide is between those that treat unmarried couples as though they were in some form of special relationship, therefore entitled to special rules of decision, and those that treat the unmarried couple as though they were no different from any other two people entering into a business relationship. The latter approach relies on the ability of the parties to protect themselves to ensure just results, and the former represents a more paternalistic approach.

Debate About Same-Gender Marriage

Perhaps the most prominent debate in family law today is that over access to marriage for lesbian and gay male couples. Historically, access to marriage has been restricted to opposite gender couples. In the 1970s, the 1990s, and recently, lesbians and gay men have initiated lawsuits aimed at securing access to the right to marry. This marriage movement has been controversial, both within and outside the lesbian and gay community.

Although the earlier efforts were unsuccessful, the current effort has had a more complex result. Notably, in 2004, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court determined that the restriction of marriage to different sex couples violated the Massachusetts Constitution. Beginning in May 2005, same-sex couples in Massachusetts were permitted to marry. In May 2008, the California Supreme Court voted (4–3) to ban marriage discrimination against gays and lesbians. Thus, as this encyclopedia went to press, California became the second state (along with Massachusetts) in the United States to legitimate same-sex marriages through the courts.

In reaction to the Massachusetts court decision, however, a number of states have enacted statutes or constitutional provisions that explicitly limit marriage to between one man and one woman. A smaller number of states have enacted statutory schemes creating new forms of recognized relationships—typically called "civil unions"—that provide some or all of the benefits of marriage under state law to same-gender couples. In general, civil unions are only available to same-gender couples. Different-gender couples are prohibited from entering into civil unions.

Federal law does not recognize marriages or civil unions of same-gender couples. This is important because more than a thousand federal benefits and obligations are formally tied to marriage. Thus, in the event of a death, the surviving spouse may be eligible for a federal pension or social security. This will not be the case for the survivor of a civil union or for the surviving spouse of a Massachusetts same-sex marriage.

The treatment of these Massachusetts marriages is unusual. Overall, the extent to which states are obliged to recognize family relationships created, recognized, or dissolved by other states or choose to recognize them varies. The full faith and credit clause of the U.S. Constitution requires states to give effect to judicial decrees of the sister states. For this reason, a divorce obtained in one state will typically be given effect by all other states. Similarly, an adoption completed in New York will be recognized in all other states, including states that would not themselves finalize the adoption.

Marriage, however, does not involve a judicial decree in the same way, even though a judge may perform a wedding. Thus, many scholars believe that states are not constitutionally required to recognize out-of-state marriages. Actually, states do typically recognize out-of-state marriages as a matter of comity. The notable current exception is marriage that involves individuals of the same gender. Massachusetts alone permits these marriages, but other states will not recognize them. Indeed, recognition is often explicitly prohibited, sometimes by statute and sometimes by the state constitution. Additionally, federal regulation (DOMA) purports to excuse states from any obligation to recognize same-gender marriages validly concluded in other states.

Although this situation creates many practical problems, some of them serious, for same-gender couples married in Massachusetts, it is not unprecedented. For nearly a century, some states permitted interracial couples to marry, but others prohibited interracial marriage and still others criminalized it. As interracial couples traveled within the United States their legal status as married, single, or criminal varied. Although statutes prohibiting private, consensual same-gender sexual conduct have been deemed unconstitutional, it still seems highly likely that for an extended period the status of same-gender couples traveling interstate will vary depending on the state they are in and perhaps on the nature of the rights at issue.

As an outgrowth of the debate about access to marriage, a number of states (including California, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Vermont) recognize a marriage-like relationship, typically called "domestic partnership" or "civil unions." Parties to these relationships receive all or nearly all of the legal rights and obligations imposed by the state on married couples without acquiring the status of being married. The distinction is important for at least three reasons.

First, marriage is a uniquely privileged social institution. Thus, for both proponents and opponents of lesbian and gay rights, the label affixed to the relationship is extremely important. Marriage retains its unique social, cultural, and religious status. For many advocates of access to marriage, civil unions and domestic partnerships are distinct markers of second-class citizenship. Second, the law governing intra-state recognition of marriage is well-developed. The law governing intra-state recognition of marriage-like relationships is virtually nonexistent. Thus, the status of a civilly united couple that travels from New Jersey to Pennsylvania is entirely unclear. Finally, federal benefits and obligations are awarded based on status under state law as "married." No federal consequences flow from the marriage-like relationships. (Of course, for the moment, the federal Defense of Marriage Act prevents the recognition of same-gender marriages, even where legally recognized by a state, as in Massachusetts.)

Parent and Child

The advent and widespread use of assisted reproductive technology (ART) has led to particularly challenging family law cases. Traditional doctrines governing parenthood developed over centuries. ART either requires application of these doctrines in unprecedented (and notably different) settings or the development of new doctrine.

Mothers were, historically, women who gave birth to children. Without advanced technology, the woman who gives birth to a child is also the woman whose genetic material contributed to the creation of the child. The advent of in vitro fertilization (IVF) broke this link. It is now possible that a woman who gives birth to a child does not have a genetic link to the child because the child may have been conceived via IVF using a donor egg. This technology thus required, for the first time, a decision about the importance of two (or possibly three) competing claims of parenthood.

Courts have divided in their approaches to surrogacy. The first critical case was that of Baby M. This case involved "traditional" surrogacy—a woman impregnated with donor sperm, where the sperm came from the man who wished to be the parent of the child. The agreement the parties entered into called for the woman who gave birth to give up the child so that the man's wife could adopt the child and become the mother to the child. During the term of the agreement, the surrogate changed her mind. The New Jersey court refused to enforce the agreement. The parents of the child were, therefore, the woman and the man, not married to each other.

This frustrated those interested in surrogacy, and the logical response was to obtain the egg from another source. Johnson v. Calvert (1993) affirms that when this is done, the intended mother/egg donor or, if there is no single person in that role, the intended mother, has the superior claim to parental status. But although this decision is binding in California and a number of states have similar law, a significant number of states have rejected the practice of gestational surrogacy, at least where the surrogate is paid.

Parental status for men traces a different history. Perhaps most importantly, the law generally begins with a presumption that if a married woman gives birth to a child, the child is considered to be the child of the husband. This presumption dates from the Middle Ages, when parentage was difficult for men to establish. The presumption could only be defeated where the man was proven to be out of the kingdom for at least a year before the birth of the child. Generally, the presumption was invoked against the husband/father to prevent him from challenging the legitimacy of his offspring.

The presumption survives today and is in use in all states, with varying degrees of force. At first blush, this might appear curious, given the present ability to determine with certainty whether the husband is in fact the source of the genetic material. But it remains enormously important because genetic testing is not routinely performed at the birth of a child. Thus, for a married man, his paternity rests on the legal presumption that if his wife gives birth to a child, he is the father of the child.

Given the existence of genetic testing, married men may seek to rebut the presumption through genetic testing, if they choose to do so and if they do so promptly. Thus, the presumption can no longer be used to prevent a married man from challenging his paternity. Instead, it is used by a married man to prevent another man from claiming paternity.

The situation for children of unmarried mothers is quite different. For many years, the child of an unmarried woman was deemed to have no father. Although this is absurd as a matter of biology, it was a correct statement of law. No man had the obligations and rights of a parent.

As social practices changed, two means of identifying the father of a child born to an unmarried woman emerged. One was blood testing to establish genetic linkage. The other was the acceptance of the child into a man's home and the subsequent actions of the man, holding the child out as though it were his own. Either of these might create a presumption of fatherhood on behalf of the man, and hence, oblige him to fulfill the obligations of child support.

Current Trends

For centuries before the 1960s and 1970s, family law was deeply and explicitly gendered. Statutes routinely conferred different rights and obligations on men and women. Courts used presumptions in favor of mothers and against fathers, but in a relatively short time, the principles of gender neutrality gained wide acceptance in law. Thus, statutes were purged of the gendered references to mothers and fathers, replacing them with "parents." Similarly husbands and wives became simply "spouses."

At the same time, gender roles persist quite widely in family law. This is most evident in households with heterosexual couples raising children. Although formal equality may be the rule, it is quite common to find the labor of maintaining the household divided between a homemaker and a breadwinner, or perhaps between a homemaker–part-time worker and a primary breadwinner.

Many forces converge to sustain this division of labor. Raising children, particularly young children, demands a flexible work schedule and, often, a short workday. Typically, high-paying jobs do not provide these features.

Equally important, the division into breadwinner and homemaker is often gendered. Thus, the stay-at-home parent is more typically the mother and the working parent is more typically the father.

This creates a circumstance where neutral rules are applied to gendered reality. The effects are sometimes problematic. For example, despite the excision of gendered language from divorce and custody law, post-divorce women are more likely to be granted more substantial time with the child or children (custody) than are men. Thus, a seemingly neutral rule that applies to custodial parents will have a greater impact on women than on men. A rule, for example, dictating that the custodial parent can only move out of the county with the agreement of the court (because moving will inevitably affect the visitation rights of the other parent) will result in increased judicial supervision of women but not of men. Many perceive this inequality to be problematic.

Conclusion

Much of family law is gendered. The politics of family law, whether in the courts or in the legislatures, often seems to break along gender lines, pitting advocates of father's rights groups against women's rights groups. Furthermore, although the number of unmarried couples, whether of the same or of different genders, has risen dramatically during the past 30 years, marriage remains the model adult relationship. This basis for governing relationships within the law is increasingly challenged by the realities of contemporary couples and families whose circumstances do not fit the normative expectations of traditional marriage.

FAMILY MEDICAL LEAVE ACT

The Family Medical Leave Act (FMLA) was enacted by the U.S. government in 1993. The FMLA guarantees eligible employees who work for covered employers 12 weeks of unpaid leave in a 12-month period. This leave can be taken for the following reasons: (a) to care for a newborn, newly adopted, or foster child; (b) if the employee is needed to care for a spouse, child, or parent with a serious health condition;

(c) if the employee's own serious health condition renders the employee unable to do her or his job. The FMLA is important because it recognizes the reality that employees carry family responsibilities and ties into the workplace. The FMLA is important for gender scholars because patterns of family caregiving are influenced by gender.

One criticism of the FMLA is that not all U.S. employers and workers are covered. Employers covered by the FMLA include all local, state, and federal agencies, and private employers who employ more than 50 employees within a 75-mile radius. Some employers who are not required to by the FMLA have also begun to offer family leave. Covered employers who interfere with an eligible employee's rights under the FMLA are liable for monetary damages and equitable remedies such as employment, promotion, and reinstatement. Workers are eligible for FMLA rights if they have worked for a covered employer for a minimum of 12 months and have worked at least 1,250 hours during the previous 12 months. It has been estimated that half of American workers are not covered because they work for small employers, have recently changed jobs, or are part-time workers.

Unlike in many other countries that provide paid parental leave, leave under the FMLA is unpaid. Some people who would like to take or extend their parental leave find themselves unable to because of economic reasons. This socioeconomic class bias worries some scholars. Additionally, scholars concerned with the unequal amounts of family caregiving between men and women (with women doing the vast majority) point out that men are generally more likely to take family leave when paid. Recently some states have attempted to finance the FMLA leave.

Some ongoing discussions surrounding the FMLA are about the need to expand the coverage and how it is administered. Differing interpretations of the somewhat ambiguous language have led to litigation and the continual redefinition of the FMLA by the courts. Considerable research continues to evaluate the rates of usage by both men and women and their demographic characteristics. Overwhelmingly, research has found that both men and women are more likely to take family leave since the enactment of the FMLA.

FAMILY WAGE

In general, the family wage refers to a wage that is earned in the labor market by one member of the family, usually the father/husband. In discussions of employment, labor, and policy, the concept of family wage has been used to refer to earnings that are considered sufficient to financially support the entire household, typically including a mother/wife and children. The concept of the family wage illustrates the complexities of power dynamics when they involve intertwining structural inequalities—in this case class, gender, and race. These complexities make it difficult for many scholars to conclude precisely whether the family wage is a positive or negative concept because it depends largely on the context and the population to which it refers. This entry describes the relationship between family wage, class, gender, and race and discusses some of the negative and positive aspects of the concept.

Family Wage and Class

From the perspective of organized labor, which has historically argued for such things as an 8-hour workday, protections against child labor, guaranteed working safety standards, and other guarantees against exploitation of workers, the family wage holds a positive connotation. It represents a concept that can be rallied around and for which public support can be leveraged to resist employer attempts to pay workers at wages that are too low to live on. Public support for a family wage to some degree protects workers from employer attempts to lower wages. It also prevents families from having to send other members into the workforce—such as wives and sons and daughters—to earn the wages that the family needs to survive.

Family Wage and Gender

Family wage is predicated on what recent literature on the family has termed the standard North American family (SNAF)—a concept that includes a "standard" assumption of a two-parent, heterosexual, breadwinner–homemaker arrangement with children. As a result, critical analyses of gender and family have raised strong objections to the family wage. For one, it reinscribes or reinstitutionalizes and reaffirms a family model that relegates women to the domestic sphere of the home. Since the earliest days of the feminist movement, well before women's suffrage, feminist scholars have noted that relegating women to the sphere of the home and banning women from the wage-earning potential of the formal labor market is a recipe for disempowering women. This forces a woman to rely on a man for money and trust in his ability to earn and wisely conserve and or invest it. Research indicates that being recognized in the public sphere of the business or work world also brings with it self- and peer-esteem that, in conjunction with earning power, conveys a sense of authority within the household. When fathers are unemployed or employed with meager and or undependable salaries, families tend toward female-dominated and female-centered patterns. Men hold comparably little say about household matters—financial, parenting-related, or otherwise. At the opposite pole, when men are the sole earners, they tend to wield considerable authority and influence in the family, as the popularized terms "the man of the house" and "the man wears the pants in the family" connote. However, when women and men contribute roughly equal earnings to the household, the power dynamics within the family shift toward an egalitarian model.

From a critical gender perspective, the family wage is problematic because of the way it influences within-family dynamics and because of the ways in which it plays out within the workforce. If a family wage is assumed, so is the fact that each family will only have one primary breadwinner and, furthermore, that it will be the man. This reasoning has played out in policy making historically. In many New Deal programs that provided jobs to struggling families to help them survive the Great Depression, only one job was allowed per family. Partly to assist with keeping track of this, and partly because of ingrained biases of implementers that were common at the time, the default was to exclude women categorically and offer these jobs only to men. Following World War II, this reasoning was used to support forcing out women who had assumed jobs in the labor market to assist with the war effort. In this instance, patriarchal heritage and patriotism combined to shame women who resisted leaving jobs—they were portrayed as stealing from a man who needed the job to support his family, and furthermore, likely a man who had served his country as a soldier—thus, another sphere of work was largely closed to women. Given the potential for multiple structural power dynamics to combine forces, feminist scholars—who tend to value equality of opportunity across genders—recognize the inequitable implications of the family wage when applied to real life situations. In the previous cases, for instance, the results clearly alienated women from the labor market because social stigma ensured that few men would support having their wives as the family's sole breadwinner, the terms by which women could be veterans were restrictive, and heterosexism ensured little support for women who decided to remain single or enter a same-sex relationship.

Family Wage and Race/Ethnicity

Another level of analysis reveals that the family wage is not simply a matter of class (as in laborers resisting capitalists) and not simply a matter of gender (as in home and workplace power dynamics of men and women) but is inextricably an issue of race. Being based on a homemaker-breadwinner assumption, the family wage is utterly divorced from the historical experience of most non-white families—particularly that of African Americans. Not permitted to maintain family ties throughout the tenure of slavery, African American families have long faced structural barriers to maintaining a two-parent family, let alone a breadwinner-homemaker arrangement. Following slavery, de facto segregation typically forced both men and women to enter menial labor force positions, and because neither was paid wages that came near to equaling the value of their work, there was little opportunity for most African American families to survive on the single income of one working adult. In the years since, change to this situation has been thwarted by the movement of urban jobs into the suburbs and from the Rustbelt to the Sunbelt just as many African American families were moving from the South to the North to seek better employment opportunities. The resulting spatial and skill mismatch has left African American men disproportionately unemployed in urban centers, further making a family wage unrealistic. Concurrent with this lack of jobs, a criminalization of black men has further hindered the possibility for breadwinner-homemaker households because fear of black men, stereotyped as dangerous and incorrigible, has deterred employers from hiring them. Given these structural conditions the family wage is undermined and its power dynamics are reversed such that women can more easily find jobs and thus they are in a better position to be breadwinners than are men.

Other non-white ethnic groups also find the family wage concept problematic as it has been historically applied. For instance, with certain ethnic Latino and Asian families, the labor market niches that have been open to them have forced both genders into menial labor, leaving neither with a sufficient salary to be the sole breadwinner in a family wage household. Given these general patterns, however, there are always exceptions, and the family wage concept is itself largely an exception to the rule. Even among white families historically, only the minority have been able to survive on the wages of a sole earner.

Among all families, across ethnicities or races, it is also misleading to assume that wage earning is the only work needed to support a family. Social theorists dating back as far as Marx and Engels have realized that the wage earned in the labor market is only one part of the production and reproduction equation among families. Feeding, clothing, and nurturing the family and tending to the needs of the home and children, work often done by women, are indeed crucial to producing rested and nourished workers for the labor market and for reproducing society and the future workforce in general by raising competent and productive children. Several nations in concert with the United Nations have recently begun enumerating such unwaged labor to bring attention to its importance. Given the vast social dependence on unwaged labor, another critical flaw of the family wage system becomes visible. During efforts to secure higher wages by appealing to the ideal of a male-secured family wage, labor activists may have overlooked the value of the historically female side of the equation. As a result, the ideological construct of the family wage, in failing to explicitly acknowledge unpaid care work, has colluded with modern and feminized notions of dependence that consider any individual who earns a wage to be independent and any individual who relies on the wage of another to be dependent. This demarcation has fostered the devaluation of dependents—most often women and children—as nonproductive members of society and less than full citizens, and has been used to justify the meager assistance programs to those considered "dependent," such as mothers' pensions programs and its more contemporary descendents Aid to Dependent Children (ADC), Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), and now Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), commonly referred to as welfare. Such programs have historically failed to bring their recipients above the poverty level and have stigmatized them as lazy, presenting a stark contrast with upper-tier social programs such as social security, which was initially patterned on the assumption of a male breadwinner–female homemaker family structure and which carries higher levels of support and virtually no stigma.

Conclusion

Given the problematic aspects of the family wage concept when inspected from angles of class, gender, and race, it is not surprising that it has failed to acquire a universal and sustained following. Although the family wage holds potential as a useful tool in struggles of workers to ensure decent wages from their employers, it is also divisive in that it is rooted in patriarchy and borne of a limited white experience that does not resonate with the experience of other racial and ethnic groups in the United States. Furthermore, in recent years, the fundamental base of the family wage, that of the two-parent, breadwinner-homemaker family, has eroded. In reality, this structure was only the dominant family structure for a brief time—from about 1900 through about 1970. Before that time, two-parent farm families were the most common arrangement, and since then dual-earner and single-parent families (i.e., all adults in a family working) have constituted the majority. Given the problematic aspects of the underlying conceptualization of "family" in the family wage, popular support has recently shifted toward a similar concept—that of the "living wage." Similar to a family wage, a living wage generally ensures that anyone working a 40-hour workweek will earn enough to afford housing and be able to keep a family of four above poverty. With the living wage, unlike with the family wage, no assumption is made about who is receiving this wage: mother, father, or nonbiologically related family contributor.

FATHERHOOD MOVEMENTS

Fatherhood movements have evolved in response to unprecedented changes in family demography and the "family values" debate that centers on the issue of family structure. These changes include the increase in unwed childbearing and divorce and their impact on the role of fathers in children's lives. In the 1990s, a grassroots fatherhood movement, and then a marriage movement, emerged in the United States. Movement participants strive to improve child well-being by strengthening fatherhood, improving the quality and stability of the institution of marriage, and reducing unwed childbearing and divorce rates. Fatherhood movements encompass a wide ideological spectrum from conservative, anti-feminist, "father-power" groups, to pro-feminist "responsible fathers" groups.

The current separation of U.S. fathers from their children is historically unprecedented. In 1960, father-absent families numbered 10 million in the United States; today the number stands at 24 million. For the first time, according to the 2000 U.S. Census, less than a quarter of the nation's households are made up of married couples with children. The U.S. divorce rate more than doubled between 1965 and 1980 and remains the highest in the world; an estimated 40 percent to 50 percent of all marriages now end in separation or divorce, affecting more than 1 million children annually. There has also been a dramatic upsurge in unwed childbearing: After remaining below 5 percent for decades, the proportion of births that occurred out of wedlock rose 600 percent from 1960 to 2000. Single-mother families constitute 7 percent of all households and grew at a rate five times faster than that of nuclear families during the 1990s. The proportion of unwed births has begun to plateau at record annual highs of 1.3 million and 33 percent respectively, and births to unmarried parents have now overtaken divorce as the primary cause of father absence. Research indicates that unmarried fathers, through divorce or unwed fathering, tend over time to become financially and psychologically disconnected from their children. Approximately 40 percent of children in father-absent homes have not seen their fathers in at least a year, and more than half of all children who do not live with their father have never been in their fathers' homes. This entry describes various types of fatherhood movements.

Father-Power Movements

Fueled by conservative writers such as David Blankenhorn, David Popenoe, and Barbara Defoe Whitehead, proponents of "father-power" have criticized changes in attitudes toward divorce, premarital sex, and unwed births as responsible for family breakdown and believe that the future of fatherhood is highly dependent on the future of marriage. The intellectual roots of the father-power movement go back to the conclusions of the 1965 Moynihan Report, in which then U.S. Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan argued that single-mother families are the principle cause of what he described as an economic and social crisis in the African American community.

Don Eberly and Wade Horn's National Fatherhood Initiative (NFI), funded by large federal grants during President George H. W. Bush's administration, has dominated the father-power movement since the early 1990s. The foundational beliefs of the NFI are as follows: (a) fathers make unique and irreplaceable contributions to the lives of children, (b) father absence produces negative outcomes for their children, (c) societies that fail to reinforce a cultural ideal of responsible fatherhood get increasing amounts of father absence, and (d) widespread fatherlessness is the most socially consequential problem of the time. The leading indicators the NFI uses to measure the progress of the father-power movement include the proportion of Americans who believe all children deserve fathers, the proportion of children whose fathers are legally identified, the proportion of fathers who support them financially, the proportion of fathers who regularly spend time with their children, and the proportion of children who spend their childhood living with their two, married parents.

Fathers' Rights Groups

Fathers' rights groups want to increase father-power by fighting for legal shifts that favor fathers, including major reforms in divorce, support, and custody laws. These groups argue that single-parent families (meaning mother-only families) have produced decades of child poverty, delinquency, and crime. Fathers' rights advocates argue that the family court system is responsible for the lack of two-parent families. Fathers' rights groups are active in efforts to reform no-fault divorce laws and argue for measures such as extending waiting periods for divorce, requiring counseling for troubled marriages, and, in cases of contested divorce, ending or restricting the right to divorce on demand and promoting covenant marriages. Many fathers' rights advocates want to link Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) to marital status in an effort to build barriers to divorce. These advocates argue that, to qualify for welfare benefits, recipients should be married or attempting to solidify their relationship.

Fathers' rights proponents also want to lower or remove child support awards. They are fighting across the United States for states to cut their guidelines for minimum child support payments and to exempt fathers from paying child support when joint custody is awarded even if children live with their father less than 50 percent of the time. These proponents want to reverse the current requirement that fathers register their employment in court documents and the automatic imposition of wage garnishment. Proponents advocate child support "arrearages" that recognize unemployment, layoffs, and illnesses as reasons for nonpayment. Proponents also aim to reverse recourse to imprisonment, suspension of professional licensing, and suspension of the license to drive for nonpayment of child support as a violation of their constitutional rights. Fathers' rights groups are against the use of private collection agencies in the collection of child support and against data-sharing computer systems that states use to track people who owe child support.

Currently, about 1 million children are affected by divorce in the United States each year. In 72 percent of cases with a formal written agreement, mothers retain sole custody. Fathers receive sole custody in 9 percent of cases, and courts award joint custody in 17 percent. Fathers' rights groups support presumptive joint physical custody, regardless of the history of care, and actively fight against the primary caretaker rule, which rewards past care and concern for children. Fathers' rights groups argue that although "primary caretaker" theory may be formally gender neutral, in practice it privileges "mothering" and ignores "fathering." Fathers' rights groups fight against any interpretation of the "best interest" of the child that excludes the father, children's visiting centers that are used as instruments to marginalize fathers, weight given to children in custody determinations, and the obligation to employ a lawyer for divorce proceedings.

Fathers' rights groups fight current divorce, custody, and support policies around the country. They want to increase fathers' power by insisting on settling family conflicts outside of court, relying on family mediation rather than adversarial means, and supporting "friendly parent" rules. These groups want to increase protected child exchanges, free access to genetic testing to determine paternity, and the "permission to move" law that redefines relocation as a change in the principle residence of a child "30 miles or greater from the child's current principle residences." Many fathers' rights advocates also argue that the spouse filing for divorce must be regarded as the one willing to abandon the children to the other parent and want to punish "false" accusations of child or spouse abuse with imprisonment for felonious perjury. Fathers' rights advocates insist that many domestic violence charges are false and should have no impact on child custody determinations even if proven true. They oppose the Violence Against Women Act (2005) and the Child Support Enforcement Act (1975), believing both Acts are unconstitutional and primary weapons in the "war against fathers."

Additionally, fathers' rights groups support expanding claims of parental alienation syndrome (PAS), a condition allegedly brought about by parents—usually mothers—who alienate their children from the other parent. PAS is not recognized by the American Medical Association or the American Psychological Association. Regardless, fathers' rights groups are using the term in court to switch custody to fathers, eliminate or reduce child support payments, and discredit charges of abuse. A national PAS foundation, funded by federal grants, has been established in Washington, D.C., with an advisory board composed of people connected to the father-power movement.

Christianist Fathers

Fundamentalist Christianists want to increase father power by preserving the heterosexual nuclear family. Since President Ronald Reagan's administration, fundamentalist Christianists have been mounting attacks on programs that promoted women's rights, welfare rights, and gay rights as the cause of the "breakdown of the American family." The Christianist "pro-family" line selectively uses social science and economic arguments to promote marriage as a cure for myriad social and economic problems and to argue that many social ills—for example, teen pregnancy, drug abuse, suicide, poor academic achievement, and low self-esteem—can be attributed to children not being raised in heterosexual nuclear families.

Christianist groups such as Marriage Savers and Promise Keepers campaign for male supremacy and have attracted millions of men during the last 15 years; much of their rhetoric centers on the idea that a "bad" woman is a woman without a husband. These fathers work through their houses of worship and rely on the Bible to make their case that "God hates divorce." They want more faith-based marital enrichment programs and communitywide ecumenical policies aimed at strengthening marriage and reducing divorce. The Promise Keepers and other religious-based fathers' organizations are against women's rights, abortion, gender equity, and homosexuality. The Promise Keepers want men to "take back" their role as head of the household and want their spouses to submit to them as they submit to the Lord.

Critiques of Father-Power Movements

Critics of father-power movements are concerned that promoting marriage may inadvertently increase domestic violence, contribute to the re-stigmatization of single mothers and their children, divert resources from custodial mothers and children to noncustodial fathers (e.g., welfare-to-work funds), erode the legal status of custodial mothers as they face new conditions (e.g., changing custody laws in state courts), and increase the requirements for low-income mothers receiving public assistance (e.g., cooperating in establishing paternity).

All of these concerns are particularly salient in situations involving impoverished women and domestic violence. The number of female-headed families in poverty increased to 3.6 million in 2002, from 3.5 million in 2001; the poverty rate for these families was unchanged from 2001, at 26.5 percent. Among children younger than age 6 living in families with a female householder and no spouse present, 48.6 percent were living in poverty, five times the rate of their counterparts in married-couple families (9.7 percent). Custodial mothers are 44 percent more likely to live in poverty than are custodial fathers. Despite these vulnerabilities, fathers' rights groups have succeeded in reducing the legal protections available to mothers who are victims of violence; they have also lessened the legal sanctions imposed on fathers who are perpetrators of violence by discrediting mothers who make accusations of domestic violence or child abuse in divorce and child custody hearings. Fathers' rights groups respond to the issues of domestic and sexual violence from the perspective of the perpetrator. When they acknowledge men's violence against women and children, they tend to blame the violence on unfair family laws.

Increased paternal involvement does not automatically mean improved child outcomes, nor is it clear that biological fathers provide nurturance so unique that substitute caregivers cannot provide it. A review of recent research studies of two-parent families found the ratio of mothers' to fathers' contribution to be 10:1 in responsibility for a child's daily activities, 2:1 in availability, and 3:1 in parent-child interactions. Researchers have also found that compared with their wives, husbands do relatively little domestic labor of any kind. Despite the powerful stereotypes working against fathers, they are more successful in child custody disputes than is commonly believed. For example, a Massachusetts gender bias task force recently found that fathers receive primary or joint custody in more than 70 percent of contested cases. And, unfortunately, abusive fathers are far more likely than are non-abusive parents to fight for child custody, withhold child support, and kidnap children.

Many interpret the pro-marriage and pro-fathers' rights groups' family-first rhetoric as an anti-woman, anti-equality message. Critics are concerned that the goals of ending domestic violence and winning gender equality directly conflict with father-power movements. Recent congressional fatherhood bills argue that "fatherlessness" is the "most consequential social problem we confront" but ignore evidence that the presence of consistent, loving caregivers is more important in a child's development than the number, sex, or marital status of the caregiver(s). Many women fear that pro-marriage, anti-divorce, pro-fatherhood advocates interpret women's independence and resistance to patriarchy as a culture of family destruction. Feminists are concerned that the notion of marriage as a solution to poverty is closely tied to right-wing initiatives in Congress to cut aid to women and children.

Responsible Fathering Movements

The fragile-families movement addresses the unique needs of low-income fathers, many of whom are young, never-married, and contending with multiple problems, including racism, poor education, and joblessness.

Low-Income Fathers

Ronald Mincy of Columbia University developed the term fragile families to designate a family formed when a child is born out of wedlock to young, disadvantaged parents. Within the fragile-families framework, the child, resident parent, and nonresident parent are viewed as a single unit, as a family. The fragile-families perspective finds that traditional welfare policy, child support enforcement laws, and public housing policies push young unwed parents apart because policymakers develop policies with middle- and upper-income traditional family formations in mind. Mincy and Hillard Pouncy argue that assistance programs must be reformed so that low-income families in which fathers want to be involved will not be penalized. Securing jobs for low-income fathers is critical, and Mincy and Pouncy argue that child support orders must be flexible and made within the father's means.

Incarcerated Fathers

The incarcerated fatherhood movement responds to the needs of the more than 2 million U.S. prisoners. Approximately 93 percent of prisoners are men, and, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, 55 percent of prisoners have minor children (with an average age of 8). Almost 1.5 million children, roughly 2 percent of all children, have a parent in prison, and that parent is nearly always a father. By some estimates, 10 million children—one in seven—will, at some point during their childhood, have an incarcerated father. Most fathers in prison have not seen their children since entering prison.

Incarceration harms family ties. In several states, such as Pennsylvania and Missouri, the Department of Corrections has created and implemented fatherhood programs with the idea that they will reduce recidivism rates. Many communities around the United States have started fatherhood programs for fathers leaving prison that facilitate weekly support groups where they can seek assistance with job training, education, counseling, and parenting skills. InsideOut Dad is an example of a peer-led, incarcerated fathers' program that offers inmate's communication skills and fathering techniques to foster positive father-child relationships. Many believe that one way to improve fathers' relationships with their children is not to imprison fathers for nonviolent, minor offenses in the first place.

Gay Fathers

There are gay fathers organizations in most states in the United States and in many countries around the globe. Most gay fathers have children from former heterosexual relationships, and others are gay fathers through adoption or foster parenting. Between 6 million and 10 million children of lesbian, gay, and bisexual parents are currently living in the United States; one-fifth of gay male households have children. The goals of gay fathering organizations are to provide support and a communication network for gay fathers so they know their parenting rights, to encourage cooperative action in promoting the common interests of gay fathers, to sponsor activities that present a positive image of gay fathers, and to encourage acceptance of alternative parenting within communities. A growing body of scientific literature demonstrates that children who grow up with one or two gay or lesbian parents fare as well emotionally, cognitively, and socially as do children whose parents are heterosexual. Children's development appears to be more influenced by the quality of the relationships and interactions within the family system than by the particular structural form it takes.

Stay-at-Home-Fathers

A stay-at-home father is the primary caregiver of his children. This arrangement was almost unknown in Western countries as recently as 25 years ago. Many stay-at-home fathers make the decision to become a househusband for economic reasons: Often his spouse out earns him, and these families find that it makes economic sense for the parent who earns less to quit her or his paid work to care for their children. A 2003 U.S. Census report estimates the number of stay-at-home fathers who were not in the labor force for the previous 52 weeks is 1 million. Only 16 percent of these fathers (about 160,000) left the labor force to care for home and family, and 45 percent reported being ill or being disabled. Since industrialization occurred in the United States, when fathers left the home for paid work, child-father contact has typically been minimal. However, in developing nations, male members of families have long had considerable roles in child care.

International Fatherhood Movements

The international fatherhood movement is often couched in religious fundamentalist terms and found, for example, in the Taliban in Afghanistan. It is considered a patriarchal backlash against political, economic, and educational gains women have made worldwide.

Religious Fundamentalism

Patriarchy has reinforced fatherhood by placing restrictions on women's bodies and how women are allowed to live their adult lives by restricting voting rights, women's sexuality, and entry to education, jobs, and private property.

Paternity Leave

Paternity leave outside of the United States in other industrialized countries is quite generous. In Germany, companies are required by law to give all employees as many as 3 years parental leave and guarantee their jobs on return. In Denmark, new fathers are allowed 34 weeks of paternity leave. In Sweden, "papa leave" has been around more than 30 years; a couple can take as much as 13 months off work between them and be reimbursed 80 percent of their pay. The leave can be used in a block, can be transferred between parents, or taken over time before the child is eight.

Two Biological Fathers

Around the globe, there are vastly different notions of what fatherhood means. Anthropologist Stephen Beckerman and his colleague Roberto Lizarralde studied how fatherhood is understood in non-Western cultures. In the Bari tribe of Venezuela, in many indigenous groups across South America, and in many other cultures across the globe, Beckerman and Lizarralde found that babies can easily have more than one biological father. The Barí, for example, believe that the first act of sex, which should always be between a husband and wife, plants the seed. Then the fledgling fetus must be nourished by repeated anointings of semen not necessarily from a woman's husband. In the Barí system, when a man is named as a secondary biological father, he is also placed under an obligation to the mother and the child and expected to give gifts of fish and game. Beckerman and Lizarralde found that secondary fathers were involved in 25 percent of pregnancies, and that women were less likely to have a miscarriage or stillbirth, and the children were more likely to survive to their teens, if they had both a father and secondary father contributing food. The Barí and others show that the idea of fatherhood is fluid. As Beckerman says, "One of the things this research shows is that human beings are just as clever and creative in assembling their kin relations as they are putting together space shuttles or symphonies."

Conclusion

Fatherhood movements have progressed along parallel tracks. "Responsible fathering" groups are embraced by many women who welcome sharing the responsibilities of raising children with biological fathers. On the other hand, "father-power" groups fighting to "take back" their families have generated many concerns. Critics of father-power groups worry about increasing violence against women in families and decreasing women's and children's economic position. The current dominant ideology of marriage is that of the companionate marriage but this masks marital power differences. And, the "new father" is more fiction than fact—only a few studies report increases in paternal involvement in recent decades.

Fatherhood may be on the social agenda in the United States, but all the "consciousness-raising" of the fatherhood movement has not produced much change in the composition of U.S. families: Currently approximately 4 of 10 children are growing up without a father in the home, which is the same as a decade ago. Fatherhood movements have emphasized the importance of fathers' rights over their children but have had little to say about their financial obligations. During the past decade, fathers' rights groups have successfully purged the phrase "deadbeat dad" from the political lexicon by arguing that it is demoralizing. The facts, however, are less forgiving. Approximately 60 percent of poor children do not get child support that is owed them and approximately 85 percent of those who do not pay are fathers.

FEDERATION OF SOUTH AFRICAN WOMEN

The Federation of South African Women (FEDSAW) was founded in 1954 by two members of South Africa's Communist Party, Ray Alexander, a trade union leader, and Hilda Bernstein, a member of the Johannesburg City Council. Established as a broadly based multiracial women's organization focused on issues that affected women, it grew to become one of the most important anti-apartheid organizations in the middle part of the 20th century.

As part of a broader coalition of anti-apartheid organizations, namely, the Congress Alliance, the inaugural conference of FEDSAW was strongly supported by a broad range of anti-apartheid organizations, including the African National Congress Women's League and several trade unions. Founded initially as an individual membership organization, in time FEDSAW became a federation of affiliate organizations.

At FEDSAW's inaugural conference, a Women's Charter was adopted. Although feminist in its orientation, the charter focused on the conditions of the oppressed black majority in South Africa. The charter demanded a range of civil and political rights, including the right to vote, and equality in relation to marriage, children, and employment. The charter did not only confine itself to apartheid laws, but also condemned indigenous laws that discriminated against African women, denying them equality in many areas of life. The charter also called for a range of economic and social rights, including the right to education and child care. The rights called for in the charter were incorporated into the Freedom Charter, adopted by the Congress Alliance in June 1955.

The burden of poverty and government-sanctioned repression was a central concern of the organization. One of the most renowned and successful activities of FEDSAW was a 20,000-strong women's march on the Union Buildings, the administrative seat of government, in Pretoria on August 9, 1956. Alexander and Bernstein, who had been banned by the apartheid government just before the march, were not allowed to attend any gatherings. The leaders of the 1956 march were Lilian Ngoyi, Rahima Moosa, Sophie Williams, and Helen Joseph. They, and women such as Amina Cachalia and Francis Baard, became some of the most prominent anti-apartheid activists. A phrase from a protest song, "You have struck the women, you have struck a rock," coined during the 1956 march, became synonymous with South African women's struggle. To commemorate the remarkable stand taken by the women of FEDSAW, August 9th has been designated the official Women's Day in South Africa.

FEDSAW continued to conduct massive campaigns of resistance to apartheid laws, particularly the hated pass laws, but in time came under tremendous pressure when the African National Congress and other political organizations were banned. Many of FEDSAW's leaders were banned, jailed, or forced into exile. Some attempts were made to revive FEDSAW in 1983, but because of the widespread political repression at the time, FEDSAW was not re-launched until 1987. Continuing its tradition of political protest, FEDSAW was active until South Africa's first democratic elections in 1994. Many FEDSAW members went into government and the bureaucracy; however, the organization is now defunct.

FEMALE CIRCUMCISION/ FEMALE GENITAL MUTILATION

Female circumcision or female genital mutilation refers to a variety of practices that involve the removal of girls' and women's prepuce, clitoris, labia minora, and labia majora. The terms female circumcision and female genital mutilation require some explanation so that readers understand the complexity of the different kinds of procedures and the diverse responses to these practices. The debate regarding the use of these terms reflects different understandings and approaches to changing the practices that affect millions of girls and women each year.

Proponents of the term female genital mutilation claim that these procedures disfigure women and girls. Medical and health care practitioners distinguish between three general types of female genital mutilation: Type I (clitoridectomy), the removal of the prepuce and part or all of the clitoris; Type II (excision), the removal of the prepuce, the clitoris, and part or all of the labia minora; Type III (infibulation), the removal of the prepuce, the clitoris, the labia minora, and the labia majora. Technically, the term female circumcision, or clitoridectomy, describes the removal of the clitoris. In practice, however, women and girls may have parts of their genitalia removed that would not place them unequivocally in one category or another. Medical and health care professionals overwhelmingly refer to all three types of female genital removal under the umbrella term female genital mutilation. In addition to the medical community, many human rights organizations and grassroots activists use the term female genital mutilation to highlight these practices as an example of violence against women and, therefore, a human rights violation.

The term female circumcision, and an alternative term, female genital cutting, are used among educators and activists who are critical of both the practice of removing part or all of girls' and women's genitals, and the ways in which the debate is framed within academic and activist communities. Those who use these terms rather than female genital mutilation do so in the spirit of advocating women's empowerment and female agency. These activists argue that describing some women and girls as mutilated implies a normalized female body, and they are particularly sensitive to problems of ethnocentrism that may arise when the critiques of these practices are espoused by those who have not been cut. Educators and activists who use the term female circumcision fear that embedded within critiques of the practice by those who use the term female genital mutilation is an implication of superiority of women from cultures that do not practice female genital cutting. Moreover, these activists argue that the term mutilation diminishes women's power as subjects when their altered genitalia establish them as objects of victimization.

There are many responses to the practice of female circumcision/female genital mutilation. Those who make use of either term may advocate the abolition of the practice and deem it a form of violence against women. Understanding the complexity of the debates on female circumcision/female genital mutilation is germane to increasing knowledge about the gendered societies in which we live and using that knowledge to improve women's lives across the globe. This entry places the practices in historical and cultural context, then discusses responses to the practices of female genital mutilation.

Female Circumcision/ Female Genital Mutilation in Historical and Cultural Context

There is no definitive explanation about the origin of female circumcision/female genital mutilation. Modest evidence traces these practices to select societies in Africa and the Middle East. However, locating its genesis is not as useful an endeavor for understanding its implications as is one that situates its significance in historical and cultural context. For example, one circulated argument is that the origin of these practices is tied to Islam. In addition to being incorrect (these practices preceded Islam), this assertion is problematic because it does not explain why many Muslims do not circumcise women and girls or why members of other religions circumcise their female population. Another example that demonstrates why an origin-based approach is problematic is the occurrence of these practices in the United States. The increased numbers of migrants in the United States performing female genital cutting (particularly on minors) prompted the inclusion of criminalizing these practices in a 1996 immigration law. Yet migrants did not introduce female genital cutting to America. Women in the United States were subject to clitoridectomies in the 19th century by the medical establishment because it was thought to be a cure for hysteria.

Female genital cutting practices may be found in many different societies and are often justified as necessary to satisfy cultural customs, religious rituals, or social mores. Girls may be cut as early as infancy or as late as adulthood. In many cultures, girls' genitals are cut as a prerequisite for marriage, to ensure virginity, and because it is believed to be aesthetically pleasing (girls and women are deemed unclean or dirty if they are not circumcised). Girls and women who are not cut may not be allowed to prepare food or marry, which may result in grave implications for their livelihood in societies that restrict women's ability to work or own property. Information gleaned from scholars, activists, and health care professionals shows that women are overwhelmingly the ones who perform female circumcisions. The circumciser may be a relative, a community member, or a medical practitioner. This position carries with it a great deal of power because the circumciser transforms girls and women into culturally acceptable females in societies that practice female genital cutting.

Responses to the Practice of Female Circumcision/ Female Genital Mutilation

The position that has gained the most currency among global debates about female circumcision/female genital mutilation is one of abolition. Those who are at the forefront of advocating the abolishment of these practices are medical and health care professionals and human rights activists. Another viewpoint that has far fewer supporters is the cultural relativist position. The term cultural relativist is mostly used by critics of cultural relativism, such as human rights activists, rather than by those who hold the position. Cultural relativists argue that societies that circumcise women and girls should not be criticized by those outside of those cultures because to do so would be ethnocentric. This position contrasts starkly with a human rights approach that advocates the abolition of these practices based on a universal right to be free from violence.

Medical Responses

Medical and health care professionals argue that all forms of female genital cutting cause severe physical and mental health problems that most women who have been cut endure throughout their lifetimes. The World Health Organization (WHO) has been the leading health care institution to advocate an abolitionist position on female genital mutilation. Health-related problems include infection, septic shock, transmission of HIV/AIDS, infertility, and death. Many circumcisions are performed under unhygienic conditions. Circumcisers often use the same instrument (which most often is not sterile) on numerous girls or women, which can lead to the spread of HIV/AIDS and other infections. Circumcisers may also suture girls and women too tightly, causing them to go into septic shock if they cannot pass urine or menstrual blood. Long-term problems with infections may also cause infertility in circumcised women. Sexual intercourse may be painful and cause excessive bleeding, which leads to the increased risk of HIV/AIDS transmission. One consequence for many women who are cut is the inability to have an orgasm. Women who are raped or give birth may be sutured again by either a circumciser or a health care professional. Without proper medical care, female genital mutilation may have lifelong debilitating affects for those who are cut.

Some medical practitioners argue that if girls and women are going to be cut, the procedure should be performed by trained professionals to decrease health-related problems associated with the practice. Overwhelmingly, however, medical and health care professionals do not support this position and instead advocate for the abolishment of all forms of female genital mutilation. Although the primary focus of the health consequences of these practices is on women's and girls' physical health, evidence from the medical community indicates that girls and women suffer post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and other mental health problems throughout their lives as a result of being circumcised.

Female circumcision is sometimes compared with male circumcision in the context of genital altering rituals that affect both women and men. The problem with this comparison is that it situates these practices as though they are equal, thereby diminishing the focus on the specificity of harm that circumcised women, but not men, experience.

Human Rights Responses

Human rights activists include grassroots members who work for change within their countries and members and employees of organizations that undertake this issue as a human rights abuse. Human rights organizations underscore the eradication of these practices as necessary for ensuring women's human rights. A human rights approach to female genital mutilation is one that views these practices as tantamount to torture. The primary goal of many human rights groups is to create change by making demands on nation-states. This approach entails pressuring governments to criminalize the practice and prosecute the practitioners through laws that make all forms of female genital mutilation illegal. In addition to campaigning for legal changes, human rights activists, particularly those at the grassroots level, educate communities that practice female genital mutilation about its medical consequences and encourage community members to alter their social mores regarding circumcision as a requirement for women and girls. Many nation-states have responded by outlawing female genital mutilation, and many communities have slowly decreased the practice of female genital mutilation. Beginning in the 1990s, countries that receive asylum seekers began accepting women and girls who were fleeing forced circumcisions with the understanding that these practices constitute a human rights violation.

The diverse responses to female circumcision/female genital mutilation illuminate the complexity of the debates surrounding these practices and the myriad possibilities for altering customs that prove harmful for so many women and girls throughout the world.

FEMALE FARMING SYSTEMS

The typology of preindustrial subsistence agriculture consisting of two paradigmatic farming systems, one male and the other female, was first expounded by Ester Boserup in 1970 in her pioneering work, Woman's Role in Economic Development. Agrarian production in Europe and Asia—Eurasia for short—was dominated by men. In contrast, women were in control of most aspects of agriculture in sub-Saharan Africa. Thus, Boserup argued, Europe's colonization of Africa was, among other things, an encounter between two radically different farming systems; this aspect of colonialism underlies the traumatic losses of economic and social status among African women under European rule.

Historically speaking, the relatively high autonomy and mobility of women in sub-Saharan Africa, although intimately associated with the female farming systems prevailing in this region before European colonization, cannot be attributed solely to their control over agriculture. Rather, the connections between farming and gender systems should be viewed within the context of a complex set of interrelated ecological, socioeconomic, and cultural factors. This entry describes some of these factors and the relationship to female farming systems.

Ecological Factors

Female farming systems developed in regions where the ratio of cultivable land to population was relatively high and land was tribally owned. Tribal communities would typically allocate plots of land to families based on their need and capacity. The land would be cleared by men and cultivated by women, primarily with the use of a hoe or digging stick. As the topsoil became depleted of nutrients, the land would be left fallow for long periods while new land was cleared for cultivation. The plough was rarely used in this type of shifting cultivation because the "long fallow" system guaranteed an almost endless supply of fertile topsoil without the need to dig deep into the earth to release nutrients and to neutralize the residues of previous cultivation. Under these ecological conditions, agriculture developed with women as the chief cultivators, possibly because their accumulated knowledge of plants carried over from their pre-agricultural role as gatherers and healers.

In regions with substantial population pressure on arable land, different farming techniques were needed for cultivating the same plot repeatedly without depleting the soil of its nutrients. The plough was perfectly suited for this type of intensive agriculture, and diffused quickly through Europe and Asia from its birthplace in the Middle East. The efficiency of plough farming depended, among other things, on the body weight and upper body strength of the farmer and on the use of traction animals traditionally domesticated and bred by men. Thus, historically, male control of farming accompanied plough cultivation throughout the world.

Property, Inheritance, and Class Systems

Shifting cultivation, tribal ownership of territory and flexible allocation of farming land to families according to need are feasible in the absence of land scarcity. Where there is population pressure on land and intensive fixed plot cultivation is the only feasible farming method, however, there is a strong motivation to establish private property rights over land. Furthermore, because men control farming in regions of intensive plough cultivation, property rights are also held by men. Land scarcity results in a large supply of landless families available for wage—or indentured—work on others' land, establishing a context for further class differentiation whereby owners accumulate wealth through appropriating the surplus created by landless laborers.

Private ownership brings with it the drive to transmit one's wealth and class status to one's descendents; furthermore, the survival of future generations and the maintenance of the family's class position depend on the devolution of land from one generation to the next without significant fragmentation. Thus, the intensive farming regions of Europe and Asia have developed into highly stratified societies with strict inheritance rules. In contrast, sub-Saharan Africa, marked by tribal or community control over land allocation, generally lacked rigid class systems. A family's prosperity, status, and prestige within the community depended less on its accumulation of private property than on its ability to control use-rights to land, which in turn depended on its capacity for cultivation. Consequently, the intergenerational devolution of personal property within bloodlines was not a major concern.

Marriage and Reproduction

The systems of property, inheritance, and class associated with male farming in Eurasia on the one hand and female farming in sub-Saharan Africa on the other hand were closely linked to the divergent family formation systems that dominated the two regions. Africa's female farming system, with land allocated according to need and capacity, meant that families with many adult women could command large plots and live in relative prosperity. Multiple wives brought prosperity and high community standing for the entire household, so monogamy was not a dominant norm. The system of tribal land allocation according to need and the ability of young children to help in cultivation minimized the costs of children while increasing their benefits. Thus, polygyny and high fertility regimes were the prevalent features of family structure in these areas. The dominant marriage transaction in female farming systems was the bride price (also called bridewealth), a payment in cash or kind made by the groom to the bride's family, which served as compensation for the transfer of her productive and reproductive capacity from her natal household to her husband's. There was little variation among families in the size of the bride price because the productive and reproductive capacity of adult women did not vary widely.

Child-spacing through postpartum abstinence was the only commonly used form of family limitation and its intended function was to maximize maternal and child survival rather than to limit family size. The high net benefits of children coupled with the absence of a need to keep family assets within the bloodline gave rise to widespread child fostering; orphans and unwanted children easily found households willing to adopt and raise them.

In the male farming systems of Eurasia, women were net consumers and monogamy was the dominant marriage pattern. Polygyny was rarely practiced even when sanctioned by religion because few men could afford to support multiple wives and their children while guaranteeing the long-term survival or class status of the family. The most common marriage transaction was the dowry, a transfer of assets from the bride's natal family to the household of the newlywed couple and typically controlled by the male head of the bride's new household. The size of the dowry was determined by the social class of the bride and groom. The dowry system served the dual purposes of guaranteeing class endogamy (that is, marrying within one's class) and contributing to the bride's livelihood and status maintenance in her new household.

To ensure the preservation of the family's assets within the male bloodline, women's sexuality was closely monitored during childbearing ages, and there were strong social mores enforcing premarital virginity and marital fidelity. Too many children threatened family survival among the lower classes and family class position among the elite. Consequently, child abandonment, induced abortion, and infanticide, all rare in sub-Saharan Africa, were common practices in preindustrial Eurasia, especially among the lower classes. Likewise, innovations in birth control methods were more readily adopted in Eurasia than in sub-Saharan Africa, and mortality decline was closely followed by fertility decline in the former but not in the latter.

Gender Roles

The direct effect of female farming systems on gender roles was the relatively high levels of autonomy, mobility, and self-direction enjoyed by women; as a direct extension of their role as cultivators, they were active in trade and community affairs. Married women typically lived in their own huts within the family compound and cultivated their own plots with help from their children. They were expected to provide for themselves and their children, and shared with their co-wives the responsibility of feeding their husbands.

When the gender systems of male and female farming regions are fully compared, however, the most salient differences are found among factors associated with the social and economic structures that developed around the ecological underpinnings of these farming systems rather than with the farming systems themselves. For example, the structures of property and inheritance that developed in response to the same set of ecological factors as male farming systems imposed tight controls on women's sexuality and gave rise to such practices as female sequestration, veiling, honor killings, son preference, female infanticide, and women's lack of autonomy, power, and control over strategic resources. In contrast, the socioeconomic structures accompanying female farming systems and their ecological underpinnings were not pivoted on male control over women's sexuality. Thus, the social and cultural practices that organized and maintained male control over women in Eurasia did not materialize in sub-Saharan Africa until European colonization. European rule brought about severe losses of status for African women through registration of land in the name of male householders, recruitment of men into cash cropping, spread of Christian values that favored monogamy over polygyny, and imposition of sociocultural norms and practices predicated on and supportive of male control of women's daily lives. It comes as no surprise, then, that women in this region were active, and in some instances took the lead in, anticolonial resistance movements.

Conclusion

The two widely differing socioeconomic and cultural systems associated with female and male subsistence farming are both patriarchal in the sense that men, as heads of households, control crucial social and economic resources and political processes, as well as owning women's productive and reproductive capacities. However, the historically specific conditions within which each system developed, and the interplay of ecological, socioeconomic, and cultural factors that shaped gender hierarchies in each, allowed for different levels of female autonomy and self-determination.

Promoting women's active participation in agriculture, or in production in general, thereby reducing their dependence on men, is certainly a worthwhile cause. However, it is not a panacea and may even adversely affect women by eroding the traditional social obligations that guarantee their support before the mechanisms of self-support are fully established. Full emancipation calls for an overhaul of the entire complex of factors that support and are supported by the particular brand of patriarchy native to each region.

FEMICIDE

Femicide is generally defined as males killing females because they are females. Variations on this definition include death through selective neglect or the use of the phrase "intentional killing" or any killing of females including those by other females. Feminists use this term to distinguish between the systematic destruction of women simply because they are women and the more general term, homicide, that is used to describe the murder of any person at another person's hands. By distinguishing between the two, feminists reject the use of gender neutral terms to describe what is normally considered hate crimes against women as a gender. Femicide is the ultimate form of violence against women. Research and discourse on femicide show that as patriarchy becomes institutionalized, femicide is used as a method of maintaining male privilege by controlling women and their sexuality. It is an extreme form of punishment against women who have somehow transgressed against men's expectations regarding a woman's proper role in society.

Femicide is a global problem, although there are some regional differences in what type is most prevalent. Some of the earlier well-known cases of femicide include the 16th- and 17th-century witch hunts in Europe. More recently, there are reports of mass femicides, such as the rape-murders of Croatian women by Serbian men during their civil war or the increasing numbers of rape, mutilation, and murder of young women in Latin American countries. Other types of femicide include dowry deaths in India, honor killings in the Arab world, and crimes of passion in the Western world. Femicide includes female infanticide, intimate femicide (women killed by their intimate partners), racist femicide (when black women are killed by white men), and homophobic femicide. Some of the most common types of femicide are described in this entry.

Intimate Femicide

Most violence against women in general is perpetrated by a partner or family member. The pervasive nature of femicide at the hands of a "loved" one destroys the myth that the home is a safe place for women. Intimate femicide represents a significant percentage of all femicides in many parts of the world. In North America and Europe, women most at risk of femicide are those residing with their husbands or intimate partners. In the United States, intimate femicide is a leading cause of death among young women. Women with a history of wife-beating are most vulnerable to being killed by their abusers when they decide to leave. Biased reporting of femicides as the outcome of domestic troubles or squabbles, while neglecting to mention abuse or female defense, gives the impression that women are equally to blame for the femicide.

Dowry Deaths

A special form of violence against women in India is dowry deaths, also known as bride burning because the most popular form of dowry femicide is to pour kerosene over the victim and set her on fire, thereby allowing the culprits to later claim that it was a kitchen accident. A large dowry can improve a bride's standing in her husband's home; a small dowry can make her life miserable. Sometimes brides are driven to commit suicide as a result of intense physical abuse; at other times, the husband and in-laws resort to murder. As demands for dowry have escalated, dowry deaths have increased alarmingly—as high as 12,000 per year.

Dowry deaths are most prevalent in Northern India where they are usually a middle- or upper-class phenomenon with the widower being remarried soon after, to bring in another dowry. Despite feminists who have actively campaigned to make changes to the existing penal codes, it is hard to pursue court cases because the police are biased, evidence is not preserved, and judges are unsympathetic. Even dying women in the hospital try to protect their husbands because of the shame or because of their children.

Honor Killings

Honor killings are most prevalent in the Arab world where women are systematically murdered by their male relatives because of shame and dishonor that they have brought to the family. A man's honor is tied into the behavior of his female relatives. The honor code requires virginity before marriage and chastity and fidelity after marriage for women. Women who violate this code are subject to punishment. If the violation becomes public, male family members have to take immediate action to restore the family's social status in the eyes of the community. Infidelity, real or suspected, is sufficient grounds for murder of a woman. A woman who has been raped may be beaten, isolated, and killed by her own family if a marriage between the rape victim and rapist cannot be arranged. In particular, women who are raped by male family members are killed to cover up incest and restore the family's honor.

Reputation and rumor plays a role in honor killings. Women who are suspected of immoral behavior are often killed, usually by a brother or father. Some sexually inactive girls have been killed simply because they were seen with non-related males or boyfriends. Although the exact number of honor killings is difficult to estimate, they form a large percentage of total femicides in some Islamic countries. Honor killings often go unpunished because the criminal justice system is sympathetic toward the perpetrators. In some countries, the penal code has specific provisions for honor killings exempting the male perpetrators from any penalty or giving them a reduced penalty. These provisions make explicit the link between sexual transgressions of women and the honor of the family, making honor killings a socially sanctioned form of femicide in many parts of the world.

FEMININE MYSTIQUE

Feminine mystique, a term coined by feminist Betty Friedan in her 1963 book The Feminine Mystique, is the notion that, post–World War II, mainstream American society advocated that white, middle-class women could and should only find fulfillment in life through housework, marriage, sexual passivity, and childrearing. Part of the ideology of the feminine mystique was that truly feminine women did not want higher education, careers, or a political voice. Rather, they should remain happily in the home and void of careers or commitments outside the assigned domestic sphere. Despite this societal expectation of femininity, many housewives wondered, "Is this all there is?," but had difficulty articulating their lack of fulfillment. Friedan deemed this unhappiness and inability to live up to the feminine mystique the "problem that has no name." This entry describes Friedan's study and its impact.

Friedan's Critique

Human potential psychologists such as Abraham Maslow, popular during the late 1950s and early 1960s, influenced Friedan's claim that the feminine mystique denied women their "basic human need to grow." By stunting this basic human need for development, Friedan claimed that women would continue to be unhappy and children would grow up with unfulfilled and neurotic mothers. Friedan also argued that the feminine mystique hurt women both personally and professionally. According to Friedan, for men and women alike, identity was largely cultivated through personal achievement, primarily through careers.

Situating her study of women in the post–World War II era, Friedan argues that after the war, women were expected to return to the domestic sphere of society, which in turn inspired the feminine mystique. She claims that men returned from war and looked to their wives for mothering. Furthermore, largely because of the escalating cold war during the 1950s, the cultivation of the American nuclear family and the idealized domestic space was part of an ideological battle against Soviet Russia to prove America's superiority. Middle-class white women were implicated in this ideological war with the USSR because they were supposed to represent idealized femininity and the triumph of the American capitalist, consumer society.

Friedan's study uses statistics and interviews to illustrate women's desire during the 1950s to achieve the feminine mystique. For instance, by the end of the 1950s, 14 million girls were engaged by the age of 17 and the average age of marriage dropped to 20. The number of women in college dropped from 47 percent in 1920 to 35 percent in 1958. During the mid-1950s, 60 percent of female students dropped out of college to get married or to cease their higher education before they became "undesirable" on the marriage market. The idea that women only went to college to land a husband and get their "Mrs. Degree" was a popular notion perpetuated by the media. From touting women's natural role as mothers and caregivers, to advocating how to properly take care of one's husband, the media and the education system helped perpetuate all aspects of the feminine mystique. The American housewife who properly performed her domesticity was deemed by the U.S. media to be the dream and envy of all women, in communist countries and throughout the world. In 1956, Life magazine rejoiced that American women were "moving back into the home." A 1954 home economics high school textbook excerpt "How to Be a Good Wife" offers this advice for housewives: "Have dinner ready. Plan ahead, even the night before, to have a delicious meal, on time. This is a way of letting him know that you have been thinking about him and are concerned about his needs. Most men are hungry when they come home and the prospect of a good meal is part of the warm welcome needed. Make him comfortable. Have him lean back in a comfortable chair or suggest he lie down in the bedroom. Have a cool or warm drink ready for him. Arrange his pillow and offer to take off his shoes. Speak in a low, soft, soothing and pleasant voice."

When Friedan interviewed housewives, however, she found that behaviors such as those outlined in the "How to Be a Good Wife" guide did not always prove fulfilling for women and that most women could not live up to this idealized feminine behavior. Unable to reach the feminine mystique, many women spent years with psychologists who tried to help them adjust to their "feminine role" or took tranquilizers or drank alcohol to ease their feelings of emptiness. By the early 1960s, the media recognized that suburban women were often unhappy with their roles. Some attributed housewives' unhappiness to education—they contended that the more educated a woman, the more likely she was to be unfulfilled as a housewife. To counter the problem of the educated "trapped housewife," some educators suggested that women no longer be allowed in universities. Magazine articles targeted those who could not reach true feminine achievement by suggesting new sexual techniques or better ways to find fulfillment through sex.

Friedan's solution to the feminine mystique differed greatly from those in mainstream American society. Rather than trying to achieve the feminine mystique, Friedan suggested that women develop a new "life plan." Housework should not be seen as a "career," but as something to finish as quickly as possible. Friedan contended that it was possible for women to have a successful career and a family. Education should also change drastically from an ideological proponent of the feminine mystique to an emancipating experience for women.

Conclusion

Friedan's The Feminine Mystique is considered an important inspiration for the second-wave feminist movement (1960s–1980s). Friedan also started the influential liberal feminist organization National Organization for Women (NOW). However, by the end of the second-wave feminist movement, in many ways the notion of the suburban housewife suffering from the feminine mystique seemed like an outdated critique because twice as many women were in the workforce as had been during the 1950s. Furthermore, feminists such as bell hooks have criticized the fact that Friedan's notion of the feminine mystique claims to speak for all women, but only relates to white, middle-class women and not to working-class women who joined the labor force from necessity.

FEMINISM AND MILITARIZATION

Militarization describes the sociopolitical environment through which militaristic control, influence, and ideologies are spread throughout society. Militarization marks a society's dependence on the military for its well-being and results in the normalization of militaristic values. Feminist work on militarization, pioneered by Cynthia Enloe, has emphasized the importance of looking for the causes of militarism (the state of military control) that occur through militarization, moving beyond traditional studies that have focused purely on the consequences of militarism. Feminists are particularly concerned with the ways in which masculinity and femininity are mapped out and used throughout a variety of military interactions. Feminists ask why militarized masculinity has been privileged, but focus primarily on the ways that militarization affects women's lives. Although feminist scholars of militarization are careful to differentiate among different cultural contexts, they identify common patterns of gendered behavior in militaries throughout the world. These theorists have also argued that feminists must move beyond a simple focus on war and examine the processes of gender socialization for military roles, such as the societal valorization of the male soldier. This entry discusses militarized masculinity, women warriors, and prostitution, rape, and care work connected with the military.

Militarized Masculinity

Feminist theorists have demonstrated that the military relies on and promotes violent masculinity. Military commanders have also used men's pride in their roles as fathers, sons, and heterosexuals to motivate them to obey commands, frequently through humiliation. The tenuousness of masculinity has particular consequences within the military, where superior officers and peers alike challenge men's manhood if they are unable to perform a required task or show signs of weakness. This perceived loss of masculinity renders a man "unfit" for military service, and violent masculinity is both legitimized and rewarded by the military. Feminists argue that male soldiers are required to prove their masculinity by committing violent acts, frequently against women. These constructions of masculinity, though, depend on an opposing construction of passive femininity, which is troubled by the presence of female soldiers.

Women Warriors

Women have been informally engaged in combat in every American war. However, this fighting was covert for much of the country's history because women in the United States were not allowed to join the military until World War II. Although women's involvement has increased and shifted dramatically since then, women are still generally excluded from ground combat. Feminist theorists argue that this exclusion reifies ideals of feminine weakness and encourages the notion that male soldiers should take care of their female comrades. Gender ideologies also promote sexist behavior and sexual harassment. The 1991 Tailhook scandal was one of the most infamous incidents of this kind within U.S. military history, when 83 women and 7 men were sexually assaulted, several of whom were female soldiers. One reason given for the Naval officers' behavior was resentment toward women's presence in the military, which had prompted a series of attempts at reforming military traditions. Feminists have also suggested that the paternalism that surrounds female soldiers situates them as second-class citizens and makes them more vulnerable to sexual assault and harassment.

Gay men and lesbians have also been an increasing presence in the American military. U.S. law forbade the entrance of gays and lesbians into the military until 1993, when the U.S. Congress passed the measure known as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." Although the military formally opposes homophobic harassment, it is generally permitted in practice, and women thought to be lesbians are subject to more frequent harassment. Feminists argue that the privileging of heterosexual masculinity has created a climate of homophobia in the military, and deviations from this standard of masculinity are punished through sexual harassment and assault. Gay and lesbian organizations have become much more militarized due to the focus on the struggle for gays and lesbians to be treated fairly in the military.

Given the frequently negative ways that militarization has affected gay male, lesbian, and heterosexual female soldiers, some feminist theorists have questioned why they would continue to express a desire to be involved with the military. Scholars have examined the role of citizenship and emphasized the limited access to citizenship that these groups have faced. Soldiers, however, are held up as the ultimate citizens, willing to fight and die for their country. Although gay men, lesbians, and heterosexual female soldiers are not valorized in the same way that heterosexual male soldiers have typically been, becoming soldiers can grant them access to a level of citizenship (and even societal acceptance) that they would not otherwise obtain.

Prostitution

Prostitutes have played a critical role in military history, although military officials typically deny that they have any policies on prostitution. Prostitutes have frequently been "kept available" to soldiers, under the logic that access to prostitutes would curtail both marriage (which has been discouraged at some historical moments) and rape. Through the involvement of military officials, local governments, and business owners, brothels have been established near military bases to facilitate contact between prostitutes and soldiers. Women involved in militarized prostitution have been subject to a number of discriminatory practices based on commonly held beliefs about femininity. Military officials have reified the ideology of women as sexual gatekeepers by forcing prostitutes to undergo testing for sexually transmitted diseases, but not requiring soldiers to do the same. Instead, officials control women to exercise control over men. Militarized prostitution upholds the virgin/whore dichotomy, exemplifying the latter while reminding soldiers about the "good women" back home, those whom the soldiers are fighting to protect. Racial hierarchies have also frequently been upheld through the use of different brothels for soldiers of different races.

Prostitutes deal with a number of health concerns, including sexually transmitted diseases, unwanted pregnancies, and AIDS. Many women who engage in militarized prostitution have either been coerced by an economic need to participate or outright forced to be involved. Finally, prostitutes have often served as scapegoats in anti-base campaigns, which have focused on the supposed immoral behavior that surrounds military bases. In recent years, feminist attention has begun to shift to the role that United Nations peacekeepers play in militarization, and scholars have discovered that many peacekeepers engage in the same behaviors that soldiers do, including prostitution. Frequently, though, prostitution has been used as a cover for militarized rape, when soldiers claim that a woman or girl was not assaulted, but was actually a prostitute.

Rape

Feminist scholars of militarization stress that rape must be understood within the context of more permissible acts of violence occurring daily, which contribute to a military culture that finds rape sometimes allowable. These authors have identified the need to differentiate between different forms of rape and the different motivations that may accompany militarized rape. Rape has actually been used as a tool of war, as an intimidation tactic against community leaders, as a warning to those thought to be threats to national security, as a method to raise soldiers' morale, and as a "prize" for the victorious army. The occurrence of rape has also been blamed on an insufficient amount of prostitutes in the area, which does not permit soldiers outlets for sex. Soldiers have sometimes seen gang rape as reinforcing a sense of camaraderie among soldiers, even transgressing men's racial differences. Rape has also been used as a form of ethnic cleansing, whereby an invading army rapes civilian women to "breed out" a particular racial or ethnic group. Feminist scholars have pointed out that although women and girls are most frequently the victims of rape, the ultimate targets are their male relatives and community members. This tactic is based on the notion that women have traditionally been defined as men's property and that sexually assaulting women is an especially grievous insult to their husbands' and fathers' senses of honor.

Care Work

In the centuries before women were formally part of the American and British militaries, camp followers traveled with soldiers and performed a variety of services for them, including cooking, laundering, mending, and nursing. However, camp followers were generally unappreciated by military commanders, and they were frequently referred to and treated as prostitutes. Soldiers relied heavily on their services, though, and exercised extreme control over camp followers. Camp followers exemplified the division of labor along both gender and class lines because the women who performed these tasks were typically poor.

Camp followers acted as nurses until military officials, along with Florence Nightingale, began pushing for the use of trained nurses, and camp followers were pushed out. However, nurses have played similarly gendered roles in the military, such that they were not officially recognized as part of the military (and eligible for ranks) until after World War I. During World War II, black nurses were segregated into a separate division to care for black soldiers, perpetuating racial hierarchies. Generally, nurses have been expected to uphold a certain standard of femininity—at different historical moments, they have been expected to remain single, to seem available to soldiers, to provide comfort, and to avoid becoming emotional in front of soldiers. Nurses are frequently discouraged from talking about their wartime experiences to civilians because the violent stories might taint the military's image. Because of the extreme violence and pain that these nurses witness, they have found it difficult to approximate this type of femininity. Recent recruitment campaigns by the U.S. military have shifted between portraying the nurse as a tough, fully militarized woman and the romanticized image of the sensitive, loving nurse.

In many military settings, male soldiers' wives have been expected to take over much of the care work that camp followers used to perform. Feminists point to the rigid construction of the ideal military wife, who is expected to uphold the image of the military, be a model wife and mother, accept restrictions on her life for the sake of national security, and place her career aspirations second to her husband's military duties. Mothers have also been militarized, depicted either as supportive military moms who speak proudly of their sons' and daughters' service in the military, or as mourning mothers who have lost their children in battle.

FEMINIST ACTIVISM IN LATIN AMERICA

Latin American feminist activism is a pillar of womanhood that pre-dates current feminisms. Latin American feminist activism has existed throughout the centuries, paralleling Western feminisms on a more formal basis for the last century and a half. Compared with U.S. and European feminism, specifically French, Latin American feminist activism been measured inadequately by Western feminisms. Both Western scholars and men have provocatively oversimplified women's struggles with colonization, racism, sexism, democracy, gender, language, and the nation-state. A reality that has been excluded from most history books is that feminism in Latin America has almost always been a group action, and thus, activism emulates a similar construction.

The issues particular to Latin America are the colonization 500 years ago as well as the continued cultural colonization of Latin America. Other emergent issues—religious evolution, the incorporation of indigenous populations into the cultures of literary and historical production throughout the 20th century, the continued linguistic and cultural richness that women have preserved throughout the centuries—all merit a new scale and framework, deconstructing established scales about feminist Latin American activism.

Since pre-Columbian times, women in Latin America have participated in change and have been in solidarity and community with other women in their daily endeavors, struggling toward the improvement of their status, as well as that of their families and regions. Scholar and political scientist Jane S. Jaquette has best stated these practices across social classes about the 20th century feminism and the transition to democracy with her research on the women's movement in Latin America. Jaquette believes that Latin American feminist analyses of politics are different than those in other regions because the political climate encouraged more interaction between women and the state. Thus, the distinction between public politics and private family lives has blurred, and there is more focus on human rights.

From a Western perspective, contemporary feminism in Latin America emerged with the suffragists in the 19th century. Initially, issues of education, equality regarding race, economics, law, property, and class were the main topics addressed by women organizing, and not necessarily the right to vote. Not until the 1920s and 1930s was it obvious to the world that women were excluded from the vote in such countries as Mexico and Argentina where women had fought for the right to be equal; nonetheless, in 1912, Argentina did not allow women to vote, nor did the Mexican Constitution of 1917, a world-famous radical document of the time.

In the 20th century, the main recurring issues that feminist activists in Latin America addressed (aside from the continued push for the right to vote and the right to an education) were health care for women and children, contraception, women's civil and human rights, and domestic violence. By 1911, in Peru, for example (the year Machu Picchu was first explored by Europeans), Maria de Jesús Alvarado Rivera was already giving feminist talks about women's suffrage. Alvarado Rivera founded a feminist organization that became part of the International Women's Suffrage Association in 1924, and was exiled to Argentina as a result of her activism when she promoted changes in the civil code to make women equal to men.

Other Peruvian feminists such as Magda Portal exemplify the Latin American women feminists who fear the manipulation of women's vote due to the history in Latin America of control of women's activism by the Catholic church and the military regimes, something that has continued. This is one emblematic example of a similar pattern in many Latin American countries that portrays a nonlinear and Western vision of everyday Latin American Feminism.

In Mexico, women have often participated in struggles of all types, including armed struggle during the historical Mexican Revolution of 1910 where Mexican women set a precedent as soldaderas, acquiring titles in the army parallel to men: "generalas" and "coronelas," an example that set a definite precedent for the wars in Central America during the 1970s and 1980s, in El Salvador, Guatemala, and informally in Honduras.

In the 1980s, the lives of women in Latin America became "interesting" to American and European feminist scholars who documented such rural organizers as Honduran organizer Elvia Alvarado, Bolivian miner Domitila Barrios de Chungara, and Guatemalan indigenous leader Rigoberta Menchú, who was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1992. This step, of having international scholars acknowledging non–middle- or upper-class women as important is essential in international feminism because it promotes the feminism of Latin American women, indigenous women, and mestizas as unique and valid. Before this, only lives of the educated and privileged women were documented in a small unequal scale, or highlighted by any one or any world organization. If one was raised in the working class, one had to become formally educated and be extraordinary to be noticed as a leader or as a woman activist.

Nonetheless, women writers in Latin America have been at the forefront of global feminist activism, beginning with the first published woman of the Americas, the nun Juana de Asbaje, best known as Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, in the 17th century, and her writings continue to be particularly theorized and feminized by women in the 20th century. Latin American women writers have been included in global endeavors that show their local activism, especially during the last 40 years of the 20th century. They have been participating in international feminist movements and writing about feminism on the international level, while expanding the array of subjectivities they represent.

Disclosing difference as an asset is important in the type of activities in which women engage, and this has finally occurred among Latin American feminist activist writers—a watershed of feminist authors marked this territory at the beginning of the twentieth century. The ideal example of this is Gabriela Mistral, a Chilean working-class woman and children's rights advocate who helped found Red Cross chapters throughout Latin America. Others such as Argentinean author Alfonsina Storni who committed suicide in the 1930s and Rosario Castellanos who died in a freak accident in Israel also used their writings to subvert established social norms for women. In the first part of the 20th century these women set a unique precedent as writers and journalists who worked in political positions as consuls or ambassadors throughout the world, and who resisted patriarchal culture both through their writings and with their bodies.

Currently, Latin American writers such as Marjorie Agosín, Pía Barros, Carmen Boullosa, Cristina Pacheco, Alicia Partnoy and Cristina Pacheco, Elena Poniatowska, and Rosamaria Roffiel have demonstrated that the connection with the social is generational and uniquely particular to Latin American feminist activists, especially writers. Activist writers such as Mexican author Poniatowska embrace their activism, seldom removing themselves from the lives of their domestic workers. Poniatowska along with the Argentinian author Partnoy who now lives in Los Angeles, CA have become activists for the disappeared and mutilated women of Ciudad Juarez, and are two of the main insurgents in the rights of the mothers of these disappeared young women from the Mexico–U.S. border. Another example is Barros, the unofficial "social worker" for the aging poor in Chile. So the Latin American activist and particularly the writer has become transnational.

Diasporic activism is also important to the shrinking notion of the world. Central to this movement is the feminism developed by returning feminist exiles who have participated in other struggles abroad. These are women who had left the Southern Cone (Argentina, Chile, Uruguay) and Central America for political reasons or the oppression of military regimes that disappeared many of their peers and families in the 1970s and 1980s. In Chile, writers such as Susana Sánchez Bravo, or even the current Chilean president Michelle Bachelet, are underlining the importance and innovation of transforming the global into the local government. The inscription of a one-dimensional official story is no longer possible in Chile or anywhere else in the world, largely because of these women. A feminism of Latin American diasporic activists is one of resistance, affirmation, and an ongoing activist agenda. It has transformed an entire continent and continues to have a ripple effect throughout the world.

FEMINIST BIOETHICS

Ethics is more than a philosophy of moral values or a set of principles governing right and wrong behaviors: ethics is also chiefly concerned with humans living lives that are worth living. Bioethics, then, is the pursuit of the good life within the realms of health, medicine, and science. Feminist bioethics, like bioethics, shares this broad focus on the good life; however, feminist bioethics specifically advocates women's rights and needs within health, medicine, and science as the primary means for women to achieve a life worth living. This entry describes the historical background, current field, and some issues of feminist bioethics.

Historical Background of Bioethics

The modern field of bioethics developed in the early 1970s. Though its contemporary social movements include second-wave feminism and the civil rights movement, bioethics shares only one basic, though extremely important, tenet with these other movements: that social amelioration is necessary for humans to live lives full of dignity. Before the 1970s, bioethics was known as medical ethics and as such, was far more limited in its scope. The shift from traditional medical ethics to bioethics is usually attributed to three events: global public outcry against the horrors of the Nazi doctors' medical and scientific experimentations on Jews that were publicized during the Nuremburg Trials, the scandalous syphilis experiments on black men at the Tuskegee Institute, and fantastical scientific innovations in what would become known as the fields of molecular genetics and biotechnology. Bioethics was vastly different from medical ethics in that it was a space for critical inquiry into the juxtapositions between medical and scientific advances and the need for improved quality of human life. Hence, bioethicists, then and now, address often-difficult questions that pit the needs of patients against the needs of doctors, health care organizations, health insurance companies, and those who would advocate medical and scientific innovations. Examples of these questions include the following: Should those persons without health insurance receive the same quality of care as persons with health insurance? Do local and national governments have the right to mandate vaccinations for school-age children? Do terminally ill patients have the right to choose death over treatment?

The Field of Feminist Bioethics

According to noted scholar Mary C. Rawlinson, feminist bioethics is a field of both study and practice that places women's rights and needs at the center of its ethical discussions and decision making. Thus, feminist bioethics critiques bioethics for ignoring the specific needs of women. This happens because bioethics considers men to be the universal subject of inquiry. Feminist bioethicists have argued that because men are the benchmarks for which to pursue ethics in health, medicine, and science, women are rendered invisible, at best, and pathological, at worst. Much of feminist bioethics scholarship has been concerned with revealing how such gender biases structure the overall health care system. Specifically, using men as the universal subject translates into outcomes such as clinical trials that use only males as subjects and little to no research on women's experiences of major illnesses (i.e., cancer, heart disease). Critiquing the use of men as universal and allegedly neutral proxies for humans is not new to feminism. Simone de Beauvoir referred to this as a process of "otherization" with men at the center and women as the "second sex."

As a field, feminist bioethics emerged in the late 1980s and the early 1990s as one manifestation of more than two decades of activism by participants in the women's health movement. Other manifestations include highly visible organizations such as the U.S.-based Boston Women's Health Collective, the National Women's Health Network, the National Black Women's Health Network, and the 1990 founding of the Office of Research on Women's Health at the National Institutes of Health.

Understanding Feminism in Feminist Bioethics

Feminist bioethics, like bioethics, is not a monolithic field with regards to interests, practices, and goals. Feminist bioethicists, especially in more recent scholarship, have tried to maintain a unified understanding of what feminism is and how it informs feminist bioethics. However, there are many instances where feminist bioethicists have contrasting views on an issue. Rosemarie Tong's article, "Feminist Bioethics: Toward Developing a 'Feminist' Answer to the Surrogate Motherhood Question," provides one example where feminist bioethicists have contrasting views: One view argues that surrogate mothers are performing a much-needed service, and as long as they are treated fairly as workers, there is nothing particularly wrong with the practice. Another view of surrogacy posits that such tasks will likely become the underpaid burden of poorer women and women of color. A third perspective conceives of surrogacy as a prime example of how reproduction will always be a burden for women's bodies. Surrogacy can also be argued to be a mechanism by which men control reproduction by moving pregnancy between the lab and the womb.

Some feminist bioethicists such as Laura Purdy have worried that a field with such divergent views will only encourage confusion and, thus, rejection from mainstream bioethicists. But within each perspective, there is a unifying theme: that women suffer from a lack of full autonomy regarding their bodies, whether they are willing to be surrogates or not. This particular unifying theme is an application of the "core feminism" that some feminist bioethicists have tried to universalize within feminist bioethics: that the oppression that women and other disadvantaged social groups face is real, harmful, inexcusable, and thus, should be remedied.

Reproduction Issues and Beyond

Though feminist bioethics encompasses a range of concerns and issues as wide as bioethics, when feminist bioethics is included in mainstream bioethics venues (e.g., courses, textbooks, policy panels, health care administration boards, educational institutions), issues related to reproduction garner the greatest representation. This narrow focus on reproduction provides an interesting perspective on the entire field of feminist bioethics. On the one hand, most scholarship by feminist bioethicists does indeed address reproductive issues. Even feminist bioethicists' current research on human genetics reflects earlier research foci on women's reproductive concerns. On the other hand, the focus on reproduction obscures other fields of bioethical inquiry that would benefit from feminist bioethics scholarship. In Feminism and Bioethics: Beyond Reproduction, Susan Wolf and other scholars offer critiques of the reproductive focus that are two-pronged: one, bioethics should pay attention to feminist bioethics in more arenas than just women's reproductive issues, and two, feminist bioethicists should move "beyond reproduction." Interestingly, critiques of the reproductive issue focus have also informed recent scholarship and activism regarding a global feminist bioethics. Here, feminist bioethicists from developing nations have argued that feminist bioethicists from developed nations have a myopic view of reproduction that has produced a body of research and resulted in global policies that are obsessed with poor women's fertility, particularly poor women from developing nations. Hence, feminist bioethicists from the global North have been deaf to the concerns of feminist bioethicists from the global South. Tong's research indicates that while privileged feminist bioethicists worried about poor women's fertility, less privileged feminist bioethicists researched poor women's working conditions imposed by global multinational corporations. This dichotomy of representation is just one of several salient critiques that has led to feminist bioethics' most current challenge.

Conclusion

Recent scholarship within feminist bioethics has taken up the task of articulating a universal feminist vision and applied it to global health care issues. This interest in universal feminist values comes out of several critiques from within feminist bioethics: (a) that feminist bioethics is in danger of fragmentation and thus, further marginalization from bioethics; (b) that feminist bioethics has thus far mostly reflected the standpoint of feminists from relatively privileged social positions in developed nations; and (c) that feminist bioethical inquiries into the needs of women from developing nations have not been generated from those women in question. Though there are numerous vocal detractors of the goal of universalizing feminism, even their concerns are primarily aimed at developing a global feminist ethics. For the detractors, the concern is that a universal notion of feminism might obscure the particular needs of local communities of women. Similar to the definition of core feminism given earlier, a universal global feminism for feminist bioethics includes the recognition that women may occupy overlapping disadvantaged social positions, including gender, race, class, nationality, religious membership, and disability status, and that these social positions must be considered in their rich complexity in any discussion of their health care needs. Following the recognition of oppressive conditions that stem from social positions, a global feminist bioethics posits that such oppression is unnecessary and intolerable and, thus, is the responsibility of all to rectify.

Feminist Disability Theory

Feminist disability theory is an emerging school of thought that includes an interdisciplinary group of scholars conducting a critical analysis of how we come to know what we know about meanings of disability and ability. Scholars in the fields of sociology, psychology, cultural studies, gender studies, disability studies, and literature contribute to the analysis of how these understandings intersect with a range of cultural notions, including gender ideologies. Feminist disability theory contributes to contemporary feminist thought about such things as the body, beauty, and constructions of masculinities and femininities. This theoretical enterprise has the particular potential to advance theorizing on the representation and experience of workers both in the paid workforce and as caregivers and receivers in family networks and other settings. Feminist disability theory has made important contributions to the field of disability studies, drawing on understandings of intersectionality that promise a bright future for theoretical explorations of gender and disability. This entry describes disability theory and studies, intersectionality, and the future of feminist disability theory.

Disability Theory and Disability Studies

The field of disability studies was founded by a group of scholars, activists, and people with disabilities as part of the disability rights movement of the 1960s. Like participants in the civil rights movement and the women's movement in the United States, participants in the disability rights movement strive to protect the rights of all persons of varying abilities while questioning what it means to have a disability. Primary aims of this interdisciplinary field include, first, to challenge the idea that disability is a medical category and, second, to use the body as a site of critical analysis. Sociologists, in particular, have used this thinking to put the term disabled in a social, political, and economic context while grounding disability in the experiences of individual life experiences.

Those using disability theory as a lens of analysis often look at both a group of people whom some consider disabled and a broader social landscape that defines some as able and others as disabled. At their beginning, disability theory and disability studies, like feminist theory and gender studies, made the experiences of people with disabilities visible to those who might not otherwise recognize them. Such visibility was supposed to help scholars, activists, and policy makers get a more complete picture of the social world and trace how oppression and privilege operate in the lives of people who might be seen as disabled. Disability theory, then, includes an analysis of power dynamics. Within this school of thought, theorists investigate meanings of normalcy, what it might mean to be abnormal, and how these definitions change over time and across locations.

In sociology, disability studies and disability theory grew out of the investigation of stigmatized identities and the ways that social groups define both insiders and outsiders. Sociologists began questioning the role of social institutions such as the workforce, the media, the family, the educational system, and the medical industry in assigning and maintaining stigma; sociologists also considered how people's day-to-day interactions in schools, work, and families reinforced certain stereotypes of what it meant to be disabled or abled. Toward these ends, sociologists studied such topics as depression, obesity, and mental retardation. Other areas explored by some sociologists and literature scholars are the role of culture and language, especially when investigating the empirical example of the Deaf community. Instead of considering themselves disabled, members of the Deaf community argue that, because of their native language of American Sign Language (ASL) and shared culture, they are actually part of a linguistic minority in the context of a larger hearing society.

Many scholars have made distinctions between definitions of the terms sex and gender. Gender studies scholars have argued that sex is something that is perhaps biologically based whereas gender is something that is socially created depending on how one interacts with others in a given society. In the early stages of theorizing, disability studies scholars were concerned with putting people who might be seen as disabled at the center of analysis. Early writings in this area did not necessarily address issues of gender with regards to one's perceived ability; however, more recent scholarship has called for a more inclusive and intersectional analysis where the consideration of gender and ability are both part of such discussions.

Intersectionality

As the field of disability studies and notions of disability theory emerged, some began drawing connections between feminist theory and disability theory. One major site for analysis was and continues to be the body and issues of representation. By looking at material bodies, theorists such as Rosemarie Thomson and Susan Wendell argued that how people come to think of bodies and their meanings depends on accepted ideas of disability and what it means to be able-bodied. People writing in this regard began looking at images of the body in popular culture and how they were gendered and abled. For example, when thinking of the concept of femininity, one might conjure up a mental picture of an "ideal" feminine body. Media images reinforce this image as one that is white, thin, young, blond, and able-bodied. Therefore, looking at representations of bodies in popular culture along with consideration of a historical period and location provides an analysis of gender and ability. This insight has prompted scholars to think critically about cultural ideas of what it means to be feminine as well as masculine. Others have looked at illnesses and conditions and have written about the material experience of bodily pain—an important consideration when engaging in what can be abstract theorizing.

While using feminist theory to view gender as an institution organized by social roles and rules, others began critically employing the concept of intersectionality. Feminist analyses of intersectionality provide a means of exploring social phenomena through simultaneous attention to race, ethnicity, class, gender, sexuality, and age as they are experienced in historical time and location. African American feminist scholars have used intersectionality to critique academic writings about motherhood that privilege the experiences of people who are white and members of the upper middle class. Their critique rejects a singular understanding of motherhood and recognizes that the experiences and the institution of motherhood vary across racial, class, sexual, and other categories. Feminist disability theorists and scholars use intersectionality in their analyses of motherhood to problematize the links between being seen as an able and legitimate mother. Feminist analyses have established that women's legitimacy as mothers—and thus as women—intimately reflects their racial, gender, and sexual privilege or disadvantage.

For example, Sara Ruddick has argued that the concept of being maternal is a socially created category based on various disciplinary practices rather than something that is biological or innately unique to women. A feminist disability studies analysis would also point out that being maternal or being a mother who is seen as disabled also requires additional identity work, in certain contexts, to be seen as legitimate. For a Deaf mother in a hearing context, this might include ensuring that her child has the ability to communicate with members of the Deaf community as well as the hearing world and thus knows ASL as well as spoken English. Such mothers might also be put in positions to ensure the acceptability of their children as well as themselves with both communities. This example, then, allows us to question the notion that being maternal is something that is based on biology as well as on one's perceived ability.

Feminist analyses of intersectionality approach bodies as raced, classed, gendered, and—with the insights of feminist disability theory—abled. Feminist theory and disability theory thus need each other. The two are intertwined, producing a rich analysis that considers ability, disability, age, race, sexuality, and social class along with other contextual factors. Through such an analysis, feminist disability theory provides a way to articulate how power dynamics reward those considered normal and stigmatize and oppress those who, in certain contexts, appear different or disabled. Feminist disability theory provides strategies for assessing how definitions of difference and sameness reflect one's location in a given society and period. Finally, feminist disability theory provides hope because it suggests that representations of gender and ability, like those informing understanding of mothering, are mutable and subject to change over time.

Future Directions

Feminist disability theory addresses a wide variety of topics, each with far-reaching implications. Hallmarks of this theoretical perspective are the ideas, first, that all people inhabit bodies that are seen as able, disabled, or a combination of the two and, second, that one's identity reflects one's race, ethnicity, social class, sexuality, age, and cultural context. Feminist disability theory also suggests that the binary between being an able body and being a disabled body is suspect. Much as gender studies theorists have challenged the false divide between what it means to be a man or a woman, feminist disability theorists are interested in investigating the complexities that lie in between the being abled and disabled because no one person fits exclusively into one category or the other. Thus, it becomes critical to look at individuals and to put their identity constructions into a historical, political, and economic context.

Much of feminist disability theory's strength lies in its spanning disciplinary fields. Social scientists, linguists, practitioners, and individuals with life experiences of disability contribute to the theorizing discussion. Many researchers also use the concept of reflexivity where they critically analyze their own roles in constructing such things as gender and ability. This is seen as an important aspect of feminist disability theory as well, especially when considering such things as research design, analysis, and law and policy making. For example, what might it mean for a hearing researcher to interview someone who is Deaf? What are the dynamics of power that might exist as they might struggle to understand one another? If the data is written in a textual format, what is lost in translation because the visual language of ASL is not a written language? How might these questions be similar and differ from interviews done with people who do not speak the same language as the researcher?

Many issues are being debated in the field and include the future directions of feminist disability theory. These include, but are not limited to, the increased number of the aging population and the similarities and differences between and among men and women; the role of bioethics and stem cell research, especially technologies that allow people to choose the sex of a child; abortion and who has the right to procreate or to be seen as viable mothers and fathers; the segregation of schools and homes for people who are aging or seen as disabled and how this might vary by gender; and the experiences of caregiving and receiving and how this varies between and among groups of men and women. As scholars, activists, and individuals grapple with these terms, feminist disability theory provides a uniquely vibrant space for creating a common language about gender and ability—a language that should be subject to consistent critique, but also one that can be a catalyst for social change.

Féministes Révolutionnaires

Féministes révolutionnaires was a radical feminist group committed to the disruption of patriarchy. The loosely knit assemblage was founded in 1970 in France by members of Mouvement de Libération des Femmes (MLF), most notably Monique Wittig and Simon de Beauvoir, both of whom later collaborated with Christine Delphy on the journal Questions feminists.

It is difficult to define Féministes révolutionnaires because members were completely against any form of hierarchy. They resisted designating individual leaders with representative goals. Actually, Féministes révolutionnaires is referred to as féministes non-alignées because it is difficult to pin the movement to any one philosophy or cause.

Launched in the context of student and worker turbulence in 1969, socialist women became discouraged by male members' unwillingness to share power; thus the battle cry, "Les hommes discourent, les femmes nettoient!" (Men discuss, women clean!). Although influenced by feminists in the United States, Féministes révolutionnaires differed from mere "reformist" groups whose major concerns were the rights and roles of women in society.

Indeed, members believed in revolution from the current system of phallocracy—a societal structure rewarding those possessing a penis—a notion similar to meritocracy, such that perceived merit is the means to gain privilege, or aristocracy whereby a person inherits power by parentage.

To bring feminist issues to the fore, members of Féministes révolutionnaires organized events to attract media attention. Their most famous exploit was placing a wreath at the Arc de Triomphe at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier with a banner that read, "Il y a plus inconnu encore que le soldat: sa femme!" (There is one more unknown than the soldier: his wife!). The exhibit was immediately dispersed by police. However, the incident made national headlines, and the faction's grievances became known to the general public for the first time.

In 1971, to assert women's rights to contraception and abortion, two popular publications printed the Manifeste des 343. The manifesto was signed by some members of Féministes révolutionnaires, including Simone de Beauvoir, testifying that they had had abortions. Abortion was illegal and such women risked arrest, so this act induced a great deal of national interest.

Féministes révolutionnaires eventually disbanded about 1979, but not before Wittig broke from the assembly because of perceived resistance to lesbian issues. Despite the group's break-up, one can gauge their influence by the overall diffusion of feminist ideas in the French media as leading to broad receptivity to MLF issues by ordinary French citizens and consequent legalization of contraception and abortion.

FEMINIST ETHNOGRAPHY

Feminist ethnography is a research methodology, a theory about how research should proceed. Its principal method is observational research conducted over time and motivated by a commitment to women. Social scientists use feminist ethnography to uncover how gender operates within different societies.

Beyond this common pursuit and commitment, a wide range of interpretations of feminist ethnography exists. To understand this, one must look at the historical development of ethnography in general and of feminist ethnography in particular and trace the debates about whether a feminist ethnography is possible. Broadly, since the 1970s a shift has occurred from seeing feminist ethnography as on-the-ground research by, about, and for women to understanding it as diverse written constructions of gendered experiences. What emerges is not a single feminist ethnography but many different versions, as described in this entry.

Defining Ethnography

The ethnographic method originated in anthropology in the mid-19th century and developed into its most characteristic form during the 20th century, when sociologists joined anthropologists in adopting it. Essentially, ethnography involves immersion in a social context with the purpose of collecting, and then recounting in an intelligible way, descriptive data concerning the world of the people being studied. Ethnography is a relational experience, and fieldworkers aim to understand the social setting from the perspective of those with whom they spend time. The method of data collection is often called "participant observation": The researcher observes the life of the group under investigation by participating in it. In the process, the researcher comes to understand the group's underlying beliefs and assumptions and must negotiate a position as both outsider and insider. The term ethnography refers to both process (the act of doing research) and product (the written account of the research that is produced when fieldwork is complete). Anthropologists have generally carried out ethnographic research in non-Western settings, and sociologists have adopted the method for use in the West. Subsequently, other subject areas including nursing studies, geography, communication studies, and religious studies have embraced ethnographic methods. Ethnography has also diversified, with contemporary forms including cyber-ethnography, photographic ethnography, and the autobiographical form autoethnography.

Overview

Notwithstanding some antecedents, feminist ethnographic research originates principally from the contributions of the women's movement of the 1960s and 1970s. In anthropology, feminist ethnography operates both as a new area of research and as a critique of the discipline's tendency to exclude women from field analyses or to present them in reductive ways. Feminist ethnography is part of the larger challenge that feminism posed to positivist social research, in which researchers approach the setting logically, objectively, and with predetermined criteria for measurement. Feminists instead tended to advocate analyses that were detailed, flexible, and subjective, arguing that they would be more conducive to representing women's experiences in a patriarchal society.

In its earlier days, feminist ethnography was chiefly concerned with women. Like other feminist research, feminist ethnography was about, by, and for women. It involved giving voice to marginalized women whose experiences had rarely been represented or understood. In this way, feminist academic ethnographers saw themselves as giving a voice to the voiceless. The critical focus on gender that most feminist ethnographers took involved questioning commonsense assumptions about men and women, masculinity and femininity. If, as social science contended, gender was socially constructed, the task of ethnography was to discover exactly how this construction took place in different social contexts. With this critical focus, a more general concern with gender rather than just women arose: The construction of gender identities and relations in the field became important questions. As the interdisciplinary field of men's studies developed during the 1980s and 1990s, feminist ethnographers began to study men and masculinity. Often these investigations were attentive to issues of gendered power: By "studying up"—the term for research on more powerful men—researchers could find out how power dynamics operated. More recently, the postmodern turn in the field of feminist ethnography has resulted in the questioning of many earlier assumptions. The focus of ethnographies has turned to narrative, deconstruction, and representation. The earlier interest in discovering the authentic gendered experiences of men and women as they are materially and economically structured has been replaced by attention to diversity, representation, and the symbolic realm.

Early Feminist Ethnography

The behavior of a group under investigation toward the researcher reveals much about that group's approach to gender. Many ethnographers, predominantly feminists, have written about how the researcher's gender informs the way they participate in and analyze the field they are studying. Several key themes emerge in the literature. First, women researchers are more able to form fruitful relations with women group members (particularly in gender-segregated settings) and develop fuller understandings of women's experiences. Second, women researchers are less likely to be seen as authoritative academics; they may thus face less opposition because their research does not appear particularly threatening. Third, group members often assign women researchers "fictive kin" roles, for example as honorary daughters (notably in family-centered cultures). Fourth, married and unmarried female researchers may have different research experiences. Marriage often signifies adulthood, affording the researcher respect and her husband's help in reporting details of male-only settings. Conversely, being unmarried signifies immaturity (though less often in Western cultures), attracting fascination and attempts to find the researcher a male partner. Single female researchers may also be treated as honorary males.

Researchers' bodies and physical appearance can shape their field experiences, and ethnographers have been alert to the need to dress in a manner that is acceptable to informants. Researchers less often discuss how such variables as ethnicity, class, sexuality, and religion also contribute to ethnographers' gendered experiences. In the case of sexuality, for example, female embodiment may mark the researcher as sexually available, and she may be subject to sexual advances from informants. Dealing with sexuality (how to present themselves, how to negotiate others' interpretations, and how to negotiate sexual relationships) is a challenging issue for ethnographers.

The issue of power has been central to feminist ethnography. Such ethnographers analyze the way structures of power routinely position participants as subordinate or more primitive than the all-knowing Western expert. The early history of ethnography was linked to a colonial project concerned with knowing, and thus being better able to control, the "other." Feminist ethnographers pointed out that this division between researcher and subject is often gendered, with the male researcher associated with knowledge and rationality and the non-Western or non-male subject associated instead with emotion and the body. Establishing equality between participants and researchers was a fundamental strategy of feminist ethnographers, who tried to work toward intimacy, dialogue, and mutual self-disclosure in their relationships with research participants. Reciprocity became a vital element of feminist ethnography and was considered valuable in itself, not simply as a means to elicit information from informants.

Feminists also seized on the political potential of ethnography. They hoped that their research could expose women's oppression and highlight the need for political changes in particular areas. Indeed, feminist ethnographers, especially in developing countries, have often worked alongside those promoting policy and development initiatives, for example with non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

Challenges to Early Feminist Ethnography

Feminist ethnography's claims have been challenged, especially since the 1980s. One strand of this critique came from women of color who began asking whether the ethnographic methods propagated primarily by privileged white women could really uncover and represent adequately the voices of non-white women without falling back on racist assumptions. Further skepticism came from the sociologist Judith Stacey, who in 1988 published the essay "Can There Be a Feminist Ethnography?" Drawing on critiques by post-structuralist ethnographers, Stacey argues that mutuality and friendship between participants and researchers may increase the harm experienced by participants who open their lives to the researcher more than in less relational research. Participants may reveal personal information they later regret sharing. The researcher, rather than her informants, controls how participants' lives are represented. Participants may feel exploited, betrayed, and abandoned when the researcher, always freer to leave than the researched, departs.

A parallel crisis in the wider field of ethnography also occurred in the 1980s. A group of (mainly male) theorists influenced by postmodernism began questioning the realist assumptions of earlier ethnographers. Ethnography, they argued, is always a construction. Ethnographic accounts are written documents, textual constructions; as such, they construct, rather than represent, the social world. The ethnographer chooses from multiple possibilities how to observe the social setting and how to write the ethnographic account, and readers then construct their own readings of the work that is produced. Because ethnographic writing cannot claim to reveal truth, it may be more ethical to be polyphonic, allowing many different voices to speak, and rejecting attempts at unifying explanations. Such postmodern critiques advocate innovative styles of writing, including poetry, photography, diary entries and letters; linear narratives are eschewed.

Although feminist ethnography predates this "new" or postmodern ethnography, some of the contributions it offers are similar, notably the call for ethical scrutiny of the ethnographic enterprise and researcher reflexivity. Yet the feminist response to postmodern ethnography is mixed. Some consider feminism and postmodernism mutually necessary to developing an ethical ethnography that attends to differences (for example, of class, geography, ethnicity, or religion) among women and men. Postmodern feminist ethnography can deconstruct dominant discourses, revealing hidden assumptions. Participants and researcher can collaboratively produce analyses, allowing the multiple perspectives encountered in the field to be presented. But others are wary that postmodern ethnographic accounts are less accessible to readers. Also, rejecting an earlier focus on women's authentic voices can deny the women featured in the texts the agency they would have gained by being represented in more conventional feminist ethnographic writing.

The feminist and postmodern turns in ethnography are connected to differences and developments in epistemology (theories of knowledge). Feminist discussions about epistemology have paralleled the debates on ethnography. As such, they should be considered in tandem because the process and product of ethnography will inevitably be affected by the epistemology of those in the field, especially the researcher.

Conclusion

Today, feminist ethnographers benefit from this developing history. Many attempt to combine the best of these approaches, trying to do ethnography that is reflexive, alert to power differences between researchers and informants, and recognizes diversity among and between men and women. In representing and constructing the lives of their participants, feminist ethnographers try to move beyond the dichotomies of victimhood or agency, recognizing that choice and constraint are intertwined in women's lives. They try also to incorporate the material and the symbolic realms and to acknowledge accounts as partial, yet valuable in uncovering the complex ways in which women—and men—make sense of their gendered lives.

FEMINIST MAGAZINES

Feminist magazines, which materialized specifically in the 1970s, are associated with a period in history when women and other marginalized groups sought to change how society thought about and constructed personal relationships. Addressing issues concerned with women's personal and social lives, feminist magazines did not undermine popular magazines as much as they provided an additional and alternative space in which issues such as divorce, marital violence, employment, and child rearing could be discussed alongside other concerns. Feminist magazines represent an important intervention in the sphere of media production, allowing many women for the first time to discuss mutual concerns outside the control of popular-media determination.

From the mid-1960s, women's liberation, and then the lesbian and gay liberation movements, heralded the beginnings of a sea change in the understanding of the spheres of the personal and the political in both America and Britain. This turnaround was particularly apparent in the magazine industry that, until 1972, was dominated by popular commercial output. Before the emergence of magazines that directly addressed issues pertaining to feminist and women's liberation, popular magazines for women were produced and consumed in a society still pledged, albeit problematically and precariously, to patriarchy, middle-class norms, and fairly rigid racial and gender-sex divisions.

Much of the cultural incongruity of the late 1960s was brought about by groups involved in civil rights, sexual politics, and gay liberation. These activist spheres challenged traditional values, particularly notions of femininity, masculinity, and hegemonic heterosexuality. The issues being raised by the ongoing sexual-gender politics and activist campaigns, which had previously not been addressed in popular media, became a major feature of the new media output and, more specifically, feminist magazines.

The strained and conflicting dialogues of the 1960s and 1970s between traditional values and identity politics problematized theories of gender, identity, and sexuality. Until the early 1960s, images and representations in popular magazines aimed at women positioned women in relation to the home and domesticity, the family, heterosexual romance, marriage, and beauty. The content of magazines such as Family Circle and Woman's Own reinforced an ideology that promoted consumerism, sexual morality, and traditional gender separations. In magazines published before the early 1960s, conjugal role relations were depicted in ways that secured male rather than female hegemony. Women were expected to stay in the kitchen or do house cleaning, and men were encouraged to find secure careers and much greater degrees of independence. The dominant view depicted men in the public sphere, and the private sphere remained the domain of women.

However, during the 1960s, activist organizations such as the women's liberation movement appealed to women by looking beyond literary, artistic, and academic circles. This allowed feminists and campaigners to mobilize a much broader activist response to the oppressions that women continued to endure in both public and private spaces. One of the most accessible ways of addressing women's concerns about issues such as divorce, domestic violence, employment discrimination, and rape was via magazines.

Spare Rib, first published in Britain in 1972 on the basis of meetings that involved feminists Rosie Boycott and Marsha Rowe, along with Ms., also first published in 1972 and founded in America by Gloria Steinem, were publications that served a feminist agenda. Using a language and formats that attempted to de-objectify women, these magazines nonetheless addressed a broad range of everyday social anxieties. The publications deployed similar formats and editorial features but differed from mainstream commercial output of the time. Cosmopolitan and Nova did not seriously challenge the gendered nature of social structures, and representations of women in popular media ignored feminist critiques. Long-standing magazines such as Good Housekeeping and Family Circle, although highlighting the importance of mutuality and the sharing of roles, continued to reinforce the gendered nature of women's domestic responsibility within the family. Feminist magazines importantly questioned such output and in doing so, critically questioned received notions of beauty, romance, and domestic life.

Feminists in the early part of the 20th century campaigned for the right to vote and for changes in laws governing matrimony and contraception, whereas feminists from the 1960s ensured that the personal, social, and political spheres were seen in relation to each other. The media was important in bringing this to women readers and audiences. Women from diverse spheres of social life now had magazines that offered links to a world beyond the confines of domestic responsibility and that provided a forum for discussing wider politics and for exploring sexuality and desire.

Spare Rib and Ms., alongside more recent output (e.g., Diva, Lesbian News) have become vehicles for the dissemination of a wide range of concerns raised by and for women themselves. Earlier feminist output sought to distance itself from the glossy and stylized publications of the popular market, offering a critique of the domain occupied by popular output, but more recent magazines have incorporated the legacies of third-wave feminism into their formal construction and message.

The rationale underpinning Spare Rib and second-wave feminist books and journals in general is summarized in the rallying cry, "The personal is political." This slogan had important consequences to the extent that early feminist magazines moved away from an exclusive interest in the private spheres to one that allowed women and groups to narrate their own stories and to begin to construct new narratives of women's hidden histories.

Since its inception, Spare Rib constructed a critical feminist analysis of sexual oppression and gender inequality, without essentializing women's identities and without imagining a singular feminist discourse. Although some popular magazines essentialized women's sexual pleasures and desires in relation to patriarchal constructions, Spare Rib and other magazines addressed and explored women's pleasures in ways that challenged and subverted the objectification and fetishization of femininity in popular culture. In the early years of the 21st century, feminist magazines and publications are much more specific in their focuses and aims, tending to be more identity based yet still addressing the broader parameters of a feminist trajectory but that is now alert to the differences and dimensions of first-, second-, and third-wave agendas.

Feminist Methodology

As modern feminist sensibilities expanded beyond the second-wave feminist social movement of the 1970s, social critics and academics could hardly ignore feminism as an intellectual enterprise. Today, feminist theory and research is a central project of most traditional academic disciplines and interdisciplinary settings such as women's and gender studies departments and programs. Initially, many feminist scholars struggled with marginalization within the academy, often fighting for recognition of their own research, as well as of the theoretical innovations and methodological critiques that continue to define feminist scholarship as historically unique and socially relevant. Primarily developed by second-wave feminist scholars, feminist methodology is an approach to collecting information, analyzing data and conducting research that analyzes traditional or patriarchal understanding of how knowledge is produced and subsequently accepted as legitimate by peers in the academy, feminist activists, policymakers, and the general public.

The challenge for academic feminists was and continues to be to generate a research methodology that does not replicate the same epistemological and ontological problems that have contributed to forms of oppression based on gender or other marginalized statuses. The development of feminist methodology has benefited in part from the rise of non-positivist theoretical paradigms and the increasing acceptance and popularity of interpretive and critical perspectives in the humanities, social and behavioral sciences, health sciences and nursing, and education. This entry describes feminist methodology and research, approaches, standards, and issues.

Feminist Methodology and Feminist Research

Some of the core issues that have influenced the development of feminist methodology include the use and application of specific research approaches; qualitative versus quantitative hierarchies; bias and believability; objectivity and subjectivity; the impact of new approaches in terms of representation (modern and postmodern influences); voice, text, and ethics; and disciplinary versus interdisciplinary and multidisciplinary distinctions.

Feminist methodology, like feminist theory, has developed through three stages: (1) the study of sex differences and biological factors to defend or to support differential experience or inequality based on gender; (2) the study of gender as social construction, to understand the production of inequality through socialization within and through social structures and to challenge understandings of gender as an individual experience; and (3) research that locates gender at the center of inquiry for all social systems and representational forms, be they social institutions, cultural practices, or language and linguistic conventions.

One of the first questions that feminist researchers raised regarded the use and application of specific research methods. Sandra Harding makes a compelling argument about methods in her essay, "Is There a Feminist Method?" She argues that methods are simply tools or techniques for collecting information (data or evidence). Examples of methods include surveys, interviews, experiments, text analyses, and observation. Although any one tool in itself is not feminist, what makes the approach to gathering information feminist is one's ontology or epistemology and, thus, one's methodology. When gathering information or evidence for a purpose, an epistemology helps determine what is considered legitimate or authentic knowledge, who can gather information, how it can be obtained, and from whom. One catalyst in the development of feminist methodological approaches was a recognition of the need to enable groups that had traditionally been primarily the object of study by others or excluded from the research process altogether or from participating in their own research. Such methodological commitments guide the application and analysis of research methods.

Qualitative and Quantitative Approaches

Feminist knowledge production emerged in response to Enlightenment thought in which scientific inquiry became the dominant approach for explaining, understanding, and predicting both the natural and social world. Based on the tenets of rationality, reason, and objectivity, scientific inquiry evolved as an alternative to traditional perspectives and power structures. Rather than relying on philosophical and religious forms of knowledge, the scientific approach relies on empirical evidence to support causal claims. Known as positivism and objectivism, these perspectives assert the existence of universal truths and structures that are knowable. As this approach became more rationalized, quantification, or assigning numerical values to abstract concepts for measurement purposes, became the norm rather than one approach. As quantitative research became dominant, competing perspectives that questioned objectivity (that a researcher can engage in inquiry without influencing the subject of study), the ability to quantify complex concepts, and the practices of research (defining who can be knowers and participants of inquiry) arose.

This perspective, commonly known as relativism, rejects the notion of universal truths and holds that knowledge is constructed and affected by both the material conditions of the world and the positionality (gender, race, class, sexuality) of the researcher. Feminist researchers in particular privileged rather than disparaged positionality as a source of data. As feminist methodology emerged, many scholars promoted qualitative approaches, in which data collection and analysis are based on the words and actions of people using a narrative or descriptive perspective and representing participants' subjective experience of social situations. Recently, scholars such as Ann Oakley have suggested that the debates surrounding these approaches are gendered in themselves (with quantitative seen as masculine and qualitative as feminine) and that researchers should use the best method and methodology to answer the research question posed. The processes of qualification and quantification are intertwined for presenting a complex picture of social reality and the generalizable claims about social phenomena as regularly occurring structural events or circumstances.

Feminist Politics and Research Ethics

Feminist methodology has been concerned with the ethics of doing social research, especially in calling for self-reflexivity and discretion in managing the ethical aspects of the research process rather than simply adhering to preestablished codes of conduct.

Feminist methodologists have analyzed "value free" objectivity, examined power relationships between the researcher and the population studied, and promoted an intimacy based on an ethics of care in relationships between the researcher and researched. Methodologists often classify research ethics into several models that are based on philosophical tenets: deontological ethics, in which ethics are based on universal principles of truth and justice; utilitarian ethics, in which the appropriateness of research is evaluated according to the results' potential to promote the common good; context or situational ethics, which emphasizes the researcher's internalized moral values and skills in negotiating and evaluating the research situation; and an ethics of care and responsibility, which emphasizes care and responsibility for research participants along with social justice. Carol Gilligan provides a foundation for a feminist ethics of care through her argument that women and girls operate under different ethics than those usually described by developmental stage theorists. A feminist ethics of care involves personal experience, context, and nurturing relationships. The positionality of the researcher thus influences the dilemmas of the research process and the manner in which feminist researchers address these issues with the population studied.

Many feminist scholars question knowledge and truth claims that are based on positivist and Eurocentric ethics. These arguments assert the primacy of lived experience, the value of dialogue in assessing knowledge claims, and an ethic of personal accountability. An issue in both the ethics of care and context/situational ethics is the potential for experience-based knowledge to supersede or negate neutrality and impartiality. However, feminist methodology prioritizes achieving the best outcomes for the researcher and the study population; feminist researchers use these outcomes to evaluate the research. Critics of this position assert that ethics of care may obscure differences between the interests and positionalities of the researcher and the researched.

Bias and Objectivity

As it challenges perspectives based on more formalized and philosophical ethical codes, feminist methodology also advances discussion of ethical issues that concern the relationship between the researcher and the researched. Long-standing practices maintain distance between those who gathered and analyzed data and those who provided their embodied experience as information. Early feminist researchers questioned the value-free and objective stances that privileged this subject-object relation. Calling for more egalitarian relationships within the research process, feminist researchers believe that this approach could diminish or even eliminate power inequality produced in the collection and dissemination of research. In addition, feminist methodology calls on researchers to be more reflexive about their own role in the research agenda and to actively address the inclusion of participants in the design, administration, and dissemination of research. However, participants do not often share this level of self-reflexivity. Their ability to have an "equal" power relationship with researchers may be impossible or, at the least, a problem for all involved in the research process. These questions represent an area of active negotiation in the field.

Subjectivity and Insider/Outsider Status

Feminists have also challenged issues of objectivity and bias with claims that issues of race/ethnicity, sexuality, disability, and class are as important to data collection and analysis as are issues of gender. Feminists from marginalized groups claimed that their positionality allowed them to better understand the marginalized populations they wanted to research. However, as researchers and members of researched categories, this positionality also creates a problem: Researchers become separated both from their researcher peers and from the very populations they strive to represent. As a result, feminist methodology began to acknowledge and question the traditional "outsider position" that empirical and positivist traditions demanded; feminist methodologists also realized that the "insider" statuses that interpretative and critical approaches advocated did not necessarily result in either better understanding or diminished power differentials.

As feminist researchers challenged conventional understandings of objectivity and bias, they also questioned tools or means to assess research. One concern was validity, the ability of data measures to genuinely capture the concept being questioned. Another was reliability, which refers to whether a study's results will be repeated if the study is replicated. As counter-Enlightenment perspectives, such as interpretative and postmodern critiques of universalizing truth claims have gained influence, standards of the trustworthiness of credibility (internal validity), transferability (external validity), dependency (reliability), and confirmability (objectivity) have become even more important. These challenges to traditional positivist science advance feminist methodology in that they deconstruct or question concepts that institutions have adopted to maintain structural and interpersonal oppression. However, the lack of consensus on evaluation standards may also assist in obscuring oppression and limiting the potential for collective action.

Conclusion

Feminist research ranges from projects by self-identification and those whom others identify as such, research published in feminist journals, and projects funded by feminist-identified organization to any research that problematizes the diversity and construction of women's lives in gendered institutions and material and historical structures. Feminist methodology addresses the manner in which research is conducted and insists on theoretical, action, or policy frameworks that promote gender social justice. Although feminist methodologies have trouble achieving consensus among researchers, the issues uncovered through feminist methodology represent an important step toward social justice.

FEMINIST SEX WARS

Sexuality has always been one of the central issues of feminist activism and scholarship. In the 1980s, fierce debates about the representation of sexuality, and pornography in particular, overshadowed other sexuality-related topics. These conflicts are often referred to as the feminist sex wars, the center of which was located in the United States. Feminist voices against pornography are still heard today, most recently in Europe, although with diminished intensity. Pornography remains one of the most hotly debated issues within feminism, one that attracts highly polarized reactions.

Certain aspects of the anti-pornography feminist stance stemmed from the cultural feminism of the 1970s. This stream of feminism praises women's culture, characteristics, and values such as women's bonding, empathy, and care. Conversely, anything connected to the "male principle" is rejected and denied. Sexuality was framed as essentially male and therefore profoundly bad. Within this discourse, male sexuality is singled out as a main source of patriarchy, for example, by Robin Morgan. During the 1970s, sexuality became a forefront feminist issue, although it was reframed in terms of oppression rather than liberation, as had been typical of the 1960s.

These tendencies within feminism congealed into the anti-pornography wing of the movement, where pornography was identified as the primary source of patriarchal domination over women. The main arguments against pornography are that it causes violence against women, constructs woman as a person with subordinate social status, silences women, and thus, constitutes discrimination against women. Based on this reasoning, part of the feminist movement strived for anti-porn legislation.

Modeled on Morgan's famous phrase "pornography is the theory, rape is the practice," anti-porn feminists argue that pornography causes violence against women. Thus, all women are victims of porn, which in this view equals violence, and all men are pictured as filled with pornographic desire for violence because, inevitably, men are brutal by nature, as Susan Griffin notes. According to Laura Lederer, porn was emphasized as not about sex but, rather, about violence and subjugation. Authors such as Diana Russell presented arguments stressing the causal link between pornography and violence. Neil Malamuth and Edward Donnerstein state that such assertions are based mostly on the findings of behavioral psychology. Other feminists criticized the mechanistic assumptions behind these claims. These authors highlighted the reductive character of positivist research design, arguing that it simplifies our understanding of the dynamics of pornography's production and consumption. Despite these contestations, the argument connecting porn with violence is still commonly used by feminists today. In these accounts, violence and sex have become inseparably locked together.

According to Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, two leading figures in the feminist anti-porn battle, woman is defined by the objectives of men's desire, whereas pornography is the site of men's power over women. MacKinnon perceives sexuality as a realm of dominance and control, making it a central mechanism for producing gender inequality. In her account, the essence of sexuality is quintessentially revealed in pornography: hierarchy, power, violence. To be a woman in a world governed by porn means pain, degradation, and humiliation. In short, to be a woman means to be oppressed like one. Forming a circular argument, pornography is both cause and expression of the oppression of women. This conception of woman is contrary to the cultural feminist version, which places woman and everything feminine on a pedestal. However, anti-pornography feminism shares with its cultural-feminist predecessor a rejection of sexuality as negative. For the former, sexuality is the core mechanism of dominance of men over women, and for the latter, sexuality falls within an oppressive male principle.

Many feminists opposed such a simplification of both sexuality and femininity. Carol Vance pointed out the twofold character of sexuality as both a realm of restriction and danger as well as a realm of agency and pleasure for women. Ann Snitow and colleagues criticized the highly contentious appeals to morality, coupling femininity once again with endangered purity and positing women as "both culture's victims and its moral guardians," and thus reinforcing rather than subverting the conventional gender binary. These writers explored the complex political nature of the intersection of sexuality with race, class, and ethnicity, in both theoretical and activist modes.

Sexuality and gender are interconnected in multiple ways. MacKinnon, however, simply states that gender is sexual and that the meaning of this sexuality is constituted by pornography. In her account, gender is conflated with sexuality to the point of analytical obliteration. This underscores sexuality as a criterion fully constituting gender, and gender then fully constitutes a person and her status. Using this double step, MacKinnon reduces other status-founding and identificatory criteria into insignificance. Woman thus becomes a universal and ahistorical category. In this manner, the anti-pornography approach produces a feminist theory of gender that shows residual essentialism.

The anti-porn reduction of sexuality to the power of men over women is based on a heterosexualization of all sexuality. MacKinnon believes that sexual hierarchy produces gender as a stable category. If the paradigmatic metaphor for the production of gender is pornography, and gender comes out of pornography as a rigid binary, it becomes clear that sexuality in this account equals heterosexuality. MacKinnon strives to analyze a society that is profoundly structured by masculine domination and gets trapped in it herself when she articulates social relations exactly in terms of the dominant perspective, according to which men define women as sexual beings. Ironically, MacKinnon's theory effectively reproduces the dominant discourse. Where other feminists such as Judith Butler cogently theorized gender as a normative institution regulating sexuality (especially sexuality challenging the normative borders of gender) and questioned the supposed coherence of sex, gender, and desire, MacKinnon presented a snapshot of gender causally given by (hetero)sexuality, thus congruous with it, and therefore fundamentally unchangeable.

Typical of both cultural and anti-pornography feminism is their binary conception of gender. Conversely, a major dividing line is their valuation of womanhood. Although cultural feminism mostly glorifies women, there is no positive appraisal of women in anti-porn feminism. In the anti-pornography narrative, women are cast only in one role—the role of victims. Whereas MacKinnon grounds femininity in pornographic oppression, Wendy Brown attacks this definition because it grounds political subjectivity in the status of injury. Thus, a political identity rooted in victimhood must be maintained for the sake of the subject's existence.

Anti-pornography feminists claim that pornography inevitably and without exception silences women. Pornography is, according to Griffin, full of images of women gagged, women silenced; women are not expressing themselves but words are being put into their mouths. Dworkin targeted pornography as a crucial avenue for the male power of naming; she describes a system in which agency lies in the hands of men while women are left silent. This silencing and harm constitute discrimination against women, and therefore its cause, pornography, should be legally treated as such, according to MacKinnon. Anti-porn feminists such as MacKinnon and Dworkin rallied for legal action with the ultimate aim of redefining pornography as the degradation and dehumanization of women. Other feminists opposed such efforts, pointing to their censoring nature and claiming that in the end it is censorship, not pornography, that hurts women. Nadine Strossen notes that the harm done to women is corollary to the suppression of sexual expression that has traditionally been denied women. Anti-censorship feminism's claims ultimately proved their point. After a Canadian court decision against pornography, praised by MacKinnon as a victory for women, criminal charges were brought against a Toronto-based gay and lesbian bookstore for selling a lesbian erotic magazine. As Brenda Cossman describes, the magazine was outlawed according to the new legal interpretation, and with it, the social existence of sexual others.

The argument that pornography silences women can be disclaimed on two levels. On the first, anti-porn feminists' action, organizing, lobbying for new legislation, in other words, speaking, contradict their own argument that silencing is the only and inescapable result of pornography. On the second level, the legal restriction of pornography proposed by feminists proved, ironically, to actually silence women, particularly those who challenged the expected sex-gender-desire coherence. By accenting the legal way, the state's scrutiny over alternative sexualities and marginalized identities was strengthened.

The feminist sex wars thus often resulted in reduction to dichotomies: sexuality was placed in the categories of pleasure versus danger, victimization versus liberation—all of which reduced power to a negative and divided the feminist movement into two opposing camps. More nuanced critiques of representations of sexuality, however, gave rise to a refinement of conceptualizations of gender and sexuality along with a rethinking of feminist agency and empowerment.

FEMINIZATION OF LABOR

The feminization of labor refers to the increasing integration of women into the wage labor market as a result of industrialization and globalization processes. The rise of the United States as an industrial power in the 20th century marked the increase in the demand for female workers into the wage labor force. The shift in the U.S. economy from agriculture to manufacturing to service has had a significant impact on labor demands and, in particular, on notions of women's labor. Perhaps one of the most important social and economic developments of the 20th century in the United States and abroad is the remarkable increase of women in the labor force. Women's participation remains important in today's global economy, as described in this entry.

Separate Spheres and Women's Work

The notion of separate spheres dominated 19th- and 20th-century thinking about gender roles and perpetuated beliefs in intrinsic differences between women and men and in the inferiority of women to men. Patriarchal family relations that focus on women's subordination to men and essentialist notions that women are naturally suited as care providers for the family made it much easier to exploit the labor of women inside and outside the home. The development of the "cult of womanhood" in the 20th century glorified women as mothers and nurturers and only exacerbated the devaluation of women's labor. Consequently, labor markets have been framed around the notion of separate spheres contributing to the gendering of work in the 20th century. Justifications of lower pay for women's work and assumptions about women's place in the home and the need for part-time or flexible work have put women at a distinct disadvantage in the paid labor market. Race and class further inform these gendered experiences. Not all women's experiences are the same: Just as gender ideologies are summoned to favor men over women, racial and ethnic ideologies are used to disadvantage groups and maximize profits by devaluing labor.

The Feminization of Labor in the United States

With the growth of U.S. industrialization in the 20th century, women's labor force participation increased remarkably, thus challenging the ideology of separate spheres. Regardless, gendered expectations of work remained. Industries such as textile manufacturing became predominantly female, whereas metal and steel industries primarily employed men. As Julia Blackwelder and others have described, technology is gender-laden. Stereotypical notions of women being good at "detail" work, or having "nimble fingers" better suited for textile and clerical work, contributed to, and in many ways cemented, occupational segregation. Women's work was regarded as less skilled, and consequently, of less value, and, more importantly, as only needed to supplement family income.

During World War II, women flocked to occupations that were previously inaccessible to them. Despite women needing employment to survive, rather than "pin money" to supplement family income, the wage gap remained. War-end layoffs and occupational demotions for women were significant. Nevertheless, the war's impact on the acceleration of the feminization of labor in the United States was far-reaching.

As the economy shifted from a blue-collar to a white-collar economy—that is, from manufacturing-based to service-based economies—women's labor force participation grew at rates greater than men's. Much of the growth of women's labor force participation took place in female-dominated "pink-collar" industries, rather than breaking occupational segregation barriers.

By late 20th century, U.S. women began entering occupations to which they had previously been denied access. Yet parallel to women's entry into new occupational terrain was the remarkable growth in low-wage service work—labor in which women are overrepresented. The economic restructuring of the global economy of the late 20th century into the 21st century has significantly affected the feminization of labor across the globe.

The Feminization of Globalization

With increased economic globalization, women have been incorporated into the global economy as a source of cheap labor. Transnational corporations operating under free trade agreements have outsourced production to developing regions of the globe where women are overrepresented in low-paying, labor-intensive, economically insecure jobs. In many respects, the global economy is maintained by gendered labor that is waged and unwaged and that occurs outside and inside the home. Globally, the service sector provides the majority of female jobs: Of employed women in 2007, almost half are in the service sector. Furthermore, in 2007, the International Labor Office considers about half of employed women to be vulnerably employed—working under relatively precarious circumstances. Increasingly, the feminization of the global labor market reflects the influx of women into low-paying jobs as well as the changing quality of employment generally. What was once characterized as women's work (low-paying, "flexible," part-time, and precarious labor) increasingly describes the quality of labor for both women and men today in the global economy.

A corollary of the feminization of labor has been the feminization of poverty, a situation in which women represent an increasing proportion of the poor in both the developed and developing worlds. Though women's labor force participation has increased substantially, their participation in the labor market has not been accompanied by a reduction in expectations regarding child care and household responsibilities. Women's work, therefore, has a greater likelihood of a double bind: Women confront low-paying, vulnerable labor market participation while having to meet the demands of familial labor. In many ways, the feminization of globalization has exacerbated existing inequalities between men and women.

Conclusion

Although globalization processes and the feminization of labor have had devastating economic consequences for women, these processes have significant implications for mobilization and activism as a new base of working women forms across the globe. The processes of globalization have indeed created a new constituency of workers empowered and bolstered by global women's rights movements and international gatherings such as the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action for Equality, Development and Peace of the Fourth World Conference on Women held in 1995. The growth of a global women's movement that focuses on the feminization of poverty brought on by economic globalization, and the inequalities and struggles of women across the globe provides a response to globalization processes that further the immiseration of women globally; nonetheless, many are optimistic that mobilization against these trends is continuing to strengthen.

Feminization of Migration

The term feminization of migration is often loosely associated with the increase in the number of women migrating. However, the term was originally coined in the 1980s by economist Guy Standing to describe a much more complex process. Standing argued that the increasing globalization of production and the pursuit of flexible labor forces to increase competitiveness favored the feminization of employment in terms of the increased numbers of women in the labor force and the deterioration of work conditions for these workers. The actual increase in women migrating should be reviewed carefully, because even with the increase, the percentage of women migrating is just under 50 percent of the total population of migrants. In addition, the proportion of men and women migrants changes drastically from country to country. The significant changes in women's migratory patterns are not in the numbers of women migrating per se, but in the reasons for migration, the newer roles women have been taking as migrants, and the cumulative effects these demographic shifts have on the local and global economy. The globalization of women's traditional role poses important challenges to understanding gender and economic inequality. The feminization of migration is predicted to increase because demand for women migrants is often greater than the demand for men migrants. This entry describes these patterns of change and discusses some of the implications.

Conceptualization

In the 1970s, the typical profile for a migrant was that of a male breadwinner. Since the 1980s, an increasing number of women have become migrants. Women, however, have always been present in migratory processes, often as spouses, daughters, or dependents of male migrants. Women are now migrating independently for economic opportunities.

The feminization of migration has produced specifically female forms of migration. Some immigration and human rights organizations argue that the feminization of migration is the result of an economic crisis in the agricultural sector, which has led to increased obstacles to men's ability to maintain their status as head of household and primary breadwinner. Male unemployment and high rates of female head of household have forced women to seek alternative sources of income, of which migration seems to be the most lucrative and sustainable. Immigration trends show huge numbers of women migrating over long distances. Female migrants have accounted for a larger percentage of migrants in developing countries than in the industrialized world.

The feminization of migration has produced gender-typed forms of migration, particularly in terms of domestic workers and caregivers, performed either in private homes or institutionalized settings such as hospitals or nursing homes; trafficking of women for the sex industry; and the organized migration of women for marriage. The migration of women predominantly for these forms of work includes both legal and illegal migration, as well as voluntary and forced migration.

Gender and Migration

Gender is an important component in understanding the process of migration. Gender shapes the migration process directly in that it influences the division of labor and the structure of the family as a whole. Migration and immigration patterns are shaped by gender roles and gender socialization, both universally and more particularly to regions, cultures, and both men and women migrants. This gender socialization is influenced by economic, political, social, and cultural factors. The global demand for migrant labor presently prioritizes women's specific skills and traditional roles. This has shifted local, national, global, and transnational associations of gender norms, gender socialization, and gender roles.

Gender plays a significant role in the construction of work made available to migrant workers. Demands for low-paid migrant workers continue, but often in types of jobs that afford a great deal of control over workers, in gender-typed professions that are typically undesirable, unregulated, and underpaid. Despite this, the current migration of women combines aspects of traditional male immigration, in that it is largely autonomous, without dependent family members. In addition, the most recent migration of women is for primarily economic purposes. Migrating women play a crucial role in the creation and maintenance of migratory networks that have implications for both the home and host countries. Demographic, economic, gender, and security differences are sometimes linked to networks. These networks have been shaped by four major revolutions: global economic integration, communications, transportation, and human rights. Increasingly, women are not "latecomers" in migratory practices, but the principle actors, breadwinners, in migratory movement. This challenges older assumptions about immigration worldwide as well as forces a reexamination of gendered expectations and actual gendered behavior. A gendered perspective on immigration is becoming more common as acknowledgement of the changes in migratory patterns increases.

Changes in the Migration Process

The number of countries affected by migration is much larger than ever before, involving most of the world in the web of migration. Migration from poorer to richer countries has increased significantly. Economic differences between nation-states are widening, increasing the motivation for economically motivated migration. By February 2007, 191 million people around the world, which is roughly 3 percent of the world's population, were living in a country different from the one in which they were born. An estimated 15 to 20 percent of the world's immigrants, roughly 30 million people, are unauthorized.

The two primary means of analyzing immigrant women's and men's experiences are the push-pull effects and the systems approach. The push-pull factors isolate whether immigrants are pushed out of their home country by unfavorable circumstances or pulled toward another country by greater opportunity. The complex factors behind the push to migrate and the pull to a particular locale are shaped by capitalism and trends of globalization. Some of the push factors are overpopulation; political, religious, or social cultural persecution; and economic hardship. The pull factors can specifically include a promise of freedom and individual security, economic opportunity, and present subcultural communities. Attention to differences in the lived experiences of men and women is important when considering the push-pull factors of immigration. The socialization of women as nurturer, mother, wife, and often dependent, but lived experience of the increasing commonality of woman as breadwinner influence what pushes the woman migrant out and what region pulls them in. Additionally, variables such as race, ethnicity, religion, education level, and access to resources also shaped these women's perceptions of what push them out of their home countries and what forces pull them to new regions of the world, whether it be intended for temporary or permanent resettlement.

The systems approach focuses on a multiplicity of social factors that aid in the immigration decision. Variables such as race, ethnicity, religion, social networks, education level, and access to resources also shape these migrants' decision-making processes that bring them to new regions of the world, whether it is intended for temporary or permanent resettlement. Both theories are used across a variety of disciplines and can be helpful in thinking about how immigration and gender are interconnected and how different systems and push and pull factors affect the process of immigration for women.

Globalization, Gender, and Work

The most recent immigration of women is labor oriented, most often with temporary intentions, and independent in that it is not motivated by family reunification; more and more females are emigrating first. More attention has been given to the numbers of women migrants and the global effects of women migrating for labor purposes. The world trade in services and labor favors women's labor migration in contrast to the demands for male manufacturing workers in the early parts of industrialization in the Western world. Women are now more likely to move from one country to another on their own. However, women's opportunity to migrate legally has been more limited than has that of men in most countries. There are some entrance restrictions for both men and women that involve stipulations for gender-typed work.

Globalization has allowed women to be more on the move than ever before. This movement has led to both exploitation and opportunity. There is a great flow of female labor and energy, which has resulted in three new trends. The first change is the entering of women in the "mobile world" as primary actors, which transforms the masculine landscape of understanding migration. The second is the change of mobilization of the unskilled category, and the third is related to the spatial patterns and the direction of migratory flow, changing the traditional flow from south to north, to a flow that is less linear. The ongoing process of globalization is tied to feminization as a feature of more recent work labor markets. Sexual division of labor outside of the household shapes the roles of family members. Many women who become migrant workers escape violence and or other precarious positions but often find themselves in similar positions in a foreign land.

Many argue that the feminization of migration is a direct consequence of the feminization of poverty, which affects women in the developing world the most. Issues that include the increase of HIV in the developing world have resulted in an increase in women as head of household and increased the extent of their lived poverty. Therefore, many women face the decision of migration solely to support their families.

Feminized Work

The distinction between productive work and reproductive work is important. Productive work refers to employment in the formal or informal economy, and reproductive work refers to work that is necessary for the functioning of households. Women are often recruited internationally to do reproductive work in other people's homes. This involves tasks of social reproduction of the labor force. This occupation has relatively easy access without prior training required because it usually mirrors household work. In the case of live-in domestic work, housing does not have to be accounted for. The major disadvantage is the lack of labor mobility because domestic work does not provide an avenue for other occupations; it involves long hours, abuse from employers, and instability of employment because of the unregulated, and often illegal, nature of the work.

Both reproductive and productive work in the host community is almost exclusively carried out by women. The lifestyles of the first world are made possible by a global transfer of the services associated with a wife's traditional role-child care, homemaking, and sex—from poor countries to rich countries. The migration of women from developing nations to do women's work in affluent countries is increasing. A major component of the exploitation of female migrant workers is the legal and illegal recruiters and agents that work in both the home and receiving countries. Restrictive regulations of these practices often drive the work underground, often leading to greater exploitation. The filling of domestic jobs by migrants in the host countries is evidence that despite the advances made in gender equality, the market continues to assign women jobs that maintain and reinforce traditional gender roles, and women's second-class status as paid workers. Domestic work is a site of feminization of migration, as well as part of the reconstruction of social inequalities on a global scale.

A large number of migrants are working in jobs for which they are overqualified. Regardless of their level of education, most women migrants are funneled into domestic work where there is little social status, little social and legal protection, and low pay. Many organizations that specialize in migrants' rights are now focusing attention on policies that aid the increasing number of women migrants, while addressing the lack of male-based work for migrant men.

A component of the feminization of migration is forced migration that primarily encompasses human trafficking of women and children for the sex industry. The United States presently estimates that between 800,000 and 900,000 people are victims of forced migration for purposes of human trafficking each year. Prostitution is the main cause. Recently, this has become understood as a human rights issue. Attention to gender discrimination, income inequality, and the lack of other opportunity are factors that help explain the proliferation of human trafficking in women.

Migration and Family

In both rich and poor countries, fewer families can rely solely on a male breadwinner. Many migrants are forced by economic necessity to leave their families behind and pave the way for the family's economic betterment. Often migrants who leave their families behind send remittances.

Remittances traditionally refer to money sent home to remaining family members. Remittances play an important role in the global economy. In particular, they have become an important stabilizing economic force for many developing countries.

According to estimates from the World Bank, developing countries received 126 billion American dollars in remittances in 2004. The volume has increased steadily. The women who send remittances are usually described as household providers. Women who move by choice through voluntary migration are estimated to remit less, and usually do so in the form of family investments, such as education. As a result, there has been an increase in education of girls in the developing world. Dependent women contribute the least to remittance flows.

Remittances have also more recently been used as a concept to illustrate the new ideology and behavior that immigrants attain through the socialization of their work in their new home. The social remittances that women migrants send or eventually take home themselves are usually in the form of new skills or applied knowledge. These new skills or applied knowledge often challenge the norms of gender socialization in their home country.

The feminization of migration has also affected the gender roles and familial roles of those left home. For example, United Nations International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women (INSTRAW) reports that 90 percent of Dominican women who migrated to Spain left their households in charge of another woman, most frequently a mother or a sister. Therefore, this affects the family that is left behind in the reassignment of gender roles and gender norms for the family as a unit.

The proliferation of long distance and long-term transnational family ties challenges conventional notions of the family. Many argue that migration transforms, reorients, and reprioritizes family relationships. The situation intensifies as women who are separated from their children often have a strong sense of anguish and feelings of guilt. Migration becomes a decision related to the needs of a family unit. Though women can gain independence through emigration, many of them confront a series of conflicts in their daily lived experiences as well as in their own conception of their futures.

Conclusions: Effects of Feminization of Migration

Feminization of migration has affected all aspects of the world that has been shaped by migration. The effects of feminizing the work of women migrants and the effects of migrating as independents are shaped by cultural variance, yet are not cultural, regional, or religiously specific. The trends shaping feminization of migration affect women across the globe. However, there are some notable distinctions and shifts in the recent migration of women. The feminization of migration has affected more than just the host and home countries and families affiliated with the migrant. Institutions such as health care have also been affected by the trends of a growing number of female migrants. In the Mediterranean, an influx of primarily female migrants has taken many positions involving elderly care. This feminization of migration is interconnected with the change in the care of Southern European regimes.

In Asia, the movement of laborers is becoming an important phenomenon associated with economic growth and development because it eases skill imbalances in labor markets while providing broad cultural and economic benefits for sending and receiving countries. In many developing Asian countries, the transformation from an agricultural to an industry economy and the massive mobilization of women in the workforce points to the importance of a global manufacturing structure. The uneven economic and political development throughout has initiated new migration movements and patterns and led to a creation of transnational spaces and changes in gender relations and power. The feminization of migration greatly alters individuals, groups, such as families and kinship networks, and all the major institutions that shape social life.

A contraction of "feminist" and "bureaucrat," the title femocrat originated in Australia in 1981 to describe a new generation of feminist policymakers who sought to address feminist concerns about issues such as pay equity, violence against women, and sexual harassment. Though some scholars argue that the conditions that enabled the proliferation of femocrats only exist in Australia and the Scandinavian countries, others maintain that though the term (if not the concept) originated in Australia, it has successfully migrated to a wide range of countries. Either way, the Australian roots of the term call attention to the vibrant feminist movement in Australia throughout the 1970s and 1980s and the significant inroads femocrats made within that state bureaucracy. By the 1980s, hundreds of femocrats worked throughout the Australian government.

The position of a femocrat is often one of tension and contradiction: femocrats must navigate loyalties to feminist movement goals and the constraints of working within rigid government institutions. Indeed, feminist scholars and others have taken disparate views of the femocrat role. Scholars who praise the work of femocrats cite the material benefits femocrats have brought about, including the passage of laws aimed to address violence against women, pay equity, and child care. Having ties to state actors has enabled the women's movement to effectively bring a feminist agenda to key government officials.

Criticisms of the femocrat role mirror critiques of second-wave feminism more generally: white, middle-class, formally educated, heterosexual, straight women often set the agenda. This can be especially problematic when femocrats claim to speak on behalf of all women, which can lead to policies that may not represent the needs of women from different class and racial backgrounds from the femocrats themselves. Some scholars argue that femocrat-influenced policies reproduce oppressive colonial relations between whites and nonwhites. Tellingly, some definitions of femocrat state that it is a contraction of the terms feminist, bureaucrat, and aristocrats. Furthermore, other critics argue that femocrats' placement within the state bureaucracy dilutes their commitment to the goals of women's liberation.

Evaluating the work of femocrats becomes most meaningful in specific cases. Keeping in mind the tensions inherent in the role can help in assessing the impact of femocrats in specific advocacy and policy arenas.

FERTILITY RATES

In the United States, the stereotypical family includes a married man and woman having 2.2 children. It is becoming increasingly clear, however, that all women may not bear the average number of children; individual and societal-level fertility rates are continually changing. In discussing fertility rates, it is important to note how fertility rates are defined, why it is important to track fertility rates, and how current fertility rates are influenced by demographic, governmental, social, political, and economic influences. These topics will be outlined in further detail in this entry.

Defining Fertility Rates

First, it is important to distinguish birth rates from fertility rates. Birth rates are defined as the number of live births per 1,000 women in the total population (across all demographic levels). In terms of population growth, however, the single most important factor is the total fertility rate (TFR). The TFR is defined as the average number of babies born to women during their reproductive years, which is typically considered ages 15 to 44. For the population in a given area to remain stable, an overall TFR of 2.1 is needed, assuming no immigration or emigration occurs. In other words, if, on average, women birth 2.1 children and these children survive to the age of 15, any given woman will have replaced herself and her partner upon death; a TFR of 2.1 is known as the replacement rate. Generally speaking, when the TFR is greater than 2.1, the population in a given area will increase, and when it is less than 2.1, the population in a given area will eventually decrease, though it may take some time because factors such as age structure, emigration, or immigration must be considered. More specifically, if there are numerous women of childbearing age and a relatively small number of older individuals within a given society, the death rate will be low, so even though the TFR is below the replacement rate, the population may remain stable or even increase slightly. This trend could not last infinitely, but could last for decades.

Currently, this type of trend can be seen in the United States and other developed nations. Women in these areas are not having enough children to replace themselves and their partners upon death, but there are more women of childbearing age than older, dying individuals (and immigration rates are substantial), so the population continues to grow despite the low TFR.

The Importance of Tracking Fertility Rates

Tracking fertility rates is important for a few reasons. First, tracking fertility rates allows for more efficient and beneficial planning and resource allocation within a particular region. If a country experiences unusually high, sustained fertility rates, increasing numbers of schools, affordable child care, and health care advancements may be needed. This most recently occurred in the United States during the post–World War II baby boom era. During this period, the TFR in the United States peaked at about 3.8, which is almost double what it was 40 years later. The unusually high number of children born during this period left communities unprepared. It is also important to know if regions experience declining TFRs. Sustained low fertility rates may signify a rapidly aging population, which may place an undue burden on the economy through increasing health care costs and the cost of supporting maximal numbers of retirees.

Finally, it is critical to track age- and race-related fertility trends to obtain a better sense of the changing needs of different population groups. With regard to race- or ethnicity-related shifts, TFRs have declined substantially among non-Hispanic blacks, American Indians, and non-Hispanic whites. Fertility rates among young Hispanics, however, are steadily increasing, which has prompted sex education programs and health care initiatives in some areas to shift to accommodate this trend. There have also been changes in age-related TFRs. TFRs have increased among women older than 30 but decreased among women younger than age 25. In addition, birth rates have substantially declined in teens aged 15 to 19, as of 2005. These shifts indicate that more women are waiting to have children because of increasing educational pursuits and later marriages. In addition, teen pregnancy rates are decreasing, which indicates successful teen pregnancy–related interventions.

Current Fertility Rates

Fertility rates vary across world regions. Although still high in many parts of the world, TFRs have begun to decline overall. In 1998, the world's TFR was slightly less than 3, which indicates overall population growth, as explained earlier. In developed countries such as the United States, however, TFRs are beginning to fall below the replacement rate, which will mean an eventual lack of population growth for these regions if this continues. Both the United Nations Population Division and the U.S. Census Bureau project that TFRs will continue to decline to an estimated TFR of 2.3 worldwide by 2025.

In general, developed countries generally have lower fertility rates than developing countries will. This is partly the result of economic prosperity and medical technology in developed countries. In other words, in developed countries, childhood mortality rates are lower and birth control is more readily accessible than in developing countries. Moreover, in developed countries children are often seen as an economic drain, as the cost to educate, feed, clothe, and protect them becomes increasingly high. In addition, in developed countries, young adults are spending longer periods obtaining a higher level of education, which often delays the age at which they have children. Finally, more children are needed in developing countries to engage in farming and other economic pursuits for the average family. In these regions, children are also necessary caregivers for younger siblings and providers for their aging parents. Also contributing to the higher fertility rates in developing countries is the lack of contraceptive access and lower amounts of female education.

Influences on Fertility Rates

Many influences affect fertility rates. This section describes such governmental, social, political, and economic influences.

Governmental Influences

Governmental policies and positions can significantly influence TFRs. TFRs in Spain, for example, have decreased significantly since the early 1970s. This decline in TFR across just one generation has been attributed to a shift away from the pronatalist Franco regime, which encouraged larger family sizes and deemphasized contraception, to a more democratic regime, which does not have such stringent policies on family size and contraception.

Governmental policies related to fertility can take two forms: direct and indirect. Direct policies are those that offer tax breaks or childbearing incentives. The impact of a direct policy on fertility rates is usually immediate. Indirect policies are those that target other societal goals, but then inadvertently affect fertility rates. Indirect policies include shifts in child care implementation or regulations and laws regarding maternity and paternity leave. It is shortsighted to speculate which of these types of policies has more long-term impact on TFRs because the efficacy of such programs is influenced heavily by social, political, and economic climates within a region.

Despite the influence that governments can have on TFRs, worldwide, few policy interventions have worked to reverse low TFRs. But, historically, governments have attempted to increase TFRs by implementing a variety of policies and programs. In the last several years, France has used a vast array of policies with one main goal in mind. More specifically, France created more harmony among individuals' work and family lives so that the threat of work and family conflict would not dissuade young adults from bearing children. To accomplish this goal, France provided child care subsidies that enabled individuals to work and have a family more easily. Second, France has implemented a reward system for individuals who have at least three children. Sweden has also followed this pattern by creating more flexible work schedules for women, ensuring quality child care, and allowing more flexible parental leaves.

Social, Political, and Economic Influences

A nation's social structure may also influence the success of fertility-based interventions. In other words, varying political, economic, and social policies may dictate that an intervention that works in one country may not work in another. Also, social changes may influence fertility rates more than policy-based interventions do. This was the case when fertility rates declined in the former East Germany after unification. Experts claimed that these changing fertility rates were more the result of a shifting social environment than of intervention or policy change. In East German families, where the unification caused economic instability, children were less likely during the subsequent 1 to 3 years. In comparison, West Germany's fertility rate remained relatively stable after unification. Experts noted that, because the unified Germany's political, economic, and social climates mirrored that of the former West Germany, fertility rates in West Germany were uninfluenced by the unification. Similarly, when Poland began to use a free-market economy, which significantly changed the economic environment of that nation, Poland began to experience a marked decrease in fertility rates.

Conclusion

In the future, the image of the stereotypical family may not include a married man and woman with 2.2 children. In some areas, the TFR has already fallen below replacement value. It is important to track fertility rates because, in the event that the population continues to lessen or even begins to decline, numerous economic and social ramifications may exist. It is also critical to realize how demographic, governmental, social, political, and economic factors influence fertility rates as the 21st century continues and the world's landscape continually shifts.

FETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) is a cluster of birth defects related to prenatal alcohol exposure. There are four diagnostic criteria for FAS: prenatal or postnatal growth deficiency, central nervous system abnormalities (most typically mental retardation), a set of characteristic craniofacial features, and confirmed maternal alcohol use during pregnancy. Estimates of the prevalence of FAS vary widely, partly because there is no set standard for recognizing a child affected by FAS. In the United States, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimate that FAS affects 0.2 to 1.5 births per 1,000. FAS tends to be concentrated among minority and disadvantaged populations. For example, in the United States, the reported prevalence of FAS is highest among African Americans and American Indians. Reports of FAS are particularly prevalent in South Africa, Russia, and among Native Peoples of Canada. However, numerous studies have documented both overdiagnosis and underdiagnosis of FAS in certain population groups. Moreover, FAS is subject to ascertainment bias, meaning that physicians may be more inclined to see it in some groups than others.

Not all women who drink heavily during pregnancy have babies with FAS; the syndrome is correlated with poverty, race/ethnicity, advanced maternal age, and high parity. Researchers have hypothesized that factors such as nutritional status, exposure to environmental toxins, smoking, and stress may exacerbate the adverse effects of alcohol. Despite widespread public belief that any alcohol exposure during pregnancy is dangerous, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact etiology of FAS. Binge drinking (the consumption of five or more drinks in a single episode) is highly correlated with FAS.

In 1973, physicians at the University of Washington discovered FAS, based on similar defects observed among eight children of alcoholic mothers. During the last several decades, the diagnosis has expanded to include categories such as "fetal alcohol effect," "alcohol-related birth defects," and "alcohol-related neuro-developmental disorder." There are no clear diagnostic criteria for these labels.

Governments around the world have responded in disparate ways to the policy issues raised by FAS. In the United States, the surgeon general first issued a warning advising pregnant women not to drink in 1981 (updated in 2004), and congressionally mandated warning labels have appeared on all alcoholic beverages since 1989. Rates of FAS have not decreased since implementation of these measures. European countries tend to have more permissive attitudes about prenatal alcohol use, whereas drinking during pregnancy is today a highly stigmatized behavior in the United States. South Dakota and Wisconsin permit civil detention of women who drink during pregnancy; several states have brought criminal charges against women whose babies have allegedly been born with FAS or a related diagnosis. None of these prosecutions has been successful.

Fetal Rights/Public Fetus

Medical technologies increasingly provide new ways of seeing and knowing the body. In pregnancy, fetal imaging technologies, diagnostic tools, and fetal surgeries have changed the status of the fetus from organism to personhood, a social status reserved for living human beings. Although medical treatment still requires accessing the fetus through the pregnant woman's body, recent technological advances demonstrate that the fetus is no longer fully contained therein. The woman's subjective and embodied experience of the fetus has shifted from a private or semi-private phenomenon to one that is public. New technologies produce representations of the fetus that aid in the construction of fetal personhood, allowing public investment in women's pregnancies and the rights of the fetus.

The shifting status of the fetus is an ongoing process made possible through interpretation and social interaction. In addition to cultural beliefs and political agendas, medical technology has been a key factor in shaping how individuals and collectivities interact with the fetus, give meaning to the interaction, and thereby interpret its status. The definition of the fetus as either a biological organism or a person results from this process. This entry first examines the role of medical technology as a key factor in the social construction of fetal personhood. Then, it discusses the implications of fetal personhood in elevating the rights of the fetus over the rights of pregnant women.

Medical Technology in the Construction of Personhood

The discourses of science and medicine have powerful implications for social understandings of the body and the fetus within the body. Technologies of reproduction have made the science of human development visible and available to multiple audiences. Imaging technologies have produced the evidence and the imagery used to demonstrate contraception and fetal development in scientific texts, pregnancy guidebooks, educational materials, and in doctor-patient interactions. New medical technologies that monitor fetal development present the stages of development on a continuum of personhood, promoting prenatal bonding and fetal patienthood.

Personhood at the Cellular Level

Anthropologist Emily Martin's cultural analysis of reproduction demonstrates how technological advances call for new considerations of personhood and the individual. In describing the content of scientific texts, Martin reveals gendered stereotypical imagery of the egg and the sperm. The egg is cast either as a damsel in distress waiting for a heroic sperm to save her or as a dangerously aggressive threat who lies in wait to trap an active but ineffectual sperm. In addition to gendering the egg and sperm, this narrative suggests deliberate human action at the cellular level. The intentional action does not belong to the persons whose bodies are involved in the interaction but to the cellular entities living within them. Intentionality is a key aspect of personhood in Western culture, thereby conferring the status of personhood to the cellular level, a necessary step in transferring personhood to the fetus at the moment of fertilization.

Prenatal Bonding

Medical technologies further identify the embryo as an individual person. This social investment in fetal personhood carries with it benefits and costs. Home pregnancy tests, for example, have encouraged women to begin to construct the personhood of their embryo/fetus at earlier points in a pregnancy. Pregnancy tests are an affordable, low-tech option used to measure the pregnancy hormone, human chorionic gonadotropin (HCG), which can establish a pregnancy before the first missed menses. These tests enable women to experience themselves as pregnant much earlier than would have been possible without this technology.

After confirming the test result with a doctor, women often begin a planning process that typically involves pregnancy guidebooks, the onset of regular fetal monitoring in a clinical setting, and disclosure of the pregnancy within one's social networks. As women experience pregnancy, cultural norms of good mothering begin to take hold. Mundane behaviors such as healthful eating, prenatal nutrition, and avoidance of risks to the fetus are imbued with moral meaning to safeguard the future child. The increase of prenatal maternal responsibilities signals a shift in focus from the health of the pregnant woman to the health of the fetus.

Corresponding with the narrative of fetal development found in pregnancy guidebooks and educational materials (from fertilized egg to complete human being), imaging technologies have enabled the fetus to be constructed as a separate, developing person. Sonograms provide visual evidence that gives women and others direct access to the fetus and help establish the "reality" of a "baby" in the early stages of pregnancy. Sonography facilitates prenatal bonding and can even be used in infertility treatment to demonstrate the process to would-be parents before a pregnancy occurs.

Fetal imaging technologies establish personhood without considering that many pregnancies end at some point along the way for reasons that are entirely unknown. Although studies reveal that 10 percent to 25 percent of all clinically recognized pregnancies end in miscarriage, the stages of fetal development are presented definitively. For those who have experienced pregnancy loss, the early personification of the fetus can intensify and lengthen the duration of emotional distress.

Fetal Patienthood

The subjectivity of the fetus is paramount with advances in medical technology. However, the status of the fetus has also become contested terrain as some medical professionals consider the fetus to be a potential patient. Varied definitions of the fetus emerge from perceptions outlined in key policy documents and medical journals, the ways practitioners discuss the fetus and the mother, and the processes of decision making about surgical procedures and practices. For instance, an analysis of medical journals illustrates a general belief that a surgery automatically signifies patienthood—a status reserved for human beings. The notion is that surgical procedures would not be performed on a clot of blood. However, studies in fetal surgery reveal that some fetuses are considered to be patients whereas others are not, and in some cases even the same fetus may shift between these statuses during treatment.

Perceptions of fetal pain (fetal stress) have also brought personhood to the forefront of medical ethics debates. Numerous medical reports have concluded that the immaturity of the fetal central nervous system prevents conscious awareness of pain before 26 weeks gestation. Yet, medical technologies have monitored fetal hormonal stress responses, which have influenced fetal treatment. In protecting the fetal patient, legal review boards have discussed the duty of practitioners to prevent and treat fetal pain. This variation in fetal status among practitioners, researchers, and review boards illustrates the role of social context in perceptions of fetal status and the political implications of fetal personhood.

Personhood and the Rights of the Fetus

Medical knowledge and technologies strongly influence individual and public understandings of proper fetal development. Based in assumptions about scientific objectivity, the medical system asserts a strong ideological force that expands medical jurisdiction and provides the framework for personal and public understanding of reproduction in addition to other aspects of health and illness. Definitions of personhood based in science and medicine lay the foundation for the expanded monitoring of both women and fetuses. New medical technologies have reinforced the construction of fetal personhood already evident within scientific and medical discourse about reproduction. This construction has enabled greater prenatal bonding and the positioning of the fetus as a patient. In a feedback loop, these processes have further solidified the status of fetal personhood.

Fetal imaging technologies in particular have furthered the investment in fetal personhood and pronatalist agendas. As the subjectivity of the fetus has taken the foreground, however, the needs and rights of the pregnant woman have shifted toward the background, creating a contested area where the rights of women are positioned in opposition to the rights of the fetus. Especially in the last few decades, it has become the personal responsibility of pregnant women and their social networks to protect the health of the fetus through fetal monitoring, behavior modification, and prenatal bonding. It has become the social responsibility of the medical system to provide these pregnant women with the knowledge and the means to engage in these protective activities. And, more recently, it has become the public's responsibility to protect the fetus from the rights of the pregnant woman who carries it.

The personal, social, and public investment in the fetus creates the context in which women make choices about their pregnancy, from what to eat to whether to carry the fetus to term. In its current iteration, the interaction among these areas of responsibility has created a situation that is weighted toward the rights of the fetus—from claims of maternal deviance if a pregnant woman fails to live up to the norms outlined in a pregnancy guidebook to extreme medical interventions in fetal surgeries to acts of aggression perpetrated against those supporting the rights of a woman to have an abortion. The public investment in the fetal personhood (the social child) has begun to subordinate the importance of women's rights to health and a self-determined life. Although this particular debate has been ongoing for decades, the rise of medical technology and the shift in medical discourse toward patienthood has given the public greater access to the fetus than ever before.

First, Ruth (1925–1982)

Scholar, author, and activist, Ruth First is best known for her investigative journalism and anti-apartheid activism in South Africa, Mozambique, and the United Kingdom. First's dedication, intelligence, and progressive politics made her an asset to the anti-apartheid movement.

Born Heloise Ruth First, she was the daughter of Julius and Matilda First, who immigrated to South Africa from Latvia in 1906. Her parents were politically active socialists and founding members of the South African Communist Party (SACP). Because of this, First grew up surrounded by the leftist political debates among different races and classes that took place in her house. In 1942, she attended school at the University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, South Africa, where she was a member of the Progressive Youth Council, secretary for the university's Young Communist League, and founding member of the Federation of Progressive Students. First graduated in 1946 with a bachelor's degree in social studies. In 1949, she married Joe Slovo, a communist labor organizer and lawyer, with whom she had three daughters.

Throughout the 1950s, First served as editor of the Guardian, a progressive newspaper, wrote numerous journalistic pieces about the conditions of migrant laborers, and focused on documenting the campaigns of the anti-apartheid movement. First published most of her scholarly activist writings in this newspaper, in addition to the Congress Alliance journal, Freedom Talk, for which she was also editor. During this time, she also founded the Congress of Democrats—an organization made up of white South Africans who opposed apartheid—and served on the drafting committee of the Freedom Charter, the document on which the new constitution of South Africa is based.

Because of their political organizing, First and her husband were both arrested for treason in 1956, but were acquitted after a 4-year trial. In 1963, First was arrested again, along with Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu, and other members of the SACP and African National Congress (ANC), for her membership in Umkhonto we Sizwe, the militant branch of the ANC. This time she was sentenced to 90 days in prison, and served 117. Upon her release, First joined her family in exile in Britain where she remained active in the fight against apartheid by holding seminars and public gatherings to support the ANC and the Communist Party. She also published several books on politics, revolution, and labor, including a memoir of her days in prison.

From 1972 until her death, First worked in academia as a research fellow at the University of Manchester, a lecturer on the sociology of underdevelopment at the University of Durham, and as the director of a research training program at the University Eduardo Mundlane in Maputo, Mozambique. On August 17, 1982, First was assassinated by a letter bomb believed to have been sent by South African police. She continues to be remembered for her commitment to racial unity in a divided South Africa, her passionate involvement in the anti-apartheid movement, and her support for the liberation of other African countries.

Footbinding

The practice of footbinding, which existed in China from the mid-900s to 1949, usually began for girls between 4 and 6 years old; some started at age 2, and some between 7 and 12. The goal was to make the feet 3 inches long. The four smaller toes were usually broken, tucked underneath, pulled toward the heel, and wrapped with bandages. Each time the feet were unbound, the bandages and feet were cleaned. Any dead skin, blisters, dried blood, and pus were removed. The feet were rewrapped even tighter, before the blood drained back into the feet, in hopes this would lessen pain, and then perfumed to mask the stench of rotting flesh. Mothers, grandmothers, or older female relatives were first to bandage the girl's feet. This process could cause paralysis, gangrene, ulceration, and death. Estimates are that 1 in 10 girls died from footbinding or its effects. Binding the feet continued for the rest of the girl's life. Decorative shoes and leggings were worn over the bandages and differed with times of day and special occasions.

The "golden lotus" foot originated in China around 900 CE before and during the Sung Dynasty, 960–1279. The exact origin of the practice is unknown. Most agree that it began because of a male erotic fascination with the shape and point of a ballerina's foot while dancing. Although footbinding began in the upper classes, it spread rapidly. In poorer families who could not afford the bandages or lack of labor constituted by a hobbled woman, the feet were not bound until the girls were older. Once the girl married, the bandages were taken off and she reentered the workforce.

Footbinding was viewed as a rite of passage for young girls. It was believed to be preparation for puberty, menstruation, and childbirth. Footbinding symbolized the girl's willingness to obey. Footbinding ensured a girl's marriagability in patrilineal Chinese culture, and a shared bond between daughters, mothers, and grandmothers.

When Confucian thought reigned, from the 10th to 20th centuries, women were devalued, had certain roles in the family, were essentially disabled, and were geographically restricted to the house. The process of footbinding kept women subordinate to men, increasing the differences between the sexes, and limiting women's power in all institutions. Chinese men found the foot to be both erotic and a prestige symbol, and the popular belief was it increased fertility because the blood would flow up to the legs, hips, and vaginal areas.

During the Manchu rule, K'ang Hsi banned footbinding in 1662, but withdrew the ban in 1668 because most Chinese were still practicing footbinding. Anti-footbinding became popular when missionaries traveled to China to argue that footbinding was cruel; missionaries also pointed out that the rest of the world looked down at footbinding, urged exposure of the naked bound foot, and thus changed their ideas about gender. With the Nationalist Revolution in 1911, footbinding was outlawed in 1912. However, footbinding finally ended with the creation of the People's Republic of China in 1949.

Footbinding has been compared with other ways to "perfect" the female body such as corsets and female genital cutting or mutilation.

Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act

Introduced by Democrats Senator Edward Kennedy and Representative Charles Schumer, the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act was passed with bipartisan support and signed into U.S. law by President Bill Clinton in 1994. The act prohibits vandalism of clinic property and using "force or threat of force or . . . physical obstruction" to attempt to or actually injure, intimidate, or interfere with anyone obtaining or providing reproductive health services. It also protects access to "place[s] of worship." Additionally, the FACE act describes penalties for violators. The act does not prohibit "peaceful picketing or other peaceful demonstration," including nonthreatening shouting, photography, and distributing antiabortion materials outside of clinics. Every federal appeals court in the United States has heard FACE cases and ruled the act constitutional. The U.S. Supreme Court has never reviewed the act.

Between 1977 and 1993, congressional investigations found that abortion clinics experienced 36 bombings, 81 arsons, 131 death threats, 84 assaults, 2 kidnappings, 327 invasions, 71 chemical attacks and more than 6,000 blockades. These investigations also found that patients had been threatened, pushed, grabbed, spit on, pinned to the ground, and beaten. The first murders of clinic workers occurred in 1993, and by 2000, 7 workers, including doctors, had been killed and another 13 had been injured.

The Civil Rights Act of 1871, also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act, was initially used to prosecute blockaders. However, in its 1993 decision of Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled such use unconstitutional. The next year in National Organization for Women v. Scheidler, the Court found that the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act of 1970 (RICO) could be used to sue violent protestors. However, the decision was overturned in 2002 in American Coalition for Life Activists v. Planned Parenthood.

Under the FACE Act, maximum sentences for first-time offenders range from 6 months to 1 year in prison or $10,000 to $100,000 in fines, depending on the severity of the violation. Maximum penalty for offenders committing bodily injury is 10 years in prison and life imprisonment for those convicted of murder. Civil suits can ask for a maximum reward between $10,000 and $25,000, depending on the severity of the violation.

In the decade after the FACE Act was enacted, 46 criminal prosecutions resulted in 71 convictions and 17 civil lawsuits resulted in rewards. A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report that reviewed reports of clinic violence in the 2 years before and after passage of the act found 21 percent fewer blockades; 17 percent fewer acts of vandalism; 15 percent fewer invasions, bomb and death threats; 13 percent fewer assaults; 4 percent fewer arsons; and 2 percent fewer bombings. More than 90 percent of providers and 60 percent of U.S. attorneys believed that the FACE act was at least partially responsible for the reduction in clinic violence. In 2000, less than 25 percent of clinics experienced blockades, invasions, bombings, arsons, chemical attacks, gunfire, bomb threats, death threats or murder, compared with more than 50 percent of clinics experiencing such violence in 1994.

Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939)

Sigmund Freud was, arguably, the most important personage in the history of psychiatry and psychology. His theory of personality, psychoanalysis, revolutionized both psychology and Western culture and remains the single, most in depth personality theory within the field. Many of his ideas have entered common culture, that is, the unconscious mind, defense mechanisms, Freudian slips, and dream symbolism. Freud is best known for his work regarding the unconscious mind, especially how memories too painful to recall consciously are exhibited in ways unknown to the sufferer, including nightmares and psychosomatic illnesses that are not "real" in the medical sense. This entry discusses his theories.

Freud was born May 6, 1856, in Freiberg (in what is now known as the Czech Republic). He was highly intelligent, matriculating at the University of Vienna at age 17. He studied neurology and earned his doctor of medicine degree, returning to Vienna to open a private practice emphasizing the study of nervous and brain disorders and to marry his fiancée, Martha Bernays.

He was an excellent researcher and spent most of his time engaged in studying the human personality. The more he studied, the more he realized that the most intriguing mysteries were not conscious; rather, they were the concealed operations of the human mind. By the early 1890s, he specialized primarily in "neurasthenics" (mainly severe hysterics), and the field taught him much, including the art of listening patiently as clients told their stories. At the same time, he began writing down his dreams, increasingly convinced that they might offer clues to the workings of the unconscious, a notion he borrowed from the Romantics. Freud saw himself as a scientist, taking material both from his patients and from himself, through introspection. By the mid-1890s, he had immersed himself in self-analysis, an exercise for which there were no guidelines or predecessors. During this period, he slowly remembered anger he had felt toward his father, while distantly recalling childhood sexual feelings for his mother, who was strikingly attractive. Later, Freud considered this time of emotional difficulty to be the most creative time in his life.

In 1900, he published the seminal The Interpretation of Dreams, but it sold poorly; even so, Freud's ideas became popular in Vienna, and he was awarded a professorship in psychiatry at the University of Vienna in 1901. He gathered around him a group of intelligent disciples, including Carl Jung, Alfred Adler, Wilhelm Reich, and others. Freud had little tolerance for anyone who disagreed with his rigid ideas. He expelled those colleagues who disagreed with him, even if they accepted the basic tenets of the theory—Jung and Adler being the two most famous examples (interestingly, both created their own personality theories).

In 1933, Adolf Hitler and the Nazi party were voted into power in Germany. Shortly thereafter, Freud's works were burned publicly throughout the country as were those of other, well-known Jewish writers. In 1938, Germany's anschluss with Austria caused Freud to leave his home, immigrating to England where he remained for the rest of his life. Freud had been an excessive cigar smoker since age 24, smoking as many as 19 per day. He was told by different physicians that to continue would be a death sentence, but he kept smoking. Freud contracted oral cancer in 1923, at the age of 67 and underwent 30 operations, but he continued to smoke cigars until his death on September 23, 1939. In the end, the pain caused by the cancer was intolerable and he had his personal physician give him an assisted overdose of morphine.

Psychoanalysis

The central goal of psychoanalysis (a term Freud coined in 1896) was to bring one's unconscious thoughts and desires into conscious awareness, thus gaining insight into one's problems or behaviors. As there was no single method for achieving this, Freud experimented with hypnotism, used especially with highly hysterical and neurotic patients. Eventually, he felt that hypnotism was not dependable, and he switched to having his patients lie on a couch, encouraging them to say whatever came into their minds (he later called this technique free association).

The bringing of unconscious thoughts and feelings to consciousness is, according to Freud, brought about by encouraging the patient to talk in free association and to talk about dreams. Another important element of psychoanalysis is a relative lack of direct involvement by the analyst, which is meant to encourage the patient to project thoughts and feelings onto the analyst. Through this process, transference, the patient can reenact and resolve repressed conflicts, especially childhood conflicts with (or about) parents. Psychoanalysis, as a theory, was based on women Freud saw in Austria. In 1896, Freud wrote that hysteria (as understood at that time) and obsessional neurosis arose from unconscious memories of sexual abuse in infancy. To buttress his argument, he claimed that he had uncovered such incidents for every single one of his current patients (one third of whom were men). Later, it was found that these patients did not report early childhood sexual abuse; rather, the findings came after Freud inferred the incidents, using a procedure that was heavily dependent on the symbolic interpretation of somatic symptoms. Unlike other great minds of this period, Freud felt that the notion of free will was delusional; that is, each day people are primarily unaware of what they think and often act for reasons that have little to do with their conscious thoughts. Thus, hysterical women were suffering from a malady that had little to do with their waking thoughts and concerns.

Freud felt that the way to understanding the unconscious derived from understanding one's dreams. He devised a "map" detailing conscious and unconscious processes. The preconscious lay between the conscious and unconscious thought—an area that was easily accessible with small effort. Freud felt that the only sure way of living up to the Enlightenment's goals of human growth was by studying one's unconscious, rather that repressing or hiding it. In psychoanalysis, repression is a major concern and is crucial in understanding the unconscious mind. Freud felt that when something was too painful to allow into consciousness, these thoughts and feelings did not disappear. On the contrary, although they are banished from one's mind, they are still in one's unconscious, causing problems. Individual differences do matter because patients tend to repress different things. Freud felt that what an individual represses is likely determined by that person's unconscious. In other words, the unconscious was for Freud both a cause and effect of repression.

Theory of Personality

In 1920, Freud posited his topography of personality—the id (governed by the pleasure principle), ego (governed by the reality principle), and superego (governed by the morality principle). The pleasure principle states, "I want what I want right now and to hell with the consequences!" In reply, the ego states, "I understand, but before we can do that, we need to do this first." Finally, the superego says, "It is wrong to want this—we should be moral and do something else." This "dialogue" occurs countless times each day and its successful conclusion depends on whether one has major problems locked away in the unconscious.

Freud argued that as humans develop, they become fixated on objects (both in general and specifically) through their stages of development. During the oral stage (birth to age 2), the child receives pleasure by sucking the mother's nipple. The anal stage (age 2 to 3) is where the toddler receives pleasure by retaining or emptying her or his bowels. The third stage (age 3 to 5 or 6) is the phallic stage, where male children often become fixated on the mother as a sexual object (known as the Oedipus complex), but will eventually overcome this attraction and repress it because of its taboo nature. Female children exhibit the same behavior in the Electra complex, where the father becomes the object of sexual attraction. The latency stage (age 6 to 12) of psychosexual development precedes the sexually mature genital stage (after puberty to death) of psychosexual development.

When an individual becomes fixated in one of the psychosexual stages, the problem usually arises because of conflict between the id and superego. Defense mechanisms are the psyche's attempt to lessen the stress that the conflict between the id and superego causes; however, their overuse or reuse rather than confrontation can lead to either anxiety or guilt, which may result in psychological disorders such as depression. Defense mechanisms include denial, reaction formation, displacement, repression/suppression (the proper term), projection, intellectualisation, rationalization, compensation, sublimation, and regressive emotionality. Freud believed that all humans were unconsciously driven by two conflicting central desires: Eros (the life instinct) and Thanatos (the death instinct). Eros was filled with humanity's creative and life-producing drives. The death instinct represented a desire for returning to a state of utter calm, or, ultimately, of nonexistence.

Conclusion

Freud's way of viewing women has been called phallocentric, primarily because in his opinion, the unconscious always desires the penis. Males are afraid of castration, which would mean the loss of masculinity to someone else. Females also want a penis; thus, an unfulfillable desire causes women to be hysterical. During the phallic stage, boys are afraid their fathers will castrate them, whereas girls sexually desire their fathers. Freud's views regarding women were commonplace in 19th-century Austria. In essence, he saw women as victims of their biology, thus, he focused on inherent limitations in women. For instance, he saw their role as mothers in childbearing as a great impediment to finding happiness, especially because maternal duties demanded a great deal of time and attention. Moreover, he viewed women's sexual development as aborted because once they discovered they lacked penises, they were forever inadequate. Freud's attitude toward women has contributed to the resurgence of contemporary applications and critiques of Freudian theories through a feminist and gender studies lens.

GANDHI, INDIRA PRIYADARSHINI NEHRU (1917–1984)

Indira Gandhi was the first woman to be elected prime minister of the world's most populous democracy, India. Her leadership was both long and controversial.

She was born in 1917 to Jawaharlal and Kamala Nehru and was the heir to a distinguished political family history. Her grandfather, parents, and aunts were all active in the Indian nationalist movement. Her father, Jawaharlal Nehru, became independent India's first prime minister. As a child, Indira joined the nationalist movement by forming the "Monkey Brigade" a group of children who assisted their political parents by secretly carrying documents and spying on the British. Her education was intermittent because of her parents' political activism and her mother's failing health. Indira attended schools in Switzerland and spent a brief time in Somerville College, Oxford, before she married Feroze Gandhi, a politician and journalist, in 1942.

Her marriage to Feroze was troubled because she was torn between her private life and the call of public service in support of her father. The Gandhis had two sons, Rajiv and Sanjay. After India's independence in 1947, Indira Gandhi served as Prime Minister Nehru's hostess and continued her political work. She was elected a member of Parliament in 1964 and became minister of information and broadcasting in Lal Bahadur Shastri's government. With the sudden death of Shastri, Congress Party politicians elected Indira prime minister in 1966 because they perceived her as weak and susceptible to their authority. She soon proved them wrong.

As prime minister, Indira Gandhi is remembered for several achievements. She nationalized Indian banks, abolished the privy purse of Indian princes and reduced their power, increased India's grain production, developed India's nuclear program and exploded the first nuclear device in 1974, and triumphed in the war against Pakistan and rendered military support to Bangladesh during its independence struggle in 1971. She was known to be an astute politician and a shrewd diplomat. However, she also increasingly centralized power in the executive branch, attempted to reduce judicial power through controversial constitutional reforms, and encouraged corruption and nepotism. In 1975, a regional judge declared her election null and void because of minor legal infractions, and people called for her resignation. However, she declared a state of emergency in 1975 and suspended the powers of the state governments, jailed several thousand dissidents without due process, and severely censored the press, citing grave internal security problems as cause for the emergency. In 1977, she called for national elections and was defeated.

In 1980, she returned to power after a major electoral victory and had to deal with several internal separatist movements including the Khalistan movement advocated by Sikh militants in Punjab. Because Sikh militants were staging their violence from and storing their weapons in the Golden Temple complex, their holiest shrine, she commanded the army to storm the temple. In the battle that ensued, many soldiers, civilians, and Sikh militants (including the leader of the movement, Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale) were killed. Her choice to invade the Temple outraged many Sikhs, and in October 1984, she paid a huge price for her action when her Sikh bodyguards assassinated her. After her death, her son Rajiv continued the Gandhi-Nehru democratic dynasty and became prime minister of India, only to be assassinated himself by a Sri Lankan Tamil separatist in 1991. Indira Gandhi inspired many young women around the world by leading a large democracy for many years, but her career also illustrates the problems of power and corruption inherent in many democracies.

Gangs, Boys

Gangs share similarities to cliques, which are made up of friends and crowds that are a loosely organized group of people. Both gangs and cliques are groups of people who share activities, and sometimes confidences. The difference is that gangs are involved in illegal and antisocial activities. Their illegal activities and visibility have waxed and waned, depending on the state of the economy and the vigilance of law enforcement. In the 1970s through the early 1990s, violent gang activities occurred at a high rate. This is attributed to the poor economy and emergence of crack cocaine. With the acceptance of contraception and the legalization of abortion, the birth rates among single women and those most likely to be at risk for gang involvement dropped, and as the older gang members were given lengthy prison terms, gang activity waned during the 1990s. The United States has tracked gang activity for the past 200 years.

Gangs fill a void by providing status, social acceptance, protection, self-esteem, and a sense of pride among the members. The emotional needs met by the gang make membership all-important for at-risk youth. Gangs are formed within geographic neighborhoods and communities and by ethnicity. Pride and geography lead to "turf" protection.

Feared by the general community for their violence, gangs maintain standards for members: recruiting new members, enforcing rules and regulations, setting goals, and assigning roles. Gang identification is provided through claiming colors, picking brand-name clothes, using gang talk, and giving street or gang nicknames. Individuality can be maintained but identification with the group is most important. Gangs are mostly composed of males, but females are affiliated either in an adjunct group or within the original gang. The role of girls in gangs is often primarily seen as either sexual objects or as mothers, which provides a sense of family for the members of the gang. Unfortunately, the activities girls are expected to perform are often illegal and puts the girls in danger.

Gangs, once dominant in the inner city, are now a problem of the suburbs and small towns as well. The revitalization of inner cities and the demolition of housing projects have forced the impoverished to move into the suburbs. As these problem families are displaced, the gangs also move, and these once relatively quiet communities must deal with an influx of illegal drugs, firearms, drive-by shootings, and deaths. This entry describes the attraction of gang membership, the process of joining, gang activities, and the process of leaving.

Lack of Hope

Most gangs originate and exist in neighborhoods where social and economic disorganization, deprivation, and family dysfunction are high. Gang members may have experienced physical or sexual abuse, emotionally unsupportive parent(s), foster care, and drug use. In addition to family dysfunction, other risk factors such as poverty and neighborhood disorganization, unaddressed learning disabilities and school failure, unmet medical and mental health needs, and delinquently oriented peers all contribute to the lack of hope for meeting society's definition of success as measured by education, employment, and material possessions. This lack of hope becomes pervasive and results in disenfranchisement. Gangs fill this void by providing an alternative and accepting family. In addition, through their illegal activities, members have access to the status and material possessions they would otherwise be deprived of. Membership is also practical: The danger of being unaffiliated outweighs the risks of affiliation; physical safety and companionship become necessary for survival.

For males raised in a female-based household, the gang can be the first opportunity to learn essential aspects of the male role through imitation of the older gang members. Young boys learn conformance, socialization, coping, and business skills in the gang culture. These skills are essential to survival in a fatherless and dysfunctional subculture of society. There is the sense of pride and power gained when recruiting new members.

Violence in a gang is both a means and an end. It is a way to achieve honor, respect, and material advantage. It is an end when honor is challenged or "turf" is invaded. Protecting honor and turf is paramount.

Joining

Joining a gang can be brutal. Boys are recruited at an early age and must prove their willingness to commit offenses as bidden by older members and leaders, and to put gang wishes ahead of their own. They are "jumped-in" (fighting with a member or members of the same gang) or are expected to commit a serious offense such as killing a rival or stealing firearms. Once in, the boys are given street nicknames, affirmation, and knowledge that any slight or offense against them will be retaliated.

Potential gang members are often groomed for membership at elementary school age. Grooming is done by older members who will often praise and give gifts of expensive items or money to younger youth. These youth are often from disorganized and impoverished families and neighborhoods, so the sense of having otherwise unattainable money and material objects is alluring. Reputations of older gang members are romanticized through stories about their violence, illegal activities, surviving in jail, fighting skill, or financial success.

Before joining, a young boy is a "wannabe" gang member. "Wannabes" will dress, talk, and act as if they are members. Once a gangster, boys do the majority of the work such as drug selling, fighting rival gangs, and procuring guns. The goal is to provide a sense of safety and community to the gang, whether real or imagined. Respect comes with survival, fighting ability, and the use of manipulation and cunning. Pride, status, and reputation are gained in being caught for illegal activities, committing murder, and being imprisoned. Unfortunately, being killed by police or in a gang war also lends status and builds reputations (after death).

The perception of being an adult is strong for these boys. Cars and cash are accessible, as is the freedom to smoke, drink, gamble, and be sexually active. Which gang to join is based on the gang that friends and family members belong to and which gang will provide the protection based on safety and neighborhood.

Gang Activities

The gang provides a powerful social network for its members. It defines life activities of the members by demanding loyalty and obedience. The punishment for disobedience can be violent and deadly. Gangs are involved in selling illegal drugs, stolen car parts, and weapons. These are lucrative means of business that demand protection of the business territory leading to rival gang wars, criminal involvement, incarceration, and the possibility of physical harm or death to the member.

When youth join these gangs, they are discouraged from traditional prosocial activities such as school attendance and legal employment. The lack of the conventional daily structure combined with free time allows the youth to occupy themselves with daily illegal activities such as substance use (although some gangs forbid the use of hard drugs such as heroin), drug selling, and precocious sexual activity. With the self-perception that these boys are adults and "manly," little attention is paid to birth control, sexually transmitted diseases, or medical or mental health needs. Commonly, substance use is used for self-medication for undiagnosed and unmet mental health needs and adds to the "high" of being a part of the gang. Unprotected sexual activity leads to unplanned pregnancies that allow the boastful honor of being a father and the opportunity show off their offspring. Often, the boys are too young to be effective parents, so the next cycle of absent parents begins for the next generation.

Young gangsters younger than age 18 actively support the criminal life of the gangs and are the "soldiers." Youth face less stringent punishment in juvenile court than an adult would for the same offenses. Youth are also given more chances to remain in the general community.

Unexpectedly, an effect of gangs is they provide a sense of calm in the neighborhood because they keep rival gangsters away. Occasionally, as gangsters age and become "old gangsters (OG)," they can move their gangs from antisocial activities to being a positive force within their community. An example of this is the evolution of the Black Panthers, who opened free-breakfast programs in the 1960s and 1970s.

Leaving

Some gang members can leave a gang with little difficulty, especially if the member was only involved marginally or for a short period. Usually, however, leaving the gang can be difficult and frightening. Some gangs threaten physical violence or death against those who want to leave, especially if a gang is organized with a long-established existence and control over a neighborhood. These threats can continue over a long period, causing the person to live in fear. Older gangsters can gradually "age-out" of active gang involvement, leaving the "work" for the younger gangsters.

GANGS, GIRLS

Girl gangs have been present for decades but virtually invisible to law enforcement and literature, until recently. Recorded offenses and arrests were generally for behaviors violating the values and morals of main society, rather than for serious felonies. Within the past 10 years, statistics have shown the number of boys arrested or detained in juvenile detention centers for serious offenses has declined while the numbers for girls has risen; self-report studies by girls record more felony involvement than arrest records show. Similarly to boys, girls participate in gang fights and gang-related criminal activity for protection of self, friends, or neighborhood; defend their role in a boyfriend-girlfriend relationship, companionship, independence, and protecting businesses (such as drug selling). Yet, there are gender-based differences.

Research suggests the factor that once rendered girl offenders and gang members invisible is gender—society did not accept that girls could commit violent or serious crimes. When girls were arrested, it was more often for status offenses such as curfew violations, running away, truancy, prostitution, theft, or minor property offenses. It is thought that because girls often dress in more conventional attire rather than in gang clothing, or are seen as mothers and do not always hang out on a corner, they escape notice by the police who are looking for male gang members. Historically, most police are male and socialized to protect females. When they arrest girls, it was more often for offenses that are self-harming rather then because girls are viewed as capable of committing serious criminal offenses. This entry discusses gender socialization, risk factors, types of gangs for girls, and the process of exiting gangs.

Gender Socialization

Socialization by gender is a large contributor to the historical criminality differences between boys and girls. From birth, society views girls as needing protection. From infancy, girls are socialized to believe that relationships build self-worth whereas boys are taught independence, not to cry, to be manly, to protect sisters, and to seek retaliation. Parenting is stricter for girls, and parents are more judgmental in raising daughters than sons: The expectations for being a "good" girl are high.

As toddlers, girls are observed playing in groups and claiming "best friends," whereas boys play side by side on a more individual basis. This socialization breeds fear of isolation that continues as girls age into adolescence. The desire to remain within the group can lead to bullying and the manipulation of loyalties (nonphysical aggression but nevertheless emotionally damaging to their victims) just to retain a place within the group. Victimization comes from isolation and division from the original group by passing notes, leaving someone out, bullying, and shaming. Those targeted respond with anxiety, self-blame, loss of pride, depression, and shame. Victimization and fear of isolation can lead girls to choose abusive relationships rather than be alone.

As girls grow into adolescence they continue to "lose their voices" and self-esteem. This is especially true if they are victims of physical or sexual abuse, bullying, and isolation. Lack of school success continues to diminish self-worth. The search for self-affirmation can lead girls to gangs, where, for the price of initiation, acceptance can be found. Acting out the feelings can be through self-mutilation or being easy prey for abusers.

Risk Factors

Gang membership provides disenfranchised girls with a sense of protection, safety, belonging, and hope for the future. Risk factors for female gang involvement are similar to those that define male delinquency: community and family conflict, poverty and neighborhood disorganization, early victimization, substance abuse, lack of educational success, learning disabilities, unmet medical and mental health needs, delinquently oriented peers, and growing up with a single parent. Gangs provide a structure and accepting family, superficially ameliorating the risk factors. The brothers who protect the sisters within the family similarly protect their female gang associates.

Although these factors affect all youth, gender-specific risks target females: sexual abuse, poverty, and sexism. Sexism in U.S. society offers less power and fewer options for females in general and even more so for those who are uneducated and living in poverty. Victimization from early sexual abuse leaves a wide path of destruction including self-loathing, depression, lack of trust, and self-damaging behaviors such as cutting themselves, running away, illegal self-medication, precocious sexual behavior, and prostitution. In seeking protection from one set of victimizers, these girls look to their gang cohort for protection, yet can become victims of these protectors. Precocious sexuality poses risks for sexually transmitted disease and for unplanned childbirth. These all can lead to the continuing cycle of victimization, truncated education, joblessness, poverty and, ultimately, lack of hope.

The Gang

Although gangs have a societally negative connotation and often lead to criminal activity, there are positive rewards for the members. These include the instant and accepting surrogate family, protection, and companionship. The negative side of gang membership includes low self-esteem, victimization, jail, and, perhaps, death. Acceptance into a gang is through brutal initiation: rape or being "jumped-in" (where the initiated will fight other gang members). Initiation can also include committing a serious offense to show that the girl is not afraid and will follow gang orders.

The three main types of girl gangs all offer both the rewards and consequences of being involved in a group: the auxiliary to an established boy gang, the all-girl and independent of any boy gang, and the coed gang. The choice of which gang to enter depends on family gang affiliation, neighborhood affinity, or a boyfriend's membership in a particular gang.

Auxiliary gangs are attached to a boy's gang with a feminized version of the male gang name (e.g., Vice Queens in New York vis-à-vis Vice Kings). Although they have their own female structure, girl gang members work together and with the boys' gang. In the coed gangs, boys and girls are together. In these gangs, the boys are dominant and the feeling of protection from the boys and being part of a family is strong. Problems can occur if entry is via a boyfriend or father of a baby and the couple breaks up, or if the girl begins a romantic liaison with a member of another gang. Traditionally, the female roles have been to be sexual objects and possessions, or message carriers when the boys are jailed. Girls also carry the weapons or drugs and spy on rivals. Girls will fight to continue gang battles for turf protection, retaliation for a slight, or continue an ongoing war with rival gangs. In the past, a girl's most common weapon was a knife or her hands, but with widespread availability, guns are more frequently used. In the coed or auxiliary gangs, girls complete the "family" idea of the gang. Studies report there is a gender-based disagreement about the sexual role of the females; males claim girls as possessions and sexual objects, but girls deny this is so.

Independent gangs have their own hierarchy and rules of behavior. Within this gang, there is the solidarity of shared troubled backgrounds and current struggles that provides support and understanding. Illegal activities such as drug selling and gang fights occur, but the members in these gangs experience peer support and a sense of independence. This sense of independence can be enticing because it provides a chance to be part of the more permissive contemporary culture. This is especially true if the female is from a traditional culture that has strict and limiting gender roles.

Exiting Gangs and the Future

Deciding to leave active gang life can be as dangerous as joining. Girls can be beaten out. Although reasons for leaving can include maturity and aging-out, there is a unique female reason: motherhood. Raising children in a gang can be supportive and can replicate a sense of family, especially when children are infants. Over time, the mothers often decide to raise their growing children in a lifestyle free of gang and criminal activity and sometimes because the fathers are no longer interested or involved.

Although the legal and emotional repercussions associated with gang membership are serious and further marginalizing for girls, in their own minds the immediate rewards of community and protection outweigh the risks. With visibility in the legal system, and knowledge of the factors of poverty, sexism, sexual abuse, girl-specific programming is working to include education, work-skills, self-care, parenting, and building self-efficacy.

Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation

The Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation (GLAAD), was established in New York City in 1985 in response to the portrayal of AIDS in the New York Post. During the 1980s and earlier periods, the portrayal of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transsexual (LGBT) persons in the media was either nonexistent or defamatory. During the past 20 years, as the organization has grown, it has shifted from chapter-based to a nationally based organization with offices in New York City, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. Today, GLAAD has been noted by Entertainment Weekly as one of the most powerful entities in Hollywood. GLAAD has been integral to the increased portrayal of LGBT persons in the media in a fair, respectful manner that highlights the diversity of the LGBT community.

GLAAD seeks to address LGBT in all facets of the media including newspapers, magazines, motion pictures, television, and radio. GLAAD responds to inappropriate and discriminatory depictions of LGBT person and educates media outlets with the GLAAD Media Reference Guide, now in its seventh edition. This guide particularly helps educate media outlets about appropriate language and terminology. GLAAD's analysis of the fall 2006 cable and reality television programming found LGBT persons in 1.3 percent of all regular roles and a significant underrepresentation of racial and gender diversity.

In recent years, issues drawing significant GLAAD attention include the media's portrayal of the gay marriage movement, hate-motivated crimes such as the murder of Matthew Shepard, the anti-gay advocacy voiced by Dr. Laura Schlessinger on her popular radio program, the hate lyrics found in the music of artists such as Eminem, the manner LGBT victims and heroes of September 11th, 2001, have been portrayed, fraudulent advertising found in ads from the "ex-gay" movement, and the manner the Catholic Church is personifying gay priests within the sex-abuse crisis within the church.

Annually, GLAAD presents media awards at ceremonies in New York City, Miami, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. The first GLAAD awards were presented in 1989. The 2005 awards were broadcast for the first time on the Logo network. In 2006, the awards were broadcast again on Logo and on VH1, reaching 85 million homes, with 5,000 guests in attendance, and raised $3.5 million. Awards are granted in various media and to persons demonstrating significant efforts for equal and respectful portrayal of LGBT persons. In recent years, awards have been given to films such as Angels in America, Bend It Like Beckham, Kinsey, Brokeback Mountain, and Trans America for their portrayal of the LGBT community. Television series receiving recent awards include Six Feet Under, Sex and the City, The L Word, and Will & Grace.

GENDER AND THE BRAIN

For hundreds of years, scientists have been delving into research concerning the differences between male and female brains. This research has at differences in brain size, structure, and functions. More recently, studies have been conducted on the influence of hormones on sex differences. This controversial research has led to some heated debates about the biological influence on gendered behaviors. This entry traces some of the findings and debates.

Brain Size and Structure

One of the first topics to be considered was the comparative size of male and female brains. Male brains were noted to be larger than female brains were. The average brain of boys at birth was found to be 12 percent to 20 percent larger than that of girls. As adults, men were found to have brains that weighed 11 percent to 12 percent more than the average weight for women. This early research was used to label women as intellectually inferior. It was later revealed, however, that when the size of the brain was compared with body weight, there was relatively no difference between the brain sizes of the sexes.

Brain structure was the next topic to receive considerable research attention. Looking for differences in brain structures to explain cognitive differences between males and females became a focal point. The human brain is complex. The cerebral cortex, the outermost part of the brain, contains 10 to 15 thousand million neurons and billions of synaptic connections. The cortex is divided into two halves, the right and left hemispheres. Connecting the two hemispheres is a mass of nerve fibers made up of 200 to 250 million axons called the corpus callosum. These fibers connect hundreds of millions of neurons between the two brain hemispheres.

The hypothalamus, considered a primitive part of the brain, is located at the base of the brain and connects to the master endocrine gland called the pituitary. The hypothalamus is the controller of many basic life functions such as temperature regulation, appetite, and sex drive. Scientists have found sex differences in several nuclei including the interstitial nucleus of the anterior hypothalamus. This clump of nerve cells was found to be larger in men than in women. Further, gender identity and sexual orientation have also been linked to variations in the hypothalamus. A particular cell group of the interstitial nucleus was shown to be twice as large in heterosexual men than in homosexual men and women. Another part of the hypothalamus was found to be smaller in male-to-female transsexuals than in a male control group. These research findings prompted great debate about whether there is a biological basis for homosexuality.

In the past 10 years, neurobiologists have reported structural differences between the sexes that have been linked to women's advantage in language-related tasks and male's advantage in visuospatial skills. Some studies indicated that when processing language, activation in the men's brains was confined to the left hemisphere, whereas both the left and right hemispheres of women's brains were strongly activated. Further, it has been said that men's right hemisphere was more specialized for spatial tasks compared with that of females. The research suggests that women have greater integration between the brain's two hemispheres (bilateral processing), whereas male brains are said to be more lateralized or specialized. Further, this concept of bilateral processing has been supported by findings regarding the size of the corpus callosum.

The splenium, which composes the back fifth of the corpus callosum, is a pathway serving complex cognitive functions. Relative to brain weight, the splenium's surface area and width were found to be greater in women than men. Male brains have been found to have fewer connections across the corpus callosum. This increased lateralization may allow for greater right brain performance, such as in enhanced visuospatial skills. Women, with greater bilateralization, would excel at verbal skills. Although contentious, there is some consensus that the corpus callosum is larger and differently shaped (more bulbous) in women compared with men. Other research, using different methods, has not found these differences.

Language and Mental Ability

In taking a closer look at women's language skills advantage, on average, women excel on recall of words and finding words that begin with a specific letter. They also tend to be better than men at matching items and performing certain precision tasks, such as Peg-Board placing. Some research suggests that women's stronger links between brain hemispheres enable verbal and nonverbal information to be coordinated. This may lead to women's greater social sensitivity.

Interesting research has pointed to sex differences in certain speech disorders. For example, men incur aphasia, an impairment of the production and understanding of speech, more often from left hemisphere damage compared with women. Since men rely more on the posterior region of the left hemisphere for speech than women do, they are more affected.

Some research has failed to find sex differences in language tasks. Conflicting results may be attributed partly to different language tasks used in various studies. It may be that the sexes differ in brain organization for some language tasks but not for others. The varying results may also reflect the complexity of the ever-changing brain.

The largest male advantage in cognitive abilities has been found for certain spatial tasks, especially for mental rotation and visualization of objects. In particular, men seem to have an advantage in tests that require the subject to imagine rotating an object or performing some similar type of mental manipulation. Further, men exhibit more accuracy in tests of target-directed motor skills, such as guiding or intercepting thrown objects. They also have been found to outperform women in navigating their way through a route.

Interestingly, it has been demonstrated that men and women use different mental strategies in attempting to perform various spatial tasks. Men often use visualization of the entire pattern or geography, whereas women appear to use verbal labels and landmarks more frequently.

Some research conducted on adults suggests a structural basis for the male advantage in visuospatial tasks. The area of the brain important for visuospatial activities, called the inferior parietal lobe, is larger in men than in women. This is especially true on the left side of the male brain. It is not known whether males and females are born with the same sized inferior parietal lobes or whether differences develop with experience through time. A growing body of research is now providing evidence that the brain's organization changes in response to learning. Thus, researchers caution that observed differences may be the result of brain adaptation to gendered learning and socialization and do not necessarily reflect innate differences.

Hormones

During the development of the embryo in the womb, circulating hormones are thought to play an important role in sexual differentiation of the brain. Some researchers have indicated that the presence of androgens in early life produces a "male" brain. In contrast, a "female" brain is thought to develop in the absence of androgen through a default mechanism. The role of ovarian hormones has only recently been investigated. Some evidence is accumulating to indicate that sex hormones may alter connectivity between various parts of the brain throughout life.

Initially, it was thought that the emergence of sex differences in spatial abilities appeared during puberty. Accumulating evidence now suggests that some differences are present early on. At this time, the role sex hormones play in brain organization is not well understood. Some research findings have suggested that both testosterone and estrogen may play a role in visuospatial and verbal skills. Scientists are speculating that prenatal hormone exposure in humans may affect brain development.

Studies have been conducted on two groups of women exposed to abnormal levels of androgens. Girls having a genetic condition called congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH) and women whose pregnant mothers took diethylstilbestrol (DES), an estrogen ("female") hormone have been studied. The adrenal glands of CAH girls produce excessive amounts of androgens ("male" hormones). Overproduction of androgens and effects of DES have been shown to masculinize female reproductive systems and contribute to possible behavioral differences. This research has provided evidence for the hormonal contributions to sex differences.

Studies found that CAH girls showed enhanced visuospatial skills as well as masculinized toy preferences. These girls may also have masculinized genitalia that may contribute to the way the child is socialized and treated by others. In further support of this view, men with androgen deficiencies show decreased visuospatial abilities on tasks such as object rotation and navigation.

The influence of androgens on spatial ability does not appear to a simple case of higher levels producing better spatial scores. High levels of testosterone may actually inhibit spatial ability. For maximal spatial ability, studies indicate an optimal level of androgens, somewhere in the low "male" range. This may also be the case for math reasoning as well.

Natural fluctuations in hormonal levels are also being investigated. Some studies indicate that women's performances on cognitive tasks changed as estrogen levels varied throughout their menstrual cycles. At the beginning of the menstrual cycle, in the low-estrogen phase, women's performance on some spatial perception tests improved. In contrast, just before ovulation, when estrogen levels were high, spatial ability decreased and speech performance was enhanced. In men, seasonal fluctuations in spatial ability have been observed. Men's spatial performance appears to be enhanced in the spring, when testosterone levels are lower. Also, men's testosterone levels are higher in the morning than in the evening. Hormonal levels also vary throughout life and with environmental changes. Very little is known about the relation between hormone levels detected early in life when abilities may become organized in the brain and those levels found in adulthood. Further research needs to be conducted to understand these impacts on the brain and behavior.

Explanations of Differences

One controversial view put forward to explain sex differences is the evolutionary perspective. According to evolutionary theory, studying the differing roles men and women have played throughout history can provide valuable insights into brain organization differences. In ancient times, men were responsible for defending the group and hunting. Women were the caretakers and gathered and prepared food and clothing. This role specialization is said to have put different selection pressures on men and women. Male-to-male competition was typically physical, resulting in larger and more aggressive men. The male advantage in navigational skill could have aided in their detection of the movement of enemies or predators. Although spatial skills could have aided in the making and use of tools and weapons, females' preference for landmarks may have enhanced their abilities to gather food closer to home. Also, although men have the physical strength to compete with other men, women may have used language skills to gain a social advantage. Increased nonverbal sensitivity might have helped in selecting a nurturant mate who was willing to participate in childrearing practices. Further, this sensitivity might have enabled her to detect threats and distress in her children, increasing their chances for survival. This evolutionary view is not without its critics.

For instance, as noted earlier, some of the research suggests that observed differences in cognitive patterns and hormonal activity may reflect social and environmental conditioning. Interestingly, some research is starting to find that when people deliberately change sex-role behavior, such as men becoming more nurturing or women becoming more aggressive, their hormones and brains change in the process.

In recent years, new methods for assessing sex differences in brain organization have been used. These include functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) and positron emission tomography (PET). Researchers are now able to see what parts of the brain are activated when a given task is performed. These techniques are also used to detect quantitative differences in the number and form of brain cells, as well as the thickness and volumes of brain regions. This research has yielded promising, yet conflicting results.

All the findings mentioned are generalizations based on group means. Much of the research conducted is based on correlational data, so causality cannot be determined. Any individual of either sex may have relatively strong or weak spatial or verbal abilities. There is considerable overlap between men and women on many cognitive tests. Also, some researchers report greater similarities between the sexes than differences, and many researchers report changes over time within individuals.

Although findings pointing to sex differences in the brain could be used to justify prejudice against women, this does not necessarily have to be the case. Physiological research on sex differences reflects existing cultural constructs regarding gender—in other words, even the questions asked reflect gender socialization. At the same time, understanding sex differences can advance our knowledge of health and illness. Certain illnesses that appear to afflict one sex more than the other, such as schizophrenia, Alzheimer's disease, and dyslexia, can benefit from continued research efforts.

GENDER AND THE INTERNET

From its inception in the latter half of the 20th century, the Internet has been a social tool that has reflected general attitudes and participation about gender among other social factors, viewed through the distinctive prism that the Internet imposes on communication. In addition, the study of gender differences in Internet use is sometimes used as a measure of gender differences and similarities in communication, of gender and sex roles, and of the reaction to and use of technology.

As technological innovator Tim Berners-Lee explains, the Internet was originally a tool for a relatively small audience, an audience of users who were predominantly conservative white men in positions of entrenched power. Indeed, the Internet was first used in the early 1970s as a means of communication for U.S. Department of Defense scientists and other defense researchers. The Internet rapidly developed into a tool for U.S. scholarly and research communication in general. (With a goal of promoting scholarly and research communication outside of the United States, Berners-Lee created the World Wide Web in 1989 as a tool for European scholars to share information; both tools are often referred to as the original entity, the Internet.) Regardless of original intent and usage by men, even the most cursory examinations demonstrate that the Internet is now accessed and used by women both at home and in the workplace, and that differences in these access and use patterns are more often either (a) minor or (b) explicable by women's different occupations and depressed salaries.

By 2000, the Internet had become a global means of communication available to anyone with access to a computer with a modem. The Internet is characterized by communication that can be rapid, uncensored, and difficult to modify once transmitted. Internet communication can occur in real time or as the static posting of type and other images. Because it is no longer restricted to scientific or scholarly usage, the Internet reflects such generally significant socially constructed categories as race and ethnicity, socioeconomic status, sexuality, sexual preference, and, of course, gender, as described in this entry.

Gendered Communication on the Internet

Differences in Internet use have been and continue to be studied widely, by, among other researchers, those at the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau has collected information on computer access and use in general since 1984 and on computer and Internet access and use since 1997. However, the Census Bureau's analysis of the data often emphasizes educational level and socioeconomic status rather than gender.

Studies, such as that of Tracy Kennedy, Barry Wellman, and Kristine Klement, of the gendered use of computers and the Internet in North America, have substantiated the existence of a digital divide in access to and in the use of computers and the Internet. Studies using large-scale survey data, the 1998 National Geographic Survey (NGS) and the General Social Survey (GSS) for 2000 and 2002, suggested that women use the Internet more for what were said to be more "social" and "supportive" reasons, thus reinforcing the interpretation of women's communication as affiliative and emotionally expressive when contrasted with that of men. In comparison, men use the Internet more for what were classed as instrumental reasons and for recreation when alone. Kennedy et al.'s study explains such disparities in use by referring to the greater likelihood that women will have other roles interfering with possible computer time, for instance, postulating that maternal caregiving for children has limited women's use of Internet technology (IT) more than have the obligations of men who are fathers.

Again using large-scale surveys, researchers such as Susan Carol Losh, have demonstrated how U.S. computer and Internet access has grown and, to a degree, changed according to gender. In examining changes in digital access from the early 1980s to the beginning of the 21st century, researchers have found dramatic growth in the numbers of Americans who have and make use of IT—yet the gendered patterns of difference in access and use have persisted. Women who were not married had, in general, the least home computer or online access of any group. Women who were less educated (together with more highly educated men, interestingly) markedly used their workplace computers more often.

In contrast to women of all categories, Losh has demonstrated that men who had at least some college were also the most likely to have workplace Web access or e-mail. Men in general (and the well-educated as a whole) were more likely to use home e-mail or to subscribe to a home dial-up or broadband service. There continued to be significant gender gaps in online time from 1995 to 2000: Men (and well-educated individuals overall) spent by far the most time online. Yet by 2000, women with graduate degrees had indeed achieved gender parity in many areas of the United States. Results have been interpreted as stemming partly from gender, educational, and occupational differences.

Women do continue to lag behind men in the intensity of their use of the Internet, continuing to spend more modest and less regular time on the Internet than men do. Yet, data also show that women are making great strides in the time they devote to Internet use, and using the Internet in their own particular ways; for example, using the Internet for activities that are thought of as developing and affirming relationships, whether in the business or personal sphere.

Richard Joiner and his colleagues examined areas of participation of women and men in varied Internet activities, along with the way in which they communicate. There were several differences in the use of the Internet attributable to gender as shown by a study of more than 600 undergraduate students. Gender differences in participants' use of the Internet were exemplified by men's greater likelihood of having their own Web pages compared with women. Overall, men were more likely to use the Internet than women; in particular, men were more likely to use game Web sites, to use other specialist Web sites, and to download material from the Internet. It was not true, as is sometimes suggested, that women used the Internet for communication more than did men. There was a significant positive relationship between Internet identification and total use of the Internet, and a significant negative relationship between Internet anxiety and total use of the Internet. Controlling for Internet identification and Internet anxiety, a significant and negative correlation between gender and use of the Internet has been found. In total, all three predictors accounted for 40 percent of the variance in general Internet use: with Internet identification accounting for 26 percent, Internet anxiety accounting for 11 percent, and gender accounting for 3 percent.

Attitudes and Anxiety

Basic attitudes toward computers and their use for the Internet as well as for other applications indicates that computer anxiety has almost inevitably been reported as more common in women than in men, as have feelings of competence with regard to computers. Yet the percentage and number differences have never marked so great a gulf, and the gap between women and men with regard to feelings of anxiety and competence has decreased every year, as broad-scale surveys like those of the U.S. Census Bureau and the Pew Project on the Internet and American Life have shown.

In specific studies of feelings about cyber-terrorism, women have shown a steady and escalated level of fear when compared with men. Studies such as that of the Pew Project and the Census Bureau note that as many as 55 percent of women report fear at the possibility of cyber-terrorism compared with as few as 40 percent of men.

Reported attitude differences between women and men users of the Internet rely on the questions researchers pose. Often such researchers have covered a limited area, often that of assaying "computer anxiety" or "fearfulness" expressed at the prospect of cyber-terrorist attack. To be sure, formulating a survey instrument that evaluates women's and men's reported anxiety and fear can be an excellent measure by which to judge gendered differences in reporting behavior. Yet, scholars suggest that researchers might also reasonably study the effect on computer and Internet users of popular beliefs about the possibility of effective cyber-terrorism to be, or the practicality of "fire sale" plans that eliminate all Internet-dependent systems in the nation. Such plans are the subject of urban legends and folk myths and the fodder of popular movie plots pitting male evil computer geniuses against male action heroes—see the film Live Free or Die Hard, for example—and the effect of these rumors and films has yet to be explored.

A reasonable fear exists among some women, which has been documented by the Pew projects. This fear is not so much a fear of technology, lurking cyber-terrorists, or the Internet complexity, but of the individuals women and girl users might encounter and how trusting or suspicious women and girls should be when using the Internet. The population expressing the highest levels of fear comprises teenaged girls who post information and especially photographs on the Internet. Thus, teenaged girls who post Internet profiles for social networking have a greater chance of being contacted by individuals with no connection either to them or to their friends, as the Pew Center reports. Although teenaged boys too are contacted and exploited, teenaged girls are far more likely to express fear about the possible ramifications of their Internet activity.

The Character of Internet Communication

The Internet is the receptacle of both real-time and virtual messages, of both immediate and static images and words. As such, the Internet allows users to engage in many different kinds of communication (and even not to seem to be on the Internet, as one does when one is lurking). From the instant message, chat room and Internet relay chat (IRC), message board, virtual community and multi-user domain (MUD), Web site, and support group, the Internet enables the transfer of images and information. The user soon understands that he or she uses the Internet with the caveat that a receiver must often take a sender at his or her word, and vice versa. In this way, networks and relationships can be formed, but will always have a tentative and uncertain quality about them—expectations that, as the receiver's words and images may be suspicious, the sender too need not necessarily communicate faithfully. In addition to "normal" misrepresentations such as claiming that one does not have a cold when one does (the better to escape the sick role), misrepresentation on the Internet may be of a kind considered much more momentous, as when gender, name, age, personal appearance, biography, sexual preference, race, or ethnicity is claimed with an intent or the result of deceiving another or others. Outrage experienced will vary with the degree to which a given characteristic is felt to be crucial to the Internet communication.

Almost any membership criterion can be manufactured and misrepresented on the Internet. Possibilities for online deception and exploitation, on the one hand, and altruistic and protective gray-hat action on the other, have been explored and discovered to take distinctively gendered turns, as in situations where a subtle dragnet is issued for young women or for older widows. The object can be Internet harassment or meeting the target to exploit her sexually or to defraud her of funds. Of course, the resulting suspicion of stated or projected authenticity and accuracy about identity, image, and deed, on the one, hand, and the match between claim and sincerity, on the other, exists with face-to-face interaction as well. However, the relatively recent use of the Internet has awakened individuals to this general feature of social interaction, as well as the potential dangers and advantages of using the Internet for strategic acts like the formation of relationships, the transmission of information, the creation, sustenance, and dissolution of networks, and the communication of positive and negative social sanctions, both formal and informal.

Gender, Identity, and Internet Communication

Multiple studies have demonstrated that women Internet users differ from men. Researchers have found that the way in which women use chat rooms, discussion boards, and listservs suggests that the cyber-discourse may be gendered in much the same way as face-to-face talk. Women may use emoticons that symbolize the emotions stereotypically sanctioned positively for their gender, and women overall are reported to use more emoticons and to use them more often. More than reinforcing the view that women are emotionally expressive whereas men remain stoically instrumental; however, the soundest research examines emoticon use in detail, over time, and with regard to different Internet audiences and contexts, as Alecia Wolf's work demonstrates.

Wolf's study of newsgroups noted that same-gender groups developed their own patterns of use of emoticons over time. When these single-gender groups formed a mixed-gender group, men did not silence women or ignore their contributions, as might be expected. Instead, men adopted women's richer patterns of use for emoticons. Women's emoticon use connoting support, gratitude, and solidarity continued to develop at the same time. In some contexts studied, in e-communication involving both women and men, men contributed at greater length and more entries were judged as "instrumental," in contrast to women's briefer online participation that was likelier to be social if not sociable. In this way, women's usernames may mirror their own names, if those names express the segment of identity they want to express; examples are 31sweet_sue74, marxistgrrrl23, IMAseriousfeminist, and abigail26, or the tongue-in-cheek 2cute2survive. Women also report sometimes choosing usernames to shield themselves from potential predators searching for women as prey, and women who post their own Web pages include information designed to shore up their image as gender appropriate while omitting information that will give others ready access, whether that access results in a simple flood of e-mail or results in male sexually predatory actions. In this respect, women in business, who often must adopt a company-chosen name, are least protected.

The Internet offers opportunities to communicate authentically or deceptively or to manage strategically one's own identity. Identity tourism, or the practice of trying on and attempting to pass as a social category to which one has no legitimate claims, exists with regard to gender along with such other categories as occupation, sexual preference, ethnicity, race, age, and socioeconomic status. When unseen and unheard in general, the individual in everyday face-to-face communication will reliably have opportunities when she or he can, or must, dissemble in expressing gender, race, age, and other social categories. In MUDs, others may enact race and gender by interacting with one's character by, for example, purchasing paint to change another's skin, change one's hair color as well as one's garments, and suggest one's name or, if in a game, a different avatar, itself with a variety of categories.

Cyberfeminism and Women's Experience

Importantly, the Internet, together with other present and future applications of computers, is sometimes presented as introducing a new type of feminism with distinctive qualities. This cyberfeminism (as students of technology and social life such as Donna Haraway and Sadie Plant suggest) can offer women the possibility of experiencing a feminism free of reductive essentialism, free of the shackles of embodied communication and the obligation to deal with the polarities of control or lack of control of the body, and free of the rhetoric of mere victimhood and the obligatory self-examination for the footprints of oppression, either as author or object of oppression. (There are also nonfeminist theorists who believe that the Internet need not be "gender-salient.") If cyberfeminists' projected possibilities are realized, the resulting social change would achieve social change, for women in particular, to a degree not even contemplated by past visionaries of cybernetics.

However, the mundane reality—and the possible disagreeable and unfortunate counterpoint to these hopes for a radical or even a liberal cyberfeminism—is that the Internet experience of some women is rarely unambiguously pleasant or successful. For example, Loong Wong's research suggests that women who are Asian may feel that a particular Web site can be experienced by those to whom it was directed as an empowering refuge for the discussion of and planning for resistance. Yet, Internet users also found themselves subject to other Internet experiences that featured an image of Asian women as self-abnegating mail-order brides or exotic dragon-ladies (see, for example, www.thaidarling.com, www.asianwifeonline.com, www.aperfectwife.com). Those who analyze such sites can feel that they portray Asian women as the continuing emblems of white men's colonially subjugated fantasies. For men who make use of such Internet sites, the Internet may thereby become a means to shore up current fantasies that trivialize Asian women and perpetuate degrading stereotypes—and to distribute these fantasies and stereotypes ever more widely, cloaked in the garments of a "new" and sophisticated technology. If this is so, then scholars argue that Internet communication is little different in character from the literacy that has enabled us to deliver information that challenges or reproduces stereotypes of the past, such as letter-writing or the print media.

Conclusion

Women's and men's use of the Internet partly responds to and can be explained by those more general gendered features of interactions with technology, of communication styles, and, indeed, of social status in U.S. society. With much the same dynamic as Wong reports, the woman who is a university professor may find virtual communities as a safe harbor of expression and support—yet experience gendered online harassment from her students. With an unambiguously sinister purpose, cyber-rape Web sites exist in numbers and may result in extreme violence toward girls and women. With such developments in mind, critics such as Eileen Green and Dale Spender warn users to carefully consider that the Internet may reinforce as well as disrupt power structures that sustain and promote gender inequities, and that virtual communities may be sounding boards for the repression of women's rights as well as tool for forging those rights. Consequently, gendered communication and the Internet shed light on the complex relationship of language, technology, and society.

Gender Discrimination in Employment

The experiences of women in the formal U.S. labor force have long been shaped by systems of inequality. Women's labor—in both the formal and the informal labor force—has been regulated within a socioeconomic structure that is rooted in the core principles of capitalism, patriarchy, and racism. Although the U.S. socioeconomic structure is highly invested in the maintenance of male privilege and male dominance, the interlocking nature of capitalism, patriarchy, and racism, as outlined by the writings of black feminists, has also created diverse labor histories as well as diverse labor realities among different classes of women. Even when women's labor history is analyzed through the prism of these interlocking and intersecting systems of inequality, it is most apparent that all women are and have always been disadvantaged in the U.S. labor force, as described in this entry.

Women and the Formal Labor Market

As acknowledged by the title of Alice Kessler-Harris's book, Women Have Always Worked, the history of women's labor is intimately woven throughout the many fabrics of the national identity and historical evolution of the United States. The complexity of women's labor in the United States cannot be solely understood by analyzing women's labor in the formal or paid labor force. Women's labor has historically been performed in what has been conceptualized as the domestic or private sphere. The positioning of women outside the formal labor force or the public sphere was, and to some extent remains, culturally justified and legally sanctioned. Such justifications and policies were rooted in the Western social construction of gender roles, which are rooted in a patriarchal system and are committed to the normalization of male superiority and dominance.

Heidi Hartmann was among the first feminist labor scholars during the second-wave U.S. feminist movement to theorize about women's subjugation—both within and outside the labor market. Hartman sought to unmask the interrelationship of capitalism and patriarchy and argued that the sex division of labor is a central and pervasive thread throughout the capitalist mode of production. The underlining patriarchal principles that supported the devaluation and marginalization of women's labor performed in the domestic or private sphere took roots in the public sphere as women—primarily white, middle-class women—began to make significant inroads into the paid or formal labor force. Although the rise of industrial capitalism and the military industrial complex generated a demand for labor—hence creating a range of occupational opportunities for women in the formal labor market—women's inroads into the formal labor market or public sphere did not result in a socioeconomic equity between men and women.

Women's Struggle for Justice in the Formal Labor Market

There has been a long history of injustices committed against women who are a part of the labor market. However, there have also been key moments where women have gained greater access to resources and better standing within the labor market. During the 1960s, many of the acts that affected civil rights in the United States also advanced women's rights through greater equality. Two acts that strongly affected women's struggle for justice were the Equal Rights Amendment and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

The Equal Rights Amendment and Feminist Movement(s)

President Lyndon B. Johnson's signing of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was a major moment in women's struggle for equality. This milestone in both the civil rights movement and the evolution of justice in the United States allowed for federal oversight and regulation of most employment policies and practices. Before one can fully understand the significance of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to the quest for women's rights and protections in the formal labor market, this legislative document must be situated in a historical legacy of feminist activism and feminist politics. To that end, the legacy of struggle surrounding the advocating for the Equal Rights Amendment highlights a broader struggle against occupational discrimination.

Ever since the Woman's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848, women have been committed to an organized struggle against systems of inequality that seek to maintain women's subjugated status. This era in feminist and womanist activism, which some scholars have identified as the first wave of the feminist movement, resulted in a national platform that sought to bring awareness to the plight of women in a patriarchal society and inspire a woman-centered movement that would agitate for sex equality as well as woman's liberation from their sexual enslavement. During this phase in the feminist movement, what emerged was a broader demand to amend the U.S. Constitution and promote equality among all individuals and protect the fundamental human rights of all persons.

Since being proposed in Seneca Falls in 1923 during the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the Woman's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, the Equal Rights Amendment has undergone a number of iterations. First introduced as the Lucretia Mott Amendment, the Equal Rights Amendment set out to ensure equality between men and women throughout the United States and in all of its jurisdictions. This proclamation encountered both opposition and hesitancy from many first-wave feminists and labor activists in the U.S. labor movement at the beginning of the 20th century. Many first-wave feminists and labor activists believed that women and children need to be protected from inhumane working conditions and exploitative labor demands; therefore, gendered labor laws that institutionalized inequities between men and women as it relates to the types of labor most suitable for women to perform and the number of hours in a day women could work were established. Such feminist politics were later critiqued—largely by second-wave feminists and academics—as paternalistic and invested in essentialist or biological stereotypes about sex and sex roles. Nonetheless, many first-wave feminists and labor activists were well-intentioned and committed to their protectionist polices; therefore they perceived the Equal Rights Amendment as possibly threatening if not undoing significant gains in the early U.S. labor and feminist movements.

During World War II, there was increased political support for the passage of the Equal Rights Amendment. Although many first-wave feminists and labor rights activists remained in opposition, Alice Paul—a longtime suffragist and woman's rights activist—emerged as a leading advocate for the Equal Rights Amendment. In 1943, Alice Paul rewrote aspects of the amendment with the intent of adding universal suffrage and equality. The Equal Rights Amendment was later referred to as the Alice Paul Amendment. Support for the revised amendment escalated in the post–World War II era and with the rise of the civil rights movement. The demand for equal rights between the sexes became a defining issue of the second-wave feminist movement.

For second-wave feminists, the notion that women were inherently different from men and therefore should be legally protected in the labor market was problematic. It is the position of most second-wave feminists and labor activists that women's unequal status relative to men is endemic to a patriarchal-capitalist society. This male-centered socioeconomic arrangement has created and maintained a legacy of sex-typed wages, of exploiting women's and children's labor, and of relegating women either to sex-typed jobs or the unpaid labor in the domestic sphere. The Equal Rights Amendment was therefore seen as a means by which to guarantee federal oversight of women's experiences in the labor force as well as a mechanism by which to contest the occupational discrimination faced by women.

Civil Rights Act of 1964—Title VII

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was a centerpiece of various progressive social movements in the United States. Even though the original drafting of the 1964 civil rights act was heavily grounded in notions or ideas of racial justice and racial equality, the plight of women and other disadvantaged groups was also part of this national conversation. The legacy of feminist activism helped shape the provisions and guidelines of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 has been essential in establishing occupational opportunities and, to a lesser degree, reforming the workplace culture for certain marginalized and minority populations. The objectives and provisions of this act of legislation are twofold. Title VII outlines specific discriminatory practices and policies in hiring based on the race, color, religion, sex, and national origin of the potential employee. In conjunction, Title VII also prohibits employers from engaging or endorsing practices and policies that discriminate based on race, color, religion, sex, and national origin with regard to promotions and job training. These provisions aimed at undoing years of institutionalized policies and practices that sought to exclude cultural minorities and disadvantaged groups from accessing certain occupational niches. Further, these provisions also established regulations against a hostile workplace for cultural minorities and disadvantaged groups.

Title VII goes beyond solely legislating against discriminatory polices and practices in the labor market. Like many of the civil rights acts that emerged during the 1960s, Title VII is also an act of legislation that established a system by which to oversee its federally mandated objectives. At the federal level, Title VII allowed for the development of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Although this authoritative body was assigned the primary task of overseeing and enforcing Title VII, its ability to actively investigate and forcibly prosecute acts of occupational discrimination—as outlined by Title VII—was the task of the U.S. attorney general. Not until 1972 with the passage of the Equal Employment Opportunity Act was the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission entrusted with the jurisdiction to fully enforce the provisions of Title VII.

Women, Work, and the (Subtle) Dimensions of Occupational Discrimination

Given the emergence of federal policies as well as increased sociopolitical agitation that sought to establish fairness and equality in the U.S. labor market, women began to make significant inroads into the formal labor market; moreover, women began to enter into occupations and occupational positions that were male-dominated. Such inroads were instrumental in reforming the sex demographics of the U.S. labor market and challenging traditional, biologically centered notions of women's sex roles. In the post–civil rights era, the once-explicit or overt nature of sex discrimination became more insidious and more apparent in the internal structure of occupations and firms that women were beginning to penetrate.

Occupational Sex-Typing

As women began to enter the formal labor market, they encountered a division of labor that was rooted in cultural assumptions about appropriate sex-roles and gender performances. Early analyses of this gendered division of labor often operated from the assumption that the distinction between men's and women's sex roles is both natural and biological. As a result of this assumption, written and unwritten labor policies were responsible for tracking both female and male workers into occupational niches that were deemed most suitable for their respective biological sex roles. Early discussions regarding the sexual division of labor (that is, men's work versus women's work) attribute this dichotomous phenomenon to the taken-for-granted connection between different types of work and biological assumptions about men's and women's innate sex roles. These gendered assumptions about work as well as workers have formed sex stereotypes about diverse classes of occupations in the formal labor market.

For most social scientists, and feminists scholars in particular, the biological discourse about sex roles as well as the sexual division of labor is problematic. When the differentiation of sex roles transitioned from being defined as a biological phenomenon to a sociocultural construct, analyses of the sexual division of labor began to uncover the artificiality and arbitrariness of this bifurcated system. The stereotyping of women's work or men's work is seen by second-wave feminists and critical social scientists as an outgrowth of a patriarchal and capitalist socioeconomic structure that requires distinct work boundaries or responsibilities for males and females. Given this socioeconomic arrangement, women's work, both in the domestic and the private spheres, is highly devalued, yet it is extremely essential to the functioning of society; moreover, women's work is fundamental to the capitalist mode of production. Within this mode of production, women's work or labor is positioned within occupational niches that lack the monetary rewards, occupational prestige, and the job stability that are more commonly associated with men's work and labor.

Occupational Sex Segregation

Although federal legislation created more inroads for women into the formal labor market as well as male-dominated occupational positions, there has been limited interaction between male and female workers both within and across occupations. The sex segregation of workers is a multifold process. At the core of this phenomenon are the cultural assumptions and stereotypes underlining the sexual division of labor. Even in occupational settings whereby considerable sex diversity exists among workers, the type of occupational tasks and job assignments that one is required to do produces and maintains a sex-segregated environment. The sex segregation of work and occupations is a process that emanates from two distinct yet interrelated factors. At one end of the spectrum, feminists and critical scholars have argued that the overrepresentation of women in certain occupations and professions is a systemic outcome of the gender tracking of females throughout the education system. By tracking females into academic disciplines that are culturally defined as most appropriate or well-suited for women, women's occupational trajectory takes them in divergent employment paths relative to that of men. At the other end of the spectrum, women become channeled into sex-typed occupations and occupational roles by employers or hiring bodies. Although the process of occupational sex segregation has a significant role in shaping the sex ratio or sex composition of an occupation, the consequences of this dimension of occupational discrimination also affects the earning potential, occupational mobility, and overall prestige of occupations that are disproportionately female compared with those that have a higher concentration of male workers and have been defined as men's work.

Sex Gap in Wages or Earnings

Women's work and women's labor have long been devalued within the United States. From a socialist feminist perspective, the work that women do is devalued as well as degraded because it is women's work. The subjugated status of women in a capitalist and patriarchal society does not become irrelevant with the increased participation of women in the formal labor market. The second-class status of women in the labor market is highlighted by the gap between men's and women's wages. Some economists have characterized the gender gap in wages as reflecting women's "limited" and more sporadic tenure in the formal labor market. Feminist and critical social scholars, however, have argued that the gap between men's and women's wages is largely the result of wage scales that are rooted in patriarchal assumptions. These assumptions have placed a lower premium and value on women's work and labor; therefore, the level of compensation associated with women's work and labor is unjust.

Occupational Mobility

Within the occupational structure, women are disproportionately positioned in the lower tiers of the labor market. The overwhelming concentration of women in entry-level or lower-level occupational positions can be explained by women's tenure in the formal labor market or in a given occupational niche—especially during the 1960s as a significant number of women became new entrants into the labor force. Although women's length of time in the formal labor market partially explains women's lower status in the labor market relative to most men, this explanatory variable masks the ways in which employers, managers, and various sexist or patriarchal policies often hinder women's upward mobility. Feminist scholars began to assess women's rate of occupational mobility or the lack thereof using an internal labor market analysis. For many women in the professions, their ability to advance from more entry-level occupational positions to positions of greater authority is restricted by a phenomenon known as the glass ceiling, a process whereby women are tracked into occupational positions that have limited opportunities for advancement or whose promotion trajectory does not lead to administrative or executive statuses.

Conclusion

Women made significant advances within the formal labor market during the last quarter of the 20th century. This progress is the result of both women's resistance to systems of inequality and legislative policies or regulations that outlawed sexual discrimination in the labor force. Although women have made great gains, dimensions of occupational discrimination do exist. In the context of a patriarchal and capitalist society, women's status in the labor market will inevitably remain devalued and impeded by sexist, male-centered practices and policies without greater equity in opportunities.

Gender Dysphoria

Gender dysphoria is discomfort or dissatisfaction with one's gender. Gender is the socially constructed dichotomy affiliated with constructs of masculinity and femininity and is primarily assigned based on one's perceived sex at birth. Infants born male are socially expected to become men, females to become women; people who choose to cross these boundaries may be diagnosed with gender dysphoria. Interestingly, those who are born intersexed, or with ambiguous genitalia or sex chromosomes, cannot be diagnosed with gender dysphoria because it is based upon a clear dichotomous structure of both sex and gender.

Gender dysphoria is an umbrella term used to refer to both transvestites and transgendered persons. Transvestic fetishism, also know as TF, TV, or cross-dressing, is medically defined to exist only in males who enjoy dressing in women's clothing. Cross-dressers are likely to be heterosexual, appropriately masculine men who may dress in women's clothing for erotic reasons. There is substantial variation in the extent of cross-dressing that may occur, ranging from women's undergarments to full clothing with the accompaniment of wigs, makeup, perfume, and jewelry. Most transvestites do not wish to change their gender or their sex. As many as 1 in 15 men may enjoy cross-dressing behavior; however, numbers of men who participate in this behavior are difficult to estimate given that many men may feel shame and embarrassment about this behavior and actively seek to keep it secret. Women also dress in men's clothing; however, this is not socially constructed as gender dysphoric, but is merely regarded as gender variance. This may also have founding in the social reality that men have greater social power and privilege; to dress in women's clothing challenges this social position and, thus, may have become regarded as a psychiatric condition.

Gender identity disorder (GID) is the official psychological diagnosis for transgendered and transsexual persons. Transgendered persons are individuals who enact a gender identity that does not culturally align with their sex; for example a born male who lives as a woman (a transwoman), or a born female who lives as a man (a transman). Transgendered persons who pursue surgical genital or sex reassignment surgery are transsexual. Transsexuals who transition from male to female are frequently denoted as MTF or M2F, and those who transition from female to male are denoted as FTM or F2M. Increasingly however, the denotation of T2F or T2M, to recognize a transgendered identity rather than a sexed identity, is being employed.

Before a person can pursue surgical sex reassignment surgery, he or she must be psychiatrically diagnosed with GID, thus must be "mentally ill" to have surgery, which in turn "cures" the mental illness by aligning the person's body with her or his mental gender construct. The psychiatric diagnosis of GID is problematic because it exists in a world where men and women commonly experience gender variations and behaviors that do not necessarily imply the desire to change their gender or sex. Additionally, it is assumed that one's psychiatric distress is the result of GID, whereas it may be the social response and stigma affiliated with cross-gendered or gender-variant behavior that is causing distress.

GID diagnosis among children is often the result of psychiatric treatment sought by parents concerned about their child's "abnormal" behavior. Parents are more likely to seek psychiatric treatment for boys who demonstrate feminine behavior (sissy-boys) than for girls who demonstrate masculine behavior (tomboys). A goal of "successful" treatment of children with GID is the avoidance of adult homosexuality and transsexualism. This embeds GID within a social context valuing heterosexuality and traditional gender identities. Although it may not be a causal relationship, research demonstrates that a significant number of gay men and lesbians recall cross-gendered behaviors as children. The degree to which heterosexual adults demonstrated cross-gendered behavior as children is unclear.

A diagnosis of GID among adults is embedded in a binary system of gender norms. Many individuals with gender variance who desire sexual reassignment surgery and need the diagnosis of GID have learned the "appropriate" narrative or story to tell their psychiatrist. Given the constraints of psychiatric diagnosis, the tremendous variation of experience that likely exist within this population becomes invisible. These narratives limit the knowledge of variation, and the continued use of this narrative further reinforces the value believed to be held in this one common story. Those who identify as transgendered or later transsexual often develop or "transition" from one gender to another over time, often at least several years.

Most persons identified with GID and who pursue surgical reassignment are born male. Although statistics vary dramatically, it is estimated that between 1 in 2,500 and 1 in 500 born males transition to become female. Perhaps fewer born-females pursue this diagnosis because socially they may have greater fluidity in the enactment of femininity, enabling the existence of a more "butch" feminine identity or this may also be a consequence of the surgical reassignment procedure itself. MTF surgical reassignment surgery has been practiced for decades and can be accomplished to enable the creation of a functionally appropriate vagina; however, FTM surgery is still being refined to create a functionally appropriate penis. FTM may simply feel that genital reassignment is less important to their gendered social identity. For both groups, socioeconomic obstacles may limit the ability to pursue psychiatric and medical treatment and surgery.

GENDER IDENTITIES AND SOCIALIZATION

Gender socialization is the process by which individuals are taught and learn the values and norms associated with women's and men's roles in society. According to prevailing lay understandings of gender, individuals are born with a sex (i.e., female or male), but they must learn their gender (i.e., what it means to be a woman or a man). Through the process of gender socialization, individuals develop their gender identity, or their definition of themselves within this dichotomy—as either a woman or a man. Although most gender socialization takes place during childhood, socialization does not end there. Because gender is a social construction that pervades all social institutions, throughout the life course and in day-to-day interactions, individuals routinely navigate social expectations of girl/boy and woman/man and revise and maintain their gender identities as necessary. This entry describes theories of gender socialization, the "doing gender" perspective, agents of gender socialization, and diversity in families.

Theories of Gender Socialization

Several different theoretical perspectives explain the process of learning and enacting gender identities. Psychoanalytic theories, namely identification theory, social learning theory, and cognitive developmental theory, and the sociological "doing gender" perspective, are the main theories of gender socialization and gender identity formation.

Identification Theory

Identification theory views gender socialization as a process by which children learn gender-appropriate behaviors by identifying with, and modeling their behavior after, their same-sex parent. Identification theory is associated with Sigmund Freud, who focused on unconscious motives and drives to explain individuals' behavior. In this vein, identification theory posits that children develop motivational systems through unconscious learning; behaviors, feelings, and attitudes all form involuntarily. Because of their close emotional relationship, an unconscious psychosexual bond forms between the child and the same-sex parent, which shapes the child's sex-role identity.

Many theorists have provided revisions to Freud in the years after he initially conceptualized identification theory. Several theorists reinterpreted his notion of penis envy by taking it out of the realm of the psychological and putting it into the realm of the social. In this revision, it is posited that women are not jealous of men's actual phallus, but rather that they are jealous of the symbolic phallus; in other words, women are envious of what the penis represents: power, status, and privilege.

Object Relations Theory

Nancy Chodorow's feminist psychoanalytic theory of gender identity called object relations theory is another, well-known revision of Freud's theory. As in identification theory, children are thought to model themselves and their behavior after their same-sex parent. However, object relations theory also states that as children develop their identities, they must become psychologically separate from their parents. This means different things and has different consequences for the formation of gender identities in boys and girls.

Object relations theory posits that boys must psychologically separate themselves from attachment to their mothers and instead model themselves after their fathers. Fathers often spend a lot of time away from the home, so boys develop personalities that are more detached from others and are oriented inward. By disconnecting from others, boys cultivate a personality that stifles most emotional expression. Conversely, girls never have to psychologically separate from their mothers because they learn how to be girls by emulating their mothers. Mothers often have close attachments to others, so girls develop personalities that are more attached to, and oriented toward, others. Through modeling, girls develop nurturing behaviors and the psychological capabilities necessary for mothering.

Chodorow's object relations theory provides a socially informed perspective by placing the creation of gender identities in the context of the gendered division of labor in the worlds of work and family. Critics of Chodorow's theory argue that her perspective relies on a "traditional" nuclear family form that historically has not been used by all American families, or by families in other countries and cultures. However, researchers have also found that this perspective's sensitivity to social context provides the flexibility necessary to understand some other family forms with different household structures and cultural traditions.

Social Learning Theory

Unlike identification theory, which focuses on unconscious learning, social learning theory focuses on observable events and their consequences, underscoring the importance of the environment in understanding gender socialization. This theory understands individuals' social behavior as a response to their environment: Individuals are either rewarded or punished for their behavior; appropriate behavior results in positive sanctions, whereas inappropriate behavior results in negative sanctions. Social learning theory, then, views gender socialization as an ongoing process of learning about gender through reinforcement from others.

Similar to identification theory, social learning theory posits that children model themselves, both in their attitudes and behaviors, after their same-sex parents. However, according to social learning theory, parents are not the only significant role models for children. Cultural images and expectations that bolster children's gender identities come from a wide range of sources, including peers, teachers, and other gendered institutions.

Although social learning theory views gender as a role that is learned through modeling, it also allows gendered behaviors and attitudes to change. Even though a person establishes gendered patterns of behavior during childhood, the person's behavior is malleable and changes according to her or his social environment. Therefore, as people are thrust into new situations and the expectations in their environment changes, so do their attitudes and behaviors. Social learning theory argues that people learn their gender roles throughout their lives.

Cognitive Development Theory

Cognitive development theory is mostly associated with the psychologists Jean Piaget and Lawrence Kohlberg. This theory posits that as children explore and interact in the social world, they create mental categories called schemata. Children then use these schemata each time they interact in the social world, modifying the schemata based on the new information they have received. Essentially, cognitive development theory sees children's social development as the result of children's interaction with their environment through their cognitive processes.

Kohlberg extended Piaget's original theory to attempt to explain the development of children's gender identities. He posited that at a young age, children learn that people are divided into two different sexes: male and female. Children first learn their own sex and then are able to classify others into those categories as well. Children come to use gender as a system for organizing and categorizing behaviors and objects and assign value to characteristics associated with men and women. Cognitive development theory also posits that as children start to believe that gender is something that will not change, they begin modeling their behavior after others of the same sex. As in identification and social learning theories, children form a strong bond with their same-sex parent and emulate their attitudes and actions.

Enculturated Lens Theory

Related to cognitive development theory is Sandra Bem's psychoanalytic theory of gender formation called enculturated lens theory. In her revision of cognitive development theory, Bem addresses its main criticism that cognitive development theory minimizes and understates the role of culture in gender socialization and the development of gender identities. Enculturated lens theory argues that culture provides individuals with a set of principles about acceptable thought and behavior, called lenses, which are embedded in society's values, social structures, and people's minds. In any given society, many different lenses exist. These lenses, or hidden norms, values, and beliefs, enable societies to reproduce themselves with each successive generation.

Enculturated lens theory focuses on the three lenses of gender that exist in the United States and most of the Western world: gender polarization, androcentrism, and biological essentialism. The lens of gender polarization centers on the concept that men and women are considered completely different, even opposite, from one another, which underlies the organization of society. The lens of androcentrism centers on the idea that men are superior to women and, as such, men and their experiences are the norm against which women are judged. The lens of biological essentialism both minimizes and justifies gender polarization and androcentrism by interpreting these lenses as biologically ordained; men's presumed superiority, using men as the default category, and unequal power relations between men and women in society are viewed as the result of natural, unavoidable differences, rather than socially constructed differences, between males and females. These three lenses operate together to influence individuals to think and act in sex-typed ways that are supported by the culture.

"Doing Gender" Perspective

In contrast to the psychoanalytic theories posed, the "doing gender" perspective is a decidedly sociological way of understanding gender and the formation of gender identities. This perspective emphasizes that gender is a social construction, as well as an act that men and women accomplish. Essentially, gender is achieved through daily interactions with others. Rather than viewing gender as an essential something that men and women have, the "doing gender" perspective analyzes gender as something that is created and recreated in everyday interactions with other people. Gender is both fluid and situational. In other words, gender is never constant or fixed; it is not a role or set of roles that an individual learns and then has, nor is it a characteristic or an attribute of a person's identity. Rather, gender is an active construction.

Gender socialization, therefore, is a process by which children come to understand their place in the world by performing the role of same-sex others. Because children and adults care how people see them, they reflect on the judgments of others, and consequently, form (and perform) their gender identities; girls and boys, and women and men, "do" their gender every time they act in ways that are consistent with gender norms. Even though individuals receive social rewards for "doing gender" in normative ways, individuals have the power to change the social definitions of gender through norm-breaking behaviors. In addition, the "doing gender" perspective acknowledges that there is more than one way to perform masculinity and femininity and that men and women enact gender to varying degrees. Some people tightly conform to gender normative behaviors and display hypermasculine (i.e., being aggressive, physically imposing, controlling) or hyperfeminine (i.e., passive, innocent, nurturing) gender identities. Others combine various aspects of normative masculine and feminine behaviors in the performance of more androgynous gender identities.

The "doing" gender perspective views gender socialization as a dynamic process that involves active negotiations and modifications, rather than passive internalization, of others' expectations. Children do not just submissively accept messages about gender but, rather, create their gender identities in interaction with others.

Agents of Gender Socialization

People learn in many different ways what it means to be a girl or a boy and later a woman or a man. Agents of socialization are the groups or social contexts through which society's norms and values are transmitted to its members. The family, peers, schools, and the media are all important places where people learn about gender and form their gender identities.

Family

The family is the primary source of gender socialization because it is the first institution that individuals enter and, immediately upon entering it, individuals are socialized into gender appropriate norms and behaviors. The moment a child is born, parents and other family members begin to treat the infant in a variety of gender-typed ways; some even argue that new technologies that allow parents to identify the sex of the fetus in the womb also allow parents and others to begin the gender socialization process before a child is even born. Regardless of whether the sex of the child is known before birth, once a child is born, adults often use different adjectives to describe infant boys and girls. Research shows that parents tend to describe their children in gender-typical ways; they use words like large, athletic, and tough to describe boys, but they use words like small, sweet, and pretty to describe girls.

Dress

Parents and other adults also use dress as a way of socializing children into their gender. Different colors and styles of clothing are marketed toward either little girls or little boys. Pastel colors, especially the color pink, are popular on clothing for girls. Girls' clothing is often adorned with ruffles, bows, flowers, hearts, and other "feminine" markings. In contrast, dark colors, especially blue, dominate boys' clothing. Sports, cars, trucks, and trains are common decorations on clothing for boys. Although some gender-neutral clothing options are available, this can open the door for mistaken gender identification because infants lack physical cues to determine whether the baby is a boy or a girl. As a result, many times when young girls are dressed in gender-neutral clothing styles or colors, parents and other family members mark their infant girl's gender through earrings or a headband.

Researchers have also noted that babies' diapers are even decorated differently, often using similar gender appropriate colors and the icons mentioned earlier, so that parents can choose the design that "suits" their little boy or girl. Parents use gender-appropriate dress and even diapers because they are ways of symbolically telling the world the gender of their child and provide reliable clues about gender that are lacking from the babies' physical appearance. One of the main reasons that parents and other family members dress children in gender appropriate ways is to help people correctly interact with their child as either a girl or a boy.

Communication

Studies have shown that parents treat boys and girls differently, even though they think they are treating them the same. Parents often communicate differently with daughters and sons, reflecting parents' gendered expectations. Gendered communication between parents and children centers on discussions of different emotions; for instance, parents tend to speak to their daughters about sadness, whereas they speak to their sons about anger. In addition, with their daughters, parents tend to use a range of emotion words and use them with greater frequency. The result of this differential communication is that girls themselves tend to use a variety of emotion words and use them more often than boys do. In addition, young girls are better able to read other peoples' emotions and to identify and examine their own emotions.

Conversely, boys are less attuned to others' emotions and tend not to acknowledge their own feelings, with the exception of anger. Rather than emotive language, when speaking with their sons, parents tend to use more action verbs, numbers, and explicit language. They are also more likely to directly and verbally teach their sons, but actively help their daughters. Some argue that this fosters dependence in girls and independence in boys. This difference in communication provides a distinct socialization experience for boys and girls.

Expectations, Personality Traits, and Behavior

Individuals in society have different expectations for boys and girls; they expect boys to be more dominant and engage in rough-and-tumble play, whereas girls are expected to be more reserved and engage in quieter forms of play. People expect different things from boys and girls and therefore encourage girls and boys to have different personality traits and express different behavior. Researchers have found that boys' aggressive behavior and girls' passive behavior is often encouraged by adults in both direct and indirect ways; for instance, studies have shown that parents, especially fathers, are more likely to engage in physical play with their sons than with their daughters, which in turn steers boys away from fantasy forms of play. In essence, parents expect boys and girls to be different, which results in differential treatment based on gender.

Toys and Play

Toys are also significant sources of gender socialization. Parents choose different toys for their children based on their gender, with toys for girls and boys fostering different skills. Girls are given more dolls and household items, which encourage passivity and reinforce women's domestic and caring role in society. Conversely, boys are given more tools, trucks, cars, and sport-related toys, which encourage creation, aggression, and competition, and emphasize men's dominant and assertive role in society. Studies on gender stereotyping and toys show that toys for boys and girls of all ages are stereotyped according to gender; however, this same research finds more overlap among toys geared toward infants and toddlers. When parents and other family members give girls and boys different types of toys to play with, they are also giving them messages about appropriate gender play.

Types of play also differ by gender. As previously stated, parents tend to engage in more interactive play with their young sons than with their young daughters, which parlays into more aggressive and physical play by boys in general. However, girls are given more leeway when crossing into boy-typed play, whereas boys are often swiftly reprimanded and redirected toward boy-typed activities when they engage in play associated with girls.

Egalitarian Values and Androgyny

Despite the differential treatment of girls and boys, recent research has found that, more than previous generations, contemporary parents are also teaching their children more egalitarian values and are attempting to cultivate more androgynous gender identities (i.e., having both male and female personality traits and behaviors) in their children. Studies have documented an increased number of career goals among young girls and an increased expectation of employment for mothers among boys and girls. This change reflects a change in parents' attitudes regarding mothers' and fathers' roles in the realms of work and family, which then is communicated to their children.

Diversity in Families: The Intersection of Gender, Race, and Social Class

Parents' gender socialization practices vary across race and social class differences. Gender, race, and social class are overlapping categories of experience; they simultaneously affect the formation of people's identities and shape their lives.

When considering the intersection of gender and race, we find differences in the expectations of what it means to be a girl or woman of color, compared with the expectations for white girls and women. For instance, the expectation that girls and women should be passive, quiet, and dependent is not as pervasive among girls and women of color. Among African American women, values such as independence and self-sufficiency are emphasized in addition to nurturance and caring. African American children of both genders are taught to value education and hard work, along with financial responsibility to their family and community. Despite these similarities, evidence also suggests that the socialization of African American boys and girls is not identical or equal.

Latino parents also have culturally defined values that are important to their children's gender socialization. An emphasis on family relations, respect and social hierarchy, and strong gender role divisions are taught to young boys and girls as a part of what it means to become a man or a woman. In addition, expectations that Latinas will be submissive, dependent, and chaste, but also bear children for their family, are important parts of gender identity for women in Latino culture; conversely, expectations that Latino men will be dominant, independent, and virile are essential components of gender identity for men in Latino culture. As a result of these gendered expectations, the same-sex parent usually takes the lead role in socializing children into their gender identities. In addition, parents stress the importance of virginity until marriage for their daughters, but not for their sons, and impose more limits and stricter rules on daughters than on sons.

One socialization practice that occurs among African Americans, Latinos, Asian Americans, and Native Americans is the formation of gender identities in the context of both racial/ethnic pride and negative stereotypes about their group. However, the points of celebration and satisfaction, as well as those of hurt and frustration, are gender specific, which means that they can be different for women and men in each racial group. Conversely, most whites do not actively teach their children about race. Occupying a privileged racial position in society, at the top of the racial hierarchy, many white parents feel no obligation to their children to tout the successes, nor mitigate the abuses, of their racial group.

Research on black and white families from different social classes shows the importance of understanding how gender, race, and social class occur simultaneously in the process of gender socialization. Parents' interactions with their sons and daughters differ on the basis of the intersection of race and social class. For instance, although both black and white parents highly value their children getting a good education and jobs in the future, this is more of a priority for black parents from lower income groups. Upper-middle class parents of both races place less emphasis on education and jobs, but when ranking priorities for their children, education and jobs are still at the top of the list for black upper-middle class parents, whereas family is central for white upper-middle class parents. In addition, white parents emphasize obedience for their sons, whereas black parents emphasize discipline through withdrawal of privileges. Overall, this research highlights the importance of considering race and social class in the process of gender socialization.

Peers

Children's daily encounters with peers are important in the process of gender socialization. Scholars argue that gender socialization is not simply a one-way process where adults teach children what it means to be a girl or a boy and, in turn, they passively accept those lessons and messages. Rather, children actively negotiate and adapt the information adults give them before they incorporate it into their self-concept. Children are seen as creative and gender socialization is viewed as a collective process. Some scholars even suggest that same-sex peers are the most influential socializing agents for children.

Research shows that children actively separate themselves by gender by dividing into same-sex playgroups. This often occurs without any adult influence as young as age 2 and grows stronger as children move into middle childhood. Studies also show that girls tend to interact with one another in smaller groups and that their games and activities are more flexible and less rule-bound. Conversely, boys tend to congregate in larger groups, and their games and activities are more structured, organized, and competitive.

Young children demonstrate strong disapproval of cross-gender behavior in their peers, but only show mild disapproval of cross-gender behavior in adults. In addition, studies find that high-status boys police the activities of girls who cross into boy-typed activities. Additionally, in both cases, peers positively sanction children with "appropriate" gender displays. However, other research highlights the similarities among girls and boys, focusing on interactions that cross the gender divide. Barrie Thorne argues that too much research emphasizes differences between children and ignores children's "borderwork"; rather than separating themselves into exclusive gender-defined groups, girls and boys commonly attempt to cross gender boundaries and participate in activities associated with the other gender. However, when adults placed children into groups, they often engaged in contests, chasing, and invasions that illustrate that the worlds of boys and girls are not equal. Girls take up less physical space than boys, have their space invaded by boys more often than they invade boys' space, and are more likely to be defined as polluted.

Studies also indicate that children often self-segregate themselves in the classroom, in the cafeteria, and on the playground. Additionally, children are liked better and tend to have more friends to play with when they choose gender-appropriate toys. This is especially true for boys: those who engage in cross-gender play are considered unpopular by both boys and girls their age and are often highly criticized and called names, such as sissy. This type of name-calling challenges a boy's sexuality, for which he is often ridiculed and bullied. Even when teachers encouraged boys to engage in cross-gender play, if their peers denounced it, boys were more likely to listen to the comments and criticisms of their peers.

Although peers are an important socializing agent for children, peers become even more important in the formation of gender identity as boys and girls get older and the influence of the family dissipates. Peers are extremely important in the development of sexuality and the teenagers' decisions to become sexually active. Peers impose heterosexual norms on each other, which is especially critical in the gender socialization of boys. Boys in their 'tween and teenage years learn from the media that manhood is wrapped up with sex and violence. Teenage boys often gain status through sexual activity, so sexual conquest becomes a part of the development of normative masculine identity. Boys often joke with each other about scenes of sex and violence they have seen in the media as a way of performing their gender identity; not engaging in such behavior could mean becoming an outsider and others challenging one's masculinity.

Conversely, teenage girls learn that womanhood is equated with a physical beauty that is rigidly defined as white, young, and ultra-thin. Girls face social pressures to conform to feminine beauty standards and are severely judged by their peers on the basis of attractiveness and sexual behavior or lack thereof. Girls, however, must walk a fine line between abstaining from and indulging in sexual activity; both the former and the latter often have negative social consequences. Teenage girls and boys who do not meet the standards of their gender category and are marked as outsiders may begin to act out in school, earn lower grades, experience depression or physical illness, and even have difficultly with relationships in adulthood.

Schools

A large part of what children learn in schools has nothing to do with reading, writing, and arithmetic; rather, children learn about proper behavior and values, including messages about gender, through what some researchers have called the "hidden curriculum." In addition to their interactions with peers, children are also socialized by their school's formal curriculum and teachers' differential expectations of boys and girls.

The formal curriculum, evident in textbooks and other educational materials, tend to emphasize men's contributions to society, while minimizing or failing to acknowledge women's vast contributions. The content on women, especially the contributions of women of color, is often limited to information on famous individuals (e.g., Rosa Parks) or mainstream and white-dominated social movements (e.g., the suffrage movement). Elementary school textbooks still often portray women as passive and dependent when compared with men. Regardless of the push toward more gender balanced and multicultural educational materials, change has been uneven and minimal.

Researchers have found that teachers tend to call on boys more frequently and give them more personal attention, praise, and specific feedback on their work. Teachers also indirectly socialize boys to be assertive and aggressive and girls to be quiet and polite by calling on girls less frequently and reprimanding girls more often than boys for speaking out of turn. In addition, separating children into different groups, lines, and teams on the basis of gender continues to exacerbate the differential treatment given to boys and girls. This practice reinforces the notion that boys and girls are inherently different by not just separating them, but many times also pitting them against each other.

Research shows that differential treatment has harsh consequences for girls; while they continue to outperform boys on standardized tests in the early years of education, girls often lag behind boys by the end of high school. High school guidance counselors and other administrators often track boys and girls into gender-typed fields and activities, discouraging girls from math- and science-based fields. Boys routinely outperform girls in math and science in high school, which then continues into their college years. Eventually, boys' encouragement and girls' discouragement in math and science courses develop into careers in these highly competitive and prestigious fields.

Media

Media, including children's literature, television, and video games, are an increasingly important agent of gender socialization. Parents are beginning to lean on the media more and more to occupy their children and teach them essential values, lessons, and skills. In addition, the media also help socialize children into their gender identities through the portrayal of gender-stereotyped behavior and attitudes.

Children's Literature

Research on children's literature has shown that books for children are sources of important socializing lessons. Gender stereotypes have been, and continue to be, prevalent. A landmark study of Caldecott award–winning picture books for children documented males playing a larger part in stories and pictures, with females rarely represented or playing supporting roles. Men and women were involved in different activities as well, as men engaged in a variety of adventures outdoors that required strength and autonomy, while women remained indoors in passive domestic roles.

Recent research on children's literature continues to assert the socializing implications of children's literature and documents similar depictions of men and women displaying stereotypical characteristics and attitudes. Men are still overwhelming depicted as aggressive and competitive, despite the call for nonsexist portrayals in children's literature. Girls are still often located in the home using domestic items, with boys outdoors involved in an adventure. One researcher noted that, even though more than two million girls play sports on organized teams, few books are written about such teams. Studies also show that a large number of these books assign girls and boys gender-typical aspirations. Researchers also note that books featuring strong, independent women are becoming increasingly popular. Books by African American writers, as compared with books by white writers, feature more female characters, and those characters are more likely to be portrayed as independent and competitive, as well as more nurturing. Despite social changes during the past several decades, few books feature men in nurturing and caring roles, or in other nontraditional ways. Children's literature, as well as television and video games, are important markers of cultural change, as well as agents of gender socialization.

Television and Video Games

With some exceptions, children's television programming is also gender stereotyped. Cartoons are especially revealing because girls are often depicted as domestic and passive, whereas boys are often depicted as active and violent. In addition, cartoons have more males as the main characters, as well as more males leading the action or pursuit. Males in these cartoons are also featured in occupations, in contrast to females who are often shown in generic caregiving roles. Studies show that these types of cartoons affect children's self-concepts and aspirations for the future because they tend to pick gender stereotypical jobs for both themselves and other people.

Research on video games and their socialization lessons is a burgeoning area of study. Video games have been described as gendered play spaces and as distinct genres are marketed toward boy and girls. Linear, goal-driven narratives mark boy's games, whereas girl's games are seen as more circular explorations. Some argue that digital play spaces need to combine these different attributes to create a common play space for both boys and girls. However, most video games are designed by men for boys and men, and change may be difficult to accomplish in such a hypermasculine arena.

As the popularity of video games has increased, researchers began to pay closer attention to the games' content. Studies show that a majority of video games overwhelmingly portray stereotypical gender roles for men and women and center on violence. Many video games lack any female characters at all. Women, when featured, are portrayed in demeaning ways, as provocatively dressed—or undressed—sexual fantasies, thus as sex objects. In addition, the violence and aggression that dominates video games is often directed toward women, particularly prostitutes and strippers.

Researchers argue that video games socialize their users through misogyny and violence, cultivating a dangerous definition of masculinity. Although the effects of these images and messages are still unknown, many argue that they may negatively affect boys' attitudes toward girls and women and their notions of acceptable behavior for boys and men.

Gender Identity Disorder

Gender identity disorder (GID) is a psychiatric diagnosis that mental health and medical professionals apply to people who were assigned one gender at birth and subsequently identify with another gender or who do not adhere to the gender role associated with their assigned gender. The GID diagnosis appears in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Fourth Edition, Text Revision (DSM-IV-TR), the American Psychiatric Association's (APA) most recent official listing of psychiatric disorders. A set of GIDs also appears in the World Health Organization's (WHO) International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems (IDC-10). This entry describes the history, current diagnostic criteria, and controversy surrounding GID.

History

GID today is the most recent version of a set of diagnoses that first appeared in American psychiatry in DSM-III in 1980. DSM-III included for the first time a diagnostic group called "Gender Identity Disorders," comprising "Transsexuality," "Gender Identity Disorder of Childhood," and "Transvestic Fetishism." These diagnoses formalized medical and psychiatric thinking about gender-variant people that dated back to the 19th century, expressed in the work of such early sexologists as Havelock Ellis, Karl Ulrichs, and Magnus Hirschfeld. More recently, GIDs were the product of heightened mid-20th-century interest among a subset of psychiatrists and other medical and mental health professionals in gender variance. Their increased interest was primarily directed at the newly emerging medical and social category of transsexuality.

Since appearing in DSM-III, the gender identity disorder entries have changed with each subsequent DSM revision. The most significant revision was the 1994 combining of "Transsexualism" with "Gender Identity Disorder of Childhood" into one overarching diagnosis, "Gender Identity Disorder." "Transvestic Fetishism," once listed among the gender disorders, has been reclassified as a sexual paraphilia. The GID diagnosis today is most associated with transsexual adults and with gender-variant children.

Current Diagnostic Criteria

As outlined in DSM-IV-TR, GID has two basic components that must be present for a diagnosis to be made: (1) There must be both a strong and a persistent cross-gender identification. (2) There must be evidence of persistent discomfort with one's assigned sex or a sense of inappropriateness in the gender role of that sex. The diagnostic text lists specific examples of these criteria as they may manifest in children and in adolescents or adults. The criteria also disallow a diagnosis if an intersex condition is present. The cross-gender identification or behaviors must also be accompanied by significant distress and impairment.

In addition to the main GID diagnosis, the DSM contains a "Gender Identity Disorder Not Otherwise Specified" (GIDNOS) diagnosis. It permits a GID diagnosis for someone who may not fit all the criteria of the primary diagnosis (such residual "not otherwise specified" categories are not unusual in psychiatric diagnostics). Examples provided in the DSM of appropriate GIDNOS diagnoses include people with intersex conditions, people whose cross-gender identification or behaviors may be temporary, and people who may obsess about castration without wanting to change sex.

Controversy

The GIDs have been controversial since they first appeared. Beginning in the mid-1990s, the level of controversy and debate increased, partly because of the work of transgender, intersex, and queer social movements, but also because of critiques made within medical and mental health professions by both individuals and lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transsexual (LGBT) professional organizations.

Critics argue that GID continues a long-standing psychiatric and medical history of pathologizing oppressed peoples. Some argue that the diagnosis stigmatizes groups that are simply expressing variation, not pathology. Critics suggest that the diagnosis individualizes a broad cultural and social phenomenon. GID, they say, transforms society's intolerance for gender nonconformity into a pathology applied to individual gender nonconformists.

For adult transsexuals, critics suggest that GID mistakenly categorizes a medical condition as a mental health disorder. These critics often point to recent research that may indicate a biological basis for transsexuality. Some therefore lobby for the elimination of the diagnosis. Others have suggested that GID could be redesignated as a benign, somatically based medical condition instead of a psychiatric disorder. However, because many transsexuals seek the services of medical and mental health professionals, some members of transsexual and transgender communities worry that removing or reforming the GID diagnosis could jeopardize the availability of sex reassignment surgeries and other procedures. There is also concern that, without the diagnosis, insurance reimbursements for such procedures could be threatened.

For gender-variant children, critics often argue that the diagnosis is over-inclusive. Research on children diagnosed with GID suggests that they will most likely grow up to be gay and bisexual. Critics note that the APA and other mental health professional organizations do not list homosexuality as a mental illness, and thus question the treatment of children they term "pre-homosexual." Some also suggest that GID treatments for children over-focus on boys, that treatment may be damaging to self-esteem, and that the distress that GID children exhibit is not inherent to their gender nonconformity but, rather, is a reaction to being stigmatized. Many of the mental health professionals who support the diagnosis and treat GID children counter that their treatments are not aimed at preventing homosexuality; that they help GID children to have better peer relations and thus bolstered self-esteem, and that research indicates that GID children do exhibit forms of distress associated directly with their gender variance.

GENDER OUTLAW

Gender outlaw refers to an individual who does not conform to society's expectations for their biological sex. In Western societies, sex is often conflated with gender, meaning that women are expected to abide by certain "rules" of femininity, and men must follow particular "rules" of masculinity. Not following these rules may result in material consequences such as discrimination, societal marginalization, and physical violence.

Western society has constructed sex, gender, and sexuality along the lines of a binary. Therefore, one is supposed to be either male or female, masculine or feminine, heterosexual or homosexual. A gender outlaw violates one or more of these binaries in some way. For example, not all babies are born with "intelligible" genitalia. Rather than accepting variation, society labels such people as "abnormal." Therefore, the parents are likely to approve sex-reassignment surgery. The baby's genitalia are then surgically shaped into either a penis or a vagina. Besides "ambiguous" genitalia, gender outlaws may not identify as their biological sex; for example, a male identifying as a woman. Also, a gender outlaw may be a person who "does" or "performs" gender in a way that does not reinforce the gender binary.

Kate Bornstein is perhaps the most well-known contemporary gender outlaw within gender studies. In her book, Gender Outlaw: On Men, Women, and the Rest of Us, it is "the rest of us" with whom she is concerned. In this work, she discusses her coming of age, highlighting how gendered and sexualized norms worked for and, more commonly, against her. She challenges cultural customs, beliefs, and institutions that are readily attached to the categories male and female by drawing on her own experiences of sex-reassignment surgery and identifying as a lesbian, transgendered woman.

Gender defender is the term Bornstein uses to describe scholars, activists, and the like, who insist on using, defending, and understanding gender as naturally linked to one's assigned sex. Gender outlaws, on the other hand, challenge gendered and sexualized binaries through writing, performance art, photography, poetry, and activism, in addition to many overlapping mediums. Some gender outlaws such as Brandon Teena, though not politically active, experienced embodied gender oppression through his everyday experiences.

Gender outlaws are also found in various geographical regions throughout the world. These regions necessarily make a direct link from binary sex categories to binary gender identities problematic. For example, as anthropologists and activists have shown in Thailand, automatically linking female and male to feminine and masculine and heterosexuality and homosexuality is highly problematic. A common cultural term, pheet, synthesizes sex category and gender identity and allows the reading of multiple genders and sexualities, thus complicating assumed binaries. This example is only one of many that challenge Western gender binaries. Gender outlaws, therefore, may be constructed as "abnormal" in certain cultural contexts but considered "normal" and sometimes spiritual in other cultural contexts.

GENDER PERFORMANCE

The concept of gender performance has developed within debates concerning sex, gender, and sexuality in sociology and feminism. Though conceptualized somewhat differently by various scholars, gender performance can be broadly defined as the act of engaging in a set of behaviors that display an individual's gender identity as female or male and that cause the individual to be so perceived during social interaction. The notion of gender performance relies on a division between "sex" and "gender." Sociologists and feminists have sought to clarify the tendency to conflate these terms by introducing the idea of a sex/gender divide wherein these two concepts are distinct, though related. Sex is defined as biological femaleness or maleness. Gender is a social construction, or set of ideas and expectations about femininity and masculinity. There are various understandings of how gender is performed, and such performance may involve the body (through body modifications such as cutting hair), dress, comportment, and social interaction and discourse.

Feminists have politicized the notion of gender as performance by arguing that women are not naturally or biologically weaker or inferior to men, but are created as less powerful through gendered social practice. Developments in feminist thought have led some feminist scholars to challenge the notion of a sex/gender distinction, a critique that has brought gender performance even more to the center of such debate. This entry describes the principal theories within which the concept of gender performance has developed. Though they appear here under distinct headings, these perspectives have not developed in isolation from each other and share many key ideas and concepts.

Symbolic Interactionism: Gender Displays

Sociologist Erving Goffman developed a symbolic interactionist approach to social interaction. Symbolic interactionism is a sociological perspective that views social reality as a product of the meaning-making of individuals during interaction with others. Goffman outlines a dramaturgical approach to social interaction wherein he likens social interaction to performances by actors onstage. He sees individuals as creative players in social interaction, influenced by the performances of other actors as well as specific audiences.

Gender is expressed during social interaction through a form of interactive performance that Goffman terms gender displays. Gender displays help define what will occur during a social interaction and how the interaction will be organized. Goffman likens gender displays between women and men to the roles of domination-subordination characterized by the parent-child relationship: the relationship between women and men is unequal, with women positioned as the dependent and subordinate child. For example, a male's masculine gender displays in interaction with a woman will likely position him as an initiator and leader; the woman then conducts herself in a gender display appropriate to femininity so that she follows the man's lead.

Though Goffman recognizes biological differences between women and men in the form of reproductive capabilities, he argues against the common interpretation of gender displays as being demonstrative of the inherent nature of female or male individuals. Goffman asserts that different behaviors of women and men are instead rooted in culture, rather than biology and that gender displays create the notion of gender difference. He uses the term sex-class to refer to women and men as distinct social classes, clearly defining the social inequality between women and men as a social (as opposed to biological) design.

Ethnomethodology: The "Doing" of Gender

Though Goffman did not specifically develop the concept of gender as performance, his work influenced other scholars who have used this terminology. The ethnomethodological research of two sociologists, Candace West and Don Zimmerman, expanded Goffman's work on gender display. Ethnomethodology is a type of sociology that seeks to understand how individuals create social life as meaningful through interaction with others. West and Zimmerman developed a theory of gender performance in which they posit gender as something individuals do. Gender is a performance that occurs during social interaction, rather than reflecting inherent traits of individuals.

West and Zimmerman argue that individuals claim to be members of a particular sex category, either female or male, through performances of gender. Social prestige and power are awarded to individuals on the basis of their privileged (male) or less privileged (female) sex category status, so stakes are high in the performance of gender. West and Zimmerman describe individuals as accountable for appropriate gender performances. That is, individuals are held accountable for clear and representative performances of gender, or else they may face negative social sanctions. As such, performances of gender are mandatory within a society wherein power and resources are allocated on the basis of sex category. Gender performance, then, incorporates individuals into social structure.

The Social Construction of Gender

Since the 1970s, sociological and feminist scholarship has widely used the understanding of gender as a social construction, a conceptualization that inherently relies on a separation of the terms sex and gender. Gender as a social construction is the culturally determined definitions of femininity and masculinity, created by humans and subject to change over time. Sex refers to biology as female or male. Further, some feminists also argue that sexuality is also a social construction that is linked to sex and gender. Feminist sociologist Judith Lorber argues, for example, that the social construct of sexuality is linked to gender by determining with whom it is appropriate to mate and the division of labor for raising children.

Feminists have used the theory of social constructionism to challenge the dominant essentialist perspectives on sex/gender, which broadly assert that gender is determined by biology and therefore reflects the unchangeable essential natures of women and men. Feminists have sought to explain the subordination of women to men in patriarchal society as an unnatural and unjustifiable social oppression. Feminists instead argue that femininity and masculinity are not naturally occurring traits or sets of behaviors or dispositions, but are learned culturally specific sets of behaviors and characteristics.

There are various feminist perspectives on the social construction of gender. Some feminists give greater consideration to the biological body and certain biological differences between women and men. Others posit that all gendered differences between women and men are socially created via individuals' compliance with gendered expectations for gender performance.

As theories on the social construction of gender have developed, feminist scholars have grown increasingly critical of the sex/gender divide. Some feminists argue that the concept of gender as a social construction has reified the notion of sex as biological; reaffirming a natural sex difference between women and men may counter the aim of some feminists to assert the equality and essential sameness between women and men.

Postmodern Feminism: Gender "Performativity"

The influence of postmodernism is apparent in the efforts of some feminist theorists to rework dichotomous understandings of sex/gender. Postmodernism is a vein of social theory that varies across academic disciplines and in application by different theorists. (Some critics doubt that there has been a transition from the modern era in social history to a postmodern era.) Broadly, postmodernism is a shift toward the elimination of universal and dichotomous categorizations of, particularly, identity and the recognition of a multiplicity of coexisting social realities or truths, as well as knowledges and identities. Postmodern feminists critique the sex/gender (nature/culture) dichotomy. Now some feminists, including philosopher Judith Butler, argue that both sex and gender are social constructions.

Butler has developed a theory of gender performativity. In Butler's formulation, gender is performed through discourse, which includes social interaction as well as the discourse contained within texts, media, and the law. Contrasting with notions of an individual self who performs gender as in West and Zimmerman's conceptualization of gender performance, Butler argues that there is no gender identity that motivates performances of gender. She suggests that the repetitious discursive performance of gender creates an illusion of a gendered core self. An individual's sex role identity exists in the performance of gender, and this identity is itself performative. Gender identity is an effect of discursive performances.

The performance of gender naturalizes the categories of gender. Gender performance creates the illusion of being an essential representation of a real, natural, and underlying gendered core in individuals. But because gender is a performance, Butler argues that there is no true gendered core or identity upon which such performances are based. Therefore, there is no original model for such performances, only ideals from which gender performances are copied. Because gender is not biologically fixed but is socially constructed, Butler argues that there is ample room for change in gender performances; there is possibility of subversion or a multiplication of gender. Butler cites drag, cross-dressing, and butch/femme identities as examples of performativity with the potential to disrupt traditional ideas about the fixity of sex/gender identities; these acts can expose gender as a performance that can be enacted by socially inappropriate actors (such as a male drag queen impersonating feminine females, or a butch lesbian enacting masculinity in appearance, relationship, and desire).

Conclusion

Many scholars continue to debate the meanings of sex and gender, and the relationship between them. Sex, gender, and sexuality are politicized concepts that underlie basic assumptions about human nature and how society is organized via sex/gender. Sociological and feminist theorists, as well as queer theorists, continue to develop new understandings of the relationship of sex/gender/sexuality and performance.

GENDER PUBLIC ADVOCACY COALITION

The Gender Public Advocacy Coalition (GPAC, GenderPAC) is an association that seeks to attain equal rights for people in all aspects of society regardless of gender, and whether or not they adhere to gender stereotypes. GenderPAC was founded by Riki Wilchins in 1995 as a loose coalition of organizations; it became a corporation in 1999 and received tax-exempt status as an IRS §501(c)3 nonprofit. The GenderPAC headquarters are located in Washington, D.C. Wilchins is the current executive director of GenderPAC.

The mission of the GenderPAC is to make communities, classrooms, and workplaces safe and free of gender biases that define masculinity and femininity in rigid terms. GenderPAC seeks to erase these gender biases through programs such as Gender Youth, Children As They Are, and Workplace Fairness. Gender Youth develops young leaders in schools and empowers them with the skills to make schools a safe place for children who do not comply with society's definition of what it means to be male or female. The Children As They Are program informs parents and educators of the dangers of forcing their children to succumb to the rigorous gender norms that are pervasive in U.S. society. This program encourages parents to allow their children to develop well-rounded interests and express themselves regardless of whether or not their behavior meets society's definition of gender "appropriate" behavior. The mission of Workplace Fairness is to ensure that people are not discriminated against in the workplace for their failure to met society's gender definitions. This program informs individuals and companies alike of what gender stereotyping is, how to recognize it and discuss it, and what needs to be done about gender discrimination and stereotyping in the workplace. Workplace Fairness offers on- and off-site workshops and training. GenderPAC has petitioned organizations to change the Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) policies to include gender identity. In 1997, one company had gender identity as part of its EEO policies. Currently, 193 major corporations have EEO policies that include gender identity.

GenderPAC accomplishes these goals through weekly press releases, published articles in the popular press, and Gender Tours that travel across the country educating the media, public, and communities of the danger of discrimination based on gender stereotypes. GenderPAC shows the danger of gender stereotypes by using its human rights report, "50 under 30: Masculinity and the War on America's Youth." This report addresses the underreporting of gender-based violence that has taken the life of more than 50 young people since 1995. Furthermore, this report addresses the trends of gender-based hate crimes to demonstrate the necessity of changing the gender stereotypes in U.S. society, including the facts that victims and assailants are predominately male and that a large number of these crimes remain unsolved.

GenderPAC has recently addressed the portrayal of masculinity in the hip-hop and rap culture, which often are replete with stereotypes of aggressiveness, homophobia, violence, and sexism. This program has called for corporations to be held accountable for the music or music videos they play portraying this dangerous view of masculinity.

Genderqueer

First widely used in the late 1990s, genderqueer is an identity adopted by individuals who characterize themselves as neither female nor male, as both, or as somewhere in between. Although genderqueers describe and express their identities differently and may or may not consider themselves to be transgender (a general term for people whose gender identity or expression differs from the gender assigned to them at birth), they commonly understand themselves in ways that challenge binary constructions of gender and traditional images of transgender individuals. Genderqueer is an identity more frequently embraced by younger gender nonconforming people, ensuring that the crossing and blurring of gender lines will continue to become more visible and likely more accepted.

The concept of genderqueer has its genesis in the development of a queer movement in the 1990s that redefined queer as a term of empowerment and confronted heteronormativity and the conformist ideologies of many lesbian and gay organizations. In a similar way, the term genderqueer challenges gender normativity and the common assumption, even among many transgender people, that everyone is either male or female. A genderqueer identity challenges the traditional transsexual paradigm that individuals who feel themselves to be a gender different from the one assigned to them at birth will seek to express that different gender completely through changing their bodies and presenting unambiguously as that gender.

Undermining this binary gender expectation, genderqueer individuals express their gender identities in a variety of ways. Some partly or entirely transition to a gender different from their birth gender through hormones, gender reassignment surgeries, or altering their bodies in other ways, such as by having electrolysis or bodybuilding, to look more androgynous or more like a gender different from their birth gender. Others do not change their bodies, but dress and present in ways that destabilize gender categories, such as by wearing a combination of clothing considered appropriate only for women or men, or by completely cross-dressing. But not all genderqueers are able to or feel the need to express a gender nonconforming identity, so appearance alone cannot be used as an indication of a genderqueer identity.

Genderqueer individuals also make different choices about how they want to be referred to by others. Some accept the pronouns compatible with their assigned gender, but others ask to be described with the pronouns of a gender different from their birth gender. Still others seek to use "they" and "them" as singular pronouns or want to be identified by gender-neutral pronouns—typically "ze" or "sie" instead of "he" or "she" and "zir" or "hir" instead of "her" or "him." A few reject pronouns altogether, preferring to be called only by their first names. Some genderqueers also adopt androgynous names, combine traditionally male and female names, or assume names that are more typical for someone assigned a gender different from themselves.

Genderqueer identities are much more prevalent among youth, many of whom feel constricted by traditional gender and transgender categories. Gender nonconforming individuals growing up in the early 21st century have access to information and can meet others like themselves on the Internet, see an increasing number of transgender images in popular culture, and benefit from the political and social gains made by previous generations of transgender activists. As a result, they often can take advantage of a greater range of options for defining and expressing their gender identities than was available to transgender individuals who came out between the 1960s and 1990s.

But despite the growing visibility of genderqueer individuals, gender nonconforming behavior, especially by individuals assigned male at birth, continues to be highly stigmatized and frequently punished. Studies have shown, for example, that gender nonconforming high school and college students experience greater levels of harassment and violence than do non-transgender lesbian, gay, and bisexual students, and rates of unemployment, incarceration, and crime victimization are much higher among individuals who are known to be transgender than among the non-transgender population. Thus, being able to transgress gender boundaries freely in most areas of society remains a privilege available only to a few.

Whether or how someone expresses or is perceived to express a genderqueer identity is also affected by race, ethnicity, class, nationality, religion, and other aspects of identity, as different cultures and communities have different norms regarding what constitutes "female" and "male" appearance and behavior. For example, women who grow up on farms in many rural communities are able to dress and act in ways that would be considered masculine in more urban areas, and men in many traditional Muslim cultures wear clothing that most Westerners would see as feminine.

To date, self-identified genderqueer individuals have published little. Even the anthology GenderQueer: Voices from Beyond the Sexual Binary, edited by Joan Nestle and colleagues, has only a few contributors who specifically describe themselves as genderqueer. With a growing number of people coming out as genderqueer, much more will be written about the lives of genderqueer people in the near future.

GENDER ROLE IDEOLOGY AND INTIMACY

Women and men relate to each other in many contexts—in family life, work and formal organizations, marriage and cohabitation, friendships, and a host of others. In all of these settings, individuals confront expectations of how they should behave and think. Although some expectations may be widely shared (e.g., calling to say thank-you after receiving a gift), others vary depending on whether you are a woman or a man. Gender role ideologies is one name sociologists have given to these sex-specific expectations. This phrase refers to a "gender role," understood as a set of expected actions and dispositions ascribed to an individual on the basis of her or his assumed biological sex. Gender also functions as "ideology," in the sense that there is a fervent and perhaps widespread belief in the truth of the expected roles. Thus, gender role ideologies may be deeply held, and not easily relinquished; they weigh upon all individuals to varying degrees.

This entry addresses the place of gender role ideologies in past and present-day heterosexual romantic relationships. Romantic relationships (e.g., married and, more recently, cohabiting) have provided fertile ground for enacting gender role ideologies. These ideologies guide individuals' answers to many practical questions arising in everyday life, and especially in romantic relationships. Will women or men perform housework? Are men or women more emotionally attached to romantic relationships? How much time should be spent together and apart? If there are children, who will work, and who will stay at home? And although these questions continue in their importance, recent social developments also present new questions for women and men to work through, and the possibility for new, more egalitarian gender role ideologies. In part, this potential for new gender role ideologies is linked to a "culture of intimacy," a concept that has been central to discussions of heterosexual relationships for the past 25 to 30 years.

The following section reviews past gender role ideologies, highlighting the social conditions that accompanied particular beliefs about women and men. Next, the entry provides a summary of how an emergent "culture of intimacy" organizes contemporary heterosexual relationships. The final section assesses the status of gender role ideologies as they exist in romantic relationships enmeshed in today's culture of intimacy.

Gender Role Ideologies: Then and Now

The period stretching from the late 1800s to the 1950s may be aptly termed America's heyday of gender role ideologies. During that time, many of the gendered expectations society has placed on women and men were solidified. As capitalist production diminished the economic role of women, women's primary responsibility by the latter days of the 19th century became more and more closely associated with the sphere of family relations. Middle-class American women were swept up in a "cult of domesticity," allying women with the caring and nurturing demands of home-life, and leaving men to dominate the rationalized and independent worlds of work and politics. Though challenged by women's entry into the paid workforce after the first and second world wars, a woman's social place during this long period was largely understood as in the home, her personality being warm, affectionate, and accommodating. In comparison, men were assigned roles as uncommunicative and unyielding economic providers. These gender roles enjoyed hegemonic status, largely unchallenged even by early-20th-century women's movements (e.g., for the right to vote).

These "traditional" ideologies profoundly shaped heterosexual relationships for the white middle classes throughout the early 20th century and into the 1950s. In accordance with these roles, there existed between married couples unequal divisions of housework, responsibilities for childrearing, and degree of emotional attachment to the relationship. But sea changes in 1960s and 1970s United States (as well as in other Western societies) promised to undermine the gender role ideologies that underpinned such inequalities. Feminist social activism, increased labor force participation, and heightened personal control over reproduction were only a few of the developments working to grant (white middle-class) women new levels of autonomy and individual opportunity. No longer would women be defined solely as appendages of the family or their husbands. Many young men as well, involved in civil rights, antiwar, and other left movements, had the chance to rethink the capitalist and masculinist ideologies shaping their own gender roles.

Since the 1960s and 1970s, sociologists have paid special attention to the possibilities generated by these social shifts. Speculation centered on whether traditional gender ideologies would crumble, giving way to more androgynous relations between women and men. Or, would constraining beliefs about gender persist? Sociologists have turned to romantic relationships as a key setting in which answers to these questions are played out.

Understanding a Culture of Intimacy in Heterosexual Relationships

Cultural, economic, and institutional shifts occurring during the mid-20th century ushered in a new context for heterosexual romantic relationships. Previous (gendered) interpretations of women and men's orientation to relationships no longer held true to the degree they once did. For example, today it is not Victorian notions of a spiritually derived "true love" that best describe individuals' orientation to romantic bonds. Neither do conditions of economic dependence or repressive cultural norms mandate marriage and permanent relationships to the extent they once did. Traditional cultural and economic frameworks for understanding romantic attachment have lost some of their explanatory and descriptive power; feminist ideologies, along with women's increased participation in paid labor and a generally flexible market economy, all worked to inaugurate a "culture of intimacy" that guides heterosexual relationships.

Although this late-20th-century culture of intimacy carries multiple definitions, several common elements can be discerned in most accounts. Intimacy typically refers to a heightened emphasis on knowing the other and on reciprocal consideration. Disclosure of the self through open communication is prioritized in a culture of intimacy, and it is widely recognized that relationships take psychological toil and effort by both partners if they are to survive. In this new order of intimacy, relationships are governed by democratic and egalitarian ideals; the survival of a marriage or other romantic relationship depends more on the degree to which it emotionally and sexually fulfills each partner than it does on external pressures (e.g., family or community coercion). If in the past heterosexual romantic bonds were organized by taken-for-granted, unequal gender roles, a culture of intimacy derives its originality from an emphasis on rational decision making, and an ability to question in ongoing fashion the way rights and responsibilities are to be shared between romantic partners. Thus, intimacy is an apt word to summarize these dynamics in that it connotes deep closeness and familiarity—necessary preconditions for such a mutually negotiated field of relationships.

To the extent that relationships are governed by these new intimate ideals, the implications are numerous. Some express concern about a discourse of rationality, rights, and partnerships invading a sphere of supposedly warmer relations. Others optimistically interpret such ideals as a progressive force, in that they elevate the needs and wishes of individuals (and especially of women) above the demands of social norms that long constrained and imbalanced heterosexual relationships. Moreover, because intimacy—at least heterosexual intimacy—refers not simply to generalized ideals but also to relations between real women and men, the fate of "traditional" gendered roles in this potentially egalitarian romantic partnership is questioned. Some scholars argue that a culture of intimacy may make romantic relationships a progressive force, in stark contrast to their past tendency to reinforce strict gender roles.

Gender Role Ideologies and Intimacy

Earlier sections of this entry described the taken-for-granted character of gender roles throughout the 19th and first half of the 20th centuries. This was a period during which material conditions (e.g., industrial capitalism) and cultural beliefs fused to create social conceptions of women as passive and nurturing and men as forceful and economically active. Various social forces functioned to reinforce the unquestioned, "received wisdom" quality of dichotomized gender roles. But today, an emergent culture of intimacy indicates a model of heterosexual bonds in which relationships, married or otherwise, are fashioned through conscious decision making and negotiation by empowered individuals. Because most women and men must work outside the home, "love" can be understood as a shared accomplishment between women and men, rather than a uniquely feminine skill. Hence, present realities make past ideologies and arrangements untenable. Moreover, scholars point to how social supports beyond the romantic relationship (interpersonal and institutional) have eroded, and the real possibility of divorce leaves women systematically disadvantaged, breeding a healthy skepticism about entering into relationships. Culturally, autonomy and independence are no longer recognized as inherent male qualities, but instead as pathways that should be made available to women as well. Some argue that these new ideals and economic conditions render relationships and gender ideologies unscripted and open for debate. The egalitarian and deliberative ideals of intimacy step in to guide individuals in rewriting relationships.

Researchers point to enduring gender inequalities in heterosexual relationships to problematize the practice of rewriting relationships. Housework is still unequally shared between married women and men, and women are more likely than men to report deficits of emotional connection in relationships. Women and men persist in describing their own orientations to love and romance in typically gendered terms (e.g., love as natural for women and laborious for men), and long-term relationships still are desired by most. Yet, the central features of the culture of intimacy—self-disclosure, a language of individual rights, emphases on self-development—do find expression in contemporary relationships, helping women to negotiate more effectively in disputes and decision making, and making women and men alike aware of innovative relationship possibilities.

Conclusion: The Promise of Intimate Culture

The relative benefits and costs associated with a culture of intimacy, and its implications for gender role ideologies are debatable. Social theorist Robert Bellah has argued that a principal shortcoming of relationships in a culture of intimacy is their insulation from external influence. To Bellah, intimate ideals encourage couples to operate according to guidelines they establish on their own, away from society. Detached from broader social norms and regulation, individuals must engage in "incessant renegotiation" of their internal relationship guidelines. Although he is nominally concerned about social norms that at times impose unreasonable limits on freedom and wield power unjustly, Bellah nonetheless is more wary of relationships between women and men that are navigated in relative isolation, or according to therapeutic experts' dictates. According to this argument, intimacy's chief failing is its rejection of traditional authority and stable gender roles in favor of new arrangements established by a "party of two."

Some scholars argue that this view is inadequate given certain present realities; the ethic of negotiation fostered by intimacy may be understood as a progressive force. It appears beneficial in that it destabilizes gender role ideologies; its promise lies also in its functionality. As the economic and cultural justifications for traditional gender roles have worn away, new relationship arrangements are demanded. According to Bellah, "incessant renegotiation," is the process through which women and men might hope to establish scripts for behavior in romantic relationships that move beyond traditional ideologies, and that cope with the unprecedented flexibility of contemporary social life. Negotiation and debate in relationships take place today in direct proportion to the (incessantly) growing range of uncharted terrain in romantic relationships. The number of new relationship questions is interminable. Who will give care for aging parents with rising life expectancies? Will a couple stay put for a woman's job that carries medical benefits or move for a man's better-paying job that carries none? For those with means to send their children to myriad after-school lessons and programs (and for those who do not have the means but do so anyway), which parent's work schedule will be rearranged to shuttle young children to their next activity? If a couple's enthusiasm for sex is dwindling, should a third party be added to the mix? These historically unique problems and a slew of others require unique solutions negotiated by both partners.

Traditional gender role ideologies constructed women as passive and caring and men as active and providing. Though these ideologies continue in some ways to shape expectations, the realities of post-1960s life have rendered these beliefs open to challenges and in a sense plainly untenable. Today, the flexible nature of contemporary society (increasingly referred to as "risk society") requires that both women and men be workers, "carers," planners, and so much more. A culture of intimacy is functional in that it conditions individuals for their roles as "on the fly" decision makers. In this sense, gender role ideologies are converging.

Gender Roles on Television Shows

Media producers often attempt to provide their audiences with a window on the world. However, because of the one-dimensional nature of television and the complex multidimensionality of social reality, such windows seldom offer accurate views of the world. Even perceived unscripted television programs such as news broadcasts, at closer inspection, are not so unscripted after all. Journalists' and newsroom editors' personal biases, often unintentionally, influence how information is framed as "news." By definition, news selection processes, a standard in journalism protocol, distort social realities because these processes isolate information from their complex, multidimensional contexts. Journalists, like their audiences, process information through preestablished interpretive frameworks, processes that are, therefore, inherently biased. Given the multifaceted nature of information and the ways in which individuals construct social reality, news, which essentially consists of reproduced information, largely reflects a journalist's subjective interpretations.

Thus, media messages are rarely exact reflections of social reality, and yet people often rely on these messages to construct their self-identities. Because people's self-perceptions are reflexively constructed, the reflective power of television as mirror is significant. People tend to use what they see on television to reinforce their existing frameworks of interpretation. These frameworks, in turn, influence how they see others, and through interactions with these others, ultimately, how they perceive themselves. The concept of television as a mirror is a central element in many gender scholars' concerns of the negative impacts of stereotypical television gender role portrayals on women's and men's self-esteem and, subsequently, society.

Historically, gender roles portrayed in television shows reflected social patriarchy. Incomplete and narrowly defined relative to race and social class, these stereotypes tend to reinforce social inequalities. At the same time, they give visibility to the social status quo and, as such, contribute to the construction of a feminist consciousness in popular culture and to the mobilization of people willing to fight for gender equality. Television gender stereotypes are thus a so-called double-edged sword: although they perpetuate the social status quo, but they also politically empower and mobilize those who are marginalized by it. This entry describes the interaction of gender roles and television.

Gender Roles on Television Shows in Historical Perspective

In the 1950s and 1960s, television producers' portrayals of women and men tended to reproduce gender roles from traditionally masculine perspectives. During this period, men's roles were much more varied and numerous than women's were. Images of men thus dominated most television shows. Men were often portrayed as breadwinners and working professionals, but, in contrast, fewer than half of the women in television shows were depicted as having any form of paid employment. Most women were relegated to roles as wives and mothers within the context of the family and home, reinforcing the common view of women as nurturers and caregivers.

The formatted "woman-as-housewife" role was typified by Barbara Billingsley's June Cleaver in the 1960s television series Leave it to Beaver. In the series, June Cleaver is preoccupied with the well-being of her family, maintaining an orderly home for her husband and two sons, and tending to her domestic duties while demurely dressed in pearls and (not too) high heels. For many critics, June Cleaver exemplifies the ways that women in mid-20th-century television were kept in positions of social powerlessness. Despite her social dependence, Cleaver never complained and carried out her duties as mother and wife with a smile, in the self-sacrificing way that was expected of women of the day.

The cultural institutionalization of women and African Americans as socially inferior to white (middle-class) men, is illustrated by the popularity of such subservient women's characters as June Cleaver or June Whitley's matriarch Margaret Anderson in the appropriately titled 1960s sitcom Father Knows Best, or stereotypical African American characters such as Lincoln Perry's happy-go-lucky Stepin Fetchit or Hattie McDaniel's loyal Mammy in the movie classic Gone with the Wind. Confining women to the domestic sphere, infantilizing African Americans, and portraying white, middle-class men as decision makers at work and the home helped exclude women and African Americans from important political and economic decision-making processes. Men's roles consistently linked rationality, a highly valued trait in the business world, to masculinity. This link, as well as portrayals of women and African Americans as indecisive and childlike, was instrumental to the gendering of financial success; it perpetuated a deterministic view of gender roles that suggested that women would never be able to succeed in the inherently masculine (rational) professional work environment. After all, as Father Knows Best often illustrated, even within the "natural" feminine domain of the household, men were in charge of all the major decision making.

Most 1950s and 1960s television shows were heavily skewed toward the white middle classes. Although working-class women and men were largely absent from television sitcoms, African Americans fared even worse. When not entirely absent from prime time television, they were relegated to supporting roles as housemaids, cooks, butlers, or mammies. Not until the premiere of Julia, in 1968, did an African American woman, Diahann Carroll, play a leading role in a prime time television show. Carroll's Julia, a nurse, was a milestone for African Americans in television. Her role was neither typecast nor framed within the traditional "black" contexts of manual labor, poverty, or the fractured family. Julia was perceived as so mainstream that some critics in the African American community stated it was "too white" and failed to address the social reality of discrimination that an African American woman faced in 1960s and 1970s America.

By the mid-1960s, representations of women in television gradually began to change. Women's roles were still largely framed in the context of the home and family, but they also started to become more financially autonomous. Financially independence, however, meant neither equal employment status to men nor a reversal of gender role expectations. Women were often cast in supporting roles such as receptionists or secretaries and had male bosses. Although women were allowed to work, they were also expected to balance their career aspirations with their caregiving responsibilities at home. Overall, women's roles were still much framed within traditional gender role expectations. Yet television shows also increasingly portrayed women as socially independent, as seen in the 1970s comedy The Mary Tyler Moore Show, which featured Tyler Moore as the single and career-oriented Mary Richards. Despite her financial and social independence, however, Mary Richards's superiors were still overwhelmingly male.

Though the diversification of women roles in television shows was promising, representations of men and masculinity remained relatively unchanged. Men's roles did become less overtly sexist, yet television shows continued to portray a divide between perceived women's and men's domains and tasks. The portrayal of men in nontraditional roles—for example, doing household chores or taking care of the children—was seldom depicted as a natural extension of masculinity. By showing such roles as isolated occurrences, often to provide comedic relief, and positioning them within feminist discourses of gender hegemony, the constructed naturalness of traditional gender roles remained unquestioned and therefore reinforced. Overall, most men in television shows continued to be portrayed within narrow race and class contexts of social, political, and economic dominance. These 1960s and 1970s portrayals reinforced white heterosexual middle-class men's perceived social superiority.

Women's roles continued to diversify in the late 20th century. Most significantly, women began to appear as lead characters in the traditionally male-dominated genre of crime drama. In the 1960s, the British crime series The Avengers had already featured a female detective, Diana Rigg's iconic Emma Peel, as co-lead. Yet U.S. media producers didn't follow in British footsteps until the late 1970s and 1980s, when women detectives in U.S. television shows took prominence in such shows as Charlie's Angels, Murder She Wrote, Police Woman, and Cagney and Lacey. The presence of women detectives in crime dramas, as well as the introduction of women-led sitcoms such as Murphy Brown, The Golden Girls, Roseanne, or Grace Under Fire in the 1980s and 1990s, reflected media producers' increasing willingness to introduce a more feminist consciousness in television portrayals of women. The character roles for these women did not fit the traditional standards of femininity; they were not overwhelmingly thin, middle-class, white, or in their twenties, and their lives did not exclusively revolve around the family and the home. Women before the early 1970s predominantly were portrayed as sexually demure, their sexual identity dependent on men's desires and approval. By the late 1980s and 1990s, women's sexuality became more prominent, and more autonomous. Gone were the pearls and knee-length skirts of the 1950s and 1960s; in came stiletto heels, miniskirts, and belly-button-baring t-shirts in popular television series such as Sex and the City, Alias, or Buffy the Vampire Slayer.

Gender Roles on Television Shows and Social Reality

From the 1950s to the early 21st century, women's roles on mainstream television became much broader in scope; it no longer was exceptional for women to be portrayed as detectives (Cagney and Lacey), CIA spies (Alias), sexually independent (Sex and the City), physically aggressive (Xena: Warrior Princess), successful career women (Dynasty or Murphy Brown), or nonheterosexual (The L Word or Buffy the Vampire Slayer).

Men's roles had changed as well, though not as dramatically as women's. This lack of change in depictions of men is not surprising; instead, it reflects the stubbornness of and social investments in a patriarchic society. Men's roles tended to reflect the social status quo as envisioned by media producers. This status quo was characterized by traits associated with hegemonic masculinity: heterosexuality, whiteness, middle-class, financial independence, physical aggression, and—of course—rationality. Largely because of the second wave of feminism and the women's movement, the framing of women's roles in terms of social equality was finally catching up with that of men's. Yet society had remained inherently patriarchic, and thus men's roles, reflecting the status quo, also had remained largely the same. There were some exceptions, with shows like Soap, Dynasty, Will & Grace, and Queer as Folk featuring male characters who were gay and bisexual, or the comedy series My Two Dads, which introduced viewers to the single male-headed family format. However, the inclusion of nontraditional male gender roles made these shows unique and therefore exceptions that confirmed the rule.

Women's roles continued to be contextualized through a masculine framework, a male gaze, often centering on relationships and emotional dilemmas. Even in a show such as Sex and the City, which is celebrated for portraying women as sexually and financially independent, story lines tended to focus on "feminine" issues such as friendships, relationships, appearance, aging, or motherhood. At the beginning of the 21st century, women's roles had become more diverse than ever before. However, the contexts of these roles often did little to effectively challenge traditional gender role expectations in society at large.

Given the instrumentality of television in the construction of the self, diversification of women's roles is a significant step toward gender equality. The mirroring effects of television suggest that, for instance, portrayals of women as working professionals may serve as positive role models for girls and women. Yet, unless critically contextualized, such portrayals run the risk of constructing one-dimensional and distorted realities of women's experiences. For instance, portraying women predominantly as working professionals ignores how factors such as institutional racism and sexism prevent many women from climbing the corporate ladder. The underlying factors contributing to women's social marginality remain unaddressed. Given the reflective nature of television, therefore, overrepresentation of women professionals may, aside from providing role models, create a false illusion that gender inequality has largely been overcome, despite the continued existence of a significant gender gap in employment and earning.

The "new man" trend of the 1990s did somewhat change the ways in which men perceived masculinity. New man masculinity, a crossover from Great Britain in the mid-1990s, juxtaposed men's physical muscularity with an emotional sensibility, allowing men, for the first time, to show a range of emotions in television roles. In the hope of reaching female audiences, media producers showed some men's roles in soap operas or situation comedies within nonstereotypical—that is, caregiving—masculine contexts. However, because such new man roles were largely targeted toward women, their representations seemed more reflective of ratings strategies rather than effecting or mirroring any actual changes in hegemonic masculinity.

As women had already experienced for decades, new man's emphasis on physical attractiveness placed increasing pressure on men to achieve physical perfection. It is telling of the social dominance of masculinity, however, that the increasingly unreachable standards of beauty associated with masculinity and femininity tended to affect the framing of men's roles differently than women's. Unlike masculinity, femininity has predominantly been measured by a woman's physical attractiveness, thinness, and youth. A man could be physically large or middle-aged, but still framed as sexually attractive to women if he was, for instance, financially successful. In most television shows, this was not an option for women. Even financially successful women, such as Joan Collins's business tycoon Alexis Colby in the television series Dynasty, were predominantly framed within contexts of physical perfection. Fortunately, television sitcoms like Roseanne and Golden Girls actively set out to challenge these double standards. Such groundbreaking shows, however, were few and like nontraditional men's roles, women of unconventional beauty tended to be treated as gimmicks; producers made their physical unconventionality central elements of shows' story lines—for example, to serve as comedic relief, rather than unquestioned, acceptable forms of femininity.

In fairness, despite all the criticism, since the 1950s gender roles in television shows have changed to reflect shifts in mainstream society. Women's roles have become more diverse, and men are more often portrayed as sensitive and caring. At the same time, it remains more common for women to be shown within domestic settings than for men, and for men to be portrayed as dominant, financially successful, charge-taking, and aggressive. In the odd instance that gender roles are reversed, it is often portrayed as something counternatural that, therefore, comes at a social cost. Even in a television show such as Desperate Housewives, which portrays women in a variety of nontraditional roles, a stay-at-home father is headed for an identity crisis, and a working mother risks alienating her children and husband. Such portrayals are not necessarily distorted and may actually mirror the realities many working women and men face within patriarchic organized societies. At the same time, however, these conventionally gendered portrayals run the risk of acting as a moral warning of the costs of a changing gender order.

GENDER STEREOTYPES

Gender is essentially a composite of stereotypes—beliefs, positive or negative, that people hold about a group and its members. Gender stereotypes are evident in many aspects of life, including personal traits, behaviors, occupations, hobbies, appearance, family functions, communication, sports activities, and preferences for most anything. Gender stereotypes shape people's behaviors, expectations, and roles; conversely, roles can become stereotypes. Research has found that gender stereotypes in Western society have remained fairly stable, even as roles have been changing. Women are increasingly present in the formal workforce; nevertheless, they are also consistently viewed as caretakers and hold a large proportion of service jobs and support positions. Regardless of their job position, women often take care of the social functions on the job. Men are seen as leaders and are often found in head positions. In the business world, masculine communication styles are often the standard. Many social differences, such as race and sexuality, influence and inform gender stereotypes. These gender stereotypes influence the choices people make about themselves and others. They are so ingrained in society, that to go against gender stereotypes can generate uneasiness, confusion, fear, and hostility. This entry describes the effects of stereotypes.

Cognition, Interaction, and Stereotypes

Stereotyping is a normal cognitive process. Humans deal with a high volume of information on a daily basis, and stereotyping is a cognitive tool for organizing information about people and thus more efficiently processing information. Stereotypes assist in social categorization as they help people maintain the consistency they tend to prefer in their lives. This consistency sometimes comes at the expense of accuracy: stereotypes can be exaggerated or false. Stereotypes help people adjust or plan their behavior to accommodate others and allow a person, when first meeting other people, to have ideas about who they are and how to treat and interact with them. Stereotypes affect what people notice, think about, and remember, as well as how they interpret other people and interact with them. In short, stereotypes facilitate smooth personal interactions.

As people communicate with others about the world around them and about their expectations for that world, they pass on messages about how others should think, feel, and act. They learn how others see them and learn how to see themselves. Although stereotyping can assist us in one's cognitive interaction with the world, stereotypes foster the loss of uniqueness. People become part of a larger group and are defined by their most salient group memberships. Gender stereotypes, numerous and pervasive, thus influence one's perceptions of others and ourselves, while muting individual differences in favor of gendered expectations and norms.

Stereotypes of Women and Men

The current stereotypes of women originated in the 19th-century Victorian era during the Industrial Revolution. At this time, the economy shifted from agriculture to factories; as this economic shift took hold, men left the home to work and the women stayed home to care for the household and children. This difference in roles is enough to create or enhance stereotypes: The disparate activities are often viewed as representing some internal aspect of a person or group of persons. Women are viewed as mothers, providing nurturance and support to others. As women are socialized to be caretakers, they learn that they need to be nice and to put others' needs before their own. The Judeo-Christian virtues of piety, purity, domesticity, and submissiveness also fostered the belief that women are most virtuous when vulnerable, dependent, and weak. Apparently in need of protection and guidance, women are stereotyped as childlike, suggesting that they are immature, incompetent, and in need of assistance. Stereotypes such as this encourage people to patronize women and to neglect their intelligence and competence. Women are also stereotyped as sex objects who pay significant attention to their physical appearance. Women who do not adhere to this stereotype may fall into another stereotyped role—that of a manly woman. This iron maiden demonstrates stereotypically male characteristics such as independence, ambition, toughness, competition, career mindedness, and directness. Other social categorizations combine with gender and create specific stereotypes of women. The butch lesbian connects with the iron maiden image of masculinity, and the femme lesbian takes on a more passive role and is concerned with her physical appearance despite the lesbian stereotype of being a bit stronger because of her supposed anti-male stance. Women of color in particular have been stereotyped in demeaning ways. Research on women in advertising supports this in findings that nonwhite women are typically portrayed as animals, less than human, and always lower in the image than males. These images depict women of color as being sexual objects lacking intelligence, being subservient to men, and requiring male control.

Boys are socialized to be in charge and assertive, if not outright aggressive. Men are stereotyped as being rational and strong. Men can be stereotyped in several roles, such as breadwinner, heroic fighters, and "sturdy oaks." As more women enter the workforce and some fathers stay home to care for the children and household, the stereotype of men as breadwinners may weaken. For now, however, the stereotype remains prevalent, and some people are still uncomfortable with men who do not have a job or an income, even if they provide for their families in other ways. Men in working-class families, often men of color, may be more prone to feel pressure from this stereotype as their wives also work outside the home to provide financially for their family. This may cause conflict in the family if the wife earns more money than her husband. The heroic fighter stereotype suggests that men are active, courageous, brave, strong, forceful, dominant, aggressive, and even violent. This stereotypical image suggests men cannot experience fear or doubt, and that to stay at home and care for family or be nurturing renders a man less than masculine, which can also be detrimental for the ego men of working-class families who must take on more responsibilities in the home while their wives are at work. This also weakens the stereotype and broadens the man's role. The sturdy oak suggests similar characteristics: A man must be tough and able to hold strong while facing whatever challenges come his way. As sturdy oaks, men will maintain control. The heroic and sturdy view of these stereotypes seems to hold especially true for black and Latino men, but less so for men of Asian ancestry. These views correspond with idealized body images in which Asian men are not viewed as being muscular or physically strong, though it is expected that black men have these characteristics. According to these stereotypes, men do not experience pain or problems and thus can remain independent of others' support and assistance. In none of these masculine stereotypes are there any conventionally feminine qualities. People routinely consider those men who exhibit some feminine qualities sissies and gay.

In the 1970s, Sandra Bem challenged the notion of a dichotomous gender system with distinctly masculine men and distinctly feminine women. Bem suggested instead that people are not necessarily primarily masculine or feminine. Masculinity and femininity may be distinct and simultaneous aspects of a single person, rather than poles of a continuum dividing women and men. Bem's argument allows the possibility that some people are androgynous, demonstrating both masculine and feminine characteristics. The Bem Sex Role Inventory, a 60-item measure, provides a scale through which a person may be classified as masculine, feminine, androgynous, or undifferentiated (low on both masculine and feminine qualities). The Bem Sex Role Inventory leveled a fundamental critique against stereotypical notions that women are essentially feminine or men essentially masculine.

Stereotypes and Socialization

When children are about 2 years old, they can distinguish men from women and boys from girls. Children as young as 3 years old have established a gender identity and can hold gender stereotypes. As children learn about men and women, they also form their own self-concepts and recognize how they fit into the world. Children understand their own gender, their roles, and stereotypes before they learn those of the other gender. They stereotype their own gender before they do that of the other gender. Boys know that blue, and not pink, is associated with them; girls, on the other hand, know that pink and purple are for them. By the preschool years, the stereotypes are fully developed, and most children hold rigid stereotypes about both genders. This rigidity decreases as children go through elementary school. In middle school, gender stereotypes can become rigid again. As people age, the stereotypes become more flexible. This flexibility increases as young adults learn more about their world and gain a critical understanding of the influence of stereotypes.

Most parents reinforce gender stereotypical behavior early on, as is evident in the toys parents choose for their children. Girls receive toys that focus on mothering behaviors, attractive appearance and grooming, and such domestic tasks as cooking and cleaning. Boys often receive toys that encourage aggressive play, construction, and destruction, such as trucks, balls, blocks, action figures, guns, and swords.

Toy companies that have tried to market gender-neutral toys have had little success. Adults with purchasing power influence the development, popularity, and marketing of toys, and their influence often affirms stereotypes at the expense of children's realities. For example, though inaccurate, the stereotype that boys are better at math is popular among parents and teachers. Such beliefs among people who strongly contribute to children's ideas about the world can influence what activities children pursue and how successful they are in their endeavors.

Social groups, institutions, and people as a whole are responsible for passing on gender stereotypes. A person learns by watching what a range of people do and will repeat what he or she sees reinforced across people and across situations. According to Albert Bandura's social learning theory, children learn gender stereotypes and stereotypical behavior from sources in addition to their parents. Children learn gender stereotypes from their teachers, peers, siblings, and the media. Media create, mold, and perpetuate stereotypes through portrayals of the genders that perpetuate stereotypes. Advertising has long relied heavily on gender stereotypes. Children who watch a lot of television tend to hold more rigid gender stereotypes. Throughout all children's programming, gender stereotypes are abundant, particularly in programs for younger ages.

Gender roles are culturally specific. Within the many U.S. cultures, there are different views of gender. These views are influenced by factors such as the region of the country, population density, racial makeup, primary industries, and socioeconomic status. The gender stereotypes seem to be more exaggerated in Southern, rural, and agriculturally based areas. Women and men in urban areas have more latitude with what roles are acceptable for them. The metrosexual male and career-oriented woman are expanding the gender roles.

Culture is also a factor beyond the borders of the United States. A large cross-cultural study looked at gender stereotypes in 30 countries in North America, South America, Europe, Asia, and Africa. College students in these countries responded to a list of 300 adjectives by indicating whom they thought the adjectives represented—men or women—and how positive or negative they considered the adjectives. The researchers found more similarities than differences in gender stereotypes. All countries found six adjectives to be associated with masculinity—adventurous, dominant, forceful, independent, masculine, and strong. All countries also agreed that three adjectives related to femininity—sentimental, superstitious, and submissive. In only a few instances were words associated with women in some countries and men in others.

Problems with Stereotypes

Although stereotyping facilitates cognition by helping us more efficiently process information, stereotypes also have negative consequences. At best, stereotypes can accurately represent a group, but they may also obscure nonstereotypical qualities that each person possesses. Regardless of one's gender identity, each person will likely have some qualities that deviate from their gender's stereotypes. For example, not all women like pink, and not all men watch football.

Though stereotypes may be completely inaccurate, they can powerfully influence people's behaviors, interactions, and perceptions of others and themselves. In one study, researchers asked men and women to memorize a list of items. The researchers told some participants that the list included items they would find at a hardware store; others heard that the list included items at a grocery store. Though the list was the same in all cases, women performed better in the memorization if researchers told them they were memorizing a grocery list, and men did better if they heard they memorizing a list of items from a hardware store. Gender stereotypes informed the participants' expectations for themselves and their ability to successfully memorize the list items.

Gender stereotypes constrain the opportunities and experiences to which women and men have access. This includes freely chosen behaviors. Some creative forms of expression, such as dancing, are stereotypically women's endeavors. If a boy wants to pursue dance lessons, he may have to counter negative reactions from his peers and family who deny him the opportunity because "dancing is for girls." Gender stereotypes also restrict, and for some promote, people's success when seeking employment, undergoing performance evaluations, or competing for scholarships. In the political arena, candidates with gender stereotypical strengths and agendas are more often successful than are those who violate gender expectations.

Another negative consequence of holding stereotypes is a concept known as stereotype threat, in which a person experiences anxiety that her or his behavior will invoke and confirm a negative stereotype of the person's group. Stereotype threat can influence gender, race, sexuality, and other social categories about which negative stereotypes prevail. This anxiety has harmful consequences for a person's performance. One study of stereotype threat and gender examined the stereotype that women perform poorly on math tests. Researchers reminded some participants of this negative stereotype; others did not hear the stereotype; both groups then took a math exam. The results showed that women did worse on the exam if researchers made their gender salient by reminding them of the negative gender stereotype.

Challenging Gender Stereotypes

Treatment based on gender stereotypes is often detrimental and reductive. For example, stereotypes that render women sex objects also render them vulnerable to sexual harassment in the workplace, school, and beyond. Recognizing the oppressive quality of, in particular, female stereotypes, feminists began to challenge gender stereotypes in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Some of the movements to encourage equality have been the "Take Our Daughters to Work" day, originally meant to encourage young females to explore their career options, and Title IX policies requiring no sexual discrimination for activities receiving federal funding, including athletics. Other sweeping changes have replaced gendered terms that had suggested males take lead positions with gender-neutral terms (e.g., "mailman" is now "mail carrier," and "chairman" is now "chair"), research has challenged the stereotype that it is primarily girls of color who become pregnant when teenagers, and the judicial system has called for both men and women to take responsibility in parenting. The increased visibility and acceptance of the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual, and queer (LGBTQ) community in popular culture and day-to-day life has challenged gender stereotypes, as well. "Butch" women, "sissy" boys, and androgynous individuals have further expanded the concepts of what a man and a woman can be in society. These and other efforts have successfully weakened stereotypes' capacity to impose restrictions on women and men. Women have felt the primary benefit of these efforts, though both they and their male counterparts continue to navigate restrictive gender stereotypes.

In their efforts to challenge the rigidity of gender stereotypes, some researchers look at schemas and their influence on gender stereotypes. A schema is a cognitive construct that organizes information and influences our perceptions. Schemas begin developing early on, and their contents are influenced by individual biographies and social location. The concept of schemas (a) helps explain the existence of stereotypes and (b) suggests a strategy for altering them. According to Bem's gender schema theory, because gender and gender stereotypes are socially constructed and maintained, they may also be socially dismantled or, at least, diminished.

According to gender schema theory, parents and others can reduce gender stereotypes in their interactions with young children. When parents discuss boys, girls, women, and men, they can emphasize the biological aspects of being a male or female rather than the social roles or stereotypes associated with each gender. Bandura's social learning theory offers another suggestion. Children learn from watching those around them, particularly their parents. Thus, parents can undermine stereotypes by eliminating gender stereotypical behavior and roles in the family: fathers can, for example, cook dinner, and mothers can perform home repairs. Parents can also eliminate gender stereotypical choices for their children by offering a range of toys, activities, and clothing. Parents can also try to create a new schema that revolves around individual differences, teaching children to recognize people's distinctive personalities and not to approach them as composites of a few salient group memberships like gender.

Research examining children raised in gender-neutral homes has identifies some factors related to producing nonsexist children. Parents who focus on the biology of being male and female, question traditional gender stereotypes, and feature mothers who work outside of the home are more likely to raise less gender-restricted children. Same-gender siblings and peers with flexible gender identities expose children to gender variation and thus promote an openness about gender.

Typically, even children raised in gender-neutral homes go through the traditional stereotyped stages of development and gender stereotyping. Even if parents raise their children in line with the suggestions put forth by Bem, children still navigating stereotyping messages from the media and their peers, rendering change a daunting, if admirable, goal.

GENDER TRANSGRESSION

Gender transgression, as discussed in this entry, is a broad term that denotes diverse phenomena when individuals do not fit the sex/gender categories attributed to them at their birth but instead act social roles not typically associated with their natal sex, diverging thus from the normative gender role. Transgender does not imply any specific form of sexual orientation because gender-variant individuals may identify as heterosexual, bisexual, queer, homosexual, asexual, or pansexual. They may have characteristics that are usually associated with a particular gender, or identify as "third gender," "intergender," "bigender," or several other places on the traditional gender continuum. Therefore, transgender identity can be said to encompass several overlapping subcategories: transsexual, transvestite, cross-dresser, genderqueer, drag kings and queens, as well as androgynous people.

In the Western cultural tradition, gender transgression has long been stigmatized, with individuals often persecuted and forced into the existence on the margins of society. Western interest in gender transgression came with the development of sexology, an interdisciplinary science that focuses on diverse aspects of human sexuality. Additionally, anthropology has provided numerous examples of non-Western gender classifications and divergent sexualities, demonstrating the cross-cultural variations in sexual and gender patterns and thus contributing to the growing challenge of Western essentialist ideology of gender dimorphism.

Gender-Variant People

Before the 19th century, preceding the work of Charles Darwin, Sigmund Freud, Karl Marx, and Émile Durkheim, it was widely believed that there were only two sexes. It was "natural" to belong to one or the other, no matter what the individual desired. The problem of "anomalous" individuals became prominent at the time of Darwin and Freud, but it seems it did not significantly alter their understanding of what was "natural" and "normal" in human sexual behavior. However, the 19th-century sexologists and sexual activists and reformers were preoccupied with this problem, attempting to introduce new terminology and hence classify the gender-variant people. Concepts such as Uranians, homosexuals, psychic hermaphrodites, or the intermediate sex were coined, aiming to identify persons whose minds, bodies, or behavior seemed to challenge sexual dimorphism. In 1923, Magnus Hirschfeld coined the term transsexual, whereas a few years before that, in 1917, the first genital reassignment surgery helped Dr. Alan Hart achieve his female-to-male transformation. Hart's case was published in 1920, in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Disorders by Dr. Joshua Gilbert, who assisted Hart with his transition and who kept the identity of his patient a secret.

The early-20th-century researchers believed that gender and sexual behavior were the result of a sexually dimorphic brain. The brain itself was believed to have a sex, which was most often in accordance with chromosomal and genital sex; however, just as there were genital or chromosomal intersex conditions, there were cases of the brain intersex morphology too, causing gender identity that was at odds with either chromosomal or somatic sex. Hirschfeld's concept of sexual intermediates, or intersex, included, for example, the whole spectrum of what is today called queer expression—gay, lesbian, transgender, and transsexual. His Institute for Sexology in Berlin, established in 1919, provided endocrinological and surgical services to transgender individuals, one of them being Lili Elbe, a case well-known in the literature on gender transgression as well as on the history of sexology. After the Nazis closed the institute in 1933, there were no cases of gender transgression in Europe accompanied by surgery until the case of Christine Jorgensen in Denmark in 1952. Surgical sex change, however, was not a choice of all gender transgressors. For example, Virginia Prince—the Southern Californian advocate for heterosexual male transvestites and the author of 1960s self-help books How to Be a Woman Though Male and The Transvestite and His Wife—argued for change of gender through nonsurgical means. She was the first person to use the term transgender.

Much of the early history of struggle of gender-variant people for social visibility and acknowledgment was intertwined with the history of homosexual emancipation movement because the conceptions of homosexuality at the time linked same-sex erotic desire and gender variance. Since the late 19th century, gender-variant people have advocated social and legal reforms that would ameliorate discrimination and oppression they suffered. Transgender advocacy gained momentum in the 1950s, with Jorgensen becoming an international celebrity, bringing transgender issues to widespread attention. By the later 1960s, some fractions of transgender activism were linked to gay liberation. However, during the 1970s, most gay, lesbian, and feminist activists distanced themselves from transgender issues. Transsexuals in particular came to be seen as reactionary in their cultural politics.

Transsexual Empire, by feminist author Janice G. Raymond, was built on anti-transsexual discourses that had already been developing for the whole decade on the grassroots level. In 1980, the American Psychiatric Association officially classified transgender phenomena as psychopathology—gender identity disorder. The terms gender dysphoria and gender identity disorder are still used in psychiatric and medical community to explain these tendencies as a psychological condition. The 1980s were also marked by the appearance of the first organized female-to-male (FTM) gender community; in 1986, a San Francisco–based FTM activist founded the FTM support group that became later FTM International and started publishing the FTM Newsletter. The public health crisis triggered by the AIDS epidemics in these years brought about a new era in transgender politics, broadening the focus toward the issues of poverty and racism and not only those of the politics of sexual identity. Leslie Feinberg, a Marxist, published the highly influential pamphlet, Transgender Liberation: A Movement Whose Time Has Come in 1992. Since then, transgender has been an umbrella term used to represent a political alliance between all gender-variant people whose social gender differs from the one assigned at birth and who suffer political oppression for that.

Non-Western Cultures

Some non-Western cultures have traditionally recognized more than two genders, American Indian tribes with their woman-living-man and man-living-woman gender identities (more popularly known as "two-spirit" or "berdache") being one of the best-known examples. Two-spirit people in the cultures of Native North America were often misinterpreted as biologically abnormal hermaphrodites or "degenerates" and, later, as deviant homosexuals, both of which categories run counter to the cultural phenomenology of two-spirit individuals in these cultures. Two-spirit people were generally changing genders, not sexes, and cultural ontology was legitimized by social practices. These alternative gender roles had many tribal forms, with different beliefs and practices. Other famous examples of gender transgression have been hijras, Indian eunuchs, a traditional gender role in Indian culture; kwolu-aatmwol of Papua New Guinea whom Westerners would anatomically classify as hermaphrodites because they embody a rare form of hermaphroditism known only in few places in the world;

Balkan "sworn virgins," biological women who under the condition of lifelong celibacy acquire the social status of "female honorary men" among transhumance pastoralists of Northern Albania and neighboring Montenegro; and "female husbands" among the Nuer of East Africa, women who acquire male status and can marry heterosexual women.

Scholars argue that these, as well as some other examples of multigender systems in certain non-Western cultures, testify that sexual dimorphism and the resulting dual-gender classification system seem not to be inevitable universal structures and that transgenderism itself has not been an invention of modern medical technology.

Conclusion

Today, the term transgender does not refer only to the cases of individuals who opt for gender change without surgical means—as argued for by Virginia Prince—but also transsexuals (either female-to-male or male-to-female), transvestites, drag queens and kings, effeminate gay men, intersex individuals, asexual individuals, and members of non-Western indigenous cultures who claim such identities.

Despite all the complexities and controversies around the issues of gender transgression, a great deal of intellectual, cultural, and political work has been done under the transgender rubric since the early 1990s. There has been a heightened level of interest in transgender issues in the media, especially after the appearance of the feature film Boys Don't Cry (2000), which called attention to the serious problem of anti-transgender violence. Transgender studies have also acquired the status of a recent area of academic inquiry, growing out of the nexus of the history of sexuality, feminism, and queer theory.

GENDER WAGE GAP

One of the most important economic trends in the 20th century was the dramatic increase in the number of women entering the paid labor force. As more women have entered the labor force, the difference between the average wages of men and those of women has decreased. However, a gender wage gap still exists, where male workers earn significantly more money then female workers do. This entry will describe the size of the current gender wage gap and the major explanations for its existence. Special attention will be paid to explaining three different types of forces that affect the wage gap: occupational segregation, vertical segregation, and within-job discrimination.

The Size of the Gender Wage Gap

According to the 2005 U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, female workers earn an average of 80 percent of men's earnings. This wage gap has declined from the 1950s when women only earned about $.60 per male dollar. Many factors have contributed to the declining wage gap. Part of the decrease can be attributed to the increase in women's wage's that occurred as women increased their human capital and job-related skills. In addition, more women now have careers that are uninterrupted by long absences for childrearing, which tend to reduce wages.

Another explanation for the decrease in the wage gap is that although women's wages have been increasing, many men found their wages falling in the 1970s and 1980s. This decline in male wages (especially for white men) is a result of the economic restructuring that began in the 1970s because of deindustrialization (a decrease in manufacturing) and the corresponding shift toward a service-based economy. The loss of manufacturing jobs that occurred with deindustrialization appears to have depressed the wages of male workers more than that of female workers, partly because more male workers were employed in manufacturing jobs.

Although wages have been increasing for some women and decreasing for some men, not all men and women have been affected similarly. Both men's and women's wages have become increasingly polarized in recent years, where the difference between the wages of those at the top and those at the bottom is becoming greater. This divide occurs largely along educational lines for both men and women, as workers with a college education have continued to experience rising wages. In addition, what specific job a worker holds may be important because the gender wage gap appears to vary in size by employment sector, occupation, and job title.

The size and shape of the gender wage gap is also influenced by race and ethnicity. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, white and Asian women earn 80 percent of what white and Asian men earn. This differs from Hispanic women who currently earn 87 percent of Hispanic males' earnings and black women who earn 89 percent of black males' earnings. The smaller wage gap between men and women who are Hispanic or black can be largely attributed to the fact that Hispanic and black men tend to earn less money than do white or Asian men.

Horizontal or Occupational Segregation

Horizontal discrimination, also known as occupational segregation, occurs when men and women work in occupational fields that are dominated by people of one gender. For example, among professional jobs, accountants, architects, and engineers are mostly men, and teachers, nurses, and social workers are mostly women. Although occupational segregation has declined in the past few decades, most workers remain in sex-segregated jobs. Occupational discrimination fuels the gender wage gap because men's occupations tend to pay better and have greater advancement opportunities.

Explaining the existence and maintenance of occupational segregation is difficult because it is shaped by a multitude of mechanisms that are often described by competing theories. Some of these mechanisms concern " supply-side" factors that have to do with the qualifications and abilities of individuals, gender-role socialization, workers' values, the opportunity structure, and the size of the labor supply. Others involve "demand" factors such as employers' preferences, the demand for workers, economic pressures, discrimination, and personnel practices, which may lead to gender differentiated treatment in the labor market.

Most scholars acknowledge that a certain amount of self-selection plays a role in sorting men and women into different occupations, as women do appear to have different preferences for jobs than men. Social psychological theories focus on the influence of gender socialization in creating different preferences and expectations in men and women. Other theories have posited that women's family responsibilities influence their choice of occupation; however, the extent to which this is true is greatly contested. In general, the degree to which women are freely choosing to enter into specific occupations or how much of this may be the result of structural constraints is a major concern to many sociologists.

Another important question for scholars studying horizontal segregation is why workers in female-dominated occupations are lower paid than are those in male-dominated fields. Paula England and other feminist researchers have argued that in U.S. society, the cultural valuation process is gendered and because women are generally devalued so are the jobs and skills that are associated with them. This cultural devaluation of women's work is one explanation for the lower wages in female-dominated fields. The belief that women's jobs are paid below their "real" worth is behind the movement for comparable worth.

Vertical or Hierarchical Segregation

Although horizontal segregation undoubtedly plays a large role in creating the gender wage gap, it cannot by itself account for the entirety. A second process that also fuels the gender wage gap is vertical segregation. Vertical segregation, also known as hierarchical segregation or the "authority gap," refers to the fact that men are much more likely than women to be in positions of authority. A number of researchers have found a significant pro-male bias in promotion decisions that is not attributable to differences in time on the job, education, or nonwork responsibilities.

Some people have argued that the lack of women in upper positions is the result of a cohort effect, where the differences in the levels of skills and experience between men and women in previous generations can explain the gap. Logically, if a cohort effect were the cause of vertical discrimination, then it would naturally decrease as older women leave the workforce and younger women (who are more similar to their male coworkers) become predominant. Although researchers acknowledge that a portion of the difference in authority may be caused by cohort changes, most research has found that vertical discrimination exists at a much greater level than it would if based solely on a cohort effect.

Several other factors are believed to influence vertical gender discrimination. Scholars have argued that a "glass ceiling" prevents or reduces the promotions of women beyond a certain point, especially in fields where they are the statistical minority. Theories of the glass ceiling argue that there are gender-based barriers to higher-status positions that result in men having greater access to these positions. The lack of female CEOs of major companies can be viewed as an example of the effect of the glass ceiling. The metaphor of the glass ceiling has been conceptualized in various ways. Some researchers see it as a literal barrier beyond which women do not advance, but other researchers see it as women encountering progressively greater barriers as they move up the hierarchy or as a series of fairly constant barriers that have a cumulative effect.

One factor that is believed to contribute to vertical discrimination and the glass ceiling effect in particular, is the lack of informal mentoring of female workers. Research has found that having a mentor is important to one's chances of reaching the highest positions, yet the majority of successful male workers are reluctant to mentor women. This may be because of worry about gossiping or sexual harassment charges, or it also could be because women are often stereotyped as being weak and therefore not good candidates for top positions. In addition, a U.S. Department of Labor study conducted in the 1990s found that career-enhancing projects, educational opportunities, and credential building assignments were less accessible to women, which may be related to the informal mentoring system. Two other factors that may also reinforce vertical discrimination are a lack of compliance with equal employment opportunity rules at higher levels in corporations and work environments that are hostile or where women encounter sexual harassment.

In contrast to theories of the glass ceiling, Christine Williams found evidence of a "glass escalator" effect, where men in female-dominated occupations benefit from hidden structural advantages that increase their career opportunities. Although men who enter female-dominated fields may face discrimination from outside forces, in their workplaces they are likely to be positively evaluated and to be rapidly promoted to positions of greater authority. This phenomenon has been much less studied than the concept of the glass ceiling and more research needs to be done to see if this phenomenon differs across industry.

Within-Job Segregation

Within-job discrimination occurs when men are paid more than are women who hold the same job and have comparable levels of skill and experience. Many people who are unfamiliar with the literature assume that this type of discrimination is what is responsible for the wage gap. In contrast to this belief, most academic research has found little to no effects of within-job discrimination after controlling for horizontal and vertical segregation, as well as personal characteristics.

Most scholars agree that although within-job discrimination was a major contributor to the gender wage gap at one point, it is no longer considered to play a significant role. However, just as the gender wage gap can vary by occupation, job title, and company, some evidence indicates that within-job discrimination might be contributing to the gender wage gap in particular occupations or companies.

General Union of Palestinian Women

The General Union of Palestinian Women (GUPW) is an umbrella organization for Palestinian women's groups such as the Women's Center for Legal Aid and Counseling and the Palestinian Working Women's Society. Palestinian women across the Middle East, Europe, and North America participate in local chapters, and other Palestinian organizations have women representatives in the GUPW. GUPW encourages women to increase their participation in social, economic, and political life. It also maintains a number of humanitarian projects providing health and welfare services to needy Palestinian families. GUPW's headquarters are located in Ramallah, West Bank, and Gaza City, Gaza, in Israel/Palestine.

GUPW has five main goals: First, mobilize Palestinian women for political action on behalf of the Palestinian people, particularly to fight against the Israeli occupation. Second, raise Palestinian women's political awareness and participation within Palestinian politics and international political arenas. Third, promote gender equality within Palestinian legal and political processes. Fourth, increase Palestinian women's participation in the economy. Fifth, provide literacy, cultural, and health programs that benefit Palestinian women.

Women's groups have played important roles in Palestinian politics since the formation of the Palestinian Women's Union in 1921. Many of these organizations focused on national liberation as linked to gender equality, and many were affiliated with Palestinian political parties. GUPW formed as a popular organization or a mobilizing section of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1965. However, GUPW took issue with sexist tendencies within the PLO and later became an organizing mechanism for Palestinian women from most Palestinian political parties. From 1967 to 1993, many of the political activities of the chapters operated in secret while the organization continued its social and economic programs for women with aid from the international community including the United Nations. Following the Oslo Peace Accords, GUPW busily sought to organize chapters, elect women to serve in the Palestinian Authority, write gender equality into the Palestinian legal system, and begin new social programs. The political turmoil at the start of the 21st century led GUPW to postpone many of its activities. However, in 2005 and 2006, the union was successful in promoting and training women candidates in a variety of Palestinian elections.

Because of the turbulent status of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and GUPW's affiliation with Palestinian politics, this organization has an ever-changing and complicated system of organization. An executive committee leads it, though most of the activities are undertaken by local chapters.

GUPW organizes political, cultural, and economic programs for Palestinian women. It runs vocational training centers for women as well as centers that provide health care for children while providing their mothers with child care. GUPW chapters run seminars on health, political rights, and Palestinian culture. GUPW continues to take part in political activities such as boycotts and protests aimed at increasing gender equality and promoting Palestinian and, to a lesser extent, pan-Arab political interests.

GENETIC PRENATAL TESTING

Advances in genetic prenatal testing since the 1970s have given parents the option of learning their unborn baby's gender, as well as other characteristics, early in the pregnancy. This technology is of concern because it gives the parents the option of aborting a fetus that has unwanted characteristics. Although aborting a fetus of an unwanted sex is widely condemned, choosing to abort for other reasons is still contested. This entry will start by describing genetic prenatal testing and sex selection. Second, the implications of prenatal testing for selection based on race and sexual orientation will be discussed. Third, the emerging arguments of the disability rights community will be explained. And fourth, a variety of other concerns regarding genetic prenatal testing will be covered.

The term genetic prenatal testing includes a variety of genetic tests that look at chromosomes, genes, or proteins and are usually done to diagnose a range of genetic disorders. The most common prenatal test is amniocentesis. In this procedure, the health care provider uses ultrasound as a guide and inserts a thin needle through the mother's abdomen and uterus. A small amount of amniotic fluid (the fluid that surrounds the baby) is removed and tested. Amniocentesis can detect chromosomal disorders such as Down syndrome, structural defects such as spina bifida (open spine, where the vertebrae fail to close), and many rare, inherited metabolic disorders. The procedure is usually done between 15 and 20 weeks of pregnancy. Many parents and medical professionals are concerned with the small increase in the risk of unintentional miscarriage (approximately 1 in 200) that is associated with amniocentesis.

Ever since the technology became available to allow for prenatal sex testing, scholars have been worried that this procedure would be followed by sex-selective abortions (where the fetus is aborted if it is not the parent's desired sex). This is especially a concern in those countries that show a strong preference for sons over daughters, such as China, Korea, and Taiwan. Although there already are concerns in some countries about infant femicide (the killing of female babies), the worry is that the use of sex-selective abortions would lead to even more unequal sex ratios. In developed countries, such as the United States, son-preference is weaker and the idea of family balancing (having one boy and one girl) is usually behind parental gender preference.

Genetic testing and prenatal sex selection are also used by parents who conceive through the use of what is often called "assisted" reproduction. This includes an assortment of reproductive technologies, including in vitro fertilization where the egg and sperm are combined in a Petri dish and selected embryos are then transferred to the mother's uterus (or in the case of surrogacy, the uterus of another woman). Although some parents may be unwilling to abort a fetus that is already growing in a mother's uterus because of its sex, more parents are willing to engage in prenatal sex-selection when the sex of the fetus can be selected before the woman is ever actually "pregnant."

Concerns about the use of genetic prenatal testing, whether in concert with either abortion or reproductive technologies that allows potential parents to "choose" their offspring, are not limited only to the topic of gender. As more knowledge about genetic makeup is discovered, worries that parents may choose not to have offspring who are either darker in skin color (racial discrimination) or who carry the so-called gay gene have increased. The arguments surrounding whether this type of prenatal genetic selection is morally acceptable become murky because, although some parents may make decisions based on prejudice, other parents claim to have the well-being of their children in mind. These latter parents claim to be basing their preferences on their understanding (but not their endorsement) that lighter-skinned or heterosexual children may be better off because of the current levels of racism and homophobia.

Similar arguments have arisen concerning the morality of prenatal discrimination (either through abortion or nonselection) based on disability and disease. Although most people still consider sex-selective abortion to be wrong, whether parents should be allowed to abort fetuses that are thought to have disabilities or genetic diseases is less clear. In recent years, many people from the disability rights community have argued against the assumptions implicit in prenatal testing and subsequent abortion. Genetic prenatal testing, especially when combined with the intention to abort fetuses that may be disabled or carrying a genetic disease, assumes that the presence of impairment makes the birth of a fetus automatically unwelcome. In addition, it assumes that the impaired child and its family will have a lower quality of life, yet fails to address the societal constraints that may contribute to these stresses (such as inadequate services and support, and continuing discrimination). Disability rights activists have argued that the practice of recommending abortion when a fetus is thought to be impaired threatens the right to life of disabled people.

In contrast, parental choice groups have argued that a liberal interpretation of reproductive rights can be taken to include not only the number or timing of children, but also their sex and other characteristics. Feminists have grappled with the tension between a commitment to parental choice (through "a woman's right to choose") and the concerns about the societal values implicit in the practice of testing for and aborting impaired or undesirable fetuses.

Finally, a range of additional concerns have been raised about the practice of genetic prenatal testing. Some scholars are concerned because they see genetic testing as another aspect of the increasing medicalization of childbirth or the rise of fetal rights. Others worry because, like so many other types of technology, access to prenatal genetic testing is not available for all women. In many cases, those women who may have the fewest resources to assist in raising a child with a disability or genetic disease are those with no access to the testing. Furthermore, several scholars have begun to explore how the option of prenatal genetic testing is presented to prospective parents and whether women are making informed decisions about whether to have the testing done.

GENOCIDE

During the 20th century, most state violence was directed toward the state's own citizens. One contributing factor to this unnerving statistic is genocide, the systematic killing by the state of a community or social group. The term genocide was coined during World War II, but it is an ancient crime. Sadly, though, 20th-century genocides witnessed an increased capacity for state killing, and for the first time, included women as both perpetrators and victims.

The legal definition of genocide is contained in the 1948 United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, ratified in December 1948. Article 2 of the convention makes genocide an international crime to attempt to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group by killing members of the group, causing the group members serious bodily or mental harm, deliberately inflicting conditions meant to bring about the group's physical destruction or preventing births, or forcibly transferring children from the group to another group.

Genocide is prohibited during times of war or peace. Other articles of the convention deal with the conditions under which the international community must intervene to protect lives. Thus, unlike many other international laws, when genocide is occurring, the international system of states, through the United Nations, has a duty to act. This entry describes the relationship of gender, women, and genocide.

The Study of Gender and Genocide

At the end of World War II, genocide studies slowly evolved into an academic discipline. By the 1980s, centers for the study of genocide were located in universities around the world. The research is propelled by the need to understand past genocides and, consequently, to record survivor's testimonies and to preserve archive materials, but also to prevent future genocides and to intervene to stop genocides once started.

The study of gender and genocide dates to the 1980s. Feminist genocide scholars, particularly Holocaust scholars, have shown that how we teach and come to understand genocides are based largely on male survivors' accounts and written by male scholars. Feminist scholars point out that male's testimonies exclude women's understandings of issues such as rape, survival strategies, or pregnancy. And missing from scholarly accounts are women's testimonials, diaries, and other forms of written and oral testimony. Thus, feminist genocide scholars seek to show how and why women's experiences of genocide differ from those of men and in so doing broaden understanding of the design and prosecution of genocides, and the conditions of survival and death.

Women and Genocide

In the 20th century, women's roles in genocide changed from nonparticipation and protection from murder, to perpetrators and victims. Before the 20th century, women rarely participated in the planning or execution of genocides, partly because women were barred from military service. But women's reproductive role, the view that they were both weak and dependent, was the basis for their protection from mass murder in war and in peace. However, women historically were never spared forms of sexual assault although systematic rape of women during genocide was unique to the last century.

Women as Perpetrators in the 20th-Century Genocides

Women participated in the planning of genocides, and were responsible, directly and indirectly, for the murders of men, women, and children. In both the Cambodian genocide (1974–1979), where 1.7 million people were murdered, and the Rwandan genocide (1994), where 800,000 people perished, women assisted with the planning. Three wives of Cambodia's Khmer Rouge leadership contributed to plans to commit mass murder. Similarly, in Rwanda, the wife of the president and one female cabinet minister were integral members of a small, powerful group of political elites that plotted the genocide. Thus, women ordered that women and girls not be spared.

Women also participated as perpetrators in three genocides: the Holocaust (1939–1945), where six million Jews and 260,000 Romas and thousands of others perished; the Cambodian genocide; and the Rwandan genocide. During the Holocaust, at least 3,000 women acted as guards in concentration camps and were known for their viciousness: They set and administered punishments, including beatings sometimes to the death. German women also participated indirectly: many worked at the concentration camps, and others benefited from camp labor to clean their homes or tend their gardens. In Cambodia, women were involved in every aspect of the forced deportations including killings, with pickaxes, of even young girls. And in Rwanda, women from all walks of life participated in the killings, turning in women who sought shelter or leading women and children to their certain death.

Women as Victims in 20th-Century Genocides

Women like men were victims because of their membership in a racial, ethnic, or national group targeted for extermination. Yet, although all victims suffered the same ultimate fate, the path women took to their deaths was shaped partly by gender. Therefore, women's experiences before, during, and post-genocide differ from that of men.

Gender roles partly determined how men and women reacted to violence that preceded the genocides. For example, before the Armenian genocide (1915–1923), where 1.5 million were murdered, the Armenian government did not expect women to be killed. When the genocide started in 1915, men were killed first: They were rounded up, forced into military service and murdered, or summarily executed. The massacres of Armenians in the late 19th century (1894–1896) had spared women and children, so the targeting of women after the men were killed was unexpected in this genocide. Women, left behind in rural areas, without military defenses, were forcibly deported to the desert. Many died en route from abuse, starvation, disease, and sorrow, and others were mercilessly raped, kidnapped into forced marriage, tattooed from head to toe, or murdered. In Nazi German–occupied France, the French, too, did not anticipate that women would be targets. Thus, men were often forewarned when roundups were about to occur, so women and children, who stayed at home, outnumbered men in some of the mass arrests and deportations to the concentration camps.

The unfathomable horrors of life and death during genocide, preserved in survivor's testimonials as well as record-keeping by the states involved and eyewitness accounts, also attest to gender differences. Women's caretaking of their children is a singular difference between men and women during genocide. Women and children were kept together, and in Nazi Germany, this was their death warrant for, with few exceptions, women and children were murdered together upon arrival at extermination camps. Moreover, during times when camps were emptied and children scheduled to be murdered, women had to choose between saving their own lives, or going to their deaths with their children; a situation men did not have to face. In genocides that included forced marches, women had to care for, protect, and often bury their children.

Pregnancy was also cause for differential treatment. In Nazi German concentration camps, pregnancy was punishable by death. If pregnant women escaped death, newborn children were often immediately murdered if they could not be smuggled out of the camp. Life in the camps also demonstrates different coping skills between women and men: women tended to decorate their barracks with photographs, curtains, and the like; women tried to make their dresses more attractive, which had less to do with vanity, and more to do with the selection process for death at roll calls; women who looked tired, infirmed, or frail would be selected for extermination. And women worked together, to provide surrogate families, to care for each other, and to keep themselves and their barracks clean to minimize the spread of despair and disease.

Sexual Assault in Genocide

The targeting of women and children is unique to 20th-century genocides, but sexual violence toward women during genocide is not. In all genocides, women have been forced into prostitution, sexually assaulted, and raped. However, 20th-century genocides elevated rape, sexual assault, and sexual terrorism from widespread occurrences to a genocidal act; in other words, systematic rape became integral in the planning and execution of some but not all genocides. One example of the use of systematic rape as a tool of genocide is the Rwandan genocide.

In Rwanda, the denigration of Tutsi women created a climate that equated their rape and murder with destruction of the Tutsi people more generally. Women were characterized as immoral, oversexualized, and arrogant. During the genocide, rape reached the level of a genocidal act because of the numbers of women raped and the multiple uses of the rapes. Estimates are that more than 250,000 women were sexually assaulted. Women were kidnapped and used as sexual slaves, repeatedly raped and gang-raped, and in many cases women were enslaved when taken as "wives." In many documented cases, rapes were only one part of an act that included genital and body mutilation, and sexual torture. In other cases, raped women who escaped immediate death were left instead to live with the shame that rape would bring. Other women were raped by men who knew they carried the HIV/AIDS virus, deliberately condemning women to slow deaths. Finally, raped women were used as a form of "reward" for soldiers and others involved in the killings.

Conclusion

Scholars of gender and genocide studies illuminate how 20th-century genocides included women as both victims and perpetrators of genocide. Moreover, analysis highlights how rape and sexual assault, traditional features of genocide, also changed from sporadic to systematic. Women were raped, mutilated, tortured, assaulted, and murdered. Understanding why genocides occur and the specific differences between how men and women experienced genocide fuels research. And because the 21st century opened with women again the victims of murder, kidnapping, and rape in the Darfur genocide, genocide prevention remains a goal for survivors and researchers alike.

GI Joe

GI Joe is the brand name of a line of dolls meant for boys, which, with the exception of one 4-year period (1978–1982), has been produced and marketed in various manifestations continuously since its creation in 1964 by the toy company Hasbro. This entry will provide a summary overview of GI Joe's history and its connection to successive popular concepts of masculine idealism.

During its more than four decades of existence, GI Joe has undergone many revisions mirroring and reinforcing contemporary changes in conceptions of masculine idealism. GI Joe was first marketed as a lifelike military "action figure." The use of the term doll, suggestive of toys for girls, was willfully and consciously avoided by Hasbro (although the doll was 12 inches tall, approximately the same size as Mattel's Barbie doll for girls). GI Joe was at first a great commercial success. Sales declined, however, as the Vietnam War grew unpopular. In response, Hasbro toned down GI Joe's militaristic message. In 1969, "GI Joe: America's Fighting Man" became "GI Joe Adventure Teams." This new bearded GI Joe was presented as an adventurer, rather than a combat soldier. During the 1970s, various other attempts were made to keep GI Joe up to date with popular culture treatments of confident manhood. Sales declined nonetheless, and GI Joe was discontinued in 1978. In 1982, however, the toy line "GI Joe: A Real American Hero" was launched. These GI Joe figures were relatively small (3.75 inches tall) and were designed to rival the then popular Stars Wars action figure toys. This new version of GI Joe was science fiction themed, and somewhat outlandish in comparison with the original. A comic book and a television cartoon show promoted this version, which nonetheless gave way to a reintroduction of the 12-inch version in the mid-1990s. Some of these later GI Joes have been designed to resemble historical (and archetypically masculine) figures such as Dwight D. Eisenhower and Buzz Aldrin.

Although GI Joe's body has been presented primarily as an instrument necessary for the accomplishment of the mission at hand, successive versions of GI Joe have been progressively more muscular. The short-lived "GI Joe Extreme" version in particular is infamous for its unrealistically massive physique. In contrast, GI Joes of all versions have only slight bumps at the crotch to indicate the existence of genitalia.

Overall, women have been poorly integrated into GI Joe's fictitious world. In 1967, a female GI Nurse was introduced and then quickly discontinued for lack of sales. In the mid-nineties, a GI Jane set of action figures was produced, also for a short time.

Gilman, Charlotte Perkins (1860–1935)

Charlotte Perkins Gilman, writer, artist, lecturer, and social reformer, was a figurehead of the social reform movement at the beginning of the 20th century and the well-known writer of important social tracts. She is today best known for her short story, "The Yellow Wallpaper" (1890), a vicious account of the gender politics in marriage, and the novel Herland (1915), which is concerned with a utopian isolated society made up of Aryan women who reproduce via parthenogenesis (asexual reproduction).

Gilman was born Charlotte Anna Perkins in Connecticut, the daughter of Mary Perkins (née Fitch Westcott) and Frederic Beecher Perkins (nephew of Harriet Beecher Stowe). Having studied at the Rhode Island School of Design, Gilman supported herself as a greeting-card artist. Despite having strong anti-marriage views, she married the artist Charles Walter Stetson in 1884 and gave birth to her only child, Katharine Beecher Stetson. Separating from her husband in 1888 (divorced in 1894), she moved with her daughter to California. She was active in the social reform movement and lectured on this across the United States and the United Kingdom. During the 1890s, she had an intimate relationship with Adeline Knapp, a newspaper reporter who shared her interests in social reform and the Nationalist Club. She married her first cousin, George Houghton Gilman, in 1900, with whom she lived happily until his death in 1924. Diagnosed with inoperable cancer, she committed suicide in 1935.

Gilman's first book, In This Our World, was published in 1893. In 1898, she published the better-known Women and Economics. This was followed by numerous works, including Concerning Children (1900), The Home, Its Work and Influence (1903), Humanness (1913), Social Ethics: Sociology and the Future of Society (1914), The Dress of Women (1915), and His Religion and Hers (1922). From the early 1890s on, Gilman was known for her lectures and articles, some of which were published in her journal, The Forerunner (1909–1916). She published 8 novels, more than 170 short stories, 100 poems, and 200 nonfiction pieces. Interest in her work, however, waned in the early 20th century. She admitted in her autobiography that people were perhaps no longer interested in her work because she firmly believed in the strength of religion as a way to improve society. Interest in Gilman did not reemerge until the 1970s, when the rise of women's writing courses led to the rediscovery of her corpus and particularly her fiction.

Glass Ceiling

The glass ceiling is a conceptual term that describes a lack of women in upper-level positions in various organizations. The Federal Glass Ceiling Commission (1991–1996) stated that the glass ceiling refers to artificial barriers to the advancement of women and minorities. The term glass ceiling is used because women can see the jobs that are above those they have, but cannot break through the "glass" to gain those positions. This unbreakable barrier keeps women and minorities from moving up the job ladder regardless of education, experience, or ability. The effects of a metaphorical glass ceiling are to relegate women to the lower rungs of the job ladder, compared with white heterosexual men. This entry discusses the effects of the glass ceiling.

The term glass ceiling has often been credited to Carol Hymowitz and Timothy Scelhardt in the March 24, 1986, issue of the Wall Street Journal. But research demonstrates that the term was used in many prior works, including that of Gay Bryant's March 1984 article in Adweek. Therefore, where this concept was derived is still under considerable debate.

The glass ceiling has been used in many works to describe artificial barriers that women and minorities face, but the actual criteria of what distinguished the glass ceiling from other forms of labor market discrimination was not put forth until D. A. Cotter and colleagues identified four particular requirements that are necessary to claim that a glass ceiling is in effect. The first criterion is that the gender difference cannot be explained by any other job-relevant characteristics of an individual. This means that a man having more training than a woman cannot explain the glass ceiling. Men and women must be equal in job-relevant characteristics. Second, Cotter et al. assert that the glass ceiling has a stronger effect at the higher levels of the organization than at the lower levels. Consequently, there will be a higher rate of gender inequality at the top of the hierarchy than at the bottom. This higher rate of gender inequality at the top of the hierarchy widens the wage gap, whereas the gender wage gap at the bottom of the hierarchy is smaller. Third, the glass ceiling is not just about proportions at each level in an organization. Cotter et al. maintain that a better indicator would be promotions to higher positions and raises of income, rather than just the proportion of men and women at each level. Last, the effects of the glass ceiling increase over an individual's career. The effects of a glass ceiling are stronger the later one is in one's career. Discrimination increases as one moves up the job ladder and increases throughout an individual's career, so the disadvantages grow. The glass ceiling has the effect of flattening women's career trajectories in comparison with men's career trajectories. Consequently, women's wages do not increase as much as men's do. The glass ceiling hypothesis has been supported by substantial evidence of male-female earnings differences that are small at first and increase immensely over time.

Results are mixed about whether the glass ceiling is evident in other countries. Comparative research has demonstrated that the effect of the glass ceiling may be stronger in Western Europe than in the United States. This is attributed to weaker barriers faced by women in the United States in comparison with other countries. Women in the United States have greater access to higher education and participate in a more dynamic economy. These ideas are counterintuitive to what one knows about work and gender in Western countries, but researchers claim that the interplay of gender ideologies, availability of jobs, and the possibility of organizing women's labor movements are more significant.

Are Women Breaking Through the Glass Ceiling?

The glass ceiling is not an absolute barrier because some women are breaking through. Often these women are seen as "tokens," which refers to promoting a woman so the organization appears to have gender equality. The women are considered tokens because they are taken from a skewed group and are treated as representatives of women as a whole. The women who are promoted become symbols who are not individualized. Others argue that women in fields such as law, the hard sciences, engineering, and academia are facing glass ceiling that are almost impossible to penetrate. Research illustrates that the invisible barriers are typically the result of sexist attitudes about women's abilities in the workplace, either direct or indirect.

Does a Glass Ceiling Still Exist?

Many doubt that a glass ceiling exists in today's workforce. The assertions are typically that women's lower positions in the labor market are just the result of age and experience, rather than labor market discrimination. Some researchers claim that a cohort effect is actually occurring. The older generations of women experience gender discrimination because they lack necessary tools that men in their cohort have. These researchers state that women in younger cohorts no longer experience a glass ceiling because women's education and experience is becoming similar to men's in their cohort. When the younger cohort ages, researchers predict that women and men will have an equal playing ground and that the glass ceiling will cease to exist. Although these are only predictions, we will have to wait for the younger cohorts to enter the labor force with higher education and relevant work experience until we see if the glass ceiling has disappeared or remains.

GLOBAL CARE CHAIN WORK

Sociologist Arlie Russell Hochschild first used the term global care chain to describe the export of care work from low-income nations to high-income nations. Care work is the work of attending to others through the provision of physical, moral, and emotional support. Historically, care work has been done informally without pay, usually by family members, as in the case of mothers caring for their children. Recognized care work occupations, in which caregivers are compensated financially, include nursing, child care, and domestic work. As the popularity of international migration increases, the distribution of care work is more likely to expand past familial links to encompass a more complex and international labor industry. One development as a result of increased migration is the creation of transnational families—families with one or more parents living outside their country. Migration theorists have explained the prevalence of international migration through push and pull factors. In low-income countries, conditions make sustainable living difficult, such as high unemployment and poverty rates, so people may feel "pushed" to go elsewhere to earn a living; whereas, receiving countries "pull" immigrants by offering more plentiful work opportunities, higher wages, and secure lifestyles. Immigrant workers also often support their families through remittances sent back home. These remittances may contribute a large source of income to the home nation's economy. Accordingly, the demand for care work in wealthy nations draws people (mostly women) away from impoverished countries as they seek to fill the positions of care workers, just as they are pushed by unfavorable circumstances in their countries of origin, in which there becomes a deficit of caregiving.

Although men have traditionally been viewed as the breadwinners of the family, which may have obligated them to migrate for work, economic hardships have also required women to travel for salaries as well. In other cases, domestic violence may influence women to flee their country to escape abusive situations, or because women are more likely to feel the brunt of divorce or abandonment, they may be additionally compelled to leave their families to provide for them financially. The feminization of migration has required many women to leave their own families behind to be cared for by relatives (often grandmothers, aunts, or godmothers) or hired help. There is a transfer of caring labor from one place to another, creating a global care work chain, which is described in this entry.

Feminized Care Work

Immigrants (especially undocumented immigrants) from poor nations tend to perform jobs that are privatized, underpaid, and devalued in their new settings. When it comes to care work, labor is also feminized because the primary responsibility for caring is allocated to women. This is largely based on socially constructed beliefs of women's inherent mothering and nurturing capabilities. Women are the preferred gender to feed, bathe, teach, and show affection to others, especially children, the sick, and the elderly. As increasing numbers of women, particularly mothers, in wealthy countries demonstrate their ability to break these barriers by entering into the paid workforce, they leave their children (and sometimes elderly parents) unattended, without supervision or care. Although most mothers in these situations must make arrangements for their relatives to be cared for during the work day, only a few are financially able to hire care workers to come into their homes to provide personalized care and perhaps perform household tasks. At the same time that traditional gender ideologies are expanding, they also remain stagnant because the new caretakers are also women, just of lower socioeconomic status. Widespread gender ideology that associates poor women with care work not only beckons their presence but also legitimizes low pay and poor treatment. Although the conditions differ across occupational settings, the informal structure (mediocre regulations and enforcement systems) of the occupation allows economic exploitation. Care work gains a name because it becomes a paid occupation; however, it remains largely invisible as well as low in pay and prestige because of its relegation to a disadvantaged social group.

The Global Care Chain and the Displacement of Love

Anthropologist Rhacel Salazar Parreñas describes a three-tiered system of reproductive transfer that is dictated by social class, which she calls an international transfer of care taking. At the top tier are middle- to upper-class women from high-income nations, followed by the hired migrant care workers who constitute the middle tier. The bottom tier consists of hired care workers in poor nations who replace those who migrate to other countries. In the process of reproductive transfer, care moves upward through the tiers, placing the burden of care work on those who inhabit the lower tiers. Moreover, there is a displacement of emotion, particularly love, from children of low-income nations, which gets added onto the amount of love received by care workers' wards.

Even though women from wealthy nations are more likely to rely on formal workers to care for their relatives, transnational mothers rely on their family members to serve as "other mothers" in their homeland. Although there is a preference for a grandmother or godmother to care for the children because female family members are believed to be best suited for loving their children, they may also employ nannies in their homes for low wages. Additionally, care work may be relegated to female children in the absence of responsible or employable adults.

Care workers sometimes develop close relationships with the children that they care for and may interpret this relationship as an outlet where they can deliver the love that they feel for their own children to the children that they are paid to care for. Not all domestic workers have strong bonds with their employers' children, and many prevent themselves from getting close because relationships can be ended abruptly by termination of employment. At the same time, transnational mothers may worry that their children's caretakers will replace them in their own families. Because of these reasons, they often feel the need to compensate for their own absence in their families' lives by attempting to be hypervigilant of the family's affairs or by sending them gifts. Ironically, they also express dissatisfaction with their employers' neglect toward their families, which often influences their own definitions of good mothering and care taking.

Gender Ideologies and Definitions of Mothering and Fathering

Transnational families, which are quickly becoming the norm in some poor nations, experience unique problems as they search to redefine traditional notions of family and parenting. Family roles of men and women are generally seen as separate and complementary: Women are nurturers, men are breadwinners. Traditionally, fathers were the only parents who traveled great distances for financial benefit. In essence, they become absentee fathers; however, they are viewed to be satisfying their traditional roles in the family. Transnational mothers, on the other hand, often take on economic responsibilities but are still allotted the full responsibility of care work (in two countries). For most of history, mothers have stayed in close proximity to their children, whether they were homemakers or held jobs that required their small children to tag along. Transnational mothering breaks this long-standing normative behavior because they endure vast distances between themselves and their own families. This stimulates far more role confusion and adaptation than when fathers leave their families.

Transnational mothering poses many moral dilemmas for mothers who have been socialized into traditional gender roles. Many have difficulty balancing their ingrained traditional beliefs with the economic reality of poverty. Transnational mothers may see themselves as upholding as well as redefining traditional gender roles and negotiating their placement in their families. Not infrequently, mothers become reluctant breadwinners as they try to make up for their lack of caregiving by maintaining intimacy in the ways that they can. They make phone calls, send letters, and text messages all in an attempt maintain their emotional role in the family. Furthermore, the effort that they put toward arranging care for their children illustrates their deep concern and commitment to their families. If a family care arrangement was not viable, or if a preselected arrangement fell through, they would feel compelled to return home, or else try to bring their children to live with them in their country of immigration. The well-being of the children is always at their central focus.

Fathers who remain home while their wives go abroad to provide financial support to the family may actually endure a loss of self-respect and dignity. This reflects poorly on men because they are perceived to be unable to provide for their families or incapable of satisfying their wives sexually. Although some men are quite secure in their masculinity, others (at the risk of appearing feminized) cast off any responsibilities of doing housework or child care to other relatives or paid workers.

GOLDMAN, EMMA (1869–1940)

Also known as "Red Emma," Emma Goldman is much more than an anarchist who protested against the imperialist capitalism as a feminist lecturing on issues ranging from birth control to jealousy. An energetic lecturer rather than a reticent theoretician, Goldman spoke to the masses to challenge the prevailing ideas on marriage, free love, prostitution, and homosexuals.

At a time when the main target of bourgeois feminists was the right to vote, Goldman took revolutionary steps to transgress the narrow political boundaries and seek women's liberation within a wider arena. Against all governments, Goldman thought the vote would only mean improving a system that fosters the tools of victimization for women. Thus, she often attacked women professionals and suffragists both in her lectures and articles she wrote as the editor of the monthly journal Mother Earth. Her critique of the mainstream feminists can also be observed in her comparison of the educated women to the working-class girls whom she deemed less tainted by the suffocating social roles.

For Goldman, women's liberation begins in one's soul and only the liberated individuals can eradicate bourgeois values from their roots. To this end, Goldman showcased Nora of Henrik Ibsen's A Doll's House, a model who closed the door of her cage for freedom. Goldman's lecture "Marriage and Love" describes marriage as an insurance policy for women who practice dependence on men. Prisoners at its best, married women are sex objects sold like a piece of meat. In "Traffic in Women," she concludes that if poverty tempts women into prostitution, then wives are prostitutes. Physical beauty is the only asset women are allowed to put on the market, so they see each other as rivals to further imprison themselves. Critical of bourgeois marriage, Goldman supported free love and the necessity of birth control. For her, motherhood was to remain a matter of free choice. The authorities of the time found such claims too bold, and short arrests following the special birth control issue of Mother Earth led to a final deportation from the United States to Russia, where she came from in 1886.

Her life is an emblem of the values she fervently supported; Goldman apparently enjoyed the capacity to create a new life out of practically nothing. Unlike most mainstream Communists of her era, Goldman believed that beautiful things are necessities, not luxuries. Her response to the disapproving comrades, "If I can't dance, it isn't my revolution!" became a motto. Her autobiography Living My Life, Martin Duberman's play Mother Earth, E. L. Doctorow's novel Ragtime, and Warren Beatty's film Reds are the key sources to explore a life started in Lithuania as a middle-class member and ended in Toronto as a world citizen.

GYNECOLOGY

Gynecology is a surgical medical specialty that grew out of the practices of obstetrics and midwifery in the mid-19th century. Practitioners usually also practice obstetrics—hence, the specialty is more commonly referred to as "obstetrics and gynecology" and practitioners are more commonly referred to as "obstetrician-gynecologists" (ob-gyns). Although some scholars have defined gynecology as the study of women in terms of their functions and diseases, the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (ACOG) defines gynecology as care related to pregnancy and women's reproductive organs. In addition, ACOG defines ob-gyns responsibilities to include providing general care to women. It is difficult to make a clear distinction between obstetrics and gynecology because both deal with similar concerns in women's health. However, only obstetricians provide medical care dealing with pregnancy and delivery. Although all obstetricians provide gynecological care, gynecologists do not necessarily provide obstetrical care. ACOG further identifies four subspecialty areas within obstetrics and gynecology: gynecologic oncology (focusing on cancers of the reproductive system), maternal-fetal medicine (focusing on the care of a pregnant woman and her fetus both before and after birth), reproductive endocrinology and infertility (focusing on hormonal or infertility problems), and urogynecology and pelvic reconstructive surgery (focusing on disorders of the genitourinary system). This entry discusses the background, feminist criticisms, and the current state of gynecology.

Historical Background

In the United States, gynecology did not come into being as a medical specialty until the mid-1800s. The man widely acknowledged as the "father of American gynecology" is J. Marion Sims, the founder of the Woman's Hospital of the State of New York. Before the mid-1800s, women's health was primarily under the purview of women midwives, who attended a large proportion of births. At that time, pregnancy and childbirth—not to mention the workings of the reproductive system—were not well understood by anyone. Furthermore, concerns about modesty also made it difficult for men to attend to women during childbirths. In effect, female midwives held a monopoly on attending pregnancy and childbirth because there was little competition.

After 1750, American men began to return from Europe, having obtained medical education there. At the same time, they brought back new knowledge about childbirth and innovations in birthing equipment. These male physicians became known as "man-midwives" to distinguish them from the traditional, female midwife, and there soon existed a division of labor where women midwives attended to pregnancies and births, but called upon man-midwives during emergencies. The foundation was being laid for a new understanding of pregnancy and childbirth—one that eventually privileged man-midwives (later to become ob-gyns) over female midwives.

Beginning around 1810, physicians began to consolidate their domination of the market in pregnancy and childbirth. They primarily did so by making the case that they were the only ones with sufficient scientific knowledge and expertise to be birth attendants—a strategy that ultimately proved successful. In addition, male-midwives began to organize as a profession and further bolstered their professional status and authority by diminishing the image of the female midwife, using racist and xenophobic ideologies. Against this back-drop, in the mid-1850s, Sims moved to New York City and began a medical practice. Sims is generally credited today with developing the technique of repairing vesico-vaginal fistulas (vaginal tears that result from childbirth) and the speculum. However, Sims remains a controversial figure because he perfected his technique by practicing on poor immigrants and slave women without the use of anesthesia.

In the 20th century, the division and development of medical specialties within the medical establishment came to fruition, and obstetrics-gynecology gradually became accepted as an established medical specialty in its own right. The field remained predominantly male for most of the 20th century. Although gynecology technically does not deal with pregnancy and delivery, many gynecologists today continue to incorporate obstetrics in their practice. However, primarily because of the stresses of long and unpredictable work hours and the high risks of litigation, some ob-gyns have dropped obstetrics from their practice and focus primarily on gynecology.

Feminist Critiques of Gynecology

Several scholars have critiqued the medical specialty of gynecology (and to a large extent, obstetrics as well) for promoting an understanding of pregnancy and childbirth as pathological conditions. Many argue that women being viewed as "patients" placed them in a subservient position relative to the ob-gyn and pathologized natural bodily processes as disease. Beginning in the 1970s, ob-gyns began to face several challenges from others who resisted medical understandings of pregnancy, birth, and women's bodies. These challenges came from the women's health movement, the home-birth movement, and a resurgence in the popularity of midwifery and alternative medicine. These activists asserted that women themselves were the ones who best understood how women's bodies and biological processes worked and that male ob-gyns did women a grave disservice by treating women's bodies like machines with repairable parts. Scholars have further documented that ob-gyns are trained with a surgical viewpoint, further fostering the view of women's bodies as machines with repairable parts. In addition, many ob-gyns also adopted paternalistic attitudes, which led to conflicts with patients because ob-gyns frequently imposed their medical will against their patients' wishes.

During this era, feminist health activists also challenged the view that the medical profession's knowledge base was objective and scientific. They contended that obstetrics-gynecology's understandings of women and women's health were often constrained by larger normative understandings of women's natures and roles. These activists pointed out that historically, there existed a belief that women's reproductive organs and negative mental health conditions were strongly related—a belief that still finds currency in some segments of society, including among some ob-gyns. Some women's health activists also pointed out that many members of the male-dominated medical specialty held conservative views about women's appropriate roles, believing that women's main role was to reproduce, which led to a restrictive and narrow understanding of women's bodies and sexualities.

In response to the medical establishment, critiques of obstetrics-gynecology and the medical model of women's reproductive health were published, as well as such books as Our Bodies, Ourselves, which aimed at providing women a different model of women's health, rather than just health care information. This feminist model advocated a holistic view of women's health and bodies and a belief that women themselves were best qualified to judge for themselves what they needed and how their bodies worked. The publication of these materials represented more than just an attempt to change dominant views of women's bodies; they attempted to provide some grassroots education to women. For year, feminist health activists have argued that obstetrician-gynecologists' refusal to share information with women forced them into a passive role when it came to their health care. Critics have charged that by withholding information and dictating what women should and should not do regarding to their health, men ob-gyns in essence control women. By sharing information about women's bodies and health through grassroots education, feminist health activists hoped that women would wrest back some control.

The Current Landscape

Many of these critiques were based on the historical reality that the specialty of obstetrics-gynecology had been dominated by male physicians. In recent decades, however, the demographic profile of the specialty is changing, and signs indicate that obstetrics-gynecology is becoming a feminized medical specialty. Since 1976, the percentage of women among obstetrical-gynecological residents has steadily risen. In 1975, women made up only 17 percent of all obstetrics-gynecology residents, but in 2000, they composed 70.3 percent. In 2005, the percentage of women residents in the specialty had further risen to 75.7 percent. ACOG predicts that by 2010, the sex composition of practicing ob-gyns nationwide will be split 50–50. Although this demographic change might be an indication that men and women are now on an even playing field in the medical specialty, the top leadership, policy, and administrative positions in obstetrics-gynecology are still held by men. Given that many critics of obstetrics-gynecology argue that women are the best judges of what they need and how their bodies work, some argue that the entry of more women into the specialty will in turn foster a more holistic view of women's health and women's bodies. However, others counter that before real change can occur, the institution of medicine itself, larger normative cultural beliefs about women, and the power disparity between men and women in society all have to change. Otherwise, these critics charge, women entering the specialty will still be trained to view women's health and bodies through a medical framework. These critics point out that although more women have entered the specialty, reproductive technologies continue to proliferate, indicating a continuing underlying view of women's bodies as pliable machines.

In contrast with early feminist critiques that equated gynecology with patriarchal control of women, some scholars have cautioned that the balance of power in the physician (ob-gyn)-patient relationship should not be seen as a zero-sum game. These scholars concur that patients are, in some ways, constrained within the larger macro system of the health care system because of such issues as the rising costs of health care and the lack of health insurance. However, they urge more nuance in examining the dynamics of physician-patient interactions. Increasingly, researchers have begun to emphasize the role that patients play in these interactions, and they argue that patients do exercise some degree of agency. In reality, gynecology can no longer be conflated with patriarchal control, and a more nuanced examination of power dynamics within the medical specialty should be adopted.

HAMER, FANNIE LOU (1917–1977)

A civil rights leader and activist, Fannie Lou Hamer served as a source of inspiration and mobilization for all black people, especially through her personal understanding of multiple oppressions forged by gender, race, and economic status. She dedicated her later life to the human and equal rights of all individuals. Hamer became known for her incredible speaking and singing voice, and her ability to extinguish others' fears especially during times of chaos and trouble.

Hamer was born in the Mississippi Delta on October 16, 1917, the youngest of 20 children, to sharecropping parents. As a young black woman in the Deep South, she experienced the injustices of racism and Jim Crow segregation laws at a young age, which solidified her lifelong commitment to freedom and equality. In 1944, Fannie married Perry Hamer, a fellow sharecropper, and eventually adopted two daughters. Although conscious of the injustices African American were suffering and their growing resistance, Hamer continued to work in the fields until 1962 when she attended a mass meeting focused on civil rights coordinated by Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). There, she learned about the right to vote, and, inspired by the event, she and 17 others made the dangerous journey by bus to Indianola, Mississippi, in an attempt to register to vote. Although the group was unsuccessful in becoming enfranchised, Hamer engaged in her first act of public service on the bus ride home. After police arrested the bus driver, the individuals riding the bus did not calm down until Hamer began singing, an action that eventually characterized her life.

News of Hamer's powerful voice reached SNCC organizer Bob Moses, who realized she was just the leader SNCC and the Freedom Movement needed. Hamer accepted Moses's request to become a SNCC activist, where she dedicated most of her energy to voter registration. After finally registering to vote in January 1963, Hamer began taking training courses to further her knowledge and enhance her activism. While traveling to one such training event in June of that year, Hamer and others were arrested while taking a lunch break at a café. In jail, Hamer was violently beaten and sexually abused by black male prisoners under the orders of the police officers. This left Hamer psychologically, emotionally, and physically scarred, with permanent damage to her kidney and left eye, yet it did not extinguish her fighting spirit. Hamer went on to share her story to inspire and mobilize African Americans across the country. Her leadership continued, and in 1964, she ran for Congress against incumbent Jamie Whitten. Although she did not win, Hamer successfully challenged and exposed the racist policies of the Democratic Party, in addition to demonstrating that African Americans have the power to hold political office.

Throughout the rest of her life, Hamer was at the forefront of many civil rights causes in the arenas of politics, finance, law, and grassroots organizing. She was particularly focused on aiding black women and improving their economic and social position. On March 14, 1977, at 59 years of age, Fannie Lou Hamer died of heart failure. Since her death, Hamer has continued to be recognized as a national symbol of the civil rights movement and is celebrated across the nation.

Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association

The Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association, Inc. (HBIGDA) was formed in 1978 by Dr. Harry Benjamin, M.D. (1885–1986). Intended to be an interdisciplinary professional association, HBIGDA brought together experts in psychology, sociology, voice therapy, medicine, and many other fields of study to improve understandings of gender identities and to standardize treatment of individuals diagnosed with gender identity disorders. HBIGDA published the first standards of care, created an international community of professionals who specialize in treating gender identity disorders, and organized professional conferences. Now in its sixth version, The Harry Benjamin Standards of Care for Gender Identity Disorders (2005) is perhaps the most significant product of HBIGDA. Originally published in 1979, the document was intended to outline the medically accepted view of transsexualism (a diagnosis that was officially added to the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders III [DSM-III] in 1980), as well as the recommended stages of treatment. The standards of care call for three phases of treatment, often referred to as "triadic therapy," for individuals diagnosed with gender identity disorders (the diagnosis that replaced transsexualism in the DSM-IV in 1994): hormone therapy, "real-life experience," and sexual reassignment surgery. Although the stages of treatment are often in this order, the standards of care note that some biological females transitioning to males may prefer hormone therapy, breast surgery, and then real-life experience. According to the standards of care, one letter from a mental health professional to a qualified physician is required to begin hormone therapy or for breast surgery, and the patient must be able to demonstrate prior real-life experience or participate in psychotherapy for (usually) 3 months. The real-life experience is intended to boost the confidence of both the patient and the medical professionals. Essentially, the real-life experience is a time in which individuals maintain full or part-time employment, function as students, participate in community volunteer activities, change their names legally to match their gender identity, provide documentation that other people in their life are aware of their gender identity, or some combination of these. Some mental health practitioners consider this a "real-life test" because the process of assuming the role of their desired gender may discourage some patients from pursuing genital surgery, or may solidify their resolve. Generally, if a patient has had 12 months of successive hormone treatment, has also has 12 months of successive real-life experience, and has two letters of recommendation from mental health practitioners and physicians, they are then eligible to pursue sexual reassignment surgery. Finally, follow-up with both mental health providers and surgeons is encouraged. In 2006, HBIGDA officially changed its name to the World Professional Association for Transgender Health (WPATH) in an effort to shift the discursive focus away from mental illness and instead promote health and well-being. WPATH considers a diagnosis of gender identity disorder to be important for patients' overall well-being, processing insurance claims, and guiding professional research.

HAY, HARRY (1912–2002)

Harry Hay (April 7, 1912–October 24, 2002) was one of the most important and influential activists in the history of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transsexual (LGBT) movements. He devoted his lifelong activity to the rights of gay people and the community. Often ahead of his time, he advocated the idea of gay people as a minority group—an initiative that seems obvious today though it was unthinkable in the 1950s.

Hay was a controversial person for his period, overcoming social and cultural norms and taboos. He was influenced by Marxist philosophy, which he first encountered in 1933. Soon afterward, he joined the Communist Party USA and became one of its most prominent figures. He soon found that there would not be support for him as a homosexual man; thus, he yielded to general expectations and married Anita Platky in 1938. However, the wound remained unhealed. Finally in 1948, Hay decided to break his silence and actively fight for the rights of homosexuals. That year, while working for the presidential campaign of Henry Wallace, he started expressing the idea of homosexuals as an oppressed minority. The breakthrough moment came in 1950 in Los Angeles, when, together with a group of friends, he founded the Mattachine Society. Soon after that, he divorced and left the Communist Party. In 1953, he and other founders left the organization when it became dominated by much more conservative ideas and his Communist roots became problematic for some members.

It took almost 20 years for a homophile movement to develop and transform itself into the next stage. The Stonewall riots, which symbolically opened up the next chapter in gay liberation, brought onto the agenda the strategies that Hay introduced in the 1950s. The idea of homosexuals forming a separate and distinctive culture quickly spread and dominated gay politics in the 1970s. On the wave of this enthusiasm, he joined the California chapter of the Gay Liberation Front. However, he soon became disappointed. By the mid-1970s, he was already looking for another, new quality for the gay community. Feeling that the gay liberation movement had lost its spirit—the key word for the next stage of his activity—he set up the first Spiritual Conference of Radical Faeries in Arizona, in 1979. From that moment, Hay dedicated his life to political work for the gay community and to the idea of spiritual renewal through neo-pagan and New Age practices embraced in the notion of the Radical Faerie.

HEALTH CARE SYSTEMS, HIDDEN/INFORMAL

The concept of hidden or informal health care lacks a commonly understood definition. For purposes of this entry, it is defined as care given or received outside the formal health care system or as those dimensions of health care existing within both formal and informal systems of care that are hidden from casual observation. Formal health care is that given to improve the health and well-being of patients by allopathic or osteopathic medical practitioners and professionals within hospitals and clinics, particularly in Western industrialized countries. In formal systems, fees are typically paid through public or private insurance or directly by patients, and occupational sex-segregation is prevalent. Physicians and technicians are typically men, whereas nurses, midwives, and aides are typically women. In most cultures, women are overrepresented both as providers and consumers of informal health care for themselves and their families. Informal care in the United States is an important force in both health maintenance and disease prevention with as many as one-third of the total population and as many as one-half of some racial/ethnic minorities engaging in unconventional medical practices or informal care. A gender perspective on informal health care in the United States and globally emphasizes the dissatisfaction among growing numbers of people, especially women, with conventional and formal medical practices. Feminist perspectives, in particular, seek to improve the health and social status of women by making visible the hidden aspects of the health care system that reinforce gender inequality. This body of knowledge and health activism also highlights women's diverse experiences as health care consumers, informal caregivers, and as agents of change. This entry describes types of and issues relating to informal health care systems.

Doctor-Patient Relations and Limited Access to Care

Dissatisfaction with doctor-patient relations is central to dissatisfaction with the formal health care system. Practitioners in the formal health care system tend to take an authoritative approach where the physician is in control. Such an approach can be particularly unpleasant for women because gender bias is easily amplified in interactions between male doctors and female patients, ultimately contributing to substandard health care. Women's experiences and concerns are often discounted or not taken seriously by doctors in medical encounters. To be seen as credible patients by doctors, as well as in their own eyes, women must go to great lengths to assert themselves in formal health care settings.

Ethnicity, class, age, and sexuality, among other factors, play a role in how individuals experience social interactions and health care institutions. Historically, African Americans have been discriminated against in formal medical care systems, and because of this, as well as lack of money or insurance, have relied on informal support systems. Susan Smith, in her book, Sick and Tired of Being Sick and Tired, documents the informal activities of black women's health networks in America, particularly in the rural South, between 1890 and 1950. This work describes significant community health efforts by midwives, extension service workers, home demonstration agents, volunteer laywomen, and club and sorority women who vigilantly sought to channel public health resources to minority communities denied access to private health care. Similarly, contemporary informal health care networks empower minority communities when formal health care is inaccessible or unsatisfactory. Physician bias and limited health care access are also experienced by other groups, including low-income and lesbian women. For poor women, power imbalances between the patient and the doctor are significant as a result of social class differences. Many experts have found that power imbalances were especially evident in some societies (India, for example) where there are extreme educational and class disparities between patients and doctors. Lesbian women can also suffer a power imbalance because of "heteronormativity," when health professionals assume that heterosexuality is the norm, thus erecting a barrier to communication and trust, and, ultimately, to quality health care. Patricia Stevens's analysis of 45 lesbian women's narrative accounts of interactions with doctors reveals that their uses of power reflected both solidarity and control depending on how physicians used power. These women expressed a desire for both competence and sympathetic understanding from physicians.

A common theme of research on women's health is the expressed desire for improved communication and increased time with health providers and physicians. Women also express a preference for holistic care directed to patients' overall well-being, and better relationships with health care providers to increase collaboration in treatment goals. Because many women's needs are not being met in formal or conventional health care systems, they are turning to informal sources such as complementary medicine and self-help alternatives.

Alternative Approaches and Women's Self-Help Groups

Along with increasing numbers of people who are dissatisfied with conventional medical care are increasing numbers—both male and female—who are using complementary and alternative medicine to meet their health care needs. Though much research is dedicated to herbal treatments and supplemental practices, such as chiropractic care, acupuncture, energywork, and massage, alternative medicine is certainly not limited to these practices. In many cases, what Western culture views as "alternative" medicine is in practice traditional folk medicine that has been used for much of history. For example, Linda Nelms and June Gorski describe the important role of the traditional African healer in linking rural populations of women and children with primary health care. Another example of traditional medicine that is being integrated with the biomedical model is the case of bicultural nurse-curanderas. Techniques practiced by curanderas vary geographically, but all share a holistic orientation to health; no separation is made between the mind and the body. The system of curanderismo begins in the extended family and then encompasses the larger community. Using traditional remedies, the curandera is believed to help bring equilibrium, or to restore God's will in the lives of patients. Only if Hispanic traditional healers have failed to help will many patients enter the system of mainstream medical care. Curanderas continue to be popular among the growing population of Hispanic men and women in the United States, as well as elsewhere.

Women use complementary and alternative medicine, particularly herbs and supplements, more than men do. Further, most complementary and alternative practitioners are female. Some research suggests that a lesbian sexual orientation may increase the likelihood of seeking complementary or alternative medicine. Also another population, older women, may find empowerment in alternatives to conventional medical practices, particularly through a holistic and patient-centered approach that enables older men and women to reclaim authority over their health that is often lost with aging.

Women's self-help ideologies and activities grew with the women's health movement during an era of larger social movements occurring in the 1960s and 1970s. A transformation of women's consciousness shifted emphasis from professional control of knowledge by medical authorities to personal experience, knowledge, and control. Groups that subscribed to self-help ideologies employed cooperation and collective support to accomplish their goals of improving health care for women of all ages, race and ethnic backgrounds, and class or employment statuses. More specifically, women's self-help groups recognized that conventional medical practices were often used to control women's bodies and lives and therefore sought to establish practices that would shift the doctor-patient balance of power in favor of the client.

An important change agent in the self-help women's movement was a small group of women in Boston, Massachusetts, who began to meet regularly in a study group dedicated to educating women about their bodies and their health. Over time, this group formalized its organizational structure, becoming the Boston Women's Health Book Collective, publishers of the well-known and now much-published Our Bodies, Ourselves. Through their work as publishers of accessible and reliable information on women's health, sexuality, and reproduction, this organization became the leading feminist advocate for women's education about their bodies. In a similar vein, in the years before the legalization of abortion with the Roe v. Wade (1973) decision, an underground women's abortion referral network embraced self-help principles, providing women-centered and patient-centered services. Operating under the pseudonym of "Jane," this informally organized women's collective in Chicago initially provided counseling and referral services, negotiating and making arrangements for women to have safe and affordable abortions. Eventually several members of the collective learned the skills required to perform abortions themselves. Jane members saw reproductive choice as a fundamental woman's right and took considerable personal risks to provide women from all backgrounds the opportunity to choose abortion in a safe and supportive setting. After abortion was legalized, the group disbanded. More recently, however, in the 1980s and 1990s, a new group known as "Metrotown" has emerged to prepare women to provide safe abortions in the event that women's right to abortion is reversed. Metrotown provides gynecological services, but also focuses on educating women to perform procedures such as menstrual extraction and on disseminating gynecological knowledge and skills to women.

Self-help gynecology advocates work to promote education about women's anatomy and reproduction, encouraging women to become actively involved in cervical self-examinations to identify and treat health problems related to reproduction. One such treatment, menstrual extraction, is the practice whereby the contents of the uterus are removed and is an important aspect of women's self-help gynecology. It can be used to prevent or shorten menstruation or to perform a home abortion in the early stages of pregnancy. The issues surrounding this procedure are complex and controversial, but the practice is significant for reasons other than those offered in political rhetoric. When the procedure is conducted, the woman receiving it plays an active role, either conducting it herself or participating in the process. This aspect of the women's health movement is significant because it upsets the power imbalances of conventional medicine.

Technological and For-Profit Intrusion

Other hidden dimensions of health care delivery that are experienced differently by women and men include what feminist scholars such as Kathryn

Ratcliff have come to refer to as the "technological and for-profit intrusion" into women's health. Women's health has become a big business in modern capitalist societies, and the American Medical Association, pharmaceutical companies, and hospitals and clinics have vied for market control of treatments and services for women. At the same time, insurance companies and government spending is often denied to women for routine procedures related to reproductive health, such as family planning and abortion, and cancer screening. Many of the problems of technological intrusion initially emerged with the historical shift away from midwifery to specialized obstetrics-gynecology in the area of maternity care. Women's bodies and childbirth, though a natural biological occurrence, became highly medicalized in the United States through cultural and structural changes. As a result of these changes, women lost much authority and knowledge about their own bodies and female midwives were forced to cede power to male gynecologist-obstetricians. Also related to this larger structural shift in power and authority, the field of gynecology-obstetrics adopted technological innovations that brought profits to medical practice. Hysterectomies, fetal monitoring, and cesarian sections as treatments and solutions to women's gynecological-obstetric problems have been overused, thereby unnecessarily subjecting women to surgical risks. In a groundbreaking ethnography of the apprenticeship training of obstetrician-gynecologists, Men Who Control Women's Health, Diana Scully documents how women have sacrificed parts of their bodies and health to the training needs of the medical profession. Although poor women receiving care in teaching hospitals have disproportionately experienced this outcome, the development of modern reproductive technologies and cosmetic surgeries, has put middle- and upper-class women increasingly at risk of for-profit intrusions, unnecessarily risky treatments, and substandard health care.

Gender Bias in Health Research and Informed Consent

A final area of health care delivery that often remains hidden from casual observation or critical examination is the historic neglect of research on women's health relative to men's. Women have been excluded from clinical research samples, ostensibly because of concerns that they may be pregnant or become pregnant during clinical trials, or that women's hormonal cycles will interact with treatment protocols. Yet, medical protocols and treatments based on all-male clinical trials and samples are prescribed for women. Although in 1986 the National Institutes of Health in the United States issued a new policy requiring justification for excluding women from federally funded clinical research, the new guidelines were not integrated into the grants application process until 1991.

Further complicating issues related to gender bias in research, in many cases women have not been given full information to make informed decisions about participating in clinical research. One of the most egregious examples is found in testing of the birth control pill. Early clinical trials involved poor Puerto Rican women who volunteered, without complete disclosure, during the early stages of birth control development. The women were not told that some of them would be selected into control groups given placebos; additionally, they were not informed of the risks of taking untested hormonal treatments that could lead to strokes and deaths and in several cases did. Although information on the risks of hormonal and other drug treatments are now routinely required by internal review boards for clinical research, as well by the Food and Drug Administration, full disclosure and information came only after women's groups lobbied persistently for social change.

Conclusion

Advocates for women's and community health promote holistic health care practices and total well-being through increasing consumer responsibility and authority for personal, family, and community care. Historically, the women's health movement has sought to promote self-help and to alter the imbalance in consumer power in health care by educating women and others about health matters, improving doctor-patient relationships, employing "alternative" approaches to health care, and through political advocacy. Informal health care activists promote policies and procedural practices that eliminate discrimination (sex, race/ethnic, age, sexual orientation, and class) in formal health care delivery and that empower women and minorities in health care decision making.

HEALTH DISPARITIES

Health disparities and research related to this topic have been an important concern in medical sociology for decades, but the term health disparities has become more central in medical sociology as well as in public health and medicine more broadly during the past decade. Sometimes the research area is also known as health inequalities, especially outside the United States. Within the United States, this area of research has received more attention because a reduction in health disparities has been listed as one of the major goals of the Healthy People 2010 report, a major goal setting and reporting effort within public health and the U.S. government. As specified by the goals of that project, the United States strives to eliminate health disparities among segments of the population, including differences that occur by gender, race or ethnicity, education or income, disability, geographic location, or sexual orientation. Collection and reporting of data on health care disparities are complex. This entry focuses on the U.S. effort to eliminate health disparities, with some comments about related issues from other countries.

Early Sociological Background

Sociological research on inequalities and health has been one of the most long-standing concerns in medical sociology, and this concern within sociology is much older than specific U.S. government policy efforts in the area. The conclusions from numerous studies are that people of lower socioeconomic status have worse health and lower life expectancies than do those from a higher socioeconomic status (SES). Recent, more sophisticated studies still find that people with incomes below the poverty level in the United States have higher (in some studies two and sometimes even three times) chances of dying early, even when other basic factors such as age, race, and gender are controlled. Relationships of SES to poorer health outcomes hold in many countries in the world, not only in the United States, and the presence of national health insurance systems that cover the entire population generally may help somewhat to reduce these types of differences, but do not eliminate them. The presence of national health insurance systems tends to be more important in reducing disparities or inequalities in access to care. This conclusion is important for countries other than the United States; however, the United States remains one of the only major developed countries that does not ensure access to health care services for all its citizens. Given this, discussion of health disparities and inequalities in the United States includes both examinations of variation in health status and in access to, use of, and quality of health care services.

U.S. Government Efforts Related to Health Disparities

At the federal level of the U.S. government, one of the first pushes for concern about health disparities was a report by the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, Margaret Heckler (1983–1985). This landmark report revealed large and persistent gaps in health status among Americans of different racial and ethnic groups. Because of this report, the Office of Minority Health (OMH) within the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) was created with a mission to address these disparities within the nation. The Centers for Disease Control (CDC), another U.S. federal government agency that focuses on public health and epidemiology, also established its own Office of the Associate Director for Minority Health (ADMH) in 1988 in response to the same report. This unit became the CDC's OMH in 2002, and was given the mission of promoting health and quality of life by preventing and controlling the disproportionate burden of disease, injury, and disability among racial and ethnic minority populations. In 2005, the OMH was expanded to create the new Office of Minority Health and Health Disparities (OMHD) in CDC. The mission of the renamed agency was broadened, with a focus on reducing health disparities experienced by populations defined by race/ethnicity, SES, geography, gender, age, disability status, and risk status related to sex and gender.

During the same period, one of the pushes for more research on health care inequalities came from the passage of Public Law 106–129, the Healthcare Research and Quality Act of 1999. This law directed the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality (AHRQ) to develop two annual reports, one focused on quality and one focused on disparities. AHRQ was directed to track prevailing disparities in health care delivery as they relate to racial and socioeconomic factors among priority populations. Priority populations include low-income groups, racial and ethnic minorities, women, children, the elderly, individuals with special health care needs, the disabled, people in need of long-term care, people requiring end-of-life care, and places of residence (rural communities). The first National Healthcare Disparities Report in 2003 built on some previous efforts in the federal government, especially Healthy People 2010, and the 2002 Institute of Medicine report, Unequal Treatment: Confronting Racial and Economic Disparities in Healthcare, Brian Smedley and colleagues. Unequal Treatment extensively documents health care disparities in the United States, with a focus on those related to race and ethnicity. One of the weaknesses of this report is that there is no focus on disparities related to SES.

The National Healthcare Disparities Report does focus on the ability of Americans to access health care and variation in the quality of care. Disparities related to SES are included, as are disparities linked to race and ethnicity, and the report tries to explore the relationship between race/ethnicity and socioeconomic position. There are seven key findings from the report. First, inequality in quality of care continues to exist and often these are particularly true for some more serious health care problems, such as minorities being diagnosed with cancer at later stages, less often receiving optimal care when hospitalized for cardiac problems, and higher rates of avoidable hospital admissions among blacks and poorer patients. Second, disparities come at a personal and societal price. Third, differential access to health care often leads to disparities in quality of care actually received. Fourth, opportunities to provide preventive care are often missed. The last three points all relate to the need for more data, more research, and the linkage of those to policy within the United States. The knowledge about why disparities continue to exist is still limited, and data limitations may limit improvement efforts.

Racial/Ethnic Health Disparities

Health differences by race and ethnicity are true both for morbidity and mortality. These differences are important in the United States, but also in other developed countries such as Great Britain and Australia. Disparities also are found in many Latin American countries. Because the ways "race/ethnicity" is understood varies across countries, specifics in health disparities also vary by country. One recent example of this type of complexity is a study that examines the black diaspora and its relationship to the health of black people in the United States and England. Black Caribbean-origin people in the United States have an advantaged health position relative to both black Caribbean people in England and black Americans overall.

U.S. data from the Midcourse Review data from Healthy People, 2010 indicate a number of specific areas in which it is useful to examine disparities by racial/ethnic category. In this report, 28 different areas of care are covered, and data are presented by racial/ethnic categories as well as by some other categories reported in later sections. Of particular interest for racial/ethnic disparities in care are examination of access to health care, maternal and infant care, physical activity and fitness, oral health, vision and hearing, substance and tobacco use, and chronic diseases.

One of the most important access areas is health insurance coverage. Among racial and ethnic groups, the white non-Hispanic population has the best coverage rates for health insurance, and Latinos and American Indians and Alaska Natives have the lowest rates, with a greater than 100 percent disparity from the group with the highest rates of coverage. Latinos also have a greater than 100 percent disparity on having a source of ongoing care, whereas non-Hispanic African Americans have a greater than 100 percent disparity for this for people under 18.

In the maternal, infant, and child health category, non-Hispanic African Americans generally have the greatest disparity from the population subgroup with the best outcomes. In many of the categories, their rates show a greater than 100 percent disparity from the group with the best rates. In categories of major policy interest such as infant mortality as well as in categories such as fetal deaths, perinatal deaths, neonatal deaths, and child deaths from 1 to 4 years of age, the group with the best rates is generally Asians.

In the areas of oral health, vision health, and hearing health, disparities by racial/ethnic category vary in importance. For oral health, the white non-Hispanic population has the best rates for 11 of the 12 objectives. Within specific categories, the largest racial/ethnic disparity is for untreated dental decay among persons aged 35 to 44 years with a greater than 100 percent disparity rate for non-Hispanic blacks. Within the same age group, destructive periodontal disease is 50 percent greater for non-Hispanic blacks. For many other categories of dental problems, such as untreated dental decay in various childhood age groups, there is no significant racial/ethnic disparity.

For vision and hearing problems, there are two vision categories among the objectives for which there are both enough data available to examine disparities and in which there are important racial/ethnic disparities. For uncorrected visual impairment caused by refractive errors, both Hispanics and non-Hispanic blacks have a 50 percent greater rate of the problem than do non-Hispanic whites. For visual impairment caused by glaucoma among those older than 45, non-Hispanic blacks have double the rate of non-Hispanic whites. For hearing problems, although data were limited, racial/ethnic disparity is not important for most indicators.

For physical activity and fitness, non-Hispanic whites have the best rates for leisure time physical activity and regular physical activity. General in this area, disparities are lower than in areas such as access to care and maternal, infant, and child health, with only one indicator in which a racial/ethnic minority has problematic rates that are double the most favorable group rates. For leisure time physical activities, Hispanics and American Indians/Alaska natives are 50 to 99 percent lower than non-Hispanic whites, but non-Hispanic blacks are only 10 percent to 49 percent lower. For regular physical activity, most minority racial/ethnic groups are only 10 percent to 49 percent less likely to engage in the activity, and for Asians there is really no difference. Hispanic and black non-Hispanic adolescents are less likely to engage in vigorous physical activity even though Hispanic students in 9th through 12th grades have the best rates for participation in daily physical activity in school and in physical education classes. Television viewing, as a negative activity in the physical fitness area, is highest among Hispanic and black non-Hispanic youth, with persistent disparities of 50 percent to 99 percent for Hispanics and double the rate or more for black non-Hispanic youth.

For substance use and tobacco use, racial/ethnic minorities often report better outcomes than do non-Hispanic whites. This is particularly true in the area of youth abuse of substances. The black population has the best rates for high school seniors who have never used alcohol, high school seniors who have never used illicit drugs, high school senior binge drinking in the past 2 weeks, and 8th, 10th, and 12th graders' steroid use in the past year. If the indicators examined are actual use of substances, black youth also have the best rates for adolescents not using alcohol or illicit drugs in the past 30 days and not using marijuana in the past 30 days. However, this is not true for some of the most serious outcomes of drug and alcohol problems. For cirrhosis deaths and drug-induced deaths, blacks, Hispanics, American Indians, and whites all have rates double the racial/ethnic group with the best rates, Asians and Pacific Islanders. For alcohol-related motor vehicle traffic deaths, the same pattern holds except that Hispanics have a rate 50 percent to 99 percent higher than Asian and Pacific Islanders, while the other groups are double. For tobacco use, the patterns of disparities are quite mixed among racial and ethnic populations. For example, the black non-Hispanic population has the best rates for 5 of the 13 objectives with significant racial and ethnic disparities, and the Hispanic population has the best rates for 4 of these objectives. There have been some successes in reduction of disparity in adult tobacco use and some lack of progress. From 1950 to 2000, there has been substantial reduction in disparity in adult tobacco use. In 1950, the black non-Hispanic population smoked at higher levels than the white non-Hispanic population. By 2001, smoking rates across the groups were equal. One group stands out with high tobacco use rates, American Indians and Alaska Natives. Their rate of use of tobacco products for people 18 and older is twice the rate of the group, Hispanics, with the lowest rate of usage. Historical factors that have promoted tobacco use as part of participation in the culture are one explanation of these high rates of use.

During the past decade, both in government efforts such as Healthy People and other research, there has been documentation of racial/ethnic differences in chronic diseases and their treatment. Various studies argue that blacks continue to receive inferior care for cancer. Blacks and other minorities have higher death rates for many types of cancer. Data from the Midcourse Review show blacks having double the overall cancer death rates, female breast cancer deaths, cervical cancer deaths, lung cancer deaths, and prostate cancer deaths. Age-adjusted diabetes death rates for black persons in the United States are approximately twice those for white persons. The number of overall cases of diabetes experienced by American Indians and Alaska Natives are twice that observed in the white non-Hispanic population. Racial and ethnic minorities bear a disproportionate burden of the diabetes epidemic; they have higher prevalence rates, worse diabetes control, and higher rates of complications. Coronary heart death rates and stroke death rates are twice as high for blacks as for the best group, Asian Americans/Pacific Islanders in the Midcourse Review data. Other studies have reported that Hispanics have more vascular disease and worse outcomes when treated for the problem.

An important consideration in thinking about racial/ethnic health disparities is to take social context seriously. Rather than considering racial/ethnic inequalities as brought about by processes internal to ethnic minority groups, the impact of wider social relationships and different historical contexts need to be considered. Issues such as social disadvantages unique to a particular racial/ethnic group in a particular society (for example, the history of institutional racism and discrimination rooted in slavery and experiences while a slave or the period immediately following slavery for African Americans in the United States) may help explain today's health inequalities.

Gender and Health Disparities

Health differences by gender have been studied in sociology for many years. General conclusions are that men report better physical health but die younger than women. The leading causes of death (heart disease, cancer, and stroke) are the same for men and women. Generally, men have more life-threatening chronic diseases such as heart disease, cancer, and kidney disease but women have higher rates of chronic debilitating problems such as arthritis, migraines, gallbladder and thyroid conditions, and more acute conditions such as respiratory infections and gastroenteritis. As with racial/ethnic disparities, the data from the Healthy People 2010 effort and the Midcourse Review data provide some of the most current information. In general, gender differences show less disparity than across racial/ethnic groups. Women have lower death rates for all cancers that occur in both sexes. In heart disease, women have better rates than men for most indicators, including coronary heart disease (CHD) death rate. Differences between men and women are often a complex mix of biological factors and social and structural factors.

In the access area, women have better rates than do men for health insurance, usual primary care provider, and several other indicators, whereas men have better rates for difficulties or delays in obtaining needed health care. In oral health, gender disparities are generally less than 50 percent. In vision health and hearing health, gender differences are also generally less than 50 percent. In physical activity and fitness, there are more gender differences. Men have a more favorable rate for participation in leisure-time physical activity. Among youth, boys in 9th through 12th grades have better rates of engaging in vigorous physical activity, and boys aged 5 to 15 have better rates of walking for transportation.

In substance use areas, women generally are similar to or have better rates than men. Men's rates are at least twice women's rates for alcohol-related motor vehicle deaths, cirrhosis deaths, and adult binge drinking. On tobacco, women have better rates than do men for seven of the eight objectives with significant disparities but initiation of cigarette use for those 12 to 17 years old is 50 percent to 99 percent higher for girls.

Methods Issues in Health Disparities

Measurement issues are important for data about health disparities. This is true both in general and in government disparity reports, which this article has used a great deal. A recent government report by the National Center for Health Statistics, the part of the federal government charged with collection of health-related data, has argued that six important decisions affect disparities data, including selecting a reference point from which to measure disparity, whether to measure disparity in absolute or in relative terms, and deciding whether to consider any inherent ordering of the groups. In conclusion, it is important to recognize that these types of choices can affect the size and direction of disparities reported, and therefore influence conclusions. These are some of the reasons that research on health disparities is complex.

Hegemonic Masculinity

Hegemonic masculinity, or hegemonic masculinities, refers to a particular set of practices and societal norms that are seen as "masculine" and that are dominant in society. Masculinity is the set of norms or expected behaviors and abilities that society prescribes to men. It is not "hardwired" biologically. Antonio Gramsci defined hegemony as winning and retaining power that forms and destroys social groups in the process. Hegemonic masculinity relates to how masculinity constructs dominance and remains in control. This involves persuading a large portion of the population and often appears normal and goes unquestioned. The norms and practices that constitute hegemonic masculinity assist men in maintaining social control. In short, hegemonic masculinity is what it takes to be a "real man" in society. The set of qualities defined as hegemonically masculine varies from place to place, over time, and culturally. Development of the concept of hegemonic masculinity was in response to and critique of literature on the male sex role, which was singular and static.

Hegemonic masculinity is a gender performance. A gender performance implies that gender is not innate or tied to sex characteristics but is a set of expectations held by society and its citizens, and a set of actions by individuals and institutions. The performance of individuals is measured against the hegemonic masculinity ideal. All gendered beings can police and shame gender performances, but those in the dominant position are most expected to police other's gender.

Hegemonic norms come with institutional power and are associated with men in power. Hegemonic masculinities are relational, meaning that they are always compared with other masculinities and all femininities. Emphasized femininities, hegemonic masculinities' counterpart, are seen as the key supporting ideal for women where not challenging hegemonic masculinity but, rather, promoting it are the goals. That women are expected by society to strive for emphasized femininities assists in keeping hegemonic masculinities in control because emphasized femininity focuses on being subordinate to men.

Hegemonic masculinity has historically been somewhat invisible not absent but seen as normative and, hence, natural. Masculinity is often attributed to biological traits, such as testosterone: Men cannot "help it" when they act in the ways of hegemonic masculinities. But variation in masculinities demonstrates that the biological argument does not hold. Gender, or masculinity, is not biological—it is a social construction, meaning that society functions to maintain the status quo and constructs expectations of men (masculinities) and women (femininities). Discussion and critique of masculinity has developed in women's studies, critical men's studies, and sociology, to name a few, as a response to the privileged invisibility of masculinities. This entry discusses several aspects of hegemonic masculinity.

What Do Hegemonic Masculinities Look Like?

Hegemonic masculinity, particularly in Western industrial societies, is heterosexual, aggressive, and competitive. It involves physical strength; economic success; control; exclusive heterosexuality and the search for sexual conquests even if by force; athletic prowess; stoicism and suppression of emotions that convey vulnerability such as empathy, sadness, and the like; and the patrolling of other men's masculinities (as well as women's femininities). These are the characteristics encompassed in being a "real man"—the most honored type of man. Hegemonic masculinity is also exemplified in the white, Christian, and "able-bodied" male body. Violence is an accepted tool in hegemonic masculinity to communicate and maintain masculinity standards to anyone challenging the system. Hegemonic masculinities are associated with contact sports such as football, rugby, and wrestling. It is associated with dangerous, dirty, or high-power jobs such as police officers, coal miners, and executives, and these ideas remain the ideal. These masculinity standards are not static and vary over time and from culture to culture. The two constants are that hegemonic masculinity is interested in maintaining patriarchal control and it is always dominant to other masculinities and all femininities.

Hegemonic Masculinities as an Ideal

Hegemonic masculinities should be seen as the ideal that men in a particular culture at a particular historical time are expected to value. It is an exemplar. The rules of hegemonic masculinities are so stringent and the monitoring and enforcement by society so strict that the quest for hegemonic masculinity is a constant performance. It is also impossible to ever be truly hegemonically masculine, which is why the quest always continues; if being hegemonically masculine were easy, men who pursue it wouldn't feel the need to try so hard to maintain it. The irony of hegemonic masculinity is how fragile a state it is and how susceptible to failure men are when they attempt to embody hegemonic masculinity.

Many men with social power are not ideally masculine—but these men can compensate for that with social power or by additionally emphasizing particular aspects of masculinity that they do embody. For example, a man may be of small stature but highly successful financially in a job with social power. The focus for this man may be to overemphasize his job power and attempt to call attention away from his physical limitation (in the eyes of societal standards). Although true hegemonic masculinity is nearly impossible to achieve, most men gain from its hegemony because they benefit from patriarchy because men in general gain from the overall subordination of women, but all men do not benefit in the same way.

Hierarchy of Masculinities

Multiple masculinities exist in the world. Recognition of a hierarchy of masculinities grew out of gay men's experiences with oppression and violence from heterosexual men. This confirmed a plurality of masculinities and the evidence that all masculinities are not equal. The hierarchy of masculinities has hegemonic masculinity at the top. Also supporting the hierarchy and assisting in patriarchy's continuance are marginalized masculinities such as those of men of color or religious and ethnic minorities. Among men of color, hegemonic masculinities exist, such as machismo for Latino men and the "cool black pose" for black men, though these masculinities are always subordinate to the white patriarchal masculinity. Last on the hierarchy are subordinated masculinities such as homosexual men or transsexual men. But this does not mean that all homosexual men are effeminate. Hegemonic masculinities can be performed by being subordinated as well, partially in compensation for not being exclusively heterosexual, for instance, as the ideal hegemonic masculinity requires. Homosexual men can embody nearly all qualities deemed hegemonically masculine while not being exclusively heterosexual.

How Hegemonic Masculinity Works for and Against Men

Hegemonic masculinity, as it works to uphold and promote patriarchy, benefits men over women. Men and masculinity are associated with qualities needed to be successful in business, athletics, the military, and politics, to name a few, and these institutions are highly valued. Because masculinity is dominant, these qualities come to be seen as dominant and these institutions have been constructed to function with masculine characteristics. The benefits that men in these positions reap assist in maintaining masculine power. Women in these arenas are expected to act masculine if they expect to be equals or to continue with emphasized femininity in an effort to appropriately accommodate hegemonic masculinity. In many instances, women remain second class in these institutions, as do most marginal or subordinated men.

Devaluing nonhegemonic men and women can be seen in the homophobia implicit in many of these institutions, sexual harassment, the glass ceiling, sexist abuse in athletics and the military, and essentializing of gender used as a way to hold women back, in addition to much more. Hegemonically, masculine men may pay a price as well. Although they are expected to be the breadwinners in the home and to have a focus outside of the house, they may miss emotional contact and time with the family. They may be encouraged to take risks or focus on profits at all costs, and this can have real health effects such as hypertension and other stress-related conditions, which may be worsened by the expectation of working through pain rather than asking for help or seeking medical attention. Although these men may constantly police the gender performance of others, they also must maintain their own and this is not a simple task. To always control emotion, be successful, try to maintain power, avoid intimacy, and so forth requires constant work. Because the gender performance is assumed to be natural (biological), society assumes that it does not require work and that maintenance is a natural tendency. Hegemonic masculinity, although one version of a script to success in a patriarchal society, is also toxic—to the men who must maintain hegemonic masculinity, as well as to the women and men left in its wake.

Hegemonic Masculinity and Women

Hegemonic masculinity is a relational approach to gender. When studying gender, researchers explain that it is important to keep the focus on men and women in how they construct gender for men. Even though patriarchal society is seen as subordinating women, women are integral to the system of hegemonic masculinity. Most men and women are in many ways complicit in support of hegemonic masculinity, helping to keep the powerful in power.

HETEROSEXUALITY

Heterosexuality is largely defined as attraction to the opposite sex, although the most rigid definitions of the word demand an attraction to the opposite gender as well. Despite compelling empirical studies and philosophical examinations suggesting that bisexuality is a more apt model of human attraction than is heterosexuality, individuals in most cultures identify as either heterosexual or in a homosexual identity category (for example, lesbian, gay, bisexual, or queer). Most people declare and enact a straight, heterosexual identity; even if individuals engage in sexual behavior involving a partner or partners of the same sex, most report that they still consider themselves to be heterosexual because they are primarily attracted to persons of the opposite sex and gender. Because of the dominance of heterosexuality, those labeled as heterosexual (collectively referred to as heterosexuals) are often only labeled as such to acknowledge or designate that they are not gay or lesbian (homosexual) or attracted to both sexes (bisexual). The expectation of heterosexuality, combined with systems created to benefit heterosexual institutions, has created a world in which many find it difficult to imagine sexual options beyond heterosexuality. This entry describes various aspects of heterosexuality, such as heteronormativity, relationships, compulsory heterosexuality, masculinity, female sexuality, and the family.

Heteronormativity

Heteronormativity refers to enforced cultural assumptions that heterosexuality is normal and natural for all people. Researchers and activists have extended the term to acknowledge and criticize the systemic accommodation and privileging of heterosexual people. For instance, marriage is largely seen (and frequently institutionally restricted) as a heterosexual institution in which only people of opposite sexes may exchange vows. Marriage is a readily apparent example of heteronormativity; sometimes heteronormativity is more subtle. For example, fictive movie and television programs often feature male-female couplings with a clearly masculine man pursuing a clearly feminine woman. Such pairings confirm viewers' expectations that romantic and idealized heterosexual couples feature strong masculine and highly feminine figures.

Heteronormativity's dominance is evident in the ease with which many people transport the lens outside the world of human interaction into other domains. Social scientific research has demonstrated that people will often impose a heteronormative frame upon situations that do not support it. For example, in one study, researchers asked people to view films of animals at play. When researchers asked participants to describe what they saw, people—regardless of age or sex—frequently assigned sex and gender roles to the animals based upon the way the animals behaved while at play. These sex and gender roles extended to heterosexual assumptions: The participants frequently identified pairs of animals as couples, with one labeled the male love interest and the other female love interest. The animals depicted in the films were all of the same sex. Sex and gender expectations—particularly expectations of heterosexuality—shaped how the viewers saw the film.

Heterosexuality is automatically assumed for most humans as well. Unless a person comes out as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or another nonstraight sexual orientation, then he or she will usually be perceived as heterosexual. This is especially true when opposite sex persons are seen together. If male and female teenagers are shopping together in the mall, others assume heterosexual identity and that the two have a romantic attraction—even if the couple denies an interest in each other. Only age differences and physical resemblance (suggesting kin relationships) undermine the assumption of heterosexual coupling placed on two opposite sex individuals. Even then, people may wonder whether or not the couple is romantically linked or if they form a different type of relationship.

Heteronormativity and the Study of Relationships

Heteronormativity is routinely viewed through the lens of relationships. This makes sense, given that the label is primarily used to designate one's sexual attraction. Social scientists have long studied heterosexual relationships, chronicling detailed understandings of these relationships in academic journals and textbooks. Understandings of the differences between heterosexual and homosexual relationships, however, remain superficial because much relationship research ignores issues of sexual orientation and assumes participants' heterosexuality. Recent research on nonheteronormative relationships challenges this nearly exclusive heterosexual lens. Interestingly enough, as researchers learn more about nonheterosexual phenomena, a stronger understanding of heterosexuality has emerged. This plays into the common claim that heterosexuality is often defined by what it is not (rather than what it actually is).

Compulsory Heterosexuality

Given the seemingly ubiquitous nature of heterosexuality and its dominance in influencing social institutions, many critics have questioned whether the heteronormative nature of most cultures is a healthy one. This question is particularly crucial to considering the voices that such a culture excludes and the personal anguish that such a culture may cause to both heterosexual and nonheterosexual individuals. As noted earlier in this entry, heterosexual labels primarily designate one's sexual attraction, but the implications surrounding the label often extend beyond sexual power to gender norms and expectations. Heteronormativity is so dominant that many who study sexuality have employed the phrase compulsory heterosexuality to describe the way people gravitate toward a heterosexual identity. The term emerges from the work of Adrienne Rich, who wrote of compulsory heterosexuality in the context of women's lives and lesbian existence.

Though Rich insisted that, given sexism, compulsory heterosexuality had particular consequences for women, many have explored the experience and consequences of compulsory heterosexuality beyond the lives of women. In these discussions, compulsory heterosexuality is commonly defined as the ingrained notion that the only option in society is to be straight. That is, heterosexuality is so successfully established as normal and natural in everyday communication that the notion of homosexuality does not easily exist in the minds of most people, especially as a sexual orientation for oneself. The expectation of heterosexuality, combined with systems that value and benefit heterosexual expression, has created a world where it is hard for many to imagine that options other than heterosexuality exist. For someone to not see herself or himself as heterosexual is equated with lack of personal development, as going through a phase, as confusion, or even as insanity.

Strongly linked to compulsory heterosexuality is the assumption that men and boys must enact masculine roles and that women and girls must enact feminine roles, especially because the performance of gender roles is inextricably linked to the assumption that individuals are naturally heterosexual. Although sex and gender are two separate and distinct concepts, people often treat them as if they are the same. When a male does not enact masculinity, or a female does not enact femininity, then individuals notice this behavior and acknowledge the gender violations by offering feedback, whether intentional or unintentional, verbal or nonverbal. For example, when one man notices another man enacting feminine behavior, he may call the other an anti-queer pejorative such as

"fag" or "sissy." In doing so, he likely is not asserting that the other person is gay; rather, he is likely asserting that the other person is violating expected gender norms. The choice of language, however, speaks to heterosexuality and heteronormativity. "Fag" and other anti-queer pejoratives are inherently linked to sexual orientation—even if not directly used that way. In practical and symbolic terms, such pejoratives elucidate the subtle connections between sex, gender, and sexuality as they intersect with language and nonverbal communication to form a culture that enforces compulsory heterosexuality.

Masculinity and Heterosexuality

Although masculinity and femininity provide the building blocks for many cultural norms and rituals, heteronormative and otherwise, masculinity is especially protected as a male domain and lauded as superior set of gender characteristics. Although most cultures have began to assimilate masculine and feminine identities, this blurring of gender lines has played out differently for each of the gender roles. Women, as feminine figures, have been allowed to enact more masculine roles than in previous generations, especially in Western culture. Women who encroach too much upon these masculine liberties, however, often receive warning that their behavior and self-presentation are not acceptable; these warnings take the form of, for example, pejorative name calling and gendered violence, including rape. Even though men have also begun to employ behaviors and practices conventionally considered feminine, men do not have the same freedom to enjoy feminine characterizations as women have to enjoy the masculine. Ironically, women's greater freedom reflects the devaluing of femininity.

The protection of masculinity has played out in many ways, crossing even into legal domains. Laws making it illegal for two individuals to engage in sodomy, for instance, were common in the United States before the 2003 Supreme Court ruling in Lawrence v. Texas. Such laws prevented a man from enacting the passive, femininelike role of receiving anal sex. Few laws existed, however, preventing women from engaging in same-sex activity. Additionally, in traditionally masculine domains such as the military, rules such as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" allow a heteronormative environment to thrive and protect a conventionally masculine space. Even such entertainment arenas as sports remain highly masculine, with men's sporting events and institutions receiving much greater attention and resources than those for women players and spectators.

Masculinity is almost inherently linked with heterosexual identity. For instance, masculinity and straightness share a common vocabulary that excludes highly expressive words, discussion of emotion, or heightened displays of affection. Male talk—and so therefore masculine talk, and so therefore straight talk—frequently includes discussions of sports, tools, machinery, or the weather, and, in a heteronormative vocabulary, it should not encroach upon such feminine topics as gardening, fashion, or soap operas—at least, not without a proper and exceptional situation or context. Many men report that they feel limited by the conversations they are allowed to have; they point out that this often causes them mental anguish or extreme frustration. This is but one example of how heterosexual masculinity may play out in unhealthy ways for those confined by it.

Other problems with heterosexual masculinity play out through systems developed around heterosexual dominance. Because males remain privileged in most social systems, the demonstration of their masculinity easily violates the rights and comfort of women. One example is sexual harassment. Men who sexually harass women are not the workplace norm, and many institutions have established policies that help protect women (and men) from sexually harassment. Nevertheless, many feminists note that cultural indicators in many workplaces indirectly support sexual harassment and make it difficult for women to come forth with claims, especially because the enactment of a man sexually harassing a woman conforms to heterosexual expectations and practices. That is, heterosexual tradition has long deemed men leaders in their domains, thus allowing them power through which they can assert authority with little question or critique. Women are easily pursued and harassed by men, then, because men feel free to be sexually assertive in a male-dominated, heteronormative world. To better understand this, one must consider the role of female sexuality in a heteronormative world.

Female Sexuality

Ultimately, heterosexuality represents societal expectations for the sexual pairing of men and women. Theoretically, this could be an egalitarian arrangement in which women's and men's sexuality and gender are on equal terms and the sexual behavior fully consensual. The reality, however, is that women in heterosexual relationships are often the objects of men, and their sexuality is supplementary to men's wishes and desires. The heterosexual relationship is one in which men are both free to explore their sexuality without backlash or warning from other members of the culture, and free to assert their gaze upon females. Women, then, are expected to play into these roles, serving as the pursued responding to the man in pursuit. This helps explain why women's clothes are often tighter and feature low cuts, why makeup and accessories are more prominent with women, and why men frequently make the first move in heterosexual relationships.

Although it is far from equal to male sexuality, female sexuality in heterosexual systems and relationships is beginning to transform; women are beginning to enjoy some of the freedoms previously reserved for men. Women who pursue sexual relationships outside of marital institutions experience less shame and stigma, and both news-oriented and fictive media representations increasingly portray women as sexual creatures outside of the confines of male-dictated pleasure. Far beyond these freedoms are the liberties that women can now enjoy as the conditions of heterosexual relationships change. Women who sought divorce were once outcast and condemned to a life of solitude, even when leaving relationships in which their husbands had verbally abused, beaten, or raped them. Women now have greater freedom to divorce without social stigma. Women also report feeling less pressure to marry or have children, something that many would have considered unacceptable just 50 years ago.

Heteronormativity and the Family

Heteronormativity has had a profound influence on the institution of the family. For generations, most of Western culture has viewed families traditionally, with a father, mother, and children living together, supporting one another, and sharing resources. As heterosexual norms have changed, so too have family structures. Families are now less traditional, with research suggesting that family units consisting of single-parent households, same-sex parents, or homes without children functioning in ways much like traditional families. Current political discourse emphasizes family structures and the maintenance of systems that allow families to thrive. However, what constitutes a family is the subject of heated debate.

The Potential to Be Heterosexual

Unlike most minority categories, where individuals are perceived to be unable to change their features to join another identity category, those who do not identify as heterosexual are sometimes considered able to choose heterosexuality and to ignore their same-sex attractions. Although most psychologists dismiss the possibility of changing one's sexual orientation, this has not quieted views that sexual orientation is open to negotiation. The strong web of heteronormativity has meant that this belief in negotiation applies only to homosexual desire and behaviors and not to heterosexual relationships. Interestingly, because heterosexuality is so easily assumed, many who do feel as if they are lesbian, gay, transgendered, or bisexual can easily conceal their nonheterosexual orientations or gender identities and remain in the closet.

Intersexuality and Bisexuality

Discussions of heterosexuality and heteronormativity often completely ignore intersexual and bisexual individuals. Intersexed persons, or persons who biologically exhibit characteristics of both sexes, often report feeling that they must choose a male or female sex role to adhere to the demands of society. Often the sex role enacted is influenced by sexual orientation, with the individual identifying as female if generally attracted to males and as male if generally attracted to females. Intersexuality is largely unrecognized in most cultures.

Bisexuality is ignored in most cultures, too, with most individuals identifying or being perceived as either lesbian/gay or heterosexual. Further, most people will self-identify in homosexual categories (gay, lesbian) or as heterosexual (straight) even when they harbor attractions to the same sex. This has caused many to question whether heterosexuality or homosexuality truly exist or if they are categories constructed in a society that is uncomfortable with fluidity and that demands rigid understandings. Research surveys have repeatedly demonstrated that those who do not fall into either heterosexual or homosexual categories are often perceived as not being trustworthy and that those who were perceived as heterosexual were noted by those participating in the surveys as the most trustworthy of all. Research also indicates that those not fitting into the opposite categories of homosexual and heterosexual generate unease, and heterosexual identities are the most comfortable for interaction.

Conclusion

Heterosexuality is interweaved into many cultural practices and coexists with many other gendered institutions. Although heterosexuality is often defined by what it is not, it is evident that what it is allows for much thought about how sex, gender, and sexuality play out in cultures.

Heterosexual Privilege

Heterosexual privilege, or straight privilege, refers to the rights and unearned advantages bestowed on heterosexuals in society. Heterosexual privilege, like many other forms of privilege, is often invisible to its recipients; heterosexuals benefit from these advantages and are usually unaware of their privileged position relative to their sexual orientation. This entry examines heterosexual privilege by reviewing how the scholarship on privilege developed, first with race and gender and, more recently, sexuality. Then, the entry continues with a discussion of individual and institutional forms of heterosexual privilege and compulsory heterosexuality. Finally, the entry concludes with a brief discussion of intersectionality as a further means for understanding how advantages based upon sexual orientation are interlocked with other forms of social inequalities.

Privilege

Privilege refers to the advantage bestowed upon one group that is denied to others because of group membership. Traditionally, studies of social inequality have focused on the oppressed status of a minority group. However, focusing only on discrimination is not a complete picture. As one group is discriminated against, another group occupies a privileged, dominant status enjoying access to goods, services, or even an acceptance that other social groups do not posses. Understanding privilege is about understanding unearned institutionalized entitlements and advantages.

Gender and Race

A plethora of scholarship exists on how privilege is gendered. Many scholars who study privilege have used a concept to help explain its nuances first popularized by Peggy McIntosh, "the invisible knapsack." As a feminist scholar, she noted how she had long seen males bestowed a special status simply because of their gender. She argued that this privileged group was almost completely oblivious to these rewards. They carried this "knapsack" full of the tools and resources that enable its owner to succeed more easily than can a person or persons without the knapsack. The owner of the knapsack may recognize that others are disadvantaged yet the acknowledgment of how one's privileges are related to another's lack of privileges is a difficult concession for many to make.

Yet, scholarly interest did not end at examining gender's place in privilege. Many scholars have argued that privilege extends to race as well, and whites are the beneficiaries. This advantage is obvious to those who do not have it, yet it is invisible to those who possess it. One's status as a member of the dominant group affords the person opportunities or entitlements that a person in another group cannot count on being available. McIntosh created a list of 50 items of the privileges that she enjoyed as a white person, some of which included having the ease and ability to surround herself with people who looked like her if and when she wanted (in person and on television), the likelihood that the curriculum in her children's school would positively speak to their cultural heritage, and the simple fact that purchasing products for her hair was commonplace or knowing that when she found a product with a color named "skin color" that it would match her skin tone.

Sexual Orientation

The importance of the knapsack is its applicability in studying other forms of privilege, such as heterosexual privilege. The persons who unknowingly benefit from being members of a dominant group perceive their situation as the normal way society functions. Heterosexuals benefit from heterosexual social unions being seen as standard and legitimate. This normalization of heterosexuality is privileged above other sexual orientations. Sexuality is understood to encompass sexual attitudes, behaviors, and desires. Some scholars argue that human sexuality is innate whereas others view sexual orientation, like gender, as socially constructed. Regardless of where one stands in this debate, it is difficult to deny the power the dominant group has at both individual and institutional levels when gauging privilege as it relates to sexual orientation.

Individual and Institutional Forms of Heterosexual Privilege

Heterosexual privilege plays out at the individual and institutional levels. At the individual level, heterosexual privilege can take the form of homophobia. Homophobia is the fear and hatred of homosexuals or their lifestyle, often regarding those who deviate from the heterosexual norm as sick or evil. What homophobia induces is the need to prove that one does not have same-sex desires by displaying hostility toward homosexuals. Research has examined homophobia as it relates to hegemonic masculinity. Individually, a heterosexual will not endure stares and ridicule if he kisses his partner in public nor should she have problems finding an appropriate card for her husband for Valentine's Day and will not be asked what caused her heterosexuality or if his heterosexuality is just a phase. Homosexuals and bisexuals do not experience these privileges and endure even more constraining situations because of the institutional nature of heterosexual privilege.

If homophobia refers to the individual fears or actions of persons who oppose any nonheterosexual relations, heterosexism can be used to describe the institutional level of discrimination that homosexuals and bisexuals face. As racism refers to discrimination against those who are not a particular race, heterosexism is the stigmatization of any nonheterosexual behavior, identity, or relationship. Some examples of institutionalized privilege include the legal acknowledgement of a heterosexual couple's right to marry, the recognition of familial relation for health insurance or when a partner is in the emergency room, the lack of doubt in a heterosexual's ability to be a good influence and parent to adopt or gain custody of children from a previous relationship, and the most dramatic form of privilege is the dominant's group nonexistent need to fear being persecuted in anything resembling a hate crime for his sexual orientation. These privileges are rarely regarded as unearned advantages or entitlements to those who possess them; as are racial and gender privilege, heterosexual privilege often goes unacknowledged and is accepted as the norm, the way things are.

Heteronormativity

Michael Warner first coined the term heteronormativity referring to the idea that heterosexuality is deemed the legitimate form of sexual union and, moreover, is expected. Heterosexuality is taken for granted and is universalized. It is regarded as the norm and moral way to be and carries with it such pressures that some nonheterosexuals may not feel comfortable publicly acknowledging their sexual preference. Societal expectations or standards are reinforced with rules and structures. Rules may take the form of formal (with the enactment of laws) or may be informal (social norms) that exist to maintain heterosexual privilege, or heterosexism. Heteronormative laws that seek to validate only heterosexual sexual relations include the criminalization of homosexuality in some societies, the creation of a parallel institution for marriage, civil unions, to protect the privileges of marriage for the union of a man and a woman, and sodomy laws.

Compulsory Heterosexuality

Adrienne Rich, who wrote on the pressure to be or appear to be heterosexual, has examined one of the informal rules, referring to this societal force as "compulsory heterosexuality." In developing this concept, she referred to compulsory heterosexuality as a set of arrangements, both institutional and cultural, that reward people for being or appearing to be heterosexual. The other side to this is what she called the lack of privileges or punishments for being or appearing to be anything other than heterosexual. A punishment for those who are not heterosexual could be experienced as a form of homophobia or heterosexism depending on the situation.

Punishment based upon heteronormative standards or the idea of compulsory heterosexuality can be overt or covert and can take the form of physical violence. One of the most well-known cases of overt punishment for someone who did not conform to expectations of being heterosexual and was stigmatized based on his sexual orientation is the terrible hate crime against Matthew Shepard in October 1998. Matthew was a college student who was pistol-whipped and tied to a fence in Laramie, Wyoming, then left for dead in the freezing night. Six days later, he died. Many other cases of horrendous acts of violent crime have been reported since the Shepard case; typically, both the victim and perpetrators are male.

Intersectionality

Intersectionality is a theory used by sociologists and feminist scholars seeking to understand how systems of sexual orientation, race, social class, gender, age, and ethnicity are interrelated and work together. Sociologist Patricia Hill Collins has written extensively on this subject and argues that each of these social categories has multiple implications on the levels of inequality in society. This matrix of oppression or interlocking system of privilege complicates the study of inequality by identifying how understandings of sexual orientation or inequalities based on race or class are influenced by gender. At an individual level, intersectionality is used to explain how any one person can simultaneously experience privilege based on membership in the dominant group of any of the social categories and oppression because of another group status. Intersectionality does not refer to an additive approach to the study of social inequalities; that is, one cannot calculate her or his level of privilege or oppression based on a scale or using numbers. The strength of this theory lies in its ability to account for different experiences of social beings, who never are members of just one group (for example, lesbian) but who experience life with complex identities affected by membership in various social groups. For instance, a person who may experience privilege because of her or his high social class or membership in the dominant race may experience oppression because of gender, race, or sexual orientation. This entry focuses solely on sexual orientation to establish a general understanding of heterosexual privilege in society; however, useful scholarship on the study of privilege and oppression examines how sexual orientation plays out in multilayered studies of social inequality.

Conclusion

Heterosexual privilege is a concept that helps us to understand one aspect of inequality that is related to sexual orientation. As interaction scholars argue, heterosexual privilege is intricately tied to understandings and expectations of sexuality and gender. Sexuality is understood to encompass sexual attitudes, behaviors, and desires. Other forms of social categories can be studied at both individual and structural levels, and so can sexuality.

Hijra/Hejira

Hijras are often referred to as India's "third sex," and they have become the subjects of numerous scholarly works in recent times. Hijras are born males (sometimes hermaphrodite or intersexed) who perform their sexual identity as female. Many adult hijras have undergone nirvan surgery (castration operation) as adults. Hijras wear female clothing such as saris, grow their hair long, pluck facial hair, wear lots of jewelry and makeup, and adopt exaggerated female body language. They dance and sing (known as badhai) at weddings and childbirth celebrations because they are believed to possess special powers to grant fertility and prosperity to a new couple or new baby. Many hijras are also involved in sex work. Because hijra identity is complex in its performance and social significance, terms such as transgender, transvestite, and homosexual prove inadequate to describe them. This entry describes hijras' social organization and history, as well as scholarly interest in hijras.

Social Organization and History

Hijras have played a significant role in Indian culture for many centuries. Several Sanskrit and Pali texts refer variously to the existence of the "third sex" and some scholars have proved the existence of hijras in precolonial and pre-Islamic India. The word hijra is believed to be an Urdu term and suggests that hijra culture and identity evolved during the Delhi Sultanate and the Mughal Empire in India where eunuchs served as confidants, political advisors, and guardians of the harem. During the British colonial period, hijras were classified as a separate caste or tribe because of their distinctive social organization and occupational identity, but they were also identified as a "criminal caste," placed under surveillance and regulation, and arrested under Article 377 of the Indian Penal code, which prohibits sodomy. In contemporary India, hijras are both venerated because of the special powers attributed to them and denigrated because of their transgressive sexual practices.

Hijras have a unique social organization. They are organized according to seven houses, which are symbolic descent groups through which each member traces her genealogy. Each of these symbolic houses contains many households in which hijras live communally and share their incomes and household responsibilities. Each descent house in a region is headed by a nayak (a leader) and has gurus (spiritual leaders) and celas (disciples). The nayaks form a council for governance and arbitration of disputes. The nayaks meet from time to time nationally to decide on policy or to celebrate an event of great significance. Each region's nayaks also form a council called a jamat that works to solve regional issues. Hijras live in family units with gurus, share their income within the family, and support one another economically. Hijras are initiated into their houses by sponsoring gurus and seniority is an important aspect of hijra social organization. Gurus and celas have a parent-child relationship where gurus are responsible for the well-being of their disciples and the disciples owe obedience and loyalty to their gurus. Through the guru-cela relationship, hijras form a web of kinship including "sisters," "aunts," and "grandmothers." Some hijras get married and take husbands and live with them. These husbands may sometimes be men who identify as heterosexual and have a wife and children but also take a hijra for a wife. Hijras with husbands may have a separate household but still connect to their symbolic house of descent for their social needs.

Most hijras earn their living through performances at weddings, childbirths, and other auspicious occasions. Some hijras also take to begging and coerce money from shopkeepers and traders by threatening to embarrass them and their customers with public displays of their altered genitalia. Many hijras also make money through prostitution although they staunchly deny this component of their economic life to ethnographers.

Hijras identify themselves as Islamic and many perform the hajj to Mecca and assume Muslim names. They also worship at the tombs of Muslim mystics along with other Indian Muslims and celebrate Islamic holidays. However, hijras also maintain Hindu practices, especially in the worship of Bahuchara Mata or Bedhraj Mata, their prime goddess who is thought of as the incarnation of the mother goddess. Worship of the goddess is especially important to hijras before and after their castration surgery. The nirvan surgery with its attending rituals and ceremonies that mimic Hindu rituals at childbirth is the most important event in a hijra's life. These risky and painful surgeries, although illegal, are performed by sympathetic medical personnel or by a daimaa (midwife).

Hijras also worship Lord Shiva as ardhanarisvara (an incarnation in which Shiva is represented as embodying both male and female principles). Several Hindu temples including the Yellamma temple in Hyderabad, the Koothandavar temple in Tamil Nadu, and the Bahuchara Mata temple in Gujarat are sacred sites for hijras. Some hijras describe themselves as sannyasis (ascetics who have renounced worldly desires) because by being castrated they have transcended sexual desire. Therefore, to be a hijra is not just a person's sexual or gendered identity but also an occupational and spiritual identity.

Scholarly Discussions

There is much scholarly interest among academics especially in the West regarding hijras. Many scholars have studied hijras and framed their discussions within a global discourse of transgressive sexuality and resistance to sexual categorization. Scholars such as Serena Nanda and Zia Jaffrey have done extensive ethnographic work amongst hijras. More recent scholarship such as that of Gayatri Reddy and Vinay Lal has questioned the categories through which scholars construct knowledge of hijras. Reddy challenges the overwhelming use of sexuality as the sole scholarly lens to study hijras and argues that hijras see themselves through a more complex lens than just sexuality and that their identity is complicated by location, work, class, and religion. Hijras have also been subjects of film including documentaries such as Bombay Eunuch (2000) and Indian popular films such as Bombay (1995). Hijras have also been featured in such fiction as Leslie Forbes's Bombay Ice (1998) and P. Mann's Season of the Monsoon (1992). Although stereotypes of hijras abound both in daily Indian life and in Indian popular culture, rigorous scholarship proves that hijras and their lives offer different and alternative ways to understand sexuality, gender, and social organization.

HIP-HOP/RAP

Hip-hop is a cultural movement started by African Americans and Latinos in the context of urban renewal, economic changes, and social dislocations in the mid-1970s South Bronx, New York City. The emergent culture incorporated several artistic activities, referred to as elements, that include emceeing (rapping), DJing, break dancing, and graffiti art. Today rap music receives the lion's share of attention by researchers even though hip-hop culture has expanded its global reach and scope to include journalism, activism, film, spoken word, fashion, literature, and advertising. This entry explores the ways hip-hop studies and gender studies have converged, and how hip-hop culture deals with homosexuality, and the development of a new type of hip-hop feminism.

Hip-Hop and Gender Studies

The nascent scholarship in rap music arose primarily from the interdisciplinary field of black studies in the early 1990s. Houston Baker, Tricia Rose, Michael Dyson, and Robin Kelley as well as journalists such as Nelson George provided largely textual and cultural analyses of the genesis, themes, images, and cultural politics of rap music. These foundational works revealed hip-hop as a social and cultural movement deeply embedded with power relations of race, class, group identity, and representation, yet, with the exception of Rose's work, scholarship on rap music has primarily focused on men and their artistry, performance, and subjectivity. One of the early interventions in the gender politics of rap music focused on the inclusion of women as active agents and performers. Cultural workers, filmmakers, and scholars have inserted women into rap history by exploring the sociohistorical role of women rappers, textual analyses of their lyrics, biographical sketches, and backgrounds of famous female rappers, and the role of hip-hop culture in the everyday expressive practices of women in the culture. Scholars such as Christina Veran and Nancy Guevara posit women rappers such as Salt-N-Pepa, Monie Love, Queen Latifah, and M. C. Lyte as key players in the development of the genre. The everyday practices of female DJs, b-girls, producers, and rappers in hip-hop are explored in a 1993 documentary by Rachel Raimist titled Nobody Knows My Name, and the popular urban hip-hop magazine Vibe published a book titled Hip-Hop Divas in 2000 that focuses exclusively on the herstories of hip-hop.

The privileging of men in the study of hip-hop reflects the gendered ways in which mass culture is framed in society generally. In this schema, women associated with popular culture are perceived as consumers rather than as producers and are viewed as engaging with the culture in more passive (feminine) ways. In contrast, men are associated with high culture, production, and the ability to sustain the intellectual and creative work needed as artists. Subsequently, women's labor, creative presence, and innovations are neglected, ignored, or deemed less distinguished than is that of their male counterparts. Similarly, the history of hip-hop writ large is about black men, and the inclusion of women artists' challenges the myth of their absence and the hegemonic construction of rap as a masculinized public sphere and performance.

Gwendolyn D. Pough, a third-wave black feminist, argues that hip-hop culture and rap music allows black women's experiences to be publicly heard and provides a platform and voice for renegotiating the ways in which they are represented in the world of hip-hop. In her seminal book titled Black Noise, Rose provides a textual analysis of the dialogical qualities of rap music as a public script in which black women "talk back" to men. Yet, the presence of female rappers may subvert but does not necessarily reconstruct gendered division of labor or overcome dominant gender ideologies in the culture. Recording studios are male-dominated spaces with bonding rituals and practices that continue to exclude women. Sexist notions of success and authenticity have meant that over the years female rappers have had to deploy a variety of strategies to earn respect and sell records in the male-dominated world of hip-hop where authenticity ("keeping it real" in rap parlance) is constructed in the hypermasculine terms of aggression, domination, competition, heterosexism, and the ability to exert control over others. During hip-hop's first decade, female rappers, graffiti artists, and DJs in hip-hop culture frequently subdued their sexuality because displays of femininity would undermine their talent or create the strong possibility of sexually "soiling" their reputation.

Through its various genres, rap privileges particular forms of masculinity that are exclusively heterosexual, thus subordinating other forms of masculinity and constructing femininity in narrow, often sexist and misogynist ways. In the mid- to late 1980s, the slew of black nationalist rappers such as Public Enemy, X Clan, Brand Nubian, and, later, Ice Cube, conjured models of black liberation based on a militant black manhood, providing searing criticisms of race but reinforcing the hierarchal discourses of gender politics of black nationalism that historically reinforces sexism and homophobia and places women in subsidiary roles for the "upliftment" of black men. In the late 1980s and 1990s, the sexual and cultural politics of black masculinity and its normative gendered codes came under unprecedented public scrutiny with the commercialization and popularity of gangsta rap, which privileges gangs, guns, and ghettos in its lyricism, demeanor, and claims to authenticity. Some scholars posit that these lyrics function as an oppositional text that provides social commentaries on racism, police brutality, and the economic isolation of the postindustrial ghetto. For others, gangsta rap is little more than the commercial packaging of hypermasculine tropes of black rage for white consumption, (who constitute the largest consumers of the genre), catering to familiar and exaggerated stereotypes about "outlaw" black men as criminal, violent, and misogynistic and black women as promiscuous.

Other scholars such as Robin Kelley and Eithne Quinn emphasize the perfomativity of black masculinity by locating their textual analyses to previous black "baadman" tropes of black masculinity in African American vernacular and expressive cultures, highlighting how constructions of black masculinity are literary and expressive devices opposing both white racism and prevailing black middle-class notions of propriety. Examining the gender politics of gangsta rap through the intersections of race, class, sexuality, and gender, black feminists face the challenge of criticizing the sexual politics of rap music while unveiling the broader contours of patriarchy and misogyny in mainstream American culture. Many argue that gangsta rap reinforces social conservative values and attitudes toward gender issues and women even as it speaks to the gender oppression of black heterosexual males under white supremacy and capitalism.

Hip-Hop and Homosexuality

In 1991, Ice Cube declared, "True niggaz ain't gay," a sentiment that continues. In a recent article of the heteronormative construction of rap music, Vincent Stephen argues Eminem is a genderphobe rather than a homophobe because his lyrics use homophobic language to criticize gender behavior, rather than sexual orientation. The performance of masculinity within the gay community of hip-hop fans commonly described as "homothugs" is, as the gay rapper Casushan noted in an interview, "a homosexual who is not easily identifiable as one." The emergent literature on this segment of rap fans reveals that their performance of masculinity consistently conforms to the same heteronormative manners and behaviors as their heterosexual counterparts. Female rappers who do not confirm to male heterosexist expectations or behavior run the risk of having epithets hurled at them, losing their legitimacy and record sales, or having their same-sex sexual preferences, couplings, and desires accommodated into the heterosexist imagination of the male gaze (such as ménage à trois)

Hip-Hop Feminism

In the 1990s, the gender politics of women rappers such as Lil' Kim or Foxy Brown elicited heated debates. Their sexually explicit raps and image are perceived by some scholars as reinscribing the dominate ideologies that Patricia Hill Collins describes as controlling images of black women that are tied to hegemonic constructions of black female subordination and sexuality that make them appear to be "naturally" sexually accessible and available. Other scholars highlight the resistive qualities of female rappers, arguing that like the blues before it, rap enables black female rappers to recuperate and revise dominant discourses of sexuality by redeploying masculine tropes such as sexual freedom or transactional sex as well as flaunting the cultural credos of black female respectability (prevalent in the presentation of self for many African American women in response to the historical construction and stereotypes about them). In her book, Check It While I Wreck It: Black Womanhood, Hip-Hop Culture, and the Public Sphere, Pough provides a historical overview of black feminist scholars engaged with hip-hop's gender politics. Briefly, she recounts how feminist scholars deal with the construction of female images and women's resistance to stereotypes; the way rap is used to respond publicly to sexism and other body and sexual politics; the subversion of male tropes to articulate their concerns and viewpoints; and the linkages of hip-hop to black women's and men's forms of play, expressive cultures, and every lives.

Conclusion

In the 21st century, scholarship on the gender politics in hip-hop has emerged as an important site of study. It signals an expansion from focusing on artists and the production of rap music to examining the impact on rap's consumers, particularly young black consumers. As global technologies disseminate rap music in a visually heightened popular culture, where strip clubs, strippers, and pornography have become more mainstream in popular culture in general, the presence of females, particularly black, has expanded beyond their presence on the microphone to so-called video vixens and strippers whose bodies are displayed for the pleasure of men and who can be bought or possessed according to the monetary largess of the rappers. Third-wave black feminists argue the current gender politics of rap has profoundly adversely affected the gender socialization, intimate relations, and sense of self. The few studies focusing on the consumption of music videos generally, and rap and rhythm and blues specifically, largely conclude that the sexual violence, beauty standards, politics of colorism, and the transactional nature of intimate relations particularly negatively affect the psychological and sexual health of young black men and women. One of the largest empirical studies by the Motivational Educational Entertainment Corporations in 2004, titled This Is My Reality, concluded that that the relationship between rap music and sexual attitudes, especially of black listeners to hip-hop, adversely affects sexual health decisions and attitudes. Another ethnographic study exploring black male and female relationships of the hip-hop generation found that many black men value economic resources and use them as a means to control and manipulate women. The images of females on rap videos lead some young women to feel they have to conform to the exploitative images of women shown in rap videos to get material goods, love, or attention.

HIRSCHFELD, MAGNUS (1868–1935)

Born in 1868 to Jewish parents in Kolberg, a Prussian town on the Baltic coast, Magnus Hirschfeld became an important theorist of sexuality and the most prominent advocate of homosexual emancipation at the beginning of the 20th century. He first studied modern languages and then medicine, obtaining his degree in 1892. His sexology research was empirically and activist directed, permeated by the belief that the sexuality ideology of Judeo-Christian civilization was a serious obstacle to the understanding of sexuality and to the reform of laws and practices that regulated it. In 1897, Hirschfeld established, together with Max Spohr, Franz Josef von Bülow, and Eduard Oberg, the Scientific Humanitarian Committee, the world's first gay rights organization. Its goal was to fight for the abolishment of the anti-homosexual paragraph 175 in the German law that punished sexual contact between men. Hirschfeld believed that scientific understanding of sexuality would promote tolerance of sexual minorities. In 1899, he started the Yearbook of Intermediate Sexual Types, the first journal in the world to deal with sexual variants, which was regularly published until 1923. He developed the theory that all human beings are intersexual variants, each individual possessing different proportions of masculinity and femininity, and these proportions changed during one's lifetime. The main idea was that there were no discrete sexual categories, but that human sexuality was in a constant flux, with potentially an infinite number of sexual constitutions.

Hirschfeld did huge statistical surveys on homosexuality, and in 1914, he published his study Homosexuality in Men and Women. One year earlier, with Iwan Bloch and Heinrich Körber, he founded the Medical Society for Sexual Science and Eugenics. In addition to publishing on sexology and sexual reforms, Hirschfeld also wrote about racism, politics, and the history of morals. In 1919 he opened the first sexology institute in the world in Berlin, the Institute for Sexual Science, which was destroyed by the Nazis in 1933, together with its huge library and archive. In the same year he established the institute, Hirschfeld also participated in the production of the first homosexual liberation film Different from the Others. Within a year, the film was banned by the German government. In 1928, Hirschfeld founded the World League for Sexual Reform, which called for reform of sex legislations, the right to contraception and sex education, and legal and social equality of the sexes. Being both a Jew and a sexual liberation activist, Hirschfeld early on became the target of right-wing supporters, being seriously physically attacked in 1920 and 1921. Later, with the Nazis coming in power, he was regularly assaulted and his lectures were disrupted. Returning to Europe in 1932 after his world journey, Hirschfeld decided not to return to Germany, but went first to Switzerland and then in 1934 to France. He died in Nice, on his 67th birthday, May 14, 1935.

HIV/AIDS

Partly because of its unique relationship to gender inequality and cultural conceptions of sexuality, HIV/AIDS is one of the most difficult public health issues. It is also one of the most challenging medical conditions to treat clinically. Infection with HIV most commonly begins with transmission of the virus during unprotected sex. Children who are born to an HIV-infected mother can become infected with the virus during pregnancy, childbirth, or breastfeeding. HIV can also be transmitted through contact with contaminated blood, a transmission route most often associated with the sharing of needles by injection drug users. Transmission of HIV during transfusions of contaminated blood or blood products has become increasingly rare as screening and heat treatments have been introduced. There is no evidence of HIV being transmitted through kissing, casual contact, or insect bites.

In the United States, HIV disease is commonly divided into four stages. In the acute infection or primary infection stage, flulike symptoms may be experienced for several weeks immediately after exposure. This first stage is the most infectious because the body contains the highest amount of virus that it ever will. However, the body's immune system does not create antibodies during the primary stage, so an HIV antibody test would likely be negative. The second stage is asymptomatic and lasts an average of 10 years.

The HIV virus is not latent during this stage because, although there are often no symptoms, the virus is actively reproducing, gradually diminishing the body's ability to respond to infections. The third stage is early HIV disease, where one or more opportunistic infections may occur. Opportunistic infections appear when the body's immune system is suppressed, causing symptoms such as fever, diarrhea, thrush, loss of vision, neurological dysfunction, skin disorders, respiratory problems, and other pain and discomfort. Opportunistic infections account for about 90 percent of all AIDS deaths and are caused by a variety of viruses, bacterias, and cancers. After further decline in the body's immune response and emergence of serious opportunistic infections and cancers, HIV infection progresses into its final stage, advanced HIV disease or AIDS. The progression of the disease is most commonly measured by the amount of virus on the body (viral load) and the body's immune function (CD4 or T-cell count).

There is no cure for HIV/AIDS. Without treatment, it takes an average of 10 years for primary HIV infection to progress into full-blown AIDS. The recommended treatment for HIV/AIDS in the developing world is Highly Active Antiretroviral Therapy (HAART), which consists of a combination of potent drugs designed to suppress the growth of the virus. HAART has successfully reduced the number of deaths caused by HIV/AIDS and helped improve the quality of life for those living with the disease. However, treatment with HAART is expensive, can cause a number of side effects, and requires almost perfect adherence to be successful. Treatment for HIV/AIDS is made even more complex because the HIV virus is able to mutate, making particular drugs and classes of drugs ineffective. Gender inequality plays a particularly important role in the effectiveness of HIV/AIDS treatment and prevention efforts because those most affected by the disease face invisibility, stigmatization, and racial and cultural stereotypes about sexual behavior. Although women are now recognized as being hit harder by HIV/AIDS than men are, the disease emerged with a strong association with gay male sexuality that, in part, obscured the unique risk the disease poses for women. This entry discusses issues and challenges for society regarding HIV/AIDS.

Stigma, Silence, and Activism

Public glimpses of what is now known as HIV/AIDS first emerged in the United States in 1981 as a collection of rare and deadly illnesses in otherwise healthy, young men. After the first cases reported by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) emphasized a connection with homosexual lifestyle, AIDS quickly became stigmatized as a "gay disease." Stigma and governmental indifference helped fuel an unprecedented amount of political activism from the gay community that shaped public policy and has helped to characterize AIDS as an exceptional public health and medical problem in U.S. society.

A defining feature of the HIV/AIDS epidemic has become the growing number of women who live with the disease. The disease disproportionately affects women both because they are increasingly at risk for becoming infected and because they are more likely than men are to provide care to others suffering from the disease. In the United States, AIDS cases have increased more than three-fold among women since 1985. Racial disparities are evident in rates of infection, with women of color accounting for 80 percent of all women estimated to be living with HIV/AIDS in the United States. Worldwide, an estimated 37.2 million adults were living with HIV/AIDS at the end of 2006. Women in sub-Saharan Africa account for 59 percent of these. If new HIV infections continue at current rates, women will soon outnumber men among those living with HIV.

In the United States, the first cases of AIDS were triggered by requests to the CDC for distributions of pentamidine, a rare drug used to treat pneumocystis carinii pneumonia (PCP). In some of the PCP cases, CDC officers reported Kaposi's sarcoma (KS), a rare form of cancer previously found only among elderly men of Mediterranean or Jewish heritage, organ transplant patients, or young adult African men. Within a matter of months, KS was grouped together with PCP and other opportunistic infections such as toxoplasmosis, severe recurrent herpes simplex, persistent thrush, cryptococcal meningitis, and cytomegalovirus. Although the cause of these infections was unclear in the early 1980s, official reports linked the grouping of symptoms to sexual behavior by identifying the majority of cases among homosexual men.

These initial reports came little more than a decade after the start of the gay rights movement at Stonewall and associated HIV/AIDS with promiscuous sexual behavior and with notions of hypersexual gay masculinity. The Stonewall riots were a series of violent conflicts between lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transsexual (LGBT) individuals and New York City police officers that began during a police raid on June 28, 1969. The riots, which were centered at the Stonewall Inn and lasted for several days, are widely recognized as the catalyst for the modern-day movement toward LGBT rights in the United States. Newspaper headlines featured phrases such as "homosexual disorder" and "gay cancer." The identity of the so-called patient zero was named in a series of articles published in the San Francisco Chronicle and mythologized in And the Band Played On both by Randy Shilts. Researchers speculated about aspects of homosexual lifestyles that could lead to a level of immunosuppression capable of causing such unusual infections. Meanwhile, President Ronald Reagan refused to speak publicly about the crisis until 1985. Just 2 years later, the Helms Amendment passed, effectively banning the use of federal funds for programs that encouraged or promoted homosexual activities either implicitly or explicitly.

The association of HIV/AIDS with male homosexuality and the ensuing political silence stymied early efforts to prevent its spread and find effective treatments. Without governmental backing of prevention education and research for treatment, fear ran amok in the public and even among health care providers. Gay activist groups and other concerned citizens responded by organizing public protests demanding more research and increased access to treatment and by forming community-based health programs that relied on volunteers to help care for people dying of the disease.

The AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) formed in 1987 at the Lesbian and Gay Community Services Center in New York City. With its slogan "Silence = Death," ACT UP characterized the lack of response to AIDS as lethal, particularly to the gay male community. ACT UP successfully protested the high cost of AZT, the first drug used to treat AIDS. Demonstrations also targeted the lengthy Food and Drug Administration (FDA) drug approval process. The FDA responded to these protests by announcing a 2-year shortening in the drug-approval process in 1987. These regulations established conditions under which drugs not yet approved can be made available to people with a life-threatening illness. In part, the public outcries over AZT drew attention to the desperation of AIDS patients and cleared the path for accelerated drug development and licensure processes in general. AIDS patients also felt the stigma in their everyday life as they struggled with being denied insurance benefits, losing jobs, and even having difficulty finding tolerant funeral parlors. Gay men played and continue to play a central role in HIV/AIDS activism and advocacy.

Although labeled a homosexual disease, more and more cases of AIDS quickly developed among hemophiliacs and children. In 1984, a 13-year-old boy named Ryan White was infected with the HIV virus through hemophilia treatments with contaminated blood products. White was not allowed to attend school, because of community fear and ignorance. Even after the local board of education ruled that he should be allowed to attend, a group of parents sued to keep him out. While fighting his ban from school in the courts, White spoke out about his personal challenges and the need for compassion toward those living with AIDS. He was featured prominently in numerous television programs and magazine covers, became friends with celebrities, was the subject of a television movie, and testified to the National Commission on AIDS. Although Ryan White was often considered more sympathetic because he was infected through blood products rather than unprotected sex or injection drug use, he resisted labels of innocence and did not distance himself from other people living with AIDS.

After his death, Congress passed the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency (CARE) Act in 1990. The CARE Act is a federal program that funds primary care and support services for people living with HIV/AIDS who also lack insurance and financial resources. These programs had their roots in models of community care, where volunteer-based supportive services were a core aspect of medical care. This legacy continues today as psychological and social services, including case management, counseling on safe sex and drug addiction, transportation, and housing are offered as key components of comprehensive team-based HIV care under the Ryan White Program. The CARE Act was reauthorized in 1996, 2000, and 2006 with about 500,000 clients served each year.

Together, AIDS activism and Ryan White's fame brought attention to stigmatization with HIV/AIDS and ultimately influenced policy at the FDA, making investigational drugs available more quickly and providing the organizational basis upon which HIV/AIDS care continues to be organized today. In this way, community mobilization and network of social support around HIV/AIDS is unique because it is rooted in the cultural formation of gay masculinity. The perception that HIV/AIDS was rooted in or even caused by gay male hypersexuality contributed to the invisibility of women in the epidemic until the 1990s.

Invisibility of Women

Today, women are known to be more susceptible to becoming infected with HIV during intercourse, are more likely to take care of loved ones and children infected because of social gender roles and norms, and have clinical manifestations and treatment requirements that differ from those of men. HIV is more easily transmitted from men to women than from women to men during heterosexual sex. Women also tend to carry the burden of child and elder care in families, are more economically dependent, and experience more domestic violence and sexual coercion than men do. Thus, women are more likely to exchange sex for money, less likely to negotiate safe sex, and have difficulty leaving abusive relationships. Finally, HIV/AIDS has clinical differences in women and men. Women tend to have lower viral loads and higher CD4 counts at similar stages of the disease. However, women experience faster progression to advanced HIV disease than men do.

Women tend to have different clinical markers and opportunistic infections than men, experience more severe and different side effects of treatment, and have the added risk of transmitting HIV/AIDS to children during pregnancy, birth, and breastfeeding. In fact, 80 percent of women with AIDS are of childbearing age. For these reasons, the primary care needs of women with HIV/AIDS are unique. They are also understudied because clinical trials often have difficulty recruiting female participants. Since HIV/AIDS cases were first defined by a series of conditions found in men, the unique ways that women were affected was overlooked in the early years, causing late or missed diagnoses. In 1993, CDC expanded the official epidemiological definition of the disease to include gynecological manifestations of HIV/AIDS, such as severe pelvic inflammatory disease (PID) and chronic yeast infections.

Efforts to prevent the vertical transmission of HIV from mothers to children signified the first major success for preventing new cases of the disease. When AIDS first emerged, rates of vertical transmission of HIV from mother to child in the United States were 21 percent. When AZT began to be used during pregnancy in 1994, these rates quickly dropped to 11 percent. Today, vertical transmission rates in the United States are lower than 2 percent with the use of HAART during pregnancy. Since 1995, CDC guidelines have recommended routine HIV testing of all pregnant women. In 2006, CDC put forward new HIV testing guidelines that recommend routine HIV testing for all adults. These guidelines accentuate the testing of pregnant women. State laws vary in their capacity to integrate and enforce these recommendations. Although women in general are at a disadvantage compared with men when it comes to HIV/AIDS, women of childbearing age and women of racial and ethnic minorities are disproportionately infected with the disease.

Intersections with Race and Poverty

HIV/AIDS increasingly affects the poor, the marginalized, and the young. Women of color have become particularly overrepresented in the epidemic. Although in 2005 African American and Hispanic women together accounted for 24 percent of the all women in the United States, women in these racial and ethnic minorities accounted for an astounding 82 percent of total AIDS cases. African American women are roughly 24 times more likely than are white women to be diagnosed with advanced HIV disease or AIDS. In fact, HIV infection is the leading cause of death for African American women aged 25 to 34 years. In 2005, 64 percent of women living with HIV/AIDS were African American, 19 percent were white, 15 percent were Hispanic, 1 percent was Asian or Pacific Islander, and less than 1 percent were American Indian or Alaska Native. Most of these women contracted HIV through high-risk heterosexual sex, which includes sex with injection drug users, bisexual males, hemophiliacs, HIV-infected transfusion recipients, and other HIV-infected persons.

About 1 in 4 African Americans and 1 in 5 Hispanics live in poverty in the United States; problems associated with low socioeconomic status, including inadequate access to health care, the exchange of sex for money or drugs, and substance abuse contribute directly or indirectly to their risk for contracting HIV. In one study, African American women with HIV living in the Southeast reported that they engage in risky behavior because they were financially dependent on their partners, felt indestructible, had low self-esteem, desired the love of a male, and used drugs and alcohol.

In recent years, the phenomenon of African American men secretly engaging in homosexual sex and having unprotected sex with wives or girlfriends has been cited as an explanation of increases in prevalence rates in the African American community. These men did not identify as homosexual, so the category men who have sex with men (MSM) was created to capture this mode of transmission. Prevention activities aimed at this risk population often refer to these men in the African American community as being on the "down low" or "DL." Critics of this newest label contend that this has further fueled the marginalization of MSM and even distorts research. At the same time, categories designed to capture women's transmission route have evolved in such a way that "high-risk heterosexual sex" has become a catchall that accounts for multiple and overlapping risk factors. Perceptions and norms of gender, race, and sexuality are embedded in the social construction of HIV/AIDS around the world, making it a challenging social and public health problem around the globe.

Global Challenges

The number of adults and children living with HIV/AIDS continues to increase in every region of the world, making it truly a global epidemic. Globally, the HIV/AIDS epidemic highlights the challenges facing societies both in cultural conceptions of gender and sexuality and in poverty and civil and political disorder. However, 63 percent of all adults and children living with HIV/AIDS live in sub-Saharan Africa, making it the region with the largest burden of disease; 72 percent of all AIDS deaths occurred in this region in 2006. The sharpest increases in HIV prevalence have occurred in Eastern Europe, East Asia, and Central Asia.

In the early part of the 1980s, global cases of AIDS displayed different gender qualities than in the United States and Europe. Most notable is sub-Saharan Africa where cases of HIV/AIDS have tended to infect men and women almost equally since the start of the epidemic. Today, in the most affected regions of the world, women outnumber men in cases of HIV/AIDS. In every society, men and women are expected to adhere to different norms. In some parts of southern Africa, women are expected to be monogamous, but men are expected to have multiple partners. Women also marry at a younger age than men do, and men are expected to have younger sexual partners. In some areas, people mistakenly believe that sex with a virgin can cleanse a man of HIV/AIDS. A similarly high value is placed on a woman's ability to bear children. These gender differences are compounded by high rates of economic dependence and violence against women. In some parts of Africa, young girls have exchanged sex for school tuition. Gender-biased laws and customs add to a context where safe sex is difficult to negotiate and the act of seeking treatment for sexually transmitted diseases is highly stigmatizing, leaving young girls vulnerable to sexual coercion and HIV infection.

Efforts to bring HIV/AIDS treatments to the rest of the world have increased in recent years, but drug therapy currently reaches less than one-quarter of those who need it in sub-Saharan Africa. As in the United States, prevention of vertical transmission from mother to child during pregnancy and childbirth has been a vital component of prevention efforts. Single doses of an antiretroviral drug called Nevirapine have been crucial to these successes because they are both safe and effective for mothers. These successes are limited by the HIV virus's ability to become resistant to certain classes of medicines. Thus, although combination drug therapy is preferable, it is often cost-prohibitive in the developing world. In contrast with the developed world, the benefits of breastfeeding may outweigh the risk of vertical transmission in developing countries, especially where water supplies used to make formula are contaminated.

Conclusion

The global crisis of HIV/AIDS is an exceptional public health and medical problem around the world, both because it has fueled a public health and medical response unlike anything else but also because it brings to light the wide range of discrimination that exist in societies with different power dynamics based on gender and sexual norms. HIV/AIDS highlights many social and gender inequities, including women's inability to negotiate safe sex practices, the cultural importance of childbearing, violence against women, male sexual expectations and practices, access to education, and malnutrition and water safety. To be successful, approaches to HIV prevention and treatment must be sensitive to how different gender and sexual norms and values influence both men's and women's ability to practice safe sex and prevent the spread of HIV. Although still being researched, microbicides and female condoms may offer women female-controlled technologies for safe sex practice. However, these approaches do not target the imbalance of power and culture of silence that are the roots of people's vulnerability to HIV infection. A sociological view of HIV/AIDS offers an understanding about gender and social inequalities that affect how societies understand sexual behavior and risk, masculinity, and women's rights.

HOMOPHOBIA

Homophobia is defined as the irrational fear and hatred of gay men and lesbians. It combines the words homosexual and phobia, hence the definition related to panic or fear of people who are sexually attracted to a person of the same sex. Many people contend that the word heterosexism is a more accurate concept because fear or panic is not the problem as much as the power and privileging of heterosexual people over gay men, lesbians, and bisexual people. Heterosexism assumes that all people are and should be heterosexual and asserts that heterosexuality is normal, natural, and right. This entry discusses various aspects of homophobia.

Homophobia and Sexism

Homophobia is intimately related to sexism in that the denigration of the feminine is central to both. According to Suzanne Pharr in her work on homophobia as a weapon of sexism, homophobia works with heterosexism to enforce compulsory heterosexuality and the nuclear family. Political conservatives and religious fundamentalists criticize feminists and homosexuality for undermining the traditional family.

Misogyny, the cultural hatred of women, is expressed through the disempowering and belittling of girls and women and the encouragement of dependence on men. Lesbians are perceived as man-haters and as females who can do without men; therefore, they are outside the natural order. Gay men are viewed as traitors to male privilege and as threats to male dominance and the natural order. Men who are even slightly effeminate and not necessarily gay are suspect.

Lesbian-Baiting

An outspoken woman or a woman who does not accept subordinate status may be "lesbian-baited"—called a lesbian whether she is one or not. The purpose of this is to silence her or encourage her to change her behavior. As a result of political backlash to gains won by the women's liberation movement, the label feminist in many circles is mistakenly equated with lesbian, and as a consequence, many women resist the feminist description. To avoid being called a lesbian, some women choose to be reformist rather than radical—in other words, to tone down their lives and views. The only reason lesbian-baiting has the power to control women's actions is because it carries a negative connotation.

Sexual Orientation Confused With Gender Identity

Heterosexism uses homophobia to blame gay men and lesbians for many societal ills. This victim blaming is an essential component of every form of oppression. Power and control apply to the personal categories of sexual orientation where heterosexuality is privileged, but sexual orientation is often confused with gender identity. Sexual orientation refers to the object of a person's romantic or intimate desire. Gender identity is an individual's internal sense of whether the individual is male-identified, female-identified, neither, or both. A common mistake is to assume every transgender person is gay and to confuse a gender issue (related to sense of self) with a sexual orientation (related to desire).

Gender normativity assumes a gender binary of men and women. Like heterosexism, if a person does not fit into the norm, it is seen as unnatural and wrong. People who are androgynous, masculine women, effeminate men, transgender, or intersex are judged as abnormal. They are outside societal expectations and may be subject to harm. Many hate crimes that are seen as homophobic are really about gender transgression—people are attacked because they violated a gender norm, rather than a sexuality norm, that the attacker(s) found unacceptable. For example, an effeminate man might not be gay but his femininity may anger other men who harm him because they feel his femininity is not manly.

Internalized Homophobia

Young children in elementary schools are exposed to societal homophobia on the playground when the words faggot, gay, and dyke are used in a derogatory way to tease and humiliate other kids. Boys are especially vulnerable to this form of social control. The expression "that's so gay" to mean something is bad is widespread. The anti-gay climate in schools is well-documented in annual reports by the Gay, Lesbian, and Straight Educators Network (GLSEN). Hence, individuals grow up surrounded by homophobia in schools, in the media, in families, in peer groups, in religious sermons, and in legislation, throughout the life course. One of the consequences of this pervasive exposure to negative messages is internalized homophobia—the entrenched belief that it is wrong, perverted, and "less than" to be gay or lesbian.

The suicide rate for young gay people is three times the national rate for teens in general. Low self-esteem, higher rates of alcohol and drug use, and mental health problems are serious problems in the gay and lesbian communities as a result of individuals feeling they need to be secretive about being gay or lesbian or that they are immoral or sick.

Structural Heterosexism

Heterosexist prejudice is seen throughout the institutions of society. On the cultural level, traditional gender roles of masculinity and femininity, definition of the family, religious views condemning same-sex sexuality as a sin, lesbian baiting, name calling, and anti-gay jokes all enforce anti-gay prejudice. Lack of civil rights protections in employment and housing, in access to the rights of marriage, and in the military policy of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" are institutional-level discriminations. These and other limitations form a constant message that the gay or lesbian person does not deserve the same rights, protections, or access to resources that heterosexuals have available to them. Validation from the culture is absent, and key mechanisms for job enhancement, adoption or foster parenting children, or relationship benefits such as joint insurance or access to your partner in a medical emergency are lacking. These messages reinforce that the gay or lesbian person is a second-class citizen.

Legal Protections and Hate Crimes

As of 2003, 24 states had no antidiscrimination laws that included sexual orientation. Eleven states had some protection for public employees. Ten states include sexual orientation in their antidiscrimination legislation. There is no federal level antidiscrimination protection.

Hate crimes, which are on the increase against gay people and gender-variant folks are "message crimes" in that they go beyond the crime against the person who is targeted to send a message to the group of which the individual is a member. Of 46 states with hate crime legislation, only 27 states and the District of Columbia include sexual orientation.

The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act (LLEEA), introduced into the House of Representatives and the Senate in May 2005, would add sexual orientation and gender identity to existing hate crimes legislation. The last federal hate crime act was passed in 1968 and does not include sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, or disability. By September 2005, only the House had passed the LLEEA. However, in 2007, the Local Law Enforcement Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2007 (LLEHCPA), also known as the Matthew Shepard Act (named after the young man who was murdered in 1998 because he was gay in Laramie, Wyoming) was introduced. The proposed federal bill would expand the 1969 U.S. federal hate crime law to include crimes motivated by a victim's actual or perceived gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, or disability. The bill passed the House on May 3, 2007, and passed the Senate on September 27, 2007.

Coming Out

Because of the repression and secrecy of being gay or lesbian, many folks are "closeted"; that is, they do not tell others in their lives that they are gay or lesbian. This means they cannot live full and free lives and need to choose to whom and when they reveal their sexual orientation. To come out as gay or lesbian entails taking risks of safety and losing friends, family, and jobs. Coming out is a personal decision with political consequences because it brings the person into opposition with a power structure that has placed her or him in a subordinate position. One strategy of the political movement for gay and lesbian rights is advocating that all gay and lesbian people come out so that others will realize how many gay and lesbian people there really are. This will also help to break down stereotypes and myths as others realize gays and lesbians are in every type of group, class, and occupation. However, until the risks are diminished, coming out is a difficult act for many to take.

Psychological Treatment

Homosexuality as a mental illness was removed from the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM-II) in 1973.

However, there are still therapeutic attempts to treat homosexuality as a mental illness. Generally referred to as "reparative therapy" or "conversion therapy," these therapists believe homosexuality is wrong, is a choice, and is caused by environmental factors. These practitioners tend to come from a religious perspective and usually incorporate prayer and religious worship in the treatment. Scripture reading, group and individual counseling, aversion therapy, and sometimes electroconvulsive shock therapy are other treatments. Most critics view this as a discredited therapeutic model and raise concerns that it can cause serious psychological harm. To date, there is no empirical evidence that these treatments work. The American Psychiatric Association opposes reparative therapy.

Advances in Gay and Lesbian Rights

The gay rights movement for equality, full legal rights, and social acceptance formally dates back to June 27, 1969, when lesbians, gay men, and gender-variant people stood up to police during a raid at the Stonewall Inn in New York City. There has since been a flurry of activism ranging from gay pride parades and events to countless educational forums and trainings, national coming out days, marches on Washington, the formation of national organizations such as the Human Rights Campaign, lobbying for legislation, efforts toward full acceptance of gays serving in the military, advocacy for full marriage rights and benefits, and more. Lawrence v. Texas was a milestone for gay and lesbian people when the Supreme Court struck down existing sodomy laws, reversed its own 1986 Bowers v. Hardwick, and affirmed the constitutional right to privacy in June 2003.

Conclusion

Homophobia and heterosexism lock people into rigid gender roles and expectations by promoting only one acceptable sexual orientation. Although homophobia may never be eliminated in society, the pressure toward a more equal and accepting society continues.

HOMOSEXUALITY

The term homosexuality emerged in 19th-century expert discourse to refer primarily to men's same-sex desire; during the 20th century, the term increasingly came to refer to female same-sex desire. Since the 1970s, the terms gay and lesbian have developed to distinguish between male and female identity and experience. The issue of homosexuality is important to theoretical debates about the social construction of sexuality and gender and is often the focus of discussions about the relationship between sexuality, gender, and power. Studies variously emphasize the historical, cultural, and relational nature of constructions of homosexuality in exploring its interrelatedness with gender. Some theorists have examined this interrelatedness as part of broader explorations of the centrality of sexuality to the modern social order. Other theorists have examined this interrelatedness for the insights it generates into gender relations in the patriarchal order. Social and cultural theorists have achieved a broad consensus that homosexuality is, in one way or another, bound up with the regulation of sexual and gender "norms," and that its study illuminates operations of power and resistance with respect to sexuality and gender. This entry discusses some of the issues, including the language of homosexuality, the construction of homosexuality, gender ideologies, and homosexual practices.
