Libya, Pakistan, Sudan, Yemen, and states in northern Nigeria. Typically such legislative programs include the ḥadd penalties stipulated for specific offences in traditional jurisprudence (fiqh) on the basis of the source texts of the Qur'an and the ḥadīth, notably, for the purposes of this examination, the offence of zinā, unlawful sexual intercourse, that is, sex between any two persons who are not (and know that they are not) married to each other. The offence of zinā is punishable, according to the traditional interpretations of the source texts, by the ḥadd penalties of stoning to death for the married offender and by whipping for the unmarried offender; these penalties are criticized by many on human rights grounds. Although the penalties apply both to males and females, the implementation of such statutes has also been criticized inter alia on grounds of their discriminatory impact on women. Particular concerns raised in this regard are evidentiary rules or judicial practice establishing pregnancy of an unmarried woman as proof of zinā; the inclusion of the crime of rape in the zinā statutes; and the disqualification of women's testimony in zinā cases (Sidahmed 2001, Quraishi 1997).

It is commonly observed that the evidentiary standards for proving the occurrence of zinā liable to the ḥadd penalty are so high as to be practically impossible to meet, except in the case of voluntary confession to the offence; otherwise, the requirement of four adult male Muslim witnesses to the act of penetration brings the offence of zinā, as Quraishi (1997, 296) points out, very much into the public sphere rather than treating it as a matter of private conduct. However, reliance on a minority juristic opinion allowing pregnancy of an unmarried woman to stand as evidence for zinā introduces a way of establishing the offence that applies only to the woman involved, and cannot be used against her partner. Sidahmed (2001, 203) observes that "the presumption of zina on grounds of pregnancy, whether corroborated by a confession or not, puts a woman defendant in a disadvantageous position compared to a man accused of the same offence" and ponders the implications of a modern-day legislature (in this case Sudan) explicitly introducing this minority opinion as part of statute law. A presumption of zinā is also of relevance to the treatment of rape as "forcible zinā" or "zinā under duress" (zinā bi-al-jabr) under the new statutes. While the use of force will exonerate the rape victim from the charge of and penalty for zinā, the same evidentiary standards are applied to the offence, making it extremely difficult for a woman to establish. Particular concern arises where women alleging rape risk being charged with zinā when they fail to establish the use of force against them (Sidahmed 1999, 198, Quraishi 1997, 302). In Nigeria, where starting in 1999 a number of northern states have implemented Shari'a penal codes, Amnesty International (2004) holds that "zinā as a criminal offence for Muslims only negates the principle of equality before the law." Against the background of considerable international attention to a number of zinā prosecutions against Nigerian women, Amnesty (2004) found that "the application of the death penalty for zina offences combined with the gender-discriminating evidence rules within the Sharia penal codes have meant that women have disproportionately been sentenced to death for zina in northern Nigeria since the introduction of new Sharia Penal Codes." In regard to Pakistan, Quraishi observes that the particular issue of rape and the misapplication of the Zina Ordinance is a "primary topic in women's human rights discussions globally, and stirs up an expected share of frustration, anger, defensiveness, and arrogance from all sides" (1997, 292).

In Muslim majority states that do not apply such codifications of Islamic criminal law and do not implement the hadd penalties, extramarital sexual relations may be criminalized under secular penal codes that historically differentiated the establishment of the offence and the length of the prison sentence on grounds of gender. Thus, for example, a husband might have to be openly involved with a woman other than his wife or to have had extramarital relations in the marital home in order for an offence of adultery to be proven against him, while no such developments on a single act of adultery would be specified for the wife. The crime of rape generally excludes marital rape but attracts very heavy penalties in case of prosecution and conviction. In some states, scholars criticize the categorization, in penal codes, of rape and sexual assault under sections dealing with, for example, crimes against public decency and morals (Jordan) or family order (Turkey) rather than in the sections on crimes against individuals. Abortion – which tends to be allowed only on therapeutic grounds (Bowen 1997) – may also be included as an offence under such sections. Mohsen finds infanticide to be "closely related to the crime of abortion" and reports that in Egypt, infanticide is "almost always a female crime," is strongly under-reported, and even where reported "is rarely prosecuted" – this last because "many law enforcement officers view such a crime as more the result of the woman's ignorance than of malicious intent" (1990, 17–18).

In many states, criminal law shows direct influence from previous colonial powers in the way it treats offences of particular relevance to women. Thus, various Middle Eastern and North African states have penal codes developed not only from the Ottoman but also the French penal codes of the nineteenth century; certain provisions of particular significance to women, notably the suspension of criminal proceedings against or punishment of the abductor of a woman in the event that she marries him, have parallels in the penal codes of some Latin American states. The French as well as Ottoman antecedents in criminal law are also illustrated in the penal codes of certain Arab states regarding "crimes of honor" (Abu Odeh 1996), to the effect that there remains a partial defence in law in the event that a man surprises his wife or one of his close female relatives in an act of zinā and kills her and/or her partner in the act; in Jordan, attempts to amend an article in the penal code providing an absolute defence in such circumstances have preoccupied sections of civil society and the legislature in recent years.

Increased attention to and research on crimes of honor against women, and particularly "honor killings," has shown that the above-mentioned articles are rarely if ever invoked as a legal defence by alleged perpetrators of honor killings; advocacy campaigns aimed at their amendment or repeal, and in some cases the opposition to such campaigns, indicate that they remain nevertheless highly symbolic. In the courts of various countries, different legal provisions combine to provide substantial reductions in penalties for the perpetrators of honor killings in circumstances that do not involve allegedly catching anyone in the act of illicit sexual liaison. Thus in some Arab states a partial defence to murder may be based on arguments akin to provocation – that is, that the perpetrator acted in a "fit of fury" and in defence of his honor (Abu Odeh 1996, Shalhoub-Kevorkian 2002a), while further reductions follow a waiving of personal rights in the prosecution by the victim's family. In Pakistan, although the statutes codifying Islamic criminal law do not recognize the partial defence of "grave and sudden provocation" previously available in criminal law, observers criticize implementation of the Qisas and Diyat Ordinance for reduced protection of women against murder (Amnesty International 1999). In Turkey, a partial defence of severe provocation may reduce the sentence to a third with further substantial reductions if, as is reported to be frequently the case, an honor killing is executed by a minor male (WWHR 2002). Turkish cases where the minor is chosen for the deed by a family council of male family members illustrate vividly the place such violence may occupy in parallel normative systems inadequately challenged by the state's criminal legal system (Sev'er and Yurdakul 1999). Research shows an apparent lack of attention and determination on the part of officials of the criminal justice system in investigating the murder or "suspicious deaths" of women in different states (Shalhoub-Kevorkian 2002a, Sev'er and Yurdakul 1999, Amnesty International 1999).

Increased domestic attention to crimes of honor in various Muslim majority states has been matched in recent years by increasing international attention, for example at the United Nations, where certain Muslim states have objected to a perceived association of honor killings with Islam. Domestically, the debate can be complicated by perceptions or assertions of Western pressure being behind attempts to amend the relevant legislation. From a different perspective, many activists and scholars situate manifestations of honor killings in the wider framework of violence against women; thus for example Shalhoub-Kevorkian (2002b, 590) observes that "naming femicide as 'crimes of passion' in the West and 'crimes of honour' in the East is one reflection of the discriminatory constructions of frames of analyses, which build a simplistic system that hides the intersectionality among political, economic, cultural and gender factors." The perceived association with Islam is also addressed explicitly. In her 2000 report, Asma Jahangir, United Nations Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary, or arbitrary executions, noted that "the practice of 'honour killings' is more prevalent although not limited to countries where the majority of the population is Muslim. In this regard it should be noted that a number of renowned Islamic leaders and scholars have publicly condemned this practice and clarified that it has no religious basis." In a number of countries, those investigating and challenging crimes of honor in their domestic contexts have invested effort in demonstrating the fallacy of the idea that there is support for such practices in the bodies of principles and rulings that make up Islamic law. In responses to allegations of a relationship between Islamic law and crimes of honor (whether in practice or as countenanced in certain legal provisions) it is the "classical" law – or the dominant interpretations of Islamic criminal law – that are set out to establish that honor killings as commonly understood are not sanctioned. Among the points stressed are the stringent procedural requirements for the establishment of the ḥadd offence of zinā, the non-approval of extra-judicial action by private parties in punishing zinā, and the sin – as well as the crime – involved in the murder of innocents under the terms of Islamic criminal law.

The fact that existing legal provisions – and judicial interpretation of the same – may combine to provide seriously reduced penalties against those who kill women on alleged grounds of "honor" is exacerbated by a lack of attention on the part of state policy and agencies to the broader (indeed global) phenomenon of violence against women in the private sphere of the home and the family. Related areas of criminal law that appear to be under-enforced in various Muslim majority states and that have particular impact on women include the prohibitions on underage and forced marriage. Rendering criminal law more effective as deterrent and/or remedy is only one focus of the many individuals and women's groups campaigning around such issues in Islamic cultures, as indeed elsewhere. The particular manifestations of abuse intersect inter alia the enduring "maleness" of the legal process, perhaps particularly in criminal law; paradigmatic attitudes to women, sexuality, and property; and deliberate or negligent choices made by state authorities not to prioritize and systematize their responses to violence against women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu Odeh, Crimes of honour and the construct of gender in Arab societies, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, U.K. 1996, 141–94.
- Amnesty International, Pakistan. Violence against women in the name of honour, AI Index ASA 33/17/99, London 1999, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/index/ENGASA330171999>>.
- , Nigeria. The death penalty and women under the Nigerian penal system, AI Index AFR 44/001/2004, London 2004, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGAFR440072004?open&of=ENG-NGA>>.
- D. L. Bowen, Abortion, Islam and the 1994 Cairo Population Conference, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 29 (1997), 161–84.
- CIMEL and INTERRIGHTS, Annotated bibliography on "crimes of honour," <www.soas.ac.uk/honourcrimes>.
- S. K. Mohsen, Women and criminal justice in Egypt, in D. H. Dwyer (ed.), Law and Islam in the Middle East, New York 1990, 15–34.
- A. Quraishi, Her honor. An Islamic critique of the rape laws of Pakistan from a woman-sensitive perspective, in Michigan Journal of International Law 18 (1997), 287–320.
- A. Sev'er and G. Yurdakul, Culture of honor, culture of change. A feminist analysis of honor killings in rural Turkey, in Violence against Women 7:9 (1999), 964–99.

N. Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Femicide and the Palestinian criminal justice system. Seeds of change in the context of state building, in Law and Society Review 36:3 (2002a), 577–605.

—, Re-examining femicide. Breaking the silence and crossing scientific borders, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 28:2 (2002b), 581–608.

A. S. Sidahmed, Problems in contemporary applications of Islamic criminal sanctions. The penalty for adultery in relation to women, in British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 28:2 (2001), 187–204.

WWHR (Women for Women's Human Rights), The new legal status of women in Turkey, Istanbul 2002.

LYNN WELCHMAN

Afghanistan

Afghanistan's legal system includes the Shari'a and the Penal Code; in most cases penalties are not gender-based although the code does refer to certain parts of the Shari'a, such as hudud, qisas, and diya. Afghanistan has capital punishment. Women's crime rate is very low and mostly family related. In Kabul, with a population of nearly three million, the women's jail has only 28 inmates who live there with their children. From 1992 to 2001 in the free northern provinces of Kapissa and Parwan, there was only one female execution and one qisas (requested by a widowed mother whose daughter was killed by a man she had refused to marry her daughter to). From 1996 to 2001, the Taliban militias stoned or executed many women publicly, imprisoned many more for violating their orders, and put into their correctional facility hundreds of young women and girls for as small an infraction as laughing in the street. While since December 2001 the reinstated 1964 constitution recognizes the rights of all citizens, has well-defined separation of powers, and does not admit fatwa as binding law, the Taliban operated only by fatwas from their leader, Mullah Omar.

An overall problem that will have to be dealt with in the criminal law domain is the fact that the judiciary is based on Hanafi law while a sizeable population follows Shari Ja'fari law.

The largest number of crimes committed by women and against women are related to family violence. Often women who have suffered in these situations face criminal charges as well. Examples abound: an already married woman whose husband was working in another city ran away because her father wanted to marry her to another man (in return for money). The police found and jailed her, both to protect her from her father and to punish her for running away without permission from a male member of her family. Sometimes the fate of women in situations of family violence does not come to light until after their death. Authorities are reluctant to indict family members in such cases.

It remains to be seen if in the new constitution (adopted January 2004) and the legal institutions now taking shape in Afghanistan these issues are dealt with in a manner consistent with equality of men and women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

M. H. Kamali, Law in Afghanistan. A study of the constitutions, matrimonial law and the judiciary, Leiden 1985.

J. E. Sihombing and H. A. Finlay (eds.), Law Asia family law series, editor-in-chief R. Watson, Singapore 1979.

H. G. Vafai, Afghanistan. A country law study, Washington, D.C. 1988.

NASRINE GROSS

Arab States

Criminal law in the Arab world derives, by and large, from Western European principles as well as from the Shari'a and 'urf (tribal or customary law), although in Saudi Arabia law is not codified and the 'ulamā' (religious scholars) preside over matters of criminal law. It would not be correct to single out the Arab states as the only locus of legal disadvantage for women or discrimination against them. Until quite recently, many Western legal codes defined women as wives and dependents. Islamic legal principles treat women as reproductive and sexual beings to be constrained by the umma (the Muslim community), family, or tribe. Theoretically, as Islamic law developed, the adjudication of crimes shifted to the umma. Yet families and tribal councils continued to serve as guardians and to apply customary law.

Women's legal status affects their role in the judicial system. For example, women are excluded from giving testimony in the most serious category of crimes in Islamic law, the hadd (pl. hudud), which are crimes against God. Women judges have presided in Syria, Yemen, Tunisia, and Lebanon but historical precedent and Islamist sentiments have prevented them from serving elsewhere. The key principles of most criminal categories are gendered and have serious implications for women.

MURDER

'Urf accorded a lesser monetary value to women's lives, and assigned a high value to virginity. Islamic law adopted these monetary distinctions, although it did outlaw cruel practices such as death by exposure of female infants. In tribal tradition, a life or limb was worth its equivalent but a woman's life was worth half that of a man's. Her reproductive value was taken into consideration, so in some areas, in a conflict between two tribes, a dead man's tribe could abduct a woman from the other tribe until she bore a son. Modern states restricted such practices, as in Section 7 of the Tribal Courts Law (1936) for Palestine.

Severe penalties such as amputations, or lashings, were imposed rather than imprisonment in the premodern era. In addition, retaliation often served to settle inter-clan disputes. 'Urf and Sharī'a law did not attempt to reform criminals; rather, public punishments were conceptualized as deterrent measures.

The worst crimes are those committed against God, the ḥadd, which have a fixed punishment, followed by qiṣās, which may involve retaliation. Least serious are ta'zīr, crimes for which a judge formulates punishment. In the Sharī'a, murder, manslaughter, and bodily injury or maiming are qiṣās crimes. The victim's family can demand retaliation or diyya (blood money). The penalty must represent equivalent harm, and be executed with the least pain possible. Female victims are entitled to diyya at half the value of a man's; since men's inheritance was twice that of women's, the valuation was logical.

In modern law codes, prison terms have replaced acts of retaliation. Murder sentences should be equivalent, but in crimes of honor or passion, the guidance for sentencing varies.

HONOR CRIMES

Honor crimes occur when male family members kill a woman for a perceived violation of the code of sexual behavior. Most penal codes exempt or reduce the sentence if the victim is seen as having "provoked" the crime. In Jordan, the average sentence for an honor crime is seven and a half months. Often, families will assign the task of killing sisters to minor males to mitigate penal sentences.

Modern Penal Codes which blur the distinction between murder and crimes of honor reinforce the notion that men have a right to punish women. Lebanon was the first Arab state to reform the article in its Penal Code of 1999, which provided exemptions or sentence reductions for honor crimes. A similar reform campaign in Jordan has yet to succeed. Articles permitting extenuating circumstances, or exemption from penalty, are discriminatory because most countries do not provide reduction of sentences for women who commit murder in such situations.

ADULTERY

Under Sharī'a law, sex is permitted solely within licit marriage. The crime of zinā (adultery, fornication) merits lashing for unmarried persons, and lapidation for married persons. Such sentences are uncommon, even in Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Libya. Under Western-influenced law codes such as that of Tunisia, women, but not men, could be punished for adultery prior to 1968. Tunisian law was subsequently reformed to apply equally to men and women. The Egyptian Penal Code previously specified a sentence of not more than two years for an adulterous woman. A man's sentence could not exceed six months, and male adultery was only so defined if it occurred in the marital home.

RAPE

In Morocco, in 1993, Hajj Muhammad Mustafa Thabit testified to rapes of around 500 women over a period of 13 years and was swiftly executed. The incident revealed that such crimes occur in Arab society, contrary to popular discourse. All Arab states penalize rape, although not marital rape. Since rape victims may be killed by their families, the crime is underreported. 'Urf treats rape as an act of physical damage and theft of sexual property, diminishing a virgin's financial worth. In countries following the Sharī'a, penalties are now severe. In the past, financial compensation might suffice if jurists found an element of doubt (shubha). Civil penal codes differentiate between forced rape and consensual sex, and minor and adult victims, as was common in Western law as well. Reformers have protested at the fact that most Arab penal codes do not charge a rapist with a criminal act if he marries his victim. This clause was repealed in Egypt in 1999. In Lebanon, torture and gender-based abuse and rape of imprisoned women was reported despite penal code articles prohibiting torture.

INCEST AND SEXUAL ABUSE

Incest is illegal under Sharī'a law. Today, penalties range from execution to those less serious than for rape. Incest and sexual abuse victims are constrained by the honor code. Incest carries a sentence of only three years in Jordan, and a male relative must register the complaint, not the victim, or a shelter where she has taken refuge. A Palestinian women's center estimated that 75 percent of sexual assault cases involve close male relatives, with girls aged between 4 and 13 being most at risk.

SEXUAL ABUSE AND HARASSMENT

As legal categories, sexual abuse and harassment are new concepts. Thus it was news when a Tunisian hospital worker filed a sexual harassment complaint in 2002, and a hospital disciplinary board swiftly convened against her. Political police surrounded the hospital and threatened the complainant and her attorneys with rape (OMCT 2002).

Arab women experience and complain of harassment in the streets and public areas. Penal or civil codes prohibit lewd behavior but are infrequently enforced.

ILLEGITIMACY

The fear of violence from a female's family often prevents the birth of illegitimate children. In cases of such births, subterfuge or infanticide are usual, or informal adoption. In Morocco, a woman may be imprisoned for six months for bearing a child out of wedlock. Child abandonment is illegal although it does occur and is the reason for the existence of most state and private orphanages. If women kill their own children, sentences vary; in Jordan, a woman can receive a sentence of 5 to 10 years, but, as in Sudan and elsewhere, judges might reduce the sentence in such a case.

ABORTION AND NEW REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES (NRTs)

Tunisia liberalized its abortion law by greatly broadening the substantiating groups for obtaining the procedure. Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Yemen, and Libya have criminalized abortion except to save the mother's life. In Morocco, Algeria, and Saudi Arabia, abortion is allowed to save the mother's life or preserve her physical or mental health. Sudan and Iraq allowed abortion in cases of rape and incest and Qatar permits it in cases of rape and fetal impairment.

NRTs are criminalized if they involve gamete donation; the rationale derives from religious principle. However, in Lebanon, Shī'i jurists have agreed that couples may use donated eggs.

PROSTITUTION, SEXUAL TRAFFICKING, HOMOSEXUALITY

Poverty and tourism fuel the sex industry in Arab states. Prostitution may be fictionalized as marriage when Arab tourists "marry" young girls in Egypt and then abandon them. War conditions caused an increase in prostitution, kidnapping, and sexual trafficking of women in Iraq. In Saudi Arabia, Mauritania, Sudan, and Libya the penalties for zinā apply to prostitution. Elsewhere, prostitution is punishable by a fine or a prison sentence. It is legal in Lebanon and Djibouti, although pimping and coercion are not. Sexual trafficking has not yet been seriously tackled in the penal codes.

Homosexuality is illicit according to the Shari'a, contrary to nature and punishable, yet is often tolerated. Outside the Gulf states, Sudan, and Libya penalties include fines and/or prison sentences, and it is conceived as an offense against public morality.

FEMALE GENITAL MUTILATION (FGM)

Although the 1946 Sudanese Penal Code prohibited infibulation, while permitting the less radical sunna circumcision, infibulation has continued. In 1957 and again in 1991, this law was re-ratified, but FGM is not mentioned in the 1993 Penal Code.

In Egypt, FGM was permitted one day a week and performed by licensed health professionals with the rationale that "medicalization" of the process might save lives. Following a CNN live exposé of a circumcision, the Egyptian minister of health banned the practice in state facilities and private clinics in 1996. His decision was overturned, then revalidated in a higher court. The decree is frequently ignored, and some deaths have resulted. Activists from Arab and African nations called for specific legislation to address FGM.

BATTERING AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Many Muslims believe that both Islamic law and custom mandate that women owe men obedience (tā'a), proper care of the household, and sexual favors on demand. A wayward woman was classified as being nāshiza according to the Shari'a and a hadīth recommended remonstrance, leaving the bed of a wife, and then lightly beating her. Liberal Muslims reject this interpretation.

Most countries penalize battery and assault, but lack articles that specifically apply to domestic violence. Moreover, the reduced penalties for honor crimes apply to batterers. Magistrates appear to discriminate in sentencing in favor of male batterers (Zulficar 1994, 86–7).

CONCLUSION

Penal codes that discriminate against women violate the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). Codes that include whipping, lapidation, and capital punishment also violate the international prohibitions against torture. The level and efficacy of legal reform in response to the CEDAW directive should be a priority for the Arab states, in spite of opposition.

Equality on the basis of gender is granted constitutionally to most Arab citizens. The disjuncture between statutory discrimination in the penal codes and women's constitutional rights provides a legal basis for reform.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu Odeh, Feminism, nationalism, and the law. The case of Arab women, SJD thesis, Harvard Law School 1993.
- Amnesty International, Lebanon. Torture and ill-treatment of women in pre-trial detention. A culture of acquiescence, AI Index MDE 18/009/2001, 22 August 2001, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGMDE180092001?open&of=ENG-LBN>>.
- J. N. D. Anderson, Islamic law in Africa, London 1954.
- Association tunisienne des femmes démocrates, Rapport aux décideurs. Les violences à l'encontre des femmes, Tunis 2001.
- M. C. Bassiouni (ed.), The Islamic criminal justice system, London 1982.
- L. Brand, Women, the state, and political liberalization. Middle Eastern and North African experiences, New York 1998.
- B'Tselem, Morality, family honour and collaboration, in Y. Be'er and S. 'Abdel-Jawad, Collaborators in the Occupied Territories. Human rights abuses and violations, Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, January 1994, 89–99.
- A. C. Chamari, La femme et la loi en Tunisie, Casablanca 1991.
- Al-Fanar, Developments in the struggle against the murder of women against the background of so-called family honour, in Women against Fundamentalism Journal 6 (1995), 37–41.
- C. Fluehr-Lobban, Islamic law and society in the Sudan, London 1987.
- J. Ginat, Blood revenge. Family honor, mediation, and outcasting, Brighton, U.K. 1997.
- S. Hammad, Violence against women. Honor crimes in Jordan, in Civil Society. Democratization in the Arab World 7:44 (December 1998), 17–20.
- M. J. L. Hardy, Blood feuds and the payment of blood money in the Middle East, Leiden 1963.
- F. A. al-Hayani, Legal modernism in Iraq. A study of the amendments to family law, Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan 1993.
- R. Husseini, Honor killings, <<http://www.pbs.org/speaktruth/topower/rana.html>>.
- P. Illkaracan (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000.
- T. Mahmood et al., Criminal law in Islam and the Muslim world. A comparative perspective, Delhi 1996.
- C. Mallat and J. Connors (eds.), Islamic family law, London 1993.
- A. E. Mayer, Islam and human rights. Tradition and politics, Boulder, Colo. 1991.
- , Libyan legislation in defense of Arabo-Islamic sexual mores, in American Journal of Comparative Law 28 (1980), 287–313.
- N. M'jid, Sexual exploitation of children in the MENA region. An overview, paper presented at the Arab-African forum against sexual exploitation of children, Rabat, Morocco, 24–6 October 2001.
- S. E. Nanes, Fighting honor crimes. Evidence of civil society in Jordan, in Middle East Journal 57:1 (Winter 2003), 112–30.
- OMCT (Organisation mondiale contre la torture), also known as World Organization against Torture, The impact of economic, social and cultural rights of women on violence against women in Egypt, report prepared for the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Geneva April 2000.
- , International Secretariat. Case TUN 141102 VAW, <<http://www.omct.org/>>.
- S. Ruggi, Commodifying honor in female sexuality. Honor killings in Palestine, in Middle East Report 28:1 (Spring 1998), 12–15, reprinted in P. Illkaracan (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000, 393–98.
- N. Shalhoub-Kevorkian, The politics of disclosing female sexual abuse. A case study of Palestinian society, in Child Abuse and Neglect 23:12 (1999), 1–19.
- A. N. Wood, A cultural rite of passage or a form of torture. Female genital mutilation from an international law perspective, in Hastings Women's Law Journal 347 (Summer 2001), 347–86.
- M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, Berks., U.K. 1996.
- S. Zuhur, Criminal law. Women and issues of gender, sex, and sexuality in the Middle East, North Africa, and the Islamic world, in KKHP/WWHR (forthcoming).
- M. Zulficar, Women in development. A legal study, Cairo 1995.

SHERIFA ZUHUR

Bangladesh

Bangladesh became independent as a result of the Indo-Pakistan war in 1971. Before and after 1971 the Penal Code of 1860, the Criminal Procedure Code 1989, and the Evidence Act of 1872 formed the statutory basis of the criminal law of Bangladesh. The government of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman enacted a constitution in 1972 that proclaimed secularism as one of the founding principles of state policy. Yet in subsequent years of military rule from 1975 to 1990 constitutional amendments revived religious-based parties and eliminated secularism as a state principle. This was feared by women's groups because of the risk of exposing women to discriminatory laws. The Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act 2000 covers the offences of grievous hurt to women and children, trafficking of women, kidnapping and abduction of women and children, confinement of women and children for ransom, rape, murder accompanied by rape, or sexual assault, and committing murder or hurt in order to obtain a dowry. In spite of this law, these offences have not abated in any significant measure. Women's organizations in Bangladesh demand that real issues related to the management of crimes be addressed, namely indifferent police, corruption, criminalization of politics, poor participation of women in the policy-making sphere, and so forth.

RAPE

The common crime of rape in Bangladesh is controlled by section 376 of the Penal Code, the Suppression of Violence Against Women and Children Act of 2000, and also punishable under the Special Powers Act of 1974 (As Amended) by the setting up of a special tribunal. But in practice criminal law does not provide enough protection to women against rape. In cases of rape the rule that prevents further action is that an independent witness is required to confirm a victim's statement. Other factors contributing to the fact that the crime is rarely reported are poor medical examination of the victim, bribery by the offender, and threats to life. Rape is also committed on women held in police custody where it is difficult to hold the offender accountable because the investigation is supposed to be carried out by his own colleagues. The social and emotional consequences of rape are endless. Marriage for victims of rape is virtually impossible. People still believe that rape is the victim's own fault and many victims of rape commit suicide.

VIOLENCE

Women are not sufficiently protected from domestic violence, including dowry deaths. Incidents of murder or attempted murder for dowry-related reasons are regular items in the country's daily papers. Acid burnings have also become a common form of violence; the main reasons for this crime are jealousy, refusal of sexual advance, revenge after an argument, or a husband seeking more dowries or permission for polygamous marriage. In 1984, a new provision, section 326A, was inserted in the Penal Code providing penalties up to capital punishment for those found guilty of this crime. The Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act 2000 recognizes offences of sexual assault and sexual harassment. Under the Bangladesh Penal Code women cannot even be charged with adultery, but occasionally decisions are controlled by the local elders, led in particular by religious leaders. There have been cases where women were accused of zinā and sentenced to be caned. Sentences passed on women (sometimes called fatwas) issued by mosque imams and madrassa maulanās have included stoning, flogging, or social boycott.

TRAFFICKING

Trafficking in women and children is a significant problem in the Bangladesh. The government has taken measures to curb the practice by introducing strict punishment to offenders in the Suppression of Violence Against Women and Children Act 2000, and strengthening border check posts.

But due to socioeconomic factors there is a serious lack of implementation of laws and border police may become partners with the traffickers in order to supplement their income.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ain o Salish Kendra, Threats of violence and violations of human rights by imams of mosques and the religious right in Bangladesh, unpublished collection of cases compiled for the period 1992-94, Dhaka 1994.
- R. Bhuiyan, Aspects of violence against women, Dhaka 1991.
- M. Guhathakurta, Gender violence in Bangladesh. The role of the state, in Journal of Social Studies 30 (1985), 77-93.
- M.-A. Hélie-Lucas and H. Kapoor (comps.), Fatwas against women in Bangladesh, London 1996.
- R. Jahan, Hidden wounds, visible scars. Violence against women in Bangladesh, in B. Agarwal (ed.), Structures of patriarchy. State, community and household in modernizing Asia, New Delhi 1988, 216-26.
- S.-R. Khan, The socio-legal status of Bangali women in Bangladesh. Implications for development, Dhaka 2001.
- R. Khondker, Violence and sexual abuse. Legal cases studies from Bangladesh, Dhaka 1990.
- K. R. Redden, Bangladesh, in K. R. Redden (ed.), Modern legal systems cyclopedia, ix, Buffalo, N.Y. 1990.
- A. Shaheena, How far Muslim laws are protecting the rights of women in Bangladesh, Dhaka 1992.

RUBYA MEHDI

Iran

The source for understanding the standing of women in Iranian criminal law is the Islamic Penal Code. The origin of this Penal Code can be found in Qanūn-i hudūd wa qiṣāṣ wa muqarrarāt-i an (The law of retribution and boundaries and its ordinances) that was passed immediately after the revolution of 1979. This law was later amended and ratified as Qanūn-i mujazat-i Islāmī: Hudūd, qiṣāṣ, diyat, ta'zīrāt (The Islamic Penal Code: boundaries, retribution, compensation, corporal punishments) by a clergy-dominated Iranian parliament in 1982 and again amended in 1992.

The Islamic Penal Code, relying on often-ambiguous Islamic commands, allows for severe and violent physical punishments. In addition, public or state authorities are given permission to violate the citizens' private spheres on the pretext of combating moral crimes and violations. As such, the Islamic Penal Code not only conflicts with international human rights treaties, many of which the government of Iran had signed before the revolution, but is also at odds with the social transformation Iran has experienced in the past century. On the basis of this code, violence against women is encouraged, women's right to life is denigrated, a woman's testimony in court is either not valued or deemed as only half as credible as that of a man, and some of her most basic human rights, such as the right to wear what she wishes, are denied.

There are many instances of gender-based inequality that can be cited in the Islamic Penal Code but at the most fundamental level inequitable treatment is manifested in the minimum age of criminal culpability. The Islamic Penal Code itself does not specify the minimum age of criminal culpability and instead in Article 49 identifies a child as someone who has not reached the age of religious maturity. It is in Article 1210 of the Civil Code that the age of religious maturity of 9 for women and 15 for men is specified. As such, girls enter the arena of criminal liability six years earlier than boys and can be punished as adults. This contradicts the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which has been ratified and signed by the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Iranian judicial system has tried to lessen the impact of the existing laws and in some ways to offer a veneer of legitimacy to its practices by creating special corrective courts for children but the realities of Article 49 of the Islamic Penal Code and the unequal treatment it promotes on the basis of gender cannot be overlooked.

Iranian criminal laws also treat men and women differently in terms of the right to wear the kind of attire they wish. Immediately after the 1979 Revolution, not wearing a veil or not wearing it properly in public was considered a crime, punishable by as many as 74 lashes until 1996 when imprisonment or monetary fines replaced lashes. The situation is complicated by the fact while Article 638 of the Islamic Penal Code passed in 1996 identifies the new penalties, it continues to keep the category of "improper" veil undefined, leaving it open to interpretation by judges or implementers of the law who have found the legal vagueness a useful tool for harassing women.

There are many other areas in which men and women face varied and unequal criminal culpability, for instance in allowing for passion killing for men but not women (Article 630 of the Islamic Penal Code). The law also treats a woman's life as less worthy than a man's by making her blood money worth half that of a man's. If a man intentionally kills or maims a woman and in turn, based on the law of retribution, is sentenced to death or maiming, the woman's family must give half of the man's blood money to his family. The law does not require blood money for a woman who has been sentenced to death or murder. Such disparity in blood money compensation, and the fact that the family of the female victim ends up owing money to the family of the male criminal in its pursuit of justice, has the potential of promoting violence against women for the sake of financial gain.

There are also areas in the Iranian criminal law, such as sexual relations between unmarried adults (zinā) or adultery (zinā-yi muḥṣina), both criminalized in the Islamic Republic, in which the Islamic Penal Code seemingly treats men and women equally. But in practice women end up receiving harsher punishments. For instance, in the case of adultery, both the married man and the married women caught in extra-marital relationships are subject to the punishment of stoning on the basis of Article 83 of the Islamic Penal Code. However, more women have been stoned because, given the fact that men in Iran have the right to marry up to four wives, adulterous men have the option of identifying the woman with whom they have relations as their new wife, an option obviously not open to adulterous women. International pressures to end this practice have only led to the suspension of stoning by the judiciary and not its outright ban through parliamentary laws.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Kār, Raf'-i tab'iz az zanān. Muqāyisab-²i kumvānsiyūn raf'-i tab'iz az zanān bā qavānīn-i dākhilī-i Irān, Tehran 1999.
- , Sākhtār-i huqūqī-i nizām-i khāvādah dar Irān, Tehran 1999.
- , Pizhūhishī darbārah-²i khushūnat 'alayh-i zanān dar Irān, Tehran 2000.
- H. R. Kusha, The sacred law of Islam. A case study of women's treatment in the Islamic Republic of Iran's criminal justice system, Burlington, Vt. 2002.
- F. Šālīhī, Diya yā mujāzāt-i māli, Tehran 1992.

MEHRANGIZ KAR

Pakistan

Since 1947, the Pakistan Penal Code 1860, the Criminal Procedure Code 1989, and the Evidence Act of 1872 have formed the statutory basis of the criminal law of Pakistan. In 1979 Islamic criminal law was partly implemented. Islamic criminal law is not compatible with the status that women already had in Pakistan. Woman's organizations mobilized and claimed that Islamic law had to face the challenges of the modern world. The women's movement in Pakistan holds that traditional Islamic law needs reinterpretation and that religion should not be confused with a patriarchal social structure. Islamization of the criminal law has shown clearly that there are differences of opinion concerning the interpretation of the Shari'a. The Islamization has affected women mainly through the aspects of criminal law described in this entry.

LAW OF RAPE

With the Islamization of the law changes were introduced in the law of rape making it part of the ordinance called The Offence of Zina (Enforcement of Hudood) Ordinance, VII of 1979 (the term zinā encompasses adultery, fornication, rape, and prostitution), and requiring Islamic standards of proof and punishments. The ordinance makes fornication and adultery, which were not regarded as crimes in Pakistan before 1979, crimes similar to that of rape. The ordinance has the following consequences: first, it is impossible to inflict the severe ḥadd punishment on the rapist because of the high standard of proof required. Second, for ḥadd punishment a woman's evidence has no value, in other words, the testimony of rape victims has less weight than the testimony of Muslim males. Third, for punishment of rape under ta'zīr a woman runs the risk of being accused of fornication/adultery if she fails to convince the court that rape has taken place. Fourth, the offence of fornication/adultery lies so close to the offence of rape that the severity of the rape offence as a serious crime is reduced.

LAW OF MURDER

The Criminal Law Amendment Ordinance VII of 1990, popularly known as the Qisas and Diyat Ordinance, subsequently became the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1997, which was passed without significant parliamentary or public debate. As part of the process of Islamization, it replaced the sections of the Pakistan Penal Code relating to murder and manslaughter and covers all offences against the human body. One profound change it effected is that direct control over cases involving murder does not lie with the state. Under Islamic law, the punishment for murder can either be in the form of qisās (equal punishment for the crime committed) or diyya (compensation payable to the victim's legal heirs). The act discriminates against women as victims and as heirs of victims.

The new law sets diyya or blood money as punishment for unintentional murder (qatl bi-sabab) and in certain categories of murder (for example grave and sudden provocation) the court only has discretion to award diyya and imprisonment of up to 14 years as ta'zīr. This is detrimental to the rights of women and the poor. Moreover, if a husband murders a wife by whom he has a child the case is treated differently from instances where strangers are involved; he cannot be sentenced to a normal penalty of death under section 302 of the Pakistan Penal Code. Instead a lesser punishment of diyya is enforced, approximately US$ 4,500, and the court may additionally sentence him up to a maximum of 14 years imprisonment.

Women as the heirs of victims are also discriminated against under this law. In the matter of the disbursement of diyya women have been treated unequally or altogether excluded:

(1) The law has made offences relating to the human body compoundable. Legal heirs have the right to negotiate with the offender under sections 309 and 310. Under section 309, legal heirs can forgive the murderer in the name of God without receiving any monetary compensation in the form of diyya, while under section 310 the legal heirs can compromise after receiving diyya in their respective shares. The minimum value of the blood-money is provided for under Section 323 PPC and is fixed by the federal government for each fiscal year. This varies according to the price of silver. The criteria for the distribution of blood-money are to be decided in accordance with the inheritance shares of men and women in Islam, which are not equal.

(2) In the matter of the compounding of qisās (sulḥ) in qatl-i-amd, a mother of minor children having the right to waive qisās may be excluded from speaking or deciding on behalf of her children. Under section 310, the right to compound qisās in qatl-i-amd rests with the walī (heir). Under section 310(2) read with section 313, if a walī is a minor or insane, the right to compound vests in their father or in his absence in the paternal grandfather. If the minor or insane person has no living father or grandfather, the right to compound qisās devolves upon the government, thus excluding altogether the mother and grandmothers.

WITNESSES

The 1984 Evidence Act, known as the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order brought in substantial amendments to the 1872 Evidence Act. Section 17 of the 1984 act provides that in "matter pertaining to financial or future obligations," the testimony of "two men, or one man and two women" is required; and in all other matters, the testimony of one man or one woman, according to what the court may accept. In ḥudūd cases women are not considered capable of appearing as witnesses at all for the crimes mentioned in the four ordinances, namely, the Offences Against Property (Enforcement of Hudood) Ordinance, VI, 1979; the Offence of Zina (Enforcement of Hudood) Ordinance, 1979; the Offence of Qazf (Enforcement of Hadd) Ordinance, VIII, 1979; and the Prohibition (Enforcement of Hadd) Ordinance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. R. Changez, The law of qisas and diyat, in Pakistan Times, 23 August 1984.
 A. Jahangir, Stoning to death in Pakistan, in Lawyers, February–March 1988, 28–33.
 A. Jahangir and H. Jilani, The Hudood Ordinance. A divine sanction?, Lahore 1990.
 R. Mehdi, The offence of rape in the Islamic law of Pakistan, in International Journal of the Sociology of Law 18 (1990), 19–29.
 —, The Islamization of the law in Pakistan, Richmond, U.K. 1994.
 R. Patel, Women and law in Pakistan, Karachi 1979.
 —, Islamization of laws in Pakistan?, Karachi 1986.
 R. Shehab, Diyat of women in Islamic law, in All Pakistan Legal Decisions 36 (1984), 84–6.
 Simorgh Collective and S. Hussain, Rape in Pakistan, Lahore 1990.
 Women protest against qisas-diyat law, in Viewpoint, 16 August 1984.

RUBYA MEHDI

Turkey

Article 10/1 of the constitution of the Republic of Turkey provides for equality before the law: “All individuals are equal before the law, irrespective of language, race, color, sex, political opinion, philosophical belief, religion and sect, or similar considerations.” However, some clauses in the Turkish Penal Code violate the principle of equality and some de facto situations discriminate against women as well.

Felonious acts that violate sexual freedom are described in “Felonies against Public Decency and Family Order,” and are considered violations of public decency and family order. But there is no word for rape in the Turkish language. Instead, the act is described as behavior that “dishonor(s) or ravish(es) someone’s honor or attack(s) someone’s chastity.” In other words, rape dishonors public decency and family honor. Males can be raped, but it is normally assumed that a rape victim is a female whose body is the property of her family, her husband, or the public. Thus, there is an article in the Penal Code (article 423) concerning the taking of a girl’s virginity: “Whoever deprives a girl of 15 of her virginity by promising marriage shall be imprisoned for six months to two years.” If victim and perpetrator marry, prosecution and punishment is suspended. However, if the wife sues for divorce within five years, public prosecution is revived or the punishment previously adjudged is executed.

The age of consent is 15 in Turkey. “Whoever ravishes a child under the age of 15 (the age of consent) shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than five years.” Further, “when the offence is committed with force, violence, or threats or is committed against an child who cannot resist because of mental or physical defects . . . imprisonment shall not be less than ten years.” Thus, all sexual intercourse with a person under 15 years of age is considered rape, regardless of the victim’s sex.

A new Penal Code is now being debated between women’s groups and the Commission of Justice. Article 429 of the Turkish Penal Code defines the penalty for abduction: “Whoever abducts a woman who has reached majority legally or by judicial decree and uses force, violence, threats or fraud, influenced by lascivious feelings or with the intent of marriage, shall be punished by imprisonment for three to ten years . . . If the abducted person is a married woman, imprisonment may not be less than seven years.” Legislation accords more importance and respect to married women than unmarried women. The Penal Code (Article 434) states that “if the abducted girl or woman marries the accused, prosecution and/or punishment shall be suspended.” If the couple divorces, the prosecution can be renewed and a previously rendered punishment can be executed. Thus the victim is forced to marry her abductor to protect her family honor.

Adultery was a crime according to Articles 440 and 441 of the Penal Code but as a result of a campaign by women’s non-governmental organizations, the Turkish Constitutions Court decriminalized male adultery as in 1996 and female adultery in 1998. Adultery is no longer a crime and can only be a ground for divorce (Civil Code, Article 161).

Homicide is a serious crime. In the case of a “malicious murder of a newborn child to protect the dignity and reputation of the offender or of his wife, mother, daughter, grandchild, adopted daughter or sister, the offender shall be punished by imprisonment for five to ten years” (Penal Code, Article 453.e). Formerly, the murder of a family member was punished by death. In accord with European Union laws, capital punishment has been abolished, and the murder of a family member is now punished by life imprisonment.

In principle abortion is no longer a felony, but under certain circumstances it is punishable. The last of three articles in a chapter on “Felonies Regulating Lineage” in the Penal Code states: “Whoever commits one of the offences in the foregoing articles to protect the reputation of himself, his wife, mother, sister, descendant or adopted daughter, shall be imprisoned for one month to three years.”

Another exception to the decriminalization of abortion based on protecting family honor is in “Felonies against the Integrity and Health of the Race.” The punishment for felonies lessens if the crime is committed to “preserve the pride and reputation of oneself or a relative” (Article 472).

Worst of all was Article 462 which regulated the reduction of punishment in “passion crimes,” but in reality applied to all “crimes of honor.” This article was annulled by the Turkish National Assembly in June 2003 to satisfy the European Union.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Türk ceza kanunu 765, approved 1 March 1926, published in Resmi Gazete 320, 13 March 1926.

Türk medeni kanunu 4721, approved 22 November 2001, published in Resmi Gazete 24607, 8 December 2001, enacted 1 January 2002.

CÂNÂN ARIN

Law: Cultural Defense

Overview

DEFINITION

The cultural defense is a legal strategy used sometimes in criminal cases in United States courts to excuse, justify, or mitigate criminal conduct. It is the admission of cultural evidence to explain the behavior of the defendant. Most often the accused is an immigrant, and in such cases the defense lawyer argues that judges and juries must consider such factors as “culture” when assessing the evidence against the accused. This form of defense is grounded in the argument that newcomers to the United States may be insufficiently assimilated to United States standards of conduct, and that foreign behavioral norms compel them to act outside United States law. Thus the accused may have acted under the influence of a particular custom or culture that is adverse to the standards of the host society, and should be considered less culpable under the law. The cultural defense seldom leads to an acquittal of the accused. Instead, it is used to argue for a mitigation of the penalty, seeking reduced criminal charges and/or a reduced sentence. The main point of the cultural defense is that people who are foreign, when acting in accord with the norms of their native culture, should not be held fully accountable under United States law for conduct that conforms to the prescriptions and proscriptions of the culture of their countries of origin.

While seemingly at odds with United States standards of individualized justice, the cultural defense fits within the existing framework in criminal law that assesses various degrees of culpability in considerations of intention, knowledge, recklessness, and negligence. United States courts recognize various defenses involving state of mind or diminished mental capacity, such as the insanity defense or the post-traumatic stress disorder defense. The cultural defense is similar to these types of defenses in that it recognizes how environment affects and defines an individual’s rationality. The cultural defense asserts a causal connection between environment and law, and elaborates that connection in the context of an individual defendant on trial. The essence of the cultural defense in legal analysis rests on the contextualization of the offense(s) with which the defendant is charged, saying that the social system must bear part of the responsibility for the crime.

One type of cultural defense case involves a defendant carrying out customs that are accepted in his or her native land but outlawed in the United States. The defendant’s argument is that “I may have committed a crime, but back home it is not a crime, and I should be judged by the laws of my country of origin.” An example of this is the case of Mohammed Kargar, an Afghani refugee, who was convicted in 1996 by a state court in Maine on two counts of sexual assault after he was reported to have “kissed” his 18-month-old son’s genitals. It was argued through expert testimony at a court hearing that the act would have been considered a customary show of a father’s affection for his child in Afghanistan, with no sexual feelings involved.

Ultimately Kargar’s cultural defense strategy was vindicated on appeal, as the Maine Supreme Court vacated his conviction on the grounds that his conduct had not been envisaged by the Maine legislature when it had enacted the penal statute on sexual assault. Kargar’s conduct, motivated by paternal feelings and not by sexual gratification, was deemed to be something outside the parameters set by the law that criminalized sexually deviant and harmful behavior. The highest court in Maine held that “although it may be difficult for us as a society to separate Kargar’s conduct from our notions of sexual abuse, that difficulty should not result in a felony conviction in this case” (State v Kargar, 679 A2d 81 [1996 Me. LEXIS 162] @ 85). However, the court also stipulated that the defendant must now know that the practice of genital kissing is prohibited by law in the United States, regardless of the motive. The Maine Supreme Court wrote, “Kargar does not argue that he should now be permitted to practice that which is accepted in his culture” (State v Kargar, 679 A2d 81 [1996 Me. LEXIS 162] @ 85, n. 5). The cultural defense was successful here because it did not raise the specter of permanence. Instead it conveyed the idea that assimilation is an integrative process, and newcomers must abandon questionable or offensive practices accepted in their countries of origin and learn to conform to United States legal and cultural standards. Kargar is not criminally liable for his past conduct given his present repudiation of the practice, even though the conduct itself remains criminal. While the courts may show mercy to defendants such as Kargar in an early stage of their assimilation, it is argued, maintenance of separate normative orders is not envisaged under the law.

The second type of cultural defense strategy argues that the defendant's state of mind was heavily influenced by cultural factors at the time of the commission of the offense(s). Here the judge is expected to take into consideration the defendant's state of mind and decide whether cultural factors played an aggravating role, in which case the charges might be reduced (for example, from second-degree murder to voluntary manslaughter). For example, in the case of a Sikh woman from Punjab, India, who attempted to kill her two children and then take her own life after she discovered her husband's infidelity, the argument was not that such parent-child murder-suicide attempts are accepted in India, but that conflicting cultural norms pressured the defendant and resulted in her feelings of disorientation and abandonment when it became clear her husband wanted a divorce. Illiterate and confined in an arranged marriage, the defendant, Narinder Virk, could not speak English, had no friends or employment and allegedly was abused by her husband. According to her attorney, Virk was trapped in the roles of a subservient wife and mother, and was driven to madness by a culture that measured her value by her domestic abilities and the success of her marriage, and threatened to disown her and her children if she failed. Expert testimony at the trial was used to argue that Virk's despair at her situation was exacerbated by the cultural standards in which she had been reared. Culture in this circumstance is viewed as contributing to the defendant's impaired mental state. Sometimes extreme emotional disturbance may only be understandable in a particular cultural context (see Piccalo 2000).

EXAMPLES OF CULTURAL DEFENSE CASES

In the United States, "culture" has become an increasingly common defense in recent years, as defendants assert that a person's cultural background is relevant under the law. Historically the idea that culture matters has been encountered in cases as early as the 1920s, where judges in a number of cases accepted a defense based on cultural differences. For instance, Italian immigrants referred to "culture" to defend themselves against statutory rape charges when they seduced and married young Italian-American women without their parents' consent (Cleghorn). Most often the defense strategy that seeks the admission of cultural evidence to benefit the defendant has been associated with patriarchal practices that are harmful to women's interests (Coleman 1996, Maguigan 1995, Volpp 1994, 2000, 2003).

At the end of the twentieth century many reported cultural defense cases involved family relations. For example, in 1987 in New York a Chinese-born man, upon learning of his wife's infidelity, used a claw hammer to strike his wife in the head eight times until she was dead. At trial an anthropology professor from Hunter College testified on the defendant's behalf, explaining that in Chinese culture a woman's adultery is severely punished because it is proof of her husband's weak character and is "an enormous stain" on the reputation of himself, his offspring, and his ancestors (cited in Renteln 2003, 34). In China, the expert continued, a husband often becomes enraged and threatens to kill his unfaithful wife. However, the close-knit community usually intervenes and prevents the husband from carrying out his threat. The defendant's case was premised on the absence of a local Chinese community that would have presumably restrained the enraged husband and protected the intended victim. The court found the defendant guilty of the lesser crime of second degree manslaughter and sentenced him to five years probation.

In another case, in a Los Angeles suburb in 1994 the attorney for a man who had beaten his wife to death argued that the murder victim had violated the norms of their Iranian Jewish community by serving her husband – the defendant – a bologna sandwich on the eve of the Persian New Year, an occasion usually celebrated with a feast. Further evidence brought to light by the defense at trial demonstrated that the victim had continually ridiculed her husband in front of relatives and friends, calling him "stupid" and making him sleep on the floor, again violating the norms of Persian culture by undermining his dominance in the marital relationship. In his opening statement, the defense attorney promised the jury that they would hear evidence "about a culture that is vastly different from yours and mine," one that is male-dominated and pious (Moore 2002, 196). In this case the judge lowered the charges from first degree murder to voluntary manslaughter. The jury convicted the defendant on the lesser charge and he was sentenced to serve an eleven-year prison term.

Trials of persons accused of child molestation have also involved the cultural defense. An Albanian Muslim man named Sadri Krasniqi was arrested for allegedly molesting his four-year-old daughter during a martial arts exhibition in suburban Dallas, Texas, in 1989. Although Krasniqi was acquitted of criminal charges in 1994, due in part to the expert testimony of an anthropologist who argued that the touching of a child's genitalia is not considered sexual in Albania, he and his wife permanently lost the custody of their children in family court. Many Muslims in Dallas and nationwide were angered by the outcome of this case because of the court's severance of parental rights before the accused came to trial in a criminal court and the adoption of the Krasniqi children by a family who had the children convert to Christianity. In response to public protest, the judge involved in the civil case publicly refused to apologize and wrote that Krasniqi's defense in criminal court had been based on the offensive assertion that "molesting young girls is acceptable in Muslim culture" (Moore 2002, 198).

The judge in the Krasniqi case puts his finger on the problem with the cultural defense strategy. The argument that culture determines an individual's behavior imagines culture to be fixed and bounded as a static set of rules, beliefs, values, and institutions, instead of being a heterogeneous set of discourses and practices that are constantly being transformed through particular historical events and exchanges and through the activities of individuals. Particular constructions of "culture" embedded in legal defenses associate offensive or questionable cultural factors with people who are then seen as primitive, unchanging, and inferior to United States standards of conduct. Thus, the assertion that touching a young child is acceptable in certain countries and cultures generalizes from the instance of the actions of one man to condemn the world's substantial Muslim population. The generalizations the cultural defense allows validate the core images of Islam and Muslims already structured in the dominant discourses.

Attempts have been made in the United States Congress to ban the use of the cultural defense in United States courtrooms in certain circumstances. In the case of female genital mutilation (FGM) – also known as female genital surgery or female circumcision – United States federal law adopted in the wake of the heavily publicized asylum case of Fauziya Kasinga in 1996 criminalized the practice of FGM in the United States and forbade any consideration of cultural imperatives in the defense against criminal charges arising from this practice. The law prohibits the court to consider the effect of any belief that the practice of FGM is required as a matter of custom or ritual. However, this has been construed as an inappropriate prohibition since the question of cultural belief is directly relevant to the state of mind of the defendant: at the time of the commission of the act for which he is criminally charged, did he have the requisite criminal intent? (see Maguigan 1999). For those who continue practices that have a cultural basis, cultural evidence continues to be admitted in court because it relates to the state of mind of the defendant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. H. Cleghorn, The immigrant's day in court, New York 1923, repr. 1969.
- D. L. Coleman, Individualizing justice through multiculturalism. The liberal's dilemma, in Columbia Law Review 96 (1996), 1093–1167.
- H. Maguigan, Cultural evidence and male violence. Are feminists and multiculturalist reformers on a collision course in criminal courts?, in New York University Law Review 36 (1995), 36–99.
- , Will prosecutions for "female genital mutilation" stop the practice in the U.S.?, in Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 8 (1999), 391–423.
- K. Moore, Representations of Islam in the language of law. Some recent U.S. cases, in Y. Y. Haddad (ed.), Muslims in the West. From sojourners to citizens, New York 2002, 187–204.
- G. Piccalo, Attorneys cite similar incident in drowning case defense. Courts saying cultural values caused woman to kill her children. Lawyers will recall 1985 episode, in Los Angeles Times, 17 February 2000, Metro, Part B, 11.
- A. D. Renteln, The cultural defense, New York 2003.
- State v Kargar, 679 A2d 81 (Me 1996).
- L. Volpp, (Mis)identifying culture. Asian women and the "cultural defense," in Harvard Women's Law Journal 17 (1994), 57–101.
- , Blaming culture for bad behavior, in Yale Journal of Law and the Humanities 12 (2000), 89–116.
- , On culture, difference and domestic violence, in American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law 11 (2003), 393ff.

KATHLEEN M. MOORE

Law: Customary

Afghanistan

Customary law in Afghanistan needs to be understood in the context of the semi-autonomous segregated societies that have made up the Afghan landscape. These are self-defined by ethnicity or geographical location/boundaries. As the practice of customary law can be an identifying marker of a geographical group or ethnicity, legislation in the case of Afghan customary law needs to be understood outside the more common state-bound usage. Legislation occurs where adjudication takes place by the person who judges or arbitrates. Since there are no written codified laws in Afghan customary legal contexts and there is only a vague sense of precedence, legislation is the enactment of laws that are neither codified nor part of a corpus of state or regional laws. Rather, village councils (jirga or shūra) and leaders draw upon a variety of legal systems including local customs, tribal laws, Islamic law (Sharī'a), and state laws. Village leaders are interested in reaching a decision which is most acceptable to the mood of the community at the time the matter under arbitration occurred, and which will be in the best interests of the community as a whole. The village community is, therefore, able to maintain a specific social order and religious-ethnic identity through village members enacting the norms of their customary law codes. In some cases, ethnic/geographical identity is intertwined with religious identity, hardly distinct from it, so that practicing customary law is the same as practicing Islamic law. Women are legislators of Afghan customary law in that they arbitrate like Afghan men both at the village level (though infrequently) and at the extended family level. There are only rare exceptional cases where women village leaders are members of the men's village councils.

As documented before the Soviet invasion, Afghan women, especially in sedentary and semi-sedentary societies, have their own sphere of legislative jurisdiction. Despite separate spheres, men have control over decisions affecting greater numbers of people and over allocations of larger resources, maintaining disparity of power distribution. Men and women in this kind of society inhabit separate worlds, yet together they contribute to the sustenance of the whole community. Anthropologists such as Audrey Shalinsky or Nancy Lindisfarne (formerly Tapper) search for women's authority or lack thereof by focusing on the boundaries in Afghan society that demarcated the public and private spheres. Through this lens men have control of the public sphere, where the "real" power is located, and women have control/authority over limited parts of the private sphere, with at best, the "soft" power of persuasion to influence men's decisions. In searching for women's power in men's public spheres, a few exceptional cases of female leaders can be found, for example, Nazo Anna (d. ca. 1715), the legendary "Mother of Afghan Nationalism," or Zarghona Anna (d. ca. 1772), who maintained governance in the capital of the early Afghan confederacy, while her son Aḥmad Shāh was away on military expeditions. However, by fine-tuning the perspective of where women's spaces are located, a very different picture of everyday women's authority and power in customary law practices can be revealed.

By looking at both gendered boundaries and private/public space boundaries through their homosocial organization, a new light can be shed on the power and authority women possess, especially in the sedentary and semi-sedentary societies of Afghanistan. "Homosocial" implies that men and women work and socialize almost exclusively with the same gender. However, the boundaries are porous and overlap where youth and elderly cross, and in certain circumstances such as celebrations or work environments.

In Afghan women's spaces, women gain authority through social networks, honorable reputation, seniority, and control of familial resources. Women who achieve authority and become village and family leaders arbitrate conflicts ranging from theft to stopping a revenge cycle (badal). In the case of the customary law code of the Pashtuns, Pashtunwali, under the rule of nanawati (literally, to enter into the security of a house) women leaders go to the houses of the feuding families and arbitrate a way for the conflict to stop, which the host must accept, especially if the leader who enters the house is from the enemy's family. These female leaders are at the top of their social hierarchies in the village or family and do not legislate through formal councils as men at the village level do. While it may seem that decisions are made unilaterally by the female leader, they are preceded by levels of informal consultation among the women since an unpopular decision would reduce the authority of the leader. The leader's control gives those whose conflicts she arbitrates incentives to follow her legislation, as she may withhold resources or contracts from those who do not.

Men are able to overturn women's decisions, especially those related to marriage and sexual misconduct of women. According to customary law codes, women have been given in marriage as blood compensation in the resolution of conflicts, or to alleviate a family's economic distress caused by high bride-price. If a woman's sexual conduct comes into question, customary law allows and sometimes encourages honor killings. Men legislate decisions that affect both the men's and the women's spheres of the family, such as reputation or economic situation. In other words, women have legislative control as long as the conflicts are within their jurisdiction only.

This view of women's authority is based in documented examples as well as in tropes in Afghan folk stories and poetry. However, over 25 years of war and displacement have left women's spheres and networks in tatters. Customary law is a continually evolving process and much of women's power of decision and control of resources has been lost due to the continual unrest and fear the war situation created. More displaced women are forced into types of seclusion they were unused to in their villages: they have to wear a bughra (burqa') in the streets around their homes and they are cut off from their social networks. With the breakdown of women's social networks and spheres men gain more control over women's legislative power.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Ahmed, Millennium and charisma among Pathans. A critical essay in social anthropology, London 1976.
- F. Barth, Political leadership among Swat Pathans, London 1965.
- H. Christensen, The reconstructions of Afghanistan. A chance for rural Afghan women, Geneva 1990.
- M. M. Ismati, The position and role of Afghan women in Afghanistan, Kabul 1987.
- P. Kakar, Tribal law of Pashtunwali and women's legislative authority, in P. Bearman and F. Vogel (ed.), Afghan legal history project, Harvard University Press (forthcoming).
- E. Knabe, Afghan women. Does their role change?, in L. Dupree and L. Albert (eds.), Afghanistan in the 1970s, New York 1974, 144–66.
- N. Lindisfarne (Tapper), Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
- A. Pont, Blind chickens and social animals, Portland, Or. 2001.
- F. Rahimi, Women in Afghanistan, Leistol 1986.
- A. Shalinsky, Long years of exile, New York 1994.

The Caucasus

From the tenth to the nineteenth centuries, a dual system of customary law ('āda) and Shari'a developed in the Caucasus. The absence of a state system and state law favored the lasting preservation of 'āda in North Caucasus. Three kinds of customary law can be distinguished: pre-reformation customary law (fifteenth to mid-nineteenth century), reformed customary law (second half of nineteenth to early twentieth century), and customary law of the Soviet and post-Soviet period (1920 to the 1990s).

The pre-reformation North Caucasian customary law can be described as an unwritten law combined with a community control system. The exception is Daghestan where systematization of 'āda was carried out in the fifteenth to eighteenth centuries and customary law was written down in Arabic.

The reformed customary law developed after the Russian-Caucasian war, under the influence of the active policy of the Russian Empire in the Caucasus, legal reforms in the Russian Empire between 1860 and the 1910s, and the incorporation of the North Caucasian peoples into Russian state power and law system. 'Āda was codified and made an element of Russian state law applicable in North Caucasus. Governmental verification of compliance with 'āda court decisions (Kabardian mendetyr, Turkic tere, Ossetian tarhon lagi or tarhoni lagtae, Russian mediatorskiy, posrednicheskiy, or treteiskiy [arbitral]) and a system of fines for non-compliance were introduced. Legal procedure was still verbal, while the 'āda court decisions began to be written down throughout North Caucasus.

The 'āda decision included the following: composition of the court, names, ages, and social status of the judges; a brief description of the case; the amount of compensation; conditions and terms of payment; and arrangement of the conciliatory feast. The document was signed by every judge.

Rights and duties to the communal authorities and the court under 'āda law were unequal. Factors that influenced the application of the 'āda norms were: class hierarchy (Kabardian uork habze, code of honor of princes and uzdens), age and sex of the participants in the conflict, and the extent of the influence of Islam and Shari'a on 'āda within the specific society.

Expansion of 'āda within the ethnic communities of the Caucasus was conditioned by the degree of Islamization and establishment of legal standards of Islam (Shari'a) in all areas of the civil and criminal legislation. The Shari'a was implemented most strongly in Northeastern Caucasus (Daghestan, Azerbaijan). Criminal cases were usually tried according to the ʿāda standards, and civil cases (mainly family) according to the norms of the Shariʿa.

Underlying customary law is a collective sense of justice: any crime is harm done to the collective. The basic principles of Caucasian ʿāda are vengeance for damage (blood feud) and reparation of damages (payment of compensation, blood money). Women are part of a collective – the family or clan – and are defended by the (male) collective. According to the ʿāda, a woman is not a legal person. The main types of harm done to Caucasian women are insult, rape, physical damage (wound or murder), abduction of the bride without her consent, non-payment of kalym, and neglect of her share of the property or inheritance being partitioned. Caucasian forms of insult include an alien man taking off the kerchief from the head of a married woman or violating the taboo on entering the female half of the house, and the smearing of the girl's house door with tar. The main types of harm perpetrated by Caucasian women include insults, quarrels, fights, and adultery.

ʿĀda was used to try most crimes concerned with the life of Caucasian women. Some wrongs were not considered by either ʿāda or Shariʿa. Rapes were in most cases settled by marriage of the victim and the rapist. Punishment for rape depended on the class status of both victim and rapist as well as the woman's marital status: the rape of a married woman was considered a more important crime and could not be settled by means of marriage and, as in a case of murder, vengeance followed.

The perpetrator of vengeance (krovnik, one who was to take revenge, “bearer of blood”) was the husband or a brother. A woman could not be an object of vengeance, even if she had incited a fight or brawl. Killing a boy was considered less offensive than killing a woman.

Harm done to a Caucasian woman (insult, wound, murder) necessitated the payment of compensation. The blood money for a woman was half as much as for a man. Another ʿāda norm was also practiced: compulsory ejection of the collective (the criminal and his family) from the village (temporarily or permanently). Women were ejected along with men. In such cases, a woman indirectly shared legal responsibility for the crime committed by her husband. If the criminal was a woman, then a man (husband, brother, father) was legally responsible for it.

From 1920, when state law was established within the territory of the Soviet Union, ʿāda standards have been applied fragmentarily and illegally. Women's rights and duties related to vengeance for damage (women have become an object of vengeance) and reparation of damages (in case of rape, the settlement of the conflict by means of marriage is used everywhere) have partly changed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(all works cited are in Russian)

PRIMARY SOURCES

- V. K. Gardanov (comp.), Material on Kabardian customary law, Nalchik 1956.
Gidatlinsky ʿāda, Makhachkala 1957.
 H. O. Khashaev (comp.), Monuments of the Daghestan customary law of the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries, Moscow 1965.
 M. M. Kovalevskiy, Law and tradition in the Caucasus, 2 vols., Moscow 1890.
 —, ʿĀda of the Daghestan region and Zakatal'sky Krai, Tbilisi 1899.
 F. I. Leontovich, Caucasian ʿāda, 2 vols., Odessa 1882.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- I. L. Babich, The evolution of legal culture of Adygs, Moscow 1999.
 V. O. Bobrovnikov, The Muslims of North Caucasus, Moscow 2002.
Customary law in Russia, Rostov-in-Don 1999.
 H. M. Dumanov, The customary law of property in Kabardian society, Halchik 1976.
 A. A. Pliev, The blood revenge of Chechens, Moscow 1969.

IRINA BABICH

Central Asia

The legal heritage of Central Asia comprises a multi-layered heritage of ancient Turkic and Persian traditions, Islam (since the seventh century C.E.), and Soviet law and practice (Kamp 1998). This is especially true for the “stans” (Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan), but Mongolia and Afghanistan were also heavily influenced by Soviet conceptions. Post-Soviet law has continued to reproduce Soviet norms, as well as drawing from legal reforms in the Russian Federation, and the United Nations human rights conventions now ratified by all these states.

Nomadic cultures were established in Central Asia by around 1700 B.C.E. The area was periodically overrun by Persians, Huns, Chinese, Mongols, and, with the advent of Islam, Arabs. Islam reached Central Asia only 20 years after the death of the Prophet Muḥammad, and during the Middle Ages Islamic art, philosophy, and law flourished in the kingdoms of Korasan, Bukhara, Herat, and Samarkand (IFL 2000). The majority of Muslims in Central Asia belonged to the Sunnī Ḥanafī sect, the most liberal of the four Sunnī schools, so that Christians, Hindus, Sikhs, and Jews have also had significant influence.

Conditions of life for women varied greatly before Soviet control. The pre-Soviet Kazakhs had no tradition of veiling or seclusion, while in Islamic Bukhara women were routinely secluded or completely veiled in public. Tajik women also were almost totally secluded.

However from the seventh century, women in most of Central Asia had, according to Islamic law, the right to inherit, own, and sell both movable and immovable property. Women acquired wealth and property through marriage arrangements and through inheritance. A man was obliged by law to give his bride mahr, a negotiated amount of money, jewels or other property, which became her own possessions, subject to her own disposal, and which served as two-thirds of her settlement if her husband divorced her (Kamp 1998). Islamic inheritance law provided that a man's property was divided among his children first, with sons receiving a share twice as large as that of a daughter. Nevertheless, daughters received an inheritance too.

Once the Soviet Union gained complete control of the region, it abolished Shari'a law, and made polygamy and bride price illegal. Most of the region's 24,000 mosques were closed, pilgrimage to Mecca was prohibited, and printing and distribution of the Qur'an was banned.

There are however a number of respects in which customary law has persisted through the Islamic and Soviet periods into the present day.

Research has shown that for Kyrgyz and other nomad peoples of Central Asia, shame and respect are the factors that sustain customary law, which is used more often than written law in relation to family and community relations (Giovarelli and Akmatova 2002). For example, Kyrgyz women interviewed in 2000 said that the custom they would most like to change is that of slaughtering as many animals at funerals as any other participant, which, despite official attempts at reform, remains strong, because of the effect of shame on the family.

Customary law has a number of other features. First is the strongly patrilineal and patrilocal family structure prevalent in most of the region, together with the influence of clan allegiances.

A second is the strong ethnic tradition predating Islam: the "cult of fertility," consequent high birth-rate, and accompanying child mortality (Tabyshalieva 1998).

Third is the increasing prevalence in Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan of polygamous marriages. Although contrary to criminal law and religious law – they cannot formally be performed by a mullah – such marriages are in Uzbekistan often conducted in the mosque. In Turkmenistan polygamy is not only traditional, but is officially permitted.

Fourth, bride kidnappings (mostly consensual – often in fact elopement) are especially common among former nomadic peoples such as the Turkmen, Kyrgyz, and Kazakh. The real scale of kidnapping without the consent of the bride, especially in remote rural areas, is unclear. There are no programs to eliminate this practice, and discussion of it remains a taboo (Tabyshalieva 1998). Recent research shows that the shame of being unmarried after age 30 appears to be more intolerable than to be stolen because traditional society is so cruel to unmarried women and men (Giovarelli and Akmatova 2002).

Where conflicts exist between customary law and written law, customary law often takes precedence in rural areas, because written law fails to reflect the reality of the villagers' lives. For example, written law does not have the notion of family property or household property (where the land is held by whoever is in the family at that time). Judges are known to use provisions of the procedural code to sanction customary law over written law in such cases.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- G. Capdevila, Central Asian women increasingly targeted by traffickers, IPS World News 17 August 2003, <http://www.oneworld.org/ips2/aug01/23_56_072.html>.
- R. Giovarelli and C. Akmatova, Local institutions that enforce customary law in the Kyrgyz Republic and their impact on women's rights, World Bank, Washington, D.C. March 2002, <<http://lnweb18.worldbank.org/ESSD/ardext.nsf/22ByDocName/Publications>>.
- IFL (Islamic Family Law), Legal datasheet for Central Asia and Caucasus, 2000, <<http://www.law.emory.edu/IFL/region/centralasia.html>>.
- N. Ismagilova, Women in mind. Educational needs of women in Central Asia – general recommendations and strategies for development (2001), <<http://www.mtuforum.org/resources/library/ismano2a.htm>>.
- M. Kamp, Land for women, too. Islam, communism, and land reform in Uzbekistan, 1925–1928, in Columbia Caspian project. Women in Central Asia. The politics of change, 15 August 1998, <http://www.sipa.columbia.edu/resources/caspian/wom_p12.html>.
- F. Najibullah, Central Asia. Women's rights activists push for higher marriage age, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, 10 February 2003, <<http://www.rferl.org/nca/features/2003/02/10022003154421.asp>>.
- A. Tabyshalieva, Revival of traditions in post-Soviet Central Asia, 1998, <<http://www.ifrs.elcat.kg/Publication/Anara>>.
- , Central Asia. Increasing gender inequality, 2000, <<http://www.ifrs.elcat.kg/Publication/Anara>>.

M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Women in Central Asian society, in Women Against Fundamentalisms 4 (1992/3), 29–31, <<http://waf.gn.apc.org/j4p29.htm>>.

Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML), Uzbekistan. Polygamy in Central Asia, 31 October 2003, <<http://www.wluml.org/english/>>.

BILL BOWRING

The Gulf and Yemen

Customary law is the term used for written and unwritten codes of conduct in rural tribal communities, both settled and nomadic, in the Gulf and Yemen. Urban communities in the region maintain that their legal systems are based on Sharīʿa, or Qurʾānic law, in contrast to rural systems based on custom. In reality, there has been considerable mutual borrowing between rural custom and urban law, especially in neighboring communities. Details of customary law vary with time and place, but rules always valorize the components of tribal honor: collective responsibility, autonomy, generosity, hospitality, the protection of the weak, equality within the tribal population, the sanctity of contract, and the importance of mediation. Known simply as “custom” in Arabic (urf, silf) customary law not only specifies formal mechanisms for settling disputes within and between communities but also reciprocal obligations between and within kin groups. These are considered obligatory. For example, a woman in rural Yemen who attended a large wedding planning to dance among the guests was called upon by the hostess, “Oh wife of my cousin, come help knead dough [for the guests].” The guest ruefully acknowledged, “True, I am your cousin’s wife,” and joined the cooks in the kitchen. In this case, the hostess presented an obligation recognized as binding within this system (Adra 1982). By the same token, a guest can deride a stingy hostess or host in public because hospitality is not considered a personal issue but a social obligation (Adra 1982).

There are no accepted mechanisms of coercion in traditional tribal society in the Arabian Peninsula. A shaykh or mediator’s influence is persuasive rather than coercive. In formal dispute mediation, an animal is sacrificed and/or money is handed over to signal that a settlement has been reached. Disputing parties generally share a meal to make the settlement binding. The basic format for mediation includes lengthy discussions in which each side presents its case until consensus is reached about the degree of blame and appropriate amends or reparations. The same format is followed informally in disputes within a household, or, with more serious intercommunity criminal acts or warfare, it may involve mediators from outside the community who are paid for their efforts.

Within a community, if women or men quarrel, others close to them (women or men) will try to mediate the dispute. The offender will be called upon to present a gift or money to make amends. If no acceptable apology or reparations are made at this point, a woman’s male kin will institute formal mediation processes in which they represent her interests. Men may represent themselves.

Technically, only the testimony of mature, male tribal Muslims is accepted during formal mediation. Yet, in practice, women’s input in community conflict resolution is important. During men’s debates, women meet to discuss the same issues. In the evenings, women discuss the case further with husbands and brothers who then bring their opinions back to the mediation process the next day. When discussions are held in the tent dwellings of pastoralists, women participate actively, although in some areas they may do so from behind a curtain.

Disputes among women most often involve husbands or relatives through marriage. A woman who is insulted by her husband or his relatives may go to her father or brother’s house in protest (hanaq in Yemen’s northern highlands). Her husband is honor-bound to follow her, present her with a gift and ask her to return. In the case of repeat offenses, outside mediators may be brought in, and irreconcilable conflict may result in her family’s demand for a divorce. If a man takes a second wife, his first wife almost always asks for divorce. There is no stigma attached to divorce in rural communities in this region, with serial marriage being common.

Customary law reflects the tribe’s male orientation. All formal interactions between groups are negotiated through men. Rituals of tribal display, for example, razfat al-ʿiyāla in the Gulf, barāʿa performance and zāmil poetry in Yemen, as well as the blood feud, are male activities. Men usually represent women during legal transactions. Marriage is formally negotiated through male kin. In principle, women are kept away from the scrutiny of strangers and are not referred to by name in public. At formal functions, segregation by gender is the rule. Women, along with guests, clients, religious minorities, and children, constitute the unarmed population to whom tribesmen owe protection.

A system that is so ideologically male is, in practice, less detrimental to women than one would expect. Tribal custom’s high valuation of the family and of alliances made through marriage lead to a respect for motherhood and an acknowledgment of the important roles women play in the tribal system. The birth of girls is celebrated rather than mourned as is reported elsewhere. Women's important, though informal, participation in conflict mediation reflects and inspires a corollary respect for women's intellect.

Among the most serious breaches of the principles of customary law is for a man to harm a woman, no matter what she has done to instigate his anger. Rural women's safety is thus ensured, and they enjoy considerable mobility, in contrast to urban women in the region who are secluded. Historically, during feuds and raids, women would take food and messages to their warring relatives without incurring any danger to themselves. In some places, women would bare their heads and accompany men in battle while beating drums to support their efforts. In contrast, situations have been recorded in which women, tired of war, would walk into the midst of fighting, take off their head covering or bare their breasts, thus putting their own honor on the line as an effective way of stopping the fighting.

While the laws of custom cover those aspects of tribal life that involve collective responsibility, they do not cover inheritance, marriage, economic transactions, or religious ritual, issues that fall under the rubric of personal status law. Formally, these are relegated to the domain of Islamic law. Thus, depending on the degree of her family's support, a woman may inherit land, choose her husband, or leave an unhappy marriage. On the other hand, she may not enjoy these rights if she does not have the backing of her immediate kin.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Adra, Qabyala. The tribal concept in the Central Highlands of the Yemen Arab Republic, Ph.D. diss., Temple University, Ann Arbor 1982, 104-211.
- H. al-'Awdī, Al-turāth al-sha'bi wa 'alāqatuhu bi-al-tanmiyya fi al-bilād al-nāmiyya. Dirāsa taḥqīqiyya 'an al-mujtama' al-Yamani, San'a 1980.
- D. Chatty, Mobile pastoralists. Development, planning and social change in Oman, New York 1996.
- S. al-Muṭayrī, Al-dīwān al-atharī. 'Ādāt wa-turāth al-bādiya. Al-a'rāf wa-al-muṭāla'āt al-qabaliyya, Kuwait 1984.
- H. Qāyid, Bādiya li-al-amārāt. Taqālid wa 'ādāt. U.A.E., n.d.

NAJWA ADRA

Indonesia

THE MAIN FEATURES OF ADAT INHERITANCE LAW

In Indonesian customary law (commonly called adat), the law of inheritance is comprised of rules governing the process of transfer and retention of family property, both material (such as land property, money, house) and immaterial (involving any legal rights and responsibilities of the deceased when alive, such as debts, mortgage, the right of land control, and similar matters), from one generation to the next (ter Haar 1950, 197). This is one aspect of adat substantive law that is inseparable from the law of marriage, in which the principles of life arising from a communal way of thinking are reflected very strongly in the teaching of preserving equilibrium and harmony within the family, the core component of the community structure. What makes the adat law of inheritance so distinct is that the process of transferring property does not focus on the death of the parents or of a particular person in one generation but is believed to have commenced with the family's original formation (Hadikusuma 1980, 18-19). Thus, although the death of a parent can be an important event for the future of the family bond, this does not mean that the transfer of property hinges on this fact, since the transfer is seen as a continuing process and can take place without any such event.

The importance of equilibrium in the community seems to be a legal foundation for dealing with transfer of property within the family, and this principle extends not only toward that which exists between man and nature but also between man and woman in the family sphere. As the welfare of the family means also in turn the welfare of the community at large, the estate transfer mechanisms should ideally be undertaken in such a way as to avoid disturbing the harmony of the family bond. Differently put, the property, whether material or immaterial, is transferred through whatever method of succession can best ensure the wellbeing of the next generation in the family, so that in turn the wellbeing of the community can be preserved. As a consequence, the mechanism of the inheritance law does not involve any complicated mathematical calculation of estate division. In principle, all the heirs can receive equal portions of the estate without consideration of gender, age, or religious belief. As long as the heirs belong to one genealogical network, the vertical transfer of property can theoretically be assumed.

On a practical level, more often than not preference is given to those heirs most in need of the estate. In this case, the economic function of the estate thus operates as a kind of primary reason for the transfer. If so, the first consideration is given not to the owner of the property in question but to the role of the estate as capital for assuring the welfare of the living members of the family. Therefore, in adat law, distribution of the estate can commence even while the parents are still alive. Whenever the children are in need of resources, the transfer of the property can be pursued. Nor is this regarded as a gift, because, when the parent dies, the child who had received the wealth before will not receive any further share of the estate. The main point of concern therefore lies in the variable of social justice among family members, since the main consideration is not how soon the wealth can be divided but how the estate can be used to the maximal benefit of all family members (especially children and any surviving parent) on an equal basis.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN

In practical terms, the adat law of inheritance is inseparably linked to the clan system embraced in the community. For this reason, women can play a key role in division of the estate. Here, the procedure of transferring the estate in adat law theoretically follows a particular pattern depending on how the community organizes its clanship, whether along patrilineal, matrilineal, or parental lines (Hadikusuma 1991, 63–146).

In the patriarchal system, where a man is regarded as the head of the family, it is only the sons who are, theoretically, allowed to inherit the estate from the deceased. This means that women are marginalized, since the daughters or female members of the family will only receive shares if they happen to be the widow of the deceased or daughters who are entitled to be considered as sons by virtue of marriage. This pattern is found in some places that preserve the patriarchal system of clanship, such as that in Batak (North Sumatra), Lampung (Sumatra), Bali, and Rote Island in Eastern Nusa Tenggara. In many instances, the patriarchal pattern of the inheritance is characterized by a preference for designating the agnatic son – in many places the first-born son in the family – as the one responsible for the future of the whole of the family, especially when the father may be very old or incapable of taking care of the family, or even deceased. Here, the sense of the wealth as capital for the economic well-being of the family is very strong, and it is the son who seems to be the one expected to take on the economic burden. The preference shown to the son by entrusting him with the property is usually understood as giving him the means to discharge his responsibility. Thus in practice the estate is not to be divided among the heirs in advance but placed under the authority of the first-born son and kept undivided until all the heirs marry and establish their own families, at which time they usually need their share of the estate in order to get started in life. This is but one of two types of collective inheritance in adat law. The other is what is called the mayorat system, in which the estate is not divided but instead placed under the collective authority of all agnatic sons and not just the first-born, to be used as a resource for the family's well-being.

By contrast, in a matrilineal system of inheritance, women take precedence in division of the estate, in keeping with the tradition in matrilineal society where the female is the locus of authority within the family. In some matrilineal adat circles, such as in Minangkabau (West Sumatra) and some regions of South Sumatra, the mother and her family exercise leadership so that only relatives on the mother's side manage and share the estate of the deceased (Rajo Penghulu 1994, 113–18). Thus what we find in matrilineal collective inheritance is that the entire network of relatives on the mother's side retains authority over the estate and enjoys the right to benefit from it at the direction of a single female heir. In some places, this kind of management of the estate is common practice as regards the ownership of land originally owned by the predecessors of the mother's family. As in the patriarchal method, the mayorat system applies here too, although in the matrilineal model the first-born daughter takes responsibility along with the first-born son of the family, so that the two relatives work together to preserve the estate for the sake of the family's welfare.

In contrast to the gender-based underpinnings of these two models, the parental system prescribes that both sons and daughters have equal rights to the estate. Thus whereas in patrilineal or matrilineal communities either only men or only women control the inheritance (with the consequence that gender alienation may then result from such a framework), the parental system sees no point in differentiating between the two sexes, and assigns them equal rights in the succession. In consequence, the estate in the parental inheritance model devolves not only on the heirs on the mother's or father's side, but on all descendants of either sex. The children or heirs of the estate are therefore not viewed as belonging to one side of the family or the other, but are equally entitled to inherit from either parent. This is the system that is most commonly found in the adat law of inheritance in the Indonesian archipelago. In the adat-based communities of Aceh and North Sumatra, most regions in South Sumatra, Java, Madura, Kalimantan and Sulawesi, as well as in most of the eastern archipelago, the parental system of inheritance is favored (Hadikusuma 1991, 109). In contrast to the patrilineal and matrilineal systems, which are dominated by the collectivist approach to estate allotment, the parental system is, in practice, more individualist in nature since the division takes into account each of the heirs, irrespective of gender. As each individual heir has the right to an allotment from the estate, it is usually divided as soon as all the heirs come to an agreement as to its division. In the parental system, therefore, there is no concept of authorizing a particular successor or group of successors in a single family line to administer the estate as found in the matrilineal and patrilineal systems.

GENDER EQUALITY IN THE RIGHTS OF PROPERTY

Regardless of the differences in the division of the estate inherent in the various clan systems described here, all adat law circles in the archipelago have this much in common: the assets owned by the father's or the mother's side before marriage are distinguished from those obtained subsequent to their marriage (Soepomo 2000, 85–90). The marriage thus becomes the dividing line: property accruing to the couple as a result of their engagement is treated in a distinct fashion from property acquired through earnings or other sources, an important consideration when calculating the estate on the death of one of the spouses. As a consequence, property of the first category obtained by each party before their marriage is counted as property that should be returned to or retained by the late spouse's original family line, while the second category, namely property obtained after the marriage, will automatically go to the heirs: the surviving spouse and their children. On a practical level, this legal norm varies greatly, depending upon how people value gender status in the society. In patriarchal societies, the authority over the couple's property is so decidedly in the hands of the father or his family line as to give him considerable power over the distribution of the family's wealth. This logic is largely repeated in matrilineal societies, where the mother and her family line dominate the wealth and keep much of her own family's wealth separate from the couple's.

The concept of common property, owned jointly by a couple, is more characteristic of the parental society, which sees the husband and wife as equal partners in the marriage bond. In this way claims to the property are based on the view of the wife and husband as having equal rights before the law (Prins 1950, 290–1). Since property acquired during the marriage is held jointly by both partners, they retain equal rights to it. Such property is viewed as indivisible, unless the marriage is dissolved, or until one of the couple dies. Even here the common feature prevails that they do not divide the estate directly but use it for preserving the lifestyle of the family. It is usually the surviving parent (widow or widower) who takes on the role of directing the estate, and if there is a decision to divide it, that parent will automatically receive a half share of the common property, while the other half will be distributed evenly to all the children of the marriage. Such a method is believed essential to maintaining peace within the family and, by extension, the equilibrium of the community at large.

This now appears to be the trend in modern Indonesia and it seems to reflect the Western concern for gender equality, which has in fact gained considerable ground in the country since its independence in 1945. Thus any legal values, whether from adat or Islamic law, that are viewed as raw material for the construction of a national law, are made to conform to this concept of gender equity (Bowen 2003). That the parental system of inheritance in adat is now meant to be the current model of inheritance law in the country is furthermore completely in line with the movement to interpret Islamic law in accordance with gender equality (Hazairin 1964).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. R. Bowen, Islam, law and equality in Indonesia. An anthropology of public reasoning, Cambridge 2003.
- B. ter Haar, Beginnselen en stelsel van het adatrecht, Groningen 1939, 1950⁴.
- H. Hadikusuma, Adat inheritance law [in Indonesian], Bandung 1980.
- , Indonesian inheritance law [in Indonesian], Bandung 1991.
- Hazairin, National family law [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1962.
- , Bilateral inheritance law according to the Qur'an [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1964.
- J. F. Holleman, Van Vollenhoven on Indonesian adat law, The Hague 1981.
- M. B. Hooker, Adat law in modern Indonesia, Kuala Lumpur 1978.
- D. S. Lev, The supreme court and adat inheritance law in Indonesia, in American Journal of Comparative Law 11 (1972), 205–24.
- I. H. Dt. Rajo Penghulu, Basic knowledge of the adat of Minangkabau [in Indonesian], 6th ed., Bandung 1994.
- J. Prins, Adat en Islametische Plichtenleer in Indonesië, The Hague 1948, 1950².
- , Adat law and Muslim religious law in modern Indonesia, in Die Welt des Islams, 1 (1951), 283–300.
- R. Soepomo, Chapters on adat law [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1967, 2000¹⁵.

Mashriq Beduins

People of the rural Mashriq, who identify themselves as badū (nomadic) or ḥaḍarī (settled), by tribal or family descent or locality, understand customary law (ʿurf, from the root ʿ r f, to know, to recognize) as the knowledge of jurally based rules and customs known to all, predating Islam and embedded in existing social, economic, and political practices. ʿUrf resolves disputes so both parties reconcile their differences, and the community as a whole moves forward. ʿUrf maintains peace through the restitution of honor to the complainant by reconciliation and compromise, or by compensation for wrongs and injury from the defendant through the efforts of mediators or, if these fail, of arbitrators.

There are said to be private collections of ʿurf judgments and opinions in Arab countries. Juhayna (1983, 283) writes that in the small towns of pre-Wahhābī Najd, judgments concerning property transactions, endowments, wills, inheritances, criminal cases, and other similar issues were recorded, unlike cases settled by reconciliation and compromise. This appears similar to mountain areas of the northern Gulf where people used ʿurf and Sharīʿa law, depending on context. In the 1970s, cases mediated by Rwala shaykhs of Syria were unrecorded. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Western scholars recorded customary law: for example, Burckhardt (1831), Jaussen (1907, 1914, 1927), Musil (1928), Dickson (1949), and Hardy (1963). ʿUrf has common themes and processes yet varies among tribes, families, and villages. Women and their role in ʿurf have received little attention. Three aspects concerning women stand out. First, women remain jural members of their natal family throughout their lives. Second, a woman owns property outright; within marriage, she can invest her property, engage in enterprises, and the proceeds are hers. She may contribute to the household, but it is her husband's duty to support her. Third, women, through their behavior, are the guardians of family honor. Women participate in all aspects of customary law, except feud, raids, and war. Their participation is largely invisible, since male relations represent them in any public forum and where women are disputants, the process takes place at home.

Customary law underpins traditional economic activity. Since women are active economic agents (de Boucheman 1939, 91–2, Metral 1993, 208, Abu Rabia 1994, Lancaster 1981, Lancaster and Lancaster 1999, Lienhardt 2001, 62–3) they become involved in disputes over ownership, boundaries, access, distribution of shares of profits and losses, fulfillment of share contracts, payment of rents or wages, delivery of goods, and the like. Women's investments and enterprises, small and large, place them in the networks of customary contractual transactions underlying regional economic activities. Family economic disputes, usually between husband and wife or mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, are about management of the joint household purse, temporary use of property belonging to one or the other, clarification of exact ownership of shares in property, gifts to kinsmen and affines, and allocations of labor inputs between co-owners or co-users. Economic disputes between the two families are concerned with transfers of outstanding bride price, and the use of property inherited by women.

Women do not fight, except by default: badū women fighting in defense of their own property (Musil 1928); a woman whose camels were raided while her husband was absent raided them back (Lancaster 1981); or a woman may be killed by raiders (Lienhardt 2001, 104). In some tribes, the end of a long-standing feud is marked by a woman of the aggressor's family being given in marriage to the victim's (Jaussen 1907, Lienhardt 2001).

Customary law, in conjunction with Islamic law, regulated marriage and family relationships. Within a working descent group, many marriages are between relatively close paternal cousins; some involve more distant paternal cousins; and a few involve individuals of genealogically distant groups linked by marriage over generations. With such preferred marriages, most individuals have networks of close or distant relations from both parents that spread within and across tribe and family. The internal dynamics of male descent groups are achieved through women drawing families closer and distancing others. Marriage becomes legal through the transfer of bride price and its various components. Groups vary in details, but the general principles compensate a woman's family for the cost of her upbringing, establish the new family unit, and provide for the woman should there be a divorce.

Only husbands can pronounce divorce, but a woman has customary procedures to persuade her husband to divorce her. Initially, she appeals to his generosity and honor. If this fails, she can return to her home for the support of her father and brothers. If her father insists she returns, and her husband makes her an attractive present, the marriage continues. If the marriage worsens, she may try behaving so badly her husband divorces her. She may return home repeatedly, but if she gets no support from her father and brothers, she may decide to flee and take protection from a leading man of good public reputation, a shaykh. He cannot refuse her appeal, and makes her whereabouts known to the husband and her family so that a settlement can be reached. She puts her case (lack of economic support, overwork, bad interaction with his female relations, his wish to move far from her family, sexual problems, brutality, coercion to agree to the marriage from her father) to the shaykhly women who pass it, along with their comments and advice, onto the shaykh, in her hearing. He mediates between her, the husband, and her father and brothers in terms of honorable behavior; if the husband agrees to a divorce, mediation continues and turns to questions of returning part of the bride price and the future of children, if any. Among shaykhly families, where marriages often have complicated political and economic factors, it is more difficult for a woman to end a marriage.

Customary law holds that anyone fleeing from vengeance has the right to seek protection and that it must be granted. It is the duty of the protector to inform the victim's family's representative of the killer's whereabouts, and initiate the processes toward restitution and compensation. Known killings by women are of their husbands, by accident in a rage, or by intent when consistently refused a divorce by him and their male relatives, and circumstances prevented flight (Lancaster 1981).

Many communities and groups have few honor killings; some, for example parts of mountain Jordan and Palestine, have more. Some groups and individuals regard women as jurally equal and autonomous individuals but men act for them in public arenas; others view women as the jural responsibility of fathers and brothers. Honor killings arise when a woman is thought to have behaved dishonorably by her male relations. Fleeing to take protection was a customary procedure; the shaykhas often gave protection themselves, faced down furious brothers in search of their sister, and mediated a solution through husbands or brothers with the girl's family. A killing within the family can have no vengeance in 'urf. Pregnancy before marriage is known; in some groups the girl is killed, in others, the family make the man responsible marry her. It is said illegitimate children are known in some groups in southern Oman. Married women quietly entertaining lovers when the husband is absent is considered by most to concern only husband and wife.

'Urf dispute settlement starts with those closest to the disputants offering advice, calls on precedent, and appeals for reconciliation and compromise. Respected women are consulted and mediate within and between families. Processes are informal until a settlement is near when some formality is seen. The disputants, with the mediator/s, agree to a settlement with witnesses who swear oaths to the agreement, especially if property is involved. Witnesses are summoned and testimony heard, verified by ordeals or sworn oaths; a woman's testimony is worth half that of a man. At this level, the mediator is rarely a woman unless the dispute is between women; even then, many prefer a male mediator, with the women represented by close male relations. Neither side need accept a mediation, and disputes can drag on for years.

Arbitration is binding on the disputants; a few shaykhs mediate but refuse to arbitrate, pushing the responsibility for settlement back on the disputants and their families. A mediated settlement or an arbitration are formal as the shaykh or shaykha "sits," both parties to the dispute are present with witnesses, and the language used is formal.

Customary law functioned through a popular understanding of its rules and procedures and its experts with their specialized knowledge of particular corpuses of law and wide experience. Women had an integral role. Though replaced by national law, 'urf continues; customary law and state law elide or are in conflict (Lancaster and Lancaster 1999, 366–72, 381–2).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. A. A. al-Abli, al-'Alāqa bayn al-jalwa wa-bayn al-tadīl al-ijtimā'ī fi jam'iyya badawīyya manzilī, M.A. thesis, Yarmuk University, Jordan 1996.
- A. Abu Rabia, The Negev Bedouin and livestock rearing, Oxford 1994.
- J. L. Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins and Wahabys, London 1831, repr. London 1967.
- A. de Boucheman, Une petite cité caravanière. Suḥné, Damascus 1939.
- H. R. P. Dickson, The Arab of the desert, London 1949.
- J. Ginat, Meshamas. The outcast in Bedouin society, in Nomadic Peoples 12 (1983), 26–47.
- M. J. L. Hardy, Blood feuds and the payment of blood money in the Middle East, Beirut 1963.
- A. Jaussen, Coutumes des Arabes au pays de Moab, Paris 1907, repr. Paris 1947.
- , Naplouse et son district, Paris 1927.
- A. Jaussen and R. Savignac, Coutumes des Fuqara, supplement to A. Jaussen and R. Savignac, Mission archéologique en Arabie, ii, Paris 1914, repr. Paris 1920.
- U. M. al-Juhany, The History of Najd prior to the Wahabis, Ph.D. diss., University of Washington 1983.
- W. Lancaster, The Rwala Bedouin today, Cambridge 1981, Prospect Heights, Ill. 1997², updated 2000.
- W. Lancaster and F. Lancaster, People, land and water in the Arab Middle East, Amsterdam 1999.
- P. Lienhardt, Shaikhdoms of eastern Arabia, ed. A. al-Shahi from Liendhardt's Ph.D. thesis 1957, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hants 2001.
- F. Metral, Elevage et agriculture dans l'oasis de Sukhne (Syrie). Gestion de risques par les commerçants-entrepreneurs, in R. Bocco, R. Jaubert, and F. Metral (eds.),

- Steppes d'Arabie. Etats, pasteurs, agriculteurs et commerçants*, Paris 1993, 195–222.
 A. Musil, Arabia Deserta, New York 1927.
 —, The Manners and customs of the Rwala Bedouins, New York 1928.

WILLIAM LANCASTER AND FELICITY LANCASTER

Sub-Saharan Africa

How do women use and participate in customary processes of dispute resolution? How do customary and Islamic legal traditions coexist? There is much variation in the position of women and the status of gender relationships vis-à-vis customary law in Sub-Saharan Africa, particularly in Muslim areas where women may also be subject to Islamic law. It is difficult to define what constitutes customary law. In Sub-Saharan Africa, “customary law” has had many meanings: it refers to indigenous African legal institutions, to different kinds of formal and informal social control, and to colonial attempts to restrain subject populations through codification of what they perceived as indigenous law. Law and law-related behaviors are, of course, subject to and dependent upon the cultural, social, and political environments. Law is thus constantly changing and is infinitely variable, and that which is (or should be) considered customary is highly contested.

Women’s rights, social status, and access to different forums for dispute resolution vary tremendously across cultures in Sub-Saharan Africa, and they have been subject to significant internal and external changes – particularly with the spread of Islam, the imposition of colonial rule, and later with independence. Although there is much variation in indigenous African legal thought and procedure, some generalities can be addressed concerning the status of women and gender roles. Throughout Africa, much of precolonial law was highly flexible in the sense that it was tailored to meet specific needs in special circumstances – little was codified. In the precolonial era, disputes were often subject to a range of mediation options. In much of Africa, elders have held a great deal of authority in their communities and they often played the lead role in handling disputes. Disputes in the past were most often dealt with at home or in community forums; this is still common in many parts of Africa today, even though most populations are also subject to state law. In Zanzibar, now a semi-autonomous island state of Tanzania, disputes were taken first to the wazee, the family elders. While men generally took charge of the proceedings, women’s opinions were valued, and a woman could take the lead in resolving a dispute, particularly if she headed a household involved. If the elders failed to resolve the matter, it was taken to the sheha, a community leader (almost always male). The final resort was the kadhi, in Arabic qāḍī, or Islamic judge – also male. This basic course of action is still followed today, although the role of the sheha and kadhi feature more prominently because they are the state-sanctioned means of handling disputes. While elders remain the first resort, some bemoan the loss of their authority to the state.

THE SPREAD OF ISLAM

The spread of Islam into Sub-Saharan Africa brought with it important changes in legal thought, means of social control, and dispute resolution. Although some scholars argue that Islamic law is not indigenous because it was introduced through the gradual spread of Islam, it has become local in many parts of Africa. Communities and individuals have different ways of interpreting and applying Islamic law and viewing the relationships between customary and Islamic law. Also, women and men can have different ways of framing legal claims and articulating the differences between Islamic and customary law. In some communities of East Africa, for example, Swahili men tend to frame disputes with reference to Islamic law while women are more likely to draw on mila, or custom. Despite cross-cultural variation, there are some important general distinctions between Islamic law and customary African legal norms. For example, the acceptance of Islamic law brought with it an increased focus on the rights of the individual over the kinship group. The acceptance of Islamic law also had an important impact on gender relationships because of differences in marriage, inheritance, and land-usage rights. Sometimes women gained rights with Islam and sometimes they lost rights. Thus, the arrival of Islamic law should not be viewed as either progressive or regressive in this regard. In some areas, such as northern Nigeria, women benefited from the acceptance of Islamic legal norms that brought inheritance rights to women that they had not previously enjoyed. In others, such as eighteenth-century Sudan, women lost advantages when the acceptance of Islam influenced inheritance practice and domestic relationships of production by drawing women away from their conventional roles in the productive sector (Spaulding 1984).

THE COLONIAL PERIOD

The colonial period brought significant legal change and affected women’s legal practice in important ways. The imperial governments approached the relationship between Islamic and customary law differently in separate areas. In some places, Islamic and customary law were regarded as one and the same, while elsewhere they held different status. In northern Nigeria, Zanzibar, and Sudan, the British kept a separate Islamic legal system in place. Similar recognition was given to Islamic legal authorities in French-held Senegal. In British Tanganyika and Gambia, on the other hand, courts applied both Islamic law and customary law depending on the circumstances of a particular case. In other regions, such as Sierra Leone and Northern Rhodesia, colonial powers equated Islamic law with customary law – and this was the only basis on which Muslims could use Islamic law.

The colonial era had a great impact on how the subject of customary law is addressed. Many scholars agree that what is referred to as “customary” is in fact a creation of colonial governments, which attempted to control their subject populations by codifying customary law. In Tanganyika, for example, the British attempted to identify broad themes in indigenous legal thought and dispute resolution, which were then given the status of “customary” and considered applicable to the indigenous populations. Codifying customary law was not necessarily beneficial to women, and in some cases women lost significant status through the codification process because culturally specific norms involving bridewealth, divorce, and family roles that had privileged women were overlooked. Furthermore, because colonial authorities most often consulted with male elders about norms of customary law, the elders were able to use the opportunity to “create” customary law to attempt to gain greater control over women (Chanock 1982). Similarly, codification sometimes exaggerated the power of chiefs over community disputes to the extent that formerly important roles of diviners and spirit mediums, often women, were diminished. The same could be true for previously autonomous groups such as age sets, women’s organizations, and individual households (Mamdani 1996). Women also sometimes suffered an economic loss when customary law was codified: women’s traditional roles as property holders were overlooked, and their possessions could be delegated to their husband’s ownership.

In many areas, colonialism created additional legal options for resolving disputes; scholars call the existence of such options “legal pluralism.” This was of particular importance to women because in the arena of family law – specifically marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance – different legal standards were potentially recognized within one territory. This has the potential to benefit women because the introduction of new legal ideas can influence how rights are understood and defined and can change the proportional power of disputants. This may benefit women when the new rights serve to improve their “bargaining power” in social and commercial relationships with men (Merry 1982). However, the reverse can also be true because new laws may undermine previous rights of women. For example, among the Lunda of Zambia, divorce for women was easier to obtain before the colonial government required in 1930 that the Native Court issue a certificate of divorce. In colonial Zanzibar women were able to obtain divorces more easily from Islamic judges than in the British courts.

THE POSTCOLONIAL PERIOD

With the dawn of independence in the mid-twentieth century, the status and application of customary law went through important changes. There have been significant differences in the ways in which newly independent states addressed issues surrounding customary and Islamic law, particularly regarding women’s status and rights. Interestingly, much of anti-colonial politics of the 1950s both focused on the ideal of a unified legal system for the new states and advocated respect for indigenous law and institutions – this occasionally resulted in a blend of customary and received law in the new states (Mamdani 1994). Some states, such as the former French colonies Mali, Niger, Senegal, and Côte d’Ivoire abolished customary courts altogether, including Islamic courts. Elsewhere, customary law and Islamic courts were preserved, as in Nigeria, where the Islamic courts provided an important means for women to pursue their rights. The official status of Islamic law in Nigeria has been controversial in recent years; this is particularly true since the reintroduction of criminal law in the northern states. In East Africa, Sudan’s reforms in the early phases of independence sought to improve women’s status under family law by easing judicial divorce in abusive marriage and improving women’s rights to maintenance by their husbands. As in Nigeria, the status of Islamic law has also been controversial in later years.

Many new civil codes in the independent states sought to improve women’s status through legal means. After liberation from Ethiopia in the early 1990s, Eritrea instituted a civil code with the aim of improving women’s status by changing customary marriage and divorce practice. Earlier, Tanzania instituted similar wide reforms by attempting to articulate principles of family law, Islamic, customary, and Christian, in the Marriage Act of 1971. The act set the minimum age of marriage for both girls and boys, and respected customary marriages by acknowledging both monogamous and polygamous marriage. Certain provisions in the act can be read as an attempt by President Nyerere to quell religious controversy in Tanzania by accommodating the needs of a religiously plural population. Although it is part of Tanzania, this act does not affect Zanzibar, where few provisions have been made in either the colonial or independence periods for customary law. Anderson argued that this was because mila, which he translates as customary law, was already infused with Shāfiʿī Islamic legal ideas, and thus was not in contradiction with Islamic law and needed no separate recognition (1955). In Zanzibar today, Islamic courts have jurisdiction over all family and personal status law and Islamic law remains essentially uncodified.

Throughout Africa today, women are faced with multiple legal options, some formal and some informal, and they make decisions influenced by family members, the perceived likelihood of a particular outcome in a particular venue, and potential stigma associated with a particular legal option. A woman's socioeconomic status and education affects her litigation strategies, and her social networks influence how she learns about and uses legal forums. The status of customary vis-à-vis other types of law remains an important issue throughout Sub-Saharan Africa, particularly concerning gender and women's rights. A famous Kenyan case that favored customary law illustrates this. In the 1980s, a widow named Wambui Otieno was vying with her deceased husband's clan for the right to bury his body. Because no written law applied, the Kenyan courts decided that customary law must be followed, and the deceased's clan was given the right to bury the body.

The anthropologist S. E. Merry has pointed out that the existence of different fields of law is particularly important to women when there is a resulting variation in the way in which areas of women's rights are defined – as in marriage, divorce, inheritance, property, and child custody (1982). In Zanzibar, many women feel that times have changed for the better because women today have easier access to legal means for resolving disputes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. N. D. Anderson, Customary law and Islamic law in British African territories, in Afrika Instituut (Netherlands), The future of customary law in Africa. L'Avenir du droit coutumier en Afrique. Symposium-Colloque, Amsterdam, 1955, Leiden 1956, 70–87.

- , Islamic law in Africa, London 1954, repr. 1970.
- P. Caplan, “Law” and “custom.” Marital disputes on Northern Mafia Island, Tanzania, in P. Caplan (ed.), Understanding disputes. The politics of argument, Oxford 1995, 203–21.
- M. Chanock, Making customary law. Men, women, and courts in colonial northern Rhodesia, in M. J. Hay and M. Wright (eds.), African women and the law. Historical perspectives, Boston 1982, 53–67.
- , Law, custom and social order. The colonial experience in Malawi and Zambia, Cambridge 1985.
- T. O. Elias, The nature of African customary law, Manchester, England 1956.
- A. Griffiths, In the shadow of marriage. Gender and justice in an African community, Chicago 1997.
- M. J. Hay and M. Wright (eds.), African women and the law. Historical perspectives, Boston 1982.
- J. F. Holleman, Issues in African law, The Hague 1972.
- M. Mamdani, Citizen and subject. Contemporary Africa and the legacy of late colonialism, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- K. Mann and Roberts, Law in colonial Africa, Portsmouth, N.H. 1991.
- S. E. Merry, The articulation of legal spheres, in M. J. Hay and M. Wright (eds.), African women and the law. Historical perspectives, Boston 1982, 68–89.
- , Law and colonialism, in Law and Society Review 25:4 (1991), 889–922.
- S. F. Moore, Social facts and fabrications. “Customary law” on Kilimanjaro, 1880–1980, Cambridge 1986.
- J. Spaulding, The misfortunes of some – the advantage of others. Land sales by women in Sinar, in M. J. Hay and M. Wright (eds.), African women and the law. Historical perspectives, Boston 1982, 3–18.
- P. Stamp, Burying Otieno. The politics of gender and ethnicity in Kenya, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 16:41 (Summer 1991), 808–45.

ERIN E. STILES

Turkey

Turkey is unique in the Muslim world with respect to the extent and progressive nature of Family Code reforms affecting women's lives. The founding of the Turkish Republic in 1923 brought an end to the Ottoman Empire's system of parallel laws and established a single, secular, and standardized judicial system adapted from the European system of law. The introduction in 1926 of the Turkish Civil Code, adapted from the Swiss Civil Code, was a major success of the reformists against the conservative forces defending the Islamic Family Code. The new Civil Code abolished polygyny and granted women equal rights in matters of divorce, child custody, and inheritance. However, to this day, customary and religious practices continue to be more influential in the daily lives of millions of women in Turkey than the Civil Code; this is especially the case for women living in eastern Turkey.

The young republic's project of creating a state based on the rule of law was an important development with respect to women. Prior to 1923, laws were based on the religious or customary laws of a particular community, and different laws applied depending on a citizen's religion, gender, occupational status, or sect. Though for Muslim women the Qur'an was the basic source of family law, particular interpretations and practices depended on the religion, sect, ethnic group, class, and region to which a woman belonged.

Women are those who are generally most disadvantaged in societies where parallel legal systems exist (separate judicial systems for religious or ethnic minorities, or judicial systems whose laws are based on traditions that vary from one region to another), as the laws implemented tend to be the ones with the most negative consequences for women (Shaheed 1994). The new republic's establishment of a modern legal system had two significant advantages for women in Turkey: first, the uniform legal system provided a basis for counteracting or diminishing the harmful impacts of the parallel legal systems on women; second, the new Civil Code undermined the traditional power of religious authorities – including the religious right – over laws pertaining to family, whereas the previous parallel system allowed religious fundamentalists to impose laws in their particular religious communities that were severely discriminatory to women (Ali and Arif 1994, WRAG 1997).

The initial republican reforms aimed at a unified, secular law, and later improvements in the legal domain have signified the end of the official validity of religious and customary laws in Turkey. However, these often continue to shape the daily lives of women, depending on their class, geographical region, and the ethnic and/or religious group to which they belong. The negative impacts of religious/customary practices are generally more severe for women of lower educational and socioeconomic levels; women living in economically disadvantaged regions and women of minority groups are most often unable to benefit from legal reform, as for example is the case for Kurdish women living in eastern Turkey.

Thus, while practices such as early and forced marriages, honor crimes, religious marriages, and polygynous marriages constitute clear violations of either Turkish Civil or Penal Code laws, these all continue to occur. The Turkish constitution and the Civil Code both enshrine the principle of civil marriage, and religious marriages have no validity under Turkish law. Polygamy is forbidden and a religious marriage ceremony cannot be held before a civil one (Articles 130, 143, 145 and 174 of the Turkish Civil Code). Violation of the law regarding civil marriage is a criminal offense for both the couple and the person who conducts such a ceremony (Article 237 of the Turkish Penal Code). However, effective enforcement of these laws is rare. In 2000, 75 years after the enactment of these laws, 7.4 percent of all marriages in Turkey were religious only and lacked a civil marriage contract, and the majority of these (53 percent) occurred in eastern Turkey (DGSPW 2001). Moreover, research shows that one in ten women in eastern Turkey is in a polygynous marriage, despite the ban on polygamy (Ilkkaracan and WWHR 1998).

The higher prevalence of religious and customary practices in eastern Turkey, many in violation of Turkish law, can be attributed in part to socioeconomic conditions, which progressively worsen from west to east; to the dominance of a tribal system among the Kurdish population that constitutes the majority in eastern Turkey; and to legal and non-legal discrimination affecting the Kurdish population as a minority in Turkey. The tribal structures (aşiret) dominating the Kurdish population are organized around large, clan-like families with tribal leaders and are based on a feeling of group solidarity involving large numbers of extended family members. The members are deemed to be responsible for upholding customary laws and practices, including early marriage, bride price, and so-called honor crimes, which are based on an ideology that assumes women's bodies are the property of the extended family/tribe/community, and that the honor of the extended family is dependent on the chastity of its women. In addition, Turkish is the only official language of all governmental institutions, including judicial ones, and Kurdish women, who speak little or no Turkish, are left with little recourse to the law for protection.

Research shows a wide range of religious and customary practices are negatively impacting women in eastern Turkey. For example, 16.3 percent of women living in the region were married before the age of 15, the minimum legal age for marriage according to the Civil Code until 2001 (the minimum legal age for marriage was raised to 18 for both sexes in 2001). More than half the women (50.8 percent) were married without their consent, although the consent of both parties is a precondition of marriage according to Turkish law. The percentage of women who thought they would be killed by their husbands and/or families if they committed adultery was 67 percent, although adultery is not even considered to be a crime under Turkish law (Ilkcaracan and WWHR 1998).

The experience of Turkey shows that legal measures alone are not at all enough to prevent the negative impacts of religious and customary practices for women; their prevention requires an effective and holistic women's human rights agenda, integrated with local and national social policies and politics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

S. S. Ali and K. Arif, Blind justice for all? Parallel judicial systems in Pakistan. Implications and consequences for human rights, Grabels, France 1994.

DGPSW (Directorate General on the Status and Problems of Women), Türkiye'de kadın, 2001, Ankara 2001.

P. Ilkcaracan and WWHR (Women for Women's Human Rights), Exploring the context of sexuality in eastern Turkey, in Reproductive Health Matters 6 (1998), 66–75, available at <<http://www.wwhr.org/?id=743>>.

F. Shaheed, Controlled or autonomous. Identity and the experience of the network, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, in Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 19 (1994), 997–1019.

WRAG (Women's Research Action Group), Women, law and customary practices, Mumbai 1997.

PINAR ILKKARACAN

Law: Enforcement

East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific

The conditions and situations of prisons and prisoners in the region are dependent upon economic growth, the legal system, management or administration, law enforcement, and the political situation. In this context, Islamic culture might have only a little impact. For instance, prison conditions in Brunei Darussalam and Malaysia are different, although both are Islamic countries. In fact, the classic Islamic criminal law is mainly based on hudūd, such as stoning to death and cutting off of hands, and not on a prison system. This does not mean that the prison system is unjustified. Instead, Islamic criminal law proposes taʿzīr, which means that Islamic judges are free to punish the offender in cases of minor felony equivalents (which are not found in the Qurʾān) in almost any fashion, including sending him/her to prison. Whilst hudūd crimes have fixed punishments, as set down by God, and found in the Qurʾān, and therefore are seen as crimes against God's law, taʿzīr crimes are crimes against society (Malekian 1994).

Based on data from 2000, women prisoners constituted 5.1 percent of the total number of all prisoners in the Asia and Pacific region (APCCA 2000). However, there were several countries that had higher than this average proportion: Thailand (17.4 percent), Hong Kong (China) (10.4 percent), Macau (China) (8.7 percent), and Singapore (8.2 percent). By contrast, the proportions were very low in the Pacific island nations of Fiji (1.4 percent), Tonga (1.5 percent), and Kiribati (1.8 percent). All of the other nations in the region had proportions of women prisoners between these figures (APCCA 2000).

One of the possible explanations is that less highly developed nations have lower proportions of women offenders. In other words, nations with a high level of socioeconomic development might generally have higher proportions of women prisoners. Another explanation could be that it is cultural and historical considerations that mark the difference. For instance, in Cambodia there has been no apparent marked increase in women prisoners, while in Kiribati the number of women prisoners is kept very small by the common practice of courts suspending a sentence if the offender is female. In Brunei Darussalam, the total number of women prisoners remained relatively stable between 2000 and 2004, but in most years the majority of female prisoners are foreigners.

Some countries have experienced extreme increases in the numbers of women prisoners, which might be seen as a reason for management concern. In Australia, for example, there have been increases in all jurisdictions except South Australia, while in New Zealand the female prison population increased by 162 percent between June 1986 and June 2000 (APCCA 2000). In Thailand the rate of increase in the female prison population dramatically exceeded the equivalent rate for male prisoners, and this trend is predicted to continue. Even in Japan, where prison populations generally are very stable, there has been an increase in the number of women prisoners of 44 percent between 1998 and 2004. In Malaysia the number of women prisoners has fluctuated over the past decade, but in 2002–4 the numbers have doubled, while in Singapore, since 1993, there has been an increase in female penal offender numbers, but not in numbers of convicted female drug addicts (APCCA 2000).

Regardless of these statistical proportions, women prisoners have special needs, particularly with regard to health care, substance abuse, and family responsibilities. In addition, issues relating to pregnancy, childbirth, contraception, menstruation, and lesbian relationships are of more or less greater relevance in individual cases. In general, arrangements have been made for pregnant women prisoners to deliver their babies in public hospitals rather than in prison. This has ensured that professional obstetric assistance was available and also avoided the stigma of having a prison named as the place of birth on the birth certificate.

There are different approaches, however, as to whether or not mothers in prison should be allowed to keep their babies with them and, if so, for how long. In Japan, mothers are allowed to keep their babies with them for up to one year, while in Kiribati the baby may stay only whilst the mother is lactating. The maximum period in both Singapore and Hong Kong (China) is three years. In Singapore, women prisoners who are young mothers are offered an 8-week parenting course (APCCA 2000).

In New Zealand, facilities are provided for babies to stay with their mothers in prison. Alternatively, prisoner mothers may be granted early or temporary release. If this is not practicable, arrangements can be made for daily visits to the prison by the baby for breast-feeding, in an appropriate setting. Arrangements can also be made, where necessary, for mothers to express their milk, for delivery to the baby located elsewhere (Kingi 2000). In Korea, it is possible for mothers to keep their babies with them in prison for up to 18 months, while the specified limit in Vietnam is two years. In Thailand, the upper limit is three years. The age limit for children to stay with their mothers is not specified in Cambodia, but the regulations provide for a mother with a baby to receive an extra one half of the adult food ration (APCCA 2000).

In Malaysia, mothers are allowed to keep their babies with them in special units in prison, for a period of up to four years, whereas in Brunei Darussalam the limit is three years, and two years in Indonesia. These Muslim countries follow the Qur'ān: "The mothers shall give suck to their children for two whole years, [that is] for those [parents] who desire to complete the term of suckling, but the father of the child shall bear the cost of the mother's food and clothing, on a reasonable basis" (2: 233).

In Malaysia and Brunei Darussalam, women prisoners may be offered vocational training that has a domestic orientation, and that is not necessarily geared to the needs of the outside labor market, such as beauty treatment, hairdressing, cooking, and secretarial skills. In Japan, training to obtain a license for care/service for the elderly is very popular with women prisoners, and is very useful in obtaining employment after release. Women prisoners in Vietnam may be offered work in tailoring, knitting, handicrafts, fine arts, or weaving (APCCA 2000).

In the majority of the nations of the Asia-Pacific region, a strict policy is pursued, requiring women's prisons, or the women's section of mixed prisons, to be staffed by female officers only. In a small number of nations, however, a policy of cross-gender staffing has been developed, which allows male officers to work in female prisons, and, conversely, female officers to work in male prisons. There are always, however, regulations that ensure that searches, and the supervision of ablutions, is undertaken by same-sex officers.

The majority of countries also follow a policy of strict segregation of male and female prisoners. In Sri Lanka, for example, male and female prisoners are strictly separated and females under 22 years are separated from adult females. There are a few exceptions, however, where contact between male and female prisoners is tolerated, and sometimes even encouraged. In the Australian Capital Territory and in Tasmania, for example, men and women can meet in educational classes. If a husband and wife are both in prison, special visits under supervision can be arranged (APCCA 2000).

In Brunei Darussalam, the law prohibits mistreatment of prisoners, and there have been no reports of such mistreatment. Prison conditions generally meet international standards. There is no overcrowding. However, there is a growing prison population. In mid 2002, there were only 31 women in prison, whereas the number of male prisoners was 423. All prisoners also receive regular medical checkups. The government is generally quick to investigate allegations of abuse and impose fines and punishment, as warranted. For instance, in September 2000, two members of the Royal Brunei Armed Forces were sentenced to four years imprisonment and three strokes of the cane for the attempted molestation and sodomy of a 20-year-old deaf girl. Approaches in female-connected criminal cases are, however, subject to change. In 1999 a photograph of a man accused of stabbing his wife and assaulting one of his children was published in a daily newspaper, a new development in a country in which privacy is generally closely guarded (United States Department of State 2002).

In Malaysia, prison conditions are poor, and prison overcrowding is also a serious problem. There were 1,328 female prisoners in Malaysian prisons in mid-2002, compared to 27,476 male prisoners. In August 2000, prison officials announced that a number of prison rules would be reviewed (United States Department of State 2002), but problems persist. For instance, Irene Xavire was detained under Malaysia's Internal Security Act (ISA), which allows police to detain people without trial indefinitely, as a preventive measure. Since it was enacted in 1960, during Malaysia's colonial era, this act has been used as justification for the arrest of thousands of activists, students, and politicians. Irene Xavire has told of her own experience, being harassed and beaten with a stick during interrogation sessions. "I had to show a policewoman a soiled sanitary pad before I could get sanitary pads and also get to keep my panties on. The police normally demand that you give up all items of clothing in exchange for the Chinese pants and blouse that they give you" (Xavire 2001).

Béatrice Saubin also told her story. In Malaysia, at age 19, she fell in love with Eddy Tan Kim Soo, a handsome, wealthy Chinese man. They planned to meet in Europe and later marry. But at the airport on her way home, her spanking new Samsonite suitcase – a gift from Eddy – was ripped apart by customs officials. Beatrice was horrified to see that it contained several kilos of heroin. Clearly she had been set up by Eddy, who, it turned out, was a member of a powerful drug cartel. Arrested, she languished in prison for two years before she was tried. Her sentence: death by hanging. On appeal, her sentence was reduced to life in prison. Efforts on the part of her grandmother and an impassioned attorney managed to stir up public opinion, finally leading to Beatrice's release after ten years. While in prison, her spirits were never broken: she taught herself Malaysian and Cantonese; she became a model prisoner and a leader as well as a medical supervisor, caring for her fellow inmates (Saubin 1991).

In Singapore, Malaysia, and Brunei Darussalam, criminal law prescribes caning as an additional punishment to imprisonment for those convicted of certain non-violent crimes, such as narcotics possession, criminal breach of trust, and alien smuggling. The caning, which is carried out with a half-inch-thick wooden cane, commonly causes welts, and sometimes causes scarring. However, male criminals age 50 and above, and women, are exempt from caning.

In Indonesia, the Directorate General of Corrections is under the administration of the ministry of justice. The system used by the directorate in carrying out its responsibilities is based on the pemas-yarakatan system, as stated in Law No. 12 of 1995. This contains the rule that the treatment of offenders is aimed at efforts to manifest social reintegration, that is, the recovery of social relationships, and the unity of the prisoners as individuals, social creatures, and creatures of God.

The directorate currently operates 427 correctional institutions throughout Indonesia. Indonesia has 4 female prisons, whereas 129 units are provided for male prisoners. In mid 2002, there were 2,111 female prisoners, while male prisoners numbered 57,377. However, prison conditions are harsh. Mistreatment, the extortion of inmates by guards, and violence among prisoners is common (United States Department of State 2002). The incidence of mistreatment drops sharply once a prisoner is transferred from police or military custody into the civilian prison system, or into the custody of the attorney general. Nine prisoners died at the Kebon Waru Prison in Bandung, West Java, from untreated illnesses, according to press reports in July 2001. Credible sources report that prisoners in some facilities are beaten routinely and systematically, as punishment for infractions of prison rules and to coerce them into giving information about other prisoners. During an August 2001 raid on Cipinang Prison, in East Jakarta, police seized knives, swords, sickles, machetes, firearms, and hand grenades, which had been smuggled into the prison for the inmates, according to press accounts. It is no secret that prisoners can get better treatment and better conditions by bribing guards.

In relation to overcrowding of prisons in Indonesia, the number of detainees and prisoners increased gradually from 44,344 in 1995 to 48,256 in August 1999. This increase in numbers was likely caused by recent economic, social, and political developments. It was claimed by the office of the Directorate General that numbers were still below the capacity of the Detention Houses and Prisons Branch (APCCA 2000).

In 2003 Scottish academic Lesley McCulloch and her American friend Joy Sadler were accused of violating their tourist visas by carrying out research and cataloguing alleged human rights abuses in Aceh, a province on the northern tip of Sumatra, which had experienced 26-year-long separatist conflict and had been granted by the government the right to institute Shari'a law. McCulloch and Sadler revealed the extent to which they were allegedly assaulted, intimidated, harassed, and forced to witness hour-long torture sessions, while being detained in Indonesia. They say, however, that their treatment was luxurious, compared with the regular severe beatings suffered by other inmates, which, the women claimed, often kept them awake at night. This is a clear example of a political situation influencing the conditions of prisons and prisoners (Aglionby 2002).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Aglionby, British woman held in Indonesian prison tells of beatings and torture of inmates, Guardian, 25 November 2002, <<http://www.guardian.co.uk/indonesia/Story/0,2763,846959,00.html>>.
- APCCA, Record of the twentieth Asian and Pacific Conference of Correctional Administrators, Report prepared and compiled by D. Biles, N. Morgan, and A. McDonald, Sydney, Australia, 5–10 November 2000.
- V. Kingi, The children of women in prison. A New Zealand study, paper presented at the conference on Women in Corrections: Staff and Clients, convened by the Australian Institute of Criminology in conjunction with the Department for Correctional Services SA, Adelaide, 31 October–1 November 2000.
- F. Malekian, The concept of Islamic international criminal law. A comparative study, London 1994.
- B. Saubin, The ordeal. My ten years in a Malaysian prison, trans. B. Brister, New York 2001.
- United States Department of State, Country reports on human rights practices for 2001. Prepared by the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, Washington, D.C. March 2002.

I. Xavire, My experience with police violence as an ISA detainee, 1 May 2001, <<http://dfn.org/voices/malaysia/isatestimony.htm>>.

NADIRSYAH HOSEN

Iran and Afghanistan

IRAN

Long-term prisons in Iran were established in the twentieth century. The replacement of corporal punishment with prolonged incarceration was part of the modernization process in which the traditional dual judicial system of Shari'a (religious) courts and 'urf (secular) courts was being transformed into a uniform one. Yet some components ascribed to modernity go back to the unique case of Qurrat al-'Ayn, a woman leader of the Babi movement in the final phase of medieval judiciary under Nāṣir al-Dīn Shāh (r. 1848–96). She was the only one in the Babi processes (1264–8/1848–52) to be condemned to lifelong imprisonment. The review procedure in 1268/1852 sentenced her to execution, which was non-public, unlike those of other Babīs. She was also the first woman executed for “sowing corruption on earth” (there was no death sentence for women in either Shari'a or 'urf, except for adultery).

THE CONSTITUTIONAL REVOLUTION 1905–9 AND THE PAHLAVI PERIOD (1920–79)

Regular imprisonment of women came into being just before women were granted constitutional rights. The judicial reform by Reza Khan in the early 1920s, however, cut away the power of the Shari'a and spared women the death penalty. In some cases women used this advantage to protect their male relatives from the death penalty. They took the blame for murder or drug dealing upon themselves and went to prison with the tacit approval of judges. However, the discrimination against women in the penal code concerning moral issues such as adultery made women vulnerable to sexual abuse by the police and jail staff.

In the most famous modern prison, Qaṣr, built 1920–25, a separate women's section was planned. In actual fact, women's prisons were merely the most underprivileged sections in men's prisons.

With the reforms of Mohammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79) in the 1960s and 1970s, women were recruited into the police force and trained as wards for women detainees. But this did not lead to a reduction of sexual abuse of female prisoners. The death penalty now also applied to women.

The lack of attention paid to the particular needs of women such as pregnancy care, childcare, and similar matters, often resulted in the demoralization of women. Mothers were also blackmailed for political reasons.

THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN 1979

The prisons with all-black-veiled inmates are the incarnation of the regime's Islamization program. As supposed “rehabilitation centers” they purport to transform “deviants” into proper human beings (ādam). As victims of double persecution female prisoners are forcibly uniformed in black chador in conformity with their female guards and become part of the Islamic media representation, whether they recant or not, whether they are Islamic or laic, Muslim or non-Muslim. “Woman,” as defined in the preamble of the constitution of the Islamic Republic, is one of the pillars of the state, a category between army and economy, and is therefore to be converted into the subject of Islamic norm. The Islamization of women became the raison d'être of the wilāyat-i faqīh (governance of the religious jurist, the all-embracing system of clerical rule in the Islamic Republic). Islamic justice imposed rigid social, moral, and behavioral codes on women.

From 1980 to 1985, ideological armed forces and numerous paramilitary organizations such as basij arrested masses of women and girls for adultery, prostitution, or simply unlawful contact with men. Revolutionary Islamic courts condemned many to execution and others to physical punishment or imprisonment. As a consequence of the bloody political repression the world public focused on political prisoners but ignored the fate of ordinary prisoners.

After the defeat of the political opposition in Iran, the hijāb became the main reason for mass persecution. The plan to combat immorality and improper hijāb (bad hijāb) of 1990 and the plan for the superior hijāb (tarḥ-i hijāb-i bartar) of 1994 resulted in massive detentions. In the following years many female street children were imprisoned. Some girls were put in prison for undefined offenses such as running away or wearing boy's attire.

AFGHANISTAN

After British rule ended in 1919, Afghanistan underwent several reform programs: the constitution of 1923 (Amān Allāh Khān); the constitution of 1931 (Muḥammad Nādir Shāh); the modernist reform of 1953 (Muḥammad Dāwūd Khān); and the constitution of 1964 (Zahīr Shāh), which sought the way to the modern world. The first “public” arena opened to women and girls during this period was the prison. The imprisonment of female relatives of male opponents was the only constant that cut through the complicated ethnopolitical conflicts and political changes from monarchy to republic and from republic to Islamic state. The situation of imprisoned women was hidden from public awareness for decades. Gender-based violence such as sexual abuse of women or the virginity test on girls in official detention centers and prisons were only reported after the end of the Taliban regime. Under the rule of the Mujāhidīn groups in the 1990s there was neither a real central power nor a judicial system. Warlords were in charge as Islamic judges and condemned their prisoners arbitrarily.

Under the Taliban (1996–2001) the Islamization of Afghanistan reached its peak. Women were excluded from public life. Shari'a courts and the Istakhbārāt (secret service) were established. Taliban militia and the authority for fighting against immorality persecuted women. They arrested, beat, mutilated, imprisoned, killed, kidnapped, and enslaved them with the accusation of immorality or just for being non-Pashtun. Many women were detained and beaten in public for specific offenses such as not wearing a burqa, wearing white socks or shoes, or shoes that made a noise when walking, being unaccompanied by a male chaperone in public, or entering a public building through a designated male entrance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Afshari, Human rights in Iran. The abuse of cultural relativism, Philadelphia 2001.
- J. Ahmadi, Die Justiz der Willkür. Geschlechterideologie als Grundlage der "Rechtsordnung" des Gottesstaates Iran, in Maria Hockstein-Rasch (ed.), 23. Feministischer Juristentag. Dokumentation, Berlin 1997, 61–7.
- , Zur Funktion des Hijab in der Staatsideologie der Islamischen Republik Iran, in Vorgänge 150 (2000), 66–70.
- A. Amanat, Resurrection and renewal. The making of the Babi movement in Iran, 1844–1850, London 1990.
- Amnesty International, Afghanistan. Police reconstruction essential to protect human rights, AI Index: ASA 11/003/2003, <<http://www.web.amnesty.org/library/index/engasa110032003>>.
- , Afghanistan. Re-establishing the rule of law, AI Index: ASA 11/021/2003, <<http://news.amnesty.org/library/index/engasa110212003>>.
- , Afghanistan. Crumbling prison system desperately in need of repair, AI Index: ASA 11/017/2003, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGASA110172003?open&of=ENG-AFG>>.
- Human Rights Watch, We want to live as humans. Repression of women and girls in western Afghanistan, HRW Index: C1411, 2002, <<http://www.hrw.org/reports/2002/afghnwmm1202/>>.
- International Commission of Jurists, Afghanistan's legal system and its compatibility with international human rights standards, final report by M. Lau, 2003, <<http://www.icj.org/IMG/pdf/doc-51.pdf>>.

- H. Nategh, Masa'lah-i zan dar barkhī az mudawwanāt-i chap az nahdat-i mashrūfīh tā 'aṣr-i Riḍa Khān, in Zamān-i Nu, 1 (1983), 8–15.
- Physicians for Human Rights, The Taliban's war on women. A health and human rights crisis in Afghanistan, Boston 1998, <http://www.phrusa.org/research/health_effects/exec.html>.
- Provisorisches Frauenkomitee gegen Hinrichtungen im Iran, Bericht über 83 Gefangene Frauen im Iran, Berlin 1989.
- D. M. Rejali, Torture and modernity. Self, society, and state in modern Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- Trapped by tradition. Women and girls in detention in Kabul Welayat, in Medica Mondiale, 5 March 2003, <http://www.medicamondiale.de/download/KabulHaftReport_e.pdf>.
- United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Integration of the human rights of women and the gender perspective, E/CN.4/2003/134, <http://www.unhcr.ch/Huridocda/Huridocda.nsf/\(Symbol\)/E.CN.4.2003.134.En?Opendocument/E.CN.4.2003.134.En?Opendocument)>.

JALE AHMADI

South Asia

This entry covers three countries crafted by violence: India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. India, with a sizeable Muslim population, is secular by constitution and law; the other two, with majority Muslim populations, have turned from secularism to theocracy.

The Indian subcontinent was structured along tribal and feudal lines during colonial times. The British superimposed upon this a secular common law framework that applied to all areas except personal law, which was left to the discretion of each indigenous community. At the same time, in certain geographical areas, the colonial power accepted the continuation of tribal law through the Frontier Crimes Regulation 1901.

Upon independence in 1947 Pakistan (which at that time included Bangladesh) therefore inherited a secular legal system with a complete hierarchy of courts that had jurisdiction in both civil and criminal matters. In addition, in what were carved out as the Federally and Provincially Administered Tribal Areas (FATA and PATA), the new republic left undisturbed the system of tribal law and tribal courts.

In India, Muslims continue to be governed in matters of personal law by the Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act 1937. Though this has been amended in some states in India and for some issues (for example, maintenance) the general secular law applies, the Supreme Court of India maintains that its application to Muslims in India is mandatory. Though the institution of the qazi (qāḍī, Islamic judge) was abolished in British India in 1864, there now exists in some localized areas in India a non-governmental alternative dispute resolution mechanism to decide issues of Muslim personal law. These are called Shariat Courts and are presided over by qazis. The state has often shied away from progressive legislation for Muslim women as it has not wished to create a political issue with Indian Muslims (who have also resisted the idea of integration).

It is, however, important to point out that in India and Bangladesh the applicable criminal law is secular and Islamic laws have not entered into this arena. This is the case even though in Bangladesh the constitution was amended in 1988 to make the religion of the republic Islam, with the rider in the amendment that, "other religions may be practiced in peace and harmony." In Pakistan, the state has taken steps to extend Islamic law outside the sphere of personal law.

Pakistan is a declared religious state and its genesis was the creation of a homeland for Muslims. The legal system has therefore accepted that the state and religion cannot conceptually be separated and that it is the business of the state to ensure that its citizens order their lives according to Islamic ideology. While family law was always included, in 1979 the Hudood Ordinances expanded the scope to criminal laws. In 1980, a Federal Shariat Court was introduced with the power to review all laws (except personal and fiscal laws) and to decide whether these were in consonance with the Qur'an and sunna. Appeal would lie to a special Shariat Appellate Bench of the Supreme Court.

The introduction of Islamic criminal laws had a profound impact on the number of women who were imprisoned and the numbers increased almost threefold over time due to the application of the Adultery Ordinance 1979, which covers the offenses of rape and adultery. In 1989 the number of women imprisoned under the Adultery Ordinance alone was reportedly approximately 6,000.

Adultery, which under the secular British Penal Code was defined as a private offence, was changed under the Adultery Ordinance 1979 and made a public offence (cognizable and non-bailable) for which the state could initiate prosecutions. According to activists in Pakistan, the complainant in an adultery case is often a member of the woman's own family. It is a convenient way for a husband who wants to marry a second time to get rid of his wife; for a father to punish an errant daughter who does not want to follow the family's dictates as to whom she should marry; or an easy strategy to remove a woman if she will inherit property. Further, as the Safia Bibi case and the more recent Zafran Bibi case show, the introduction of adultery as a public offence after 1979 has made a rape victim vulnerable to a counter charge of adultery.

Zafran Bibi had filed a criminal complaint for rape under the Adultery Ordinance 1979. Whilst rape was not proved, on the basis that intercourse had occurred Zafran Bibi was convicted of zinā (adultery) under this ordinance and was sentenced to the maximum punishment of death by stoning. The case was taken up by the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan and Zafran Bibi's conviction and sentence were eventually set aside.

Despite intensive lobbying efforts made by human rights groups, even today over 7,000 women and children are imprisoned in the 75 jails of Pakistan, of whom more than 50 percent are women imprisoned under the Adultery Ordinance. Almost all these women come from the poorest sections of society. They are especially vulnerable because of their illiteracy, low economic status, and limited access to legal resources. These women suffer the dual yoke of oppression as state law is superimposed upon the existing tribal structure, which is also protected by Pakistani law. As Nafisa Shah (1998) points out, the imposition of the Hudood Ordinances and the Qisas and Diyat Act 1990 have added tribal characteristics to the Pakistani justice system.

In India and Bangladesh, though women may not be imprisoned for adultery, they are imprisoned as in Pakistan for prostitution or murder (often of their husbands). As in the case of their Pakistani counterparts they come from poverty-stricken backgrounds. In all three jurisdictions these women are kept in overcrowded conditions without access to health or legal aid facilities. Many have young children incarcerated with them as these children have no homes or family to go to. In 2002 the Indian Council of Legal Aid and Advice filed a public interest litigation in the Supreme Court asking that state governments formulate proper guidelines for the protection and welfare of children of women prisoners. In Karachi Central Jail, Pakistan, the children of women prisoners are taught by a teacher whose salary is paid by a local NGO (non-governmental organization), the EDHI Trust, rather than by the government.

The judiciary and the police in the subcontinent have taken an ambivalent view of women's rights. In dealing with the issue of dowry, which is prevalent among Muslims as well as Hindus, activists say that despite the insertion of section 304B in the Indian Penal Code in 1986 convictions are rare and judges are often uninterested. In India it is said that there are about 5,000 dowry deaths annually. In all three jurisdictions allegations are consistently made of custodial rape. A study in Bangladesh by the NGO Odhikar documented that 13 women were raped by members of law enforcement agencies in 2000, the youngest being a girl of six.

Given the strength of patriarchal structures within the subcontinent, the application of "Islamic" criminal law becomes even more complex because of its "moral" connotation. In Pakistan a definite anti-woman bias is evident from the language used by courts to describe a rape victim. Some of the terms used are "loose character," "habitual case of enjoying sexual intercourse," "shady person," "willing party," and "woman of easy virtue." Thus, once women are imprisoned under the Adultery Ordinance 1979 in Pakistan, whether rightly or wrongly, they lose the protection of the family. In the Bangladeshi context, Naila Kabeer (1989) also notes that rehabilitation, whether of prostitutes, jail inmates, or other fallen women, is determined by notions of "purity." As compared to male prisoners, women receive fewer visitors and a larger proportion of women in prison are without legal representation. Their contact with the family is also broken by the fact that in all three countries, there are fewer women's jails than men's jails. Women may therefore be imprisoned away from their hometowns. In the province of Sindh (Pakistan), for example, there is only one woman's jail in Larkana. In Tamil Nadu, India, there are nine central prisons and only two women's jails.

The response of states within the subcontinent has varied. In Bangladesh, a series of laws has been promulgated making kidnapping, trafficking, rape, and acid throwing offenses with a maximum penalty of life imprisonment or death. In India, Muslim women are governed by the secular criminal laws, which have been amended proactively. In 1983 the minimum punishment was increased in cases of custodial rape. To contend with dowry deaths Section 174(2) of the Indian Criminal Procedure Code now requires that in cases of death of a woman within seven years of her marriage the police have to send the body to a civil surgeon for examination. In stark contrast, in Pakistan the state has enacted discriminatory laws in the form of the Hudood Ordinances, which it refuses to repeal on one pretext or another, despite the recommendation of the Pakistan Commission on Inquiry for Women (1997).

In Pakistan, the judicial system also recognizes tribal customary law under which killings of women in furtherance of male honor are condoned. In these cases a lesser sentence is given to the accused because "sudden and grave provocation" is accepted as a mitigating factor. Even in those cases of murder that are prosecuted, under the Qisas and Diyat Law it is possible for the murderer to pay blood money to the heirs of the murder victim and thus, contrary to the principles of human rights, murder has been made a compoundable offence. Ironically, whilst adultery has been categorized as a public offence that is non-compoundable, murder has been reconceptualized as a compoundable private offence against the victim rather than the state.

Judicial acceptance in Pakistan of crimes of honor under the defense of grave and sudden provocation also indicates that the tribal code of justice is not limited to the tribal area (FATA); its principles have a more general application within the Islamic criminal laws and the Indo-British court system. In 2000, the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan reported that over 1,000 honor killings take place in Pakistan every year. These are generally not prosecuted.

In Bangladesh, as the state has begun to sponsor Islamization, activists say that in rural areas women are now increasingly facing trials through the fatwa (religious judgment). Village elders usually form a salish or tribunal from which women are excluded, as they are in Pakistan from the tribal jirga. Interestingly the tribal jirga does not sanctify itself by applying Islamic law, but the Bangladeshi salish has meted out "Islamic" punishments in contravention of the Penal Code and some women have been publicly flogged.

Whether finding its justification in religion or tribalism, the ultimate effect of the interplay of tribal laws, customary practices, Islamic law, and Indo-British traditions is to deprive women, and any advantage or opportunity offered by one law or system is cancelled out by the other.

The subordination of women through violence cuts across all cultures and religions within the subcontinent. In Pakistan the situation is starker because of state-enacted Islamic criminal laws that reinforce women's secondary status and are not used for her protection but rather for her policing and punishment. By allowing imprisonment of women in large numbers under the Adultery Ordinance the law has provided an additional tool of oppression for men to wield in Pakistan.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Ahmad, The position of women with reference to the Pakistan criminal justice system, in Alam-e-Niswan 1:1 (n.d.), 57.

- , Development in the law of rape, in The tyranny of rape, Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, February 1992, 6.
- , The other view point, in Tuesday Review, Rights of Women in Islam, Dawn (Pakistan daily) 14–20 November 1995, 88.
- S. Ashraf, Behind bars, in She Magazine (July 2003), 83. Bureau Report, Dawn, 31 May 2000, <www.dawn.com>.
- D. Chanddokhe, Dowry death, <http://www.legalserviceindia.com/helpline/help5.htm>.
- Government of Pakistan, Report of the Pakistan commission on inquiry for women, Islamabad 1997.
- Hinduism today*, August 1988, <http://www.hinduonnet.com/thehindu/mag/2003/04/06/stories/20030406-00290400.htm>.
- N. Kabeer, The quest for national identity. Women, Islam and the state in Bangladesh, Institute of Development Studies at the University of Sussex, Discussion Paper No. 268, Brighton, England, October 1989 and in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the State, Philadelphia 1991, 115–43.
- S. Kamal and A. Khan, A study of the interplay of formal and customary laws on women, i, unpublished study by Raasta Development Consultants, Karachi 1997.
- D. Kandiyoti, Women and Islam. What are the missing terms? <www.wluml.org/english/pubs/pdf/dossiers5-6.pdf>.
- S. Kazi. Muslim women in India, Report of Minority Rights Group International, 1999, <www.minorityrights.org/admin/Download/Pdf/muslimwomenrep.pdf>.
- M. A. Khan (ed.), Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan 1973, Karachi 1988.
- R. Marcus, Violence against women in Bangladesh, Pakistan, Egypt, Sudan, Senegal and Yemen, March 1993, <http://www.ids.ac.uk/bridge>.
- H. Mayell, Thousands of women killed for family “honor,” National Geographic News, <http://news.nationalgeographic.com/news/2002/02/0212_020212_honorkilling.html>, February 2002.
- T. Mehmood, The Muslim law of India, Allahabad 2002.
- T. M. Murshid, Women, Islam and the state in Bangladesh. Subordination and Resistance, <www.unige.ch/iued/new/information/publications/pdf/yp_creativite_femmes_dev/11-crea_tazeen.pdf>.
- M. Pal et al. (eds.), The situation of women in Bangladesh. Study initiated by Asian Development Bank, January 2001, <http://www.adb.org/Documents/Books/Country_Briefing_Papers/Women_in_Bangladesh/default.asp>.
- K. Pillai, Women and criminal procedure, <http://www.hsph.harvard.edu/Organizations/healthnet/SAsia/forums/crimes/articles/procedure.html>.
- F. Rahman. Female sexuality and Islam, <www.wluml.org/english/pubs/pdf/dossiers5-6.pdf>.
- S. Rahman, Women in Bangladesh. Reflections on women and violence in 2000, <http://www.ahrchk.net/hrsolid/mainfile.php/2001vol11nos5/67/>.
- S. Sardar Ali and K. Arif, Parallel judicial systems in Pakistan and consequences for human rights, in F. Shaheed et al. (eds.), Shaping women's lives, laws, practices and strategies in Pakistan, Lahore 1998, 29–60.
- N. Shah, Faislo. The informal settlement system and crimes against women in Sindh, in F. Shaheed et al. (eds.), Shaping women's lives, laws, practices and strategies in Pakistan, Lahore 1998, 227–52.
- Society for the Advancement of Community, Health, Education and Training, study reported in Dawn, 20 February 2003. See also Women in jails in miserable state, in Dawn, 20 May 2003, <www.dawn.com>.
- P. Srinivasan and G. R. Lee, The dowry system in India. Women's attitudes and social change, <www.bgsu.edu/organizations/cfd/r/research/pdf/2002/2002_15.pdf>.
- Tamil Nadu, Prison Department, Statistics, <http://www.tn.nic.in/prisons/statistics.htm>.

NAUSHEEN AHMAD

Sub-Saharan Africa

Prisons in Africa are an un-African institution. Nowhere in precolonial African societies were prisons used as a form of punishment; West Africa's measures for crime control were restorative and retributivist justice. European colonialists converted slave forts along the Atlantic coast into gaols or cachots (Bernault 2003). In postcolonial Africa, several notorious prisons were shut down, although a few countries opened separate prisons for women and adolescent males. Prisons turned into “homes” for young, socially displaced, undereducated, unemployed, and poor women.

Certain occupations, such as sex work or domestic work, invite sexual abuse and criminalization. Domestic workers tend to be young, rural, unmarried women who may risk being assaulted or raped by their patron; in countries where abortion is illegal and unaffordable, they may commit infanticide out of despair. In some women's prisons, the majority of prisoners and remanded women are accused – or convicted – of infanticide. The social sanctions for having a child out of wedlock are severe. Amina Lawal, a Nigerian woman who escaped – on appeal – the sentence of stoning in a Sharī'a court in October 2003, is a case in point. Some women await execution for up to ten years. Unfair and sexist trial procedures put women at further risk; for example, a divorced woman whose baby was stillborn was still charged with murder because her doctor's evidence was not introduced in court (Amnesty International 2004).

In several African countries, the institution of polygamy also has a negative effect, particularly on women who have never received formal education or who dropped out of primary education. A recent Ugandan study (Tibatemwa-Ekirikubinza 1999) actually notes the higher prevalence of female criminality (toward husband, junior co-wife, or the co-wife's child) in rural regions where polygamy prevails. Prisoners, in particular those who were senior wives, note the disparities in asset sharing by their husbands; frequently they justify their offenses by accusing the husband of total economic and emotional abandonment of them and their children.

The threat of sexual violence is intensified in women's prisons, especially where men guard women convicts in women's living quarters. Male prisoners, too, can be a threat to women's well-being. Most African prisons house men, women, and children, and may merely provide separate sleeping facilities. During colonial times, sexual assault and gang rape was particularly prevalent because women were not given separate quarters from men. In Senegal, African women were expected to cook for the entire prison population and sleep in the kitchen or on the porch of the fort or prison compound (Konate 2003). Colonial prisons enforced racial segregation, and European prisoners were housed in the vicinity of the warden's office or compound (Goerg 2003).

Lesbian convicts are particularly vulnerable to attack from heterosexual prisoners and being reported to prison staff (Dirsuweit 1999, Mkhize 1992). Some prisoners also convey fear of guards who are known lesbians and prey on female prisoners (Shawalu 1985).

In many countries, unsentenced detainees held on remand for more than five years comprise over 70 percent of the prison population. What is often deemed "death by natural causes" by prison officials is actually caused by the following factors: lack of sanitation and clean drinking water, dietary deficiency, lack of adequate health care, and overcrowding (an especially dire situation in Rwanda prisons after the recent genocide of Tutsis). Mortality rates increase dramatically during the rainy season. A recent Zimbabwean study illustrates prison conditions that may be generalized for the vast majority of women's prisons in Africa. There is no gender-specific consideration. Men's prisons are the standard and women are housed in sections of men's prisons or – more infrequently – in separate facilities. Women are refused basic sanitary items (Musengezi et al. 2003). South African female common law prisoners were particularly degraded by being denied underwear and cotton from the prison system in the 1970s (Kuzwayo 1985).

Generally, judges do not grant early release to pregnant women, mothers with widow status, or those who have young children. The lack of basic health and dietary needs is particularly grave for pregnant women. In most prisons in Africa, pregnant convicts get minimal or no pre- or perinatal care; child mortality, as a result, is higher in prisons than in civil society. Most prisoners are mothers, and young children often stay with their mothers, in part because the father has abandoned the wife upon her incarceration or because the mother's family is ashamed of her convict status and refuses to take the children. In some prisons, no extra clothing is provided for children, and children suffer from the same poor diet as their mothers; the children are literally punished along with their mothers (Tibatemwa-Ekirikubinza 1999). "Women with babies in prison seem to carry a double punishment of coping themselves and fending for their children" (Musengezi et al. 2003). Measures of rehabilitation are minimal and prison chores are overwhelmingly of a domestic nature, reinforcing a gendered division of labor. Many women are illiterate and have very minimal formal education. Linguistic difficulties may adversely affect ethnic minorities and immigrants, who do not understand the lingua franca of the courts and the prison staff (de Klerk et al. 2001). Amina Lawal did not understand the charge against her, because the Shari'a judge used Arabic, rather than her native Hausa, when she was indicted for adultery.

POLITICAL PRISONERS

From the onset of the colonial conquest, the carceral compound was used for political control of Africans. However, after decolonization, many governments continued the practice of incarcerating political opponents (Bernault 2003). Women's political imprisonment is predicated on their participation in liberation struggles during the colonial and apartheid era. Women instigated revolts against poll taxes (Nigeria) and fought with men for national liberation (for example, Mau Mau members in Kenya, pass laws resisters in South Africa). Many women were subjected to sexual assault, rape, and other forms of torture and murder in detention camps and prisons cells (Harlow 1992, wa Wamwere 2002, Konzaye 1985, Tesfagiorgis 1992). Women political leaders also faced house arrest and banishment, which turned the banned person into a self-policing docile body (Ramphela 1995). Winnie Mandela was so acutely aware of her exceptional status in the apartheid regime that she was always prepared to return to prison and had a suitcase ready at all times (Mandela 1985). Gambo Sawaba was similarly prepared; she was incarcerated more than a dozen times for her defiant stance against the Native Authority in northern Nigeria before Nigeria's independence. Often her offenses stemmed from public speaking and consorting with men in public, offenses which also attracted prison terms during the 1960s (Shawalu 1990).

Political detainees and prisoners differentiate themselves from common or social detainees and convicts. They describe serving their sentences with pride and determination, and several prisoners report that their family and community support was essential to endure isolation and torture. They instigate hunger strikes and launch grievances, never coming to terms with the label of prisoner; some refuse to work and all refuse to be “rehabilitated.” A few prisoners use violence against guards to resist repression (Makhoere 1988). Some women are erroneously detained for participating in illegal political movements, yet upon release, they actually join the liberation movement to which they were falsely accused of belonging (Tesfagiorgis 1992).

In South Africa under apartheid, women political prisoners attempted to make common cause with common law prisoners, who were condemned to hard labor (Meer 2001). The regime refused acknowledgment of the existence of political prisoners, yet it isolated them from common law prisoners. Sometimes, the warden placed common prisoners with a political prisoner to press them into service to inform on the latter (Makhoere 1988). Northern Nigerian political prisoner Gambo Sawaba counseled women to say they were practicing Christians to evade harsh sanctions of the Sharī'a court (Shawalu 1990).

But at other times, political prisoners distance themselves from the “unfortunate drunks” and outcasts (First 1989). This hierarchy is reinforced by the warden’s “fear of infectious belief”: political detainees and political prisoners tend to be totally segregated so that they cannot incite the mass of social prisoners to rise up and organize for better prison conditions or raise their political consciousness. Almost all political prisoners have participated or organized a hunger strike. Caesarina Kona Makhoere reports that her cohort instigated the first strike in South Africa’s women’s prisons in 1976 – a time of mass arrests and deaths in detention of school children in the aftermath of the Soweto uprising. After 1976, isolation of detainees increased; this method of punishment attacks the soul of the political prisoner and was particularly utilized under the apartheid regime of South Africa (Mashinini 1989, Makhoere 1988, First 1989, Mandela 1985). Sometimes, political prisoners are allowed no literature other than the Bible or the Qur’ān and they use the scriptures in order to make light of their own situation (Makhoere 1988, Meer 2001), in particular when they endure psychological torture, such as prolonged interrogation (First 1989). Despite the severe psychological and physical hardships faced by women prisoners, their situation often is downplayed by male political prisoners and their community while men’s political imprisonment is romanticized (Middleton 1998). Yet, women faced torture and death in detention under the apartheid regime; political detainees of both genders faced isolation, often without bedding or thin blankets covering cold, concrete floors. However, the regime sharply discriminated according to the color line; white and colored prisoners did receive better accommodations than black prisoners.

Many former political prisoners complain of heart problems, growth of tumors, and other diseases affecting their health in the long term. Mashinini’s account of her six-month solitary detention reveals an intense level of post-traumatic stress disorder. Her isolation was only interrupted by extended interrogations by her tormentors. Yet, all prisoners’ testimonials note with pride that they endured persecution, banishment, and prison life and at times even “confess” to their interrogators that “everything I had done I would willingly do again” (First 1989, 90). Fatima Meer, a former president of the Black Women’s Federation of South Africa, reports that she would not have wanted to miss the experience of five months detention, despite the fact that she was already a banned person by the time she was detained (Meer 2001, 210). Political prisoners fairly easily reintegrate into their society, thanks to the community support they receive; some leave the country to receive counseling for post-traumatic stress disorder (Mashinini 1989). Common law prisoners, however, face many difficulties post-release. The majority are abandoned by their husbands and even their own families of origin. Long-term prisoners struggle with adjusting to the changes of society, and many face abject poverty, suffering from property loss and even mob justice: a Ugandan ex-prisoner may find her house burnt to the ground and her belongings confiscated (Tibatemwa-Ekirikubinza 1999).

Is there hope for closing prisons all over Africa? A few countries, such as Mali, have closed prisons from the colonial period and have not built new prisons. Yet criminal activities, even committed by women, are a growing concern in many African countries and imprisonment continues to be the choice of punishment, rather than the aberration.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Amnesty International, Nigeria. The death penalty and women under the Nigerian penal systems, 2004.
- F. Bernault, The politics of enclosure in colonial and post-colonial Africa, in F. Bernault (ed.), J. Roitman (trans.), History of prison and confinement in Africa, Portsmouth, N.H. 2003, 1–53.
- T. Dirsuweit, Carceral spaces in South Africa. A case of institutional power, sexuality and transgression in women’s prison, in Geoforum 30:1 (1999), 71–83.
- R. First, 117 days, New York 1989.
- O. Goerg, Colonial urbanism and prisons in Africa. Reflections on Conakry and Freetown, 1903–1960, in F. Bernault (ed.), J. Roitman (trans.), History of prison and confinement in Africa, Portsmouth 2003, 119–34.

- B. Harlow, Barred. Women, writing, and political detention, Hanover, N.H. 1992.
- V. de Klerk and G. Barkhuizen, Language usage and attitudes in a South African prison. Who calls the shots?, in International Journal of Social Language 152 (2001), 97–115.
- D. Konate, Ultimate exclusion. Imprisoned women in Senegal, in F. Bernault (ed.), J. Roitman (trans.), History of prison and confinement in Africa, Portsmouth, N.H. 2003, 155–63.
- E. Kuzwayo, Call me woman, San Francisco 1985.
- C. K. Makhoere, No child's play. In prison under apartheid, London 1988.
- W. Mandela, Part of my soul went with him, New York 1985.
- E. Mashinini, Strikes have followed me all my life. A South African autobiography, London 1989.
- F. Meer, Prison diary. One hundred and thirteen days, 1976, Cape Town 2001.
- P. Mkhize, A snake with ice water, in B. Schreiner (ed.), A snake with ice water. Prison writings by South African women, Johannesburg 1992, 240–9.
- J. Middleton, Convictions. A woman political prisoner remembers, Randberg 1998.
- T. Modie-Moroka, Vulnerability across a life course. An empirical study. Women and criminality in Botswana prisons, in Journal of Social Development in Africa 18 (2003), 145–79.
- C. Musengezi and I. Staunton (eds.), A tragedy of lives. Women in prison in Zimbabwe, Harare 2003.
- M. Nagel, Women, prisons and peacemaking in Mali, in M. Nagel et al. (eds.), Rethinking prisons. Cross national perspectives, Rowman and Littlefield (forthcoming).
- M. Ramphele, A life, Cape Town 1995.
- D. Schalkwyk, Writing from prison, in S. Nuttall et al. (eds.), Senses of culture. South African culture studies, Oxford 2000, 278–97.
- B. Schreiner (ed.), A snake with ice water. Prison writings by South African women, Johannesburg 1992.
- R. Shawalu, The story of Gambo Sawaba, Jos, Plateau State, Nigeria 1990.
- A. Tesfagiorgis, A painful season and a stubborn hope. The odyssey of an Eritrean mother, Trenton, N.J. 1992.
- L. Tibatemwa-Ekirikubinza, Women's violent crime in Uganda, Kampala 1999.
- K. wa Wamwere, I refuse to die. My journey for freedom, New York 2002.
- Prisons in Africa, <<http://hrw.org/prisons/africa.html>>.

MECHTHILD NAGEL

Law: The Four Sunnī Schools of Law

Overview

This entry initially examines the factors that precipitated the rise of the four legal schools in Sunnī Islam, the various methodologies the schools utilized in the derivation of juridical rulings, and the cultural factors that influenced the rulings they issued. These were important considerations in the issuance of rulings on women in Sunnī jurisprudence. Based on the rulings stated in various juridical tracts, the entry also compares and contrasts the treatment of women in these schools.

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SCHOOLS OF LAW (MADHĀHIB)

With the establishment of the Umayyad dynasty in the eighth century, Muslims were living under rulers who were not regarded by many as the proper authority to create the Qurʾānic ideal of a just social order. It was at this time that the office of a definitive group of scholars interested in recording traditions took shape. Many Followers (tābiʿūn) of the Prophet are also mentioned as having acumen in juridical matters. These experts in the legal field tried to define and expound Islamic legal doctrine especially on issues that pertained to rituals, inheritance, marriage, divorce, and so forth. The early scholars in the legal field formed the provenance of the fuqahāʾ – a group of scholarly elite who specialized in the study of Islamic legal science, the Sharīʿa.

Initially, the jurists were private individuals who were keen to discern God’s intent on a particular ruling. The goal of the jurists’ endeavor was to reach an understanding (fiqh) of the Sharīʿa, that is, to comprehend in precise terms the law of God. Guided by a corpus of precepts and laws and their own independent reasoning, the jurists, especially in the ‘Abbāsīd period, attempted to construct a legal edifice by developing and elaborating a system of Sharīʿa law binding on all Muslims. They began to interpret and develop Islamic law, invoking various hermeneutical principles such as maṣlaḥa (derivation and application of a juridical ruling that is in the public interest), qiyās (analogy), ijtihād (independent reasoning), istiḥsān (preference of a ruling that a jurist deems most appropriate under the circumstances), and other innovative interpretive principles. They aimed to respond to the needs of the times and to go beyond the rulings stated in the revealed texts while at the same time paying respect to the very texts that had empowered them.

Increased legal activities by the fuqahāʾ led to the development of ancient schools of law in different parts of the Islamic world. Initially, the schools of law did not imply a definite organization or strict uniformity of teachings within a school. Gradually, the jurists constructed a program for private and public living centered on the Sharīʿa. The Sharīʿa, as articulated by these jurists, became a structured normative praxis and a comprehensive system that governed personal and public demeanor. The schools were named after their founders or prominent jurists in the area.

THE JURISTS OF THE SCHOOLS OF LAW

Derivation of legal rulings (ahkām) was contingent on local circumstances and the employment of different sources of law. In Medina the sunna (practices of Muḥammad) was informed not only by transmitted reports from the Prophet but also by the transmitted practices of the community. The local character of the traditional practices was partially incorporated in the Medinese concept of Prophetic sunna. Preponderance was frequently given to local practice over reports of Prophetic practice since it was argued by the Medinese that contemporary practice could interpret or supplement earlier practice.

In his al-Muwattaʾaʾ, Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/795) often transmits earlier or contemporary Medinese practice on a legal point. He also cites different reports on the practices of the Prophet to vindicate his own legal opinion. He then accepts or rejects these in the light of his own reasoning and based on the practices of Medina. This selective process can be corroborated from his frequent usage of the statement, “This is the opinion that we [the people of Medina] hold.” In essence, Mālikī jurisprudence attempted to forge a closer link to practical considerations by attaching greater weight to social customs than did jurists in other areas.

In contrast to the Mālikīs, the jurists of Kufa saw their interpretations based on reasoning (raʾy) as an equally authoritative factor in the decision of a point of law. The raʾy of a scholar was partially incorporated by Abū Ḥanīfa (d. 150/767) as an important element in jurisprudence. The jurists of Kufa also used qiyās (analogy) in the extension of Prophetic practice and often formulated the law on rational grounds as opposed to ruling on the basis of transmitted practice that purportedly reflected Prophetic practice.

Kufan society was very cosmopolitan as it was exposed to different cultures and classes. Its class distinctions were not felt in the closely-knit Arab society of Medina. The school of Medina was conservative and bound to the laws established in Medina, whereas, animated by a spirit of independent thinking and analogy, the school of Kufa was eclectic and receptive to foreign legal systems. The Kufans also incorporated the customs of the divergent cultures that were prevalent there including some Sassanian customs appropriated from Persia.

The views of another prominent jurist of the time, Muḥammad b. Idris al-Shāfiʿī (d. 205/820), differed considerably from those of Medina and Kufa. Shāfiʿī contended that the personal opinion of the jurist must arise within rather than outside of the perimeters of Prophetic sunna. If this cannot be demonstrated, he said, then the sunna cannot be accepted as it might have arisen from the opinions of local authorities or arbitrary reasoning.

Focusing on the famous Qurʾānic verse “Obey God and His messenger,” Shāfiʿī further circumscribed the definition of the sunna, restricting it to a textual and transmitted record of Prophetic practice. The Medinese and Kufans would have to base their rulings on a universal standard, the sunna as reported in accredited traditions. Although he depended on traditions from the Prophet, Shāfiʿī also allowed limited usage of analogy and a more restricted form of reasoning excluding arbitrary opinions and discretionary decisions. Recognizing the presence of spurious traditions he stipulated strict conditions for the acceptance of traditions. By insisting on the sunna of the Prophet, Shāfiʿī nullified the concept of local practices and arbitrary reasoning. Through his efforts, the four schools came to subscribe to a common theory of the sources of law (Qurʾān, tradition, consensus, and analogy).

In contrast to the other schools of law, the main thesis of the ahl al-ḥadīth (people of tradition) was that traditions transmitted from the Prophet and his companions superseded local traditions and legal injunctions that were derived independently of revealed sources. They produced traditions to vindicate their views and based their legal system on the Qurʾān and traditions purportedly transmitted from the Prophet. Even though many of these traditions were spurious, the ahl al-ḥadīth spurned all forms of reasoning and some jurists, such as Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241/855), even claimed that weak traditions were better than human reasoning.

The use of various hermeneutical devices, exposure to diverse cultural influences, and a variegated understanding of the sources, derivation, and contents of the sunna were thus important factors that precipitated differences between the schools and influenced the rulings that were issued by them.

It is also important to note that the juridical manuals were composed in the male-dominated centers that excluded female voices in Islamic legal discourse. Women had little say in relation to the laws on marriage, divorce, inheritance, female testimony, and so forth. Consequently women’s issues have depended on “representational discourse” conducted by male jurists who interpreted and articulated the rulings related to women. Moreover, patriarchal structures of Arab culture that prevailed in the eighth and ninth centuries were often incorporated in the emerging juridical literature. These were significant factors that influenced how women were treated in the juridical discourse.

THE QURʾĀN AND ḤADĪTH LITERATURE ON WOMEN

Against the background of a tribal society in seventh-century Arabia, the Qurʾān ameliorated the situation of women considerably. It put a stop to female infanticide and prohibited men from inheriting the wives of their fathers (4:19). It also granted women rights of inheritance and permitted them to possess property. Reflecting the patriarchal society of seventh-century Arabia, the Qurʾān also required that men be responsible for the maintenance of women. Muḥammad was asked to accept the pledge of allegiance from women and they were not prevented from participating in public activities.

Many female figures are praised in the Qurʾān. Mary is lauded for her piety and is seen as an example for all righteous people (66:12). Angels visited her and God cast His spirit into her. Similarly the Qurʾān has words of praise for the wife of the Pharaoh for protecting and rearing Moses and commends the Queen of Sheba for her wisdom in accepting Solomon’s invitation to submit to God (27:43).

The pro-female tone of the Qurʾān is not replicated in the ḥadīth literature. Many traditions incorporated in the ḥadīth literature that was compiled in the ninth and tenth centuries denigrated the position of women. The negative cultural evaluation and status of a woman was thus transmitted in some of the ḥadīth reports. Some traditions maintain that women were created from a crooked rib; others claim that a woman passing in front of a man who is praying invalidates his prayer. This derogatory tone is also evident in traditions that indicate that most of the inhabitants of hell are women, that women are deficient in intellect, and that a wife's salvation is contingent on keeping her husband happy. A community that is led by women, some traditions assert, cannot prosper. Women are also portrayed as the source of fitna or seduction and therefore must be excluded from public participation. Women were therefore encouraged to pray at home rather than in the mosque.

The pejorative stance on women in ḥadīth is often reflected in the juridical rulings stated in the four schools of law. For the sake of brevity, the entry focuses on the following women's issues that are discussed in the legal manuals: marriage, divorce, and the rights of inheritance.

MARRIAGE

Emerging in the cosmopolitan and pluralistic milieu of Kufa, Ḥanafī law puts men and women on the same footing with regard to their ability to conclude important transactions, including marriage. In Kufa, a girl who had reached the age of puberty and could manage her own affairs was allowed to marry without the consent of her guardian. Reflecting the patrilineal and more traditional outlook of Medinan society where the male members of a tribe decided on and concluded the marriages of women, Mālik insisted on the need for a guardian to conduct a marriage. The other Sunnī schools of law also require the permission of the guardian to conclude a marriage of a girl unless she is not a virgin. This is a good example of how local circumstances engendered variations in the legal positions adopted by the different schools of law. Under the pressures of reformation in recent times, Tunisia, which follows Mālikī law, adopted the Ḥanafī doctrine in 1957 and allowed an adult woman to choose her spouse independently of the wishes of her guardian.

All four schools allow the drawing of a prenuptial agreement. Due to its extensive employment of the concept of public interest (maṣlahah), Ḥanbalī fiqh is more tolerant and liberal in this ruling. It permits a man to willingly stipulate in a prenuptial contract that he will not marry another wife or, for example, that he will not force his wife to leave her home town. He is bound to honor such conditions and if he violates them then the wife can unilaterally dissolve the marriage. The other three schools regard such conditions as void although the contract is seen as valid. Using the concept of talfīq (literally, piecing together), Mālikī wives in Tunisia and Ḥanafī wives in Syria benefit from this liberal Ḥanbalī doctrine relating to provisions in marriage contracts for they are permitted to stipulate such conditions in their marriage contracts.

The marriage contract has to include the mention of bridal gift, called ṣadāq or mahr. In pre-Islamic Arabia, this was paid to the wife's father. However, the Qur'ān revised this and required that the mahr be paid directly to the girl. All the four schools of law maintain that the wife has the right to demand the mahr immediately after the marriage has been solemnized and before it is consummated. However, if she willingly accepts the consummation then she loses the right to demand the mahr immediately.

The impact of cultural factors is also evident in finding a marital partner who is "equal" (kafā'a). Reflecting the different classes of people inhabiting Kufa, the Ḥanafīs had an elaborate system regarding compatibility, maintaining that the occupation of the husband is essential in determining whether he is equal to his spouse. Hence they recognize a detailed hierarchy of professions. Like the Ḥanafīs, the Shāfi'īs and Ḥanbalīs also require compatibility in religion, social status, profession, and lineage. Reflecting the lack of class differences and social stratification in Medina the occupation of the husband was not deemed to be an important consideration for the Mālikīs. Although the concept of kafā'a was later adopted by the Mālikīs, they insist on compatibility of the couple in religious matters only.

DIVORCE LAWS

All the legal schools granted a husband the unilateral right to divorce his wife at his discretion, whereas a woman who wished to be separated from her husband had to go through a judicial process where she had to demonstrate good grounds for divorce.

Sunnī law accepted two forms of divorce, the regular form (ṭalāq al-sunna) and the reprehensible version of triple divorce called (ṭalāq al-bid'a). The former consists of a single pronouncement of divorce when the wife is not in her menstrual period and without intercourse having taken place since her last period. The husband has the right to take the wife back during the waiting period ('idda) which lasts for three monthly cycles.

Most sources agree that the triple ṭalāq was introduced by the second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb (d. 22/644), to punish some men who had divorced women in jest and had taken it lightly. In this form of divorce the laws of purity are disregarded and the repudiation is made irrevocable by a three-fold pronouncement by the husband in a single meeting. When he says to his wife, "I divorce you" three times she becomes prohibited from him until she remarries and consummates the second marriage. After this second marriage is terminated, she can remarry her first husband once the waiting period has elapsed. The triple ṭalāq is irrevocable and thus does not afford the opportunity for reconciliation. Although the ṭalāq al-bid'a is condemned as reprehensible, this form of divorce is accepted by all the four Sunnī schools and is still practiced in many countries.

The perilous position of women in divorce matters can be further discerned from the fact that the Ḥanafīs, Mālikīs, and Shāfi'īs consider a divorce recited by mistake or in jest or under intoxication to be valid. The Ḥanbalīs, however, do not consider such a divorce valid.

In recent times, reforms have been enacted in various countries to control the husband's unilateral right of repudiation. The Syrian Law of Personal Status of 1953, for example, stipulates that the triple ṭalāq is to count as a single repudiation so as to allow the couple an opportunity to reconcile. The law also requires the husband to pay compensation to the wife if the court deems that he divorced her without reasonable cause. Tunisia refuses to recognize any divorce effected outside the judicial process. The Tunisian Law of 1957 also prohibits polygyny, a practice that is endorsed by the Qur'ān provided the wives are treated equally. To prevent abuse of the system, the Iraqi law of 1959 requires a polygamous marriage to be validated by the court.

The impingement of cultural factors engendered significant differences in other juridical opinions that emerged in the different schools. All the schools agree that maintenance is obligatory during the waiting period of a revocable divorce. The schools differed, however, on maintenance during the 'idda (waiting period) of an irrevocable divorce. The Ḥanafīs were more favorable to the women, stating that the rules of maintenance during the 'idda of a revocable divorce were also applicable for an irrevocable divorce. The other schools differentiated based on whether she was pregnant or not. Unless she was pregnant, the wife in Medina was entitled to receive only lodging in her husband's home during the 'idda.

Under Islamic law, the wife has limited options to initiate divorce proceedings. Her right is encapsulated in the khul' (by the instigation of the wife) form of divorce. Since the Qur'ān recognizes khul'

(2:229), it is accepted by all the legal schools. However, it can be finalized only with the husband's consent. For khul' to be valid the wife has to petition for divorce and is also required to offer some form of compensation to the husband (such as the return of the mahr). Khul' operates as a single, irrevocable divorce with an 'idda incumbent on the wife. Contrary to Ḥanafī law, the Mālikīs recognized the validity of a khul' divorce even without the consent of the husband.

Other differences between the schools occur in the laws pertaining to the judicial rights of a woman to seek divorce. Abū Ḥanīfa refused a judicial divorce unless the husband was impotent or had other personal defects. Thus factors such as the failure to provide maintenance, intermittent absence, continuous physical abuse, or life imprisonment do not provide grounds for a judge to dissolve the marriage because divorce is seen as the husband's prerogative.

In this instance, Mālikī law accords more rights to the woman. She can ask for a divorce due to the husband's desertion, failure to maintain her, cruelty, sexual impotence, or chronic disease. Mālikī law also recognized judicial divorce on the grounds of a husband's injurious treatment of his wife. It went further, stating that if the differences were irreconcilable, the court may finalize the divorce even without the husband's consent. The other schools of law allow a woman to demand ṭalāq on certain grounds, for example, not providing maintenance, physical abuse, or prolonged imprisonment leading to hardship for the wife. Syria, which normally follows Ḥanafī law, in 1953 adopted the more liberal Mālikī law, which states that the wife may petition for divorce on such grounds as the husband's cruelty, desertion, or failure to maintain her.

Differences between the schools also arose over the question of a missing husband. Mālikī law was more favorable to women in this instance. Mālik held that the wife of a missing husband may seek judicial separation after a four-year waiting period. If he does not reappear within this time, she will observe the 'idda of a widow and is then free to remarry. The Ḥanafīs, Shāfi'īs, and Ḥanbalīs, in contrast, state that the wife of a missing husband may not remarry as long as he may be considered alive based on the average life span of a person. The Ḥanafīs fix this at 120 years, the Shāfi'īs and Ḥanbalīs at 90 years. Such laws reflect the patrilineal character and male dominance of eighth- and ninth-century Arabian society when many of the juridical rulings were formulated.

INHERITANCE LAWS

In pre-Islamic Arabia, women were not accorded rights of inheritance. This was changed by the Qurʾān, which prescribed that certain inheritance shares be allotted to women since they were now to be counted as heirs of the deceased. The Qurʾān stipulated that men were to provide for and assure the economic stability of the family. Due to this requirement, they were allotted double the share of inheritance of women. Economic independence of the woman was further assured by the fact that no male relative, including the husband, could touch her property. The husband was required to maintain her from his own resources. Moreover, women could and often did initiate their own businesses.

In contrast to the Arabian patrilineal system where agnatic heirs (ʿasaba) were the principal heirs before Islam, the Qurʾān did not recognize their rights to inherit. In this the Qurʾān sought to reform the position of female relatives. All legal schools accept the distribution of fixed shares to the Qurʾānic heirs. However, pre-Islamic customary tribal laws prevailed in the Sunnī law of inheritance. All four schools grant distant agnates (ʿasaba) the remains of shares after the distribution to heirs that are stipulated by the Qurʾān. These distant agnates thus excluded the rights of the daughters of the deceased. Female heirs would only receive their share if there were no agnate heirs. By recognizing the claims of agnate collaterals, Sunnī law emphasized the tribal concept of an extended family.

Even in the laws of inheritance differences that affected women emerged between the Sunnī schools. When no Qurʾānic heir or agnate relative survived the deceased, the jurists of Kufa allowed non-agnate relatives (daughters and sister's children) to inherit. Such cognate relatives (called dhawū al-arḥām) were not allowed to inherit in Medina. In the absence of agnate relatives, the Mālikīs maintained that the public treasury is a "rescue heir," whereas the other three schools allow the cognate relatives such as the children of the deceased's daughter or sister to succeed in the absence of Qurʾānic heirs or agnate relatives. It was the patrilineal society of Medina that denied women such rights of inheritance. In many instances, therefore, the cosmopolitan society and extraneous cultural influences in Kufa led to women enjoying greater rights.

Other miscellaneous differences emerged between the schools with respect to their treatment of women. The view that the Ḥanafīs empower women more than the other schools is supported in their ruling that the voluntary fast of a woman without her husband's consent is reprehensible but not prohibited. In contrast, the other three schools state that it is not permissible for a woman to observe a supererogatory fast without her husband's consent if the fast will interfere with any of his rights over her. Most jurists have held that women cannot lead men in prayers, hold judicial positions, or be political leaders. However, Abū Ḥanīfa asserted that a woman can act as a judge in all commercial and civil cases but not in criminal and personal injury cases. Some Mālikī jurists maintained that a woman can serve as a judge in any case.

The jurists concur on the issue of women's testimony in the courts. Based on the Qurʾānic verse 2:282, which stipulates that when one man is not available to witness a business contract two women should replace him, the jurists of the four schools extended this requirement in all cases of testimony. The verse has also been used to support the alleged inferiority of a woman's evidence as compared to that of a man.

In recent times, courts have departed from the doctrines expounded in the classical legal tracts. Many Muslim countries have enforced the eclectic principle of borrowing from different law schools and have required the involvement of the judicial process so as to ensure a more equitable system and to reform the law to accord with modern contingencies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. Abou El Fadl, Speaking in God's name. Islamic law, authority and women, Oxford 2001.
- N. Abu Zahra, The pure and powerful. Studies in contemporary Muslim society, Reading, Berkshire, U.K. 1997.
- N. Coulson, A history of Islamic law, Edinburgh, 1964, 1978².
- , Conflicts and tensions in Islamic jurisprudence, Chicago 1969.
- A. Fyze, Outlines of Muhammadan law, Delhi 1972.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender and social change, New York 1998.
- W. Hallaq, A history of Islamic legal theories, Cambridge 1999.
- , Authority, continuity and change in Islamic law, Cambridge 2001.
- W. Madelung, Shiʿi attitudes toward women as reflected in fiqh, in W. Madelung, Religious schools and sects in medieval Islam, London 1985, 69–79.
- M. Maghniyya, The five schools of law, Qum 1995.
- F. Mernissi Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in a modern Muslim society, Cambridge 1975.
- , Women and Islam. An historical and theological enquiry, trans. M. J. Lakeland, Oxford 1991.
- A. Sachedina, Woman, half-the-man? The crisis of male epistemology in Islamic jurisprudence, in F. Daftary (ed.), Intellectual traditions in Islam, London 2000, 160–178.
- Joseph Schacht, The origins of Muhammadan jurisprudence, Oxford 1950.

- , An introduction to Islamic law, Oxford 1979.
- B. Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, traditions, and interpretation, New York 1994.
- A. Wadud, Qur'an and woman. Rereading the sacred text from a woman's perspective, New York 1999.
- B. Wheeler, Applying the canon in Islam. The authorization and maintenance of interpretive reasoning in Hanafi scholarship, Albany, N.Y. 1996.

LIYAKAT TAKIM

Law: Other Schools of Family Law

Overview

This entry discusses how women are treated in the twelver Shī'ī (Ja'fari) school of law and the factors that shaped the issuance of juridical rulings on women in Shi'ism.

Derivation of legal rulings (ahkām) on women in Shi'ism was contingent on the patriarchal character of Arab culture prevalent in the eighth and ninth centuries. The methodologies that the jurists (fuqahā') utilized in the derivation of juridical rulings also affected the rulings on women. Hence before dealing with women's issues, the entry examines the factors that contributed to the rise of the Shī'ī school of law and the hermeneutical devices that the jurists used to deduce rulings.

The formation and crystallization of a Shī'ī school of law coincided with the rise of Sunnī schools of law. The emergence of a distinct Shī'ī school can probably be traced to the time of the fifth Shī'ī imam, Muḥammad al-Bāqir (d. 117/735). Respected by and contemporary to many Sunnī jurists in Medina and Kufa, he is credited with laying the foundations for the establishment of the Ja'fari school of law. Al-Bāqir is also the first Shī'ī figure from whom a vast corpus of ḥadīth (traditions) literature has been transmitted. His legal formulations were later elaborated by his son, the sixth Shī'ī imam, Ja'far al-Ṣādiq (d. 148/765) after whom the school was named. Al-Ṣādiq was a contemporary of prominent Sunnī jurists such as Abū Ḥanīfa (d. 150/767) and Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/795).

Circumstances that led to the rise of the Sunnī schools of law also precipitated a concurrent need for a Shī'ī school. The goal of the jurists' endeavor in the eighth and ninth centuries was to reach an understanding (fiqh) of the Sharī'a, that is, to comprehend in precise terms the law of God. Guided by a corpus of precepts and laws and their own independent reasoning the jurists attempted to construct a legal edifice by developing and elaborating a system of Sharī'a law. At the same time, the Shī'ī imams began to formulate their own understanding of the law and to establish paradigmatic precedents for the situations they encountered. Knowledge, interpretation, and articulation of the law meant that the imams became the main source of religious authority in Shi'ism.

During the period when the imams were with them, the Shī'īs accepted their pronouncements as the only valid source of law after the Qur'ān and the sunna of the Prophet. The imam was believed to be the final enunciator of the law, occupying the same position as the Prophet himself. Since the imam is also believed in Shi'ism to have inherited the comprehensive authority of the Prophet, the sunna of the imam is seen to be as binding as the sunna of the Prophet himself. As Shī'ī theology posited the imam to be divinely appointed (naṣṣ), endowed with divinely inspired knowledge ('ilm), and infallible (ma'sūm), the authority of the imam supersedes the authority of local practice or speculative reasoning. The emergence of a distinct Shī'ī school of law should thus be viewed as the result of the Shī'īs' self-understanding of the nature of religious leadership and their limitation of juristic authority to the imams.

Apart from the imams, some of their deputies in places like Kufa reportedly acted as jurists in their communities. In particular, Jābir al-Ju'fi (d. 127/745), Burayd b. Mu'āwiya (d. 150/767), Zurāra b. A'yān (d. 150/767), and Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Thaqafi (d. 150/767) are mentioned as some of the fuqahā' (jurists) of the Shī'ī community. Disciples such as Abān b. Taghlib (d. 142/759) were reportedly authorized by the imams to issue juridical edicts (fatwas) and to respond to legal questions in Medina.

The Shī'īs were not allowed by the imams to practice qiyās (analogy), ra'y (opinion), ijtihād (independent legal judgment), or other rational methods that were employed in the Sunnī schools. They were required to rely on the Qur'ān and narrations (riwāyāt) from the Prophet and the imams in the derivation of juridical rulings. In practice, some of the disciples of the imams, such as Zurāra b. A'yān, Muḥammad b. Muslim, and Hishām b. al-Ḥakam, probably influenced by the cosmopolitan and eclectic nature of Kufa, employed many of the speculative methods that were accepted in the Sunnī schools. In addition, after the occultation of the twelfth imam in 940 C.E., Shī'ī jurists had recourse to various hermeneutical devices such as maṣlaḥa (enacting a legal point that is most conducive to the welfare of the community) and other interpretive principles to respond to the needs of the times and to go beyond the rulings stated in the revealed texts.

SHI'ISM AND WOMEN

Generally speaking, due to the pivotal roles played by women such as Fāṭima, the daughter of the Prophet, and Zaynab, his granddaughter, women have received better treatment in Shī'ī ḥadīth and legal literature than in Sunnī tradition. There are fewer traditions in Shī'ī ḥadīth manuals that demean women. Both Fāṭima and Zaynab are portrayed as role models and revered in Shī'ī circles because they resisted injustice and oppression. After the establishment of Shī'ism in Iran in the sixteenth century, women received higher religious education and were even certified to exercise ijtihād, although until recently most Shī'ī jurists have barred women from occupying the position of judge. In places such as Iran and Iraq women religious leaders have held a position closer to that of male religious leaders than in most Sunnī countries. In recent times, special religious seminaries have been established and female religious scholars preside over women's religious ceremonies.

Rulings on women in Shī'ī legal manuals are also influenced by what Shī'īs deem to be anti-female innovations introduced by 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. As this entry shows, to refute the legal points introduced by the second caliph, Shī'ī law is opposed to some Sunnī rulings on certain female issues.

As with the Sunnī experience, women's issues in Shī'ī jurisprudence were explored, interpreted, and articulated by male jurists. There is a paucity of female representation in both Sunnī and Shī'ī legal manuals. Women were represented by men who often reflected the male-dominated milieu of eighth-century Arabia when many of the rulings on women were formulated by the imams of the schools.

Although Shī'ī law has its own distinctive character on some points of law, there are many instances where it agrees with one or more of the Sunnī schools. For the sake of brevity, the entry focuses on the following women's issues that are discussed in Shī'ī legal manuals: marriage, divorce, and the rights of inheritance.

MARITAL LAWS IN SHI'ISM

Most Shī'ī scholars agree that a woman who is sane, mature, and can handle her affairs is permitted to contract her own marriage without the consent of a guardian whether she is a virgin or not. This is based on the rational consideration that a human being has the liberty to choose his or her own partner. In this the Shī'īs tend to agree with the Ḥanafīs who adopted the same ruling on the issue.

The Shī'īs also state that at the time of marriage, compatibility is required in religious matters only. Reflecting the Medinese origins of the school where class differences and social inequities were largely absent, the Shī'īs did not consider social status, lineage, or the occupation of the husband to be important factors in choosing a spouse. The Mālikīs, who emerged from the same Medinese environment, held a similar view.

In addition, Shī'ī law also empowers the woman by allowing her to stipulate conditions in a marriage contract that will grant her the right to initiate divorce proceedings should her husband violate the terms of the agreement. She can stipulate, for example, that if her husband abuses her, she has the right to dissolve the marriage. In this way, she can circumvent the judicial process and the cumbersome khul' ṭalāq (divorce) and can instead recite her own ṭalāq. The Shī'īs predicate this ruling on the principle of maṣlaḥa, that is, invoking a law that is conducive to the welfare of the parties concerned.

A distinctive Shī'ī feature concerning marriage is the institution of mut'a, or temporary marriage, which was practiced in the early Muslim community. The Qur'ānic verse: "Those from whom you seek pleasure give them their prescribed dowries" (4:24) is seen as validating this practice. Traditions cited in Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ indicate that the practice was allowed by Muḥammad but later prohibited by 'Umar. Its acceptance in Shī'ī law is premised on numerous statements from the imams denouncing 'Umar's proscription of a practice that had been approved by the Prophet. A prominent feature of Shī'ī jurisprudence is its rejection of laws that were introduced by the caliphs, since they are seen as violating Prophetic practices.

Mut'a differs from permanent marriage in that the duration of the marriage has to be stipulated when it is solemnized. This period can range from a few minutes to many years but it should not exceed the life span of an average person. In addition, like a permanent marriage, mut'a allows for a mahr (bridal gift) payable to the woman. However, there is no divorce to be recited when the agreed period expires. The marriage can be renewed or the woman begins a waiting period (idda). The waiting period in a mut'a marriage is different from a permanent marriage in that the woman can remarry after observing two (instead of three) menstrual periods.

The institution of mut'a is not favorable to a woman, especially as she is not entitled to any right of maintenance and does not inherit from her husband. The contract may be terminated prematurely either by mutual agreement or by one party unilaterally. The husband is responsible to maintain any children born from a temporary marriage.

DIVORCE IN SHI'ISM

Shī'ī laws on divorce treat women more favorably than their Sunnī counterparts. This is because the Shī'īs do not accept the triple ṭalāq that the Sunnīs adopted as a valid form of divorce. The Shī'īs dismiss the triple ṭalāq as an innovation that was introduced by 'Umar. Shī'ī rejection of this form of divorce is favorable to women since the triple ṭalāq allows the husband the right to unilaterally pronounce the divorce in one meeting. The ṭalāq bars any further contact between the couple until she is married to another person and terminates the second marriage after consummating it.

Shī'ī law is also stricter than Sunnī law with regard to divorce. It considers as invalid any repudiation during a menstrual period, or when the woman is pure but cohabitation has taken place since her last period. In addition, Shī'ī law also requires the presence of two male Muslim witnesses during the divorce and allows the man to take back his wife during the waiting period ('idda). Even after the waiting period ends, the couple can get back together by solemnizing a second marriage.

According to Sunnī law, any word indicating repudiation may be used and witnesses are not required for its validity. Shī'ī law confines the husband's power of repudiation to defined limits. It insists on a specific formula and a correct pronouncement of ṭalāq is necessary. It is required that the husband states, "You are divorced" or "She is divorced," so that the words recited indicate a clear and unambiguous intention to dissolve the marriage. Any divorce undertaken under duress, in anger, or in jest is not deemed to be valid. The net result of the stricter conditions and the rejection of the triple ṭalāq has been a lower divorce rate in many Shī'ī countries.

Since divorce proceedings are normally initiated by the husband, women's rights to seek divorce are more circumscribed. Shī'ī law allows a woman to seek divorce under the khul' (at the instigation of the wife) form of divorce. Khul' can be finalized with the husband's consent. For it to be valid, the wife has to petition for divorce and is also required to offer some form of compensation to the husband (such as the return of the mahr). Khul' operates as a single, irrevocable divorce with an 'idda incumbent on the wife.

The wife can also nullify the marriage under certain circumstances without obtaining a formal divorce. Nullification is possible if the husband has no sexual organ, is impotent or insane, or if he has leprosy or leucoderma.

The wife can also obtain divorce if the husband is missing. The ruling on a missing husband is contingent on his financial state. If he has assets from which the wife can be maintained then it is not permissible for her to remarry under any circumstance until she is certain of his death or of his divorcing her. If he does not have enough assets to maintain her then she can obtain a divorce through the judicial process.

Like the ruling of the Mālikī school, the Shī'ī position is favorable to women in this instance. The judge is required to order a four-year waiting period during which time he will initiate a search for the husband. At the end of the period, the judge will pronounce the divorce by using the authority granted to him as the deputed agent of the occult imam. After this divorce the wife will observe an 'idda for four months and ten days, after which she may remarry.

INHERITANCE LAWS

The Qur'ān changed aspects of tribal laws that were considered unjust. In pre-Islamic Arabia, women were not accorded rights of inheritance. The Qur'ān ameliorated this situation by allocating certain inheritance shares to women who were now to be counted as heirs of the deceased.

The Shī'īs refused to recognize any customary law that was not explicitly endorsed by the Qur'ān. Since the Qur'ān does not recognize the pre-eminence of the male agnate relatives, the Shī'ī law of inheritance rejects the privileged position that Sunnī inheritance rules accord to male blood relatives, the agnates (or 'asaba) of the deceased. Due to this, the Shī'ī law of inheritance is more favorable to women. Shī'ī law states that, regardless of their gender, the closest relatives (qarāba) will inherit after the division of Qur'ānic shares. This is in contrast to Sunnī law, which accords distant agnates the remains of the shares after the distribution to heirs that is stipulated by the Qur'ān. The Shī'īs quote Ja'far al-Ṣādiq as saying, "Dust in the jaws of the 'asaba" to justify this exclusion.

The ramifications of the Shī'ī position on female heirs in inheritance become evident from the fact that under Sunnī law, a single surviving daughter was limited to a maximum of half of the inheritance no matter how distant the next eligible male-line relative was. By excluding the agnates, Shī'ī law gave the same daughter the whole inheritance. The inclusion of distant male relatives indicates that the Sunnīs uphold the concept of the extended family, whereas by giving more rights to parents and lineal descendants Shī'ī law stresses the nuclear family.

Shī'ī inheritance laws also stipulate different layers or tiers of inheritance. These are: the lineal descendants and parents of the deceased; brothers and sisters and their issue, and grandparents of the deceased; and uncles and aunts and their issue. The presence of the first category of heirs will exclude the other two from inheriting.

In constructing a typology of male and female relatives based on their relationship with the deceased, Shī'ī law treats male and female relatives equally. It stipulates that any descendant, male or female, in the first category will always exclude the collateral, that is, the second tier (the brothers and sisters of a deceased). Hence the daughter of the deceased will exclude the brother. If she is the only survivor, she will even exclude a distant male agnate such as a cousin from inheritance. Furthermore, the presence of a son's or daughter's daughter will also exclude the siblings of the deceased because a daughter or her offspring belong to the first category of heirs whereas brothers and sisters belong to the second.

Through this principle, female and cognate relatives are integrated within the Shī'ī classes of heirs. Thus the presence of any other relatives in Shī'ī law – child, grandchild, or the mother – precludes the brothers and paternal grandparents from any rights of succession. Reflecting the patriarchal nature of Arab society where men were responsible for the maintenance of women, the Qur'ānic principle that the male relative receives double the share of the female is also enforced in Shī'ī law.

Shī'īs prefer the nearer relative to the more distant. They say that one who is related through both parents excludes the consanguine (agnate). Hence a full sister excludes a consanguine brother. Sunnī law, on the other hand emphasizes the concept of the family group by recognizing the claims of agnate collaterals.

Political considerations may have influenced the development of the Shī'ī scheme of inheritance. The principle that cognate relationship is a stronger basis for succession than agnate ties and that the claims of collateral are subordinate to those of lineal descendants validate the reported claims of Fāṭima to inherit an estate (called Fadak) from her father, a claim that was rejected by Abū Bakr. The principle of cognate inheritance would also legitimize succession in the female line as all the imams were descendants of the Prophet through Fāṭima.

The Shī'īs believe that their laws accurately represent the Qur'ānic spirit. Their acceptance of mut'ā is based on a Qur'ānic verse that endorses the practice; their rejection of the triple ṭalāq and the rights of agnate relatives is premised on the view that these have no Qur'ānic basis. For the Shī'īs, customary laws could only be implemented if they were explicitly endorsed in the Qur'ān. For the Sunnis, they could only be repudiated if the Qur'ān explicitly rejected them. This was one major reason for the differences between the Shī'ī and Sunnī legal systems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abu Zahra, The pure and powerful. Studies in contemporary Muslim society, Reading, Berkshire, U.K. 1997.
- J. Cole and N. Keddie (eds.), Shi'ism and social protest, New Haven, Conn. 1986.
- N. Coulson, Conflicts and tensions in Islamic jurisprudence, Chicago 1969.
- , A history of Islamic law, Edinburgh 1978.
- A. Fyzee, Outlines of Muhammadan Law, Delhi 1972.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender and social change, New York 1998.
- S. Haeri, Law of desire. Temporary marriage in Shi'i Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1989.
- W. Hallaq, Authority, continuity and change in Islamic law, Cambridge 2001.
- W. Madelung, Shī'ī attitudes toward women as reflected in fiqh, in W. Madelung, Religious schools and sects in medieval Islam, London 1985, 69–79.
- M. Maghniyya, The five schools of law, Qum 1995.
- F. Mernissi Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in a modern Muslim society, Cambridge, Mass. 1975.
- , Women and Islam. An historical and theological enquiry, trans. M. J. Lakeland, Oxford 1991.
- A. Sachedina, The just ruler (al-sultān al-'ādil) in Shi'ite Islam. The comprehensive authority of the jurist in Imamite jurisprudence, Oxford 1988.
- , Woman, half-the-man? The crisis of male epistemology in Islamic jurisprudence, in F. Daftary (ed.), Intellectual traditions in Islam, London 2000, 160–78.
- J. Schacht, The origins of Muhammadan jurisprudence, Oxford 1950.
- , An introduction to Islamic law, Oxford 1979.
- S. Seestani, Islamic laws, London 1994.
- A. Wadud, Qur'an and woman. Rereading the sacred text from a woman's perspective, New York 1999.
- B. Wheeler, Applying the canon in Islam. The authorization and maintenance of interpretive reasoning in Hanafi scholarship, Albany, N.Y. 1996.

Law: Family Law, 7th–Late 18th Centuries

Overview

THE DEVELOPMENT OF ISLAMIC FAMILY LAW

Classical Islamic family law, like other areas of Islamic law (the Shari'a), is based primarily on the texts of the Qur'an and the sunna of the Prophet Muḥammad, and the principles derived and induced from those texts. Both bodies of texts contain specific rulings as well as general principles that form the basis of classical Islamic family law. The foundations for this law were developed over the first three centuries of Islam by scholars who employed various methods of reasoning to interpret the sacred texts. Scholars also developed a doctrine of consensus, the means by which particular interpretations of sacred texts were rendered authoritative (even “orthodox”). Differences in legal theory, as well as cultural differences and various historical developments resulted in scholars forming themselves into “schools” (madhhabs) of law. By the fourth/tenth century, there were four main law schools of Sunnī Islam: Mālikī, Ḥanafī, Shāfi'i, and Ḥanbalī. Among the Shi'īs, the Twelver (also called Ja'fari) and Zaydī schools are the most important.

The formation of a scholarly community developed over time; at the beginning of Islam, it was the Prophet Muḥammad who was the authoritative interpreter of the law. During his lifetime, the Prophet gave rulings on many cases of family law. It is clear that he was determined to provide some regularity to the many diverse customs that governed family life in pre-Islamic Arabia (Hodgson 1974, 340, Stern 1939, 81). Over the next few centuries, the law was developed and systematized by scholars and state officials. Although legal scholars were often reluctant to become involved in the exercise of political power, from early on colleges for religious and legal scholarship (madrāsas) were often sponsored by political rulers. In most urban areas, judges and other officials who applied the law were drawn from the body of madrasa graduates. By the Ottoman period, this was a formalized and centralized system; steps toward codification of the law were taken, and Ottoman officials were usually required to apply Ḥanafī law. At the same time, there were always scholars who did not hold official government positions, yet their opinions were treated as binding by individual followers and communities.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF WOMEN TO THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE LAW

Understanding the development of a community of orthodox legal scholars and the procedure for selecting judges and other officers of the court is crucial for understanding the development of classical Islamic family law. Many modern scholars have seen the apparent exclusion of women from legal scholarship and institutions to be responsible for the development of a system of family law they perceive to be biased against women. Not all of these perceptions are justified. The content of the law and the nature of its biases is discussed below. With respect to the participation of women in the scholarly discourse, from the beginning of Islam until the end of the classical period, women are included in biographical dictionaries of scholars. Women are especially prominent in the early period as transmitters of Prophetic hadīth (Roded 1994, 63–89, Stern 1939, 21). On the other hand, it was exceedingly rare for a woman to hold an official political or legal office in medieval Muslim societies. This was primarily due to the widely held sentiment that it was better for women to limit their presence among men in the public sphere in order to maintain a chaste and wholesome society (Fadel 1997, 199). As a result, it is likely that the more scholarship became institutionalized and closely associated with the state, the less opportunity women may have had to participate in the legal discourse.

Throughout the centuries, however, female authorities were never completely absent from the process of law-making and adjudication. Female witnesses were regularly called in paternity cases and in cases that required expertise in some aspect of female physiology or reproduction. Very early in the development of Islamic law, the decisions of some female experts set important precedents that had significant consequences for women and their families for generations. For example, during the time of the Caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb (r. 634–44 C.E.), a woman who had been widowed gave birth to a fully-developed child, only six months into her second marriage. Naturally, the woman was suspected of having had an illicit relationship before her current marriage. However, a female expert witness called by ʿUmar testified that this was a case of a “sleeping child” (rāqid). The woman had been pregnant by her first husband, but when he died, the child, deprived of vital fluids due to the mother’s extreme grief, had entered a state of hibernation. When the woman remarried, her new husband’s seminal fluid reawakened the child, who completed his development in six months. ʿUmar accepted this explanation by the female expert and the notion of the sleeping child became a part of Islamic law, especially in the Mālikī school. Although not all legal schools accepted this precedent, the law generally relied on female expert witnesses to determine the facts of the case whenever female physiology was involved.

Women also had opportunities to shape the law to the extent that custom was recognized by and incorporated into Islamic law. On matters on which revelation was silent, custom (urf, āda) was explicitly recognized as a source of law by the classical jurists. This appropriation of custom into the law was, as Lawrence Rosen has stated, not “an occasional trickle or an idiosyncratic intrusion promoted by a rare commentator.” Rather, custom was foundational to all aspects of the law. “Custom is indeed, and always has been, a source of Islamic law – but not in the European sense of source which has been projected onto Islamic law, but as an integral part of the Shari’a itself” (Rosen 1989, 96). This is particularly true in family law, where custom is normative in so many areas, particularly in determining maintenance (nafaqa), custody, and marital rights. What this means is that women were not simply passive recipients of legal rulings. Rather, where women had any power to shape and articulate community norms (a power that depended on a vast range of sociological and material factors) they had the ability to influence the application of the law. As Rosen has demonstrated for contemporary Islamic courts, for example, the expectations of individuals that the law should produce a “just” result compels jurists to continue to search for principles and values of the law that will support an outcome perceived as just by the community.

Even during the time of the Prophet, as the Qurʾān was being revealed, it seems that Muslim women had expectations that Islamic rulings would do them justice. Islamic literature contains a number of reports of women expressing their conviction that God would affirm their sense of justice by revealing what they considered to be a fair ruling to the Prophet. Thus, ʿĀ’isha received the exoneration she expected when the punishment for the slander of chaste women (qadhf) was revealed (24:4). Khawla received the ruling she prayed for when the Qurʾān prohibited men from divorcing their wives by using a pre-Islamic formula known as zihār, stating “you are to me as the back of my mother” (58:2–4). The Qurʾān refers to Khawla as “the woman who disputed” (al-mujādila) and the chapter containing this revelation came to be named after her. This clearly shows the effect of Muslim women’s expectations about Islamic law on the course of revelation itself.

In terms of the sunna, women seemed to have had relatively free access to the Prophet, and their support was important in making his mission a success. Women’s concerns, complaints, and expectations, therefore, shaped even the primary sources of Islamic law. As Islamic law came to be articulated and formalized over the centuries, women continued to play some part in supporting or discrediting those who claimed to authoritatively represent the law. For example, women could contribute to undermining the authority of scholars by informal social sanctions, like spreading gossip, and they could contribute to the support of those scholars they favored by giving their institutions alms and by sending their children to study with them.

On the other hand, the concerns of men about women’s place and authority could also provoke revelation. Thus it is reported that after the Prophet ruled that a woman could physically retaliate against her husband who had hit her, many men complained. The Prophet then conveyed a new revelation that such retaliation was not permitted, that men, as a final measure could use some physical force to discipline their wives, but if that did not work, they must seek arbitration (Qurʾān 4:34). This authority to use force was certainly abused by some men since cases are discussed by the jurists. Muslims jurists developed a standard remarkably similar to the English common law “rule of thumb” in which husbands could not hit their wives with a switch wider than a thumb. In Islamic law, a toothstick (miswāk) was the standard. In cases of abuse, some jurists allowed women to sue their husbands for damages if they were injured or visibly hurt by them (Tucker 1998, 66). Other jurists said that any use of physical force could be considered prohibited abuse in cultures where such force was felt to be repulsive. It is likely that any woman seeking protection from an abusive husband needed strong family or community support; legal protection could not be invoked if there were cultural barriers to women accessing such protections.

GUARDIANSHIP: AUTHORITY AND RESPONSIBILITY

The revelation permitting physical disciplining of wives is one of the justifications jurists gave for granting men in their various capacities certain kinds of legal authority and coercive power over their female relatives. The sunna was usually cited to argue that only a male could serve as the guardian (walī) of previously unmarried women, and this guardianship was required by most schools of law. What this means is that classical jurists granted men, in certain circumstances, political authority over women within the context of the family. According to jurists, this authority is God-given, for the Qurʾān states that “men are responsible for women (al-rijāl qawwamūn ʿalā al-nisāʾ)” (4:34). This authority, however, is functional, and never absolute; it can be taken away by the state if a man abuses or neglects his position (Tucker 1998, 42). For example, a man can lose his right to be his daughter’s guardian in contracting her marriage if his motivation is personal gain rather than his daughter’s welfare.

Because men have a certain degree of coercive authority over their wives, and because classical jurists did not consider it proper for a non-Muslim to exercise coercive authority over a Muslim, Islamic law forbids the marriage of non-Muslim men to Muslim women, yet permits Muslim men to marry “chaste” women (al-muḥṣanāt) from the “People of the Book” (Qurʾān 5:5). Another consequence of this principle is that non-Muslim women who convert to Islam can be separated from their non-Muslim husbands; even concubines who convert to Islam can be removed from the ownership of their non-Muslim masters (Mattson 1999, 178).

Any authority that men have over their female relatives is always linked with the responsibility to provide full maintenance (nafaqa). Maintenance law is one of the most important areas of Islamic family law, as is evidenced by the early compilation of complete texts devoted to the subject. Fathers are required to provide full support for unmarried daughters, even as adults. A single, divorced, or widowed woman who is in need has the right to support from her male relatives, including her father, brothers, sons, and uncles. Even married women whose husbands are unable to support them can demand support from male relatives; in such cases, however, the support can be considered an obligatory loan to the husband who should reimburse the expenses when he is able.

Given this potential financial and emotional burden male relatives could bear, it was clearly in men’s interests to find husbands who were willing and able to support their female relatives for their lives. One instrument for protecting women’s interests was the requirement that a previously unmarried woman must have her male guardian consent to her marriage. Among the Sunnīs, only the Ḥanafīs did not require the guardian’s approval for the marriage of a female virgin. The Ḥanafīs did protect the family’s interests, however, by permitting the family to block the marriage of a female virgin if her mate was not her “equal.” Equality (kafāʾa) could be considered from many different aspects in the Ḥanafī school, including profession, ethnicity, social status, and religiosity. The other Sunnī schools also recognized the doctrine of kafāʾa, but they used it to limit marriages arranged by guardians for their dependents. Since guardians are permitted to contract marriages for minor dependents (male and female), the doctrine made it possible for other guardians to object to the contract if they considered the groom unequal to the bride. Among the Shīʿīs, kafāʾa was applied to ensure that descendants of the Prophet in particular were not given away in unsuitable marriages.

It would be reductionist to consider guardianship simply an instrument of control that men willfully exercised over women. If this were the case, it would be difficult to explain why a previously married woman (thayyib) was permitted to contract her own marriage – especially in an age where second and third marriages were not uncommon. In addition, we cannot reasonably explain guardianship simply as an instrument to protect the financial interests of the family. Rather, the instruments of Islamic family law appear to have more internal consistency if we approach them from the dominant underlying assumption, an assumption that is often explicitly articulated, that the paternalistic protection of male relatives is necessary because women are more vulnerable to poverty, harm, and exploitation than men. The desire to protect both women and their families from predatory outsiders is evident, for example, in an account of a disagreement between the founders of two of the orthodox Sunnī schools of law, Mālik (d. 796) and al-Shāfiʿī (d. 820). Mālik is reported to have waived the requirement that a previously unmarried woman had to have the approval of her guardian for marriage if the woman was from one of the lower classes of society whose customs did not include a regular reliance on guardians. Apparently Mālik, who gave significant weight to custom as a source of law, felt that such people, since they had little to lose in the way of wealth or family solidarity in any case, should be permitted to practice their own customs. Al-Shāfiʿī strongly disagreed, arguing that such a woman was even more in need of the protection of a guardian, since she was most vulnerable to deception and exploitation. Such a woman without a male guardian should have one appointed by the state, which, in any case, always retained the ultimate authority to remove or appoint a guardian.

Assuming that most guardians will act in the best interests of their wards, classical Islamic law also grants guardians the power to contract marriages on behalf of minor male and female wards. Such marriages could be consummated at puberty, which is determined physiologically, although a minimum age of nine for girls and twelve for boys is irrefutably presumed (El Alami and Hinchcliffe 1996, 9). At that time, either party can repudiate the marriage, by exercising the “option of puberty.” Naturally, custom played an important role in determining the extent to which the option was exercised.

DETERMINING PATERNITY BY REGULATION OF SEXUAL RELATIONS

Throughout the medieval Islamic world, local customs and beliefs differently affected the way in which women’s sexuality was regulated through the law. In some places, previously unmarried women were expected to prove their virginity on their wedding night by bearing an intact hymen. Muslim jurists rejected this customary proof of chastity and the justifications for the harm some men caused to women because of this. As one seventeenth-century Syrian jurist said, “being deflowered does not necessarily mean that illicit intercourse has taken place, for virginity can be lost by jumping, or through menstruation, or with age, and so forth” (Tucker 1998, 1). According to Judith Tucker, classical Muslim jurists “took a clear position here against social customs that assigned fathers, brothers, and husbands the role of enforcer of female sexual behaviour. Men could guard their female relatives, especially minors, against involvement in situations that might lead to improper sexual contact, but an actual instance of sexual intercourse outside of marriage was a crime against religion: rigid rules of procedure and evidence did not allow for any special family role and, furthermore, implicitly condemned any unilateral family move to punish those presumed guilty” (Tucker 1998, 166).

As Tucker notes, however, the family was assigned a dominant role in preventing women from situations that might lead to illicit sexual contact. To this end, customary practices were often given great deference. For example, the fourteenth-century Syrian jurist Ibn Taymiyya permitted female circumcision because it can limit the “excessive” sexual desire experienced by some women. Astonishingly, Ibn Taymiyya prohibited piercing children’s ears because it is physical mutilation. Although the practice of female circumcision was not widespread in the Muslim world, it is significant that Ibn Taymiyya was so convinced of the grave harm that illicit sexual relations would involve that he waived his own clear prohibition against physical mutilation to permit it (Ibn Taymiyya, 18).

In the medieval Islamic discourse, sexuality and sexual relations were generally considered a good thing; at the same time, the desire for sexual fulfillment, like the desire for other worldly pleasures, could be distracting and corrupting. Unregulated, sexuality could lead to injustice in this world and distance from God’s presence in the next. Men’s sexuality and behaviors were also heavily regulated and controlled by the law and religious discourses. If men engaged in illicit relationships, heterosexual or homosexual, they could be ostracized by society and punished by the law. However, because women are considered to have tangible proof of their virginity, and because sexual intercourse can result in pregnancy, it is much more difficult for a woman to conceal an illicit relationship. A woman could not simply turn to God in repentance for sexual transgressions that harmed her state in the afterlife, she often had to deal with real world consequences of her actions.

In trying to make sense of the medieval jurists’ application of the law, we need to consider their understanding of the social and political context in which they lived. In premodern Muslim societies, where security of life and goods was often elusive, where state support and protection of needy individuals was limited, where an official police presence was minimal even in cities, and where highways and rural areas were often subject to attacks by bandits, it was the rare individual who could have a secure life without the support of an extended family. Family solidarity and group interests always limited individual choice, for men and women. Women, however, were considered most in need of protection both because they were deemed more naive and emotional than men, and because it was assumed that there were always men willing to take advantage of vulnerable women. As long as these perceptions about human nature were unchallenged (and as long as women were sheltered from public life they likely remained naive), the authorities seem to have remained convinced that the best way to achieve security for women was to limit their contact with men. The legal principles of “what leads to the prohibited is itself prohibited” and “blocking the means” were invoked, sometimes to a logical extreme, to limit women’s presence in the public sphere. Although many Muslim women, urban and rural, needed to work outside the home, in most places unrelated women and men were separated by physical or behavioral barriers to prevent close intermingling. A man could socialize freely with a woman only if he was her husband or mahram – a man permanently prohibited from marrying her. Male relatives, by serving as chaperones or guardians of women, limited the access of unrelated men to those women.

From the standpoint of the law, one of the greatest risks of unregulated sexual behavior was undetermined paternity. If women were considered vulnerable in an insecure world, unprotected children were even more at risk. A consistent underlying principle in Islamic family law is that children have the right to be acknowledged and supported by their biological father. In order to establish this relationship, Islamic law prohibited all sexual activity outside marriage and concubinage. Any child born to a wife is presumptively the offspring of the husband. If a man wishes to deny paternity for his wife’s child, he must take an oath that can be rebutted by his wife.

In the case of concubinage, the schools of law were split; the majority did not allow a man to deny paternity of any child his concubine might bear. Concubinage was strictly regulated, so that a man could have sexual relations only with a woman over whom he had full ownership; otherwise he might accuse a business partner of impregnating the slave. All children born to concubines had rights equal to children born of free wives to support and inheritance. A woman who became pregnant by her master acquired the status of umm al-walad (mother of a child) and could not be sold or given away for the rest of her life. The umm al-walad was freed upon the death of her master. Although the umm al-walad did not inherit a fixed share of her master’s estate, she could be freely willed up to a third of the estate. Making this kind of provision for concubines seems to have been common; the early jurist al-Shāfi‘ī, for example, willed a variety of goods (including a slave of her own) to his concubine (Mattson 1999, 209).

The Ḥanafīs, however, did allow a master to deny paternity of his concubine’s child. In areas where Ḥanafī law was applied, the practice of concubinage must have had very different consequences, allowing more abuse of slave women and less control over men’s sexuality. Since the Otto-mans spread and enforced the Ḥanafī school over many Islamic lands in the later medieval period, this doctrine could have had a significant impact on family relations and the slave trade.

In keeping with the principle that children have a right to their biological lineage, Islamic law forbids fictional adoptions. Caring for foster children or orphans is highly meritorious in Islam, but an adopted child should keep his or her own family name, if it is known. Lineage is also protected by allowing women only one sexual partner at a time – her husband or master – while men can have up to four wives in addition to concubines. After divorce or being widowed, a woman cannot remarry until a certain fixed period has passed (the ‘idda) to ensure that she is not carrying her former husband’s child. Similarly, a man cannot establish sexual relations with a concubine until she has completed a similar waiting period (the istibrā’).

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE

With marriage, men assume the responsibility to fully support their wives. Married women have the right to control their own property, and even wealthy women have no legal responsibility to contribute to household expenses or their own daily needs. The level of support provided by the husband depends both on his means and the wife’s social status. Both of these principles can be found in the Qur’ān (2:233), where men are ordered to maintain their divorced wives who are nursing their children according to “customary standards of fairness” (al-mā’rūf), but that “no one shall have a greater burden placed on them than they can bear,” meaning that men should not have to pay greater alimony or maintenance than they can truly afford.

The husband’s commitment to the financial support of his wife is symbolized in the mahr – the marriage gift pledged at the time of marriage. The mahr (also called ṣadāq) is typically comprised of cash or other fungible property, although it could be anything of value – for example, the manumission of a slave woman by her master who then marries her (Spectorsky 1993, 121). Typically, the amount of mahr is negotiated between the groom and the bride or her family according to individual expectations and cultural norms. The state applies cultural norms in fixing a mahr in cases of divorce or dispute if an amount has not been specified in the marriage contract. In such cases, judges normally award a mahr mithl, a mahr for someone “like her” in terms of social and economic status (Nasir 1986, 90–2). Here again, we see that social customs and individual expectations, including women’s expect-tations, comprised part of the family law that was applied by Muslim jurists.

Islamic law was adamant that the mahr was the sole property of the bride; the repeated insistence of jurists on this point in legal texts indicates that it was not unusual for self-interested guardians to take the mahr for themselves. Another issue frequently discussed by the jurists is the attempt of some men to avoid paying the mahr by agreeing with another family to “exchange” brides between the families, with neither bride getting a mahr. This practice, known as shighbār, was explicitly prohibited by the Prophet, but seems to have continued as a cultural practice among the Beduin in particular (even until modern times, when Beduin women sought the judgment of Sharīʿa courts to secure their Islamic rights over customary practices; see Shaham 1993).

Unlike in many medieval Mediterranean and Asian societies, the family of the bride was not required to pay the husband a dowry. In some societies, however, it was customary for a bride to bring a trousseau (jahāz) with her to her husband’s home. Consisting normally of bedding, furnishings, jewelry and clothes, the jahāz was legally the property of the bride, unless some of it had only been lent to her by her family for a time. Legal texts indicate that some men tried to claim part of their wife’s trousseau upon divorce, a claim that was supported by custom in some places, but rejected by Islamic law (Tucker 1998, 54–5).

If a man desired to divorce his wife (talāq), he was forbidden to take back the mahr or any of the gifts he had given her. It was customary in some communities for couples to split the mahr into two amounts: prompt (muqaddam) and deferred (muʾakkhar). The prompt mahr was paid at the time of marriage, the deferred mahr was considered a debt against the husband’s estate if he died, or which he had to pay if he divorced his wife. In addition, some scholars, particularly Mālikī scholars, interpreted Qurʾān 2:236 to indicate that the judge could require the husband to pay alimony (matāʿ) to his ex-wife.

In classical Islamic law, the husband can exercise his right of divorce without resort to the court. Once the husband utters a statement of divorce, his wife enters a “waiting period” (ʿidda) of three months (or menstrual periods), or until delivery of a child if the wife is pregnant. During this time, the couple should live together without having sexual relations. If sexual relations are resumed before the end of the ʿidda, or if the husband tells his wife he wants her back as his wife, the marriage is resumed. If no such action is taken during the waiting period, the couple are divorced. If a couple have twice divorced and remarried, a third marriage is forbidden to them unless the woman consummates a marriage with another man. These regulations are intended to deter men from using divorce as a threat and tool of manipulation over women, which seems to have been common in some societies.

Judges have the power to grant a divorce to women for a number of reasons, including abuse, neglect of duty, lack of support, and impotence. Jurists gave a rather wide variety of interpretations of the husband’s duties and the wife’s rights. For example, some said that the wife had a right to regular sexual intercourse, so that impotence for any extended period was grounds for divorce, while the Ḥanafī school required only that the husband was able to consummate the marriage. With a judicial dissolution of marriage (faskh), the wife had the right to retain her full mahr and all her marriage gifts, or to receive the remainder of her mahr if she had not been fully paid at the time of marriage.

A third means to dissolve a marriage is “divestment” (khulʿ) by the wife. In this case, the woman does not claim any neglect or abuse by the husband, but still desires to end the marriage. Some scholars considered this process a kind of divorce, others classified it as “ransoming.” The difference is important, because those scholars who consider khulʿ to be a divorce conclude that it has legal effect only if accepted by the husband. In contrast, those scholars who consider khulʿ a ransom permit the wife to end the marriage without the agreement of the husband, simply by returning to him the mahr and any other marriage gifts.

Marriage contracts could be used to provide a woman with stronger legal instruments for securing a divorce against the wishes of her husband. Basic contracts recorded the necessary components of the marriage process, such as the names of the parties, that each consented to the union, and the amount of the mahr. In addition, Shīʿī jurists, in contrast to Sunnīs, permitted the contract (written or oral) to limit the duration of the marriage. Sunnī jurists claimed a consensus that “temporary marriage” (zawāj mutʿa) had been prohibited by the Prophet Muḥammad.

Marriage contracts seem to have been especially important, however, for recording stipulations made by the bride. The inclusion in early legal texts of sample marriage contracts with a variety of possible stipulations indicates that the practice was relatively widespread. Documentary evidence indicates that stipulations continued to be an important part of marriage contracts throughout the classical period (Abdal-Rehim 1996, 98–103, Spector sky 1993, 13). Common stipulations included the right of the wife to divorce her husband if he took another wife or a concubine, her right to reside close to her family or in a certain town, her right to a domestic servant, her right to a monthly or yearly allowance beyond her standard maintenance rights, the agreement of the husband to provide support for his wife's children by a previous marriage, and the agreement of the husband not to travel away from his family for long periods of time.

Of course, women's rights to include stipulations in their marriage contracts do not mean that all women had the power to conduct such negotiations. Poverty, low social status, and lack of family support could deprive a women of the power to meaningfully negotiate a contract. Although this is true of people and contracts in general, it is likely that women often had less freedom to freely negotiate contracts than men. Nevertheless, it is significant that by recognizing the validity of stipulations in the marriage contract, classical Islamic law gave women a potential instrument for negotiating the lifestyle they desired with their future husbands, and the legal force to compel their husbands to abandon or adopt certain behaviors, or face punitive measures.

MAINTAINING FAMILY SOLIDARITY

The inclusion in marriage contracts of stipulations that a man could not move his wife away from her family is one indication of the importance of family solidarity in premodern Muslim societies. Islamic family law fostered and promoted mutual dependence in a number of ways. The responsibility of men to provide maintenance for female relatives has already been discussed. Minor dependents, male and female, also have the right to complete maintenance from their male guardians. This includes children of divorced men who are in the custody of their mother. Parents and grandparents, if needy, have the right to full support from their adult children and grandchildren.

Apart from financial responsibilities, the law requires guardians to properly care for their children. Babies have the right to be nursed, although some scholars say this is not the legal duty of the mother. If a woman does not want to nurse her child herself, the father must pay a wet-nurse, if he is able. If the parents are divorced, the father must pay support to the mother if she is to nurse the baby. Before age seven, children are considered to need the care of a woman (ḥaḍāna). For this reason, most schools of law placed young children in the custody of the mother in case of divorce, but gave the father custody rights for older children, when they were considered in need of the protection and mentoring of a father. Some scholars argued that girls should stay in the custody of the mother until marriage. In all cases, a father could fight the mother's custody if she remarried. Although the step-father became a mahram to his female step-daughters, the girls' male relatives had the right to have them removed from his household. According to most Sunni scholars, a young child in this situation should be placed in the custody of another female relative; Shī'īs allow the father to take custody.

Marshall Hodgson has noted that while Islamic law strengthened the nuclear family against the customs of pre-Islamic society, the law also aimed to keep all intimate relationships within the law. Thus, polygamy and concubinage were recognized and legislated. Hodgson says that the "effect of the Shari'i rules on marriage was to accord to up to four mates absolutely equal rights, which their children also shared in; the kept mistress or the free-born concubine [of the ancient world and Christian Europe] disappeared, in effect, from among the ordinary privileged classes . . . the Christian system sanctified – and under favorable circumstances surely fostered – a solidarity of interest in a couple committed to a single marital union despite the temptations of wealth. The Muslim system sacrificed the primacy of conjugal unity in favour of equality of rights on the part of all concerned" (Hodgson 1974, 341).

To foster the solidarity of the extended family, Islamic law designates fixed inheritance shares for close family members, allowing no disinheritance. In most cases, the Qur'ān allots male relatives double the inheritance of equivalent female relations. This inequality is explained by some scholars as a compensation for the greater responsibility men have to provide maintenance for family members. The Qur'ān lists many categories of relatives who can potentially inherit; the more close relatives there are, the fewer distant relatives will be allotted a fixed share. The Qur'ān does encourage Muslims to leave something for more distant relations from the third of the estate that can be freely willed to non-Qur'ānic heirs. Relatives who profess a different faith can also receive an inheritance from the third, since they are barred from receiving a fixed share. One of the Prophet's wives used this provision to will a third of her estate to her Jewish nephew (Ibn Sa'd 1990, viii, 102).

CONCLUSION

Premodern Islamic legal texts display a wide variety of opinions held by classical jurists on almost every issue related to family law. In addition to the diversity of opinion evident in law books, the incorporation of custom into the law meant that Islamic family law often yielded divergent, even contradictory, results in its actual application across the Muslim world. At the same time, the law retained an overall coherence due to the retention of a number of core regulations and underlying premises, some of which have been discussed here. With the coming of colonialism, new world-views and customs challenged many of these premises upon which Islamic family law was built.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Muhammad Ibn Sa'd. al-Ṭabaqat al-Kubrā, 9 vols. Beirut 1990.
 Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Ḥalīm Ibn Taymiyya, Fatāwā al-nisā', eds. Sayyid al-Jamīlī and Aḥmad Sā'ih, Cairo 1987.
 Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb al-Māwardī, Kitāb al-naḥāqāt, ed. 'Amir Sa'īd al-Zībārī, Beirut 1998.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abdullāh b. Aḥmād b. Qudāma, al-Mughnī, 9 vols., Cairo n.d.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. 'Amr al-Khassāf al-Shaybānī, Kitāb al-naḥāqāt, Beirut 1984.
 Saḥnūn b. Sa'īd al-Tanūkhī, al-Mudawwana al-kubrā li-al-Imām Mālik ibn Anas, 6 vols., Beirut 1905.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- A. A. Abdal-Rehim, The family and gender laws in Egypt during the Ottoman period, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.),

- Women, the family and divorce laws in Islamic history*, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 96–111.
 D. El Alami and D. Hinchcliffe, Islamic marriage and divorce laws of the Arab world, London 1996.
 M. Fadel, Two women, one man. Knowledge, power, and gender in medieval Sunni legal thought, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 29:2 (1997), 185–204.
 M. G. S. Hodgson, The venture of Islam. Conscience and history in a world civilization, i, The classical age of Islam, Chicago 1974.
 I. Mattson, A believing slave is better than an unbeliever. Status and community in early Islamic society and law, Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago 1999.
 J. J. Nasir, The Islamic law of personal status, London 1986.
 R. Roded, Women in Islamic biographical collections. From Ibn Sa'd to Who's Who, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
 L. Rosen. The Anthropology of justice. Law as culture in Islamic society, Oxford 1989.
 R. Shaham, A woman's place. A confrontation with Bedouin custom in the Shari'a court, in Journal of the American Oriental Society (April–June 1993), 192–7.
 W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and marriage in early Arabia, London 1903, new ed. 1990.
 A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
 S. A. Spector, Chapters on marriage and divorce. Responses of Ibn Hanbal and Ibn Rahwayh, Austin, Tex. 1993.
 G. H. Stern, Marriage in early Islam, London 1939.
 J. E. Tucker, In the house of the law. Gender and Islamic law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, Berkeley 1998.

INGRID MATTSON

Law: Modern Family Law, 1800–Present

Afghanistan

As a Muslim nation, Afghans consider the Sharī'a, and specifically Ḥanafī fiqh, as the basis of their laws. However, as a tribal society, they have held onto pre-Islamic codes and local customary practices. The line between the two has gradually blurred.

Family law in Afghanistan has developed parallel to the development of the state and political changes. From the inception of the modern Afghan state in 1747, matters pertaining to family law were settled on an ad hoc basis, either in Sharī'a courts or in tribal assemblies. It was Amīr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Khān (r. 1880–1901) who first attempted to codify Afghan family law and apply it in a uniform manner throughout the country. He banned child marriage, forced marriage, and exorbitant bride-price. He also declared un-Islamic such practices as bride-price and the giving of girls in marriage to end blood feuds. He also restored to women the right to seek divorce in cases of non-support, and to widows their rights to inheritance. Although these were important first steps, qāḍīs in remote areas of the country continued to issue rulings based on traditional practices and on their own interpretation of the Sharī'a.

Amīr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Khān's son, Amīr Ḥabīb Allāh Khān (r. 1901–19), continued to emphasize his predecessor's vision and went further in adopting a systematic program of public education on the Sharī'a. This program, designed by Maḥmūd Ṭarzī, the famous Afghan reformer, consisted of publishing books on the Sharī'a, including rulings on women's rights, regular appearance of articles in the state-run newspaper, Sirāj al-akhbār, and publication of manuals for qāḍīs.

King Amān Allāh Khān (r. 1919–29) is considered the champion of modernization and of family law reform. In 1921 he issued a marriage decree in which child marriage was pronounced strictly forbidden and the age of majority was set at 13. In 1924, when he presented the nation with its first constitution, his family law reforms, especially articles related to polygamy, divorce, mahr (gift to the bride), and the age of majority came under severe criticism by the conservative 'ulamā'. In the compromised version of the law, polygamy remained permissible, but an unjust polygamist's wife could go to a Sharī'a court and seek his punishment. Punishment was also prescribed for husbands who tried to prevent their wives from petitioning against them. Forced marriage between two adults was prohibited. The marriage of minors agreed upon by their fathers or guardians was allowed, but strongly recommended against. In the case of a minor bride, the 'aqd could be contracted, but the marriage could be consummated only upon her reaching puberty, which contrary to the age of 13 that the King had demanded, followed the Ḥanafī norm of age 9. In January 1929 King Amān Allāh was overthrown and achievements dating from the 1880s were reversed.

In 1960 a matrimonial code was adopted, permitting child marriage in principle, meaning that the nikāḥ (consummation of marriage) could occur only when the girl reached puberty. Article 2 set the legal age of nikāḥ at 15.

The constitution of 1964, introduced by King Zāhir (r. 1933–73), stated that “all the people of Afghanistan, without discrimination and privilege before the law, have equal rights and obligations.” This provided the legal basis for subsequent petitions and court rulings that were more favorable to women.

The constitution of 1977 explicitly pronounced women legally equal to men. Written and promulgated during President Dāwūd's republican regime, it stipulated that, “all the people of Afghanistan, both women and men, without discrimination and privilege before the law, have equal rights and obligations.” This constitution did not name the Ḥanafī school as the official madhhab of Afghanistan. Consequently, in the Civil Law of the same year, the Mālikī interpretation of a divorce mechanism using the concepts of l'ān and faskh was introduced. This allows women to seek divorce by a judicial process and decree. The legal age of majority for females was set at 16 and the law gave adult females the right to enter marriage without their guardian's permission. Among the first legislative acts of the Marxist regime that toppled President Dāwūd in 1978 was the declaration as strictly illegal of marriage of girls under the age of 16; violators became liable to imprisonment of six months to three years. The punitive measures in this decree distinguished it from the earlier law on this matter.

With the outbreak of war against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in the 1980s, state institutions, including the judiciary, gradually disintegrated. With it, the practice of family law reverted to the rulings of individual qādīs based on their own interpretation of the Sharī'a.

With the coming to power of the Taliban in 1996, a revived attempt was made to implement the law uniformly throughout Afghanistan. The Taliban's understanding of the Sharī'a was far from the liberal interpretations that had gradually entered the field of family law in Afghanistan before 1978. The Taliban did, however, issue two decrees favorable to women. In September 1998 the Taliban banned the tribal practice of giving a woman in marriage in the settlement of blood feuds, and prohibited the compulsory marriage of a widow to her deceased husband's next of kin.

Throughout all legal reforms, laws on inheritance have remained unchanged and are based on the Sharī'a. In practice, however, women are often denied their Islamic share of inheritance.

After the fall of the Taliban in December 2001, a presidential decree declared the 1977 family law as valid and applicable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- A. Y. Ali, The meaning of the glorious Qur'an. Text, translation and commentary, Beirut n.d.
Asās al-quḍāt, Kabul 1303/1886.
 al-Bukhārī, Mukhtaṣar Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, Riyadh 1996.
Fatwa-i shar'i suṭr wa-ḥijāb, Kabul, 27 August 1993.
 Sultan Mohammad, The constitution and law of Afghanistan, London 1900.
 F. M. Kātib, Sirāj al-tavārikh, 3 vols., Kabul 1331–3/1913–15.
Matn-i kāmil-i qawanin-i asāsi-yi Afghānistān (Complete text of Afghan constitutions), Qum, Iran 1995.
Nizāmnāmah-i 'arūsi. Nikāḥ wa khatna suri, Kabul, 23 August 1925.
Proceedings of the Loya Jirga of 1303 HS, Kabul 1926.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- A. R. I. Doi, Woman in Shari'ah (Islamic law), London 1989².
 J. L. Esposito, Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 1982.
 R. Farhādā (ed.), Maqalāt-i Maḥmūd Tarzī dār sirāj al-akhbār-i Afghāniyya, Kabul 1977.
 H. K. Kakar, Government and society in Afghanistan. The reign of Amir 'Abd al-Rahman Khan, Austin, Tex. 1979.
 M. H. Kamali, Law in Afghanistan, Leiden 1985.
 H. Malikyar, Development of family law in Afghanistan. The roles of the Hanafi Madhhab, customary practices and power politics, in Central Asian Survey 16:3 (1997), 389–99.
 L. B. Poullada, Reform and rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929, Ithaca, N.Y. 1973.

HELENA MALIKYAR

Arab States

THE PREMODERN ERA

In order to appreciate the nature of family law reform in the modern era, a cursory reference to rules on the family in the premodern era under Islamic jurisprudence has to be made. The “family,” as a unit revolving around the acts of marriage and reproduction, was unknown to premodern Muslim jurists. Rather, they saw marriage as one of several equally important legal relationships that formed in their totality the web of the premodern Islamic medieval household. In this legal household, the man was the financial provider, the head, and the guardian of the household, while the wife (or wives) was the provider of sexual pleasure (obedience) in return for her right to maintenance. Other members of the household (concubines, slaves, children, relatives) also owed the male provider different kinds and degrees of obedience in return for their right to maintenance. The provider had the power to discipline those toward whom he had the duty of maintenance. An important background rule that has survived until modern times is, however, that free women owned property independently from their husbands and had complete freedom to dispense with and administer this property. They had no duty of maintenance to anybody.

The schools of law in the Sunnī world (Mālikī, Shāfi'ī, Ḥanafī, Ḥanbalī) dominated the legal system in the premodern era, in which each school had its own set of jurists who wrote treatises of jurisprudence on various subjects ranging from contract, tort, and crime to marriage, concubinage, and divorce. Each school had a class of muftis who provided legal opinions to the school's constituents. Qādīs (judges) were affiliated with these schools and interpreted the treatises of their school's main jurists in adjudicating cases. The schools were relatively autonomous and free from the intervention of the ruler in the administration of law.

TRANSFORMATION OF THE LEGAL SYSTEM IN THE EARLY MODERN ERA

European penetration of the Ottoman Empire (nineteenth century) succeeded by European colonialism (nineteenth and twentieth centuries) triggered a process of substituting the doctrines of the schools with European legal transplants. This process proved unstoppable, especially as it was adopted by local Muslim elites, who saw it as part of an overall modernizing/Europeanizing effort that they themselves embraced and shepherded. The transformation was mediated through the capitulatory regime that brought into existence mixed courts applying European codes in the area of civil and commercial law and extending their jurisdictions not only to foreigners and non-Muslims but also to Ottoman Muslims. Secular national courts eventually replaced the mixed courts while mimicking their structural and textual foundation. By the turn of the twentieth century, Islamic law was left with only the family to regulate.

In the post-Ottoman era (whether under European colonialism or later in the postcolonial period), the nation-state emerged as the central and dominant political unit. The historic autonomy of law that characterized the premodern era was lost, as all law, even God's law, had to be legislated by the state to become official. Courts became part of a centralized legal system dominated by the powers of the state. Courts administering Islamic law came to be distinguished from those that did not, the former known as Sharī'a courts and the latter as "regular" courts administering transplanted European law. Eventually, most judges were graduates of law schools which taught Islamic jurisprudence as part of an otherwise secular curriculum concentrating on transplanted law; they could adjudicate cases on the family as well as other areas of secular law. Some judges were trained in Sharī'a faculties (which came to be incorporated within the structure of secular universities) with degrees in Islamic jurisprudence and theology and were only qualified to sit in family courts.

FAMILY LAW REFORMS IN THE ARAB WORLD: THE FIRST STAGE

Early reforms of family law, beginning in the first half of the twentieth century and continued in the early part of the second, aimed generally at transforming the legal domestic unit from the "medieval household" of Islamic jurisprudence into the modern "family" of the family code, without radically departing from the premodern schools' conceptual legal structure of gendered reciprocity (husbands maintain and wives obey). The idea behind these early reforms was to chip away at the most cruel aspects of gendered reciprocity by first, limiting the scope of the wife's obedience; second, expanding the scope of the husband's financial duties; and third, limiting the range of powers in the family these financial duties allowed him. Thus, wives' financial rights whether during the marriage or after divorce were increased; new grounds allowing wives to exit from marriage were established; and the husband's right to no fault divorce and to practice polygamy was constrained and limited. Examples include the laws on the family passed in Egypt (1920, 1929), Jordan (1917, 1951, 1976), Syria (1953), Lebanon (1917), Iraq (1959), and Palestine (1919, 1951, 1976). In addition, the state's power to mediate conflicts between husbands and wives was consolidated through the introduction of legal requirements of registration and documentation of marriage and divorce. Early reforms also targeted the law of procedure in Sharī'a courts to make it less dependent on oral testimony (the rule in the premodern era) and to create an official system of appellate review for the first time in Islamic adjudication (Anderson 1976, Coulson 1964, 163–4, Schacht 1982, 101).

Tunisia is notable in its attempt to realize radical reform through abandonment of the principle of gendered reciprocity. Instead of maintenance for obedience, the Tunisian Majalla (Family Code 1957) advocates reciprocal good treatment by both spouses and shared duty of maintenance (if the wife has money). In exchange for the duty of maintenance, the wife no longer has to obey her husband, and has equal access to divorce, guardianship powers over her children, and the power to consent to a minor child's marriage. For the first time in Islamic history, however, a husband can take his wife to court demanding that she maintains the family if she has money. Husband no longer, per reforms in Tunisia, spares wife's purse. The premodern principle of exempting wife from any duty of maintenance was abandoned.

METHODS OF REFORM

To create these doctrinal changes while still basing them on Islamic law, early reformers resorted to acts of ijtihad (devising a new rule based on a fresh reading of the Qur'an and the Prophetic traditions); ikhtiyār (choosing among the various opinions of the premodern schools of jurisprudence, even those considered minority schools); talfiq (creating a doctrine afresh through combining two rules derived from two different schools); adoption of Shī'i jurisprudence or opinions of schools long considered "dead"; and finally, the implementation of rules on procedure that make a particular substantive rule ineffective (through legislating statutory limitations or registration requirements) (Hallaq 1997, 210–14). Approaching the doctrines of the schools, alive and dead, Sunnī and Shī'i, including majority and minority opinions within each, without specific loyalty to the doctrine of any particular school, has created for the first time in Islamic history a kind of supra-madhhab legal consciousness that remains prevalent until today among the modern Muslim jurists/reformers/legal commentators (Esposito 2001, 119–26). It should be noted, however, that the doctrines of particular schools remain dominant in certain regions as the historic origin from which departure to alternative doctrines took place (for instance, Mālikī doctrine in North Africa and Ḥanafī in Egypt and the Levant; An-Naʿim 2002, 5–6).

TRANSFORMATION OF THE LEGAL TREATISE ON THE FAMILY

Modern treatises commenting on the modern family code or statute clearly convey the supra-madhhab consciousness of their authors. Typically in these treatises, the views of various premodern schools on a particular doctrinal matter are discussed and the rule adopted by the legislature through ijtihād, ikhtiyār, or talfīq is identified and commented upon. In general, modern treatises share with the reformers the project of transforming the “household” into a “family.” Instead of a male provider overseeing a household inhabited by wives, concubines, slaves, children, and relatives, the modern family constructed by these treatises via commentary on the family code is a predominantly monogamous one in which marriage is a matter of offer and acceptance between a man and a woman with the goal of reproduction. Marriage for reproduction in the modern Islamic treatise is a novel construct diverging widely from marriage as a contract between a man and a woman according to which a woman provides sexual pleasure, as was the case in the premodern juristic treatise (Sonbol 2003, 157). However, given that reforms have taken place within the principle of gendered reciprocity without eliminating it altogether, the modern codes and treatises are notable for incorporating rules associated with the premodern household as well as those associated with the monogamous reproductive family unit. The rule on wifely obedience through provision of sexual pleasure to husband (medieval household), as well as the norm of reproduction as the purpose of the marriage contract (modern family) are both present, in tension with each other and each pulling in a different conceptual direction (Badran 1976). A modern innovation of these treatises is the presentation of obedience for maintenance as an element of a long list of reciprocal rights and duties exchanged by the spouses.

FAMILY COURTS IN THE MODERN ERA

Judges in the contemporary family courts in the various Arab countries, have, in general, used their discretion in interpreting the law to further whittle away at the most detrimental aspects of gendered reciprocity. This is of course not always the case, and depends on how liberal or conservative the judges interpreting the legislation might be. Liberal rulings tend in the direction of increasing the husband’s maintenance obligations and of contracting women’s obedience obligations; conservative rulings tend in the other direction. Family courts in various states are notorious for delay in settling cases, causing a great deal of hardship for litigants, especially women, rendering their marital status and financial rights uncertain for lengthy periods of time (Hill 1979, 72–101, Sonbol 2003, 180–3).

DEBATE OF FAMILY LAW REFORM: THE SECOND STAGE

The second stage of family law reform, starting in the early 1980s, brought new actors to the scene and triggered a fresh debate. Unlike the first stage, where reforms took place through an alliance between the secular nationalist elites controlling the state, reforming feminists influenced by Western enlightenment, and modernizing ʿulamāʾ (Muslim jurists) seeking to revive Islamic law to challenge the transplantation of European law into the Arab world (Abu-Odeh 2004), the political forces that came to the fore in the second stage look significantly different. The participants in this second stage of debate comprise first, a new generation of Islamicists, including women Islamicists who are offended by the reforms of the first stage and who seek to revive a gendered reciprocity that is unshackled by these reforms. It is noteworthy that women Islamicists might differ from male Islamicists over how to interpret gendered reciprocity with the former seeking to use it to curb male power and the latter seeking to reconsolidate this power. The second party to the new debate is the religious bureaucracy which has played the role after the first stage of reforms of administering Sharīʿa courts and adjudicating family law cases, and which wants to preserve the reforms (reformed gendered reciprocity) while being willing to either minimally advance those reforms or alternatively curb them, depending on its perception of how it is faring in the eyes of the public (in its competition for legitimacy with the new Islamicists). Third, there is a reinvigorated feminism aligned with the international human rights movement which wants to abolish gendered reciprocity altogether in favor of formal equality (both husband and wife share duty of maintenance and treat each other well, no wifely obedience). Fourth, there is a liberal feminism which shares the basic convictions of the human rights feminism but shuns secular discourse and insists on packaging its liberal feminism in the language of a reformed interpretation of Islam. The last participants in the debate are the secular nationalists controlling the state. For them, the stakes are high, as the Islamicists gain popular following among the public, undermining the historic ability of political elites to ally themselves with the feminists to advance micro reforms. Like the Shari'a clerics, they engage in push-and-pull support for further reforms depending on the public's reaction, their paramount concern being not the reform but the stability of their control over the state (Moors 2003, Welchman 2003).

The Islamicists in Egypt tried to make their imprint on the debate by arguing before the Supreme Constitutional Court of Egypt (SCC) that certain reforms as they unfolded in Egypt (Law 25 of 1920, Law 25 of 1929, and Law 100 of 1985) violated article 2 of the Egyptian constitution, which establishes that the Shari'a is the primary source of legislation. Restricting polygamy, allowing women judicial divorce, and imposing financial duties of maintenance on men retroactively were all rules, the Islamicists argued, that went against the grain of article 2 because they were un-Islamic, or contrary to the Shari'a. The SCC developed a judicial test to inspect the Islamicity of the rules which was flexible enough to allow the reforms to survive. The typical approach of the court was to split the difference between the demands of the Islamicists and those of the feminists: polygamy is neither an absolute right of the husband (Islamicists) nor is it to be abolished (feminists) but should survive in a restricted form whereby women can ask for divorce if they prove harm when the husband takes a second wife (Lombardi 1998, El-Morr 1997, Najjar 1988).

The new feminists seem to be demanding a concession from women in the name of formal equality. Women should be willing to waive the rule that protects their wealth from the husband's demands (share in the duty of maintenance of the family) in return for abolishing the rule of wifely obedience. Many feminists treat this as a worthy trade-off and they also argue that it reflects social reality since women do indeed participate in maintaining the family as a matter of fact (CGESWE 1992). This, however, is a contentious strategy of reform given the fact that while rich women tend to go to court to request divorce, poor women for the most part go to court to request maintenance from their husbands (Würth 2003). The trade-off might prove costly to poor women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

L. Abu-Odeh, Egyptian feminism. Trapped in the identity debate, in Y. Y. Haddad and B. F. Stowasser (eds.),

- Islamic law and the challenges of modernity*, Walnut Creek, Calif. 2004, 183–212.
- , Modernizing Muslim family law. The case of Egypt, in Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law and Oxford Comparative Law Forum (forthcoming).
- N. Anderson, Law reform in the Muslim world, London 1976.
- A. An-Na'im (ed.), Islamic family law in a changing world. A global resource book, London 2002.
- B. A. al-'A. Badrān, Al-fiqh al-muqāran li-al-ahwāl al-shakhsiyya, i, Beirut 1976.
- J. Y. Brinton, The Mixed Courts of Egypt, New Haven, Conn. 1968.
- M. M. Charrad, Repudiation versus divorce. Responses to state policy in Tunisia, in E. N. Chow and C. W. Berheide (eds.), Women, the family, and policy, Albany, N.Y. 1994, 51–69.
- , States and women's rights, Berkeley 2001.
- CGESWE (Communication Group for the Enhancement of the Status of Women in Egypt) (ed.), Legal rights of Egyptian women in theory and practice, Cairo 1992.
- N. J. Coulson, A history of Islamic law, Edinburgh 1964, repr. 2003.
- D. Crecelius, The course of secularization in modern Egypt, in J. L. Esposito (ed.), Islam and development. Religion and sociopolitical change, Syracuse, N.Y. 1980, 49–70.
- A. Z. al-Dābsi, Kitāb al-nikāh min al-asrār, Cairo 1993.
- A. al-Dardīr, Al-sharḥ al-saghir. Ta'līf Aḥmad al-Dardīr, 'alā mukhtaṣarihi al-musammā aqrab al-masālik ilā madthhab al-Imām Mālik, ii, ed. M. al-Ḥamīd, Cairo 1965.
- D. S. El Alami and D. Hinchcliffe, Islamic marriage and divorce laws of the Arab world, London 1996.
- A. M. El-Morr, Judicial sources for supporting the protection of human rights, in E. Cotran and A. O. Sherif (eds.), The role of the judiciary in the protection of human rights, Boston 1997, 5–33.
- J. L. Esposito, Islam and politics, Syracuse, N.Y. 1984, 1998⁴.
- , Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 1982, 2001².
- W. B. Hallaq, A history of Islamic legal theories, Cambridge 1997, repr. 2002.
- E. Hill, Mahkama! Studies in the Egyptian legal system, London 1979.
- A. Hourani, A history of the Arab peoples, Cambridge 1991, repr. New York 1992.
- Ibn Qudāma, Kitāb al-nikāh, ed. M. Khattab and M. al-Sayyid, Cairo 1996.
- S. A. Jackson, Islamic law and the state, Leiden 1996.
- 'A. R. al-Jazīrī, Kitāb al-fiqh 'alā al-madthāhib al-arba'a, iv, Cairo 1990.
- H. J. Liebesny, The law of the Near and Middle East, Albany, N.Y. 1975.
- C. B. Lombardi, Islamic law as a source of constitutional law in Egypt. The constitutionalization of the Sharia in a modern Arab state, in Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 37 (1998), 81–123.
- T. Mahmood, Statutes of personal law in Islamic countries, New Delhi 1987, 1995².
- G. Makdisi, Rise of colleges, Edinburgh 1981.
- M. K. Masud et al., Islamic legal interpretation. Muftis and their fatwas, London 1996.
- A. Moors, Introduction. Public debates on family law reform. Participants, positions, and styles of argumentation in the 1990s, in Islamic Law and Society 10 (2003), 1–11.
- F. M. Najjar, Egypt's laws of personal status, in Arab Studies Quarterly 10 (1988), 319–44.

- J. J. Nasir, The Islamic law of personal status, The Hague 2002.
- J. Schacht, An introduction to Islamic law, New York 1982.
- A. I. al-Shirazi, Al-muhadhdhab fī fiqh al-Imām al-Shāfiʿī, M. Zuhaili (ed.), Damascus 1992.
- A. E. Sonbol, Women of Jordan. Islam, labor and the law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2003.
- M. A. Wani, The Islamic law on maintenance of women, children, parents and other relatives, Noonamy, Kashmir 1995.
- L. Welchman, Beyond the code. Muslim family law and the Shariʿa judiciary in the Palestinian West Bank, The Hague 2000.
- , In the interim. Civil society, the Shariʿa judiciary and Palestinian personal status law in the transitional period, in Islamic Law and Society 10 (2003), 34–69.
- A. Würth, Stalled reform. Family law in post-unification Yemen, in Islamic Law and Society 10 (2003), 12–33.
- F. J. Ziadeh, Lawyers, the rule of law and liberalism in modern Egypt, Stanford 1968.

LAMA ABU-ODEH

Egypt

Prior to the late nineteenth century family law and family courts, as such, did not exist in Egypt or anywhere else in the Ottoman Empire. Matters pertaining to marriage, divorce, inheritance, and custody, along with criminal and civil matters, were adjudicated through the Shariʿa courts on the basis of Islamic law or, in the case of Christians and Jews, the milliyya (confessional) courts. Administrative cases fell under qānūn, or Ottoman executive law. ʿUrf (customary law) played a critical role in legal practices, influencing local preferences for particular schools of legal interpretation and strategic choices by plaintiffs about how and where particular sorts of cases were raised. In Egypt, the Shāfiʿī school was favored in the Delta, reflecting the prevalence of the extended family with the father as head of household. In Upper Egypt, the preference was for the Mālikī school, which reflected the prevalence of tribal kinship models, stressing the authority of male members of the wider clan, from father to clan head. Decisions by jurists were interpretive, based on the practice of referencing and interpreting texts, rather than on codes promulgated by the governing authority.

The notion of family relationships as based upon complementary, rather than equal, rights between men and women was foundational to such legal interpretations. The law upheld the authority of men as fathers and husbands with proprietary rights over women and younger family members, based on their status as financial providers to the household. In return for the right to maintenance, a woman owed obedience (tāʿa) to her husband and father. In practice, however, the fluid nature of adjudication often worked in the interests of women, who used the court system regularly as a way to assert their legal rights. The legal system, therefore, often honored a woman's right to choose a husband, to enter marriage as a propertied person, to demand adequate support for herself and to negotiate a divorce on her own initiative. Such courts, which were authorized to adjudicate the cases of all parties who came before them, were patronized not only by Muslims but also by Christians seeking to gain divorces or register marriages that would then follow the principles of Shariʿa law.

Egyptian legal reforms of the late nineteenth century drastically altered the terrain of law and adjudication. In 1883, one year after the British had occupied Egypt, a Civil Code based on Napoleonic law was compiled by the colonial administration for the new national (ahliyya) courts. These assumed jurisdiction over criminal and commercial matters. Matters related to marriage, divorce, custody, guardianship, and inheritance remained the judicial province of the Shariʿa and milliyya courts. Confining Shariʿa to domestic matters politicized the family as both a sphere of intimate, affective relations and as a repository of group identity of which religious affiliation was a defining legal and moral characteristic. The politicization of what have come to be known as personal status laws (ahwāl shakhṣiyya) emerged from the intersection of European colonial discourses on domesticity and the primacy of the nuclear family as a hallmark of modernity and anti-colonial nationalist discourses. Egyptian secular nationalist as well as Islamic reformers targeted the family as a site for reforms which aimed both to make Egypt more modern and to preserve a distinctive national culture.

The Muslim personal status laws of 1920, 1923, and 1929 codified and rationalized the rules governing family law. A committee made up of religious leaders incorporated rules from the various madhāhib to create a single, unified body of law and procedure, which was then reviewed by the minister of justice and approved by the prime minister. Such reforms institutionalized the authority of religious officials, underpinned by the sanction of secular state institutions, to legally regulate the shape and content of the family.

Legal reforms raised the minimum age of marriage, made state registration of marriage a requirement and rationalized male divorce pronouncements (talāq). Amendments laid out provisions for judicial divorce by the wife on the basis of ḍarar or harm, making marital discord (shiqāq) grounds for divorce. In spite of the very different status of marriage within Coptic law, which recognized marriage as a holy sacrament sanctified by God rather than as a contract between two people, contemporaneous changes in Coptic family law mirrored the general trends toward reform in the Muslim personal status laws. Such reforms were, in part, the result of an intensive campaign by the Egyptian Feminist Union, which had placed modification of the personal status laws at the top of its reform agenda. After an unsuccessful attempt in 1923 to gain voting rights for women, the union turned its attention to improving the status of women within the family. While the campaign was a partial success, the union was unsuccessful in securing the abolition of polygamy and its demand that all divorces be subject to judicial approval.

The codification of family law established the gendered roles of mother and wife and husband and father as a legal basis of personhood (ashkhāṣ) and citizenship upon which rights and duties were placed. These rights and duties mirrored not only the position of women in the family but also their status within the nation. Husbands and fathers enjoyed absolute rights to guardianship, divorce, and custody, while wives and mothers had to petition the court to achieve their rights, constituting them as legal dependents of the state. Legally speaking, men, as enfranchised political individuals, could make claims to rights as equal, autonomous individuals. Women, however, had to make claims for rights on the basis that they were mothers of the future generation of Egyptian citizens. This model of maternal citizenship enabled feminists to be partially successful in their calls for changes to family law as well as to successfully claim the right to be educated, but circumscribed the other sorts of demands for rights and inclusion.

While such rights and duties recognized generally prevailing social norms, which viewed men and women as having complementary (and unequal) roles within Egyptian society, the recognition of women as legal individuals with rights that had to be protected was new. Thus, the personal status code laid out the conditions through which women could obtain a divorce, receive support from their husbands, retain custody of their children, and contest marriages concluded by their male guardians without their consent. It was precisely this recognition of rights, however, which constituted women as dependent legal subjects and emphasized male familial authority. As wives and mothers, women were entitled to economic support in exchange for obedience and freedom from darar, while unilateral divorce was rigidly enshrined as a male prerogative. At the same time, the legal delineation of the conditions under which both husbands and wives could obtain a divorce privileged new notions of companionate marriage based on the authority of the male breadwinner at the expense of wider male kin and may actually have made divorce more difficult to obtain for both parties. Such a vision of marriage was reflective of relatively new notions of domesticity that favored the bourgeois nuclear family as the linchpin of the Egyptian nation and the foundation of its moral, social, and political order.

These laws remained virtually unchanged until the 1970s despite changes in the structure of the Egyptian court system. In 1955, the Shari'a and other confessional courts were abolished by the Nasser regime as a means to bring religious communities more firmly under the control of the state. A new family court was established within the existing national court system. While this may have undermined the control that religious community leaders had exercised over women through the autonomous confessional courts, the preservation of the existing personal status laws meant that the gender inequalities remained.

It is these inequalities that made reform of the personal status laws a particular target of the Egyptian women's organizations, starting in the 1920s. Reform campaigns have achieved some feminist demands (such as raising the age of marriage and raising the age of ḥadāna, the period in which the mother has rights to custody over her children) but have failed to achieve other chief feminist demands such as abolition of polygamy or restricting male right to divorce by making it subject to a judge's approval. In part, difficulties have stemmed from the monopolization by religious authorities of family law and attempts to preserve the family as a site of cultural authenticity against perceptions of Western encroachment. But difficulties have also derived from the state's attempts to claim sovereignty over women's issues beginning in the 1950s with the Nasser regime's program of state feminism. In 1979, President Anwar Sadat passed a number of reforms to Egypt's family law by executive decree after they failed to be ratified in the Egyptian parliament. Named for Sadat's wife, "Jihan's Law," as it came to be popularly known, gave wives the right to keep the marital home in the event of a divorce and the right to be informed and granted a divorce if their husbands took another wife. The law was widely criticized, not only by Islamists who argued that the changes were contrary to Shari'a but by other leftist and secular opposition groups who objected to the authoritarian way the reforms had been enacted. Jihan's Law was struck down on procedural grounds in 1985.

More recent reform campaigns have been more successful. In 2000, the Egyptian parliament passed the Law on the Reorganization of Certain Terms and Procedures of Litigation in Personal Status Matters. Its provision gave women the right to initiate a "no fault" divorce (khul') in exchange for giving up her financial claims upon her husband, including the deferred part of her mahr (bride money). The legislation was the culmination of a 15-year campaign by a broad coalition of women activists, lawyers, and scholars who used novel organizational strategies to achieve their ends. Unlike in prior attempts at reform, which tended to conceptualize the issue of family law as one of equal rights for women, the protagonists of the most recent campaign focused on increasing women's rights by reinterpreting Islamic tradition. Not only did this allow activists to counter charges that changes to the law were un-Islamic but it also allowed coalition building across the political spectrum. Future attempts to reform law in Egypt are likely to draw on this successful mode of organizing rather than appealing to a discourse of equal rights.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Odeh, Modernizing Muslim family law. The case of Egypt, Toronto 2001.
- L. Al-Atraqchi, The women's movement and the mobilization for legal change in Egypt. A century of personal status law reform, Ph.D. diss., Concordia University 2003.
- M. Afifi, Reflections on the personal status laws of Copts, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 202–18.
- J. N. D. Anderson, Recent developments in Shar'ia law. III. The contract of marriage, in Muslim World 41 (1951), 112–26.
- , Recent developments in Shar'ia law. IV. Further points concerning marriage, in Muslim World 41 (1951), 187–98.
- , Recent developments in Shar'ia law. V. The dissolution of marriage, in Muslim World 41 (1951), 271–88.
- M. Hatem, The enduring alliance of nationalism and patriarchy in Muslim personal status laws. The case of modern Egypt, in Feminist Issues 6:1 (1986), 19–43.
- N. Safran, The abolition of the Sharia courts in Egypt, in Muslim World 48 (1958), part 1, 20–8.
- R. Shaham, The family and the courts in modern Egypt, Leiden 1997.
- A. E. Sonbol, Adults and minors in Ottoman Shar'ia courts and modern law, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 236–56.
- , Law and gender violence in Ottoman and modern Egypt, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 214–31.

Gulf, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen

During the last two hundred years, little change has taken place in family legislation in the Arabian Peninsula and the Gulf. These countries still rely on uncodified personal status law with only Kuwait and Yemen as exceptions. While Kuwait was the first country in the Gulf to issue legislation on marital relations – law no. 5 of 1961 on marriages between Kuwaitis and non-Kuwaitis – it introduced a comprehensive family code only in 1984. In Yemen, the first code was promulgated in 1974 in what was at that time the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen.

In marked contrast to other countries in the region, in conservative Gulf states the voice of pressure groups has not been strong enough to force ruling elites to allow reform in family legislation. Introducing women's rights in law has proved difficult. Still, democracy alone is not expected to lead to reforms in Islamic law: women's rights' advocates fear that elections simply bring to power Islamists who do not favor codification.

Prior to the present era, three distinct courses of legal practice were followed: an uncodified version of the Islamic Shar'ia, often combined with local custom ('urf) (Saudi Arabia, Kingdom of Yemen, Oman, Aden Protectorates, Gulf Protectorates); Ottoman rule during the latter part of the nineteenth century (Kuwait as part of Basra Province); and British administrative and legal influence (Aden Colony, Kuwait administered from British India). In Aden, with direct British rule, the Anglo-Muhammadan legal practice as developed in India was introduced with British judges applying Shar'ia for Muslims in matters of personal status.

All the classical schools of Islamic jurisprudence are present in this area. The Hanbali school prevails in Saudi Arabia and Qatar and five of the seven emirates that form the United Arab Emirates (Sharjah, Ajman, Fujayrah, Ras al-Khaymah and Umm al-Qaywayn). Abu Dhabi and Dubai follow the Mālikī school. In Bahrain the population is divided between Mālikīs and Ja'farīs with separate courts. Kuwait enacted a family code (Law no. 51 of 1984 concerning Personal Status) 23 years after independence based on Mālikī interpretation. Oman, whose sovereignty Britain acknowledged in 1951, applies Ibādī doctrine even though the population includes Shāfi'īs (Dhofar), Ḥanafīs (al-Batinah), Ḥanbalīs (Ja'lan), Mālikīs, and Ja'farīs.

The majority of Yemenis follow the Shāfi'ī school; the substantial Zaydī population in the north follows the Hadāwī school. Small Shī'ī communities of Ja'farīs, Ismā'īlīs, and Bohras exist in the north and south without the right to follow their own legal school. The present Family Code (Law no. 20 of 1992 concerning Personal Status as amended in 1998 and 1999) draws from all schools of Islamic jurisprudence. When the country was divided, each state applied very different legislation. The Family Law of the Yemen Arab Republic (Law no. 3 of 1978) provided a conservative reading of Islamic law schools and custom (urf). The Family Code of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) (Law no. 1 of 1974 in Connection with the Family), a radical interpretation of the Shari'a, was considered one of the most progressive codes in the Islamic world.

The present code provides some improvement for women in the north; for example, in signing the marriage contract the woman's guardian has to be present, while earlier no representative of the bride was needed; the conditions under which polygamy was allowed are tightened, as are provisions regarding the husband's obligation not to cause any material or psychological harm (darar) to his wife. In addition, in the event of divorce, the age of children remaining in the custody of the mother was raised. For southern women, all these provisions were clear deteriorations. In the PDRY family code, polygamy was allowed only under special conditions, subject to court decision, and all divorces required litigation.

According to classical jurisprudence, marriage (nikāh) is a contract between two parties based on an offer and acceptance in the presence of two male witnesses. A woman is represented by her guardian (walī) in signing the contract. However, in Ḥanafī and Ja'farī law any sane adult can contract marriage on his or her own. The Sunnī schools of fiqh agree that a person who is in sound mind is capable of marrying at the onset of puberty. Sunnīs do not specify the age but for Ja'farīs this means nine for girls and twelve for boys. The Ja'farīs also acknowledge an unlimited number of temporary marriages (mut'a) where the spouses sustain neither mutual obligations nor inherit from each other. Children born in such a union have the same rights as in nikāh. All classical schools approve polygyny up to four nikāh unions.

Marriage according to all law schools entails mutual obligations on spouses. The husband is obliged to pay a bridal gift (mahr) and provide maintenance and appropriate accommodation. In exchange, the wife is obliged to obey him. What this obedience means in practice is contested among classical jurists. For some it means, besides residing in his house and allowing sexual relations, taking care of the household chores. The majority of Shī'ī and Sunnī jurists agree that a woman who works outside the home without her husband's permission loses her maintenance.

All classical schools grant the husband unilateral right to repudiation (talāq). The Ḥanafī school accepts talāq pronounced under duress or when drunk. Consequent to talāq the wife is obliged to start her 'idda, a waiting period of three menstrual cycles, or delivery if pregnant, before remarriage. During the 'idda the husband is obliged to maintain her. Ja'farī law requires two male witnesses and a prescribed formula in Arabic for talāq. Classical schools distinguish talāq al-sunna (repudiation in accordance with Prophetic sunna) and talāq al-bid'a (innovation, irregular talāq). In the Kuwaiti code talāq should follow oral expressions according to custom or in a case where a person is unable to speak, either in writing or by means of gestures (Article 104). Yemeni law allows both sunna and bid'a talāq (Article 62). In a 1998 amendment, women lost the right to compensation in unjustified talāq.

Classical schools agree on dissolving marriage by mutual consent (mubāra'a) and on the instigation of the wife (khul'). Both require the wife to pay compensation to the husband, often the mahr, in exchange for divorce. The classical schools see it as reprehensible to ask for more than the mahr, but Yemeni law stipulates that the compensation can be either money or service even if it is more than obliged in the contract (Article 72), while in Kuwaiti law the compensation depends on the marriage contract (Article 114). Under Ḥanbalī law, a woman can stipulate in her marriage contract that she has her 'isma (bond) in her hand, that is, the freedom to dissolve the marriage. It is reported, however, that Saudi men are reluctant to grant such a clause.

A marriage can also be terminated by annulment (faskh) or judicial separation (tafriq). Yemeni law recognizes only faskh and grants women a divorce on grounds of the husband's inability to provide maintenance, alcoholism, or prolonged absence (articles 51–3, 55). The classical schools acknowledge also the concept of harm (darar) but definitions of injury, physical or mental, vary among jurists. Ḥanafī law is the strictest and allows judicial divorce only on the ground of the husband's impotence. While the Mālikī school is most favorable to woman, Ja'farī law is only mildly better than the Ḥanafī and adds insanity, leprosy, and venereal disease to the grounds for divorce. The Kuwaiti law acknowledges darar as harm that either spouse has caused the other that makes it impossible for them to live together (Article 126).

According to the Ja'farīs, in the event of divorce, the mother loses her children once boys reach age seven and girls age nine. The Ḥanbalīs set the age at seven for both. For Ḥanafīs the mother's custody ends when a boy is able to feed, clothe, and cleanse himself and when a girl attains puberty. Shāfi'īs require that both sexes reach the age of discretion and are able to make decisions. Mālikīs are the most lenient for mothers and allow a boy stay with his mother until puberty and a girl until she marries. The Yemeni law sets ages nine and twelve unless the judge decides differently (Article 139). However, in cases of charges of immorality, the mother loses her children once they are five (Article 144).

According to the classical schools, the widow is entitled to inherit from her deceased husband after paying funeral expenses, maintenance costs during her 'idda, and debts. All schools agree on the inheritance share allotted to the widow (one fourth), but Sunnīs and Shī'īs differ on the meaning of a child which reduces that share to one eighth. For Sunnīs, a child must be related to the deceased without a female link while Ja'farīs maintain that every child is a descendant. The Yemeni law applies the Sunnī interpretation (Article 307).

Even though it is generally asserted that in the absence of codified law women gaining justice in court depends on the judge, in countries with a code, such as Yemen, the role of the judge is also crucial. Out of the countries discussed here, the PDRY is the only state that has allowed women to act as judges (see Figure 1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. El Alami and D. Hinchcliffe, Islamic marriage and divorce laws of the Arab world, London 1996.
- S. H. Amin, Law and justice in contemporary Yemen. People's Democratic Republic and Yemen Arab Republic, Glasgow 1987.
- J. N. D. Anderson, Islamic law in Africa, London 1954.
- S. Dahlgren, Contesting realities. Morality, propriety and the public sphere in Aden, Yemen, Helsinki 2004.
- E. A. Doumato, The ambiguity of Shari'a and the politics of "rights" in Saudi Arabia, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995, 135–60.
- M. Fakhro, Gulf women and Islamic law, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, Berkshire, U.K. 1996, 251–62.
- E. Hill, Islamic law as a source for the development of a comparative jurisprudence. Theory and practice in the life and work of Sanhūrī, in A. al-Azmeh (ed.), Islamic law. Social and historical contexts, London 1989, 146–97.
- M. Molyneux, Women's rights and and political contingency. The case of Yemen 1990–1994, in Middle East Journal 49 (1995), 418–31.
- J. Nasir, The Islamic law of personal status, London 1990.
- J. Schacht, An introduction to Islamic law, Oxford 1964.

- L. Welchman, Islamic family law. Text and practice in Palestine, Jerusalem 1999.
- A. Würth, A Sana'a court. The family and the ability to negotiate, in Islamic Law and Society 2:3 (1995), 320–40.

SUSANNE DAHLGREN

Iran

In the domain of modern family law, the changes that have occurred in Iran do not suggest a progressive expansion of women's rights based on a move from tradition to modernity. Rather the changes have fluctuated, at times in opposing directions, depending on the policies and ideological orientations of the men in control of the government.

Although the roots of the modern legislative process in Iran can be traced to the aftermath of the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11, modern legislation in the area of family law did not materialize until 1967. Before this date, in keeping with the long-standing practices of the Ja'farī school of jurisprudence, the position of women within the sphere of family remained precarious. A new Civil Code in 1931 gave women the right to ask for divorce under certain conditions, and the marriage age was raised to 15 years for girls and 18 years for boys. But the Civil Code was secular and family laws remained within the domain of Islamic jurisprudence. For instance, a husband could divorce his wife at will by simply submitting a short letter of intent to be notarized for record. The wife was not required to be present and the husband unilaterally decided on the nature and extent of his financial obligations, if any, after divorce.

Major changes were introduced in the area of family law with the passage of the Family Protection Law of 1967 (significantly amended in 1975). This law did not redress the unequal status of women under Islamic inheritance laws, which continue to be in effect until today. However, it did abolish extra-judicial divorce, and required judicial permission for polygyny and only under limited circumstances after the first wife's consent was given. It also established Special Family Courts for the application of the new personal status legislation. Minimum age of marriage for girls was raised to 18 years old. The establishment of the family courts, in particular, was significant in so far as they created an arena in which judges, lawyers, and interested organizations could see and dwell on the family problems that existed in the society and propose important amendments to the law that came into effect in 1975.

The progressive direction of change in favor of women's rights within the family came to a halt with the 1979 Revolution that ended the Pahlavi dynasty (1925–79) and brought into power a new Islamic leadership. The Supreme Judicial Council issued proclamations directing courts that all un-Islamic legislation was to be suspended. The Special Family Courts established by the Family Protection Act were dissolved. The Special Civil Courts were established in 1979 to adjudicate over matters relating to family law. Once again, the absolute right to divorce for men was instituted, men could register their divorce unilaterally, and marital obedience and maintenance were governed by classical conditions, with obedience squarely resting on the wife's shoulders. Furthermore, specific measures taken to bring polygyny under control and give women more power over questions of child custody, allowing the Special Family Courts to mediate and check the husband's absolute right to the children, were all abolished. The minimum age of marriage was initially set with puberty at 9 years old. In 2002, this minimum age was raised to 13. The marriage of a virgin girl (even after puberty) became dependent on the permission of the father or paternal grandfather, with the proviso that a Special Civil Court may grant permission if the guardian refuses without valid reason. Temporary marriage continued to be permitted.

Despite the complete reversal of the previous gains immediately after the revolution, the status of women within the confines of family law has not remained static. Responding to pressures by women and attempting to resolve major problems that have surfaced with the reinstatement of patently non-egalitarian laws in an increasingly urban and educated society, the Islamic Republic of Iran has been pushed gradually to modify some of the laws that were put into effect immediately after the revolution. However, so far these modifications have occurred within frameworks that continue to insist on the essential inequality of men and women in the sphere of family law.

For instance, a 12-article law on marriage and divorce passed in 1986, while allowing the wife the right to obtain a divorce if the husband marries without her permission or does not treat co-wives equitably in the court's assessment, essentially maintains the husband's absolute right to divorce. A wife may take the matter to court if her husband refuses to pay maintenance and the court will fix a sum and issue a maintenance order. The law also stipulates that arrears of maintenance to the wife have precedence over all other liabilities against the husband. Furthermore, the wife's refusal to have conjugal relations where the husband has contracted venereal disease is no longer deemed as constituting disobedience.

Additional 1992 amendments provide that registration of divorce without a court certificate is illegal. Several other grounds are provided for judicial divorce, including the proven insanity of either spouse, the husband's inability to consummate marriage, the husband's failure to comply with a maintenance order, and where continuation of marriage constitutes proven difficulty or hardship for the wife. Another 1992 amendment law extends the wife's grounds for divorce to the husband's drug addiction constituting a danger to his family, the husband's desertion of the marital home for six months without legitimate cause, and the husband's conviction for a crime bringing dishonor to the family. Yet another reform, also introduced in 1992, extends the divorced wife's financial rights from maintenance during 'idda and her deferred agreed upon sum in case of divorce to the right to sue for payment for household services rendered to her husband during the marriage, although the measure has proved difficult to apply in practice, partly because of the difficulty in assessing wages for housework.

In the area of child custody, the mother's custody now ends at seven years and custody reverts to the father if the mother remarries. The mother may be granted custody in certain cases if the father is proven unfit to care for the child. The increased number of grounds for which women can sue for divorce, seek financial remuneration, and ask for limited custody of their children has in effect led to the return of the family courts, even if the laws remain unequal.

In general, the framework within which changes in family law in favor of women have been approved remains unequal and heavily slanted toward men. In 1997, a prenuptial document to be signed at the time of marriage was approved to bring about more equality. The object was to give women the rights they lacked within the context of Islamic laws. Through this document the future husband can forfeit his rights to polygyny and unconditional divorce. Women can initiate divorce, divide assets, and have joint custody of children and child support. However, all the articles have conditions attached to them. As pointed out by the critics, this is only a voluntary contract, men do not have to sign it and if they do not there are no legal consequences.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Afshar, Islam and feminisms. An Iranian case study, New York 1998.
- S. Haeri, Divorce in contemporary Iran. A male prerogative in self-will, in C. Mallat and J. Connors (eds.), Islamic family law, London 1990, 55–67.
- M. Kār, Raf^c-i tab'iz az zanān. Muqāyisab⁻ⁱ Kunvānsiyūn Raf^c-i tab'iz az zanān bā qavānīn-i dākhilī-i Irān, Tehran 1999.
- , Sākhtār-i huquqī-i nizām-i khāvādah dar Irān, Tehran 1999.
- , Pizhūbishī darbārah⁻ⁱ khushūnat 'alayh-i zanān dar Irān, Tehran 2000.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Women, marriage and the law in post-revolutionary Iran, in H. Afshar (ed.), Women in the Middle East, London 1993, 59–84.
- S. Pakzad, The legal status of women in the family in Iran, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 169–79.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.

MEHRANGIZ KAR

South Asia

INDIA (INCLUDING PRE-1947 PAKISTAN AND BANGLADESH)

The modern legislative bases for Muslim law in India (and pre-1947 Pakistan and Bangladesh) are the Shariat Act of 1937, which established the inheritance rights of Muslim women, and the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act of 1939 (Hidayatullah and Shankardass 1968, 3), which dealt with divorce. These acts modified the Hanafi laws, which applied to Muslims in the Indian subcontinent by incorporating the laws of other Muslim jurists to enable Muslim women to have the best available options in divorce and inheritance.

British colonial power in nineteenth-century India limited the political and economic options available to Hindu and Muslim communities. Changes were only possible through communities and social constituencies (including women) working cohesively through political and social organizations. As a result the nineteenth century witnessed the passage of a number of secular laws regarding women's rights, including the Sati Abolition Act of 1829, the Widow Remarriage Act of 1856, the Female Infanticide Act of 1870, and the Child Marriage and Enforced Widowhood Act of 1891.

Family laws pertaining to Hindus and Muslims (including those relating to marriage, divorce, and inheritance), however, were treated as religiously derived and left uncodified partly to stem claims of interference in the rites and rituals of personal law. Due to the administration of all laws through the English court system many existing regional customs and traditions came to be accepted by English courts as Islamic. This Anglicization of Muslim law coincided with the abolition of the advisory post of kazi (qāḍī, Muslim judicial adviser) in 1864 (Pearl and Menski 1998, 333–4), depriving many Muslim women of rights to divorce, remarriage, mahr, and inheritance. It was not till the heightened political activities of the nationalist movement and the women's movement and the formation of the Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Hind in 1919 (Ali 2000, 147) that attention began to focus on Muslim women's rights and the perception that codifying personal laws to restore women's Shari'a rights and would unify the community.

Despite common nationalist goals and cross-over membership, the differences between the Hindu and Muslim communities and their political and social goals became increasingly apparent following the formation of organized political parties (the Congress Party in 1885 and the Muslim League in 1906) even when women of both communities were jointly forging a powerful women's movement in the 1920s. The period immediately preceding the passage of the Age of Consent Act of 1929 (which increased the age of marriage of both girls and boys) highlighted the differences between the goals of men and the unity of women of both communities. The extensive evidence gathered by the Age of Consent Committee across the country to promote passage of the legislation brought forth political arguments establishing their differences though both supported the legislation. The passage of the legislation focused attention on the confluence between women's rights and the political agenda of each community, with women's rights representing the area deemed immutable by both sides.

The debates preceding the adoption of the Age of Consent Act presaged those attending the passage of the Shariat Act of 1937 and the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act (DMMA) of 1939, both passed in the heightened political and social awareness raised by the activities of the Indian National Congress, the Muslim League, the Indian women's movement (Lateef 1990, 55–73), and Muslim Ullema groups (Narain 2001, 20, Ali 2000, 151–6). Muslim and Hindu women leaders of the All India Women's Conference and the Women's Indian Association supported the legislation. The effect of both acts was to unite the community under one law and provide Muslim women with rights to property, succession, divorce, mahr, and remarriage denied them under customary law. From 7 October 1937, the Shari'a laws became applicable to all Muslims "notwithstanding any custom or usage to the contrary, in all questions (save questions relating to agricultural land) regarding intestate succession, special property of females, including personal property inherited or obtained under contract gift or any other provision of Personal Law, marriage, dissolution of marriage, including talaq, ila, zihar, lian, khula and Mubara'at, maintenance, dower, guardianship, gifts, trusts and wakfs" (Hidayatullah and Shankardass 1968, 3).

In India, custody of children was governed by the Guardians and Wards Act 1890, which distinguished between custody and guardianship: while the custody of children under Hanafi rules would allow the mother custody of sons for seven years and daughters for nine years, the guardianship remained with the father. The religious status of the children was considered primary in awarding custody should the mother's religion change due to remarriage (Pearl and Menski 1998, 413–16). In practice secular courts ensure that the best interests of the child are usually considered of primary importance.

In 1986 the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act was passed by the Indian Legislature in response to a supreme court judgment with reference to the Mohammad Ahmad v. Shah Bano Begum case for maintenance. The case was filed under section 125 of the 1973 Criminal Procedure Code, which would enable an indigent woman to receive maintenance from her former husband. The supreme court ruled that secular law superseded personal law, a decision in keeping with earlier high court rulings dealing with the same issue. The court ruled that non-payment of maintenance after the prescribed period stipulated by Muslim personal law would be against the intention of the Qur'an and the mahr payment to the wife at marriage could not be regarded as maintenance at divorce and ordered the husband to pay Shah Bano both maintenance and the mahr owed her. The chief justice urged the government to pass the Uniform Civil Code specified under article 44 of the Indian constitution (Pearl and Menski 2000, 210–11), which would bring all Indians under secular law.

The Shah Bano case raised fears of assimilation in the conservative and well organized groups of the Muslim community who immediately denounced the judgment and demanded it be repealed. The agitation that ensued led to a hasty effort on the part of the government to undo it through legislation. The resultant Muslim Women's Bill deprived Muslim women of the right to appeal for maintenance using section 125 of the 1973 Criminal Procedure Code but created other provisions for their benefit, which, due to judicial interpretations, have proven more generous to women. Part 2 of the act mandates that a Muslim woman be accorded fair provision and maintenance at the time of her divorce (Pearl and Menski 1998, 212–14). The wife's relatives or the State Waqf Boards, cited in the act as options should the husband fail to provide maintenance, have not been considered as viable or as important as enforcing maintenance and fair provision from the husband. The new law was also immediately challenged as unconstitutional (a hearing is still pending in the supreme court).

PAKISTAN

The Shariat Act of 1937 and the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act of 1939 (which had been inherited from India) were modified by the passage of the Muslim Family Law Ordinance of 1961, which was supported by the All Pakistan Women's Association (APWA), an organization that Begum Liaquat Ali Khan established after independence in 1947. The Muslim Personal Law of Shariat of 1948 was the first legislation elaborating on the initiative of the 1937 statute to recognize the right of Muslim women to inherit property from their father's and husband's families (Esposito and DeLong 2001, 85). Pakistani feudal customs including unilateral divorce and unrestricted polygamy accelerated the need for changes in family laws that were designed to go beyond the Shariat Acts of 1937 and 1939. APWA set up five committees to deal with the outstanding issues confronting women: Women and Family Law, Responsibility of Family and Community, Education, Political Rights, and Women in Economic Rights and Facilities. These committees were to lobby government on behalf of women. In the struggle that followed over six years, these groups worked within the framework of established Islamic traditions in order not to raise the ire of the 'ulamā' establishment of Pakistan who were always ready to challenge women's rights.

The Marriage Commission's Report 1956, a precursor to the ordinance, revealed the differences between Muslim modernists and traditionalists over interpretation of Muslim personal law and the extent to which ijtihad or individual reasoning could be exercised by judges rather than religiously trained scholars. The modernists tried to use ijtihad as a way of enabling change in the status of women (Haidar 2000, 294, 299), which the traditionalists rejected, seeing it as an encroachment of Western ideas on Islam. The commission used the conservative poet politician Iqbal's criticism of the rigidity that had crept into Islamic legal structures after ijtihād had been eliminated in the fourth century to argue in support of ijtihād. The commission exercised self-censorship, anticipating a conservative backlash. It conceded that it could not interfere with the Shari'a but with real life issues that should not be the monopoly of theologians.

The sole theologian on the commission, Maulana Haq, objected to its attempts to broaden the scope of ijtihād and questioned the validity of equating Islamic scholars with laymen because there is no priesthood to define Islamic concepts. While the Muslim Family Ordinance went some way to redressing the shortcomings of the 1937 and 1939 acts, it tried to avoid taking on the traditionalists by relying on judges to interpret laws liberally. Women were now able to use "incompatibility" that included sexual dissatisfaction and aversion to husband as a basis for divorce if they gave up the right to financial compensation. However, some courts ignored the financial renunciation leaving the husband to sue for it in another court (Haidar 2000, 328, 332–3, 335). On issues of custody Pakistani law follows traditional law and reiterates the mother's subordinate custody to that of the father in accordance with the Guardians and Wards Act (Pearl and Menski 1998, 412). In many recent cases, however, as in Shahzad Muhammad Sidiq v. Shahnaz Farzana (1997) judgment was based on the best interests of the child (Pearl and Menski 1998, 418).

Under General Zia ul-Haq (who seized power in 1977) there was a definite move to bring Pakistan closer to being an Islamic state. A Federal Shariat Court was created to verify the Qur'anic authenticity of personal law legislation. The Hudood Ordinances outlawed extramarital relations and alcohol, and promoted interest free banking; it also ruled as anti-Islamic the activities of Qadian, Lahori, and Ahmadi groups. The Qanun-e-Shahadat (Law of evidence) 1983–4 differentiated the legal testimony of women to their detriment from that of men and made no distinction between adultery and rape, leaving women to bear the punishment for both (Esposito and DeLong 2001, 90). The Pakistan Dowry and Gifts (Restriction) Act 1976 states that the gifts brought to the marriage by the wife are and remain her property, noting that in Muslim law husband and wife retain their independent legal status, though this is often obstructed by patriarchal social structures.

BANGLADESH

Though Bangladesh inherited Pakistani laws, changes were made, such as the Muslim Marriages and Divorce (Registration) Act 1974 that made registration of all marriages compulsory (though not mandatory). Maintenance rights for divorced women have been liberally interpreted by the Bangladeshi courts with judges re-examining the relevant Qur'anic passages. Judge Mohammad Gholam Rabbani J. ruled that "every Muslim can and should read and interpret the Qur'an and it must be in the light of the existing circumstances in changing needs of the world." He further stated: "it is an article of faith of a Muslim that he should follow without questioning what has been revealed in the Qur'an and disobedience thereof is a sin." On maintenance he ruled that, "a person after divorcing his wife is bound to maintain her on a reasonable scale beyond the period of iddat for an indefinite period, that is to say till she loses the status of divorcee by remarrying another person" (Pearl and Menski 1998, 225).

In the case of Mosammat Nur Akhtar v. Abdul Mabud Chowdhury (1996) in which the husband had alleged that his wife had left him voluntarily so no maintenance was due, the wife produced documentation that he had sought permission from the local Union Council to marry another woman. While granting the divorced wife maintenance Judge Rabbani ruled that section 6 of the Muslim Family Law Ordinance of 1961, regarded as permission for polygamy, was against Islamic law and should be deleted from the Ordinance (Pearl and Menski 1998, 226). On the question of custody, Bangladeshi courts have been more conservative and ruled that the mother has custody of her minor daughter till she attains puberty (unless she first marries a person not related within the prohibited degree) as in the case of Akter Jahan Tanzia alias Bab v. state (1986) B.L.D. 281 (Pearl and Menski 1998, 423).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. Ali, The emergence of feminism among Indian Muslim women 1920–1947, Karachi 2000.
- J. L. Esposito and N. J. DeLong, Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2001.
- N. Haidar, Islamic legal reform. The case of Pakistan and family law, in Yale Journal of Law and Feminism 12 (2000), 328, 332–3, 335.
- M. Hidayatullah and R. K. P. Shankardass, Mulla principles of Mahomedan law, Bombay 1968.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities 1890–1980s, New Delhi 1990.
- V. Narain, Gender and community. Muslim women's rights in India, Toronto 2001.
- D. Pearl and W. Menski, Muslim family law, London 1998³.

Turkey

The Civil Code of the Turkish Republic was passed in 1926, and comprised family law as one of its sub-fields. The new law entailed substantive improvements in the status of women (Starr 1974). Polygamy and repudiation were outlawed while women gained equal rights with men in terms of conditions and initiation of divorce. Custody rights in case of divorce were rearranged so as to bring equal rights to women. Prevailing inequalities in inheritance between male and female children were abrogated. Civil union was recognized as the only legally valid form of marriage, thereby reducing the importance of religious marriage.

The new family law was not recognized as a code in its own right but comprised only a segment of the Civil Code. Nevertheless it was a key element of republican reforms as it rearranged relations between genders and between generations and changed the ways in which household and family were created and dissolved. This was a central part of the republican desire to replace existing Islamic imperial practices and institutions with secular, civic, and so-called “modern” ones. In line with the envisaged civilizational shift of the Turkish Republic from an Islamic culture, perceived as backward, to one based on Western ideals with a progressive ethos, the law made no reference to Islamic law in terms of source or content. The new Turkish Civil Code was mainly a translation and adaptation of the Swiss Civil Code of the time.

Yet, the law cast the husband as head of the household who was to have the ultimate say in matters such as custody of children or domicile. The wife was cast as “assistant and counselor of the husband.” In order to work outside the home, married women needed permission from their husbands.

All in all women’s rights in terms of family law were meant to sustain the nuclear family by casting women in the roles of enlightened, secular wives and mothers. Women’s presence, both public and private, was meant to be primarily for the betterment of the nation and the new republican nuclear family – often conceived in interchangeable forms (Sirman 2000).

In the next seven decades the code remained relatively intact until the 1990s, although efforts to change it had already begun in the 1950s. The 1990s saw the impact of the feminist movement as it publicly problematized the Civil Code in terms of women’s rights. Feminists also mobilized the effects of global women’s movement such as the Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), which Turkey had ratified in 1985. The clause that required the husband’s permission for a married woman to be able to work outside the home was annulled in 1994. The Law on the Protection of Family, passed in 1998, enabled women to seek restraining orders in case of physical abuse. In 2001 the constitution was amended to state that: “the family is ... based on the equality of spouses.” The new Civil Code, a result of feminist efforts, stipulates equality of spouses within marriage in terms of domicile and custody. The husband is no longer recognized as head of the household; both spouses represent the family. The law sets the age of 18 as the legal minimum age for marriage for both men and women, whereas previously it was 17 for men and 15 for women. Children born out of wedlock have the same rights as the children of married parents and their mothers have primary claim over their custody. The law also allows single parents to adopt children. Moreover, instead of the previous default regime of separate property, it establishes a new matrimonial property regime. In the case of divorce – unless another property regime is selected by the couple – property obtained during the course of marriage is to be divided equally, regardless of whose name it is registered under. Here the law recognizes women’s domestic labor in the making of family property. A parliamentary bill, however, limits the application of this law to property acquired only after January 2003, implying the de facto exclusion of about 15 million married women from the law’s provision. Political and legal contentions around this article continue.

Another important development in terms of family law in Turkey was the establishment of family courts in 2003. The new courts are to apply related sections of the Civil Code together with the Law on the Protection of the Family and are to engage in a deeper examination of the family situation of litigants. The new specialized family courts can potentially facilitate the juridical recognition of disadvantages women face in family life.

Next to the nature of the legal texts, access to law remains another key aspect of gender inequality in family law. There is a significant gender gap in the effect of legal institutions and knowledge on daily life practices. This leaves women vulnerable to customary practices that are themselves reproduced in relation to the weak injunctive power of the law.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ilkcaracan and P. Ilkcaracan, Kuldan yurttaş’a. Kadınlar neresinde?, in A. Unsal (ed.), 75 yılda tebaa’ dan yurttaş’a doğru, Istanbul 1998, 77–90.

- D. Kandiyoti, Emancipated but unliberated? Reflections on the Turkish case, in Feminist Studies 13:2 (1987), 317–38.
- N. Sirman, Writing the usual love story. Fashioning of conjugal and national subjects in Turkey, in V. A. Goddard (ed.) Gender, agency and change. Anthropological perspectives, London 2000, 250–73.
- J. Starr and J. Pool, The impact of a legal revolution in rural Turkey, in Law and Society Review 8:4 (1974), 533–60.

DICLE KOGACIOGLU

The United States

Muslim women in the United States constantly struggle to reconcile the legal requirements and the value system of their faith with the United States system of justice and its system of values. Recent immigrants seeking a divorce, or the enforcement of nuptial agreements obtained in countries where Islamic law is recognized add questions of international law to this struggle as well. Muslim family law is an amalgam of Islamic law and the Mediterranean family structure, which anthropologists characterize as endogamous (practicing marriage largely within one's own group); patrilineal (tracing descent through the male members of the family); patriarchal (empowering the father with the formal and final authority); extended (including three or more generations within the same household); and polygynous (marrying more than one wife). These characteristics, previously restricted mainly to Muslim lands, are today common among Muslims living in Europe and the United States. As for the Islamic elements of the law, these stem largely from the Qur'an, the practice of the Prophet (sunna), the unanimous opinion (ijmā') of the learned elders ('ulamā'), and the juridical opinions of regional schools of law (madhāhib). Family law issues in the United States are based on this classical framework, whereas those stemming from judgments obtained in the Muslim world may also include secular laws unique to individual Muslim countries.

For Muslim women, therefore, painless solutions to marital woes are understandably difficult to procure given the need to comply with the dictates of faith, law in forum, and the protocols of transnational law. Prenuptial agreements, for instance, display strong biases that are clearly Islamic, whereas issues of divorce display equally strong United States juridical biases. Those with marriages solemnized in accordance with Islamic law, in the United States or abroad, may turn to the United States courts to enforce settlements obtained in accordance with Islamic sacred law, or to rescind such settlements. At times the intent is clearly malicious, as in the case of spouses of dual citizenship, who attempt to deprive their partners of a share in the marital estate by obtaining favorable dissolutions only available in a Muslim country, and then enforcing the same through the United States courts. Contrariwise, they may challenge such enforcement efforts by invoking the undue entanglement clause of the First Amendment or public policy arguments. United States courts may also be asked to adjudicate extra-judicial dissolutions, such as a talāq, which men generally obtain through the local mosque within the United States, or by mail, through a foreign court that recognizes out-of-court divorces, and which they then present to the United States courts for ratification.

While all such issues hinge to a lesser or greater extent on questions of jurisdiction, domicile, or the undue entanglement clause of the First Amendment, in the case of overseas judgments there is additionally the issue of comity. Whilst not a law as such, the principle of comity is nonetheless a doctrine of reciprocity to which United States courts defer because it ensures the recognition of United States judgments elsewhere. Comity gives due recognition to cases originating in foreign judgments but only if such cases comply with two conditions: first, that the foreign court in question has the required jurisdiction, and second, that its adjudication, in both substance and procedure, does not offend United States public policy. On the question of jurisdiction, the State of New York has refused to recognize unilateral divorce (talāq) within the United States because all divorces so obtained, the court ruled, must comply with the laws of the state (Shikoh v. Murff). And on public policy, the courts have ruled that comity will not extend to custody arrangements procured overseas under the influence of Islamic law because the law discriminates against women. That in Islamic law, for example, a child, even while in the physical custody of the mother, remains nonetheless under the guardianship of the father was considered offensive to public policy (Amin v. Bakhaty 2001 WL 1223612 [La.] [2001]). But United States courts also seem to suggest that, whilst structurally indistinguishable from long-established Arab social practice, Muslim family law nonetheless is flexible enough to comply with the public policy of the United States.

Marriages performed by the clergy are recognized by the United States courts, but the same is not true of dissolutions procured outside the jurisdiction of a formal judicial system. The primary instrument for dissolving Muslim marriages, however, is talāq, which empowers the male alone to dissolve a marriage unilaterally and extra-judicially. In contrast, the wife has only two options: to dissolve the marriage by way of a delegated ṭalāq (ṭalāq al-tafwīd), which is usually embedded in a prenuptial agreement, or by way of khulʿ. In many Muslim countries today, the couple need simply check a box to empower the wife also to unilaterally institute a delegated divorce. Women outside the Islamic world, however, have no legal means to implement such prenuptial clauses and sometimes find themselves in what scholars term a limping marriage. In this case they do obtain civil divorces from a secular court but remain married to husbands who often, out of malice, withhold the ṭalāq pronouncements, and deny their otherwise divorced wives the right to remarry according to Islamic rites. This is particularly true of women in countries such as the United States where extra-judicial repudiations are void and where no authority exists to coerce the husband to institute an Islamic ṭalāq. Furthermore, ṭalāqs obtained overseas have not fared well in United States courts: in a recent ruling the courts deemed such repudiations unenforceable because of irreconcilable differences, both substantive and procedural, between ṭalāq and a civil divorce (Seth v. Seth, 694 S.W. 2d 459, 463 [Tex. Ct. App. 1985]). The courts have also refused to enforce financial settlements ensuing from repudiations procured within the United States but through an arbitration process based on Islamic law; this, the court ruled, would be in violation of the First Amendment prohibition against undue entanglement. The wife in classical Islamic law, and under modern legislation in some Muslim countries, has the right to dissolve the marriage through khulʿ. In this case she petitions her husband directly, or through the state, or, where no such authority exists, through the local religious authorities, to dissolve the marriage in return for a financial payment, usually equal to her mahr payment. Once again, the undue entanglement clause as interpreted currently denies her this relief within the United States. The conversion of spouses to Islam has also created its own set of challenges to Islamic law. According to classical Islamic law Muslim women may not marry, or remain married to, partners who belong to other faiths, which of course means that on conversion the wife's marital relationship is put in jeopardy. Some jurists have now ruled in favor of upholding the marriages of such female converts; but even this small minority has yet to rule in favor of recognizing the civil contracts of Muslim females who marry outside Islam.

In mitigation of the husband's unfettered right to divorce, and the potential cause of financial harm to his wife, Islamic law allows the inclusion of a mahr clause in a prenuptial contract. Such clauses routinely split the mahr into a cash portion, due immediately, and a deferred portion due on demand, or on dissolution of the marriage. Additional rules govern marriages not consummated and mahr not specified: in the first case the mahr amount is halved, and in the second, a suitable gift is substituted instead. The United States courts have refused to enforce deferred mahr, however, on the basis that a prenuptial clause allowing a spouse to profit from a divorce is contrary to public policy, and thus unenforceable (in re Marriage of Dajani, No. 0004356, Court of Appeal of California, Fourth Appellate District, Division Three, 204 Cal. App. 3d 1387; 251 Cal. Rptr. 871; [Cal. Ct. App. 1988]). But they have also considered mahr agreements enforceable on the basis that they are property waivers that supersede the laws of alimony or the laws governing the equitable distribution of the marital estate. And the California Courts of Appeal have enforced mahr agreements based on the neutral principles of contract law (in re Marriage of Noghrey [1985] 169 Cal.App.3d 326 [215 Cal. Rptr. 153]).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. L. Esposito, Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 1982.
- D. Forte, Islamic law in American courts, in Suffolk Transnational Law Journal 7 (1983), 1–33.
- A. al-Hibri, Islam, law and custom. Redefining Muslim women's rights, in American University Journal of International Law and Policy 12:1 (1997), 15–18.
- A. al-Najjār (ed.), al-Majalla al-ilmīyya li-al-majlis al-ʿUrubbī li-al-iftāʾ wa-al-buḥūth, Ireland 2003.
- J. Nasir, The status of women under Islamic law and under modern Islamic legislation, London 1990.
- G. Qaisi, Religious marriage contracts. Judicial enforcement of mahr agreements in American courts, in Journal of Law and Religion 15 (2000–1), 67, 72.
- B. Stowasser, Women and citizenship in the Qur'an, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 23–38.
- B. Venkatraman, Comment, Islamic states and the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Are the Shari'a and the Convention compatible?, in American University Law Review 44 (1995), 1949, 1970, 1984–5.

Law: Women as Witnesses

Overview

Throughout Islamic history as well as during the contemporary period, Muslim jurists, reformers, and latterly feminists have discussed the concept of women as witnesses in Islamic law, yet the topic has not achieved a prominent status within Islamic legal discourse.

Providing legal evidence is imperative in upholding the Shari'a, or divine law in Islam. The three methods through which legal evidence can be provided in the Shari'a are confession (iqrār), testimony (shahāda), and oath (yamin). Testimony is defined as a statement in court concerning the rights of others, which is based on observation, and introduced by the word “ashhadu” (I testify) (Peters 1997). The prerequisite for testifying is that the person be ‘adl, that is, be of honest, just, and upright character. The person should have reached puberty; be sound in body and mind; must never have been punished or been guilty of a serious offence; and must not have engaged in immoral behavior. One cannot testify for one’s immediate family. Testifying is considered a collective obligation, farḍ ‘alā al-kifāya, but becomes an individual obligation in cases where it is necessary for a specific person to testify in order to protect the rights of another. This obligation is adhered to in all matters of testifying within the Shari'a except when dealing with Islamic criminal law (the ḥadd offences), because of the severity of both the crime and the penalty. The act of testifying is an extremely noble act as well as a grave responsibility.

Throughout much of Islamic history the perception and practice has been that witnesses were required to be male for most legal cases. For instance, in the area of the ḥadd concerning adultery (zinā), the four schools of jurisprudence, namely Ḥanafī, Mālikī, Shāfi'ī and Ḥanbalī, accept only four male witnesses. For ḥadd offences other than adultery, such as the law of retaliation for murder (qiṣāṣ), theft (sariqa), highway robbery or brigandage (hirāba), and involvement with intoxicants (khamr), the four juristic schools require two male witnesses. The Qur'ānic verses utilized to support their claim are 65:2, which describes the number of witnesses required during a divorce, and 5:106, which deals with the writing of a will. In other issues – for example, marriage (nikāḥ); divorce (talāq); remarriage with one’s divorced wife (raj' a); annulment of a marriage after the husband’s sworn testimony to have refrained from marital intercourse for a period of at least four months (ilā'); repudiation (zihār); relationship by marriage (nasab); submission to the will of God (islām); apostasy from Islam (ridda); declaring witnesses unreliable (jarḥ); declaring reliable witnesses (ta'dīl); death and poverty (mawt wa-i'sār); appointment of a representative, agent, deputy, proxy or delegation of authority (wakāla); guardianship (wilāya); and witnessing over another witness (shahāda 'alā shahāda) – the four schools, with the exception of the Ḥanafī, require three male witnesses. The Ḥanafī school accepts two male or one male and two female witnesses for these cases based on Qur'an 2:282:

O ye who believe! When ye deal with each other, in transactions involving future obligations in a fixed period of time, reduce them to writing; let a scribe write down faithfully as between the parties; let not the scribe refuse to write: as Allah has taught him, so let him write. The liability dictate, but let him fear His Lord Allah and not diminish aught of what he owes. If the party liable is mentally deficient, or weak, or unable himself to dictate, let his guardian dictate faithfully. And get two witnesses, out of your own men, and if there are not two men, then a man and two women, such as ye choose, for witnesses, so that if one of them errs, the other can remind her. The witnesses should not refuse when they are called on (for evidence) disdain not to reduce to writing (your contract) for a future period. Whether it be small or big: it is juster in the sight of Allah, more suitable as evidence, and more convenient to prevent doubts among yourselves but if it be a transaction which ye carry out on the spot among yourselves there is not blame on you if ye reduce it not to writing. But take witnesses whenever ye make a commercial contract; and let neither scribe nor witness suffer harm. If ye do (such harm), it would be wickedness in you. So fear Allah; for it is Allah that teaches you. And Allah is well acquainted with all things.

Regarding financial transactions, the four schools require two male or one male and two female witnesses based on Qur'an 2:282. Lastly, in many cases dealing with only women – such as childbirth, stillbirths, and breast-feeding – only female witnesses are allowed. However, jurists differ in the number of female witnesses required taking into account the woman’s level of knowledge with respect to the subject matter and qiyās, or analogical deduction, based on several verses and ḥadīth, especially in relation to Qurʾān 2:282. In summary, the majority opinion amongst the four schools is that for transactions, two males, or one male and two females, are required. In the other areas of law, whether personal or penal, three male witnesses are specified. In situations specific to women, female witnesses are accepted, but the number required varies with the different schools. To a large extent, the four schools of jurisprudence make reference to Qurʾān 2:282 as the foundation of their reasoning, followed by the application of qiyās.

Other jurists provide contrary opinions to those given by the four main schools. For instance, in the area of the ḥadd offences, Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350) reported that the testimony of eight women would be sufficient to establish that adultery had been committed, and punishment would follow accordingly. ‘Atā’ Ibn Abī Rabāḥ (d. 732) and Ṭawūs Ibn Kaysān (d. 725) reported that women’s testimonies along with those of men are acceptable in any ḥadd crime, including zinā, where the testimonies of two women and three men can establish the case. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (d. 110) also reported that two women and three men can establish the case. Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhirī (d. 1064) believed that the testimonies of two men, four women, or one man and two women are admissible as proof in ḥadd crimes, except in the case of zinā where a minimum of four male witnesses is required. Although these jurists differ from the general view and maintain that women can be witnesses in ḥadd cases, they are still acting in accordance with Qurʾān 2:282. Another renowned jurist, Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (d. 923), maintained that in areas other than commercial and financial matters, he was unable to locate any evidence from the original sources which would exclude women from acting as judges who hear and evaluate the testimony of others. In cases concerning finance and commerce, following Qurʾān 2:282, al-Ṭabarī states that the second female witness may be required to “remind” the first since women are rarely involved in these matters. Prominent jurists such as Taqī al-Dīn Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1327) and Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350) concur with al-Ṭabarī’s opinion and conclude that testimony cannot be determined by gender, but instead must be established by credibility alone. Thus, when a woman offers credible testimony, the judge must admit it just as he would admit the credible testimony of a man. Therefore, it is evident that renowned jurists differed with the generally held notion regarding women as witnesses.

Regardless of the viewpoints that exist indicating that women may be witnesses in ḥadd cases, according to human rights advocates, generally this has not been nor is it currently the practice in the Muslim world. In countries such as Pakistan, Egypt, Nigeria, Sudan, Afghanistan, Malaysia, and Iran, the respective penal codes demand two male witnesses or one male and two female witnesses for cases involving commercial or financial transactions, and do not accept women as witnesses in ḥadd related cases. According to human rights activists, the effects of implementing Islamic law in this fashion have been detrimental in certain cases involving women who have been sexually assaulted or raped. However, according to the Shariʿa, in the case of sexual assault, bayinna (evidence) is what is required in order to support a case. None of the aforementioned countries actually implement Shariʿa in the full sense of the term. Rather, their constitutions are based on a mixture of religious and culturally related enactments.

The notion of accepting women as witnesses is an area of disagreement amongst the jurists and the schools of law, although such disagreement is not an issue in Islamic law. Concepts have been examined and verdicts stated, to the best of the jurists’ knowledge, within a specific time frame and within a specific environment. Qurʾān 2:282 pertains to business and commercial transactions which are complicated and ambiguous, even for an expert businessman. It is true that a woman who normally is not involved in such difficult transactions may have neither knowledge nor understanding of the matter and is likely to get confused, especially in the court environment, which is dominated by men. This is also true in recent history where judges, lawyers, litigants, and witnesses are generally men. In no matters other than the transactions referred to in 2:282 does the Qurʾān equate the evidence of two women with one man. On the contrary, in the matter of imprecation where the husband charges his wife with adultery, the testimony of the woman is equal to that of her husband. Thus, the status of women as witnesses in all legal cases, including those involving the ḥudūd ordinances, may require further examination by contemporary jurists. Furthermore, according to human rights advocates, in criminal cases such as adultery, it is not possible according to various state constitutions to demand witnesses of a specific gender. The situation is similar in cases of rape and sexual assault, although the Shariʿa requires evidence to prove or disprove sexual assault. The practice of women serving as witnesses, as well as other rights and freedoms of women in the legal sphere of Islam, are complex matters requiring the accurate comprehension of the original texts. Within the guidelines of Islamic law these issues have been and will continue to be examined.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Y. 'Ali (trans. and comm.), The Holy Qur'ān, Beltsville, Md. 1989.
- T. J. al-'Alwānī, The testimony of women in Islamic law, in American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences 13 (1996), 173–96.
- M. B. Arbouna, Islamic law of evidence. The function of official documents in evidence. A comparative study with common law, Kuala Lumpur 1999.
- M. Asad, The message of the Qur'ān, Lahore 1992.
- M. Ashraf, Women's rights in Islam, Lahore 1991.
- J. Badawi, Gender equity in Islam. Basic principles, Plainfield, Ind. 1995.
- Z. A. Badawi et al., Gender assessment Sudan Interim Strategic Plan, 2003–5, <http://www.usaid.gov/locations/sub-saharan_africa/sudan/sudan_isp_a2.pdf>.
- A. E. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 2003.
- A. R. Doi, Sharī'ah. The Islamic law, London 1984.
- , Women in the Sharī'ah, London 1989.
- M. Fadel, Two women, one man. Knowledge, power, and gender in medieval Sunni legal thought, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 29 (1997), 185–204.
- A. Ibn al-Naqīb, Reliance of the traveller, ed. and trans. N. H. M. Keller, Evanston, Ill. 1994.
- R. Ismail (ed.), Hudud in Malaysia. The issues at stake, Kuala Lumpur 1995.
- N. E. Jonas, The role of witnesses in the procedural law of Hudud, Montreal 1988.
- M. Lippman, S. McConville, and M. Yerushalmi, Islamic criminal law and procedure. An introduction, Westport, Conn. 1988.
- , al-Mawsū'at al-fiqhiyya, Kuwait 1990.
- R. Peters, Shāhid, in Encyclopaedia of Islam 9 (1997), 208–9.
- Y. al-Qaradawi, Islam's stance on women's testimony, 2002, <<http://www.islamonline.net/fatwa/english/FatwaDisplay.asp?hFatwaID=46067>>.
- M. N. al-Rifā'ī, Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr, part 3 (abridged), London 1998.
- M. A. A. Sidahmad, The hudud, Kuala Lumpur 1995.
- A. Taheri, A noble woman carries torch for democracy in Iran, in Wall Street Journal, 13 October 2003.
- G. Webb (ed.), Windows of faith, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.

NADIRA MUSTAPHA

Memory, Women, and Community

Afghanistan

With overall literacy presently estimated at no more than 25 percent and rural female literacy in single digits, Afghanistan has had an oral culture. People maintain everyday information, community historical memory, and entertainment “literature” in memory and share it face to face. Afghan women are vigorous custodians and important icons of memory in the construction of social identity and values.

As agents of memory, women participate in divisions of cultural labor whereby different persons (distinguished by age, gender, class, ethnicity, location, education, work) may specialize in different bodies of knowledge, communicated in different contexts. While much of memory is verbal, some (for example, music, crafts techniques) is communicated primarily by nonverbal performance and imitative practice. Not all performances of memory equip the audience in turn to transmit the specific information communicated. In the women’s genre of lament for the dead or in the personal experience narratives women tell each other during their reciprocal gham-shādī (Dari, sorrow and celebration) or tapos (Pashto, inquiry) visits, women learn by participation the sociolinguistic expectations for listeners and tellers in those social events, then use those verbal forms to claim their own social place and perform their own memories movingly for others on similar occasions (Grima 1992, Kieffer 1975).

Performers and listeners prize accurate memory of specific textual content in proverbs, stories, or songs (notwithstanding narratives’ transformations in transmission, Mills 1990). Oral tradition communicates key social ideas, even in fictional entertainment such as folk-tales and romances as well as more serious, believed narratives such as saints’ legends, or in didactic proverbs. Female and male performance preferences vary: among Dari (Persian) speakers in Herat City in the 1970s long, multi-episodic romances were predominantly a men’s genre, while both women and men would tell folk-tales or afsānah, including international tales (for example, Afghan variants of “Cinderella” and “Beauty and the Beast,” told mostly by women). While women were about equally likely to tell stories with female and male heroes, men mainly told male-centered tales (Mills 1985). Women and men performed for family members at home; some men did so in more public settings (shrines, bazaars, tea-houses). Misogynist stereotypes of hypersexual, greedy, or otherwise disorderly women are widespread in tales and in proverbs, but tellers’ and listeners’ constructions of female nature could be paradoxical or resistant as well as stereotypical, with particular tellers’ views only accessible through interactive, context-sensitive analyses of particular performances (Mills 1991, 2000, 2001).

The ubiquitously popular sung quatrain (Dari chārbaytī, Tajik Persian falak, Sakata 2002) emphasizes themes of love and separation. Women, besides commanding a repertoire of traditional marriage songs (of separation for the bride’s family and triumph for the groom’s), enjoyed knowing and singing numerous chārbaytī together, accompanied by the dāyereh frame drum, at women’s wedding parties and in informal home visits. A singer may personalize traditional verses bemoaning separation by naming absent or deceased relatives in the verse, as did returned refugee women recorded in Herat in the 1990s. Separation (of the soul from God) is also a key theme in Sufi mysticism, lending possible mystical-religious implications to verses addressed to an absent love. In Pashto, the similarly popular two-line lyric landay, considered women’s poetry but also composed and sung by men, addresses themes including love, loss, honor, and historical events. From the 1950s, female and male performers on the radio (and later on cassettes) added to local people’s memorized repertoire and gave women, who rarely attended public musical performances, access to professional singers’ repertoires. The Taliban’s banning of wedding and entertainment music on religious grounds between 1996 and 2001 may not have much affected the cultural survival of these short songs, performed by women and men in private and often already romantically opposed to public proprieties.

Three decades of warfare and displacement did affect women’s status as objects of memory as well as their repertoire and performance occasions. The Marxist regime rallied Afghan women to revolution, invoking female icons of Afghan history (poets and martial heroines), stressing the need for activist women to help right injustice and build a socialist nation. Women’s vulnerability to propagandist appropriation and violence, described in personal experience narratives and oral histories, became a rallying theme for the Afghan Islamic resistance after the Soviet occupation in 1979. Protection of women's sexual honor as an icon of national sovereignty was interwoven with ideas of Islamic duty (Dupree 1984). Neither ideology idealized women's self-determination, but rather women's actions and treatment as national (and for Islamists, religious) duty. While Marxists invoked more distant Afghan historical figures, such as Malalay, the Pashtun heroine who fought the British in the battle of Maiwand in 1880, a major anti-Soviet female icon was the Kabul high school student Nahidah, first to call out nationalist slogans against Soviet troops at an Independence Day parade in July, 1980, and shot to death in the ensuing riot. Schoolgirls featured in reports of subsequent anti-government street demonstrations threw their headscarves at Afghan soldiers and police and demanded that they should go home and leave the girls to "defend the motherland" (Dupree 1984, 333). With diffuse resistance coalescing into regional and ideological parties, this fits a larger pattern: female heroes emerge in moments of default of male leadership, thus provoking men to action, but not establishing autonomous female agency.

The anti-Soviet Mujāhidīn resistance (1979–89) and the Taliban movement displacing the warring Mujāhidīn factions after 1995 both removed women from the public sphere, yet explicitly feminist legendry formed, for example around the controversial person of Meena, the assassinated founder of the secular-feminist Revolutionary Association of Women of Afghanistan (RAWA), in RAWA's assiduously maintained oral history (Brodsky 2003). Later, clandestine girls' schools were the least-kept secret of Taliban Afghanistan, widely publicized in the Western media. After the Taliban defeat in 2001, many urban women described participating in this "untold" history of resistance, acting out of nationalist or Islamic commitment to help Afghan women (rejecting the Taliban's gender policies as "un-Afghan" and/or un-Islamic oppression) or from simple need for family income. Time will tell whether the general historical memory of female heroism in Afghanistan will develop from a discourse of sacrifice and devotion and eulogize action for rights and empowerment.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. E. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 2003.

N. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women,

- in M. Shahrani and R. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan. Anthropological perspectives, Berkeley 1984, 306–40.
- B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxtun women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
- W. Heston, Landay, in M. Mills, P. Claus, and S. Diamond (eds.), South Asian folklore. An encyclopedia, New York 2003, 351–2.
- C. Kieffer, Les formules de lamentation funèbre des femmes à Caboul. Āwáz andáxtan-e zaná, in Mélanges linguistiques offerts à Emile Benveniste, Paris 1975, 313–23.
- M. Mills, Sex role reversals, sex changes and transvestite disguise in the oral tradition of a conservative Muslim community in Afghanistan, in R. Jordan and S. Kalcik (eds.), Women's folklore, women's culture, Philadelphia 1985, 187–213.
- , Oral narrative in Afghanistan. The individual in tradition, New York 1990.
- , Rhetorics and politics in Afghan traditional storytelling, Philadelphia 1991.
- , Seven steps ahead of the devil. A misogynist proverb in context, in P. Enges (ed.), Telling, remembering, interpreting, guessing. A Festschrift for Prof. Anniki Kaivola-Bregenhøj on her 60th Birthday, Joensuu, Finland 2000, 449–58.
- , The gender of the trick. Female tricksters and male narrators, in Asian Folklore Studies 60:2 (2001), 238–58 (with bibliography).
- H. L. Sakata, Music in the mind, Washington, D.C. 2002.

MARGARET A. MILLS

The Caucasus and Central Asia

Seven decades of state mandated atheism have not eradicated Muslim identity in Central Asia and the Caucasus because women, who transmit cultural norms and collective identity, are less influenced by cultural diffusion than men. Women, particularly those living outside large urban centers, have been historically less likely than men to have access to secondary education or prolonged exposure to alternative lifestyles than men who are free from social restraints to leave their community in search of work, education, or to fulfill their military obligations. Traditionally, women are not permitted to marry non-Muslims, and commonly remain practicing members of their confession, even if their men are not.

Many girls receive formal religious instruction from female religious specialists – referred to as otin or bibiotun. Young girls follow the same curriculum as boys attending a maktab, and those who wish to become religious specialists will remain with the otin for a few additional years for more in-depth study of normative Islam. Their education and the title of otin, conferred upon them upon graduation, make them pivotal figures in their communities where they will provide women with access to religious knowledge, assume leadership, and mediate in communal affairs.

The otin serves as model for women, who, after decades of Westernization and modernization efforts, first by tsarist Russia and later by the Soviet Union, had been expected to abrogate their “suffocating” and “backward” adherence to tradition and Islam. An otin commonly fulfills official religious functions just like female preachers in Iran. She acts as the female equivalent of the mullah and instructs girls in the basics of Islam and the proper way to behave in the given local context. With her students, she introduces women to official Islam mediated by popular rituals and local traditions.

Soviet policies aside, the majority of the peoples inhabiting Central Asia and the Caucasus still adhere to traditional values, because women continued to regale their audiences with stories of their Islamic past. These tales demonstrate God’s hand in the affairs of humanity and give hope that faith and proper conduct can overcome all hardships and that good deeds will be rewarded in their own time. Muslim identity was kept alive, albeit surreptitiously, through the stories told by women.

The narratives lean heavily on Sufi literature interwoven with pre-Islamic traditions passed down through the generations. Women such as Fāṭima, the daughter of the Prophet Muḥammad, his wife ‘Ā’isha, and pious local women are held up as models to emulate, or at least to motivate girls to internalize their qualities of piety, to submit to the will of man and God, and to display quiet suffering and self-sacrifice.

These qualities are often embodied by revered saints and are valued even now. Mothers teach them to their daughters by example, through narratives, and by pointing to the otin whose authority among women and power in the community can be extensive. Older women debate socioreligious issues and reinforce communal ties by evoking shared values and blood ties – real or imagined – in recounting local history and legends. These stories, laden with moral messages and liberal doses of admonition to miscreants help shape the cultural fabric of the collective. The religious and historical narratives women hear and pass on to others shape their concept of Self and Other within the boundaries of shared Muslim identity.

For women, the opportunity to affirm Muslim identity arises in the context of the ritual meal (sufra) held after a shrine visitation (ziyāra). This practice is common in the Turco-Iranian cultural zone and predates Islam. During sufra, women sit together in honor of the saint whose intercession with God has been sought and apparently been granted. Details of the saint’s life are recounted; her/his character is lauded; and readings from the Qur’ān may be offered. The host, who invites relatives, friends, and neighbors, provides a repast consisting of ritual foods commonly associated with the occasion. Histories are exchanged and created during an event that, in traditionally gender segregated societies, solidifies communal ties among women who may not all be related to each other and whose contact is limited by traditions that commonly censure women’s social gatherings – unless held under the mantle of religious activity.

Soviet gender policies and mandated atheism did little to change the region’s traditional cultures, which had been forged over the centuries, combining animism, shamanism, Zoroastrian tradition, and Islam. Individual and collective identities arose from ties to land, clan membership, belief in common ancestry, and loyalty to a particular leadership figure. The predominantly traditional Muslim societies that today constitute the population of the Caucasus, such as the Chechens, Tatars, and Azerbaijanis, and Central Asia’s Kazakhs, Turkmens, and Tajiks, to mention but a few, have relied heavily on women to maintain and communicate Muslim identity.

Construction of identity, collectivity, and the transmission of memory are grounded in popular religious activities that allow women from different social and ethnic backgrounds to meet and exchange experiences and ideas. They tell and retell myths, histories, and legends, emphasizing local ideals and norms, thereby creating a yardstick by which the audience can measure their individual and collective demeanor and adherence to the postulated ideals. They also add something of their own experiences to the blend of narratives. Thus they add their legacy to history and vitalize Islam for the next generation. Islam provides the mirror through which identity – Self and Other – is viewed, crystallized, and reaffirmed.

Note: ziyāra and sufra are transliterations from the Persian and denote a ritual complex that consists of a “small” pilgrimage – the big one being the hajj – and a ritual meal that is commonly held in a garden or park in fulfillment of a vow made during a pilgrimage to a shrine or tomb. Persian is used because it is universally understood in the region to convey the religious significance of the event.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abadan-Unat, The impact of legal and educational reforms on Turkish women, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 195–214.

- E. A. Allworth (ed.), The Tatars of the Crimea. Return to the homeland. Studies and documents, Durham, N.C. 1998².
- M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997.
- A. Kefeli, The role of Tatar and Kriashen women in the transmission of Islamic knowledge, 1800–1870, in R. Geraci and M. Khodarkovsky (eds.), Of religion and empire. Missions, conversions, and tolerance in tsarist Russia, Ithaca, N.Y. 2001, 250–73.
- S. Keller, To Moscow, not Mecca. The Soviet campaign against Islam in Central Asia, 1917–1941, Westport, Conn. 2001.
- A. Khalid, The politics of Muslim cultural reform. Jadidism in Central Asia, Berkeley 1998.
- E. J. Lazzerini, Volga Tatars in Central Asia, 18th–20th centuries. From diaspora to hegemony, in B. F. Manz (ed.), Central Asia in historical perspective, Boulder, Colo. 1994, 82–102.
- S. P. Poliakov, Everyday Islam. Religion and tradition in rural Central Asia, trans. A. Olcott, ed. and intro. M. B. Olcott, Armonk, N.Y. 1991.
- I. Togan, In search of an approach to the history of women in Central Asia, in K. A. Ertürk (ed.), Rethinking Central Asia. Non-Eurocentric studies in history, social structure and identity, Reading, U.K. 1999, 163–93.

ANDREA GIACOMUZZI

Iran

The Shāhnāma, a national epic that versifies a mytho-history of Iran, suggests a vital role played by women and the notion of the feminine in general. Omidshar (2003) argues that feminine symbols, and female figures, appear throughout this epic to “arbitrate all significant instances of transfer of power, be they royal, heroic or magical.” The feminine, embodied at times in female literary and historical characters such as Farānak, Barmaya, and the goddess Anāhītā, stands at the birth of “all new orders” and reassuringly watches over moments of transitional trauma.

Reading the periodicals and historical records of the Constitutional Revolution (1905–11) in Iran for the forgotten parliamentary debates that focused on the nation’s responsibility for the fate of a large number of Quchani women and girls captured or sold to the Turkmens, Najmabadi (1998) suggests that gender may well be considered a “uniquely structuring category” for the study of similar transitional moments such as Iranian modernity. Though largely forgotten in subsequent renditions of the events of the constitutional period, the debates concerning the “daughters of Quchan” were pivotal to the consolidation of the Iranian parliament and for the constitution of Iran’s modern identity. As with the Turkish and the Arabic, the Persian reconfiguration of the term vatan defined a nation that was imagined as a community larger than the familial and the immediate and inscribed as a female body. The female body as mother and as beloved became principally the metaphorical, and ultimately the material, battleground for the inscription of the nation and its modernity.

The body of the Bābī poet Tāhira Qurrat al-‘Ayn (Fāṭima Baraghānī) is remembered in the chronicle of the nineteenth-century Qājār court historian, Muḥammad Taqī Sipīhr, as one such constitutive body. In his Nāsikh al-tavārikh, Sipīhr takes pleasure in an exaggerated description of the poet’s unveiled body. Her rumored unveiling marks a critical point in the history of Iranian modernity, situating in fact its memorable beginnings. She is represented as the object-cause of national desire, a desire that then is condemned by the force of the law in such a way that the national subject is hailed to destroy it. Reading this and other nineteenth-century narratives hermeneutically, it is impossible to pin down what her particular encroachment on the nation is about. But in the recollection and attachment of the image of this prototypical Bābī, to various local subjectivities in the next eight decades, it is clear that “the Bābī” is indistinguishable from the modern Iranian subject.

Reza Shah’s reign is often remembered in association with women’s forced unveiling in 1936, an edict that saw the veil as a marker of national backwardness and as a measure of women’s social retardation. The enforcement of unveiling sparked new debates about women’s education, progress, and women’s role in the constitution of the nation. The Bābī as an unveiled female body was recovered again and again in the public and private documents of this era as a threat to the very constitution of the Iranian nation and paradoxically as the marker of its emerging modernity. What is at stake, it would seem, as Najmabadi (1998) also concludes concerning the debates that ensued during the Constitutional era, is the concept of nāmūs (honor), “which shifted in this period between the idea of purity of woman (išma) and integrity of the nation,” both subjects of male responsibility and protection.

For a generation of largely upper-class, urban, educated female writers who were born before the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the body and its compulsory veiling appear in memory as overdetermined sites for the articulation of the sociopolitical tensions that crystallized as after-effects of the 1979 transition of power and Iran’s subsequent war with Iraq. The hijāb (Islamic dress), which was instituted in the new republic to represent the integrity of the nation and to protect and preserve the purity of its women, is described in the semi-autobiographical texts of Asayesh (1999), Satrapi (2003), and Nafisi (2003), for example, as “stifling” and “unnatural.” The Iranian chador (veil) in these texts stands to differentiate the ideological position of the fundamentalist woman from the one who stands in opposition to the Islamic regime. Acts of adornment, polished nails, the wearing of sheer hose, lipstick, or the few purposeful strands of hair that show from under a headscarf appear in these chronicles as embodied principled positions in the war against a perceived repressive theocratic regime. While such notations appear quotidian, superficial, and at times repetitive in the numerous memoirs and biographies that were written within three decades of the revolution, the distinctions, focusing as they do on the agency of women and the honor of men, get to the heart of a question that has dominated Iranian politics in history and memory since the nineteenth century – a question that points up the fault lines of communal belonging, religious identity, class affiliation, and gender dynamics in the constitution of the nation: “Whose country is this?”

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- G. Asayesh, Saffron sky. A life between Iran and America, Boston 1999.
- H. E. Chehabi, Staging the emperor's new clothes. Dress codes and nation-building under Reza Shah, in Iranian Studies 26:3/4 (1993), 209–33.
- Firdawsi, Shāhnāma, i–v, ed. D. J. Khaleghi-Motlagh, Costa Mesa 1988–97.
- A. Nafisi, Reading Lolita in Tehran, New York 2003.
- A. Najmabadi, The story of the daughters of Quchan. Gender and national memory in Iranian history, New York 1998.
- M. Omidasalar, Waters and women, maidens and night. The passage of royal authority in the Shahnama, in G. Nashat and L. Beck (eds.), Women in Iran. From the rise of Islam to 1800, Chicago 2003, 170–86.
- Tāj al-Salṭana, Crowning anguish. Memoirs of a Persian princess from the harem to modernity, 1884–1914, ed. A. Amanat, Washington, D.C. 1993.
- M. Satrapi, Persepolis, New York 2003.
- M. T. Sipihri (Lisān al-Mulk), Nāsikh al-tavārikh, ed. T. Sirāhih and M. B. Biḥbūdī, Tehran 1353.

NEGAR MOTTAHEDEH

Turkey

The relations between memory, gender, and nation-state formation in Turkey can be best captured if their multiplicity is drawn out. This necessarily involves discussing the construction of gendered memories by the early republican elite in comparison with those produced by their “daughters” and looking at contemporary articulations of nostalgia in the identity formulation of different groups.

During the establishment of the Turkish Republic, the state emphasized a qualified Westernization with the aim of undercutting collective loyalties to the Ottoman legacy. This effort was coupled with a unique form of secularism based on a distinction between the “right” and “wrong” Islams – the latter being an umbrella term for any religious activity that had the potential to challenge the legitimacy of the new regime. In creating a collective memory to consolidate and justify the republican pillars, images of women would be indispensable tropes.

Ziya Gökalp, the most significant intellectual of the period, provided the framework of the new Turkish national identity with a pre-Islamic past whereby desired elements of modernization could be Turkified. His theory centralized women as the guardians and transmitters of this pure Turkish civilization, which had characteristics such as gender equality, feminism, and monogamous families (Durakbaşa 1998). As a result, the new collective identity was based on a particular remembrance of the pre-Ottoman past in which gendered subjectivities played a significant role in coalescing the “indigenous” and the “foreign.”

Whereas the bigotry of the Ottoman period and heretic religious practices were said to victimize women, the republican ideals and “correct” Islam were seen as sources of moral principles and modesty requirements. Hence, the Woman Question became the pivotal component of the Kemalist project with the image of the modern women symbolizing the break with the past (Kandiyoti 1991). The mainstream historical writing described the enlightened male elites as the pioneers of this change – concealing the suppression of women's autonomous movements (Tekeli 1990). The discourse also distinguished between Istanbul women (among whom such movements had originated) and peasant women. While peasant women's efforts during the war were glorified, “Istanbul women” were seen as betrayers who entertained the enemy (Toska 1998). This gendered differentiation also served the purpose of alienating Istanbul, whose inhabitants were regarded as suspect because of the past political importance of the city.

Another remarkable aspect of this contrast is the way minorities are constructed in popular memory. The close relationship between Turkish nationalism and Turkish ethnicity is reflected in the establishment literature where non-Muslim women were depicted as morally loose, creating an other against which the morality of the “true” Turkish woman could be checked. Reinforcement of ideals of Turkish womanhood vis-à-vis the decreasing visibility of “betraying” women may have also served as a way of erasing the forced and, in many ways, brutal transformation of a heterogeneous society into one that was predominantly Turkish and Muslim. By the same token, the rejection of the Kurds as a minority and their redefinition in terms of religious heresy and regional backwardness find their parallel in literature and memoirs depicting the need to educate women victimized by lack of language skills and modern education (Türkyılmaz 2001).

Until recently, the success of such formulations was reflected in the ways “daughters of the republic” embraced this identity and advocated the nationalist project. Numerous memoirs, biographies, and oral history projects focusing on female witnesses of the early republican era reveal how women from urban, middle- and upper-middle-class families participated in the consolidation of this story (Ilyasoğlu 2000, Tekeli 1988). These elite women tended to narrate their life stories in an epic fashion resembling the historical telling of the founding of the nation, complicating the demarcation between official history and authenticity of life experience. They defined their existential meanings around their biological or spiritual fathers and defended the militarist and elitist tendencies of the republic (Altınay 2000).

Another common thread in these recollections is nostalgia, which is shaped around the contrast between the past and the present. This partly stems from the relatively recent emergence of challenges to the Kemalist visions of these women and from mainstream historical writing (Z. Arat 2000). For instance, in the Islamist construction of the republican history, the equity between modernization and secularization is questioned. At the forefront of this challenge are urban, educated women who enter the public sphere donning the hijāb (Göle 1996). The new feminist groups also question the thankful attitude of the earlier generations and suggest alternative readings of history and collective memory through which they demand a more comprehensive women’s liberation (Y. Arat 2000, Tekeli 1998).

As a result, in Turkey, as in many Third-World nation-state formations, images of women along with the actual participation of particular groups of women in the public sphere have played indispensable parts in shaping and reshaping collective memories.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. G. Altınay, Ordu, millet, kadınlar. Dünyanın ilk kadın savaş pilotu: Sabiha Gökçen, in A. G. Altınay (ed.), Vatan, millet, kadınlar, İstanbul 2000, 246–79.

- Y. Arat, Gender and citizenship in Turkey, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, New York 2000, 275–86.
- Z. Arat, Educating the daughters of the republic, in Z. Arat (ed.), Deconstructing images of “the Turkish woman,” New York 2000, 157–82.
- A. Durakbaşa, Cumhuriyet döneminde modern kadın ve erkek kimliklerinin oluşumu. Kemalist kadın kimliği ve “münevver erkekler,” in A. Berktaş (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 28–50.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- A. Ilyasoğlu, Islamist women in Turkey. Their identity and self-image, in Z. Arat (ed.), Deconstructing images of “the Turkish woman,” New York 2000, 241–62.
- D. Kandiyoti, End of empire. Islam, nationalism and women in Turkey, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 22–47.
- Ş. Tekeli, Birinci ve ikinci dalga feminist hareketlerin karşılaştırmalı incelemesi üzerine bir deneme, in A. Berktaş (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 13–28.
- Z. Türkyılmaz, Turkification through girls’ education. The case of “mountain flowers” in Elazığ Girls’ Institute (1937–1950), unpublished MA thesis, Boğaziçi University 2001.

ÖZLEM ALTAN

Western Europe

This entry deals with women’s role in the construction of memory and collective identity in Western Europe. It focuses on migrant Muslim women and the way religious practices are remembered and reconstituted.

MEMORY, GENDER, AND MIGRATION

Studies on memory and remembering are rapidly expanding within the disciplines of the social, historical, and political sciences (Boyarin 1992, Wertsch 2002, Olick and Robbins 1998, Misztal 2003). The same holds true for the notion of identity. This is no coincidence because the two notions are intimately connected. The core meaning of individual or group identity is sustained by remembering and what is remembered is defined by the assumed identity (Gillis 1994, 3).

Memory is influenced by the particular social, cultural, and historical condition in which individuals find themselves. Gender is accordingly an important – but not exclusive – factor in the differentiation of people’s memory. Extensive literature points to the importance of women as storekeepers of memory or as custodians of tradition. Boundaries of belonging and constructions of national and collective identities are symbolized by women and the female body (Neubauer and Geyer-Ryan 2000, Anthias and Yuval-Davis 1989, Yuval-Davis 1997, Anthias and Lazaridis 2000).

Connerton (1992) has advanced insights into the importance of ritual celebrations and commemorations for the ways societies remember. He argues that communal memory is shaped by the ritual re-enacting of past events. Recollected knowledge of the past is conveyed and sustained by ritual performances. Recollections are at work in two distinct areas of social activity, in commemorative ceremonies and in bodily practices. His major contribution to the study of communal memory consists of connecting commemorative ceremonies and bodily practices. Connerton particularly stresses the incorporated character and habitual practice of memory. In habitual memory the past is sedimented in the body.

Migration entails a radical break with the past. Commemorative ceremonies and bodily practices have to be reproduced in a new context. An important consequence of migration is that “territory is decentred and exploded into multiple settings” (Fortier 2000, 157). That is, in the context of migration, it is no longer the nation that forms the site and frame of memory. A well-documented process for migrants from Muslim backgrounds is the strengthened consciousness of religious identity. This reorientation can take many forms and is the result of internal as well as external factors; in the end, however, most Muslims are forced to deal with religion (Roy 2000, Vertovec and Rogers 1998). Religion thus becomes a central frame of memory and identity formation.

In the new locality, the family also acquires a particularly important role in conveying and sustaining communal memories from one generation to the next. The family displaces the nation as the site of memory (Fortier 2000). This development strengthens women’s role in “memory work” within migrant communities (Gillis 1994).

REPRODUCTION OF ISLAMIC RITUALS IN WESTERN EUROPE

It is thus in the religious commemorative rituals within the family and the “mnemonic migrant community” at large that communal memory is reshaped in the context of diaspora. Whereas early in the migration process these commemorations were performed inside private homes or sometimes forgotten, they are increasingly organized by communal associations and mosques and even performed in the streets (Werbner 2002). In the Netherlands, community centers sometimes function as the locus of collective memory for minor celebrations such as Sha‘bān, ‘Ashūra, and ‘Īd al-Mawlid for Moroccan migrant women. Recipes for traditional dishes and religious songs are reproduced, meals are shared, and tapes played. Cooking special dishes for commemorative rituals is a central but neglected part of memory work performed by women (Kersher 2002). Spellman (2001) notes a tremendous increase in Iranian social and cultural organizations in London and the reconstitution of religious gatherings (suf-ras) by women. Iranian women use sufra gatherings as identity building vehicles, during which cultural constructions of gender are negotiated, contested, and reinforced. The task of sustaining memories and rebuilding communal identities is imbued with current concerns and negotiations.

The Islamic calendar is rich in commemorative rituals such as special days during Ramadan and the concluding feast ‘Īd al-Fiṭr, the Feast of Sacrifice (‘Īd al-Aḍḥā), Islamic New Year, ‘Ashūra, and the Birthday of the Prophet (‘Īd al-Mawlid). Moroccan migrant women used to prepare in the home country for the month of fasting either through fasting or feasting during the month of Sha‘bān. Women came together and shared a meal of couscous. In the Netherlands, however, many women mention that they tend to “forget” this celebration. Ramadan is important for communal and religious identities and is often referred to as the month of “sharing.” This relates to “sharing food,” “sharing time,” and “sharing with the poor.” Fasting is understood as sharing the experience of poverty, and toward the end of the month money is distributed to the poor, practices that are sustained in Europe. The most important difference between Ramadan in Europe and in Muslim countries is the absence of “Ramadan Time” (Armbrust 2000). In many Muslim countries, day and night are turned upside down. Office hours and school schedules are adjusted to Ramadan, television programming is suitable for Ramadan, and the time of breaking the fast is broadcast. In Europe, daily life goes on as usual.

The lack of family and the lack of synchrony of sacred and secular time change the character of most commemorative celebrations in Europe and strongly influence the celebrations for ‘Īd al-Fiṭr and ‘Īd al-Aḍḥā. Schiffauer (1991) observes the experience of emptiness and meaninglessness during religious commemorations among Turkish migrants in Germany. The changing content and meaning is noted particularly with regard to ‘Īd al-Aḍḥā. In the Netherlands, important transformations are occurring in the place and the time of slaughtering. This is also indicated by research in France and Belgium (Brisebarre 1993, 1998, 1999, Dasseto 1998). In Morocco, slaughtering is mostly done inside the home or in the street in front of the house. Selecting and buying the sheep, as well as the sacrifice itself, is a household affair. Because of the transfer to the slaughterhouse in Europe, women are no longer part of the selecting and slaughtering ritual. Many migrants also perceive the temporal reordering of the ritual as a problem. They have to wait at the slaughterhouse and are not able to perform the ritual at the time prescribed by the Mālikī school of law. Moreover, the meat of the sheep should be shared in a ratio of one third for the family, one third for relatives, neighbors, and friends, and one third for the poor. In Morocco meat can easily be distributed to the poor. Most migrants in the Netherlands, however, say that they do not know poor people and eat the entire sheep with relatives and friends. According to them the sacrifice has almost turned into an ordinary meal. Werbner (1990) mentions the changed meaning of the khatam Qur'ān, the sealing of the Qur'ān for British Pakistanis. After reading the Qur'ān, an offering of food is made to the guests and a share is put aside for the poor as charity. As "there are no poor people in Manchester," the central meaning of charity is lost and changed into hospitality.

On the 10th of the month of Muḥarram, the first month of the Islamic New Year, 'Ashūra is celebrated. This celebration tends to be forgotten by Moroccan migrant women in the Netherlands because they do not always know when these occasions are celebrated. Not all of them are acquainted with the Arabic calendar and they do not see the tangible signs that would remind them of the approaching commemorations in the country of origin. That is, the sensory aspects of time and habitual aspects of celebrations are absent. During 'Īd al-Mawlid, some people in Morocco visit a mawsim, an annual festival at a saint's shrine, organized by a zāwiya, religious brotherhood. The mawsim continues for seven days during which people perform dhikrs, litanies, and hadras, trance dances. Whereas some migrant women bemoan the disappearance of 'Īd al-Mawlid, others perceive the way it is sometimes celebrated in Morocco as bid'a (innovation). They regard religious lessons and religious songs as the proper form of commemoration.

MEMORY WORK AND CHANGING IDENTITIES

In the process of building new communal identities there are thus diverse and contradictory tendencies. First, new commemorative elements are created, for example in the form of religious classes and lectures on commemorations. Second, migration leads to a process of reconstruction of rituals. Third, it can also lead to a loss of recollected knowledge and erosion of ritual practices.

Celebrations are partly reconstructed in a hybrid and pluralistic fashion that reflects the ongoing process of negotiating identities. There is, for instance, a tendency to organize multicultural iftār meetings during Ramadan. Especially 'Īd al-Fiṭr and 'Īd al-Aḏḥā are occasions for organizing special events with music, singing, and dancing by the younger generation. Other tendencies in addition to secularization and hybridization can also be observed. In the Netherlands, most older women still remember 'Ashūra, if not for the feasting at least for the fasting. The generally observed separation of "culture" or "tradition" from "religion" can be analyzed for religious celebrations as well (Vertovec and Rogers 1998, Roy 2000). Religious aspects tend to become dominant whereas the mixing with cultural traditions is frowned upon.

Minor celebrations tend to be forgotten. Due to migration, bodily and sensory clues for remembering are dislocated and the transmission of societies' memories is no longer performed in habitual spaces. As Dakhliā (2001) claims, however, forgetting is part of the process of remembering since memory erodes at the margins of groups. Forgetting can be conceptualized as a process of reconstruction in which elements that are less relevant for the present context are latent. Explicit reflection is required on the commemorative performances in the new context, which also allows for contest and reconstruction of the way communities remember. Memory is continuously reshaped and the memory work is constantly adapted to new circumstances. As Salih (2000, 2001) observes in her study of Moroccans in Italy, migrants are neither champions of hybridity nor simply reproducing traditional cultures. There are multiple paths through which Muslim migrants in Western Europe renegotiate individual and collective identities within their "mnemonic communities."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Anthias and G. Lazaridis (eds.), Gender and migration in southern Europe. Women on the move, Oxford 2000.
- F. Anthias and N. Yuval-Davis (eds.), Woman, nation, state, Houndmills, Basingstoke, U.K. 1989.
- W. Armbrust, The riddle of Ramadan. Media, consumer culture and the "Christmas-ization" of a Muslim holiday, paper delivered at the American Anthropological Association, November 2000.
- J. Boyarin (ed.), Remapping memory. The politics of time-space, Minneapolis 1990.
- A. M. Brisebarre, The sacrifice of 'Īd al-Kabir. Islam in the French suburbs, in Anthropology Today 9:1 (1993): 9–12.
- , La fête du mouton. Un sacrifice musulman dans l'espace urbain, Paris 1998.
- , "La fête du sacrifice." Le rituel ibrahimien dans l'islam contemporain, in P. Bonte et al. (eds.), Sacrifices

- en islam. Espaces et temps d'un rituel*, Paris 1999, 93–122.
- P. Connerton, How societies remember, Cambridge 1992.
- J. Dakhli, New approaches in the history of memory? A French model, in A. Neuwirth and A. Pflitsch (eds.), Crises and memory in Islamic societies, Beirut 2001, 59–74.
- F. Dassetto and M. N. Hennart, Belgique. Pratiques et significations de l'Ayd al-kabir, in A. M. Brisebarre (ed.), La fête du mouton. Un sacrifice musulman dans l'espace urbain, Paris 1998, 191–203.
- A. M. Fortier, Migrant belongings. Memory, space, identity, Oxford 2000.
- J. R. Gillis (ed.), Commemorations. The politics of national identity, Princeton, N.J. 1994.
- A. J. Kersher (ed.), Food in the migrant experience, Aldershot, U.K. 2002.
- B. A. Misztal, Theories of social remembering, Philadelphia 2003.
- J. Neubauer and H. Geyer-Ryan (eds.), Gendered memories, Amsterdam 2000.
- J. K. Olick and J. Robbins, Social memory studies. From “collective memory” to the historical sociology of mnemonic practices,” in Annual Review of Sociology 4 (1998), 105–40.
- O. Roy, Muslims in Europe. From ethnic identity to religious recasting, in ISIM Newsletter 5 (2000), 1 and 29.
- R. Salih, Shifting boundaries of self and other. Moroccan migrant women in Italy, in European Journal of Women's Studies 7 (2000), 309–23.
- , Confronting modernities. Muslim women in Italy, in ISIM Newsletter 7 (2001), 1, 32.
- W. Schifffauer, Die Migranten aus Subay. Türken in Deutschland, Stuttgart 1991.
- K. Spellman, Repasts and hopeful futures. Iranian women's religious gatherings in London, in A. Neuwirth and A. Pflitsch (eds.), Crises and memory in Islamic societies, Beirut 2001, 347–65.
- S. Vertovec and A. Rogers (eds.), Muslim European youth. Reproducing ethnicity, religion, culture, Aldershot, U.K. 1998.
- P. Werbner, The migration process. Capital, gifts and offerings among British Pakistanis, New York 1990.
- , Imagined diaspora among Manchester Muslims, Oxford 2002.
- J. V. Wertsch, Voices of collective remembering, Cambridge 2002.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Gender and nation, London 1997.

KARIN VAN NIEUWKERK

Military: Women's Participation

Sub-Saharan Africa

Women in Sub-Saharan African countries have had an ambivalent relationship with the militaries of their societies. Since the mid-1990s, African women have become best known for the creation of unprecedented peace networks and movements throughout Africa – a vital response to the rash of post-Cold War armed conflicts there. Although statistics on women and militarism are almost impossible to obtain, the clear involvement of African women with informal militias and informal militaries is disproving Fukuyama's essentialist stereotype (1997) that women are nurturers and not soldiers and causes us to explore Mead's concern with the "unwillingness of most societies to arm women" (1967, 236). The stereotype that Muslim women do not participate in the military is also challenged by the data. In fact, the differential involvement of Sub-Saharan African women with the military is not dependent upon religion, but rather on the nature of ties between the military, culture, the state, and other institutions of the society.

The militaries of most traditional African kingdoms were formed through male conscription, and there was often complementary support given by women of all classes to the process of military conquest by which these traditional states emerged. Few ordinary women were in the military, and neither traditional nor modern African militaries conscripted women.

Under colonialism, African women were excluded from the military. European colonizers shaped the militaries to be institutions that could dominate and subdue African societies, so they conscripted men from marginal areas. These men understood that they were being exploited, but they eventually came to see the military as a job that could guarantee them some economic security.

This relationship of the Sub-Saharan African military dominance over other institutions persisted until recently, manifesting itself in five main trends. The first trend appeared in many Anglophone and Francophone colonies that agitated for independence, and achieved it through elections and negotiations in the 1960s. A decade later, the army was strong enough to take over in states with weak electoral or judicial institutions, or where governments were authoritarian and corrupt. Women became adversaries of the military because of its resistance to elections, abuse of civilians, and assaults on women leaders.

The second trend was the appearance of liberation movements where guerilla armies resisted colonial hegemony in Algeria, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Angola, Mozambique, Namibia, Zimbabwe, Guinea-Bissau, and South Africa. In these cases, both men and women became freedom fighters, and those women who experienced battle on the front lines earned status relatively equal to that of men. However, most women were also a part of the women's wing, the women's auxiliary forces, the nursing unit, or the equipment suppliers and food brigade rather than the heads of regiments. This range of roles still offered women an alternative to male domination in the domestic arena.

As a subset of the above cases, in both Muslim and Christian parts of Sub-Saharan Africa where liberation struggles continued into the 1970s and through the 1980s, women's military involvement depended on the context. In northern Sudan, Muslim women of the National Islamic Front supported their men fighting against the Christian south (Hale 1996), although more pacifism emerged later. In Eritrea, some women resisted religious and cultural conservatism by fighting for liberation from Ethiopia in both single sex and mixed units (Coughlin 2000). Muslim and Christian women participated in a 30-year liberation struggle against Ethiopia until independence was secured in 1993. They formed 35–40 percent of the EPLF freedom fighters, 25 percent of the front line combatants, roughly 20–40 percent of the administrative and industrial occupations, but 50.5 percent of the health fields.

Many women saw the military as a way to alter their subordinate positions within society, whether due to class oppression, or sexism. Many Eritrean women broke out of intolerable marriages by becoming freedom fighters (Leguesse 1994), and some married fellow soldiers. In Eritrea, Tsegga Gaim said: "The gender issue was such a very big part of this struggle for the women fighters . . . I learned in the EPLF not only to fight for independence, but also for equality" (Stephens 2000). But at the end of the early liberation wars, women fighters often paid a high price for the breaking of traditional norms. Most were discharged from the military, but not demobilized and reintegrated as men were. Barth (2002) describes the disappointment of peasant Eritrean female fighters at being neglected by society following the war, remaining unmarried, or being forced to return to unequal domestic situations and rural labor.

A third trend appears in the 1980s and 1990s, where African women entered guerilla armies to help resolve societal injustices and state crises. For example, in Uganda, when the corrupt governments of Idi Amin and Milton Uboté fell through coups, women joined the grassroots National Resistance Army formed by Yoweri Museveni. Ultimately, they were integrated into the Ugandan Defense Force, and today more than 500 Ugandan women serve as captains, administrators, or privates. In South Africa, women joined the African National Congress to resist apartheid, some becoming members of its exiled military leadership, Mkonto we Sizwe. When these women fighters returned at the end of apartheid, they had to force their former comrades and party members to negotiate women's 30 percent representation in political positions within the new South Africa. Ultimately, many ANC women were integrated into the reconstructed South African Defense Forces, joining white women who were already 10 percent of SADF (Cock 1995, 1993). Alternatively, many of these former combatants were elected as parliamentarians on ANC slates throughout the country.

A fourth trend has appeared since the end of the Cold War, where militias or armed forces have waged "wars against the people" (Ferguson 2003). This has involved the captures of girls by rebel groups and formal armies, gang rape, and generalized violence against women in places such as Liberia, Sierra Leone, Sudan, Congo/DRC, and Rwanda during the genocide. In Northern Uganda, the Lord's Resistance Army captured girls as a way of reproducing "rebel families." Elsewhere they were abducted through the killing of their family members, although some entered to escape domestic abuse or through fear of the victimization that could accompany war. The absence of alternatives to fighting may propel them toward joining. Often these girl and women fighters were no less violent than their male counterparts, although ANC women tried to avoid killing people. Overall, the futures of women fighters have tended to be in doubt, since demobilization efforts usually do not include the girl and women fighters (Veale 2003). The exceptions are places such as Sierra Leone, where women's NGOs have taken as their mission the rehabilitation of child fighters and women.

Strong indications of women's opposition to this trend emerged in the 1990s. Women's peace movements were evident all across the continent, especially in Liberia, Sierra Leone, Mali, Nigeria, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania, and South Africa (Mikell forthcoming). African women's peace and anti-military themes were evident at the 1995 Beijing Conference and have been carried forward at conferences in Zanzibar, South Africa, and Ghana between 1998 and 2003 that have been distinctly pro-state, anti-militarist, and supportive of civilian control of the military. Women have speculated that in southern Africa, the HIV-AIDS trajectory may be linked to the SADF expansion into frontline states, accounting for the 20–36 percent AIDS prevalence rates in these countries (Mail and Guardian 1999). In many of the countries listed here, especially South Africa, Uganda, and Rwanda after the genocide, women became an elected majority within parliament, and were better able to reshape the relationship between state, military, and civil society.

At the same time, a fifth trend is appearing, signaling a new relationship between women and soldiering in those societies undergoing transitions to democracy. Since women are not conscripted in Sub-Saharan Africa, their voluntary entrance into the military indicates their desire for economic mobility as well as their nationalist commitment. Although women are represented in small numbers in these militaries, they are achieving high rank.

Today, women still make up a significant portion of the Ugandan People's Defense Forces. They are now a part of the security bureaucracy and defense ministers for SADF, and they are among the officer corps in international venues such as the Africa Center for Strategic Studies. This trend is likely to increase as Sub-Saharan African countries democratize, and as women demonstrate agency and nationalism by opting for the military because it can offer them career opportunities. One Ugandan woman soldier defended her choice: "You see, in the army your performance will either pull you up or down" (UAF 2001).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A.-O. Agbese, Maintaining power in the face of political, economic and social discrimination. The tale of Nigerian women, in Women and Language 26:1 (March 2002), <<http://static.highbeam.com/w/womenandlanguage/march222003/maintainingpowerinthefaceofpolitical-economicandsoc/>>.
- E. F. Barth, Peace as disappointment. The reintegration of female soldiers in post-conflict societies. A comparative study from Africa, PRIO Report 3, 2002, <http://www.prio.no/page/Project_detail/Projects_by_programme_all/9244/37835.html>.

- J. Cock, Forging a new army out of old enemies. Women in the South African military, in Women's Studies Quarterly 23 (Fall/Winter 1995), 97-111.
- , Women and war in South Africa, Cleveland 1993.
- Conscription and armies in the world, 2002, <<http://www.c3.hu/~farkashe/english/countries.htm>>.
- K. M. Coughlin, Women, war and the veil. Muslim women in resistance and combat, in G. J. DeGroot and C. Peniston-Bird (eds.), A soldier and a woman. Sexual integration in the military, London 2000, 223-39.
- R. B. Ferguson (ed.), The state, identity, and violence. Political disintegration in the post-Cold War world, London 2003.
- F. Fukuyama, Women and the evolution of world politics, in Foreign Affairs 77:5 (September/October 1997), 24-40.
- S. Hale, Post-liberation women. The case of Eritrea, in M. R. Walker and J. Rycenga (eds.), Frontline feminisms. Women, war and resistance, New York 2000, 349-70.
- D. Harman, A woman on trial for Rwanda's massacre, in Christian Science Monitor, 7 March 2003.
- R. Iyob, The Eritrean struggle for independence. Domination, resistance, nationalism, Cambridge 1997.
- Y. E. Keairns, The voices of girl soldiers. Summary report, Quaker United Nations Office, New York 2002.
- A. Legesse, Role of women in development. Zula plain baseline study, Consultancy Report, Appendix 5, Oslo, Norwegian Church Aid 1994.
- N. Mba, Kaba and khaki. Women and the militarized state in Nigeria, in J. Parpart and K. Staudt (eds.), Women and the state in Africa, London 1989, 69-90.
- M. Mead, Epilogue, in M. Fried, M. Harris, and R. Murphy (eds.), War. The anthropology of armed conflict and aggression, Garden City, N.Y. 1967, 236.
- G. Mikell, Women mobilizing for peace. African-American responses to African crises, in International Journal on World Peace 17:1 (2000), 61-84.
- , African women. Globalization and peacebuilding from the bottom up, in SOULS. A Critical Journal of Black Politics, Culture and Society, Columbia University Press (forthcoming).
- , African women. Balancing militarism and peace, paper presented at the Invited Session, 102nd Annual Meeting, American Anthropological Association, Chicago, 19-23 November 2003.
- A. Nicodemus, Soldiers brought AIDS to SA, in Mail and Guardian (South Africa), 3 September 1999, <<http://www.q.co.za/news/1999/9909/990902-aids.htm>>.
- NUEW (National Union of Eritrean Women) The voice of Eritrean women (newspaper of NUEW), Asmara 1980, various issues.
- M. Nzomo, Governance, gender, and conflicts in Africa, United Nations, Dakar 2002, <<http://unpan1.un.org/intradoc/groups/public/documents/CAFRAD/UNPAN008250.pdf>>, 7-9.
- M. Stephens, Tsegga Gaim. Women and War Project, Eritrea, 2000, <<http://www.melaniestephens.com/wwtsegga.htm>>.
- M. Turshen and C. Twagiramariya (eds.), What women do in wartime. Gender and conflict in Africa, New York 1997.
- UAF (Uganda Armed Forces), Uganda women in combat. They tell their story, Uganda government homepages, Women of the Uganda Army, <<http://web.archive.org/web/20010424124901/http://www.uganda.co.ug/army/>>.
- S. Urdang, And still they dance. Women, war, and the struggle for change in Mozambique, London 1989.
- , Fighting two colonialisms. Women in Guinea Bissau, New York 1979.
- A. Veale, From child soldier to ex-fighter. Female fighters, demobilization and reintegration in Ethiopia, Pretoria 2003.

GWENDOLYN MIKELL

Turkey

One of the foundational myths of Turkish nationalism is that the Turkish nation is a military nation; that "every Turk is born a soldier" (Altunay forthcoming). This entry addresses the implications of this myth for women in terms of military service and citizenship and women's participation in the military as officers.

Military service is compulsory for all males, currently for fifteen months at the age of 21 (six to twelve months for university graduates). The law that regulates this citizenship practice was passed in 1927 after a brief discussion in the parliament. Upon the reading of the first article, which made military service obligatory for all males, one member questioned its implications for women: "If voting and becoming a candidate is a national issue, participating in the country's defense is also a similar right, a similar duty. . . . I would like to ask whether you have taken women's services into consideration, or to what extent" (TBMM 1927, 385). The suggestion that women's participation in the military should be considered was not taken seriously by other law-makers in 1927, but it has arisen several times since then. The most recent attempts were in 1996, initiated by the minister of defense (Çalışlar 1996), and in 1999, initiated by a woman member of the parliament (Hürriyet 1999). Neither of these proposals went much further, but both sparked heated debate.

"Nationalist projects are simultaneously gender projects" (Walby 1996). The 1927 debate reveals the extent to which the compulsory military service law was as much a part of the state's gender project as it was of its nationalist project. It also reveals that the law-makers were quite aware of this. By bringing male citizens together in the barracks and separating them from female citizens, law-makers were creating a major source of gender difference that was defined and administered by the state. As in many other nation-states, in Turkey masculinity, first-class citizenship, the state, and the military have been interwoven through continuous and compulsory male military service (Enloe 2000, Nagel 1998).

The first woman to serve in the Turkish military after the independence war was Sabiha Gökçen

(1913–2001), one of the adopted daughters of Atatürk and the first woman combat pilot in the world. Gökçen joined the Air Academy in 1936 and participated in a large-scale military operation in Dersim, a Kurdish-Alevi dominated province in southeastern Turkey in 1937. Upon her successful undertaking of combat duties, Gökçen remembers Atatürk telling her: “We are a military nation. From ages 7 to 70, women and men alike, we have been created as soldiers” (Gökçen 1996, 126). For the New York Times (19 September 1937), she was “The Flying Amazon of Turkey.”

Gökçen remained the only woman to join the military until 1955, when several women won a court case to join the Army College on the grounds that the regulations did not specify gender as a limitation for application. A number of women entered the colleges of the army, navy, and air force in the following years. But in the early 1960s, the entry regulations for military colleges were amended to include “being male” as a requirement for the applicants (Kurtcepe and Balcıoğlu 1991, 172–3). It was only in 1992 that women were, once again, allowed to apply for the military colleges and academies. The 2001 figure for the total number of woman officers in the Turkish armed forces is 918 out of a total force of more than 800,000 (Year-In-Review 2001). Turkey has the second largest military in NATO (after the United States), and one of the lowest ratios of female personnel (together with Italy and Poland). The recruitment of women into the military academies after the 1990s may partly have been a result of the pressures coming from NATO, particularly the Committee on Women.

The implications of compulsory military service and becoming a military officer are quite different. While the latter can be seen as the right to choose a military career, the former marks the right of the state to ask for women's service without their consent. In the public debates on both issues, different opinions have been raised by women, ranging from demands to be conscripted to antimilitarist stances critiquing the military establishment altogether. Some women, like Gökçen, have been active in the creation and perpetuation of the myth that the Turkish nation is a military nation. Other women have been critical of this myth altogether (see Emektar 2003, Cumhuriyet 1992). In the absence of in-depth research, we know very little about the ideas of the large numbers of women who have not participated in the public debates, but have been essential to the military service system as mothers, wives, girlfriends, and sisters. We also know little about the actual experiences of women officers in the military.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. G. Altınay, The myth of the military-nation. Militarism, gender, and education in Turkey, Palgrave MacMillan (forthcoming).
- A. Arman, Gencim, güzelim, kadını, denizciyim, in Hürriyet, 7 June 1998.
- O. Çalışlar, Haydi kızlar askere(!), in Cumhuriyet, 21 April 1996.
- Cumhuriyet*, Aklı başında kadın orduya girmez, 21 June 1992.
- G. Emektar, Kadınlar askerlikle özgürleşmeyecek, 15 May 2003, <www.bianet.org>.
- C. Enloe, Maneuvers. The international politics of militarizing women's lives, Berkeley 2000.
- S. Gökçen, Atatürk'le bir ömür, prepared by O. Verel, İstanbul 1996².
- Hürriyet*, Kadına 3 ay askerlik, 6 December 1999.
- İ. Kurtcepe and M. Balcıoğlu, Kara harp okulu tarihi, Ankara 1991.
- J. Nagel, Masculinity and nationalism. Gender and sexuality in the making of nations, in Ethnic and Racial Studies 21:2 (1998), 242–69.
- TBMM Zabıt Ceridesi*, Inikat 79, C:1 Devre II, Cilt 33, 21 June 1927.
- S. Walby, Woman and nation, in G. Balakrishnan (ed.), Mapping the nation, London 1996, 235–54.
- Year-in-Review 2001*, Committee on Women in the NATO Forces, 25th Anniversary, 2001, <http://www.nato.int/ims/2001/win/00-index.htm>.

AYŞE GÜL ALTINAY

The United States

Women have served on the battlefield as nurses, water bearers, cooks, laundresses, and saboteurs since the revolutionary war. They held no official positions in the military but worked as civilians serving their country's military needs until the establishment of the Army Nurse Corps in 1901 and the Navy Nurse Corps in 1908. During the First World War (1917–18), the first formal military positions were held by 21,480 army nurses and more later served in the Quartermaster's Corps. The Reorganization Act (1920) allowed women to hold “relative rank” from second lieutenant to major (but without rights and privileges).

In 1942, the Army Nurse Corps changed to the Women's Auxillary Army Corps (WAAC) and in 1943 to the Women's Army Corps (WAC), which included the Women's Air force Service Pilots (WASP) who flew as civil service pilots. WASPs flew stateside missions as ferriers, test pilots, and anti-aircraft artillery trainers. The navy also recruited women into its Navy Women's Reserve, called Women Accepted for Volunteer Emergency Service (WAVES) (Highlights of Women in the Military). In 1978, the women's corps were terminated and women were integrated with the regular services. The number of women increased from 1.6 percent of the total United States military force in 1973 to 15 percent in 2003 (Manning and Wight 2003, 10). The majority of combat related positions are still off-limits to women, although women are trained to defend themselves and their units. During Desert Storm in 1991, approximately 41,000 women, including Muslims, were integrated in many combat support positions in the theatre of operation in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Americans became alarmed about their women supporting the combat forces who were within close proximity of the front lines.

Little information has been collected about Muslim women in the military because their story is still unfolding. There is no reference to them in any books containing information about women in the United States military but more is written about Muslim Women in military services in other countries. The United States military statistics refer to its personnel by gender and ethnic background rather than by religion, which is counted from the perspective of pastoral and religious support. The information for this topic comes primarily from firsthand experience, interviews with women who have served or are serving in the military, and conversations with Muslim chaplains in the military.

It is still uncertain when the first Muslim women joined the United States military. The first evidence found through a survey was of an American Muslim woman born of Lebanese parents from Quincy, Massachusetts who joined the Navy Reserves in 1958, served approximately two years, and later resigned. She joined out of pride because five of her brothers had served in either the Second World War or the Korean War and she felt it was her patriotic duty to do the same. The end of the Vietnam War and the draft opened the way for more women to join the military, most of them African-American, and some immigrants or Americans born of immigrant parents. The statistics available show the largest percentage of the Muslim population in the military now to be African-Americans, followed by South Asians, Arabs, and Caucasians. From the 1970s to the present, the Muslim population increased and gained acceptance and was given space on the military bases to use for worship, Islamic education, and other religious activities. Awareness of Muslim women in the military increased as a result of stories of service women requesting to wear the hijāb as part of their uniform, and the tragic events of 11 September 2001 with the resulting media exposure of Muslim women in Afghanistan and Arab countries.

STATISTICS

According to statistics from June 2003 from the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) Manpower Section, there are 1.4 million military personnel on active duty and out of this number there are approximately 4,164 personnel (male and female) or 0.3 percent who have declared Islam as their religion on their personnel records. The American Muslim Armed Forces and Veterans Affairs Council states that there are approximately 15,000 Muslims in the military, which constitutes approximately 1.1 percent of the total force (Barber 2003), of which the female Muslim population is approximately 533 women, or 0.03 percent on active duty.

A number of factors account for the difference in the numbers of Muslims in the military. New recruits at basic training may not state a religious preference out of fear of being singled out or harassed because of their faith, and fail to update their records at a later date. A few women converted to Islam while in the military and did not update their records, and some who say they are Muslim do not want it to be in their records. The record will reflect a “no religious preference” if the records are not updated. The OSD maintains that about 70 percent of military personnel do declare a faith (Akhtar 1998).

The chart below shows the growth of the female Muslim personnel in the active services of the military from 1995 to 2003 and the Reserves in 2003.

Female Muslim Population in the U.S. Military Service	1995	2003	Reserves	2003

Army	197	257	Army	196
			Air National Guards	16
Air Force	80	132	Air Force	5
Navy	70	117	Naval	9
Marines	23	27	Marines	11
Total	370	533	Total	237

EDUCATION

Many Muslim women in the military utilize the education benefits and work on successfully achieving a bachelor's degree. Since the 1970s, women have been required to have a high school diploma (all women's jobs required this) and be in good physical condition to join the military. Their male counterparts were required to have only an eighth-grade education, because of the shortage of men joining the military after the end of the draft, and the assumption that combat positions do not require a high school diploma.

Women were not allowed the free education at the military academies in order to be commissioned as officers until 1976 when Congress changed the rules. There are no records of any Muslim females graduates from the academies. Women were commissioned through other sources, such as the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) and the Officer Candidate School (OCS) starting in 1972. There are a few Muslim women who were commissioned from these sources. Also, the Equal Rights Amendments of 1972 afforded women the opportunity to have a career within the military with equal pay for equal work.

WHY MUSLIM WOMEN JOIN THE MILITARY, STAY IN THE MILITARY, AND/OR LEAVE THE MILITARY

From the 1970s until the present, women have been recruited to join the military with benefits of college tuition, military training that could be transferred into a civilian career, travel opportunities, and a paycheck that afforded some single parents the opportunity to put food on the table. Why do they stay in the military? They stay in the military because of job satisfaction and a pension. Part of the job satisfaction is having supervisors and commanders who accommodate their religious needs by allowing them to take time off for prayer and fasting during the month of Ramadan. Some have allowed women to wear their hijāb while in uniform per the regulation which stipulates that the commander may allow the wearing of the hijāb. Why do Muslim women leave the military? Many converted to Islam after joining the military and felt that the military was incompatible with their faith because they were not allowed to wear the hijāb. After completing their contract they left the military. A small number have left because they were harassed by their supervisors who did not allow time off for prayer or leniency with physical fitness during Ramadan and because overall they were not treated well. These women had to make equal opportunity complaints and seek the aid of the chaplains and sometimes legal council to be given their rights to religious accommodations. The main reason why women leave the military, however, is the conflict they have trying to raise their families when they must spend long periods of time away from them.

ROLES OF MUSLIM WOMEN

Muslim women serve as aviators in the Air Force flying F-16s and in the Army flying helicopters, as doctors working close to the front line in times of combat, as translators (Arabic), intelligence agents, nurses, administrators, military police, chaplains' assistants, food specialists, dentists, mechanics, machinists, and in public relations, logistics, transportation, and many other jobs. Some are placed close to the front lines, as squad leaders, team leaders, platoon leaders, company commanders, and battalion commanders. There are a few examples of Muslim women in the military who have achieved some rank. The highest ranking officer is a lieutenant colonel (o-5) in the Army Medical Corps. She is a white American who converted to Islam after assignment to Tajikistan. A retired African-American lieutenant commander (o-4) in the Navy was the first female Muslim to receive a commission as a line officer in any of the armed services. A major in the Army Reserves applied to become the first female Muslim chaplain, case pending. A captain in the Marines, a public relations officer, and company commander of a public affairs company is following in her father's footsteps, an Arab-American and former Marine. In 1994 many changes were made in terms of occupations that women could hold in the military. Ninety-one percent of the positions in the Army are open to women, 94 percent in the Navy, 92 percent in the Marines, and 99 percent in the Air Force. The restrictions are combat positions or combat related positions (Manning and Wight 2003, 13).

ACHIEVEMENTS

The greatest achievement was the appointment of the first Muslim Army chaplain in 1993. The number of Muslims in the military required them to have religious representation, and with the help of outside forces and the exposure of Islam through Desert Storm, the push for acceptance as a Muslim community within the military was inevitable. Joint Forces Commander General Khaled bin Sultan said in his book Desert Warrior that there were over 2,000 military personnel who accepted Islam during the first Gulf War while assigned in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. The Saudi government paid for Muslim military personnel, men and women, to perform the hajj, giving an international presence to the Muslims in the United States military. Other achievements are access to a pocket-size editions of "The Meaning of the Holy Quran" at military chapels, certified halal Meals-Ready-to-Eat (MREs), and time to perform daily prayers and attend Friday prayers, as well as Ramadan observances. The Chief of Chaplains sends memos to commanders informing them how to accommodate their Muslim personnel. Important goals that are still pending are wearing the hijāb for female Muslims and possibly the inclusion of female Muslim chaplains to minister to the needs of the Muslim population in the military. The American Muslim Armed Forces and Veterans Affairs Council has been the advocate of many women on bases around the country, especially for wearing the hijāb. It has ensured that service women are represented and their rights are protected.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Akhtar, Islam in the armed forces, in Nation, 29 December 1998, <<http://www.renaissance.com.pk/febnev199.html>>.
- M. Barber, Muslims in the U.S. Military are as loyal as any, chaplain says, Seattle Post-Intelligencer Reporter, 2001, <http://seattlepi.nwsourc.com/attack/43546_chaplains20.shtml>.
- G. J. DeGroot and C. Peniston-Bird (eds.), A soldier and a woman. Sexual integration in the military, Harlow, England 2000.
- M. C. Harrell and L. Miller, New opportunities for military women. Effects upon readiness, cohesion, and morale, Santa Monica, Calif. 1997.

- Highlights of Women in the Military, 24 August 2003, <<http://womensmemorial.org/Highlights.html>>.
- Maj. Gen. J. Holm, Women in the military. An unfinished revolution, Novato, Calif. 1982, 1992 (rev. ed.).
- Capt. L. Manning and V. R. Wight, Report of women in the military. Where they stand, Women's Research and Education Institute, Washington, D.C. 2003⁴.
- B. J. Morden, The Women's Army Corps, 1945-1978, Center of Military History, United States Army, Washington, D.C. 2000, <<http://www.army.mil/cmhpq/books/wac/index.htm>>.
- Women in the Military Service for America Memorial, <<http://womensmemorial.org/>>.
- United States, Department of Defense, Office of the Secretary of Defense, statistics on military personnel, 2003.

SHARADA HOSEIN

Modesty Discourses

Overview

Within the Islamic tradition, a Qur'ānic verse that can be, and frequently has been, drawn upon to authorize discourses of modesty for women is Verse 31 of Sura 24 (Light): “And tell the believing women to lower their gaze and be modest, and display of their adornment only that which is apparent, and to draw their veils over their bosoms, and not to reveal their adornment save to their husbands or fathers or husbands' fathers, or their sons or their husbands' sons, or their brothers or their brothers' sons or sisters' sons, or their women, or their slaves, or male attendants who lack vigor, or children who know naught of women's nakedness.”

Across the Muslim world, in a variety of social settings, women's modesty, whether expressed as respectful comportment; the sexual propriety that circumscribes interactions between men and women in public; dress that conceals bodily contours, hair, and sometimes the face; or the emotions of shyness or embarrassment, is a fundamental component of a gendered social morality. Although many aspects of this moral system may be found in non-Muslim societies, especially those of the circum-Mediterranean, what may be distinctive is that the religious source cited above, along with related statements on morality and virtue found in the Qur'ān and the ḥadīth (traditions of the Prophet), are available for citation and interpretation. Historically, they have been adapted and adopted to give meaning or authority to local practices and demands. The emphasis has usually been on the importance of modesty for women, the parallel verse (24:30) enjoining men to be modest being less frequently invoked and carrying different connotations.

APPROACHES TO THE ANALYSIS OF MODESTY

Analysts have taken a number of approaches to understanding the workings of the gendered ideals and discourses of modesty in the social lives of communities across the Muslim world. Many anthropologists who have worked in tribal or rural communities have focused on how the modesty of women is linked to the code of honor that governs social relations in communities organized around kinship. Where the honor and reputation of families, rather than fixed wealth, control over the means of production, or occupation is critical to social ranking, the behavior of individual family members is constrained by the ways in which it might reflect on the family, maintaining, enhancing, or jeopardizing the family's standing or prestige. In many such situations, from societies of the circum-Mediterranean to those of South Asia, the modesty of women – defined by respectful comportment and sexual propriety – is deemed critical to the honor of their families.

Many social functions have been attributed to this moral system, particularly the imperative of women's modesty. Some anthropologists argue that the ideal of modesty for women functions to preserve patrilineal kin groups, restraining women and thus preventing them from disrupting the bonds among brothers and patrilineal kin. Others note that such systems function to preserve patriarchal control by excluding women from interfering in decision-making, whether over property or marriage alliances. Yet others suggest that at the least this system reproduces gender hierarchies since the passions of men for their honor lead them to strictly control the women who might undermine it. This relationship shapes the ties between brothers and sisters.

Those who find unsatisfying these sorts of functionalist arguments about the utility of modesty discourses in preserving social structures favor approaches that place more weight on the honor code as a system of cultural meaning. How do the ideals of modesty, they ask, give value to certain ways of being? For example, Abu-Lughod's analysis (2000) of the Awlād 'Alī Beduin in Egypt questions whether the requirements for women to be modest are patriarchal. She observes that in such social systems both men and women are held to moral ideals; and they are held equally responsible for the maintenance of family and personal honor. She concedes, however, that the ideals are gendered such that men's honor tends to take the form of valor and independence whereas women's honor takes the form of modesty, which can be defined as voluntary deference to social superiors and the sexual propriety that is one aspect of this deference.

Analyzing modesty as part of a system of meaning can lead also to an appreciation of the ways in which discourses of modesty can work to rationalize and reproduce social distinctions among social groups or strata. In deeply hierarchical societies such as that found in Yemen, modest comportment, along with competitive hospitality and consumption, are, as anthropologist Anne Meneley (1996) shows, crucial to the reputations of the socially respected landowning families in at least one city. This moral discourse has the effect, however, of asserting the superiority of this propertied elite group as a whole, in contrast to socially marginal “outcaste” groups. Women from these marginal groups are denigrated by social superiors for lacking modesty and are ridiculed if they try to take on the accoutrements of modesty by veiling. The moral discourse of modesty, in other words, according to Huda Seif, an anthropologist who has studied propertyless and despised social groups in Yemen, should be seen as one of the ideological mechanisms for perpetuating social inequality.

Ethnographers of everyday life in various Muslim communities from Africa to Asia have noted that whatever its functions and meanings, the discourse of modesty is context-sensitive. Expectations about women’s modesty come into play only in certain social situations and vary over the life cycle, being dependent especially on age and marital status. The demands for modest comportment are particularly directed at girls and younger women. The restrictions and expectations shift over the life cycle such that morality for older women tends to be less tied to the demands of modesty. In many societies across the Muslim world, older women behave more assertively, are more relaxed in the company of men, and have more public roles. Modesty can also be situational: in many communities that value and insist on the modesty of women, women can be bold, use sexually explicit or coarse language, and be anything but shy and retiring as long as this is within the intimate social contexts of gender-segregated women’s spheres. Veiling too can be situational, either being expected only in public or varying by the relative status of the men being encountered. Moreover, in some communities, women have available to them particular forms such as oral poetry in which they can freely express a range of sentiments that, if communicated in ordinary language and in public contexts, would compromise modesty.

Finally, phenomenological approaches to the study of modesty insist, against the functionalists and those interested in interpreting the cultural meaning of modesty, that one must explore how the ideals and discourses of modesty are experienced, learned, or cultivated by women themselves. Some have noted the close relationship between the assertion of modesty as a moral ideal and the feelings of shame or embarrassment that women experience in situations when they find themselves inappropriately dressed, exposed in public, or find their seclusion or separation from unrelated men breached. The critical reports in the early twentieth century of Bengali writer and champion of women’s education, Rokeya Sakhawat Husain, on the absurdities of women’s lives in purdah (the South Asian term for the seclusion of women) inadvertently reveal the depth to which women have internalized modesty. She recounts an incident in which a young bride, left for hours on her own in her new household, was forced to urinate in a vessel in which she had brought betel nuts because she was too shy to go wandering around the house looking for the bathroom (Rokeya 1988, 27–8). Others have focused on how the dispositions to act modestly and even the sentiments of shyness or embarrassment that underlie them are inculcated in the socialization process. Girls are taught appropriate behaviors, scolded for inappropriate or immodest behaviors, and absorb the ideals of modesty through moving naturally through symbolically loaded everyday worlds constructed in terms of the separation of the sexes.

With the growth and spread of Islamist or piety movements in the last decades of the twentieth century from Egypt to Malaysia, women’s modesty has taken on cultural meanings different from the familial core and consequently is experienced differently. Modesty has assumed more explicitly religious meanings. As Saba Mahmood argues, using the case of Egyptian women in the mosque movement in the 1990s, in such contexts modesty or shyness is considered one of the key religious virtues for women. Rather than being linked to the honor of families it is seen as integral to the realization of “closeness to God.” Women seek to cultivate modesty and shyness in themselves, many of them sensing that it does not at first come naturally because of their upbringing. Through bodily acts, especially veiling, such women, often from more secular and middle- and lower-middle-class backgrounds, believe that they will be able to imprint on themselves the appropriate attitudes and sentiments of the pious person. If some women complain at first that they feel uncomfortable taking on the hijāb, the head covering that is part of contemporary Islamic or modest dress, they believe that eventually they will come to feel uncomfortable when they are not wearing it. As Mahmood (2001, 214) concludes, conducting oneself modestly and taking on the veil are treated by these women, as “the critical markers, as well as the ineluctable means by which one trains oneself to be pious” (emphasis in the original).

THE MODERN POLITICS OF MODESTY

If modesty discourses in the twentieth century have been associated primarily with Muslim piety or with the familial code of honor that is so much a part of rural, tribal, or even conservative urban communities, these are not their only contexts and meanings. Historians and students of the development of nationalism and the nineteenth- and twentieth-century modernizing projects across the Muslim world have observed a pattern whereby women, almost as a condition of their becoming educated and moving into public spaces, have taken on stricter forms of modesty and chastity than those practiced in family-based worlds. It is as if they and their families, or their modernizing rulers, must prove that their moves out of the home and sex-segregated spaces will not threaten the social order or bring about their moral degradation.

Deniz Kandiyoti, for one, has argued that for the Turkish women who benefited from the secularizing reforms of Kemal Atatürk beginning in the late 1920s, being educated and finding public roles in politics and the workplace entailed a desexualization. Cultural emphasis was placed on women's maternal roles or their roles as ungendered citizens. Similarly, historian Afsaneh Najmabadi has argued that as elite and middle-class Iranian women in the early part of the twentieth century unveiled, entered educational institutions, and began to inhabit the "modern" heterosocial space where men and women mingled, they came to strictly control their behavior and language. They lost, she argues, the richly sexual and lively language of the homosocial women's worlds that earlier generations had inhabited. She describes the result as "veiled discourse – unveiled bodies." The secular or nationalist women who emerged out of these projects in Turkey and Iran have been described as "modern-but-modest."

Ideals of women's modesty have also been built into the laws about public morality that have been adopted by many Muslim majority states. Rather than seeing these as vestiges or holdovers from "traditional" values deriving from the honor-based morality of face-to-face communities, analysts such as Ayşe Parla argue that such laws, and the enforcement of sexual modesty represented by such related new practices as state-mandated virginity examinations, must be viewed as new and unprecedented forms of coercion and control over women. Turkish feminists protested at these examinations in the 1980s and 1990s which were conducted mostly on young women in state institutions such as schools or factories when there was suspicion of sexual (immodest) behavior. Carried out by medical doctors and enforced by state agents such as police, principals, and prison guards, these examinations are expressions of new powers the modern state has arrogated for itself. They are fundamentally different from familial controls, even occasionally violent, over the honor and modesty of daughters and sisters. The use of rape, as reported in Turkey, Pakistan, and elsewhere, as part of the torture of political dissidents or intimidation of political rivals is another example of the current exploitation of the cultural ideals of modesty for political purposes in modern states.

The modesty of women, and especially the veiling that is the most visible symbol of it, have also been appropriated and manipulated by modern nation-states in the Muslim world in their bids to declare either their modernity or their cultural authenticity. Although the early twentieth-century debates about veiling in countries such as Egypt or the subsequent laws mandating the removal of the veil and the wearing of "Western" dress in countries such as Iran under Reza Shah illustrate the powerful symbolic value of women's modesty as a sign of national cultural backwardness, the most far-reaching deployment of the discourse of modesty has been that undertaken by the Islamic Republic of Iran under the Shī'ī clergy led by Ayatollah Khomeini in 1979. Immediately, as a sign of the Islamization of society, veiling and the strict separation of the sexes, which some feminist critics call gender apartheid, was imposed. Championed in the name of resistance to the sexual objectification of women associated with the West, and couched in the language of protecting women and respecting them, regulation of women's modesty has sometimes been enforced by self-appointed moral police and zealously promoted by some clerics who express anxiety about the sexual chaos that the free movement of women in public might ignite. Above all, the fact that the modesty and veiling of women have in this case been directly tied to the preservation of a national morality, and to the assertion of an Islamic cultural authenticity that legitimizes this nation-state, distinguishes the state-imposed modesty discourses from family-based ones or even those emerging from grassroots piety movements in nominally secular states.

ISLAMIC PRESCRIPTION IN THE CONTEXT OF EAST AND WEST

There are historical precedents for the association of gendered discourses of modesty with Islamic religious virtues, creating a tradition on which those in modern states such as the Islamic Republic of Iran can draw. Religious reformers who have sought to bring their societies into line with what they consider proper Islamic behavior guided by the Shari'a have often focused on the modesty of women. In their prescriptive treatises on proper religious, legal, and ethical behavior, Muslim scholars condemn the lax modesty practices of women of their times and assert the importance of restricting women's movements in public as a means to preserve the separation of the sexes. A distinguishing feature of twentieth-century treatises is that the modesty of Muslim women is implicitly or explicitly cast in relationship to the immodesty and immorality of Western or non-Muslim women.

A comparison of treatises on women from different historical periods reveals the shift in the religious signification of modesty. A good example of an early document is the mid-fourteenth-century Egyptian treatise al-Madkhal by Ibn al-Hājj, analyzed by medievalist scholar Huda Lutfi. This treatise, which criticizes popular social and religious practices of Cairenes of the time, returns again and again to the threats to the social order represented by women's violations of modesty ideals as they dress in their finery to go out in public, mingling with shopkeepers, Sufi adepts, and donkey drivers who take them to visit shrines; as they wear clothing that reveals their bodies and are careless about veiling; and even as they watch processions from behind screened windows.

Five and a half centuries later, at the turn of the twentieth century and on another continent, the Deobandi reformer Maulana Ashraf 'Alī Thānawī's popular treatise on women called Bibishti Zewar (Heavenly ornaments) similarly condemns contemporary women's religious and cultural practices, but in his own region of what is now India. Within his didactic text, Thānawī urges women to be sober and modest, even while advocating, because of the colonial context and Hindu-Muslim rivalry, that they become literate and educated. Because his prescriptive text emphasizes the importance of women's education as part of their fulfillment of religious duties, however, the range of virtues encouraged in women encompasses much more than modesty. Where modesty is explicitly encouraged, as in the reporting of a ḥadīth to the effect that "modesty is intrinsic to faith and faith brings one to paradise," the moral commentary that follows warns: "You should never, however, be modest in regard to an act of religion. For example, women often do not perform the prayer during travel or during the days of a wedding. Such modesty is worse than immodesty" (Thānawī 1990, 214).

At the end of the twentieth century, conservative religious authorities such as Egypt's late Shaykh Muḥammad Mutawallī al-Sha'rāwī, who could disseminate their views through television and pamphlets, articulated the dangers of sexual mixing and urged on women both domesticity and what had since the 1970s come to be referred to as Islamic or modest dress – full length clothing and a new form of veiling that involved either covering the hair or both hair and face, except the eyes. Running through Sha'rāwī's promotion of a gendered Muslim morality is the negative foil of the West where women are treated as sex objects. To support his views, Sha'rāwī even alleged that the well-known sex symbol Marilyn Monroe had expressed weariness at the limelight and wished that she had been a housewife (Stowasser 1987, 269). The stereotype of Western consumer society as a place where women are sexualized and exploited is common in Muslim discourses about women. This stereotyping took its most influential form in the revolutionary writings and speeches of the Iranian intellectual Ali Shariati who, in the 1970s, accused local Iranian elite women of being "painted dolls." He warned, in his Fatima is Fatima, that women were the weak link in the Western capitalist infiltration and exploitation of the Third World.

These examples show how prescriptive treatises have changed drastically in form and content, even while authoritatively referring to religious sources. The incorporation of modesty discourses into what might be called cultural nationalist arguments, or arguments about the distinction between Islamic society and the West, has given greater weight to calls for changes, often restrictive, in women's freedom of movement and in the conduct of their social lives. These treatises enunciate the dangers of the social chaos that might result or has resulted from failures to enforce women's conformity to ideals of modesty; the latest threat is considered the threat to the integrity of Muslim nations or the Muslim community.

Many Muslim women share these men's concerns about the integrity of their national or religious communities and have proudly embraced the ideals of modesty and the veiling that is associated with it. At the same time, the invigoration of modesty discourse through its bolstering by religious authorities has presented formidable challenges to feminist activists. Those activists who work for an end to punishments of women for sexual infractions, including rape, or who advocate gender equality, more public and professional roles for women, and the non-reduction of women to their sexual identities, find that these goals are not easily reconciled with discourses of women's modesty. Most disturbing is that these goals are now susceptible to delegitimization by being associated with the West.

CONCLUSION

Women's modesty is a fundamental component of gendered moral systems in many societies across the Muslim world. It has been analyzed using different approaches: tracing textual sources, noting social functions, interpreting cultural meanings, and exploring phenomenologically how it is experienced. Although modesty sometimes finds its authoritative religious justification in the Qur'an and can be inspired by women's desires to be pious, it cannot in all its daily social practices be derived solely from religious texts. Linked in many societies to a cultural code of honor that determines the respect and reputation of families, it both pressures and motivates women. Such codes are found in non-Muslim as well as Muslim societies, most notably around the Mediterranean. The discourses of modesty have been transformed radically in the twentieth century as they have become integral to piety movements, appropriated and generalized by nationalist movements, and incorporated into modernizing reform movements, secular or Islamic. Some modern nation-states' enforcement through law and the police of women's modest behaviors, whether of sexual propriety and segregation or forms of dress, in the name of protecting public morality and the nation's health or asserting an Islamic identity in contradistinction to the West, has also fundamentally altered its significance as a moral system. It has also generated critiques by feminists within and outside these societies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments, Berkeley 1986, updated with new preface 2000.
- H. Afshar, Islam and feminisms, New York 1998.
- P. Bourdieu, Outline of a theory of practice, trans. R. Nice, Cambridge 1977.
- D. Kandiyoti, The end of empire. Islam, nationalism and women in Turkey, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 22-47.
- H. Lutfi, Manners and customs of fourteenth-century Cairene women, in N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 99-121.
- S. Mahmood, Feminist theory, embodiment, and the docile agent, in Cultural Anthropology 16 (2001), 202-36.
- A. Meneley, Tournaments of value, Toronto 1996.
- A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the State, Philadelphia 1991, 48-76.
- , Unveiled bodies – veiled discourses, in Feminist Studies 19 (1993), 487-518.
- A. Parla, The "honor" of the state, in Feminist Studies 27 (2001), 65-88.
- Begum Rokeya, Sultana's dream and selections from The secluded ones, ed. and trans. R. Jahan, New York 1988.
- B. F. Stowasser, Religious ideology, women, and the family. The Islamic paradigm, in B. F. Stowasser (ed.), The Islamic impulse, Washington, D.C. 1987, 262-96.

Maulana Ashraf 'Ali Thānawī, Perfecting women. Maulana Ashraf 'Ali Thanawi's Bihishti Zewar, trans. B. D. Metcalf, Berkeley 1990.

LILA ABU-LUGHOD

Central Asia and the Caucasus

"Men can do what they like, and so can Russian women, but not we Muslim women. We have to keep our legs and heads covered. It is a sin for us to expose them in the street. In the past, Muslim women veiled their faces but even today we cannot leave the house without permission and must not be alone with a man except our husbands, whom we must obey in all things." This statement from Tajikistan speaks to the way popular discourse shapes the construction of hierarchical differences between the sexes through the enforcement of female modesty practices.

Historically, details of expected behavior patterns differed considerably over this wide region. Prior to the Russian revolution, some communities, such as the Tatars, allowed women significant mobility, including access to education and jobs, while full seclusion was practiced in others, notably by the Sarts of the Ferghana Valley area, currently divided among Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan, with women wearing the all-covering cloak (faranja or paranji) and thick horsehair veil (chachvon) if they ventured outside. After the Russian conquest of Turkestan, some young women expressed a wish to be allowed to abandon seclusion, although those who actually did so were mostly lepers, prostitutes, and other social outcasts. The Tatar Jadidist movement and the young Bukharans spearheaded a movement toward modernization, especially of education and, to a certain extent, even of women's position. However, it took the Bolshevik attacks on Islamic traditions in the 1920s to produce real change, although for the following few decades some women continued to veil.

Eventually, Muslim communities adapted to the new situation by changing their definitions of female modesty practices to allow for coeducation and a mixed-sex workforce, thus permitting women to retain their respectability while wearing modern clothes and interacting with males in public. Nevertheless, many families, especially in rural Tajikistan, took their daughters out of school soon after the onset of puberty and never allowed their womenfolk to take a formal job. In Central Asia, a Sovietized form of traditional clothing, usually a dress worn over loose trousers and a small headscarf, came to symbolize modesty for Muslim women. In the most conservative areas, such as Khatlon province in Tajikistan, rural Gharimi women continued to be secluded and cover their faces with a white headscarf in the presence of strangers, right up to the outbreak of the civil war. Today the economic situation has forced them to abandon this. Many now shop in the market and some have even become the family breadwinners.

The struggle by Muslim peoples to retain their cultural identities within the Soviet Union was closely bound up with the construction of difference through gender identities, where female modesty played a major role. Today's endeavors by the newly independent states to devise legitimate national identities are similarly bound up in constructing ideals of national womanhood. Islamic modesty discourses play a significant role here, although the extent to which attempts are made to enforce them varies significantly, depending on social status, class, educational and income levels, and urban or rural residence. For instance, in Kyrgyzstan some young women have adapted their behavior as a response to such influences as soap operas, like Santa Barbara from the United States, and make great efforts to procure stylish Western garments. Although many young urban women in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan have begun doing the same, one can also see women there wearing hijāb.

In fact, Islam enjoins both men and women to observe modesty practices, by keeping their bodies discreetly covered and especially by behaving in such a way as to limit attraction between the sexes. Tajik males, however, rarely regulate their behavior according to such rules. On the contrary, in both urban and rural areas they frequently harass women in the street, often making it difficult for them to face leaving their homes without a male escort. They make particularly free with those wearing modern dress, thus pressuring women into assuming traditional garb. Both during the riots of 1990 and during the power struggles of 1992, young women wearing modern dress were assaulted and raped, supposedly as a way of enforcing Islamic practices. In Kyrgyzstan in the late 1990s, women whose behavior was judged incompatible with such practices were beaten (Handrahan 2001, 477). Since the end of the Soviet Union, similar incidents have occurred in other parts of this region.

Thus, contemporary Islamic discourses, in Central Asia and the Caucasus alike, support the female adoption of explicit practices of modesty expressed both in dress and demeanor. In the most conservative circles, the latter goes beyond promoting the roles of wife and mother to include encouraging women to retire from wage labor, thus allowing men greater access to economic resources in this difficult period. In general, modesty discourses contradict the legal equality expressed in national constitutions, appearing to aim at restoring traditional pre-revolutionary gender identities privileging male domination.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Acar and A. Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000.
- L. Handrahan, Gender and ethnicity in the transitional democracy of Kyrgyzstan, in Central Asian Survey 20:4 (2001), 467–96.
- C. Harris, Women of the sedentary population of Russian Turkestan through the eyes of Western travellers, in Central Asian Survey 15:1 (1996), 75–95.
- , Coping with daily life in post-Soviet Tajikistan. The Gharimi villages of Khatlon Province, in Central Asian Survey 17:4 (1998), 655–71.
- , Control and subversion. Gender relations in Tajikistan, London 2004.
- M. Kamp, Unveiling Uzbek women. Liberation, representation, and discourse, 1906–1929, Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago 1998.
- G. Massell, The surrogate proletariat. Muslim women and revolutionary strategies in Soviet Central Asia 1919–1929, Princeton, N.J. 1974.
- N. Tohidi, The intersection of gender, ethnicity and Islam in Soviet and Post-Soviet Azerbaijan, in Nationalities Papers 25:1 (1997), 147–67.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva and E. Turgumbekova, The daughters of Amazons. Voices from Central Asia, Lahore 1996.

COLETTE HARRIS

Iran and Afghanistan

In Afghanistan and Iran contemporary Muslim women live under restrictive civil/secular and Islamic Shari'a law that regulates their appearance. They struggle to define themselves, their social hierarchy, status, and modesty in economic, political, and religious spheres of influence when and where their appearance is regulated. The two countries share a geographic border and links to a Persian historical and linguistic past. There are seemingly many shared similarities as well as differences that circumscribe Muslim women's daily lives. Consequently, to be female, Muslim, and either Afghan or Iranian is an identity frequently visually essentialized by wearing head coverings (hijāb) and observing modesty (hayā).

According to Muslim and non-Muslim scholars, the concept of hijāb generally in popular Islamic culture is understood in two specific forms. Often, hijāb is considered as an item of clothing worn as concealment by women as a religious obligation under Islam. More frequently, hijāb is regarded as various styles of head and/or body coverings adopted within and across cultures where Islam is practiced (Shirazi 2000, 115). However, historically the concept of hijāb is a much broader concept that refers to the act of covering and the covering practices of both Muslim men and women (El Guindi 1999). The concept of hijāb, then, is not only an item of dress that has evolved over time as a compulsory practice for Islamization policies but more specifically an item of dress that more often defines women as female.

Hayāʾ refers to the concept of modesty that governs both Muslim men's and women's dress (Daly 2000). Hayāʾ prescriptions vary according to religiosity and personal, social, and cultural contexts. Some of these prescriptions concern the degree of cover or exposure of the body; the area of the body covered; the proximity of the clothing in relation to the body; the opacity or transparency of textile qualities; the public or private nature of a social situation; the prayer versus non-prayer times of day; and the individuals present, their gender, familial relationship, nationality, and religion. An orthodox individual may adhere strictly to these prescriptions and wear a hijāb. In contrast, the state may impose the wearing of a specific style of hijāb and how it must be worn. In Iran since the early 1980s the Office of Guidance has imposed on women the compulsory hijāb (Shirazi 2000, 116). Similarly, during the 1990s under the rule of the Taliban in Afghanistan the most extreme hijāb restrictions were imposed on women by the Department of Vice and Virtue. Afghan women were denied their human rights based on how they covered or revealed their body when seen in a public social context; wearing or not wearing a head covering, the chaadaree, was not a choice (Skaine 2000).

Though many Muslim men and women regardless of culture or ethnic affiliation dress according to an enculturated understanding of hayāʾ, many Muslims may not actually be cognizant of this Arabic term and merely maintain that "we are dressing as proper Muslims out of respect for our religion and our families." In Islamic states such as Afghanistan and Iran, it is unclear whether modesty is a self-regulated concept or an institutionalized value that governs the modesty of (primarily) women (Nakanishi 1998).

Muslim women's head coverings are not the central focus of most discourses of their lives but in many instances head coverings are implicated in questions about their rights as citizens. Whether historical, religious, generational, political, or gender specific explanations are given, the preoccupation with women's hijāb and hayāʾ is more than ambivalence toward their meaning and use in daily and special occasion wear. They have become sites of compliance as well as resistance for women defining their lives.

Afghan women wear two different types of head coverings. Both may be considered hijāb and both are considered an expression of hayāʾ. For over a century, Afghan male politicians and religious clerics have debated the form, style, and other aesthetic, social, and moral dimensions of women's head coverings as well as women's rights. The most common are the chaadar and the chaadaree (Daly 1999). The chaadar is a two-dimensional, square or rectangular shaped garment, analogous to the Western notion of a scarf or shawl. Though the style of wearing varies, typically a chaadar covers the head including the hair, neck and shoulders of the wearer and protects these parts of the body from view. It is considered a partial head covering, scarf, or shawl worn as part of an ensemble. It is worn in both private and public contexts and it is subject to style variations and personal aesthetic preferences. In contrast, the chaadaree is a three dimensional vertically-paneled, seamed, and pleated garment that encompasses and encloses the entire body of the wearer, in order to obscure her from view. It is considered a "full veil" and is worn over a woman's entire ordinary clothing, including a chaadar. A rectangular area of open-work embroidery covers the eyes and provides limited vision for the wearer as well as minimal vision by the observer of the wearer. It is worn primarily in public contexts outside the home.

Since the turn of the twentieth century Iranian women's head covering practices and notions of modesty have likewise been regulated by Iranian men. However, proactive Iranian women have manipulated their head coverings to communicate acceptance as well as resistance to political and religious reform movements in Iran (Baker 1997). In Iran, both individual choice and collective consensus have existed simultaneously for decades. But similar to the Afghan women's chaadar, an Iranian woman wears "a large scarf that covers the hair, shoulders and neck," the rusari, and like the Afghan woman's chaadaree, the Iranian rupush is "a loose outer garment that flows down the knees and covers the arms" (Shirazi 2001, 1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Baker, Politics of dress. The dress reform laws of 1920/30s Iran, in N. Lindisfarne-Tapper and B. Ingham (eds.), Languages of dress in the Middle East, Richmond, Surrey 1997, 178-92.
- M. Daly, The paarda expression of hejaab among Afghan - women in a non-Muslim community, in L. B. Arthur (ed.), Religion, dress and the body, Oxford 1999, 147–62.

- , The Afghan woman's chadaree. An evocative religious expression?, in L. B. Arthur (ed.), Undressing religion. Commitment and conversion from a cross-cultural perspective, Oxford 2000, 131–46.
- F. El Guindi, Veil. Modesty, privacy and resistance, Oxford 1999.
- N. Lindisfarne-Tapper and B. Ingham (eds.), Languages of dress in the Middle East, Richmond, Surrey 1997.
- H. Nakanishi, Power, ideology, and women's consciousness in postrevolutionary Iran, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 83–100.
- F. Shirazi, Islamic religion and women's dress code. The Islamic Republic of Iran, in L. B. Arthur, Undressing religion. Commitment and conversion from a cross-cultural perspective, Oxford 2000, 113–30.
- , The veil unveiled. The hijab in modern culture, Gainesville, Fla. 2001.
- R. Skain, The women of Afghanistan under the Taliban, Jefferson, N.C. 2002.

MARY-CATHERINE DALY

The Ottoman Empire

Over the course of its history, the Ottoman Empire incorporated religiously and ethnically diverse populations that held varying beliefs about proper conduct between men and women. This entry focuses largely on official discourse regarding modesty as directed at elite Ottoman women in the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries, with an emphasis on normative discourse regarding gender segregation and standards of dress. It also emphasizes how expectations of gendered behavior – especially the seclusion and veiling of women – differentially affected women according to status and class.

The Ottoman tribe was one of a number of nomadic pastoralist Turkish tribes that migrated from Central Asia into the lands of the 'Abbāsīd and Byzantine Empires beginning in the twelfth century. Central Asian Turkish tribes included women in positions of political and military power and maintained relatively egalitarian public roles for men and women compared to those in the imperial states of the Near East. Women's involvement in public activities persisted as Turkish tribes gained dominance in Anatolia. The Muslim traveler and chronicler Ibn Baṭṭūta, who visited Ottoman territory during the reign of Orhan I (ca. 1324–62), especially remarked on the fact that in general “among the Turks and the Tatars their wives enjoy a very high position.”

As the Ottomans consolidated power in Anatolia and surrounding areas, however, Turkish culture gradually incorporated some of the gender patterns of the sedentary 'Abbāsīds and Byzantines, which emphasized exclusive male succession, and a male administration and military. An ethic that removed elite women from both positions of power and the public sphere gradually became so dominant that by the sixteenth century, women of the Ottoman court were strictly veiled and segregated in the closely guarded imperial harem. Gender segregation was also practiced by the 'ulamā', though less formal segregation was the norm among lower status families.

Political discourse about modesty reinforced strict gender segregation as various officials and members of the 'ulamā' publicly objected to any involvement of royal women in political activities. Various scholars throughout Muslim history cited women's supposedly inferior intellectual or moral capacity as the basis for women's exclusion from politics, while others saw women's political activity as contrary to divine law. In 1599, for example, Mufti Şun' Allāh issued a written criticism of women's influence in the Ottoman court, claiming that such involvement was an abuse of Sharī'a. To bolster his argument, Şun' Allāh drew on a popular ḥadīth, in which the Prophet Muḥammad proclaims, “A people who entrusts its affairs to a woman will never know prosperity.” While Şun' Allāh's criticisms of politically active women may have been a play for power in the face of court women who were agitating against him, he was following a long tradition in which questions of female modesty served as a mechanism that kept royal women from becoming overly involved in politics and in general limited women's power. Indeed, Şun' Allāh's statement about the segregation of the genders echoes earlier pronouncements by religious officials such as the sixteenth-century Mufti Kemalpaşazade, and scholars such as Birgivi Mehmed Efendi (d. 1573) and Ibn al-Ḥajj, all of whom decried the involvement of royal women in politics.

The modesty discourse was directed at the power exercised by royal women, but official statements also called for the exclusion of all women from the public sphere. Şun' Allāh declared that no women should walk among men in the markets, claiming that such mixing of men and women was a harmful innovation and an abuse of Sharī'a. Kemalpaşazade likened the socializing of unrelated men and women to cheating in the marketplace and selling alcohol, while the influential 'ālim Birgivi Mehmed Efendi devoted a significant portion of his work Tarikat-ı Muhammediye to arguments in favor of strict gender segregation as a means of establishing the ideal society.

For these officials and other elites, the control of women was a metaphor for social order. During periods of rapid social and political change, as occurred in the late sixteenth-century Ottoman Empire, modesty discourse reflected a fear of those changes by focusing on threats to basic social categories (for example, male versus female) and moral norms (gender roles and conduct). A prominent idea among Islamic jurists was that when “proper” gender roles are reconstituted and strictly maintained, society becomes harmonious. As Ottoman historian Leslie Peirce has argued, placing restrictions on subordinate populations, such as women, is certainly an easy way for the government to assert authority in times of anxiety and change. Thus Şun‘ Allāh’s criticism of the public and political activities of women can also be seen as an expression of concern for what he and others perceived to be an increasingly chaotic society.

The Ottoman government in general had a vested interest in dictating the place and appearance (type of clothing) permitted to women. Indeed, from the sixteenth until the twentieth century, the Ottoman state authorities regularly issued decrees (*firman*s) defining what women may or may not wear, sometimes describing allowable women’s clothing in great detail. From the sixteenth to the twentieth century, the Divine Porte frequently issued *firman*s that specified the permissible color and thickness of a woman’s coat (ferce), the material that could be used for lining a ferce, and the acceptable length of veils and scarves. The appearance of the female body was consistently an issue of imperial import.

It would of course be a mistake to assume that modesty discourse calling for restrictions on women’s power and movement reflected the actual experiences of women themselves. Women did have the means to exercise influence in politics and society, thus provoking reactions from Mufti Şun‘ Allāh and others. For example, the Valide Sultan, the mother of the sultan, exercised a great deal of power over her son’s various concubines within the harem, and often had considerable influence over her son’s court and politics, especially after the reign of Süleyman the Magnificent (1520–66). Ottoman authorities often recognized that it was the normal role of the Valide Sultan to use political manipulations to assist her son in his ascension to the throne. Furthermore, when a sultan was too young or less than fully competent at the time of ascension (as happened six times during the first half of the seventeenth century), the Valide Sultan could act as virtual regent as long as necessary. Beyond the exercise of power, rules governing gender segregation were suspended under special circumstances, such as during royal pageants or when royal and elite women attended mosque teaching sessions and went to pray at tombs. Finally, seclusion practices became less strict for women past child-bearing age. Ebu’s-su’ud Efendi (Abū al-Sa’ūd), a jurist and mufti under Süleyman the Magnificent, declared that older women were free to join Friday mosque services from which young women were barred.

While some modesty discourse was directed at all women, most concerned elite women only, since they were the ones who followed the strictest modesty practices. In fact, segregation and veiling were signs of class, so that these practices became more stringent as one moved up the social ladder. Poorer women in both urban and rural settings regularly participated in public life, and were frequently involved in some economic enterprises. For example, agricultural labor among the rural poor required full participation of all able-bodied family members and women regularly worked in fields in the presence of men and without heavy veiling. Lower-class women also worked at certain jobs, such as spinning yarn or preparing dough. Low status women would provide services and goods to elite women sequestered in harems, performing such tasks as acquiring items, ferrying messages, and acting as midwives or entertainers. These poorer women served as a link between the elite women of the harem and the outside world, so that the ability to segregate upper-class women depended on the availability of poorer women who were relatively free to move in public space. Still, gender segregation and modest dress requirements did exist to some extent in the lower classes as well, since women were more restricted in their public activities than men. In periods of social turmoil, officials sometimes attempted to restrict further the public appearance of all women, but only with partial success. At almost all times, non-elite men and women interacted in the public sphere much more than did elite men and women.

In essence, notions of modesty in the Ottoman Empire of the Golden Age (sixteenth century) served not only to define gender roles, but were an idiom through which power and class distinctions were demarcated. The ability – or “luxury” – to segregate women was limited to the ruling and elite classes, so that economic advantage and political power were directly linked to the power to control women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Mehmet Birgivi Efendi, Tarikat-ı Muhammediye, trans. C. Yıldırım, Istanbul 1981.

- O. Bon, The sultan's seraglio. An intimate portrait of life at the Ottoman court, trans. R. Withers, London 1996 (first published ca. 1650).
- al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, N.p., 1378/1958–9, 4:376ff.
- M. E. Düzdağ (ed.), Seyhülislām Ebusuud Efendi fetvaları ışığında 16. asır Türk hayatı, Istanbul 1983.
- Ibn Baṭṭūta, The travels of Ibn Baṭṭūta, A.D. 1325–1354, trans. with revisions and notes from the Arabic text edited by C. Defrémery and B. R. Sanguinetti, by H. A. R. Gibb, Cambridge 1962.
- Şemseddin Ahmed Kemalpaşazade, Fetava, Süleymaniye Library, MS, Dar ul-Mesnevi 118.
- Naşir al-Dīn Tūsī, The Nasirean ethics, trans. G. M. Wickens, London 1964.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of the modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- M. A. Fay, Women and waqf. Property, power, and the domain of gender in eighteenth-century Egypt, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 28–47.
- G. Goodwin, The private world of Ottoman women, London 1997.
- H. İnalcık, The Ottoman Empire. The classical age 1300–1600, trans. C. Imber and N. Itzkowitz, London 1973.
- G. Nashat and J. E. Tucker, Women in the Middle East and North Africa. Restoring women to history, Bloomington, Ind. 1999.
- L. P. Peirce, The imperial harem. Women and sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, New York 1993.
- , Seniority, sexuality, and social order. The vocabulary of gender in early modern Ottoman society, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 169–96.
- N. Şeni, Fashion and women's clothing in the satirical press of Istanbul at the end of the 19th century, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society, London 1995, 25–45.
- S. J. Shaw, History of the Ottoman Empire and modern Turkey, 1, Empire of the Gazis, Cambridge 1976.
- J. E. Tucker, Gender and Islamic history, Washington, D.C. 1993.

KIM SHIVELY

South Asia

The material form of Muslim women's modesty in South Asia, appearance, is frequently defined and described politically with respect to powerful cultural Indian and Islamic influences on dress (Tarlo 1996). Though Muslim women living in Bangladesh, India, Kashmir, and Pakistan share a similar regional socioeconomic and geopolitical history their "Muslimness" is often juxtaposed with the Hindu religion, the predominant religion of India. Since the partition of India, Muslim women's identity in nationalist struggles of Bangladesh, Pakistan, and more recently in Kashmir has been a subtle social construction and personification of modesty.

Religion and gender in India are politicized in the public arena to differentiate Muslim and Hindu communities and their power (Shahida 1990). The politicization of Islam and Hinduism is an important issue that circumscribes traditional daily life practices in general and the lives of Muslim women in particular. Muslim women regardless of socioeconomic status and religiosity suffer dual minority status not only as members of the minority Muslim community but also as females who are relegated to minority status, as are other women in India regardless of religious orientation (Lateef 1998). Within this sociopolitical climate, for the purpose of solidarity there is pressure within the Muslim community for both men and women to conform to Islamic standards for gender, dress, modesty, and decorum. Simultaneously, there is also pressure from the Hindu community for minority Muslim women as females to adopt female Indian cultural codes of conduct, including an understanding of modesty and aesthetics.

Like Muslim women elsewhere, South Asian Muslim women's modesty can be understood and socially constructed through the concepts of ḥijāb, ḥaya', and purdah. Regional, national, and ethnic variations exist cross-culturally but often local customs defer to the Islamic Middle East (El Guindi 1999). In addition, South Asian women's modesty parallels Persian and Afghan women's expressions and practices (Daly 1999). Typically, for Muslim men and women, ḥijāb is understood as the act or process of covering specific parts of the body. For women in particular, ḥijāb is also an actual covering that conceals varying degrees of the head, shoulders, and upper body. Hijāb practices are presumed to be governed primarily by the Islamic concept of modesty known as ḥaya'. Observant Muslims may choose to follow ḥaya' by wearing an actual garment such as a ḥijāb in a local or prescribed cultural regional manner like the Pakistani dupatta (head covering, long rectangular thin scarf). Purdah is a multi-dimensional concept of spatial and psychological gender separation that both Muslim and Hindu women may observe (Jeffery 1979, Papanek 1973). A family may designate an actual space within the confines of the domestic environment for purdah, or similar to ḥijāb, designate a covering that conceals the female wearer from potential male observers, especially unrelated males. Additional variations, interpretations, and subtleties of these three concepts exist throughout the South Asian subcontinent.

In contrast to Muslim women living in India, the identity of Bangladeshi women has been in part constructed and conflated with issues of nationality, ethnicity, and economics (Kabeer 1994, Hashmi 2000). Since the birth of Bangladesh in 1971, economic development, nationhood, Islamic identity, and gender relations have been intertwined (Siddiqi 1998). Though living in a predominantly Muslim state, women struggle with an increasingly politicized identity, which extends to their public identity in the work environment and their dress. Though “political Islam is conventionally associated with a highly visible code of conduct for women, especially in the realm of dress and comportment and in family relations, . . . the particular conditions under which Islamization has been sponsored by Bangladesh, by an impoverished state confronted with multiple sources of foreign aid and an increasing reliance on women’s labor, have ensured that the state leaves untouched issues regarding women’s deportment, dress, and working conditions” (Siddiqi 1998, 205–27). Having formerly lived among the Hindu majority in India, Bangladeshi women continue to observe Hindu practices of female seclusion or purdah to safeguard their honor. Bangladeshi women wear head coverings as a comparable and yet portable expression of seclusion while in public, which to a degree circumvents traditional Muslim and cultural customs of the region. Seemingly constrained Bangladeshi Muslim women have redefined former social practices such as purdah with contemporary interpretations of their social reality.

Similar to Indian and Bangladeshi Muslim women, Kashmiri women’s identity and modesty continues to be politicized in the pursuit of state sovereignty. India and Pakistan vie for economic and political control of Kashmir and its people. Islamic influence in Kashmir is appreciated in the revival of the material culture and social customs that resonate with the Muslim experience of Afghans, Pakistanis, and Persians. Kashmiri Muslim women’s modesty or ḥayāʾ as ḥijāb and purdah is visually, regionally, and traditionally expressed in the form of the Kashmiri shawl. Though Kashmiri shawls communicate a strong historic and aesthetic weaving and embroidery tradition, more recently the wearing of a shawl expresses religious and political sentiments.

Pakistani women participate in a range of formal and informal educational opportunities and consequently a range of visual appearances are present in private and public contexts. This reflects the varying individual and familial acknowledgment of socioeconomic and religious realities and their experiences. Since the partition of India, Pakistani women participate in the public sphere in demanding positions in political, educational, and economie spheres of influence. Never without their dupattas, Pakistani women appear “unveiled and veiled” in all their permutations, side by side in major cities (Haeri 2002, 8). Haeri reports that “unlike Iranian women, Pakistani women are not mandated by the state to veil.” They wear the modest yet beautifully color-coordinated two-piece suit, known as shalwar kameez, which is almost always accompanied by a dupatta. In Pakistan, women’s attire combines modesty with beauty, while allowing for individual taste and financial resources to improvise upon it.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Bodman and N. Tohid (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998.
- M. Daly, Pakistani dress, Paper presented at Ars Textrina, Madison, Wis. 1998.
- F. El Guindi, Veil. Modesty, privacy and resistance, Oxford 1999.
- C. F. El-Solh and J. Mabro (eds.), Muslim women’s choices. Religious belief and social reality, Oxford 1994.
- S. Haeri, No shame for the sun. Lives of professional Pakistani women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
- T. Hashmi, Women and Islam in Bangladesh. Beyond subjection and tyranny, New York 2000.
- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1979.
- N. Kabeer, Women’s labour in the Bangladesh garment industry. Choice and constraints, in C. F. El-Solh and J. Mabro (eds.), Muslim women’s choices. Religious belief and social reality, Oxford 1994, 164–83.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. A minority within a minority, in H. Bodman and N. Tohid (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 251–73.
- H. Papanek, Purdah. Separate worlds and symbolic shelter, in Comparative Studies in Society and History 15:3 (June 1973), 289–325.
- L. Shahida, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities, New Delhi 1990.
- D. Siddiqi, Taslima Nasreen and others. The contest over gender in Bangladesh, in H. Bodman and N. Tohid (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 205–28.
- E. Tarlo, Clothing matters, Chicago 1996.

MARY-CATHERINE DALY

Sub-Saharan Africa: Somali Society

Somali women’s identity, their appearance in general and their modesty in particular, provides a common unifying cultural and religious focus in their life. In Somalia, women’s identity is closely linked to patrilineal descent groups, clan, and lineage relationships as well as extended and nuclear family units rather than a unified Somali national identity (Luling 2002, 223). In part this lack of national identity for both men and women may be attributed to Somalia's recent independence from the United Kingdom and Italy in the early 1960s (Abdullahi 2001). Subsequently, with the collapse of the Somali government, by the 1990s intra- and inter-clan fighting dominated and fragmented the country (Lewis 2002). As a result, many Somali men and women continue to live in disrupted and displaced families within Somalia as well as in diaspora resettlement communities throughout the world (Daly 2002).

Somali women's identity and appearance are closely linked to several Islamic concepts: ḥayā', the Islamic concept of modesty and ḥijāb, Islamic head coverings and their practices. These concepts are prevalent in several distinctive Somali women's dress choices. Each choice emphasizes a slightly different idealized view of the world: cultural, Islamic, and Western orientations (Daly 2000).

"Somalis were among the first people to become converted to Islam, beginning in about the ninth century of the common era . . . Islam is deeply embedded in their culture and is an essential part of their identity" (Luling 2002, 225). During the period prior to independence, geography and trade relationships delineated pastoral rural from urban life experiences of women. Women's dress reflected the indigenous materials available to them or those items acquired through trade (Akou 2001, Loughran et al. 1986). However, stereotypically, traditional Somali women's dress includes a diric (dress), garbarsar (head covering), and masar (scarf). Though one might presume that Somali women dressed modestly according to Islamic prescriptions for ḥayā' and ḥijāb, neither term was significantly used by Somalis until the civil war period of the 1990s. Consequently, Somalis did not distinguish between Somali cultural or Somali Muslim dress or modesty. Although they are Muslim, most Somali women have never worn the face veil (Luling 2002, 225), but do wear head coverings and scarves.

From independence in 1960 until the Djibouti Peace Conference of 2000, civil conflict between clans over scarce resources prevented a unified Somali national identity. During the civil war, Somalis witnessed the torture and killing of family members, friends, and others (Aman 1994). In response to these dire circumstances many Somali men and women invoked Islam in both the private and public arenas of life presumably to help solve the economic, political, and social problems of the country. Somali women may have intuitively chosen to dress more modestly to ensure their physical and psychological well-being (Daly 2001). Today, Somali women choose a style of dress that communicates their commitment to Islam and its meaning in everyday life to transcend the cultural politics of nationality. For women, this choice replaces the cultural garbarsar and masar with the Islamic khimar or jilhabib, both considered ḥijāb head coverings.

Though currently most Somali women would acknowledge that all forms of head coverings are potentially ḥayā' inspired and forms of ḥijāb, the khimar and jilhabib head covering styles in particular are more modest expressions of ḥayā' and Islamic wear (Daly 2002). In both Somalia and the diaspora, women report that they began wearing the jilhabib when civil war escalated and they fled Somalia to live in interim refugee camps. Ḥayā', wearing ḥijāb, though ostensibly for religious reasons, also became a political statement. Some Somalis "feel that Islam is the solution to years of political chaos, and have consciously made adjustments to their behavior and dress in hopes of creating a new Somalia" (McGowan 1999, 208).

Like other Muslim women, Somali women's appearance and their modesty is not static but rather a dynamic amalgam of cultural, Islamic, and Western influences. A Somali woman dresses for the occasion emphasizing the personal, social, and cultural values that are appropriate. During weddings, though modesty is a consideration, cultural aesthetics dominate and traditional hand-woven fabrics are used. Throughout Ramadan special attention is given to more modest ensembles, and the most colorful outfits are brought out for the Eid celebrations. Western cut and sewn garments, such as skirts, blouses, dresses, and pants, though seemingly incongruent, do coordinate with ḥayā' and ḥijāb styles and are deemed modest.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Abdullahi, Culture and customs of Somalia, Westport, Conn. 2001.
- H. Akou, Rethinking "fashion." The case of Somali women's dress in Minneapolis-St. Paul as an evaluation of Herbert Blumer's theory on fashion, M.A. thesis, University of Minneapolis 2001.
- A. Aman, Aman. The story of a Somali girl, New York, N.Y. 1994.
- M. Daly, Fouzia Mohamed (affidavit), Minneapolis, Minn. 2000.
- , Dress and legal issues of Somali refugees in Minnesota, paper presented at the Annual Meeting of the International Textile and Apparel Association, Kansas City, Mo. November 2001.
- , Somali, Muslim, American. Women's dress in a diaspora community, paper presented at the 45th Meeting of the African Studies Association, Washington, D.C. 2002.
- I. Lewis, A modern history of the Somali. Nation and state in the Horn of Africa, Oxford 2002.
- K. Loughran, L. Loughran, J. Johnson, and S. Samatar (eds.), Somalia in word and image, Washington, D.C. 1986.

- V. Luling, The Somali of the Horn of Africa, in R. Hitchcock and J. Osborn (eds.), Endangered peoples of Africa and the Middle East. Struggles to survive and thrive, Westport, Conn. 2002, 219–34.
- B. McGowan, Muslims in the diaspora. The Somali communities of London and Toronto, Toronto 1999.

MARY-CATHERINE DALY

Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa

Modesty practices are closely related to regionally and historically variable, discursive constructions of propriety and of men and women as embodied sexual beings. Modesty discourses impinge upon and reflect women's and men's respective agentive capacities, capacities that are often class- and age-specific. Most local understandings of modesty refer to the idea that an individual should acquire certain emotional and cognitive capacities to be able spontaneously to distinguish between "shameful" and "decent" acts. Key terms, such as "shame," "restraint," and "patience" are rendered in local vernaculars that sometimes reveal an Arabic origin. Most understandings see modesty as an embodied capacity for self-restraint and control that can be visibly enacted and asserted as a virtue, and that simultaneously constitutes a way of practicing virtue.

Modesty standards, the ways they are defined and negotiated through locally variable notions of respect, honor, and shame, form part of a broader discursive system through which gender relations and other social hierarchies are defined. The latter, based primarily on age and rank difference, feed back into the constructions of moral personhood and reputation. Male modesty practices reveal a concern with the assertion of status among equals and within a hierarchical social order. Gender difference tends to be constructed as a matter of men's and women's differential need for protection. Women are seen as being essentially defined by their bodily constitution. This makes them more vulnerable to moral and physical assault, yet also turns them into a potential threat to the social and moral order associated with men.

Most of the (comparatively scarce) historical and ethnographic documentation on modesty discourses in Muslim West Africa deals with constructions of moral personhood that are related to Sufi orders (turuq). In northern Nigeria and Senegal, modesty, as a capacity and an act of virtue, is especially valued in aristocratic women, particularly in the daughters, sisters, and wives of Sufi leaders. Practicing modesty augments the prestige these women enjoy on the basis of their genealogical descent and, occasionally, their scholarly erudition. The scholarly preoccupation with Sufi-based Islam in West Africa has sometimes led to the assumption that Sufi-related modesty practices are representative of constructions of moral and social difference in West African Muslim societies. There is, however, considerable historical and regional variation in the forms and social effects of modesty discourses. The discourses emerge at the shifting intersections between particular regional histories and broader, sometimes global, processes. Modesty practices are interrelated with kinship structures and with the ways these and other social institutions express regionally varying constructions of gender. Historical reconfigurations of modesty standards are often related to political economic transformations which affect women's opportunities for public intervention and their capacities to create themselves as "valuable persons" by means of income generating activities or gift exchange. Contemporary discursive constructions of modesty reveal traces of the changing intertwining of socio-economic and gender inequalities in nineteenth-century politics and under colonial and postcolonial rule. They mirror the social standing of religious and political authorities who articulate particular readings of Islamic normative systems. The discourses thus expose different historical trajectories of the institutionalization of Islamic moral standards and of their intermingling with non-Islamic notions of propriety.

Late colonial rule witnessed the invigoration of debates on female virtue in many territories of West Africa. These debates revealed that earlier certainties about gender-specific divisions of labor and realms of political intervention were unsettled. Notions of female modesty gained a particular salience insofar as they defined, and were in turn shaped by, the domestic and public activities in which women could legitimately engage. Starting in the mid-1970s, in an atmosphere of widespread disillusionment with the promises of political independence, new debates on cultural authenticity and political autonomy emerged which focused on women's embodied propriety. Since then, female modesty has been of key significance in public controversies over the relationship between national and religious identities and over the normative foundations of the political community. Rather than reflecting a neat divide between secularist and so-called Islamist viewpoints, the controversies reveal an often fierce competition among protagonists of various Islamic viewpoints.

Current modesty discourses highlight ideals of female domesticity; they are closely related to the emergence of stricter dress conventions and practices of female seclusion. In the past, female domesticity occasionally served as a marker of high status (for example, among aristocratic families of the Sokoto Caliphate of Northern Nigeria and, after the 1940s, in Niger, Senegal, Guinea, and Mali among traders with business ties to the Arabic-speaking world). Starting in the 1980s, definitions of female modesty qua domesticity gained currency among broader segments of the urban population, in an economic situation in which lower-class women had to assume greater financial responsibility for the family. To husbands and fathers, keeping a woman at home indicates their ongoing capacity to provide for their family and to maintain control over women and juniors. Thus, the rejuvenation of discourses on female propriety can be understood in the light of recent transformations in domestic economies that are a consequence of neoliberal structural adjustment programs since the mid-1980s. The new ideal of female domesticity contrasts curiously with the significance that protagonists of an Islamic moral reform attribute to women's public appearance. In their view, women's public enactment of modesty is constitutive of the new moral order on which the political community should be based.

Several processes are at the origin of the seemingly contradictory tension between female domesticity as a status marker and the new emphasis on women's public enactment of Islamic virtue. Over the past 20 years, rank and economic differences among women have often been exacerbated, particularly in urban areas. Women of diverse socio-economic standing reflect on and negotiate their differential capacities for moral self-realization by conveying their often conflicting views on propriety. The fact that women contribute substantively to the discursive construction of female modesty as the cornerstone of different moral and political communities also needs to be related to emergent forms of female mutual support groups, and to the spread of informal educational institutions and activities which often combine old and new paradigms of religious and secular knowledge acquisition. Finally, political liberalization in the late 1980s in some West African countries made possible the emergence of a plural civil society and the proliferation of media technologies which allow for a decentralized appropriation of media products. All these developments made women's public interventions more conceivable and feasible, but also threatened conventional views of women as guardians of family continuity.

The new stress on women's public enactment of propriety needs to be read in the light of this paradoxical development. Proponents of an Islamic revival identify female dress practices as a primary strategy for enacting virtue and for inviting others to follow their call for moral reform. The choice of decent attire entails a set of polysemic, publicly delivered statements about the relationship between political and personal subjectivity, and about the importance of individual virtue to the normative foundations of the political community. In this, current Islamic revivalist trends articulate through their modesty practices a particular vision of why and how the personal is political.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Cooper, Marriage in Maradi. Gender and culture in a Hausa society in Niger, 1900-1989, Portsmouth, N.H. 1997.
- C. Coulon, Women, Islam, and Baraka, in D. Cruise O'Brien and C. Coulon (eds.), Charisma and brotherhood in Africa, Oxford 1988, 113-34.
- E. Evers Rosander, Women and muridism in Senegal. The case of the Mam Diarra Bouso Daira in Mbacké, in K. Ask and M. Tjomsland (eds.), Women and Islamization. Contemporary dimensions of discourse on gender relations, Oxford 1998, 147-76.
- B. B. Mack and J. Boyd, One woman's jihad. Nana Asma'u, scholar and scribe, Bloomington, Ind. 2000.
- D. Schulz, Political factions, ideological fictions. The controversy over the reform of family law in democratic Mali, in Islamic Law and Society 10 (2003), 132-64.

DOROTHEA SCHULZ

Motherhood

Arab States

Mother (umm) and motherhood (umūma) are highly celebrated in Arab proverbs, poetry, folk-songs, fairy tales, and religious texts. These highlight the central role of the mother in raising children, managing the household, and producing and reproducing families, communities, and nations. They also highlight how mothers are to be loved, honored, and respected by their children. While rarely explored in any explicit way, various studies indicate some interesting variations based on age, gender, and social class in defining motherhood. Still, across all Arab societies, bearing and rearing children are central to notions of femininity and womanhood (Eickelman 1984, Inhorn 1994, Peteet 1997). From an early age, young girls are taught about the centrality of children in a woman's life and girls often actively participate in feeding and taking care of younger siblings. So important is motherhood that most studies take it for granted and rarely go beyond descriptive accounts of the roles of mothers in taking care of their families and children (Rugh 1997, Wikan 1996). Interestingly enough, studies of infertility and women's struggle to conceive a child teach us the most about the emotional value of motherhood and the powerful meanings that society invests in mothering. The equation between motherhood and femininity is clearly manifested in how a woman who cannot conceive and become a mother is viewed as dhakar or male (Inhorn 1994).

Bearing children is socially marked and celebrated in almost all Arab societies. A new mother is visited by neighbors and relatives and is usually given gifts (such as jewelry, money, and new clothes for her and the newborn). Special drinks and sweets are offered to the visitors. A new mother is also offered foods rich in protein and is helped by family members and neighbors in doing household chores. She is encouraged verbally and through some taboos (such as restrictions on her movement and leaving the home for up to 40 days after the delivery) to rest and sleep as much as possible. In many Arab countries, the new status of the mother and the importance of a male child are reflected in the custom of addressing a woman after the name of her first-born male child (for example Umm Aḥmad if the name of her first son is Aḥmad).

Unlike common negative images of the "step-mother" (zawāj al-āb) and mothers-in-law, many sociological and anthropological studies present a vivid view of the mother as selfless and totally devoted to her children. The strong emotional bonds between mother and child are often contrasted to the more formal relationship that exists between the father and his children. A mother not only nurtures and cares for her children on a daily basis but she also mediates the father's power and works to facilitate the fulfillment of her children's needs and desires when not fully approved by the father (Altorki 1986). She is especially seen as devoted to her male child, who is the source of power, social recognition, and stability in her life as a new wife and the source of emotional and financial support in old age (Rugh 1984, Rassam 1984, Joseph 1999). Studies also refer to the very strong relationship that binds a mother and her daughter and show how women feel sorry for a mother without a female child (Eickelman 1984, Joseph 1999). So strong is the bond between a woman and her children that many women endure difficult marriages and harsh living conditions to avoid the risk of separation from their children (Wikan 1996).

The role of the mother has been central to continuous attempts by governments and various groups to promote family planning, enhance child health-care, build modern nations, and Islamize society, as well as to define the social, economic, and political rights of women. Many Muslim activists, for example, glorify motherhood and view it as key to a woman's existence and to the construction of the "true" Muslim umma (al-Mughni 1993, Sonbol 2003). They emphasize that it is a woman's moral duty to stay at home and raise her children properly. Motherhood becomes the main duty of a woman and must be cherished and embraced. Drawing on various traditions of the Prophet, such as, "Paradise is under the feet of mothers," these activists argue that motherhood is more valuable than any other job outside the home. Other groups see more room for women to work outside but always emphasize the priority of mothering over other activities. Some women's groups place greater value on working outside the home and downplay the role of motherhood. They tend to see women's liberation and empowerment as mainly linked to participation in public life and view motherhood as a tool that has often been used by different groups to restrict women to the domestic sphere.

Motherhood is closely linked with nationalism in various Arabic countries. This is especially true among native populations who fear being outnumbered by foreigners, like the Palestinians (in the context of their struggle for independence) or the Kuwaitis (given the presence of large numbers of foreign migrant workers and their families) (al-Mughni 1993). Accordingly, having children and raising them as Palestinian is seen as an essential part of the Palestinian national struggle. The umm al-shāhid (mother of the martyr) is a national Palestinian symbol (inside and outside the West Bank and the Gaza Strip) that is invested with great social and political value (Petee 1997). She represents cherished notions of sacrifice, resistance, and steadfastness. Despite this strong link between motherhood and nationalism, however, most Arab countries do not grant citizenship to children born to local mothers and foreign fathers. This issue, the custody of children and their support after divorce, and the provision of more facilities which would allow women to combine work and motherhood are some of the key issues that most Arab countries are struggling with.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Altorki, Women in Saudi Arabia. Ideology and behavior among the elite, New York 1986.
- N. Atiya, Khul-Khaal. Five Egyptian women tell their stories, Syracuse, N.Y. 1982.
- C. Eickelman, Women and community in Oman, New York 1984.
- M. C. Inhorn, Quest for conception. Gender, infertility, and Egyptian medical traditions, Philadelphia 1994.
- S. Joseph, My son/myself, my mother/myself, in S. Joseph (ed.), Intimate selving in Arab families. Gender, self, and identity, Syracuse, N.Y. 1999, 174–90.
- H. al-Mughni, Women in Kuwait. The politics of gender, London 1993.
- J. Petee, Icons and militants. Mothering in the danger zone, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 23:1 (1997), 103–29.
- A. Rassam, Towards a theoretical framework for women's studies, in UNESCO, Social science research and women in the Arab world, London 1984, 122–38.
- A. Rugh, Family in contemporary Egypt, Cairo 1984.
- , Within the circle. Parents and children in an Arab village, New York 1997.
- A. E. Sonbol, Women of Jordan. Islam, labor, and the law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2003.
- U. Wikan, Tomorrow, God willing. Self-made destinies in Cairo, Chicago 1996.

FARHA GHANNAM

Australia

INTRODUCTION

Motherhood is an integral part of a woman's life, but it is culturally constructed (Bernard 1974). The experience of motherhood can be challenging when compounded with migration (Liamputtong and Naksook 2003). This entry discusses the influence of Afghan culture on the ways Afghan women experience motherhood. It also deals with the impact of migration on their mothering roles. It is based on in-depth interviews with Afghan women and participant observations in the Afghan community in Melbourne, Australia.

AFGHANS IN AUSTRALIA

According to the Australian Bureau of Statistics 2001 Census of Population and Housing, there are 11,296 Afghans living in Australia: 6,776 males and 4,520 females. The first wave of migration dates back to 1859 when Afghan immigrants arrived in Australia as cameleers. The Afghan camel trains provided transport to central Australia and supplied remote sheep and cattle stations as well as new gold mining communities (Wardak 1997). Throughout the history of camel driving in Australia, camel handlers were referred to as Afghans or Ghans. Over the next 40 years, more Afghans arrived in Australia. In the 1901 census, the Afghan population had increased to 394 from only 20 recorded in the 1871 Census. As a result of the Immigration Restriction Act 1901 as well as the introduction of modern transport, the Afghanistan-born community gradually declined (DIMIA 2003). The second wave took place in the 1980s as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 (Wardak 1997, DIMIA 2003). Many Afghans sought refugee status as a result of the civil war in their country of origin. The third wave of immigration to Australia occurred as a result of the brutal Taliban regime from 1995 onwards. There was a decrease, however, in arrivals from Afghanistan due to the introduction of border legislation and the collapse of the Taliban regime. As a result, many Afghans arrived in Australia as illegal immigrants and were sent to detention centers around the country. According to the most recent statistics of the Department of Immigration and Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs (DIMIA), issued on 25 July 2000, the total number of "boat people" arriving in Australia between 1989 and 2000 was 8,289, of whom only 1,141 were Afghans. The Afghans who have arrived in Australia since late 1999 are largely of Hazara background, and came as a result of persecution by the Taliban. Also included are some anti-Taliban Pashtuns or members of other persecuted groups.

GENDER ROLES WITHIN AFGHAN CULTURE

The Afghan immigrants in Australia still strongly adhere to many Afghan traditions. Among these, kinship is the key facet of Afghan life. An Afghan kinship system stretches vertically from nuclear family to the nation as a whole. The system involves a genealogy of ancestry and the "blood aspect permeates the entire fabric, for even the blood feud is inherited" (Dupree 1973, 183). To some degree, the family determines the social rank, marriage partner, religious adherence, and personal standards and manners of its members (Wardak 1997).

Family life is at the core of the psychological well-being of the Afghan people. They tend to socialize exclusively with members of their extended family. Every decision is connected to the family. The typical Afghan family is multigenerational. The senior female supervises and delegates tasks to the other women in the household and directs all female activities (Hemming 1997). The extended family is not only the major social unit but also the major economic unit in society. The family guarantees security for both men and women from the time of birth to the time of death as individual, economic, social, and political rights are found within the family. Gender and age roles are expressed within the household and it is here that young boys and girls learn their place in the world (Hemming 1997).

For all Afghan immigrants, the family functions as the primary social institution. Afghan culture is patriarchal (authority remains in the hands of the elder males), patrilineal (inheritance is through the male line), and patrilocal (the female moves to her husband's place of residence upon marriage) (Dupree 1973, Wilber 1995). However, as Dupree (1973) asserts, "the idealized picture is greatly modified by certain elements which perpetuate matri-influences." As the centrality of the women's roles is pivotal to the well-being of the family, the selection of spouse is important. The preferred marriage for a man is to marry a daughter of his father's brother (Dupree 1973, 191, Wardak 1997). There is a strong matri-core in the Afghan community, which can be seen in intimate aunt-niece relationships and mother-in-law and daughter-in-law closeness (Dupree 1973). Although endogamous marriages are most prevalent among all groups within Afghanistan, inter-ethnic marriages have always occurred, and are increasing due to large populations settling outside the areas of their ancestors, including among those who are in Australia.

The primary obligation for women is to uphold family honor by conforming to the norms of accepted behaviors. Afghan society, with its strong belief in male superiority, gives men the prerogative to make all decisions and few challenge this (Dupree 1998). Afghan women typically have little formal power. However, informally, strength is shown in decision-making in the home and often in economic activities outside the home (Dupree 1973). The traditional conception of the male element is one of strength and the female element is one of weakness (Dziegiel 1977).

Traditionally, Afghan communities distinguish between two worlds: the world of men and the world of women, which only come together in the home (Dziegiel 1977). The world of the men is typically the external world, where work outside the home is undertaken. Women are confined to the internal world, dealing with household care and raising children. Traditional ideology favors the subordination of women by men (Dziegiel 1977, Wilber 1995). This is still prevalent among those who are now living in Australia.

The upbringing of children up to the age of ten years is the domain of the mother who shapes and influences their personalities. This accounts for the high respect that is granted to mothers as well as the acceptance of a "matriarchy," following the death of the father. The widowed mother brings the family together, continuing to live in the household of her adult son (Dziegiel 1977). The father is in charge of the discipline and punishment of the children. Boys stand in awe of their fathers and the relationship is one of respect and obedience. The mother raises the children from birth and has a strong bond with her children (Wilber 1995). The relationship between mother and daughter in Afghan culture is very close and is extremely warm and affectionate (Hemming 1997). It is the mother that children turn to for support, particularly as her interests are centered around the home (Wilber 1995).

MOTHERHOOD: WOMEN'S VOICES

The influence of Afghan social structure is clearly mirrored in women's perceptions and lived experiences of being a mother.

The meaning of motherhood

Motherhood is associated with kindness and respect. The mother is responsible for the entire family and she endures many hardships to bring a child into this world. She is acknowledged for this on a daily basis. The virtue of motherhood is metaphorically compared with a “rare” or a “precious” entity.

Islam grants a very high status to motherhood. Hence, many Afghan women marry young, as their primary aim is to become a mother. Motherhood is perceived as the ultimate goal of every woman. The status of a mother is more respected than the status of a father because of the hardships childbirth brings. The high status of the mother is clearly expressed in the religious saying: “Heaven is under the feet of the mother.” Motherhood is believed to grant the mother a high status in Heaven.

Islam asserts that parents, particularly mothers, are to be cared for in their old age and treated kindly. Traditionally, children will look after parents in old age. This is the time when mothers are repaid for all their hard work raising children. A mother must always feel that she controls the family and her children should do what she says, particularly in old age. Afghans prefer to have many children so that they will be secure and well taken care of in later life. They believe that more children, especially more sons, will carry the family name and their fathers’ traditions.

The mother’s responsibility is to raise her children in the best possible way. Religious guidance and moral codes are of utmost importance. Good mothers need to ensure the smooth running of the family and household matters. In addition to taking care of her children, a good mother should ensure that the family life is harmonious. Whether a woman is a good mother or not is usually judged by how the children turn out. However, under the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, some women were denied the opportunity to ensure that their children would be educated.

Living in a new country brings many changes in the women’s lives as mothers, particularly their decision to have children. Shabnam, an Afghan immigrant to Australia said: “The way of living was different in Afghanistan than it is in Australia . . . I think that many Afghans are having fewer children. Bringing up children here is harder because their future is uncertain. Parents may fear that they won’t be obeyed like they are in our country.”

Being a migrant mother

Moving to a new homeland is a significant life change. Moving to another country as a mother is even more difficult. For many women, moving away from Afghanistan is the only option for them to raise their children. Despite difficulties, most women feel positive about being in Australia. They are grateful that their children have escaped from a war-torn country. In Australia, children are free to attend school and enjoy the social environments that Australia has to offer. Many women feel that being a migrant mother in Australia has motivated them to raise their children as good Muslims. They wish to be seen as a person who is a “good migrant.” It is a challenge for them.

Many women arrive in Australia as refugees. Their past experiences impel them to see their children succeed. They tolerate hardship as long as they can bring up children to have a better life than theirs. Women anticipate the trials of the future. They fear that their children will want to disconnect from Afghan traditions and follow Australian ways. Many feel that being in Australia creates an extra pressure for them to succeed in raising their children.

Generally, women feel very satisfied with being migrant mothers. As refugees, some women were separated from their husbands and families as they had to escape their countries at different times. Because of this, being together with family is an important factor in their lives. Women realize how lucky their children are to be in Australia, in comparison to those still living in Afghanistan.

Women also hope that their children will become educated in religion and have good moral characters. Some hope that their children will escape the negative influences within Australian society. Women are concerned about the future of their daughters because girls are considered more vulnerable in Afghan culture. A man can always take care of himself but a daughter needs to be taken care of. A concern for many women is that their daughters find good husbands who will treat them well. Good moral character is an important aspect of Afghan culture, particularly for girls. If a young girl is of bad character, this is a reflection upon her mother and sometimes the entire family may be labeled as “bad” and disrespected. Therefore, mothers always try to bring their girls up in the best possible way.

In summary, mothers are held in the highest regard and are granted respect from children and society. Motherhood is thus the ultimate goal of Afghan women. Despite some differences between individual women, collectively, the trend is positive and the women share a view that their new lives in Australia are comparatively better and easier than for those who remain in Afghanistan.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Bernard, The future of motherhood, New York 1974.
DIMIA (Department of Immigration and Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs), Commonwealth of Australia,

- 2003, <<http://www.immi.gov.au/statistics/infosummary/source.htm>>.
- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1973.
- N. H. Dupree, Afghan women under the Taliban, in W. Maley (ed.), Fundamentalism reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban, London 1998, 145–66.
- L. Dziegiel, The situations of women in traditional Afghan communities, in Ethnologia Polona 3 (1977), 67–71.
- R. Hassan, Faithlines. Muslim conceptions of Islam and society, Oxford 2002.
- I. M. W. Hemming, Gender and Islam, purdah and power. The production and management of Afghan women's health and illness, Ph.D. diss., University of California, Los Angeles 1997.
- I. A. Ibrahim, A brief illustrated guide to understanding Islam, Houston 1997, <<http://www.islam-guide.com/>>.
- P. Liamputtong and C. Naksook, Life as mothers in a new land. The experience of motherhood among Thai women in Australia, in Health Care for Women International 24 (2003), 650–68.
- R. H. Magnus and E. Naby, Afghanistan. Mullah, Marx, and mujahid, Boulder, Colo. 2000.
- M. Murad, Islam in brief, Riyadh 1998.
- P. Wardak, Afghan community profile. A snapshot of Afghans in Victoria, Melbourne 1997.
- D. Wilber, Afghanistan. Its people, its society, its culture, New Haven, Conn. 1995.

PRANEE LIAMPUTTONG AND VICKI TSIANAKAS

The Caucasus

In Caucasian cultures the cult of the mother, which is at the forefront of life, manifests itself at the linguistic level. Many words, such as land, water, and fire in the Vainakh, Daghestan, and Georgian languages begin with the word for “mother,” as well as the words denoting sanctity in the Abkhazian language. In these cultures the traditional attitude toward the mother is combined with forms of Christianity and Islam.

Although there are nuclear families in the cities, the extended family predominates in the Caucasus. Islam allows polygyny in both religious and local law, and cases are observed in Azerbaijan, the Caucasian Republic, and Georgia (Pankisi Gorge, mountainous Achara, and Kvemo Kartli, inhabited by the Azeri population).

Female archetypes dictated that a woman's most important function was reproduction. Even today if a married woman does not produce a child, her husband, her relatives and those of her husband, and the woman herself regard it as a tragedy. Traditional ways of combating childlessness are widespread in the Caucasus, such as prayers, baths of holy water, and folk medicine, including sacrifice: tushol (Chechnya, Ingushia), kobilkeri (Daghestan), and madimairam (Ossetia) (Muzhukhov 1989, 52, Chesnov 1993, 60–1). Only after giving birth to a child and the multi-staged ritual of purification that follows is the woman a full member of society. She achieves status only as a mother and, as such, she perpetuates the postulates of patriarchy.

The mother perpetuates the child's gender roles as well. For example, among the Tsezs of Daghestan the boy is referred to as “wolf,” “dog,” and “lion,” the girl as “swallow,” “hen,” and “bird” (Karpov 2001). In all cultures of the Caucasus the son is the “family defender,” responsible for carrying on the status of his family and ancestors. The man's family views the woman as a temporary member, a guest of the family (Karapetian 1967, 40, Gajiev 1985, 110, Kochetova 1991, Smirnova 1968, 113).

In the Caucasian family the notion of fatherhood was often included in the mother's role as parent. The psychologists Nizharadze and Surmanadze call this phenomenon the strength of the “mother line” in the process of child raising. It is firmly established as a tradition. Today, in relation to family and especially to a child, the mother remains an influential figure. She can control the life of her child and she can exert pressure and influence the child's behavior and choice of friends (Surmanidze 1998, 10, Nizharadze 1999, 11).

In many cultures of the Caucasus, the cult of the mother is reflected in the existence of female goddesses: Mother Nature (Nana, symbol of fertility in Georgia, the goddess Ana Hit in Armenia), Mezuzahs (wood housewife in Adige), Jaja (goddess of agriculture), Anana (mother-creator) (Inalipa 1954, 224, Janashia 1960, 22), Tusholi (goddess of spring among the Vainakhs) (Shiling 1934, 107), and Mzekali (goddess of weather and the harvest in Georgia).

As Surmanidze points out, in the mother cult the idealized icon holds a powerful sway over reality. While the idealized icon of mother is far from reality, the mother is often judged by it. It does not leave room for real life development and adaptation, but if the mother does not behave in the stereotyped ways, if she goes beyond the icon's borders, she may incur the disapproval of society (Surmanidze 1998, 10).

However, Soviet policy introduced significant changes and undermined (but did not entirely destroy) many religious dogmas and cultural stereotypes. Despite the fact that the mother may have had an active professional life outside the house as doctor, teacher, or factory worker, her former obligations as the person responsible for domestic life remained paramount. This is the meaning of the woman's “double burden” and lies behind her need to be a “superwoman.”

Indeed, for the majority of the population in the Caucasus, the family has continued to be the repository of what was left of tradition and culture. In the post-Soviet period of socioeconomic and political collapse, Caucasian women have been better able to adapt to the new realities. In the face of great unemployment and pervasive poverty, mothers have the responsibility for children and family survival.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Alimova, Rites and rituals of childbirth, from the end of the nineteenth to the beginning of the twentieth centuries [in Russian], Makhachkala 1981.
- I. Chesnov, Archetype of a stone in the Barkar-Karachaev tradition [in Russian], St. Petersburg 1993.
- S. Gajiev, Family and marriage among the peoples of Daghستان, nineteenth to early twentieth centuries [in Russian], Moscow 1985.
- R. Gamzatov, My Daghستان, Makhachkala 1989.
- S. Inal-İpa, Outline of the history of marriage and family among the Abkhazians [in Russian], Sukhumi 1954.
- N. Janashia, Articles on ethnography of Abkhazia [in Russian], Sukhumi 1960.
- G. O. Karapetian (ed.), Armenian folklore [in Russian], Moscow 1967.
- U. Karpov, Woman's place in the cultures of the peoples of the Caucasus [in Russian], St. Petersburg 2001.
- E. Kochetova and U. Karpov, Bringing up children in west Daghستان, in The world of childhood in traditional cultures of the peoples of the USSR [in Russian], part 1, Leningrad 1991, 122–40.
- M. Muzhukhoev, Medieval cult monuments in the Central Caucasus [in Russian], Grozni 1989.
- G. Nizharadze, Woman and conflict, in Alternative to conflicts (Tbilisi) [in Georgian] 3/4 (1999), 29–33.
- E. Shiling, Tusholi cult among the Ingushians [in Russian], iv, Orjonikidze 1934².
- I. Smirnova, Bringing up a child in Adig. Past and present [in Russian], viii, Ethnography, Maikop 1968.
- L. Surmanidze, Georgian attitudes toward women, in Current gender issues (brochure) [in Georgian], Tbilisi 1998, 13–14.

FERIDE ZURIKASHVILI

Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia

In this area, motherhood is at the very center of female identity, activity, and construction. “Paradise lies at the foot of the mother,” a ḥadīth states. Motherhood brought status to females, and acceptance from parents-in-law. Newly married women were expected to have children as soon as possible. With the birth of her first child, especially if it was a son, a bride began her ascent from the lower end of family position. Her position generally continued to improve with the birth and growing up of more children. Motherhood could bring many rewards and resources. Girls desired motherhood as a mark of becoming an adult woman, and for the ability it gave them to enter into respected social relations. Despite this, motherhood and attitudes toward it were also fraught with danger and difficulty.

Until recent decades, motherhood began early. Parents and relatives arranged marriages for girls at relatively early ages. Even after governments raised the legal age of marriage for females, families found ways of ignoring age requirements. Having children was the main goal of marriage. Becoming a mother outside marriage constituted perhaps the greatest disaster which could befall a female and her family. In some places, an unmarried mother could face severe punishment or even death.

A woman's in-laws, her own parents, and the community expected her to produce a child as soon as possible after nine months of marriage. The mother-in-law watched carefully for signs of pregnancy. For the bride, these early months of marriage might be all the more stressful as she knew her continued position in the household rested on her ability to produce children. If she failed to become pregnant, suffered miscarriages, lost young children, or failed to produce males, she might well be divorced and sent home, or her husband might marry an additional wife. Few husbands tolerated remaining childless.

Because of early marriages, girls often bore children at early ages, which had serious medical consequences, including a relatively high maternal death rate, relatively low birth weight, and high infant mortality. After gestation and childbirth, nursing and caring for an infant also took a heavy toll on immature bodies. Becoming a mother, though necessary to join the community of adult women, also brought a lifetime of hard work caring for the household and children.

Until recent decades, women did not have access to birth control. In any case, husbands generally wanted large families. High child mortality rates also caused women to have many children in order to ensure that a good number would survive. Although hard on the body and health, and requiring a great deal of work, women's status generally rose as they had more children.

Brides and families valued male children far more than females, and for their own status and benefit, women hoped for boys. Young women were prone to feel terribly disappointed, and shamed, upon bearing a daughter. Although male children held authority over their mothers from an early age and might disobey and harass them, sons could also be a main source of defense and support for a mother. Because they often had little else as a means to gain power and influence, women catered to their sons.

Although mothers hoped for sons, they also welcomed daughters who, from a young age, could help their mothers. By the time a girl became a young teenager, she might be doing most of the household work. Mothers and daughters often remained close throughout the years.

A young woman was expected to focus her life on her children. Mothers shouldered the responsibilities of raising and training their children. If children did not turn out well, people tended to point to the mother, even suggesting that the children had taken in bad characteristics along with their mother's milk.

A young bride usually faced a mother-in-law who strategized to retain the affection and devotion of her son. Mothers often took a large part in choosing wives for their sons. It was generally assumed that they would look for submissive brides who would obey and work well for them.

Because of their close attachment to her children, women in unhappy or violent marriages were liable to feel trapped and unable to leave. Custody laws favored the father. If a woman remarried, her new husband would not be willing to support children from her previous marriage. Also, a mother would worry about leaving her children under the care of a stepmother. Children could thus become a chain binding mothers in an unhappy and restrictive marital situation.

Given this attachment, the death of a child could also bring down upon mothers the greatest tragedy and unbearable sorrow of loss. During the 1980–8 Iran-Iraq War and the 25 years of war in Afghanistan, mothers suffered terribly on behalf of children injured, frightened, living in privation, or killed. With the death of sons, widowed women, particularly in poverty ridden Afghanistan, lost their means of support and usually became extremely poor.

Although women were expected to bear children starting from nine months after the wedding and then continue to do so, upon reaching the period of life when her children had married, pregnancy often brought embarrassment to a mother because it testified to ongoing sexual relations, deemed unseemly for older females.

Until the last two or three decades, except in very well-off and modernized families, older widowed mothers lived with their children. Homes for the elderly did not exist.

In the 1950s and 1960s, beginning with the more upper-class modernized population – a larger proportion of the population in oil-rich and Westernizing Iran – constructions of motherhood began to change. With more female education, a later age of marriage, birth control, and middle- and upper-class women working in professional positions outside the home, the singular emphasis on marriage and motherhood for women began to weaken. In the period after the Iranian Revolution in 1979, ruling clerics again pressed for women's primary roles as wives and mothers in the home and encouraged high birth rates. However, in the 1990s and into the twenty-first century, the age of marriage and first birth began to rise and the birth rate began to decline drastically. Iranian girls sought education. More females attended universities than males. Even in rural areas, women began to postpone marriage and space and limit their pregnancies. With far fewer children, mothers and fathers began focusing on the emotional, social, educational, and psychological needs of each child. Constructions of mothers and motherhood began to evolve from that of the totally self-sacrificing devoted mother to one of companion and guide. Such changes took place far less often in the other countries of the area. In Afghanistan, in the poverty and disruption of 25 years of war, chaos, and political repression, most females could not attend school or work. Even in the post-Taliban era, conservative gender rules continue to restrict lives of women. This is true among the Afghans and Pakistani Pukhtuns particularly, and also among Muslims in Pakistan and India, although women here are not quite as severely restricted to home-bound roles of wife and mother. However, women who attend university and work outside the home still give priority to their responsibilities of home, husband, and children.

Elderly mothers in Afghanistan continue to live with their children. Nuclearization of the family and grandmothers living separately from their children is not frequent among Muslims in Pakistan and India. However, in Iran, for those widows who are in good enough health to care for themselves, changes are taking place. Although Iranians until recently believed that elderly parents should live with their children and take a central place in their lives, now many, perhaps even most, older widows who are able to care for themselves live in their own homes. The view of mother is changing from that of devoted mother and grandmother to that of rather independent mother and grandmother who decides on her geographical mobility, trips, pilgrimages, and visits. Sometimes these women feel cheated. They had been at the beck and call of a demanding mother-in-law, but now when they have reached the life stage at which they expect to reap the harvest of their acquiescence to a patriarchal system by gaining authority over daughters-in-law and a central position in the extended family, the world has been transformed. Educated and/or working daughters-in-law are not willing to live under the authority of a mother-in-law, sharing the attention and resources of their husbands with her. Most of the time, when mothers decline, their daughters or daughters-in-law care for them. However, both state run and private care facilities for the elderly now exist in Iran. In Afghanistan, Pakistan, and India such changes have taken place far less, if at all.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Ali, Madras on rainy days, New York 2004.
 V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin, Tex. 1988.
 T. Durrani with W. and M. Hoffer, My feudal lord, London 1994.
 Z. Eglar, A Punjabi village in Pakistan, New York 1960.
 S. Farman-Farmaian with D. Munker, Daughter of Persia. A woman's journey from her father's harem through the Islamic Revolution, New York 1992.
 E. Friedl, Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, New York 1991.
 —, Sources of female power in Iran, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 151–67.
 B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxtun women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
 S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1988.
 S. Haeri, No shame for the sun. Lives of professional Pakistani women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
 J. Howard, Inside Iran. Women's lives, Washington, D.C. 2002.
 P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1989.
 M. Kousha, Voices from Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
 S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities, New Delhi 1990.
 C. Lindholm, Generosity and jealousy. The Swat Pukhtun of Northern Pakistan, New York 1982.
 N. Lindisfarne (Tapper), Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
 K. Mumtaz and F. Shaheed, Women of Pakistan. Two steps forward one step back? London 1987.
 A. Nafisi, Reading Lolita in Tebran, New York 2003.
 P. Omidian, Aging and family in an Afghan refugee community. Transitions and transformation, New York 1996.
 A. Rauf, Rural women and the family. A study of a Punjabi village in Pakistan, in Journal of Comparative Family Studies 18 (1987), 403–15.
 Å. Seierstad, The bookseller of Kabul, trans. I. Christophersen, London 2003.
 A. M. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life histories of working women in the old city of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992.

MARY ELAINE HEGLAND

Turkey

The nineteenth and twentieth centuries marked an era of profound change in Turkish society. During the transition from the Ottoman Empire to the Turkish Republic (mid-1800s–1920s), Istanbul experienced the first systematic decline in fertility and reorganization of family life, where gradually the Western ideal of the nuclear family displaced more traditional extended patriarchal family forms (Duben and Behar 1991). The twentieth century witnessed the spread of the nuclear family form to rural areas as well, though in practice the extended family persists as a powerful cultural ideal in both rural and urban areas (White 1994, 35). It is in this context that the social meaning of mothers and motherhood became a focal point for politicians and reformers and mothering came to be seen as an essential aspect of producing and reproducing national identity.

European preoccupation with the politics of population, fueled by the developing sciences of medicine, society, and demography, influenced Ottoman elites in the late nineteenth century and drove social policies created by Turkish national elites after independence in 1923 (Gürsöy 1996). Leaders of the new republic posed population as a key issue in building the nation-state. Linked in rhetoric and policy, early republican leaders promoted population expansion as a means to securing and maintaining state sovereignty and linked population policies directly to Turkish nationalism.

While these leaders worked to elevate the status of women through access to education, suffrage in 1934, and work outside the household (especially in “helping professions” such as nursing and education), they also wanted women to marry, have numerous children, and raise families. Reformers equated notions of biological motherhood with social motherhood in an effort to promote childbirth and “modern” childrearing practices. In the 1930s deputies to the Grand National Assembly (Turkey’s parliamentary body) passed several laws to promote marriage and childbirth and declared abortion unlawful (Gürsöy 1996). The extent to which the laws were enforced and effective is questionable, yet these measures signified the importance of marriage, reproduction, and motherhood to the republican nation-building project and demonstrated the intensification of political interest in the everyday social lives of women.

Reformist discourses on motherhood and family in the early republic (1920s–1940s) idealized the fecundity and strength of the Anatolian village mother, promising monetary assistance and tax breaks to women bearing many children. Strong, fertile, and stalwart, Anatolian village mothers were portrayed as true patriots. This idealization coincided with a contradictory impulse to root out aspects of Anatolian culture that were regarded as unhealthy or backward. Educators, social workers, and doctors stressed the need to eliminate many childrearing practices, including swaddling babies, superstition-based customs for protecting children from harm, and beliefs that prevented women from accepting Western biomedical models for child-birth and childrearing. Other elite discourses focused on urban, educated women who married later, practiced birth control or had abortions, challenging their commitment to the call to motherhood in the name of national strength.

Women's associations helped to shape and spread early republican discourses on motherhood and nationhood. Associations such as the Anneler Birliđi (Mothers' union) in the 1930s took up philanthropic and educational initiatives, advancing a reformist project that reflected urban, elite social values. Other associations, such as the Women's Union (disbanded by the state in 1935), advanced platforms that promoted women's rights within the family and society as well as broader social justice issues such as peace.

Legal reforms in the 1920s and 1930s offered new rights for women, yet reinforced patriarchal power structures within family and broader kin groups (Kandiyoti 1988). Recent amendments to the constitution and Civil Code (2001–2) have formally introduced equality of men and women within the family. The well-known phrase "The family is the foundation of Turkish society" is now amended with the phrase "and is based on the equality of the spouses." The Civil Code in its first major modifications since the adoption of the Swiss Civil Code in 1926 now recognizes the equality of spouses within the family, has removed the designation of the husband as "head of household," and acknowledges inheritance rights of children born out of wedlock and, importantly, rights to equal shares of property acquired after marriage to all those who married after the law came into effect.

In contemporary Turkish society motherhood remains a dominant cultural ideal and notions of womanhood and femininity are still largely constructed through becoming a wife and mother. Marriage continues to be widely considered biologically and socially necessary – an obligation to one's family and society (White 1994, 41) – especially among rural and working-class women.

In recent decades, despite formal gains made in laws and policies related to women's position within the family and society, the work of parenting remains almost the exclusive province of women (Arat 1996, 30). We cannot assume, however, that this means that mothering takes place exclusively within the nuclear family. Despite the fact that the majority of families in Turkey are nuclear in structure today, the extended family still persists functionally (White 1994, 35, Abadan-Unat 1986, 186). Erel notes that assuming the mother is the primary caregiver is a class-specific, ethnocentric construction, especially if one considers that in rural Turkey women and children participate in agricultural work and child-rearing is the collective labor of mothers, older siblings, aunts, and grandmothers. Erel also points out that in urban areas "housework and childcare often take place in a wider social context of extended-family members and neighbours" (2002, 133; see also EWIC II Household Division of Labor: Turkey and the Caucasus).

Erel's work among Turkish migrant families in Germany points to the need for comprehensive new research on changing forms and ideals of motherhood and family both in Turkey and in diasporic communities (especially in Europe). How does greater integration into Europe shape notions of motherhood? As families temporarily and permanently divide through migration from Turkey to other parts of Europe, how are extended family networks functionally and ideologically maintained? To what extent is the social space for women as subjects outside of motherhood opening up (both within Turkey and Europe)? What new discourses on family, family values, and the meaning of mothers as carriers of the national culture are emerging? And, perhaps most profoundly, what are the long-term effects of a decade of growing poverty rates in Turkey and a weak social safety net on the everyday lives of women and their children? How do economic realities coincide with the social valuation of motherhood and the need for broader systems of familial support for childcare and rearing? These questions call for a renewed focus on the family and constraints facing women in particular in coming years.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abadan-Unat, Social change and Turkish women, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 5–31.
- Y. Arat, On gender and citizenship in Turkey, in Middle East Report (January–March 1996), 28–31.
- C. Delaney, The seed and the soil. Gender and cosmology in Turkish village society, Berkeley 1991.
- , Father state, motherland, and the birth of modern Turkey, in S. Yanagisako and C. Delaney (eds.), Naturalizing power. Essays in feminist cultural analysis, London 1995, 201–36.
- A. Duben and C. Behar, Istanbul households. Marriage, family and fertility, 1880–1940, Cambridge 1991.
- U. Erel, Reconceptualizing motherhood. Experiences of migrant women from Turkey living in Germany, in D. Bryceson and U. Vuorela (eds.), The transnational

- family. New European frontiers and networks*, New York 2002, 127-46.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- A. Gürsöy, Abortion in Turkey. A matter of state, family or individual decision, in Social Science Medicine 42:2 (1996), 531-42.
- D. Kandiyoti, Bargaining with patriarchy, gender and society, in Feminist Studies 2:3 (1988), 274-90.
- Z. Toprak, The family, feminism, and the state during the Young Turk period, 1908-1918, in E. Eldem (ed.), Première rencontre internationale sur l'Empire ottoman et la Turquie moderne, Istanbul 1990, 441-52.
- J. B. White, Money makes us relatives. Women's labor in urban Turkey, Austin, Tex. 1994.

KATHRYN LIBAL

Nation, Women, and Gender

Overview

In many respects, the study of gender and nationalism in Islamic societies is in its early phase. At the same time, our knowledge about women's experiences in nationalist movements has expanded considerably in the last two decades thanks to micro-level studies conducted by historians and social scientists. With this in mind, the goal of this overview, rather than summarizing an abundance of findings and conclusions, is to point at a major watershed in the study of gender and nation. What is emphasized here, then, is the current methodological shift from questions associated with women's emancipation and political agency to explorations of nations as fundamentally gendered constructs. This conceptual development is a result of recent paradigmatic shifts occurring in both fields of gender studies and the study of nationalism.

NATION AND EMANCIPATION: FULFILLED AND UNFULFILLED PROMISES

Most of the research on the subject of women and nations in Islamic societies has been dedicated to the issues of legal rights and political or cultural emancipation. To be sure, feminist ambitions were part and parcel of nationalist agendas since the earliest manifestations of nationalism in Islamic countries. For many Muslim women in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, participation in nationalist activity offered new channels to the public space. Contrary to the traditional view of Muslim women as utterly confined to the domestic sphere and consequently alienated from everything public or political, women's social agency in public spaces had been exhibited long before nationalism. Women exercised political influence through social networks in imperial courts and households, by applying to judicial courts, and in numerous other forms of daily interaction, not always documented. Nevertheless, one of the new elements introduced by nationalism, which seemed promising at the time in terms of female emancipation, was the factor of mass politics. This was made possible by the press and some new mechanisms of political grouping. For the first time women resorted to nationalist idioms to promote feminist agendas through the press in Egypt, Iran, and the Ottoman Empire of the late nineteenth century, and similarly in Central Asia (especially Tatar women) in early twentieth century. In the first quarter of the twentieth century, the era of mass politics was also marked by the new phenomenon of large-scale demonstrations, wherein women from all social strata took an active part in anti-colonial activities, as was the case in Iran, Egypt, and some of the Ottoman domains.

The early marriage between nation formation and discourses of female liberation was evident throughout the Islamic world. Algeria is a symptomatic case in point. After independence, Algerian female liberating discourse had recourse to women's share in the national struggle. The nation-emancipation linkage was even more conspicuous in the last years of the Ottoman Empire. Subsequent to the 1908 revolution, as soon as women entered the arena of political activism, their claims for rights were expressed in patriotic terms, a trend that was to be continued in the republican period. Female emancipation was a component of nationalist discourses also in Afghanistan, under King Amān Allāh and in Iran under Reza Shah, which looked at the Young Turks, and later Mustafa Kemal's regime, as models to be followed. Correspondingly, the need to liberate women in Central Asian society, embedded in a nationalist discourse, was an integral part of the ideology of Jadidism (the movement for cultural reform in Central Asia at the turn of the twentieth century).

In most of the Islamic countries, the involvement of women in the nationalist discourse suggested a new era of female political and cultural agency. However, more often than not, the post-independence phase marked a setback for feminist movements. The Turkish liberation movement was the only case in which women made their way into the leading core of the nationalist movement (Halide Edib is a salient example), while the general rule for other nationalist movements was that the Woman Question should be postponed until after independence.

It is often argued that throughout the twentieth century women realized that the formulation of "first nation then emancipation" was not to be fulfilled soon. According to the same common wisdom, women participated in nationalist movements with the supposition that the realization of the national goals would bring about their liberation (Fleischmann 1999, 115). Hence, as the promise of emancipation fell short of expectations after independence (Algeria is the most suggestive illustration in this regard), scholars and feminist activists have represented the nation-emancipation linkage as some sort of infringed contract. However, such a “utilitarian” depiction of women’s involvement in nationalist struggles, as if it were motivated mainly by feminist aspirations, is somewhat teleological and superficial. It fails to take into account the contingencies of wars and war movements, which are rarely related to any consideration of what will happen after the war ends (Lazreg 1994, 119). Additionally, such a depiction perpetuates the false image of anti-colonial struggles as a masculine affair with women playing only a marginal role, and implies that as far as the nationalist struggle is concerned, women’s motivations essentially differed from those of men.

The case of the Palestinian nationalist movement is of particular interest given that it is probably the only ongoing anti-colonial struggle in the Islamic world. The nation-emancipation linkage did not exist in Palestinian nationalist discourse until well into the 1970s, when women joined military operations. Women’s partaking in informal communal politics was legitimized by the Palestinian national movement, but the absence of any challenge to patriarchal structures turned aside the emergence of feminist consciousness (Joseph 2000, 37).

“ALL NATIONALISMS ARE GENDERED”: FROM WOMEN’S AGENCY TO GENDERED NATIONS

Gender as a category of analysis has been absent from the mainstream theorizing about nations and nationalism. This enduring academic oblivion has been explained as an outcome of the male-biased nature of the classical theories of politics (Yuval-Davis 1997, 2). Yet, the dramatic emergence of cultural studies in recent years has inspired a new set of theoretical questions concerning both gender and nationalism. In both fields, foundational concepts have been problematized and deconstructed, and the validity of disciplinary boundaries and definitions has been challenged. While most of the earlier studies of nationalism stressed political and social processes by employing methods from the social sciences, there is a growing contemporary tendency to apply analytic tools developed in post-structuralist and cultural theory, discourse analysis in particular, and explore nationalism as a culturally-constructed phenomenon. By the same token, in the field of gender studies the basic category of “women” as a unitary, homogeneous concept has proven to be methodically misleading together with a series of dichotomies that had previously been taken for granted, including that of male/female. Moreover, it has become evident that if one wants to comprehend social and cultural complexities, one has to ask how gender relations shaped social arrangements and discourses in the most constitutive senses (along with class, ethnicity, and other categories). These conceptual developments are bringing forth what seems to be a major shift in the study of gender and nations, namely, moving from reconstructing women’s political position on to looking at nations as historically gendered entities.

The notion that “all nations are gendered,” coined by Ann McClintock, has been substantiated since the early 1980s in a good number of studies on gender and nations in various contexts. Nevertheless, as far as Islamic countries are concerned, gender as a critical category of analysis referring to both maleness and femaleness is still missing from most mainstream discussions on nationalism. At best, it is habitually “added” to monographs or anthologies together with other “marginal” social forces (such as minority groups) by way of a standardized lip service, required by the growing appeal of gender studies in the West. Moreover, most of the research about nationalism and women treats the former as a political movement rather than seeing it also as a cultural or discursive project in which ideals of womanhood and manhood, deeply invested in modernist visions, were key elements (Abu-Lughod 1998, 17). While applying the terms “women” and “gender” interchangeably and narrowing the issue of gender to questions of women’s rights and political activism, students of nationalism in the Islamic world are, generally speaking, still blind to the significant role of gendered metaphors, constructions of maleness and femaleness, and gender-based discourses in processes of nation formation.

Investigation of nations as culturally-gendered constructs is a new enterprise in the study of Islamic cultures. Most of the questions associated with gender and nation are thus still to be addressed. However, the available research does allow us to presume that in most if not all contexts the gendered nature of nationalism is deeply intertwined with discourses of modernity. There may be little doubt that the production of the woman of modernity, with its various implications, complicates the simple statements about the emancipatory project of modernity (Najmabadi 1998a, 183).

Partha Chatterjee’s well-known depiction of Bengali highly gendered anti-colonial discourse appears to be relevant to nationalist formulations in many Islamic cultures. According to Chatterjee, the Bengalis structured a cosmology of modernity and nation intended to sustain the anti-colonial struggle. In this world-view, the Bengalis aspired to become identical to the British colonizer in an outer material domain but preserve difference in an inner spiritual domain as a means of resistance. Middle-class women had a significant role in this formulation of the national project by being the hallmark of the internal spiritual domain, untouched by and protected from the political field within the colonial state. The home was imagined as the realm of the spiritual and accordingly feminine and traditional, in which the “true identity” existed, whereas the outside world was imagined as material and masculine. Moreover, the idea of the “new woman” was invented and then indoctrinated as a means of formulating an authentic modernity. The new woman was contrasted with modern Western society but at the same time she was distinguished from the “old,” namely, traditional woman. Tradition, then, played two conflicting roles in the Bengali nationalist construct: it was a positive marker of the cultural essence but it was also the negative reverse of modernity and thus should be left behind (Chatterjee 1993).

In spite of diverse trajectories of postcolonial states, and running the risk of reductionism, similar imaginations of nationalism are evident in Islamic countries that experienced colonial encounters. In Algeria, for one, the family was represented as a sanctuary of “authentic” values, and the woman as the guardian of traditional values vis-à-vis colonial influences. Akin to the Bengali case, an Algerian convention of the “new woman” emerged as a direct opposite to the one of the “traditional woman,” serving as a banner of Algerian anti-colonial nationalism and fueled by the ethos of the heroine mujāhidāt (female liberation warriors) (Cherifati-Merabtine 1994). Azerbaijan provides another illustration for the convention of women as repositories of tradition and national identity in the context of confronting colonial domination. Unable to resist Russian cultural domination, the private domain was perceived as the ultimate fortress of identity. In order to avoid the negative label of “Russified,” women were assigned the role of bearing “the ethno-nationalist load” (Tohidi 1996). Pakistan may provide an additional case in point, especially with regard to women’s education at the turn of the twentieth century, when the confinement of women’s education to household chores and religious teaching was perceived as Muslim cultural resistance against colonialism and Hinduism (Jalal 1991, 81). The idea of the family as the bastion of the nation was evident also in Central Asia (Khalid 1998, 226). These illustrations clearly reflect the ambivalence embodied in the notion of the “new woman” in the context of nationalism, a convention symbolizing tradition and its negation at the same time.

In some of the states that did not experience a direct colonial confrontation, however, the idea of modernity as an acute break with the past was promoted by the state more aggressively than in others and lacked the cultivation of the notion of tradition-as-authentic. Such was the case of Kemalist Turkey, which turned its back on the Ottoman past on the grounds of its “traditional” nature. As illustrated by Kandiyoti, the cultural elite, collaborating with the state, promoted a cultural refashioning of not only new idealized femininity but also modernized masculinity. Hence, reformers and novelists represented the Ottoman father and husband as an authoritarian figure who displayed little feeling for his family, while expecting the ideal “new man” of the Turkish nation to be emotionally close to his family and directly involved with his children (Kandiyoti 1998, 281). A comparable project of promoting new wives and mothers for the sake of the nation in accordance with the new totem of modernity occurred also in Iran of the last decades of the nineteenth century and the early decades of the twentieth century, when women were assigned the role of producing the new citizens of the nation (Najmabadi 1998b).

The convention of women as the prosopopeia of the national spirit and honor, associated above all with their marital role while seeing the nation as an extended family, is one of the most profound features of nationalist discourses around the globe. Just as universal is the idealization of masculinity as the foundation of the nation and society, to use Mosse’s phraseology (Mosse 1985, 16). This role assigned to the “women of the homeland,” highly regarded as it has been, has often been in conflict with interests of women (Yuval-Davis 1997, 67). Family honor has been employed as a means of fortifying patriarchal power by way of controlling female behavior and sexuality. This social trend was not eased by the appearance of nationalism but rather was reinforced and re-presented, now through nationalist idioms. The latter supported the male homosocial nature of nationalist discourses in a way that prevented any significant emancipation after national independence. Egypt at the turn of the twentieth century provides a typical case in point. Popular notions about family honor and female sexual purity were elevated to a national ideal and brought about the construction of a concept of national honor. This development did not imply an invitation to women to take part in the national game. On the contrary, it perpetuated their absence from it as bona fide actors and full partners by reducing their roles to subjects and symbols of a nationalist consciousness monopolized by men (Baron 1993). Hence, in spite of the promise embedded in the mass politics of nationalism to incorporate all members of the nation, male or female, the gendered nature of nationalism actually worked against the inclusion of women. While in many instances early Muslim reformers made efforts to emphasize the inclusiveness of the nation to non-Muslim members of the national community, women were located through the familial metaphor not within the inclusive brotherhood of all men, but as auxiliary to the national fraternity as wives, mothers, or daughters.

According to the conventional modernist narrative, women's progress could be achieved only through state-led modernization and secularization. This founding concept, exhibited in Turkey under Mustafa Kemal and in Iran under Reza Shah, meant that women who were unwilling to come to the public on the state's terms were excluded from the political field of the nation. In fact, some recent versions of the Islamist agenda, well rooted in modernist and nationalist discourses, have meant new options of inclusion for many women. In Iran female illiteracy has been eradicated, in Turkey the growing challenge of the Islamist movement made it possible for religious women to step into the political field on their own terms, and in occupied Palestine the Hamas movement has enabled women to participate in the struggle for liberation and even to acquire the prestigious status of shāhida (martyr), a category formerly reserved only for men.

Some of the recent studies on gender and nation in Islamic countries, which treat the nation as a culturally gendered construct, have stressed the male-oppressive nature of the nationalist (and modernist) discourse. This tendency may be partly explained by the critical approach of cultural studies toward the "project of modernity" and partly by historians' awareness that female emancipation is still an unfinished business in most parts of the Islamic world. Nevertheless, the emancipatory potential of nationalist discourses should not be downgraded. Although patronizing and limiting in many ways, it was the modernist visions of Iranian, Turkish, and Central Asian nationalisms under Reza Shah, Mustafa Kemal, and Jadidism respectively that provided for the first time the opportunity for millions of women to enter public spaces on a large scale by virtue of their position as "mothers of the nation." Hence, the cultural refashioning of women's position in Islamic societies in the framework of nationalism was neither totally oppressive nor entirely emancipatory. The "modern educational regimes, deeply gendered from the start" set in motion both emancipatory and disciplinary trends. The former made it possible for women to enjoy a moment of freedom and sharing public spaces with men while the latter contained regulatory practices and concepts that set boundaries to women's participation in public life (Najmabadi 1998b).

In the final analysis, it is important to bear in mind that crucial as they were, the early moments of nationalism in the Islamic world were far from being the last word on the meanings of maleness and femaleness in the never-ending process of inventing the nation. Visions of nation and gender, highly allied from the start, have been constantly negotiated between women and men, governments and citizens. Gendered concepts of nations have been time and again modified to adapt to changing realities and concepts in numerous and conflicting fashions that are still waiting to be studied.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Feminist longings and postcolonial conditions, in L. Abu-Lughod (ed.), Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998, 3–33.
- B. Baron, The construction of national honour in Egypt, in Gender and History 5 (1993), 244–55.
- S. Berger-Gluck, Palestinian women. Gender, politics and nationalism, in Journal of Palestine Studies 24 (1995), 5–15.
- M. Booth, Woman in Islam. Men and the "women's press" in turn-of-the-20th-century Egypt, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 33:2 (2001), 171–201.
- M. Charrad, State and gender in the Maghrib, in Middle East Report (March–April 1990), 19–24, reprinted in S. Joseph and S. Slymowics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2000, 61–71.
- P. Chatterjee, The nation and its fragments. Colonial and postcolonial histories, Princeton, N.J. 1993.
- D. Cherifati-Merabtine, Algeria at a crossroads. National liberation, Islamization and women, in V. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity, London 1994, 40–62.
- E. Fleischmann, The other "Awakening." The emergence of women's movements in the modern Middle East, 1900–1940, in M. L. Meriwether and J. E. Tucker (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999, 89–139.
- S. Hale, The women of Sudan's National Islamic Front, in J. Beinun and J. Stork (eds.), Political Islam. Essays from Middle East Report, Berkeley 1997, 234–49.
- M. Hatem, Modernization, the state, and the family in the Middle East women's studies, in M. L. Meriwether and J. E. Tucker (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999, 63–87.

- A. Jalal, The convenience of subservience. Women and the state of Pakistan, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 77–114.
- A. Jamal, Engendering state-building. The women's movement and gender-regime in Palestine, in Middle East Journal 55 (2001), 256–76.
- S. Joseph, Elite strategies for state building. Women, family, religion and the state in Iraq and Lebanon, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 176–200.
- , Women and politics in the Middle East, in S. Joseph and S. Slymovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2000, 34–40.
- D. Kandiyoti, Some awkward questions on women and modernity in Turkey, in L. Abu-Lughod (ed.), Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998, 270–87.
- A. Khalid, The politics of Muslim cultural reform, Berkeley 1998.
- M. Lazreg, The eloquence of silence. Algerian women in question, New York 1994.
- A. McClintock, Family feuds. Gender, nationalism and the family, in Feminist review 44 (1993), 61–80.
- L. Mosse, Nationalism and sexuality. Respectability and abnormal sexuality in modern Europe, New York 1985.
- A. Najmabadi, The story of the daughters of Quchan. Gender and national memory in Iranian history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1998a.
- , Crafting an educated housewife in Iran, in L. Abu-Lughod (ed.), Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998b, 126–70.
- N. Othman, Islamization and modernization in Malaysia. Competing cultural reassertions and women's identity in a changing society, in R. Wilford and R. Miller (eds.), Women, ethnicity and nationalism. The politics of transition, London 1998, 170–92.
- S. Sobhan, National identity, fundamentalism and the women's movement in Bangladesh, in V. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity, London 1994, 63–80.
- N. Tohidi, Soviet in public, Azeri in private. Gender, Islam, and nationality in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, in Women's Studies International Forum 19 (1996), 111–23.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Gender and nation, London 1999.

AVI RUBIN

National Insignia, Signs, and Monuments

Arab States

Arab states, like other modern nation-states, produce visual representations of the nation that are often highly gendered; the imagining of nationhood seems to have a great deal to do with the imagining of femininity and masculinity. But representations of gender and nation in Arab countries do not follow a single formula, nor do they remain static over time. In Egypt, where the peasant population was always larger than the urban or nomadic populations, peasants were the chosen symbols of cultural authenticity from the earliest days of nationalist iconography, and the nation was often represented as a peasant woman. In Jordan, where the merchant class was economically dominant from the founding of the state in 1921, tribal men and all women represented tradition in national imagination, while urban males represented the future. The familiar male/female, modern/traditional duality is completely reversed in some Kuwaiti iconography, where “Family Day” commemorative stamps depict the man in full Arab dress as the woman and children, all dressed in Western clothes, sit or play in a circle around him. In addition, when social issues deemed critical to national development are represented (such as education and literacy), women have been used as markers of progress in almost all Arab countries, with the apparent exception of Saudi Arabia, regardless of competing depictions of women as the custodians of tradition (whether peasant or tribal) in most of these same countries.

As the site of one of the earliest nationalist movements in the Arab Middle East, Egypt has a particularly long history of imagining nationhood. After the nationalist leader Muṣṭafā Kāmil died in 1908, a memorial committee created a statue that depicts Kāmil standing erect, delivering a speech. He places his left hand on a bust of the Sphinx, and points down with his right hand. The extended forefinger of his right hand draws us to the pedestal of the statue: a bronze relief shows a seated young peasant woman, with head covered but face unveiled, of slightly smaller dimensions than Kāmil. Entrapped in the square space, she represents Egypt under British occupation. By this time, a consensus had formed in Egyptian nationalist imagination: the nation should be represented as a woman. It had a certain linguistic logic (Miṣr, or Egypt, is gendered female in Arabic), and the choice also gave nationalists a rich field for political commentary through sexual innuendo and gendered metaphors. Inspired by the Revolution of 1919, Maḥmūd Mukhtār sculpted a work called Nahdat Miṣr (The awakening of Egypt), which shows a peasant woman lifting her veil from her face with her left arm and placing her right arm on the back of a Sphinx as it rises up on its forelegs. The Sphinx rising suggests a rebirth of Egypt’s ancient grandeur; the peasant woman lifting her veil symbolizes the liberation of the modern nation. The statue became the pre-eminent symbol of the national struggle, and the unveiling of women remained a popular metaphor for Egyptian independence.

After 1948, Palestine was often represented by Arab states as a woman in need of rescue. This idea can even be indicated by the absence of women from images. Postage stamps produced by Egypt, Syria, and Jordan since the 1960s portray Palestinian refugees in the form of a man dressed in rags and struggling to carry his children, or as a man and child peering through barbed wire, their landlessness symbolized by the mother’s absence. At the same time that Palestine was being imagined as a woman in need of male Arab defenders, however, the very real Palestinian female warrior-martyr was making her way into official national iconography in several Arab states. A 1970 stamp produced by the People’s Republic of Southern Yemen depicts silhouetted figures of mixed gender holding guns above their heads as they plant the Palestinian flag in the ground. The same year, Kuwait published a stamp in honor of female “Palestinian commandos”; the image on the stamp depicts a young, unveiled woman brandishing a machine-gun.

While images of Palestine indicate a potential tension between representations of the nation as a woman and representations of women defending the nation, on some levels there may be a continuum from one of these symbols to the other. A 1952 Egyptian postage stamp celebrating the nationalist revolution of that year portrays a female figure in culturally indeterminate dress, broken chains dangling from her raised arms, which are holding a large golden sword in the air, against a crescent background. Such images clearly evoke the use of female figures to symbolize liberty in Western national iconography, while continuing the well-established tradition of representing the nation as a woman. They also have a resemblance to Arab-Islamic cultural narratives of women who encourage, shame, or even lead men into battle. Shortly after the Iraqi revolution of 1958, the new regime issued a stamp with the image of a woman carrying a torch and followed by two men whose fists are raised in rebellion. The woman clearly represents freedom and leads two main elements of the Iraqi nation – the tribes and the peasantry – into the modern, postcolonial era. But viewed in the context of well-known narratives of resistance in Iraq, in which a single woman is often “the spark that kindles the flame” of revolt, either in the background or as a leader, the image takes on additional resonance.

In a much more grandiose production, the post-revolutionary government commissioned Jawād Salīm to build the “Monument to Liberty,” an enormous sculpture in Baghdad’s Liberation Square that tells the epic of the revolution. It includes two women representing the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, a female figure symbolizing liberty, mother figures curled around a male martyr and a newborn child, a tribal woman in a wailing pose, her arms raised in grief and/or rage, and two figures of mixed gender representing political demonstrators. The woman demonstrator marches one stride ahead of the man, both fists raised in the air, her face turned toward the monument’s viewers; the two seem perfectly matched in physical strength and forward momentum. The female figure was instantly recognized by Iraqi commentators not only as a symbol of the new nation’s future but also as a representative of its recent past; women had participated in the rebellions of 1920, 1948, 1952, and 1956, and stories of female leaders and martyrs had developed into local legends. The sculpture shows some of the ways that national imagination can combine local, Western, and Arab gendered iconography, resonating in familiar ways on multiple levels, while also signaling new modes of conceptualizing both gender and nation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Arab Postal Union General Secretariat, Arab postal stamps catalogue, Cairo 1976.
Ittibād al-Sha‘b, Baghdad 1959.

SECONDARY SOURCES

B. Baron, Egypt as a woman. Nationalists, gender and politics, University of California Press (forthcoming).
 S. al-Khalil, The monument. Art, vulgarity and responsibility in Iraq, Berkeley 1991.

J. Massad, Colonial effects. The making of national identity in Jordan, New York 2001.

L. Wedeen, Ambiguities of domination. Politics, rhetoric, and symbols in contemporary Syria, Chicago 1999.

BETH BARON AND SARA PURSLEY

Iran

In Iran the most important iconic sign of modern nation/statehood has been the Lion and Sun emblem. When first adopted in 1836 by Muḥammad Shāh Qājār (r. 1834–48) as the official emblem of the Iranian state, the lion was male, the sun (fe)male, that is, a beautiful face, which in Qājār iconography could be either male or female. Over the following decades the sun burst into a magnificent Qājārī face and the lion became more masculinized (see Figure 2). By the early twentieth century, however, the sun gradually lost hair and distinct facial features. These were permanently erased some time in 1935/6. By the late 1970s, the emblem was fully geometrized (see Figure 3). In the aftermath of the 1979 Revolution, the Lion and Sun, deemed an icon of monarchy, was replaced by a calligraphic depiction of “There is no god but Allah.”

The Lion and Sun’s genealogy is variously narrated as pre-Islamic (Zoroastrian) or as Central Asian Turkic. It is affiliated with the sign system of astrological tables, and stands for Shī‘ī loyalty to ‘Alī through one of his given names, Asadallāh, God’s lion. In the Qājār period, the emblem appears on Jewish wedding documents (ketubas), and on Shī‘ī banners for Muḥarram processions. This enormous traffic in signs between different sites of representation accounts for the Lion and Sun’s unique success as the sign of modern Iranian-ness. It is hard to find any other modern icon of Iranian-ness that belongs to as many domains of signification, bringing together Zoroastrian, Jewish, Shī‘ī, Turkish, and Persian symbolics.

The metamorphosis of the Lion and Sun emblem coincided with a period of cultural change in Iran when beauty was feminized. The sun’s gender was correspondingly consolidated as female. Its effacement thus makes a paradoxical statement about the gender of modernity. During the very same period in which real women became more publicly visible in Iranian society, the symbolic sun of the national emblem was effaced as it became more identified as female. In fact, Reza Shah’s (r. 1926–41) order to erase the sun’s facial features occurred within a year of his order for compulsory unveiling of women in public (1936).

To understand this transformation, we need to look at the representational domain to which the sun belonged, the Qājār visual culture. There, the (fe)male face did not represent “real (wo)men,” but (wo)men of male artistic, and more particularly male sexual fantasy. S/he fulfilled adult male desire for music, wine, dance, homo/heterosex, or just plain voyeuristic pleasure. S/he illustrated popular romances and classical stories.

For a figure of male fantasy to be the main feature of the national emblem posed a problem. First, the artist’s fantasy was denigrated by the reproducibility of an emblem in many media (newspapers, official state signs and stationery, stamps, coins, flags, and so forth). The language of representation increasingly relied on mimicking the camera and attributing authenticity to the photograph. More importantly, the place of artistic representation, the shift from private chambers and books read in private to publicly displayed state signs created an element of conflict between the private nature of fantasies of pleasure and the public nature of its new location. Third, while the purpose of (fe)male representations in the private chambers or even the printed books of the nineteenth century was to provide pleasure to men, public display of the national emblem was a serious matter of national politics and state power. Whether as a medallion to be granted for services to the state, or as a logo printed on the masthead of the official state gazette, on letterheads, stamps, coins and flags, this (fe)male sun was not there for the voyeuristic pleasure of male viewers, but to inspire awe and respect, allegiance and identification. Fourth, the nineteenth century marked a shift in Iranian male sensibilities. The young beautiful male adolescent to whom the adult man was attached had turned from a figure of celebration into one of abjection.

Finally, the incongruity became progressively more pronounced as the project of building a modern Iranian nation increasingly included real women in the public sphere. This latter process brought the modernist embarrassment to a head, becoming a problem by the first decades of the twentieth century as women became readers of gazettes, users of stamps, and viewers of the flag. Public display of (wo)men of male sexual fantasy became a source of modernist anxiety and discomfiture and forced a gradual yet unmistakable eclipse of the sun. The more public the medium, the more the facial features of the sun would fade. We can almost trace the gradual setting of the sun as the century progressed and as the emblem was reproduced on widely circulating artifacts, until its eventual formal effacement.

While the Lion and Sun was eliminated as Iran’s official emblem in 1979, it has acquired a deep nostalgic burden among Iranian émigrés.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Kasravī, Tārikhchah-i shīr va khawrshīd, in Armaghān 11, 7 (1930), 542–54; 8 (1930), 588–98.
 M. Minuvī Tīhrānī, Mansha’-i naqsh-i shīr va khawrshīd, in Dinshah Irani memorial volume. Papers on Zoroastrian and Iranian subjects, Bombay 1948, 85–109.
 H. Nayyir Nuri, Tārikhchah-i bayraq-i Irān, va shīr va khawrshīd, Tehran 1965.
 S. Nafīsī, Darafsh-i Irān va shīr va khawrshīd, Tehran 1949.
 A. Piemontese, The statutes of the Qajar orders of knighthood, in East and West 19:3/4 (1969), 431–73.
 Y. Zukā’, Tārikhchah-i taghyīrāt va tahavvulāt-i darafsh va ‘alāmāt-i dawlat-i Irān, in Hunar va Mardum 31 (1965), 13–24; 32/3 (1965), 21–38; 34 (1965), 24–40; 35 (1965), 32–7; 36 (1965), 30–7; 38 (1965), 21–9.

AFSANEH NAJMABADI

Sub-Saharan Africa

This entry explores what national symbols might mean to women living in Islamic cultures in Sub-Saharan Africa. Little research has been undertaken on this subject so the focus has to be on setting the scene and asking appropriate questions. To do this, it is first necessary to briefly address the question of African nation-building and the processes of gendering of these nations.

Research into nation-building in African countries has been minimal, although specific national discourses have been identified in a few countries (Fosse 1997, Steiner 1997, I. Cusack 1999). The new leaders of independent Africa set about building nations from their multiethnic peoples and used whatever material was at hand to construct a national identity, just as an artist might construct a collage. Thus, religion may or may not contribute to the national culture, although for Islamic states such as Sudan and Mauritania Islam will inevitably be central to the nation-building project. There is a danger of generalizing when writing about Africa because of its ethnic, religious, and historical diversity and the same caveat should be applied to Islamic politics (Eickelman and Piscatori 1996). However, Gwendolyn Mikell argues that “a pattern of gross female exclusion and gender bias emerged as Islam made incursions into sub-Saharan Africa” (1997, 14). Present-day female literacy rates across Africa, comparing countries where Islam is dominant with those where it is not, suggest that this may still be the case.

In addition to nation-specific discourses, nations generally have a set of symbols and practices that accompany the dominant ideology of nationalism. Thus, when Namibia achieved independence in 1990 the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting produced a folder entitled “Namibian National Symbols” (Fosse 1997, 434). There is a variety of national symbols, some overt, in the form of flags and monuments, and others associated with what Michael Billig has termed “Banal Nationalism” (1995). National cuisine and national dishes are examples of this quiet, everyday, unnoticed nationalism. Thus in Senegal, mention of le thiébou-dienne, one of the national dishes, will quietly flag the nation. Women, Muslim and otherwise, have been involved in assembling these African national cuisines, for example, by gathering ethnic and regional cuisines into “national” cookery books and thus contributing to the nation-building project (I. Cusack 2003).

Nations can be considered Janus-faced, that is, looking both ways, and providing a past and a future for the retrospective “fictive ethnicity” that is the nation (Balibar and Wallerstein 1991, 102). Women are often the object of the “backward look” that is associated with tradition and ethnic roots. This is particularly so where religion is firmly entrenched, within a nation-state, such as in Ireland after independence in 1922 (T. Cusack 2000). We might therefore ask whether in those countries with a strong Islamic tradition in Sub-Saharan Africa, women are the particular object of this backward look and whether the symbols such as the national flag are seen by women as grounding them in tradition. Alternatively, when comparing the national with ethnic and religious institutions and traditions, do national symbols represent modernity and the possibility of emancipation? Most national symbols such as flags, shields, and emblems, as well as national monuments, are clearly gendered and will typically be associated with male security forces and modernization. National anthems, another overt national symbol, confirm the gendered character of African nations, Islamic and otherwise. Of the 48 Sub-Saharan states, only five anthems mention women in the text while “sons,” “men,” and “forefathers” appear in many. When women are mentioned they are sometimes marginalized as in Botswana: “O men, awake! And women close beside them” (<http://www.thenationalanthems.com.country/Botswana.htm>). Likewise, national monuments are often built to commemorate fallen male national “heroes,” presumably to encourage others to be willing to sacrifice their lives for the nation. Thus, “Heroes Acre” in Harare, Zimbabwe, contains the tombs of soldiers who fought in the liberation struggle. All except one are men, the exception being President Mugabe’s first wife (Werbnier 1998, 84).

According to Raymond Firth, the national flag is imbued with “the sacred character of the nation; it is revered by loyal citizens and ritually defiled by those who wish to make a protest” (Billig 1995, 39). Many African flags include the Pan-African colors of green, yellow (gold), and red, the greens sometimes associated with Islam. For instance, the flag of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania is green with a crescent moon and star, in yellow, at the center reflecting the majority Islamic faith. Islam may influence more directly the form of the national flag. Thus, the first Mali flag adopted in April 1959, when Mali was part of a federation with Senegal and French Sudan, had a “kanaga” – a black man-like figure – superimposed on the central yellow band. In 1961 this figure was removed, under pressure from Islamic groups (<http://fotw.vexillum.com/flags/ml.html>, 2). Marina Warner (1983) has shown how allegorical forms of women representing nations perform functions they would not normally be expected to do – for example, as judges, statesmen, or soldiers; Britannia, Marianne, and “Mother Russia” are such figures (T. Cusack and Bhreathnach-Lynch, 2003). Such allegorical visual representations of women are unlikely to be used as national symbols in the Islamic world.

A turn to Islam in late twentieth-century Sub-Saharan Africa has often had a negative impact on women’s rights. In Sudan, the family code of 1991 established Sharī’a law and limited women’s rights; this reached a peak in 1996 when, for example, women in Khartoum were only allowed to work if it was an extension of their domestic duties (Lesch 1998, 133–4). In contrast, women have played an important role in the ruling National Islamic Front (Eickelman and Piscatori, 95). The Sudanese flag, adopted in 1970, uses the pan-Arab colors – red, white, black, and green – perhaps pulling Sudanese identity, and the “sacred character of the nation” more toward the center of the Islamic world and away from Sub-Saharan Africa (<http://www.sudan.net/society/flag.shtml>).

If we accept the generalization that religious and ethnic traditions are often implicated in the maintenance of masculine dominance (Vail 1989, 14), perhaps the modernizing component of nationalism might be seen as improving the lives of women. In Senegal, a secular republic with a 94 percent Muslim population, the government has used the Islamic Brotherhoods as religious intermediaries between the state and people. It has had a modernizing agenda and has made considerable efforts, for example, to encourage families to educate girls (Gordon and Gordon 2001, 282) and in the 1990s the government appointed a minister for African women's emancipation, Ms. Awa Guéye Kébé. In rural areas women who have taken part in the Tostan ("breaking out of the egg" in the Wolof language) education program have initiated movements to stop the practice of female circumcision (Easton 1998). So despite the still poor literacy levels of women, the Senegalese flag might perhaps be perceived by women as a symbol of the modern face of the nation that allows for their empowerment. Despite the evidence that nations are gendered so as to disadvantage women, the nation-state remains the chief means for economic development and modernization. National symbols are more likely to be associated with bettering the lives of women than grounding them in tradition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- E. Balibar and I. Wallerstein, Race, nation, class, London 1991.
- M. Billig, Banal nationalism, London 1995.
- I. Cusack, Hispanic and Bantu inheritance, trauma, dispersal and return. Some contributions to a sense of national identity in Equatorial Guinea, in Nations and Nationalism 5 (1999), 207–36.
- , Pots, pens and "eating out the body." Cuisine and the gendering of African nations, in Nations and Nationalism 9 (2003), 277–96.
- T. Cusack, Janus and gender. Women and the nation's backward look, in Nations and Nationalism 6 (2000), 541–61.
- T. Cusack and S. Bhreathnach-Lynch, Art, nation and gender. Ethnic landscapes, myths and mother-figures, London 2003.
- P. Easton, Senegalese women remake culture, in World Bank, IK Notes, 3, 1998, <<http://www.worldbank.org/aftdr/ik/default.htm>>.
- D. F. Eickelman and J. Piscatori, Muslim politics, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- L. J. Fosse, Negotiating the nation. Ethnicity, nationalism and nation-building in independent Namibia, in Nations and Nationalism 3 (1997), 427–50.
- A. A. Gordon and D. L. Gordon, Understanding contemporary Africa, Boulder, Colo. 2001³.
- A. M. Lesch, Sudan. Contested national identities, Oxford 1998.
- G. Mikell (ed.), African feminism, Philadelphia 1997.
- C. B. Steiner, The invisible face. Masks, ethnicity, and the state in Côte d'Ivoire, in R. R. Grinker and C. B. Steiner (eds.), Perspectives on Africa, Oxford 1997, 671–7.
- L. Vail, Introduction, in L. Vail (ed.), The creation of tribalism in southern Africa, London 1989, 1–19.
- M. Warner, Monuments and maidens. The allegory of the female form, London 1983.
- R. Werbner (ed.), Memory and the postcolony. African anthropology and the critique of power, London 1998.

IGOR CUSACK

Networks

North Africa

In North Africa, a person's network consists of a web of social ties with kin, neighbors, friends, and (less commonly for women) co-workers maintained primarily through face to face interactions. Due to Arab-Islamic cultural norms segregating the sexes, men generally socialize with male network members in non-domestic spaces: in cafes, playing board games on street corners, at work, or at public celebrations such as weddings and circumcisions. Likewise, women typically interact with network members in female spaces: paying visits to each other's homes, and taking group female trips to the public baths (hammams), local shrines (marabūt), and even the beach. While Western ideals of companionship between married couples are reflected today in the increase of mixed-sex socializing at weddings and family events, the majority of men's and women's network interactions continue to be sex-segregated. It is not surprising, therefore, that husbands' and wives' networks are often distinct and separate. There is some evidence to suggest that women's networks may cross-cut the more rigid patronage and political lines of men's networks, creating a more diverse and flexible base of female alliances and loyalties.

Despite women's increasing education and entrance into the workforce (Tunisia leads the region in this regard), women's networks continue to be predominantly kin based. Friends, neighbors, co-workers, and other outsiders form a relatively small portion of the networks of rural and lower-class women's networks. In contrast to prevailing assumptions that the Arab patrilineal family severs women's natal ties, a number of studies demonstrate that after marriage North African women continue to visit and remain close to their natal family, reflecting a female bilateral pattern. This pattern is particularly pronounced among the Berber populations of Morocco and Algeria.

Class, region of origin, and a woman's education all play a role in the composition of networks. After migration to major urban areas, or even internationally, women and their husbands maintain strong ties to their home communities, preferring to interact with, marry, and live near others from the same region and social class. Since membership in a network requires frequent reciprocal exchanges of visits, gifts, and services, networks typically delimit social and class boundaries. A family's social status is defined by its ability to afford to provide the lavish food and hospitality expected by guests in the upper and even middle classes. "Keeping up with the Joneses" (or Abdurahmans in the North African case) is not defined by the size of one's house or car, but by the generosity of one's table and the ability to provide equally valuable social connections and services.

Consequently, visiting networks play a critical role in the economic success and physical survival of a woman and her family. Social networks provide access to goods and services that are difficult to obtain – ranging from foreign electronics to skilled medical care – and provide critical information, whether about jobs, ways to circumvent government regulations, or even the whereabouts of a new shipment of Adidas sneakers in the nearby market. In a region where social welfare programs are limited and poorly implemented, a woman's social network may be her only source of assistance during a serious illness, the death of her husband, or the sudden loss of her father's job.

Although the advent of cars, electronic mail, and cellular phones, and increasing female literacy rates has made communication with network members easier for a small segment of the population, in North Africa hospitality, visiting, and face to face interactions continue to be the primary means of maintaining network ties. Whether daily drop-in visits to a neighbor, or a formal visit at a religious holiday, women's visits are essential in confirming ties to network members. Daily visits to nearby kin and neighbors are generally an informal affair. Visitors may be offered a simple glass of tea, but otherwise are expected to join in the household tasks on hand, whether it be shelling nuts, knitting and sewing, or tending the children. On weekends women and their families make more formal visits, dressing in their finest clothes to pay a call to friends and family not seen during the week. Frequently, weekend visits take on the appearance of large family reunions as relatives from the surrounding area congregate at an older parent's or grandparent's home to eat dinner, drink tea, and watch television together. These visits cultivate intimate ties with a group of close network members who may be counted upon for assistance during life crisis events.

Visits at religious celebrations (ayād) and life cycle events (munāsabāt) play an important role in reaffirming ties with a larger group of useful connections who can provide information and practical help: obtaining jobs, circumventing government red tape, or locating services such as mechanical repair. Arab tradition requires that friends and relatives visit a woman on the seventh day after the birth of a child. Following a death, a formal visit to bereaved family members is also expected during a seven- to ten-day mourning period. And, depending on the region and local cultural traditions, weddings, engagements, and circumcisions are celebrated over a one- to seven-day period, during which network members visit and attend parties, bearing gifts of food, money, or household items.

Muslim religious holidays also require the exchange of visits and food to maintain network ties. Although there are numerous small religious holidays and special regional saints' days that vary throughout the area, the four primary holidays observed are: Mawlid (the birth of the Prophet Muḥammad), Ramadan (the month of fasting), ʿĪd Ṣaghīr (a two-day holiday following Ramadan), and ʿĪd Kabīr (commemorating the prophet Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac). During each of these holidays, women prepare special dishes and cakes, each region proud of its own unique foods. In most Arab communities in North Africa these dishes and cakes are served during formal holiday visits to as many as several hundred network members. Barring extreme illness or age, failure to visit during these life cycle events and holidays can be sufficient justification for terminating a relationship.

Visiting, exchanging gifts, and maintaining network ties form a central part of Muslim North African women's daily lives and experience. Given the social, practical, and economic importance of women's networks, a woman's daily world of interacting with and visiting female kin, friends, and neighbors, not only provides companionship and joy, but solace and support throughout her life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Bourqia, M. Charrad, and N. Gallagher (eds.), Femmes, culture et société au Maghreb, Casablanca 1996.
- S. S. Davis, Patience and power. Women's lives in a Moroccan village, Cambridge, Mass. 1983.
- E. Fernea. A street in Marrakech, New York 1975.
- P. Holmes-Eber, Daughters of Tunis. Women, family and networks in a Muslim city, Boulder, Colo. 2002.
- H. Hoodfar, Between marriage and the market. Intimate politics and survival in Cairo, Berkeley 1997.
- D. Mahfoudh, Paysannes de Marnissa. Le difficile accès à la modernité, Tunis 1993.
- D. Singerman, Engaging informality. Women, work and politics in Cairo, in R. Lobban (ed.), Middle Eastern women and the informal economy, Gainesville, Fla. 1998, 262–86.

PAULA HOLMES-EBER

The Ottoman Empire

Ottoman women's networks were webs of loose and easily maintained ties that structured the culture of women's worlds, could be mobilized to provide support for families and households, and also functioned to provide access and information between parts of a society. Since the Ottoman Empire spanned seven centuries and included societies from Eastern Europe to Mesopotamia, and since only infrequent glimpses of women's culture are preserved in the historical record, it is impossible to survey the full range of types of women's networks historically or geographically. This entry focuses on women's networks of the Arab Ottoman provinces and practices which, even as they declined through much of the post-imperial era, were remembered by female informants as the way things were done in generations past, but also persisted into the twentieth century because their of their fundamental utility in organizing societies. The ties of female kin, the informal gatherings of neighbors, the formal visits of social self-presentation and marriage scouting, the circulation of midwives and female entertainers through all strata of society, and later the emergence of literary and cultural salons and charitable committees run and frequented by Young Ottoman women provided critical arenas for cultural development, for emotional and material support, and for information about the market and politics.

KINSHIP

The most basic and important form of women's network in Ottoman society was the web of kin relations preserved by religious and legal understandings of the mutual obligations of spouses, parents and children, and siblings and extended families, and reinforced through the devolution of wealth through gift giving, care provision, and inheritance and marriage payments. Maternal and affective webs of kinship were brought to life by the principal of ṣilāt al-raḥim (literally, the bonds of the womb). Understood through the secondary meaning of raḥma (tenderness), this Arabic term emphasizes the maternal and distant relatives whose ties are not those of juridical obligation but ones of love. The ties of ṣilāt al-raḥim were cultivated through festive gatherings of female relatives (mothers, daughters, sisters, aunts, and cousins) as well as through labor sharing and emotional and other types of support in hard times.

Kinship terminology shows that men who would not necessarily belong to the same circles are linked by their relations to women's kin networks. Perceiving the ways in which people are brought together by networks of female relatives adds a dimension to an understanding of juridical paternal kin relations or male dominated religious, guild, or military organizations.

FRIENDSHIP

The reciprocity that allowed female relatives to exchange visits, time, labor, and even financial support across households provided a template for visits based on physical proximity, namely the custom of the şubhiyya (literally, morning event) in which neighbors would regularly get together for conversation, coffee, or refreshments, or seasonal or occasional communal labor after the men had left the house and before the daily routine of housework and food preparation had begun in each home. These neighborly gatherings or visits were marked by informality of dress and manner and access through back doors, over rooftops, or within buildings or compounds. Other neighborly networks were cultivated by the occasional exchange of a plate of cooked food from one house to the next. To return an empty plate would be a breach of etiquette and a lost opportunity to strengthen a bond of proximity and friendship.

The informal morning visits in particular were the locus for the exchange of information ranging from marital politics and advice to discussion of the market, often based on the last evening's discussion with menfolk, and formed a parallel track to what male merchants would discuss in the market and coffeehouse. The neighborly şubhiyya may often have served as a financial pool in which periodic contributions were combined and paid out in turn to the members of the pool for emergencies, personal items (such as gold), or even subsidies for male relations' enterprises.

More formal afternoon gatherings took place after the day's work had been done and the day's main meal had been served. These istiqbāl or reception visits reinforced broader but more select social groups, and they involved formal dressing, exiting the compound or the neighborhood, and more mannered self-presentation. A hostess might invite her group of friends, neighbors, and relatives to a special occasion to invoke God's blessing for a particular problem or individual in her family. Similar festive gatherings took place in cities' most private public place, the bath or hammam. The musicians who entertained at female gatherings, as well as the midwives who attended to women from all walks of life, circulated between various milieus and provided points of contact between distinct quarter and class social circles.

PATRONAGE, CIVIC ASSOCIATIONS, AND REFORM

The women's networks that underlay elite Istanbul society provided an important infrastructure for discourses of reform and enlightenment. In the 1870s and 1880s, the female poet Sair Nigar Hanım held a weekly salon on Tuesdays at her mansion in Istanbul attended by intellectuals and reform politicians. Her intellectual-in-residence for these salons was the newspaper woman and novelist Fatma Aliye and the circle included the prominent educator Ayşe Sidika. These women, all members of prominent Istanbul reformist families, used the local tradition of women's sociability as well as a French model of the salon to nurture an Ottoman national reform agenda.

Women's traditional networks were also mobilized at the end of the Ottoman period around charitable work and war relief efforts. Between 40 and 100 women's civic organizations were established between the fall of Sultan Abdülhamid and the founding of the Turkish Republic. These ranged from the Ottoman Ladies' Organization for the Uplifting of the Homeland (officially registered under the Committee of Union and Progress's "Law of Organizations" in 1909), to the Turkish Women Tailor's Cutting Home (registered in 1913), to the Mutual Support Organization of Circassian Women (registered in 1919). The legacy of Ottoman women's formal and informal networks continued to be important well into the national period.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Bekiroğlu, Ottoman female poets, in K. Çiçek et al. (eds.), The great Ottoman-Turkish civilization, Ankara 2000, 249–59.
- H. Edib, Memoirs of Halidé Edib, New York 1926.
- H. Gerber, Social and economic position of women in an Ottoman city, Bursa 1600–1700, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 12 (1980), 231–44.
- L. Hanimefendi, The imperial harem of the sultans. Daily life at the Çırağan Palace during the nineteenth century, Istanbul 1995.
- K. Kreiser, Women in the Ottoman world. A bibliographical essay, in Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 13:2 (2002), 197–206.
- A. Marcus, Men, women and property. Dealers in real estate in eighteenth-century Aleppo, in Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 26 (1983), 137–63.
- Ş. Mardin, The genesis of young Ottoman thought. A study in the modernization of Turkish political ideas, Princeton, N.J. 1962.

- M. L. Meriwether, The kin who count. Family and society in Ottoman Aleppo, Austin, Tex. 1999.
- J. Pardoe, The city of the sultan, and domestic manners of the Turks in 1836, Philadelphia 1837.
- L. Peirce, Gender and sexual propriety in Ottoman royal women's patronage, in D. F. Ruggles (ed.), Women, patronage and self-representation in Islamic studies, Albany, N.Y. 2000, 53–68.
- , The imperial harem. Women and sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, Oxford 1993.
- H. Sha'rāwī, Harem years. The memoirs of an Egyptian feminist 1879–1924, trans. M. Badran, London 1986.
- A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- N. A. N. M. Van Os, Ottoman women's organizations. Sources of the past, sources for the future, in Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 11:3 (2000), 369–83.
- M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle East women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997.

LEILA HUDSON

South Asia

Visiting each other during the day, when husbands and children are at work and school, is a common practice for housewives of urban upper-middle classes in contemporary South Asia. In fact, this practice dates back many generations, and was prominent amongst the women of the Muslim intelligentsia in pre-partition India as well, as referenced in many women's novels of the time, such as those by Mastoor (1952), Fatima (1993), Shah-nawaz (1957) or Chughtai (1995). Here, as in contemporary urban life, such visits serve as a source of bonding for the women, who drop in informally at neighborhood homes for a cup of tea and biscuits around 11 a.m. (before lunch time), as well as an opportunity to exchange neighborhood gossip, particularly on the topics of love, marriage, and childbirth.

Then there are the mayun gatherings, when women relatives and friends of prospective brides meet at the home of the bride-to-be every evening for several weeks prior to the wedding ceremony. These informal gatherings are an opportunity to tease and prepare the bride on how to become a proper "wife." They also afford older women with marriageable sons a chance to scout out prospective daughters-in-law from among the unmarried eligible girls participating in the song-and-dance festivities during this mayun period – when the bride-to-be is also supposed to be in seclusion from all male relatives and the outside world in general, confined to the home and also restricted to wearing yellow-colored clothing, which she will change only on the day of her wedding.

Coffee mornings are a more formal networking occasion, again for women belonging to the upper or more elite echelons of society. Women do not "drop in" on these occasions, rather, they must be invited by the hostess. The occasion serves as an excuse for high society women to dress up and arrive in their silk shalwar kameezes or latest imported Western fashions. Topics for discussion may be the errant behavior of a husband, or the illness of a mother or grandmother, or laments about the disrespectful behavior of servants, or the latest scandal involving a corrupt politician, or even the extra-marital affair of a friend or acquaintance. Women launching into some business venture, particularly involving the fashion industry, dressmaking, and so forth, may use a coffee morning to showcase some of their merchandise or at the very least advertise their new business. Women involved in social work or other welfare schemes will also use these occasions to discuss upcoming charity functions, and the like, and round up volunteers to help out with these functions, or with collecting donations from their rich husbands or other relatives and friends.

Milads are other social gatherings that have been taking place amongst Sunnī Muslim women in Pakistan since its formation in 1947, and which, of late, have regained their popularity as religious zeal has intensified among the previously more secular upper classes, although women of all social classes have always regularly held these functions at their homes. A milad is essentially a prayer-meeting, in the form of a party. These all-female events are held year-round, and a woman will hold a milad party if she has a particular favor to ask of God (known as a manat) – in return for the granting of which favor she will promise to donate food or money to the poor. Sometimes a milad is simply a thanksgiving party, and women gather to sing hymns dedicated to the Prophet Muḥammad (pbuh), asking for his spirit to bless the home of the hostess and the invitees as well. The bulk of the event consists of women reading the Qur'ān collectively, and then, when all 30 sections have been read, dates are passed around, hymns are sung, and the gathering then indulges in rich and tasty foods and desserts and tea or soft drinks, before the party breaks up. These gatherings tend to last several hours and can be either morning or afternoon affairs.

While milads have been common forms of networking for women of the lower middle classes and the urban elite, they have become much more institutionalized and popular over the past decade, taking place in the homes of the very wealthy and privileged women as well. They now often take the form of dars parties, that is, Qur'anic instruction is a regular feature of these gatherings, with sessions often led by a woman who could be described as a female equivalent of a mullah – a learned teacher of the Qur'an and hadīth. The educated and wealthy urban women have donated vast sums of money to build or rent spacious halls and buildings in big towns and cities across Pakistan where formal dars or instructional classes in Qur'anic exegesis are held, where women can enroll for short or long courses for a nominal fee. The atmosphere in private homes has also become more religious, and many women choose to hold similar dars-type events in their homes that are also occasions for social networking.

A Shī'ī version of a milad is known as a majlis. These gatherings take place specifically during the Islamic calendar month of Muḥarram, when the Prophet Muḥammad's (pbuh) grandson Ḥusayn was brutally killed during battle in the seventh century C.E. Shī'ī Muslims the world over commemorate his martyrdom to this day by holding mourning meetings every year throughout this month which culminate in a frenzied night of self-flagellation and blood-letting accompanied by intense singing of devotional songs. While the most extreme forms of these practices are reserved for men, Shī'ī women and girls also organize gatherings at their homes and at devotional gathering-places known as "imam baras," in various neighborhoods, and get together to sing mourning dirges, cry, beat their chests, and listen to stories recited by a female religious leader in praise of Ḥusayn's sacrifice for his people, as well as to listen and weep at his sister Zaynab's pure and abiding love for her brother. These occasions serve as a way for the women of this community to reassert their commonality and share their collective pain, and indeed, are cathartic occasions where stories of spiritual miracles pertaining to the martyrdom are exchanged in a spirit of religious bonding. Such occasions also serve the secular function of providing mothers an opportunity to survey the gathering for prospective daughters-in-law.

While milad and majlis parties do take place in some Muslim households in India, and somewhat more frequently in Bangladesh, these practices are not as widespread there as they seem to be in Pakistan. Indeed, they appear to be more confined to a lower socioeconomic stratum of Muslims. The more educated women of the contemporary Muslim elite in India tend to be more secular-minded, and instead of milads, prefer to hold "kitty-parties," a practice which involves several women getting together on a monthly basis after agreeing to contribute a certain pre-agreed amount of money to a kitty. Each month, the sum goes to one of the women in the group. This large sum of money is most often used by the winner of the kitty to purchase big-ticket household items, and occasionally, gold jewelry. Kitty-parties are fairly common practice across South Asia.

There are also potluck lunches held in mixed communities in smaller towns in India such as Benares, which provide educated middle- and upper-class women of both Muslim and Hindu backgrounds to mingle without their menfolk or children present. The women present at these generally informal and often last-minute get-togethers are relatives living in proximity to each other as well as neighborhood women. These religiously mixed or diverse neighborhoods tend to have a similar class composition, whereas Muslim-concentrated neighborhoods or muḥallas tend to be much more class-stratified. In such neighborhoods in Lucknow and Benares, for example, there is not much social intermingling between Muslim women of different classes, save for an occasional conventional greeting exchanged between a woman of a higher socioeconomic class and a woman from a lower class who might be standing at her doorstep while the former walks past. The lower-class woman will usually be illiterate and may visit the upper-class woman's home to have a letter read from her village. Some of the educated women in these neighborhoods start informal schools in their homes to educate the female children of these women, who may also be servants in their homes, and this becomes another means of networking between women of different class backgrounds.

Finally, there is a large and growing network of women's non-governmental organizations (NGOs) across South Asia, which has arisen to fill the gap left by governments that are largely non-responsive to the educational and social welfare needs of their poorest citizens, amongst whom the majority happen to be women. From the "do-good" volunteer model, there are now the professionally run women's organizations, including theater groups that mount educational plays and skits in the most downtrodden communities and neighborhoods, with women and girls comprising the bulk of the audience. Here is an example of a social networking that turns into an opportunity for education and empowerment for social change. Other types of NGOs, such as the Grameen Bank in Bangladesh, provide women with increased financial viability which also encourages new forms of networking, and which in turn leads them to consolidate their sense of empowerment through female solidarity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Ahmed, The hopes of Bangladeshi women. The social impact of the Micro Credit Program, Dickey fellowship report 2000, <www.alum.dartmouth.org/classes/66/interns>.
- I. Chughtai, The crooked line, trans. T. Naqai, Oxford 1995.
- A. Fatima, The one who did not ask, trans. R. Ahmad, Oxford 1993.
- R. Ghadially, Women in Indian society. A reader, New Delhi 1988.
- M. Hydari, Crossing boundaries – Dr. Farhat Hashmi makes her presence felt in UAE, in Dawn (Karachi) 2003.
- N. S. Khan et al. (eds.), Aspects of women and development, Lahore 1995
- K. Mastoor, The inner courtyard, trans. N. Hussein, Lahore 2000.
- F. Shaheed et al. (eds.), Shaping women's lives, Lahore 1998.
- M. Shah Nawaz, The heart divided, Lahore 1957.
- F. Zafar (ed.), Finding our way. Readings on women in Pakistan, Lahore 1991.

FAWZIA AFZAL-KHAN

Turkey

A gendered spatial organization offers women advantages as well as disadvantages. Within societies in which social space is separated according to gender, distinct women's cultures can emerge. Women's visits to each other's homes, to religious sites, and their role in a range of life cycle rituals take on definite social and political significance. One of the effects of the separation of space by gender is that the stricter the boundary between the two domains, the greater the possibility that a certain independence of the female domain will emerge. In such a situation a rich social life and forms of intimacy among women develop. When spatial separation occurs within a society in which men's political patronage networks need to be as wide as possible, women's networks and channels of communication become important to men.

In some regions and societies, restrictions on women's movements through space counter these potentialities, but in Turkey many women have enjoyed considerable autonomy within and between the spaces allocated to them. Under both the imperial society of the Ottoman era (1453–1918) and the secular republic established in the 1920s, Turkish women have a long tradition of visiting and excursions outside the home. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (Murphy 1988, 111), an early European observer, remarked upon the comparative freedom of the wealthy and powerful women she moved among but later foreign observers sometimes dismissed women's sociality as trivial. These later observers failed to appreciate both the ways in which visiting was integrated into status and power networks and their significance in sustaining women's interests within society more generally.

A number of scholars have described the formalized visiting patterns found among Turkish women (Aswad 1967, Benedict 1974, Dobkin 1974, Fallers and Fallers 1976) and the ways in which women's networks provided both social support and important forums for the circulation of information. Beck and Keddie's important book, Women in the Muslim World (1978) brought together the first fruits of the new wave of scholarly interest in the lives of Muslim women and provided a crucial foundation for the work that followed. Kıray (1981) identified four types of visit among women living in the Black Sea town of Ereğli and these forms are found across Turkey. The first was the informal visits of poorer women as they passed their leisure time together. The second was the regular, formal visiting day with formal food and drink held by better off women and from which children are generally excluded. Then there were women's ceremonial visits to households, particularly for the performance of death ceremonies as well as for other life cycle events, leisure excursions to parks, the cinema, or a women-only beach, and visits to the main markets. Women also visit saints' shrines. In the major cities where attendance at visiting days can be difficult, working women may attend afternoon teas held at about five o'clock. Taken together, these patterns of women-only visits and excursions add up to a social life that is far from the lonely seclusion of the Orientalized Western imagination.

Studies emerging under the influence of feminist theory and the women's movement of the 1970s generally adopted some form of structural analysis in developing understandings of the ways in which women's space was established and of how women lived their lives within them. In particular, there was considerable interest in examining the public/private division of space associated with bourgeois modernity as it developed in European states. Many studies considered whether patterns of seclusion should be considered in terms of public and private, whether the private and domestic domain should be given a less subordinate position than it enjoyed in secular, modern societies, and whether religious beliefs could be thought of as causing the seclusion of women. Kıray (1981) argued that visits exchanged between women's homes were equivalent to the ways in which men received visits in coffee shops and that the important role of women in directing the family economy and family relationships saw the emergence of a women-only subculture of mature and responsible personalities (Kıray 1981, 268). Turkish women enjoy the sociality of these visits and they help to develop the independence of mind and personal authority so striking to foreign observers. Kıray's data and interpretation of them remain important in countering Orientalist perceptions of women's lives and in accounting for the personal strength of women who were widely believed to be oppressed, subservient, and silent. They also direct attention to theoretical developments emerging from the work of scholars who have attempted to rethink the public-private dichotomy both from within and from outside existing epistemologies. Marcus (1992, 119), for example, argued that while there is a female domain that is centered on the household, it cannot be described as private or equated to the private domain of Western modernity. Rather, she held, the household is a center for women's public, sociable, and religious lives.

More recently, women scholars writing from within the Middle East and North Africa have developed a number of powerful analytical responses to the concepts of public/private and sex/gender found in universalizing narratives of modernization and aspects of feminist theory as it emerged from the 1960s. For Turkey, the reworking of public and private in the work of Göle (1997, 2002) is of great interest. She points to a very different articulation of gender, space, and modernity in Turkey, one which bears strongly upon debates about the subordination of women, the nature of sexuality, and the lives of women and men in modern Islamist states and societies. Driven by current political events, much recent attention has been given to veiling rather than to segregated space (for example, Yegenöglü 1998); however the effects of a lessening of gender-segregated activities on women's emotional and political independence and sociality needs further study.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Aswad, Key and peripheral roles of noble women in a Middle Eastern plains village, in Anthropological Quarterly 40 (1967), 139–52.
- , Property control and social strategies. Settlers on a Middle Eastern plain, Cambridge, Mass., 1971.
- L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978.
- P. Benedict, The kabul gunu. Structural visiting in an Anatolian provincial town, in Anthropological Quarterly 47:3 (1974), 28–47.
- M. Dobkin, Social ranking in the women's world of purdah. A Turkish example, in Anthropological Quarterly 40:2 (1974), 65–72.
- L. Fallers and M. Fallers, Sex roles in Edremit, in J. Peristiany (ed.), Mediterranean family structures, Cambridge 1976, 243–61.
- N. Göle, The gendered nature of the public sphere, in Public Culture 10:1 (1997), 61–81.
- , Islam in public. New visibilities and new imaginaries, in Public Culture 14:1 (2002), 173–190.
- M.-J. DelVecchio Good, A comparative perspective on women in provincial Iran and Turkey, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass., 1978, 482–500.
- D. Kandiyoti, Sex roles and social change. A comparative appraisal of Turkey's women, in Signs 3:1 (1977), 57–73.
- M. Kıray, Changing roles of mothers. Intra-family relations in a Turkish town, in J. Peristiany (ed.), Mediterranean family structures, Cambridge 1976, 259–74.
- , The women of small towns, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 259–74.
- F. Mansur, Bodrum. A town in the Aegean, Leiden 1972.
- F. Mansur Koşar, Women in Turkish society, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass., 1978, 124–140.
- J. Marcus, A world of difference. Islam and gender hierarchy in Turkey, Sydney 1992.
- F. Mernissi, Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in modern Muslim society, Bloomington, Ind., 1987.
- D. Murphy, Embassy to Constantinople. The travels of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, London 1988.
- M. Yegenöglü, Colonial fantasies. Towards a feminist reading of Orientalism, Cambridge 1998

JULIE MARCUS

Western Europe

WOMEN'S INFORMAL NETWORKS AND THE INTERDOMESTIC DOMAIN

Discussions of women's position in Muslim society have repeatedly highlighted the importance of "women's worlds" in contexts of strictly gendered divisions of labor and female seclusion (purdah). In Bosnia, female neighborly networks are formed around coffee morning visiting (Brinja 1995). Intimate circles often articulate counter-hegemonic resistance to male domination (Abu-Lughod 1986). The theoretical point underlying these studies is summed up by Rosaldo's argument that women's position is raised when they can challenge male claims to authority "by creating a sense of rank, order and value in a world of their own" (1974, 36).

The crucial role played by British Pakistani women migrants in creating and controlling the interdomestic domain of sociability between families, neighbors, and friends is developed by Werbner (2002a). In Pakistan, Punjabi women traditionally manage the ritual gift economy known as lena dena, practiced during life-course rituals, particularly weddings (Eglar 1960). Werbner shows that the translocation of lena dena to Britain was the product of gendered power struggles between married women and their spouses: migrant women fought to recapture this domain, often against the explicit wishes of husbands who regarded ritual gifting as wasteful. In Manchester, women entered the British labor market, often as clothing machinists, to finance their pivotal role as symbolic transactors of gold, cloth, food, and money between households. The scale and cost of celebrations, particularly weddings, is huge.

Writing on recently arrived Moroccans in Italy, Salih found a preference for holding wedding rituals in Morocco, true also of Moroccans in France, Belgium, and Holland, despite lengthy sojourning (2003, 83). Such rituals serve to reintegrate migrants symbolically into their home communities, while enabling them to display their newly acquired wealth and Western lifestyles. Weddings are occasions for family reunions of migrants settled in different European countries.

For Pakistani migrants, the female mehndi (henna) pre-wedding ritual is the most elaborate within a complex cycle of rituals. Werbner describes the symbolic transformations occurring during the mehndi which, she argues, move bride and groom from a state of culturally constrained “coldness” to framed “heat,” in anticipation of the consummation of the marriage. Equivalent female henna rituals known as kina gecesi, laylat al-ḥimmā or mehndi, are held by Turkish, Moroccan, and Surinamese Hindustani Muslim migrants in the Netherlands (Dessing 2001). The female dresser, negaffa, paints the Moroccan bride with henna and plays an important role in the wedding reception, in which the bride changes her clothes several times, and is carried around the hall amidst singing and ullulating. As among Pakistanis, weddings involve elaborate exchange relations.

Importantly, much like in India (Raheja and Gold 1994), the Pakistani mehndi is an occasion for bawdy singing, sexual clowning, and masquerade, in what might be termed a resistive or counter-hegemonic commentary both on the status of women in Muslim Punjabi society, and of Pakistani migrants within British society. Such clowning is not simply reflexive; it fulfils a symbolic transformational role in the ritual process, occurring at a key liminal moment, before the clown is banished amidst gales of laughter by the women (Werbner 2002a). Mehndi rituals allow for inventiveness and cultural hybridity, while revitalizing through aesthetic performance the substances, foods, music, and dance of the homeland. The groom is subjected to hazing, sexual joking, and forced feeding by the female bride receivers, underlining the power and control of Punjabi women over the domestic domain. As Raheja and Gold also argue, such rituals highlight the uninhibited expressive sexuality of South Asian women. Not surprisingly, mehndis are disapproved of by Muslim reformists and Islamists.

A key issue concerns the migrants’ move from initial isolation to sociability. Saifullah Khan (1977) argued that the supportive world of village women is disrupted when Mirpuri migrant women move to Bradford and are kept isolated in strict purdah in their homes. This is, however, only a stage: the need is to recognize the intersection of the labor migration cycle with the familial life cycle (Werbner 2002a). As families mature, women begin to develop extensive social networks, expanded further as weddings, funerals, and khataṁ Qur’ān multiply.

The movement in purdah can be represented diagrammatically (after Werbner 2002a, 150).

DOMESTIC LIFE CYCLE PHASE

Young family

	Isolated women	Secluded women, but frequent contact with female kinswomen or friends (sometimes work)
MIGRATION PHASE	Initial	Settled
	Isolated, but for a relatively short period (rarely work)	Extensive women-centered interhousehold network (often work)
		Mature family

The centrality of women in “pre-political contexts of everyday life” is one stressed by Ålund in her study of Yugoslav women in Stockholm. She argues that “rather than being passive victims, women who have migrated actively employ the complex cultural symbolism of their histories to challenge contemporary forms of subordination and, in the process, they create new solidarities” (1999, 150–1). As in Bosnia, so too in Sweden women sustain informal networks and foster cross-ethnic local solidarities. Palestinian women asylum seekers in Berlin from Lebanon use streets as intense spaces of sociability and intimacy (Abdulrahim 1996, 62–3). Their networks incorporate Lebanese, Palestinian, Kurdish, and other Arabic speaking women and are instrumental for keeping tabs on husbands and maximizing access to services. Courtyards, parks corners, and squares are used for daily afternoon meetings, although women still suffer isolation, especially during the winter months.

The elaborate preparation of food, a major aspect of all interdomestic relations, is highlighted in a study of middle-class Iranian women migrants in Britain, who lay enormous stress on capturing the flavors and taste of Iranian food (Harbottle 2000). Food is also central to Algerians in South East France, whose rituals follow a set pattern: opening rite, prayers, meal, songs and dances, closing rite (Andezian 1990, 201). The food in such gatherings is blessed, containing baraka, and dhikr is performed, inducing ecstatic trance (ibid., 202). The female leader, the muqadma, presides over the rituals, conducts the supplicatory prayer (duʿā), mediates requests to saints, finds solutions to personal afflictions, and accompanies women on Sufi pilgrimage to Algeria. Such invisible neighborhood events, convened in the privacy of homes, link immigrant women of all ages in family, neighborhood, and friendship networks. Like Algerians in France, Pakistani women migrants in the United Kingdom convene domestic communal Qurʾān readings in which food is blessed, to mark death, personal crises, and moments of transition (Werbner 2002a).

Young girls and women figure prominently in Pakistani mehndi celebrations. They are the ones who dance, sing, and clown, supporting the bride. Hence networks of second-generation girls and younger women are formed around such interdomestic rituals and celebrations. As they mature, issues of female seclusion and arranged marriage have gained prominence. Quite often, pubescent girls’ movements are restricted and they are chaperoned, with family honor or the Islamic edicts regarding modesty repeatedly invoked. Fear of gossip is highly potent in close-knit Pakistani communities in Oxford, England, although illicit love affairs do occur (Shaw 2000, 172–3). Arranged marriages are a source of intergenerational conflict. The rate of Pakistani intercontinental marriages, often with close kin, continues to be high, with rising numbers of divorces and “forced” marriages, in which youngsters are coerced into marriage, sometimes abducted while on overseas visits.

ISLAMIZATION, HOME STUDY, AND ASSOCIATIONAL NETWORKS

Whether because of global trends toward Islamicization, or the maturation of second-generation migrant women, the spread of the hijāb (veil) has been marked in Muslim migrant communities across Western Europe, from Norway, Denmark, and Sweden to France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, and the United Kingdom, along with the proliferation of Islamic study groups (dars), as noted by Afshar (1998) and Schmidt (2004). These rotate between women’s homes or meet in mosques to interpret Qurʾānic verses or learn classical Arabic, often guided by a woman expert in Islamic studies. Some “born again” women belong to national and international networks, such as Al-Huda women’s network, which has its headquarters in Pakistan. These networks use electronic mail and the Internet. An increased knowledge of Islam allows young women to resist traditional customs as un-Islamic, and to demand the right to make their own marriage choices (Dwyer 1999, Schmidt 2004).

Countering these conservative trends are more radical networks, such as that of lesbian Muslim and South Asian women in Britain (Kawale 2003). Hence, along with the visible Islamicization there has also been a growth in women’s associational networks, whether philanthropic, Islamist, or radically critical of Muslim law and custom.

Turkish and Maghribi women’s associations in France differ (Yalçın-Heckman 1997), with Moroccans having stronger and wider contacts with French authorities. Second and third generation Maghribi women are better integrated into the social services and speak good French. Lloyd reports that since 1981, Algerian women in France have founded a vast number of “caring” and cultural associations, some oriented to the homeland (Lloyd 1999).

In the United Kingdom, Werbner (2002b) reports the emergence of a Pakistani women’s association that used satirical popular culture and spectacular philanthropic transnational activism to gain recognition. Many federated Muslim associations such as the Young Muslim Association of Britain or the United Kingdom Islamic Mission in Britain have women's sections. Sufi groups allow space for women. The network of Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML), which advocates against infringements of women's human rights in Muslim countries, has its headquarters in London.

Many activist secular associations are multiethnic. In the United Kingdom these include Southall Black Sisters, which advocates against domestic violence, and encompasses South Asian women irrespective of religious origin, and Women Against Fundamentalism, which recently has agitated for women's rights in Algeria (Lloyd 1999). During the autumn of 1998 a caravane of Algerian associations, with a very strong representation of women, toured France to raise funds and present information on the growth of civil society in Algeria. Associations joined to defend the rights of asylum seekers (sanspapiers) from Algeria and West Africa. In 1996, a protest began of asylum seekers from Mali and Senegal in which women took a leading role. Lloyd (2003) reports that the women were in a stronger position than men to build networked support because they had more contacts with neighborhood structures, such as schools, shops, and local services, and their organizations reached across ethnic and national boundaries. The protest culminated in a march of 100,000 public sector trade unionists. Such alliances have raised consciousness about the plight of asylum seekers in France, many of them from Muslim countries and many of them women.

CONCLUSION

Muslim migrant women's networks draw on cultural familiars translocated from home into the migration context, enabling migrant women despite their marginality to create new solidarities, to sustain networks for self help, sociability, and study, and, more rarely, to mobilize for political protest.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Abdulrahim, Defining gender in a second exile. Palestinian women in West Berlin, in G. Buijs (ed.), Migrant women. Crossing boundaries and changing identities, Oxford 1993, 55–81.
- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments. Honor and poetry in a Bedouin society, Berkeley 1986.
- H. Afshar, Strategies of resistance among the Muslim minority in West Yorkshire. Impact on women, in N. Charles and H. Hintje (eds.), Gender, ethnicity and political ideologies, London 1998, 107–26.
- A. Ålund, Feminism, multiculturalism, essentialism, in N. Yuval-Davis and P. Werbner (eds.), Women, citizenship and difference, London 1999, 147–61.
- S. Andezian, Migrant women in France, in T. Gerholm and Y. G. Lithman (eds.), The new Islamic presence in Western Europe, London 1990, 196–204.
- T. Brinja, Being Muslim the Bosnian way, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
- N. M. Dessing, Rituals of birth, circumcision, marriage, and death among Muslims in the Netherlands, Leuven 2001.
- C. Dwyer, Veiled meanings. Young British Muslim women and the negotiation of difference, in Gender, Place and Culture 6:1 (1999), 5–26.
- Z. Eglar, A Punjabi village in Pakistan, New York 1960.
- K. Gardner, Global migrants, local lives. Travel and transformation in rural Bangladesh, Oxford 1995.
- L. Harbottle, Food for health, food for wealth. The performance of ethnic and gender identities by Iranian settlers in Britain, Oxford 2000.
- R. Kawale, A kiss is just a kiss . . . or is it? South Asian lesbians and bisexual women and the construction of space, in N. Puwar and P. Raghuram (eds.), South Asian women in the diaspora, Oxford 2003, 181–200.
- C. Lloyd, Transnational mobilisations in contexts of violent conflict. The case of solidarity with women in Algeria, in Contemporary Politics 5:4 (1999), 365–77.
- , Antiracism, racism and asylum seekers in France, in Patterns of Prejudice 37 (2003), 3.
- G. G. Raheja and A. G. Gold, Listen to the heron's words. Reimagining gender and kinship in North India, Berkeley 1994.
- M. Z. Rosaldo, Women, culture and society. A theoretical overview, in M. Z. Rosaldo and M. Lamphere (eds.), Women, culture and society, Stanford 1974, 17–43.
- V. Saifullah-Khan, Pakistanis and social stress. Mirpuris in Bradford, in V. Saifullah-Khan (ed.), Families in Britain. Support and stress, London 1979, 35–58.
- R. Salih, Gender in transnationalism. Home, longing and belonging among Moroccan migrant women, London 2003.
- G. Schmidt, Identity formation among young Muslims. The case of Denmark, Sweden, and the United States, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 24:1 (2004), 31–46.
- A. Shaw, Kinship and continuity. Pakistani families in Britain, London 2000.
- P. Werbner, The migration process. Capital, gifts and offerings among British Pakistanis, Oxford 1990, repr. with new preface 2002a.
- , Imagined diasporas among Manchester Muslims, Oxford 2002b.
- L. Yalçin-Heckman, The perils of ethnic associational life in Europe. Turkish migrants in Germany and France, in T. Modood and P. Werbner (eds.), The politics of multiculturalism in the new Europe, London 1997, 91–110.

Patronage and Clientage

East Asia and Southeast Asia

An impressive amount of research has been conducted on the phenomenon of patronage and clientage. In literature, patronage and clientage are often used synonymously, particularly because anthropological and social science research uses the pattern of patron-client relationships to describe certain forms of dependency and/or loyalty-based interaction in societies. Both expressions refer to a male-oriented concept in ancient Rome, in which the patron (patronus) represented the protecting partner in a dyadic relationship. The patron was required to assist the client (cliens) in an emergency and defend him in trial. Originally, the client, who always came from a plebeian family, was an obedient servant, a protégé or a dependent slave, attached to a patrician family. Even though the plebeians were obliged to seek a patrician patron, they were free to choose the person they preferred. The client sought the patron's protection and delivered services in return. Later on, in the Caesarian period, the client was usually a poor citizen who served a member of the nobility and received accommodation and other privileges in return.

The early Roman relationship of patron and client implied a reciprocal moral obligation. The patron was morally required to support the client in public and private affairs, whereas the client was expected to display respect and thankfulness for the support he received. The tight personal relationship between the patron and the client (and his household) was initially a clear-cut power relation, but was gradually transformed into a relationship of trust and loyalty. The mutual trust as the core element of the partnership rendered the patron-client relation a lifetime contract, including the hereditary right of the descendants to continue it. As a societal institution, the patron-client relation was normative in moral rather than in legal regard (Weber Pazmiño 1991, 18–19). It was normally men who established the relationship with the client. The fact that the patronage was extended to his household indicates that the women and children were only “attached” to the contract.

Until the late 1960s, research on the topic was mainly conducted by cultural anthropologists. From then on, social scientists joined in to study patron-client relationships first from a sociological and then from a political science perspective. Following the thought pattern of modernization theory, clientelistic relationships were then seen as a feature of premodern societies, which were regarded as underdeveloped. Patronage and clientage were now mentioned in the context of clan structures, tribal culture, and feudal forms of interpersonal relations between the powerful and the powerless. As patronage was predominantly associated with religiously inspired developments in social organization, Catholicism became a focal point for scholars, resulting in extensive case studies focusing mainly on Latin America and Southern Europe. The subsequent extension of the geographical scope of research to Asia, however, challenged the general belief in the disappearance of patronage and clientage once modernization has been set into motion. Theories based on the Western model of development suggested that in industrialized states with complex social structures, the importance of informal institutions, such as patron-client contracts, would gradually be replaced by impersonal, formally legitimated institutions. This proved to be a too hastily generalized theoretical idea, as the case of Japan, one of the most striking cases of non-Western modernization, demonstrated. In Japan, familial ideology played an extraordinary role before the Second World War, when the entire concept of state was based on the principle of the “family state,” with the emperor as the godfather of the Japanese race. After the war, familial ideology formed an essential part of Japanese company life. This preservation of traditional values at a time of rapid modernization became crucial for the revision of the classic modernization theory.

For advanced analysis of patronage and clientage, the dynamic character of the phenomenon is relevant. Clientelistic relationships change not only according to their respective societal context; they are also contingent upon the historical setting in which they constitute a structural element of social organization. Irrespective of gender aspects and historical settings, clientelism implies three core elements: first, social inequality and asymmetry in the relation of the partners involved; second, the exchange of goods or services; and third a personal character of the relationship. Gender aspects of patronage and clientage relate to all three elements.

Who enters a clientelistic relationship and why?

In Asia, clientelism is linked ultimately to the forging of loyalty and to family ideology. In societies where descent is of importance, patrons of high-ranking families gather clients around themselves. Until the first half of the twentieth century, clients were not paid for their services with money. The reward for their work and services in paddy fields, in plantations, in orchards, in the house or elsewhere was simply food and accommodation. In modern days, this pattern changed and money began to play a prominent role in patron-client contracts. In Asia's Islamic societies, the patron families often claim a royal lineage – relatives and offspring of a sultan – or trace their family ties back to a syed (sayyid, of Arab origin). Until the late 1950s (or even later) it was not unusual in some regions for such families to educate and prepare their daughters for their future role as caretaker of the entire entourage of the patron, especially when there was no male family member available to perform this task after the patron passed away. The role of the hereditary caretaker thus became de-gendered to a certain extent.

In insular Southeast Asia, both the dyadic relationship between male patrons and clients and the concept of adopted sons and daughters are still in existence. Today, the patron family becomes the foster family, or keluarga angkat in Indonesian/Malay. On their way from one place to another, people can approach the house of a local family, beg for food and shelter and a space to lay down their head. Once they act like a son or daughter – being obedient and loyal to the parents, helping with the housework – they may be adopted by the respective family. While in former times this pattern worked for young people seeking shelter and a place to stay, its role today is more differentiated, ranging from a more or less symbolic expression of liking each other to very pragmatic forms of utilization in the political arena. Another pragmatic motivation for the adoption of a son or daughter is the lack or abundance of female or male children in a household. Since both sexes are assigned gendered roles, their presence is of importance for a family. Therefore, it is common practice to give a child to a related family when there is a need or reason to do so. The concept of keluarga angkat is not restricted to Muslims but is a common pattern practiced by families of various ethnic origins and religious orientations.

In Malaysia, adoption has developed into a modern form of a formerly informal, legally non-binding patron-client relationship. Here, the father of the family is even entitled to marry the adopted daughter, which gives the otherwise de-gendered practice a peculiar twist and reveals the dominant position of the male in this practice. Another gender bias is the fact that patron families nowadays have become more reluctant to adopt girls. Current administration requires the registration of adopted children, even if they are nephews or nieces of the same family. Rape and abuse of adopted girls cannot be completely avoided by way of registry, but the adoption is at least legally based, so that any kind of abuse of the relationship can be brought to trial.

It is remarkable that women in many Asian Islamic communities seek advice from an imam, a local shaykh, or an ‘ālim more often than men in order to cope with personal problems in daily life. The character of such a relationship is not so much shaped by the seeking of shelter or protection but by a mutual arrangement of “advice for money” – concerning matters such as which sūra of the Qur’ān should be read in order to ease physical, mental, or emotional pain. The relationship between a client and the provider of spiritual guidance need not last for a lifetime, although it is usually a steady connection. The reason for the higher frequency of female clients seeking help from religious advisors is believed to be the reluctance of men to admit the need for advice. For men, finding solutions for parental and marital problems is facilitated by the possibility of turning to a second, third, or fourth wife, whereas the women who are left behind often struggle to make ends meet, in particular when a regular source of income ceases to exist. The common term for advice from a wise person, and in particular from a religious celebrity, is “spiritual,” indicating that humans need more than material security in order to handle the challenges of life. A male bias lies in the fact that the spiritual leaders in these Islamic societies are solely men. There is no imāma, shaykha, or ‘ālima.

Patronage and clientage in Northeast Asia, in contrast, inherit elements of Confucian and Buddhist thought. Japan, Korea, and China have preserved these elements until today and have translated them into a modern context (the Japanese company functioning as a “family,” for example). Confucian principles relating to seniority and rules of respect within the family (younger brother–elder brother; son–father) do not explicitly refer to women. The status of woman in the hierarchical order, however, is lower than men’s. Within the hierarchical order, women assume a respected status only when no suitable male counterpart is available. In rural China, the system of patronage and clientage is ultimately linked to the clan structure, which is deeply embedded in Chinese society. In Japan, specific modes of interaction were cultivated during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, resulting in principles such as giri (owing somebody something based on moral duties), oyabu-kobun (the “parent” partner enjoying the loyalty of the “child” partner) or sempa-kōhai (the elder of two colleagues, students, schoolmates, and so forth taking care of the younger and enjoying the latter’s loyalty and obedience). In societies where seniority plays an important role, patronage and clientage have strong repercussions in the political and occupational arena. The representation of women in patron functions is rare even today. For most of the women in such societies, breaking through the glass ceiling requires a comprehensive restructuring of the male-dominated organizational arena. Therefore, it is the more remarkable that Northeast, Southeast and South Asia are outstanding examples in terms of the occurrence of female political top leadership. The succession to the posts of minister, prime minister, president or opposition leader by women is extraordinary. The shared element of those women’s career pattern is their dynastic background, combined with a traditional clientelistic feature. The obvious importance of dynasties and elite family lineage even in today’s political life renders a common theoretical assumption questionable, namely, the assumption of the decreasing importance of patronage and clientage in modern and highly complex societies. Japan and South Korea are cases in point.

In most Asian societies, patronage and clientage mingle with a strong prevalence of paternalism in human interaction. As a general feature of the phenomenon in Asia, the concepts of loyalty and protection bear a strong meaning. Traditionally women have been considered to be in need of protection, which is an argument that also nurtures the frequent understanding among Muslims of the headscarf as a piece of cloth providing protection of women in public life. Men in the role of the patron outnumber the women in such function by far, but there are exceptions to the rule, such as the system of training girls to become the caretaker of extended elite families in Southeast Asia. Patronage does not cease to exist when “modern” principles of social and political organization gain momentum. Conversely, traditional forms, principles, concepts, elements, and mechanisms of clientelism have been translated into a modern context. There is certainly a cultural dimension to the phenomenon, so that the assumption of a connection between Catholicism and clientelism as claimed in earlier research bears some truth. Caution should be employed, however, in ranking the influence of cultural and religious traditions. It is by no means established that Islamic societies display a higher frequency of clientelistic structures than Confucian, Buddhist, Christian, or Hindu societies. The ancient concept of clientelism, with its emphasis on informality in the legal regard, its individual personal relationships, and principal of volunteerism, has widely prevailed until today. Legally registered procedures such as the adoption of a child are an exception to the conventional mechanism. For women, patronage and clientage may imply both privileges and disadvantages in the pursuit of welfare, status, or social position. Women in a clientelistic relation have to cope with different kinds of problems from men, for example when they are urged by the patron to deliver sexual services in exchange for certain privileges. The sanctions for violating the rules of a clientelistic relationship are the same for both sexes: since there is no legal basis, punishment occurs in form of moral degrading such as public exposure, defamation of character, or informal tools of social control such as gossip or ridicule.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. Clapham (ed.), Private patronage and public power. Political clientelism in the modern state, London 1982.
 C. H. Landé, Introduction. The dyadic basis of clientelism, in S. Schmidt, L. Guasti, C. H. Landé, and J. C. Scott (eds.), Friends, followers, and factions. A reader in political clientelism, Berkeley 1977, xiii–xxxvii.
 R. Lemarchand, Comparative political clientelism. Structure, process and optic, in S. N. Eisenstadt and R. Lemarchand (eds.), Political clientelism, patronage and development, Beverly Hills 1981, 7–34.
 H.-H. Nolte (ed.), Patronage und Klientel. Ergebnisse einer polnisch-deutschen Konferenz, Cologne 1989.
 S. Piattoni (ed.), Clientelism, interests and democratic representation. The European experience in historical and comparative perspective, Cambridge 2001.
 L. Roninger and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Democracy, clientelism and the civil society, London 1994.
 G. Weber Pazmiño, Klientelismus. Annäherung an ein Konzept, Ph.D. diss., University of Zurich 1991.

CLAUDIA DERICHS

Turkey

Patron-client relationships involve at least two parties and are characterized by enduring, multifaceted exchange over time in stratified societies. While asymmetrical, they are often characterized by personal warmth and affection (Roninger 2001). The relationship can be invoked at any time, and the participants derive from it various forms of security. For example, a patron may acquire from it a reliable workforce, and a client economic and physical security (Platteau 1995). In Turkey women encounter and participate in patronage and clientage in a variety of roles, such as citizens, household members, rural agriculturalists, recent migrants living in cities, and in social and political movements. Patronage and clientage have proven remarkably portable and adaptable during the past century as Turkey has transitioned from a new, mainly rural state in which patronage and clientage existed most classically in the landlord-peasant relationship, to a modernizing, urbanizing state in which they now characterize machine politics and myriad other economic/social relationships (Güneş-Ayata 1994).

The concepts of patronage and clientage, especially as they concern women's lives, have come to be morally laden because they challenge the individualistic, egalitarian ideal articulated by the late modern Turkish state. Studies of Turkish politics and governance, economic development, and civil society (Balci, Burns, and Tongun 2002) and policy papers by multilateral organizations such as the World Bank (2000) often emphasize women's roles in patron-client networks, which the authors regard as related to or synonymous with "corruption."

PATRONAGE AND CLIENTAGE IN HOUSEHOLDS

While patronage and clientage are usually associated with male-dominated social arenas, in actuality they may have more everyday relevance in Turkey for women than for men. Adaman and Çarkoğlu, who define corruption in Turkey as the presence of bribery and patronage networks (2001, 2), note that "women, on the average, turn out to have a higher perceived intensity of corruption" of local governments, and speculate that this is due to women's engagement in "ordinary life struggle" such as "shopping, escorting children to and from schools, cleaning houses . . . etc." (ibid. 18). White (1994) characterizes the relationship between a woman and her daughter-in-law in Turkey's patrilineal, patrilocal households as a patronage relationship. Özyeğin (1996) has characterized the relationship between Turkish female employers and domestic workers as based on patronage. Workers received benefits such as loans, educational assistance for their children, and small castoff or new items.

Studies of Turkish peasant communities (Kudat 1975, Sayari 1977) portray communities where patronage and clientage script virtually all social relationships. In such communities, women's activities have provided essential household sustenance. As village economies have been gradually impacted by the market, women's contributions have been devalued as cheap imported goods replace those they once crafted (Delaney 1991, 267).

Millions of households in Turkey have left village life altogether, and more than half of Turkish women now live in urban areas (Hemmasi and Prorok 2002, 399). A major cause of urbanization has been the breakdown of patron-client landlord-peasant relationships due to agricultural mechanization since the 1950s, which has prompted rural families to migrate to towns and cities in Turkey and abroad. Upon arrival, the migrants again "enter into patron-client relationships in terms of work, welfare and political organization" (Akşit, Karanci, Gündüz-Hoşgör 2001, 14).

PATRONAGE AND CLIENTAGE AND SOCIAL MOVEMENTS

Women in Turkey have challenged patronage and clientage through a variety of means. Participants in the 1980s feminist movement among urban elite women implicated patron-client relations by attributing inequality to the networks of gender and production relations (Sosyalist Feminist Kaktüs 1988, cited in Arat 1994, 104). Religious women's organizations, such as the 40 that comprise the Islamist Istanbul Rainbow Women's Platform (Houston 2001, 140) provide an alternative to mainstream patronage and clientage. Since they lack linkages to the powerful business, banking, and media circles, they are able to avoid the rentier and patron-client relationships of the mainstream parties (Balci, Burns, and Tongun 2002, 48). Finally, the separatist Kurdistan Worker's Party, one of the few revolutionary movements in the Islamic world to engage women as combatants, challenged large landowners and other patrons during its violent campaign against the Turkish state from the mid-1980s to 1999.

CONCLUSION

Although from the start the Kemalist Turkish state granted women significant civil and political rights, it was still patriarchal in most respects and neglected to set up a system that allowed women to exercise these rights. Instead, the system that has prevailed in Turkey is based on patronage and clientage. It is daily invoked and challenged by women in relationships ranging from ideologically diverse public social movements to the most intimate settings of their families and households.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Adaman and A. Çarkoğlu, Engagement in corruptive activities at local and central governments in Turkey. Perceptions of urban settlers, Marseilles 2001.
Y. Arat, Women's movement of the 1980s in Turkey.

- Radical outcome of liberal Kemalism?, in F. M. Göçek and S. Balaghi (eds.), Reconstructing gender in the Middle East. Tradition, identity, and power, New York 1994, 100–12.
- T. Balci, T. Burns, and L. Tongun, Influence of Turkish Islamist groups on Turkey's candidacy to the European Union, paper presented at the American Political Science Association Annual Meeting, Boston 2002.
- C. Delaney, The seed and the soil. Gender and cosmology in Turkish village society, Berkeley 1991.
- A. Güneş-Ayata, Roots and trends of clientelism in Turkey, in L. Roniger and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Democracy, clientelism, and civil society, Boulder, Colo. 1994, 49–63.
- M. Hemmasi and C. V. Prorok, Women's migration and quality of life in Turkey, in Geoforum 33 (2002), 399–411.
- C. Houston, Islam, Kurds and the Turkish nation state, Oxford 2000.
- A. Kudat, Patron-client relations. The state of the art and research in Eastern Turkey, in E. Akarli and G. Ben-Dor (eds.), Political participation in Turkey, Istanbul 1975, 61–8.
- G. Özyeğin, Verwandtschaftsnetzwerke, Patronage und Klassenschuld Das Verhältnis von Hausangestellten und ihren Arbeitgeberinnen in der Türkei, in Frauen in der einen Welt, 2 (1996), 9–28.
- J. Platteau, A framework for the analysis of evolving patron-client ties in agrarian economies, in World Development 23 (1995), 767–86.
- L. Roniger, Patron-client relations, anthropology of, in N. Smelser and P. Baltes (eds.), The international encyclopedia of the social and behavioral sciences, London 2001, 1118–20.
- S. Sayari, Political patronage in Turkey, in E. Gellner and J. Waterbury (eds.), Patrons and clients in Mediterranean societies, London 1977, 103–30.
- Sosyalist Feminist Kaktüs, Neden dergi çıkariyoruz, in Sosyalist Feminist Kaktüs 1 (1988), 6.
- J. B. White, Money makes us relatives. Women's labor in urban Turkey, Austin, Tex. 1994.
- World Bank, Social assessment and agricultural reform in Central Asia and Turkey, Washington, D.C. 2000.

DIANE E. KING

Peacekeeping and Conflict Management

Arab States

UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING AND CONFLICT MANAGEMENT: HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The concepts of peacekeeping and conflict management are primarily classified under the rubrics of political and military categorizations aimed at instilling an impartial military presence in areas of conflict in order to ease political tensions and allow for diplomatic negotiations toward peace to occur. The model for contemporary peacekeeping missions was initiated during the Arab-Israeli war of 1948 following United Nations Security Council Resolution 50, dated 29 May 1948. The mission was called the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) and is still considered an active mission in the occupied territories of Palestine and Israel. The United Nations has also maintained peacekeeping missions in the Golan Heights (UNDOF) since 1974 and in Lebanon (UNIFIL) since 1978 and has been carrying out missions with the Palestinian Liberation Organization (UNSCO) since 1999 and in Iraq (UNAMI) since 2003. Completed peacekeeping missions in the Arab world include the following:

UN Program	Country	Initiated	Completed
UNEF I	Suez, Egypt	1956	1967
UNIGIL	Lebanon	1958	1958
UNYOM	Yemen	1963	1964
UNEF II	Egypt-Israel	1973	1979
UNIMOG	Iran-Iraq	1988	1991
MINUSRO	Morocco	1991	1991
UNIKOM	Iraq-Kuwait	1991	2003
UNASOG	Chad-Libya	1994	1994

Through the course of development, peacekeeping missions have evolved to incorporate conflict management personnel: these include the traditional “Blue Berets” (the moniker given the international soldiers comprising peacekeeping forces because of their distinctive headgear); civilian police officers; electoral experts and observers; de-miners; human rights monitors; specialists in civil affairs and governance; and experts in communication and public information in order to ease the political and military tensions and to promote the reconciliation and reconstruction process.

Despite the expansion of mission objectives to incorporate aspects of conflict management, peacekeeping issues are primarily analyzed through a strongly militarized perspective of peacekeeping and conflict management activities. This perspective is based on the highly patriarchal conceptualization that the use of force through heavily armed and state centered approaches is the only means available to ensure peace. This ideal has a tendency to perpetuate a cycle of violence that has yet to prove completely effective in ensuring lasting peace and reconciliation, particularly in the Arab world. An essential query that is still not addressed in the peacekeeping and conflict management equation is how these militarized operations have impacted on and affected women.

Until the adoption of Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women, Peace and Security (31 October 2000), the gender variable had not been taken into account; the conduct of peacekeeping and conflict management activities primarily as military operations often resulted in a disproportionate amount of violence and injustice imposed on women. Prior to the adoption of Resolution 1325, women’s contributions toward peace-building and conflict resolution were not recognized as significant factors to be incorporated into the organization of peacekeeping missions. Resolution 1325 reaffirms “the important role of women in the prevention and resolution of conflict and in peacebuilding, and stress[es] the importance of their equal participation and full involvement in all efforts for the maintenance of peace and security, and the need to increase their role in decision-making with regard to conflict prevention and resolution” (UNSCR 2000).

Resolution 1325 called for four main themes to be addressed during peacekeeping operations. The first is the participation of women in decision-making and peace processes: the number of women in institutions and field operations should be increased and women’s groups should be consulted and included in actual peace processes. The second theme is the creation of training guidelines and materials to incorporate a gender perspective for all peacekeeping personnel prior to their deployment. The third is the adoption of a gender perspective including measures that protect and respect the human rights of women and girls. The fourth involves gender mainstreaming in United Nations reporting systems and stresses the need to incorporate gender mainstreaming in all aspects of the political decision-making processes among the member states, particularly during the peace-building and post-conflict reconstruction phase (Naraghi-Anderlini 2000).

GENDER VARIABLE IN PEACEKEEPING AND CONFLICT MANAGEMENT: ARAB WOMEN

Despite the groundbreaking advances of Resolution 1325, the issues of war, peacekeeping, conflict management, and security are still identified under the patriarchal rubric of political, economic, and military characteristics. These characteristics highlight the pervasive violence against women during conflict, which often persists after armed conflict in the form of domestic violence against women. The most significant factor contributing to the exclusion of women from participating in peacekeeping and conflict management operations is the lack of political opportunities afforded to encourage, and in many cases even allow, the political participation of women in the decision-making process that directly affects their lives.

A study conducted by the United Nations Security Council in October 2002 indicates that first, a mere cessation of hostilities does not bring an end to intra-state conflict. To end conflict, the creation of sustainable peace by means of fundamental societal change is required. Such change includes democracy, good governance, human rights, the rule of law, and gender equality. If half the population – women – are excluded from the equation, these changes simply do not occur. Second, lasting peace must be “home grown” and based on indigenous processes. Local women hold communities together during conflict, organize political movements, manage relief efforts and rebuild societies (United Nations Press Release SC7467).

Based on the findings of the Security Council’s report, it may be safely concluded that the highly militarized and patriarchal approaches to peacekeeping missions and conflict management activities must be reconstructed to include a gendered perspective in order to be effective and allow for sustainable peace. Given that the first peacekeeping mission is still in effect 56 years after it was initiated provides enough evidence for the inadequacy of the existing structures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

D. P. Auerswald, Disarmed democracies. Domestic institutions and the use of force, Ann Arbor 2000.
G. Cawthra and R. Luckham (eds.), Governing insecurity.

Democratic control of military and security establishments in transitional democracies, London 2003.

- C. Enloe, Maneuvers. The international politics of militarizing women’s lives, Berkeley 2000.
D. Gioseffi (ed.), Women on war, New York 2003.
J. Hagan, Do not send us your weapons. The General Assembly Debates Peace and Security, United Nations Chronicle Online, <<http://www.un.org/Pubs/chronicle/2002/issue4/0402p18.html>>.
H. Herzog, A space of their own. Social-civil discourses among Palestinian-Israeli women in peace organizations, in Social Politics 6:3 (Fall 1999), 344–69.
Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues, Common security. A blueprint for survival, New York 1982.
G. E. Irani and N. C. Funk, Rituals of reconciliation. Arab-Islamic perspectives, Columbia International Affairs Online, <<http://osiyou.cc.columbia.edu:2226/wps/fun01/fun01.html>>.
D. R. Marshall, Women in war and peace. Grassroots peace-building, Washington, D.C. 2000.
S. Naraghi-Anderlini, The A-B-C to UN Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women and Peace and Security, 2000, <<http://www.peacewomen.org/un/sc/ABC1325.html>>.
B. Reardon, Sexism and the war system, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
I. L. Saqjor (ed.), Common grounds. Violence against women in war and armed conflict situations, Quezon City, Philippines 1998.
I. Skjelsbaek, Gendered battlefields. A gender analysis of peace and conflict, Oslo 1997.
M. Thee, Militarism and militarization, in E. Lazlo and J. Y. Yoo (eds.), World encyclopedia of peace, Oxford 1986, 594–8.
J. Turpin, Many faces. Women confronting war, in L. A. Lorentzen, and J. Turpin (eds.), The women and war reader, New York 1998, 3–19.
United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations, <www.un.org/Depts/dpko/dpko/home.shtml>.
United Nations Press Release, <<http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2002/sc7467.doc.htm>>.
United Nations Security Council Resolution 50, 1948, 1986, <<http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/un/sres050.htm>>.
United Nations Security Council Resolution 1325, 2000, <http://www.un.org/events/res_1325e.pdf>.
L. M. Woerhle, Silent or silenced?, in L. A. Lorentzen and J. Turpin (eds.), The women and war reader, New York 1998, 343–8.
Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. Peace women. UNSC RES 1325 translated, <<http://www.peacewomen.org/un/ecosoc/CSW/ELTheme22004>>.

NORMA T. NEMEH

The Caucasus and Turkey

In the sub-region of the Caucasus and Turkey a variety of recent conflicts have given rise to efforts at peacekeeping and conflict management in which women have played increasingly visible roles. The conflicts have taken place along religious, ethnic, and socioeconomic lines in modernizing states, each of which has a history of empire; these features are all factors in the conflicts and their resolution.

Seven instances of open warfare occurred in the Caucasus in the 1980s and 1990s, and there have been many other cases of the use of armed force against civilians (Hansen 1998, 9). In Turkey, the Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan (PKK, Kurdistan Worker's Party), a Marxist separatist movement, waged an armed campaign against the state during the 1980s and 1990s, and other recent conflicts have occurred on a smaller scale. Domestic violence is also prevalent. A high percentage of women in Turkey report being at least occasionally beaten (Arat 2000). Conflict resolution and peacemaking are thus as applicable to intimate, household levels as to broader geopolitical levels, and local women activists have responded with initiatives aimed at curbing violence of all kinds.

Throughout the sub-region, women have traditionally played an important role in indigenous mediation, often invoking a specific societal role such as motherhood. According to tradition in the Caucasus, a woman could stop a fight by throwing her scarf between the combatants (Garb 1996, 36). In Turkey, the women's activist group "Saturday Mothers" responded with a campaign to unite people from disparate political factions, and assisted Kurdish parents in tracing their imprisoned or "disappeared" children (Anderson 1999, 232).

Women in the sub-region have also built on efforts by their predecessors. Recent attempts to mobilize Azeri and Armenian women for peace in the disputed area of Nagorno-Karabakh have built upon earlier movements dating back to the early twentieth century (Tohidi 2000). Efforts at reducing domestic violence in Azerbaijan date back at least to the 1920s (Heyat 2000).

The vocabularies and institutions of peacemaking, peace-building, peacekeeping, and conflict management in the Caucasus and Turkey have proliferated in recent years as a consequence of the globalization of civic activism. Many recent endeavors at peacemaking, particularly those that specifically involve women, have arisen from collaboration between local activists and international institutions. For example, in 2001 the Center for Global Peace at the American University in Washington, D.C. created a commission to promote peace between Armenians and Turks and between Armenians and Azeris (International Peace and Conflict Resolution 2003). The commission's efforts have engaged women, including a trip by Armenian women to Istanbul and a pilot television show focusing on women's issues designed to reach both Turkish and Armenian viewers.

Local women activists have created local and cross-state peace-promoting linkages both directly and through United Nations agencies and international non-governmental organizations. The Transcaucasus Women's Dialogue, established in 1994, brought together women from Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia to work on such projects as the rehabilitation of child war victims and training in peace- and democracy-building (Reimann 2001, 55). United Nations Security Council Resolution 1325, adopted in 2000, calls for incorporating gender-informed perspectives into disarmament, demobilization, and rehabilitation initiatives in Azerbaijan and has served to sanction the efforts of local activists. Women for Conflict Prevention and Peace Building in the Southern Caucasus, an initiative started by the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) in 2001, addresses the condition of unresolved conflict known as "no-war-no-peace" in Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Armenia. It has engaged in a variety of peace-building activities, such as convening a meeting between women in the Azeri Nakhichevan area; gathering women leaders from among the estimated 1.2 million Internally Displaced People (IDPs) in the South Caucasus for conflict resolution and peace-building workshops; and developing a university curriculum on gender and conflict resolution (UNIFEM 2003).

Peace-promoting vocabularies are transmitted through various technologies, of which women activists have recently made creative use. In the late 1990s activist women in Armenia, whose previous strategy had mainly been oral presentation, started using media technologies for peacemaking (McKay and Mazurana 2001, 24). In Turkey, a shift has been taking place in the way the Turkish-Kurdish conflict is talked about. The ban on the public use of the Kurdish language, including on radio and television, has been relaxed, and acknowledgment of Kurdish ethnic difference is now more common in public discourse.

Women are a majority in every state in the sub-region of Turkey and the Caucasus; more women than men are thus affected by conflict. Moreover, in combat zones women are often victimized by rape, displacement, and otherwise to a greater degree than men even though most of the combatants are male. Efforts by women in the region at peacemaking, peace-building, peacekeeping, and conflict resolution demonstrate that women are not content to remain victims, and that they can play a vital role in the struggle for peace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Anderson, Women's many roles in reconciliation, in European Centre for Conflict Prevention (ed.), People building peace. 35 inspiring stories from around the world, Utrecht 1999, 230-6.

- Y. Arat, Gender and citizenship in Turkey, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 275–86.
- P. Garb, Mediation in the Caucasus, in A. W. Wolfe and H. Yang (eds.), Anthropological contributions to conflict resolution, Athens, Ga. 1996, 31–46.
- G. Hansen, Humanitarian action in the Caucasus. A guide for practitioners, Providence, R.I. 1998.
- F. Heyat, Azeri professional women's life strategies, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata, (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 177–201.
- International Peace and Conflict Resolution (IPCR), Track two project in Turkey and the Caucasus, in IPCR Newsletter Winter Issue (2003), 4.
- S. McKay and D. Mazurana, Raising women's voices for peacebuilding. Vision, impact and limitations of media technologies, London 2001.
- C. Reimann, Towards gender mainstreaming in crisis prevention and conflict management. Guidelines for German technical co-operation, Eschborn 2001.
- N. Tohidi, Gender and national identity in post-Soviet Azerbaijan, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 249–92.
- UNIFEM (United Nations Development Fund for Women), Southern Caucasus Peace Project, Women for conflict prevention and peace building in the Southern Caucasus, New York 2003.

DIANE E. KING

South Asia

Women in South Asia have traditionally played an active role in conflict resolution particularly at the grassroots level. They have a history of joining in liberation movements such as the nationalist movements and the Tebhaga and Telengana movements during the late 1940s. However, it was only in the postcolonial period that they consciously organized themselves for conflict resolution. This was as a result of the increasing numbers of intra-state conflicts in South Asia. In the late 1980s conflicts of state versus community were sharply on the rise. In Bangladesh problems over the Chittagong Hill Tracts (CHT) from 1980 led to a series of massacres, plunders, and destruction of villages. In India the 1980s witnessed increasing violence in Kashmir, Punjab, and the Northeast. In Sri Lanka too the post-1983 period was one of growing hostility between the Tamils and the Sinhalese. Again, antagonisms between Sindhis and Mohajirs intensified after the 1985 elections in Pakistan. Although all these conflicts had historical roots they became particularly violent in the late 1980s and 1990s. And in all these movements women played an important role in conflict resolution.

People in the CHT were antagonistic toward the government of Bangladesh from the time the Kaptai dam was built (1957–62) and thousands of people became homeless. In the early 1970s the whole of CHT was brought under military control. The original inhabitants of the CHT were the Jumma (tribal) people. They were aggrieved not just because of the dam but also because the state had undertaken to change the demographic balance of the region through a policy of settling Bengali Muslim people from the plains in the CHT. The protest of the Jumma people brought forth severe counter-insurgency measures leading to extra-judicial killings and massacres by the state. The rebels also formed a military unit called the Shanti Bahani. In all of this the tribal women were targeted; this was dramatically brought to the fore by the abduction of Kalpana Chakma in 1996. While the region was being torn apart the Hill Women's Federation (HWF), a secular women's organization, was formed in 1989 by women students of the Chittagong University. By 1991 it had become extremely popular. One of its main goals was to end Muslim violence against the tribal people. Although secular, it worked with both secular and religious groups such as the Bengali Muslim intelligentsia, human rights groups, and even community-based organizations such as the Tripura Samiti and the Marma Samiti. The main aims of these groups were justice for the tribal people of CHT and an end to violence. They were among the strongest voices for peace with the Bangladesh government in 1997 but once a pact was signed between the people of CHT and the Bangladesh government they were denied any political space.

In India, conflicts between state and community in Kashmir and the Northeast led to women's activism for conflict resolution. In Kashmir, women's popular participation found articulation through organizations such as Dukhtarane Millat and Muslim Khawateen Markaz. Islamic social reform movements inspired both these organizations. Through these movements women appropriated the democratic space for popular protest in the early 1990s. They mobilized other women and protested against violence directed toward Kashmiri Muslims. They braved the batons of the police and shielded their men. They would run to the security bunker to agitate against unlawful arrest of boys from the neighborhoods. In the early 1990s the burqa-clad female protestor was a familiar sight. However, as the movement gained momentum these women became more and more identified with the separatist movements and lost much of their legitimate space for conflict resolution.

In Northeast India, in contrast, some women's groups, particularly the Naga women, have through their activism made spaces for their voices in conflict resolution. The Naga conflict predates Indian independence and began as a movement for autonomy. Soon, however, it converted into a separatist movement leading to increasing violence. In the 1980s the Nagas were fighting not just the Indian state but also a fratricidal war between different Naga groups. It was during this period of extreme violence that women in Nagaland organized themselves into a secular group known as the Naga Mothers Association (NMA). Most of its members were Christians but they did not bring up religion as an issue. They raised their voices against any violent acts and urged the Nagas to work together. They were instrumental in reducing conflict among Naga people and also bringing the Nagas and the Indian state into a political dialogue. They were the first South Asian women's group to sit in a ceasefire negotiation between the government of India and the Nationalist Socialist Council of Nagaland (Isaac-Muivah faction). During the period of ceasefire they have continued their pro-peace activism and have made efforts to improve their relations with people of neighboring Assam and Arunachal Pradesh. One of the main reasons for the success of NMA is that they have legitimized their role in conflict resolution through a non-partisan approach and have been successful in making crucial alliances with other civil society and human rights organizations. Although there is a plethora of women's groups in Northeast India, such as Meira Paibies (Torch bearers) in Manipur, the Kuki Women's Federation, and the Mizo Widows' Union, none of them are as successful in making political interventions as the NMA.

In 1984 the security forces in the Jaffna area detained more than 500 young men who were suspected of being terrorists. It was a time of growing violence in Sri Lanka as the government tried to suffocate the Tamil separatists led by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam in the east and north of the country. These unlawful detentions triggered a women's movement in Jaffna. The women organized themselves into a Mothers' Front in 1984 and marched with nearly 10,000 participants to protest against the Government Agent. The mothers were able to distinguish themselves as citizens of Sri Lanka and as such different from the rank and file of the liberation movement. The protest march yielded partial and momentary results but effected a permanent impact on the activities of the state, which began to detain Jaffna youths with caution. The Mothers' Front in the north survived for two years and then the women were forced to disperse. There were similar experiments by women in the south but none of these movements lasted for very long. This was because the conflicting sides such as the Sri Lankan government and the Tamil separatists largely opposed women's interventions in conflict resolution. South Asian experiences demonstrate that when both sides in a conflict try to marginalize women very seldom are women able to make any major interventions. Even in conflict resolution women find it extremely difficult at times to transcend their group identities.

The Sindhi Mohajir conflict in Pakistan initially gave women a political space but their own leaders soon took it away from them. The Muttahida Qaumi Movement (MQM) of the Urdu-speaking immigrants from India, who were the voices of the Mohajirs, inspired women to join the movement. In February 1989, 7,500 women enlisted in the MQM in a single day. The MQM was an urban middle-class phenomenon and many of its women participants shunned the veil as they considered themselves to be progressive. But the MQM women soon began to be seen as partisan and militant and their abilities to negotiate politically declined. Even the Sindhiani Tehrik (Sindhi Women's Movement) could make no headway in conflict resolution. This was when a radical women's group known as Women's Action Forum (WAF) stepped in. WAF contacted women from MQM and Sindhiani Tehrik. They held themselves to be a platform for peace and facilitated inter-community dialogues. It was the WAF initiative that made some space for inter-community understanding in Pakistan.

Women's role in conflict management in South Asia has been checkered. Some women's groups such as the NMA or the WAF have made long-term interventions for conflict resolution and others, such as the Mothers' Front in Sri Lanka, have had only immediate success. Most of these women's movements grew out of a necessity to provide alternatives to violence within their society. They are thus always identified with their own communities. They achieve greater success and more political space when they are able to transform their identities from the local to the universal. Most often their activism is rooted in their cultural roles as mothers, wives, and sisters. There is however, a growing recognition among women today that activism based on these roles may be counter-productive. In recent years women have moved away from such identifications and act as women and compatriots rather than as mothers and daughters. After the Gujarat riots against Muslims in 2002 secular women from both the Hindu and Muslim communities came together in an organization called Women for Peace. Even in the conflicts between the state and the Maoists in Nepal women's peace groups have taken such titles as Women's Leadership for Peace. Motherhood traditionally gave women the legitimacy to intervene in conflict management; since it was considered a male domain only mothers, wives, or daughters could raise voices against violence. Recent experiences have led women to make their appeals less as mothers and more as citizens. When women appealed as mothers or wives they were marked as partisan and excluded from political negotiations. In the recent peace talks in Sri Lanka women's groups have represented themselves as citizens and recovered a space for themselves in conflict management. Even in state versus state disagreements women have achieved some success in managing conflicts. Women's groups are increasingly active in civil society initiatives for peace between India and Pakistan. Also, it was the women's movement in Pakistan that condemned the atrocities of its own army and apologized to Bengali women in Bangladesh. However, it is in the intra-state conflicts that women have achieved most in conflict management, particularly when they have been able to feminize the space for peace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Banerjee, Between two armed patriarchies. Women in Assam and Nagaland, in R. Manchanda (ed.), Women, war and peace in South Asia. Beyond victimhood to agency, New Delhi 2001, 131-76.
- , Resisting erasure. Women IDPs in South Asia, in P. Banerjee, S. B. Raychowdhury, and S. Das (eds.), The UN guiding principles and internal displacement in South Asia, Sage Publications (forthcoming).
- A. Basu (ed.), The sacred and the secular. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New Delhi 1998, 15-32.
- K. Bhasin, S. K. Nighat, and R. Menon (eds.), Against all odds. Essays on women. Religion and development, New Delhi 1994.
- A. M. Chenoy, Militarism and women in South Asia, New Delhi 2001.
- C. Cockburn, The space between us. Negotiating gender and national identities in conflict, London 1998.
- R. Coomaraswamy, Report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, UN Commission on Human Rights E/CN.4/1998/54, 26 January 1998.
- , To bellow like a cow. Women, ethnicity and the discourse of rights, in R. J. Cook (ed.), Human rights of women. National and internal perspectives, Philadelphia 1994, 39-57.
- M. Guhathakurta, The Bangladesh liberation war. A summons to memory, in A. Kalam (ed.), Internal dynamics and external linkages, Dhaka 1996, 19-29.
- A. Jehangir, Whither are we?, in Dawn (Pakistan), 2 October 2000.
- N. de Mel, Women and the nation's narrative. Gender and nationalism in twentieth century Sri Lanka, New Delhi 2001.
- D. Rahasingham-Senayake, Ambivalent empowerment midst tragedy of Tamil women in conflict, in R. Manchanda (ed.), Women, war and peace in South Asia. Beyond victimhood to agency, New Delhi 2001, 102-30.
- T. Sarkar and U. Butalia (eds.), Women and the Hindu right. A collection of essays, New Delhi 1995.

PAULA BANERJEE

Sub-Saharan Africa: The Horn and East Africa

Populations of Muslims extend from the coasts of Eritrea throughout East Africa. Within the Horn of Africa there are diverse Muslim populations living in Eritrea, Ethiopia, Sudan, Somalia, Djibouti, and Kenya. While many of these populations are also related in culture, ideology, and national borders, there are significant regional differences. Muslim women throughout this area have been active in resolving conflicts and disputes, primarily at the household and community level. However, because many of these women are living in societies characterized by long-term, low- and high-level conflict, women have taken an increasingly public role in working for peace in their societies, at a community, national, and international level.

Historically, Muslim women in the Horn and East Africa have played an important role in dispute resolution at the household level. This is facilitated in part by exogamous marriage patterns that ensure women move from their father's households to a neighboring clan or sub-clan when they marry. Women retain the linkages with their familial clan as well as their husband's clan throughout their lifetimes, facilitating communication and dispute resolution between groups. They act as important go-betweens keeping communication between clans flourishing while men are often trapped into a more rigid vertical communication structure within their clan. Women are also assigned the responsibility of ensuring harmony among themselves and their husbands and among their children and their spouses. Muslim women have drawn on notions of purity and religiosity and codes of behavior from the Qur'an to ensure relationships flow smoothly (Hirsch 1998).

The Horn of Africa has been a site of prolific public peacebuilding efforts by women. Somali populations that reside within Djibouti, Ethiopia, Somalia, and northern Kenya have been active in promoting both conflict and conflict resolution for centuries. Groups of women have taken an increasingly public stance that has challenged gender roles while drawing heavily on notions of Islamic purity and religiosity in order to gain further legitimacy among local, national, and international frameworks. Since the fall of the Siyad Barre regime in 1991, Somalia has functioned without a national government. Somali women came together, both locally and in exile, establishing organizations for peace and reconciliation (Hussein 1995). One of the most prominent organizations is Save Somali Women and Children (SSWC), founded by Asha Hagi Elmi. This group has been instrumental in Somali peace negotiations, demanding a seat at the table at international level peace talks. This organization is open to all Somali women willing to work outside of strict clan alliances and was vital in ensuring women were at the peace talks in Djibouti in 1998. The work of SSWC and other women's organizations has ensured that women will occupy 25 percent of parliamentary seats in the new Somali government. Somali women's organizations have held numerous peace demonstrations and marches throughout Mogadishu and Hargeisa, bringing together warring factions and presenting a united front against war and the continued violence.

Wajir Women for Peace (WWP) began in July 1993 to discuss ways for women to help mitigate the conflicts among women traders in the market place and on a broader clan level throughout the Wajir district in northern Kenya. The organization began because interclan feuding and cattle raiding had become so severe it had spilled into the trade sector, making it impossible for women to bring their goods to market and trade without fighting. However, when these women got together and began to discuss conflict resolution they realized a much broader mandate was required. Mama Fatuma became first chair of WWP. Also leading peace negotiations and establishing grass roots peace initiatives were Mama Halima and Mama Zainab. WWP eventually expanded to include other members of the community including elders, businessmen, religious leaders, and non-governmental organization representatives and renamed itself Wajir Peace Group (WPG). In 1995 WPG became a member of the Kenya Peace and Development Network, linking the local efforts to a national organization.

Delegations of women have been very active in the ongoing peace negotiations between the Afar and the Issa, two ethnic groups living in northwestern Ethiopia. There had been low-level conflict over land and water resources between these two pastoral groups for many generations. Delegations of women from each group visited the opposing communities to establish an initial dialogue for peace. Among the Afar and Issa, if a group of women go and visit an opposing community and are treated well and given good hospitality it indicates the opposing side is serious about peace. If the women are not treated well it indicates the opposing side is not willing to engage in serious dialogue about conflict resolution.

Ethiopian Muslim and Christian women are working together in the eastern highlands to build up conflict resolution skills in their shared communities, promoting increased understanding and stronger community strength across religious lines. In Sudan, women's groups have formed to facilitate communication across religious lines so women from the predominantly Muslim north can maintain dialogue with women from the south. Among these organizations is the Sudan Women's Voice for Peace organization, which seeks to establish peace, democracy, and women's rights in the new Sudan.

Women working for peace in these regions have adopted the position that peace is a collective responsibility and women must take an active role. Women of any age can work in peacemaking roles, but in most cases it is older, respected women who do this work. Respected women peacemakers are seen as wise, broad-minded, and diligent about religion. They are considered truthful and concerned about the welfare of all people, not just their own family or clan. They take the initiative and are able to mobilize others.

Women working in public peacemaking on the Horn and throughout East Africa are committed to ending violence and restoring peace in their society. These groups generally work across clans, and often encounter early hostility from leaders in their society. Many have gradually been accepted and have become important contributors to the ending of conflict in their communities. "Women's peace groups assume that the individual people involved in a conflict situation are responsible for working toward non-violent resolutions of the conflict. Peacebuilding cannot and should not be solely left to the leaders and/or outside interventions" (Elmi et al. 2000, 133).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. M. Adam, Somalia. A terrible beauty being born? in W. Zartman (ed.), Collapsed states. The disintegration and restoration of legitimate authority, Boulder, Colo. 1995, 69–81.
- Centre for the Strategic Initiatives of Women, Women's work in peace. Lessons from training projects in the Horn of Africa, by H. Osman, Washington D.C. 1999.
- A. H. Elmi, D. Ibrahim, and J. Jenner, Women's role in peacemaking in Somali society, in D. L. Hodgson (ed.), Rethinking pastoralism in Africa. Gender, culture, and the myth of the patriarchal pastoralist, Oxford 2000, 121–41.
- S. F. Hirsch, Pronouncing and persevering. Gender and the discourses of disputing in an African Islamic court, Chicago 1998.

- M. Michaelson, Afar-Issa conflict management, in Institute of Current World Affairs Letters, Hanover, N.H. January 2000.
- E. Rehn and E. J. Sirleaf, Women, war and peace. The independent experts' assessment on the impact of armed conflict on women and women's role in peace-building, New York 2002, <www.unifem.undp.org/resources/assessment>.

EMILY FRANK

Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa

Women play an important role in the transformation of conflicts in West Africa by becoming active across political, religious, and ethnic affiliations. Theirs is often conflict management at the local level, where Africa's internal wars are increasingly fought, and their efforts can be the first steps toward reconciliation in communities devastated by violence.

At the end of 2000, the United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 1325 to increase the representation of women in peace processes. The issue of women's participation in conflict management, the reconstruction of postwar communities, and the prevention of future conflict are particularly salient in West Africa where women constitute the majority of those adversely affected by armed conflict. Women throughout the region have contributed to the reintegration of combatants and displaced persons, the development of early warning mechanisms, and the formation and management of pressure groups through a cross-section of organizations and civil society networks.

In 2000, women from Liberia, Sierra Leone, and Guinea formed the Mano River Union Women Peace Network (MARWOPNET). The network has taken an active position in pressing for peace in Sierra Leone, but it was the group's initiative to negotiate a meeting between feuding Presidents Charles Taylor of Liberia and Lansana Conté of Guinea in 2001 and convince the leaders to participate in a regional peace summit that illustrated the potential of women's efforts toward conflict resolution in West Africa. Despite its diplomatic success, the effectiveness of MARWOPNET continues to be limited by scarce resources and its exclusion from the formal peace process.

In Liberia, a delegation of six women was organized to make a forced entry into the 1994 Accra Clarifications Conference. Their experience demonstrates that governments and regional bodies may still be gender-biased against women's involvement in the peace process; yet their strategic presence at the conference increased the women's visibility in the media. As a result, the Liberian government supported the appointment of a woman interim president who was instrumental in negotiating a temporary peace.

Women in Senegal have played a prominent role in promoting meetings and rallies in the southern region of Casamance where government forces have struggled to avert an armed insurgency by the rebel Mouvement des forces démocratiques de Casamance (MFDC). In October 2002 over 3,000 women marched in Ziguinchor and solicited new pledges from the regional governor and the MFDC leaders to work toward a settlement.

In Mali, women's associations have been integral to the reconciliation and the restoration of trust between the Northern Tuareg community and the national government.

The National Women Peace Group (NAWOPEG) was founded in Nigeria in 2002 as a grassroots civil society initiative and a peace movement to facilitate the transformation of conflict in Nigeria. The group functions as a network of mediators and a framework for peace through a trained group of women known as Focal Points (FPs), each of whom represents a state in the federation.

Throughout West Africa, women have responded to the urgent demands of managing conflicts and reconstructing societies by breaking boundaries to help build a secure future.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Beilstein, The expanding role of women in United Nations peacekeeping, in L. A. Lorentzen and J. Turpin (eds.), The women and war reader, New York 1998, 140-7.
- M. Fleshman, African women struggle for a seat at the peace table, in Africa Recovery 16:4 (February 2003), 1 and 15-19.
- S. Hale, Some thoughts on women and gender in Africa. Listening to the whispers of African women, in Journal of African Studies 16:1 (Winter 1998), 21-30.
- S. Macdonald, P. Holden, and S. Ardener (eds.), Images of women in peace and war, London 1987.
- D. R. Marshall, Women in war and peace. Grassroots peacebuilding, Washington, D.C. 2000.
- L. Olsson, Gendering UN peacekeeping, Uppsala 1999.
- C. Sylvester, Feminist theory and international relations in a postmodern era, Cambridge 1994.
- , Feminist international relations. An unfinished journey, Cambridge 2002.
- UNESCO, Women's contribution to a culture of peace, Expert Group Meeting, Manila 25-28 April 1995.
- United Nations Security Council Resolution S/RES/1325, 31 October 2000, <http://www.un.org/events/res_1325e.pdf>.
- S. Whitworth, Gender, race and the politics of peacekeeping, in E. Moxon-Browne (ed.), A future for peacekeeping?, London 1998, 158-75.

JENNIFER L. DE MAIO

Political Parties and Participation

Afghanistan

The Afghan constitution of 1964 granted universal suffrage; however, political parties were not allowed. Prior to the constitution power was firmly held by the political elite associated with the royal family. Conservative social norms and limited access to education minimized the participation of women. In Kabul, urban women in the education sector and in women's organizations exercised political influence. Women were elected to parliament and in 1965 the first woman cabinet member was appointed.

In 1978 the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) seized power and implemented radical social reform in which the emancipation of women figured prominently. The communist PDPA welcomed the active participation of women, advocated the equality of the sexes, and sought to integrate women into the government and society at all levels.

Civil war created a large refugee population, primarily in Pakistan and Iran. The resistance organized itself into seven main political parties ranging from conservative Islamic fundamentalists to more moderate and liberal elements. Women played advocacy roles for the resistance and women's rights in a number of these parties but the majority of these groups wished to limit women to traditional roles.

The fall of the communist regime in 1991 resulted in a power struggle that led to continued civil war. In 1996, the reactionary Taliban regime gained power and banned the education of girls and confined women to the home. With the fall of the Taliban, the internationally brokered Bonn agreement in December of 2001 set forth a plan for the re-establishment of a permanent government in Afghanistan. The plan ensured the participation of women in this process. Political parties were legalized in September 2003; however, they remain highly localized and are predominantly Kabul based. The participation of Afghan women in the political process has met resistance but international insistence and support from the Afghan Interim Authority has allowed women election delegates and resulted in women being appointed to key commissions and cabinet positions. At the recent Constitutional Loya Jirga (December 2003), 25 percent of the delegates were women. They protested at their lack of representation in the council's leadership positions and were promptly granted a deputy and two assistants.

Urban Afghan women are deeply committed to participating in politics, while women outside the capital remain marginalized in traditional roles. Whatever the outcome of the unfolding political situation in Afghanistan, women will continue to make their voices heard.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1973, 1980³.
B. R. Rubin, The fragmentation of Afghanistan. State formation and collapse in the international system, New Haven, Conn. 1995, 2002².

MARK DAVID LUCE

Arabian Peninsula

OVERVIEW

In the early 2000s, the seven states of the Arabian Peninsula (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Yemen) showed different degrees of popular political participation for men and women. Only the Republic of Yemen was equipped with a multi-party system and universal suffrage when it was established in May 1990. Political parties remained banned in all six Gulf monarchies. In five of them, however, the concept of elections have become gradually accepted as part of the political process.

In those four peninsula states where women were allowed to vote and stand for elections (Bahrain, Oman, Qatar, Yemen) they (re-)obtained these rights only in recent decades or even in recent years. However, on election day female candidates could not count on the support of the rising numbers of female voters and were elected to a parliament or a consultative council only in urban coastal centers (Yemen: Aden and Mukalla, Oman: Muscat). While women participated in shaping public opinion to a considerable degree and were prominent in civil society, they remained highly underrepresented in official positions all over the Arabian Peninsula. Even though in some countries women were appointed ministers they did not head ministries of strategic importance. In Yemen Wahiba

Farah was appointed minister of state for human rights in 2001, and in Qatar Shaykha bt. Aḥmad al-Maḥmūd became minister of education in 2003. Segregation of the sexes (originating from a mixture of tribal and religious traditions stylizing women as the embodiment of cultural values and identities) kept women out of politics, especially in those states where there were no formal participatory institutions.

THE SEVEN PENINSULAR STATES IN DETAIL

In two countries in the peninsula there have not been any elections at all: the United Arab Emirates and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. When preparations for local elections in Saudi Arabia were announced in October 2003, women were unlikely to be included in the electorate. A third country, the Emirate of Kuwait, remains the last country in the world where the right to vote only applies to parts of its male population (for example, citizens who have been naturalized less than 20 years ago are excluded). The issue of women's votes has been brought up by the Emir of Kuwait and women activists several times in the past, but was blocked by parliament. This was generally explained by the fact that the Kuwaiti parliament was dominated by Islamist representatives. However, efforts of the Emir to bypass parliament on this issue made female political participation a symbolic bone of contention between parliament and government. This certainly did not serve women's interest. The chances that women might participate in the upcoming local elections looked promising by the end of 2003 and this was likely to be the breakthrough for a further broadening of female political participation in Kuwait.

While the Kingdom of Bahrain saw some kind of local elections in the 1920s, no elections took place on the national level until the early 1970s. From 1973 until 2002 there were no elections at all in Bahrain. Unlike in the 1920s, when women who could prove land ownership were allowed to vote, they could not participate in the elections of the 1970s. In 1992 a formal petition was submitted to the ruler demanding – among other things – a role for women in the political process. While women remained absent from the official scene for another decade, they participated in demonstrations and resistance against the regime, sometimes facing arrest and torture. The year 2001 saw the introduction of universal suffrage, and in 2002 Bahraini women could vote and run for office in the 9 May municipal elections for the first time. As in the 24 October 2002 parliamentary elections, however, they did not win any seats. Women were nevertheless prominent members of civil society and the business community, and some were appointed to highly visible official positions: in 2000 King Ḥamad bin 'Īsā al-Khalifa, who took over from his father in 1999, appointed four women to the consultative council, which was turned into the 40-member second chamber of the two-chamber parliament shortly thereafter. The first female ambassador was appointed in 1999 and a number of women have entered the higher echelons of the ministries.

Elections were first introduced to the Emirate of Qatar with local elections in March 1999. Suffrage was universal and male and female candidates ran for office, but none of the six female candidates was elected. Only in the second local election on 7 April 2003 a woman won a seat – after male candidates had withdrawn. Later that month, male and female voters approved a constitution that codified a woman's right to vote and run for office and the first woman cabinet minister was appointed in May 2003. Elections for 30 seats in a 45-member consultative council are planned for 2004.

The Sultanate of Oman held its first elections with limited suffrage in 1991. Suffrage remained limited – the Sultan selected those who could participate – in the 1998 and the 2000 elections when two women were elected to the consultative council. Universal suffrage was only introduced in October 2002, and on 5 October 2003 the 83-member consultative council was elected directly for the first time after the Sultan had given up his right to select from among successful candidates. The two female members of the former council could defend their seats (both in Muscat), but no other women was elected.

In the two predecessor states of the Republic of Yemen female political participation was either not regulated but de facto non-existent (in the Yemen Arab Republic) or explicitly encouraged (in the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen). In May 1991 women participated in a referendum that approved the constitution of the newly established Republic of Yemen. Yemen's – and the peninsula's – first fully-fledged multi-party parliament with universal suffrage and male and female candidates was elected on 27 April 1993. As in the 1997 parliamentary elections women won 2 out of 301 seats (in 1993 in Aden and Mukalla, in 1997 both in Aden). On 27 April 2003 only one women was elected (in Aden). The first female minister was appointed in 2001 to oversee the newly established ministry of human rights. One of the major parties still refuses to nominate female candidates in elections.

In most states of the peninsula women's formal and informal political participation has increased over the 1990s. Universal suffrage and the appointment of women to official positions have laid the foundations for a revised perception of women's role in politics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001.
 U. Meinel, Zweifelhafte politische Reformen, in Informationsprojekt Naher und Mittlerer Osten 31 (Autumn 2002), 36–8.
 D. Nohlen, F. Grotz, and C. Hartmann (eds.), Elections in Asia and the Pacific. A data handbook, 1, Oxford 2001.

IRIS GLOSEMEYER

The Balkans

The political participation of women is an important aspect of the democratization process. However, in the Balkans there has been a sharp drop in the level of the political representation of women during the transition to democracy. Balkan women have been deeply affected by the social, economic, and political changes in the post-communist era. The political underrepresentation of women was accompanied by increasing unemployment among women and the rise of a neo-conservatism stressing women's maternal and domestic roles (Bracewell 1996).

Although there were tremendous differences among the Balkan countries prior to the establishment of communist systems, in terms of economic development, religion, political heritages, and previous traditions in regard to gender roles, the development of women's roles in communist Balkan countries was similar. Education and employment were the two areas that saw the greatest improvement for women under communist rule. However, this did not mean equality. Women's wages continued to be lower than men's and few women held important decision-making roles in the economy. Although women participated in symbolic political activities such as voting and taking part in mass demonstrations in numbers approximately equal to men, they played a limited role in the exercise of real political power within the Communist Party (Wolchik 1998). Yugoslavia was the only country in Eastern Europe that had a coherent feminist movement (Ramet 1995).

There was a significant decline in the representation of women in political and administrative positions following the multi-party elections in the early 1990s (there are no adequate data on women from different religious groups). Under communist rule, women formed between 20 and 35 percent of the members in the national parliaments of the East European countries. In the parliament of Slovenia, economically the most advanced part of Yugoslavia, women constituted 25 percent of the deputies. However, in the post-communist Slovenian parliament this number fell to 10 percent, while in the Bulgarian parliament it was as low as 3.5 percent. In Albania, there were 73 women out of the 250 deputies in the last communist parliament while in the first post-communist parliament the number of women fell to 9 (Ramet 1995). Though there was some progress in subsequent elections, women are still underrepresented in the parliaments of the Balkan countries (Slovenia 12.22 percent; Romania bicameral 7.86 and 10.72 percent; Serbia and Montenegro 7.94 percent; Croatia 20.53 percent; Bulgaria 26.25 percent; Albania 5.71 percent; Bosnia and Herzegovina bicameral 0.00 and 16.67 percent; Macedonia 18.33 percent). The situation is no different in the Balkan countries with a non-communist background. The percentage of women in the Greek parliament is 8.67 percent while in the Turkish parliament, in a country in which women were granted voting rights as early as 1934, it is just 4.36 percent (Inter-Parliamentary Union).

Transitions to democracy were frequently combined with a new electoral law. The Balkan countries have introduced different variations of proportional and combined electoral laws. Even though there is strong evidence that proportional representation systems tend to benefit women candidates, there is a trend toward the segregation of female and male candidates on party lists (OSCE ODIHR 1998). The long-term effects of the regulations favoring female candidates imposed by the international community, such as the new electoral law in Kosovo, which requires the political parties to reserve a third of their candidate lists for women, remain to be seen.

After the collapse of communism, many of the multi-party elections in the Balkans were held under extraordinary conditions. Particularly, the ethnic tension in socialist Yugoslavia and the disintegration of the country shaped not only the political behavior of men but also of the women living in it. Since the early 1990s the political life of Bosnia-Herzegovina has been to a large extent dominated by nationalist parties formed on ethnic lines. In the first multi-party elections in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1990, the Muslim party, the Party for Democratic Action (SDA), received an overwhelming majority of the votes in the Bosnian Muslim community (Babuna 1996). This party, which became a center of national resistance under war conditions, was to continue to enjoy the massive support of the Bosnian Muslim men and women until the signing of the Dayton Accord in 1995. In the post-Dayton elections, the SDA had to compete with several other political parties.

In Kosovo, where the ethnic tension was also high, Muslim Albanian women, like the Bosnian women, subordinated women's interests to the national cause and supported the Albanian national leadership in its resistance to Serbian pressure (Mertus 1999). Ibrahim Rugova and his Democratic League of Kosovo continued to enjoy the support of the majority of the Kosovar Albanians after the NATO intervention in Kosovo in 1999. In Bulgaria, the overwhelming majority of the ethnic Turks voted for the Movement for Rights and Freedoms party (MRF). In the elections of 1990 and 1991 the MRF, which became an important political factor in Bulgaria, won the support of over 90 percent of the Turkish minority, 50 percent of the Pomaks (Bulgarian speaking Muslims), and about a third of the Muslim Roma (Eminov 2000). The Muslim and Christian Roma women, who are socially discriminated against, remain largely outside political life in most of the Balkan countries. Furthermore, the Roma political parties rarely cooperate with each other.

In the post-communist period, the nationalist parties in many Balkan countries tried not only to bring about an increase in the birth rates of their respective populations but also to redefine women as primarily biological reproducers of the nation. In Serbia and Croatia, despite the policies of the nationalist regimes, which seem to be in conflict with women's rights and interests, there is only mixed evidence of a gender gap in men's and women's political attitudes and almost none in their voting behavior. Many women supported nationalist parties, even though they remained unwilling to sacrifice their autonomy in reproductive decisions to the nationalist cause (Lilly and Irvine 2002).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Babuna, Die nationale Entwicklung der bosnischen Muslime. Mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der österreichisch-ungarischen Periode, Frankfurt 1996.
- W. Bracewell, Woman in the transition to democracy in South-Eastern Europe, in M. J. Faber (ed.), The Balkans. A religious backyard of Europe, Ravenna 1996, 213–20.
- A. Eminov, Turks and Tatars in Bulgaria and the Balkans, in Nationalities Papers 28 (2000), 129–46.
- Inter-Parliamentary Union (Switzerland), <<http://www.ipu.org/parline-e/parlinesearch.asp>>.
- C. S. Lilly and J. A. Irvine, Negotiating interests. Women and nationalism in Serbia and Croatia, 1990–1997, in

- East European Politics and Societies* 16 (2002), 109–46.
- J. Mertus, Women in Kosovo: contested terrains. The role of national identity in shaping and challenging gender identity, in S. P. Ramet (ed.), Gender politics in the Western Balkans. Women and society in Yugoslavia and the Yugoslav successor states, University Park, Pa. 1999, 171–86.
- OSCE/ODIHR (Organization for Security and Development in Europe/Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights), Women and democratization. OSCE Human Dimension Implementation Meeting. Background paper 3, Warsaw 1998.
- S. P. Ramet, Social currents in Eastern Europe. The sources and consequences of the great transformation, Durham, N.C. 1995.
- S. L. Wolchik, Women and the politics of gender in communist and post-communist Central and Eastern Europe, in S. P. Ramet (ed.), Eastern Europe. Politics, culture, and society since 1939, Bloomington, Ind 1998, 285–303.

AYDIN BABUNA

Canada

The story of Muslim women and political parties and participation in Canada is one of beginnings: Muslim women are only just starting to become involved in formal politics in Canada. (This is true also of Muslim men.) As in most other polities, women in general are underrepresented in Canadian legislatures, ranking 35th out of 181 countries according to the Geneva-based Inter-Parliamentary Union (data from IPU December 2002).

In the last ten years, although there has been a remarkable increase in the number of minority women elected to the federal parliament, minority women remain underrepresented in elected bodies (Black 2003, 59). Muslims represent 2 percent of the Canadian population (2001 Census data) but there are no Muslim women elected to the federal parliament and only one (of whom I am aware) elected in a provincial legislature (Fatima Houda-Pepin in Quebec). One Ismā'īlī woman (Mobin Jaffer) has been appointed to the federal senate, a non-elected body in Canada. Thus, in proportion to the population, Muslim women are clearly underrepresented in elected bodies in Canada at all levels of government – local, provincial, and federal. This is in keeping with Abu-Laban's description of the structure of formal political power in Canada being a "gendered vertical mosaic": majority groups hold more power than minority groups, and within those groups, men hold more power than women (Abu-Laban 2002, 269).

This absence of women from the scene of formal politics raises a host of questions. Is Muslim women's absence due to external factors, such as discrimination, or internal barriers, such as pressures not to be involved in politics? Are there Muslim women who run for office, but who do not get elected? Are Muslim women active in party politics? Unfortunately, these questions cannot be addressed in this brief entry. Though there is a significant body of literature on women's participation in formal politics in Canada, little attention has been paid to the ethnoracial dimensions of women's participation beyond considering the two main groups in Canada, Anglophone and Francophone women (Black 2003, 59, Abu-Laban 2002, 270–5). There is no research on the political participation of Muslim women.

According to Muslim women activists, few Muslim women run for office in Canada. Lila Fahlman, who was born in Canada to a Lebanese father and an American Methodist mother, was the first, running for the Winnipeg nomination of the New Democratic Party (NDP) for the 1971 Federal election (Fahlman 1999, 64). She was not nominated. Natasha Fatah, who was born in Pakistan and moved to Canada when she was almost 10, has been heavily involved in party politics. She joined the Ontario NDP at age 13, and in 1999, at age of 20, was elected co-chair of the Ontario New Democratic Youth. Natasha says that while there are Muslims involved in politics at the youth level, they are not active at the political party level. She was the only Muslim youth (let alone woman) involved in the Ontario NDP.

Scholars have identified several factors that are barriers to women's participation in formal politics. Newman and White (forthcoming) group these barriers into three broad categories: ideational, social, and cultural; organizational; and institutional. Their work, however, deals only with women in general: how they might apply to Muslim women in particular is not explored. It is safe to assume that in addition to facing the kinds of barriers that any woman would face, Muslim women face other barriers unique to them, internal and external. The most important internal barriers facing Muslim women are restrictive interpretations of Islam that say it compromises a Muslim women's modesty to be involved in politics, and that her proper sphere of activity is the home. These opinions are held widely, by both men and women, of all different kinds of ethnic groups.

Of less impact, but still relevant, is an opinion held by some Muslims that Muslims, men or women, should not participate in politics at all. The argument is that since the Canadian polity is not run according to Islamic law, Muslims should not be involved in the making of law, since that would involve them in un-Islamic practices. In the last ten years many Muslim leaders have rejected this view, and are actively encouraging Muslims to be involved in electoral politics in the belief that this is the only way for Muslims to affect positively the communities in which they live (Khan 2002).

The most important external hurdle for Muslim participation in electoral politics, and one that would apply equally to men and women, is the widespread negative perception by the general public of Islam and Muslims. Muslims are cast as "outsiders," often as barbaric "others" who do not hold or respect Canadian values. A Muslim who ran for office would face a challenge in reaching out to the general populace to overcome these negative views. Another important barrier is the systemic racism that applies to all visible minorities. Not all Muslims are from a visible minority, but many are: thus they would face racism as well as Islamophobia, should they run for office.

It is possible (although further empirical research would be necessary to affirm this) that even at the level of the political party, members hold the same, or similar, negative stereotypes of Muslims, thus impeding Muslim involvement at the party political level. Natasha Fatah faced this problem within the NDP. She found that because she was Muslim, she often had trouble getting her perspective on issues properly heard, especially those issues relating to Muslims, like Palestine. Instead of responding to the intellectual issue, people would dismiss her opinion with "you just feel that way because you're a Muslim." There was an assumption that she was inherently biased. The reactions she describes underscore a point made by Jerome Black in his study of ethnoracial minorities in Canadian parliaments: in recent years ethnoracial minorities have concluded that the only way to have their issues addressed at the level of public policy is to have group representation in elected bodies, and not to rely on interest-group based advocacy (Black 2002, 355–6). Group exclusion from the political realm sidelines group issues and concerns (ibid., 369, Newman and White forthcoming). In spite of this, Natasha also believes strongly that none of the barriers were insurmountable to someone who was able to explain herself well, present a strong voice for justice, and was willing to work hard.

An absence in formal politics does not imply that Muslim women are not active in the Canadian polity in other ways. Indeed, as Abu-Laban and other scholars point out, to consider women's involvement in formal politics as the only expression of their political participation is to miss women's activism in informal politics, the arena in which most women activists operate (Abu-Laban 2002, 277). In Canada Muslim women have focused most of their political energies in the area of community activism. Muslim women are found in all kinds of community groups, from social service agencies to media watch groups. Some are activists in mainstream groups, others in Muslim groups with an Islamic focus. Two examples of the latter are directly relevant here. In 1997–8, the Afghan Women's Organization worked with the Federation of Muslim Women (FMW), the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW), and MediaWatch on a federally funded multi-phase project about Muslim women and the media. The project included focused group discussions with Muslim women about the representation of Muslim women in the Canadian media, with an aim of increasing media literacy and advocacy skills of Muslim women (Jafri and Bullock, 35–40). At their 2003 annual conference, CCMW organized a workshop with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities designed to raise awareness among Muslim women about the non-electoral aspects of municipalities. The extent of Muslim women's involvement in these kinds of informal politics emphasizes that Muslim women in Canada are not politically passive.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- 2001 Canadian Census, <<http://www12.statcan.ca/english/census01/Products/Analytic/companion/rel/contentscf>>.
 IPU (Inter-Parliamentary Union), <<http://www.ipu.org/wmn-e/classif.htm>>.
 Natasha Fatah, interview, 10 September 2003.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- Y. Abu-Laban, Challenging the gendered vertical mosaic. Immigrants, ethnic minorities, gender and political participation, in J. Everitt and B. O'Neill (eds.), Citizen politics. Research and theory in Canadian political behaviour, Toronto 2002, 268–82.
 J. H. Black, Representation in the parliament of Canada. The case of ethnoracial minorities, in J. Everitt and B. O'Neill (eds.), Citizen politics. Research and theory in Canadian political behaviour, Toronto 2002, 35–72.
 —, Differences that matter. Minority women MPs, 1993–2000, in M. Tremblay and L. Trimble (eds.), Women and electoral politics in Canada, Toronto 2003, 59–74.
 K. H. Bullock and G. J. Jafri, Media (mis)representations. Muslim women in the Canadian nation, in Canadian Woman Studies 20:2 (2000), 35–40.
 L. Fahlman, Lila, in S. Zaman (ed.), At my mother's feet. Stories of Muslim women, Kingston, Ont. 1999, 51–69.
 M. A. M. Khan, American Muslims. Bridging faith and freedom, Beltsville, Md. 2002.
 J. Newman and L. White, Movement and public policy. The political struggles of Canadian women, Oxford University Press (forthcoming), chapter four.

Iran

Iranian women participated in the events leading to the Constitutional Revolution of 1905/6. Their numbers were few but their involvement signaled a break with the past when women, except occasional women of the court, did not participate in the public life of the country.

Women formed societies (anjumans) and women's discussion groups, some of which included men. They founded schools for girls and published magazines both in Tehran and the provinces. These constituted spaces for women's political participation as well. They discussed women's education and health and the problem of veiling. In their writings and their gatherings they drew comparisons between Iranian women and women in more progressive countries. Among the leading women's organizations in the 1920s was the Patriotic Women's League. In the 1930s, a number of women's organizations affiliated themselves to political parties, including the Communist Party and the Revival Party.

Political parties began seriously to recruit and organize women's branches in the 1940s. For example, the Democratic Party of Azerbaijan and the Tudeh (Communist) Party had women's sections. The Tudeh Party even appointed women to its central committee; the Democratic Party founded a women's organization and named one woman to the party's executive committee. A woman served in the leadership of the rightwing Sūmkā Party.

Women were active in the political agitation for nationalization of the British-run Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. They demanded changes in the electoral law to allow women to vote and run for elected office and the revision of sections of the civil law regulating marriage, divorce, and child custody. The Jam'iyat-i Rāh-i Naw (Society for the new way) and the Jam'iyat-i Zanān-i Huqūqdān (Society for women lawyers) were at the forefront of these efforts.

In 1963, women were among the founders of the Īrān-i Nuvīn Party, a state-sanctioned organization that became highly influential in Iranian politics. Two women sat on the politburo of the Rastākhīz Party, formed in 1975 when the Shah declared a single party system, and women served on all the party's various committees.

Two underground anti-Shah guerrilla organizations, the Mujāhidīn-i Khalq and the Fidā'iyyīn-i Khalq included women among their rank and file. These organizations acted openly for a brief period after the Islamic Revolution, but were subsequently declared illegal. The Mujāhidīn, who continued their opposition activities from abroad, elected a woman as the head of their organization. Since the Islamic Revolution, women have been members of every political party and political and professional organization, including the clerically-dominated Islamic Republic Party and the reformist Islamic Iran Participation Front.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Afari, The Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
- B. Bāmdād, From darkness into light. Women's emancipation in Iran, ed. and trans. F. R. C. Bagley, Hicksville, N.Y. 1977.
- G. Nashat (ed.), Women and revolution in Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1983.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.

HALEH ESFANDIARI

North Africa

Considering the role women played in the struggle for liberation, their participation in the political process in post-independence Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia seemed only natural, as the terms of the first constitutions indicated – even if the modalities of their participation (the right to vote and their access to the public sphere and to political representation) were left undetermined. However, the conditions under which they were associated with the struggle for liberation – they were made to be symbols of the preservation of identity, moral integrity, and authenticity – meant, implicitly, that they would be kept out of the political sphere and that their inferior status would be perpetuated. In all three countries, the question of gender identity combined with that of political participation was to determine the way women – or at least women activists – would go about having their demands taken into account by the political systems put into place during the post-independence period. As we examine that process, a certain number of paradoxes must be considered.

Not counting charities and other benevolent associations established during the colonial era, the first post-independence political organizations and trade unions were created, if not to deny the specificity of women's struggle, at least to underline that their struggle was to be subordinate to the more global struggles in which the nation – the people, the movement for independence, the development forces – was engaged. This was evidenced by the existence of national unions closely supervised by the central governments (the Union nationale des femmes tunisiennes, created in 1958; the Union nationale des femmes algériennes, created in 1963; and the Union nationale des femmes marocaines, created in 1969). There were also women's sections within trade unions (themselves often controlled by the state) as well as within political parties: the Union socialiste des forces populaires and the Istiqlal party in Morocco; and the FLN (Front de libération nationale) in Algeria and the PSD (Parti socialiste destourien) in Tunisia, both single parties. Everywhere, women were asked to choose between identifying themselves as women first and Algerian/Moroccan/Tunisian second, or vice-versa; and between identifying themselves as women first and members of the party or the union second, or vice-versa. Their mission was to mobilize women's energies and potentials toward a common goal rather than to focus on specific demands, which would have left them vulnerable to the criticism of weakening the domestic front. As the 1964 Charter of Algiers indicated, "Algerian women should be able to participate effectively in politics and the building of socialism by joining the ranks of the party and national organizations and acceding to positions of responsibility." All constitutional texts, organic laws, and charters adopted by Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco since gaining independence have used the same language (minus the mention of socialism), conferring political rights on women in theory when in reality even men themselves are prevented from exercising such rights because of the authoritarianism of the state.

In all three countries, this affirmation in principle of women's political rights had a trade-off in the form of a logic of confinement, which left women with very limited opportunities to become members of parliament, government, or party leaderships – positions to which they had access only through a quota system. As a result, the sole political outlets conceded to women were women's organizations, which were tightly controlled by the state. In Algeria, the only women to be able to claim some political legitimacy were those who were recognized as former mujāhidāt – and even they were encouraged to go back home and "rest." And when, on several occasions between 1965 and 1984, women opposed the passing of ever more reactionary family codes, they had to resort to informal or even clandestine means of mobilization and action – petitions, demonstrations, and unauthorized associations – due to the extremely tight control the FLN exercised over the Union nationale des femmes algériennes. Those actions would not be enough to prevent the implementation in 1984 of a particularly retrograde law – "a dramatic regression," to quote Zakya Daoud. In Morocco, the rapid degradation of the relationship between the monarchy and the political parties born out of the national movement meant that the demands for female participation were relegated to the back burner, and the initiative by women militants to have those demands integrated into the platform of the parties they belonged to was deliberately stalled in the name of partisan discipline. As for Tunisia, which had the most advanced legal status for women until the revision of the Moroccan Mudawwana in October 2003, it is without a doubt the country in the Maghrib where the political participation of women is most problematic, as if the “state-backed feminism” instituted by President Bourguiba’s regime had rendered ineffective or neutralized the purely political dimension of women’s participation in the public sphere – that participation being strictly regimented by the Union nationale des femmes tunisiennes, whose mission is blurred with that of the ministries in charge of social affairs. In the early 1990s, Zinelabidine Ben Ali, Bourguiba’s successor, sought to remobilize women and ask for their support in his repression of Islamist movements, only to realize that there were only 7 female members of parliament, that women accounted for only 11 of the 200 members of the RCD (Rassemblement constitutionnel démocratique, the new name for the PSD), and above all that women’s – not to mention feminist – magazines had all ceased to exist and that all major newspapers had eliminated their women’s sections. Additionally, it must be noted that in all three countries, the political socialization of the feminine vanguard, largely leftist in the 1960s and 1970s, and Islamist since the beginning of the 1980s, contributed to the exacerbation of the political marginalization of those militants, both as women and as sympathizers of political movements that were the constant targets of state repression.

A crucial point to be made here is that the political formula – single party system, as in Tunisia until 1981 or Algeria until 1989, or multiparty system, as in Morocco – does not seem to have any significant influence on the capacity of women to make their presence felt on the political scene, except perhaps in Algeria where, starting in 1989, the proliferation of political parties came with an increase in the number of women in positions of leadership within those parties: 5 women out of 30 members in the political bureau of the Front des forces socialistes (FFS); 10 women among the 42 founding members of the Parti de l’avant-garde socialiste (PAGS); 4 women out of 18 members in the executive bureau of the Rassemblement pour la culture et le développement (RCD); and, with Louisa Hanoune as the secretary general of the Parti des travailleurs, the only women head of a political party in the Arab world. However, what this activism by female militants has shown first and foremost is the limited ability of those organizations to mobilize women, especially when one compares it with the mobilizing power of the Front islamique du salut (FIS), which claimed a million women as members – of a total of three million members – at the time of the legislative elections of December 1991. Moreover, in Algeria as well as in Tunisia, women’s rights militants, for whom the state party (the RCD in both cases) is the only vehicle for political participation, run the risk of being perceived as condoning the repressive actions of the two regimes, particularly against Islamist movements, and agreeing with the premise that advances in women’s rights might have to be secured to the detriment of human rights. In Morocco, where it was not until 1993 that two women became members of parliament, and until 1998 that a woman was appointed to the position of “minister delegate,” the election of 35 women in parliament in the fall of 2002, following the implementation of a gender-based quota system, could primarily be attributed to the king’s will – not to the political parties’ activism or to women’s abilities to have those parties endorse their call for greater female participation in politics.

Looking past the difficulties and obstacles women have to face before they can accede to positions of power within political organizations, be elected as members of parliament, or become ministers, the most insidious form of political marginalization for women continues to be their confinement to women’s issues. While no one will dispute the value of having women voice their own concerns and defend their own interests, a female exclusivity on female matters is no more justified than the exclusion of equally competent women from consideration for “general interest” positions of authority, as is almost systematically the case in Algeria and Morocco. In that regard, with three women serving respectively as minister for employment and professional training, minister for the promotion of women and families, and vice-president of the National Assembly; and with women accounting for 21.6 percent of all municipal councils’ membership, 24 percent of magistrate positions, and 13 percent of the seats in the Conseil supérieur de la magistrature, Tunisia remains an exception in the Maghrib.

Translation from the French by Matthieu Dalle,
University of Louisville

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Brand, Women, the state and the political liberalism. Middle Eastern and North Africa experiences, New York 1998.
- Z. Daoud, Féminisme et politique au Maghreb. Soixante années de lutte, Casablanca 1993.
- S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.

ALAIN ROUSSILLON

South Asia

INTRODUCTION

South Asia is home to over 400 million of the world's Muslim population of whom the majority reside in Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan. While Bangladesh and Pakistan have elected women prime ministers, a survey of the national political scene in these three countries indicates limited participation by women in the political process.

In Bangladesh, even though the heads of the two major parties (Awami League and the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, BNP) are women, the 2002 elections led to success for only 6 women candidates (of the 32 fielded). In India, women have a limited presence in the lower house (8.8 percent) and the upper house (10.3 percent) and Muslim women are even less well represented with only one Muslim woman in each house. In Pakistan until the 2002 electoral reforms, which led to reservation of 33 percent of seats for women, there were only 6 female members in the 217-member national assembly and 2 women out of 83 senate members. After the reforms went into effect Pakistani women ended up with 21.6 percent of seats in the lower house and 17 percent of seats in the upper house. These numbers are reflective of the challenges posed by the politicization of religion and the interplay between class and identity politics as Muslim women seek to mobilize and participate in political activities in the South Asian region.

POLITICIZATION OF RELIGION

The 1980s and 1990s saw dramatic changes in the relationship between states and religious forces in the South Asian region. The Iranian Revolution and the growth of "fundamentalism" in the Middle East, the Salman Rushdie affair, and the Gulf War of 1991 led to heightened polarization along religious lines in Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan.

BANGLADESH

In Bangladesh the government of General Ershad made Islam the state religion in 1988. After his departure in 1991, the two major political parties, the Awami League led by Sheikh Hasina and the BNP led by Begum Khaleda Zia have had to contend with the growing strength of conservative Islamic forces represented by the Jamaat-e-Islami. The alliance between the BNP and the Jamaat-e-Islami in the 1991 elections pushed the BNP government to arrest a young doctor turned author, Taslima Nasreen, for alleged blasphemy in her novel Lajja. The Jamaat for its part used protests and demonstrations to try to get Nasreen executed. In the years that followed the process of Islamization has been pushed even further as the competition between the Awami League and the BNP has intensified with the two parties taking alternate control of the state. In the 2001 elections, the BNP-Jamaat alliance won 215 of the 300 seats in parliament. However despite the presence of a prime minister and an opposition leader who is female, women's participation in national politics and in government is limited.

PAKISTAN

In Pakistan, the Islamization begun by General Zia ul-Haq was briefly halted by his death in 1988. In the elections that followed, the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) led by Benazir Bhutto came to office. Her tenure was fraught with difficulties because of resistance from the military and religious leadership who were opposed to a woman running an Islamic republic. The PPP government was dismissed after 18 months, plunging Pakistan into a series of short-lived governments until the 1999 military coup led by General Pervez Musharraf who allied himself with Islamic parties represented by the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA) in his quest for legitimacy. International and domestic pressure to return Pakistan to a democracy subsided in the wake of the 11 September 2001 attacks as Pakistan became a partner in the United States war on terrorism. In the elections held in 2002, the share of anti-United States and pro-Islamic parties went from 5 to 17 percent of the vote especially in key areas like the North West Frontier Province. However, the Musharraf government did institute the promised 33 percent reservation of seats for women, which has led to the largest ever influx of women politicians into the Pakistani parliament. The fact that these women politicians were not directly elected evoked mixed responses from women's groups who fear that they will do a better job of representing their families than representing the concerns of women.

INDIA

In India, the Congress Party sought to halt its declining public support by pandering to communal forces (Hindu and Muslim). In the 1980s the Shah Bano case led the Congress government to pass the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Bill. The distinction made between monolithic Hindu and Muslim communities during the debates on the bill fueled the tensions between them and contributed to the success of the Hindu nationalist party, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), which went from 2 seats in parliament in 1984 to 189 seats in the 1999 elections. The BJP also strengthened its position by agitating for the construction of a temple to Lord Ram at Ayodhya on the site of Babri Masjid, a mosque that had been demolished by party supporters in December 1992. The debate over Shah Bano and the destruction of the Babri Masjid led to more involvement by educated, urban Muslim women in the activities of women's organizations such as the Janawadi Mahila Samiti (JMS) and the National Federation of Indian Women. However for most Muslim women, the two events led to a redefinition of Muslim female identity primarily as Muslims and as a minority, and consequently to more constraints on women's rights in the name of Islam.

CLASS AND IDENTITY POLITICS

Surveys of women parliamentarians in the South Asian region indicate that most of them come from middle- to upper-class backgrounds, have professional training, have accessed politics through their families, and have few or no links to the women's movements in their countries. Class and kinship ties help these women to defray some of the traditional costs to Muslim women of political involvement. These women are able to afford paid help or have a strong family support system that takes care of household and childcare duties in particular. For women like Benazir Bhutto who were single when they entered politics there is tremendous pressure to conform to traditionally female roles once they marry. The exception to this is political widows like Sheikh Hasina and Begum Zia in Bangladesh who are accorded a special status by virtue of their personal tragedies, which have led them to assume the political mantle of a father (Sheikh Hasina) or husband (Begum Zia). Class can also mediate the influence of religion. In India, Dr. Najma Heptullah, who is the deputy speaker of the Indian Rajya Sabha (upper house) is from an elite class and educational background and has been supported in her career by her family. At the local level, a survey of 20 women ward commissioners from four cities in Bangladesh found a similar nexus between class (as defined by education and income), kinship ties, and political participation. For these women, familial connections to politics provided valuable experiences that later translated into public office and helped smooth their way in a conservative Islamic environment.

IMPORTANCE OF ELECTORAL REFORMS

Most Muslim women in South Asia do not participate in political activity. Women's groups in Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan have been at the forefront of efforts to bring about electoral reforms aimed at giving women access to office in political environments where they are simply not tolerated. While this can be contentious at the national level, governments have been more responsive at the local level. In Bangladesh, during the last local government elections (Union Parishad) more than 12,000 women members were elected directly for reserved seats. In India, the adoption of the 73rd and 74th amendments to the Indian constitution in 1993 led to the reservation of 33 percent of seats for women in elections to local bodies (Panchayati Raj). Over one million women today (some of whom are Muslim) hold office at the local level in India and, more importantly, a third of all chair positions in local bodies are also filled by women. In Pakistan, the Musharraf government reforms led to the election of 120 women in the four provincial assemblies and 36,000 female councilors. The response in Islamic constituencies has been mixed. In some cases there have been efforts by religious leaders to bar women from voting and threaten punishment if they do (North West Frontier Province) and to issue fatwas banning women from appearing on a podium to campaign for election (Mallapuram district in Kerala, India). However, the Islamist MMA in Pakistan fielded 570 candidates in the 2002 elections on a platform focused on women's rights to education, social status, literacy, and protection from violence. The party was able to win 15 seats in the national legislature and a further 20 in the provincial assemblies. The hope is that as more women enter local government they will gain public acceptance for women's role in governance and create a space for new generations of women representatives.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkham (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995.
 Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, New Delhi 1994.
 C. W. Howland (ed.), Religious fundamentalism and the human rights of women, New York 1999.
 P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender.

- Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia*, New York 1998.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities 1890s-1980s, New Delhi 1990.
- F. Mernissi, The fundamentalist obsession with women, Lahore 1975.
- , Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in modern Muslim society, Bloomington, Ind. 1987.
- S. Sutherland (ed.), Bridging worlds. Studies on women in South Asia, New Delhi 1992.
- UNESCO reports, <www.unescap.org/huset/women/reports>.
- S. White, Arguing with the crocodile. Gender and class in Bangladesh, Dhaka 1992.

SUDHA RATAN

Sub-Saharan Africa

Women in predominantly Muslim societies in Sub-Saharan Africa have been part of the movements that have shaped the African political landscape from the pre-independence period of the late 1950s and 1960s up until today. Recent developments have shown that Muslim women are assuming political leadership today as they did during the nationalist movements.

In Kenya, for example, Muslim women in the late 1950s were involved through the Muslim Women's Institute and Moslem Women's Cultural Association in a movement to petition the colonial authorities to scrap legislation that did not allow coastal women, who were primarily Muslim, to vote. They argued against the voting policy on the grounds that it was discriminatory because women in other parts of the country were allowed to vote after 1956. Once this victory was won, they initiated campaigns to get women to vote.

In Tanganyika (today Tanzania), Muslim women such as Bibi Titi were leaders of the independence movement from the outset, while others were socialized into political activities through dance groups, networks of food sellers and other self-employed women. Because they were organized as Muslim women into such groups they were considered harmless by the colonial authorities and easily eluded their suspicions. Nevertheless, these women formed the backbone of the nationalist movement and were critical to the success of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) and its women's wing that led the country to independence.

In the post-independence period up until the mid-1980s, women throughout Africa were active in the politically motivated and patronage driven women's wings and mass women's organizations that dominated women's mobilization at the national level. They were typically led by female relatives of state and party leaders, and primarily served the ruling party by garnering votes, and serving social functions of dancing, singing, and cooking food for party dignitaries.

In the mid 1980s new movements emerged that were distinct from these earlier women's organizations which had been tied to the single party. The new organizations were autonomous from the ruling party in terms of leadership, funding, and agendas. They took up issues ranging from increasing women's political presence, women's education and literacy, reproductive rights issues, to women's legal rights in areas of inheritance, marriage, divorce, land ownership, and citizenship. Some organizations addressed issues such as violence against women, domestic violence, and sexual harassment. In Senegal, Kenya, Mali, Burkina Faso, and Chad there have been major initiatives to end the practice of female genital mutilation (FGM). Women have sought legislative and constitutional changes to improve the status of women.

In some countries women's organizations addressed the disparaging portrayal of women in the media. In Tanzania, Muslim women were members and leaders of the new generation of women's rights organizations. The very earliest of these new organizations, founded in 1979, the Tanzania Media Women's Association (TAMWA), was formed by Muslim women and had a strong Muslim women's presence in its leadership.

The 1990s also saw the beginnings of a new wave of movements attempting to bring about multi-partyism, civilian rule, and democratization in Africa. Women in predominantly Muslim countries were at the forefront of these movements. In Mali, thousands of demonstrating women and children were shot at by forces of President Moussa Traoré in a series of events that led to his downfall in 1991. In Sierra Leone, women were the only group to openly defy soldiers as they demonstrated to demand that free elections be held when rumors began to circulate that the military might postpone the February 1996 elections. In Conakry, Guinea, women organized a sit-in in front of the presidential palace in a support of a 1990 general strike of workers and student demonstrations, and to protest at the economic crisis, which they blamed on the country's leadership. In Niger, several thousand women demonstrated in protest at the exclusion of women representatives from the preparatory commission charged with organizing the national conference in 1991 (only one woman was included out of 68 delegates). In the end, five women were added to the delegate list of the national conference to decide on the country's future.

Muslim women have been actively pursuing strategies to attain political representation in legislatures throughout Africa. Of the ten countries in Africa with the lowest representation of women in the legislature, nine have predominantly or large Muslim populations. It has therefore been in some of these countries that women have sought greater political representation through the introduction of quotas. Already the largely Muslim countries of Senegal, Eritrea, Mali, and Djibouti have begun to meet with success in raising the rates of female representation as a result of such pressures. Even in Somalia, a country that has been torn by civil war based on clan divisions, the Women's Association lobbied the Transnational National Government to make sure they had 25 seats (10 percent) in the transitional assembly.

Those organizations working toward increase in women's political representation are generally linked to organizations that are involved in civic education, leadership training, networking among women to advance women's political awareness and skill, support for women candidates on a non-partisan basis, and media campaigns and other efforts to increase public awareness about the need for women's leadership.

Thus, in Niger, a predominantly Muslim country, women activists have worked to change women's status on a number of fronts simultaneously and they have made a series of gains in a relatively very short period of time. They have succeeded in obtaining major changes in the Family Code that protect women's rights. They achieved the ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women in 1999. The following year women activists were able to win a 35 percent quota for women in the legislature in a country where previously only one woman had had a parliamentary seat. In 2001 the government placed heavy penalties on people convicted of practicing FGM.

One issue that has been critical for women has been peace initiatives. Although their role has rarely been acknowledged or publicized, women have been involved in peace movements from Senegal's Casamance region, to Mali, Sudan, Somalia, and Sierra Leone.

With the spread of Islamicist movements in countries such as Niger, Nigeria, Mali, Eritrea, Sudan, Ghana, and elsewhere, some women activists are drawing on alternative traditions within Islam to promote women's rights and/or leadership. Muslim women's organizations have generally taken one of four general approaches. They have worked within Islamic discourses to highlight Islamic traditions that promote women's rights; adopted secular approaches; pursued pragmatic approaches that work either within the framework of Islamic law or by adopting a secular approach depending on the situation; and finally, sought an approach that carves out a niche for women within an Islamicist framework.

For example, the Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN) and Women's Rights in Moslem Law in Nigeria have tried to open up the gender discourse within Islam, pressing for a redefinition of women's rights, including inheritance and custody rights, equality in education, and the full participation of women within the bounds of the Islamic Sharī'a law that is now followed in twelve Nigerian states.

Some women's organizations within majority Islamic countries have pursued greater secularism as a way of advancing women's rights. By calling for greater gender inclusiveness in politics, Muslim women have become some of the staunchest forces for democratization and a secular state in countries such as Sudan. In the case of Sudan, the regime of General 'Umar Ḥasan Aḥmad al-Bashīr has undermined the rights of women by imposing increasingly harsh restrictions since he came to power in 1989. These restrictions include dress regulations, banning all political and non-political organizations, restricting travel by women, firing women from top positions, and institutionalizing physical and psychological abuse of women accused of being dissidents. Women's groups such as the Sudanese Women Union have been at the forefront of the movement for a democratic secular state, campaigning against the legal restrictions against women and arguing for an interpretation of the Qur'ān that does not discriminate against women and one that promotes equality, human rights, democracy, and civil liberties. Secular women have also been concerned about the implications of a "pure" and "authentic" Islamic state for the non-Muslim and non-Arab inhabitants of southern Sudan.

Other groups such as BAOBAB in Nigeria seek to advance the rights of women who live under Islamic laws through whatever means women locally deem appropriate, whether it involves taking a secular stance or using arguments based on Islamic law. Nigeria became a focus of international attention in the late 1990s with the expansion of institutionalized Islamic law in the northern part of the country and the imposition of harsh punishments on women charged with violating the laws, including imposing the penalty of stoning to death on individual women singled out and accused of adultery. Women lawyers and organizations like BAOBAB actively appealed against such sentences.

Finally, there are those women's movements that work within the Islamic establishment and are supportive of it, although often with their own interpretations. In Sudan, for example, many leading militant Islamist women of the National Islamic Front (NIF) such as Su'ād al-Fātiḥ al-Badawī and Batūl Mukhtār Muḥammad Ṭāhā were actively involved in interpreting Islam independently and mobilizing supporters for the Islamicist cause in the 1980s.

In addition to these strategies at the national level, there are regional organizations, such as Women Living Under Muslim Laws, which are involved in information sharing, database building, networking, solidarity action, and organizing campaigns throughout Africa and the Middle East. These organizations have allowed women in predominantly Muslim countries to coordinate their activities and learn from one another.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abdulai, Interview. Dr. Fatima Babiker Mahmoud, in Africa World Review (May–October) 1993, 48–50.
- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- B. Callaway, Women and political participation in Kano City, in Comparative Politics 19:4 (1987), 379–93.
- B. M. Cooper, The politics of difference and women's association in Niger. Of "prostitutes," the public and politics, in Signs 20:4 (1995), 851–82.
- S. Geiger, TANU women. Gender and culture in the making of Tanganyikan nationalism, 1955–1965, Portsmouth, N.H. 1997.
- S. Hale, Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism, and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
- , Gender politics and Islamization in Sudan, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Dossier 18, October 1997, <<http://www.mluml.org/english/index.shtml>>.
- F. A. Ibrahim, Sudanese women under repression, and the shortest way to equality, in M. R. Waller and J. Rycenga (eds.), Frontline feminisms. Women, war, and resistance, New York 2000, 129–39.
- M. Strobel, Muslim women in Mombasa, 1890–1975, New Haven, Conn. 1979.

ALII MARI TRIPP

Turkey

In 1934, prior to all Muslim countries and many Western states, Turkish women had full suffrage rights. Following the 1935 elections 4.5 percent of the members of parliament were women; since then this ratio has never been attained.

In the literature few reasons are put forward to explain why Turkish women gained the vote so early. First, and most important, is that female participation in public life was seen as one of the major reflections of the Turkish Republic's project of secularization, Westernization, and modernization. Second, it is argued that the early republican regime was trying to distance itself from the rising fascist regimes in Europe, and granting suffrage rights to women was a show of alliance with democracy in Europe (Tekeli 1982). It has also been argued that demands coming from women's groups, starting in the Ottoman period and including those by the Turkish Women's Association in the 1920s and 1930s, were significant and the republican leaders could not turn a blind eye to them (Çakır 1994). However, we see noticeable decreases in women's representation with the introduction of the multi-party system in 1950, a development that meant that there was no further need to prove democratization of the country.

In 2003 Turkey ranked 110th amongst 173 countries in women's representation in parliament (4.4 percent) and in local government women's representation was less than 2 percent. This low level of participation constitutes a sharp contrast to the relatively high level of participation of women in professions (33.9 percent) and public offices (17 percent) (UNDP 2000). Such low levels of political participation are due to factors that are also common to other parts of the world. Women in general lack assets such as financial resources, organizational capacity, political expertise and experience, as well as a traditional community support base, which are considered essential for political success. Moreover, motherhood, family, and modesty are important values that usually clash with the expected competitive, assertive, argumentative, and extroverted nature of politicians (Güneş-Ayata 1998). Under these circumstances, the majority of the women in political positions are "selected" by the party leadership as tokens to demonstrate egalitarian perspectives of the parties (Yaraman 1999).

Despite this low representation in the political sphere, gender issues and role models have been focal in Turkish politics. Early republican reforms envisaged a woman who was educated, working, and participating equally with men in public life (Durakbaşa 1998). Equality in public life rather than the private sphere was stressed, even though here too there were many advances through the introduction of the Civil Code in 1926, such as equal rights of property inheritance, divorce, and custody.

This model has been challenged since the 1980s from many perspectives. First, feminists from many different ideological standpoints argued that the republican model of equality has been only partly successful because it underestimated the difficulties experienced by women because of family duties, community structures, and conventional role models (Z. Arat 1998). The state was deeply criticized for being gender blind (Kadıoğlu 1998). Low representation of women in politics was considered to be both a cause and outcome of this insensitivity.

Simultaneously, groups who identified more closely with Islam began their criticism. Despite internal variations, in very broad terms, these groups argued that the republican model of women was too insistent on a Westernized public female role model and was intolerant of women with Muslim identities entering public life (Saktanber 2002). In the last decade, women emphasizing a Muslim identity have become increasingly more active, creating non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and charity foundations as well as mobilizing votes (Y. Arat 1999).

The low level of participation of women in politics has been a vocalized concern especially for the secular feminist groups. Women's NGOs have raised this issue and have proposed different methods of improvement. Founded in 1997, Kadın Adayları Destekleme Ve Eğitim Derneği (KADER, Association for the support and training of women candidates), is an organization that specifically aims to promote women in politics.

Two other methods of promotion of women's participation have been through establishment of quotas for women and founding of women's auxiliaries in political parties. At present (2003) four political parties have quotas (Republican Peoples Party 25 percent, People's Democracy Party 25 percent, Freedom and Solidarity Party 30 percent, and True Path Party 10 percent) pertaining to internal elections. While absence of women in electable positions in the lists is uncommon, even the parties that have quotas in their statutes do not apply them to candidacies in local and national elections. Women's auxiliaries in parties have been a controversial issue. Their success has been in vote mobilization and fund-raising rather than in helping women become politicians themselves (Tekeli 1982). The first auxiliary was opened by a left wing party, the Republican People's Party, in 1957 and other political parties soon adopted the idea. Nonetheless, in most center-right and center-left parties the women's auxiliaries remained marginal in the last two decades and women's representation was primarily carried out by feminist NGOs.

Leadership of political parties has never totally neglected women's representation. All have recognized the importance of women's votes – research indicates that about half of women vote independently of their male relatives – and have tried to appeal to them through rhetoric and by appointing a token number of female candidates (Sancar-Üşür 2000).

In the last two decades, with rising sensitivity to gender issues, political parties began to have specific chapters in their programs on gender issues. Two main perspectives are observable here. The political parties of the right (including Islamists and nationalists) have a family centered perspective and propose policies that will facilitate, enhance, and support women in family based roles (Güneş-Ayata 2001). Left and left-of-center parties, however, present a more progressive ideology at least in the rhetoric, where they argue that an egalitarian society can be constructed only with equal participation of women and men in public life. Yet they also avoid a deep questioning of patriarchal systems, and especially problems that pertain to private life and family (Güneş-Ayata and Aslan-Akman 2004).

Feminist groups, with the help of international organizations and media, have persuaded the political decision-making bodies to make gender issues a part of the governmental mechanism. The Directorate General on the Status and Problems of Women was established in 1990 after the ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) as a national mechanism. Even though the directorate has not been very influential in mainstreaming gender issues in policymaking, it has been important in disseminating international norms, supporting gender studies, promoting women's NGOs, and creating wider gender sensitivity.

In conclusion, despite early attempts to encourage women to enter politics, Turkey has a long way to go in gender mainstreaming, the development of a gender sensitive and conscious agenda in policymaking, the adoption of affirmative measures to increase female representation, and the encouragement of women to express their own voices and demands. In short, the empowerment of women through politics will take time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Y. Arat, Political Islam in Turkey and women's organizations, Istanbul 1999.
- Z. Arat, Kemalizm ve kadın, in 75 Yılda kadımlar ve erkekler, Istanbul 1998, 51–70.
- S. Çakır, Osmanlı kadın hareketleri, Istanbul 1994.
- A. Durakbaşa, Cumhuriyet döneminde modern kadın ve erkek kimliklerinin oluşumu. Kemalist kadın kimliği ve münevver erkekler, in 75 Yılda kadımlar ve erkekler, Istanbul 1998, 29–50.
- A. Güneş-Ayata, Laiklik, güç ve katılım üçgeninde Türkiye'de kadın ve siyaset, in 75 Yılda kadımlar ve erkekler, Istanbul 1998, 237–48.
- , The politics of implementing women's rights in Turkey, in J. H. Bayes and N. Tohid (eds.), Globalization, gender and religion. The politics of women's rights in Catholic and Muslim contexts, New York 2001.

- A. Güneş-Ayata and C. Aslan-Akman, Overcoming gender inequalities in political recruitment. Another challenge for democratization in Turkey, in B. Hoecker and G. Fuchs (eds.), Women's political participation and representation in the states joining the European Union, Opladen 2004, 259–84.
- A. Kadioğlu, Cinselliğin inkarı. Büyük toplumsal projelerin nesnesi olarak Türk kadını, in 75 Yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 89–100.
- A. Saktanber, Living Islam. Women, religion and the politicization of culture in Turkey, London 2002.
- Ş. Tekeli, Kadınlar ve siyasal toplumsal hayat, İstanbul 1982.
- UNDP, Human Development Report 2000, New York 2000.
- S. Üşür, Kadın erkek eşitliğine doğru yürüyüş. Eğitim, çalışma yaşamı ve siyaset, İstanbul 2000.
- A. Yaraman, Türkiye'de kadınların siyasal temsili, İstanbul 1999.

AYŞE AYATA

Political Prisoners

Iran and Afghanistan

IRAN

There were female political prisoners in Iran long before women's prisons were established and prior to the modern discourse of the political prisoner, which goes back to the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The imprisonment of women was an important aspect throughout all periods of political suppression.

1840s/1850s. Suppression of the Bābī movement

Qurrat al-'Ayn, a woman leader of the Bābī movement was until her execution incarcerated (January 1850–October 1852) in a non-official prison, in the upper chamber of the house of Tehran's chief of police, Maḥmūd Khān Kalāntar.

1920s/1930s. Suppression of the socialist movement

In the 1920s, women's associations and newspapers were attacked by the police and groups linked to the mullahs. Some of the prominent feminists were exiled and their journals closed. In Qazvīn alone, 24 members of Anjuman-i Parwarish were incarcerated. In the 1930s, some women linked to the Communist Party were imprisoned.

1950s. Suppression of the National Front and Tudeh Party

Several members of the Iranian Women's Organization linked to the Tudeh Party were imprisoned.

1970s. Suppression of Marxist and Marxist Islamic guerrilla organizations

In the early 1970s, female political prisoners were still seen as an appendix rather than as political opponents and were incarcerated alongside common criminals. Women's suffrage coincided with political suppression in the 1960s. This led to the significant appearance of women in political opposition. Because of the radicalization of political struggles in the 1970s the regime took drastic measures. The Anti-Terrorism Committee, commanded by SAVAK (secret service), brutally tortured prisoners. Women and girls were also victims of sexual torture such as rape. In the maximum security prisons of Qaṣr and Iwīn separate blocks for women were added. Hundreds of women were condemned to imprisonment, many for life. Forty-two were killed, including those killed in armed confrontations and others who committed suicide just before capture. Three were executed by firing squads, three murdered in prison and some died under torture. Under the pressure of protests the regime proclaimed a general amnesty on 26 October 1978.

1979–. Gender-based suppression in the Islamic Republic of Iran

In 1979, Farrukhrū Pārsā, the former female minister of education, was executed for "sowing corruption on earth." Iranian officials announced that she had been "wrapped in a dark sack and machine-gunned." This marked the beginning of gender-specific suppression.

Between 1981 and 1985 the Islamic Revolutionary Committees caused the high-security prisons of Iwīn, Qizil Hīṣār, and Guhar Dasht in Tehran and other prisons to be overcrowded with many thousands of female political prisoners, from 10 to over 70 years old, among them members and sympathizers of oppositional groups or mothers helping their children. Closely watched by repenters (tawābīn) and female wardens, they were at the mercy of male guards who tortured, raped, married, or executed them.

Sixty died under torture and over 1,500 were executed: 47 were pregnant, 187 were under eighteen, 22 were thirteen to fifteen-years-old, 9 were under thirteen, 2 were over seventy, and the youngest was ten. In addition many Bahā'ī women were executed for refusing to recant.

Ideological courses accompanied the continual torture, which was used not only to obtain information or ideological recantations in public but was also part of everyday life in prison. The goal was to destroy the entire personality. Resistance and disobedience were brutally punished. In 1986, disobedient women were confined in boxes for up to ten months and many went mad.

Some repenters sought an end in (temporary) marriages with eligible guards, others in suicide. In 1988, non-repentant prisoners were executed. Hundreds of women linked to the Mujāhidīn organization were hanged as “armed enemies of God,” leftist women were whipped at the five times of prayer for weeks. One woman died after 22 days and three committed suicide. Approximately one hundred women survived the massacre because of the public protests of Iranian women in Berlin in 1989.

In the 1990s and the early 2000s, the female political prisoners were mostly prominent lawyers, journalists, publishers, and others struggling for women’s rights.

AFGHANISTAN

Merely for being relatives of male offenders, Afghan women constituted generations of anonymous prisoners, for example women and children belonging to the royal family as well as those belonging to Islamists (1978 and 1979). Women were also imprisoned and tortured as political offenders.

1970s

The first republic (Sardar Dāwūd 1973–8) was based on political repression; one response to this was the foundation of the Revolutionary Association of Women of Afghanistan (RAWA) in Pakistan in 1976.

1980s

Under the Communists and Soviets, the numerous interrogation and torture centers of the secret service, Khidmat-i Iṭilā‘at-i Dawlatī (KHAD), were opened to women. Numerous women were arrested for taking part in student demonstrations or as members of armed opposition organizations. At the same time, leftist women were condemned by Islamic courts in the regions controlled by Mujāhidīn. There were cases of execution. As prisoners of war, Afghan women and their children were objects of a significant gender-specific victimization.

1990s

Mujāhidīn groups imprisoned, tortured, and raped women and children of ethnic-religious minority groups and those of the rival ethnic groups in official and private prisons. Many were executed and many went missing. In 1993, under President Rabbānī in Kabul, Shī‘ī minorities, including women and children, were imprisoned, tortured, and raped. From 1995 to 2001, the Taliban militia kidnapped hundreds of non-Pashtun women and forced them into marriages with Taliban commanders.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Ahmadi, Imprisoned women, in Iran Bulletin 1997, <<http://www.iran-bulletin.org/women/AHMADI.html>>.
- P. ‘Alizādah, Khūb nigāh kumid, rāstakī ast. Guzārish-i zindān, Paris 1987.
- Amnesty International, Afghanistan. Leben ohne Menschenrechte, Bonn 1986.
- , Women in Afghanistan. A human rights catastrophe, London 1995.
- , Women in Afghanistan. Pawns in men’s power struggle, AI Index: ASA 11/11/99.
- K. Āzarī, Maṣlūb. Khātirātī az zindānhā-yi Jumbūri-i Islāmī, Cologne 2001.
- A. Dihqānī, Ḥamāsah-i muqāvimat, Beirut 1974.
- L. Kelly, Vision, innovation and professionalism in policing violence against women and children, Strasbourg 2003.
- D. MacEoin, From Shaykhism to Babism. A study in charismatic renewal in Shi‘i Islam, Ph.D. thesis, University of Cambridge 1977.
- S. Pārsīpūr, Khātirāt-i zindān, Stockholm 1996.
- M. Rahā, Ḥaqīqat-i sādih. Khātirāt-i az zindānhā-yi Jumbūri-i Islāmī, 2 vols., Hanover 1992–4.
- B. Seel, In diesen Momenten dachte ich, es sei besser, wenn ich stürbe, in Die Tageszeitung (Berlin), 27 November 1991, 3.
- , Die Folter diktiert die Sprache der Macht, in Die Tageszeitung (Berlin), 12 November 1991, 3.

JALE AHMADI

Political Regimes

Afghanistan

Gender and women's issues have featured prominently in the political evolution of modern Afghanistan; however, traditional elements have consistently resisted efforts to change Afghan society. King Amān Allāh (r. 1919–29) attempted to transform Afghanistan into a modern state. His modernization campaign produced Afghanistan's first constitution (1924), the secularization of education, and advocated the emancipation of women.

Girls' schools were established in Kabul. Women were encouraged to unveil. Legislation in 1923 gave women the right to marry the man of their choice. Prominent female members of the royal family established the Anjuman-i Himāyat-i Niswān (Women's protective society). Girls were sent abroad for secondary education and coeducation at the primary school level was proposed. Conservative tribal elements decried the emancipation of women as an invasion of privacy, a violation of modesty, and an attack against the chastity of the family.

Rebellion against Amān Allāh's reforms forced his abdication and exile. Nādir Shāh (r. 1930–3) became king and in deference to popular protests, he suspended Amān Allāh's reforms, including female education. After the ascension of King Muḥammad Zāhir Shāh (r. 1934–72), female education was gradually reintroduced along with various other reforms. In 1959, a subtle campaign initiated by Prime Minister Dāwūd, successfully unveiled women although purdah prevailed in the rural areas.

The constitution of 1964 granted women the right to vote. Education at the tertiary level was coeducational and women were encouraged to participate in the government and to enter traditionally male dominated professions. In 1965, a woman was appointed as minister of public health. Women were elected to the lower chamber of parliament. By the early 1970s, Afghanistan had trained seven female doctors.

The government discouraged polygamy, child marriages, and domestic violence against women but in the countryside where governmental authority was minimal these practices continued. Many Afghans outside the capital and major cities remained unaware of developments that continued to empower Afghan women. Girls' schools were established in all of the provincial capitals but enrollment remained substantially lower there. University-educated women found it more difficult to find husbands than uneducated women. Many women found employment as teachers. From the 1950s through the 1970s women made steady gains as the government encouraged the integration of women into society, but it was careful not to impose its policies.

The communist regime (1978–91) led by the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) introduced radical social reform programs reminiscent of Amān Allāh's reign. Compulsory literacy classes for rural women caused an extreme reaction. Coupled with the Soviet occupation a fierce civil war erupted, which tore the country apart. The regime, with its active policy of promoting equality of the sexes, found itself more and more dependent on women as large portions of the population fled into exile. Toward the end of this period, the majority of school children and university students were girls. Women were employed in all sectors, even as bus drivers.

The Taliban regime (1996–2001) took control of the country after a brief unsuccessful Afghan Interim Government (AIG) ended in inter-party civil war. The Taliban interpretation of Islam conformed closely to tribal social norms and essentially espoused no role for women outside the home. This reactionary policy banned female education, prevented women from working outside the home, and forbade them to leave the home without being accompanied by a close male relative.

The December 2001 internationally brokered peace in Afghanistan helped establish a process for the re-establishment of a permanent government in Afghanistan. Women have been included in the process for establishing the interim government and appointed to the cabinet and major commissions. Twenty-five percent of the delegates at the Constitutional Loya Jirga (December 2003) were women. Female education has been reinstated and women's groups in the larger urban areas have an active voice. A nationwide voter registration campaign has registered large numbers of women for the national elections scheduled for September 2004. While all of these developments are encouraging, the advances made by women in the second half of the twentieth century will only be regained when a stable government and rule of law are re-established throughout the land.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1973, 1980³.
 L. B. Poullada, Reform and rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929. King Amanullah's failure to modernize a tribal society, Ithaca, N.Y. 1973.
 B. R. Rubin, The fragmentation of Afghanistan. State formation and collapse in the international system, New Haven, Conn. 1995, 2002².

MARK DAVID LUCE

Turkey

The late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were periods of rapid social change in Ottoman society. Confronted with economic pressures, the impact of the West, the reform of education, and especially the demands of conscription during the Balkan War and the First World War, women began moving out of their domestic realm into the public domain of men.

Not surprisingly, this influx of women into the public realm was accompanied by a debate over their rights. The Turkish nationalists, Young Turks, regarded women's emancipation as one of the major requisites of a larger social revolution, but it was not only modernizing male intellectuals who were involved in the debate; women themselves, by organizing in several associations and writing in and even editing daily papers and magazines, actively took part in this debate and thereby contributed to the creation of a civil public space. Feminist voices were even heard asking men to give up their desire to "liberate" women and "leave them to their own devices because women had more subtle ways of defending themselves and their kind" (Çakır 1994, 125).

However, Ottoman and later republican (Muslim) feminists were very aware that Turkish nationalism paved the way for women's citizenship rights, and Turkish feminism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was dominated by the nationalist ideology. This is obvious in the discourse and practice of women's organizations and in the discourse of prominent female writers such as Sabiha Zekeriya (Sertel). The rationalization she uses for granting political rights to women in 1919 is significant: "We, who have sacrificed most for the life and independence of this country, are the children of this nation too . . . Refusing to include us in general suffrage while granting the right to vote to the minorities who have shown their indifference toward this country is both a sin and a crime" (Toprak 1998). The nascent Kurdish nationalism and Kurdish women's activism of the period also went hand in hand, to a great extent replicating the pattern of the Turkish case (Karakışla 2003).

Women demanded to be full citizens in return for their "sacrifices" in the War of Independence (1919–22). They even applied to establish the "Women's People's Party" as early as 1923, immediately after the proclamation of the Turkish Republic, but were refused authorization on the grounds that women had not yet been given political rights. Instead, they were advised to set up a women's association, illustrating the fact that the stage for the granting of social and political rights for women was set by men as founders of republican Turkey (Arat 1989). One of the most important distinctions between the Ottoman society and the new republic was that now women were visible in the public space, and this constituted an unwanted challenge for men. Although – or perhaps because – this break with the past was so deep as to cause almost a psychological trauma in social life, it was also surrounded by ideological and structural continuities based on patriarchy. This is what some writers term the "replacement of Islamic patriarchy by Western patriarchy" (Z. Arat 1998) and constitutes a telling example of articulation of traditional sexist stereotypes and rules with nationalist, secularist discriminations and new gender roles.

Illustrative of this is that the new Civil Code (1926), which brought the secularization of the family and improved women's social status, also had its own patriarchal biases legally designating the husband the "head" of the family and relegating the wife to being his "helpmate." Explicitly patriarchal clauses of the Civil Code were only amended in 2002 after a long struggle by women. The legal biases reflected a male dominated society that sought to confine women to traditional gender roles while at the same time demanding that they be professionals and good patriots. An explanation of the smoothness with which these biases could find a place in the so-called radically new jurisprudence may be that they were an attempt to cope with the deep fear and challenge men sensed when faced by women's newly gained visibility in the public space and thereby eliminate the patriarchal anxiety prevalent in society.

With the granting of political rights (1934) women were formally accepted as citizens and the public space was now open for their contributions. But the nature of these contributions was to be strictly defined by the male leaders and ideologues of the single party regime who tried to harness the “New Woman” to the creation and reproduction of a uniform citizenry (Kandiyoti 1991). In 1935 the Turkish Women’s Association, obeying the advice of the regime, abolished itself on the ground that it had achieved its end (suffrage). The corporatist ideology of the state denied the existence of class and other sectoral interests in the body politic and controlled not only the women’s movement but also the worker’s associations, cultural clubs, and so on. However, control of women and their bodies assumed a specific character. A utilitarian approach seeking to mobilize the creative powers of women for the benefit of the whole nation was prevalent and this well served the corporatist/solidarist ideology of the regime. Now that the “overwhelming father,” the Ottoman state, who had “long kept the creativity of the Turk under pressure and hindered his coming of age” was no longer there (Bora 1997), the New Man of the republic was obliged to obey the nation-state, whereas the New Woman in her turn was to obey the New Man. This compliance on women’s part would, more or less, last until the new feminist movement of the late 1980s when women started to critically evaluate the Turkish experience of modernizing nationalism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Altınay (ed.), Vatan, millet, kadınlar, İstanbul 2000.
 Y. Arat, The patriarchal paradox. Women politicians in Turkey, Rutherford, N.J. 1989.
 Z. Arat, Kemalizm ve Türk kadını, in 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 51–70.
 F. Berktaş, Institutionalization of the Turkish women’s movement as an historical experience, in Institutionalisierung der Frauenbewegung. Chancen und Risiken, Bonn 1992, 99–106.
 —, Doğu ile Batı’nın Birleştiği yer. Kadın imgesinin kurgulanışı, in Modern Türkiye’de siyasi düşünce, vol. 3, Modernleşme ve Batıcılık, İstanbul 2002, 275–86.
 —, Osmanlı’dan Cumhuriyete feminizm, in F. Berktaş, Tarihin Cinsiyeti, İstanbul 2003, 88–111.
 T. Bora, Cumhuriyet’in ilk döneminde milli kimlik, in N. Bilgin (ed.), Cumhuriyet, demokrasi ve kimlik, İstanbul 1997, 53–62.
 S. Çakır, Osmanlı kadın hareketi, İstanbul 1994.
 —, Osmanlı kadın dernekleri, in Toplum ve bilim 53 (Spring 1991), 139–57.
 D. Kandiyoti, Cariyeler, bacılar, yurttaşlar, İstanbul 1997.
 —, Emancipated but unliberated? Reflections on the Turkish case, in Feminist Studies 13:2 (1991), 317–38.
 Y. S. Karakışla, Kürt Kadınları Teali Cemiyeti (1919), in Toplumsal Tarih 111 (March 2003), 14–25.
 Z. Toprak, Sabiha (Zekeriya) Sertel ve Türk feminizmi, in Toplumsal Tarih 51 (March 1998), 7–14.

FATMAGÜL BERKTAŞ

Political-Social Movements: Ethnic and Minority

Iran and Afghanistan

In Afghanistan and Iran markers of group distinction – nationality, ethnicity, religion, language, and race – intertwine in complex ways, and interact with gender, class, and socioeconomic formations such as nomadism, tribalism, and feudalism.

The relative sizes of Afghanistan's ethnic groups have changed in the wake of the internal wars that began in the late 1970s and have turned the country into an international war zone. In the absence of reliable census data, the following are estimates only. By 1978, there were Pashtuns (40 percent, mostly Sunnīs), Tajiks (25 percent, mostly Sunnīs), Hazaras (10 percent, mostly Shī'ī), Uzbeks and Turkmens (13 percent, mostly Sunnī), and smaller communities such as the Aimaqs (Sunnī), Baluches and Brahuis (Sunnī), and Nuristanis. These socio-ethnic formations are diverse in terms of settlement and production relations. Thus, tribalism is more prevalent among the Pashtuns than the Tajiks, while nomadic life is more persistent among the Aimaq. Religious minorities include Shī'īs, Ismā'īlīs, Hindus, Sikhs, and Jews (Jawad 1992).

In Iran, there are Persians (50 percent, Shī'ī), Azerbaijani Turks (24 percent, Shī'ī), Kurds (9 percent, mostly Sunnī), Lurs (5 percent, Shī'ī), Baluches (3 percent, Sunnīs), Arabs (2.5 percent, mostly Shī'ī), Turkmens (1.5 percent, Sunnī), Qashqayis (1.2 percent, Shī'ī), Armenians (0.71 percent, Christian), Assyrians (0.36 percent, Christian), and Jews (0.25 percent) (data based on government sources cited in Aliyev 1966, 64). While Arabs, Azeri Turks, Baluches, Kurds, and Turkmens live predominantly on their ancestral territories, which extend into neighboring countries, others such as Armenians, Assyrians, and Jews are scattered throughout the country. Religious minorities include, among others, Sunnīs, Bahā'īs, Christians, Ismā'īlīs, Zoroastrians, Jews, and Ahl-e Haqq.

Relationships among the groups are marked by inequality, although the minority/majority distinction is not necessarily a question of numerical strength. Thus, while in Afghanistan the Pashtuns are more numerous than the Tajiks and enjoy hegemony in the exercise of state power, their language is overshadowed by the literary and cultural hegemony of Dari, the language of the Tajiks.

Afghanistan has therefore been called a “nation of minorities” (Jawad 1992).

BEFORE THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

These communities lived in harmony and conflict in a feudal regime which tied the majority of the population to agrarian land and did not allow the centralization of state power. The majority were ra'āyā (subjects), and lived as peasants or members of tribes, with a very small, though influential, urban population. Allegiance was to kin, tribe, ethnic group, and birthplace, and religion was often ignored when it conflicted with the requirements of nomadic, tribal, and feudal life (Jawad 1992, 7).

While these peoples shared a great deal, from proverbs to songs to tilling techniques, they were aware of their ethnic distinctness, which was often expressed in terms such as Pashtunwali, Kurde-warî, and Baluchmayar (Pashtu, Kurdish, and Baluch way of life). The dominance of the male was one of the markers of ethnic identity (Lafrance 2000, Hassanpour 2001). Women, as bearers of men's honor, carried also the honor of kin, tribe, and people, and were, as such, targets of the enemy in times of war. Ethnicity as a marker of womanhood is articulated in folklore and language, for example, dukhtar-i tarsā (Christian girl, Persian) or kiçe hermenî (Armenian girl, Kurdish). However, the ethnic particularism of women was dwarfed by the universality of a patriarchal regime that was indispensable for the (re)production of tribal and feudal relations of production.

NATIONALISM AND NATION-BUILDING

The Constitutional Revolution of Iran (1905–11) aimed at instituting a modern political system distinguished by national sovereignty, citizenship, regime of rights, the rule of law, representative government, and territorial integrity. In Afghanistan, British interest in building a bulwark against Russia, rather than a democratic revolution, initiated the first steps toward the centralization of state power. In both countries, though more so in Iran, the nation-state tended to eliminate the exercise of power by ethnic peoples, and put an end to feudal, tribal, or religious fragmentation of the land and the people. This project, like its Western counterparts, was patriarchal, and moved to control women, who were emerging as a new political force.

Part of the nation-building project was to create an "Iranian woman" and an "Afghan woman," who, as citizens, would be identified by their membership in the nation rather than any particular ethnic group. In both countries, violence was integral to building the state and the nation. Like Western experiments in civic nation-building (see, for example, Nelson 1998), citizenship was, far from being neutral, anchored in the dominant ethnicity. Even in the case of Iran, where Reza Shah changed the ethnic name Persia, "land of Persians," to the less marked name of Iran, "land of Iranians," national womanhood was defined in Persian, cultural, and linguistic terms. Some male Iranian nationalist intellectuals construct Iranianness in opposition to Arabism, and seek the racial, Aryan purity of the nation in the sexual purity of women (Saad 1996, 127–32).

Early twentieth-century attempts to build an Afghan nation-state were "national politics without nation" (Centlivres and Centlivres-Demont 1988, 235). In fact, nationalist consciousness, to the extent that it emerged, lacked a social basis, and the names "Afghan" and "Afghanistan," chosen for citizens and the homeland were used to refer to Pashtuns and their territory. Early efforts to integrate women into the nation through granting them limited rights, especially education, brought one monarch down in 1929. By the 1970s, however, the "Afghan woman" had emerged although limited largely to the capital city of Kabul and the few urban centers, which were dwarfed by the countryside.

In Iran, consciousness of women's rights predated the male-centered "state feminism" of the Pahlavī period. Women's rights debates began in the Persian and Azerbaijani print media in the late nineteenth century. As in the Ottoman Empire, Christian and Jewish women had earlier access to education, and played an active role in the struggle.

Today, almost every ethnic people has developed its own nationalism, often in opposition to state nationalism. Like state nationalisms, they invest in women's rights as part of the nation-building project. Early Kurdish nationalists, for instance, viewed rural women as the bearers of pure Kurdish language and culture untainted by the dominant nation's assimilationist policies. Moreover, as mothers, women were in the best position to instill in the nation's children a pure Kurdish identity.

As early as the beginning of the twentieth century, many nationalists, including Kurds, Persians, and Turks blamed unequal gender relations and especially the oppression of women on Islam and its Arab roots. They construct their pre-Islamic history as an era of gender equality. The evidence, to the extent that it exists, is the old tribal or pastoral society, in which women were the main labor force, and associated, more or less freely, with males. Even in the present, Kurdish nationalists argue that Kurdish women enjoy more freedom than their neighboring Arab, Persian, and Turkish sisters. This claim has been challenged in so far as the cited evidence – mixed dancing, free association of females and males, absence of veiling in rural Kurdistan, as well as the existence of female rulers – is also found among Arabs, Persians, and Turks.

In a similar vein, some followers of pre- and post-Islamic minority religions, for example, Zoroastrians and Bahā'īs, argue that, compared with Islam, their religions grant women more equality. The coming to power of two Islamic theocracies in Iran and Afghanistan has further invigorated this discourse. The conflict between women and theocracy has contributed to the formation of "Islamic feminisms" and, in contrast, promoted a secular politics of gender relations based on the separation of religion and state, and religion and law. Although Islamists generally argue that their faith is opposed to any division of human beings along the lines of race and ethnicity, and thus that Islam and nationalism are incompatible (Khumaynī 1983), some trends in "political Islam" aim at their fusion, and thus contribute to the ethnicization of Islam along nationalist lines (for example, Arab, Iranian, and Turkish Islamist movements). Another form of nationalist appropriation of religion is the tendency of some Kurdish nationalists to claim either Yezidism (currently a minority religion in Kurdistan and Armenia) or Zoroastrianism (not practiced in Kurdistan) as authentic Kurdish religions, which are said to grant women more freedom.

The ethnicization of women's movements is not, however, a product of Afghan or Iranian experiences. In the context of ongoing transnationalization and globalization, nationalist and religious movements, both minority and majority, everywhere promote a politics of ethnicization, nativization, or indigenization of feminism and women's movements.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. M. Aliyev, The problem of nationalities in contemporary Persia, in Central Asian Review 14:1 (1966), 62–70.
 P. Centlivres and M. Centlivres-Demont, Et si on parlait de l'Afghanistan? Terrains et textes, Paris 1988.
 N. Jawad, Afghanistan. A nation of minorities, London 1992.

- A. Hassanpour, The (re)production of patriarchy in the Kurdish language, in S. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 227–63.
- R. A. Khumaynī (Ayatollah Khomeini), Dar justjū-yi rāh az kalām-i imām, xi, Millī girāī, Tehran 1983.
- P. Lafrance, La femme et le Pakhtunwali, in Centre d'Etudes et de Recherches Documentaires sur l'Afghanistan, La femme afghane à travers l'histoire de l'Afghanistan. Actes du Colloque. UNESCO – Paris, 11 décembre 1998, Paris 2000, 73–9.
- D. Nelson, National manhood. Capitalist citizenship and the imagined fraternity of white men, Durham, N.C. 1998.
- J. B. Saad, The image of Arabs in modern Persian literature, Lanham, Md. 1996.

AMIR HASSANPOUR

Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria

“MOSAIC SOCIETIES”: PROBLEMS OF TERMINOLOGY AND PERCEPTION

Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria are characterized by a rich ethnic, religious, and cultural diversity that was formed and reconfigured historically through processes of settlement, migration, displacement, war, and state policy. It has long been a cliché to describe the Middle East, and especially the “fertile crescent” region, as constituting a mosaic society (Coon 1958) traditionally characterized by an “ethnic division of labor” (Sussnitski 1917). The easy and misleading premises of these formulations today may be couched in more nuanced language but still often form the basis of scholarly as well as popular and media representations. Assumptions concerning pure identities, impermeable boundaries, and age-old enmities alternately exaggerate or underestimate societal tensions and political mobilizations based on shifting ethnic, linguistic, and confessional identities and do not help in understanding how identities are constructed and reproduced, how they intersect and cross-cut one another, how difference and perceptions of difference are articulated, or why political demands may or may not be made on the basis of ethnic difference or in terms of minority rights.

Adequately understanding how these processes are gendered is even more difficult, given the paucity and the quality of the literature. While, as in any type of collective identity, one can easily see that women and their bodies symbolically operate as markers of difference, that marriage strategies are at the heart of group reproduction as well as inter-group alliance, and that women's participation in political processes are significant, these generalizations cannot easily be substantiated through specific understandings of how they may operate in the case of particular groups, localities, or even states.

STATES, SOCIETIES, AND NATIONALISMS

Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria exhibit significant variation in terms of nation building and state building which creates disparate contexts for political mobilization on the basis of ethnicity or demands in terms of minority rights or national self-determination. It is also important to recognize that groups within these countries have historically always been in interaction with each other and across the borders formed in the twentieth century. Thus the Kurds, but also Turkmens and Assyrians, while constituting a “minority” within particular states (Syria, Iraq, Iran, and Turkey), form large trans-border populations. Others are part of historically constituted diasporas (Jews, Armenians) while all groups are part of contemporary global diasporas as a result of labor and refugee movements. In this diverse landscape, the Kurdish movements are the most salient, and best researched, minority movements and can help illustrate the ways in which religion and gender play into these movements.

It is also important to consider how Syria, Iraq, Jordan and Lebanon (in that order) participate in discourses of Arab nationalism. Syria and Iraq (until the 2003 invasion by the United States and coalition forces) were the most comparable, in terms of the multiple ethnic and minority groups that inhabit their territories, their secular, nationalist, “revolutionary” official rhetoric, and their authoritarian regimes. The ruling groups in these regimes were mostly recruited from communities to which the long-serving presidents belonged (‘Alawīs in the case of Syria and Tikrītīs in the case of Iraq) and are thus described by some authors as “minority regimes.” Both these states mobilized women through a rhetoric of modernism, nationalism, and state feminism, which privileged the state and broader ideals of the Arab nation over ethnic, religious, or local identifications, as witnessed by the attempts to socialize the “new Iraqi woman” (Joseph 1991).

Jordan participates in the discourse of Arab nationalism through emphasizing the role of the Hashemites in overthrowing Ottoman rule in the 1920s. Equal weight is also given to the monarchy's religious credentials and descent from the lineage of the Prophet Muḥammad. Society and politics is largely fractured on Palestinian/East Bank Jordanian lines as well as through tribal allegiances created by both bottom-up and top-down dynamics. Loyalty to the regime and the monarch is the basis for privileging groups. In this context the minority groups, such as Circassians, Chechens, Christians (both Palestinian and East Bank), and Armenians, have not formed movements on a minority basis although they do make political claims on this basis. Circassians and Christians (as well as Beduin tribes) have allotments in parliamentary seats through quotas in certain electoral districts. Furthermore, ethnicity and religion certainly play important roles even in the absence of formal movements. For example, Circassians and Chechens mobilized to extend aid and medical relief during the Abkhasian-Georgian war of 1992–3, as well as for the ongoing Chechen-Russian conflict, in the latter case finding common ground with Jordanian Islamist groups.

The experience of Tūjān al-Fayṣal, the only woman thus far elected (in 1993) to the Jordanian parliament (there are women appointed to the senate) is also instructive. Although Tūjān al-Fayṣal did not campaign on ethnic issues, she did run for the Circassian seat in her electoral district thus enabling her to win with significantly fewer votes than she would have needed for a majority seat. As a member of parliament, her progressive politics were not based on lobbying for her ethnic community but when she became the target of Islamists and conservatives in parliament and eventually of the government (she was taken to court for apostasy by the former and charged and imprisoned for slander by the latter), the Circassian community leadership rallied around her and interceded on her behalf with the king. In this way, ethnicity plays a political role even in the absence of movements as such.

Lebanon is the most anomalous state in the group, constituted (in the French mandate formulation) as “a nation of minorities – where the largest minority rules,” with the Maronite Christians having been designated the largest minority. The Maronites’ collective sense of identity is tied to the church (an Eastern Christian church later Romanized) and was forged historically through territorial and political conflicts (for example, the Maronite-Druze “civil war” of 1860). An ethnic dimension is added to this identity through asserting descent from the Phoenicians and distance from Arabs and Muslims. This identity was continually mobilized, as were Sunnī, Druze, and Shīʿī identities, due to the sectarian basis of the Lebanese state, reinforced by such practices as the lack of civil marriage and the relegation of all personal status matters to religious authorities (Joseph 1991). The language of political competition and conflict is that of sectarianism and confessionalism rather than minority politics. In spite of the Maronite “defeat” with the end of the civil war in 1990–1, and shifts in balance, such as the emergence of the Shīʿīs as a powerful political force, Lebanese politics is not about majorities and minorities but consists of shifting alliances among the 17 “sects” which are officially designated as comprising the Lebanese polity.

KURDISH POLITICS IN IRAQ: RELIGION, WOMEN, AND RIGHTS

It should be stated clearly that Kurdish movements are more properly described as national movements espousing the goal of national self-determination (the term Kurdistan first appeared in the fourteenth century.) However, given that the Kurdish population exists as “minorities” within four contiguous states (Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Turkey), as well as in various diasporic communities, the form in which political struggles have taken place has been that of minority and ethnic movements and bargaining with the central state for certain forms of political and cultural expression and autonomy. The remainder of this entry offers a brief discussion of how these politics unfolded in the context of the Iraqi state, where Kurds form between 15 and 20 percent of the population, with the recognition that this only addresses one part, albeit an important one, of the Kurdish situation. Iraqi Kurdish society is characterized by religious, linguistic, and tribal diversity. Most Kurds are Sunnī Muslim with a small percentage of Shīʿīs. Some Kurds also adhere to Islamic heterodox and pre-Islamic religions (such as Yezidism) and there are also Kurdish-speaking Jews.

In 1925, the League of Nations awarded the Ottoman vilayet of Mosul to Iraq rather than Turkey, but the area was supposed to remain under League Mandate for 25 years and the Iraqi state was to guarantee Kurdish autonomy. This did not come to pass and the long history of clashes and negotiations between various Kurdish political parties and movements and the central government in Baghdad is one of promises not kept and hopes dashed. For example, when the Baʿth party first took power in Iraq in 1963, the Kurdish Democratic Party (KDP) requested autonomy in Kurdistan over everything except foreign affairs, finance, and national defense, but this was not accepted. In 1970 a peace accord with the regime outlined a 15-point program which included Kurdish language education, respect for culture, economic support, land reform, self government, and the freedom to establish student, youth, women’s, and teachers’ organizations (McDowall 1996). Despite the importance of this formal recognition, the plan was not implemented, setting the stage for the next conflict. The unilateral 1974 Autonomy Law promulgated by Baghdad foundered over oil and Kirkuk, which Mustafa Barzani claimed as the Kurdish autonomous capital and the state refused to cede. This led to the 1974–5 war between government and Kurdish forces, which was followed by a policy of forced resettlement of Kurds to other areas of Iraq, redrawing of administrative boundaries, and Arabization, which included “financial rewards to Arabs who took Kurdish wives, a deliberate encouragement of ethnic assimilation . . . and the Arabizing of some place names” (McDowall 1996, 340).

It is important to add, however, that Kurds and non-Kurds have long cooperated in forming political platforms. For example, the KDP, formed in August 1946, changed its name to the Kurdistan Democratic Party in 1953 so as to include non-Kurds, while up to 35 percent of the members of the Iraqi Communist Party, established in 1934, were Kurdish. More recently, the Kurdistan Front in 1985 was formed of the five major parties, Kurdish and non-Kurdish, including the Assyrian Democratic Movement, reflecting the fact that Iraqi Kurdistan comprises a number of groups, most notably Turkmens and Assyrians.

Things changed with 1988 and the notorious Anfal operations, which killed approximately between 150 and 200 thousand villagers in Kurdistan. Some elderly and women and children survivors were sent to a concentration camp in southwest Iraq, and most women were taken to a camp near Kirkuk where thousands died. In several of the Anfal operations men were singled out for execution, while in southern Kurdistan women and children were also executed. The post 1990–1 Gulf War period has seen the designation of northern Iraq as a safe haven, and no-fly zone, with a high degree of self-determination in politics and economy. At the same time, the region saw the growth of extremist Islamist movements such as Anṣār al-Islām which, among other things, have tried to impose the veiling of women’s faces and bodies and the banning of girls’ education and women’s work outside the home. As this volume goes to press, the final status of this region, and indeed of Iraq itself, is yet to be determined. Whatever the outcome, it will have a momentous impact on Kurdish politics and populations in neighboring countries, especially Turkey.

The gender dimensions of these political vagaries obviously extend beyond the mention of women as victims of violence and ethnic cleansing. While cautioning against exaggeration, several authors emphasize the important role of women in Kurdish politics and public life, including activism, participation in elections, women’s publications, and the formation of women’s organizations within the main Kurdish parties. In the 1992 elections in the Kurdish autonomous zone, six women were elected to parliament out of 105 seats. These female deputies and women activists lobbied (albeit unsuccessfully) for legal reform and the rescinding of the personal status and penal laws of the Iraqi government that discriminated against women. Women also organized a 200 kilometer peace march to protest against the war between the two major parties, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) and the KDP, in 1994.

In spite of this progress, the general consensus of most feminist authors is that national liberation has overshadowed women’s emancipation. Still, nationalist and popular discourses promote a representation of Kurdish women as traditionally enjoying high status, relative freedom, and equality as compared to women in Arab, Turkish, and Persian societies. In a familiar twist, these same images are deployed by outsiders to accuse Kurdish women of promiscuity especially in the context of the religious practices of heterodox groups. Historical studies reveal that Kurdish women played leading roles in religious lodges and movements as well as in political and military leadership. There are several accounts of Kurdish women leading tribal groupings and confederations, usually after the death of their husbands, and in some cases of their fathers. The participation of women in the military continues today in Kurdistan, as nearly all Kurdish political parties (except the Islamist ones) include guerrilla women fighters in their militias.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. van Bruinessen, Agha, shaikh and state. The social and political structures of Kurdistan, London 1992.
- C. Coon, Caravan. The story of the Middle East, New York 1958.
- A. Hourani, Minorities in the Arab world, Oxford 1947.
- S. Joseph, Elite strategies for state-building. Women, family, religion and state in Iraq and Lebanon in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 176–200.
- D. McDowall, A modern history of the Kurds, London 1996.
- S. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001.
- M. Rubin, Are Kurds a pariah minority? in Social Research 70:1 (2003), 295–330.
- A. J. Sussnitzki, Zur Gliederung wirtschaftlicher Arbeit nach Nationalitäten in der Türkei, in Archiv für Wirtschaftsforschung im Orient 2 (1917), 382–407.

North Africa

The Berber cultural movement is the most significant minority sociopolitical movement to emerge from North Africa's rich racial, ethnic, and religious landscape. Berberophones constitute approximately 25 percent of the population of Algeria and 40 percent of Morocco. With roots stretching back to the 1920s, the contemporary movement consists of a diffuse network of activists organized into cultural associations and political parties primarily located in Algeria (especially Kabylia), Morocco, and the North African diaspora in Europe and North America. The movement claims the indigeneness of Berbers (or imazighen, free men, in activist discourse) to North Africa and contests the "minority" label imposed on them by North African states with official Arab nationalist ideologies. Berber activists advocate the recognition of Berber language (Tamazight) as an official and national language of Algeria and Morocco equal to Arabic in the public sphere (education, media, government). Although generally marginalized from leadership roles, women play significant roles in the movement as salient symbols and outspoken militants.

Berber activists underline the cultural distinctiveness of imazighen from the Arab populations of North Africa. The elaboration of an Arab/Berber ethnic divide derives to a great extent from the efforts of French military and colonial administration to extensively document Berber legal codes and oral poetry. Their divide-and-rule policies targeted Berber populations for potential assimilation due to their perceived sedentary nature, laboring qualities, republican social organization, and lack of visible religiosity (as indicated primarily by the non-veiling of women) (Lorcin 1995). Such strategies resulted in the 1930 so-called "Berber Dahir" (decree) that created separate juridical systems for Arab and Berber populations in Morocco.

Reacting to these policies, early articulations of nationalism advocated the multicultural (Arab and Berber) identity of Algeria and Morocco. In the 1960s, these were gradually replaced by an ideology of Arab nationalism and policies of linguistic Arabization by the ruling National Liberation Front and Istiqlal parties. In response, Berber activists founded the Berber Academy and the Berber Study Group in Paris, and the Moroccan Association for Cultural Research and Exchange in Rabat, to standardize Tamazight, develop a Berber script, and publish Berber poetry.

These efforts developed into a widespread social movement after the Kabyle student uprisings of April 1980, known internationally as the "Berber Spring." The events provoked the founding of an umbrella political organization, the Berber Cultural Movement, as well as hundreds of cultural associations throughout North Africa and the diaspora that sponsor courses in Tamazight and Berber history and serve as loci for cultural expression. Since 1989, the advocacy of Berber cultural and linguistic rights has been further taken up by Kabylia-based political parties: the Socialist Forces Front and the Algerian Rally for Culture and Democracy (RCD). A World Amazigh Congress was founded in 1995, coordinating the efforts of Berber associations across the globe. Through electioneering, school strikes, and petitioning supranational human rights bodies, the movement has succeeded in garnering the official recognition of "Berberity" as a constituent part of Algerian and Moroccan identity, as well as the tentative introduction of Tamazight in the media and education systems. However, struggles continue, with violent encounters between Kabyle youth and the Algerian military in July 1998 and April 2001 (Maddy-Weitzman 2001, Silverstein 2003).

Within this multi-stranded movement, women have played an important, if often marginalized, role. The movement has appropriated a number of women from history into its pantheon of cultural heroes, including Kahina, Kheïra, and Fathma n'Soumer – women Berber leaders who fought against the Arab and French invasions of the seventh and nineteenth centuries (Ferrah 1997). Their images adorn Berber cultural productions and meeting halls, and songs memorializing their achievements galvanize association meetings. These historical women also function as an imagined genealogy for contemporary female Berber militants, such as Khalida Messaoudi and Djura Abouda, who look to them for inspiration (Messaoudi 1995, 1998, 27–8, Djura 1993, 116–25).

Women's participation in Berber militancy has generally been relegated, however, to the sidelines of direct confrontation, as the mourning sisters to their fallen brothers. One of the strongest voices from the Kabyle diaspora, Malika Matoub, remains known primarily as the sister of the militant folk-singer Lounès Matoub, having led rallies after his 1998 assassination and written a biography memorializing his life (Matoub 1999). Women have often been leaders and founders of cultural associations, but their role in the political movement, particularly in Morocco and Algeria, has been primarily limited to participation in organized actions. Messaoudi, elected to the Algerian parliament in 1997 on the RCD ticket, perhaps represents an exception to this general trend. However, her alliance with the RCD is largely situational; while an advocate for the recognition of Berber culture and language, her primary activism has revolved around the repeal of the 1984 Family Code (Messaoudi 1995).

Such feminism underlines another space for women's participation in the Berber cultural movement: artistic performance. Female singers – including Hanifa, Chérifa Ouardia, and Taos Amrouche – were particularly prevalent in the Kabyle immigrant scene of the 1950s and 1960s, melding a Berber cultural revival with an early feminist politics. Taos became a star of international folk festivals by collecting and recording the oral poetry of her mother Fadhma, whose autobiography she later edited (Amrouche 1968). Considered too proximate to Berber ethnonationalism, she was barred from representing Algeria at the first PanAfrican Cultural Festival in 1969 (Goodman 2002, 97).

Male musicians and songwriters of the militant “new Kabyle song” style of the 1970s and 1980s similarly deployed and reworked maternal genres and images, creating idealized visions of Berber village domesticity and culture (Mahfoufi 1994). In this process, however, they have often silenced the women whose songs they appropriate (Goodman 1996). Contemporary female singers – such as the group Djurdjura, Malika Domrane, Nouara, Houria Aichi (Aurès region), and Fatima Tabaamrant (Morocco) – have attempted to recapture the genre, using it not only to celebrate Berber culture and language, but also to critique the patriarchal structures of Berber society and the misogynist violence of their fathers and brothers (Djura 1991, 1993). In their songs and performances, they inject a critical feminist counterpoint to the cultural movement as a whole.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Amrouche, Histoire de ma vie, Paris 1968.
 S. Chaker, Berbères aujourd'hui. Berbères dans le Maghreb contemporain, Paris 1998² (rev. ed).
 Djura, Le voile du silence, Paris 1991.
 —, La saison des narcisses, Paris 1993.
 A. Ferrah, Kahina, Algiers 1997.
 J. Goodman, Dancing towards “la mixité.” Berber associations and cultural change in Algeria, in Middle East Report 200 (1996), 16–20.
 —, Writing empire, underwriting nation. Discursive histories of Kabyle Berber oral texts, in American Ethnologist 29:1 (2002), 86–122.
 C. Lacoste-Dujardin, Femmes kabyles. De la rigueur patriarcale à l'innovation, in Hommes et Migrations 1179 (1994), 19–24.
 P. Lorcin, Imperial identities. Stereotyping, prejudice and race in colonial Algeria, London 1995.

- B. Maddy-Weitzman, Contested identities. Berbers, “Berberism” and the state in North Africa, in Journal of North African Studies 6:3 (2001), 23–47.
 M. Mahfoufi, La chanson kabyle en immigration. Une retrospective, in Hommes et migrations 1179 (1994), 32–9.
 M. Matoub, Matoub Lounès, mon frère, Paris 1999.
 K. Messaoudi, Une Algérienne debout. Entretiens avec Elisabeth Schemla, Paris 1995, trans. A. C. Vila, Unbowed, Philadelphia 1998.
 P. Silverstein, Martyrs and patriots. Ethnic, national, and transnational dimensions of Kabyle politics, in Journal of North African Studies 8:1 (2003), 87–111.
 T. Yacine, La revendication berbère, in Intersignes 10 (1995), 95–106.

PAUL A. SILVERSTEIN

Sub-Saharan Africa: South Africa

This entry examines the situation of Muslim women in South Africa. They are a heterogeneous group who manifest diverse attitudes and tendencies but are beginning to assert their rights and challenge “traditional” modes of thought and patterns of behavior. They are doing this within the context of being minorities three times over: first, they are Muslims, a religious minority of just over half a million out of South Africa's total population of 41 million; second, they represent a number of ethnic groups originally from Asia and the Arabian Peninsula as well as other parts of Sub-Saharan Africa; and third, they are women. Accordingly, their involvement in South African political and social movements has been multifaceted and draws on a number of ideological discourses. The two most important loci of these, from the mid-twentieth century to the present time, have been the struggle against the old South African regime's policy of racial discrimination against non-whites – with whom most Muslims were included – and contemporary activism for women's rights.

BACKGROUND: ASSIMILATION, ISOLATION, AND INTEGRATION

Traditionalist values remain important in some sectors of South Africa's Muslim population and among these women adopt a minimalist approach to involvement with the state or with the broader community. Any interaction or cooperation with either tends to be on the basis of necessity, not motivated by a sense of identity with national goals. Their concerns are expressed in such areas as the recognition of Muslim Personal Law, including provisions of the Muslim Marriage Bill. In contrast, some Muslim women have become full participants in South Africa's emerging “rainbow nation.” They identify with national rather than Muslim-specific interests. The new South African Bill of Rights and the constitution provide the basis for their decisions and continued activism. Some of these Muslim women played key roles in the long struggle against apartheid and the subsequent envisioning of a new, multicultural nation.

Located between these two positions is the pragmatism that characterizes the majority of Muslim women in South Africa who seek a balanced assimilation, fearing the loss of their identity yet also rejecting isolationism as self-defeating. Thus, while they maintain constructive engagement with various levels of government and civil society, they continue to proclaim their Islamic identity.

POLITICAL LEADERSHIP

Cissy Gool (d. 1963) is one of the trail blazers for women in the field of politics. The daughter of the famous Dr. Abdullah Abdul Rahman, the first "Black" South African to graduate as a medical practitioner, she served as a city councilor in Cape Town for many years and was an instrumental role model for other Muslim women.

Beginning in the mid-twentieth century, Muslim women played a prominent role in national politics. Leaders included Amina Cachalia and her older sister, Zaynab Asvat, and Fatima Meer, all of whom were actively involved in resistance politics. Amina Cachalia, wife of the veteran freedom fighter Molvi Cachalia, was active in the Transvaal Indian Congress, and became treasurer of the Federation of South African Women which spearheaded the Defiance Campaign, culminating in the famous march by 20,000 women to the Union Buildings in Pretoria to protest against the pass laws in 1956.

The sociologist Fatima Meer (born 1928), author of Nelson Mandela's biography, Higher Than Hope, and of over 40 other books and numerous articles, is among the best-known anti-apartheid activists. A disciple of Mahatma Gandhi's philosophy of passive resistance, she endured banning, detention, and death threats with calm resolve. A close friend of both Nelson and Winnie Mandela, she is now one of the key figures in the anti-globalization movement in South Africa. She supported Steve Biko's (murdered 1975) Black Consciousness Movement and established the Institute of Black Studies at the University of Natal.

In the 1970s and 1980s young and old Muslim women marched through the streets of major cities demanding an end to apartheid. Scores were arrested and detained, some were tortured. One of these women, Zubeida Jaffer, a journalist by profession, has recently published an autobiographical account of her involvement in resistance politics during the heyday of the United Democratic Front entitled Our Generation.

Today, several Muslim women occupy key positions in government ministries such as education, and four currently serve as members of the national parliament: Naledi Pandor, Fatima Chohan, Farida Mohamed, and Fatima Hujag.

For traditionalist women, involvement in national level politics is to be avoided because they believe that the secular policies of the South African nation conflict with their religious beliefs. For example, many avoid political participation because the state supports rights such as abortion on demand, gambling, and homosexual unions. They are unlikely to vote in elections because they do not wish to be involved in a system which they perceive to be essentially immoral.

SOCIAL WELFARE AND WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS

Muslim women have long been active in social welfare and development in their communities and form the majority of the staff of virtually every organization dealing with social welfare issues. The Islamic Social and Welfare association is one of the larger and better-known groups in the Cape Province. In the northern city of Johannesburg, Soraya Hassim of the Islamic Relief Agency has been carrying out important work among the destitute for decades, a contemporary expression of zakāt. The Women's Cultural Group in Durban, Kwa Zulu-Natal, under the guidance of Zuleikha Mayet, has been providing financial assistance to needy university students for decades and is a strong example of Muslim women's ongoing commitment to educational excellence. Involvement in social welfare groups is not only important in and of itself but also provides a public and therefore political voice for women. Likewise, there is a long history of women's organizations active in the country. The Directory of Muslim Institutions and Mosques in South Africa provides a list of 20 women's organizations. The activities of these groups include education, social relief, propagation of Islam, promotion of culture, and participation in politics.

POLITICAL ACTIVISM IN MOSQUES AND THEOLOGICAL COUNCILS

Most mosques in South Africa still prohibit women from attending prayers. The Cape Province, historically the earliest home to South African Muslims, has a more liberal tradition and women there not only join the congregation in the mosque but also visit the cemetery. Interestingly, land for the first mosque to be established at the Cape was donated by a woman, Saartijie van de Kaap in 1794, at the end of the period of Dutch occupation.

Women have started a campaign to be admitted in all mosques. With the support of male champions of women's rights, they have also started the family 'id congregation in several major centers, much to the chagrin of those who believe that they are violating a sacred tradition.

The exclusively male theological councils' decisions are now being questioned by women, especially in the realm of family law, for example, issues of divorce and custody, which they believe to reveal a male bias. Challenges have been made to other aspects of Islamic law that are perceived as discriminatory as well. One crucial area has been in the realm of inheritance, traditionally weighed in favor of men. Muslim activists are demanding that inheritance should be shared equally between men and women and that divorced women should be provided with maintenance even after the end of 'idda, the three-month waiting period for Muslim widows, after which they are allowed to remarry. Women also demanded and succeeded in obtaining the right to have input in the drafting of the Muslim Marriage Bill. An interesting related development is the recent employment of women counselors by theological councils to advise families experiencing marital problems.

CONCLUSION

A distinctive ethnic and cultural minority, South Africa's Muslim women bring the strengths of their past struggles as Muslims, as Asian and African immigrants, and as women to the challenges of nation building in the new South Africa.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, London 1992.
- S. E. Dangor, Historical perspective, current literature and an opinion survey among Muslim women in contemporary South Africa. A case study, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 21:1 (2001), 109–29.
- M. Davids (comp.), Directory of Muslim institutions and mosques in South Africa, Maraisburg 1996.
- E. Everett, Zainussia [Cissie Gool] [1897–1963]. A bibliography, B.A. hons. paper, University of Cape Town 1978.
- Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, New Delhi 1994.
- R. A. Hill, The role of Muslim women in Cape Town, B.A. hons. paper, University of Cape Town 1977.
- Z. Jaffer, Our generation, Cape Town 2003.
- D. Kandiyoti, Identity and its discontents. Women and nation, Women Living Under Muslim Laws Dossier 20, July 1998.
- R. Ridd, Separate but more than equal. Muslim women at the Cape, in C. F. El-Solh and J. Mabro (eds.), Muslim women's choices. Religious beliefs and social practice, Oxford 1993.
- F. Seedat, Women and activism. Indian Muslim women's responses to apartheid South Africa, M.A. thesis, University of Cape Town 2003.
- Straight Path* (South African-based Islamic magazine) ed. F. Asmal.
- C. Waddy, Women in Muslim history, London 1980.
- Women's Cultural Group, brochure commemorating 35 years of community service 1954–1989, Durban 1989.
- R. F. Woodsmall, Moslem women enter a new world, New York 1975 (reprint of the 1936 ed.).

SULEMAN E. DANGOR

Turkey

At the start of the twenty-first century, Turkey's state institutions are increasingly unable to keep up with the complex changing structure, needs, and demands of a heterogeneous Turkish society. Despite strong centrifugal tendencies along ethnic, religious, and national lines among the population, Turkish nationalism or its more recent version, the so-called Turkish-Islamic synthesis, is still promoted as a unifying force (Bozarslan 1996). In its practical functioning the state has been forced to take some steps in the field of religious, ethnic, and women's rights. Yet attempts by the state and military establishment to control opposition movements such as political Islam and Kurdish nationalist politics, both movements with a large female constituency, continue to be sources of serious crises and violence (Çaha 2000, Cizre 1999). In particular, ethnic minority women in Turkey are confronted with multi-layered forms of oppression and violence.

At the root of Turkey's problems lies the process of nation building. Republican Turkey is a typical example of a state forging a nation from above. The founding of the Turkish Republic in 1923 and its official ideology, Kemalism, which prescribed ethno-nationalism, etatism, and secularism as main pillars of the political system, represented an important break with the Ottoman multi-ethnicity. As part of the broader project of nation building, the status of women was made into the barometer of Turkish modernization. Turkish nationalism, however, contained contradictory elements from the very beginning. On the one hand, Turkish citizenship was defined as an all-embracing concept encompassing all citizens, regardless of ethnic origin or gender, granting them equal rights and obligations. On the other hand, every citizen in republican Turkey, which according to Andrews (1989) counts at least 47 distinct ethnic groups, was by official definition declared to be a “Turk.” The concept of minority in a juridical sense was limited to non-Muslim and thus religious minorities (Greek-Orthodox, Jews, and Armenians).

From early on subsequent governments had recourse to forced assimilation, and preferred mass deportations as a means of Turkification. This applied in particular to the Kurds, Turkey’s largest ethnic minority who make up around 15 percent of the population. Kurdish resistance movements during the 1920s and 1930s, typically male dominated movements with ethnic and religious elements, were violently oppressed (Bruinessen 1992). Compulsory education, state controlled media in Turkish, and general conscription, proved relatively effective for integrating Kurdish men into “national” politics. Kurdish women were much less affected by assimilation policies. Modernizing and emancipating reforms such as obligatory primary education for girls or rights guaranteed by legal marriage, such as inheritance and child custody, also had very little impact on their lives. In particular the lives of Kurdish women in eastern and southeastern Turkey, which is often characterized as a semi-feudal society relying on traditional and agricultural economy, continued to be ruled by customary and religious laws and traditional gender patterns.

Turkey suffered three military coups (1960, 1971, and 1980), of which the last had the most pervasive effect on politics and society, inciting both majority and minority women to activism in the public sphere. Paradoxically, the period of depoliticization of society after 1980 provided a space for the development of a feminist movement that questioned constructions of Turkish identity and women’s “liberation” (Tekeli 1993, Sirman 1979). Gender related issues and notions of the “ideal woman” also became part of an ideological terrain on which issues of national, ethnic, and religious identities were being debated, as exemplified by debates on the covering of women and the Kurdish women fighters. The 1980s turned out to be a watershed. Questions of identity and diversity forged a process of fragmentation in society, for example, Turks-Kurds, secularists-Islamists, Alevis-Sunnis and nationalists-leftists. Stress on Sunnī Islam in official constructions of Turkish identity further alienated the Alevis, a heterodox religious minority consisting of both Turks and Kurds. Political Islam, which locally has an important Kurdish element too, emerged as a mass movement and an important political force, gaining absolute majority in the parliamentary elections in 2002.

A major development in the 1980s and 1990s was the rise of a Kurdish national movement in Turkey and in Western Europe, headed by Abdullah Öcalan’s Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan (PKK). From 1984 until 1999, the PKK fought a guerrilla war against the Turkish state, which led to its partial success but also caused massive destruction and displacement in the Kurdish areas. The Kurdish national movement drew considerable public attention owing to the high number of women militants among PKK ranks (20 percent) and the prominence of the so-called Woman Question in its political discourse (Yalçın-Heckmann and Gelder 2000). Stress on women’s emancipation and gender equality incited Kurdish women to become politically active: Leyla Zana became first woman member of parliament with a distinct Kurdish identity in 1991. For the majority of women in the Kurdish area, however, decades of war and economic crisis had grave consequences. The armed conflict merely strengthened the male-dominated structure of the community through the increase of cooperation between the military and Kurdish tribal leaders and through the rise of militaristic values in society. Incidence of gendered violence in the predominantly Kurdish areas is relatively high (Gökçeççek-Yurdakul 2001). Yet, apart from literacy courses by the state-run adult education centers (for example, ÇATOM), no rehabilitation program for women has been undertaken.

During the 1990s there was a significant degree of liberalization of state policies. Legal constraints remained, however, and liberalization coincided with an unprecedented decline in standards of human rights, exemplified by increased violence against women during detention (Amnesty 2003). Kurds, Alevis, and some smaller ethnic groups such as the Laz and Circassians started cultural publications and organizations, and pro-Kurdish political parties were established. Also Kurdish women’s groups in the large urban centers began publishing their own magazines (for example, Roza, Jujin, Jin û Jîyan, and Özgür Kadın), addressing the position of Kurdish and other minority women from various points of view, ranging from feminist to nationalist. Debates on differences (ethnicity, class, religion) are nowadays common among women’s movements in Turkey, inciting literary and scientific production on multiple gendered identities (Altınay 2000).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Altınay, Giriş. Milliyetçilik, toplumsal ginsiyet ve feminizm, in A. Altınay (ed.), Vatan, millet, kadımlar, İstanbul 2000, 11–29.
 Amnesty International, Turkey. End sexual violence against women in custody, London 2003.

- P. Andrews, Ethnic groups in the Republic of Turkey, Wiesbaden 1989.
- H. Bozarslan, Political crisis and the Kurdish issue in Turkey, in R. Olson (ed.), The Kurdish nationalist movement in the 1990s. Its impact on Turkey and the Middle East, Lexington, Ky. 1996, 135–53.
- M. van Bruinessen. Agha, shaikh and state. The social and political structures of Kurdistan, London 1992.
- Ö. Çaha, Aşkın devletten, sivil topluma, Istanbul 2000.
- Ü. Cizre, Muktedirlerin siyaseti. Merkez Sağ-Ordu-İslâmcılık, Istanbul 1999.
- A. Gökçeççek-Yurdakul, Culture of honor, culture of change. A feminist analysis of honor killings in rural Turkey, in Violence against Women 7:9 (September 2001), 964–98.
- D. Kandiyoti, End of empire. Islam, nationalism and women in Turkey, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 237–60.
- N. Sirman, Feminism in Turkey. A short history, in New Perspectives on Turkey 3:1 (1989), 1–34.
- Ş. Tekeli (ed.), 1980'ler Türkiye'sinde kadın bakış açısından kadınlar, Istanbul 1990, 1993².
- L. Yalçın-Heckmann and P. van Gelder, Das Bild der Kurdinnen im Wandel des politischen Diskurses in der Türkei der 1990er Jahre – einige kritische Bemerkungen, in E. Savelsberg et al. (eds.), Kurdische Frauen und das Bild der kurdischen Frau, Münster 2000, 77–104.

PAULINE VAN GELDER

Political-Social Movements: Feminist

Afghanistan

Much of the documented information in English about women's rights in early twentieth-century Afghanistan emphasizes state-imposed changes to women's legal and social status in Afghan society. Most of these reforms were initiated between 1919 and 1929, during the reign of King Amān Allāh: the constitution was changed to guarantee equal rights for women and men; female students were sent to pursue higher education in Turkey; and the Anjuman-i Ĥimāyat-i-Niswān (Association for the protection of women's rights) was established. Most shocking, perhaps, for the clergy was the public unveiling of Queen Şurayyā and other female members of the royal family. King Amān Allāh was overthrown in 1929.

It took approximately another 30 years for the ruling government to address women's rights in Afghanistan. In 1959, under Muḥammad Zāhīr Shāh, policies were put in place to enable women to unveil voluntarily, to attend university, and to find employment outside the home. By 1964, women gained the right to vote, and became increasingly vocal, forming organizations that actively worked to redress gender inequality in Afghanistan.

The Democratic Organization of Afghan Women (DOAW) was formed in 1965; its main objectives were promoting women's literacy and banning forced marriages for women. In 1986, however, the DOAW was renamed the All-Afghan Women's Council, and became less forceful in its demands for gender equality, providing instead legal and social assistance to poor Afghan women. In 1977, Mīna Kishwār Kamāl (Meena) founded the Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan (RAWA), an independent political organization of Afghan women fighting for women's rights and social justice in Afghanistan. In 1981, RAWA launched a bilingual magazine, Payām-i-Zan (Woman's message) in Persian (Dari) and Pashto. After the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in December 1979, RAWA became directly involved in resistance movements. Meena was assassinated in Quetta, Pakistan in February 1987 by Islamists supported by the KGB. RAWA's original objective was to gain equal rights for Afghan women, and continues its work today, establishing schools and orphanages in Pakistan's refugee camps, and providing health services for women.

Recent Afghan feminist organizations include: Shuhada, a non-governmental organization which worked against the Taliban to provide Afghan women access to health care and education; Shirkat Gah, an organization operating out of Pakistan that works with refugee Afghan women to teach them about the Islamic laws under which they are living; Women for Afghan Women, established in spring 2001, a diasporic group whose target membership is Afghan women in New York and Afghanistan; and Negar-SAFA (Soutien aux femmes d'Afghanistan), based in Paris and founded by Afghan and French women, which works for the betterment of Afghan women's lives, promoting women's education and employment. The organization describes its conception as a response to Afghan women's call of distress under the Taliban. During Taliban rule in Afghanistan, Negar enabled Afghan women's groups to make contact with each other and with diasporic Afghan women's organizations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. E. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 1998.
- S. Mehta (ed.), Women for Afghan women. Shattering myths and claiming the future, New York 2002.
- V. Moghadam, Reform, revolution, and reaction. The trajectory of the "Woman Question" in Afghanistan, in V. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994, 81–109.
- , Revolution, religion, and gender politics. Iran and Afghanistan, in Journal of Women's History 10:4 (Winter 1999), 172–96.

NIMA NAGHIBI

Arab States

The 22 Arab states, with a population of over 280 million, range from Morocco in North Africa to Iraq in West Asia. These states share many similarities in terms of culture, religion, and historical evolution, while also differing widely in their respective socioeconomic dynamics and political experiences. All states share particular regional challenges, themselves a function of international relations and politics, and while some have hugely developed oil-rich economies, others have little or no natural resources. Some of these states boast relatively modernized polities, while others verge on the politically semi-feudal. Religion has enormous social, political, and cultural impact, particularly as the region is the historical meeting place of the three monotheistic world religions, but the region as a whole is predominantly Islamic.

It is too common a refrain, indeed a cliché, to assume that Islam determines the debate around women and women's rights. The complex reality is that religion (whether Islam, Christianity, or any other faith tradition in this fertile religious landscape) plays an important role as an identity marker, a phenomenon which increased significantly toward the latter part of the twentieth century. This heightened role and awareness of religion has entailed a redefinition of the role of the state, civil society, and economy, and within that framework, of women's specificities. Whether Muslim or Christian, Arab women have become increasingly conscious of the fact that no matter how qualified and capable they are, there is a glass ceiling that – barring one or two cases – prevents women from occupying important decision-making positions in the political (for example, as presidents or prime ministers), judicial (as judges), or religious realms (for example, as a mufti). This is blamed not on any one religion per se (because this would not explain the fact that other non-Arab Muslim countries often have very different sets of conditions (for example, women occupy important decision-making positions).

Women form nearly 60 percent of the population of these states and, in some countries, they form also approximately 60 percent of the student body at various levels. The first feminist movement was fashioned in the shadow of the colonial era and manifested itself in Egypt in the late 1800s, later traveling to all corners of the Arab world, such that by the 1960s many of the seeds of contemporary feminist organizations had taken root. Anti-colonial struggles moulded much of the discourse supportive of feminist rhetoric, as well as that opposed to it. To this day, feminist movements are regarded with suspicion, and are seen as either a harbinger or a manifestation of Western imperialist encroachment. After the events of 11 September 2001 and subsequent United States military action in Afghanistan, followed closely by the invasion of Iraq and its unfolding dynamics, women activists find themselves facing the same challenges today that they faced earlier: to speak of women's rights when the Muslim world is facing its toughest challenge since colonial times is to support “the enemies of Islam.”

DEFINITION AND TERMINOLOGY

But what do feminism or gender mean in the Arab context? To many, feminism, in so far as it is an attempt to struggle for more rights for women (whether the right to vote, to equal pay, or to divorce and custody of children without the legal harassment currently in store for many women), has been a permanent feature of the social, cultural, and political landscape. Although the first modern feminist movements (as opposed to feminist discourse, which was attributed to men in Egypt and Tunisia) are often spoken of as appearing in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, students of religious history (whether that of Islam or Christianity) are quick to unearth examples of much earlier champions of women's rights. Claiming back this history (or “herstory”) is in fact slowly gaining credibility as a legitimate scientific enterprise in Arab academia, and is supported by several activists in the non-governmental sphere as well.

Feminism as a term, however, is far from widespread. With no equivalent in the Arabic language, the word contributes to the misperception of the entire movement as foreign. Few women activists feel comfortable with the term, and those who do are not necessarily consistently vocal about it as a self-definition. It is not uncommon to find researchers referring to feminism – or to certain activists as feminists – while the activists themselves balk at the reference. At the same time, however, an alternative mode of reference to these women and men has yet to appear. Some have toyed with the Arabic terms niswiyya or nisā'iyya (which act as a translation of the word feminism) but such terminology has simply not become popular.

The term gender also has no Arabic translation, but is more often used by feminist groups and sometimes social scientists as a descriptive or analytical category. Gender is still seen as synonymous with “women” and a widespread or popular appreciation of the nuances of the term – whether semantic or actual or both – remains lacking in the Arab world. At the same time, the social construction of masculine and feminine roles and identities is central to an understanding of the social oppression and the cultural constructions of violence that affect women in the Arab world.

THE CONTINUUM OF FEMINISM

For the sake of clarity in this entry, a broad definition of the term feminism is used with two key components: a consciousness that women are oppressed in many ways, and actual attempts to rectify or deal with this reality (Karam 1998). This working definition is inspired by the extensive research carried out by Arab women researchers such as Leila Ahmed, Mervat Hatem, Evelyne Accad, Souad Dajani, Fatima Mernissi, Suad Joseph, Lila Abu-Lughod, Soraya Altorki, Yvonne Haddad, and Nadje Al-Ali – to mention but a few. Arab women are probably amongst the most written and researched about women in the world, and several non-Arab women researchers have also presented landmark and seminal studies over the years such as Judith Tucker, Beth Baron, Elizabeth Fernea, Nikkie Keddie, Sondra Hale, Barbara Stowasser, Susan S. Davis, Cynthia Nelson, Margot Badran, and many others. Together, these works continue to inform and transform feminist consciousness and practice in the Arab world.

With the above definition, it is possible to identify three main feminist streams in the Arab world that fall firmly within a continuum: secular (herein understood as non-religious discourse); religious (largely, but not only, couched in Islamic terms); and Islamist (framed within and advocating for political Islam). None of these streams is by any means homogeneous or generic; each category is full of diversity (and ambiguity) and often the barriers delineating one form of discourse from another are tenuous, hence the importance of imagining a continuum of discursive practice.

Secular feminists on the whole tend to shun faith-based discourse. This does not mean that they disrespect religion or are themselves non-religious. On the contrary, some of them can be devout (and are keen to describe themselves as such) in their personal lives. When it comes to framing their discourse on women's rights publicly, many secular feminists will skirt around religious issues or argue that to bring in religion is to risk endangering women's rights – either because of the dominance of conservative religious establishments, or because they fear creating a rift amongst their own ranks (since they will not all share the same faith tradition). Secular feminists are generally comfortable with the term “feminist” and many have strong connections with their feminist sisters from other countries, working for the implementation of all international legal human rights instruments and against all forms of discrimination, such as CEDAW (Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women), the Beijing Platform for Action, and others.

Some secular feminists can be openly antagonistic about and toward religion, maintaining that religion itself is the cause of much of the oppression women suffer, and are thus unwilling to engage with their more religious sisters, seeing them as laboring under a false consciousness. The more religious the message of the social or political activists, the more suspicious the secular feminists tend to be – often for good reason. Rarely in the Arab world is there any praise from religious circles for those who promote women's rights outside religious frameworks. Similarly, wherever there is an active Islamist movement (for example, in Algeria, Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, and Lebanon) some of the strongest opposition will be from secular feminists, believing that women's rights will be the first casualty of any Islamist regime, and citing Afghanistan, Iran, and Saudi Arabia as examples.

On the opposite side of the continuum, Islamist feminists – to many, a contradiction in terms – have an important role to play. In the same way that not all secular women are feminists, not all women members of Islamist movements (which themselves exist right across the Arab world) are feminists by any means. On the contrary, some of the most vociferous critiques of feminists and feminism emanates from Islamist circles – men and women. So who are Islamist feminists? These are the activists within the movement who advocate political Islam and who subscribe to the working definition of feminism used above. In other words, these are the women who acknowledge that women are oppressed and see the Islamist reality as an option to bring about a better world for both men and women.

For Islamist feminists, broadly speaking, the reasons for women's oppression are often explained in terms of society's lack of adherence to Islam (or to God) and the adjuncts of that faith in general. It is because Arabs are not following God's laws (which can only be just), runs the argument, that we confront the social, political, and structural problems we have today. A society dominated by (an enlightened interpretation) of the Shari'a, or Islamic law, is one that, in these women's opinion, will guarantee justice for women and thus improve Muslim women's condition. Islamism, seen as favoring a more just society, is also perceived as the means to achieve this end. Islamist feminists share one thing in common with their secular counterparts: a sense of unease, or even outright suspicion vis-à-vis each other. They argue that international legal instruments are at best redundant, and at worst, problematic and foreign, since all Muslims need are the Qur'an, the sunna, and the hadith.

Religious feminists fall somewhere in the middle of the continuum. They are to be distinguished from Islamists in that they do not support any one political philosophy or ideology and, in fact, many of them can be uncomfortable with what they perceive as the homogenizing tendency of Islamist feminists and their dogmatism with respect to interpretation and understanding of the Shari'a. With a healthy respect for the role of faith in empowering and liberating women and men, religious feminists are nevertheless keen on emphasizing new and evolving interpretations of doctrine, and advocate for the meeting point between international legal instruments (for example, CEDAW) and the essence of all faith traditions.

Religious feminists stand apart from their secular counterparts by maintaining that no discourse of women's rights that rejects religion can achieve its objectives in contexts where such a religion is the pervasive lingua franca of the masses and the politicians. Religious feminists are vociferous in urging caution with blind espousal of a religio-political cause (without a distinct women's rights agenda). They are equally cautious about any outright rejection of religion as a framework for reference. For many of them, faith traditions (in this case mostly Islam) guarantee a context of infinite justice for women – but the way the religion is preached, interpreted, and manipulated (politically) is highly problematic. In order to counter this manipulation, many religious feminists are keen on learning or advocate a rereading of religious and non-religious history and religious texts and traditions. Familiarity with, if not mastery of, the religious language is seen as one of the strongest tools for rejecting religious dogmatism, political obfuscation, and manipulation of religious rhetoric against women, as well as the formation of constituencies that can engender social transformation.

As indicated earlier, women activists are not glued to or within these feminist categories. In fact, on some women's rights issues, such as abolishing female circumcision, changing family (and/or civil) laws, and with certain political dynamics, such as support for the Palestinian cause and calls for democratization, there is often an overlap of interests and a commonality of agendas amongst the otherwise different streams.

Regardless of their position on the continuum, many of today's feminist organizations had some of their roots in charity work in the late 1800s and early 1900s. By the middle of the twentieth century, charity work gave way to activities that ranged from promoting women's electoral participation and running for political office, to organizing and providing small grants to rural development projects, micro-financing and income generation initiatives, organizing and lobbying politicians, and producing some seminal academic research.

Some organizations that started out combining a feminist agenda with anti-colonial opposition, such as Bint al-Ard (Daughter of the earth) in Egypt or the more radical women's work committees in the West Bank, which called for women's issues to be worked on during the nationalist struggle (as opposed to waiting for national liberation to actually happen), have more or less disbanded. This is an indication of both a shift in feminist discourse over the years (where one could argue that locating women's emancipation within national liberation may have been limiting and was ultimately unsuccessful), and of the changing political realities. Other groups, locating their discourse in broader social development language, such as the Palestinian In'ash al-Usra (Family rejuvenation society), the Rabi'at al-Nisa' al-Sudaniyyat (League of Sudanese women), or the Women's Cultural and Social Society of Kuwait continue to exist in various guises, though in a much less prominent fashion. More recently however, in the mid-1990s and particularly in the lead-up to the United Nations International Conference on Population and Development in 1994 and the Fourth United Nations World Women's Conference in Beijing in 1995, a number of groups have become far more vocal with agendas that openly – and courageously – deal with political participation, violence against women (particularly rape and clitoridectomy), and reproductive rights issues (abortion and contraception), many of which are still largely considered social taboos. Such organizations include the Al-Mar'a al-Jadida (The new woman) in Egypt, which, at different times, also included women from Sudan and neighboring North African countries; al-Nadim Center (also in Egypt); and the Collectif 95 Maghreb Egalité, which brought together women (and feminist groups) from Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco.

In addition to these, women's committees have formed and are extremely active in academic contexts in universities in Arab capitals such as Cairo, Khartoum, Beirut, Algiers, and Rabat, boasting a body of work on women that is both extensive and intensive, and publications (including books and a rich variety of journals, and research papers) that are impossible to quantify. Women's committees in national non-governmental umbrella organizations and/or syndicates (such as human rights organizations, lawyers and teachers' unions), and within regional Arab bodies (such as the Arab Lawyers' Union and the Arab Organization for Human Rights) have also amassed a legacy of impressive work on, with, and for women's rights issues. Tied to and separate from these, some Arab regional women's only organizations have also emerged with varying degrees of success, with agendas that focus on common challenges (particularly political participation, economic empowerment, and cultural – especially educational – development issues), such as the Arab Women's League based in Cairo. All of these are separate from other women's organizations that are formed under the aegis of certain governments, and often headed by the first ladies of countries such as Tunisia, Egypt, Lebanon, and Jordan. These are in many ways offshoots of what Mervat Hatem referred to as "state feminism" or the kind of women's rights discourse that is acceptable to, if not promoted by, governments. It is worth noting that in Iraq until the collapse of the Saddam regime, state-sponsored women's unions were, in the limiting framework of Ba'th party politics, able to mobilize women on the national and provincial levels, a situation similar to that in some Eastern European states until the collapse of communism. Needless to say, whereas all these groups face a huge challenge in the form of resource mobilization and funding in particular, state-sponsored feminism, depending on the time, location, and sociopolitical context, fares comparatively better.

The issue of resources, however, can be crippling to a great many of these organizations, and can significantly limit the diversity of issues and initiatives dealt with. Not only that, but feminist discourse is enriched by the activities that unfold in the field, such that a limitation of these activities can and does impact on the development of the discourses themselves. On the brighter side, however, the lack of resources, coupled with the imperatives of changing political contexts (globally and locally) may also forge issue-based alliances (for example, over changes in family laws) that significantly enhance feminist praxis in the Arab world. This is not simply a matter of optimistic assessment, but realistic feasibility.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), Muslim women and the politics of participation. Implementing the Beijing Platform, Syracuse, N.Y. 1997.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- N. Al-Ali, Secularism, gender and the state in the Middle East. The Egyptian women's movement, Cambridge 2000.
- S. Altorki and C. F. El-Solh (eds.), Arab women in the field. Studying your own society, Syracuse, N.Y. 1988.

- M. Badran, Feminists, Islam, and nation. Gender and the making of modern Egypt, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
- H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, London 1998.
- C. F. El-Solh and J. Mabro (eds.), Muslim women's choices. Religious belief and social reality, Providence, R.I. 1994.
- N. Hasan (ed.), al-Mar'a al-'Arabiyya wa-al-hayāh al-'amma, Cairo 1997.
- M. Hatem, Gender and Islamism in the 1990s, in Middle East Report 222 (2002), 44–8.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991.
- A. Karam, Women, Islamisms and the state. Contemporary feminisms in Egypt, London 1998.
- (ed.), A woman's place. Religious women as public actors, New York 2001.
- N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991.
- S. al-Khayyat, Honor and shame. Women in modern Iraq, London 1990.
- F. Mernissi, Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in Muslim society, London 1985.
- G. Nashat and J. E. Tucker, Women in the Middle East and North Africa. Restoring women to history, Bloomington, Ind. 1999.
- New Woman Research Center, Al-haraka al-nisā'iyya al-'Arabiyya. Mudhākhlat min Tūnis, Falastin, Miṣr wa-al-Sūdān, Cairo 1995.
- B. Shaaban, Both right and left handed. Arab women talk about their lives, Bloomington, Ind. 1991.
- S. Shami et al., Women in Arab society. Work patterns and gender relations in Egypt, Jordan, and Sudan, Providence, R.I. 1990.
- H. Sharabi, Neopatriarchy. A theory of distorted change in Arab society, Oxford 1988.
- E. Sullivan, Women in Egyptian public life, Syracuse, N.Y. 1986.
- J. E. Tucker, Arab women. Old boundaries, new frontiers, Bloomington, Ind. 1993.

AZZA M. KARAM

The Caucasus

Caucasian peoples tend to enjoy a collectivist type of culture. Hence, unlike the feminist movements of the West, women's rights activism has not taken the shape of movements centered on women's individual rights.

During the Soviet period equality between women and men was advocated by the official ideology and legislation. The highest management body, the Supreme Soviet, had quotas of between 38 and 40 percent for women deputies. In 1948 the only official women's organization, the Women's Council, was founded, with centralized administrative and network structure. All levels of education, and all professions and careers were equally accessible for men and women. Yet women's integration into political life was incomplete since women were not appointed to positions where actual political decisions were made (Chubinidze 2000, Tsereteli 2000).

From 1991, after the dismantling of the Soviet Union, the first women's non-governmental organizations started to appear in the Caucasus. By the end of the twentieth century women's organizations in Caucasian countries were powerfully developed, with between 150 and 170 active organizations. Permanently operating special women's state committees were also set up. In the higher educational institutions courses covering various aspects of gender are available. There are also scientific research centers on gender and women's rights. From 2002 to 2004 the speaker of the parliament of Georgia, and the interim president, was a woman, N. Burdjanaze.

Modern Caucasian women are actively involved in community life, but decision-making positions are less accessible to them. The average membership of women in parliaments in the Caucasian countries is 12 percent (Babayan 1999, Tsintsadze 2003).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Babayan, Gender realities and the prospects of the society in transformation, in Association of Women with University Education, Proceedings of the 3rd international conference. Woman and society. Gender equality in the perspective of democratic development [in Armenian], Tsakhtadzor, Armenia 1999, summary in English, p. 174.
- N. Chubinidze, Discussion of women's economical and political status issues, in N. Devdariani et al. (eds.), Women in political and social life [in Georgian], Tblisi 1998, 75–86.
- Y. Y. Karpov, Caucasian woman. World vision premises of the public status [in Russian], in Etnograficheskoe Obozrenie (Moscow) 4 (2000).
- M. Tsereteli, Women's rights in the light of their motivation values [in Georgian], Tblisi 2000.

MZIA TSERETELI

Central Asia

In the Muslim regions of the Russian Empire, the Woman Question was initially dealt with mostly at the beginning of the twentieth century and particularly after the revolution of 1905, or rather when the reforming Muslim Jadidist movement included the Woman Question in its political and social program. In these regions, the Muslim press contributed a great deal to the implementation of the question. The Central Asian intellectual Jadidists participated in the reform movement, but because they were excluded from the political realm their program remained only a theory. Even before the October Revolution of 1917, the Central Asian Jadidists proposed to ban the parandzha (clothing that covered women from head to foot) and the chachvan (horse-hair veil) by decree, but the proposal lacked a following. Contrary to the Jadidists, the Qadimists (the traditionalist clerics) defended the veil and the seclusion of women. The debate between Muslim reformism and conservatism continued after 1917.

The Woman Question acquired fundamental importance after the October Revolution. Women's emancipation was one of the main objectives of the Bolshevik government. For this purpose, in 1919 it instituted the Zhenotdel, the women's department of the Communist Party. While in European Russia the Zhenotdel immediately became active amongst women, in Central Asia its real activity did not begin until 1923–4. The issues that the Soviet government had to fight against to emancipate Central Asian women were linked to Muslim traditions and institutions: polygyny, kalym (bride-price), the forced marriage of underage children, the seclusion of women, and the veil. The Soviets were committed to struggle against traditions considered backward in the name of modernization and secularization of the country. More, they intended to use women to destroy the Muslim patriarchal family and consequently to break the blood and tribal ties that were at the base of society and to establish new social bonds on a socialist basis. Female emancipation was essentially directed at promoting social change and undermining Muslim religious identity. In Central Asia, woman was considered the vehicle of change, the “surrogate of the proletariat” (Massell 1974), considering the almost total absence of a working class. For this aim, the Zhenotdel created institutions to inform women of their rights, ratified by Soviet legislation, and to furnish medical, legal, and professional help that was almost completely absent before 1917. In 1926, the Soviet government planned an attack against the former everyday life and against Muslim tradition: the khudzhum (attack, Uzbek) was effectively launched in 1927, promoting mass unveilings (mostly in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan) on dates such as 8 March, 1 May, and the anniversary of the October Revolution. The Jadidists supported the policy of mass unveilings. During 1927, thousands of women took off their veils, but most of them came back to the veil following the reprisals carried out by their families, by some of the more conservative fractions of the populace, and by most Muslim religious leaders. Many women were killed or suffered physical and moral violence. In 1930, the Zhenotdel was disbanded, but in Central Asia some cells continued to operate.

During the Soviet period, the emancipation of Central Asian women was extolled as accomplished: this discourse was subjected to criticism during the Gorbachev era. The official data claimed that the quotas of representation within government and party organs reserved for women had been achieved (in the 1970s, in Uzbekistan, women constituted about 47 percent of employees in the government and party apparatus); female illiteracy had been almost eradicated (the percentage of literate women aged between 9 and 49 had risen from 2 percent before the revolution to 99 percent in 1970); and all professional careers and all levels of education were open to women. Nevertheless, women were far from having reached full equality with men: discrimination against them persisted in all fields. Women, especially indigenous women, were concentrated in manual, lower-skilled, and lower-paid jobs; there was no increase of female employment during the last decades of the Soviet Union; in the 1970s, women did not occupy prestigious posts in the high spheres of industry or in crucial sectors of the economy. There was evident inequality between women of the indigenous nationalities and the Russians, who obtained the best posts. In the republics of Central Asia, feminist movements were not present because of the peculiarity of the system. The Woman Question was an affair of state that controlled and eventually financially supported women's associations. The Soviet establishment claimed that since the emancipation of women had been completely accomplished, there was no necessity for any feminist movement.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union and the gaining of independence by the Central Asian republics, the Woman Question started to assume a new importance. After 1991, some international women's conferences were held in Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan. In this context it is not possible to speak about "feminism" in its traditional meaning: Central Asian feminists criticize Western feminism, which, in their opinion, does not take into consideration the issues relating to women with different experiences. Central Asian women, as bearers of values of the national cultural identity, feel their role is to defend these values rather than to sustain feminist values: the Woman Question has entered a second stage as regards the issues of national and cultural identities. There are some feminist movements in Kazakhstan (such as WLCI, the Women's League of Creative Initiative, founded in 1994, one of whose primary goals is to "study and spread the ideas of feminism") and in Uzbekistan, but the debate is still at an initial stage. Indeed, the feminist movements started to emerge at the same time as the revival of traditional society which is supported in part by Central Asian states and governments. In Tajikistan and in Kyrgyzstan, some women's non-governmental organizations have formed with different aims and constitutions, but it is very difficult to speak about organizations with a declared and marked feminist outlook; they are mostly associations and foundations directed to the improvement of women's conditions in different fields. The Women's Resource Center in Tashkent, established in 1994, is a center that supports women: one of its aims is the provision of information on legal rights. In Uzbekistan, some female councils and committees which act at all levels of public life have been established by state organs, but they seem still to be weak. Some Turkmen women reckon that in their country a feminist movement cannot develop because of the strong traditions of the society.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union and the emergence of poverty, inflation, unemployment, and economic crisis, Central Asian women are involved in the daily struggle to survive. Probably the Woman Question and feminist movements will receive a greater impulse during the next few years, when the transition from a state planned economy to a market economy has been concluded. Central Asian republics will be more settled and women will be freer to think how to locate themselves within the new society and the women's movements.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261-304.
- J. Baker, The position of women in Kazakhstan in the interwar years, in Central Asian Survey 4:1 (1985), 75-114.
- L. M. Handrahan, Gender and ethnicity in the "transitional democracy" of Kyrgyzstan, in Central Asian Survey 20:4 (2001), 467-96.
- C. Harris, The changing identity of women in Tajikistan in the post-Soviet period, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 205-28.
- D. M. Heer and N. Youssef, Female status among Soviet Central Asian nationalities. The melding of Islam and Marxism and its implications for population increase, in Population Studies 31:1 (1977), 155-73.
- D. Kandiyoti, Identity and its discontents. Women and the nation, in Millennium. Journal of International Studies 20:3 (1991), 429-43.
- N. Lubin, Women in Soviet Central Asia. Progress and contradictions, in Soviet Studies 33:2 (1981), 182-203.
- G. J. Massell, The surrogate proletariat. Moslem women and revolutionary strategies in Soviet Central Asia. 1919-1929, Princeton, N.J. 1974.
- P. A. Michaels, Kazak women. Living the heritage of a unique past, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidí (eds.),

- Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity*, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 187–202.
- D. Northrop, Veiled empire. Gender and power in Stalinist Central Asia, New York 2004.
- A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. Central Asia, Delhi 2002.
- S. Tadjbakhsh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology in Tajikistan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163–85.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva and E. Turgumbekova, The daughters of Amazons. Voices from Central Asia, Lahore 1996.
- Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Assertions of self. The nascent women's movement in Central Asia, Lahore 1995.

CHIARA DE SANTI

Iran

There were a significant number of active feminist organizations from the beginning of the twentieth-century to the 1960s in Iran. These included the Women's Freedom Society, founded in 1906 by a group of male and female intellectuals who gathered in secret to discuss the status of women. In 1910, the Anjuman-i Mukhadirāt-i Vatan (National ladies' society) was formed. Its members were active in promoting women's education, and encouraging the use of Iranian-made rather than imported goods. As such, the organization was active in promoting the economic independence of Iran. In 1922, the Anjuman-i Nisvān-i Vaṭankhvāh-i Īrān (Patriotic women's league of Iran), launched a magazine called Patriotic Women, which emphasized women's rights, including women's education and women's right to marry later in life. In 1927, Zandukht Shirazi founded the Association of Revolutionary Women in Shiraz. The organization worked for women's unveiling and gender parity. Zandukht began a newspaper entitled Daughters of Iran in 1931–2. It printed news about international feminist efforts, literary articles, and Zandukht's radical poems and editorials.

The Kānūn-u Bānūvān (Ladies' center) was formed in 1935; its goals included improving the morality of women, training women in modern domestic chores, and opening charity centers for poor mothers and orphans. According to some scholars, the establishment of the Kānūn-u Bānūvān marked the transformation of twentieth-century Iranian feminist activism into a state-sanctioned and contained feminism, since the organization was overseen by Reza Shah's daughters, Ashraf and Shams Pahlavī, and received significant government funding. Recent scholarship demonstrates, however, that there was a variety of Iranian feminists and groups who pursued feminist goals autonomously. State-legislated policies such as the 1936 Unveiling Act, for instance, were preceded by women's heated debates on the subject of unveiling and women's employment.

In 1961, however, the High Council of Iranian Women was established with Ashraf Pahlavī as the honorary head; at this point, all women's organizations were encouraged to join the High Council in order to gain legitimacy. In 1966, the state replaced the High Council with a larger bureaucratic organization, the Sāzman-i Zanān-i Īrān (Women's organization of Iran). This state-sponsored organization professed to work for the social, political, and economic advancement of all women, but during the revolutionary years the organization came under attack for its perceived inattention to the needs of working-class and rural women.

Women's activism peaked during the 1978–9 revolutionary period, as women demonstrated against the Shah and what they understood to be the regime's imperialist policies. At the same time, they demonstrated against the restrictive policies regarding women's dress and mobility that the nascent Islamic Republic was beginning to promote. Because of the perception of a state-sanctioned Westernized feminism under the Pahlavis, anti-imperialist nationalists denounced feminists as imperialists and counter-revolutionaries.

A decade and a half later, there was a resurgence of diverse and forceful Iranian feminist voices in the public arena. Women's magazines and journals have provided an important public forum for debates between secular and religious feminists in contemporary Iran. Although most of these magazines are published by religious feminists, secular feminists have been welcomed to contribute to them. Some of the more outspoken and influential of these feminists include: Shirin Ebadi, lawyer, human rights activist and winner of the 2003 Nobel Peace Prize; Mehrangiz Kar, human rights lawyer and secular feminist activist who has published extensively on the legal rights of Iranian women; Shahla Lahiji, founder of the first women's publishing house in Iran; Shahla Sherkat, editor of the religious feminist magazine, Zanān (Women); and Faezeh Hashemi, editor of the daily Zan (Woman, banned at the time of writing). The current state of the media in Iran is such that while magazines are regularly forced to cease publication, other magazines soon emerge to take their place. In feminist debates in Iran, a multitude of voices is participating and attempting to shape the future of an indigenous Iranian feminism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality. Women, state and ideology in contemporary Iran, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1992, 663–87.
- , Feminisms in an Islamic republic, in J. Scott, C. Kaplan, and D. Keates (eds.), Transitions, environments, translations. Feminisms in international politics, New York 1997, 390–9.
- , Authority and agency. Re-visiting women's activism during Riza Shah's period, in T. Atabaki (ed.), The triumphs and travails of authoritarian modernisation in Turkey and Iran. Twentieth-Century Turkish and Iranian histories from below, Routledge Curzon (forthcoming).
- M. Poya, Women, work and Islamism. Ideology and resistance in Iran, London 1999.
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1981.

NIMA NAGHIBI

Israel

The lives of Israeli women, a nationally, ethnically, and religiously diverse category, reflect a complex of opportunities and barriers. Of 6,439,000 citizens in 2001, there were 77 percent Jews, 15 percent Muslims, 2 percent Christians, and 1.6 percent Druzes (Israel 2002, table 2.1). Nominally, women of all groups enjoy basic liberal civil rights, including the right to vote and be elected to political office, and the right to free, universal education, health services, and legal defense. However, the application of these to the lives of women varies considerably. The lack of separation between state and religion produces discrimination against women, since family matters fall under the jurisdiction of the religious courts. During the 1990s, women's struggles registered some significant gains in this regard, with the establishment of a civil court for family affairs, which decides property and child custody settlements, although it cannot grant the divorce itself. A second locus of discrimination is the exclusion of women from formal politics. In 2003 women comprised only 14 percent of members of parliament. All of them were Jewish, and only two women, also Jewish, were heads of local municipalities. In the work arena, women's earnings fall far below those of men. The rate of labor-force participation among Jewish women (53 percent) is similar to that of women in many industrial countries, while that of Arab women (15 percent) is lower than in some neighboring Arab countries, which bears direct implications for poverty. For Arab women, particularly, gender discrimination is amplified through articulation with national exclusion, and often also with class marginalization.

Organized feminism in the region, in both national communities, dates to the early decades of the twentieth century. In Israel impressive achievements were registered at the stage of state formation in establishing extensive state-provided services for working women, especially those relating to maternity and childcare. The oldest women's organizations, most identified with these achievements, have become well-established. Funded by state or party agencies, with branches spread throughout the country, they provide mostly legal and social support services. On the grassroots level, feminist activism resumed in the 1970s and has remained lively, with some significant changes. The 1970s wave was led by upper-middle-class Jewish women of European and American descents (Ashkenazi). Their major focuses were consciousness-raising groups on the one hand and fighting male domestic violence on the other. Achievements included the establishment of rape-crisis centers, hot lines, and shelters for battered women, and breaking the silence that surrounded the problem. Parallel to that, feminists continued to lobby for women's work, domestic wages, and civil rights. Many of these activities have increasingly come to rely on state support.

From the 1980s, and more so through the 1990s, many feminists became involved in peace activism, calling for a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. This development politicized local feminism, creating complex effects. From the perspective of Jewish women from marginalized groups, mostly Mizrahi (Jews of North African and Middle Eastern origin) and lower-class, it marked Israeli feminism as elitist, as it oriented itself outwardly, toward Palestinians, instead of addressing the class and ethnic cleavages within the Jewish society. This led to a second wave of politicization, mostly throughout the 1990s, in which mainstream Jewish feminists were challenged from within. It culminated in institutionalizing the quarters policy, a declared commitment to equal self-representation of Ashkenazis, Mizrahis, Palestinians, and lesbians in shared feminist activities.

In separate settings, Mizrahi feminists have concentrated their efforts in the educational system, empowering mothers to fight the tracking system that discriminated against their children. Later they also engaged in fighting for the labor rights of working-class and poor women. Arab feminists concentrated their efforts on education, creating progressive curricula and empowering teachers, on anti-violence measures, and on creating a discourse of sexual liberation. Religious Jewish and Muslim feminists addressed, separately, scriptural and spiritual issues. Most Arab feminists have also been closely involved in male-dominated circles supporting Palestinian nationalism. In terms of its institutional basis, the second wave feminism yielded an array of non-governmental organizations, funded by external donors, which are more radical than the older organizations, and consequently also more marginalized. Notably, despite their separate identities, the various groups also form coalitions and share many of their members.

The 1990s witnessed a proliferation of women's studies in academia, which in the early 2000s have yielded several programs and even some departments of women and gender studies. Into the first decade of the twenty-first century, with heightened political hostilities, an ongoing economic recession, and a rapid retreat of the welfare state, Israeli feminism is orienting itself increasingly toward the economic empowerment of women, through skills training, workers' organizations, and micro-credit programs. Notwithstanding the creativity, foresight, and commitment of the feminists, the majority of Israeli women of all groups remain reserved regarding the title "feminist." While they tend to endorse the discourse of women's rights, the mainstreaming of a gender perspective on society and politics remains far outside local popular discourses.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Amir, S. Fogiel-Bijaoui, R. Giora, and E. Shadmi (eds.), Feminist theory and research. Israeli institutions and society, in Israel Social Science Research (special issue) 12 (1997), 1–2.
- A. Ilany, The Israel report, in US/Israel Women to Women, 20th anniversary learning and strategic planning initiative, New York 2001, 29–53.
- Israel, Central Bureau of Statistics, Statistical abstract of Israel, no. 53, [Jerusalem] 2002.
- D. Izraeli, A. Friedman, H. Dahan-Kalev, S. Fogiel-Bijaoui, H. Herzog, M. Hasan, and H. Neveh (eds.), Sex, gender, politics [in Hebrew], Tel Aviv 1999.
- R. A. Kanaaneh, Birth of the nation. Strategies of Palestinian women in Israel, California 2002.
- P. Motzafi-Haller, Scholarship, identity, and power. Mizrahi women in Israel, in Signs 26:3 (Spring 2001), 697–734.
- T. Rapoport and T. El-Or (eds.), Cultures of womanhood in Israel, in Women's Studies International Forum (special issue) 20 (1997), 5–6.
- H. Stier and A. Lewin, Does women's employment reduce poverty? Evidence from Israel, in Work, Employment and Society 16:2 (2002), 211–30.

AMALIA SA'AR

South Asia

Women in South Asia have participated in many movements. For example, historical records speak of women as revolutionaries in the early colonial period. The nationalist struggle saw many women as leaders and participants, and in the postcolonial period women have initiated and achieved many goals. However, whether the women's movement and the feminist movement are the one and the same thing is a contentious issue.

There is a prevalent tendency to define feminism as a phenomenon that originated in Europe and was informed by the self-conscious concerns of women as women. Women in South Asia exist in the context of religious divisions and, to a large extent, of sexual segregation. These women's interests span much more than issues of gender hierarchies. After initial resistance feminist analysts are now beginning to accept the multiplicity of differences that inform our experiences of gender hierarchy. Keeping with this understanding of feminism this entry uses the concept of feminist movements to include all mobilizations of women. This is also consonant with the description of feminism as a new social movement.

In South Asia women's participation in the public sphere can be usefully divided into three phases: the early colonial period, the nationalist struggle, and the postcolonial period.

EARLY COLONIAL PERIOD

Women in this historical period feature as revolutionaries resisting the British efforts at colonization. Although most accounts of resistance to foreign powers by women describe them as wives or mothers of political rulers it is important to emphasize that these women were mostly uneducated and belonged to a social milieu that valorized seclusion for women, whether or not that was the social reality. For them to take up arms when their menfolk were not able to do so was revolutionary in the most radical sense. The most prominent names are those of Rani of Jhansi and Begum Hazrat Mahal, both of whom actually stepped in to direct and lead armed struggle against the British colonists.

WOMEN IN THE NATIONALIST STRUGGLE

Many social reformers seeking to change undesirable aspects of Indian society preceded the nationalist movement. Both Hindu and Muslim reformers identified women's condition as the target of reform. For a number of Hindu reformers widow remarriage, age of consent, and child marriage were the glaring injustices to be rectified. Muslim reformers were in a more difficult situation as they invoked the minority Muslim identity against the dominant Hindus and the English colonists. For them to identify the disadvantages of their tradition was not politically viable in this context.

Lack of education for women became a major concern in India partly because the colonial rulers constructed the Woman Question in such a manner that it came to signify their moral superiority over the colonized (Ray 2002). In slightly different ways both Hindu and Muslim reformers sought to construct ideas about the modern woman that drew upon the Victorian ideal of womanhood but also depended on a glorified golden past of their own traditions. The reformers were, however, less focused on education as enhancing women's development and more concerned to make them better partners and mothers. This manifested as valorization of motherhood in the nationalist discourse. There is evidence in women's writings in the contemporary journals that seems to indicate that most educated women accepted these ideas and emphasized the nurturing roles of wives and mothers.

Muslim community leaders also tried to address the problem of non-education for Muslim girls and women especially since the dictates of purdah (seclusion) made it more difficult for them to access public institutions of education. Muslim male leaders were divided about the need and use of education for Muslim girls. The most contentious issue turned out to be whether Muslim girls should be tutored at home or in schools. Many individual Muslim women supported girls' education by endowing schools. Rokeya Sakhawat Husain is one of the better-known women who started a school for girls and ran it successfully. Unlike many men, Rokeya saw education as the means for enabling women to fend for themselves and live with dignity.

The availability of formal education for women led to the emergence of a group of women with a desire for organized action to improve the position of women (Kasturi and Mazumdar 1994). A number of associations were formed in the early nineteenth century. Invariably the members of these associations were from reformist middle-class families. Such associations faced much opposition in the early part of the century but in the latter part the resistance decreased as the revivalist ideology provided an alternative rationale for improving the position of women. By the end of the century a nascent women's movement was under way.

The newly educated younger women thus found themselves in the throes of nationalist struggle. However, the religious divide between Hindus and Muslims complicated matters. Although the main leaders of the nationalist movement declared time and again that theirs was a secular struggle on behalf of all Indians, Muslims nevertheless found themselves in another camp. Many Muslim women continued to be part of the women's and nationalist political organizations but others felt compelled to join Muslim-only associations. The All India Muslim Ladies Conference was founded in 1914 (Minault 1981).

There is considerable disagreement among scholars about the exact effect of the nationalist movement on the women's movement. One stream of thought suggests that issues of reform and in particular the women's issue, were subsumed within nationalism (Natarajan 1959). Another suggests that the politics of nationalism fostered conservatism in social beliefs and practices as it glorified India's past and tended to defend everything traditional (Ghulam 1983). Another view is that nationalism resolved the Woman Question by relying on the ideological framework of the home-world dichotomy and giving women the responsibility to maintain the cohesiveness of the family and kin group to which men could not give much attention (Chatterjee 1989).

Kasturi and Mazumdar (1994) disagree with all these analyses as they all seem to look for a linear connection between the nineteenth century reform movements and the growth of nationalism in the twentieth century and the roles prescribed for or played by women in Indian nationalism. Moreover, these analyses totally ignore the way women themselves responded to the challenges of colonialism. There is ample evidence that once mobilized, women moved on their own, acquiring new confidence and articulating new priorities. A number of scholars (Forbes 1982, Minault 1982) have separately analyzed Gandhi's role in mobilizing women in the nationalist struggle as one dependent on the ideology of a self-sacrificing paragon of virtue. However, Kasturi and Mazumdar (1994) see Gandhi's success in his perceptiveness that the plight of women was a direct consequence of the economic depredation of colonialism. He preached gender equality in economic rewards and political decision-making and women responded in great numbers to Gandhi's call for khadi (spinning and weaving of thin cotton fabric) because it represented a method of employment generation for the masses.

WOMEN IN POSTCOLONIAL STATES OF SOUTH ASIA

In the independent states of India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh women have struggled for diverse rights.

India

In India much feminist effort has been directed at the state to reform laws. Criminal law relating to rape was reformed as a consequence of the women's movement organizing protests at the inept handling of the complaint of rape of a woman in police custody. Laws relating to dowry, sati, and selective abortion of female fetuses are some of the other notable achievements of the women's movement.

However, efforts of women are not only directed at the state. SEWA (Self Employed Women's Association) represents the best known example of grassroots mobilization of women. Ela Bhatt has been instrumental in organizing self-employed women and empowering them to generate incomes and manage available resources (Crowell 2003).

Communal schism in the Indian women's movement happened after the government capitulated to the demands of Muslim fundamentalists and enacted the Muslim Women's Act 1986 (Agnihotri and Mazumdar 1995). Muslim women were divided over the question of maintenance for divorced Muslim wives and it became difficult for Hindu women to argue against the measure when some of the Muslim women demanded it (Agnes 1999).

Pakistan

In Pakistan, women's organizations were primarily constituted by middle-class women who oriented their work toward improving the conditions for women from lower socioeconomic strata (Alvi and Raue 2002). It was in 1980s that the feminist movement became active in opposing the efforts at Islamization of some parts of the laws (Weiss 1986, Kennedy 1988). In 1981 the Women's Action Forum was formed and subsequently endorsed by seven women's groups (Ahsam 2002). Although started by professional women, WAF has widened its base by cooperating with other women's organizations.

Bangladesh

Women in Bangladesh had to experience the turmoil of nationalist struggle first against the British and then against the state of Pakistan. In the struggle for independence from Pakistan women of Bangladesh had to bear the indignities of mass rape by the Pakistani army, yet the new government marginalized them. The nascent feminist movement did not work actively to mobilize support for them either (Hossain and Hossain 2002). Subsequently the feminist movement has directed its attention to dealing with escalating violence against women. It has successfully lobbied the government to enact the Prohibition of Dowry Act, 1980. However, an effort to modify the Muslim Family Law Ordinance of 1961 has not produced any change. This ordinance, enacted in the early days of Pakistan's existence, gave Muslim women some legal protection but in Bangladesh the state has to juggle the demands of feminists with those of the religious fundamentalists.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Agnes, Law and gender inequality. The politics of women's rights in India, Oxford 1999.
- I. Agnihotri and V. Mazumdar, Changing terms of political discourse. Women's movement in India, 1970s–1990s, in Economic and Political Weekly 30:29 (1995), 1869–78.
- A. Ahsam, Fundamentalist ideology and feminist resistance, in A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. South Asia, ii, Pakistan, Delhi 2002, 53–70.
- H. Alvi and S. Raue, Pakistani feminism and feminist movement, in A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. South Asia, ii, Pakistan, Delhi 2002, 1–52.
- P. Chatterjee, The nationalist resolution of the women's question, in K. Sangri and S. Vaid (eds.), Recasting women. Essays in colonial history, New Delhi 1989, 233–54.
- D. Crowell, The SEWA movement and rural development, New Delhi 2003.
- G. Forbes, From purdah to politics. The social feminism of the All India Women's Organization, in H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982, 219–44.
- M. Ghulam, Reluctant debutante. Responses of Bengali women to modernization, 1849–1905, Rajshahi 1983.
- S. Hossain and R. Hossain, Feminism and feminist movement in Bangladesh, in A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. South Asia, iii, Bangladesh, Delhi 2002, 1–62.
- L. Kasturi and V. Mazumdar, Introduction, in L. Kasturi and V. Mazumdar (eds.), Women and Indian nationalism, New Delhi 1994, xxv–lxvii.
- C. Kennedy, Islamization in Pakistan. Implementation of the Hudood Ordinances, in Asian Survey 28:3 (1988), 307–16.
- G. Minault, Sisterhood or separatism? The All-India Muslim Ladies Conference and the nationalist movement, in G. Minault (ed.), The extended family. Women and political participation in India and Pakistan, Delhi 1981, 83–108.
- , Purdah politics. The role of Muslim women in Indian nationalism, in H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982, 245–61.
- H. Moghissi, Feminism and Islamic fundamentalism. The limits of postmodern analysis, London 1999.
- S. Natarajan, A century of social reform in India, Bombay 1959.

- H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982.
- B. Ray, Early feminists of colonial India. Sarla Devi Chaudhurani and Rokeya Sakhawat Hossain, Delhi 2002.
- A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. South Asia, ii, Pakistan, Delhi 2002.
- A. M. Weiss, Implications of the Islamization program for women, in A. M. Weiss (ed.), Islamic reassertion in Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1986, 97–113.

ARCHANA PARASHAR

Sub-Saharan Africa

For this entry, the authors have adopted Valentine Moghadam's definition of feminism: "feminism is a theoretical perspective, and a practice that criticizes social and gender inequalities, aims at women's empowerment, and seeks to transform knowledge – and in some interpretations, to transform socio-economic structures, political power and international relations" (Moghadam 2002, 45). Defined in this way, feminism may have different specific objectives depending on the social, economic, and political context in which it is functioning. In Muslim West Africa Islamic beliefs and practices are not uniform, even in those countries where more than 85 percent of the population is Muslim. In this context, feminism wears many faces. West African feminists define their own goals in regard to what features of their society or polity must be changed to give women a fair and just place, and these goals differ depending on the context, time, and circumstance. The following examples are indicative of the extremes of the range of goals and activities of Islamic West African feminist groups.

Since January 2000, twelve states in northern Nigeria have adopted Shari'a law and Shari'a-based penal codes under the leadership of fundamentalist Muslim leaders. Married women are therefore secluded during their child-bearing years, and women do not go out alone. When they do go out, they are covered from head to toe. In October 2001, Safiya Yakubu Hussaini was sentenced to death by stoning after having been found guilty of adultery by the Shari'a court in Sokoto, Nigeria. Since that time, although Safiya Hussaini has been acquitted by the Shari'a Court of Appeal, the cases of two other women sentenced to death by stoning by two other Shari'a courts in northern Nigeria (one for conceiving a child out of wedlock and the other for adultery) are wending their way through the courts.

Muslim women leaders in Nigeria, working in concert with the International Solidarity Network of Women Living Under Muslim Laws, have begun to challenge aggressively the interpretations of Islamic law that have sanctioned the imposition of harsh sentences against women while the male perpetrators of these crimes are not punished. In this work, they stand on the ground first laid by Nana Asma'u, daughter of the legendary Usman don Fodio, leader of the Islamic Jihad in northern Nigeria in the mid-nineteenth century. Nana Asma'u (1793–1864) remains to this day much revered as a pious woman, as an important leader in the Jihad, and indeed as the ultimate role model for a Muslim woman (Mack and Boyd 1995). Educated by her father in classic Islamic scholarship, Asma'u was designated by him, when she was only 20 years old, as the "leader of women." She immediately began to teach the Qur'an to women whom she then sent throughout the Caliphate to spread that teaching, and, of more importance to contemporary Islamic feminists, to teach women about their rights under Islam. Nana Asma'u did not challenge the fundamental principles of her teachers or their understandings of the secondary position of women in Islam. But she did create the space for women to seek education and to be respected for their learning and revered in their own right as learned Muslims. It is into this space that present day Islamic feminist activists are stepping, challenging the interpretation and application of Muslim law by the Shari'a courts against women in northern Nigeria.

In contrast to northern Nigeria, political power in Senegal is not held by Muslim fundamentalists. Both politics and policy are dominated by Western-educated technocrats who have traditionally turned to conservative rural Muslim leaders for electoral support. Unlike the case in northern Nigeria, women in Senegal are not veiled and not secluded, but move about freely and fully participate in the economy. They do not have the same access as do men to economic, social, and political power, however. Women are less likely to be educated, less able to get higher paying jobs, and distinctly less likely to hold political office or manipulate political power than are Senegalese men (Callaway and Creevey 1994, Creevey 1996).

In this context it is not surprising that Senegalese feminism was represented in the 1990s by groups that argued directly for governmental and societal reform to allow social changes that would empower women (Sow 1997a, 54, 1997b, 1973, 1985). Yewwu Yewwi (a Wolof term meaning "raise consciousness for liberation") is one group that has embodied this liberal feminist approach. Led by educated Muslim Senegalese women, this group headed the opposition to the 1974 Family Code. Yewwu Yewwi leaders did not hesitate to conduct public forums, to write articles for Senegalese newspapers and to publish their own newsletters. They also networked, using family and friends and political connections. The code was finally revised in 1989, and most of the changes were favorable for women (Creevey 1996, 299–301, Callaway and Creevey 1994, 176–81). Yewwu Yewwi and its successor, Réseau Siggil Jiggeen (Network of women rising), continued to agitate for further improvements in the code throughout the 1990s. In 2000, they were rewarded when a new constitution that made further reforms was introduced.

Conditions are always changing throughout Muslim West Africa. Women's definitions of what is important to them will also change. In Senegal, the replacement of Yewwu Yewwi by Siggil Jiggeen in the late 1990s signaled a tactical move by Senegalese feminists away from identification with the Western feminist confrontational emphasis on equality and toward the more widely accepted goal of achieving economic power and independence for women. Nonetheless, they continued to struggle for governmental reform and broadened their activities in many ways. Fatou Sow, a feminist leader and distinguished scholar, has even started her own radio station, Sokna FM (sokna is a honorific title for a woman), which deals solely with issues and concerns of women. In Nigeria, Ayesha Imam, also a noted scholar and feminist leader, and other Muslim feminists have established "action research" teams composed of women's rights activists, 'ulamā' (scholars of Islam), lawyers, historians, and Arabic linguists to research Muslim jurisprudence, the history of Islamic law in Nigeria, and Shari'a court decisions in order to challenge the interpretations of Islamic law by fundamentalist judges in the Shari'a courts.

Many West African women, of course, belong to a wide variety of groups that are not included in this discussion because of our definition of "feminist." Many more Senegalese women in rural areas belong to women's associations, which have limited social and/or economic objectives, than to Siggil Jiggeen. These groups empower women in their businesses and lives and may ultimately result in increased demand for specifically feminist objectives among a wider population (Creevey 2004). However, women's perceived goals can also become limited rather than expanded. A good example is the transition in Sudan in the late 1980s and early 1990s when educated women brought into the National Islamic Front (NIF) moved from supporting social reform to aspiring to "ideal" Muslim womanhood (Hale 1995, 185–218). In northern Nigeria, women working to reinterpret Muslim law are working within a specific Islamic framework and do not challenge its underlying gender conservatism. Sudanese and Nigerian women are responding to the growing wave of fundamentalist power and trying to see it in a positive way, as did Nana Asma'u many years ago. Perhaps there is a danger that acknowledging such limited movements and labeling them as "Islamic feminism" will undercut support for those Muslim women who are both unwilling to compromise with conservative religious teachings and trying to change the social and political structure of their society to fully empower women (Moghissi 1999). In the real world of Islamic West Africa, however, the context defines what is possible. Feminists here are responding realistically to their specific conditions and will continue to do so.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- L. Creevey, Islam, women and the role of the state in Senegal, in Journal of Religion in Africa 26:3 (1996), 268–307.
- , Impacts of changing patterns of women's association membership in Senegal, in B. Purkayastha and M. Subramaniam (eds.), The power of informal networks. Lessons from South Asia and West Africa, Lanham, Md. 2004, 61–74.
- S. Hale, Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism, and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
- B. B. Mack and J. Boyd, One woman's jihad. Nana Asma'u, scholar and scribe, Bloomington, Ind. 2000.
- V. Moghadam, Islamic feminism and its discontents. Towards a resolution of the debate, in T. Saliba, C. Allen, and J. A. Howard (eds.), Gender, politics, and Islam, Chicago 2002, 15–51.
- H. Moghissi, Feminism and Islamic fundamentalism, London 1999.
- E. Sow, Dépendance et développement. Le statut de la femme en Afrique moderne, in Notes africaines 130 (July 1973), 256–65.
- , Muslim families in contemporary Black Africa, in Current Anthropology 26:5 (December 1985), 566.
- , The social sciences in Africa and gender analysis, in A. M. Imam, A. Mama, and F. Sow (eds.), Engendering African social sciences, London 1997a, 31–60.
- , Gender relations in the African environment, in A. M. Imam, A. Mama, and F. Sow (eds.), Engendering African social sciences, London 1997b, 251–70.

BARBARA CALLAWAY AND LUCY CREEVEY

Turkey

The history of the Woman Question in Turkey goes back to the second half of the nineteenth century, a period marked by far-reaching Westernizing reforms that aimed at reinvigorating the declining Ottoman Empire. Women's issues emerged as the foremost battlefield for debates between modernizers and conservatives of the era, the former identifying women as the loci of Ottoman backwardness, and the latter condemning any major reforms in this arena as foreign encroachments on the cultural essence of Ottoman society. Initially it was a group of male reformers who began criticizing practices such as arranged marriages and polygamy, and emphasized the importance of women's education as a prerequisite for progress. Scattered women's voices soon joined the debate, a development fostered by the emergence of a women's press toward the end of the century. In general the women's discourse was similarly one of progress and education, rarely challenging the identity of women as wives and mothers. While Islam maintained its prominence as a point of reference for many reformists, misguided traditions were often blamed for Muslim women's oppression.

The Second Constitutional Period, ushered in with the 1908 Young Turk Revolution, was a turning point in the treatment of the Woman Question. The terms of the debate were modified with the emergence of a Turkist movement that idealized pre-Islamic Turkish history for its record of women's rights, thereby creating a new reference of authenticity and thus relegating traditions oppressive to women to some undesirable, foreign influence. This was also the time when the women's press and women's organizations flourished in numbers and diversity, and feminizm (feminism) became a central signifier in debates surrounding women's issues. The modest improvements in women's educational opportunities that began in the nineteenth century, moreover, continued at a faster pace during this era, with women gaining access to higher education for the first time in the 1910s.

During the War of Independence following the First World War, many women voluntarily involved themselves in the nationalist struggle, and some filled the posts emptied by men going off to war. Nationalist activities of women not only legitimized their public presence, but also provided them with a new image, that of asexual sister-in-arms and patriotic citizen. This image was best personified, as well as created in writing, by Halide Edip Adivar, one of the well-known novelists of the early republican era, who was distinguished both by her defense of women's rights and by her patriotism. Many radical reforms regarding women followed the declaration of the Turkish Republic in 1923, making Turkey a pioneer in woman's rights, especially among Muslim countries. Between 1924 and 1926, women were granted equal rights with men in the field of education, a new Civil Code based on the Swiss model was passed, replacing Muslim family law, and religious restrictions on women's dress were lifted. Finally, by 1934, women were fully enfranchised. These reforms facilitated the emergence of a substantial group of middle-class female professionals, represented in impressive numbers within a few decades in fields such as academia, law, and medicine, who in turn became the leading symbols of the secular and democratic nature of the republic. Ironically, however, soon after the achievement of full political rights, the single most important women's organization of the time, Türk Kadınlar Birliği (Turkish women's union) disbanded, deeming itself no longer necessary.

From the 1930s until the 1980s, there was a virtually dormant period in Turkey in terms of an autonomous women's movement, a situation commonly linked to the prevalence of the nationalist/modernizing discourse among educated middle-class women, and to the domination of left-wing ideologies in oppositional circles. The former typically assumed incomplete modernization as the root cause of women's continued subordination despite the achievement of formal legal equality, while the latter treated women's oppression as only secondary compared to class oppression and, similar to the former, idealized the image of a desexualized comrade-woman. The new women's movement of the 1980s, influenced by the second-wave feminist ideas coming from the West, challenged the adequacy of formal legal equality achieved as a result of republican reforms, which many criticized as "state feminism," while at the same time asserting its independence, or at least distinctiveness, from other social causes. The new feminists insisted on the political nature of the personal sphere, and emphasized the importance of reclaiming female sexuality. Emerging against the backdrop of the depoliticized atmosphere following the 1980 coup, the new feminist movement germinated in small, informal groups that came together for consciousness-raising sessions and panels in a few metropolitan centers, and carried out ideological debates in certain non-mainstream periodicals. Toward the end of the decade, starting with the 1987 march against domestic violence and continuing with the 1989 campaign against sexual harassment in the streets, the new feminist message eventually succeeded in reaching beyond the bounds of small intellectual circles, and attracted the attention of a larger public.

The new feminist wave passed on to the 1990s with increased internal diversity, greater emphasis on institutionalization and issue-oriented activism. From the few metropolitan centers, it expanded into smaller cities, and the intellectual monopoly of secular, left leaning circles over the subject was to some extent challenged with the rise of a women's rights discourse among Islamist women, and among women active in the Kurdish nationalist movement. Collaborations between women's groups and the government, especially at the local level, produced new institutions such as shelters for battered women and a women's studies library in Istanbul. As a combined effect of Turkey's ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in 1985 and pressure coming from feminist groups for its full implementation, the 1990s and 2000s also witnessed modifications in the Civil Code and criminal law toward greater legal equality of men and women. Parallel to increased feminist activism, moreover, there has been an increase in the number of literary works by women raising issues such as female sexuality, as well as a visible upsurge in scholarly publications on women's studies and history, which, among other things, recovered for contemporary feminists in Turkey their long forgotten predecessors of the late Ottoman era.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abadan-Unat (ed.) Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981.
- Y. Arat, Women's studies in Turkey. From Kemalism to feminism, in New Perspectives on Turkey 9 (Fall 1993), 119–35.
- A. Bora and A. Günel (eds.), 90'larda Türkiye'de feminizm, Istanbul 2002.
- S. Çakır, Osmanlı kadın hareketi, Istanbul 1994.
- A. Durakbaşa, Halide Edib. Türk modernleşmesi ve feminizm, Istanbul 2000, 2002².
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- A. İlyasoğlu and N. Akgökçe, Yerli bir feminizme doğru, Istanbul 2001.
- D. Kandiyoti, Women and the Turkish state. Political actors or symbolic pawns?, in N. Yuval-Davis and F. Anthias (eds.), Women-nation-state, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1989, 126–49.
- , End of empire. Islam, nationalism, and women in Turkey, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 22–47.
- A. Karakaya-Stump, Debating progress in a “serious newspaper for Muslim women.” The periodical Kadın of the post-revolutionary Salonica, 1908–1909, in British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 30:2 (November 2003), 155–81.
- A. Parla, The “honor” of the state. Virginity examinations in Turkey, in Feminist Studies 27 (Spring 2001), 65–88.
- N. Sirman, Feminism in Turkey. A short history, in New Perspectives on Turkey 3 (Fall 1989), 1–34.

Ş. Tekeli, 1980'ler Türkiye'sinde kadın bakış açısından kadımlar, Istanbul 1990, 1995³.

AYFER KARAKAYA-STUMP

The United States

The multiple challenges and issues confronting Muslim women in their own communities, as well as in their relations and interactions with mainstream American society, have facilitated a spirit of activism and engagement in public life. Across the United States a number of community-based and national Muslim women's organizations and initiatives have formed, prompted by efforts to advance Muslim women's education and women's rights, to address women's social and economic concerns and to promote scholarship and activism on issues of jurisprudence, theory, and hermeneutics (Webb 2000). Although many of these initiatives relate to and have engaged in national and international feminist campaigns and discussions, strategic alliances and efforts at coalition building between American Muslim women and the broader feminist movement have remained limited.

According to Fernea (1998) the word “feminism” to many Muslim women in the United States evokes an exclusively Western, almost imperialist movement that does not affirm or validate faith-centered identities and realities. A vast majority of Muslim women have largely disengaged from the feminist movement because they feel not only that their diverse narratives and experiences as Muslim women are silenced, but that the movement typically directs, defines, and prioritizes needs and issues on behalf of Muslim women (Fernea 1998, Haddad and Smith 1996, Webb 2000, Ahmed 1992). Ahmed (1992) points to a neocolonial legacy embedded within the dominant feminist movement that seeks to rescue the typical downtrodden oppressed Muslim woman. Contemporary feminist campaigns in the United States addressing the “Muslim woman” issue, notably the campaign to end gender apartheid in Afghanistan, echo this critique. As Chishti (2003) indicates, the highly visible and politically charged campaign to “emancipate” Afghan women successfully influenced United States foreign policy toward Afghanistan. The political campaign alienated many American Muslim women not in terms of the actual goals, but because of the dichotomized simplicity of pitting secularism against religion and Western liberal freedom against “backward” Islamic tradition. In doing so, the feminist campaign not only heightened Islamophobia and reinforced stereotypes of Islam and Muslim women in the United States, but simultaneously undermined the complex historical, political, and economic factors that contributed to the conditions of women in Afghanistan.

Despite these challenges, a growing number of Muslim women's initiatives in the United States emerged or were cemented preceding the 1995 United Nations World Conference on Women. Organizations such as the Muslim Women's League, based in California, drafted position papers on the United Nations Platform for Action, and a number of discussions took place across the country gearing up for the conference among Muslim women scholars, activists, and lawyers (Webb 2000). In particular, the 1994 conference in Washington on "Religion, Culture and Women's Human Rights in the Muslim World," co-sponsored by the Sisterhood is Global Institute (SIGI), brought to light the work of existing research and activist Muslim women's organizations in the United States such as Karamah: Muslim Women Lawyers for Human Rights, founded by Azizah al-Hibri, and the North American Council for Muslim Women (NACMW) founded by Sharifa Alkhateeb. The latter organization, in addition to the Muslim Women's Georgetown Study Project, worked extensively on analyzing the connections between CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women) and the Qur'an and hadith, leading to their participation on five panel discussions at the World Conference in Beijing (Abu Gideiri 2001). The national advocacy work of Karamah and NACMW continues, as both organizations actively address the issues and concerns of Muslim women and the American Muslim communities nationwide, particularly at the White House and on Capitol Hill. NACMW has been encouraging the greater involvement of Muslim women in public life and addressing key social justice issues, such as violence against women, loans for economic ventures, health care, and female genital mutilation. Similar national efforts by Karamah include acting as consultants in legal cases (such as divorce) to American courts on issues related to women and Muslim Shari'a law. As a networking organization, Karamah engages in writing and education on numerous issues such as domestic violence, women's rights in Islam, and legal education. These two organizations in particular have paved new roads for the scholarly and activist contributions of American Muslim women at the national and international level.

The majority of Muslim women's community-based organizations across the United States are working for women's rights and education and addressing the social, economic, and political concerns of American Muslim women. Muslim women's organizations have formed or have increased their public activities to address the needs of Muslim women, largely bypassed by both mainstream feminist organizations and mainstream Muslim organizations. The former typically do not recognize the complexity of the American Muslim women's experience and the latter exclude women from senior decision-making bodies and are largely informed by patriarchal attitudes and practices (Ali 2003, Abu Gideiri 2001). In this regard, Abu Gideiri writes, "Muslim women are sustaining, resisting, adjusting or changing their historical roles within contemporary American circles" (2001, 1). Dozens of national Muslim women's organizations have been formed in the United States, a great majority of them promoting women's empowerment through education. The Muslim Women's League, the United States chapter of Sisters in Islam and the International Union of Muslim Women are some examples of national organizations that promote comprehensive and critical Islamic education for women, alongside addressing misconceptions and common misunderstanding of gender in Islam in the broader community. In researching the challenges faced by American Muslim women, Haddad and Smith (2003) comment that Muslim women in America have a history of activism, helping to create institutions, social structures, and support groups across the country. Although they have suffered a setback due to the backlash and profiling as a result of 11 September 2001, there is a new kind of activism emerging among American Muslim women, mainly to reach out to mainstream society in efforts to inform the public about Islam and dispel popular myths and stereotypes, particularly about Muslim women.

There is undoubtedly a growing community of Muslim women activists and organizations in the United States addressing critical concerns faced by American Muslim women. Although few Muslim women's organizations identify themselves as feminist, their work is addressing the immediate and strategic needs and concerns of Muslim American women and their families. Thus many Muslim women activists, scholars, and organizations are increasingly finding themselves engaged in feminist discussions and interacting with the broader feminist movement (Haddad and Smith 1996, Webb 2000). In her study of Muslim women's identity in North America, Khan (2000) identifies the critical need for Muslim women living in North America to engage in feminist discourse in order to explore how gender, capitalism, and patriarchy implicate their lived realities at various levels, and to carve their own niche in feminist organizing, which she argues is vital for progressive alternatives and collective strategies. Coalition building among Muslim women and the larger feminist movement in the United States holds great potential, not only to build an inclusive movement but also to promote collective analyses and work toward achieving mutually defined goals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Abu Gideiri, The renewed woman of American Islam. Shifting lenses toward gender jihad?, in Muslim World 91:1/2 (2001), 1–18.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- S. Ali, Building a movement. A woman's work, in Islamic Horizons (May/June 1424/2003), 16–24.
- M. Chishti, The international women's movement and the politics of participation for Muslim women, in American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences 19:4 (2002), 80–99.
- E. W. Fernea, In search of Islamic feminism, New York 1998.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith, Islamic values among American Muslims, in B. Aswad and B. Bilge (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 19–40.
- , Adjusting the tie that binds. Challenges facing Muslim women in America, in H. Jawad and T. Benn (eds.), Muslim women in the United Kingdom and beyond, Leiden 2003, 39–64.
- S. Khan, Muslim women. Crafting a North American identity, Gainseville, Fla. 2000.
- G. Webb (ed.), Windows of faith. Muslim women scholar-activists in North America, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.

MALIHA CHISHTI

Political-Social Movements: Islamist Movements and Discourses

The Caucasus and Central Asia

INTRODUCTION

We define Islamist movements very broadly, referring to political movements that either adopt Islam as a principle ideology or include it as a main constituent of their ideology or ideologies. There has been very little research on the role of women in shaping Islamist movements and discourses in the Caucasus and Central Asia. Nevertheless, from what we do know, women have played a significant historical role in the struggles against Russian presence in the region. Informally, women also struggle to define varying aspects of their Muslim and ethnic identities against the backdrop of Islamist discourse and nationalist resistance.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Russian invasions of the Caucasus and Central Asia in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries ignited several cycles of resistance that were initially successful, but finally defeated. Beginning in 1783 with Shaykh Manşūr's multiethnic Caucasian resistance and continuing until the establishment of the North Caucasian state in 1918 and the Soviet invasion of that nascent state in 1921, the Caucasus barely enjoyed a peaceful period during the Tsarist era. The Tsarist era also witnessed the 30-year Caucasian wars (1829–59) involving the legendary Imām Shāmīl, whose wife was a central figure in his resistance campaign. Similarly, in Central Asia, the resistance was losing ground to the Russian advance, with Tashkent falling to Tsarist Russia in 1865, Samarkand and Bukhara in 1868, and the Turkmen regions in 1883–4 (Haghayeghi 1996, 93). The same cities fell to the Soviets again in the 1920s after short periods of independence.

One of the reactions to losing the battle against the Russians was the birth of the reformist Jadid movement. Established in 1883 by Ismail Bey Gaspiralı (1851–1914), the movement advocated a modern interpretation of Islam, spreading education and allowing greater freedom for Muslim women as methods of combating Russian imperialism. The Jadid movement “not only included the ‘women question’ in their political and social agenda but transformed it into a ‘cause célèbre’” (Rorlich 2002, 247). Gaspiralı declared, “Whoever loves his own people and wishes them a [bright] future must concern himself with the enlightenment and education of women, restore to them [their] freedom and independence and give wide scope to the development of their minds’ capabilities” (Rorlich 2002, 249).

Confronted with the 1917 developments and upheavals, the Jadidists were divided between several strategic choices, ranging from full cooperation with the new “progressive” Soviets to militarily resisting the “new invaders.” Factionalized and fractured, the movement was easily suppressed by Lenin and later crushed by Stalin. The demise of the Jadid movement ended the “reform from within” attempt and it became the exclusive task of the Soviets to “emancipate” the Muslim women of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

Termed the “surrogate proletariat,” Muslim women were targeted exclusively as a way to simultaneously weaken traditional Central Asian identities and impose a uniform socialist, “modern,” Russian model of society. This program focused on incorporating women more visibly into the public sphere, emphasizing their labor participation, educational opportunities, and equality before the law (Akiner 1997, 262). In addition, symbols of their Islamic identity, such as the veil, were systematically targeted. In 1955, under Khrushchev, veil burning ceremonies were given widespread publicity and in 1959, the “end of the era of the veil was officially announced with a ceremonial burning of the last veil in Bukhara” (Rashid 1994, 34). This forced Soviet “emancipation” was not completely successful. Although many women benefited from the educational and work opportunities offered to them, not all necessarily subscribed to the ideological components of the Soviet program.

Another Soviet policy that affected Muslim women was the suppression of Islam in the public sphere. As a result, Islamic belief and rituals were mainly preserved in the private sphere, the realm of the family and community. As primary caregivers in the family, women could engage in private religious practice and maintain rituals and customs that reflected both their Islamic and ethnic heritages, without state intrusion (Akiner 1997, 274). They were therefore key actors in preserving their Islamic and traditional Central Asian identities, individually and collectively, under Soviet rule, even as they were the “objects of emancipation” in the public sphere.

POST-INDEPENDENCE ERA

The process of defining women’s roles, socially and politically, is part of the general resurgence of Islamist and ethnonationalist identities, both of which serve as contrast to Soviet imperialism. One manifestation of this sociopolitical dynamic is the focus on women’s dress as a marker of traditional, ethnic, and Islamic identities (Tadjbaksh 1998, 175). In Tajikistan, for example, between 1990 and 1992, when nationalist sentiments were at their peak, the veil and traditional dress (atlas) were declared a national dress by both Muslim men and women (Tadjbaksh 1998, 175).

More generally, competing ideals of womanhood have come to dominate social Islamist discourse in post-independence Central Asian society. As part of the backlash against the Soviets, there is a positive view of the “traditional, Muslim, Central Asian woman” and a negative perception of the “emancipated, modern, Russian woman.” In reality, most Central Asian women do not fall easily into either category. The majority seek to balance the two, rather than to replace the latter with the former in a reversal of the Soviet female emancipation campaign (Akiner 1997, 263). For example, at a conference on “Islam and the Role of Women” in September 1992, Central Asian women favored the domestic role of traditional women in the education and upbringing of their children, while assessing the difficulties for modern women to juggle their professional and domestic responsibilities (Tadjbaksh 1998, 177).

Women’s responses to Islamist and nationalist pressures are expressed predominantly in informal ways, and not exclusively through organized, political involvement. For example, Muslim women’s organizations have not been very successful so far, partially due to lack of sufficient funding, and there is not much evidence of a specifically feminist component to Islamist movements (Akiner 1997, 294). In social practice, although many women are inclined to view Islam favorably, not many choose to express it by adopting the veil. Most women see it as a matter of personal commitment and not a political statement of their identity (Akiner 268).

Many Tajik women continue to work outside the home, if and when they can find work in the midst of political insecurity, due to financial necessity, and do not practice female seclusion as part of the ideal for traditional women (Tadjbaksh 1998, 180).

Yet many Central Asian and Caucasian women support Islamist-oriented and nationalist political movements. In Central Asia, during the Tajik civil war, a significant percentage of Tajik women supported the United Tajikistani Opposition (UTO), whose backbone was the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP). In 1992, Nazarudin Zuberdulla, commander of the UTO’s military wing, declared that the UTO’s women supporters were selling their jewelry to buy arms (Rashid 1994, 180). In the Caucasus, a study conducted by the Union of Women of the Don Region (UWDR 1999) about Chechen women’s attitudes toward making Chechnya an Islamic state showed that a significant percentage favored the idea. Two out of three women looked favorably upon the prospect of establishing an Islamic state in Chechnya, while one in four respondents favored the Shari’a courts, which were re-established in Chechnya from 1997 to 1999 (UWDR 1999). This is in addition to Chechen women’s participation in the war for “independence” as well as in field-commanding resistance units (Chechen women 1999).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

UWDR (Union Women of the Don Region), Chechen women’s attitude towards making Chechnya an Islamic state, 1999, <http://home.novoch.ru/~donwomen/Report_ChechWom&War_09.htm>.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- S. Akiner, Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261–304.
- Chechen women during war, 1999, <www.amina.com/article/chech_wom.html>.
- M. Haghaygehi, Islam and politics in Central Asia, New York 1995.
- A. Rashid, The resurgence in Central Asia. Islam or nationalism? London 1994.
- A. Rorlich, Muslim feminism and nationalism. Crimea, Middle Volga and Caucasus, in A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movements, Delhi 2002, 245–67.
- S. Tadjbaksh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology in Tajikistan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163–85.

OMAR ASHOUR AND UZMA JAMIL

Indonesia

Indonesian women activists have been involved in women's issues since the beginning of the twentieth century. Dewi Sartika (1884–1947), a Sundanese noblewoman in West Java who founded a school in 1904, was influenced by the ideas of Princess Raden Adjeng Kartini (1879–1904). In West Sumatra, Rahmah El-Yunusiah was concerned with women's education and Rasuna Said with politics and journalism.

Born in a strongly Islamic background on 20 December 1900, El-Yunusiah pioneered an Islamic school dedicated exclusively to women. She believed that women in many respects lagged behind men and this induced her to build the Madrasah Diniyah Puteri (Islamic School for Women). This school inspired other women activists to open similar schools in other parts of the country. El-Yunusiah successfully wedded Islamism with the women's emancipation movement in Indonesia; she was labeled by some the "Kartini of Islamic Schools" (Burhanudin 2001).

Said built political consciousness among young women in West Sumatra. Initially she was involved in education and taught on the staff at El-Yunusiah's school for some years. Later on she turned to politics and journalism. She left El-Yunusiah and began to develop her career as an activist. On many occasions she attempted to argue that women's roles in liberating the country were as important as those of men. As a result, she was indicted by the Dutch colonial administration and spent some years in jail.

Another prominent woman is Roehanna Koedoes, who published a magazine, Soenting Melajoe, dedicated to the progress of women. Through this magazine, Koedoes disseminated not only the ideas of women's emancipation and women's skills, but also of gender equality. Although it survived for only a short period of time (1912–21), it succeeded in raising women's consciousness of several issues, for example, their roles in education, politics, and social life.

EMANCIPATION AS PART OF MODERNIZATION

The struggles of El-Yunusiah and Said to improve the conditions of women cannot be separated from the waves of Islamic modernization movements in West Sumatra in particular and in Indonesia in general at the beginning of the twentieth century. A number of Islamic organizations were founded with the aim of modernizing Indonesian Muslims. Muhammadiyah, the locomotive of the Islamic modernization movement in Indonesia, laid a strong emphasis on education, including women's education.

Muhammadiyah chose education and social activities as its most important agendas. As a modern organization, Muhammadiyah believed that women should be included in the modernization processes. This meant that women's education became the highest priority in its activities. Nyai Ahmad Dahlan, the wife of Ahmad Dahlan, the founder of Muhammadiyah, founded Sopo Tresno in 1914, a study circle dedicated to women which became the means for the dissemination of a progressive spirit among women, especially those involved in the Muhammadiyah. In 1917, it was transformed into a larger organization called Aisyiyah, a women's sub-organization within Muhammadiyah which remains active until today.

Another modernist Muslim organization, Persis (The unity of Islam), established Persistri as a sub-organization concerned with women. It oriented its activities toward giving religious guidance to its members. Nahdlatul Ulama (NU) established a sub-organization concerned with women, Muslimat. Like Aisyiyah, Persistri and Muslimat provide skills and knowledge for their members, founding branches of their organizations all over the country to support their activities.

Despite the consciousness of progressive ideas among Indonesian women in terms of education and emancipation, certain other problems, including polygamy, were not addressed. A number of women opposed polygamy since it conflicts with the principle of equality between men and women. But many Muslim women still considered polygamy to be a part of religious obligation as it is mentioned in the Holy Qur'ān. Polygamy became a crucial issue in modern Indonesian history. Despite women's severe criticism of it, they could not ignore religious stipulations which clearly support it. Aisyiyah, for instance, at the Bukit Tinggi congress in 1930, stated that polygamy is a part of Islamic teaching. In contrast, Aisyiyah criticized some practices imported from the West, for example, female workers and male–female relationships, which did not fit with religious teachings. These were considered to be un-Islamic, and not perceived as progressive.

Indonesian women activists at the beginning of the twentieth century understood women's movements largely in terms of women's education. This can be seen in the work of El-Yunusiah and Nyai Ahmad Dahlan for whom women's education, more precisely Islamic education, was the main prerequisite for women's emancipation. This understanding seems logical, given that at the time schools remained closed to women. Only a small number of women from the privileged groups, such as Kartini, could enjoy education.

Some women activists had a slightly different understanding concerning women's emancipation: Rasuna Said stressed the importance of women's political consciousness as part of women's emancipation. It can even be said that she was the first woman activist who believed that women cannot be separated from politics. Rasimah Ismail, Said's successor, emphasized her belief that women should contribute to Indonesia's independence movement.

Women's political consciousness became more apparent in 1928 when the first national women's congress was held in Jakarta. At this congress the women addressed the issue of the improvement of women's education, and also supported the independence movement. A year later, at their second congress, also in Jakarta, they restated political agendas including their support for independence and their rejection of provincialism and regionalism.

FROM EMANCIPATION TO GENDER

By the late 1980s, there was a shift of paradigm among women activists concerning women's discourses. Emancipation had been achieved and the issue of gender came to the fore. A number of Muslim intellectuals introduced gender discourse to Indonesian Muslims, along with the issues of democracy, human rights, and environment. Prominent figures concerned here are, among others, the late Mansour Fakhri, a representative of a non-governmental organization who attempted to explain gender from a sociological point of view and Masdar F. Mas'udi, who explained it through examination of Islamic classical texts (fiqh).

Gender discourse raised contrary opinions among Muslims. Conservative Muslim groups believe that gender ideas have been influenced by Western liberal principles which undermine religious teachings. They argue that Muslims should be aware that not all Western concepts, including that of gender, align with the teachings of Islam. For this reason, they rejected gender discourse as being un-Islamic. Rejection of gender discourse comes mostly from the so-called Islamist groups who believe that since Islam is a complete religion, there is no need for Muslims to seek other principles and models for their life.

In contrast, a number of young Muslim intellectuals hold that the principles of gender equality should be disseminated among Muslims because there are still certain practices in the community which are undermining of women. Some Muslim gender activists believe that certain Qur'anic verses and the hadith of the Prophet Muhammad were biased by the social structure of the Muslim community, which supported patriarchal cultures. This problem, they believe, can only be solved by deconstructing the principles of Islam. Some gender activists even say that it is time to demasculinize the paradigm.

Among various intellectuals who examine Islam vis-à-vis gender from different perspectives is Nasaruddin Umar, who uses hermeneutical methods in understanding the gender verses in the Qur'an. Umar finds that the Qur'an was revealed in a language highly influenced by patriarchal cultures and is therefore gender-biased. Another gender activist, Badriyah Fayumi, examines a number of hadith that are supposed to be biased by gender issues. She finds that gender biases in the hadith are influenced by historical and sociological contexts which infiltrated the body of Islam.

Another prominent figure is Husein Muhammad. From a deeply Islamic background, Muhammad approaches Islam and gender through classical Islamic textbooks (fiqh). According to him, fiqh actually gives a huge perspective on women, ranging from conservative to liberal. Gender inequalities emerged when conservative precepts dominated fiqh and appeared to be the only fiqh available for Muslims; this took place as a result of attempts made by certain groups in the Muslim community to maintain the status quo within the community.

Attempts such as those made by Masdar F. Mas'udi have succeeded in improving gender understandings within the members of the NU, the largest Islamic organization in Indonesia, frequently labeled as representing "traditionalist Islam." Mas'udi is now a member of the top executive board of the NU. During the late 1970s, he founded P3M, the Center for Research and Development of the Pesantren [Islamic boarding school] and Society, and attempted to disseminate gender ideologies among the members of the NU community.

Many Muslim gender activists in Indonesia come from traditionalist Muslim backgrounds. Rahima, one of the most important NGOs in Indonesia working on gender issues, was founded by NU intellectuals, including Husein Muhammad. The Modernist Muhammadiyah also works on gender. Siti Ruhaini Dzuhayatin, a gender activist from Yogyakarta with a Muhammadiyah background, established Rifka Annisa, an NGO working on women and gender issues.

Works of international Muslim feminists also exert an influence. By the late 1980s, Fatima Mernissi, Riffat Hassan, Nawal Sadawi, Ashgar Ali Engineer, and Amina Wadud Muhsin had stimulated Indonesian Muslims to think more deeply about women's issues, leading to new understandings of gender. This was supported by Ulumul Qur'an, a new Indonesian journal dedicated exclusively to the discussion of various issues concerning Islam, including gender. In 1989, it published an article by Yvonne Haddad on the image of Eve in the Qur'an. This article was received positively by its readers. A year later, it published an article by Riffat Hassan on women's theology in Islamic tradition which also evoked positive responses. This is the period when Indonesian Muslims came into contact for the first time with the concept of gender in a very broad sense. More female and male intellectuals realized that gender equality was the most important aim to be realized. They held various discussions and seminars, and undertook research and training concerning this issue. The number of Muslim students exploring gender as their research project grew significantly in Muslim campuses in the country. Some of them went on to become women or gender activists.

A number of key figures, among them Lies Marcoes-Natsir and Farha Ciciek, have played a great role in socializing and disseminating gender and women's issues to a wider Muslim community, especially students. They represent the first generation of Indonesian Muslim women who are seeking rationalization of gender from religious perspectives. Despite challenges from conservative Muslim groups, they dedicate their lives to the issues surrounding gender and are positively reinforced by younger fellow Muslims. Among young Muslim intellectuals emerging from the 1990s are Nurul Agustina, Ratna Batara Munti, Ala'i Najib, Syafiq Hasyim, Ratna Megawangi, and Badriyah Fayumi. They flourish as the second generation and, like their predecessors, are committed to the dissemination of the gender discourse in Indonesia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES (all in Indonesian)

- N. Agustina, Islamic traditionalism and feminism, in Ulumul Qur'an (fifth year special edition) 5:5/6 (1994).
- A. Arani (ed.), Body, sexuality, and women's sovereignty, anthology of young 'ulamā's' thoughts, Yogyakarta 2002.
- F. Ciciek, Attempts to overcome domestic violence. Learning from the life of the Prophet Muhammad p.h.b.u., Jakarta 1999.
- M. Chalil, Women's dignity, Bandung-Jakarta 1954.
- Z. Daradjat, An accountable marriage, Jakarta 1975.
- A. A. Engineer, Women's rights in Islam, Yogyakarta 1994.
- M. Fakhri, Gender analysis and social transformation, Yogyakarta 1996.
- et al., Discussing feminism. Gender discourses in Islamic perspectives, Surabaya 1996.
- B. Fayumi and A. Najib, The creature who receives the most attention from the Prophet. Women in Prophetic narratives, in A. Munhanif (ed.), The hidden pearl. Women in classical Islamic literatures, Jakarta 2002.
- Fitriyani, Roehana Koedoes. A West Sumatran woman, Jakarta 2001.
- F. Mernissi and R. Hassan, Equal before God. Writings of Riffat Hassan and Fatima Mernissi (translated into Bahasa Indonesia), Yogyakarta 1995.
- L. M. Marcoes-Natsir and J. H. Meuleman (eds.), Muslim women in textual and contextual studies, Jakarta 1993.
- S. Wieringa, A scented malicious supernatural being. Women's organizations in post-1950s Indonesia, Jakarta 1998.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- I. Abdullah, The origins of gender, Yogyakarta 1997.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992, trans. into Indonesian, Wanita dan gender dalam Islam, Jakarta 2000.
- E. Amalia, Muslim women's aspirations and their political roles during the New Order concerning women's empowerment. Gender relations in Islam, undergraduate thesis, IAIN Syarif Hidayatullah, Jakarta 1999.
- J. Badawi, Gender equity in Islam. Basic principles, Plainfield, Ind. 1995.
- K. Bhasin, Understanding gender, Jakarta 2002.
- J. Burhanudin (ed.), Indonesian women 'ulamā', Jakarta 2001.
- B. S. Dewantara, Nyi Hajar Dewantara in myth and reality, Jakarta 1979.

JAJANG JAHRONI

Iran and Afghanistan

Massive participation of Iranian women in the 1979 Islamic Revolution and women's support for political Islam in the 1980s have led specialists to inquire into the reasons behind women's participation in Islamist movements whose aim, it is argued, is to limit women's rights and their political, economic, and social choice. Given the limitation of existing research and published material on Afghanistan this entry focuses on Iran.

In the name of religion some Islamists with a positivist approach to nature essentialize gender inequality, which they consider to be natural and to originate in the divine will. They confine women to domesticity where natural hierarchy limits the equality between men and women. Sayyid Jawād Muṣṭafavī, an Iranian cleric and the author of a widely read book on the family (1995), argues, "God has created women to do the housework, child-bearing and child-rearing. God has created men for activities outside the home, for confronting the hardships of life." Likewise, in Afghanistan, the Taliban denied women their basic rights and secluded them from public life.

Islamists are not unanimous in limiting the role of women to that of mother and wife. Some endorse women's active presence in the public sphere but are opposed to egalitarian gender relations and women's autonomy. In the aftermath of the Iranian Revolution Ayatollah Khomeini encouraged Islamist women's activities in the public sphere and criticized the traditionalist clergy, saying, "God is satisfied with women's great service. It is a sin to sabotage this [women's activity in the public sphere]." In Afghanistan, some members of the Northern Alliance, especially Aḥmad Shāh Mas'ūd, who fought against the Taliban from 1996 onwards, shared more or less the same view.

Reasons that lead to women's participation in Islamist movements are manifold. Some women who valorize the centrality of women's role in the family, and disapprove of individualism, which, they think, is provoked by Western sociocultural influence, are attracted to Islamist discourse. For these women Islamic values can and should be preserved through maternity. Maryam Bihruzī, a member of the first to fourth Islamic Majlis (assembly) who was a preacher prior to the revolution and leads the conservative Zaynab Association, is among this category. She declared that "according to Islam men are protectors of women" and that "the home is the most suitable place for women because children need their mother's presence" (1983).

Some lower-class women who suffer from their social condition and demand social justice are drawn to Islamist organizations and associations because of their charitable activities rather than their Islamist political discourse. In the absence of social institutions Islamists assist the needy through their solidarity networks thereby winning the loyalty of poor or impoverished women. In Iran, prior to the unfolding of the revolution, revolutionary clergy and their bāzāri (merchant) allies gained the support of poor urban women and women rural migrants thanks to religious charitable activities before mobilizing them to participate in the revolution. They became the main pillars of the Islamic regime. The increasing gap between the rich and the poor in post-revolutionary Iran and the persistence of poverty, however, have led to the disillusionment of these women. The wife of a man wounded at war (jānbāz) who lives in a poor suburb of Tehran declares: "We are even more disinherited than before the revolution. The Islamic state did not keep its promise. My husband went to the war as a volunteer (basiji) and was severely wounded. What did he obtain in return? Just a wheelchair" (personal interview, Khak-i Sefid 1996).

Young and educated women from religious lower- or middle-class backgrounds who are not subordinated to traditional religious views and aspire to social participation join Islamist movements in order to enhance their active presence in the public sphere. Their aspiration to autonomy, their efforts to reappropriate modernity and to provide new interpretations of religious laws and traditions in order to promote women's status, however, are disapproved of by their male counterparts who consider moves toward women's autonomy and emancipation to be a Western plot against Islam. In post-revolutionary Iran, the implementation of the Shari'a (Islamic law) and the excessive privileges granted to men gradually led to the disillusionment of some young Islamist women, contributing to the emergence of gender sensitivity among them and ultimately to their mobilization against sex discrimination. According to an Iranian Islamist activist: "I realized that revolutionary social activity was meaningless when women were losing their rights and started to defend women's rights" (personal interview, Tehran 1994).

Some radical religious women with a political agenda join Islamist movements to promote their political stands. A'zam Ṭaliqānī, daughter of the radical cleric Ayatollah Maḥmud Ṭaliqānī and the editor of the magazine Payām-i Hājar is an example. Her work for the cause of the disinherited brought her into contact with the plight of women, especially the poor: "Poverty and polygamy are the only things that poor women have obtained from the revolution" (1990). Payām-i Hājar was the first women's magazine to advocate the reinterpretation of Qur'ānic verses, especially al-Nisā (Women) and to refute the legalization of polygamy.

The institutionalization of gender inequality in the aftermath of the Iranian Revolution has provoked general discontent among women, including many former Islamists, and triggered their mobilization against segregation laws and institutions. These women reject divine justifications for gender inequality through a new reading of Islam that accommodates the equality of rights between men and women. Shahlā Shirkat (1996) the editor-in-chief of the influential women's magazine Zanān (Women) argues: "Radical legal changes are needed to solve women's problems. Because many articles of the Civil Code are based on the Shari'a, its reinterpretation proves necessary and women should be involved in this undertaking." Likewise, Zeiba Shorish-Shamley (2001), an Afghan activist, argues that "men and women have equal status in Islam. However, in practice these rights have been violated."

Faced with these intellectual endeavors and women's social struggle for equal rights, a new perspective has emerged among reformist clerics. They now oppose the official and rigid interpretations of Islam that essentialize gender inequalities, and present an evolutionist perspective that attempts to adapt Islam to women's modern demands. Muḥammad Mujtahid-Shabistārī (2000) argues, "The Qur'ān and traditions should be understood and interpreted in the framework of a historical and social approach. The Prophet modified a number of rights and regulations that he considered to be unjust vis-à-vis women. He changed flagrant inequalities that adversely affected women according to the understanding of justice that existed in his time. The main message is that other inequalities imposed on women throughout history should also be abolished."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. 'Abbāsqulizādah and M. Ibtikār, personal interview, Tehran, July 1996.
- M. Bihruzī, Ṭarḥ-i kumīsyūn-i vizieh-i umūr-i zanān dar majlis, in Zan-i Rūz 26 (February 1993), 11–12.
- , Interview, Ettalaat, 22 February 1983, 6, 11.
- R. Khumaynī (Ayatollah Khomeini), sermon on 19 September 1979, in Ṣaḥīfih-yi nūr, ix, Tehran 1989, 136.
- , declaration issued on 12 March 1982, in Ṣaḥīfah-yi nūr, xvii, Tehran 1989, 211.
- A. Kian-Thiébaud, From Islamization to the individualization of women in post-revolutionary Iran, in S. Ansari and V. Martin (eds.), Women, religion and culture in Iran, Richmond, Surrey 2002, 127–42.
- M. Mujtahid-Shabistārī, Naqdī bar qirā'at-i rasmī az dīm, Tehran 2000, 503–4, 509.
- S. J. Muṣṭafavī, Bihisht-i khānavādah, i, Tehran 1995, 118.
- J. Nachtwey and M. Tessler, Explaining women's support for political Islam. Contributions from feminist theory, in M. Tessler (ed.), Area studies and social science. Strategies for understanding Middle East politics, Bloomington, Ind. 1999, 49.
- S. Shirkat, personal interview, Tehran, July 1996.
- Z. Shorish-Shamley, Women's position, role, and rights in Islam, <<http://www.afghan-web.com>, April 2001>.
- A. Ṭāliqānī, interview, in Ettalaat, 3 March 1990, 4
- , personal interview, Tehran, February 1996.

AZADEH KIAN-THIÉBAUD

Mashriq, Egypt, and North Africa

Just as there are differences within any political ideology and movement, Islamism also embodies various competing streams of thought and modalities of engagement. Although all these share the ultimate objective of Islamizing (rendering more Islamic through the application of Shari'a law) both the state institutions and legislation, as well as the society as a whole, they differ radically as to the methods they employ.

Fundamentalism and rising religious extremism are not one and the same phenomenon. Originally, "fundamentalism" was coined to define a Christian movement which was literal in its interpretation of Christian texts in the Western world, and particular to a certain era. While the literal interpretation of texts (be they religious or even non-faith based documents such as legislation) remains an important aspect of fundamentalism, the movements today understood as "religious fundamentalist" vary widely in their composition, objectives, organization, and mode of operation.

Muslim, or Islamic, fundamentalism, is thus a problematic concept – unless used to apply narrowly to those who espouse very literal understandings of the Qur'ān, sunna, and ḥadīth in their lives and outlook. Primarily, fundamentalists may follow a relatively strict interpretation of their religious tradition in their own personal lives. There is, therefore, a substantial difference between Islamic fundamentalists and Islamists. Whereas Islamists organize and distinguish themselves as political parties with an agenda to compete for political and state power (for example, the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Jordan, and Syria, and more extreme, that is, armed, groups such as Jihad in Egypt, Hamas in Palestine, and Hizballah in Lebanon), many fundamentalists abhor political engagement, believing that the entire process of politics is impure at best and corrupting at worst. Some fundamentalists may also be Islamists (that is, belong to Islamic political organizations), but many Islamists are not even well-versed in the religious doctrine per se, and are not literal in their interpretation and practice. In fact, some leading Islamist ideologues, such as Sayyid Quṭb, are credited with being creative and often innovative in their interpretation of text and tradition to adjust to contemporary political discourses.

Religious extremism, in contrast, should be distinguished from both fundamentalism and religious-political movements. Religious extremism exists within all religious traditions and definitions of it vary depending on the vantage point of the researcher or institution. It is present in both the private (personal and family) sphere as well as the larger public (state and society) sphere. At its base, it can be understood as the use of religious discourse to validate violence, in a Machiavellian sense, as a means to a political end. Not all Islamist or fundamentalist movements are extremist since most of them are based on principles that condemn all violence and are committed to investing in and serving society and educating people about religion. Moderate Islamists are known to set up social institutions which perform important social services (health care, shelter provision, education, and the like) and to participate peacefully in electoral politics.

On the political continuum of Islamism the differences in methods veer from the moderate to the extreme. At one end, the moderates believe in gradual Islamic education and awareness raising amongst peoples; active, legal, and peaceful political participation; condemnation of violence as a means to achieving an end; and the importance of actively participating in the social sector (through donations of various forms of resources – personal, financial, or other – to education, health care, welfare services, and so forth). The moderates tend to believe in political participation, democratization, and respect for human rights as principles and standards which are advocated by Islam itself, and will seek to create alliances across the political spectrum.

At the opposite end of the continuum are the radicals, or extremists, many of whom condone the use of violence as a legitimate means to the sanctified objective of spreading the word of God. Most radicals eschew existing political arenas as fundamentally corrupt and opt out of participation, or at worst decide to wage war against the political regime and the society. Some radicals also believe in contributing to social work, but very often such contributions are made available only to a limited circle of partisans.

Some Islamists, therefore, have undertaken to bear arms in a struggle specifically tailored to wreak mass havoc and destruction in order to bring about a more religious (and in their eyes, just) political order, or to consolidate an existing one – such as the Taliban in Afghanistan, and modern day al-Qā'ida (al-Qaeda). Although they are a minority amongst Islamists, and certainly on the wider political spectrum, such extremists are also heard the most and known the best. Partly because many radicals initially tended to embrace a moderate version of political conviction, and later (due to a variety of reasons) veered toward a more radical stance, and because all Islamists ultimately champion the implementation of Shari'a, secular politicians tend to be deeply suspicious of the democratic credentials of Islamists. This is despite the fact that many Islamists assert democratic values of consultation, consensus, and justice.

Women are active members of all these groups: fundamentalists, Islamists, and religious extremists. When the first Islamic political party in the twentieth century – the Ikhwān al-Muslimīn (Muslim Brotherhood) of Egypt – was nearly annihilated by the then president and Arab nationalist leader Gamal Abdel Nasser, it was single-handedly kept alive – despite great odds – by one woman, Zaynab al-Ghazālī. Al-Ghazālī was instrumental in maintaining the infrastructure, and even the ethos of the movement, and eventually went on to become a strong proponent of women's activism within Islamist movements around the Arab and Muslim world.

From India to the United States, women are actively recruiting other women (and men) into fundamentalist movements. As spokespersons for the ideology, as the motors of organizations, and often as ideologues of the need to make women focus on their primary responsibility as mothers and wives, women play an important role in recruiting and mobilizing others within these movements.

As for religious extremists, research into members of Egyptian Jihad and Lebanese Hizballah has shown that there were women, fully and diversely veiled, who were prominent not only during the executive meetings of the movements, but also in undertaking activities which could – and in some cases, did – imperil their lives. Whether discussing strategies of confronting state repression, or carrying arms from one location to another, highly educated and eloquent women were often crucial actors and partners within such extremist movements. In other words, not only are women not absent from religious extremism, but they can be critical to the success of such movements.

Secular women activists in the Arab world claim such participation to be “false consciousness.” Unable to fathom why women would be part of movements which limit women's public roles, secular women activists often regard their female counterparts in Islamist and extremist movements as being either brainwashed or downright unintelligent. Islamist women activists – and to a large extent the women members of extremist movements – in turn, see their secular counterparts in much the same terms: indoctrinated by Western values and agents of corruption. It might be said that no movement is as polarized as the women's movement between the religious and more secular activists.

What must be borne in mind, however, is that the women members of Islamist movements differ widely in and amongst themselves, more so perhaps than their sisters in extremist religious organizations. Indeed, some women Islamists see their engagement within such movements as an empowering reality, and apply this discourse to argue for women's equity and the religious imperative behind women's social, economic, and political advancement in Muslim societies. Whereas secular women activists see the United Nations conventions and civil laws as the means to an enhanced women's status, Islamist women – some of whom are equally keen on the same improvement to women's positions – see the Qur'an (and a more enlightened practice of "the real Islam" more broadly) as the only (and far more powerful) vehicle to achieving this aim.

Even though many Islamist women prioritize women's roles as mothers and wives, some of them argue that, far from limiting women's active participation in the public arena, these roles can also be strategic forms of public engagement. By performing these roles, the proponents argue, women learn and practice important skills that strengthen the family unit (the most important nucleus of any society), which is critical for propagating certain ways of thought and eventually building a powerful national infrastructure that services both dīn wa-dawla (religion and nation). In other words, there is such a thing as "political motherhood." Thus, in an ironic twist on feminist language ("the personal is political"), some Islamist women activists interpret the political to be broader than the traditionally defined public space, and inclusive of the (previously) private domain of family. Hence the family is conceived of as a mini-state, and women, as leaders of that, become important political actors.

Not all Islamist women think along these lines. Nevertheless, it is significant that some of the most vocal political opposition in many parts of the Arab world today – the Islamists – have women leaders who uphold versions of such a philosophy. In so doing, these women are simultaneously being respectful of their religious tradition – as well as very protective of it – and advocating for women's active public service.

There remains a group of women and men, active within fundamentalist and Islamist extremist groups, who openly oppose women occupying any public roles whatsoever and, indeed, feel that many of the rights granted to women in legislation (whether, for example, pay equal to that of men in labor contexts and/or equal access to divorce in some personal status situations) are contrary to the spirit and letter of religious advocacy. Some of the loudest voices in the religious communities in Arab countries today uphold such views, and the cacophony that ensues is fueled by factors which are often not even related to religion. From the point of view of the woman or man on the Arab streets, there is a vacuum where grand mobilizing ideologies such as Nasserism and Arab socialism used to be. Liberalism appears to have failed in everything except increasing the divide between rich and poor, and the democratic deficit. In addition, various governments and regimes, hampered by debt and structural adjustment – thus crippling their ability to provide necessary social services to the most vulnerable constituencies – also appear increasingly emasculated in a foreign policy context that has led to a virtual loss of one land (Palestine) and a recolonization of another (Iraq).

Into this vacuum and seeming chaos, the relative certainty of the unchanging religious texts (and those who speak in its name) is alluring. Where governments offer no mobilizing collective ideology and appear remote from people's needs and wants, religious spokespersons elucidate the justice and inherent communal welfare of the never changing Qur'an. Where governments fail to provide basic social services, Islamists run schools and donate their expertise and time to clinics and hospitals that care for the poor and even provide stipends, pensions, and much more. And where governments appear undermined in political and military conflicts, religious extremists uphold the sanctity of martyrdom in the name of nobler causes. The fact that many Arab governments have also begun to use religious rhetoric means that religious discourse has become a normative form of social and political engagement.

In such a situation, women (and particularly women's bodies) become charged political and cultural symbols. In much the same way that the colors and placement of flags are meant to symbolize various issues, women's bodies also become symbolic of larger issues. In turbulent times, control over women, as the upholders of the honor and integrity of the community and the nation, stands as a potent signifier for political control.

Activists for women's rights in the Muslim world, together with those intellectuals arguing for both moderate Islamic and secular political dynamics, are always attempting to ward off criticisms from two sides: the religious right in their own countries (for whom they are never "authentic" or "Islamic" enough) on the one hand, and the Western right (seeing much of what takes place in the Muslim world as principally anti-Western) on the other. In this situation, a possible third way of thinking politically, socially, culturally, and economically in the Muslim world and amongst Muslim communities, is muted.

Religious discourse has an important role in Arab society. That is not, per se, problematic. Serious challenges are presented, however, in the shape of the abuse of the religious terrain as a result of local democratic deficits, global economic trends, and the subsequent utilization of women as a vehicle to express supremacy in turbulent times. An additional challenge is the inability of many political actors to distinguish between the various forms of religious engagement in the contemporary polity. Were such distinctions as those mentioned earlier made, and if the assumption that fundamentalist movements invariably result in the restriction of women's rights be questioned, there would be important opportunities for strategic alliances to be formed which could address pressing social, political, and economic concerns, while empowering significant sectors of the population.

Success stories have emerged through the realization by some activists that, regardless of their own personal convictions and/or feelings about religion, it continues to play an important role in the average person's life. One of the critiques most frequently leveled against secular women activists is their lack of knowledge of the religious texts, which can be a major hindrance in the process of arguing for certain kinds of social change. Qualified women scholars and activists now form a significant element of the women's movements, providing important advice and argumentation when necessary.

It is also becoming increasingly more evident (even palatable) to many women activists that to bring about social change, it is important to involve all actors in society, including men, but especially religious leaders. The experiences of Egyptian mothers married to non-Egyptian men, and those of Moroccan women in favorably amending their personal status/family laws, point to the importance of mobilizing the male constituency, both secular and – most importantly – religious.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, New York 1994.
 H. Afshar, Islam and Feminisms. An Iranian case study, Houndmills, Basingstoke, U.K. 1998.
 —, Women and politics in the Third World, London 1996.
 D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991.
 A. Karam, Women, Islamisms and state. Contemporary feminisms in Egypt, New York 1998.
 — (ed.), Transnational political Islam. Religion, ideology and power, London 2004.
 — (ed.), A Woman's place. Religious women as public actors, New York 2001.
 V. Moghadam, Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994.
 M. Poya, Women, work and Islamism. Ideology and resistance in Iran, London 2000.

- A. Saad-Ghorayeb, Hizbullah. Politics and religion, London 2003.
 B. Winter, Fundamental misunderstandings. Issues in feminist approaches to Islamism, in Journal of Women's History 13:1 (2001), 9–41.

AZZA M. KARAM

Pakistan

Pakistan is part of a region where the sense of the spiritual is palpably present in ordinary people's lives. Islam is the shared identity of an otherwise heterogeneous, multiethnic, and multilingual country. Islam provides community, ethics, morality, and rituals, understood and practiced in myriad ways, not all of which are accepted by high, scripturalist Islam. Islam is a living oral spiritual tradition, an essential part of women's lives; they understand it in ways that help them make sense of their lives. In this context, a small minority of literate, urban, and relatively privileged women participate in or oppose the Islamist movement.

Islam as personal faith of the literate and the non-literate, Islam as a movement in opposition to oppressive regimes, and Islam as an oppressive theocracy are three distinct phenomena. While the last two in particular are male defined enterprises, Islam as faith may have the least confining or the most liberating potential for women. This potential fast declines in Islamist opposition movements and tends toward gross oppression in theocratic Islamist governments. Pakistan's government has vacillated between military dictatorship and civilian rule or a combination of the two. Ayub Khan (1958–69) liberalized family laws to make them slightly more equitable for women. Zia ul-Haq (1977–88) disenfranchised women to an alarming degree under the pretext of Islamization. The current military ruler, Pervez Musharraf, seems inclined toward undoing Zia ul-Haq's Hudood Ordinances but faces strong opposition from the Islamists within and outside the parliament. The Islamist movement and Islamist elements within the government generate a discourse of "liberation" of women from "Western ignorance." In a Muslim country with a colonial past and with deep sympathies for countries like Afghanistan, Iraq, and Palestine, anti-Western sentiment serves the Islamists well as women's liberation/feminism is presented as a ploy to further destroy the fabric of Muslim life.

Islamist activity revolves around two main axes, personal reform and political ascendancy. Personal reform is carried out through preaching (da'wa) and creation of Islamized space entailing segregation, prayer, fasting, and veiling of women. It does not necessarily ask urban women to return to their homes but endeavors to separate them in public. Women are increasingly engaged in religious, cultural, and social life outside the private realm, but this has not led to a new model of womanhood. Conventional female virtues like modesty, obedience, and self-sacrifice in relation to children and family are still upheld even when women actively engage in public life in ways that were previously inaccessible to them. Political ascendancy entails will to gain political power based on the belief that Islam is the only true religion and that it requires governance according to God given and unchangeable laws. These laws mostly uphold male and Muslim supremacy, surveillance and control of Muslim women's lives, disenfranchisement of religious minorities, and criminalization of sexual minorities. Leadership in the name of God is the prerogative of Muslim men although women are not prohibited from participation at the lower levels.

The thrust of most Islamist movements is to keep women in a subordinate place even after they have gained access to means of self empowerment such as education and paid work in the public sector. Escape from freedom and escape from materialism are given as two reasons for women's willing participation in Islamist movements.

Women continue to be the object and primary victim of Islamist discourse in Pakistan. The so-called Islamization during Zia ul-Haq's military regime and now of the North West Frontier province focuses on reclaiming traditional male privilege, which may seem to be slipping away with the modernization and education of women.

In the vacuum created by a politically stifling and at times treacherous environment, which seriously curtails the possibility of free exchange of ideas between women of various persuasions, secular and religious, Muslim and non-Muslim, it is movements such as al-Huda, led by Dr. Farhat Hashmi, an Islamist female scholar/preacher, that take hold. Dr. Hashmi's organization has gained some following amongst the literate urban women in the major cities of Pakistan. She advocates hijāb and calls women to study the text of the Qur'ān for themselves. She makes the familiar claim that it is the male interpretations of the word of God which have subjugated and oppressed women, and that as women study the Qur'ān themselves they will be liberated. The study of Qur'ān in her centers is limited to a preliminary study of the meaning of the Arabic text in Urdu. Relative to the circumstances of the individual woman Hashmi's message may have some liberating elements. Hashmi's schools have provided a safe haven for modern educated and elite women who are seeking to hold onto a respectable traditional identity while integrating into a male workforce or enjoying the lifestyle of the privileged housewife.

The United States based Pakistani theologian Dr. Riffat Hassan has pointed out that Hashmi does not engage with any real issues of social and economic justice. According to Hassan this is a betrayal of a religion that takes egalitarianism and social justice very seriously. Hashmi, an Islamist and Hassan, a liberation theologian, both rally Muslim women back to an interpretation of a Qur'ān affected by their geographical and ideological location. Neither of them has formulated a cogent theological response to contemporary developments in historical critical studies of Islam.

The work of secular women activists and lawyers is another important context for discussing women and Islamist discourse in Pakistan. According to Hassan the shortcoming of the human rights activism and discourse is its anti-religious stance, which cannot gain root in a religious society like Pakistan. Hassan makes a distinction between a secularism that respects the individual's freedom of choice in matters religious and a secularism that is anti-religious. She considers the work of human rights activists and lawyers, such as Asma Jehangir, to be socially and politically irrelevant in Pakistan because of their "anti-religious" stance. In her critique of Jehangir, Hassan seems to confuse Islam as personal faith with Islam as a theocratic imposition. Hassan proposes that Jehangir assume an American-style religion-friendly secularism in a theocratic state like Pakistan and that she respect "freedom of religion" in a political context where there is very little freedom of religion. Since the almost theocratic Pakistan is a signatory to United Nations documents, in advocating for individuals' rights vis-à-vis the state, having recourse to international standards of human rights (as upheld in documents generated and endorsed by the United Nations) is a valid strategy especially when very few other options are available. On the other hand, discourses that draw on the liberating and empowering elements of the people's own heritage and beliefs may be most relevant and effective as means of empowerment at the grassroots level. However, these may not accord with Hassan's understanding of "ethical-normative" Islam, which she sees as the option that would bring desperately needed positive social change in Pakistan. Hassan's International Network for the Rights of Female Victims of Violence in Pakistan (established 1999), which maintains a chronicle of violence against Pakistani women, is secular and is not used by her as a vehicle for her feminist liberation theology.

The issue may not be how to convince ordinary Pakistani women that they deserve respect and fair treatment. They may already be convinced of it without any reference to either the Qur'an or a United Nations document. The issue may be the question of how they empower themselves vis-à-vis the state and society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- K. Bhasin, R. Menon, and N. S. Khan (eds.), Against all odds. Essays on women, religion, and development from India and Pakistan, New Delhi 1994.
- Z. Hasan, Forging identities. Community, state and Muslim women, Karachi 1996.
- R. Hassan, Woman and the Qur'an, Utrecht, The Netherlands, 2001.
- , Islam and human rights in Pakistan. A critical analysis of the positions of three contemporary women, in Canadian Foreign Policy 9:2 (Winter 2002), 131–56, reprinted in Dawn Review Magazine (Karachi), 7 and 14 November 2002.
- A. Jehangir and H. Jilani, The Hudood Ordinances. A divine sanction? A research study of the Hudood Ordinances and their effect on the disadvantaged sections of Pakistan society, Lahore 1990.
- M. K. Masud, H. D. Shakeel, and H. Jaffery (eds.), International conference on Islamic laws and women in the modern world, Islamabad 1996.
- K. Mumtaz and Y. Mitha, Pakistan, tradition and change, Oxford 1996.
- A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist Movement. South Asia, ii, Pakistan, Delhi 2002

SECONDARY SOURCES

- K. Abou El Fadl, Speaking in God's name. Islamic law, authority and women, Oxford 2001.
- Ibn Warraq (ed.), What the Koran really says. Language, text, and commentary, New York 2002.
- , The quest for the historical Muhammad, New York 2000.
- H. Moghissi, Feminism and Islamic fundamentalism. The limits of post-modern analysis, London 1999.
- L. Ziring, Pakistan at the crosscurrent of history, Oxford 2003

GHAZALA ANWAR

Sub-Saharan Africa

Islamism appeals to millions of women worldwide. The same is true in Sub-Saharan Africa, although expressions and content as well as reasons for adherence vary considerably. Islamist discourse in general finds itself in opposition to aspects of what is perceived and denounced as “Western” modernity. This modernity is characterized by social ills such as loose morality, materialism, substance abuse, alienation, and crime. Islamist discourse and action are directed against these ills: Islamists want to replace the corrupt modern order with an Islamic one, based on the revelation of God. The resistance to Western modernity is but one aspect of Islamism. In Sub-Saharan Africa in particular, Islamist reaction against “traditional” Islam makes for a second religious-ideological pillar. Sufi mysticism – the Islam of the majority of African Muslims – and the practice of saint worship, a widespread “traditional” Islamic practice, are considered as illegitimate innovations and in principle are heavily condemned by Islamists. The Islamist actions and discourse, however, must be contextualized in their particular local settings. Islamist leaders, groups, and individuals – men and women – operate in a given sociopolitical context that informs their actions. These are not everywhere the same. For example, African Islamists do not all hold the same position on the issue of women going out in public. Women will not necessarily join Islamist movements for the same reasons, nor do they always give their membership the same meaning or content. Women and men develop various strategies for negotiating space and power within a given society. Islam and Islamism are, like other institutions or ideologies, instrumental in this process of constant renegotiation.

Islamism has been credited for widening the scope of the participation of women in public life, religiously as well as intellectually. Mosque attendance, not common for women in Sub-Saharan Africa, is not an exclusively male practice any more. This is beginning to become noticeable in the architectural set-up of Islamist mosques throughout Africa, which explicitly provide space for women to pray. Old, traditional mosques only had a small space for elderly women; younger women stayed at home and prayed there (Cantone 2002). Islamist movements have been very active in the field of modern Islamic education, aimed at men and women. The Senegalese Islamist association, Jamaatu Ibadu Rahmane, successfully runs a number of primary and secondary schools in various parts of the country. These schools provide an innovative kind of Islamic education: they teach Islamic sciences, but also recognize the importance of “marketable skills,” such as mathematics, computer science, and language education. About half of the pupils in the primary schools are girls. Through this Islamic education, acceptable even to more “traditional” Muslims who have not been particularly concerned with female education, girls are given independent Islamic knowledge as well as worldly skills they can usefully employ in later life (Renders 2003). The result of the Islamist initiative in Senegal was that “traditional” Muslims, notably the potent Sufi brotherhoods, followed their example and started their own programs accessible to both boys and girls. In Nigeria, the late 1970s saw the start of the campaign for new Islamic education of the Islamist organization Yan Izala. A major reason for success of Yan Izala in Nigeria was their efforts to start schools and to advocate women’s education. The same phenomenon can be seen in Eastern Africa (Loimeier 1997).

The most significant contribution of Islamism in comparison to traditional Sufi Islam seems to be the possibility for both Muslim men and Muslim women to gather and master religious knowledge independently. Women are enabled to participate more actively in the public sphere as Muslims in their own right. A woman submits herself directly to God, as a Muslim individual. She does not need an intermediary such as her father or her husband. In principle, she is an independent, thinking human being with direct access to religious knowledge. Islamist organizations organize Arabic classes for women, who will be able to study original sources independently. Sometimes religious material is provided in the local language, written or on audiotape, which makes the effort easier for women without formal schooling. Whereas in the traditional practice the Qur’anic school laid the basis for the women’s – very elementary – religious education, which was completed by her husband, now young girls can go to Islamic institutes before marriage (Tagueem Fah 2002). An Islamist woman is by no means in all instances secluded – she is often able to lead an active social life and become a member of the Islamist associations. However, this does not mean that women have an actual role in the decision-making process of Islamist movements, which are invariably led by men. Women’s authority in religious matters is also not valued equally with men’s. Yet women’s access to Islamic knowledge could potentially change the context in which sociopolitical interaction takes place.

Islamist women often have their own subgroups and associations, such as the Muslim Sisters Organization in Nigeria, the female branch of the Muslim Students Society (MSS). The MSS also participated in the formation of the Federation of Muslim Women’s Association of Nigeria (Barkindo 1993). In the northwest of the now imploded Somali Republic, Islamist women have organized religious study groups. The members come together once a week, for example on Thursday night at the beginning of the weekend, to listen to a lecture by a shaykh, to watch a film or to read a book, and to discuss their findings and questions. Participants in the sessions are well-to-do and well educated, businesswomen, or even university graduates who have had an international experience. They are critical of traditional Somali Sufism, not so much in the theological sense, but rather in its social implications, notably the widespread male consumption of qāt, a mild narcotic leaf imported from Ethiopia. They argue that according to real Islam one has to be useful to society and denounce the men who sit down all day to chew qāt claiming it is “something religious” (Ali 2002).

In the process of political and social positioning of Islamist organizations, moral issues are often very prominent in the discourse. Women’s issues are considered of paramount importance in the proper exercise of Islamic morality. Therefore, the Muslim woman and her perceived role and duties as a daughter, spouse, and mother are hotly debated issues. In fact, they have never before been so central to the discussions and controversies between different Islamic groups as well as between Islamist groups and the secular state. Family planning in particular is a bone of contention for Islamist movements. The 1994 United Nations conference on population and development held in Cairo provoked passionate reactions. A number of Muslim organizations chose at the instigation of the Senegalese government to participate in Réseau islam et population, an organization working to promote means of family planning – notably birth spacing – acceptable to Islamic scholars and the religious leaders of the Sufi brotherhoods. The Réseau caused a major stir-up, even within the organization itself, when they took the initiative of promoting the use of condoms in an AIDS awareness campaign. The actions of the Réseau are abhorred by the Islamists. To them, the only acceptable protection against AIDS is abstinence. In the case of married couples, birth control is not acceptable under any circumstance. The Islamist Jamaatu Ibadu Rahmane accused the government and the Sufi Muslim organizations of immorality and of collaboration with the vicious strategy of Western neo-Malthusianism. The “satanic programme geared at the depopulation of the planet” was attributed to Western fears of “new barbarian invasions” and “the pressure of feminist movements wanting to cause women to revolt by allowing them to decide by themselves about issues of procreation” (Le Musulman 1994, 4–5).

Yet, concerning other issues, the position of the Islamists is progressive compared to the opinions of other Muslim individuals and organizations. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is a widely accepted practice in the whole of Eastern Africa. Social pressure to perform the operation is very strong. In Somalia, where the prevalence of FGM approaches nearly 98 percent, it is Islamist organizations such as al-Ittihad and al-Islah who strongly condemn the practice and actively work against it. The Somalis practice the “pharaonic” variety of FGM (infibulation) resulting in serious risks for girls’ and women’s health. The Somali Islamists consider it forbidden in Islam to harm one’s own body. Al-Ittihad women move around in public wearing a burqa-like attire, with only a small space for the eyes. Sometimes they even wear stockings and gloves in the often extremely hot desert climate. But the girls do not have to undergo FGM. In Somalia, as elsewhere in Sub-Saharan Africa, it is this non-traditional attire of the women that distinguishes them visibly as members of Islamist groups. The practice of fully covering the head and body is in most instances a recent phenomenon, imported by the Islamists. Although in many Sub-Saharan regions Islam has been present for many centuries, the women did not usually cover their hair, except for prayer.

Where and under what circumstances a woman’s honor – and therefore the honor of her male relatives – is considered to be in jeopardy is not univocally determinable. In some instances, mixing of men and women in public is problematic in the view of African Islamists. In others it is not: “Islamic” dress is viewed as sufficient to guarantee the prevention of vice. The prevailing approach varies and is likely to depend on a particular sociopolitical situation and context. In the case of Nigeria, in 1983 a number of Muslim politicians, including the leader of the Islamist Yan Izala, Abubakar Gumi, started a campaign for wider participation of women in Nigerian politics. This move was informed by the hope that a Muslim candidate would win the presidential election. Abubakar Gumi appealed to Muslim men to allow their wives and daughters to register for the election and to go out and cast their votes, for as Gumi phrased it: “politics is more important than prayer.” His position was condemned by a number of his opponents as outright heresy. Yet Gumi took matters even further when he stated that the election was to be considered a jihad. Muslims had to protect their religion: if Muslim women did not vote, a non-Muslim would win. Eventually, a Muslim did win the election due to the mobilization of the Muslim women’s vote. The same arguments were used again in the next local government election. On that occasion, the leader of Yan Izala in Kaduna declared that Muslim women could leave their houses without any problem, as long as they dressed properly. Men preventing their wives from registering for the vote would feel sorry afterwards, “because the wrong people would be voted to power” (Loimeier 1997).

In some cases Islamist movements have stimulated social emancipation among Muslim women. This emancipation is not really driven by Islamist ideology per se. On the one hand, women are recognized as Muslims able to acquire religious knowledge independently. On the other hand, the issue of morality in the Islamist discourse puts the greatest burden on women. It seems that the sociopolitical context and the power relations in a given situation are of paramount importance in determining Islamist discourse concerning gender issues. Women in Islamist movements also have to act within an existing context. Relations between men and women as well as among the women themselves within an Islamist organization is a matter of day-to-day negotiation. It is not unthinkable that Islamism in female branches of Islamist movements will ultimately develop its own dynamic. But this depends on what is possible in a given context and on the agency of the relevant actors – men and women – themselves.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Amran Ali, businesswoman, interview with the author, Hargeysa, 3 June 2002.
Le Musulman (journal of the Jamaatu Ibadu Rahmane) 47 (1994).

SECONDARY SOURCES

- B. M. Barkindo, Growing Islamism in Kano city since 1970. Causes, form and implications, in L. Brenner (ed.), Muslim identity and social change in Sub-Saharan Africa, London 1993, 91–105.
 C. Cantone, Radicalisme au féminin? Les filles voilées et l’appropriation de l’espace dans les mosquées à Dakar, paper presented at conference on L’islam politique en Afrique Subsaharienne d’hier à aujourd’hui. Discours, trajectoires et réseaux, Université Paris VII Denis Diderot, 28–9 October 2002.
 R. Loimeier, Islamic reform and political change. The example of Abubakar Gumi and the Yan Izala movement in northern Nigeria, in D. Westerlund and E. Evers Rosander (eds.), African Islam and Islam in Africa. Encounters between Sufis and Islamists, London 1997, 286–307.
 M. Renders, Muslim organisations and the discourse of “development” in Senegal, in Journal of Religion in Africa 32:1 (2003), 61–81.
 G. Taguem Fah, Pouvoir du savoir. Renouveau islamique et luttes politiques au Cameroun, paper presented at conference on L’islam politique en Afrique Subsaharienne d’hier à aujourd’hui. Discours, trajectoires et réseaux, Université Paris VII Denis Diderot, 28–9 October 2002.

Sudan

With a legacy of Sufi-inspired Mahdism in the nineteenth century and with Sufi-organized political sectarianism dominating northern Sudanese politics from that century on, Sudan's middle-class, modernist Islamist revolution of 1989, promulgated through a military coup d'état, can, in a number of ways, be seen as a model of an attempt to build a Sunni republic. Significant aspects of its modernist character have been the mobilization of public consciousness of citizenship in an Islamic state and the conspicuous gendering of the processes involved.

Islamist women activists have been among the most politically active women in Sudan's history and were instrumental in the gaining of power by the Islamist regime. The National Islamic Front (NIF), the initial guiding party of the revolution, is an off-shoot of the Muslim Brotherhood (Ikhwān); women began their activism early within both of these movements.

In building an Islamic nation particular hegemonic strategies were developed. Among northern Muslims (Muslims comprising perhaps two-thirds of the population and unarguably being politically dominant) women have both been constructed and have constructed themselves as the woman citizen – Muslim, mother, teacher, student, socializer of Islamic values, political organizer, and militia member. State hegemonic strategies have involved the manipulation of gender and other identities, especially as these are manifested in the fashioning of this “new Muslim woman.” Women have been fashioned through the media (especially television); the schools (where palpable changes in the curriculum have been made to accommodate the religious ideology of the state); the legal apparatuses (through the enforcement of particular aspects of Sharī'a); and through community organizations, which were working to develop an “authentic” Sudanese culture, one based on Islamic identity that was to supersede Arab identity. In this way women could see themselves as oppressed in the past by Arab patriarchy but potentially liberated by Islam. Women's complicity in and resistance to these constructions are among the dynamics of contemporary northern Sudan.

The discourse that framed women within the Islamist movement was generated by both men and women and was contested, leading to societal debates about the roles of women. The leading ideologue of the NIF, Ḥasan al-Turābī, took a modernist and liberal approach to the role of women, arguing that the Islamic movement in Sudan had developed its own version of equality for women and was not reliant on the West for its ideas. He claimed that the Islamist movement presented no obstacles to women advancing or holding a position anywhere in society (Lowie 1993, 46–7). Women ideologues of the NIF, while also disavowing Western influence, nonetheless coopted some of the discourse of Western feminism. In framing women within Islamist discourse, activist Su'ād al-Fāṭih al-Badawī distanced herself from the idea of separatist roles for men and women and opted for a complementarity approach, namely, that “men and women complete and perfect each other.” Al-Badawī stressed the responsibility educated women have to raise the consciousness of others (al-Badawī 1986).

Of enormous interest to the Islamist regime was the gender division of labor, which ideologues and state officials were attempting to transform. In the post-independence period (after 1956) women had begun to move into most economic spheres and occupations. Because girls soon began to compete with and often outscore boys in the Sudan School Certificate examination, they were channeled into the most prestigious university faculties. By the 1980s conservative Islamists saw a distortion of a healthy gender division of labor that promoted Islamic values. When the NIF began its rise to power, the gender division of labor was re-evaluated and changes made. Women's activism within political Islam had first been in the schools as teachers of Islamic principles, as organizers and teachers within nursery schools set up in mosques, in neighborhood medical clinics, and in various Islamic charity organizations. Politicized religious women also permeated the ranks of various lower and middle-rung civil service jobs, taking over these jobs from dismissed non-hijāb-wearing liberal and leftist women. Once the NIF took power, Islamist women continued to move into the universities in large numbers, but were admitted into the fields sanctioned by the movement rather than other fields of study deemed inappropriate for women. Within the faculty of medicine, for example, women were encouraged to study general medicine and eschew such lucrative fields as surgery or even obstetrics.

The Islamist movement in Sudan, although a modernity project, fostered tight control over women's sexuality (for example, monitoring relations with men, controlling dress and public “moral” behavior, regulating birth control, forcing group weddings, and encouraging female circumcision) and positioned women in ways that served the regime. Women, for their part, both struggled against these assignments and collaborated in their creation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. F. al-Badawī, article in al-Ṣaḥāfa (Khartoum), 3 May 1986, 10.
 M. Badran, Khartoum's answer to Beijing, in Al-Abram Weekly, 5–11 September 1996a.
 S. Hale, Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism, and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
 —, "The new Muslim woman." Sudan's National Islamic Front and the invention of identity, in Muslim World 86:2 (1996b), 177–200.
 A. L. Lowie (ed.), Islam, democracy, the state and the West. A round table with Dr. Hasan Turabi, Tampa 1993.

SONDRA HALE

Turkey

Turkey is one of those countries where reaction against the ambivalent consequences of modernization assumed the form of identity politics, and where an Islamist movement pushed the Muslim woman's "covered identity" to the center of the debates surrounding secularism, modernization, and Westernization.

In the mid-1980s when civil society began to flourish in Turkey, Islamist women's groups also took their place among the numerous civil initiatives. Although part of a general Islamist movement that was an outlet to express political dissatisfaction caused by the sharp social, economic, and politico-cultural cleavages in the Turkish system, the Islamist women's groups had their own specificities. They organized primarily in defense of their right to wear headscarves, especially in the universities, and to promote an Islamic way of life in general. Women, supported by men, engaged in public demonstrations and boycotts, and the battle given in defense of the headscarf was interpreted as an act of protest by the general public against the secular state. The 1990s witnessed a new yet vigorous activism by these women who organized in the Ladies' Commissions of the (Islamist) Welfare Party. They contributed considerably to the electoral victories of this party both at the local (1994) and national (1995) levels by registering almost one million members to its ranks in six years. However, to their disappointment, women were pushed backstage immediately after the elections.

The activism of Islamist women was echoed in various publications, pamphlets, and books, which led to a heated debate over women's issues among themselves. It also drew the attention of non-Islamist women academicians and feminists resulting in a proliferation of academic work on Islamist women. Although very careful about not calling themselves "Muslim feminists" and always keeping their distance from feminism, which they claimed to be a Western import corrupting especially women, Islamist women nevertheless tried from within an Islamic framework to develop emancipatory agendas for women. Both female and male Islamist writers tried to steer a middle course between interpretations of sociopolitical and cultural realities (veiling and segregation, for example) of Islam and the universal human rights discourse. In their effort to assert that there is complete gender equality in Islam they pointed to the chasm between the message of the Qur'an (egalitarianism) and the manner in which it is historically interpreted, and argued that it is "tradition tainted by Judaism" and not Islam as such that has oppressed women; thus a return to the sources – the Qur'an and the sunna – was to be sought (Aktaş 1991, Akdemir 1991, Kırbaoğlu 1991).

Islamist women's activism provided an opportunity for marginalized women to seek empowerment (Arat 1999, 89), yet it also demonstrated the limits of an identity politics based on religiously sanctioned biological essentialism of bodily difference. According to Islamist writers, gender roles were God given, therefore fixed and unchangeable; anyone attempting to change them or blur the boundaries between them was in rebellion against God and showed a "pathological nafs situation" (Hatemi 1991, 329). In the process of modernization, doubly burdened with wage work and family responsibilities, women had lost their identity as women and the only solution lay in reinforcing traditional gender roles. Therefore it was complementarity and not equality that women should demand. A prominent Islamist woman writer, Cihan Aktaş, argued that the feminist movement, in seeking equality with men and ignoring "women's fitrat," failed to acknowledge the importance of women's roles as mothers and homemakers; Islam had given woman the position of helpmate to man, not his enemy. Aktaş, while demanding a more active life for women and their right to enter the public domain, at the same time endorsed the concept of women's fitna (the destructive effects of woman's potential for creating discord in the community): "If women will be shut in the home, then what is the rationale for veiling and covering? Is this [covering] not the way to ensure women's participation in the social arena without her giving way to fitna?" (Aktaş 1991, 255).

Islamist women's struggle to question the fairness of republican secularism that excluded them from the public domain is part of women's general critique and contestation of the republican project of modernity, which failed to ensure full equal rights and responsibilities of citizenship for them. However, it was the view of the women's movement that gender inequality was not only due to the failure of the "liberal contract" but also to the deeply patriarchal religio-cultural context of the country. It was here that the Islamist and secular women parted ways. Islamist women stopped short of challenging the dominant patriarchal order, and moreover, "otherized" all women reluctant to accept an Islamic lifestyle. The body of the covered woman was declared "sacred" whereas that of the secular woman a "sexual object," and she was seen as an accomplice of the secular "lowly moral order" (Aktaş 1984, Gülnaz 1996, Çaha 1996).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Acar, Women in the ideology of Islamic revivalism in Turkey. Three Islamic women's journals, in R. L. Tapper (ed.), Islam in modern Turkey. Religion, politics and literature in a secular state, London 1991, 280-303.
- S. Akdemir, Tarih boyunca ve Kuran-ı Kerim'de kadın, in Journal of Islamic Research 4 (1991), 260-70.
- C. Aktaş, Sömürü odağında kadın, İstanbul 1984.
- , Kadının toplumsallaşması ve fitne, in Journal of Islamic Research 4 (1991), 51-9.
- , Tesettür ve toplum, İstanbul 1991.
- Y. Arat, Political Islam in Turkey and women's organizations, İstanbul 1999.
- , Group-differentiated rights and the liberal democratic state. Rethinking the headscarf controversy in Turkey, in New Perspectives on Turkey 25 (Fall 2001), 31-46.
- F. Berktaş, Grenzen der Identitätspolitik und Islamistische Frauenidentität, in B. Pusch (ed.), Die neue muslimische Frau, Würzburg 2001, 67-87.
- , Islamic concept of gender equality, in N. Arat (ed.), Mediterranean women and democracy, İstanbul 2002, 107-21.
- A. Bulaç, İnsan, örtü ve medeniyet, in İzlenim (July-August 1995), 4-6.
- Ö. Çaha, Sivil kadın, Ankara 1996.
- R. Çakır, Direnış ve itaat, İstanbul 2000.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern, Ann Arbor 1996.
- M. Gülnaz, Suyu tersine akıtanlar, in Birikim 91 (1996), 66-9.
- H. Hatemi, İslamın kadına bakışı, in Journal of Islamic Research 4 (1991), 328-31.
- A. İlyasoğlu, Örtülü kimlik, İstanbul 1994.
- M. H. Kırbaşoğlu, Kadın konusunda Kuran'a yöneltilen başlıca eleştiriler, in Journal of Islamic Research 4 (1991), 271-83.
- N. Narlı, Modernization, political Islam and women, in N. Arat (ed.), Mediterranean women and democracy, İstanbul 2002, 91-96.
- A. Saktanber, Becoming the "other" as a Muslim in Turkey. Turkish women vs Islamist women, in New Perspectives on Turkey 11 (1994), 99-134.

FATMAGÜL BERKTAŞ

Political-Social Movements: Islamist Movements and Discourses and Religious Associations

Canada

The role of women in the rise and development of Islamic organizations in Canada is one of extraordinary and unique efforts owing to the wide diversity of people, cultures, races, languages, and ethnicities within the Muslim Canadian community and the Canadian mosaic at large.

The Islamic organization is the primary venue in which Muslims express and safeguard their identity. In 1963, Muslim university students founded the Muslim Students Association of the United States and Canada (MSA), consisting of 13 chapters across the United States. In 1967, the MSA encompassed 36 chapters across North America and by 1970 the number had risen to 68. The establishment of the MSA took place almost one century after Muslims first arrived in Canada. History records the first Muslim presence in Canada as Agnes and James Love, a Scottish couple who gave birth to the first Canadian Muslim child in 1854. The first wave of Muslim immigration began in 1880, and a second wave arrived following the First World War. The third and major wave of Muslim immigration came to Canada following the Second World War.

The multicultural nation-state par excellence fully welcomed the new waves of refugees and immigrants fleeing from repressive governments or simply seeking an opportunity for an enhanced life. Educational pursuits were swiftly fulfilled, jobs obtained, and Muslims contributed economically to the multicultural society. From a mere 13 Muslims in 1871 to 98,165 in 1981, and 579,640 in 2001, organizational bodies sprouted up across Canada revealing the Canadian Muslim presence, of which the first was the MSA.

In the initial stages of development of the MSA, most of the Muslim university students, predominantly international students, were men. (In Canada the MSA membership included, in addition to students, those immigrants who had already established themselves in the workplace). Consequently the executive committee was comprised of only men. Eventually, wives of the male MSA members became involved as members of the MSA in their own right. Most of the menial tasks in the MSA fell to women; these included assisting in the typing and editing of the first MSA publication, al-Ittihad, and organizing and founding numerous structured fundraising projects, such as the bazaar at each MSA Convention. Consequently, most of the financial resources of the MSA can be attributed to the efforts of its female members. The financial contribution in addition to other behind-the-scenes work of women formed the backbone of the historical movement.

In 1968, the MSA created a women's subcommittee as a means for female members to voice their opinions as well as to initiate projects within the organization. In 1972, Khadija Haffajee, of South African descent, was the first woman to lecture from an MSA platform. Subsequently, she rose to the position of Canadian Zonal MSA Representative for women in 1978, a position she held until 1986. During this period, she was the only woman present at the MSA National meetings in Canada. Furthermore, Haffajee was the first Canadian woman to become chairperson of the Women's Committee for MSA Continental in 1982. This position involved overseeing projects conducted mainly by women, which included developing educational literature and hosting religious learning circles and camps. These endeavors fostered some of the most prominent contemporary women activists in North America.

In MSA chapters that were dominated by foreign attitudes and/or cultural paradigms, women were not publicly or visibly involved. Nonetheless, in other chapters, women easily occupied advisory and/or executive positions, including that of president. This phenomenon is widely observed commencing in the 1990s when the children of those who came to North America in the 1960s and 1970s (the generation which initiated the MSA) entered university or college and became a predominant part of the MSA themselves (as first generation Canadians/Americans). Currently, in 2003, the Continental MSA Executive, which at one point was all male, consists of five women and three men, while a female president heads at least 25 percent of the MSA-affiliated chapters. However, maintaining a presidency position does not determine the extent and/or level of women's activism within the MSA since some women implement an equally strategic and active position by assuming a behind-the-scenes role.

As an increasing number of MSA members graduated to become professionals in their communities, it became apparent that a different type of organization was required. Thus the Islamic Society of North America (ISNA) was formed in 1983. From the onset, the organizational structure included a women's committee to oversee women-related issues through which female members participated in initiatives similar to those they were involved in within the MSA sphere. Haffajee became the first ISNA Canadian Zonal Representative of the women's committee from the beginning of ISNA's existence. In 1997, 13 years after ISNA's inception, Haffajee was elected as the first and only woman on the Majlis al-Shura, ISNA's highest decision-making body. Currently another woman, Dr. Ingrid Mattson, who is also a Canadian but resides in the United States, holds the position of ISNA Vice-President (USA).

The next stepping stone after the establishment of ISNA was the Muslim Youth of North America (MYNA), founded for the children of those in ISNA. This group, dedicated to youth in junior and senior high school, originated in 1985, partially as an initiative by the youth themselves. Females and males hold the positions of continental president or zonal representatives and thus travel to annual meetings and mobilize their respective regions, maintain executive positions, give lectures, and chair meetings. MYNA, similar to the MSA, falls under the umbrella of ISNA.

As a result of MSA's continued success and fortitude, numerous organizations evolved throughout the United States and Canada. In 1971, a handful of MSA members developed a study circle in order to intensify their Islamic education. Eventually, this study circle labeled itself the Islamic Circle of North America (ICNA). The founding members were both men and women with separate yet parallel executive bodies. The ICNA Ladies' Wing organizes activities for Muslim women across North America, such as Qur'an and hadith-based study circles, training camps, and programs to teach non-Muslims about Islam.

In 1997, an organization was founded with objectives and an organizational structure similar to that of ICNA, but dedicated solely to Canada: the Muslim Association of Canada (MAC). Currently women host separate executives but liaise at certain junctures with corresponding male members. However, women participate at almost every level of the association, such as maintaining positions in the National Convention and on the Board of Trustees, which are the association's highest bodies, as well as spearheading youth committees in which they are responsible for coordinating youth activities for both men and women.

As the Muslim community in Canada continued to grow, several Islamic organizations formed in order to present a more accurate portrayal of Islam and Muslims in Canada. The Council of American Islamic Relations (CAIR) was founded in the United States in 1994, with the launching of the CAIR-Canada chapter in 2000. Some of CAIR-Canada's tasks are to monitor local and national media in order to challenge stereotypes, work for human rights causes, host information seminars and workshops, distribute action alerts, and advance inter-community relations. Dr. Sheema Khan, a woman activist, is the founder and current chairperson of CAIR-Canada and is thus responsible for overseeing all endeavors. The Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) was formed in 1998 with constructive objectives such as to educate Canadians about Islam and Muslims, and to network with all levels of government, academia, and non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Wahida Chishti Valiante, a family counselor, is one of the founding members and vice president of CIC. While overseeing the various CIC initiatives, she lectures regularly at both national and international conferences, and is a published author of major research papers related to media and social work. CAIR and CIC executive members and members-at-large consist of men and women who may fulfill parallel roles within media-related organizations.

The contribution of Muslim women in the development of the masjid – a place for worship, education, community functions, and recreation – has varied across Canada since the establishment of the first mosque in Canada on 12 December 1938, founded and for which funds were raised by pioneer Canadian Muslim women, until the present day. This is primarily due to the diversity of people, cultures, races, and ethnicities within Islam and the Muslim community. In some mosques women maintain executive positions, chair meetings, organize events, and deliver lectures, whereas in other mosques these roles are uncommon. The imam, the governing council of the mosque, and/or cultural differences play a major factor in determining how a woman may contribute within the mosque.

Canadian-based Muslim women's organizations such as the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW 1982) and the Federation of Muslim Women (FMW 1997) serve as catalysts for Muslim women to attain a voice within the larger Islamic movement and the Canadian community as a whole. These organizations mirror identical objectives and maintain a similar role to the MSA and ISNA women's subcommittees that presided in the early years of the two organizations.

The role of Muslim women in the development of the Islamic organizations in Canada is one of remarkable and diverse endeavors. Women have assisted in building a dynamic Islamic Canadian community with over 650,000 Muslims. It represents the history of a people who wish to maintain a proper decorum between men and women yet simultaneously align with the community at large. Despite the challenges created by numerous cultures, languages, races, and over 60 ethnicities within the Muslim community, Islam provides a democratic environment for a multiplicity of views to be thoroughly discussed. Canada, a country propagating multiculturalism, is a genuine land of opportunity in which to practice Islam in its purest form.

In conjunction with the chosen mandates of each organization and mosque, Muslim women on mosque executive committees and within core Canadian Islamic organizations utilize the Qur'ān and the sunna as their model for activism. This influential and formidable activism mirrors outstanding and influential women at the time of the Prophet who participated in the rise and development of every dimension of the Prophet's society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- O. B. Abdullah, Springboard to a reality, in Horizons (May/June 2003), 43–53.
- O. Alam, Women in MSA. From leaders on campuses to leaders in communities, unpublished paper.
- S. Ali, Birthing a movement, in Horizons (May/June 2003), 18–19.
- , The founding mothers, in Horizons (May/June 2003), 20–1.
- S. Azmi, Canadian social service provision and the Muslim community in metropolitan Toronto, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 17 (1997), 153–66.
- J. Badawi, Gender equity in Islam. Basic principles, Plainfield, Ind. 1995.
- A. Bewley, Islam. The empowering of women, London 1999.
- R. Bothwell and J. L. Granatstein, Our century. The Canadian journey, Toronto 2000.
- M. D. Bryant, Some notes on Muslims in Canada and the USA, in Hamdard Islamicus 24 (2001), 7–10.
- K. Bullock, Rethinking Muslim women and the veil, Herndon, Va. 2002.
- Y. Y. Haddad, A century of Islam in America, Muslim World Today Occasional Paper No. 4, Washington, D.C. 1986, reprinted in Hamdard Islamicus 21:4 (1997), 1–12.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim communities in North America, Albany, N.Y. 1994.
- D. H. Hamdani, Muslims and Christian life in Canada, in Journal Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 1 (1979), 51–9.
- , Muslims in the Canadian mosaic, in Journal Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 5 (1984), 7–16.
- , Canada's Muslims. An unnoticed part of our history, in Hamdard Islamicus 20 (1997), 97–100.
- , Canadian Muslims on the eve of the twenty-first century, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 21 (1999), 197–209.
- , A century of Islam in Canada, in Horizons (May–June 2002), 18–22.
- , Muslims and Islam in Canada, in M. M'Bow and A. Kettani (eds.), Islam and Muslims in the American Continent, Beirut 2001. See also <<http://muslimcanada.org/cdnmuslm.htm>>.
- A. Kettani, Muslim minorities in the world today, London 1986.
- A. W. Lorenz, Canada's pioneer mosque, in Aramco World 49 (1998), 28–31.
- A. Lotfi, Creating Muslim space in the USA. Masājid and Islamic centers, in Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 12 (2001), 235–54.
- Y. al-Qaraḍāwī, Markaz al-mara' fi al-ḥayā al-Islāmiyya, Amman 1996.

NADIRA MUSTAPHA

Political-Social Movements: Millenarian

South Asia

Islam, as a religion of revelation, began as an apocalyptic movement anticipating the Day of Judgment, and retains apocalyptic and millennial elements to this day, especially in Shia theology, but also in many forms of popular religiosity. In particular, the mujaddid tradition, that foresees a “renewer” at every century turn (A.H.), appears to constitute – before the century has turned – a form of apocalyptic messianic expectation in the coming of the hidden Mahdī. South Asian Islam, however, in comparison with other parts of the world, has not been particularly renowned for the presence of millenarian movements. This absence of significant millenarian tendencies in South Asia can be linked, on the one hand, to the strong Sufi and syncretic traditions that have flourished for much of the period since Islam was introduced to the subcontinent in the early eighth century C.E. On the other hand, South Asian Islam has also encompassed a tradition of reform movements, which have sometimes acted as powerful vehicles for Islamic renewal and resurgence. It is, therefore, in the context of these kinds of reforming impulses that millenarian-style trends have periodically surfaced.

The millenarian idea that divine or supernatural intervention will bring about a reversal of worldly expectations resulting in an earthly paradise tends to appeal to those who are dispossessed both culturally and economically. This has been the case in South Asia where such movements have arisen during periods of great social or political uncertainty, or during crises of one sort or another. However, unlike other parts of the so-called Muslim world, these millenarian impulses did not necessarily revolve around a central Mahdī figure. All the same, they were usually associated with charismatic male leaders, whose leadership skills proved essential to the dynamics of the movement, as reflected in the title of mujaddidi-i (renewer of the faith) by which they often came to be known. The millenarian movements that made the greatest impact in South Asia emerged from the eighteenth century onwards, and were often linked with the concept of jihad (holy war), thus involving some degree of popular uprising directed at the overthrow of infidel power, which was regarded as essential if the Islamic community were going to be able to renew its strength and vigor. Inevitably perhaps, bearing in mind the gender norms associated with South Asian Muslims during this period, it is virtually impossible to find concrete evidence of female involvement in such movements, but, as with any populist uprising, it is possible that female sympathizers backed their male relatives’ participation by looking after affairs at home while the men carried on the struggle elsewhere. The problem is to identify such activity in the patchy source material that is available.

Early Mahdist movements, with millenarian associations, were connected with the completion of the first one thousand years of the Muslim era. In South Asia, they took definite form through the teachings of Mīr Sayyid Muḥammad of Jaunpur in the later fifteenth century C.E., who claimed that a voice from heaven had whispered to him “Thou art the Mahdī.” Other Mahdīs emerged during this period in different parts of the subcontinent, but, on the whole, they were educated men who possessed great oratorical power as preachers, tended to be hostile to established elites at court and within the ranks of the ‘ulamā, and claimed to be renovators of Islam, that is mujaddidūn. Perhaps the best known example of this millenarian tendency was Shaykh Aḥmad Sirhindī (1564–1624), given the honorific title of Mujaddid-i alf-i thānī (Renewer of the second millennium). As a young man he learned the fundamentals of Sufism from his father. Later he was initiated into the Naqshbandī order. Toward the end of his life, his reputation as “renewer of the faith” was established when he was viewed by his followers as the renovator expected to arrive at the beginning of the second millennium after Muḥammad on account of his efforts to purify Islam and restore its traditional orthodoxy. His stand against what he perceived as anti-Islamic practices in India helped to bring about a religious renaissance. To counteract the forces of heresy, which he believed had been encouraged by the religious innovations associated with the Mughal Emperor Akbar, he sent trained disciples out to towns and cities across the subcontinent in order to propagate what he regarded as the true spirit of Islam. How far his ideas penetrated the world of Muslim women remains impossible to quantify, though it is known that he married a woman belonging to a noble family and that it was through personal links and correspondence with noblemen and courtiers that he was able to bring some pressure to bear on the court of Akbar's successor, Jahāngīr.

The shaykh fought for the suppression of all innovation (bid'ā) introduced into Islamic culture, but, on the whole, his exhortations to this effect were general and rarely attacked specific deviations. However, in one letter, addressed unusually to an anonymous Sufi woman, he did elaborate on the innovations peculiar to Muslims in India, and attributed many of them to the greater tendency of women than men to perform blameworthy actions. Utter stupidity on their part, he claimed, meant that women prayed to stones and idols and asked for their help to such an extent, especially at such times of crisis as when smallpox struck, that virtually all Indian Muslim women were involved in polytheistic practices of one sort or another. Likewise, their celebration of Hindu festivals such as Diwali, and their insistence on sacrificing animals at the tombs of Sufi saints, meant that they had violated the conditions upon which the Prophet Muḥammad had accepted the "pledge of the women" (bay'at al-nisā). As was the case with many Islamic reformers of this and subsequent periods, lapses in correct behavior on the part of Muslim women were held responsible for much of what was perceived to be wrong with existing Muslim society.

By the middle of the eighteenth century, mounting pressure on Muslim interests in South Asia helped to produce a further round of millenarian-style movements. During this period, the might of the Mughal Empire was steadily eroded by the rise of various indigenous successor states and the encroachment of European influence. Faced with crisis on a massive scale, Muslim intellectuals in centers of Muslim power such as Delhi grappled with ways of responding. In Delhi, Shāh Walī Allāh (1703–62), like Shaykh Aḥmad Sirhindī, believed himself to be a mujaddid, charged with purifying Islam from the accretions that he believed were responsible for its political weakness. Again, like his predecessors, while he came from a Sufi tradition and had been initiated into the Naqshbandī, Chishtī, and Qādirī orders, Shāh Walī Allāh was highly critical of tomb worship and the veneration of saints. Since Muslim women remained closely associated with these populist forms of Islamic practice, it can be deduced that such thinking must have played a large part in marginalizing and undermining central aspects of their spiritual lives, devaluing to a great extent the authority that they could exercise in relation to the rhythms and nature of religious practice within their families and communities.

While Shāh Walī Allāh's thinking had an enormous impact on intellectual developments within north Indian Islam and influenced a wide range of later reformers, it was his "successors" in the nineteenth century who translated this thought into action in the shape of a number of millenarian-style protest movements. Again, however, the evidence for how these movements affected women's lives is very sparse, and the conclusions that can be drawn are largely conjectural. The best known nineteenth-century movement was that associated with Sayyid Aḥmad Shahīd of Rae Bareilly (1786–1831) who studied for a period of time in Delhi under the guidance of Shāh Walī Allāh's son, 'Abd al-'Azīz Dihlawī. A charismatic personality, he acquired influential supporters who were attracted to his emphasis on pure tawḥīd (monotheism) as well as to his opposition to "saint worship" and social customs such as excessive expenditure on marriages and the Hindu-like taboo against widow remarriage that had developed among many Indian Muslims. Here again, it was on aspects of women's lives in particular that the spotlight of reform was turned, though, as yet, there has been no academic study undertaken to explore the specific consequences of this movement from either a female or a gender perspective. It is, however, now well established that reform movements across the spectrum at this time focused much of their effort on making Muslim women into "better" Muslims, since they were regarded by many reformers as holding the key to community renewal.

Upon his return from performing pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca in 1821, the Sayyid began to prepare for a jihad, which was launched in 1827, against the Sikhs in northwestern India. His defeat and death at Balakot in 1831, however, did not put an end to his Mujāhidīn movement, which persisted for decades against the British presence, with his followers often known as Wahhābis on account of alleged connections with the Arabian movement of the same name. British perceptions that Wahhābis played a key role in the Mutiny of 1857 intensified efforts to control the movement, and two major Wahhābi trials were held in Amballa and Patna in 1864 and 1870 respectively. Meanwhile, the related Farā'īdī movement led by Ḥājī Shari'at Allāh (1781–1840) developed in Bengal during the same period with similar priorities of fighting against rites and rituals influenced by Hindu customs. Shari'at Allāh declared British India to be a dār al-ḥarb (land of war) and, therefore, permitted no community prayers either on Fridays or on the occasion of religious festivals. How far this particular proscription would have influenced women's lives, however, is debatable since the vast majority of Muslim women in South Asia have rarely prayed outside their homes. His son Dūdū Miyān (1819–62) organized his father's movement further by sending out agents into the Bengali countryside, where their protest frequently merged with resentment against richer landowners who tended to be Hindus, endowing it with an element of class conflict. All the same, these reformers laid special emphasis on eradicating particular rituals, such as forbidding drums and dancing girls at the marriages of villagers' daughters. Likewise, a short-lived rebellion in Bengal in the early 1830s, led by Tītū Mīr, who may have been a disciple of Sayyid Aḥmad Shaḥīd, targeted landowners who, to restrain his activities, had imposed a tax on the beards of his followers, a distinguishing mark among Muslims and hence a very provocative move. In the official court records that document the trial of Tītū Mīr's followers in 1832–3, there is no evidence of active involvement on the part of women, though the imprisonment and exile of male family members must undoubtedly have had a significant effect on their lives.

One further development that exhibited millenarian-style affinities in South Asia was the Aḥmadī movement, which emerged at the end of the nineteenth century. While it is generally accepted that it arose as a protest against the success of Christian proselytization, as well as in response to the perceived decadence of prevailing Islamic mores, its founder, Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad (1839–1908) claimed to have received a revelation at the start of the fourteenth century A.H. authorizing him to receive allegiance as the promised Messiah and Imām Mahdī, that is, the apocalyptic savior who according to Muslim tradition will appear at the Day of Judgment. His claims earned the persistent enmity of the general Muslim community, which branded him a heretic and labeled members of the Aḥmadī movement as non-Muslims. However, the involvement of middle-class urban supporters, who formed the nucleus of the so-called Lahore branch when the movement split around 1914, meant that this section became noted for its liberal, modernizing tendencies. This was reflected in the emphasis that was placed on educating women and setting up schools for girls, constituting a fairly radical move in the context of early twentieth-century Muslim South Asia. On the other hand, the so-called Qadian section remained more traditional, strictly enforcing purdah and encouraging polygamy. The Aḥmadī movement remains, to this day, characterized by these apparently contradictory trends with respect to the lives of its female members.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Ahmad, The political and religious ideas of Shah Waliullah of Delhi, in Muslim World 52 (1962), 22–30.
 Q. Ahmad, The Wahabi movement in India, Calcutta 1955.
 Y. Friedmann, Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi. An outline of his thought and a study of his image in the eyes of posterity, Montreal 1971.
 —, Prophecy continuous. Aspects of Ahmadi religious thought and its medieval background, Berkeley 1989.
 P. Hardy, The Muslims of British India, Cambridge 1972.
 K. W. Jones, Socio-religious reform movements in British India, Cambridge 1990.
 M. A. Khan, History of the Fara'idi movement in Bengal (1818–1906), Karachi 1965.
 —, Titu Mir and his followers in British Indian records (1831–1833 AD), Dacca 1980.
 D. N. MacLean, La sociologie et l'engagement politique. Le Mahdawiya indien et l'état, in Revue des mondes musulman et de la Méditerranée 91–94, Mahdisme et millenarisme en islam, ed. M. Garcia-Arenal, Paris 2002, 239–56.
 B. D. Metcalf, Islamic revival in British India. Deoband, 1860–1900, Princeton, N.J. 1982.
 —, Perfecting Women. Maulana Ashraf 'Ali Thanawi's Bihishti Zewar, Berkeley 1990.
 A. Powell, Duties of Ahmadi women. Educative processes in the early stages of the Ahmadiyya movement, in A. Copley (ed.), Gurus and their followers. New religious reform movements in colonial India, New Delhi 2000, 128–56.
 A. Schimmel, Islam in the Indian subcontinent, Leiden 1980.
 W. C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, Lahore 1963.
 M. T. Titus, Islam in India and Pakistan, Serampore 1959.
 B. Wilson, Millenialism in the comparative perspective, in Comparative Studies in Society and History 6 (1963), 93–114.

SARAH ANSARI

Turkey

The concept of the millennium was transformed in the Islamic world under the influence of remnants of Central Eastern and Judeo-Christian mythology into a type of Messianism known as Mahdism.

In Turkish history, from the thirteenth to the twentieth centuries, there were a number of Mahdist uprisings, two of which, the Bābā'ī revolt in 1240 in the Seljuk period and the Shaykh Badr al-Dīn revolt in 1416 in the Ottoman period, were of particular importance as regards both their immediate and subsequent effects. Apart from these two revolts there were also other Mahdist uprisings on a smaller scale. The Timurtash revolt in 1321 during the Seljuk period, the growth of underground opposition to the Ottoman government among the Bayramī Melāmīs in the sixteenth century, the Shahqulu (1511), Nur 'Alī Khalīfa (1512), Bozoklu Djalāl or Shāh Walī (1520), and Shāh Qalandar (1527) revolts, some of which had links with the Safavid State, as well as the armed Qizilbash Turkmen rebellion, the Sakarya Shaykh, and the Urmiye Shaykh in the time of Murad IV (seventeenth century), and finally the Sayyid ‘Abd Allāh (1668) revolts were all in the Mahdist tradition.

As for the republican period, the Menemen incident in 1930 might be regarded as another example, but as this incident was somewhat different in character and was closely associated with the domestic political opposition of the day, it is rather doubtful whether it can be classed as a truly Mahdist revolt.

Apart from the Shaykh Badr al-Dīn revolt, almost all the Mahdist uprisings during the Ottoman period were in the nature of rebellions waged by the nomadic Turkmen tribes against the central government's policy of the enforced adoption of a settled lifestyle and subjection to taxation. In Turkish history, Messianism has always acted as the ideological motivation for revolts against the central political government based on the social and economic discontent felt by the periphery. The local administrators sent by the central government had a significant share in the causes of these rebellions. Indeed, they could be said to have provoked the revolts by their refusal to recognize the people's beliefs, customs, and traditions and by the dislike or even contempt they displayed for their ways of life. An individual would emerge – usually from among the Turkmen babas who were their religious leaders – proclaim himself as the Mahdī and summon the people to revolt, whereupon the Turkmen, with their great devotion toward these religious leaders, who were sometimes also heads of the tribes, would have no hesitation in joining in the rebellion. As a result of the hard way of life to which they were exposed in the steppes of Asia Minor, the Turkmen who took part in these movements represented a group in which women played as important a part as men in everyday life. Thus it was that these Mahdist uprisings, composed mainly of nomadic Turkmen, were afforded very great support by the participation of women at every level. Anatolian epics such as Kitāb-i Dede Korkut and Dānīshmend-nāma contain episodes illustrating the heroic deeds of the nomadic Turkmen women. These episodes show that some of these women enjoyed a high social status in the tribes to which they belonged.

It is well known that in Central Asia in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the followers of Aḥmad-i Yasawī included a large number of women and that, although it is not regarded as generally acceptable in Islam, these women performed religious rites together with men. Moreover, Baba Ilyās-i Khorasānī (d. 1240), a Wafā'iyya shaykh in Anatolia in the thirteenth century who took a leading part in the Bābā'i revolt, is known to have performed rites with a congregation composed of both men and women. Ottoman archival documents reveal that in mystical circles Turkmen women could even act as tekke shaykhs. Turkmen women belonging to these circles, some of whom may well have taken part in the Mahdist uprisings, are known to have formed a recognized group referred to in one of the early Ottoman chronicles (Āshik-pashazāda tarīkhi) as Bajiyān-i Rūm (Anatolian sisters). Although we have very little detailed information regarding the nature of these groups, Ottoman archival records prove that there is no doubt of their existence. In these records we find mention of women sheikhs with the title bājī or khātun, such as Fāṭima Khātun, Bülbül Khātun, Hajjī Fāṭima, Bājī Ana, Fāṭima Ana, and Akhī Fātima. Hagiographic sources also attest to the existence in mystical circles in Anatolia of a group of women of this kind. A very good example of this is Fāṭima Bājī, who was close to Bektāsh-i Walī, the eponymous founder of the Bektāshī religious order. Fāṭima was given the title bājī because of her position as a female awliyya, greatly honored in Bektāshī tradition. The view proposed by some scholars that these bājīs were the wives of members of two very important mystical groups referred to in Ottoman records as Akhīyān-i Rūm and Abdālān-i Rūm may well contain a great deal of truth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ö. L. Barkan, Kolonizatör Türk dervişleri, in Vakıflar Dergisi 2 (1942), 279–304.
 U. Firdevsî, Velâyetnâme-i hacı Bektaş-ı velî, İstanbul 1953.
Kitāb-i Dede Korkut, ed. M. Ergin, Ankara 1964.
 F. Köprülü, Türk edebiyatında ilk mutasavvıflar, ed. O. Köprülü, Ankara 2003.
 I. Melikoff, La geste de Melik Danişmend. Etude critique du Danişmendname, 2 vols., Paris 1960.
 İ. Mevlânâ, Jāmi' al-meknūnāt, İstanbul University Library, İbnü'l-Emin, MS no. 3263, vv. 49b–50b.
 Münecimbaşı, Sahā'if al-akhbār, iii, İstanbul 1285, 436–8.
 J. Muştafâ (Qoja Nishanji), Tabaqāt al-Mamālik wa darajāt al-masālik, ed. P. Kappert, Wiesbaden 1981, 384b.
 A. Y. Ocak, XVI yüzyıl Osmanlı Anadolu'sunda mesyanik hareketlerin bir tahlil denemesi, in V. Milletlerarası Türkiye Sosyal ve İktisat Tarihi Kongresi Bildirileri, Ankara 1989, 817–26.
 Â. Paşazāde, Osmanoğularının tarihi, ed. K. Yavuz and M. A. Y. Saraç, İstanbul 2003, 298.
 İ. Peçevî, Tarīkh-i peçevî, i, İstanbul 1283, 120–2.
 A. Refik, Osmanlı devrinde Râfızılık ve Bektaşılık, in İstanbul Üniversitesi Edebiyat Fakültesi Mecmuası 9 (1932), 21–59.
 Khwāja Sa'd al-Dīn, Tāj al-tawārikh, iii, İstanbul 1280, 162–81.

- Silahdar Mehmed Pasha, Tārīkh-i Silabdār, i, Istanbul 1928, 334–5.
- H. Sohrweide, Der Sieg der Safaviden in Persien und seine Rijckwirkungen auf die Schiiten Anatoliens, in Der Islam 15 (1965), 145–86.
- A. Tchelebi, Menākıbu'l-qudsiyye. Baba İlyas-ı Horasanī ve sülalesinin menkabev tarihi, ed. I. E. Erünsal and A. Y. Ocak, Ankara 1995.
- Ş. Tekindağ, Şahkulu Baba Tekeli isyanı, in Belgelerle Türk Tarihi Dergisi 3 (December 1967), 34–9 and 4 (January 1968), 54–9.

AHMET YAŞAR OCAK

Political-Social Movements: Peace Movements

Central Asia

This entry is about women, gender, and the peace movements in Central Asia. Women have made substantial contributions to peacebuilding and conflict resolution in the five Central Asian states of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan as they have worldwide. International recognition of women's peacebuilding role is a recent phenomenon (Marshall 2000), and much of the recent global attention paid to it has focused on the post-Soviet republics because of their numerous and varied conflict zones. This has been concomitant with the tremendous focus by global development organizations and local non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on "civil society" in the region.

During Soviet times, women political actors were virtually by definition part of state institutions such as the Soviet Women's Committee (Reardon 1993, 123). While Soviet communist ideals were egalitarian and called for women's participation in government, the women who did assume leadership roles were generally not allowed to address concerns, including peacebuilding, that might threaten the state.

Women's post-Soviet peacebuilding contributions have taken place in the context of the transition from centralized Soviet to republican state control and from a stridently socialist political system to new state structures to varying degrees both socialist and capitalist. In this new milieu, the percentage of women participating in government has decreased in many categories. At the same time, a "third sector" NGO culture has flourished in which women have assumed active leadership roles.

That women are "naturally" associated with peace and men with war has long been seen as self-evident both in Western society and globally, and this is still accepted unquestioningly by some feminists (for example, Reardon 1993). But opponents of this view call it unnecessary essentializing (for example, Smith 2001). In Central Asia, the importance of women in non-governmental activism seemed curious to a Western observer given the strong traditions of patriarchy in the region, who then noted that such avenues allowed women leadership opportunities not available to them elsewhere in the society (Klose 2000). Structures of governance that exclude women, then, may do as much to encourage them to promote peace through NGOs as local ideas about proper gender roles discourage them from entering government institutions.

Many Central Asian NGOs focus on conflict prevention, conflict resolution, and peacebuilding either exclusively or as part of a broader platform. In a few cases women's opportunities for activism lie within organizations that predate independence but that operate with new leeway. For example the Women's Association of Tajikistan, founded during the final years of the Soviet Union, has been active in post-conflict efforts focused on identifying needs and coordinating government assistance following the 1992–7 civil war (Schoerberlein-Engel 1997, 225). For the most part, however, the post-Soviet NGOs represent a new kind of women's activism, much of it endeavoring to promote peace outside state channels at a grassroots level, and often with funds from international donors.

There have been only two major conflicts in the post-Soviet Central Asian republics in contrast to the adjacent Caucasus, in which several major conflicts have taken place. Islamism has played a role in both cases, pitting Muslims against other Muslims. In the civil war in Tajikistan, "neo-communists" and "Islamists" sparred, and in Uzbekistan the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan waged a campaign against the government in 1999 and 2000 in an attempt to create an Islamic state (Roy 2002). Both movements have now been curtailed, especially since the United States began its "war on terrorism" and removed the Islamist Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan from power.

While major conflict has been rare, many areas of small-scale and potential conflict exist in Central Asia. Most are ethnically delineated. In Uzbekistan, for example, the state aspires to mono-ethnicity and has vigorously promoted Uzbek identity to the consternation of its non-Uzbek population, which includes ethnic Tajiks and Russians (Liu 1997). In the Ferghana Valley, divided awkwardly between Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan, complex border disputes, many with histories rooted in the early twentieth century, are ongoing (International Crisis Group 2002). Extra-regional state actors are also highly influential; Iran, Turkey, and Russia all vie for influence, as do mainly Western multinational corporations seeking to exploit the region's rich oil and gas reserves (Olson 2001).

Contributions by women acting through NGOs have included local activism inspired by international conflict resolution methods, such as in the case of a rural women's group in Kyrgyzstan that participated in advocacy training, which it used to appeal to the local land commission to change a land redistribution system it regarded as unjust (Estes 2000). In Kazakhstan, an NGO called the Centre for Effective Gender Policy conducted a needs assessment and found violence and sexual harassment to be the most common problems young women face (International Federation of University Women 2001); in identifying these problems, the NGO addressed aspects of violence that since the 1980s have been recognized by the United Nations as part of the definition of "peace" (Gierycz 2001, 15-16). Work on discrimination and violence toward women has also been carried out by the Almaty Women's Information Center in Kazakhstan (Center for Civil Society International 1998). Such activity is a vital starting point in efforts toward peace of all kinds in societies with high rates of gendered violence; one study found that in Tajikistan, 67 percent of women were "regularly exposed to some form of violence in the home" (United Nations Development Fund for Women 2003).

The Kyrgyz NGO Foundation for Tolerance International, which was founded and is headed by a woman, works toward the prevention and resolution of inter-ethnic conflicts in cross-border areas. It monitors conflict situations, organizes mediation processes, and conducts training exercises (Joan B. Kroc Institute for Peace and Justice 2003).

At the United Nations-sponsored Commonwealth of Independent States Regional Workshop in Almaty in 1999, participants recognized a "shared responsibility for the peacefulness and prosperous future" of the region in response to "the senseless horrors and tragedies of war" (Karat Coalition 2003). Across Central Asia, women are rising to this challenge and taking responsibility for the peace and prosperity of their societies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Center for Civil Society International, Almaty women's information center, Seattle 1998, <<http://www.civilsoc.org/nisorgs/kazak/awic.htm>>.
- V. Estes, Lessons in transition. Gender issues in civil society development, in E. K. Klose (ed.), Give and take. A journal on civil society in Eurasia, Washington, D.C. 2000, 5-6.
- D. Gierycz, Women, peace and the United Nations. Beyond Beijing, in I. Skjelsbaek and D. Smith (eds.), Gender, peace and conflict, Thousand Oaks 2001, 14-31.

International Crisis Group, Central Asia. Border disputes and conflict potential, Osh/Brussels 2002.

International Federation of University Women, UNIFEM uses the technology to support women in LDCs, Global Perspective (Geneva) 8:2 (May/June 2001), <<http://www.ifuw.org/gs-0601.htm>>.

Karat Coalition, The priority of women from Central and Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States, Warsaw 2003, <http://www.karat.org/achievements/beijing_statements1.html>.

E. K. Klose, The third sector. A place of opportunity for women, in E. K. Klose (ed.), Give and take. A journal on civil society in Eurasia, Washington, D.C. 2000, 3.

Joan B. Kroc Institute for Peace and Justice, Women PeaceMakers program. 2003 Women PeaceMakers biographical abstracts, San Diego, Calif. 2003.

M. Liu, The perils of nationalism in independent Uzbekistan, in Journal of the International Institute (Ann Arbor, Mich.) 4:2 (Winter 1997), <<http://www.umich.edu/~inet/journal/vol4no2/uzbek.html>>.

D. R. Marshall, Women in war and peace. Grassroots peacebuilding, Washington, D.C. 2000.

R. Olson, Turkey's relations with Iran, Syria, Israel, and Russia, 1991-2000. The Kurdish and Islamist questions, Costa Mesa 2001.

B. Reardon, Women and peace. Feminist visions of global security, Albany, N.Y. 1993.

O. Roy, Islamic militancy. Religion and conflict in Central Asia, in M. Mekenkamp, P. Van Tongeren, H. Van De Veen, and G. R. Tinterow (eds.), Searching for peace in Central and South Asia. An overview of conflict prevention and peacebuilding activities, Boulder, Colo. 2002, 97-108.

J. S. Schoerberlein-Engel, Overcoming the ravages of Tajikistan's civil war, in M. M. Cernea and A. Kudat (eds.), Social assessments for better development. Case studies in Russia and Central Asia, Washington, D.C. 1997, 199-225.

D. Smith, The problem of essentialism, in I. Skjelsbaek and D. Smith (eds.), Gender, peace and conflict, Thousand Oaks 2001, 32-46.

United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), New York 2003, Tajikistan quick facts, <<http://www.womenwarpeace.org/tajikistan/tajikistan.htm>>.

DIANE E. KING

South Asia

The role of women in peace movements in South Asia began with women's participation in national liberation movements from the early twentieth century. Two developments of the nineteenth century particularly helped Indian women's entry into the formal political space. These were the social reform movements fostered by men such as Ram Mohan Roy and Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, and the growing popularity of movements that challenged British imperialism. Women participated in the "Extremist Movements" in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and took part in acts of extreme violence. It was Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi who perceived a direct and peaceful political role for women in large numbers.

Gandhi launched his massive non-violent non-cooperation movement in 1919 and encouraged the participation of women in it. Thousands of women responded to his call. Gandhi urged women to be peaceful in their demonstrations as they were the repositories of "moral force." However, Gandhi never challenged the essentially patriarchal structure on which Indian society was built. He also used Hindu symbols to encourage women to participate in the movement, thereby furthering the polarization of politics on the basis of religion. Female leaders such as Sarojini Naidu emphasized harmony and comradely cooperation between men and women in the struggle for freedom from British rule. Apart from Gandhi, the communist movement also brought women into mass politics. Women from the Communist Party including Manikuntala Sen, Renu Chakravarty, and Ela Reid actively participated in humanitarian activities during the infamous Bengal famine of 1942. They espoused the view that humanitarian work and political work were one and same.

After India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka became independent, women made claims on the formal political space. Although some of them assumed leadership roles that in no way feminized the political space. The protracted Tamil and Sinhala conflict in Sri Lanka, the Sindhi Mohajir (Muslims who came from India during partition) problems in Pakistan, the Indian state's conflict with Muslims in the Kashmir valley and with indigenous people in Northeast India, and the Bangladesh government's conflict with the Jumma (tribal) people in the Chittagong Hill Tracts (CHT) brought women to the forefront of activities for conflict resolution and peace. Mothers' associations epitomized women's peacemaking roles in South Asia. In the Sri Lankan conflict there were at least four mothers' associations at different times. Even in the Indian context there were the Naga Mothers who made remarkable progress in their movement for peace.

The mothers' associations in South Asia appeared mainly in the 1980s. Both the Naga Mothers Association (NMA) and the first Mothers' Front in Sri Lanka were started in 1984. These were the result of women's spontaneous peaceful protest against protracted violence in their own societies. None of these women's groups were created to intervene in peace politics. The NMA had its birth in women's social protest against alcohol abuse and the Mothers' Front was created to protest against disappearances in the region. Both these groups appropriated gender roles to make space for their entrance into mass politics. They appealed as mothers to warring factions to stop violence. Motherhood allowed them to speak for peace with authority in a situation of tremendous aggression. One of the first pamphlets published by the NMA was entitled Shed No More Blood. Although the NMA has survived till today the Mothers' Front disappeared after a few years. One of the main reasons for the disappearance of the Mothers' Front in Sri Lanka was that its members could not get support from either the state or the rebels. The NMA survived because both the warring factions considered its survival to be crucial to the politics of peace in the region.

In the CHT the Hill Women's Federation (HWF) took up the mantle of peace. They protested against abuse of the Jumma people including illegal arrests, kidnapping, killing, and rape. The HWF found a platform in the emerging women's movement in Bangladesh and came together with it over the disappearance of Kalpana Chakma, a leader of the HWF. The government of Bangladesh signed an accord with the Jumma people in 1997. With the growing strength of Islamic political parties in Bangladesh women's peace initiatives of both Bengali and tribal women are now under severe threat.

Women's peace movements in South Asia have traditionally utilized the gendered roles of womanhood. Appeals made on the basis of gendered roles such as motherhood have often led to positive results for women in peace politics in South Asia. It is true that none of the women involved in peace movements challenged the patriarchal social structure. But unlike the Mothers' Front in Sri Lanka, the NMA retained their relevance in politics through a number of radical activities. They tried actively to negotiate for peace not just between the state and the Naga communities but also between different tribal groups. They actively campaigned for women's rights to inherit landed property. They also tried to build bridges between communities. Unlike the Mothers' Front, the NMA resisted efforts by political parties in conflict to subsume their agenda. For their efforts in peacemaking they enjoyed the honor of being the first South Asian women's group to sit on a ceasefire negotiation.

Among women's groups for peace in the urban areas in South Asia are Women in Peace in South Asia (WIPSA), and Women in Security, Conflict Management and Peace (WISCOMP). Although these groups make appeals for peace on the basis of their femininity, they do not espouse gendered roles such as motherhood. They consciously distance themselves from being identified with any particular ethnic or religious communities. These groups concern themselves more with interstate conflicts, such as that between India and Pakistan, rather than intra-state conflicts. They are also vociferous critics of the nuclear program of India and Pakistan. In Sri Lanka a few such women's groups campaigned successfully for women's participation in ceasefire negotiations.

Women's peace movements are largely issue-based in much of South Asia. Different women's groups for peace come together on the same platform in moments of crisis. The one common aim of these groups is to fight against the marginalization of women through adherence to personal law. The Shah Bano case in India brought women's groups together to protest against Muslim personal law. Women's peace movements were losing much of their fervor when the riots against the Muslim population in Gujarat brought them together once again. There was widespread protest against growing fundamentalism in the region and an effort was made to build up a regional women's movement for peace on the platform of opposing all anti-feminist laws and ordinances such as the Hudood and blasphemy laws in Pakistan and the growing popularity of Hindutva in India. The greatest challenge to such movements is delivered by women's groups belonging to the extreme right, such as women in the Jamaat-e-Islam in Pakistan and Bangladesh and the Sangh Parivar in India.

One of the main contributions of South Asian women's peace movements is that they define peace in much larger terms than merely the end of war. Many of these groups, both secular and religious, speak of peace with equitable distribution of resources among all segments of the population. They are severely critical of the growing militarization of the region. However, a major defect in South Asian women's peace movements, both rural and urban, is that they are unable to disassociate themselves from their communities. Peace movements across communities, such as women's groups within the Pakistan India People's Forum for Peace and Democracy, often have a socialist orientation. These are the movements that are fighting against fundamentalism and radical nationalisms in the region. They are making an effort to build bridges across communities but their efforts are as yet in the nascent stage.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Banerjee, Peace initiatives of Naga women, in Canadian Women's Studies 19 (Winter 2000), 137-42.
 M. Burguières, Feminist approaches to peace. Another step for peace studies, in Millennium. Journal of International Studies 19:1 (1990), 1-18.

- U. Butalia, The other side of silence. Voices from the partition of India, New Delhi 1998.
 CIDA (Canadian International Development Agency), Gender equality and peacebuilding. A draft operational framework, Ottawa 1998.
 R. Manchanda (ed.), Women, war and peace in South Asia. Beyond victimhood to agency New Delhi 2001.
 G. Shangkham, Naga women and the peace process, in Kohima News Letter, 8 June 2000, 1-8.
 Women's Coalition for Peace, Statement I and II in Nivedini 6:1 (1998), 195-9.
 Women's Initiative, The green of the valley is khaki. Women's testimonies from Kashmir. A report by Women's Initiative, Bombay 1994.
 WSRC (Women's Studies Research Centre, Guwahati University), Women in the North East. Challenges and opportunities in the 21st century, Guwahati 2002.

PAULA BANERJEE

Turkey and the Caucasus

This entry is about women, gender, and the peace movement in Turkey and the Caucasus, where women peace activists are responding to conflicts that have disrupted the lives of millions and killed thousands of people. Armenia and Azerbaijan have sparred over Nagorno-Karabakh. In Georgia, several separatist movements and boundary disputes flared in the 1990s. Chechens, aided by non-Chechen Muslim fighters from a diverse array of countries, have been fighting a war against Russia that is both separatist and Islamist. In Turkey, Kurdish separatists have fought government forces in a secularist, Marxist bid for autonomy, and Turkey has strained relations with several of its neighboring states. These and the histories of other conflicts, of the grievances of their participants, and prospects for peace are diverse. Exacerbating factors include ethnic, nationalist, and territorial assertions, religion, and designs by both local and international entities on the rich oil and gas reserves in the region.

Despite this diversity and complexity, peace movements by women have emerged that cut across ethnic, religious, and political categories. Non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and government agencies focus on mobilizing people for peace, and a significant proportion of these have been initiated and are headed by women. One observer claims that approximately 60 to 70 percent of Azerbaijani NGOs, many of which promote peace, are headed by women (Bickley 2000). Women's NGO participation is highly visible in the surrounding states as well. It is likely that the conflicts in the Caucasus and Turkey have attracted more female than male protest. For example the Conflict Research Center, an independent organization in Baku headed by a woman, promotes civil society (Davis 2000). In Georgia, the Tbilisi-based Caucasus Women's Research and Consulting Network (CWN) educates people about gender inequalities and socialization. Most of its representatives are minority women (Reimann 2001, 41).

GLOBAL/LOCAL PEACE ACTIVISM

Most facets of the peace movement of women in Turkey and the Caucasus involve practical efforts such as the networking of activists, the promotion and implementation of community development programs, and political lobbying. They also, although less frequently, take on the form of public protest, as exemplified by the activities of 100 Chechen women who blocked the main highway between Grozny and Ingushetia to draw attention to Russian aggression (Islam Online 2002), or anti-war protests in Turkey during the weeks leading to the coalition war against Iraq in March 2003 during which activists, many of them women, held marches, rallies and other anti-war events in Turkish cities to protest at the entry of the Turkish military into the war (Altınay 2003).

International concern for democratization and the promotion of civil society has prompted support for grassroots peace efforts by women from the United Nations, international NGOs, and Western government agencies. Local women activists who succeed at the local level are frequently offered support that enables them to ramp up previously small-scale efforts and to initiate new ones. For example, the Regional Bureau for Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States (RBEC), a division of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), initiated the Regional Programme in Support of Gender in Development in Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey. This has provided an umbrella for regional meetings such as "Women's Rights are Human Rights: Women in Conflict," which brought together peace activists from 13 countries in 1998 (UNDP 1998). Similarly, the Women Peacemakers Program of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation (IFOR) holds training sessions for women peacemakers; in 2003 it convened workshops in Armenia and Azerbaijan (IFOR 2004).

HISTORICIZING THE PEACE MOVEMENT IN THE CAUCASUS AND TURKEY

In the three autonomous Caucasus states of Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan as well as the independent northern Caucasus republics of the Russian Federation, the legacy of former control by the Soviet Union is profoundly influential. Kemalist ideology wields influence of a similar magnitude in Turkey. These historical forces strongly affect current peace movements by women and have yielded a number of ironies. For example, gender inequity and gendered violence are prevalent throughout the Caucasus and Turkey despite strong emphasis throughout most of the twentieth century by the governments of both Turkey and the Soviet Union on equality for women. Women activists thus are faced with overcoming profound social barriers to their leadership, but can simultaneously appeal to egalitarian discourses already familiar to their hearers. Similarly, the Soviet system, which yielded an increase in women's literacy from 10 percent in 1926 to around 100 percent in the 1960s (Akiner 2000, 124), gave women in the Caucasus the educational background they would later need for organizing in new political environments that are in large part more tolerant of grassroots activism than were the Soviets. However, without the lifting of centralized, imposed Soviet control, many of the current conflicts against which peace activists campaign might not have occurred in the first place (Cornell 1997).

While many of the conflicts in Turkey and the Caucasus have taken on a new character during the past two decades, in nearly every case the etiology of hostilities can be traced to at least the early twentieth century. For example the Turkish state's aspirations to mono-ethnicity, which belie the ethnic diversity found in it (Andrews 1989), have been strong since its founder Mustafa Kemal Atatürk espoused them. Ethnic conflicts in Turkey and its Ottoman predecessor state have taken place on a variety of scales, the grandest being between Turks and Armenians during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and the state and the PKK (Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan, Kurdistan Workers' Party), a Kurdish rebel movement that carried out a violent campaign against the state during the 1980s and 1990s. Women in Turkey have consistently stepped forward to oppose violence as a solution. Peace Mothers Initiative was founded during the PKK war by mothers of PKK fighters. Its members called upon both parties to end the conflict (İstanbul Sosyal Forumu 2004); some have reportedly endured torture (Amnesty International 2000). The Turkish Mothers Association, an association founded in 1959 which focuses on the advancement of women and children (Turkish Mothers Association 1998), also called for an end to the PKK conflict.

Enmity between Turkic and Armenian peoples has a long history in the Caucasus as well as in Turkey itself. A major clash took place in Baku in 1905 (Fraser et al., 655) and hostilities continued into the First World War. This was followed by several decades of relative quiet under Soviet control. From 1988 to 1994, the two sides engaged in open warfare over Nagorno-Karabakh, and although a cease-fire has been in place since 1994, the conflict remains largely unresolved. Women on both sides have responded with peace efforts. For example, in 1999 a group of women from Azerbaijan and Armenia, both of which had a history of activism at the local level, were involved in founding the Women Waging Peace initiative with backing from a United States foundation that has sponsored similar initiatives elsewhere. Azeri and Armenian members of Women Waging Peace have worked to promote peace over Nagorno-Karabakh both locally and in national and international forums (Women Waging Peace 2004).

THE DILEMMA OF THE NATURALIZED ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN WITH PEACE

A longstanding association of women with peace and men with conflict persists in the popular discourse of diverse societies and among activists and analysts of peace movements. This portrayal and the dilemma that it presents have been the subject of numerous recent articles on the subject of peace movements and conflict resolution by academicians and activists. Tickner (2001, 21) offers this summary of the dangers: "Besides the obviously problematic slide into distinctions such as good women/bad men, the association of women with maternal qualities and peacemaking has the effect of disempowering both women and peace and further delegitimizing women's voices in matters of international politics."

In an article in which she touts women's strength in conflict resolution due to their "already existing roles" but also points out some of the dangers associated with such generalizations, Anderson (1999) cites several examples from the Caucasus and Turkey, including the "practical" work of the IDP Women's Association of Georgia in bringing Georgian, Abkhazian, and Ossetian children together at summer camps, and the revival in the 1990s of an old custom whereby women waved white scarves to intervene in the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict. Among women peace campaigners in the Caucasus and Turkey, the deployment of women's "traditional" roles and already-existing networks seems to have more legitimizing than marginalizing power. A Turkish woman leader in the peace movement in Cyprus noted this, pointing out that when bi-communal peace groups started to grow in the 1990s and were eventually shut down by government authorities, they targeted the women's peace groups first. She theorized that the women's groups were more threatening to the authorities than mixed-gender groups (Uludağ 1999).

Whether they continue to use the social capital uniquely afforded to them by their gender, or decide to downplay "tradition" in favor of less gender-bound expressions, ongoing conflicts ensure that women peace activists in Turkey and the Caucasus have plenty of work yet to do.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Emerging political order in the new Caspian states. Azerbaijan, Kazakstan and Turkmenistan, in G. K. Bertsch, C. Craft, S. A. Jones, and M. D. Beck (eds.), Crossroads and conflict. Security and foreign policy in the Caucasus and Central Asia, New York 2000, 90-128.
- A. G. Altınay, What will the Turkish government remember as it votes on the war this week?, New York 2003, <<http://www.peace-initiative-turkey.net/AAltınay.doc>>.
- Amnesty International, Public AI index. EUR 44/55/00. UA 319/00 Torture/ill-treatment 19 October 2000, Library. Online documentation archive, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGEUR440552000?open&of=ENG-IRQ>, London 2000>.
- S. Anderson, Women's many roles in reconciliation, in European Centre for Conflict Prevention (ed.), People building peace. 35 inspiring stories from around the world, Utrecht 1999, 230-6.
- P. A. Andrews, Ethnic groups in the Republic of Turkey, Wiesbaden 1989.
- C. Bickley, Gyulyum. Azeri college friends found NGO, find new opportunities, Initiative for Social Action and Renewal in Eurasia (ISAR), Washington, D.C. 2000, <<http://www.isar.org/isar/archive/GT/GT81rada.html>>.
- S. E. Cornell, Conflicting identities in the Caucasus, in Peace Review 9 (1997), 453-9.
- S. Davis, Eurasia insight. Women waging peace in the Caucasus, New York 2000, <<http://www.reliefweb.int/w/rwb.nsf/o/edofc625c73644588525687b006ba5da?OpenDocument>>.
- N. Fraser, K. W. Hipel, J. Jaworsky, and R. Zuljan, A conflict analysis of the Armenian-Azerbaijani dispute, in Journal of Conflict Resolution 34 (1990), 652-77.
- IFOR (International Fellowship of Reconciliation), Women Peacemakers Program, in WPP home, Alkmaar 2004, <<http://www.ifor.org/WPP/>>.
- Islam Online, Chechen women block highway to protest arrests by Russian army, News, 2002, <<http://www.islamonline.net/English/News/2002-07/18/article04.shtml>>.
- İstanbul Sosyal Forumu, Proposal to the ESF, İstanbul 2004, <<http://www.sosyalforum.com/English/proposal.htm>>.
- C. Reimann, Towards gender mainstreaming in crisis prevention and conflict management. Guidelines for German technical co-operation, Eschborn 2001.
- J. A. Tickner, Gendering world politics. Issues and approaches in the post-Cold War era, New York 2001.
- Turkish Mothers Association, About T.M.A, Ankara 1998, <<http://www.geocities.com/turkander/>>.
- S. Uludağ, Strategies for women in peace-building, in Women and armed conflict list archive, 1999, <<http://www.sdn.undp.org/ww/women-armdconf/mmsg00071.html>>.

UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), Summary of the sub-regional conference. Women's rights are human rights. Women in conflict, Baku 1998, <<http://www.undp.uz/GID/eng/AZERBAIJAN/SEMINARS/report.html>>.

Women Waging Peace, Armenia/Azerbaijan, Women waging peace, Cambridge, Mass. 2004, <http://womenwagingpeace.net/content/conflict_areas/armenazer.asp>.

DIANE E. KING

Political-Social Movements: Protest Movements

The Balkans

This entry describes the participation of Muslim women in two different protest movements, each of which, in its own way, affects the social and political behavior of women in the Balkans. The entry focuses primarily on Bosnia-Herzegovina but includes, in a broader context, Serbia, Montenegro, Macedonia, and Kosovo. The first protest movement is the controversy surrounding the unveiling of women – the removal of the zar and feredža, as the traditional women's costume in the region is called. The second, more recent, is the public protest by the women of Srebrenica who are calling for the truth about their menfolk who have been missing since the mass murders at the United Nations safe area of Srebrenica in 1995. The removal of the zar and feredža encourages Muslim women to participate in public and economic life. The protest of the women of Srebrenica is indicative of changes in the way Muslim women react to the problems they face and the way these problems are articulated in public. This is all the more significant since it is happening among poorly educated rural women brought up in the traditional manner.

UNVEILING

The unveiling of Muslim women in the Balkans was a long and contentious process, the early signs of which were to be seen when the issue of the emancipation of Muslim women was first raised. At various times, different groups were involved: male Muslim intellectuals, men and women associated with the Communist Party and its agenda, and members of the legislature, who concluded the matter by passing a law banning the wearing of the zar and feredža. The process that had begun with the debates of 1878 ended with the enactment of the law in September 1950. It was accompanied by public polemics, propaganda, and actions in support of the unveiling of women, but also by resistance by both women and men – traumatic experiences that left their mark in the memories of women and in unrecounted history.

The first stage of this dynamic process extended from 1878 to 1918, and was characterized for Muslims by the encounter with different cultural and civilizational values and with capitalism at the start of Austro-Hungarian rule. Changes to their way of life put the spotlight on the position of Muslim women. The traditional way of life, the view of gender roles, and the understanding of religion prevented Muslim women from taking an active part in the new social and economic trends. Arguments over the status of women, the education of Muslim women, their manner of dressing, and the response to new challenges were largely conducted by men, Muslim intellectuals whose views met with condemnation from conservative circles.

The second stage lasted from 1918 to 1941. With the end of the First World War, the debate over the status of Muslim women took on a sharper edge. The open confrontation of two opposing views continued: one advocating the unveiling of women, education for girls and women, and women's involvement in public and social life, and the other rooted in traditional, conservative views of the status of Muslim women which kept them home- and tradition-bound. The debate was accompanied by the publication of works interpreting Islamic teachings as posing no obstacle to the education of women and their participation in public life, and calling for the emancipation of Muslim women in line with the demands of modern life. This standpoint was upheld by Rā'is al-'Ulamā' Čaušević, whose understanding was that religious precepts were not contrary to the unveiling of women and who was openly of the opinion that Muslim women could be seen in the streets with their faces unveiled. Typically, at that time the issue was reduced to the veiling or unveiling of women and public debate between men.

In the final stage, 1941 to 1950, women began taking an active part in the process, which was now conducted within the ideological matrix of communism and the equality of the sexes in the process of class liberation and equality of rights. The activities of Muslim women cannot be considered in isolation from the women's movement as a whole in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Yugoslavia at the time. Women were actively engaged in every aspect of the war of national liberation, and were also active in urging Muslim women to become involved in changing their own position by attending literacy classes and forming various associations and groups. Organized action to unveil women began in 1947 and used propaganda involving both women and men. This propaganda presented the zar and feredža as symbols of backwardness, lack of education, and inequality. The actions led to the passing of the law banning the wearing of the zar and feredža.

Studies dealing with women's experience of unveiling have drawn attention to the culture shock experienced by women. The abrupt shift from one form of outward appearance to another was accompanied by adverse feelings, including confusion, disorientation, and the sense of being exposed to external pressure – these were particularly marked among the uneducated rural female population.

In conclusion, it can be said that the zar and feredža were the symbols on which appeals for changes to the rights and status of Muslim women in society were focused. Although it was not primarily a women's protest, from the very outset it altered the way of life of Muslim women in the region, and met with resistance from both women and men. Among men, resistance took the form of attempting to retain the traditional, male-dominated society. Among women, it was an expression of their disorientation and confusion when confronted with changes to their way of life. The outcome was that women emerged from the private sphere, becoming involved in the economic domain and education, and made themselves heard in public.

THE MOTHERS OF SREBRENICA

The movement launched by the mothers of Srebrenica began following the fall of the United Nations safe area of Srebrenica and the mass killings of men and boys in 1995. It brought together Muslim women, mainly from rural areas and with little education, in their efforts to find out the truth about the atrocities committed in Srebrenica and the fate of their missing family members. This women's organization should be viewed not only through the lens of the reasons for their coming together and protesting, but also as a new political phenomenon. It was not part of Muslim tradition in this part of the world for women to come together and protest openly, in public. Just as their unveiling was seen, in its day, as showing themselves in public contrary to their culture and tradition, so their public protest and revelation of their feelings were forms of expression inappropriate to the cultural tradition of Muslim women. Brought together by shared tragedy, they went beyond the traditional reaction to tragedy – a dignified silence, in the home, with the least possible outward manifestations – and came out on the streets with placards calling for the truth and accountability. By making their presence felt and constantly reminding the public of what had happened, they made sure that the tragedy of Srebrenica was not relegated to the sidelines.

Compared with women in the early years of the twentieth century, who had no right to speak out in public and political life, the women of today (with all their limitations in regard to political and public experience, level of education, and civic participation) have become a political factor. They are calling for local and international politicians to be held to account, and showing themselves willing and able to become actively involved in matters that affect their own lives. These activities have been supported by other women's and human rights groups in the region.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- M. Begović, On the position and responsibilities of Muslim women with regard to Islamic teachings and the spirit of the times [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1931.
 S. Penava, Sources and references for problems concerning the emancipation of Muslim women in Bosnia-Herzegovina [in Croatian], in Prilozi 18 (Sarajevo 1981), 273–84.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- V. Bogičević, Literacy in Bosnia-Herzegovina from the origins of Slav literacy to the end of Austro-Hungarian rule in 1918 [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1975.
 For or against unveiling [in Serbo-Croatian], in Reforma, a periodical launched by young people in early 1928 which campaigned for the unveiling and emancipation of women.
 O. N. Hadžić, The Muslim issue in Bosnia-Herzegovina [in Serbo-Croatian], part 1, repr. from Obzor, Zagreb 1902.
 A. Hotić, Causes of the decline of the Islamic peoples [in Serbo-Croatian], Bos. Novi 1913.
 S. Kačar, Women's narratives [in Serbian], Podgorica 2000.
 A. Studnička, What do the Muslims of Bosnia-Herzegovina need to secure a better future? [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1906.
 —, Record of Islamic educational survey [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1911.
 Đ. beg Sulejmanpačić, A proposal for the resolution of the question of our Muslim women [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1918.

NEWSPAPERS

- Novo doba* (published by the Muslim Central Committee), Nova žena (published by the Antifascist Front of the Women of Bosnia-Herzegovina), Sarajevski dnevnik, Oslobodenje, Borba, Ženski svijet.

JASNA BAKŠIĆ MUFTIĆ

The Caucasus and Central Asia

Women's protests in Central Asia and the Caucasus are embedded in the context of history, socio-economics, politics, and gender. In spite of women's participation in the political and economic development of Central Asia and the Caucasus, gender roles still place women in the domestic arena. Within current contexts, women protestors utilize their gender roles as mothers to confront regional regimes. This produces new cultural frames for viewing local women as public women, protectors of men.

Central Asia is a cultural and geographic area of five countries situated in close proximity: Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, and Kyrgyzstan. They are linguistically similar (except Tajikistan), share Islamic religious beliefs and practices, a common history, and internal ethnic diversity. Prior to the nineteenth-century Russian conquest all were a part of Turkestan, and then between 1920 and 1990 a part of the Soviet Union until independence in 1991. All these countries experience local economic decline and vast unemployment. They share quasi-democratic, totalitarian regimes, which persecute political and Islamic opposition. Uzbekistan has enacted harsh laws against religious and secular opposition. Currently, 7,000 detainees are charged with religious and anti-government activities in the country (HRW 2002). Fearing imprisonment, local men are reluctant to protest in the streets. Hoping that they will not be dealt with as harshly as men, local women become publicly active as a way of protecting their male relatives (UDD 2002).

The Caucasus, another cultural and geographic area, includes Armenia; Azerbaijan and Nagorno-Karabakh; Georgia and its three "entities" of Abkhazia, Ajara, and South Ossetia; and the Checheno-Ingush Republic (Chechnya). Although religio-cultural diversity characterizes the region, these administrative entities are united by close proximity to each other and a common historical and sociopolitical background. Conquered by Russia by the nineteenth century, these areas became a part of the Soviet Union. While some republics (Georgia) became independent at the end of the twentieth century, others (Chechnya) are still disputing their administrative relationships with Russia. Politically, these areas are "anocracies," transitional between autocracies and democracies (Marshall 2003, 17). Unlike Central Asian states, the Caucasus has an active opposition, a relatively free press, and a vibrant political life (for example, Azerbaijan). At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the Caucasus suffered from socioeconomic and political instability, due in part to the influx of thousands of refugees, and infrastructural damage resulting from unresolved regional conflicts. Chechnya, a predominantly Muslim republic, has been in armed conflict with Russia for a decade (1994–6 and 1999–2003). During this conflict, Chechen civilians continued to "disappear" while in the custody of Russian Federal troops (HRW 2002). Often left as the sole heads of their families, women in these areas take to the streets to prevent further persecution of their male relatives.

Historically, albeit inconspicuously, women participated in the sociopolitical life of Central Asia and the Caucasus as a separate force or united with men. Women's social positions were transformed by these protests, which were staged by groups as diverse as Soviet ideologues and nativist movements. The regions' oral traditions include stories about women's protests against political and personal subjugation. In the epic "Forty Maidens," Central Asian women warriors physically resisted foreign intrusions and shared the same rights and responsibilities as men (Chatterjee 1997). The oral tradition of the Caucasus describes the foremothers of local women as Amazons. Late nineteenth-century travel accounts report that local women, like Amazons, fiercely resisted Russian conquests. During the siege of the town of Ahloulgo, 400 women threw themselves from the walls of the fortress as a sign of protest (Golovin 1854, 94). Some women, like the Georgian Queen Tamara, assumed state leadership in their societies. In fact, Georgia's power and influence reached its peak during her reign in the twelfth to thirteenth centuries.

At the beginning of the Soviet era, women of these regions took an active part in the transformation of their social positions. In Turkestan in 1916, "Ruzvan-bibi Akhmedzhanova, Zukhra-bibi Musaeva and other women, while protesting against sending their sons to war, were shot dead by [Russian] soldiers" (Alimova). In Turkestan, women's protests against the veil, khudzhum (assault), began on International Women's Day, 1927. Organized by the Sredazburo's (Central Asian Bureau) Zhenotdel (Women's Section) under the direction of Serafima Lubimova and her deputies, these protests triggered social changes, which came at a terrible price for local women (Keller 1998). Inspired by Soviet emancipation rhetoric local women tore off and burned their veils in public. In conjunction with other aspects of the liberation campaign, these public protests inspired thousands of regional women to burn their veils on the spot (Massell 1974). At the same time, this public unveiling drastically increased violence against unveiled women and cost tens of thousands of lives. In 1928 alone, about 300 women were killed either by their close relatives or by basmachi (local guerilla movements) (Popov 1938).

There was no information about regional women's protests during the Soviet period. Some examples were discovered after the disintegration of the Soviet Union, while others were reported outside the country. Under Soviet rule, women were active participants in nationalist movements in the Caucasus. In a popular nationalist protest in 1989, 20 Georgians, most of them women, were killed and hundreds injured when Soviet troops attacked a demonstration in Tbilisi.

Contemporary women's protests underscore political/religious persecution and power abuses by existing regimes. In Uzbekistan on 2 July 2001, an Uzbek militia rounded up about 50 women and their children in Tashkent and 30 in Andijan. These women were protesting against the detention and harsh treatment of their male relatives, alleged members of banned religious groups. Protestors were trying to present a petition addressed to the Uzbek president, which accused the interior ministry's staff of torture and physical pressure against the detainees. Chechen women also protested against the detention, ill-treatment, and disappearance of local males during the Russian federal troops' cleansing operations in Chechnya (HRWWR 2003b). On 15 March 2001, federal troops carried out a punitive operation in the settlement of Novogroznenskii, killing several civilians. In response, several hundred local women blocked traffic on one of the main roads in Chechnya. For three days, they chanted "No to murders, cleansings, robbery and camps! Where are you, leaders of Chechnya? Where are you, muftis? Where are you, judges? They are killing us with your agreement!" (MHRC 2001) Some of these protests are documented either by regional mass media (Chechnya) or on the Internet (Uzbekistan, Chechnya).

Women's protests expose political problems by constructing a sociopolitical critique of the existing regimes around women's roles as mothers and wives, thus becoming a strong political voice and a source of opposition to the local governments. On 21 March 2001, about 300 female protestors in Andijan (Uzbekistan) demanded the release of their male relatives, imprisoned for their religious practices. The signs that women carried read: "2001: Year of the Widow and Orphan," a hollow echo of the Uzbek president's declaration of the year of 2001 as the "Year of the Mother and Child." The demonstration was dispersed by local militia forces (HRWWR 2002). Similarly, in Chechnya on 8 March 2001, International Women's Day, about a hundred women, whose male relatives had disappeared after being arrested by federal troops, gathered in the center of Grozny. They had signs in their hands that read "Russia, return our children!" and "Let our children go!" (PRIMA News Agency 2001).

The regional governments' persecution of female protesters shows that local regimes perceive women's actions as a direct political threat (HRWWR 2003a). In spite of growing harassment, local women challenge the regimes' treatment of civilians by globally publicizing the abuse of power. As a result, the Uzbek government has finally allowed international observers access into some of the country's prisons (HRWWR 2002). Russian authorities also introduced two decrees requiring the presence of local officials during the arrest of civilians in Chechnya, as well as some degree of infrastructure to address grievances. They also began an investigation into disappearances (HRW 2002, HRWWR 2003b).

Although governmental concessions seem to be small and illusory, women's protests persist in publicly confronting existing power relations in the regions by producing a social critique that uses their gender roles as mothers and wives (HRW 2003). Thus, women's protests have become "one of the major channels of public voice" in both Central Asia and the Caucasus at the beginning of the twenty-first century (Norris et al. 2002, 19).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Alimova, Women's issue in Uzbekistan. Lessons of the history and today's objectives, <http://www.undp.uz/GID/eng/UZBEKISTAN/PUBLICATIONS/uz_bul3_7.html>.
- S. Chatterjee, M. Mazumdar, and A. Sengupta, Unveiling stereotypes. Transitional politics and gender in Central Asia, in R. Samaddar (ed.), Women in Asia. Work, culture, and politics in South and Central Asia, Dehli 1997, 101–21.
- I. Golovin, The Caucasus, London 1854.
- HRW (Human Rights Watch), Russia. Chechen "disappearances" continue, New York 2002, <http://www.hrw.org/press/2002/04/chechnya041502.htm>>.
- , Uzbekistan. Progress on paper only. Analysis of the U.S. state department's certification of Uzbekistan, New York 2003, <<http://www.hrw.org/europe/uzbekistan.php>>.
- HRWWR (Human Rights Watch World Report), Uzbekistan, New York 2002, <<http://www.hrw.org/wr2k2/europe22.html>>.
- , Uzbekistan, New York 2003a, <<http://www.hrw.org/wr2k3/europe16.html>>.
- , Russian Federation, New York 2003b, <<http://www.hrw.org/wr2k3/europe11.html>>.
- S. Keller, Trapped between state and society. Women's liberation and Islam in Soviet Uzbekistan, 1926–1941, in Journal of Women's History 10:1 (Spring 1998), 27–36.
- M. Marshall, Global trends in democratization, in M. Marshall and T. R. Gurr (eds.), Peace and conflict 2003, College Park, Md. 2003, 17–23.
- G. Massell, The surrogate proletariat. Moslem women and revolutionary strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1919–1929, Princeton, N.J. 1974.

Memorial Human Rights Center (MHRC), Peaceful mass protests in Chechnya 2001. Human Rights Center "Memorial," <<http://www.memo.ru/eng/memhrc/texts/protests.shtml>>.

P. Norris, S. Walgrave, and P. Van Aelst, Who demonstrates? Anti-state rebels, conventional participants or everyone?, draft, 25 October 2002, forthcoming in Comparative Politics, <<http://ksghome.harvard.edu/~pnorris.shorenstein.ksg/ACROBAT/Who%20demonstrates.pdf>>.

F. Popov, Work among women in Uzbekistan [in Russian], in Antireligioznik 12 (1938), 14.

PRIMA News Agency, Women of Chechnya spend International Women's Day fighting for their children, 9 March 2001, <<http://www.primanews.ru/eng/news/news/2001/3/9/19004.html>>.

Uzbekistan Daily Digest (UDD), Uzbek women beaten up, threatened with rape in detention, Voice of the Islamic Republic of Iran, Mashhad [in Uzbek] 2002, <<http://www.eurasianet.org/resource/uzbekistan/hypemail/200205/0016.shtml>>.

SVETLANA PESHKOVA

Indonesia

Since the beginning of the twentieth century Indonesian women have been voicing their protest at conditions they considered oppressive. Indonesia is the country with the largest Muslim population in the world: 90 percent of its 210 million inhabitants adhere to Islam, so much of women's protest was articulated in terms of Islamic teachings and practices. This multiethnic country has many local traditions in which male dominance is entrenched. As well as Islam, which entered the archipelago in the thirteenth century, Dutch colonialism and post-colonial nationalism are the other major forces that affect women's subordination. Patriarchal structures are most strongly encountered in family relations. The struggle against polygyny has been one of the central elements in the Indonesian women's movement.

HISTORICAL OVERVIEW

In various regions women wielded considerable political, social, and economic power. The Muslim realms of the Moluccas and Aceh were once ruled by queens. Women also led in wars or served as soldiers. When, by the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Dutch consolidated their colonial presence, they strengthened patriarchal and feudal structures. Only the titled and other elite males had access to political and economic power (Onghokham 2003). Racial politics were also introduced. The Muslim population fell under patriarchal Islamic laws, while customary law was applied to the non-Muslim native population. This legal dualism was perpetuated after independence in 1945.

At that time there was some support for the idea of using Islamic law as the foundation of the nation, but for the sake of pluralism this was rejected; however, some groups still favor it.

The first Indonesian modern feminist was Princess Raden Adjeng Kartini, who died during childbirth in 1904. Her passionate and brilliant letters became an inspiration for women all over Indonesia as well as abroad. She struggled against polygyny, forced marriages, feudal customs oppressive to women, and colonial injustice and also advocated women's education. In the pre-independence period, women's struggles concentrated on these areas, as well as trafficking of women and children, the rights of women laborers, and political rights (Suryochondro 1984, Wieringa 2002). The first women's schools were set up in the first decades of the century by such prominent leaders as Dewi Sartika in Bandung and Rahmah El Yunusiah in Western Sumatra. The Muslim women's organization Aisyiyah also set up schools for girls in this period. By 1930 the colonial government prohibited schools set up outside its jurisdiction, as it feared such schools might instill nationalist sentiments. Women were very active in the protest movement that followed.

In 1938 the colonial government granted white women both active and passive political rights, but Indonesian women only passive rights. The Indonesian women's organizations strongly resisted, arguing that in several regions in precolonial times they had also been able to stand for election. Women played an active role both in the armed resistance against the Dutch in colonial times, and in the war for national independence after the Japanese defeat of 1945.

During the Old Order period (1945–65) of Indonesia's first president, Sukarno, the Indonesian women's movement was at its strongest. The most prominent women's organization at that time was the communist-oriented Gerwani, which fought for women's social and political rights, for instance for women's land rights. This militant organization was associated with sexual perversions by the military who, under the leadership of General Suharto, took over from President Sukarno after one of the most bloody massacres of modern history (Wieringa 2002). The New Order regime (1967–98) was characterized by the muting of all democratic forces, including women fighting for their rights. Right-wing women's organizations, including Christian and Muslim groups, rallied against their socialist counterparts. Muslim women's organizations even took over the school that had been set up by Gerwani (Baidlowi 1993). The military regime set up its own women's organizations in which women no longer struggled for their own rights, but were mobilized for the maintenance of military power and for national development as obedient wives and dutiful mothers. The marriage law adopted in 1974 entrenched this process.

This process of depoliticization and domestication of women by the state (Suryakusuma 1987) led to the erosion of women's economic and political rights. Defined as dependent housewives they were exploited as cheap laborers. The colonial policy of denying women subject status before the law was maintained, so that women did not have, for instance, independent access to credit provided by banks.

In the New Order period women did not demonstrate for their own rights, but many women joined other protest movements, such as the human rights or student movements. Women were also in the forefront of the struggles for labor and land rights. In a strongly patriarchal culture such as that of North Sumatra women might bare their breasts in their struggles to prevent their land being taken away from them.

In February 1998 women staged major protests against the high cost of living, particularly of baby milk. By mobilizing the perception of women as mothers with a major responsibility for their children's welfare, the failure of the military New Order was demonstrated. The organization Suara Ibu Peduli (Voices of concerned mothers) brought together women of all social classes. When mass protests followed and major riots broke out (in which many women, particularly of Chinese descent, were raped and killed), President Suharto was forced to step down.

The Reformation Era (after 1998) made it possible for women again to set up mass organizations fighting for women's rights, such as the Indonesian Women's Coalition for Justice and Democracy. One issue that attracted much attention was women's political leadership. Certain Islamic parties declared that Megawati Sukarnoputri (the daughter of former President Sukarno), the leader of the party that had won the 1999 elections, could not become the president of the country. Other Islamic groups and many women's groups contested this. Only in 2002 could she take up the presidency.

Since 1998 many women's groups have emerged or have become more active. Critical issues they are fighting against include the influence of the military and continued human rights violations as well as sexual violence against women. Amid rampant corruption the living conditions of the majority of the people have not improved so that women again take to the streets, protesting at the return of the army to the center of power and at the neoliberal economic policies.

The decentralization policy of the government poses new problems for women. The identities of the newly defined autonomous provinces or regions are constructed along concepts of women's behavior and control over their bodies, often based on particular Islamic interpretations that, for instance, prescribe the veil or restrict their movements. In Aceh several women had their heads shaved for not wearing the veil. Women's groups are divided between those who support the introduction of Islamic law and those who oppose it.

MARRIAGE LAW

One of the issues that have haunted the Indonesian women's movement from its beginning, and which still has not been solved satisfactorily, is that of equal marriage rights for women. While the Indonesian women's movement has been able to unite on many issues, it has continuously been split on the struggle against polygyny. Secular and Christian women's organizations have fought for its abolition while Muslim women's groups have defended it as an essential part of Islamic teaching. Yet individually many Muslim women have taken part in actions to abolish this practice, which demonstrates how Muslim women are controlled by male-dominated Islamic organizations.

After Kartini had first written about the pain polygynous husbands caused their wives, referring to it as a great evil supported by customary law and Islam, the newly formed women's organizations started discussing it. The first all-Indonesian Women's Congress in 1928 proposed to fight for a marriage law that would guarantee women's rights. In 1937 the colonial government proposed a draft marriage law that stipulated monogamy and equal rights for women in divorce. Islamic groups, including women's organizations, strongly opposed it, and the Women's Congress could not support it, in order to preserve its own unity, and also in the face of preserving national unity in the struggle against the Dutch colonial power.

After independence in 1945 the issue was not resolved. In 1952 a government decree guaranteed the widows of polygynous men twice the amount the widow of a monogamous husband would get. Nineteen women's organizations strongly opposed this de facto legalization of polygyny, which also amounted to the state subsidy of the practice. In 1953 women took to the streets, in the first demonstration for women's rights after independence. Muslim women joined individually, not as members of their organizations. Indonesia has two large Islamic women's organizations. Aisyiyah was set up in 1917, as the women's wing of the Muhammadiyah movement. One of their major contributions was the demand to install female judges in the courts dealing with marriage issues. This demand was met in the 1950s. The other Islamic mass women's organization is the women's wing of the Nahdlatul Ulama, the Muslimat Nahdlatul Ulama, which was set up in 1946.

President Sukarno's polygynous marriage in 1954 evoked major protests from women's organizations. Again the major Muslim women's organizations kept silent, as did Gerwani. They aspired to become a mass organization and followed the directive of the Communist Party to always support the national hero, Sukarno. Many individual members deplored this, for Gerwani had always been in the forefront of the struggle for equal marriage rights. In 1958 two draft marriage laws were discussed in parliament, one proposed by the government, and a more radical one proposed by a feminist member of parliament. The discussions were stalled because of opposition from Islamic organizations.

In 1973 again a draft marriage law was proposed that stipulated monogamy and civil marriage. Islamic groups and parties strongly opposed it, both on the streets and in parliament. A compromise was agreed which stipulated that monogamous marriage was the rule, but which allowed polygyny when a woman did not have children, was not able to fulfil her marital duties, or had an incurable illness. Interreligious marriages were prohibited (Saptaningrun 2000).

The fact that polygyny is still allowed provokes much debate. The rules affecting the military and civil servants have been tightened. Men of other groups feel they are free to contact polygamous marriages, even without the consent of the court, which is stipulated in the law. They see it as a deed sanctioned by Islam. Pro-polygyny groups even organized a contest for a Polygamy Award in July 2003. This provoked strong protests from women's groups, including many Muslim women. A group of veiled women wanted to climb onto the stage where the award was being given, claiming that they as women belonging to polygynous groups had the right to be heard. They were prevented from reading their protest statement by security forces. At the time the mass media trumpeted around that the four wives of the men who received the award were happy with him. Yet the first wife openly stated that she was sick at heart at his behavior. Interestingly both pro- and anti-polygamy groups based their arguments on particular interpretations of the Qur'an and used Islamic symbols, such as the veil. This testifies to the plurality of views on Islam, its practices and teachings, in Indonesia. This plurality has become more manifest since the 1990s, when gender issues were widely discussed for the first time within Islamic organizations.

CONCLUSION

Interests of the state or of Islamic groups have often been superimposed on women's interests, even if these had been formulated since the beginning of the women's movement. This has been possible because the major Muslim women's organizations, as well as the largest socialist women's organization, Gerwani, were formed as women's wings of male-dominated parties or organizations, even if they were independent in name. Independent Muslim women's groups have been better able to fight for women's rights. Only since the 1990s have women both within Islamic organizations and outside them touched on areas that had previously been considered male monopolies. Gender analysis and feminist interpretations of Islam have gained wide currency with the translation of many books on such topics into Indonesian. Feminist debates also have a great influence on the general discourse in Indonesia, which is still very much male-oriented. Indonesian feminist interpretations also serve to stem the influence of the Middle Eastern culture that has been promoted by fundamentalist groups who have become stronger since the fall of Suharto.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Anderson, Law reform in the Muslim world, London 1976.
- A. H. Baidlowi, The profile of an Indonesian women's organization. A case study of the Muslimat Nahdlatul Ulama, in L. Marcoes-Natsir and J. Meuleman (eds.), Indonesian Muslim women in textual and contextual studies [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1993.
- R. A. Kartini, Letters to Mrs. Abendanon-Mandri and her husband, trans. S. Sutrisno, Djambatan, Jakarta 1987.
- Ongkhokham, The thugs, the curtain thief and the sugar lord. Power, politics and culture in colonial, Jakarta 2003.
- I. D. Saptaningrum, The history of law no. 1/1974 on marriage and gender stereotyping [in Indonesian], mimeo 2000.
- J. Suryakusuma, State Ibuism. The social construction of womanhood in the Indonesian New Order, M.A. thesis, The Hague 1987.
- S. Suryocondro, A portrait of the Indonesian women's movement [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1984.
- S. Wieringa, Sexual politics in Indonesia, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 2002.

Iran

Despite historical blindness to women's participation in various social and political movements in Iran, scattered accounts show women's involvement in local and national protests, such as riots against bread scarcity, rising prices, and tax increases. Since at least the mid-nineteenth century, women have made enormous contributions to efforts for social change in Iran.

The development of gender consciousness and the women's rights struggle were hindered by sexual segregation and restrictive moral codes, which deprived women of access to literacy, paid work outside the home, and the right to a public presence. Yet there were always exceptional women, such as Ṭāhirah Qurrat al-ʿAyn (1815–51) and Bībī Khānum Astārabādī (1858–1921), who openly exposed and opposed male supremacy and the patriarchal values and practices that barred women from the acquisition of knowledge and access to the country's social and economic resources (Nāṭiq 1358/1980, Nāṭiq and Ādamiyat 1368/1989).

By participating in wider social and political movements of the period, such as the Tobacco Protest of 1891–2, and particularly, the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11, women gained a new political maturity and began to forge an independent political identity. Thus empowered, activists crossed gendered boundaries and social norms. For example, women disguised in men's clothing joined military actions in the civil war that followed ratification of the constitution (Nāhīd 1360/1981); in support of pro-constitution clergymen, others built strongholds on the rooftop of a religious shrine near Tehran, throwing stones at the attacking army.

Disappointment at the consolidation of their legal and social inferiority in the first Iranian constitution subsequent to the victory of the Constitutional Revolution increased activist women's gender consciousness and self-image, giving rise to the Iranian women's movement. In 1906, a group of women marched in the streets of Tehran, took off their veils, and demanded recognition of their rights. Outraged, prominent Constitutionals called them prostitutes hired by "reactionaries" to discredit the revolution (Bayat-Philip 1978).

Women's protests against the injustices to which they were subjected were expressed in remarkably diverse forms. Some sought radical short-term goals while others pursued more lasting, fundamental changes in women's status. These efforts sometimes evoked a violent response. A group of women in Shiraz became targets for mob attacks when they changed their black chador to brown ones, in protest at veiling (Sanasarian 1983, 14). But the women persisted. Activists burned in public a pamphlet written by a clergyman opposed to women's rights (Bāmdād 1977, 63). Adult literacy classes and girls' schools were established at enormous costs to the pioneers of women's rights. Many groups and associations were formed. Over 20 women's periodicals were published between 1910 and 1930.

However, one contradictory result of the evolution of the modern Iranian state under the two Pahlavī Shahs (1925–79), including structural and legal changes in society and economy, was increasing police repression and the creeping extension of autocratic state control over civil society. While some changes benefited women, they also had a damning effect on the burgeoning women's movement (Najmabadi 1991, 56–8). Cooptation of women activists, and the appropriation of the feminist agenda by the state, circumscribed and discredited women's militant efforts, and put a stop to indigenous, radical, and independent forms of protest for over 50 years, to be revived only after the 1979 Revolution, ironically, under the rule of Islamic clergy.

Only a few weeks through the revolution, following Ayatollah Khomeini's decree for the unveiling of women (8 March 1979), Iran saw a chain of women's powerful, spontaneous protest marches, sit-ins, and work stoppages in ministries, hospitals, and girls' high schools (Moghissi 1994). This marked the rebirth of an independent, powerful, and effective women's movement for change. The consolidation of the power of the Islamic state and the political repression and ousting of organized opposition a year later also dismantled many secular women's associations and groups that proliferated immediately after the revolution. Yet political repression has failed to silence women.

Signs of women's resistance to gender barriers and their resistance to legal restrictions and gendered social and moral codes imposed by the new state have been observable throughout the country since the revolution. These have included secular women's defiance of the hijāb code; their remarkable resilience and skill in reclaiming educational and employment spaces they lost after the revolution; the voices of discontent and protest coming from Muslim women activists against gendered values promoted by the media and the education system; and the astute and skillful use of national and international days for protests such as anti-war marches and, more recently, the re-emergence of International Women's Day celebration (Fašl-i Zanān 1382/2003) to voice women's urgent concerns and demands. All these speak, eloquently, to the presence of women as a highly potent political force for social change in contemporary Iran.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Bāmdād, From darkness into light. Woman's emancipation in Iran, ed. and trans. F. R. C. Bagley, Hicksville, N.Y. 1997.
- M. Bayat-Philip, Women and revolution in Iran, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 301–2.
- Y. Dawlatābādī, Hayāt-i Yabiyā, Tehran n.d.
- Faṣl-i zanān*, Tehran 1382/2003.
- K. Millett, Going to Iran, New York 1982.
- H. Moghissi, Populism and feminism in Iran. Women's struggle in a male-defined revolutionary movement, New York 1994.
- ʿA. A. Nāhid, Zanān-i Īrān dar junbish-i mashrūṭa, Tabriz 1360/1981.
- A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality. Women, state and ideology in contemporary Iran, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 48–76.
- H. Nāṭiq, Nigāhī bih barkhī nivistiḥā va mubarazāt-i zanān dar dūra mashrūṭa, in Kitāb-i Jumʿa 30 (1358/1980).
- H. Nāṭiq and F. Ādamiyat, Afkār-i ijtimāʿi, va siyāsī va iqtisādī dar āsar-i muntashir nashudab-i dawrān-i Qājār, Saarbrücken 1368/1989.
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1983.

HAIDEH MOGHISSI

North Africa

Beyond the Mediterranean tradition of patriarchy, whose mechanisms have been uncovered by Germaine Tillon (1996), does it make sense to examine the trajectories of women's struggles in the Maghrib's three main countries (Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco) as part of a single movement? In Tunisia, Bourguiba instituted a system of state-backed feminism, whose preservation nowadays is, for some, one of the last valid reasons to support the regime of Bourguiba's successor against the threat of "Islamist regression." In Algeria, in the period that followed independence from France, the collusion of the Front de libération nationale (FLN) and conservative religious forces to send women back into the home, paved the way for a true "civil war within the civil war" dating back to the early 1990s, in which gender relations are at stake, and that is at least equal in violence to the war between the military and Islamists. Finally, in Morocco, subtle adjustments to the Mālikī tradition, supported by the monarchy, have barely weakened masculine domination, but have given some degree of liberty to elite urban women on the economic, political, and intellectual fronts. In the meantime, ordinary women continue to share with ordinary men the unfavorable fate cast upon the underprivileged by the Sharifian kingdom. These significant differences notwithstanding, the three countries present several common traits forming a system of constraints that determine the way women will organize their struggle in relation to the global societal evolutions of each country, and are indicative of obstacles or even regressions recorded in those societies.

In Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco, resistance to colonization turned the family structure and the preservation of women's honor into the last bastion of a distinctive identity as well as symbols of maintained integrity. As a result, a contradiction emerged between the role of women in the resistance – which was important, particularly in Algeria and Morocco – and women's ability to articulate autonomous demands. An additional possible consequence was the continued subjugation of women. In contexts where the aim for reform constituted the modality of both the interactions and the confrontation with the colonial power and its "civilizing mission," the first "feminists" in the Maghrib were men: Tahar Haddad and Bourguiba in Tunisia; Ben Badis and Ferhat Abbas in Algeria; and Sultan Mohamed Ben Youssef and Allal al-Fassi in Morocco. They preached the renovation of the feminine condition by the resurrection of the models of pious ancestors. But as soon as women took it upon themselves to articulate their own demands, they faced the recurring accusation of Westernization, notably on the issues of the veil, polygamy, and ṭalāq (repudiation).

Once independence was obtained, the one-party systems in place in Algeria and Tunisia, and the monarchy in the case of Morocco, did not deem it necessary to address the question of the place of women in society as a specific issue: as long as the state promised improvements in the condition of women – and delivered them in the sectors of education, health, and employment – women were strongly discouraged from raising the question of their status, in spite of the fact that the constitutions of all three countries stated that they should enjoy the same rights and responsibilities as men. A long period of latency followed, during which women's demands could only be expressed – cautiously – through organizations created by and under the control of the state or the single party – the Union nationale des femmes tunisiennes, created by Bourguiba in 1958; the Union nationale des femmes algériennes, created in 1963 under the supervision of the FLN; and the Union nationale des femmes marocaines, created in 1969 by the monarchy and headed by the sister of King Hassan II – or within the framework of the trade unions.

In all three countries, new forms of protest, specifically feminist in their nature, have arisen through the realization that improvements – very real in Tunisia and Algeria; less so, or at least limited to certain sectors, in Morocco – did not translate into a transformation of women's status, or worse, were used as a justification for the consolidation of the patriarchal order. These new forms of protest explicitly challenge the nature of gender relations and question the reformist framework within which women's rights and status have been discussed up to this moment. Still in question, in terms that are specific to each country, is the possibility for feminine demands and modes of action to move toward an increased degree of autonomy. Without delving into the details of mobilizations taking place in each of the three countries, a number of common characteristics can be identified.

One is the focus on the question of personal status, particularly in Algeria and in Morocco, where feminist demands have centered around the re-examination of the Family Code enacted by the Assemblée nationale populaire in 1984 in Algeria, and of the Mudawwana (code of personal status) promulgated by Mohamed V in 1957 in Morocco. Both codes adhere to the Muslim Shari'a on issues such as polygamy, repudiation, matrimonial guardianship, and inheritance. In both countries, protest is voiced through press releases, petitions, and, less frequently, marches and demonstrations organized by groups of women often comprised of intellectuals and scholars, who have difficulties relating to women from lower classes, especially rural women. At the core of the argument formulated by feminists in Algeria and Morocco is the denunciation of the codes as unconstitutional insofar as they contradict the principle of equality of all citizens affirmed in each country's constitution, and are incompatible with international conventions signed by both countries. In Algeria, no notable results have been achieved: the regime's promises to re-examine the Family Code are regularly forgotten as soon as the electoral campaigns have ended, as was the case in 1999 when Abdelaziz Bouteflika was elected president, and after the May 2002 legislative elections. More substantial progress has been attained in Morocco, where in October 2003, King Mohamed VI implemented profound changes to the Mudawwana, which fulfilled some of the most fundamental demands by militant members of the women's movement – in particular the abolition of matrimonial guardianship (wilāya), the restriction of polygamy, and the institution of legal divorce in place of talāq. In Tunisia, feminist protest tends to align itself with a more general movement that favors human rights against the authoritarian regime of Zinelabidine Ben Ali – though some women willingly accept token positions in government. In a country whose personal status code is considered the most progressive in the region, women's resistance since the 1980s has been based on the denunciation of the dichotomy that exists between the law and promises made by politicians, which outline tangible benefits for women that must be defended, and the reality of masculine domination, which, for intellectuals in feminist circles, appears to have been only superficially challenged.

In Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia alike, the question of women's participation in the political process tests the ability of feminist militants to put in place autonomous organizational structures in a fundamentally hostile environment: since they have not succeeded in influencing single parties or parties that hold some sort of monopoly on political legitimacy, such as the FLN, the Neo-Destour, or the Union socialiste des forces populaires (USFP), which they cannot afford to leave, feminist militants tend to rely on two fall-back strategies as they organize themselves. First, they work within the realm of civil society by creating an increasing number of associations specializing in problems that affect women (literacy, single mother assistance, domestic violence, and so forth) as well as general interest non-governmental organizations, which operate independently of "official" feminist groups – the Association démocratique des femmes du Maroc and the Union de l'action féminine in Morocco; Egalité, émancipation et promotion and the Association pour le triomphe du droit des femmes in Algeria; Club Tahar Haddad, the Association des femmes universitaires, and the Association tunisienne des femmes démocrates in Tunisia – and whose objective is to put pressure on the political establishment. Second, they concentrate on the regional and international arenas, where they work through human rights organizations, the United Nations system, European and North American feminist organizations, and foundations for development assistance. This strategy has yielded some positive results in recent years: for instance, the World Bank's technical and financial assistance in the preparation of the "Plan d'intégration des femmes au développement" drafted by a group of Moroccan feminists and later embraced by the new government. Another achievement was the collaboration of feminists from Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia, who started the Collectif 95 Maghreb-Egalité in order to be represented at the fourth United Nations World Conference on Women in Beijing in 1995. Consider also that the support for the Palestinian intifada between 1987 and 1989 and since 2000, or for the Iraqi people during the Gulf war of 1990–1 and since the beginning of the American occupation in 2003 have provided ideal opportunities for feminists in the Maghrib to unite and minimize their differences.

In all three countries, feminist demands regarding women's personal status provide a central argument and a powerful lever for mobilization to Islamists and all kinds of conservatives who denounce the collusion of feminists with the Western world and with corrupt regimes as they conspire against Islam. In Algeria, the support of some feminists for repression of the Islamic movement has given credence to these accusations. In Tunisia and Morocco, especially since the 1990s, feminists have also come up against the emergence of what can only be called "Islamist feminism," whose proponents – some, if not all – have adopted most feminist demands in terms of education, employment, and participation in the political process, while still calling for the enforcement of the Shari'a as it applies to personal status. In countries where Western models are discredited more than ever before, the ability of Islamist feminists to reach milieus that secularist feminism is unable to access appears to be one of the key factors in the struggle of women in the contemporary Maghrib.

Translation from the French by Matthieu Dalle,
University of Louisville

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Z. Daoud, Féminisme et politique au Maghreb, Casa-blanca 1993.
G. Tillion, Le haram et les cousins, Paris 1966.

ALAIN ROUSSILLON

Palestine

Over the past century, Palestinian women's political protest has been anchored in nationalist responses to colonialism, dispossession, and military occupation. Despite a tumultuous history marked by serial crises, social fragmentation, and statelessness, women's forms and focuses of protest have been remarkably enduring.

A defining moment in the history of women's organized protest was the 1929 gathering of 200 elite Muslim and Christian women in Jerusalem to found the Arab Women's Congress; resolutions against Zionist colonization were delivered to the British High Commissioner and a demonstration of women in a honking car cavalcade wound around Jerusalem. Resolutions and demonstrations represent two consistent features of Palestinian women's protest: the first, appeals to justice or, more prosaically, public relations, and the second, public protest that both breaks and uses gender boundaries. The unveiling of women at the congress also highlighted aspects of modernity that were to become contested issues in Palestinian women's activism. Articles in the Arabic press (often by women) during British rule (1917–47) contained both a modernizing discourse of "women's awakening" and a more traditional call for women to defend men, home, and family (Fleischmann 2003). Both discourses resonate throughout the century.

Most Palestinian women, including the 70 percent of peasant women living in villages, were not represented at the congress. While elite-popular divisions have characterized other women's movements in the Arab region, the Palestinian situation is distinguished by the role of peasants, and particularly peasant women, as national signifiers, and by the sustained and multiple roles of peasant women in maintaining resistance whether in the 1936–39 Great Revolt, in exile in refugee camps, or under Israeli military occupation. Peasant women's repertoire of protest has included aid to militants, intervention in arrests, silence and misidentification of militants, manipulating their "inferior" status to smuggle weapons (Swedenburg 1995, 180), comfort to the injured and families of the martyrs, as well as casting responsibilities of care and socialization in terms of nationalist resistance. Older and married women have served as expressive voices for the community: cursing soldiers, praising courage, and mourning the dead. More organized protest activities have centered on prisoners, including sit-ins and demonstrations, sometimes bringing women together across socioeconomic divides. Elite and later middle-class women have made varied efforts to link with rural and poor refugee women, most successfully in the first Palestinian intifada (1987–93). Student activism has also been a bridge between classes and social groups, particularly with the sharp rise in female education commencing in the 1960s, when many young women and men were the first in their families to enter secondary or post-secondary education.

In the wake of mass dispossession and the fragmentation of Palestinian society in 1948, elite women turned largely to charitable or service activities to meet the needs of the refugee population as well as continuing in appeals to the international community. Women in refugee camps engaged in scattered protests, participating in demonstrations, sometimes against the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), the agency in charge of Palestinian refugees, sometimes against the state regime. Statelessness, where any “rights” granted by prevailing powers were both difficult to acquire and could be withdrawn arbitrarily, also increased women’s role as mediators and strategists for the travel documents, food rations, and security approval needed for family and individual survival and mobility, a role that turned easily to protest. Older women might use their status to defy officials whether by simply jumping queues or by haranguing a soldier to see a detained son. Although Palestinian female students joined in the widespread Nasserist protests of the day in Jordan and Lebanon, there were not substantial numbers of female prisoners until the period of Israeli occupation.

The June 1967 war and the founding of the Palestinian resistance opened up new arenas and possibilities for women’s protest, and at the same time the military occupation of the West Bank and Gaza imposed new restrictions. In the latter context, practices of daily life became reinterpreted as ṣumūd (steadfastness) and often acts of resistance. Tilling the land, picking wild thyme, contacting a relative in Lebanon, or even going to school, could be illegal acts. In Jordan and Lebanon, the armed resistance brought women into its ranks (to some extent) and made refugee camps sites of mobilization where new roles of women as militant cadre (usually the young and unmarried) joined the more familiar informal roles of women assisting fighters and undertaking neighborhood-based actions when their camps were under siege (Petee 1991). These activities continued even after the departure of the organized Palestinian resistance: in the wake of the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon, women spontaneously organized a commemorative march despite the high risk (Sayigh 1991).

The widespread and visible participation of Palestinian women in the intifada that erupted in the West Bank and Gaza in December 1987 against Israeli military occupation took place in the context of the earlier rise of mass-based women’s, students’, and community voluntary work associations (Taraki 1990). From 1978, women’s committees, led by former student activists, were linked to clandestine political movements, but had considerable independence of action. Their leadership consciously broke from the charitable mode of women’s activism and aimed to link with rural and refugee camp women. Although formal membership in these committees was limited, they provided a framework at the local level for women’s protest where even informal activities, like visiting families of the martyred, injured, or detained, were charged with an “organized” aspect. The first year of the intifada saw weekly women’s marches from churches and mosques and women were particularly active in the educational committees that taught children (illegally) when schools were closed by military order (Jad 1999). A series of emblematic Women’s Day’s demonstrations on 8 March 1988 showed the women’s movement at full force, with participation across classes and locales. A leaflet issued by “the Palestinian women’s movement” proclaimed a dominant theme: “Let each women consider the wounded and imprisoned her own children.” Women’s extension of their mothering and domestic roles to include the community (Giacaman and Johnson 1988, Petee 1997) was a noted feature of the first intifada. A remarkable level of women’s participation was confirmed in a 1995 survey of 6,024 married women where nearly half the women had protected someone, usually a young man, from arrest by the Israeli army, over a third had marched in a demonstration, and over a quarter had thrown stones. On average, women had engaged in these activities at least ten times (Huntington et al. 2001, 10). Another significant feature of the intifada period was growing links with Israeli and international women’s peace groups.

While some analysts saw women’s public participation as drawing them away from the isolation and repression of domestic life (Strum 1992) others identified the home and family as sites of protest and transformation, whether women were defending their home against invasion, mobilizing family and kin networks for protest, or mothers were using narrative strategies and social support to constitute the heroic self of an imprisoned son (Jean-Klein 2000). Women’s protest also encountered backlash in the form of a campaign to impose the ḥijāb (headscarf) on women in Gaza. Coupled with the male political hierarchy failing to recognize women’s leadership in the intifada, social and gender issues (the terms were often conflated) became a new focus of women’s protest, particularly in the interim period of nascent state-building (1996–2000). Women’s protest had a dual focus in the interim period: first, for equality as “citizens” in legislation and governance under the Palestinian Authority and second, against continued Israeli occupation, with a particular emphasis on prisoners, land and Israeli settlements, and Israel’s closure of the Palestinian territory.

The second intifada, which erupted in September 2000, has been sharply contrasted with the first in terms of participation by both women and civil society as a whole (Johnson and Kuttab 2001). Aside from the distinct features of the second intifada, including Israel's excessive force, the consequent extreme risk of public protest, and the Palestinian turn to militarism, the demobilization of the interim period and the profound crisis in Palestinian nationalism in the wake of the Oslo accords weakened abilities to mobilize and organize (Hammami and Johnson 1999). Although scattered candlelight marches and other peaceful protests occurred, usually sponsored by women's organizations, women's main avenue of protest lay in neighborhood and community activities such as participation in funeral marches and visiting families of the dead and wounded. If in the first intifada previous practices of steadfastness ripened into organized resistance, sumūd and organized resistance in the second intifada seem sharply divided, with women, and most civilians, in an increasingly difficult struggle to maintain the rudiments of daily life. The separation of communities through Israeli policies of closure and siege also weakened political organization, while borders and crossing points – and the building of the separation wall – became sites of both women's formal and informal protest, side by side with rites of humiliation and repression.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- E. Fleischmann, The nation and its "new" women. The Palestinian women's movement, 1920–1948, Berkeley, 2003.
- R. Giacaman and P. Johnson, Palestinian women. Building barricades and breaking barriers, in Z. Lockman and J. Beinín (eds.), Intifada. The Palestinian uprising against Israeli occupation, Boston 1990, 155–69.
- R. Hammami and P. Johnson, Equality with a difference. Gender and citizenship in transitional Palestine, in Social Politics 6 (Fall 1999), 314–43.
- R. Huntington, B. C. Fronk, and B. Chadwick, Family roles of contemporary Palestinian women, in Journal of Contemporary Family Studies 32:1 (Winter 2001), 1–19.
- I. Jad, From salons to the popular committees. Palestinian women 1919–89, in I. Pappé (ed.), The Israel/Palestine question. Rewriting histories, London 1999, 249–68.
- I. Jean-Klein, Mothering, statecraft and subjectivity in the Palestinian intifada, in American Ethnologist 27:1 (2000), 100–27.
- P. Johnson and E. Kuttab, Where have all the women (and men) gone? Reflections on gender and the second Palestinian intifada, in Feminist Review 69:1 (Winter 2001), 21–43.
- A. Kavar, Daughters of Palestine. Leading women of the Palestinian national movement, Albany, N.Y. 1996.
- J. Peteet, Gender in crisis. Women and the Palestinian resistance movement, New York 1991.
- , Icons and militants. Mothering in the danger zone, in Signs 23:1 (1997), 103–29.
- R. Sayigh, Palestinian women and politics in Lebanon, in J. E. Tucker (ed.), Arab women. Old boundaries, new frontiers, Washington, D.C. 1993, 175–94.
- P. Strum, The women are marching. The second sex and the Palestinian revolution, Chicago 1992.
- T. Swedenburg, Memories of revolt. The 1936–39 rebellion and the Palestinian national past, Minneapolis, Minn. 1995.
- L. Taraki, The development of Palestinian political consciousness, in J. Nassar and R. Heacock (eds.), Intifada. Palestine at the crossroads, New York 1990, 53–72.

PENNY JOHNSON

Purdah in South Asia

The issue of purdah (literally “curtain,” limiting interaction between men and women outside well defined categories, see Papanek 1982, 194) became central to the effort of the women's movement in India in the early twentieth century. It was viewed as the one custom most responsible for confining Hindu and Muslim women to their traditional domestic roles. Women's protest against purdah provided a commonality of interests that appeared to supersede communal differences and furthered cooperation on political and economic issues. The Indian women's movement was the culmination of efforts by women leaders, both Hindu and Muslim, to move away from the shadow of male reformers of the nineteenth century and to become directly involved in women's education and their social and economic independence, the very issues that had traditionally held them back.

The sanction for purdah or seclusion of Muslim women is ascribed to an injunction in the Qur'an urging modesty for men and women: “Say to the believers, that they cast down their eyes. . . . And say to believing women, that they cast down their eyes . . . and reveal not their adornments save such as outward, and let them cast their veils over their bosoms” (Arberry 1973, 49). Among the Hindus the custom had been institutionalized into the social structure, for which justification was found in the Puranas, Mahabharata, and the Ramayana (Stuers 1968, 79, Gordon 1968, 7). Muslim purdah in the early twentieth century was characterized by the wearing of an over garment or burqa. This was considered an advance, since it enabled mobility outside the house while still maintaining seclusion (Amin 1996, 130).

Purdah, along with semi-religious social taboos, became identified with child marriages and the inability of child widows to be independent, as Hindu reformers in the nineteenth century turned their attention to the situation of women. The custom of purdah had led to the closing of options available to women outside marriage compounded by lack of inheritance rights and if widowed, no prospect of remarriage. Their lives, from birth onwards, were entirely controlled by the father or by the husband's family. Though Hindu purdah is observed within the family between male and female members and Muslim purdah is from the outside world (Papanek 1982, 194), and despite regional variations in patriarchal structures, the purdah mentality existed in all regions. While child marriage and lack of widow remarriage were not specifically associated with Islam, the pervasiveness of cultural and regional customs tended to influence both communities and to supersede specific Muslim laws pertaining to women (Lateef 1990, 62–4), depriving them of the right to education, inheritance, and remarriage.

Muslim reformers did not immediately join their Hindu counterparts in condemning such customs. However, as the debate on the position of women evolved, the lack of education and early marriage became inextricably linked to the custom of purdah. In the nineteenth century Muslim reformers focused on purdah and argued that the rigidity with which it was enforced exceeded the original intent of the Qur'ān. A distinction was drawn between customary purdah and the Qur'ānic requirement of modesty (Ali 2000, 10). Reformist teaching, emanating from the Dar-ul-Ulum at Deoband urged Muslim women to absorb a mixture of Islamic and Western education and impart it to the family and the community in order to protect Muslim society from colonial influences (Ali 2000, 11, 12). By 1899, Bengali intellectuals were urging Western education for Muslim women though not the total abandonment of purdah (Amin 1996, 198). Neither Hindu nor Muslim reformers wanted to alienate conservative societies of the time. However, even Muslim conservatives had difficulty justifying the custom on the basis of Qur'ānic injunctions (Rahman 1982, 291).

Since girls' education was considered the most important factor in reducing the incidence of purdah and raising age at marriage, the Mohammadan Educational Conference, established in 1886 to promote English education in the community, passed the first resolution urging the education of women in 1888. By 1896 a separate segment was devoted to women's education and in 1903 women began to participate in the activities of the conference (Nehru n.d., 23).

The pace of change and social support for women varied between regions (including united Bengal and Punjab, currently Bangladesh and Pakistan) depending upon the extent of purdah and the activities of reform groups. In Bengal the activities of Hindu reformers were reflected in Muslim women's writing (Amin 1996, xiii). The political ferment in the Muslim community in India and abroad mobilized the community and encouraged women to organize politically. This was strengthened by the setting up of purdah clubs, which increased the interaction between women of the Western educated Muslim community. They became venues for discussion of contemporary issues, for exchanging information and experiences outside the confines of the family. The Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam (Muslim Ladies' Association or Conference) was set up in Hyderabad in 1901 (Zaidi 1937, 107), in Aligarh in 1905 (Mirza 1969, 13), in Lahore in 1907 (Shahnawaz 1971, 25), and in Calcutta in 1913 (ibid., 94). The leadership of these organizations was drawn from prominent families already involved in political and educational activities. Polygamy, education, and the constraints imposed by purdah on the exercising of rights in the Sharī'a were their main concerns.

With the proliferation of women's organizations, it was inevitable that non-partisan national organizations would be created to cater to the broader needs of women. The establishment of the Women's Indian Association in Madras in 1917 and the All India Women's Conference (AIWC) in 1928 drew many women of ability across the religious spectrum. The work of these organizations went beyond social issues such as purdah and widow remarriage to political participation. To most women leaders, both Hindu and Muslim, purdah and its restrictions were to be cast aside so that women could participate in social and political policymaking that directly affected them.

The women's movement benefited from the momentum of the nascent national movement. The imprisonment of male leaders enabled women to set aside purdah and their restrictive familial roles to step forward in their place. The activities of Abadi Banu Begum and Bi Amman were just such an example. Bi Amman, the mother of prominent Muslim politicians Shaukat Ali and Muhammad Ali, active in the 1920s–1930s, acted as a bridge between the women's and the political movements. At meetings to encourage women's participation, Bi Amman was propelled into the political limelight. In 1917, she appeared in a burqa and spoke at the Muslim League and Congress meetings alongside Hindu women leaders. Her activities, commitment to the political aspirations of the Muslim community, nationalist credentials, and her effort to recruit women to both movements, provided the women in purdah a connection to the national movement. This was demonstrated at a public meeting in Punjab. When arguing that the whole audience was after all part of her family, she lifted the veil of her burqa and came out of purdah (Minault 1982, 252–4).

The formation of non-partisan women's groups enabled Muslim and Hindu women to fight together for their rights and to steadily recognize the irrelevance of purdah. Sultan Jahan Begum, the politically active ruler of Bhopal, shifted from a position of support for purdah to its renunciation. Early in her rule she opposed coeducational institutions because of the prevalence of purdah. In 1922 she reportedly wrote that "to expect Muslim girls to go to schools and colleges with open faces or with veils on with boys to obtain instruction . . . is tantamount to the death of their finer sentiments, morality and religion" (Roshini 1946, 11, 92). Several years later, in a report of the AIWC, she is quoted as having said: "The present strictness of purdah system among Muslims does not form part of their religious obligations. The Mussalmans should coolly and calmly decide whether by respecting a mere custom should they keep their women in a state of suspended animation" (Kaur 1968, 26). It was only in 1929, when she presided over the AIWC session, that she publicly and symbolically removed her purdah. At that session a resolution against purdah was passed (Caton 1930, 123).

Though purdah had already been identified as the chief impediment to the progress of women in the nineteenth century, it was not till the formation of the women's movement in the twentieth century that women leaders belonging to politically active families were able to render purdah irrelevant and to center women's issues within the goals of the national movement. In turn, the national movement with its broad alliance of communities provided women leaders with a platform that gave no importance to their traditional roles or purdah but instead supported them in promoting issues that increased their social and political participation and created links between communities and regions across the subcontinent, even when political aspirations of male leaders and political parties diverged (Lateef 1990, 85).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. Ali, The emergence of feminism among Indian Muslim women, 1920–1947, Oxford 2000.
- S. N. Amin, The world of Muslim women in colonial Bengal, 1876–1939, Leiden 1996.
- A. J. Arberry, The Koran interpreted, New York 1973.
- A. R. Caton, The key of progress, Oxford 1930.
- D. Gordon, Women of Algeria. An essay on change, Cambridge, Mass. 1968.
- M. Kaur, Role of women in the freedom movement, Delhi 1968.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities 1890s–1980s, New Delhi 1990.
- G. Minault, Purdah politics. The role of Muslim women in Indian nationalism, 1911–1924, in H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982, 245–61.
- S. H. Mirza, Muslim women's role in the Pakistan movement, Lahore 1969.
- S. K. Nehru (ed.), Our cause, Allahabad n.d.
- M. A. Nuhuman, Ethnic identity, religious fundamentalism and Muslim women in Sri Lanka, in Muslim Women's Research and Action Forum, Alternative perspectives. A collection of essays on contemporary Muslim society, Colombo 1997, 11, 12; also in Women Living under Muslim Laws, Dossier 21 (September 1998), 89–111.
- F. Rahman, The status of women in Islam. A modernist interpretation, in H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982, 285–310.
- Roshini*, publication of the All India Women's Conference, 11 (February 1946).
- J. Shahnawaz, Father and daughter, Lahore 1971.
- C. Vreede-de Stuers, Parda. A study of Muslim women's life in northern India, New York 1968.
- S. M. H. Zaidi, Muslim womanhood in revolution, Calcutta 1937.

SHAHIDA LATEEF

Political-Social Movements: Revolutionary

Egypt

Women have played a prominent role in Egyptian revolutionary movements over the last century. The three major revolutionary movements have mirrored the three broad, overlapping political trends that have shaped Egyptian politics in the twentieth century: nationalist, leftist, and Islamist.

The participation of women in the 1919 Revolution has been enshrined in Egyptian nationalist historiography as the beginning of Egyptian women's public participation in the nation. The events of 1919 were touched off in March by the deportation of Sa'd Zaghlūl, leader of the nationalist Wafd (delegation) party, by the British colonial authorities. As news of the deportation spread, cities and towns erupted in mass strikes and demonstrations against British rule. Modes of women's participation in anti-colonial activism tended to be class specific. Elite women formed the Wafdist Woman's Central Committee, participated in organized strikes and provided support to the efforts of the Wafd's Central Committee. Lower-class women participated in spontaneous street demonstrations; some were killed by British troops and honored as martyrs to the Egyptian nationalist cause. In the countryside, rural women provided food and assistance to activists charged with sabotaging the rail lines.

Although Egyptian nationalist accounts have come to stress women's militant participation in demonstrations and their martyrdom at the hands of British troops, the iconography of the revolution itself relied heavily on familial imagery which stressed the maternal roles women had to play in revolution. Sa'd Zaghlūl's wife Šafiyya played a prominent political role during the unrest of 1919, making speeches to crowds who gathered in front of her home, which was popularly known as Bayt al-Umma (House of the nation), and writing articles in support of political action. Her actions, however, were conceptualized as part of her duties as Zaghlūl's wife and her role as Umm al-Miṣriyyīn (Mother of the Egyptians) rather than as radical political acts in their own right. Šafiyya's role as a symbol of the proper Egyptian woman, sacrificing for nation and family, served to justify the new sorts of political activities women were undertaking even as it circumscribed more radical claims that women could make on the basis of those activities. When Egypt was granted independence in 1922 and the 1923 constitution recognized the principle of universal male suffrage, feminist demands for the vote on the basis of revolutionary participation were ignored.

The immediate post-Second World War period witnessed a second wave of revolutionary activity brought on by the political deadlock produced by the struggle for control between the monarchy, the Wafd, and the British and the emergence of new social and political movements. Leftist organizations which rose to prominence during this period, including communist, socialist, and labor groups maintained a broad, ideological commitment to women's rights as part of their general programs aimed at securing wider social, political, and economic rights for the lower and middle classes and included women in leadership positions. The student movement in particular saw active women's participation and leadership, among them Sayza Nabarāwī, Laṭīfa Zayyāt, Widād Mitri, and Injī Aflāṭūn. For the most part, however, the platforms of such organizations de-emphasized specific feminist struggle, subsuming the issue of women's liberation into the broader struggle for the liberation of the Egyptian masses. Nonetheless, the general atmosphere of radical political activism encouraged the formation of ad hoc groups and committees (such as the League of Women Students and Graduates of the University and Egyptian Institutes, the Committee of Young Women, and the Women's Committee for Popular Resistance), which organized specifically around women's issues and mobilization, providing a forum for new articulations of the relationship between class, nation, and feminism.

The other major revolutionary movement during the post-Second World War period was the Muslim Brotherhood, which advocated the end of British and Western influence in Egypt and the institution of a government based upon Islamic principles. A fundamental part of their program was the return to what they argued as more Islamically "traditional" roles for women, valorizing women's roles as mothers and wives whose religiously ordained place was in the home. The Muslim Brotherhood was an exclusively male organization, but it often coordinated activities with another Islamist group, the Muslim Sisters, led by Zaynab al-Ghazālī. Like the Muslim Brotherhood, the Muslim Sisters defined women primarily as mothers, calling on them to take up their duty to raise the next generation of Muslim believers.

The 1952 "Revolution" was actually a military coup led by Gamal Abdel Nasser who claimed to embody the popular and revolutionary will of the Egyptian people. As part of its avowed task to make Egypt into a modern, independent nation by mobilizing previously disenfranchised groups and achieving social justice, the Nasser regime granted women the right to vote and hold public office, the right to work, and the right to obtain an education on the same level as men. Although women gained recognition as enfranchised citizens, however, like other groups they lost political autonomy. In 1954, political parties were abolished in favor of a series of single party organizations. Many women who were active in revolutionary organizations in the 1940s, such as Zaynab al-Ghazālī and Injī Aflaṭūn were jailed, as were other Islamists and communists.

In the post-Infitaḥ period, political Islam has become the main framework of revolutionary opposition to the Egyptian regime. Revolutionary Islamist groups such as Takfīr wa-Hijra, Jihād, and the Jamī'at al-Islāmiyya trace their roots back to the Muslim Brotherhood. What distinguishes these radical groups from the majority of Islamist organizations (which are reformist in nature) is that they advocate the violent overthrow of the Egyptian state. What revolutionary Islamist groups share with reformist groups is a common conception of women's primary roles as mothers and spouses. Within the context of Islamist struggle, however, these are viewed as fundamentally political, not social, roles. There has been significantly more scholarship on the participation of women in the project of Islamic reform (as opposed to Islamic revolution). What information exists suggests that women's activities vary from organization to organization. Female members of Jihād have often been used to carry explosives and messages between cells as well as forge links with other revolutionary groups. For the most part, however, women in revolutionary Islamist organizations have been primarily charged with "reproducing" the female ranks of the organization, by identifying wives for male organization members and spreading dā'wa (the call) through prayer meetings and study groups.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Botman, The experience of women in the Communist movement, in Women's Studies International Forum 11:2 (1988), 117-26.
 Z. al-Ghazālī, Ayyām min ḥayātī, Cairo n.d.
 A. Karam, Women, Islamisms and the state, New York 1998.

A. Khater and C. Nelson, Al-harakah al-nisā'iyyah. The women's movement and political participation in modern Egypt, in Women's Studies International Forum 11:2 (1988), 465-83.

A. L. al-Sayyid Marsot, The "revolutionary gentlewomen" in Egypt, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women and the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 261-76.

L. Zayyat, The search. Personal papers, trans. S. Bennet, London 1992.

Laura Bier

Indonesia

In 1942 colonial rule over Indonesia ended with the defeat of the Dutch by the Japanese. When the imperial army was conquered in 1945 Indonesia declared its independence. A national liberation war of four years followed. Women's participation in the nationalist and revolutionary movement was considerable. Until 1965 Indonesia's first president, Sukarno, steered Indonesia on a nationalist and socialist course. The Communist Party, the PKI, gained considerable influence and became the third largest communist party in the world. Islamic and right-wing military forces resented this development. A bloody putsch by left-wing colonels in 1965 was followed by a massacre of socialist groups, spurred on by military-instigated accusations of sexual perversions allegedly committed by young communist women. This led ultimately to the establishment of a right-wing military regime under general Suharto. Women played critical roles in these developments. The women's wing of the PKI, Gerwani, became a women's mass organization until it was banned in 1966. Right-wing women took to the streets after the putsch and demanded the banning of Gerwani.

NATIONAL LIBERATION

By the beginning of the twentieth century the newly-educated indigenous elite of Indonesia began to harbor nationalist sentiments. Inspired by the brilliant letters of the young Javanese princess Kartini (Kartini 1987), women began to chart their own course, which combined demands for their own rights, notably that of education with national liberation. The first women's organization was set up in 1912. In the following years many more organizations were formed, particularly in Java and the Minangkabau, a region in Sumatra that is characterized both by matrilineal customary law and a strict adherence to Islam. Both religious (Muslim and Catholic) and socialist women organized themselves. A major Islamic organization, Aisiyyah, was set up in 1917 mainly to give women religious instruction. They opposed a major demand of non-Islamic women's organizations, monogamy in marriage. Socialist women organized under the banner of a male-dominated socialist Islamic organization, the Sarekat Rakyat (People's league). In those years socialist and Islamic views were not so much perceived to clash as they would be in later years. The PKI, established in 1924, counted several women among its members. Some of them were also involved in the 1925–6 communist uprising, which was quickly crushed by the colonial government.

In 1928 the first all-Indonesian women's congress was held. Until the Japanese occupation, the unity of the women's movement was continuously threatened by the opposition between Islamic and non-Islamic groups over the issue of marriage reforms. Gradually the women's movement rallied behind the nationalist movement. Their leaders maintained that Indonesian women could only be emancipated after national liberation was won. Sukarno spoke of women as being the "second wheel of the chariot" of national liberation (Sukarno 1963, 255).

Women joined the guerilla war against the Dutch who refused to accept Indonesia's independence and tried to regain control of the region. Some young, radical women joined the Laswi, women's army units, and engaged in active combat. Others were engaged as messengers. Many more were involved in public kitchens to feed the fighters and in hospitals to care for the wounded soldiers.

Several national women's meetings were held during the years the national liberation struggle lasted. This period culminated in a major national women's congress held in August 1949, which was attended by 82 groups from all religions. Major women's interests were formulated, such as equal rights for women, protection for women workers, and education. The unity achieved at this congress was geared toward the achievement of national unity but left two major issues unresolved – the extent of the marriage reforms discussed (Suwondo 1981), and the struggle for socialist emancipation.

WOMEN AND SOCIALIST NATIONALISM

The reign of Indonesia's first president, Sukarno, lasted until 1965. This was a period of nation building in which women and men were swept up in nationalist rhetoric, which became increasingly socialist. The new constitution of the republic guaranteed women equal rights, but the marriage issue remained unsolved. Now that the struggle for national independence was won, non-socialist women retreated to the domestic realm and left the political arena to men. Particularly religious (both Muslim and Christian) women increasingly returned to the "kodrat wanita," an essentialist, supposedly divinely-ordained code of women's conduct, which stipulates women's obedience to men. Gerwani was founded in 1950. Many of its members had been actively engaged in the guerilla struggle against the Dutch. In the first years they focused on building a small group of dedicated women. After 1954 they followed an instruction from the PKI, and started building a mass movement of revolutionary women. The PKI saw itself as the head of an Indonesian "communist family" in which Gerwani was assigned the role of the "mother." After 1959, when Sukarno established his authoritarian rule called "Guided Democracy," Gerwani also became radicalized. It was the only women's organization that refused to leave the national political arena to men. The organization's "militant mothers" (Wieringa 2002) concentrated less on gender concerns than they had in their first years but increasingly voiced national concerns. This led to tensions with non-socialist women's groups, particularly the Islamic mass women's organizations. Gerwani never officially became the PKI's women's wing. They had a weekly corner in the communist daily, and for many years published a magazine called Api Kartini (Kartini fire).

On 30 September 1965 leftist colonels abducted the nation's top generals, except General Suharto, and murdered them on a field on which young communist women were being trained for a nationalist campaign of Sukarno against the formation of Malaysia. Later the military accused these women of having castrated the generals. This greatly antagonized conservative groups in society and particularly Islamic youth groups were mobilized. Ultimately over a million socialist women and men were massacred and tens of thousands detained for many years. Muslim and Catholic women were in the forefront of the demonstrations and joined in demonizing Gerwani members as "whores" and "perverse women." General Suharto replaced President Sukarno and restored an order built on women's domestication. During his reign women's political agency was associated with sexual and moral disorder (Wieringa 2002). Initially Islamic women's groups experienced relief; later they realized that they too were no longer able to implement the social programs they had formerly harbored.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. A. Kartini, Brieven aan Mevrouw R.M. Abendanon-Mandri en haar Echtgenoot met andere Documenten, ed. F. G. P. Jaquet, 1912, Dordrecht 1987.

- Sukarno, Sarinah. The duty of women in the struggle of the Indonesian Republic [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1947, 1963.
- N. Suwondo, The position of Indonesian women in law and society [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1981.
- S. Wieringa, Sexual politics in Indonesia, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 2002.

SASKIA E. WIERINGA

Iran and Afghanistan

IRAN

Women's emancipation as a component of social progress surfaced before the emergence of Iran's constitutional movement (1905–11). In the 1840s, the Bābī movement projected equality between the sexes in many domains of social life (Cole 1998). The Constitutionals supported female education and increased social participation. Women contributed to the revolution, but the Majlis, influenced by religious leaders, denied women enfranchisement, categorizing them with the mentally handicapped and criminals (Afary 1996).

In the early 1900s, advocates of women's education included women with socialist sympathies. Socialists saw women's rights as a prerequisite to social progress and opposed state and clerical suppression (Shahidian 2002a).

Reza Shah's ascendancy signaled the demise of activism by leftists and women (Sanasarian 1982). Neither movement resurfaced until the Shah's abdication in 1941.

In 1943, the Organization of Iranian Women, affiliated to the Tudeh (Communist) Party demanded legal transformations regarding women in the family and workplace. In 1945, the short-lived autonomous governments of Azerbaijan and Kurdistan approved women's enfranchisement. Before it was outlawed in 1949, the Tudeh Party introduced legislation for enfranchisement and improved conditions. Clerics and conservatives rejected the bill (Abrahamian 1982).

The 1953 coup brought widespread arrests. Only state-approved organizations existed for the next 25 years. Women participated in student movements and semi-clandestine circles. Activists discussed land reform and infiltrating the working class, rarely addressing women's issues.

In the 1970s, the People's Mujāhidīn Organization of Iran and the Organization of Iranian People's Fedaii Guerrillas offered opportunities for expressing women's dissent. The former, radical religious activists, relied on Marxist political economy, the latter on Marxism-Leninism (Abrahamian 1989). Initially, women participated in neither group; it took time for the Mujāhidīn to recognize them (Najāt Ḥusaynī 2001). Marxists attracted more women than religious organizations; their membership drew on colleges, urban intellectuals, and liberal-minded professionals (Abrahamian 1982).

Though female leftists loomed significantly in the 1979 Revolution and most maintained independence from Islamists, the left disregarded feminist autonomy. Many leftist women's organizations functioned primarily as recruiters (Moghissi 1994, Shahidian 2002a). Women participated on the left, opposing the Islamic Republic of Iran's assault on rights (Tabari and Yeganeh 1982, Moghissi 1994, Hajebi Tabrizi 2000).

After 1981, leftists and women activists were imprisoned or exiled. Exiled women organized, some affiliating with political organizations, others advocating autonomy. They recounted their tribulations, especially prison experiences (Barādarān 1992). Discussions have reassessed culture and politics through a gender lens; an autonomous women's movement has gradually taken root. Women's involvement in community activism includes establishing libraries and family crisis centers; providing services for expatriates; and broadcasting (Shahidian 1996, Ghorashi 2002).

Those in Iran established study groups and engaged in writing and publishing. Veterans and newcomers have revisited leftist approaches to gender. Secular women concentrated on the emerging – albeit amorphous – women's movement, rallying for rights, participating in conferences, organizing celebrations of 8 March. Some wrote for reformist journals; others cooperated with reformists but maintained independence. Their writings were later published as books and anthologies (Shahidian 2002b).

AFGHANISTAN

Women's rights have also been an ingredient of modernization in Afghanistan, dating from the early 1900s. Yet weak central governments, tribal factionalism, reforms from above, and conservative reactions have retarded gender reforms (Dupree 1980).

Not until the 1964 constitutional debate did women publicly voice concerns over rights (Dupree 1984). Organized movements soon emerged. Liberals advocated eliminating sex discrimination and increasing government participation. Socialists proposed changing the material bases of women's oppression by eradicating semi-feudalism and capitalism (Emadi 2002).

Under Dāwūd's presidency, strong student movements developed in the 1970s. Nationalist and leftist women participated in protests to promote student demands and gender equality.

A small group, led by Meena (1957–87), established in 1977 the first independent feminist organization: the Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan (RAWA), partly in response to the marginalization of women's issues in existing organizations. RAWA emphasized clandestine, grassroots activism and empowerment (Brodsky 2003).

Established in 1965, the pro-Soviet Democratic Party of the People of Afghanistan (PDPA) soon split into two factions: Khalq (Masses) and Parcham (Banner). The Parcham formed the Women's Democratic Organization of Afghanistan (WDOA). Each faction organized clandestine cells that infiltrated governmental and educational institutions and youth groups. When their party ruled, women from each faction gained prominence. Their impact was limited since the public could not relate to well-known female politicians (Emadi 2002).

Various PDPA governments initiated gender reforms, emphasizing kindergarten expansion, literacy, education, job security, and health services. Decree No. 7 aimed to change marriage customs, but retained laws on custody, divorce, polygyny, and abuse (Dupree 1984).

Under the PDPA, the state assumed protection for women instead of welcoming women's grassroots activism. Women were heralded in stereotypical supportive roles. Autocratic reforms provoked resentment, especially in villages (Dupree 1984). The PDPA responded by slowing reform and reinstating Islamic family law. Party followers purportedly retained PDPA initiatives (Moghadam 1992). There were, nonetheless, reports of abuse of power by party members. Many female members were obliged to allow their parents to choose their mates (Emadi 2002).

Particularly in Kabul, women and youth initially supported leftist rule. Yet factional conflicts heightened, and promises of reforms failed to materialize. Disillusionment turned into feelings of betrayal after the invasion by the Soviet Union. Women's resistance emerged in informal gatherings, but when information exchange about imprisoned loved ones proved ineffective, collective protests formed (Emadi 2002).

Invasion created educational and employment opportunities for some women; for many it meant loss of family, and captivity in Soviet and Mujāhidīn jails. Women played key roles in grassroots opposition and experienced enhanced community status and empowerment by learning new organizational and military skills (Ellis 2000). Many joined the resistance following the imprisonment or death of sons and husbands. Though military participation was not extensive, women took part especially in identifying and executing collaborators (Dupree 1984, Emadi 2002).

Invasion shifted emphases of the movement from gender struggle to community services at refugee camps and support for male Mujāhidīn whose vision of an independent Afghanistan did not include gender equality (Brodsky 2003, Emadi 2002). Various organizations in camps were involved in activities such as health services, education, and creating revenues for women. Fundamentalists in camps and the Pakistani police often harassed activists. Many organizations learned to act within limits set by fundamentalists who wielded tremendous power (Dupree 2001). RAWA alone simultaneously opposed Soviets and fundamentalists (Brodsky 2003).

Far from emancipation, the Taliban's demise restored the Northern Alliance, Mujāhidīn who earlier inflicted wounds on Afghan women: "The oppression of Afghanistan and particularly Afghan women did not start with the Taliban nor has it ended with its defeat" (RAWA, in Brodsky 2003, ix).

Sociopolitical change in Iran and Afghanistan intertwines with concern for women's rights. Women symbolize modernity for governments and parties, a condition that may advance status but costs women's movements autonomy. Iranian women emerged as an active group earlier than Afghani women, but revolutionaries in both countries showed reluctance toward feminist autonomy. One factor for this resistance was a common ideological source: Soviet Marxism. Upheavals in the late 1970s effected divergent results. In Iran, the Islamic Republic assaulted women's rights; in Afghanistan, a paternalist Marxist regime dubbed autonomous activism counter-revolutionary. Afghani women have also had to ward off Islamist denial of women's rights, even after resisting Soviet occupation. Exiled Afghani and Iranian women defended women's rights in the homeland and experienced new forms of activism and community involvement.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- E. Abrahamian, Iran between two revolutions, Princeton, N.J. 1982.
 ———, The Iranian mojahedin, New Haven, Conn. 1989.
 J. Afary, The Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy, and the origin of feminism, New York 1996.
 M. Barādarān (M. Rahā), Haqiqat-i sādah, Hanover, Germany 1992.
 A. E. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 2003.

- J. Cole, Modernity and the millennium, New York 1998.
- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1980.
- N. H. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women, in M. N. Shahrani and R. L. Canfield (eds.), Revolution and rebellion in Afghanistan. Anthropological perspectives, Berkeley 1984, 306–40.
- , Afghan women under the Taliban, in W. Maley (ed.), Fundamentalism reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban, New York 2001, 145–66.
- D. Ellis, Women of the Afghan war, Westport, Conn. 2000.
- H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, Westport, Conn. 2002.
- H. Ghorashi, Ways to survive, battles to win. Iranian women exiles in the Netherlands and the United States, New York 2002.
- V. M. Moghadam, Revolution, Islam and women. Sexual politics in Iran and Afghanistan, in A. Parker et al. (eds.), Nationalisms and sexualities, New York 1992, 424–45.
- H. Moghissi, Populism and feminism in Iran. Women's struggle in a male-defined revolutionary movement, New York 1994.
- M. Najāt Husaynī, Bar farāz-i khalīj, Tehran 2001².
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement, and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1982.
- H. Shahidian, Women and clandestine politics in Iran. 1970–1985, in Feminist Studies 23:1 (1997), 7–42.
- , Women in Iran. Gender politics in the Islamic Republic, Westport, Conn. 2002a.
- , Women in Iran. Emerging voices in the women's movement, Westport, Conn. 2002b.
- A. Tabari and N. Yeganeh (eds.), In the shadow of Islam. The women's movement in Iran, London 1982.

HAMMED SHAHIDIAN

Iraq

Shortly after the Iraqi Revolution of 14 July 1958, which toppled the British-backed Hashemite monarchy, the new republic commissioned Jawād Salīm to build “The Monument to Liberty,” an enormous sculpture in Baghdad’s Liberation Square that tells the epic of the revolution. Among its more famous images are two political demonstrators of mixed gender. The woman marches one stride ahead of the man, both fists raised in the air, her face turned directly toward the monument’s viewers; the two seem perfectly matched in physical strength and forward momentum. Salīm’s powerful depiction of a woman in protest was immediately recognized by Iraqi commentators not only as a symbol of the nation’s future but also as a representative of its recent past.

The participation of Iraqi women in revolutionary uprisings during the first half of the twentieth century is well established, and their roles in the rebellions of 1920, 1948, 1952, and 1956 even developed into national legends. Women were active in Arab and Kurdish uprisings, in urban and rural demonstrations, and in underground revolutionary parties. This participation often took an unorganized form, as women spontaneously entered the streets en masse with men. Well-known cultural legends, as well as numerous accounts by historians, also illuminate a recurrent theme in Iraq’s narratives of resistance, in which a single woman leads a group of men or of mixed gender in revolt. In one such legend, a woman named Danuka is said to have led a demonstration of male workers to the house of Prime Minister Šādir during the Wathba (Leap) rebellion of 1948, and then addressed him in front the crowd, waving a revolver in each hand. This story resembles a number of well-documented incidents in Arab as well as Kurdish regions of Iraq. In October 1956, for example, a woman was shot and killed by Iraqi police as she led the funeral procession of Shaykh Maḥmūd of the Barzanjī Kurds into an attack on the local jail, which was holding one of the shaykh’s sons. The monarchy announced in its defense that the woman was a “communist sympathizer,” but she would become known in national legend as “the martyr Akhtar.”

In addition to spontaneous participation in uprisings, women were involved in Iraq’s underground revolutionary movements in more organized ways. The Iraqi Communist Party (ICP), the country’s most significant revolutionary organization from the Second World War through 1958, actively recruited women for demonstrations, for example by bringing truckloads of rural women into Baghdad for nationalist marches, as well as for long-term mobilization. Women’s cells were established in the ICP during the 1940s, as was the position of mas’ūl, the comrade in charge of organizing and recruiting communist women. In 1952, female members of the party founded its women’s auxiliary, the League for the Defense of Women’s Rights, which distributed clandestine literature promoting sexual equality and organized women to participate in the 1952, 1954, and 1956 rebellions. It also attracted a number of the best-known female artists, poets, and intellectuals of Iraq’s artistic and political underground.

After the 1958 Revolution, the public visibility of women at political meetings and street demonstrations, while in many ways consistent with the historical participation of Iraqi women in rebellion, may have also gone beyond the earlier paradigms as women organized their own mass demonstrations, went door-to-door educating people in Marxist ideology, and took up arms in the new republic’s civilian militia, the People’s Resistance Forces. While women were represented in many of the grassroots organizations that emerged after the revolution, they were particularly active in the Peace Partisans, the Federation of Democratic Youth, the Iraqi Teachers' Union, and, above all, the League for the Defense of Women's Rights.

The league achieved some substantial victories during its two years of active public life. In 1959, it won its legal campaigns to outlaw honor killings and to implement the personal status law, which stipulated a minimum age of 18 years for marriage and expanded women's protection against arbitrary divorce; most controversially, female descendants were accorded equal rights with males in matters of intestate succession. Also in 1959, Prime Minister Qāsim appointed a founder of the league, Naziha Dulaymī, as his minister of municipalities, making her the first woman and the first member of the Communist Party to serve in the Iraqi cabinet. Dulaymī claimed in her opening speech at the league's second conference, on 8 March 1960, that league membership had grown from 20,000 to 42,000 in a single year, and that thousands of additional women were receiving literacy training and medical services at league branches throughout the country. An Iraqi women's art exhibit was opened at the Institute of Modern Art in Baghdad in conjunction with the conference; it contained works "depicting the Iraqi woman's struggle in the eradicated regime and her gains and efforts in the flourishing era of the Revolution" (Iraq Times, 3 August 1960).

In 1960, Qāsim's regime began suppressing the country's revolutionary organizations, including the League for the Defense of Women's Rights, and the first Ba'ṯh coup of 1963 dealt the final death blow to a public, autonomous women's movement in twentieth-century Iraq. One of the new regime's first policy acts was to repeal the clause of the personal status law that guaranteed equality between male and female heirs. The second Ba'ṯh government, which ruled Iraq from 1963 to 2003, was more progressive on women's issues, and strove to integrate women more fully into the national labor force and educational system. It was also fond of using such achievements as evidence that a state-directed approach to women's rights was more effective than one led by an autonomous feminist movement. But the Ba'ṯh Party's success in this area rested at least partly on its ability to contain and control gender challenges and women's rights discourses that emerged before and during the revolutionary years of 1958–60. Ba'ṯh leaders adopted the popular if highly contested rhetoric of women's equality produced by the League for the Defense of Women's Rights and other revolutionary groups, while effectively containing their more radical implications and possibilities.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Iraq Times, 1958–60.

Ittiḥād al-sha'b, 1958–9.

United States Department of Commerce Joint Publications Research Service, The communist movement in Iraq, parts I and II, Washington, D.C. 1967.

SECONDARY SOURCES

H. Batatu, The old social classes and the revolutionary movements of Iraq, Princeton, N.J. 1978.

J. Ismael and S. Ismael, Gender and state in Iraq, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 107–36.

SARA PURSLEY

North Africa

Although largely ignored in the official recorded histories of the Maghrib, women have greatly contributed to the political and social construction of the modern countries of this region of the world. They fought for independence, militated in political parties, initiated activism and civil society, infiltrated academia, and boldly combated religious fanaticism. Throughout the period that extends from pre-colonization, colonization, independence, and state-building to the era of democratization, women have always been active in private and public spaces. Their movements started as political, focusing on education and legal rights, and moved to include civil society and academia as well. The strategies used by women to counter the inequities they protest against have been shaped by specific historical, social, political, economic, and linguistic environments where reformism, colonization, leftist political parties, civil society, multilingualism, academia, and Islamism played a significant role.

The history of women's movements in the Maghrib goes back to the pre-colonization and the colonization periods during which male leaders of the Islah (reform) movement such as Allal al-Fassi (Morocco), Ibn Badis (Algeria), and Tahar Haddad (Tunisia) argued for women's emancipation within the cultural/religious value systems of Maghribian societies. These leaders linked social development and modernization with women's education. This instigated many women of the 1930s and 1940s to start claiming their rights through pioneer women's organizations such as Akhawāt al-Ṣafā' (Sisters of purity) in Morocco, the Association of Muslim Women in Algeria, and the Union of Tunisian Women. These associations were created and led by educated urban elite women who had connections with the larger national liberation movements.

Women such as Malika El-Fassi (Morocco), Djamilia Debeche (Algeria), and Bchira M'rad (Tunisia) are examples. The first women's organizations did not problematize women's status because women believed that independence would bring about their emancipation; their aim was to make women aware of their social importance and train them in the public organization of their demands. These pioneer women used strategies such as press articles, public speeches, and private or public gatherings where they explained the importance of women's education and participation in the struggle for independence. As a result of these actions, women participated in revolutionary movements by combating the enemy, hiding male members of their families, and smuggling weapons.

Following the independence of Morocco (1956), Tunisia (1956), and Algeria (1962), the new ruling elites sought to re-establish Islam in their sociolegal institutions through family laws based on the Shari'a (Islamic law). However, it was only in Tunisia that the family law was progressive. In spite of unfair legal treatment, women's lifestyle on the eve of independence was different from that of their mothers. They took advantage of improved health standards, massive access to schooling in urban areas, generalized paid work, and an increasing participation in the labor force, all of which were needed for the economic development of the newly independent countries to broaden their horizons beyond the domestic sphere.

These benefits allowed women academics to become aware of the fact that the shift from the ideology of liberation to that of state-building marginalized women. Fatima Mernissi and Leila Abouzeid (Morocco), Assia Djebbar and Fadma Amrouche (Algeria), and Souad Guellouz and Emna Belhaj Yahya (Tunisia) are examples. In Morocco and Algeria, these voices were particularly fueled by the bitter realization that the family laws turned out to be a betrayal in relegating women to home and hearth and distancing them from public spheres. From then on, women's struggle was concentrated on the revision of family law in these two countries. Only in Tunisia did family law give women basic rights.

In addition to academics, many women activists started organizing themselves politically by creating women's sections within leftist parties. Representative names of prominent women in this respect are Nouzha Skalli and Rabéa Naciri (Morocco), Louisa Hanoun and Khalida Messaoudi (Algeria), and Bochra Belhaj Hamida and Sihem Ben Sidrine (Tunisia). They used this space to challenge the "reactionary" establishment and called for more social equity and human rights. In the mid-1980s, women's role in development surfaced in the countries of the Maghrib with more acuity, because of four major factors: literacy, the law of the job-market, democratic political values, and international pressure. These factors were heavily exploited by the leftist socialist movements. Women's voices within these movements became louder and two trends emerged: women who pushed for social equity through party line and women who, although partisans of social movements, stressed the gender issue and the singularity of women's demands. It is the latter type of women who largely contributed to the emergence of a strong civil society in the Maghrib.

Pioneer activist associations such as the Association marocaine des femmes démocrates, the Association pour le triomphe des droits des femmes, and the Association tunisienne des femmes démocrates were a prominent part of an overall social movement which, backed by calls for more human rights, launched the era of civil society that is still thriving. In capitalizing on civil society, women were a prominent part of the overall progressive and human rights promotion movement of the mid-1980s onwards. The area of family law remained the focus of women's demands either in political parties or in civil society in contexts where Islamism resists any amendment of family law. In Morocco, Algeria, and also Tunisia, women struggled for the revision of family law. Tunisian family law was amended in 1965, 1966, and 1981, and the Moroccan in 1993 and 2004. The Algerian family law was amended in 1984 and demands to introduce more amendments are becoming ever louder. In Morocco and Algeria, demands for women's rights are being accompanied by demands for cultural and linguistic rights.

An important aspect of women's movements in the Maghrib is their great impact on the democratization processes in their countries, the lifting of the sacredness that surrounded religious texts, and on mentalities. More and more female voices such as Farida Bennani, Zainab Maadi, and Latifa Jbabdi are advocating a reinterpretation of the sacred texts (the Qur'an and the Prophet's sayings) from a feminist perspective. It is such endeavors that partly led to the recent revision of Moroccan family law.

From the mid-1990s onwards, women's movements in the Maghrib have been greatly enhanced by the creation of centers and groups for academic research on gender or women's studies such as the Center for Studies and Research on Women in Fes and various university women's groups. These movements have also been consolidated by the pioneer creation of university graduate units such as one for women's studies in Rabat and another for gender studies in Fes. These graduate units have produced the first cohorts of masters and doctorate holders in women's and gender studies in Morocco. University centers and graduate units have significantly contributed to bridging the gap between the university and civil society as students often carry out fieldwork with women's non-governmental organizations. They have also been very instrumental in democratizing higher education. More national and international colloquia are devoted to women's issues and more books by and on women are introduced in the university curricula. The current move in Maghribian women's movements is from a predominantly political discourse to more academic discussions, building-up of scholarship and fieldwork, bridging gaps between academia and activist civil society, and, most importantly, preparing students who will ensure continuity. Gender is more and more used as an analytical tool for understanding men, women, and society in this part of the world.

The great headway obtained by women in the Maghrib highlights the fact that women's experiences, interpretations, and understandings of issues and events were unique and often differed from men's. These endeavors brought about the issues of health, enterprise, jobs, and other similar influences, as relating to women for the first time. Women's voices began to be taken seriously by the decision-makers. Women's movements in the three countries of the Maghrib share some aspects and differ in others. On the one hand, these movements crystallize around continuous demands for the revision of the family laws, they denounce the sexist practices of their heavily patriarchal sociocultural environment, they want more political and legal rights, and they capitalize on education as women's empowerment. On the other hand, women's movements are deeply affected by the political leadership of each country: while the king in Morocco as the highest political and religious authority is in favor of women's promotion, no such support is found in Algeria or Tunisia. In Algeria, women rely more on political parties, and in Tunisia, the secured rights may be jeopardized by increasing restrictions on human rights.

All in all, the role of women in the revolutionary movements of the Maghrib has become nowadays one of the pillars of the general development and democratization. Through their movements, women in this region have succeeded in creating and maintaining opportunities for women by providing education, health care, legal assistance, and economic opportunities. Their achievements are remarkable in a social order based on heavy patriarchy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- D. Amrane, Les femmes algériennes dans la guerre, Paris 1991.
- A. Belarbi, Mouvements de femmes au Maroc, in Annuaire de l'Afrique du nord 28 (1989), 455–65.
- F. Bennani and Z. Maadi, Sélection de textes sacrés sur les droits humains de la femme en islam, Rabat 2000.
- R. Bourquia (ed.), Etudes féminines, Rabat 1997.
- Z. Daoud, Féminisme et politique au Maghreb. 60 ans de lutte, Casablanca 1993.
- G. El Khayat, Le Maghreb des femmes, Casablanca 1992.
- S. Ferchiou, Féminisme d'état en Tunisie. Idéologie dominante et résistance féminine, in R. Bourquia, N. Charrad, and N. Gallagher (eds.), Femmes, culture et société au Maghreb, Casablanca 1996, 134–8.
- G. Halimi, La cause des femmes, Paris 1992.
- R. Naciri, Genre, pouvoir et prise de la décision au Maroc, in Nations Unis, Commission Economique pour l'Afrique, Disparité entre femmes et hommes et culture en Afrique du Nord, 2001, 25–40, <<http://www.uneca-na.org/francais/un/PUBLICATIONS%20DU%20CENTRE/DISPARITES%20ENTRE%20FEMMES%20ET%20HOMMES%20ET%20CULTURE%20E.PDF>>.
- F. Sadiqi, Women, gender and language in Morocco, Leiden 2003.
- , Women and politics in Morocco, in International Feminist Journal of Politics. E-Journal, Routledge (forthcoming).

SECONDARY SOURCES

- Collectif 95 Maghreb Egalité, Women in the Maghreb. Change and resistance, Brussels 1995.
- , Les maghrébines entre violences symboliques et violences physiques (Algérie, Maroc, Tunisie), Brussels 1999.

FATIMA SADIQI

Palestine

Palestinian women have been part of the resistance against Israeli colonialism throughout the history of the conflict. They have often been mobilized via their domestic roles and kinship ties as mothers and wives, but also as militants, politicians, and grassroots organizers.

During the Arab Revolt (1936–9), a sustained strike against the British Mandate and Zionist incursions in Palestine, women hid and prepared food for fighters and acted as couriers for men who had less freedom of movement (Sayigh 1993, 188). Through their involvement, some women gained political consciousness and awareness of social problems, and their families encouraged their participation because it supported the national cause (Antonius 1979, 36). These themes would reappear in future phases of the struggle for national liberation: politicization of women's domestic roles; the influence of kin relations; exploitation of the adversary's gender prejudices; and the impact of political work on women's empowerment.

When it was located in Lebanon the secularly based resistance involved women's broad, and active, participation. It motivated a degree of structural and ideological transformation in gender-based social relations, and women leaders consciously sought to exploit the malleability of social structures and values that can accompany war (Peteet 1991). Some women were mobilized via extensions of their domestic roles, while others challenged gender boundaries even further by fighting. During this period when nationalist values and valor were prioritized, in many cases activism was tolerated and encouraged by women's families and the society.

The nationalist inspiration of domestic activities was also central to the first intifada (uprising) in the Occupied Territories (1987–93). Not only did women shelter activists hiding from occupation authorities, they also actively confronted Israeli soldiers. A typical image from that period was that of a Palestinian woman, wielding a pot threateningly in one hand while wrenching some young man free of the grips of an Israeli soldier trying to arrest him. "All the boys are my sons," became a saying which, calling on traditional kinship relations, both explained and justified such courageous acts.

Through the promotion of national products and the local economy, women's popular committees, active since the 1980s, likewise extended women's traditional domestic activities into forms that helped sustain the first intifada. The committees' members, recruited from all social strata, encouraged home gardening and ran sewing or canning cooperatives as part of a strategy of "steadfastness," thus enabling women to help support their families during a time of economic hardship when many male bread-winners were imprisoned or otherwise unable to work (Hiltermann 1991). Although the committees were designed to raise both national and gender consciousness through widening women's participation in the economic and political spheres, societal expectations that women would prioritize the demands of raising families sometimes superseded their political commitments, curtailing women's involvement after marriage.

Women's political and militant activities have often been facilitated by Israeli gender biases. During the first intifada, the Israeli military did not shut down offices of the women's committees with the same frequency as they did other political offices. Women did not, however, escape imprisonment, beatings, and other reprisals, punishments which are often sexualized. Israeli interrogators use rape, sexual threats, and threats against children as forms of intimidation and torture against female prisoners. Some have asserted that withstanding such sexual harassment was transformed into a nationalist badge of courage, and that men sought women who had been political prisoners as marriage partners in order to defy the Occupation authorities (Thornhill 1992). Despite their brave and sustained participation and sacrifices for the sake of the nation, however, women's activism has not yielded a revolution in their social and political position. Not every family has accepted their daughters' political participation, and former female prisoners are not always seen as being desirable wives.

Another example of the exploitation of Israeli gender prejudice appeared during the second intifada, which began in 2000, when female suicide bombers slipped past Israeli security because they did not fit the typical profile of the male religious devotee. The wave of female suicide bombers attracted shocked curiosity in a Western press used to characterizing the perpetrators of such acts as young, fanatical men seduced into jihad by the promise of doe-eyed virgins in heaven. Women's involvement in what many Palestinians refer to as "martyrdom operations" served first, to counter orientalist stereotypes of the lascivious and religiously fanatical male "Arab terrorist," and second, to reassert the political message of these acts: that Palestinian women, men, and children are suffering from Israeli occupation.

The more militarized and less popular nature of the second intifada has created a starker distinction between the battlefield and home front, minimizing both men's and women's roles in direct resistance to the occupation. Women's participation has been largely confined to support roles, hiding and supplying food to fighters, for example. Mothers of martyrs continue to be a primary symbol of resistance, thereby heightening the significance of women as bearers of fighters (Johnson and Kuttab 2001, 31). While combat and imprisonment are not exclusively men's experiences, they are more central to the construction of male gender ideals. Beatings and detention have been described as rites of passage that transform young men into resistant subjects endowed with social prestige (Peteet 1994, 31).

The growth of the Islamist movement began to cause a restrictive conflation of women with national honor during the first intifada, when a campaign was waged in Gaza to impose the hijab on women. The headscarf was re-encoded as a sign of women's political commitment, and women who did not wear it were defined as insufficiently nationalist. One analyst interpreted the "intifada hijāb" as signifying not modesty or respect; it was, rather, an indication of "the power of religious groups to impose themselves by attacking secularism and nationalism at their most vulnerable points: over issues of women's liberation" (Hammami 1990, 26). In part as a response to growing Islamism in Palestine, women activists reasserted the link between the struggle for an independent state with democratization and women's rights, as exemplified in the discussion of personal status law during the 1998 Model Parliament. Some Islamists tried to justify their rejection of the women activists' demands in nationalist terms by accusing them of being tools of imperialism and Zionism (Moghadam 2003, 179–80). Since women's military participation in the resistance in the 1970s, a dominant discourse has been that women's liberation would come through participation in the nationalist struggle and that a focus on specifically women's social issues was a distraction from the national struggle. And while leftist parties have mouthed support for women's issues, the dominant party, Fatah, has never had an articulated ideology concerning women, and their rhetoric reasserts women's primary role as "the mainstay of the family and the vessel of Palestinian culture" (Gluck 1995).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Antonius, Fighting on two fronts. Conversations with Palestinian women, in Journal of Palestine Studies 8:3 (Spring 1979), 26–45.
- R. Giacaman, I. Jad, and P. Johnson, For the common good? Gender and social citizenship in Palestine, in Middle East Report 198 (January–March 1996), 11–16.
- S. Gluck, Palestinian women. Gender, politics and nationalism, in Journal of Palestine Studies 24:3 (Spring 1995), 5–15.
- R. Hammami, Women, the hijab, and the intifada, in Middle East Report 164/5 (August–May 1990), 24–8.
- J. Hiltermann, Behind the intifada. Labor and women's movements in the Occupied Territories, Princeton, N.J. 1991.
- P. Johnson and E. Kuttab, Where have all the women (and men) gone? Reflections on gender and the second Palestinian intifada in Feminist Review 69 (Winter 2001), 21–43.
- J. Peteet, Gender in crisis. Women and the Palestinian resistance movement, New York 1991.
- , Male gender rituals of resistance in the Palestinian intifada. A cultural politics of violence, in American Ethnologist 21:1 (1994), 31–49.
- , Icons and militants. Mothering in the danger zone, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 23:1 (1997), 103–29.
- R. Sayigh, Palestinian women and politics in Lebanon, in J. E. Tucker (ed.), Arab women. Old boundaries, new frontiers, Bloomington, Ind. 1993, 175–92.

T. Thornhill, Making women talk. The interrogation of Palestinian women security detainees by the Israeli General Security Services, London 1992.

LORI A. ALLEN

South Yemen and Dhofar

During the latter part of the twentieth century, the southern part of the Arabian Peninsula gave birth to revolutionary movements which fully engaged women but which left them with different outcomes. While in southern Yemen women can still enjoy most of the revolution's fruits, in Dhofar, the western province of Oman, the revolutionary movement was crushed, leaving few accomplishments.

In South Yemen, demands for reforms for women were raised first in Aden in the 1940s in pamphlets issued among cultural circles comprised of men from intellectual and commercial families. Aden formed part of British India until 1937. After Indian independence there were demands for freedom, the significant source of influence in Aden coming from centers of Arab radicalism such as Cairo and Beirut. Another influence was North Yemeni resistance to the rule of the imams driven by Arab nationalists, and the presence of exiles from this movement in Aden.

Radicalism in Aden followed different roads. A haven for labor migration from all over the peninsula, Aden harbored a strong trade union movement and radical political parties. Women's right to education, their legal rights, and the freedom to discard the hijāb were on the agenda of the radical wing of the independence movement. News and inspiration came through Ṣawt al-ʿArab radio in Cairo and the BBC Arabic service. At an early stage of the revolution, the National Liberation Front in its National Charter demanded women's emancipation from traditional roles and their subjugation to men.

Women's societies began in 1951 when the British founded the Aden Women's Club, a charity that later became radical and, with local leaders, was renamed the Arab Women's Club. By the 1960s, the Arab Women's Club and its rival, the Aden Women's Association, each had 300 members. By independence in 1967, women's associations were united in the General Union of Yemeni Women (see Figure 5).

The revolution in South Yemen began in 1963 with the uprising in Radfān, a mountainous area north of Aden. Women participated in the armed struggle and two women became famous fighters, Khadija al-Ḥawshabī, a member of the ruling family and martyred in the fight, and Da'ra. Other rural women carried food and messages to fighters. In Aden, women's role was merely political. They led demonstrations, initiated strikes in schools, took care of the wounded, and carried arms and hand grenades under their cloaks. In the women's societies, activists confronted the British and recruited more participants to the struggle.

After independence in 1967, women's issues only came to the fore after a radical leadership in the National Liberation Front gained power in 1969. Women were now called to join the labor force, educate themselves, and use the newly available health services. A committee formed of pro-revolutionary religious scholars, juridical experts, and women's activists began drafting a family code that would reflect the spirit of the 1970 constitution which gave women rights equal to men. The Family Law (law no 1 of 1974) deviated from the Sharī'a in placing the obligation to support the family on both men and women, limiting polygamy to cases of the wife's barrenness or incurable illness (subject to court hearing) and prohibiting unilateral divorce. The law was in congruence with classical Sharī'a law on marriage payment (mahr) and the wife's waiting period after divorce or widowhood ('idda).

In line with the constitution, the law declared marriage to be a contract between a man and a woman equal in rights and duties, and outlawed child marriages and marriage of a woman below 35 years to a man 20 years older. Saudi Arabia and conservative Yemeni circles targeted the law as un-Islamic. Ordinary women saw it as allowing them free-choice marriage and giving them rights for the first time.

In Aden during the 1980s and 1990s women reached high positions in working life, even supervising large factories (see Figure 4), while in the countryside achievements were smaller and women activists had to struggle to get local women to visit health clinics. In Aden girls' enrollment in secondary education was high; in some rural areas families did not allow daughters to finish primary school. In leaders' speeches, misogyny was attacked and men were taught to treat every woman as if she were his sister. Working women in Aden remained critical of the lack of public childcare and the fact that they worked a double shift at home, but at the same time responded positively to the state policy of women's liberation (tabrīr al-mar'a). Few women reached high positions in the state hierarchy and women remained the minority in the ruling party apparatus. After the unification of Yemen in 1990, northern traditionalists who held that women had too many rights demanded adjustment, and this was echoed by some southern leaders. The Personal Status Law (law no 20 of 1992) accomplished this in relation to family affairs; but while women lost most of their earlier legal rights, progressive judges in family courts continued defending vulnerable women. After unification, the nomination of the first ever female full cabinet member has remained one of the few accomplishments.

In Dhofar, guerilla movement against the despot Sultan Sa'īd bin Taymūr and the British military started in 1965, quickly developing into a people's struggle with women fighting alongside men. The Dhofar Liberation Front was established in 1964 by exiled Omanis with Nasserist and radical Arab nationalist ideas, with women leaders who had become politically active while studying in Beirut. The organization soon incorporated activists from other Gulf countries and adopted the name Popular Front for the Liberation of Occupied Arab Gulf. In 1968, the front launched an educational campaign to spread socialist ideas among the population to complement its literacy campaigns. Females aged twelve and upwards participated in camps with political and military training.

Slavery was abolished in the liberated areas and women engaged in the dual front of armed struggle and the fight against backwardness. Women were seen to face double oppression, that of a repressive social system and as victims of men. Young country women were reported to have developed consciousness of the role reactionary men have had in alienating Islam from its progressive message. Guerilla actions continued until 1981 when they were finally defeated by the new ruler, Qabūs, son of Sultan Sa'īd bin Taymūr, with the aid of foreign troops. Dhofar was showered with development money from neighboring countries and schools, clinics, and roads were built. However, reforms were carried out in order to strengthen the traditional social structure where a woman's place is at home.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Feminism and feminist movements in the Middle East, a preliminary exploration. Turkey, Egypt, Algeria, People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, in Women's Studies International 5 (1982), 153–68.
- D. Chatty, Women working in Oman. Individual choice and cultural constraints, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 32 (2000), 241–54.
- S. Dahlgren, Yemen, in B. Sherif-Trask (ed.), The Greenwood encyclopedia of women's issues worldwide. The Middle East and North Africa, Westport, Conn. 2003, 437–66.
- F. Halliday, Arabia without sultans, Harmondsworth 1979.
- H. Lackner, PDR Yemen. Outpost of socialist development in Arabia, London 1985.
- M. Molyneux, Women and revolution in the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, in Feminist Review 1 (1979), 4–19.

 —, Women's rights and and political contingency. The case of Yemen 1990–1994, in Middle East Journal 49:3 (1995), 418–31.
 M. Paluch, Yemeni voices. Women tell their stories, Sana'a 2001.

SUSANNE DAHLGREN

Sub-Saharan Africa: Eritrea

Women played a central role in Eritrea's 30-year war for independence from Ethiopia, which annexed the former Italian colony in the 1960s, but their post-independence participation in public life presents a mixed record. By the nationalist victory in 1991, they made up nearly a third of the 95,000 – strong Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) and 13 percent of the frontline fighters in what had been the longest-running conflict in modern African history – a conflict characterized by remarkably successful efforts to unify the diverse society of four million people, half Muslim and half Christian, from nine ethnic groups while promoting egalitarian social relations across both gender and class.

Women served in many non-combat capacities – as teachers, paramedics, political organizers, technicians, garage mechanics, drivers and more – while thousands of women civilians organized to support the war effort. This positioned them to challenge traditionally submissive roles in the strictly patriarchal society and to demand equal participation in the economy and the country's post-independence political life. But there has been significant slippage in their wartime gains.

Women activists were drawn into important but time-consuming political projects: writing a new constitution, revising the Civil Code, developing legislation, restructuring the civil service, demobilizing former fighters, forwarding recommendations for economic development, and drafting other new policy initiatives. This represented a sharp break with the grassroots-level work to change gender relations with which they had been engaged. Meanwhile, women fighters saw a spike in the divorce rate as male comrades opted for more subservient partners. Men in some communities also formed clandestine committees – later exposed and dismantled – to prevent women from participating in postwar land reform.

These social struggles took place against the backdrop of a complex process of state building. The decades-long independence war had left Eritrea in ruins. At the close of the fighting, water and sewage systems in the towns barely functioned; the few asphalt roads had been torn up; port facilities were badly damaged; the rail system was entirely dismantled; and the whole country had a generating capacity of only 22 megawatts, barely enough to keep the lights burning in the major towns. The World Bank estimated the country's per capita income at less than US $150, compared to US $330 for the rest of Sub-Saharan Africa. Nor was there a political infrastructure to take over and transform – it, too, had to be built from scratch.

The starting point was decidedly weighted against women's participation. In a mixed Muslim and Christian society where close to 80 percent of the people relied on agrarian-related activities, women were uniformly denied the right to own or inherit land. Women had been specifically denied the right to vote in the 1950 constitution which governed Eritrea's early relationship with Ethiopia, and in all but one minority community (the Kunama, whose people practice a traditional faith), women were excluded from village and clan self-governance.

In both Muslim and Christian communities, girls were routinely married at puberty under contracts arranged at birth. A bride might be as young as nine, though she continued to live at home until menstruation. Female genital mutilation (FGM) was widely carried out and girls frequently contracted serious infections during these crude operations. Death in childbirth was extremely common, due to the chronic malnutrition and anemia. At the end of the protracted conflict, Eritrean women had a life expectancy of barely 40 years; by 2001, it had risen to 54 years.

In 1994 the new government nationalized urban and rural land and allocated use-rights to all Eritrean women and men. The government also decreed a national service campaign that required women and men over 18 to undergo six months of military training and spend a year on reconstruction projects. This was partially intended to weld together the multicultural society, while placing women and men in a condition of relative gender equality, much as service in the liberation front had done.

However, measures such as land reform, national service, the enforcement of laws against sex discrimination by a woman minister of justice, the appointment of a near majority of women to the Constitution Commission, and the reservation of 30 percent of the seats for women in newly-elected regional and national People's Assemblies were not enough to counter the resurgence of patriarchal values in the deeply conservative society. In addition to struggles over land and spiraling divorce rates, there were sharp rises in child marriage and other formerly banned practices, such as humiliating “virginity testing” for prospective brides.

The National Union of Eritrean Women (NUEW), with 200,000 members in 2004, was the largest of three sectoral associations (along with those of workers and youth) that spun off from the liberation movement and was the main institutional vehicle for women’s interests in postwar Eritrea. Founded in 1979 by the EPLF, the NUEW retains strong links with the liberation movement (renamed the People’s Front for Democracy and Justice [PFDJ] in 1994), which controls both the program and the composition of the NUEW’s leadership. Its current head, Luul Gebreab, is a former platoon commander in the EPLF who now sits on the central council of the PFDJ.

The union manages skills training, literacy, and self-improvement programs, as well as rural credit schemes and other development projects, each of which is accompanied by consciousness-raising seminars, and it advises other bodies on legislation, trade union contracts, and policies that affect women. However, the ruling party does not tolerate rival non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and it discourages program initiatives outside the union’s mandate, so there is no women’s organizing or advocacy outside the NUEW framework except for that among youth.

Another party-controlled mass organization, the National Union of Eritrean Youth and Students (NUEYS), runs education and training programs and cultural and recreational activities for young women and men aged 16 to 35 in both Christian and Muslim communities. Unlike the NUEW, the youth movement, with an estimated 120,000 members in 2004, makes the issue of combating “harmful traditions” a centerpiece of its advocacy work and campaigns against FGM in Christian and Muslim communities with considerable success. Female NUEYS members target young women, and male members target young men in three-day educational programs held in villages and poor urban neighborhoods around the country to end the practice.

One alternative attempt at women’s self-organizing came in 1995 when former guerrilla fighters established the Eritrean Women War Veterans Association, BANA. Members pooled demobilization payouts to set up a share company. Later, they registered as an NGO to solicit foreign funds. In one year, membership grew to 1,000. They established a fish market, a bakery, a training program for commercial drivers, and other projects aimed at economic self-sufficiency. However, in 1996 the government shut down the NGO, forbidding BANA to raise foreign funds but permitting it to operate as a private enterprise.

The Tesfa Association, formed by ex-female fighters in 1994 to address the lack of childcare facilities for working mothers, was another failed NGO experiment. Tesfa established a kindergarten and ran public fundraising campaigns in Asmara. Soon, however, it too began to attract foreign funds, as its leaders looked to replicate their success. In 1996, shortly after BANA was stripped of its NGO status, Tesfa was closed down without explanation. Its projects and resources were given to the NUEW.

The government’s early hostility to independent civil society organizing intensified after the renewal of conflict with Ethiopia in 1998–2000 over unresolved border issues. Since then, it has also shut down the country’s private press, detained leading critics and stifled policy-oriented public debate. Thus there are no public forums in 2004 – in or out of government – where women can contest law or policy.

Despite these stark limitations, the NUEW provides a base for women to struggle at the local level with “traditional” power, and it functions as a discrete lobby with government and within the ruling party. In the early 1990s, the NUEW successfully spearheaded a number of reforms in the inherited Ethiopia Civil Code (Eritrea Profile, 20 August 1994). These include the following provisions: marriage contracts must have the full consent of both parties; the eligible age for marriage is raised from 15 to 18 for women, the same as that of men; both mothers and fathers are recognized as heads of the family; there is to be no discrimination between men and women in divorce cases (grounds for which are adultery, desertion for two years, venereal disease, and impotence); paid maternity leave is extended from 45 to 60 days; abortion is now legal in cases where the mother’s mental or physical health is threatened and in instances of rape or incest; and the sentence for rape is extended to 15 years.

The country’s new constitution, ratified by the National Assembly in 1997 but not yet implemented by the president, prohibits discrimination based on race, ethnic origin, color, and gender and mandates the National Assembly to legislate measures designed to eliminate such inequality. The government has also declared International Women’s Day an official holiday and signed the Convention for the Rights of the Child and ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW).

A number of prominent women influence public policy. In 2004, three women, two of whom are Muslims, held ministerial portfolios: justice (Fozia Hashim), tourism (Amna Nur Husayn), and labor and social affairs (former NUEW chair Askalu Menkerios). The same three women sat on the PFDJ's 19-member Executive Council, chosen at the party's last congress in 1994, and women held 22 percent of the seats in the National Assembly and 11 percent of ambassadorial posts. In no-party elections held throughout the country in 2002 for village administrators and deputy administrators in both Muslim and Christian communities, women won more than a fifth of the posts.

However, gender-related changes in the public sphere are not woman-led. Eritrean women have access to the top, but they lack organized representation in the president's inner circle, where most policy is determined. More importantly, women lack a genuinely autonomous and activist social movement to push the state (and the party) from the outside.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Connell, Against all odds. A chronicle of the Eritrean revolution, Trenton, N.J. 1997.
- , Rethinking revolution. New strategies for democracy and social justice. The experiences of Eritrea, South Africa, Palestine and Nicaragua, Trenton, N.J. 2002.
- R. Iyob, The Eritrean struggle of independence. Domination, resistance, nationalism 1941–1993, Cambridge 1995.
- NUEW, NUEW and gender issues in Eritrea (1991–2001). A self-assessment, in The proceedings of the 20th anniversary conference of the National Union of Eritrean Women. November 27–29, 1999, Asmara 2002, 127–35.
- T. Tekle, Women's access to land and property rights in Eritrea, in United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), Women's land and property rights in situations of conflict and reconstruction, New York 1998, 104–12.
- UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), Human development report, Geneva 2003.
- United States Department of State, Senior Coordinator for International Women's Issues, Eritrea. Report on female genital mutilation (FGM) or female genital cutting (FGC), Washington, D.C. 2001.
- A. Wilson, The challenge road. Women and the Eritrean revolution, Trenton, N.J. 1991.

DAN CONNELL

Sudan

Sudan has experienced a number of revolutionary movements: for example, the Mahdist messianic movement of the nineteenth century, freeing the area for a time from the British and building its own society and administration; the nationalist movement of the first half of the twentieth century, culminating in independence from the British in 1956; the guerilla war that spanned the second half of the twentieth century and extended into the twenty-first century, pitting the southern region against the northern region, and led primarily by the Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/SPLA), a revolutionary organization that aimed for a united socialist Sudan; the Islamist revolution (1989) that transformed the society into one guided by Sharī'a and Islamic principles; and various socialist, progressive, and "minority" liberation movements and fronts in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. Especially since the "Islamic Trend" emerged in the 1980s and Islamists took power in 1989, imposing Islamization projects, different regions of the country have engaged in uprisings that are broader than identity or minority politics (for example, in eastern Sudan the Beja People's Party; in the west the Nuba Mountains resistance, and in the west an uprising in Darfur). Like all sociopolitical movements, these have been gendered. Women have played greater and lesser roles in terms of the armed/military struggles, but have played essential support roles as well as engaging in political activity and some leadership roles. Furthermore, each of these revolutionary or proto- and quasi-revolutionary movements has altered the gender division of labor and gender relations in significant, if not revolutionary, ways.

The only enduring progressive revolutionary party to develop in Sudan in the twentieth century was the Marxist-Leninist Sudanese Communist Party (SCP). Although an offshoot of the Egyptian communist party and having strong ties to the Soviet Union, it was still very much a "national" party. As Sudan's main leftist party, the SCP has been persecuted, driven underground and into exile, and has been beheaded (with the 1971 execution of Secretary-General 'Abd al-Khāliq Maḥ jūb). The SCP has fought for social revolution via paths mostly eschewing armed struggle, the failed 1971 coup d'état being one of the exceptions. A full-scale revolutionary process in the Marxist sense has not occurred in Sudan – in fact has seen a severe setback since the 1989 Islamist coup d'état.

Despite impediments within the context of a conservative, religious sectarian, Muslim society, the SCP was strong in its organizing in various spheres: the tenant farmers, the trade unions, and especially among railroad workers, youth, the intelligentsia, and women. Even some strong influence in the all-powerful military occasionally emerged.

However, foremost among the organizing achievements of the SCP was its foundation of an affiliated Sudanese Women's Union (SWU), at one time one of the strongest women's organizations on the African continent or in the Middle East. The SWU was founded in 1952, was active during the late nationalist period (1952–6), and reached its zenith in 1965, with branches opened throughout the country and liberal gains in women's rights such as suffrage, equal pay, and maternity leave.

Despite this achievement, however, the patriarchal ideology, paternalism toward the SWU, and the structure of the SCP and the gender strategies it has followed have greatly diminished its effectiveness as an agent of socialist gender transformation. Most cadres have not had an adequate understanding of the subjectivity of oppression and of the connections between personal relations and public political organization, nor have they understood issues of sexuality, let alone directly addressed them. With these omissions, it is unlikely that the SCP could have done more than politicize the conventional roles of Sudanese women. While it would be wrong to say the SCP did not consider the role of women in building the revolution or did not imagine the place of women in a liberated Sudan, it did not advocate or engage in, even within its own organization, transformative gender practices aimed at a revolutionary transformation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Z. B. El-Bakri and El-W. M. Kameir, Aspects of women's participation in Sudan, in International Social Science Journal 35:4 (1983), 605–23.
- A. Gresh, The Free Officers and the Comrades. The Sudanese Communist Party and Nimeiri face-to-face, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 21 (1989), 393–409.
- S. Hale, The wing of the patriarch. Sudanese women and revolutionary parties, in Middle East Report 16:1 (1986), 25–30.
- , Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism, and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
- F. A. Ibrāhīm, Ṭarīqānā ilā al-tubarrur, Khartoum n.d.
- F. B. Mahmoud, The role of the Sudanese women's movement in Sudanese politics, M.A. diss., University of Khartoum 1971.
- G. Warburg, Islam, nationalism, and communism in a traditional society. The case of Sudan, London 1978.

SONDRA HALE

Syria

Revolutionary movements in twentieth-century Syria have been a platform for women's demands for emancipation and access to political power. However, even when they have captured control of government, these movements have not revolutionized women's legal, economic, or social status, primarily because of the weaknesses of the Syrian state and economy, and the strength of conservative opposition movements.

The 1908 Constitutional Revolution fostered a new politics of citizenship in Syria and across the late Ottoman Empire. Elite urban women mobilized as citizens to promote social reforms, especially in family life, girls' education, and public hygiene, through the formation of charity groups and through the newly uncensored press. Most important was Mārī 'Ajāmī's magazine al-ʿArūs (Bride), founded in 1910 in Damascus, which portrayed its female readers as agents of a social renaissance. The Young Turk government supported Syrian women's efforts to feed the poor and to educate girls during the First World War. It also decreed the Family Law of 1917, which limited the authority of religion in matters of marriage and divorce. After the Ottomans' defeat in 1918, Syrian women activists supported constitutionalism and advocated women's suffrage under Faysal's short-lived Arab regime (1918–20). Their leader, Nāzik 'Ābid, published a reformist journal, Nūr al-Fayḥā (Light of Damascus), and headed a nurses' battalion in the fight against French occupation.

The French, who ruled Syria from 1920 to 1946, did not promote reform of women's legal or social status. Women instead pursued reform through alliances with the nationalist opposition to French rule. Adil Bayhum al-Jazā'irli, who headed the Syrian Women's Union for decades after its 1928 founding, cooperated with the National Bloc. Their alliance was based on shared commitments to liberalism and nationalism (Sakākīnī 1950) among the landowning and rising middle classes. Jazā'irli led women in campaigns for education and personal status reform, as well as campaigns for Arabist causes, especially in defense of Palestinians. Thurayā Ḥāfiḥ also emerged as a leader in public demonstrations for women's political rights and against veiling (Shaaban 1998, 47–51). Women supported nationalists in armed revolt against the French in 1925–8 and again in May 1945. But willingness to fight for their country did not win women immediate rights. Leaders of the National Bloc, who inherited rule from the French, expanded women's access to education after 1946, but they were not politically strong enough to promote substantive legal reform in face of opposition from the Muslim Brotherhood. It was only with Ḥusnī al-Za'īm's military coup against the nationalist elite in 1949 that women attained partial suffrage (Razzaz 1975, 151–60). Another dictator, Adib al-Shishakli, awarded women full suffrage in 1953.

After independence, women turned to leftist movements to advocate for their reforms, but they too were limited by religious opposition. In contrast to the segregated movements of nationalist liberals, communist women like Amīna ‘Arif al-Jarrāh attended meetings and public demonstrations unveiled in the 1940s and 1950s. Maqbūla Shalaq, a leader of the Communist Party’s women’s wing, promoted women’s right to work against the maternalist agendas of other parties and the dominant Women’s Union (Thompson 2000, 241). But even as many female students joined the communists, the party backpedaled on its commitment to women’s equality. In response to directives of the Soviet Comintern and to rival recruitment by Islamic populists, party leaders openly opposed reform of women’s personal status laws in 1939, claiming that it would inflame sectarian divisions and weaken working-class solidarity (Thompson 2000, 161). The Muslim Brotherhood advanced a counter-revolutionary platform that rejected Ottoman-era restrictions on religious law and favored the status quo in women’s confinement to the domestic sphere. The extent of women’s support for the Brotherhood remains unclear. While some Islamist women campaigned against women like Thurayā Ḥāfiz, most urban women discarded their veils after independence in 1946.

The emergent Ba’th Party reasserted a commitment to integrating women fully into public and national life (Razzaz 1975, Jamāl al-Dīn and al-Khūri 1976). Promoting an Arab socialism, the party became an important political force in the 1950s. Some women, mostly university students, also joined the party. The Ba’thists took power in a 1963 coup and have ruled Syria since. The party has explicitly promoted general social reforms, especially in education, that aimed to raise women’s status. It worked not just through the Women’s Union, which was incorporated into the party apparatus in 1968 as the General Federation of Women, but also through its peasant, workers, and youth organizations. These were corporatist entities designed as much to control constituent groups as to mobilize them. Nonetheless, by 1990 the regime had begun enforcing equal pay laws, had raised women’s literacy significantly, and had appointed a female minister. Thirteen women had served as members of parliament (Shaaban 1988, 51, 56). Women’s use of contraception rose, and the fertility rate fell from 7.4 to 3.6 births per woman between 1980 and 2000. But in other areas women’s progress was stalled. In 2000, women represented little more than a quarter of the labor force and their literacy rate had reached only 60 percent (World Bank GenderStats).

Lack of social progress coincided with a lack of legal and political reform. While the 1964 Syrian constitution mirrored much of the party’s founding constitution, it omitted the party’s earlier language that had explicitly guaranteed women’s equality with men. The 1964 document referred only to educational, health, labor, and legal rights that belong to “all citizens” (Abu Jaber 1966, 127, 170, 176–7). Only a few women, mainly party members, advanced to higher positions in government and the professions. And while all women enjoyed the right to vote under the Ba’th, elections had been rendered empty exercises. Scholars and observers blame the failure to improve women’s economic status on the fact that the Syrian economy, stagnant since 1980, could not absorb women into the workforce. It also reflected state preferences for male employment that date to the French era: upon coming to power in 1970, President Ḥāfiz al-Asad awarded family bonuses only to male employees (Perthes 1995, 24–9).

The economic and political exclusion of women also reflects continued pressure from religious opposition. By the late 1970s an Islamic Front emerged in the provinces to contest Asad’s hold on power. The Front’s 1980 manifesto adopted the language of gender equality that Syrians had been using since Faysal’s day, but explicitly limited that equality within bounds set by Islamic law on women’s duty toward her home, husband, and children (Abd-Allah 1983, 247–8). The Front also explicitly advocated women’s veiling as a political symbol of dissent (Abd-Allah 1983, 189). After brutally defeating the Front in 1982, the Ba’th trod lightly on women’s issues. The General Federation of Women shrank from advocating women’s rights in conservative villages so as not to antagonize religious men (Hinnebusch 1990, 234, 250, 272). And the regime promoted a patriarchal cult of Ḥāfiz al-Asad that demanded women’s sacrifice to their father-leader and their nation (Wedeen 1999, 49–65). In the 1990s, many Syrian women took up the veil again, as a visible sign of opposition to the Ba’th regime that had long proclaimed women’s liberation as its goal. The taboo on personal status reform since the Ottoman era reflects the ongoing tension between revolutionaries and conservatives who seek to retain the status quo of male privilege and male guardianship over women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- U. F. Abd-Allah, The Islamic struggle in Syria, Berkeley 1983.
- K. S. Abu Jaber, The Arab Ba'th Socialist Party. History, ideology, and organization, Syracuse, N.Y. 1966.
- R. A. Hinnebusch, Authoritarian power and state formation in Ba'thist Syria, Boulder, Colo. 1990.
- D. Hopwood, Syria 1945–1986. Politics and society, London 1988.
- N. Jamāl al-Dīn and S. al-Khūrī, Hawla al-mar'a, Damascus 1976².
- A. 'A. al-Jarāh, Ayyāmī kānat ghaniyya, Damascus 1985.
- V. Perthes, The political economy of Syria under Asad, London 1995.
- N. al-Razzāz, Mushārakat al-mar'a fī al-ḥayat al-āmma fī Sūriya mundhu al-istiqlāl 1945 wa ḥatt, Damascus 1975.
- W. Sakākīnī, Inṣāf al-mar'a, Damascus 1950.
- B. Shaaban, Syria. Guaranteed rights for all, except at home, in B. Shaaban, Both right and left handed. Arab women talk about their lives, Bloomington, Ind. 1988, 28–80.
- E. Thompson, Colonial citizens. Republican rights, paternal privilege, and gender in French Syria and Lebanon, New York 2000.
- L. Wedeen, Ambiguities of domination. Politics, rhetoric and symbols in contemporary Syria, Chicago 1999.
- World Bank Group, GenderStats database of Gender Statistics, <http:// devdata.worldbank.org/genderstats/home.asp>.

ELIZABETH F. THOMPSON

Turkey

The revolutionary movements in Turkey can be traced back to the late Ottoman period, to the Young Turks (Hanioglu 1995) who eventually came to power in the Second Constitutional Period (1908), and to other groups, some of them socialist, which were active but never dominant within the state structure. Prior to the Turkish Republic, modernizing movements sought to accomplish social transformation in the Ottoman state. The influence of Islam in cultural, spatial, and social spheres was viewed as responsible for the exclusion of women from most parts of public life. The legal codifications of 1839 and the constitutional reform movements of 1876 and 1908 brought about change in this structure toward centralization, secularization, and freedom, directly affecting women's claims for individual rights and independence against the constraints of traditional gender roles. The political discourse of prevailing intellectual trends, namely Ottomanism, Westernism, and Turkism, always included the theme of women's emancipation; hence, the first protagonists of the Woman Question were modernist men. However, the debate over this issue was not confined solely to men; women themselves were actively involved in it too. These pioneering women wrote in women's journals, such as Aile (Family), Hanımlara Mahsus Gazete (Journal for women), Genç Kadın (Young woman), Demet (Bunch), Kadın (Woman), Süs (Ornamentation), Kadınlar Dünyası (Women's world) and İnci (Pearl), of which there were altogether 40. These activities can be defined as the "Ottoman women's movement," for the number of journals and organizations run by women at the time deserves such a characterization (Çakır 1993).

The Osmanlı Müdafaa-i Hukuk-u Nisvan Cemiyeti (Association for the defense of the rights of Ottoman women) founded by Ulviye Mevlan, and its publication Kadınlar Dünyası, problematized women's status in Ottoman society and struggled against traditional gender inequalities as Ulviye Mevlan's words witness: "Women shall not any more rely on male writers' deceitful remarks that women are men's life-long comrades and companions. These are all lies. However, although we know they are lies, they lure our feelings. This is why we cannot defend our rights" (Çakır 1994, 125).

The revolutionary nature of the Turkish Republic is evident in the abolition of the Caliphate (1924), the secularization of education by the enactment of the Tevhid-i Tedrisat Kanunu (Law of union of education, 1924) and the adoption of the new Civil Code (1926), which opened the way for women's citizenship. The modernization project of the republic aimed at national mobilization of both genders, and important steps toward the inclusion of women into the public sphere were achieved. The "new man" of modern Turkey tried to define and promote the "new woman," equipping her with certain rights of citizenship and professional roles in the public realm. But the Turkish Republic was based on the fraternity of male citizens (Durakbaşa 1998) and women were not regarded as parties in the social contract until 1934 when they acquired full citizenship rights.

Politically eminent women such as Halide Edip (Durakbaşa 2000) and Nezihe Muhittin protested against the terms of emancipation defined by the male protagonists of Turkish modernization, arguing for the political rights of women against the idea that the republic was not mature enough to grant women the right to vote. Nezihe Muhittin founded the Kadınlar Halk Fırkası (Women's people's party, 1923) to defend the participation of women in politics. She became the founder of Türk Kadınlar Birliği (Turkish women's association) when this party was not legally authorized.

As the republic established itself ideologically and institutionally the revolutionary character of the modernization project weakened until the 1960s when major republican values were reawakened. A socialist party, Türkiye İşçi Partisi (Labor Party of Turkey, LPT) was represented in the parliament for the first time and became the major locus of revolutionary projects and political opposition. Behice Boran, the leader of the party, is an important symbol of the socialist movement, with a life that extended from the university to the parliament, surviving many trials and prison terms because of her political career and beliefs until her death in 1987 (Berktaş 2002).

The socialist movement (Tuñay 1991) was not confined to the leadership of the LPT; a number of socialist parties, notably the Turkish Communist Party (TCP) whose origin can be traced back to the 1920s, were present in the late Ottoman period; and the TCP remained illegal until the elections of 2002. The 1970s were the years when the leftist political organizations, parties, and youth movements, also under the influence of 1968 student activism in the West, determined the political agenda until the 1980 military coup. Many women supported these groups who saw the solution to the Woman Question as lying within class struggle. Women in leftist politics were usually excluded from decision-making mechanisms, an experience they shared with women in nationalist or Islamist political frameworks (Berktaş 1995). In 1975, under the influence of the TCP a semi-independent women's association, İlerici Kadınlar Derneği (Progressive women's association) was set up with a mass membership of 15,000. Still, their main target was to recruit women to the socialist cause. It was only after 1980 that women realized the significance of autonomous women's organizations in the struggle against male dominance and patriarchy, and that women's liberation could not be reduced to socialist revolution.

The post-1980 leaders of the feminist movement were mostly disillusioned women who had learned from their experience in left-wing political circles. These women, academics and students among them, preferred to define themselves as feminists and advocated an independent women's movement challenging the patriarchal structures in society. Their major accomplishments were: feminist consciousness-raising groups; a campaign against violence against women (Say No to Wife-Beating Campaign); publication activities; campaigns to amend the articles that discriminate against women in the Civil Code and the Penal Code; the founding of the women's library in Istanbul and women's research centers in the universities; women's shelters; and the recent amendment of the Civil Code in 2002.

The 1980s also saw the politicization of the Kurdish movement, which equally affected the Kurdish women's cause. Although caught between national and feminist identities, Kurdish women created publications and organizations that problematized issues such as polygamy, violence against women, adult education, and honor killings, and searched for possible solutions. In contrast, the Islamist women's movement focused on the attempt to demonstrate that prevailing oppressive Islamic practices concerning women had their origins not in the Qur'an but in the "implementation" dominated by patriarchal traditions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Berktaş, Has anything changed in the outlook of the Turkish left on women?, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society, London 1995, 250–62.
- , Olagandisi bir kadın. Behice Boran, in Tarihin cinsiyeti, Istanbul 2003, 192–204.
- S. Çakır, Die historische Entwicklung der Frauenbewegungen in der Türkei vom Osmanischen Reich bis zur Türkischen Republik, in A. Kaputanoğlu et al. (eds.), Die türkische Frauenbewegung, Karlsruhe 1993, 47–56.
- , Osmanlı kadın hareketi, Istanbul 1994, 125.
- A. Durakbaşa, Kemalism as identity politics in Turkey, in Z. Arat (ed.), Deconstructing images of "the Turkish woman", New York 1998, 139–57.
- , Halide Edib. Türk moderleşmesi ve feminizm, Istanbul 2000.
- Ş. Hanoğlu, The Young Turks in opposition, New York 1995.
- M. Tuñay, Türkiye'de sol akımlar, Istanbul 1991.

Political-Social Movements: Unions and Workers' Movements

Arab States (excepting North Africa and the Gulf)

National constitutions in Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, and Palestine identify the equality of citizens of both sexes before the law; Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, and Lebanon ratified the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). This suggests uneven patterns of worldwide protection, meaning some Arab women enjoy law-based health benefits, employment safeguards, and paid maternity leave, while others are left unprotected. In general, working women enjoy differential work protection on account of their sector of employment; the predominance of women employed in education and civil service in the central Arab states prohibits them from either joining labor unions or participating in collective bargaining.

Sovereign central Arab states are party to the International Labour Organization Forced Labour Convention 1930 (ILO C. 29); the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (98); the Equal Remuneration Convention 1951 (100); the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention 1957 (105); and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention 1958 (111). Yet in all six states, public demonstrations require the authorities' prior approval; in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, labor issues are or recently have been the purview of a state-based trade union federation. Of the ILO "core conventions," Iraq, Jordan, and Lebanon have not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), as discussed below. All states' trade unions are affiliated to the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU).

Egypt's state has taken responsibility for the interests of those women who work even though at present the unemployment rate is 19 percent among women and 5 percent among men (Farah 2002, 1). Egypt's constitution of 1956, and as amended two years later, guarantees women's equality with men before the law. The 1971 constitution adds: "The state is responsible for striking a balance between woman's family duties and her work in society and standing on equal footing with men in political, social, cultural and economic domains." Laws 47 and 48 of 1978 regulate Egyptian women working in the public sector. Three times during their working lives, such women have the right to a three-month paid maternity leave and two-year unpaid childcare leaves. Women working part-time have the right to half salary and half-holidays. Law 137 for 1981 extended ILO benefits – working women and men are equal before the labor law; women are forbidden from night work, immoral, or unhealthy work – to the private sector; the law went on to require that private firms also offer paid maternity leave, lactation breaks, and unpaid childcare leaves, as well as requiring employers of more than 100 women to provide childcare.

If Egypt's state has taken responsibility for working women's interests, this legal framework is not necessarily to all workers' benefit. While Egyptian workers may join trade unions, the law does not require them to do so; it is notable that most union members (approximately a quarter of the labor force) work in state-owned enterprises. The government sets wages, benefits, and job classifications by law, so few issues are open to negotiation. A 1985 ILO report notes that, in contravention to ILO C. 87 to which Egypt is signatory, the Egyptian Trade Union Federation is the named central organization of a legally-proscribed single trade-union system. Workers' right to strike is not guaranteed by law; the public prosecutor may call for a trade union employee's removal from office should that employee call for abandonment of work or be deliberately absent from public service (Upham 1991, 132). While existing labor laws are prejudiced against collective bargaining, the new Unified Labor currently under discussion in the parliament would provide the right to strike and statutory authorization for collective bargaining (United States Department of State 1998). However, activists on behalf of working women complain that the new law would represent a step backward from the present levels of working mothers' entitlements.

Iraq's 1970 constitution granted women equal access to education, property, the franchise, and public office (article 19). Iraq's labor law no. 151 (1970), its provisions renewed by law no. 81 (1987), established women's right to equal opportunities in the civil service and equal pay; the 1971 maternal law provided for six months' paid maternity leave, with the right to an additional six months' unpaid leave. The General Federation of Iraqi Women (GFIW), based in law 139 (1972) provided women with literacy classes, vocational training, and child-care (Farouk-Sluglett 1993; data refer to 1980). By 1986, women were said to be 40 percent of public sector employees, although Iraq does not register women's labor force participation with the ILO.

The labor code also established a single trade union structure, the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU), with 1,250,000 members (Upham 1991, 233). The GFTU excluded civil servants, and any demonstrations required prior approval from the ministry of the interior. Labor conscription was introduced in 1980, at the beginning of the war with Iran. Decree 150 (1987) left public sector employees rights of association. In 1991, Kuwaiti labor activists complained to the ILO that Iraqi occupation authorities banned trade unions, destroyed their offices, and deported, imprisoned, or killed Kuwaiti trade union leaders.

Iraqis currently live and work under military occupation. Coalition Provisional Authority Order I (16 May 2003) disestablishes Iraq's Ba'ath Party "by eliminating the party's structures" such as the GFIW and GFTU. CPA Order 1 may contravene the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), which "includes the right of everyone to the opportunity to gain his [sic] living by work which he [sic] freely chooses or accepts" (AI I 2003). "Elimination of the party's structures" also results in an inability to maintain civil order, and Iraqi women's experience with violence keeps them from work and activism.

Jordan's 1952 constitution grants citizens the right to work (requiring special conditions for women's employment) and to form trade unions "within the limits of the law" (article 23). Jordan reports employment indicators to the ILO; of those employed in Jordan, 14.2 percent were women. Of employed women, 48.9 percent in 2000 worked outside the home (Jordan 2000, cited in Ghosheh 2002); of those, half work for the government, 15 percent were self-employed, and about 10 percent employed by family members (1997). In addition to education, in which women are 42.1 percent of all employees, Jordanian women work in health and social services (13.9 percent), domestic labor (0.6 percent), and non-governmental organizations (0.5 percent).

Unlike in Egypt and Iraq, only Jordanian medical professionals and teachers working in the private sector have the right to join unions. While unions are not required to affiliate with the Jordanian Federation of Trade Unions (JFTU), all do, as in Egypt and Iraq. The JFTU reported 200,000 members in 1994, with 17 unions representing 30 percent of Jordanian workers (Upham 1991, 239). The labor law no. 8 (1996) excludes public servants (including women who work as teachers, municipal and agricultural workers, and non-nationals) from its protections. The one million foreigners working in Jordan are barred from trade union membership. Permission is required to strike, and is granted only if the ministry of labor fails to initiate arbitration. Furthermore, recent emergency decrees (laws of 2 October 2001) criminalize a number of vaguely defined offenses, including unauthorized public meetings (AI I 2002).

Lebanon's constitution (1926, including 1990 amendments) guarantees equality of citizens before the law (article 7). In 1994, 12.9 percent of Lebanon's female population was economically active. Two years later, 26.8 percent of formally employed women were teachers, 14 percent worked in commerce and maintenance, 13.8 percent in industry, 9.8 percent in health and social work, and 8 percent in domestic service. While Lebanese labor law guarantees equal remuneration for similar positions for men and women, agriculture lies beyond the reach of national legislation (Lebanon 1996, cited in Nauphal 1997). A considerable percentage of rural women work as seasonal daily paid laborers, and survey results suggest even women with skills receive half men's remuneration, particularly in rural areas. Likewise, while the labor law regulates women's maternity leave, such protections do not cover women working in agriculture or family businesses.

Women and youth participate in unions to represent their interests. Strikes in the private sector were suppressed by armed forces between 1975 and 1990. Given that young Lebanese workers associate political parties with militia rule, the Confederation générale des travailleurs libanais (CGTL) acts as a political party. The CGTL, with approximately 77,100 members (1990) advocates policies on poverty, social inequality, and civil rights. While women – the majority married and over 40 years of age – form about half of union members, their representation in leadership positions is significantly less (Lebanese Centre for Policy Studies 1993, al-Nahar 1996, Moghaizel 1987, all cited in Nauphal 1997). During 1992, Lebanon witnessed the most significant labor mobilization since 1975, with a nationwide strike protesting at the collapse of living standards.

Palestinians live and work under military occupation, which means that Palestinians experience both high unemployment and severe restrictions on movement. Palestine's women's labor force participation was 11.3 percent, with 4.2 percent of women employed as technicians, experts, and clerks, and 3.3 percent in agricultural labor (UNDP 2000).

Even with the establishment of the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) in 1996, different labor laws govern Palestinians. The West Bank and Gaza are governed by a combination of Jordanian law and PNA decisions, while residents of Jerusalem are subject to Israeli labor law. Palestine's labor law (2000) prohibits gender discrimination in the labor market, stresses non-discrimination in wages, forbids women's employment in risky and arduous jobs, on night shifts and during pregnancy, and grants maternity and lactation leaves. The PNA civil service law also provides for women's maternity leave.

Even though Palestinian women compose about 7.6 percent of trade union membership, their activities indicate the limits military occupation imposes on workers and union officers' movement. The General Federation of Palestinian Trade Unions reported 100,000 members and the Gaza Federation of Trade Unions an additional 25,000 (1993). Palestinians' access to permits to work in Israel or to travel remains a leading issue. According to the BBC, Israeli authorities prevented activist Amīna al-Rīmāwī from speaking on Palestinian working women's status at the 31st Arab Labor Conference meeting in Damascus during February 2004.

Syria reports economic activity rates to the ILO, and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU) has its headquarters in Damascus. Women were 19.8 percent of Syria's workforce in 2000: 58.7 percent of agricultural laborers, 22.2 percent of crafts persons/technicians, and 8.3 percent of executives/clerks (SAR 2000a). Many Syrian women find employment in state sponsored-education, where they are 65.7 percent of primary teachers, 48.2 percent of secondary school instructors, and 23.1 percent of university faculty (SAR 2000b). Syrian women are least represented in manufacturing (5.7 percent) (SAR censuses, SAR 2000a, cited in SAR unpublished).

Syria's citizens are equal before the law, according to the 1973 constitution (article 25). Syria's labor law grants women the right to employment in both the private and public sectors. Even though Syria has not ratified the CEDAW, the labor law emphasizes that both sexes must receive equal wages for equal work. Since 1968, the ministry of social affairs and labor sets minimum wages, establishes occupational safety specifications, pays social security premiums, and controls the right of association. Syria's workers have been represented by a single trade union structure, which restricts the rights of foreign and non-Arab workers. State of emergency legislation in force since 8 March 1963 constrains men and women from extending their rights through collective action (AI I 2004).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- AI I (Amnesty International Index), MDE 12/176/2003, 4 December 2003, Iraq. Memorandum on concerns related to legislation introduced by the Coalition Provisional Authority, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGMDE141762003?open&of=ENG-2MD>>.
- , MDE 16/007/2002, 19 March 2002, Jordan. Freedom of expression at risk, <<http://www.hrea.org/lists/hr-media/markup/msg00004.html>>.
- , MDE 24/016/2004, Syria. 41 years of the state of emergency. Amnesty International reiterates its concerns over a catalogue of human rights violations, 8 March 2004, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGMDE240162004>>.
- N. R. Farah, Egypt. Gender Indicators, National Council for Women, NCW/R/02/006/E, February 2002, unpublished.
- Jordan, Department of Statistics, Percentage of Jordanian workers aged 15 and above according to employment status, in Annual report of employment and unemployment in Jordan, Amman 2000.
- Lebanese Centre for Policy Studies, A study of the needs and opportunities for skilled workers in Lebanon, 1993, <<http://www.lcps-lebanon.org/resceco/9294/workers93.html>>.
- Lebanon, Ministry of Social Affairs, The population and housing database, Beirut 1996.
- SAR (Syrian Arab Republic), General Union of Women, External Relations Office/UNIFEM (2001), The gender indicators required for monitoring and following post-Beijing activities in the Syrian Arab Republic, unpublished.
- , Central Bureau of Statistics, Internal migration survey, Damascus 2000a.
- , Central Bureau of Statistics, Statistical abstract, Damascus 2000b.
- , Central Bureau of Statistics, Census, Damascus 1970, 1981, 1994.
- UNDP, Palestine human development report 2000, New York 2000.
- United States Department of State, 1998 country report on economic policy and trade practices. Egypt, Washington, D.C.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Farouk-Sluglett, Liberation or repression? Pan-Arab nationalism and the women's movement in Iraq, in D. Hopwood et al. (eds.), Iraq. Power and society, Oxford 1993, 51–73.
- H. Ghosheh, Mainstreaming gender in the Jordanian national economic and social development plan. A case study 1999–2003, report commissioned by the United Nations Interagency Gender Task Force with the Jordanian National Commission for Women, 15 April 2002.
- L. Moghaizel, Participation politique des femmes pendant la guerre, in Actes du colloque, La femme libanaise témoin de la guerre, Paris 1987.
- al-Nahar*, poll, September 1996.

N. Nauphal, Post war Lebanon. Women and other war affected groups, ILO action programme on skills and entrepreneurship training for countries emerging from armed conflict 1997, <<http://www.ilo.org/public/english/employment/skills/training/publ/pub9.htm>>.

M. Upham, Trade unions of the world, Harlow, Essex 1991.

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Iran

The labor movement and trade unions in Iran began in the early twentieth century. They have not been homogeneous institutions; some have had grassroots support and some have been agents of the state. They survived long periods of authoritarian regimes. At different historical periods their actions have confirmed a profound reactivation of civil society (Bayat 1987, Ladjevardi 1985). However, they remained male dominated organizations. In 2003, 30 percent of formal sector workers in state enterprises and 6 percent of formal sector workers in private enterprises were women. Notions of masculinity and femininity locate women in unskilled and low paid work; they pay higher taxes and receive lower levels of bonuses and other entitlements. There are large numbers of women unpaid workers and even paid workers in the agriculture and the informal sector in rural and urban areas whose issues are not addressed by the male dominated trade unions (Poya 1999, 83–98).

Historically women played important roles within the labor movement. In 1930, a leading member of the oil workers' strike committee, which organized the first strike against the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, was a woman called Zahrā; other details about her are not available. In the 1930s, women workers won their specific demands: maternity leave and the right of mothers of newborn babies to have paid time off to breast-feed their babies in the factory during working hours. In 1944, women workers established the Union of Women Workers, alongside the United Central Council of Workers Unions. In 1947, Raziyya Sha' bānī, a trade union activist, was arrested as the first woman political prisoner from the labor movement (Partuvi 2002).

In 1951, the oil workers' strike led to the victory of Muṣaddiq's nationalist government and oil nationalization. This period ended with the 1953 CIA coup. In the 1960s and 1970s the dictatorial regime controlled the trade union movement and changed the term "trade unions" to "syndicates." Nevertheless, many workers remained militant and class conscious. Women workers' strikes have been significant in the history of labor movement in Iran: at the Shahnaz Factory in 1960 and 1962; the Ziba Factory in 1971; the Pars Electric and Milli Shoe Factories in 1974; and the Shahi Textile Factory in 1976 (Partuvī 2002). In February 1979, a growing revolutionary movement and a general strike resulted in the collapse of the monarchy and the establishment of the Islamic state.

Before 1979, cultural restrictions affected women's mobility and many families did not allow their daughters and female members of their families to join trade unions. But during and after the 1979 Revolution more women became active members of shawrās, workers' councils, which replaced the syndicates of the pre-1979 period. Many women workers in pharmaceutical, food, and textile industries were involved in the shawrās. They were struggling to set up workplace nurseries, literacy classes for women workers, and better health and safety conditions at work. In this period women's activities raised gender consciousness. Women were engaged in trade union activities as women. This was significant in a number of ways. The shawrās were under attack by the autocratic Islamic state and both female and male workers were struggling to save the shawrās. But male workers were against female representation; they believed that women should leave these activities to men. For their part, women believed that they should be represented in the shawrās as women workers because they had specific demands. These experiences, together with the imposition of hijāb, Islamic dress code, and sex segregation, originally designed to marginalize women in the public sphere of life, ironically opened up opportunities for many women workers to participate in trade unions. In the early 1990s, for the first time in Iran, Afsar-mulūk Yasan, a woman activist, was elected as the leader of the hairdressers' shawrā (Poya 1999, 125–130).

However, studies on gender and trade unions in Iran demonstrate that despite increase in women workers' activities in trade unions since the 1980s, they have remained in a minority and have very little voice at any of the decision-making levels. There has been a continuing resistance by male trade unionists to women's participation in trade unions. In most shawrās a woman serves as treasurer, but their participation is limited when important decisions are taken (Āqājānī 2000, Ardalān 1999, Lāhijī 1999).

Since the 1990s, a growing women's movement has challenged the patriarchal institutional domains of the Islamic state. Women workers reacted to male dominated trade unions by forming women's trade associations: for example, there are trade associations for women publishers, teachers, nurses, and lawyers (Rostami Povey 2001, 44–71). In 1998, Jamila Kadivār, a journalist and a member of parliament (2000–4) established the Women Journalists' Trade Association and in 2002 published Sid-yi zan (Woman's voice). In the first edition of this publication, Layli Farhādpūr, a journalist and a member of the association, discussed gender wage differentiation amongst the media workers, women's long hours of work, their absence at the management level, and the impact of the closure of the media in 2000–2 on women's employment (Farhādpūr 2002). On 8 August 2003, this association together with two other media unions – the Journalists' Trade Union and the In Defence of Freedom of Media Association – organized a successful strike of all media workers in support of the democracy movement and to protest at the death of Zahra Kazemi, an Iranian-Canadian journalist who died in custody in Iran during the pro-democracy movement in the summer of 2003.

The establishment of women's trade associations from the late 1990s demonstrates that Iranian women workers find it difficult to create conditions that furnish their democratic rights within existing unions. So in their own way they are challenging the male dominated trade unions. This may lead to the formation of more women's trade unions or women workers may force male dominated institutions to recognize women's full participation in trade unions. In the meantime, some women's non-governmental organizations are providing an array of support groups available to women outside the formal workplace (Rostami Povey 2004). They are not replacing the trade unions and they do not organize women as workers. Nevertheless, despite their limited activities, they function as an alternative civil society organization, finding it easier to construct democratic rights through women's institutions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Āqājānī, Šandūq-i hamyar-i dar karkhana ma, in Jins-i duvvum. Majmū'a-i maqālāt 5 (2000), 91–2.
- P. Ardala-n, Aya dar itihadiyah-i sinfi zanān bi shahravandi shinākhta mishavand?, in Jins-i duvvum. Majmū'a-i maqālāt 4 (1999), 43–8.
- A. Bayat, Workers and revolution in Iran, London 1987.
- L. Farhādpūr, Aya zanān-i rūznāma nakār ihtiyāj bi yik tashakul-i sinfi khas darand?, in Sida-yi zan. Nasbriya anjoman-i rūznāma nakār zan-i Īrān 1 (2002), 2.
- S. Lāhijī, Sih tajruba va yik ārzū, in Jins-i duvvum. Majmū'a-i maqālāt 1 (1999), 37–44.
- H. Ladjevardi, Labor union and autocracy in Iran, New York 1985.
- M. Partuvī, Jāyigāh-i zanān dar tabaqa kārkar, in Fašl-i zanān. Majmū'a-i ārā va didgā'hā-yi fiministī 2:2 (2002), 149–153.
- M. Poya, Women, work and Islamism. Ideology and resistance in Iran, London 1999.
- E. Rostami Povey, Feminist contestations of the institutional domains, in Feminist Review Collective 69 (2001), 44–72.
- , Trade unions and women's non-governmental organizations. Diverse civil society organizations in Iran, in A. Leather (ed.), Development in practice 14:1/2 (2004), 254–66.

ELAHEH ROSTAMI POVEY

Turkey

Turkish women enjoyed a wide range of civil and political rights and were granted new opportunities by the republican regime as early as the 1920s. Even though much progress was made compared to the Ottoman period, the new regime proved to be limited in the full realization of women's liberation. The inferior position of women in organized labor both in numbers and influence demonstrates their prevailing subordination in Turkish society. The membership of females in labor unions today is variously estimated to be between 6 and 10 percent of total unionized workers. Their position in the union administrative bodies, on the other hand, is one of outrageous underrepresentation, far below the numbers proportionate to their membership. Despite the fact that recent years have marked a certain level of progress in terms of integration of women members into the unions, their involvement is still largely confined to the women's committees, bureaus, and workplace representation.

The story of women workers' experience with workers' organizations in Turkey is by and large an unexplored topic. Although the establishment of the first workers' organizations comparable to labor unions goes back to the early twentieth century, women's position in the union movement attracted scholarly attention and became an issue only after the 1980s with the rise of the feminist movement in Turkey. Apart from the very small amount of research conducted in the 1970s, memoirs and works on the history of strikes and on the working class in general are the major sources of evidence for women's status in organized labor during the pre-1980 period. The limited statistical data and research, however, show that women have played a minor role in the union movement in Turkey with the exception of a few "heroines," and these exceptions were mostly masculinized activists concerned with general problems of workers rather than women-specific issues.

Along with the low level of industrialization, and the structural weakness of workers' movements and unionism, the low union membership rate among women workers, as well as their restricted representation among the administrative cadres, are mainly attributable to the pre-eminence of traditional values in Turkish society. While women have access to the public sphere as citizens equal with men in modern Turkey, the private sphere is still held to be the appropriate place for women, since their roles as mothers and wives are prioritized by the prevailing patriarchal mentality. This has strong implications for the marginalization of women in the labor market, which reinforces labor union discrimination against women, and hence reproduces the gendered ideology in the labor market. The female labor force participation rate, 24.3 percent of the total female population above the age of twelve, as well as the dominance of unpaid family labor as the major type of female economic participation, 51.9 percent of the total female labor force, are crucial factors in explaining the exclusion of a large proportion of women from union membership in Turkey. Moreover, urban women working in the marginal service sector, such as cleaning on a daily or monthly pay basis, women engaged in home production, and most of the women working in small-size enterprises are deprived of both social security rights and union membership.

Even though the low unionization rate among women workers partly highlights their limited representation in the union decision-making process, as well as the low rate of participation in union activities, the correlation between numbers and influence is mostly misleading. In fact, women's secondary status within the unions continues to be the case where the female membership is relatively high. This is essentially related to the reflection of sexual division of labor at the organizational level, as has been the case in most of the other political and economic organizations in Turkey. Women workers' passive stance in the unions is largely linked with the double burden caused by the separate roles that they have to perform at home and at work. Women workers generally do not have the opportunity to engage in any other activity, even if they would prefer to do so. In addition, the deep-rooted preconception concerning the masculinity of politics at large has its negative repercussions on the socialization of women members in unions. Within the context of the traditional distinction between women's and men's jobs, most women either are habitually apathetic or do not perceive themselves as potential decision-makers or as being capable of undertaking union activities. The lack of sufficient information concerning the functions of labor unions further aggravates the alienation of women within the unions. Most women perceive unions as organizations solely responsible for defending their economic interests and thus their expectations from the unions are very limited. Besides the scarcity of educational facilities, this perception is highly related to the profile of unionism in Turkey, which is largely confined to the collective bargaining process. Women who do have labor union consciousness remain aloof to the unions when faced with their indifferent stance toward their special needs and demands, such as childcare support, reduction of working hours, and improvement of working conditions.

The post-1980 period has seen the advancement of certain policies for the encouragement of women's participation at all levels and the management of women-specific problems. The establishment of the Bureau of Women Workers under the Confederation of Trade Unions of Turkey in 1982 with the support of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions represents a significant step in this respect. Similar initiatives followed, accompanying the rise of the feminist movement. The steps taken so far are nevertheless far from effective in undermining male domination. Today, the number of unions that have acknowledged the significance of the Woman Question still remains very limited.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Devlet İstatistik Enstitüsü, Türkiye istatistik yılığı 2002, Ankara 2003.
- Y. Ecevit, Shop floor control. The ideological construction of Turkish women factory workers, in N. Redclift and M. T. Sinclair (eds.), Working women. International perspectives on labour and gender ideology, London 1991, 56-68.
- S. Erdoğan, Kadın işçiler ve sendikalar, in O. Baydar and G. Dinçel (eds.), 75 yılda çarkları döndürenler, İstanbul 1999, 271-80.
- M. Koray, Çalışma yaşamında kadın gerçekleri, Ankara 1993.
- A. Ögün and A. Özman, Türkiye'de kadın-sendika ilişkişi. Sendikalaşma ve örgüt içi temsil, Ankara 1998.
- G. Toksöz, Kadın çalışanlar ve sendikal katılım, in A. Ü. Siyasal Bilgiler Fakültesi Dergisi 49:3/4 (1995), 439-54.
- G. Toksöz and S. Erdoğan, Sendikacı kadın kimliğı, Ankara 1998.

Postcolonial Dissent

Malaysia and Indonesia

Dissent that is postcolonial in orientation requires a double move. It must be critically aware of the discourses, categories, and power structures of both colonialism and nationalism. This form of dissent requires a sustained analysis of the ways in which social and political structures as well as language itself perpetuate colonial structures that entrap women and other unrepresented groups even when they seem to be liberating in their overall intent. The analytical framework on which this type of dissent is based was first articulated by a group of mostly diasporic scholars in universities in the United States and United Kingdom who identified their work as “postcolonial criticism” and “colonial discourse theory” in the 1980s and 1990s. With the benefits of both experience in and distance from their homelands, these postcolonial critics have worked to disentangle an array of colonial, national, and as well as neocolonial and neonationalist forces that constrain thought and language and justify inequalities. Postcolonial critics are particularly attentive to the ways in which nationalists struggling to gain political and cultural independence were caught in a series of oppositions: between the notions of “East” versus “West”; the “civilized” versus the “uncivilized”; the elite versus masses, urban versus agricultural; those who followed indigenous traditions versus those who followed the so-called “book” religions (those with written sacred texts), among other issues. Those who practice postcolonial dissent in Malaysia and Indonesia focus attention on the ways in which these divisions continue to be exploited in the development and maintenance of local, regional, and national power.

Prior to the 1990s, it was difficult to develop and maintain an active practice of postcolonial dissent in Malaysia and Indonesia, where governments as well as local leaders called upon the discourse of nationalism to rally responses against threats to sovereignty and self-determination. During the decade of the 1990s, however, this situation was transformed as a convergence of events occurred. The central themes and points of analysis of postcolonial criticism were translated into the languages and contexts of Indonesia and Malaysia, and connections were established between local or indigenous knowledges and the insights of a growing number of global social justice activists and scholars. These groups began to advocate for a stronger and more unified response to problems related to economic globalization, military and governmental oppression, environmental justice, and the rights of women and indigenous peoples. Systems for national, regional, and transnational networking constructed by non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and the United Nations system created opportunities for activists and scholars to exchange ideas at such conferences as the Rio Summit on the environment in 1992 and the Beijing Women’s Conference in 1995. Each of these major events was preceded by significant preparatory activity at the regional and local levels, in which activists met to collect information and develop platforms for action, leading to productive discussion and interaction among various communities of activists and stakeholders. The follow-up conferences, including “Beijing+5” and “Rio+10” have created structures that motivate participants to maintain a high level of activity on their issues of concern, and to intensify their cross-issue networking to prepare for specific major events. The activity of those conferences has been sustained and increased with the development of the annual World Social Forum, an alternative to the major United Nations conference venue, where grassroots organizing was the main focus. The result of this activity has been the normalizing of the idea of interconnectedness across national boundaries, and the increase of large-scale coalition building and networking activity.

In 2002, for example, Indonesian activists created a broadly integrated coalition in response to their government’s efforts to prepare for the World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD) in Johannesburg, South Africa. The coalition consisted of groups concerned specifically with environmental issues such as climate change and biodiversity in forestry and marine life, as well as those overseeing human, labor, and environmental issues in the areas of mining and agribusiness, and human rights activists focused on children, women, and indigenous peoples. This kind of coalition-building, also known as “civil society” action results in part from the dissemination of ideas produced through postcolonial critique that see beyond the conventional disciplinary and issue-area boundaries and categories.

Developments in postcolonial dissent have emerged in part out of particular urgencies brought on by the economic and political crises that hit both countries in 1997–9, including mass riots and the overthrow of the 30-year Suharto regime in Indonesia and the jailing of the progressive Deputy Prime Minister Ibrahim Anwar in Malaysia on specious charges of corruption and sodomy. One of Anwar's major contributions to political activism was his popularization of the term masyarakat madani, Malay for "civil society," which he promoted as a "path for a Malaysian-style Islamic modernity and civilization (Othman 2003, 126). In contrast to other Malaysian leaders, Anwar argued that masyarakat madani required "a political climate which accepts dissent, critical judgment, and pluralistic views as part of the democratic process of governance" (ibid., 127); these views inspired the group of supporters who demonstrated against his incarceration in 1998.

As these crises have unfolded, activists have been increasingly ready to respond, because of widespread awareness of how national governments, like their colonial predecessors, use ethnic, religious, and class- and gender-based "divide and conquer" techniques to distract the populace. As Ariel Heryanto and Sumit Mandal explain in their recent book Challenging Authoritarianism in South-east Asia: Comparing Indonesia and Malaysia, the term reformasi (reform) traveled across the border in 1998 from Indonesia to Malaysia, along with the idea of "reformasi activism" (Heryanto and Mandal 2003, 7). Reformers in both nations are currently in the process of comparing the structures of "othering" that occur between ethnic groups, particularly concerning Chinese populations (ibid., 8–11), and indigenous peoples. Similar cross-border activity is evident among Muslim feminists, as evidenced in regional workshops sponsored by the Malaysian group Sisters in Islam.

CHALLENGES TO POSTCOLONIAL DISSENT

Postcolonial dissent in the diasporic arena differs from that practiced within the "excolonized nations" such as Malaysia and Indonesia in two ways. First, activists from these nations experience a greater degree of danger and sacrifice in their efforts; they have been vulnerable to imprisonment without trial, torture, and other forms of silencing. Second, political and religious leaders in both Malaysia and Indonesia are adept in presenting critiques of the West that coincide with the intentionality of postcolonial dissent even as they maintain the hierarchical structuring of "East versus West" of the colonial period. Malaysia's Prime Minister Dr. Mahathir Mohamad has been instrumental in promoting the idea of "Asian values," in response to threats to Malaysia's sovereignty by the international human rights regime together with the regimes of economic globalization (interventions by the International Monetary Fund and more recently, the World Trade Organization). While the concept of "Asian values" is meant to empower Asian nations, it does so at the expense of popular sovereignty within Malaysia, as it promotes communal and patriarchal values for the purposes of maintaining a strict socioeconomic order. Similarly, the denunciation by Muslim leaders of "Western" practices in an effort to create a sense of Islamic unity and dignity has in some instances led to a loss of women's rights. While women have increasingly donned the jilbab (head covering) in part to promote Islamic empowerment, changes in Malaysian family law have restricted their rights in marriage and divorce (Othman 2003, 139). In Indonesia, Muslim leaders presented readings of Islamic texts to argue that a woman could not take the role of the presidency. In both cases, the rhetoric of postcolonial dissent was utilized to negate its fundamental spirit by reversing efforts to dismantle hierarchical and exclusive power structures to the benefit of the underrepresented and subaltern.

RESPONSES TO THE "ASIAN VALUES" DEBATE

One dissenting voice in the "Asian values" debate has come from Malaysian human rights organization SUARAM (Suara Rakyat Malaysia, People's voice of Malaysia). Speaking for the group, Kua Kia Soong has argued that Asian society and culture encompass more than the narrowly defined model Dr. Mohamad put forth. Asian values may also include the philosophies of Hindu, Buddhist, and Taoist philosophies (represented by Malaysia's Indian and Chinese populations) as well as animist beliefs held by indigenous peoples of the region, and as such, a respect for human life, social equity, and "ecological harmony" (Kua Kia Soong 2001, 10). With this approach, SUARAM has worked with other human rights and environmental justice activists to reframe struggles against Malaysia's economic development policies in terms of popular rather than national sovereignty and human security as opposed to national security. SUARAM focuses on struggles for popular sovereignty – the rights of peoples whose lands have been targeted for development by the central government to determine how their land will be developed and how profits from that development will be distributed. In this work, SUARAM has formed coalitions with such organizations as SIRD (Strategy Info Research Development) to draw attention to issues of urbanization, indigenous people's rights, and environmental justice in Malaysia, concentrating in particular on the Sungai Selangor Dam project and its displacement of the Temuan peoples from their native villages. The movement to protect land and culture from development projects intersects with SUARAM's central focus, the protest against Malaysia's ISA (Internal Security Act) which was recently invoked against demonstrators supporting Ibrahim Anwar and numerous other activists since that time.

In Indonesia, activists offer another alternative to the "Asian values" paradigm through their focus on developing processes for "transitional justice" based on the model of South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation programs. Efforts toward truth and reconciliation are linked to aspects of postcolonial dissent, in that they seek intersections between the binarized narratives of victim and perpetrator, and cultivate relationships between people from a variety of ethnic and religious backgrounds to draw out broad, liberating truths. These efforts expand upon postcolonial theory in their advocacy of a hybrid form of justice that draws from multiple legal systems and results not in punishment but accountability and healing. Many activists in Indonesia at present are committed to this approach as perhaps the only means of facing the future in the wake of 40 years of severe violence and oppression that is yet unabated.

Efforts toward "truth seeking" came to the fore with the work of TRK (Tim Relawan Kemanusiaan, Volunteers for humanity), an assemblage of rights workers from a variety of NGOs and other organizations, and multiple religious and ethnic backgrounds that targets its efforts at major flash-points of ethnic and gender violence in Indonesia. TRK began its work by supporting the efforts of student and other demonstrators at the height of the struggle against the Suharto regime. After the riots of 1998, the TRKP (the Violence against women division of the TRK) collected data on the victims of the mass rapes against Chinese women in several Indonesian cities, and publicized the events in an effort to force the accountability of the Indonesian military. Using the discourse of the international women's movement, the TRKP argued that the rapes were "crimes against humanity," not just "anti-Chinese" violence (Budianta 2003, 163). TRK's efforts led to the establishment of the Komnas Perempuan (National commission on violence against women), which is currently involved in an initiative to map and document violence against women throughout Indonesia (Farid and Simarmatra 2004, 24). Recently, TRK has set up field offices in Aceh, Maluku, and East Timor (Timor Larosae) and works to distribute medicines and help displaced peoples while collecting information for investigations of human rights violations. Along with TRK, several organizations have been working on the collection of testimonies and oral histories from the 1965–6 violence that brought ex-president Suharto (1966–98) to power, including JKB (Jaringan Kerja Budaya, Cultural network) and ELSAM (Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat, Institute for policy research and advocacy). Despite the government's slow progress in the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission in Indonesia, the activists at these organizations are continuing to prepare for the opportunity to revisit past injustices in order to "forgive but not forget."

POSTCOLONIAL DISSENT AND MUSLIM FEMINISM

In response to the "Islamization" of social and legal systems through increased influence of Islamic law over civil law, women in Malaysia formed the organization known as Sisters In Islam. Since its inception in 1998, Sisters in Islam has taken an inclusive approach to its discussions of the relationship between mosque and state, incorporating the views of Muslim scholars and members of Islamic organizations with or without political affiliations, as well as lawyers schooled in civil law, journalists, academics, and activists. The organization's inception was transnational in scope, incorporating many of the ideas in circulation throughout the Islamic world, including those of African American theologian Amina Wadud, who was at that time teaching at the International Islamic University in Kuala Lumpur. A group of interested women scholars studied Wadud's concept of Islamic hermeneutics, which distinguish those elements that "are universal and eternal" from those that refer to "the cultural and historical specificities of seventh-century Arabia" (Anwar 2001, 229). Since that time, co-founders Zainah Anwar and Norani Othman have written for Malaysian and international audiences about their organization's efforts to include all of the umma or Islamic community (men and women) in "female inclusive" readings of Islamic texts, drawing upon insights developed by Muslim feminists working in national and international contexts, including Pakistani American writer Riffat Hassan, Moroccan feminist Fatima Mernissi, and Wadud (Anwar 2001, Othman 1994, 2003). Othman and others call for the reclaiming of ijtihad (individual interpretation of scripture) for women, and the transformation of this process to a more “dialogical or communitarian” approach (Othman 1994, 153).

The exchange of ideas and strategies at international as well as regional women’s conferences has been instrumental in the work of Sisters in Islam, as has increased access to print media and the use of the Internet. The organization, working with other groups, used the opportunity of the 1995 Beijing Conference for women to collect data on the conditions of women in Malaysia. The group has also employed CEDAW (the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, which Malaysia ratified in 1995) as a rallying point to make transparent some of the unspoken arguments for misogynistic practices. Men were forced to publicly argue, for example, that they had a right to beat their wives (Anwar 2001, 236) and that laws prohibiting domestic violence in Malaysia (in response to the CEDAW) should thus be applicable only to non-Muslim men. Using several modes of interpretation and argument sanctioned under Islam, women counter-argued that surely, wife-beating was not in the spirit or world-view of the Qur’an. Malaysian women then worked through the legal system to pass new legislation known as the Domestic Violence Act in such a way as to include Muslims within its jurisdiction.

Similar activity has occurred in Indonesia, led by the initial efforts of Wardah Hafidz, one of the first Indonesian women to speak to a Muslim audience about the “misogynist” aspects of “Islamic fundamentalism” in the magazine Ulumul Qur’an. Citing Pakistan as an example, she argued that “women are the first targets of Islamization,” to the degree that regressive steps concerning women are taken as a means of demonstrating progress in the “Islamizing” of society (Hafidz 1993a, 39). Muslim feminism is now widely represented in Indonesia through print journalism and on television, as well as through the Internet on such sites as islamlib.com, homepage of the Indonesian organization Liberal Islam, and rahima.or.id, website of the Islamic women’s organization Center for Training and Information on Islam. The recent opening of dialog and public expression in Indonesia appears to be positively affecting the dissemination of ideas associated with Muslim feminism, at least among elite women with access to newspapers and the Internet. Several prominent female activists have helped in this process. Through her position as a senior researcher at the Ministry of Islamic Affairs, Musdah Mulia has had a prominent voice in the current movement, as has Indonesian sociologist Dr. Siti Ruhaini Dzuhayatin. The Muslim feminist movement in Indonesia was given greater visibility and influence through the participation of former First Lady Sinta Nuriyah. In 2001, she established a 13-member panel of experts to examine the “yellow books,” the Islamic texts taught in most religious schools in Indonesia, for examples of discriminatory interpretations of the sacred texts. As in Malaysia, the purpose is to draw together scholars from a variety of disciplines, including experts in the Islamic legal code and in the interpretation and exegesis of Islamic texts, as well as anthropologists, linguists, and scholars of gender studies, to invoke a communitarian response to the role and treatment of women in Islamic society.

CONCLUSION

Postcolonial dissent was once marginalized in Malaysia and Indonesia, along with writers, artists, and academics who employed this mode of critical analysis. This form of dissent is becoming the basis for participation in national, regional, and transnational activism on a variety of interconnected topics centered around human rights, human security, and popular sovereignty. Increased dialog between Malaysia and Indonesia has given strength to movements in both countries as they have formed webs and networks that enable communing, strategizing, and the sharing of information. Despite the prominence of these movements in the international arena and in academic research, they are still challenged by powerful national governance systems that display limited openness to democratic reforms and transitional justice processes. However, participants in these movements continue to build on strong theoretical and practical foundations, increased awareness and normalization of human rights discourse in the media and populace, and transnational support from activists in other nations working toward the same ends.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Abugidieri, A historical model for gender jihad, in Y. H. Haddad et al. (eds.), Daughters of Abraham. Feminist thought in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, Gainesville, Fla. 2001, 81–107.
- Z. Anwar, What Islam, Whose Islam? Sisters in Islam and the struggle for women’s rights, in R. Hefner (ed.), The politics of multiculturalism. Pluralism and citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia, Honolulu 2001, 227–52.
- A. Appadurai, Disjuncture and difference in the global cultural economy, in Public Culture 2:2 (1990), 1–24.
- (ed.), Globalization, Durham, N.C. 2001.
- K. A. Appiah, Is the post- in postmodernism the post- in

- postcolonial?, in Critical Inquiry 17 (Winter 1991), 336–57.
- H. Bhabha, The location of culture, New York 1994.
- M. Budianta, The blessed tragedy. The making of women's activism during the reformasi years, in A. Heryanto and S. Mandal (eds.), Challenging authoritarianism in Southeast Asia. Comparing Indonesia and Malaysia, New York 2003, 145–77.
- A. Chayes and M. Minow (eds.), Imagine coexistence. Restoring humanity after violent ethnic conflict, San Francisco 2003.
- N. van Doorn-Harder, Interview. Sinta Nuriyah Abdurachman Wahid. A Muslim feminist stirs Indonesia's waters, in Christian Science Monitor, 17 May 2001.
- J. L. Esposito (ed.), The Iranian Revolution. Its global impact, Miami 1990.
- H. Farid and R. Simarmatra, The struggle for truth and justice. A survey of transitional justice initiatives throughout Indonesia, International Center for Transitional Justice Occasional Paper Series, 2004, <<http://www.ictj.org/indo.asp>>.
- W. Hafidz, Misogyny and fundamentalism in Islam [in Indonesian], in Ulumul Qur'an, 1993a.
- , Islamic women's organizations and the direction of their development, in L. M. Marcoes et al. (eds.), Muslim women of Indonesia in textual and contextual studies [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1993b.
- R. Hassan, Feminism in Islam, in A. Sharma et al. (eds.), Feminism in world religions, Albany, N.Y. 1999, 248–78.
- P. Hayner, Unspeakable truths. Confronting state terror and atrocity, New York 2001.
- A. Heryanto and S. Mandal (eds.), Challenging authoritarianism in Southeast Asia. Comparing Indonesia and Malaysia, New York 2003.
- M. Kick and K. Sikkink, Activists beyond borders. Advocacy networks in international politics, Ithaca, N.Y. 1998.
- Kua Kia Soong (ed.), People before profits. The rights of Malaysian communities in development, Kuala Lumpur 2001.
- F. Mernissi, The veil and the male elite. A feminist interpretation of women's rights in Islam, trans. M. J. Lake-land, Reading, Mass. 1991.
- S. Nuriyah, Many religious interpretations discriminate against women, in Tempo, 16–21 January 2001.
- N. Othman, Hudud law or Islamic modernity?, in N. Othman (ed.), Shari'a law and the modern nation-state. A Malaysian symposium, Kuala Lumpur 1994, 147–53.
- , Islamization and democratization in Malaysia in regional and global contexts, in A. Hernanto et al. (eds.), Challenging authoritarianism in Southeast Asia. Comparing Indonesia and Malaysia, New York 2003, 117–44.
- N. Peluso and M. Watts (eds.), Violent environments, Ithaca, N.Y. 2001.
- R. Radhakrishnan, Postmodernism and the rest of the world, in F. Afzal-Khan and K. Seshadri-Crooks (eds.), The pre-occupation of postcolonial studies, Durham, N.C. 2000, 37–70.
- B. Stowasser, Gender issues and contemporary Quranic interpretation, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender and social change, New York 1998, 30–44.
- SUARAM (Suara Rakyat Malaysia), <<http://www.suaram.org/home.htm>>.
- TRK (Tim Relawan Kemanusiaan), <<http://trk.sekitarkita.com/siapakami/sk.htm>>.
- A. Wadud, Qur'an and woman. Rereading the sacred text from a woman's perspective, New York 1999.

JULIE SHACKFORD-BRADLEY

Public Office

Afghanistan

For the vast majority of Afghan women, the family functions as the paramount social institution. Thus women's participation in public office remains conspicuous by its absence.

King Amīr Amān Allāh (1919–29) tried to liberate women but his programs met with tribal backlash and led to his overthrow. During the premiership of Muḥammad Dāwūd (1953–63) an attempt at public unveiling occurred on the second day of Jeshn (24–30 August 1959). Other bold steps were also taken; for example, a delegation of Afghan women participated in a conference on Asian women in Ceylon in 1957 and a women delegate was sent to the United Nations in 1958.

King Zāhir Shāh (1933–73) inaugurated a liberal era in 1959 when he formally announced the voluntary end of female seclusion. During the constitutional period (1963–73) a liberal constitution accorded significant rights to women, including the right to vote and the right to education. The Constitutional Advisory Commission included two women appointed by the king. The Loya Jirga (Grand Assembly) also included four women. A distinctive feature of the election of 1965 was the election of four women. Miss Kubra Nurzai, minister for public health, was the first female minister in Afghanistan. Mrs. Shafiqā Ziyayee was another woman minister who remained without portfolio in Etemadi's second cabinet (1969–71). Women were enfranchised by the constitution and they voted in the urban centers.

During the 1980s, after the communist government (1978–92) came to power, a central feature of government policy was the emphasis on education and vocational training, including women's education. The educational policy of the communists saw the dispatch of children, including hundreds of girls, from urban areas to the Soviet Union. It was estimated that by the end of this period, women were to be found in all major government departments, in addition to the police force, the army, business, and industry. Women taught, studied, and acted as judges in the family courts. They worked as scientists and pharmacists in government laboratories and comprised over 75 percent of teachers, 40 percent of medical doctors, and approximately 50 percent of civil servants, almost all of them city based (Human Rights Watch 2001).

The social policies of the Taliban led to a drastic curtailment of women's freedom. Girls and women were denied the opportunity to receive education or employment (other than in the health sector) and forbidden to leave their homes unless completely veiled and accompanied by a male relative. Following strong protests by the international community over the wholesale dismissal of female government employees after the Taliban took power in 1996, it was agreed that they could continue to draw their salaries without being allowed to perform their work functions. However, in 1999 a report of the United Nations Secretary-General noted the widespread dismissal of female civil servants in a move to cut government spending (United Nations 2003).

One of the major political achievements of the Bonn process (December 2001), which occurred after the fall of the Taliban, was the effort to make Afghan women an increasingly active political force. The independent commission for the convening of the Emergency Loya Jirga (February 2002) included 3 women out of 21 commissioners, including one vice-chair of the commission. Women from all segments of society, across ethnic and religious communities, accounted for 200 delegates to the Loya Jirga, or 12.5 percent. One woman was elected vice-chair of the Loya Jirga, and another, Massouda Jalal, received the second largest number of ballots for the position of president. The Emergency Loya Jirga endorsed the cabinet of the Transitional Administration, which includes three women: Habiba Sorabi, minister of women's affairs, Suhaila Siddiq, minister of public health, and Mahbooba Hoquqmal, minister of state for women's affairs. The minister of state for women's affairs provides policy advice for gender mainstreaming, legal issues, and political participation. Despite this success, women continue to face enormous challenges in the public sphere.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCE

United Nations Commission on the Status of Women, The situation of women and girls in Afghanistan, Report of the Secretary-General, E/CN.6/2003/4, Forty-seventh session, 3–14 March 2003.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1980.
 N. H. Dupree, Afghan women under the Taliban, in W. Maley (ed.), Fundamentalism reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban, London 1988, 145–66.

ARPITA BASUROY

Arab States

Women in the Arab world today enjoy the smallest share of parliamentary seats worldwide. They occupy only 5.7 percent of all parliamentary seats in the region, as compared to 15 percent in Sub-Saharan Africa and 12.9 percent in Latin America and the Caribbean countries. Women hold 3 out of 128 (2.3 percent) seats in Lebanon; 6 out of 110 (5.4 percent) in the lower house and 7 out of 55 (12.7 percent) in the upper house in Jordan; 11 out of 454 (2.4 percent) in the lower house in Egypt; 24 out of 389 (6.2 percent) seats of the lower house in Algeria; 30 out of 325 (9.2 percent) in Morocco; and 30 out of 250 (12 percent) in Syria. Most of the Gulf countries do not hold elections, and Kuwait does not allow women the right to vote.

Some Arab countries have adopted legislation to increase the representation of women in key positions, but these laws are sometimes not enforced or not adequate to ensure women significant representation. Recently, Arab countries such as Morocco and Jordan have adopted quotas that guarantee the representation of women. Both Morocco and Jordan have reserved parliamentary seats specifically for women; Morocco has set aside 30 of a total 325 parliamentary seats and Jordan 6 out of 110. The number of female politicians elected at the communal level in Morocco's 2003 elections rose from 84 to 127, but this is out of a total of 22,944 elected officials. Lebanese women hold fewer than 1 percent of all seats at the municipal level. The King of Morocco has recently appointed the first female royal counselor, Zoulikha Nasri. Egypt has instituted different forms of quotas, but none are currently in effect. At the ministerial levels, Arab states employ a larger concentration of women in key public offices (these may include women serving as ministers and vice ministers and women holding other ministerial positions, including parliamentary secretaries). In fact, Lebanon ranks fourth in the world, while Jordan is eighth. Egypt employs women as prominent judges in the Female Shūra Assembly.

Although women are underrepresented in elected or appointed positions, their employment in key government offices is on the rise. For instance, women occupy prominent positions in the United Arab Emirate's ministry of education. The UAE ministry of planning reported that there were more female than male employees in the more than 25 federal ministries; in 2001, 16,223 workers were women and only 9,518 men (Gulf News 2002).

The limited presence of women in parliament has raised considerable concern among observers and policymakers. Egypt's 'Amr Mūsa, for instance, has suggested that women's status in the Arab world will improve only when they hold prominent decision-making positions. In Morocco, women's parliamentary participation hastened the adoption of the family code provisions of 2004. Yet, a recent examination of the last four Egyptian parliaments seems to imply that female presence has had no direct effect on the levels of gender issues raised in parliamentary sessions.

Arab women active in political life are not content with the current status quo. They often find themselves having to secure the male and female vote. To secure the male vote female candidates discuss national issues, and issues regarding gender become secondary. As a result, and further complicating matters, most women do not see the formal legislative process as a viable means to improve their condition. Of Arab women MPs, 68 percent are dissatisfied with the current level of women's political participation and 80 percent of women active in public life claimed that they could accomplish their goals without having to participate in formal state institutions.

Certain political, material, social, and cultural conditions continue to stifle women's ability to attain their goals. Political parties remain weak and ineffectual, thereby reducing their impact on policy. The rule of law, too, is weak in the Arab world, and though a few laws guaranteeing women's participation in the public sphere exist, they need to be enforced as well. The dearth of legislation promoting women's presence in parliament also explains their continued marginalization. Reactionary forces seek to exclude women from the public and political spheres, and many current political regimes promote these conservative elements. Prior to unification, half of the judges in South Yemen were women, but subsequently conservative forces have reappointed these women to clerical positions. In fact, the patriarchal political environment does not favor equal participation in the political sphere. Other factors, including the lack of political party support for and backing of female candidates, have hindered women's formal participation. A disjunction between women's civil organizations and current women MPs who are often less concerned with gendered causes encumbers the advancement of women's issues in legislative processes. Familial dynamics also promote male, rather than female, political participation. Finally, the dismal state of Arab economies structures women's access to the public sphere. As standards of living decline and unemployment rates rise, women are becoming unable to afford the education necessary to enhance their human capital.

The impediments to meaningful gender representation are thus located in the political, economic, and cultural realities of the region.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Brand, Women, the state and political liberalization. Middle Eastern and North African women, New York 1998.
- M. Charrad, State and gender in the Maghrib, in Middle East Report (March–April 1990), 19–24, updated and reprinted in S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001, 62–71.
- Gulf News online edition, 16 December 2002, <<http://www.gulf-news.com/Articles/news.asp?ArticleID=71228>>.
- M. Hatem, Economic and political liberalization in Egypt and the demise of state feminism, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 24:2 (1992) 231–51, reprinted in S. Sabbagh (ed.), Arab women. Between defiance and restraint, New York 1996, 171–93.
- IDEA <<http://www.idea.int/women/parl/studies1a.htm>>.
- S. Joseph, Gender and family in the Arab world, in S. Sabbagh (ed.), Arab women. Between defiance and restraint, New York 1996, 194–202.
- R. Khalidi and J. E. Tucker, Women's rights in the Arab world, in S. Sabbagh (ed.), Arab women. Between defiance and restraint, New York 1996, 9–18.
- NationMaster.com, <www.nationmaster.com>
- D. Singerman, Where has all the power gone? Women and politics in popular quarters of Cairo, in F. M. Gocek and S. Balaghi (eds.), Reconstructing gender in the Middle East. Tradition, identity and power, New York 1994, 174–200.
- United Nations Development Programme, Programme on governance in the Arab region, Yemen. Women in public life, 2003, <<http://www.pogar.org/countries/yemen/gender.html>>.
- Women in national parliaments, 2003, <<http://www.ipu.org/wmn-e/world.htm>>.
- S. Zuhur, Women and empowerment in the Arab world, in Arab Studies Quarterly 25:4 (Fall 2003), 17–38.

AMANEY JAMAL

The Caucasus and Central Asia

From the early days of its establishment (1917), the Soviet state pursued policies that would emancipate women and give them equal rights with men, as an important part of the overall strategy to build a new society. The first Soviet constitution (1918) and a series of subsequent decrees granted women equal political rights that gave them access to civil service. In implementing these policies, which were advanced for their time, the Bolshevik government made special provisions to ensure that Muslim women of ex-colonial Russian territories were involved in the process. Before that, participation of women in public office was not possible, especially in the highly traditional and segregated societies of the ex-colonial Muslim territories of the Russian Empire.

The policies of the Bolshevik government during its first decade resulted in the first women being elected to local and central governing bodies (soviets). However, this representation remained low until the end of the 1930s. In 1922, in spite of invitations from the Bolsheviks, women made up 11 percent of deputies of city councils and 1 percent of village councils (Khasbulatova 2001). In Turkistan, fewer than half the elected female delegates in 1926 represented the Muslim population (Khairullaev 1990). In light of this, starting from 1925, the Soviets accelerated their work toward the emancipation of Muslim women of the Caucasian and Central Asian republics by publishing the appeal of the Central Executive Committee of the USSR, “On the rights of the working women of the Soviet East and necessity to combat all forms of their enslavement in economic and family areas” (Khairullaev 1990). This called for more active measures in involving Muslim women (or as they were called at that time “women of the Orient”) to participate at all levels of public and political life. This important political document was discussed at numerous meetings organized by local soviet bodies, women's councils (zhenotdel), and youth communist organizations (comsomol) and was followed by concrete steps taken by the Communist Party that included measures to create an environment enabling Muslim women to be active in public life. One of the principal requirements of these policies was increasing women's representation in public office, as well as their membership in the only political force of the time – the Communist Party. As a result of these policies, within two years, in 1927–8, with the initiation of the “Khudjum” campaign, the representation of local women in elected bodies doubled (Khairullaev 1990). In addition to that, from 1937, the Communist Party started to integrate quotas for women in elected bodies of power at all levels. At that time, the quota for the Supreme Soviet (equivalent to parliament) of the Soviet Union was 30 percent, and locally elected bodies up to 40 percent. In 1960, the proportion of women in representative bodies of power fluctuated from 27 percent in the Supreme Soviet, up to 41 percent in the district councils of the people's deputies (soviets).

This proportion was maintained until 1989 (Khasbulatova 2001).

The Soviet state was not persistent in implementing its declared policies to promote the participation of women in governing the state. Except in a few cases, women were not appointed to top decision-making positions in the government. Throughout Soviet history, only two women were appointed (at all-union level) to the position of minister (culture and health). Periodically, a few more women headed the presidiums of the Supreme Soviet at the republican level (equivalent to a speaker of parliament). The Communist Party controlled the process of involvement of women in executive powers through giving them secondary positions, whether in councils of ministers, line ministries, or party committees at territorial levels. Only once, a woman from a Muslim republic, Yadgar Nasrettdinova, was able to achieve the highest levels of power in the Soviet system from the 1940s to the 1970s, occupying at various times the positions of Chair of the Supreme Soviet in the Uzbek SSR and Chair of the Upper Chamber of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR.

The substance of the seemingly progressive objective of increasing access and participation of Muslim (and all other) women in public office was distorted by the Soviets because a top-down approach was predominant in the process of its implementation. The demands for promoting female candidates came from central to local bodies (quotas). The practices of the Soviet period demonstrated that actual capabilities and talents of women, including their educational and professional abilities, were least required by the state and society. What really mattered was the social origin of those being promoted, or their conformity to and compliance with the general aims. This was one of the major principals for the formation of the echelon of delegates and deputies of the Soviet ruling elite. Such realities often resulted in non-professional women and men being promoted to positions of power; women patronized by the government occupied a visible but often decorative place in public office. The impact was dubious as the public mentality for many decades captured the image of a female politician negatively, often seeing them as incapable of meaningful decision-making.

However, the overall impact of Sovietization was that Muslim society was changed and gender segregation was in principal liquidated. The farewell to the past was not an easy one given the victims of the Khudjum campaign but it was still a step forward. At the same time, actual equality was never achieved as there was no social base for a wider and real women's movement in Muslim republics. Instead, Sovietization brought new challenges. The lives of Muslim women during Soviet times were regulated by the state and family, with numerous invisible and hidden barriers women had to overcome themselves.

The quota system for women so widely practiced by the Soviet regime was abolished in 1989. This resulted in an immediate and sharp decline in the proportion of women involved at all levels of local and central governmental bodies. In the post-Soviet republics, a comparatively higher level of women in public office is observed so far only in Turkmenistan with 26 percent of members of parliament being women (the highest in the Commonwealth of Independent States). The representation of women in administrative and managerial posts is 36 percent and in senior posts approximately 16 percent. In other Muslim republics these figures are lower. For instance, in Uzbekistan, women have a representation in the parliament of only 9.9 percent. The percentage of women in supreme organs of government stood at the beginning of 2002 at only 13.7 (Uzbekistan 2002). In Tajikistan, after the election of 2000, the percentage of elected women in parliament was about 14.9, and in administrative and managerial posts 15.5 percent.

The Soviet policies were not consistent in promoting women in public office but the current situation gives even more reasons for concern. Growing poverty and unprecedented revival of customs and traditional attitudes pose the danger of losing the gains achieved in the past at huge costs.

The national governments made international commitments after the Caucasian and Central Asian republics gained independence in 1991, in terms of protecting and promoting gender equality. In compliance with them they established institutional mechanisms and are working toward further improvement of national legal frameworks. In the majority of Muslim countries of Central Asia, equal rights and opportunities laws have been drafted and in Kyrgyzstan were approved by the parliament in early 2003. However, the traditional patriarchal attitudes that replaced communist ideology prevail and women remain associated with "social" or just "women and family" issues in public office, usually stranded in secondary positions.

The quota system practiced in Soviet times discredited itself as an avenue for letting non-professionalism and conformism dominate decision-making; therefore despite international commitments for soft quotas, even some women's non-governmental organizations in post-Soviet Caucasian and Central Asian republics are reluctant to promote this concept.

The issue of participation of women in public office remains marginalized and its links to democratic and people-centered development remain outside general public discourse. Unless proper attention is given to these issues at the highest level and comprehensive national programs are designed and implemented, there is a potential danger of losing the momentum to rectify the initial drawbacks that occurred at the early stages of independence and making the process, at least in some of the countries, irreversible.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261–304.
- D. Alimova, Women's issues in Central Asia. A history of studies and current problems, Tashkent 1991.
- M. M. Khairullaev (ed.), Islam and women of the Orient. History and present day [in Russian], Tashkent 1990.
- O. A. Khasbulatova, Russian state policies toward women (1900–2000), in Theory and methodology of gender studies [in Russian], Moscow 2001.
- M. B. Olcott, Women and society in Central Asia, in W. Fierman (ed.), Soviet Central Asia. The failed transformation, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 235–56.
- S. Tadjbakhsh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim society. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163–87.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, Lahore 1995.
- UNDP (R. Ibrahimbekova coordinator), The report on the status of women of Azerbaijan Republic (available in English and Azeri), Baku 1999.
- Uzbekistan, Ministry of Macroeconomics and Statistics, Women and men in Uzbekistan. Collection of statistics [in Russian], Tashkent 2001.

DONO ABDURAZAKOVA

Iran

Women participated actively in the Constitutional Revolution of 1905/6. The constitution recognized all citizens as equal before the law, but the electoral law of 1906 barred women from voting and being elected to parliament.

Proposals for revision of the electoral law were advanced on a number of occasions in the five decades between the ratification of the 1906 constitution and the extension of suffrage to women in 1963. The issue of female suffrage was raised by a single deputy in the Majlis (parliament) in 1911 and debated on the floor of the legislature in 1944. In the early 1950s, Premier Muḥammad Muṣaddiq considered enfranchising women, but abandoned the idea. Throughout this period, the clerical leaders opposed the extension of the vote to women, declaring such a step incompatible with Islamic teachings and a source of corruption among women.

Iranian women voted for the first time in the 1963 referendum on the White Revolution – a program of reform introduced by Mohammad Reza Shah. The government did not sanction women's participation in the referendum but at the same time did not prevent women from setting up their own ballot boxes, casting votes, and announcing the results. Newly enfranchised women voted in the September 1963 parliamentary elections. For the first time, six women were elected to parliament. The Shah appointed two other women to the senate. In subsequent parliamentary elections the number of women deputies increased. In 1978, on the eve of the Islamic Revolution, 22 women sat in parliament.

Women retained the right to vote after the Islamic Revolution and four women were elected to the first parliament under the Islamic Republic. In the 2000 Majlis elections, 13 women were elected to parliament. A number of women tried to run for the presidency in the elections of 1997 and 2001 but were disqualified. The Iranian constitution is vague concerning the gender of the president. Women also successfully competed for seats in pre- and post-revolution local council elections.

Two women were appointed to the cabinet in the 1960s and 1970s: Farrukhrū Pārsā as minister of education and Mahnāz Afkhamī as minister of state for women's affairs. The position of minister of state for women's affairs was abolished in 1978 to appease the unfolding Islamist movement.

Immediately prior to the Islamic Revolution in 1979 women were employed in significant numbers in both the private and public sectors and held numerous decision-making positions. Despite the significant participation of women in the protests leading to the revolution and the overthrow of the monarchy, women in decision-making positions were purged or given early retirement. Female judges were dismissed.

But women gradually inched their way back into the public sphere. In 1997, Ma'sūmeh Ibtikār became the first woman vice president for environmental affairs. By 2004, women were serving as members of parliament, deputy ministers, and directors-general of government ministries. Most cabinet ministers and provincial governors appointed advisers for women's affairs. Women were permitted to serve as advisors to some courts, even if they continued to be barred as judges.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Afari, The Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy, and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
- M. Afkhamī, Jāmi'ah, dawlat va junbish-i zanān-i Irān, 1357–1342. Muṣāhbah bā Mahnāz Afkhamī, ed. G. R. Afkhamī, Bethesda, Md. 2003.
- B. Bāmdād, From darkness into light. Women's emancipation in Iran, trans. F. R. C. Bagley, Hicksville, N.Y. 1977.
- M. Dowlatshahi, Women, state, and society in Iran 1941–1978, Washington, D.C. 2002.
- H. Esfandiari, Reconstructed lives. Women and Iran's Islamic Revolution, Washington, D.C. 1997.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- A. Tabari et al. (eds.), In the shadow of Islam. The women's movement of Iran, London 1982.

HALEH ESFANDIARI

Turkey

In Turkey, women's formal political participation began with the rise of the Turkish Republic. Although the governing party of the Ottoman Empire's last decade, the Union and Progress, had defined itself as the "party of the male and female Ottomans" (Çavdar 1991, 17) the issue of the political rights of women never appeared on its agenda. After the foundation of the Turkish Republic, a group of women attempted to establish a women's party. This was not allowed by the single-party authorities. The changes in the legal status of women promoted by the state between 1920 and 1935 have been defined as one of the foremost examples of state feminism in history (Tekeli 1990, 152). With great support from Atatürk, Turkish women were granted political rights much earlier than women in many Islamic or European countries. They were enfranchised for local elections in 1930 and subsequently for national elections in 1934.

From 1930 until 1946, there was overwhelming support by single party leaders for increased women's participation in both local government councils and the national assembly, with the adoption of an informal quota system. In the 1935 national elections, 18 women (4.6 percent) were elected to the parliament. With the advent of the multi-party regime, however, a sharp decline in the participation of women was observed. Until 1984, the percentage of women parliamentarians ranged between 0.61 and 1.76 (KSSGM 2001, 104). After 1984, a slight increase occurred, though the percentage did not surpass that of 1935. Although the number of women taking an active role in politics has increased in recent years, in the last general election (2002), of 550 deputies elected into the parliament, 24 were women (4.5 percent). Of 365 deputies of the governing Justice and Development Party (AKP), which holds a moderate Islamic position and has recast itself as conservative-democratic, 13 are women. The Social Democratic People's Republican Party (CHP), the opposition party, has 11 women deputies out of 177.

Between the years 1935 and 2004, only 126 women became members of parliament and nearly half of them (48.9 percent) did not have the opportunity for a second term. Therefore, out of a total 8,517 seats women occupied only 183 (2.1 percent). Women have mostly been elected from the lists of majority parties.

Studies show that men play a critical role in drawing women into politics. Women elected to political office have been introduced to politics by men. Party leaders have recruited daughters of eminent "political families" because of their family names. However, another pattern is that of apolitical women, with no previous political interest and experience. These apolitical women have been drawn into politics because of their high social or professional standing (Arat-Pamuk 1990, 30–3; Talashı 1996, 206). Women parliamentarians have been better educated and are more professional than their male colleagues (Kovanlıkaya 2001, 425). With the rise of religious political parties, a new counter-elite of women who dress according to Islamic traditions has emerged. They participate in the public domain and politics and are also composed of urban, well-educated, and professional women.

WOMEN IN GOVERNMENT

In spite of their educational and occupational superiority, women parliamentarians have been underrepresented in government or in ministerial posts. Since 1971, only 14 women have taken part in 16 cabinets occupying 28 ministerial posts. Women ministers have been mainly concentrated in social areas such as women's affairs, culture, and tourism (78.6 percent) compared to legal (3.6 percent), economic (10.7 percent), foreign affairs (3.6 percent), and internal affairs (3.6 percent). In 1993, a woman (though hardly a feminist), Tansu Çiller, the leader of the True Path Party (DYP), became the first female prime minister in Turkey and served till June 1996. Presently, in the AKP's 23-member cabinet there is only one woman minister of state responsible for women and family affairs.

The causes of underrepresentation of women in parliament and cabinets are:

1. In general, women's patterns of political participation reflect their disadvantageous position in society. The majority of women lack political resources such as education, occupation, and wealth. This limits their political participation and representation. Besides, a kind of self-imposed limitation interrupts women's participation in politics (Koray 1991, 125).

2. The legal rights of women are sometimes ignored in favor of more traditional provisions of Islam in relatively closed provincial communities. Women in most small towns and villages are still socially secluded. The success of legal reforms in changing women's conditions has been limited largely because Islamic beliefs and traditions concerning gender roles continue to be socially valid (Toprak 1990, 43). It is commonly believed that participation of women in social life will be destructive of the functions of the family. Social and political activities of women are controlled and limited by their husbands, their families, and social/political actors (TUSİAD 2001, 208).

3. The political parties have never considered gender equality as an issue of democracy. It is still a rhetorical subject only to be remembered during election campaigns. It can be easily asserted that political parties have used women only as a symbol of Westernization and modernity. Furthermore, it is claimed that the political parties in Turkey have been the reproducer and the supporter of sexist ideology (Çakır 2001, 401). It is thus not surprising that there is insufficient support, such as quotas or short lists for female candidates, to increase women's chances of being elected. As a result women still tend to be nominated in limited numbers and for marginal seats.

4. Lastly, the instability of the Turkish party system has a negative effect on women's participation and representation in politics.

WOMEN IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Turkish women began to work in public administration in the 1880s as teachers and nurses. After the foundation of the Turkish Republic, the number of women officials increased due to the proliferation of bodies and functions of public administration. Especially in the early years of the Turkish Republic successful, professional, avant-garde women were presented to the public as model pioneers on the path of new, Western inspired civilized society by the single-party leaders (Abadan-Unat 1981, 102). During the multi-party period, while the political parties seem not truly interested in promoting women's situation in public administration, such factors as economic necessity, the rising educational level, changes in the family structure, and decline in birth rate have encouraged women to go to work. In other words, the growing participation of Turkish women in public administration is essentially the result of economic and social change, rather than specific egalitarian political policies. In this sense, it is largely a "spontaneous development" (Çitçi 1998, 575).

The statistical data on women working in public administration show that their total number has increased at a faster rate than that of their male colleagues. Between 1938 and 2003 the total number of women in the public service increased sixty-fold, while the total number of male public officials has increased thirteen-fold. According to the 2003 statistics women constitute percent 31.8 of public officials (T. C. Emekli Sandığı 2003). As in politics, they are much more educated than their male counterparts. However, it should be noted that they tend to be concentrated in areas associated with women's traditional societal roles in, for example, education and health. At the senior level of civil service, while 10.5 percent of high administrative officers are women, at present there is no female permanent secretary or provincial governor. Moreover, women constitute only 2.1 percent of sub-governors, 3.7 percent of chiefs of police, and 4.3 percent of ambassadors. Nonetheless, it could be said that women in public administration are in a much better position than those in politics.

CONCLUSION

Turkish society is characterized by the contrasts and combinations of East and West, by a confluence of modernity, traditionalism, and Islamism. Varied subcultures, classes, and values shape educational, occupational, and political opportunities for women in Turkey today. Educated women from urban, middle, and upper classes have been able to take advantage of participating in bureaucracy and politics. Since women are particularly weak in electoral politics, their parliamentary performance has not actually increased female representation or women's participation in the decision-making process.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abadan-Unat, Women in government as policy-makers and bureaucrats, in M. Rendel (ed.), Women, power and political systems, London 1981, 94-115.
 Y. Arat-Pamuk, From the private to the political realm. Female parliamentarians in Turkey, in F. Özbay (ed.), Women, family and social change in Turkey, Bangkok 1990, 28-38.

- S. Çakır, Bir'in nostalgisinden kurtulmak. Siyaset teorisine ve pratigine cinsiyet açısından bakış, in A. İlyasoğlu and N. Akgökçe (eds.), Yerli bir feminizme doğru, İstanbul 2001, 385-422.
- T. Çavdar, İttihat ve terakki, İstanbul 1991.
- O. Çitçi, Son söz yerine. 20. yüzyılın sonunda kadımlar ve gelecek, in Oya Çitçi (ed.), 20. yüzyılın sonunda kadımlar ve gelecek, Ankara 1998, 571-82.
- A. Güneş-Ayata, Türkiye'de kadının siyasete katılımı, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Kadın bakış açısından kadımlar, İstanbul 1993, 293-312.
- KSSGM (Kadının Statüsü ve Sorunları Genel Müdürlüğü), Türkiye'de kadın 2001, Ankara 2001.
- M. Koray, Günümüzdeki yaklaşımlar ışığında kadın ve siyaset, in Ş. Tekeli and M. Koray, Devlet-kadın-siyaset, İstanbul 1991, 81-153.
- Ç. Kovanlıkaya, Erkek parlamentonun kadın siyasetçileri, in A. İlyasoğlu and N. Akgökçe, (eds.), Yerli bir feminizme doğru, İstanbul 2001, 423-53.
- G. Talalı, Siyaset çıkmazında kadın, Ankara 1996.
- T. C. Emekli Sandığı, 1 July 2003 <www.emekli.gov.tr>.
- Ş. Tekeli, The meaning and limits of feminist ideology in Turkey, in F. Özbay (ed.), Women, family and social change in Turkey, Bangkok 1990, 139-59.
- B. Toprak, Emancipated but unliberated women in Turkey. The impact of Islam, in F. Özbay (ed.), Women, family and social change in Turkey, Bangkok 1990, 317-38.
- TUSİAD, Kadın-erkek eşitliğine doğru yürüyüş Eğitim, çalışma yaşamı ve siyaset, İstanbul 2000.

OYA ÇİTÇİ

Public/Private Dichotomy

Overview

Gender distinctions in Muslim societies have often been approached through a clear dichotomy between the public (equated with men) and the private (equated with women) domains. Corresponding to this split is a whole set of oppositions such as male/female, honor/shame, outside/inside, active/passive, powerful/powerless, superior/inferior, and visible/invisible. While these oppositions have been especially common in the study of the Middle East, they have also directly and indirectly informed the study of Muslim communities in other parts of the globe. From Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Morocco to Azerbaijan, the Philippines, and Indonesia, in the literature an emphasis on spatial and symbolic distinctions that structure interaction between men and women is frequently encountered. Different (Muslim and non-Muslim) writers have seen this opposition as central to the construction of Muslim femininities and masculinities.

PUBLIC/PRIVATE AND THE QUESTION OF POWER

Since the late 1960s, several studies have questioned the public/private dichotomy and its value in understanding power and gender inequalities. This critique has focused on two aspects. An earlier set of studies aimed to show how the dichotomy fails to capture the active role women play in social life and the significant power they exercise in running the affairs of their families (Nelson 1974, Altorki 1986, Rassam 1984). In an article published in 1974, Cynthia Nelson provided a powerful critique of this split, linking it to Western categories that inform discussions of power, privacy, and publicness. In contrast to the sharp dichotomy and the great emphasis most (mainly male) researchers placed on the power that men exercised in the public domain, Nelson drew on various ethnographic studies (mainly conducted by women) to show the complex interplay between the public and private spheres. She demonstrated that despite the segregation of men and women, the latter still had the ability to influence men and exercise more power than had been assumed in earlier studies. Through sorcery, witchcraft, and healing, women exercise considerable influence over men and their decisions. In short, women's networks always cross the boundaries between inside and outside and function to link the concerns of men and women. Authors such as Soraya Altorki (1986), Asma Afsaruddin (1999), and William Lancaster (1997) have revealed the political implications of the roles of mothers, sisters, and other female relatives in arranging marriages. Other studies have shifted the attention to the symbolic and political significance of the private domain and documented how the house unit may become fundamental to the resistance of domination, marginalization, and colonization as well as to the assertion of ethnic/national identities. When Azerbaijan was part of the Soviet Union, for instance, anti-religious policies pushed Islam to the private domain of the family. Within this context, women and their ritual practices acquired central significance in resisting Soviet domination and in asserting Azeri national and religious identity (Tohidi 1998). Similarly, the house, its decoration, and women's religious practices are important markers of the differences between Bosnian Muslims and their Christian neighbors (Bringa 1995). While these conditions increase the symbolic power invested in the private domain, they may also facilitate and legitimize the possibility of imposing restrictions on women and their access to various public spaces.

PUBLIC/PRIVATE AS CONTESTED DOMAINS

A second and more recent set of studies question the meaning of "publicness" and "privacy," emphasizing the shifting and unstable meanings of these two concepts (Afsaruddin 1999, Bringa 1995, Ghannam 2002, Meneley 1996). In particular, these studies have been critical of the male-based definition of the "public" common in the literature. While many researchers tended to view men's activities and spaces as part of the public domain, they usually saw women's practices (even when conducted outside the immediate domain of the household) as "privatizing" public spaces. In contrast to this view, recent anthropological research has demonstrated how women have their own "publics." Anne Meneley, for example, illustrates how Yemeni women through visiting and networking are active in enhancing their families' honor and status. While the domains of their visits are separate from men, as dictated by prevailing social tradition and Islamic norms, they nevertheless formulate publics invested with power and social value. Honor is not limited to men; women are also active in boosting the prestige and good reputation of their families. Rather than assuming fixed notions of public and private and equating them with one group or another, Ghannam (2002) argues that it is crucial to always question who is defining these two concepts and how the distinctions between them are negotiated by gender and age groups in different contexts. Various actors ranging from family members (a brother, a husband, or a mother) and local men and women (a neighbor or a friend), to government officials (a police officer or a judge) and religious figures all struggle to define and redefine the social spaces that are accessible to men and women. Women's access to the mosque, for example, has shifted. Studies show that during the Prophet's lifetime, women were allowed free access to the mosque (Ahmed 1992). Over time, various rulers and religious figures have facilitated or restricted women's access to the mosque. Currently, women have free access to it in most Muslim countries. In Egypt, the government and most religious groups do not prevent women from attending the mosque. In fact, there are many religious figures and activists who strongly advocate women's attendance of weekly lessons, Friday sermons, and daily prayers at local mosques. Other groups, motivated by a specific understanding of Islam or by social norms of shame and honor (as is the case in some parts of Upper Egypt), make strong arguments against women's participation in mosque-related activities and emphasize that it is more religiously sanctioned for women to pray at home.

ISLAM AND THE PUBLIC/PRIVATE SPLIT

Several scholars see the public/private opposition as inherently Islamic (Mernissi 1987, Abu-Lughod 1987). They argue that the fundamental differences Islam envisioned between men and women have been translated into spatial distinctions between the domains allocated to each side in the housing unit and the community at large. This argument is perhaps best exemplified in the common discussions of seclusion and veiling (or more accurately, the hijab, which refers to different styles of covering specific parts of the female body, most frequently the hair but sometimes also the face and hands), both of which have historically attracted the attention of Western travelers, writers, colonial authorities, and policymakers.

Some authors argue that before the arrival of Islam women were not segregated from men but enjoyed sexual freedom and played an active role in public life (Mernissi 1987). The arrival of Islam introduced new restrictions on women's movement, marriage choices, and participation in public activities. Because Islam conceptualizes female sexuality as powerful and potentially destructive, it instituted seclusion and veiling as strategies to control and manage these threats. Fatima Mernissi argues that to be able to cross the boundaries that separate the public from the private, Islam urges women to prevent any potential social disorder (fitna) by veiling themselves. Veiling in this context desexualizes the woman and renders her invisible in the street, the domain of men (Mernissi 1987, 143).

Various studies have added complexity to this sole emphasis on Islam by looking at the continuities between pre-Islamic and Islamic traditions. Leila Ahmed (1992), for example, shows how veiling was a tradition that predated Islam and that marked social divisions. Elite women donned the veil before the arrival of Islam to distinguish themselves from slaves and "improper" women. Other scholars examine factors such as class and tribal structures that shape the distinction between the public and the private in contemporary Muslim societies. Seclusion and veiling, for instance, were mainly practiced by upper-class Muslim families while peasants and the urban poor could not afford to conform to such ideals (Tucker 1993, Altorki 1986, Cooper 1998, Abu-Lughod 1987). Studies also show that notions such as purdah (segregation) in Pakistan are more informed by specific regional cultural norms (such as shame and honor) that are shared by other religious groups and that cannot be explained mainly by Islamic values (Weiss 1998). At the same time, Muslim women are a heterogeneous group and may give diverse meanings to the same practice. For example, they may cover their hair in different ways and for a variety of reasons. Some see the veil as part of their religious duties. Others see it primarily as an obligatory social tradition or as a practical tool for allowing them to go out to work while maintaining their honor and respectability. In contexts where Muslims are a minority and may feel excluded from the dominant culture (as is the case in France), veiling may be highlighted as a signifier of the religious and ethnic collective identities that Muslims aspire to maintain. All of this makes Islam one powerful factor among several in the construction of gender distinctions and the making of public and private spaces.

CURRENT DEBATES

The meanings of public and private and the boundaries that differentiate the spaces allocated to men from those allocated to women are contested and struggled over. Currently, this contestation is best manifested in attempts to expand or restrict women's access to education, political participation, and wage employment. Various groups and activists believe that women should not be limited to the domestic domain but should be active in public life. Behind this view is a strong belief that education and work outside the home will empower women and transform inequalities in family relationships (Al-Ali 2000). Other groups draw on Islamic traditions and values to argue that, rather than reflecting inequality, the public/private distinction shows that men and women complement each other. Men, they argue, should be the providers and protectors while women should be the mothers, the home-makers, and care givers (Karam 1998). Working outside the home is a form of oppression because it contradicts the "natural role" that God granted women. Female Islamist advocates in particular are actively defining the proper role of women as wives and mothers and working to communicate this to other women through various means such as informal networks, visits to homes, and weekly lessons in local mosques. Some scholars and activists are rereading religious scriptures to provide alternative interpretations that allow women to play more active economic and political roles. They argue that it is the interpretations of Islamic scriptures, done mainly by men, and not the scriptures themselves that support male domination and exclude women from various public spaces.

Muslim women belong to different nations, regions, classes, ethnicities, and age groups. They often live in heterogeneous communities where different religions and cultural systems coexist. Accordingly, Islamic texts and discourses are interpreted in many contexts and by different actors. All of these factors complicate any simple generalizations about the public/private dichotomy. Muslim women in countries such as Tunisia, Indonesia, and Turkey, for instance, tend to have more rights than women in Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and Afghanistan when it comes to voting, the legal age of marriage, divorce, child custody, and work outside the home. Women's various public spaces and activities are shaped not only by Islam and social norms but also by economic and political forces. For example, unemployment is high in several Muslim countries for both men and women. In Egypt, where women were usually employed in the public sector, recent structural adjustment programs have reduced the opportunities open for them in the public sector without expanding their access to the private sector (Karam 1998). Many women find their only option to be "informal" employment, which grants them little employment security. At the same time, global changes such as the development of new means of communication (including satellite television and the Internet) and new systems of transportation are challenging conventional spatial distinctions between public and private spaces. Therefore, the shifting meanings of private/public and women's access to paid work, education, health services, and the legal system are all shaped by the complex interplay between global forces and local/national religious, social, political, and economic factors.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Abu-Lughod, The Islamic city. Historic myth, Islamic essence, and contemporary relevance, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 19:1 (1987), 155-76.
- A. Afsaruddin, Hermeneutics and honor. Negotiating female "public" space in Islamic/late societies, Cambridge, Mass. 1999.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, Cairo 1992.
- N. Al-Ali, Secularism, gender and the state in the Middle East. The Egyptian women's movement, Cambridge 2000.
- S. Altorki, Women in Saudi Arabia. Ideology and behavior among the elite, New York 1986.
- T. Bringa, Being Muslim the Bosnian way. Identity and community in a central Bosnian village, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
- B. Cooper, Gender and religion in Hausaland. Variations in Islamic practice in Niger and Nigeria, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 21-38.
- F. Ghannam, Remaking the modern. Space, relocation, and the politics of identity in a global Cairo, Berkeley 2002.
- S. Joseph, The public/private. The imagined boundary in the imagined nation/state/community. The Lebanese case, in Feminist Issues 57 (Autumn 1997), 73-92.
- A. Karam, Women, Islamisms, and the state. Contemporary feminisms in Egypt, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hants. 1998.
- W. Lancaster, The Rwala Bedouin today, Cambridge 1981, Prospect Heights, Ill. 1997².
- A. Meneley, Tournaments of value. Sociability and hierarchy in a Yemeni town, Toronto 1996.
- F. Mernissi, Beyond the veil. Male-female dynamics in modern Muslim society, Bloomington, Ind. 1987.
- C. Nelson, Public and private politics. Women in the Middle Eastern world, in American Ethnologist 1:3 (1974), 551-63.
- A. Rassam, Towards a theoretical framework for women's studies, in UNESCO, Social science research and women in the Arab world, London 1984, 122-38.
- N. Tohidi, "Guardians of the Nation." Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137-63.

- J. E. Tucker, Women and the state in 19th century Egypt. Insurrectionary women, in Middle East Report (January–February 1986), 9–13.
- (ed.) Arab women. Old boundaries, new frontiers, Bloomington, Ind. 1993.
- A. Weiss, The slow yet steady path to women's empowerment in Pakistan, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender, and social change, New York 1998, 124–43.

FARHA GHANNAM

Race, Gender, and Difference

Egypt and Sudan

Our investigation of the lived experience of women in Egypt and Sudan acknowledges the importance of viewing race and gender as variables within an interlocking system of domination and oppression that includes class, age, sex, ethnicity, and religion (Collins 2000). Within this framework, difference is constructed within a matrix of domination where distinctive systems of oppression, such as racism, sexism, and patriarchy, are interconnected and have similar ideological explanations for the subordination of individuals and groups within a society. Difference in these countries is experienced by women as a complex set of fluid and inter-discursive processes shaped by Islam, patriarchy, colonialism, slavery, and the several nationalisms (for example, Egyptian nationalism, Arab nationalism) that have arisen in the Nile Valley region.

In the Nile Valley, race has long been more of a social than a biological construct, including in its definition cultural, religious, linguistic, and historical elements that in many cases overshadow the genetic. The Nile Valley region contains a multitude of ethnic groups, including Egyptians of Arab/European/African ancestry, Nubians, Copts, Berbers, northern Sudanese of Arab/African ancestry, Dinka, Nuer, Nuba, and the nomadic and seminomadic Rashaida, Baggara, and Bishari pastoralists, as well as Armenians, Greeks, Italians, and French. Most of these groups have experienced genetic intermixture with members of other ethnicities.

Many of those who write about the relationships between the various ethnic groups in Sudan charge that racism is a defining characteristic of these relationships (Deng 1995, Jok 2001, Hale 2003). In Egypt, on the contrary, this subject remains a source of great debate (Powell 2000, Fluehr-Lobban and Rhodes forthcoming). Whereas racism in the past has been defined as the construction of categories of “others” that have immutable boundaries (most often genetic in nature) in order to exclude, inferiorize, and/or exploit them, this definition is changing. There is a growing acceptance that the old biological basis of racism is giving way to the justification of bigotry through the invocation of cultural difference (Silverman and Yuval-Davis 1999, Blaut 1992, Back and Solomos 2000, Smedley 1998, Stam 1997), and even a “racism without races” (Balibar 1991). The criteria for prejudice in cultural racism are ethnic group traditions, practices, and cultural heritage rather than biological makeup. Yet, the commonality between cultural and biological racisms is the fact that they are, above all, social relations rooted in material structures and historical relations of power. It is in light of this emerging definition of racism that we may interpret the attitudes of the ethnic groups of Sudan and Egypt toward each other.

A greater understanding of attitudes about race in Egypt and Sudan necessitates an examination of Islam. Islam has a well-earned reputation as a religion of tolerance, welcoming people of all ethnic heritages and viewing them all as equal in Islam. Passages in the Qur’an reflect an awareness of difference among people, but express no racial or color prejudice; in fact, the message is that piety is more important than birth. However, in social thought and practice, there has been a hierarchy based upon skin color and ethnicity (Drake 1987, Lewis 1971).

Scholars have linked notions of race and color in the Nile Valley with Arab culture, Islam, and the institution of slavery (Marmon 1999, Hunwick and Powell 2002). In the literature of ancient Arabia, color terms were used to describe human skin tones and sometimes ethnic groups, but in a relative rather than an absolute sense. After the Islamic conquests of Africa and Asia, however, color terms were applied to humans. Although in pre-Islamic times, “blackness” was not invariably negative, it became more so as time went on, until finally by the time of the Umayyad caliphs, it was nothing but an insult. The African slave trade influenced Arab attitudes toward dark-skinned people by reinforcing the association of blackness with slavery, low-status positions, and demeaning occupations. Although there were white slaves, it seems that they tended to fill higher administrative positions and once freed, could rise to any level. This was not the case for Blacks, perhaps because their color made them more visible in Arab society (Drake 1987, Lewis 1971, Segal 2001). This indicates the beginning of the salience of whiteness and blackness in the formation of class positioning in Nile Valley cultures. Moreover, it highlights how the invisibility of whiteness allows the assertion of racelessness in these societies.

Islam did not consider owning slaves sinful, although there were strictures against owning fellow Muslims. Even here, Blacks were at risk, as history shows that the law was not always strictly enforced to protect African Muslims from slave raids. Slaves historically were exported from Sennar, Kordofan, Darfur, and Nubia to northern Sudan and Egypt, as well as to many countries in the Middle East.

Overlapping this color/race hierarchy was a gender hierarchy: female slaves outnumbered male slaves in Sudan by two to one, and by three to one in Egypt. They not only provided domestic help but were also a large part of the harems of wealthy men. Islam did not forbid a slave master to have sex with his slaves, and many slave women became concubines (Baer 1967, Collins 1992, Cunnison 1966, Segal 2001, Lewis 1971, Marmon 1999, Willis 1985), as it was openly acknowledged that the sexuality of all enslaved women was a primary aspect of their productive labor. A hierarchy existed among the female slaves, with whites being valued above their darker counterparts. This distinction between white and black women has shaped the sociocultural landscape, as evidenced by the interstitial position white women still occupy as individuals who are simultaneously racially privileged and sexually marginalized.

Moreover, the association of African women with concubinage, a status lower than that of wife, remains and has fed into stereotypes about them. Children born of an enslaved mother and a free Arab father were considered members of their father's lineage and ideally, therefore, free Muslim Arabs. In reality however, there were degrees of Arabness, and this attitude showed itself most clearly when the slave mother was of African origin. The many negative proverbs, anecdotes, and stereotypes about Africans, slaves, black skin, and Black slaves bears this out: "son of a Negress" is still a customary pejorative epithet in many areas of the Arab world (al-Afif Mukhtar forthcoming, Drake 1987, Lewis 1971). The impact of the race/color hierarchization, therefore, is reflected in the institution of marriage, whereby some families may be reluctant to align themselves with those that obviously possess Sub-Saharan African ancestry, and by the over-accentuation of particular white ethnic heritages such as Turkish.

In addition to nineteenth-century slavery, notions of race and ethnicity in the Egyptian context have been greatly influenced by the colonial aspirations of Egyptians. Egypt's leading scholars in the nineteenth century initially viewed humankind in terms of social evolutionary thought propounded by its British colonizers. But by the end of the nineteenth century, this perspective was overshadowed by their desire to colonize Sudan. Egypt attempted to demonstrate the legitimacy of its claims to Sudanese territory by asserting that the Sudanese were its kinsmen rather than racially distinct people. Although during his presidency Gamal Abdel Nasser often extolled pan-African unity in his speeches, reminding his fellow Egyptians that they were Africans as well as Arabs, the more persistent construction was of the Sudanese as inferior and "in need of Egyptian guidance" (Powell 1995, 29). In contemporary times, remnants of this ideology can be found in discourses about Sudanese-Egyptian relations within Sudanese communities in Cairo, and in popular culture (Armbrust 1996, Fabos 1999, Morsy 1994, Powell 2000, 2001). In Egypt the Sudanese number as many as four million, due to their migrations north throughout the twentieth century. They live in rural and urban centers there, and have an ambiguous relationship with the rest of the society. Legally granted full rights, including the right to own land, the Sudanese are not classified as refugees. However, they are often unable to obtain legal authorization to work and housing, and are subject to intense discrimination and abuse at the hands of the Egyptian authorities.

Arab nationalism, which claims that all members of the society could be unified through a common ancestry that was based primarily on Islam, but also upon a sense of shared history, language, and culture, underscores conceptualizations of race and ethnicity in Egypt. This ideology disregards ethnic, religious, and linguistic differences, and at key historical moments, calls for cultural assimilation (for example, the inundation of ancient Nubia due to the raising of the Aswan High Dam). This desire to deny and purge difference in Egyptian culture can be viewed as "an insidious albeit unsystematic racism" (Harrison 1995, 55).

As non-Egyptian segments of Egyptian society (from Palestine, Sudan, Somalia, Eritrea, and Ethiopia) continue to grow as they seek political asylum in Cairo, scholars are beginning to carry out more in-depth analyses of the cultural construction of race and racism. A review of newspaper articles and journals suggests that the Sudanese are subject to harassment and bodily harm, as evidenced by the Sakakini Riot in 2000, which was sparked by the reported harassment of southern Sudanese women by Egyptians on the streets of Cairo (Apiku 2000a, 2000b, Fabos 2000).

In Sudan, to be an "Arab" is to embody a composite of ethnicity, language, skin color, and culture (Deng 1995). Although there are over 500 different ethnic groups in Sudan, most research has been concentrated upon the “Arabs” of northern Sudan, the Dinka of the Bahr al-Ghazal area, and the Nuba of southern Kordofan. These groups have been genetically intermixed for centuries, yet they continue to define each other as members of separate races, some of whom are superior to others (Deng 1995, Jok 2001).

The “Arabs” of the north, a mixture of Arab and African peoples, are politically dominant although in the minority numerically. They defined, until recently, Sudanese nationality as Arab and Muslim, effectively disenfranchising the inhabitants of the south and west, who define themselves as “African” (although there is some Arab admixture), and non-Muslim. Because the southerners have resisted governmental attempts to impose Shari’a law upon them, they have been subjected to military action against them for at least 47 years. Since 1956, each successive government has pursued a policy of the Arabization and Islamization of the country, using negative stereotypes of Africans as backward, primitive, and pagan as justification for this, and thereby encouraging what has become in effect ethnic cleansing and cultural genocide (Spaulding and Beswick 2000).

The southern Sudanese, many of whom are now refugees in the north, are stereotyped as unfit for anything but menial labor, in fact as “naturally slaves” (Jok 2001). Since they are not legally recognized as citizens of Sudan, southerners have no recourse to police protection. Indeed, they are subject to police profiling, arrest, and incarceration in jails where they may be beaten and raped. Women and children from the south and west, primarily Dinka and Nuba, who were captured in raids on their villages, work mainly in northern households as domestics and nannies. It has been argued that they are, in fact, enslaved. The women and girls are especially vulnerable to sexual abuse by the male members of the families they work for as they are thought to be sexually wanton: the stereotype of Africans as primitive, along with the history of enslaved African women as concubines, encourages this belief. Domestic workers are given Muslim names and forbidden to speak their own language; this is used as an indication of a family’s ability to “convert” a southern woman, an action which is highly regarded among northerners. A woman who converts may have a clitoridectomy (Gruenbaum 2001, Hale forthcoming, Jok 2001, van Achterberg 1998).

Although there are surely women among the population of northern Sudanese who do not ascribe to the prevailing beliefs discussed here, it appears that most do. Many are complicit in the oppression of southern women because they provide cheap household labor: the ailing economy has forced many northern women to seek work outside the home, and household help has enabled them to continue to fulfill their domestic duties as well. Many deny that the oppression of ethnic groups goes on, arguing that the reports of raiding and enslavement by government-funded militias are lies told by the United States and Europe. Others believe that they are helping the southern Sudanese by raising them from their primitive state: “One influential woman leader in the Islamist movement suggested that a solution to the ‘southern problem’ was for Muslim men to take non-Muslim Dinka women as second wives or concubines, assuming that their children would be raised as Muslims” (Gruenbaum 2001, 119).

Hale (forthcoming) reports that Sudan is now in the process of reinventing its national identity, de-centering its “Arab” identity and centering “Islam,” as a way of furthering political goals. Islamist northern women have been most instrumental in this, as they have very negative feelings about “Arab” patriarchal culture. Southern and western non-Muslim women share these feelings, but they are also quite resistant to Islamization. They charge that the Muslims with whom they interact every day are racist, pointing to the history of slavery among their people by these very Islamists, to their casual use of racial epithets, to their prejudice against dark skin, as well as to their own experiences while working in “Arab” households, to support these charges. But they also have their prejudices, and may be heard to refer derogatorily to families with “Arab blood,” implying an impurity in their Dinka or Nuba gene pools (Deng 1995). In addition, younger northern Sudanese scholars have begun to ask why they must deny their African heritage in order to be considered Sudanese. Al-Afif Mukhtar concludes: “Northerners believe that they are descendents of an Arab father and an African mother, and they identify with the father and reject the mother. To the average Northerner, the mother symbolizes the Southerner within, and unless Northerners accept their mother and identify with her, they will not accept Southerners as their equals” (forthcoming, 43).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- A. van Achterberg (ed.), Out of the shadows. The first African indigenous women’s conference (FAIWC), Amsterdam 1998.
- A. al-Afif Mukhtar, The crisis of identity in northern Sudan. A dilemma of a Black people with a White culture,

- in C. Fluehr-Lobban and K. Rhodes (eds.), Race and identity in the Nile valley. Ancient and modern perspectives, Africa World Press (forthcoming).
- S. Apiku, Sudanese rounded up in Cairo, in Middle East Times, 20 May 2000, <http://www.metimes.com/2K/issue2000-20/eg/sudanese_rounded_up.htm>.
- , Sons of the Nile slug it out on Abbasiyya's Ahmed Said Street, in Middle East Times, 31 July 2000, <http://www.metimes.com/2K/issue2000-31/eg/sons_of_the.htm>.
- W. Armbrust, Mass culture and modernism in Egypt, Cambridge 1996.
- L. Back and J. Solomos (eds.), Theories of race and racism. A reader, London 2000.
- G. Baer, Slavery in 19th century Egypt, in Journal of African History, 3 (1967), 417–41.
- E. Balibar, Is there a “neo-racism?” in E. Balibar and I. Wallerstein (eds.), Race, nation, class. Ambiguous identities, London 1991, 17–27.
- J. Blaut, The theory of cultural racism, in Antipode. A Radical Journal of Geography 23 (1992), 289–99.
- P. Collins, Black feminist thought. Knowledge, consciousness and the politics of empowerment, Boston 1990, 2000 (rev. ed.).
- R. O. Collins, The Nilotic slave trade. Past and present, in Slavery and Abolition 13:1 (April 1992), 140–61.
- F. Deng, War of visions. Conflict of identities in the Sudan, Washington, D.C. 1995.
- S. Drake, Black folk here and there. An essay in history and anthropology, ii, Los Angeles 1987.
- A. Fabos, Ambiguous ethnicity. Propriety (adab) as a situational boundary marker for the northern Sudanese in Cairo, Ph.D. diss., Boston University 1999.
- , Cosmopolitan racism? Nationalism, refugees, and integration, <<http://www.evansfoundation.be/Commonlang/Fabos.pdf>>.
- E. Fernea and R. Fernea, The Arab world. Personal encounters, New York 1985, 1991².
- C. Fluehr-Lobban and K. Rhodes (eds.), Race and identity in the Nile valley. Ancient and modern perspectives, Africa World Press (forthcoming).
- E. Gruenbaum, Sudanese women and the Islamist state, in S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001, 116–25.
- S. Hale, Nationalism, “race,” and class. Sudan's gender and culture agenda in the 21st century, in C. Fluehr-Lobban and K. Rhodes (eds.), Race and identity in the Nile valley. Ancient and modern perspectives, Africa World Press (forthcoming), chap. 11.
- F. Harrison, The persistent power of “race” in the cultural and political economy of racism, in Annual Review of Anthropology 24 (1995), 47–54.
- , Introduction. Expanding the discourse on “race,” in American Anthropologist 100:3 (1998), 609–31.
- J. Hunwick and E. T. Powell (eds.), The African diaspora in the Mediterranean lands of Islam, Princeton, N.J. 2002.
- M. Jok, War and slavery in Sudan, Philadelphia 1995, 2001².
- B. Lewis, Race and color in Islam, New York 1971.
- S. Marmon (ed.), Slavery in the Islamic Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1999.
- S. Morsy, Beyond the honorary “white” classification of Egyptians. Societal identity in historical context, in S. Gregory and R. Sanjek (eds.), Race, New Brunswick, N.J. 1994, 175–98.
- E. T. Powell, Egyptians in blackface. Nationalism and the representation of the Sudan in Egypt 1919, in Harvard Middle East and Islamic Review 2 (1995), 27–45.
- , Brothers along the Nile. Egyptian concepts of race and ethnicity, 1895–1910, in H. Erlich and I. Gershoni (eds.), The Nile. Histories, cultures, myths, Boulder, Colo. 2000, 171–81.
- , Burnt-cork nationalism. Race and identity in the theater of ‘Ali al-Kassar, in S. Zuhur (ed.), Colors of enchantment. Theater, dance, music, and the visual arts of the Middle East, Cairo 2001, 27–38.
- R. Segal, Islam's Black slaves. The other Black diaspora, New York 2001.
- M. Silverman and N. Yuval-Davis, Jews, Arabs and the theorization of racism in Britain and France, in A. Brah, M. Hickman, and M. Mac an Ghail (eds.), Thinking identities. Ethnicity, racism and culture, London 1999, 25–48.
- A. Smedley, “Race” and the construction of human identity, in American Anthropologist 100:3 (1998), 690–702.
- J. Spaulding and S. Beswick (eds.), White Nile, Black blood. War, leadership, and ethnicity from Khartoum to Kampala, Lawrenceville, N.J. 2000.
- R. Stam, Tropical multiculturalism. A comparative history of race in Brazilian cinema and culture, Durham, N.C. 1997.
- J. Willis, Slaves and slavery in Muslim Africa, 2 vols., London 1985.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Anderson and P. Collins (eds.), Race, class, and gender. An anthology, Belmont, Calif. 1992.
- J. Cole, Commonalities and differences, in J. Cole (ed.), All-American women. Lines that divide, ties that bind, New York 1986, 1–30.
- K. Dugger, Changing the subject. Race and gender in feminist discourse, in B. P. Bowser (ed.), Racism and anti-racism in world perspective, Thousand Oaks 1995, 138–53.
- J. Jok, Militarization and gender violence in south Sudan, in Journal of Asian and African Studies 34 (1999), 427–42.
- J. Lado, Women as refugees. Change through displacement among southern Sudanese women in Cairo, M.A. thesis, American University in Cairo 1996.
- K. Saks, Toward a unified theory of class, race, and gender, in American Ethnologist 16:3 (1989), 534–50.

ANNE M. JENNINGS AND MAURITA POOLE

The Ottoman Empire

The Ottoman Empire was a territorial aggregation of ethnicities and races which practiced variations of policies emphasizing integration rather than exclusion. Ottoman officials asserted, for instance, that the empire's population shared a supranational identity, the Osmanlı milleti (Ottoman nationality). This formulation, adopted by Ahmet Cevdet Pasha (1823–95), the Ottoman Empire's premier historian and advisor to three sultans, highlights the many ways state and subject generally succeeded in navigating the empire's diversity for six hundred years.

The role of women proves central to understanding this process. Women effected through marriage or inheritance the commercial and cultural fusion of the Balkans and Eastern Mediterranean worlds and linked otherwise racially and ethnically incongruent components to an Ottoman society. The very origins of the Ottoman dynasty reflect the function of marriage in bridging racial and ethnic divides. Sultan Osman's Turkic-speaking contemporaries in the late fourteenth century forged relationships with other culturally hybrid peoples throughout the Anatolian and Balkan regions through marriage. These marriages constituted political and economic alliances that ignored religious or ethnic differences, assuring in the process a harmonious transition of newly conquered territories to Ottoman rule.

Over time, the empire affirmed these methods of distributing power by way of a uniquely structured military apparatus. The Janissaries, for example, represented a confluence of the empire's ethnic diversity, integrating marginal communities through the devşirme (recruitment of Janissaries) into the mainstream of imperial power. Formerly "Christian boys," Africans and mountain villagers from the Caucasus trained as loyal extensions of the empire, representing a system that linked Istanbul with subject societies in North Africa, the Arab-speaking territories, and the Balkans. While representing distinct, often self-identifying units embedded in occupied regions, Janissaries usually integrated with the local community by marrying women from prominent local families.

The Harem-i Hümayun (Imperial harem) and the harems of prominent officials in the provinces also served this integrative function at the highest level of imperial politics. The harem was a virtual melting pot of the world's racial and ethnic diversity as the politics of reproduction assured integration of much of the empire's peoples. Race and ethnicity did matter in the empire's harems to the extent that chief eunuchs of African origin were highly prized, creating a lucrative market in captured slaves. While slavery was practiced in many corners of the empire, there are many cases in Ottoman history of African men wielding considerable power. The sultan's palace as a whole served as a microcosm of imperial diversity in which Albanians, Arabs, Slavs, Ethiopians, Nubians, Kurds, and Turks all specialized in specific duties. These servants, much like the harem's eunuchs, operated within networks that linked people through common origin. These regionally based networks explain how certain groups in Ottoman society monopolized particular trades, a source of the periodic outbreaks of ethnic or sectarian violence that resulted in the breakdown of the empire's stewardship of its diversity.

Women played the symbolic as well as practical role of preserving the integrity of the communities out of which the diversity in imperial circles came. This is clear in how local traditions (örf or yasa) evolved during Ottoman history to prescribe specific productive roles for women in societies throughout the Balkans, Middle East, and Anatolia. The Kanun of Luk Dukagjin found in Northern Albania, for example, went to great lengths to outline the Albanian woman's role in the larger context of how the community interacted with the Ottoman state. These traditional systems, found from Bosnia to the Caucasus to Yemen, reflected an undercurrent of tension in which women would serve as markers of the community's self-perceived boundaries, separating the local from a heterogeneous empire that often used marriage to integrate these otherwise isolated communities.

In many documented cases, women were able to utilize the institutions erected by the state to secure greater individual rights, often at the expense of these local misogynistic traditions. Scholarship has shown that women who had access to Ottoman courts in cities, Damascus and Jerusalem for instance, sometimes challenged indigenous legal codes, liberating them from strategic marriages as well as securing their personal fortunes. Ultimately, the Ottoman state's capacity to shape the lives of individual women by way of its institutions helped affirm the integrative principles at work among the empire's elite. Many powerful local women used the state's administrative mechanism to catapult them beyond their immediate, at times repressive, environment and assure them a prominent place in the larger world.

Of course, the empire's heterogeneous character left it vulnerable to periodic conflict among various communities. This is particularly true in the nineteenth century when the significance of racial, ethnic, and religious differences took on new weight in the face of Christian Europe. One consequence of this was the economic changes induced by greater European influence. These changes systematically extricated large numbers of Ottoman woman from their traditional roles in local communities. Cases in Lebanon, for instance, demonstrate how European capitalists and missionaries targeted rural women, tying them to small-scale factory labor schemes that, coupled with increasing violence instigated by members of self-identified ethnically national communities protected by outside powers, often resulted in the increased importance of using ethnicity or religion to disaggregate Ottoman society. Calls from various Christian communities for greater autonomy or even outright independence from the Ottoman state helped reformulate the self-perceptions of the Ottoman elite, resulting in the transformation of the Osmanlı milleti into a more rigid and ultimately self-defeating definition of Ottoman identity that relied on shared religious and, later, linguistic associations to determine an individual's affiliation to community.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Cohen, A tale of two women. Facets of Jewish life in nineteenth-century Jerusalem as seen through the Muslim court records, in A. Levy (ed.), Jews, Turks, Ottomans. A shared history, fifteenth through the twentieth century, New York 2003, 119–27.
- A. Duben and C. Behar, Istanbul households. Marriage, family and fertility, 1880–1940, Cambridge 1991.
- J. Hathaway, Marriage alliances among the military households of Ottoman Egypt, in Annales islamologiques 29 (1995), 133–49.
- A. Khair, “House” to “Goddess of the House.” Gender, class and silk in 19th century Mt. Lebanon, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 28:3 (1996), 325–48.
- M. Mundy, Women's inheritance of land in highland Yemen, in Arabian Studies 5 (1979), 161–87.
- L. Peirce, The imperial harem. Women and sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, New York 1993.
- T. Shuval, The Ottoman Algerian elite and its ideology, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 32:3 (2000), 323–44.
- J. E. Tucker, In the house of law. Gender and Islamic law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, Berkeley 1998.
- M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997.
- Anatolia (Kadioğlu 1996). Since the early years of the Turkish Republic (founded in 1923), gendered ideologies of nationalism have both valorized rural women as the workers and mothers of the Turkish nation, and, at the same time, glorified the ideal of the “modern” Turkish woman who would take her place beside men in the Westernized public sphere of the nascent state (Kandiyoti 1987, Göle 1996). Turkish national identity has thus been configured through contested and sometimes contradictory representations of women and the social-spatial enactment of gender roles.

ISA BLUMI

Turkey

The intersection of race and gender in Turkey can best be understood in the context of Turkey's ethnic diversity, the paradoxical construction of Turkish nationalism, and the state's official denial of non-Turkish identities within its borders. A well-known Turkish saying holds that “there are seventy-two-and-a-half peoples in Turkey.” The category “Turkish” thus masks a wide range of ethnic heritages, encompassing many people of Balkan, Anatolian, Caucasian, and Asian origin. In the context of this diversity, the Turkish state has promoted a contradictory formulation of national identity, first articulated during Ottoman times in the writings of Ziya Gökalp (1876–1924). “Turkishness” came to refer at once to a civic identity (all those who are citizens of the Turkish state, regardless of ancestry) and to an exalted ethnic group, the Turkic people of

From the Laz of the Black Sea region to the Kurds of the southeast and the Arabs of the southern border regions, the boundaries of Turkey thus encircle many different groups that can claim non-Turkic ethnic identities; Peter Andrews (1989) catalogues 47. While Arabic is spoken as the mother tongue of about 2 percent of the population, the Kurds are Turkey's largest linguistic minority, comprising approximately 15 percent of the population and speaking two different dialects of Kurdish (Kurmanji and Zaza). The everyday circumstances of ethnically marked women in Turkey are linked to larger patterns of material inequality. Among Turkey's linguistic minorities, almost a quarter of women (compared to 1 percent of men) do not speak Turkish. Kurdish and Arabic speaking women in Turkey have notably lower rates of literacy and educational access than do other women, although these differences decline in the urban areas (Gündüz-Hoşgör and Smits 2001). The predominantly Kurdish and Arab provinces of the southeast comprise the poorest region of the country and these ethnic minorities are relatively worse off compared to the country as a whole (İçduygu et al. 1999). However, for women of all backgrounds, educational opportunities and economic conditions are also shaped by social values, patriarchal structures, and levels of family control (Gündüz-Hoşgör and Smits 2001, Cindoğlu and Sirkeci 2001).

Like Turkish national identity, Kurdish identity has also been articulated in part through representations of women and ideologies of gender. The idea that Kurdish society is notably egalitarian has been promulgated by both Western Orientalists and Kurdish nationalists, whose modernist political ideology encouraged the ideal, if not the reality, of gender equality. The claim that Kurdish culture has historically afforded women relative strength and power is often staked on the prominence of individual women leaders in Kurdish history. More recently, scholars have begun to challenge these narratives and to look more closely at the patriarchal structures that pervade rural Turkey (Mirzeler 2000, Mojab 2001. Finally, the diversity of Kurdish culture calls into question any attempt to generalize the situation of “Kurdish women.” Not only do women’s lives differ across class and rural-urban environments, but Alevism, a Muslim religion practiced by 30 percent of Kurds in Turkey, plays a critical role in shaping attitudes and practices regarding gender relations and women’s education among Kurdish communities in Turkey (Wedel 2001).

There are few published accounts of gender relations or women’s lives among Turkey’s ethnic minorities. Only a small number of survey-based and ethnographic studies have attempted to portray the lives and social relations of Kurdish and Arab women in Turkey. Ethnographic work with Kurdish women migrants in Istanbul has given voice to women’s experiences of migration and urban life (Wedel 2001, Secor 2004). For many Kurdish, Arab, and other women in Turkey, the armed struggle between the militant PKK (Kurdish Worker’s Party) and the Turkish state reconfigured the conditions of their lives in the 1990s. While Kurds had long been among those migrating to Turkish cities in search of economic and educational opportunities, this decade saw these numbers swell to include thousands of refugees. Many migrant Kurdish women describe encountering discrimination in urban neighborhoods, workplaces, and schools. At the same time, the city opens new channels for women’s education, economic independence, and political participation. For example, the 8 March World Women’s Day demonstrations in Istanbul have been an important site for Kurdish women’s political mobilization. Finally, like other ethnic minorities in Turkey, Kurdish women find themselves struggling with questions of assimilation, solidarity, and identity in a context of ongoing uncertainty as to what it means to be an ethnically marked citizen of the Turkish Republic.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. A. Andrews (ed.), Ethnic groups in the Republic of Turkey, Wiesbaden 1989.
- D. Cindoğlu and I. Sirkeci, Variables that explain variation in prenatal care in Turkey. Social class, education and ethnicity revisited, in Journal of Biosocial Science 33 (2001), 261–70.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor, Mich. 1996.
- A. Gündüz-Hoşgör and J. Smits, Linguistic capital. Language as a socio-economic resource among ethnic women in Turkey, paper presented at the meeting of the ISA Research Committee on Social Stratification and Mobility (RC28) in Mannheim, Germany 26–28 April 2001.
- A. İçduygu, D. Romano, and I. Sirkeci, The ethnic question in an environment of insecurity. The Kurds in Turkey, in Ethnic and Racial Studies 22 (1999), 991–1010.
- A. Kadioğlu, The paradox of Turkish nationalism and the construction of official identity, in Middle Eastern Studies 3 (1996), 177–94.
- D. Kandiyoti, Emancipated but unliberated? Reflections on the Turkish case, in Feminist Studies 3 (1987), 317–38.
- M. K. Mirzeler, The formation of male identity and the roots of violence against women. The case of Kurdish songs, stories and storytellers, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 20 (2000), 261–9.
- S. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation, Costa Mesa 2001.
- A. J. Secor, “There is an Istanbul that belongs to me.” Citizenship, space, and identity in the city, in Annals of the Association of American Geographers 94:2 (2004), 352–68.
- H. Wedel, Siyaset ve cinsiyet. İstanbul gecekondularında kadınların siyasal katılımı, İstanbul 2001.

ANNA J. SECOR

Western Europe

INTRODUCTION

Muslim women of immigrant origin have had a particular experience in Europe as the interplay between gender and their ethnic and religious backgrounds has presented obstacles from both external society and from within the Muslim family structure itself.

Research about Muslim identity in Europe suggests that younger generations of Muslim women might increasingly be drawing on Islam as a positive means of differentiating themselves from others. Thus, how they express their religion differs from the way in which Islam has been practiced by their parents in the transplanted context.

MUSLIM WOMEN AS IMMIGRANTS

Many women who accompanied their immigrant husbands to Europe had little choice in the matter. In some ways, these women were the most visible immigrants in their new societies, seen around communities as they performed their daily tasks of shopping and taking their children to school. It was through them that many Europeans had their first contact with Muslims.

This high degree of visibility and the obvious differences in appearance sometimes gave rise to racial prejudice and discrimination, be it due to their religion, clothing, or their color, combined with the fact that they were women.

Some of the prejudice and discrimination was, in part, linked to the way in which Muslim women have been seen by non-Muslims. What is often seen as a religious difference and attributed to Islam is actually a product of cultural or national differences. Indeed, for the immigrant women themselves, cultural and religious elements of customs often overlap. They know religion as part of their everyday lives in their countries of origin, where most people around them were also from the same culture and religion. Thus, the boundaries between that which is religious and that which is cultural have often been blurred.

It was noted in a recent British study that the daughters of original immigrants are expected to behave modestly and are subject to stricter parental control than are their brothers. This is culturally common across the Indian subcontinent, particularly with Muslim and Sikh girls (Henninck, Diamond, and Cooper 1999). Moreover, girls of all religious affiliations from the Indian subcontinent are more influenced by their cultural traditions and their religions than are their European peers.

For many young Muslim women, the discrepancies between the customs of European society and the expectations of their parents and communities are significant. The internal family expectation, on the one hand, and general trends in youth behavior in the broader social environment, on the other, can create an imbalance, more so for young Muslim females than for Muslim males. A young woman's sense of "self" in external society and within her internal domestic realm can be very different (Keaton 1999, 50) and this requires that she constantly negotiate between them in order for her to achieve a balanced psychological state (Hashmi 2003b).

In this way, Muslim women of all ages face a dual discrimination as a racial minority in the majority society and as women within their internal family and community structures. As noted in reference to Britain, "Sexism is intertwined with racism; one reinforces the other, as far as Asian girls are concerned" (Brooks and Singh 1978 cited in Brah and Shaw 1992, 2).

MULTIPLE DISCRIMINATION

Muslim women living in Europe experience a two-fold discrimination (Hashmi 2000b). Being Muslim in a non-Muslim society has led to some difficulties, raising issues such as wearing the headscarf in school (for example, in France) or at work, fitting prayer times into a work timetable, obtaining halal meat or, since 11 September 2001, being subject to the broad political discourse of terrorism that is now associated with Islam.

While in religious terms women are supposedly equal to men (apart from when acting as witnesses or in the Islamic law of inheritance), in reality their positions are often far less fair. Within many Muslim families, a woman's primary cultural role is that of mother and a wife. However, this is frequently oversimplified by observers from Western viewpoints, and results in Muslim women being seen as subordinate to Muslim men because their careers and educations are not prioritized and their opinions and sexual freedoms are suppressed. While many Muslim women do face this two-tier discrimination, there is recent evidence of change.

In research conducted in the late 1990s, young Muslim women born and educated in France and Britain felt that negative perceptions of Muslim women were inaccurate and that they did not in fact feel disadvantaged because of their gender in religious contexts (Hashmi 2003b). The fact that these young women were participating in higher education was clearly a factor contributing to these opinions. Being in an external liberal environment gave them the freedom to express themselves personally and academically and opportunities to mix more freely with a wider range of people – including males of similar Muslim backgrounds who might become prospective marriage partners. It also indicates how education for females of this generation is no longer stigmatized; only a narrow segment of extremely traditional Muslims view university education as jeopardizing their daughters' marital opportunities. Indeed, many Muslim parents in Europe realize that having an education is an important safety net for young women, should a marriage fail (Ahmed 2001). However, the very fact that education can be viewed as merely a safety net indicates the view of many that marriage is still the most important goal for their daughters.

NEW GENERATIONS AND THE EXPRESSION OF "DIFFERENCE"

For young Muslims, Islam is learned from their immigrant parents. Yet, in the transplanted context of European Christian or secular society, it can take on a more direct and personal meaning than the customs of their parents' country of origin. In its purest form, Islam has more defined boundaries than ethnicity or culture (Jacobson 1999, Hashmi 2000a) and thus can become a locus of identity that acknowledges and incorporates their perceived "differences" (Hashmi 2003b).

In the 1950s and 1960s, Muslims often wanted to remain inconspicuous in order to fit into European society. Nowadays, Muslim children are much more visible in their local communities, in places such as restaurants, shops, and the workplace.

This is epitomized in the wearing of the headscarf (hijāb) by Muslim women in Europe (Gaspard and Khosrokavar 1995). Although European women historically have covered their heads as well, nowadays, for many non-Muslims, the headscarf symbolizes the oppressive patriarchy that they believe Islam to be. When women are forced to wear hijāb, this argument stands. However, research indicates that many young Muslims choose to wear the hijāb, even though their mothers do not and their fathers do not insist upon it (Hashmi 2003b, 195).

The wearing of the hijāb infuriates some Muslim women who feel that to wear it simply acknowledges Muslim female inequality and negates what the Western world has granted them: treatment as equals outside their communities and families, allowing them to question the patriarchal values underlying certain traditions, and re-educating and empowering them without criticism or alienation from their religious communities.

The wearing of the headscarf is just one indication of the reinvention of Islam in Europe that must be distinguished from the Islam of their immigrant parents. Young Muslims are more confident in expressing their religious identities and of being accepted as women, Muslims, and ethnic minorities. This trend has been aided by recent developments in European Union anti-discrimination legislation that now protects women, racial minorities, and the practice of religion (Bell 2002).

Recently, the issue of forced marriage has typified the negative aspects of what young Muslim women must endure from their families. The idea of an unmarried girl or woman bringing shame on her family as a result of liaisons she might have with males (whether sexual or not, Muslim or non-Muslim) is also viewed as archaic and indicative of a cultural interpretation of Islam that is both sexist and hypocritical. British cases of fathers killing their daughters (known as “honor killings”) because of this shame have exacerbated the view that Islamic domestic life continues to be a domain of female servitude, even though this practice is mainly cultural. Forced marriages are a similar concern, where daughters (although also sons) are sent overseas to marry against their will. This problem is largely confined to families where the parents are less educated immigrants from rural areas of the Indian subcontinent who live within insular communities in Britain, where the predominant interpretation of Islam is based on a cultural patriarchal misinterpretation.

Research has shown that it is these daughters who are questioning their place as Muslim women (Hashmi 2003b). It is perhaps on this basis, and with optimism, that future generations of female European Muslims may be less subject to these internal levels of cultural discrimination. Moreover, as young women become more open in discussing their religion with non-Muslims, they may help form new perceptions and realities for and about Muslim women externally in contemporary European societies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Ahmed, Modern traditions? British Muslim women and academic achievement, in Gender and Education 13:2 (2001), 137–52.
- K. Armstrong, The battle for God. Fundamentalism in Judaism, Christianity and Islam, London 2000.
- M. Bell, Anti-discrimination law in the European Union, Oxford 2002.
- A. Brah and S. Shaw, Working choices. South Asian young Muslim women and the labour market, London 1992.
- D. Brooks and K. Singh, Aspirations versus opportunities for Asian and white school leavers in the Midlands, London 1978.
- F. Gaspard and F. Khosrokar, Le foulard et la République, Paris 1995.
- N. Hashmi, Immigrant children in Europe. Constructing a transnational identity, in A. Höfert and A. Salvatore (eds.), Between Europe and Islam. Shaping modernity in a transcultural space, Brussels 2000a, 163–74.
- , Gender and discrimination. Muslim women living in Europe, London 2000b, <www.epic.ac.uk>.
- , A Muslim school in Bristol? An overview of the current debate and Muslim school children's views, Bristol 2003a.
- , From ethnicity to religion. The shifting identities of young Muslims in Britain and France, Florence 2003b.
- M. Hennick, I. Diamond, and P. Cooper, Young Asian women and relationships. Traditional or transitional?, in Ethnic and Racial Studies 22:5 (1999), 867–92.
- J. Jacobson, Islam in transition. Religion and identity among British Pakistani youth, London 1999.
- T. D. Keaton, Muslim girls and the other France. An examination of identity construction, in Social Identities 5:5 (1999), 47–64.
- M. Pickthall (trans.), The meaning of the glorious Koran, New York 1991.

NADIA HASHMI

Rape

Overview

In Islamic law, rape is placed under the category of ḥadd (pl. ḥudūd) crimes, which are offenses with specific punishments ordained by God. Ḥadd crimes include offenses such as apostasy, drinking, theft, zinā (sexual indiscretion), and false accusation of zinā (qadhf), and are crimes warranting some of the harshest punishments in Islamic law including the death penalty. Rape is defined as a zinā crime in juridical writings. Unlike Western legal traditions, Islamic law does not consider rape a separate legal category, but places it together with other sex acts outside of the marriage contract, such as fornication, adultery, incest, homosexuality, prostitution, procurement of prostitution, and bestiality. The inclusion of rape in the catch-all classification of zinā has led some authors to question whether the concept of rape exists at all in Islamic law. Historical sources clearly do recognize rape as a social reality, and it is usually described in Islamic sources as forced zinā and, as such, a crime subject to prosecution.

RAPE IN HISTORY

Although rape is not discussed in the Qurʾān, it is mentioned in ḥadīth sources. One ḥadīth transmitted by Ṣafiyya bt. ʿUbayd describes how rape cases were treated: “A state-owned slave had sexual intercourse with a girl from among the war booty (khumus). He had coerced her until he raped her. Therefore, ʿUmar flogged him according to the ḥadd and banished him, but he did not flog the girl because she was forced” (al-Bukhari 1985, ix, 67). This is one of the earliest documented cases of rape in Islamic history and demonstrates the difference between willing and coerced zinā. It draws an important distinction between rapist and victim. Ḥadīths were used to set legal precedents in the early Islamic community, and in this case the ḥadīth advocated flogging and banishment as punishment for rape. As Islamic law developed, rape was considered bodily harm and was subject to the payment of blood money (diya). As a result, juridical writings often suggested monetary payment for reparations in rape cases.

Rape is discussed in several Islamic sources such as fiqh (Islamic jurisprudence), fatwas (legal opinions), and Sharīʿa court records. In these sources rape is described as “forced zinā.” Coercion to commit zinā, whether forced prostitution or rape, is viewed as the worst form of zinā in Islamic law. Abū Ḥanīfa argued that if anyone forced another to commit zinā he was subject to punishment. This is why several sources discuss the punishment of procurers and not the punishment of prostitutes, since prostitutes were viewed as being subject to coercion.

Islamic law passed through another significant phase of development in the early Ottoman period. As a consequence there are several sixteenth-century sources for Ottoman law that include the kanūn-nāmes (Ottoman imperial codes) and thousands of fatwas issued by Ebu’s-suʿūd (Abū al-Saʿūd Muḥammad b. Muḥammad, 1492/3–1574/5), Ottoman jurist and Shaykh al-Islām, who was the supreme religious counselor under Sultan Süleymān (r. 1520–66). One fatwa written by Ebu’s-suʿūd demands that a man who raped a boy was to be executed if force were proven by bodily damage, namely a ruptured anus. According to the kanūn-nāmes if a man abducted a boy, he was to be punished by castration or payment of 24 gold pieces. The kanūn-nāmes contain several codes on the abduction of girls, boys, and women. Abduction was a crime viewed as rape since it was often performed for that purpose. Throughout the sixteenth century raids by tribesmen and disgruntled irregular troops in Anatolia often included the abduction of girls and boys. The kanūn-nāmes reflect an attempt to curb this activity by prescribing severe punishments for abduction. The punishment of castration was also applied in cases of the abduction of women from private homes.

The kanūn-nāmes advocate severe flogging and a fine of one akçe per stroke in cases of molestation or “kissing” of women, both terms connoting rape. The kanūn-nāmes discuss rape euphemistically, for example: “If a person enters a woman’s house or approaches her on her way and cuts off her hair or takes away her garment or kerchief, [thus] offering [her] a gross indignity, the cadi shall, after [the offense] has been proved, chastise [him]; he shall have [him] imprisoned” (Heyd 1973, 100).

Ebu’s-suʿūd advocates a woman’s right to self-defense during rape stating that she has the right to defend herself to the point of killing her attacker with an ax without suffering punishment. Ebu’s-su'ud states that a woman who defends herself in this way has committed an act of jihad. Jihad in this case is a matter of self-defense and illuminates the meaning of jihad as more than a defense of Islam against attack.

Evidence requirements for rape in Islamic law fall into two categories, eyewitness accounts and oath taking. If eyewitness evidence is available, four male eyewitnesses must appear and must have seen the act of penetration itself “as a rope in a collyrium jar” or “like a well-rope in a well.” The evidence requirements are extremely rigid in these cases making it difficult if not impossible to prove cases of zinā particularly, since rape often took place in private and secluded spaces. Even in cases where potential witnesses were in close proximity, rape was difficult to prove. In a case found in Sharī'a court records from Aleppo one rapist stuffed a handkerchief into the mouth of his victim to keep her from screaming according to the victim's testimony. This prevented a call for aid or the arrival of witnesses at the scene of the crime. Oath taking, however, was an option for powerful testimony in the court and on occasion rape victims would use the oath for recourse. Oaths were taken very seriously in premodern Islamic courts: a witness swore by God in front of a judge that an event had or had not occurred. In the early modern period professional midwives would appear in court as expert witnesses to attest to the condition of the rape victim offering testimony of forced entry.

Often the sources advocate punishment without specifying its form. The Ottoman imperial codes advocate imprisonment for rapists, but if the crime is combined with other crimes, such as breaking and entering and abduction, the severity of the punishment increases to castration. In the court records compensation was the standard punishment for rape offenses in an amount to be paid to the victim. Compensation was a variation on customary payments (diya) for bodily damage found in Islamic law.

Missing in the kanūn-nāmes is a specific category or language for rape. Euphemisms are used to describe cases of rape (as well as other cases of zinā) in the kanūn-nāmes and court records. The kanun-names use terms such as “abduction by force” (çikup cebr ile) and “forceable marriage” (nikāh itdiduruna cebr ile) to describe issues of gender violence. Ottoman sources also use the familiar term “forced zinā” (zina cebr ile) to describe rape. This euphemistic approach to a delicate subject can cloud the real issue at law: that in cases of abduction, forced marriage, and forced zinā, the victim is unwilling and therefore a victim of rape. In the Ottoman and Arabic legal codes the term “force” (cebr, jabr) conveys the meaning of a non-consensual act and cannot be ignored. It is not until the nineteenth century that a new word appears in the Arabic vocabulary to describe rape cases. Ightisāb, a term that literally means illegal appropriation, becomes the standard term to describe this crime. The evolution and development of the word evokes the patriarchal values of the ancient Mesopotamian world in which rape was viewed as a crime against property. In the ancient code of Hammurabi, rape was seen as a usurpation of a husband or father's property depending on the marriage status of the victim. In turn, a rapist was to be punished in accordance with theft laws in ancient Mesopotamia and not for sexual assault. Jewish law, on the other hand, recognized rape as a criminal offense of the same type as physical assault and murder. Under the category of zinā criminal offences, Islamic law treats rape as both a sexual offense and an attack on property. Another concept that becomes attached to the meaning of rape in the modern period is that of honor. The application of the term hatk al-ird, literally meaning to “violate the honor” of a person, can also be patriarchal. The question hangs – whose honor has been violated, the woman's or her patriarch's – be it her father, husband or brother. As Islamic law developed specific legal categories for rape, premodern patriarchal values were conveyed through the concept of ightisāb and hatk al-ird.

RAPE IN THE ISLAMIC WORLD TODAY

Rape has increasingly become an issue of debate as modern codes of law have offered legal loopholes for rapists to evade punishment. One major change is the way in which rapists are punished. In the early modern period, the laws advocated punishments such as castration and imprisonment, yet most often the offender was given a fine and paid “compensation” to the victim. In the modern period laws have made it more difficult for women to prosecute their attackers and even encourage rape victims to marry their attackers. This practice, common in Egypt, was fostered to discourage abductions of young women.

Today, a common legal device used by rape offenders is the moral profiling of women who are “asking for it.” Cases in Pakistan show that working women, in particular women who work at night, are often profiled as “loose” women and targets of rape. Often the modus operandi of rapists is a gang attack, in which several rapists unite against a single woman. One explanation proposed as to why gang rape is prevalent today is the economic conditions of most Muslim countries. Problems of unemployment have made it difficult for men to produce dowries and strict moral standards make it impossible to be with a woman outside of marriage. Therefore, rape is viewed as the only way for a man to “know a woman” outside of marriage. Gang rape has become a common trend for another reason; it is used since the legal system has allowed rapists to become witnesses in court to testify against the rape victim. Often the testimony of rapists includes the accusation that the woman was a prostitute. This spin on Islamic law is an interpretation of the Sharīʿa that holds that there must be four male eyewitnesses to zinā as proof of the crime. The jurists never intended the crime of zinā to apply only to women and be used in this way, but under modern interpretations, punishment is reserved for women alone, many of whom sit in Pakistani jails today.

In the 1990s, working and “Westernized” women were profiled as “prostitutes” in Algeria by Islamic militants belonging to a number of militias including the GIA (Armed Islamic Group). Rape and throat slashing were often the methods used to punish these women. Women profiled as “prostitutes” were often those who wore blue jeans, smoked cigarettes, and were employed outside the home. Not only were Westernized or professional women targeted but also women who dared to go out in public unchaperoned. One of the most disturbing cases of rape in recent years is the 1992 gang rape of a young Egyptian woman in a crowded bus station in Cairo. Despite the great number of witnesses the case was dismissed for lack of evidence. The Egyptian media commented that the girl deserved to be raped since she should not have been allowed to leave home unattended. As a reaction to this case, a law was proposed by the Egyptian National Assembly that blamed the families of rape victims for allowing their daughters out of the home. The law did not pass. The clearer identification of what constitutes rape should have resulted in a fairer treatment of women under Islamic legal systems. Two issues, however, have hindered the prosecution of rape in several Muslim countries in the recent past. First, the notion that women are the torch bearers of public morality and as such are in a great way responsible for breaches of morality such as rape – the victim becomes the perpetrator; second, conditional on the first, a gendered interpretation of zinā law in which only women are subject to punishment. This brand of moral fundamentalism prevalent in the Islamic world today contorts the law in support of a particularly perverse aspect of patriarchy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, Islamic University, Beirut 1985.
 M. E. Düzdağ (ed.), Şeyhülislām Ebussuud Efendi fetvaları ışığında 16 asır Türk hayatı, Istanbul 1972.
 U. Heyd, Studies in old Ottoman criminal law, ed. V. L. Menage, New York 1973.
 ʿAlī b. Abī Bakr al-Marghinānī, The Hedaya, or guide. A commentary on the Mussulman laws, trans. C. Hamilton, 4 vols., London 1791, 1870².

SECONDARY SOURCES

- C. Imber, Zina in Ottoman law, in Ö. L. Barkan et al., Contributions à l'histoire économique et sociale de l'Empire ottoman, Leuven 1983, 59–91.
 E. Semerdjian, Gender, violence and intent in Ottoman law. A view of the imperial kanunnames and fatwas of the sixteenth century, in A. E. Sonbol and J. O. Voll (eds.), A history of her own. Deconstructing women in Islamic societies, Syracuse University Press (forthcoming).
 A. E. Sonbol, Law and gender violence in Ottoman and modern Egypt, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 277–89.
 —, Rape and law in Ottoman and modern Egypt, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 214–32.

ELYSE SEMERDJIAN

The Ottoman Empire

As elsewhere in the premodern world, rape was a common occurrence in the lands governed by the Ottoman sultans. Because of the tenacious habit of abduction, it was probably more common in rural than in urban areas. Rape was clearly viewed as a criminal offence by both the Islamic law (Sharīʿa) enforced by the sultans and their own statutes (kanun) (al-Marghinani 1791, al-Halabi 1891, Düzdağ 1983, Heyd 1973). As a legal problem, rape was treated under the broad rubric of zinā, illicit sexual relations; the usual term for rape in Ottoman Turkish was cebran zinā, zinā by force. As a social phenomenon, rape was intertwined with a number of concerns, including personal honor, lineage, property, and the sometimes difficult process of making marriages. A noteworthy feature of rape in the premodern Ottoman context is the willingness of victims to speak out in demanding the punishment of rapists.

Who were the victims of rape and its perpetrators? State documents tended to view those at risk to be married women and boys, and the threat of rape to stem from young male adults, unmarried and unsocialized (Heyd 1973). But young girls too were raped and/or abducted, and rapists included men of varied ages and social standing. There was often a social gap between rapist and victim, the latter's lesser status sometimes exacerbating the difficulty of making an accusation stick. With boys and young men, rape was not necessarily homosexual in the modern understanding of the term, since it was sometimes an aspect of establishing heterosexual male hierarchies. In normative legal discourses, the typical rape scenario envisioned breaking into a house, but actual accusations against rapists suggest that they found their victims equally on the streets and in open spaces on the perimeters of villages, towns, and cities. As for the domestic rape of household servants and slaves, it is difficult to estimate the extent of this hidden phenomenon.

If we define rape to include instances more complex than the isolated act of an individual, then rape scenarios proliferate. Prostitution operations where pimps (female as well as male) coerced individuals into sexual commerce were sometimes taxed (and thus quasi-sanctioned) by the state (Imber 1983). More common, forced sex was institutionalized through the practice of slavery: a female slave owned by a male was by legal definition sexually licit to him. Although the law prescribed harsh penalties for habitual sodomists and pederasts, it did not formally regulate a man's sexual use of a male slave (paternity not being an issue). Finally, the frequent wars fought by the Ottomans furnished opportunities for rape and the enslavement of captives. Evliya Çelebi, Ottoman courtier and traveler, noted the outbreak of pregnancies among the women of Ferdenvar after Ottoman forces attacked in 1661 (Dankoff 2004). The Ḥanafī school of Islamic law, adopted by the Ottoman sultans (but not necessarily by their Muslim subjects), tacitly sanctioned wartime rape by permitting the suspension of Shari'a for Muslims outside "the domain of Islam" (in contrast, the Mālikī and Shāfi'ī schools required Muslims to follow Shari'a – and thus avoid zinā – wherever they found themselves) (Sonbol 1997).

Despite the recognition of rape as a serious criminal offense, punishment of rapists was difficult to accomplish. Even though the Shari'a requirement of four witnesses to the act of penetration was routinely recognized as unrealistic (as it was in the legal handbook of the Ḥanafī jurist, al-Marghīnānī, popular among the early-modern Ottomans) (al-Marghīnānī 1791), this strict standard influenced prosecution of rape. When there were witnesses, they typically chose to remain silent because a defect in the testimony of one brought punishment on all four (Peirce 2003). When the accuser could not provide proof, the alleged rapist could be acquitted by providing character witnesses, unless he had a previous reputation for loose behavior. This was a common phenomenon throughout the empire. In 1621, witnesses for a Cairene man accused of rape testified that the accuser herself was immoral, with the result that she was banished from her city quarter (Sonbol 1997). In 1681, five men on the Aegean island of Samos testified to the innocence of another when a woman accused him of raping her in her house (all were Christians) (Laiou forthcoming). Moreover, if an accusation could not be substantiated, the accuser was likely to be punished for slander (qadhf). Finally, under the legal doctrine of shubha (resemblance), rapists were sometimes pardoned by claiming belief that their act was permissible, if it resembled licit sexual behavior, for example, assuming (erroneously) that they had a valid marriage contract with the raped woman or that sex with the female slave of another household member was lawful (Tucker 1998). In such instances, legal practice was soft on rapists, but it should be noted that this attitude was in keeping with a long tradition in Muslim-ruled states of avoiding routine use of corporal or capital punishment (the Shari'a punishment for a married free-born Muslim adulterer or rapist was death by stoning).

However, the frequency of rape accusations dealt with by the empire's judges and muftis demonstrates that such legal obstacles could be overcome. Circumstantial evidence of various kinds was accepted in lieu of the testimony of four witnesses, for example, physical examination by midwives, bystanders testifying to the victim's distress even if they did not witness the rape itself, or the believability and/or social prominence of the accuser. If punishment was hard to bring about, compromise solutions were not, although they varied according to local legal customs. Marriage of a virgin to her rapist (with her consent) was one; it is hard to know how often rape was a ploy to precipitate a marriage otherwise difficult to contract (desired at least by the rapist). Compensation of the victim (diyya) was another compromise solution; for example, a man pleading a mistaken belief that he had a valid marriage contract with a virgin had to pay her the "fair dower" amount in compensation. Here, rape was seen as a violation or theft of a person's rights over his or her body (Sonbol 1997, Tucker 1998). Finally, the numbers of patently unprovable rape accusations made around the empire make it hard to avoid the conclusion that even if a person had to pay the slander penalty, publicly accusing a rapist was an avenue to recovering some honor from a morally fraught situation (Peirce 2003).

Why were rape victims willing to speak out? A variety of reasons suggest themselves. First, because zinā was considered a crime against God (thus against the community at large), it fell to the ruling authority to prosecute and punish sexual crime, so accusations against rapists were not always voluntary. Moreover, the Ottoman preference for imposing fines rather than physical punishment meant that state officials who received such fines as part of their stipends had an incentive to bring rape out into the open. Second, the acute sense of personal honor prevalent among Ottoman subjects compelled individuals to speak out about a whole array of assaults on the person (verbal harassment, yanking beards and hair, touching, and so forth); this encouragement to publicize dishonor to one's body lowered the threshold of courage required to speak out about rape. Third, victimization by rape was not gender specific, so that males and females were both expected to speak out. Lastly, there was a widespread culture of slander and accusationism, with women not infrequently making baseless accusations of harassment and rape (and being punished for doing so). In short, talk of rape was neither hushed nor necessarily damaging in the premodern Ottoman world.

The question of rape as a social problem in the premodern Ottoman period can be studied through a variety of legal sources, including works of Islamic jurisprudence, fatwas, sultan kanun, and the large numbers of court records that survive from the late fifteenth century onward. Chronicles and other narrative sources occasionally provide insights, as in the example of Evliya Çelebi. However, only a small fraction of these materials has been studied as yet, so it is difficult at present to know if and how attitudes toward rape and its legal treatment may have changed over time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Dankoff, The world of Evliya Çelebi, Leiden 2004.
 M. E. Düzdağ (ed.), Şeyhülislam Ebussuud Efendi fetvaları ışığında 16. asr Türk hayatı, Istanbul 1983.
 Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥalabī, Multaqā al-abḥur, Istanbul, 1309/1891 or 1892.
 U. Heyd, Studies in old Ottoman criminal law, ed. V. Menage, Oxford 1973.
 C. Imber, Zina in Ottoman Law, in J.-L. Bacqué-Gramont and P. Dumont (eds.), Contributions à l'histoire économique et sociale de l'Empire ottoman, Leuven, Belgium 1983, 59–92.
 S. Laiou, Christian women in an Ottoman world. Interpersonal and family relations brought before the Ottoman judicial courts, 17th–18th centuries, in

- M. Buturović and I. Schick (eds.), Women in the Ottoman Balkans (forthcoming).
 ʿAlī ibn Abī Bakr al-Marghīnānī, The Hedaya, or guide. A commentary on the Mussulman laws, trans. C. Hamilton, 2 vols., London 1791.
 L. Peirce, Morality tales. Law and gender in the Ottoman court of Aintab, Berkeley 2003.
 A. E. Sonbol, Rape and law in Ottoman and modern Egypt, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 214–31.
 J. E. Tucker, In the house of the law. Gender and Islamic law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, Berkeley 1998.

LESLIE PEIRCE

South Asia

In South Asian societies, rape has been used against women from minority communities and from economically deprived social groups to intimidate women in particular and the targeted community/groups in general. This entry examines the specific connections between rape and minoritism in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh and state and community responses to rape in these countries.

RAPE AND MINORITISM

The connection between rape and male power has been noted by South Asian feminists (Gandhi and Shah 1989) who have also pointed to the conjunction of factors that increase the vulnerability of some women such as minority women and working-class women. Communalization and the social and economic marginalization of Muslims in post-independence India has resulted in sexual assaults perpetuated on Muslim women, as was apparent in the anti-Muslim pogrom in Gujarat in 2002 (Hameed et al. 2002). Similarly, Christian women in Pakistan have suffered sexual assault following the invasion of Iraq by American forces in 2003 (Duin 2003, Shakir 2003) and Hindu women have been raped in Bangladesh during communal riots following the demolition of the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya, India by Hindu fundamentalists in 1992 (Nasrin 1994). In all these cases of sexual violence, women are seen as repositories of community honor. Thus rape is experienced as something more than violence against individual women; members of the communities of both the perpetrators and the victims experience the rape of minority women as symbolic dishonor of the community. However, in the case of the Gujarat riots, it has been persuasively argued that the nature of violence against minority women – stripping, beating, throwing acid, raping, burning, killing of pregnant women, and killing of children before their parents' eyes – went beyond collective dishonoring. It was meant to destroy or punish the fertile Muslim female body and to destroy future generations (Sarkar 2002).

Social activists and commentators have noted the culpability of the nation-state in cases of sexual assault during communal riots. A report by women's organizations after the 2002 Gujarat riots states: "There is evidence of State and Police complicity in perpetuating crimes against women. No effort was made to protect women. No Mahila (women) Police was deployed. State and Police complicity in these crimes is continuing, as women survivors continue to be denied the right to file FIRs (First Information Reports). There is no existing institutional mechanism in Gujarat through which women can seek justice" (Hameed et al. 2002, 1).

Social commentators and activists in Bangladesh and Pakistan have similarly noted state silence and complicity in cases of violence against minority women during and following communal riots, including failure to intervene in time or at all, failure to register cases of assault, and a complete denial of the problem by state representatives (Nasrin 1994, Duiin 2003, Shakir 2003). This leads to a silencing of the experiences of minority women. Social activists in all these countries have also found that their families and their communities further silence women because the articulation of the experience of rape is seen as further dishonoring the community. In situations where minority women experience sexual or physical violence in non-riot situations, their experience of communalism and communal violence can contribute to their silencing. For instance, following the communal riots in 1992–3 in Mumbai, India, an activist pointed out: "The reality of being Muslim in this city cannot be wished away . . . After the riots, women feel that their problems multiply after going to the police" (Hasina Sheikh, cited in Gangoli 2000, 212).

RAPE, HONOR, AND SOCIAL STATUS

The perception of women as repositories of family and community prestige is not confined to situations of communal tension and riots. In 2002, members of the tribal council of the Mastoi tribe in Meerwala, Pakistan passed a decree ordering the gang rape of a woman as punishment for a crime allegedly committed by her brother. Three members of the Mastoi tribe aged between 11 and 14 raped her younger brother and when he protested he was accused of raping an adult woman. The police did not help the family and the tribal council ordered that the sister be raped by four men as revenge (Sarwar 2002). In cases such as these, the complacency of the rapists derives not only from the culpability of the state, but also from the inequities within the social system. The family of the raped woman in Meerwala were poor and socially marginalized and hence not in a position to influence opinion or to persuade the police to assist them. There are recorded instances of similar cases where poor and socially marginalized women have failed to get justice from the legal system in Bangladesh and India; and traditional forms of justice, including village mediation systems, work against the interests of women (Gangoli 2000).

LEGAL SYSTEMS

There is some degree of variation within the law on sexual assault and rape in South Asia. However, to some extent, the legal concern with defining rape as an offence in South Asia is with regulating the sexuality of the woman, rather than with protecting her bodily integrity. To varying degrees, rape laws in South Asia are based on, and legitimize, patriarchal presumptions and attitudes regarding male and female sexuality. While purporting to provide justice to raped women, the laws in actuality reinforce patterns of heterosexual dominance in which women are seen as inferior, sexually passive, and, within marriage, the sexual property of their husbands.

Bangladesh has laws protecting women's right to life and safety. These include articles in the Penal Code relating to rape. The Women and Children Repression (Special Provisions) Act 2000 provides stringent punishment for offenders. Marital rape is criminalized in Bangladesh. However, the implementation of laws is very poor and convictions for rape are rarely made, because women are unaware of their rights and the legal system is misogynist (Marcus 1993).

Pakistan is governed by the Hudood Ordinance, which was passed in 1977 under President Zia ul-Haq, ostensibly to bring the laws of the country into conformity with "the injunctions of Islam" (Quraishi 1997). Under this law, rape is termed zinā bi-al-jabr and is based on the principle of non-consensual penile penetration into the vagina; it carries a penalty for the perpetrator of 25 years imprisonment. However, this offers little support to women as under this law, the proof required for zinā bi-al-jabr is either a confession by the accused or witness statements by four Muslim adult men. If a zinā bi-al-jabr case fails for lack of witnesses or a confession, the legal system concludes that the intercourse was consensual and the rape victim is charged with zinā (adultery), which is a criminal offence. Following the Hudood Ordinance, there has been a rise in the incidence of rape as men are more confident of escaping detection, while fear of imprisonment for zinā dissuades women from making accusations of rape (Marcus 1993). Within the rape law in Pakistan, marital rape is not criminalized, giving husbands hegemonic rights over the bodies of their wives.

In India, rape is legally defined as penile penetration into the vagina. Amendments to the rape law made in the 1980s introduced a new category of rape, namely, rape by members of the police within their official jurisdiction, by public servants, by superintendents or managers of jails, remand homes, hospitals, of women under their custody, including gang rape. Within this category of rape the onus of proof was shifted from the defendant to the accused, which reversed the generally applicable legal principle of innocence until proven guilty. As in Pakistan, the rape law does not recognize marital rape as a legal category under Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code.

CIVIL SOCIETY RESPONSES

While the reality of rape and sexual assault for women in South Asia can seem daunting the responses of civil society are extremely heartening. In Bangladesh, many women's organizations exist that work toward responding to specific cases, legal awareness, and consciousness raising. These include autonomous groups such as Ain o Salish Kendra and Nari Pokkho, party-linked organizations such as Bangladesh Mahila Parishad, and state agencies such as the government of Bangladesh's Women's Affairs Directorate.

In Pakistan, women's organizations in Pakistan include the Women's Action Forum, which was formed in response to a judgment on zinā. Women Against Rape works specifically with rape victims. Simorgh Collective documents media coverage of rape (Marcus 1993).

In India, the first major campaign of the fledgling women's movement was in the early 1980s around the gang rape of a tribal girl, Mathura, by a group of policemen in a police station and the role and complicity of the judiciary in condoning it. The anti-rape campaign took off in different cities around the country almost simultaneously. Some of the autonomous groups that emerged at this point were the Forum Against Rape (later Forum Against Oppression of Women), Saheli, Stree Sangharsh, Asmita, and Vimochana (Vibhuti et al. 1983). Responses to sexual violence against minority women have been an integral part of the agenda of these organizations, articulated in reports on the Gujarat riots by women's organizations (Hameed et al. 2002).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Duin, Christians besieged in Pakistan, in Washington Times, 28 June 2003, <<http://www.washingtontimes.com/world/20030627-092413-5203r.htm>>.
- N. Gandhi and N. Shah, The issues at stake. Theory and practice in the contemporary women's movement in India, New Delhi 1989.
- G. Gangoli, Law, patriarchy and the feminist movements in Bombay, 1975–1993, Ph.D. diss., University of Delhi, 2000.
- S. Hameed et al., How has the Gujarat massacre affected minority women? The survivors speak, Ahmedabad 2003.
- R. Marcus, Violence against women in Bangladesh, Pakistan, Egypt, Sudan, Senegal and Yemen, Bridge Report no. 10, Brighton 1993, <<http://www.ids.ac.uk/bridge/Reports/re10c.pdf>>.
- T. Nasrin, Shame, trans. K. Datta, New Delhi 1994.
- A. Quraishi, Her honor. An Islamic critique of the rape laws of Pakistan from a women-sensitive perspective, in Michigan Journal of International Law 18 (1997), 287.
- T. Sarkar, Ethnic cleansing in Gujarat. An analysis of a few aspects, in Akhbar 3 (2002), 2.
- N. Shakir, Women, minorities and Hudood law in Pakistan, in Asian Human Rights Commission 5:31 (2003), 4.
- P. Vibhuti et al., The anti rape movement in India, in M. Davis, Third World, second sex. Women's struggles and national liberation, London 1983, 180–6.

Religious Associations

Central Asia

Women's religious associations and gatherings in Central Asia are closely connected with the historical, political, economic, ethnic, and social evolutions of the region. Their larger presence was noticed during the last decades of the twentieth century and they have become still more evident since the collapse of the Soviet Union, when the Central Asian republics gained their independence and Islam was recognized as an important element of ethnic-religious identity.

Until the Russian conquest of Central Asia in the second half of the nineteenth century, state power and religious authority were closely intertwined. During the centuries that followed the introduction of Islam to Central Asia, the female presence within Muslim religious institutions was almost nonexistent: while the public sphere was reserved for men, women were restricted to the private sphere (women's gatherings took place mostly within the home). This opposition between the public and private persisted throughout the twentieth century.

After the tsarist conquest, most Islamic institutions such as mosques, religious schools, and courts were placed under the control of the Russian government, while others, such as waqf endowment and alms giving (zakāt) were banned. Despite the close control and prohibitions imposed by the Russians, Islam continued to expand. During the period of the tsarist government, as before, Muslim women played an almost insignificant role within official Islam. Some of them, wives of mullahs, gave private lessons to girls belonging to the richer families. These women clerics (in Uzbek, otins) became more evident in the religious world of Central Asia during the twentieth century. At the end of the nineteenth century, with the birth of the Jadidist reform movement in the Muslim regions of the tsarist empire, an interest in the Woman Question emerged in the Islamic Russian world. Whilst remaining within the framework of Muslim values, the reformists wished essentially to modernize the education system. In their program, which remained at a theoretical level, the Jadidists supported the unveiling of women and their education. Central Asia was influenced by this attempt at modernization, even if it did not represent the cultural center of the movement, which was strongest in Crimea, the Middle Volga, and the Caucasus.

With the October Revolution, power relationships in Central Asia underwent important changes. Islam as a religious and social system was placed under attack from the Bolsheviks. The Soviet government adopted different religious policies during its existence. After 1917, religious schools and courts were prohibited, and the waqf lands were confiscated. After 1922, with the introduction of the New Economic Policy, these restrictions were eased. From 1925, following the regionalization of Central Asia, the Soviet government took up a more intransigent and authoritarian position toward religion; strong anti-Islamic campaigns were implemented during the 1930s. After the Second World War, an increase in religious activity and an impulse to the faith, due in part to the new spirit of cooperation of the government with the religious institutions, were registered; this revival again fell into abeyance during the Khrushchev era (1957–64) with his campaign of religious persecution. During the 1970s, a new détente developed: the pressure on believers was slackened, even though atheistic propaganda was still disseminated. During the 1970s and 1980s, there was a resurgence of Islam in Central Asia.

Between 1917 and 1991, most of the pre-revolutionary Islamic traditions survived and in some cases were strengthened. During these decades, Central Asian people lived in two dimensions: one public and Sovietized, the other private and Islamized. In this way, the official Muslim religion coexisted side by side with the more popular, underground, and familiar religion, where women have always predominated. The prevalence of beliefs in female spirits and the female reliance on Muslim clergy, amulets, and pilgrimages to the shrines of the saints gave the perception of a "women's religion" in Central Asia. Women's gatherings had a private dimension, where the official religion and the state could not enter.

After 1991 and the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Islamic resurgence became more marked. Islam became a fundamental part of the religious-cultural identity of the Central Asian people. The presence of Muslim women in society increased. In Uzbekistan, some religious schools exclusively for women were opened and some male schools started to accept female students. In Kyrgyzstan, departments for female students were established within important Islamic institutions. Women started to attend the mosques – which until then had been an exclusive male prerogative – and to wear the veil again. In Uzbekistan, the state established women's committees at the level of the mahalla (neighborhood community): the primary task of the committees is to inform and to support families on all issues, such as finding jobs or providing financial help. Religious activity within the mahalla is continuously increasing. Girls still receive an elementary religious education from the otins, the female equivalent of the mullahs: they have a rudimentary knowledge of the Qur'anic precepts, but they are unable to decipher the Arabic script. The otins prepare girls for marriage and motherhood and provide basic religious instruction; they are in charge of prayers and important celebrations within the community such as weddings and births. Every mahalla has its otin, but sometimes one otin is shared by two or three mahallas. Within the mahalla, women meet generally every Saturday to pray in a room reserved for them and to receive advice about the Qur'an, about the fundamental rules of the Shari'a, and about correct Islamic behavior. Women who attend these meetings are often over 50 years old. After the religious part of the meeting, women drink tea, eat previously prepared food, and chat. Many women, mostly in rural areas, where the level of education is lower, are attracted by religious groups which preach the return to authentic Islamic values and to the traditional family. Soon after the independence of the Central Asian republics, some organized groups of Islamic women emerged: they are national non-governmental organizations acting on the territory of groups generally incorporated in political parties with an Islamic matrix.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Islam, the state and ethnicity in Central Asia in historical perspective, in Religion, State and Society 24:2/3 (1996), 91–132.
- , Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261–304.
- D. Alimova and N. Azimova, Women's position in Uzbekistan before and after independence, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 293–304.
- M. Brill Olcott, Women and society in Central Asia, in W. Fierman (ed.), Soviet Central Asia. The failed transformation, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 235–54.
- H. Fathi, Otins. The unknown women clerics of Central Asian Islam, in Central Asian Survey 16:1 (1997), 27–43.
- O. V. Gorshunova, The otin [in Russian], in Etnograficheskoe Obozrenie 3 (2001), 135–7.
- P. A. Michaels, Kazak women. Living the heritage of a unique past, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 187–202.
- S. P. Poliakov, Everyday Islam. Religion and tradition in rural Central Asia, New York 1992.
- A. Saktanber and A. Özataş-Baykal, Homeland within homeland. Women and the formation of Uzbek national identity, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 229–48.
- A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement. Central Asia, Delhi 2002.
- S. Tadjbakhsh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology in Tajikistan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163–85.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam. The women of Uzbekistan, Lahore 1995.
- M. A. Tolmacheva, The Muslim woman in Soviet Central Asia, in Central Asian Survey 12:4 (1993), 531–48.
- Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Assertions of self. The nascent women's movement in Central Asia, Lahore 1995.

CHIARA DE SANTI

Iran and Afghanistan

This entry introduces the historical and contemporary developments of women's religious gatherings and associations in Iran and Afghanistan. It presents the ways in which national and Islamic state led projects and movements, at different historical moments, have shaped voluntary associational life in both locations. While considering the unintended consequences of state led approaches to associational life, attention is also paid to the inter-relationship and levels of cooperation between informal, seemingly private religious women's gatherings and grassroots religious associations in the public domain. It demonstrates how religious gatherings and associations have been vehicles that both reinforced and challenged national and Islamist movements with their strictly delineated gendered norms of behavior. They have also served as pathways to participation in public matters and have enlarged women's scope of action to tackle harsh social, political, and economic realities. Women's religious associations are heterogeneous and must be considered in relation to the interplay between specific national and regional contexts, as well as women's socioeconomic, religious, ethnic, and political orientations. Particular consideration should be given to the increasing exchanges and linkages with global movements, international associations, and human rights groups around the world.

It has been customary in Iran and Afghanistan for Muslims to gather together in gender-specific groups for religious instruction and practices. Whereas men's religious events are usually held at mosques or local shrines, women's religious activities, such as *sufra*s and *jalasa*s, are usually held privately in women's homes or in front of mosques in order to provide food and welfare for the disadvantaged. Social service activities stemming from religious traditions, which have a long history in Iran and Afghanistan, reveal the interchange between religious commitment and civic participation. While women's religious associations vary greatly in terms of their specific agendas and priorities, their entrance into public space at the beginning of the twentieth century signified a new sense of public presence that altered the distinction between the public domain of employment, governance, and culture – reserved for men – and the private domain of the family, reserved for women.

In Iran, middle- and upper-class women from Tehran and the provinces started to form a number of anjumans (grassroots associations) during the period around the Constitutional Revolution of 1905/6. The few women who emerged onto the political stage turned their informal religious and social gatherings into political meetings. A number of independent associations, which were influenced by different nationalist and religious ideologies, actively promoted women's political advancement and made concerted efforts to raise funds for schools, health clinics, and orphanages.

In Afghanistan, the foundation for associational activities were laid in the late 1920s when King Amān Allāh and his wife Queen Şurayyā introduced new reforms for women to express their grievances (ibid.). However, tribal and religious opposition to the reforms led to the overthrow of the king in 1929 – and it was not until the reign of Zahīr Shāh (1933–73) that moves toward women's advancement in the public domain were observed. Even so, women continued to exercise political and social influence through informal and less visible community support networks.

In Iran the newly formed women's associations were appropriated by Reza Khan (1925–41) as a result of his ambitious program of modernization. Women's appearance and involvement in public life – seen as signifiers of national identity – were also shaped by Western norms and Atatürk's model of reform. During the rule of Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavī the state continued to institutionalize women's issues and address them as social welfare concerns. Under strict state control, however, independent associations were largely silenced and did not have the freedom to assemble their own agendas.

During the late 1960s and 1970s a coalition of Iranian opposition groupings, comprised of men and women with sundry Islamist, nationalist, and Marxist leanings, challenged the Pahlavī's monopoly over political activity. Women spread political information through informal religious networks stemming from mosques, bazaars, and women-only religious gatherings, *jalasa*s and *sufra*s. Women activists, endorsing diverse religious and political platforms, joined forces and played an important role in overthrowing the Pahlavī dynasty in 1979.

In Afghanistan the period between the 1950s and the Soviet invasion of 1979 saw the formation of a number of secular women's groupings, consisting mainly of urban-based, educated women who aimed to advance the human rights of women. Women's independent activities were, however, restricted by the rise of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan and the Soviet invasion in 1979.

In Iran, after two years of revolutionary transition, Ayatollah Khomeini and Islamic forces eradicated political opposition and dominated the revolutionary process and its outcome.

The 1980s witnessed the development of "official" women's Islamist religious associations. However, many women who were not involved in the official religious associations have organized themselves through women-only religious gatherings, co-operatives, grassroots religious charities, mosque networks, and the growing number of service-oriented non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Paradoxically, the governmental policies controlling dress codes and gendered access to public space made it possible for women, particularly those from families that customarily isolate women from public activity, to work and learn in the public arena. Inadvertently, women's public involvement shed light on the impracticality of many governmental policies.

Religious gatherings and novel NGOs have become platforms for secular and religious feminists to debate and negotiate legal status and social positions of women. Many associations, including those that actively question the dominant role of Islam in public life, have acquired religious overtones in order to frame their grievances in the public sphere. Feminist debates extend to and are informed by women's associations that are organized by women who live outside Iran. Religious gatherings and associations – often linked to mosques, schools, and charity foundations – are a few of the many spaces where some women living in the diaspora become involved in welfare concerns and political matters.

In Afghanistan in the latter part of the 1990s the theocratic dictatorship known as the Taliban came to power and instituted a severe gender regime that prohibited women's freedom to work and be educated. Under brutal conditions, some Afghans exercised their informal religious and social networks and organized underground schools and health services for women. The world learned about the dire conditions of Afghan women largely through communication links forged between refugee and diasporic networks, the Internet, and women's associations. Through these levels of cooperation women and men have successfully linked with feminist and human rights groups across nation-state borders and invoked international attention.

To conclude, this entry has surveyed the linkages and barriers between women's informal and seemingly private religious activities and associational opportunities for women in public life. Local and global women's religious voluntary associations – in a range of political and religious shades – have multiplied in Iran and Afghanistan in the beginning years of the twenty-first century. While both Iranian and Afghan local and nationally-based women's religious associations are increasingly linked to international women's associations, the political and economic situation in Afghanistan has generated greater involvement of international associations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Adelhah, Being modern in Iran, New York 2000.
 J. Afary, Steering between Scylla and Charybdis. Shifting gender roles in twentieth century Iran, in National Women Studies Association 8:1 (1996), 28–49.
 —, The Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots, democracy, social democracy, and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
 H. Ahmed-Ghosh, A history of women in Afghanistan. Lessons learnt for the future, in Journal of International Women's Studies 4:3 (2003), 1–14.
 B. Bâmdâd, From darkness into light. Women's emancipation in Iran, trans. F. R. C. Bagley, New York 1977.
 S. Barakat and G. Wardell, Exploited by whom? An alternative perspective on humanitarian assistance to Afghan women, in Third World Quarterly 23:5 (2002), 909–30.
 N. H. Dupree, Women of Afghanistan, Bonn 1986.
 H. Hoodfar, The women's movement in Iran. Women at the crossroads of secularisation and Islamization, Women Living Under Muslim Laws 1999, <http://www.iranchamber.com/podium/history/020312_women_secularization_islamization1.php>.

- Islamic Republic of Iran, Constitution, <www.unesco.org>.
 Z. Mir-Hosseini, Islam and gender. The religious debate in contemporary Iran, Princeton, N.J. 1999.
 V. Moghadam, Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1993.
 —, Revolution, religion, and gender politics. Iran and Afghanistan compared, in Journal of Women's History 10 (1999), 172–95.
 A. Najmabadi, Feminism in an Islamic republic. Years of hardship, years of growth, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, Gender, and Social Change, London 1998, 59–84.
 B. Namazi, Summary of study on Iranian NGOs, November 1999.
 P. Paidar, Gender of democracy. The encounter between feminism and reformism in contemporary Iran, United Nations Research Institute for Social Development, October 2001.
 K. Spellman, Religion and nation. Iranian local and transnational networks in London, Berghahn Books, Oxford (forthcoming).
 A. Torab, Piety as gendered agency. A study of jalaseh ritual discourse in an urban neighbourhood in Iran, in Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute N.S. 2:2 (1996), 235–52.

KATHRYN SPELLMAN

Malaysia and Indonesia

INTRODUCTION

Much has been written about gender and Islam in recent decades. The upsurge of interest in this topic is influenced by people's attempt to understand the position of men and women in Islam and their interrelations, which have become the subject of repeated controversy. One view is that Islam guarantees equality of the sexes in all matters of vital concern (Qur'an 33:35) and endorses harmonious relationships between men and women (Qur'an 30:21). The second view is that Islam promotes the devaluation of women and the social domination of men, and this is reproduced and maintained in the social system deliberately and purposely (see also Metcalf 1998, 108).

The rise of Islamic movements and associations in Muslim countries has reinforced the stereotypes of Islam's inferior treatment of women. It is therefore imperative to examine how gender is constructed in these movements in the light of the members' interpretation of Islam. This entry examines the gender ideology of Jamaat Tabligh in Malaysia, and the Nahdlatul Ulama (NU) and Muhammadiyah, the two largest Islamic organizations in Indonesia. NU has two women's organizations, Muslimat and Fatayat. Muhammadiyah has one women's organization known as Aisyiyah.

These organizations occupy an important and potentially powerful position in Indonesia (Marcoes 2002, 188).

THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Jamaat Tabligh

The breakup of the global system of Muslim empires caused by religious and political rivalry in the Muslim world and the expansion of European colonial powers during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries influenced the emergence of reformist, revivalist, and scripturalist movements in the Muslim world (Ali 2003, 108). The emergence of the Jamaat Tabligh (Society for the propagation of the faith) was part of the Muslims' response to the broad historical forces that swept the Muslim world. It is a quietist, apolitical, and spiritual movement founded by Maulana Muhammad Ilyas in 1927 in Mewat, south of Delhi in India (Ali 2003, 175).

Since the the partition of India and Pakistan in 1947, Jamaat Tabligh has developed into a transnational movement aimed at educating Muslims in Islamic values and practices (Ali 2003, 175). The movement is bound by six principles: kalima, the declaration of faith that there is no God but Allah and Muhammad is His Messenger; ṣalāt, the performance of the five daily prayers; ʿilm and dhikr, knowledge and remembrance of Allah; ikhhlās al-niyya, the purity of intention and sincerity as most pleasing Allah; ikrām al-Muslimīn, the respect and honor that Muslims should demonstrate toward fellow-believers; and tafrīʿ al-waqt, sparing time for self-reformation and missions for proselytization to the movement (Ali 2003, 176).

Nahdlatul Ulama (NU)

The Nahdlatul Ulama (Revival of religious scholars) was established by Javanese religious scholars in 1926 to strengthen traditional Islam in Indonesia and to counterbalance the religious appeals of modernist Muhammadiyah (Candland and Nurjanah 2004, 2). Since NU was composed of ʿulamāʾ who were exclusively male, the wives of the scholars formed Muslimat and Fatayat to promote the well-being and status of women (Tristiawati and Munir 1995). Muslimat was founded in December 1940 in Surabaya, East Java for NU women above the age of 40. Fatayat was established in Surabaya, East Java, in April 1950, for women between the ages of 20 and 40. Structurally, Muslimat and Fatayat are linked to thousands of villages and millions of women in the country (Candland and Nurjanah 2004, 5).

Muhammadiyah

The Muhammadiyah (followers of Muhammad) is a reformist socioreligious movement set up in Jogjakarta in 1912 by a modernist Muslim, Ahmad Dahlan (Alfian 1969, 244–5). Its aim was to bring Muslims to the true teachings of Islam as enshrined in the Qurʾān and ḥadīth. To achieve this objective, Ahmad Dahlan laid down the major activities to be undertaken by the movement. These activities consisted of tabligh (religious propagation), education, Aisyiyah (the sister organization of the movement), social welfare, boy scouts, enterprise, publications, libraries, and a few other activities (Alfian 1969, 263). Unlike NU affiliated women's organizations, Aisyiyah was initiated not by women members but by the founder himself (Alfian 1969, 245). Concerned with the backward social status of women, he established Aisyiyah in order to improve their position in society (ibid., 246–7). Until today, Muhammadiyah has continued to undertake activities similar to those identified by Ahmad Dahlan. The participation of women is encouraged. Aisyiyah, however, concentrates on religious, education, and health activities.

GENDER RELATIONS

Generally, societies in the developed countries believe that men and women have equal rights and responsibilities in every aspect and activity in life. Rather than merely copying the Western model, the Islamic movements and associations in Muslim countries offer a distinct understanding of what it means to be a woman and a man in society. The Jamaat Tabligh is a case in point. In its ideological construction of gender, both men and women are enjoined to share responsibility for family and daʿwa (propaganda) work. Indeed, men and women in this group engage in what some societies would label as masculine or feminine roles, yet they do it to create a moral order which they believe to be Islamic in character and founded on the sunna of the Prophet.

When they set out on a daʿwa mission, men are exposed to different roles regardless of their socio-economic status. These roles vary from teacher, to nurse, cook, or cleaner. Through this, they learn progressively how to perform the roles that are traditionally associated with femininity and they apply this not only during the mission but also when they are at home. While men are on a mission, or otherwise absorbed in the tabligh movement, the women also learn how to be the only breadwinner and the head of the family in order to sustain the household. These roles are associated by some traditional societies with men. In the tablighi view, parenting and housework are an integral part of everyone's obligations to the family and they are part of 'ibāda (worship).

To facilitate women's involvement in da'wa, men provide full support and assume responsibilities for housework and childcare (Metcalf 1998). It is the task of the movement to remove all hindrances for both sexes from playing its full part in family life and da'wa work. Therefore, the cultural ideal of separate spheres, which suggests that women belong to the private/home sphere and men belong to the public/work sphere, appears questionable from the perspective of this movement. As a result, the tabligh movement creates a unique family type where the husband and wife run the household, bring up the children, and participate in the movement together. In performing their dual obligations, both sexes are required to emulate the ideal patterns of behavior exemplified by the Prophet. They are expected to cultivate the virtues of humility, sincerity, gentleness, perseverance, meticulous observance of prayer, and commitment to the service of others. These virtues are inculcated in members through practical experience and translated into practice in their daily undertakings both at home and during the mission tours.

However, while women are recognized as part of the life-force of the movement, their freedom of expression is regulated by men. During meetings, each tablighi woman is given only 15 minutes to discuss matters related to the six fundamental principles of the movement. In contrast, Islam enjoins equal rights for men and women including the expression of emotions and opinions (Qur'an 9:71). In addition, the movement promotes complete segregation of sexes. Women are not only separated by the veil, but also by the absence of social interaction. In Islam, there is no complete segregation between men and women. The most important aspect that should be observed by them is related to their behavior and manner in dealing with both sexes (Qur'an 24:31).

Despite some restrictions imposed on them, women argue that the movement offers them an opportunity to live as true Muslims who conform to the teachings of Islam. In other societies women are treated as commodities and inferiors, but the tablighi women claim that they are accorded respect and dignity, and they are given the same rights, responsibilities, and opportunities as men.

In their view, there is no need for them to join any feminist movements fighting for equal rights because they are already liberated by the movement from oppression, seclusion, and subordination.

While it is true that women's da'wa activities are confined to women only, they also contribute to the development of the society. In the view of tablighi women, they play different roles in society, and through their performance of these roles they are able to transmit Islamic culture and traditions to other groups in society. To outsiders, the veil symbolizes female oppression, seclusion, and subordination to the male sex. The tablighi women, however, disagree with this notion. Like other revivalist women's groups (Afshar 1996), they argue that the veil is a symbol of Islamization, and that it is a liberating rather than an oppressive force. With the veil, they are able to participate in public life, while at the same time preserving their modesty and chastity.

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS AFFILIATED TO NU AND MUHAMMADIYAH

Like tablighi women, members of women's organizations affiliated to NU and Muhammadiyah are encouraged to lead a dynamic public life without sacrificing their domestic responsibilities or their modesty. Although their participation in politics is rather limited, and their activities are confined to women only, they run their own organizations, initiate religious and educational activities, and implement government-sponsored programs. Unlike the tablighi women, however, they are not required to put on the veil and observe uniformity of dress.

In Muslimat, women are involved in three ways (Candland and Nurjanah 2004, 5): first, as women of the NU community, with religious affinity toward, but no official status in, the association; second, as registered members (anggota) of the association; and third, as elected members of various committees (pengurus) of Muslimat. Fatayat initiates different programs: organization and management; leadership and education; economic and cooperative activities; health and sports; da'wa and information; advocacy and legal affairs; social, artistic, and cultural activities; research and development; and foreign connections (Candland and Nurjanah 2004, 5). Since its funding is limited, it has collaborated with international bodies such as UNICEF, Asia Foundation, and the Ford Foundation to implement its programs.

Likewise, Aisyiyah undertakes various development activities for women such as building women's mosques, kindergartens, and women's Islamic schools. It also promotes women's participation in the public sphere in religious, educational, and health activities. It has established an extensive network of family planning and maternity clinics. Through this network it provides health, nutrition, and family education and assistance to women. The government's family planning program is based on Aisiyah's concept of ideal family (keluarga sakinah) (Candland and Nurjanah 2004, 6).

Division of labor based on gender is manifest in both NU and Muhammadiyah. The activities of Muslimat, Fatayat, and Aisiyah are women-centered and less political. However, these roles are chosen and defined by women themselves. The members we interviewed argue that in Islam, politics is inseparable from other dimensions of social life. Therefore, when female members have chosen to work for women only, they also contribute to the political life of NU and Muhammadiyah, and to the development of their families and the Indonesian society at large. In both organizations, members claimed that men and women do not compete for power, but rather complement each other in their roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Afshar, Islam and feminism. An analysis of political strategies, in M. Yamani (ed.), with additional editorial assistance from A. Allen, Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, New York 1996, 197–216.
- Alfian, Islamic modernism in Indonesian politics. The Muhammadiyah movement during the Dutch colonial period (1912–1942), Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, Madison 1969.
- A. Y. Ali, The meaning of the Holy Qur'an, Beltsville, Md. 1999¹⁰.
- J. Ali, Islamic revivalism. The case of the Tablighi Jamaat, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 23:1 (April 2003), 173–81.
- C. Candland and S. Nurjanah, Women's empowerment through Islamic organizations. The role of Indonesia's Nahdlatul Ulama in transforming the government's birth control program into a family welfare programme, a case study prepared for the World Faith Development Dialogue Workshop in New Delhi, India, 9–11 February 2004.
- L. Marcoes, Women's grassroots movements in Indonesia. A case study of the PKK and Islamic women's organizations, in K. Robinson and S. Bessell (eds.), Women in Indonesia. Gender, equity and development, Singapore 2002, 187–97.
- B. D. Metcalf, Women and men in a contemporary pietist movement. The case of the Tablighi Jama'at, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 107–21.
- S. Tristiawati and R. Munir, The Nahdlatul Ulama, mimeograph, 1995.

PUTE RAHIMAH MAKOL-ABDUL DAN
SAODAH ABDUL RAHMAN

North Africa

Women's associations meet to perform religious rituals on a regular or occasional basis throughout North Africa. These associations are autonomous, attached neither to each other, nor to parallel men's associations, although some associations recognize distant or former affiliation with Sufi (Islamic mystical) orders. They are usually loosely structured with membership based on ritual participation. Their rituals may take the form of the dhikr, or Sufi remembrance ritual, a spirit possession ceremony called ḥaḍra or lila, or a combination. Some are held exclusively for women, whereas men affiliated with Sufi orders may be present at others to play instruments, chant, slaughter sacrificial animals, or observe. The rituals provide the women with an opportunity for social contact and a communal worship experience of their own design.

Documentation of women's associations holding spirit possession rituals exists for Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. In the case of Tunisia, the association's rituals are held in the tombs of holy figures. A woman healer orchestrates the ritual and treatment of women participants afflicted with spirit possession. The few men present watch or play drums and castanets and chant to summon the spirits. The spirits inhabit the afflicted causing them to move rhythmically and to fall into trance. While in trance, they are encouraged by the healer to articulate their personal dilemmas and formulate solutions (Ferchiou 1991). Women's associations holding similar rituals exist in urban centers in Algeria (Jansen 1987) and Morocco (Fernea 1979, 1988, Maher 1984, Rausch 2000, Reysoo 1998). The healers directing the ritual, who are often freelance seers, may claim affiliation with the male musicians' Sufi order. However, the female participants consider themselves bound to each other and the ritual leader. The rituals are usually held in private homes, sometimes during rites of passage celebration such as weddings (Jansen 1984) or circumcisions (Maher 1984). They allow the participants to process gender-related conflicts.

Two differing examples of women's associations performing dhikr-like rituals exist in Algeria. Despite distant affiliation with the Qādirī Sufi order, both function autonomously. The female leader of the first association orchestrates rituals held on Friday afternoon in the tomb of a holy figure. The rituals consist of prayers and litanies praising the Prophet, followed by the expression of requests by individual women for the resolution of personal problems transmitted to the holy figure by the leader who requests intercession. Then current daily dilemmas related to gender issues are discussed, followed by closing prayers (Andezian 2001). The second association is more structured, with the leader in charge of scheduling the rituals and admitting new members. The dhikr-like ritual is held in holy figures' tombs or private homes at the request of those needing assistance with infertility, illness, and other afflictions. After guiding the participants in multiple repetitions of Arabic phrases praising Allah, the leader gives a lesson on religious matters and leads the chanting of poetic verses, which may vary according to the context. Rhythmic movements to induce trance may accompany the chanting. The ritual includes the sacrifice of an animal provided by the afflicted. The members are usually older, and widowed or divorced and view their participation as an expression of piety in preparation for Judgment Day (Jansen 1987).

Based on unpublished fieldwork data, two types of associations holding rituals resembling the dhikr exist among Berber women in the Souss region of southwestern Morocco today. The first association is located in the village of Agard Udad near Tafraout in the Anti-Atlas Mountains. The association meets daily between the afternoon and sunset prayers in a meeting room in a centuries-old mosque on an embankment which overlooks the village. The mosque also contains a kitchen where the women prepare ritual meals when a villager donates an animal for sacrifice to acquire special blessing. Membership is based on attendance and open to all women. Many of the regular participants are advanced in age. The women chant multiple repetitions of a series of Arabic phrases as well as long age-old Berber poems praising Allah, with intermittent Arabic and Berber prayers. Halfway through the ritual, the women pause to drink traditional Moroccan sweet green tea with mint. The ritual content is unique to this location. The association leader, an older woman, introduces the chants, prayers, and poems. Besides the entire ritual, she, like the older participants, preserves in her memory the legendary history of the mosque in rhymed Berber prose. Former leaders also instructed the women in religious matters on separate occasions (Qasim 1991).

The second type of association can be found in variant forms throughout the Souss region of southwestern Morocco. Three associations exist in the Atlantic coastal town of Tiznit and two in Bounaaman, a village in the foothills ten kilometers due south of Tiznit. In Tiznit, the ritual gatherings are held in the tomb complexes of holy figures. In Bounaaman, they take place in a tomb complex and a private home. In all five locations, the ritual consists primarily of Berber couplets chanted multiple times, sometimes accompanied by drumming or clapping, and intermittent Arabic prayers. In Tiznit, the women occasionally chant long age-old Berber poems as a group or with one woman chanting the poem and the others the refrain. The couplets and poems express veneration of and longing for the Prophet and call on local holy figures to intercede in times of need. All five associations are loosely structured with membership based on open ritual attendance. The participants vary in age, but the majority in Tiznit are older, whereas middle-aged women are common among participants in Bounaaman. Unlike those in Tiznit, the associations in Bounaaman have no officially designated leaders. The leaders in Tiznit give sermon/lessons periodically throughout the ritual on religious topics. One association leader prefers to speak about pertinent daily life issues such as local girls' changing dress styles, growing materialism, and abortion. Lively discussions ensue. The rituals occur between the afternoon and sunset prayers, daily or weekly. Midway through the ritual, sweet green tea with mint and bread, purchased with participants' donations, are served. Local inhabitants occasionally bring a meal for the women to share to ensure the salvation of a family member who has died.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Andezian, Expérience du divin dans l'Algérie contemporaine. Adeptes des saints dans la région de Tlemcen, Paris 2001.
- S. Ferchiou, La possession. Forme de marginalité féminine, in Annuaire de l'Afrique du Nord 30 (1991), 191–200.
- E. W. Fernea, Saints and spirits. Religious expression in Morocco. A guide to the film, Austin, Tex. 1979.
- , A street in Marrakech, Prospect Heights, Ill. 1988.
- W. Jansen, Women without men. Gender and marginality in an Algerian town, Leiden 1987.
- V. Maher, Mutterschaft und Moralität. Zum Widerspruch der Frauenrollen in Marokko, in D. W. Sabean and H. Medick (eds.), Emotionen und materielle Interessen. Sozialanthropologische und historische Beiträge, Göttingen 1984, 143–78.
- H. Qāsim, The mosque up above [in Tashilhit Berber], Casablanca 1991.
- M. J. Rausch, Bodies, boundaries and spirit possession. Moroccan women and the revision of tradition, Bielefeld 2000.
- F. Reysoo, Pèlerinages au Maroc. Fête, politique et échange dans l'islam populaire, Paris 1991.

MARGARET J. RAUSCH

Turkey

From the earliest days of acceptance of Islam by Turks women have played an important role in the formation and development of religious associations, particularly of Sufi orders, though few are known by name. Turkmen tribes first came to Anatolia at the end of the eleventh century. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, with increased Turkmen migration, Islam spread throughout tribal society, mainly through dervishes, who were dedicated, humble male believers. In the formative years of Ottoman society dervishes also took part in the conquest of Thrace and the Balkans and became gazis, Islamic war heroes. They received land in the conquered territories and built their dervish lodges, which often became centers of Turkic cultures and religious teaching (Barkan 1942).

The Bektaşî order was prominent, especially in rural Anatolia, and its dervishes led a sedentary life in organized lodges in contrast to the anarchical dervish groups who later on formed the heterodox groups in Turkey called Alevis. Both Alevis and Bektaşîs refer to a popular saint called Hacı Bektaş (d. 1270) who belonged to Turkmen tribes and became the symbol of Anatolian Islam. Unlike his contemporary, Mevlana Celaleddin Rumi (1207–73), he did not study in the medreses. Bektaş was not a theologian but a mystic, and throughout his life he remained close to people and did not give up the shamanism customary in Central Asia (Mélîkoff 1998). In both Bektashism and Alevism women took part in religious gatherings together with men, and some women velis (friends of God), addressed as bacı (sister), were as highly regarded as their male counterparts (Çamuroğlu 1992, Ocak 2000). In Bektashism the chief of the tekke is baba (father) and in Alevism dede (grandfather) is the spiritual chief of the community, but according to a fifteenth-century Ottoman historian, Aşıkpaşazade, the Bektaşî order was founded after the death of Bektaş by a woman called Kadıncık Ana (ana means “mama/mother,” kadıncık “little woman”). Kadıncık Ana, either the adoptive daughter of Bektaş, according to Aşıkpaşazade, or his spiritual wife, according to the Vilâyetnâme, Bektaş’s hagiography, saved his life during the Babâî revolts (1241–3) and also founded the order with the help of his disciple Abdal Musa (Mélîkoff 1998, 2).

In medieval Anatolia giving women a socially recognized place in the public sphere by addressing them as sisters or mothers was not peculiar to religious associations. During the Seljuk period, a semi-mystical organization and forerunner of the trade guilds, the Ahi brotherhood, had a branch, said to be established by Fatma Bacı, whose members were women engaged in weaving and related occupations and which was known as Bacıyân-i Rûm (Bayram 1994).

Many women followed the path of Sufism opened by Mevlana Celaleddin Rumi, a path which advocates unlimited tolerance regardless of religious background. Some women, not necessarily his descendants, became the representatives of the order in the Mevlevi mukabele (sema or whirling ceremony), were appointed as shaykha, wore traditional hırka and sikke, whirled with men, took responsibility for both men and women on the Sufi path, and had numerous murids (Helminski 2003). They are still known as the female saints of Anatolia and their tombs and shrines have been visited throughout the centuries, especially by women (Araz 1966). However, following the empowerment of the medreses in Ottoman society, including in the Mevlevi order, in many religious orders women and men were segregated and only in Bektaşî and Alevi circles could women regularly continue to participate in religious gatherings with men (Gölpınarlı 1969, 147).

Owing to this time-honored tradition, the relegation of women to women-only gatherings and keeping their saintly presence publicly under low profile became salient characteristics of many religious associations in modern Turkey as well. For example, in the provincial towns of eastern and southeastern Anatolia, and in the conservative religious orders of the large cities, wives or daughters of shaykhs are usually considered to be responsible for maintaining the communication between the shaykhs and their female followers; hence women function as the female representatives of those particular orders, yet they do not actually hold office. In modern Turkey women continue to be active participants of religious associations, whether in newly established non-governmental organizations or branches of various traditional religious orders, but because of the orthodox Islamic modesty codes which entail the seclusion of women, they stay one step behind men. This does not reflect either their spiritual or mental capacities, but the gender biases prevalent in those associations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Araz, Anadolu evliyalari, Istanbul 1966.
 Ö. L. Barkan, Osmanlı İmparatorluğunda bir iskan ve kolonizasyon metodu olarak vakıflar ve temlikler I. İstila devirlerinin kolonizatör Türk dervişleri ve zaviyeleri, in Vakıf Degisi 5 (1942), 279–386.
 M. Bayram, Fatma Bacı ve Bacıyân-i Rûm, Konya 1994.
 R. Çamuroğlu, Tarih, heterodoksi ve babailer, Istanbul 1992.
 A. Gölpınarlı, 100 soruda tasavvuf, Istanbul 1969.
 C. A. Helminski, Women of Sufism. A hidden treasure, Boston 2003.
 I. Mélîkoff, Bektashi/Kızılbaş. Historical bipartition and its consequences, in T. Olsson, E. Özdalga, and C. Raudvere (eds.), Alevi identity. Cultural, religious and social perspectives, Istanbul 1998, 1–8.

A. Y. Ocak, Alevi ve Bektaşî inançlarının İslam öncesi temelleri, İstanbul, 2000.

AYŞE SAKTANBER

The United States

Methodical research on the social and political conditions of American Muslim women is almost non-existent. There is little reliable information that would allow observers to draw an accurate portrait of the facts and perceptions of the involvement of women in communal and public life. However, the pool of Muslim women in the American public sphere is growing, as they are increasingly joining the ranks of upper middle-class professionals and community activists.

There are a few Muslim women leaders who have run for public office, such as Representative Yaphett El-Amin, a democrat who represents the 57th district in the Missouri House. She worked as a counselor to young men in trouble before she became the first ward Democratic committee-woman in 1997. She is public about her faith and receives support from her husband in her involvement in politics. She has established her political career through the Democratic Party apparatus. However, little is known about her involvement in Muslim women's issues.

Muslim leaders, women included, have engaged in the polemical discourse on the status of contemporary Muslim women. This activism represents the hallmark of such groups as the Muslim Women's League, which is headed by a Los Angeles pediatrician, and Muslim Women Lawyers for Human Rights, which is headed by a law professor in Richmond, Virginia. These groups and others profess interest in reclaiming the status of women as free, equal, and vital contributors to society. As they implement educational programs designed to achieve this objective, they stand in sharp contrast to the stereotypical images of Muslim women as an oppressed, helpless segment of the Muslim community.

There is also the International League of Muslim Women, an organ affiliated with the W. D. Mohammed Ministry, founded by the mainline African American Muslim leader. This women's group was established in 1984 and now has 33 chapters, 3 of which are located in the West African countries of Togo and Ghana. To many Muslims, these Muslim women stand as a good example of how American citizens in the age of globalism see the whole world as a natural domain for Islamic sisterhood and for cultural and religious connectivity.

A new trend in Muslim women's activism focuses on the human experience of women rather than the politically charged dialogue on the status of Muslim women. A number of groups have begun to identify areas of need by women that do not offend the sensibilities of the various sides of the ideological debate. Some have organized to provide services to women, beginning predictably in the area of education.

American Muslim organizations continue to struggle to define the role of women in public life. Although there are no religious objections to this type of involvement, men are less interested in such prospects than women. In Muslim community forums, these women have begun to make the case for inclusion. Azizah, a magazine founded by two women in 2001, which accepts contributions only from women, works to encourage Muslim women to forge their own identity in community and public arenas. The founders of the magazine have decided that it is essential to include the various experiences of women, whether they are immigrant or indigenous, wear the hijāb or not, and whether they choose to pursue careers outside the house or are satisfied with their roles as mothers and homemakers. As a result, the magazine's articles cover a range of topics, including fashion, ethnic cuisines, the opportunities and challenges facing women in the workplace, marriage, and the role of women in their communities.

Muslim households in the United States usually lack the extended family support system that is strong in Muslim countries. Community is the family's secure bridge to the outside world. Similar to trends in Christian and Jewish congregations, Muslim places of worship represent hubs of activity for women, who usually form auxiliary committees running programs for mosque participants. They also teach children the value of volunteerism and supporting their mosque through a variety of fund-raising activities, including bake sales. Women usually take on these tasks merely as members of the community doing their part to meet their collective needs. Additionally, women's committees at mosques organize speaking events and discussion groups focusing on women's concerns.

Islamic centers with adequate facilities have offered women's fitness programs. Others have arranged for all-female sports events, including swimming, in outside facilities. In most mosques women are usually allowed to serve on the board of directors, although this actually occurs in only a small number of congregations. In 2001, Cherrefe Kadri, a resourceful lawyer, became a chairperson for the Islamic Center of Greater Toledo in Perrysburg, Ohio. She has taught and served as a director of the center's weekend school, organized youth summer programs, edited the center's bimonthly magazine, and served as secretary and vice president of the society's executive committee.

Women staff several other community organizations. Islamic schools in particular provide several thousand jobs, which are largely occupied by women who teach and perform administrative functions. Women also work as reporters in community media outlets and spokespersons in a number of public affairs agencies. Indeed, groups like the Council on American-Islamic Relations, which is heavily staffed by women, often measure progress in the status of Muslim civil rights in the United States by improvements in the treatment of Muslim women.

National community development groups have increasingly recognized the importance of women's involvement in community life. Some have opted for organizational structures for women parallel to those led by men. An example of such a tendency is the Sister's Wing of the Islamic Circle of North America (ICNA), which was established in 1979. Its website notes that the women's department was developed "to enable ourselves, the sisters, to work on the establishment of the Deen [faith] freely and within our own circle." The group's heightened recognition of the social problems that face the community has led it to establish Muslim Family Services, an agency that aims to help families become self-sufficient. According to the organization, the divorce rate among American Muslim couples is intolerably high and represents a serious threat to Muslim family life. The group has supported the construction of women's shelters and initiated a matchmaking program.

In addition to the faith-based organizations, there are several women's groups that identify themselves with a certain ancestry; few of these groups, which are mainly Palestinian and Lebanese, have organized for the sake of gender and ethnic awareness. For example, the Palestinian-American Women's Association has worked to highlight the suffering of Palestinian women under Israeli occupation. There is also the Lebanese Women's Awakening in North America, a feminist discussion forum on the web. But ethnic women's groups tend also to be social service oriented, offering programs directed at beneficiaries in their local areas.

In regions with a significant Muslim population, social service centers have paid special attention to issues affecting the lives of women, such as domestic abuse. In Wood Dale, Illinois, the Hamdard Center for Health and Human Services has provided medical and counseling services since 1994. The center's crisis hotline is staffed by multilingual workers who are able to communicate with recent immigrants from the Middle East and South Asia. The center's shelter assists women and child victims of domestic abuse. Hamdard also provides court-ordered assessments in divorce and child-abuse cases, and serves as a facilitator for publicly funded social service programs. When the agency started, it was completely dependent on community support. While the demand for services grew over time, donations lagged. The agency continued to grow, but it has become increasingly dependent on public funding.

Muslim women's organizations have clearly contributed to the welfare of women and society. These groups have offered replicable models for Muslim women's involvement outside family circles. Departing from earlier periods in the development of Muslim communities, when the discussion of women's issues was only a matter of intellectual interest, Muslim women's groups are paying more attention to the practical needs of women and their families and communities. This pragmatic tendency is taking hold not only in shaping internal community communications, but also in defining women's needs and the ways to mobilize resources to meet them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith. Muslim communities in North America, Albany, N.Y. 1994.
 Islamic Circle of North America (ICNA), <http://www.icna.org/sisterswing/20_years.htm>.
 Karamah, Muslim Women Lawyers for Human Rights, <<http://www.karamah.org>>.
 Muslim Women's League, <<http://www.mwusa.org>>.
 M. Nimer, The North American Muslim resource guide. Muslim community life in the United States and Canada, New York 2002.
Pakistan Link, Crossing the Rubicon in Toledo, Ohio, <<http://pakistanlink.com/sah/01-12-2001.html>>.
 J. I. Smith, Islam in America, New York 1999.

MOHAMED NIMER

Western Europe

Associations based on gender and Islam in Western Europe can be divided broadly into three, not necessarily mutually exclusive, categories: (1) informal women's groups with grassroots membership or affiliation, linked to local mosques; (2) associations run by women as the female branch of an international male-dominated association, most often with headquarters in the Muslim world, or of a male-dominated, European-based association, responding to the needs of Muslims in Europe; and (3) autonomous associations organized by women and bringing together Muslim women from different ethnic, national, linguistic or ideological backgrounds to serve women's particular needs and interests or to promote needs of the broader Muslim community.

INFORMAL WOMEN'S GROUPS

The local mosque is most often the natural arena for women's activities, and in many cases it has taken on a new importance in a Western context. The mosque has become the place where women can meet regularly with others who share the same faith, language, and culture. Increasingly, mosque activities seem to reflect a recent, slowly growing trend toward solidifying a collective Muslim identity in the public domain, and often the mosque has become the main center for community functions as well as for religious instruction for men, women, and children. Teaching activities in the local mosques usually include Qur'an classes for girls; such classes are quite often, at least on the basic level, organized and carried out by women. However, some mosques – like a few South-Asian Deobandi and most Tabligh-oriented mosques – are still closed to women; women belonging to these circles have, to some extent, recourse to other arenas for organized religious and social activities.

This first category primarily includes informal women's groups linked by gender-segregated participation in annual religious festivals and rituals that previously took place in private homes. These groups meet regularly through the year, providing iftār for women during Ramadan, arranging mawlid (Prophet's birthday) celebrations in the women's section of the mosques, and sometimes organizing women's hajj groups. When needed, they perform particular rituals, such as ʿaqīqa celebrations for a newborn child or the recitation of the whole Qur'an during Ramadan or on the occasion of a death, as is often the case in South Asian Brelwi mosques. In the Shīʿī community, women's groups meet on a regular basis in private homes for majlis-i ʿazā (mourning assemblies) during the month of Muḥarram. Muḥarram activities in the women's section of the ḥusayniyya (mosque) are often extensive and include recitation of religious poetry and preaching by the women themselves. All these groups, which organize traditional ritual activities, have had to take into account their new setting and the long distance traveled to reach it; women have thus developed social networks and new organizing skills in order to fulfill their wish to participate and perform. First-generation immigrants seem to be the most faithful participants in these informal groups.

Local mosques may also make room for women's groups that initiate social and cultural activities or even new ritual activities. To give one example: the largest Arab mosque in Oslo (1,700 members in 2004) had four women's groups in 2003. Three were responsible for courses for women and girls: one class for tajwīd (recitation of the Qur'an), one for tafsīr (explanation of the Qur'an), and one art class (painting, embroidery). The fourth group organized lectures on topics of religious and cultural interest, open to mixed audiences (men and women as well as Muslims and non-Muslims). Such activities, when well organized, also attract women from mosques of different ideological and ethnic affiliations, and may help build bridges between different communities. These groups occasionally initiate and encourage ritual participation in new ways. Since 1990, in the same Arab mosque in Oslo, women participate in the men's ʿĪd prayer (although in a separate room), and this particular ceremony also draws women from other mosques – Turkish, Pakistani, or African.

Converts to Islam often play a central role in women's organized mosque-related activities. Probably a majority of European converts to Islam are women, and some of them also bring organizational skills into the community and encourage born Muslims to engage in new activities. These local activities can easily be combined with membership in women's associations outside a particular mosque, and active women often become members of autonomous women's associations.

WOMEN'S BRANCHES OF MALE-DOMINATED ASSOCIATIONS

A number of mosques are affiliated to specific Islamic movements or international organizations. Some of them find a base for women's activities in private homes (such as members of Jamaat Tabligh), in mosques with women's quarters (such as the Pakistani Idara Minhaj ul-Qur'an or the Turkish Milli Görüş), or have mosques reserved for women (as is often the case among the Turkish Süleymanlis, namely members of the Avrupa İslam Kültür Merkezleri Birliği).

The Jamaat Tabligh, founded in British India in the late 1920s, recruits mainly from South Asian and Arab communities (particularly Moroccan), and has established preaching networks and mosques throughout the world. Although women are expected to conform to strict rules of modesty and seclusion, those married to active Tabligh members are often encouraged to engage in dāʿwa activities as long as they do not mix with unrelated men. In Norway, women's jama'āt gather in small preaching groups (two to four women), addressing themselves to Muslim women in their neighborhood. Wives of active members of the Tabligh may travel with their husbands, organizing parallel gatherings for women. As the Tabligh movement mainly focuses on devotional practice, "an arena where women and men are, fundamentally, on the same ground" (Metcalf 2003, 56), the Tablighis remain open, at least to a certain degree, to organized women's activities.

Several associations are linked to one particular ethnic or linguistic community. The Pakistani Idara Minhaj ul-Qur'ān, founded in the 1980s with headquarters in Lahore, Pakistan, has established branches in several European countries; the founder and leader runs a political-religious party in Pakistan. Idara has succeeded in recruiting a number of followers from the Pakistani communities, particularly in Denmark and Norway. The mosque-related activities of Idara's women's groups are centered on devotional activities as well as on regular gatherings where social, legal, or medical instruction is given by educated female members of the movement (medical doctors, teachers, and so forth). The Turkish Milli Görüş, as well as the Süleymanlis, have women's branches that organize both religious education and devotional activities; they also provide, at least to some extent, social aid to Turkish women and to families in need. The Milli Görüş federation has around 791 local branches in Western Europe and of these, 445 have an active women's section. The Süleymanlis offer an interesting example of a traditional, hierarchical, and Sufi-oriented organization with an active female branch, led by a hierarchy of women linked to gender-segregated teaching activities. Their teaching program also includes more advanced religious studies (in Turkey) for those who aspire to the title hoca hanım, "madam imam" (a parallel to hoca efendi). At their headquarters in Cologne, Germany, the women's house is spacious and well kept, receiving girls for religious instruction from the Turkish community at weekends. The girls also participate in devotional activities, mainly dhikr meetings twice a day, and receive spiritual guidance from their female teachers. These women's centers are now established in numerous cities and smaller towns in Western Europe. The female teachers also function as preachers; the most talented are sent on preaching tours during Ramadan. In 1999, the young woman (24 years of age) who was preaching in two of the Süleymanli mosques in Norway (that is, the mosques permanently reserved for women in Oslo and Drammen) had the previous year been on a preaching tour to Sydney and Melbourne. This second category also includes Sufi networks where women organize dhikr gatherings or participate in the men's dhikr. Of a different character are the relatively small number of male-dominated religio-political associations or parties that also recruit women for their female sections, like Hizb ut-Tahrir. This militant party, which in Western Europe is mainly active in Great Britain and Denmark, runs a women's section in Denmark, and recent numbers indicate around 100 female recruits (Grøndahl et al. 2003, 35); no woman, however, is accepted in the leadership of the party.

A small number of associations anchored in the Muslim world are controlled or strongly influenced by Muslim governments; the most explicit example is the Turkish Diyanet (Diyanet İşleri Türk İslam Birliği). In these mosques women's groups are encouraged to take care of basic religious and ritual activities for women and children and of certain social events, such as national day celebrations.

Associations based in the Muslim world – however greatly they might differ among themselves – are founded on an ideology of segregation, and women have little or nothing to say in the leadership. This state of affairs is repeated by most of the new and influential, European based, male-dominated associations.

Since the 1980s, a number of new associations have been established, some of them with a female branch or a parallel organization taking care of women's concerns. For example, women have been, at least to some extent, included in the two large French organizations, the influential Union des organisations islamiques de France (UIOF), founded in 1983, and the Fédération nationale des musulmans de France (FNMF), established in 1985. Parallel women's associations also exist, like the nationwide Ligue française de la femme musulmane (LFFM); this association was created in 1995 to encourage social contacts between Muslim women and "to coordinate local women's associations and to support and help female initiatives pertaining to social questions" (LFFM web page). LFFM, linked to UIOF, is responsible for gatherings and colloquia, for example, on themes such as violence in the home or violence against women in society (two examples from 2003).

A new trend among the recent male initiated associations in Western Europe should also be mentioned: some accept gender cooperation, like the Union de la jeunesse musulmane in France, established at the end of the 1980s, and Présence musulmane from the 1990s.

AUTONOMOUS WOMEN'S ASSOCIATIONS

This grouping includes autonomous associations organized by women; this trend can be traced back to the mid-1980s and became clearly visible during the 1990s. Although many – in particular Turkish, Moroccan, and Pakistani Muslims – interact almost exclusively with Muslims of the same ethnic origin, an increasing number of Muslim women's associations are crossing or superseding ethnic, national, or linguistic barriers. Such associations, most often based on the initiative of an individual person or of a small group, are promoted by a new generation interested in communicating in European languages, committing themselves to local women's concerns, and cooperating with non-Muslim authorities and contacts with European society at large. These groups offer counseling and address social problems of the Muslim community. They may offer remedial classes for young girls or obtain space for sporting activities. Some sell, and sometimes publish Islamic books, or they organize telephone helplines for women.

Well known are the activities of An-Nisa Society, founded in 1985, with headquarters in London and related groups in Bradford and Birmingham. An-Nisa Society provides a range of services not provided by the larger society or by male-dominated Muslim associations or mosque groups. Their activities include social work (counseling, information concerning the rights of women, and so forth); at the same time they also promote cultural activities such as art exhibitions, and encourage women's creative and artistic abilities.

In several European countries similar associations have been developed. Examples are the women's group of the Islamic Information Centre in the Hague and the Foundation for Muslim Women, also in the Netherlands. Autonomous associations have existed in France since the early 1990s, when the Union des soeurs musulmanes of Lyon was established as a support group for young women who had been excluded from the educational system for insisting on wearing headscarves. The association Femmes actives et sportives has promoted participation in sports for women, and the Ecole Lamalif offers courses in classical Arabic, tutoring for schools and literacy classes, and plans to open the first Muslim female chaplaincy in France, in the women's prison at Nanterre (Maréchal 2003, 106). The London-based Muslim Women's Helpline, established in 1989, offers counseling for women with family problems, for elderly and isolated women, and the like.

Although not all of them are long-lived, these associations can be seen as an important sign of vitality and of the will and motivation to ameliorate Muslim women's living conditions. In Norway, the Oslo-based Islamic Women Norway, established in 1991, rapidly became one of the largest Muslim associations in the country, with 3,500 active members (in 2000) and with branches in three Norwegian cities; the aim of the leadership is to encourage sporting activities, mainly swimming, and to encourage women and young girls to take social responsibility by learning how to organize such activities, to collect membership fees as well as to receive their own modest wages, to fill out their own tax returns, and so forth. Sporting activities, for those interested, are combined with counseling or Norwegian language courses. Because of the swimming lessons, the association recruits members who otherwise rarely engage in activities outside their homes, and who are not easily reached by non-Muslim social services. Male members of the Muslim community in many cases encourage their wives or daughters to participate, but have also expressed concern that women could develop non-Islamic attitudes or that an activity which is not haram (forbidden) in itself could eventually lead to one that is.

CONCLUSION

Since the mid-1980s, different categories of women's associations have become increasingly visible, not only among Muslims themselves but also in the larger society. The status of women has become the symbol of an Islamic way of life in front of the Western majority, and the importance of the position of women is growing. Social problems of the Muslim community are constantly in focus in European societies. These include forced marriages, Islamic divorce practices, and polygamous marriages and have prompted some Muslim women to become more active in the public sphere and to establish groups or associations to support and represent Muslim women. One of the more contentious issues is, of course, the Islamic dress code, especially the headscarf. Since the mid-1990s, exclusion of women and girls from schools or jobs, mainly in France, has led to the organization of support groups. The handling of the hijab question – an issue symbolically important both outside the Muslim community and inside the associative milieus – will most probably remain a long-lived cause for organized efforts.

Although it is obvious that Muslim women are still far behind Muslim men in organizational activities, numerous small-scale activities are carried out by almost anonymous Muslim women's groups. These groups are still based on segregation and traditional values, and most emphasize ritual and moral obligations. However, as traditional mosques in the countries of origin often had no place for women, their present inclusion in most mosques can be seen as an accommodation to changing circumstances.

As members of male-dominated religious associations, women are definitely not as active as male members; they often remain restricted to specifically female issues, with limited influence on decision making, and with no, or very limited, place in the leadership.

Until now, the most vital and original contributions to women's organizational life are the new European associations based on gender cooperation (such as Présence musulmane) and the autonomous female associations. Together with informal groups and networks, they represent organizational training fields for women; they attract members and followers from different ethnic and linguistic backgrounds, thus counteracting the present fragmentation and lack of cooperation present in local Muslim mosque communities. Such associations, even if few in number, can be seen as another sign of how political, social, and cultural priorities, both of the Muslim community and probably also of their European interlocutors, are beginning to produce new types of Muslim organization. The founding members of women's groups and associations are not blind to shortcomings of male-biased mosque leadership or male-dominated associations; until now, however, such criticisms have been articulated in guarded terms. In general, women's associations are more centered on social issues than on ideology.

Increasing literacy as well as economic independence have given at least some women more autonomy and greater courage to affirm their rights, to take responsibility and to encourage female leadership. Consequently, women are gradually becoming more active in associations based on gender cooperation and as participants in debates concerning what kind of visible roles they are to play in the community's organizational life. Several trends are thus at work, but the fact remains that women are still playing a secondary role in the organizational development of the European Muslim community as a whole.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Babès, L'islam positif. La religion des jeunes musulmans de France, Paris 1997.
- M. Grøndahl et al., Hizb ut-Tahrir in Denmark [in Danish], Aarhus 2003.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith, Muslim minoritites in the West. Visible and invisible, Oxford 2002.
- S. T. Hunter, Islam, Europe's second religion. The new social, cultural, and political landscape, London 2002.
- F. Khosrokhavar, L'islam des jeunes, Paris 1997.
- B. Maréchal, Mosques, organisations and leadership, in B. Maréchal et al., Muslims in the enlarged Europe. Religion and society, Leiden 2003, 79–150.
- B. D. Metcalf, Tablighi Jama'at and women, in M. K. Masud, (ed.), Travellers in faith. Studies in the Tablighi Jama'at as a transnational Islamic movement for faith renewal, Leiden 2000, 44–58.
- (ed.), Making Muslim space in North America and Europe, Berkeley 1996.
- T. Modood and P. Werbner (eds.), The politics of multiculturalism in the new Europe, London 1997.
- A. S. Roald, Eve's other face. Muslim women's activities, in I. Svanberg and D. Westerlund (eds.), Blue-yellow Islam. Muslims in Sweden [in Swedish], Nora 1999, 123–39.
- O. Roy, Vers un islam européen, Paris 1999.
- S. Vertovec and C. Peach, Islam in Europe. The politics of religion and community, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1997.
- K. Vogt, Islam in Norway. Mosques and Islamic organizations [in Norwegian], Oslo 2000.
- , Integration through Islam? Muslims in Norway, in Y. Y. Haddad (ed.), Muslims in the West. From sojourners to citizens, Oxford 2002, 88–100.

KARI VOGT

Sectarianism and Confessionalism

Egypt

Coptic Christians are Egypt's largest religious minority. Today, the exact number of Copts is unknown, with estimates ranging from six to ten million. Most Copts follow the Coptic Orthodox faith, although a small number identify with the Roman Catholic and Anglican Churches. Because of their visible status, a discussion of sectarianism and gender in Egypt is ultimately a discussion of Coptic women. Within this context, it should be noted that Coptic women have historically lived "doubly marginal" lives, under the authority of patriarchal rules, which have often repressed them as women and, due to sporadic sectarian strife in Egypt, as members of a minority group.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the debate over the issue of sectarianism in Egypt resurfaced with great intensity. At the heart of this discussion is whether or not Coptic Christians constitute a minority or even a sect in Egypt. Since the late nineteenth century, at the time when the Egyptian nationalist identity was being formulated, the prevailing argument was that Copts are Egyptians who, aside from their religious affiliation, are ethnically identical to their Muslim counterparts. Then and now, this viewpoint has generally disregarded the idea that a Coptic socioreligious experience might be distinct from a Muslim experience. The inattention to Egypt's multi-sectarian social composition, which once included a visible number of Greeks, Armenians, and Jews, comes at a time when Egyptian society is increasingly being defined as "Islamic." The pervasive focus on constructing a homogeneous nationalist identity seems to override the distinctiveness of the Coptic experience. The role of women in this discussion has received little scholarly attention, most likely because Coptic women constitute a marginalized group within a minority community.

There are two predominant factors that shape the lives of Coptic women today: the laws and rules governing Muslim Egyptian society at large and the rules internal to the Coptic community itself, mostly as dictated by the Coptic Church.

Many of Egypt's laws draw on the Sharī'a, or Islamic law, and according to a 1995 law, the application of family law is based on an individual's religion. In regard to matters of divorce, then, Coptic women are more restricted in their rights than their Muslim counterparts since the Coptic Church forbids divorce with few exceptions. The 2000 Personal Status Law made it easier for Muslim women to obtain divorce without a husband's consent, but the application of this law among Christian women has been practically unachievable. In contrast, because inheritance laws for all Egyptian citizens are based on Sharī'a, both Muslim and Christian female heirs receive half the amount of a male heir's inheritance. Occasionally, on a case by case basis, the Coptic Church has exerted informal pressure to win more favorable inheritance rights for Coptic women, but the enforcement of this matter has been inconsistent.

In broader society, during the 1980s, using a tone similar to that used to characterize the position of Muslim women, fundamentalist groups such as the Egyptian Islamic Jihad maintained that "the imposition of Muslim law on Copts will be beneficial to them (e.g., strict regulations in matters of feminine dress that enhance virtue)" (Sivan 1985, 148). While this statement represents a viewpoint probably uncommon among Muslims, since the 1970s the growing Islamist tide has exacerbated tensions between Egyptian Muslims and Christians as sectarian violence has erupted sporadically throughout Egypt. In the context of gender relations, this tension is particularly evident in the issue of the veil or ḥijāb. Historically, both Coptic and Muslim women wore the veil until the turn of the twentieth century when unveiling came to symbolize a woman's advancement. Scholars have noted that in the past decades, many Muslim women have chosen to reveal; their reasons range from protecting their modesty to publicly asserting their religious identity (Macleod 1991, Rugh 1986). This phenomenon, however, has forced the issue of gender, minority status, and public religious expression to the fore in the lives of most Coptic women. Although the Christian religion does not articulate the need for women to wear a veil, Coptic women in urban centers have commonly adopted a modest style of dress. They have been careful to avoid offending the moral standards upheld by conservative Islamic teachings and by their own church, so they wear, in general, longer skirts, they cover their arms, and in some cases they don headscarves. However, in a situation where most Muslim women are veiled and most unveiled women are Copts, it is easy to single out Coptic women in the public arena. While Coptic men dress similarly to their Muslim counterparts and therefore blend in more easily, Coptic women consistently complain of daily harassment and discrimination, particularly in densely populated urban centers such as Cairo, Alexandria, and Asyut. As there are increasingly fewer Muslim women going about unveiled, Coptic women are harassed because they are perceived as being “immodest” and because, as Christians, they are acting against Islamic prescripts on gender roles.

The second facet affecting Coptic women is shaped by their role within the church. In general, the day-to-day problems of Copts and Muslims in Egypt are similar. In the face of economic hardships and burdensome societal demands, both communities have turned to religion to find answers and communal support. As a consequence of their minority status and because society does not wholly condone their public expression of Christianity, women have found new roles in the confines of the Coptic Church. Today, Coptic women are active as Sunday school teachers, religious mentors, and volunteers (khuddām). However, the religious conservatism that has affected the Muslim community at large has similarly shaped the teachings of current Coptic clerical leaders in ways that have hampered the role of Coptic women. Within the church, a plethora of books, pamphlets, articles, and sermons address women on the codes for proper and improper behavior within the community and offer role models in the form of “virgin-saints” or idealized married women. For years, the Coptic Church has tied the role of “wife-mother” to the advancement and survival of the Coptic minority. Policing young women and instructing them on how to raise loyal members of the community has become a central duty of Coptic priests. Some women have rejected marriage and the perceived loss of their independence, resorting instead to Coptic convents where they serve as nuns. But there are groups of women who have sought another alternative: these women have realized, as one scholar writes, that “education, access to paid work, and especially the possibilities of being active in the church, constitute alternatives for self realization” (Thorbjørnsrud 1997, 187). This situation has created a dilemma for Coptic church leaders: while the church relies upon the community service provided by unmarried female khuddām, it also sees itself as the institution that has the power to sustain the Coptic minority’s reproductive future – a future increasingly threatened by sectarian tensions – by influencing women in their marriage decisions and in their family lives.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anon., Al-mar'a wa-tanmiyatihā biṣād al-sinīn, Cairo 1998.
- F. Armanios, “The virtuous woman.” Images of gender in modern Coptic society, in Middle Eastern Studies 38 (2002), 110–30.
- , Coptic Christians in Ottoman Egypt. Religious worldview and communal beliefs, Ph.D. diss., Ohio State University 2003.
- A. Ayalon, Egypt’s Coptic Pandora’s Box, in O. Bengio and G. Ben-Dor (eds.), Minorities and the state in the Arab world, London 1999, 53–71.
- P. van Doorn-Harder, Contemporary Coptic nuns, Columbia, S.C. 1995.
- M. ‘Irijāwī, Qawānīn abkām al-usra ‘indā ghayr al-Muslimīn min al-Miṣriyyīn, Cairo 1986.
- A. Macleod, Accommodating protest. Working women, the new veiling, and change in Cairo, New York 1991.
- M. Purcell, A place for the Copts. Imagined territory and spatial conflict in Egypt, in Ecumene 5 (1998), 432–51.
- A. Rugh, Reveal and conceal. Dress in contemporary Egypt, Syracuse, N.Y. 1986.
- E. Sivan, Radical Islam. Medieval theology and modern politics, New Haven, Conn. 1985.
- B. Thorbjørnsrud, Born in the wrong age. Coptic women in a changing society, in N. van Doorn-Harder and K. Vogt (eds.), Between desert and city. The Coptic Orthodox Church today, Oslo 1997, 167–89.
- ‘A. Zaki, Al-mar'a fī al-kanīsa al-Miṣriyya, Cairo 1995.

FEBE ARMANIOS

The United States

Women from among the roughly six million Muslims living in the United States represent diverse sectarian, ethnic, cultural, educational and class backgrounds. Thus it is difficult to generalize about one gender structure in Islamic communities, or what constitutes normative roles for women, informing their self-image, religious beliefs and practices, and their relations with men. It is important to distinguish among members of any of the branches or sectarian groups of Islam between those who are self consciously practicing Muslim women, either in mosques or other institutions, and those who are secular and generally non-practicing. Sometimes secular Muslim women of diverse sectarian backgrounds are actually more active and collaborative in professional circles or groups as a way of networking than are those who are more religiously observant. This entry highlights some sociological and historical features pertaining mainly to religiously observant women.

Under the rubric “Muslim” and “Islamic” lie numerous diverse and at times antagonistic groups and sects. Differences in religious consciousness and what is considered the right approach to Islam have varied from one wave of immigrants to another. South Asians Muslims in a locale such as New York or California differ from Arabs in Michigan or Ohio in the way women shape their identity and the level at which they participate in Islamic associations. With Black American Muslims the picture becomes even more complex. While Black women traditionally associated with the Nation of Islam have put great emphasis on the racial and national implications of the movement, other African Americans, such as those of the Ḥanafī madbhab, for example, are more concerned with following what they understand to be orthodox Sunnī beliefs and practices.

Much of the Islamic literature in the United States today tries to reduce this multivocal and heterogeneous mix of American Islam and to point to the reality of Muslim women as one uniform body. The political dynamics of life in a secular society dominated by a still white protestant middle-class ethos has helped create a uniform and non-gendered image of American Islam, which does not match reality. Both in academic scholarship and in journalistic representations, the “Muslim woman” – either a convert or one born and raised in the American context – is seen as the “other,” someone with somehow false or inferior claims to American Western culture. This neo-Orientalist discourse functions to clinically remove the Islamic experience from its natural historical habitat, the American West, and identifies it anachronistically with a Third World whose qualities seem more appropriate for Islam. This artificial removal of the Islamic from the West is internalized by Muslim women and men themselves, in their defense of their religion, and upheld as a definitive trait of their identity and history. American Muslim women across sectarian lines have used a fixed binarism of Islam versus the West to describe ethos, religion, and even behavioral patterns in their communities.

Within and across the various groups that make up Islam in the United States – Sunnī, Shīī, Sufi, and heterodox movements – there are important differences in ritual, doctrine, and interpretation of Qurʾān and ḥadīth that have direct bearing on women’s status, self-image, and gender relations. Around one fifth of American Muslims are Shīīs of Twelver, Ismāʿīlī, and Zaydī branches. In urban areas these groups maintain their separate mosques and centers, but in smaller towns Twelvers and Zaydīs often participate in Sunnī places of worship. Sunnī and Shīī women generally differ in terms of female role models and spiritual guides. Sunnīs tend to identify with the “mother of the faithful” image found in the Prophet Muḥammad’s wives, particularly Khadija and ʿĀʿisha. Khadija is depicted as an assertive and able businesswoman, and ʿĀʿisha as a political activist and an important source of some of the ḥadīth and law pertaining to women. Sunnī women have embellished the lives and feats of the Prophet’s wives to confirm Islam’s support of female leadership and educational and professional ambitions.

Twelver Shīī women emphasize the role and position of the Prophet’s daughter Fāṭima, tracing the imamate through her and her husband ʿAlī. Fāṭima’s centrality to the early imamate tradition historically has given Shīī women a superior spiritual and social position as compared with Sunnī women, particularly with respect to inheritance and leadership in public religious activities. Ismāʿīlī women especially tend to underscore the esoteric and symbolic nature of Islamic rituals such as prayer, fasting, pilgrimage, and testimony, arguing that inner faith is more important than outward, exoteric manifestations of worship or verbal adherence to Islam. Ismāʿīlīs today debate the possibility that the Agha Khan’s daughter may become the leader of the movement, since he seems to have favored her over his sons. The Druze branch of the Ismāʿīlīs, often referred to as “Unitarian,” make up a small minority of American Muslims. They consider mainstream Muslims to have diverted from the true spirit of monotheism. Depending on geographical region and class, Druze women may favor a greater association and even marriage with Christians over Muslims. In general, however, marriage outside the sect is discouraged.

Sufi movements such as those of Ḥaẓrat Ināyāt Khān and Idries Shah have competed with mainstream Islam in attracting women converts from Christianity and Judaism. Among Sufi groups that embrace puritanical or traditionalist restrictions on social life, women’s roles and experiences have differed little from those manifest in major Sunnī and Shīī groups. In a few cases, female Sufi groups have succeeded in transcending gender inequality and seem to have been empowered by an escape from a Sharʿa-based regulation of their activities. In Angels in the Making, Laleh Bakhtiar discusses the lives of women who joined the Sufi movement in the United States, showing that Islamic mysticism can be therapeutic and helpful in preserving the mental health of (especially young) Muslim women. It functions as an alternative to Western psychoanalysis for a range of psychological disorders.

American Muslim women generally believe that Islam affords equal rights and opportunities for both genders, but that roles for men and women are complementary rather than identical. The economic burdens facing working- and middle-class Muslim families, both native and immigrant, and the apparent need for the income of wives as wage earners, have reconfigured gender relations in a manner that has encouraged decision-making and certain social freedoms for women within an Islamic frame of reference. Meanwhile, many Muslim groups in the United States are fearful of these changes, and continue to argue that the man is the natural family provider with female labor outside the house devalued. In this context, several legal injunctions issued by clerics and muftis encourage Muslim men across sectarian lines to participate in housework and childrearing activities. Muslim women in all sects and denominations may find themselves torn in these discussions. Often as a result of American discrimination and social marginalization, they have tried to preserve a united front with their male counterparts in defining what constitutes proper female behavior in Islam. Some consent to male paternalism and gender inequality, reject premarital sexual relations, and submit to spousal control as a confirmation of their Islamic identity in the face of delegitimization. It is not surprising that many Muslim women describe veiling, in any of its various manifestations, as liberating in ways hard for Western feminists to comprehend. The extensive legal and informal debates on the veil confirm not its normative appearance in Islam, but rather the challenges Islam faces as well as the fluidity of sectarian translations of Islamic ritual, attire, and sexual modesty.

Both Sunnī and Shīʿī Muslim women put great emphasis on making their marriages work, accommodating differences with their spouses and resorting to divorce only when all communal and familial reconciliatory approaches fail. Marrying outside the faith is discouraged, but it occurs often enough to be a source of concern for American Muslims. Among the thorny issues facing Muslim families of various sects and social classes is validating female virginity, prohibiting premarital relations, and controlling the extent of socialization among young Muslim women and non-Muslim men. Illustrative of the experiences of many American Muslims, Maryam Qudrat Aseel (2003), of Sunnī Afghani background, notes that in her culture the struggle with familial authority is much more intense in the case of young girls. Boys are free to do as they please, with no accountability, while girls are not. Aseel confirms the strong sectarian character of her Islamic upbringing in which girls are expected to marry not only a Sunnī Muslim, but one who is Tajik or Pashtun Afghani.

The practice of polygamy, itself banned by United States law, is found in very small numbers of American Muslim families, especially among some members of the Nation of Islam and other African American sectarian movements. Some Shīʿīs practice mutʿa (temporary marriage), though it is generally discouraged. On the whole, an increasing number of Muslim women want greater control over the conditions of their marital contracts, with the resulting increase in detailed premarital agreements. The rights accorded to women under American civil law seem to have made less urgent the call raised in many countries for reforming Islamic law on marriage, polygyny, and divorce.

American Muslim women of all sects and classes, mainstream and heterodox, continue to struggle over access to and manipulation of public space. Many feminist Muslims support gender commingling in religious congregations, whether in the mosque or Sufi circles, during prayer or in other religious performances. Sunnī, Twelver Shīʿī and Ismāʿīlī women have sought leadership roles within their American communities and religious circles, invoking Qurʾānic verses, traditions from the ḥadīth, and/or the sayings of imams and other religious leaders. But there are limits to the goals and scope of female leadership in any classical religious establishment, including the various branches of Islam. A select number of women from all the main branches of Islam in America have embraced a feminist approach to the textual sources of Islam and advocated reforming positions in relation to women's status and gender relations. This approach has contested male-dominant views of women's rights in Islam, emphasizing female education and political leadership. Feminist Islam attempts a hermeneutical manipulation of religious texts to empower women not through open protest or dismissal of the foundational scriptures, but rather by reinterpretation of the verses and the law. Sunnī and Shīʿī women, immigrants and American-born, are struggling to be responsive to the traditions that have formed them and their communities. At the same time they are learning how to work together to challenge the bias that pits Islam against the West and to find their place and their voice as American Muslims.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. L. Anway, Daughters of another path. Experiences of American women choosing Islam, Lees Summit, Mo. 1996.
 M. Q. Aseel, Torn between two cultures, Sterling, Va. 2003.
 L. Bakhtiyar, Angels in the making, Chicago 1996.
 Y. Y. Haddad (ed.), The Muslims of America, New York 1991.

- Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Muslims on the Americanization path?, New York 2000.
- Y. Y. Haddad and A. T. Lummis, Islamic values in the United States. A comparative study, New York 1987.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith, Mission to America. Five Islamic sectarian communities in North America, Gainesville, Fla. 1993.
- (eds.), Muslim minorities in the West. Visible and invisible, Walnut Creek 2002.
- A. G. Hasan, American Muslims. The new generation, New York 2001.
- R. Hassan, Women in the context of change and confrontation within Muslim communities, in V. R. Mollenkott (ed.), Women of faith in dialogue, New York 1987, 96–109, repr. in World Council of Churches, The challenge of pluralism, Geneva 1988, 17–26.
- A. Lebor, A heart turned east. Among the Muslims of Europe and America, New York 1997.
- M. F. Lee, The Nation of Islam. An American millenarian movement, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- A. B. McCloud, African American Islam, New York 1995.
- C. E. Marsh, From Black Muslims to Muslims. The transition from separatism to Islam, 1930–1980, Metuchen, N.J. 1984.
- B. D. Metcalf (ed.), Making Muslim space in North America and Europe, Berkeley 1996.
- A. Mohammad-Arif, Salaam America. South Asian Muslims in New York, trans. S. Patey, London 2000.
- D. Ribadeneira, Questions on the Koran. Some Islamic women challenge interpretations they say have hurt their gender, in Boston Globe, 15 January 1997, A1.
- J. I. Smith, Islam in America, New York 1999.

RULA ABISAAB

Secularism

Arab States (excepting North Africa and the Gulf)

If secularism is regarded as a political ideology the aim of which is to remove religion from public political life, then secularism does not fare well in the Arab countries in the early twenty-first century. Political parties and movements, which only a few decades ago publicly advocated a firm separation between religion and state, dīn and dawla, now keep a low profile in such matters, or have lost their political influence. But if secularism is understood as the process by which “religion” is perceived as separate and different from “non-religion,” then secularism prevails in Arab states and has done so for a long time.

In order to understand how gender intersects with secularism it is crucial to delineate the relationship between secularism as ideology and secularism as a historical process. One obvious link is the legal reforms of the Tanzimat period in the late nineteenth century whereby administrative law (qānūn) in various fields was separated from religious law (Sharīʿa). This continues through the break-up of the Ottoman Empire, the mandate period, and the establishment of independent states. During this period what became Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, and Jordan were secularized. The body politic came to be regarded as independent of the will of God. Educational institutions were set up outside religious institutions, and education was gradually seen to be relevant for other than religious purposes. In most countries men of religion became servants of the state. In this historical process secularism as an ideology was subservient to ideas of national rebirth or development. Women became symbols of the backward nation: just as the nation needed to be liberated, so did women. Religion as such was not attacked but only the effects of “backward” practices or “backward” religion. And, as has been amply shown, legal reform of family law was commonly influenced by European patriarchal notions as espoused in the Code Napoleon, for example. The very concept of personal status law is a direct import from France.

In the 1970s the aim of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was to establish a secular state in all of Palestine. At the turn of the twenty-first century the Palestinians in occupied territories are at loggerheads in defining the role of religion in a new constitution. This development can be seen as typical of political change in the Middle East where the last decades have marked a move away from secularism toward the increased influence of religion. But is such a characterization really true?

In the post-independence period the nationalist discourse overshadowed all other political discourses in these states. In such a discourse all citizens – men and women – have a holy duty to their country or to the Arab nation. It has been noted that expressions of nationalist movements in many parts of the world are infused with religious vocabularies stressing sacrifice and submission. While class interests were recognized by various socialist and communist parties, the needs of the nation were still the most important. While some parties, notably the communist parties in various countries, claimed that Arab women were downtrodden and exploited, their liberation could come only with the true liberation of the nation. Women therefore had to wait patiently for their rights to be realized, or in the case of the Palestinians, had to obediently serve the resistance. Such misogynist ideas were, of course, not invented in the Arab world, but have been part and parcel of modern nationalist and revolutionary movements everywhere. The secular vernacular of the PLO in the 1970s, it can be said, was part of a Zeitgeist, just as the religious vernacular today is an essential part of contemporary politics. It is also noteworthy that the religious vernacular of today has been shaped by decades of nationalist secular rhetoric.

Thus we need to look beyond the simple dichotomy of secular/religious. We should first of all ask: what are the perceptions of gender in secular nationalist and in religious ideologies? Second, we should seek to understand the relationship between perceptions of gender and gendered policies.

In most Arab states the modern constitution based on secular nationalist ideologies grants women and men equal rights and obligations. Women and men are perceived to be essentially similar. In the religious ideologies of some states and religious opposition movements women and men are regarded as different and dissimilar. While women and men are equal before God they have different rights and duties in society. Hence from an ideological point of view there is a vast difference between secular and religious ideologies. Yet the gendered policies are not simple reflections of these ideologies. Take Syria as an example of a secular state with a nationalist ideology. State employees have the same salary regardless of gender and entry to the university is based on grades and unrelated to gender (thus favoring women). But within the family a Syrian woman is still not equal to a man. Family law is fairly complicated with special provisions for religious minorities. Christians apply the rules of the various churches for marriage and divorce and Druzes have no recourse to polygamy. There is no civil marriage in Syria, and a marriage between a Christian man and a Muslim woman is not legally recognized. Although there have been debates in Syria, just as in Lebanon, about the need to secularize family law, both the Sunnī majority and the various minorities have been staunchly opposed to this.

Leading Christians have voiced a fear over the demise of their congregations and for many of the Sunnī majority the secularization of family law is seen as the work of the ethnic and religious minorities. Due to this sensitivity, the Syrian regime, which is perceived as dominated by non-Sunnī interests, has been reluctant to push for reforms in family law. In 2003, however, more than ten thousand Syrians from all walks of life petitioned to increase the custody rights of mothers. The petition was presented as a bill in parliament, but instead the issue was settled by a presidential decree whereby custody rights were extended but not as far as the bill had suggested. In this way Syrian political leaders could show the world their support for women's rights while avoiding a sensitive public debate in parliament and preventing the conservative opposition from using the bill to make a religious statement. Hence Syria can be said to be a secular state but one in which religion plays a very important role in the gendering of policies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- T. Asad, Formations of the secular. Christianity, Islam, modernism, Stanford 2003.
 D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Philadelphia 1991.
 M. L. Meriwether and J. E. Tucker (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999.
 J. M. Peteet, Gender in crisis. Women and the Palestinian resistance movement, New York 1991.
 M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Berkshire, U.K. 1996.

India

In India secularism has never been based on the idea of a wall of separation. Since independence in 1947, almost all discussions of secularism have been based on the idea of equal respect for all religions, a concept propounded by Mahatma Gandhi. This approach to secularism requires an equal respect for all religions within both the public and private spheres.

The meaning given to this concept of secularism depends in large part on the meaning given to equality. If equality is understood in a formal sense – treating likes alike – then secularism will insist on treating India's various religious communities alike. By contrast, if equality is understood in a more substantive sense – of addressing disadvantage – then secularism will allow for an accommodation of difference between religious groups, and the protection of the rights of religious minorities.

Indian secularism has been based on a substantive approach to the equal respect for all religions, which has allowed for the protection of religious minority rights primarily through temporary special measures. This includes the right of a religious minority to be governed by its personal laws. Women are governed by customary laws that are seen to infringe on their rights to gender equality. The progressive groups and the Hindu right (who are intent on setting up a Hindu state in India) have called for the adoption of a secular Uniform Civil Code (UCC) to be applicable to all communities in the same way. Muslim women fear that such a code would be based on the norms and values of the majority community, the Hindus. If the code is based on a formal notion of equality, then Muslim women will have to surrender their distinct religious practices in favor of equality. This forces a choice between religion and equality, which does not recognize that women from the minority community are not just women, or Muslims, they are Muslim women. Formal equality emphasizes sameness in treatment. The Hindu right uses its support for the UCC to argue that all women must be treated the same, which means Muslim women must be treated in the same way as Hindu women. Any recognition of difference is seen to constitute a violation of secularism. Any recognition of difference between women in different religious communities is seen to violate the constitutional guarantees of equality, which, the Hindu right states, require formal equal treatment. There are a few voices urging that any adoption of a UCC must be based on a substantive understanding of equality and intersectionality, that is, the recognition that Muslim women have suffered historical disadvantage based on both their gender and religious identity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- T. Basu and T. Sarkar, Khaki shorts, saffron flags. A critique of the Hindu right, London 1993.
 R. Bhargava (ed.), Secularism and its critics, Delhi 1998.
 R. L. Chaudhari, The concept of secularism in the Indian constitution, New Delhi 1987.
 B. Cossman and R. Kapur, Secularism's last sigh? Hindutva and the (mis)rule of law, New Delhi 2001.
 M. S. Gowalkar, Bunch of thoughts, Bangalore 1966.
 R. C. Heredia and E. Mathias (eds.), Secularism and liberation. Perspectives and strategies for India today, New Delhi 1995.
 Z. Pathak and R. S. Rajan, Shah Bano, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 14:3 (1989), 558–82.
 T. Sarkar, Hindu wife, Hindu nation. Community, religion and cultural nationalism, London 2002.
 T. Sarkar and U. Butalia (eds.), Women and the Hindu right, New Delhi 1995.
 V. D. Savarkar, Hindutva. Who is Hindu? Pune, India 1929.

RATNA KAPUR

Iran

Gender has worked as a key category in defining the secularism of Iranian modernity. Iranian politics of modernity, since the mid-nineteenth century, has been marked by the emergence of a spectrum of nationalist and Islamist discourses. Within that spectrum, one notion of Iranian modernity took Europe as its model of progress and civilization (taraqqī va tamaddun) – the two central terms of that discourse – and increasingly combined that urge with recovery of pre-Islamic Iranianism. Other trends sought to combine their nationalism with Islam, by projecting Shi'ism as Iranianization of Islam in its early centuries (Tavakoli-Targhi 2001). Later twentieth-century developments largely led to ejection/abandonment of what may be called an Islamist nationalist trend from the complex hybridity of Iranian modernity – until its re-emergence in new configurations from the late 1980s. Until recently, it had become a commonly accepted notion that Iranian politics is and has been a battleground, since the nineteenth century, between modernity and tradition, with Islam always in the latter camp. Similarly, the beginning of Iranian feminism was not marked by a boundary, setting Islam to its beyond. Women's rights activists made rhetorical use of any available position to invent a female-friendly discourse.

Though there were debates among women on certain issues, these differences were not consolidated as incompatible and contradictory positions. Nor was Islam viewed as inherently anti-women. While anti-Constitutionalist forces grounded their political opposition to the constitution (1906–9) and to the reforms advocated by modernists, such as women's education, in their interpretations of Islamic precepts, the advocates of these reforms also drew from the same sources to argue their case.

The conflation of modernist with non-Islamic and Islamic with tradition and anti-modern took shape in the course of the twentieth century through a series of gendered conflicts.

A critical period was the reign of Reza Shah Pahlavī (1926–41), and more specifically the unveiling campaign initiated in winter 1936. As Tavakoli-Targhi has argued, in the nineteenth century European and Iranian/Islamic women (perceived as radically different) emerged as “terrain[s] of political and cultural contestations” (1990, 74). These contestations “resulted in the valorization of the veil (hijāb) as a visible marker of the self and the other” (2001, 54). Despite this mid-nineteenth-century preoccupation, during the early decades of the twentieth century unveiling was not on the agenda of reformers, who were more concerned with women's education and reform of family laws. A changing social context later in the twentieth century, however, began to bring the issue to the fore. Women began to be more visibly part of the social scene, through their participation in Constitutional activities, forming associations and holding meetings, establishing schools and holding public graduation ceremonies for students, and writing in the press and publishing women's journals. They also began to circulate more openly in the streets. Urban middle- and upper-class women began to slowly challenge and expand their very restrictive gender spaces – a space much more restricted than that of lower middle- and working-class women who had a claim to streets and moving around the city.

By the early 1920s, in certain neighborhoods, mostly “north” Tehran, women had begun to go out on the street without a face veil. Some women began to venture out without the chador, replacing it with loose long tunics. From the very beginning, unlike issues such as women's education or reform of family laws, unveiling was a contested issue among reforming women themselves (Hoodfar 1997, Najmabadi 2000).

After the official ban on the chador was imposed in 1936, state violence entered into the picture and an unbridgeable chasm opened up among women themselves. Girls were withdrawn from schools and kept at home. Women teachers who did not want to unveil resigned from their jobs or were dismissed. Girls' schools that had been the site for women's public togetherness, with women acting not only as students and teachers but also as citizens, now became the site of a division. The unveiling campaign as enforced by the government now expelled some from this common site. As with other measures taken by Reza Shah's government, increasingly modernization became conflated with only that modernity in which becoming modern was disaffiliated from Islam and made to coincide with pre-Islamic Iranianism. Those who had sought to combine their quest for modernity with a reconfiguration of Islam were unmistakably marked as traditional and anti-modern – an identification that has only in recent decades been reshaped. This process changed the meaning of modernity, Iranianism, and Islam. Iranian modernity took increasingly a non-Islamic (though not necessarily anti-Islamic) meaning. Iranian secularism and nationalism were critically reshaped through the expulsion of a different kind of modernity, one that had attempted to produce a different hybrid made of grafting Iranian nationalism onto Shi'ism.

In the 1960s, the contests over women's suffrage (1963) and the introduction of the Family Protection Act (1967) similarly consolidated secularism of modernity with the modernization program of the Pahlavī state which was opposed by the clerical establishment. Once again women's rights issues served as a marker of the Islamic and the secular. Perhaps more than any other sociopolitical and cultural issue of contention, women's rights issues became markers of secularism of modernity. This historical legacy lies behind the current fears of contamination of secularism and feminism by religion.

The emergence of a vocal feminist position from within the ranks of the Islamist movement over the past decades in Iran constitutes an important break from the past positioning of all Islam to the beyond of the modern and the secular. By opening up the domain of Islamic interpretation to non-believers and non-Muslims, by insisting on the equality of women and men in all areas, by disconnecting the presumed natural or God-given differences between women and men from the cultural and social constructions of gender, these currents have opened up a space for dialogue and alliance between Islamist women activists and secular feminists, reversing a 60-year-old rift in which each treated the other as antagonist.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Adelpak, Being modern in Iran, trans. J. Derrick, London 1999.
- H. Hoodfar, The veil in their minds and on our heads. Veiling practices and Muslim women, in L. Lowe and D. Lloyd (eds.), The politics of culture in the shadow of capital, Durham, N.C. 1997, 248–79.
- A. Najmabadi, (Un)veiling feminism, in Social Text 64 (2000), 29–45.
- P. Paidar, Gender of democracy. The encounter between feminism and reformism in contemporary Iran, Geneva 2001.
- M. Tavakoli-Targhi, Imagining Western women. Occidentalism and Euro-eroticism, in Radical America 24:3 (1990), 73–87.
- , Refashioning Iran. Orientalism, occidentalism and historiography, New York 2001.
- N. Tohidi, Feminizm, dimukrāsī va islāmgarayī, Los Angeles 1996.

AFSANEH NAJMABADI

Pakistan

As in other parts of South Asia, the Woman Question in Pakistan has long been mired in a communitarian mode of analysis that privileges religion over other forms of collective identity. This is in no small part the legacy of a colonial sociology of knowledge that treated Indian society as an aggregation of religious communities, and created notions of majority and minority communities that ignored internal differentiations along lines of gender as well as class, caste, region, and language. Because Pakistan came to justify its creation on the basis of Islam, an emphasis on religion as the organizing principle of society has been a leitmotif of state policies in the postcolonial period as well. The fracturing of gender by religion has allowed the Pakistani state to continue to skirt the specific problems of its female citizens, the vast majority of whom live in conditions of abject poverty and disease.

Although extending control over virtually every aspect of life, the colonial state vowed not to interfere in the religion and culture of Indians. This policy was accomplished by removing the personal law of India's main religious communities from the purview of British colonial law. Shari'a law was shorn of public content – civil and criminal – and privatized to apply only to issues of marriage, divorce, and inheritance; cases pertaining to Muslim personal law, however, were heard in British law courts, an important appendage of the public sphere. Customary practices were allowed to overrule the personal laws of religious communities in regions that today constitute Pakistan.

The policy of non-interference in religion created an artificial separation between a political public and a religious and culturally informed private sphere. Far from emptying politics from the realms of religion or culture, and vice versa, the colonial state did much to bring these spheres closer together and reshape them in the process. Instead of being relegated to the private sphere, religious and cultural differences were orchestrated in the public arena by social groups competing for government patronage.

Women were central to this orchestration, in particular to the redefinition of a Muslim male middle-to upper-class identity. Concerned with projecting and preserving their distinctive religiously informed cultural identity, the Muslim ashraf (literally, “respectable”) classes were anxious to protect their women from the “evil” influences of the colonial “public.” This anxiety was shared by Muslims who were products of theological seminaries as well as so-called reformers ready to incorporate aspects of modernity in order to engage more effectively with Western colonialism. The cherished model of womanhood was that of the literate but domesticated, wise but chaste, intelligent but submissive wife, a conception that stood in stark contrast to the other major image of woman – the prostitute who lured respectable men into temptation and ruined them, financially, morally, and psychologically. The shattering experience of partition in 1947 only hardened the Muslim ashraf classes in their opinion that an unprotected woman was the source of immorality, irreligiosity, and social degradation.

A few gestures were made to prove the Islamic bona fides of the new state. The West Punjab Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act of 1948 superseded custom by conferring inheritance rights on women, including agricultural land. Apart from legal loopholes that allowed families to circumvent the law, giving women the right to inherit landed property, this was a class rather than a gender concession. Adopting the colonial state’s restricted view of the Shari‘a, the managers of Pakistan were prepared to consider social legislation on behalf of women dealing with marriage, divorce, and the guardianship of children. Middle- and upper-class women at the vanguard of the movement to secure women’s rights used this opening to good advantage. The crowning achievement of women’s rights activists was the Family Law Ordinance of 1961, which granted women rights in marriage, divorce, and guardianship. It was a fitting conclusion to a debate that had concentrated on issues of personal law at the expense of broader social and economic entitlements in the public sphere.

The Family Law Ordinance became one of the main targets of attack by the anti-women’s rights lobby, threatening as it did the personal autonomy of Muslim men by bringing the protected space of the home under the direct scrutiny of the state. While opposing the rights of women as equal citizens, this lobby had no qualms about appropriating another key legacy of Western colonialism – the modern nation-state. For Pakistani women the problem has been worsened by authoritarian rulers looking for legitimacy by making women the focal point of state-sponsored Islamization. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the military regime of General Zia ul-Haq introduced wildly discriminatory legal measures against women. This period in Pakistan’s history marked a departure from the colonial pattern of confining the legal discourses of Islam to the personal domain. The Hudood Ordinance made rape and adultery indistinguishable. Along with the law of evidence, which reduced the worth of a woman’s testimony to half that of a man, Zia’s Islamization program created parallel systems of law, complicating the already inadequate mechanisms of assuring civil and criminal justice. In a sense, while the crusaders for democratic and women’s rights like the Women Action Forum (WAF) were engaged in rearguard action to defend the small gains made since the 1960s in the area of personal law, a military ruler under the banner of Islam colonized a significant part of the public space where the battle for equal political, social, and economic rights ought to have been fought in the first place.

Successive governments have continued to invoke an Islamic national identity that overrides all differences. Together with the prolonged denial of democratic rights, the state’s ideological posture has prevented a resolution of the nexus between gender and class and gender and community as well as between gender and nation – a failure exacerbated by the fact that in Pakistan, as in other parts of the world, it is largely the class origins of those at the vanguard of the “feminist movement” that have shaped the articulation of women’s issues at the level of the state. Concerned more with rights denied them than the economic entitlements of their less privileged sisters, women belonging to the upper and middle strata have done a better job of defending their class interests than they have those of their gender. Educated, urban, middle- and upper-class in the main, these women have for the most part worked within the state’s restricted definition of the women’s question as one pertaining to issues of personal law – marriage, divorce, guardianship, and inheritance – and have thus largely ignored the social, economic, and political entitlements of women cutting across class and community, with grave implications for women's rights as equal citizens of the state.

Women in Pakistan are now debating the terrain on which their struggle for equal citizenship rights can be most effectively waged. A first step in that direction is a forceful rejection of the false dichotomy between the colonial public and communitarian private, which has provided the foundation for a military-bureaucratic public and a male-defined private sphere in Pakistan. Such a system affords protection of a sort to domesticated middle- to upper-class women while leaving women facing both class and gender oppression outside the purview of the discourse on rights. Violence against women has become a defining feature of an imploding authoritarian state and an exploding anarchic society. Tinkering with minor improvements in personal law leaves the entire field of political, economic, and social rights open to manipulation by the self-appointed guardians of an Islamic moral order.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. S. Ahmad, Masculinity, rationality and religion. A Feminist perspective, Lahore 2001.
- , Hysterics, harems and houris. Cultural and psychological reflections on women, sexuality and Islam, in D. S. Ahmad, Women and religion, iv, Lahore 2000, 167–207.
- R. Ahmad (trans.), Beyond belief. Contemporary feminist Urdu poetry, Lahore n.d.
- S. S. Ikramullah, From purdah to parliament, New York 1998.
- , Behind the veil. Ceremonies, customs and colour, New York 1992.
- A. Jalal, Convenience of subservience. Women and the State of Pakistan, in Deniz Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991.
- , Self and sovereignty. Individual and community in South Asian Islam, London 2000, especially chapter 2.
- B. Metcalf, Reading and writing about Muslim women in British India, in Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities, and the state in India, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- G. Minault, Secluded scholars. Women's education and Muslim social reform in colonial India, Delhi 1998.
- H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Columbia, Mo. 1982.
- D. Saiyid, Muslim women of the British Punjab. From seclusion to politics, New York 1998.
- F. Shaheed and K. Mumtaz (eds.), Women of Pakistan. Two steps forward, one step back, London 1987.
- A. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life histories of working women in the Old City of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992.

Turkey

Secularism in Turkey has been closely intertwined with discourses and practices of Westernization, modernity, and nationalism. Secularization efforts date back to the nineteenth century, when the Ottoman state granted complete equality before the law to all subjects regardless of their religious creed. The subsequent modernization reforms gradually contributed to the emergence of Turkish proto-nationalisms at the end of the century. Although the nationalists had different stands on the degree and the role of religion in public life (Hanioglu 1995), they generally agreed on the urgent need to modernize the state as well as the society for the sake of imperial survival. Eventually, the collapse of the empire in the First World War (1914–18) and the consequent victory in the War of Independence (1919–22) led to the crystallization and hegemony of Kemalist nationalism.

Kemalist nationalism constituted the radicalization of previous secularization attempts, primarily because it aimed at eradicating the legacy of the Ottoman practices that were partly legitimized by the Islamic Caliphate. Shortly after the proclamation of the Turkish Republic (1923), the Kemalists abolished the Caliphate (1924), closed down the Islamic brotherhoods (1925), adopted a modified version of the Swiss Civil Code (1926), and changed the script from Arabic to Latin (1928). It is apparent from the scope of the reforms that they aimed not only to transform the political structure, but also to rearrange social relations. The reforms did not, however, intend to directly challenge people's identification with Islam but to secularize everyday conduct with minimum popular resistance from the predominantly Muslim citizenry. More specifically, the Kemalists, like the late nineteenth-century modernizers, aimed at making religion subservient to the state's interests (Turhan 1991, Deringil 1998). They redefined the proper forms of religious practices in relation to their secularist ideals, frequently appealing to these novel concepts in consolidating their nationalist agenda, and strictly prohibited other groups from autonomously employing religious signs at state institutions. Islam was therefore confined to the private sphere and its entry to the public realm was determined by the secular nationalist standards (Taranlı 1993, Yavuz 2000, Keskin-Kozat 2003).

The nationalist co-optation of religion is best illustrated in the case of women's rights and the regulations concerning veiling. Women actively participated in the nationalist struggle by raising significant popular and financial support for the Kemalist forces. After the War of Independence, Kemalists attempted to incorporate women's autonomous activism into the nationalist framework so that they could both secure an important vanguard group for their secularization reforms and assimilate a strong rival that might easily mobilize resources against them (Çaha 1996, 115–16). They therefore granted women equal rights in educational, social, and political spheres. Various scholars took issue with the content and the limits of these reforms, asserting that although they provided women with unprecedented opportunities, they preserved the predominant patriarchal structures and failed primarily in rural areas (Tekeli 1990, Kandiyoti 1991, Arat 1994). Building upon such arguments, this entry explores how in the specific case of veiling women's emancipation in Turkey is significantly contingent on their compliance with the nationalist regulations of Islam.

Kemalists did not initially ban but informally discouraged women's veiling, arguing that it symbolized social backwardness and religious obscurantism. It was implicitly assumed in the early twentieth century that female civil servants, parliamentarians, and students should not wear headscarves. Nevertheless, the relative relaxation of state controls over religion in the 1950s and the resurgence of religious activism in the 1960s compelled the Kemalist elite to take more austere measures. In the 1970s, a considerable number of veiled university students were dismissed from school because of their improper attire. In 1983, the Higher Education Council introduced the first nationwide ban on the wearing of the veil on university campuses. The ban was severely contested by the Islamist groups and later by the members of the Motherland Party, then in power. The Turkish Constitutional Court put an end to the legal aspect of the debate in 1988, stipulating that the veil was a political rather than a religious symbol and hence it should not be worn at universities (Özdalga 1998, 41–6).

It is important to dwell upon the consequences of the ban on veiled women's socioeconomic and political status. While the court's decision does not prohibit women from wearing headscarves in public spaces, veiling is prohibited in educational institutions, which provide individuals with the formal training and qualifications necessary for attaining future success. The decision also serves as the primary legal justification for denying veiled women employment in the state sector, a crucial source of employment in contemporary Turkey. Women's participation in national politics is also restricted by the internal ordinances of the parliament, which endorse that women should not wear headscarves within the General Assembly. In 1991, two veiled women, Neslin Ünal of the Nationalist Action Party and Merve Kavakçı of the Virtue Party, were elected to the parliament for the first time in the history of the republic. Whereas the former took off her veil and served her term, the latter faced vehement protest from secularists for having come to the oath-taking ceremony with her veil on. Kavakçı had to leave the chambers without being sworn in and later lost her parliamentary seat on another technicality (Göçek 2000).

The legal restrictions on veiling are usually coupled with a general endorsement from secularist social groups that “women may wear headscarves at their homes but doing so as a civil servant or student should be considered as a sign of religious fundamentalism” (Oran 2000). Such exclusions of veiled women from the nationalist public sphere have accelerated their involvement in the Islamist circles, which also curtailed their autonomous demands. Considering the Woman Question secondary to other macro-political issues (Karabıyık-Barbarosoğlu 2000), Islamist elites granted them inadequate representation in the party mechanisms (Saktanber 2002), supervised their publications to the degree of purging them (Göle 1996, 121–6), and denied employment in order to foster a “modern” company image (Özbilgin 2000). Hence, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, secularism and Islamist mobilization in Turkey both enable and constrain women's struggle for greater rights in different ways.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Z. Arat, Turkish women and the republican reconstruction of tradition, in F. M. Göçek and S. Balaghi (eds.), Reconstructing gender in the Middle East. Power, Identity, and tradition, New York 1994, 57–78.
- Ö. Çaha, Sivil Kadın. Türkiye'de sivil toplum ve kadın, Ankara 1996.
- S. Deringil, The well-protected domains. Ideology and the legitimation of power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909, London 1998.
- F. M. Göçek, To veil or not to veil? The contested location of gender in contemporary Turkey, in Interventions 1:4 (2000), 521–35.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- Ş. M. Hanioglu, Young Turks in opposition, New York 1995.
- D. Kandiyoti, End of the empire. Islam, nationalism and women in Turkey, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and state, Philadelphia 1991, 1–21.
- F. Karabıyık-Barbarosoğlu, Kendisi Olmaktan Vazgeçmiş İslamcı Kadınlar, in Yeni Şafak, 10 March 2000.

- B. Keskin-Kozat, Entangled in secular nationalism, Islamism and feminism. The life of Konca Kuriş, in Cultural Dynamics 15:2 (2003), 183–212.
- B. Oran, İç politikada nafile sorunumuz. Türban, in Agos, 6 October 2000.
- M. F. Özbilgin, Is the practice of equal opportunities management keeping pace with theory? Management of sex equality in the financial services sector in Britain and Turkey, in Human Resource Development International 3:1 (2000), 43–67.
- E. Özdalga, The veiling issue, official secularism, and popular Islam in modern Turkey, Richmond, Surrey 1998.
- A. Saktanber, Whose virtue is this? The Virtue Party and women in Islamist politics in Turkey, in P. Bacchetta and M. Powers (eds.), Right-wing women. From conservatives to extremists around the world, New York 2002, 71–84.
- İ. B. Tarhanlı, Müslüman toplum, “laik” devlet. Türkiye’de Diyanet İşleri Başkanlığı, İstanbul 1993.
- Ş. Tekeli, The meaning and limits of feminist ideology in Turkey, in F. Özbay (ed.), Women, family and social change in Turkey, Amsterdam 1990, 139–59.
- İ. Turan, Islam and nationalism as political ideology, in R. Tapper (ed.), Islam in modern Turkey. Religion, politics, and literature in a secular state, New York 1991, 40–56.
- H. M. Yavuz, Cleansing Islam from the public sphere, Journal of International Affairs 54:1 (2000), 21–42.

BURÇAK KESKIN-KOZAT

Western Europe

The Western notion of secularism in the context of law means the withdrawal or dismissal of properties, people, or things from the churches’ observance or power (Lübbe 1965, 23). In a more general sense secularism refers to theories of modernization which assumed, up until the late 1970s, that religion had lost its relevance and meaning in society. Today sociologists of religion describe secularism as a typical development in modern times that only aims at changing the shape of religion in modern societies (Casanova 1996). This is shown, for instance, by the differentiation of subsystems in society, which also means the separation of religion and state, and the individualization of religion. Secularism is analyzed by stripping off religious meanings in regard to religious symbols, practices, and ideas while keeping it a profane tradition or social structure (Weber 1920).

The Western historical and sociological concepts of secularism are not entirely transferable to Islam. Nevertheless in the context of immigration to Europe and the confrontation with Western Christian secularism, they are helpful heuristic paradigms for the understanding of some of the developments of Islam in Western Europe.

SECULARISM AS DIFFERENTIATION OF RELIGION AND STATE

Muslims in Western Europe have not yet shaped a church-like organization. The special circumstances they must acknowledge in their new situation, however, involve particular methods of accommodation. Since second generation immigrants are more oriented to Europe, they have built mosque associations in a more Western style. These mosque associations still substitute the missing cultural institutions of their homelands. Thus in many cases the mosque is used, for example, to celebrate religious ceremonies that would not take place in or around the mosque in most parts of the Muslim world, in particular weddings, rites of circumcision, or funeral ceremonies (Shadid and Koningsveld 1995, 25). Customs that in another context were seen to be located between the realm of religion and culture are now defined as religiously bounded. The imam, who traditionally had only the function of prayer leader, has various “religious” tasks in Europe and consequently has become a more religious authority. Mosque associations also offer cultural and social activities and courses along with religious services. A differentiation is made between members and non-members of mosques, again differing from what pertains in most of the Muslim world. The pluralistic situation in which Muslims find themselves sets many of them in a more distant and perhaps more service-oriented relation to the mosque (Shadid and Koningsveld 1995).

At the same time, a female second generation has moved into the mosques and aspired to participate, since the mosques are the only public places in which, for most Muslims, it is socially acceptable for women to be present. Even though the boards of directors of the mosque associations have mostly been filled by men, women continue to gain more influence in the mosques. Today no mosques are built without rooms for female believers. The women provide religious and non-religious activities, including instructional courses, in these rooms. Women have also formed their own associations in the fields of consulting and education (for example, Klinkhammer 2000, Jonker 2001). This autonomous empowerment of Muslim women, which is observable in all Western European countries, is supported by some associations. One of the larger German associations has established a permanent women’s representative. In France, Belgium, and other countries the state representatives demand the participation of women when they begin to negotiate on their behalf.

Beyond these structural developments, which implicitly accept the separation of state and religion, there are also public statements of individuals and mosque associations. The most recent and most widely discussed statements are the German Islamic Charta (2002), which declares in 21 points the loyal relationship of Islam to the secular democratic society, and the books of Tariq Ramadan (1994, 1998), who also argues that Muslims can live in harmony as religious people in a secular state.

SECULARISM AS INDIVIDUALIZATION OF RELIGION

The individualization of religion can be based on the possibility of selecting one's own way of religious life. For example, Muslims in Europe choose between different forms of Islamic associations – those concerning religion, ethnicity, or other matters. Individualization of religion can also refer to the way and content of religious life. This form of individualization seems to be more characteristic of the better educated second generation Muslim women and men.

Muslims generally express the desire to experience Islam and the Islamic beliefs in their life, although many Muslims disapprove of formal authorities like muftis. They often read the Qur'an on their own and interpret it in light of their own personal experiences. Some of them are interested in spiritually-oriented and experience-oriented forms of Islam such as dhikr.

Some empirical studies have shown that certain practices of Muslim women, such as wearing a headscarf, automatically mean falling back into old traditional tracks. For many women, however, it is very important to affirm that this behavior is not based on a traditional understanding of relationships, personality, and Islam. These women, who are mostly well educated, insist that they have chosen to wear the covering on their own initiative. They feel accountable to neither a man nor their parents in their decision, but affirm themselves personally bounded to Allah, who is the center of their religion. They interpret the religion of Islam from their own experience and their claim to freedom and independence in private and public spheres. Of course this interpretation is also connected to the respect that is thereby accorded to them by other Muslims, both men and women. As they understand it, the decision to accept the headscarf as an expression of their personal religiosity is made exclusively through this possibility of individual freedom of action (Klinkhammer 2003, Karakaşoğlu 1998).

SECULARIZATION OF RELIGIOUS CELEBRATIONS AND IDEAS

Genuine secularization of Islamic ideas and practices is rare in Western Europe, although there is almost no research in this field. While great attention has been given to the increasing identification of Muslim migrants with Islam in the last 20 years, the question of a decreasing relevance of Islamic norms and practices has not yet been examined.

Certain realities, however, can be noted. It is observable that secular but not atheistic Muslims in Europe celebrate the last days of Ramadan. Ramadan Bayram, a feast for all Muslims, has been transformed into a family celebration similar to Christmas in Christian-secular culture. It may well be that certain Muslim concepts, such as tawhid (unity), may also be taken over and adapted to a secular Muslim mind. In this sense, secularism points to some principles or models of cultural behavior that have already been stabilized by religion. However, most of the time Muslim migrants adapt to Western secular culture concepts and modes of behavior such as individualism. At the same time some Muslims have started to celebrate secular feasts that are common in Western societies, for example birthdays and the New Year (Yalzin-Heckman 1994).

Thus in spite of the increasing influence of modernization on the religion of Islam in Western Europe, secularism in terms of a decrease of meaning or of the relevance of religion is not apparent. Islam has become an important issue in the politics of personal and collective identity in the context of migration. Many Muslims in Western Europe differentiate their community structures from those of the general cultural in which they are now located, even though it is clear that they are affected by the trend of individualization. The individualization of Muslim women actually seems to bring about the opposite of a decrease in the relevance of religion insofar as it makes Islam visible in the public sphere through women's decision to wear a headscarf. These developments confirm recent analyses of modernization, which have shown that secularism generates changes in the face of the religion, but does not necessarily bring about its dissolution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Casanova, Public religions in the modern world, Chicago 1994.
 G. Jonker, Religiosität und Partizipation der zweiten Generation. Frauen in Berliner Moscheen, in R. Klein-Hessling, S. Nökel, and K. Werner (eds.), Der neue Islam der Frauen. Weibliche Lebenspraxis in der globalisierten Moderne. Fallstudien aus Afrika, Asien und Europa, Bielefeld 1999, 106–23.

- Y. Karakaşoğlu, "Kopftuchstudentin" türkischer Herkunft an deutschen Universitäten. Impliziter Islamismusvorwurf und Diskriminierungserfahrungen, in H. Bijlfeld and W. Hetimeyer (eds.), Politiserte Religion, Frankfurt 1998, 450–93.
- G. Klinkhammer, Moderne Formen islamischer Lebensführung. Eine qualitative Untersuchung zur Religiosität sunnitisch geprägter Türiinnen der zweiten Generation in Deutschland, Marburg 2000.
- , Modern constructions of Islamic identities. The case of second generation Muslim women in Germany, in Marburg Journal of Religion 8:1 (2003), <http://www.uni-marburg.de/religionswissenschaft/journal/mjr/current.html>.
- J. M. van der Lans and M. Rooijackers, Types of religious belief and unbelief among second generation Turkish migrants, in W. A. Shadid and P. S. Koningsveld (eds.), Islam in Dutch society. Current developments and future prospects, Kampen, The Netherlands 1992, 56–65.
- C. Leggewie, Der Islam im Westen. Zwischen Neofundamentalismus und Euroislam, in J. Bergmann, A. Hahn, and T. Luckmann (eds.), Religion und Kultur, special issue of Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie (Opladen) 33 (1993), 271–91.
- H. Lübbe, Säkularisierung. Geschichte eines ideenpolitischen Begriffs, Munich 1965.
- T. Ramadan, Les musulmans dans la laïcité. Responsabilités et droits des musulmans dans les sociétés occidentales, Lyon 1994.
- , To be a European Muslim, Lyon 1998.
- W. A. Shadid and P. S. Koningsveld, Blaming the system or blaming the victim? Structural barriers facing Muslims in Western Europe, in W. A. Shadid and P. S. Koningsveld (eds.), The integration of Islam and Hinduism in Western Europe, Kampen 1991, 2–21.
- , Integration and change. Some future prospects, in W. A. Shadid and P. S. Koningsveld (eds.), The integration of Islam and Hinduism in Western Europe, Kampen 1991, 228–39.
- , Religious freedom and the position of Islam in Western Europe. Opportunities and obstacles in the acquisition of equal rights, Kampen 1995.
- N. Tietze, Jeunes musulmans de France et d'Allemagne. Les constructions subjectives de l'identité, Paris 2002.
- M. Weber, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, 1, Tübingen 1920.
- L. Yalzin-Heckmann, Are fireworks Islamic? Towards an understanding of Turkish migrants and Islam in Germany, in C. Steward and R. Shaw (eds.), Syncretism/anti-syncretism. The politics of religious synthesis, New York 1994, 178–95.

GRITT KLINKHAMMER

Sexual Abuse: Children

The Balkans

This entry reviews sexual abuse of children in central Balkan countries and territories (Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia, Kosovo, Montenegro, Macedonia, and Vojvodina), where different Muslim ethnic groups live as a majority or a minority, and mostly as indigenous peoples (Roma, Bosniaks, Albanians, Turks, and others).

At the end of Ottoman rule, Shari'a courts were transformed from courts of general jurisdiction into special courts whose jurisdiction was reduced to the issues of family and succession law, and issues related to endowments. The Austro-Hungarian Empire took over these courts and the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes did not change the position of Shari'a courts significantly. After the Second World War, a law was passed disbanding Shari'a courts in the People's Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina. That was the end of Shari'a law as part of the applicable law, but its norms had a major influence on the morals and customs of Muslims in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

According to the Qur'an and the traditions of the Prophet, incest and other forms of sexual abuse are mortal sins. They threaten all three levels of human dignity: soul (God inspired human being with His spirit); body (human beings are created in the most beautiful uprightness); and sociability (a general alliance of all human beings with God). This attitude, based on spiritual tradition, pervades Muslim culture. However, the only comprehensive legal sanctioning against such crimes has been achieved with the current application of secular criminal laws.

Incomplete research on sexual abuse in Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro, Croatia, Kosovo, Vojvodina, and Bosnia-Herzegovina, while they were federal units of the former Yugoslavia, confirms that this issue was mainly absent from courts. The phenomenon was, as a rule, considered taboo, and both victims and witnesses avoided reporting them to the police and courts. Although crimes of sexual abuse were considered the worst violations of individual and collective dignity, publicizing them would permanently stigmatize the victim and his or her family. Records of Shari'a courts in Bosnia-Herzegovina cover various crimes, but a sample of records revealed no court case regarding sexual abuse of children between the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries. New legislation concerning sexual abuse of children has had broad popular support.

Sexual abuse is defined in the criminal legislation of Bosnia-Herzegovina (in the Criminal Codes of the Federation of Bosnia-Herzegovina and the Republic of Srpska), Serbia, Montenegro, and Croatia. Crimes of sexual abuse of children were included in those laws in the first years of the twenty-first century as a result of a worldwide debate on these issues. Description of the crime of sexual abuse is now more detailed than was the case in legislation after the Second World War and earlier. The criminal legislation of Bosnia-Herzegovina includes sexual abuse of children in the group of crimes against sexual freedom and morality. Sexual abuse of children includes rape, sexual intercourse by abuse of office, sexual intercourse with a child, fornication, sexual act in front of a child or a minor, forcible prostitution, using a child or minor for pornographic purposes, introducing a child to pornography, and incest. There are no significant differences in the crimes defined as sexual violence in the criminal legislation of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia, Montenegro, and Croatia.

According to statistical data of the ministry of the interior in Bosnia-Herzegovina, 208 criminal reports on sexual abuse of children were filed between 1997 and 2002. Perpetrators were 15 to 85 years of age. Victims of violence were, as a rule, girls aged 3 to 18. According to the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Bosnia-Herzegovina, 16 percent of all abuse is sexual abuse. These data include all ethnic communities in Bosnia-Herzegovina (Serbs/Orthodox Christians, Croats/Roman Catholics, Bosnians/Muslims, and others). There are no data regarding distribution of these crimes among different ethnic populations. During the systematic rape of Bosnian Muslim women in the 1992-6 war against Bosnia-Herzegovina, many cases of rape of underage girls were recorded. In some Serb prisons, such as Foča, Muslim girls were kept and systematically raped.

According to public sources, 100 cases of sexual abuse of children were registered in Croatia between 1996 and 1999. Fifty percent of the cases happened within the home, and 35 percent of perpetrators were family members. According to the statistics of the Serbian ministry of the interior, 892 criminal reports of sexual abuse of children were filed between 1998 and 2002. According to the data of the non-governmental organization (NGO) Incest Trauma Center in Serbia, the number of reported cases of child sexual abuse has increased since 2000; currently, some 50 new cases are reported every week. Data on sexual abuse of children in Slovenia, Kosovo, Macedonia, and Montenegro were not available.

After the war against Bosnia-Herzegovina (1992–6), numerous NGOs for human rights and related issues were established in the country and in the region. These organizations work on raising awareness regarding women's issues, gender, and sexual abuse of children in accordance with general European standing on these matters. There are public demands all over the region to improve the existing documents by precisely defining sexual abuse of children. There are also more and more requests to develop legislative, executive, and judicial powers in order to efficiently register, prosecute, and veto these crimes. These issues are presented in public debates and in the media, particularly in women's and feminist organizations, but so far no general position on them has been reached. There are no unified and developed procedures for registering sexual abuse of children in any of these countries, which is why the existing statistics are inconsistent. In some countries there is an obvious increase of the number of cases of sexual abuse of children that is not visible in others. It is reasonable to assume that the magnitude of sexual abuse of children in all the countries concerned is similar.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- CID, I begged them to kill me [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1999.
 Commission for Gathering Facts on War Crime, The sin of silence. Risk of speech [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1999.
 F. Karčić, Studies of Shar'ia law [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1997.
 M. Milosavljević, Child sexual abuse [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 2002.
 Z. Mršević, Incest between myth and reality [in Serbian], Beograd 1997.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Singer, Criminal-judicial responsibility and protection of youth [in Croatian], Zagreb 1998.
 V. Nikolić, Domestic violence in Serbia [in Serbian], Beograd 2002.

The Caucasus and Turkey

All countries of the southern Caucasus region – Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia – as well as neighboring Turkey, have signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC). This stipulates that a child is any human being under 18 unless they have attained legal majority earlier. The particular articles of the CRC that apply to child sexual abuse and exploitation are numbers 19 and 34, 35, and 39. Only the two majority Islamic countries – Turkey and Azerbaijan – have additionally signed the Optional Protocol on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography.

Age limits for sexual activity remain controversial in the Caucasus. Girls in both majority Islamic and Christian countries of the Caucasus region and Turkey, living in rural areas especially, can marry “voluntarily” as early as age 12 or 13. Younger brides marry older adolescents or young adult men, and almost certainly drop out of the education system without completing minimum schooling. Definitions of abuse, however, imply a lack of consent for sexual contact between a child and an adult or someone at least 5 years older. Some Western European countries have set the legal age for consent to sexual relations at 12 or 14. National legislations in the Caucasus lack precise legal age prescriptions on this issue, though an initiative in the Georgian parliament in 2003 requests that this limit now be set at 16.

Abuse within the family and the commercial sexual exploitation of children, both boys and girls, exist universally to some degree. However, a lack of serious research in the Caucasus is actually contributing to and covering the growing problems.

In Turkey there is cause for alarm because of the lack of investigations into cases of abused children. Cases are increasingly reported, but inadequate follow-ups mean that the children continue to be abused, or have even been known to be killed when abuse was reported.

Rape has the clearest legislative consequences in all countries concerned. In Georgia, the criminal code specifies details of the act and the ages, as well as length of imprisonment; for example, raping a person younger than 14 is punishable by imprisonment from 10 to 20 years. In Azerbaijan, the criminal code mentions the rape of infants as well as of juveniles, acts which engender imprisonment from 8 to 15 years.

CHILD PROSTITUTION IN THE CAUCASUS

Georgian law does not define prostitution in general or child prostitution in particular. Prices for an underage prostitute in Georgia range from around $5 for 2 hours in small rooms in beerhouses, to luxury hotel prices at $200 per night. None of the countries concerned, however, have gathered real statistical data concerning child prostitution. In 1997 the Georgian Ministry of Internal Affairs had registered 50 minors who worked as prostitutes in Tbilisi. A study by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and the Center for Intercultural and Social Studies in Tbilisi showed that 112 prostitutes aged between 12 and 16 were known, with an average age of 13, most of whom were encouraged, assisted, or forced into the activity by their parents or families. The activity often grows out of other street activities such as begging, though in some cases girls from rural families come to the capital for prostitution without their families' knowledge. Child prostitution in Georgia is a well-organized business, with the ensuing financial interests of certain circles, including the very government services that would be expected to enforce legislation; instead they control most prostitution establishments, albeit inconspicuously. Also, expatriates have been accused of increasing the market, and a 2003 report on expatriate patrons of a beer bar in Tbilisi caused a well-respected international peace-keeping agency to reorganize itself and discreetly dismiss certain ranking employees.

TRAFFICKING

The Caucasus countries are under-informed on most issues of child abuse and exploitation, and none have fully investigated trafficking. The prostitution of women and minor Georgian girls in Turkey has been largely documented, both by scientific research and on Internet "sex tourism" sites. The baseline for the issue on trafficking is the Stockholm Declaration on Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. Although Turkey has ratified the latter, none of the southern Caucasus countries have.

A Georgian minister of internal affairs stated that "no kind of trafficking exists," while "the UN, OSCE, IMO, Interpol, Europol, US State Dept, European Commission, and other agencies unanimously rate Georgia as the leader in Caucasus countries and Central Asia" (UNICEF 2001). Jean-Christophe Peuch, of Radio Liberty, Prague, reported on 27 July 2001 that "deteriorating economic conditions, corruption and a high rate of unemployment are factors that have contributed to the growing phenomenon of trafficking women and girls from the three Caucasus states of Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia." Azeri and Armenian women are trafficked to Turkey and the United Arab Emirates while the destinations of Georgians are more diverse. An End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children (ECPAT) report of 2000 states that "Georgia holds the leading position" in the increase of commercial sexual exploitation of children (CSEC) in the Central Asia and Caucasus regions. Georgia heads the three categories of child prostitution, child pornography, and trafficking in children in Central Asia and the Caucasus, although at the same time attempts are being made to combat the problems through non-governmental organization work and with UNICEF. However, Azerbaijan has serious problems in child prostitution and trafficking, yet CSEC in that country is not regarded as a problem that warrants measures to be taken. Armenia has an important trafficking problem but, again, no measures are being taken.

The increased trafficking through Turkey reported by IOM includes trafficked migrants exposed to labor exploitation, but children are particularly vulnerable to these smugglers who commit human rights violations "in the form of rape, physical and mental abuse, food deprivation, abandonment and even death" (IOM 2000).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- ECPAT (End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children), < <http://www.ecpat.net/eng/index.asp>>.
- IOM (International Organization for Migration), Report on irregular migration in Turkey, 2003.
- Parliament of Georgia, Independent Board of Advisors, Legal mechanisms against commercial sexual exploitation of children, Tbilisi 2001.
- UNICEF (United Nations Children's Fund), The general situation of children's rights and commercial sexual exploitation of children in Georgia, in Situation analysis of women and children in Georgia, Tbilisi 2000.
- UNOCHA (United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan) Tbilisi, Georgia humanitarian situation and strategy 2003, Tbilisi 2003.
- World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, Declaration and Agenda for action, Stockholm 1996.
- Women for Future, The problem of women's trafficking in Georgia, Tbilisi 2002

MARY ELLEN CHATWIN

Iran

A review of Iranian newspapers and magazines reveals that child sexual abuse is a problem and there is a need for laws protecting victims when sexual abuse happens inside the family. Among constraints that have hindered the preparation of a national plan of action is cultural resistance to addressing the problem because the subject is largely taboo. Often the issue is dealt with more generally under headings such as “violence” and “trauma” (UNICEF 2003). Sexual violence and abuse within the family is rarely reported and children themselves are largely silent on this issue. Laws make reporting by children unlikely. Article 220 of the Iranian Penal Code recognizes only a light sentence and fine for a father who kills his child in the course of administering “educational” punishment. Early marriage with the permission of the guardian is valid provided that the interests of the ward are duly observed. According to ‘Ulyā-i Zand (2002), this could also potentially be a form of female sexual abuse.

Despite the cultural resistance and the taboo nature of the subject, there has been a recent interest in this issue due to the problem with runaway youths. Investigations show that a large number of girls run away from home because they are mistreated by their parents (Shikhāvand 2003). Many suffer sexual abuse from their father, or brothers, and out of fear of being beaten they do not dare to speak about it. Many boys between the ages of 11 and 15 are victims of pedophilia, a subject also largely taboo in this society (Shikhāvand 2003).

‘Ulyā-i Zand (2002), a prominent researcher who has done extensive work concerning prostitution in Iran, found that in a sample of 147 women prostitutes, 22.5 percent of them had been sexually abused as a child by their father, brother, step-father, friend, or neighbors. In the latest report by the Iranian Surgeon General, out of 324 reported cases of child sexual abuse, 237 were females under 15 with ages ranging from 0 to 13 (83 percent were between 11 and 13). ‘Ulyā-i Zand (2002) cites children as “the most innocent victims of sexual assault” in the society. She adds, “speaking concerning sexual abuse of children is quite hard, but keeping mum on the issue is unjust.” She also claims that studies of 99 percent of underage children who had been sexually assaulted indicate the phenomenon is more common among “lax and despotic families.” Among those interviewed, mothers had knowledge of the assault in 48 percent of child abuse cases but refused to disclose it for fear of the “despotic father’s” reaction (‘Ulyā-i Zand 2001).

In another important study by Ibrāhīmī-Qavām (1991), 39 girls and 11 boys between ages 10 and 18 who reported sexual abuse to their school official were compared with 200 adolescents with comparable socioeconomic status who had not suffered from sexual abuse. Out of these 50 adolescents, 18 had been abused by father, 7 by brother, 9 by neighbor, 4 by stranger, 5 by cousin, 1 by brother-in-law, and 4 by someone unknown. The ages at the time of abuse ranged from 4 to 15. The result indicates a significantly higher level of disturbance with respect to anxiety symptoms, social avoidance, fear of negative evaluation, physiological and psychological disturbances, and self esteem among victims of sexual abuse, especially female victims.

These scattered pieces of research indicate that there have been some attempts on the part of female scholars and advocates to discuss the issue in depth with the hope of creating laws to protect children from sexual abuse and breaking the taboo that surrounds it so that children can feel safe to report the abuse.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- 150 Children end up in Iran court daily for harassment, in Hayāt-i naw (Tehran daily), 20 November 2001.
- S. Ibrāhīmī-Qavām, Study on the level of anxiety and self esteem among victims of sexual abuse, unpublished manuscript, Tehran 1991.
- Shikhāvand, interview in Hambastigī (Tehran daily), 20 November 2001, 11.
- S. ‘Ulyā-i Zand, Unsuitable marriage. A fundamental ground for prostitution, in Journal of Scientific Research on Social Welfare 5:2 (2002), 119–41.
- UNICEF, Commercial sexual exploitation of children. The situation in the Middle East/North Africa region, Second World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, 20 October 2003, <<http://www.unicef.org/events/yokohama/background8.html>>.

MANIJEH DANESHPOUR

South Asia

In South Asia, sexuality remains a taboo topic in public discourse and, consequently, little research has been conducted on sexual abuse of adults or children. In the 1990s, three surveys conducted in Delhi and Mumbai by Sakshi, RAHI, and the Tata Institute of Social Sciences indicate that over 40 percent of young girls in India might be victims of sexual abuse. The majority of abusers are kin to their young victims and trusted individuals such as servants and family friends. Of the 800 cases of rape reported in Pakistan in 1994, 50 percent of victims were minors and only a fraction of the perpetrators were outside the girls’ families.

In South Asian Islamic cultures, chastity is considered to be a woman’s crowning glory and without it, she is worth nothing to her family and society. This dictum extends even to young girls. For a “good” girl, sexual awakening is permitted only after marriage and by her husband. Girls and women fervently internalize the social message that a virtuous female is sexually naive. This may place young girls in a difficult bind, not only in terms of defending themselves against sexual assault, but also speaking openly when such abuse occurs.

Since every sex act is considered to be a carnal deed even when coerced, a girl/woman is considered to be indirectly, if not directly, complicit in her own victimization. While Shari’a confers adulthood on boys at 18, girls become adults at menarche. Thus, underage female rape victims in Pakistan are often charged with zinā. Regardless of age, a girl is “damaged goods” if sexually violated and can almost never reclaim her former right to moral integrity and decency. Once a girl’s “sexual ruin” becomes public knowledge, she may be perceived as an open target for men within and outside her family as it is assumed that she is now valueless. A girl’s safety often rests on the impeccability of her social reputation. Many rape victims in Pakistan have been murdered to restore family honor. Consequently, parents seldom report the rape or sexual abuse of their daughters to legal authorities. Instead, mention of such violence is routinely suppressed and kept secret even from close relatives. Parallel attitudes toward and consequences for men, even perpetrators, do not seem to exist.

While perpetrators of child sexual assault could be of any class, in South Asian Islamic communities, assault might be less common among girls of middle- and upper-class families as they are rarely allowed out unescorted. Thus, class privilege provides some protection to girls against assault by strangers. Girls from poor families, who may work as maids or laborers, are exceptionally vulnerable to sexual assault by their employers or acquaintances, as they have no significant family protection to depend on.

A few other social structural conditions affect child sexual abuse in all South Asian societies. First, although the two sexes are strictly separated to ensure girls’ safety, the extended family configuration allows many men, related and unrelated, access to the family/women’s quarters. While older women stringently supervise activities of adolescent females, younger girls are given more latitude of action and movement under the assumption that their age makes them immune to unwanted sexual attention. Such relative freedom renders young girls vulnerable to abuse by acquaintances and relatives.

Since children are brought up in strict sex-segregation, even siblings and cousins who grow up in the same household scarcely get an opportunity to develop mutual friendship and companionable affection. Thus they may deem sexual relationship as the only feasible option between opposite genders. In a society where girls and women are almost universally out of reach, adolescent boys and men of all ages may be inclined to sexually exploit vulnerable young girls, whom they can control through threats and coercion.

Second, in the Islamic household the father is the leader and, although ideally both parents ought to share power, it is the father who has the ultimate authority. Accordingly, the patriarch and older men in the family expect complete respect and loyalty from all family members, especially women and girls. South Asian children are taught absolute obedience to age-superiors, which makes it difficult to defy demands from elders, especially when accompanied by threats and coercion. Compliant victims might easily be commanded to submit to sexual abuse and intimidated into silence.

Lastly, most South Asian societies vigorously deny the existence of child sexual abuse in their midst. In Islamic communities, incest takes two forms: child sexual abuse and sex in forbidden relationships such as between father-in-law and daughter-in-law. Even when mothers and other women realize that sexual abuse is occurring within the family, they may feel helpless and unable to ameliorate the situation. Economic dependence on men and the fear of social reprobation effectively gag women and keep them from supporting victims.

Regarding legal recourse for sexual violence, most South Asian nations implement a mixture of Shari’a laws and uniform legal codes for Islamic communities. Although a number of civil codes guiding marriage, divorce, and property rights follow Shari’a directives, sexual assault including rape and incest falls within the purview of the criminal legal systems. In Islamic countries such as Pakistan and Bangladesh, local community administrations frequently attempt to employ religious laws for zinā transgressions; but these have been recurrently overturned by the court systems.

Regardless of legal efficacy, social attitudes and belief systems dominate the conduct of Islamic societies in South Asia. Correspondingly, a number of social obstacles prevent girls and women from seeking legal redress for sexual violation. For instance, codes of family honor overwhelmingly prevent individuals from lodging complaints against members of their own family. The potential loss of the victim's reputation acts as further discouragement from seeking outside help. Even when victims overcome these difficulties and lodge complaints with law enforcement agencies, other extralegal obstructions arise.

The police in South Asia have been determinedly reluctant to register grievances of gender violence such as domestic violence, sexual assault, and incest. Notoriety regarding police brutality and custody rape also inhibits individuals from pursuing legal remedies. The dire lack of well trained medical personnel, appropriate facilities, and technology further impedes rigorous prosecution of sexual assault cases. The length of time taken to bring each case to trial, the insensitivity of judges and court personnel, and the enormous burden on victims to produce proof, effectively thwart efforts to bring abusers to justice.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Amnesty International, Women in Pakistan. Disadvantaged and denied their rights, New York 1995.
- , Pakistan. Violence against women in the name of honor, New York 1999.
- H. Begum, Violence in Islamic texts and its relevance to practice, in I. Mukhopadhyay (ed.), Violence against women, Kolkata, India 2002.
- A. Bouhdiba, Sexuality in Islam, trans. A. Sheridan, London 1998.
- Breaking the Silence Group, Non-commercial sexual abuse of children in Bangladesh. A case study based report, Dhaka 1997.

- A. A. Engineer, The rights of women in Islam, New York 1992.
- J. Goodwin, Price of honor. Muslim women lift the veil of silence on the Islamic world, New York 2003.
- M. A. Khan, Two case studies from a Muslim mohalla. Bigamy and incest, in Islamic Voice 14-07:163 (July 2000), <www.islamicvoice.com/july2000/law.htm>.
- U. Mazhar, Rape and incest. Islamic perspective, in Crescentlife 2002, <www.crescentlife.com/articles/rape_and_incest_islamic_perspective.htm>.
- R. Menon, Sexual abuse of children. Hidden peril, in India Today, 31 October 1992, 69-73.
- S. Moitra (ed.), Women, heritage, and violence, Calcutta 1996.
- G. Poore, The children we sacrifice. A resource book, Silver Spring, Md. 2000.
- RAHI Findings, Voices from the silent zone: Women's experiences of incest and childhood sexual abuse, New Delhi 1999, <rahisupp@del2.vsnl.net.in>.
- Rahima, Centre for Training and Information on Islam and Women's Rights Issue, The problem of incestuous rape is no longer a private problem!, interview with Husein Muhammad (n.d.), <www.rahima.or.id/English/interviews_8b.htm>.
- Rape. When victim is seen as villain, in India Abroad, 10 July 1998, 1, 30-4.
- S. Sood (ed.), Violence against women, Jaipur 1990.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- Sakshi Violence Intervention Centre, Report on a survey of 350 school children in New Delhi, India 1997, as cited in G. Poore, The children we sacrifice. A resource book, Silver Spring, Md. 2000.
- Tata Institute of Social Sciences, Report on a 1994-1995 survey of 150 school children in Mumbai, India, as cited in G. Poore, The children we sacrifice. A resource book, Silver Spring, MD 2000.

SHAMITA DAS DASGUPTA

Shah Bano Affair

Overview

In a landmark judgment delivered in April 1985, India's Supreme Court granted a small maintenance allowance to Shah Bano, a seventy-three-year-old Muslim divorcee, to be paid by her husband under the Criminal Code. Shah Bano had been married to Mohammed Ahmed Khan since 1932. Ahmed Khan married again in 1946, and in 1975, on account of property-related disputes between the two wives, Shah Bano and her children moved out from their family home; in 1978 she filed a maintenance suit against her husband in the Judicial Magistrate's Court in Indore, appealed to Section 125 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and pleaded for Rs. 500 as monthly maintenance. To avoid maintenance under this section, Khan divorced Shah Bano by irrevocable triple ṭalāq. In August 1979, the local magistrate ordered that Ahmed Khan pay her maintenance of Rs. 25 per month, which was later revised on her appeal to Rs. 179 by the Madhya Pradesh High Court. In an appeal to the Supreme Court, Ahmed Khan argued that since he had fulfilled his obligations under religious personal laws, Islamic law placed no further maintenance liability upon him; rather Section 125 conflicted with his rights under personal law.

The Supreme Court, headed by Chief Justice Chandachud, dismissed the appeal and confirmed the judgment of the Madhya Pradesh High Court. The Apex Court was asked to pronounce on the relationship between these sections of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1973 and religious personal law. The Court ruled that Section 125, as part of criminal rather than civil law, overrides all personal law and is uniformly applicable to all women, including Muslim women. The judgment was supported by detailed citations from the Qur'an, to show that a husband is obliged to provide maintenance for his divorced wife if the wife is unable to provide for herself. It also raised the question of a uniform civil code, arguing that if the constitution was to have meaning, the aspiration contained in Article 44 must be realized.

The judgment sparked off a major political uproar. Outraged by the judgment, the religious leadership, including the Jamaat-e-Islami, the Jamiat-al-Ulema and the All India Muslim Personal Law Board, spearheaded an agitation to repeal it. There was a spate of meetings, marches, and conferences all over the country to protest against the danger it posed to Muslim minority identity. The central issue in the agitation was the sanctity of religious personal law. As against this, the campaign in favor of the judgment, dominated by champions of women's rights and liberal Muslims who considered the reform of personal laws desirable, was much smaller.

To understand this controversy one has to look at the context in which it arose. The past two decades have witnessed a steep rise in communal violence and identity politics in the larger political arena. The Shah Bano affair and the unlocking of the gates of the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya in 1986 saw the growth of a massive Rama temple movement, resulting in the rapid escalation of political violence and support for the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party (which leads the National Democratic Alliance that has ruled India since 1998). The lack of any noticeable opposition among Hindus to the countrywide violence unleashed in the wake of the temple movement, compared to the outrage against the Muslim Women's (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act (MWA) of 1986, left large sections of the Muslim population feeling vulnerable. For its part, the Congress government showed no concern for Muslim feelings about the campaign against the Babri mosque, which culminated in its eventual demolition in December 1992, in contrast to the extraordinary concern for the Muslim position on the Shah Bano case.

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi sought to placate the disquiet of the religious leadership and their perception of threat to Muslim identity by enacting the MWA to override the judgment and unequivocally exclude Muslim women from the purview of the Criminal Code, to which all citizens otherwise had recourse. The principal objective of the legislation in the context of the Shah Bano controversy was: "to specify the rights which a Muslim divorced woman is entitled to at the time of her divorce and to protect her interests." Under the MWA a divorced Muslim woman is entitled to, (a) "a reasonable and fair provision of maintenance" within the period of 'idda; (b) two years' maintenance for her children; (c) her dowry and all other properties given to her by her relatives, husband, and husband's relatives. If the woman is unable to maintain herself after the 'idda period, the magistrate can order those relatives who are entitled to inherit her property to maintain her in proportion to their share of the inheritance in accordance with Islamic law. If the woman has no such relatives, the magistrate is to ask the State Wakf Board to pay maintenance. Several rulings in the state high courts have interpreted the act so as to provide Muslim women with a higher maintenance amount than was given under Section 125 and, more importantly, lump sum payments for the future security of women.

The critics of the judgment ignored the crucial question of women's rights, which remained confined to feminists and left-wing parties. The Muslim leadership focused on issues that linked women and family life to Islamic legal identity. The government defended the new legislation on the ground that it conformed to the wishes of the Muslim community and should be supported irrespective of the opinion of large sections of Muslim women, or other communities, or society at large.

Several individuals and groups challenged the constitutionality of the MWA in the Supreme Court, its violation of several articles on fundamental rights, and its discriminatory character vis-à-vis Muslim women. The verdict of the five-judge Constitutional Bench in the Latifi case delivered in 2001 confined itself to the constitutionality of the MWA, which limits Muslim women's right to maintenance to the 'idda. The court ruled that a divorced woman is entitled to a "reasonable and fair provision of maintenance" to be made and paid to her within the 'idda period by her husband. Significantly, this includes future needs. The word "provision" indicates provision in advance for meeting future needs and "reasonable and fair provision" may include provision for her residence, her food, her clothes, and other articles. The Latifi judgment is important as it provides some relief to divorced Muslim women by expanding the notion of "a reasonable and fair provision for maintenance" to include their future needs.

Two issues are central to the reform of personal laws in India. First the relationship of personal law to the state, and second, the appropriate institutions through which reform of personal laws could be organized and carried outside the arena of the state. Personal laws are discriminatory; they run counter to Article 14's guarantee of the equal protection of the laws, Article 15's prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex and also discrimination on grounds of religion, and Article 21 interpreted by the court as involving a life with human dignity. The constitution included a provision to recognize pre-constitutional laws only if they conformed to fundamental rights. Even so, all such laws were recognized and continued after the constitution came into effect and thus the courts have allowed women to be governed by the law of religion without subjecting such laws to the test of constitutionality.

Based on the principle of separation of public and private domains, the Indian state has tacitly accepted that it cannot intervene and initiate change in religious personal laws, namely, the private sphere of Muslims. There are two questions here. One is the relationship of Muslim personal law with the state. Two factors are important in analyzing this relationship: the development of Islamic jurisprudence and its role within the state. More specifically, although those engaging in the current debate over personal law cite the Qur'an in their arguments for and against reform – whether state induced or community based – what gets ignored is the fact that Islamic jurisprudence is a separate entity from the Qur'an, and is so not only because of its own relationship with the state, but also because its historical development has actually made it such. Furthermore, when combined with the power of the modern nation-state, the degree of change is limited because the moral and legal framework on which it is based is itself immutable. State initiated reform within personal law poses a problem because of the contradictory nature of Islamic law. It is also problematic not just because of who the state decides to listen to, but also because India is not a Muslim state but a secular state in which Muslims are a sizeable minority. In this situation, Muslim personal law is seen as representative of all Muslim sentiment. This diminishes its diversity and contradictoriness and perpetuates the myth of a single Muslim personal law, and considers changes in personal law in other Muslim countries as irrelevant. It becomes clear then that Indian Muslims see themselves and are seen as Muslims of a particular demographic and historical setting, and it follows that Muslim personal law does not involve Muslims per se, but specifically Muslims in India.

The second and more complicated question is whether the Indian state, through its courts and parliament, can initiate social reform in the same way as these institutions had intervened to change Hindu family laws. The Muslim leadership has not spurned state intervention altogether. Indeed state intervention was desired to encode and enforce restrictive and repressive laws; it was equally favored as the agency for legal reform of personal laws. Ashraf ‘Alī Thānawī, a leading Islamic scholar/reformer in the 1930s worked with Muslim converts in Punjab and Central India to eradicate non-Islamic and pre-Islamic practices, which subsequently led to the Shariat Act of 1937. He engaged in the same political and legislative activity to find Islamic precedent for Muslim women to seek divorce, which subsequently led to the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act, 1939. While Thānawī was sharply critical of the “state’s” treatment of Muslim personal law, it was this institution that he approached first to rectify its legal misperceptions. The critics of the Shah Bano judgment approached the state in the same way. Even though the state is often blamed for interpreting and misinterpreting religious laws, its critics have invariably appealed to it. Religious and political leaders are not completely opposed to state intervention when it is advantageous to them. These laws become off-limits only when they concern judicial scrutiny and reform in favor of women’s rights.

For a long time after independence, the standard liberal-modernist and feminist narratives demanded the abolition of personal laws and the institution of a uniform civil code on liberal grounds of equal rights for women. This argument called for reforms from above on the initiative of the state much the same way as reforms were introduced within Hinduism in the mid-1950s. Pitted against them were the conservative communitarians who demanded strict maintenance of separate personal laws for each religious group. However, the modernist and feminist positions have changed in part because of their appropriation by Hindu nationalists and also because of the Muslim perception of external threat to their religious identity and culture prompted by the dramatic growth of the Hindu right and its ambition to establish a singular citizenship through an eradication of the legal recognition of community differences. This has meant a less secure environment for minorities, especially Muslims. But, more importantly, the assertion of Hindu identity is taking place through a renewed emphasis on Muslim identity as obscurantist and fundamentalist. Given that Hindu nationalism has now become a powerful political force, many feminists feel rather uncomfortable with the demand for state-initiated personal law reform, considering that the call for uniform laws could turn into a device to attack minorities. In view of this, a reformist position in which personal laws need internal reform, not outright rejection, has gathered support since the early 1990s.

Ideally, the initiative for change of personal laws should come from within the community, which can better define the scope, institutional location, and justification for reform. However, the basic problem is the absence of authoritative institutional structures within the Muslim community that can undertake this difficult project. In the last few years women’s groups, principally Muslim women’s organizations, have mobilized in favor of the internal reform project. They have addressed their reformist appeal to the ‘ulamā’ and at the same time made efforts to influence public opinion. In October 2000 and April 2001 the Muslim Personal Law Board, a male-dominated body of over 150 Muslim clerics held meetings in Bangalore and New Delhi concerning the problems of Muslim women in the light of the Shari‘a. For the first time Muslim women and religious clerics shared a common platform to discuss issues of Muslim personal laws. Both meetings witnessed Muslim women raising their voice in favor of change and the religious clerics dodging the issue by blaming unjust religious practices on the distortions in Muslim samaj or society, which needs reform, rather than personal laws as such.

Yet all these initiatives have not had the effect of promoting reform because the conditions for meaningful dialogue are wanting. This is due mainly to the multiplicity and heterogeneity of the community, which makes the emergence of a resolute leadership of the entire community very difficult. The Muslim community is diverse, heterogeneous, and hierarchical, with no identifiable institution and agencies with the requisite power and legitimacy to interpret and undertake reform. What counts as the leadership of the community is an artifact of power. Governmental policy in the Shah Bano case played right into the hands of powerful religious leaders who do not consult women. It bolstered the existing power structure of the community and accepted the clergy as the sole spokesmen and allowed them to define any potential change in the Muslim community’s practices as a distortion of religiously sanctioned practices. Moreover, the external environment is not conducive to modernization owing to the insecurity in which most Muslims live. The majority within the Muslim community, which most likely supports reform, is unable to overcome its defensiveness toward external and internal pressures on the community.

In this situation the Latifi judgment is a step forward in the road to equality between the sexes because it provides a predominantly social, rather than religious, grounding for maintenance provisions. By interpreting the provisions of the MWA in a manner that enhances rights of women by taking into account gender disparities and social conditions, the court adopted a socially based reading that can further constitutional goals and can bring personal laws in line with equality and justice.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

R. Baird, Religion and law in independent India, New Delhi 1993.

Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, New Delhi 1994.

P. Jeffery and A. Basu, Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1999.

R. Kapur (ed.), Feminist terrains in legal domains. Interdisciplinary essays on women and law in India, New Delhi 1996.

A. Parasher, Women and family law reform in India. Uniform civil code and gender equality, New Delhi 1992.

Women's Action and Resource Unit, Muslim women speak. Testimonies of women, Ahmedabad, 2000.

ZOYA HASAN

Social Hierarchies: Modern

East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific

INTRODUCTION

A multi-faceted web of classes, states, ethnicities, social statuses, property rights, ranks (seniority), and kinship hierarchy shapes, to varying degrees, the construction of gender and women's lives throughout the developing world. Added to this complexity are worldwide forces such as globalization, feminism, the Charter of the United Nations, and Islamization. The combination of these local and global forces has generated a new image of women as progressive, modern, and industrial, and yet confined by the persistence of traditional and local cultures. In view of these changes, this entry describes the competing powers of local institutions and global forces that mold the constitution of gender and the construction of modern social hierarchies and examines their impact on women's experiences in East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific Islands.

WOMEN AND GENDER IN EAST ASIA

Although women's lives and experience in East Asia are far from unitary, the resilience of Confucianism and the underlying construction of social, political, and daily practices shape Chinese, Korean, Taiwanese and Hong Kong women's choices, opportunities and lives. Similarly, the industrializing economics, social change, and political transformation do not set women free from the unshackled patriarchal demands of family obligations, the bearing of male children, and the support of the men in the family. At the same time, women also struggle with their own personal choices (Chiang 2000, 243, Hampson 2000, 170, Tang et al. 2000, 189). In the Chinese post-Mao era and with the escalating unemployment, state ideology shifted into a discourse of the ideal modern "Eastern woman" (dongfang funü) – as distinct from the ideal Western woman whose merit lies in her career – who is professional, while still remaining a "virtuous wife and good mother" (xiangi liangmu) (Hooper, 187–9). Like their sisters, Japanese women have never fully abandoned the patriarchal view of the ideal "good wife, wise mother" (ryosai kenbo) that persists from the days of Meiji state ideology. The fundamental concept of women as nurturers and reproducers both in the domestic and public spheres continues to persist because of numerous factors, such as gendered upbringing, education, corporate structure, state ideology, media and consumer culture (Tipton 2000, 210, 225).

The same is true for Muslim women in East Asian society, forced as they are to diversify their strategies in order to achieve the ideal of balancing their role as good wives and caretakers of the household and their reality as members of a minority (Pillsbury 1978, 657–65, Jaschock and Shui 2000, 28). East Asian Muslims are not nearly as concerned about producing male offspring as they are about giving the children a good education and bringing them up as Muslims. Women are usually in charge taking care of the household, educating the children, and providing halāl (licit and clean) foods, whereas men are breadwinners and the heads of the families. While Chinese Muslim women's full commitment to become good wives and mothers limits their full participation in the public realm, except in women's mosques and social organizations, their sisters in Taiwan find the need to contribute to the family finance (Pillsbury 1978, 666). Both, however, face a restricted mobility, not because of seclusion or strict veiling practices, but due to the fact that they are members of a minority group.

WOMEN AND GENDER IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

Southeast Asian culture appears to attribute greater equality to men and women (Errington 1990, 3). The high status that women generally enjoy is largely due to a social organization based on bilateral kinship, making for no apparent preference for male over female (Robinson 2000, 143). Ideally, a family is happy to have both a son and a daughter; daughters alone are, however, equally welcome. As parents grow older, they usually allow the daughters to stay with them or inherit the house. This arrangement is possible within bilateral kinship and its variations are found in Java, Sunda, South Sulawesi, the matrilineal society of Minangkabau in Sumatra, and Thailand (Dube 1997, 7, Robinson 2000, 143, Limanonda 2000, 248–61, Puntarigivat 2001, 233). In other societies, especially in the greater part of Sumatra, Bali, Vietnam, and Singapore, the kinship relation is more patriarchal in that wives usually move in with their husbands' families, prior to renting or owning their own houses.

However, the bilateral, matrilineal, and uxori-local mechanism does not directly bestow equality in the sense that men and women are equal in every respect. The cultural construction of gender in most of Southeast Asia is still rooted in dapu[r] (kitchen), sumu[r] (well), and kasu[r] (bed); even if women enjoy greater financial autonomy, careers, education, inheritance, and mobility, they are still burdened with the task of maintaining the household in their parents' house and later in their husband's household. The ideal of a woman's total devotion to family is also echoed in the state regulations. The Malaysian, Indonesian, and Singaporean governments emphasize the model of the ideal harmonious Asian family where the man is head of the family and the woman head of the household (Stevens 1998a, 103, Robinson 2000, 141). Thai culture even encourages the daughter's devotion to the family. Since women have no religious role, they must perform "filial piety" by relieving the parents of their household tasks or economic needs, even by means of prostitution (Puntarigivat 2001, 229). The image of ideal wife and mother also emerged in Vietnam during the renovation (dong moi) era, especially in the 1980s and 1990s, when women were forced back into the domestic sphere (Fahey 1998, 244).

The unequal status existing between men and women clearly shows that the cultural construction of power and privilege in societies is not equally distributed. Unlike the Western construction of power, which lies in economic control and coercive power, the Southeast Asian construction depends on "spiritual power and effective potency" (Errington 1990, 5). Apart from this tangible measure, kinship relations, seniority, nobility, education, wealth, occupation, and social standing affect a person's status in the society (Brenner 2000, 139). A woman's control over economic resources by means of managing the husband's wealth, inheritance, or personal earnings and their power over the household does not lend her any higher status. However, a woman's blood or spousal relation to powerful men with cultural refinement, spiritual potency, or respected political status can indirectly lead to plenty of privileges being granted to her.

The inequality between men and women in Southeast Asia is often religiously derived. In a predominantly Buddhist country such as Thailand, the notion of the dutiful and virtuous wife originates in the Anguttara Nikaya, where Buddha equates women's power to her ability to manage household along with other virtues, such as confidence, charity, and wisdom (Puntarigivat 2001, 219). In countries where Confucianism is widespread, such as Singapore and Vietnam, the good wife is seen as keeping the society upright. Similarly, the traditional role of a woman, that is, to be obedient to her parents and later to her husband and to be responsible for the household and caring for the family, finds its justification in predominantly Muslim countries (such as Malaysia, Indonesia, and Brunei) in the Qur'an (4:34). The higher status enjoyed by men over women is derived from the view that men are the primary and women the secondary creation and that men receive more privileges with respect to matters of inheritance and divorce.

Muslim feminists, womanists, and male advocates for women's rights object to the subordination of women through the institution of sexist religious doctrines. They urge Muslims to reinterpret the Qur'an and understand it within the context of the mission of human beings as God's vicegerents, who will receive either reward or punishment depending on their good deeds in this world, and from the perspective of Islam as a complete system for both men and women. However, the very notion of Islam as a complete system itself generates heated debate in the forum of Islamic revivalism, which regards an Islamic state based on the Shari'a as the ideal solution to all such problems – a view current among minorities in Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, and the Philippines.

WOMEN AND GENDER IN AUSTRALIA

Although Australia is a melting pot of the diverse Aboriginal cultures and the white English-speaking and non-English-speaking immigrants, it is primarily dominated by Anglo-Celtic, post-European culture. On gaining commonwealth status in 1901 as a federation of the former British colonies, the new state committed itself to the "White Australia Policy," which excluded non-Europeans, including early Afghan Muslim settlers, from citizenship (Johns and Saeed 2002, 198). When Australia grew more open to Muslim immigration, it applied an assimilationist policy to integrate the immigrants into Anglo-Celtic Australia (Bulbeck 1998, 193). However, with the abolition of the policy in the 1970s and a boom in immigration from non-European and non-Christian countries, Australia introduced a new policy called multiculturalism, which recognized the immigrant heritage while adjusting to a new culture and environment.

Given the multicultural background of Australian citizens, the construction of gender varies depending on the society to which a woman belongs. Among the predominantly Anglo-Celtic Australian feminists, a liberal attitude prevails in ensuring women's freedom from violence in the private sphere and their access to the public sphere (Bulbeck 1998, 8). These feminists often apply the same yardstick to Australian women of non-English speaking background, insisting that they too should be speaking, autonomous, authoritative subjects in both the private and public spheres.

Women's authority within non-English speaking communities, however, operates somewhat differently from that of Anglo-Celtic Australian women. Among Aborigines, for example, a woman's authority increases as she ages, even though this authority is never fully equal to that of a man (White 1974, 37). While women's authority in many aspects of life (such as economic matters, the betrothal ceremony, and religious ritual) is never formally acknowledged or equal by Western standards, women do take a role in influencing and supporting male decisions. The only aspects over which women take full in charge are those linked to major life events, such as menstruation, pregnancy, and childbirth, which is performed in secrecy and without male attendance. Women's authority is thus more informal, and it increases or decreases depending on age, the husband-wife relation, the parent-child relation, kinship, and economic power (Berndt 1974, 67-70).

Many non-Anglo-Celtic Australians are Muslim women who migrated to Australia along with their families or were born in Australia. As their immigration status is closely related to that of the family, gender-based definitions operate within that unit, especially among married women who choose to maintain the household and take care of the children in order to educate them properly (Yasmeen 2002, 220-1). Women's full engagement with the family, the division of labor within the family, their lack of education, the language barrier, the wearing of the hijab, and stereotypical images of Muslim women among Anglo-Celtic Australians as subordinate all restrict Muslim women's participation in the public sphere (Yasmeen 2002, 224-7, Rozario 1998, 654). This limited participation, however, like their marginal status as immigrants, is not restricted to Muslim women, but is common among women with a non-English speaking backgrounds as well.

WOMEN AND GENDER IN THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

As in Australia, the social hierarchies that shape the construction of gender and women's lives in the Pacific Islands are far from homogeneous. Colonization, self-government, the flow of urbanization, employment, and the demand for cash cropping are the contending issues that alter realities in the Pacific Islands and women's lives in general (Marsh 1998, 666). Despite the changes that these have entailed, indigenous cultures still have an effect on women's lives. Among the Anganen of the Southern Highlands Province of Papua New Guinea, for instance, men enjoy a higher status than women. Male territoriality, patrilocality, patrilineality, virilocality, and clanship support a social order in which wives provide the bride-price for their exchange, are separated from their natal kinfolk and are totally absorbed into their husbands' clans (Merrett-Balkos 1998, 233). By contrast, in societies where there are few differences between matrilineality and patrilineality, such as in the Solomon Islands, the status of women as "breeders and feeders" increases their self-reliance (Bulbeck 1998, 124). In short, the hierarchical social system affects the way men and women relate in their daily lives, ritual practice, public roles, and access to opportunities.

CONCLUSION

While the social hierarchies that shape women and gender in East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific are far from unitary given the vast geographical extent of this region, their diverse cultures, and the varying degree of external pressures, they share one thing in common: traditional norms that preserve the prevailing image of women as reproducers and nurturers and maintain the entrenched notion of the sexual division of labor. Yet while these traditions will continue to exert their influence on women, progress toward gender equality will continue to flourish, as more women become involved in policy-making that affects women's choices and national development.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. H. Berndt, Digging sticks and spears, or the two-sex model, in F. Gale (ed.), Women's role in Aboriginal society, Canberra 1974, 64-84.
- S. A. Brenner, Why women rule the roost. Rethinking Javanese ideologies of gender and self control, in C. B. Brettell and C. F. Sargent (eds.), Gender in cross-cultural perspective, Upper Saddle River, N.J. 2000, 135-56.
- C. Bulbeck, Re-orienting Western feminism, Cambridge 1998.
- L. N. Chiang, Women in Taiwan. Linking economic prosperity and women's progress, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 229-46.
- Confucius, The analects (Lun yü), trans. and intro. D. C. Lau, New York 1979.

- L. Dube, Women and kinship. Perspectives on gender in South and South-East Asia, Tokyo 1997.
- L. Edwards, Women in the People's Republic of China. New challenges to the grand gender narrative, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 59–84.
- S. Fahey, Vietnam's women in the renovation era, in K. Shen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998, 222–49.
- M. Ferguson, Women and religion, Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1995.
- S. Hampson, Rhetoric or reality? Contesting definitions of women in Korea, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 170–87.
- B. Hooper, Flower vase and the housewife. Women and consumerism in post-Mao China, in K. Shen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998, 167–93.
- M. Jaschok and Shui, J. J., The history of women's mosques in Chinese Islam. A mosque of their own, London 2000.
- A. H. Johns and A. Saeed, Muslims in Australia. The building of a community, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim minorities in the West. Visible and invisible, New York 2002, 195–216.
- B. Limanonda, Exploring women's status in contemporary Thailand, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 247–64.
- S. T. Marsh, Migrating feminisms. Maligned overstayer or model citizen, in Women's Studies International Forum 21:6 (1998), 665–80.
- L. Merrett-Balkos, Just add water. Remaking women through childbirth, Anganen, Southern Highlands, Papua New Guinea, in K. Ram and M. Jolly (eds.), Maternities and modernities. Colonial and postcolonial experiences in Asia and the Pacific, Cambridge 1998, 213–38.
- B. L. K. Pillsbury, Being female in a Muslim minority in China, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Muslim women in the Muslim world, Cambridge 1978, 651–73.
- T. Puntarigivat, A Thai Buddhist perspective, in J. C. Raines and D. C. Maguire (eds.), What men owe to women, Albany, N.Y. 2001, 211–37.
- K. Robinson, Indonesian women. From Orde Baru to Reformasi, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 139–69.
- S. Rozario, On being Australian and Muslim. Muslim women as defenders of Islamic heritage, in Women's Studies International Forum 21:6 (1998), 649–61.
- M. Stivens, Sex, gender and the making of the new Malay middle class, in K. Shen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998a, 89–126.
- , Theorizing gender, power, and modernity in affluent Asia, in K. Shen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998b, 1–32.
- C. Tang, W. T. Au, Y. P. Chung, and N. Y. Ngo, Breaking the patriarchal paradigm. Chinese women in Hong Kong, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 188–207.
- E. K. Tipton, Being women in Japan, 1970–2000, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalization, Ann Arbor 2000, 208–28.
- I. M. White, Aboriginal women's status. A paradox resolved, in F. Gale (ed.), Women's role in Aboriginal society, Canberra 1974, 36–46.
- S. Yasmin, Muslim women as citizens in Australia. Perth as a case study, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim minorities in the West. Visible and invisible, New York 2002, 217–32.

ETIN ANWAR

The Gulf and Yemen

The oil economies of many of the Gulf emirates and states have undoubtedly had an impact on social hierarchies. The shifts in social hierarchies, however, should not be seen as simply transforming from “traditional” to “modern.” Indeed, local practices and social organization, such as tribal affiliation, have both accommodated and been remobilized by new state bureaucratic systems. Nevertheless, the dramatic transformation in the region's economy – from subsistence agriculture and pastoralism to rentier – has certainly affected how hierarchies are both produced and maintained. Similarly, it should be noted that while some of the Gulf emirates and states, such as Abu Dhabi and Kuwait, have substantially more oil than others, the others, such as Yemen and Bahrain – especially through trade and remittances – are not exempt from the dramatic transformations wrought by oil, forming what some scholars have argued to be an integrated regional economy (Owen 1985). Oil revenues and the structure of the oil market, however, have not affected social hierarchies on their own: notions of “tradition” as well as national education systems, enabled by oil revenues, are also seen to have transformed social and gendered hierarchies (al-Falah 1991).

Although what might be understood as traditional and modern hierarchies might not necessarily correspond to the shifts in how certain identities have come to matter in the post-oil era, there have, nevertheless, been changes in how hierarchies are produced and reproduced. To understand the ways hierarchies have transformed, it is important to examine hierarchies in the early days of oil and the establishment of the modern states. In Bahrain, for example, hierarchies in the late 1960s, at least, were reproduced primarily through profession or craft (Serjeant 1968), sometimes intersecting with tribal affiliations. As in a caste system, certain professions (such as butcher, tailor, barber, carpenter, office worker, agricultural worker, poultry dealer, pearl diver) were relegated to the lower strata of society while other professions were preserved for the upper strata (Bujra 1971). This division of professions was and is important for men as well as women. At the same time, according to Serjeant, the main social cleavage in Bahraini society was between what were considered the “Arabs of tribal descent,” who are Sunnīs, and the Shīī Bahārna, while in Southwest Arabia – in Oman and Yemen (although also mentioned in Kuwaiti literature) – a distinction might be found between a variety of ethnic identities as well as the tribal, Arab, or Bayasira (Wilkinson 1974).

Lienhardt (1972) who wrote of the Trucial States in the 1960s suggests that the strict sex segregation of the society accounts for the lower status of women. Nevertheless, he wrote, men were not as dominant in society as they claimed to be and one of the reasons for their limited dominance, especially in the practices of divorce, was that the Trucial States are influenced by Beduin rather than peasant society, the mobile rather than settled. Lienhardt’s description of the status of women in the early days of development and oil, however, also suggests that although women maintained the honor of the family and often had its support and protection, they had – as they intersected with the statuses of their “ethnic” or “caste” positions – less access to wealth, power, and prestige.

In contrast, it has been argued that the oil economies of the region have enabled the expansion of national education systems which, in turn, have produced greater equality between men and women in the professional labor market, countering the practices of “traditional patriarchal societies” (al-Falah 1991). However, the transformation of the economies, bureaucratic regimes, and education systems has also produced new gendered hierarchies, based not only on new class formations, but also on national and ethnic identities and stratifications. Indeed, despite the formal “modern” education of Gulf populations, relatively few women enter the labor market, leaving most positions to Arabs of other nationalities or to Europeans, Iranians, and Indians (Longva 1993, Seikaly 1994). And, while some of the Gulf emirates and states have promoted the hiring of local populations, other policies that encourage women to be good housewives seem to discourage local women’s entrance to the labor market. Thus, although greater wealth has given women in the Gulf a fair amount of independence, many – sometimes in the name of “tradition” – have not entered the labor market, leaving both government and private employment to men as well as a hierarchy of expatriate workers. Similarly, while it seems as though the new hierarchies are more based on wealth rather than profession and patrilineal descent, marriage between members of historically professionally and ethnically distinct groups remains limited.

Finally, it should be noted that town and village social networks among women, often across different status groups, continue to remain strong. And, as men move to capital areas and the city-states of the Gulf, women generally remain in the towns and villages, sometimes complementing their remittance incomes with small-scale trade. However, as men in unstable labor markets lose their jobs, they return to the towns and villages, sometimes creating tensions with the women who have remained.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Bujra, The politics of stratification. A study of political change in a South Arabian town, Oxford 1971.
- N. al-Falah, Power and representation. Social change, gender relations, and the education of women in Kuwait, in E. Davis and N. Gavrielides (eds.), Statecraft in the Middle East, Miami 1991, 149–75.
- P. A. Lienhardt, The position of women in the society of the Trucial Coast, in D. Hopwood (ed.), The Arabian Peninsula, London 1972, 219–30.
- A. N. Longva, Kuwaiti women at a crossroads. Privileged development and the constraints of ethnic stratification, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 25:3 (1993), 443–56.
- R. Owen, The Arab oil economy. Present structure and future prospects, in S. K. Farsoun (ed.), Arab society. Continuity and change, London 1985, 16–33.
- M. Seikaly, Women and social change in Bahrain, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 26:3 (May 1994), 415–26.
- R. B. Serjeant, Fisher-folk and fish traps in al-Bahrain, in Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 31:3 (1968), 486–514.
- J. C. Wilkinson, Bayasirah and bayadir, in Arabian Studies 1 (1974), 75–85.

MANDANA LIMBERT

North Africa

The hierarchies that characterize the social landscape of North Africa today are the outcome of profound changes triggered by colonial institutions beginning in the early nineteenth century. Since 1830, when the French first entered Algeria, North African social organization and stratification have been modified by new roles and functions open to women. However, before discussion of how the present reality slowly emerged, it is important to place it in its larger cultural and historical context.

The three nation-states (Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco) that constitute the geographical area of North Africa share a number of characteristics making the claim of a single cultural area possible. They have in common, for example, the following elements: an ethnic-linguistic component in the form of Berber and Arab populations as well as mixed Berber/Arab groups; the experience of Islam as one religion and the adoption of the Sunnī rite, with its own interpretation and legislation of reality; and, later, the French colonial experience with its linguistic, organizational, and institutional characteristics.

Although these strong connections illustrate a shared imaginary and role attribution according to gender and age, there are still limitations that complicate the description of these three nation-states as a unified culture. First, there exist within each nation-state extremely varied communities: urban, semi-urban, rural, and other (tribal nomads, for example, though to a lesser extent in Tunisia). These each have their own internal hierarchies and predispositions/resistance to accepting change to their social structures. Second, the political model each country adopted after its independence from France differs from the others in many ways. In 1956 Morocco laid claim to an institutional monarchy, while Tunisia adopted a liberal economic regime headed by the then-maverick Bourguiba. Then in 1961 Algeria adopted a socialist regime based on a single party model (Front de libération nationale).

The post-independence political management of existing social and economic structures in these three countries consequently wrought different changes. The remainder of this entry focuses on two elements as start points for a discussion of these changes: first, it examines the common imaginary structures in premodern North Africa; second, it looks at the formal, official structures of the post-independence era.

In premodern North Africa, women rarely stood as individuals or possessed an independent status; rather, they were always defined relationally. As we know through historical treatises and early colonial ethnographies, women were invested with symbolic values that made them, more often than not, objects of the culture rather than its subjects. In any given social setting, the social standing of a woman was defined by four determining elements: the larger net of kinship with whom and by which she is identified (namely, her consanguineous kin, those of simulated kinship, and those built through marriage); property or possession of goods (even if the woman does not lay actual claim to the property proper because she is married outside her kin group); her fertility and especially her capacity for bearing sons; and finally, for lack of a proper expression, the “cultural capital” stemming from her own general behavior and her group’s ascribed status of social importance, honor, and/or religiosity.

“Cultural capital” means the political role or leadership position from which a woman may originate that gives her a distinguished social status, as in the example of sharīf families, descendants of the Prophet who have strongly influenced the history of North Africa. Women lived with and evolved within vertical links of dependence, whether of their kin group, their in-laws, or both. The modes of relationships were largely predetermined by these external elements and only rarely were there women who could effectively, though positively, separate themselves from these traditional structures. A woman’s status could only be defined by and via her kinship relations, and not through her being an individual in her own right, as exemplified by women prostitutes who had forsaken (or were forced to break from) the dominant social structures in a negative way – as morality would define it.

An important number of elements played rather positively in the emergence of what is identified today as modern social hierarchy, a term that implies social mobility: a relatively more progressive understanding of social regulations; the consideration of merit as a criterion of social mobility; and, generally, a stratification that differs both in scale and function from the older one. These elements may be separated into two clusters: one set that is conjectural but has a profound bearing on the structural level, and a set that is more internal and inevitable. The latter stems from a cultural logic and patterns of accommodation to external pressures necessary for the survival of any group under a centralized political power.

Concerning the conjectural cluster of effects, three factors should be stressed: the birth and spread of nationalist ideology, which recognized, in some sense, a woman’s “subject-hood”; high population growth due to medical progress that led to mass migration and, to varying degrees, a break with traditional ways; and the development (slow especially in the case of Tunisia and Morocco) of an industrial infrastructure that gave rise to important population movements and social reorganization that both indirectly and, at times, directly challenged traditional statuses and roles. An important result of these changes was the emergence of social classes (and especially the middle class).

Throughout the formative years following political independence, these social classes would become a dominant principle in understanding North African social organizations and political institutions. The remaining internal processes, such as education, access to salaried labor, and “a possibility of corporeal freedom,” have also played extremely decisive roles in engendering new social roles and statuses for North African women.

Historical processes distributed political and economic power unevenly throughout the North African region under consideration; however, thanks to mass education and access to wage labor, women (either as active agents or as agents unconsciously drawn into this overwhelming current) contributed to the erosion of the traditional cultural definition that they were only relational beings. All three countries adopted an open and free-of-charge schooling system, a democratic institution par excellence, that offered the same education to girls and boys alike. Although the number of illiterate women is still relatively high in all three countries, especially in rural, southern, or mountainous areas, an important number of women who studied in schools, universities, and institutes were able to change the professional profile of their countries and, therefore, be defined by their professions and their individual achievements. Though this route of education was first paved, and often appropriated, by elite urban women, women of migrant origin or of "lower" social status were later able to reap the benefits of education. This effect is seen especially in the case of Algeria during its heyday of socialism and state services.

A notably more important number of women have had access to wage labor which has turned them into productive agents within their immediate environments. By contributing to and benefiting from this market economy, women today are able to accumulate and consume goods, activities that have ostensibly altered their ascribed status as primarily consumers (though they were always also producers, but in ways society considered natural). The values and characteristics attributed to women have therefore changed. When entering into marital alliances, for instance, in all three urban cultures attention was given not only to the women's cultural capital but also to their financial contributions and the commodities they were able to harness.

Although women's rank and standings have changed from a relational and largely passive role definition to a more active model in economic and sociopolitical terms, such a transformation does not mean that the entire structure of cultural meaning has changed. This quasi-autonomy of women, the spread of consumer culture, and the more recent revisions of family laws (in Morocco and those proposed for Algeria) have had the ill-fated effect of whetting the conservative, if not rigid, societal patterns that embrace the idea of male supremacy under the pretense of religious authenticity. What started as a political contestation by the Islamist movement during the early 1980s in North Africa has practically permeated all social segments and realities. Women's access to public space, to salaried labor, and to political representation, all of which were instrumental in opening a new era for women in the aftermath of independence, are nowadays in dispute.

As often illustrated in the case of Tunisia, where women have more legal rights even while they are socially and culturally disfavored, the same pattern of two divergent perspectives prevails in North Africa: that is, a discursive and official one that sees women's contribution to society as a motor of development and equity, and a more reality-oriented view that is increasingly pulled toward a conservative trend that imprisons women in their biological role. This reigning mentality, which the women themselves uphold, and the effects of the immediate history of women's contribution to the public space, reflect the beleaguered values that define North African social spaces today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Charrad, The state and women's rights. The making of postcolonial Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco, Berkeley 2001.
- J. Clancy-Smith (ed.), North Africa, Islam and the Mediterranean world. From the Almoravids to the Algerian war, Portland, Ore. 2001.
- S. Ferchiou (ed.), Hasab wa nasab. Parenté, alliance et patrimoine en Tunisie, pref. F. Héritier-Augé, Paris 1992.
- P. Knauss, The persistence of patriarchy. Class, gender, ideology in twentieth-century Algeria, New York 1987.
- V. Maher, Women and property in Morocco, New York 1974.

JAMILA BARGACH

Stereotypes

Afghanistan

Afghan women remain at the crossroads of different kinds of stereotyping. The sex/gender system practiced exemplifies “ineluctable patriarchy” and necessitates that young girls marry into large families, gain respect primarily by bearing sons, and later in life obtain power as mothers-in-law. Seclusion of women from all males excepting the mahārim (acceptable male guardians) through a system of purdah (seclusion) is widely practiced while most women are required to wear a burqa (veil) in public. This kind of seclusion is regarded as crucial to the family’s honor and pride. Afghan society regards women as the perpetrators of the ideals of the society, symbolizing honor of the family, community, and the nation. Scholars have attributed Afghan patriarchy to the mode of production based on nomadic pastoralism and settled agriculture, all constituted patrilineally (Riphenburg 2003). Women and children are often incorporated into the idea of property belonging to a single male. This is especially true of the Pashtuns (the largest ethnic group) whose tribal code is masculine.

It is also widely believed that women must be controlled and protected so as to maintain moral purity. A large section of conservatives also consider women socially immature with less moral control and physical restraint than men, and hence untrustworthy. Such attitudes lead to “generic” stereotyping – not specifically related to Islam – that Afghan women are alienated, incapable of decision-making, subjugated, and inferior to their male counterpart. Other characteristics that are directly related to Islamic tenets, such as the Prophet’s wives’ behavior as representing the ideal, subordinate, and domestic roles for women, upholding of polygamy for men, and marriage and motherhood being the only opportunities for women, lead to “sectorial” stereotypes. This kind of stereotype relies on essential and cultural views of Islam and harps on generalizations that Muslim women have more children, are ignorant, and do not have access to the outside world because they belong to a particular culture.

Discourses on Afghan women have also stressed the centrality of women in Afghan society. This contradicts the stereotype of Afghan women living lives of unremitting labor, valued by men solely for sexual and reproductive services. Many stress respect for women as an important value that cannot be undermined. There is also a fine line of difference with regard to private and public roles of women. Some claim that there is a noticeable sharing of ideas and responsibilities in many households and sometimes individual charisma and strength of character surmount conventional subordinate roles. Public image is very important, requiring urban women to be models of reticence and rural women to be properly submissive. Any digression from prescribed roles can lead to moral condemnation and social ostracism. Elphinstone’s accounts (1815) indicate that although women did not have a large role to play outside their homes, they had an important position within their homes and did have a right to socialize. However they had to cover themselves when in public to maintain chastity and modesty. This hardly produced any feeling of confinement.

Among the rural, nomadic, and some ethnic groups, such as the Nuristani, digressions from the stereotypical role are often found. They do not observe purdah. Rural women often participate in agricultural activities and also specialize in handicrafts such as carpet- and felt-making. In contrast, Nuristani women plow the fields while men herd the flocks and process dairy products. Nomadic women take care of their cattle and prepare dairy products. Felt- and rug-making are also part of female activity. Urban women joined the workforce in large numbers during the Communist period (from 1978) and the majority of them were professionals; technicians and administrators employed by the government provided appropriate support. Health and education were the two sectors where they participated most, probably because they were extensions of the traditional roles of women. However some also worked for the police, army, and airlines and also in government and private industries.

The way the West perceives Afghan women is largely dependent on international political developments. This leads to a mixture of misperceptions and flawed judgments. They are classified as women belonging to members of a particular group (Afghan as well as Muslim) and hence stereotypical inferences are drawn, resulting in faulty generalizations. During the Taliban regime Afghan women were stereotyped as alienated and subjugated with no rights. Although primarily true, what the West chose to ignore was the atrocities committed on women by the previous regime and also the lack of security in the post-Taliban Karzai regime. The perception of Afghan women in the Karzai period is significantly that of a liberated and publicly active group. Such conclusions stem from lack of knowledge about Afghan social norms and problems of transitional countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Amnesty International, Women in Afghanistan. A human rights catastrophe, 1995, <<http://www.amnesty.org/ailib/intcam/afgan/afgtoc.htm>>.

United Nations, Economic and Social Council, Report of the Secretary-General on the situation of women and girls in Afghanistan, 21 July 2000, E/CN.4/Sub.2/2000/18, <http://www.unhchr.ch/Huridocda/Huridoca.nsf/\(Symbol\)/4f3b6f16c0088a70c125694d0053823a?OpenDocument/4f3b6f16c0088a70c125694d0053823a?OpenDocument)>.

SECONDARY SOURCES

M. Elphinstone, An account of the kingdom of Caubul and its dependencies in Persia, Tartary and India, London 1815, Karachi 1972³.

J. L. Esposito, Introduction. Women in Islam and Muslim societies, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender and social change, Oxford 1998, ix–xxviii.

C. J. Rippenburg, Gender relations and development in a weak state, in Central Asian Survey 22:2/3 (June–September 2003), 187–207.

ARPITA BASUROY

Canada

Ethnically and socially diverse, Canadian Muslims enjoy legal equality regarding citizenship, religious practice, and institution building, yet experience prejudice and religious intolerance that is rooted in twentieth-century racially structured immigration policy, reinforced by Canadian and American media portrayals, and centered on images of male violence (particularly to Muslim women) that legitimize Western political motives.

The extent to which Muslim Canadians differ in their informal identification and formal affiliation with coreligionists makes it problematic to speak of a single Canadian Muslim community. Canada's 2001 national census revealed that roughly 580,000 Canadians, nearly 2 percent of the population, are Muslim. It is essential to acknowledge the diversity of this population so as to recognize the multiple forms of bias and prejudice against Muslims: religious intolerance, racism, and xenophobia. In fact, 86 percent of Canadian Muslims identify as members of visible minority groups, and 72 percent indicate that they were born outside Canada. Of the total Canadian Muslim population, 46 percent immigrated to Canada between 1991 and 2001, including 30 percent who immigrated between 1996 and 2001. The largest ethnic groups are South Asian (37 percent) and Arab (21 percent).

Quotas imposed on non-European immigrants between 1891 and 1962 demonstrate structural racial prejudice that affected Muslim populations; immigrant-sending countries were arranged hierarchically according to desirability, with Syria (Canada's primary sender of Muslim immigrants) ranked next to last (Kelly 1998, 86). Yet, notwithstanding varying degrees of religious intolerance and racial prejudice (particularly associated with skin color), many Muslim women who immigrated to Canada during this period integrated into mainstream society to a greater extent than recent immigrants, and experienced economic and social mobility (Husaini 1999, 17). Class and education have been significant but not sufficient factors in overcoming societal barriers to mobility; as a group, Muslims are characterized by higher educational levels and lower incomes than the Canadian average.

Despite having its own domestic news and entertainment industry, Canadian society is pervaded by media images, including images of Muslims, produced in the neighboring United States. Portrayals of fictional terrorists as Muslim, as in the feature film Executive Decision which depicts a terrorist praying to Allah, and in another scene, a man holding a Qur'ān while committing a terrorist act, have been condemned by Canadian Muslims. News reporting is another medium in which Islam is represented as a religion that promotes violence. While archival video footage of Muslims prostrate in prayer and sound files of the call to prayer have been used in Canadian television and radio to accompany reporting on violence committed by Muslims, by contrast, communal rituals and religious symbols of Christians and Jews are not featured during news accounts of political violence by members of these faiths.

Increases in bias and prejudice against Muslims in the news media have corresponded to international political events. Since 1979, when Iranian students stormed the American Embassy in Tehran and held 66 Americans hostage for up to 444 days, images of Muslims (especially Iranians and Arabs) in popular culture have emphasized tropes of violence, irrationality, and female oppression more than exoticism (Khan 2002, 4–5). Like the American media, Canadian news sources immediately speculated that the 1995 bombing of a United States government building in Oklahoma City was committed by Middle Eastern terrorists; juries later convicted two Americans, both fundamentalist Christians, of the act. Widespread condemnation of the media for its coverage of this event, in particular, was instrumental in decreasing (though not eradicating) bias against Muslims in Canadian news reporting. In a headline that appeared in 2000, a major metropolitan newspaper characterized as an “Islamic bomb” a nuclear weapon possibly under development by Osama bin Laden. Following public criticism, the newspaper later issued a retraction, and stated that the association of the suspected plot with Islam was gratuitous and unjustified.

The theme of violence and discrimination against women in Muslim societies was a prominent aspect of the Canadian media’s coverage of the 11 September 2001 attacks by al-Qā’ida (al-Qaeda) on American targets. In this message, also promoted by the French in the early twentieth century to justify their colonization of North Africa, the West depicts itself as the welcomed liberator of Muslim women. Nonetheless, the Canadian media have provided for divergent voices of Muslims, male and female, which are accorded legitimate space for engagement of these issues in national newspapers, radio, and television.

Canadian Muslims have addressed stereotypes and biases in several ways. Some families, a minority, have organized and supported full-time Muslim schools where children are isolated from a vilification of Islam and Muslims that parents view on television and suspect is present at school as well (Kelly 1999, 211–12). According to these parents, Muslim schools offer children, as Muslims and as immigrants, the opportunity to be part of a majority group and develop psychological strength that they would not otherwise acquire.

Several voluntary associations have been formed. The goals and activities of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women, founded in 1982, include helping Muslim women integrate into broader society, educating Canadians about Islam and Muslim cultures, and monitoring the portrayal of Islam in public schools (McDonough and Alvi 2002, 79, 85). Through letters and articles published in Canada’s national papers, CAIR-CAN, the Council on American-Islamic Relations Canada, has frequently drawn the attention of Muslims and the wider public to negative and inaccurate media representations of Islam and Muslims. Electronic mail, the Internet, and fax machines have been used effectively by CAIR-CAN as tools for acquiring and disseminating information about instances of misrepresentation and biased reporting, and for organizing response.

Prejudice and bias against Canadian Muslims affect women, in particular, when they wear distinctive dress such as the hijāb and jellaba (a minority practice among Canadian Muslim women). In many contexts, these garments are associated with a political and social stance that is thought to be incompatible with mainstream secular democratic Canadian values, particularly among the French-speaking majority in the province of Quebec. In several instances since 1994, girls have been expelled from Quebec schools for wearing the hijāb; in each case, school administrators have said the hijāb contravenes their secular ethos. Public debate on this question has been marked by statements from Quebec nationalists and feminists that prohibiting it in the classroom will free young Muslim girls from patriarchal oppression.

Experience of bias and prejudice is entwined with Canadian women’s decisions to wear hijāb. Feelings of exclusion from mainstream society have influenced the choice of some young Canadian-born Muslim women to identify more closely with their heritage, construed in both religious and ethnic terms. Wearing hijāb, a choice that is valued in some religious communities, is considered by some to be a proactive strategy through which women assert and define their identity to mainstream society and within the diasporic Muslim community. Expressing their decision both in terms of religious freedom valued by mainstream society and as a personal choice that reflects commitment to communal religious ideals, young women who wear hijāb often experience greater authority and freedom (particularly relating to mobility) within the family.

Discussion among feminist Canadian Muslim scholars of hijāb and women’s legal and social status in Muslim societies has often been moderated by the desire not to reinforce the dominant stereotype of Muslim men’s cruelty toward women. The vigor with which Canadian media, feminist groups, and society at large have discussed and defended the legal and social position of Muslim women and girls in Canada, and more generally “women in Islam,” has been attributed by these scholars to a subtle racism that elides ethnicity, class, and place of origin in a general condemnation of Muslim men/civilization (Hoodfar 1993, Jamal 1994, Khan 2002). Future research by and about Muslim women in Canada must address both how negative stereotypes influence individuals’ social strategies, and how variables such as class, ethnicity, marital status, age, place of birth, and personal narratives as refugees and immigrants intersect with experiences of, and strategies to combat, bias and prejudice within dominant Canadian society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Alvi, H. Hoodfar, and S. McDonough (eds.), The Muslim veil in North America. Issues and debates, Toronto 2003.
- H. Hoodfar, The veil in their minds and on our heads. The persistence of colonial images of Muslim women, in Resources for Feminist Research/Documentation sur la recherche féministe 22:3/4 (1993), 5-18.
- Z. Husaini, Historical background, in S. Zaman, At my mother's feet. Stories of Muslim women, Kingston, Ont. 1999, 13-19.
- A. Jamal, Identity, community and the post-colonial experience of migrancy, in Resources for Feminist Research/Documentation sur la recherche féministe 23:4 (1994), 35-41.
- Z. Kashmeri, The gulf within. Canadian Arabs, racism, and the Gulf War, Toronto 1991.
- P. Kelly, Muslim Canadians. Immigration policy and community development in the 1991 census, in Islam and Christian-Muslim relations 9:1 (1998), 83-102.
- , Integration and identity in Muslim schools, in Islam and Christian-Muslim relations 10:2 (1999), 197-217.
- S. Khan, Aversion and desire. Negotiating female identity in the diaspora, Toronto 2002.
- S. McDonough and S. Alvi, The Canadian Council of Muslim Women. A chapter in the history of Muslim women in Canada, in Muslim World 92:1/2 (2002), 79-97.
- A. Rashid, The Muslim Canadians. A profile, Ottawa 1985.
- S. Zaman, At my mother's feet. Stories of Muslim women, Kingston, Ont. 1999.

PATRICIA L. KELLY SPURLES

South Asia

Stereotypes either depict Muslim women as exotic, oppressed, and almost totally enslaved by men in Islam, or as defending the virtues of Islam and the status and rights accorded to women. Both these stereotyped approaches must be avoided as they are apologetic and hardly take into account contemporary problems in society or women's position from a gender perspective within a historical context. Women's position is determined more by sociocultural practices, political interests, and current realities of each area than by Islamic principles, for instance, the global interpretation and application of personal laws.

The defenders of Islam argue that Islam has showered women with ample rights and that therefore there is no need to launch a campaign or movement to reform Islamic principles. Historically, it is certainly true that Islam was one of the earliest organized religions to have accorded certain rights to women. With this in mind, many Muslims refuse to acknowledge the changes that have taken place both historically and politically the world over. The social and political diversity that exists in the Muslim world is considerable. Consequently, Muslim women are not a homogeneous group with a single identity. Their ideas, knowledge, and status vary with culture, class, education, and their access to power and resources in society. The intersection of religion with local culture, politics, economics, gender relations, and gender norms shapes the lives of women.

Muslim women in South Asia, particularly in India, suffer from various stereotypes of backwardness; their status is attributed to the prevalence of purdah, polygamy, divorce, and large family size. This entry examines first the gaps between the stereotypes and the reality of Muslim women's lives, and second how the stereotypes of Muslim women are imbibed and promoted by the general population, the academy, and the media. The stereotypes and the real situation of women are guided by the prevailing power relations but often justified in the name of religion.

In spite of the emphasis on education and earning a living in Islam, most Indians, including many Muslims, subscribe to the view that Islam prohibits women from acquiring education and taking up employment. The overall educational level and the representation of Muslims in the organized sector as a whole, particularly in government, is low, and that of Muslim women even lower. The proportion of Muslim women in higher education in India is only 3.56 percent (Muslim Women's Survey 2002). The average work participation rate for Muslim women is 14 percent lower than that of scheduled caste women (37 per cent) This stereotypical perception of education and employment of Muslim women to a large extent overlooks the historical context of their backwardness and the overall socioeconomic position of the community, their minority status, and the political climate of the country (Hussain 1998) and disregards discrimination in education, employment, and gender norms.

Personal law is often seen as a symbol of identity and any discussion of it becomes political. Women are sacrificed on the altar of Muslim identity on the pretext of preserving it. At the application level these laws are influenced by their gendered interpretations and the local culture. For example, a woman is entitled to an inheritance worth half that of her brother, but in practice the impact of local culture and its application indirectly debar her from inheriting anything. This practice is justified by various arguments: the family will spend on her marriage; after marriage she will receive hospitality from her brothers whenever she visits her natal family; and asking for her share will spoil her relationship with her brothers and bring disrespect to the family honor (Hussain 1998). Thus, the gendered practices and the local culture determine what women's behavior should be and bind them to the role of guardians of the threatened identity.

In the area of marriage and divorce, once again, the practice of Islam overrides scriptural Islam because of prevailing local culture. For example, the consent of a girl to marriage is rarely sought and registration of marriage (nikāhnāma) is hardly practiced. Personal choice of marriage partner is considered to be disrespectful of family honor. Divorced women are left with very little or no support from family, community, or the Wakf Board. The interests of dominant political and conservative groups restrict women's options. For example, the Muslim Women's Protection of the Right to Divorce Act 1986 and the judgment of the Supreme Court of India in 2001 prevented Muslim women from claiming maintenance as Indian citizens. Thus, both the gendered practices and interpretations of personal laws and the interest of particular groups from within or outside the community must be taken into account in explaining the stereotypes of Muslim women.

In the sphere of sexuality and reproduction, Islamic provisions are overruled or misinterpreted by the maulanas, senior religious leaders, resulting in various misconceptions about the fertility pattern of Indian Muslims. These misconceptions and misinterpretations both within the community and outside it further bolster the stereotypical image of Muslim women and give the impression that marriage and motherhood are the only opportunities for them. Women are often held responsible for the birth of female children and for infertility, thus providing the rationale for a man to divorce or marry a second wife because the family needs a male heir to carry the family name (Hussain 2001). Such interpretations are gendered and rooted in, and reinforced by, the cultural and ideological systems of multiple patriarchies rather than mere religious prescriptions.

The public stereotypical views of Muslim women, including in the media, hold that a woman can be divorced any time for no given reason and can easily remarry (as shown in many television serials and films) and that every Muslim man has four wives. These two views have most often been cited and visualized by the general public as the main reasons for the miserable and subordinate status of Muslim women. But the fact is that the possibility of remarriage for a divorced woman is almost absent because of the stigma, shame, and disrespect related to divorce and the problems of dowry. It is easier for a divorced man to remarry even if he has grown children (Hussain 2003). The legal provision for four wives is often used to explain the miserable condition of Muslim women and is considered a reason for the growth of the Muslim population in India. This stereotype is negated by various reports that show Muslims as the least polygamous community compared to other religious communities (India 1975). The supposed backwardness of Muslim women in India is not a result of this provision; rather it is due to a combination of various factors. Growth and decline of population is dependent on other socioeconomic and political factors, as is evident from the population decline of other Muslim countries, particularly Bangladesh.

Academic writings also create stereotypes of Muslim women and relate their backwardness to religion, ignoring the power and gender dynamics of the wider social structure: "Muslim women are miserable creatures without any rights whatsoever in respect of marriage, succession, guardianship or birth control. Islam has accorded the right to a man to have four wives. The most abominable is the system of purdah. In Muslim society a double standard of morality is prevailing" (Subbama 1998, 3).

The prevalence of stereotypes and the observance of gendered practices show that patriarchal norms and hegemonic ideologies use a selective interpretation of religion and culture. These ideologies support social, economic, and political practices that sustain the dominance of certain groups; religion is often used to justify existing social relations in the society. It is these that are the root cause of gender inequality and gender discrimination. It seems that differentiations within the community in terms of class and money, power, and privilege are often used as powerful and unifying forces in a "cultural articulation of patriarchy" (Shaheed 1997). The rigid cultural strictures and the prevailing stereotypes override the religious prescriptions and skew the rights of women (Hussain 2003).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Hussain, The changing half. A study of Muslim women in India, Delhi 1998.
- , Inter-generational mobility among Muslim women in India. Report, Indian Council for Social Science Research, Ministry of Human Resource Development, Delhi 1999.
- , Do women really have a voice in reproductive matters?, in Asian Journal of Women Studies 7:4 (2001), 29–69.
- , Male privilege female anguish. Divorce and remar-

- riage among Muslims of Bihar, in I. Ahmad (ed.), Divorce and remarriage among Muslims in India, New Delhi 2003, 263–90.
- M.-A. Hélie-Lucas, The preferential symbol for Islamic identity. Women and Muslim personal law, in V. Moghadam (ed.), Identity politics and women, Boulder, Colo. 1994, 399.
- India. Committee on the Status of Women in India, Towards equality. Report of the committee on the status of women in India, New Delhi 1975.
- K. Mason, Conceptualizing and measuring women's status. Paper presented at Population Association of America Meeting, Miami, Fla., 5–8 May 1994.
- ORG-Marg Muslim Women's Survey 2001–2002, <www.infochangeindia.org/bookandreportsst_At1jsp>.
- F. Shaheed, The interface of culture, custom and law. Implications for women and activism law in legal education and practices in Pakistan. North South co-operation, in R. Mehdi and F. Shaheed (eds.), Women's law in legal education and practice in Pakistan. North South cooperation, Copenhagen 1997, 151–64.
- Women facing Muslim personal laws as the preferential symbol for Islamic identity, first draft, paper prepared for the WIDER Round Table on Identity Politics, 8–10 October 1990, Helsinki.

SABIHA J. HUSSAIN

The United States: Arab Muslim Women as Portrayed in Film

Motion pictures are one of the most powerful teaching tools ever created. “There exists today no means of influencing the masses more potent than the media” (Pope Pius XI). “The cinema must and shall become the foremost cultural weapon of the proletariat” (Nikolai Lenin). This entry examines how image-makers have presented the Arab Muslim woman in film. History reveals that since the beginning of cinema, in fact for more than a century, Hollywood's movies have humiliated, demonized, and eroticized the Muslim woman. Obviously, filmmakers did not create these images, but inherited and embellished Europe's pre-existing Arab stereotypes. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries European artists and writers offered fictional renditions of women as swathed and submissive exotic “objects.” The stereotype that came to be accepted as valid, becoming an indelible part of European popular culture, has been transferred into American filmmaking.

I began my research on Arab Muslim women as portrayed by Hollywood in 1960. By locating, viewing, and studying more than 60 movies, I discovered many portraits that are dangerous and destructive and should be taken seriously, as well as others that are less offensive. In films ranging from yesteryear's foreign legion thrillers up to and including contemporary political dramas, producers associate the Arab Muslim woman with violence, sex, and oppression. Locked into a cycle of predictable character-types, she has appeared in every sort of film imaginable: sword-and-sandal soaps, musical comedies, magic carpet fantasies, historical tales, movie serials, and terrorist shoot-'m-ups. In films that feature any image of an Arab Muslim woman, stereotypical idiosyncrasies abound that can be seen as rigid and repetitive.

It all began with two silent shorts – one censored, the other uncensored – Fatima (1897) and Fatima's Dance (1907). Both feature Fatima, the star of Chicago's 1896 World's Fair, as a veiled bosomy belly dancer. To see Arab belly dancers appearing in early films is not surprising. At the turn of the century, in vaudeville and burlesque circles, the dancers were familiar fare. Hollywood simply emulated this image. In Arabian Nights fantasy films such as The Sheik (1921), Slave Girl (1947), and John Goldfarb, Please Come Home (1964), Arab women appear leering out from diaphanous veils, or as unsatisfied, disposable “knick-knacks” lounging on ornate cushions, or scantily-clad harem maidens with bare midriffs, all closeted in the women's quarters of the palace and/or on display in slave markets. The phantasm of the harem still persists. In Disney's remake of Around the World in Eighty Days (2004), for example, Arnold Schwarzenegger portrays Prince Hapi, a Middle Eastern shaykh with “one hundred or so wives.”

Many films feature Arab women in far less alluring images. In features such as My Favorite Spy (1959), Shark (1969), and Deception (1992) women lurk in the background as unattractive, covetous beasts of burden carrying jugs on their heads; others lie as they rob Westerners; still others are portrayed as obese and revolting. Films like Protocol (1984) and The Sheltering Sky (1990) feature Muslim women as a cackling horde of crows, and as shapeless black bundles of covered, ululating women, trekking behind their unshaven mates.

The portrayal of Arab women as black magic vamps began in 1917, with Fox's silent Cleopatra, starring Theda Bara. Studios promoted them as “serpents” and “vampires,” as a result of which the word “vamp” was added to English dictionaries. Movies such as Saadia (1953) and Beast of Morocco (1966) feature Arab women as enchantresses in cahoots with and possessed of devils.

A very different image of Arab women is projected in films that portray them as active agents of warfare, most specifically as bombers. Perhaps the most overlooked portrait of the Arab woman is the bomber image. The Arab woman as bomber began with Republic's movie serial, Federal Agents vs. the Underworld Inc. (1948). Since then, Hollywood has released six feature films showing Palestinians, Moroccans, and other Arab women not as exotic, bumbling and subservient maidens, but as terrorists invading the United States and killing American civilians. Federal Agents displays Nila, Hollywood's first-ever Arab terrorist. Described as an "alien threat," this Egyptian "female fanatic" and her Arab cohorts move to bring down United States federal agents. Nila tries to eradicate the agents by administering a deadly "rare oriental herb," firing a pistol, and tossing a bomb at the American "infidels." But she's no match for the Western protagonists. In the end, a huge statue crushes her. Nila gasps her last as the hero quips, "Seeking to destroy others, Nila succeeded in destroying herself."

Not until some 30 years later, in Black Sunday (1977), did Hollywood aggressively show another Arab terrorist. Like books, movies last a very long time. Thanks to network and cable systems, at least once a year, usually days before the annual Super Bowl game, generations of viewers have witnessed Dahlia, a Palestinian, trying to blow up the Super Bowl and everyone in it. In Black Sunday Dahlia arrives in the United States, acquires a bomb, then seduces a former Vietnam prisoner of war and enlists his aid. She proceeds to help gun down American citizens "where it hurts": in Los Angeles, Washington D.C., and Miami. Final frames show Dahlia and the veteran steering a blimp over Miami's Super Bowl stadium, intending to detonate a cluster bomb that would massacre 80,000 spectators, including the American President. In time, an Israeli officer, not an American agent, terminates them.

Four years later Shakka, a dangerous Moroccan terrorist, surfaced in the 1981 drama, Nighthawks. Aware that Shakka is in New York City, the city's security chief warns his colleagues to be wary of her: she was "born in Tangiers, of wealthy parents; a spoiled broad who kills without provocation." His profile proves correct – moments later Shakka shoots him dead. In the end, Shakka and her cohort, a German assassin named Wulfgar, hold the families of United Nations officials hostage in a cable car dangling 250 feet above the East River. As expected, the Western protagonists save the day and the terrorists are shot dead.

Wrong Is Right (1982) portrays hateful Arab students as terrorists. Clad in robes and checkered headscarves the students march on Times Square and tussle with New York policemen, shouting "Death to America." One young Arab woman fastens a plastic bomb onto her body, blowing up herself and injuring onlookers. In the James Bond thriller, Never Say Never Again (1983), Fatima, a nuclear terrorist working with SPECTRE, attempts to detonate two nuclear bombs in the West. She fails, terminated by James Bond.

The greater Los Angeles area is the setting for Wanted: Dead Or Alive (1987). Here, Palestinian and homegrown Arab Americans go on a killing spree, blowing up more than 200 men, women, and even children. Just outside the city, the camera reveals an Arab-American terrorist factory. Inside the plant are more than 50 chemical weapons that are about to be released into the atmosphere, intended to kill millions. When Malak, the primary villain, and Jamilla, his loyal sidekick, find out the powerful explosions could also kill them as well as their fellow conspirators, Malak cancels the mission. The angry Jamilla protests. Determined to launch the weapons, she is willing to die for the cause. Malak shoots her dead. True Lies (1994) presents Juno, a female Palestinian terrorist, who with her fellow Palestinians, members of the "Crimson Jihad," move to launch nuclear missiles over American cities. Final frames show the movie's hero and the Marines kicking "Arab ass."

The message contained in all seven of these films showing Arab women as terrorists, and especially in the four that portray her as a nuclear terrorist, is that Arab Muslim women are capable of the most malicious actions and that the solution is to rid the United States of their presence. In contrast, only a handful of old-fashioned, out-of-date movies – such as The Return of Chandu (1934), Princess Tam Tam (1935), Baghdad (1949), Flame of Araby (1951), and Princess of the Nile (1954) – present the Arab woman as characterized by intelligence, courage, and beauty. Admirable Egyptian queens appear in the 1934 and 1963 versions of Cleopatra, and in Caesar and Cleopatra (1946). When, on rare occasions, the dark-complexioned, heroic Arab woman tries to woo a Western protagonist, she is inevitably disappointed. Films such as Outpost in Morocco (1949) and Secondhand Lions (2003) assume that an Arab woman in love with an American protagonist must die.

In most Hollywood films, then, the portrayal of Arab Muslim women is as exotic, violent, and distinctly other. Arab women are seldom projected to look and behave like most of the viewers. Producers never show them at home with family, or functioning in the workplace as professionals. Instead of revealing a common humanity, Hollywood movies from the beginning have fostered xenophobia and prejudice by their assumption that women under Islam are in a pathetic state, thus helping alienate the Arab woman from her international sisters, and vice versa.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Alloula, The colonial harem, Minneapolis, Minn. 1986.
 W. Buonaventura, Serpent of the Nile. Women and dance in the Arab world, Northampton, Mass. 1998.
 L. Jacobs, The rise of the American film, New York 1961.
 A. Naff, The Arab Americans, New York 1988.
 J. G. Shaheen, The TV Arab, Bowling Green, Ohio 1984.
 —, Reel bad Arabs. How Hollywood vilifies a people, Northampton, Mass. 2001.
 W. Zinsser, In search of Lawrence of Arabia, in Esquire, June 1961.

JACK G. SHAHEEN

Western Europe

The hallmark of stereotypes is the lack of individual distinguishing marks giving birth to standardized and oversimplified mental pictures. What are the specific expectations and stereotypes as far as Muslim women in Europe are concerned?

The way Western Europeans consider and perceive Muslim women is hard to measure because it varies over time. It is more a complex mixture of misperceptions, quick judgments, and even racism than a precise feeling limited to certain attitudes. Moreover, inadequate or selected knowledge makes it very difficult for people to view individuals as unique and complex persons and encourages them to rely on stereotypes articulating a selection of social or physical traits such as race, sex, or religion. Certainly the media, in particular television but also newspapers and magazines, have very much helped this process of stereotyping Muslim women by systematizing the association of specific images – the most internationally admitted one being that of a woman wearing a black headscarf – with the journalistic coverage of issues such as political Islam in Europe, terrorism and religion, the failure of integration, and so forth. This is the case with all weekly magazines published in Western Europe, some being more or less the champions of that type of photo-discourse association (Der Spiegel, Focus, Le nouvel observateur).

Muslim women living in Europe are at the crossroads of many kinds of stereotypes, some related to gender, others to religion. Some gender stereotypes implicitly recall more classical ones (not specifically related to Islam): women are unstable, irrational, and vulnerable when they are not protected by men. We would call these stereotypes “generic” as they refer to a general picture of women at large as alienated and submitted to male authority, not capable of any autonomous decision. The categorization of persons on the basis of gender implies the existence of gender related characteristics consistent with this classification. Other stereotypes are directly related to what is seen in Europe as the intangible main characteristics of Islam (for instance polygamy, the behavior of the wives of the Prophet Muḥammad, Islamic law, inequality between men and women, the subordinate role attributed to women within marriage, and motherhood being the only opportunities for them). We would call these “sectorial stereotypes” as they explicitly rely on an essentialist and cultural view of Islam (Muslim women have more children than others, they are ignorant, they do not have access to external society because of their specific “culture”). Islam appears as the key to explain and justify differences between us and them. To some extent, these two main lines of stereotypes interact more or less strongly according to the national context in which they emerge. Independently from Islam, gender stereotypes vary from one European country to another. The national shape taken by the public debates around gender equality clearly demonstrated this variance some years ago when it came to be introduced as a central principle at the European level. Explicitly looking at Muslim women in Western Europe, there is, however, one main issue that seems to represent a common focus for the specific stereotypes of which these women may be the objects: the headscarf. The public representations that come out in such debates vary over time and place and help us to question the changing parameters of the stereotyping processes at stake.

The veil is widely considered to be what makes a Muslim woman visible as a believer and embeds hers in specific inter-gender relationships (men dominating women). By extension, it gives rise to specific views on sexuality of Muslim women. However, when it comes to headscarf controversies – obviously with varying resonance in the Western European countries, from indifference in the United Kingdom to the polemic national crisis that started in the late 1980s in France – the time dimension appears central. Indeed, the Muslim women who were at the core of the first discussions at the end of the 1980s do not have the same social and economic profile as the contemporary girls and women who claim the right to wear the veil while studying or working. This difference of profile is reflected by the types of argument used by politicians and opinion makers to explain why it should be strictly forbidden to wear a headscarf in public places. Twenty years ago, the dominant argument dealt with male domination over women in Muslim societies at large and by proxy in the Western European countries. Nowadays, new elements are incorporated such as the individual right to choose how to express religious affiliation and the potential emancipatory function of this religious sign (this taken from the literature analyzing the political commitment of women in Muslim societies such as Iran and Turkey). It is now commonly admitted that if in some cases the veil comes from a top-down imposition (from father, brothers, a religious authority, and so forth), it may also be a rational choice strategy to wear it as it opens margins of movement that otherwise would not be available.

Public stereotypes of Muslim women basically moved from the image of the non-educated peasants who constituted the majority of the first waves of migration to Europe and hardly spoke European languages, to the one of the educated and smart young women who have engaged in a radical political movement. Interestingly, this perception of the generational changes gave also birth to “positive” stereotypes such as the idea that Muslim girls would be more successful at school than Muslim boys. These kinds of generalized opinions have recently been revised to form a more differentiated picture including variables such as the educational arena in which boys and girls are trained, the level of education they receive, and access to employment. Western European societies in general have learned a great deal during the last 40 years. The debate over female genital mutilation (FGM) is a relevant illustration of how societies incorporate new forms of knowledge: it is now generally admitted that FGM is not an Islamic practice but rather a local historical tradition in places such as Sub-Saharan Africa or Egypt. It is, however, important to consider that stereotypes surrounding Muslim women settled in Western Europe also stem from Muslim populations living in the same contexts, both men and women. Most of the criticism comes from a reading of Islamic traditions that stick to the original text without elaborating on the changing contexts and eventual new interpretations, such as those of the reformists. Muslim women in Europe are either perceived by their peers as too close to or too far from the original message and its essential values. More and more social studies are trying to focus on the gender issues among Muslim populations not only through the lens of family or political commitment, but also by working on specific topics such as emerging female religious authorities.

The stereotyping process that shapes the public images of Muslim women in Western Europe is more and more dependent on international political developments, and thus constantly evolving. There is no doubt about the intimate tie binding the perception of Islam in Europe with the representation of Islam out of Europe: the common representation of Muslim women in Europe is very much linked with the perception of women’s life in Muslim societies. The Western European reliance on stereotypes follows the path of salient international events (for instance at the beginning of the 1980s, the surprising role of women in revolutionary processes and their ambiguous social and political position in the following years, or, during the 1990s, the rise and fall of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan with its consequences for women).

Stereotypes concerning Muslim women in Western Europe depend upon time and place but still constitute forms of categorization of others attributing certain patterns of attitude (negatively connoted) to ethnic and religious identity. By classifying women as members of a group (Muslims), stereotypes draw inferences about them stemming from their perception of the group itself. This often leads to abusive generalizations and even types of discrimination that may lead to further exclusion as expressed in the report of the French Haut conseil à l’intégration (HCI 2001, 98–9).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- V. Amiraux, Discours voilés sur les musulmanes en Europe. Comment les musulmans sont-ils devenus des musulmanes? in Social Compass 50:1 (2002/3), 85–96
 HCI (Haut conseil à l’intégration) L’Islam dans la république, Paris 2001.
 L. Reina, Gendering Orientalism. Race, femininity and representation, London 1996.

VALÉRIE AMIRAUX

Sufi Orders and Movements

The Balkans

The presence of Sufi orders in the Balkans is closely linked to Ottoman rule over this ethnically mixed peninsula between the fourteenth and early twentieth centuries. The diversity and number of Sufi orders indicate that most of the peninsula provided receptive grounds for the dissemination of Sufi ideas and practices. Indeed, it would be impossible to imagine the high conversion rate to Islam in many areas without an active Sufi presence. Balkan Islam, then, has been neither fully defined by Sufi ideas or practices, nor has it been influenced by a single Sufi way. While a number of orders that set foot in the region subsequently lost their initial importance and membership, others endured in one or several Balkan regions until the present. Among the most important orders are the Halvetī, Naqshbandī, and Bektāshī, while less prevalent ones include the Qādirī, Rifāʿī, Mevlevī, Bayrāmī, Melāmi, and Bedevī. Overall, Sufi orders infused Balkan Islam with new vigor in both belief and practice. While some were highly syncretic and therefore enjoyed popular appeal (for example, the Bektāshī), others were more attractive to intellectual and literate circles (for example, the Halvetī).

As regards Muslim women, their access to and participation in Sufi life is difficult to assess due to the lack of adequate and consistent sources. However, the Sufi inclinations of many Muslim women were recorded sporadically. For example, the presence of the “Sisters of Rum” (Bacıyân-i Rûm), a mystical organization of women with roots in Asia Minor, is mentioned in fragmentary references across Bosnia and Greece. Thus, a nineteenth-century English travelogue mentions one Derviş Hanım in Thessaloniki, and another woman who replaced her dead husband as the shaykh of the Sisters of Rum’s lodge in Kavala, Greece. In Bosnia, they were locally known as Badžijanije, and anecdotes about their lives in hagiographical literature date to the seventeenth century. Badžijanije are spoken of as spiritual masters, educators, influential ladies, even eccentrics. As late as the mid-twentieth century, a prayer to “Seven Sisters” who were part of this movement was included in the mourning ceremony in some parts of Bosnia. Among these “Seven Sisters” was the wife of the Qādirī Shaykh Hasan Kaimi in Sarajevo of the seventeenth century. She worked as the shaykh of Kaimi’s auxiliary lodge which was later instituted as specifically women’s.

Other women left their own works testifying to Sufi links and experiences. Worthy of mention is the seventeenth-century Asiye Hatun of Skopje, Macedonia, who left a log of her dreams which she had recorded and discussed with her Halvetī shaykh. Both the dreams and the shaykh’s commentary reflect the richness of Asiye Hatun’s Sufi knowledge. Likewise, the nineteenth-century Bosnian Habiba Stočević Rizvanbegović wrote love poetry, in Ottoman Turkish, which reveals typical Mevlevī motifs. Her biography mentions that she left Bosnia for Konya to join the Mevlevī order, to which she dedicated the rest of her life. But while their membership in most Sufi orders continues today, women’s experiences are by and large relegated to private space as they are commonly not allowed to participate in dhikr ceremonies or engage in other rituals and practices side by side with men. If they do come to dhikr on special occasions, they are usually placed in a separate room. Perhaps the most notable exception to such segregation at rituals is the Bektāshī order.

Long associated with the Ottoman military establishment, Bektāshī activity spread throughout the Balkans, as evidenced by the remains of their tekkes (lodges) and türbes (tombs) in Greece, Macedonia, Bosnia, Bulgaria, and Albania. Shīrī in orientation and organized around a shaykh referred to as baba, the Bektāshīs intertwine Islamic teachings with local customs and folklore, making the order popular especially in rural areas. The most enduring presence of the Bektāshī is to be found in Albania. Despite heavy persecution by Enver Hoxha’s atheist regime in the 1970s and 1980s, the Albanian Bektāshī managed to regroup once the state relaxed its religious policies, instituting themselves in 1993 as a community separate from Sunnī Muslims. This has enabled the Bektāshīs to augment their membership and restore some of the tekkes and türbes that had been confiscated or destroyed. As regards gender relations, the Bektāshīs proudly maintain that women are granted equal opportunities in all matters of belief and practice. Indeed, Bektāshī women undergo the same initiation ceremony, participate side by side with men in all rituals, and are equally involved in the tradition of composing sacred songs, as evidenced by a collection of spiritual songs entitled Gül Deste (Bouquet of roses). This level of gender intermixing and equality is certainly not the case with other Sufi orders in the region, and has been used by certain Sunnis to slander Bektāshī morality.

Despite the lack of direct participation in other Sufi orders, however, women have adopted and adapted to Sufi teachings in a variety of ways. One interesting development linked to Sufi influence is the ritual of tevhid (Arabic tawhīd) practiced by women in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Tevhid is primarily the ritual of mourning, performed on several occasions: the day of the burial (dženaza), the seventh day, the fortieth day after death, and subsequently six months and one year after death. Tevhid is led by professional bulas, the women educated in the religious school for women (ženska medresa) that has operated in Sarajevo with interruptions since 1940. Among their various responsibilities is to attend ceremonies and family rituals, but their most central duty lies with the tevhid and mevlud (Arabic mawlid, a festive occasion). When the medresa was closed down between 1949 and 1978, the tevhid ritual underwent a crisis as a new generation of women had to be trained either by older bulas or by their husbands who worked as Islamic teachers and community leaders. Tevhids are attended by the female relatives, neighbors, and friends of the deceased, and are commonly held at his/her home, though they can take place in a mosque. The bulas lead the prayers, recite appropriate verses from the Qurʾān, and appoint other women to carry on the recitation. Every recital is followed by a collective prayer and the mention of the deceased, as well as of other dead relatives, who thereby receive “gifts” in the afterlife. During the final prayer, women collectively recall the names of God and the Prophet Muḥammad. Ritually, tevhid is likened to the Sufi dhikr in that it emulates some of its aspects, including, in some cases, the use of large rosaries (tespih) similar to those used in Sufi tekkes, and a rhythmic swaying of the body. One theory holds that in Ottoman times Sufi masters were invited to perform mourning rituals at the house of the deceased. While the men attended the burial, the women who stayed at home followed the Sufi way of ritual mourning and gradually adopted it as their own practice. Nowadays, tevhid is certainly the most common ritual in Bosnia and one that bears an important witness to the influence of Sufi practices on women’s religious life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. K. Birge, The Bektashi order of dervishes, London 1956.

- T. Bringa, Being Muslim the Bosnian way, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
- N. Clayer, Islam, state and society in post-communist Albania, in H. Pulton and S. Taji-Farouki (eds.), Muslim identity and the Balkan state, New York 1997, 115–38.
- L. Garnett, Mysticism and magic in Turkey, London 1912.
- M. Hadžijahić, The Badžijanije in Sarajevo and Bosnia, in The Annals of the Gazi Husrev Beg Library [in Bosnian] 7/8 (1982), 109–33.
- A. Hatun, Rüya mektupları, ed. and intro. C. Kafadar, Istanbul 1994.
- F. Nametak, Bosniak diwan literature [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1997.
- H. T. Norris, Islam in the Balkans, Columbia, S.C. 1993.
- A. Popovic, The contemporary situation of the Muslim mystic orders in Yugoslavia, in E. Gellner (ed.), Islamic dilemmas. Reformers, nationalists and industrialization, Berlin 1985, 240–54.
- A. Softić, Tevhids in Sarajevo [in Bosnian] Sarajevo 1984.

AMILA BUTUROVIC

Egypt

Medieval historians were uninterested in recording women’s participation in Sufi orders which must be inferred from incidental references to shaykhs in Mamluk and Ottoman Egypt who catered to women and admitted them into their orders – controversial topics among Sufi men – and from denunciations of women’s participation in dhikr, the ritual “remembrance” of God through repeated chanting of some of His Names. There are rare notations of women who became shaykhas, such as Zaynab Fāṭima bt. al-Abbās (d. 1394), head of a women’s retreat house in Cairo founded in 1285 by Princess Tadhkaray for Zaynab bt. Abū al-Barakāt “al-Baghdādiyya” and her women. Most of these women were widows or divorcees. Some men’s Sufi retreat houses may have included women; the historian Maqrīzī mentions that one of them had a separate bathroom for women.

Traditional male disregard for women’s participation in Sufism continues in the official denial by the government-sponsored Supreme Council of Sufi Orders that any women are members in the more than 70 registered Sufi orders. In reality, women participate in the orders, and a few women are de facto shaykhs of orders, though officially unrecognized. The policies of individual orders toward women vary a great deal; some orders exclude them altogether, while others create space for them. Some shaykhs instruct their disciples primarily through visions, and this may be particularly important for women, whom social conventions often bar from direct interaction with a shaykh.

Women in Cairo and the Delta are much more visible, vocal, and assertive than women in Upper Egypt, where it is sometimes still considered appropriate to seclude girls when they reach puberty. Many shaykhs in Upper Egypt have only male disciples. One woman who frequented a shaykh was shot by her father for dishonoring the family. She survived and fled to Cairo, where she was free to pursue the Sufi life. In Upper Egypt women do not participate in the dhikr rituals held at *mawlid*s (saint's day celebrations), although they visit the saints' tombs and sometimes observe the dhikr.

In the Delta and in Cairo, women participate more visibly in the Sufi orders, including dhikr and other mawlid activities. During the "great night" of the mawlid of Aḥmad al-Badawī in Tanta, the floor of the mosque is covered with men, women, and children, without any gender segregation. Economic transactions, secular entertainment, and games are more evident at *mawlid*s in Cairo and the Delta.

Dhikr is held weekly, in both afternoon and evening, at some saint's shrines or within certain Sufi groups. Women are more likely to participate in the afternoon than at night. Some shrines attract more women's participation than others. Not all shrines are equally holy, and those with less sanctity (accorded by undefined popular consensus) are more accessible to women. Women are barred from the shrines of Ḥusayn and Sayyida Zaynab after sunset, although they sit outside the gates. In contrast, the visitors to the shrine of Abū Su'ūd are nearly all women. Women are less likely to rise to join the dhikr rows in a mosque, although they may watch in large numbers. Women who participate in dhikr often remain where they are in a seated position, drawing a thin veil over the face to avoid being watched while in trance. Women are more likely to participate if dhikr takes place in the street or in a square outside the mosque, although men always outnumber them. If men break into a folk-dance during dhikr, this is usually tolerated as a spontaneous expression of joy, but if a woman does this, it is usually seen as provocative.

Sufism in Egypt is largely associated with rural areas and the lower urban classes, although participation of well-educated and wealthy urbanites is not uncommon, as Sufi rituals and festivals, respect for Sufi shaykhs, and veneration of Sufi saints are well integrated into Egyptian religious life, often without being identified as "Sufi." Women's participation crosses categories of age and social class and is often connected with their family's involvement with a particular order, but other women are led into Sufism through life crises, spiritual impulses, or visions that lead them to a particular spiritual guide. Certain orders cater specifically to the middle and upper classes. The Jāzūliyya Ḥusayniyya Shādhiliyya, a mainly middle-class order, employs popular musical styles rather than traditional Sufi music, to attract educated youth. Women's participation is unusually equal to that of men: they sit on one side of the shaykh, while men sit on the other, and everyone performs dhikr in a seated position.

In Egypt Sufi women do not generally meet separately from the men. The only order with a separate section for women is al-Shar'īyya al-Muḥammadiyya, the order of Muḥammad's Sharī'a, a name that deflects criticism from those who feel Sufism contradicts the Sharī'a. The dhikr of these women, all upper-class, is solemn and dignified, lacking music, motion, or ecstatic expression. Upper-class women do not speak loudly or express emotion in public, although such behaviors are typical of lower-class women in Cairo.

Women prepare food at *mawlid*s, where Sufis offer food and drink to passers-by. They may be hidden from sight or actively involved with the guests. Some women as well as men devote much of their life to traveling the circuit of the *mawlid*s to honor the saints, camp by the shrines, and offer hospitality.

Women who are leaders in the Sufi orders are usually called "mother," not shaykha, just as disciples are the "sons" and "daughters" of a shaykh. Sufi "mothers" have "sons" as well as "daughters." They have recognized spiritual virtues, especially visions and miraculous knowledge, but a brother or son is appointed official shaykh of the order. Although women are generally perceived as spiritually weaker than men, some women attain very high spiritual rank.

Some Sufis feel that gender concerns are inappropriate among those who have passed beyond the domain of the flesh. They claim not to be subject to sexual passions, and freely interact with Sufis of the opposite sex. One Sufi "mother" lives with two unrelated "sons." Ḥāgga Zakiyya 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib Badawī, an older woman, allowed a young man to rest his head on her lap, calling him her "daughter," to indicate transcendence of normal gender distinctions. On the other hand, some Sufis feel observance of strict segregation is imperative when outsiders are present, out of respect for their weakness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A. 'Abd al-Rāziq, Al-mar'a fi Miṣr al-Mamlūkiyya, Cairo 1975.

- V. J. Hoffman, Sufism, mystics, and saints in Modern Egypt, Columbia, S.C. 1995.
- C. Mayeur-Jaouen, Al-Sayyid al-Badawi. Un grand saint de l'islam égyptien, Cairo 1994.
- E. B. Reeves, The hidden government. Ritual, clientelism and legitimation in northern Egypt, Salt Lake City 1990.
- M. Winter, Society and religion in early Ottoman Egypt. Studies in the writings of 'Abd al-Wahhab al-Shā'rani, New Brunswick, N.J. 1982.

VALERIE J. HOFFMAN

North Africa

Women have been active in Sufi orders in North Africa throughout history. They participated in separate women's dhikrs (Sufi remembrance rituals), and served as muqaddamāt (circle leaders). Muqaddamāt acted as liaisons between the men's and women's groups, led the women's dhikr, initiated new women members, and taught Sufi doctrine and practices to women members. Some women took charge of the internal administration of the zāwiyas (Sufi lodges) in which they lived and worshipped. The primary sources for these roles and practices include Arabic historical works and treatises, anthropological studies, travel literature, and reports written by the French colonial administrators. Although their objectives and male authorship limited the details on women, considerable insight can nonetheless be gained from them into Sufi women's practices.

Today, women are active in Sufi orders of two types based on ritual content. The first ritual type, the dhikr, involves multiple repetitions of Arabic poems, phrases, or words in praise of Allah or the Prophet Muḥammad to induce an ecstatic state or divine union. The second, the ḥaḍra or līla, is a therapeutic spirit possession ceremony, in which rhythmic music accompanied by chants is performed to summon supernatural beings which inhabit participants causing them to move rhythmically and fall into trance. Despite some decline in Sufi activities due to oppositional efforts by Islamic reformists over the past century, scholarly interest in exploring women's participation in the surviving orders is growing.

Whether they were local creations or pan- or trans-regional institutions, many orders had parallel forms of women's participation. An investigation in 1917 revealed that 18 women members of the Tijāniyya in the Tunis region held muqaddama certificates (Clancy-Smith 1992). The details of Libyan women's roles in the Sanūsiyya remain limited, but its founder, who was raised by his aunt, an active teacher and preacher, was criticized for allowing gender-mixed gatherings. His wife was known for the extreme demands she placed on the male members' piety (Vikør 1995).

Algerian women's participation in Sufi orders has been documented for two time periods: the early nineteenth to the early twentieth century and 1983 to 1999. At the end of the nineteenth century, there were 27,000 women members of Sufi orders in Algeria, mainly in the Qādiriyya, Raḥmāniyya, and Tijāniyya (Jansen 1984). There were 4,000 women Raḥmānī members in the commune of Akbou. In 1913, there were three times as many female as male Raḥmānī members in a zāwiya in the Tkout region. Muqaddamāt presided over women's dhikrs and initiated women adepts using men's procedures. Furthermore, special procedures were developed when men initiated women, in order to avoid direct physical and eye contact (Clancy-Smith 1992).

While no specifics are available on women's groups' educational and ritual practices, some details exist on women's headship of zāwiyas. One example is Lālla Khadija who directed a Raḥmānī zāwiya in Kabyliya after her husband's death, from 1837 to 1842. Her daughter, who married her mother's successor, also had a leadership role. Moreover, she is reported to have been the first woman to initiate women members and authorize muqaddamāt. In the 1890s, the co-wives of the deceased zāwiya leader at Laghouat and the Kanadsa zāwiya leader's mother, who was both feared and venerated, were in charge of the administration of their respective zāwiyas. The ages and backgrounds of these women leaders are unknown (Clancy-Smith 1992).

Another example is Lālla Zaynab, who directed the Raḥmānī zāwiya in al-Ḥāmil from her father's death in 1897 until she died in 1904 at about age 50. She fought an intense legal battle against her male cousin to acquire this position. Educated by her father, intimately involved with the functioning of the zāwiya all her life, and saintly in status, she was better suited to take on responsibility for the education and social welfare of its members. During her tenure, she initiated both men and women into the order. A large number of women of varying ages and backgrounds lived in the lodge during her and her father's tenure (Clancy-Smith 1992, 1994).

Today, women are active members of the 'Īsāwiyya, both in Algeria and France. Men dominate the order structurally, but 'Īsāwī women's groups hold separate, self-styled weekly jama' rituals. These rituals consist of a dhikr of litanies expressing intense love for the Prophet with percussion accompaniment, followed by individual women divulging their personal problems to the muqaddama before the group. A lila may also follow. Furthermore, the women attend the annual four-day pilgrimage festival, where they observe men's spirit possession rituals, which culminate in such feats as slashing themselves with swords and consuming poisonous snakes. On the fourth day, the women perform a self-designed theatrical ritual, donning costumes and re-enacting daily events exemplifying gender conflicts in the relationships among members. The ritual serves to process these conflicts. Algerian 'Īsāwī women in France have initiated the weekly performance of dhikr and lila in two locations (Andezian 2001).

Moroccan women's historical participation in Sufism has received little scholarly attention. When the early sixteenth-century head of the Jāzūliyya, al-Ghazwānī, called for reform of urban and rural religious education and women's integration into religious life as measures to remedy the moral deterioration of Moroccan society, the number of educated Sufi women increased. Several distinguished themselves as authorities on Sufism including 'Ā'isha al-Idrisiyya. Al-Ghazwānī's two most important disciples, al-Habṭī and al-Tlīdī, maintained separate women's zāwiyyas, identical to the men's, with muqaddamāt trained in jurisprudence. Al-Habṭī's wife, Amīna bint Khajjū, a fully trained legist, presided over a women's zāwiya, where she taught Islamic and Sufi fundamentals (Cornell 1998).

Some eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Moroccan branches of the Tijāniyya appointed muqaddamāt to lead women's dhikrs and initiate new women members. The muqaddama Hajja Khadija wrote a treatise on Sufi doctrine (al-Hajja n.d.), traced her ancestry back to the Prophet, and initiated men into the order (El Adnani 2001). The Darqāwiyya encouraged women's participation, claiming eight muqaddamāt in 1942 (Trimingham 1971), and allowed gender-mixed gatherings (Vikør 1995).

The scholarly studies of three orders holding spirit possession ceremonies, the Ḥamādsha (Crapanzano 1973), Raḥḥāliyya (Naamouni 1995), and Gnāwa (Welte 1990), discuss women's participation tangentially. Women are not included in the orders' hierarchies, but actively participate in their therapeutic spirit possession practices. Their needs and experience of trance are recognized as differing from those of men.

As for orders performing dhikr, in and around the town of Taroudant, Nāṣirī, Jillālī and Darqāwī women's groups separately perform dhikr in local holy figures' tombs. Nāṣirī and Jillālī women choose their group leaders, whereas male leaders appoint them in the Darqāwiyya (Dwyer 1978).

Based on fieldwork observations, Nāṣirī women perform dhikr every afternoon in the order's main zāwiya in Tamegrut. Likewise, in the Khalūfī tomb complex in Oujda, women hold a dhikr every Friday afternoon in one of the two zāwiyyas. Until 30 years ago, 30 to 40 Tijānī women gathered daily to perform dhikr in a separate room in the zāwiya in Tiznit. The age and socioeconomic background of these women vary broadly, but older women tend to make up the largest age group.

Fieldwork observations have revealed that women throughout Morocco actively participate in the Būdshīshiyya, a branch of the Qādiriyya established in northeastern Morocco in the early twentieth century with a developed national and international recruitment program. Girls and young unmarried women (aged 14 to 30) from all over the country participate in the annual one-month summer training camp at the main zāwiya in Birkan. In Tiznit, the women's group consists solely of Ishilhin (Berbers) from a wide range of socioeconomic backgrounds. About half are unmarried high school students or graduates who are fluent in Moroccan and Modern Standard Arabic and attend the annual Būdshīshiyya training camp. The other half are mostly illiterate, middle-aged to elderly women with very limited knowledge of Arabic. On Sundays and Wednesdays, they all gather in the zāwiya to perform the Arabic dhikr led by the younger members or the muqaddama, who initiates new members and links the group to the men's group through contact with the local shaykh. Midway through the dhikr, two young women, trained at Birkan, give lessons in hadīth and fiqh in Tashilhit, and the group chants an age-old Tashilhit religious poem in unison.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Andezian, Expérience du divin dans l'Algérie contemporaine. Adeptes des saints dans la région de Tlemcen, Paris 2001.
- J. A. Clancy-Smith, The house of Zainab. Female authority and saintly succession in colonial Algeria, 1850–1904, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1992, 254–74.
- , Rebel and saint. Muslim notables, populist protest, colonial encounters (Algeria and Tunisia, 1800–1904), Berkeley 1994.
- V. J. Cornell, Realm of the saint. Power and authority in Moroccan Sufism, Austin, Tex. 1998.
- D. H. Dwyer, Women, Sufism and decision-making in Moroccan Islam, in L. Beck and N. R. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge 1978, 584–98.
- J. El Adnani, Entre hagiographie et histoire. Les origines d'une confrérie musulmane maghrébine. La Tijāniyya (1781–1881), book manuscript 2001.

- al-Hajja Khadija bint Aḥmad (Qariʿat al-Maghrib), al-Sayf al-Yamāni, Cairo n.d.
- W. Jansen, Women without men. Gender and marginality in an Algerian town, Leiden 1987.
- K. Naamouni, Le culte de Bouya Omar, Casablanca 1995.
- J. S. Trimmingham, The Sufi orders in Islam, Oxford 1971.
- K. S. Vikør, Sufi and scholar on the desert edge. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Sanūsī and his brotherhood, Evanston, Ill. 1995.
- F. M. Welte, Der Gnāwa-Kult, Frankfurt 1990.

MARGARET J. RAUSCH

Turkey, South Asia, Central Asia, Afghanistan, Iran, the Caucasus, and the Arab East

Many contemporary scholars have noted that the mystical or Sufi interpretation and practice of Islam is an arena that provides scope for female participation and women's leadership. Others (Murata, Ahmed) have understood Sufism as providing a counter or alternative philosophical strand within Islamic traditions that allows for greater expression of feminine spirituality.

The fact that many manifestations of Sufism take place outside of the mosque relieves female participants of the strict imposition of certain formal ritual restrictions such as gender segregation. However, the mixing of males and females in these environments may become a target of criticism for opponents of Sufism. Whether in some cases the incorporation of pre-Islamic popular practices and concepts by Sufis gives greater opportunity for women to participate is open to debate.

HISTORY AND THEORY

The understanding that Sufism arises from a mystical philosophy embedded in the Qurʾān permits the expression of the feminine or receptive aspect of the ultimate reality represented by divine attributes such as the Merciful, the Inner, and so forth. In the other main source of religious authority, the Prophet's sunna, his "beautiful" (jamālī) qualities such as gentleness and forbearance may be seen as supporting a feminine ideal.

The Qurʾānic figure most associated with concepts of female sanctity is Mary, mother of Jesus. Her attitude of acceptance and her state of purity and receptivity to divine revelation sets a pattern for female sainthood in Islam that is similar to her role in Christian piety. Later Sufi-influenced poets have expanded the Qurʾānic account of Yūsuf and Zulaykha into an allegory of spiritual transformation in which the female's lust for this handsome youth is transformed through suffering into mature spiritual love.

Among the Prophet's family, his most saintly female relative is his daughter, Fāṭima, who is elevated to a special spiritual status in the Shīʿī tradition. Here she embodies the archetype of the suffering mother whose sons will ultimately be martyred, as well as the pure virgin (bātūl) who is beyond the lusts and defilements of the physical body. Other descendants of the Prophet such as Sayyidnā Nafisa (824), a descendant of Ḥasan, his grandson, and Sayyidnā Zaynab, the Prophet's granddaughter, are venerated in Cairo as female saints and their shrines are important pilgrimage sites for both men and women.

FEMALE ASCETICS

The Sufi tradition's most prominent female is Rābiʿa al-ʿAdawiyya of Basra (d. ca. 801). Her story is an appealing legend of a slave girl whose piety won her freedom after which she became a lifelong ascetic. The anecdotes of her reported by ʿAṭṭār (d. 1230) in the Tadhkirat al-awliyāʾ contrast her to the male ascetic, Ḥasan of Basra, whose spiritual states and insights she is able to best through her pragmatic wisdom and more developed miraculous powers. ʿAṭṭār termed her a "man," a common way of appreciating the achievements of Sufi females. For example, Jāmī (d. 1492) in his Nafaḥāt al-uns entitled the section of biographical anecdotes of 33 women, "those who have achieved the stations of men." According to Baldick, later legends of Rābiʿa conflate two historical persons. In this case, "the pair of the penitent courtesan and the sexually abstinent wife form a pattern that continues in Sufi biographies" (1989, 30).

The wife of the Sufi al-Ḥakim Tirmidhī (d. ca. 932) is said to have achieved the same spiritual status as her husband and her dreams are reported in his spiritual autobiography. Other notable Sufi women include Fāṭima of Nishapur (d. 849), admired by famous male Sufis Biṣṭāmī and Junayd. Given the social conditions of earlier times many female saints are reported as "anonymous" in the biographical compendia.

While the literary tradition may under-report their existence, at the popular level the evidence of shrines to female saints remains, for example the shrines of Lalla Sittī in Tlemcen, Lalla ʿĀʾisha al-Mannubiyya in Tunis, and Bībījān Pāk Dāmanān in Pakistan. Sūlamī (d. 1021) and many other early hagiographers devoted separate sections to biographies of pious and ascetic females. Sūlamī's notices present to us pre-ṭariqa female Sufis who embody ascetic and world-denying qualities. As is the case with female scholars in Islam, the number of female saints proportionate to males who are reported seems to decrease over time. Besides the early ascetics, other female Sufis for whom we have information tended to come from the elite classes such as the Mughal princess Jihān Ārā Begum (d. 1680). She is said to have composed a biography of the Sufi master, Muʿīnuddīn Chishtī as well as her own mystical poetry. In addition she was a patroness of architecture.

SUFI THEORY OF THE FEMININE

Ibn al-ʿArabī (d. 1240) mentions several females who were his spiritual guides including Fāṭima of Cordoba (1971). His writings reveal a spiritual egalitarianism in which his characterization of male and female gendering is “accidental” rather than essential to human nature. He asserts that women can be spiritually perfected and that there is “no spiritual qualification conferred on men which is denied to women.” It is reported that a number of female disciples received the khirqā or cloak of spiritual transmission from him.

The Sufi theorist al-Ghazālī (d. 1111) articulated a more negative opinion of females, seeing their attractiveness as a distraction on the path to spiritual submission. In fact, the image of the feminine in the Islamic tradition and for male Sufis is often ambivalent. Females may represent for some male writers worldly temptation or the lower soul (nafs). A ḥadīth represents women as deficient in religion and reason and the “affliction” of menstruation was perceived as reflecting women’s inability to participate in formal ritual and spiritual practices at certain times.

PRACTICE: POPULAR AND HIGH TRADITION

Sufi shrines are more accessible to females than many mosques because of the lack of formal regulations and the spontaneous nature of ritual expression. Visits to shrines may provide sanctioned outings for women that are undertaken for healing and other benefits beyond religious edification. Common disorders addressed by visiting shrines are infertility, mental disturbance, and marital problems. While women of all social classes may perform shrine visits, they provide in particular an outlet for poorer women to picnic, visit, and relax.

In South Asia many of the saints’ tombs are internally gender segregated so that females cannot approach the actual burial site of a male saint and vice versa. In Central Asia, shrines or mazārs of female saints are pilgrimage sites of their own. Throughout the Muslim world females are the majority of visitors to shrines and may perform rituals such as lighting candles (North Africa) or tying strings on the grilles or trees surrounding the tomb as a symbol of the binding nature of ritual vows. Certain aspects of popular Sufism and the cult of the saints are particularly accessible to females, for example, their participation in the preparation of special foods or meals for distribution, known in South Asia as langar. The anniversaries of the deaths of South Asian saints and ʿarūs (marriage) days, may require the preparation of special sweet dishes involving further female expertise. For example, some families commemorate the Sufi saint, ʿAbd al-Qādir Gilānī (d. 1166) in a household ritual, held on the eleventh day of every lunar month in which a series of devotional food offerings are prepared according to rules that stress ritual purity.

The celebration of the Prophet’s birthday in mawlid/mevlid ceremonies that may occur throughout the year provides further occasions for female gatherings. While not exclusively confined to practicing Sufis, mawlids usually involve Muslims who believe in the saints and continued access to the Prophet as intercessor.

The extent to which women participate in ritual aspects of formal Sufism varies with the Sufi order and region. In the Turkish Bektāshī Order women are said to participate equally in ritual. In many parts of the Muslim world, however, women are not encouraged to become practicing Sufis. Most traditional scholars hold that the permission of a husband or guardian is required for a woman to take initiation in a Sufi order, presumably since this might challenge the husband’s authority. Initiation of females may consist of putting the hand in a bowl of water or holding onto a piece of cloth held by the male shaykh in order to avoid direct physical contact, based on the practice of the Prophet when accepting the allegiance of females. Some Sufi authors such as ʿAbd al-Wahhāb Shaʿrānī (d. 1565) see the relationship between a male shaykh and female disciples as being problematic. This highlights the difficulty of women receiving personal guidance and achieving the requisite intimacy with a teacher within a gender segregated social system. Some female Sufis circumvent barriers on gender mixing by receiving their spiritual instruction from the shaykh in dreams and visions.

At Sufi ceremonies the women are often gathered in a separate room or space or behind a screen or curtain where the sense of participation in the ritual ḥadrat or dhikr is limited. Children and uninterested females may also be present in the female space, further detracting from the experience. In Sufi ritual women may be discouraged from pronouncing the sacred formulas aloud, from standing, or from performing vigorous bodily movements due to taboos on males hearing the female voice and perceptions that women might become excessively emotional or ecstatic and violate rules of decorum. In Egypt, however, women may on occasion celebrate the dhikr standing, swaying to the rhythms in lines or spaces separate from males or on special days assigned to them. For example, at the shrine of Sīdī ‘Alī Zayn al-‘Ābidīn in the City of the Dead area of Cairo, women attend at a special time and weave to music performed by male performers (munshidūn), some going into trance-like states. Female participants often draw their veils over their faces, symbolically demarcating private space.

In the Iranian Ni‘matullāhī Order women are initiates but have never been shaykhs. Among the women’s circles a female may serve as a pir dalīl (guide for female novices) or as a tea master/mistress, but they listen to the poetry and music sung in the men’s section conveyed by a loud speaker. One report of a Qādirī Order meeting for women in Kermanshah has the female Sufis meeting separately and drumming and chanting for their own sessions.

In general, women’s dress at Sufi ritual events is less likely than that of males to bear special emblems of authority. In some Sufi orders, however, women don white robes over their usual clothing during more formal dhikr sessions.

In societies such as Egypt, Sudan, and Somalia a popular female religious practice that may be associated with Sufism is the zār, a sort of dance that evokes cathartic and healing powers. Sometimes female musical troupes perform at zārs. Hoffman (1995) notes that in mixed Sufi performance gatherings female performers face the problem that if they sing songs of love, they may become the objects of romantic imagination on the part of males in the audience.

Music and performance traditions associated with Sufism may provide scope for women’s participation. For example in Oujda, Morocco Aissawa women convene their own gatherings on Friday afternoons, involving music and trance states. In South Asian mystical poetry, the longing spiritual aspirant is usually given the female gender in mystical romance. Thus the female voice becomes the dominant one, at least theoretically, while some evidence for female performance in limited contexts can be found in the South Asian context. For example, the well-known Pakistani artist, Abida Parveen, specializes in Sufi songs of Punjabi saints while affecting masculine dress and mannerisms in her public performances of this material.

In addition, wealthy women are known to have supported particular Sufi masters and institutions. Separate convents or refuges for Sufi women have been sponsored by female patrons at various epochs of Muslim history. For example, rabats or shelters for women were constructed in premodern Cairo, Aleppo, and Baghdad. Their functions may have overlapped spiritual retreat with charitable shelter.

FEMALE LEADERSHIP

It has been reported that charisma is passed down in female lineages in certain Moroccan Sufi orders. Tombs of females associated with saints as mothers, wives, and daughters may be visited or venerated on their own, reflecting these women’s residual charismatic powers.

The question of whether a female could be appointed as an initiating master (murshida) or even a spiritual successor (khalīfa) within Sufi lineages receives various responses. Some writings deny the possibility whereas others record instances of such female leadership while expressing concern as to whether a female shaykha could guide male disciples. For example, Mu‘inuddīn Chishtī of India (d. 1236) is said to have designated his daughter, Bībī Jamāl, as a khalīfa. In contrast, a later Chishtī saint, Bābā Farīd (d. 1265), said that his daughter, Bībī Sharīfa, would have been appointed a khalīfa except that this role was not available to women. The twentieth-century Chishtī, Khwāja Ḥasan Niẓāmī (d. 1955) of Delhi, is known to have appointed some female khalīfas. Clancy-Smith (1992) documents the case of a nineteenth-century female Sufi leader in Algeria, Lalla Zaynab of the Raḥ māniyya. Due to the restrictions on the public role of women, their leadership in Sufi orders was usually transmitted through female networks and female ritual leadership generally takes place within exclusively female gatherings.

CONTEMPORARY DEVELOPMENTS

Islamist movements have tended to discourage Sufi interpretations of Islam and popular practices such as the veneration of saints and shrine visitation. At the same time, elements of asceticism and self-fashioning, together with a renewed interest in the traditional sciences of the Unseen, enable a particular strain of Islamist piety accessible to both males and females that is close to the mood of early Sufism.

In other developments female members of American Sufi movements have agitated for greater gender equality, for example, female Mevlevis have introduced training in the sema (whirling ceremony) for women and have even performed the ceremony publicly in Turkey. In Algeria, the government-sponsored council of zāwiyas is contemplating giving more recognition and encouragement to female participation and such trends seem likely to increase with shifting concepts of gender roles in the public space, whether emerging from Islamist or modernist interpretations of Islam.

Elite women from the Muslim world might join one of the modern urban ṭarīqas that offer more individualistic concepts of spiritual growth, for example, the Dhawqī Shāh branch of the Chishtī Ṣābirī Order based in Karachi, Pakistan. Research on urban elite women of Damascus documents how they constitute their own Sufi circles within the Naqshbandī movement, led by Mufti Aḥmad Kaftārū, under the direction of his daughter, Shaykha Wafā'. Böttcher (1998) reports attendance of between one and two thousand women at dhikr sessions sponsored by this group in the Abū al-Nūr mosque in Damascus. Sub-groups of women of this movement sponsor more "select" dhikrs for initiates in private homes. This form of Sufi teaching stresses Islamic knowledge and piety and is encouraged as part of a Syrian state-sponsored Sunnī re-Islamization in which Sufism is a preferred alternative to political activism. Other groups of Syrian Sufi women are necessarily less overt in their activities. Contemporary transnational Sufi movements such as the Naqshbandī Ḥaqqānis of Shaykh Nāẓim draw participation from Muslim elites in Malaysia and Egypt, including many women.

The current situation of female Sufis in Iran must be viewed in the context of Sufism in general. While intellectual Sufism representing a cultural heritage of art and poetry is supported by the Islamic Republic, a fairly systematic repression of practical Sufism has occurred, including the persecution and surveillance of known Sufis and the closure and confiscation of Sufi centers, thereby restricting the involvement of both men and women.

In Uzbekistan's Ferghana valley, Sultanova (1999) finds females known as the Otin-oy (otins), usually the relatives of male religious leaders, sustaining a "domestic" or "reflected" Sufism that includes poetry, chanting, dhikrs, and even a Qādiriyya dance. These sessions, in general, celebrate life cycle rituals and religious holidays, rather than being specifically ṭarīqa-based practices. Her observation is that the importance of such female religious activity was enhanced under communist rule since it was less susceptible to persecution than more usual forms of Sufism. Its fate in the post-Soviet context remains to be seen.

In modern Turkey neo-Sufi movements such as the Sait Nursi and Gülen communities draw inspiration from some aspects of Sufism and attract large numbers of female members. In these movements the philosophical elements of Sufism and an activist agenda have replaced traditional forms of initiation, ṭarīqa identity, and charismatic transmission; female leadership, however, is not yet significant.

The fact that much of our information about contemporary Sufi practice comes from studies written by Western or Western trained researchers leads to the translation of "inner" experiences of Sufi women into modern psychological or anthropological systems. For example psychologist Michaela Özsel (1996) documents her 40-day Sufi retreat under a Turkish shaykh in diary form, ultimately invoking Jungian theory as an interpretive framework. Anthropologists have analyzed the dynamics of the intersection of emotion and embodiment in contemporary South Asian females affected in varying ways by Sufism (Werbner 1998). Female public intellectuals such as Ayşe Sasa in Turkey and Karīmān Ḥamza in Egypt represent cases of secularized Muslim women turning to Sufism in a quest for emotional stability and religio-cultural authenticity.

These literary and theoretical developments provide material that was absent or difficult to access in more traditional Sufi writings, and in some cases an entry into specifically female Sufi experience.

Rābī'a al-'Adawiyya (d. ca. 801) also known as Rābī'a of Basra is one of the best-known early Sufis, largely because of her biography in Tadhkirat al-awliyā', by Farīd al-Dīn 'Aṭṭār (d. 1230). Her inclusion among the "ranks of men" represents a state of mystical unity that transcends any class or gender distinctions. She is also portrayed as besting male saints and authorities of her time through her sincerity, spiritual insight, and level of intimacy with the divine beloved. Among famous anecdotes concerning Rābī'a are the Ka'ba's coming out to meet her and her desire to burn paradise and extinguish hell so that love for God would be sincere, removed from extrinsic fears and expectations of punishments or rewards.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. B. Abbas, The female voice in Sufi ritual. Devotional practices of Pakistan and India, Austin, Tex. 2002.
 L. Ahmed, Women in Muslim history, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
 Ibn al-'Arabī, Sufis of Andalusia. The "Rūh al-Quds" and "al-Durrat al-fākhirah" of Ibn 'Arabī, trans. and intro. R. W. J. Austin, foreword M. Lings, London 1971.

- J. Baldick, Mystical Islam. An introduction to Sufism, New York 1989.
- A. Böttcher, L'élite féminine kurde de la Kaftariyya. Une confrérie Naqshbandi damascene, in Les annales de l'autre islam 5 (1998), 125–39.
- M. Chodkiewicz, Female sainthood in Islam, in Sufi (Spring 1994), 12–19.
- J. Clancy-Smith, The house of Zainab. Female authority and saintly succession in colonial Algeria, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1992, 254–74.
- , The shaykh and his daughter. Coping in colonial Algeria, in E. Burke III (ed.), Struggle and survival in the modern Middle East, Berkeley 1993, 145–63.
- R. E. Cornell (ed. and trans.), Early Sufi women. Dhikr an-Niswa al-Muta'abbdāt aṣ-Ṣūfiyyāt by Abū 'Abd ar-Rahmān as-Sulamī, Louisville, Ky. 1999.
- A. Dialmy, Féminisme, islamisme, soufisme, Paris 1997.
- D. H. Dwyer, Women, Sufism and decision-making in Moroccan Islam, in L. Beck and N. R. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 585–98.
- J. Elias, Female and feminine in Islamic mysticism, in Muslim World 78 (1988), 209–24.
- al-Ghazālī, Marriage and sexuality in Islam, trans. M. Farah, Salt Lake City 1984.
- Habiba. A Sufi saint from Uzbekistan*, video film directed by C. Allione, Mystic Fire Video 1996.
- V. Hoffman, Sufism, mystics, and saints in modern Egypt, Columbia, S.C. 1995.
- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1979.
- F. Malti-Douglas, A woman and her Sufis, Washington, D.C. 1995.
- F. Mernissi, Women, saints, and sanctuaries, in Signs 3 (1977), 101–12.
- S. Murata, The Tao of Islam. A sourcebook on gender relationships in Islamic thought, Albany, N.Y. 1992.
- Mystic Iran. The unseen world*, film directed by A. Farshad, 2002.
- M. Özelsel, Forty days. The diary of a traditional Sufi solitary retreat, Brattleboro, Vt. 1996.
- C. Raudvere, The book and the roses. Sufi women, visibility and the Zikir in contemporary Istanbul, Istanbul 2002.
- S. Reinhertz, Women called to the path of Rumi. The way of the whirling dervish, Prescott, Ariz. 2001.
- Saints and spirits (Morocco)*, film directed by M. Llewelyn-Davies, produced by E. Fernea, 1979.
- A. Schimmel, My soul is a woman. The feminine in Islam, New York 1997.
- M. Smith, Rabī'a and her fellow saints in Islam, Cambridge 1924.
- R. Sultanova, Uzbekistan. Female rites as a musical phenomenon, 1999 <<http://www.santacecilia.it/italiano/archivi/etnomusicologico/ESEM99/musicspace/papers/sultanova/sultanova.htm>> (includes video of female dhikr).
- P. Werbner and H. Basu, Embodying charisma. Modernity, locality, and performance of emotion in Sufi cults, New York 1998.

MARCIA HERMANSEN

The United States

In the United States Sufi orders range from universal or New Age movements whose membership is largely Euro-American to transplanted communities of recent Muslim immigrants. Other American Sufi orders are hybrids of traditional Islamic and modern Western attitudes, practices, and individuals.

To the degree that Sharī'a-based rituals are incorporated by a particular Sufi order, gender distinctions become visibly operative in its functioning in America. In the more strictly Islamic Sufi movements such as the Naqshbandi-Ḥaqqānī order led in the United States by Shaykh Hishām Kabbānī, deputy and son-in-law of Shaykh Nāẓim, women participate in the gender segregated rituals but are not accorded formal leadership roles. Female members of the leaders' families are viewed as role models for women disciples.

In the case of many American Sufi women, gender segregation and other restrictions on female participation are likely to provoke some discomfort. This leads to a subversive quality in these women's reflections on Sufism in which they challenge normative Islamic concepts and cultural expectations regarding maleness and femininity and gender-specific roles. It is noteworthy that when Western women visit Sufi teachers in the Muslim world they are often accorded privileges of the shaykh's company and occupying male spaces denied to local females. The symbolic masculinization of Sufi women in American orders may include the adoption of symbols of affiliation and authority that were traditionally unique to men such as wearing special caps or robes.

It is said that Sufism was first brought to the United States in 1912 by the Indian Chishtī teacher, Ḥaẓrat Ināyāt Khān. His teachings evolved into a universalist interpretation of the unity behind all Prophetic revelations inspired by the same spirit of guidance. After Khān's untimely death in 1926 his movement was revived by his son, Pīr Vilāyat Khān, in the 1970s and joined for a time by disciples of an American Sufi, Murshid Samuel Lewis (1971). Eventually Lewis's disciples broke off to form their own movement, the Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society, now an international movement including practitioners of the Dances of Universal Peace developed by Lewis. Ināyāt Khān initiated a number of Western women as Sufi teachers (murshidas) and himself married an American. Today his grandson, Ziā Ināyāt Khan, directs the movement in the United States.

American Sufi movements of Turkish origin, the Halvetī-Jerrāhīs and Mevlevīs, are particularly interesting in terms of the extent of their female participation and leadership. The Halvetī-Jerrāhī order was brought to America by Shaykh Muzaffer Ozak (1993) of Istanbul who first came to the United States in 1980. Branches of this ṭarīqa developed in New York under the leadership of Tosun Bayrak and Shaykh Nūr (Lex Hixon), and in the San Francisco Bay Area under Ragip (Robert) Frager. After the death of Shaykh Muzaffer, the American order branched into two movements. Ultimately one branch of the American Jerrāhīs, known as the Ashkijerrāhīs, drawn mainly from Lex Hixon's followers, evolved separately, under a female teacher, Shaykha Farīḥa Fāṭima al-Jerrāhī. The biographical notice of Shaykha Farīḥa notes that she was made a female leader or shaykha by Muzaffer Ozak in 1985 and is the first female leader in the Jerrāhī order in over 300 years. The leader of this movement in Mexico is also a woman.

In the case of the Turkish Mevlevī order (often referred to as whirling dervishes), American initiates may learn the traditional practice of "turning." Among these disciples are American women who are set on breaking the barrier to female participation in the dhikr (form of Sufi meditation). Traditional shaykhs from Turkey may be pleased that Americans are becoming dervishes, but are unsettled to be asked to give permission for females to whirl, at least publicly. In another branch of the American Mevlevī movement, Camille Helminski joins her husband, Kabīr, in writing and teaching activities.

Among the challenges to traditional norms that have been raised by converted American Sufi women is activism. In the same way that third wave or cultural feminists try to avoid the past mistakes of white middle-class feminists in attempting to impose their agenda on women of color, female participants in Western Sufi movements feel the need to negotiate their understandings of gender roles so as to reflect both traditional authenticity and justice.

Webb's edited volume (2000) on Muslim women's activism in America includes articles by two women associated with Sufi movements. These women exemplify the active roles played by many Sufi women in American Muslim life today. Rabia Terri Harris is a member of the Halveti-Jerrāhī Sufi order. Harris has university degrees in Middle Eastern Languages and Cultures and has contributed translations of Arabic texts by the classical Sufi writer al-Qushayrī (d. 1072). She is involved in peace and justice movements and lectures on progressive Islam.

Gwendolyn Zohara Simmons is a member of the Sheikh Muhammad Raheem Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Mosque and Fellowship in Philadelphia. Guru Bawa Muhaiyaddeen (d. 1986), a Sufi teacher from Sri Lanka, settled in Philadelphia in 1972, and attracted many American followers. The community has evolved at present into two branches, one more focused on Bawa as a spiritual teacher in a non-denominational orientation and the other more Islamic Sharī'a-oriented. In her writings Simmons, an African-American, directly confronts the oppression of women in some Muslim contexts, including among some American Muslim communities, in the light of her personal experiences in the American Civil Rights movement. According to Simmons, the Sufi master Guru Bawa taught that women manifest the feminine qualities of Allah, and gave special recognition to women's participation and leadership.

The directness of some female Sufis is sometimes seen by male Sufi leaders as rebelling against conventional gender expectations. In an incident at an International Association of Sufism Conference in the San Francisco Bay Area in 1994, a Rifā'ī Sufi shaykh from Kuwait was leading a collective dhikr, in which a succession of universal and Sharī'a-oriented teachers took turns directing the audience in Islamic chants. The shaykh commented that since some female participants were not covering their hair during the practices, the angels could not be present at the gathering. Some American Sufi women were outraged at this comment and protested by walking out, in a few cases provocatively tossing their heads to flaunt their cascading tresses in defiance.

In summary, it is clear that female members of Western Sufi movements take positions about gender along some sort of continuum from subversion and activism directed to challenging and reforming traditional Muslim practices to acceptance of the rationale for "gender complementarity."

In fact, the concept that maleness and femaleness function as distinct energies is expressed not only by Sharī'a-oriented movements, but also in certain teachings of universalist groups such as the Islamia Ruhaniat International. Members of these groups cultivate specific movements, dances, or practices as part of "attuning" to essentially different gender frequencies.

Several Shī'ī Sufi orders are present in the United States. Dr. Nahid Angha, daughter of the Sufi teacher Shāh Maghsoud (d. 1980), whose shrine is located in Novato, California, is the leader of the International Association of Sufism. In her movement a woman friendly approach is taken. Initiatives of this group include trying to foster cooperation and communication across all Sufi movements. In addition, in 1993 they established a global networking movement for female Sufis, the Sufi Women Organization.

The son of Shāh Maghsoud, Saleheddin Ali Nader Angha, heads a separate organization known as the MTO (Maktab Tarīghat Oveyssi) or the Shahmaghsoudi School of Islamic Sufism with over 39 centers in North America. The membership is drawn from both the Persian émigré and American convert Muslim communities. Women have a high degree of leadership within the movement and run a number of the local centers, giving lessons and teaching Sufi practices. Rituals (the dhikr) of the MTO are performed with males and females seated separately but in the same space. Head covering is not required although both genders generally wear white clothing for the ceremonies. A number of the female members of the movement have published works related to Sufism, including California psychologist Dr. Lynn Wilcox, Linda O'Riordan, Barbara Larsen, Soraya Behbehani, Farnaz Khoromi, Melvina Noel, and Avidesh Shashaani.

Another prominent American Sufi woman is Dr. Laleh Bakhtiar of Chicago, who has been affiliated with several Sufi orders. She is a writer in the fields of Sufi thought and psychology and edits and translates classical Sufi and Islamic sources.

Gray Henry is an American woman who was initiated into the Shādhilī order. Through the publishing houses Islamic Texts Society and Fons Vitae, which she founded, Henry makes available scholarly translations of works on Islamic spirituality for both the serious seeker and the academic classroom.

In the African American Muslim community Sufism has not played a very large role. African American Muslims usually join Shari'a-oriented movements such as the Bawa Muhaiyadeen Foundation and the Naqshbandī-Haqqānī order. In African-based immigrant movements such as the Tijāniyya, the Burhāniyya, and the Murīdiyya the leadership is largely drawn from African immigrants, and therefore women's leadership roles have not been prominent.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Angha, Principles of Sufism, Fremont, Calif. 1991.
 L. Bakhtiar, Sufi women of America. Angels in the making, Chicago 1997.
 L. Banner, Finding Fran. History and memory in the lives of two women, New York 1998.
 C. Helminski, Women of Sufism. A hidden treasure, Boulder, Colo. 2003.
 M. Hermansen, What's American about American Sufi movements?, in David Westerlund (ed.), Sufism in Europe and North America, New York 2004, 36–62.
 S. Reinhertz, Women called to the path of Rumi. The way of the whirling dervish, Prescott, Ariz. 2001.
 G. Webb (ed.), Windows of faith. Muslim women scholar activists in North America, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.

L. Wilcox, Women and the Holy Quran. A Sufi perspective, Riverside, Calif. 1998.

Sufi Women Organization, Sufi women. The journey towards the beloved, Novato, Calif. 1998.

MARCIA HERMANSEN

Western Europe

THE RECEPTION OF SUFISM

When European research about the "Orient" began in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the poet Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832) included Islamic and especially Sufi motifs in many of his poems, serving to introduce some of the ideas of Islamic mysticism in the West. Founders of European Islamic studies such as Ignaz Goldziher, Carl Heinrich Becker, and Christiaan Snouck Hurgronje saw Sufism as functioning to close the gaps between Islamic law, theology, and individual piety, and Sufism was labeled as secondary to the dominant development of orthodox Islam. Not until the middle of the twentieth century did Sufism come to be understood by European scholars as an integral part of the cultural heritage of Islam and as a widely influential power in the development of the religion. In recent years, Sufism has also been transformed into a medium for dealing with East-West philosophy and cultural globalization by Western researchers and believers.

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF SUFI GROUPS AND ORDERS

Sufism in Western Europe has developed in three primary types. First is that developed by Westerners in the early twentieth century looking for sources of religious and spiritual truth outside the Christian church. Second, since the 1960s Muslim labor migrants have brought traditional Sufi orders and practices to the West. Third, today there are Western Sufi orders which are mixtures of the first two types.

WESTERNIZED SUFI GROUPS

Some extraordinary forms of Sufi practices attracted Western intellectuals and travelers. One of the first travelers to be initiated into a Sufi order was a woman, the Russian Isabelle Eberhardt (1877–1904). In 1900 she became a member of the Qadiri order in Tunisia, but she died four years later. The initiation of the Swiss Fritjof Schuon (1907–98) in 1932, and more especially of Georges Ivanovitch Gurdjieff (1866–1949), had a serious impact on the spread of Sufism. Gurdjieff was a central figure for various Sufi orders in Western Europe and the United States who were attracted to his Sufi music and dance performances.

One of the first Sufi groups to be established in the West was that of Ḥaẓrat Ināyāt Khān (1882–1927), an Indian Pīr of the Chishtiyya order who traveled to the United States, England, and Germany in 1910. During his travels he attracted a number of Western disciples. He started publishing books in English about Sufism in 1914, and two years later he settled in London and founded the first Sufi order in Western Europe. Also important for the development of this Westernized Sufism were the writings of such dominant figures as Idris Shah (an Indian with a Scottish mother), who published The Sufis in 1964, and Reshad Feild, who wrote The Last Barrier in 1976. These books became very popular and were translated into other Western languages. Although the authors were influential and famous in the arena of Westernized Sufism, they were almost never leaders of Sufi orders. Westernized Sufism was generally presented as something that can be separated from Islam. The followers were almost always non-Muslim Westerners who understood Sufism more as a kind of philosophy or universal religion than as a religious practice of Islam, although it was often combined with forms of music, dance, and meditation.

Today the best-known and most widespread association of trans-Islamic Sufism is the Western Sufi movement founded by Pīr Ḥaẓrat Ināyāt Khān. The group has branches in France, Germany, the Netherlands, the United States, and several other countries. Today the association is led by the Pīr's son, Vilāyāt Ināyāt Khān. Followers believe in the wisdom of uniting different religious forms of mystical expression and in the mystical relationship between God, man, and creation. Within the Sufi movement, special techniques and steps of mystical learning, spiritual healing, and spiritual symbology exist (Jironet 2002).

SUFI ORDERS IN THE WEST

With the immigration of workers from Muslim countries starting in the 1960s, Islam became established in Western European countries. Sufi orders were built by labor migrants from Morocco, India, Sudan, and other countries. In the beginning, they were not noticed much by Westerners because the existence of something other than orthodox Islamic practice was not known. Today these orders are ethnically closed groups which do not differ in any significant aspect from their counterparts in the Islamic world or in non-Muslim countries outside the West. A Punjabi immigrant in Britain, for example, may belong to a British branch of the same order that his family belongs to in the Punjab. The Punjabi order supports the expatriate in Britain with spiritual guidance and material assistance. The Punjabi shaykh or his khalīfa (Arabic, successor, here the second in the hierarchy) travels to Britain often, and the British immigrant goes regularly on a pilgrimage to his shaykh or his shrine. Often the children of immigrants are sent by their parents to the order in their country of origin for a traditional education. Attempts to establish independent branches of such ethnic traditional Sufi orders have often failed because of the power of different groups in the country of origin (Geaves 2000).

Traditional Sufi orders are found especially in Britain and France where workers emigrated from countries with vivid Sufi traditions. All followers share the same ethnic background and special devotional practices of their order such as the dhikr ceremony and pilgrimage to the shrine of a dead shaykh. Many orders also celebrate the birthday of the Prophet Muḥammad with a procession in the streets in some European cities. In Germany such Sufi groups are rare because the majority of immigrants come from Turkey where Sufi orders have been forbidden since 1925. But today there are so-called laic Sufi orders (for example, Süleymançiler) without a living shaykh but with ceremonial practices, such as dhikr and recitation of the silsila, of the founder of the group.

WESTERN SUFI ORDERS

There are also Sufi orders that are trans-ethnic and Islamic. Two groups are worth mentioning because they are widespread in Western Europe. One of the most prominent Western Sufi orders is the Naqshbandī order of the Cypriot Shaykh Muḥammad Nāẓim 'Adil al-Qubruṣī al-Ḥaqqānī. Shaykh Nāẓim made his first visit to Europe in 1974. Twenty years later more than three thousand people attended the London mosque each night where he led prayers during Ramadan. Today he has followers all over the Islamic world and in the West. Although the practices of the order do not differ much from other Naqshbandī orders, the Western followers of Nāẓim differ from other traditional Sufi orders because the majority are women and from the spiritual left. The Western order is ethnically mixed, so Muslim-born and converts pray together. The order has established an independent identity in the West. The weekly dhikr and the visits from Shaykh Nāẓim, who travels throughout the world, are the center of the social activities of the order.

The other important Western Sufi order is the Sudanese Burhāniyya, a branch of the Shadhiliyya founded by Shaykh ʿUthmān (d. 1983). His son, the present Shaykh Ibrāhīm, resides in Khartoum and visits Germany annually. At first the Western non-Muslim Burhānīs were spiritually oriented seekers who only practiced Sufi dhikr, but today they claim to be orthodox Muslims. Sudanese advisers have been acting as teachers of the Western converts. The order does not differ from traditional Islamic Sufi orders. Only the trans-ethnic spread in Western Europe and the central role of Western women in the Western branches are unusual.

In general it can be said that female Western murids (pupils) are in the majority in Westernized and Western Sufi orders in Europe. The separation of the sexes is not as strict as is usual in Sufi groups in Islamic countries. Nevertheless, khalīfas are almost always men. One exception is Irina Tweedie, who has followed the Indian Naqshbandī way and today has many murids in the West. All the Westernized and Western Sufi groups focus on ritual, mostly with music and dance. Members practice no silent dhikr in the Westernized Naqshbandī tradition and only a minority of them perform the five Islamic ritual prayers. Western shaykhs seldom practice spiritual healing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- T. Atay, The significance of the other in Islam. Reflections on the discourse of a Naqshbandi circle of Turkish origin in London, in Muslim World 89:3/4 (1999), 455-77.
- M. Dressler, Sufismus in Deutschland, in Handbuch der Religionen 4:2 (1997), 1-10.
- K. Duran, Muslim diaspora. The Sufis in Western Europe, in Islamic Studies 30:4 (1991), 463-83.
- S. Galip, Un gourou Nakshibendi. Sheyh Nazim Kibrisi, in M. Gabrieleau, A. Popovic, and T. Zarcone (eds.), Naqshbandis. Historical developments and present situation of a Muslim mystical order, Istanbul 1990, 437-40.
- R. Geaves, The Sufis of Britain. An exploration of Muslim identity, Cardiff 2000.
- K. Jironet, The image of spiritual liberty in the Western Sufi movement following Hazrat Inayat Khan, Leuven 2002.
- M. H. Kabbani, The Naqshbandi Sufi way. History and guidebook of the saints of the Golden Chain, Chicago 1996.
- A. Rawlinson, A history of Western Sufism, in Diskus 1:1 (1993), 45-83.
- L. Schlesann, Sufismus in Deutschland. Deutsche auf dem Weg des mystischen Islam, Cologne 2003.
- S. Sviri, Documentation and experiences of a modern Naqshbandi Sufi, in E. Puttick and P. B. Clarke (eds.), Women as teachers and disciples in traditional and new religions, Lewiston, N.Y. 1993, 77-89.
- L. F. Williams (ed.), Sufi studies. East and West. A symposium in honor of Idries Shah's services to Sufi studies by twenty-four contributors marking the 700th anniversary of the death of Jalaluddin Rumi (A.D. 1207-1273), New York 1973.

GRITT KLINKHAMMER

Umma

Overview

The term umma designates one of the most fundamental concepts in Islam. Often translated as the “Muslim community” of men and women, the term has assumed different meanings in evolving historical circumstances. Conceptually, the meaning of the term umma underwent significant transformations in three main contexts: the early, formative use of the term in the Qurʾān and ḥadīth; the elaboration of the concept in Islamic legal and political thought; and finally, the extension of the use of the term to denote national communities and the concept of a nation. The sources for the study of the concept of umma in the first phase are both relatively limited and equivocal. In the second and third phases of its development, a wealth of historical information and a vast and diverse literature both refine and complicate the understanding of the concept in its different settings and contexts.

The foundational source for the study of the Islamic concept of umma is, naturally, the Qurʾān. The term umma appears 64 times in the Qurʾān; in Qurʾānic usage, it usually designates a people to whom God sends a prophet, or a people who are objects of a divine plan of salvation. In both cases, the term umma, and the communities identified in its various uses, equally refer to and are made up of men and women. According to most studies of the Qurʾānic concept, the term umma refers to a single group sharing some sort of common religious orientation. In Qurʾānic usage, however, the connotations of community and religion do not always converge.

The word umma has multiple and diverse meanings in the Qurʾān. In several instances it refers to an unspecified group of people (for example, “And when he [Moses] came to the water of Madyan, he found on it a group of men [umma min al-nās] watering,” 28:23). The term can also mean a specific religion or the beliefs of a group of people (for example, “they say: We found our fathers following a certain umma, and we are guided by their footprints,” 43:22), or an exemplar or model of faith, as in the reference to Abraham as an “umma, obedient to God” (16:120). Umma also refers to the followers of prophets (for example, “For every umma there is an apostle,” 10:47); to a group of people adhering to a specific religion (for example, “To each one of you We have appointed a law and a pattern of life. If God had pleased He could surely have made you all a single umma,” 5:48); to a smaller group within the larger community of adherents (for example, “They are not all alike; among the people of the Book is an upright umma,” 3:113); to the followers of Muḥammad who are charged with a special responsibility (for example, “And thus We have made you a medium umma that you may be the bearers of witness to the people and that the Apostle may be a bearer of witness to you,” 2:143); or to a subgroup of these followers (for example, “So let there be an umma among you who may call to good, enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong, and these it is that shall be successful,” 3:104).

Umma also often denotes a misguided group of people (for example, “Were it not that all people would be a single umma, We would certainly have allocated to those who disbelieve in the Beneficent God [to make] of silver the roofs of their houses and the stairs by which they ascend,” 43:33), or a misguided party from among the followers of a prophet (for example, “And on the day when We will gather from every umma a party from among those who rejected Our communications, then they shall be formed into groups,” 27:83, or “Then We sent Our apostles one after the other; whenever there came to an umma their apostle, they called him a liar, so We made one follow the other [to its dooms], and We turned them into bygone tales,” 23:44). Umma could mean a period of time (“And if We hold back from them the punishment until a stated umma/period of time, they will say,” 11:8); it can also mean an order of being (“And there is no animal that walks upon the earth nor a bird that flies with its two wings but they are an umma like yourself,” 6:38).

With the vast majority of Qurʾānic injunctions addressed jointly and explicitly to men and women (al-muʾminīna wa-al-muʾmināt), and lacking any textual evidence for a gender specific use of the term umma, the community in the Qurʾānic conception of umma encompasses men and women alike. This inclusive use of the term is corroborated in the events of the formative period and, to a great extent, in the ḥadīth literature where the communal sense of the term is clearly articulated. Although it is hard to come up with precise estimates, it is likely that in the Meccan period of Muḥammad's prophethood, a majority of the converts to Islam were women. In fact, the first person to accept Muḥammad's call to Islam was his wife Khadija who played an instrumental role in supporting Muḥammad and reassuring him in times of doubt and hardship. Women converts to Islam also played a central role in spreading the teachings of the new religion, gaining new converts, and protecting the young and vulnerable community of Muslims. For example, the early sources provide accounts of the role Muslim women played in subverting, and eventually lifting a Meccan siege and boycott of the Banū Hāshim (Muḥammad's clan) quarter of Mecca. Thus, women were not just included in the new Muslim community, but they played a vital role in constituting this community and securing its survival.

The dichotomy between the communal and religious notions of umma in the Qur'ānic use of the term has parallels in ḥadīth literature. In several traditions attributed to Muḥammad, the term "my umma" is used to refer to his kinship group and not to those related to him by religion. Nonetheless, ḥadīth literature provides the concept of umma with its precise and focused meaning. Besides the Qur'ān, the earliest extant source of Islamic provenance is a set of documents written by Muḥammad shortly after his arrival at Medina. These documents, commonly referred to in modern scholarship as the "constitution of Medina," comprise several practical provisions designed to regulate social and political life in Medina under Islam. The main purport of the "constitution" is political and not religious. It defines treaty relations between the different groups living in Medina and its environs, including the Muslim tribes of Medina, Muslims who emigrated from Mecca, and Jews. The constitution starts with the pronouncement that all these groups constitute "one distinct community (umma) apart from other people." In the 47 clauses of the constitution, the term umma appears only in one other instance when the Jews of Banū 'Awf are said to constitute "an umma with the believers." The same clause goes on to state that the Jews have their religion and the Muslims have theirs. The meaning of the term umma in the constitution is clearly not synonymous with religion. The constitution also delineates relations of mutual aid between the different constituent tribal groups, actions to be taken against those who violate the terms of the agreement, and actions to be taken against criminals belonging to the incipient community in Medina. Rather than supplanting or abolishing the tribal bonds, the constitution regulates the relations within tribes, and between them and the outside world, on the basis of the higher order of umma. Umma here is a concept of daily life that also stands for a certain kind of identity and defines a social unit.

While the "constitution of Medina" sanctions diversity within the Islamic umma, the Qur'ān further sanctions differentiation between various ummahs as a norm decreed by God. Sūra 10:19 reads, "People were once a single umma; but they differed (and followed different ways). Had it not been for the word proclaimed by your lord before, their differences would have been resolved" (see also 2:213, 5:48, 11:118, 16:93, and 42:8). To some extent, therefore, the Qur'ānic concept of umma refers to an ideal collective order, an original all-encompassing unity which is always invoked, but never completely recovered. This rudimentary concept of the umma, however, is complemented by the narrower concept of the umma of believers. This is the "medium umma" (2:143) which is further qualified in the Qur'ān as: "the best umma evolved for mankind, enjoining what is good, forbidding what is wrong, and believing in God" (3:110; see also 4:41 and 16:89). This specific umma, or the followers of Muḥammad, is further differentiated from the followers of earlier messengers and prophets; whereas the latter's sphere of influence is restricted to particular peoples, the former's scope is all of humanity. When referring to prophets before Muḥammad, the Qur'ān says, "To every umma We have sent an apostle [saying:] Worship God" (16:36; see also 10:47); in reference to Muḥammad, however, the Qur'ān adds: "Say: O people, I am verily the apostle of God to you all" (7:158). The universality of Muḥammad's mission was thereby asserted, and the "medium umma" played the central role in the fulfillment of this mission after him. Once again, this medium umma is not specified along gender lines, and no differentiation is made between men and women in its constitution.

The concept of umma underwent substantial developments immediately after Muḥammad's death. Different circumstances accompanied the selection of each of the first four caliphs after Muḥammad, yet in each of these cases the appointment was conferred by the majority of the umma, thereby investing ultimate political authority in the umma and its consensus. Other developments sharpened the conceptions of umma and its theoretical authority. For example, many early leaders and religious authorities argued that, to preserve its unity, the umma needs a leadership unified in the person of one imam. According to this view, therefore, the interests of the umma provided the justification for the authority invested in the office of the imam or caliph, and as such, the umma served as the ultimate source of political authority. The second caliph, 'Umar, relinquished the distribution of conquered land to Muslim conquerors, and considered it public property, the property of the whole umma. In addition to its social and political ramifications, 'Umar's action effectively treated the umma as a corporate legal entity. To be sure, in subsequent periods of Islamic history, the ideals of the formative period were often violated; yet the tension between these ideals – the unity of the umma and its role as the ultimate source of political authority – and the political and social realities of Muslim societies continued to inform Islamic legal and political theory and practice throughout history.

Under Umayyad rule, the need for a unified political authority was overemphasized, and was used to justify an exclusive Arab dynastic rule at the expense of the ideal of the unity of the umma. Under the 'Abbāsids, the inclusive Qur'ānic notion of the umma was revived, and the political dominance of the 'Abbāsīd family did not preclude the participation of other ethnic groups. This participation, however, led to the gradual loosening of political centralization. As the 'Abbāsīd caliphs wielded less control over an increasingly decentralized state, they continued to function as symbols for the unity of its umma. This unity was also corroborated by an Islamic cultural tradition which was well developed by the end of the second century of Islam.

Traditionalists and ḥadīth scholars argued that Islam can only be preserved by safeguarding the unity of the umma. The standard legal formulations of the classical period defined the umma as a spiritual, non-territorial community that is distinguished on the basis of the shared beliefs of its members. The literature of the classical period also viewed the umma as a socioreligious reality with legal and political import. There were no formal conditions or ritual requirements for joining the umma aside from being born to Muslim parents or freely choosing to become a Muslim. Membership in this umma can thus be viewed as a sort of citizenship which guarantees the equality of all Muslims. Yet although this equality extended in the Qur'ānic formulations to both genders, in the lived experiences of Muslim societies women were often excluded from the exercise of political authority. For example, while most legal scholars recognized the intellectual authority of women scholars and their right to issue legal rulings (fatwas), they also argued that women cannot occupy executive office, thus restricting the effective participation of women within the collective order of the umma.

Tensions between various ethnic groups in Muslim societies also compromised the ideal of a unified umma. Beginning with the third century after the hijra, Islamic literature conferred a distinguished status to the Arabs within the larger umma of Muslims. This literature emphasized the centrality of the Arabs and their language to Islam in response to the shu'ūbiyya movement, which denigrated the Arabs in favor of other ethnic identities. Al-Shāfi'ī (d. 820), for example, lists in his Risāla the Qur'ānic references to Arabic and its prominence, while Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (d. 855) collects numerous ḥadīths which enumerate the virtues of Arabs and reprimand their foes. In different genres of writing, including jurisprudence, philosophy, history, poetry, and prose, the Arabs are said to be privileged with the language of the Qur'ān and of Paradise, and by being the core community to whom Muḥammad was sent. As the political hegemony of the Arabs receded, so did the cultural tensions between them and other ethnic groups. The initial reactive defenses of Arabs and Arabic gave way to independent self-conscious reflections on Arabness as a cultural identity, and on its unique and organic link to the religious, political, and social identity of the Islamic umma.

The social reality of the unified umma, and the related concept of the abode of Islam (dār al-Islām), were not undermined by political decentralization in the Islamic world. However, under the pressure of European colonial encroachment on Muslim domains, this social identity was seriously challenged. Attempts to defend and redeem Muslim unity by reviving the idea of the umma included popular Islamic resistance movements as well as the officially-sponsored pan-Islamic policies of the Ottoman Sulṭān 'Abd al-Ḥamīd the Second (1878–1909). Equally significant was the call by Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī (1839–97) for Islamic solidarity to reinvigorate the umma in the face of European aggression. The European colonial challenge, however, had an intellectual dimension: European ideas of the secular nation-state and of reforming social and gender relations had some appeal among Muslim elites. Nonetheless, the earliest forms of nationalism in the Islamic world conceived of Islam as a central component of the nationalist project, and appropriated the Islamic concept of umma. While nationalist movements in the guise of Islamic reform often disrupted the actual political unity of the umma, they did not challenge the theoretical authority of its idea. The secularization of nationalism came at a later stage, and with it the sharpening of the conflict between loyalties to the sovereign, secular nation-state, and the religious umma. These competing loyalties eventually led to a larger separation between Islam and nationalism.

Women participated in the nationalist movements and were also symbolically invoked in the emerging nationalist discourses. Generally, however, nationalist movements and discourses did not provide effective solutions for problems of gender inequality, and the nationalist project remained heavily dominated by men. When, in the second half of the twentieth century, some nationalists began to speak out in favor of a complete separation of religious and national identities, many Islamists responded by arguing that loyalty to the Islamic umma negates any other loyalty to ethnic, linguistic, or geographical entities. To a greater extent than their nationalist counterparts, women participated in the Islamist movements and here too were symbolically invoked in the Islamic critiques of nationalism. Nonetheless, the idea of an Islamic umma, as it is used in contemporary political discourse, carries the imprints of the nation-state with which it is competing. Similarly, the challenges facing women within the context of the nationalist movements, whether secular or Islamic, are intertwined. And despite substantial limitations on political and legal expressions of the idea of the umma, it remains a significant source of social identity for many Muslim men and women throughout the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Al-Ahsan, Ummah or nation? Identity crisis in contemporary Muslim society, Leicester, U.K. 1992.
 N. Berkes, The development of secularism in Turkey, Montreal 1964.
 W. R. Darrow, Ummah, in The encyclopedia of religion, xv, New York 1987, 123–5.
 F. M. Denny, The meaning of umma in the Qurʾān, in History of religions 15 (1975), 34–70.
 —, Ummah in the Constitution of Medina, in Journal of Near Eastern Studies 36:1 (1977), 39–47.

- E. Giannakis, The concept of umma, in Graeco-Arabica 2 (1983), 99–111.
 H. A. R. Gibb, The Islamic congress at Jerusalem in December 1931, in A. J. Toynbee (ed.), A survey of international affairs, London 1935, 99–109.
 —, The community in Islamic history, in Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 107:2 (1963), 173–6.
 G. E. von Grunebaum, Nationalism and cultural trends in the Arab Near East, in Studia Islamica 14 (1961), 121–53.
 —, Modern Islam. The search for cultural identity, Berkeley, 1962.
 Muḥammad Ḥamadallāh al-Ḥaydarabādī, Majmūʿat al-waṭḥāʾiq al-siyāsiyya li-al-ʿahd al-nabawī wa-al-khilāfa al-rāshida, Cairo 1956. Includes the Arabic text of the “Constitution of Medina,” 15–21.
 A. Hourani, Arabic thought in the liberal age, 1798–1939, Cambridge 1983.
 M. Kramer, Islam assembled. The advent of the Muslim Congress, New York 1986.
 H. Kruse, The development of the concept of nationality in Islam, in Studies in Islam 2:1 (1965), 7–16.
 L. Massignon, L’umma et ses synonymes. Notion de “communauté sociale” en islam, in Revue des études islamiques, 1941–1946, Paris 1959, 151–7.
 N. Nassar, Maḥmūm al-umma bayn al-dīn wa-al-tārikh, Beirut 1978.
 —, Taṣawwūrāt al-umma al-muʿāṣira, Kuwait 1986.
 C. A. O. von Nieuwenhuijze, The umma. An analytic approach, in Studia Islamica 10 (1959), 5–22.
 R. Paret, Umma, in The Encyclopedia of Islam, new ed., iv, Leiden, 1960–, 1015–16.
 I. H. Qureshi, The struggle for Pakistan, Karachi 1969.
 F. Rahman, The principle of shura and the role of the umma in Islam, in American Journal of Islamic Studies 1:1 (1984), 1–9.
 U. Rubin, The “Constitution of Medina.” Some notes, in Studia Islamica 62 (1985), 5–23.
 R. al-Sayyid, Al-umma wa-al-jamāʿa wa-al-sulṭa. Dirāsāt fī al-fīkr al-siyāsī al-ʿarabī al-Islāmī, Beirut 1984.
 —, Dār al-Islām wa-l-nizām al-duwalī wa-al-umma al-ʿArabiyya, in Mustaqbal al-ʿalam al-Islāmī 1:1 (1991), 37–70.
 —, Maḥābīm al-jamāʿāt fī al-Islām. Beirut 1993.
 R. B. Serjeant, The Constitution of Medina, in Islamic quarterly 8 (1964), 3–16.
 A. D. al-ʿUmari, Al-mujtamaʿ al-madanī fī ʿahd al-nubūwa, Medina 1983, 107–36.
 W. M. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, Oxford 1956.

AHMAD DALLAL

Women's Rights: Male Advocacy

Overview

THE NINETEENTH AND TWENTIETH CENTURIES

The Woman Question early on became a key component of state actors' attempts to mobilize all available resources to fend off encroachment by European powers looking to colonize or simply render usable (to them) the geostrategic assets of the Middle East, North Africa, and other traditionally Muslim territories. Beginning in the early nineteenth century, reformers in the Ottoman Empire and the Egyptian khedival state started to expand the roles of women in society as a distinct category of modern state-building efforts. Mehmet Ali (Muḥammad 'Ali) (r. 1803–48), as governor of Egypt when it was a semi-autonomous province of the Ottoman Empire, identified women as part of a reproductive formula to create the strong and healthy population he needed to build his military and economic strength. Ironically, his reforms led to famine and ill health through the loss of much subsistence agriculture. Mehmet Ali implemented reforms to reduce infant mortality and improve female reproductive health, including founding a state school of midwifery. The first classes of midwives to graduate were African slave women, but the school recruited more widely as it expanded. Midwife graduates were married to medical school graduates before being sent out to set up public health services in the countryside. Such reforms, driven by state necessity to create new roles for women, were repeated throughout the remainder of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and continue today.

Beginning in the 1850s, Ottoman intellectuals started to debate the implications of these policies. The prominent intellectual and journalist Namık Kemal argued in 1867 that Ottoman women had become weak and wasteful in the nineteenth century from aping Western bourgeois mores, while at the same time becoming woefully ignorant, leaving them unable to conceive of alternatives to what was presented to them by local Europeans and by the European press as new, chic, and appropriate. Namık Kemal attempted to remedy this with the first Ottoman publication for women, a supplement to his own gazette, in which he argued for a distinctly Ottoman and Muslim vision of modern women through discussions of education, public comportment, educated motherhood, and patriotic shopping as part of managing a household's finances. In 1882, another prominent Ottoman intellectual tied the nation's progress to its treatment of women, in a formula that was to become characteristic of modern Muslim intellectuals. Şemseddin Sâmî's pocket paperback entitled Kadımlar (Women) became a bestseller, and was reissued in 1895, but he was forced by censors to cut out a section on veiling as a condition of being allowed to publish it. Our only indication of what this section argued is a photograph of himself and his wife, both dressed in Western style, and she without charshaf (unveiled). Like Namık Kemal, Şemseddin Sâmî saw education as the key to progress not simply for women but through women, for Muslim societies and states in general.

At roughly the same time in Egypt, Qāsim Amīn published in Arabic very similar arguments for changes in the status of modern Muslim women. In the 1880s, women began to enter these debates on their own behalf, and to challenge, adapt, and manipulate state reform agendas to expand women's roles. In the Ottoman center of Istanbul and the main port cities of the empire, the Woman Question arose at the same time that newspapers and other cheap print media began to spread from state-sponsored gazettes to more private and corporate productions, and as public education was vastly expanded and modernized. Here again, state imperatives opened doors for women, and female journalists, teachers, and entrepreneurs began to achieve prominence under the protection of male publishers and bureaucrats. By 1900, the Woman Question had taken the form it has held mainly to this day among Muslim thinkers ranging from conservative to radical: delineating the place of women in society and the role of education in allowing them to fulfill their societal duties; providing a history of women's rights in other eras and concurrently in other countries; and describing the place of women according to any given writer's understanding of Islam. Among these three writers, Şemseddin Sâmî seems to have been the most radical, and the only one to argue consistently that women's education would not simply benefit the health and well-being of their families, but could also allow women into the workplace. From the 1870s onwards, most of the empire was devastated by continuous warfare on the frontiers, with two key results for our purposes here: massive refugee flows into the empire from lost provinces, and conscription of men of all ages into the army, leaving women as de facto heads of households. These demographic facts gave weight to arguments of Şemseddin Sâmî that women needed to be educated for work outside the home, and women were actively recruited by state actors into the new high tech sectors of telegraphy and telephony, as well as into teaching and writing for publication. By the end of the First World War, women in the workplace had become familiar to urbanites in the Mediterranean basin from Cairo to Istanbul, and out to the borders of Iraq. The situation in Iran, in majority-Muslim colonies in south and east Asia, and in North Africa was somewhat different.

INTERWAR ERA

After the First World War, much of the Muslim world was under the rule or “tutelage” of European and east Asian powers. In the 1920s and 1930s, local notables were deeply invested in proving their fitness to rule, which included the display of modern attitudes toward women. Nonetheless, women in this region underwent a similar pressure to return home and leave jobs to the male survivors of the First World War. An example of how European attitudes were used to criticize and at the same time subvert local authorities is the odd character of Lord Cromer, consul-general of Egypt. When at home in England, Lord Cromer was an active member of a club aiming to suppress efforts by British women to gain the vote. In Egypt, though, he was a trenchant critic of veiling and other local practices that he portrayed as oppressive of Muslim women, arguing that their piteous state was evidence of Muslims’ inability to rule themselves. Though his intentions were not aimed in the end at expanding women’s rights, his rhetoric nonetheless opened doors to heightened debate about the potential and necessity of educating women and allowing them more public roles in modernizing Islamic societies and states. Qāsim Amin’s arguments were given an extra boost, for example, and Egyptian and Syrian women took the changed public atmosphere as their opportunity to found women’s magazines promoting a variety of feminist agendas. During the British Protectorate of Egypt and the mandate system in the Arab heartlands, male bureaucrats saw to it that women’s education expanded along with general education throughout the region as a way of mobilizing human resources for independence. Nation-states required local leadership with local loyalties at the ruling level, but equally essential were loyal citizens, conscious of their democratic rights and responsibilities and capable of fulfilling their new roles. For this reason, women were activated as educated housewives and mothers, having the primary responsibility for raising children to become the new patriotic and hard-working citizens of modern nation-states.

In the mandate territory of Palestine, this project was complicated by a continual flow of Jewish immigrants into and out of Palestine. Jews of European origin arrived with a civilizing mission in mind, and many of them also arrived with socialist and communist ideals they pursued, including absolute equality (outside the home) for women. The kibbutzim and moshavim (collective communities) of early Palestine were active areas of experimentation in such radical ideas as collective childcare and women’s equal participation in the workforce in areas not traditionally associated with women. Some of these early collectives attempted to establish peaceful coexistence with Arab populations, incorporating them into their collective projects of improving the land. The effect of this radical stream of European thought has been diluted by the continuing marginalization of Jewish Zionists arguing for peaceful coexistence and other alternative social visions in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, as well as the State of Israel’s need to develop a vibrant capital sector in order to support its military expenditures. Nonetheless, the ideas of Marx and Engels, along with those of Fourier and other European radicals of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, put these men, and their followers in the region, in the camp of men supporting expansion of women’s rights and responsibilities to support state-building projects.

In North Africa, women were extremely active in the bloody struggle for independence from France throughout the 1960s and still echoing in Algerian politics today. In post-revolutionary states and postcolonial states, the new rulers were often either military men wedded to meritocratic ideas that some applied and some did not apply to women along with men. Another variant was a new or modernizing monarchy as in Morocco or Afghanistan, where kings moved rapidly to pull women into educational and work environments, and even into active political life as elected and appointed officials of the state. In Dutch colonies in southeast Asia, as well as the former British colony of India, Muslim women became objects of reform, as well as activists in anti-colonial struggles. Male Muslim scholars and activists participated directly in the formative debates of Arab-Muslim modernity and liberation struggles, achieving fame and a wide readership in the Muslim world at large, as they forwarded arguments debating possible roles for women. Many had recognizably feminist agendas; many made traditional arguments for women's participation in the workforce and public life after their children were school-age or older; many argued for a preservation of local ethnic traditions that defied Qur'anic injunctions for women's rights in family and property laws.

COLONIAL AND POSTCOLONIAL STRUGGLES

While men were the leaders of most anti-colonial struggles at the beginning of the twentieth century, women rose to prominence as heroes of the resistance and protectors of guerrilla fighters throughout the century. Their fame was sharply curtailed, however, by traditional attitudes compounded of Greco-Roman and Mesopotamian imperial cultures with a broad variety of tribal cultures that privileged men's roles in warfare and resistance over that of women. An early exception was Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, founder of modern Turkey, who instituted universal public education and female suffrage in the 1920s and 1930s, arguing that giving women equal rights was a way of paying off the debt Turkey owed them for their heroic service during the First World War and the war for Turkish independence (see Figure 6).

While Iran was not formally colonized, it had been an intense focus of Anglo-Russian conflict since the nineteenth century, with England attempting to protect its south Asian colonies, and Russia pushing toward Iran's rich reserves of manpower, wealth, and natural resources. Most activist intellectuals focused intensely on preserving or regaining Iran's economic independence from these struggles even as the ruling dynasty and local governors traded resources for cash at a stunning rate, leaving much of Iran's economic potential in the hands of foreigners. After the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11, boycotts of colonized sectors of the economy, and the establishment of the Pahlavī regime in the 1920s, Iranian elites took the newly discovered resources of oil to fuel rapid modernization of state institutions, economic sectors, and the peoples of Iran. In a highly controversial move, the first Pahlavī Shah of Iran banned the veil from public life, compelling observant Muslim women to remove this ritually significant means of preserving modesty from their daily practice. Despite his dictatorial policies that, in the end, stripped women and men alike of civil rights, some women were able to take the terms of Iranian modernity as presented to them, and manipulate those terms to expand the possibilities of their public roles. Still further to the East, Muslim scholars in British India and Dutch Indonesia drew on debates from Iran and the Ottoman Empire as they developed their own anti-colonial struggles, and as they negotiated their own terms of modernity.

Starting at the end of the nineteenth century, the long-time trickle of emigrants from Muslim regions to the United States and Europe took on the force of streams and then rivers, with enough Christian Syrians and Armenians in Boston, for example, to found their own papers and build neighborhoods that replicated socioeconomic patterns in their countries of origin. Starting at the end of the twentieth and beginning of the twenty-first century, Muslim emigrants began to outnumber Christian and Jewish emigrants from the Middle East to the United States and Europe, and as a result, new debates over Muslim identity in concert with new national identities – German, Canadian, American – forced new formulations of male-female legal and social issues. These fast-paced debates and adaptations played out in diaspora at the same time that Muslims were coming to equally rapid, some would say forced, terms with new national identities in what has been traditionally recognized as the Muslim world in Eurasia, Africa, South Asia, and Southeast Asia.

THE NATION-STATE ERA

From the middle of the twentieth century, and earlier in Iran and South Asia, European radical ideas had been adapted to the purposes of anti-European colonial struggles, and then into the project of building former colonies and mandate territories into modern nation-states. The first generation of Arab revolutionaries of non-elite origins, such as Gamal Abdel-Nasser in the 1950s, were socialist and secularist military men. They saw all elements of their populations as resources to be developed (and in many cases exploited) in order to build their territories into strong, economically and politically independent nation-states. Most signally in socialist Iraq of the late 1960s and 1970s, women were sent to school by state edict, trained in modern professions, and given jobs ranging from factory worker to trained surgeon and engineer. These programs were resisted, in turn, by religious Muslims who saw the turn toward secular states as a danger and a betrayal of Muslim tradition. Like the thinkers of the late nineteenth century in the Ottoman Empire and Egypt, they rehabilitated Islam and argued that Muslim women had traditional rights, privileges, and protections that they had lost under secularist regimes. They argued that unveiled women in the workplace were vulnerable to sexual harassment, and that a woman living under Muslim law had more property rights, civil rights with respect to marriage, and public respect than did the “new women” of secular Iran, Egypt, or Turkey in their Western suits and Western jobs. The Muslim Brotherhood supported the formation of a women’s auxiliary, the Muslim Sisterhood, and women rose to political prominence through the organization. Women’s rights have been entangled in this struggle for decades now, and can be seen in varying forms in Muslim-majority societies as different as post-revolutionary Iran, the Kingdom of Morocco, and wartorn Indonesia.

Important developments have taken place in Southeast Asia or in formerly low-visibility groups that have a dramatic impact via the Internet, cheap recorded media such as cassettes and compact disks, and ease of travel. One figure who has risen to new prominence comes out of a tradition, Sufism, with terms of sociopolitical engagement very different from those discussed so far. A Naqshbandī shaykh originally from Beirut, Muhammad Hisham Kabbani, has continued the tradition of writing biographies of the Prophet’s female companions, and is a strong advocate of women’s rights under Shari’a. He has also argued for adaptation of Islamic social and legal traditions to changing terms of a new era and new settings for Islam. He founded an organization, Kamilat, to advocate for women’s rights and give guidance to modern Muslim women in matters large and small, and appointed his wife, Hajja Naziha Adil, as executive co-chair. The current executive director of this organization, Hajja Taliba Jilani, is an American convert to Islam. Women play prominent roles as writers, correspondents, and objects of discussion in Kamilat, and like many new Muslim organizations, Kamilat has established a strong presence on the Internet at <www.kamilat.org>, but is also under constant attack from more mainstream and right-wing Muslim organizations. At the same time, Muslim men and women of all denominations are under fire from secularists in the countries to which they have emigrated, including those where freedom of religion is enshrined as a founding value of the state. Muslim women are, perhaps, finding new variants of patriarchal support for their rights in new state settings in a world-wide diaspora. It remains to be seen how this will play out in terms of individual rights within Muslim communities, and within various political regimes.

From the nineteenth century, then, male politicians, activists, and intellectuals have attempted to change the status of Muslim women, and to delimit or expand their public roles, as key elements of strategies of modernization, anti-colonial resistance, state-building, and internal reform. The Turkish feminist Şirin Tekeli put this dynamic in a wry formulation, asking “how is it that we are emancipated, but not liberated?” – by which she meant that Turkish women were emancipated from above for the purposes of the state, but that they did not set the terms of their own liberation through struggle and demands from below. Turkey is the most stark example of this dynamic, but it has variations throughout the Muslim and non-Muslim world. Even as male state actors have seen uses for women in public life, they have been less concerned with improving the actual conditions of women’s (or other citizens’) daily lives, so that most Muslim women in most national and diasporic settings, like their sisters elsewhere, continue to carry the burden of housework and child rearing while also pursuing a career outside the home. The continuing inequalities in professional, political, and home life leave the question of male advocacy of women’s rights vexed by two questions. First, why do men advocate an expansion of women’s roles in their societies? And second, what happens to male advocacy when women advocate for themselves and demand more than their male “advocates” are willing to grant them?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- C. M. Amin, The making of the modern Iranian woman. Gender, state policy, and popular culture, 1865–1946, Gainesville, Fla. 2002.
- E. Frierson, Unimagined communities. Educational reform and civic identity among late-Ottoman women, in Critical Matrix 9:2 (Fall 1995), 57–92.
- M. Ghousoub and E. Sinclair-Webb (eds.), Imagined masculinities. Changing patterns of identity for Middle Eastern men, London 1999.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender, and social change, Oxford 1998.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Gendering the Middle East. Emerging perspectives, New York 1996.
- A. Najmabadi, The story of the daughters of Quchan. Gender and national memory in Iranian history, New York 1998.
- Ş. Tekeli, Emergence of the new feminist movement in Turkey, in D. Dahlerup, (ed.), The new women’s movement, Beverly Hills 1986, 179–99.
- E. Thompson, Colonial citizens. Republican rights, paternal privilege, and gender in French Syria and Lebanon, New York 2000.
- United Nations. Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, Women in Indonesia. A country profile, New York 1998.

Women's Studies Programs in Muslim Countries

The Caucasus and Turkey

TURKEY

The development of women's studies in Turkey in academic units at universities in the 1990s owes much to the changes in social and cultural politics in the country which were accelerated in the 1970s and 1980s. In this period, activist women aimed at eliminating the androcentric biases and the unbalanced gender dynamics of epistemology in social sciences (Kandiyoti 1996, 2-3, Abadan-Unat 1995, 15). The 1980 coup d'état created a political vacuum in which several women's groups formed a movement and expressed a secular response to the rising Islamic fundamentalism (Y. Arat 1995, 80, Doltaş 1995, 61).

The 1980s mark the initial efforts of mapping histories and preparing translations of feminist research that developed outside Turkey. Women's journals and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) focused on issues such as domestic violence, women's rights, and political participation. A group of women established the journal Somut (Concrete) in 1983. Several publications followed this initial attempt (Y. Arat 1995, 80), including feminist (sic), and the socialist feminist journal Kaktüs (Cactus). The Women's Solidarity Association was established in 1989. The Women's Library in Istanbul, established in 1991, is the first and only documentation center that houses information on women in many languages.

After these developments outside academia, the institutionalization of academic women's studies in Turkey developed in the early 1990s in two distinctive structures: in research centers with interdisciplinary research teams and in departments with courses in graduate and undergraduate programs. The development and institutionalization of women's and gender studies in Europe and the United States influenced Turkish academia. For example, the 1991 meeting organized by Frauen Anstiftung in Bonn made scholars think about institutionalization and its effects (Akkent 1994).

Marmara University Research and Implementation Center for the Employment of Women was established in 1992. Istanbul University Women's Research and Education Center launched its classes in the academic year 1991/2, and the Women's Studies Department opened in 1993 with an interdisciplinary curriculum for graduate students.

Ankara University Women's Studies Center (KA-SAUM) was established in 1993 with an interdisciplinary perspective for feminist research, education, and networking with women's organizations and NGOs. The Department of Women's Studies was established in 1996, offering courses on theories and methodology of social sciences and women's studies, history of feminist thought, and the women's movement.

The Middle East Technical University (METU) Gender and Women Studies Center organizes seminars and activities on women's issues, publishes articles and research, provides gender training, and maintains close links with women's NGOs. Gender and Women's Studies at METU is an interdisciplinary program, established in 1994 as a part of the Graduate School of Social Sciences. The Gender and Women's Studies Graduate Program is the only program in Turkey that carries the word "gender" in its title, offering both thesis and non-thesis alternatives.

Mersin University Women Studies Center (MER-KAM) was established in 1997 with different working groups, mostly using volunteer efforts of the academic personnel and NGOs. They focus on forming and maintaining databases and publications, networking with NGOs, organizing seminars and meetings, and offering vocational training for women.

Çankaya University Women's Research Center and Van Yüzüncü Yıl University's Women's Research Center (YUKAM) were both established in 1998. Ege University Women's Studies Research Center conducts research on women's issues. Established in 2000, Ege University Women's Studies Graduate Program offers classes on gender and the history of the women's movement.

Other centers for women's studies include Atılım University (Ankara), Çukurova University (Adana), Eskişehir Anadolu University (Eskişehir), Gazi University (Ankara), and Hacettepe University (Ankara).

Gender courses are also integrated into the curricula of other academic establishments, mostly in the departments of sociology, anthropology, and literature. There is a debate as to whether women's studies is a discipline in and of itself or an interdisciplinary area. Questions relate to pedagogical and methodological issues. Curricula for women's and gender studies programs are not yet fully expanded to include issues such as queer theory, race, and ethnicity. There seems to be a discrepancy in communication and activities between urban centers and those that are less urban, not to mention the weakness of links between women within and outside academia. Particular issues related to Turkey need to be developed rather than borrowing paradigms from abroad. The boom in enrollment in women's studies centers and programs faces a decline since there are limited work options after graduation.

AZERBAIJAN

In Azerbaijan, the establishment of women's studies aimed to explain why women have always been degraded by men in the economic, social, decision-making, and human development spheres. A sub-regional conference entitled "Women's Rights are Human Rights: Women and Military Conflict" was held in Baku with the participation of governmental and non-governmental representatives from Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan on 18–20 May 1998 (Mustafayev 2001, 8). The Gender and Human Rights Research Unit (GIHAB) began its activities with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Gender Project in 1998 with a conference on gender issues, mainly on education, human rights, and women's refugee problems (GIHAB 2002, 5).

Issues related to gender education were initiated by the UNDP Gender Project and, at the end of 1998, activities were implemented in this direction as mentioned in the plan for action of the project's second phase. At the same time, the Open Society Institute-Soros Foundation and the Central European University based in Budapest started certain projects in higher educational institutions in Azerbaijan concerned with gender education.

There are 42 state and 19 private higher educational institutions in the Azerbaijan Republic. Western University, Azerbaijan Public Administration Academy, Baku State University, Khazar University, and Baku Slavic Languages University offer courses on gender.

Gender courses on political science, philosophy, psychology, sociology, culture, legal aspects, Azeri history, and economics are open to all departments of the Western University. In addition to developing syllabi, the Gender Studies Center has also directed academic activities of teachers and masters and bachelors program students, and made proposals regarding the incorporation of gender and peace-related topics in course and diploma theses.

Special focus was placed on development of materials for the national scientific conference organized on 23 December 2000, "Integration of Gender Theory into Social and Humanitarian Sciences," where 50 scholars, researchers, teachers, masters students, and leaders and specialists from gender centers participated.

At the Baku State University, gender courses are given in the psychology, sociology, and philosophy departments and are integrated into different subjects, such as ancient history, international relations, and English. Baku Slavic Languages University places more emphasis on eliminating the gender stereotypes apparent in textbooks and aims to develop focused gender pedagogy.

The Women's Studies Center at Khazar University was established in 1991, aiming at protecting and promoting women's rights. It maintains close collaboration with Purdue University and implements joint programs. It is a member of the Global Sisterhood Institute. In 1997, the center set broader goals and reinforced studies on women's issues. It has invited scholars from the United States, Western Europe, Turkey, Pakistan, Israel, and Norway who run sessions on gender. Students at the Women's Studies Center have maintained close relationships with women refugees and internationally displaced persons, and encouraged them to support the peace-building process in Southern Caucasus (Khazar University 2001–3, 125).

KYRGYZSTAN

The Department of Equal Rights in Kyrgyz-Russian Slavonic University has a special gender studies course, taught for the past five years. Kyrgyz National University, Bishkek Humanitarian University, Osh State University, and Kyrgyz Pedagogical University have special courses on gender within the sociology, history, and pedagogy departments.

Before proposing the new gender studies program for implementation in 2003/4, the National Council on Gender Development in cooperation with UNDP, UNFPA (United Nations Population Fund), and SFK (Soros Foundation Kyrgyzstan) representatives provided two round tables on gender studies perspectives in Kyrgyzstan. Although gender courses have been taught in various departments, the necessity for professional development by increasing knowledge about gender theory and methodology was stressed. Participants at educational events will receive the opportunity to prepare the syllabus and approve it in their universities (Shishkереva 2003).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Türk toplumunda kadın, Istanbul 1979.

- , Kadın araştırmalarında neden. Amaç ve kapsam, in N. Arat (ed.), Türkiye’de kadın olgusu. Kadın gerçeğine yeni yaklaşımlar, İstanbul 1995, 15–50.
- A. Abasov, Gender research in Azerbaijan, in R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002, 9–18.
- M. Akkent (trans.), Kadın hareketinin kurumlaşması. Fırsatlar ve rizikolar, İstanbul 1994.
- N. Arat (ed.), Türkiye’de kadın olgusu. Kadın gerçeğine yeni yaklaşımlar, İstanbul 1995.
- Y. Arat, 1980’ler Türkiye’de kadın hareketi. Liberal Kemalizmin radikal uzantısı, in N. Arat (ed.), Türkiye’de kadın olgusu. Kadın gerçeğine yeni yaklaşımlar, İstanbul 1995, 71–92.
- A. Asedov, Special course programs on gender education, in R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002, 62–79.
- F. Berktaş, Women’s studies in Turkey 1980–1990, in Women’s memory. Proceedings of the International Symposium of Women’s Libraries, 8–10 October 1991, İstanbul 1991, 271–5.
- H. Birkalan, Türkiye’de feminist etnografya yeri ve zamanı?, paper presented at the First Conference of Turkish Cultural Studies Meeting in Van, Turkey, 3–6 September 2003.
- N. Çilingiroğlu, Türkiye’de akademik düzeyde kadına yönelik kurumsallaşma, in Hacettepe Toplum Hekimliği Bülteni 22:2 (2001), 4–6.
- D. Doltaş, Batıdaki feminist kuramlar ve 1980 sonrası Türk feminizmi, in N. Arat (ed.), Türkiye’de kadın olgusu. Kadın gerçeğine yeni yaklaşımlar, İstanbul 1995, 51–71.
- R. İbrahimbeyova, Gender aspects of education, in R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002, 48–52.
- D. Kandiyoti, Contemporary feminist scholarship and Middle Eastern studies, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Gendering the Middle East. Emerging perspectives, New York 1996, 1–27.
- Khazar University 2001–2003 Catalogue*, Baku 2001.
- F. D. Mammedova (ed.), On gender education in higher education institutions [in Azeri], Baku 2001.
- R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002.
- F. Özbay (ed.), Study of women in Turkey. An anthology, İstanbul 1986.
- Qerb Universiteti, Gender research center [in Azeri], pamphlet, Baku 2002.
- Z. Quluzadi, On gender education in Azerbaijan, in R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002, 44–8.
- E. Shishkereva, personal communication 2003.
- A. Veyselova, Learning gender relations in Azerbaijan, in R. Mirzazade (ed.), Gender research in Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 2002, 177–8.

HANDE A. BIRKALAN-GEDİK

Central Asia

TAJIKISTAN

In Tajikistan, gender studies were launched in 1996. For the first time sociological research focused on gender roles within the family and the sources of gender inequality. Studies have looked at women’s participation in entrepreneurship and women’s legal status and local legislation on gender equality have been examined. The results of sociological research were published in a series of brochures called Women in Transition in Tajikistan. A statistical and analytical study of modern gender statistics was conducted and published in the collection Gender Statistics in the Republic of Tajikistan, in addition to the statistical collections on Women and Men in Tajikistan and Family and Children in the Republic of Uzbekistan. In 1999, Gender and Culture, a textbook, was published for high school students through the activities of non-governmental organizations (NGOs). The government approved a program entitled “The Direction of Government Policy on Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities for Women and Men, 2001–2010.”

TURKMENISTAN

The issues of gender development in Turkmenistan have become integral to government policy. A National Action Plan on the Advancement of Woman was drafted with the United Nations as follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on the Advancement of Woman (Beijing 1995) and the results of its implementation are detailed in the Report on Implementation of the National Action Plan 2000. Also in 2000 the National Statistical Institute of Turkmenistan (NTISF) prepared a Review of the National System of Collection, Analysis, and Distribution of Data on Population and Reproductive Health. In 2001 NTISF published Gender Aspects of Socioeconomic Indicators. Materials from the seminar “Gender Equality in Compliance with Turkmenistan’s Constitutions and Legislation” were published in 2002. Among the materials from the International Summer School (“Gender Studies in Central Asia”) was a course on “Gender in the Economy.” This course was designed by the faculty members of the Turkmenistan State University and the Women’s Resource Center. According to the brochure “Gender Studies and Gender Awareness in Turkmenistan: Problems of Higher Education” the university students of law and business and management attended a special 14-hour course on “Gender and Economics.”

KYRGYZSTAN

In Kyrgyzstan the international environment stimulated public awareness of the concept of gender in the second half of the 1990s. Ideas about gender appear in all government programs. Among them are “Development Strategy for the Kyrgyz Republic to 2010”; “National Plan for the Development of Education in the Kyrgyz Republic to 2015"; and the "National Plan for Achieving Gender Equality in the Kyrgyz Republic, 2002–2006." In March 2003 a law outlining government guarantees for the provision of gender equality was approved. There is ongoing preparation of a 36-hour course on "Basic Theories of Gender Equality," which will be obligatory for all students. Since 2002 Kyrgyzstan has been attempting to integrate gender awareness into the ministries and other governmental bodies.

UZBEKISTAN

Uzbekistan was one of the first Central Asian countries to take measures to provide equal rights for men and women. In 1995 Uzbekistan ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), intending to include these protections in national legislation. In 1996 the UNDP initiated introductory workshops on gender awareness. The term "gender" became known and was included in government vocabulary. However, gender awareness among NGOs is much better developed, and since 1996 NGOs have been conducting sociological research in gender studies. Research has been undertaken on rural women, on gender in basic textbooks, and on violence against women. A new course on "Basics of Gender: Theory and Practice" and a textbook for high school students was designed. The ministry of education approved the course and the textbook and they will be incorporated into the humanities curriculum in national universities.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Asian Development Bank/Global Security and Cooperation, Gender expertise of basic education textbooks in Uzbekistan [in English and Russian], (forthcoming).
- Association of Businesswomen in Tajikistan, Women in transition in Tajikistan, i, Women and entrepreneurship, ii, Women's health problems, iii, Women and the law, iv, Violence against women [in Russian], Khujant 1998.
- Family and children in the Republic of Tajikistan. A statistical collection* [in Russian], Dushanbe 2002.
- Gender and culture. Textbook* [in Russian], Dushanbe 1999.
- Men and women in the Republic of Tajikistan. Statistical collection* [in Russian], Dushanbe 2002.
- UNDP, Human development report. Uzbekistan [in English, Russian, and Uzbek], Tashkent 1999.
- Status of rural women in transition, in Collected materials UNDP/INTAS/WRC/SABR [in English, Russian, and Uzbek], Samarkand 2000.
- Women in Development, Gender Statistics in the Republic of Tajikistan [in Russian], Khujant 1998.

DINARA ALIMDJANOVA

Iran

Women's studies programs in Iran are of very recent vintage, developed through a process mostly guided from above and without effective input from individuals with expertise in women's studies or groups and institutions that have been instrumental in pursuing feminist causes. The initial idea for the establishment of women's studies programs was put forth by the Center for Women's Studies and Research, which was established in 1986 as "non-governmental" and yet affiliated to the Ministry of Sciences, Research, and Technology to enhance the integration of women in the state-guided process of economic development. The proposed programs were initially relatively broad in scope and breadth and included study of feminism and women's movements and issues in all its dimensions throughout the world.

In January 2000, the Supreme Council for Planning at the Ministry of Sciences, Research, and Technology approved the plan for a master of arts program in women's studies but only allowed for three specializations within the program: woman and family, women's rights in Islam, and women's history. The limited scope of the approved subjects places various universities in the difficult position of attempting to start programs with state-imposed guidelines, which many of the interested faculty do not accept as useful or sufficiently comprehensive. Given this predicament, the women's studies programs in several public universities, three of which began accepting students for the first time in the 2002/3 academic year, are bound to be evolving as various faculties within these institutions attempt to adapt guidelines developed elsewhere to their own particular needs, resources, and constituency.

Public universities have dealt with the tension between imposed specializations and their own resources and needs in different ways. For example, the College of Humanities at Tarbiat Modarres University, a teacher training college, has mostly followed the three main specializations approved by the Ministry of Sciences, Research and Technology, only replacing the specialization in women's history with women in development and politics. The women's studies program at 'Allamah Tabā tabā'i University, on the other hand, is housed in the social sciences faculty and has only accepted woman and family as a specialization. It has also removed Arabic as a requirement and added courses such as introductions to women's studies and women's movements to its curriculum. Al-Zahrā University, a women's college, while accepting students, has not assented to any of the proposed specializations and has instead focused on prerequisites and a few main courses, delaying the decision about better-suited specializations within its program until later. The same holds for the College of Social Sciences at Tehran University, which is to begin accepting students in women's studies in 2003/4 without specifying any specialization within the program. The publicly stated intent at Tehran University is to develop the program either without specialization or introduce specializations different from those approved.

So far none of the private or semi-private universities have shown interest in the development of women's studies programs, and chances of them showing interest are slim given the lack of a strong demand for the establishment of such programs. However, now that several programs have been established at public universities, the likely trend will be an increasing attempt on the part of various civil society forces interested in women's issues, particularly as represented in the vibrant women's press, to shape the evolution of these programs in directions that will take them beyond the existing state-imposed limits. Already critics have pointed out the lack of qualified instructors as well as the oddity of having a master of arts degree in women's studies without the existence of the prerequisite women's studies courses at the bachelor level. They have also questioned the top-down, male-dominated process that led to the creation of what some worry will become mere "for show" women's studies programs developed by the Ministry of Sciences, Research, and Technology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Ardalān, Majra-hayah tā'sis-i rishti-yi muṭālī'āt-i zanān, in Zanān 81 (2001), 36–40.
 N. Moti', Rishti-yi muṭālī'āt-i zanān. Tā'liq-i vaq'iat ya tā'in-i muq'iat-i zanān-i Īrān?, in Zanān 80 (2001), 36–7.

FARIDEH FARHI

Women's Unions and National Organizations

Afghanistan

Women's organizations in Afghanistan have been profoundly affected by power struggles surrounding government-sponsored modernization projects expressed through liberal or leftist discourses, and resistance to such social upheaval expressed through Islamist discourses, both resulting in coercively undemocratic practices. Women's organizations have moved toward and away from state institutional affiliation according to regime changes and the changing orientations of leading activists.

The Anjuman-i Himāyat-i Niswān (Association for the Protection of Women) was established in 1928 by Sirāj al-Banāt and Queen Şurayyā to encourage women to demand the rights provided by King Amān Allāh's reforms of marriage customs and restrictive social practices, and advocacy of women's education (Moghadam 1993, 218–20).

The Mu'assasa-i Khayriyya-i Zanān (Women's Welfare Association, WWA), established by the monarchical state in 1946, was founded by Zaynab 'Ināyat Sirāj and Bibī Jān, both members of the royal family. Its members consisted of liberal upper- and middle-class activists. Although it tried to encourage unveiling, the emphasis of WWA was to encourage income-generating activities and to modernize women by providing literacy, family planning, and vocational classes. In 1953 it established the journal Mirman. In 1975 WWA became institutionally independent and changed its name to the Women's Institute (WI). The WI had branch offices in ten provincial cities and grew to 8,000 members. Kubra Noorzai, the institute's director, was elected to the National Assembly under President Dāwūd, and the organization began to promote gender equality through the state's modernization policies (Emadi 2002, 91–2, 97, Ellis 2000, 164–6).

The Sāzmān-i Demokratik-i Zanān-i Afghanistān (Women's Democratic Organization of Afghanistan, WDOA) was created by the Parcham faction of the socialist People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA). The leading activists of the WDOA, such as Anahita Ratibzad and Şurayyā, fought for women's rights in marriage, education, and suffrage (Moghadam 1993, 225, Emadi 2002, 95). After the PDPA came to power, WDOA (temporarily renamed Khalq Organization of Afghan Women), led an aggressive, coercive, and unpopular national literacy and marriage reform campaign and was staunchly pro-Soviet. In 1987 WDOA, now claiming almost 95,000 mostly urban members, was renamed the Afghan Women's Council under the non-PDPA leadership of Masuma Asmati Wardak, who adopted a less confrontational approach (Emadi 2002, 107, Moghadam 1993, 228–36, Dupree 1984).

The Jām'iyat-i Inqilābi-i Zanān-i Afghanistān (Revolutionary Association of Women of Afghanistan, RAWA) was founded in 1977 by Meena. RAWA opposed the repressive tactics of the PDPA and organized women and girls in factories and schools to fight against the Soviet invasion through armed struggle, strikes, demonstrations and distribution of night communiqués (shabnāmas). RAWA's goal of women's equality within a socialist democratic Islamic republic was framed as inseparable from their goal of national liberation and overrode criticisms of the Mujāhidīn in importance (Emadi 2002, 108–11). The Mujāhidīn regime and later the Taliban caused RAWA to denounce Islamism and armed struggle and call for a secular state. RAWA clandestinely provides basic healthcare, education, and income-generating activities in Afghanistan and refugee camps in Pakistan and strives to draw international attention to the situation of Afghan women (RAWA 2002).

Limited reforms have been hampered by a lack of public security resulting from the transitional government's weakness, local unrest, and resistance to continued American occupation and the deleterious local rule of former Mujāhidīn leaders. The Afghan Women's Network, a coalition of 24 non-governmental organizations founded in 1996, has taken a conciliatory approach toward the transitional government, framing suggestions to expand women's rights in the constitution within an Islamist framework. RAWA is critical, viewing the constitution as an unacceptable concession to the detriment of Afghan women (Human Rights Watch 2002, Afghan Women's Network, RAWA).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Afghan Women's Network, <<http://www.afghanwomensnetwork.org/>>.

Nationwide Conference of the Women of Afghanistan,

Text of speeches in the nation-wide conference of the women of Afghanistan, held in Kabul from Nov. 28–30, 1980, Kabul 1980.

RAWA, <www.rawa.org>.

RAWA, Shoulder to shoulder, hand in hand. Resistance under the iron fist in Afghanistan, in Radical History Review 82 (2002), 131–40.

SECONDARY SOURCES

N. H. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women, in M. Shahrani and R. L. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan. Anthropological perspectives, Berkeley 1984, 306–40.

D. Ellis, Women of the Afghan war, Westport, Conn. 2000.

H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, Westport, Conn. 2002.

Human Rights Watch, “We want to live as humans.” Repression of women and girls in western Afghanistan, Human Rights Watch Report 14:11 (December 2002), <<http://www.hrw.org/reports/2002/afghnwmn1202/>>.

V. Moghadam, Women and social change in Afghanistan, in V. Moghadam, Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1993, 207–48.

MANA KIA

Iran

Women’s organizations in Iran have primarily been concerned with educating women, bettering their rights within the family and asserting their rights to excel in the public sphere. Many organizations have published newspapers and journals to voice their views and raise awareness. Predominantly nationalist and secular in nature, their rhetoric, rather than directly attacking Islam, has criticized elements of Iranian society seen to have warped Islam, which in its “true” form supports the women’s rights being sought. Institutionally autonomous during times when the state has been weak, women’s organizations have been subsumed within the state during periods of centralization. Following the 1979 revolution, national women’s organizations have become overtly Islamist in nature, though no less modernizing and feminist.

The Jām’iyat-i Nisvān-i Vaṭankhvāh (Society of Patriotic Women, SPW) was formed in 1922 and was led by strong activists, such as Muḥtaram Iskandarī, Mastūrī Afshār, and Saḍīqa Dawlatā bādī, who had differing priorities with regard to women’s rights. SPW’s activities included rallies, meetings, demonstrations and petition campaigns. The SPW disbanded when deep divisions over veiling and “how to relate to the increasingly autocratic government of Riza Shah” came to a head at the Second Congress of Women of the East in 1932. In 1935 the state established the Kanūn-i Bānuvān (Women’s Center) to support its gender policies, particularly unveiling, through education and awareness raising activities. Many former members of the SPW were amongst its leading activists (Najmabadi 2000, 36–9, Sanasarian 1982, 55).

With the weakening of the central state between 1941 and 1953, women’s organizations once again multiplied. These included the Jām’iyat-i Zanān-i Īrān (Iranian Women’s League); the Hizb-i Zanān-i Īrān (Party of Iranian Women) led by Ṣaffiya Firūz and Fāṭima Sayyāh, later the National Council of Women; and the Tudeh affiliated Tashkīlāt-i Zanān-i Īrān (Organization of Iranian Women), later the Society of Democratic Women (Sanasarian 1982, 72–3, Amin 2002, 226–7, 234–8).

After the 1953 coup d’état, smaller women’s organizations began to reappear. By 1959 14 of these groups coalesced into the Federation of Women’s Organizations, a loose body designed to foster greater effectiveness and cooperation amongst its component organizations.

The Shawrā-yi ‘Ālī-yi Jām’iyāt-i Zanān (High Council of Women’s Societies) was created in 1961, consisting of 18 women’s associations. Although international activities were under government control, member organizations enjoyed a fair degree of autonomy to conduct their domestic work and enjoyed the benefit of state resources (Sanasarian 1982, 80–1, Dolatshahi 1984, 14–16).

In 1966 the Sāzmān-i Zanān-i Īrān (Women’s Organization of Iran, WOI) was established under the leadership of Ashraf Pahlavī. It was a centralized, nationwide women’s organization consisting of 33 smaller organizations. Individual societies in the provinces were replaced with WOI branches, and Mahnāz Afkhamī served as secretary-general from 1970 to 1979 (Dolatshahi 1984, 22–3, Afkhami 1984, 337). The WOI was more integrated into the state apparatus and less democratic than its previous forms – although officers were elected from each branch, Pahlavī had the power to appoint the majority of the organization’s eleven-member central council (Sanasarian 1982, 83–5). Activists within the WOI had to realign their political demands and socioeconomic projects to fit with those of the state.

Since the 1990s, secular feminists have been in dialogue with Muslim feminists, who challenge clerical religious interpretations by drawing from the Qur’ān and reinterpreting Islam to critique the state and call for women’s rights. Some post-revolutionary Islamist women’s organizations are: Women’s Society of Islamic Revolution; the Iranian Islamic Women’s Institute; the Ḥazrat-i Khadija Association; the Women’s Solidarity Association; and the Social-Cultural Council of Women. Secular feminists, such as Mehrangiz Kar, are active in the women's periodical press, as legal advocates, and in promoting feminist education and awareness. Roshangaran, the first independent publisher of mostly women writers, was founded by Shahla Lahiji, who also established a research institute devoted to women's studies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- B. Bāmdād, From darkness into light. Women's emancipation in Iran, trans. F. R. C. Bagley, Hicksville, N.Y. 1977.
- M. Dolatshahi, Interview recorded by Shahrokh Meskoob, 15 May 1984, Paris, tape no. 4, Iranian Oral History Collection, Harvard University.
- Women's Organization of Iran and International Institute for Adult Literacy Methods, The design of educational programs for the social and economic promotion of rural women. An international seminar 19-24 April 1975, Tehran 1975.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Afkhami, Iran. A future in the past – the “prerevolutionary” women's movement, in R. Morgan (ed.), Sisterhood is global, Garden City, N.Y. 1984, 330–38.
- M. Amin, The making of the modern Iranian woman. Gender, state policy and popular culture, 1865-1946, Gainesville, Fla. 2002.
- A. Kian-Thiébaud, From Islamization to the individualization of women in post-revolutionary Iran, in S. Ansari and V. Martin (eds.), Women, religion and culture in Iran, Richmond, Surrey 2002, 127–42.
- A. Najmabadi, (Un)veiling feminism, in Social Text 18:3 (2000), 29–45.
- G. Nashat, Women in pre-revolutionary Iran. A historical overview, in G. Nashat (ed.), Women and revolution in Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1983, 5–35.
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement, and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1982.

MANA KIA

Turkey

The history of women's issues in Turkey goes back to the nineteenth-century Ottoman period, but more organized women's movements emerged in the context of the atmosphere of relative freedom created by the revolution of 1908. Following this revolution women were permitted to found associations pertaining to their own interests. The most outstanding of these was the Ottoman Association for Defense of Women's Rights, established in 1913. It sought to reform existing family law with the aim of creating an egalitarian family and to encourage women to take part in public life (Çakır 1996).

At the beginning of the republican regime (1923), those women who joined the feminist movement defined enfranchisement as their basic demand. Serving this aim, they established the first political party in republican Turkey, the Kadınlar Halk Fırkası (Women's People Party) in 1923 as soon as the republican regime was declared. Since the party was officially not allowed, members of the party established the Türk Kadınlar Birliği (Union of Turkish Women) in 1924, which struggled for voting rights until 1935.

The founder of the Turkish Republic, Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, and his associates advocated that women should have equal rights with men in every respect. They made substantial reforms toward promoting women's status. Women were given rights in three main areas: new rights that came with the adoption of the Swiss Civil Code in 1926; education for females alongside males; and enfranchisement in 1934. Polygamy was forbidden and women gained equal status in legal and political areas. In the election of 1934, the first election in which women participated, 18 women (4.5 percent) were elected to the parliament.

Having gained these rights, the leaders of the women's movement decided that there was no longer any need for a women's movement. In 1935, some leaders of the Union of Turkish Women, particularly those who were in sympathy with the regime, abolished the union. Thus from 1935 onward, women came to serve as the vanguard of the Kemalist regime rather than to seek to improve their status (Göle 1992). This continued at least until the 1980s.

From 1980, the women's movement was revived in Turkey as a direct consequence of the liberal policies pursued by civilian governments. Women who sought prestige under the banner of official ideology started to shift their attention to struggle for self-realization in the public sphere. Feminist women started to raise their voice first in Somut (Concrete), a weekly magazine, in 1983 and then in many other feminist journals through the 1990s and 2000s. Different women's groups have brought to light local problems by means of these journals and have taken many actions. They have mainly concentrated on such issues as the right to abortion, divorce on demand, equality in family life, elimination of legal norms detrimental to women, and elimination of assault on women in the public sphere (Tekeli 1990).

Under the influence of the women's movement women's issues are among the hottest topics discussed in the media, in cinema, and in politics since the 1980s. Women's issues have continued to occupy the agenda of different social groups ranging from ethnic to traditional and modern (Çaha 1995).

Some of the prominent nationwide voluntary associations established by these groups are Ayrımcılığa Karşı Kadın Derneği (Women's Association for struggling against discrimination), Çağdaş Yaşamı Destekleme Derneği (Association for the support of contemporary life), and Kadın Adayları Destekleme ve Eğitim Derneği (KADER, Association for the support and training of female candidates for parliament).

In addition to these voluntary organizations there are two important official national associations. The first one is Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu (Prime ministry family research institution), established in 1989. The basic aim of this organization is to protect the family and any value associated with the family. The integration of different generations in the family, the protection of family as an institution, and the protection of the rights of family members figures prominently in the work of this organization. It sees women as members of the family and deals with their problems within that perspective. Beyond women's problems, the organization addresses the issue of how the Turkish family can be strengthened. This is the reason why this association has been strongly criticized by feminist groups.

The second official national women's organization is Başbakanlık Kadının Statüsü ve Sorunları Genel Müdürlüğü (Prime ministry directorate for women's problems and status), established in 1990. Its aim is substantially different from the previous one; it has cooperated with other women's organizations to solve women's problems. It mainly searches for grounds to obtain equality of opportunity for women and many feminist women have participated in its projects. It has struggled particularly against Turkish laws which discriminate against women, and demands that women and politicians work to eliminate such norms.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Y. Arat, The patriarchal paradox. Women politicians in Turkey, London 1989.
- Ö. Çaha, Sivil kadın. Türkiye' de sivil toplum ve kadın, Ankara 1995.
- S. Çakır, Osmanlı kadın hareketi, İstanbul 1996.
- N. Göle, Modern mahrem. Medeniyet ve örtünme, İstanbul 1992, translated as The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- Ş. Kurnaz, Cumhuriyet öncesinde Türk kadını 839-1923, Ankara 1991.
- T. Taşkiran, Cumhuriyetin ellinci yılında Türk kadın hakları, Ankara 1973.
- Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Kadın bakış açısından 1980'ler Türkiye'sinde kadın, İstanbul 1990.

ÖMER ÇAHA

Youth Culture and Movements

Iran

Although Iranian youth have been the subject of state development policies for several decades, the fully-fledged arrival of what can be and has been identified in the Iranian public discourse as a youth culture and movement must be traced to the post-revolutionary era, particularly in the mid to late 1990s. In the 1960s and 1970s various attempts were made to organize and create public spaces – for example, the Kākh-i Javānān (Palace of Youth) or summer and athletic camps – for the youth of both sexes to encourage their congregation and engagement in social and cultural activities. However, it is in the later period that the immediate post-revolutionary population boom of the early 1980s confronts the Iranian Islamist state with difficult youth related issues to manage. Figures ranging from 60 to 70 percent have been reported regarding the percentage of the Iranian population that is young, depending on the cut-off age used. According to the Iran Statistical Yearbook 1378/1999, which is based on the 1996 census, approximately 60 percent of the Iranian population in 1996 was under the age of 24. This population bulge is expected to continue until the latter part of the current decade, when it will begin to taper off owing to the implementation of population control policies in the late 1980s.

The increasing number of youth coupled with the Islamist state's harsh policies toward many forms of social and public activities, ranging from enforced Islamic dress codes (mostly for women but also for men) to public inhibitions or outright ban on certain types of social interaction among men and women, as well as on many cultural activities such as concerts and other forms of entertainment, have made Iranian youth increasingly restless since the 1990s. While not articulated in an organized social movement, the demands and needs associated with Iranian youth have loosely but clearly manifested themselves in the Iranian fledgling press; student demonstrations for increased political, social, and cultural freedom; unorganized but nevertheless systematic disobedience of publicly enforced Islamic dress codes and guidelines for proper Islamic behavior in public; electoral behavior; and clandestine cultural activities in music and the arts. These disparate political, social, and cultural activities have become so prominent and troublesome for the Islamic Republic that the social category of “youth” and what to do about their needs, demands, and problems have become an integral part of the Iranian public discourse.

In this public discourse, however, the nature of the relationship between gender related issues and the loosely knit youth movement is not yet clear. In fact, the categories of “youth” and “women” are generally discussed as though they are completely separate entities, with distinct problems and issues. At the same time, there seems to be an unstated assumption that the problems of young men and women are largely the same: the existence of an autocratic and moralistic state that treats both with disdain; imposes rigid guidelines on their public and even private behavior; inhibits their political participation; is incapable of creating suitable employment opportunities for their increasing numbers; and is unable to deal forthrightly with severe social problems such as prostitution and drug abuse among youth. As such, the particular problems gender related issues pose for Iranian youth within and beyond the dictates of the Islamic theocracy are not yet adequately conceptualized. There are discussions of important social issues, such as the rise in number of young female prostitutes or runaway girls (some of whom trans-dress as boys in order to survive in the streets), in Iran's women's press and the press directed at youth. But there has been little systematic discussion of how gender dynamics make the lives of youth in the confines of the Islamic Republic differentiated and varied. Similarly, until recently there has been very little critique of the continued dominance of young men in the more organized parts of the youth movement such as the student movement. This is despite the fact that young Iranian women through a variety of activities, ranging from their continued defiance of the Islamic dress code, to their now higher acceptance rate at the universities, to their strong voice in arts and literature, have been critical contributors to the emergence and sustenance of the youth movement and culture. However, the situation is rapidly changing. The increasing presence of younger women in the Iranian press, the creation of feminist Internet sites such as <www.womeniniran.org> run by a younger generation of women activists, and the explosion of young Iranian web bloggers, many of whom are women, are bound to significantly affect the way gender issues are discussed in the Iranian youth culture and movement.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Adelhkhan, Being modern in Iran, New York 2000.
 Statistical Centre of Iran, Iran statistical yearbook 1378/1999, Tehran 2001.
 B. Yaghmaian, Social change in Iran. An eyewitness account of dissent, defiance, and new movements for rights, Albany, N.Y. 2002.

FARIDEH FARHI

North Africa (including Egypt)

The period extending from the 1940s to the 1980s witnessed a demographic explosion in greater North Africa which had the significant side effect of producing a large youth population between the ages of 15 and 24 whose various needs (education, health, leisure) demanded attention and heavy state investment. The 2000 census in Egypt reported a high percentage (20.5) of youth out of a population of 67 million; Libya registered a significant 24.1 percent out of a population of little over 5 million; Tunisia 20.9 percent out of 9 million; Algeria 21.7 percent out of 30 million; and finally Morocco 21.2 percent out of 29 million (United Nations 2002). These percentages denote the extent to which youth continues to be the center of gravity for all these nation-states. While the historical legacy of each country differs to varying degrees from its neighbors concerning programs, political mobilization, and other cultural activities involving youth, this entry focuses on the underlying assumptions that govern the youth movements and their main commonalities.

Youth remains at the heart of the social and political debate in all of the Arab world today as it did during and following the achievement of political independence in these countries. This is because of the demographic weight of youth and because the future of any nation-state rests on its shoulders. Hence, there is an obligation to provide a well-rounded education and grooming for various forms of responsibility. The creation of youth organizations for education, culture, sports, and leisure were important historical moments that were meant to symbolize the overarching promise that youth represent in general: the capacity of work, dedication, promise, and hope for a bright future. Though the ideologies that nourished their activities differed widely, youth organizations as distinct as scout movements or neighborhood local associations contributed to the preparation and the mainstreaming of their adherents into a normative ideology. Associations of course possessed varying statuses: from those that were aligned with political parties, as is the case with Nasserist Egypt or socialist Algeria and Libya, to others that claimed an apolitical character and were more interested in cultural activities such as theatre, painting, sports, group-games, and similar activities. Despite these differences there was, nevertheless, a current of politicization underlying cultural events such as popular theatre or anti-illiteracy programs. An example of this ideological substratum is the Arab Scout Conference; the first was held in Syria in 1954 at the height of Arabic nationalism (qawmiyya) and it continued its aim of pan-Arabism even as late as its 23rd meeting in 2001 in Saudi Arabia. Associations were often used for ideological purposes, but they were also seen and as a means for fostering respect for difference and for learning the values of democracy. Their educational role as models of democratic institutions, on the one hand, and as places for talent and initiative to find their expression, on the other, attracted all sorts of youth. More specifically, in the case of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya, during the immediate post-independence period and thanks to the euphoria of nationalistic feelings, highly important projects were realized thanks to the collective efforts of youth. Building roads, constructing schools, or contributing to large-scale afforestation were among such programs.

During the research for this entry, the notorious and rather heartbreaking absence of specific programs or discussions concerning young women in youth culture(s) became obvious. While young women benefited from summer camps and contributed largely to the making of the youth movements in all their facets, it is more their age group, their status as being young, that was of importance rather than their gender. It seems from the scant sources available that active realization and consciousness of young women's issues were either lacking or considered secondary during the process of nation-building throughout the mid-twentieth century. While the socialist regimes espoused a Marxist inspired model of economic exploitation as the basis of injustice and therefore saw no need to be gender specific, other regimes paid only lip service to issues relating to women when they actually addressed them consciously. Following turbulent decades in the contemporary history of the Arab world in the wake of continuous wars with Israel, the disillusionment with pan-Arabism, internal conflicts between Arab countries, especially the three Gulf wars, the polarization of politics, and the lessening of job opportunities for massive numbers of youth, the realities of the youth movement today are totally different from the spirit that characterized its birth during the 1940s and institutionalization in the 1950s. Throughout North Africa and Egypt, the infrastructures put in place for youth sensitization and participation are experiencing, to varying degrees, serious shortages, if not outright failure, as in Algeria and Morocco. This gloomy spectrum ranges from the meager subsidies they receive, the extremely limited numbers of educators who create and watch over programs and projects, to the bankruptcy of the belief-systems that nourish them. The weight of Islamist movements and the spread of various non-governmental organizations (NGOs) specializing in artistic movements are the two, though quite polarized, ingredients that have somewhat slowed down the apathy and alienation vis-à-vis public affairs that have suffused youth movements in these countries – though such apathy exists to a much lesser extent in Libya due to the repressive political regime. Women educators and younger women beneficiaries are active participants and actors within youth movements in these countries today.

Examples of modern organizations in Egypt are AIESEC Egypt, the Arab Office of Youth and Environment (AOYE), and the Egyptian Girl Guides Association (EGGA). In Libya organizations include the Secretariat of Youth and Sport of the Masses and an NGO, the General Union of Great Jamahiriya Students (GUGJS). In Tunisia there is a ministry of youth (Ministère de la jeunesse et de l'enfance), and an important NGO is the Union of Tunisian Youth Organizations (UTOJ). In Algeria, there is the Algeria National Union of Algerian Youth (UNJA) and the famous Conseil supérieur de la jeunesse (CSJ). In Morocco there is also a ministry and a number of other NGOs such as AIESEC Morocco, Chantiers jeunes Maroc (CJM), and the Fédération nationale de scoutisme marocain (FNSM). Though there is no longer the euphoria of youth movements that existed in the mid-twentieth century, the current programs of these associations and NGOs have not only created a new dynamic of societal relations but have also opened up the public space for youth for various forms of expression. They aim at fostering self-esteem and group solidarities that exemplify, in the end, the underlying philosophy that has always nourished the culture of youth movements since its inception with socialist ideologies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arab Scout Conference, <http://www.arabscout.org/AboutUs/Organizational_Body.htm percentArabScoutConference>.

N. Bancel, D. Denis, et al. (eds.), De l'Indochine à l'Algérie. La jeunesse en mouvements des deux côtés du miroir colonial, 1940–1962, Paris 2003.

R. Meijer (ed.), Alienation or integration of Arab youth. Between family, state and street, Richmond, Surrey 2000.

NITLE (National Institute for Technology and Liberal Education) Arab World Project, <http://arabworld.nitle.org/main_menu.php>.

M. Tessler, Morocco's next political generation, in Journal of North African Studies 5:1 (Spring 2000), 1–26.

United Nations, Youth Profiles Online research reference, 2002, <<http://www.un.org/esa/socdev/uyinyin/wywatch/country.htm>>.

JAMILA BARGACH

Turkey

The study of youth culture and movements in Turkey is relatively new. Kinship terminology and the use of a term to denote the period between puberty and marriage suggest that age, and the distinction between juniors and seniors, play a central role in the construction of personhood in Turkish society. Historically, it was preferable, for reasons of social control, to keep the period between puberty and marriage as short as possible. In Ottoman society, young men formed the backbone of revolts from the sixteenth century. “Wild blood” (delikanlı, the term used to refer to youth) was to be channeled along tracks acceptable to adult society, such as the military, apprenticeship, agricultural/pastoral labor, and early marriage. The threat of nonconforming behavior on the part of young women required even more stringent and internalized systems of domination.

The period of reforms known as the Tanzimat (1839–76) ushered in a new conception of youth. It is no coincidence that the main social movements of the late Ottoman period were known as the Young Ottoman movement and the Young Turk movement. In the late nineteenth century, educated young Ottomans (mostly men) were called upon to save the institutions of empire. The emphasis on the modernizing role of educated youth culminated in the 1920s in a veritable cult of youth initiated by the new Turkish state to build a national consciousness and a modern nation-state. The phrase “children of the republic” refers to this new youth. Up until the present, it would be young women's bodies in particular that would come to symbolically represent the nation.

In 1960, the Democratic Party, which had ruled the country since the first multi-party elections, was removed from power by a military coup. University students played a role in protests against the regime. In the late 1960s, under a liberal constitution, the growing student movement, increasingly disillusioned with the status quo, influenced by youth movements in Europe and elsewhere in 1968, spurred on by various forces with much to gain from the rise of extremism, moved outside the legal terrain, culminating in increased violence followed by brutal repression subsequent to the military coup of 1971 (and again in 1980). Youth, who embodied the new nation in the early republican period, were now reconstructed in the public discourse as a threat to the national interest. Youth themselves, in contrast, claimed it was the government itself that was illegitimate. Despite their differences, the early republican and youth of the late 1960s shared a modernist construction of youth. Men tended to dominate the student movement; a history of women in the politics of this period remains to be written. The feminist movement of the 1980s arose as much out of the experience of 1968 as from a critique of it.

The 1980 military coup was an important watershed in Turkish politics. A new constitution that restricted civil liberties was put into effect, and young people born in the 1980s were raised in a relatively depoliticized environment. In the 1980s and 1990s, in addition to Islamist and Kurdish nationalist movements, a variety of subcultures including environmentalists, human rights activists, feminists, gays, and others entered the public sphere. Just as it symbolizes a break in Turkish political culture, the post-1980 period constitutes a rupture with modernist constructions of youth. Today, constructions of youth circulate through the media, where young people are increasingly represented. For youth who reject the way they are depicted, existing categories do not seem to fit. Their individualism, denigrated by previous generations, stems from a hesitancy in linking their subjective identities and lifestyles to a single collective project. The feminist movement had an influence on this subjective turn. Young people are increasingly challenging their construction in public discourse, the established hierarchy between elders and juniors, and the mission imposed on them by adult society. This suggests that the construction of youth (and of age) in Turkish society may be changing.

Today, one half of Turkish society is under the age of 25; these young people are mostly urban. The rise in educational attendance and age at marriage, coupled with high unemployment, have led to the extension of youth as a life stage – without, however, reducing the economic dependence of young people on the older generation. Growing economic inequalities threaten to disenfranchise a youthful population from the rights of citizenship. The development of a more participatory public sphere is predicated upon the restructuring of a political system that amounts to a gerontocracy. Young people in Turkey are caught between disillusionment with the promises of the nation-state and the hope of greater participation in what has become a transnational public sphere requiring new definitions of citizenship as well as of adulthood and youth. The issue for young people today is how to achieve (or maintain) the promises of modernity within conditions of neo-liberal globalization.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Berktaş, Has anything changed in the outlook of the Turkish left on women?, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society. A reader, Atlantic Highlands, N.J. 1994, 250–62.
- A. Kaya, Ethnic group discourses and German-Turkish youth, in G. G. Özdoğan and G. Tokay (eds.), Redefining the nation state and citizen, Istanbul 2000, 233–51.
- Ş. Mardin, Youth and violence in Turkey, in International Journal of Social Science 29:2 (1977), 251–89.
- , The mobilization of youth. Western and Eastern, in J. Kuczynski et al. (eds.), Perspectives on contemporary youth, Tokyo 1988, 235–48.
- L. Neyzi, Object or subject? The paradox of “youth” in Turkey, in International Journal of Middle East Studies, 33:3 (August 2001), 411–32.
- L. Peirce, Seniority, sexuality, and social order, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. The vocabulary of gender in early modern Ottoman society, Leiden 1997, 169–96.

LEYLA NEYZI

The United States

Youth cultures are distinct in that peer groups dominate social relationships. Of notable significance to Muslim youth is how interpretations of Islam influence the socialization of women. However, much of what is deemed appropriate behavior for girls in the name of religion stems from select interpretations of religious teachings in particular cultural settings. Interpretations of Islam, and the range of its application to youth behaviors in the United States, constitute the focus of this entry. While the topics covered are not necessarily exhaustive, they illustrate key issues regarding women and gender among Muslim youth in the United States, including the matters of dating, youth movements, and parent-child relations.

DATING

Youth culture in the United States centers on relations between boys and girls, with dating often the theme of movie plots, music, and school activities

(for example, dances). Whether the Muslim family is liberal in its interpretations of Islam or heavily involved in organized religion, the main objection to dating by Muslim parents stems from the link it has to premarital sex, particularly for girls. Parents are likely to state their dislike of dating in general, but stress specifically their concern for daughters, upon whom restrictions are often more intensely enforced (Ajrouch 1999, Mohammad-Arif 2000). The tendency to apply strict religious teachings to a girl's behavior, predominantly her sexuality, stems from the patrilineal organization of the family, where obligation and group membership derive from identifying a child's father. It is also necessary to consider, however, that notions of "good girl" behavior do not apply exclusively to Muslim youth. As many groups based either on religious affiliation or national origins struggle to maintain an identity and produce a sense of belonging, socialization advocating "good girl" behavior weighs heavily in that effort. While similarities exist between Muslim youth and other ethnic groups in the United States, those parallels often go unrecognized due to a tendency to view Muslims as the cultural "other."

Applications of Islam to boy-girl relationships in the United States often include parents looking the other way when it concerns their sons' dating behaviors. A study focusing on children of Lebanese Muslim immigrants living in Dearborn, Michigan found that although girls' social activities are strictly monitored in Dearborn, boys frequently act under less supervision, and are given more freedom and autonomy to make choices about dating (Ajrouch 2000). This double standard links to beliefs that boys have little to lose should they engage in premarital sex (they cannot become pregnant), but is lodged in religious mandates about modesty.

Youth sometimes proactively seek out Islamic teachings because of this double standard, learning that the religion advocates similar standards and expectations for both boys and girls. This knowledge may influence Muslim youth in the United States to embrace a religious identity as a strategy to counter parental rules based on cultural traditions (Schmidt 2002). As such, some young Muslim women in the United States choose to wear hijāb (head covering) in the search for a Muslim identity (Naber 2002, Mohammad-Arif 2000, Shakir 1997). Those who make that choice often describe feeling protected, respected, and safe from unwanted male advances. The work of Nadine Naber (2002) illustrates how girls from Arab Muslim families adopt a "Muslim first, Arab second" approach to identity in order to challenge parental restrictions on public interactions and marriage choices.

The response among young women toward the United States norm of dating ranges from dating without their parents' consent or knowledge to organizing gender specific activities. For instance, a group of Muslim high school students in San Francisco, California organized a "Muslim Prom," where Muslim high school senior girls joined together, without boys, for an evening of dressing up, dancing, and eating, stopping only for evening prayers (Brown 2003). Also, a Muslim version of dating sometimes emerges in which a boy and girl may rendezvous, but time spent together always includes an adult chaperone, and the intent of dating involves plans to eventually marry. Dating for the simple pleasure of enjoying the company of the opposite sex is generally unacceptable (Haddad and Smith 1996).

YOUTH MOVEMENTS

The importance of gender relations to youth culture is also evident in youth movements. While movements based on Islam among youth whose parents or grandparents emigrated from an Islamic country are rare in the United States, youth organizations do emerge within religious institutions in an effort to increase interactions among Muslim youth. Depending on the institution, activities range from conservative events such as religious lectures to more liberal associations such as picnics and dances.

One persistent youth organization, founded in 1963, is the Muslim Student Association. It was established at University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign by a group of foreign Muslim graduate students who organized as a means to foster support for one another (Mohammad-Arif 2000). Forty years later, this organization exists on college campuses across the United States, now mainly comprised of United States born and/or raised Muslim youth wishing to carry out Islamic programs and projects. Campus activism frequently involves coordinating to fight for justice and reform in the United States political system (Schmidt 2002). Muslim youth also often organize on college campuses to protest against United States foreign policy (Naber 2002).

Observers of youth movements on college campuses note the tendency to build a religious affiliation into an ethnic identity (Schmidt 2002). In other words, an Islamic identity emerges, void of culture, distancing Muslim youth from both mainstream American culture and the culture of their immigrant parents (Hermansen 2003). Hermansen highlights disquieting trends within Muslim youth movements including a lack of intellectual analysis of their situation, promulgation of rigid norms (for example, hijāb for women, beards for men), and discouragement from studying the humanities or pursuing social science careers. Gender relations figure prominently in such movements, particularly the tendency for Muslim youth to announce their difference from American youth by ensuring gender segregation at campus events. Separating young men from young women allows Muslim youth not only to differentiate themselves from their non-Muslim American peers, but also to claim moral superiority in that they adhere to religious teaching about modesty and protect themselves from potential sexually charged situations. Hermansen suggests that such tendencies may result from adolescent anxieties.

Islam has also inspired youth movements among African American adolescents. One such movement, for example, called Five Percenters, emerged in the 1960s in Harlem, New York as a splinter group from the Nation of Islam (Nuruddin 1994). Adherents believe that they are the 5 percent of humanity who understand true Islam and are dedicated to living a righteous life. They view Islam as a natural way of life as opposed to viewing it as a religion. A focus on the young black male is central. While this movement has been applauded for the self-esteem it nurtures among adolescent males, representing a subculture that speaks directly to disenfranchised youth, it builds in part on an explicit ideology that men are superior to women. This ideology is found in official declarations such as the belief that only men can attain perfection, and that the highest level women may reach is one step below perfection. Women are also viewed as dangerous in that while they may use their “magnetic” qualities for good, that is, to bear a child, they also may use those qualities for sexual promiscuity. Interestingly, African American youth often outgrow the Five Percenter ideology, in search of “mature” outlets for political and spiritual energies. Many of those who were Five Percenters in the mid 1960s and 1970s became mainstream Muslims as adults (Nuruddin 1994).

PARENT-CHILD RELATIONS

Youth culture generally encompasses young people between the ages of 12 and 20.

While many youths are relatively compliant, youth cultures among Muslims in the United States are notable for the tensions that exist in relationships with parents and with dominant cultural norms. For instance, among South Asian Muslim youth in the United States, tensions between immigrant parents and United States born children often result in a double identity for youth (Mohammad-Arif 2000). As South Asian Muslims in the United States often live in upper middle-class suburbs, youth respond to pressure from their American peers, sometimes engaging in activities about which parents do not know, such as meeting friends of the opposite sex, or listening to rap music. They retain a desire to please parents, but they also acquire “American” traits such as independence and autonomy. Interestingly, once South Asian Muslim youth attend university, they often shed the need to fit in in favor of a quest to get back to their roots. Contrary to trends in the homeland or in Europe, South Asian Muslim parents in the United States value a university education for both daughters and sons. While restrictions on social activities and a stated desire for arranged marriages is prevalent among South Asian Muslim parents, they express a determination to ensure that their daughters receive the same opportunities for university education as do their sons (Mohammad-Arif 2000). However, the preferred areas of study include those where children may be assured of economic success. Children often enter the parentally sanctioned fields initially (for example, medicine), but then later switch to the areas they find most personally satisfying, much to the dismay of their parents.

Those young women who learn to navigate the two cultures, that of their parents and that of the dominant culture, will undoubtedly benefit from both worlds. However, the situation may arise where they embrace one culture over the other. Muslim girls occupy a unique position in that conforming to parental values constitutes a deviation from dominant cultural norms yet conforming to dominant cultural norms likely challenges parental values. Girls from Muslim families living in the United States must negotiate between two worlds, and two sets of cultural values that often seem incompatible. Whether a person is a child of immigrants, third generation, or a member of a family that converted to Islam, the influence of religion on gender roles, however indirect, permeates the youth experience.

As a final note, it is difficult to speak of Muslim youth in the United States as one monolithic category. National origins range from the Middle East, to Southeastern Asia, to Africa, to converts within the United States. The interplay between religion, culture, and race produces a myriad of situations such that it is impossible to posit a universal Muslim youth culture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. J. Ajrouch, Family and ethnic identity in an Arab American Community, in M. Suleiman (ed.), Arabs in America. Toward a new future, Philadelphia 1999, 129–39.
- , Place, age, and culture. Community living and ethnic identity among Lebanese American adolescents, in Small Group Research 31 (2000), 447–69.
- P. L. Brown, At Muslim Prom, it's a girls-only night out, in New York Times, 9 June 2003, A20.
- Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith, Islamic values among American Muslims, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilgé (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 19–40.
- M. Hermansen, How to put the genie back in the bottle? “Identity” Islam and Muslim youth cultures in America, in O. Safid (ed.), Progressive Muslims, Oxford 2003, 306–19.
- A. Mohammad-Arif, A masala identity. Young South Asian Muslims in the U.S., in Comparative Studies of South Asia, Africa, and the Middle East 20 (2000), 67–87.
- N. Naber, Arab San Francisco. On gender, cultural citizenship and belonging, Ph.D. diss., Department of Anthropology, University of California, Davis 2002.
- Y. Nuruddin, The Five Percenters. A teenage nation of gods and earths, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim communities in North America, New York 1994, 109–32.
- G. Schmidt, Dialectics of authenticity. Examples of ethnification of Islam among young Muslims in Sweden and the United States, in Muslim World 92 (2002), 1–17.
- E. Shakir, Bint Arab. Arab and Arab American women in the United States, Westport, Conn. 1997.

KRISTINE AJROUCH

Western Europe

Muslim youth in Western Europe do not belong to one monolithic category. A variety of conditions must be taken into consideration including the sociopolitical context of each country, the differing social position and cultural origin of their families, and the fact that both natives and immigrants are included in this classification. This entry deals with changes in the understanding of Islamic beliefs and practices among young Muslim women born or raised since early childhood in Europe. The key issues for these current changes are the individualization of the faith, the empowerment of young Muslim women through education, the growing importance of youth associations, and the use of diversity as a resource for participation.

INDIVIDUALIZATION OF THE FAITH

For youth who live in Europe, being Muslim is a question of personal choice. In contrast to their parents, they feel that they have become Muslims after undergoing an individual quest which has led them to emphasize the ethical and spiritual dimensions of Islam rather than the normative aspects (Babès 1997, Moreno Alvarez 2001). As with other young people, religiousness is one subjective resource among many others with which to construct a personal identity that is always changing and complex (Tietze 2002). Young Muslim women actively reinterpret the religious traditions of their parents, selecting some aspects and deciding against others in such a way as to create a sense of meaning in their lives. They criticize patriarchal customs by distinguishing religion from local traditions that have been confused with Islam by their parents (Saint-Blancat 2003). For example, they generally refuse an arranged marriage and wish to choose their husband even if his national origins differ from that of their parents. The important issue for many is that he should be a “true Muslim” and not simply a Muslim by tradition.

All these elements show a process of individualization of the Islamic faith, which does not mean that religion is enclosed in a private space, as we will see in the next key issues.

EMPOWERMENT THROUGH EDUCATION

Young Muslim women have increased their autonomy by becoming engaged in professional or academic preparation (Amiriaux 2000). Their studies bring changes in power relationships inside the family, with traditional gender roles being questioned. A wider access to Islamic knowledge and recourse to produce it on their own is of notable significance to Muslim girls. As in other religions, male experts have been the sole possessors of religious authority for a long time, but now a generation of Muslim women experts is emerging. They are developing an innovative theological commentary that enables them to defend their human rights in a religious perspective and to assume a key position between the Muslim communities and society as a whole (Jonker 2003).

YOUTH ASSOCIATIONS

Many girls join Muslim associations for family reasons: parents or brothers already take part in them. By choosing a Muslim youth association they are more easily able to meet peers, and to develop and discuss their religious knowledge in a protected social environment as it has been understood by their parents. A common result of those encounters is that Muslim girls are silently gaining autonomy (Amiriaux 2000). As it happens these associations become an environment in which they meet peers, and in which religion is merely a possible topic of common interest. Trips and visits to the cinema and other sources of entertainment are provided, with the spiritual dimension of the association not always evident. In this way many Muslim girls are learning to participate in civil society. In some European countries Muslim youth associations are connected with other youth organizations (not only religious ones) and they are working on common themes (for example peace or human rights). In 1995 the JMF (Jeunes musulmans de France), the YMUK (Young Muslims UK), and the SUM (Sveriges Unga Muslimer) first promoted a network of youth associations. Since 1996 several Muslim youth organizations from different European countries have created the FEMYSO (Forum of European Muslim Youth and Student Organizations), which is now a well-known INGO (international non-governmental organization) composed of 37 associations. FEMYSO is a member of the European Youth Forum.

DIVERSITY AS A RESOURCE FOR PARTICIPATION

In the present historical and political context of global war and Islamophobia, Islam is often construed negatively and thus stigmatized by others. European Muslim youth identities are forged in reaction to negative and essentialist representations of both Islam and immigrants (Vertovec and Rogers 1998). Some scholars have underscored the exclusion and the social marginalization of these youths (Khosrokhavar 1997) and interpreted the proclaiming of their religious diversity as a reversal of the stigma, as a sort of withdrawal to the community, and as a social rebellion against the social majority. Recent studies have indicated the social and political involvement of those young Muslims who clearly express a desire to contribute to the development of the European society to which they feel they belong (Lathion 2002, Bouzar and Kada 2003). For these youths, religious identification with Islam becomes a resource for participation in civil society. This is especially true for the girls who wear the hijāb and feel they are victims of an overt stigmatization due to their high level of visibility. This level of recognition often leads to a sense of responsibility for the girls who are ever more frequently called upon by the society in which they live to act as intercultural mediators and social brokers, and to daily reconstruct new social bonds.

It is not only a question of demanding recognition of the right to diversity. It is also a request to be considered as equals and to take part in the public sphere in the development of social and political projects in common with other citizens.

The information presented here is not intended to be exhaustive, but rather to illustrate key issues of the main social and cultural changes regarding European Muslim girls. As with all changes there are obstacles to be overcome in terms of the European society, the families, and the religious communities to which these youths belong.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- V. Amiraux, Jeunes musulmanes turques d'Allemagne. Voix et voies de l'individuation, in F. Dassetto (ed.), Paroles d'islam. Individus, sociétés et discours dans l'islam européen contemporain, Paris 2000.
- L. Babès, L'islam positif, Paris 1997.
- D. Bouzar and S. Kada, L'une voilée, l'autre pas, Paris 2003.
- G. Jonker, Islamic knowledge through a woman's lens. Education, power and belief, in Social Compass 50:1 (2003), 35–46.
- F. Khosrokhavar, L'islam des jeunes, Paris 1997.
- S. Lathion, La jeunesse européenne vers une identité commune?, in Cahiers d'études sur la Méditerranée orientale et le monde turco-iranien 33 (January–June 2002), 109–25.
- L. F. Moreno Alvarez, El islam positivo. La religión de los jóvenes musulmanes en España, in Migraciones (Madrid) 10 (2001), 249–94.
- C. Saint-Blancat, La transmission de l'islam auprès des nouvelles générations de la diaspora, in Social Compass 51:2 (2004), 235–47.
- N. Tietze, Jeunes musulmans de France et d'Allemagne. Les constructions subjectives de l'identité, Paris 2002.
- S. Vertovec and A. Rogers, Muslim European youth. Reproducing ethnicity, religion, culture, Aldershot, England 1998.

Zoroastrian Women

Overview

The history of Zoroastrian women stretches back at least two thousand years. The focus of this entry is on Zoroastrian women living in Iran, a society that became Muslim in its majority. Today there are possibly twenty thousand Zoroastrians in Iran. It examines their situation from ancient times to the present, with special consideration of women's role in religious ceremonies.

HISTORICAL EVIDENCE

Until the end of the second millennium B.C.E. and the beginning of the first millennium B.C.E., in what is today Iran, conditions for women were relatively superior compared to subsequent developments. There is written evidence from the ancient province of Ilam (which includes today's Khuzistan) and the love stories of Shāhnāma (Book of Kings) also suggest the favorable position of women (Mazdāpūr, 1975).

In Gāhān, the oldest and most authentic section of the Avista (Avesta, the central scripture of Zoroastrianism), versified by Zoroaster himself, women and men are invited to perform religious and social duties together and the promise of salvation extends to both sexes. In other sections, Avista addresses both women and men (Yasnā 35, 6). The book salutes and prays for both men and women. Nonetheless, the patriarchal structure of social institutions is clearly expressed in Avista and other ancient Iranian writings. The frequency with which Avista addresses men and the heavier duties ascribed to them makes apparent men's pre-eminence in the social hierarchy. By studying ancient texts and graphic archeological remains, we can trace through history this male superiority, which reached its zenith after the establishment of Islam in Iran.

The title dēnak places the grandmother as the head of the dynasty in the Sasanian tablets. The names of queens and goddesses are also mentioned here and there. We know of the female royal titles dukhsbī and wis-dukht (Benveniste 1966, 24–50, Brosius 1998, 183–4) and other noble and religious titles in the Soghdian language as well. Sasanian lay women had signets that testified to their economic activity. Royal women had their own assistants and property. Nevertheless, these indications of female high status gradually give way to male values.

The Sasanian family, or dūdag, has an intricate structure, from the extended family in antiquity to the modern nuclear family. At the head of the family was dūdag-sālār, invariably a male. Women and children were in his custody. He represented the family to the outside world and society to his household. Existing manuscripts present him as the owner of properties and even of family members whom he had the right to sell. This contradicts the rights of women and children to property mentioned by some sources. Either the laws were not consistent or refer to special circumstances. From Vandidād (Fargard 15:11, 13, 15), it appears that a woman was sometimes in the custody of her father, husband, brother, or son, and sometimes free, or khawd-sālār. A khawd-sālār woman could appear before a court of law as a witness or serve as a judge (Mazdāpūr 1990, 80–1).

In Sasanian society there were many kinds of marriage, for example, pādikhshā zanīh, stūr zanīh, ayōkēn zanīh, and chakar zanīh. In pādikhshā zanīh, the consent of the woman and the family head are required. Her sālār is her husband or his father. She could, under certain conditions, become her husband's absolute equal – hanbāaz. Such a marriage was sexual, economic, and ceremonial. It was considered eternal. Stūr zanīh (and a particular type of it, ayōkēn zanīh) was strictly ceremonial with an economic component. When a girl with this kind of nominal marriage married, her real marriage was called chakar zanīh. A woman's second marriage was also called chakar zanīh, but had no economic implications. She was still eternally wed to her first husband, and her actual husband could adopt one or several of her children. A boy who was born from a pādikhshā zanīh or stūr zanīh marriage, or was a padīrīftag (stepson), could reach dūdag sālārī at the age of 15. If a pādikhshāyīh wife remarried after her husband's death, the man in the second marriage was not called her husband unless the authorities agreed to it and allowed him to be the sālār of the family.

These intricate relationships needed explanation even in the Pahlavī texts from the ninth century C.E., for example, Ravāyat-i umīd ashawahishtān, where their ambiguity subjected them to inquiry. This evolving trend has resulted in the modern nuclear family in the Zoroastrian community.

Choosing the head of the household and the dividing the inheritance among the living members was the duty of the father and the head of the family (Mazdāpūr 1990, 80, 86), even though the kadagbānūg (housewife) could choose the dūdagsālār after the death of her husband.

The contemporary Zoroastrian family is monogamous and children take the father's surname. The Zoroastrian wife, like other Iranian women, usually continues to carry her father's name after marriage. There are special marriage and divorce registries for Zoroastrians in Tehran, Yazd, Kirman, and Ardakan.

A wife could not be divorced without her consent according to Pahlavī texts. In modern times, and before the 1967 Family Protection Law, there was no official divorce in the traditional Zoroastrian community. Subsequently, divorce became common, with a sudden increase recently, and no mahr (or kābīm) for women.

The pādikhshāyih wife's inheritance from her husband was equal to that of the pādikhshāyih's son from his father. Her husband could not nullify her inheritance in his will. The mahr was considered the husband's debt and had to be paid from his estate before all other payments. A daughter's inheritance from the father was half that of a brother. The economic relationship of the chakar wives was based on an agreement. At various points in time chakar children took from half the pādikhshāyih children's inheritance to none at all. Today, a daughter's inheritance is equal to that of a son but may be altered by agreement. It is not customary to distribute the inheritance while one of the parents is alive, unless all inheritors agree. Of course, contemporary Zoroastrians can also use the state laws. According to the Iranian Islamic Inheritance Law (Article 881), if there is a Muslim in the family, non-Muslims cannot inherit. There is evidence that many Zoroastrians in the past converted to Islam to take advantage of this distinction.

A good part of the extant jurisprudential ancient texts deal with female-related taboos, such as menstruation and impurities associated with pregnancy, and their attendant purification. During menstruation and after childbirth, women were banned from participating in social and religious ceremonies. Therefore women could not be priests or achieve other official religious positions. They were also prohibited from holding positions that required attendance every day. Such prohibitions and purifications are no longer followed except in religious ceremonies.

Although there is no formal evidence, Zoroastrian women are believed on average to enjoy better health and more comforts of modern living than other women in Iran. Higher educational levels, the establishment of Zoroastrian hospitals, and the availability of trained obstetricians gradually altered the practice of home birth, especially in cities. Even though rural women are still largely deprived of proper medical care, they have had access to services for the past 60 years.

ZOROASTRIAN WOMEN TODAY

The Islamic community's measures to convert others to Islam put pressure on the Zoroastrian community (Boyce 2001, 145–215). This weighed heavier on Zoroastrian women. When the powerful Zoroastrian community of the Sasanian period submitted to laws that were unfavorable to them, the role of Zoroastrian women was greatly transformed. It was left to Zoroastrian women to raise their children to cleave to the ancestral religion under difficult circumstances and tolerate deprivations to protect their ancient way of life. At the same time, Zoroastrians were able to establish, albeit with some distance, a friendly relationship with a majority that considered them impure and imposed the jizya (poll tax) on them.

When the jizya was abolished in 1882, the Zoroastrian community moved closer to equality with other Iranians and achieved better living conditions. With the forced unveiling of women (1936), Zoroastrian women often abandoned their traditional colorful clothing whose details and adornments were different from the clothing of Muslims. Even though many women remained faithful to their way of life, there are few visible differences between Zoroastrian and non-Zoroastrian women today.

Modernity and new research into the Zoroastrian religion and customs have changed the general public's perception of Zoroastrians. Iranian Muslims have long considered Zoroastrians to be a sincere and honest community. It is even possible currently to detect a kind of nostalgia for the ancient past. Although in Iranian society today a Zoroastrian woman is first an Iranian, she is still subject to discrimination on the basis of her religion. The biggest injustice was the unequal diya (compensation) allotted to non-Muslims, especially women. Recently, a law abolished this inequity. There is ample evidence that until recent times, Zoroastrians, especially young girls, were forced to convert to Islam. They were denied employment or education, often when their merits qualified them.

In modern Iranian society, Zoroastrian women are largely like other women and often benefit from the prevailing laws and state facilities, except in certain circumstances. Zoroastrian women no longer dress in distinctive clothing and avoid other limitations to activity; with certain restrictions, they can enter various educational fields and occupations – from medicine, teaching, and state employment to menial work. Often, their lives are indistinguishable from the lives of other Iranian women. True, the small Zoroastrian population and its scattered situation, resulting from migrations, creates certain problems, especially for women at the age of marriage. But in general, the doors to better lives are not closed to Zoroastrian women and girls, and within the old structures, most can cope with current conditions.

EDUCATION

From the distant past, the education of Zoroastrian girls has been acceptable. Knowledgeable and experienced women in the neighborhood conducted private instruction. They taught various kinds of housework, from washing dishes, sewing patterns, and knitting, to taking care of sheep, and sometimes even reading and writing. This tradition can perhaps be attributed to the emphasis that Pahlavī texts placed on girls' education (Navvābī 1976, 474, Mazdāpūr 1990, 104). Illustrations of female education are also found in early books, such as Mādāyan-ī Hazār Dādīstān. They indicate that women were familiar with difficult court rulings and were well versed in the law (Mazdāpūr 1990, 105).

Beginning in the nineteenth century, Zoroastrian girls attended Christian missionary and American girls' schools and later girls' schools were established in Yazd, Kirman, and Tehran. The first such school was established in Kirman in 1892. The percentages of literate Zoroastrian girls at the end of the Qājār period is noteworthy (Amini, 210–11). Today, the number of illiterate Zoroastrian women is negligible.

The oldest Zoroastrian girls' schools, which are still in existence, were founded in 1908. The most famous is in Tehran (Anūshīravān Dādgar, established in 1936). Today, of the approximately 50 Zoroastrian schools, 20 are girls' schools. From the beginning, the staff and students in these schools were often composed of both Zoroastrians and non-Zoroastrians.

EMPLOYMENT

Teaching and school administration in Tehran and other big cities as well as in rural areas with more traditional schools were the first forms of employment for women in the modern period. Next were midwifery and nursing, and a wide array of other vocations including university-level teaching, state employment, journalism, medicine, painting, and commerce. There was also the maintenance and cleaning of other Zoroastrian homes and the fire altars and other tasks linked with religious ceremonies, which have always been customary among Zoroastrians.

In former times, women performed what today would be considered masculine work, such as the grafting of trees and animal husbandry. There are reports of Zoroastrian women midwives and hakīms (healers) who practiced medicine and orthopedics. In the absence of men who had to pay their jizya with their labor or who went searching for income-producing labor, women were forced to run household and farm and to manage the household expenses after the payment of jizya. Once they completed the arduous farm work and household tasks, they turned to their traditional duties, such as weaving fabrics or textiles, making shirts and wool clothing, and sewing and stitching.

Women no longer sew old, intricate patterns on clothes. Traditional domestic weaving looms can no longer compete with factory-produced fabrics. Zoroastrian woven products required skill and were different from those of the Muslims. They varied according to the fabric and the use for which they were intended. Nowadays, there are only a handful of looms in operation. While the spinning of cotton has been abandoned, spinning wool is still practiced and women still knit wool clothing. Formerly, to save fuel and heat, girls and young women gathered in the winter and work together in a designated place.

The gender division of labor was rooted in the Pahlavī text, Ardā-Wirāf Nāmāg, which attributes man's sins generally to his labor and employment, while the woman's are fixed in her sexuality and her relationship with her children (Mazdāpūr 1990, 108). While the text lauds the role of woman in farming and animal husbandry, it disapproves vocations thought to encourage impurity or sinful behavior. Thus, wet-nursing is prohibited because of the possibility that a mother might inflict damage on her own child. Prostitution is an absolute sin. In Pahlavī texts, the source of a female prostitute's sinfulness lies in the mixing of men's sperm (shubr gumīzishnih) inside a woman's womb. Any man who has unsanctioned sex with a woman will acquire all her sins and she all his spiritual reward. The Zoroastrian community, at least in the modern age, lacks women prostitutes.

Aside from royalty, women are not mentioned in Zoroastrian history. A woman who played a determining role in changes in Iranian society is Gulistān Bānū from Kirman. She emigrated to India in 1795 and influenced Indian Zoroastrians to come to the aid of their fellow Zoroastrians in Iran. The Gulistān Dakhmah (Tower of Silence) in Kirman and another in Yazd are named after her. The Zoroastrian cemetery in Tehran (Qaṣr-i Firūza) is named after the wife of its founder, Arbāb Kaykhusraw Shahrūkh. Today, two Zoroastrian women are acknowledged: Bānū-yi Khādim-i Pīr-i Sabz (d. 1987), and Farangīs Shahrūkh (Yeganegi) (b. 1916). The late Bānū-yi Khādim-i, whose ancestors served the Pīr-i Sabz sanctuary, or Chakchak, for seven generations, stayed in the sanctuary by herself or with another person for 21 years. She lived on an isolated mountain to perform her service. Her strength and solitude bestowed upon her a magnificent and unique status in the Zoroastrian community. In a way, Bānū has become a spiritual figure. Farangīs Khānum is the face of the modern Zoroastrian woman. She worked to introduce Zoroastrian women to modern culture. Thanks to her efforts, Iranian handicrafts revived and flourished. She founded Zoroastrian women's associations and helped shape the coeducational Center for Zoroastrian University Students in Tehran (1967). The Ancient Iranian Cultural Society, established in Tehran in 1961, was also the result of her initiative. Currently, there are many professional Zoroastrian women both in Iran and among Iranian immigrants abroad.

The Zoroastrian Women's Organizations in Tehran (founded 1950) and Yazd are both presently active. These organizations engage in charity work and provide many kinds of assistance. Women are also members of the Society of Zoroastrians of Tehran and other cities.

FEMALE FIGURES IN RELIGIOUS RITUALS

Although Zoroastrian women cannot become priests because of entrenched taboos related to impurities associated with childbirth and menstruation, female family members of priests sometimes participate in activities that have religious significance, such as sewing the kushtī, the sacred belt of the Zoroastrians. Sometimes they participate in religious ablutions as well. Such tasks, as well as serving ceremonial foods, are mainly performed by postmenopausal women. Women's main role in religious events, however, is to observe the traditional everyday religious customs and prepare ceremonial foods. Sometimes this responsibility translated into a woman's profession. Although men also cooked for guests, the preparation of ceremonial foods was women's special domain.

In Gāhān, the name Pūrūchistā (holder of much knowledge, Yasnā 53, 2), the youngest daughter of Zoroaster, is mentioned. The prophet expects her to use her own wisdom and select a husband who embodies wisdom. In the non-Gāhān Avista (Younger Avista), several women are mentioned, especially in Farvardīn-yasht, where respect is paid to those who have passed away. Some of these women were real historical figures, but they are mentioned less often than men. In Bundahish, which is written in the Pahlavī language, there is a mention of 15 immortal women and 15 men. None of the women's names have survived.

As in the Semitic religions, the Zoroastrians speak of angels, male and female. Upon closer examination, it becomes clear that the sex distinctions were rooted in the grammatical structure of the language. In Gāhān, out of six Ameshaspentas, who are equal to esteemed angels, three are male and three are female. Also, in the complete Gāhān, we find the names of Daēnā (Pahlavī, Dēn, conscience) and Ashī (the reward of good deeds), who in the Younger Avista are both identified as goddesses. In the Younger Avista, numerous female gods are also mentioned, most prominent among them Anāhītā. Her name is in the epigraphs of the second period of Achaemenid kings. It is generally accepted that the growth of the religion of Anāhītā or Nāhīd is owed to the influence of Mesopotamian goddesses, namely the Sumerian Inanna, the Akkadian Ishtar, and possibly the indigenous Nana. Anāhītā is the most famous Zoroastrian goddess and is better known than Spəntā ārmaitī or Sepandārmaz, the superior Gāhānic goddess.

Today well-known shrines play a major role in Zoroastrian rituals: Chakchak or Pīr-i Sabz, Pīr-i Nāraki, Pīr-i Bānū-yi Pars, Pīr-i Hrisht, Seti Pīr, and Pīr-i Naristāna. According to the prayer books (ziyāratnāma), these sacred sites served as hiding places for Zoroastrians. When a foreign enemy was closing in and the possibility of capture was at its greatest, the mountains and earth hid them. Other than Pīr-i Naristāna and another sacred site, far from Yazd, these shrines are all named for women and girls.

Finally, female figures play a role in various sacred Zoroastrian banquets. In recent years, these banquets have become very important and although they contain no particular religious element and priests are not in attendance, people have fervently turned to them. They consist of the banquet of the daughter of Shāh-i Parian (the ruler of fairies), the banquet of Bībī Si'Shanbah, the banquet of Nukhūd-i Mushgil'gosha (which eases and resolves difficulties), and the banquet of Bahman Amishaspand. Among these, the banquets of the daughter of Shāh-i Parian and Bībī Si'Shanbah are named after women, and in the story of the other two, women play important roles. Women are responsible for carrying out the detailed ceremonies of all four banquets.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- T. Amīnī, Asnādī az Zartushtiyān-i mu'āshir-i Īrān (1258-1338 Sh.), Tehran 2001.
- C. Bartholomae, Über ein sasanidisches Reshtsbuch, Heidelberg 1910.
- E. Benveniste, Titres et noms propres en iranien ancien, Paris 1966.
- M. Boyce, Zoroastrians. Their religious beliefs and practices, New York 2001.
- M. Brosius, Women in ancient Persia (559-331 BC), New York 1998.
- K. H. Gould, Outside the discipline, inside the experience. Women in Zoroastrianism, in A. Sharma (ed.), Religion and women, Albany, N.Y. 1994, 139-82.
- K. Mazdāpūr, Nishān-ha-yi zan-sarvārī dar chand izdivāj-i dāstāni-i Shāhnāmāh, in Farhang va zindagī 19:20 (1975), 94-120.
- , Zan dar 'a'in-e Zartushtī, in Mārkiẓ-i Farangī-Sinimāyī, Hayāt-i ijtimā'i zan dar tārikh-i Īrān, Tehran 1990, 42-111.
- M. Navvābī, Andarz-i āzurbud mārsipindān, Tehran 1976.
- A. Perkhānian, The book of a thousand judgements (A Sassanian law-book), trans. N. Gasoian, Costa Mesa 1997.
- M. Shaki, The Sassanian matrimonial relations, in Archiv Orientalni 39 (1971), 322-45.
- K. Shārukh, Yaddāshthā-yi Kaykhusraw Shābrukh. The memoirs of Keikhosrow Shahrokh, ed. and trans. S. Shahrokh and R. Writer, Lewiston, N.Y. 1994.
- G. Ushidārī, Tārikh-i Pablavī va Zartushtiyān, Tehran 1976.

KATAYUN MAZDAPOUR

Name Index

- 11 September 2001 88, 170, 175, 182, 185, 267, 271, 293, 324-326, 399, 491, 559, 583, 598, 696, 754
- A dying colonialism* 38
- Abadi Banu Begam (see Bi Amman)
- Abbas, Ferhat 640
- al-'Abbās, Zaynab Fāṭima bt. 762
- 'Abbāsids 349, 440, 501, 777
- Abdālān-i Rūm* 623
- 'Abd al-'Azīz, Shāh 326
- 'Abd al-Lāṭif, Shāh 327
- 'Abd al-Muṭṭālib 1
- 'Abd al-Rahmān, king of Afghanistan 82
- 'Abd al-Rāziq, 'Alī 7
- 'Abdī, 'Abbās 94
- Abdul Rahman, Abdullah 578
- Abdūlhamid II 37, 530, 770
- al-'Abidin, Sidī 'Alī Zayn 768
- Abī Rabāḥ, 'Atā' Ibn 476
- 'Abid, Nāzik 662
- Abkhasian-Georgian war 574
- Abkhazia 79, 634
- Abolition of Forced Labour Convention 1957 666
- Aborigines 746-747
- Abouda, Djura 576
- Abouzeid, Leila 654
- Abū Bakr (khalīfa) 449
- Abu Dhabi 24-25, 465, 748
- Abū Ḥanīfa 443, 446
- Abu-Lughod, Lila 36, 144, 494, 584
- Abū al-Nūr mosque 769
- Abū al-Sa'ūd Muḥammad b. Muḥammad (Ebu's-su'ud) 121, 502, 698-699, 763
- Abū Ṭālib (uncle of the Prophet) 1
- Abū Zayd, Naṣr 7
- Accad, Evelyne 584
- Accra 280
- Aceh 26, 332, 420, 431, 636-637, 674
- Achara 512
- Adab i-Mulaqat* (journal) 194
- Adana 783
- al-'Adawiyya, Rābi'a 766, 769
- Aden 71, 465, 551-552, 657-658
- Aden Women's Association 657
- Aden Women's Club 657
- Adil, Hajja Naziha 782
- Adivar, Halide Edip 596
- Administration of Muslim Law Act (Singapore) 379
- Adultery Ordinance 1979 (Pakistan) 434-435
- Adygeia 218
- Aeeneh Zan* (Women's mirror) (magazine) 41
- Afar 549
- 'Affān, 'Uthmān ibn 28
- Afghan Women Lawyers and Professional Association 41
- Afghan Women Roqia Center for Rights, Studies and Education 367
- Afghan Women's Network 788
- Afghan Women's Organization 556
- al-Afghānī, Jamāl al-Dīn 777
- Afghanistan 3, 7, 20, 40-41, 59, 81-82, 92, 94-95, 105-106, 113, 117-119, 134-135, 155, 164-165, 192-193, 199-201, 211, 213, 215-216, 231-233, 238-239, 252-253, 284-286, 287, 302-303, 325-326, 335-336, 367, 402, 411, 414-416, 432-433, 458-459, 476, 478-479, 491, 499-501, 509-512, 513-515, 518, 551, 566-567, 568-569, 571-573, 582, 583, 584, 597-598, 604-605, 609, 625, 650-652, 677-678, 687, 706-708, 752-753, 760, 766-770, 780, 788-789
- Afkhamī, Mahnāz 681, 789
- Aflātūn, Injī 647-648
- Africa 47-49, 74-77, 84-86, 125-128, 135-137, 144-145, 181-182, 195-197, 245-247, 258-260, 396-398, 424-426, 436-439, 487-489, 525-527, 561-563, 577-579, 594-595, 611-613
- East Africa 74-75, 204, 223, 245, 256, 279, 338, 396, 424-425, 548-550
- Horn of Africa 74, 548-549
- North Africa 4-5, 69-70, 233-235, 275-277, 528-529, 557-558, 576-577, 640-642, 653-655, 711-712, 749-751, 764-766, 793-794
- West Africa 35, 37, 47, 74-75, 144-145, 195-197, 245-246, 327-329, 330-331, 436-439, 506-507, 550, 594-595, 714
- Africa Center for Strategic Studies (ACSS) 488
- Africa Democracy Forum 280
- African Center for Democracy and Human Rights Studies 182
- African National Congress 488
- Afshār, Mastūrī 789
- Agard Udad 712
- Age of Consent Act 1929 (India) 65, 469
- Agha Khan 722
- Agustina, Nurul 604
- Ahi order 713
- Ahl-e Haqq 358, 571
- Ahl-i Ḥadīth 341
- Ahlougo 634
- Aḥmad, Mīrzā Ghulām 622
- Aḥmad, Nazīr 60, 343
- Ahmadi, Lilema 41
- Aḥmadi movement 181, 471, 622
- Ahmed, Leila 36, 71, 169, 584, 686
- Aichi, Houria 577
- AIIESEC Egypt 794
- AIIESEC Morocco 794
- al-'Ā'ila* (journal) 66
- Aile* (journal) 664
- Aimaqs 571
- Ain o Salish Kendra 54, 174, 704
- Aintab 12
- Aisha 274
- 'Ā'isha (wife of the Prophet) 34, 155, 319, 350, 451, 480, 722
- Aissawa 768
- Aisyiyah 26, 322-323, 602, 636, 638, 648, 708-711
- 'Ajami, Mārī 662
- Ajara 634
- Ajman 465
- Akbar, Mughal emperor 620

- Akhawāt al-Şafā' 653
Akhiyān-i Rūm 623
 al-Akhras, Ayāt 320
 Aktaş, Cihan 615
 Akter Jahan Tanzania (case) 471
 Al Aĥmad, Jalāl 285
 Al-Ali, Nadje 584
Ālam-i Nisvān (journal) 135
 'Alawīs (Alevīs) 358, 361, 573
 Albania 412-413, 553, 693, 761
 Aleppo 35, 121-122, 364, 699, 768
 Alevīs ('Alawīs) 183-184, 490, 580, 695, 713
 Alexandria 721
 Algeria 4-5, 36-37, 69-70, 276-277, 303, 316, 368, 404, 487, 518-520, 528, 536-537, 557-558, 576-577, 584-585, 640-642, 653-655, 678, 700, 711, 749-751, 764-765, 768-769, 793-794
 Algeria National Union of Algerian Youth (UNJA) 794
 'Alī (son-in-law of the Prophet) 524, 722
 Ali Khan, Begum Liaqat 470
 Ali, Muĥammad 645
 'Alī, Muĥammad (Mehmet Ali, khedive) 779
 Ali, Mumtaz 161-162
 Ali, Shaukat 645
 Aligarh 60, 194, 645
 Ali v Sufaira (case) 377
 Aliye, Fatma 530
 Alkhateeb, Sharifa 598
 All-Afghan Women's Council 582
 All-India Ladies Association 61
 All-India Muslim Ladies Conference (Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam) 61, 194, 343, 469, 592, 645
 All-India Muslim League 61, 469
 All-India Muslim Personal Law Board (India) 341, 741, 743
 All-India Women's Conference (AIWC) 61, 645
 All-Indonesian Women's Congress 637
 All-Pakistan Women's Association (APWA) 53, 82, 470
 'Allāmah Tabātabā'i University 786
 Almaty Women's Information Center 626
 Altındağ women's shelter 56
 Altorki, Soraya 582
 'Alyān, 'Ārif 320
 Amal 321
 Amān Allāh Khān, king of Afghanistan 94, 134, 284, 335, 432, 458, 518, 568, 582, 677, 707, 788
 Amanitare 279-280
 Amasya 11, 202
 Amballa 621
 American Civil Liberties Union 185
 American Muslim Alliance 186, 291
 American Muslim Armed Forces and Veterans Affairs Council 491
 American Muslim Council 291
 American Muslim Political Coordinating Council 291
 Amin, Idi 488
 Amīn, Qāsim 36, 67-68, 72, 779-780
 Amīni, Fatemeh 325
 Amiri, Rita 41
 Amiryar, Sara 41
 Amman 8
 'Amran 229
 Amrouche, Fadma 654
 Amrouche, Taos 577
 Ana Hit 512
 Anāhītā 481, 803
 Anana 512
 Anatolia 10-13, 202, 260-261, 349-350, 501, 515, 623, 693-694, 698, 713
 Ancient Iranian Cultural Society 803
 Anderson, Benedict 154, 294
 Anderson, Louise Garrett 69
 Andhra Pradesh 240
 Andijan 635
Anfāl 364, 575
 Anganen 747
Angels in the Making (book) 722
 Angha, Nahid 771
 Angha, Saleheddin Ali Nader 772
Anīs al-jalīs (journal) 66
 Anjuman-i Himāyat-i Nisvān 568, 582, 788
 Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam (see All-India Muslim Ladies Conference)
 Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam Bangla 53
 Anjuman-i-Khuddam-i-Ka'aba 61
 Anjuman-i Mukhadirat-i Vatan 589
 Anjuman-i Nisvān-i Vaṭankhvāh-i Irān 589
 Anjuman-i Parwarish 566
 Ankara 56, 783
 Ankara University Women's Studies Center (KASAUM) 783
 Anna, Nazo 414
 Anna, Zarghona 414
 Anneler Birliđi 516
 Annisa, Rifka 603
 Anşār al-Islām 575
 al-Anşārī, Abū Ayyūb (Eyüp) 201-202
 Anti-Atlas Mountains 712
 Anti-Terrorism Ordinance 1992 (Bangladesh) 180
 Anwar, Ibrahim 673-674
 Anwar, Zainah 674
Āpi Kartini (magazine) 649
 Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades 320
 Aquino, Corazon 91
 Arab European League (AEL) 293
 Arab Lawyers' Union 585-586
 Arab League 266
 Arab Office of Youth and Environment (AOYE) 794
 Arab Organization for Human Rights 586
 Arab Revolt 655
 Arab Scout Conference 793
 Arab states 21-24, 87-89, 98-100, 111-112, 189-191, 210-211, 299-302, 319-321, 347-349, 367-370, 387-389, 508-509, 523-524, 543-544, 582-586, 666-669, 678-679, 725-726, 766-770
 Arab Women's Club 657
 Arab Women's Conference 88
 Arab Women's Congress 642
 Arab Women's League 586
 Arab-Israeli war 543
 Arafat, Yasser 348
 Aramian Theater 13
 Arbil 364
Ardā-Wirāf Nāmag 802
 Ardahan 11
 Ardakan 801
 Arifidiatmo, Novaris 132
 Arjomand, Homa 162
 Armand, Inessa 78
 Armed Islamic Group (GIA) 700
 Armenian Apostolic Church 10
 Armenian Theater Society 13
 Armenian women 10-14, 19, 392, 545, 571, 573-574, 580, 629-630, 689, 720, 737, 781
 Armstrong, Amatullah 323
Around the World in Eighty Days (film) 757

- Artemis (journal) 13
 Arunachal Pradesh 547
al-'Arūs (magazine) 662
 al-Asad, Hāfiẓ 663
 Asadallāh 524
 Asatur, Zabel (see Sibyl)
 Ashī 803
 Ashkhabad 284
 Ashkijerrāhīs 771
 Ashna, N.J. 363
 'Ashūra 484-485
 Asia
 Central Asia 3-4, 19-21, 50-52, 72-74, 78-79,
 103-105, 116-117, 141-142, 163-164, 191-192,
 198-199, 228-229, 237-238, 251-252, 283-284,
 373-374, 416-418, 479-481, 587-588, 600-601,
 625-626, 633-636, 679-681, 705-706, 785-786
 East Asia 61-66, 89-93, 131-134, 321-322, 333,
 429-432, 745-748
 South Asia 52-55, 59-61, 82-84, 106-108,
 123-125, 142-144, 179-181, 194-195, 202-204,
 211-214, 216-218, 231-233, 239-242, 255-258,
 286-289, 326-327, 338-344, 351-353, 377-381,
 433-436, 469-471, 513-514, 531-533, 538-540,
 546-548, 559-561, 591-593, 620-622, 626-628,
 644-646, 702-704, 738-740, 755-757, 766-770
 Southeast Asia 25-29, 131-134, 242, 322-323, 331-333, 351-353, 393-396, 538-540, 745-748
 Aşıkpaşazade 713
 Asma'u, Nana 329, 396, 594-595
 Asmita 704
 Assam 547
 Assilmi, Aminah 292
 Association for the Defense of the Rights of Ottoman
 Women 664
 Association pour la défense et la promotion des femmes (ADPDF) 276
 Association démocratique des femmes du Maroc 641 Association pour l'égalité devant la loi entre les hommes et les femmes (AELHF) 275-276 Association des femmes tunisienne pour la recherche et le développement (AFTURD) 276
 Association des femmes universitaires (Tunisia) 641
 Association marocaine des droits des femmes 275, 654
 Association marocaine des femmes démocrates 654
 Association of Muslim Women in Algeria 653
 Association of Nigerien Women 398
 Association for the Protection of Women's Rights 582
 Association of Revolutionary Women (Iran) 589
 Association for the Support of Contemporary Life 791
 Association for the Support and Training of Female Candidates for Parliament 791
 Association pour le triomphe du droit des femmes 641
 Association tunisienne des femmes démocrates (AFTD)
 276, 641, 654
 Assyrian Democratic Movement 575
 Assyrians 178, 284, 358, 360, 571, 573-575
 Astārabādī, Bībī Khānum 639
 Asvat, Zaynab 578
 Aswan High Dam 690
 Asyut 721
 Atatürk, Kemal Mustafa 146, 157, 248, 289,
 360-361, 490, 496, 629, 682, 707, 781, 790
 Atılım University 783
 Aṭṭār, Farid al-Dīn 766, 769
 Auclert, Hubertine 70
 Aurat 53
 Auratstan 286
 Aurès 577
 Australia 27, 62-63, 90-93, 100-102, 133,
 175-177, 321, 323-324, 333-334, 353, 358,
 429-430, 509-512, 745-747
 Australian Family Law Act 1975 101
 Avierino, Alexandra 66
 Avista 800, 803
 Avrupa Islam Kültür Merkezleri Birliği 716
 Awami League 54, 83, 559
 Awlād 'Alī Beduin 494
 A'yān, Zurāra b. 446
 Ayodhya 179, 560, 702, 741
 Ayrımcılığa Karşı Kadın Derneği 791
 Ayub Khan, Muhammad 609
 Azad Kashmir 342
 Azerbaijan 10-12, 38, 50-51, 72-73, 78, 130-131,
 140-141, 157-158, 207-208, 218, 250, 337, 362,
 364, 372, 391, 416, 480, 512, 520, 545, 556,
 628-630, 634, 650, 685, 736-737, 784
 Azerbaijan Public Administration Academy 784 al-Azhar University 171-173, 356
 Azhuri, Esther 66
Azizah (magazine) 714
 Bâ, Mariama 195
 Bab v. state (case) 471
 al-Bâb, 'Alī Muḥammad 15
 Bâbâ Farid 768
 Baba of Karo 136
 Bâbâ'ī movement 622
 Bâbâ'ī revolts 713
 Bâbī movement 15-16, 432, 481, 566, 650
 Babri Masjid 179, 287, 560, 702, 741
 Bacı, Fatma 713
 Bacıyân-i Rûm 713, 761
 Badasht 15
 al-Badawi, Aḥmad 763 Badawi, Hāgga Zakiyya 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib 763 al-Badawī, Su'ād al-Fatīh 563, 614
 Badir Khan 360
 Badis, Ben 640, 653
 Badžijanije 761
 Baggara 689
Baghdad (film) 758
 al-Baghdādiyya, Zaynab bt. Abū al-Barakāt 762
 Bahā'ī women 15-18, 178
 Bahā'u'llāh 15-17
 Bahla 229-230
 Bahman Amishapand 803
 Bahr al-Ghazal 278, 691
 Bahrain 24-25, 71, 269-270, 465, 551-552, 748-749
 Bahry Somjuradov 3
 Bai Tahira (case) 377
 Baijiyān-i Rûm (chronicle) 623
 Bakhtiar, Laleh 722, 772
 Bakhtiaris 178, 284
 Baku 208, 250, 628-629, 784
 Baku Slavic Languages University 784
 Baku State University 784
 Bakufu dynasty 333
 Balakot 621
 Bali 352, 420, 745
 Balkans 42-43, 261, 370-372, 553-554, 632-633, 693, 713, 735-736, 761-762
 Balkhi, Seddighe 41
 Ballad of Kaka Mir and Kak Sheikh 359
 Ballad of Khaj and Syamand 359

- Ballad of Las and Khazal 359
 Ballad of Shor Mahmud and Marzingan 359
 Balquis Fatima v. Najm-ul-Ikram Qureshi (case) 378
 Baluch 335, 338, 341, 571
 Baluches 571
 Baluchistan 240, 342
 Baluchmayar 571
 al-Banāt, Sirāj 788
 Banchte Shekha 174
 Bandaranike, Srimavo 90
 Bandung 431, 636
 Bangladesh 7, 38, 52-55, 82-83, 90-92, 106-107, 123-125, 142-143, 171, 173-174, 179-180, 202, 216-217, 225, 240-242, 266, 286-288, 304, 338-341, 343, 377-378, 405-406, 433-435, 468, 471, 503-504, 532-533, 546, 548, 559-560, 593, 627-628, 645, 702-704, 739, 756
 Bangladesh Mahila Parishad 704
 Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) 54, 83, 559
 Bangladesh Women's Affairs Directorate 704
 Bangsamoro 323
 Bangsamoro Women's Foundation for Peace and Development 323
 Banjul 182
 Banjul Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights 307
 Banke 124
 Bānū, Gulistan 802
 Banū 'Awf 776
 Banū Hāshim 776
 Banū Sa'd b. Bakr 356
 Baobab 182, 224, 280, 562
 al-Bāqir, Muḥammad 446
 Baraghāni, Fāṭima 481
 Baraghāni, Fāṭimih Bigum (see Qurrat al-'Ayn)
 Barelvi 341
 Barmaya 481
 Barre, Siyad 549
 Barzani 364
 Barzani, Mustafa 575
 Barzinji, Sheikh Mahmoud 363, 652
 Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu 791
 Başbakanlık Kadının Statüsü ve Sorunları Genel Müdürlüğü 791 al-Bashīr, 'Umar 278, 562 al-Bāsil bek, 'Abd al-Sattār 67
 Başkent Kadın Platformu 57
 Basra Province 465 al-Başri, al-Ḥasan 476
 Batak 420
 Batak Karo 332-333
 al-Batinah 465
 Bayazīdi, Mela Maḥmūd 358-359
 Bayezid I 349
 Bayrak, Tosun 771
 Bayramī Melāmīs 622
 Bayrāmī order 761
 Bayt al-Umma 647
 BBC Arabic service 657
 Būdshishiyya order 765
Beast of Morocco (film) 757
 Becker, Carl Heinrich 772
 Bedevī order 761
 Beduin 67, 120, 189, 210-211, 228, 233, 356, 422-423, 455, 494, 574, 749
 Behbehani, Soraya 772
 Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action 22, 85, 267, 275, 278, 280, 488, 584-585, 598, 642, 672, 675, 785
 Beijing+5 672
 Beirut 13, 36-37, 585, 657-658, 782
 Beja People's Party 661
 Bektāshī order 623, 713, 761-762, 767
 Bektāsh-i Walī 623
 Belgium 30, 187, 293, 484, 535-536, 732
 Bello, Muhammad 328-329
 Ben Ali, Zinelabidine 558, 641
 Bengali Muslim Women's Association 53
 Bennani, Farida 654
 Berber Academy 576
 Berber Spring 576
 Berber Study Group 576
 Berberity 576
 Berbers 30, 69, 528, 576-577, 689, 712, 749, 765
 Berlin 536
 Berti 331
 Beylerian, Marie 13
 Bhabha, Homi 294
 Bhartiya Janata Party (BJP) 286, 560, 741
 Bhikha, Zain 292
 Bhopal 60, 646
 Bhutan 92, 123
 Bhutto, Benazir 52-53, 83, 90, 148, 559-560
 Bhutto, Nusrat 53
 Bhutto, Zulfikar Ali 53, 83, 181
 Bi Amman (Abadi Banu Begum) 61, 645
 Bībī Si'Shanbah 803-804
 Biṣṭāmī, shaykh 766
 Bidlīsī, Sharaf al-Dīn 358
Bihishti Zewar 60, 497
 Bihruzī, Maryam 605
 Biko, Steve 578
 Bilbas tribal confederacy 215
 Bin Laden, Osama 754
 Bint al-Ard 585
 Bint al-Nīl 68
 Birgivi Mehmed Efendi 501
 Birkan 765
 Birmingham 109, 718
 Bishari 689
 Bishkek 116
 Bishkek Humanitarian University 784
 Bishnois 339
 Biṣṭāmī, Sufi shaykh 766
 Black Consciousness Movement 578
Black Sunday (film) 758
 Black Women's Federation of South Africa 438
 Bohras 123, 194, 465
 Bonn 783
 Boran, Behice 665
 Bornu 222, 330
 Boserup, Esther 311
 Bosnia-Herzegovina 42-43, 306, 333, 370-371, 534, 536, 553-554, 632, 685, 693, 735-736, 761-762
 Boston 781
 Botan 360
 Botswana 126, 526
 Bounaaman 712
 Bourguiba, Habib 558, 640, 750
 Bouteflika, Abdelaziz 641
 Bozoklu Djalāl revolt 622
 Bradford 110, 535, 718
 Brahuis 571
 Brazil 221
 Brelwi 716
 British Colombia 162
 British Shariah Council 385
 British Somaliland 75
Brocaded Saree, The (book) 194
 Brunei 27, 351, 378-380, 393, 429-431, 746
 Buddhism 25

- Bukhara 416
 Bukharans 498
 Bukhārī 71, 296
 Bukit Tinggi 332
 Bukit Tinggi congress 602
 Bulgaria 254, 553-554, 761
 Burhāniyya order 772, 774
 Burdjanaze, N. 587
 Bureau of Women Workers (Turkey) 671
 Burkina Faso 85, 196, 561
 Burma 63, 353
 Bursa 11, 201
 Burundi 127
 Byzantine Empire 202, 349-350, 501

 Cachalia, Amina 578
 Cachalia, Molvi 578
Caesar and Cleopatra (film) 758
 Çağdaş Yaşamı Destekleme Derneği 56, 791
 Cairo 9, 13, 34, 67, 201, 356, 360, 376, 586, 612, 657, 690, 700, 721, 762, 763
 Cairo University 7
 Calcutta 53, 303, 645
 California 722, 796
 Cambodia 63, 429, 430
 Cambridge Group for the History of Population and Social Structure 254
 Cameroon 85-86, 144, 327, 331
 Canada 7, 102-103, 112-115, 161-163, 270-272, 554-556, 617-619, 753-755
 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 161, 271
 Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW) 113, 161, 271-272, 556, 618, 754
 Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) 271, 618
 Canadian-Muslim Civil Liberties Association (CMCLA) 271
 Çankaya University Women's Research Center 783
 Cape Province 578
 Cape Town 74, 578
 Carter, Jimmy 309
 Casamance 550, 562
 Caspian region 362
 Caste Disabilities Removal Act 1850 (India) 304
 ÇATOM 580
 Caucasus 3-4, 19-21, 50-52, 72-74, 78-79, 103-105, 115-116, 130-131, 140-141, 165-167, 191-192, 206-208, 218-219, 235-236, 247-249, 250-251, 336-338, 372-373, 390-391, 415-416, 479-481, 512-513, 544-545, 586-587, 600-601, 628-631, 633-636, 679-681, 736-737, 766-770, 783-784
 Caucasus Women's Research and Consulting Network (CWN) 629
 Čaušević, Rā'is al-'Ulamā' 632
 Çelebi, Evliya 358, 701-702
 Center for Effective Gender Policy (Kazakhstan) 626
 Center for Research and Development of the Pesantren and Society 603
 Center for Studies and Research on Women (Fes) 654
 Center for Training and Information on Islam (Indonesia) 675
 Center for Women's Studies and Research (Iran) 786
 Center for Zoroastrian University Students (Tehran) 803
 Central African Republic 126
 Central Arab states 21-24, 459-463
 Central European University 784
 Central Recovery Operation (India) 341
 Ceuta 211

 Chad 85, 245, 330-331, 543, 561
 ChakChak 803
 Chakma, Kalpana 546, 627
 Chakravarty, Renu 627
 Cham 353
 Chantiers jeunes Maroc (CJM) 794
 Charter for Rights of Women in Africa 280
 Chassériau, Théodore 69
 Chechen-Russian conflict 574
 Chechnya 50, 372, 601, 634-635
 Chérifa 577
 Chicago 16-17, 185-186
 Child Marriage and Enforced Widowhood Act 1891 (India) 469
 Child Marriage Restraint Act 1929 59, 65, 125
 China 25, 27, 28n1, 28n2, 63, 90-92, 133, 297, 322, 333, 353, 360, 412, 429, 539
 Chishtī, Mu'īnuddīn 767-768
 Chishtī order 621, 773, 767-768, 770
 Chishtī Šābirī order 769
 Chittagong Hill Tracts 546, 627
 Chittagong University 546
 Chohan, Fatima 578
 Choson dynasty 333
 Chowdhury, Motia 54
 Chowdhury, Sajeda 54
 Chughtai, Ismat 60, 194
 Church Missionary Society 71
 Ciciek, Farha 604
 Çiller, Tansu 682
 Cipinang Prison 431
 Circassians 218, 573-574, 580
 City of the Dead (Cairo) 768
 Civil Rights Act 1964 (United States) 164
Cleopatra (film) 757-758
 Cleveland 168
 Clock, Sarah 17
 Club Tahar Haddad 641
 Coalition for Equality in Personal Status Laws 120
 Code Napoleon 725
 Code of Personal Status (Tunisia) 388
 Collectif 95 Maghreb Égalité 275, 585, 642
 Cologne 717
 Commission for Adoption and Fostering (post-Soviet countries) 4
 Committee on the Status of Women in India 84
 Committee of Union and Progress's "Law of Organizations" (Turkey) 530
 Committee of Young Women (Egypt) 647
 Commonwealth of Independent States (RBEC) 629, 680
 Communist League (Yugoslavia) 42, 632
 Communist Party (India) 627
 Communist Party (Indonesia) 638, 648
 Communist Party (Israel) 46
 Communist Party (Soviet Union) 50, 78, 130, 587, 679-680
 Communist Party (Yugoslavia) 42, 553
 Comores 245
 Compilation of Islamic Law (Indonesia) 379, 394
 Conakry 561
 Confederation générale des travailleurs libanais (CGTL) 667
 Conflict Research Center (Baku) 628
 Congo 127, 488
 Congress Party (India) 469, 559
 Conseil supérieur de la jeunesse (CSJ) (Algeria) 794
 Constantinople 202, 350
 Constitution of Afghanistan 458
 Constitution of Iraq 1970 667

- Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan 165
 Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran 81, 432
 Constitution of Jordan 1952 667
 Constitution of Lebanon 1926 667
 Contagious Disease Act 1864 64
 Conté, Lansana 550
 Convention against Torture, and Other Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) 306
 Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction 306-307
 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) 22, 24, 50, 56, 79, 83, 85, 112, 125, 127, 225, 266, 273-275, 279, 307-309, 404, 472, 584, 597, 660, 666, 668, 675, 786
 Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) 306
 Convention on the Nationality of Married Women 307
 Convention on the Political Rights of Women 307
 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide 306 Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) 86, 118, 307, 407, 660, 736
 Coptic law 464
 Copts 388, 689, 720-721
 Côte d'Ivoire 126, 145, 425
 Council of American Islamic Relations (CAIR) 61, 291
 Council of American Islamic Relations-Canada (CAIR-CAN) 271-272, 618, 754
 Court of Arab Women 274
 Crimea 50, 705
 Criminal Law Amendment Act 1997 (Pakistan) 407
 Criminal Procedure Code 1973 (India) 377, 435, 470, 741
 Criminal Procedure Code 1989 (Bangladesh) 405
 Criminal Procedure Code 1989 (Pakistan) 407
 Croatia 42, 553-554, 735
 Cromer, Lord 36-37, 67, 71, 780
 Çukurova University 783
Cultural Journal of Afghanistan Women 41
Customs and Manners of the Kurds (1858-9) (book) 358

 Daēnā 803
 Daghestan 50, 79, 130, 207, 372, 415-416, 512
 Dahlan, Ahmad 602, 709
 Dahlan, Nyai Ahmad 602
 Dajani, Souad 582
 Dallas 412
 Dāmanān, Bibījan Pāk 766
 Damascus 10
 Dances of Universal Peace 770
Dānish (journal) 135
Dānishmend-nāma 623
 Danuka 652
 Dār al-Iftā' 171, 173
 Dār Juwayd 122
 Dār al-Qaḍā' 161
 Da'ra 657
 Darangen city 243
 Darfur 278, 330, 661, 690
 Dari 215, 367, 478, 571, 582
 Darqāwiyya order 765
 Dar-ul-Ulum (Deoband) 645
 Dasar Wanita Negara 244
 Dā'ūd, Muḥammad 677
 Da'ud, Imam 168
Daughters of Iran (newspaper) 589
 Dawi, Shukkria Barekzai 41
 Dawlatābādī, Saḍīqa 789
 Dāwūd Khān, Muḥammad 432, 458, 650, 788
 Dāwūd, Sardar 567-568
Days From My Life (book) 320
 Dearborn 796
 Debeche, Djamilia 654
Deception (film) 757
 Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women 111, 307
 Defenders of God's Path 322
 Defenders of the Nation 322
 Delacroix, Eugène 69
 Delhi 60, 738, 768
 Demak 25
Demet (journal) 664
 Democratic Action Party (Malaysia) 28
 Democratic League of Kosovo 554
 Democratic Organization of Afghan Women (DOAW) 582 Democratic Party of Azerbaijan 556
 Dēn 803
Dengī Afret (magazine) 363
 Denmark 536, 717
 Deobandis 60, 341, 343, 497, 716
 Department of Vice and Virtue (Afghanistan) 41, 500
 Department of Vice and Virtue (Pakistan) 180
 Dersim revolt 1937-1938 361
 Derviş Hanım 761
 Desert Storm 491-492
Desert Warrior (book) 492
 Dewa 304
 Dhaka 217
Dharb-i-Mu'min (newspaper) 326
 Dharma Wanita 132, 244
 Dharmashastras 303
 Dhofar 465, 657-658
 Dhofar Liberation Front 658
Dholā-Maru (legend) 340
 Dihlawī, 'Abd al-'Azīz 621
 Dinka 689, 691
 Diop, Sokhna Magat 75
 Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention 1958 666
 Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act 1939 (India) 59, 107, 377-378, 469-470, 743
 Divorce Act (Canada) 103
 Diyanet İşleri Türk İslam Birliği 717
 Diyarbakır 56-57, 184, 362
 Djebbar, Assia 654
 Djibouti 126, 182, 245, 404, 505, 548-549, 562
 Djurdjura 577
 Dogon 331
 Domestic Violence Act 1994 (Malaysia) 323, 352, 675
 Domrane, Malika 577
 Dowry and Bridal Gifts (Restriction) Rules 1976 (Pakistan) 124
 Dowry Prohibition Act 1980 (Bangladesh) 124, 593
 Drammen 717
 Drew, Timothy 168
 Druzes 120, 574, 590, 722, 726
 Dubai 24-25, 465
 Dukhtarān-e Millat (Kashmir) 340, 546
 Dulaymī, Naziha 653
 Durban 74, 578
 Dussap, Srpuihi 13

- Dzaghig Ganants* (journal) 13
 Dzuhayatin, Siti Ruhaini 603, 675

 East Timor 674
 Ebadi, Shirin 44, 179, 589
 Eberhardt, Isabelle 772
 Ebu's-su'ud Efendi (see Abū al-Sa'ūd)
 Ecole Lamalif 718
 EDHI Trust 434
 Edip, Halide 664
 Edirne 201
 Egalité, émancipation et promotion (Algeria) 641
 Ege University Women's Studies Reseach Center (Turkey) 783
 Egypt 7, 9, 21-24, 35-38, 66-69, 71-72, 74, 76, 99, 111-112, 122, 155, 156, 171-174, 189, 210, 254-255, 266, 274, 278, 290, 297, 307-308, 316, 319-320, 321, 368, 369, 387, 388, 389, 400, 403-404, 460-465, 476, 494-497, 518, 520, 523, 543, 583-586, 606-607, 609, 647-648, 666-667, 678, 685-687, 689-692, 699-700, 720-721, 760, 762-764, 768-769, 779-782, 793-794
 Egyptian Feminist Union 68, 464
 Egyptian Girl Guides Association (EGGA) 794
 Egyptian Trade Union Federation 666
L'Égyptienne (journal) 68
 El-Amin, Yaphett 714
 El-Fassi, Malika 654
 Elmi, Asha Hagi 549
 ENDA T.M. (Senegal) 246
 Enforcement of Shariah Ordinance (Pakistan) 378
 Engineer, Asghar Ali 603-604
 England 31, 378, 536, 773, 780, 781
 Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (United States) 184
 Equal Remuneration Convention 1951 666
 Equality Now 281
 Erdogan, Recep Tayyip 183
 Ereğli 533
 Eritrea 126, 425, 487-488, 548, 562, 659-661, 690
 Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) 487, 659
 Eritrean Women War Veterans Association (BANA) 660
 Ershad, Hussain Mohammad 286, 559
Ershad-al Neswan (magazine) 41
 Esayian, Zabel 13
 Eskişehir 783
 Eskişehir Anadolu University 783
 Etemadi, Muhammad Nur Ahmad 677
 Ethical Policy 65
 Ethiopia 182, 425, 487, 548-549, 612, 659-660, 690, 693
 European Council for Fatwa and Research 320, 385
 European Court for Human Rights 187
 European Youth Forum 799
 Evidence Act (Pakistan) 407-408

 Fadā'iyyin-i Khalq 556
 Fahlman, Lila 555
 Fakih, Mansour 603
 Family Act 1975 (Australia) 101
 Family Code 1984 (Algeria) 577, 641
 Family Code 1992 (Yemen) 466
 Family Code 1996 (Sudan) 526
 Family Code of the Republic of Uzbekistan 4
 Family Courts Law 1995 (Israel) 120
 Family Law (Yemen) 466, 658
 Family Law Act 1989 (Korea) 333
 Family Laws Commission (Pakistan) 53
 Family Protection Law (Iran) 272, 302, 392, 467, 801
 Family Rejuvenation Society (Palestinian) 585 Family Welfare Organization (PKK) 132, 244 al-Fanār (Palestinian) 210
 Fanon, Frantz 38, 155
 Faraḥ, Wahiba 551-552
 Farā'idi movement 621
 Farānak 481
 Farhādpūr, Laylī 670
 Farrukhād, Furūgh 216
Faṣl-i Zanān 639-640
 al-Fassi, Allal 640, 653
al-Fatā (journal) 66
 Fatah 320, 657
 Fatah, Natasha 555
 Fatayat (Indonesia) 709-711
 Fatemeh Zahra Religious Seminary (Tehran) 325
 Fathma n'Soumer 576
Fatima (film) 757
 Fāṭima (daughter of the Prophet) 325, 447, 449, 480, 722, 766
 Fāṭima Bāji 623
 Fāṭima of Cordoba 767
Fatima's Dance (film) 757
 Fāṭima bt. Ḥajj 'Alī (case) 121
Fatima Is Fatima (film) 497
 Fāṭima of Nishapur 766
 Fatuma, Mama 549
 Faysal, King 348
 al-Fayṣal, Tūjān 7-8, 574
 Fayumi, Badriyah 603-604
Federal Agents vs. the Underworld Inc. (film) 757-758
 Federal Territoties Act (Malaysia) 394
 Federation of Democratic Youth 653
 Federation of Muslim Women (FMW) 271, 618
 Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN) 47-48, 280, 329, 398, 562, 612
 Fédération nationale des musulmans de France (FNMF) 717
 Fédération nationale de scoutisme marocain (FNSM) 794
 Federation of South African Women 578
 Feild, Reshad 773
 Female Infanticide Act 1870 (India) 469
 Female Shūra Council (Egypt) 679
Femina (magazine) 132
feminist (journal) 783
 Femmes actives et sportives (France) 718
 Ferdenvar 701
 Ferghana Valley 498, 625, 769
 Fes 654-655
 Fidā'iyyin-i Islam 94
 Fidā'iyyin-i Khalq 285, 556
 Fiji Islands 91-93, 353, 429 al-Firdaws (journal) 66
Fire (film) 124
First Party, The (short story) 194
 Fīrūz, Ṣafiya 789
 Fitmiḥ, Shams-i 16
 Five Percenters 797
Flame of Araby (film) 758
 Foča prison 735
 Focal Points 550
 Fodio, Usman dan 75, 327-329, 396, 594
 Fons Vitae (USA) 772
Forty Maidens (film) 634

- Forum Against Oppression of Women (India) 704
 Forum Against Rape (India) 704
 Forum of European Muslim Youth and Student Organizations (FEMYSO) 799 Foundation for Muslim Women (Netherlands) 718
 Foundation for Tolerance International (Kyrgyzstan) 626
 Frager, Ragib (Robert) 771
 France 30, 32, 37, 62, 69, 74, 151, 152, 175-176, 187, 280, 348, 385, 484, 535-537, 571, 640, 686, 696, 717-718, 725, 732, 750, 759, 764-765, 773, 799
 Frauen Anstiftung (Bonn) 783
 Freedom and Solidarity Party (Turkey) 564
 Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention 1948 666
 French Sudan 526
 Fromentin, Eugène 69
 Front de libération nationale (FLN) (Algeria) 557, 576, 640-641, 750
 Front des forces socialistes (FFS) (Algeria) 558, 576
 Front islamique du salut (FIS) (Algeria) 276, 558
 Frontier Crimes Regulation 1901 433
 Fruit of Islam 168
 Fujayrah 465
 Fula 144
 Fulani 74, 144, 146, 330
 Fulbe 144-145, 196, 328
 Futa (Guinea) 144
 Futa Jallon 327
 Futa Toro 327
 Futehally, Zeenat 194

 al-Ghazālī, Abū Hamīd Muḥammad 767 al-Ghazālī, Zaynab 320, 607, 647-648 al-Ghazwānī, shaykh 765
 Gāhān 800
 Gaim, Tsegga 487
 Gambia 86, 144, 182, 245, 280, 327, 425
 Gandhi, Indira 90
 Gandhi, Mahatma 194, 578, 592, 626-627, 726
 Gandhi, Rajiv 741
 Gandhi, Sonia 90
 Gao 330
 Gasprinsky (Gaspıralı), Ismail Bey 50, 600
 Gaya Nusantara 352
 Gayane 10
 Gaza Federation of Trade Unions 668
 Gaza 509, 643, 656, 668
 Gazi University 783
Genç Kadın (journal) 664
 Gender and Development (GAD) 311
 Gender, Environment and Development (GED) 311
 Gender and Human Rights Research Unit (GIHAB) (Azerbaijan) 784
 General Federation of Iraqi Women (GFIW) 666
 General Federation of Palestinian Trade Unions 668
 General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) 666
 General Federation of Women (Syria) 663
 General Union of Great Jamahiriya Students (GUGJS) (Libya) 794
 General Union of Yemeni Women 657
 Georgia 78, 391, 512, 545, 574, 587, 628-630, 634-635, 736-737, 784
 Germany 20, 82, 175, 187, 316, 364, 484, 516, 536, 717, 773-774
 Gershon, Rabbi 316
 Gerwani 636, 638, 648-649
 Ghana 126-127, 280, 330, 381, 488, 562, 714
 Ghana Center for Democratic Development 280
 Ghanaian Federation of Muslim Women's Association 280
 Ghatak Dalal Nirmal Committee (Bangladesh) 54
 Ghoobar, Liza 41
 Gilanis 284
 Glasgow 110
 Gnāwa order 765
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von 772
 Gökalp, Ziya 482, 694
 Gökçen, Sabiha 289, 361, 489
 Gökkuşuğu Istanbul Kadın Platformu 57
 Goldziher, Ignaz 772
 Goran, Abdullah 363
 Gorskiy Courts 372, 391
 Grameen Bank in Bangladesh 532
 Greece 62, 761
Green Book 348
 Guardian Council (Iran) 81, 118
 Guardians and Wards Act (India) 470-471
 Guellouz, Souad 654
 Guhar Dasht prison 566
 Guinea 144-145, 245, 507, 550, 561
 Guinea-Bissau 487
 Gujar Bakarwals 108
 Gujarat 194, 240-241, 287-288, 338, 343, 547, 628, 702-704
 Gülen community 769
 Gulf states 24-25, 229-231, 269-270, 418-419, 465-467, 551-553
 Gumi, Abubakar 613
 Güney, Yılmaz 361
 Güneydoğu Kadın ve Kültür Platformu 57
 Guptis 339
 Gurdjieff, Georges Ivanovitch 772

 Haalpulaaren 144
 Habbalin, Louisa 66
 Habibi, Shafigha 41
 al-Habṭī, shaykh 765
 Hacettepe University 783
 Haddad, Tahar 640, 653
 Haddad, Yvonne 582
 Haddidchi-Dabbagh, Marziyeh 325
 Hadjerai 331
 Hadramawt 338
 Haffajee, Khadija 617-618
 Hafidz, Wardah 675
 Ḥāfız, Thurayā 662, 663
 Hague, The 718
 Haifa 120
 Haifa Feminist Center 96
 al-Hakam, Hishām b. 446
 Ḥālī, Alṭāf Ḥusayn 60
 Halide Edib 518
 Halima, Mama 549
 Halimi, Gisèle 70
 Halveti order 761
 Halveti-Jerrāhi order 770-771
 Ḥamādsha order 765
 Hamas 321, 521, 606
 Hamdard Center for Health and Human Services 715
 Hamida, Bochra Belhaj 654
 al-Hāmīl 764
Hammlara Mahsus Gazete (journal) 664
 Hammurabi code 699
 Hamra 229-230
 Ḥamza, Karīmān 769
 Ḥanbal, Aḥmad b. 441, 777
 Hanifa 577

- Ḥanīfa, Abū 441
 Hanım, Sair Nigar 530
 Hanoune, Louisa 558, 654
 Haq, Mawlana 471
 ul-Haq, Zia 53, 83, 286, 304, 471, 609–610, 703, 729 al-Ḥaqqānī, Muḥammad Nāzīm ‘Ādil al-Qubruṣī 770, 773 Harare 526
 Hargeisa 549
 Ḥāritha, Zayd ibn 1, 4
 Harlem 797
 Harris, Rabia Terri 771
 Haryana 241
 Hashemi, Faezeh 589
 Hashim, Fozia 661
 Hashmi, Farhat 326, 610
 Hassan II, king of Morocco 641
 Hassan, Riffat 169, 603, 604, 610, 674
 Hassim, Soraya 578
 Hasyim, Syafiq 604
 Ḥatāta, Sharīf 9
 Hatem, Mervat 583, 586
 HaTikvah 96
 Hatun, Asiye 761
 Hausa 35, 37, 74, 75, 135–137, 182, 196–197, 222–224, 259, 328–329, 330, 396, 437
 al-Ḥawshabī 657
Hay Guin (journal) 13
 Hazara 335, 509, 571
 Ḥaẓrat-i Khadija Association 789
 Hekmatyar, Golboddin 325
 Helminski, Camille 771
 Henry, Gray 772
 Heptullah, Najma 560
 Herat 416, 478
 Hezb-i Islami 325
 al-Hibri, Azizah 598
 High Council of Iranian Women 589
 High Council of Women’s Societies (Iran) 789
Higher Than Hope (book) 578
 Highlander Verbal Courts 372, 391
 Hill Women’s Federation (HWF) 546, 627
 Hindu Code 1956 304
 Hindu Right (see also Hindutva) 179–180, 726, 743
 Hinduism 25
 Hindutva 286–288, 339, 342–343, 628
Hir-Rānjhā (legend) 340
 Hisbah Bill 340
History of Humāyūn 256
 HIV/AIDS 127, 168, 224, 280, 488, 612
 Hixon, Lex 771
 Hizbī Jinan 362
 Hizb al-Tahrir 51, 717
 Hizballah 321, 606
 Hizb-i Zanān-i Irān 789
 Hogben, Alia 162
 Hoghghmal, Mahbobeh 41
Homework (film) 119
 Hong Kong 92, 353, 429, 745
 Hoquqmal, Mahbooba 677
 Hossain, Attia 194
 Hossain, Rokeya Sakhawat 53, 60, 495, 592
 Houda-Pepin, Fatima 554
 “House of obedience” law 23
 Hoxha, Enver 761
 Hrawi, Elias 23
 Hripsime 10
 al-Huda 610
 al-Huda Institution for Islamic Education 326 al-Huda women’s network 536
 Hudood Ordinances 1979 (Pakistan) 53, 83, 287, 288, 342, 343, 378, 408–409, 434, 435, 471, 609, 628, 703
 Hui 322, 333, 353
 Hujaig, Fatima 578
 Hula, Mīryam 363
 Human Rights Commission of Pakistan 435
 Human Rights Commission of Afghanistan 41
 Hurgronje, Christiaan Snouck 772
 Ḥusayn (grandson of the Prophet) 285, 532 285
 Husayn, Amna Nur 661
 Ḥusayn, Tāhā 7
 Huseini, Zhila 363
 Hussaini Brahmins 339
 Hussein, king of Jordan 348
 Hussein, Saddam 348, 586
 Hutu 127
 Hyder, Nazr Sajjad 60
 Hyder, Qurratulain 194
 Hyderabad 60, 645
 Ibādīs 465
 Ibn ‘Ābidīn 122
 Ibn al-‘Arabī 767
 Ibn Bābawayh 356
 Ibn Baṭṭūta 501
 Ibn al-Ḥājj 497, 501
 Ibn Hishām 356
 Ibn Ishāq 356
 Ibn Kathīr 122
 Ibn Majīd, Aḥmad 26
 Ibn Taymiyya, Taqī al-Dīn 453, 476
 Ibrāhīm, Fāṭima Aḥmad 47, 278
 Ibrāhīmī-Qavām 738
 Ibtikār, Ma‘šūmeh 681
 Ibu Tien 156
 Ibuism 244
 Idara Minhaj ul-Qur’ān 716–717
 IDP Women’s Association of Georgia 630
 Idrīs, Wafā’ 320
Ikhwān al-Muṣlimīn (see Muslim Brotherhood)
 Ilam 800
 İlerici Kadınlar Derneği 665
 Illinois 715
 Ilyas, Maulana Muhammad 709
 Imam, Ayesha 47, 182, 595
 Imam, Jahanara 54
 Imperial Harem 693
 In Defence of Freedom of Media Association (Iran) 670
 Inanna 803
 In‘āsh al-Usra 585
 Ināyāt Khān, Pīr Ḥaẓrat 722, 770, 773
 Ināyāt Khān, Pīr Vilāyāt 770, 773
 Ināyāt Khān, Ziā 770
 Incest Trauma Center (Serbia) 736
İnci (journal) 664
 India 17, 28, 35–37, 52–55, 59–61, 82–84, 90, 92, 106–108, 123–125, 142–144, 171, 179–181, 194–195, 202–204, 213, 231, 232, 240–242, 256, 257, 286–289, 297, 303–305, 326, 338–344, 353, 377–378, 379, 412, 433–436, 465, 469–470, 497, 503–504, 514–515, 531–532, 546–548, 559–560, 591–593, 607, 620–622, 626–628, 644–646, 657, 696, 697, 702–704, 709, 716, 726–727, 728, 738, 741–744, 755–757, 768, 770, 773, 774, 780–781, 802–803
 Indian Council of Legal Aid and Advice 434
 Indian Ocean 74, 204, 338

- Indian Penal Code 435
 Indochina 353
 Indonesia 26-27, 35-37, 63-65, 79-81, 90, 91-93, 131-132, 155-157, 244, 280, 322, 332-333, 351-353, 378-381, 393-394, 419-421, 430-431, 539, 602-604, 636-638, 648-650, 672-675, 685, 687, 708-711, 746, 781-782
 Indonesian Women's Coalition for Justice and Democracy 80
 Ingushetia 50, 512, 629
 Inna of Gobir 328
 Institute for Women's Studies and Research (Iran) 119
 International Association of Sufism Conference 771
 International Bill of Rights 309
 International Campaign for the Defense of Women's Rights 162
 International Commission of Jurists 279
 International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU) 666, 668
 International Confederation of Free Trade Unions 671
 International Court of Justice (ICJ) 308
 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) 22, 265, 306, 308
 International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) 22, 265, 306, 666-667
 International Criminal Court 127
 International Decade for Women (1976-1985) 45, 53, 127, 172, 266, 274, 311
 International Fellowship of Reconciliation (IFOR) 629
 International Islamic Council 309
 International Islamic University 674
 International Labor Organization Maternity Protection Convention 307
 International Labour Organization Forced Labour Convention 1930 666
 International League of Muslim Women 714
 International Network for the Rights of Female Victims of Violence in Pakistan 610
 International Women's Rights Action Watch (IWRAW) 279
 Iran 10-14, 15-18, 23, 28, 35-36, 38, 40-41, 43-44, 81-82, 94-95, 105-106, 113, 117-119, 134-135, 155, 162, 164-165, 171, 174, 177-179, 192-193, 199-201, 211-213, 215-216, 231-233, 238-239, 252-254, 272-273, 284-286, 302-303, 309, 315, 317, 322, 325-326, 338, 345-346, 358-366, 368, 374-375, 392-393, 406-407, 412, 432-433, 447, 467-469, 476, 480, 481-482, 496, 497, 499-501, 503, 504, 513-515, 518, 520, 521, 524-525, 536, 543, 551, 556-557, 566-567, 571-573, 574, 584, 589-590, 604-606, 625, 639-640, 650-652, 667, 669-670, 681-682, 706-708, 727-728, 737-738, 753, 760, 768-769, 780, 781, 782, 784, 786-787, 789-790, 792-793, 800-804
 Constitutional Revolution 13, 36, 177-178, 192, 216, 272, 284, 362, 363, 432, 467, 481, 556, 571, 639, 681, 707, 781
 Islamic Revolution 43, 94, 164, 213, 232, 276, 285, 375, 392, 468, 514, 556, 557, 559, 566, 604, 605, 648, 681
 Īrān (newspaper) 118
 Iran Bethel 135
 Īrān-i Nuvīn Party 556
 Iran-Iraq War (1980-88) 105, 269, 285, 325, 514
 Iranian Islamic Women's Institute 789
 Iranian Legal Medical Office 118
 Iranian Women's League 789
 Iraq 71, 229, 232, 285, 299, 347-348, 358-365, 404, 443, 447, 460, 481, 524, 543, 573, 574-575, 582, 583, 586, 608, 609, 629, 642, 652-653, 666, 667, 702, 725, 780, 781
 Iraqi Communist Party (ICP) 363, 575, 652-653
 Iraqi revolution 1958 524
 Iraqi Teachers' Union 653
Īrshād-i Nisvān (journal) 135
 Īsāwiyya order 764-765
 Isfahan 10, 11, 35
 Isha L'Isha (Woman to Woman) 45, 96
 Ishilhin 765
 Ishtar 803
 Ishvani 194
 Iskandārī, Muhtaram 789
 al-Islah 613, 653
 Islamabad 124
 Islamic Center for Political and Cultural Activities of Afghan Women 41
 Islamic Center of Greater Toledo 714
 Islamic Center of Japan 322
 Islamic Charta (Germany) 733
 Islamic Circle of North America (ICNA) 291, 618, 715
 Islamic Council and Kadi's Court Act (Brunei) 379
 Islamic Cultural Association (Japan) 322
 Islamic Family Law Act (Malaysia) 394
 Islamic Family Law Enactment (Malaysia) 379, 394
 Islamic Front (Syria) 663
Islamic Horizons (magazine) 291
 Islamic Information Centre (The Hague) 718
 Islamic Inheritance Law (Iran) 801
 Islamic Institute for Civil Justice (Canada) 161
 Islamic Iran Participation Front 557
 Islamic Jihad (Egypt) 606, 648, 720
 Islamic Jihad (Palestinian) 320
 Islamic Party of Kenya 182
 Islamic Penal Code (Iran) 406
 Islamic Relief Agency (South Africa) 578
 Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP) (Tajikistan) 50, 601
 Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) (Algeria) 276, 558
 Islamic Sharia Council (London) 109
 Islamic Social and Welfare Association (South Africa) 578
 Islamic Society of North America (ISNA) 186, 291, 618-619
 Islamic Texts Society (USA) 772
 Islamic Women Norway 718
 Islamic Women's Welfare Council of Victoria (IWWCV) 324
 Ismail, Rasimah 603
 Ismā'īlīs 50, 123, 194, 327, 341, 465, 554, 571, 722-723
 Isma-Listen 175-176
Īsmat (journal) 60, 194
Israel Studies 96
 Israel 44-47, 95-97, 119-121, 190, 210-211, 320, 321, 543, 590-591, 642-644, 655-656, 668, 715, 758, 780, 784, 793
 Issa (Ethiopia) 549
 Istanbul 10, 12-13, 34, 35, 56, 57, 201, 254, 255, 260-261, 360, 362, 376, 482, 515, 530, 541, 545, 597, 665, 693, 695, 771, 779, 780, 783
 Istanbul Rainbow Women's Platform 541
 Istanbul University Women's Research Center 56
 Istakhbārāt (Afghanistan) 433
 Istiqlal party (Morocco) 557, 576
 Italy 74, 151, 187, 485, 490, 505, 535

- Ithnā ‘Ashariyya Shī‘īs (see Twelver Shī‘īs) al-Ittihad (journal) (USA) 617 al-Ittihad (Somalia) 613
 Iwīn prison 566
- Jabul Arabiyya 168
 Jād al-Ḥaqq, Jād al-Ḥaqq ‘Alī 172, 173
 Jadidism 50, 498, 518, 521, 587, 600, 705
 Ja‘fari, Nasrin 363
 Jaffa 46
 Jaffer, Mobin 554
 Jaffer, Zubeida 578
 Jaffna 547
 Jahan, Nur 286
 Jahan, Shah 60
 Jahan, Sultan 60, 646
 Jahangir, Asma 53, 401
 Jaja 512
 Jakarta 323, 431, 603
 Jalal, Massouda 677
 Jalalabad 41
 Ja‘lan 465
 Jamāl, Bibī 768
 Jamālzāda, Muḥammad ‘Alī 94
 Jamaat Tabligh 708–709, 716
 Jamaat-e-Islam 52, 55, 287, 326, 340, 343, 559, 628, 714, 741
 Jamaatu Ibadu Rahmane 611–612
 Jāmī 766
 Jāmī‘at al-Islāmiyya 648
 Jamiat-e-Ulema Hind 55, 469, 741
 Jām‘iyāt-i Inqilābi-i Zanān-i Afghanistan (see Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan)
 Jāmī‘yat-i Nisvān-i Vaṭankhvāh 789
 Jām‘iyat-i Rāh-i Naw 556
 Jām‘iyat-i Zanān-i Ḥuqūqdān 556
 Jāmī‘yat-i Zanān-i Īrān 789
 Jammu 108, 240, 342
 Jān, Bibī 788
 Janawadi Mahila Samiti (JMS) 560
 Janissaries 693
 Japan 43, 63, 90–92, 133, 157, 322, 333, 351, 358, 429–430, 538–540, 636, 648–649, 745
 Japan Muslim Association 322
al-Jarīda (newspaper) 68
 Jaringan Kerja Budaya (JKB) 674
 Jaringan Perempuan dan Politik (JPP) 80 al-Jarrāh, Amīna ‘Arif 663
 Jaunpur 620
 Java 25–26, 243, 420, 431, 602, 648, 709, 745 al-Jawziyya, Ibn Qayyim 476
 Jaysh-i Muḥammad 326
 al-Jazā‘irli, Adil Bayhum 662
 Jāzūliyya order 765
 Jāzūliyya Ḥusniyya Shādhiliyya order 763
 Jbabdi, Latifa 654
 Jeddah 229
 Jehangir, Asma 610
 Jerrāhī order 771
 al-Jerrahi, Farīha Fatima 771
 Jerusalem 10, 46, 71, 120, 317, 320, 348, 388, 642, 668, 693
 Jerusalem and the East Mission 71
 Jesmin Sultana v. Mohammad Elias (case) 378
 Jeunes musulmans de France (JMF) 799
 Jewish women 315–318
 Jihān Ārā Begum 767
 Jihān’s law 172, 464–465
 Jillālī 765
- Jilānī, ‘Abd al-Qādir 767
 Jilani, Hajja Taliba 782
Jin ū Jiyan (magazine) 580
 Jinnah, Mohammed Ali 61, 303 al-Jizūli, Muḥammad 278
 Jogjakarta 709
 Johannesburg 578
John Goldfarb (film) 757
 Joint Women’s Programme (India) 84
 Jordan 7–9, 22–23, 71, 87–88, 112, 122–123,
 211, 221–223, 274, 300, 307, 348, 368, 400,
 403–404, 423, 460, 523, 573–574, 584, 586,
 606, 643, 666–668, 678, 725
 Jordanian Federation of Trade Unions (JFTU) 667
 Joseph, Suad 582
 Judeo-Arabic 318
 Judeo-Persian 318
 al-Ju‘fī, Jābir 446
Jujin (journal) 57, 362, 580
 Jumma 546, 627
 Junayd, Sufi shaykh 766
 Justice and Development Party (AKP) 183, 282, 682
- Kaap, Saartijie van de 579
 Ka‘b, Nusayba bint 319
 Kabbani, Muhammad Hisham 770, 782
 Kabir al-Din, Ḥasan 327
 Kabul 40–41, 95, 119, 285, 367, 402, 479, 551, 567–568, 572, 651
 Kabyle 69, 576, 577
 Kadhi’s Act 1985 (Zanzibar) 397
Kadın (journal) 664
 Kadın Adayları Destekleme ve Eğitim Derneği
 (KADER) 56, 564, 791
 Kadın Çevresi 56
 Kadıncık Ana 713
 Kadının İnsan Hakları Projesi 56
Kadınlar (book) 779
Kadınlar Dünyası (journal) 664
 Kadınlar Halk Fırkası 664, 790
 Kadri, Cherrefe 714
 Kaduna 613
 Kafari 335
 Kaftārū, Aḥmad 769
 Kahina 576
 Kaimi, Hasan 761
 Kākh-i Javānān 792
Kaktüs (journal) 56, 541, 783
 Kalāntar, Maḥmūd Khān 566
 Kalimantan 420
 Kamal, Begum Sufia 54
 Kamal, Meena Keshwar (see Meena)
 Ka-Mer (Kadın Merkezi) 56, 362
 Kāmil, Muṣṭafā 155, 156, 523
 Kāmil, Şafiyya 156
 Kamilat 782
 Kamkar, Qashang 363
 Kanūn-i Bānuvān 789
 Kano 137, 196, 223, 224
 Kanun of Luk Dukagjin 693
 Kanūn-u Bānuvān 589
 Kapissa 402
 Kappes, Lillian 17
 Kapsiki 331
 Kaptai dam 546
 Kar, Mehrangiz 589, 790
 Karachi 769
 Karachi Central Jail 434
 Karakalpaks 142, 251
 Karamah 598

- Karaman 202
 Karbala 15, 232, 285
 Karnataka 241
 Kartini, Raden Adjeng 602-603, 636-637, 648
 Karzai, Hamid 7, 95, 753
 Kashmir 108, 342-343, 503-504, 546
 Kashmir Valley 339, 627
 Kasinga, Fauziya 413
 Kasravi, Ahmad 94
 Katsina 136, 182
 Kavakçı, Merve 183, 731
 Kavala 761
 Kayan 120
 Kaysān, Ṭawūs Ibn 476
 Kayseri 202
 Kazakhstan 2, 50-51, 72-73, 78, 116, 141, 198, 283-284, 374, 588, 625-626, 634, 784
 Kazemi, Zahra 670
 Kāzim, Sayyid 15
 Kébé, Awa Guéye 527
 Kebon Waru Prison 431
 Kelantan 27-28, 243-244, 323, 394-395
 Kemal, Namik 157, 779
 Kemalpaşazade 501
 Kenembou 330
 Kenya 47-48, 74-76, 85, 127, 181-182, 245, 280, 381-382, 396-397, 426, 437, 488, 548-549, 561
 Kenya Peace and Development Network 549
 Kerala 240-241, 339, 341, 560
 Kermanshah 768
 Kessab 11
 Khadija (wife of the Prophet) 319, 350, 722, 776
 "Khadija of the age" 350
 Khadija, Hajja 765
 Khadija, Lalla 764
 Khajjū, Amīna bint 765
 Khālid, Khālid Muḥammad 87
 Khālid, Layla 320
 al-Khalīfa, Ḥamad bin ʿIsā 552
 Khalūfī tomb complex 765
 Khān, Amīr ʿAbd al-Rahmān 458
 Khān, Amīr Ḥabīb Allāh 458
 Khan, Sheema 272, 618
 Khān, Sir Sayyid Aḥmad 59, 143
 al-Khansā' 319
 Khānum, Farangīs 803
 Khanum, ʿIsmat 17
 Khānum, Māh Sharaf 359
 Khalq Organization of Afghan Women 788
 Khārijīs 28, 319
 Khartoum 526, 585
 Khatami, Mohammed 43, 178
 Khatlon province 299
Khatun (journal) 60, 194
 Khatun, Anwaru 54
 Khawla 451
 Khazar University 784
 Kheira 576
 Khidmat-i Itilā ʿat-i Dawlatī (KHAD) 567
 Khilafat Movement 61
 Khojas 303, 327
 Khomeini, Ayatollah 171, 178, 325, 357, 392, 496, 605, 707
 Khorasāni, Baba Ilyās-i 623
 Khoromi, Farnaz 772
khudzhum 19, 50, 587, 634, 679 khulāṣa qāʿid usra muwāṭin 24
 Khurasan 15
 Khuzistan 800
 Kiribati 429
 Kirman 801-803
Kitāb-i Dede Korkut 130, 623
Kitāb-i Aqdās 16
 K.Ka.DaV 362
 Koalisi Perempuan Indonesia untuk Keadilan dan Demokrasi (KPI) 80
 Koeddoes, Roehanna 602
 Komele 363
Kommas Perempuan (see also National Commission on Violence against Women) 674
 Kompilasi Hukum Islam 394
 Konya 761
 Korasan 416
 Kordestan 11
 Kordofan 690
 Korea 333, 430, 539-540, 745
 Korean War 491
 Kosovo 42, 553-554, 632, 735-736
 Kra 26
 Krupskaya, Nadezhda 78
 Kufa 440-442, 444, 446
 Kuki Women's Federation 547
 Kumaratunga, Chandrika 90
 Kunama 659
 Kung-futze 333
 Kurdewarī 571
 Kurdish women 358-366
 Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) 362-364, 574-575
 Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) 184, 361, 541, 545, 580, 629, 695
 Kurdistani, Mastura 359
 Kurmanji 184, 694
 Kutty, Sajidah 271
 Kuwait 24-25, 71, 87-88, 270, 307, 348, 368, 465-466, 491-492, 509, 523, 543, 551-552, 585, 667-678, 748-749, 771
 Kvemo Kartli 512
 Kwa Zulu-Natal 578
 Kwang Kyu, Lee 133, 156
 Kyrgyz National University 784
 Kyrgyz Pedagogical University 784
 Kyrgyz-Russian Slavonic University 784
 Kyrgyzstan 50-51, 72-73, 78, 116, 142, 164, 198, 283-284, 374, 416, 498-499, 588, 625-626, 634, 680, 705, 784-786
 Labe region 328
 Labor Party (Israel) 45
 Labor Party of Turkey (LPT) 665
 Ladakh 339
 Ladino 318
 Laghouat 764
 Lahiji, Shahla 790
 Lahore 60-61, 378, 645, 717
 Lahori group 471
Lajja (novel) 179, 559
 Lakshwadeep 108, 339
 Lampung 243, 420
 Laos 63
 Larsen, Barbara 772
 Lashkar-i Tayba 326
 Laskar Hizbulwatan 322
 Laskar Sabilillah 322
Last Barrier, The (book) 773
 Latifi (case) 742, 743
 Law and Mediation Center (Bangladesh) 174
 Law for the Protection of Family (Turkey) 56, 128, 262, 472

- Law of Associations (Israel) 45
 Law of Evidence 1983-4 (Pakistan) 471
 Law of Union of Education 1924 (Turkey) 664 Law on the Reorganization of Certain Terms and Procedures of Litigation in Personal Status Matters
 2000 (Egypt) 465
 Lawal, Amina 182, 222, 224, 397, 436, 437
 Lawsī 649
 Lawyers Alliance for Women 281
 Laz 580, 694
 League for the Defense of Women's Rights (Iraq)
 652, 653
 League of Sudanese Women 585
 League of Women Students and Graduates of the University and Egyptian Institutes 647
 Lebanon 23, 35-37, 87-88, 112, 172, 190, 300,
 321, 333, 347-348, 358, 368, 388, 402-404, 460,
 536, 543, 573-574, 584, 586, 606-607, 643, 656,
 666-678, 693, 715, 725-726, 796
 Leiden Law School 157
 Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat (ELSAM)
 674
 Lenin, Vladimir 78
 Levant 35, 461
 Lewis, Murshid Samuel 770
 Liberal Islam 675
 Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam 547
 Liberia 127, 145, 280, 488, 550
 Libya 315, 399, 403-404, 543, 764, 793-794
 Ligue démocratique pour les droits des femmes
 (Morocco) 275
 Ligue française de la femme musulmane (LFFM) 717
 Literacy Corps (Afghanistan) 40
 Literacy Movement Organization (Iran) 325
 London 537, 718
 London Missionary Society 71
 Lord's Resistance Army 488
 Lorestan 11
 Los Angeles 149, 412, 758
 Loya Jirga 41, 95, 284, 551, 568, 677
 Lubimova, Serafima 634
 Lucknow 60, 532
 Lunda 425
 Luri 345
 Lurs 571
 Lyon 718

 Maadi, Zainab 654
 Macau 429
 Maccido, Al Haji Mohammodu 329
 Macedonia 42, 553, 632, 735-736, 761
Mādāyan-ī Hazār Dādīstān 802
al-Madkhal 497
 Madras 646
 Madrasah Diniyah Puteri 602
 al-Madrasa al-Saniyya 66-67
 Madura 420
 Maghreb/Mashrek Network for Information and Training on Gender 274
 Maghsoud, Shah 771-772
 Mahabad 362
 Mahabharata 644
 Mahal, Begum Hazrat 591
 al-Mahdī, Wisal 278
Mahendra-Mūmal (legend) 340
 Mahfouz, Naguib 171
 Mahila Parishad 54, 704
 Mahjūb, 'Abd al-Khāliq 661
 al-Mahmūd, Shaykha bt. Aḥmad 552
 Mahmūdi, Zhinus 17

 Mai Tatsine 223
 Maiwand, battle of 479
Majalla (Ottoman) 388
Majalla (Tunisia) 4, 460
 Makhoere, Caesarina Kona 438
 Maktab Tarighat Oveysi (MTO) 772
Malali (magazine) 41
 Malawi 126, 181, 204, 396
 Malaya 25, 65
 Malaysia 27-28, 63-65, 90-93, 131-132, 155-156,
 242-244, 323, 332, 351-353, 378-381, 393,
 394-395, 429-431, 495, 539, 649, 672-675,
 708-711, 746, 769
 Maldives 92-93, 123, 267, 338-339
 Mali 47-48, 85-86, 181-182, 245, 330-331, 397,
 425, 438, 488, 507, 526, 537, 550, 561-562
 Mālik b. Anas 355, 440, 446
 Mallapuram 560
 Maluku 280, 674
 Mamluk Egypt 34, 762
 Manchester 109, 485, 535
 Mandela, Nelson 578
 Mandela, Winnie 437, 578
 Mangoenpuspito, R. Siti Soekaptinah Soenarjo 80
 Manipur 547
 Manji, Irshad 161-163
 al-Mannubiyya, Lalla 'A'isha 766
 Mano River Union Women Peace Network
 (MARWOPNET) 550
 Mansūr, Shaykh 600
 Māppilla 339
 Maputo 280
 al-Mar'a al-Jadīda (Egypt) 585
 Marcoes-Natsir, Lies 604
 Marcos, Ferdinand 91, 323
 Margarit 10
 al-Marghīnānī, jurist 701
 Marma Samiti 546
 Marmara University Research and Implementation
 Center for the Employment of Women 783
 Maronite Christians 574
 Maronite-Druze "civil war" 574
 Marriage Act (Tanzania) 397, 426
 Marriage Act 1974 (Indonesia) 379
 Mas'ud, Aḥmad Shāh 605
 Mas'udi, Masdar F. 603
 Mashriq 273-275, 422-424, 573-575, 606-609
 Mastoi 703
 Matoub, Lounès 576
 Matoub, Malika 576
 Mattson, Ingrid 618
 Mau Mau 437
 Mauritania 75, 85, 126, 245, 267, 404, 525-526
 Mawdūdī, Sayyid Abū al-A'lā 290
 Mayet, Zuleikha 578
 Māzandarān 16
 Mazari-i Sharif 41
 al-Mazayniyya 319
 Mazhar, Maryam 66
 Mazlum Der 57
 McCulloch, Lesley 431
 Md. Hefzur Rahman v. Shamsun Nahar Begum (case) 378
Mecelle 388
 MediaWatch 556
 Medina 34, 169, 387, 440-444, 446, 776
 Medina, constitution of 776
 Meena 40, 325, 479, 582, 651, 788
 Meer, Fatima 438, 578
 Meerwala 703

- Megawangi, Ratna 604
 Meira Paibies 547
 Melāmi order 761
 Melaka 25, 27
 Melbourne 717
 Memons 303
Memories of an Indian Childhood (short story) 194
 Menkerios, Askalu 661
 Meos 108
Mermom (magazine) 41
 Mernissi, Fatima 34, 169, 584, 603, 654, 675, 686
 Mersin University Women Studies Center (MERKAM) 783
 Mesopotamia 529, 699, 781
 Messaoudi, Khalida 576, 654
 Mevlan, Ulviye 664
 Mevlevī order 713, 761, 768, 770–771
 Mewat 709
 Mezuzahs 512
 Michigan 722, 796
al-Midan (Egyptian magazine) 9
 Middle East Technical University (METU) Gender and Women Studies Center 783
 Mill, James 59
 Mill, John Stuart 94
 Milli Görüs 716–717
 Minangkabau 26, 332, 334, 352, 420, 648, 745
 Mindanao 243
 Ministère de la jeunesse et de l'enfance 794
 Mīr, Titū 622
Mir'āt al-'arūs (book) 343
Mir'at al-basnā' (journal) 66
Mirman (journal) 788
 Mirpuri women 535
al-Miṣrīyāt (journal) 68
 Mitri, Widād 647
 Mixed Marriage Law (India) 65
 Miyān, Dūdū 622
 Mizo Widows' Union 547
 Mkhitar Gosh 10
 Mkonto we Sizwe 488
 Moaber, Shafiga 41
 Mogadishu 549
 Mohajirs 546, 547, 627
 Mohamad, Mahathir 28, 156, 673
 Mohamed V, king of Morocco 641
 Mohamed VI, king of Morocco 641
 Mohamed, Farida 578
 Mohammad Gholam Rabbani (case) 471
 Mohammed Kargar (case) 411
 Mohaqeqdamad, Mustafa 174
 Mohila Ainjibi Samity 54
 Mojaddadi, Sebghatullah 285
 Mojahed, Jamila 41
 Moluccas 636
 Mombasa 75, 76
 Mongolia 416
 Montenegro 553, 632, 735–736
 Montreal 113
 Moody, Susan 17
 Moorish Science Temple 168
 Moors 330
 Morady, Fouzia 41
 Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) 323
 Moroccan Association for Cultural Research and Exchange 576
 Morocco 3–5, 7, 37, 69–70, 87–88, 189, 211, 275–277, 368, 403–404, 484–485, 528, 535, 543, 557–558, 576–577, 582, 585, 640–642, 653–655, 678, 685, 711–712, 749–751, 765, 768, 773, 780, 782, 793–794
 Mosammat Nur Akhtar v. Abdul Mabud Chowdury (case) 471
 Moslem Women's Cultural Association (Kenya) 561
 Mosul 574
 Motherland Party (Turkey) 731
 Mothers' Front (Sri Lanka) 547, 627
 Mothers' Union (Turkey) 516
 Mouvement des forces démocratiques de Casamance (MFDC) 550
 Movement for Rights and Freedoms party (MRF) (Bulgaria) 554
 Mozambique 126, 204, 487
 M'rad, Bchira 654
 MSA-Northwestern University 186
 Mu'assasa-i Khayriyya-i Zanān (Afghanistan) 788
 Mu'āwiya, Burayd b. 446
 Mudawwana (Morocco) 4, 276, 558, 641
 Mugabe, Robert 526
 al-Mughrabī, Dalāl 320
 Mughal 35, 59, 241, 256, 339, 620, 621, 767
 Muhaiyaddeen, Guru Bawa 771
 Muhammad, Elijah 168
 Muhammad, Husein 603
 Muḥammad, Mīr Sayyid 620
 Muḥammad, Mullā 15
 Muḥammad, Zayd ibn 4
 Muhammadi Begum 194
 Muhammadiyah 26, 602–603, 638, 709–711
 Muḥarrām 524, 532
 Muhittin, Nezihe 664
 Muhsin, Amina Wadud 604
 Mujāhidīn-i Khalq 556–557
 Mujtahid-Shabistārī, Muḥammad 606
 Mukalla 551, 552
 Mukhtār, Maḥmūd 523
 Mulia, Musdah 675
 Mumbai 703, 738
 Munti, Ratna Batara 604
 Muridiyya brotherhood 75, 86, 713, 772
 Murad IV 623
 Mūsā, 'Amr 678
 Mūsā, Nabawiyya 67
 Muṣaddiq, Muḥammad 669, 681
 Muscat 551, 552
 Museveni, Yoweri 488
 Musharraḥ, Pervez 83, 559–560, 609
 Muslim (jurist) 296, 447
 Muslim American Society (MAS) 291
 Muslim Association of Canada (MAC) 618
 Muslim Brotherhood (Ikhwān al-Muslimīn) 319–321, 606–607, 614, 647–648, 662–663, 782
 Muslim Code on Personal Law (Philippines) 379
 Muslim Family Laws Ordinance 1961 (Pakistan) 53, 82–83, 124–125, 287, 304, 340, 378, 470–471, 593, 729
 Muslim Family Ordinance 1961 (Bangladesh) 340, 471
 Muslim Girls School (Lucknow) 60
 Muslim Intelligentsia Forum (India) 55
 Muslim Khawateen Marka (India) 546
 Muslim Lawyer's Association (MLA) (Canada) 271
 Muslim League for Accountability (MULAC) 47
 Muslim Marriage Bill (South Africa) 577, 579
 Muslim Marriages and Divorce (Registration) Act 1974 (Bangladesh) 471 Muslim Personal Law (Morocco) 577

- Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act 1937
 (India) 304, 342, 433, 470, 743
 Muslim Personal Law Board (India) 341, 741, 743
 Muslim Personal Law of Shariat 1948 (Pakistan) 470
 Muslim Political Action Committee (USA) 291
 Muslim Sisters 36, 647
 Muslim Sisters Network 280
 Muslim Sisters Organization (Nigeria) 612
 Muslim Student Association (MSA) (Canada) 186,
 796, 617–619, 796
 Muslim Students Society (MSS) (Nigeria) 612
 Muslim Students' Association (Nairobi) 47
 Muslim Wakf Validating Act (India) 303 Muslim Welfare Home for Needy Women and Children (Toronto) 114
 Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act
 1986 (India) 377, 470, 560, 593, 741, 756
 Muslim Women Lawyers for Human Rights (USA)
 598, 714
 Muslim Women's Bill (India) 84, 470
 Muslim Women's Georgetown Study Project 598
 Muslim Women's Helpline (London) 718
 Muslim Women's Institute (Kenya) 561
 Muslim Women's League (USA) 598, 714
 Muslim Women's Society (Egypt) 320
 Muslim Youth Movement (MYM) (South Africa)
 280
 Muslim Youth of North America (MYNA) 618
 Muslimat Nahdlatul Ulama 322–323, 602, 638, 709–711
 Muştafavī, Sayyid Javād 604
 Musta'lian Ismā'īlī Shī'īs 341
 Muttahida Majlis-i Amal (MMA) 340, 559–560
 Muttahida Qaumi Movement (MQM) 547
 Mutual Support Organization of Circassian Women 530 al-Muwaţţā' 387, 440
My Favorite Spy (film) 757
 Myanmar 92, 93
 Mzekali 512
- Nabarāwī, Sayza 647
 Nabard, Mary 41
 Nablus 300–301
 Naciri, Rabéa 654
 al-Nadim Center 585
 Nādir Shāh, Muḥammad 432
Nafahāt al-uns 766
 Nafiu Rabiū (case) 224
 Naga Mothers Association (NMA) 547, 627
 Naga women 546–547, 627
 Nagorno-Karabakh 545, 628, 630, 634
Nahdat Mişr 523
 Nahdlatul Ulama 322, 602, 638, 708–709
 Nāhīd 803
Nahid (magazine) 41
 al-Nahla 229
 Naidu, Sarojini 627
 Nairobi 12, 47, 76, 280–281
 al-Najariyya 319
 Najd 422
 Najib, Ala'ī 604
 al-Najrānī, Shabīb 28
 Nakhichevan area 545
 Nampalli Girls School 60
 Nāmūs Girls' School 215
 Nana 512, 803
 Nanterre 718
 Naqshbandī order 620–621, 761, 769–770, 773–774, 782
- Naqshbandī-Ḥaqqānī order 769–770, 772
 Narayanganj 180
 Nari Pokkho 54, 704
 Narinder Virk (case) 412
 Nasif, Fātima 319
 Nāsif, Malak Hifnī 67–68
Nāsikh al-tawārikh 481
 Nāşiri 765
 Nasreen, Taslima 7, 171, 173, 179–180, 343, 559
 Nasretddinova, Yadgar 680
 Nasri, Zoulikha 678
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel 464, 607, 648, 690–781
 Nasserism 608
 Nation of Islam 168, 722–723, 797
 National Bloc (Syria) 662
 National Commission for Women (India) 55
 National Commission on Anti-Violence against Women
 (Indonesia) 352
 National Commission on the Status of Women
 (Pakistan) 53
 National Commission on Violence against Women
 (Indonesia) 352, 674
 National Committee on Beijing (Bangladesh) 54
 National Council of Women (Iran) 789
 National Council of Women in India (NCWI) 61
 National Council on Gender Development
 (Kyrgyzstan) 784
 National Federation of Indian Women 560
 National Front (Iran) 566
 National Islamic Front (NIF) 47, 278, 487, 526,
 563, 595, 614
 National Liberation Front (Yemen) 657–658
 National Marriage Act (Indonesia) 393
 National Resistance Army (Uganda) 488
 National Spiritual Assembly (Iran) 17
 National Statistical Institute of Turkmenistan (NTISF)
 785
 National Union of Eritrean Women (NUEW)
 660–661
 National Union of Eritrean Youth and Students
 (NUEYS) 660
 National Union of Women of Afghanistan 41
 National Women Peace Group (NAWO-PEG) (Nigeria)
 550
 Nationalist Action Party (Turkey) 731
 Nationalist Socialist Council of Nagaland 547
 Nawab Begams of Bhopal 60, 646
 Nawfal, Hind 66
 Nayrīz 16
 Nazareth 120
 Negar-SAFA 582
 Negeri Sembilan 27, 332, 352
 Negev 120, 211
 Nehzat-i Savād Amūzī 325
 Neo-Destour (Tunisia) 641
 Nepal 90, 92, 123–124, 338–339, 547
 The Netherlands 30, 62, 187, 293, 484–485,
 535–536, 718, 773
 Network of Women and Politics 80
Never Say Never Again (film) 758
 New Democratic Party (Canada) 555
 New Guinea 63, 65, 90, 92–93, 747
 New Julfa 10
 New Order Indonesia 131–132, 157, 244, 393, 636–637
 New South Wales Anti-Discrimination Board 175
 New York 41, 168, 582, 722, 771, 797
 New Zealand 90–93, 358, 429
 Nizāmi, Khwāja Ḥasan 768
 Nicaragua 308

- Nī'matullāhī order 768
 Niger 37, 47-48, 75-76, 86, 181-182, 245, 328,
 397, 398, 425, 507, 561-562
 Nigeria 37, 47, 48, 74-76, 85-86, 127, 135,
 137, 181-182, 196, 222-224, 245-246, 280,
 309, 328-329, 381-382, 396-400, 424-425,
 436-438, 476, 488, 506-507, 550, 562, 594-595,
 612-613
 Nigerian National Council of Women's Societies 280
Nighthawks (film) 758
 Nijera Kori 54
 Nile Valley region 689
 Nimtoli 180
 An-Nisa Society 718
 Niyālā 15
 Nizām-nāmeḥ 284
 Nobel Peace Prize 44, 179, 273, 589
 Noel, Melvina 772
 Noorzai, Kubra 788
 Norastani, Hawa 41
 North American Council for Muslim Women
 (NACMW) 598
 North Henan 133
 North Korea 90
 Northern Alliance 651
 Northern Rhodesia 425
 North-West Frontier Province 180, 340, 559-560, 610
 Norway 536, 717-718, 784
 Notting Hill 30
 Nottingham 30
 Nouara 577
 Nuba 331, 689, 691
 Nubians 689-690
 Nuer 689
 Nukhūd-i Mushgil'gosha 803
 al-Numayrī, Ja'far 397
 Nur, Shaykh 771
Nūr al-Fabyā' (journal) 662
 Nūr 'Alī Khalifa revolt 622
 Nuristan 239
 Nuristanis 335, 571
 Nuriyah, Sinta 675
 Nurzai, Kubra 677
 Nusa Tenggara 420
 Nyerere, Julius 397, 426

 O'Riordan, Linda 772
 Öcalan, Abdullah 580
 Odhikar 435
 Oğuz Khan 349, 350
 Ohio 714, 722
 Oklahoma City 754
 Okunna, Latifa 47
 Oman 25, 71, 190, 211, 229-230, 270, 423, 465, 551-552, 657, 749
 Omar, Hajiya Sa'adiya 329
 Omar, Mullah 402
 Ontario Arbitration Act 161
 Open Society Institute-Soros Foundation 784
 Optional Protocol on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography 736
 Organization of Iranian People's Fedaii Guerrillas 650
 Organization of Iranian Women 650, 789
 Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC) 266-267
 Orhan I 350, 501
 Osh State University 784
 Oslo 716-718
 Osman I 349

Osmanlı Müdafaa-i Hukuk-u Nisvan Cemiyeti 664
 Ossetia 79, 512, 630, 634
 Othman, Norani 674
 Ottoman Association for Defense of Women's Rights
 790
 Ottoman Empire 6, 10, 121-123, 201-202,
 254-255, 349-351, 375-377, 381-383, 529-531,
 692-694, 700-702
 Ottoman Ladies' Organization for the Uplifting of the Homeland 530
 Ouardia 577
 Oujda 765, 768
Our Generation (book) 578
Outpost in Morocco (film) 758
 Ovadia, Stella 56
 Ozak, Muzaffer 770-771
 Özelsel, Michaela 769
Özgür Kadın (magazine) 580

 P3M 603
 Pacific 89-93, 351-353, 433-424, 747
 Pahlavī 803
 Pahlavī, Ashraf 589, 789
 Pahlavī, Shams 589
 Pahlavis 36, 134, 362-63, 468, 589, 639, 707
 Paikan, Suraya 41
 Pakistan 37-38, 40, 52-55, 61, 82-84, 90-92,
 106-108, 123-125, 142-143, 148, 151, 179-181,
 202-204, 213, 216-217, 225, 231-232, 240, 257,
 286-289, 290, 297, 304, 326, 333, 336, 338-344,
 377-378, 399-400, 405, 407-409, 433-436,
 469-471, 476, 496, 503-504, 514-515, 520,
 531-533, 534-536, 546-548, 551, 555, 559-560,
 567, 582, 593, 609-611, 627-628, 645, 651, 674,
 675, 686-687, 699-700, 702-704, 709, 717,
 728-730, 738-740, 766, 768-769, 784, 788
 Pakistan Commission on Inquiry for Women 435
 Pakistan Dowry and Gifts (Restriction) Act 1976 471 Pakistan India People's Forum for Peace and Democracy 628
 Pakistan Penal Code 407-408
 Pakistan People's Party (PPP) 559
 Pakistan Women Lawyers Association 378
 Palace of Youth (Iran) 792
 Palestine 320-321, 642-644, 655-657
 Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) 320, 725
 Palestinian intifada 642-644, 656-657
 Palestinian Islamic Resistance Movement 321
 Palestinian-American Women's Association 715
 PanAfrican Cultural Festival 577
 Pandor, Naledi 578
 Pangkor Treaty 27, 67
 Pankisi Gorge 512
 Papua New Guinea 63, 65, 90, 92-93, 747
parandzha 19
 Paris 576, 582
 Parlika, Suraya 41
 Pārsā, Farrukhrū 566, 681
 Parti de l'avant-garde socialiste (PAGS) 558
 Parti Islam SeMalaysia (PAS) 27-28, 395
 Parti socialiste destourien (PSD) (Tunisia) 557
 Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan (see Kurdistan Workers' Party)
 Party for Democratic Action (SDA)
 (Bosnia-Herzegovina) 553-554
 Party of Iranian Women 789
 Parveen, Abida 768
 Parwan 402
 Pasai 25, 331
pasdaran 325

- Pashto 41
 Pashtuns 106, 217, 335-336, 367, 414, 433, 479, 510, 567, 571-572, 723, 752
 Durrani Pashtuns 134
 Ghilzai Pashtuns 134
 Pashtunwali 335, 367, 414, 571
 Patani 26
 Pathans 231
 Patna 621
 Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) 364, 575
Patriotic Women (magazine) (Iran) 589
 Patriotic Women's League (Iran) 556
Payām-i-Zān (magazine) 40, 582
Payām-i Hājar (magazine) 605
Pazartesi (journal) 56
 Peace Mothers Initiative 629
 Peace Partisans 653
 Penal Code (Turkey) 409-410
 Penal Code 1960 (Jordan) 122
 People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) 165, 285, 336, 551, 568, 651, 707, 788
 People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) (Eritrea) 660, 661
 People's Mujāhidīn Organization of Iran 650
 People's Resistance Forces (Iraq) 652
 People's Voice of Malaysia 673
 perestroika 50
 Permanent Arab Court to Resist Violence Against Women 23, 112
 Perrysburg 714
 Persis 602
 Persistri 602
 Personal Status Law 1992 (Yemen) 658
 Personal Status Law 2000 (Egypt) 720
 Perth 133
 Peshwar 124
 Petersberg 82
 Peul 144
 Philadelphia 771
 Philippines 27, 90-93, 323, 351-353, 378-380, 393, 685, 746
 Phoenicians 574
 Pink Triangle 352
 Pīr-i Bānū-yi Pars 803
 Pīr-i Hrisht 803
 Pīr-i Nāraki 803
 Pīr-i Naristāna 803
 Pīr-i Sabz 803
 Plang, Bai Matabay 323
Please Come Home (film) 757
 Poland 490
 Pomaks 554
 Popular Front for the Liberation of Occupied Arab Gulf 658
 Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) 320
 Portugal 62
 Pranamis 339
 Preep Trust 54
Présence musulmane 718-719
 Prime ministry directorate for women's problems and status (Turkey) 791
 Prime ministry family research institution (Turkey) 791
Princess of the Nile (film) 758
Princess Tam Tam (film) 758
 Progressive Women's Association (Turkey) 665
Protocol (film) 757
 Protocol to the African Charter of Human and People's Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa 280
 Pukhtuns 192, 213, 231, 514
 Punjab 124, 240, 257, 303-304, 340, 342, 412, 534, 535, 546, 645, 729, 743, 768, 773
 Puranas 644
 Purdue University 784
 Purple Roof Women's Shelter Foundation 56
 Pushtun 213, 231, 284

 Qabūs, sultan of Oman 658
 Qaddafi, Mu'amar 348
 Qadian group 471
 Qadimists 587
 Qādiriyya order 328, 621, 711, 761, 764-765, 768, 769, 772
 al-Qā'ida 607
 Qājār 16, 802
 Qājār, Muḥammad Shāh 524
Qānūn al-usra (Algeria) 4
 Qanun-e-Shahadat Order 1984 (Pakistan) 408, 471 al-Qaraḍāwī, Yūsuf 320
 Qashqais 178, 571
 Qāsim, 'Abd al-Karīm 653
 Qaşr prison 432, 566
 al-Qassām, 'Izz al-Dīn 320
 Qatar 23, 24-25, 71, 270, 404, 465, 551-552
 Qays, Thābit ibn 109
 Qazvīn 15, 566
 Qisas and Diyat Ordinance 1990 (Pakistan) 288, 400, 408, 434-435
 Qizil Hīşār prison 566
 Qizilbash Turkmen rebellion 623
 Qom 178, 325
 Quchanis 481
 Quddūs 15
 Quebec 102, 554, 754
 Quetta 325, 582
Quilt, The (short story) 194
 Qurabiyya school 66
 Qurrat al-'Ayn, Tāhirah 15-16, 432, 481, 566, 639
 al-Qushayrī 771
 Qūṭb, Sayyid 290, 319, 321, 606

 Rabat 576, 585, 655
 Rabbānī, Burhanuddin 567
 Rābī'a of Basra 769
 Rābiṭat al-Nisā' al-Sūdāniyyāt 585
 Radfān uprising 657
 RAHI 738
 Raḥḥāliyya order 765
 Rahima (Center for Training and Information on Islam and Women's Rights Issues) 323, 603, 675
 Rahman, Sheikh Mujibur 405
 Raḥmāniyya order 764, 768
 Rajasthan 108, 216, 240-241, 339
 Rama temple movement 741
 Ramadan, Tariq 733
 Ramayana 644
 Rani of Jhansi 591
 Ras al-Khaymah 465
 Rashaida 689
 Rassemblement pour la culture et le développement (RCD) 558, 576-577
 Rastākhīz Party 556
 Ratibzad, Anahita 788
 Rawalpindi 124
al-Ra'y (newspaper) 8
reformasi activism 673
 Regional Bureau for Europe 629
 Reid, Ela 627
 Rembau 332

- Republican Brothers 278
 Republican Peoples Party 564
 Research, Action and Information Network for the Bodily Integrity of Women (Rainbo) 279-280
 Réseau islam et population 612
 Réseau Siggil Jiggeen 595
Return of Chandu (film) 758
 Revival Party (Iran) 556
 Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan (RAWA) 40, 285, 325, 479, 567, 582, 651, 788
 Reza Shah Pahlavī 94, 134, 177-178, 362, 392, 432, 481, 496, 518, 521, 524, 572, 589, 707, 727
 Riau sultanate 26
 Richmond 714
 Rifā'ī order 761, 771
 Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 666
 Riimaybe 330
 al-Rīmāwī, Amīna 668
 Rio+10 672
 Riway-i-am 303
 Riyadh 269
 Rizvanbegović, Habiba Stočević 761
 Roma 554, 735
Rooz (magazine) 41
 Roshangaran 790
 Rote Island 420
 Roy, Ram Mohan 626
 Royal Commission of for Human Rights (Jordan) 23
Roza (journal) 57, 362, 580
 Rugova, Ibrahim 554
 Rum 350
 Rumi, Mevlana Celaleddin 713
 Rushdie, Salman 7, 95, 171, 559
 Russian Federation 50, 79, 252, 372, 416, 629
 Rwala 422
 Rwanda 127, 437, 488

Saadia (film) 757
 Saanei, Yusef 174
 Sabah 243
 Sabra and Shatila massacre 643
 Sabz, Bānū-yi Khādīm-i Pīr-i 803
 Sadat, Anwar 464
 Sa'dāwī, Nawāl al- 7, 9, 603
 al-Šadiq, Ja'far 446, 448
 al-Šadr, Mūsā 321
 Sadri Krasniqi (case) 412
 Safia Bibi (case) 434
 Safiya Hussaini (case) 594
 Saheli 704
 Šahindal, Fadime 365
 Sahir, Mustaqim 292
 Šahrūh 349
 Said, Rasuna 602, 603
 Sait Nursi community 769
 al-Sakakini, Khalil 348
 Sakakini Riot 690
 Sakarya Shaykh revolt 623
 Sakshi 738
 Šalāh, Su'ād 172
 Salama Women Foundation 323
 Salīm, Jawād 524, 652
 al-Saltanah, Muzayyan 135
 Samar, Sima 7, 41, 95
 Samarkand 417
 Sāmi, Šemseddin 779-780
 Sammalito Nari Samaj 54
 Samos island 701

 San Francisco 771, 796
 San Jose 292
 Sana'a 229-230
 Sandukht 10
 Sangh Parivar 628
 Sanūsiyya order 764
Santa Barbara (soap opera) 499
Satanic Verses, The (book) 171
 Santoso, Maria Ulfah 80
 Sarajevo 370, 761
 Sarekat Islam 26
 Sarekat Rakyat 649
 Sarki Maiduwa (case) 223-224
 Sartika, Dewi 602, 636
 Sarts 498
 Sasa, Ayşe 769
 Sati Abolition Act 1829 469
 Saturday Mothers 57, 362, 545
 Saubin, Béatrice 430-431
 Saudi Arabia 20, 22, 24-25, 147, 172, 189, 221,
 269, 270, 329, 347, 368, 402-404, 465-467,
 491-492, 523, 551-552, 584, 658, 685, 687, 793
 Sauj Bulaq 362
 Saur (April) Revolution 165, 285, 336
 SAVAK 566
 Save Somali Women and Children (SSWC) 549
 Sawaba, Gambo 437, 438
 Sawt al-'Arab radio 657
Šawt al-mar'a (journal) 278
 Say No to Wife-Beating Campaign (Turkey) 665
 Sayyāh, Fāṭima 789
 Sayyid 'Abd Allāh revolt 623
 Sayyid Khan, Mīra 327
 Sayyid Waqqās 28
 Sāz-mān-i Demokrātik-i Zanān- Afghanistan 788
 Sāz-mān-i Zanān-i Irān 589
 Schuon, Fritjof 772
Secondhand Lions (film) 758
 Secretariat of Youth and Sport of the Masses 794 Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women, Peace and Security 2000 543-545, 550
 Seddiqi, Suhaila 41
Seerat (magazine) 41
 Self Employed Women's Association (SEWA) 593
 Sen, Manikuntala 627
 Senegal 37, 47, 48, 75-76, 85-86, 126, 127, 144,
 181-182, 245-246, 327, 331, 397, 425, 437,
 506-507, 526, 537, 550, 561-562, 594-595, 612
 Sennar 690
 Sepandārmaz 803
 Serbia 306, 553-554, 632, 735-736
 Seti Pīr 803
 Seven Sisters 761
 Seza 13
 Sezim shelter 116
 Sha'bānī, Razia 669
 Shabībīyya 28
 Shādhilī order 772
 Sha'rānī, 'Abd al-Wahhāb 767
 Sha'rāwī, Hūdā 68
 al-Sha'rāwī, Muḥammad Mutawallī 497 al-Shāfī'ī, Muḥammad b. Idrīs 441
 Shafiq, Durriyya 68
 Shah Bano (case) 83, 288, 342, 377, 470, 560, 628, 741-744
 Shāh Qalandar revolt 622
 Shāh Walī revolt 622
 Shāh, Aḥmad 414
 Shāh, Fath 'Alī 16
 Shah, Idries 722, 773

- Shāh, Nādir 568
 Shāh, Nāṣir al-Dīn 432
 Shāh-i Parian 803–804
 Shāhīd, Sayyid Aḥmad 622
 Shāhīd of Rae Bareilly, Sayyid Aḥmad 621
 Shahjahanabad 35
Shāh-jo Risālo 327
 Shahmaghsoudi School of Islamic Sufism 772
Shāhnāma (Book of Kings) 481, 800
 Shahqulu revolt 622
 Shahrūkh, Arbāb Kaykhusraw 803
 Shahrūkh, Farangīs 803
 Shahzad Muhammad Sidiq v. Shahnaz Farzana (case) 471
 Shalaq, Maqbūla 663
 Shāmil, Imām 372, 600
 Shangai Women's Mosque 322
 Shanshe shelter 116
 Shanti Bahani 546
Sharaf-Nāmi 358
 Shar'ā Criminal Code (Kelantan) 323
 Shariah Council (England) 31
 Shar'at Allāh, Ḥājji 621
 Shariat Application Act 1937 (India) 59, 124, 304, 342, 433, 470
 Shar'ati, 'Alī 164, 285, 497 al-Shar'iyya al-Muḥammadiyya order 763 Sharjah 465
Shark (film) 757
 Shashaani, Avidēh 772
 Shawrā-yi 'Alī-yi Jām'iyāt-i Zanān 789
 Shaykh Badr al-Dīn revolt 622–623
 Shaykh, Shamima 280
 Shaykha Wafā' 769
 Shaykhī sect 15
 Shazia Khaskheli (case) 342
Sheik, The (film) 757
 Sheikh Muhammad Raheem Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Mosque and Fellowship 771
 Sheikh, Haniya 271
Sheltering Sky, The (film) 757
 Shiraz 589, 639
 Shirazi, Zandukht 589
 Shirkat Gah 53, 582
 Shirkat, Shahlā 605
 al-Shīshaklī, Adīb 663
 Shoahman family 3
 Shoghi Effendi 16
 Shorish-Shamley, Zeiba 605
Shukūfah (journal) 135
shū'ūbiyya movement 777
 Sibyl (Zabel Asatur) 13
 Siddiq, Suhaila 677
 Siddiquee, Yusra 271
 Sidi 338
 Sidika, Ayşe 530
 Sidrine, Sihem Ben 654
Šid-yi zan 670
 Sierra Leone 12, 145, 280, 425, 488, 550, 561–562
 Sikandar 60
 Simmons, Gwendolyn Zohara 771
 Simorgh Collective 704
 Sindh 240, 327, 338, 339, 435
 Sindh Graduates Association 342
 Sindhi Women's Movement 547
 Sindhiani Tehrik 547
 Sinetron 132
 Singapore 27, 90–93, 131–133, 155–157, 175, 243, 351–353, 378–380, 393, 429, 431, 746
 Sinsuat, Bai Tanto 323
 Sinsuat, Bai Yasmin 323
 Siphir, Muhammad Taqī 481
 Sirāj, Zaynab 'Ināyat 788
 Sirhindi, Aḥmad 620–621
 Sisterhood is Global Institute (SIGI) 274, 598, 784
 Sisters in Islam (SIS) 27, 323, 352, 598, 673–675
 Sisters of Rum 761
 Sisters of Zaynab 216, 346, 605
 Sitti, Lalla 766
 Sivas 183–184
 Al Siwar 120
 Siyāh Chāl 16
 Skalli, Nouzha 654
 Skopje 761
Slave Girl (film) 757
 Smith-Bodichon, Barbara Leigh 69
 Sūmkū Party 556
So Long a Letter (book) 195
 Social Democratic People's Republican Party (CHP) (Turkey) 682
 Social-Cultural Council of Women (Iran) 789
 Society for the Advancement of Kurdish Women 360
 Society of Democratic Women (Iran) 789
 Society for the New Way (Iran) 556
 Society of Patriotic Women (Iran) 789
 Society for Promoting Female Education in the East 71
 Society for Protecting of the Rights of the Child (SPRC) (Iran) 273
 Society for Women Lawyers (Iran) 556
 Society of Zoroastrians 803
Soenting Melajoe (magazine) 602
 Soghdiāns 228
 Sohar 190, 211, 229
 Sokna FM 595
 Solo 243
 Somalia 76, 113, 126–127, 245, 307, 504–505, 548–549, 562, 613, 690, 768
Somut (journal) 783, 790
 Songhai 330
 Soong, Kua Kia 673
 Sopo Tresno 602
 Soraby, Habiba 41, 677
 SOS Children's villages 3
 South Africa 47–48, 74, 85–86, 126–127, 181, 279–280, 397, 437–438, 487–488, 577–579, 617, 672, 674
 South African Defense Forces (SADF) 488
 South Sinai 210
 Southall Black Sisters 537
 Soutien aux femmes d'Afghanistan 582
 Sow, Fatou 595
 Spain 62, 151, 223, 316
 Special Family Courts (Iran) 467–468
 Special Marriage Act 1954 (India) 339–340
 Spellberg, D.A. 34
 Spōntā ārmaitī 803
 Srebrenica 632–633
 Sredazburo's 634
 Sri Lanka 90, 92, 123, 142, 179, 241, 338, 378, 430, 546–548, 627–628, 771
 Srpska 735
 State Ibuism 131
 State Waqf Boards (India) 470
 Stewart, Elizabeth 17
 Stockholm 536
 Stockholm Declaration on Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children 737
 Strategy Info Research Development (SIRD) 674

- Stree Sangharsh 704
 Suara Ibu Peduli 637
 Suara Rakyat Malaysia (SUARAM) 673-674
 Succession Act (India) 304
 Sudan 21-24, 47-48, 71, 75-76, 85, 172, 245, 277-279, 297, 298, 330-331, 381, 396-397, 399, 403-404, 424, 476, 487-488, 525-526, 548-549, 562-563, 585, 595, 614-615, 661-662, 689-692, 768, 773
 Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/A) 661
 Sudan Women's Voice for Peace 549
 Sudanese Communist Party (SCP) 278, 661
 Sudanese Penal Code 404
 Sudanese Women's Union (WU) 47, 278, 562, 662
 Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society 770-771
 Sufi Women Organization 771
Sufis, The (book) 773
 Suharto 131, 155-157, 244, 393, 636-638, 648-649, 673-674
 Sühnî 327
 Sukarno 26, 636-638, 648-649
 Sukarnoputri, Megawati 26, 91, 394, 637
 Sūlamî, shaykh 766
 Sulawesi 420
 Sulaymaniyya 364
 Süleyman the Magnificent 350, 502
 Süleymanlis 716-717
 Sultan Fatimah 26
 Sultan Jahan Begum 646
 Sultan, Khaled bin 492
 Şulţān al-Rūm 349
 Sultāna, Raziyya 326
Sultana's Dream (book) 53
 Sultania Girls School 60
 Sultanova 769
 Sumatra 25, 26, 331-332, 352, 420, 431, 602, 636, 637, 648, 745
 Şun' Allāh, Mufti 501
 Sunda 745
 Sungai Selangor Dam project 674
 Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act 2000 (Bangladesh) 405-406
 Supreme Council of Kenya Muslims (SUPKEM) 47
 Supreme Council of Sufi Orders 762
 Surabaya 709
 Şurrayā, queen of Afghanistan 135, 582, 707, 788
 Surūsh, 'Abd al-Karim 94
Süs (journal) 664
 al-Suyufiyya school 66
 Sveriges Unga Muslimer (SUM) 799
 Swahili societies 74, 76, 204-206, 258, 382, 396, 424
 Swaziland 126, 127
 Swiss Civil Code 6, 56, 146, 383, 391, 426, 472, 516, 596, 730, 790
 Syariah Criminal Code (Malaysia) 27, 379, 395
 Sydney 101, 717
 Syeeda Khanum v. Muhammad Sami (case) 378
 Syria 23, 35-37, 87-88, 121-122, 221-222, 254, 274, 348, 358, 360, 363-364, 368, 402, 404, 422, 442-443, 453, 460, 523, 573, 606, 662-664, 666, 668, 678, 725-726, 753, 769, 780, 793
 Syrian Christian and Jewish women 66
 Syrian Law of Personal Status 1953 443
 Syrian Women's Union 662
 Tabaamrant, Fatima 577
 al-Tabarî, Abū Ja'far Muḥammad ibn Jarîr 387, 476
Tabbat Hakika (poem) 329
 Tadhkaray, Princess 762
Tadbkirat al-awliyā' 766, 769
 Tafraout 712
 Taghlib, Abān b. 446
 Ṭāhā, Batūl Mukhtār Muḥammad 563
 Ṭāhirih (see Qurrat al-'Ayn)
Tabrîr al-mar'a (book) 36, 67
 al-Ṭaḥṭāwî, Rifā'a Rāfi' 156-157
Tabzib un-niswan (journal) 60, 194
 Taibeh 120
 Taiwan 90, 745
 Tajikistan 50-51, 72, 78, 116, 141-142, 163-164, 237, 252, 283-284, 374, 416, 492, 498-499, 587, 601, 625-626, 634, 680, 784-785
 Takfir wa-Hijra 648
 Taliban 20, 40-41, 82, 95, 165, 180, 193, 213, 232, 253, 285, 287, 302, 326, 402, 433, 459, 478, 479, 500, 509-511, 551, 567-568, 582, 604-605, 607, 625, 651, 677, 708, 753, 760, 788
 Ṭaliqānî, A'zam 605
 Ṭaliqānî, Maḥmūd 605
 Tamara, queen 634
 Tamegrut 765
 Tamerlane 349
 Tamil Nadu 240-241, 435-436
 Tanbazar 180
 Tang dynasty 28
 Tanganyika 74, 204, 425, 561
 Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) 561
 Tanta 763
 Ṭaṇṭāwî, Muḥammad 172
 Tanzania 47-48, 74, 126, 182, 279, 381, 397, 424-426, 488, 561
 Tanzania Media Women's Association (TAMWA) 279, 561
 Tanzimat 146, 725, 794
 Taqî'zāda, Ḥasan 94
 Tarbiyat Modarres University 786
 Ṭarîf, Layla bint 319
Tarikat-ı Muhammediye 501
 Taroudant 765
 Tashilhit 765
 Tashkent 116, 635
 Taskilât-i Zanān-i Irān 789
 Tasmania 430
 Tata Institute of Social Sciences 738
 Tatars 480, 498, 501, 518
 Taylor, Charles 550
 Taymūr, 'Ā'isha 66
 Taymūr, Sa'id bin 658
 Tbilisi 635
 Tebhaga movement 546
 Tehran 15-16, 118-119, 279, 325, 362, 375, 556, 566, 605, 639, 707, 727, 802-803
 Tehran University 94, 787
 Tekeli, Şirin 56, 782
 Telengana movement 546
 Temuan 674
 Terai 124
 Tesfa Association 660
 Texas 412
 Thabit, Hajj Muḥammad Mustafa (case) 403
 Thailand 27, 63, 90-91, 243, 351, 353, 378-379, 429-430, 745-746
 Thānawî, Ashraf 'Alî 60, 343, 497, 743 al-Thaqafî, Muḥammad b. Muslim 446
 Thessaloniki 761
Thousand and One Nights 234
 Tihrani, Ta'rih 17
 Tijāniyya order 86, 144, 328, 764-765, 772

- Tikrītīs 573
 Tim Relawan Kemanusiaan (TRK) 674
 Timor Larosae 674
 Timurtash revolt 622
 Tipura Samiti 546
 Tirmidhī, al-Hākīm 766
 Titi, Bibi 561
 Tiznit 712, 765
 Tlemcen 766
 al-Tlidī, shaykh 765
 Tobacco Protest 639
 Tocqueville, Alexis de 94
 Togo 714
 Tonga 429
 Topuzian-Toshigian, Hayganush 13
 Toronto 113–114, 291–292
 Torun, Şule 56
 Tostan education program 527
 Touma-Suliman, Aida 120
 Trabzon 202
 Transcaucasia 391
 Transcaucasus Women's Dialogue 545
 Transjordan 71
 Transvaal 74
 Transvaal Indian Congress 578
 Traoré, Moussa 561
 Trengganu 28, 395
 Tribal Courts Law 1936 (Palestine) 403
 Tripoli 300, 315
True Lies (film) 758
 True Path Party (DYP) 564, 682
 True, Corinne 16
 Tsezs 512
 Tuareg 330, 550
 Tubu 330
 Tudeh (Communist) Party 363, 556, 566, 650, 789
 Tunis 279, 764, 766
 Tunisia 4, 5, 35, 37, 69, 70, 99, 111, 122, 187, 276–277, 368, 388–389, 402–404, 442–443, 460, 528, 557, 558, 583, 585–586, 640–642, 653–655, 687, 711, 749–751, 764, 772, 793–794
 al-Turābī, Ḥasan 278
 Türk Kadınlar Birliği 596, 664, 790
 Turkey 5–6, 55–57, 128–129, 137–139, 146–147, 165–167, 183–184, 206–207, 218–220, 247–249, 260–262, 281–282, 289–291, 383–384, 391, 409–410, 426–428, 472–473, 482–483, 489–490, 515–516, 533–534, 540–542, 544–545, 563–565, 569–570, 579–581, 595–597, 615–616, 622–624, 628–631, 664–665, 670–671, 682–684, 694–695, 712–714, 730–732, 736–737, 766–770, 783–784, 790–791, 794–795
 Turkish Communist Party (TCP) 665
 Turkish Mothers Association 629
 Turkish Women's Association 563, 570, 664
 Turkish Women Tailor's Cutting Home 530
 Türkiye İşçi Partisi 665
 Turkmenistan 50–51, 72, 78, 116, 141, 283–284, 416–417, 625, 634, 680, 784–785
 Turkmenistan State University 785
 Tusholi 512
 Tutsi 127, 437
 Tweedie, Irina 774
 Twelver (Ithnā 'Ashariyya) Shī'īs 341, 357, 392, 446, 450, 722–723
 'Ubayd, Saifiyya bt. 698
 Ubote, Milton 488
 Uganda 85, 126–127, 162, 181–182, 280, 436, 438, 488
 Uganda Muslim Supreme Council 280
 Ugandan Defense Force 488
 Ugandan Muslim Women Vision (UMWV) 280
 Ugandan People's Defense Forces 488
Ulumul Qur'an (journal) 604, 675
 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb (khalīfa) 442, 447, 450–451, 777
 Umar, Nasaruddin 603
 Umayyads 440, 689, 777
 Umm al-Miṣriyyīn 155, 647
 Umm al-Qaywayn 465
 Umm el-Fahm 120
 Umm Kulthūm 36
 Umud shelter (Bishkek) 116
 'Unal, Neslin 731
 'Unayzah 229
 Uniform Civil Code (India) 726
 Union de l'action féminine (Morocco) 641
 Union de la jeunesse musulmane 718
 Union des organisations islamiques de France (UIOF) 717
 Union des soeurs musulmanes 718
 Union nationale des femmes algériennes 557, 640
 Union nationale des femmes marocaines 557, 641
 Union nationale des femmes tunisiennes 557, 640
 Union of Kurdish Women 364
 Union of Tunisian Women 653
 Union of Tunisian Youth Organizations 794
 Union of Turkish Women 790
 Union of Women of the Don Region (UWDR) 601
 Union of Women Workers (Iran) 669
 Union Parishad 560
 Union socialiste des forces populaires (USFP) 557, 641
 United Arab Emirates 24–25, 210, 230, 368, 465, 551, 552, 737
 United Central Council of Workers Unions 669
 United Democratic Front (South Africa) 578
 United Kingdom 30, 109–110, 187, 329, 505, 536–537, 672, 759
 United Kingdom Islamic Mission 537
 United Nations Commission on the Status of Women 265
 United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) 643
 United States 17, 40, 55, 62, 88, 113, 130, 147–151, 162, 167–170, 182, 184–186, 262–264, 267, 272, 287, 291–293, 306–309, 324, 326, 329, 336, 399, 411–413, 430, 473–474, 490–493, 499, 559, 573, 583, 597–599, 607, 610, 617–618, 625, 630, 672, 691, 714–715, 721–724, 753, 754, 757–759, 770–772, 773, 781, 783, 784, 795–798
 United States Patriot Act 182
 United Tajikistani Opposition (UTO) 601
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 (UDHR) 8, 22, 265, 267, 309
 Universal House of Justice 15–16
 Universal Islamic Brotherhood 168
 Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights (UIDHR) 309
 Unveiling Act 1936 (Iran) 589
 Urdu 36, 60, 256, 547, 610
 Urmieh 13
 Urmiye Shaykh revolt 623
uṣūl-i jadīd 50
 Uttar Pradesh 341
 Uygur Turks 5
 Uzbekistan 4, 19, 50, 51, 72–73, 78, 104, 116, 142,

- 163-164, 198, 199, 237-238, 283-284, 374, 416, 498, 499, 587-588, 625, 634-635, 680, 705-706, 769, 784, 786
- Vainakh 512
- Valiante, Wahida Chishti 272, 618
- Van 11
- Van Yüzüncü Yıl University's Women's Research Centre (YUKAM) 783
- Vancouver 162
- Vandîdâd 800
- Vardanian, Maro 13
- Vatican 172
- Veiling and Unveiling* (book) 36
- Victoria Girls High School (Lahore) 60
- Vidyasagar, Iswar Chandra 626
- Vietnam 63, 90, 430, 491, 745-746, 758
- Vilâyetnâme 713
- Village Courts Ordinance 1976 (Bangladesh) 378
- Vimochana 704
- Virtue Party 183, 731
- Virginia 714
- Voices of Concerned Mothers (Indonesia) 637
- Vojvodina 735
- Volga 50, 705
- Volunteers for Humanity (Indonesia) 674
- Vorgetts, Fahima 41
- Wadud, Amina 674-675
- Wafâ'iyya 623
- Wafd party (Egypt) 68, 647
- Wafdist Woman's Central Committee 647
- Wahhâbism 16, 20, 621
- Wajir 549
- Wajir Peace Group (WPG) 549
- Wajir Women for Peace (WWP) 549
- Wakar Gewaye* 329
- Walî Allâh, Shâh 326, 621-622
- Wali, Sima 41
- Wambui Otieno (case) 425
- Wanted: Dead or Alive* (film) 758
- Waqf Validating Act 1913 59
- Wardak, Masuma Asmati 788
- Wathba (Leap) rebellion 652
- Wâşil, Naşr Farîd 172-173
- W.D. Mohammed Ministry 714
- Wedding Suit, The* (novel) 194
- Welfare Party (Turkey) 290, 615
- West Bank 21, 190, 509, 585, 643, 668
- West Bengal 240-241
- West Punjab Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act 729
- Western Europe 29-33, 108-110, 151-153, 186-188, 293-295, 384-386, 483-486, 534-537, 695-697, 715-719, 732-734, 759-760, 772-774, 798-799
- Western University 784
- White Australia Policy 746
- White Revolution 681
- White Women's Protection Ordinance 65
- Widow Remarriage Act 1856 (India) 469
- Wihdat 8
- Wilcox, Lynn 772
- Winnipeg 555
- Wolof 195, 331, 527, 594
- Woman and Development (WAD) 311
- Women Against Fundamentalism 537
- Women Against Rape 704
- Women Against Violence (WAV) 120
- Women and Children Repression (Special Provisions) Act 2000 703
- Women for Afghan Women (WAW) 41, 582
- Women for Conflict Prevention and Peace Building in the Southern Caucasus 545
- Women for Peace (India) 547
- Women for Women (Bangladesh) 54
- Women for Women's Human Rights (WWHR) 219, 383
- Women in Black (Israel) 45, 96
- Women in Black (former Yugoslavia) 280
- Women in Development (WID) 311
- Women in Green 45
- Women in Law and Development in Africa (WILDAF) 279
- Women in Peace in South Asia (WIPSA) 627
- Women in Security, Conflict Management and Peace (WISCOMP) 627
- Women Journalists' Trade Association 670
- Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML) 47-48, 280, 288, 537, 563, 594
- Women Peacemakers Program 629
- Women Waging Peace 630
- Women's Action Forum (WAF) 53, 83, 547, 593, 704, 729
- Women's Action Front (WAF) 547
- Women's Association (Somalia) 562
- Women's Association for Muslim Widows and Orphans (China) 322
- Women's Association for Struggling against Discrimination (Turkey) 791
- Women's Association of Afghanistan 41
- Women's Association of Tajikistan 625
- Women's Center (Iran) 789
- Women's Central Sub-Committee (India) 61
- Women's Coalition for Justice and Democracy (Indonesia) 637
- Women's Committee for Popular Resistance (Egypt) 647
- Women's Cultural and Social Society of Kuwait 585
- Women's Cultural Group (South Africa) 578
- Women's Democratic Organization of Afghanistan (WDOA) 788
- Women's Freedom Society (Iran) 589
- Women's Global Fund (Ghana) 280
- Women's Indian Association (WIA) 61, 469, 645
- Women's Institute (Afghanistan) 788
- Women's Leadership for Peace (Nepal) 548
- Women's League of Creative Initiative (WLCI) 588
- Women's Legal Center (South Africa) 279
- Women's Library and Information Center (Turkey) 56, 783
- Women's Movement that Cares for Maluku (GPP) 280
- Women's People's Party (Turkey) 569, 664, 790
- Women's Protective Society (Afghanistan) 568
- Women's Resource Center in Tashkent 588
- Women's Rights in Moslem Law in Nigeria 562
- Women's Society of Islamic Revolution (Iran) 789
- Women's Solidarity Association (Iran) 789
- Women's Solidarity Foundation (Turkey) 56, 783, 789
- Women's Status Committee (Israel) 45
- Women's Union (Turkey) 516
- Women's Vocational Training Center 41
- Women's Voluntary Service (WVS) (Pakistan) 82
- Women's Welfare Association (WWA) (Afghanistan) 788
- Wood Dale 715

- World Amazigh Congress 576
 World Social Forum 672
 World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD) 672 Wrong is Right (film) 758
- Xavire, Irene 430
- Yahya, Emna Belhaj 654
 Yakut Turks 5
 Yan Izala 181, 612-613
 Yan Taru 329
 Yao 396
Yaşamda Özgür Kadın (journal) 57, 580
 Yasan, Afsarmulük 669
 Yasawî, Ahmad-i 623
 Yāsīn, Aḥmad 321
 Yazd 801-803
 Yazīdis 358
 Yeganegi 803
 Yemen 22, 23, 24-25, 38, 71, 123, 149, 189, 229-230, 269-270, 300, 315, 368, 399, 402, 404, 418-419, 465-467, 495, 523, 543, 551-552, 584, 657-659, 678, 685, 693, 748-749
Yeridasart Hayubi (journal) 13
 Yewwu Yewwi 594-595
 Yezidism 572, 574
 Yiddish 318
 Yogyakarta 603
Yol (film) 361
 Yon, Arian 41
 Yoruba 74
 Young Muslim Association (Nairobi) 47
 Young Muslim Association of Britain 537
 Young Muslims UK (YMUK) 799
 Young Turks 518, 569, 596, 662, 664, 794
 Youssef, Sultan Mohamed Ben 640
 Yugoslavia 42, 280, 370-371, 553, 632, 735 el-Yunusiah, Rahmah 602
- Zabid 229-230
 Zafran Bibi (case) 434
 Zaghawa 331
 Zaghlül, Sa'd 67-68, 155, 647
 Zaghlül, Şafiyya 647
 Zāhir Shāh, Muḥammad, king of Afghanistan 432, 458, 568, 582, 677, 707
 Al-Zahrā University 786
 al-Zāhirī, Ibn Ḥazm 476
 al-Za'im, Ḥusnī 662
 Zainab, Mama 549
 Zaire 204
 Zambia 204, 425
Zan (newspaper) 589
Zan va Ghanon (magazine) 41
Zanān (journal) 44, 393, 589, 605
 Zana, Leyla 184, 365, 580
 Zangezur 11
 Zanjān 16
 Zanzibar 396, 397, 424-426, 488
 Zarifian-Kupelian, Siran 13
 Zaydis 450, 465, 722
 Zayn al-Din, Nazira 36
 Zaynab bint 'Alī (granddaughter of the Prophet) 216, 319, 325, 445, 532, 766
 Zaynab, Lalla 768
 Zayyāt, Laṭīfa 647
 Zaza 384, 694
 Zenana Madrasa 60
 Zeytun 11
 Zhongyuan 133
 Zia, Begum Khaleda 52, 54, 83, 90, 559-560
 Ziayee, Shafīqa 677
 Ziguinchor 550
 Zilani, Hina 53
 Zimbabwe 126-127, 437, 487, 526
 Zina Ordinance (Pakistan) 287, 400
Zohra (novel) 194
 Zoroastrians 178, 228, 284, 480, 524, 800-804
 Zuberdulla, Nazarudin 601

Subject Index

- abandonment of female children 296–298
 abduction 278, 307, 339, 341, 343, 372, 390–391, 405, 409, 416, 546, 698–700
ābirū 215
 abortion 2–3, 174, 217, 297, 400, 404, 409–410, 436, 515–516, 578, 585, 593, 660, 712, 790 acid-throwing 123, 288, 342, 406, 435, 702
‘āda (see also customary law) 235, 372, 390–391, 415–416, 451
 adat (see also customary law) 19, 27, 64–65, 242, 332–333, 351–352, 419–421
‘adl 475
 adoption 1–6, 104–105, 143, 257, 277, 287, 304, 356, 379, 404, 413, 454, 539–540 secret adoption 1, 5 adultery (see zinā)
afsanah 478
aḡhabaji 130
‘agunah 316
ahiretlik 6
ahkām 440, 446
ahl al-farā‘id 299
ahl al-hadīth 441
ahwāl shakhṣiyya (see also personal status law) 463 aila ijmasi 250
aile 166
ak birchek 140, 250
ak sakkal 140, 250, 374
 alcohol 12, 27, 118, 129, 395, 471, 501, 627 alcoholism 152, 238, 466
 alimony 8, 102, 104, 297–298, 341, 454–455, 474 alkali (plural alkalai) 222 alms giving (see also zakāt) 705 alovkhona 228
‘amma 345
 amputation (see also ḥadd) 222, 278, 403 al-Amr bi-al-ma‘rūf wa-nahy ‘an al-munkar 41, 216, 322 amū 345
amutot 45, 46
ana 157, 713 anak dara 243
anggota 710
 Angrezi Shari‘a 31
Anguttara Nikaya 746
 Animism 63, 480
anjumans 556, 707
 apartheid 47, 280, 437, 438, 488, 578 gender apartheid 216, 363, 496, 597 apostasy 7–9, 27, 162, 222, 304, 380, 395, 475, 698
‘aqd 458
‘aqīqa (see also naming ceremony) 204, 716
‘aql 199
 Arab socialism 608, 653
 Arabization 575–576, 691
‘arūs 767
‘asāba 299, 444, 448
‘asabiyya 347
‘Ashik-pashazāda tarikhi 623
ashkhāsh 464
ashraf 729
aṣiret 427
atauly 390
 atheism 479–480
atlas 601
aul 251
awqāf (see waqf)
‘ayād (see also ‘id) 529
ayökēn zanib 800

baaba 144
baba 713, 761
bābā 345
badal 414
badū 422
bājī 623 bakhīla 229
barādar 345
barabari 256
barā’ performance 418
baraka 75, 536
barangay 243
basīj 432, 605
basmachi 634
başörtüsü 282
bātūl 766
bay‘at al-nisā’ 621 bayinna 476
bayt al-tā’a 122
bayt al-umma 155
bazārī 605
 beards 182, 185, 283, 622, 702, 797 besleme 6 bestiality 11, 698
beyngure 144
bibiotun 479
bid‘a 7, 182, 485, 621
 bigamy 16, 106, 252, 372
bībaya‘ī 215
biraderi 108, 339
 birth control 142, 263, 513–514, 516, 612, 614, 756
biy 103
 blasphemy 7, 171, 179, 181, 559, 628 blood money (see diyya) blood table 390
 Bori 35, 75, 136–137, 182, 328 breastfeeding (see also milk) 2 bride-price (see also mahr) 27, 118, 143, 146, 163, 199, 201, 251, 302, 372, 390–391, 415, 417, 422–423, 427, 458, 587, 747 bughra (see also burqa’) 415
buibui 182, 205
bulas 762
burqa’ (see also hijāb) 61, 165, 180, 203–204, 285, 309, 335, 415, 433, 546, 613, 644–646, 752 caliphate 52, 222, 328–329, 350, 507, 594, 664, 730 cari lauk 243

 caste 84, 179, 216, 286–287, 304, 339–340, 342, 728, 748–749, 755
 castration 698, 699
cebr 699

- cebran zina* 700 chaadar 500
chaadaree 335, 500
chachvan 498, 587
 chador 287, 309, 432, 482, 639, 727 chakar 801
chakar zanib 800
chārbaytī 478
 charitable trust (see waqf) charshaf 779
 chastity 16, 128, 143, 204, 206, 211, 215, 218–219, 262, 307, 409, 427, 453, 496, 568, 710, 738, 752
 child custody 8, 10, 31, 83, 101, 110, 112,
 117–118, 120, 124, 202, 287, 298, 307, 333,
 383, 384–385, 392, 425–426, 468, 556, 580, 590, 687 child widows 644
çikup cebr ile 699
 circumcision
 female circumcision (see also female genital mutilation) 23, 173, 205, 278, 280, 413, 453, 527, 585, 614
 male circumcision 19, 163, 234, 528–529, 711, 732 sunna circumcision 404 citizenship 19–33, 154–155 authentic citizenship 21 second-class citizenship 21–22, 120, 288 civil law 6, 27, 146, 161, 252, 303, 351, 368, 371, 458, 556, 585, 608, 674, 723, 741 civil society 34–58, 672–673
 clientelism 538–542
 clitoridectomy 585, 691
 codification 73, 287, 388, 394, 424, 450, 463, 465, 469, 552, 664
 customary law 76, 402, 414–415, 425
 family law 392, 397, 458, 464, 469
 Shari'a law 273, 367, 379, 399–400, 426 colonialism 59–77
 comity 473
 common law 27, 31–32, 378, 433, 437–438, 451 communal witness 376
 communism 19, 42, 82, 94, 167, 219, 361, 364, 371, 551, 553, 567–568, 586, 625, 627, 636,
 647–649, 652, 661, 663, 677, 679, 725, 752, 769, 780
comsol 679
 concubinage 64–65, 155, 454, 456
 concubines 1, 64, 224, 257, 260, 328, 335, 350, 452, 454, 456, 459, 461, 502, 690–691 confessional courts 463 confessionalism 720–724 conflict management 543–550 constitutions 78–86
 Coptic law 388, 464
 crime of passion 122, 221–222, 225–227, 401, 403, 407, 410
 criminal law 27, 43, 222, 399–410, 411, 417, 431, 434, 593, 597, 735
 Islamic criminal law 27, 118, 158, 280, 397, 399–410, 429, 435, 475
 cultural capital 750–751 cultural defense 411–413 cultural purity 294 cultural racism 30
 custody 98–110
 customary law 8, 27, 51, 59, 76, 78, 84, 269–270,
 280, 303–304, 331–332, 334, 341–342, 351–352,
 372, 375–376, 381, 384, 388–390, 392, 396–397,
 402, 414–428, 435, 448–449, 463, 469, 636–637, 726 dādā 345
dādāsh 345
dāi 345
dalits 287–288
 Dār al-Ḥarb 621
 Dār al-Islām 158, 166, 327, 777
daraja 64 darar 121–123, 278, 463–464, 466
dars 532, 536
dasturkhanchi 228
dā'wa 319, 323, 609, 648, 709–710, 717 dāyereh 478
 deaconesses 10
 decent systems 330–344
dede 713
deliklanlı 794
 democracy ideologies 50–58, 87–96
 democratization 21, 47–48, 51–52, 55, 85, 90, 96, 146, 181, 183, 276, 288, 553, 561–563, 585, 607, 629, 653–655, 657
dēnak 800
 desertion 99, 124, 201, 316, 380, 443, 468, 660 değişirme 693
dhakar 508
dhammāl 327 dhawū al-arḥām 444
dhikr 327, 485, 536, 709, 711–712, 717, 733, 761–774
dīn wa-dawla 608, 725
 direct rule 59, 75
diric 505
 divorce 98–110, 454–456
 legal doctrines 442–443, 448
diya 288, 343, 403, 406, 408–409, 698–699, 701, 801
 domestic labor 6, 130, 135–136, 145, 207–208, 237–238, 247–248, 250, 352, 363, 472, 667
 domestic violence 21, 46, 48, 56, 101, 104,
 111–129, 142, 150, 199, 224, 238, 259, 262,
 323, 352, 362–363, 369, 374, 380–381, 395,
 399, 404, 406, 537, 544, 545, 561, 568, 590, 596, 598, 641, 675, 740, 783
 domesticity 130–139
dongfang funü 745
 dress code 28, 31, 53, 156, 169–170, 176, 182, 200, 287, 353, 363, 669, 707, 718, 792 drugs 118–119, 142, 238, 292, 375, 429, 431–432, 468, 792 du'ā 536
 dual jurisdiction 27
dūdāg 800
dūdāg-sālār 800–801
dukshī 800
dukhtar 345–346
dukhtar-i tarsā 571
dupatta 503–504
durnam 217
dženaza 762
ecemī 362
 empowerment 13, 21, 28, 31, 41, 51, 57, 83, 95, 98, 138, 172, 184, 187, 208, 250, 271–272, 274, 278,
 288, 291, 294–295, 322–323, 325, 440, 444, 447,
 473–474, 479, 509, 527, 532–533, 564, 568,
 585–586, 590–591, 593–595, 598, 604, 607,
 609–611, 615, 639, 651, 655–656, 673, 687, 697, 713, 722–723, 732, 798

- endogamy 98, 151, 156, 256, 284, 339–340, 356, 473, 510 enforcement of law 429–439 entertainment 28, 100, 213, 232, 234, 359, 478, 753, 763, 792, 798 ethnic movements 571–581 “ethnic Tower of Babel” 30
 ethnocracy 96
evatlik 6
evdarlik 130
 extramarital sexual relations (see zinā) ‘ezrat nashim 317
ezzat 216
- Fadak 449
falak 478
 family modern Islamic discourses 161–170 political notion 154–160 family citizenship record 24 family code 4, 23, 94, 125, 158, 163, 276, 374, 391, 426, 460–461, 465–466, 526, 557, 562, 577, 595, 641, 658, 678 family courts 101, 392, 413, 460–461, 463–464, 467–468, 472, 658, 677 family endowments 299–300, 303
 family law 4, 20–23, 27, 31, 43, 65, 99, 104–106, 109, 125, 127, 147, 154, 158, 161, 164–165, 182, 276, 279, 284, 298, 299, 304, 311, 335, 351, 353, 369, 372, 375, 378, 392–393, 394, 396–397, 425, 427, 434, 440–474, 579, 586, 596, 609, 651, 654–655, 662, 673, 720, 725–727, 742, 751, 790
 Islamic family law 22, 259, 334, 351–352, 397, 440–450, 452, 454, 456–457, 473 family planning 97, 116, 142, 172, 261, 297, 322, 326, 508, 612, 711, 788 family relations 140–153
fanā fi Allāh 327
faranja 498
fasakh 380
faskh 455, 458, 466
 fatherland 156–157
 fatwa 26, 73, 121, 171–174, 179–180, 287–288, 320, 326, 355–357, 378, 402, 406, 435, 446, 560, 698, 702, 777 cyber-fatwas 172
fatwabaz 173
 female genital mutilation (FGM) 85, 111, 113–114, 123, 127–128, 173, 277–278, 280, 294, 404, 413, 561–562, 598, 612–613, 659–660, 760 femicide (see also honor killing) 96, 111, 211, 372, 401 feminism 594
 colonial feminism 71
 Islamic/Muslim feminism 44, 161, 169–170, 225, 286, 290, 295, 362, 569, 572, 594–595, 603, 615, 673–675, 746, 789
 Islamist feminism 57, 278, 584–585, 642 poststructuralist feminism 226–227 radical feminism 56, 226–227 second wave feminism 131, 591, 596 state feminism 289, 361, 363, 464, 572–573, 586, 596, 682
 Western feminism 268 feminist movements 582–599
feminizm 596
ferece 502
feredža 632–633
fez 289
- fictive ethnicity 526
 fictive kinship 339
 filial piety 746
fiqh 162, 172, 340, 395, 399, 440, 442, 446, 458, 466, 603, 698, 765 firmans 502
fitna 284, 442, 615, 686
fitrat 615 flogging (see lashing)
 foster family 6, 539
 fostering 1–6, 145, 454
 foundling 2, 4, 22
 freedom of expression 175–188 freedom of religion 7, 85, 95, 184–185, 323, 393, 610, 782 frèresches 255
 friendship 189–197, 530
fuālah 230
 functionalist lineage theory 337
fuqahā 440
furū 356
fynga 390
- gambling 28, 395, 578
garbarsar 505
garb arsar gaziz gazarat 50
gazis 713
 gender activists 603–604
 gender empowerment measure (GEM) 92 gender socialization 198–209
gham-shādī 478
gharbzadigī 285
ghaybat 211
gherat 217
gida 135, 137
gidan mata 136
gināns 327
 god-kings 25 gold 301
gonakh 130
gonakhparvarlik 130
 gossip 210–214
goth 195
 guardianship 1–6, 22, 24, 81, 83, 100, 117, 276–277, 341, 379–381, 452–453, 460, 463–464, 470, 473, 475, 641, 663, 729–730, 756 gyegu 345
- hadāna* (see also custody) 1, 100, 341, 456, 464
hadārī 422
 Hadāwī school 465
hadd (plural hudūd) 27, 395, 402, 406, 408, 429, 475–476, 698
hadra 485, 711, 764, 767
hajj 136, 232, 480, 492, 621, 716 hākīm 51
hakīm 802
halāla 341
halitsah 315–316
hammams 528, 530
 Hanafi school 9, 50, 82, 109, 223, 256, 335, 340–341, 369, 376, 378, 402, 417, 440–445, 447, 450, 452, 454–455, 458–459, 461, 465–467, 469–470, 475, 701, 722 hanaq 418
hanbāaz 800
 Hanbali school 440–445, 450, 459, 465–467, 475
hane 254
haqq Allāh 223

- ḥaram* 718
 harem 34, 71, 235, 260, 358–359, 501–502, 690, 693, 757 harm 121–123, 278, 463–464, 466 harta sepencarian 395
hatk al-ird 699
hatk-i 'iṣmat 215
hatk-i nāmūs 215
havli 251
hayā' 215, 499–500, 503–505
hayat yoldash 140
 hearth-holds 258
 henna rituals 535–536
 hidden Mahdi 620
hijāb 2, 28, 32, 50–51, 71, 113, 152, 164, 170, 172, 175–177, 178, 182, 184–185, 203, 272, 278, 283, 285, 291–292, 313, 322, 384–385, 432, 481, 483, 491–493, 495, 499–500, 503–505, 536, 610, 614, 639, 643, 656–657, 669, 686, 696–697, 714, 718, 720, 727, 747, 754, 796–797, 799 hijra 168, 328, 777 hirāba 475
hirka 713
hisba 9, 340
hoca efendi 717
hoca hanum 717
 holy war 319–329
 homicide 118, 223, 225, 226, 269, 409 homosexuality 86, 129, 252, 263, 275, 334, 404, 453, 578, 698, 701 honor 215–220
 feminist approaches to honor 225–227 honor crime 23, 113, 122, 128, 219, 221–224, 225–226, 282, 383, 403–404, 427 honor killing 21, 23, 46, 53, 96, 111, 119–120, 215–216, 218, 221–224, 225–226, 262, 267, 288, 307, 309, 342–343, 348, 362–365, 400–401, 415, 423, 435, 653, 665, 697 hospitality 130, 194, 204, 207, 210, 215–216, 218, 228–236, 418, 485, 495, 528, 549, 756, 763 hotlines 112, 120, 715
 “dial-a-fatwa” 172 house of obedience 23, 122 households 250–264, 541
 laterally extended 258 nuclear 258
 polygynous 258
 single-parent 20, 258, 261 three-generational 258, 259 hubb 230
hujb 215
hukum syarak 380
 human rights 265–282
 Islamic human rights 265, 267
hūrī 16
ḥusayniyya 716

'ibāda 710
ibu 131
ichari ev 130
ichkari 228
Īd al-Adhā 484–485
Īd al-Fiṭr 484–485
Īd Kabir 529
Īd al-Mawlid 484–485, 529, 716, 762–763, 767
Īd prayer 716
Īd Ṣaghīr 529
'idda 99–100, 104, 442–443, 447–448, 454–455, 466–468, 471, 579, 658, 741–742 identity politics 283–295
'iffat 215
iftār 485, 716
ighṭisāb 699
ijjat 216
ijmā' 473
ijtihād 152, 162, 246, 266, 268, 276, 388, 440, 446–447, 460–461, 470–471, 675 ikhlās al-niyya 709 ikhṭiyār 460–461
ikrām al-muslimin 709
'ilā 470, 475
 illegitimate children 2, 64, 257, 334, 404, 423 illiteracy 55, 107–108, 274, 323–325, 360, 362, 364, 367–368, 377–378, 382, 434, 521, 588, 793
'ilm 446, 709 imāma 539
 imam baras 532
imazighen 576
 imperialism 59–77
 impotence 11, 99, 443, 448, 455, 466, 660 imprisonment 429–439 incest 4, 215, 221, 333, 355, 399, 403–404, 660, 698, 735, 739–740 indirect rule 27, 74, 75
 infanticide 3, 296–298, 400, 404, 436, 441 infertility 2, 98, 107, 297, 508, 712, 756, 767 infibulation (see also female genital mutilation) 404, 613 inged 323
 inheritance 299–305, 444
 legal doctrines 419–421, 448–449
 intermarriage 202, 315, 339, 387 international conventions 306–310 international organizations 311–314
 Internet 9, 162, 172, 178–179, 190, 536, 635, 675, 687, 708, 737, 754, 782, 792 intiḡāl 299
iqrār 475
 Iranianism 727–728
'ird 215
irtidād (see also apostasy) 7
islām 475
Islam noir 75
 Islamic revivalism 131, 133, 319, 746
 Islamic schools of law 440–449
 Islamist discourses 600–619
 Islamist movements 600–619
 Islamization 81, 83, 168, 245, 279, 285, 286, 287, 304, 315, 318, 323, 330–331, 339, 342, 351, 361, 363, 393, 399, 408, 415, 432–433, 435, 496, 500, 504, 559, 593, 609–610, 661, 674, 675, 691, 710, 729, 745 de-Islamization 313
 re-Islamization 50, 52, 769
'iṣma 481
'iṣmat 215
istiḡsān 440 istiḡbāl 530
itibar 218
izdivāj-i muvaqqat 392
'izzat 194, 203

jabr 699
 Ja'fari school 402, 446, 450, 465–467 jahāz 455
jama' rituals 764
jamaat council 108
jānbāz 605
jando 205

- jarb* 475
jāriyya 358
jāt 339
jātī 339
jellaba 754
jhagra 108
jihad 319–329
jihād-e akbar 326–327
jihād-e asghar 326
jihād-i nafs 325
jilbab 673
jilhabib 505
jirga 108, 414, 435
jizya 801, 802

kabābis 231
kābīm 801 kadagbānūg 801
kadhi (qādī) 396, 424
kaduncik 713
kafā'a 256, 442, 452
kafāla (see also fostering) 1, 4–5, 276 kafīl 1
kāfir (plural kuffār) 322, 326 kākā 345
kalīma 709
kalym (see also bride-price, mahr) 19–20, 103, 163, 372, 416, 587 kamakan 332
kanaga 526
kanun 375, 693, 700, 702
kanūm-nāmes 698–699
karāma 229 karma 25
karo kari 342
kashen 218
kata kiūmo 205
kaum 339
kazi (qādī) 107, 469
kazoku kokka 157
kelin 141
keluarga angkat 539
keluarga sakīnak 711
Kemalism 36, 56, 137–138, 146, 248, 361, 391, 482–483, 520, 541, 629, 730–731, 790 kenduri 243
ketubas 524
khāla 345
khālifa 768
khamr 475
khāndān 339
khatam Qur'ān 485, 535
khātun 623
khawd-sālār 800
khimar 505
khirqa 767
khuddām 721
khul' 99, 106–107, 109, 380, 389, 443, 447–448, 455, 465–466, 470, 474 khuwābar 345
kibbutzim 780
kiçe hermenī 571
kidnapping 20, 118, 186, 374, 404–405, 417, 433, 435, 567, 627 kina gecesī 535
kinship 330–357, 529
kishīya 259
kitty-parties 532
kobilkeri 512
kodrat wanita 649

kroumik 415
kūfī 185 kufr 7 kul 339
kunatskaya 235
kushī 803
kuttāb 66

laban al-faḥl 355 labor, household division of 237 labor law 666–668
land usage 396, 424
landay 478
langar 767
laqīṭ (see also foundling) 2, 4 lashing (flogging, whipping) 67, 180, 221–223, 278, 399, 403–404, 406–407, 435, 567, 698 law of retaliation (see qisās) laylat al-ḥinnā' 535
legal literacy 368
legal pluralism 379, 381–382, 385, 392, 425 legal rulings 440, 446, 777 legal system, access to 367–387 lena dena 535
li'ān 458, 470
liberalism 35, 57, 384, 608, 662
lila 711, 764–765 literacy 17, 54, 66, 78, 84–95, 117, 158, 165, 173, 239, 325, 359, 362, 367–368, 374, 478, 523, 525, 527–528, 556, 560–561, 568, 580, 582, 629, 632, 639, 641, 651, 653–654, 658, 660, 663, 667, 669, 694, 718–719, 788 lub 342

machi 342
madam imam 717
mādar 345
madare-man 346
madhhab (plural madhāhib) (see also Islamic schools of law) 380, 387, 389, 440–449, 450, 458, 460–461, 463, 473, 722 madimairam 512 madrasa (plural madāris) 20, 34, 50, 376, 450, 602 magic 98, 223, 328, 757 mahalla 142, 191, 284, 374, 532, 706 mahari 397
Mahdism 614, 622–623, 661
mahr 22–23, 98–100, 106–108, 118, 143, 165, 201–202, 276, 278, 302, 335, 377–378, 380, 389–391, 397, 417, 442–443, 447–448, 454–455, 458, 465–466, 469–470, 474, 658, 801
mahr mithl 454
mahram (plural mahārim) 2, 25, 345, 454, 456, 752 majlis 532
majlis al-shūra 270
majlis-i 'azā 716
male advocacy 779–782
malik 304
Mālikī school 59, 109, 223, 355, 378, 397, 440–448, 450–452, 455, 458–459, 461, 463, 465–467, 475, 485, 640, 701 mamak 332
maman 345
manat 531
mankūḥa 257
marabūt 528
mard 215 mardānagī 215
marriage 340–342, 454–456

- arranged marriage 113, 118, 146, 151, 156, 168, 309, 335, 351-353, 365, 393, 412, 513, 536, 596, 797, 798
 child marriage 65, 84, 94, 125, 163, 255, 362, 458, 568, 592, 644-645, 658, 660 consanguineous 261
 forced marriage 12, 32, 111, 113, 118, 140, 142, 163, 282, 316, 383, 386, 394, 401, 427, 458, 536, 582, 587, 636, 697, 699, 718
 legal doctrines 442, 447
 levirate marriage 142, 145, 302, 315, 341, 459 love marriages 60, 353
 polygamous marriage 1, 66, 107, 118, 261, 315, 383, 406, 417, 426, 443, 638, 718 prohibition 2 temporary marriage (see mutʿa) marriage choice 263, 536, 686, 796 marriage contract 22-23, 98, 106, 108-109, 121-122, 124, 143, 168, 238, 261, 269, 276, 316,
 340, 376, 378, 427, 442, 447, 454-456, 461, 466, 660, 698, 701
 martyrdom 10, 15, 232, 320, 325, 532, 608, 647, 656 al-maʿrūf 454 masar 505
mashtots 10 masjid 618
maşlahā 440, 442, 446-447
maşʿul 652
maʿşūm 446
maşyarakat madani 673
matāʿ (see also alimony) 455
 matriliney 28
mausim 485
mawt wa-ʿsār 475
mayorat system 420
mayun 531
mazār 20, 50, 767
mediatorskiy 415
medreses 713 mehmonkhona 228
mehndi 535-536 mehr 201 memory 478-486
mendetyr 415
menij 195
 Messianism 620-624
mevlid 767
mevlud 762
mikva 316
mila 396, 424, 426
mīlad 531-532
 military, women's participation 487-493
miliyya courts 463
 milk 355-357
 milk siblings 343
 "the living milk" 330
 "sire's milk" 355
millat 284
 millenarian movements 620-624
milli aile 261 minority movements 571-581
mīrī 299-300
 missionaries 12-13, 37, 60, 65-66, 70-72, 134-135, 245, 323, 693, 802
miswāk 451
mītakshara system 304
mitzvot 317
 modesty discourses 494-507
mohollas 194
 monogamy, Bahāʿī 16
 Mosaic law 000
 mosaic societies 573
 moshavim 780 mother of the martyr 509
 motherhood 508-517
 motherland 156-157
mubāraʿa 466, 470
mufti 8, 171-173, 280, 501-502, 583, 769 muhākama sharʿiyya (see also Sharīʿa courts) 375 muhallas 532
al-muhsānāt 452 mujaḍḍid 620
mujaḍḍid-i 620
Mujaḍḍid-i alf-i thānī 620 al-mujādīla 451
mujaḥidāt 520, 557
mujaḥidīn 320, 325
mujaḥid 15, 325
mukabele 713
mulk 299-300
 multiculturalism 29-33, 170, 273, 485, 619, 746
 "red boot" multiculturalism 30
 multiple discrimination 696
mumaiyyiz 395
munāsabāt 529
munshidūn 768
muqaddama 764-765
muqadma 536
murīd 327, 774
 murder 402-403
murshida 768
murtadd (see also apostate) 7, 174
mustaftī 171, 172
mutʿa 338, 392, 447, 449, 466, 723
mwari 205

nafaqa 1, 22-23, 117, 121, 242, 451-452
nafs 326-327, 615, 767
najābat 215
 naming ceremony 196, 204
nāmūs 140, 206, 215, 218, 284, 335, 481 nanawati 414
nasab 1, 339, 475
nāshiza 117, 122, 404
naşş 446
 nation 518-522
 national flags 526 national organizations 788-791 national symbols 523-527 nationalism 154-160
 banal nationalism 526
nawāzil 356 neene 144
neene-gotoobe 144
negaffa 535
 neopatriarchy 348
 networks 528-537
 New Age 770
 new reproductive technologies (NRTs) 404
nikāh (see also marriage, marriage contract) 124, 143, 163, 252, 257, 340, 378, 385, 390-391, 458, 466, 475
nikāh itdiduruna cebr ile 699
nikāhnāma 756
nikanama 124
niqāb 172
nisāʿiyya 583
nişman 363
niswiyya 583

- nuclearization of households 255
nukh 339 nuns 10 nursing 355-357
nusyuz 380-381
nyai 65
nyakanga 205
- orang lua* 332
örf 693
 Orientalism 62, 66-68, 260, 290, 294, 303, 321, 534, 656, 694, 722 orphans 1-6, 140, 261, 277, 297, 299, 315, 320, 322, 341, 454, 589, 635 orphanages 3, 5, 10, 65, 219, 298, 322, 404, 582, 707
Osmanlı milleti 692, 694
otin (plural otines) 19, 191, 479-480, 705-706, 769 otin-oy 769
 Ottoman imperial codes 698
 Ottomanism 664
- pādikhshā zanīb* 800
pādikhshāshāyih 800-801
pahala 242
pākdāmani 215 pan-Arabism 793
panchayat 84, 108, 560
parandzha 19, 587
paranji 498
pardanishin 303
 patrilocality 148, 339, 747 patronage and clientage 538-542
paxto 216, 217
 peacekeeping 543-550 peace movements 625-631
pemasyarakatan system 431
pengurus 710 pension 23, 117, 395, 492, 608 people of tradition 441
peran ganda 244
 personal law 55, 59, 83-84, 106, 124, 143, 287, 288, 303-304, 342-343, 351, 379, 385, 433-434, 469, 470-471, 577, 628, 726, 728-730, 741-744, 755-757 personal status law 8, 122, 269, 368, 389, 397-398, 419, 426, 463-465, 653, 657, 663, 725 pir dalil 768
pisar 345, 346
piyālo 327
 poetry 76, 159, 212, 216, 259, 318, 327, 359, 363, 415, 418, 478, 495, 508, 576-577, 716, 761, 767-769, 777 political motherhood 608 political participation 21, 26-28, 43, 47-48, 51, 54, 71, 87-89, 91, 94-95, 270, 279, 284, 300, 320, 392, 544, 551-558, 560, 563, 578, 585-586, 607, 645-646, 656, 677-679, 682-683, 687, 695, 783, 792 political parties 551-565
 political prisoners 566-567
 political regimes 568-570 political representation 90-91, 112, 273, 287, 295, 336, 553, 557, 562, 751 political rights 19-33 poll tax 801
posrednicheskii 415
 postage stamps 523-525
 postcolonial dissent 672-675
 pregnancy 2, 81, 98, 100, 127, 145, 223, 296-297, 306, 355, 395, 399, 423, 429, 432, 437, 443, 451, 453-455, 466, 513-514, 566, 668, 702, 747, 796, 801
- prenuptial contract 442, 468, 473-474
 Primitivism 62
 property rights 299-305, 421 prostitution 20, 63-64, 76, 100, 118, 141-142, 199, 219, 246, 298, 404, 408, 432, 434, 698, 701, 735-738, 746, 792, 802 protest movements 632-646 public morality 9, 278, 287, 404, 496, 498, 700
 public office 677-684
 public/private dichotomy 685
 punishments 429-439
purdah 52, 60, 143, 194-196, 203, 217, 256, 284, 312, 326, 495, 503-504, 534-535, 568, 592, 622, 644-646, 686, 752, 755-756 pürüchistā 803
pusaka rendah 332
pusaka tinggi 332
pusako 332
- qabila* 284, 335
qadhif 395, 451, 701
qailin 335
 Qā'im 15
qalandari way 327
qānūn 463, 752
qarāba 448
qāt 230, 612
qat'-e kleegary 367
qatl bi-sabab 408
qatl-i-amd 408
qawm 335-336
qawmiyya 793 qawwām 64
qazi (qādi) 434
qirx 338
qişās 27, 118, 342, 402-403, 406, 408, 475 qishr 230
qiyās 6, 440-441, 446, 475-476 qoum 339
 quota system 19-20, 23, 51, 54, 80, 83, 87-88, 274, 557, 558, 562, 564, 574, 586, 588, 678-680, 682, 683
 Qur'anic heirs 299
- ra'āyā* 359, 571
rabats 768
 race 689-697 raḍā'a 2, 339, 343
rahma 529
rafa 475
rajm kardan 215
 Ramadan 73, 182, 292, 484-485, 492, 505, 529, 716-717, 733, 773
 Ramadan Bayram 733
 rape 12, 19-20, 38, 42, 83, 112, 116, 123, 126-128, 156, 173, 215, 221, 226, 273, 282, 287-288, 341-343, 361-362, 364, 369, 373, 378, 391, 395, 399-400, 403-404, 405-406, 408-409, 412, 416, 434-436, 471, 476, 496-497, 499, 539, 545, 566-567, 585, 593, 627, 637, 656, 660, 674, 691, 698-704, 729, 735-740
 custodial rape 435
 domestic rape 701
 forced rape 403
 gang rape 123, 343, 437, 488, 700, 703-704 marital rape 22, 111, 118, 126-127, 273, 369, 400, 403-404

- mass rape 593
 political rape 38
 public rape 288
rāqid 451
ra'y 440, 446
razfat al-iyāla 418 reasoning 440
 religious association 705-719 religious pluralism 187, 397 religious racism 175-177
 remarriage 11, 32, 59, 99-101, 105-107, 110, 142, 145, 202-203, 238, 252, 255, 264, 330, 341-342, 395, 443, 447-448, 451, 454-456, 466, 468-471, 474-475, 514, 579, 592, 621, 645, 756, 800 repudiation (see also talāq) 22, 31-32, 98-99, 103, 109, 276, 387, 392, 394-395, 443, 448-449, 453, 466, 472, 474-475, 640-641 revenge cycle 414 revolutionary movements 647-665
ribāṭ 36, 328
ridā'at al-kabīr 356
ridda (see also apostasy) 7, 475
riwāyāt 446
 Roman law 32
rupush 500
rusari 500
 Russification 166, 374
 de-Russification 52
ryosai kenbo 745

ṣabr 101
ṣadāq 96, 442, 454
ṣadaqa 242
sajjadā nashīm 327
sako 332
salāmi 340
sālār 800
ṣalāt 709 salish 124, 173-174, 180, 378, 435 samande 332
sangsār kardan 215
sariqa 475
sati 59, 288, 593
savab 3 sayoo 195 sayyid 539
 seclusion (see also purdah) 34-35, 37-38, 40, 47, 51, 71, 75, 130-139, 143, 163, 190-193, 201-203, 218, 246, 256, 259, 284, 312, 326, 335, 362, 395, 415, 417, 495, 498, 501-502, 504, 507, 531, 533-534, 536-587, 591-592, 601, 644, 677, 686, 710, 713, 717, 745, 752 sectarianism 720-724
 secularism 725-735
selamlık 235
 self-immolation 142, 199, 238, 363, 364 sema 713, 768
 separatist movements 281, 352-353, 362, 431, 541, 545-547, 614, 628 sevap 5
 sex-selective feticide 298 sexual abuse 111, 116, 119, 123, 199, 282, 343, 403, 411, 432-433, 436, 691 children 735-740
 sexual harrasment 371, 399, 702, 782 sexual trafficking 404 sexual violence 111, 120, 126-128, 282, 288, 343, 399, 436, 637, 702, 704, 735, 738, 739 shabnāmas 788
shādī 257

 Shāfi'ī school 26, 223, 256, 369, 394, 426, 440-445, 450, 452, 454, 459, 463, 465, 467, 475, 701, 777 shahāda 325, 475
shahāda 'alā shahāda 475
shahīd 285, 326
shahīda 521
 shalwar kameez 184, 287, 504, 531
shamaj 12
sharaf 215
sharam 194
 Sharī'a 4, 7-9, 19-21, 26-27, 32, 41, 50, 55, 64, 73, 81-82, 87, 101, 108-110, 117, 121-122, 124, 127, 158, 161-164, 178, 180, 182, 198, 215-216, 254, 257, 266-270, 273, 276, 278-279, 284, 302-303, 307, 335-336, 367-368, 370-372, 374-378, 380-382, 384-386, 388-391, 392, 396-397, 400, 402-404, 408, 414-418, 422, 431-433, 436-437, 440-476, 497, 499, 501, 526, 562, 584-585, 594, 598, 605-607, 614, 641-642, 645, 658, 661, 691, 700-701, 706, 720, 722, 725, 735, 739, 746, 763, 770-772, 782
 Sharī'a courts 10, 27, 53, 85, 107, 120-122, 161-162, 278, 341, 368, 370-371, 375-376, 378-381, 388, 390-391, 395, 397, 433, 436, 438, 455, 458, 460-461, 463, 594-595, 601, 698-699, 735 sharm 143, 215, 217 shaurās 669
sheha 424 shelter for battered women 112, 114, 120, 274, 282, 362, 380, 403, 590, 597, 607, 656, 665, 715, 768 shighār 455
shiqāq 463 shirbaha 335
shubha 403, 701
shubr gumizishnih 802
shūra 87, 414
ṣigha (see also mu'ā) 392
sijillāt 369
sikke 713
ṣilāt al-rahīm 529
silf 418
 single mothers 16, 20, 252, 641 sitaat 76
 slave trade 245-246 sleeping fetus (rāqid) 98, 397, 451 social control 210
 sodomy 11
somo 205
 Sovietization 141, 237, 374, 680 spirit possession 75-76, 136, 182, 328, 711, 764-765 state religion 81, 85, 287, 393-394, 559 stepmother 4, 508, 514
 stereotypes 291, 752-760
 sectorial stereotypes 759 stigma (stigmatization) 2, 5, 42, 96, 100-101, 105, 107-108, 111, 127, 141-142, 146, 150, 259, 341, 385, 418, 426, 429, 696, 735, 756, 799 stol krovi 390
 stoning to death 85, 215, 222-224, 278, 287, 328, 342, 387, 397, 399, 406-407, 429, 434, 436, 562, 594, 701 stove burning 123-124 stridhan 304
stūr zanīh 800
ṣubhiyya 530
 succession 299-305

- süd* 337
süd qobumluq 337
 suffrage 28, 36, 37, 45, 60, 68, 81–82, 154, 172, 216, 278, 361–362, 364, 515, 551–553, 563, 566, 569–570, 647, 662–663, 681, 728, 781, 788
 Sufi orders 34–35, 74–75, 289, 327, 497, 506, 537, 612, 711, 713, 761–774
 Sufism 26, 36, 144, 324, 326–328, 338, 478, 480, 506, 536, 511, 612, 614, 620–621, 711, 713, 717, 722–723, 761–774, 782 sufra 480, 484, 707 suicide 116, 118, 123–124, 142, 150, 180, 191, 216, 238, 282, 320, 361, 363–364, 406, 412, 566–567 şulh 408
sultāna 26
şumūd 643–644
şümük qobumluq 337
suntuure 144
surau 242
suudu 144
swadeshi 61
syariah (see also Sharī'a) 332
syed 539
- tā'a* 122, 404, 463
tabannā 1 tābī'un 440
tabligh 709 tā'dil 475
tafrī' al-waqt 709 tafrīq 466
tafriṭa 230
tafsīr 122, 716
tahrīm 2
tahrīr registers 254, 260
tajaddud 284
tajwid 716
takfir 7
ṭalāq (see also divorce) 15, 99, 101–103, 107–110, 124, 143, 341, 387, 394–395, 397, 442–443, 447–449, 455, 463, 466, 470, 473–475, 640–641 ṭalāq al-bid'a 442–443, 466 ṭalāq al-sunna 442, 466
ṭalāq al-tafwīd 380, 474
ṭalāq-e badai 341
ṭalāq-e bain 341
ṭalāq-i tafwīd 343
ṭalāq-ul bidā' 341
talfiq 442, 460, 461
tā'liq 380
tamkin 117
tapos 478
taraqqi va tamaddun 727
tarhana 247
tarhon lagi 415
tarhoni lagtae 415
tariqa (plural ṭuruq) (see also Sufi order) 75, 506, 526, 769, 771 tawābin 566
tawhīd 621, 762, 733 tā'zīr 121–122, 403, 408, 429
tekke 713, 761–762
tere 415
 territoriality 347, 747
tespih 762
tevhid 762 thawb 184
thayyib 452
th'eryiueshchylh'et 390
- thiéboudienne* 526
 third space 294
treteiskiy 415
 tribal law 8, 122, 223, 269–270, 402, 414, 433, 435, 444, 448 tribalism 26, 40, 435, 571 trusteeship 1–6, 104
tuji fyng 390
 turban 185 türban 282
türbes 761
 Turkification 88, 360, 361, 482, 580
 Turkishness 289, 694
 Turkism 146, 664
tushol 512
- umm* 508
umm al-mu'minin 155
umm al-shāhid 509
umm al-walad 454
umma 775–778
umūma 508
 unanimous opinion 473
 unlawful accusation of zinā (see qadhif) unlawful sexual intercourse (see zinā) unveiling 19, 36, 44, 207, 317, 362, 481, 523, 524, 582, 587, 589, 600, 632–633, 634, 642, 677, 705, 720, 727–728, 779, 788–789, 801 unyago 204–206
uork habze 415
'urf (see also customary law) 221, 375, 376, 392, 402–403, 418, 422–423, 432, 451, 463, 465–466
'usūli 15
- vani* 343 n.2
varna-jātī 339
vartan-bhānji 340
vatan 157, 284, 481
velis 713 viduity 32
virahimī 327
 virgin-saints 717
 virginity 12, 125, 145, 148–149, 173, 198, 203–204, 206, 226–227, 262, 282, 315, 387, 402, 409, 453 non-virginity 12, 211
 virginity testing 219, 225, 282, 383, 433, 496, 660, 723
- wājib* 230
wakāla 475
wakil 8, 376
walāya 1, 100, 104, 475, 641 walī 104, 387, 394, 408, 452 walī mujbīr 394
walwar 335
waqf 2, 34, 59, 303–304, 376–377, 470, 705, 756 warombo 205
waṭan 156
waṭaniyya 156
wazee 424
weiganji 322
 Westoxification 285
 whipping (see lashing) widow immolation (see also sati) 59, 288 wilāyat-e nafs 341
wilāyat-e nikāh 341
wilāyat-i faqīh 432
 “wild blood” 794
wis-dukht 800
 witnesses, women as 408, 475–477

- Woman Question 44, 59, 94, 360, 362, 482, 518, 580, 587-588, 592, 595-596, 664-665, 671, 705, 731, 779, 273
 women's courts 396
 women's studies programs 783-787
 women's unions 788-791 workers' movements 666-671

xiangi liangmu 745

yamīn 475 yanaşma 6 yarmulke 185
yasa 693
yibum 315-316
 youth cultures and movements 792-799 yurt 163, 228, 251

zakāt 578, 705
zameen 367
zāmil poetry 418

zan 215, 367
zān-i dāi 345
Zar 367, 632-633
zār 75-76, 768
zawāj al-āb 508
zawāj muʿa (see muʿa)
zāwiya 485, 764
zenana 194
ženska medresa 762
zhenotdel 587, 634, 679
zhenotdely 19
zhensoviets 140
žihār 1, 451, 470, 475
zinā 215, 221, 223, 395, 399-401, 403-404, 406-408, 434, 475-476, 698-704, 739 forced zinā 399, 699-700 zinā bi-al-jabr 400, 700, 703 zina cebr ile 699
zinā-yi muḥşina 407
ziyāra 480
ziyāratnāma 803

ILLUSTRATIONS

Figure 1. Adeni family court judge in her court with her assistant, early 1990s. After Yemini unification, women were no longer allowed to head a family court or to train as judges. (Photo: Susanne Dahlgeren.)

Figure 2. Narinjistan, Shiraz. Qajar period building.

Figure 3. Official State Emblem of Iran, early 1970s.

Figure 4. A factory worker in the Leather Shoe Factory, Aden. During the early years of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, literacy was a requirement to enter factory work. The photo is from 1989. (Photo: Susanne Dablgren.)

Figure 5. Participants of a literacy class run by a local club of the General Union of Yemeni Women during the late years of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen. (Photo: Susanne Dahlgren.)

Figure 6. Khayāl al-zill (Cairo: n.d.), vol. 2, no. 62, Sunday, 23 August 1925, p. 16. (Photo Credit: Near East Collections of the Princeton University Library.)

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WOMEN & ISLAMIC CULTURES

General editor

Suad Joseph

Associate editors

Afsaneh Najmabadi

Julie Peteet

Seteney Shami

Jacqueline Siapno

Jane I. Smith

VOLUME II

SET

WWW.BRILL.NL