

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WOMEN & ISLAMIC CULTURES

WOMEN & ISLAMIC CULTURES

Family, Law and Politics

VOLUME 2

BRILL

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WOMEN
& ISLAMIC CULTURES

VOLUME II

Family, Law and Politics

General Editor: Suad Joseph (University of California, Davis)

Associate Editors and their regional responsibilities:

Afsaneh Najmabadi (Harvard University)

Turkey, Iran, India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Central Asia and the Muslim Republics of the ex-Soviet Union.

Julie Peteet (University of Louisville)

Seteney Shami (Social Science Research Council)

Arab Gulf States, the Arab Eastern Mediterranean, North Africa, Mauritania, Israel, Andalusian Spain and Europe under the Ottoman Empire.

Jacqueline Siapno (University of Melbourne)

China, Mongolia, Philippines, Indonesia, Malaysia, Brunei, Burma, Thailand, Australia, Vietnam, Cambodia, Singapore, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and the Asian Pacific.

Jane I. Smith (Hartford Seminary)

Western Europe, the Americas, and Sub-Saharan Africa.

Editorial Assistant to Jane I. Smith:

Alice Horner (Independent scholar)

Sub-Saharan Africa.

Copy editing:

Margaret Owen

Indexing:

Paul Schrijver

Advisory Board:

Lila Abu-Lughod, Columbia University

Leila Ahmed, Harvard University

Nadje al-Ali, University of Exeter

Soraya Altorki, American University in Cairo

Rabiatu Ammah, University of Ghana

Yesim Arat, Boğaziçi University

Barbara Aswad, Wayne State University

Beth Baron, City College New York

John Bowen, Washington University

Suzanne Brenner, University of California,
San Diego

Jocelyn Cesari, CNRS and Harvard University

Julia Clancy-Smith, University of Arizona

Virginia Danielson, Harvard University

Layla Diba, The Bard Graduate Center for Studies in the Decorative Arts, Design, and Culture

Elizabeth Fernea, University of Texas, Austin

Yvonne Haddad, Georgetown University

Sondra Hale, University of California,
Los Angeles

Virginia Matheson Hooker, Australian National University

Deniz Kandiyoti, University of London

Nursyahbani Katjasungkana, Indonesian
Women's Association for Justice

Nikki Keddie, University of California,
Los Angeles

Kim Knott, University of Leeds

Saba Mahmood, University of California, Berkeley

Katayun Mazdapur, Institute for Humanities and Cultural Studies, Tehran

Aminah McCloud, DePaul University

Anne Meneley, Trent University

Barbara Metcalf, University of Michigan

Farzaneh Milani, University of Virginia

Shahzad Mojab, University of Toronto

Kathleen Moore, University of California,
Santa Barbara

Ebrahim Moosa, Duke University

Cynthia Nelson, American University in Cairo

Karin van Nieuwkerk, ISIM Nijmegen University

Sulayman Nyang, Howard University

Norani Othman, University of Kebangsaan,
Malaysia

Carla Petievitch, Montclair State University

Anthony Reid, National University of Singapore

Barbara Stowasser, Georgetown University

Sylvia Tiwon, University of California, Berkeley

Nayereh Tohidi, California State University
Northridge

Frances Trix, Wayne State University

Judith Tucker, Georgetown University

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WOMEN & ISLAMIC CULTURES

VOLUME II

Family, Law and Politics

General Editor

Suad Joseph

Associate Editors

Afsaneh Najmabadi

Julie Peteet

Seteney Shami

Jacqueline Siapno

Jane I. Smith

BRILL
LEIDEN – BOSTON
2005

© Copyright 2005 by Koninklijke Brill NV,
Leiden, The Netherlands
Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill Academic Publishers,
Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP

ISBN 90 04 12818 2 (Vol. II)

ISBN 90 04 13247 3 (Set)

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Cover design: BEELDVORM, Pijnacker

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Brill provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers MA 01923, USA. Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

For author's template, see:

<http://www.brill.nl>

<http://www.sjoseph.ucdavis.edu/ewic>

Contents

List of Contributors	xv
List of Illustrations	xxi
Acknowledgments	xxiii
Preface (Suad Joseph)	xxvii
Adoption and Fostering
Overview (Ingrid Mattson)	1
Central Asia and the Caucasus (Marfua Tokhtakhodjaeva & Almaz Kadirova)	3
North Africa (Jamila Bargach)	4
Turkey (Ferhunde Özbay)	5
Apostasy
Overview (Nancy Gallagher)	7
Armenian Women
Overview (Houri Berberian)	10
Bahā'ī Women
Overview (Susan Stiles Maneck)	15
Citizenship
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Marie-Carin von Gumpfenberg)	19
Egypt, Sudan and Arab States (Valentine M. Moghadam)	21
The Gulf and Yemen (Rima Sabban)	24
Southeast Asia (Vivienne Wee & Asma Beatrix)	25
Western Europe (Jocelyne Cesari)	29
Civil Society
Overview (Elizabeth F. Thompson)	34
Afghanistan (Elahé Rostami Povey)	40
The Balkans (Jasna Bakšić Muftić)	42
Iran (Farideh Farbi)	43
Israel (Hanna Herzog)	44
Sub-Saharan Africa (Robert A. Dowd)	47
Civil Society and Democracy Ideologies
Central Asia and the Caucasus (Anara Tabyshalieva)	50
South Asia (Rounaq Jahan)	52
Turkey (Yeşim Arat)	55
Colonialism and Imperialism
British Colonial Domains of South Asia (Siobhan Lambert-Hurley)	59
East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia and Oceania (Susanna G. Rizzo)	61
Egypt (Mervat F. Hatem)	66
French North Africa (Patricia M. E. Lorcin)	69
Middle East, British (Nancy L. Stockdale)	70
Russian Colonial Domains of the Caucasus and Central Asia (Mitra Raheb)	72
Sub-Saharan Africa (Lorelle Denise Semley)	74
Constitutions
The Caucasus and Central Asian States (Dono Abdurazakova)	78
Indonesia (Susī Dwī Harijantī)	79
The Islamic Republic of Iran and Afghanistan (Asghar Schirazi)	81
South Asia (Laura Dudley Jenkins)	82
Sub-Saharan Africa (José C. M. van Santen)	84

Democracy Ideologies
Arab States (Lindsey Fauss)	87
Asia-Pacific Region (Mohammad Mohabbat Khan)	89
Iran and Afghanistan (Azadeh Kian-Thiébaud)	94
Israel (Elizabeth Anne Faier)	95
Divorce and Custody: Contemporary Practices
Arab States (Willy Jansen)	98
Australia (Jamila Hussain)	100
Canada (Earle Waugh)	102
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Marfua Tokhtakhodjaeva & Almaz Kadirova)	103
Iran and Afghanistan (Homa Hoodfar)	105
South Asia (Nasreen Fazalbhoy)	106
Western Europe (Haifaa Jawad)	108
Domestic Violence
Arab States (Leila Hessini)	111
Canada (Shabeen Hussain Azmi)	112
The Caucasus (Feride Zurikashvili)	115
Central Asia (Marfua Tokhatakhodjaeva & Almaz Kadirova)	116
Iran and Afghanistan (Vida Nassehi-Behnam)	117
Israel (Madelaine Adelman)	119
The Ottoman Empire (Elyse Semerdjian)	121
South Asia (Habiba Zaman)	123
Sub-Saharan Africa (Scott London)	125
Turkey (Cânân Arın)	128
Domesticity
The Caucasus (Farideh Heyat)	130
East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia (Mina Roces)	131
Iran and Afghanistan (Jasamin Rostam-Kolayi)	134
Sub-Saharan Africa: Hausa Societies (Elsbeth Robson)	135
Turkey (Şule Toktaş)	137
Family Relations
The Caucasus (Farideh Heyat)	140
Central Asia (Colette Harris)	141
South Asia (Nita Kumar)	142
Sub-Saharan Africa: Fulbe Societies (B. Lacey Andrews)	144
Turkey (Sevil Sümer)	146
The United States (Barbara C. Aswad)	147
Western Europe (Chantal Saint-Blancat)	151
Families: Metaphors of Nation
Overview (Kathryn Robinson)	154
Family: Modern Islamic Discourses
Canada (Alisa Perkins)	161
Central Asia (Colette Harris)	163
Iran and Afghanistan (Valentine M. Moghadam)	164
Turkey and the Caucasus (E. Olcay Imamoğlu)	165
The United States (Earle Waugh)	167
Fatwa
Overview (Elora Shehabuddin)	171
Freedom of Expression
Australia (Alia Imtoul)	175
Iran (Masoud Kazemzadeh)	177
South Asia (Ratna Kapur)	179
Sub-Saharan Africa (Ousseina Alidou)	181
Turkey (Amberin Zaman)	183

The United States (Mohamed Nimer)	184
Western Europe (Valérie Amiraux)	186
Friendship
Arab States (Celia E. Rothenberg)	189
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Andrea Giacomuzzi)	191
Iran and Afghanistan (Mary Elaine Hegland)	192
South Asia (Rehana Ghadially)	194
Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa (Frank A. Salamone)	195
Gender Socialization
Central Asia (Sofia Kasymova)	198
Iran and Afghanistan (Erika Loeffler Friedl)	199
The Ottoman Empire (Madeline C. Zilfi)	201
South Asia (Zarina Bhatty)	202
Sub-Saharan Africa: Swahili Societies (Kjersti Larsen)	204
Turkey and the Caucasus (Farideh Heyat)	206
Gossip
Arab States (Ann Gardner)	210
Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia (Mary Elaine Hegland)	211
Honor
Iran and Afghanistan (Shabrizad Mojab)	215
South Asia (Erin Patrice Moore)	216
Turkey and the Caucasus (Ayşe Parla)	218
Honor: Crimes of
Overview (Lama Abu-Odeh)	221
Sub-Saharan Africa: Northern Nigeria (Allan Christelow)	222
Honor: Feminist Approaches to
Overview (Lama Abu-Odeh)	225
Hospitality
Central Asia (Nodira Khaitbaevna Azimova)	228
The Gulf and Yemen (Anne Meneley)	229
Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia (Mary Elaine Hegland)	231
North Africa (Paula Holmes-Eber)	233
Turkey and the Caucasus (Irina Babich)	235
Household Division of Labor
Central Asia (Dono Abdurazakova)	237
Iran and Afghanistan (Erika Loeffler Friedl)	238
South Asia (Sajeda Amin)	239
Southeast Asia (Theresa W. Devasahayam)	242
Sub-Saharan Africa (Beth Anne Buggenhagen)	245
Turkey and the Caucasus (Niliifer A. İsvan)	247
Household Forms and Composition
The Caucasus (Farideh Heyat)	250
Central Asia (Colette Harris)	251
Iran and Afghanistan (Erika Loeffler Friedl)	252
The Ottoman Empire (Tomoki Okawara)	254
South Asia (Indrani Chatterjee)	255
Sub-Saharan Africa (Scott M. Youngstedt)	258
Turkey (Ferhunde Özbay)	260
The United States (Mary Elaine Hegland)	262
Human Rights
Overview (Lynn Welchman)	265
Arab Gulf and Yemen (Huda A. Seif)	269
Canada (Nadira Mustapha)	270

Iran (Niaz Kasravi)	272
Mashriq Arab States (Isis Nusair)	273
North Africa (Lilia Labidi)	275
Sudan (Carolyn Fluehr-Lobban)	277
Sub-Saharan Africa (Christina Jones-Pauly)	279
Turkey (Murat Çemrek)	281
Identity Politics
Central Asia (Colette Harris)	283
Iran and Afghanistan (Fakhri Haghani)	284
South Asia (Amrita Chhachhi)	286
Turkey (Katherine Pratt Ewing)	289
The United States (Katherine Bullock)	291
Western Europe (Nadia Fadil)	293
Infanticide and Abandonment of Female Children
Overview (Nancy Gallagher)	296
Inheritance: Contemporary Practice
Arab States (Annelies Moors)	299
Iran and Afghanistan (Erika Loeffler Friedl)	302
South Asia (Tazeen Mahnaz Murshid)	303
International Conventions
Overview (Adrien Katherine Wing)	306
International Organizations
Overview (Manzurul Mannan)	311
Jewish Women
Overview (Rachel Simon)	315
Jihad
Arab States (Lori A. Allen)	319
East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia (Muhamad Ali)	321
Iran and Afghanistan (Azadeh Kian-Thiébaud)	325
South Asia (Michel Boivin)	326
Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa (Jean Boyd)	327
Kinship, Descent Systems
Sahelian West Africa and North Central Africa (Chad/Sudan) (Mirjam de Bruijn)	330
East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific (Mina Elfira)	331
Kinship, Descent Systems and State
Afghanistan (Senzil Nawid)	335
The Caucasus (Ingrid Pfluger-Schindlbeck)	336
South Asia (Aparna Rao)	338
Kinship, Idiomatic
Iran (Erika Loeffler Friedl)	345
Kinship and State
Arab States (Diane E. King)	347
Ottoman (Kim Shively)	349
Southeast Asia, East Asia, Australia, and the Pacific (Maila Stivens)	351
Kinship: Milk
Overview (Avner Giladi)	355
Kurdish Women
Overview (Shahrzad Mojab)	358
Law: Access to the Legal System
Afghanistan (Nasrine Gross)	367
Arab States (Anna Würth)	367

The Balkans (Jasna Bakšić Muftić)	370
The Caucasus (Irina Babich)	372
Central Asia (Dono Abdurazakova)	373
Iran (Mehrangiz Kar)	374
The Ottoman Empire (Margaret L. Meriwether)	375
South Asia (Shabida Lateef)	377
Southeast Asia (Noraida Endut)	378
Sub-Saharan Africa (Leslye Amede Obiora)	381
Turkey (Pinar Ilkkaracan)	383
Western Europe (Qudsia Mirza)	384
Law: Articulation of Islamic and non-Islamic Systems
Arab States (Christina Jones-Pauly)	387
The Caucasus and Turkey (Irina Babich)	390
Iran (Irene Schneider)	392
Southeast Asia (Mark Cammack)	393
Sub-Saharan Africa (Erin E. Stiles)	396
Law: Criminal
Overview (Lynn Welchman)	399
Afghanistan (Nasrine Gross)	402
Arab States (Sherifa Zubur)	402
Bangladesh (Rubya Mehdi)	405
Iran (Mehrangiz Kar)	406
Pakistan (Rubya Mehdi)	407
Turkey (Cânân Arin)	409
Law: Cultural Defense
Overview (Kathleen M. Moore)	411
Law: Customary
Afghanistan (Palwasha L. Kakar)	414
The Caucasus (Irina Babich)	415
Central Asia (Bill Bowring)	416
The Gulf and Yemen (Najwa Adra)	418
Indonesia (Ranto Lukito)	419
Mashriq Beduins (William Lancaster and Felicity Lancaster)	422
Sub-Saharan Africa (Erin E. Stiles)	424
Turkey (Pinar Ilkkaracan)	426
Law: Enforcement
East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific (Nadirsyah Hosen)	429
Iran and Afghanistan (Jale Ahmadi)	432
South Asia (Nausheen Ahmad)	433
Sub-Saharan Africa (Mechthild Nagel)	436
Law: The Four Sunnī Schools of Family Law
Overview (Liyakat Takim)	440
Law: Other Schools of Family Law
Overview (Liyakat Takim)	446
Law: Family Law, 7th–Late 18th centuries
Overview (Ingrid Mattson)	450
Law: Modern Family Law, 1800–Present
Afghanistan (Helena Malikyar)	458
Arab States (Lama Abu-Odeh)	459
Egypt (Laura Bier)	463
Gulf, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen (Susanne Dahlgren)	465
Iran (Mehrangiz Kar)	467
South Asia (Shabida Lateef)	469
Turkey (Dicle Kogacioglu)	472
The United States (Muneer Fareed)	473

Law: Women as Witnesses
Overview (Nadira Mustapha)	475
Memory, Women, and Community
Afghanistan (Margaret A. Mills)	478
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Andrea Giacomuzzi)	479
Iran (Negar Mottahedeh)	481
Turkey (Özlem Altan)	482
Western Europe (Karin van Nieuwkerk)	483
Military: Women's Participation
Sub-Saharan Africa (Gwendolyn Mikell)	487
Turkey (Ayşe Gül Altınay)	489
The United States (Shareda Hosein)	490
Modesty Discourses
Overview (Lila Abu-Lughod)	494
Central Asia and the Caucasus (Colette Harris)	498
Iran and Afghanistan (Mary-Catherine Daly)	499
The Ottoman Empire (Kim Shively)	501
South Asia (Mary-Catherine Daly)	503
Sub-Saharan Africa: Somali Society (Mary-Catherine Daly)	504
Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa (Dorothea Schulz)	506
Motherhood
Arab States (Farha Ghannam)	508
Australia (Pranee Liamputtong & Vicki Tsianakas)	509
The Caucasus (Feride Zurikashvili)	512
Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia (Mary Elaine Hegland)	513
Turkey (Kathryn Libal)	515
Nation, Women, and Gender
Overview (Avi Rubin)	518
National Insignia, Signs and Monuments
Arab States (Beth Baron & Sara Pursley)	523
Iran (Afsaneh Najmabadi)	524
Sub-Saharan Africa (Igor Cusack)	525
Networks
North Africa (Paula Holmes-Eber)	528
The Ottoman Empire (Leila Hudson)	529
South Asia (Fawzia Afzal-Khan)	531
Turkey (Julie Marcus)	533
Western Europe (Prina Werbner)	534
Patronage and Clientage
East Asia and Southeast Asia (Claudia Derichs)	538
Turkey (Diane E. King)	540
Peacekeeping and Conflict Management
Arab States (Norma T. Nemeš)	543
The Caucasus and Turkey (Diane E. King)	544
South Asia (Paula Banerjee)	546
Sub-Saharan Africa: The Horn and East Africa (Emily Frank)	548
Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa (Jennifer L. De Maio)	550
Political Parties and Participation
Afghanistan (Mark David Luce)	551
Arabian Peninsula (Iris Glosemeyer)	551
The Balkans (Aydin Babuna)	553

Canada (Katherine Bullock)	554
Iran (Haleh Esfandiari)	556
North Africa (Alain Roussillon)	557
South Asia (Sudha Ratan)	559
Sub-Saharan Africa (Aili Mari Tripp)	561
Turkey (Ayşe Ayata)	563
Political Prisoners
Iran and Afghanistan (Jale Ahmadi)	566
Political Regimes
Afghanistan (Mark David Luce)	568
Turkey (Fatmagül Berktaş)	569
Political-Social Movements: Ethnic and Minority
Iran and Afghanistan (Amir Hassanpour)	571
Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria (Seteney Shami)	573
North Africa (Paul A. Silverstein)	576
Sub-Saharan Africa: South Africa (Suleman E. Dangor)	577
Turkey (Pauline van Gelder)	579
Political-Social Movements: Feminist
Afghanistan (Nima Naghibi)	582
Arab States (Azza M. Karam)	582
The Caucasus (Mzia Tsereteli)	586
Central Asia (Chiara De Santi)	587
Iran (Nima Naghibi)	589
Israel (Amalia Sa'ar)	590
South Asia (Archana Parashar)	591
Sub-Saharan Africa (Barbara Callaway & Lucy Creevey)	594
Turkey (Ayfer Karakaya-Stump)	595
The United States (Maliha Chishti)	597
Political-Social Movements: Islamist Movements and Discourses
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Omar Ashour & Uzma Jamil)	600
Indonesia (Jajang Jahroni)	602
Iran and Afghanistan (Azadeh Kian-Thiébaud)	604
Mashriq, Egypt and North Africa (Azza M. Karam)	606
Pakistan (Ghazala Anwar)	609
Sub-Saharan Africa (Marleen Renders)	611
Sudan (Sondra Hale)	614
Turkey (Fatmagül Berktaş)	615
Political-Social Movements: Islamist Movements and Discourses and Religious Associations
Canada (Nadira Mustapha)	617
Political-Social Movements: Millenarian
South Asia (Sarah Ansari)	620
Turkey (Ahmet Yaşar Ocak)	622
Political-Social Movements: Peace Movements
Central Asia (Diane E. King)	625
South Asia (Paula Banerjee)	626
Turkey and the Caucasus (Diane E. King)	628
Political-Social Movements: Protest Movements
The Balkans (Jasna Bakšić Muftić)	632
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Svetlana Pesbkova)	633
Indonesia (Nursyahbani Katjasungkana)	636
Iran (Haideh Moghissi)	639
North Africa (Alain Roussillon)	640
Palestine (Penny Johnson)	642
Purdah in South Asia (Shahida Lateef)	644

Political-Social Movements: Revolutionary
Egypt (Laura Bier)	647
Indonesia (Saskia E. Wieringa)	648
Iran and Afghanistan (Hammed Shabidian)	650
Iraq (Sara Pursley)	652
North Africa (Fatima Sadiqi)	653
Palestine (Lori A. Allen)	655
South Yemen and Dhofar (Susanne Dahlgren)	657
Sub-Saharan Africa: Eritrea (Dan Connell)	659
Sudan (Sondra Hale)	661
Syria (Elizabeth F. Thompson)	662
Turkey (Serpil Çakır)	664
Political-Social Movements: Unions and Workers' Movements
Arab States (excepting North Africa and the Gulf) (Elizabeth Bishop)	666
Iran (Elaheh Rostami Povey)	669
Turkey (Aylin Özman)	670
Postcolonial Dissent
Malaysia and Indonesia (Julie Shackford-Bradley)	672
Public Office
Afghanistan (Arpita Basuroy)	677
Arab States (Amaney Jamal)	678
The Caucasus and Central Asia (Dono Abdurazakova)	679
Iran (Haleh Esfandiari)	681
Turkey (Oya Çitçi)	682
Public/Private Dichotomy
Overview (Farha Ghannam)	685
Race, Gender, and Difference
Egypt and Sudan (Anne M. Jennings & Maurita Poole)	689
The Ottoman Empire (Isa Blumi)	692
Turkey (Anna J. Secor)	694
Western Europe (Nadia Hashmi)	695
Rape
Overview (Elyse Semerdjian)	698
The Ottoman Empire (Leslie Peirce)	700
South Asia (Geetanjali Gangoli)	702
Religious Associations
Central Asia (Chiara De Santi)	705
Iran and Afghanistan (Kathryn Spellman)	706
Malaysia and Indonesia (Pute Rahimah Makol-Abdul & Saodah Abdul Rahman)	708
North Africa (Margaret J. Rausch)	711
Turkey (Ayşe Saktanber)	712
The United States (Mohamed Nimer)	714
Western Europe (Kari Vogt)	715
Sectarianism and Confessionalism
Egypt (Febe Armanios)	720
The United States (Rula Abisaab)	721
Secularism
Arab States (excepting North Africa and the Gulf) (Annika Rabo)	725
India (Ratna Kapur)	726
Iran (Afsaneh Najmabadi)	727
Pakistan (Ayesha Jalal)	728
Turkey (Burçak Keskin-Kozat)	730
Western Europe (Gritt Klinkhammer)	732

Sexual Abuse: Children
The Balkans (Džamna Duman)	735
The Caucasus and Turkey (Mary Ellen Chatwin)	736
Iran (Manijeh Daneshpour)	737
South Asia (Shamita Das Dasgupta)	738
Shah Bano Affair
Overview (Zoya Hasan)	741
Social Hierarchies. Modern
East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific (Etim Anwar)	745
Gulf and Yemen (Mandana Limbert)	748
North Africa (Jamila Bargach)	749
Stereotypes
Afghanistan (Arpita Basuroy)	752
Canada (Patricia L. Kelly Spurles)	753
South Asia (Sabiha J. Hussain)	755
The United States: Arab Muslim Women as Portrayed in Film (Jack G. Shaheen)	757
Western Europe (Valérie Amiraux)	759
Sufi Orders and Movements
The Balkans (Amila Buturovic)	761
Egypt (Valerie J. Hoffman)	762
North Africa (Margaret J. Rausch)	764
Turkey, South Asia, Central Asia, Afghanistan, Iran, the Caucasus, the Arab East (Marcia Hermansen)	766
The United States (Marcia Hermansen)	770
Western Europe (Gritt Klinkhammer)	772
Umma
Overview (Ahmad Dallal)	775
Women's Rights: Male Advocacy
Overview (Elizabeth Frierson)	779
Women's Studies Programs in Muslim Countries
The Caucasus and Turkey (Hande A. Birkalan-Gedik)	783
Central Asia (Dinara Alimdjanova)	785
Iran (Farideh Farbi)	786
Women's Unions and National Organizations
Afghanistan (Mana Kia)	788
Iran (Mana Kia)	789
Turkey (Ömer Çaha)	790
Youth Culture and Movements
Iran (Farideh Farbi)	792
North Africa (including Egypt) (Jamila Bargach)	793
Turkey (Leyla Neyzi)	794
The United States (Kristine Ajrouch)	795
Western Europe (Annalisa Frisina)	798
Zoroastrian Women
Overview (Katayun Mazdapour)	800
Indices to Volume II
Name Index	805
Subject Index	828

List of Contributors

Dono Abdurazakova, Ph.D. (history)
Rula Abisaab, McGill University, Quebec
Lila Abu-Lughod, Columbia University, New York
Lama Abu-Odeh, Georgetown University Law Center, Washington, D.C.
Madelaine Adelman, Arizona State University
Najwa Adra, Independent Scholar
Fawzia Afzal-Khan, Montclair State University, New Jersey
Nausheen Ahmad, Shirkat Gah, Women's Resource Centre, Karachi, and South Asian Research Network on Gender, Law and Governance, Warwick, UK
Jale Ahmadi, Independent Scholar
Kristine Ajrouch, Eastern Michigan University
Muhamad Ali, Syarif Hidayatullah State Islamic University, Jakarta, Indonesia
Ousseina Alidou, Rutgers University, New Jersey
Dinara Alimdjanova, DSSP/UNDP, Uzbekistan
Lori A. Allen, University of Chicago
Özlem Altan, New York University
Ayşe Gül Altınay, Sabanci University, Turkey
Sajeda Amin, Population Council, New York
Valérie Amiraux, CNRS/CURAPP, Université Jules Verne of Picardie, France
B. Lacey Andrews, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island
Sarah Ansari, Royal Holloway, University of London
Etin Anwar, Hamilton College, Clinton, New York
Ghazala Anwar, University of Canterbury, UK
Yeşim Arat, Bogaziçi University, Turkey
Cânân Arin, Co-founder of Purple Roof Women's Shelter Foundation, Co-founder of Association for Support and Training Women Candidates, Co-founder of Istanbul Bar Association Women's Enforcement Center, Turkey
Febe Armanios, Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vermont
Omar Ashour, McGill University, Quebec
Barbara C. Aswad, Wayne State University, Detroit, Michigan
Ayşe Ayata, Middle East Technical University, Turkey
Nodira Azimova, Sharh va Tavsiya Sociology Center, Tashkent, Uzbekistan
Shaheen Hussain Azmi, Independent Scholar
Irina Babich, Russian Academy of Sciences
Aydın Babuna, Bogaziçi University, Turkey
Jasna Bakšić Muftić, University of Sarajevo
Paula Banerjee, University of Calcutta
Jamila Bargach, School of Architecture, Rabat, Morocco
Beth Baron, City University of New York
Arpita Basuroy, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad Institute of Asian Studies, India
Asma Beatrix, City University of Hong Kong
Vida Behnam, Independent Scholar
Hourī Berberian, California State University, Long Beach
Fatmagül Bertkay, Istanbul University
Zarina Bhatti, Indian Association of Women's Studies, New Delhi and Centre of Women's Studies,
New Delhi
Laura Bier, New York University
Hande A. Birkalan-Gedik, Yeditepe University, Istanbul
Elizabeth Bishop, The University of Texas, Austin

Isa Blumi, Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut
 Michel Boivin, Centre d'Etudes de l'Inde et de l'Asie du Sud (EHESS/CNRS), Paris
 Bill Bowring, London Metropolitan University
 Jean Boyd, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
 Mirjam de Bruijn, African Studies Centre, Leiden
 Beth Anne Buggenhagen, University of Chicago
 Katherine Bullock, University of Toronto
 Amila Buturovic, York University, Toronto
 Ömer Çaha, Fatih University, Istanbul
 Serpil Çakır, University of Istanbul
 Barbara Callaway, University of Connecticut
 Mark Cammack, Southwestern University School of Law, Texas
 Murat Çemrek, Selcuk University, Konya, Turkey
 Jocelyne Cesari, Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris and Harvard University
 Indrani Chatterjee, Rutgers University, New Jersey
 Mary Ellen Chatwin, Tbilisi State University, Republic of Georgia
 Amrita Chhachhi, Institute of Social Studies, The Hague
 Maliha Chishti, OISE/University of Toronto
 Allan Christelow, Idaho State University
 Oya Çitçi, Türkiye ve Orta Doğu Anne İdaresi Enstitüsü, Ankara
 Dan Connell, Simmons College, Boston, Massachusetts
 Lucy Creevey, University of Connecticut
 Igor Cusack, University of Bristol, UK
 Susanne Dahlgren, University of Helsinki
 Ahmad Dallal, Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.
 Mary-Catherine Daly, College of St. Catherine, St. Paul, Minnesota
 Manijeh Daneshpour, St. Cloud State University, Minnesota
 Suleman E. Dangor, University of Kwazulu-Natal
 Shamita Das Dasgupta, Manavi, Inc., New Jersey
 Jennifer L. De Maio, University of California, Los Angeles
 Claudia Derichs, University of Duisburg-Essen
 Theresa W. Devasahayam, Asia Research Institute, the National University of Singapore
 Robert Dowd, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
 Džamna Duman, University of Sarajevo
 Susi Dwi Harijanti, Padjadjaran University, Indonesia
 Mina Elfira, Universitas Indonesia
 Noraida Endut, Universiti Sains Malaysia
 Haleh Esfandiari, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, Washington, D.C.
 Katherine Ewing, Duke University, North Carolina
 Nadia Fadil, Catholic University of Leuven, Belgium, Research Assistant for the Fund for Scientific Research (FWO-Vlaanderen)
 Elizabeth Anne Faier, University of Richmond, Virginia
 Muneer Fareed, Wayne State University, Detroit, Michigan
 Farideh Farhi, University of Hawaii at Manoa
 Lindsey Fauss, The Queen Zein Al Sharaf Institute for Development (ZENID), Jordan
 Nasreen Fazalbhoy, University of Mumbai
 Carolyn Fluehr-Lobban, Rhode Island College
 Emily Frank, Indiana University
 Elizabeth Frierson, University of Cincinnati
 Annalisa Frisina, University of Padova, Italy
 Nancy Gallagher, University of California, Santa Barbara Geetanjali Gangoli, University of Bristol, UK
 Ann Gardner, Applied Social Anthropologist
 Pauline van Gelder, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands
 Rehana Ghadially, Indian Institute of Technology, Mumbai

Farha Ghannam, Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania
Andrea Giacomuzzi, University of Arizona, Tucson
Avner Giladi, University of Haifa
Iris Glosemeyer, Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, Berlin
Nasrine Gross, University of Kabul
Marie-Carin von Gumpfenberg, Policy Studies Central Asia, Munich
Fakhri Haghani, Georgia State University
Sondra Hale, University of California, Los Angeles
Colette Harris, Virginia Tech
Zoya Hasan, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi
Nadia Hashmi, Formerly of European University Institute, Florence
Amir Hassanpour, University of Toronto
Mervat F. Hatem, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
Mary Elaine Hegland, Santa Clara University, California
Marcia Hermansen, Loyola University, Chicago
Hanna Herzog, Tel Aviv University and Harvard University
Leila Hessini, Ipas, USA
Farideh Heyat, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
Valerie Hoffman, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
Paula Holmes-Eber, University of Washington
Homa Hoodfar, Concordia University, Quebec
Shareda Hosein, Hartford Seminary, Connecticut
Nadirsyah Hosen, The State University of Islamic Studies (UIN) Syarif Hidayatullah, Jakarta
Leila Hudson, University of Arizona
Jamila Hussain, University of Technology, Sydney
Sabiha Hussain, Centre for Women's Development Studies, New Delhi
Pinar Ilkcaracan, Independent scholar, Women for Women's Human Rights – New Ways, Turkey
E. Olcay Imamoğlu, Middle East Technical University, Ankara
Alia Imtoul, Gender Studies, University of Adelaide
Nilüfer A. İsvan, Channing Bete Company, Inc., South Deerfield, Massachusetts
Rounaq Jahan, Columbia University, New York
Jajang Jahroni, State Islamic University Syarif Hidayatullah, Jakarta, Indonesia
Ayesha Jalal, Tufts University, Massachusetts
Amaney Jamal, Princeton University, New Jersey
Uzma Jamil, McGill University, Quebec
Willy Jansen, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands
Haifaa Jawad, University of Birmingham, UK
Laura D. Jenkins, University of Cincinnati
Anne M. Jennings, Independent Scholar
Penny Johnson, Institute of Women's Studies, Birzeit University
Christina Jones-Pauly, Harvard University and University of London
Almaz Kadirova, Women's Resource Centre, Tashkent
Palwasha Kakar, Harvard University
Ratna Kapur, Centre for Feminist Legal Research, and Indian Society for International Law, New Delhi
Mehrangiz Kar, Harvard University
Ayfer Karakaya-Stump, Harvard University
Azza M. Karam, Regional Bureau for Arab States, United Nations Development Programme
Niaz Kasravi, Amnesty International USA (Ph.D. University of California, Irvine)
Sofia Kasymova, Academy of Sciences, Dushanbe, Republic of Tajikistan Nursyahbani Katjasungkana, Indonesian Women's Association for Justice
Masoud Kazemzadeh, Utah Valley State College
Patricia L. Kelly Spurles, Mount Allison University, New Brunswick
Burçak Keskin-Kozat, University of Michigan
Mohammad Mohabbat Khan, University of Dhaka
Mana Kia, Harvard University

Azadeh Kian-Thiébaud, University of Paris VIII and Monde Iranien, CNRS
 Diane E. King, American University of Beirut
 Gritt Klinkhammer, University of Bremen
 Dicle Kogacioglu, Sabanci University, Istanbul
 Nita Kumar, University of Michigan and Centre for Postcolonial Education, India
 Lilia Labidi, University of Tunis
 Siobhan Lambert-Hurley, Nottingham Trent University, UK
 Felicity Lancaster, Orkney
 William Lancaster, Orkney
 Kjersti Larsen, University of Oslo
 Shahida Lateef, Independent Scholar
 Pranee Liamputtong, La Trobe University, Melbourne
 Kathryn Libal, University of Connecticut
 Mandana Limbert, Queens College, City University of New York
 Erika Loeffler Friedl, Western Michigan University
 Scott London, Randolph-Macon College, Ashland, Virginia
 Patricia M. E. Lorcin, University of Minnesota, Twin Cities
 Mark David Luce, University of Chicago
 Ranto Lukito, State Islamic University Sunan Kalijaga Yogyakarta, Indonesia and Faculty of Law, McGill University, Quebec
 Pute Rahimah Makol-Abdul, International Islamic University, Malaysia
 Helena Malikyar, New York University
 Susan Stiles Maneck, Jackson State University, Mississippi
 Manzurul Mannan, Independent University, Bangladesh
 Julie Marcus, Charles Sturt University, New South Wales
 Ingrid Mattson, Hartford Seminary, Connecticut
 Katayun Mazdapour, Institute for Humanities and Cultural Studies, Tehran
 Rubya Mehdi, University of Copenhagen
 Anne Meneley, Trent University, Canada
 Margaret L. Meriwether, Denison University, Ohio
 Gwendolyn Mikell, Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.
 Margaret A. Mills, Ohio State University
 Qudsia Mirza, School of Law, University of East London, UK
 Valentine M. Moghadam, Illinois State University and UNESCO
 Haideh Moghissi, York University, Toronto
 Shahzrad Mojab, University of Toronto
 Erin Patrice Moore, University of Southern California
 Kathleen M. Moore, University of California, Santa Barbara Annelies Moors, University of Amsterdam/ISIM
 Negar Mottahedeh, Duke University, North Carolina
 Tazeen Mahnaz Murshid, Université Libre de Bruxelles and School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
 Nadira Mustapha, McGill University, Quebec
 Mechthild Nagel, State University of New York at Cortland Nima Naghibi, University of Winnipeg
 Afsaneh Najmabadi, Harvard University
 Senzil Nawid, Independent Scholar
 Norma T. Nemeh, School for International Training, Academic Director, Jordan Program
 Leyla Neyzi, Sabanci University, Turkey
 Karin van Nieuwkerk, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands
 Mohamed Nimer, Council on American-Islamic Relations
 Isis Nusair, Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana
 Leslye Amede Obiora, University of Arizona College of Law
 Ahmet Yaşar Ocak, Hacettepe Üniversitesi, Turkey
 Tomoki Okawara, Tohoku University, Sendai, Japan

Ferhunde Özbay, Bogaziçi University, Turkey
Aylin Özman, Hacettepe University, Ankara, Turkey
Archana Parashar, Macquarie University, New South Wales
Ayşe Parla, New York University
Leslie Peirce, University of California, Berkeley
Alisa Perkins, University of Texas, Austin
Svetlana Peshkova, Syracuse University, New York
Maurita Poole, Independent Scholar
Sara Pursley, City University of New York
Annika Rabo, University of Stockholm
Mitra Raheb, Independent Analyst, St. Thomas University, Miami
Saodah Abdul Rahman, International Islamic University, Malaysia
Aparna Rao, University of Cologne
Sudha Ratan, Augusta State University, Georgia
Margaret J. Rausch, University of Kansas
Marleen Renders, University of Ghent
Susanna G. Rizzo, University of Wollongong, New South Wales
Kathryn Robinson, Australian National University
Elsbeth Robson, Keele University, UK
Mina Roces, The University of New South Wales
Elaheh Rostami Povey, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
Jasamin Rostam-Kolayi, California State University, San Marcos
Celia E. Rothenberg, McMaster University, Ontario
Alain Roussillon, Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris
Avi Rubin, Harvard University
Amalia Sa'ar, University of Haifa
Rima Sabban, Independent Researcher
Fatima Sadiqi, Sidi Mohamed Ben Abdellah University, Fes, Morocco
Chantal Saint-Blancat, University of Padova, Italy
Ayşe Saktanber, Middle East Technical University, Ankara, Turkey
Frank A. Salamone, Iona College, New Rochelle, New York
José C. M. van Santen, Leiden University
Chiara De Santi, European University Institute, Florence, Italy
Ingrid Schindlbeck, Ethnologisches Museum, Berlin
Asghar Schirazi, Free University, Berlin
Irene Schneider, University of Göttingen
Dorothea Schulz, Free University, Berlin
Anna J. Secor, University of Kentucky
Huda A. Seif, Founder and Director: Alternative World: Partnership for Equitable Development and Social Justice, New York
Elyse Semerdjian, Whitman College, Washington
Lorelle Denise Semley, Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut
Julie Shackford-Bradley, California State University, Monterey Bay
Jack G. Shaheen, Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville
Hammed Shahidian, University of Illinois at Springfield
Seteney Shami, Social Science Research Council, New York
Elora Shehabuddin, Rice University, Houston, Texas
Kim Shively, Kutztown University, Pennsylvania
Paul Silverstein, Reed College, Portland, Oregon
Rachel Simon, Princeton University, New Jersey
Kathryn Spellman, University of London and Syracuse University and Huron International University, London
Erin E. Stiles, California State University, Sacramento
Maila Stivens, University of Melbourne
Nancy L. Stockdale, University of Central Florida

Sevil Sümer, University of Bergen, Norway
Anara Tabyshalieva, Institute for Regional Studies, Kyrgyzstan
Liyakat Takim, University of Denver, Colorado
Elizabeth F. Thompson, University of Virginia
Marfua Tokhtakhodjaeva, Women's Resource Centre, Tashkent
Şule Toktaş, European University Institute, Florence, Italy
Aili Mari Tripp, University of Wisconsin, Madison
Mzia Tsereteli, Tbilisi State University, Republic of Georgia
Vicki Tsianakas, La Trobe University, Melbourne
Kari Vogt, University of Oslo
Earle Waugh, University of Alberta
Vivienne Wee, City University of Hong Kong
Lynn Welchman, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
Pnina Werbner, Keele University
Saskia Wieringa, University of Amsterdam
Adrien Katherine Wing, University of Iowa College of Law
Anna Würth, Free University, Berlin
Scott M. Youngstedt, Saginaw Valley State University, Michigan
Amberin Zaman, Turkey Correspondent, Economist (UK)
Habiba Zaman, Simon Fraser University, British Columbia
Madeline C. Zilfi, College Park, University of Maryland
Sherifa Zuhur, Strategic Studies Institute, U.S. Army War College, Pennsylvania
Feride Zurikashvili, Tbilisi State University, Republic of Georgia

List of Illustrations

The illustrations can be found between pages 428 and 429.

Family Law: Modern Family Law, 1800–Present: Gulf, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen (Susanne Dahlgren):

[See page 467]

Figure 1. Adeni family court judge in her court with her assistant, early 1990s. After Yemeni unification, women were no longer allowed to head a family court or to train as judges. Photo Susanne Dahlgren.

National Insignia, Signs, and Monuments: Iran (Afsaneh Najmabadi):

[See page 524]

Figure 2. Narinjistan, Shiraz, Qājār period building.

Figure 3. Official State Emblem of Iran, early 1970s.

Political-Social Movements: Revolutionary: South Yemen and Dhofar (Susanne Dahlgren):

[See page 657–8]

Figure 4. A factory worker in the Leather Shoe Factory, Aden. During the early years of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, literacy was a requirement to enter factory work. The photo is from 1989. Photo Susanne Dahlgren.

Figure 5. Participants of a literacy class run by a local club of the General Union of Yemeni Women during the late years of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen. Photo Susanne Dahlgren.

Women's Rights: Male Advocacy: Overview (Elizabeth Frierson):

[See page 781]

Figure 6. Khayāl al-ẓill (Cairo n.d.), vol. 2, no. 62, Sunday, 23 August 1925, p. 16. Photo Credit: Near East Collections of the Princeton University Library.

Acknowledgments

As we send Volume II of The Encyclopedia of Women and Islamic Cultures to press, we take the time to respectfully and gratefully acknowledge those who have contributed to its ongoing production. We continue to be indebted to Brill for its investment in what has turned out to be a much larger and longer-lived project than any of us anticipated when EWIC was first conceived in 1994. Sam Bruinsma, the Business Unit Manager for History and Olaf Köndgen, the Islamic Studies Editor at Brill, have gone out of their way to provide support for EWIC, including adding the staff support services of Ingrid Heijckers who has significantly improved the efficiency of EWIC production. Isabella Gerritsen has loyally worked as EWIC's traffic director at Brill since 2001, managing correspondence and the flow of articles between authors, editors, and Brill. Margaret Owen has done a magnificent job as Copy Editor.

At the University of California, Davis, Dean of Social Sciences Steven Sheffrin offered EWIC and my other research projects a new server for our web work and web page (<http://sjoseph.ucdavis.edu/ewic>). Dean of Graduate Studies Jeffrey Gibeling kindly committed a new three-year work study grant for the EWIC research assistant. Vice Chancellor for Research Barry Klein was helpful in processing the new Ford Foundation grant, as was the Director of Sponsored Programs, Ahmad Hakim-Elahi. M. R. C. Greenwood, University of California Provost and Senior Vice President, and her staff played a vital role in working through contract details of the Ford Foundation grant. Much of the grant development could not have proceeded without the incredible efficiency and diligence of Leanna Sweha, UC Davis Contracts and Grants Officer, who worked through contract and subcontract details, and Matt Nguyen who stepped in when Leanna was away from the office. I am also indebted to Sandy Nixon and Kathy Haas in Accounting for processing the larger budget and reporting issues.

The computer expertise of Minh Nguyen from the Dean's office and the support of Assistant Dean Steven Roth and Lissa Torfi were important at crucial moments. In the Anthropology Department at UC Davis, Nancy McLaughlin, the Managerial Staff Officer, has worked hard to supervise my EWIC grants and the EWIC office, assisted valiantly by Candy Cayne Clark, the Anthropology Department Grants Officer, and the Anthropology Staff: Peggy Slaven, Barbara Raney, Royce McClellan, Eddie Ng, Tim Gilbert and Lisa Dietz. Their help has been most necessary for the continued work of EWIC.

Tracy Smith completed three years as EWIC Research Assistant in the Spring of 2004 with outstanding dedication. Bettina Schneider stepped in as EWIC Research Assistant most effectively in the fall of 2004. Jerry Lee trouble shot all our computer problems for over a year until he graduated in the Spring of 2004 when Andrey Dub took on that critical role. The number of undergraduate students working as Interns on the Scholars and Scholarship Project, to be published in a future EWIC volume, has increased. Nancy Wan, Monica Garcia, Fatima Naseem Malek, Rhyen Coombs and Tony Beukers – all of whom began working between January and Fall of 2002 – were joined by Marya Osucha, Emily Rostel, Monique Salas and Michelle Sandhoff in the Winter of 2003. Paulina Medeiros Tederer, Andrea McNees, Cristeta Shope, and Eva Brown joined in the Spring of 2004 followed, in the Summer of 2004, by Megan Fowler and Mary Beth Lansom. Fifteen undergraduates making a commitment of up to three years of work to ascertain all the Ph.D. dissertations carried out on topics related to women and Islamic cultures and to do a detailed analysis of the topics and researchers is rather unusual and quite admirable. I have been impressed and humbled by their energy and commitment.

Each of the Associate Editors have been supported by their institutions and paid assistants. Julie Peteet had the assistance of Leslie French, Whitney Gifford and Maryam Mirriahi who helped with her editorial work. Peteet is grateful for the support of the University of Louisville College of Arts and Sciences and Sharon O'Bryan, her support staff.

Seteney Shami would particularly like to thank Laleh Behbehanian and Tina Harris for research and administrative assistance, particularly in setting up systems to manage the flow of information and email traffic. Mary Ann Riad and Elissa Klein then joined the project. Shami is particularly grateful for the work of Laura Bier in diversifying the pool of invited authors, tracking authors and even reading some entries. Maria Todorova and Lucine Taminiian were most helpful in suggesting authors.

Mohammed Tabishat assisted in translation. Shami also most gratefully acknowledges the Social Science Research Council for accommodating her engagement in the EWIC project, for financial assistance of project funds, and for providing facilities and logistical means for her and her research assistants.

Afsaneh Najmabadi gratefully acknowledges student assistants Avi Rubin and Tanya Zakrevskaya. She would, in very special terms, like to thank student assistant Loretta Kim whose incredible research and administrative skills and commitment made it possible for Najmabadi to persist in the hard work of editorial productivity. She is also grateful for the contributions of distinguished scholars whom she continually consulted – Yeşim Arat, Nodira Azimova, Nilüfer İsvan, Margaret Mills, Shahrzad Mojab, and Nayereh Tohidi. Najmabadi would like to recognize the contribution of Rose Glickman for translations from Russian and French and editorial work and Farideh Farhi for translations from Persian. Cory Paulsen, Harvard University History Department financial officer, was particularly helpful in processing the EWIC grants. Harvard University has been remarkably supportive during her work as Associate Editor.

Jane I. Smith would like to acknowledge the support of the Hartford Seminary, and especially Alice Horner, an independent researcher in Washington, D.C., who worked with her as Editorial Assistant for Sub-Saharan Africa to locate authors. Nathal Dassing of ISIM in Holland helped Smith with Western European sources and authors and Sheila McDonough, Nadia Wardeh, and Celine Leduc helped with sources and authors on Canada.

Similarly, Jacqueline Siapno had the support of the staff and administration at the University of Melbourne. She would also like to thank her hard-working, brilliant, and dedicated Research Assistant, Dina Afrianty, affiliated with the State Islamic Institute in Jakarta. International Advisory Board Editor Virginia Matheson Hooker was particularly helpful for South East Asia consultations.

The Editors of EWIC express their gratitude to the 42 members of the International Advisory Editorial Board. They came from all disciplines and all regions of the world. Many contributed entries to EWIC, many helped us find authors for entries, and all lent their good names to this project.

We are most grateful to the Ford Foundation for awarding EWIC a supplementary grant which was even more generous than the original grant. Without the funding from the Ford Foundation, much of the work and growth of EWIC would not have been possible. Constance Buchanan and her assistants, Maxine Gaddis and Irene Korenfield, shepherded the grant through the Foundation and elicited the joint contributions and support of Ford Foundation regional offices, including: Emma Playfair (Cairo), Ganesan Balachander (New Delhi), Omotade Aina (Nairobi), Gerry Salole (Johannesburg), Suzanne Siskel (Indonesia), and Adhiambo Odaga (Lagos). In addition contributions came from the central New York offices: Constance Buchanan and Janice Petrovich (Education, Knowledge, and Religion Program). The Ford Foundation grant allowed us to fund research assistants, buy out time, and fund Editorial Board meetings, supplies, and equipment. The grant made it possible for the Editorial Board to come closer to reaching our standards of encyclopedic knowledge production. We are greatly indebted to Constance Buchanan and all the New York City and Regional Program Officers who participated in this funding.

My personal gratitude to EWIC's Associate Editors, Afsaneh Najmabadi, Julie Peteet, Seteney Shami, Jacqueline Siapno, and Jane I. Smith and Editorial Assistant Alice Horner is profound. They have made sacrifices for EWIC at a level none of us could have anticipated when we began working together in the Spring of 1999. They have brilliantly conjoined their diverse intellectual trajectories into a interdisciplinary, cross-cultural, transhistorical, collaborative, feminist project from which and through which we have all learned and grown. They have given from their hearts and souls, and I, more than any, have benefited from their insights, guidance, and wisdom. Our five years of working together, with a few more years to go, has yielded not only a harvest of scholarship, but a bounty of friendship.

Many others have contributed and will contribute to EWIC. Hopefully, we will be able to acknowledge as many as possible in these pages of future volumes of EWIC. Volume III is nearing completing of author solicitation as I write, with Volumes IV–VI slated for completing of author solicitations in the coming few months. We encourage and invite authors who are interested in contributing to contact us. Our author database has nearly 2,000 self-volunteered writers and potential contributors to EWIC from all over the world, giving new meaning to the idea of a global project. Nevertheless, we are certain there are scholars, graduate students, and practitioners whom we have not reached and urgent them to contact us (sjoseph@ucdavis.edu or ewic@ucdavis). You may also fill out a potential author template directly on our web page <http://sjoseph.ucdavis.edu/ewic>. From those who submitted potential author templates and have not yet been contacted, I request patience with our labor-intensive process and urge you to contact us again if you have submitted a template, are interested in contributing, and have not heard from us. It is especially important to us to continue to develop our potential author database, as we plan to publish an online edition of EWIC which will allow for ongoing updates. On behalf of the Editors and Brill, I express my deepest gratitude to all contributors, past and future.

I would like also to express appreciation to authors who tried very hard to meet our deadlines and were not able to. We extended deadlines a number of times, but as with any publication, some final cut-off date must be set. All the entries that were accepted for publication but that did not meet our final deadline for Volume II will be published in the online edition of EWIC, on which we hope to begin work in 2006.

Finally, my daughter, Sara Rose Joseph, continued to sacrifice and bear witness to this project with which she has lived most of her life. Now she admonishes me, from her college dorm room, for the hours spent on EWIC, all the while pleased that we have produced this most marvelous contribution to feminist scholarship.

SUAD JOSEPH,
General Editor, EWIC
Davis, California
October 2004

Preface

VOLUME II, EWIC

With Volume II, EWIC launches the first of four volumes dedicated to substantive topics of relevance to women and Islamic cultures globally. These four volumes, Volumes II–V (Volume VI is the cumulative index), are unusual in that each volume is topically organized. Within each volume, we maintain the conventional alphabetical listing of entries. Volume II brings together over 360 entries on women, family, law, politics, and Islamic cultures around the world. The Editors solicited entries on these topics in relationship to each other because of the historical and contemporary interweaving of these issues in Islamic cultures. Family is always a subject of law and politics in any state level society. States are always invested in what is defined as family and in the regulation of the activities of families as collectivities and of the persons ensconced within families. In many regions of the world, especially in the Middle East, family is defined as the basic unit of society (rather than the individualized citizen) and state actors mediate their relationships to state citizens through family structures, family relations, family idioms, and family moralities. State projects and state visions of the family as an idea and concrete family relationships are often translated into and transported through law and legal practices. In many Muslim majority countries, and even in some Muslim minority countries (such as India), the arena of family law that covers marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance is assigned to religious courts. The delegation of family law to religious courts in these states does not mean that the state is not interested in family or family law. In some of these states, religious clerics are salaried by the state or serve under the supervision of the state. In some cases where state law is promulgated, state family law may be influenced by Islamic law (Iraq, Egypt). Regardless of the specific articulations, however, states rarely ignore family structure and ideology. Law rarely is indifferent to the reality that most people live within families. And families and persons are rarely unaware or completely oblivious to the operations of law and politics in their lives. The topics covered in this volume do not exhaust the range of issues which intertwine family, law, and politics as many of these topics (labor, health, education, work, environment, and the like) are taken up in other volumes. What we set out to do in Volume II, then, is to bring together the core matters of state functioning, especially through law, in relation to family.

We began with a list of 109 topics. Of these, just under three dozen were originally defined as overviews on large topics. Some of the overviews were the single entry on a large topic, such as the overviews of apostasy and milk kinship. Other overviews were structured as introductions to a series of regional entries on those topics, such as the overviews of civil society and honor. During the development of Volume II, some overviews were changed and others added as we faced the constraints of author solicitations.

The non-overview topics of the original 109 were designed to generate a series of entries for each region of the world. How many such entries each topic generated and how those entries were defined by country or groups of countries was left to the Associate Editors responsible for each region. The Associate Editors faced enormous hurdles in finding authors for each of the remaining 75 topics. They had to decide what countries to group together for specific topics, which topics to do country by country, and which topics to cover on a larger regional basis. For some topics, the geographic divisions seemed, to some degree, self-evident, while others were not at all clear. On many topics, how countries were grouped together depended almost entirely on finding authors who had the expertise (and time) to write. Entry boundaries were at times driven by author expertise as much as they were by country boundaries. A degree of unevenness and inconsistency in the the geographical content of entries resulted which was unavoidable. This inconsistency is productive in many ways, as it reminds us that geographical boundaries are not “natural,” but the outcomes of historical and political processes which may not be congruent with social and cultural processes.

Another unavoidable inconsistency is the regional/country gaps in coverage from one topic to another. In all cases, the Associate Editors made every effort to cover all regions for all topics. We realized this grand ambition could not be achieved for a number of reasons. Research simply does not exist on some topics for some regions. Where research does exist, we were not always able to find the appropriate authors. At times, authors were overloaded and were not able to commit to writing the entries for EWIC in the time frame which we were able to afford them (typically we invited authors to return entries within three months of their acceptance).

Some authors tried, but were not able to complete their entries in time for inclusion in the print edition of Volume II. We have over 130 entries for Volume II which were still being written or revised, or had been revised but did not arrive in time for inclusion. While we regret not being able to hold the publication of Volume II for all these entries, we are committed to publishing those which were accepted in the online edition of EWIC.

With the limitations of our capacities as Editors, the limitations of the fields covered, and the limitations of this ambitious globally defined project, we have produced an incomparable volume of entries on subjects critical to understanding women, family, law, politics, and Islamic cultures. The entries provide a basis for critical comparative research. More importantly, Volume II sets the stage for innovative rethinking of the basis for comparative and interdisciplinary research on women and Islamic cultures which will be continued in Volumes III–VI and in the online edition of EWIC.

SUAD JOSEPH,
General Editor, EWIC
Davis, California
October 2004

Adoption and Fostering

Overview

Across cultures, adoption and fostering take different forms. In the Arabic language, adoption (tabannā) signifies the creation of a fictive relationship of parent to child, by naming the child as one's own and by endowing him or her with rights and duties identical to those of a biological child. Fostering (kafāla) is the act of assuming partial or complete responsibility for a child whose parents are temporarily or permanently unable to care for him or her. Adoption in the former sense is forbidden in Islam, while fostering is highly recommended. Nevertheless, it would be incorrect to say that "Islam forbids adoption," since some forms of adoption, like "open adoptions," which are becoming more popular in Western societies, are similar to Islamic foster arrangements. In addition, some societies use the term "partial adoption" to signify the Islamically validated foster relationship. At the same time, in examining the practice of adoption in Muslim societies, it must be recognized that legal norms are not definitive in influencing social practice. Extra-legal practices like secret adoptions and various accommodations leading to ambiguous foster relationships can be found in diverse Muslim societies.

The primary textual reference prohibiting the creation of fictive biological relationships, including adoption and the practice known as zihār, by which a man divorces his wife by calling her his "mother," is Qur'an 4:5. Before the implementation of this prohibition, early Muslims continued the pre-Islamic form of adoption that could entail "an erasure of natal identity" (Bargach 2002, 27). References to this practice indicate that adoptees were usually, if not always, male. In Arab tribal society, dominance was achieved by being able to martial large numbers of fighting men. The adoption of male children and even adults was one way to increase this number, in addition to fathering large numbers of children by multiple wives and concubines, or acquiring male slaves. In many cases, adoption was closely linked to enslavement, which gave captors the power to strip captives of their natal identities and appropriate them into their own families.

Children in pre-Islamic Arabia were also adopted for typical emotional reasons, such as pity for a needy child or because of an inability to bear children. Before the Qur'anic verse prohibiting adoption was revealed, the Prophet Muḥammad himself freed and adopted a slave boy given to him by his wife, calling him "the son of (ibn) Muḥammad." After the revelation, Zayd took the name of his biological father, and was henceforth known as "Zayd ibn Ḥāritha." There are reports that this change took place in connection with Zayd's divorce of his wife, whom the Prophet then married. This action emphasized the difference between real parenthood and adoption, since marriage to a woman who has ever been married to one's son is forbidden by Qur'an 4:22–4. Nevertheless, as Bargach argues, the prohibition on adoption cannot be linked to an isolated event in the Prophet's life, since it was clearly necessitated by the importance placed on lineage (nasab) in the Islamic revelation (Bargach 2002, 56–62).

Fostering is an important theme in the biography of the Prophet. Since his father died before his birth, the Prophet's grandfather assumed guardianship (walāya) over him. When 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib died, the Prophet's uncle, Abū Ṭālib, became his guardian. A custom in pre-Islamic Arabia, Islam made it a legal obligation for male relatives to provide maintenance (nafaqa) and protection for orphaned children. A fatherless child is considered an "orphan" (yatīm) even if his or her mother is still living. The duty to care for orphans is a significant theme of the Qur'anic and Prophetic sayings. Oft-cited is the Prophetic saying, "I and the sponsor (kafil) of an orphan will be like this in Paradise (and he held up two fingers close together)" (Bukhārī 1997, viii, 34).

In most schools of Islamic law, a needy orphan has the right to maintenance from a male relative even if the mother retains custody (hadāna) of the child (Nasir 1990, 173–89 197–200). It is not uncommon for the brother of a man who has died leaving children to marry his brother's widow in order to provide the kind of support and supervision for his nephews and nieces that he would for his own children. In traditional societies, if such a man is already married, a polygamous marriage is usually the result. As polygamy becomes less common in modern societies, the uncle's support may be limited to financial assistance.

Children whose fathers are poverty-stricken or unable to adequately care for them also have a right to support from legally designated relatives. Sometimes the child is temporarily placed in the custody of these relatives, to ensure regular maintenance and supervision (as is reported about the Prophet Muḥammad, who brought his young cousin ‘Alī into his household). In some cases, this fostering arrangement is carried a step further, and poor parents give their children away to relatives for adoption. In most Muslim societies, it is understood that Islamic law gives every person the right to know and benefit from his or her true natal identity. Nevertheless, some children are not told about their biological parents until they reach adolescence. In this case, the arrangement might best be described as temporary adoption, since the child grows up initially unaware of his different status within the family.

Fostering and adoption by relatives is also a means for dealing with infertility in many Muslim societies. A childless couple may be given a child by a relative – usually a brother or sister – who has more than one child. Sometimes this is done with the goal of stimulating conception, since there are reports in many societies, Muslim and non-Muslim, of previously childless women conceiving after adoption. In most cases, the main goal is to allow a childless couple to share in the joy of raising a child. This is usually done out of a sense of empathy for the couple, but in some traditional cultures, for example, among the Chinese Kazakhs, this is more of an obligation (Svanberg 1994, 241). Among the Kazakhs, it is also traditionally understood that grandparents have a right to adopt their eldest grandchild, so they will not be lonely in a house without small children. The emotional impact on the child has not been well studied, but there are suggestions that there are few problems in traditional societies in which group identity is paramount. However, in modern societies, in which the nuclear family is idealized and individuality is cultivated, youths may be emotionally devastated when they learn that they were given away as children in such an arrangement.

Due to Islamic restrictions on interaction between unrelated members of the opposite sex, it is less common for Muslims to assume custody of unrelated children than related children. Islamic law prohibits a man from being alone with a woman unless he is her mahram, and requires women to wear hijāb in front of non-mahram men. These regulations do not generally apply to children, but would affect a foster child who has reached puberty. Breastfeeding an unrelated child is a means of removing these barriers. In Islamic law, suckling (radāʿa) establishes a biological relationship that results in the same marriage prohibitions (tabrīmāt) that entail from a birth relationship. Consequently, not only the foster mother, but also her sister or other close female relatives, can suckle a child to establish a relationship of tabrīm among them. In modern times, women have been able to use lactation drugs to stimulate their ability to feed a foster child. Legal schools differ about the number of feedings needed to establish this relationship; five or ten feedings is the average. Most legal schools also require that the child be under a certain age, usually two years, for a nursing relationship to have legal effect. There is a ḥadīth, however, that the Prophet allowed this to be done for older, even post-pubescent children (Muslim 1929, x, 31–3).

Although suckling establishes a biological relationship, it does not establish maintenance and inheritance rights. Foster children, therefore, have no share in the inheritance designated for children in the Qurʾān (4:7–12). However, any Muslim can will up to one-third of his or her estate to a person who does not have a right to inherit, and foster children often benefit from this (Glander 2001, 118). In addition, during their lifetimes, Muslims may freely gift their property to any party or interest. The family trust (waqf) has traditionally been used in Muslim societies to ensure a stable income (and sometimes social status) for vulnerable family members, including daughters, handicapped children, freed slaves, and foster children.

The severe negative social and legal consequences for extra-marital sexual activity among Muslims have traditionally been a major deterrent to the acknowledgment and legitimization of any child born out of wedlock. Abortion, although generally prohibited in Islamic law, has always been available in Muslim societies, and certainly is used to prevent the birth of illegitimate children (Musallam 1983). Illegitimate children are sometimes abandoned anonymously, although abandonment can also be due to dire poverty. Islamic law gives the finder the right to guardianship of the foundling (laqīṭ), unless he or she is unfit for this responsibility (Nasir 1990, 168–9). To protect the child from living with the stigma of illegitimate birth, guardians and authorities often create respectable identities for the child. For example, guardians may claim that a child is the offspring of distant relatives who have died. In some cases, women who are expecting to take custody of an abandoned or illegitimate child fake a pregnancy before bringing the child home (Rugh 1995, 134). These “secret adoptions” are always motivated by a desire to avoid shame: the shame of being an illegitimate child, the shame of an illicit pregnancy, or the shame of infertility.

Compared with medieval Europe, orphanages have never been common in traditional Muslim societies. With changing social norms and the weakening of the extended family under the pressures of modernity, however, orphanages have been established in greater numbers in Muslim societies. It is also possible that the establishment of orphanages, like the establishment of public schools, hospitals, and other modern state institutions, was a factor that led to the weakening of the traditional extended family in Muslim societies, and subverted widespread informal arrangements for the care of children. Increased regulation of adoption and fostering arrangements has had similar results. For example, in 1993, after there was a highly publicized case of a center for abandoned babies allegedly selling them, Morocco made it a crime to abandon a child, and set up a special procedure that a woman must follow to give up her child. Obviously, few women feel comfortable meeting with a state bureaucrat to discuss their need to abandon a child because of poverty or an illicit relationship. Consequently, more Moroccan women have resorted to infanticide, abortions, or secret adoptions since this law was established (Bargach 2002, 38–41). Additionally, poor people often find it difficult to negotiate the bureaucratic procedures necessary to adopt a child, and some states permit only married couples to adopt. In Morocco, for example, unmarried women have not been permitted to adopt individually, but can only work as state appointed “mothers” to groups of orphaned children in the internationally affiliated SOS Children’s Villages (Bargach 2002, 41, Glander 2001, 97).

In modern times, the establishment of orphanages has increasingly been considered an appropriate solution to the problem of large numbers of children displaced or orphaned by war. Many Muslim countries reject international adoption as a way to provide homes for these children, arguing that they have a right to be under the guardianship of individuals who share their culture and religion. Over the two decades of conflict in Afghanistan, for example, all Afghan leaders rejected international adoption, but accepted foreign aid to provide better services within their communities for needy children. Increasingly, Islamic charitable organizations operating internationally have adopted Western-style sponsorships for the support of poor or orphaned children.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Bargach, Orphans of Islam. Family, abandonment, and secret adoption in Morocco, Lanham, Md. 2002.
 Muḥammad ibn Ismāʿil al-Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, trans. M. M. Khan, 9 vols., Riyadh 1997.

- J. Chelhod, Radaʿ, in EP, viii, 361–2.
 G. Djuric, Muslims and the law of adoption in Yugoslavia, in Islamic and Comparative Law Quarterly 1 (1981), 39–50.
 A. Giladi, Infants, parents and wet nurses. Medieval Islamic views on breastfeeding and their social implications, Leiden 1999.
 A. Glander, The Oriental child not born in wedlock. A study of the anthropological parameters, religious motivations and sociological phenomena of child care in Islam and Judaism, Frankfurt am Main 2001.
 D. Latifi, Adoption and the Muslim law, in Journal of the Indian Law Institute, 16 (1974), 118–22.
 A. Laylish, Bequests as an instrument for accommodating inheritance rules. Israel as a case study, in Islamic Law and Society 2:3 (1995), 282–319.
 ———, The family waqf and the Sharʿa law of succession in modern times, in Islamic Law and Society 4:3 (1997), 352–88.
 B. F. Musallam, Sex and society in Islam, Cambridge 1983.
 J. J. Nasir, The Islamic law of personal status, London 1986, 1990².
 A. B. Rugh, Orphanages in Egypt. Contradiction or affirmation in a family-oriented society, in E. W. Fernea (ed.), Children in the Muslim Middle East, Austin, Tex. 1995, 124–41.
Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim bi-sharḥ al-Nawawī, 18 vols., Beirut 1929.
 A. E. Sonbol, Adoption in Islamic society. A historical survey, in E. W. Fernea (ed.), Children in the Muslim Middle East, Austin, Tex. 1995, 45–67.
 I. Svanberg, Xinjiang Kazak adoption practices, in Central Asiatic Journal 38:2 (1994), 235–43.

INGRID MATTSON

Central Asia and the Caucasus

The attitude to adoption and fostering varies according to the historical moment. During the Islamic period, the act of adoption was equated with savab, an act of generosity that would be rewarded by God. In periods of wars and natural disasters, this attitude is reinforced. During the Soviet period there was a solicitous attitude toward children abandoned or left without parents. This is exemplified by the celebrated case of the Uzbek family of Shoahman and Bahry Somjuradov who adopted 14 children of different nationalities during the Second World War. As the male population was away from home fighting during the war, the basic responsibility for fostering during this period lay on women’s shoulders. Many families adopted or gave temporary shelter to children during the postwar period in the Soviet Union.

In the republics of Central Asia and the Caucasus, women’s participation in decision-making about adoption and custodianship has taken new forms during the post-Soviet period. An increase in divorce and demographic and gender imbalance in the postwar period led to a reduction of the number of families with both husband and wife and an increase in the number of single women; for many of them creating a family was only possible through adoption or fostering of children from large families of close relatives, and in rare cases from children's homes (no statistical data available).

During the modern period, the process of adoption and fostering in the countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus has been regulated by law; the family and civil codes have corresponding chapters and articles, reflecting the order of adoption and guardianship and the rights of adopters and trustees, as well as the rights of potentially adopted children. In all the post-Soviet countries there are bureaus that regulate the legal order of adoption, fostering, and trusteeship. Although under the legislation the relative rights of men and women in the family to guardianship or adoption are not specified, the material and economic status of adopters influences the decisions of the Commission for Adoption and Fostering. Thus in Muslim families where in most cases the sole bread winner is the man, the woman has no independent means to maintain a child and consequently cannot apply for adoption or custodianship independently.

In secular states, children who are left without parental care are handed over for education to a family for adoption, trusteeship, or guardianship. If no such family is available, children are placed in an institution (educational or medical establishments, establishments for the population's social protection).

Under the family legislation, both spouses have the right to adopt. "Upon the adoption of a child by one of spouses the consent of the other spouse to adoption is required unless the child is adopted by both spouses. The consent of the spouse is not required if this spouse has discontinued family relations, has not lived with the family for more than a year, and the residence of the spouse is not known" (Family Code of the Republic Uzbekistan, Section IV, Chapter 19, 157).

Adopters can be adult citizens of either sex. The difference in the age between the adopter and the adoptee varies within the limits of 15 and 16 years, except in cases of adoption by a stepfather or a stepmother.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- The family code of the Republic of Uzbekistan* [in Russian], 1996.
The family code of the Republic of Azerbaijan [in Azerbaijani], 2000.
Law of the Republic of Kazakhstan on marriage and family [in Russian], 1998.
 V. Nalivkin and M. Nalivkina, A sketch of the domestic life of women in a settled local population of Ferghana [in Russian], Kazan 1886.

G. Rakhimova and J. Nuriev, A Turkmen family. Traditions, customs, and rites [in Russian], Ashgabat 1988.

MARFUA TOKHTAKHODJAEVA
AND ALMAZ KADIROVA

North Africa

There is a consensus in formal Islamic jurisprudence that adoption is prohibited. Adoption here means the canceling of birth affiliation and the creation of fictive kinship by a non-related party where name, succession, and inheritance rights of the child are legally created as though the non-related party were a biological parent. It is the absence of the biological bond with such a child that makes this practice dangerous, as explained in Sunnī rites; it alienates these legal heirs, it may lead to incest, and it may also cause havoc to the structure of the family. Islam as a religion, as a source of legislation, and as an ethos advocates and protects the rights of orphans because they are bereft of the protective net that a family and a clan give to their individual members. Islamic jurisprudence is, however, quite clear about not mixing between registers: orphans, children born out of wedlock, and foundlings (laqīṭ) cannot be adopted by a family, but can only be the recipient of the gift of care (kafāla) and good deeds.

This position finds its root in the episode commonly known in the Sharī'a as that of Zayd b. Ḥāritha, formally known as Zayd b. Muḥammad after the Prophet adopted him in keeping with pre-Islamic traditions. The Prophet married Zaynab, Zayd's former wife, a marriage that was considered incestuous by the standards of the time and that thus constituted symbolically a definite rupture with pre-existing beliefs. Today in most nation-states where family laws are inspired or influenced by the Sharī'a, there is a prohibition on adoption. In North Africa, with the exception of Tunisia where secular family law (majalla) gives full legal status to adoption, family codes (mudawwana for Morocco and qānūn al-usra for Algeria) only recognize affiliation within legally established marriages, though they do offer the possibility of kafāla to foundlings.

In this patriarchal social order, it is formally the name of the father and the father's affiliation that are considered to be legally important while women's agency is viewed as instrumental and not important in and of itself. Although adoption is officially prohibited in North Africa, there are extensive and culturally legitimized forms of secret adoptions, fostering practices, intra- and extra-family exchange of children, swapping of children, or entrusting them to individuals/families, the majority of which take place outside, and are at times contrary to, the legal norms in place. Such practices are a common heritage and shared by all social strata. The institutional codes come into play only in dire cases of inheritance or larger family conflicts while, generally speaking, what constitutes a family in the cultural imaginary transcends those legally delimited relations.

Research shows that it is women who are the primary instigators and actors in these other forms of adoptive transactions. The reasons for this can be explained through educational and practical terms; first, girls' education and socializing processes still emphasize, and at times exclusively maintain, that the ideal role for the woman is that of the procreating mother. Marriage is therefore merely instrumental for begetting offspring and families bereft of children are considered abnormal and sterility is viewed as a curse; kafāla and other alternative forms of adoption endow a woman with a raison d'être in terms of the role she and her culture have created for her. Second, birthing, nurturing, and rearing of newborns occur in largely circumscribed female spaces and hence circulation of information is simple and informal transactions are easily carried through. Most women prefer to adopt girls rather than boys as little girls are seen as allies and as potential household support and worthwhile emotional investment by their putative mothers; girls are, therefore, a scarcity in most centers for abandoned babies in the three countries.

In Morocco and Algeria legal kafāla is state controlled and obeys institutional norms, and the same is true for open adoption in Tunisia. Abandoned babies are usually born in or brought to centers where they are taken care of until they are chosen by a family or an individual. Those babies who are not selected are sent to orphanages (either state owned or run by philanthropists) at different age limits. In each country, a number of administrative steps need to be fulfilled prior to a child being taken home by a family (or individual) because, in Morocco and Algeria, children are considered wards of the state and are only entrusted to families for their upkeep; legally the kafāla party cannot be considered a parent. In Tunisia the name of the adoptive party is given to the adopted child; in Morocco and Algeria names differ as they are markers of paternal affiliation, which can officially only be the outcome of birth within a legal marriage. Outside the legal frame, however, and when women contract a secret adoption with the approval of their husbands, or swap children with neighbors or other family members, they create a family unit that emu-lates the biological one and there are no legal constraints on parenting. In the cases of secret adoptions, families pretend the child has been legally born while in other cases various means of agreement may be worked out to the benefit of all parties concerned. Young women who give birth outside marriage, a terrible crime in societies where the code of honor and shame still structure women's lives, often give up their newborn in public spaces, to intermediaries, to other women and individuals for their own survival. This practice is widespread although it is difficult to track such traffic empirically as it is not only illegal but a highly taboo topic. Some non-governmental organizations in Morocco and Algeria have started working with young mothers who refuse to abandon their newborns as the shared belief is that only a biological family can be an ideal environment for any child. This is especially true for the case of children born out of wedlock given that the larger social environment brands them with as bastards, a violent stigma and a means of exclusion that can at least be tempered by the mother's presence.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Bargach, Orphans of Islam. Family, abandonment, and secret adoption in Morocco, New York 2002.
 A. Gil'adi, Children of Islam. Concepts of childhood in medieval Muslim society, London 1992.
 L. Lamber, Children in changing families. A study of adoption and illegitimacy, London 1980.
 A. Rugh, Within the circle. Parents and children in an Arab village, New York 1997.

JAMILA BARGACH

Turkey

Ancient Turkic tribes had different motives and practices regarding adoption. Among Yakut Turks adoption was made for humane reasons, while wealthier Uygur Turks utilized it for servitude and slavery. But whatever the purpose was, the adopted child's rights of inheritance were equal to those of biological children and the prohibition of marriage with family members was equally applied to them. Only men had the right to adopt children, and they could adopt both sexes.

The custom of adoption existed in Arabian communities until the revelation of the Qur'anic verse saying that adopted children could not bear the father's name and that there would be no prohibition of marriage with them abolished adoption in Islamic law (Qur'an 33). Nevertheless, the care of orphans, and rearing and marrying them, came to be regarded as a pious act (sevap). Polygamy is a recommended means to protect girl orphans from deprivation. Islamic law suggests foster-family and marriage institutions instead of legal adoption, although adoption as a term still exists.

The term evlatlık (adopted child) referred to fostering in Turkey. It was also used to categorize the stepchildren of the husband. Wives did not have the right to accept a stepchild as evlatlık. Different words, such as ahiretlik, besleme, and yanışma were strictly related to the Islamic tradition of fostering, and socially degraded the child's status. However, ironically, as these children's actual position declined in households, the term evlatlık gained more common use.

Muslim households overwhelmingly preferred girls for fostering in Turkey. Since the fostered boy would have the status of a stranger, the women in the household would have to be careful regarding their veiling. This was one of the reasons why mainly girls were chosen. They were used for domestic labor as they learned their gender role. Moreover, they were semi-legitimate sexual objects for the male members of the household, as in the case of domestic slaves. The potential of the fostered girl has been the subject of numerous novels, short stories, and diaries in Turkey.

The practice of fostering children spread with the waves of mass migration and wars in Ottoman society. The critical date for this was 1864, when over a million Caucasian migrants entered Ottoman territory and started to sell their girls and women as slaves. In order to restrict the slave trade, the government distributed unprotected girls and women to Muslim middle-class families as evlatlıks. This official arrangement redefined and in consequence degraded the status of evlatlıks. Very often they were treated like domestic slaves or servants. This policy formed an example for later governments. During the succession of wars from 1911 to 1922, internal conflicts and mass migration resulted in the emergence of thousands of orphans in need of protection. While boys were sent to boarding schools, the military, or to workshops as apprentices, girls were made servants to urban Muslim families where they would be called evlatlık.

The republican government abolished Islamic law and promulgated an adjusted Swiss Civil Code in 1926. The new order allowed individuals who did not have children and were over age 40 to legally adopt any person who was at least 18 years younger than themselves. Adoption contracts had to be made in state courts. Adopted children had all the rights and duties of biological children.

Legal adoption conflicted with the ongoing practice of having evlatlıks as well as with Islamic law. The new law therefore permitted the adopter to prepare an additional official contract to restrain the inheritance rights of the adopted child. Moreover, if he wanted to marry his adopted child, he could repress his adopter status, again through a court decision. The adopted child had the right to inherit from her/his biological parents as well. These items aimed to avoid religious dispute on legal adoption.

The Civil Code did not ban the tradition of having evlatlıks. For years poverty and misery urged peasants to give away or sell their daughters of ages six to seven to urban families. But with the prohibition of slavery and slavery-like practices in 1964, the tradition of having evlatlıks faded away. Although girl child labor in domestic work is still present, they are no longer described as evlatlıks.

The foster-family program, which was established in 1949, aims to provide temporary homes for unprotected children until age 18. The government pays the expenses of fostered children to the families, and supervises them periodically. It never became popular, partly because officials had to be very strict with the families to end the exploitation of girls embedded in cultural practices.

In 2001, a different civil law was enacted in Turkey. Legal adoption rules became milder. The minimum age limit for the adopter was lowered to 30, and this was disregarded for couples with five years of marriage. Legal adoption is becoming increasingly popular in Turkey. There are thousands of families on the government waiting list. Girls under age two are preferred, although gender balance exists among the children already adopted.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Caferoğlu, Türk taamül hukukunda evlatlık müessesesi (Adoption institute in Turkish customary law), in Türk Hukuk ve İktisat Tarihi Mecmuası 2 (1939), 97-113.
- M. Emre, İslam'da kadın ve aile (Women and family in Islam), İstanbul 1981.
- Y. S. Karakışla, Savaş yetimleri ve kimsesiz çocuklar. Ermeni mi Türk mü? (War orphans and unprotected children. Were they Armenian or Turkish?), in Toplumsal Tarih 46 (1999), 46-55.
- F. Özbay, Evlatlıklar (Adopted children), İletişim (forthcoming).
- I. Parlatur, Tanzimat edebiyatında kölelik (Slavery in nineteenth-century renovation fiction), İstanbul 1992.
- F. H. Saymen, Türk medeni hukuku. Umumi prensipler (Turkish civil law. General principles), İstanbul 1948.
- Ö. Şen, 19. Yüzyılda Osmanlı devleti'ndeki köle ticaretinde Kafkasya göçmenlerinin rolü (The role of Caucasian migrants in the slave trade of the Ottoman Empire in the nineteenth century, in Dünyü ve Bugünüyle Toplum ve Ekonomi 6 (1994), 171-92.

Apostasy

Overview

Radical Islamists have often filed charges of apostasy and blasphemy against secular Muslim intellectuals. Early in the twentieth century, for example, the charge of apostasy was brought against prominent intellectuals such as Tāhā Ḥusayn and ‘Alī ‘Abd al-Rāziq. It was not, however, used against Muslim women activists until 1989, the year of the apostasy suit against Salman Rushdie, when Jordanian Islamists filed a suit for apostasy against an outspoken Jordanian television talk-show host, Tūjān al-Fayṣal. Since then the charge has become almost routine. In 1990, during the build-up to the Gulf War, the charge of apostasy was used against Saudi women who illegally drove their cars in protest against the ban on women driving. The women drivers were suspended from their jobs and required to pay substantial fines. The charge of apostasy was also used in an attempt to discredit feminist activists in Morocco. In 1992, it was brought against the Bangladeshi author Taslima Nasreen who went into exile for her safety. In 1996, Islamist lawyers sued Naṣr Abū Zayd, professor of Arabic at Cairo University, for apostasy. A court found him guilty and he and his wife left Egypt to avoid being forcibly divorced. In 2001, a lawyer accused the Egyptian physician, writer, and feminist activist Nawāl al-Sa‘dāwī of apostasy and argued that she be divorced from her husband. In 2002, religious conservatives charged the interim Afghan government’s minister for women’s affairs, Sima Samar, with blasphemy for allegedly saying in an interview with a Persian newspaper in Canada that she did not believe in Sharī’a law, which she insisted she did not say. On 25 June 2002, Afghanistan’s supreme court dropped the blasphemy charge citing lack of evidence, but Afghan President Hamid Karzai did not reappoint Samar minister for women’s affairs. Many of these charges would appear to be politically motivated. What is the legal justification for the charges?

Takfīr (pronouncement of unbelief against someone) is a rather imprecise term, which is often translated as “accusation of apostasy.” The terms ridḍa or irtidād (renunciation of faith), kufr, (disbelief), and bid‘a (non-Sharī’a innovation) do not readily correspond to their English translations and are often used almost synonymously. The principle sources of Sharī’a (Islamic law), Qur’ān, sunna (the tradition of the Prophet), ijmā (scholarly consensus), and qiyās (analogy to other legal principles), offer contradictory views on the question of apostasy. The Qur’ān does not give a penalty for apostasy and contains frequently quoted passages that call for freedom of religion. For example, “No compulsion is there in religion. Rectitude has become clear from error. So whosoever disbelieves in idols and believes in God, has laid hold of the most firm handle, unbreaking; God is All-hearing, All-knowing” (2:256); “Say: ‘The truth is from your Lord; so let whosoever will believe, and let whosoever will disbelieve’” (18:30). On the other hand, many other passages indicate that apostates will meet a harsh fate. For example, “Those that believe not in the signs of God God will not guide; there awaits them a painful chastisement. They only forge falsehood, who believe not in the signs of God, and those – they are the liars. Whoso disbelieves in God, after he has believed – excepting him who has been compelled, and his heart is still at rest in his belief – but whosever’s breast is expanded in unbelief, upon them shall rest anger from God, and there awaits them a mighty chastisement” (16:107).

The sunna contains more unequivocal condemnations of apostasy than does the Qur’ān. Among the most commonly cited ḥadīth on apostasy are: “The blood of a fellow Muslim should never be shed except in three cases: that of the adulterer, the murderer, and whoever forsakes the religion of Islam” (Bukharī), and, “Whosoever changes his religion, kill him” (Bukharī). The four law schools agree that the penalty for apostasy is death, but there are many conditions and qualifications preceding such a judgment. An apostate (murtadd) must associate other gods alongside Allah, defame the Prophet, treat the Qur’ān with contempt, or deny fundamental beliefs such as the existence of the Day of Judgment. Typically two adult witnesses must testify as to the apostasy of the accused who may deny the charges, proclaim his or her faith, and/or repent and return to Islam. Usually a period of three days is given for the accused to reconsider and repent. There are contradictory views as to whether women apostates should be killed or imprisoned and beaten. Both men and women convicted of apostasy lose their property rights and must be divorced from their Muslim spouses.

Few if any of the individuals accused of apostasy in recent times considered themselves to be apostates. Indeed many took pains to state their adherence to Islam, which should invalidate the apostasy suits. The legality of apostasy charges is also unclear since most Muslim states do not have a law of apostasy. Law codes are typically based on several sources: British or French colonial law, Shari'a, customary law, and in some cases, tribal law. Most Muslim states have retained Shari'a law only pertaining to marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance. Governments from North Africa to Southeast Asia, however, in response to pressure from religious conservatives, have been trying to strengthen Shari'a law. At the same time these governments have been facing pressure from international and local advocates of Muslim women's human rights for the liberalization of Shari'a based personal status laws. The apostasy suits against Tūjān al-Fayṣal and Nawāl al-Sa'dāwī, because they resulted in extensive international attention and legal and political reforms, will serve to illustrate this clash of legal and social standards.

In 1989, Tūjān al-Fayṣal, the Jordanian talk-show host, was among twelve women who ran for parliament. As an opening salvo to her campaign, al-Fayṣal published an article entitled "Yushtimūnā wa-nantakhibūhum," (They curse us and we elect them) in al-Ra'y, a government-owned newspaper. In her article, she ridiculed the Islamists who subscribed to a well-known ḥadīth that "woman by nature is deficient in intellect and religion" and who believed that "women were predictable and guided by their emotions, legal minors who need a male guardian to run their affairs." She sarcastically remarked that since the Islamists believe that "women are limited by their reproductive functions the best women must be those who are not mothers." She complained that they sugarcoat their views on women's deficiencies by praising women's femininity and decency, but when women demand their freedom and equal rights they accuse them of wanting to "abandon tradition."

Three weeks after the publication of this article, she received a subpoena to appear at the south Amman Islamic court on Tuesday, 17 October 1989. The two plaintiffs were an assistant mufti and a private in Jordan's armed forces. The charge was apostasy from Islam. Jordan, however, had no apostasy law and several Islamic courts refused to accept the case. Finally, the Islamic court in Wihdat, south Amman, agreed to hear it. The plaintiffs' lawyer accused al-Fayṣal of apostasy, heresy, and ridiculing the Qur'ān, the ḥadīth, and the Shari'a. He added, "Men of religion had tried to warn her of the danger of her words and had asked her to write an article asking for forgiveness and expressing her repentance, but that she had persisted in her infidelity." He asked the court "to declare her an apostate, to divorce her from her husband, to refuse her repentance, to ban her articles, to prevent the media from dealing with her, and to grant permission to spill her blood." The two plaintiffs then signed a document, submitted it to the court and their wakīl had a copy presented to al-Fayṣal's lawyer.

The charge that al-Fayṣal had called for four husbands per woman caused a sensation. At various election rallies she had asked, "If men can have four wives why not women four husbands?" The fact that she repeatedly insisted that she was trying to point out that men should not have four wives any more than women should have four husbands made no difference to her accusers. In her response to the charges, she responded, "I am a Muslim and I say that God is one and Muḥammad is the Prophet of God. So they have no ground for their case in Islam, because only God can judge if a person is sincere." She said they attacked her because she drew on Islamic laws to defend women's rights and had threatened them in their own domain. In Jordan, women's rights are embodied in the laws of personal status governing marriage, divorce, child custody, alimony, and inheritance, which are weighted against women, but, as al-Fayṣal pointed out, Article 6:22-23 of the 1946 Jordanian constitution, grants women "political, economic, and social equality." In addition, Jordan signed the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which reaffirms the equality of men and women. The personal status laws therefore contradict the constitution and the UDHR. Al-Fayṣal effectively made the case against her a violation of her constitutional and human rights.

In the elections, all twelve women candidates lost while the Islamists and their allies made substantial gains in parliament. The day after the election, the judge ruled that the Islamic court did not have the competence to decide al-Fayṣal's case. The plaintiffs, however, did not give up. In January 1990, al-Fayṣal received another summons. A court of appeal had agreed to hear the part of the case concerning divorce from her husband because of her alleged apostasy, which it said was within its competence. This time al-Fayṣal went to court supported by a large and vocal crowd of local and international activists and by prior arrangement, simply repeated the shabāda before the qāḍī. She neither rescinded nor apologized for her views. After hearing al-Fayṣal's statement, the court found no proof of apostasy and declared her innocent of all charges.

The international response was even greater when Nawāl al-Sa'dāwī was charged with apostasy. In 2001, al-Sa'dāwī was the best known of the Arab feminist or women activists, the international women's human rights movement was burgeoning, and the Internet had become a major tool of communication. The case began when a lawyer asked the prosecutor-general to put her on trial for "deriding Islam and ridiculing its fundamental principles." He said he was motivated by an interview published in the independent weekly, al-Midan, in early March, 2001, in which al-Sa'dāwī stated, as she often has, that the veil was not obligatory. He alleged that she had claimed that the Islamic pilgrimage was a vestige of pagan practices and that the Islamic inheritance law, which gives males twice the share of females, should be abolished due to the fact that up to 35 percent of families in Egypt are currently dependent on the income of a woman. Nawāl al-Sa'dāwī issued a statement on 18 May 2001 that was immediately posted on her website and read around the world. She argued that the case was an attempt to make scapegoats of two intellectuals, herself and her husband, Sharīf Ḥatāta, who had both been active in the struggle for democracy and human rights. She insisted that she had only said that caring for the poor was more important than religious rituals and that kissing the Black Stone in the Ka'ba was considered by some Islamic scholars to be a "historical vestige of paganism adopted by the Prophet with the aim of rallying the tribes of Mecca under the banner of Islam." Al-Sa'dāwī cited Article 40 of the Egyptian constitution: "that all citizens are considered equal before the law, that they have the same obligations and enjoy equal rights, that they should not be discriminated against for reasons of gender, race, language or belief." As al-Fayṣal had done a dozen years earlier, al-Sa'dāwī argued that the Islamists were using religion to further their struggles for political power.

Like Jordan, Egypt has both secular and Sharī'a laws and no law of apostasy. Article Two of its amended constitution, however, states, "Islamic Sharī'a is the basis of legislation." Unlike Jordan, ḥisba, regulation of public morality, is legal in Egypt, which loosely follows the Ḥanafī law school. Ḥisba traditionally allowed any Muslim to sue another for beliefs that may harm society, but because of recent abuses it had been amended so that a private citizen must request the state prosecutor to bring suit.

In May 2001, the prosecutor-general's office dismissed the ḥisba case, but the Cairo personal status court decided to consider al-Sa'dāwī's forced separation from her husband. Journalists, lawyers, human rights activists, and private citizens from Egypt, the Arab world, Europe, and North America rallied to her defense. After several postponements, on 30 July, the court rejected the forcible divorce case and ruled that no individual can petition a court to forcibly divorce another person.

Both of these cases were sensationalized in the international media and were major embarrassments for their respective governments. Both lawsuits were apparently more political than religious in intent, both were well outside the boundaries of traditional Sharī'a law, and the presiding judges eventually dropped both of them. Nevertheless their legal importance should not be underestimated. Taken together the lawsuits illustrate the intense and ongoing confrontation between advocates of Sharī'a law and advocates of secular constitutional and international human rights law over the freedom of women activists to call for political and social reform.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. J. Adams, Kufr, in J. L. Esposito (ed.), The Oxford encyclopedia of the modern Islamic world, New York 1995, ii, 439-43.
- A. A. An-Na'im, The Islamic law of apostasy and its modern applicability. A case from the Sudan, in Religion 16 (1986), 197-224.
- A. J. Arberry, The Koran interpreted, New York 1970.
- M. Cook, Commanding right and forbidding wrong in Islamic thought, New York 2000.
- C. W. Ernst, Blasphemy. Islamic concept, in M. Eliade (ed.), The encyclopedia of religion, New York 1987, 242-5.
- N. Gallagher, Human rights on trial in Jordan. The triumph of Toujan al-Faisal, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995, 209-31.
- M. H. Kamali, Freedom of expression in Islam, Cambridge 1997.
- I. A. Karawan, Takfir, in The Oxford encyclopedia of the modern Islamic world, New York 1995, iv, 178-9.
- I. Zaman, Bid'ah, in The Oxford encyclopedia of the modern Islamic world, New York 1995, v, 1, 215-16.

NANCY GALLAGHER

Armenian Women

Overview

Any discussion of Armenian women must take into consideration that they have been part of a large minority dispersed in the Ottoman Empire and Iran, concentrated in Anatolia, Iranian Azerbaijan, and Isfahan, and after the First World War in Arab lands. The study of Armenian women is fairly new and therefore limited, suffering from unevenness in scholarship and leading at times to generalizations, especially but not exclusively about the premodern period. While these communities share much with each other and the Muslim majority populations, attention must be paid to historical and regional variations when discussing women in Armenian religious doctrine and practices and Armenian women's lives within the larger Muslim communities.

The Armenian Apostolic Church does not allow the ecclesiastical ministry of women, yet there have been throughout history expressions of lay spirituality in the form of women saints and martyred virgins, scribes, members of women's guilds, parish councils, and diocesan delegations as well as nuns and deaconesses. According to church history, saints such as the fourth-century Sandukht, Gayane, and Hripsime (whose martyrdom ultimately led to the conversion of the Armenian king in the early fourth century) were among the first Armenian martyrs. Scribes, some of whom were virgins, while others such as the seventeenth-century Margarit were "the captive soul beset by sin, tossed about by life and perishing in the depths of iniquity, full of evil in spirit" (Oghlukian 1994, 27), have been responsible in small or large part for the preservation of several dozen manuscripts (Tsovakan 1954, 133–5).

NUNS AND DEACONESES

Nuns within the Armenian church existed throughout the medieval period up to the twentieth century in places such as Jerusalem, New Julfa, and Istanbul (Ervine 1999, 129). The history of the female deaconate goes at least as far back as the tenth century, possibly earlier. In the nineteenth century, deaconesses were present in Armenian convents such as St. Catherine's convent in New Julfa and the Galfayan convent in Istanbul, with the last deaconess being ordained in 1982. St.

Catherine's convent is a great example of the strong social consciousness of women's lay activity in seeing to orphanages, hospitals, and so forth (Arat 2000, 153–89). Although canonical books of the fourth to the eight centuries remark on women, direct mention of deaconesses is made only in manuscript ritual books (mashtots) from the ninth to the eleventh centuries; after the twelfth century, ritual and other books appear with ordination rights for deaconesses (Arat 2000, 90–1, 98, 100–1, Thomson 2000, 278). Based on eighteenth- and nineteenth-century sources, it becomes clear that the duties of the deaconess were limited to conducting the liturgy of hours in the convent, proclaiming the Gospel, singing, bringing the chalice, and using incense during Holy Mass (Arat 2000, 110). Some medieval clerical writers rejected the female deaconate altogether, even prohibiting the testimony in court of women and "crushing grapes for the production of wine for the Holy Mass" (Arat 2000, 106). The opposition of medieval clerics seems to draw its justification from the conviction that women were "impure" (Arat 2000, 107, Oghlukian 1994, 42).

USE OF MUSLIM COURTS

Medieval "de-scriptive and pre-scriptive texts" (Thomson 2000, 15) such as the Lawcode of Mkhitar Gosh, whose main purpose was to prevent Christian Armenians from resorting to Muslim courts, shed light on ecclesiastical laws regulating women's behavior in marriage and divorce as well as providing a view into the social lives of medieval Armenian women (Thomson 2000, 47, 52). The issue of the use of Muslim courts is an interesting one; recent studies show that non-Muslim minorities, including women, used Sharī'a courts in almost all cities of the Ottoman Empire, including Damascus and Istanbul (al-Qattan 1999, 429). According to eighteenth-century court records of the Galata region of Istanbul, a large number of Armenian and Greek women resorted to the courts because of their dissatisfaction with their communities' inheritance practices (Göçek and Baer 1996, 57). Similarly, in Damascus, while minorities at times appeared at courts out of necessity, most often they went to seek the court's favor in cases involving marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance (al-Qattan 1999, 430). Sharī'a courts provided not only efficiency, enforceability, and registry, but also better served the interests of claimants. Christian women, for example, sought divorce in these courts, where wife-instigated divorce was available and more likely to be granted. Moreover, “by availing themselves of the courts in pursuit of personal interests, they demonstrated an impressive knowledge of Islamic legal practice, an acceptance of shared cultural-legal norms, and a pragmatic outlook on marital and familial issues” (al-Qattan 1999, 433–4).

MALE-FEMALE RELATIONSHIPS

The laws regarding male and female relationships clearly placed men over women by allowing far greater rights for divorce and remarriage. For example, while the husband could remarry after divorce from an adulterous wife, the woman could not. In fact, the woman had no right to leave an adulterous husband permanently (Thomson 2000, 133–4). She could also not instigate divorce if the husband were impotent, in the same way that the husband could not leave her if she were barren (Thomson 2000, 129, 196, 221–2, 241; see also chapter 11). It seems that the latter custom survived into the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries Ottoman-Armenian communities (Villa and Matossian 1982, 91). Furthermore, a woman could not remarry for seven years after abandonment or the disappearance of her husband and could be brought back by force if she abandoned him (Thomson 2000, 136, 242). It seems the only possible reasons for the allowance of wife-instigated divorce was if the husband had a “passion for sodomy or bestiality” (Thomson 2000, 135, 222–3), or apostasy (Thomson 2000, 139), or “pollution with foreigners” (here meaning Muslims) (Thomson 2000, 135). In all cases, reconciliation was preferred and encouraged.

REGIONAL VARIATIONS AND SIMILARITIES

While there are regional variations, some distinct similarities or patterns emerge for eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Armenian communities in different parts of Anatolia, from Van in the east, to Bursa in the west, Amasya to the north, and Kessab and Zeytun to the south, and Iranian-Armenian communities in northwestern Iran, specifically the Azerbaijan province and Isfahan, both places having large Armenian populations.

DRESS

Armenian women as members of a religious and ethnic minority retained their cultural distinctiveness far more than Armenian men who were much more likely to come into contact with the dominant group of Muslims. For instance, Armenian women in Iran retained their distinctive dress well into the first quarter of the twentieth century while men by that time had some elements of Iranian clothing (Berberian 2000, 74). Like that of Ottoman-Armenian women, Iranian-Armenian women’s dress generally consisted of several layers of undergarments, shirts, long skirts, aprons, ornaments of beads and silver coins, head and mouth covers, usually in white (Berberian 2000, 74; for Anatolia, see A. Poghosyan 2001, 182, Villa and Matossian 1982, 60). While Armenian women in western Anatolia often wore an apron falling over the dress, eastern Armenian women wore no apron. Some women wore baggy trousers (Villa and Matossian 1982, 59–60). Eastern Armenian women’s costume included a partial, undecorated face cover to hide the mouth, and sometimes the tip of the nose, and a white kerchief for younger women and black for older women and widows. Married women tended to cover the head and part of the face with scarves (A. Poghosyan 2001, 180). Similarly in Iran, younger girls wore a distinct headcover; unmarried older girls did not have a nose or mouth cover while new brides covered both with a white cloth. Middle-aged women dressed more simply, in darker colors, sometimes mixed with white, and wore no ornaments, while elderly women dressed even more simply and wore a white head cover and often did not cover their noses or mouths (Berberian 2000, 75). Not surprisingly, the costumes of Iranian-Armenian women resembled to a great extent those of Caucasian Armenian women in the region of Zangezur and those of the Ottoman-Armenian women of Ardahan and Van. In some cases, they were also very much like those of the Muslim tribal women of Lorestan and Kordestan, with some variations. The same could be said of other minority women in the Middle East whose dress and other social customs were often not distinguishable from those of Muslim women. In addition, the dress of Isfahan’s Armenian women seemed to be much more ornamental and studded with more jewels and coins than those to the north, signifying perhaps the greater prosperity of that community (Berberian 2000, 74–5).

MARRIAGE

Both Ottoman- and Iranian-Armenian women married between the ages of 14 and 17. Like the grooms, they had little say in whom they married and a couple may not even have seen each other until the wedding ceremony, although it seems this was more common in Iran (Villa and Matossian 1982, 72, 75, Berberian 2000, 75). The marriage of prepubescent girls in Anatolia was not unheard of as the “more physically or politically insecure the villagers felt, the younger the age of marriage” (Villa and Matossian 1982, 73). This is despite the prohibition of marriage before maturity (Thomson 2000, 238). The new bride, whose mouth was covered, could not speak or eat in the presence of her husband’s family. She could speak only to and through children. The rule against speaking was often relaxed after the first child was born, but even then she spoke only when spoken to (Villa and Matossian 1982, 92, Wallis 1923, 582–3). Women’s dress and behavior, including segregation during mealtimes and church services, remained basically unchanged in the rural Iranian-Armenian communities until the mid-twentieth century although here, as with other aspects of women’s lives, regional and even familial variations existed (Berberian 2000, 75, Villa and Matossian 1982, 93–5).

The importance placed on the virginity of the bride is evidenced in certain regions of Anatolia by the ritual of the showing of the bloody sheet from the marriage bed as well as the prohibitions against slandering women with accusations of non-virginity and the punishment for rape in the form of a fine paid to the father or the forced marriage of the rapist to the victim, if acceptable to the victim’s family. All this, of course, reaffirms the patriarchal system and the belief that women are custodians of family honor (Villa and Matossian 1982, 85, Thomson 2000, 145, Berberian 2000, 87).

Thus women did not merely physically reproduce their children, but as mothers who were the major influence in the lives of their children, they were also the socializers of children, reproducing the culture through dress, behavior, and use of language as well as culinary and other customs (Berberian 2000, 75).

WOMEN’S ACTIVITIES

In terms of family standing, the wife of the senior male was the matriarch (Villa and Matossian 1982, 27). In addition to the chores related to household maintenance and food preparation, women were also involved in the textile arts and crafts, combing, spinning wool, linen, flax, cotton, and making textiles, carpets, lace, embroideries (Villa and Matossian 1982, 71, Kasparian 1983, 25). Women were taught embroidery and needlelace in church schools, convents, and monasteries as well as in workshops and homes, starting as early as age 5, beginning to master techniques at 10, and learning to spin the wheel and loom by 15 (Kasparian 1983, 27, Sharambeyan 2001, 165, A. Poghosyan 2001, 156, Villa and Matossian 1982, 117). These skills provided them with a form of subsistence in economically difficult times and a voice: “needlework was one of the few forms of self-expression open to a woman in a society where she was largely without rights or prestige. A woman’s skill and virtuosity in the fabric arts stood in direct opposition to her traditional role in the society, which demanded constraint and humility” (Sharambeyan 2001, 165). Some Armenian women in Iranian Azerbaijan also participated and controlled the wine trade, largely because alcohol could not be sold openly, thus making the home the site of transaction (Berberian 2000, 74).

WOMEN’S EDUCATION

Girls’ duties began to differentiate from those of boys at about age seven as girls began to take on household chores and later care for younger siblings (Villa and Matossian 1982, 117). For the twentieth century, indications are that certain things remained unchanged (Wallis 1923, 582–4). Differences in rights, responsibilities, and expectations between the genders continued throughout life as evidenced by inheritance customs, according to which although in principle unmarried daughters were required to receive the same share as sons, in reality they often received half that share (Thomson 2000, 182, 183, Villa and Matossian 1982, 28). Variations, of course, existed and they were due not only to regional and cultural distinctions but also to family belief systems deeply affected by education and contact with Westernizing elements such as missionaries.

MISSIONARIES

American missionaries were first to offer secondary education to women in the Ottoman Empire by the establishment of a secondary school in 1845 in Istanbul with the primary goal of training teachers, although graduates were more likely to marry than choose a teaching career. The first girls’ school in Iran was established in 1838. Communities were at first reluctant to accept or objected outright to single female teachers. The process of acceptance took at least a few decades (Merguerian 1990–1, 110, 111, Merguerian 1990, 47). Like their counterparts in Iran, missionary girls’ schools in the Ottoman Empire, beginning with Istanbul but then spreading to other areas like Aintab a couple of decades later, provided instruction in modern vernacular Armenian, reading with the Bible as the main text, writing, hygiene, housekeeping, and sewing (Merguerian 1990–1, 115, 116, Merguerian 1990, 31, 47, Berberian 2000, 77–84).

ARMENIAN SCHOOLS

Education of girls often depended on availability of schools and fear for the safety of girls who might have to travel long distances to the nearest school, but also on the family's or community's belief system, which often ran counter to efforts to educate women, charging that education corrupted them (Villa and Matossian 1982, 71). Armenian schools opened soon after missionary schools in an effort to offset the influence of missionaries and assimilation or acculturation; these were experienced especially by communities where, as in the case of Iranian-Armenians in Urmieh, many Armenians communicated with each other only in Turkish or Kurdish rather than Armenian (Berberian 2000, 78–9). Proponents of education placed their arguments in the context of national progress, emphasizing that women's education would better serve the Armenian people or nation (Berberian 2000, 82–3).

A major force behind the expansion of the education of both boys and girls were Ottoman- and Iranian-Armenian women who formed charitable organizations, helped to establish new schools and often provided students with tuition, clothing, and school supplies (Berberian 2000, 83–5, Kalaidjian 2000, 165, Adanalian 1979, 255–9).

WOMEN IN THEATER

Women also began to make appearances on stage starting in the late nineteenth century in Iranian and Ottoman cities (Berberian 2000, 86). In Istanbul, women's roles may have been played by women actors possibly earlier in the Aramian Theater, established in 1846, and later the Eastern Theater or Armenian Theater Society, established in 1861 (Navasargian 1999, 33, 35). Starting in the 1880s, women also began to establish their own theatrical groups, traveling and performing in Istanbul and parts of Iran and Egypt (Navasargian 1999, 43).

ARMENIAN DIASPORA: FEMINIST ISSUES

The twentieth century saw the influx of Armenian refugees from Ottoman Anatolia into Arab lands and Iran. We have little insight into the everyday lives of women in the newer diasporas. Much of the very limited studies on Armenian women in the twentieth century focuses on women victims of the genocidal process of the First World War and on women's feminist and nationalist writings. Women's activism extended to nationalist and feminist spheres as they became involved in political activity, in membership or even as founders of political parties, in the case of Maro Vardanian, in support of the nationalist movement.

During the Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1905–11, Iranian-Armenian women of the upper-middle and upper classes began to be involved in the women's movement in Iran, especially in the attempt to bring women's issues to the attention of Iranian women and raise their consciousness. Their organizations tried to educate women in politics, Ottoman and Iranian constitutionalism, as well as inheritance rights, hygiene, and so forth (Berberian 2000, 91). Similar organizations existed among Ottoman-Armenian women (Adanalian 1979, 255–9). Especially significant were feminist writers Srpuhi Dussap, Sibyl (Zabel Asatur), and Zabel Esayian, whose writings promoted justice and equity for women in the public and private spheres and educational and employment opportunities (Rowe 2000, 69). Beginning in the late nineteenth century and later in the twentieth century, women's journals, some with a feminist agenda, began to appear in Istanbul, Cairo, and Beirut. Journals such as Marie Beylerian's Artemis, which appeared in Cairo in 1901–3, Hayganush Topuzian-Toshigian's Dzagbig Ganants (Women's flower), published in Istanbul in 1905–7, and Hay Guin (Armenian woman), published in Istanbul in 1919–32, focused on women's issues and concerns. They encouraged girls' education and women's full participation in public life as a crucial part of national development. Of the women's journals, Seza's (Siran Zarifian-Kupelian) Yeridasart Hayuhi (Young Armenian woman), which appeared in Beirut intermittently from 1932 to 1968, made an especially important contribution as a proponent of women's rights, education, and empowerment (Zeitlian 2000, 119–41).

CONCLUSION

A large segment of Ottoman- and Iranian-Armenian women began to be educated and politicized in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, although the majority of both populations shared similar status, roles, and customs and remained traditional in interpersonal relations, social structure, and world-view. Their lives were not very much different from those of Muslim women. While the influence of religion cannot be denied, class and exposure to Westernization, especially through missionaries and Caucasian Armenian immigrants in the case of Iran, were more significant than religion in determining these women's lives.

The twentieth century witnessed major economic, political, and social transformations in the Middle East. The formation of new nation-states, policies of radical nationalism, homogenization, and centralization in Arab countries, Turkey, and Iran as well as more recently Islamist movements and governments such as that of Iran, political instability, civil wars, and so forth, had and continue to have special implications for women. This is especially true but not exclusively so in regard to the reforms and policies that directly targeted women's status and roles in society. It is very likely that such transformations also affected Armenian women; however, with the lack of primary and secondary literature on the impact of such changes on minority women, in particular Armenian women, it is at this point in the history of the field difficult to draw conclusions and provide a cogent analysis. This dearth and the significance of the impact of twentieth-century developments does, however, point to great possibilities in terms of future directions for research.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abrahamian and N. Sweezy (eds.), Folk arts, culture, and identity, Bloomington, Ind. 2001.
- M. L. Adanlyan, Patriotic Armenian women's society [in Armenian], in Patma-banasirakan handes 4:87 (1979), 255-9.
- G. Aivazian, Sainly and profane women in classical texts. Rhipsimé and Parandzem, in B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000, 67-85.
- L. P. Alishan, Sacred archetypes and the Armenian woman, in Journal of the Society for Armenian Studies 4 (1988-9), 77-103.
- K. M. Arat, Die Diakonissen der armenischen Kirche in kanonischer Sicht, in Handes amsorya 1-12 (1987), 153-89.
- , The deaconess in the Armenian church, in B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000, 86-118.
- L. Bakar, The Armenian woman as a governing force in society, in B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000, 269-77.
- H. Berberian, Armenian women in turn-of-the-century Iran. Education and activity, in R. Matthee and B. Baron (eds.), Iran and beyond. Essays in Middle Eastern history in honor of Nikki R. Keddie, Costa Mesa 2000, 70-98.
- R. Ervine, Women who left the world. The Armenian nuns of Jerusalem, in T. Hummel, K. Hintlian, and U. Carmesund (eds.), Patterns of the past, prospects for the future. The Christian heritage in the Holy Land, London 1999, 124-34.
- A. Giulkhandanian, Revolutionary Armenian women [in Armenian], Paris 1939.
- F. M. Göçek and M. D. Baer, Social boundaries of Ottoman women's experience in eighteenth-century Galata court records, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire, Leiden 1996, 48-65.
- A. S. Kalaidjian, Serpuhi Vahanian Dussap. Defining a new role for women, in B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000, 162-78.
- A. O. Kasparian, Armenian needlelace and embroidery. A preservation of some of history's oldest and finest needlework, McLean, Va. 1983.
- G. Lazian, The Armenian woman and the Armenian revolution [in Armenian], Cairo 1959.
- B. J. Merguerian, Mt. Holyoke Seminary in Bitlis. Providing an American education for Armenian women, in Armenian Review 43:1/169 (Spring 1990), 103-24.
- , The beginnings of secondary education for Armenian women. The Armenian female seminary in Constantinople, in Journal of the Society for Armenian Studies 5 (1990-1), 31-65.
- B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000.
- Fr. A. Oghlukian, The deaconess in the Armenian Church. A brief survey, trans. S. P. Cowe, New Rochelle, N.Y. 1994.
- A. Navasargian, Armenian women of the stage, Glendale, Calif. 1999.
- A. Poghosyan, Carpets, in L. Abrahamian and N. Sweezy (eds.), Armenian folk arts, culture, and identity, Bloomington, Ind. 2001, 150-64.
- S. Poghosyan, Costume, in L. Abrahamian and N. Sweezy (eds.), Armenian folk arts, culture, and identity, Bloomington, Ind. 2001, 177-94.
- N. al-Qattan, Dhimnis in the the Muslim court. Legal autonomy and religious discrimination, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 31 (1999), 429-44.
- V. Rowe, The "new Armenian woman." Armenian women's writings in the Ottoman Empire, 1880-1915, Ph.D. diss., University of Toronto 2000.
- E. Sanasarian, Religious minorities in Iran, Cambridge 2000.
- A. Sharambeyan, Needle arts, in L. Abrahamian and N. Sweezy (eds.), Armenian folk arts, culture, and identity, Bloomington, Ind. 2001, 165-76.
- R. W. Thomson (trans), The lawcode [Datastanagirk'] of Mxit'ar Goš, Amsterdam 2000.
- N. Y. Tsovakan, Female scribes [in Armenian], in Sion 4-5 (April-May 1954), 133-5.
- S. H. Villa and M. K. Matossian, Armenian village life before 1914, Detroit 1982.
- W. D. Wallis, Brief communications. Some phases of Armenian social life, in American Anthropologist (October-December 1923), 582-4.
- S. Zeitlian, The role of the Armenian woman in the Armenian revolutionary movement [in Armenian], Los Angeles 1992.
- , Pioneers of women's journalism in the western Armenian media, 1862-1968, in B. J. Merguerian and J. Renjilian-Burgy (eds.), Voices of Armenian women, Belmont, Mass. 2000, 119-41.

Bahā'ī Women

Overview

The Bahā'ī Faith grew out of nineteenth-century Shī'ī messianic expectations much as Christianity grew out of similar expectations within Judaism. The Bahā'ī Faith's founders (the Bāb and Bahā'u'llāh), in claiming to be the latest messengers from God with new divinely revealed laws, irremediably divorced the new religion from its Islamic background. Among the distinguishing principles promulgated in the Bahā'ī writings was the equality of women and men. More important than this principle was the fact that it expressed itself in behavior strikingly different from the Islamic milieu from which it emerged. This equality does not refer solely to the spiritual plane; Bahā'ī scriptures explicitly state that education for women and men should be identical and that women should be active in political affairs and hence the public sphere. Representation of women in top Bahā'ī administrative positions is quite high compared to percentages of women observed in other religious organizations, comprising a third to half of the Bahā'ī leadership. They are, however, excluded from membership of the highest administrative body, the Universal House of Justice.

WOMEN IN THE BĀBĪ PERIOD

One of the prominent followers of Sayyid 'Alī Muḥammad al-Bāb, who in 1844 secretly revealed himself to be the Qā'im, the messianic figure expected by the Shī'ī Muslims was a woman, Fā'imih Bigum Baraghānī, later known as Ṭāhirih (Ṭāhirah Qurrat al-'Ayn). The Bahā'ī Faith would emerge out of the Bābī movement when Bahā'u'llāh assumed the leadership around 1863, claiming to be the fulfillment of the Bāb's prophecy regarding the coming of He Whom God would make manifest. Ṭāhirih provides one of the key models of womanhood within the Bahā'ī community.

The daughter of the leading clerical family of Qazvīn, Ṭāhirih received an excellent education from her mother and her father, both of whom were mujtabids in Qazvīn. Her maternal relatives belonged to the Shaykhī sect of Shī'ī Islam whereas her paternal relatives were staunchly 'usūlī. Though married to her paternal uncle's son, she herself followed in her mother's footsteps, moving to Karbala, and taking up residence in the home of the late Shaykhī leader, Sayyid Kāzīm, at the behest of his widow. She became the leader of those Shaykhīs in Karbala who subsequently took up the Bābī cause.

Ṭāhirih's activities created controversy within the Bābī community, through her insistence that Islamic law was no longer binding upon Bābīs. During Muḥarram, Ṭāhirih deliberately provoked the 'ulamā' by dressing in gay colors and appearing unveiled to celebrate the birthday of the Bāb instead of donning mourning clothes to commemorate the martyrdom of Imām Ḥusayn. To prevent violence, the governor intervened and arrested Ṭāhirih, eventually sending her back to Iran.

On her arrival in Qazvīn, she refused to take up residence with her estranged husband, Mullā Muḥammad, and divorced him, taking the initiative of pronouncing the ṭalāq herself. No doubt this estrangement grew out of their religious differences, for her father-in-law, Muḥammad Taqī, virulently opposed both the Bābīs and the Shaykhīs, and incited mob violence against them. A Bābī sympathizer retaliated by fatally stabbing the mullā. Though the assassin insisted he acted alone, Ṭāhirih's husband implicated her and executed several Bābīs. Ṭāhirih escaped with the assistance of Bahā'u'llāh, who hid her in his home in Tehran.

Sometime later, the Bābī leaders met in Badasht, Khurasan to discuss the future direction of the Bābī community in the face of growing persecution. Tension developed between Ṭāhirih, who advocated a complete break with Islam and a militant defense of their community, and the more conservative Quddūs, who initially advocated policies aimed at the rejuvenation of Islam. As she had in Karbala, Ṭāhirih appeared before the assembled believers unveiled. One shocked believer slit his own throat and fled. Unperturbed, Ṭāhirih declared, "I am the Word which the Qā'im is to utter, the Word which shall put to flight the chiefs and nobles of the earth!" (Shoghi Effendi 1944, 32–3).

Eventually Quddūs conceded that Islamic law had been abrogated. So complete was his reconciliation with Ṭāhirih that the two departed from Badasht riding in the same howdah. When they neared the village of Nīyālā, the local mullā, outraged at seeing an unveiled woman sitting next to a man and chanting poems aloud, led a mob against them. A deadly clash resulted and the Bābīs dispersed in different directions. Pitched battles raged between the Bābīs and government forces between 1848 and 1850 in the Iranian province of Māzandarān and in the cities of Zanjān and Nayrīz. Ṭāhirih remained in hiding, moving from village to village until she was captured in 1848. She was sent to Tehran where she was imprisoned in the house of the chief of police. Here as elsewhere, she was able to hold meetings with the leading women of the city. Among them was Shams-i Fitnih, a Qājār princess and the granddaughter of Faṭḥ 'Alī Shāh, who became an ardent Bābī and later one of the earliest Bahā'īs (Māzandarani 1969, 6:412–14).

In 1852, following an abortive attempt on the life of the Shah, a general massacre of Bābīs ensued in which Ṭāhirih fell victim. While male Bābī leaders were executed publicly in a brutal manner, Ṭāhirih was taken in secret to a garden and strangled. Bahā'ī sources quote her last words to have been: “You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women” (Shoghi Effendi 1944, 75).

WOMEN IN THE WRITINGS OF BĀHĀ'U'LLĀH

The writings of Bahā'ū'llāh proclaim, “In this Day the Hand of divine grace hath removed all distinction. The Servants of God and His handmaidens are regarded on the same plane.” He states that differences between the sexes are the result of “vain imaginings” and “idle fancies,” which his revelation dispels (1986, 2). However, like the Qur'ān, the Kitāb-i-Aqdas, containing Bahā'ī sacred law, is written in Arabic, a language that uses the male gender for the collective, and most of its laws are written as if addressed to men. This androcentric view, which a cursory reading of the text gives, is not, it should be recognized, the manner in which Bahā'īs have understood the greater part of the Aqdas. Whereas the Aqdas appeared to allow bigamy, 'Abdu'l-Bāhā, Bahā'ū'llāh's successor, insisted that conditions of equity could not be met for two wives; therefore monogamy alone was permissible (Aqdas, 209). Shoghi Effendi, who led the Bahā'ī community as Guardian between 1921 and 1957, stated that in most cases the laws in the Aqdas applied equally to men and women except when context made this impossible. Only in the case of membership in the Universal House of Justice has the male oriented language been taken literally.

When read within the context of nineteenth-century Iran, the Kitāb-i-Aqdas presents some startling contrasts to the norms of male-female relations.

The concept of ritual uncleanness is absent, and it is optional for women to perform the usual obligatory prayers or fast during their menses. While chastity is enjoined on men and women alike, no special attention is given to controlling the sexuality of women. In contrast to the harsher penalties for adultery found in both Judaism and Islam, adulterers are subject to a fine (Aqdas, 47).

While Bahā'ū'llāh's Arabic writings necessitated the use of the male gender when referring to God, those in Persian have no gender. However, thus far, references to God have been translated using the male gender regardless of the original language. Perhaps more interesting concerning the issue of gender in the Bahā'ū'llāh's writings is the symbol of the Heavenly Maiden or the ḥūrī. In the Qur'ānic vision of paradise, black-eyed damsels or ḥūrīs are thought to serve its inmates. Within the Bahā'ī context of fulfilled eschatology, the ḥūrī comes to symbolize the Holy Spirit, the personification of Bahā'ū'llāh's revelation and the vehicle through which he receives it. His initial revelation in the dungeon of the Sīyāh Chāl consisted of a vision of this maiden who informed him of his divine mission. She appears frequently in Bahā'ū'llāh's later, mystical works where this feminine theophany has a symbiotic relationship with Bahā'ū'llāh and is ultimately inseparable from him (Walbridge 1996, 158–65).

FROM EAST TO WEST

When the Bahā'ī Faith was introduced to America after 1893, women played a prominent role, outnumbering male converts by two to one. Bahā'ī administrative institutions initially included women. However, when Iranian Bahā'ī teachers arranged for the election of the Chicago House of Justice, they insisted that only men were eligible. When Corinne True wrote to 'Abdu'l-Bahā asking for clarification 'Abdu'l-Bahā replied that the House of Justice, “according to the explicit text of the Law of God, is confined to men, this for a wisdom of the Lord God's, which will ere long be made manifest as clearly as the sun at high noon.” Seven years later 'Abdu'l-Bahā ruled that this exclusion applied only to the as yet unformed Universal House of Justice and allowed women in America to serve on local bodies (Maneck 1994, 223–5).

FROM WEST TO EAST

The introduction of the Bahā'ī Faith to America had a profound effect on the position of Bahā'ī women in Iran, through correspondence, through Western Bahā'īs who traveled to Iran, and through receiving talks given by 'Abdu'l-Bahā in America.

One Iranian Bahā'ī woman influenced by this development was Ta'irih Tihrani (1861–1911), born 'Ismat Khanum. Ta'irih's husband served as a bodyguard to the Shah and often imprisoned Bahā'īs in his home. Ta'irih embraced the Bahā'ī Faith after her marriage, and attempted to show every kindness to Bahā'ī prisoners. For this she was often beaten until she bled. After her husband died, Ta'irih played an active part in the Bahā'ī community. She cropped her hair and received Western Bahā'ī visitors into her home, urging Iranian Bahā'ī women (with limited success) to remove their veils and mix freely with men as Western women did. Eventually she established a girls' school and published articles on women's emancipation (Najmabadi 1997, 146–95).

At the behest of 'Abdu'l-Bahā many American Bahā'ī women came to Iran. Their presence helped transform gender relations within the Iranian Bahā'ī community. Dr. Susan Moody arrived from Chicago to assist Iranian Bahā'ī doctors in establishing a hospital. Elizabeth Stewart, a nurse, Dr. Sarah Clock, and Lillian Kappes, a teacher, later joined her, becoming instrumental in establishing one of the country's finest girls' preparatory schools. Iranian Bahā'ī women also traveled to America for study (Armstrong-Ingram 1986, 181–210).

'Abdu'l-Bahā explicitly promoted women's rights as an aspect of Bahā'ī teachings during his trip to the United States in 1912. He stressed the need for women's education, deeming the education of mothers so essential to the proper upbringing of children that he insisted that the education of daughters take precedence over that of sons. Despite the linkage of motherhood and education, 'Abdu'l-Bahā did not restrict women's proper sphere to the home. He urged women to excel in arts and science. He held that their participation in the political sphere would prove to be a prerequisite for peace. The only fields where 'Abdu'l-Bahā would not extend full and equal participation was in military endeavors and membership in the House of Justice.

Copies of 'Abdu'l-Bahā's talks were distributed throughout Iran, and, along with the influence of American Bahā'īs residing in Iran, these awakened Iranian Bahā'ī women to possibilities unthought of in previous generations. Some began to advocate immediate abolishment of the veil and to agitate for women's full participation on Bahā'ī administrative bodies. 'Abdu'l-Bahā felt that actions such as discarding the veil would bring on needless persecution in an already volatile situation. 'Abdu'l-Bahā pleaded with the women not to do anything "contrary to wisdom." Women's assemblages at this time should be confined to educational matters so that "differences will, day by day, be entirely wiped out, not that, God forbid, it will end in argumentation between men and women." 'Abdu'l-Bahā stated that he himself would in time ensure that women would achieve full equality; in the meantime they ought not to agitate (1986, 5–6).

Women were not permitted to serve on Bahā'ī institutions in Iran until 1954 but by 1981, when the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahā'īs of Iran were arrested and executed, the chairperson was a woman, Zhinus Maḥmūdi, Iran's leading chemist (Maneck 1994, 227)

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

Since the late 1960s and the 1970s the Bahā'ī Faith has seen its largest growth in areas such as India, Latin America, and Africa. While women have played a significant, and sometimes leading, role in the propagation efforts, the numbers of male enrollments in those countries has vastly exceeded those of females. Realizing that this discrepancy does not augur well for the future, some Bahā'ī communities have established institutes aimed at raising the literacy rate of rural women and providing them with basic vocational skills. It is not yet known whether these have impacted the demography of the community.

There exists no single theory of Bahā'ī feminism, but Bahā'īs, men and women alike, are agreed on one principle: hierarchical systems that place men above women in a divinely ordained order have no sanction within the Bahā'ī scriptures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- 'Abdu'l-Bahā, The promulgation of universal peace, 1922, Wilmette 1982.
 S. 'Ala'i and C. Dawes (ed.), The role of women in an advancing civilization, Willetton, Western Australia 1989.
 R. J. Armstrong-Ingram, American Bahā'ī women and the education of girls in Tehran, 1909–1934, in P. Smith (ed.), In Iran, Los Angeles 1986, 181–210.
 Bahā'u'llāh, Compilation on women, Oakham, Ill. 1986.
 —, Kitāb-i Aqdas, Haifa 1992.
 P. Caton (ed.), Equal circles. Women and men in Bahā'ī communities, Los Angeles 1987.
 T. Culhane, I beheld a maiden. The Baha'i Faith and the life of the spirit, Los Angeles 2001.
 J. Khan and P. Khan, Advancement of women, Wilmette 1999.
 B. Ma'ani, The interdependence of Bahā'ī communities services of North American Bahā'ī women in Iran, in Journal of Bahā'ī studies 4:1 (1991), 19–46.
 S. Maneck, Tahirih. A religious paradigm of womanhood, in Journal of Bahā'ī studies 2:2 (1989), 39–54.
 —, Women in the Bahā'ī Faith, in A. Sharma (ed.), Religion and women, Albany, N.Y. 1994, 211–27.
 F. Māzandarānī, Tarikh-i zuhūr, 4 vols., Tehran 1969.
 A. Najmabadi (ed.), Namih-ha va nivishtih-ha va āsh'ar in "Recasting women and femininity in Qajar Iran," in Nemeye digar 2:3 (1997), 146–95.

Shoghi Effendi, God passes by, Wilmette, Ill. 1944.

J. Walbridge, Sacred acts, sacred space, sacred time, Oxford 1996.

Women, Compilation issued by the Universal House of Justice, Oakham, Ill. 1986.

SUSAN STILES MANECK

Citizenship

The Caucasus and Central Asia

Caucasian and Central Asian women are currently in a process of constant negotiation and renegotiation of their womanness, finding themselves between a revival of Muslim norms and traditions, a Western capitalist influence, and a recent Soviet history, all with completely different standards of what it means to be both a woman and a citizen.

SOVIET TIMES

From the earliest days of rule, the Soviet Communists regarded the inclusion of Central Asian and Caucasian women in their very concept of citizenship as a strategic priority. Equating the treatment of women in these traditional societies with slavery, they identified women as the “surrogate proletariat” to engage in the class war and to wage war against religion. The Soviets tried to make women into fully-fledged citizens mainly by introducing legal reforms and social allowances for women. They provided women with rights equal to those of men by revising the existing legal system and abolishing ‘āda and Shar‘a practices such as polygamy, payment of kalym, and marriage without consent of the bride. To draw women into socialized production, they granted them free and high level education, access to work in traditionally male dominated fields (for example, engineering), and multiple social allowances such as paid lengthy maternity leave and state-sponsored childcare. By establishing women’s sections (zhenotdely) within the Communist Party and introducing a quota for women of 30 percent of the seats in parliaments and governing bodies, the Soviets pushed for female presence in all spheres of public life.

Despite the very real improvements in facilities and range of choices, and the greater visibility of women in public life, the women’s conception of themselves as citizens did not really change. In the private sphere older patterns of behavior continued to dominate gender relations. The Communists’ women’s liberation campaign failed because it was perceived as the emasculation of men and the defeminization of women. To give an example, the mass unveiling of Uzbek women in 1927, known as the khudzhum (the attack), symbolized for Uzbek men a defeat and a brutal rape. The honor and dignity of the whole community was suddenly and monstrously violated. For the Communists, the success of the khudzhum was an ideological victory. To them, the parandzha, the veil of horsehair, symbolized everything that they were fighting to eradicate: oppression, ignorance, injustice, and human degradation. For Central Asians, the veil was a protection against unwanted contact with strangers and against the physical grime of the environment (Akiner 1997).

In response to the forced modernization, strong cultural barriers were erected, behind which sedentary and nomad traditions were frozen, to guard against Soviet encroachments. Women did not assume the role of a revolutionary force to destroy traditional society. Rather, they colluded in its preservation. By accommodating external pressures through the adoption of additional identities, appropriate to the public sphere, they deflected intrusions into the private domain, thereby protecting the integrity of the older disposition of family roles and religious practices. Cut off from the formal, male dominated teachings of Islam, women became the primary transmitter of religious knowledge to the younger generation in the home. In Uzbekistan, otyns, female mullahs with no spiritual education, preserved knowledge of women’s role in rituals connected with the major life cycle ceremonies (male circumcision, burial rites, marriage), and semi-Islamic practices such as visits to the graves of revered individuals (Olcott 1991).

POST-SOVIET TIMES

After independence, women were caught between conflicting concepts of citizenship: they longed for the Soviet lifestyle with its high social security standards, at the same time feeling the need to return to their “authentic” roots, with a renewed emphasis on traditional domestic obligations, and continuing along the road to greater personal independence and freedom of choice.

In the Caucasus, nationalistic sentiments, fueled by war, dominated the gender discourse. Confronted with war, displacement, and destruction, women chose to subordinate gender issues to nationalist goals, constructing and perceiving their role as auxiliary to the primary nationalist task. Especially in Armenia, women felt constrained, being the guardians of the nation and bastions of resistance against assimilation. Here, a revived discourse of genocide (harking back to the large-scale 1915 slaughter of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire) and ongoing threats to Armenian survival appealed to women to remain home, maintain the family economically and morally, inspire their men with patriotism, and give birth to future soldiers (Dudwick 1997).

In Central Asia, however, nationalist sentiments could not mobilize masses. The Soviet Union's collapse was greeted with ambivalence and reluctance. Here, top-down nationalism played a major role in defining women's concepts of citizenship. Presidents functioned as primary narrators of gendered nation-building, nationalism, and national identity-forming. Reasserting their authority through the symbolic identification of the head of state as the "Father of the Nation," they reinstated patriarchal values. Campaigning that women were supposed to be the "guardians of home and hearth," they perpetuated a fertility cult aimed at increasing their ethnic groups' populations and thence their power both within their state and in the region as a whole. At the same time, the fixed quota representation practiced under the Soviet system was removed. Politics became a "men's business," dominated by clan interests and tribal resource allocation. Women withdrew from politics, identifying political action with "masculine behavior, power struggles, private property disputes, corruption and hypocrisy" (LaFont 2001).

The post-Soviet nation-building process was accompanied by a revival of Muslim norms, idioms, and practices, also defining women's post-Soviet concepts of citizenship. Freedom of worship allowed the pilgrimage to holy places, mazārs, the opening of madrasas and Islamic cultural centers as well as the establishment of women's non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that aimed at revitalizing Muslim traditions. This Islamic revival evoked a call for legalization of old, semi-Islamic Central Asian and Caucasian traditions such as payment of kalym, bride kidnapping, and polygamy. Though officially debated and widely practiced, these traditions were never legalized. Ruling elites as well as the better part of the population rejected the agenda of conservative Islamists who pressed for enforced sex segregation, compulsory veiling, and the restoration of Shari'a in family law. The strict implementation of Muslim norms and law in countries such as Taliban-led Afghanistan or Wahhābī Saudi Arabia figured as deterring rather than as attracting examples for the overwhelmingly secular societies in Central Asia and Caucasus.

Despite the emergence of nationalist and Muslim identities, secular, pro-Western concepts of citizenship predominate in the identity-building process currently underway, leading to the break-up of long-standing borders and boundaries and a considerable reversal of new gender roles in public and private life. This process is accelerated by the deterioration of social welfare and the collapse of the economic system. Women and men are more and more forced to make compromises with dominant gender identities and to make adjustments, often as part of desperate strategies to survive the new situation. Men see their ability to support their families remarkably reduced. Women feel impelled to seek for cash contributions to the household. As the traditional sexual division of labor is changing, relations of authority and responsibility between men and women are destabilizing. The extended family is transforming into a broken family, a single-parent family, or even a polygamous family. Violence against women, female slavery, prostitution, trafficking in women, and rapes have become widespread phenomena, radically challenging the concept of women as citizens equal to men, which women favor, formerly imposed by the Soviets and propagated by Western societies.

In post-Soviet Caucasus and Central Asia, women find themselves in a dilemma, caught between different concepts of citizenship. Socially and economically they are encouraged to seek emancipation while ethnically and religiously they are supposed to return to old behavioral norms where the functions of bearing and caring for children, looking after their husbands, and fulfilling their household duties are their sole lot (Tabyshalieva 2002). Despite awareness of this dilemma, there is no discussion underway focusing on women's contribution to the construction of citizenship in the Caucasian and Central Asian societies. Although women have taken the opportunity to become involved in society by establishing political parties and NGOs, they have so far refrained from launching a broad women's movement. None of the women-led NGOs has an explicit feminist agenda, and only a few take up the issue of women's rights at all. The majority of women's organizations have devoted themselves to channeling assistance to single mothers, families with many children, and disabled and handicapped persons. While several small women's parties have formed, women figure in very insignificant numbers in larger political parties, none of which has shown interest in women's issues. In consequence of this feminist disengagement, women do not take an active part in the construction of post-Soviet citizenship. The degree of women's future success in moving beyond the boundaries dictated by conservative nationalists and Islamists depends on state gender policies, the strength of civil society, especially women's NGOs, and the legal establishment of human rights at a general level.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000.
- S. Akiner, Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261–304.
- M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997.
- N. Dudwick, Out of the kitchen into the crossfire. Women in independent Armenia, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 235–49.
- L. M. Handrahan, Gender and ethnicity in the “transitional democracy” of Kyrgyzstan, in Central Asian Survey 20 (2001), 467–96.
- S. LaFont, One step forward, two steps back. Women in post-communist states, in Communist and Post-Communist Studies 34 (2001), 203–20.
- M. B. Olcott, Women and society in Central Asia, in W. Fierman (ed.), Soviet Central Asia. The failed transformation, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 235–56.
- A. Tabyshalieva, Central Asia. Increasing gender inequity, in A. Strasser et al. (eds.), Central Asia and Islam, Hamburg 2002, 150–8.

MARIE-CARIN VON GUMPPENBERG

Egypt, Sudan and Arab States

Globalization and democratization have catapulted issues of citizenship to international and national prominence. Discussions abound on the rights of citizens vis-à-vis the state, the quality of relations between the state and civil society, the status of immigrants, and the rights of women. In Arab states, tackling the problem of women's second-class citizenship has acquired urgency, chiefly because of the demands of women's movements. Constructions of citizenship are gendered and inscribed in state policies and legal frameworks (for example, constitutions, family laws, labor laws, and socioeconomic policies), in religio-cultural institutions and practices (for example, Islamic laws and norms), and in popular discourses. Laws, norms, and discourses often cast “authentic citizenship” as adherence to Islam and the state, while the media, schools, and religious institutions also reproduce images of “the ideal Muslim woman.” Constructions of citizenship usually differentiate between nationals and non-nationals, women and men, and Muslim and non-Muslim citizens. Civil, political, and social rights are generally circumscribed, but nationals, men, and Muslims have more citizenship rights than non-nationals, women, and non-Muslims. Disparities between women and men are captured in indicators of citizenship such as educational attainment, access to employment and income, control over the body and fertility, and political participation.

The growing literature on Arab women's citizenship (Shehadeh 1998, Botman 1999, Hammami and Johnson 1999, Joseph 2000, Charrad 2001, Moghadam 2002, 2003b) draws attention to constructions of women's citizenship and campaigns for equality and empowerment. Empirical studies show that many Arab women are cognizant of their second-class citizenship and desire expanded rights and equality. One study found that refugee and low-income women in the West Bank cited the following desired rights: education, work, and freedom of movement; and the right to take one's inheritance, choose a marriage partner, and be free from domestic violence (Rubenberg 2001, 123). These aspirations are common throughout the Arab region, where women's organizations seek the reform of family laws, the criminalization of domestic violence (including “honor killings”), enhanced nationality rights, and greater political and economic participation.

ASPECTS OF WOMEN'S

SECOND-CLASS CITIZENSHIP

Shari'a-based family laws or civil codes – which govern marriage, divorce, maintenance, paternity, and custody of children – place women in a disadvantaged position in the family and the society, designating them as wives, mothers, and daughters, and conferring greater privileges on men. Since the early 1980s, and in a more concerted fashion since the early 1990s, feminists and women's organizations have prioritized legal reforms to expand their citizenship rights. Feminist research, advocacy, and lobbying efforts are directed at governments, clergy, the media, international organizations, and the transnational public sphere. Women have deployed secular, universal, and Islamic discourses to disseminate their ideas and achieve their goals (Moghadam 2003a).

Reform of family law is important for several reasons: it is a central element in the modernization of religious institutions and norms in Muslim societies; it establishes women's human rights and their equality within the family and vis-à-vis male kin; it has implications for women's wider citizenship rights and their social participation, including economic citizenship; and it brings the Arab states in line with international norms and codes as enshrined in such conventions as the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, and the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action.

The content of family law varies to some degree across countries, depending on the legal school in place and, over time, change has occurred. The former People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (then known as "the Cuba of the Middle East") adopted an audaciously egalitarian family law in the late 1960s, but it was abrogated after the country merged with North Yemen in 1990. Some constitutions stipulate equality of all citizens (for example, that of Egypt), but this is contradicted by the family law, which confers different rights and obligations on women and men. Saudi Arabia, which has no modern constitution, refers to the Qur'ān as its basic law, and has institutionalized a patriarchal interpretation of Islamic precepts governing marriage and the status of women in the family and society.

What is common across Arab countries is that religious law is elevated to civil status, and religious affiliation is a requirement of citizenship. This often places women, secular Muslims, and non-Muslims in a disadvantaged position. In Sudan, where a long civil war has engaged the predominantly Arab and Muslim north against the black and non-Muslim south, the Sudanese state constructs the "authentic" citizen as a Muslim. Any abandoned or foundling children may be adopted by Muslims only, and raised as Muslims (Hale 2000, 95).

Male guardianship is usually inscribed in the family laws, and thus the father or other male kin may permit "a virgin" to marry. The Islamic marriage contract does require the consent of the wife, and in some countries women may insert stipulations into the contract, such as the condition that she be the only wife (An-Naim 2002). Marriage, however, remains largely an agreement between two families rather than two individuals with equal rights and obligations. Moreover, marriage gives the husband the right of access to his wife's body, marital rape is not recognized, and a wife is required to obey her husband (Shehadeh 1998, Welchman 2001). Children acquire citizenship and religious status through their fathers, not their mothers. Muslim women are not permitted to marry non-Muslim men. Under Islamic family law, males inherit more family wealth than do females, and non-Muslim widows cannot inherit from Muslim husbands. A husband may divorce without reason, and some countries allow repudiation, but a woman can divorce – or request that she be divorced – only upon specific conditions. Because Islamic family law operates on the principle of patrilineality, fathers or their male agnates are given automatic custody of children upon divorce. Muslim family law also permits the practice of polygamy by men.

Under Islamic family law and attendant civil codes, women are required to obtain the permission of father, husband, or other male guardian to seek employment, start a business, travel, or open a bank account for a child. In Jordan and Sudan, a father or husband has the legal right to forbid his wife or daughter to seek employment or continue in a job. In Sudan, a woman cannot claim her spouse as a dependent; only a man can do so, and only he can receive family allowances. An employed woman cannot receive any residential plot that may be allocated to those in public service if her husband already has one (Hale 2000, 94). The implication of guardianship is that women are seen as incapable of entering contracts on their own. Wives who are educated or politically aware may stipulate the condition that they be allowed to work in their marriage contracts, but others make no such stipulations, and courts have been known to side with the husband when the issue is contested (Sonbol 2003, 89–99). In constructing women as dependents of men and minors within the family, Arab legal codes have strengthened the male breadwinner/female homemaker ideal – or "the patriarchal gender contract" (Moghadam 1998) – which in turn has reinforced women's second-class citizenship in economic and political domains.

SOCIOECONOMIC IMPLICATIONS

Muslim family law mandates a sum of money from the groom to the bride, the mahr, which is sometimes paid in full and sometimes deferred until the event of divorce. The marriage contract stipulates the amount, which is usually agreed to by both families. A husband is obligated to provide for his wife and children, and non-maintenance by the husband is grounds for divorce. A wife is under no obligation to share her wealth or any earnings with her husband, contribute to the family economy, or even perform household labor. In return for maintenance (nafaqa) by the husband, the wife is obligated to obey her husband, provide sexual services, and bear children. In the case of divorce, however, she may lose her claim to the mahr if she is seen to be at fault or if she initiates the divorce.

Sons inherit twice as much as daughters, and they are also expected to look after their parents in old age. (However, in many Arab countries, due to male out-migration among other reasons, it is the daughters who are increasingly looking after aged parents.) A deceased man's inheritance and his pension are divided among his widows, children, and other relatives that he may have been supporting. As a result, many widows receive insignificant pensions.

For these reasons, Arab feminists insist on reform of family laws. Mahr, nafaqa, and unequal inheritance rights reinforce gender difference and women's economic dependence. Legal frameworks, and especially the family laws, cast women as daughters, mothers, and wives, while men are the guardians and breadwinners. Women's association with the private sphere of the family has also resulted in relatively low rates of female participation in the political domain – a situation that Arab feminists have been seeking to change.

RECENT CAMPAIGNS AND ACHIEVEMENTS

In Egypt, women's rights activists succeeded in having reforms adopted that ease the restrictions on women's capacity to divorce, partly through the introduction of a new marriage contract that stipulates the rights of the wife. In 1999, they secured the reversal of Article 291, which exonerated rapists who married their victims. Egyptian feminists and public health activists have also formed or worked with coalitions against female circumcision. In both Iran and Egypt, activists have made their case in an Islamic idiom – arguing that patriarchal cultural norms rather than egalitarian and emancipatory Islam are responsible for the legal status and social positions of women – but they have also appealed to the international women's rights agenda and the relevant conventions.

In Jordan, the criminalization of honor killings of daughters and sisters has become a major social issue for feminist lawyers and journalists, concerned members of the Jordanian royal family, and others. The state was initially timid before the tribe and kin-based social structure, but women's groups and the Royal Commission for Human Rights pushed for legal reforms. In December 2001 the Jordanian cabinet approved several amendments to the Civil Status Law. The legal age for marriage was raised from 15 for women and 16 for men to 18 for both, and Jordanian women were given legal recourse to divorce. New restrictions on polygamy require a man to inform his first wife of plans to marry again and to submit evidence of his financial ability to support more than one wife. As a result of an amendment to the penal code, perpetrators of honor crimes are no longer exempt from the death penalty – though judges are still allowed to commute the sentences of the convicted.

In Lebanon, feminists formed the Women's Court: The Permanent Arab Court to Resist Violence against Women, which launched highly visible campaigns in 1995, 1998, and 2000, and a Feminine Rights Campaign to focus on gender equality in divorce. In a country where communal traditions hold sway, the state is weak, and there are 15 family codes for the 18 legally recognized religious sects, many feminists nonetheless are in favor of civil codes that supersede sectarian authority (Joseph 2000, Shehadeh 1998). Secularists, feminists, and democrats in an array of civil society organizations encouraged President Hrawi to propose an optional civil marriage, but it was defeated by entrenched religious forces, especially among the Sunnis (Saadeh 1999).

In Yemen, a woman was appointed state minister for human rights in 2001, and a successful campaign was launched against the "house of obedience" law, or the forced return of a woman to the matrimonial home. Yet much remains to be done. Feminists and human rights activists seek to insert an equality clause into the constitution, to criminalize honor killings (the penal code currently exonerates a husband's killing of his adulterous wife), to decriminalize sexual misconduct by women (90 percent of women prisoners are charged with adultery or similar sexual misconduct), and to change the electoral laws to allow for quotas for women candidates.

Enhancing women's participation in governance is a major aim, and an achievement was the appointment in 2003 of government spokeswomen in Syria and Jordan. That year, the first female judge was approved in Egypt, while in Qatar, a woman candidate ran for political office. The growing proportion of women university students in many Arab states heralds greater social participation.

Reforms have come about because of internal factors and forces (such as new governments and socio-demographic changes in the female population), but the global women's rights agenda fostered by the United Nations has helped to expand the political opportunity structure within which Arab women can make claims for enhanced citizenship rights.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. An-Naim, Islamic family law in a changing world, London 2002.
- S. Botman, Engendering citizenship in Egypt, New York 1999.

- M. Charrad, States and women's rights. The making of postcolonial Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco, Berkeley 2001.
- S. Hale, The Islamic state and gendered citizenship in Sudan, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 88–104.
- R. Hammami and P. Johnson, Equality with a difference. Gender and citizenship in transitional Palestine, in Social Forces 6:3 (Fall 1999), 314–43.
- S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.
- V. Moghadam, Women, work, and economic reform in the Middle East and North Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1998.
- , Citizenship, civil society, and women in the Arab region, in al-Raida 19:97/98 (Spring/Summer 2002), 12–21.
- , Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1993, 2003^{2a}.
- , Engendering citizenship, feminizing civil society. The case of the Middle East and North Africa, in Women and Politics 25:1/2 (2003b), 63–88.
- C. Rubenberg, Palestinian women. Patriarchy and resistance in the West Bank, Boulder, Colo. 2001.
- S. Saadeh, The political repercussions of President Hrawi's optional civil marriage (1998), paper presented at the 33rd annual meeting of the Middle East Studies Association, Washington, D.C. 19–22 November 1999.
- L. Shehadeh, The legal status of married women in Lebanon, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 30:4 (1998), 501–19.
- A. E. Sonbol, Women of Jordan. Islam, labor, and the law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2003.
- L. Welchman, Jordan. Capacity, consent and under-age marriage in Muslim family law, in International Society on Family Law, The international survey of family law. 2001 edition, ed. A. Bainham, The Hague 2001, 243–63.

VALENTINE M. MOGHADAM

The Gulf and Yemen

Citizenship in the Arab Gulf States and Yemen is constructed on a kin-tribal basis. Within this patrilineal, patriarchal social structure, state rulers – the male heads of tribes – grant citizenship to members of society on the basis of family and tribal lineage. This differs from the universally dominant discourse of citizenship and contractual civil rights practiced in liberal democracies (Joseph 2000). Understanding this difference eases the mapping of a gendered citizenship in Gulf countries, where women are assumed to be under the guardianship of male members in society.

In the Gulf states, a khulāṣa qā'id usra muwāṭin (family citizenship record) or a “national certificate,” officially used in some states, is the main record of citizenship. The term may differ slightly from one state to another, yet the meaning remains the same. Embedded in this construction is the inability of a national woman to extend citizenship rights to her husband and children if married to a non-national, a non-Gulf Cooperation Council national, or a non-Muslim. It is only in the exceptional case of an unknown, deceased, or absconding father that a national woman in the Gulf region can extend citizenship to her children, although she cannot have a separate family record. In the case where she does, she cannot register her children in this record. With the inability to sustain family lineage, the woman's family record will cease to exist upon her death.

The national certificate is the main document upon which nationality is issued. It defines the citizen's ranking and, in turn, the state benefits to which he or she is entitled. A woman follows her guardian's grade. Nationality is not granted on an equal basis; it varies from full nationality by descent to nationality by naturalization. When a non-national woman is granted citizenship as a result of marrying a full national, hers is considered full nationality, but is still treated as that of a dependent. The woman may lose it in case of early divorce (the period is defined differently among Gulf states) or second marriage to a non-national.

A non-national woman is not granted automatic citizenship through marriage. She must first apply for it, and then wait for a period that may vary from three years (United Arab Emirates) to five years (Saudi Arabia) to fifteen years (Kuwait). None of the Gulf States allow dual citizenship. Anyone (male and female) taking up citizenship in the Gulf region must forsake their previous citizenship and submit their old passport to the authorities in the respective Gulf state. The practice of specifying the status of women as the “daughter of” or “wife of” in all identification documents such as driving licenses, passports, and bank accounts, has been challenged and is expected to recede following complaints by women against it.

Despite the fact that all Gulf countries are signatories to the CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women) discrimination continues. Kin-based citizenship necessarily results in discrimination against women in the region. However, this should not obscure some of the positive elements enjoyed by women in the Gulf region. As oil states, with the exception of Yemen, Gulf countries built their legitimacy on a state welfare system that provides citizens with rights to free education, employment, housing, and health services, as well as other grants and state subsidies. Since women are by definition members of the family, they are considered beneficiaries of these rights as long as they do not conflict with their primary responsibilities to their families.

Women's progress in the field of education within a short period serves as a showcase. The United Arab Emirates state federation, established in 1971, was able during the 1990s to make impressive inroads in women's education on a global scale (UNDP 1995). This led, in all oil-producing Gulf States, to uneven development and a situation where women are highly educated yet still denied political rights in the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia.

Until 1998, with the exception of Kuwait and Yemen, no Gulf state provided any of its citizens with electoral rights. Male members of legislative councils were appointed by the ruling families and acted only as consultative bodies. Bahrain has, since the turn of the millennium, led the Gulf states in terms of political rights, followed by Qatar and Oman. These states have modified their constitutions, and legislated equal gender rights. Women in these countries are making daily advancements in administrative and political offices. The United Arab Emirates grants more socioeconomic rights, but falls behind on the political, while Saudi Arabia continues to fall behind on all counts. A woman in Saudi Arabia may hold a Ph.D., or even be a global figure, yet she is still unable to drive or travel without prior male guardian approval and the escort of a mahram male (kin whom she cannot marry).

Despite their uneasiness, living in such contradiction in comparison with each other across state regional borders and with women globally, women in the Gulf region believe in their relative bargaining power in the very structure of the family and tribe. In a system where rules are broken on the basis of personal contacts and direct relationships, exceptions to stated rules are sometimes available.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Abdulla (ed.), Gulf strategic report 2002–2003, Sharja 2003.
- S. Adams, The basic right of citizenship. A comparative study, Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, D.C., September 1993, <<http://www.cis.org/articles/1993/back793.html>>.
- S. Altorki, The concept and practice of citizenship in Saudi Arabia, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 215–36.
- S. Carapico and A. Wuerth, Passports and passage, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 261–71.
- Constitutions (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, United Arab Emirates, Yemen), <<http://cofinder.richmond.edu>>.
- S. Joseph, Civic myths, citizenship and gender in Lebanon, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 107–36.
- Markaz dirasāt al-Khalij, al-Khalij fi 'ām 2003, Dubai 2004.
- H. al-Mughni and M. A. Tetreault, Citizenship, gender, and the politics of quasi states, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 237–60.

R. Sabban, al-Mar'a wa-al-qānūn fi al-Imārāt al-'Arabīyya al-Muttahida. Ru'ya ijtimā'iyya, in al-Tashrīāt al-ijtimā'iyya fi al-Imārāt, Sharja 1997.

A. Sayad (ed.), al-Mar'a al-Yamaniyya wa-tahaddiyāt al-'asriyya, Syria 1995.

United Nations, Division for the Advancement of Women, Women 2000 and beyond. Women, nationality and citizenship, June 2003, <<http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/public/>>.

UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), Human development report 1995, Gender and human development, <<http://www.undp.org/hdro/hdrs/1995/english/95.htm>>.

RIMA SABBAN

Southeast Asia

THE SOUTHEAST ASIAN CULTURAL MATRIX

Islam reached Southeast Asia many centuries later after it had reached China.¹ The exact time of its arrival in Southeast Asia is still debated, with dates ranging from 1100 to the 1300s (Reid 1993a, Ricklefs 1981). Despite its relatively late arrival, as compared with China, it was in Southeast Asia that Islamic sultanates emerged – for example, Pasai in north Sumatra (ca. 1297), Melaka on the west coast of Malaya (ca. 1400), Demak in west Java (ca. 1478), and many others (Milligan 2003, Federspiel 2002). Islam was thus a political force in the region long before modern nation-states emerged there.

Islam came into a region dominated by bilateral kinship patterns, in which both sexes have relative equality.² This indigenous egalitarianism was altered by the arrival of Hinduism and Buddhism, which inspired the formation of states ruled by god-kings who mediated between heaven and earth. The political hierarchy was believed to mirror a hierarchy of unequal souls – an idea legitimated by the concept of karma (Wolters 1982).

The Southeast Asian sultanates that subsequently emerged were transformations of these earlier “Indianized” kingdoms. Consequently, the Islamic rulers needed to reconcile the implicit egalitarianism of Islam with the Indic hierarchical conception of the god-king (Milner 1988). Islam thus came as an equalizing force which impacted on an earlier Indic hierarchy but resonated with an even earlier indigenous egalitarianism between the sexes.

The implicit egalitarianism of Islam is shared with other monotheisms in that all believers are supposedly equal before God. With this as a point of departure, Islam has been variously adapted and adopted, particularly in relation to the different schools of thought that came to the region, including schools that favor gender equality, as well as those that do not. Muslim women in Southeast Asia are thus part of an Islam that is plural and dynamic.

SOUTHEAST ASIAN ADAPTATIONS OF ISLAM AND THEIR GENDER IMPLICATIONS

Conversion to Islam in Southeast Asia was gradual. While conversion tended to occur among certain ruling elites in port cities, peasants and tribals tended to retain earlier religious traditions. Even among converts, it was (and still is) common to find religious syncretism fusing Islam with other beliefs (Bentley and Ziegler 2003).

Islam came in the context of an Islamicate civilization brought by mystics and merchants. The former are associated with Sufi Islam and the latter with a more ritualistic, Sharī'a-based Islam of the Sunnī Shāfi'ī school of jurisprudence (Lapidus 1991). Sufi Islam accommodated pre-Islamic practices, as well as indigenous ideas of gender equality. But even Sharī'a-based Shāfi'ī Islam did not entrench patriarchy.

As a result, Muslim women in Southeast Asia have always enjoyed a relatively high status. Historically, among many Muslim populations in the region, women have owned property and dominated local markets as traders (Reid 1988, 146–64). Culturally, the Muslim Minangkabau people of West Sumatra continue to be matrilineal up to this day (Blackwood 1997, 1999, NationMaster.com 2004).

Religion was (and in Indonesia, still is) no hindrance to marriage between Muslim women and men of other religions. The fifteenth-century Arab navigator, Aḥmad Ibn Majīd, observed the following practices among Southeast Asian Muslims: “The infidel marries Muslim women while the Muslim takes a pagan to wife” (Ibn Majīd 1462, 206, Pires 1515, 268, quoted in Reid 1988, 155).

Women's political leadership in Southeast Asia further indicates relative gender equality. The sultanates of Patani (in the Isthmus of Kra) in 1584 and Aceh (in north Sumatra) in 1641 came to be ruled by sultānas (female rulers). Their reign lasted a century in Patani and 58 years in Aceh. During the reign of the third queen of Aceh, the ‘ulamā' (theologians) mounted a campaign against her after obtaining a fatwa (legal pronouncement) from Mecca declaring women's rule illegitimate (Reid 1993b, 265–6).

Despite the controversy over female political leadership, the sultānas' relatively long reign shows that women's right to rule was accepted to a significant degree. There are different interpretations in Islam about women's right to govern. Although tradition states that a ruler is an imam and that no man should pray behind a female as an imam, there is nevertheless a sect that declares that any capable woman who can fight the enemy can become an imam and lead the umma (congregation of believers).³

More recently, at the end of the nineteenth century, the Riau sultanate was also ruled by a self-described “Sultan Fatimah,” who eventually bequeathed her throne to her son (Wee 1985). Women's right to rule continues to be a contested issue among Muslims three centuries later, as exemplified by Indonesia's President Megawati Sukarnoputri, who became the country's first female president in 2001, after initial Muslim opposition to her appointment (Mahmood 1 January 2004). Megawati is the daughter of Sukarno, the first president of Indonesia, and her case implies a persisting belief in an older right – that of a son or daughter to inherit the father's position.

THE POSTCOLONIAL MODERN NATION-STATE

In Southeast Asia, the transition from premodern kingdoms to modern nation-states was mediated through European colonialization. Southeast Asian nation-states did not evolve through a metamorphosis of indigenous systems. Instead, the postcolonial Asian nation-state has been superimposed on at least four layers of earlier political history – that is, colonial states, Islamic sultanates (and their equivalents), Indianized kingdoms, and indigenous tribalism. None of these has completely supplanted previous layers.

The result is a dynamic plurality of different social realities, which may be complementary, competitive, or conflicting. For example, the nation-state and the umma may coexist in complementarity, or they may compete with each other for the allegiance of their citizens/members, or they may conflict with each other in what they demand of their citizens/members. Muslim women (and also men) thus have to negotiate their way through a complex situation of multiple interacting realities.

A historical example of the complementarity of nationalism and Islam is Sarekat Islam (Islamic Union), a reformist movement that arose in Java in 1911, regarded as Indonesia's first nationalist movement (McVey 1965). Sarekat Islam and other such movements promoted women's political participation as equal members of a modern Islamic nation (Petrus Blumberger 1931). Another such movement in Indonesia, Muhammadiyah, set up in 1914 a separate women's organization called Aisyiyah (after an influential wife of the Prophet) and built women's mosques (allegedly unique to the Indonesian archipelago), kindergartens, and women's Islamic schools, thereby encouraging women to be active agents of change (Overview of world religions). Women's political participation in modern nation-building thus began in the context of these Islamic reformist movements.

SHARĪ'A, ADAT, AND CIVIL LAW

Many Muslims in Southeast Asia are subject to three bodies of law – Sharī'a (Islamic law), adat (customary law), and secular civil law. Under British indirect rule, the sultans were allowed to administer only Sharī'a and adat. This divided jurisdiction was formalized in the Treaty of Pangkor in 1874 (Wee 2003) and continues in contemporary Malaysia, where Sharī'a and adat are still administered separately by the local governments of the nine sultanates (now called states). The result is “a lack of uniformity of laws among [the Malaysian] states” (ADB 2002, 62).

Sharī'a and adat differ in that the former is administered formally through the Sharī'a court, while adat is administered informally through social practice. In some cases, Sharī'a takes precedence, while in other cases, adat prevails. For example, in the Malaysian states of Negeri Sembilan and Melaka, local Muslims follow matrilineal adat laws in matters of inheritance and divorce, even when these contradict Sharī'a injunctions (Hooker 1984, Kamali 1998, 158–79).

Although Muslims in Southeast Asia are subject to three bodies of laws, they come under the jurisdiction of only two courts, Sharī'a and civil courts. Dual jurisdiction for Muslim citizens applies not only to Malaysia with its surviving sultanates and the Brunei sultanate, but also to Singapore, Thailand, and the Philippines, where Muslims constitute minorities. The Sharī'a court usually has jurisdiction only over cases related to marriage, divorce, betrothal, nullity of marriage, judicial separation, division of property on divorce, payment of bride-price, maintenance, compensation for a divorced wife, and inheritance (Chandrasegar 2000).

Dual jurisdiction has gendered consequences, because the status of women differs in civil law and in Islamic law. Muslim women subject to dual jurisdiction tend to be less than equal to Muslim men and to non-Muslim citizens. For example, in Malaysia and Singapore, a Muslim man is legally permitted to have up to four wives, whereas a Muslim woman can have only one husband. In contrast, non-Muslims in Malaysia and Singapore are guaranteed monogamous marriages by the civil law of the state, with polygamy deemed a crime (ADB 2002, 62).

The limitation of the Sharī'a to family law in Malaysia and Singapore was inherited from colonial administrative practice, where criminal law and civil law, apart from family law, came under the purview of British common law (Jayasankaran 1999, Economist 1993, Ong 1999, Hor 2001). The Islamic state government of Kelantan in Malaysia enlarged the scope of the Sharī'a on 25 November 1993, when it enacted the Syariah Criminal Code (11) Enactment 1993. This expanded scope covers hudūd and qisās offences. Hudūd law deals with mandatory punishment for theft, robbery, illicit sex, alcohol consumption, and apostasy, with such punishment being mostly corporal in nature, while qisās (law of retaliation) deals with bodily injury or loss of life, where the punishment is death or imprisonment, but with the proviso that financial compensation can be given if the victim's guardian forgives the offender.

However, the federal government of Malaysia has stated that criminal law comes under its jurisdiction. Not only has it refused to ratify these locally adopted hudūd and qisās laws, the federal government has also warned that legal action will be taken should any state government implement local laws that contravene federal laws (Aljazeera.net 28 October 2003). As a result, despite the Syariah Criminal Code (11) Enactment 1993 in Kelantan, no Muslim criminal law has ever been implemented there (or elsewhere in Southeast Asia).

In countries with a single jurisdiction, such as China and Australia, civil law applies to Muslim and non-Muslim citizens alike. However, under both single and dual jurisdictions, Muslim women find themselves in a bind. If they seek to be full citizens, subject only to civic law, other Muslims may consider them as being un-Islamic in their behavior, even if the outcome of this is relative gender equality. On the contrary, if they seek to be subject to Islamic law, thereby demonstrating their Islamic identity, they may find their status reduced by certain gendered injunctions of the Sharī'a. To transcend this bind, feminist Muslims promote a vision of Islam that upholds “equality, justice and freedom,” to quote the Malaysian group called Sisters in Islam (SIS).

WOMEN'S “CITIZENSHIP” IN KELANTAN – HEARTLAND OF A PROPOSED “ISLAMIC STATE”

The Islamic Party (Parti Islam SeMalaysia or PAS) of Malaysia has formed the state government of Kelantan since 1990. PAS has long been known to have an agenda to establish an Islamic state in Malaysia (Beatrix 1994). PAS released its Islamic State Document on 12 November 2003 (PAS 2003), which has a section called “Policy on Women,” declaring the following objectives:

1. To empower women in accordance to their nature and potentials [sic];
2. To present a comprehensive policy on Women Development [sic];
3. To encourage healthy competition of women alongside men within the limits of the Shari’ah;
4. To eliminate the exploitation of women in all aspects of life;
5. To prepare a new strategic plan for women in the new millennium;
6. To encourage cross-cultural women integration irregardless [sic] of race and religion (PAS 2003).

The Democratic Action Party, an opposition party, criticized this Islamic State Document, asking what constitutes the “limits of the Shari’ah” for women (Lim 2003). It is worth investigating what women’s “citizenship” means in PAS-ruled Kelantan. In the 1990s, the PAS state government introduced certain Islamic policies, such as the following:

1. compulsory hijāb (Islamic dress code) for all Muslim women and all working women in the state, including non-Muslims: this entails covering the head with a headscarf;
2. banning of all forms of public entertainment, including traditional performing arts, as well as modern forms of entertainment, such as discos and fun fairs;
3. banning of liquor and gambling;
4. sex-segregated check-out lanes at supermarkets;
5. cinemas to keep the lights on during screenings.

Tourists and visitors (Phillion 22 March 2000), and the queen (that is, the wife of the sultan of Kelantan) are exempted from the compulsory Islamic dress code. However, PAS leaders frequently criticize the wife of former Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad and top women officials because they do not wear headscarves.

No woman with uncovered head is allowed to enter the office of the chief minister of the Kelantan state government. Yet a portrait of the non-veiled queen hangs in his office. In 1992, when Asma Beatrix interviewed the chief minister about hierarchy and equality in his vision of the Islamic state, he admitted that the royalty has “a very special place.” This implies the persistence of an Indic hierarchy that exempts the queen as royal ruler from the compulsory Islamic dress code to which lower-ranking women are subjected (Beatrix 1999).

Apart from the compulsory covering of their heads, there has been no evident withdrawal of women from public space. The street markets of Kelantan continue to be dominated by women traders. While they too wear headscarves, they take care to choose bright colors and to match them with appropriate long dresses and make-up.

What is more significant is the political participation of Kelantan women in electoral politics. Like other women in Malaysia, Kelantan women enjoy universal suffrage. While PAS had no women candidates in the 1999 general elections, it fielded ten women candidates in the 2004 general elections, with two of them winning a parliamentary seat at the federal level and a state seat (Koshy 25 March 2004). Their wins are particularly notable, since PAS lost disastrously overall in the 2004 elections.⁴

Therefore, despite the imposition of Islamic policies and the proposal of an Islamic state, as long as all citizens are able to participate freely in political life and to vote for their representatives, women can continue to shape their political future through the ballot box. They can choose to seek in Islamic parties a sense of belonging that is akin to family ties and a position from which to resist secular dominance; they can affirm their citizenship in non-religious terms; or they can blend Islamic identity with citizenship, as feminist Muslims are trying to do.

NOTES

1. The earliest country in the Asia-Pacific region to have contact with Islam was China during the Tang dynasty (618–907). ‘Uthmān b. ‘Affān, the third Caliph, is said to have sent a delegation to China in the year 650 – that is, 29 A.H. or 18 years after the death of the Prophet Muhammad (peace be upon him). The head of the delegation was Sayyid Waqqās, a maternal uncle of the Prophet.

2. While matriliney is found in some Southeast Asian societies, there is an absence of patriliney except among certain migrant groups from India and China (Andaya 1994, 99–116).

3. This view is associated with a sect known in Muslim historiography as the Shabībiyya, adherents of the Khārijī Shabīb al-Najrānī (c. 100/718 also known as Shabīb b. Yazīd), who had fought, along with his mother and wife, against the reigning caliph at the beginning of the eighth century. Even in contemporary theocratic Iran, there are some clerics who promote the right of women to run for presidential elections, though such advocates are still marginal (Zan-e Ruz, no. 1440, 12/25/93, 14–17, cited in Keddie 2000, 422).

4. Seats held by PAS at the national level fell from 27 to just 7. It lost control of the Trengganu state legislature, winning only 2 of the 32 seats in the state assembly. It retained control over the Kelantan state legislature by a margin of only 4 seats over the opposition’s 20 seats (Pereira 2004, Bernama 2004).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- ADB (Asian Development Bank), Sociolegal status of women in Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines and Thailand, Manila 2002, <http://www.adb.org/Documents/Studies/Sociolegal_Status_Women/default.asp>.
- Aljazeera.net, Mahathir rejects Islamic law, 28 October 2003, <<http://www.drmahathirmohamad.com/news/007.htm>>.
- B. W. Andaya, The changing religious role of women in pre-modern South East Asia, in South East Asia Research 2:2 (September 1994), 99–116.
- A. L. Beatrix, Behind the veil. Islam in Malaysia and Tunisia, in H. Buchholt and G. Stauth (eds.), Investigating the South-South dimension of modernity and Islam, Hamburg 1999, 41–55.
- , The Muslim state. Pursuing a mirage?, in N. Othman (ed.), Shari'a law and the modern nation-state, Kuala Lumpur 1994, 33–44.
- J. H. Bentley and H. F. Ziegler, Traditions and encounters. A global perspective on the past, Boston 2003.
- Bernama, Being too ambitious proved costly for PAS, Kuala Lumpur, 24 March 2004, 1.
- E. Blackwood, Women, land, and labor. Negotiating clientage and kinship in a Minangkabau peasant community, in Ethnology 36:4 (Fall 1997), 277–91.
- , Big house and small houses. Doing matriliney in West Sumatra, in Ethnos. Journal of Anthropology 64:1 (March 1999), 32–57.
- C. Chandrasegar, Singapore legal system, October 2000, <<http://www.tpclaw.com.sg/sls/sls.htm>>.
- Economist*, Islam in Asia. For God and growth in Malaysia, 27 November 1993, 39.
- H. M. Federspiel, Modernist Islam in Southeast Asia. A new examination, in Muslim World 92:3/4 (Fall 2002), 371–87.
- M. B. Hooker, Islamic law in South-East Asia, Singapore 1984.
- M. Hor, Singapore's innovations to due process, in Criminal Law Forum 12:1 (2001), 25–40.
- S. Jayasankaran, Caught in the act, in Far Eastern Economic Review (28 October 1999), 60–2.
- M. H. Kamali, Islamic law in Malaysia. Issues and developments, in E. Cotran and C. Mallat (eds.), Yearbook of Islamic and Middle Eastern law, iv, London 1998, 158–79.
- N. R. Keddie, Women in Iran since 1979, in Social Research 67:2 (Summer 2000), 422.
- S. Koshy, More women elected but will they speak up?, 25 March 2004, <http://thestar.com.my/election2004/story.asp?file=/2004/3/25/e2004_news/7619560&csec=e2004_news>.
- I. M. Lapidus, A history of Islamic societies, Cambridge 1991.
- K. S. Lim, Five questions on the incompatibility of the PAS Islamic State blueprint with democracy, human rights, women rights and pluralism, 16 November 2003, <<http://www.malaysia.net/dap/lks2748.htm>>.
- K. Mahmood, Megawati picks Islamic leader as running mate, 1 January 2004, <<http://www.islamonline.net/English/News/2004-05/06/article05.shtml>>.
- R. T. McVey, The rise of Indonesian communism, Ithaca, N.Y. 1965.
- J. A. Milligan, Teaching between the cross and the crescent moon. Islamic identity, postcoloniality, and public education in the Southern Philippines, in Comparative Education Review 47:4 (November 2003), 468–92.
- A. C. Milner, Islam and the Muslim state, in M. B. Hooker (ed.), Islam in South-East Asia, Leiden 1983, 1988², 23–49.
- NationMaster.com, Encyclopaedia. Minangkabau, 2004, <<http://www.nationmaster.com/encyclopedia/Minangkabau>>.
- D. S. L. Ong, The Singapore family court. Family law in practice, in International Journal of Law, Policy and the Family 13:3 (December 1999), 328–49.
- Overview of world religions, Muhammadiyah, <<http://philtar.ucsm.ac.uk/encyclopedia/indon/muham.html>>.
- PAS (Parti Islam SeMalaysia), The Islamic state document, 2003, <<http://www.wluml.org/english/news/pas-islamic-state-2003.pdf>>.
- B. Pereira, PAS dicing with bitter harvest, in New Straits Times, 9 April 2004, 10.
- J. T. Petrus Blumberger, De Nationalistische Beweging in Nederlandsch-Indië, Haarlem 1931.
- S. E. Phillon, Malaysian state asks women to cover up (fwd), PEN-L mailing list archive, 22 March 2000, <<http://archives.econ.utah.edu/archives/pen-/2000m03.4/msg0051.htm>>.
- A. Reid, Southeast Asia in the age of commerce, i, New Haven, Conn. 1988, 146–64.
- , Islamization and Christianization in Southeast Asia. The critical phase, 1550–1650, in A. Reid (ed.), Southeast Asia in the early modern era. Trade, power, and belief, Ithaca, N.Y. 1993a, 151–79.
- , Southeast Asia in the age of commerce, 1450–1680, New Haven, Conn. 1993b, 265–6.
- M. C. Ricklefs, A history of modern Indonesia, c. 1300 to the present, Bloomington, Ind. 1981, 316.
- SIS (Sisters in Islam, 2000–2004, <http://www.sistersinislam.org.my/home_mission.htm>.
- V. Wee, Melayu. Hierarchies of being in Riau, Ph.D. thesis, Australian National University, Canberra 1985.
- , The quest for an Islamic state as a response to the secular state, in Ex/Change 7 (June 2003), 10–16.
- O. W. Wolters, History, culture and region in Southeast Asian perspectives, Singapore 1982.

VIVIENNE WEE AND ASMA BEATRIX

Western Europe

As Westerners, and whether we like it or not, we are henceforth, as Nathan Glazer (1997) has stated, all multicultural, a point we must surely acknowledge. The multicultural nature of Europe's national communities is a recent phenomenon connected with the sedentarization of those waves of immigrants who settled in Europe following the Second World War, and who all shared the common characteristic of coming from non-European, mainly Islamic, cultures.

Postcolonial immigrants in Europe live on the fringes of their respective societies, victims of racism and discrimination. For those who oppose it, multiculturalism intends merely to excuse the fact that integration has failed, and, at the same time, the fact that the principle of equality has been defeated. Opponents of multiculturalism are keen to point out that "praise of difference" is at the heart of racist discourse (Malik 2001, 31). The debate is far from over between the following two viewpoints: a first position states that policies on multiculturalism function to sustain social inequality; a second holds that such policies promote change within the norms and values that are the very foundations of democracies by incorporating certain elements of the immigrants' cultures.

Both positions hold some truth. For a critical perspective of ethnic minorities and multiculturalism, we must note that the majority of policies that are put into action are based on a confusion between race and culture, a fact explained by their direct link with the settling of immigrants "of color." Those European countries such as the United Kingdom or the Netherlands that are often held up as examples of successful multicultural countries actually became multicultural through a reactive process. Such reactive multiculturalism is a response to the economic and social difficulties generated by the sedentarization of immigrants of color in traditionally assimilationist countries, even though such countries may not have been ethnically homogeneous. This has been the predominant situation in Europe since the Second World War, where immigrants could no longer be effortlessly assimilated given that the material potential for integration had been eroded. At the same time, the shock waves sent out by the Second World War and decolonization weakened the notion of a dominant culture. In this respect, it is revealing that in countries where regional differences have been preserved, such as is the case in the United Kingdom, Belgium, and the Netherlands, systems put into place to help new immigrants adapt are specific to each situation, borrowing very little from the historically-acquired wisdom on the incorporation of ethnic groups with cultural and linguistic differences. This happens to such a degree that the term "ethnic minority" is often made to be synonymous with "immigrant group." Britain, for example, never fully completed cultural integration, meaning that British culture is far from being homogeneous, despite the fact that political narratives still orchestrate a sense of Britishness. However, the settlement of immigrants in no way benefited from this history of diversity management. As early as 1958, with the riots of Nottingham and Notting Hill which involved immigrants, the illusion of a tolerant British society was quickly shattered. Unemployment was almost nonexistent at the time and consequently explanations put forward immediately evoked immigrants' skin color and the problems of racial conflict. The multicultural structures and systems introduced since 1968 have primarily been a response to a need to create conditions that will usher in interracial harmony.

There are, in general, many misunderstandings and false perceptions regarding the rights and privileges accorded to ethnic groups. A cursory glance at the situation in Europe reveals that, far from the often fantasized perceptions of privileges bestowed on specific communities or ethnic groups, the policies that are put into place are, for the most part, measures taken in order to prevent and fight against inequality and discrimination linked to race or ethnicity. Even in an officially assimilationist country like France, the use of such policies will be found. In addition to this element of the battle against inequalities, there is also in general what Audrey Kobayashi calls "red boot" multiculturalism (1993, 205-31), that is, the financing of various cultural events such as, for example, a festival of Berber music, a rap concert, or an exhibition of African art. What is known as multiculturalism, then, consists in a partial assimilation with the dominant public culture, and a preservation of individual cultures within the private sphere (which includes not just the family, but the neighborhood and the world of volunteer organizations). The arrival of Islam within European societies brings into question this dominant approach, and engenders a debate on what public culture actually "contains," explicitly laying down as a principle the coexistence of several cultures.

In all countries that promote them, multicultural systems and structures are far from being unanimously accepted. The common denominator of different critical accounts highlights the ineffectiveness of multiculturalism, which, far from reducing inequalities, tends, in certain cases, to exacerbate them by ethnicizing and racializing social and economic issues, and by making ethnic groups more dependent in view of their public financing. Criticism also focuses on the way that the culture that forms the foundations of public policies is conceived. From this point of view, it is in Sweden that the denunciation of "ethnic business" and the "ethnic Tower of Babel" resounds with the greatest clarity. Alund and Shierup do not balk at the term "cultural racism" when describing the manner in which immigrants' cultures are trapped by essentialism and exoticism. In a move to respect cultural differences, the Other's culture all too often becomes an artifact disconnected from the living culture. It is perceived by most people as a homogeneous entity, fixed and imported, which the new immigrants can decide to preserve or replace. It is thus the dominant groups who define the Other's culture, as well as the place assigned to it within the public sphere. Islam very often becomes a disembodied object of knowledge in whose name public policies are put into place (such as the teaching of Arabic, or religious instruction) without immigrant populations having been consulted as to their real needs (Alund and Schierup 1991).

The most controversial aspects of acknowledging Muslim minorities are less connected with cultural differences (and respect for them), and are more strictly located within the domain of religion. The political problem does not reside in the conflict between the rights of the citizen and collective rights; rather it concerns the internal restrictions as related to common law that are laid claim to by a specific group. In other words, is one group, whatever this group may be, within its rights to ask the state to intervene in order to guarantee practices that might oppress the individual? It is within such circumstances that the status of Islam is often considered to be problematic, whether in relation to dress code, marriage, divorce, work, or social life. The cultural reality of Western female Muslims is, in fact, much more complex insofar as they are experiencing an Islamic law that has adapted to the secular and pluralistic context.

IMPLICIT ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF CIVIL ISLAMIC LAW UNDER WESTERN LAW

It is an unprecedented situation that often receives no attention: Islamic legal norms are being reconstructed in the West as a function of the principles of dominant European law. Within the dominant scenario of the majority of Muslims who accept the legal and institutional framework of the country where they live, an adaptation of Islam to the national law is indeed in progress. Astonishingly, this adaptation is, in most cases, passive. In fact, this adjustment does not emanate from legal experts of Muslim theologians, but from European and American judges. The consequence is the slow and "invisible" construction of a new form of Islam, of an Islam that has been adjusted to Western law (Cesari 2004). The contours of this evolution are more or less clear depending on the country and the Islamic group concerned. In the case of England, Pearl and Menski (1998) call this hybrid legal system "Angrezi Shari'a." "While English Law is clearly the official law, Muslim Law in Britain today has become part of the sphere of unofficial law. This analytical paradigm indicates that Muslims continue to feel bound by the framework of the Shari'a and value it more than Western concepts . . . Thus, rather than adjusting to English law by abandoning certain facets of their Shari'a, South Asian Muslims in Britain appear to have built the requirements of English Law into their own traditional legal structures" (Pearl and Menski 1998, 75). This emergent hybrid product is marked with the seal of Western individualist culture, that is, it is marked as being compatible with the principle of individual freedom. The recognition (even implicit) of such a principle is currently redefining Islamic regulations with regard to the status of the individual and the family, the two main areas where discord arises between the norms of Western law on individuals' rights and the legal norms of Muslim countries. It proves to be beneficial to the status of women and to their empowerment.

Islamic precepts regarding the family and the individual have been profoundly altered by life in the West. In matters of family law, most Muslim countries privilege a system of norms that accredits polygamy, gives priority to the husband throughout divorce proceedings, and does not recognize civil or inter-religious marriages. Usually, conflicts arise within international law on individuals' rights when the legal prescriptions of certain foreign countries contradict basic human rights in matters such as marriage or divorce.

It is within the domain of repudiation that arbitration or attempts at reconciliation between religious law and civil judgments are often necessary. Repudiation is everywhere prohibited by current Western laws. When a minority group is more organized, judges can take into account recommendations made by religious decision-makers. In England, a reconciliation body has been set up, the Shariah Council, in order to settle disputes that may occur over forms of religious and civil marriage. Concerning polyamy, when a husband refuses to consent to his wife's plea for divorce, the wife can resort to the Shariah Council, which then summons the two parties and tries to offer a form of arbitration. However, it seems that in the future legal conflicts centered on polygamy will continue to decline in number since this practice is practically no longer followed by those individuals socialized in the context of Western society. Certain female law experts are currently emerging, arguing that the Qur'anic norms in matters of marriage are actually those of monogamy. Other conflictual aspects of Islamic family life concern the religion of children and child custody, notably in cases of inter-religious marriages. In Islam, the father transmits his name and his religion to his children. He is thus legally entitled to custody of the children in the event of divorce from a non-Muslim woman. In general, Western courts do not recognize such a principle except if it is in the best interest of the child.

A new set of Islamic norms is thus currently being forged in the European and American courts of justice. As a general rule, negotiation is suitable in all aspects of family life. The recognition of individual freedom and the taking into account of each party's best interest leads to compromises that change not only the letter but also the spirit of the Islamic norms, stripping them of the meanings they have in Islamic societies. One example of this transformation, which sheds light on how a Muslim can be "acclimatized" to the norms of Western law, concerns the length of the commonly accepted period of viduity. The traditional law on the required amount of time that must elapse before remarriage cannot be followed to the letter in European societies. Inheritance rules offer another example of the way practices translated for the new context demonstrate flexibility. Once again, Islamic precepts (two parts for each son compared to one part per daughter) cannot always be strictly adhered to, especially within those legal systems influenced by Roman law (Roman law ensures that each descendant is equally respected under the law). It is in matters of repudiation that the changes are the most profound, but also the most difficult to identify. Even though repudiation can still officially take place in the eyes of the religious group, it may have been unofficially initiated by the wife herself. Moreover, repudiation is increasingly discussed by both partners. The fact that man and wife may respect traditional Islamic law cannot therefore predetermine a situation of oppression or inequality within the marriage. The decline of polygamy and negotiation in matters of repudiation are thus the two main elements of transformation within Muslim law within the context of democracy.

INDIVIDUAL FREEDOMS UNDERMINED?

Finally, the risk often associated with the incorporation of Islam into Western society is that of a breach of individual freedoms, especially for women. The dilemma between individual freedom and the rights of minorities (which has solidified the opposition between liberals and communitarists) often serves as a reference framework for controversy. For the liberals, the highest of political values resides in individual freedom; they thus applaud the individual emancipation in all prescribed and inherited statutes. On the contrary, communitarists denounce the conception of the autonomous individual as mere fiction, and emphasize the importance of social determinisms and power relationships. Either the group is produced by individual practices, or the individual is produced by group practices: such are the alternatives that subtend the opposition between the two viewpoints. However, concrete observation of ethnic needs/demands, including those made in the name of Islam, reveal that most groups attempt on a daily basis to reconcile regard for individual freedom with the acknowledgment of specific cultures. The famous opposition between individual rights and collective rights thus appears more of a theoretical question than one based in social reality. What we are witnessing is more of an attempt at integration that also preserves religious, cultural, or ethnic differences. The debate on forced marriages in the British context illustrates the ethnic resistance to the recognition of individual freedom that is covered by Islamic arguments and denounced by some Muslims. The relevant question is thus how the protection of specific subcultures can favor individual emancipation instead of stifling it.

As we have seen, acknowledgment of Islam's specific characteristics within Western societies does not resemble, by far, a structured program for recognition of a Muslim minority endowed with special rights, but occurs in fragments within two main sectors: organization of worship and family life. The vast majority of Muslims have adapted to this situation as is shown, for example, by the lack of demand that Shari'a be applied. Moreover, these same Muslims are engaged in a vast process of theological and philosophical legitimization of their condition as a minority. This could be experienced as a limitation, but is, in fact, perceived as emancipatory. On the other hand, whole sections of Western societies consider inappropriate, even scandalous, certain positions or requests which could quite easily be met within the framework of existing common law. This is, for example, the case with the headscarf in the French secular context. The hijāb worn in public schools is seen as a sign of the oppression of the female while some Muslim women claim that any law that bans it violates their right to religious expression. This divergence between Muslims and non-Muslims is affecting the process of recognition of Islam in secular European societies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Alund and K.-U. Schierup, Paradoxes of multiculturalism. Essays on Swedish society, Aldershot, Hants., England 1991.
 J. Cesari, When Islam and democracy meet. Muslims in Europe and the United States, New York 2004.
 N. Glazer, We are all multicultural now, Cambridge 1997.
 M. Kenan, The perils of pluralism. A re-examination of

- the terms of engagement between races and cultures, and a plea for equality, in Diversity Factor 9:3 (Spring 2001), 31-4.
- A. Kobayashi, Multiculturalism. Representing a Canadian institution, in J. Duncan and D. Ley (eds.), Place/culture/representation, London 1993, 205-31.
- D. Pearl and W. Menski, Muslim family law, London 1998, 74.

JOCELYNE CESARI

Civil Society

Overview

Recent research on Muslim women's lives outside the home and harem has called into question accepted truths about the nature of their seclusion. An important branch of this scholarship has focused on Muslim women as citizens in civil society. Scholars have engaged the prevailing liberal model of civil society, defined as an arena of public discourse and action separate from political, economic, and domestic spheres (Cohen and Arato 1992, Butenschon 2000, Norton 1995). The collective impact of this engagement constitutes a revisionist literature that rejects strict divisions of public and private as Eurocentric and that instead emphasizes the fluidity of power networks and the negotiated nature of boundaries between state, market, and family in many postcolonial and Islamic societies. Many of these scholars have found evidence of civil society where liberal thinkers have found only absence: in the medieval era, in the Ottoman Empire, and under military dictatorships today. They have also exposed the gendered process by which civil society has been historically constructed, challenging essentialist views of Islam as synonymous with patriarchy and antithetical to democracy. By focusing on the importance of intermediary groups in the creation of political discourses and structures, this literature challenges easy equivalences between Islam, women's oppression, and dictatorship.

EARLY AND MEDIEVAL ISLAMIC SOCIETIES

Scholars of Islam's earliest centuries have re-examined legal discourses that appear to have marginalized women in communal and political affairs. Mernissi (1991) has argued that the Prophet established at Medina the principle that all believers are equal before God through a revolutionary conflation of public and private spheres: he situated his wives' apartments adjacent to the first mosque and took them along to battlefields so that they might participate fully in communal affairs. Stowasser (1994) has similarly observed that seventh-century Medinan women took public oaths of allegiance and service to the community. However, she argues that the Prophet's later revelations explicitly definied a private family sphere for women and children that was off-limits to strangers, especially men. The intent was not, however, to cut women off from politics. Stowasser and other scholars use the term segregation rather than seclusion to emphasize women's separate but nonetheless important Qur'anic role in what may be called the earliest Islamic civil society. Scholars generally agree, however, that this egalitarian ideal was corrupted after the Prophet's death, when Persian and Byzantine patriarchal values influenced Muslim legal scholars' readings of scripture. As Spellberg (1994) has shown, Sunnī and Shī'ī scholars used ḥadīth concerning the Prophet's favorite wife, 'Ā'isha, to ban women from politics altogether. In ninth-century legal discourse, women's segregation became seclusion.

This portrait of legal isolation from political and communal affairs has been challenged, however, by late medievalists who have had greater access to historical sources that suggest how Muslim women actually lived. From the eleventh century, a new, Islamic civil society appears to have emerged outside Arabia. A new patrician class of scholar-merchant families reordered urban life around distinctively Islamic institutions that had varying degrees of autonomy from the state (Bulliet 1972, Lapidus 1988). In Arab lands, Goldberg (1993) has argued, scholar-merchant elites actively protected their autonomy from monarchy through their mobility and their control of legal interpretation. He and other scholars have challenged old views that there was no "public" life in medieval and early modern Islamic cities simply because they did not exhibit the formal and autonomous institutions or mental divisions between public and private that characterized the European world (Reynolds 2001). Recent research on the Ottoman eighteenth century, for example, suggests that the devolution of political power from Istanbul did not produce a chaos of private fiefdoms, but rather new, dense networks of fiscal, cultural, and political influence that bound public and private interests across the empire (Salzmann 1993).

Within the robust urbanism of merchants' bazaars, waqf foundations for families and charities, private madrassa colleges, and Sufi mystical brotherhoods, women were surprisingly active. In Mamluk Cairo, for instance, elite women routinely owned residential and other properties and expended family wealth to fund schools and charities, while poorer women worked outside the home in a variety of occupations as peddlars, bathhouse attendants, medical and spiritual advisors, and domestic servants. Women played similar roles in early modern Istanbul and Aleppo. In imperial capitals and provincial seats alike, they built mosques, libraries, and clinics for the poor, and they participated in political revolts and religious movements (Keddie and Baron 1991, Sonbol 1996, Marcus 1989, Hamblly 1998). In West Africa, Muslim Hausa women remained active in public and retained authority in the local religious tradition of Bori through the eighteenth century (Callaway and Creevey 1994). And in eighteenth-century India, elite Muslim women used their seclusion as a political resource in resisting British interference in their regions (Barnett 1998). Elite women's activities should not be understood as simply extensions of state power. As Faroqhi (2000), Babayan (1998), and others have shown, art, architecture, and charity were activities embedded in urban social networks.

The precise nature of pre-nineteenth-century civil society – and the extent of women's participation in it – remains unclear. Current research on the Islamic past also lacks clarity on how the gendering of civil society changed over time and space. Certainly, the nature of the state regime was a major factor. A comparison of seventeenth-century Isfahan and Shahjahanabad, for example, shows that the poorer but more homogeneously Muslim Iranian capital permitted a greater role in architectural patronage for non-imperial women while the heterogeneous Mughal capital relaxed norms of seclusion and permitted a greater public role for royal women (Blake 1998). And scholars of the Ottoman Tulip Period in the early eighteenth century have demonstrated how the state deliberately altered gender boundaries as part of a broader cultural policy, and how it had to negotiate with other interests in order to do so (Zarinebaf-Shahr 1998). Indeed, class played an important role in gendering civil society. Ascendant military and scholarly families appear to have imposed class-based definitions of male and female space to mark their status as Petry (1991), Khouri (1996), and Zilfi (1996), among others, have shown.

COLONIAL-ERA REFORMS

From the late nineteenth century, civil societies in Islamic countries clearly underwent a substantial transformation. Shifting trade routes, new technologies of transportation and communication, European intervention, and state reforms combined to alter society and the nature of public life.

By 1900, cityscapes had been transformed to include new forms of public spaces in governmental centers, parks and gardens, theaters, and even retail shops. Educational, cultural, political, and charitable associations mushroomed as elite classes mobilized around various programs of social and political reform. A vibrant press thrived in varying degrees of autonomy from the state. Meanwhile, workers began to form unions independent of their artisanal masters and often in defiance of state regulation.

Women's participation in the new civil societies took on new, more institutionalized forms that would coalesce into formal women's movements in the early twentieth century. By 1900, elite Egyptian women had founded journals, schools, and charity organizations that carved a newly public sphere of social and cultural reform, autonomous from the British-controlled state. Like women reformers in Tunisia, the Levant, Turkey, Iran, India, and Indonesia, they reconceived the household and housewife as part of – not apart from – the nation and society, and as principal sites of modernization and progress. Calls to educate mothers of citizens spread across the Islamic world, signaling this expansion of women's role in civil society. Women in Indonesia, for example, established groups in every major town to promote women's education and social reform (Lochar-Scholten 2000). In 1928 they held their first national congress, the same year that Lebanese and Syrian women federated their groups. Elites were not alone in promoting social change. Before the First World War, women peasant migrants returned to Mount Lebanon from the Americas to promote new gender roles in Lebanese family and society (Khater 2001).

Modernization did not necessarily mean liberation – or liberalism. In Islamic countries as in European ones, women's emergence into new urban public arenas was fraught with conflict. Men were rankled by the intrusion of women into spaces formerly reserved for them. Male writers expressed fear that educated women would no longer obey their husbands. These common gender anxieties took on forms distinctive from Europe when they reflected not only the discursive repertoire of Islam, but also the different trajectory of social and political development in countries built upon different social structures and shaped by European industrial capitalism and colonization. First, new forms of association may have reflected social changes common to those in Europe, but they also coexisted, and competed, with older social networks and Islamic institutions such as Sufi brotherhoods and charitable institutions. Second, modern civil societies formed in Western Europe as arenas for the emergent capitalist bourgeoisie, and were therefore distinct from the state. Outside Europe, modern civil societies were most often products of state reforms, and so were located not separately from the state but at the intersection of the political and social spheres. They also reflected the conditions of the economic periphery. Modernization in most Islamic countries did not come with the prosperity and liberty experienced in Europe: rather, it came as the tool of intrusive governments and foreign colonizers. These factors combined to make the new civil societies sites of tremendous tension that often focused on issues of gender. Indeed, women often became a principal site upon which political and social cleavages opened. This contentiously gendered origin of modern civil societies would have profound effects upon women's strategies of mobilization and their futures as citizens.

Scholars have studied the gendering of civil society in modern Islamic societies primarily from two perspectives, that of discourse and that of institutional structure. Ahmed (1992), Abu-Lughod (1998), and others locate the origins of Muslim women's marginalization as citizens in the binary gendered discourse in the colonial era. Typical was the notoriously anti-suffragist British ruler of Egypt, Lord Cromer, who pronounced Egypt doomed to backwardness as long as its women remained veiled. Elites replicated that public-private, modern-traditional dichotomy in books like Qāsim Amīn's Tabrīr al-mar'a (The liberation of women, 1899), which argued that Egypt's path to modernity lay in the unveiling and education of its women. This modernist argument provoked a reactionary politics of authenticity by nationalists and Islamists who urged women to stay home and protect indigenous family values. This colonial binarism ultimately worked against women who fought for an equal voice in civil society, Ahmed argues, because it forced them to choose between their liberation and their patriotism, a choice eventually symbolized by their decision of whether or not to veil: "And therefore, ironically, it is Western discourse that in the first place determined the new meanings of the veil and gave rise to its emergence as a symbol of resistance" (Ahmed 1992, 164).

Even where Europeans did not directly rule, anxious discourses about Islam and gender identity in civil society exploded, as in the Constitutional Revolutions in Iran (1905–11) and the Ottoman Empire (1908–12). As Brummett (2000), Afary (1996), and others have shown in studies of the revolutionary press, gender became a touchstone of debates about democracy, Islam, and modernity. Erstwhile revolutionary allies, secular nationalists, and Islamic reformers soon split bitterly around the issues of women's education, suffrage, and even dress. After the First World War, Göle (1996) argues, Turkish Kemalists made the unveiling of women and the abolition of Islamic laws central to what became an authoritarian, Westernizing project. Kemalists' destruction of gender segregation was an all-out attack on the Islamic social order. Paidar (1995) argues that the Iranian Constitutional Revolution produced a dominant discourse of modernization under the Pahlavī dynasty (to 1979) that emphasized women's education and unveiling but left women firmly under religious law and male authority at home.

In the contentious discursive field that shaped public life, women sought to avoid the traps that would cast them as either anti-Islamic or anti-modern. It was a struggle simply to make their voices heard in public, as opponents employing a hardened Islamic discourse or patriarchal nationalism silenced women teachers and writers in early twentieth-century Iran, intimidated women writers and speakers and thus closed down women's journals in Syria and Lebanon, and harassed even the great Egyptian singer, Umm Kulthum (Milani 1992, Thompson 2000, Danielson 1999). Some women bridged secular-Islamic cleavages of public-private by mobilizing under the banner of religion. In India, Muslim women found space to mobilize within the broader Islamic revival; they advocated health reforms to assure the biological future of their community and wrote in Urdu-language journals (Ali 2000). In Algeria they used desert Sufi ribāts as bases of influence (Clancy-Smith 1991). In Egypt, women triangulated nationalist and Islamist discourses in various ways. The Muslim Sisters and other populist Islamic women's movements advocated women's reforms within an Islamic framework while biographies of famous Muslim women inspired women to public action (Booth 2001, Badran 1991). But there was a danger in pushing religious reform too far. For example, in Beirut in 1928, Nazira Zayn al-Din published a book, Veiling and Unveiling, that reinterpreted scripture to call for a return to the basic egalitarian principles of Islam and to remove the veils of medieval tradition that bound women. It unleashed a tide of condemnation from conservative clerics that effectively silenced her (Thompson 2000).

Locher-Scholten (2000) argues that Indonesian women adopted a particularly successful strategy under Dutch rule, in contrast to the paralyzing power of binary discourses in the Middle East. Local culture and economic practice kept the line between public and private far more fluid in Indonesian society than in many other Islamic societies, and nationalists did not restrict women to a domestic sphere protected from the colonial state, as in the Middle East and India. This fluidity permitted wider women's mobilization and more political options. Rather than confront the fateful choice between patriotism or liberation, Indonesian women adopted Islamic modernist discourses opposed to colonial modernism. Unlike most Middle Eastern women, they obtained suffrage from their colonial government.

Other scholars have emphasized the power of state and social structure, in addition to discourse, in marginalizing women in civil society. Frierson (1996) argues that Muslim Ottoman women who founded charities, published journals, opened shops, and ventured into the new public arena were careful not to stray too far from official Islamic norms, for they recognized that Abdülhamid II's state had staked the Ottoman future upon a Islamized equivalent of European national identity and civil society (see also Deringil 1998). Even in Arab provinces like Beirut, the Ottoman state intervened vigorously to regulate morality, including gender relations, in new forms of public space (Hanssen 2001). During the First World War, however, states in both the Middle East and Europe encouraged women's mobilization. Women's organizations mushroomed to meet the needs of the wounded and poor, to build girls' schools, and publish consciousness-raising journals, laying the groundwork for the formal movements of the interwar period.

But while wartime policies may have promoted the growth of women's movements, postwar structures of colonial rule often reinforced male dominance. As Thompson (2000) has shown, Syrian and Lebanese women living under the French Mandate confronted colonial alliances that bound civil society to the patriarchal power of tribal chiefs, religious patriarchs, and large landowners. This predisposed opposition groups to overcome their class differences by also agreeing to exclude women from civil society. These political pacts reinforced religious laws that guaranteed men's power over wives and daughters, and continued to weaken the women's movement's ability to mobilize long after independence. In Egypt, not only Cromer's ideology, but also British support of the monarchy and landowning class subverted the constitutional government established in the 1920s, and so marginalized women and the poor in politics. The weakness of the British mandatory state in Palestine contributed to the absolute breakdown of civil society there; as a result, Fleischmann (2003) argues, feminist and class politics were submerged into the violent nationalist conflict between Arabs and Zionists.

The effect of colonial policy on Islamic societies of West Africa is debated. Callaway and Creevey (1994) argue, for example, that France's more interventionist rule in Senegal created greater space for women's mobilization than did British policy in Nigeria, where the state granted greater autonomy to Muslim religious leaders. Cooper (1998), on the other hand, argues that women's oppression was not merely the result of unfettered Islam: Both French and British policies toward separate Hausa populations in Niger and Nigeria undermined women's prestige as scholars and their access to farmland, which were the critical prerequisites to their growing seclusion in the twentieth century.

Other scholars dispute the primacy of state structure in determining women's participation in civil society. Charrad, in her study of North Africa (2001), proposes kinship structure as the more important factor. She argues that the strength of tribes in Algeria and Morocco forced the French to cooperate with them in policies that encouraged a paternalistic conservatism toward women's status. Only in Tunisia, because of its weaker tribal power and precolonial legacy of bureaucratic centralization, were the French able to enact legal reforms that would strengthen women's status in civil society. In her study of South Asia, Jalal (1991) privileges class interest over either state or kin structure. She argues that Muslim women in colonial India were not passive victims of male nationalists' heightened cultural protectiveness; rather, elite women were complicit in efforts to maintain seclusion as a marker of their class and religious status. They began attending formal schools primarily as a defense against the influence of Christian missionary schools, not as a step toward autonomy and participation in a liberal civil society.

THE CONTEMPORARY PERIOD

Colonial-era legacies of binary discourse, identity conflict, and political structure inform research on Muslim women in contemporary civil societies. In postcolonial Lebanon, Algeria, and Pakistan, for example, scholars have found that postcolonial anxiety over religious identity and communal boundaries has intensified pressure to exclude women from civil society. Joseph (2000), for example, argues that communal bargaining in Lebanon since independence has produced pacts between the state and religious leaders that have reinforced kinship ties and undercut women's individual rights. Similarly, in Algeria, Cheriet (1996) argues, the weak independent state adopted populist policies that gendered civil society by buying men's loyalty in exchange for preservation of patriarchal practices that limited women's authority and independence both in and out of the home. In Pakistan, Haeri (1999) argues that civil society emerged not alongside or outside older kin structures, but rather intertwined with them. This historical reality, she maintains, explains the new phenomenon of political rape, where groups dishonor their political foes through the violation of female relatives – a practice apparently rooted in Pakistani soldiers' rapes of Bengali women during the civil war in 1971. The effect of these rapes has been to intensify protectiveness and seclusion of women, and so their exclusion from civil affairs.

These and other scholars of the contemporary Islamic world have thus sought to explain the error of Frantz Fanon's prediction in A Dying Colonialism (1967) that decolonization struggles would equalize male and female citizens. Revolutionary regimes did improve women's access to public resources and office during the 1960s and 1970s (Hatem 2000, Joseph 1991, Molyneux 1991, Kandiyoti 1991). However, as under the authoritarian, interwar regimes in Turkey and Iran, women's benefits were often only partial and won at the price of lost autonomy from the state. Revolutions, moreover, did not generally void the colonial era's patriarchal pacts and dichotomous discourses. In Egypt and South Yemen, for example, socialist revolution produced a backlash centered upon the restoration of Islamic norms regarding women's status. Likewise, weak revolutionary regimes in the Palestinian entity and in Azerbaijan rolled back reforms in the 1990s as they caved to pressure from Islamic interests (Asfaruddin 1999). Meanwhile, liberal theorists had hoped that non-socialist polities might prove more egalitarian as a wave of liberalization and the reinvigoration of civil society were heralded in the late 1980s (Butenschon 2000, Norton 1995, Schwedler 1995). Brand's comparative study (1998), however, pessimistically concluded that emergent civil societies in the Arab world, as in Eastern Europe, have often become the domains of religious movements that explicitly exclude women's participation.

Three groups of scholars offer more optimistic visions, through non-liberal frameworks of inquiry. Some demonstrate that women have adopted ingenious strategies to overcome colonial binarism. Göle (1996) argues that women's reveiling in contemporary Turkey is an effort by Turks to take back their historical agency after its enslavement to European models of modernization. Ahmed (1992) similarly argues that Egyptian women's reveiling is not a withdrawal from the public sphere but rather an attempt to supersede colonial binarism. Despite Islamist pressure and state dictatorship, Egyptian women continue to mobilize in a diverse array of groups where religious and secular agendas often converge (Al-Ali 2000). Most striking, the vibrancy of debate and resilience of civil society in post-revolutionary Iran have defied earlier predictions of women's exclusion from public life, and instead fostered new forms of Islamic modernity that permit women's participation (Paidar 1995, Mir-Hosseini 1999). And in both Bangladesh and Pakistan, where Islamic politics have polarized civil society, women's groups have flourished, especially to protect women's legal rights and to provide them with jobs (Shaheed 1998). According to Shehabuddin (1999), rural Muslim women in Bangladesh do not feel compelled to follow Islamist parties whose agendas conflict with women's practical needs.

A second group of scholars has confronted the inadequacy of liberal frameworks by experimenting with feminist and communitarian models of citizenship (Joseph 1993 and 2000, Yuval-Davis and Werbner 1999, Benhabib 1998). They identify processes that sustain gender inequality in civil society, as well as strengths women have as citizens embedded in subnational communities. A third group has turned its focus away from the formal women's organizations that have emerged over the past century to study the endurance of women's informal networks. Hale, for example, argues that Sudanese women's organizations established as wings of male parties (Islamic and socialist) were not only accessories to men's domination but also obstacles to the more promising power of women's informal networks. Women's networks defy public-private dichotomies by mobilizing connections within families, workplaces, and neighborhoods not only to amass significant economic and cultural resources, but also to assert political influence at a grassroots level (White 2002, Singerman 1995, Hale 1996). However, the populism of "vernacular politics" in Turkey, White argues, masks the economic foundations of women's political weakness. Her concerns echo those of MacLeod (1992) and Ahmed (1992), who worry that women's use of Islamic symbols may ultimately play into the hands of the authoritarian Islamic elite. The debates about the relationship of Islam to women's status as citizens in civil society have only begun in this fruitful, emergent field of inquiry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

L. Abu-Lughod, Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998.

- J. Afary, The Iranian constitutional revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
- A. Afsaruddin (ed.), Hermeneutics and honor. Negotiating female “public” space in Islamic/late societies, Cambridge, Mass. 1999.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- N. Al-Ali, Secularism, gender and the state in the Middle East. The Egyptian women’s movement, New York 2000.
- A. Ali, The emergence of feminism among Indian Muslim women, 1920–1947, Karachi 2000.
- Q. Amin, The liberation of women. A document in the history of Egyptian feminism, trans. S. S. Peterson, Cairo 1992.
- K. Babayan, The “‘aqāid al-nisā’a.” A glimpse at Safavid women in local Isfahani culture, in G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world, New York 1998, 349–82.
- M. Badran, Competing agenda. Feminists, Islam and the state in nineteenth and twentieth-century Egypt, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 201–36.
- R. Barnett, Embattled begums. Women as power brokers in early modern India, in G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world, New York 1998, 521–36.
- B. Baron, The women’s awakening in Egypt. Culture, society, and the press, New Haven, Conn. 1994.
- S. Benhabib, Models of public space. Hannah Arendt, the liberal tradition, and Jurgen Habermas, in J. B. Landes (ed.), Feminism, the public and the private, New York 1998, 65–99.
- S. Blake, Contributors to the urban landscape. Women builders in Safavid Isfahan and Mughal Shajahanabad, in G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world, New York 1998, 407–28.
- H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998.
- M. Booth, May her likes be multiplied. Biography and gender politics in Egypt, Berkeley 2001.
- L. Brand, Women, the state, and political liberalization. Middle Eastern and North African experiences, New York 1998.
- P. Brummett, Image and imperialism in the Ottoman revolutionary press, 1908–1911, Albany, N.Y. 2000.
- R. W. Bulliet, The patricians of Nishapur. A study in medieval Islamic social history, Cambridge, Mass. 1972.
- N. A. Butenshon et al. (eds.), Citizenship and the state in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.
- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- M. Charrad, States and women’s rights. The making of postcolonial Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco, Berkeley 2001.
- B. Cheriet, Gender, civil society and citizenship in Algeria, in Middle East Report 26:1 (January–March 1996), 22–6.
- J. Clancy-Smith, The house of Zainab. Female authority and saintly succession, in N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 254–74.
- J. L. Cohen and A. Arato, Civil society and political theory, Cambridge, Mass. 1992.
- B. M. Cooper, Gender and religion in Hausaland. Variations in Islamic practice in Niger and Nigeria, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 21–38.
- V. Danielson, Moving toward public space. Women and musical performance in twentieth-century Egypt, in A. Afsaruddin (ed.), Hermeneutics and honor. Negotiating female “public” space in Islamic/late societies, New Haven, Conn. 1999, 116–39.
- S. Deringil, The well-protected domains. Ideology and the legitimation of power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909, New York 1998.
- F. Fanon, A dying colonialism, trans. H. Chevalier, New York 1967.
- S. Faroqhi, Subjects of the sultan. Culture and daily life in the Ottoman Empire, New York 2000.
- E. Fleischmann, The nation and its “new” women. The Palestinian women’s movement 1920–1948, Berkeley 2003.
- E. Frierson, Unimagined communities. State, press, and gender in the Hamidian era, Ph.D. diss., Princeton University 1996.
- E. Goldberg, Private good, public wrongs, and civil society in some medieval theory and practice, in E. Goldberg, R. Kasaba, and J. Migdal (eds.), Rules and rights in the Middle East. Democracy, law and society, Seattle 1993, 248–71.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- S. Haeri, Women’s body, nation’s honor. Rape in Pakistan, in A. Afsaruddin (ed.), Hermeneutics and honor. Negotiating female “public” space in Islamic/late societies, New Haven, Conn. 1999, 55–69.
- S. Hale, Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism, and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
- G. R. G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world, New York 1998.
- J. Hanssen, Public morality and marginality in fin-de-siècle Beirut, in E. Rogan (ed.), Outside in. On the margins of the modern Middle East, New York 2001, 183–211.
- M. Hatem, The pitfalls of nationalist discourses on citizenship in Egypt, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 33–57.
- A. Jalal, The convenience of subservience. Women and the State of Pakistan, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 77–114.
- S. Joseph, Elite strategies for state building. Women, family, religion and the state in Iraq and Lebanon, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia, 1991, 176–200.
- , Gender and civil society, in Middle East Report 23:4 (July–August 1993), 22–26.
- (ed.), Citizenship and gender in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991.
- N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991.
- A. Khater, Inventing home. Emigration, gender, and the middle class in Lebanon, 1870–1920, Berkeley 2001.
- D. R. Khouri, Drawing boundaries and defining spaces. Women and space in Ottoman Iraq, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 173–90.
- M. Lapidus, A history of Islamic societies, New York 1988, 2002 (rev. ed.).
- E. Locher-Scholten, Women and the colonial state. Essays on gender and modernity in the Netherlands Indies 1900–1942, Amsterdam 2000.

- A. E. MacLeod, Accommodating protest. Working women, the new veiling, and change in Cairo, Cairo 1992.
- A. Marcus, The Middle East on the eve of modernity. Aleppo in the eighteenth century, New York 1989.
- F. Mernissi, The veil and the male elite. A feminist interpretation of women's rights in Islam, trans. M. J. Lakeland, Reading, Mass. 1991.
- F. Milani, Veils and words. The emerging voices of Iranian women writers, Syracuse, N.Y. 1992.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Islam and gender. The religious debate in contemporary Iran, Princeton, N.J. 1999.
- M. Molyneux, The law, the state and socialist policies with regard to women. The case of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen 1967-1990, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia, 1991, 237-71.
- A. R. Norton (ed.), Civil society in the Middle East, 2 vols., Leiden 1995.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, New York 1995.
- C. Petry, Women as custodians of property in medieval Egypt, in N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 122-42.
- D. Reynolds (ed.), Interpreting the self. Autobiography in the Arabic literary tradition, Berkeley 2001.
- A. Salzmann, An ancien regime revisited. Privatization and political economy in the eighteenth-century Ottoman Empire, in Politics and Society 21:4 (December 1993), 393-423.
- , Tocqueville in the Ottoman Empire, Leiden 2003.
- J. Schwedler (ed.), Toward civil society in the Middle East? A primer, Boulder, Colo. 1995.
- F. Shaheed et al., Women in politics. Participation and representation in Pakistan (with update 1993-1997), Lahore 1998.
- E. Shehabuddin, Beware the bed of fire, Gender, democracy and the Jama'at-i Islami in Bangladesh, in Journal of Women's History 10:4 (Winter 1999), 148-71.
- D. Singerman, Avenues of participation. Family, politics, and networks in urban quarters of Cairo, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
- A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- D. A. Spellberg, Politics, gender and the Islamic past. The legacy of 'A'isha bint Abi Bakr, New York 1994.
- B. F. Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an. Traditions and interpretation, Oxford 1994.
- E.F. Thompson, Colonial citizens. Republican rights, paternal privilege, and gender in French Syria and Lebanon, New York 2000.
- J. B. White, Islamist mobilization in Turkey. A study in vernacular politics, Seattle 2002.
- N. Yuval-Davis and P. Werbner (eds.), Women, citizenship and difference, New York 1999.
- F. Zarinebaf-Shahr, Women and the public eye in eighteenth-century Istanbul, in G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world, New York 1998, 301-24.
- M. C. Zilfi, Women and society in the Tulip Era 1718-1730, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 290-306.
- 1964 Afghan women participated in the drafting of the constitution and won the right to vote. In the 1960s and 1970s they had a strong presence in many institutions: education, health, engineering, the civil service, and parliament. However, the struggle between the Soviet Union and the United States to control the flow of regional oil and natural resources and their support for their chosen warlords, combined with the growth of extremist Islam and tribalism, led to war and violent conflicts and eroded any chance of achievements of women in urban centers being extended to rural or poor women (Rashid 2000, 41-54, Mehta and Mamoor 2002).

Continuous war and violent conflict from the late 1970s led to the collapse of state and other institutions. Civil society was devastated and social capital was eroded. Individuals and communities were unable to achieve their objectives as the war culture replaced all rules, norms, obligations, trust, and reciprocity in social relations and social structures. Millions were disabled or injured, or died. Millions became refugees; the majority of them lived in Iran and Pakistan, many of them with female heads of household (Shah 2000, Shakib 2002).

Despite long years of war and violent conflict women proved their strength by pulling themselves from the depths of seclusion and oppression in order to reach a free space of agency. They played a pivotal role in constructing the future civil society organizations through grassroots solidarity movements both at home and in exile. Under the Taliban, many women risked their lives by turning their homes into an underground network of schools for girls and young women. After the fall of the Taliban, they realized the importance of their underground organizations and activities. In 2001, women activists in the Literacy Corps identified 2,000 girls and female students in Kabul alone who were awarded certificates for the skills they had acquired under the Taliban years in women's secret schools (Rostami Povey 2003).

The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan (RAWA) played a particularly crucial role by creating cohesion and solidarity in their community. RAWA was established in 1977 to struggle for democracy, women's rights, and human rights and published Payām-e Zan (Woman's message), a quarterly political magazine. Meena Keshwar Kamal, the founding member of RAWA, was assassinated in 1987. However, RAWA's activities continued in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and in the West (Brodsky 2003, 80-1).

Many professional women remained in Afghanistan or returned there to form networks and soli-

ELIZABETH F. THOMPSON

Afghanistan

The Afghan women's movement in the twentieth century had a major impact on gender issues. In parity groups with poorer women. These networks and groups became mechanisms for women's empowerment. Amongst these women are: Suraya Parluka, a leading member of the National Union of Women of Afghanistan; Seddighe Balkhi, the head of the Islamic Center for Political and Cultural Activities of Afghan Women; Shafigha Habibi, a leading member of the Women's Association of Afghanistan; and Shafiqah Moaber, the director of the Women's Vocational Training Center.

Their secret organizations laid the foundation for the building of social capital, which was crucial for the process of reconstruction. Following the fall of the Taliban, they actively participated in rebuilding their organizations, regrouping their members and creating opportunities for women's participation in the process of transition from war to peace. Women journalists also became active. In Kabul they set up the Cultural Journal of Afghanistan Women (Rostami Povey 2003). In 2002–3 other women's daily, weekly, and monthly magazines appeared. In Kabul, Shukkria Barezai Dawi published Aeeneh Zan (Women's mirror); Lilema Ahmadi published Rooz (Day); Mary Nabard published Seerat (Nature); Hawa Norastani published Ershad-al Neswan (Women's guidance); Jamila Mojahed published Malali; Fouzia Morady published Zan va Ghanon (Women and law); and in Jalalabad Arian Yon published Nahid (Globe).

Education was at the heart of women's struggle. In 1996 when Kabul was conquered by the Taliban, Kabul University female professors went to Bamiyan and set up a university until Bamiyan fell into the hands of the Taliban forces in 1998 (Rashid 2000, 68–9).

Women lawyers also continued their activities under extreme forms of oppression. Suraya Paikan established the Afghan Women Lawyers and Professional Association in 1998 in Mazari-i-Sharif. The organization had 400 active members. They were forced to leave Afghanistan by the Taliban but they continued their work in Peshawar and in 2001 they returned to Kabul. In 2003, despite resistance to women's legal and constitutional rights with the re-emergence of extremist Islamists, 200 women lawyers worked in Kabul as judges, prosecutors, and teachers.

After the fall of the Taliban, Afghan women emerged as a force not to be ignored. In 2000, 200 women participated in the 1,550-member Loya Jirga, the traditional grand assembly. Mahbobeh Hoghghmal, a lawyer, was one of the 21 people chosen by the United Nations out of 1,000 names to decide how the Loya Jirga should convene and how the transitional government should be formed.

In 2001, three women delegates (Sima Wali, Sima Samar, and Suhaila Seddiqi) participated in the UN-sponsored Bonn negotiations to form an Afghan interim government. They demanded the creation of a ministry of women's affairs and the appointment of Sima Samar as deputy prime minister and Suhaila Seddiqi as the minister for public health. However, in 2002, Sharī'a Islamic law, under the guise of the al-Amr bi-al-ma'rūf wa-al-nahy 'an al-munkar (Ministry for the enforcement of virtue and suppression of vice), which had terrorized the people under the Taliban, was reinstated (Mehta and Mamoor 2002, 21, Brodsky 2003, 270–2). Sima Samar was forced out of her job for objecting to the continued role of warlords in the government confirmed by the Loya Jirga (Steele 2002, Viner 2002). Nevertheless, Afghan women continued their struggle for the establishment of civil society to contend with the patriarchal movements and institutions. Habiba Soraby replaced Sima Samar and published the magazine Mermon (Women) in Pashto; Sima Samar became the Director of the Human Rights Commission, and Mahbobeh Hoghghmal became the adviser to Habiba Soraby.

Outside Afghanistan, Afghan women intensified their activities. In 2001, Women for Afghan Women (WAW) held their conference in New York under the leadership of Sima Wali, Sara Amiryar, Fahima Vorgetts, and Rita Amiri to promote women's rights issues (Mehta 2002).

In 2003, Liza Ghobar was appointed a member of the Loya Jirga to work with Afghan women refugees and the diaspora community in Iran, in order to identify the needs of Afghan women to be included in the new Afghan constitution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. E. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 2003.
- S. Mehta and H. Mamoor, Building community across difference, in S. Mehta (ed.), Women for Afghan women. Shattering myths and claiming the future, New York 2002, 15–26.
- A. Rashid, Taliban. Islam, oil and the new great game in Central Asia, London 2000.
- E. Rostami Povey, Women in Afghanistan. Passive victims of the borge or active social participants? in Development in Practice 13:2–3 (May 2003), 266–77.
- S. Shah, Where do I belong?, London 2000.
- S. Shakib, Afghanistan. Where God only came to weep, London 2002.
- J. Steele, Women lead protests as Afghan warlords muscle in on power, in Guardian (London), 13 June 2002.
- K. Viner, Feminism as imperialism, in Guardian (London), 21 September 2002.

The Balkans

This analysis of civil society with the focus on women and gender issues relates to the situation in the successor states of former Yugoslavia, with particular emphasis on Bosnia-Herzegovina. In addition to the factors common to all the states, the communist heritage, the process of transition, the experience of armed conflict, postwar state-building, and the reconstitution of society, Bosnia-Herzegovina is distinguished by the role and influence of the international community and the high proportion of members of the Islamic community in the region.

In the second half of the twentieth century, the Communist Party (later to be known as the Communist League) controlled every feature of society, from the economy to creativity. Party ideology thus became the framework within which everything worked: labor unions, the media, the academic community, youth organizations, religious communities, professional associations – every element of civil society. Civil society was subject to ideological stigma. For example, the Encyclopaedia published by the Zagreb Lexicographic Institute (1976) contained no entries for civil society, civism, or the bourgeoisie, and the Sociological Lexicon (Belgrade 1982) dedicated a mere six half-lines to these entries – the same column-centimeters as those for the entries on gangsterism, pilgrimage, and rogues/rascals (Pokrovac 1991). When feminist critique first made its appearance in the late 1970s, it came up against ideological condemnation from the party elite. Women's activism was endorsed within existing organizations.

The transition to civil society in the successor states of former Yugoslavia is hampered by subservience to the political culture and the weaknesses of civil initiatives. To this must be added the non-democratic way the state institutions worked, poor control mechanisms in regard to the authorities, ethnocentrism, and manifestations of political and religious exclusivity, all of them among the products of the violent dissolution of the Yugoslav union of states.

The break-up of Yugoslavia was accompanied by wars in Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina, and by conflicts in Kosovo and Macedonia. The last decade has thus been marked by post-conflict transition and attempts to strengthen civil society as an alternative model to the authoritarian socialist heritage. The process includes efforts to establish the rule of law and democratic, responsible governance with the enactment of laws creating an environment designed to enhance the autonomy of society in relation to the state. Attempts are being made to increase the autonomy of corporations, labor unions, universities, the media, and civic associations. The role of civil society is to be a socially integrative factor and advocate of democracy. The process of reconciliation should take place within civil society (non-governmental organizations' activities associated with the truth and reconciliation process, working within local communities to restore inter-ethnic relations and reconciliation) to institute a culture of peace and tolerance (NGOs concerned with peace education and those engaged in inter-religious dialogue); to promote a culture of democracy (alternative movements, youth associations, training for the youth groups of various political parties, education in civism); to develop environmental awareness (work on the protection of the environment); and to promote a culture of values (associations engaged in the protection of the cultural heritage, intercultural exchanges).

The first women's organizations were civic peace groups, humanitarian organizations concerned with psychosocial support for women who had been raped and abused, refugees, displaced persons, and war widows, and women's rights advocacy groups. Following the first free pre-war elections, women effectively vanished from the official scene, from political electoral bodies and the executive authorities in all the successor states of former Yugoslavia. Faced with political marginalization, subject to violence, importuning for the rights they had gained under socialism (economic, social, and cultural as well as reproductive rights), women became the leading actors in civil society and NGOs. The constant work of women's NGOs can be monitored. Organizations that began work during the war with rape victims and abused women continued working on ways to protect women from violence in the family, combating trafficking in women, and providing protection for abused women. Organizations that advocated women's rights in political and public life are still active in this field, promoting women in politics and political education, conducting campaigns for women politicians and NGOs to work together. Organizations that began by providing psychosocial aid are now focusing on women's health, reproductive rights, aid for disabled women and for elderly, helpless women. Women's groups promoting women's rights are still active in this field, with education and training programs, organizing women's studies and advocating the right to sexual orientation and human rights in general.

The pluralism of women's interests and the way they organize can also be observed in religious matters. Faith-based women's organizations have emerged, concerned with education and promoting religious values and lifestyle. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, Muslim women's organizations have been set up, concerned with education, humanitarian aid, the promotion of Islamic values and the Islamic way of life, and defending the right to dress in an Islamic way. The present women's NGO scene reflects the country's religious, political, and cultural pluralism.

The international community has an important part to play in the activities and development, but also in the frailties of civil society, with its aid programs and focus on specific issues. Given that civil society is still undeveloped, has not achieved financial independence, has failed to introduce internal organizational structures, and lacks experience in the field, it is subject to the influence of international donors. Analyses indicate that local organizations are subordinate to international organizations and donors. The activities of local NGOs derive from foreign projects, missions in the region, and the goals they aim to achieve. The absence of coordination between donors, and the imbalance between the needs of beneficiaries and donors, make it harder to achieve genuine results in the operations of civil society. It seems as though the entire process of developing civil society, including the work of women's organizations, is taking place top-down and from outside the country. Top-down development means that project leadership is in the hands of people who are not from this region, and development outside the country means that the needs, aims, and resources required to carry them out are determined in different circles. Paradoxically, civil society has been accorded a responsible role but the opportunities available for it to develop are limited.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- G. O. Csepeli, A. Scheppele, and K. Lane, Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome in social science in Eastern Europe. The colonisation of East European science, in Social Research, 22 June 1996, <<http://www.c3.hu/scripta/scriptao/replika/honlap/english/01/12ecsep.htm>>.
- International Crisis Group, Denied justice. Individuals lost in a legal maze, Balkans Report 85, 23 February 2000, <<http://www.crisisweb.org/home/index.cfm?id=1525&l=1>>.
- D. D. Lakičević, "Archipelago Balkan." Political authoritarian regimes and xenophobia in new Balkan states [in Serbian], Belgrade 2002.
- M. Ottaway and T. Carothers (eds.), Funding virtue. Civil society aid and democracy promotion, Washington, D.C. 2000.

- Z. Pokrovac, The difference between civil society-state and new government [in Croatian], Zagreb 1991.
- S. Sali Terzić, International support policies to SEE countries. Lessons (not) learned in Bosnia-Herzegovina, in S. Terzić, Civil society [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 2001, 136–54.
- F. Sero and M. Mrđa, Study of local non-governmental organisations in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Problems, analyses and recommendations [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1998.
- , Overview of the current situation and the level of development of the non-government sector in Bosnia-Herzegovina in civil society and local democracy [in Bosnian], Center for Promotion of Civil Society, Sarajevo 2001, <www.cpcd.net/~72k>.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- Activities of Belgrade non-governmental organizations. Civil society and political culture the Balkan way. Recommendations for the road to Europe, in Diary (Novi Sad) [in Serbian], 5 February 2004.
- CARE, Role of civil society in northeast European countries [in Croatian], <http://www.carecro.org/care/dok/civilno_drustvo.doc>.
- Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia, <<http://www.helsinki.org.yu/>>. <http://www.yungo.org/yucom>.
- M. Matulović, Nationalism, cosmopolitanism, and the problem of the political responsibilities of an individual [in Croatian], <www.cedet.org.yu/disc_doc/Miomir%20Matulovic%20-Nacio%20i20ljprava2.doc>.
- B. Stojković, Debate. Culture and civil society – non-governmental organizations as factors of culture policy [in Serbian], November 2001, <www.zaprokul.org/xu/debate/debata_20011122.html>.

JASNA BAKŠIĆ MUFTIĆ

Iran

Contemporary debates about gender, Islam, and civil society in Iran have been greatly influenced by the Islamic Revolution of 1979 and the policies promulgated immediately after the revolution. The tensions created by the formal affirmation of women's rights to political participation and education in the post-revolutionary constitution in the face of actual negation of women's individual rights, particularly in the area of family law and in the differential treatment of men and women in criminal law, opened a fissure through which a vibrant debate about the treatment and role of women in Islamic civil societies gradually entered the Iranian public discourse. Following the presidential election of 1997, the concept of civil society and the need for its expansion was introduced as a campaign platform by the winning candidate, Mohammad Khatami, and women, along with youth and intellectuals, became publicly identified as harbingers of civil society activism and enlargement.

Debates about how women's status in society can be enhanced in an Islamic society such as Iran are not new. The pre-revolutionary state attempted to approach the question by identifying itself as indispensable to the securing of women's rights in Iran through such policies as making the veil illegal as early as 1936 and instituting legal changes in the arena of family rights in the 1960s and 1970s. In this pre-revolutionary formulation, however, autocratic modernization, secularism, and women's rights were intertwined in such a way as to foreclose the possibility of civil society activism on the part of the majority of women in Iran's Islamic and modernizing society. Women's rights were mostly conceptualized as a necessity to be promoted by the modernizing elite sectors in the face of opposition from the societal forces associated with tradition and religion.

In the post-revolutionary political discourse, in contrast, discussions about women's rights and civil society activism have been the inevitable outcome of a political system that has pursued misogynous policies in the arena of women's individual rights while insisting on an Islamic rhetoric that nominally promotes the equality and dignity of men and women in the political, economic, and spiritual arenas. This tension has allowed women's civil society activism to be framed as a struggle for a more egalitarian and democratic interpretation of Islamic commands and precepts and not a rejection of Islam and Iran's native culture. Given the essentially equal rights orientation of women's activism in Iran, the question of its relationship to feminism, a movement generally identified as anti-Islamic and in the service of foreign powers in the Iranian public discourse, has naturally come to the fore. While many women involved in agitation for equal rights have resisted the term Islamic feminism, it has slowly become part of the public discourse thanks to pioneering feminist journals such as Zanān, which began operating in early 1990s with an explicit commitment to both feminism and Islam.

The idea of agitation for reform in women-related laws within an Islamic framework has also brought forth questions about the relationship between women's civil society activism and the broader movement to expand the civil society and democratize/reform the Iranian Islamic state. One set of questions has focused on whether there is a distinct Woman Question in Iran. Many male intellectuals associated with the reform movement, in a forum held in Zanān magazine in the mid-to-late 1990s, reasoned that the Woman Question was part and parcel of the democracy question in Iran. By implication they argued that civil society activism centering on women's issues takes or should take a back seat to the more inclusive struggle for democracy and human rights. Many women activists and thinkers explicitly rejected this formulation. The least this debate, still unresolved, showed was that the women who were concerned with the reform of Islam and the Iranian state had a different understanding of the issue from that of their male counterparts.

Another set of questions that has come to the fore more recently deals with the question of whether women's civil society activism constitutes a movement at all, with some arguing that at best it is a proto-movement. Others have conceptualized the character of women's civil society activism in Iran as essentially leaderless, decentralized, and yet widespread. Still others have seen these types of questions as attempts to devalue women's activism; that is, attempts to portray women's struggle to bring about change as less organized and hence less effective or important than the movement for political reform and democracy.

Given the important strides women have made in the areas of education and employment, women's civil society involvement and debates about it are bound to expand in Iran, particularly now that the international community has acknowledged the importance of women's struggles in Iran by granting the 2003 Nobel Peace Prize to one of the country's premier women civil society activists, the lawyer Shirin Ebadi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Farhi, Religious intellectuals, the Woman Question, and the struggle for the creation of a democratic public sphere in Iran, in International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society 15:2 (Winter 2001), 315–37.
- E. Gheytauchi, Civil society in Iran. Politics of motherhood and the public sphere, in International Sociology 16:4 (2001) 557–76.
- H. Jalaeipour, “Mas’ala-yi” ijtimā’yi na “junbish-i” ijtimā’yi, in Yas-e-No, 1 November 2003, 7 and 9.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Islam and gender. The religious debate in contemporary Iran, Princeton, N.J. 1999.
- A. Najmabadi, Feminism in an Islamic republic. Years of hardship, years of growth, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Women, gender, and social change in the Muslim world, New York 1998, 59–84.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- Zanān*, various issues.

FARIDEH FARHI

Israel

The liberal definition of civil society as an “independent social sphere of the state, the market, and family” where citizens act voluntarily and individually, is at odds with the equivalent feminist and postcolonial definition of civil society. This perceives these categories as fluid, socially negotiated, and shaped by the relationship of convergence and separation, a result of the political and cultural construction of reality carried by various social forces in a particular historical period. From this perspective, civil society offers alternative options for inclusive equal citizenship.

Though geographically in the Middle East, and surrounded by Islamic countries, Israel is, in many senses, a Western nation. A liberal democratic state, with an 18 percent Palestinian minority, Israel grants equal rights to all citizens regardless of sex, religion, or race. However, ethnic, national, and gender inequality are deeply woven into the cultural and structural landscape. Five basic components have produced a culture of exclusion and inclusion of women in Israel: (1) the myth of equality; (2) a binary gendered perception of the world; (3) patriarchal cultural and structural arrangements of Jewish and Palestinian society; (4) the lack of separation between state and religion, which supports patriarchy; and (5) the protracted Israeli-Arab conflict, which emphasizes military and militarism as a male domain and the family as female domain. In both Jewish and Arab Palestinian society women embrace familial roles, which, though they marginalize them, include them as signifiers of the collective boundaries and national solidarity (Kanaaneh 2002, Hasan 2002, Herzog 1998, Yuval-Davis 1987). These components subordinate women's roles and status to the state, and neutralize female power in institutionalized politics. Women's forums, which often define themselves as feminist, challenge the predominantly patriarchal culture by suggesting alternatives to the dominant structures.

Israel's highly segregated society is represented in the history of Jewish and Palestinian civil activity; each traveled three major stages in its history.

JEWISH SOCIETY

1. Under Ottoman and British colonial rule, Jewish social activities occurred mainly at the civil society level. The predominant historiography of this period is narrated from a male perspective and stresses the construction of governmental institutions and economic infrastructure. Until recently, it neglected women's roles entirely. Women were extremely active in the suffrage struggle, and in their contributions to the establishment of schools, health services, and clinics for women and infants, and organized social work (Shilo 2001). Most of these endeavors were eventually co-opted by and institutionalized within a national framework. With the centralization of political power and bureaucratization, however, women were marginalized.

2. Ruled by the hegemony of the Labor Party in the first three decades of the state – from 1948 until the late 1970s – state and civil society merged (Ben Eliezer 1998). Women's organizations, as most other organizations, were forced to adjust to the dominant political agenda of the period – one that gave priority to a gender biased nation-state (Fogiel-Bijaoui 1992, Israeli 1999, Herzog 2004).

3. Since the late 1970s, feminist organizing has flourished in Israel, extending civil society, and becoming particularly strong in the 1990s. The emergence of feminist organizations in Israel was part of an international trend cemented by the United Nation's Declaration of the Decade For Women in 1975, the extension of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) (Yishai 1998), and the decentralization of the state (Ben Eliezer 2003). In 1981, the Law of Associations (NGOs, in Hebrew amutot) was brought into force and new organizations were required to register with the ministry of the interior. This was part of the state's effort to monitor the flood of organizational activity. In 1982, there were 12,000 Jewish and Palestinian-Israeli NGOs. In 2000 that number reached 27,000 (Jaffe 2002). Nearly a quarter of these organizations are women's organizations and women are very active in all the organizations.

Many women's organizations focus on a single issue, for example, working to end violence and sexual assault, protecting reproductive and marital rights, advocating for one-parent families and lesbian rights, or addressing offensive advertising, sexism, racism, ethnic inequality, and religious discrimination. Some also work to enhance the political agenda. Many of the latter used ideas of womanhood and motherhood as their banner, for example, mothers of soldiers, Women in Black, Women in Green (of the Right), Woman to Woman (for Jewish and Palestinian co-existence) (Helman 1997, El-Or 1995).

Most of the women's organizations are small, somewhat marginal, and often isolated from each other. In spite of the weak ties between organizations the growth of feminism has had a cumulative effect in the political sphere. Proposals for feminist legislation and a Women's Status Committee have resulted from grassroots activity and the diffuse and decentralized character of women's activity within civil society. This activity is slowly transforming the political culture of Israel by suggesting alternative visions of gender relations and women's social status.

PALESTINIAN CIVIL SOCIETY IN ISRAEL

1. In the Mandate period, Palestinian society developed social and political organizations as part of its internal dynamics, the broader Arab national movement, and the anticolonial movement (Kimmerling 1993). With urbanization and the development of the middle class, women's organizations – some of them explicitly feminist – began emerging in Jaffa, Jerusalem, and other major cities (Peteet 1991, Fleischmann 2003). The war of 1948 led to the collapse of the social structure of Palestinian society and the women's organizations that were a part of that structure.

2. From 1948 to 1966 Palestinian citizens of Israel were under military rule. During this period, Palestinian civil society was almost non-existent. The only women's organizations were branches of the Communist Party, Israeli parties, and church-related charity groups run by women.

3. From the mid-1970s, and especially in the 1990s, Palestinian NGOs in Israel grew in numbers and their sphere of activities expanded (Payes 2004). Since 1980, nearly 1,000 Israeli-Palestinian organizations have registered as amutot. Many of them work for equal citizenship and social equality; 5 percent of these NGOs are women's organizations. Palestinian women are proportionally more involved in civil society organizations than in the formal Arab political parties in Israel (Abu Baker 1998). Palestinian women's associations advocate for welfare, health, and education reform (Mar'i 1991) and work to protect victims of domestic violence and women who have been threatened with honor killings by their families (Hasan 2002). These groups have also been active in peace organizations (Sharoni 1995, Cockburn 1998, Herzog 1999, Peteet 1991). Feminist activists stress the link between national and feminist causes, arguing that the oppression of Palestinian women in Israel results not only from the oppression perpetuated by Palestinian society, but from patriarchal patterns that are often inextricably linked to official policies (Payes 2004, Rabinowitz 2002).

The "national solidarity" demanded of Palestinian and Jewish women acts as an obstacle to an understanding that women of both national groups share similar concerns and might benefit from cooperation and coalitions that work toward protecting women's rights and freedoms. The increasing strength of the feminist movement has revealed the connection between nationalism and women's status. In the 1990s, this approach spawned numerous women's peace movements and coalition building between Israeli-Jewish and Israeli-Palestinian women (Emmett 1996, Sharoni 1995, Pope 1993). The fragile nature of such coalitions has been exacerbated by the fragility and difficulty of the peace process.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. Abu Baker, A rocky road. Arab women as political leaders in Israel [in Hebrew], Ra'ananna 1999.
- U. Ben Eliezer, State versus civil society. A non-binary model of domination through the example of Israel, in Journal of Historical Sociology 11:3 (1998), 370–96.
- , New Associations or new politics? The significance of Israeli-style post-materialism, in Hagar. International Social Science Review 4 (2003), 5–34.
- C. Cockburn, The space between us. Negotiating gender and national identities in conflict, London 1998.
- T. El-Or and G. Aran, Giving birth to settlement maternal thinking and political action of Jewish women on the West Bank, in Gender and Society 9:1 (1995), 60–78.
- A. Emmett, Our sisters' promised land. Women, politics, and Israeli-Palestinian coexistence, Ann Arbor 1996.
- E. Fleischmann, The nation and its "new" women. The Palestinian women's movement, 1920–1948, Berkeley 2003.
- S. Fogiel-Bijaoui, Feminine organizations in Israel. Current situation [in Hebrew], in International Problems, Society and Politics 31 (1992), 65–76.
- M. Hasan, The politics of honor. Patriarchy, the state and the murder of women in the name of the family honor, in Journal of Israeli History 21:2 (2002), 1–37.
- S. Helman and T. Rapoport, Women in Black. Challenging Israel's gender and socio-political orders, in British Journal of Sociology 48:4 (1997), 682–700.
- H. Herzog, Homefront and battlefield and the status of Jewish and Palestinian women in Israel, in Israeli Studies 3:1 (1998), 61–84.
- , A space of their own. Social-civil discourses among Palestinian Israeli women in peace organizations, in Social Politics. International Studies of Gender, State and Society 6:3 (1999), 344–69.
- , Women in Israeli society, in U. Rebbun and C. I. Waxman (eds.), Jews in Israel. Contemporary social and cultural patterns, Hanover, N.H. 2004, 195–220.
- D. Izraeli, A. Friedman, H. Dahan-Kalev, S. Fogiel-Bijoui, H. Herzog, M. Hasan, and H. Naveh, Sex, gender, politics. Women in Israel [in Hebrew], Tel Aviv 1999.
- E. D. Jaffe, Giving wisely. The internet directory of Israeli nonprofit and philanthropic organizations, 2002, <<http://givingwisely.org.il/Copyright.htm>>.
- R. A. Kanaaneh, Birthing the nation. Strategies of Palestinian women in Israel, Berkeley 2002.
- B. Kimmerling and J. Migdal, The Palestinian, New York 1993.
- M. M. Mar'i and S. K. Mar'i, The role of women as change agent in Arab society in Israel, in B. Swirski and M. P. Safir, Calling the equality bluff. Women in Israel, New York 1991, 213–21.
- S. Payes, Palestinian NGOs in Israel. The politics of civil society, I. B. Tauris (forthcoming).
- J. M. Peteet, Gender in crisis. Women and the Palestinian resistance movement, New York 1991.
- J. Pope, The emergence of a joint Israeli-Palestinian women's peace movement during the intifada, in H. Afshar (ed.), Women in the Middle East. Perceptions, realities and struggles for liberation, London 1993, 172–83.
- D. Rabinowitz and K. Abu Baker, The stand tall generation. The Palestinian citizens of Israel today [in Hebrew], Jerusalem 2002.
- M. Shilo, R. Kark, and G. Hasan-Rokem (eds.), Jewish women in the Yishuv and Zionism. A gender perspective [in Hebrew], Jerusalem 2001.

- Y. Yishai, Civil society in transition. Interest politics in Israel, in Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 555 (1998), 147–62.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Woman/nation/state. The demographic race and national reproduction in Israel, in Radical America 21 (1987): 37–59.

HANNA HERZOG

Sub-Saharan Africa

While it is generally true that the voices of women, and Muslim women in particular, have been conspicuously absent from the political discourse conducted in postcolonial Sub-Saharan Africa, there is variation within the region. In light of this variation, this entry addresses three questions: (1) Where have Sub-Saharan African Muslim women been most organized, politically active, and openly supportive of the development of civil society? (2) Why have Muslim women been more organized, politically active, and openly supportive of democracy in some countries of Sub-Saharan Africa than in others? (3) How might democratization itself affect the political influence of Muslim women in Sub-Saharan Africa?

Of the Sub-Saharan African countries with a significant Muslim presence, it is Nigeria where Muslim women have been most organized, politically active, and openly supportive of democracy. This does not mean that Muslim women have always and everywhere enjoyed more social freedoms and political rights in Nigeria than in other countries. In fact, unlike Muslim women in other countries of West Africa, such as Mali, Niger, and Senegal, Muslim women in many predominantly Muslim areas of northern Nigeria were not given the right to vote at independence. In some parts of northern Nigeria, women were not granted the right to vote until 1976. At the dawn of the twenty-first century, Muslim women in certain parts of northern Nigeria continue to live in domestic seclusion. However, in other parts of Nigeria, especially western Nigeria, Muslim women have played a more public and influential political role, even if it has been less public and politically influential than that played by men and non-Muslim women.

In Nigeria, organizations such as the Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN) and Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML) were founded during the 1980s and became forces for social and political change during the 1990s (Callaway and Creevey 1994, Quinn and Quinn 2003). These organizations have been founded and/or led by relatively educated and charismatic Muslim women, such as Haja Bilkisu and Latifa Okunna of FOMWAN, and Ayesha Imam of WLUML. FOMWAN and WLUML have been dedicated to educating Muslim women about their rights under Islamic law, encouraging faithfulness to that law in Muslim communities, and promoting Islamic principles of justice and protection of the weak in the wider society (Dunbar 2000). FOMWAN became one of the major sponsors of the Muslim League for Accountability (MULAC), which was founded to fight corruption and to promote responsive government in Nigeria (Quinn and Quinn 2003). Of the Muslim women's organizations in Nigeria, FOMWAN has been especially important. Evidence of FOMWAN's importance includes the size and scope of the organization and the attention and support it receives from the Muslim establishment.

In Kenya, South Africa, Sudan, and Tanzania, Muslim women have also been relatively organized and politically active (Strobel 1979, Mirza and Strobel 1989, Hale 1996, Geiger 1997, Oded 2000, Quinn and Quinn 2003). During the 1980s and 1990s, Muslim women became openly supportive of democracy in these countries. In Kenya, the voices of Muslim women were amplified during the 1990s through organizations with political agendas that include both men and women, such as the Supreme Council of Kenya Muslims (SUPKEM), the Muslim Students' Association at the University of Nairobi and the Young Muslim Association in Nairobi. SUPKEM included a Department of Women's Affairs, which, during the run-up to national elections, conducted seminars in order to promote political participation by Muslim women and to educate Muslim women as to their rights as citizens (Oded 2000). The Muslim Students' Association and the Young Muslim Association in Nairobi have included many young and educated Muslim women who have been dedicated to promoting participation in and support for Kenya's fledgling civil society. In South Africa, Muslim women played an active part in organizations intended to end apartheid and, during the 1990s, women have added their voices to those of their male counterparts in the Muslim Youth Movement, calling for greater governmental transparency (Quinn and Quinn 2003). In Sudan, the Sudanese Women's Union (WU), under the leadership of Faṭīma Aḥmad Ibrāhīm, was influential through the 1980s. During the 1980s, women became increasingly involved and openly vocal in the National Islamic Front (NIF), an Islamist party that took control of government in 1989 (Hale 1996). Throughout the 1990s, Muslim women in Tanzania have been active in politics and have formed non-governmental organizations intended to promote political awareness among Muslim women (Dunbar 2000).

Typically, Muslim women have been more politically organized and openly supportive of democracy in Sub-Saharan African countries which are not overwhelmingly Muslim (Nigeria, Kenya, South Africa, Sudan, and Tanzania – Kenya and South Africa are predominantly Christian), than in countries that are overwhelmingly Muslim (Mali, Niger, and Senegal). One possible reason that Muslim women have become more engaged in these developing civil societies is that more Muslim women have been exposed to and inspired by non-Muslim women's movements in countries that are pluralistic. It is also possible that more Muslim women have been politically active in countries that do not have Islamic majorities because more of them have had the opportunity to be formally educated, often in Christian schools. This implies that Islam itself sometimes prevents women from participating in politics and openly supporting democracy. It implies that only exposure to non-Islamic, Western ideas, secular values, feminist discourses and the idea of universal human rights can explain why Muslim women have been more politically active and openly supportive of democracy in some settings than in others. However, this does not appear to be the case. In the Sub-Saharan African countries where Muslim women have become most organized, politically active, and openly supportive of democracy, they have typically appealed to Islam and religious values, not Western ideas, secular values, feminist discourses, or universal human rights. For example, FOMWAN and WLUML have called for greater fidelity to Islamic law and democracy. Thus, the question is, why might Islam inspire political participation and vocal support for democracy by women in some settings more than others? The answer to this question is certainly complex.

One possible explanation has to do with religious competition. Sub-Saharan Africa is one of the world's most religiously competitive regions (Barrett 2001). Islam has competed with a myriad of Christian churches, both mainline and independent, for converts and influence over the wider society for more than a hundred years (Hansen and Twaddle 1995, Haynes 1996, Gifford 1998). This competition burst out into the open with the breakdown of authoritarian regimes and the advent of multiparty elections in Sub-Saharan Africa during the 1990s, and has been especially intense in the most religiously plural settings, settings where a significant number of Muslims and Christians are present. In religiously competitive settings, particularly during periods of political transition, when constitutions are revised or created and the relationship between the state and religious institutions may be renegotiated, it becomes very important for religious leaders to ensure that the voice of the religious institution they lead is heard. In religiously competitive and democratizing settings, there is good reason to expect that Muslim leaders will be most encouraging of political participation by Muslim women, since including Muslim women more than doubles the Muslim voting population and increases the leverage of the Muslim community vis-à-vis the state.

Thus, women become an important political resource for Muslim leaders in the most religiously competitive settings. This does not necessarily mean that Muslim women will simply do the bidding of their religious leaders, who, at the dawn of the twenty-first century, are mostly men. As Muslim women come to recognize that they are a valuable political resource, they are likely to become more organized and effective at promoting change, within the Islamic community and in the wider society, as they did in Nigeria, Kenya, South Africa, Sudan, and Tanzania during the 1990s. In these countries, Muslim women are likely to use newly found social and political leverage to address issues of importance to them, including education and domestic violence, as well as inheritance and property rights.

The consolidation of democracy is far from inevitable in contemporary Sub-Saharan Africa. Poverty, disease, political corruption, and global inequities, among other factors, threaten the prospects that fledgling democratic institutions will be strengthened in the region. However, assuming that democratization continues and that elections become increasingly free, fair, and regular, it is likely that the social and political leverage of Muslim women will increase, within the Muslim communities and in the wider society, particularly in the most religiously plural and competitive national settings of Sub-Saharan Africa.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Barrett (ed.), World Christian encyclopedia. A comparative survey of churches and religions in the modern world, Oxford 2001.
- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Islam, women, religion and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- R. A. Dunbar, Muslim women in African history, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 397–418.
- J. Esposito and J. Voll, Islam and democracy, New York 1996.

- S. Geiger, TANU Women. Gender and culture in the making of Tanganyikan nationalism (1955-1965), Portsmouth, N.H. 1997.
- P. Gifford, African Christianity. Its public role, Bloomington, Ind. 1998.
- S. Hale, Gender politics in Sudan. Islamism, socialism and the state, Boulder, Colo. 1996.
- H. B. Hansen and M. Twaddle (eds.), Religion and politics in East Africa, Athens, Ohio 1995.
- J. Haynes, Religion and politics in Africa, London 1996.
- A. Imam and J. Ibrahim, Democratic processes in Africa. Problems and prospects, in Review of African Political Economy 54 (1992), 102-5.
- I. M. Lewis (ed.), Islam in tropical Africa, London 1980.
- S. Mirza and M. Strobel, Three Swahili Women. Life histories from Mombasa, Kenya, Bloomington, Ind. 1989.
- A. Oded, Islam and politics in Kenya, Boulder, Colo. 2000.
- C. Quinn and F. Quinn, Pride, faith, and fear. Islam in Sub-Saharan Africa, New York 2003.
- M. Strobel, Muslim women in Mombasa (1890-1975), New Haven, Conn. 1979.

ROBERT A. DOWD

Civil Society and Democracy Ideologies

Central Asia and the Caucasus

The Muslim states of Central Asia and the Caucasus (Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Azerbaijan) have many common features in their cultures and histories, but have taken different ways in their transition to democracy. An overwhelming majority of the population of Central Asia are Muslims. In Azerbaijan and several republics of the Russian Federation, Dagestan, Ingushetia, and Chechnya, all indigenous peoples identify themselves as Muslim as well. Except for some groups of Shī'īs in Azerbaijan and the Ismā'īlīs in Tajikistan, the majority of Muslims in Central Asia and the Caucasus are Ḥanafī Sunnīs.

Before the 1917 October Revolution, all these countries were part of the Russian Empire. They organized several holy wars, gazavat, against what was seen as Orthodox Christian rule. In the nineteenth century and at the beginning of the twentieth, Jadidism (from uṣūl-i jadīd, the new method) spread among the Muslim population of the Russian Empire, including Crimea, Volga, Central Asia, and the Muslim Caucasus. Led by Ismail Bey Gasprinsky, this movement for Islamic modernization proposed to elevate the status of women in society. Jadidism advocated equality and secular education for women, and condemned polygamy and the poor treatment of women. Jadidists believed that Islam grants women the right to knowledge and participation in a new enlightened Muslim society. However, after the takeover of Central Asia and the Caucasus by the Soviet government, Jadidism as an Islamic political and cultural movement was uprooted and the idea that emancipation of Muslim women was an important element for modernization and national progress was forgotten.

During the Soviet era (1917–91), the Communist Party aimed to suppress Islam as an ideology and paid great attention to gender relationship and the status of women in Muslim republics of the Caucasus and Central Asia. A Soviet campaign, the khudzhum, forcing and encouraging women to discard their veils and be integrated in political and economic life led to numerous deaths of women and their relatives; it also drastically changed gender relations in Muslim societies. Hijāb and veiling were strongly suppressed by Soviet authorities as a sign of ideological backwardness. With open practice of Islam discouraged, a substantial proportion of women continued to worship at the holy places (mazārs). Modernization, women's emancipation campaigns, the abolishment of Sharī'a law and introduction of secular Soviet law, mass education, and participation in elections and the public sector all had great impact on the status of women. The active participation of well-educated women in public life in post-Soviet Central Asia and the Caucasus is a consequence of the Soviet policies.

In 1991, Central Asia and the Caucasus gained independence. After perestroika and the collapse of the Soviet Union, a remarkable process of re-Islamization spread across the area. Thousands of mosques and tens of madrāsas were established, and millions of people began to openly practice Islam. Women set up non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that support local cultural and Muslim traditions and modernity. In Kazakhstan, for instance, a league of Muslim women has several branches across the country.

In all Muslim countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus, political leadership has imposed strict state control to prevent the spread of fundamentalism and Islamic militancy. In Uzbekistan, after a short period of perestroika, a Soviet-style attitude to religious believers has been restored: men and women suspected of participation in Islamic movements are persecuted; the government discourages women from wearing the hijāb. The establishment of political parties based on religion is forbidden everywhere except in Tajikistan. After the civil war in 1992–7, the Islamic Renaissance Party actively participates in political life and has its representatives in the government.

The countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus signed the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). However, on the whole, this has had little impact on the improvement of women's status in society. Women's representation in national governments and parliaments is significant compared to many other countries. In Turkmenistan under authoritarian rule women form 26 percent of the parliament and in Kyrgyzstan with its more liberal regime they form only 6.7 percent, figures that do not show the real process of democratization and women's access to political power in either country.

Table 1. Seats in parliament held by women in the Muslim countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus.

Country	Percentage
Azerbaijan	10.5
Kazakhstan	11.2
Kyrgyzstan	6.7
Tajikistan	12.4
Turkmenistan	26.0
Uzbekistan	7.2

Source: Human Development Report, 2002. Deepening democracy in a fragmented world, published for the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), New York 2002, 227–8.

Some women's NGOs and movements advocate a restoration of the quota system as a way of ensuring women's political participation, even though the Soviet case clearly illustrates the ineffectiveness of such an approach. Token participation of women in political life supported by a 30 percent quota system did not lead to the real political empowerment of women. Current efforts by women's NGOs concerning the restoration of a quota have had limited support among both women and men. In Uzbekistan, the president issued a decree to appoint a woman as a deputy governor. Some Uzbek women's NGOs commented that this decision was a signal to block the access of women to positions of governor (hākim) and other higher posts. In Kyrgyzstan, reminiscent of the Soviet-style women's committees, a pro-governmental women's party was organized. In general, although there are several female leaders of political parties in Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan, women in the Caucasus and Central Asia are more active and powerful in NGOs than in political parties. In a transition that led to mass unemployment, women were the first to lose their jobs in both the private and public sectors, so some women moved to the non-governmental sector. Women are alienated from political life in all countries; often they express their concerns by joining dissident forces, as editors of newspapers, journalists, scholars, and activists in political parties and NGOs.

Reforms involving political liberalization and the strengthening of civil society are most successful in Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan, and Tajikistan. Women in these countries are thus better able to discuss civil society issues and the role of Islam in transition to democracy and the market economy. They can be heard and express their own interests publicly in the media, whereas the leaderships in Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan still maintain a Soviet-style governance and control over civil society that impedes women from openly expressing their concerns and discussing democracy ideologies. Despite these differences between the states, in the non-governmental sectors in all countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus women's NGOs are the most numerous and well organized thanks to the enthusiasm of women themselves and the support of international organizations and Western donors.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, as a result of numerous missions from Muslim countries, the first women in hijāb appeared on the streets of cities and villages in all Muslim states of Central Asia and the Caucasus. A number of Muslim leaders and politicians began to restore discriminatory interpretations of the Qur'an and some Muslim families brought back traditions humiliating to women. Polygamy, under-age marriage, and seclusion of women, especially in rural areas, are seen by some politicians and families as the fair restoration of ancestors' traditions. Despite progressive written law protecting women's rights, a significant number of families practice customary law, mainly in rural areas. Predominance of customary law in inheritance, access of women to land and their tenure rights are little discussed in society. Many women regret losing the previous Soviet system with its safety net of free health care, protection of mothers, children, and retired people, and employment opportunities; the transition to a market economy involved increasing poverty accompanied by de-emancipation of women, and the inability of the states to maintain social allowances and support for women and children.

At the same time, leaders of the newly independent Muslim countries in search of national ideology have promoted the veneration of medieval figures. Building national ideology through nationalism and praise of wartime rulers contradict commitments of the leadership of all these countries to pursue democratization and stability in the region. Unfortunately, the voice of women leaders in NGOs, the media, and political parties aiming to prevent a spread of these ideas is not heard well. The majority of NGOs and political parties and the media rarely debate gender issues linked to the revival of Islam and male-dominated interpretations of the Qur'an and national histories.

Since the late 1990s, Hizb ut-Tahrir (Party of Liberation), a transnational Islamic party, has called for non-violent establishment of a caliphate including Central Asia and the Caucasus. Both men and women, inspired by ideas of social equity and justice, and frustrated by current economic and political crises, rampant corruption, and ideological vacuum, have joined this party. Participation in such radical Islamic movements needs to be seen as an outlet for the expression of social and political dissatisfaction and de-Russification (anticolonial) feelings among dissident people. The low resistance of the younger generation to religious extremism is partly explained by the weakness of official clergy, who face financial and ideological problems in their actions and who are severely restricted by state authorities.

In general, an intensive process of re-Islamization and democratization in the countries of Central Asia and the Caucasus has led to a critique of the Soviet ideological legacy and to a search for new democratic ideologies combined with Islamic values and a high status of women in society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000.
- M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997.
- U. Ikramova and K. McConnel, Women's NGOs in Central Asia's evolving societies, in M. Ruffin and D. Waugh (eds.), Civil society in Central Asia, Seattle 1999, 198–213.
- A. Khalid, The politics of Muslim cultural reform. Jadidism in Central Asia, Berkeley 1998.
- G. Massell, The surrogate proletariat. Moslem women and revolutionary strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1924–1929, Princeton, N.J. 1974.
- OSCE/ODIHR, NGOs in the Caucasus and Central Asia. Development and co-operation with the OSCE, Human Dimension Implementation meeting background paper 2000/1, Warsaw 2000.
- A. Tabyshalieva, Central Asia. Increasing gender inequality, in A. Strasser, A. Haas, G. Mangott, and V. Heuberger (eds.), Central Asia and Islam, Hamburg 2002, 151–8.

ANARA TABYSHALIEVA

South Asia

Approximately half of the world's 1.1 billion Muslims live in three countries of South Asia: 145 million and 130 million in Muslim-majority Pakistan and Bangladesh respectively, and 125 million in Hindu-majority India. Yet, the global discourse on Muslim women in civil society and democracy is shaped largely by the experiences of the Middle East where only 172 million Muslims live.

The Western media generally portray Muslim women as veiled and excluded from the public sphere. This is not so for South Asian Muslim women. They are rarely veiled and they are active in civil society as leaders as well as members of organizations. Similarly, South Asian Muslim women participate in local and national politics as voters and as people's representatives. Since the return of democratically elected governments in the 1990s, Pakistan and Bangladesh have been ruled by women leaders.

In Pakistan, Benazir Bhutto was elected head of government from 1988 to 1990 and again from 1993 to 1996. She was forcibly ousted from power because of her differences with the civil-military elite that dominated Pakistan. Two elected women prime ministers have governed Bangladesh since 1991: Khaleda Zia, 1991 to 1996 and 2001 to the present, and Sheikh Hasina from 1996 to 2001. Khaleda and Hasina have led the two major political parties of Bangladesh since the early 1980s. They also led the movement that finally toppled the military regimes that ruled for two decades.

Detractors argue that these women entered politics through dynastic connections. Benazir and Hasina inherited the political mantels of their assassinated fathers and Khaleda that of her assassinated husband. But the very fact that these women led their male-dominated political organizations for nearly three decades and enjoyed personal popularity with the voters demonstrates that women are acceptable as leaders in Muslim societies. Even the fundamentalist Islamist parties in South Asia, such as Jamaat-e-Islami in Pakistan and Bangladesh, accepted women in leadership positions when they entered into electoral alliances with the mainstream parties headed by women.

The Muslim world is not homogeneous. The countries and regions have different social, cultural, and political traditions. These differences explain the varying levels of women's participation in the public sphere. For example, in contrast to the Middle East where most countries are still ruled by authoritarian regimes that strictly control civil society, South Asia has a long tradition of Western-style liberal democracy. Here the nationalist movements against colonialism embraced visions of a democratic polity. After independence all three South Asian states opted for democratic parliamentary government, though Pakistan and Bangladesh were later ruled by military regimes for long periods of time. South Asia's cultural tradition is characterized by a mild observance of purdah. As a result, South Asian Muslim women have been able to participate in civil society and political organizations for nearly a century.

The pattern of women's engagement in civil society, politics, and governance has changed over the years. During the first half of the twentieth century South Asian women, mainly aristocratic and upper-middle-class, became involved in social welfare organizations. The nationalist movements recruited a few of these female leaders to mobilize support of female voters. The last three decades, however, have seen a sea change in women's involvement in social and political organizations. Beginning in the 1970s, following the United Nations declaration of the International Women's Decade (1976–85), hundreds of women's organizations and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) have emerged. Some of these organizations provide services such as education, health, credit, and employment, while others advocate women's human rights. They have mobilized grassroots women into economic, social, and political activities; the leadership is no longer exclusively upper-middle-class women.

Women's organizations now go beyond the traditional role of simply mobilizing women's votes for political parties. Increasingly they are pressing political parties to explicitly address women's issues in their platforms and to ensure a critical mass of women representatives in national parliaments and local governments.

Predictably, the growing visibility of women in the public arena has elicited a backlash from the religious extremists. In Pakistan, the Islamist forces succeeded in introducing new Islamic laws curtailing women's equal rights. In Bangladesh, they exerted pressure through fatwas that violated the existing laws of the land. In India, they successfully reversed the government's decision to introduce uniform civil family laws for all religious communities. However, women's organizations continue to resist the religious extremist forces and have been in the forefront of citizens' movements for secularism, human rights, and democracy.

Begum Rokeya Sakhawat Hossain (1880–1932) was a pioneer in the emergence of Muslim women's participation in public space in South Asia. She established the first Muslim Girls' school (later a college) in 1911 in Calcutta and founded the Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam Bangla (Bengali Muslim Women's Association) in 1916. From 1903 she was a vanguard feminist author with articles on the oppression of Muslim women. She strongly criticized the role of mullahs and their misuse of religion. Her best-known book, Sultana's Dream (published in English in 1905) describes a feminist utopia (Hossain 1988). Her writing demonstrates the long-standing indigenous feminism in South Asia.

PAKISTAN

In the 1920s and 1930s several elite Muslim women entered the public sphere in five major areas: education, health care, social reform, literary culture, and political work (Asghar Ali 2000). The influx of refugee women and children after the partition of India and the creation of Pakistan in 1947 impelled many middle-class women to become involved in charity and volunteer organizations. The All Pakistan Women's Association (APWA) established branches all over the country. Though closely tied to the government, APWA launched a campaign in 1955 against the prime minister's polygamous second marriage. APWA successfully lobbied to create the Family Laws Commission, which drafted the Family Laws ordinance in 1961. It set a minimum age for marriage, made second marriage and divorce difficult for men, and facilitated divorce for women (Hussain 1991).

In the early 1970s in Pakistan the popularly elected government of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto (1971–7) supported women's advancement by appointing women to high level government positions and by establishing a National Commission on the Status of Women. Several women's organizations, such as Aurat and Shirkat Gah, emerged during this period. However, the military regime of General Zia ul-Haq (1977–88) which overthrew Bhutto in 1977 imposed a dress code in offices and schools, introduced Islamic punishments through the Hudood Ordinance (1979), and established Shari'a courts. Women's organizations protested against these restrictions. In 1981, the Women's Action Forum (WAF) was formed with branches in all four major cities of Pakistan. WAF was the first organization to publicly protest against the actions of the military regime. In the 1980s and 1990s several NGOs and women's organizations emerged, some with grassroots connections. Women (Asma Jahangir, Hina Zilani) assumed leadership of mainstream human rights organizations. They succeeded in making violence against women, like honor killings, major issues in the human rights discourse nationally and internationally.

Women led by the mother and daughter team of Nusrat and Benazir Bhutto were active in the pro-democracy movement of the 1980s in Pakistan. After the return of a democratically elected government (1988–99) several women were elected to parliament, though their numbers remained small. In the current parliament in Pakistan, elected in 2002, a system of women's reserved seats (elected indirectly) has created a 21 percent representation of women in the lower house and a 17 percent representation in the upper house of parliament.

BANGLADESH

Compared to Pakistan, women in Bangladesh have participated even more in social and political movements; they participated in the various people's movements against Pakistan's government, such as the language movement of 1952 and the student movement of the 1960s. Women cultural activists were in the forefront of the resistance to the assault on Bengali culture. The country's leading female poet – Begum Sufia Kamal – was the conscience and leader of civil society, protesting against autocratic military rule and demanding a secular and democratic polity. In the 1954 provincial assembly election women were directly elected to seven reserved seats in the assembly. Several women gained prominence as top ranking leaders of political parties. In 1966, Anwara Khatun led the main Bengali nationalist party, the Awami League, when its male leadership was imprisoned.

During the 1950s and 1960s, several women's voluntary neighborhood associations emerged promoting literacy and skill training for women. In 1969, the country's largest women's organization, the Mahila Parishad, was established to advocate for the release of political prisoners. The Mahila Parishad is now a multi-faceted organization for women's rights with more than 100,000 members throughout Bangladesh. Following the birth of Bangladesh in 1971, thousands of NGO women fieldworkers went to villages to mobilize millions of rural women to access education, health care, credit, and employment. Though the majority of women involved in NGO activities are either fieldworkers or "beneficiaries," women lead some prominent NGOs such as Nijera Kori, Ain o Salish Kendra, and the Preep Trust.

Many NGOs emphasize women's issues (Jahan 1995). Over 500 women's organizations are registered with the women's ministry. Some, like Women for Women and Nari Pokkho, focus on feminist research, advocacy, and training. Others, like Bangladesh Mahila Ainjibi Samity, focus on women's rights. Some work in specific sectors, for example, garment workers, commercial sex workers, and migrant labor. Others, such as Sammalito Nari Samaj and the National Committee on Beijing, are umbrella organizations, lobbying for specific policy and action.

In the three decades since independence, gender issues have certainly entered the mainstream discourse. Beginning with issues of "women in development" (WID), women's rights activists have expanded the feminist discourse to include sexuality, violence, human rights, and political participation. They have also built alliances with a broad array of civil society organizations headed by men. Civil society protests around issues of violence against women draw widespread participation of men.

Women's increasing participation in civil society organizations is accompanied by increasing participation in politics. At the time of independence, there were no women directly elected by the citizens to the national parliament. The 1973 constitution provided for 300 general and 15 reserved women's seats to be elected by the general members of the parliament. Later the number of women's reserved seats increased to 30. Similarly a 30 percent quota for women was reserved in local councils, again indirectly elected. In the early 1980s, the two major mainstream political parties of the country chose two female leaders, Sheikh Hasina (the Awami League) and Khaleda Zia (Bangladesh Nationalist Party) as party presidents in order to hold the various feuding factions together. In the last quarter century these two women not only maintained their hold on the party but also led pro-democracy movements and ruled the country after winning three successive democratic elections.

While Hasina and Khaleda owe their leadership positions primarily to dynastic connections (Jahan 1987), several women (Motia Chowdhury and Sajeda Chowdhury in the Awami League) have emerged as top ranking leaders without any familial ties. As prominent figures in civil society, some women led political movements that had major social and political impact. For example, in the late 1980s and early 1990s Jahanara Imam, a literary figure, led the Ghatok Dalal Nirmal Committee (committee to eliminate killers and collaborators), which mobilized public opinion against the post-1975 military government's policy of rehabilitating collaborators with the Pakistanis.

With the return of democratic elections, women's organizations started a public advocacy campaign in favor of direct elections for 30 percent of women's reserved seats in the national parliament and local bodies. In 1997 direct elections were introduced in local elections, but not for the national parliament. Since the expiration of the women's quota system in 2001, women hold just 2 percent of the parliamentary seats; however 9 percent of cabinet posts are held by women. Women's voting percentage has also steadily increased and at present they vote in higher numbers than do men. Many observers have argued that in 1996 election results were determined by the women's swing vote, when they voted in favor of the Awami League to resist the rising strength of the officially sponsored Islamist forces.

INDIA

In contrast to Pakistan and Bangladesh the Muslims in India had the disadvantage of being a minority community. Muslim women were doubly disadvantaged. Lacking national or visionary leadership, the voices and experiences of Muslim women are represented by male Muslims claiming to represent the entire community. The restrictive agendas of Islamist organizations like Jamiat-e-Ulema Hind and Jamaat-e-Islami, which focus on retention of Shari'a laws, have limited Indian governments' capacity to take legislative measures to end discrimination in personal laws for Muslim women. Shari'a laws became a major contested issue in the late 1980s when the Supreme Court passed a judgment in favor of women. It was supported by women's organizations but rejected by the Islamist parties. The 1990s, however, saw the emergence of Muslim civil society organizations such as the Muslim Intelligentsia Forum that questioned the authority of Muslim political and religious leaders. The National Commission for Women held a series of public hearings on Muslim women to highlight the economic problems faced by them. Several Muslim women also started to discuss specific reforms in Muslim personal laws. These efforts symbolize Muslims' determination to challenge existing Shari'a laws and renegotiate ideas on women's rights.

CONCLUSION

What are the challenges for Muslim women's civic and political engagement in South Asia? First, for the majority of Muslim women, poverty, illiteracy, lack of education, employment, and income still remain the major constraints. Upper-middle-class women dominate among activists and leaders. Second, the gradual erosion of the elite's commitment to secular ideology and the ascendance of religious extremists since the 1980s pose another threat. In Pakistan and Bangladesh the power of Islamist forces has gradually increased under the patronage of military regimes supported by the United States. The democratically elected governments in the 1990s did not vigorously defend secular ideology, as did the founding fathers. Finally, increasing corruption of electoral politics (for example, the dominant role of black money and muscle men to capture votes) deters women's participation in democratic parties (Jahan 1994).

Women's organizations pursue multiple strategies to address these challenges. They consistently demand greater investment in social sectors to reduce gender gaps in human development. Many NGOs also address these issues. Often women's organizations are the lone voices protesting at the extremist religious organizations. However, the women's organizations have yet to devise effective strategies to counter political corruption, which has excluded the majority of women from participating in electoral democracies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. Ali, The emergence of feminism among Indian Muslim women 1920-1947, New York 2000.
- N. Hoodbhoy, The women's movement in Pakistan, in R. dos Tempos (ed.), Alternative women's visions and movements, ii, Rio de Janeiro 1991, 247-54.
- R. S. Hossain, Sultana's Dream, New York 1988.
- N. Hussain, Military rule, fundamentalism, and the women's movement in Pakistan, in R. dos Tempos (ed.), Alternatives. Women's visions and movements, ii, 1991, Rio de Janeiro 1991, 211-28.
- R. Jahan, Women in South-Asian Politics, in Third World Quarterly 9:3 (July 1987), 848-70.
- , Why women, what politics?, in R. Jimenez-David (ed.), Proceedings of the first Asia-Pacific congress of women in politics, 21-23 June, 1994, Manila, Philippines 1994, 7-15.
- , Men in seclusion, women in public. Rokeya's dream and women's struggles in Bangladesh, in A. Basu (ed.), The challenge of local feminism. Women's movements in global perspective, Oxford 1995, 87-109.
- P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998.

ROUNAQ JAHAN

Turkey

It is widely argued that civil society flourished in Turkey in the 1980s. Social scientists estimate that there were approximately 60,000 associations by the late 1990s and that women's organizations constituted 0.3 percent of all non-governmental organizations (NGOs) (Kalaycıoğlu 2002, Pusch 2003). In 2000, there were 179 registered women's NGOs (Pusch 2000, 483). Women's activism in the public realm contributed to the democratization process in the country, particularly through its resonance in public discourse, regardless of ideological stand or numerical strength. If democracy is self-rule, women contributed to democratization in the country by challenging the state and demanding that state institutions respond to women's needs as women defined these needs themselves. In a context with a strong state tradition where state defined what the best interests of its citizens were, such a challenge was a significant step in self-rule. At another level, women's activism within civil society contributed to the process of democratization by helping liberalize the polity. A liberal context where individual, civil, or sociopolitical rights are respected is a necessary condition of a democratic polity. Communal norms, which have disregarded individual rights, have long been causes of women's discrimination as women themselves have argued. Working through civil society and women's organizations that prioritize respect for individual rights, women expanded the opportunities they could have as individuals and defended their rights of public expression, and/or religion, thereby contributing to the liberalization of the polity.

Despite their cross-cutting cleavages and blurred boundaries, it is possible to plot a division between secular and Islamist women based on their self-identification. Secular groups in search of rights and opportunities included different socialist, radical, Kemalist or unidentified feminists, Kurdish women and/or feminists, and mothers who organized to protest at the loss of relatives. Islamist groups organized primarily in defense of their right to wear headscarves in universities, though there were some organized to promote Islamic life and dispense charity.

SECULAR FEMINISTS AS MEMBERS OF CIVIL SOCIETY

Women who called themselves feminists emerged in the early 1980s and formed what they later recognized as consciousness-raising groups. Şirin Tekeli, Stella Ovadia, and Şule Torun were the foremost feminist women in this early stage. In 1984, the short-lived Kadın Çevresi (Women's circle) a book club that aimed to translate feminist works and serve as a medium of feminist communication, was formed. In 1986, Şirin Tekeli initiated a petition campaign in which 4,000 signatures were collected to have the 1985 United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) implemented by government. In 1987 feminist women organized a march and later a festival to protest against domestic violence. They drew attention for the first time in Turkey's history to this widespread problem, which cut across class lines. The mobilizing spirit of the campaign against domestic violence prompted the emergence of feminist publications – called feminist (sic) and Kaktüs – that allowed the crystallization of radical feminist and socialist feminist ideas respectively. Feminists institutionalized their demands for expansion of women's opportunities by establishing the Women's Library and Information Center and the Purple Roof Women's Shelter Foundation in 1990 in Istanbul. In 1991, the Women's Solidarity Foundation was established in Ankara and in 1993 this group opened the Altındağ women's shelter. On the issue of domestic violence, Kurdish women established the center KA-MER (Kadın Merkezi) in Diyarbakır in 1997. Meanwhile, other women's associations, platforms, initiatives, and organizations arose to promote women's rights, including many beyond the major cities of the country and others among university students (Bora and Günel 2002). The journal Pazartesi published between April 1995 and March 2002 became an organ of feminist dialogue and perspective. An award-winning woman's interest group was Kadının İnsan Hakları Projesi (Women for women's human rights), established in 1993 to work toward the realization of women's human rights. KADER, the Association to Support and Educate Women Candidates was initiated by some feminists in 1997 and supported by a large coalition of women to promote women into parliament.

As this feminist activism surged, a group of women, some of whom called themselves Kemalist feminists, emerged in reaction to Islamist activism that spread. They established a foundation in 1989 called Çağdaş Yaşamı Destekleme Derneği (Association to promote contemporary life) to promote secular (that is, Kemalist) education and spread Westward-looking official ideology to counter the demands of the Islamists. They generated income and scholarships to educate women in less developed regions of the country and the peripheral areas of capital cities.

Meanwhile, feminism penetrated the state, and public universities began opening women's studies centers and programs. Istanbul University Women's Research Center coordinated a petition campaign in 1993, which about 119,000 women joined, to have the Civil Code amended. The Civil Code, which was adapted from the Swiss Code in 1926, had inegalitarian clauses where the husband was recognized as the head of the family and its representative and the wife as his helper. The campaign for the amendment of the Civil Code was endorsed by a large coalition of feminists and women's groups. The association of Turkish women jurists drafted the amendment. Although international pressures were an important factor precipitating change, the diverse feminist groups succeeded in having the Law for the Protection of Family passed in 1998 to protect women against domestic violence and the Civil Code amended by the end of 2001. The new Civil Code abolished the supremacy of the husband in the marriage union and, in cases of divorce, allowed women to share the property acquired during marriage.

Besides those who organized to promote their rights, women, mostly mothers whose sons “disappeared” in police custody, also expanded the parameters of democratic participation and civil rights. They gathered regularly every Saturday in a central meeting place in the heart of Istanbul, from May 1995 for more than three years, to protest at the lack of information on more than 300 lost sons or relatives. The Saturday Mothers, as they were commonly known, assumed a political role as mothers to make their individual claims against the state. They did not merely challenge the realm in which mothers could define their predicament but they also defied the statist understanding of “the common good” by redefining their own interests in their own words.

Independently of Turkish women and feminists, Kurdish women made their mark on civil society in Turkey with their journals Yaşamda Özgür Kadın (Free women in life, January 1998–March 2000), the feminist Roza (March 1996–2000), and Jujin, brought out by feminists who split from Roza (December 1996–March 2000). Yaşamda Özgür Kadın focused on women’s place in the Kurdish nationalist struggle, while the latter two adopted a Kurdish feminist posture analyzing problems of Kurdish women in relation to Kurdish men as well as Turkish feminists. In these feminist journals, questions of assimilation, the prohibition of Kurdish as a public language, and the relationship of Kurdish women to the Turkish state and its population control policies were widely discussed (Açık 2002). Kurdish women, though they might have been few in numbers, were critical in challenging the discourse of homogeneous Turkish nationalism and Turkish feminism in defense of their democratic rights.

ISLAMIST FEMINISTS AS MEMBERS OF CIVIL SOCIETY

Perhaps the most visible and active group of women who had their voices heard in defense of their rights in opposition to the state were the Islamist women. Even though women who gathered informally and mostly spontaneously to seek their right to attend universities wearing headscarves, as they claimed Islam dictated, were most visible, there were other Islamist women’s organizations dispensing charity or promoting an Islamic way of life. The latter were mostly organized around three coalitions founded in the mid-1990s that were quite short-lived and rather amorphous: the Gökkuşluğu Istanbul Kadın Platformu (Istanbul women’s rainbow platform), the Başkent Kadın Platformu (Capital city women’s platform), and the Güneydoğu Kadın ve Kültür Platformu (Platform of women and culture of the Southeast) organized in Diyarbakır.

Women who organized spontaneously or as part of human rights associations such as Mazlum Der (Headscarf commission), to protest the ban on headscarves in universities constituted a radical challenge to state secularism. The Turkish state had secular laws and the women who covered their heads did so in obedience to Islamic law. The women who protested the ban on headscarves challenged the nature and boundaries of state secularism in defense of their rights of religious observance. Even though the ban remains in force, the nature and limits of Turkish secularism is keenly disputed.

CONCLUSION

Women of diverse ideological positions who came together in formal associations, foundations, or informal groups and initiatives expanded the boundaries of a democratic society in Turkey. Not only did these groups bring to public debate diverse issues that radically challenged the principles on which Turkish democracy was expected to be built, but they also allowed those women who became members of civil society to empower themselves as individuals whether they espoused an Islamist or a secular feminist ideology. The unprecedented issues they brought to public debate and the individualism they cultivated promoted a culture of liberalism that could nurture a democracy respectful of difference and coexistence.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Açık, Ulusal mücadele, kadın mitosu ve kadınların hareket geçirilmesi. Türkiye’deki çağdaş Kürt kadın dergilerinin bir analizi, in A. Bora and A. Günel (eds.), 90’larda Türkiye’de feminizm, Istanbul 2002, 279–306.
- Y. Arat, Toward a democratic society. The women’s movement in Turkey in the 1980s, in Women’s Studies International Forum 17 (1994), 241–8.
- , Political Islam in Turkey and women’s organizations, Istanbul 1999.
- , Democracy and women in Turkey. In defense of liberalism, in Social Politics 6:3 (Fall 1999), 370–87.
- A. Bora and A. Günel (eds.), 90’larda Türkiye’de feminizm, Istanbul 2002.
- K. Çayır, Islamist civil associations. The case of the Rainbow Istanbul Women’s Platform, unpublished M.A. thesis, Boğaziçi University 1997.
- E. Kalaycıoğlu, State and civil society in Turkey. Democracy, development and protest, in A. B. Sajoo (ed.), Civil society in the Muslim world. Contemporary perspectives, London 2002, 247–72.
- B. Pusch, Stepping into the public sphere. The rise of Islamist and religious conservative women’s non-governmental organizations, in S. Yerasimos et al. (eds.), Civil society in the grip of nationalism, Istanbul 2000, 475–505.

- N. Sirman, Feminism in Turkey. A short history, in New Perspectives on Turkey 3 (1989), 1–34.
- Ş. Tekeli, Emergence of the feminist movement in Turkey, in D. Dahlerup (ed.), The new women's movement. Feminism and political power in Europe and the USA, London 1986, 179–99.

YEŞİM ARAT

Colonialism and Imperialism

British Colonial Domains of South Asia

British colonial rule was imposed on most regions of South Asia (with the notable exception of present-day Afghanistan) from 1757 under the auspices of the East India Company, though it was not formalized until a century later when official Mughal sovereignty was dissolved in favor of direct rule by the British crown after the Indian rebellion of 1857. As early as 1826, however, the centrality of the Woman Question to Britain's "civilizing mission" in India was established when James Mill decreed in his influential History of British India: "Among rude people, the women are generally degraded; among civilized people they are exalted." From his limited reading about Indian religions and society, he concluded, "nothing can exceed the habitual contempt which the Hindus entertain for their women." As this quotation indicates, it was those customs defined specifically as "Hindu" that were considered most objectionable by the British in the course of the nineteenth century. Hence, the colonial government introduced legislation (often at the explicit encouragement of Indian reformers) to prohibit sati or widow burning (1829), enable Hindu widows to remarry (1856), and raise the age of consent from the age of ten to twelve years (1891). It was not until the early twentieth century that the government of India responded to calls within the Muslim community (consisting of approximately 20 percent of India's population in the colonial period) by passing a number of acts intended to augment Muslim women's legal rights.

The first of these acts was the Waqf Validating Act of 1913, which sought to reinstate those endowments (awqāf) that benefited surviving members of a donor's family (as opposed to funding religious or charitable projects). By virtue of ties of kinship, needy Muslim women were to receive support. The second was the Shariat Application Act of 1937. As the title suggests, it aimed to replace customary law in India with Muslim personal law, which was deemed to be more advantageous to women, though it had little actual effect after compromises were made on the issue of inheritance. More influential was the Muslim Dissolution of Marriage Act of 1939, which permitted women to initiate divorce proceedings, primarily on grounds accepted by the Mālikī school of Islamic jurisprudence. The act that caused the greatest upheaval among Muslims, however, was one that applied to all religious communities, namely, the Child Marriage Restraint Act of 1929. Raising the minimum age of marriage to 14 for girls and 18 for boys, it brought Muslim women into conflict with men of their community as never before when they vigorously endorsed it through women's organizations, while leading male reformers, politicians, and 'ulamā denounced it as irrelevant or "un-Islamic" on account of its failure to recognize the jurisdiction of Muslim judges.

Beyond this legislation, colonial rule in South Asia had its most dramatic effects on women by inspiring a process of self-examination within the Muslim community itself. Having experienced a loss of political power, Indian Muslims were forced to recognize that the Islamic world had fallen behind Europe in terms of intellectual, technological, and material development. The question arose as to how they could maintain their cultural identity in the face of European encroachment and the numerical dominance of the Hindu community. By the late nineteenth century, a response had come in the form of socioreligious reform movements that sprang up across India to restore a "pure" Islam that was free of cultural accretions. A number of variations existed, but, in general terms, this process was understood to mean a return to scriptural sources, including the Qur'ān and ḥadīth, and early Islamic history.

Early Muslim reformers, such as Sayyid Aḥmad Khān (1817–98), highlighted the significance of women to this project of reform by dictating that the real strength of Islam lay in a "private" domestic sphere that was outside the purview of the British government. As women were responsible for maintaining the home as an oasis of tradition and passing on religious knowledge to their children, they were deemed to have a vital role to play in the maintenance of Islamic culture. Yet, when these male reformers turned their attention to women, they discovered that many of them were ignorant of scriptural Islam and even the basic tenets of their religion. A particular complaint was that they were dedicated to rituals and customs that were expensive and unrelated to their faith, including exorcism, vows to spirits, idol worship, and life-cycle ceremonies. Their response was to advocate a changed role for women to be achieved through specific moral and practical education. This reformist program represented male intrusion into a segregated female world over which women had previously exercised a substantial degree of autonomy.

In order to spread their message, Muslim reformers utilized the new print technology which had been introduced to India by the British, publishing a range of short tracts, journals, manuals, and novels. Despite a shared agenda, two main strands may be identified within this genre of literature. The first encompassed traditional Muslim scholars ('ulamā') who devised a program of reform largely independently of European influence. With regard to gender, this approach meant that no distinction was made between the moral and intellectual capabilities of men and women. A key example of this type of text was Bihishti Zewar (Heavenly ornaments) by the Deobandi scholar, Mawlana Ashraf 'Alī Thānawī (1864–1943). It advocated that both sexes should follow the example of the Prophet and read religious texts in Arabic (though girls were expected to begin their training in the vernacular). The second strand included social reformers, known as Islamic modernists, who were motivated by their encounter with the colonial power to take example from European prototypes. In particular, they were inspired by Victorian notions of bourgeois domesticity to argue that women had special moral and spiritual qualities that prepared them for an exalted role within the home. Representative authors of this type of literature included Nazir Aḥmad (1833?–1912) and Alṭāf Ḥusayn Ḥālī (1837–1914).

Other Muslim reformers took practical steps to found private schools for girls from the 1880s. Prominent early examples included the Nampalli Girls School in Hyderabad (founded 1890), the Victoria Girls High School in Lahore (founded 1906), the Zenana Madrasa in Aligarh (founded 1906), and the Muslim Girls School in Lucknow (founded 1912). The key aim of these institutions was to prepare girls to better fulfill their future roles as wives and mothers of the Muslim community. In doing so, their achievements should not be overstated; by the time of the 1931 census, only 1.2 percent of Indian Muslim women (as compared to 1.9 percent of Indian women as a whole) were literate. Yet female education did have a number of unforeseen and often paradoxical effects as well. The institutionalization of certain customary practices, such as purdah, in girls schools, for instance, stimulated a demand for segregated medical and educational facilities to be staffed by Muslim female professionals, including teachers, doctors, and nurses. School attendance also fostered women's interest in social service organizations and Urdu journalism, while cultivating broader networks of female communication. The result was a burgeoning of Muslim women's activism in the Indian subcontinent in the early decades of the twentieth century. Like prior efforts by male reformers, it sought to introduce incremental change to society by building on Islamic norms.

The first stage in this process was the establishment of women's journals to which Muslim women themselves contributed. Some of the first were Tabzib un-niswan (founded 1898, Lahore), Khatun (founded 1904, Aligarh) and 'Ismat (founded 1908, Delhi), though a large number of other titles soon proliferated across India in Urdu and other regional languages. These journals provided reading material to newly educated women on topics as diverse as female education, women's rights in Islam, health, nutrition, home economics, and gardening. By the 1920s, they also began to take up more explicitly feminist issues, including female suffrage, legislative reform, economic independence, "love" marriages, and the relaxation of purdah, while also reporting on contemporary politics and travel. Certain Indian Muslim women also wrote longer pieces, including novels, manuals, and reformist tracts. At the forefront of this movement were pioneering figures, such as Muhammadi Begam (1878?–1908) and Rokeya Sakhawat Hossain (1880–1932), who introduced a distinctly feminine sensibility to Urdu literature for women. It was to be developed by a later generation of female authors, including Nazr Sajjad Hyder (1894–1967) and 'Ismat Chughtai (1911–91).

Other Muslim women took practical steps for women's education and emancipation by establishing schools, health programs, and women's organizations. Leading figures in this field were the Nawab Begams of Bhopal, Sikandar (1816–68), Shah Jahan (1838–1901), and Sultan Jahan (1858–1930), who used their semi-autonomous state in central India as a testing ground for women's reform. Specific projects included schools for elite and less privileged girls (the best known being the Sultania Girls School, founded 1903), a purdah women's hospital (founded 1891), and a women's social club (founded 1909). The last Begam of Bhopal also sought to lay the foundations of an autonomous women's movement in India in which Muslim women would play an active role by inaugurating the Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam (All-India Muslim Ladies Conference) in 1914 and the All-India Ladies Association in 1918. Furthermore, she and other Muslim women participated in the three main women's organizations at the national level, namely, the Women's Indian Association (WIA, founded 1917), the National Council of Women in India (NCWI, founded 1925) and the All India Women's Conference (AIWC, founded 1927). Their involvement in these bodies represented a willingness to establish an alliance with women of other communities over the issues of female education, social uplift, and legislative reform.

Despite these activities, Muslim women failed to become involved in the Indian women's movement in large numbers. What proved to be more influential in stimulating their involvement in mass movements in the colonial period were causes related to their Muslim identity. The first evidence of this may be seen in connection with political activities in India following the Balkan wars when women-only meetings were held by the Anjuman-i-Khuddam-i-Ka'aba (founded 1913) to raise funds for the defense of the khaliifa and the holy places of Islam. During the Khilafat movement in the early 1920s, Indian Muslim women were mobilized in even greater numbers to attend mass rallies with speeches by women leaders, such as Abadi Banu Begam (known as Bi Amman, 1852–1924). In particular, they were called upon to build on their traditional roles as defenders of their family's faith by donating gold ornaments, wearing only handspun (swadeshi) cloth, and taking up the nationalist ritual of spinning. The depiction of women's political activities as an extension of their domestic role enabled them to gain social acceptance for an expanded role in society in a way that would not have been possible otherwise.

This statement gains even greater credence when applied to Muslim women's activities in the 1930s and 1940s. As part of the resuscitation of the All-India Muslim League under the leadership of Mohammad Ali Jinnah, a separate Women's Central Sub-Committee was established in 1938. It stimulated unprecedented numbers of women to attend the league's meetings, including the annual session in Lahore in 1940 at which the demand for Pakistan was articulated. From this point, street politics became an accepted pastime for veiled Muslim women, who organized mass processions, public meetings, and fundraising campaigns across India in support of the Muslim League. Indeed, the decisive victory of this party in the elections of 1946 may be attributed in large part to the campaigning efforts of female activists who convinced burqa-clad women in urban constituencies to come to the polling stations to vote. Yet women's involvement in the Pakistan movement was too brief to bring any qualitative change to their social status in the long term. Rather, the intertwining of religion with politics has meant that Muslim women's relationship with the state has been fraught with difficulties in the postcolonial era.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. Ali, The emergence of feminism among Indian Muslim women 1920–1947, Karachi 2000.
- S. N. Amin, The world of Muslim women in colonial Bengal, 1876–1939, Leiden 1996.
- A. Basu and B. Ray, Women's struggle. A history of the All India Women's Conference 1927–1990, New Delhi 1990.
- G. Forbes, Women in modern India, Cambridge 1996.
- S. Ikramullah, From purdah to parliament, London 1963, repr. Karachi 1998.
- A. Jalal, The convenience of subservience. Women and the state of Pakistan, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 77–104.
- S. Lambert-Hurley, Contesting seclusion. The political emergence of Muslim women in Bhopal, 1901–1930, Ph.D. thesis, University of London 1998.
- B. D. Metcalf, Perfecting women. Maulana Ashraf 'Ali Thanawi's Bihisht-i Zewar, Berkeley 1990.
- , Reading and writing about Muslim women in British India, in Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities, and the state, New Delhi 1994, 6–14.
- G. Minault, Secluded scholars. Women's education and Muslim social reform in colonial India, Delhi 1998.
- (ed.), The extended family. Women and political participation in India and Pakistan, Columbia, Mo. 1981.
- (trans.), Voices of silence. English translation of Khwaja Altaf Hussain Hali's Majalis un-nissa and Chup ki dad, Delhi 1986.
- S. H. Mirza, Muslim women's role in the Pakistan movement, Lahore 1969.
- Q. A. Rasul, From purdah to parliament. The memoirs of a Muslim woman in Indian politics, Delhi 2001.
- D. Saiyid, Muslim women of the British Punjab. From seclusion to politics, London 1998.
- J. Shahnawaz, Father and daughter. A political autobiography, Lahore 1971, repr. Karachi 2002.
- R. F. Woodsmall, Moslem women enter a new world, Lahore 1936.

SIQBHAN LAMBERT-HURLEY

East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia and Oceania

INTRODUCTION

It's queer how out of touch with truth women are. They live in a world of their own, and there had never been anything like it, and never can be (Conrad 1995, 28).

Conrad's words in Heart of Darkness (1902) clearly reveal how in colonial narratives the representations of colonized peoples and women tended to coincide or mirror each other. Women were associated with notions of "darkness" and "savage" as opposed to "light" and "civilized"; they represented a potential destabilizing Dionysian or chthonian force, which had to be tamed and controlled to protect the Apollonian, urianian entity of the imperial state. The Nietzschean undertows of imperial images and perceptions are indicative of the aggressively fearful nature of the enterprise. Women, native and non, along with the colonized males embodied the devastating forces of nature, of esoteric and exotic obscurity, primitive, as Mille and Delmaison describe in their novel La femme et l'homme nu, in being simultaneously "slave[s] of dominant forces" and sources of the "unleashing of forces" (1924, 118, cf. Ridley 1983, 90-1).

In perusing the literature on colonialism and imperialism in East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia/Oceania, one cannot fail to notice the scarce attention paid to the effects that these phenomena have had on shaping the image and role of both migrant and native women in colonial settings. Female agency appears conspicuously absent from the narratives and historiographies of both colonial and nation-building enterprises and when it does appear, it plays an instrumental or structural-functional role in the construction of both the colony and the empire, a function that persisted during the decolonization and nation-building era. Women's bodies were disposed of in a way that served male interests. In the masculine context of the colony both European and native women, as bearers of life and of the imprint of ethnicity, became "instrumental" in the structuring of the foundational ethnic and social differences and relations within the empire (Yuval-Davis and Anthias 1989). As Summers (2002) effectively summarizes, in colonial settings women were "categorized" as either "damned whores" or "God's police." That colonialism and its cognate imperialism were gendered phenomena, giving rise to masculine categories of dominance, appears clear from the metalanguage by and in which the enterprise came to be articulated, which inherently posed as the metaphor and metonymy of masculine dominance over the feminine "other." They were the product or systemic arrangements of masculine discourses, practices, and policies by which colonized peoples were subdued and power relations were structured. The regimentation of the relations between the colonizer and the colonized was deemed essential in order to avoid the entropy brought about by miscegenation and the annihilation of difference and, consequently, of identity.

EXPLORING THE STATUS QUAESTIONIS

At the outset of an analysis of the effects of colonial policies and practices on colonized populations and in particular on women, it is necessary to draw attention to some of the main issues connected to the topic in the geographical setting under examination. First, it must be postulated that colonial policies were framed with reference to the interests of the colonial power, which produced particular practices, as well as discourses, in colonial settings. In East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia/Oceania, colonial policies concerning women were designed to structure and systemize the boundaries and the power relations between Europeans and native populations in order to protect the economic and political interests of power groups.

In a vast region in which the discourses of Primitivism and Orientalism often overlap and which is characterized by the presence of several European powers (Great Britain, The Netherlands, France, Portugal, and Spain, the last replaced after 1898 by the United States) and by cultural and religious heterogeneity, the task of analyzing and defining the effects of colonial policies and practices on colonized people proves to be elusive, if not daunting. Notwithstanding the universal approach adopted by the colonial powers in the application and implementation of policies in colonial settlements, which were not tailored to fit specific local realities, these did not produce homogeneous effects. The local culture and religiousness acted, in fact, as a filter or reagent precipitating particular analyses and syntheses in loco. As Furnivall states, it is superfluous to argue that the Western powers that colonized the territories in Asia and Oceania have a "fundamental" unity since they share a common "civilization" derived from Greece and Rome and reinterpreted in the light of Christianity (1956, 3). Differences between the policies implemented by colonial governments stemmed from the particularist interests they were pursuing and the fundamental principles informing particular practices. Considering the two major colonial powers in Southeast Asia during the nineteenth century, Great Britain and The Netherlands, the differences appear evident: British colonial policy was based on the principles of the rule of law and economic freedom, whereas the Dutch aimed at "imposing restraints on economic forces by strengthening personal authority and by con-servicing the influence of custom" (Furnivall 1956, 3). Consequently, while colonial policies appear to be homogeneous, colonial practices come to differ. The analysis of the latter therefore becomes the main focus for understanding the effects that the former had on the structuring of social roles and functions of individual categories.

A second question that must be considered in the context of the study of the effects of colonial policies and practices on the local populace is that colonial partitions brought about the breaking up of cultural areas which were demarcated by the presence of specific values and norms derived from the spread and acceptance of religious beliefs based on either a historical revelation or theophany (Islam, Christianity, and, to a certain extent, Buddhism) or on a philosophical-gnomic system (Confucianism). Although these often were either influenced by or incorporated local customs in the domain of ritual, overall they continued to preserve their intrinsic structural semantics. Disregarding completely the contours of colonial partitions and of modern political geography in this region, in fact, it is possible to distinguish four areas defined by the prominence of a particular religion: the Theravada Buddhist nations of continental Southeast Asia (Thailand, Burma, Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia); the Muslim countries of archipelagic Southeast Asia (Malaysia, Indonesia); the Christian areas of Oceania (Australia, New Guinea, and the Pacific); and the Confucian and Shinto areas of China and Japan respectively. The borders of these areas are not sharp but rather blur and overlap current state borders so that religious enclaves may be found beyond colonial and, later, national boundaries. The implementation of colonial policies, however, notwithstanding the cultural-religious-ethnic heterogeneity of the regions in question, was homogeneous and uniform. Colonial governments considered colonial peoples as a shapeless mass or entity and as a mere "territorial" extension of the colonial power. The policies of the mother country were extended indiscriminately to the colonial periphery.

Women in colonial settings came to epitomize the "colonized mass" as a whole. Since reproduction was the means of perpetuation and transmission of genetic/ethnic markers, it was necessary to control those considered to be the bearers of racial features, namely women. Policies were designed to target the maintenance of ethnic boundaries and perpetuate European dominance. By controlling women, both native and European, through laws regulating mixed marriages, prostitution, and education, it was possible to draw and maintain distinctive ethnic boundaries between the colonizer and the colonized, which constituted the basis for the structuring of political and social relations of dominance and dependency.

The absence of policies discriminating among the heterogeneity of local cultural realities, although indicating the instrumental function of women in colonial settings, makes the task of defining the effects of those policies, particularly on native women, extremely difficult. While European women continued to live within the boundaries of their autochthonous cultural-religious templates even in colonial settings, the status and role of native women presumably underwent radical changes. The analysis of precolonial narratives and of socio-economic and political patterns in the areas in question reveals that women played an important participatory role in society that complemented that of their male counterparts. Buddhism, Islam, Confucianism, and Animism all acknowledged the important social and economic function of women (Furnivall 1956, 13). It follows that the policies enacted by the Christian colonizers profoundly altered the precolonial balance and complementarity underlying gender relations.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS: RELIGION AND COLONIAL/IMPERIAL POLICIES AND PRACTICES

Religion and religious institutions have been regarded by scholars of all times as playing a functional role in the creation of colonies and empires. The expansion of and conversion to the religion of the colonizer were deemed or envisaged as means to facilitate and foster the stability of colonial rule. Such an approach, however, has been unable to account for the ideological discontinuities and persisting dialectics that characterized colonial settings. As a matter of fact, religious beliefs, values, and norms, sanctioned and transmitted by ritual repetition informed the actions of both colonizers and colonized, shaping particular socioeconomic and political organizations and engendering perceptions of difference and epistemological misunderstandings. If one assumes religion to be the constantly changing product of continuous processes of adaptation to a particular ecosystem, which in turn prompt parallel processes of internal group integration through the linkages of language and the conceptions of time and space, in other words as a system of survival and perpetuation, it appears that religion plays a foundational, rather than functional role in patterning and structuring cultural, political, and socioeconomic templates. Religious motives were not only adduced to justify the colonial/imperial enterprise, but informed the drawing of policies and practices in colonial possessions.

The role and function of women in colonized societies was strongly influenced by religious beliefs and institutions. The spread and acceptance of monotheistic religions (Islam and Christianity) brought about the domestication or social segregation of women. Women's morality became the tool to shape discourses of male dominance and superiority and to preserve cultural and ethnic integrity (Lerner 1986) in the clash/encounter between institutionalized historical religions.

Historians have devoted little attention to the effect colonial policies had on the Muslim women in what can be referred to as the "Muslim Basin" of Southeast Asia, the Indo-Malaysian archipelago. The cause may be attributed to the scarce archival information on women, in particular on those who did not engage in some activity under colonial government control, such as prostitution. The silence of the archives is, however, indicative of the discontinuity characterizing the social history of these regions but also of the subjugation of women in the colonial system. This is not the place to enter the debate regarding the hermeneutics of Islamic law on women and the structuring of their asymmetric position in Islamic society vis-à-vis their male counterparts (Ahmed 1992, Mernissi 1991). It suffices to state that in areas outside the original birthplace of Islam, Muslim religious norms and customs tended to fuse with local popular religiousness. It follows that it is possible that women who lived in the fold of Islam continued to maintain their original pre-Islamic status and role in society. The homogenizing effect, however, of European colonial policies, which aimed at homologating subjected populations, overruled local customs and divested the markers of religious boundaries of their social significance.

It is possible, however, to infer that the policies prompted radical changes in the status, role, and function of Muslim women. On the basis of Islamic law, in fact, women were endowed with a certain degree of freedom. The Qur'an states that women may inherit and own property (4:6) and are recognized to have rights similar to those exercised against them by their male counterparts, although it is stated that men have a "status above" or precedence over (daraja) women (2:226). Although it appears that daraja occurs in the context of matters regarding divorce (4:34-8), it is stated that men have, however, qawwām, that is authority, over women since they have an obligation or moral duty to protect and support them (Bowker 1999, 1043).

In Muslim societies and communities of the Indo-Malay archipelago the norms of Islam regulating gender relations were generally applied matching the role of women under local adat.

Colonial policies brought about the abrogation of many precolonial norms and practices. In Malaysia, in stark contrast with the policy of non-interference in matters affecting Malay custom and religion declared in the 1874 Pangkor Treaty, the British enacted policies that gradually contributed to weaken the Islamic factor in the life of the Malays (Cowan 1961). In the courts civil servants tended to refer to British statutory law practices in preference to those of Shari'a or adat (Sadka 1968, 156). For instance in the cases of Muslim children who were declared illegitimate by Islamic courts, British judges made them legitimate, overruling also the granting of custody to the father (Ahmad 1973). It follows that colonial practices weakened the position of women in Islamic communities and in colonial settings as a whole, inaugurating a trend that would continue during the decolonization and nation-building phase.

As stated earlier, women in colonial settings were listed under the categories of either "damned whores" or "God's police." The former was mainly the reserve of native women who became concubines of European settlers or prostitutes in brothels to serve the needs of European men; the latter encompassed the European women who came to the colonies to protect and police male morality and genetic integrity. The extension of the 1864 Contagious Disease Act to British colonial possessions led to the registration of prostitutes and the definition of women's roles and responsibilities. The act was designed not to abolish prostitution but to place sex work in the hands of the male state (McClintock 1995, 288-9). The Dutch implemented an analogous policy in their Indonesian possessions at the turn of the twentieth century in an attempt to curtail the negative effects of concubinage (Ming 1983) and prostitution (Hesselink 1987), which, if left unchecked, posed a serious threat to white male fertility and the propagation and perpetuation of the white race in colonial contexts. The policies coincided with the arrival of European women in the colonies, as wives of settlers and officials, who had been instructed in the mother country before departure in regard to their role in the colony (Stoler 1991).

The regulation of sex relations and the enactment of eugenic policies were deemed essential, if not vital, by European colonial governments in order to establish effective and stable rule. European motherhood, consequently, came to be placed at the center of the programs of empire-building as a means to regiment male morality as well as to provide an example to native women of a civilized and morally appropriate way of life. Wives of missionaries, for instance, who worked side by side with their spouses in colonial settlements, were regarded as having a “gracious influence of wise and thoughtful womanhood” on local women (Langmore 1989, 165–84). White women, as the bearers and breeders of ethnic markers, consequently had to be protected. In 1926 in British New Guinea the White Women’s Protection Ordinance was issued to protect white women, and indirectly whiteness, from the “black peril.” In Indonesia, although in 1901 the Dutch enacted the so-called Ethical Policy, which called for consideration of native adat, this was accompanied by the simultaneous enactment of welfare programs concerning parents and parenting, servants, orphanages, nurse maids, and nurseries (Stoler 2002, 1996). In 1898, the Mixed Marriage Law, which called for the abrogation of polygamy had been issued (Stoler 2002, 101–6). The motive adduced to its promulgation was that it aimed at protecting native men’s rights. In reality it went to correct the 1848 Civil Code, which, ruling that marriage partners of European and native standing were subject to European law, allowed European men living in concubinage with native women (nyai) to legalize their union and legitimate their mestizo children. Policies regulating marriage arrangements were also implemented in British Malaya, in particular in regard to child marriage. The Age of Consent Act of 1891 raised the age of consent to sexual relations for girls from 10 to 12 and the Child Marriage Restraint Act of 1929 forbade marriages of girls below the age of 14. In the Dutch East Indies laws of this kind were never promulgated: child marriages took place in the form of betrothal to be followed later by marriage. Muslim women maintained a certain degree of freedom in particular in matters regarding divorce and property (Keddie 1990, Locher-Scholten 2000, 193–6).

During the 1930s, amendments introduced to the law in order to protect European women who married Indo-Malay men generated a debate within the Muslim community instigated by local Muslim women and religious authorities in both Indonesia (Locher-Scholten 2000, 187–209) and Malaysia (Manderson 1980, 17–18, 22–4), which brought about its withdrawal. Muslim Indonesians argued that such a law subverted the issue of marriage and gender relations in Islam (Locher-Scholten 2000, 187–8) since women and family law play an essential role in the preservation of Islamic unity and identity (Eickelman and Piscatori 1996, 83–94). The colonial government argued that the law inherently aimed at protecting European women against Muslim practices in inter-religious and inter-ethnic marriages. In reality it acted as a means for preventing European properties from falling into the hands of Muslim subjects, which would have led to a change in European practices of inheritance and property ownership. The law, however, encroached upon the structural semantics of Islamic hadith (tradition) and consequently its application was strongly resisted, generating widespread calls for its abrogation. What emerges from the dynamics and dialectics of the debate is that the categories of race, gender, and class came to intersect with those of religion (Locher-Scholten 2000, 209–10), placing the latter at the center of the structuring of inter-ethnic relations and later of nationalist ideologies.

CONCLUSIONS

Colonial policies and practices prompted cultural and social change in the autochthonous templates of colonized populations. These changes are evident when comparing precolonial cultural templates with the programs of nation-building and state-crafting implemented during the decolonization era. The hiatus that exists between the two periods not only indicates the deep transformations that took place during colonial rule but also calls for a re-examination of the dynamics and dialectics of anti-colonial struggles and resistance. Colonized populations, in a frenzy to shake off the yoke of European dominance, did not completely reverse the practices that generated particular gender relations. Women’s bodies continued to represent the tabula on which to draw nationalist ideologies and policies. The control of the reproductive function of women was vital to the reproduction and perpetuation of the nation and to the legitimacy of claims of nationhood. Presumably the veiling of women in Islamic societies was prompted by the need to preserve community, and later national, integrity and unity: the discussion regarding the asymmetric position of women in Islam vis-à-vis their male counterparts should, therefore, be set in the particular context and regarded as a legacy of the effects of colonial practices and policies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ahmad, The administration of Islamic law in Southeast Asia, in Islamic Culture 57 (1973), 37–55.
- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- J. Bowker (ed.), The Oxford dictionary of world religions, Oxford 1999.

- J. Conrad, Heart of darkness, London 1995.
- C. D. Cowan and O. W. Wolters, Nineteenth century Malaya. Origins of British political control, London 1961.
- D. Eickelman and J. Piscatori (eds.), Muslim politics, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- J. S. Furnivall, Colonial policy and practice. A comparative study of Burma and Netherlands India, New York 1956.
- L. Hesselink, Prostitution, a necessary evil particularly in the colonies. Views on prostitution in the Netherlands Indies, in E. Locher-Scholten and A. Niehof (eds.), Indonesian women in focus. Past and present notions, Dordrecht 1987, 205–24.
- E. Keddie, The past and present of women in the Muslim world, in World History 1 (1990), 77–108.
- D. Langmore, Missionary lives. Papua, 1874–1914, Honolulu 1989.
- G. Lerner, The origins of patriarchy, New York 1986.
- E. Locher-Scholten, Women and the colonial state, Amsterdam 2000.
- L. Manderson, Women, politics and change, Oxford 1980.
- A. McClintock, Imperial leather. Race, gender and sexuality in the colonial contest, New York 1995.
- F. Mernissi, Women and Islam. A historical and theological enquiry, Oxford 1991.
- P. Mille and A. Delmaison, La femme et l'homme nu, Paris 1924.
- H. Ming, Barracks-concubinage in the Indies, 1887–1920, in Indonesia 35 (1983), 65–93.
- H. Ridley, Images of imperial rule, New York 1983.
- E. Sadka, The protected Malay states, 1874–1895, Kuala Lumpur 1968.
- A. L. Stoler, Carnal knowledge and imperial power, in M. Leonardo (ed.), Gender at the crossroads of knowledge, Berkeley 1991, 82–5.
- , A sentimental education. Native servants and the cultivation of European children in the Netherlands Indies, in L. J. Sears (ed.), Fantasizing the feminine in Indonesia, Durham, N.C. 1996, 71–91.
- , Carnal knowledge and imperial power. Race and the intimate in colonial rule, Berkeley 2002.
- A. Summers, Damned whores and God's police, Camberwell, Vic. 2002.
- N. Yuval-Davis and F. Anthias (eds.), Women, nation, state, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1989.

SUSANNA G. RIZZO

Egypt

The onset of British occupation of Egypt in 1882 dealt a critical blow to independent Egyptian modernization and signaled the colonial restructuring of the society. Nowhere were the new relations of power between colonizer and colonized more apparent than in the area of gender relations and policies. British colonial government used the education of Egyptian women to prove its civilizing mission to its Oriental subjects. While some women writers ignored and/or were critical of that Orientalist discourse, which assumed the inferiority of the Orient and the superiority of the Occident, many men and women internalized it in their writings on gender roles and relations. More seriously, Egyptian nationalists found themselves in the paradoxical position of having to defend the status of women in Islamic societies while recognizing the need to overcome their backwardness. As a result, their gender discourses and policy agendas reflected a strong underlying belief in the necessity of following in the footsteps of the Occident as a developmental other.

‘Ā’isha Taymūr’s Natā’ij al-abwāl fi al-aqwāl wa al-af’āl (Consequences of changing conditions as they relate to speech and deeds) offered the first commentary on the crises of dynastic government and community that paved the way for British occupation and colonialism. Published in 1888 under strict British censorship, it stressed the need to struggle to overcome these crises through the transformation of Islamic traditions as a guide for the reorganization of the key political, economic, and social institutions of society. With that aim, Taymūr advocated the nationalization of dynastic government and the overcoming of class cleavages through the revival of fraternal relations of solidarity and the downsizing of polygamous marriages as means of infusing Islamic society with new sources of dynamism (Taymur 1888).

In contrast, Syrian Christian and Jewish women, who were graduates of missionary schools where the Orientalist discourse on knowledge and society was part of the curriculum, used a derivative of that discourse in the earliest women’s journals calling on the Orient to copy the gender roles in the Occident. Toward that goal, the early journals, which included Hind Nawfal’s al-Fatā (Girl, 1892), Louisa Habbalin’s al-Firdaws (Paradise, 1896), Maryam Mazhar’s Mir’at al-ḥasnā (Mirror of beauty, 1896), Alexandra Avierino’s Anīs al-jalīs (The familiar companion, 1898), and Esther Azhuri’s al-‘Ā’ila (Family, 1899), emphasized womens’ education as part of the development of modern domesticity in the family (Baron 1994, Fawwaz n.d., 7–16, Hatem 2002).

When in the 1890s the British colonial government finally turned its attention to education in general and girls’ education in particular, it declared itself to be committed to the expansion of girls’ education as part of the civilizing mission. Paradoxically, its educational policy was restrictive (Tucker 1985, 125) and focused on the acquisition of basic literacy skills at the elementary school (kuttab) level and channeling very young girls into the study of domestic sciences (ibid. 126). It ended free public education for girls and relied on private schools to satisfy the needs of the middle classes.

This represented a break with the precolonial

educational policy where the approach was less gendered and less restrictive. It is best described by the three public schools that catered to the educational needs of young girls before 1882 and the changes that they had to endure under British control. The oldest of these schools was for midwives and was established in 1832. At the beginning, it had difficulty recruiting students, but eventually it attracted many working-class girls who upon graduation were employed by the state in the different provinces (Kuhnke 1990). In 1888, the school was transformed into a British-style nursing school in which students were trained to be helpers of male physicians who from then on monopolized the study and the practice of obstetrics to which the early graduates had access (Mahfouz 1935, 75–76). The other two public schools located in Cairo, al-Suyufiyya (1873) and Qurabiyya (1875), provided general education for girls. In the 1880s, the two schools were combined into one as al-Madrasa al-Saniyya in 1889 with a curriculum that reflected the new emphasis on domestic sciences. The first graduates of al-Saniyya, who included the feminist writer Malak Ḥifnī Nāsif and the distinguished educator Nabawiyya Mūsā, went on to train at the Teachers' College in 1901 and eventually worked as teachers at schools for girls (Kamal 2001, 179). Even though private primary education for girls continued to expand during the first two decades of the twentieth century, the establishment of preparatory and secondary school education for girls had to wait for Egyptian formal independence in 1923.

The rudimentary colonial view of girls' education was shared by Egyptian nationalists and modernists who claimed to be supporters of the liberation of women. Among them was judge Qāsim Amīn, who with other Egyptian nationalists such as Sa'd Zaghlūl, the Egyptian minister of education in 1906, worked closely with the British consul, Lord Cromer. Amīn apologetically defended Islamic gender practices in response to the Orientalist attack by Duc d'Harcourt's L'Égypte and les Égyptiens (1894) and then used his book Tahrīr al-mar'a (The liberation of women), published in 1899, to reiterate the negative Orientalist representations of Islamic society and to blame Muslim women for its backwardness (Hatem 2002, 17–21). Unfortunately, the title of the book, its call for the abolition of the veil, and the attack launched against it by Muslim conservatives led most readers and analysts to assume that it had a progressive message. Recent analyses have moved beyond this superficial view to criticize Amīn's embrace of the colonial views of Lord Cromer (Ahmed 1992, 155–57) and the assumptions and categories of the Orientalist discourse (Hatem 2002, 17–21).

The colonial government had hoped that its abolition of corvée labor and the downsizing of the draft system would make it popular among the peasant classes. In fact, peasant men and women continued to view British soldiers in their midst with hostility (Tucker 1985, 145–6), culminating in the outbreak of violence in Dinshway (1907) where soldiers shooting pigeons accidentally shot a peasant woman and set fire to a barn, causing the peasants to attack them. In response, the colonial government whipped and executed the peasants involved.

The new colonial economy, which relied on the presence of a large landowning class and their support, did not improve the economic conditions of the peasant majority. Their plight was ignored by the modernist nationalist intellectuals of the early period who either maintained friendly relations with the Egyptian landed classes or were themselves members of that class. For example, Qāsim Amīn presented a simultaneously romantic and condescending view of peasant women and men in his writings. He argued that unlike the urban well-to-do women who were unproductive and did not share their husbands' education, peasant women were the economic partners of their husbands and shared their level of knowledge. In his view, peasant men and women led a "naive Beduin-like existence where the needs of the family were limited" (Amīn 1984, 32, 42).

The romanticization of the work of rural women overlooked their poverty and limited the satisfaction of their many needs. During the early part of the twentieth century, urban poor women faced equally difficult work conditions in the markets and in cigarette factories (Sālim 1984, 20). These conditions of work differed markedly from those facing middle-class women who developed an interest in public work in the first decade of the twentieth century. Their education provided them with better material, if not social, conditions as the memoirs of Nabawiyya Mūsā suggest. It was understood that working middle-class women had to leave their jobs once they were married. Malak Ḥifnī Nāsif, one of the first graduates of al-Saniyya school, ended her teaching career when she married the notable 'Abd al-Sattār al-Bāsil bek. More atypical was Nabawiyya Mūsā, the prominent educator, who chose not to marry and had a long career teaching first in public schools and then in her own private schools.

While Mūsā supported women's right to education and work in her writings, Nāsif developed the earliest and most powerful critique of the modernist-nationalist discourse espoused by the al-Jarīda group (which included Amīn and Zaghlūl), especially its blame of Egyptian women for the backwardness of the Muslim family and the society. As the only woman writer who had a column in the mainstream al-Jarīda newspaper, she suggested that men were using this new discourse and the goal of liberating women to impose their gender agenda on women, belittling the latter's perspective on such matters as the veil, polygamy, and public policy (El-Sadda 1994, 1998). In an effort to develop a distinct voice for women, Nāsif argued that the abolition of the veil was less important than changing the social and economic conditions that were responsible for the subordination of women. She also underlined the continuing role that men played in the reproduction of conditions that oppress women through polygamy, divorce, and resistance to an expanded public presence of women (Hatem 2001, 31–2).

The death of Nāsif in 1918, at the age of thirty-two, evoked numerous public testimonials by men and women that acknowledged her contributions to the development of an independent voice for women. The outbreak of a national revolution in 1919, calling for the end of British rule, contributed to a switch in perspective that strengthened the leading role played by the male nationalist elite and their modernist-nationalist discourse in shaping the public agendas of women. Upper- and middle-class women were mobilized by the women's committee of the Wafd party, which led the revolution. While the newspapers of the period pointed out that urban working-class women participated in industrial strikes, with rural women joining their men in the demolition of railway tracks and telegraph poles, the upper- and middle-class women's peaceful orderly demonstration monopolized national and international attention. The Wafd's women's committee also organized a successful boycott of British goods and wrote to local and international newspapers as well as to the British government voicing their views on the political issues of the day (al-Subkī 1986, 25).

The political mobilization of women in support of the 1919 revolution contributed to their co-optation by the nationalist discourse and its gender agenda. For example, Hūdā Sha'rāwī, whose husband was an original member of the Wafd, concurred with the leaders of the revolution that Egyptian women were not yet ready for political rights. She utilized the new visibility and the skills she developed as one of the leaders of the Wafd's women's committee in the formation of the Egyptian Feminist Union in 1923, which undertook the task of preparing women for these rights through education and extensive social work among the poorer classes. As one of the wealthiest Egyptian women of her time, she quickly allied the union with the International Alliance for Women's suffrage, embracing its Western gender agenda and attending its different international conferences (Sha'rāwī 1981, 248–60). Here, the desire for national independence from British colonialism did not coincide with the rejection of Western feminist agendas. These remained as the only social and political model for feminist organizing in Egypt. The union, its French journal, L'Égyptienne (1925–40), and the Arabic journal, al-Miṣrīyāt (1937–40) appealed to an audience that was primarily Westernized and well-to-do (Badran 1995).

Like the Western women of the alliance, the union used its dispensary and domestic school to present itself as the caretaker of women of poorer classes, seeking to socialize them into middle- and upper-class domesticity with classes that taught them family hygiene and genteel domestic skills such as sewing (Mariscotti 1994). The result was another variant of the hegemonic modernist-nationalist discourse first introduced by Amīn at the end of the nineteenth century that sanctioned domesticity as the primary role of women. Not only was this discourse oblivious of the fact that urban and rural working-class women have always had to juggle work inside and outside the home, but it also ignored the professional aspirations of middle-class women who were increasingly interested in public work. By the time Sha'rāwī died in 1947, other middle-class women's organizations, such as Bint al-Nīl led by Durriyya Shafīq, began to eclipse the Egyptian Feminist Union with a platform that addressed the more complex political and professional needs of this new generation of women (Nelson 1996). The 1952 revolution, which put an end to colonial rule, embraced this new middle-class agenda and used it as a source of national and international support.

In conclusion, the gender claim of the civilizing mission of colonial rule proved empty. It did not improve the economic, social, or political conditions under which women lived or worked. Nor was it associated with the advancement of women and/or their rights. The prominent Orientalist assumptions and categories of the colonial discourse indirectly influenced the development of the modernist-nationalist discourse that constructed the identities of Egyptian men and women, their views of themselves and of each other. It privileged the views of middle- and upper-class men as the agents of modernity and treated women as the party responsible for the backwardness of the nation. This discourse continues to shape postcolonial society. The results of its modernizing project are modest at best. More seriously, it failed to give women an independent voice and has historically survived by enlisting the support of middle- and upper-class women for a narrow social agenda that neglects the needs of their rural and urban working-class counterparts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, New Haven, Conn. 1992, 155–7.
- Q. Amīn, Tahrīr al-mar'a, Cairo 1984.
- M. Badran, Feminists, Islam and nation, Princeton, N.J. 1995, chapter 5.
- B. Baron, The women's awakening in Egypt, New Haven, Conn. 1994, chapters 1, 6, 7.
- H. Elsadda, Malak Hifnī Nāsif. Ḥalqa mafqūda min tārikh al-nahḍa, in Hajar 2 (1994), 109–19.
- , Notions of modernity. Representation of the “Western woman” by female authors in early twentieth century Egypt, in The Arabs and Britain. Changes and exchanges, Proceedings of a Conference organized by the British Council 23–5 March 1998, Cairo 1998, 352–66.
- Z. Fawwaz, al-Durr al-manthūr fi rabat tabaqāt al-khudūr, Kuwait n.d.
- M. Hatem, Malak Hifnī Nāsif bayn ru'ya qadīma wajadīda, in H. al-Ṣadda (ed.), Min rā'idāt al-qarn al-'ishrīn. Shakhshīyāt wa qadāyā, Cairo 2001.
- , The nineteenth century discursive roots of the continuing debate on the social contract in today's Egypt, San Domenico, Italy 2002.
- H. Kamal, Muhāḍarāt al-fara' al-nisā' fi al-jāmi'a al-miṣriyya, in H. al-Ṣadda (ed.), Min rā'idāt al-qarn al-'ishrīn. Shakhshīyāt wa qadāyā, Cairo 2001.
- L. Kuhnke, Lives at risk. Public health in nineteenth-century Egypt, Cairo 1990, chapter 7.
- N. Bey Mahfouz, The history of medical education in Egypt, Cairo 1935.
- C. Mariscotti, Consent and resistance. The history of upper and middle class Egyptian women reflected through their published journals, 1925–1939, Ph.D. diss., Temple University 1994, chapters 2–3.
- C. Nelson, Doria Shafik. Egyptian Feminist, Cairo 1996, chapter 8.
- L. M. Sālim, al-Mar'a al-Miṣriyya wa-al-taghyīr al-ijtimā'i 1919–1945, Cairo 1984.
- H. Sha'rāwī, Mudhakkirāt Hudā Sha'rāwī ra'idat al-mar'a al-'Arabiyya al-ḥadūtha, Cairo 1981.
- A. K. B. al-Subkī, al-Ḥaraka al-nisā'iyya fi Miṣr mā bayna al-thawratayn 1919–1936, Cairo 1986.
- Ā'isha Taymūr, Natā'ij al-ahwāl fi al-aqwāl wa al-af'āl, Cairo 1888, chapters 1, 3.
- J. E. Tucker, Women in nineteenth-century Egypt, Cambridge 1985.

MERVAT F. HATEM

French North Africa

The position of women in colonial society in North Africa was ambiguous; so too was the question of gender. European women were from the perceived “superior” civilization. As such they were above North African men and women in the colonial hierarchy but below European men. North African women were at the base of the gender pyramid. Colonial gender frameworks were more traditional than in metropolitan France, making their circumvention complex. Perceptions of women and women's agency in the colonial enterprise were also complicated by the fact that the military dominated the early years of colonial conquest and rule in Algeria (1830–70) and Morocco (1907–34). In addition, French occupation of Algeria, considered to be a part of France, preceded that of the two protectorates, Tunisia (1882) and Morocco (1912), by 52 and 82 years respectively. These factors shaped the experiences of women in the three regions of French North Africa in different ways.

During the military administration in Algeria little interest was shown in women, whatever their origin. The French/European civilian population was small and suffered from high mortality. Women who survived experienced the hardships of a pioneering society. Their agency in the colonial enterprise and their contact with local women were limited to the private sphere. As for North African women, a few officers chose wives from the two main ethnic groups, Arab and Berber, but on the whole their condition was deemed to be lamentable and was often cited as evidence of the inferiority of Islamic civilization. The French did make some distinction between Arab and Berber women, the latter being seen to be more independent than Arab women. French troops in Algeria were struck by the fact that Kabyle (a sub-group of the Berbers) women had joined in the fray of battle ululating and urging their warriors on to victory. This perceived Amazonian quality differentiated them from Arab women.

As colonization progressed, artists seeking exotic inspiration came to North Africa. Their influence contributed to the fabrication of the “Oriental” female as exotically erotic. Men (Delacroix, Fromentin, Chassériau) as well as women (Smith-Bodichon, Anderson) contributed to this development, which was extended, during the twentieth century, to the art forms of literature and photography. Sexuality was therefore a mediating framework between the cultures of France and North Africa.

The ambiguous nature of colonial practices and processes toward indigenous women arose out of their objectification and the contradictory images that emerged during the early decades of colonial rule in Algeria. As colonization progressed and spread to Tunisia and Morocco, the belief that women were a possible key to successful assimilation was added to perceptions of their backwardness or eroticism. If the French could access their private lives and erode their status as guardians of local tradition by instilling French values the women would pass them on to their children. To educate North African women, the French would have to break down the barriers of cultural resistance that had developed during the occupation. French women, the colonial authorities believed, were best suited to this task. In 1900 the French feminist Hubertine Auclert wrote a treatise on the condition of Algerian women. Derogatory in tone, it was not anti-colonial but rather an appeal to the colonial authorities to improve the Algerian woman's lot. As they settled into the Maghrib some French women followed in Auclert's footsteps in an attempt to draw North African women into the French fold (Bugéja 1921, Célarie 1925).

North African women's response to these and other attempts at their colonization varied over time and space. During the early decades of colonization, North African women were encumbered with a double yoke of domination: colonial and gender. Algerian women undoubtedly felt the colonial burden most intensely due to the length and intensity of the French occupation. Land sequestration and the imposition of French legal structures caused material and moral deprivation that affected women with particular intensity. The commodification of land and the French principle that all land was alienable had an impact on family structure and size. Together with the imposition of heavy taxation and protracted warfare (in Algeria and Morocco) families had to sell their land to meet the costs of occupation. Furthermore, until the Second World War, with the exception of the elites and some urbanites, most North African women remained illiterate, making it difficult for them to respond to juridical and fiscal constraints. Women reacted to the changes in their situation by retrenching within the family, which became a bulwark against colonialism. Until the final stages of the nationalist struggle for independence, women's resistance was largely passive. It was effective, nonetheless, insofar as they created an oral tradition of anticolonialism that was passed from one generation to the next.

North African women did not, however, remain totally removed from colonial society. Large numbers of them entered domestic service in settler homes. Whereas the relationship between the two groups of women symbolized the colonial framework and represented the major contact point between the two, it nonetheless served as a site of acculturation for both.

Schools for girls were established in North Africa on a sporadic basis in the period following the Ferry laws (1880s). To begin with their focus was on skill acquisition, whether it was French-style home management or proficiency in certain arts and crafts. Missionary schools were among the first to appear, but due to parental reticence in the face of a Christian environment, enrolment was limited. From 1919 onwards there was a slow expansion of educational opportunities for women, but women only really started to enjoy the privileges of education after 1945. A French education introduced women to French republican concepts providing them with the intellectual arsenal with which to refute colonialism. At decolonization, therefore, educated North African women, such as the Tunisian Gisèle Halimi, entered the public arena taking their place alongside their male counterparts. It was not only an educated minority that took part in the struggles for independence, however. Literate and illiterate alike, North African women joined and aided the nationalist movements in the hope of ridding themselves of the double yoke of colonialism and gender inequality. Although they achieved the former, the latter proved to be a longer struggle.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Alloula, The colonial harem, trans. M. Godzich and W. Godzich, Minneapolis 1981, 1986².
 H. Auclert, Les femmes arabes en Algérie, Paris 1900.
 M. Bugéja, Nos soeurs musulmanes, Algiers 1921.
 H. Célarie, Nos soeurs musulmanes. Scènes de la vie du désert, Paris 1925.
 J. Clancy-Smith, La femme arabe. Women and sexuality in France's North African empire, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, New York 1996, 52–63.
 —, Gender, work and handicraft production in colonial North Africa, in M. L. Meriwether and J. E. Tucker (eds.), A social history of women and the family in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999, 25–62.
 —, L'école rue du Pacha à Tunis. L'éducation de la femme arabe et "la plus grande France" (1900–1914), in Clio. Histoire, femmes et sociétés 12 (2000), 33–55.
 —, Educating the Muslim woman in colonial North Africa, in B. Baron and R. Matthee (eds.), Iran and beyond. Essays in Middle Eastern history in honor of Nikki Keddie, Costa Mesa 2000, 99–118.
 M. Lazreg, The eloquence of silence. Algerian women in question, London 1994.
 S. Monneret, L'Orient des peintres, Paris 1989.

PATRICIA M. E. LORCIN

Middle East, British

With its vast imperial holdings in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Great Britain ruled over millions of Muslim women. Often using women's social roles as benchmarks of civilization, British imperial agents used women to legitimate their imperial oppression of indigenous societies in vast areas of the Islamic world, including large territories in the Arab Middle East. However, although imperial agents claimed their agendas were meant to advance women's social positions, the experience of imperialism was often less than rewarding for women's personal and public lives.

At its height, the British Empire was deeply entrenched in the Arab world, directly administering and/or controlling the governments of Egypt, Sudan, Palestine, Transjordan (now Jordan), Aden (now in the Republic of Yemen), Kuwait, Iraq, Qatar, Bahrain, and Oman. Some nations, such as Egypt, were directly ruled, while others, such as Iraq and Transjordan, were established as mandatory nations with Arab monarchs at the head of government. In all of these territories, British imperialists assaulted local Islamic culture from several angles in the name of women's liberation. Male political leaders, feminists, and missionaries were all anxious to denigrate local leadership and culture in the name of freeing local women from oppression. However, an unavoidable consequence of such a tactic was tremendous resentment against the imperialists, whom their subjects viewed as hypocrites unwilling to admit their real goals for imperial control: the exploitation of local people and resources to create greater wealth and power for Britain.

One of the most decisive locations for gendered rhetoric in the British Empire was in Egypt. Formally occupied by Britain in 1882, British rulers often used what Leila Ahmed (1992) has called "colonial feminism" to claim the need for British rule in the name of liberating Egyptian women from native patriarchy. Casting Islam as a primary force oppressing Egyptian women, the British leader Lord Cromer used visible markers such as the hijab and the practice of maintaining harems as evidence for his case in destroying local autonomy in Egypt. Cromer claimed that British rule would usher in a new era for Egyptian women, at the expense of Islamic leadership and culture, which he believed was morally and spiritually corrupt.

However, British policies focused on window-dressing, rather than actual change for the betterment of native women's lives. A highly sexualized discourse denigrating the practices of veiling and polygamy drove anti-Islamic theories in the imperial theater and the metropole, while imperial policies continued to decrease women's actual mobility through society. For instance, the British government in Egypt increased tuition costs for elementary education, making education for girls less accessible, at the same time that leaders such as Cromer were decrying education statistics among Muslims in the empire.

Such practices were often interpreted by British subjects as typical of an oppressive ruling elite out to destroy native leadership and values. At the same time, they were reinforced by other Britons working in non-official capacities to promote the empire's social, spiritual, and political leadership in Islamic nations. Feminists sought to export ideas about women's social and political participation to Arab women, while missionaries were eager to convert Muslim and Christian Arabs to Protestantism. Although these groups did not always agree in Great Britain, missionaries and feminists alike expended tremendous energy abroad to establish their ideals of domesticity, education, and spirituality. They also reached out to Muslim women living outside the purview of direct imperial rule, hoping to erode indigenous patriarchy in places such as the Ottoman Empire. In this way, they paved the way for more formal colonial rule in places such as Palestine before the Ottoman Empire was dismantled after the First World War.

Missionary bodies such as the Church Missionary Society, the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, the Jerusalem and the East Mission, and the London Missionary Society established scores of churches, schools, and "houses of industry" aimed at drawing Muslim women away from Islam and toward Protestant Christianity. The predominant discourse directed toward would-be converts was a firm belief that Islam was an evil religion, and an indicator of its wickedness was the seclusion and veiling of women. Although missionaries often found themselves in conflict with British governmental authorities, their message of the superiority of British modes of religion, domesticity, and child-rearing usually assisted the larger imperial effort to expand British influence and domination.

British feminists, too, traveled throughout the empire, disseminating their beliefs in women's education and public participation among Muslim women. They often focused their attention on a desire to remove the veil from the bodies of Muslim women, attacking the cultural context of Islamic civilization and promoting Western dress as the first step toward Westernization in other aspects of life as well. British feminists put forward their nation's models of education, dress, and marriage practice among imperial subjects, even at a time when they themselves did not have equal property rights in their own country, or the right to vote or attend most institutions of higher learning. Although frequently fighting their own battles against patriarchy at home, they were actively engaged in supporting the expansion of British patriarchy abroad, in the name of women's liberation.

In the wake of social, political, and spiritual attacks on local culture, some Muslims living under British rule came to adopt values promoted by the imperial elite. However, many embraced ideals of Westernization in an effort to combat imperial authority. Qāsim Amīn, for example, became an advocate for women's education and the expansion of women's public participation in Egypt as a result of his experiences in Europe. Ardentely convinced of the superiority of Western nations, he nonetheless advocated the adoption of Western models in an effort to regain independence ('Amara 1976). Amīn, and other subjects of the British, had something in common with the imperialists. Like them, he used local women's social positions, their physical presences, and their religious values as indicators of the worth of native attitudes. By embracing colonial ideologies of Muslim women, Amīn and others inadvertently reinforced them.

The result of British colonial practices on the lives of the millions of Muslim women ruled by the empire in the Middle East was mixed. As feminist and nationalist movements emerged in colonized lands, women struggled to shine a spotlight on the patriarchies that oppressed their full participation in society, both local and colonial. However, the association between imperialism and Western feminism, and the subsequent denigration of Islam by British politicians, missionaries, and feminists, laid the groundwork for deep distrust between colonized people and those espousing their ideas about women's roles in native societies. Some women embraced colonial notions, others cast them aside; but throughout the British Empire, Muslim women were used by colonizers and colonized as templates for or against their particular sociopolitical agendas.

Arab nationalists were eager to rally women to the cause of independence, and women in Egypt, Palestine, and other Middle Eastern nations organized conferences and demonstrations calling for more inclusive political and personal rights for women in the context of independent nations free from British rule. However, nationalist leaders, like the imperialists, did not extend substantial rights to women once the British relinquished control, despite their use of women's issues to bolster their struggles for independence. This resulted, in part, in the continued festering of the Woman Question, promoted by imperialists during their rule of the Middle East, deep into the postcolonial era. Such reification of women's existence continues to stand as a potent and contentious point between Muslims in former colonial nations and Westerners, long since the end of British rule in Muslim countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
 M. 'Amara (ed.), al-A'māl al-kāmila li Qāsim Amīn, 2 vols., Beirut 1976.
 M. Badran, Feminists, Islam, and the nation. Gender and the making of modern Egypt, Princeton, N.J. 1995.
 N. Chaudhuri and M. Strobel (eds.), Western women and imperialism. Complicity and resistance, Bloomington, Ind. 1992.
 E. Fleischmann, The nation and its "new" women. The Palestinian women's movement, 1920-1948, Berkeley 2003.
 B. Melman, Women's Orients. English women and the Middle East, 1718-1918. Sexuality, religion and work, Ann Arbor 1992, 1995.
 E. W. Said, Orientalism, New York 1978.

NANCY L. STOCKDALE

Russian Colonial Domains of the Caucasus and Central Asia

The social environment of Muslim women in the Islamic parts of Russia, which included Azerbaijan and today's Central Asia (that is, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan) during the Tsarist period (1865-1917) is a topic not extensively studied. Despite this intellectual hindrance, there is some evidence that the Tsarist government reinforced the hierarchical, patriarchal social structure of the Islamic lands by choosing not to disturb ancient attitudes that had been held over millennia.

The history of Central Asia and its surrounding region has been shaped by Persian, Turkic, and to a lesser extent, Mongolian and Arab cultures, which at the beginning, or at least in time, respected the cultural and religious practices of the population. The emergence of Russia, a Christian, Slavic power, however, appeared to change that and created a major dilemma and concern for the Muslim population. Unlike previous conquerors, this new power was not going to integrate itself, culturally or religiously, with the Muslim population. The leaders of the Islamic areas made every effort to confront this new power, ranging from military battles to intellectual clashes, and to defend their cultural and religious independence. The final result was a social and legal concession by the Russians not to interfere in the Muslim population's social and, at times, legal practices.

This attitude developed partly as a result of the Russians' own beliefs in gender inequality but more importantly because of their understanding of the role Islam would play in this part of the empire. Aware of the relationship between Islam and culture and the danger in directly challenging this arrangement, the Russians established an unwritten contract with the leaders of the Muslim republics to allow them to maintain certain practices that were based on cultural as well as religious traditions. The non-interference agreement encompassed several different elements, each reinforcing the patriarchal social structure of the Muslim population. One was the infusion of religious doctrine and law into the daily activities of the Muslim population.

Because the center of social as well as religious life of every city was the mosque, the religious leaders, the 'ulamā', codified customs that they deemed best for the society through religious decrees and Islamic education, thereby religiously endorsing attitudes toward women. By interpreting Islam in a manner that supported their individual views on women and the society as a whole, the 'ulamā' prevented any direct challenge to their authority, because they invoked the Qur'an and hence claimed divine sanction. At times, however, religious interpretations varied from republic to republic. In Uzbekistan, for example, because the type of Islam that was taught in schools reflected a more conservative attitude toward women and this attitude was transferred into the daily social practices of the society, any form of contact between men and women, outside of marriage, was virtually forbidden. In Kyrgyzstan, in contrast, Muslim women exercised greater social freedom than their Uzbek counterparts. Because of their society's nomadic nature and harsh climate, female participation was essential in daily life. As a result, there was a more liberal and less restrictive attitude toward women. Kyrgyz women, for example, did not have to fast during the month of Ramadan or pray five times a day. However, despite these differences, the Kyrgyz society was also one of patriarchy where men dictated the moral behavior of the family. In addition to Islamic education, the Russians permitted the Shari'a to remain the guardian of law in the region, even though the most serious crimes cases came under the jurisdiction of Russian courts (Akiner 1986, 262). For example, in addition to the civil office, the 'ulamā' recorded birth, marriages, and deaths of the population. The arrangement between the state and the 'ulamā' allowed the Muslim population not only to continue to preserve what they believed to be their heritage but also to guard against cultural practices that they may have viewed as a threat to the existing social structure.

The other factor that helped to strengthen traditional attitudes toward women was the decision of the Russians not to interfere in the patriarchal system of the Muslim societies, in other words to leave all the domains of the "home" untouched. Governed by a patriarch, who was expected to make all the decisions, the Muslim family was a closely knit institution, where membership was achieved by birth, adoption, or marriage, and the line was preserved through the son. Within this system, the patriarch defined the "moral" tone of the family, particularly when it came to women. A Muslim woman, regardless of her socioeconomic background, was required to behave in a manner that was synonymous with her cultural surroundings. She was, for example, to dress in a manner that represented her individual culture, religious beliefs, and social status. In Uzbekistan social rules demanded very little contact between men and women. They also compelled Uzbek women to dress in a manner that was not that different from the men. They wore long trousers and long shirts and covered themselves with a long gown and a heavy black veil. The reason for the veil was not so much religion as social protection. Because certain Muslim women had broken with traditional practices, either by divorcing or wearing Russian style clothing, they were perceived as "immoral." So, in order to protect herself from charges of immorality, an Uzbek woman covered her head with a veil.

But by the beginning of the twentieth century some of the Islamic communities, perhaps influenced by Russia's social habits, began to allow greater social rights for women. The upper and middle classes of Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, for example, allowed girls to go to school and to obtain an education. In several parts of the region female poets began to publish their work and became well-known literary figures. In Azerbaijan, the first all girls' schools were opened in the early 1900s. Yet, despite these opportunities, the social environment of the majority of Muslim women remained largely the same because the changes were targeted toward the small urban upper elite.

During the Russian occupation the women of Central Asia and the Caucasus lived in an environment where ancient cultural attitudes combined with religious doctrine dictated their social behavior. Partly fueled by an attempt to maintain their heritage and partly because of personal beliefs, the various peoples who made up the Russian Islamic republics, supported at times by women, advocated values that not only represented their past but also marked their future. These values would continue to be in practice even during the Soviet era, where every attempt was made to Sovietize the Muslim population.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Islamic peoples of Soviet Union, London 1986.
 E. Allworth, Central Asia. 120 years of Russian rule, Durham, N.C. 1989.
 S. Becker, Russia's protectorates in Central Asia. Bukhara and Khiva, 1865-1924, Cambridge, Mass. 1968.
 E. Dunn, Post-revolutionary women in Soviet Central Asia, in Canadian-American Slavic Studies 9:1 (1975), 93-100.
 R. Frye and W. W. De Jong, The heritage of Central Asia. From antiquity to the Turkish expansion, in Indo-Iranian Journal 41:2 (1998), 190.
 R. Girshman, Iran from the earliest times to the Islamic conquest, Harmondsworth, Middlesex 1965.
 K. Gronbech, The Turkish system of kinship, Copenhagen 1953.
 J.-A. Gross (ed.), Muslims in Central Asia. Expressions of identity and change, Durham, N.C. 1992.
 G. Hogg, Who were the Soviet people? A guide to materials on the non-Russian nationalities of the former USSR, in Reference Services Review 21:1 (1993), 25-36.
 W. Jochelson, Peoples of Asiatic Russia, New York 1970.
 L. Kader, Peoples of Central Asia, Bloomington, Ind. 1966.
 B. Manz, Central Asia in historical perspective, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
 H. Masse, Persian beliefs and customs, New Haven, Conn. 1954.
 B. A. Nazarov and D. Sinor (eds.) with D. DeWeese, Essays on Uzbek History, Culture, and Language, Bloomington, Ind. 1993.
 S. G. Wilson, Persian life and customs. With scenes of incidents of residence and travel in the land of the lion and the sun, New York 1895.
 R. Wixman, Everyday Islam. Religion and tradition in rural Central Asia, in Slavic Review 54:3 (1995), 822.

MITRA RAHEB

Sub-Saharan Africa

This entry traces women's contributions to Muslim African societies during the colonial period that generally lasted from the 1890s to 1960.

The history of Islam in colonial Sub-Saharan Africa is often depicted through men's participation in trade routes and Sufi orders. There has been little mention of women in culture or politics. While Islam expanded and changed during European colonial administration, local historical processes and colonial policies de-emphasized gender and women's roles. Yet Muslim African women continued to influence diverse social arenas. In the process, African women reshaped Muslim identity and local gender ideologies.

Islam had a long history in Africa by the time of European colonial expansion in the late nineteenth century. In British East Africa, Swahili-speaking Muslims populated coastal Kenya and Tanzania (formerly German Tanganyika). Indian Ocean contacts dating to the eighth century and a long history of adaptation of Islam resulted in a unique Swahili society. Marriage and local migration patterns may have been important to Islam's spread into the East African interior during the colonial period (Sperling 1999, 282). In the Horn of Africa, Britain, France, and Italy carved up largely Muslim territories. Prior to European intervention, Egyptian imperialism shaped women's and men's attitudes toward both Islam and external intervention in that region (Boddy 1988). In West Africa, the Sahelian region just south of the Sahara Desert had been the site of Islamic learning from at least the fourteenth century, though the earliest contacts date back to the eighth century. Women served as crucial links in these networks through economic activity, marriage, and religious scholarship (Boyd and Last 1985, Robinson 2000, 166). In West Africa, the British claimed Nigeria with its northern Hausa-Fulani speaking Muslims and an increasing number of southern Yoruba-speaking Muslims. Otherwise, France colonized most of West Africa. Finally, South Africa's Muslim population mainly resided in Cape Town, Durban, and later Transvaal. Many South African Muslims were Asian immigrants forced out of Southeast and South Asia by the seventeenth century. Enslaved African women and men who converted to Islam also made up part of the Muslim population by the nineteenth century (Shell 1999). These diverse contexts provided challenges and opportunities for women to contribute to local society and Islamic culture.

European colonial policies and attitudes acted as another variable in Muslim African communities. On one hand, European officials saw Islam as an improvement over indigenous African religious practices. On the other, European official and popular discourse also viewed Islam negatively, particularly in its treatment of women. In an uneven fashion, European policymakers portrayed Islam as local "tradition" or as an alien imposition. For example, Great Britain applied its famed practice of "indirect rule" in different ways. Based on a model developed in Muslim northern Nigeria, indirect rule ideally made use of existing power structures and recognized local leaders as intermediaries. In northern Nigeria, British policies maintained the emirate system while restricting access to Western education and other resources in the name of Muslim "tradition." Yet British officials ignored women's positions of power in precolonial Muslim Hausa-Fulani society (Cooper 1998). Using a different approach, despite the centuries-long influence of Islam in British Somaliland, British officials emphasized local traditions and clan differences (Kaptein 1999b, 237–9). In British East Africa, new towns and centers emerged which brought Islam to non-Muslim areas via Muslim traders who acted as colonial agents. However, literate African Christian converts eventually displaced Muslim intermediaries (Sperling 1999). In each case, British administrators (initially) focused on (Muslim) male actors while often denying all female resources.

The difference between British “indirect rule” and French colonial policies is often overstated since colonial governments employed a variety of policies. Nevertheless under the model form of French “direct rule” (particularly prior to the First World War), French colonial administrators often displaced indigenous authorities, or replaced legitimate local leaders with favorites of the French. Sometimes Muslims were placed in control of largely non-Muslim populations. At the same time, French colonial administrators ultimately developed relationships with key Muslim leaders, particularly in the Senegal-Mauritania region. Because of its North African colonies and relationships with expanding Muslim populations, French officials represented France as a “Muslim power” (Triaud 1999, Robinson 2000). However, an underlying suspicion of pan-Islamic movements always simmered beneath any pretense of French favor toward Islam. To assuage these fears, French-scholar-administrators postulated a theory regarding Islam noir (Black Islam). The concept of Islam noir suggested that West African Islam was too unorthodox and localized to partner with Arab or pan-Islamic movements based in North Africa or the Middle East. The French colonial administration partly isolated Islamic practice and scholarship in West Africa. Islam’s peculiar relationship with French colonialism also consolidated the power of Muslim leaders in particular ways (Triaud 1999, 181–2). French colonial documents focus on clerics and leaders from specific regions and provide little information on women’s participation in Islamic culture through religious practice, kinship networks, and scholarship. Instead, Muslim women’s participation in indigenous forms of worship takes precedence (Coulon 1988, 113–15). These perceptions of women’s Islamic practice partly explain how European administrators ignored women’s influence in Muslim African communities. The examples below explore the implications of Muslim religious expansion and Muslim women’s religious expression during the colonial period.

Gender played an important role in the different paths of Islamic expansion in French-controlled southern Niger versus British-controlled northern Nigeria. The nineteenth-century reform movement (jihad) of Usman dan Fodio had different effects in the Hausa-speaking area that straddles the Niger-Nigeria border. Dan Fodio’s movement, which gained control over what became northern Nigeria, encouraged women’s education and right to inheritance. However, the practices of veiling and seclusion limited the physical and economic independence of women. The Maradi valley in southern Niger resisted dan Fodio’s policies. In Maradi, women continued to farm, moved freely in public, and participated in Bori. Bori (known as Zar in Sudan and North Africa) is a spirit possession ritual that recognizes both Islam and indigenous religious practices. Bori also provided an avenue for political power and social influence for women that both French and British colonial administrative policies overlooked. Meanwhile, European colonial policies had various effects on both sides of the border. The opening of trade between northern Nigeria and southern Niger during the colonial period brought practices such as veiling and seclusion into fashion in southern Niger by the end of the colonial period. Yet, in southern Niger, women used their access to farming to gain real estate and Bori remained a social force. In northern Nigeria, women’s groups have drawn upon the history of women’s education and interpretation of Islamic texts. Women’s participation in Muslim society in this border region reflects precolonial dynamics, colonial policies, and women’s initiative (Cooper 1998).

In Senegal, the presence of a leading woman in a Sufi ṭariqa (brotherhood) similarly resulted from internal local dynamics. In 1943, following her father’s death, Sokhna Magat Diop succeeded her father as khalīfa or leader of a small Mouride ṭariqa. Her ascent suggests that “popular” Islam in Sufi brotherhoods suits and supports women’s involvement in Muslim religious practice. Diop also personally cultivated baraka or charisma through her ascetic and humble lifestyle (Coulon 1988). Diop’s ability to manipulate colonial relationships like earlier Senegalese Muslim leaders is less clear. Her father reputedly instructed her in the ways of the French colonial administration. She also engaged in politically useful marriage alliances. The Diop case is not so much a singular biography as it is an example of local innovation and possible shifts in African Islam that occurred against the background of European colonial activities.

In other parts of the continent, colonial policies and Muslim religious expansion intersected in indirect ways. In Mombasa on the Kenyan coast, elite Muslim women and descendants of slaves shifted the meaning of Muslim Swahili identity. Despite increased marginalization under the British colonial regime, Swahili women recast their Muslim identity through wedding dances and new economic practices (Strobel 1979). In the colonial city of Nairobi, Islam served as a social inroad into urban society for poor rural female migrants in the early part of the twentieth century. As some of these female migrants participated in the labor process, particularly through prostitution, their activities showed the limits of British colonial control over labor processes and social values. Before the 1930s, Muslim ideas of hierarchy and respect shaped certain neighborhoods and relationships more than colonial directives. Islam also provided a means for women to attain property and landlord status (White 1992, 58–65, 223). In Kenya, existing Muslim communities altered in self-definition and composition partly due to the economic and social initiative of women.

In northern Sudan, Zar or spirit possession serves as a site to explore women's experience of Islam and colonialism. Turco-Egyptian occupation in the early nineteenth century gave way to Anglo-Egyptian rule by the end of the nineteenth century. In this context of war and devastation during the nineteenth century, Zar reputedly emerged in northern Sudan. Zar potentially serves as a counterdiscourse of resistance to outside influence, including well-established Islamic practice. Through their participation in Zar, women act outside the boundaries of their femininity and village identity. Zar thereby challenges local order while providing therapeutic care and self-awareness. From a local to a broader Islamic cultural context, women in northern Sudan who participate in Zar ceremonies have the potential to alter, contest, and reconstruct the relationships between women and men within local Islamic culture. The emergence and expansion of Zar during the colonial period suggests the interaction between the colonial imposition, local constraints, and women's mobility within Muslim cultural boundaries (Boddy 1988).

In northern Somalia, songs, poems, and sayings similarly serve as a site for debate over women's roles and gender norms in a Muslim, largely pastoral, society. The tumult of colonial rule and a 20-year long anticolonial movement took a toll on the economic and social development of the region during the twentieth century. Much Somali orature from this period reaffirmed male views of social norms, particularly in relation to women's proper behavior. Somali women sang religious songs or sitaat that celebrated women's roles through an evocation of celebrated female Muslim figures. Women's oral performance in Somalia suggests how poetry, work songs, and religious songs made social commentary, reflected social norms, and claimed a gendered, Muslim identity (Kaptein 1999b).

The invisibility of these histories and actors in Islamic and colonial African history illustrates various power dynamics. After the devastation of the First World War, European colonial officials in Africa refocused their attention on masculine domains of power. In the eyes of colonial administrators, the rapid introduction of "civilization" had threatened male control and social order (Conklin 1997). Colonial administrators sought to re-establish an imagined, idyllic African past through more intrusive control over women and women's bodies. Key policies included the codification of customary law, birthing clinics, and domestic training for women (Chanock 1985, Hunt 1999). These programs and policies emerged most forcefully among Christian women or women who engaged in indigenous worship. These non-Muslim cases, together with the Muslim examples above, illustrate the integral part gender played in European imperial efforts in Africa (Summers 1991).

This entry highlights the connection between European colonial policies, gender, and Islam in a variety of locations in Sub-Saharan Africa. Muslim African women influenced religious and non-religious domains throughout history in multiple ways (Dunbar 1999). Brief examples here illustrate how Muslim women reconfigured the meaning of Muslim identity in southern Niger and Mombasa. Women affected colonial economies through their participation in labor processes and markets in Nairobi and northern Nigeria. Women's religious scholarship and spirituality in Senegal, Sudan, and Somalia expanded the realm of Muslim religious expression. The lack of attention to Muslim African women reflects the colonial record and the general focus on Muslim men's trade and learning. This brief exploration of Muslim African women's religious observances, socioeconomic activities, and cultural strategies challenges the standard view of Islamic history on the continent. Attention to diverse (especially marginalized) groupings of women, youth, migrants, and others, expands both African and Islamic history.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Boddy, Spirits and selves in Northern Sudan. The cultural therapeutics of possession and trance, in American Ethnologist 15 (1988), 4–27.
- J. Boyd and M. Last, The role of women as agents religieux in Sokoto, in Canadian Journal of African Studies 19 (1985), 283–300.

- M. Chanock, Law, custom, and social order. The colonial experience in Malawi and Zambia, Cambridge 1985.
- A. Conklin, A mission to civilize. The republican idea of empire in France and West Africa, 1895-1930, Stanford 1997.
- B. Cooper, Gender and religion in Hausaland. Variations in Islamic practice in Niger and Nigeria, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 21-38.
- C. Coulon, Women, Islam, and Baraka, in D. B. Cruise O'Brien and C. Coulon (eds.), Charisma and brotherhood in African Islam, Oxford 1988, 113-33.
- R. A. Dunbar, Muslim women in African history, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 1999, 397-417.
- N. R. Hunt, A colonial lexicon of birth ritual, medicalization, and mobility in the Congo, Durham, N.C. 1999.
- L. Kapteijns, Ethiopia and the Horn of Africa, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 1999a, 227-50.
- L. Kapteijns with M. O. Ali, Women's voices in a man's world. Women and the pastoral tradition in Northern Somali orature, c. 1889-1980, Portsmouth, N.H. 1999b.
- D. Robinson, Paths of accommodation. Muslim societies and French colonial authorities in Senegal and Mauritania, 1880-1920, Athens, Ohio 2000.
- R. C.-H. Shell, Islam in Southern Africa, 1562-1998, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 327-48.
- D. C. Sperling with additional material by J. H. Kagabo, The coastal hinterland and interior of East Africa, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 1999, 272-302.
- M. Strobel, Muslim women in Mombasa (1890-1975), New Haven, Conn. 1979.
- C. Summers, Intimate colonialism. The imperial production of reproduction in Uganda, 1907-1925, in Signs 16:4 (1991), 787-807.
- L. White, The comforts of home. Prostitution in colonial Nairobi, Chicago 1990.

LORELLE DENISE SEMLEY

Constitutions

The Caucasus and Central Asian States

To review the interrelations between women, gender, and constitutions, and assess the role and significance of constitutions as a legal base to provide a regulatory framework for gender relations in Caucasian and Central Asian societies, it is important to look at the overall historic background. During the pre-Soviet era (before 1917), the countries known now as Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, belonged to the Russian Empire, which maintained varying degrees of control over its colonial territories. Indigenous societies, however, were allowed to exercise customary laws to a certain extent, with women generally excluded from public life and subject to strong paternalistic attitudes. Since then, during the twentieth century, these societies have been through a radical transformation that affected all aspects of life, but the status of women especially. This changed image of “Eastern” women, who during the Soviet regime gained access to education, employment, generous social welfare, health services, and enjoyed far more freedom when compared to Muslim countries with similar income levels, was one of the principal trump cards of Soviet propaganda.

SOVIET TIMES (1917–1991)

After the Bolsheviks seized power in October 1917, all legal norms of ex-colonial territories of the Russian Empire were proscribed and the legal norms adopted in Bolshevik Russia were to be followed (Saidbaev, 1984). The Soviet doctrine based on the theoretical assumptions of Vladimir Lenin, Inessa Armand, Nadezhda Krupskaya, and other Bolshevik ideologues who attached particular importance to the liberation of women and equality between the sexes began to be implemented. The objective of these policies was to achieve universal literacy for women and actively involve them in public life and thus ensure their high participation in the workforce. In these policies, emancipation of “suppressed women of the East” was one of the strategic priorities and one of the most important political considerations of the central organs of the Communist Party in Moscow from its earliest days of rule.

The first decrees of the Bolshevik government in 1918, and then the first Soviet constitution adopted in 1922, contained provisions to equalize women and men. Equal rights at that time meant equal rights to vote, to marry, or instigate divorce. In 1918, early marriages were abolished and the official registration of marriage was made mandatory. Still, these important legal acts remained declarative, and the constitution alone was not able to change deeply traditional societies. Therefore, constitutional provisions for equality remained unclaimed, and had to be reinforced by other measures (legal acts, decrees, and decisions) of the Bolsheviks. In Central Asia, specific policy measures to liberate women and engage them in socioeconomic life were also required.

With adoptions of new constitutions in the Soviet Union, in 1936, and then in 1977, to reflect the changing situation and political agenda of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the articles declaring equality between sexes continued to form an important part of the supreme law. By the 1960s and 1970s, constitutional law provided women with rights and social entitlements such as legal guarantees for equality, property and inheritance rights, greater access to education, increasing opportunities in the public sphere, child allowances, state-sponsored childcare, lengthy maternity leaves, and guaranteed return to employment after maternity leave.

The status of women in the Caucasus and Central Asia changed significantly within one generation (from the 1920s to the 1960s). However, throughout Soviet history, constitutions primarily served as a tool for ideological purposes to demonstrate to the world how the Soviet government “cared” for the needs of women. There were no mechanisms created to implement the constitutional provisions other than political will and pressure coming from the ruling Communist Party. Equality between sexes was interpreted as “equality before the law,” and remained limited, being largely perceived as sameness or similar identity. At the same time, the paternalistic approach toward women’s specific needs arising from their biological roles led to the development of “protectionist” legislative measures that, in turn, further enhanced perceptions of women as mothers, bearing sole responsibility for family and children. Therefore, in spite of impressive achievements in the area of employment, education, social welfare, especially visible in the context of Central Asian and Caucasian countries, equality of sexes remained illusory as hidden discrimination continued to exist. It found its reflection in gender disparities and unequal gender roles when women had a disproportionate burden of responsibilities and men were alienated from the family sphere.

POST-SOVIET TIMES

Constitution in its modern role of a supreme national law, providing legitimacy and symbolizing sovereign statehood, has been considered as an important tool in the process of nation-building in Caucasian and Central Asian states. After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, all these countries renewed their legal frameworks, and adopted new constitutions. This did not apply to the parts of the Caucasus that remained as constituencies of the Russian Federation (namely Abkhazia, Chechnya, Dagestan, and Osetia).

Constitutional law in the Caucasian and Central Asian states, as in the Soviet past, recognizes fundamental human and civil rights and freedoms, and guarantees equality regardless of sex, race, ethnicity, language, religion, social origin, political convictions, or individual and social status, according to the principles and standards of international law. All states have also signed and ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) without reservation, and have made other international commitments in terms of the protection and promotion of gender equality.

As the Soviet regime suppressed freedom of conscience and other human rights related to spiritual faith, expectations arose at the beginning of the 1990s that the newly independent countries, in search of national identity, would turn to Islam as the principal religion in the region. Over the last decade the situation has remained complicated, but the legal and constitutional frameworks of these countries, especially with respect to gender equality, have remained secular.

While most Soviet social, economic, and political rights continue to be upheld, they have not been implemented, as throughout the region governments have failed to mobilize resources for adequate social spending. Another problem is that policies aimed at equality of sexes repeat mistakes once made under the Soviet governments: clear definition of discrimination based on gender is absent from the legal domain, as well as mechanisms to implement equal rights. The de facto situation reveals serious gaps in terms of implementation of the constitutional provisions. Moreover, such provisions do little to counteract common mindsets in terms of traditional gender roles that form the root of many gender-related inequalities and problems in the region.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Alimova, Women's issues in Central Asia. A history of studies and current problems, Tashkent 1991.
- S. Akiner, Between tradition and modernity. The dilemma facing contemporary Central Asian women, in M. Buckley (ed.), Post-Soviet women. From the Baltic to Central Asia, Cambridge 1997, 261–304.
- V. Asatryan and A. Harutyunian (eds.), Women status report. Impact of transition (available in English and Armenian), Erevan 1999.
- Gender Development Association, Georgia, Status of Women in Georgia (available in English and Georgian), Tbilisi 1999.
- Islam and women of the Orient. History and present day [in Russian], collection of articles, Academy of Science of Uzbekistan, Tashkent 1990.
- M. B. Olcott, Women and society in Central Asia, in W. Fierman (ed.), Soviet Central Asia. The failed transformation, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 235–56.
- S. Saidbaev, Islam and society. Results of historic and sociological study [in Russian], Moscow 1984².
- S. Tadjbakhsh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163–87.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, Lahore 1995.
- UNDP (R. Ibrahimbekova coordinator), The report on the status of women of Azerbaijan Republic (available in English and Azeri), Baku 1999.

DONO ABDURAZAKOVA

Indonesia

A constitution can be defined as “a set of fundamental laws, customs and conventions which provide the framework within which government is exercised in a state” (Ebert 1981, 4). Its basic contents are: the framework or structure of government; the power of government; and relations between the governors and the governed, especially rights of the latter.

Women and gender issues within the Indonesian constitutional system can be viewed from several aspects, such as women's participation in the constitution making process and the protection of women's rights in the constitution and in implementing legislations.

THE CONSTITUTION MAKING PROCESS

The importance of women's involvement in a constitution making process can be explained by the argument that “the effectiveness of a constitution requires acceptance by the community and ownership of its provision,” and to achieve this purpose, particular attention should be paid, among other things, to the process by which a constitution is made (Saunders 2002, 2). The process should undoubtedly involve all constituents within the community, including women. Sadly, looking at the experience of various countries, women are usually underrepresented in the process (ibid.). Yet women play important supporting roles in practice, as academics, researchers, or organizers.

Indonesia is no exception. Looking back to Indonesian constitutional history, there were only 2 women out of 69 members of the Badan Penyelidik Usaha-usaha Persiapan Kemerdekaan Indonesia (BPUPKI, Committee for examination of Indonesian independence), which was in charge of drafting the 1945 constitution. They were Mrs. R. Siti Soekaptinah Soenarjo Mangoenpuspito and Maria Ulfah Santoso, who later became the Indonesia's first woman minister (State Secretariat 1998).

The 1945 constitution was amended four times between 1999 and 2002 and women again played a minimal role in the formal drafting of amendments as they constitute only 9.2 percent of the total members of the Majelis Permusyawaratan Rakyat (MPR, People's consultative assembly), which is in charge of amending the constitution (Ani Soetjipto 2002, 15). However, outside the assembly, women activists and women's organizations, for example, the Koalisi Perempuan Indonesia untuk Keadilan dan Demokrasi (KPI, Indonesian women's coalition for justice and democracy) and the Jaringan Perempuan dan Politik (JPP, Network of women and politics), have made significant contributions by conducting seminars, preparing the drafts of amendments that deal specifically with women and gender matters, and conducting lobbies. The movements resulted in, among other things, the adoption of new provisions relating to the protection of women's rights in the amended 1945 constitution.

PROTECTION OF WOMEN'S RIGHTS IN THE 1945 CONSTITUTION AND ITS AMENDMENTS

Article 27, paragraph (1) of the 1945 constitution states that “all citizens have equal status before the law and in government, and shall abide by the law and the government without any exception.” Although the words “men” and “women” are not used it is commonly accepted that the constitution upholds the principle of equality for men and women. However, the KPI argues that the article only recognizes the principle of equality before the law, rather than equality of men and women (KPI 2000, 15). Therefore, the KPI suggests the inclusion of the principle of anti-discrimination on the grounds of race, ethnic origin, sex, age, religion, or political ideology (ibid., 15). Implementation of the equality principle should be accompanied by affirmative action (ibid., 16).

In 2000, in response to the public demand for extending the recognition of human rights provisions, the People's Assembly made the Second Amendment to the 1945 constitution. Some important provisions relevant to women's rights are stipulated in Articles 28H paragraph (2) and 28I paragraph (2). The former states that “each person has the right to assistance and special treatment in order to gain the same opportunities and benefits in the attainment of equality and justice” while the latter states that “each person has the right to be free from discriminatory treatment on any grounds and has the right to obtain protection from such discriminatory treatment.” It can be concluded that the amended 1945 constitution provides the principles of equality and paves the way for using affirmative action policy in any field to enhance women's rights.

LEGISLATION RELEVANT TO WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND GENDER

Prior to the Second Amendment of the 1945 constitution by the People's Assembly, the Dewan Perwakilan Rakyat (DPR, House of representatives) and the president enacted a new law on human rights, Law Number 39 of 1999, in Part 9 of which women's rights are explicitly provided for. Part 9 directs that the political and electoral system as well as the appointment mechanism in the executive and judiciary arms of government should guarantee women's representation. It also guarantees the right to determine citizenship, the right to obtain special protection in the workplace concerning any matter that might affect a woman's reproductive function, the right to legal action based on her own conduct, and so forth.

It is recognized that some obstacles to women's participation in parliament still exist in Indonesia. These include “political obstacles, socio-economic obstacles and ideological and psychological hindrances” (Shvedova 1998). One possible way out is to introduce a quota system. Unfortunately, the amended 1945 constitution does not contain any single article that deals with a quota for women in the national parliament. Rather, it is covered by Law Number 12 of 2003 on General Election. Article 65 of this law states that “each participating political party may nominate candidates for the DPR, Provincial DPRD, and Regency/Municipal DPRD, for each electoral district, giving consideration to representation of women of at least 30 percent.”

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Ebert, Women and constitutional renewal, in A. Doerr and M. Carrier (eds.), Women and the constitution in Canada, Ottawa 1981, 3–27.
- Indonesia, 1945 Constitution, translation, <http://www.gtzsfdm.or.id/documents/laws_n_regs/con_decree/Const_Law_1945.pdf>.
- Indonesia, State Secretariat, Notes from the session of the Committee for Examination of Indonesian Independence and the Committee for Preparation of Indonesian Independence 28 May 1945–22 August 1945 [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1998.
- KPI (Koalisi Perempuan Indonesia untuk Keadilan dan Demokrasi), Women, human rights and the constitution [in Indonesian], Jakarta 2000, 1–33.
- C. Saunders, Women and constitution making, paper presented at the international conference on Women, Peace Building and Constitution Making, Colombo 2002, 1–23.
- N. Shvedova, Obstacles to women’s participation in parliament, in A. Karam (ed.), Women in parliament. Beyond numbers, Stockholm 1998, 19–41.
- A. Soetjipto, Increasing women’s political participation through constitutional and electoral reforms, in International IDEA, Strengthening women’s political participation in Indonesia, Jakarta 2003, 7–18.

SUSĪ DWĪ HARĪJANTĪ

The Islamic Republic of Iran and Afghanistan

IRAN

The constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran emerged from the Islamization of the revolution of 1979, in which Iranian women of various social strata took part, as did Iranian men. At that time there was already a constitution formally in force, which had come out of the revolution of 1906–7 (Raḥīmī 1978), and which was much less bound to Islamic provisions. The new constitution acquired its legitimacy in a referendum that took place in 1980, where the majority of women, like the majority of men, voted for it. It outlines an Islamic state, in which “all penal, financial, economic, administrative, cultural, military, political, and other laws and regulations must be based on Islamic criteria” (Art. 4). In actual legislations these criteria are determined by the Guardian Council, consisting of twelve jurists, of whom six are to be clergymen (fuqahā). The council has, among other powers, the right to ensure that no legislative proposal, approved by the parliament, runs counter to the principles of the Shī‘ī Sharī‘a. Binding legislations to Sharī‘a is an obligation that, to begin with, discriminate against women in their private and social life.

The position of women as described in the constitution of the Islamic Republic may be summarized as follows:

1. The “decisive role of women,” as part of the faithful, in the revolution is recognized by acknowledging that they were “actively and massively present in a most conspicuous manner at all [its] stages” (the Preamble).

2. It is declared as “natural” that women, because of the “greater oppression” they suffered under the old regime, “should benefit from a particularly large augmentation of their rights.” The oppression this statement refers to lies in “women being regarded as an object or instrument in the service of promoting consumerism and exploitation” (the Preamble).

3. Art. 3, note 14, obliges the state to secure “the multifarious rights of all citizens, both women and men.” But Art. 20 makes it clear that the relevant steps have to be taken “in conformity with Islamic criteria.” This stipulation is repeated in Art. 21, where the state is bound to “ensure the right of women” in all “material and intellectual” respects and to “create an environment favorable for the growth of women’s personality.” The concrete measures that are to be implemented according to this article are for the purpose of “protecting mothers, particularly during pregnancy and child-rearing,” “establishing competent courts to protect and preserve the family,” “providing special insurance for widows, aged women, and women without support,” and “awarding of guardianship of children to worthy women, in order to protect the interest of the children, in the absence of a legal guardian.” The last clause means that a mother gets the right of guardianship of her children only when the father and his male ancestors are not alive.

The constitution of the Islamic Republic is not explicit about women’s suffrage, which most prominent Islamic fuqahā opposed before the 1979 revolution. The reason why election laws have conceded women this right after the revolution should be seen in light of the increase in women’s social and political power during and after the revolution, a fact that cannot be ignored any more.

AFGHANISTAN

The turbulent twentieth-century history of Afghanistan has resulted in at least five constitutions since 1923. However, all of them declare Islam as the state religion and stipulate in different formulations that in Afghanistan no law shall run counter to “the principles of Islamic faith.” Only the constitutions of 1977, 1987, and 1990 state explicitly that “women in the Republic of Afghanistan have equal rights with men.” The constitution of 1964 formulates this provision as “equal rights” for the people of Afghanistan “without discrimination.” During the rule of the Taliban (1996–2001) the constitutional basis of the state was the Sharī’a. The departure of the Taliban paved the way for a conference held in Petersberg (Germany) between 27 November and 5 December 2001 in which representatives of the most influential political groups of Afghanistan took part. The conference decided, among other things, that a committee would draft a constitution that would be considered for approval in a constitutional Assembly to be held in 2003. Until then the constitution of 1964, without its monarchic components, was to be the legal basis of the administration governing Afghanistan.

The constitution of 1964 stipulates, apart from binding legislation to the “provisions of the Ḥanafī doctrine of Islam” (Art. 2 and 64), that in the fields in which there are no laws the provisions of Ḥanafī jurisprudence of the Sharī’a “shall be considered as law” (Art. 69). In addition to further stipulations reflecting its patriarchal foundation, this constitution implicitly favors a movement initiated by King ‘Abd al-Raḥmān in 1883, aiming at reforming the legal and social conditions of women. The movement, although frequently interrupted by the opposition of the Islamic clergy and by other traditionalist opponents of the reform, did achieve some of its goals. The extension of suffrage to women and the nomination of women as ministers are some of the measures that were taken before monarchy was replaced by a republican state in 1973. Urged on by the radical and/or communist administrators of the new republic, the situation of women improved more rapidly. Offering posts of minister to women, admitting them to universities, and protecting those who were willing to unveil were some of the steps taken by the government, along with the agitation that accompanied them. These reforms took place when the opposition to them was not much weaker than in earlier times. The increased influence of Islamicists caused by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 and by the leading role that they played in resisting this invasion impeded the development of the position of women inside the country. Reaching its culmination under the Taliban rule, the setback ended after the Taliban were defeated by international forces. The situation of women has been improving since 2001: about 200 women took part in the emergency assembly in June 2002 and women were given two ministerial posts in the new government. It remains to be seen whether the new constitution for Afghanistan will be more favorable to women than the constitution of 1964.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Afghanistan Online, <<http://www.afghan-web.com/history/>> (for the Afghanistan constitutions).
 F. Azari, Women of Iran. The conflict with fundamentalist Islam, London 1983.
 C. Benard and E. Schlaffer, Veiled courage. Inside the Afghan women's resistance, New York 2002.
 ICL – Iran – Constitution, <http://www.oefre.unibe.ch/law/icl/i0000_.html>.
 Feminist Majority Foundation, <<http://www.feminist.org/afghan/intro.asp>>.
 J.-H. Grevemyer, Afghanistan. Sozialer Wandel und Staat im 20. Jahrhundert, Berlin 1987.
 C. Nölle-Karimi, C. Schetter, and R. Schlaginweit (eds.), Afghanistan. A Country without a state?, Frankfurt am Main 2002.
 P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
 M. Raḥīmī, Qānūn-i asāsī-i Irān va ūsūl-i dimūkrāsī, Tehran 1978.
 A. Schirazi, The constitution of Iran. Politics and the state in the Islamic Republic, London 1997.
 A. Tabari and N. Yeganeh (eds.), In the shadow of Islam. The women's movement in Iran, London 1982.

ASGHAR SCHIRAZI

South Asia

The place of women and the working of gender in the constitutions of modern South Asian states, including India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, to varying degrees reflect the cultures of their sizeable Islamic populations and have sparked considerable political contestation.

PAKISTAN

Although the successive constitutions of Pakistan have included some progressive policies for women, and Pakistani women have drawn on Islam to demand rights, a history of discriminatory, purportedly Islamic ordinances, reversions to authoritarian rule, and persistent judicial failures to protect fundamental rights have hurt the position of women. In the early years after the formation of Pakistan in 1947, women were able to invoke Islamic law to demand rights to inherit property. In the wake of additional pressure from women's organizations, including the Women's Voluntary Service (WVS), later the All Pakistan Women's Association (APWA), the 1956 constitution included equality of status, some economic rights, and reserved legislative seats for women. After a reversion to military rule, the 1961 Family Laws

Ordinance provided some safeguards for women in the area of divorce law, but the 1962 constitution removed rights to directly vote women into reserved seats. The 1973 constitution under elected leader Zulfikar Ali Bhutto included equality before the law, non-discrimination on the basis of sex in government service, and reserved legislative seats for women at the local and national levels (Ali 2000).

After ousting Bhutto, military ruler Zia ul-Haq appealed to religious parties and patriarchal interpretations of Islam to consolidate his power. Women were central to General Zia's "Islamization" program, including the Hudood Ordinances passed in 1979, which made women pursuing rape cases vulnerable to charges of adultery. The opposition of women's organizations such as the Women's Action Forum (WAF) was able to restrict to the realm of finance another law reducing the value of women's testimony to half that of men's (Weiss 1994, 418).

Since his death in 1988, General Zia's "Islamic" amendments to the 1973 constitution have persisted, although various governments have appointed female judges, put in place women's quotas for government employment, and in 1996 agreed to become party to the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). Even the first female prime minister of a Muslim state, Benazir Bhutto, daughter of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and initially opposed to the Hudood Ordinances, found it politically untenable to repeal them once in office. The eighth amendment, passed under Zia, contributed to her difficulty by necessitating a two-thirds vote in the National Assembly to repeal the laws that had been passed by Zia's government. Returning Pakistan to military rule in 1999, Pervez Musharraf has criticized reactionary Islamists yet also further undermined judicial independence (Cotran and Yamani 2000, 162-3). The imperative to focus on legal rights has meant that the women's movement in Pakistan has had limited ability to focus on broader social and economic development issues (Ali 2000).

BANGLADESH

After the creation of Bangladesh (formerly East Pakistan) in 1971, a secular constitution was put in place in 1972. Interrupted by extended periods of military rule, democracy re-emerged with the 1991 elections. Despite efforts to achieve gender equality in the constitution and the dominance of two female leaders in contemporary Bangladesh, Begum Khaleda Zia, leader of the Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) and Sheikh Hasina, leader of the Awami League (AL), the political influence of most women in Bangladesh remains low.

The constitution reserved 15 seats for women in the parliament, a number raised to 30 (nearly 10 percent of total seats) in 1979. After a lapse of three years starting in 1987, a 1990 constitutional amendment reinstated the 30 reserved seats. Women have successfully contested non-reserved seats as well. Politicians who have benefited from these reservations have mixed feelings about the ability of such policies to empower women (Commonwealth Secretariat 1999, 27-37).

The constitution guarantees women's equality in public life but not in the personal sphere, which is governed by the personal laws of religious communities. Muslim personal laws in Bangladesh, applicable in cases of marriage, divorce, inheritance, and child custody, discriminate against women, despite reforms in 1961. Men's rights to polygamy, easier divorce, larger inheritance of property, and authority over children after divorce are examples of inequities in personal laws (Khan 2001, Akhtar 2001).

Special ordinances against gender-based violence originated in 1983 and were expanded to include children in the 1990s. The government of Bangladesh is also a signatory of CEDAW, yet enforcement of these domestic, constitutional, and international initiatives remains limited by corruption and weak enforcement mechanisms. As in the rest of South Asia, many women, particularly poor women, are not aware of their rights (Asian Development Bank 2001, 6).

INDIA

Unlike Pakistan and Bangladesh, India is not a Muslim-majority state, but its 12 percent Muslim population makes it one of the largest Muslim countries in the world. India's constitution, in place from 1950 to the present, declares it a secular republic, committed to equality. Personal laws varying by religious community (applicable in cases involving marriage, divorce, maintenance, guardianship, adoption, inheritance, and succession) are one mechanism to achieve religious minority rights, yet they have raised questions about both secularism and equity, particularly with regard to women's rights (Larson 2001).

Debates over whether India should have a uniform civil code came to the forefront of Indian politics with the Supreme Court case of Shah Bano, a divorced Muslim woman demanding maintenance. The Supreme Court circumvented Muslim personal law to grant Shah Bano ongoing maintenance in 1985, causing controversy that continued with the subsequent Muslim Women's Bill, an effort to shore up personal law. Many women's organizations, such as the Joint Women's Programme, a national association with members of various religious backgrounds, opposed the Muslim Women's Bill. Muslim women were divided on the issue (Engineer 1987, 237–42). The increasing political power of Hindu nationalists and their support for a uniform civil code continues to alarm many Muslim politicians. Many analysts feel that political considerations rather than equity concerns have steered much policy regarding minority women (Hasan 1999, 123).

The actual impact of constitutional and legal provisions for women on their status was scrutinized most thoroughly by the Committee on the Status of Women in India in their 1975 report, which documented continuing gender imbalances in terms of sex ratios, work participation, literacy, and election to political office (India 1975). The women's movement in India continues to press for change in all of these areas, yet faces internal divisions along caste, class, regional, and religious lines.

Amendments to the constitution in 1992 reserved one third of seats for women in the panchayat system of local councils. Legislative attempts to amend the constitution and reserve one third of seats for women in the parliament have failed, in part because of controversial demands for sub-reservations for Muslim and lower caste women (Jenkins 2003). In addition to such challenges to women's unity, feminist legal scholars have drawn attention to the way legal discourses, despite formal legal equality, continue to reinforce ideologies of female duty and dependence (Niranjana 2000, 273).

In South Asian polities, group-based policies, particularly religious personal laws, have resulted in gender inequities even when constitutions purport to assure gender equality. Likewise, many initiatives to advance women in South Asian countries, such as reserved legislative seats, are group-based, "women's" rather than universal policies. Rights activists have often struggled with balancing their interests as women and as Muslims in political and constitutional contexts that rarely reflect the nuances of overlapping identities and interests.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. S. Ali, Law, Islam and the women's movement in Pakistan, in S. M. Rai (ed.), International perspectives on gender and democratization, New York 2000, 41–63.
- S. Akhtar, The status of widows in Bangladesh, in P. Grimshaw, K. Holmes, and M. Lake (eds.), Women's

- rights and human rights. International historical perspectives*, Basingstoke, Hampshire 2001, 220–28.
- Asian Development Bank, Women in Bangladesh, Manila 2001.
- Commonwealth Secretariat, Women in politics. Voices from the Commonwealth, London 1999.
- E. Cotran and M. Yamani, The rule of law in the Middle East and the Islamic world, London 2000.
- A. A. Engineer (ed.), The Shah Bano controversy, Hyderabad 1987.
- J. L. Esposito with N. J. DeLong-Bas, Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2001².
- Z. Hasan, Muslim women and the debate on legal reforms, in B. Ray and A. Basu (eds.), From independence towards freedom. Indian women since 1947, Oxford 1999.
- India. Committee on the Status of Women in India, Towards equality. Report of the committee on the status of women in India, New Delhi 1975.
- L. D. Jenkins, Women's reservations and representation, in L. D. Jenkins, Identity and identification in India. Defining the disadvantaged, London 2003, 156–74.
- R. Kapur and B. Cossman, Subversive sites. Feminist engagements with law in India, New Delhi 1996.
- S. Khan, Good governance and judiciary. Equal rights of women, in H. A. Hye (ed.), Governance. South Asian perspectives, Karachi 2001, 137–44.
- G. Larson (ed.), Religion and personal law in contemporary India. A call to judgment, Bloomington, Ind. 2001.
- S. Niranjana, On the women's movement in India, in P. R. de Souza (ed.), Contemporary India. Transitions, New Delhi 2000, 264–81.
- B. N. Ramusack and S. Sievers, Women in Asia. Restoring women to history, Bloomington, Ind. 1999.
- A. M. Weiss, The consequences of state policies for women in Pakistan, in M. Weiner and A. Banuazizi (eds.), The politics of social transformation in Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 412–44.

LAURA DUDLEY JENKINS

Sub-Saharan Africa

The many countries that make up Sub-Saharan Africa lodge numerous ethnic groups within their borders. Most of these groups still hold to their customary laws, and are Muslims, Christians, or followers of African traditional religions. Gender refers to ways in which masculinity and femininity are constructed, lived, reconstructed, and negotiated by people living in the context of different communities (van Santen and Willems forthcoming). There may be apparent conflicts between the constitutional guarantees of gender equality and the traditional status of women in many cultures in Africa, including the various Muslim communities, for example, over forced or child marriages (Ibhawoh 1999, 11). Cultural traditions may contain norms, institutions, and constitutional provisions that support gender equality – fairness of treatment by gender – as well as norms and institutions that are antithetical in relation to globally accepted relations of equality. Concerning gender, most Muslim societies use a mixture of Islamic contexts and interpretation of Islamic texts (Qurʾān and hadīth), pre-Islamic culture, tradition, custom, and the interests of those who hold the reigns of power (Shamina 1997, Creevey 1996).

Islamic communities in Sub-Saharan Africa have had to deal with non-Muslim members within their own cultural regions, which has sometimes caused them to draw boundaries and define interactions between “us” and “them.” This may lead to confrontations, but can also bring about constructive cooperation and mutual interdependence between communities with national or state policies that are reflected in the political structures and constitutions. Even in regions where Muslims are a majority there are often groups, sometimes of a fundamentalist nature, who consider themselves to be good believers and consider other Muslims to have an inadequate understanding of Islamic faith and principles, and who therefore try to convert or reconvert their population. Such is the case, for example, in Sudan, where the regime has taken on increasingly Islamic course, although its constitution acknowledges the right to equality (art. 21) and freedom of religion (art. 24). As sources of the Sudanese constitution include Islamic law, referendums, the constitution itself, and custom, the personal status of women is subject to the relevant provisions of the Qurʾān (Bantekas and Abu-Sabeib 2000, 540). In North Cameroon Islamic purifying movements are also active, but they place strong emphasis on education for women and a larger role for them in the public and political space, which the national constitution provides for but which traditional pre-Islamic society often denies.

In some African countries national constitutions disfavor equal gender relations and need to be brought into accord with Islamic law and constitution to favor women’s position; in other countries the contrary is the case. In Nigeria, famous for the Shari’a court death sentence by stoning prescribed for women accused of adultery, the 1999 constitution, Section 6/1 vests judicial power in the federation of diverse lower courts. However, final appeal can be made in the Nigerian states’ Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court (Essien 2000).

Some governments deal with the differences between their Islamic and non-Islamic populations explicitly; for example, in Mauritania the constitution adopts Islam as a state religion but application of Islamic laws depends on the conditions given by state laws (Monteillet 2002). Other nation-states do not mention the discrepancies of Islamic law in relation to the state. In Uganda, for example, a new constitution was enacted in 1995 in which most of the critical provisions concerning both Muslim and non-Muslim women were accepted. These provisions were enacted after an enormous struggle on the part of women’s groups to have a female representative from each of the 39 districts on the Constitutional Commission (Matembe 2002, 196–7). In South Africa an entire chapter of the new constitution of 1996 was dedicated to institutions supporting constitutional democracy, such as the Human Rights and Gender Equality Commission (Ebrahim 1998).

The constitutions of certain countries, such as Senegal and Mali, are based on former colonial constitutions, rendering them secular republics with a governmental structure adapted from the French colonizers and modified to suit national needs (Creevey 1996, Clark 1999). In other countries new constitutions were adopted after a process of democratization and the preceding national conferences. Chad, for example, a country with a large Islamic population which has long been divided by internal wars, adopted a new constitution in 1996 (Lanne 1996) that mentions equality of the sexes in article 6.

In Sub-Saharan Africa constitutional provisions against gender discrimination are reinforced by the obligation assumed by different states as signatories to the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and the African Charter on Human and People’s Rights. Article 18(3) of CEDAW explicitly states: “The state shall ensure the elimination of every discrimination against women and ensure the protection of the rights of women and the child as stipulated in the Universal Declarations conventions” (Mugwanya 2000, 761, Ibhawoh 1996, 46). However, as Mugwanya argues for Uganda, many states urgently need to reform their legal systems, as well as those practices and customs in both public and private spheres that are antithetical to the rights and dignity of women. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is an example. CEDAW and the United Nations’ Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action on Women’s Rights recognized FGM as a form of violence against women. Its practice is unambiguously forbidden in some state constitutions, such as Burkina Faso, where practitioners have been prosecuted in connection with the death of young girls (Ibhawoh 1999, 70). In other countries, however, such as Sudan, attempts to enforce legislation against FGM have caused popular outcries and have been abandoned. In 1990 the government of Kenya announced that it had officially banned FGM, but no law was passed in parliament to prohibit it. The Nigerian constitution is in conflict with the 1990 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, article 24(3), but little has been done to prevent the practice.

Gender issues in the context of national constitutions arise in connection with questions of inheritance, marriage, and the dissolution of marriage. Most Muslim countries in Sub-Saharan Africa follow Muslim laws on these matters. In Nigeria, Niger, Mali, Cameroon, Senegal, and the Gambia women are married and allowed divorce according to Islamic laws, though those laws are interpreted differently in various Muslim communities. Female children may inherit the half share allotted them by Islamic law, and this does leave Muslim women with the possibility of inheriting land (Meager 2000), while women of most non-Muslim ethnic groups have just the usufruct, even though the constitutions of most African countries entitle them to rights to land and other property. In countries such as Mali and Senegal, where historically Islam served as a basis for social organization and a vehicle for mediation and negotiation between a weak state and a predominantly Muslim society, the leadership of brotherhoods such as the Tijāniyya and the Murides continue to wield enormous power (Clark 1999). In such circumstances, Islamic beliefs and the accompanying cultural baggage may negatively influence women when Muslim leaders are conservative and constitutional declarations do not work efficiently because of the interdependence of the government and the Muslim leaders who restrict the authority of each of them over society (Creevey 1996, 302).

Finally, a clause dealing with a legal construction of homosexual and sexual orientation was included in the 1993 interim constitution of South Africa (De Vos, 1996), but is either absent or negatively interpreted in the legal discourse of most African states.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. N. Abdullahi, Article 39 of the Ethiopian constitution on secession and self determination. A panacea to the nationality question in Africa?, in Verfassung und Recht in Übersee 31:4 (1998), 440–55.
- A. A. An-Na'im, Towards an Islamic hermeneutics for human rights, in A. A. An-Na'im et al. (eds.), Human rights and religious values. An uneasy relationship?, Amsterdam 1995, chapter 16.
- I. Bantekas and H. Abu-Sabeib, Reconciliation of Islamic law with constitutionalism. The protection of human rights in Sudan's new constitution, in African Journal of International and Comparative Law 12 (2000), 530–53.

- A. F. Clark, Imperialism, independence and Islam in Senegal and Mali, in Africa Today 46:3/4 (1999), 149–67.
- L. Creevey, Islam, women and the role of the state in Senegal, in Journal of Religion in Africa 26:3 (1996), 268–307.
- P. Devos, Pious wishes or directly enforceable human rights? Social and economic rights in South Africa's 1996 constitution, in South African Journal on Human Rights 13:1 (1997), 67–101.
- H. Ebrahim, The soul of a nation. Constitution making in South Africa, Oxford 1998.
- E. Essien, Conflicting rationes decidendi. The dilemma of the lower courts in Nigeria, in African Journal of International and Comparative Law 12 (2000), 23–30.
- B. Ibhawoh, Between culture and constitution. The cultural legitimacy of human rights in Nigeria, Copenhagen 1999.
- B. Lanne, Tchad. La constitution du 14 Avril 1996. Présentation, in Afrique contemporaine 182 (1997), 63–88.
- M. Matemde and N. R. Dorsey, Gender, politics and constitution making in Uganda, Kampala 2002.
- K. Meagher, Veiled conflicts. Peasant differentiation, gender and structural adjustment in Nigerian Hausaland, in D. Bryceson et al. (eds.), Disappearing peasantries?, London 2000, 81–99.
- S. Monteillet, L'islam, le droit et l'état dans la constitution mauritienne, in L'Afrique politique (2002), 69–100.
- G. W. Mugwanya, Augmenting the struggle for gender equality in Uganda. A case for the domestication of international human rights standards, in African Journal of International and Comparative Law 12 (2000), 754–98.
- E. I. Nwogugu, Family law in Nigeria, Ibadan 1990.
- H. Rushwan, Female circumcision, in World Health (September 1995), 16–17.
- J. C. M. van Santen, "In between-sons." Mafa system of land, property and sustainable "land-use" in and outside the Mandara mountains, in M. Ali et al. (eds.), Management of fragile ecosystems in the North of Cameroon, Leiden 2001, 221–33.
- , "They will be pulled into hell with a rope around their balls." Femininity, masculinity and the Islamic fundamentalist wave, the case of North-Cameroon, in A. Breedveld and J. C. M. van Santen, The dynamics of Islam and identity in Africa, Brill (forthcoming).
- J. C. M. van Santen and K. Willemse, Islam at the frontier. Dynamics of Muslim identities in relation to the changing role of the state in post-colonial Africa, NOW Research Proposal 2003.
- , The issue of "Islamic fundamentalisms." Masculinities and femininities, in A. Breedveld and J. C. M. van Santen, The dynamics of Islam and identity in Africa, Brill (forthcoming).
- Shamima, paper presented at the MYM Islamic Tarbiyyah Programme 1997, 19–23 December, As-Salaam, KwaZulu-Natal 1997.
- K. Willemse, The burden of boundaries. Islamist discourse and constructions of gender in Darfur, West-Sudan, in A. Breedveld and J. C. M. van Santen, The dynamics of Islam and identity in Africa, Brill (forthcoming), notes 4–5.

Democracy Ideologies

Arab States

Democracy is representation for the people by the people. A true democracy must include women who are representative of half of the population. Arab states that do not allow women to participate politically either implicitly or explicitly demonstrate, in this fact alone, their commitment and desire to democratize. As is evidenced from Table 1, regime type and economic and social status play little role in women's entrance into parliament. Indeed, societal obstacles which hinder women from entering such positions can in many cases be overcome by foreign influence and then, in most instances, by a quota system.

Political culture in the Arab world is shaped by informal groups and kinship relations, even within the formal political systems. Arab political structures include traditional and conservative monarchies, republics, and secular and Islamic regimes. Western democracy ideologies are often juxtaposed against these various structures of Arab political culture. Therefore, much of the political cultural analysis of the Arab world tends to dilute the possibilities of democratic advancement by labeling these states as "democratically challenged." The reasoning for such a consensus stems from religion, cultural beliefs, authoritarian Arab leaders, political economy, or a rejection of foreign influence. Yet, reform processes are taking place in Arab countries, albeit slowly, which aim to establish democratic methods of governing.

Certain religious interpretations adopted by religious groups contribute to the stagnation of the Arab reform process. Some scholars (such as Kedourie) believe that democracy is an alien concept to Islam while some Arab thinkers (Khālid Muḥammad Khālid) believe that the Islamic principle of shūra (consultation council) corresponds to the idea of democracy.

The evidence regarding obstacles to democracy are more clearly understood by examining the issue of women's status according to Shari'a law (Islamic law), which Islamic movements strive to uphold. Islamic law allows men to unilaterally divorce their wives, accepts polygamy, considers a woman's testimony to equal half that of a man, and allows a woman to inherit only half of what a man may inherit. Interpretation of women's inferior status in Islam is further reinforced by the patriarchic structure of the Arab family. An inferior view of women clearly represents a major obstacle to democracy, by not considering a woman a full participant in society.

Full participation is a right of every individual in society. Human rights organizations and women's organizations are at the forefront in creating a more pluralistic society in attempts to break up patterns of control and exclusionary tendencies in the Arab states. The ideologies of the women's movements and democracy share characteristics such as equality, dignity, autonomy, power-sharing, liberation, and human rights. While women's movements and democracy are ideologically united, women's presence in elected positions of formal government in the Middle East and North Africa region has been the lowest (regionally) in the world. Causes of this phenomenon are conventionally related to religious and cultural gender roles, tribal affiliations, or the existence of a patriarchal society.

Conventional wisdom suggests that if women's role in the social and economic sectors of the public sphere were to improve then women would more easily make the transition into politics. Table 1 shows that it is the external factor (whether conditionality of foreign aids or resisting foreign hegemony and influence) rather than socioeconomic factors that creates a conducive environment which allows women to enter the political realm. Foreign influence is the strongest variable affecting women's entry into the political realm.

Table 1

State	External Factor	Political Participation Rate	Female Labor Force
Jordan	Conditionality	5.4%	16.0%*
Morocco	Conditionality	10.0%	11.0%
Syria	Resistance	10.4%	25.0%
Lebanon	Minimal	2.0%	30.0%
Kuwait	Minimal	0.0%	33.8%

Source: World Bank GenderStats

* Department of Statistics, Government of Jordan, 2002

Table 1 examines five different states in terms of external factors, political participation rates of women, and percentage of female labor force. By viewing the external factors in relation to women's participation rates in politics a clear parallel is illustrated with foreign influence. The impact of increased foreign aid money granted on a conditional basis and resistance to foreign influence plays a major role in creating a kind of representative democracy. Surprisingly, the strongest female labor force rates (Lebanon and Kuwait) are associated with the lowest rates in political participation and the least involvement with outside forces either through conditional aid or resistance participation.

Women's political participation in the Arab world can be seen to run parallel to a strong foreign influence either in a direct (Jordan and Morocco) or indirect (Syria) way. Interestingly, the direct influence of the United States on both Jordan and Morocco has yielded positive outcomes as both countries have enacted a quota system to overcome the social obstacles that face women entering political positions and to further their democratic reform processes. United States suggestions to Jordan are closely linked with hundreds of millions of dollars in development and military aid. The Moroccan move toward democracy and women's involvement in political positions is similarly based on external forces, namely, foreign aid from the United States, which quadrupled from 1999 to 2000, the fall of the Berlin wall, the collapse of dictatorships, Western calls for democracy and human rights, and the aftershocks of 11 September 2001.

The Jordanian and Moroccan states, which are dependent on foreign aid, have had to implement certain measures to allow women's entry into parliament. Although women have campaigned in both countries success has been marginal due to the patriarchy and religiosity of society. The quota system provided a solution. By issuing royal decrees both Jordan and Morocco pleased the foreign providers of aid and broke through cultural barriers which inhibited women's entry into parliament. The quota system in Jordan ensures women 6 out of 110 seats in parliament to women, the quota in Morocco ensures 30 out of 300. The quota system provokes impassioned support and fervent opposition. A supportive argument maintains that over the years qualified women have been discriminated against solely on gender grounds. The quota system therefore is seen not as a favor to women but as an essential move toward creating a truly representative government. An oppositional argument declares that the quota system blatantly discriminates against men and, further, doubts that women have the capacity to fulfill the required duties in the formal political sphere.

Unlike the situation in Jordan and Morocco, Syrian women's involvement in politics can be traced back to the need to resist the process of Turkification which posed a genuine threat to the Arab sense of identity. This trend continued in 1919 when Syrian women were politically active in demonstrating against the French occupation and when in 1935 they participated in the Arab Women's Conference in Cairo in resistance to the Zionist infiltration. Syrian women received the right to vote in the same year as a result of demonstrating participatory approaches against threatening external forces. Lebanese and Kuwaiti women have had little experience in terms of political participation against external forces and therefore have low to non-existent rates of political participation. Furthermore, the Lebanese and Kuwaiti regimes are rarely candidates for Western pressure.

Arab politics, including women's movements, are shaped by and large as a response to external pressure. The success of democracy in the Arab world is contingent upon a kind of assertive linkage between foreign aid and demands for genuine democratic reform. Given the centrality of the external factor in Arab politics, internal variables such as kinship, tribal and religious groups, and socioeconomic factors should not be seen as a major stumbling block in the path of women's entry into politics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- J. Caivano, Women's participation in the democratic process. The OAS Permanent Council in conjunction with the Unit for the Promotion of Democracy and the Executive Secretariat of the Inter-American Commission of Women, 25 November 2002, Washington, D.C. <http://www.upd.oas.org/lab/information/democratic_forum/11_25_2002_washington_dc_joan_caivano.html>.
- Jordan, Department of Statistics, Jordan in Figures. June 2002, issue 4, Amman, <http://www.dos.gov.jo/dos_home_e/main/index.htm>.
- A. Karam, Strengthening the role of women parliamentarians in the Arab region. Challenges and options, 8 April 2002, United Nations Development Programme-Programme on Governance in the Arab Region, <<http://www.pogar.org/publications/gender/karam2/section3.html>>.
- Inter-Parliamentary Union, Plan of Action, Paris, 26 March 1994.
- Inter-Parliamentary Union, Women in national parliaments. Situation as of 31 May 2003, <<http://www.ipu.org/wmn-e/arc/world310503.htm>>.
- Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, More than victims, Washington, D.C., 12 September 2002, <<http://wwics.si.edu/topics/pubs/womenpeaceprpt.pdf>>.

World Bank, Gender and development in the Middle East and North Africa. Women and the public sphere, November 2003, <http://lnweb18.worldbank.org/mna/mena.nsf/Attachments/GenderReport-overview/\$File/GENDER-REPORToverview.pdf>.

World Bank, GenderStats, <<http://devdata.worldbank.org/genderstats/home.asp>>.

SECONDARY SOURCES

L. Anderson, Democracy in the Arab world, in R. Brynen et al. (eds.), Political liberalization and democratization in the Arab world, i, Theoretical perspectives, Boulder, Colo. 1995, 77–92.

N. Ayubi, Islam and democracy, in D. Potter et al. (eds.), Democratization, Cambridge. 1997, 345–66.

J. Bill and R. Springborg, Politics in the Middle East, New York 2000.

A. Ehteshami, Is the Middle East democratizing?, in British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 26:2 (November 1999), 199–217.

F. Faqir, Engendering democracy and Islam in the Arab world, in Third World Quarterly 18:1 (1997), 165–74.

R. Hussein, Women's parliamentary quota proving to be a double-edged sword, in Jordan Times, 15 January 2003.

—, Female candidates in the capital explain platform, debate issues, in Jordan Times, 12 June 2003.

J. S. Makdisi, The mythology of modernity. Women and democracy in Lebanon, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam, New York 1996, 231–49.

A. Odibat and R. F. Bahou, Gender and democratization in the Arab region, Amman 2004.

A. Phillips, Engendering democracy, Cambridge 1991.

R. Voet, Feminism and citizenship, London 1998.

LINDSEY FAUSS

Asia-Pacific Region

INTRODUCTION

The recent interest in women and democracy is premised on women's increasing access to and control over representative institutions. Political participation is considered the key to the enhancement of the status of women and the institutionalization of democracy. Women activists are no longer happy to see women only vote in elections and sign petitions. For them gender inequality needs to be viewed from a broader context by focusing on women's disadvantaged position in terms of income and work. Political participation for women is only meaningful if women are in a position "to elect a government more responsive to women's poverty, one committed to a better programme of equal pay for equal work, combined with a set of welfare policies that would cater for women's needs" (Phillips 1993, 103). The quest for equality for women in politics has been a continuing concern for both feminists and the United Nations for the last three decades. The United Nations organized five major international conferences on women between 1975 and the present to increase women's participation in politics.

The significance of the role of women in politics in general and in democracy in particular is important for several reasons. Issues involved in the analysis of women in Third World politics are based on three assumptions that differ substantially from the case of men (Waylen 1996, 6). These assumptions are: politics does not have the same impact on women as it does on men; the political process often alters gender relations; and women often participate in political activity as political subjects. These assumptions show that men and women participate quite differently in formal politics in the First as well as the Third World, both in getting issues onto the political agenda and in policy-making and implementation (Ackelsberg 1992). One of the outcomes of this difference is that there is a distinct tendency for women to participate less than men in formal politics in higher echelons of power (Peterson and Runyan 1993).

This entry analyzes the situation of women vis-à-vis democracy in the Asia-Pacific region. In the process attempts are made to show differentiation and interrelationships between the key phrases "women and Islam" and "women and democracy."

WOMEN AND ISLAM

When Islam emerged in Arabia in the seventh century C.E. it was not only a new religion but also a movement of social reform with particular relevance to the status of women (Minces 1980, 15). Islam gave women a legal status, with rights and duties. Social responsibility in Islam is derived from the Qur'an: "And [as for] the believers both men and women – they are friends and protectors of one another: they [all] enjoin the doing of what is right and forbid the doing of what is wrong" (9:71). This verse requires women and men to act for the betterment of society. Political involvement is a means to fulfill obligations to society. The history of Islam contains examples of women performing political roles, for example, voting in elections and holding positions of legislators and judges. But in many Muslim countries women have been denied some of their basic rights. This is contrary to Qur'anic teaching. The Qur'an proclaims that all believers who perform good deeds, whether male or female, "shall enter the garden and they shall not be dealt with unjustly" (19:60). From this and other verses it can be inferred that the Qur'an intends to maintain equality between sexes (Engineer 1994, 51).

WOMEN AND DEMOCRACY

There is now a consensus that for a political system to be called democratic it must have certain characteristics: open political competition, a multi-party system, civil and political rights guaranteed by law, and accountability operating through an electoral relationship between citizens and their representatives (Luckham and White 1996, 2). There has also been continuing tension within democratic theory between popular sovereignty and the power of the elite, between representatives and participatory principles, and between partial interests and common interests (Luckham and White 1996, 3). Criticisms leveled against democracy range from questioning its theoretical foundations to its adverse impact on women in democracies. Liberal democratic theory is considered essentially gendered and it perpetuates patterns of patriarchy and gender subordination both in polity and society (Rai 1996). For feminists, liberal democracy has failed to serve the interests of women (Mendus 1992, Phillips 1993). It has also been stated that women never have been and still are not admitted as full and equal members in any democratic country (Pateman 1989, 210). The feminist critique of democracy is premised on women's subordinate position in economy, polity, and society. Feminists point out that the underrepresentation of women in liberal democratic polities is due to emphasis on the individual as the legitimate actor in democratic politics and the division between public and private spheres (Rai 1996). In the context of the Third World it has been argued that this division inhibits mass participation of women in politics and consequently in the democratic process affecting them (Rai 1994, 209).

The basic objection of feminists is that the objective of democratization has not materialized in democratic systems. Democratization is expected to take place under conditions in which power resources have become so widely distributed that no group is any longer able to suppress its competitors or maintain its hegemony (Vanhanen 1997, 5). Feminists have challenged the relationship between democracy and democratization. They contend that a separation has been made between democracy (a political method) and institutional arrangement from democratization (a social and political process) (Pateman 1996, 7). The resultant dichotomy further weakens position of women vis-à-vis men because women may be enjoying certain rights in democracy while in the wider arena, namely democratization, they may be denied certain other rights that are products of sociopolitical interactions, belief systems, and capacities of individuals in particular societies (Khan 2001, 3).

ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

The Asia-Pacific region consists of diverse countries with different populations and cultural heritages (Chung 1991, 103). The region's population reached 3.4 billion in the early 1990s (UN 1993, 2). The social landscape of this region has a wide spectrum of variations in the circumstances of women in such areas as workforce participation rates, earning opportunities, levels of education, health status, fertility, political representation, and participation in government. Such differences are in part accounted for by the extent, type, and quality of interventions of government on behalf of women in society (Sobhan 1992, 1).

The large number of countries in the region have various kinds of political systems. In South Asia, Bangladesh, India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka there are democracies while Pakistan remains under military rule. In East Asia, Japan has been a stable democracy for half a century and South Korea and Taiwan have carried out significant democratic transitions during the past decade. China, North Korea, and Vietnam are non-democracies. In Southeast Asia, Malaysia, Thailand, Indonesia, Singapore, and the Philippines have in place competitive elections, parliament with opposition representation, reasonably well-established norms of political competition, rule of law, and legalized opposition political parties. Burma remains firmly under the control of a military junta. In the Pacific region, Australia and New Zealand have remained vibrant democratic systems. Papua New Guinea has maintained a democratic system since gaining independence in 1975.

A survey of the region shows that women are far from achieving equal participation in decision-making and leadership positions. By 1995 only 24 women had ever been elected as heads of state or government (Corner 1997, 2). In 1994 women held 5.7 percent of posts of cabinet minister. There has been a wide level of variation in terms of women's parliamentary representation.

Though female leaders such as Indira Gandhi and Sonia Gandhi of India, Khaleda Zia and Sheikh Hasina of Bangladesh, Benazir Bhutto of Pakistan, and Srimavo Bandaranaike and Chandrika Kumartunga of Sri Lanka have dominated the political scene in recent decades, women in South Asia still have the lowest rates of participation in systems of governance. Women occupy only 7 percent of parliamentary seats; only 9 percent of cabinet ministers are women; and only 20 percent of members of local governments are women (HDC 2000, 136).

At the grassroots level women on the whole constitute a much smaller membership of political parties than men. Naturally, this means that the numbers elected to representative bodies are also low (see Table 1). While women generally remain underrepresented in formal politics, this does not imply that policies formulated and implemented within the political process do not have a critical impact on the lives of different groups of women. Therefore, while examining policy-making and its outcomes, the gendered nature of the state comes under significant scrutiny. Usually large numbers of women work in the public sector but only a few occupy top positions. This scenario is seen in all types of political systems.

Data indicate that in the year 2000 the highest proportion of female public sector administrative and managerial personnel is found in New Zealand (44 percent), followed by Fiji Islands (20.7 percent), and Australia (19.5 percent) (see Table 2).

In Southeast Asia, Corazon Aquino of the Philippines was elected to the presidency after the fall of the Marcos regime. Megawati Sukarnoputri of Indonesia is now the president of her country. Female representation in top elected political bodies in Southeast Asia still remains rather low. Women's representation in ministerial and sub-ministerial positions in some of the Southeast Asian countries in 1996 was: Thailand 3.8 and 4.5 percent, Singapore 0 and 7.1 percent, Malaysia 7.7 and 4.7 percent, the Philippines 8.3 and 26.3 percent, and Indonesia 3.6 and 1.4 percent (UNDP 1996).

The situation of women in terms of political representation is not much different in East Asian countries. In Japan the percentage of women in the lower and upper houses are 2.3 and 14.7 percent respectively (Yoko et al. 1994, 396). In South Korea 2 percent of legislators are women (Sohn 1994, 436). In China women hold 11.1 and 21.1 percent posts at ministerial and sub-ministerial levels (UNDP 1996).

These data point to a rather disappointing state of affairs. The "virtual exclusion and marginalization of women from formal politics" (Chowdhury and Nelson 1994, 15) cannot be explained by referring only to women's socially shaped choices and social norms. Rather, predominance of a male ethos of formal politics and culture and formal political institutions, including political parties, contributes to the situation. It has been argued that future enhancement of women's political engagement needs to be viewed from a much broader perspective taking into cognizance gender construction of the family, civil society, the economy, and official institutions (Chowdhury and Nelson 1994, 21).

For many years political participation of women has been used as an indicator of development of a country and of the status of women in that particular country. Women's participation has been measured against certain critical variables including their right to vote; their role in political associations; their participation in various elections; their success rate in elections; and their role in top policy-making bodies. Data on these variables are important, but to be useful they need to be evaluated in terms of social and historical context of each individual country (Manderson 1980, 10).

A comparatively high proportion of women active in the political arena may be due to the class structure of a particular society that allows women belonging to the upper strata to participate in much larger numbers compared to lower-class women and men.

The rise of all female prime ministers and presidents in politics in South Asia and Southeast Asia is due to primarily due to the kinship factor. They all inherited and benefited from political positions of their late fathers and husbands.

Female leaders, activists, and academics in Muslim majority countries such as Bangladesh, Indonesia, Malaysia, and Pakistan do not feel that Islam is antithetical to democracy ideologies or that it hinders women's active participation in formal politics. They believe that the spread of education and opening of economic opportunities for women will facilitate the challenge to those conservative religious interpretations that specifically discriminate against women's participation in public life. They believe that Islam upholds the principles of justice, dignity, and equality (Anwar 2000, 4). These principles are in clear conformity with democracy ideologies.

CONCLUSION

The present state of women's participation in democratic systems is unacceptable and needs to be changed. It is strange that the talent, experience, and wisdom of the vast majority of women in the Asia-Pacific region remain untapped. In order to institutionalize democracies and enhance women's participation in politics a number of things must happen. First, commitment, vision, and foresight of political leadership are important. Second, appropriate institutions need to be established and nurtured. Third, structural and legal impediments to the advancement of women need to be removed. Fourth, governments in Muslim majority countries should be able and willing to keep conservative political leaders under check. Finally, a strong and vibrant civil society should be able to operate without undue governmental restrictions.

Table 1: GENDER EMPOWERMENT MEASURE (GEM)

Region/ Country	GEM Rank	Seats in parliament held by women (as % of total)	Female legislators, senior officials and managers (as % of total)	Female professionals and technical workers (as of % of total)	Ratio of estimated female : male earned income
East Asia
China	n.a.	21.8	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Japan	32	10.0	9*	45	0.44
Hong Kong, China	n.a.	n.a.	25	38	n.a.
Korea, Republic of	61	5.9	5	34	0.45
South Asia
Afghanistan	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Bangladesh	66	2.0	5*	35 d	0.57
Bhutan	n.a.	9.3	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
India	n.a.	8.9	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Nepal	n.a.	7.9	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Pakistan	n.a.	-j	9*	26*	n.a.
Sri Lanka	64	4.4	4	49	0.48
Southeast Asia
Indonesia	n.a.	8.0	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Malaysia	43	14.5	20*	45*	0.46
Myanmar	n.a.	-I	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Philippines	35	17.2	35*	66*	0.59
Singapore	23	11.8	23	42	0.50
Pacific
Australia	10	26.5	26	48	0.69
Fiji Islands	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Maldives	62	6.0	15	40	0.60
New Zealand	9	30.8	38	54	0.67
Papua New Guinea	n.a.	1.8	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Samoa	n.a.	6.1	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Solomon Islands	n.a.	0.0	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Vanuatu	n.a.	0.0	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.

* Data are based on the International Standard Classification of Occupations (ISCO-68) as defined in ILO 2001.

 Data are as of 8 March 2002. Where there are lower and upper houses, data refer to the weighted average of women's shares of seats in both houses.

Source: UNDP 2002, 226-9.

Table 2: WOMEN IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR IN THE ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

Region/Country	Women in government at ministerial level (as % of total) 2000
East Asia
China	5.1
Japan	5.7
Hong Kong, China	n.a.
Korea, Rep of	6.5
South Asia
Afghanistan
Bangladesh	9.5
Bhutan	n.a.
India	10.1
Nepal	14.8
Pakistan	n.a.
Sri Lanka	n.a.

Table 2 (cont.)

Region/Country	Women in government at ministerial level (as % of total) 2000
Southeast Asia
Indonesia	5.9
Malaysia	n.a.
Myanmar	n.a.
Philippines	n.a.
Singapore	5.7
Pacific
Australia	19.5
Fiji Islands	20.7
Maldives	n.a.
New Zealand	44.0
Papua New Guinea	0.0
Samoa	7.7
Solomon Islands	n.a.
Vanuatu	n.a.

Source: UNDP 2002, 239–42.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Ackelsberg, Feminist analyses of public policy, in Comparative Politics 24:4 (1992), 477–93.
- Z. Anwar, Perspective from Malaysia, in Asia Foundation, Democratic transitions and the role of Islam in Asia, 18 October 2000, 3–7.
- N. Chowdhury and B. J. Nelson, Redefining politics. Patterns of women's political engagement from a global perspective, in N. Chowdhury and B. J. Nelson (eds.), Women and politics worldwide, New Haven, Conn. 1994, 3–24.
- Y. Chung (ed.), The Asia-Pacific community in the year 2000. Challenges and prospects, Sejong Institute Monograph Series 91–01 (no. 6), Seoul 1991.
- L. Corner, Women's participation in decision-making and leadership. A global perspective, 1997, <<http://www.unifem-eseasia.org/resources/techpapers/wleaders.htm>>.
- A. A. Engineer, Muslim family law, in L. Sarkar and B. Sivaramyia (eds.), Women and law. Contemporary problems, Dhaka 1994, 50–62.
- HDC (Human Development Centre), Human development in South Asia 2000. The gender question, Dhaka 2000.
- ILO (International Labour Organization), Yearbook of labour statistics, Geneva 2001.
- M. M. Khan, Problems of democracy. Administrative reform and corruption, in BISS Journal 22:1 (2000), 1–24.
- R. Luckham and G. White, Introduction. Democratizing the South, in R. Luckham and G. White (eds.), Democratization in the South. The jagged wave, New York 1996, 1–10.
- L. Manderson, Women, politics and change, Kuala Lumpur 1980.
- J. Mincos, Introduction. A confessional universe, in J. Mincos, The house of obedience. Women in Arab society, trans. M. Pallis, London 1980, 13–25.
- S. Mendus, Losing the faith. Feminism and democracy, in J. Dunn (ed.), Democracy. The unfinished journey 508 BC to AD 1993, Oxford 1992, 207–19.
- C. Pateman, The disorder of women. Democracy, feminism and political theory, Cambridge 1989.
- , Democracy and democratization, in International Political Science Review 17:1 (1996), 5–12.
- V. S. Peterson and A. Runyan, Global gender issues, Boulder, Colo. 1993.
- A. Phillips, Must feminists give up on liberal democracy?, in D. Held (ed.), Prospects for democracy. North, South, East, West, Cambridge 1993, 93–111.
- S. Rai, Gender and democratization. Or what does democracy mean for women in the Third World?, in Democratization 1:2 (1994), 209–28.
- , Gender and democratization. Ambiguity and opportunity, in R. Luckham and G. White (eds.), Democratization in the South. The jagged wave, New York 1996, 220–42.
- R. Sobhan, Planning and public action for Asian women, Dhaka 1992.
- B.-C. Sohn, Women's political engagement and participation in the Republic of Korea, in N. Chowdhury and B. J. Nelson (eds.), Women and politics worldwide, New Haven, Conn. 1994, 436–47.
- UN (United Nations), The United Nations in the Asia-Pacific region, Bangkok 1993.
- UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), Human development report 1996. Economic growth and human development, New York 1996, <<http://hdr.undp.org/reports/global/1996/en/>>.
- , Human development report 2002. Deepening democracy in a fragmented world, New York 2002, <<http://hdr.undp.org/reports/global/2002/en/>>.
- T. Vanhanen, Introduction, in T. Vanhanen, Prospects of democracy. A study of 172 countries, London 1997, 3–9.
- S. Walby, Gender, globalization and democracy, in Gender and Development 8:1 (2000), 20–8.
- G. Waylen, Analysing women in the politics of the Third World, in H. Afshor (ed.), Women and politics in the Third World, London 1996, 7–24.
- E. Wormland, Rhetoric, reality, and a dilemma. Women and politics in Papua New Guinea, in N. Chowdhury and B. J. Nelson (eds.), Women and politics worldwide, New Haven, Conn. 1994, 560–74.
- N. Yoko et al., The U.N. Convention on Eliminating Discrimination against Women and the status of women in Japan, in N. Chowdhury and B. J. Nelson (eds.), Women and politics worldwide, New Haven, Conn. 1994, 397–414.

Iran and Afghanistan

Democracy ideologies are based on gendered concepts of citizenship. They define a citizen as a free and autonomous contract-making individual, a property owner, the male citizen. Democracy ideologies exclude women from the state. This exclusion is accentuated by the attempts to separate state and civil society, civil society and the private sphere, and the state and the private sphere. The works of Alexis de Tocqueville (1805–59), the French philosopher and historian, present an example of the gendered character of democracy ideologies. In his much acclaimed work De la démocratie en Amérique (1835–40), he makes an ideological distinction between state and civil society, considers women as custodians of religion and mores, advocates sex segregation and women's exclusion from the public sphere, argues that women's social and political inequality is a natural fact, and maintains that democracy is guaranteed through women's exclusion from the state, or what he calls women's political powerlessness.

By marginalizing women and excluding women from the state and the public sphere democracy ideologies deny women individuality, autonomy, and independence. Indeed, they do not perceive women as individuals but as family members whose rights and obligations are defined in relation to male relatives, leaders, and protectors of women.

In Iran and Afghanistan, modern centralizing states, although antidemocratic, more or less included women in their general program of modernization and national development, but did not challenge gendered distinction between public and private spheres. Women obtained the right to education and to work and were later granted political rights. But with their institutionalization of gendered relations, these states did not challenge gendered systems of social stratification or gendered relations within the family and did not remove from family and religion their social functions. These modernizing states submitted women to the control of the men of their community and privileged women mothers and wives over women citizens. The reformer Afghan King Amān Allāh (1921–9) promoted women's education and introduced a family code in 1921 outlawing child marriage as contrary to Islamic principles, followed by other measures in 1924, including the right of Afghan girls to choose their husbands. Although the introduction of a civil legal code went against traditionalist values of the tribal society and customs, it did not, however, intend to question patriarchy and male domination. In Iran under Reza Shah (1925– 41), the number of girls' schools increased sharply in urban areas and the foundation of Tehran University in 1936 allowed women access to higher education and to work mainly in the administration. The veil was outlawed in 1936 but the new family code promulgated in 1933 was entirely founded on Islamic law.

Patriarchal system and gender inequality persisted in the 1960s and 1970s despite the grant of voting rights to women (1963 in Iran, 1964 in Afghanistan), statutory changes, and urban women's increasing presence in the public sphere. Women mothers and wives were still privileged over women citizens. The application of Islamic laws in the aftermath of the Iranian Revolution and following the downfall of the communist government in Afghanistan reinforced patriarchy and denied women their citizenship rights.

In Iran and Afghanistan the Western liberal notion of the citizen, which implies a masculinized construct, has been predominant in democratic discourses that also shared the Western construct of nation-state. As a consequence, attempts to ensure women's legal and citizenship rights, as major factors in the building of democracy, have been largely absent from democratic discourses. Anti-clerical, reformist, and Jacobin-minded Iranian intellectuals such as Aḥmad Kasravī (assassinated in 1945 by the Fidā'iyyīn-i Islām, a fundamentalist group), Ḥasan Taqīzāda, and Muḥammad 'Alī Jamālzāda shared the principle of patriarchy and male domination. Despite their different viewpoints on the question of women's emancipation, like de Tocqueville and John Stuart Mill (1806–73), they considered domestic work, and child-bearing and rearing as women's main social function and natural role. Kasravī even argued that women's political participation was in contradiction to their natural characteristics. Several religious reformist intellectuals in post-revolutionary Iran, including 'Abd al-Karīm Surūsh (known as the standard-bearer of religious intellectualism in post-revolutionary Iran) and 'Abbās 'Abdī, who are against political Islam and advocate democracy, also largely share a gendered concept of citizenship. Surūsh's lack of interest in the Woman Question is paramount when we compare his writings on women to the vast corpus of his published work. He has so far devoted only two paragraphs to women. His discussion of gender issues is limited to some lectures and interviews where he criticizes both traditional understandings of women's status in Islam and equal rights advocates. In 'Abdī's view, the question of women and their legal and citizenship rights is not intertwined with the building of democracy and therefore does not constitute an urgent issue for democracy ideologies.

Over two decades of civil war in Afghanistan, and the rule of the Taliban (1996–2001) have led to the disintegration of the state, social destructuring, and deprivation of women in terms of education, health facilities, work, and social and political participation. Although in the post-Taliban era women have obtained the right to education and to work, many years are needed to reconstruct the country and to empower women. The building of democracy is further hindered by poverty, lack of political stability, and fundamentalist opposition to women's social and political participation, as illustrated by the low representation of women at the Loya Jirga (traditional assembly), and to the presence of women as cabinet ministers or in other decision-making posts. President Hamid Karzai dismissed Sima Samar, the first minister in charge of women's affairs, following pressure by traditionalists, who had dubbed her the Afghan Salman Rushdie. Indicative of the lack of attention of the new Afghan government to women's problems is the fact that Habiba Sarabi, the new minister, was forced to dismiss 150 of her female staff due to financial shortfalls. Faced with structural, political, and cultural impediments to women's empowerment, educated Afghan women, who are conscious that democracy cannot be attained unless women's rights are established, have started to mobilize. Habiba Sarabi maintains: "The situation is very saddening but I'm determined to struggle." Women members of the editorial board of Rooz, the first post-Taliban women's magazine published in Kabul, as well as founders and members of women non-governmental organizations share this determination.

In Iran, despite the rule of Islamic law and important obstacles in the way of women attaining authority and power, building capacity for democracy is increasing due to higher literacy rates for women (80 percent of females aged six and over are literate), higher education for young women (50 percent of the 1,500,000 students are female), women's increasing social, cultural, and economic activities, and their increasing political involvement. Moreover, women's representation at local and municipal councils is growing (an 80 percent increase in the 2003 elections compared to 1999). Women's local civic activity combined with their involvement in national politics is likely to enhance grassroots bottom-up democracy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- 'A. 'Abdī, Rawshanfikrī-i dīn-i va masā'il-i fawritar az masā'il-i zanān, in Zanān 58 (2000), 38.
F. Collin, E. Pisier, and E. Varikas, Les femmes de Platon à Derrida, Paris 2000.

- S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics, Introduction, in S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001, 1–19.
A. Kian-Thiébaud, Intellectuels religieux et clercs iraniens face à la modernité occidentale, in Revue française de science politique 47 (1997), 776–97.
A. Matin-Asgari, 'Abdolkarim Sorush and the secularization of Islamic thought in Iran, in Iranian Studies 30 (1997), 95–116.
Z. Mir-Hosseini, Religious modernists and the "Woman Question," in E. Hooglund (ed.), Twenty years of Islamic revolution. Political and social transition in Iran since 1979, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002, 74–95.
A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality. Women, state and ideology in contemporary Iran, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 46–76.
P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1997.
H. Sarabi, interview with M. F. Colombani, La vie à Roz, in Elle 30 (2003), 158–60.
'A. Surūsh, Qabz va bast-i ḥuqūq-i zanān, in Zanān 59 (2000), 32–7.
A. de Tocqueville, De la démocratie en Amérique, 2 vols., Paris 1961.

AZADEH KIAN-THIÉBAUD

Israel

Israel defines itself as both the Jewish state and a democracy. The Declaration of Establishment of the State of Israel, signed on 14 May 1948, explicitly calls for "the natural right of the Jewish people to be masters of their own fate, . . . in their own sovereign State"; it also stresses Israel's commitment to democratic principles including elections, social and political equality, and "freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture" (Israel 1948). Israel lacks a constitution, instead relying on a series of Basic Laws such as the 1992 Basic Law of Individual Freedom and Dignity, which guarantees the protection of all life, personal property, and individual liberties.

Many Israelis articulate identity by referencing dichotomies that highlight tensions within Israel over nationalism (Jewish/Palestinian), ethnicity (European/Oriental), and religion (secular/religious, Jewish/non-Jewish). For example, a feminist, left-leaning, secular woman of Moroccan parents might explain her civil identity in terms of politics that emphasize democracy, her national identity as Jewish, and her ethnic identity as Oriental or Moroccan while a Christian Palestinian woman might describe her national identity as Palestinian, her religious identity as Roman Orthodox, and her civil identity as Israeli. Such categorical distinctions deeply structure and affect a person's experience and participation within the state as one element within each pair carries more political, social, economic, and cultural power (Domínguez 1989). For marginalized groups within Israel, the state's embrace of democracy affords possible redress of civil discrimination; democracy and civil society are perceived as more flexible than Judaism or Zionism, which emphasize heritage.

Within academic and popular debates, scholars, politicians, and citizens regularly use the terms "Zionism," "Jewish," and "democracy," yet an overview of the terms illustrates that few shared meanings surface beyond the basic recognition that these terms belong to specific discourses related to Israel's existence. Moreover, individuals often obfuscate the ways in which normative ideas of the state drive descriptive analyses. Uneven and inconsistent democracy ideologies have real consequences for structurally marginalized groups – especially women and Palestinian citizens – when translated into policy. In the case of divorce and the absence of civil marriage in Israel, women receive different legal consideration in the civil and religious courts (Adelman 1997) or, with Palestinian femicides (honor killings), women find themselves subject to codes that further victimize the woman and stigmatize Palestinians (Faier 2004).

Israel is not a liberal democracy; its legislative, judicial, military, and religious bodies codify and institutionalize its Jewish character and Zionist underpinnings. State symbols reinforce the centrality of "Jewish" as a defining feature: the flag (Star of David) and national anthem (HaTikvah, The Hope) signify Jewish meanings and further distance non-Jews from the state. Falah (1996) argues that state land planning policies act in counter democratic ways by seeking to establish Jewish demographic dominance and, thus, Jewish ideological and physical boundaries in predominantly Palestinian areas.

Consequently, many Israelis and non-Israelis question whether Israel can be both Jewish and democratic. Some contend that as Zionism and democracy are fundamentally incommensurate, only a one-state solution ensures equality for all citizens. Post-Zionists share a similar stance by rejecting Zionism as a political organizing philosophy and calling for democratization. However, this literature stresses differing goals and processes because, as Silberstein (1999) illustrates, post-Zionism has metamorphosed from early assertions that the establishment of Israel fulfilled Zionist ideals to current wide-ranging critiques directed at state institutions, the distribution of power, and political processes.

Recent debates in the journal Israel Studies highlight ongoing concerns about how best to describe Israel's political ideologies and practices. According to Smooha (1990), Israel is an ethnic democracy that grants elevated status to Jews but does not prohibit the simultaneous realization of national and civil rights by Palestinian citizens. Ghanem, Rouhana, and Yiftachel (1998) reject Smooha's argument, stating instead that Israel's classification should be as an ethnocracy because of the inclusion of religion within the political structure of the state. Others maintain that while the absence of religion is not a precondition of democracy, the meaning of "democracy" or "the Jewish State" is disputed and riddled with inconsistency, misinterpretation, and uneven application (Gavison 1999).

What is striking about Israel's democracy debates is the diminished role gender plays as an issue theoretically linked to political ideologies, discourses, and practices (Kimmerling 2001). Although women (Jewish) serve in the military, run in parliamentary elections, and participate fully in daily life, the paucity of material that addresses gender and democracy as referential raises the question as to whether national conflict in Israel supersedes gendered issues (see Chatty and Rabo 1997 for other Middle Eastern contexts). Available literature and ethnographic data suggest that despite popularized discourses of gender equality in Israel, women face discrimination daily (Swirski and Safir 1991), find themselves challenged when they diverge from expected gendered life trajectories (Sa'ar 2001), and experience state and society through masculinist and nationalist contexts (Españoly 1994).

In addressing gaps in democratic process, the women's movement focuses on the interrelationship between the political and the personal. Through its non-governmental organizations (NGOs), co-existence activities, peace groups, networks, and other groups, the women's movement offers opportunities for critiquing the status quo, organizing community action, and seeking alternative forms of social and/or political organization. For example, the organization Isha L'Isha (Woman to Woman) Haifa Feminist Center runs a media watch program that examines the impact of negative stereotypes on both the perception of women and their experiences. Women in Black and other women's peace groups have sought to locate their resistance within gendered discourses that draw from ideas of democracy and equality but do not replicate them (Shadmi 2000, Sharoni 1995). Magno (2002) examines the obstacles and possibilities for women's NGOs to produce social and political capital while Faier (2004) explores attempts by Palestinian female NGO activists to gender citizenship and nationalism in the face of risk and uncertainty.

Deep and established division among Israeli women, usually along ethnic (Ashkenazi/Mizrahi, that is, European/Oriental) or national (Palestinian/Jewish) lines obscure how class, colonialism, and state categorization affect both women's lives and their experiences of the state (Shohat 1989). Kanaaneh (2001) illustrates how Palestinian women situate themselves and are situated as sites of power where demographic conflict, Palestinian nationalism, family planning, and the politics of gender within Israel play out. Similarly, Kahn (2000) explores reproductive technologies among unmarried Jewish women, drawing out the complicated ways fertility and reproductive debates invoke Jewish law as well as democratic access to state health services. According to Torstrick (2000), coexistence groups that desire social and cultural integration between Jews and Palestinians but not changes in Israel's political structure reinterpret the ideals of democracy along cultural idioms rather than risk exposing contradictions within the state's democratic fabric. Emmett (1996) shows that while female coexistence activists attempt to subsume politics within the personal, larger political conflicts seep into and infuse the interpersonal, challenging distinctions between public and private as well as self and nation.

Democracy in Israel is a hotly contested political ideology. Democracy ideologies interchange with larger conversations about civil society, nationalism, religion, and identity, opening up possibilities for revealing and perhaps benefiting from contradictions and inconsistencies within the state. Clearly, other concerns – namely the maintenance or contestation of the Jewish character of the state and the protracted Israeli-Palestinian conflict – temper the definition, articulation, and practice of democracy in Israel. Given these parameters, women face the doubly difficult task of interjecting their voices within state discourses and in turn, negotiating the form and substance of gendered ideologies of democracy and citizenship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Association for Civil Rights in Israel, <<http://www.acri.org.il/english-acri/engine/index.asp>>.
- M. Freedman, Exile in the promised land. A memoir, Ithaca, N.Y. 1990.
- D. Grossman, Sleeping on a wire. Conversations with Palestinians in Israel, New York 1993.
- Haifa Women's Coalition Homepage, <<http://www.haifawomenscoalition.org.il/>>.
- Israel, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, <<http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa>>.

- A. Shammas, Arabesques. A novel, trans. V. Eden, New York 1988.
- Women's Voice, Women's Center, <<http://kolhaisha.israel.net/engindex.html>>.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Adelman, Gender, law, and nation. The politics of domestic violence in Israel, Ph.D. diss., Durham N.C. 1997.
- D. Chatty and A. Rabo (eds.), Organizing women. Formal and informal women's groups in the Middle East, Oxford 1997.
- V. Domínguez, People as subject, people as object. Selfhood and peoplehood in contemporary Israel, Madison, Wis. 1989.
- A. Emmett, Our sisters' promised land. Women, politics, and Israeli-Palestinian coexistence, Ann Arbor 1996.
- N. Espanioly, Palestinian women in Israel. Identity in light of the occupation, in T. Mayer (ed.), Women and the Israeli occupation. The politics of change, London 1994, 106–20.
- E. Faier, Organizations, gender, and the culture of Palestinian activism in Haifa, Israel, New York 2004.
- G. Falah, Living together apart. Residential segregation in mixed Arab-Jewish cities in Israel, in Urban Studies 33 (1996), 823–57.
- R. Gavison, Jewish and Democratic? A rejoinder to the "ethnic democracy" debate, in Israel Studies 4 (1999), 44–72.
- A. Ghanem, N. Rouhana, and O. Yiftachel, Questioning "ethnic democracy." A response to Sammy Smooha, in Israel Studies 3 (1998), 253–67.
- Israel, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1948, <<http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace+Process/Guide+to+the+Peace+Process/Declaration+of+Establishment+of+State+of+Israel.htm>>.
- S. Kahn, Reproducing Jews. A cultural account of assisted conception in Israel, Durham, N.C. 2000.
- R. Kanaaneh, Birthing the nation. Strategies of Palestinian women in Israel, Berkeley 2001.
- B. Kimmerling, The invention and decline of Israeliness. State, society, and the military, Berkeley 2001.
- C. Magno, New pythian voices. Women building political capital in NGOs in the Middle East, New York 2002.
- A. Sa'ar, Lonely in your firm grip. Women in Israeli-Palestinian families, in Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 7 (2001), 723–40.
- E. Shadmi, Between resistance and compliance, feminism and nationalism. Women in Black in Israel, in Women's Studies International Forum 23 (2000), 23–34.
- S. Sharoni, Gender and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The politics of women's resistance, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995.
- E. Shohat, Israeli cinema. East/West and the politics of representation, Austin, Tex. 1989.
- L. J. Silberstein, The post-Zionism debates. Knowledge and power in Israeli culture, New York 1999.
- S. Smooha, Minority status in an ethnic democracy. The status of the Arab minority in Israel, in Ethnic and Racial Studies 13 (1990), 389–413.
- B. Swirski and M. Safir (eds.), Calling the equality bluff. Women in Israel, New York 1991.
- R. Torstrick, The limits of coexistence. Identity politics in Israel, Ann Arbor 2000.

Divorce and Custody: Contemporary Practices

Arab States

The practices and social implications of divorce and custody are discussed here by looking at how women live with divorce before, during and after marriage. How do Arab women deal with the threat of divorce? What are their means to influence the divorce process? And what are its social and economic consequences? Historical studies of court archives have provided interesting insights into how women pursued or resisted divorce in court and added to its analysis from a legal perspective (Mir-Hosseini 2000, Ahmad 1972, Gibb and Kramers 1974, El-Alami and Hinchcliffe 1996, Sonbol 1996, Esposito and DeLong-Bas 2001), but information on women's actual experiences is scant and fragmented. Women's divorce experiences vary greatly, depending not only on the particular religious, customary, and national laws locally adhered to, but also on class, urban or rural locality, context of migration or dislocation, and individual circumstances.

BEFORE MARRIAGE

Before marriage, girls and their parents try to reduce the risk of future divorce or its harmful consequences by choosing a marriage partner from comparable family background, preferably the father's brother's son or another kinsman. He is expected to show respect and responsibility for a wife who is related to him, and she will feel more comfortable living with relatives. No figures are available to confirm whether familial endogamy indeed reduces the divorce rate. Another strategy is to demand a sizable bridal gift (mahr or ṣadāq). This is thought to deter divorce because the man would lose this investment, which becomes her property if he divorces her. Estimations of the divorce risk are most expressed in the deferred mahr, the part due upon dissolution of the marriage, which is set higher for previously divorced or unrelated grooms. Cousins pay less, which may leave a woman divorced by her cousin with less property than if she had married a stranger. Bride-exchange between families exacerbates the precariousness of marriage for the women involved, because when one wife is repudiated the other must return to her parents too; and both women have less security in gold, because hardly any mahr is paid. Girls who are divorced before the marriage is consummated are expected to return the mahr, as Moors found for Palestine (Moors 1995, 145). A last means to empower women in divorce matters is through the stipulations Muslim women are allowed to write into their marriage contract. When any stipulated right, for example, to study, work, or remain the sole wife, is not granted, women can demand divorce (Chérif-Chammari 1995). Feminists advise the use of this strategy, but in practice it is difficult because girls depend on their male matrimonial guardian and male notaries, who are reluctant to negotiate and register uncommon clauses. Moreover, most girls prefer not to think of future marital problems, and some even fancy divorce as a way to become free.

DURING MARRIAGE

After the wedding, the conjugal tie is challenged by the young man's loyalty and obligations toward his mother and patrilineal kin. He needed their financial support for his marriage, which gives them the power to interfere in the couple's life. His family's demands for financial and emotional support are frequently a source of marital tensions (Mir-Hosseini 2001, 120). Accusations of magic in North Africa express this antagonism among in-laws (Jansen 1987, 115–20). Women know the marriage bond can be broken easily, and fear the fragility of their husband's love. Children are essential to secure the bond. Infertile women in the Maghrib sometimes say they are pregnant with a "sleeping fetus" to ward off the threat of divorce (Jansen 2000). Women also protect themselves by collecting gold, especially in the first years of marriage, or by saving their housekeeping money or salary. The tendency – and legal right – of employed women to spend their income on themselves rather than their family unit, is a source of conflict among better-educated urban couples.

Women's strategy to keep close social and financial ties with their family of birth, by a regular exchange of gifts or by leaving them their share of inheritance, is a source of security for women, but can equally be a source of marital conflicts, and can facilitate a separation. Maher explained the higher divorce rates she found in Moroccan villages compared to the nearby town by the fact that rural women could fall back on their families to whom they had left their land and with whom they had kept up intimate relations. Poor women in town who were cut off from the support of their families or without land rights in their villages of origin had no means to request a separation (Maher 1974a, 191–221, 1974b).

Marital discord is generally attributed to the wife's disobedience or disagreeable character. Among the Moroccan poor the discrepancy between the legal model of men as the sole providers and the social reality of the wife being in many cases the main breadwinner is an important underlying reason for marital breakdown. A common way for unemployed men to respond to the dishonor of being dependent on their wife's work or network, is to reclaim authority by violence or by deserting the family (Mir-Hosseini 2000, 120–1).

DIVORCE

In the divorce process, women have fewer rights than men. The dominant form of divorce in Islam is the talāq, whereby a man simply declares: "I repudiate thee." When he does so three times the divorce becomes irrevocable. He need not give a reason, nor need his wife be present or informed. This superior male right dominates the general discourse on divorce. It is expressed by the use of the passive form ("he has repudiated her" rather than "they separated") in stories of men randomly divorcing their wives and in male threats during conflicts. This discourse fuels women's fear of divorce more than actual knowledge of divorce rates; accurate statistics on this issue are remarkably absent or unreliable in most Arab countries. Most Arab states have limited excessive use of this male prerogative. Many now require registration of the talāq by a notary, and consider repudiations made under certain circumstances invalid, for example, when the husband is intoxicated or in a fit of anger or violence, or pronounces a triple repudiation in one formula, or when the wife is menstruating. In Egypt since 1979 the wife must be informed of the action and is entitled to remain in the rented marital home when she assumes custody of the children (Rugh 1984, 179). In Tunisia a divorce can only be obtained in court.

Despite such adaptations, women remain disadvantaged in terms of divorce. Simple registration does not suffice, and women must request divorce through a court. Nearly all divorce cases treated in court are therefore instigated by women, although men initiate divorce twice as often as women (Mir-Hosseini 2000, 84–5, Rugh 1984, 177). Unlike men, women need to have good reasons to petition for divorce, such as the husband's impotence or suffering from a dangerous contagious disease, repeated and extreme violent abuse, failure to provide maintenance, or desertion.

An alternative for women to effect separation is to convince the husband to divorce her. In this khul' divorce by mutual consent, the wife must pay the husband compensation for agreeing to release her: she "buys her head" as people say in the Maghrib. It should not be seen, however, as a "woman's divorce" in which women have equal rights. Men can abuse this option to avoid paying divorce dues. Rather than pronouncing a talāq a man can make his wife's life so miserable that she leaves him and pays for a khul' divorce. Moreover, he can make her pay dearly for her freedom. She commonly has to return the mahr and to relinquish her right to the deferred mahr, but often she also gives up her maintenance during the waiting period ('idda), the maintenance of the children, or even the right to custody. A woman thus has to give up the very property that was meant to protect her against divorce and its financial consequences. Lower-class women without economic means or familial support will therefore seldom request a khul'. Instead, they fight to retain their mahr and maintenance. It is mainly women from upper and middle strata of society who request a khul' divorce in court. Since 2000, Egyptian women can do so without the husband's agreement. By exploiting the possibilities of khul' to the full, they can gain more gender equality in access to divorce. But they still bear the brunt of its consequences: the required arbitration process reinforces the extant familial control over divorce arrangements, women must return the mahr and other gifts, and stand up to public opinion, which condemns khul' as disrespectful (Tucker 2003).

Several women's organizations take a stand against gender discriminatory family laws and court practices or provide concrete support to divorcees (Collectif 95 1995). Divorce rates are likely to increase with the growing participation of women in the labor market and in politics. Christians in Islamic countries divorce less often than Muslims. The divorce rules of their churches vary from a total ban on divorce to allowing it under specific circumstances. Christian women have less fear of divorce and no protection in the form of a deferred mahr. Occasionally, a Christian who wants to divorce becomes Muslim or, more commonly, converts to another Christian denomination that accepts divorce.

AFTER DIVORCE

A divorced woman is expected to return to her family of birth and then remarry. A women's impetus to leave her husband is influenced by her chances of remarriage and the fear of losing her children. Only young women without children who can easily find a new partner willingly request divorce; post-menopausal women or women with several children seldom voluntarily do so (Maher 1974b, 191–221). The second marriage reveals a drop in social status: the mahr is lower and the second husband less attractive in terms of age, income, or civil status (Jansen 1987, 2–3). Moreover, a woman can seldom take her children into the new marriage. If her female relatives cannot take care of them, her ex-husband has the right to take the children away from her. Unlike men, women must observe a legal waiting period ('idda) before they can remarry. During this period of three menstrual cycles, or when they are pregnant until they have given birth, the man can take his wife back.

Not all families are able or willing to welcome back a divorcee with several children, despite the strong ideology of family support. They will pressure her to reconcile with and obey her husband, or when that fails, to sue the ex-spouse to pay maintenance. When he is too poor, the family often cannot but reproachfully accept that the divorcee earns her own living and that of her children. Divorcees are as a result over-represented among employed women.

The work of divorcees in public space and their movements outside male control contribute to the ambiguous reputation of divorcees as both morally degraded and joyfully free. Divorcees are often referred to in pejorative terms. Married women fear them for their seductive powers. In songs and gossip, divorcees and other “women without men” are associated with looseness, drunkenness, and prostitution. The choice of some divorcees to make a living in the entertainment business is seized upon to stigmatize the whole group, and forces others to go to extreme lengths to prove their decency (Jansen 1987, 196–8). On the positive side, divorcees are less constrained in their behavior than married women. They can experience economic independence and decision-making power, and taste the pleasures of mobility and exploration of the outside world. Despite the envious gossip and moral reprobation, some divorcees have come to enjoy life without a partner.

The mother is recognized as the most suitable caretaker of the children after divorce. If she cannot raise the child, or when she remarries, the right of care (ḥaḍāna) passes to her mother, or another woman in her family, before going to the child's paternal grandmother. This female prerogative does not prevent conflicts concerning the children. In some legal systems women's rights to the children are temporary. This gives fathers a hold over the mother and her children, whether they reclaim the children after a certain age or not. Another reason is that a father keeps his rights to guardianship (wilāya), provided he pays for the child's maintenance. It gives him the right to decide on its education, residence, travel or marriage, and the mother must obey him in anything that concerns the child. The major source of contention concerning the children, however, is the insufficiency or absence of maintenance. Among middle and upper classes, the fathers who do pay for their children still need regular prompting. Most broken marriages are found among the poor, and here men often forego their guardianship rights because they cannot afford to pay maintenance or prefer to spend their meager income on their new family. Women's privilege of custody means that they have to carry the full economic burden.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. N. Ahmad, The Muslim law of divorce, Islamabad 1972.
- A. Chérif-Chammari, Le mariage. Guide des droits des femmes, Tunis 1995.
- Collectif 95 Maghreb Egalité, One hundred measures and provisions for a Maghrebian egalitarian codification of the Personal Statute and Family Law, Rabat 1995.
- D. El-Alami and D. Hinchcliffe (eds.), Islamic marriage and divorce laws of the Arab world, The Hague 1996.
- J. L. Esposito with N. J. DeLong-Bas, Women in Muslim family law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2001.
- H. A. R. Gibb and J. H. Kramers, Ṭalāk, in Shorter encyclopaedia of Islam, Leiden 1974, 564–71.
- W. Jansen, Women without men. Gender and marginality in an Algerian town, Leiden 1987.
- , Sleeping in the womb. Protracted pregnancies in the Maghreb, in Muslim World 90 (2000), 218–38.
- Koran. With a parallel Arabic text*, trans. N. J. Dawood, London 1990 (5th rev. ed.), 2:227–31, 33:49, 65:1–7.
- V. Maher, Women and property in Morocco, London 1974a.
- , Divorce and property in the Middle Atlas of Morocco, in Man 9 (1974b), 103–22.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Marriage on trial. A study of Islamic family law in Iran and Morocco, London 1993.
- A. Moors, Women, property and Islam. Palestinian experiences, 1920–1990, Cambridge 1995.
- A. B. Rugh, Family in contemporary Egypt, Syracuse, N.Y. 1984.
- A. E. Sonbol, Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- J. E. Tucker, Tracking the woman's divorce. Kbul' in historical context, paper presented at ISIM, Leiden, 14–16 March 2003.

WILLY JANSEN

Australia

The majority of Australian Muslim women involved in divorce and custody problems are required to negotiate their way through two sets of social and legal systems – the Islamic system, which governs their religious belief and culture, and the Western, secular Australian system, which operates under different principles and procedures. To date, there have been few, if any, formal studies of the way in which Australian Muslims deal with divorce and custody, and the information in this entry is based on a small number of informal surveys, responses from Islamic welfare organizations, and anecdotal evidence.

The Muslim community in Australia is small, recent, and very diverse. According to the 2001 census, 281,578 persons out of a total population of over 19 million identified themselves as Muslims. This number represents about 1.5 percent of the Australian population. Substantial migration of Muslims to Australia began only in the early 1970s, and so the majority of Muslims are recent migrants, the children of migrants, or their grandchildren. The Muslim population originates from more than 60 different countries, with different languages, and cultures and following different schools of Islamic law.

The majority of Muslim migrants to Australia come from countries where divorce, custody, and similar matters are regulated by Islamic law, and to most of them the Shari'a remains binding on the conduct of their family affairs. The Australian government does not recognize Islamic law. The Australian legal system is secular and is applied without distinction of ethnicity, race, or gender to all Australians. There is therefore some tension in the minds of Muslim Australians about how to accommodate both systems in case of family breakdown.

Under the Australian Family Law Act 1975, there is only one ground for divorce – irretrievable breakdown of marriage, evidenced by the fact that the parties have lived separately and apart for a period of at least twelve months. There are no fault grounds for divorce and no inquiry into the reasons for the marital breakdown. Either husband or wife may unilaterally decide to end the marriage and lodge an application for divorce with the family court. After proof of service of the application on the respondent spouse, the court can grant a divorce, provided that it is satisfied that proper arrangements have been made for any minor children of the marriage.

Ancillary matters such as child custody and access (residence and contact orders) are dealt with by separate applications. There is no presumption in favor of either parent and the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration. In recent years, the courts have placed much more emphasis on mediation as a way of resolving disputes concerning children. Although mainstream mediators undergo cross-cultural training, there are very few Muslim mediators and there is no culturally specific counseling service available to Muslims. In the first instance, women will normally seek the help of a sympathetic shaykh or imam, and in some communities there is strong social pressure not to involve institutions outside the Muslim community.

However, family members may not be present in Australia to help mediate family disputes, and women complain that male community leaders are too close to other men in the community and not prepared to support women even in cases of domestic violence. Women are frequently exhorted simply to exercise patience (ṣabr). There is only one refuge for Muslim women who have been forced to leave their homes. This was set up by the Muslim Women's Association in Sydney in 1988 to provide protection to Muslim women in an Islamic environment, since it was found that Muslim women were reluctant to enter culturally inappropriate mainstream refuges.

In some cases, women encounter community disapproval for seeking help about marital problems and are simply expected to endure bad marriages. There is still some social stigma attached to divorce in some communities, and divorced women may find it difficult to remarry.

Accessing the Australian court system is usually a last resort, although anecdotal evidence is that people from some communities, for example, the Turkish community, are more willing to do so. This may be because migrants from Turkey are used to having their family affairs regulated by a secular legal system. Where there is a dispute over child custody and it is feared that a child may be removed overseas, the Australian court system is more frequently used to obtain the necessary orders to prevent the child leaving Australia without the consent of the custodial parent.

Other than this, it is difficult to generalize about the way in which Muslim women deal with divorce and its consequences, because of differences in cultural background, level of education, and level of adherence to religious tradition. Some Muslims rely entirely on Islamic principles, entering into religious marriages and divorcing by ṭalāq, bypassing the Australian legal system completely. Other people with marital difficulties engage in forum shopping, accessing whichever system seems to suit their needs. Women who want a religious divorce, in circumstances where the husband refuses to pronounce ṭalāq, are unable to access an Islamic religious court, since none exists in Australia. A small number of shaykhs are willing to assist women, by persuading the husbands to pronounce talāq, or by granting a divorce in other circumstances.

Rates of divorce among Muslims are relatively higher than among the mainstream population in younger age groups (Saeed 2003, 90). After the age of 30, the incidence of divorce drops to well below that of the non-Muslim majority. No studies have as yet been undertaken to explain this situation, but it may be that the encouragement to early marriage in some communities results in early divorce as couples mature and find they do not have as much in common as they had hoped.

Other marriages break up because of migration stresses, particularly among refugees and the newly arrived. Factors such as lack of family and community support networks, uncertainty about the future (particularly in the case of refugees on Temporary Protection visas), and non-recognition of overseas qualifications leading to reduced socioeconomic status (Kamalkhani 2002) all contribute to the likelihood of marital breakdown, affecting both men and women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Islamic Welfare Centre, The true position of women in Islam, Sydney 2003 (pamphlet produced by local Muslim group).
- Z. Kamalkhani, Recently arrived Muslim refugee women coping with settlement, in A. Saeed and S. Akbarzadeh (eds.), Muslim communities in Australia, Sydney 2001, 97–115.
- A. Saeed, Islam in Australia, St. Leonards, N.S.W. 2003.

JAMILA HUSSAIN

Canada

Divorce has been of some consequence in the interaction of Muslims and the West throughout history, since the alleged ease with which Muslim men could divorce their wives was often used by European critics of Islam as proof of inequities and lack of modernity within the tradition. For example, the primary legalities of divorce are laid out in the Qurʾān, by which the male uttering of the talāq formula (“I divorce you”) three times in succession constitutes the legal end of the relationship. Since the Qurʾān had no equivalent procedure for the wife, the claim of inequity before the law was often made. Muslim social law was therefore assumed to be inferior to Western law by Western legists. Moreover, when the earliest Muslims (ca. 1880s) came to Canada, the legal system in place necessitated many modifications of Muslim expectations:

1. Muslim men could not have more than one wife and were expected to have divorced those not eligible to be the “first wife.” 2. Muslim divorce practice was not legally recognized in Canada, so regardless of whether the formula had been pronounced, Canadian legal procedures in the courts had to be undertaken. 3. Children from severed Muslim unions under most schools of Islamic law were assigned to the mother until they were pubescent, when they were typically assigned to the care of the father; in Canadian jurisdiction, the courts had no precedence in affirming the Islamic code, so cases were decided on the basis of the court’s judicious evaluation of the evidence. In the earliest times this meant the children were assigned to the mother. 4. Muslim law had various ways of providing for women after divorce, but none as clear-cut as the alimony/child support legislation in Canada, with the attendant responsibility falling on the husband. Muslim men, therefore, preferred to divorce under Muslim law.

The division of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments in Canada has had an impact upon Muslims. Section 91 of the British North America Act of 1867 allowed the federal government control over the “capacity” of marriage, divorce, and custody, whereas solemnization jurisdiction rested with the provinces. Canada’s case is further complicated by the fact that Quebec law differs significantly in its origins and formulations, with the Civil Code providing the basis for such social relationships as marriage. Some areas of dispute, such as matrimonial property, are provincial responsibilities. As a rule of thumb, the federal rules apply to all matters relating to setting up the legalities of these social relationships, but the provinces handle all practical matters of delivering the capacity to the people. In the early days, before imams were available, Muslims could not have marriages solemnized in a religious manner, and Muslims in remote areas had to rely upon the authorities validated by the province, making Muslim marriage, for example, an entirely secular matter. Furthermore, as in many aspects of federal-provincial relationships, Canadians discover that provincial custom defines the nuances much more readily than the federal law seems to imply. Thus, in matters of divorce, for example, local judges have great latitude regarding division of property, which allows for the enlightened judge to take Muslim law into consideration. A different judge, or one in an area not familiar with Muslim law, may not be so disposed. Moreover, since many Muslims came to Canada in the postwar period, they were subject to the changing perceptions of the legal fraternity. Statutes covering divorce in Canadian law changed in 1968 with the advent of the Divorce Act; its provisions made divorce easier and less humiliating. Under it, Muslims who agreed to divorce could make the claim that the pronouncing of the formula was evidence of the absolute break of the marriage bond, and the court could then accept that "irreconcilable differences" had ended the marriage. Revised, and eased further in 1985, the statutes allowed the court wide jurisdiction in interpreting the breakdown of a relationship, and one aspect that came to be respected by the courts was that a registered divorce in an Islamic context would have the same weight in Canada. Furthermore, unless there was good reason for challenging the Muslim legal case, courts could and did accept the legal school of the litigants as binding with regard to the children. If the mother contested that ruling, then Canadian law would apply. Under Canadian law to this date, the courts have acted as parens patriae, that is, as having parental responsibility for the child's welfare, and that has been interpreted to mean that all aspects of foreign law could and might be considered in the application of custody. Normally, however, this means undertaking to determine what the children themselves wish, and only secondarily a consideration of Muslim law. Under amending legislation that is now under consideration, the word "custody" has been removed from the text. This has arisen from arguments that parents have no inherent custodial rights over their children in divorce, since the court holds that prerogative. Consequently, Muslim laws assigning children to the father at age twelve are even less likely to be given priority in Canadian courts.

Canadian courts have, however, shown some developments in accepting Muslim notions of female independence. If the wife had monies under her ownership prior to marriage (such as a dowry), the courts have shown some willingness to maintain those as her personal wealth after the breakdown of the marriage, as is the case under Muslim law. However, these kinds of rulings can also be overridden in provincial law, where the property brought to the marriage and used by both parties during the marriage is considered common property. Muslim women are at a disadvantage in such proceedings, since typically the males carry on the business of the family, and the men are more familiar with the disposing of assets. Finally, some women, married under Muslim law but divorced under Canadian law, sense a disjunction in their emotional life arising from the secular nature of the divorce; more than a few have complained of still feeling bound by Muslim religious marriage bonds even after several years of being divorced in Canada.

Beyond these areas of concern, Muslim women in Canada have demonstrated an inventive mind when it comes to Muslim law; they have, for example, developed a facility to explore various schools of Muslim law and to move from one legal school to another as it best fits their perception of their case. Canada thus allows them a freedom that they would not have in their "home" jurisdiction, where they are deemed to have been born under the jurisdiction of a certain legal school and are therefore subject to its codes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A Bissett-Johnson, Family law, in J. H. Marsh (ed.), The Canadian encyclopedia, i, Edmonton, Alta. 1985, 613-14.
 M. Eichler, Families in Canada, Toronto 1983.
 A. A. Engineer, The rights of women in Islam, New Delhi 1992.
 Z. Husaini, Muslims in the Canadian mosaic, Edmonton, Alta. 1990.
 D. Laberge and P. Lanreville, Law, in J. H. Marsh (ed.), The Canadian encyclopedia, ii, Edmonton, Alta. 1985, 984-6.
 L. Larson, J. Walter Goltz, and B. Munro, Families in Canada. Social context, continuities and changes, Scarborough, Ont. 2000.
 R. B. McGowan, Muslims in the diaspora. The Somali communities of London and Toronto, Toronto 1999.
 E. Waugh, S. M. Abu-Laban, and R. Qureshi (eds.), Muslim families in North America, Edmonton, Alta. 1991.

EARLE WAUGH

The Caucasus and Central Asia

INITIATION OF DIVORCE

The ability to end a marriage is an important facet of women's rights. Women frequently could not dissolve their marriages on their own initiative because of the economic conditions that bound them. If they divorced, they had to give back the kalym (bride-money) as decided by the court of biy in Kyrgyz in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. A woman had the right to divorce through the court in the following cases: the husband was incapable of performing his marital duties; the husband withheld from his wife food and clothes for six months and 13 days; the husband treated his wife cruelly; the husband had a mental disorder; and physical defects of the wife hindering her work. The judge had the right to decide on the dissolution of the marriage, on return of the kalym, and on a large fee for himself.

As a rule, husbands initiated divorce. A husband could divorce his wife at any time and on any pretext. He had only to repudiate her by unilateral declaration (talāq); he could then take his word back and go on living a married life. A woman who was divorced on her husband's initiative had no right to her dowry or her children.

A woman who initiated a divorce had no right to an allowance, while a woman divorced on the initiative of her husband had an allowance until the 'idda expired.

Childlessness would often constitute grounds for divorce. The birth of a girl could also justify polygyny. The divorced woman lost the right to bring up her children. In the case of divorce or the father's death, children (in particular boys) remained in the care of the father's relatives. In this connection, adoption of boys was widely practiced in the countries of Central Asia (in particular among the Uzbek and the Kyrgyz).

After Central Asian and Caucasian states became integrated into the Russian Empire, courts began to dissolve marriages on women's initiative. Under Soviet rule, the Muslim communities of Central Asia and the Caucasus gradually began to relinquish Muslim laws; however, they retained power and continued existence as sociocultural values.

While according to the family law divorce can be initiated by either spouse, in traditional Muslim societies divorce is an unseemly act, especially for women. A report presented by human rights activists states: "In Uzbekistan in many cases divorce is the result of domestic abuse. A woman attorney assures us that all her clients filed for divorce because their husbands had beaten them. Thus, the divorce process normally begins when a woman wants to free herself of domestic violence" (Minnesota Advocates 2000, 53).

A woman's right to divorce is restricted by public opinion, by the attitude of the community, relatives, and parents. Her parents close the door of the parental house to her. It is more difficult to marry off the daughters of divorced mothers; younger sisters of a divorced woman will not be able to marry because the stamp of the divorced sister is on them. Old Uzbek proverbs about marrying off a daughter say: "May your dead body return from there," and "Flesh for you and bones for us."

AFTER DIVORCE

The most frequent problem today upon divorce in the countries of Central Asia is that of where a divorced woman can live. In most cases, the wife has no right to her part of the house belonging to her husband's parents. After divorce, small children remain in the care of the wife (contrary to the traditions of the Caucasian peoples, where children can remain in the father's family). There is also a problem with work. A woman who has remained at home without working outside the home loses whatever qualifications she may have had before marriage; if she was not educated before the birth of children, in most cases a woman has no opportunity to acquire or continue education. For such women there is only work that is underpaid, dirty, intensive, and unskilled. Alimony does not cover all the expenses of maintaining children because of the low level of wages. Many women refuse alimony to prevent the subsequent claim on the part of the father for return of the alimony when the children attain majority. If a father pays alimony for the children's maintenance he is entitled to demand 25 percent of their wages for his own maintenance in his old age. If a divorced woman is engaged in commercial business, she is more likely to work a more flexible schedule, allowing her more time to be with her children; and she earns a better income.

CHILDREN

Under Islamic law in the pre-Soviet period, trusteeship (wilāya) could be established for minors and the mentally disabled. Trusteeship was carried out by the father, a trustee (walī), or a judge (qāḍī). It began before a minor achieved sexual maturity and stopped upon the death of a ward. The trustee had to be a Muslim; a woman could also be a trustee.

After divorce in the post-Soviet period, a young woman is always offered for marriage again. However, if she already has a child, her parents always try to take the child away from her. Childless families adopt children of close relatives. Sometimes a child is taken to a childless family from a large family against his or her mother's will. Such children learn who their true mother is only in adulthood. This frequently creates shock and stress. Adoptive parents prefer to hide the truth from the child unless extraordinary events force them to reveal it. The real mother has little role in the bringing up of her child. Frequently, adoptive parents take children from poor families for trusteeship. They often do not accord the same status to their adopted children as to their biological children. The girls are usually married off earlier than the biological daughters; they do not receive education equal to the biological children; they are loaded with housework more often; and they are often used as workers in the house. The attitude is the same toward boys. They become helpers in the house or on the farm; the adoptive parents are less concerned with their education and intellectual growth. The food and clothing of adopted children leave much to be desired.

The eldest daughters (less often sons) are sometimes left to be brought up by their lonely and aged grandmothers and grandfathers. Frequently, these are grandmothers and grandfathers living in the countryside, while the parents live in cities with the other children. An insuperable gap in education and language emerges between these children. A woman takes this step only in extreme and desperate and dire situations: a divorce, hard material conditions, or temporary economic difficulties. In the Soviet period, this often happened when parents have to pursue their education.

Frequently, close relatives assume custody of children born out of wedlock to their daughters or sons. Such children are adopted and brought up in families as younger brothers or sisters. Their real origin is hidden from relatives.

Among post-Soviet Caucasian peoples and ethnic groups with Muslim traditions the question of adoption in inter-ethnic marriages is more complex. There are cases of mothers being fully separated from their children on religious grounds, where the father has a local nationality (the Chechens and Dagestans). This is observed in societies under the strong influence of national and religious extremism. Mothers in such families are compelled to migrate to their historical homelands. Their children are violently taken away from them and remain in the families of their fathers. Close relatives are engaged in their education. These children are encouraged to have a hostile attitude toward their biological mothers of a different confession, who allegedly would not accept Islam even for the sake of children. Mothers of such children have no opportunity to meet their children for many years (no statistics available).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Chaikovsky, Issik Kul province in 1869–1871 [in Russian], in Turkistanskiye vedomosti 45 (1872).
 Human Rights Watch 13:4(D) (June 2001), Uzbekistan.
 N. A. Kislyakov, Essays on the history of family and marriage among the peoples of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, Leningrad 1969.
 Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, Domestic Violence in Uzbekistan, December 2000, <mnadvocates.org>.
 O. Osaulenko, Gender norms of religious and common law [in Russian], Bishkek 2000.
 A. S. Saidov (ed.), Hidāya, vol. II. Tashkent 1998.

MARFUA TOKHTAKHODJAEVA AND ALMAZ KADIROVA

Iran and Afghanistan

Unequal divorce and custody rights in Iran and Afghanistan are the main reasons behind the social system that places men at the head of the household and fathers in control of children. In effect, many of the gains women secured as citizens have been nullified through family laws that make their freedom of movement, their desire to work or study, or to end their marriage subject to the approval of their husbands. Thus women are rendered subjects rather than partners of their husbands. While men have had, by religious convention and law, a unilateral right of divorce, women have had access to divorce on only very limited grounds and even then, to prove their case, often have to go to the unfamiliar and unwelcoming courts. Thus women must often look to alternative strategies to obtain a divorce, even assuming they can face the social stigma and economic hardships.

Although both Afghan and Iranian societies pay lip service to motherhood, mothers are given few rights in regard to custody of their children, who are viewed as belonging to their fathers. The custody rights of a mother in Iran exist up to the age of two for boys and seven for girls; while in Afghanistan among different cultures it can vary from five to seven years for boys and from five to puberty for girls. However, these rights are frequently ignored, and even when observed, should the mother remarry the custody reverts to the father. Visiting rights of mothers are the grayest part of Muslim jurisprudence and traditional practices in both societies. Even where mothers' visiting rights are legally recognized, there are no enforcement mechanisms. Frequently, belligerent husbands take away the children in order to punish their ex-wives. The threat of such eventualities constitutes a disincentive for any wife's disinclination to toe the line. Consequently, women may remain in an unhappy marriage so as not to lose their children. In both Iran and Afghanistan many widowed women feel obliged to accept marrying their brothers-in-law in order not to lose custody of their children. Years of war and high male mortality have brought the lack of custody rights for mothers to the forefront of Afghan women's concerns. Interestingly, widows of the Iran-Iraq War (1980–8) managed to successfully organize and pressure the Islamic Republic of Iran into changing the law to allow them to retain custody of their children even after remarrying. Women hoped the law would extend to all mothers in Iran although thus far resistance to such a development has been very strong.

Historically the male unilateral right of divorce has wreaked havoc in women's lives by rendering them economically and socially vulnerable. The practice of oral divorce continues to put women in an uncertain situation. As divorcees, women can not claim maintenance and yet on occasions women who remarried have been accused of bigamy (with severe legal and social consequences for them and their families) by the erstwhile husbands who have denied divorcing them. Thus an end to oral divorce has been a major demand by women in both societies. Under Iran's modern, centralized state there is compulsory registration of marriage and divorce and a resulting diminution of oral divorce. However, in Afghanistan, after two decades of war and the destruction of state institutions, the limited gains women had secured have almost totally evaporated. Thus oral divorce and, worse yet, lack of obligation on the part of the husband to ever communicate the divorce to the wife has seriously compromised women in Afghan society.

Although recent reforms in Iran have increased the possibility for women to obtain divorce if they can prove domestic abuse or severe addiction, the long and often costly procedure as well as the unwelcoming atmosphere discourages women from using these channels. They often, in effect, buy their divorce and occasionally the custody of their children by making their husband an offer. This kind of divorce is called khul' and traditionally women would give up their mahr, the gift that at marriage a husband pledges to give to his wife as a part of the marriage contract. As a counter strategy, increasingly husbands are demanding much more than the mahr, assuming they do not refuse the divorce outright. In some ethnic groups, such as the Pashtuns and Persians, a bride's family will tend to demand a more substantial although deferred mahr as a sort of marriage security for the bride. Among many other ethnic groups the mahr remains a small nominal sum and sometimes is paid to the father of the bride at the time of marriage. Nonetheless these culturally grounded strategies partially explain why women and their families in Afghanistan resisted attempts by the government in 1978 to limit the mahr to 300 Afghani (US$5 today), particularly since there were few other mechanisms in place to protect women against abuses by the husband and his family. Indeed, Iranian women launched a successful public campaign to bring about a law that allowed for the mahr to be reassessed at the time of payment by taking inflation into account. An earlier campaign had made it compulsory for men to pay wages for the housework that women had performed during the years of marriage before husbands could legally divorce their wives. An obstacle to realizing these options has been that many Afghan women and some Iranian women have no marriage certificate, or the certificate does not stipulate the mahr, thus limiting women's leverage.

A final plot for women has been to take advantage of the long-existing marriage contracts and to insert various useful clauses including an unconditional right of divorce. This strategy is rapidly becoming popular and is viewed by many women as the main vehicle to help them become more equal partners in their marriages. It could be argued that the above are cosmetic reforms that neither satisfy women's demands nor question the fundamentally unequal nature of divorce and custody laws. They nonetheless have increased many women's negotiating power in obtaining a divorce.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Centlivres-Demont, Afghan women in peace, war, and exile, in M. Weiner and A. Banuazizi (eds.), The politics of social transformation in Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 333-65.
- N. H. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women, in M. Shahrani and R. L. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan, Berkeley 1984, 306-40.
- H. Hoodfar (ed.), Shifting boundaries in marriage and divorce in Muslim communities, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, France 1996.
- , The women's movement in Iran. Women at the crossroad of secularization and Islamization, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Montpellier 1999.
- , Families on the move. Impact of forced migration on the role of Afghan women and family structure, in Hawwa. Journal of Women of the Middle East and the Islamic World 2:2 (2004), 142-71.
- M. H. Kamali, Law in Afghanistan. A study of the constitutions, matrimonial law and the judiciary, Leiden 1985.
- M. Kār, Sākhṭār-i ḥuqūq-i niẓām-i khānavādah dar Īrān, Tehran 1999.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Stretching the limits. A feminist reading of the Sharia in post-Khomeini Iran, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, U.K. 1996, 285-319.
- V. Moghadam, Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1993.

HOMA HOODFAR

South Asia

Across South Asia there are many commonalities regarding marriage and divorce as they affect women. These arise out of a common cultural familial kinship pattern in many parts of the region and the common historical experiences regarding the development of Muslim personal law. There have been divergences in the development of family law during the last 50 years in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh but on the whole the experiences of women regarding divorce are alike. This is because the expectations regarding gender roles in the society, the relation between wife-givers and wife-takers and the responsibilities incumbent on each with reference to marriage, especially the exchanges at marriage and even subsequently, remain similar in many parts of these countries. Variations exist due to class and region and the type of kinship system (matrilineal or patrilineal), which can make the experience of divorce and its aftermath different for different social groups.

Reliable information on the experiences of divorce is difficult to come by because of the few systematic empirical studies of the topic. Legal issues dominate the literature, and the work of social workers, non-governmental organizations, and others dealing with women's issues provides some information regarding women's experiences of the formal legal system. Studies reported in Ahmad (2003) show that there is considerable social stigma attached to divorce. Divorce is more frequent among families from the lower socioeconomic strata than among the middle and upper classes. The most commonly practiced procedure for divorce is the unilateral talāq, where the husband pronounces the divorce formula three times on the same occasion, thus making the divorce irrevocable and final. Though from the religious point of view this is considered reprehensible, not only is it legal, but it is also generally believed to be the proper procedure. Commonly cited reasons for divorce are the inability of the wife to have children, a second marriage of the husband, non-maintenance of the wife by the husband, or insufficient dowry provided by the wife's family.

In a situation where few women are economically independent, where there is a high rate of female illiteracy, and where divorce carries a stigma, only a small proportion of women are able to take advantage of the rights given under the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act of 1939, which is the operative law dealing with divorce initiated by women in Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan. The problem of having to prove the grounds for divorce, which may be compounded by the time lag between separating from the husband and filing the case, ignorance of the procedure involved in establishing proof (such as prior police complaints in the case of violence), the expense of litigation, and the uncertainty of the outcome, all make the court option a distant one for most women. The fact that a large number of cases do not reach completion in the courts points to the possibility that out of court settlements are reached. Case studies suggest that recourse to the court can be initiated as a pressure tactic to get the husband to grant a divorce, which he may be refusing to do in order to avoid paying the dues of mahr and maintenance that the court would require.

The imbalance in the law is compounded by social norms and practices that put women in an inferior position economically and socially. Marriage is practically universal, and is considered to be the foremost source of security for a woman. Cultural ideals, such as that "a woman should leave her husband's home only in a coffin," deter women from opting out of a marriage even if it is highly abusive. The unrestricted right of divorce means that the threat of divorce can be used as a means of controlling the behavior of the wife. The cultural norm that the wife's side does not take any initiative that could jeopardize the marriage means that women do not press for divorce, living in hope that their situation will change for the better. Since most women are not in a position where they can be financially and emotionally independent, major considerations for a woman if she wants to separate from her husband are to minimize the stigma that arises from accusations of being responsible for the divorce and to arrange for her own financial security. Often women prefer to remain separated from the husband, accepting polygamous marriages, violent marriages, or even non-support, rather than to press for divorce and its attendant insecurity. On the other hand, since the oral divorce allows for considerable misuse, for instance, leaving women uncertain as to their marital status, women are often forced to initiate divorce proceedings in order to clarify their marital situation, especially if there is a possibility of their remarriage. The uncertainty of marital status can have dangerous repercussions if, for instance, the wife who believes she has been divorced remarries and is then charged with adultery by the former husband, as has happened in Pakistan. A trend that has been reported with reference to cases registered in the Shari'a courts or with the local kazi (judge) is that there is an increase in cases of kbul' in recent years. This increase appears to indicate that women are being forced to purchase their freedom by agreeing to give up their right to mahr and maintenance, rather than that they are initiating divorce. The unequal relations between wife-givers and wife-takers is also illustrated in the dowry system, where gifts are expected to flow from the bride's family to the groom and his family. The mahr, which is a gift given by the husband to the wife in consideration of the marriage, and which could act as a security for the wife in case of divorce, thus does not fit into the cultural norm. More often than not the mahr is a token amount of Rs. 786, Rs. 555, or even as low as Rs. 50. In communities where the mahr is fixed at a high rate, often the assumption is that it is not actually to be paid. Though a high mahr is seen as a way of deterring divorce, in practice, a husband can succeed in making the wife agree to give up the mahr and sometimes even pay some amount in exchange for a divorce. Post divorce or even post separation, most women find themselves dependent on their natal families, along with their children.

The formal legal system, however, touches on the lives of only a fraction of the people in South Asia. Marriage and divorce are widely seen as belonging to the private sphere, over which the more appropriate authority is that of the family or community-based organizations (known in different regions by various names such as the biraderi, the jamaat council, jirga, panchayat). As pointed out by Shaheed (1998, 69) in Pakistan, where women's mobility is severely restricted, female illiteracy is rampant, and women's access to information about state laws or even practices elsewhere in the country is limited or absent, the operative practices of the community become the absolute standard. These community-based institutions are usually dominated by men who rarely have training in the legalities of divorce procedure or knowledge of the rights of women under the Sharī'a. Here too the wife or her family can find themselves at a disadvantage. Customary norms discourage women from taking the initiative to establish their case and thereby jeopardize the marriage, while the husband, through his personal contacts, may be able to establish his version of the situation over a long period before the final break is sought. Moreover, he can simply disregard a decision that does not suit him, as these institutions depend on moral rather than legal authority and cannot enforce their decisions other than through community-based sanctions, which are rarely brought into play for matters such as divorce. Though studies on the working of these institutions are not available, it is possible to see that the procedure for divorce and settlement of dues can involve long negotiations as each side uses the informal and formal resources available to them to establish their case and to avoid losing their position in the community, and sometimes takes advantage of the plural adjudication systems in the country.

Anthropological accounts give some idea of the variations in practices of separation and divorce especially where the formal legal system does not hold sway. Among the Gujar Bakarwals of Jammu and Kashmir, and the Meos of Rajasthan, it has been reported that men rarely divorce their wives. However, if a woman wants to leave her husband she may elope with another man. Among the Meos if the woman wants to marry another man, he must pay compensation (jhagra) to the first husband. Unless this amount is amicably settled, elopement can lead to serious feuds, which sometimes last for generations (Ahmad 1976).

In the matrilineal society of Lakshwadeep there is a minimum dislocation for a woman and her children in the event of divorce (Dube 1999). Women do not move to their husband's home after marriage. The husband in fact visits the wife. The children are brought up in the mother's household. The divorce rate is very high and both women and men reported multiple marriages. The formalities of the Sharī'a are followed in that the husband is pressurized to pronounce the ṭalāq formula. If a woman has to pay compensation to the husband to obtain the divorce, she can sometimes prevail upon her next prospective husband to pay the amount. There is little stigma attached to divorce.

A number of the problems described here have been controlled through marriage contracts that incorporate stipulations regarding women's right to divorce and other matters. This procedure was adopted as far back as a century ago (Caroll 1982), though today it is hardly used.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ahmad (ed.), Family, kinship and marriage among Muslims in India, Delhi 1976.
- , Divorce and remarriage among Muslims in India, Delhi 2003.
- N. Alam et al., Determinants of divorce in a traditional Muslim community in Bangladesh, in Demographic Research 3 (2000), <www.demographic-research.org/volumes/vol3/4/3-4.pdf>.
- L. Caroll, Talaq-i-tafwid and stipulations in a Muslim marriage contract. Important means of protecting the position of the South Asian Muslim wife, in Modern Asian Studies 16:2 (1982), 277–309.
- L. Dube, The meaning and content of marriage in a matrilineal Muslim community, in Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bombay, n.s. 74 (1999), 78–95.
- F. Shaheed et al. (eds.), Shaping women's lives. Laws, practices and strategies in Pakistan, Karachi 1998.

NASREEN FAZALBHOY

Western Europe

In Islam marriage is regarded as a civil contract between two adults, which entails an offer by one partner and acceptance by the other in the presence of two witnesses. The qādī, or official, usually solemnizes the marriage in a mosque, or court, or any other location. The marriage contract sets the defined rights and duties for each party. Because marriage is not a sacred union, divorce in Islam has always been permissible. Although the Qur'anic legislation (at least in theory) on divorce aims at protecting women and allowing them to free themselves from the marital bond if it becomes necessary, there is today a huge gap between divine principles and reality. In most Muslim countries female divorce is a controversial issue and women are seldom allowed to exercise their right without establishing strong evidence of mistreatment or male sexual impotency. This is primarily because the treatment of divorce, whether in the schools of law or in various modern rules and regulations, reflects patriarchal understanding of the Qurʾān and the sunna. For example, in all schools of law the right to end the marital tie rests exclusively in the hands of the husband, who has the power to repudiate his wife any time he wishes. In doing so, he needs neither grounds nor the consent of his wife. This kind of divorce is known as ṭalāq and it is the unilateral prerogative of the husband – no one else has the right to pronounce it. The ease with which ṭalāq takes place has led to abuse and misuse, and despite the fact that on many occasions Muḥammad condemned the arbitrary practice of it, the jurists were and are still generally unwilling to alter the status quo.

A woman can obtain a divorce only if her husband agrees to it. In this context, she can secure her release via a khulʿ agreement in which she pays her husband a sum of money (especially if she is the one who initiates the process) in return for her freedom, or through a so-called mutual agreement between the two parties to dissolve the marital bond with no payment on either side. The woman can also obtain a divorce if she stipulates in her marriage contract the right to do so. This form of divorce is known as delegated divorce: the husband agrees to delegate the right to divorce to his wife, or to someone else who acts as an agent to release her on his behalf (notice that the delegated divorce neither affects the husband's right to ṭalāq nor relieves the wife from going to court to effect the divorce).

If the wife fails to secure her husband's agreement, her only recourse is to apply for court intervention; this is called judicial divorce, in which the judge (subject to approval) can either compel the husband to pronounce ṭalāq or pronounces it on his behalf. The grounds upon which a wife can demand separation vary from one country to another depending on the school of law to be followed. In this context, the most restrictive is the Ḥanafī school, while the most liberal is the Mālikī school. Nevertheless, female divorce is limited even with convincing evidence of mistreatment. The actual legislation in most Muslim countries is rigid and the cultural setting is patriarchal; these combine to ensure that female divorce is a difficult and protracted process. If the woman does not have a very strong reason, she can easily be refused divorce and sent back home to an unwanted husband. This is in contrast to the Qurʾānic verse 2:29 and the ḥadīth, especially the ḥadīth about the wife of Thābit b. Qays, both of which offer clear and adequate legal basis to allow women to obtain a divorce relatively easily, even without powerful justification.

Divorce has been grossly abused. Indeed, in most cases, it has been deliberately used to suppress, control, and humiliate women. The same attitude can be found among Muslims living in Western Europe; for example, in the United Kingdom, tensions can easily arise in the area of divorce for Muslim women. When marriages break down women are often abandoned and find it difficult to get divorced. This is primarily because of strong pressure from the community to force women to stay within the marital bond at all costs. Very often, when a wife has problems with her husband, the general attitude of the community is to blame her and try and talk her into better behavior; if she asks for divorce, the tendency is to persuade her to be patient and considerate even in matters where the husband is guilty of transgressing the terms of the contract. If her husband (as happens in most cases) refuses to cooperate, she is faced with the difficult choice of having to seek judicial divorce. There are at least two problems associated with this: first, as Islamic law is not recognized in Europe, there is no recognized body at the national level that could act as a court or as a judge, leaving the wife at the mercy of the individual representative. Here, the Islamists disagree on who should assume the role of a judge: some say an imam, shaykh, or learned person could do the job, while others insist on an Islamic-educated scholar. Second, the form of Shariʿa applied in Europe among Muslims with regard to personal status law leaves little opportunity for women to obtain a divorce.

Muslims in the United Kingdom are predominantly South East Asians who are mainly followers of the Ḥanafī school of law, the most restrictive school in terms of women's issues in family law. This means that Muslim women here face an uphill struggle in their efforts to effect an "Islamic divorce." An Islamic Sharia Council was founded in London in the 1980s to deal with family issues, especially marital disputes, from the Islamic perspective. Its members, according to the council, are drawn from all over the United Kingdom and represent the five different schools of law; its main clients are women who are seeking divorce from reluctant husbands. Although the council claims to serve Muslims in the United Kingdom, with many branches in cities such as Birmingham, Manchester, Bradford, and Glasgow, it is by no means a nationally recognized body, at least among Muslims. In fact, a large number of Muslim people are not aware of its existence. It is primarily a self-constituted body, has no legal status and deals solely with Islamic divorce; civil marriages dissolved by the British courts and issues related to maintenance and child custody fall outside its purview. The council can claim success in some of the cases presented to it, but the fact remains that these are a tiny minority. Also, despite the fact that its decisions are binding, it has no legal base to enforce them if the husband decides not to cooperate. Its ability to handle divorce cases efficiently is called into question; at the moment there is only one secretary who manages the daily work of the council. The result is lack of communication, misinformation, and long delay; it is estimated that a resolution dispute could take up to three years.

When women fail to secure divorce via a Muslim mediator, very often they go to British courts to obtain civil divorce; this can be done if they have marriage status according to United Kingdom law. A number of Muslim women in Britain do not have marriage status, primarily because they did not marry according to United Kingdom law. As such, they are left in limbo at the mercy of their husbands who refuse to grant them ṭalāq. Once a woman petitions for divorce in a United Kingdom court, apart from some obstacles related to cost, ignorance of the Islamic Shari'a, and lack of faith-sensitive support during the crisis and after it is resolved, she is able to obtain a decree absolute, maintenance, and control and custody of the children. This is because the majority society as well as the British authorities tend to be sympathetic toward women in disputes concerning divorce and child custody. However, even after obtaining civil divorce, a Muslim woman is still not completely free to start a new life. This is because civil divorce is not recognized in Islamic law and therefore she is still technically not free to remarry. Here, the woman could easily be blackmailed into submission by a brutal husband; the price could be financial, or, much more importantly, child custody. In Islam, child custody rules are based on scholarly opinions and vary considerably from one school to another. These rules, in general, favor the father, especially if the mother decides to remarry after separation. In this context, the husband can strike a good deal in return for Islamic divorce, undermining the benefit she gains from the civil divorce regarding finance and child custody.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Carroll, Muslim women and Islamic divorce in England, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 17:1 (1997), 97–115.
- H. Jawad, The rights of women in Islam. An authentic approach, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hants. 1998, 71–82.
- , Historical and contemporary perspectives of Muslim women living in the West, in H. Jawad and T. Benn (eds.), Muslim women in the United Kingdom and beyond. Experiences and images, Leiden 2003, 1–17.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Marriage on trial. A study of Islamic family law. Iran and Morocco compared, London 1993, Marriage on trial. Islamic family law in Iran and Morocco, London 2000 (rev. ed.).
- A. S. Roald, Women in Islam. The Western experience, London 2001, 213–36.
- S. N. Shah-Kazemi, Untying the knot. Muslim women, divorce and the Sharia, London 2001.

HAIFAA JAWAD

Domestic Violence

Arab States

Domestic violence – acts of violence between two individuals who have had an intimate or a family relationship – encompasses physical, sexual, psychological, economic, and verbal aggression between men and women, brothers and sisters, parents and their children. According to the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, domestic abuse includes: “battering, sexual abuse of female children in the household, dowry-related violence, marital rape, female genital mutilation and other traditional practices harmful to women, non-spousal violence and violence related to exploitation” (Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights 1994). In Arab countries, occurrences of domestic violence may also comprise expelling wives from their marital homes, forced marriages, polygamy, and “honor killings” (also referred to as “femicide”).

Domestic violence is deeply rooted in societal norms, including gender roles and expectations, and codified in legal systems that privilege male authority over women in the domestic and public spheres. The 1995 Egyptian Demographic and Health Survey demonstrates the extent to which violence against women is socially sanctioned: in that study one out of every three married women was beaten, usually by her husband. Eighty-six percent of Egyptian women surveyed condoned violence under the following circumstances: wife refuses to have sex (69.9 percent), wife answers back (62 percent), wife talks to other men (64.2 percent), and wife burns food (27.2 percent). While those findings point to the pervasiveness of violence across social class, religious, ethnic, and regional divides, other research indicates that two factors contribute to women’s increased risk of domestic violence in the Arab world: early marriage and substantial difference in ages between spouses (LCRVAW 1998).

In a context of widespread social acceptance of domestic violence, women are often not aware of their rights being violated and reluctant to speak out against perpetrators because of the stigma attached and their fear of retribution. The absence of reliable data, the paucity of laws and policies that account for such violence and penalize its practices, and the poor training of medical providers and law enforcement agents to screen for violence all contribute to the hidden nature of domestic violence. In countries where laws do exist, there is often a lack of awareness of pertinent legislation and of where proper counsel can be found. Research furthermore underscores the influence of social pressure on women survivors of violence not to speak out against perpetrators. In addition, law enforcement agents may limit the ability of populations to exercise their rights under existing laws, especially abuse that results from sexual violence (Shalhoub-Kervorkian 2000).

The impact of domestic violence is widespread and includes negative effects on women, children, families, men, communities, and societies. The short-term health impacts for women include bruises and cuts, while long-term sequels can involve chronic disabilities, mental disorders, pervasive fear and depression, and unwanted pregnancies. The far-reaching repercussions of domestic violence, and the costs that it entails to individual women and to already over-extended health care systems, are demonstrated in a study in Alexandria, Egypt, that shows that domestic violence was the leading cause of injury to women, accounting for 28 percent of all visits to hospital trauma units (Graitcer and Youssef 1993).

Despite the prevalence, severity, and cost of domestic violence, the silence attributed to the social sanctioning of the practice has made it difficult for women’s and rights groups to research the problem, develop effective interventions, and advocate for legal and societal change. Measures are increasingly being taken, however, to raise public awareness, protect women, prevent crimes, and change the social norms that ignore or condone such violence. Strategies to address violence against women in the Arab states tend to be three-fold: to document and analyze the types, magnitude, and consequences of domestic violence; to assist individual women who suffer from violence; and to challenge societal norms, institutions, and legal frameworks that condone such practices (New Women’s Center for Research and Training 1994, Tunisian Association of Democratic Women 1995, Collectif 95 1999, LCRVAW 1998, Women’s Center For Legal Aid and Counseling 2001, Ait-Hamou 2003).

Consequently, research in several Arab countries highlights the prevalence of domestic violence, the strategies developed by women, the necessity of changing laws that condone aggression, and the importance of situating violence in the broader sociocultural and political context of the respective countries. Studies also underscore the need to develop cultural understanding of violence, and context-specific models of intervention. An additional area of investigation addresses the challenges that service providers and therapists face in their efforts not to doubly victimize women who speak out against violence and seek counsel (Shalhoub-Kervorkian 1999).

The interventions developed by women's and rights groups include: opening shelters to ensure women's safety while assisting them with legal counsel; establishing hotlines to provide support for women and assistance in obtaining child custody; finding employment; and locating a home. Groups have also organized human rights education training for law enforcement agents, journalists, health workers, lawyers, women's organizations, and individuals (Ait-Hamou 2003).

In the area of legal reform, activists in several countries have focused their efforts on abolishing one of the most repressive laws, which stipulates that rapists be acquitted of all criminal charges if they marry the woman or girl who was raped. In Egypt, this law was overturned in 1999. Other changes are sought for equal rights in matters of divorce, inheritance, custody, nationality, political representation, and respect for state obligations under international legislation.

Several regional initiatives have been created to support country-level activities. Created in 1996, the Arab Women's Court to Resist Violence Against Women comprises organizations across 11 Arab countries interested in raising awareness of discriminatory factors in existing personal status codes, and creating alternative texts that honor states' obligations to respect women's safety and equality under international laws. This followed the first public hearing on women's experiences with violence, organized in 1995 in Lebanon, which included women's live testimonies from 14 different Arab countries. More recently, an Arab regional resource center on violence against women was established in Jordan to serve as a clearing-house for related information and documentation across the Arab states and link women researchers and activists working in this area.

The awareness of the effects of violence against women across the Arab states has increased as demonstrated in the media coverage of this issue, and related research and interventions. Future activities could be strengthened if a wider range of civil society and government actors were to include violence against women as a focus of their work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ait-Hamou, Violence against women. The case of Algeria, paper presented at the Arab regional conference on Violence against Women, Cairo, 12-13 May 2003.
- Collectif 95 Maghreb Egalité, Les Maghrebines entre violences symboliques et violences physiques (Algérie, Maroc, Tunisie), Rabat, Morocco 1999.
- F. El-Zanaty et al., Egypt demographic and health survey, Cairo 1993.
- P. Graitcer and Z. Youssef, Inquiry in Egypt. An analysis of injuries as a health problem, Washington, D.C. 1993.
- LCRVAW (Lebanese Council to Resist Violence Against Women), Violence against women. A report based on a sample of 92 victims, November 1998, <http://www.lebanesewomen.org/cases.htm>.
- New Women's Center for Research and Training, Violence against women. A field study in preparation for the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing [in Arabic and English], Cairo 1995.
- Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Declaration on the elimination of violence against women, Geneva, General Assembly Resolution 48/104 of 20 December 1993.
- N. Shalhoub-Kervorkian, The politics of disclosing female sexual abuse. A case study of Palestinian society, in Child Abuse and Neglect 23:12 (1999), 1275-93.
- , Blocking her exclusion. A contextually sensitive model of intervention for handling female abuse, in Social Service Review 74:4 (2000), 620-34.
- Tunisian Association of Democratic Women, La violence à l'égard des femmes, Tunis 1995.
- Women's Center for Legal Aid and Counseling, Report on the status of Palestinian women based on the CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women) framework [in Arabic], 2001, <<http://www.wclac.org/publications1.html>>.

LEILA HESSINI

Canada

Domestic violence remains an issue of concern for Muslim women in Canada as it does for many women in societies worldwide. The specific character of domestic violence among Muslim communities in Canada is strongly shaped by the immigrant status of most members of the Muslim community and by the unique dynamics of the meeting of Islamic culture with Canadian society and culture. To understand the significance of these two features it is important first to review the key demographic characteristics of the Muslim minority community in Canada and to review the identity challenges that starkly face Canadian Muslim women.

DEMOGRAPHIC TRAITS

The 2001 census indicated that the Muslim population in Canada stood at 569,645, representing 2 percent of the Canadian population, rendering Islam the largest non-Christian religion in the country (Husaini 1999, 15–16). This represented a remarkable growth since 1970 when the Muslim population stood at only 33,370. By far the largest element in this growth is extensive immigration, which has been supplemented by relatively high rates of fertility and to some lesser degree by conversion.

The Canadian Muslim population is highly diverse and in many ways mirrors the Muslim world. Immigrants and refugees have come from virtually all parts of the Muslim world and from diaspora communities in the Caribbean, Africa, and Europe. The largest ethnoracial groups are South Asian (42.1 percent) and Arab (22.8 percent) in origin. In addition, large numbers of refugees have come in the last two decades from Iran, Afghanistan, and Somalia. Further adding to the mix is the presence of representatives from virtually all major doctrinal schools and offshoots of Islam including various strands of both the major Sunnī and Shīʿī groups. A variety of orientations to Islam are also notable in the Canadian Muslim population. Migrants positively disposed to traditional Islamic norms have come from many countries, alongside those who seem secular and indifferent, some of whom have fled political and cultural forms of Islamic expression.

Muslims in Canada are primarily resident in urban centers across the vast country. The largest concentration is to be found in the greater Toronto area where 254,110 Muslims lived in 2001. Toronto alone had 44 percent of the Canadian Muslim population. The significant concentration of Muslims in cities has resulted in many outward signs of Muslim religious and cultural life. In Montreal, and in particular in Toronto, mosques, Muslim religious schools and halal restaurants and food stores are now noticeable. Forms of traditional Muslim attire, especially the ḥijāb (headcover), are also now commonly observed.

The diversity of the Muslim community has contributed to a highly decentralized and uncoordinated structure of community involvement and representation. A number of national organizations exist, but most Muslims are undoubtedly more connected to their local mosques and community organizations. Among the more significant Muslim organizations for women is the Canadian Council of Muslim Women, a nationwide organization founded in 1982, which has been active in organizing conferences and seminars and fostering research and literature about Muslim women in Canada.

ISSUES OF IDENTITY

Literature concentrating specifically on Muslim women in Canada is just emerging. Recent contributions in this area have focused attention on the experience of Muslim women adapting to life in Canada (Hoodfar 2003, Khan 2002, McDonough 2003, Meshal 2003, Zaman 1999). These contributions emphasize that Muslim women are subject to competing prescriptions emerging from mainstream society and from Muslim communities. They demonstrate how identity is negotiated for a number of Muslim women in Canada in response to factors of normative Islamic teachings, gender, race, ethnicity, migration, and minority status, amidst the apparent polarity of Islam and the West. Diversity and variety is a common theme emerging from each of these contributions, as it is clear that Muslim women in Canada self identify in a vast number of complex ways. This diversity in self-identification is mirrored in the diversity of ways in which Muslim women live in Canada. Many Muslim women live in traditional role structures within the home while large numbers are involved in a number of activities outside the home. While the majority of Muslim women in Canada do not wear ḥijāb an increasing number are doing so (Meshal 2003). Observance of the ḥijāb has been cited as a key factor in discrimination and harassment of Muslim women seeking employment (Persad 2002).

ISSUES OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Mainstream Canadian media frequently focus attention on the presence in some Muslim societies of specific forms of domestic violence often associated with Muslim culture including, most significantly, forced marriage, honor crimes, and female genital mutilation. However, unlike well-publicized situations in Muslim communities in Europe and the United States, no concrete examples of these types of domestic violence occurring in Canada have arisen in scholarly or popular media reports.

Arranged or semi-arranged marriages remain the norm in most immigrant Muslim families, in both first and second generations, but no issues of compulsion have generally been raised (Hogben 1991, Qureshi 1991). Undoubtedly the social and sexual activity of most Muslim women remains significantly constrained relative to norms in mainstream Canadian society, but indications of honor-based violence directed at women for violating religious and cultural norms have been isolated (Hogben 1991). The Ontario Human Rights Commission produced a policy paper regarding female genital mutilation (OHRC 1996). This paper indicated that the policy was developed in response to suggestions from key community contacts that female genital mutilation was found among some immigrant communities in Canada. Again, no concrete incidents were cited to illustrate this. It is possible that these practices exist to some degree in pockets of the Muslim community coming from parts of Africa where the practice remains common, but to say anything more than this would be largely speculative.

Spousal abuse is a more clearly established form of domestic violence of concern for Muslim women in Canada. Research and literature about, and community response to, spousal abuse in the Muslim community has developed more than that on any other area of domestic violence. Major Canadian surveys of violence against women have found that some form of spousal abuse is common throughout Canadian society, but these surveys have not produced religious or ethnic community level specification (Johnson 2002). It is notable that research and literature on spousal abuse lumps Muslim women with national or ethnic groupings intersecting with the Muslim community (South Asian, Arab, Somali, and so forth) or with immigrant and refugee women in general (Bannerji 2002, Papp 1990, Moussa 2002, Schmidt 2000). Only Azmi's qualitative studies on wife abuse and the welfare response to it in the Muslim community in Toronto have focused attention on wife abuse specifically in the Muslim community (1996, 1999).

It is not clear from the literature to what degree Muslim women face spousal abuse in Canada. No quantitative data exist that compare the presence of spousal abuse found in countries of origin with its presence in Canada, nor do quantitative data exist to compare the presence of this form of domestic violence with its presence in other communities in Canada. At the very least it is clear that spousal abuse of various types and degrees exists in Muslim communities and that it is a recognized issue of concern within both the Muslim community and mainstream institutions.

Clearly the experience of spousal abuse among Muslim women is similar in many regards to that of spousal abuse in other mainly immigrant communities. Many immigrant Muslim women, like other immigrant women, are particularly isolated and vulnerable. Language barriers significantly impede their awareness of Canadian legal and social norms. They often lack extended family and community support networks, and are often economically dependent on their spouses. This situation is further complicated in situations where women have been sponsored for immigration by their spouses and for whom fear and threat of deportation is at least a perceived concern.

Also like other immigrant women, many Muslim women face serious issues of shame and denial. The role of wife and mother is a comparatively significant one in the cultural and religious understanding of many immigrant women and especially so for Muslim women. The threat of marital and family breakdown is particularly difficult to accept and as a result many Muslim women are often reluctant to report abuse unless it becomes particularly severe.

Along with immigration status issues, the experience of domestic violence for Muslim women in Canada has been heavily influenced by a pervasive and ongoing competition between normative Islamic and mainstream Canadian ideological and cultural outlooks. These competing ideological perspectives lead to varying visions of the nature of spousal abuse and appropriate welfare responses to them. Muslim religious community initiatives in responding to wife abuse tend to view spousal abuse as a product of religious and spiritual decline and put considerable emphasis on the provision of religious and spiritual counseling for both spouses, and on the preservation of the family as a major goal alongside issues of the safety of abused women. In contrast, mainstream providers of services for abused women tend to focus on unequal gender relationships as the primary cause of spousal abuse and emphasize the safety of abused women as the sole and overriding goal (Azmi 1996, Valiante 1992).

Mistrust of the mainstream society's initiatives responding to spousal abuse has led religious sectors of the Muslim community to develop alternative services that are perceived to better conform to religious norms. In Greater Toronto, where the Muslim community in Canada has experienced its most significant institutional development, a number of services parallel to mainstream ones have been developed by religious institutions and organizations. Most significant in this regard was the establishment in 1996 in Greater Toronto of the Muslim Welfare Home for Needy Women and Children. This 27-bed shelter was the first of its kind in Canada to provide shelter for women fleeing abusive relationships. The shelter is open to all women regardless of religious affiliation but reflects the need of the Muslim community to provide shelter inspired by religious values.

The immigrant experience and the meeting of Islamic religious perspectives with those of mainstream secular Canada are two significant factors that have shaped the experience of Muslim community life in Canada. These two factors have been, and will likely continue to be, major factors influencing issues of domestic violence in the Muslim community in Canada for decades to come.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Azmi, Perceptions of the welfare response to wife abuse in the Muslim community of metropolitan Toronto, Ph.D. diss., University of Toronto 1996.
- , Wife abuse and ideological competition in the Muslim community of Toronto, in H. Troper and M. Weinfeld (eds.), Ethnicity, politics, and public policy. Case studies in Canadian diversity, Toronto 1999, 164–89.
- H. Bannerji, A question of silence. Reflections on violence against women in communities of colour, in K. McKenna and J. Larkin (eds.), Violence against women. New Canadian perspectives, Toronto 2002, 353–70.
- W. M. Hogben, Marriage and divorce among Muslims in Canada, in E. H. Waugh, S. M. Abu-Laban, and R. B. Qureshi, Muslim families in North America, Edmonton 1991, 154–84.
- H. Hoodfar, More than clothing. Veiling as an adaptive strategy, in S. S. Alvi, H. Hoodfar, and S. McDonough (eds.), The Muslim veil in North America. Issues and debates, Toronto 2003, 3–40.
- Z. Husaini, Historical background, in S. Zaman (ed.), At my mother's feet. Stories of Muslim women, Kingston, Ont. 1999, 13–19.
- H. Johnson, Methods of measurement, in K. McKenna and J. Larkin (eds.), Violence against women. New Canadian perspectives, Toronto 2002, 21–54.
- S. Khan, Aversion and desire. Negotiating Muslim female identity in the diaspora, Toronto 2002.
- S. McDonough, Voice of Muslim women in S. S. Alvi, H. Hoodfar, and S. McDonough (eds.), The Muslim veil in North America. Issues and debates, Toronto 2003, 105–20.
- R. Meshal, Banners of faith and identities in construct. The hijab in Canada, in S. S. Alvi, H. Hoodfar, and S. McDonough (eds.), The Muslim veil in North America. Issues and debates, Toronto 2003, 72–105.
- H. Moussa, Violence against refugee women. Gender oppression, Canadian policy, and the international struggle for human rights, in K. McKenna and J. Larkin (eds.), Violence against women. New Canadian perspectives, Toronto 2002, 371–402.
- Ontario Human Rights Commission, Policy on female genital mutilation (FGM), Toronto 1996.
- A. Papp, Report on abused South Asian women in Scarborough, Toronto 1990.
- J. Persad, No hijab is permitted here, Toronto 2002.
- R. B. Qureshi, Marriage strategies among Muslims from South Asia, in E. H. Waugh, S. M. Abu-Laban, and R. B. Qureshi, Muslim families in North America, Edmonton, Ont. 1991, 185–212.
- S. Schmidt, Why does wife abuse occur in Somali refugee families settling in Canada when it rarely occurs in Somalia?, essay, New College, University of Toronto 2000.
- W. Valiante, Domestic violence and the South Asian family. Treatment and research issues, unpublished manuscript, Toronto 1992.
- S. Zaman (ed.), At my mother's feet. Stories of Muslim women, Kingston, Ont. 1999.

The Caucasus

Domestic violence, a taboo subject in Caucasian culture, is deeply embedded in traditions of family privacy and autonomy. As it is a matter of private concern, the culture does not permit the society at large either to discuss or adjudicate violence within the family. It differs from other forms of violence in that it occurs in an enclosed space.

Historically, family autonomy evolved as an institution for survival and protection. In Caucasian culture the family consists of the immediate nuclear family and a wide circle of relatives. But acquaintances may also take part in resolving family problems. The expression, “My family is my business alone,” expresses the exclusion of the state and legal institutions, and there is no legal definition of domestic violence.

The mechanisms of domestic violence rest on the fact that in the family the males control the resources and therefore women are subservient to them. In the extended family the greatest conflicts occur between pairs: wife and husband, daughter-in-law and mother-in-law, and son-in-law and mother-in-law. The role of violator and victim changes according to region and ethnicity, although the traditional perception is that it is mainly the wife and mother-in-law who instigate conflict. The exception is the mother who is the idealized icon.

Young people do not see domestic violence as an acute problem. Not particularly concerned with the internal family dynamics of domestic violence, they see only external causes and suggest only external solutions: adopt laws, improve economic and living conditions, and make violence a problem for open discussion in the public arena. Although domestic violence is influenced by education, inequality of family income, social environment, and attitudes, adults give priority to internal family relations: mutual understanding between spouses, children, and extended family. An absolute majority of the victims of violence suffer the consequences of economic power over them and the absence of protective institutions. According to research by Pkhakadze (2002), female victims of domestic violence do not report it for the following reasons: shame in the face of public exposure (32 percent); fear that it will give the family a bad reputation (10 percent); conviction that revelation will have no effect (29 percent); and fear of divorce and losing children (6 percent). Five percent of women think that domestic violence is normal and 20 percent fear being beaten for revealing domestic violence. As long as the attitude toward domestic violence confines it to the privacy of the family, there can be no meaningful social discussion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. M. Alikhanov-Avarski In the mountains of Daghestan. Travel impressions and stories of the Caucasus [in Russian], St. Petersburg 1985, 1–339, 1986, 55–337.
- A. G. Bulatova, Traditional winter games and entertainment in the mountains of Daghestan, in A. Alibov (ed.), Problems of social life among the peoples of Daghestan in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries [in Russian], Makhachkala 1987.
- A. Dubrovnik, Cherks [in Russian], Nalchik 1991.
- S. S. Gajiev, Family and marriage among the peoples of Daghestan, from the nineteenth to the beginning of the twentieth centuries [in Russian], Moscow 1985.
- U. U. Karpov, Notes on traditional social life. Materials of ethnographic field research [in Russian], St. Petersburg 1996³.
- , The place of women among the peoples of the Caucasus [in Russian], St. Petersburg 2001.
- M. Kuchukhidze, Family violence [in Georgian], Tbilisi 2000.
- M. C. Kudaev, Wedding rites [in Russian], Nalchik 1988.
- G. Nizharadze, Woman and conflict, in G. Kutsishvili (ed.), Alternatives to conflict [in Georgian], Tbilisi 1999, 3–4.
- P. Pkhakadze, Family violence [in Georgian], Tbilisi 2002.
- L. Surmanizde, Attitudes toward gender violence [in Georgian], Tbilisi 2000.
- G. Tevdoradze, Five years in Pshavi and Khevsureti [in Georgian], Tbilisi 1941.

FERIDE ZURIKASHVILI

Central Asia

By tradition in the Central Asian region boys are regarded as the bearers of the family line, while girls are temporary members of the family and the community. Thus boys and girls have a different social status and are educated in different ways. As research has demonstrated (Karasaeva 1996), the second-class status of women is fixed in the social consciousness, characterized by scorn for women that begins even before they are born. The result of research conducted by the OSCE (Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe) in Uzbekistan (Tashkent and Tashkent Province) demonstrates that the majority of women are second-class members of the family and are inferior to every other family member (husband, mother-in-law, father, mother, brothers).

This is observed in every stratum of society. Custom and prejudice take precedence over law and the norms of human rights when it comes to the position of women in the family. According to tradition the woman is alienated from her basic rights of choice and freedom in her life. Research shows the following: 52 percent of women do not have the right to choose their husband; 82 percent of women have no voice in family decisions; 64 percent of women have no access to the family income; and 60 percent of women are deprived of the right to express their opinions on family problems. As a result, by custom 98 percent of women experience deprivation of their rights; 43 percent of women cannot independently decide on family planning issues; and childlessness serves as a reason for divorce of 54 percent of women. The patriarchal custom of bride theft, with few exceptions, is met with complete social acceptance and in reality hides the rape of young women, forcing them to reproduce. “The husband must be on a higher level than his wife,” admonishes a well-known Muslim aphorism. These conditions form the basic rules for choosing mates in adult life (personal and business). This is the basis for the unjust distribution of rights and obligations in the family, and for the discrimination against women in the family. Frequently, this discrimination takes the form of domestic violence.

The most widespread form of violence in the culture is domestic violence, both the actual act and the threat of the act, which afflicts and damages women, physically, psychologically, economically, and morally. In six months in 1999 there were 2,497 incidents of domestic abuse in families; this is more than 33 percent of the total number of criminal acts. Acts of violence perpetrated on women composed 30 percent of the general number of murders (81 women were killed), 77 percent of suicides, 44 percent of cases of deliberate infliction of harm to health, 60 percent of beatings, and 21 percent of all threats of violence (CEDAW 2000, 27).

The statistical data on domestic violence from crisis centers – Shanse, Sezim, and the Umud shelter in the city of Bishkek (Kyrgyzstan) – corroborate the statistics of the ministry of internal affairs of the Kyrgyz Republic. In the course of three years of work with more than 9,000 women and girls in these establishments, 37 percent experienced physical force in the family, 23 percent psychological force, and 7 percent sexual abuse (Tugelbayeva 2001, 34).

The official attitude toward domestic violence differs from one republic to another in Central Asia. The governments of Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan publicly discuss the problems of domestic violence and struggle against its negative consequences. In Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan public discussion of these topics is forbidden. Indeed, in these republics domestic violence has a quasi-legal status. The facts of domestic violence are either hidden or discussed as isolated cases. The term “domestic violence” is not used in juridical practice. “Not a single case of family violence that we investigated ever reached the courts, therefore one cannot speak definitively about the relationship of the legal establishment to these matters. Attorneys, judges, and the militia consistently gave us to understand that the majority of cases of family violence, even in the presence of the police, never get to the courts” (Interview, Human Rights Watch, 8 June 2000). These are the words of one of the judges: “Even when a victim is criminally treated, such cases are normally hidden from the very beginning” (Interview, Human Rights Watch 22 May 2000, Human Rights Watch 2001).

Most important is that the great majority of women and girls who experience domestic violence consider this to be an integral element of family relations. For them it is a structural part of the overarching patriarchal legacy, supported by countless tenacious traditions and customs. It is precisely the patriarchal culture that preserves violence toward women as a system of exacting obedience and eliciting terror; it is like a virus that reproduces itself from generation to generation. Only a profound reformation of social and cultural norms will change this state of affairs, which is validated by the attitudes of centuries (Tugelbayeva 2001, 21).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- CEDAW, National report, Republic of Kazakhstan, 2000, <<http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/cedaw/reports.htm#k>>.
- Human Rights Watch 13:4(D) (June 2001), Uzbekistan.
- A. Kadirova, The discriminatory influence of certain customs and prejudices on the position of women in the family [in Russian and Uzbek]. Proceedings of the conference on Overcoming of gender stereotypes, OSCE (Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe), 18–19 September 2001, Tashkent.
- A. K. Karasaev, The Kyrgyz community. The tradition of violence against women [in Russian], Bishkek 1996.
- L. Sadikova (ed.), The rights of women in Kyrgyzstan. Muslim tradition, Islamic values, and contemporary law [in Russian and Kyrgyz], Bishkek 2001.
- B. Tugelbayeva (ed.), Violence against women. Prevention and struggle against the consequences [in Russian and Kyrgyz], Bishkek 2001.

MARFUA TOKHTAKHODJAEVA AND ALMAZ KADIROVA

Iran and Afghanistan

In this entry the phrase domestic violence is used to describe a variety of actions and omissions that occur in different family relationships. These include incidents of physical attack and/or psychological or mental violence (Davis 1994, Martin 1979, Viano 1992).

As far as Iran and Afghanistan are concerned, literature on the subject is scarce and field studies very recent in Iran and practically non-existent in Afghanistan. There exist no statistics or articles written solely about domestic violence against women in Afghanistan, possibly due to the socio-political upheavals of the past two decades. Only anecdotal evidence is found, from the mass media and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), that incidences of domestic violence have increased as a result of the war, displacement, and poverty.

Broadly speaking, two related gender issues affect the problem of domestic violence in both countries: one is attitudinal and based on norms and values; the other relates to legal doctrines and the Shari‘a.

PATRIARCHAL NORMS AND VALUES

Patriarchal values and a family system based on male supremacy, hierarchy, and obedience to the oldest male are prevalent (Nassehi-Behnam, 1985). Children socialized at home and in educational institutions that reflect a discriminatory image of women (Mohceni 1978, Taleghani 1994) learn to accept the practice and transfer of archaic gender roles and thus maintain patriarchal norms and attitudes. The consequences of this can be observed in different spheres of female life: a higher female child mortality due to discriminatory attitude of mothers toward food distribution (Nassehi 1996); the existence of a wide gap in the literacy rates of men and women (Aghajanian 2000); and the early marriage of girls when financial resources are limited.

ISLAMIC LAW

Because of the existence of religious and legal doctrines inspired by Shari‘a, the Iranian and Afghan civil codes concerning marriage, divorce, child custody, pension (nafaqa), family residence, right of citizenship, guardianship, and inheritance place women in a highly disadvantageous position in the social order (Behnam 1990).

In dominant interpretations of Islamic law, the right of punishment is reserved solely to men. But beating a woman is not recommended. Nevertheless in the mentality of certain men, religious as well as secular, an “untamed” woman must be trained. The response of clerics to a question on domestic violence is: “Islam does not recommend men to beat their wives, nevertheless, if a wife is not compliant (nāshiza), they are authorized to beat her. A woman is called ‘untamed’ if she refuses to satisfy the desires of her husband (tamkin). Husband’s sexual satisfaction being part of tamkin, the rape of a wife cannot be considered as an assault! Thereafter, punishing her becomes a right for men” (Ardalan and Khaksar 1994). Even in the realm of crime the supremacy of men is blatant. According to Islamic criminal law (qisās), a woman’s life is equal to half that of a man, a situation that often results in the male escaping punishment after committing a crime.

Although the Iranian government joined the UN Convention on Children’s Rights in 1993 and the parliament adopted a resolution proposed by activist women (September 2000) to raise the legal maturity age from 9 to 15 for girls and from 15 to 17 for boys, the problem remains unsolved. The Guardian Council rejected the resolution on grounds of incompatibility with Islamic law (Kian 2002). Nevertheless, bargains are being made, but the situation remains inconclusive. Young children can be married off as long as the father, grandfather, or guardian allow it (Kar 2000). The child must obey and respect his parents (article 1177) and parents have the right to punish and beat him if necessary (article 1179). Qisās thus gives the father the right to treat the child the way he deems fitting, even as far as killing the child; if a father kills his child, the act is not punishable by law (article 220) (Ebadi 1999). Given the legal abuses, it becomes difficult to define violence and punishment in such cultures.

WOMEN

According to the content analysis of a Persian daily newspaper (Īrān) during 1995 (Nassehi-Behnam 1999, 135), women were the usual victims of violence in the home and men the habitual perpetrators (85 percent men, 15 percent women). In most of the cases men acted violently toward women whereas women’s aggressiveness was self-inflicted (attempted or successful suicide). Forty percent of reported domestic violence incidents resulted in the death of the victim, 2.5 percent in suicide, 3.5 in attempted homicide, and the rest in disputes and assaults that were taken to court.

Victims of male aggression are mostly wives, children, wife’s parents, and siblings. Men often consider their parents-in-law responsible for their wife’s behavior. Female violence is scarce and often involves threatening men (suicide attempt and self-burning) rather than injuring another person. But among women who attempted self-burning many have lost their lives (Moghissi 1994). Two cases of female homicides (a co-wife and the child of a co-wife) show, contrary to what some Muslims pretend, how intolerable a polygamous marriage may become to the first wife.

A documented study of violence (Kār 2001) concludes that violence against women is a partially hidden phenomenon because Iranian women have traditionally learned to tolerate and accept male violence and avoid reporting incidents of abuse. Legal organizations do not help the dissemination of data concerning domestic violence. That is the reason why statistics do not reflect the gravity of the situation of women’s lives. Kār mentions the negative consequences of divorce in Persian culture, such as gender inequality in child custody and the lack of safeguards (economic and effective) for divorcees, as the main reasons for such subordination. A survey on divorcees in Tehran confirms the absence of any protection systems for these women, who are considered deviants in traditional societies (Nassehi 1980).

A survey of battered women in Tehran (E’zazi 2001) reveals that in 53 percent of the cases, violence against women is practiced at home and the rest in public places. A considerable number of the women interviewed did not know why they were beaten. Among respondents only 7 percent reacted to light physical attacks. Most women said they tolerated their husbands’ violence to avoid being divorced, since they thought their husband’s aggression was to make them ask for a divorce without the benefit of their bride-price (mahr). Others accept men’s brutality as part of normal male behavior. Sixty-three percent were forced into marriage or went through arranged marriages. A considerable number of marriages were heterogamous. The reasons battered women gave for domestic violence are: jealousy, family disputes resulting from interference by in-laws or visits of wife’s family members, financial problems, and alcohol or drug addiction.

Statistics from a report on people who consulted the Iranian Legal Medical Office during a period of 30 months (Kohani 2001), indicate that among approximately 2.5 million plaintiffs, more than half reported quarrels, and 24.5 percent of these were battered women. Of this number, 9 percent wanted to officially record their complaints for future decisions (osr va haraj), 31 percent to obtain a divorce, and 60 percent just to scare their aggressors and prevent future attacks.

An RDS report (2000) on the situation of Afghani women says: “the Human Rights situation for women was extremely poor . . . As lawless fighting continued in some areas, violence against women occurred frequently, including beatings, rapes, forced marriages, disappearances, kidnappings and killings. Such incidents generally went unreported, and most information was anecdotal . . . Prostitution and beggary are the only options especially for widows to survive and feed their children.” The Human Rights Watch report of September 2002 on West Afghanistan confirms these allegations through testimonies.

CHILDREN

A study of violence toward children in three child dispensaries in Tehran shows that among 3,019 children (1,578 boys and 1,441 girls) who were brought to these dispensaries, 367 (12.2 percent) were abused. The percentage of boys who were physically assaulted was 14.5, and of girls 9.6. Child abuse was mostly due to plurality of children (large family), drug addiction, and stress. Among abusers, 34.1 percent had themselves been victims of violence during their childhood and 26.4 percent had prior abuse cases. According to the conclusion of this study, there is a positive correlation between physical assault and age, sex, place of residence, marital status, and history of violence in the family.

A Persian film called Homework, based on research on violence toward children, reflects the oppression that parents inflict upon their children at home.

A survey conducted by the UNHCR (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees) in Afghanistan (1997) estimated the number of street children in Kabul at 28,000, of whom 20 percent were girls. Children as young as five years of age are forced to go out and earn a living for their disabled parents or young sisters.

CONCLUSION

What is presented here is but a vague estimation of what happens in Iran and Afghanistan. Scientific, long-term investigations must be carried out to obtain the true picture of domestic violence in these countries. Nevertheless, it is certain that, especially in Iran, both governmental organizations (such as police departments and the ministry of hygiene, healing and medical training) and NGOs (such as the Institute for Women's Studies and Research) have become conscious of the gravity of the situation and try not only to prevent domestic violence but also to protect the victims (Kār 1996). To improve the situation however, it is imperative that the judicial system be revised in these countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Aghajanian, The status of women and female children in Iran, in M. Afkhami (ed.), In the eye of the storm, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 44–61.
 Ardalan and Khaksaz, Ta hāla shodah hamsaritan rā bazanid?, in Zanān (Tehran) 18 (June–July 1994), 6–19.
 V. Behnam, Zan, khānuvāda va tajadud, in Iran nameh (Bethesda, Md.) 11:2 (1990), 241.

- M. Davies, Women and violence, London 1994, 1.
 S. Ebadi, Atfāl va khushūnat, in V. Nassehi-Behnam (ed.), Violence and family, Nimeye Digar 2:5, (1999), 72–81.
 S. Ezazi, Khushūnat-i khānuvādagi. Zanān-i kutak kburda, Tehran 2001.
Homework, a Persian film by A. Kiarostami, based on research by Sholeh Dolatabadi, 1987.
 M. Kār, Aya hanuz ham zarurāt-i ta'asis-e khaṇah-yi amn ihsās nāmāshavad, in Zanan 29 (1996), 2–3.
 —, Barisiy-i khushūnat 'alayh-i zanān dar huquq-i inqilābiy-i Irān, in V. Nassehi-Behnam (ed.), Violence and family, Nimeye Digar 2:5 (1999), 55–71.
 —, Pizhūhishī darbārah-i khushūnat 'alayh-i zanān dar Irān, Tehran 2000, 145.
 A. Kian, Les familles iraniennes entre Islam, état et famille, Paris 2002, 103.
 M. D. Kohani, Paper presented to the Seminar on Violence and Family and reported in a special issue (Vezeḥ nameh) published by the University of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation Sciences, Tehran, November 2001, 19.
 J. P. Martin, Some reflections on violence and the family, in J. P. Martin (ed.), Violence and the family, New York 1978, 346–59.
 H. Moghissi, Huquq-i zan va bunbasthāy-i farhanki-i 'ijtimāy-i jumhurīy-i islām, in Chashm Andāz (Paris) 13 (Spring 1994), 42–53.
 N. Mohceni, Taṣvīr va naqsh-i zan va mard dar kitābhāy-i darsīy-i kudakān, Tehran 1978.
 G. Nassehi, Situation analysis of women and children in the Islamic Republic of Iran, UNICEF limited publication, March 1992, rev. 1996, 60.
 V. Nassehi-Behnam, Change and the Iranian family, in Current Anthropology 26:5 (December 1985), 557–62.
 —, Khushūnat dar khānavāda va bāztāb-i ān dar matbū'at-i Irān, in V. Nassehi-Behnam (ed.), Violence and family, Nimeye Digar 2:5 (1999), 135.
 V. Nassehi-Behnam et al., The study of the situation of divorcees in Tehran [in Persian], Tehran 1980.
 RDS, Contemporary women's issues. Based on country reports (Afghanistan) on human rights practices for 2000, <<http://rdsweb2.rdsinc.com>>.
 A. A. Sayyari et al., Barisiy-i kudakāzari jasmāni dar murāja'n-i sah darmānkāh-i takhasusīy-i darujān kudakān dar shahrīstān-i Tihrān, in Rehabilitation Science Quarterly 6/7 (Fall 2001), 7–13.
 M. Taleghani et al., Portrayal of women in primary school textbooks before and after the Revolution, UNESCO 1994.
 E. C. Viano, Violence among intimates. Major issues and approaches, in E. C. Viano (ed.), Intimate violence. Interdisciplinary perspectives, Washington, D.C. 1992, 3–12.

VIDA NASSEHI-BEHNAM

Israel

Domestic violence, a subset of gender violence, refers to family-based sexual abuse, battering of women, and “honor killings.” Researchers and activists point to intergenerational transmission of violence, political and economic hardship, gendered structural inequality, and/or patriarchal proprietary objectification of women as keys to domestic violence.

The location of Muslims within Israeli society helps to contextualize this complex phenomenon. Between 1948 and 1966, Palestinian Arab citizens (including Muslims, Christians, and Druze) were regulated under a military administration. Muslims constitute a majority of the non-Jewish Palestinian Arab national minority, with 1.7 million persons making up 16 percent of the Israeli population within the Green Line, but including East Jerusalem. Most Muslims live in Arab towns of fewer than 20,000 residents. Larger towns range in size from Taibeh (30,000), to Umm el-Fahm (38,000), and Nazareth (41,500), where confidentiality in social services and policing is often compromised. Muslims in Israel are amongst the youngest and least educated of the population, and also experience the highest levels of unemployment and poverty (especially Beduin living in the Negev). Socioeconomic marginalization, compounded by weak representation in local and national politics, intensifies battered women's entrapment. Palestinian feminists also argue that such second-class citizenship within a militarized society inspires critiques of political violence but creates silences about gender violence.

In this family-centered society, national tensions link marriage and motherhood to Palestinian identity. Marriage and motherhood enforce national and religious autonomy, evidenced, for example, in the exclusive jurisdiction of male qādis in Shari'a courts (which are exempt from Israeli legislation on women's equality) over marriage and divorce, and the five-year struggle, won in 2001 by the Coalition for Equality in Personal Status Laws, to amend the Family Courts Law (1995), to open civil courts to Muslims to determine maintenance and child custody. Muslim men who batter rely on the state's lax enforcement of the 1959 anti-polygyny law and the legal prohibition against forced divorce, whereby a husband unilaterally pronounces his wife divorced, a tenet of Islamic divorce law. Threats of unilateral divorce enforce subordination and quell battered women's resistance, especially for Muslim women who, for economic reasons, fear of abandonment, family rejection, and the loss of social status or child custody, wish to stay married. Indeed, marriage rates are high and divorce rates lowest within the Muslim community, where living alone as a single or divorced woman is relatively rare. Muslim women marry on average at 21.5 years of age and have the highest number of children, when compared to Druze, Christian, and Jewish Israelis.

It was Jewish feminist activists who established the first battered women's shelter in 1977 in an Arab neighborhood in the city of Haifa. However, not until the 1990s did Arab and Jewish women, based in non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and public agencies, successfully transform violence against women from a personal harm into a social problem and firmly establish violence against women or family violence in the Israeli lexicon. As part of the global anti-gender violence movement, women organized centers for victims of sexual violence, opened hotlines and shelters, called for alternatives to violent and controlling forms of masculinity, and demanded legal changes and funding for victim services. Muslim women won limited recognition of their unique living conditions and related needs. In 1991, legislators gave victims access to restraining orders, although this option has limited utility for the majority of Muslim women who live adjacent to their husband's family. The first and only Israeli shelter staffed by and for Arabs was founded by Palestinian activists in 1993. Public monies partially support these and other shelters and regional prevention centers, but few are located in majority Muslim locales. Additionally, limited Arabic language materials on gender violence exist.

Israeli police estimate one out of every five married women is physically battered; the ministry of labor suggests one in four men chronically use physical violence against wives and children. Drawing on research among Palestinians that indicates similar prevalence rates, Aida Touma-Suliman, director of the Nazareth-based NGO Women Against Violence (WAV), estimates that one in four Palestinians in Israel beat their wives at least once a year. Approximately one in five engaged women report their partner's use of physical aggression against them. Taken together, the pervasive nature of domestic violence, the tendency to consider it a family issue, and men's justification of wife beating contributes to the normalization of physical violence and other behaviors intended to intimidate and control women. In concert with allied organizations, such as Kayan and Al Siwar, members of WAV work to end the familial ideology of privacy that upholds violence against married and unmarried women, and so-called "honor killings," where male relatives execute and thus punish a woman for breaking gender codes of comportment and mobility. Overall, about one third of victims of family-based threats and violence who seek support report the abuse to the police. In 2001, the police documented over 22,000 new cases of domestic violence in the population at large, yet representatives of law enforcement and the judiciary often dismiss violence against Muslim women as "cultural" and intervene in ways that at times ultimately endangers those seeking protection.

Palestinian women in Israel, working together and at times in coalition with Jewish Israeli feminists and/or members of the anti-occupation peace movement, continue to call for gender equality within a national framework, in order to make violence against women in all its forms unacceptable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- M. Bassok, Census. One quarter of Israel's children are Muslims, 2 February 2004, <www.haaretzdaily.com>.
 M. Freedman, Exile in the promised land. A memoir, Ithaca, N.Y. 1990.
 Israel, Central Bureau of Statistics, Statistical abstract of Israel, no. 49 [in Hebrew], Tel Aviv 1998.
 E. Konur, State funding for organizations that serve victims of violence against women 1990–2000, Adva Center, Tel Aviv March 2000, <http://www.adva.org/violence1999.html>.
 Sikkuy, The Sikkuy report 2001–2002. Monitoring civic equality between Arab and Jewish citizens of Israel, Jerusalem 2002.
 Working Group on the Status of Palestinian Women in Israel, The status of Palestinian women citizens of Israel, NGO parallel report submitted to CEDAW July 1997.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Adelman, No way out. Divorce-related domestic violence in Israel, in Violence Against Women 6:11 (2000), 1223–54.
 —, The military, militarism, and the militarization of domestic violence, in Violence Against Women 9:9 (2003), 1118–52.
 M. Adelman, E. Erez, and N. Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Policing violence against minority women in multicultural societies. “Community” and the politics of exclusion, in Police and Society 7 (2003), 103–31.
 N. Berkovitch, Motherhood as a national mission. The construction of womanhood in the legal discourse in Israel, in Women's Studies International Forum 20 (1997), 605–19.
 A. Ghanem, The Palestinian Arab minority In Israel, 1948–2000. A political study, Albany, N.Y. 2001.
 M. Haj-Yahia, Patterns of violence against engaged Arab women from Israel and some psychological implications, in Psychology of Women Quarterly 24 (2000), 209–19.
 —, Beliefs about wife beating among Arab men from Israel. The influence of their patriarchal ideology, in Journal of Family Violence 18 (2003), 193–206.
 N. Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Law, politics, and violence against women. A case study of Palestinians in Israel, in Law and Policy 21 (1999), 189–211.
 R. Torstick, The limits of coexistence. Identity politics in Israel, Ann Arbor 2000.

MADELAINE ADELMAN

The Ottoman Empire

Although several modern legal codes make reference to domestic violence, Islamic law (Shari'a) addresses it through the concept of darar (harm) that encompasses several types of abuse against a spouse. For example, darar can include the failure of a husband to provide obligatory support (nafaqa) for his wife, which includes food, shelter, and clothing. A husband's absence from the home, his inability to fulfill his wife's sexual needs, or mistreatment of his wife's family members can result in dissolution of the marriage. Darar also includes physical abuse against a spouse. The laws concerning darar maintain that if a woman is harmed in her marriage, she can have it annulled: “the most important proof needed was to show that the husband had broken the marriage contract or that the marriage caused the woman harm” (Sonbol 1996, 281). Physically assaulting a wife violates the marriage contract and is grounds for immediate divorce.

There are very few studies available on domestic violence in Islamic history. Colin Imber (1997) mentions it in the context of Ottoman fatwas. Ottoman law tends to treat cases of darar in accordance with the Shari'a; this is reflected in a sixteenth-century fatwa from the Ottoman Şeyhül-islâm Ebu's-su'ud (Abū al-Sa'ūd) that reads: “Question: Zeyd hurts his wife Hind in many ways. If the qāḍī knows about it, is he able to separate Hind from Zeyd? Answer: He is able to prevent his hurting her by whatever means possible” (Imber 1997, 216). Further evidence of Ottoman treatment of darar can be found in studies currently being undertaken using Shari'a court records from the Ottoman period. For example Shari'a court cases from Aleppo, Syria reflect the ability of women to seek retribution when subjected to abuse. The courts of Aleppo ruled against abusive husbands in several cases of domestic violence. In one court case from May 1687 Fāṭima bt. Ḥajj 'Alī filed a lawsuit against her husband testifying that he was abusing her; he had hit her with a stick on her body and on her mouth causing her to bleed. She claimed that he was constantly abusive. In her defense she brought along five witnesses. The court reprimanded the abusive husband, ordering that he be given ta'zīr (discretionary punishment) (SMH 36:78:214 16 Rajab 1098 A.H./May 1687).

In the Shari'a courts women had several strategies for defense. First, a woman could bring witnesses to testify on her behalf and strengthen her case. Second, she could include a clause against domestic abuse in her marriage contract that would offer her further protection if her husband ever abused her. Including these conditions in a marriage contract was an option in any Muslim marriage and offered the bride an opportunity to protect herself legally. For example, women could use their rightful conditions in the marriage contract to bar a man from his legal right to a second wife. When any condition was violated it led automatically to divorce. However, during the nineteenth-century reform period modern laws eliminated the ability of women to insert conditions in their marriage contracts.

It has been a common misinterpretation that Islam condones violence against women. In the Qurʾān there is a controversial verse stating: “As to those women on whose part ye fear disloyalty and ill-conduct, admonish them [first], [next], refuse to share their beds, [and last] beat them [lightly]; but if they return to obedience, seek not against them means [of annoyance]” (4:34). First, it is important to state that punishment is reserved for disobedient (nāshiza) wives. In Islamic law the husband’s obligation in marriage is to provide for his wife; in return she owes him obedience (tāʿa). In Yūsuf ‘Alī’s translation cited here, he interprets the the original Arabic “idribuhuna” as “beat them [lightly]” when in fact the phrase literally means “beat them.” This is because of dominant interpretations in juridical writings of tafsīr (Qurʾānic interpretation) that have settled the matter. In his interpretation of this verse, Ibn Kathīr cautions men to “refrain from severe reprimand . . . beat them non-violently and do not break their bones” (Ibn Kathīr i, 386). In another passage Ibn Kathīr states that jurists prohibited men from beating and disfiguring their wives. Some juridical writings prescribe more than divorce for abusive husbands. Condemnation of a husband who abuses his wife can be found in the writings of nineteenth-century Syrian jurist Ibn ‘Ābidīn in his Radd al-muḥtār ‘ala durr al-mukhtār, where he addresses the issue of a man who beats his wife in a chapter entitled “Excessive Beating.” He writes of a man who beats his wife excessively and “breaks bone,” “burns skin,” or “blackens” or bruises her skin: “if he does so without justification, taʿzīr is mandatory” (Ibn ‘Ābidīn iii, 190). Ibn ‘Ābidīn does not state what form the punishment should take. Interestingly, Ibn ‘Ābidīn’s writings from the nineteenth century are consistent with the formulations of the Sharīʿa court case from Aleppo mentioned earlier in which taʿzīr was given as punishment to Fāṭima’s abusive husband. Muslim jurists repeatedly admonished men who committed violence against their wives and the Sharīʿa court upheld their position.

Amira Sonbol’s exploration of the nineteenth-century reform era in Egypt has noted the detrimental effects of legal reform on women’s rights. Looking at the relationship between tāʿa and darar she found that in the nineteenth century the burden of proof on women plaintiffs increased. Furthermore, disobedient wives had their rights gradually taken away by their husbands who wielded new state-endorsed authority over their wives. Included in a husband’s new-found power was the institutionalization of the bayt al-tāʿa or “house of obedience” in which a husband could forcibly confine his wife if she was disobedient. Nineteenth-century personal status laws also allowed a wide range of discretion as to what disobedience entailed: some husbands interpreted it as taking a job, shopping, or visiting friends (Sonbol 1998, 287). Sonbol found that increasingly women had difficulty challenging these cases in court and often lost. Dalenda Larguèche’s study of the incarceration of women in Tunisia shows a striking similarity: disobedient wives could be sent by a judge to Dār Juwayd, a system of domestic prisons, for correction. There was an increase in the number of these prisons in the nineteenth century. These institutions were used to modify the behavior of disobedient wives “so as to ‘bring them around’ to the prescribed norms of conduct and morality” (Larguèche 1996, 260). Both Sonbol and Larguèche problematize the connection between obedience and darar in the modern period as the patriarchal state commingles with the Sharīʿa. These pioneering studies question the notion that modernization is a springboard for progress as several areas of the law drastically limit the legal options afforded women in earlier periods.

Although in the rubric of Western law, murdering a wife in a crime of passion has been placed in the same legal category as domestic violence, this is not the case in Islamic law. There is no mention in the juridical texts of condoned or permissible murder of a wife. However, some modern laws, such as Jordan’s Penal Code (1960), contain clauses for “excuse for murder” or offer reduced sentences for men who murder a wife or a female relative suspected of sexual misconduct (Sonbol 2003, 193–4, Abu-Odeh 1996, 143). Authors such as Amira Sonbol and Lama Abu-Odeh have argued that there is a legal connection between “excuse for murder” and “crimes of passion” in the European tradition through the focus on circumstance and the criminal intent of the murderer. Modern legal reforms borrowed from French criminal codes freed the criminal of responsibility so long as the element of surprise was present (Sonbol 2003, 196). In contrast, crimes of passion, prejudicially called “honor crime” in the context of the Islamic world, have mistakenly been associated with Sharīʿa despite their stark connexion with tribal law. The areas with the highest instance of honor crime, namely Yemen and Jordan, are regions that have large populations of recently sedentary Arab tribes and are best understood in that context.

Although this entry illuminates the way in which domestic violence was treated in the Ottoman and modern periods there is no comprehensive study dealing with the issue of domestic violence. With so few studies on ḍarar available it is not possible to perform a comparative study at the moment. By the same token, with a dearth of information available it leaves the path open to future researchers to pursue this area of much needed study.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- M. Ibn 'Ābidīn, Radd al-muḥtar 'ala durr al-mukhtār, 7 vols., Cairo n.d.
 I. Ibn Kathīr, Mukhtaṣar ṭafsīr Ibn Kathīr, 3 vols., Beirut, 1981.
al-Qur'ān, trans. Yusuf 'Alī, Beirut n.d.
 SMH (Sijillāt al-maḥkama Ḥalab), Aleppo court records, Syrian National Archives, Damascus, Syria.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- L. Abu-Odeh, Crimes of honor and the construction of gender in Arab societies, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, New York 1996, 141–94.
 C. Imber, Ebu's-su'ud. The Islamic legal tradition, Stanford, Calif. 1997.
 D. Larguèche, Confined, battered, and repudiated women in Tunis since the eighteenth century, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 258–76.
 A. E. Sonbol, Law and gender violence in Ottoman and modern Egypt, in A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996, 277–89.
 —, Tā'a and modern legal reform. A rereading, in Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 9:3 (1998), 285–94.
 —, Women of Jordan. Islam, labor, and the law, Syracuse, N.Y. 2003.

ELYSE SEMERDJIAN

South Asia

In South Asia, violence against women takes many forms, ranging from slapping, pushing, hitting, and kicking to dowry-killings, acid-throwing, nutritional deprivation, stove burning, polygamy, unilateral divorce, and sexual abuse. Information on violence against Muslim women in Nepal, Sri Lanka, Bhutan, and the Maldives is almost non-existent. The print media has focused largely on Bangladesh and Pakistan – two Muslim majority countries in South Asia – and India, where about 125 million Muslims live. In these three countries, women's groups, non-governmental organizations, and feminist voices have been effective in disseminating information on gender violence and articulating women's responses. Most of this information has concentrated on public violence and trafficking in women and girl children; very little data have been collected on domestic violence, which is usually considered a private matter until murder, suicide, or attempted murder within a family takes place (Khondker 1994). Even so, many suicide cases go unreported and no government statistics or systematic police records exist for domestic violence.

Violence against women is part of the history of South Asia (Jayawardena and De Alwis 1996). Over time, Islam in South Asia has been experienced, interpreted, and practiced differently under colonization, imperialism, and nationalism and in the process has been transformed. In 1947, after 200 years of British rule, India was divided into two parts: India, a predominantly Hindu state, and Pakistan, a Muslim state. Since then, Islam as a religion has played a vociferous role in the subcontinent. Despite the separation of Muslim Pakistan from India, religion failed to hold Pakistan together. In the 1971 liberation war, Bangladesh, a province linguistically and culturally separated from the rest of the provinces of Pakistan, emerged as an independent country. During the liberation war, Pakistani military forces, all Muslims, conducted countless acts of violence on Bangladeshi women (more than 80 percent of the population were Muslim) through individual rape, gang rape, torture, and killings (Mascarenhas 1975, Imam 1986). This war in the Indian subcontinent culminated in a public outcry about male violence against women and ushered in what Kabeer (1988) describes as “a feminist consciousness,” one that revealed the common thread of women's oppression across classes and religions.

Contrary to the pervasive perception of the family in South Asia as a tightly knit, well-integrated, primary-support kinship organization, gender-based domestic violence occurs throughout Muslim women's lives regardless of sect, class, education, geographical location, or rural/urban variation. In India, for example, female genital mutilation to control female sexuality is practiced among Bohra Muslims (an Ismā'īlī Shī'ī sect); however, within South Asia this custom is never recognized as domestic violence (Ghadially 1991). In Bangladesh, it is accepted that a husband can inflict several sorts of violence: sexual, psychological (for example, a threat), or vicarious (smashing a plate, beating a child, or damaging something) (Shailo 1994). In Pakistan, a 1989 survey conducted by the Women's Division suggested that domestic violence occurs in approximately 80 percent of the country's households (ADB 2000). An Asian Development Bank (ADB) report states: "During 1998, 282 burn cases of women were reported in Punjab. Of these, 65 percent died of their injuries. Data collected from two hospitals in Rawalpindi and Islamabad over a period of three years since 1994 reveal 739 cases of burn victims" (ADB 2000, xi). Such stove burning more often happens not as a result of a woman's negligence in the kitchen but because of attempted murder either by the husband or by the husband's family. (The Indian movie Fire graphically shows an example of stove burning inflicted on a woman by a husband.) In Bangladesh, India, Nepal, and Pakistan, demand for a huge dowry (ranging from money, gold ornaments, television, car, refrigerator, or furniture to land) by either the groom or the groom's family can cause enormous psychological pressure on the prospective bride and her family. In an effort to reduce the number of brides killed because of dowry, an anti-dowry law was enacted by the Jatiyo Sangsad (parliament) of Bangladesh in 1980. However, as Anam reports, "The Home Minister disclosed in Parliament on 22 November [1993] that there were 21,622 [women] reported suicides since January 1992. Most of these are cases of dowry deaths, domestic violence, etc., whereby women are murdered in a planned way and their husbands or relatives report that they have committed suicide. In other cases, their lives are made so unbearable that they are forced to commit suicide" (1993, 1). An ADB report on Nepal states that in the SAATHI and Asia Foundation survey (1997), "knowledge of violence related to dowry was reported by 38 percent of respondents in Banke, a western Terai district with a predominantly Muslim population" (ADB 1999, 20). To regulate, restrict, and eventually eliminate the custom of dowry, a number of laws have been passed in South Asia. These include the Dowry Prohibition Act of 1980 in Bangladesh (Akanda and Shamim 1985), and the Dowry and Bridal Gifts (Restriction) Rules of 1976 in Pakistan (Ali and Naz 1998). Although these laws have been in effect for over 20 years, customs and social norms and, most of all, the ineffectiveness of the governments in South Asia allow dowry killing to continue.

The patrilineal and patrilocal as well as the patriarchal nature of the social system gives males responsibility for protecting the welfare of women and children. In rural areas, where more than 70 percent of Bangladeshi women live, women's lives are restricted by the social institution called shamaj, which dictates the lives of rural people, especially women, in numerous ways. For example, in the case of domestic conflicts, a local rural community court called the salish (composed entirely of male members) plays a key role in arbitrating conflict. The woman must be represented by an adult male, who is considered the woman's guardian (World Bank 1990). Moreover, in rural and urban areas, a gender-based division of labor, as well as socially prescribed reproductive roles, ensures that women's labor is taken for granted and unremunerated in many households. As a result, many women are economically dependent and are especially vulnerable to abusive/violent relationship, desertion, divorce, or widowhood.

In Pakistan, the constitution of 1973 guarantees two fundamental rights in Article 25: all citizens are equal under law, and there shall be no discrimination based on sex (Mumtaz and Shaheed 1991). The existence of contradictions between these legal doctrines and women's actual status reveals the marginalized situation of women and children in Pakistani society, and ultimately perpetuates domestic violence. An ADB report states: "The official figure for the murder of women during 1998 was 1,974; the majority of them were victims of their own relatives – husbands, brothers, fathers, and in-laws" (2000, 19). A number of laws on marriage, divorce, maintenance, and child custody, which were enacted during the British colonial rule under the Shariat Application Act of 1937, meant that Muslims would be guided by their personal law or Shari'a (Mumtaz and Shaheed 1991). These laws have been amended and modified since then, but the fundamental constitutional principle of Pakistan as an Islamic state has solidified the role of patriarchy, namely, the existence of male supremacy in sociopolitical, legal, and economic institutions. This principle jeopardizes a woman's safety not only in the public domain, but also in her own home. For example, the Family Laws Ordinance of 1961 made the registration of marriage mandatory, but the right of irrevocable divorce remained with the husband. The husband had the authority to delegate his wife the right to divorce him in the nikanama (marriage registry), but this right is rarely awarded. A 1998 mini-survey conducted in three areas of Peshwar found that during the last 20 years, "in the Spin Jummat (University Town area), not a single nikanama contained a delegation of the right of divorce. Likewise, the Sunehri Masjid Nikah Registrar said that his registrar also did not have any case with a talaq (divorce) . . . It was only in the Nauthia area that the Nikah registrar reported two marriage contracts . . . [which contained] delegation of the right of divorce to the wife" (Ali and Naz 1998, 118). Lack of women's rights to divorce perpetuates an indentured relationship in a marital contract and, in too many cases, perpetuates male violence against women within a family. Moreover, the social norm emphasizing the value of virginity makes it almost impossible for women who are divorced to find another suitable marriage. To delegitimize and reduce the incidence of child marriage, the colonial Child Marriage Restraint Act (1929) and the Muslim Family Laws Ordinance (1961), were joined recently by a law requiring a woman's consent in marriage. Despite these laws, Shaheed reports what happens in practice: "A recent national survey (of 1609 women respondents) showed that 75 percent either had not been consulted or their opinion given no weight at all. Child marriages continue . . . and the Option of Puberty that allows minors to rescind unconsummated child marriages before reaching 18 years of age has never been heard of by an overwhelming number of those it is intended to provide relief to" (1998, 71). Child marriage or women's marriage without consent is condoned by society in the name of custom/tradition. However, these practices are rarely identified as domestic violence.

In India, there are nearly 60 million Muslim women, making up the second largest female Muslim population in the world (Hasan 1998, 72). In contrast with Bangladesh and Pakistan, Muslim women in India have not witnessed any changes in personal, or religion-based, family laws (Hasan 1998, Kumar 1995). In fact, Muslim personal laws in India institutionalize "easy divorce and polygamy" (Hasan 1998, 78). Customs (dowry), social traditions (patrilineality), and age-old discriminatory family and personal laws are entrenched in Muslim women's lives and facilitate the perpetuation of gender violence in the family.

All over South Asia – in Bangladesh, Pakistan, and India – women's groups have articulated the need to fight against domestic violence. Two actions these groups advocate are a Uniform Family Code and the implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Kinds of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). Still, the question remains: how to implement a Uniform Family Code and other much needed reforms without jeopardizing religious minority rights? Until this question is resolved, the level of domestic violence against women will not change in South Asia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

ADB (Asian Development Bank), Women in Nepal, Programs Department (West), Manila 1999.

- , Women in Pakistan, Programs Department (West) and Office of Environment and Social Development, Manila 2000.
- , Women in Bangladesh, Programs Department (West), Manila 2001.
- L. Akanda and I. Shamim, Women and violence. A comparative study of rural and urban violence against women in Bangladesh, Dhaka 1985².
- S. S. Ali and R. Naz, Marriage, dower and divorce. Superior courts and case law in Pakistan, in F. Shaheed, S. A. Warraich, C. Balchin, and A. Gazdar (eds.), Shaping women's lives. Laws, practices and strategies in Pakistan, Lahore 1998, 107–42.
- S. Anam, Stop, please stop this violence, Daily Star (Dhaka), 25 November 1993.
- Bangladesh, Mahila Parishad, Status of women in Bangladesh, Dhaka 1992.
- R. Ghadially, All for "izzat." The practice of female circumcision among Bohra Muslims, in Manushi 66 (September–October 1991), 17–20.
- Z. Hasan, Gender politics, legal reform and the Muslim community in India, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 71–88.
- J. Imam, Of blood and fire. The untold story of Bangladesh's war of independence, trans. M. Rahman, Dhaka 1986.
- R. Jahan, Women in Bangladesh, in Women for women, Bangladesh 1975, published for Women for Women Research and Study Group, Dhaka 1975, 1–30.
- K. Jayawardena and M. De Alwis (eds.), Embodied violence. Communalising women's sexuality in South Asia, London 1996.
- N. Kabear, Subordination and struggle. Women in Bangladesh, in New Left Review 168 (1988), 114–15.
- R. Khondker, Domestic violence is a more hush-hush affair, Morning Sun (Dhaka), 3 February 1994.
- R. Kumar, From chipko to sati. The contemporary Indian women's movement, in A. Basu (ed.), The challenge of local feminisms. Women's movements in global perspective, Boulder, Colo. 1995, 58–86.
- A. Mascarenhas, The rape of Bangladesh, New Delhi 1975.
- K. Mumtaz and F. Shaheed, Historical roots of the women's movement. A period of awakening 1896–1947, in F. Zafar (ed.), Finding our way. Readings on women in Pakistan, Lahore 1991, 3–25.
- F. Shaheed, Engagements of culture, customs and law. Women's lives and activism, in F. Shaheed et al. (eds.), Shaping women's lives. Laws, practices and strategies in Pakistan, Lahore 1998, 61–80.
- I. Shailo, The main targets of violence, Morning Sun (Dhaka), 24 February 1994.
- World Bank, Bangladesh. Strategy paper on women in development, Washington, D.C. 1990.
- S. Zia, The legal status of women in Pakistan, in F. Zafar (ed.), Finding our way. Readings on women in Pakistan, Lahore 1991, 26–42.

HABIBA ZAMAN

Sub-Saharan Africa

The term domestic violence refers primarily to physical battery in the context of the household or the family. But battering lies on a continuum of gender violence in the private sphere that includes sexual assault, psychological torment, and deprivation of the capacity to meet basic human needs. Domestic violence is most common where the social structure favors male power and the dominant ideology legitimates women's subordination. In Africa, domestic violence emerges from many of the same patterns of economic, political, and legal discrimination found worldwide. Women's economic dependence on men makes leaving a violent household difficult or impossible. Domestic violence acts as a form of social control, enforcing women's low status and discouraging them from seeking political change. Legal systems tend to enforce patriarchal norms and provide only limited resources for preventing or punishing violence. The everyday experience of domestic violence in Africa also reflects local realities and cultural context.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE IN CULTURAL CONTEXT

Any inquiry into the place of violence in African life runs the risk of reproducing a stereotypical image of a homogeneous and "uncivilized" part of the world that has helped to justify Western racism, colonialism, and paternalism. An accurate assessment of gender violence in Africa therefore requires recognition of Africa's great cultural diversity, as well as the context of colonialism and international inequality that continues to shape contemporary African societies.

The incidence of domestic violence varies across Africa, with research indicating higher rates in Ghana, Senegal, South Africa, Tanzania, Uganda, Zimbabwe, and lower rates in countries where it is generally considered socially unacceptable, such as Côte d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Eritrea, Gabon, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritania, Somalia, Swaziland, and Togo. However, these findings should be considered in the context of the problems of under-reporting, the "culture of silence" surrounding domestic violence in many African societies, and the incomplete and ongoing nature of domestic violence research in Africa.

Aspects of culture that shape domestic violence include relative acceptance of physical force in marriage, gender role expectations, and family structure. All of these undergo stress in response to deteriorating economic conditions and political repression, fostering violence and making redress more elusive.

In some predominantly Muslim countries, such as Senegal, Islam provides a rationale for male battering under the label of "correcting" wives who misbehave. In non-majority Muslim countries like Ghana, comparable legitimation derives from oral tradition and popular culture. In some contexts, such as Zimbabwe and Uganda, a majority of women report that battering is justifiable under certain circumstances. Many Africans throughout the continent see domestic violence as a private matter subject to local norms and family authority, not public scrutiny or state intervention. These beliefs present a challenge to activists working to change attitudes and laws. However, over-generalizations about the acceptance of gender violence in Africa belie the diversity of views both among and within African societies. In Senegal, for example, many men and women argue that battering is at odds with the precepts of Islam.

Patterns of family authority provide the structure within which acts of violence and responses to violence occur. Hierarchical male authority, common in Africa, makes women's resistance difficult. Some practices may exacerbate the incidence of violence in particular instances. Polygyny, a significant though minority practice in many African countries, may create conditions of unique vulnerability for battered women. In Uganda, some polygamous men use physical force to manage conflicts between co-wives. Ugandan women may also tolerate violence for fear of divorce and economic abandonment by a husband with additional wives. The payment of bridewealth may also exacerbate battering, as well as marital rape. Originally, this practice symbolized the bond between families and compensation for a daughter's labor. But in many African countries today, including Botswana, the Central African Republic, Mozambique, South Africa, and Uganda, bridewealth constitutes the "purchase" of a woman's body by her husband, helping to justify abuse.

The economics of gender violence have grown harsher in the aftermath of the economic crisis of the 1980s and severe structural adjustment policies. Women who are economically dependent on men and their families cannot afford to protest or to escape violent households. Men unable to fulfill traditional economic roles carry frustration and conflict into family life. Battered women, their health and energy drained, cannot contribute fully to the economic well-being of their families or the development of their societies.

SEXUAL VIOLENCE

As with battering, sexual violence in much of Africa is met with silence or defined as part of a socially acceptable range of behavior. As in the rest of the world, most rape in Africa occurs between acquaintances, including intimates and family members. Alongside battery, rape creates a climate of terror and oppression in the domestic sphere that damages both physical and mental health. Rarely criminalized, marital rape commonly falls under the principle of “marital exemption” by which the private sphere is protected from state intervention. While laws prohibiting marital rape do exist in a handful of countries, including Ghana, Zimbabwe, and South Africa, they are rarely enforced.

Gender violence is also a common feature of large-scale conflict in Africa. In Burundi, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Liberia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, and Somalia, rape is part of women’s everyday experience of violence. In Burundi’s civil conflict, for example, soldiers and members of armed political groups have used rape to humiliate and terrorize the population. The stigma attached to rape can also do long-term damage to a woman’s position in her family and community. In Rwanda, children born to Tutsi women raped by Hutu men have become outcasts. Refugees from Africa’s conflicts, living in desperate conditions and far from family and community mechanisms that may mitigate abuse, are especially vulnerable to both rape and battering.

THE IMPACT OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE ON HEALTH

Battering and rape directly threaten the health of women and girls. Rape also facilitates the spread of HIV/AIDS and other diseases, and results in unwanted and high-risk pregnancy. In Swaziland and Uganda, for example, high rates of HIV infection among girls and women correlate with the incidence of both marital rape and domestic violence.

Controversy surrounds the question of whether female genital cutting, in its mild and severe forms, constitutes violence against girls and women or a defensible cultural custom. In Kenya, for example, local activists protest against the practice while many Gikuyu women see it as an essential rite of passage. However, its widespread negative impact on women’s health and sexuality shares much in common with battery and rape. Alongside the pain of the procedure and subsequent painful sexual activity, the risk of infection, HIV transmission, and complications during childbirth are all associated with the practice. The range of efforts to limit this procedure centers on challenging the misconception that it is a requirement of Islam, finding alternative employment for professional circumcisers, educating people about the health risks, medicalizing the procedure to make it safer, and criminalization.

LEGAL RESPONSES TO DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Africa possesses a broad array of non-state dispute resolution mechanisms and formal legal processes that vary from country to country, most of which contain a blend of customary, religious, and European law. Traditional sanctions against gender violence remain an invaluable resource in much of Africa, but they have weakened in the face of urbanization, economic crisis, forced migration, and war. The common mediation approach to family disputes may backfire when battered women are compelled to respond in a conciliatory manner.

Throughout Africa, criminal rape prosecutions are rare, and with few exceptions marital rape and domestic violence are not crimes. Where such laws do exist, there are typically problems with both police and judicial enforcement. In South Africa, for example, police systematically treat domestic violence as less serious than other types of assault. In Senegal, judges discourage women from seeking divorce as a way out of a violent marriage. In countries such as Nigeria, where the Shari’a plays a major role in family law, prosecutions have been rare as some legal activists apply Islamic legal principles in domestic violence cases, while others appeal to international human rights law.

Gender violence entered international human rights discourse in force with the United Nations Decade for Women ending in 1985, and while absent from the original Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in 1979, new language was adopted in 1992 and 2003 declaring gender violence as a human rights violation. In 1998, the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ruled that rape is a form of genocide, and in the same year the International Criminal Court listed sexual violence as a crime falling within its jurisdiction. The human rights approach to gender violence in Africa must contend with the charge of many Africans that international standards exhibit Western bias and disrespect for African cultures. Activists inside and outside Africa respond that the goal of ending gender violence should be in harmony with African cultural values, and that any disharmony indicates the need for change. Ultimately, the effectiveness of national and international struggles in ending domestic violence in Africa must draw on existing cultural resources while working to transform the economic, political, and legal context in which African women live.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Amnesty International, Burundi. Rape – the hidden rights abuse, New York 2004.

- Carnegie Council on Ethics and International Affairs, Human Rights Dialogue, Violence against women, Series 2, 10 (Fall 2003), <<http://www.cceia.org/viewMedia.php/prmID/1061>>.
- Center for Women's Global Leadership (ed.), Gender violence and women's human rights in Africa, New Brunswick, N.J. 1994.
- R. E. Dobash and R. Dobash, Violence against wives, New York 1979.
- N. Green, Gender violence in Africa. African women's responses, New York 1999.
- Human Rights Watch, Shattered lives. Sexual violence during the Rwandan genocide and its aftermath, New York 1996.
- , Just die quietly. Domestic violence and women's vulnerability to HIV in Uganda, New York 2003.
- S. London, Conciliation and domestic violence in Senegal, West Africa, in Political and Legal Anthropology Review 20 (1997), 83–91.
- S. E. Merry, Women, violence, and the human rights system, in M. Agosin (ed.), Women, gender, and human rights, New Brunswick, N.J. 2001, 83–97.
- R. Ofei-Aboagye, Domestic violence in Ghana. Some initial questions, in M. A. Fineman and R. Mykitiuk (eds.), The public nature of private violence. The discovery of domestic abuse, New York 1994, 260–84.
- M. J. Osirim, Crisis in the state and the family. Violence against women in Zimbabwe, in African Studies Quarterly. The Online Journal for Africa Studies 7 (2003), <<http://web.africa.ufl.edu/asq/v7/v7i2a8.htm>>.
- F. Oyekanmi (ed.), Men, women and violence, Dakar 1997.
- United Nations Population Fund, State of world population 2003, New York 2003.
- C. Watts, S. Osam, and E. Win, The private is public. A study of violence against women in Southern Africa, Harare 1995.
- World Health Organization, Understanding women's attitudes toward wife beating in Zimbabwe, in Bulletin of the World Health Organization (2003), 501–8.

SCOTT LONDON

Turkey

Almost all forms of violence against women in the family are widespread in Turkey. There is no female genital mutilation (FGM) or dowry killing but honor crimes do occur. According to the Turkish Civil Code marriage is only possible between opposite sexes; thus violence occurring in same-sex relationships is not covered here. Domestic violence includes physical, economic, sexual, and verbal violence, isolation, constant criticism, attacks against self-esteem, and so forth. In short, most forms of violence can be seen in the family. Violence is based on inequality of power between spouses and is seen as the best way of controlling women. A Turkish proverb demonstrates this attitude: “A woman’s womb should not be left free from a fetus and her back should not be left without a stick.”

There is no specific article or chapter regarding domestic violence in the Turkish Penal Code. General rules applied to physical violence are applied to domestic violence as well. Articles 414, 415, and 416 deal with rape, seduction of children, and assault on chastity and Article 417 covers aggravating circumstances connected with these crimes. The age of consent is 15. Articles 414 and 415 of the Turkish Penal Code deal with the rape of persons under the age of 15; Article 414 refers to “whoever rapes an infant under the age of 15” and Article 415 refers to “whoever attempts to assault the honor and chastity of an infant under the age of 15.” Article 416 covers rape and assault that leads to sexual violence against a person who is over 15 by use of any means of coercion, deceit, fraud, and the like. Article 478 regulates the maltreatment of family members, including children, with imprisonment of offenders ranging from three months to three years. Article 417 deals with the punishment of rape, seduction of children, and assault on chastity. However, none of the articles in the Penal Code mention domestic violence directly. Rape in marriage is not considered a felony. Although articles related to rape do not make any differentiation between rapes occurring within or outside marriage, both decisions of the Criminal Court of Appeal and legal theory state that marriage is the place where people satisfy their sexual desires legitimately. By accepting marriage, each spouse implicitly gives consent to sexual intercourse and it is therefore not possible to talk about rape in marriage. In the Turkish Civil Code, violence against a wife may form a ground for moral compensation and divorce. The Turkish Penal Code is about to undergo a total change. In the new proposals pending at the Turkish Grand National Assembly, rape within the family is considered a crime (Article 105/2). Sexual crimes are covered under the heading “Crimes against Sexual Inviolability.”

The official State Institute of Statistics does not collect data on violence against women, in either general or domestic matters. The only statistics on domestic violence have been collected either by private researchers or universities. Thus the extent of domestic violence or rape or any other form of violence against women in Turkey is unknown.

Separate from the provisions in the Civil Code and the Penal Code against maltreatment, there is also the Law on the Protection of Family, law number 4320, issued on 14 January 1998. This law was promulgated as a result of the women’s movement in Turkey. According to Article 1, if a spouse or child or another member of the family living under the same roof is subject to abuse, and notification is made either by the victim or by the public prosecutor, a justice of the peace can pass a protection order including one or more of the following rulings or take any other measures that are deemed appropriate in addition to provisions of the Civil Code. The accused spouse can be ordered:

1. not to use violence or threatening behavior against the other spouse or children (or other members of the family living under the same roof);
2. to leave the abode shared with spouse or children, if there are any, and not to approach the abode occupied by spouse and children or their places of work;
3. not to damage the property of the spouse or children (or of others living under the same roof);
4. not to cause distress to the spouse or children (or others living under the same roof);
5. to surrender a weapon or other similar instruments to the police;
6. not to arrive at the shared abode while under the influence of alcohol or other intoxicating substances or to use such substances in the shared abode.

These measures can be applied for a period not exceeding six months and if the accused does not abide by the rulings he or she will be warned that he or she is liable to arrest and confinement. The judge will take into account the standard of living of the victim and rule on maintenance payments accordingly.

According to Article 2 of the law, the court entrusts a copy of the protection order to the public prosecutor. The public prosecutor monitors the application of the order through the police. In the event of an order being issued, the police will conduct an investigation without the need for the victim to submit a written application. The public prosecutor can file charges at the penal court against a spouse who does not abide by an order, the penalty for which is a prison sentence of between three and six months.

The inclusion in the law of family members living under the same roof is positive. Violence against family members is not always committed by the husband; brothers, sons, sometimes daughters, and in-laws from both sides can be perpetrators. The law is inadequate in that it excludes ex-spouses, spouses living out of wedlock, those who are dating but not living under the same roof, and homosexual couples. There is a proposal prepared by women's non-governmental organizations to improve the law.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

V. Savaş and S. Mollamahmutoğlu, Türk ceza kanununun yorumu, iii, Ankara 1995.

CÂNÂN ARIN

Domesticity

The Caucasus

This entry deals mainly with Azerbaijan. This is because of the shortage of relevant scholarship on the rest of the Muslim Caucasus. In this region the pre-Soviet religious prescriptions on the seclusion of women reinforced the association between the domestic and the feminine. In the wealthy urban homes the gendered division of space confined women to ichari ev (inner home). What survived from this tradition in the Soviet era was the notion that it is the husband/father's duty to conduct the household's dealings with the outside world: shopping (especially trips to a baker or a butcher), taking things for repair, even taking the garbage out, were considered very much male tasks. It confirmed male prestige and a woman's dignity, though in practice women also participated in searching for scarce goods and joining long queues (Heyat 2002b, 117).

Following the Soviet revolution state ideology promoted the communalization of all housework and childcare in order to free women from such chores. But in later decades economic imperatives and other factors led to the abandonment of such utopian ideals. Instead, it was expected that women be equal citizens, loyal workers, and devoted mothers and wives who rather than rejecting family roles fulfilled them perfectly well, taking pride in their capacity to serve. Modernization and rationalization of domesticity was advocated by the state and Communist Party officials in the context of the communalization of family life. But this only took place in urban centers where canteens, wash houses, nurseries, and kindergartens were established. At the same time, the close association between women and domesticity persisted under the Soviet system, particularly in the rural regions. In Daghestan, girls were taught cooking skills from a very young age and by their teens were involved in heavy domestic labor as well as arduous farm work (Chenciner 1997).

In Azerbaijan, as elsewhere in the Soviet Union, despite the increasing public roles assumed by women, strong gender divisions of domestic labor persisted. Culturally this was reflected in the close association between the feminine and the domestic, and its converse: the masculine and avoidance of domestic chores. This is denoted by the way the label aghabaji (effeminate master) is given to men who involve themselves in housework, especially cooking and cleaning. Washing clothes and dishes are considered strictly female tasks. However, in households where there were no daughters present, because of difficulties of access to paid labor, sons and husbands also participated.

In the Azeri culture domesticity is a highly valued dimension of femininity (Heyat 2000a, 2002b). Women's domestic skills, evdarlik, are in fact crucial to maintaining a high standard of hospitality, gonakhparvarlik, in the form of generous offering of food and great respect toward guests, gonakh. This is reflected in the folklore and literature of Azerbaijan as far back as the medieval epics of Dede Korkut. It is also a source of ethnic pride through which Azeris distinguish themselves from the Russians and other Slavic and European peoples (Tohidi 1996, 1998). As in the rest of Caucasus and the Middle East, a tradition of hospitality still remains an integral element in the system of honor and prestige. In the later Soviet era, with a flourishing alternative economy (Heyat 2002c), investment in feasts became an important feature of maintaining personal networks that facilitated access to goods and services (Mars and Altman 1987). Given that the work was done entirely by women in the family, domestic skills of cooking and entertaining were a matter of pride and prestige as well as a necessity for women, including highly educated professional women.

In the post-Soviet era, however, for the small sector of the new rich, women's greater access to labor-saving devices, the abundance of processed and part-prepared food, and the development of the catering industry, particularly in the major cities, has reduced their domestic burden. Most women of this class have assumed the role of full-time housewives. For those of the younger generation the question of prestige is not based so much on their domestic skills but their looks, maintaining slim, fashionable figures, their knowledge of a Western language, and travel to Europe or the United States (Heyat 2002b, 185). Meanwhile, for the majority of the population the drastic decline in income and new poverty has entailed adopting survival strategies such as subsistence farming, hand-crafting of goods, petty trading, and provision of services that draw on their domestic skills. In the foreseeable future, therefore, the construction of women's identity through their domesticity will continue throughout the Muslim Caucasus, even across most of oil-rich Azerbaijan.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Chenciner, Daghestan. Tradition and survival, London 1997.
- F. Heyat, Azeri professional women's life strategies, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000a, 177–201.
- , Azeri women in transition. Women in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, London 2002b.
- , Women and the culture of entrepreneurship in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, in R. Mandel and C. Humphrey (eds.), Markets and moralities. Ethnographies of postsocialism, Oxford 2002c, 19–31.
- G. Mars and Y. Altman, Alternative mechanism of distribution in a Soviet economy, in M. Douglas (ed.), Constructive drinking. Perspectives on drink from anthropology, Cambridge 1987, 270–9.
- N. Tohidi, “Guardians of the nation.” Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137–161.

FARIDEH HEYAT

East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia

The grand gender narrative that has dominated East and Southeast Asia over the last five hundred years is the definition of woman as wife and mother (“bearer of sons” is the East Asian variation). This metanarrative remained uncontested until the late twentieth century when the rise of second wave feminism and women's activism raised alternative definitions of woman as worker and citizen. The corollary of this limited construction of the feminine as wife and mother (and this applies to women in both Muslim and non-Muslim societies in the region) is women's conflation with domesticity. Hence, both Muslim and non-Muslim women in East and Southeast Asia were similarly defined by cultures which delineated men as heads of households and women as mothers responsible for child-rearing and for domestic duties – the caring of the home. Although some official discourses may pronounce women “queens of the households,” in actual practice men still had authority over household decisions. There is a wide gap between official discourses of the ideal woman embedded in domestic bliss, or the ideal woman as housewife, and reality, since many peasant and lower-class women have been workers (and in Southeast Asia have dominated the marketplace) throughout the centuries. The other interesting irony is that although second wave feminism has officially raised alternative narratives for women, the rise of Islamic revivalism in the 1970s (coinciding with second wave feminism) reinforced the traditional gender narrative and raised women's domesticity as an ideal. In Malaysia for example, “‘upwardly mobile’ women were keen to demonstrate their ‘Muslimness’ and modernity by their identification with domesticity, motherhood and the consumption of religious and material paraphernalia which marked the Muslim home” (Healey 1994, 109). The “feminine” woman is “domestic” (Healey 1994, 109). This cultural deification of the woman as domestic is also endorsed by state ideologies of women, particularly in Malaysia, Indonesia (during the Suharto years), and Singapore.

The woman as housewife confined to the domestic sphere is also an elite or middle-class ideal since in reality many women have to work in order to make ends meet. Those who can afford it hire domestic helpers. These helpers are mostly women as well, thus reinforcing the view that women are best suited to domestic tasks. Consequently, the study of domesticity, Islam, and women in the Southeast Asian context is more about constructions of the feminine than it is about the realities of women's daily lives. Nevertheless domesticity is a very powerful ideology endorsed by culture, Islam, and the state even in the midst of the desire to become “modern” (Stivens 1998, 60).

State ideologies promoted women's domesticity. In the last 30 years of the twentieth century state ideologies and Islamic revivalism both emphasized women's domesticity. According to Evelyn Blackwood: “In Indonesia, in addition to state efforts to identify women with the domestic domain, mainstream Islamic discourse on womanhood portrays women as wives and mothers above all else” (1995, 126). In Indonesia during the New Order (1965–98) the state enshrined the notion that men are heads of households and families and women's roles are as housewives and mothers. Feminist scholars have labeled this ideology State Ibuism (ibu means mother), interpreting the state's definition of ibu as limited to its biological meaning: “State Ibuism defines women as appendages and companions to their husbands, as procreators of the nation, as mothers and educators of children, as housekeepers, and as members of Indonesian society – in that order” (Suryakusuma 1996, 101). These views were codified in programs that promoted the importance of motherhood and the belief that women were primarily responsible for their children and their family's health, care, and education (Blackwood 2000, 88). The state women's organization, the PKK (Family Welfare Organization), established in 1973, and the Dharma Wanita (the organization of wives of civil servants) propagated a middle-class ideology of womanhood in which women's domesticity in the nuclear household was paramount (Blackwood 2000, 89). The media (advertisements and television in particular) also reinforced state ideologies of domesticity. One popular television series, Sinetron (from a government owned television station), had as one of its underlying messages the proposition that the good woman is a domestic person (Blackwood 2000, 89, Aripurnami 1996, 252). One of the writers for the series, Novaris Arifidiatmo, told Femina, Indonesia's most prominent magazine, that "the theme is that of the good woman as a domestic person" (quoted in Aripurnami 1996, 252) and of course its opposite, a woman "not utterly domestic" was likely to be intrinsic to the "bad" woman (Aripurnami 1996, 252). The Sinetrons considered "the best films ever produced" endorsed the philosophy that a woman's place is in the home. Women characters in the paid workforce were positively presented if they conformed to traditional female occupations such as domestic helpers. After all, the housemaid's role was within the framework of domesticity that coincided with the government's encouragement of this type of paid labor (even if the women went overseas) (Sunindyo 1993, 138–9). This ideology extended to the big screen of New Order Indonesia, where women played subsidiary roles. In films categorized as "women's films" a common concern was the definition of the destiny of women and this was presented as "mother" within the space of the family (Sen 1993, 117). In Indonesian films, men were located in the paid public sphere while women were confined to the roles of reproductive agents in the unpaid domestic sphere (ibid., 119). In cinema there has yet to be a re-evaluation of the position of women because they are either depicted as mothers in the domestic sphere or prostitutes outside it (ibid., 130).

Islamic leaders in Indonesia have also interpreted the woman's primary role as wife and mother. Indonesian Muslim women in high government positions or who are leaders of women's organizations endorse these same statements supporting the state policy in which women are defined through domesticity (Blackwood 2000, 90). These state ideologies are so influential that even women who are not technically housewives claim to be housewives even if they are not the housewives of the state ideology, prompting Evelyn Blackwood to label them "contradictory housewives" (2000, 91).

In Malaysia too, both the state and religion endorsed the view of men as heads of households and families (Stivens 1998, 60). Maila Stivens argued that "the desired effect of the state pronatalism seems to be that women remain housebound, co-ordinating the mass consumption their fecundity is supposed to guarantee" (ibid., 60). Interestingly, Malaysia's preoccupation with modernity (post 1970s) isolated (if somewhat reinvented) women's domesticity as intrinsic to the new Malaysian modern woman.

Women are largely responsible for "the 'domestic' construction of the Malay middle classes" (Stivens 1998, 62), as women's magazines give instructions on household décor, child rearing, and cuisine as well as specific advice on how to prepare for Muslim holy days and festivals (ibid., 63). Since the family is highly politicized in Malaysia, the moral panic about working mothers producing delinquent children heightened fears about the family in crisis. The state responded in recent years with campaigns about "happy families" in which the father is head and protector of the family and the mother is his warm and supportive helpmeet (Stivens 2000, 26).

Singapore has remained since its independence an unabashedly patriarchal state. State policies applied to all women (whether Chinese, Malay Muslim, or Indian) and thus, Singapore's Muslim women have been defined alongside their non-Muslim sisters. The authoritarian nature of the regime meant that the policies were implemented quite forcefully across all classes of women. Men were defined as heads of households and women were to be wives and mothers morally bound to the home. State policies on education, health benefits, housing allocation, and citizenship all affirmed this view of women: "The government defines women's primary role in the family as that of child raising" (Chan 2000, 47). Educational policy for example, made home economics a compulsory subject for all girls whereas boys were enrolled in technical studies (1969) (Chan 2000, 47, Kong and Chan 2000, 522). Although the need for women to join the workforce meant that the policy was relaxed in 1977 (girls could study either home economics or technical studies, with boys studying technical studies), by 1987 home economics was again compulsory for girls and technical studies for boys, advocating the premise that "girls should be girls" and that boys' priority should not be home matters (Kong and Chan 2000, 522). What was more alarming about this educational policy was that it intended to fashion the new Singaporean woman of the future as a homemaker (Kong and Chan 2000, 523). In 1983 Prime Minister Lee Kwang Kyu unleashed the Great Marriage Debate in which he outlined the crisis discourse – Singapore’s graduate women tended to have fewer children and therefore if nothing was done Singapore’s competitiveness was at stake. The use of eugenics in his arguments further reiterated the view that the future of Singapore depended on women’s roles as mothers. Intelligent women – graduate women – should be mothers producing “smart” children to keep the nation competitive in the global marketplace.

There is still a vacuum in the scholarly literature on women, Islam, and domesticity in East Asia. Japan’s Muslims are mostly immigrants – male contract laborers rather than women. Likewise, the history of women in the Chinese Islamic diaspora “is largely unacknowledged and even now only barely documented” (Jaschok and Shui 2000, 45; see also state of the field essay Gladney 1995, 371–4). In the People’s Republic of China since 1950, the experiences of Muslim women have been similar to those of non-Muslim Chinese women (Jaschok and Shui 2000, 138). Research in the central China region (Zhongyuan) disclosed the cultural axiom that “a woman’s primary reason for living is her husband and family” (ibid., 139). Before the 1950s women were confined to their houses, particularly in North Henan where men’s roles were to perform outside work and women’s roles were to look after the children at home. This binary division was essentialized in the maxim: “man working outside, woman doing housework at home” (ibid., 140, 143). Since the 1950s, although both husbands and wives earn salaries, many husbands and some women still isolate housework as a “woman’s task” (ibid., 145). Jaschok and Shui’s fieldwork with Muslim women married to Muslim teachers, scholars, or religious leaders led to the conclusion that “their duties are limited to housework; they look after the husband’s needs and raise their children in the strict observance of Islam” (ibid., 146). Clearly, domesticity is still a powerful ideology defining Muslim women of contemporary China.

Muslim women in Australia come from the Muslim migrant population who have immigrated as part of a family unit (Yasmeen 2001, 74). A study on Muslim women’s settlement needs in Perth underscored the women’s prioritization of education, training, and employment as essential to their sense of self-esteem and independence (Yasmeen 2001, 82). But these same women preferred to postpone their ambitions and focus instead on their roles as homemakers as they assumed primary responsibility for child-rearing, care of the aged, and housework. While the roles these women performed may not differ much from those in their countries of origin, in Australia the high unemployment rate of Muslim men (25.3 percent compared to the national average of 8.8 percent) has had the impact of restricting women’s space in the home. Men’s larger role in the domestic arena has resulted in the shrinking of space available to women (Yasmeen 2001, 84). Whether Muslim women attend Islamic schools or not they are still subject to the Australian syllabus. Hence, Australia’s female Muslims are in much the same position as mainstream women with respect to domestic duties. Most women do their own housework; some husbands help and some do not; some women who can afford it can outsource household tasks (ironing, cleaning) while some may be full time mothers (Hussain 2003).

Domesticity is therefore a very powerful ideology shaping cultural constructions of women in this region of enormous diversity. Despite the appearance of alternative narratives that launched debates about the “modern” Asian woman (Roces and Edwards 2000) contemporary state ideologies and the rise of Islamic revivalism have reinforced rather than contested this enduring gender narrative.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Aripurnami, A feminist comment on the Sinetron presentation of Indonesian women, in L. J. Sears (ed.), Fantasizing the feminine in Indonesia, Durham, N.C. 1996, 249–58.
- E. Blackwood, Senior women, model mothers, and dutiful wives. Managing gender contradictions in a Minangkabau village, in A. Ong and M. G. Peletz (eds.), Bewitching women, pious men gender and body politics in Southeast Asia, Berkeley 1995, 124–58.
- , Webs of power. Women, kin and community in a Sumatran village, Lanham, Md. 2000.
- J. Chan, The status of women in a patriarchal state. The case of Singapore, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity and globalisation, Sydney 2000, 39–58.
- D. C. Gladney, Islam in Chinese religions. The state of the field, in Journal of Asian Studies 54:2 (1995), 371–7.
- L. Healey, Modernity, identity and constructions of Malay womanhood, in A. Gomes (ed.), Modernity and identity. Asian illustrations, Melbourne 1994, 96–121.
- J. Hussain, personal communication, 2003.
- M. Jaschok and Shui J. J., The history of women’s mosques in Chinese Islam. A mosque of their own, Richmond, Surrey, U.K. 2000.
- L. L. Kong and J. Chan, Patriarchy and pragmatism. Ideological contradictions in state policies, in Asian Studies Review 24:4 (2000), 501–31.
- M. Roces and L. Edwards, Introduction. Contesting gender narratives, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity and globalisation, Sydney 2000, 1–15.
- K. Sen, Repression and resistance. Interpretations of the feminine in New Order cinema, in V. M. Hooker (ed.), Culture and society in New Order Indonesia, Kuala Lumpur 1993, 116–33.

- M. Stevens, Modernizing the Malay mother, in K. Ram and M. Jolly (eds.), Maternities and modernities. Colonial and postcolonial experiences in Asia and the Pacific, Cambridge 1998, 50–80.
- , Becoming modern in Malaysia. Women at the end of the twentieth century, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity and globalisation, Sydney 2000, 16–34.
- S. Sunindyo, Gender discourse on television, in V. M. Hooker (ed.), Culture and society in New Order Indonesia, Kuala Lumpur 1993, 134–48.
- J. I. Suryakusuma, The state and sexuality in New Order Indonesia, in L. J. Sears (ed.), Fantasizing the feminine in Indonesia, Durham, N.C. 1996, 92–119.
- S. Yasmeen, Settlement needs of Muslim women in Perth. A case study, in A. Saeed and S. Akbarzadeh (eds.), Muslim communities in Australia, Sydney 2001, 61–79.

MINA ROCES

Iran and Afghanistan

Domesticity is a social, cultural, and historical construction with multiple layers of meaning, including a type of space, a kind of work (paid or unpaid), and a relationship of power or organization (Hansen 1992). Constructions of domesticity in Iran and Afghanistan in the mid-nineteenth century to the present were shaped by broad economic developments and social and cultural practices, such as urbanization, the emergence of a middle class, state-building, and nationalist and missionary ideologies.

Differences among women based on ethnic and tribal group, region, social class, mode of subsistence, and family make it difficult to generalize about domesticity in relation to gender roles, identities, and ideologies. For example, in Afghanistan among the nomadic pastoralist Durrani Pashtuns, women are responsible for milking the animals and weaving the tent awnings, whereas among the Ghilzai Pashtuns men handle such tasks. Many women in Iran and Afghanistan work in agricultural production and make goods and crafts at home for sale in markets and private households. In many rural and poor urban families, children do the household work and caring for younger siblings and the flock. However, even though women perform important economic roles in both the household and larger society, throughout history they were defined primarily as wives, mothers, and the carers of children. In addition, a division of labor existed whereby women were confined to domestic activities, while the economic and political decisions outside the domestic sphere belonged to men.

Domesticity has served as an index of class. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in Iran and Afghanistan, a steady supply of domestic servants and relatives among people of means made up for the lack of modern household technology and amenities. This is still the case in Afghanistan today. Thus, some wealthy Iranian and Afghan women had an identity beyond what was defined by domesticity in that they enjoyed more leisure and recreational time and could entertain family and friends and partake in charitable, philanthropic, and political events. This strengthened their identity as actors in the public arena. Similar factors also allowed other poorer and middle-class women to utilize their domestic skills in commercial enterprises, such as embroidery or carpet-making.

Features of the patriarchal social structure were more entrenched in Afghanistan due to the predominance of pastoral nomadism as a mode of subsistence and the weaker role of the state in instituting “modernizing” reforms. For example, women’s reproductive roles were more fetishized in the context of Afghanistan’s ethnic, tribal kinship-based patriarchy in which women, labor, and land were owned by males (Moghadam 1999, 175). In contrast, even though the nomadic tribal population in Iran was also sizeable, a larger urban, middle class emerged in the early to mid-twentieth century.

In both Iran and Afghanistan, early twentieth-century reforms sought to modernize the role and status of women. Reza Shah Pahlavī of Iran (1925–41) and King Amān Allāh of Afghanistan (1919–29) instituted reforms in education, marriage, and dress. State-building projects that shaped domestic ideologies were influenced by the development of modern scientific thought that sought to rationalize the home and create a new hierarchy of power within it. Domesticity as a state project was a symbol of modernization and social transformation of the nation and its women. For projects of modern state building, women frequently become markers of political goals and cultural identity. Scientific domesticity as a state project and ideology involved disciplining and civilizing women. During the modernization periods of the early twentieth century in Iran and Afghanistan, the unveiled woman who was a household manager trained in the science of domesticity and proper hygiene signified modernity and progress. On the other hand, the veiled woman lacking an education in scientific domesticity symbolized backwardness and superstition. Women’s range of experiences and appearance was defined by the cultural and political goals of the state.

Studies of domesticity in the Middle East are in part about encounters between European and North American colonial and missionary projects and local communities in the settings of schools, women's organizations, and the periodical press. Unlike Afghanistan, Iran experienced considerable British, French, and especially American missionary influence in education. However, cultural encounters between missionaries and Iranians often inspired struggle over the content and meaning of domesticity.

American missionary notions of domesticity were based on belief in the "dignity of labor" of wife and mother as an ingredient of the modern, hygienic, scientifically ordered household, nation, and society. For example, the American Presbyterian girls' school Iran Bethel, established in 1895, introduced a course called "Household Arts." The curriculum included domestic science subjects such as designing and decorating a home, plumbing and water-gathering, heating, lighting, washing clothes, cooking, and sewing. Missionaries considered this type of education vital for modern Iranian womanhood and believed that it also secured the missionary influence on the Iranian household. However, the earliest students at Iran Bethel were from Iran's most wealthy and prominent families and were not accustomed to performing housework, which they viewed as best left to their servants.

Even though Iranian students initially resisted missionary models of domestic science education, reformers and certain segments of elite Iranian society embraced important notions of scientific domesticity. Feminists of the early twentieth century in particular used it to stake their claim in the educational and public arenas. As adherents of nationalist ideology, they argued that if Iran were to become a modern nation, the Iranian family, and particularly women who raised children, needed access to proper education and training. The Iranian women's journals Dānish (Knowledge, 1910–11) and Shukūfah (Blossom, 1914–18), founded by female editors Dr. Kahhal and Muzayyan al-Saltanah respectively, Ālam-i Nisvān (Women's universe, 1921–34), edited by graduates of Iran Bethel, and the Afghan women's journal Irshād-i Nisvān (Women's guidance, 1921–5), established by Queen Šurayyā, published articles on childcare, household affairs, and increased rights for women.

Domestic science education and elite women's writings had a concrete impact on Iranian and Afghan households. In the twentieth century, the rise of the urban middle classes, especially in Iran, led to the transformation of scientific domesticity into actual domestic practices.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Centlivres-Demont, Afghan women in peace, war, and exile, in M. Weiner and A. Banuazizi (eds.), The politics of social transformation in Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 333–65.
- V. Gregorian, The emergence of modern Afghanistan, Stanford, Calif. 1969.
- V. Moghadam, Reform, revolution and reaction. The trajectory of the "woman question" in Afghanistan, in V. Moghadam (ed.) Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994, 81–109.
- , Revolution, religion, and gender politics. Iran and Afghanistan compared, in Journal of Women's History 10:4 (1999), 172–95.
- A. Najmabadi, Crafting an educated housewife in Iran, in L. Abu-Lughod (ed.), Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998, 91–125.
- J. Rostam-Kolayi, Foreign education, the women's press, and the discourse of scientific domesticity in early-twentieth-century Iran, in N. Keddie and R. Matthee (eds.), Iran and the surrounding world. Interactions in culture and cultural politics, Seattle 2002, 182–204.
- N. Tapper, Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge, 1991.
- K. Transberg Hansen (ed.), African encounters with domesticity, New Brunswick, N.J. 1992.

JASAMIN ROSTAM-KOLAYI

Sub-Saharan Africa: Hausa Societies

Occupation of domestic roles, engagement with domestic labor, and association with domestic spaces of the home are central to the identities of Muslim Hausa women in Northern Nigeria. The identities of millions of ordinary rural and urban Muslim Hausa women are formed largely through their lived experiences of daily domesticity. The lives of women, especially adult married women, are strongly rooted in the domestic sphere, primarily via their occupation of the domestic space of the gida (courtyard home) within which they perform the daily tasks of domestic labor. Time use studies show that for both rural and urban Muslim Hausa women much of their time is occupied with domestic tasks. Dominant ideologies and prevailing socioreligious discourses also express, reflect, and ensure that women's place is in the home bearing and rearing children, preparing food, washing clothes, and engaging in the myriad of tasks essential to the daily and generational reproduction of the family, community, and society. With respect to the construction of Hausa women's identities via domesticity, the widespread practice of wife seclusion is one of its most fundamental aspects.

For many married women seclusion in the domestic sphere is part of the Hausa cultural environment today and dates back to the early nineteenth century and the Sokoto Jihad – a powerful campaign of Islamic religious reform that had major impacts on gender relations in the region that still resonate today. It is the ideologies and practices of seclusion that keep married Hausa Muslim women largely within their domestic courtyards screened from the public male gaze by high compound walls. The image of “leisured” domesticity associated with seclusion indicates high social status. Thus, with increased prosperity, or aspirations in that direction, wives find themselves increasingly tied to the domestic sphere by seclusion. Conversely, it is also argued that Hausa women opt for seclusion in order to boost their own social status and to reject the hard work of agriculture (associated with slave status of former times).

Geographically and historically Muslim Hausa women’s identities, as constructed through notions and practices of the domestic, reflect past and present ideological constructions and practices. Ideologies around domesticity are not monolithic, but intersect with other ideological terrains around gender, seclusion, marriage, ethnicity, and so on. Individuals and groups of people negotiate within and across these ideological fields. Ideologies and practices of domesticity shift with political and economic changes, but always involve conflict, power relations, and reconstruction of ideological fields in arenas of contestation and negotiation.

Seclusion is claimed to tie women to the domestic sphere, reduce their spatial mobility, limit their opportunities for income earning and increase their dependence on men and children. However, within their domesticity many Muslim Hausa women operate as secluded traders with economic roles that are diverse and in many circumstances fundamental to their household’s economic survival. There are, however, class variations, such that a few urban women work in the professions and the formal sector, thereby transcending the domestic sphere to work in public space(s) and in non-domestic occupations. Thus, not all Hausa women’s identities are defined by domesticity.

Up to the 1980s at least, in cities such as Katsina, another minority of Hausa women pursued alternatives to domesticity (that is, marriage, seclusion, and domestic labor) by supporting themselves as courtesans. This was also known in the past in rural areas with the existence of gidan mata (houses of women). Similarly and alongside courtesans, Hausa women Bori (spirit possession) adepts are dissociated from domesticity in that they do not observe seclusion, may go on hajj without their husbands, and suchlike. However, even Hausa women Bori adepts, while portrayed as powerful independent agents, are also recognized as being affected by the strong gendered social norms of Hausa femininity and its equation with domesticity and seclusion, in that relative to male Bori adepts their mobility is nonetheless restricted. With growing Islamism, options for women to pursue lifestyles as courtesans and Bori adepts were becoming less tenable by the 1990s.

Early insights into the domesticity that so overwhelmingly permeates the lives of many Hausa women are to be found in the account of Baba of Karo – an ordinary rural Muslim Hausa woman who recounted her life story to the anthropologist Mary Smith in the mid-twentieth century. Rural women today are much more widely secluded than in Baba’s time.

In the literature there are two contrasting and contradictory representations of Hausa women as formed through domesticity and their engagement with domestic labor: Hausa women as victims (domestic drudges) and in contrast Hausa women as agents (powerful matriarchs). Although this is a somewhat crude and caricaturing binary division, it nonetheless draws out the extent of diverse portrayals of Hausa women. In many ways both sets of representations are (regulatory?) fictional identities, in addition to being rather narrow and unidimensional. Alternative discourses and subject positions might be provided by Hausa women themselves, but we have very little information on how Hausa women would account for themselves. Clearly, who does the reporting partially determines how Hausa women are viewed and represented. Even such accounts as there are derived from Hausa women themselves contain contradictions. Baba of Karo provides evidence both of Hausa women actively resisting seclusion (Smith 1954, 80) and initiating divorce (ibid. 107–8), but also as victims of violent domestic abuse from their husbands (ibid. 169, 204, 232–5).

Discourses of Hausa women as victims of domesticity see them as subjugated by patriarchal oppression, subordinate, dependent on men/children, dispirited drudges, constrained, restricted to the home, immobile, to be pitied, imprisoned by seclusion, and controlled by husbands, men, and patriarchy; they are illiterate, poor, ignorant, powerless, and isolated.

At the other end of the spectrum, discourses of Hausa women as domestic agents portray them as intelligent, creative, strong, independent, self-reliant, and even subversive individuals actively resisting patriarchy and domestication. Albeit operating within and from the domestic realm, they are seen as powerful individuals, initiators of divorce, able to hold husbands in debt, control children's labor, and advise and influence male leaders. Images of Hausa women as agents illustrate how they are socially, economically, politically, and culturally active within and despite the domesticity that dominates their lives. These Muslim women are in control of their own lives, their children, and the economic and other affairs of their households. Such women are seen to have strong networks within and beyond the domestic realm and to be powerful, active traders, courtesans, Bori adepts, and so on. Some argue that because Hausa women subvert the restrictions of domesticity they are not victims. For example, while women may not be able to choose to reject seclusion, they can and do manipulate its conditions, constantly devising ways to exploit and work around restrictions of occupying and being occupied by the domestic.

Despite their limited spatial mobility and physical restriction to the domestic space of the courtyard and home (gida), secluded Muslim Hausa wives have an impact (albeit indirect) on external political affairs through influencing their husbands and the upbringing of their children. This is especially true for the elite, most domesticated, and tightly secluded of all Hausa women – the royal wives in the Kano Palace. A tiny minority of highly educated Hausa women scholars and poets (mostly from the past, but some today) are similarly portrayed as influential in political and social matters, albeit from within their domestic roles as model wives and mothers.

The discourse that emphasizes women's agency sees Hausa women occupying domestic women's worlds that are portrayed as sites of strength and separateness, reflecting feminine value systems. This is a valorization of the domestic, private sphere in which men are not welcomed and from which they remain largely absent. It is a domesticity within which women are viewed as culturally autonomous, active agents (rather than passive victims) who wield the potential for subverting established male power. Thus, although appearing thoroughly domesticated, Muslim women in Northern Nigeria resist domestication through covert or indirect bargaining (albeit not in overt organized ways), in face-to-face relations with husbands, children, co-wives, other kin, friends, and neighbors with such strategies as diversion of food, income, or labor resources.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. Boyd and B. B. Mack, Women's Islamic literature in Northern Nigeria. 150 years of tradition, 1820–1970, in K. W. Harrow (ed.), The marabout and the muse. New approaches to Islam in Islamic literature, London 1996, 142–58.

- B. Callaway, Muslim Hausa women in Nigeria. Tradition and change, New York 1987.
- C. Coles and B. B. Mack (eds.), Hausa women in the twentieth century, Madison, Wis. 1991.
- A. M. Imam, Politics, Islam, and women in Kano, Northern Nigeria, in V. M. Moghadam (ed.), Identity politics and women. Cultural reassertions and feminisms in international perspective, Boulder, Colo. 1994, 123–44.
- A. Koko and J. Boyd, Nana Asma'u, in B. Awe (ed.), Nigerian women in historical perspective, Lagos 1992, 37–54.
- R. Longhurst, Resource allocation and the sexual division of labor. A case study of a Moslem Hausa village in northern Nigeria, in L. Beneria (ed.), Women in development, New York 1982, 95–117.
- B. B. Mack, Authority and influence in the Kano harem, in F. Kaplan (ed.), Queens, queen mothers, priestesses and power. Case studies in African gender, New York 1997, 159–72.
- S. O'Brien, Pilgrimage, power, and identity. The role of the Hajj in the lives of Nigerian Hausa Bori adepts, in Africa Today 46 (1999), 10–40.
- R. Pittin, Houses of women. A focus on alternative lifestyles in Katsina City, in C. Oppong (ed.), Female and male in West Africa, London 1983, 291–302.
- , Social status and economic opportunity in urban Hausa society, in F. A. Ogunshye et al. (eds.), Nigerian women and development, Ibadan 1988, 264–79.
- E. Robson, Wife seclusion and the spatial praxis of gender ideology in Nigerian Hausaland, in Gender, Place and Culture. Journal of Feminist Geography 7 (2000), 179–99.
- E. Schildkrout, Hajija Husaina. Notes on the life history of a Hausa woman, in P. W. Romero (ed.), Life histories of African women, London 1988, 78–98.
- E. B. Simmons, A case-study in food production, sale and distribution, in R. Chambers, R. Longhurst, and A. Pacey (eds.), Seasonal dimensions to rural poverty, London 1981, 73–80.
- M. F. Smith, Baba of Karo. A woman of the Muslim Hausa, London 1954, repr. 1981.
- , Baba of Karo [in Hausa], Kano 1991.

ELSBETH ROBSON

Turkey

After the foundation of the republic in 1923, Turkey went through an immense and profound process of modernization, which in the Turkish case meant the adoption of Western social, cultural, and economic structures and the abolition of traditional institutions. As part of this grand project, the Kemalist reforms were initiated, which radically affected the status of women. Such reforms included the introduction of a secular Civil Code that banned polygamy and granted women enhanced property rights. Although women had property rights in the Ottoman Empire, the scope and the use of such rights remained very limited and covered only upper-class and educated women. With the reforms, however, the scope of property rights expanded to a universal scale. In addition, all free religious schools were banned; primary education was made compulsory for both boys and girls; and Western codes of dressing were supported. These reforms were significant in their ascription of a new role for women, who were to take part in the public sphere as a sign of Westernization. The republican elites were of the opinion that women were not only to act as a medium of modernization but were also to take on an instrumental role. Women as homemakers and as mothers who would raise the future generations of citizens according to the ideals of the state were to distribute the values of the republic and to construct a modern family. This was not a means of confining women to the domestic sphere; in addition to their roles in the household, women were to take part in the public sphere by way of education and work.

Although the Kemalist reforms resulted in the increasing visibility of women in the public sphere, this reflected more the case of elite families in urban areas who were committed to the republican ideals (Abadan-Unat 1991, 183). The peripheral masses, mostly in rural areas, were dominated by Islamic values that asserted the segregation of the sexes and confined women to domesticity. This section of society was reluctant to send its daughters to schools beyond primary level. In order to convince traditional families to allow their daughters to be educated without disrupting the patriarchal ideology and prescribed gender roles, in the 1930s the Turkish state started to establish girls' institutes in accordance with the Kemalist reforms. This development illustrates the consensus between the Kemalist modernizers and the traditional families on the gender roles of women centered on domesticity.

The girls' institutes were single-sex educational institutes at high school level where daily contact with the opposite sex was curtailed. In these schools students were trained to be good housewives and mothers. The establishment of the girls' institutes emerged out of a policy of compromise between the state and the society: female children were to be educated, but along the lines of their gender roles and not in a coeducational environment. With the girls' institutes, the state would ensure women's education and women would spread a modern and Westernized lifestyle to society.

The education program of the girls' institutes served to rationalize and modernize domesticity. Subjects offered at the institutes included needlework, handicrafts, knitting, courtesy, painting, child development, family economics, nutrition, and so forth. With the aim of becoming good housewives, the students were taught how to sew and iron Western attire, how to welcome guests with Western etiquette, how to use dinner services and serve food at a table. At a time when food was eaten with wooden spoons on the floor, these courses served to implement the modern lifestyle. In order to become good mothers, the students were taught how to bring up the future generation with scientific and medical knowledge. For instance, they learned that feeding bottles and diapers needed to be sterile and that when children became ill, they were not to be cured by old wives' techniques but by medical doctors and nurses. After centuries of women doing the same work of mothering and housekeeping, transferring their know-how from generation to generation, students were now being taught in public institutions with schoolteachers under a scientific curriculum.

The institutes' objective of modernizing traditional femininity in the service of the republic's orientation toward the West resulted in two paradoxes (Ş. Toktaş 2002, 427). First, although these schools trained students how to be good housewives, some of the graduates did not become housewives exclusively. With the high school diplomas they had earned they worked in the public sphere as civil servants in state offices such as post offices or banks. Second, among the graduates who chose to work, some did not marry and become mothers as anticipated (motherhood in Turkey is strictly confined to marriage). These outcomes became possible with the specific track of Turkish modernity and the opportunities it offered to women. The Kemalist reforms, imposed from above, enabled women to take part in the public sphere and women in return adopted these reforms willingly and elaborated them. Women who perceived themselves empowered by education and work were able to stand on their own feet. Women were able to redefine their gender roles and take a greater part in public life.

In 1974, the girls' institutes were changed into girls' vocational high schools and the educational program was reformed. The restructured schools prioritized vocational education and employment. Due to the industrialization of Turkey and the incompatibility of the former education program with the labor markets, the curricula of the vocational schools were more oriented toward the needs of industry. Today, the courses given at girls' vocational high schools are industrial design, textile painting and weaving, pastry cooking, interior decoration, food analysis, electronics, jewelry making, hairdressing, and the like. The change from the girls' institutes to vocational high schools marks the difference in the approach to women: the former aimed to produce housewives and mothers, the latter members of the workforce.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

N. Abadan-Unat, The impact of legal and educational reforms on Turkish women, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Boundaries in sex and gender, London 1991, 177-94.

Ş. Toktaş, Engendered emotions. Gender awareness of Turkish women mirrored through regrets in the course of life, in Women's Studies International Forum 25 (2002), 423-31.

ŞULE TOKTAŞ

Family Relations

The Caucasus

This entry deals mainly with Azerbaijan. This is because of the shortage of relevant scholarship on the rest of the Muslim Caucasus. Family relations in the Muslim Caucasus are based on gender and generational hierarchies whereby the elders command great respect and authority over the young. In the pre-Soviet era men had absolute authority over their wives and children, as reflected in the phrase ar Allahin kolgasidir (a husband is the shadow of God). The Soviet revolution attempted to alter many of the patriarchal aspects of family and gender relations by banning the practices of polygamy, and underage and forced marriages, and through setting up women's committees, "zhensoviets," which campaigned for women's emancipation and intervened in cases of violence against women. Gender equality was established in legislation concerning marriage, custody of children, inheritance, and employment (Heyat 2002, 80).

During the Soviet era extended family and kinship relations continued to form the most fundamental basis of support for the individual and the focus of their loyalties (Chenciner 1997, Tohidi 1996, 1998). However, there were subtle and profound changes in family and gender relations, especially in the industrialized urban centers in Azerbaijan. The liberalization in intergenerational relations was most marked in mother/daughter-in-law relations. It was transformed from a highly authoritarian relationship where a young bride was expected to act as a maid in the service of the husband's household, to one of mutual support and loyalty. Similarly, husband/wife relationships, particularly among the intelligentsia, were significantly transformed, as noted in the change of term for a spouse, hayat yoldash (life comrade/friend). Nevertheless, the husband, ar, remained the nominal head of the family and the main breadwinner (Heyat 2002, 145).

In the later Soviet era as women entered employment en masse (in the rural areas as members of collective farms, kolkhoz) they became breadwinners as well as largely assuming charge of household affairs and the education of children. The Soviet media and the state regularly promoted the position of mothers, awarding medals and rewards to women with many children. The system of strong reciprocal support within the close-knit extended family also reinforced the mother's position, since it was often the maternal grandmother and aunts who helped with the care of children (Heyat 2000). Mothers and grandmothers generally wield overwhelming influence over their offspring in matters of education, marriage, and residence. However, fathers also retain close relations with their children, especially with their sons. Among the siblings, brothers often assume authority over sisters regarding issues of sexual propriety and female conduct. This is less so among the educated professional strata of society where male-female relations are more liberal.

Given the strength of the institution of family, relations with cousins, whether on the paternal or maternal side, are often very close. It is not uncommon for people to refer to their first cousin as their brother or sister. The mutual support and loyalty expected from the kin group, particularly the first degree family members, makes it incumbent on the adult children to care for elderly parents. Traditionally, the youngest son is expected to remain with his parents after marriage and eventually to inherit the family home. Widows normally live with their youngest son and his family. Under the Soviet system shortage of housing reinforced the practice of multiple generations living in a single household (Chenciner 1997). However, this also led to increased tension in the household and friction between generations, in particular with in-laws. In cases of family disputes, the customary arbiter is a well-respected elder member, the ak sakkal (gray beard). The ak birchek (gray hair), female elder, often mediates disputes between women members. It is rare for Azeri families to resort to the legal system to resolve a conflict with a relative.

In Azerbaijan, and generally among the Muslims in the Caucasus, the family as a network of support and control, particularly of women, led to few incidents of runaway children. In Soviet times, in cases of serious conflict within the family a child could move on to live with a close relative, or failing that, to a state boarding house caring for orphaned or abandoned children. In many of these state homes, especially in the larger cities, the degree of care and concern for the children's welfare was reasonably high. However, since independence, there is a growing population of displaced and homeless young people in the major cities. The vulnerability of runaway girls, in the absence of family protection and state provisions, is further escalated with the increase in prostitution and the post-Soviet lawlessness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Chenciner, Daghestan. Tradition and survival, London 1997.
- F. Heyat, Azeri professional women's life strategies, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and Identity Construction: Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 177–201.
- , Azeri women in transition. Women in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, London 2002.
- N. Tohidi, Soviet in public, Azeri in private, in Women's Studies International Forum 19:1/2 (1996), 111–23.
- , “Guardians of the nation.” Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137–61.

FARIDEH HEYAT

Central Asia

The traditional Central Asian family is extended, patrilineal, and patrilocal. There are many variations over this vast area, especially between the historically sedentary and the nomadic peoples. These were intensified by differential exposure to Sovietization, Tajikistan being the least influenced and Kazakhstan the most, with urban populations more affected than rural.

There are also significant similarities, particularly in basic gender characteristics. Inculcated in children from birth, in order to induce appropriate behavior patterns, and in Central Asia both sex and age dependent, these are crucial to family relationships. Since this region is a gerontocracy, young men and women are expected to be submissive to parents but gain power as they age. However, gender stereotypes depict the mature controlling man and the young sexually pure, submissive women, thus naturalizing older male dominance. In much of the region, young people have little, if any, choice over marriage arrangements and mothers have been known to force even their sons into unwanted unions. Nevertheless, in many more educated and/or urban circles young people may choose their own spouses, with parental approval. At least among Tajiks and Uzbeks, marriage between first cousins is frequent, while Kazakhs marry exogamously. Traditional family organization is often maintained even by the most highly educated, and the worst thing that could happen to a Central Asian family is to lose its honor (nāmūs) through improper gender-related behavior from either sex.

Traditional family relations are strongly formalized. Relational rather than proper names are used when addressing, and talking about, members, and teknonymy is prevalent in all but the most Russianized environments. The strictest customs regulate the conduct of the daughter-in-law (kelin), particularly as a new bride. Kelin literally means incomer and at least until they have consolidated their relationship within their marital family by bearing sons, brides remain on sufferance and must strive hard to please. They should remain silent and work hard. A man's first allegiance is to his natal family, so a kelin will rarely have anyone on her side if she has problems with one of her in-laws.

It is important for a kelin to bear a child as soon as possible, with patrilocal residence intensifying son preference. In Soviet times large families were prevalent, especially in Tajikistan and Turkmenistan, with 15 or more children not uncommon in rural areas. While desired numbers of children have dropped since independence, the tendency remains on the high side. One son, often the youngest, will be expected to remain with his parents for life and he and his wife will have the primary responsibility for their care. It is considered shaming to abandon old people, and large families mean that childless individuals can usually find someone to look after them. Barrenness is highly stigmatized, usually blamed on women, and considered an acceptable reason for polygyny or divorce.

Especially among newly-weds, divorce is greatly on the increase in most of Central Asia, owing to economic pressures, social instability, and, in Tajikistan at least, a dearth of young men. In that republic divorce is almost as often initiated by mothers-in-law as by husbands. However, women who make a good living, whose husbands, unemployed, and thus a drain on resources, refuse to carry out traditionally female domestic and child-care tasks, are starting to instigate divorce. Despite legal equality, women often suffer hardship upon divorce, including social opprobrium as well as material difficulties. In pre-Soviet times children were held to belong to the patrilineage. However, since Soviet courts almost always awarded children to divorced mothers, even after a religious divorce, mothers today very often take the children. As there is little or no shared custody, the parent who does not take the children may rarely, if ever, see them again.

Legally, divorcees and widows have a right to remain in the family home. However, if this belongs to their in-laws they are more likely to move back in with their parents. Remarriage is not stigmatized, although for those with large numbers of children this may be difficult. Levirate marriage, common before the revolution, is less prevalent today. Much to women's dismay, polygyny is on the increase, especially among labor migrants, who may have a wife in more than one place.

Major decisions are usually discussed in family councils in which traditionally men are the main locutors. In some circles women may voice their opinions directly, in others only through husbands or other males. Conflicts are similarly settled in these councils, or with the help or support of religious leaders or mahalla tribal elders. However, young people can rarely appeal against the edicts of their parents, especially over choice of spouse. While boys have considerable mobility and so can distance themselves from family disputes, girls' movements are more restricted to the home, where many feel alienated and isolated.

In Kyrgyzstan and Karakalpakstan the practice of bride stealing, either with the girl's compliance or against her will, is common. Suicide is one response to forced marriages, particularly in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan, usually by self-immolation, drowning, or imbibing industrial-strength vinegar. Another option for girls under severe pressure is to run away from home, if possible to a relative. Otherwise, they may end up among the increasing numbers of street children, who hang around market places trying to earn enough to eat, and sleep under bridges or in other sheltered places. Rates of sexually transmitted diseases are on the rise among this cohort, many of whom resort to prostitution to survive.

The post-Soviet period has seen an increase in family violence, mainly committed by husbands, but also by parents and in-laws. This is worsened by drug addiction, and compounded by rhetoric, legitimized by appeals to religion that situates men as the masters in the home, and the discourse of honor that limits women's rights to protest or reveal family problems. Most republics now have non-governmental organizations that provide some protection and support for victims of domestic violence but despite laws against this, it is rare for officials to take action. Instead they remain complicit with tradition, which, notwithstanding the decades of Soviet rule, remains the most important influence on Central Asian families.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. Blackwell, Tradition and society in Turkmenistan. Gender, oral culture and song, Richmond, Surrey 2001.

- C. Harris, Muslim views on population. The case of Tajikistan, in J. Meuleman (ed.), Islam in the era of globalization. Muslim attitudes towards modernity and identity, London 2002, 211–22.
- , Control and subversion. Gender relations in Tajikistan, London 2004.
- E. Hvoslov, The social use of personal names among the Kyrgyz, in Central Asian Survey 20:1 (2001), 85–95.
- S. Kadyrov, Some questions on the study of the Turkmen family, in Central Asian Survey 12:3 (1993), 393–400.
- K. Kuehnast, Let the stone lie where it has fallen. Dilemmas of gender and generation in post-Soviet Kyrgyzstan, Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota 1997.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, Lahore 1995.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva and E. Turgumbekova, The daughters of Amazons. Voices from Central Asia, Lahore 1996.
- C. Werner, The dynamics of feasting and gift exchange in rural Kazakstan, in I. Svanberg (ed.), Contemporary Kazaks. Cultural and social perspectives, New York 1999, 47–72.
- T. A. Zhdanko and G. P. Vasil'eva, The new and the traditional in the daily life of rural families in Central Asia and Kazakhstan [in Russian], Moscow 1980, 47–72.

COLETTE HARRIS

South Asia

While Muslims in South Asia are divided between India (14 percent of the population), Pakistan (97 percent), Bangladesh (85 percent), and Sri Lanka (9 percent), their history is common before 1947, and different after that largely according to the politics of each state.

In all South Asian families, the birth of a female infant is celebrated less joyously than that of a male. In spite of government family planning efforts, as in India from the 1960s, most Muslim families are unconvinced about birth control methods. The preference for sons leads to large families. The prospect of dowry payments and of losing the daughter to the spouse's family makes daughters less respected and cherished in perceptible ways, although parental love may be the same for girls as for boys.

The infant begins to be constructed as a gendered being almost immediately after birth. As the child grows up, the allotment of family resources in all areas of life is in favor of men over women. The majority of Muslims in India are either farmers in rural areas, or artisans in urban areas. Girls as daughters and women as wives are almost never given apprenticeship in a craft, but they do play an indispensable role in the family's occupation. This role goes unacknowledged, and all women are regarded as primarily cooks, servers, and nurturers, not workers. Women who are acknowledged as wage earners are usually in weaker economic and political positions than men with similar skills. Middle-class women are progressively better educated and pursue work outside the home. However, their image also remains predominantly that of home-maker.

While the acquisition of knowledge is enjoined on all, the knowledge is limited for most children, and specially for girls, to the learning by rote of some portions of the Qur'an. In the colonial period, because Muslims were accused of being "backward" partly because of the condition of Muslim women, reform of this backwardness, such as the attempts of Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khān, stressed the importance of education. While schools and educational programs for girls came to be seen as indicative of progress, it was considered essential to retain signs of the community, such as the practices of purdah and seclusion, alongside education.

Important family sacraments include the nikāh, marriage contract, which is a sunna of the Prophet. The bars to marriage are blood relationship or consanguinity between the woman and her male ascendants and descendants, and relationship by marriage or affinity. Dowry is a practical bar to celebrating the birth of girls on an equal footing with boys. Although theoretically undesirable in Islam, it is prevalent, like purdah, across class divisions, but markedly in upwardly mobile families. Divorce (ṭalāq) is permissible, and though not frequent, is discriminatory against women. Mahr, or the bride-price settled specifically upon women, could theoretically be a counter to easy divorce, except that most mahr amounts are relatively low, and most women are prevailed upon to forego mahr payments. Women are guaranteed rights to inheritance but, as with mahr, may be dissuaded from claiming them, and only a few cases of non-observance are taken to court.

The nationalist state in India, with its constitution of 1950, guarantees equal rights to all its citizens and makes special provisions for women. But the Indian state has been "communal" in that it has relied on an identity that was Sanskritic and on institutions such as personal law to cover the areas of marriage, divorce, adoption, and inheritance. Personal law, defended by the community as essential for its self-definition, and condemned by both progressivists and fundamentalists as regressive in its denial of rights to the individual, is itself a hybrid. It was concocted over two hundred and more years by the colonial state with its fears and prejudices, from selected oral testimonies, Indian interpreters' reports, colonial constructions, and internal debates within classes of people in India. Muslim personal law may be criticized for its adherence to polygamy, easy divorce by men, and unequal rights of inheritance. The state, in its continued acceptance of this law, as well as through all other legal and political measures, supports the community in its gendered exercise of power.

While modesty and chastity in both men and women are highly prized, and the Qur'an asks both men and women to lower their eyes, it is women who are veiled. Everyday life, to be properly Islamic, is supposed to be defined by sharm (modesty and self-effacement on the part of women). Purdah as the worn garment or veil indicates varying exercise of control and agency. Its wearing is largely in inverse relationship to modern education, occupation, and self-consciousness. But its wearing also permits a degree of autonomy and freedom, and is liberating for women in giving them the ability to move about almost freely and engage in almost any occupation. In contemporary times, the covering of the self can also be a political statement of women's control over their own choices and lives.

Purdah, literally curtain, or the physical seclusion of women, is practiced also through the separation of public/outside space and private/inside space, and then through the segregation of domestic space as men's and women's. Whether it be one room or a self-sufficient section of a capacious house, there is a "separate world" for women, enforced by the design of spaces and buildings. This confinement, while a hindrance to equality, is also a source of agency and power for women.

In Pakistan and Bangladesh there is a patriarchal unity of purpose between the state and the community, and change in inegalitarian gender relations within the family occurs gradually through reform. In India, there is, ironically, a similar unity between a secular/Hindu state and the Muslim community, but reform becomes more elusive because, as in colonial times, the community can claim its autonomy from "external" interference and resist legal and educational change.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ahmad (ed.), Family, kinship and marriage among the Muslims, Delhi 1976.
 —, Divorce and remarriage among Muslims in India, Delhi 2003.
 V. R. Bevan Jones and L. Bevan Jones, Women in Islam. A manual with special reference to conditions in India, Lucknow 1941, repr. Westport, Conn. 1987.
 N. Haksar, Campaign for a uniform code, in A. R. Desai (ed.), Women's liberation and politics of religious personal laws in India, Bombay 1986, 47–51.
 Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, Delhi 1994.

- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1979, repr. 2000.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991.
- G. Minault (ed.), The extended family. Women and political participation in India and Pakistan, Columbia, Mo. 1981.
- H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Delhi 1982.
- Z. Pathak and R. S. Rajan, Shah Bano, in Signs 14:3 (1989), 558–82.
- T. Saliba, C. Allen, and J. A. Howard (eds.), Gender, politics, and Islam, Chicago 2002.
- C. Vreede-de-Stuers, Parda. A study of Muslim women's life in northern India, Assen, Netherlands 1968.

NITA KUMAR

Sub-Saharan Africa: Fulbe Societies

Terminology alone does not offer a sensible guide to intimate family relationships between husband and wife, siblings, children and parents, and extended kin. Rather, in order to discuss the complex interaction of gender, Islam, and family in sub-Saharan Africa, one has to examine the relationships between individuals and within domestic groups that are characterized by continually shifting relationships of authority, influence, emotional solidarity, and conflict. Family and gender are better explored as negotiated processes than terms to be defined. Several aspects of these relationships are addressed in this entry, such as power, access to resources, political economy, marriage patterns, mobility, inter-generational relationships, fostering, social status, and kinship. Attention must be paid to the embedded nature of gender as a material, social institution and as a set of ideologies located in a particular politico-economic and historic context. Abu-Lughod argues for “ethnographies of the particular” by which she locates the effects of extra-local and long-term processes as manifested locally and specifically, produced in the actions of individuals living their particular lives, inscribed in their bodies and their words (Abu-Lughod 1999, 150). Following Abu-Lughod’s model, this entry raises these broader theoretical and practical issues related to the study of family, gender, and Islam and then situates these ideas within a particular social, geographic, and historic context – that of the Muslim Fulbe of West Africa.

Fulbe is the term used in the Futa region of Guinea to describe the people who speak the language Pular, known elsewhere as Fula, Fulani, Peul, or Haalpulaaren. The Fulbe are one of West Africa’s most populous ethnic groups and are widely scattered across the sub-region in a more or less continuous belt, stretching from The Gambia and Senegal in the west to Cameroon and beyond in the east (Oppong 2002, 28). While they are considered one of the major cattle-keeping peoples of the world (Riesman 1984, 171), they are also known as farmers, traders, and learned Islamic teachers. The Fulbe brought Islam to the Guinea/ Senegal region in the mid 1700s, when the pastoralist nomads settled down in villages with their conquered slaves. The jihad provided the initial justification for the enslavement of the infidels, a practice perpetuated through the Fulbe social hierarchy of nobles, captives, and artisan groups. Most Fulbe practice a syncretic form of (Tijāniyya) Sufism, in which cultural beliefs and norms are combined with Islamic principles.

In the traditional view of a rural Fulbe household in Guinea, the child is born into the suudu (hut), given to her neene (mother) by her baaba (father). He or she generally shares the suudu with full siblings or neene-gotoobe (children of the same mother) who are raised according to their sex and birth order. Since many marriages are polygynous, the household may be composed of several buildings that house co-wives and their children and correspond to discrete household economies. Each wife has her separate set of tools, utensils, and foodstuffs for daily activities and is usually responsible for producing items for sauce such as tomatoes, beans, onions, and okra from her suntuure (household garden) and for purchasing clothing, shoes, and medicine for her children. Money gained from the sale of items from the suntuure, from income-generating activities outside the household, or from grain harvested in a field given to her exclusively for cultivation by her husband are considered hers to keep. The beyngure, or entire domestic unit into which an individual is born, might be extremely large and widespread. Usually the oldest male is considered the head of the household and is the one in charge of all the different domestic units situated in the fenced area, of which there may be many. Included may be aging parents, semi-permanent visitors, children who are being fostered, a tenant who is farming for the season or practicing a trade, or a son who has married and is living with the family.

Family relationships tend to be more normative in rural than urban areas because there is strong community power to sanction behavior and relationships. For the patrilineal Fulbe, parallel cousin marriage is preferred in order to maintain wealth and land within the family. The Fulbe refer to this as the best and worst type of marriage, as there is simultaneously great familial support and intense social pressure for the marriage to succeed and to avoid divorce. Levirate marriages are common, where a widow is remarried to her late spouse's brother, and women past childbearing age tend to be married for respectability and stature in the community.

Discussions about the family are often based on the males' point of view rather than looking at the rights and responsibilities transferred through marriage to women, such as domestic labor, sexuality, and children. There is often a significant age difference between a man and his wife because of the demands on men to accumulate sufficient bride-wealth and to attain the appropriate status in the family to have the support of the father, uncles, and other influential family members. For women, access to resources is made possible through marriage, though it can be especially problematic in polygynous unions. The move to her husband's house/village upon marriage marks the transition from girl to woman. Marriages are most often arranged by the parents of the young woman. Unlike many other West African societies, Fulbe consider neither premarital sex nor dating as precursors to marriage, as the resulting union would be impure before Allah (Furth 2004, 94). In fact, Fulbe prohibit girlfriends and boyfriends from marrying, especially in cases where sexual relationships are confirmed in pregnancy. Virginity is highly prized for brides, although recent estimates of sexual activity among teenagers in Guinea (Görge et al. 1998) suggests that virginity may be more symbolic than real, reflected by the decrease in the practice of displaying bloodstained sheets after the marriage is consummated or the willingness to fabricate proof in order to protect the families' honor (Furth 2004, 104).

Power differences within families based on parity and gender differently affect members' ability to access resources such as land, housing, money, and education. For those who move with their husbands, migration is a source of new ideas and skills, but for those who are denied resources within the marriage, migration may become a means to financial independence. Women in rural areas generally face greater family-related social and economic constraints than their male counterparts and may view mobility, as well as extra-marital sexual networking, as alternatives. The process of leaving is a catalyst for change and negotiation of social roles for women that clearly merits further exploration and research.

The pilgrimage to Mecca is another transformative experience for women, as the Hadja title is a religious, social, and economic status symbol. For a woman to have her child finance the pilgrimage to Mecca is a sign of success: she has raised her children to be contributors to the family economy, according to Islamic principles. Status in the community and family has traditionally been based on hereditary positions and religious learning, perpetuated through marital alliances. However, the ability of young men to make their fortune through labor migration has led to an increase in interethnic marriages and marriages between high and low status families. Movement from rural areas to urban centers also allows for temporary, informal living arrangements between men and women where the consent of the families is not sought, for example relationships that are called tap to me (Krio for "cohabit with me") by Fulbe in Sierra Leone (Andrews 2004). While these extra-familial relationships are not commonly discussed or condoned, they are an important example of how migration to urban African cities and beyond provides an expansion of cultural norms and gender roles.

Kinship is a strategic resource in this context where migration is a durable feature of everyday life and seizing opportunities in other regions may depend on the presence of kin, whether real or practical, to ease the initial pressures of the move. Particularly in Guinea, Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Côte d'Ivoire, many Fulbe, who may have originally arrived as economic migrants, have now become forcibly displaced because of war. For Fulbe, practical kin are created through sharing household resources, care of children, and having a common place of origin. While the existence and importance of a biological caregiver is assumed, children may spend a substantial amount of time away from blood relatives. Fostering is a common practice; children may go to live with a childless aunt, an older relative who needs assistance, or family in an urban area who can provide support while the child is at school. Children provide a link between scattered family members, particularly for a group like the Fulbe who continue to be migrants for economic and political reasons. The maintenance of family ties through marriage, remittances, fostering, and visits for funerals and other important ceremonies remains vital in maintaining a sense of Fulbe identity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments. Honor and poetry in a Bedouin society, Berkeley 1986, 1999 (updated ed.).
- L. Andrews, Sembakounya camp life, in K. Jacobsen (ed.), Refugee camps. A problem of our time, Palgrave MacMillan Publishers (forthcoming).
- M. Di Leonardo (ed.), Gender at the crossroads of knowledge. Feminist anthropology in the postmodern era, Berkeley 1991.

- R. Furth, Marrying the forbidden other. Marriage status and social change in the Futa Jallon Highlands of Guinea, Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, Madison 2004.
- R. Görgein et al. (eds.), Sexual behavior and attitudes among unmarried urban youths in Guinea, in International Family Planning Perspectives 24 (1998), 65–71.
- Y. Oppong, Moving through and passing on. Fulani mobility, survival and identity in Ghana, New Brunswick, N.J. 2002.
- P. Riesman, The Fulani in a development context. The relevance of cultural traditions for coping with change and crisis, in E. P. Scott (ed.), Life before the drought, London 1984, 171–91.
- , First find your child a good mother, New Brunswick, N.J. 1992.

B. LACEY ANDREWS

Turkey

Gender and family relations in Turkey are influenced by traditions stemming from the Ottoman-Islamic heritage, pre-Islamic Turkic origins, and Mediterranean culture, all interacting with the processes of a revolutionary modernization. Turkey is an extremely heterogeneous country and women's positions and gender relations in the family vary significantly according to place of residence, level of education, and professional status.

The position of women in the family and society changed considerably after the Kemalist reforms, which had the aim of establishing a secular nation-state. However, the first initiatives for the emancipation of women and democratization of family relations were taken during the Tanzimat period, in the latter half of the nineteenth century. The leading ideologue of Turkism, Ziya Gökalp, asserted that a family morality based on ancient Turkish cultural values included norms such as democracy in the family, the equality of men and women, and monogamous marriage (Kandiyoti 1995). Gökalp's ideas had a great influence on Mustafa Kemal Atatürk in the processes of Westernization, secularization, and nation-building.

In 1926, the Turkish Civil Code, modeled after the Swiss Code, was adopted. This law abolished polygamy, and endorsed compulsory civil marriage, the right of divorce for both partners, and egalitarian inheritance laws. However, the civil law failed to establish full legal equality between the sexes since it contained several clauses that endorsed a traditional male-headed family model and institutionalized women's dependence on men (Arat 1994). In 2001, the Civil Code was amended. The "head of the household" clause was eliminated, each spouse acquired the right to represent the conjugal union, and a new regime ensuring sharing of property after divorce was adopted.

While legal reforms were important in securing women's rights, a basic ambiguity influencing women and family relations was also institutionalized. Even though women's education and participation in the public sphere were encouraged, their main and most sacred duty was specified as motherhood. The persistence of traditional role patterns within families, the double burden of working women, and strict control of female sexuality has led to a labeling of Turkish women as "emancipated but unliberated" (Kandiyoti 1987).

The success of legal reforms in changing women's conditions was limited to the extent that Islamic traditions concerning sex roles have remained socially valid, especially in rural areas (Toprak 1981). There have not been radical changes in the status of peasant women who work full time as unpaid family workers. Arranged marriage, demand for bride price, marriage of underage girls, and boy preference are common practices in rural areas.

In urban areas, arranged marriage is rapidly declining and young people are afforded a relative autonomy in their marriage decisions (Sunar 2002). Marriage in order to start a family is almost universal: the marriage rate is above 90 percent. The divorce rate is still low, with only around 6 per cent of all marriages ending in divorce. Cohabitation without formal marriage is rare and is often morally stigmatized. Fertility rates vary significantly with women's level of education. While women with lower levels of education give birth to an average of 2.5 children, this number declines to 0.8 children for women with higher education (SIS 1998).

The bilateral kinship system in Turkey, in which descent is traced equally through both males and females, shows more similarity to Mediterranean countries than to the patrilineal descent system of most Middle Eastern Islamic countries (Baştuğ 2002). Kinship loyalties are strong and ties between parents and children are very close. Children of both sexes remain with their parents until marriage and frequent interaction is maintained after marriage. Families try to live near other kin and routinely exchange goods and informal services. The social security system is not well developed in Turkey and close family ties extending into kinship relations serve an important function of security in times of crisis and conflict. Wider kinship relations are extremely important in both rural and urban areas in Turkey among all social classes, despite the high percentage of nuclear family residence (Duben 1982). The modern Turkish family does not exhibit the pattern of separateness and autonomy of members from one another and their wider kin but one of continued emotional interdependence (Kağıtçıbaşı 1985).

In Turkish families, women have the main responsibility for housework, childcare, and care of the elderly. When they receive help, it is mainly other women – their daughters, mothers, or paid female helpers, not their husbands – who share their workload. This traditional division of labor remains valid even for a majority of dual-earner, professional couples (Sümer 2002). Family members are highly dependent on each other for the care of small children and the elderly. A familistic gender regime prevails in Turkey (Drew, Emerek, and Mahon 1998). The assumption that childcare and care of the elderly should be met within the family (that is, by women) leads to low public provisions and supports the male-breadwinner/female-housewife family model.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Z. F. Arat, Turkish women and the republican reconstruction of tradition, in F. M. Göcek and S. Balaghi (eds.), Reconstructing gender in the Middle East. Traditions, identity, and power, New York 1994, 57–78.
- S. Baştuğ, The household and family in Turkey. An historical perspective, in R. Liljeström and E. Özdalga (eds.), Autonomy and dependence in the family. Turkey and Sweden in critical perspective, Istanbul 2002, 99–115.
- E. Drew, R. Emerek, and E. Mahon (eds.), Women, work and the family in Europe, London 1998.
- A. Duben, The significance of family and kinship in urban Turkey, in Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı (ed.), Sex roles, family, and community in Turkey, Bloomington, Ind. 1982, 73–100.
- Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı, Intra-family interaction and a model of family change, in T. Erder (ed.), Family in Turkish society, Ankara 1985, 149–65.
- D. Kandiyoti, Emancipated but unliberated? Reflections on the Turkish case, in Feminist Studies 13:2 (1987), 317–38.
- , Patterns of patriarchy. Notes for an analysis of male dominance in Turkish society, in S. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society, London 1995, 306–18.
- SIS (State Institute of Statistics), Republic of Turkey, <www.die.gov.tr>.
- S. Sümer, Global issues/local troubles. A comparative study of Turkish and Norwegian urban dual-earner couples, doctoral diss., Department of Sociology, University of Bergen 2002.
- D. Sunar, Change and continuity in the Turkish middle class family, in R. Liljeström and E. Özdalga (eds.), Autonomy and dependence in the family. Turkey and Sweden in critical perspective, Istanbul 2002, 217–37.
- B. Toprak, Religion and Turkish women, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 28–92.

SEVİL SÜMER

The United States

The family is the major social institution in the Muslim world, as well as among Muslim Americans. Other institutions, political, religious, and social, may compete for importance, but seldom succeed. Women play an extremely important role in the family, but males have privilege through a kinship system of patrilineality, also found in most of Asia. Islam, originating in Saudi Arabia, reflects patrilineal privilege and often enforces the kinship system in family laws, especially in countries experiencing an increase of religious ideology. This entry examines the effect of the traditional Muslim family system on women of Middle Eastern and Asian origin in the United States.

Muslim families in the United States differ along lines of socioeconomic background and individual histories and experiences. Factors such as residence in a close ethnic community or scattered in the suburbs, the number of relatives or people sharing the same country of origin who assist or restrict activities, economic class, education, generation, and pre-migration patterns are all variables that may affect behavior even more than religious identity. However, the ideology of family rules includes being large and extended, is based on intimate social reciprocal obligations, and for most is patrilineally organized. Visiting among the members is expected and frequent. Women play a big part in this sociability, by planning, negotiating, influencing children's marriages, spreading information, hosting, and preparing food.

Chain migration, where one member in a family migrates to the United States, then brings other members of the family, contributes to this pattern. Families are important for economic survival in a new country. Upper-class immigrants sometimes migrate without families and form fictive kin groups. Social gatherings tend to be large, and the hostess is never exactly sure how many guests will attend. Umm Hassan comments, "Every weekend, I feed all these people. My daughter and I are tired from bringing them coffee and tea and fruit all day. My husband's niece and her husband leave, then his nephew comes" (Walbridge 1996, 310).

KINSHIP RULES AND THE EFFECT ON FAMILY AND WOMEN

Understanding the rules of patrilineal kinship is essential for contextualizing women. Sometimes confused with patriarchy, which means male power, patrilineality is a comprehensive kinship system in which a person, son or daughter, becomes a member of the father's descent group at birth, and shares many special rights and obligations with that group. A person's behavior reflects favorably or unfavorably on that name and group, not merely upon self or parents. Through rules of patrilineality, Muslim men are permitted to marry out with more ease than women, since the children are seen to follow the man's religion and culture. It is expected that the children of women who marry out will follow their father's line. The honor or reputation of the family acts as a strong mechanism of social control. The mother's family is not unimportant. However, since it is often an emotional support group, migration may increase its importance if the father's family is dispersed.

Being socialized as a member of a group rather than of a nuclear family is a basic difference between Muslim and many other American families where the emphasis is on individualism and individual space. This is at variance with the idea of shared obligations, which may come at the price of individual pursuits. When a young Muslim was asked why she went to the movies with her cousins rather than her friends, she replied, "But they are my friends." Other Asian, Mediterranean, South American and Third-World ethnic groups such as Chinese, Indians, Italians, and Mexicans with large families also share this experience.

Male privileges in Islamic patrilineal systems include the possibility of multiple wives in the Middle East, more inheritance, fewer restrictions on sexuality, and more power given to males, especially elders, in the patriline. The latter power is termed "patriarchy." Parents are called the father and mother of the eldest son, Abu and Umm Ahmed for example, and a son's birth receives much attention. Fathers are treated with respect in public and often receive preferential treatment at home. Wives should not contradict husbands in public. There are generational differences as well. When asked how it was growing up as an Arab Muslim girl, one elderly immigrant woman whose father used a belt on her says, "It is different today. A girl of five might as well have been a woman then . . . My Dad was definitely the boss. My mother would say, 'Don't you know, God is first and your husband second.'" (Aswad 1997, 233).

The males of the patriline are seen both as the protectors of women and as the enforcers of behavior. Outsiders see the resulting modesty and disproportionate public restrictions placed on females, especially young unmarried girls, yet do not observe the support system. The control of female sexuality and the insistence on female virginity before marriage relates to the need for sure knowledge that a child belongs to the father. That this is more a cultural than a religious norm is clear from the fact that the same sanctions and pressures are placed on, for example, Christian Asian women.

The custom of patrilocality, by which men in the patriline try to live near each other, has traditionally accompanied patrilineality and serves to reinforce male power. In Muslim cultures, women may be separated from their lineage and sources of protection and social support when they move to their husband's locale after marriage. The custom of cousin marriage within the patriline (marriage of a girl to her father's brother's son) eases this separation since the father and his brother will try to live near each other. While patrilocality does not always pertain to the United States, women often experience similar feelings of separation in a new and alien environment. In the United States, first cousin marriage is prohibited, but cousins can marry in the Middle East and then transfer to the United States. An early survey of a Muslim Arab immigrant community found that 50 percent were married to relatives (Aswad 1974, 67). Marriages are strongly influenced and sometimes planned by parents, who feel it is their duty to secure a good marriage for their children by examining the credentials of a mate and the economic situation of his or her parents.

ECONOMIC FACTORS AND WOMEN

The Middle Eastern and Asian patriline is involved in economic ventures such as land control and store ownership, and often affects the political realm. It is difficult for women to struggle against male power because it is embedded in a vast range of lineage obligations, not just patriarchy. In contrast, women may gain power if they are members of a strong or rich patriline. Instances where they have even occasionally replaced their fathers in government, such as former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto of Pakistan who inherited much of her father's power, are often confusing to Westerners.

During the immigration process, the power of lineages may break down and allow new opportunities for lower-class people as well as for women. Migration may also disrupt the structure and composition of families, making life difficult emotionally and economically. Sometimes children are left in the home country. Situations of warfare in the Middle East or South Asia also bring great strains on families who are separated because of immigration to the West (Aswad 1992).

Economic class affects family interaction. In the United States, many upper-class immigrants live in suburban areas, and had fewer family members when they first migrated. The 1965 immigration laws gave preference to relatives and professionals with skills needed by the United States. Immigrants made links with persons from their regions of origin, religion, and/or class and occupation, such as doctors and successful business people. Among these upper-class immigrants, there are many educated professional women. Pharmacy is a popular occupational choice among immigrants and later generation Muslim women.

Muslim women have successfully used their social networking in numerous businesses. Among Iranian Muslims in Los Angeles, Dallafar found women actively participating in their ethnic economy using their class, ethnic, and gender resources to open small businesses. Many of these are run from the home, or are family-run enterprises (1996, 123). For many women employment is full-time and they often have multiple roles such as seamstress, cashier, and public relations. In many cases, rather than being secondary to the husband, they are "central to the survival of the small ethnic entrepreneurial business" (ibid.). Dallafar points out the importance of women's social and family networks, which they use in the home and transfer to a business environment. This networking is evident in small stores across the United States, and also among those who have been successful in the real estate business and major companies where they serve clients from the Middle East. Among working-class families in industrial areas, immigrant Muslim women historically have worked in clothing and to a lesser degree on assembly lines. Most families try to influence their daughters to follow professions that restrict interaction with non-related males.

Muslim men are still considered the providers and protectors of the family. Those without educational or language skills in the United States suffer feelings of diminished status. They may feel guilty or embarrassed if a wife works or receives welfare. Most, however, support their daughters' education, although it may be less valued than a son's.

Muslim women of the lower classes have received welfare in the United States, and, as in other cultures, welfare has affected gender relations since it usually goes to women. Some lower-class men welcome governmental assistance, and before it was mandated that welfare recipients must seek employment, saw it as a means of assistance while their wives stayed at home with the children. Others worry that welfare unduly strengthens the women's role: "Welfare will fulfill her needs rather than her husband. She will think she is financially independent without me. It will weaken or destroy my role" (Aswad 1996, 186). Generally Muslim Lebanese immigrant women feel it threatens the male role more than those from Yemen (ibid.). Having many children is a status symbol among Muslim lower classes, and requires women to be at home. Poor women have come to view welfare as a method of contributing to income and achieving more economic leverage in the family while trying to carry out their duties of raising a family.

YOUTH BEHAVIOR, DATING, AND SOCIALIZING

Muslim customs are at variance with a culture where marriage involves dating, love, and a great measure of freedom of choice in choosing a mate, even though the ideology of that freedom may be exaggerated. There is both a generational and a cultural gap for Muslims. Today most parents fear their children will marry non-Muslims, though attitudes change according to historical periods. Until the late 1960s the emphasis was on assimilation into the United States. Anglo names were common and many Muslims married non-Muslims. Educated Muslim male professionals of the 1960s often married non-Muslim women whom they met in college. As the number of Muslims in the United States has increased, the emphasis has moved for many from assimilation to self-identity as both Muslim and American. With this has come an increased emphasis on Muslim children, especially girls, marrying within the faith.

The behavior of Muslim American children reflects not only on the honor of the father's family, but also on the mother who is expected to raise her children in the correct fashion. Sometimes the strongest strains may be seen in the family between girls and their mothers, when daughters enter the more permissive American culture. Sons are given more leniency in dating than daughters due to the expectation of female but not male virginity at marriage. A son's ability to marry outside the faith more easily than a daughter's is also a factor.

Muslim children are expected to obey and respect parents, but girls are more restricted. Opinions about this vary. Farida says, "From the time you are born until the day you die you always respect your parents. No matter what. If you take a beating from them, you take a beating." Hanaa disagrees, "If I feel I'm right, I stick up for myself. If they yell, I yell right back." The asymmetry of sexual control over women is particularly felt in the area of dating. Farida says, "If I could change one thing, I'd change how the Muslim guys get more freedom than the girls" (Eisenlohr 1996, 254). Hanaa agrees. "I tell my mother that I would let my daughter have more freedom." Lubna adds, "A lot of Arab girls aren't allowed out at night" (ibid. 255).

Some feel that rules are stricter now than they used to be. "In the 1950s and 1960s," says one woman, "Arab boys and girls here could date, and not just in groups. The boys may have started dating American girls, but then the girls followed suit, dating Arabs and sometimes non-Arabs . . . None wore scarves, and many girls wore shorts; my sister still does at 65 years of age. Now with the immigrants from the Middle East, there is much less going out by the girls." (Aswad 1997, 233). Her own marriage had been arranged by an imam to a man 20 years older than she, but she did not arrange her sons' marriages, both of whom married non-Arabs and non-Muslims. Socializing across sexes today often tends to be among kin or friendship groups, especially among recent immigrants. Brothers have the responsibility to guard their sisters, but often assist them in keeping secrets.

MOTHERS, DAUGHTERS, AND BROTHERS

Mothers have power usually not seen outside the community. Their success in raising children is important, and through their traditional role in planning marriages they acquire power over sons as well as daughters. They are usually the mediators between father and children. Shryock comments, "Most Arab immigrants accept as a fact of life that a man should be head of the house, even if 'the mother is the neck that moves the head'" (2000, 586). Widows are to be cared for by their eldest son. Women find power through women's groups and visiting patterns that engage in gossip and knowledge of relationships, of which men are often ignorant. Occasionally they dominate husbands, but most try to embrace a balance of influence, hard domestic work and increasingly outside employment, negotiating, and manipulation, characteristics shared by many women in the world.

Daughters bear the greatest responsibility for good behavior. They bond with sisters and female cousins, and seek their brother's assistance with their parents on issues of dating or marriage. Brothers have privileges over sisters. Usually they protect them and may side with them against parents. Others exploit this power and mistreat their sisters, sometimes without parental rebuff. Zobeida says, "My brother helps me. When my parents say no, he says, 'Why are you doing this? Let her do this'" (Eisenlohr 1996, 260). Nehmeh adds, "I have three brothers who don't live at home, but I see them just as much as if they did. One might say 'If I find out what you're doing and I don't like it, then you're in trouble'" (ibid., 259).

MISTREATMENT AND DIVORCE

Some girls have threatened suicide and others have run away. If an issue of misbehavior becomes public, and is not worked out by other members of the family, clergy, or community social agencies, male members of the patriline, usually a father or brother, may abuse a girl. In the extreme, they may murder her. This seldom occurs in the United States but remains as a threat. Rarely does a woman harm or murder a man. Family relations are considered private, and domestic violence is usually hidden, as in much of the world. The greater emphasis on Islamic values has generated arguments over Qur'anic verses used to condone the beating of wives. A predictor of domestic violence is the restriction of women's ability to leave the family setting (Hajjar forthcoming).

Divorce rates, while low, are rising and have reached 10 percent among Arab Muslims. This reflects the pressures on employed women, as well as the ability to leave an abusive husband and retain custody in the United States. Some men restrict their wife's employment for this reason. Pressures against divorce include a strong stigma, family influence, lack of job skills or other economic resources, alternative domestic arrangements, and the still present possibility of losing custody of children (Hajjar forthcoming). A recent study in Dearborn found that Muslim immigrant women felt, rightly or wrongly, that their husbands would be deported if they called the police (Kulwicki 2000).

Non-Muslim counselors should be cognizant of the moral role of males and extended families to intervene and protect females as well as their potential to harm them. When domestic violence occurs, each situation needs to be treated with special sensitivity. Muslim women seeking to gain their rights, achieve independence, and yet maintain emotional and physical support from the family face a strong system of social and emotional obligations and customs. It is not an easy balance, but one that many American Muslim women are working hard to achieve.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Ahmed, G. Kaufman, and S. Naim, Southern Asian families in the United States. Pakistani, Bangladeshi, and Indian Muslims, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 155-72.
- B. C. Aswad, The Lebanese Muslim community in Dearborn, Michigan, in A. H. Hourani and N. Shehadi (eds.), The Lebanese in the world, London 1992, 167-88.
- , Attitudes of Arab immigrants toward welfare, in M. W. Suleiman (ed.), Arabs in America, Philadelphia 1999, 177-91.

- (ed.), Arabic speaking communities in American cities, Staten Island, N.Y. 1974.
- B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996.
- B. Bilg , Turkish-American patterns of intermarriage, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 59–106.
- L. Cainkar, Palestinian women in American society, in E. McCarus (ed.), The development of Arab American identity, Ann Arbor 1997, 85–105.
- A. Dallafar, The Iranian ethnic economy in Los Angeles. Gender and entrepreneurship, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 107–28.
- C. Eisenlohr, Adolescent Arab girls in an American high school, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 250–70.
- L. Hajjar, Domestic violence and Shari’a, in L. Welchman (ed.), Islamic family law, Zed Press (forthcoming).
- S. Howell, Finding the straight path, in N. Abraham and A. Shryock (eds.), Arab Detroit, Detroit 2000, 241–8.
- J. Kadi (ed.), Food for our grandmothers, Boston 1994.
- A. Kulcicki and J. Miller, Domestic violence in the Arab-American population, in Mental Health Nursing 20:3 (1999), 199–216.
- A. Shryock, Family resemblances. Kinship and community in Arab Detroit, in N. Abraham and A. Shryock (eds.), Arab Detroit, Detroit 2000, 573–610.
- L. S. Walbridge, Five immigrants, in B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims, Philadelphia 1996, 301–17.

BARBARA C. ASWAD

Western Europe

Recent changes in family relationships and gender hierarchy among European Muslims are due to women’s pragmatic use of their migration experience, and to the fact that younger generations, especially women, born and socialized in Europe, have marked the difference between cultural traditions and Islamic faith.

Women did not come to Europe simply following their husbands: far from being passive participants, women have their own migratory project inside the context of family migration. Since the 1990s, in Italy and Spain women have also arrived on their own. Emigration imposes confrontation and adaptation; it prolongs and perfects the changes that have already begun in the societies of origin. Insertion into Europe does not result in estrangement from the culture of origin: it generates an attempt at critical synthesis, typical of the diaspora condition, in which women play a role both conservative and innovative. This process is of course neither obvious nor painless.

As critical and pragmatic participants, women experience emigration as an opportunity to make changes in their private life (freer marital choices, access to work, shifting in the dynamics of the couple), but also as a chance to strengthen certain values that in their eyes are non-negotiable, such as the priority given to motherhood, and faithfulness to the ethical principles of Islam as a framework for behavior.

Fewer and fewer marriages are arranged by parents, and they do not necessarily take place between members of the clan, or of the same ethnic and/or national group. Women still accept arranged marriage, but only as long as the free choice of the individual is respected.

Family constraints were, for the first European cohorts, the main reason behind the departure of runaway girls, whose rebellion against parental dictates led to exclusion from the family and separation from the community. Nowadays, in the name of respect for the Islamic rule prohibiting coercion, which renders any action invalid in the eyes of God, women utilize religious tradition to break free from cultural pressure.

However, the real turning point is in marital relationships. All the empirical research on the European diaspora shows female demands that traverse all national communities (be they Turkish, Moroccan, or Pakistani). Women demand, in the following order: more equity, reciprocal esteem and respect, and real communication between partners. They express explicit refusal of polygamy. They demand acknowledgment of equal shared responsibility by the couple, especially regarding the education of children, an implicit criticism of the traditional masculine model of authority. This general wish for change is faced with the following paradox: on the one hand the still ingrained custom of choosing endogamic unions, on the other hand the shortage of potential husbands in a marital market where a partner meeting this description is rare merchandise in the breeding ground of “mummy’s pets” educated like son-kings. Among North African women in France, aged between 25 and 29, only 38 percent are married, alongside an already not particularly high national average of 48 percent. In the eyes of the fathers, yielding to a career appears preferable to the dreaded choice of exogamy. The increase of celibacy and the postponement of marriage show the new feminine demands synthesized in the irony of the joke: “a good husband must not be like a mother-in-law” (Schmidt di Friedberg and Saint-Blancat 1998).

Traditional patriarchal relationships are nevertheless unconsciously very strong. An individual is still not completely autonomous from his/her family and kindred. Fathers, brothers, cousins have rights over him/her, and he/she duties to them.

These contradictions nowadays create conflict between generations and genders.

Breaking free from their role is also a difficult task for men. In Muslim families, males are still socialized to practice their superiority over women and their right to control them as a given fact. Protected and always defended by their mothers, they have more freedom than their sisters or cousins, particularly regarding sex. In case of a mixed marriage, the family, though displeased, does not banish the male, as they would his sister. Male authority derives also from the duty to sustain wife and family. Losing jobs, for the fathers who are first generation immigrants, or having difficulty in finding jobs, for their sons (in France the unemployment rate of North Africans aged between 20 and 29 is 40 percent, twice the national average), contribute to the weakening of gender hierarchy. The instability of male identity, faced with both contradictory family expectations and indirect social discrimination in many European societies, gives rise to humiliation and frustration, which result in rising alcoholism, forms of deviance, and the kind of control, sometimes violent, enforced on daughters, mothers, and sisters.

Women do not question one of the fundamental conceptions of their culture: the pre-eminence of the mother role above all others, which often delays in time, or relegates to a secondary position, the choice of profession for many. For most women, motherhood remains an unavoidable and non-negotiable step on their way to identification and affirmation on a personal level, and to contribution on a community level. The priority of motherhood does not at all exclude a general tendency toward fewer births. For women, the ideal number of children (2 or 3 at most) is a sign of the decrease in fertility rates, both in Muslim societies and in diaspora communities.

Regarding work, the traditional family model considers salary as a male prerogative. Female work is seen as an additional income. Only widows and divorcees need to work, if they do not have a brother, an adult son, or a generous brother-in-law on whom they can count. Work is appreciated as an economic contribution to the needs of the family, as an agent of external socialization and personal growth, but it is still not considered as rewarding and gratifying as dedication to raising and educating the children. However, the paths chosen by socialized women in the diaspora or by the increasing number of women who come to Europe on their own, progressively show an autonomous choice to attempt to conciliate working life with the primary value of motherhood. Women prefer independent jobs, which gratify them and give them the possibility to freely organize their working time.

Women's demands do not appear to be caused from the outside, by the sole comparison with European family models; they are born of the interiorization of religious norms that coincide with the identity of women and their gender role; in brief, from the heart of Islam itself, where the principles of justice and equality lead all conduct.

Not all women are able to find their way between what is written in the Qur'an and what has been enforced by social tradition, under the control of men. Many, however, make a clear distinction between religious law and traditional customs. It is therefore to be expected that the means by which women will be able to shake the foundations of both patriarchal and theological hegemony, hence modifying their social status, will be renewal of religious interpretation (ijtihad) itself. Only through critical work on Islamic law and a growing capability of mastering Qur'anic tradition, combined with secular knowledge acquired in European universities, will women be able to breach the normative orthodoxy of learned Islam, which has always been reserved for and governed by men. There is a long way to go, but that breach can hardly be closed. In the words of Nouria, a young Turkish girl of 17, "When I discovered my religious sources and was finally able to study them, I realized that Islam gave me rights my father was denying me: the possibility to study, my assent to the choice of my husband, who does not necessarily have to be a Turk . . . This brought revolution to our home; I finally had arguments not to let them run my life . . . I managed to enforce my values without having to suffer for them in an institution, as my elder sister had been forced to do" (Bouzar 2003, 46).

Young women are progressively retrieving gender identity through the prism of religion. They no longer want to marry a "Muslim in tradition," but a "Muslim in heart." Polysemous usage of the hijab is another example of this autonomy of conduct: by choosing or refusing to wear it, women express a demand for individual and plural interpretation of religious practice. Women have begun to challenge the principle of their submission, which they do not find in the spirit of the Qur'an. They are aware of the role they may play in the future if they manage to act on the content of religious transmission, and thus on the transformation of family roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
L. Babès and T. Oubrou, Loi d'Allah, loi des hommes, Paris 2002.

- D. Bouzar and S. Kada, L'une voilée, l'autre pas, Paris 2003.
- D. Bouzar, Réappropriation de la référence musulmane, parenté et citoyenneté, in EMPAN 50 (2003), 45–50.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1991.
- N. Guénif Souilamas, Des "beurettes" aux descendantes d'immigrants nord-africains, Paris 2000.
- G. Jonker, Islamic knowledge through a woman's lens. Education, power and belief, in Social Compass 50:1 (2003), 35–46.
- C. Lacoste-Dujardin, Des mères contre les femmes. Maternité et patriarcat au Maghreb, Paris 1996.
- A. Ramirez, La inmigración marroquí. Los procesos de cambio en las relaciones de género y el papel del Islam, in V. Maquiera and M. J. Vara (eds.), Género, clase y etnia en los nuevos procesos de globalización, Madrid 1997, 183–91.
- A. S. Roald, Women in Islam. The Western experience, London 2001.
- C. Saint-Blancat, L'islam de la diaspora, Paris 1997.
- O. Schmidt di Friedberg and C. Saint-Blancat, L'immigration au féminin. Les femmes marocaines en Italie du nord. Une recherche en Vénétie, in Studi Emigrazione/ Migration Studies 131 (1998), 483–98.
- N. Tietze, Jeunes musulmans de France et d'Allemagne. Les constructions subjectives de l'identité, Paris 2002.
- M. Tribalat, Faire France, Paris 1995.
- S. Vertovec and A. Rogers (eds.), Muslim European youth. Reproducing ethnicity, religion, culture, Aldershot, England 1998.
- N. Weibel, Par-delà le voile. Femmes d'islam en Europe, Paris 2000.

CHANTAL SAINT-BLANCAT

Families: Metaphors of Nation

Overview

INTRODUCTION

Benedict Anderson observes that nationalism is akin to kinship in that it rests on assumptions of putative “blood” connections between those regarded as fellow nationals/fellow citizens (1991, 5). Nationalist rhetoric is replete with images of blood and earth evoking birth and autochthony. The status of citizen, the sense of belonging to the nation, arises on the basis of birth, of blood connections, like membership of a family. (Indeed the word nation derives from the Latin nasci, to be born.) In some instances, the nation and the family are explicitly connected through metaphorical equations that naturalize the exercise of state power, rendering it inevitable and even God-given. More commonly, the equation is more imminent, with woman’s role within the family serving as a homology for her role as a citizen, or her performance of citizenship linked to domestic/maternal roles. The “Western construct of the nation-state, which became the compulsory form for the rest of the world, is based on citizens as detached from communities, as individuals. In fact – in the Arab world, the Third World, and much of the West – persons are deeply embedded in communities, in families, in ethnic and social groupings” (Joseph 1997, 64). Just as men and women are not necessarily equal within families, the connection to the nation is not equally available to men and women. They are differentiated in terms of civil and political rights, these differences commonly deriving from their family roles.

In his path-breaking work on nationalism, Anderson does not pursue the connection of the nation with kinship, except insofar as his argument posits the imagining of the nation as a community, a fraternity. Scholars of nationalism have not tended to see the nation as a social entity that exhibits a deep gender asymmetry, even though the language of nationalism is replete with gender imagery. The national subject is represented as male, in both nationalist rhetoric and in scholarship. The theoretical insights required to analyze the gendered basis of the nation have been developed within feminist political theory, and these tools are now being applied by (mainly female) scholars in analyses of specific nations/nationalist movements. Gender relations, both in the private world of the family and in the public order, are foundational to analysis of the nation.

WOMEN’S CITIZENSHIP AND NATIONALIST STRUGGLES

In an oft-cited formulation, based on a wide-ranging historical review, Yuval-Davis and Anthias (1989) have outlined the terms on which women have been offered citizenship – terms that are, on the whole, different for men: as biological reproducers of the members of the national collective; as reproducers of the boundaries of national groups (through restrictions on sexual or marital relations); as active transmitters and producers of the national culture; as symbolic signifiers of national difference; and as active participants in national struggles. These idealized roles in the political life of the nation are linked to their duties within the private world of the family. Eickelman and Piscatori (1996, ch. 4) discuss the centrality of the link between women’s role in the moral order and the upholding of the civic virtue of the nation in modern Islamic political thought.

Jayawardena has documented the important ways in which women, and women’s issues, were integral to the articulation of the ideal of the nation in many struggles for national independence. Claims for women’s civil and political rights – most commonly in marriage and family law, education, and suffrage – have often originated independently of the influence of the first wave of feminism in the West. Indeed, the “first arena in which women as a group began to be involved in political action was that of nationalist struggles” (Jayawardena 1987, 258). There are few published materials on the imaginings of nation by these women, but it is clear that they were articulating a modern notion of women’s rights as part of their vision.

Reviewing nationalist movements in twelve nations (including five with majority Muslim populations), Jayawardena concludes that the reform of the family and women’s roles were important symbolic elements of the strategies of bourgeois nationalist reformers in their quest for a national consciousness and for modern secular political structures. For these reformers, family structures that oppressed women were associated with old orders and the bourgeois family was central to the modern nation. Practices such as polygamy, concubinage, and divorce were regarded as “social evils” that threatened the stability of bourgeois family life. There was an “in-built conservative bias” in many nationalist movements at the same time ensuring that “women should retain a position of traditional subordination within the family” (Jayawardena 1987, 15). But others opted for more radical change as part of the social reconstitution associated with national independence. Moves to transform the family and the roles of women were opposed not just by colonial rulers, but also by traditional political and religious elites, who countered with responses such as isolationism or fundamentalism (Jayawardena 1987, 6).

Moghadam contrasts two styles of leadership in contemporary Islamic nations (using Iran and Afghanistan as case studies): modernizing (secular nationalist) elites, “particularly, but not exclusively, those with a socialist orientation” (1993, 125), who see the emancipation of women as integral to their agenda for development; and emerging “fundamentalist” movements, which seek a return to the past, including the (re) instatement of traditional sex roles. In the latter case, the family encodes the social role of women, their citizenship duties, their relation to the nation. That is, different national visions imply different bases of citizenship for women.

ARTICULATION OF THE NATION AS FAMILY

Fanon linked the metaphor of the nation as family to the psychodynamics of colonial domination: “Militaryization and the centralization of authority in a country automatically entail a resurgence of the authority of the father” (1967, 141–2) – the state borrows and enlarges the domestication of gender power within the family. “Fanon understands brilliantly how colonialism inflicts itself as a domestication of the colony, a reordering of the labor and sexual economy of the people, so as to divert female power into colonial hands and disrupt the patriarchal power of colonized men” (McClintock 1995, 364). He understands the different ways in which men and women are implicated in nationalist movements, and “recognises the power of nationalism as a scopic politics most visibly embodied in the power of sumptuary customs to fabricate a sense of national unity” (ibid., 365). For men, women become the visible signs of the emerging nation, and hence “subject to especially vigilant and violent discipline,” such as the “emotive politics of dress” (ibid.).

McClintock has most clearly identified the manner in which the family trope has been fundamental to articulating the nation in authoritarian political thought. The family “offers a ‘natural’ figure for sanctioning national hierarchy within a putative organic unity of interests” (1993, 63). Echoing this view, Joseph has commented, “Hierarchy tends to genderize: those in superordinate position are masculinized, and subordinates are feminized” (Joseph 1997, 66).

The family trope was explicitly employed by the Egyptian nationalist leader Muṣṭafā Kāmil (1874–1908). He worked to develop a new sense of national belonging beyond local community or tribe by promoting the idea of the nation as one family. According to Baron, he did this to de-emphasize religious difference. This idea was adopted by his successor Sa’d Zaghlūl – his home became Bayt al-Umma (the house of the nation) and his wife Umm al-Maṣriyyin (The mother of all Egyptians). In turn, this name evoked umm al-mu’minīn (mother of all believers) that was given to ‘Ā’isha, Muḥammad’s favorite wife (Baron 1993, 248–50).

Depicting the nation as a family, with a common symbolic home and mother, was an attempt to heal communal rifts and bridge class divides. These images were also meant to inspire male hearts with love and instill in them the sense that they had a duty to protect the honor of the family/nation (Baron 1993, 252).

The nation-as-family trope is fundamental to the assertion of a style of politics manifesting “Asian Values” in Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore, where ruling elites have aspired to a form of national politics deemed to be unique, and based on core values rooted in putative history. Central to this is the embracing of the patriarchal family as a cornerstone of a unique Asian world-view that brings social stability. In the island state of Singapore, with a minority Muslim population, the ruling elite claims a congruence between the place of the individual in a “natural institution like the family” (Heng and Devan 1992, 356) and the citizen’s loyalty to a state that intervenes in all areas of their lives. Women are represented as loyal daughters of the paternal state, as well as patriotic mothers bearing the nation’s children; “the transfer of the paternal signifier from the family to the state” renders natural an “omnipresent government” (ibid.). The model of paternal authority is an important underpinning of authoritarian rule.

In the case of Indonesia, the fictive patriarchal family has been elevated to the status of a core element of state ideology, particularly under the long authoritarian rule of President Suharto (1966–98). Indonesian political leaders have argued for an autochthonous political tradition that gives central place to “the notion of the state as a family, organically united in love, and governed by a father-head who best understands the needs of its members” (Reid 1998, 25). Not only was Suharto – who presided over a corrupt and crony-ridden regime – known as the “Father of Development” and his wife universally referred to as Ibu Tien (Mother Tien), but the state ideology enshrined a notion of familial harmony as a quintessential “Indonesian” characteristic in order to counter demands for the political contestation associated with democracy. For Indonesia’s women, this ideology was reflected in discriminatory legal instruments as well as in a systematic campaign to mobilize them in state-sponsored organizations intended to nourish their roles in the private sphere of the family as the expression of “good citizenship” (Robinson 1999).

WOMEN, THE FAMILY, AND BOUNDARIES

In the invocation of the nation as family, women and their fecundity are seen as important “boundary markers” of both ethnic group and nation. The symbol of the family represents a homogenizing version of the nation that suppresses plurality – and indeed this has been a strong effect where this trope has been deployed.

The former, long-standing president of Singapore, Lee Kwang Kyu, proposed that the state intervene in the marriages and reproductive choices of educated Singaporean women for eugenicist purposes, through a combination of incentives for childbearing and experiments in state-brokered marriages. He linked this appropriation by the state to traditions where families arranged marriages, often without their daughters’ knowledge or consent, and also speculated on the possibility of reintroducing polygamy (in fact, polygyny). The proposal was directed at the majority Chinese residents, manifesting anxiety that their social precedence may be challenged by Indian and (Muslim) Malay minorities. A similar invocation to “breed” was made by Prime Minister Mahathir, to Muslim Malay citizens of Malaysia, manifesting anxiety that the Muslim Malay majority of Malaysia would be overrun by Chinese citizens. Mahathir stressed the unique qualities of the Malays, strongly rooted in their Islamic religion: in this vision, the Malay family, and women in their role as mothers, are fundamental to a (Malaysian) Islamic modernity.

Women act as identity markers by preserving dress codes and other manifestations of public behavior that define national boundaries, and boundaries between nation/ethnic groups. In Egypt, the strong promotion of public veiling by Muṣṭafā Kāmil’s wife Ṣāfiyya was linked to the fact that Ṣāfiyya’s honor (as mother of the nation) had become the nation’s honor. “The vocabulary and signs employed to disseminate nationalism thus reinforced certain deeply embedded beliefs about gender, reaffirming ideals of sexual purity, morality and motherhood” (Baron 1993, 252).

Women are seen as the repositories of tradition and are often enjoined to marry endogamously. In situations of political conflict, within and between nations, the connection between nation-women-family-honor provides a language of violation. Within the “microcosm” of the family, should a woman be compromised or violated, there must be redress lest the honor of the family be spoiled, and so in conflict situations, rape becomes a direct attack on the nation (which, like the family, is conceptualized in terms of blood and relatedness). This idea was developed in Egyptian nationalist struggles against the British: “the notion of the collective was expanded, and with this a new sense of collective honour developed” (Baron 1993, 246). Dishonor was increasingly associated with the inability of Egyptian men to protect their women, an expression of the homology between the family and the wider collective, the nation.

MOTHERLAND/FATHERLAND

A common invocation of the familial trope is the conceptualization of the nation as mother or father. Nasta suggests the idea of “motherland” is a common colonial trope, inherited by patriarchal post-colonial male leaders: “In the iconographies of nationalism, images of mothers have conventionally invited symbols suggestive of primal origins – birth, hearth, home, roots, the umbilical cord of being – as encapsulated by terms such as ‘mother-tongue,’ ‘mothercountry’” (1991, xxi).

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, many modernist Islamic thinkers embraced French political thought. This was especially the case in Egypt, which was at the forefront in the reform of Islam (Jayawardena 1987, ch. 3), and ideas flowing from Egypt were influential in other Middle East countries. Donohue and Esposito argue that Rifā‘a Rāfi‘ al-Ṭaḥṭāwī (1801–73) was the first writer to introduce these new concepts into Arabic (1982, 11), expressing the French notion of fatherland (patrie) by the Arabic waṭan (home area), and patriotism by waṭaniyya. He wrote:

there are some indications that God disposed men to work together for the improvement of their fatherland and willed that they relate to one another as members of one family. God willed that the fatherland would . . .

take the place of father and mother and tutor and would be the locus of happiness shared by men. Thus, it is not fitting that one nation be divided into numerous parties on the basis of different opinions, because partisanship begets contradictory pressures, envy and rancour with consequent lack of security in the fatherland (1982, 11).

Here the exposition of the fatherland expresses organicist political thought: the family brings harmony. But al-Ṭaḥṭāwī also envisages a modern democracy in which men are free and equal and membership of the “family” incurs obligations.

The ideas flowing from the French Revolution influenced Namik Kemal (1840–88), one of the most important intellectual leaders of the Young Ottomans in the later nineteenth century. He popularized the use of waṭan and these new meanings “took hold in all the main Middle East languages” (Keddie 1995, 243).

In his modernizing project for the Turkish nation, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938) – Atatürk or Father of the Turks – employed images of the Father State (Devlet Baba) and the Motherland (Anavatan). While the idea of the “father state” had been employed under the Ottoman Empire, he embraced the concept in a new way, in particular by pairing it with the feminized “motherland.” This was intended to provide a more overarching sense of identity than the millets (nations) acknowledged under Ottoman rule: these were usually confessional groups, into which one was born, distinguished by a particular language and ethnic group (Delaney 1995, 179).

Delaney argues strongly for the translation of vatan (waṭan) in Turkish as “motherland,” rather than the “fatherland” implied by the French translations of the activists mentioned above. Tohidī recounts a similar notion of homeland (ana vatan) as meaning “motherland” in Azerbaijan (1998, 118). (In Indonesian, waṭan is given a non-gendered gloss, but invokes the ideal of kinship – the tanah tumpah darah, or “land where the blood was spilled.”) Palestinian nationalists have invoked gendered images of “the fertile mother-nation” and “Palestine as the Father’s land” (Abdo 1994). In Azerbaijan, and in Palestine, the image of the mother nation or motherland conflates family and national morality: as mother, her honor must be defended and protected at all costs.

There is need for further scholarship on the articulation of national ideals and the use of the family trope, or derivative metaphors such as “motherland” and “fatherland.” What are the implications for the everyday performance of gender, and of articulation of civic rights, of the invocation of such metaphors? How does the idea of defending the honor of the motherland flow into the vigilant and violent discipline of women that is especially associated with fundamentalist national regimes? How does the family metaphor condition the moral imperatives surrounding women’s performance of femininity?

THE ORIGIN OF FAMILIAL THINKING

The idea of the family as a model for harmony tends to be historicized, the connection with ideas of “blood relations” asserting it as an autochthonous political theory. In discussing this move in Indonesian political thinking, Reid comments, the familial metaphor can be historically linked to “the current of organicism in European political thought, now discredited in the West because of its association with fascism” (Reid 1998, 25). In Indonesia, the historical trajectory can be traced, through the Leiden Law school and its influence on constitutional arrangements in the colonial period, and on the thinking of Indonesian nationalist lawyers who authored the 1945 constitution (which allows for centralization of executive power). Reid also links these ideas to the Japanese occupation during the Second World War and their idea of the family state (kazoku kokka).

Discussing the organicist familial model, Reid writes:

The political features held to grow out of these principles are the organic unity of state and society, harmony and consensus rather than open debate and majority decision . . . the primacy of group needs over individual needs . . . and rejection of the standard elements of liberal constitutionalism, such as separation of powers and individual rights (1998, 25).

This ideology became a tool of political control for the Suharto regime, which ruled through domination of a state party. Each social “interest” was represented and bound together in a political process that disallowed open competition under the rubric of (familial) harmony, while in practice enshrining the rule of the father through a regime of state terror.

Fundamentalism represents itself as delving into the autochthonous roots of the nation, envisaged through Islamic texts. It is interesting that the “post-Confucian” Singapore, the theistic but not Islamic Indonesian New Order, and both secular and fundamentalist Islamic movements can utilize family metaphors as the basis of “nation.” There is room for further explorations of the connections between the construction of women, the family, and the nation in fundamentalist and secular nationalist thought, seeking out links to other philosophical traditions and the force of those influences.

FAMILY RELATIONS AS “ANTI-HISTORY”

The familial/organic trope is not autochthonous, but it provides modes of political organization with the imprimatur of “history” or “tradition.” Invocations of the cultural category “family” utilize the naturalizing power of ideology (drawing on notions of blood ties/nature). McClintock links the metaphorical equation of nation and family to the evolutionary modes of historical thought that emerged in the nineteenth century. After 1859 and the advent of Social Darwinism, the idea of the evolution of races/nations was conceptualized as a family tree in which “the family offered an indispensable metaphoric figure by which national difference could be shaped into a single historical genesis narrative which naturalized the idea of evolutionary progress, with the European family as the apogee. Within this narrative of progress, women were seen as ‘inherently atavistic,’ as the ‘conservative repository of the national archaic’” (1995, 359).

The idea of the family as the national archaic was picked up by (male) secular nationalist reformers, in ideals about reforms in gender/family relations as part of the revolutionary social transformation that was to accompany moves to postcolonial independence. However, in many instances, colonial authorities as well as middle-class reform and nationalist groups left existing gender relations largely intact. Whereas colonial authorities did not tolerate the operation of Islamic law in areas such as criminal law, it was seen to be appropriate in family law/family relations. Eickelman and Piscatori comment that in Islamic nations there has been more resistance to changes in the arena of family law than in other spheres (1996, 94). (It is also an area where there is most difficulty in obtaining cooperation in international law.)

This has contributed to a scenario in which domestic life is regulated by Islam/custom; for example Tohid comments on Azerbaijan in relation to Soviet rule: “The family thus becomes the dār al-Islām (domain of Islam) to be protected from the penetration of the dominant ‘other’” (1998, 155). That is, the family (and particularly the mother) functions as the site of resistance against assimilation to the dominant culture. So the hierarchical structures and male control are reproduced, in a language of resistance and cultural preservation. Paradoxically, this has been possible because the Soviet Union left the Muslim male’s domination of his private territory – women and the family – intact (1998, 118). Both secular nationalist and fundamentalist discourses have invoked ideals of Islamic morality in social control. Whether or not the state has a civil family code or whether Shari‘a is allowed to operate without state intervention become important issues. “In many Third-World countries, Arab ones included, kinship and community are crucial organizers of social life. I don’t see state institutions or civil society operating independently of kin-based relations . . . The people themselves don’t separate public and private” (Joseph 1997, 68).

SOURCES

The printed word is inextricably linked to the genesis of the idea of nation and the achievement of nationhood (Anderson 1991). Nationalist movements leave volumes of written material but the development of national consciousness is also tied to new forms of narration, including ways of narrating the self – rich sources in the form of biographies and autobiographies as well as novels.

The postcolonial female writer is not only involved in making herself heard, in changing the architecture of male-centered ideologies and language, or in discovering new forms and language to express her experience, she has also to subvert and demythologize indigenous male writings and traditions which seek to label her . . . In countries with a history of colonialism, women’s quest for emancipation, self-identity and fulfilment can be seen to represent a traitorous act, a betrayal not simply of traditional codes of practice and belief but of the wider struggle for liberation and nationalism (Nasta 1991, xv).

Women’s writing can “subvert and question the ‘father tongue’ and make way for a multiplicity of perspectives” (ibid., xvii). Boehmer suggests it is a source of counter-symbolic images of gender. Mary Poovey asks, “Did historically specific nationalisms . . . contribute to the normalization of an interiority constituted as trans-individual? Was this interiority gendered? How does it exist alongside that constituted by the family?” (cited in Hall 1993, 102). The question is how these iconic images are brought into play, and how they are challenged. Fictional writing can be a way to explore this. Does the icon of the mother have the same meaning for women as men? “Do nationalist vocabularies not implicate women in certain paradoxes of identity and affiliation?” (Boehmer 1991, 4). Boehmer suggests that “where male nationalists have claimed, won and ruled the ‘motherland,’ this same motherland may not signify ‘home’ and ‘source’ to women” (ibid., 5).

The historical records of nationalism and nationalist thinking (like many historical records) are gendered – men are more likely to operate in the public domain and to leave written records, while in most countries women’s literacy has lagged behind that of men. Women writers, in particular, have drawn attention to the ways in which the illiterate participate in and reproduce nationalist thought. Other cultural materials are important; hence the analysis of rituals, sermons, symbols, and forms of oral expression, including poetry and song, and visual media including film and art/craft works.

CONCLUSIONS AND FURTHER QUESTIONS

An important task is the revisiting of nationalist discourse in regard to the translation of terms employed in familist and gendered metaphors. Have colonial stances in regard to families, gender regimes, and law impacted on familist and gendered tropes in nationalist thought? What are the continuities of political thought from European traditions, including the French and American revolutions, and in what ways do they involve familial metaphors? What have been the impacts of these transformations in bourgeois thinking for other social spheres? McClintock reminds us that “nations are not simply phantasmagoria of the mind, but are historical and institutional practices through which social difference is invented and performed” (1993, 61). The Feminist Review (1993) raises the question of the ways in which narratives of national identity become forms of individual subjectivity. How is affect mobilized on behalf of the nation? This question is especially important when investigating the emotive issues of motherhood, family, and honor and their relationship to issues of national identity and citizenship. What is required to achieve ideals of citizenship that are not gendered, notions of difference that do not imply/invoke inequality?

Islamic nationalism (in the sense of anticolonial and liberation struggles) can become caught up in a broader conceptualization of the struggle across national borders for the achievement of a united Islamic umma that transcends national boundaries. The limiting intimacy of the family trope is at odds with this. Is there an inherent tension between non-fundamentalist modes of Islamic political thought and the power of the (inherently authoritarian) family metaphor?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abdo, Nationalism and feminism. Palestinian women and the intifada – No going back?, in V. M. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994, 148–70.
- M. Afkhami, Introduction, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995, 1–16.
- B. Anderson, Imagined communities. Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism, London and New York 1991 (rev. ed.).

- B. Baron, The construction of national honour in Egypt, in Gender and History 5:2 (Summer 1993), 244–55.
- E. Boehmer, Stories of women and mothers. Gender and nationalism in the early fiction of Flora Nwapa, in S. Nasta (ed.), Motherlands. Black women's writing from Africa, the Caribbean and South Africa, London 1991, 3–23.
- C. Delaney, Father State, Motherland, and the birth of modern Turkey, in S. Yanagisako and C. Delaney (eds.), Naturalizing power. Essays in feminist cultural analysis, New York 1995, 177–200.
- J. J. Donohue, and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam in transition. Muslim perspectives, New York 1982.
- D. F. Eickelman and J. Piscatori, Muslim politics, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- F. Fanon, Black skin, white masks, New York 1967.
- Feminist Review*, Special issue on nationalisms and national identities, 44 (Summer 1993).
- Gender and History*, Special issue on gender, nationalisms and national identities, 5:2 (1993).
- C. Hall, Gender, nationalisms and national identities. Bellagio Symposium, July 1992, in Feminist Review 44 (Summer 1993), 97–103.
- G. Heng and J. Devan, State fatherhood. The politics of nationalism, sexuality and race in Singapore, in A. Parker et al. (eds.), Nationalisms and sexualities, New York 1992, 343–64.
- K. Jayawardena, Feminism and nationalism in the Third World, London 1987.
- S. Joseph, Gender and civil society (interview with J. Stork), in J. Beinlin and J. Stork (eds.), Political Islam, London 1997, 64–70.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1991.
- N. R. Keddie, Iran and the Muslim world, New York 1995.
- A. McClintock, Family feuds. Gender, nationalism and the family, in Feminist Review 44 (1993), 61–80.
- , Imperial leather. Race, gender and sexuality in the colonial contest, New York 1995.
- V. Moghadam, Revolution, Islam and women. Sexual politics in Iran and Afghanistan, in A. Parker et al. (eds.), Nationalisms and sexualities, New York 1992, 424–46.
- , Patriarchy and the politics of gender in modernizing societies. Iran, Pakistan and Afghanistan, in South Asia Bulletin 13:1–2 (1993), 122–33.
- , Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994.
- S. Nasta, Introduction, in S. Nasta (ed.), Motherlands. Black women's writing from Africa, the Caribbean and South Asia, London 1991, xiii–xxx.
- A. Reid, Political “tradition” in Indonesia. The one and the many, in Asian Studies Review 22:1 (1998), 23–38.
- K. Robinson, Women. Difference versus diversity, in D. K. Emmerson (ed.), Indonesia beyond Suharto, New York 1999, 237–61.
- R. B. al-Tahtawi, Fatherland and patriotism, in J. J. Donohue and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam in transition. Muslim perspectives, New York and Oxford 1982, 11–15.
- C. Timmerman, Muslim women and nationalism. The power of the image, in Current Sociology 48:4 (2000), 15–27.
- N. Tohidi, “Guardians of the nations.” Women, Islam and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137–61.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Gender and nation, London 1997.

N. Yuval-Davis and F. Anthias (eds.), Woman, nation, state, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1989.
Women's Studies International Forum, special issue, Links across differences. Gender, ethnicity and nationalism, 19:1/2 (1996).

KATHRYN ROBINSON

Family: Modern Islamic Discourses

Canada

This entry examines the debate over Islamic law in Canada and also introduces Irshad Manji, a controversial Islamic feminist.

The debate over the use of Shari'a (Islamic law) tribunals to settle disputes between Muslims in Canada has divided the Muslim community. Proponents of the Shari'a courts stress the importance of Islamic arbitration in cases concerning family law, although the courts can be used to solve any civil disputes. In Ontario, some Muslims have been using Islamic arbitration since 1991, when the Ontario Arbitration Act opened civil law cases to alternative arbitration. More recently a movement to standardize and generalize the use of Shari'a courts has gained momentum, with the goals of widening the scope of these courts beyond Ontario to all Canada, encouraging courts to uphold decisions made under Shari'a law, and rendering the Shari'a court's decisions binding for the parties involved. Canadian and international women's rights associations have responded by establishing a vigorous counter-movement against Shari'a law in Canada.

Retired lawyer Mumtaz Ali, the chief proponent and spiritual leader for the advancement of Shari'a law in Canada, founded the Islamic Institute for Civil Justice (Dār al-Qaḍā') to forward the movement's aims in October 2003. Ali contends that since living under Shari'a law is a religious obligation for Muslims, Canada's recognition of the tribunal's legitimacy is an issue of human rights and religious freedom. Furthermore, he argues that the right to Shari'a tribunals is fully in accordance with the ideals of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, since the use of these courts will be voluntary for all parties involved. However, as Ali's feminist critics are quick to point out, it is questionable whether the Shari'a option can be considered truly voluntary, given the internal pressures that will be placed upon members of the community to seek its services. This point is evinced by Ali's rhetorical polarization of the issue, in which he equates the desire to live under Shari'a law with the status of being a good Muslim. In a 1995 interview/address to his community, he tells Canadian Muslims that whoever prefers governance by secular Canadian family law over Shari'a law cannot claim to believe in Islam as a religion and a complete code of life actualized by the Prophet. He also claims that participation in the movement to establish Shari'a law constitutes a necessary moral duty for Canadian Muslims.

Although Ali stresses that Muslims are obliged to seek governance under Islamic law, he has limited the extent of his Shari'a campaign to issues concerning family law, content to leave penal and other law codes under the scope of secular law. Ali explains this apparent contradiction pragmatically, claiming that since family law is an area in which the Canadian judicial system could feasibly accommodate Muslim minority concerns, his decision to confine his movement to family issues is far more realistic and practical than trying to establish recourse to other aspects of Shari'a for Canadian Muslims.

In his online essay, "Complementarity Equanimity," Ali addresses the singular importance of family law for Muslims as a comprehensive system of rules for married life that governs the "delicate and diverse aspects of gender temperaments." He explains that for Muslims, the ideal of personal, psychological, rational, and physical harmony between spouses can be reached exclusively through reference to Shari'a law. Since marital harmony serves as a cornerstone for moral conduct and proper social behavior in general, the Shari'a-governed family must serve as the foundation for any Muslim society. A strict version of gender complementarity lies at the heart of Ali's ideology. Although the woman is afforded employment and property rights, Ali asserts that liberty of the woman does not run contrary to a general policy of Islam, which prescribes that the male take on the role of the head of the household and manage the affairs of the family.

Muslim Canadian women's associations have mobilized against the advancement of Shari'a law in Canada and this issue has garnered the attention of the international Muslim women's community as well. Most importantly, in crafting their statements of opposition, these groups offer alternative perspectives from which to see the debate to those provided by Mumtaz Ali. For example, the standpoint of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW), Canada's most prominent Muslim women's organization, is developed from within an Islamic framework, and thus successfully resists Ali's polarizing statements that categorize any opposition to his vision as un-Islamic. In its online position statement, the CCMW identifies itself as a pro-faith national organization that is not opposed to Shari'a in general, but that rather opposes the current plans to apply Shari'a in Canada. Against Ali's claims, the position statement points out that while Muslims have five beliefs and five pillars of practice, there is no sixth pillar or belief which states that Muslims have to practice fiqh, or Islamic arbitration.

The CCMW, with chief spokesperson Alia Hogben, have leveled their chief argument against the Shari'a campaign by challenging the notion that those who will use the Shari'a courts will do so voluntarily. Rather, because of sociocultural factors, many Canadian women will be coerced into choosing the Shari'a courts over the Canadian ones. They specify the written statements made by Mumtaz Ali, which stress that not following the Shari'a option is "tantamount to heresy-apostasy" as a particular focus of concern, identifying his rhetoric as coercive and as evidence against the voluntary nature of the Shari'a option. The CCMW position statement significantly explores the cultural and historical specificity of Muslim women in diaspora, and pinpoints their particular vulnerabilities to pressures from both their culture of origin and their host countries. Hogben points out that as newer immigrants, Canadian Muslims are searching for markers to identify themselves as a faith group, and the use of Shari'a serves as one such marker. Hogben expresses her concern that some Canadian Muslim women may be persuaded to use Shari'a, rather than seeking protection under the law of the land, as part of a struggle for identity rather than a search for justice. She calls attention to the role that the fears and anxieties of being new immigrants and a minority has in driving Canadian Muslims to construct an identity that incorporates diverse elements, including living under Muslim law, and cautions Muslim women that not all of these diverse elements are essential to living in Canada as practicing Muslims.

The position statement further challenges Mumtaz Ali's assumptions by proposing that a non-Muslim law, which is judged to be in harmony with the spirit of Islamic law, could serve as suitable basis for Islamic society in diaspora. The CCMW strongly states that it does not recognize any compelling reason to live under any form of law in Canada other than Canadian law, and demands the right to live under the same laws as other Canadian women. The association praises the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as a document that safeguards and protects women's equal rights, and claims that the values of Canadian law are also the cornerstones of Islam. In inverse relation to the goals of the Shari'a movement, the CCMW identifies its objective as assisting Canadian Muslim women to live under Canadian laws, which are congruent with Islamic ideals of social justice and equality.

The International Campaign for the Defense of Women's Rights in Iran is another organization leading a vigorous campaign against the Shari'a courts in Canada, although it adopts a secular framework from which to make its claims. Led by coordinator Homa Arjomand, this organization has engaged in awareness-raising through appearances on radio and television; Internet publications and newsletters; a sophisticated website; appeals to key government and judicial figures; panels for discussion and debate; and an online petition, which had been signed by 1,981 people by April 2004. Arjomand argues that adoption of the Shari'a tribunals constitutes a move against secularism, modernism, egalitarianism, and women's rights, and would send a message to women that they are underserving of human rights protection. She points out that since the government is responsible for ensuring the safety and protection of all individuals and the civil rights and liberties of all citizens living in Canada, it is ultimately responsible for curtailing the influence of the Shari'a movement.

Besides being the locus of a heated debate over Shari'a law, Canada is also the home and base of a highly provocative Muslim woman speaker and writer, Irshad Manji. A television journalist and author of the bestselling book, The Trouble with Islam: A Wake-Up Call for Honesty and Change, Manji has garnered international attention, including death threats. In the first weeks after its publication, her book made front-page news across Canada and received immediate attention in Europe and the United States.

A native of Uganda, Manji emigrated to Vancouver, British Columbia with her family at the age of four, and joined the growing Islamic immigrant community there. Throughout her life and career, Manji has continued to question what she considers to be the inflexibilities of dominant Islam. Her message centers on the revivification of ijtihad (interpretation of religious texts), and she urges all Muslims to engage in critical reflection about their religion. Among her most controversial views are her questioning of the infallibility of the Qur'an, her sympathy with both Arabs and Jews in Palestine, and her privileging of the West as the most suitable site from which to initiate Islamic reform.

Despite her radical views, Manji refuses to give up her Muslim identity, and instead levels her critique of dominant Islam from the vantage point of an insider. As a lesbian and a feminist, she diverges a long way from the usual standards of those who speak for Islam.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Ali, Complementary equanimity, 1992, <<http://muslimcanada.org/equanimity.html>>.
 Canadian Council of Muslim Women, Position statement on the proposed implementation of sections of Muslim law in Canada, 2004, <http://www.ccmw.com/Position%20Papers/Position_Sharia_Law.htm>.
 International Campaign Against Shari'a Court in Canada, 2004, <<http://freehost14.websamba.com/noshariacourt/>>.
 Islamic Institute of Civil Justice, <<http://muslim-canada.org/DARULQADAform.html>>.
 I. Manji, The trouble with Islam. A wake-up call for honesty and change, New York 2003.
 R. Mills, Interview with Syed Mumtaz Ali. A review of the Muslim personal/family law campaign, 1995, <<http://www.muslim-canada.org/pfl.pdf>>.

ALISA PERKINS

Central Asia

"We Central Asians are Muslims, so we must all marry and have children. Our parents are supposed to choose our husbands, unlike Russian girls. They have to manage by themselves and they cannot always find one," explained a Tajik girl from Dushanbe.

The family is at the center of Muslim society, and the relationship between spouses is prescribed in the Islamic family code, which is generally supposed to give men domination over their wives. In pre-revolutionary sedentary Central Asian families, each sex had distinct duties, women's centering round childbearing and housework, while men's were to protect and regulate the family, and provide material resources. The Shari'a allowed girls to be married as young as 9 and boys from 15 years of age, but parents might betroth their children at birth. Women were generally secluded. In theory, men might have up to four wives, whom they could easily divorce, but in practice most had difficulty in saving bride price and wedding costs for even one, and could ill afford to divorce her. On sufficient grounds women could petition the qādi courts for divorce, but this was rare, especially as it could be hard to support themselves afterwards. Even secluded women could earn money, which they were not obliged to contribute toward family finances, except in the poorest households.

In the nomadic societies, women were not secluded and could mix with men. Their responsibilities included putting up the yurt that was their portable dwelling place, and taking charge of the household for long periods, while the men took their livestock to pasture. Nevertheless, in these families men also dominated and women were little freer than their secluded sisters.

After the revolution, the Soviet government tried to transform the Central Asian family. Attention was particularly focused on a small set of traditional practices considered to result from the pernicious effects of religion. Starting in the 1920s polygyny, child marriage, forced marriage, and bride price (kalym) were all banned. The state tried to substitute civil marriage and divorce ceremonies for religious ones, and discouraged religious funerals and circumcision. Women were encouraged to abandon seclusion, educated, and taken into the workforce, thus upsetting the customary division of labor within the family, although men rarely took on domestic tasks in compensation.

Central Asians resisted these strategies by attempting to preserve traditional family values, legitimizing this by appeals more to religious norms than to the defense of their cultural heritage. Even those Central Asians who modernized their attitudes toward education and the workforce tended to retain traditional attitudes toward family relationships. Weddings of underage girls and polygynous unions were celebrated by nikāh without civil registration. Most marriages were still arranged, especially in rural Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Brides had to submit to their husbands and obey their mothers-in-law, who often treated them as servants. Even women with high public status were expected to subordinate themselves at home. Frequently, all monies were placed in a common pot, so that women's earnings did not serve to gain them increased decision-making powers. Such changes as did occur were more often due to official pressures rather than individual commitment to modernity. For instance, parents who married underage daughters were liable to imprisonment, as were mullahs who officiated at marriage ceremonies.

Since independence, the governments of Central Asia have derived the construction of new national identities from religiously based traditional values that identify women with domesticity. This has been accompanied by Islamist discourses that strongly suggest that women's roles should be limited to those of housewife and mother, and also by a popular resurgence in customs formerly proscribed by the Soviet government but never completely abandoned, including polygyny. Proposals to legalize this last were unsuccessfully debated in the parliaments of several countries, including Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan. Nevertheless, men openly practice it, justifying this by religious doctrine.

Islamist discourse, especially in Uzbekistan, represents men as social, political, economic, and spiritual leaders for both nation and family, while women are portrayed as subordinate to their husbands, physically and emotionally dependent on them, owing to their supposed bodily frailty and weakness. Women are strongly encouraged to withdraw from the workforce into dependence. Some accept with relief the chance to terminate their labor burden but the more educated are appalled and resist.

While Islamists preach male dominance, many women seek greater equality in the home, and battle to educate their daughters, backed by women's non-governmental organizations that campaign for greater social equality. Even women who generally favor traditional gender identities have expressed dislike of current trends, especially polygyny.

Thus, the post-Soviet family is becoming a locus for struggle not just between men and women but also among different schools of thought – the traditional, the religious, the Sovietized, and the Westernized. The first two are based on differing interpretations of Islam, but even those favoring the last two still accept the importance of religious principles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Acar and A. Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000.
- T. Dahl, The Muslim family. A study of women's rights in Islam, Oslo 1997.
- C. Harris, Control and subversion. Gender relations in Tajikistan, London 2004.
- A. Ilkhamov, Impoverishment of the masses in the transition period. Signs of an emerging "new poor" identity in Uzbekistan, in Central Asian Survey 20:1 (2001), 33–54.
- M. Kamp, Unveiling Uzbek women. Liberation, representation and discourse, 1906–1929, Chicago 1998.
- K. R. Kuehnast, Let the stone lie where it has fallen. Dilemmas of gender and generation in post-Soviet Kyrgyzstan, Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota 1997.
- G. Tett, Ambiguous alliances. Marriage and identity in a Muslim village in Soviet Tajikistan, Ph.D. thesis, University of Cambridge 1995.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, trans. S. Aslam, ed. C. Balchin, Lahore 1995.
- M. Tolmacheva, The Muslim woman in Soviet Central Asia, in Central Asian Survey 12:4 (1993), 531–48.
- Women Living Under Muslim Laws, For ourselves. Women reading the Quran, Lahore 1997.

COLETTE HARRIS

Iran and Afghanistan

Iran and Afghanistan are neighboring Muslim countries with long historical ties that evolved somewhat differently in the course of the twentieth century. They have had divergent encounters with modernity, and varied levels of socioeconomic development (urbanization, industrialization, class formation) and state capacity. Yet in the late twentieth century, both countries experienced revolutions and religio-political conflicts in which discourses about women, gender, and the family figured prominently.

IRAN

The Iranian Revolution against the Shah, which unfolded between spring 1977 and February 1979, was joined by countless women. The large street demonstrations included huge contingents of women wearing the veil as a symbol of opposition to Pahlavī bourgeois or Westernized decadence. The idea that women had "lost honor" during the Pahlavī era was a widespread one. The Islamists in Iran felt that "genuine Iranian cultural identity" had been distorted by Westernization. Islamists projected the image of the noble, militant, and selfless Fāṭima – daughter of the Prophet Muḥammad, earlier popularized by the late Islamist scholar 'Alī Sharī'atī – as the most appropriate model for the new Iranian womanhood (Tohidi 1994, Najmabadi 1994).

Such views shaped the new Islamic regime's policies and laws on women, gender, family, and religion. The 1979 constitution spelled out the place of women in the ideal Islamic society that the new leadership was trying to establish: within the family, through the "precious foundation of motherhood," rearing committed Muslims. The Islamic Republic emphasized the distinctiveness of male and female roles, a preference for the privatization of female roles (although public activity by women was never barred, and women retained the vote), and the socially valuable nature of motherhood and domesticity. Hijāb and sex-segregation in public spaces were made compulsory, and certain fields of study, professions, and occupations were decreed to be off-limits to women. With the abrogation of the Pahlavī state's family law, the Islamic state lowered the age of marriage for girls to puberty, made access to contraception difficult, reinstated polygyny, permitted men the right to easy divorce (but all but denied women the right to divorce), and granted men total headship over families, including sole custody over children after divorce, and the right to "discipline" wives and children. Wives were required to obtain the permission of husbands for purposes of travel or employment. The new policies and laws were enacted under the banner of the promotion of Islam, the struggle against colonialist and imperialist plots, and the protection of culture, morality, and family.

AFGHANISTAN

In April 1978 the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) seized power in what came to be called the Saur (April) Revolution and established the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan (DRA). The DRA introduced a radical reform program to modernize Afghan society. These included the government promulgated Decree No. 7, which would enhance the status of women and girls within the family while also reducing the high costs of marriage and the prevalence of indebtedness among rural households.

The first two articles in Decree No. 7 forbade the exchange of a woman in marriage for cash or kind, customarily due from a bridegroom on festive occasions; the third article set an upper limit of 300 afghanis, the equivalent of $10 at that time, on the mahr.

Articles 4 to 6 of the decree set the ages of first engagement and marriage at 16 for women and 18 for men. The decree further stipulated that no one could be compelled to marry against his or her will, including widows. Aware that abolishing polygamy would engender considerable hostility, the PDPA prohibited its members from practicing it.

The PDPA attempts to change marriage practices, expand literacy, and educate rural girls met with strong opposition. Unlike Iran, the Afghan state was not a strong one, able to impose its will through an extensive administrative and military apparatus.

Discourses of women, gender, family, and Islam have figured prominently in political developments in Iran and Afghanistan since at least the late 1970s. In Iran, compulsory veiling signaled the (re)definition of gender rules, and the veiled woman came to symbolize the moral and cultural transformation of society. In Afghanistan, uncovering women, raising their status within the family, and promoting their schooling and social participation were the chief markers of the socialist modernizing project of the DRA. Further divergences, however, took place in the late 1990s and into the twenty-first century. Iranian women's rights activists, both Islamic and secular, succeeded in effecting some changes to discriminatory gender policies and the family law. Moreover, as their educational attainment rates rose, women began to marry later and have fewer children. Meanwhile, Afghan women experienced a draconian gender regime under the Taliban, who claimed that Islam and Afghan tradition mandated the confinement of women to their homes and the burqa. The post-Taliban transition brought about some relief, but schooling was still inaccessible to most rural girls, for whom marriage and child-bearing remain the main life option. The new constitution of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan (approved January 2004) stipulates the equality of all Afghan citizens, women and men, and calls on the state to "devise and implement effective programs for balancing and promoting of education for women" (Article 44). It also states that the "family is a fundamental unit of society and is supported by the state. The state adopts necessary measures to ensure physical and psychological well being of family, especially of child and mother, upbringing of children and the elimination of traditions contrary to the principles of sacred religion of Islam" (Article 54).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, Westport, Conn. 2002.
- V. Gregorian, The emergence of modern Afghanistan. Politics of reform and modernization, 1880-1946, Stanford, Calif. 1969.
- V. M. Moghadam, Patriarchy and the politics of public space in Afghanistan, in Women's Studies International Forum 25:1 (Spring 2002), 1-13.
- , Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1993, 2003².
- A. Najmabadi, Power, morality, and the new Muslim womanhood, in M. Weiner and A. Banuazizi (eds.), The politics of social transformation in Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 336-89.
- G. Nashat (ed.), Women and revolution in Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1983.
- S. K. Nawid, Religious response to social change in Afghanistan 1919-1929. King Aman-Allah and the Afghan ulama, Costa Mesa 1999.
- A. Tabari and N. Yeganeh (eds.), In the shadow of Islam. The women's movement in Iran, London 1982.
- N. Tapper, Causes and consequences of the abolition of brideprice in Afghanistan, in N. Shahrani and R. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan, Berkeley 1984, 291-305.
- N. Tohidi, Modernity, Islamization, and women in Iran, in V. M. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994, 114-47.

VALENTINE M. MOGHADAM

Turkey and the Caucasus

Throughout history, the family has been considered the backbone of Turkish and Caucasian societies, and its importance was reinforced by religion. Among the Turkish societies of the region, the family is seen as sacred and protected by God, and women are regarded as such an integral part of the family that the Turkish word for family, aile, is sometimes used to refer to a wife. However, the position of women in the family and society varies greatly and may seem both emancipatory and restrictive, as it has historically been the target of both progressive and traditional orientations. In this entry, women's intra-family status is considered within a sociohistorical context by examining similarities and differences between Turkey and the Caucasus.

One common element is that the states of both the Turkish Republic and the former Soviet Union, the two major sovereign sociopolitical powers in the area, were involved in initiating changes in women's status, which was seen as pivotal to efforts at modernization. In these secular polities women were encouraged and given the opportunity to live public lives, involving educational and occupational attainments.

Beyond this apparent similarity, however, the role envisaged for women in the policies of these two states has been radically different. In the Caucasus, the reforms were seen as being imposed by the ruling Soviet state, in order to benefit from the economic potential of women's labor. Educated, career-oriented women who in the public realm symbolized Soviet emancipation were, in the private realm of the family, expected to be the custodians and perpetuators of religious and familial traditions. At home the Islamic component of their identity was an important marker of differentiation from the Russians (Shami 2000). Caucasian women had to reconcile the varied, and at times conflicting, expectations of the Soviet state and their Muslim communities. The assertive professional women of the public realm resorted to docility and submission at home to protect their men's sense of masculinity in the quasi-colonial context of the Soviet period (Tohidi 2000), and played a significant role in providing religious education, and in resisting the process of Russification (Heyat 2000, Shami 2000). Thus, the emphasis put on the persistence of the traditional family (and the related patriarchal values and religio-ethnic norms) entailed paradoxical gender implications: the family served as a buffer against external pressures by offering support and solidarity but it also functioned as a repressor of women's independence and personal growth. Though some women expressed resentment, most regarded the family as a "mixed blessing," "the dar al-Islam to be protected from the penetration of the dominant 'other'" (Tohidi 2000, 281).

In contrast, in Turkey, rather than being imposed by an external ruling power, as in the Caucasus, the well-educated, professional women prototype was regarded as the building block of the new modern outlook of the Turkish national republican identity. This outlook was rooted in the nationalist ideologies going back to the modernization efforts of the Ottoman Empire in the nineteenth century (Jayawardena 1986). The demands for women's rights had legitimacy according to the authentic nationalist and religious traditions, that is, the original Turkic roots, and "the tenets of pure Islam cleansed of misinterpretations" (Minai 1981, 48); and many laws and regulations were accepted to secure gender equality in different domains of life.

Beliefs and traditions often tend to lag behind legal changes, particularly in rural areas. Urban settings respond more quickly. Today, in spite of certain difficulties, particularly concerning the slow change in the role of the male, as well as problems in maintaining relationships with the extended families, Turkish urban families, on the whole, seem to be moving in the direction of achieving a state of cooperative interdependence based on relative egalitarianism, with increases in socioeconomic development (Imamoğlu 2000). Age at marriage and education play an important role in the emergence of a modern outlook toward marriage and family, especially for women. Better educated urban women are more likely to marry husbands of their own choice and at older ages, to contribute more as breadwinners, and to participate more in family decisions. Women's power in the family tends to increase with increases in their socioeconomic status and modernism, whereas the more modern husbands of higher socioeconomic status tend to wield less power than the more traditional husbands of lower socioeconomic status. Although the nuclear family type is widely prevalent, ties with the extended family are often very close (Imamoğlu 2000).

The process of transformation of Turkish women's traditional roles has been interlocked with the process of constructing a new progressive nation-state and national identity in this Muslim society with a secular state. Because the Islamic cultural heritage has been regarded as an inseparable aspect of Turkish nationalism, the modernization efforts of the secular state toward becoming a part of the international system have been, for the most part, embraced by the great majority of the Turkish people (Olson 1985), although religiosity still tends to be generally associated with a more authoritarian outlook and traditional attitudes toward gender (Imamoğlu 1999).

In the Caucasus, although egalitarian gender relations constituted an important aspect of the nationalist writings of the Turkic ethnic groups of the area when they were colonized by Russia (Rorlich 2000), in the new states, in contrast, nationalist efforts often involve a rejection of anything associated with Soviet colonialism, and hence pose problems for women. As compared to the early Turkic nationalists, contemporary nationalists of the post-Soviet Caucasus have adopted more conservative interpretations of Islam, which has come to represent an opposition to the Soviet-imposed communism and Westernization. Patriarchal relations and traditional gender division of labor are increasing as part of such nation-building efforts; for example, the tendency to marry at a younger age and bear many children is held up as the sacred duty of women to their nations; many women do not object to this because of their feeling of having been worn down by the “double burden” of the Soviet era (Tohidi 2000). Thus Caucasian women face the major burden of the current difficulties of the economic transformation of the socialist states; these indirectly influence women’s family status by reinforcing gender-based traditional division of labor and hampering their public participation (Shami 2000).

Thus, in spite of some progressive changes, issues involving gender and family are so closely identified with the Islamic cultural traditions that they continue to elicit conservative political reactions, even today. The strong family traditions and religion of the people of this region, who have recently been exposed to the widespread tensions of rapid change in different areas of life, have been important sources of support and meaning as well as a means of restriction. Still, the more liberal and democratic trends among the progressive segments of the area may pave the way toward promoting more egalitarian, gender-sensitive relationships in these societies, as suggested by the Turkish urban trends.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Heyat, Azeri professional women’s life strategies in the Soviet context, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 177–201.
- E. O. Imamoğlu, Some correlates of religiosity among Turkish adults and elderly within a cross-cultural perspective, in L. E. Thomas and S. S. Eisenhandler (eds.), Religion, belief, and spirituality in late life, New York 1999, 93–110.
- , Changing gender roles and marital satisfaction in Turkey, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 101–16.
- K. Jayawardena, “Civilization” through women’s emancipation in Turkey, in K. Jayawardena, Feminism and nationalism in the Third World, London 1986, 1989³, 25–42.
- N. Minai, Women in Islam. Tradition and transition in the Middle East, New York 1981.
- E. A. Olson, Muslim identity and secularism in contemporary Turkey. “The headscarf dispute,” in Anthropological Quarterly 58:4 (1985), 161–71.
- A. Rorlich, Intersecting discourses in the press of Muslims of Crimea, Middle Volga and the Caucasus. The woman question and the nation, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 143–61.
- S. Shami, Engendering social memory. Domestic rituals, resistance and identity in the North Caucasus, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 306–31.
- N. Tohidi, Gender and national identity in post-Soviet Azerbaijan. A regional perspective, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 249–92.

E. OLCAY İMAMOĞLU

The United States

It is helpful to characterize Islamic discourses on family in the United States by distinguishing four social constellations: early migration followed by adaptation; the rise of African-American Islam; the developments attending the feminist agenda; and the reactions to the rise of Islamism (fundamentalism). While each has its own trajectory, none operates without interaction with the others. Despite attending complexities, the constellations do provide structures through which the Islamic experience can be understood.

EARLY MIGRATION FOLLOWED BY ADAPTATION

The stage was set for Islam in the United States to be gendered in a specific way by migration patterns. The earliest Muslim migrants were males who came to work. They came without spouses. It is important to note this fact because one of the ideological bases of traditional Islam has been the critical role of family in defining Muslim life. Family is essential to umma (community) formation, which itself is a kind of family writ large, but it is also significant because of the theologically-sanctioned relationship of the sexes, which is gendered while being cohesive. This theological ideology began with the Qur’ān, and it has remained a central feature of Islamic societies ever since.

In effect, then, the beginnings of Islam in the United States arose without Muslim women being present, a situation unnatural from a religious point of view. Furthermore, restricted by laws that curtailed the immigration of certain nationalities (such as the Arabs), Muslims discovered that establishing families often required extraordinary effort (importing a spouse from a distant country). Not until 1965 were these laws to relax and allow a much more free-flowing creation of family life to occur. American Muslim women faced the additional problem that they could not marry unless the husband-to-be professed Islam. Spousal conversion is a significant theme encountered from the inception of Islam in North America. When it failed, parents had to send daughters back to the country of origin to procure suitable mates, usually through the good offices of a relative. Poor families could not afford this luxury and even wealthier Muslims found it problematic. Moreover, while arranged marriages are the norm in Islam, such marriages usually only apply to the first, with the result that divorced immigrant women, or women whose husbands are deceased, must rely on their own initiative or well-placed community resources to find a further spouse.

Another area of conflict was the Muslim acceptance of polygamy, a practice at odds with law in the United States; those who had more than one wife had to adopt divergent means, such as maintaining a second household, but without the legal benefits accorded the first wife under the law of the country. Clearly the roadblocks to appropriate marriage spurred adaptation, and marriages were often brokered with a Muslim from a different ethnic group, or even of a different, but related religious group, such as Christian Arabs, providing continuity at least in cultural if not in religious affairs.

Early on, Muslim gendered differentiation also had an impact on attitudes toward premarital sex. Values derived from Muslim countries affirmed the central role of the female in maintaining family legitimacy and/or Islamic veracity, and for the immigrant community, great emphasis was placed on a segregated and honor-bound space for Muslim girls. By contrast, while sexual experimentation with non-Muslim women was officially denounced by religious authorities, it was often tolerated for young males. By the twenty-first century these concerns had shifted. Faced with the threat to family integrity posed by HIV and other sexually-transmitted diseases, families became equally concerned that both males and females adhere to a Muslim standard, whether they be male or female. Where parents of daughters were almost universally concerned about the perils of sexual involvement with young men, now many American Muslim parents fret just as much over the potential waywardness of sons. Hence resistance to the perceived rampant sexual freedom in American society is now enjoined upon all youth. Since arranged marriages continue to be the vehicle of choice for Muslim youth of immigrant families, the concept of marriage as a contract between families, rather than individuals committing themselves to each other, continues to be an important feature of Islamic life.

THE RISE OF AFRICAN-AMERICAN ISLAM

With the advent of the Moorish Science Temple in 1913, Timothy Drew began the articulation of a discrete and crucial element in contemporary American culture: the African-American Muslim movement. Its most vigorous and empowered son was to be Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975), whose Nation of Islam succeeded in reaching the poor and largely neglected inner city ghettos. The movement was partly successful because Elijah Muhammad insisted on the validity of the Nation's family life. For him, broken homes with many children, all without the required Islamic male supervision, were wreaking havoc in African-American society. He set out to re-establish the traditional Islamic family structure through several innovative ways: he built upon the strength of women to construct his educational institutions and women's organizations; he insisted on the training of girls as much as boys; he reinforced the role of women in the home and family by highlighting their achievements; and he assigned his paramilitary organization, the Fruit of Islam, a role in disciplining recalcitrant males. He aggressively insisted on the Fruit's role in re-directing male responsibilities toward spouses and children. He affirmed the Islamic norm of marriage contracts and commitments. All these actions, and others of similar intent, were to have a powerful impact on the burgeoning growth of the movement.

The success of Elijah Muhammad may be the most spectacular, but it is not the only African-American story. Charged by a religious sense of hijra, or migration, African-Americans clustered into little communities, attempting to withdraw from the larger society into a space bordered by an Islamic consciousness. Such social experiments as Jabul Arabiyya in West Valley, New York, or the Universal Islamic Brotherhood in Cleveland established a sense of distinctiveness and promoted a connectedness to Muslim culture in the Middle East and Africa. Key to the founding of these communities was the Islamization of gender, marriage, and family. Thus, Imam Da'ud, founder of the Universal Islamic Brotherhood, insisted on the segregation of boys from girls in his schools, instituted the use of veils for all women and girls, and promoted a sense of equal but distinctive space within the community, in effect, a gendered space similar to that found in the Middle East. Moreover, marriage was not only planned by parents, and approved by the imam, but the youthful adolescents who were married lived under the supervision of adults until such time as they were deemed sufficiently mature to manage on their own. All this was in keeping with the belief that Islamic society required strong disciplinary leadership to protect the community against the sexual evils of society at large, and to foster a true women's role. These utopian communities looked to the Prophet Muḥammad's political position in Medina, and to his relationships with his wives as models for constructing a valid American Muslim identity.

THE DEVELOPMENTS ATTENDING THE FEMINIST AGENDA

Feminist ideology has also had a marked impact on Muslims in the United States. Concerns over the role and position of women in a patriarchal society developed into a full-blown critique of the inequities between men and women in Western culture. However, it is important to note that the roots of the feminist critique begin not with feminist contentions of the twentieth century, but with Western critiques of Islam from the medieval period, when Christian adversaries singled out Muḥammad's relationships with women as demonstrative of Islam's inferiority. The result was that females and their roles in Islam became a lightning rod for anti-Islamic fervor in the West. The intensity of this critique guaranteed that gender issues would dominate the symbolic world of cultural knowledge, making it virtually impossible today to comprehend the nuances of Muslim women's actual lives. Reactions to the virulence of this campaign began to be felt in the Muslim world, with the result that such elements as Muslim dress codes became ways of expressing identity, difference, and ultimately rejection of the West. In sum, many contemporary aspects of Muslim women's lives, and the meaning of their gendered existences, arise out of an agenda imposed by or in reaction to the Western interpretation of the feminine.

It is not surprising, then, that Islamic sensitivities to the feminist critique should take several contentious forms. There are advocates of Islamic feminism, Islamicist (fundamentalist) feminism, and Islamic womanism in various permutations throughout the United States. The first accepts that the Western critique of Islamic society and the way it treats women is somewhat justified; Muslim scholars such as Mernissi, Ahmad, and Hassan portray Muslim society as patriarchal, while carefully disengaging the Qur'ān from their critique.

They insist that Islam must return to the equality present in the Qur'ān's teachings and in the life of the Prophet in order to free itself from the distortion that centuries of patriarchal exegesis have introduced. Moreover, some American Muslim women see both the conceptualization of woman's body and the submissive discourse within traditional Qur'ānic understandings as problematic for the true achievement of an equal gender ideology. Fundamentalist or Islamicist feminism eschews this discourse, holding that such analyses are merely the application of secularist doctrine to a religious culture that rejects the secular outright. These feminists argue for an Islam disengaged from its cultural moorings, and point to an Islam of religious power and authority affirming the original vision of God's Holy Book. Writers such as Dunya Maumoon insist on the veracity of the Qur'ān's depiction of women and their rights; furthermore, Mahmood and others see ample evidence of a distinctive affirming of women's body and a contextualized meaning of submissiveness within Islamicist doctrine. Still others react to long-standing Muslim antagonism to the very term feminism, and try to shape a new perspective that will embrace the best within Islamic culture without challenging the basis of the Qur'ān's own wording. Dubbed Islamic womanism, this trend regards the distinctive emphasis placed on the "feminine" to be quite foreign to Islam, insisting that the true Islamic understanding of gender is one of complementarity. Theoretically akin to Dove's argument for post-colonial Africa, womanist discourse sees "traditional" Muslim society as importantly, but differently, matriarchal, with roles and responsibilities that allow gender to function synergistically in the wider Islamic culture. Womanists see this as anything but a passive discussion; rather they insist upon the gender equality in the Qur'ān as the foundation for discourses within Muslim homes and communities, a kind of participatory process of determining true Islamic identity. Barazangi terms this "participatory feminism," but it is feminist only to the extent that it begins its analysis from what women contribute to the corporate Muslim whole. Within the American context, then, feminism has been a catalyst that has sparked a heated debate both within and without the umma, and has cognate significance for Muslim women, gender issues, and family life.

REACTIONS TO THE RISE OF ISLAMISM (FUNDAMENTALISM)

While feminist discourses have been carried on largely at the formal and academic levels, it is important to note that they have also had a significant impact on the street. Islamicist and revivalist trends have heightened conflicting positions. The use of the hijāb among women is a rising feature within Muslim enclaves in major cities, signaling an awareness of the distinctiveness of American Muslim culture; arguments for specifically Muslim social services, based on “Muslim values” or “multiculturalism” can regularly be heard, and just as regularly contested; voices against a distinctive Muslim dress code have been raised within American institutions, based on the visibility prejudices attending the attacks of 11 September 2001; separate schools for Muslim boys and girls are now found throughout the United States, along with the implied rejection of American public educational culture; males are insisting on their position as the public representative of the family, even while mosque organizations struggle to articulate an “official” role for women; the hegemony of males over religious and social institutions is being challenged within the local communities by effective women leaders; veiled women have once again been singled out as in need of liberation, even as Islamic feminists carry new Qur’anic interpretations into the nation’s television and media outlets.

The very violence of the Islamist agenda has upset other Muslim women, who urge that their image of nurturing and shaping the next generation is being hijacked by an Islam over which they have little control, and to which there is only limited commitment within the community at large. Many Muslim women have pointed out that the United States has sustained their families, promoted their well-being and allowed them to grow, all values consistent with the Islam they embrace. Those women who self-identify with radical Islam have little in common with the ordinary Muslim woman in the United States, who finds the foregrounding of killing in the name of Islam antithetical to her treasured role as mother and community builder.

All four constellations interact with varying intensities among Muslims in the United States today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmad, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- N. H. Barazangi, Muslim women’s Islamic higher learning as a human right. Theory and practice, in G. Webb (ed.), Windows of faith. Muslim women scholar-activists in North America, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 22–47.
- , Participatory feminism, at <www.einaudi.cornell.edu/parfem/working paper.htm>, 2003.
- R. M. Dannin, The greatest migration, in Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim minorities in the West. Visible and invisible, Walnut Creek, Calif. 2002, 59–76.
- N. Dove, African womanism, in Journal of Black Studies 28:5 (1998), 515–40.
- R. Hassan, Muslim women and post-patriarchal Islam, in P. Coe, W. Eakin, and J. McDaniel (eds.), After patriarchy. Feminist transformations of the world religions, Maryknoll, N.Y. 1991, 39–63.
- S. Mahmood, Feminist theory, embodiment, and the docile agent. Some reflections on the Islamic revival, in Cultural Anthropology 6:2 (2001), 202–36.
- D. Maumoon, Islamism and gender activism. Muslim women’s quest for autonomy, in Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs 19:2 (October 1999), 269–83.
- F. Mernissi, The veil and the male elite. A feminist interpretation of women’s rights in Islam, trans. M. J. Lakeland, Reading, Mass. 1991.
- , Women and Islam. A historical and theological enquiry, trans. M. J. Lakeland, Oxford 1991.
- K. M. Moore, Law and the transformation of Muslim life in the United States, Albany, N.Y. 1994.
- A. Sachedina, Woman, half-the-man. The crisis of male epistemology in Islamic jurisprudence, in F. Daftary (ed.), Intellectual traditions in Islam, London 2000, 160–78.
- S. Yousef, Islamic work. Muslim women misunderstood, Chicago 1993.

EARLE WAUGH

Fatwa

Overview

In Islamic legal parlance, fatwa (fatwā, pl. fatāwā) refers to a clarification of an ambiguous judicial point or an opinion by a mufti, a jurist trained in Islamic law, in response to a query posed by a judge (qāḍī) or a private inquirer (mustaftī). It is not a binding judgment or verdict – that is for a judge to deliver. Although the practice of issuing fatwas dates back to the earliest days of Islam, the term gained worldwide notoriety in 1989 following Ayatollah Khomeini's fatwa against the British author Salman Rushdie; Khomeini charged Rushdie with blasphemy in his novel The Satanic Verses and pronounced a death sentence on the author. Soon there were reports of similar fatwas against the Egyptian novelist Naguib Mahfouz and the Bangladeshi novelist Taslima Nasreen. The greater awareness of and attention to the term fatwa since the late 1980s is reflected in both the increased international media coverage of current fatwas as well as the greater number of scholarly works on historical and contemporary fatwas that has been produced in both Muslim and non-Muslim contexts. It would be inaccurate, however, to attribute the increasing number of fatwas pertaining to women (the primary concern in this entry) in Islamic societies entirely to the renewed prominence of the term itself. Throughout Islamic history, fatwas have been sought in greater than usual numbers during times of change and transition, and this is also true of the late twentieth century; as a result of state policies, the efforts of non-governmental organizations (NGOs), as well as the growth of Islamist politics, women in Muslim societies are increasingly confronted with new public roles and opportunities. Thus, while in the nineteenth century Muslims in Iran, Algeria, and India sought fatwas on how to interact with the new non-Muslim colonial powers, laws, and customs in their midst, today Muslims pose such questions as: what is appropriate dress for women? Can women shake hands with men? Are beauty pageants contrary to Islam? Can women vote? Can women participate in Christian-funded development activities?

The high profile fatwas mentioned earlier raise important questions that are relevant to a broader discussion of the role of fatwas today and how they affect the lives and behavior of ordinary women in Islamic societies. By issuing a fatwa on behalf of the Muslim umma (community of believers), Khomeini granted himself the authority to speak on behalf of Muslims everywhere. The question then arises, who has the authority to issue a fatwa? The varied responses to Khomeini's fatwa among Muslims themselves lead to a second related question: upon whom is a fatwa binding and under what circumstances? Finally, on what topics can fatwas be issued? This entry explores these questions in the context of recent decades, with particular attention to fatwas pertaining to women in two populous Muslim-majority countries, Egypt and Bangladesh.

Muslim countries today vary in the importance they attach to official muftis. Egypt, for instance, has had an official Dār al-Iftā' (office that issues fatwas) since 1895, headed by the country's grand mufti. In addition to the Dār al-Iftā', Egypt is home, of course, to that venerable seat of Islamic learning, al-Azhar University, headed by the grand shaykh. For some observers, both institutions' close ties to the Egyptian state have given their decrees legitimacy; according to critics, they have become mere pawns of an undemocratic government. Interestingly, recent years have seen open disagreement between the two institutions on many controversial issues, including international politics. Bangladesh, which came into existence only in 1971, was established as a secular state and has no comparable national institution for fatwas. There, the term fatwa exploded onto the national scene in the early 1990s with a fatwa against Taslima Nasreen, issued by an obscure group that accused her of blasphemy and offered a reward for her execution; the international media quickly dubbed her the "female Rushdie." This was accompanied by reports of rural fatwas – decrees by village-based religious leaders – against village women accused of having behaved in an un-Islamic manner. The norms of Islamic jurisprudence would deem these men unqualified to issue fatwas, yet local villagers took their pronouncements as binding decrees and went on to commit acts of often brutal violence against the women in question.

While there is some confusion then in Muslim societies about who exactly is authorized to give a fatwa, most Muslims do assume that only men can issue fatwas; indeed, there have been no official female muftis anywhere in the Muslim world.

Although women learned in Islamic law have been giving unofficial religious advice, essentially fatwas, through the ages, there is still no official sanction for a woman mufti. In 1999, Dr. Su'ād Ṣalāh, head of the department of fiqh (jurisprudence) in the faculty of Islamic and Arabic studies for girls at al-Azhar University, approached Grand Mufti Naṣr Farīd Wāṣil offering to serve as his assistant, without salary, and be responsible for fatwas solely on women's affairs. She pointed out that there was nothing in the Qur'ān or ḥadīth to suggest that this would be contrary to Islam, yet she never received a response from him.

A relatively new development that may open up possibilities for women to offer fatwas is the world of cyber-fatwas. While, traditionally, a private individual in need of religious advice would travel as far as necessary to pose his question in person to an appropriately qualified and respected mufti, today Muslims throughout the world can send their queries across cyberspace with the click of a mouse. There are advantages and disadvantages to the phenomenon. The greatest advantages perhaps are that, first, individuals who would be hesitant or for any reason unable to travel to a "live" mufti can seek information as long as he or she has access to the Internet (a fairly small group of course); second, individuals can pose questions about intimate matters that they would be loathe to broach in person. The disadvantages are that it is not possible to verify the qualifications of the mufti or the authenticity of the information he or she provides; moreover, given the global nature of the web, it is unlikely that the mufti has solid knowledge of the local context within which the muftā, the person posing the question, operates. One solution seen in Egypt today are the Egyptian tele-evangelists, websites, and "dial-a-fatwa" hotlines; these represent modern alternatives to the traditional muftis yet are sufficiently locally situated that they can draw on both their knowledge of local practices and religious texts when preparing a fatwa.

EGYPT

Significant early twentieth-century Egyptian fatwas regarding women included: permission for family planning as early as the 1930s; a 1942 sanction for women to pray in mosques; a 1952 prohibition on women's suffrage on the grounds that voting and running for election are rights restricted to men (though Egyptian women did receive both rights in 1956). In 1979, Grand Mufti Jād al-Ḥaqq 'Alī Jād al-Ḥaqq openly expressed his support for the so-called Jihān law; in response to outrage at the new law on the part of many members of the Islamic establishment, Jād al-Ḥaqq issued a long fatwa arguing that laws making polygamy more difficult for men and permitting women to leave their homes without their husbands' permission were very much in accordance with Islam. Islamists responded by declaring him a puppet of the government. Like most countries of the world at the time, in the midst of the United Nations Decade for Women, Egypt was under international pressure to take visible steps to empower the country's women. In the mid-1980s, Acting Grand Mufti Mujāhid and his successor Grand Mufti Shaykh Muḥammad Ṭanṭāwī were both called upon to decide whether the ḥijāb (women's dress covering head and entire body) or the niqāb (ḥijāb plus a veil covering the face and gloves for the hands) was the more appropriate dress for Muslim women. Both men issued similar statements: based on their examination of the Qur'ān and ḥadīth, they declared that the ḥijāb was the correct dress for Muslim women and the niqāb was unnecessary; neither man, however, discussed any possible disadvantages to wearing the ḥijāb. As Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen points out, the study of fatwas can be very useful in establishing a chronology of changing social norms. Given that the first questions posed about the niqāb date only to the mid- to late-1980s, it seems reasonable to conclude that the face veil and gloves were fairly recent phenomena then and far from being in common use.

In June 1988, Ṭanṭāwī issued a long fatwa in response to recent controversy over the sex-change from man to woman of Sayyid 'Abd Allāh, a medical student at al-Azhar University. The fatwa concluded that it was permissible to perform the operation in order to reveal hidden male or female organs and that indeed it was obligatory to do so when advised by a doctor; but it was not permissible if the person simply wished to change sex.

The 1994 United Nations Population Conference was a controversial event for religious groups of all persuasions. Within the Islamic world, the governments of Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Lebanon refused to attend following critical fatwas by their countries' religious authorities. Like the Vatican, they saw the conference as focused on encouraging promiscuity and limiting the number of people on earth despite God's wishes. The most contentious issue to arise from the conference, however, was that of female genital surgery. A CNN broadcast of an actual female genital surgery at the time of the conference thrust the issue into Egyptian public discourse for the first time. An embarrassed Egyptian government quickly promised to curb the practice; although a ban had been in effect since 1959, the practice had persisted unhindered. Shortly after the conference, Jād al-Ḥaqq, then grand shaykh of al-Azhar, issued a fatwa declaring that uncircumcised girls tend to “a sharp temperament and bad habits” and are like to fall prey to “immorality and corruption.” He described genital cutting as “a laudable practice that does honor to women” and as a religious practice as important as praying to God. The government’s response to this fatwa was to lift the ban and require that the service be available at government hospitals one day a week. The rationale was that at least then the surgery would be conducted under safe hygienic conditions; however, given that the government hospitals charged five times more than the going street rate, this initiative was unlikely to attract poorer families and was doomed from the start. Interestingly enough, Ṭaṇṭāwī’s statement on the subject was in clear contradiction to Jād al-Ḥaqq’s position. He argued that the modesty of young girls depended not on circumcision but on a proper religious and moral education and upbringing; furthermore, he had found no evidence that the Prophet had had his own daughters circumcised. The Egyptian Organization of Human Rights filed a lawsuit against Jād al-Ḥaqq for his support of female circumcision. A court later dismissed the suit; in any case, by then, Jād al-Ḥaqq had passed away and Ṭaṇṭāwī was the new grand shaykh of al-Azhar. In June 1996, the government finally banned female circumcisions in all hospitals, public and private, and prohibited any licensed medical professional from performing the surgery. The following year, however, the new grand mufti, Shaykh Naṣr Farīd Wāṣil, issued a fatwa decreeing that female circumcision should be permitted even though it is not obligatory under Islam. Soon after, a court overturned the government’s directive prohibiting licensed health workers from conducting the surgery on the grounds that the government could not interfere in professional practice through a ministerial decree.

In 1998, Wāṣil issued a fatwa that a woman who had been raped was entitled to surgery that would “restore” her virginity; because state and society had failed to protect her, he argued, it was up to them to provide this service so that she might go on to lead a normal life. This controversial fatwa provided an excuse for media and public discussions on the issue of rape; some critics expressed concern that such surgery would serve to deceive the woman’s future husband, while others, such as women’s groups, did not see the mufti’s proposal as the most appropriate way to meet the needs of a raped woman.

BANGLADESH

In Bangladesh, where there is no official fatwa-issuing authority comparable to the Dār al-Iftā’ or al-Azhar University of Egypt, the fatwas that have made national and international headlines are of a very different nature. In addition to the death sentence against the writer Taslima Nasreen, throughout the 1990s there were reports of incidents in which ordinary landless village women were publicly humiliated, beaten, and in one case, burned to death following local salish (village tribunal) indictments, usually under charges of adultery. While a salish comprising the old wise men of the village was a traditional part of the rural informal justice system, the use of the term fatwa to describe its decision on a case was a distinctly new phenomenon. In addition, women who had become involved in NGO projects in order to earn money, receive medical care, or attend literacy classes, became the subject of fatwas by local religious leaders: some fatwas called for these women to be ostracized from the community, others declared them apostates and automatically divorced from their husbands. Finally, in a number of areas, local religious leaders issued fatwas stating that it was “un-Islamic” for women to vote in local and national elections. In many of the cases investigated, it was found that the women were proxies in larger fights between families and that the “fatwas” were endorsed by the wealthier party in these disputes. This helps to explain why the poorer and less powerful members of the community felt they had no alternative but to go along with the fatwas issued, even when they considered them unjust or even un-Islamic. Non-Muslim women were not spared the brunt of this new form of gendered oppression: a Hindu teenager was punished by a salish in 1994 simply for talking to a Muslim man.

The public response to such fatwas in Bangladesh has been divided between secularists and Islamists. For the former, these incidents simply confirm their worst fears regarding the public use of religion: if state and society are not restored to the secularist principles on which the country was founded, the country is doomed to medieval barbarism. According to the Islamists, half-educated village religious leaders have been able to get away with their unlawful fatwas precisely because there is no national and official fatwa board in the country that can issue genuine Islamic fatwas. They insist that fatwas are an integral part of Islamic jurisprudence and are horrified that the secularists have coined the derogatory term fatwabaz to refer to anyone who issues a fatwa.

Many of the NGOs working in rural areas made a deliberate effort to educate villagers about the dangers of these unlawful fatwas. The Dhaka-based legal aid organization Ain o Salish Kendra (ASK, Law and mediation center) took the lead in documenting cases of such fatwas and of filing charges against the perpetrators whenever possible; the center estimated that there were about 180 reported incidents of fatwa-related violence between 1993 and 2001. Recognizing that the salish provides poor villagers an invaluable, inexpensive, and locally-rooted alternative forum for dispute resolution to expensive formal courts, ASK, Banche Shekha (Learning to survive), and other NGOs undertook projects to develop this institution while minimizing its worst aspects. Thus they educated poor village women as well as local elected officials on the intricacies of state law so that they could challenge inappropriate decrees made by religious leaders in a salish. Activists achieved a major victory in 2001 when the Bangladesh high court ruled that all fatwas issued by individuals without legal authority are illegal and non-binding and called on parliament to enact laws to stop this dangerous practice. While human rights activists celebrated, Islamist leaders responded by declaring the two judges responsible for this ruling murtads (infidels) and called on all true believers to take action against them.

IRAN

In Iran, where Shi'i Islam bestows upon clerics a degree of authority and official power not found in Sunni Islam, the personality of an individual religious leader can make all the difference. Grand Ayatollah Yusef Saanei, for instance, is among the twelve most revered clerics in Shi'ism. He believes that the Qur'an calls for the equality of all people, men and women, Muslim and non-Muslim. He has issued fatwas banning discrimination on the basis of race, gender, or ethnicity; he has declared that women can hold any job, including his; and he has stated that abortion is permitted in the first trimester for reasons other than the mother's health or fetal abnormalities. He has even written letters of consent for women who are seeking abortions to take to their doctors. He rationalizes such fatwas on the grounds that Islamic laws should be interpreted in accordance with changes in science and social realities. A second cleric, Ayatollah Mustafa Mohaqeqdamad, has argued that men should not be permitted to divorce their wives simply by uttering "I divorce you" three times. His rationale is that an Islamic marriage requires the consent of both parties and therefore, surely, divorce should require the same.

As this entry shows, although the practice of giving fatwas has been part of the Islamic tradition from its earliest days, it has come to be understood very differently in different contexts at the turn of the twenty-first century. In countries with official fatwa-issuing institutions, fatwas are seen generally as authoritative statements on issues of concern to contemporary state and society; in some instances, as in Egypt, state muftis have lost some credibility because they are regarded as being in too close an alliance with the state. In Iran, on the other hand, independent and powerful ayatollahs have been able to issue controversial fatwas challenging traditional ideas of gender roles. In Bangladesh, finally, which does not have an official fatwa-board, the term has been appropriated by village religious leaders to target and punish women they feel are behaving inappropriately.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. M. S. Alam, Women in the era of modernity and Islamic fundamentalism. The case of Taslima Nasrin of Bangladesh, in Signs. Journal of women in culture and society 23:2 (1998), 429-62.
- A. S. Dallal, Fatwa (modern usage), in The Oxford encyclopedia of the modern Islamic world, ii, New York 1995, 13-17.
- T. I. Hashmi, Women and Islam in Bangladesh. Beyond subjection and tyranny, New York 2000.
- M.-A. Hélie-Lucas and H. Kapoor (comps.), Fatwas against women in Bangladesh, Grabels, France 1996.
- M. K. Masud, B. Messick, and D. S. Powers (eds.), Islamic legal interpretation. Muftis and their fatwas, Cambridge, Mass. 1996.
- M. R. Khan, Fatwabaz [in Bengali], Dhaka 1996.
- E. Shehabuddin, Contesting the illicit. Gender and the politics of fatwas in Bangladesh, in Signs. Journal of women in culture and society 24:4 (1999), 1012-44.
- J. Skovgaard-Petersen, Defining Islam for the Egyptian state, Leiden 1997.
- M. Zeghal, La guerre des fatwâ-s. Gad al-Haqq et Tan-tawi. Les cheikh-s à l'épreuve du pouvoir, in Cahiers de l'Orient 45 (1997), 81-95.

ELORA SHEHABUDDIN

Freedom of Expression

Australia

This entry is concerned with the ways in which Muslim women in Australia experience religious racism as a restriction on their freedom of religious expression. Recently a number of initiatives have tried to gather information on levels of religious racism and have tried to address related issues (New South Wales Anti Discrimination Board 2003, DIMIA 2003, HREOC 2004, Dunn 2003). Schools are places where young Muslim women experience particularly high levels of racism; however, many Muslim women have strategies of resistance to allow them to subvert the racism and continue to express their religious identities publicly and proudly.

In recent years there has been increasing recognition that Australia has a number of issues to deal with in relation to its minority Muslim population. Of particular concern have been increasing levels of religious racism Muslims experience, particularly those Muslim women who wear hijāb, as they are the most easily visible members of Australia's Muslim communities. In 2003, the New South Wales Anti-Discrimination Board, in an attempt to understand the nexus between media coverage and representation of events involving or affecting Muslims, published a report entitled Race for the Headlines. This report recognized that Australia has a "long history of institutionalised racism" (New South Wales Anti-Discrimination Board 2003, 3) against a range of peoples including, most recently, people of Middle Eastern background and Muslims. It also recognized that "it is virtually impossible to isolate the ways in which media coverage of current events, political commentary and rhetoric, and community attitudes interact" (New South Wales Anti Discrimination Board 2003, 4) and therefore that religious racism against Muslims was not to be "blamed" solely on either the media or individuals in the community.

Shortly after this report was published, Australia's Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) began a series of consultations with Arab and Muslim Australians in order to gather qualitative data relating to experiences of racism, based on both religion and ethnicity. HREOC called this consultative process "Isma-Listen" because their primary goal was to listen to the stories and experiences of racism and to ask Arab and Muslim communities what they felt would be appropriate government responses or solutions to their concerns. During the consultations the HREOC facilitators made it clear to participants that HREOC was aware that Arab and Muslim Australians, particularly women who wear hijāb, experienced extremely high levels of racism but that HREOC and its state-based counterparts rarely received official complaints. The Isma-Listen process was an opportunity for individuals to speak out under the freedom of anonymity and without the obligation of pursuing the case through official avenues. What these consultations established was that Muslim (and Arab) Australians were not confident that their complaints would be taken seriously, or that they feared further negative repercussions if they pursued an official complaint (HREOC 2004).

Even prior to the HREOC consultations, the Australian government had recognized that Muslims are one of Australia's minorities most likely to experience racism (Dunn 2003). In response to this the "Living in Harmony" initiative was instituted with the aim of encouraging "tolerance" and "anti-discrimination" (DIMIA 2003). Through the distribution of small grants to community groups who were involved in projects or events that aimed at reducing barriers between religious and ethnic communities and who facilitated opportunities for "cultural exchange," the Australian government believed that racism would be reduced. However, as the Isma consultations demonstrated, measures such as "Living in Harmony" are largely ineffective in reducing the racism experienced by ordinary Muslims, particularly veiled Muslim women.

One of the areas that the HREOC Isma consultations reported was the experience by Muslims of high levels of racism in schools. Unlike countries such as France, Singapore, and Germany, Australia's view of itself as a secular country does not require that its citizens refrain from outward expressions of religiosity such as the wearing of hijāb. However the current global context (particularly since 11 September 2001) is one of hostility toward Muslim women who wear hijāb as an open and public display of their commitment to Islam. Consequently, the experience of many young Muslim women who wear hijāb in Australian schools is one of overwhelming hostility and negativity. The Isma-Listen consultations reported that schools were often places of fear and distress for Muslim women as, in many cases, schools were ill-equipped, or unprepared, to deal with either racism or the special needs of Muslim students. Students did not feel safe in practicing their religion as they would become the target of abuse, bullying, physical attacks, and hostility from both staff and other students. One of the major effects of these experiences is to make young people, particularly women, feel alienated from the Australian education system, and society more broadly, and to increase their feelings of persecution, fear, and vulnerability. Despite being assured that they are free to practice their religion, many of the students spoken to felt that the current climate prevented them from freely expressing their religiosity. Often these young people, even when permitted to practice particular aspects of their religion such as dress codes, dietary habits, and certain forms of social interaction (such as a lack of physical contact between the sexes), felt as if this “permission” was tenuous and that approval could be withdrawn at any moment.

In research conducted with young women in Australian schools, this researcher has heard many narratives of religious racism. One of the most powerful came during an interview with a 17-year-old woman named Shakira. Having recently begun wearing hijāb, she was well aware that doing so would increase her visibility and that she might well become a target of racism, but she was determined not to let this deter her. Her first obstacle was whether her school would treat her new clothing choice with respect. In discussions with the head of the school Shakira was assured that provided she wore a cream colored hijāb so that it blended in with the school uniform she was more than welcome to wear it. After a few months in which Shakira felt that her new, active religiosity was gradually becoming accepted by staff and students an incident occurred which showed her that hostility toward her hijāb, and thus her identity as a Muslim woman, had been simmering under the surface waiting for an opportunity to erupt.

The school commissioned a large color photograph of all staff and students and Shakira took part in this. When she received her copy of the photo, she initially found it difficult to locate herself in the image because, in order to erase her Muslim identity as embodied in her hijāb, the school had air-brushed her hijāb in such a way that it appeared to look like brown hair. Shakira’s fury and hurt at this action meant that she felt unable to continue at the school she had attended for many years. The injustice she had suffered was compounded as she then had to settle into a new school, find new friends, and accommodate to a different set of teachers and expectations while her original school continued unaffected by the incident.

Other young women interviewed as part of the same study spoke about their school’s refusal to provide them with a space in which to perform their midday prayers despite the women’s flexibility about the size and location of the room. They felt that this decision was unfair as the (public) school had made generous provisions to Christian youth groups operating during lunchtimes at the school. They felt that if the school, which publicly promoted itself as a multifaith, multicultural environment, wished to live up to this claim then it should support students of all faiths in their practices, or, alternatively, not support the practice of any faith by its students.

The young women also spoke about the willingness of their schools to provide a range of food options at their school canteens as against their continued refusal to provide halal (or kosher) food, even where Muslim students made up a significant portion of the schools’ populations. During the research it also became clear that schools were largely unwilling to re-evaluate pedagogical practices that affected their female Muslim students’ ability to comfortably participate in lessons. For example, many of the young women felt uncomfortable in having to work closely with male classmates, particularly on lengthy projects that would involve working together on weekends and after school. Similarly they were reluctant to participate in certain school activities such as swimming carnivals because these were inappropriate according to their sense of religiosity. All the young women said that their schools often told them that it would be willing to accommodate any special religious needs but that although schools occasionally made special provisions, this was rare and the constant pressure of having to request special treatment meant that the young women felt constrained and resentful toward the education system that so clearly did not support their choice to be actively Muslim. In many instances when they did make special requests these were not catered for appropriately or, in some cases, at all.

While Australia might profess to be a society in which there is total religious freedom, the experiences of young women in schools, as well as other Muslims, tell a different story. A nation does not need to legislate in order to make it difficult for individuals to practice their religion as is the case in France recently (Willms 2004); it only needs a majority population willing to perpetuate negative representations and hostility toward them. Even if racism does not result in a change in religious practice, either internal or external, the racism itself is a curtailment of religious freedom of expression. Many of the young women involved in a variety of research projects have stated that it is racism and hostility to their Muslim identity that makes them feel oppressed. This stands in direct contradiction to ideas of Muslim women as always being oppressed by their menfolk. As one woman put it in HREOC's consultations, "Muslim women are portrayed as being oppressed by their husbands but in fact we are being oppressed by the society where we can't feel comfortable wearing our hijāb and practicing our religion" (HREOC 2004, 77).

However, when dealing with racism, Muslim women in Australia refuse to become victims and enact strategies of resistance. For example, in a number of Australian cities Muslim women have come to agreements with fitness centers and swimming pools to ensure that men are excluded from certain sessions each week in order that Muslim women (and other women) have a comfortable environment in which to work out or swim. While these arrangements have often come under pressure from some sectors of the community, the women have not allowed racism to deter them from expressing their religious identities as well as participating in the broader society (New South Wales Anti Discrimination Board 2003). Other examples of resistance to racism are more subtle, however.

In research with female Muslim school students they repeatedly spoke of the importance of networking with other young Muslim women so that if an incident of racism occurred each woman had an immediate support network who understood her situation and who could assist in the healing and reparation process. These networks were not substitutes for friendships but provided key support to the young women and enabled them to continue to publicly identify as Muslims in instances where, without these support networks, the racism may otherwise have led them to hide their religiosity in fear of their safety.

For many Muslim women who wear hijāb in Australia, religious racism is something they must confront on a daily basis. Partly as a result of being members of a minority Muslim community within a majority non-Muslim country and partly because of their visibility, a visibility that evokes popular ideas of Muslim women being oppressed and therefore victims, Muslim women bear the brunt of hostility and negativity (Deen 2003, Kampmark 2003, Mubarak 1996, Sukkarieh and Zahra 2002). However, they do not passively accept such racism. Rather, they actively resist and subvert both the racism they experience directly and the negative stereotyping and representation in the media and popular culture. Although it may be difficult for these women to freely express their commitment to Islam in a variety of ways, most commonly and most visibly through wearing the hijāb, they continue to find ways to do so while simultaneously being mindful of their safety.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Deen, Caravanserai. Journey among Australian Muslims, St. Leonards, N.S.W. 1995, Fremantle, W.A. 2003 (new ed.).
- DIMIA (Department of Immigration and Multicultural and Indigenous Affairs), "Living in Harmony" Initiative, 2003, <<http://www.immi.gov.au/multicultural/harmony/index.htm>>.
- K. Dunn, Racism in Australia. Findings on racist attitudes and experiences of racism, paper presented at the conference on "The Challenges of Immigration and Integration in the European Union and Australia," University of Sydney, 18–20 February 2003.
- HREOC (Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission), Isma-Listen national consultation on eliminating prejudice against Arab and Muslim Australians, 2004, <http://www.hreoc.gov.au/racial_discrimination/isma>.
- B. Kampmark, Islam, women and Australia's cultural discourse of terror, in Hecate 29:1 (2003), 86–105.
- F. Mubarak, Muslim women and religious identification. Women and the veil, in G. Bouma (ed.), Many religions, all Australians, Kew, Australia 1996, 123–46.
- New South Wales Anti-Discrimination Board, Race for the headlines, Sydney 2003.
- O. Sukkarieh and M. Zahra, Silence that speaks and dreams that cry, in Borderlands e-journal 1:1 (2002), <http://www.borderlandsejournal.adelaide.edu.au/vol1no1_2002/sukkarieh_silence.html>.
- J. Willms, France unveiled: making Muslims into citizens, in OpenDemocracy, 2004, <http://www.opendemocracy.net/email/ed3500/willms_1753.jsp>.

ALIA IMTOUAL

Iran

The Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11 was a turning point in the lives of Iranian women. Women participated in huge numbers and gained important sites for expressing their views, including journals, schools, and associations that flourished in the following period (1911–24) (Afary 1996).

The defeat of the Constitutionalists (1921–5) and the consolidation of power by the highly dictatorial Reza Shah (1925–41) had two contradictory impacts. Independent women's journals and groups were destroyed, while the state implemented social reforms such as mass education and paid employment for women. Reza Shah also banned wearing the Islamic hijāb. Under Reza Shah's rule, women, like other sectors of the society, lost the right to express themselves and dissent was repressed. Reza Shah brutally repressed non-Persian ethnic minorities (Azerbaijanis, Kurds, Arabs), nomadic tribal groups (Bakhtiaris, Qashqais), dissident Shī'ī clerics, and Sunnīs. Compliant Shī'ī clerics were granted funds to develop seminaries in the city of Qom.

From the 1850s, non-Muslims constituted between 1 and 4 percent of the population, Sunnīs between 8 and 10 percent, and Shī'īs between 89 and 94 percent (Abrahamian 1982, 12, Limbert 1987, 30). Under Reza Shah Armenians were viewed with suspicion following their massive participation in the Constitutional Revolution and their general sympathy with progressive forces. Other non-Muslim religious minorities (Zoroastrian, Jewish, and to a lesser extent Assyrian) were allowed social freedom as long as they did not engage in politics. However, during the period 1934–41, religious minorities (Bahai, Armenian, and Assyrian) were targeted for discrimination, and their schools were closed (Abrahamian 1982, 163).

The period after Reza Shah's abdication in 1941 until the 1953 coup was the freest period in Iran's contemporary history. Various political groups mobilized workers, women, and ethnic groups. The August 1953 coup brought to an end a period marked by extensive civil liberties where all groups – including women's, religious, and ethnically-based groups – were free to publish their political and ideological perspectives and organize to demand their rights.

The period 1953 to late 1978 witnessed the return of Pahlavī authoritarianism, which combined repressive measures with reforms financed by oil revenues. The massive oil income in the 1960s and 1970s allowed mass education, including higher education for women at unprecedented levels, with a huge increase in women entering into salaried professions and blue-collar employment.

Despite participation of women in higher education and employment in substantial numbers, they (along with the rest of the society) were not allowed freedom of expression, or the right to establish independent journals or groups. Many young university women were attracted to left-wing groups, but in the early 1970s women's rights were not prominent as such; they were subsumed under other guises, either the anti-imperialist struggle or class demands (Kazemzadeh 2002). The Islamist groups, by and large, opposed the Shah's programs as wholesale importation of Westernized norms alien to Islamic values and identity. Secular liberal democratic groups emphasized the repression of individual and political rights by the Shah's regime.

The anti-Shah movement from early 1977 to February 1979 included diverse groups. After coming to power, however, Khomeini and his fundamentalist allies instituted gender policies that were resisted by large numbers of women. These struggles revolved around the compulsory hijāb, dismissal of female judges, dismissal of employed women, limiting women's access to higher education, and reinstatement of Sharī'a laws. Feminist, liberal democratic, and leftist forces publically criticized and resisted the fundamentalist policies until June 1981, when a violent reign of terror succeeded in silencing all voices. Mass executions, in the tens of thousands, crushed all non-fundamentalist forces.

Religious minorities (Sunnī, Bahā'ī, Armenian, Assyrian, Jewish) lack many civil and political rights in Iran today. Many religious minorities, particularly the non-Muslims, left the country after the 1979 revolution in order to escape persecution and discrimination.

The deteriorating economic conditions, suffocating cultural environment, and harsh discrimination against women gave rise to a widespread passive resistance throughout the 1980s, which eventually forced the regime to renege on many of its earlier policies in the 1990s.

In May 1997, a large number of women participated in the elections and overwhelmingly voted for Hojatolislam Mohammad Khatami, a reformist cleric who had promised reduction of repression and toleration of civil society institutions. His election opened a period when dissidents could voice their ideas, with many becoming increasingly bolder in their demands and in their criticisms.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the fundamentalist regime has lost its ideological hegemony and political legitimacy but not its ability to coerce and subdue. The proliferation of satellite television, foreign-based radio broadcasts, and the Internet have progressively undermined the regime's ability to restrict political ideas. The Internet has enabled the exchange of information via undetectable email: opponents of the regime can easily publish articles and photos on the Internet under pseudonyms. Iranian youth, particularly young women, have found it safe to write their views on personal weblogs in Persian. Use of these new media has allowed increased and undetected communication and contact between the opponents of the regime residing abroad with people living in Iran, but also, more significantly, it has enabled activists in Iran to meet fellow activists.

Numerous feminist Internet sites based abroad as well as inside Iran provide a plethora of information, feminist literature, and solidarity. The awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Shirin Ebadi, an Iranian human rights and feminist activist, further emboldened Iranian feminists inside Iran and cemented their relationships with Iranian feminist activists abroad.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- E. Abrahamian, Iran between two revolutions, Princeton, N.J. 1982.
- J. Afary, The Iranian constitutional revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy, and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
- F. Azari (ed.), Women of Iran. The conflict with fundamentalist Islam, London 1983.
- M. Kazemzadeh, Islamic fundamentalism, feminism, and gender inequality in Iran under Khomeini, Lanham, Md. 2002.
- J. W. Limbert, Iran. At war with history, Boulder, Colo. 1987.
- A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality. Women, state, and ideology in contemporary Iran, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 48–76.
- G. Nashat (ed.), Women and revolution in Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1983.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement, and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1981.
- A. Tabari and N. Yeganeh (eds.), In the shadow of Islam. The women's movement in Iran, London 1982.

MASOUD KAZEMZADEH

South Asia

The issue of freedom of religious expression has acquired increasing significance in the context of South Asia in light of the rise of right-wing movements and their attack on religious minorities. Hateful writings and speeches played a role in political events such as the destruction of the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya in December 1992; the vituperative and vitriolic speeches and writings of the Hindu Right against the Muslim community in 1992 and 1993 framed the context within which the Bombay riots took place in September 1992 and January 1993; and the fatwa issued against Taslima Nasreen in May 1994 represented a contest over who has the right to speak for whom.

The right to freedom of speech is guaranteed as a fundamental right under article 19 of the Indian constitution, article 39 of the Bangladesh constitution, article 14 of the Sri Lankan constitution, and article 19 of the Pakistan constitution. In each country, reasonable restrictions on the right to free speech are permitted, for example, in the interests of public order and decency. The penal codes in each country also have provisions that prohibit words or representations that promote disharmony or enmity between different religious, caste, or racial communities, between language or regional groups, or that deliberately outrage the religious feelings of any class by insulting its religion or religious beliefs. The codes also have provisions against obscenity and affront of a woman's modesty. Many court decisions indicate that the legal provisions against hateful speech have been primarily used to protect minority religious groups from various attacks on their religion and religious beliefs. Most prosecutions have involved quite vicious and outrageous attacks on the religious beliefs or practices of the concerned community. However, the increasingly overt religious climate and rise of right-wing politics have led to the erosion of the rights to free speech and expression of women and religious minorities.

INDIA

In India, the Hindu Right is increasingly successful in promoting the perception of the persecution of the majority by the minority and asserting itself as the spokesperson for what constitutes Hindu culture, religion, and history. It has promoted its agenda partly through the right to free expression, while simultaneously attacking the right of anyone who dissents from or challenges its agenda.

In the context of Muslim women, the Hindu Right avails every opportunity to denounce the Muslim community because of the way it treats women. They invoke their free speech rights to report any atrocity or indignity committed against Muslim women, whether within the Muslim community in India or within the surrounding Muslim countries. For example, the Hindu Right took up the cause of Taslima Nasreen, in the fatwa controversy that emerged around this Bangladeshi writer. The fatwa was issued in September 1993, after the publication of her novel, Lajja, a story of the plight of a Hindu family in Bangladesh persecuted in the aftermath of the destruction of the Babri Masjid in December 1992. In a newspaper interview in May 1994, Nasreen called for a reform of religious texts that oppress women and the fatwa was reasserted. Facing protests and calls for Nasreen's death, the Bangladeshi government charged Nasreen with blasphemy. Nasreen fled the country to live in exile.

In this controversy, the Hindu Right positioned itself as the defender of free speech from the threat of fundamentalist censors. Women's rights groups also defended Nasreen's rights to free speech. In the hands of the Hindu Right, the rhetoric of freedom of expression was deployed to construct the Muslim "other" as the violator of democratic rights and to deflect attention from the similar absence of a respect for free expression within its own ranks. The Hindu Right became the self-appointed champion of the rights of Nasreen, a Muslim, and deployed the violation of these rights as a way of attacking the Muslim community as a whole. Women's groups championed Nasreen's right to free speech as an assertion of her civil and human rights. However, they also found themselves in the awkward position of being aligned with the Hindu Right, who opposed the fundamentalist attack on Nasreen to further constitute itself as secularist.

BANGLADESH

The right to women's sexual expression and sexual autonomy in Bangladesh is also enjoined by cultural practices and the rise of right-wing fundamentalism that views women's conduct through a moral lens. For example, in rural areas a salish or tribunal is frequently used to settle local disputes. Women are excluded from participating in the salish. Village religious leaders have developed the practice of making declarations, which they call fatwas, on individual cases dealing with marriage or divorce, or meting out punishments for perceived moral transgressions. These proceedings have been manipulated by local religious leaders to find women guilty of extramarital sexual affairs and other acts. Punishments are dispensed in accordance with religious laws as interpreted locally, and these are often in contravention of the existing penal code. Some women have been flogged publicly and a few have also committed suicide.

In January 2001 the high court ruled illegal all fatwas, or expert opinions on Islamic law. Generally, only muftis (religious scholars) who had expertise in Islamic law were authorized to declare a fatwa. While the court's intention was to end the extrajudicial enforcement of penalties by religious leaders, primarily in the villages, the ruling declared all fatwas illegal and resulted in violent public protests. The appellate court stayed the high court's ruling and the case is pending further hearing.

The moral framework in which sexual expression is addressed finds its most explicit manifestation in the Anti-Terrorism Ordinance of 1992. The ordinance provides punishment for all kinds of terrorism including harassing women. Sexual harassment provisions should promote women's rights to equality, sexual autonomy, and sexual expression.

However, the equation of sexual harassment with terrorism associates women's sexual purity, honor, and dignity with the honor, dignity, and security of the nation-state. The ordinance does not enhance women's rights to sexual autonomy or expression, but rather recasts her sexual integrity as an expression of nationhood. Securing her sexuality is equated with securing the nation. Women's conduct and sexual behavior are strictly monitored and they are harshly dealt with if implicated in any moral transgressions.

Women's rights to free speech and expression must be understood against the increasingly conservative nature of the government and its moral clean-up campaign. In 1999 police forcibly removed 267 sex workers from a large brothel district in Tanbazar and Nimtoli, Narayanganj as part of its clean-up and cultural purity efforts. Authorities claimed that the women wanted to be rehabilitated. The women asserted that they had the right to live in their homes, and practice their trade. The women were confined in a center for vagrants, where some alleged that they were abused. Eventually all of the women were released, and most returned to work in other locations. The case triggered a major campaign against the eviction, though women's claims to sexual expression were not simultaneously endorsed. The speech issue in this instance was overshadowed by the right to freedom of association and the challenge to the arbitrary actions of the government. The conservative moral authority of the state to restrict women's rights to sexual speech and expression was not in any way challenged or altered.

PAKISTAN

In Pakistan, the right to free speech of women is being threatened with the rise of the religious fundamentalist parties in the North-West Frontier Province. These groups have successfully lobbied for the adoption of Shari'a law in the province. The government is seeking to establish a Vice and Virtue Department "to restrict the faithful from wrongdoing." Girls over the age of twelve must wear the burqa. Young men are tearing down billboards with images of women whose faces are unveiled. The dominance of hardline Islamic parties and the support they have previously expressed for the Taliban has added to fears that the province is a new breeding ground for Taliban-style ideology. These parties are intent on imposing their values, by force if necessary, and are against all forms of modernity, especially women's rights.

Another complex area is the right to free speech of women in minority communities in Pakistan.

Those at particular risk of abuse are the members of the Aḥmadiyya community. Aḥmadīs, members of a religious group founded in the nineteenth century, consider themselves to be Muslim, but orthodox Muslims regard them as heretical. In 1974, a constitutional amendment introduced by then Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto declared Aḥmadīs a non-Muslim minority. Subsequent legislation passed in 1984 made it a criminal offence for Aḥmadīs to call themselves Muslim, and profess, practice, and propagate their faith as Muslims.

The blasphemy laws are a major tool used to harass, intimidate, and detain members of the minority community or members of the majority religion who in some way interpret, teach, or debate their religion in a non-orthodox manner. The blasphemy laws continue to be used by the present government to arbitrarily detain members of the minorities. Charges are also filed under those sections of the penal code specifically directed against Aḥmadīs and entail trial by the special anti-terrorism courts. Women are unable to acknowledge their religion or speak out against the discrimination they experience for practicing their faith. They are also prevented from criticizing practices within their own community that harm women, for fear of betraying the community, which already faces external threat and persecution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Basu, Feminism inverted, The real women and gendered imagery of Hindu nationalism, in T. Sarkar and U. Butalia (eds.), Women and the Hindu right, London 1995, 158–180.
- K. Crenshaw, Beyond racism and misogyny. Black feminism and “2 Live Crew,” in M. J. Matsuda, C. R. Lawrence III, R. Delgado, and K. W. Crenshaw (eds.), Words that wound. Critical race theory, assaultive speech and the first amendment, Boulder, Colo. 1993, 54–61.
- D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1990.
- R. Kapur, Who draws the line? Feminist reflections on speech and censorship, in Economic and Political Weekly, 20–27 April 1996, WS15–WS22.

RATNA KAPUR

Sub-Saharan Africa

The record of freedom of expression of women in Sub-Saharan Islamic cultures has been mixed and historically conditioned – that is, if we take freedom of expression broadly to include the space of free articulation of ideas, feelings, opinions, and identities in verbal, non-verbal, and symbolic forms.

Freedom of expression presumes unfettered access to the tools and means for the exercise of that freedom. Foremost among these are intellectual, linguistic, and literary skills imparted in specific educational settings. In the majority of Muslim societies in Sub-Saharan Africa, classical Arabic and higher realms of Islamic learning were almost the exclusive preserve of men. As a result, the space to articulate a particularly woman centered reading of Islam and women’s place within it has been undermined by patriarchal control of Islamic learning and knowledge.

Since the beginning of the democratization process in the early 1990s, however, many of these societies have experienced the emergence of political Islam with movements such as Izala in Nigeria and Niger. This development has created new conditions in which Muslim women have begun to develop their own initiatives to study classical Arabic and to understand and use Islam from their own perspectives – ranging from orthodox to liberal and secular positions (Gamatié-Bayard 1992, Alidou 2000).

In instances where Muslims constitute the preponderant majority in the nation, as in Niger, Mali, and Senegal, this Muslim women’s activism rooted in new readings and uses of Islam has inspired minority Christian women to engage in similar efforts to interrogate afresh the place of women in Christianity itself and in the wider Muslim polity (Marut 2002, Ganda and Galadima 1992, 3).

Where Muslim women’s readings of Islam in predominantly Muslim nations have departed from received patriarchal interpretations, the women have often been victims of violence and aggression and subject to accusations of selling out to Western interests. In nations where Muslims are not in the majority, in contrast, as in Kenya, Uganda, Malawi, and South Africa, similar developments among Muslim women have led to their being associated not only with Western interests, but also with the interests of the non-Muslim “other,” namely Christians, in the nation-state. For example in Kenya, the (gender) Equality Bill was opposed by most Muslim men, and some conservative Muslim women’s associations supported this particular protest on the ground that the proposed bill was a Western-Christian inspired legal document (Mazrui 1999).

Gender disparity within education, however, is evident not only within the world of Islam, but also in the more recent domain of secular education. Religious, colonial, and postcolonial conditions, including forces of globalization, have combined to the disadvantage of women in modern schools, especially at the higher levels. As a result, Muslim women’s acquisition of ex-colonial languages and educational qualifications that have become requisite in critical areas of public expression such as the government, parliament, and electronic and print media has been disproportionately lower than that of their male counterparts (Callaway and Creevy 1994, Djibo 2001, Hamani 2000, 127–69).

If the development of pluralist politics has had implications for women's education, however, it has also affected the expression of their identities. Nowhere is this development more evident than in dress discourses, especially in urban landscapes. The rise of political Islam in this new context has led to the emergence of a dress code, such as hijāb (veiling), to which Muslim women are expected to adhere. Women who choose not to express their Muslim identity through the hijāb code have sometimes been victims of verbal and physical assault by extremist Islamist males. In Kenya, Muslim women of the coastal areas who did not wear buibui – a wide, black floor-length cloak with attached veil (Hirsch 1998, 48–56) – suffered physical assault from young male members of the Islamic Party of Kenya.

In contrast, especially in societies where Muslims are in the minority, Muslim women in hijāb have experienced discrimination and hostility in educational institutions and places of work. For example, in inland Kenya, Muslim women students took their schools to court to challenge their suspension on the ground of wearing the hijāb (Coastweek 17–23 April 1999).

The 11 September 2001 tragedy in the United States has also had implications for the dress expression of identity in Sub-Saharan Africa. Several African countries, including Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, Ethiopia, and Djibouti, have been under pressure by the United States government to enact “anti-terrorist” legislation that bears a strong resemblance to the United States Patriot Act (Kelley 2003). This has certainly included Muslim profiling through bodily appearance. The hijāb among Muslim women and the jallābiyya (long white robe) among bearded Muslim men as expressions of Islamic identity have now become a political liability in the post-September 11 dispensation. Spring and summer 2003 saw a massive student demonstration in the capital city of Gambia, Banjul, against a high school superintendent who dismissed female students wearing hijāb to school (Independent [Banjul] 3 June 2003).

If the expression of Islamic identity has suffered under certain conditions, Muslims themselves have sometimes violated the freedom of expression of others. It is widely accepted, for example, that spirit possession and exorcism, both predominant among women in Sub-Saharan Africa, are sacred spaces for the expression of women's feelings, ideas, and desires that are taboo for women to express in other domains within Islamic patriarchy. In many Islamic cultures there was, for a long time, a co-existence and even a symbiosis between Islam and indigenous African spirituality such as Bori in Hausaland (McIntyre 1996, 257–74, Cooper 1998, 28–31). But some Islamist movements in Niger, Nigeria, Mali, and Senegal have in many cases led to a new antagonism against these important rituals, condemning them as expressions of bid'a (innovation) that are antithetical to authentic sunna (tradition) of the Prophet Muḥammad. In the same spirit of Islam, Niger even went to the extent of passing a law in the 1980s that criminalized rituals of spirit possession, especially in the holy month of Ramadan. It was only under the pressure of pluralist politics of the 1990s onwards that the law became dormant and the rituals, which had become clandestine in urban areas especially, regained their free space of expression.

In spite of instances of hostility generated by religious fundamentalism of all types and the shortcomings of the new democratic experiments in Sub-Saharan Africa, the new politics of pluralism has, without doubt, granted Muslim women the space to inscribe their agency in an overt expressive manner, sometimes at the risk of being victimized. A case in point is the national tension arising from the women's campaign for the constitutional adoption of an egalitarian family law in Niger (Dunbar 1991, Niger Republic 1995, Reynolds 1997). It has also offered, in a number of countries, new possibilities for Muslim women to join other women in coalitions across boundaries of religion to advocate for the rights and freedoms of women, as in the case of the horrifying so-called Shari'a trial of Amina Lawal in Katsina, North Nigeria, on charges of adultery. This is clearly illustrated by the commendable work of women activists and scholars such as Ayesha Imam of Baobab (a human rights non-governmental organization) and others working in the African Center for Democracy and Human Rights Studies in Mali to educate Muslim and Christian as well as non-Muslim and non-Christian women about religious and secular laws and policies that violate women's rights and freedoms.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- O. Alidou, Islamisms, the media and women's public discursive practices in Niger, paper presented at the Conference on Islam in Africa sponsored by the Institute of Global Cultural Studies at the State University of New York, Binghamton 13–15 April 2000.
- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994, 55–186.
- B. Cooper, Gender and religion in Hausaland. Variations

- in Islamic practices in Niger and Nigeria, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohid (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversities within unity, London 1998, 21–37.
- H. Djibo, La participation des femmes africaines à la vie politique. Les exemples du Niger et Sénégal, Paris 2001.
- R. A. Dunbar, Islamic values, the state and the development of women. The case of Niger, in C. Cole and B. B. Mack (eds.), Hausa women in the twentieth century, Madison, Wis. 1991, 69–89.
- M. Gamatié-Bayard, Le harem, in Le Démocrate (Niger), 10 August 1992, 3.
- S. Ganda and A. Galadima, Debate on secularism in Niger. The reaction of the church, in Le Démocrate (Niger), 28 September 1992, 5.
- S. F. Hirsch, Pronouncing and preserving. Gender and the discourses of dispute in an African court, Chicago 1998.
- K. J. Keley, US launches terror initiatives in East Africa, in East African (Nairobi), 1 September 2003.
- J.-C. Marut, Les particularismes au risque de l'islam dans le conflit casamançais, in Politique africaine, Paris 2002, <<http://www.cean.u-bordeaux.fr/pubcean/particularismes.pdf>>.
- A. Mazrui, The equality bill. An alternative Islamic perspective, a Kenyan human rights position paper, Nairobi 1999.
- J. McIntyre, A cultural given and a hidden influence. Koranic teachers in Kano, in D. Parkin, L. Caplan, and H. Fisher (eds.), The politics of cultural performance, London 1996, 257–74.
- Niger Republic, Ministry of Social Development and Population and the Promotion of Women, Rapport national. Conférence mondiale sur les femmes et développement, Niamey 1990.
- E. M. Reynolds, The democratic transition in Niger (1991–1996). Women leaders' theories and organizational strategies for the empowerment of women, masters thesis, Clark University 1997.

OUSSEINA ALIDOU

Turkey

Turkish women enjoy a broad array of constitutionally guaranteed rights that remain largely unparalleled in the rest of the Muslim world. Turkey's drive to become a full member of the European Union (EU) has added great impetus to democratization in general and to the expansion of free expression in particular. Yet, Turkey's rigidly pro-secular policies, while enabling women to compete with men professionally and socially, have also restricted free religious expression of openly pious women.

Bans on the Islamic-style headscarf in government institutions and in both state and privately run educational institutions are viewed by overtly pious Turks as one of the chief restrictions on religious freedoms. Merve Kavakçı, a Western-trained engineer, who covers her head, was stripped of her parliamentary seat and of her Turkish nationality after appearing at the parliament's inaugural session in 1999 wearing her headscarf. Her candidacy on the ticket of the Islam-oriented Virtue Party in the 1999 parliamentary elections was also cited as one of the main reasons for the party's closure by the constitutional court in 2001 on the grounds that it was seeking to overturn secular rule.

The French parliament's decision in February 2004 to ban religious "symbols" including the headscarf in state-run primary schools and lycées was perceived as a blow by Turkish women campaigning to lift such bans in Turkey as it provided ammunition for those who argue that the headscarf is a political symbol used to advocate Islamic militancy. Fearing retribution from the military, the conservative Justice and Development Party (AKP), led by a group of former Islamists, which came to power alone in the November 2002 elections, did not field any female candidates who wore the Islamic-style headscarf either then or during municipal elections held in March 2004. The wives of AKP cabinet members, including the wife of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, continue to be barred from attending state functions because they cover their heads. Some pious women have resorted to wearing wigs over their headscarves so as to circumvent the ban, especially in high schools and universities. Religiously observant Turks are especially irked by the fact that the headscarf is not allowed even at coeducational state run religious schools where imams and preachers are trained and students, in addition to learning all subjects taught in secular schools, are taught about the life of the Prophet Muḥammad and how to read the Qur'an.

Turkey's powerful armed forces continue to label Islamic fundamentalism as the main threat to the country's security and have played a major role behind the scenes in clamping down on any overt expression of Islam in public life. Turkey's own peculiar brand of secularism is exercised through the strict control of all aspects of religious life through the state-run Religious Affairs Directorate, which appoints all the country's imams. Members of Turkey's minority Alevi sect, who practice a liberal form of Shī'i Islam, have long accused the state of discriminating against them by not including information about their faith in mandatory religion classes taught in government run schools. They also accuse the Religious Affairs Directorate of bias because it regards them as a cultural rather than a religious group. Tensions between the Alevis and Turkey's Sunnī Muslim majority have occasionally escalated into outright violence. In one of the worst such incidents, in 1993, some 37 Alevi intellectuals, writers, and poets were burned to death in a hotel in the eastern province of Sivas by a crowd of people emerging from Friday prayers at a local Sunni mosque. The failure of Islamist activists to condemn the Sivas massacre, as it came to be known, has left a deep scar in the Alevi psyche.

Indeed, the debate over secularism and the role of Islam in society and politics continues to be one of the major issues dividing modern Turkey as it strives to cement over three decades of largely uninterrupted democratic rule.

Turkey's current constitution was drawn up in 1982 by the rigidly pro-secular military after it had seized power directly for the third and last time in 1980. The constitution imposed stiff curbs on free expression, with the result that thousands of Turkish nationals have since been jailed for so called non-violent "thought crimes."

A separatist insurgency launched in the country's predominantly Kurdish southeastern provinces by the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) led to a sharp rise in human rights violations throughout the 1990s as government forces resorted to brutal methods, including arbitrary detentions, torture, and the forcible evacuation of thousands of Kurdish villages, to stamp out the rebellion. In 1994 a special state security court sentenced four ethnic Kurdish members of parliament to 15 years in jail on thinly supported charges that they were linked to the PKK; among them was Leyla Zana, a female Kurdish parliamentarian from the southeastern province of Diyarbakır, whose chief offense was to have addressed the parliament in the Kurdish language during an inaugural session in 1991. All four were released pending an appeal on 9 June 2004 in a move aimed in part to persuade the EU to begin membership talks with Turkey by the end of 2004. The same day Turkish state-run television aired its first ever program in the most widely spoken Kurdish dialect, Kurmanji.

In 2003 the parliament passed legislation lifting bans on teaching Kurdish as a language in privately run language courses, but teaching in the Kurdish language is forbidden still. Turkey's human rights record has been repeatedly cited by EU governments as one of the main reasons why Turkey has been denied entry to their organization so far.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Pope and H. Pope, Turkey unveiled, London 1997, 324-5.
 United Nations, Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, Combined fourth and fifth periodic reports of States parties, Turkey, August 2003.
 United States Department of State, Turkey, Country Reports on Human Rights Practices - 2002, Washington, D.C., <<http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2002/18396.htm>>.

United States Department of State, Turkey, International Religious Freedom Report 2003, Washington, D.C., <<http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2003/24438.htm>>.

AMBERIN ZAMAN

The United States

Muslim women struggle against demeaning stereotypical images depicting them as incapable of being productive elements in society. They often find themselves confronting cultural trends within the Muslim community that hold them to a high standard of moral discipline yet deny them any significant role in shaping the future of their own community. But Muslim women are diverse along lines of ethnicity, religious attitude, and occupation. Their experiences and views on gender and freedom of expression issues are even more complex.

Muslim women wearing hijāb, the attire that varies in style but usually covers the hair, neck, and body except for the face and hands, have been the most vocal in recent years in pressing for their right to practice their faith. Feeling empowered by the constitutional protection of freedom of religion, many Muslim women share the view that being American does not mean shedding their religious convictions. After all, the United States is a pluralistic society that has produced and marketed many modes of dress around the world. So, while the ethnic South Asian shalwar kameez and the Arab thawb have given way to contemporary North American clothing styles, the hijāb has survived because it stems from deeply held religious beliefs.

While the hijāb has caused controversy, for example, in uniformed occupations, the issue is increasingly regarded as a matter of freedom of religion in the workplace and at school. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, a federal government agency set up to implement the employment clauses of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, has advocated the right of women to wear hijāb at work. The law requires employers to offer reasonable accommodation to the religious practices of employees.

Often the discriminatory treatment experienced by women wearing hijāb is overt and could conceivably be challenged in court. However, most potential plaintiffs are not willing to make waves, cannot afford the usually high cost of legal counsel, or simply are unaware of their legal rights. In many cases, Muslim women denied their First Amendment right to wear hijāb look for other jobs or relax their fulfillment of religious requirements to fit the demands of employers, just as some Muslim men shave their beards or take off the kūfi they wear for religious reasons in order to keep their jobs.

A few corporations have taken steps to recognize the need to accommodate religiously inspired modes of dress. For example, on 18 May 2001, United Airlines, whose uniform policy was challenged by Muslim women in a number of incidents, announced that its customer service employees across the United States would be “allowed to wear a company-sanctioned hijab, turban or yarmulke as part of their uniform.” Explaining the decision, the company stated, “We want our workforce to reflect the diversity of our global customer base.”

For the public, hijāb has become a Muslim identifier. Outside the workplace, women with hijāb are frequently the targets of anti-Muslim attacks. In schools, girls with scarves are taunted; in shopping malls women with hijāb are harassed or denied service. Traveling Muslim women also reported humiliating experiences at airports, especially after the 11 September 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. On the other hand, Americans demonstrating sympathy and tolerance to Muslims wore hijāb to express solidarity with Muslim women when anti-Muslim hate crimes peaked after 11 September 2001. In one case of passenger profiling involving a Muslim woman, a coalition of groups led by the American Civil Liberties Union filed a law suit against private security personnel at O’Hare International Airport in Chicago for the degrading treatment of a Muslim passenger wearing hijāb, charging that the woman’s freedom of religion and constitutional protections against unreasonable search and seizure had been violated.

Women who convert to Islam have indicated additional pressures. Some have faced rejection by family members who do not approve of their decision to embrace another religion; some families have become so intolerant of the change that they have severed relations and disinherited their convert daughters. In a few such cases, parents of converts have even attempted to gain custody of their grandchildren. In other cases family members and friends may express tolerance toward their relatives converting to Islam but treat them as if they have become disloyal citizens.

Muslim women with an ethnicity-based identity may face a different set of pressures related to racial and national origin prejudice. The immigrants in this subset of Muslim women struggle while attempting to strike a balance between assimilation and acceptance, being American without losing pride in their roots and core values. Some find the problematics of freedom relate more to the dis-crimatory treatment they face from family members who, for example, consider it unacceptable for their female relatives to date but are not bothered by the same behavior from their male counterparts.

Many women view their identity in terms that are much larger or even different from ones confined to religion and ethnicity. Regardless of orientation, most Muslim women are concerned about balancing the demands of work, family, and society. Experiences differ. Immigrant women coming from patriarchal cultures face a more difficult task in meeting the demands of career while fulfilling the demands of husbands who expect them also to cook, clean, and care for children. In some instances women have been forced to make a choice between marriage and work outside the house. In the United States, Muslim women generally place high value on education; many refuse to consider marriage or job before finishing college. Parents generally support such a tendency.

Many Muslim men are adjusting to the requirements of family life where both husband and wife are employed to sustain a household. Among many Muslim women a sense of sisterhood has been established around the need to support one another in pursuing a multi-faceted life inside and outside the house. Some have developed childcare services based on reciprocity; others have established day care businesses to support the desire of their Muslim sisters to earn a living or participate in public functions.

Because of the lingering male bias that often claims legitimacy on the basis of tradition, some intellectual Muslim women are joining forces to re-examine religious scholarly works. A number of contemporary female authors argue that religious texts have been misinterpreted for centuries by male jurists who did not have women’s interests – or, for that matter, particularly Islamic interests – in mind. These women are only beginning to offer religious interpretations they believe to be free of male bias. This movement, however, is still in its infancy and has yet to make any significant impact on the discourse on the status of Muslim women.

Muslim women’s roles outside the home include organizing on the basis of gender to promote the involvement of Muslim women in civic life. Such involvement is constrained by a gender gap between Muslim men and women regarding the social and political roles of women. More women than men are enthusiastic about the involvement of women outside the house. Still, the reality is that Muslim women participate in community life in a variety of ways, although women struggle for representation in leadership positions. A number of Muslim community organizations in the United States are responding to women's call for inclusion. The Islamic Society of North America had its first female vice president in 2001. The American Muslim Alliance elected a woman to serve on its board in 2004. Nearly half the staff and a board member of the Council on American-Islamic Relations are women. Among young Muslims, the inclusion of women is being institutionalized. For example, some Muslim Student Association (MSA) chapters, such as MSA-Northwestern University in Chicago, now have by-laws requiring co-presidency by males and females. On 25 June 2004, MSA National elected its first female president. As women gain access to higher education and job related skills, they enhance their contribution to community and society and increase their chances to improve their status and assume leading roles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami, Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995.
 C. Anway, Daughters of another path. Experiences of American women choosing Islam, Lee's Summit, Mo. 1996.
 Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (eds.), Islam, gender, and social change, New York 1998.
 J. I. Smith (ed. and intro.), Women in contemporary Muslim societies, Lewisburg, Pa. 1980.
 A. Wadud, Qur'an and woman. Rereading the sacred text from a woman's perspective, New York 1999.
 G. Webb (ed.), Windows of faith. Muslim women scholars-activists in North America, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000.

MOHAMED NIMER

Western Europe

Fundamental rights are protected legally at different levels in Western Europe. Do Muslim women living in the member states of the European Union fully experience these rights? Do they benefit from more freedom of expression and religious expression than in Muslim countries?

Freedom of expression and freedom of religious expression are part of the fundamental rights that are guaranteed and protected by law at the national and European Union level. These fundamental rights have individual and collective dimensions that may in some case interfere with and even contradict each other. Moreover, in Western European countries, the complex history of the relationship between state and religion is central to understanding the specific political culture of every national context. Western Europe may in fact appear from the outside as a relatively uniform religious landscape (Christian). The difficulty of the task of analyzing freedom of expression and freedom of religious expression of Muslim women living in Europe lies in the extreme diversity of the national settings when attempting to interpret the meaning of these fundamental rights and putting them into practice. This may be the main reason for the problem Western European societies have in recognizing and guaranteeing these fundamental rights to Muslim populations.

In the European Union, a set of legal provisions has been implemented aimed at protecting the fundamental rights of individuals. Recently, the European directive on the creation of a general system for equal treatment in employment and work (2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000) makes religion an individual criterion for discrimination, which for the first time appears explicitly in a juridical text. However, there is no unitary "religious" European public policy. Religion remains potentially a highly controversial issue as demonstrated in the discussion of the text of the Preamble to the future European Constitution and the quotation of an explicit reference to a set of "common religious values." In this picture, Muslims in many respects appear as latecomers and even as troublemakers. For instance, now that the economic, juridical, and political standards for admission into the European Union are closer than ever, the perspective of the accession of Turkey, a secular republic but still a Muslim society, is more openly questioned in terms of religious identity.

The situation of Muslim women in this context is the same as for other women, at least from a purely juridical perspective. Indeed, if Muslim women do have European citizenship through access to that citizenship in their country of residence, they fall within the scope of European jurisdiction as far as personal status is concerned. This, however, is not the case for those who are still citizens of Muslim countries and still subject to the rule of law of these countries. This is of peculiar importance for marriage and divorce, and also for decisions concerning children in such cases. Freedom of expression and fundamental rights remain under foreign legal influence and may contradict the fundamental principles of the European Union. A particularly vivid illustration is the reality of a child kidnapped (mainly) by his or her father after a divorce in a Western European country and brought back to his country of origin.

If we try to map the situation of Muslim women in Western European societies, a distinction has to be made between women who have access to education and professional skills, allowing them employment and financial autonomy, and those who remain under the very strong influence of the family structure. Time changes the situation for many. For the most part, the first category is composed of women who arrived when very young or who were born in the European countries where their parents decided to move. The situation is quite different for those women arriving in their twenties as the first of their family to migrate. This is particularly true of the young Muslim women who continue to be brought from the country of origin to be married to young Muslim men already living in Europe. At first glance, this may appear from a sociological perspective to be a matrimonial strategy implemented to obtain access to new positions through physical and social mobility. Recent qualitative studies conducted among young Muslim girls from Turkey, however, have demonstrated that in terms of personal autonomy and in particular of contact with European societies, the circumstances of these women are highly dependent on their educational skills, as well as their ability to construct their own autonomy vis-à-vis the family.

Another issue is that of the collective visibility of Muslim women in the public space in Europe. Here the discussion relates to many issues. The first level is a political one: no Western European country forbids women to participate in political life, either as a political candidate or as a voter. Once they acquire citizenship in the European country in which they live, Muslim women benefit from this right. The situation is again different for Muslim women who are not European citizens. The second level is that of religious organizations. In most European countries, Muslims are organized in associations that provide a range of different activities, either related to religious practices and education (mosques, praying rooms, Qur'an courses), or oriented toward social and even economic activities (sports, halal business, library, women's groups, schools, and so on). As in many other associations, women are underrepresented, with the exception of women's groups oriented to specific activities, mostly related to the education of children. This is also the case with the internal membership on boards of directors or steering committees of national Muslim federations in many countries. At a third level, if we remain in the realm of religious authorities and observe the composition of the various structures that function as the national partner of a state, very few women can be found. It seems nevertheless that a general movement toward empowerment of Muslim women in these religious circles is emerging. This empowerment is often based on new skills in Islamic knowledge (Jonker 2003) and on a growing familiarity with European ideals and principles of gender equality (Roald 2001).

Finally, we must note the opportunities that residence in Western Europe may have given to women that would not have been available to them in most Muslim societies. Western European countries present an ambiguous face. On the one hand, for women coming from Muslim societies where certain religious signs such as headscarves are perceived as highly political and therefore strongly controlled or forbidden (as in Turkey and Tunisia), European countries represent places of freedom where praying or walking with a veil in the street is not a problem. This idea of Europe as a space of religious freedom is mostly true for countries where religion and politics have found an institutional way of coping with each other. The United Kingdom, Italy, and Germany are perhaps the most obvious cases. In contrast, some limits to this religious freedom may appear and open up highly controversial discussions when it comes to recognizing the individual's right to wear a headscarf at school, at work, or on an ID card. Here again, national political cultures and the way the "neutrality" of the state is articulated with regard to religious pluralism have to be considered in a historical perspective to understand why this topic is so difficult to manage in some contexts, while in others it is rather smoothly discussed. The wish to wear the veil in daily life emerged at the same moment in many European contexts (Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom). While in most (but not all) cases it has been quite easily managed when the veil is worn at school, matters are different when women make the same claims for religious freedom in the workplace and in particular in the public sector. The tension between two principles – individual rights to practice freely a religion versus state neutrality (as expressed, for instance, by civil servants) – appears obvious. It remains a national debate, not yet a European one. This may eventually change once the European Court for Human Rights produces a case law helping Muslim women to have this specific claim recognized as an individual right to freedom of expression and of religious expression. This is, however, not yet the case (see the recent decision of the European Court for Human Rights, 44774/98 on 29 June 2004).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J.-Y. Carlier and M. Verwilghen (eds.), Le statut personnel des musulmans. Droit comparé et droit international privé, Brussels 1992.
- G. Jonker, Islamic knowledge through a woman's lens. Education, power and belief, in Social Compass 50:1 (2003), 35–46.

- A.-S. Roald, Women in Islam. The Western experience, London 2001,
W. A. R. Shadid and P. S. van Koningsveld (eds.), Religious freedom and the neutrality of the state. The position of Islam in the European Union, Leuven 2002.

VALÉRIE AMIRAUX

Friendship

Arab States

Recent studies of women, gender, and friendship in Arab states can be roughly divided into two often overlapping categories: studies that focus on the use of the discourse of kinship, broadly defined, in creating and describing women's most central friendships; and studies that draw out the relationship between women's friendships and the geographies and practicalities of women's daily social lives. Recognizing how women create meaningful social relationships through the use of a kinship idiom takes us past a biogenetic, familial-based determinism focusing on the role of the Arab family to a nuanced understanding of how women create a range of meaningful relationships. Traditionally, scholars have emphasized the form and functions of the genealogically-defined extended family, while often excluding other meaningful sources of relationships for women. At issue here is the fact that many women in communities throughout Arab states use the idiom of kinship to describe meaningful relationships of all sorts. Scholars who take this discourse as a simple reflection of biological fact miss the use of the kinship discourse as commentary on the social construction of meaningful social relationships.

Further, by recognizing the roles of neighbors and the socially constructed geographical boundaries of the social lives of Arab women, we may learn how key cultural and political economic forces affect women's intimate lives. Cultural limitations imposed on women's movements and, thus, on women's opportunities for forming close relationships, may not necessarily be seen as oppressive by the women themselves; on the other hand, when international and nationalist politics create artificial borders and boundaries between and among communities, the repercussions for friendships and families alike are often severe and keenly felt as inherently oppressive. Yet because they have often been understood to be both limited to and entrapped by the domestic (rather than public) sphere, women's social circles have often been simplistically assumed to be limited to their family members. Debunking these commonly held misconceptions about women's isolation within the family and carefully delineating the layers of meanings found within the use of the kinship idiom have been central goals of recent scholars.

Finally, studying friendships of women in Arab states may serve to help us consider what exactly constitutes "friendship" in specific cultural settings and lead us to a greater recognition of its culturally and historically constructed qualities, rather than presuming that friendship is an ahistorical, timeless, or "natural" relational category.

FRIENDSHIP AND FAMILY

Recent scholarship emphasizes how, in both practice and ideology, notions of family and friend are both closely related to each other and/or distinguished from each other, depending upon context. Thus, although often distinguished linguistically, in practice friend and kinship relationships may be difficult to tell apart. For example, as Geertz points out, although in Morocco speech distinctions are made between kin and non-kin, "the operative, everyday, acted-upon premises do not rely on sharp and simple distinctions among family, friend, and patron" (1979, 315).

Reflecting the closely related character of good friends and one's family is the fact that women's most meaningful friendships are often described as being similar to good kin relations. For example, Lila Abu-Lughod, in a study of Beduin women in Egypt, describes how Beduin who live together and develop close relationships may stress the "link of paternal kinship" in discourse, whether or not it exists, as a means of describing the nature of their friendships; long-time neighbors may thus be considered "quasi-kin" (Abu-Lughod 1986, 63). Soraya Altorki similarly notes for elite women in Saudi Arabia, "old friends are treated as if they were close kin" (1986, 103). Formality is significantly lessened among friends (as it is among family members), and visits are not based on a strict basis of reciprocity. Friendship ties may play a key, supportive role in women's lives, a role that is at times as important as the roles played by kin. Anne Meneley, in her study of Yemeni women in the town of Zabid, notes that the word for "neighbor" has an "emotionally evocative quality," calling up a sense of comfortableness, familiarity, and feeling "like kin" (1996, 54).

These examples demonstrate that, for many women in the Arab world, the family is a central model for creating meaningful relationships with others. They do not suggest, however, that women are unaware of, or indifferent to, the difference between those who are biologically-related family members and those who are not. Nor does it suggest that friends who are spoken of and/or treated as kin are equated with biological kin. Further, it is important to note that just as relationships among genealogically-related women may be shaped by personal preference, antagonistic histories, or the hope for closer future ties, so too are the relations among friends. Thus, women use the discourse of family to imbue their friendships with culturally appropriate meanings. Ideally, one's extended family members should be one's friends; one's friends, if not from the extended family, should be treated as if they are so related.

FRIENDSHIP AND THE GEOGRAPHY OF SOCIAL LIFE

Women's friendships in Arab states are shaped not only by expectations of kin-like relations, but also by geographical location, a factor that is intrinsically affected by international and national politics and economics, as well as local practices of gender segregation and, in some instances, seclusion. Geographical constraints and opportunities, always socially and politically constructed, are consequently imbued with cultural, political, symbolic, and emotional meanings.

The importance of closely located neighbors as sources for women's closest friendships is undeniable in places where women's movements are located primarily in, or restricted to, the neighborhood. Wikan, for example, argues that in the case of Sohar, Oman, where women's lives are strictly defined by patterns of sex segregation and by remaining far from the public eye, women maintain circles of diverse companions usually chosen from among their neighbors; women do not use the word "friend" to describe their relationships with one another; rather, men use the word "friend" to describe their relationships with peers. Wikan argues that "the very diversity [in terms of ethnicity, age and wealth] of these circles indicates that physical closeness and convenience are major considerations in their formation" (1982, 116).

Spaces that are primarily female are also important for the formation and maintenance of women's friendships. Suad Joseph argues that, for women in an urban lower-class neighborhood in Lebanon, the requirements of men's work away from their neighborhood left the street a female domain; for women, "co-residence in a street became a basis for intimacy" (1978, 545). Similarly, Rothenberg (2004) has argued that for Muslim villagers in the West Bank, the "kind of family that matters" for many women is shaped by a sense of friendship created, in large part, through the circumstance of being physically close to one another. The role of international as well as local politics is also central here: in the West Bank, the ready existence of a history of ties that can be found to link almost any two neighbors, coupled with the pressure for emigration from the village and the fact that many families are forcibly divided because of Israeli restrictions on who was allowed to return to the West Bank after the occupation that began in 1967, make enduring physical presence as well as individual preference key factors in creating important social ties. Indeed, if almost anyone can be considered kin (albeit to varying degrees) and, simultaneously, the threat of departure from the village is seen as always imminent, the people who matter are those upon whom one can rely and those about whom one cares.

NEW DEVELOPMENTS

The ethnographic examples discussed here reflect the linkage between notions of friends and family, as well as close relationships of all kinds and geographical location. A number of relatively recent developments in the Arab world have impacted on and will continue to affect women's experiences of friendship in the decades to come. A process already in motion is women's increasing access to higher education and the workforce, experiences that change the shape and nature of women's friendship networks. It has been demonstrated, for example, that women may become involved in political organizations with their peers on university campuses (for example, El Guindi 1981) and have experiences which are certain to affect their choices of friends. The growth of the nuclear family structure also affects women's opportunities and preferences for large networks of friends; while nuclear family arrangements may allow women some increase in the freedom to make their own choices about with whom to spend their time, it also often increases their workload, as there are fewer adult women to share the work of the household. Finally, the increasingly widespread use of the Internet and "chat rooms" have made both international and cross gender "virtual" friendships possible in ways that were unthinkable a generation ago. These and other changes as yet unforeseen will shape and be shaped by the experience of friendship for women in Arab states and will pose interesting possibilities for future research.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments, Los Angeles 1986.
 S. Altorki, Women in Saudi Arabia, New York 1986.
 F. El Guindi, Veiling infitah with Muslim ethic, in Social Problems 28:4 (1981), 465–83.
 H. Geertz, The meaning of family ties, in C. Geertz, H. Geertz, and L. Rosen (eds.), Meaning and order in Moroccan society, New York 1979, 315–91.
 S. Joseph, Women and the neighborhood street in Borj Hammoud, Lebanon, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 541–58.
 A. Meneley, Tournaments of value, Toronto 1996.
 C. Rothenberg, Spirits of Palestine, New York 2004.
 U. Wikan, Behind the veil in Arabia, Chicago 1982.

CELIA E. ROTHENBERG

The Caucasus and Central Asia

Among the values preserved by the various ethnic groups living in the Caucasus and Central Asia are the maintenance of gendered space and the concept of family honor. Women maintain family reputation and honor by demurely staying in the background and exercising restraint. This often means that women's friendships are primarily forged within the extended family structure, as women of conservative Muslim and Orthodox Christian families traditionally were/are enjoined not to socialize with those unrelated to them. While conservatism is not solely found in rural areas, village life is somewhat more prone to keep within traditional norms due to the intimate living conditions of small settlements. Urban life allows more flexibility and openness because of the anonymity cities provide. This makes it easier for women to create bonds of friendship outside the family circle and widen their webs of social relationships.

How significant friendships between women are when viewed from a socioeconomic and political perspective is difficult to ascertain and represent in numbers and statistics. Currently, there is little if any research material available that specifically addresses the role of friendships in Central Asia or the Caucasus. This may reflect a disinterest of scholars to investigate the importance of informal relationships in general, or women's private lives in particular. It may also indicate a lack of available funding for research that does not translate into economic or political applications. Then again, it may simply be a matter of the difficulty encountered when scholars try to enter into personal discourse with informants who wish to remain anonymous, or mistrust foreigners who apparently represent institutional entities, or – even worse – governments.

Friendships are an integral part of the social network that facilitates local micro-economies and makes survival possible in severely distressed economies of the slowly developing civil societies. Hence, women's friendships are of immense importance as they not only represent an emotional and social outlet for them, but also because they provide access to networks that help pool and redistribute scant resources in areas devastated by Soviet economic policies that created an ecological disaster zone across the vast expanse of Central Asia.

As can be gleaned from numerous scholars of the region whose work originates in different disciplines, women's friendships are essential for the survival of all social groups. Attempts at creating civil societies in the independent states have made the role of friendship among women in given neighborhoods and with women from foreign non-governmental agencies more visible in recent years. Within grassroots organizations run by and for women, friendship between women of different ethnical, religious, and socioeconomic backgrounds are opening channels of communication as well as venues for political agency.

Still, popular religion is often the only acceptable social outlet for many women. Rituals and ceremonies are fertile grounds for renewal, maintenance, and creation of friendships. Unlike most men, women venture past class and professional boundaries in search of social connections. They cast their nets wider in forming friendships and use religious and religiously sanctioned gatherings, especially when sponsored by the mahalla – the traditional community based on patrilineal clan organization – to build networks.

The social life of the community centers on the mahalla, a bastion of traditionalism that situates women in a "safe" and (usually) unassailable discursive space. Within that framework, women's friendships are articulated according to traditionalist sensibilities. In this context, religious instruction by an otin, a woman who teaches Islam to girls and women, festivals, rituals, and prayer meetings are welcome diversions and present additional opportunities to connect with the world outside family boundaries.

Most women depend on their friends for emotional support, especially as many of the younger women often find themselves utterly powerless and isolated as junior wives at the mercy of their mother-in-law. A "good wife" is silent, does not leave her house without her husband, and subordinates herself completely to her mother-in-law. This translates into high suicide rates for young brides who are isolated from family and childhood friends, as marriage generally means living with the new husband's family. Especially in rural areas, where not even the illusion of privacy exists, friendships with equally powerless young neighborhood women are crucial in maintaining sanity. Urban life by comparison is somewhat more liberal and anonymous. Town women have more opportunities to meet in the context of the workplace and social outings that cross class and age barriers. Hence, their opportunities to build friendships are enhanced when compared to those of rural women.

Women in post-Soviet space still experience the double burden of being part of the paid labor force as well as being responsible for all domestic chores. Although it appears that there is a revival of pre-Soviet social norms that limit women's role in public positions, the political leadership at least still appears to further women's political engagement. Whether this is mere window dressing to attract Western investment, or represents any deep felt conviction that women ought to have a voice in public and international discourse is open to debate. The fact remains that women in government positions occupy positions of relative powerlessness when compared to their male counterparts. Here again, the role of friendship ought to be investigated. Could women with strong bonds with others in similar situations create a climate of egalitarianism on an official level that could eventually trickle down to the private sphere and domestic discourses? Relevant research remains to be done in this regard.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. du P. Gray, Soviet women. Walking the tightrope, New York 1989.
- P. A. Michaels, Kazak women. Living heritage of a unique past, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 187-202.
- J. Nazpary, Post-Soviet chaos. Violence and dispossession in Kazakhstan, London 2002.
- S. P. Poliakov, Everyday Islam. Religion and tradition in rural Central Asia, trans. A. Olcott, ed. and intro. M. B. Olcott, Armonk, N.Y. 1991.
- M. H. Ruffin and D. Waugh (eds.), Civil society in Central Asia, Seattle 1999.
- S. Tadjbaksh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology in Tajikistan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 163-86.
- N. Tohidi, "Guardians of the nation." Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137-62.

Iran and Afghanistan

Friendship plays a significant part in the lives of Iranians and Afghans, who do not generally value solitude or privacy, but enjoy forming and maintaining acquaintance and companionship. Women show warmth and affection to their female relatives and friends. Because Iranian and Afghan families often maintain tight ties and most females are generally restricted from movement outside kin circles, the closest friendships are often with mother, sisters, cousins, or aunts.

For females, friends offered support and reprieve from sometimes oppressive husbands or in-laws. Poorer or rural women might be able to confide their stories of mistreatment to neighbors, weep, and receive sympathy. In less well-off and traditional families, males could go out and find friends and activities outside their family and relatives. Especially before large-scale schooling of girls, females faced more severe limitations on developing friendships outside family, female relatives, and neighbors. Class, finances, and level of seclusion affected a female's ability to spend time interacting with others. Women in the socially conservative Pukhtun ethnic group, who form the majority of Afghanistan's population, usually were not able to leave their courtyards or small kin groups and faced barriers to forming friendships outside these circles. Urban and better off rural women in Iran, with its higher standard of living and much larger population, enjoyed a social life of interacting with other women. Rural women looked forward to weddings, visits to the cemetery on Thursday afternoons, and even mourning rituals, as opportunities for talking with other women. Better off women often engaged in rounds of visits and gatherings during which they could converse and keep up friendships. Iranian and urban Afghan women could participate in religious rituals at home, attend segregated life cycle rituals, or perform pilgrimage at shrines together.

Because of the informal and personalistic nature of society, when women mobilized to attain aims, they generally worked with their friends. Some urban Iranian women cooperated with their female friends in supporting the Constitutional Revolution and developing newspapers, journals, and schooling for females in the earlier part of the twentieth century.

Early marriage and moving away to the home of a husband generally disrupted young female friendships. Obligations to husband, children, household, and in-laws, as well as expectations of modesty left little time or opportunity for a young wife to keep up friendships. In her later years, freedom from responsibilities to husband and children, and the greater latitude allowed a post-menopausal woman, enabled her to spend time with friends.

In the 1960s and 1970s, with more girls going to school, and even a minority to university, and then taking jobs, in Iran more so than in Afghanistan, females found opportunities to make friends with their classmates and work associates. Well-off families often participated in one or more circles of people who met on a regular basis, weekly or monthly, for food and conversation. Wealthier women who were not working might take turns hosting elaborate lunches. High school girls might follow suit, their parents driving them to the home of a classmate on a weekend for a good meal cooked by the mother, and then a movie in the afternoon. Even less educated and less economically advantaged women could participate in regular women's religious gatherings to listen to recitations of the passion of Shīrī Muslim saints. Educated and modernized females in Iran and in the tinier middle- and upper middle-class urban Afghanistan could develop extensive networks outside religious and kin circles. Based more on specific common interests and world-view rather than on proximity, such friendships might last a long time, even after marriage. In urban Iran, groups of couples could enjoy weekend outings and eat out at restaurants together.

In Afghanistan, the war with the Soviet Union, the conflict between factions after the expulsion of the Soviets, and then finally the Taliban rule forced many Afghans to become refugees. Friendships and ties with family and relatives were disrupted. Often Afghan women living as refugees away from their own neighborhoods and villages in Afghanistan faced severe seclusion. Under the Taliban, women were not permitted to leave the house without a male family member escort, and thus were cut off from friends and relatives. Under the insecure conditions of post-Taliban Afghanistan, families fear for the safety of their females, and often do not allow girls to go to school, or visit in other homes without a male family escort, thus reducing opportunities to interact with friends.

In Iran, women met with friends to discuss personal and public issues. Women mobilized their friends for various organizations and participation in political marches for supporters of the revolution against the Pahlavī regime. After the revolution and the subsequent formation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the religious/political leaders mandated increased gender segregation and women's modesty. In the early years of the republic, women were restricted in their movements and activities and were thus less able to maintain interaction with friends outside religious and kin gatherings. However, after these early policies were modified, even those from rural, lower-class and more conservative families began to attend high school and university in greater numbers, thereby gaining opportunities to develop friendships outside the family. Women's segregated religious gatherings to study the Qur'an and other religious sources have increased in popularity. Some women are working through their friendship networks to try to bring about positive change in women's rights and opportunities.

In Afghanistan, women cooperated with friends to try to form home-based, secret schools for girls during the Taliban period and to oppose the severe Taliban restrictions on females.

Those Iranian women, and the much smaller percentage of Afghan women, who work outside the home have little time for intensive rounds of visiting and attending religious ritual, neighborhood, kin, and friendship group gatherings. However, they continue to place great importance on socializing, intimate or intellectual exchange, and developing close relationships with other women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin, Tex. 1988.
 H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, London 2002.
 S. Farman-Farmaian, Daughter of Persia. A woman's journey from her father's harem through the Islamic Revolution, New York 1992.
 E. Friedl, Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, New York 1991.
 M. Hegland, Women and the Iranian Revolution. A village case study, in M. J. Diamond (ed.), Women and revolution. Global expressions, Dordrecht, The Netherlands 1998, 211–25.
 Z. Kamalkhani, Women's Islam. Religious practice among women in today's Iran, London 1997.
 M. Kousha, Voices from Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
 H. Moghissi, Populism and feminism in Iran, New York 1996.
 A. Nafisi, Reading Lolita in Tehran, New York 2003.
 P. Omidian, Aging and family in an Afghan refugee community. Transitions and transformation, New York 1996.
 E. Sanasarian, The Women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1982.
 N. Tapper (Lindisfarne), The women's subsociety among the Shahsevan nomads of Iran, in L. Beck and N. R. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 374–98.
 —, Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
 A. Torab, The politicization of women's religious circles in post-revolutionary Iran, in S. Ansari and V. Martin, (eds.), Women, religion, and culture in Iran, London 2002, 143–68.

South Asia

Like ripples of water hit by a pebble, the social life of Muslim women in South Asia emanated outwards from the center at a speed dictated by the Islamic ideology of purdah and its attendant concepts of 'izzat (honor) and sharm (dishonor) on one hand, and embracing Western education and its concomitants on the other. Little is known about the social life of women in the early twentieth century. Literary and survey sources focus on the family and kin as sources for social relations. Women, especially sisters, functioned both as siblings and friends. Zeenat Futehally dedicated her novel Zohra (1951) to her three sisters. Elite women had the privilege of social access to Parsee, Hindu, and English women. This is portrayed in Attia Hosain's short story, "The First Party" (1991). Unlike the world of family and kin, this constituted a formal social world and less of an intimate emotional one. Unlike elite Muslims who lived in multiethnic locations, their less privileged sisters were clustered in mohollas (ethnic enclaves). Besides family and kin their social network spilled into the neighborhood. Ismat Chughtai's short story, "The Wedding Suit" (2001), set in North India, describes the role of neighborhood women in assisting each other in preparing the bride's trousseau as girls in various households reached marriageable age. In Gujarat when men were away at work, women sat on the otlo (porch) of their residential building and gossiped with neighbors, a practice that continues to this day. The purpose of the network was instrumental in scope – religious and life cycle rituals – rather than for leisure. With few exceptions the site for friendship was limited to the domestic space and contacts centered on same sex, sect, and class but across generations as well. There is no scholarship on lesbian relationships within the zenana (women's quarters). Ismat Chughtai's short story, "The Quilt" (2001), written in the 1940s, depicts a lesbian relationship between a woman and her maidservant, as seen through the eyes of a child.

Cross-gender contact, not to mention friendships, were strictly taboo. However, unlike the Hindus, Muslims practiced purdah primarily toward non-related males. As a result, across class and sect, relations between kinsmen and women were relaxed and as cousin marriages were favored there was teasing leading to romantic overtures. This is depicted in several literary works such as Qurratulain Hyder's short story, "Memories of an Indian Childhood" (1991). Contact with unrelated males was not completely absent. In her autobiographical work, The Brocaded Saree (1946), Ishvani mentions how as a young doctor her grandfather trained the women of the community to assist him in taking the pulse of women and delivering their children into the world.

The publication of Muslim women's journals and the formation of Muslim women's associations extended the social boundaries of women to a greater geographical sphere. The publication of Tabzib un-Niswan, Khatun, and 'Ismat in the twentieth century initiated the spread of ideas of women's education and social change. Muhammadi Begum, the co-editor of Tabzib un-Niswan wrote in Adab-i-Mulaqat, an etiquette book dealing with social gatherings, on how to offer hospitality at such "modern" functions as tea parties and what to do when visiting. Minault (1998) writes, "This was especially useful information for purdah-observing women who were just beginning to socialize beyond the immediate family circle and were unsure how to behave." The All India Muslim Ladies' Conference (Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i-Islam) was formed in Aligarh in 1914. It established regional branches and advocated female education and a purdah observance based on Islamic injunction rather than the stricter variety dictated by custom. Minault highlights some of the friendships among its office bearers and hosts from different parts of the country and the increased sense of community it fostered among Muslim women. In a limited way, it also expanded exposure to non-kin men.

By the 1930s the acceptance of higher education for girls, relaxation of purdah rules, and Gandhi's political activism opened possibilities for the integration of women into a network that transcended regional, religious, and sectarian lines. Schools and colleges functioned as new sites from where friends could be drawn. The postcolonial disintegration of joint family and business, alteration in residential patterns, and improved public transport brought additional possibilities in women's friendship patterns. Anees Jung (1993) on Muslim women describes Rashida, 20 and unmarried, who sits amidst a group of women who gather every week at a welfare center. The women talk about their homes, problems of raising children, husbands who dominate, and elders who squabble.

Despite dramatic changes, women's friendships remained firmly rooted in their ethno-sectarian communities. International migration resulted in dispersal, but identity politics and Hindu-Muslim riots have pushed many back to their ethnic enclave and undone the social achievements of the past century. This is best illustrated by the women of the Daudi Bohra Ismā'īlī sect of Shī'ī Muslims who continue with their practice of friendship, prevalent since the early twentieth century, variously known as menij (turn), sayoo (friends), or goth (an arrangement). This is a circle of ten to twelve women similar in age and class who meet on a rotation basis every month in a member's home. Entry is established by puberty and is formalized by a few basic rules such as collection of annual dues, charge of a fee for failure to adhere to one's turn, and so forth. The cash collected is spent going to movies, restaurants, and picnics. From time to time extra dues are collected for travel. The main purpose is to pass time, have good food, pray together, and exchange information pertaining to women's concerns. Women enjoy the company of other women as it addresses their special interests, reduces their dependency on men, and gives them privacy. As a concession to modernity, the community has added a new dimension to friendship known as "couple-company" consisting of married men and women who follow a similar pattern. Social contact between the sexes is still dictated by the Islamic ideology of purdah and the nature of political economy. Jeffery (1979), describing the lives of women of pirzade men (custodians of a shrine in Delhi), writes that accommodating male guests posed a serious challenge as women had to be made invisible to them. These extremes reflect the diversity of women's experience in South Asia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Asaduddin (ed.), Lifting the veil. Selected writings of Ismat Chughtai, Delhi 2001.
 Z. Fatehully, Zobra, Bombay 1951.
 A. Hosain, The first party, in L. Holmstrom (ed.), The inner courtyard. Stories by Indian women, Delhi 1991, 106-11.
 Q. Hyder, Memories of an Indian childhood, in L. Holmstrom (ed.), The inner courtyard. Stories by Indian women, Delhi 1991, 39-55.
 Ishvani, The brocaded saree, London 1946.
 P. Jeffery, Frogs in a Well. Indian women in purdah, London 1979.
 A. Jung, Night of the new moon. Encounters with Muslim women in India, Delhi 1993.
 G. Minault, Secluded scholars, Delhi 1998.

REHANA GHADIALLY

Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa

Your presence in my life is by no means fortuitous. Our grandmothers in their compounds were separated by a fence and would exchange messages daily. Our mothers used to argue over who would look after our uncles and aunts. As for us we wore out wrappers and sandals on the same stony road to the koranic school . . . We walked the same paths from adolescence to maturity, where the past begets the present. My friend, my friend, my friend. I call upon you three times (Mariama Bâ, So Long a Letter).

TYPES OF WOMEN'S INTIMATE RELATIONSHIPS

Friendship is a voluntary relationship based upon trust that one chooses to engage in and that provides mutual rewards, including personal and social support. Unlike the formally structured interactions of kinship and other socially institutionalized roles, which are ultimately about meeting the needs of groups in society, friendships are primarily about meeting the needs of individuals, including expressions of intimacy and the privileging of and by another. Such relationships are more easily entered into over the course of an individual's lifetime but are also more easily abandoned, a brittleness that may at times prove useful.

Female friendships throughout Sub-Saharan Africa, including Muslim regions, tend to be distinguished by age groups and gender. From among one's contemporaries are chosen the majority of one's friends – those acquaintances whom one is always happy to see and who are greeted warmly at the market-place or at school; those "useful to know" people with whom one may exchange gifts and even the formalized mutual obligations of a patron/client relationship; and those who are the "most-trusted friends," with whom people share the joys and sorrows of their lives. This type of relationship is the focus here. It may last longer than many marriages and may transcend time and space. Such longstanding intimacy is illustrated sensitively in the novella So Long a Letter (1981) by Senegalese author Mariama Bâ, who uses the device of an exchange of letters between two educated Wolof women, friends since childhood. At times, a woman's intimate associations with other women may take precedence over her bonds of kinship and marriage; they certainly help her cope successfully with the demands of such ties.

In general, women friends form mutual aid societies, complementing the ranks of female kinswomen. They watch each other's homes, children, and at times, husbands, and often send food back and forth to each other. Indeed, this exchange of food can be an important way of establishing or reinforcing a friendship. When spouses quarrel it is often a female friend who intervenes to heal the breach and who seeks to keep the dispute from escalating out of bounds. She counsels patience and restraint to both parties. Since marriage in Sub-Saharan Africa is rarely just between two people, this function of the friend as mediator can play an important role before representatives of the families have to become involved. Female friends will also come to the aid of a woman who gives birth far from her female relatives. They take over all household duties for the first week and check in on her as she gradually resumes her household tasks.

This sharing of the minutiae of daily life is highly characteristic of women's friendships as is the frequent intersection of female kin (relatives) and non-kin (friends). One of the few to study friendship in Africa was Paul Riesman who examined personality formation among the Muslim Fulbe of Burkina Faso. He comments on these matters when he elucidates the Fulbe proverb, "giDo yaaye womnata BiDDo" (It's the mother's friend who will make the baby dance). He explains that playing with a baby by bouncing it on one's lap and tossing it up slightly is known as "making the baby dance"; thus, a true friend is a person who will help not only the individual but also one's relatives, represented by the image of playing with the child (Riesman 1992, 118).

ISLAM AND THE CONVENTIONS OF FRIENDSHIP: THE EXAMPLE OF THE MUSLIM HAUSA

Muslim Hausa women in Sub-Saharan Africa are bound by social convention – believed to derive from the prescriptions of the Qur'an – to entertain friends only in their households. Married women should be attractive only in their homes since their husbands will blame them if any other man finds them attractive. To decrease the odds that this will happen, formal visits between friends take place after nightfall, which also coincides with the end of the workday and the completion of daily chores.

Married men generally are not close to their wives nor women to their husbands. Men tend to stay out of women's quarters in other homes and only rarely enter these quarters in their own homes. They feel freer in visiting older sisters and other female relatives than they do in visiting younger sisters. In these female quarters, then, women have a great degree of freedom from male scrutiny and censure. Visits are one way that Hausa women develop and maintain their own networks as well as their ongoing involvements in their extended families. Religious ceremonies such as marriages and naming ceremonies are constant events in Hausa communities and provide other opportunities for women to meet, develop connections, and exchange information without any male presence. Through these networks they influence developments in their wider communities.

Women's visiting networks have become especially important in the contemporary urban centers, places such as the barracks of Kano, Nigeria studied by Katja Werthmann. The barracks area of Kano is part of the new section of town and the layout of houses is quite different from that in the Old City of Kano. In the Old City there is a clear division of public and private space and women's spaces are safely away from the public gaze. The barracks houses, however, do not afford this privacy. The old entrance hall is gone and there is no public space to replace it. Moreover, the outer area is not shaded as in traditional houses so men spend their days near mosques or in other areas where they can more comfortably meet. Women are almost the sole occupants of the neighborhood for much of the day and have used this opportunity to more fully develop their friendships. Because the women living in this neighborhood of Kano come from all over Nigeria there is a virtual absence of women's kinship networks. Instead, women have replaced these local kin networks with ones of non-kin friends throughout the city and reinforce these key support relationships with systematic visiting practices.

The ties of kinship and of friendship may intersect in other contexts as well. Hausa life cycle celebrations illustrate this point. Men and women remain separated for most of the events. For example, the bride is never present at a Hausa wedding, while the groom is typically present if the wedding is his bride's first marriage. The woman receives her guests and gifts at her father's home. Her female relatives and friends take care of the preparations for the celebration. The bride recites verses from the Qur'an in a display of her piety and knowledge in front of her relatives. As she does so, her female friends are there to support her, but traditionally hidden from view until the women join together in their party afterwards. The women then announce the marriage to the larger community by taking cakes and other treats home with them, thus spreading the news of the marriage through distributing a female-associated domestic product, processed food.

Gender segregation and celebration with friends also characterizes Hausa naming celebrations. The naming ceremony for a newborn child has two parts. In the early morning, the ceremony occurs at the mosque. It is for men only and here the baby receives its name. Then there is a later celebration that begins late in the morning. This ceremony is for women only. It generally gets loud and festive and takes up most of the remainder of the day. There is ceremonial drumming, performed by Hausa males who are allowed in despite the restrictions of purdah. They begin with Hausa style drumming but move to a more generic Muslim style as the day continues. Then music fills the air and women dance with one another. They have the time to relax, eat, catch up on each other's news, exchange information, and enjoy one another's company.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Bâ, So long a letter, trans. ModupéBodé-Thomas, Oxford 1981.
- L. Creevey and B. Callaway, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion, and politics in West Africa, Boulder, Colo. 1994.
- D. A. Donahoe, Measuring women's work in developing countries, in Population and Development Review 253 (1999), 543.
- B. House-Midamba and F. K. Ekechi (eds.), African market women and economic power. The role of women in African economic development, Westport, Conn. 1995.
- P. Riesman, First find your child a good mother. The construction of self in two African communities, New Brunswick, N.J. 1992.
- F. A. Salamone, The Hausa people. A bibliography, New Haven, Conn. 1983.
- , God and goods in Africa, Salem, Wis. 1985.
- , The problem of magic and religion. Further explorations into the relationship of missionaries and anthropologists, in Proceedings of the New York State Sociological Association, Oakdale, N.Y. 1994.
- , The Bori and I. Reflections of a mature anthropologist, in Anthropology and Humanism 19 (June 1995) 15–19.
- , Law and ritual. A Nigerian case, in Papers of the commission's Xth international congress, Faculty of Law, University of Ghana, Legon, Ghana, 21–4 August 1995, 14–38.
- , Review of William Miles, Hausaland divided, in American Ethnologist 23 (1996), 161–2.
- , Ethnicity and Nigeria since the end of the civil war, in Journal of Dialectical Anthropology 22 (1997), 303–33.
- , The illusion of ethnic identity. An introduction to ethnicity and its uses, in L. L. Naylor, Multiculturalism and diversity in the United States, Westport, Conn. 1997, 117–26.
- , The Waziri and the thief. Hausa Islamic law in a Yoruba city. A case study from Ibadan, Nigeria, in Journal of Legal Pluralism 42 (1998), 139–55.
- , Children's games as mechanisms for easing ethnic interaction in ethnically heterogeneous communities. A Nigerian case, in S. M. Channa (ed.), International encyclopedia of anthropology, iv, New Delhi 1998, 751–65.
- , Religion and repression. Enforcing feminine inequality in an "egalitarian society," in S. M. Channa (ed.), International encyclopedia of anthropology, xi, New Delhi 1998, 2551–62.
- , Hausa, in J. F. Rodriguez (ed.), The historical encyclopedia of world slavery, 2 vols., San Francisco 1998, 333–44.
- , Bornu-Kanem Sultanatein, in Magill's guide to military history, Pasadena 2000, 222–4.
- with V. Salamone, Kirki. A core value of Hausa culture, in Africa (Italy) 48 (1993), 359–81.
- , Erikson in Nigeria. Exploring the universality of the theory of psychosocial development, in Anthropos 88 (1993), 87–98.
- K. Werthmann, Matan bariki, "women of the barracks." Muslim Hausa women in an urban neighbourhood in northern Nigeria, in Africa 72:1 (2002), 112–30.

FRANK A. SALAMONE

Gender Socialization

Central Asia

Although the development of gender socialization throughout Central Asia shares a common history, the Soviet period created fundamental changes. Currently this process is expressed through socioeconomic, cultural, and political differences among Central Asian republics.

Throughout Central Asia the concept that women belong to men is ubiquitous: their social status is acquired through father, brother, husband, and son (Tokhtakhodjaeva 2001). Socialization is geared to gender roles: for the woman, the role of wife, mother, and housewife; for the man, provider and head of household.

The family is the main agent of socialization, especially for Muslim women; even in the Soviet period, women, essentially excluded from the public sphere, lived mainly within the home and family (Pal'vanova 1982). In the traditional Central Asian family children, male and female, understand their gender identity at a very early age. The birth of a boy is joyfully celebrated by everyone (Andreev 1953). Girls are rarely accorded such attention. The parents, especially fathers, openly express emotional attachment to their young sons, even through play emphasizing the boy's gender significance (Kisliakov 1969). Fathers are significantly less attentive to female children. Mothers prepare girls to take care of themselves and to take on their allocated obligations. At the age of five and six years girls take care of younger siblings. From earliest childhood girls are taught to tolerate deprivation and limitations in food, sleep, and comforts. A capricious girl is not tolerated, while the family accepts capricious and demanding boys. Mothers and grandmothers promote these attitudes. Using her own experience a mother prepares her daughter for her subsequent difficult life as a wife in the husband's home, where she will be subservient to the husband and his relatives (Sharipova 2002). The strictly hierarchical relationship between bride and mother-in-law is a frequent source of family conflict, especially in recent times, when young wives (even in rural areas) are better informed about their rights and have a better developed sense of their own worth than women of the older generation.

Observing the father's power in the family's daily life, boys recognize their superiority over girls; they know that they have the right to punish them if they deviate from the norms of their gender status. Boys are encouraged to activity, to self-defense, to aggressiveness. They spend a great deal of time outside the home in the company of men.

Both family and community exercise strict control over girls' behavior. Girls know that they must serve other family members, especially the males. They must be modest, obedient, and fear all men: male kin may punish them for disobedience and strange men may cast aspersions on their honor and good name. A girl's good name is the capital that defines her worth in the family and the community. That good name includes not only preserving her virginity until marriage, but modesty in clothing and speech, and not showing herself in social spaces with unrelated men. Control over girls' and women's sexual behavior is a fundamental element in Central Asian gender socialization. Traditional norms encourage asexuality in women of all ages. Expressing sexuality in any form is considered deviant behavior (Sharipova 2002). However, in the post-Soviet period preserving virginity until marriage is more or less a formality. Both premarital and extramarital sex are practiced, especially in the big cities and regions influenced by polyethnic culture (Tabyshalieva 1998).

Gender segregation is especially rigid in the plains of Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Turkmen villages, and the southern areas of Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. In the mountainous areas of Tajikistan gender segregation is less rigid than in the plains and women are more independent, since the household is in women's hands (Andreev 1953). In the cities of Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan where polyethnic groups predominate, traditional norms and the Shar'ia are more of a formality (Tabyshalieva 1998).

The role of education in the socialization of Central Asian Muslim women was important in the Soviet period. Formal education for all and obligatory work for women outside the home led to the formation of a female social group within class: worker, peasant, intelligentsia. The intelligentsia encouraged education for girls that was geared to professions differentiated by gender. Thus, teaching and medical work were considered appropriate for women, commensurate with their roles of mother, wife, housekeeper. Soviet modernization gave rise to a special form of male and female conformism, a double standard between Russified norms of behavior at work and in social spaces, but the observation of traditional norms of behavior within the family and in personal relationships between men and women.

Mass communication has had an enormous influence on gender socialization. In the post-Soviet period Muslim ideology and the formation of a model Muslim woman are furthered through the mass media, literature, and art. Secular publications portray a synthesis of the stereotype of the new Central Asian woman, a blend of wife and mother with worker. There is also an element entirely new to the Central Asian mentality, namely public sexuality. Advertisements for cosmetics and clothing and the arrival of beauty contests create a feminine ideal through the female body.

The socioeconomic crisis and the influence of globalization in the post-Soviet period have weakened the role of male as provider. More women must become full- or part-time providers for their families. This, of course, changes traditional concepts of masculinity and femininity (Kasymova 2002). The working woman who feeds her family will spend the greater part of her day at work and she will go on business trips, while the husband remains at home and takes care of the children and the household. These changes create external and internal conflicts evidenced by discrimination toward women. Domestic violence, sexual abuse at work and in social places increase the vulnerability of Muslim women. These factors contribute to deviant behavior by women, such as prostitution, illegal business undertakings, and suicide. Female self-immolation is observed mainly in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. These tendencies are present not only in the cities but in rural areas through Central Asia (Tabyshalieva 1998).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Andreev, Tajik valleys of Khuf [in Russian], Stalinabad 1953.
- A. Bauer, N. Boshman, and D. Grin, Women and gender relations in Kazakhstan. Social consequences [in Russian], Manila 1998.
- A. Dzhalilov, On the history of women in Central Asia before and after the introduction of Islam [in Russian], Dushanbe 1974.
- C. Harris, Control and subversion. Gender and socialism in Tajikistan, Manchester, U.K. 2000.
- Islam and Eastern Women* [in Russian], Tashkent 1990.
- S. Kasymova, Gender relations in traditional Tajik society [in Finnish], in Idantukimus (Helsinki) 2 (2002), 45–55.
- N. Kisliakov, Studies in the history of the family and marriage among the peoples of Central Asia and Kazakhstan [in Russian], Leningrad 1969.
- B. Pal'vanova, Emancipating the Islamic woman [in Russian], Moscow 1982.

- A. Tabyshalieva, Reflections of time. Notes on the history of Central Asian women [in Russian] Bishkek 1998.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Exhausting the past. The position of women in Uzbekistan, a society in the process of reclaiming Islam [in Russian], Tashkent 2001.
- Women in Kyrgyzstan. Tradition and new realities* [in Russian], Bishkek 1995.

SOFIA KASYMOVA

Iran and Afghanistan

Girl children are socialized into sex segregation, dependency, lack of authority, and severely limited access to resources through example, admonition, contradictory gender messages, stories, heavy demands, and violence (especially in Afghanistan). In popular gender ideology girls differ from boys and have contradictory characteristics: infant girls need more food (are weaned later) but older girls need less food; girls are smaller and weaker yet more resilient; better tempered yet fickle; more emotional yet secretive; sweeter yet valued less although fathers can sell them for a bride price, especially in Afghanistan; and frail yet hard working. Their reason ('aql) is firmer (they assume responsibilities earlier than boys), yet women's reason is weaker than men's. As part of their father's kin group, their loyalty is challenged after marriage. These purported differences within the gender hierarchy, authoritarian relationships (responsibility from men downwards, obedience upwards to men), and patrilineality with preference for male children account for differences in socialization. They also lead to benign and explicit neglect of girls, including differential access to food, health care and schooling, and to traffic in children (in Afghanistan). Population statistics suggest a gender imbalance favoring males in Iran, but figures are unreliable.

A girl's beauty is praised yet girls hear that their attractiveness threatens men. Even female toddlers are told to be modest (be well covered, sit with folded legs, not laugh or speak in front of men). Girls are told to trust male relatives yet also to perceive men as threats (like wolves) and to be suspicious of them. The avoidance of unwanted male attention and aggression is a major concern, and girls admonish and chaperone each other and avoid public spaces, especially in Afghanistan. Until the age of about six, they can appear in public bare-headed; later, modesty dictates attire ranging from colorful head-scarf and short, tight coat over jeans in cities in Iran today to the all-encompassing veil almost everywhere in Afghanistan. In Iran, some young urban women date men (especially on the telephone) and appear in public unmolested with make-up and minimal compliance with the dress code, setting examples for others. In Afghanistan girls still learn that only the veil, strict segregation, and home mean safety and propriety, and are punished for transgressions by women and men.

Males older than nine may claim authority over females. In all social strata this creates power struggles between sisters and younger brothers who demand compliance but whom sisters still see as the wards they had been as toddlers. Girls come to expect brothers to be more restrictive than fathers and more likely to be violent. Public improprieties will bring punishment because they suggest a girl's poor management by father or brothers and thus diminish the men's honor. In Afghanistan women may use men's fear of losing control over their women to subvert male authority, but girls learn through their stories that this is dangerous.

Obedience requires the instillation of respectful fear (tars) in children. Girls, taken to be more compliant than boys, develop respect mostly through admonition, scolding, and intimidation while for boys additional harsh threats and beatings are deemed necessary in most traditional families. Girls witness aggression among male relatives, toward women and themselves, and come to see it as a lamentable fact of life. Staying close to home, girls have unparalleled intelligence abilities and functions and thus are suspected especially by their brothers of possessing secret knowledge. Lacking authority, they learn to exert power by manipulating people and knowledge and through dissimulation, at the price of being called untrustworthy. Most learn to see that they are the property and wards of men (especially in Afghanistan) and that their position is one of servitude, that their restricted access to important things from money and inheritance to religious rituals is immutable, and to regard their marital future as fate beyond their control. Depression among women and girls is high in both countries and discussed widely in Iran.

Formal education reaches most children in Iran, while in Afghanistan it is unavailable to most, especially to girls. The Iranian government pushes girls' education to meet women's needs in the Islamic society; this led to a surge of women into education. In the sex segregated schools female students do not defer to males but compete among themselves, which benefits their self esteem. Middle-class girls are encouraged to emulate professional women. Even young rural and low-class women now see education as an alternative to early marriage and large families, however unrealistic it is for most. In Afghanistan religion was used to rationalize banning girls from all schooling and is still used to justify the transmission to girls of traditional, pre-modern patterns of life for women in all classes and regions, including the notion that marriage, motherhood, and dependency form the only God-ordained, reasonable female existence. Child betrothal and early marriage of girls are still practiced widely in Afghanistan while even in rural Iran most girls now expect a say in marriage arrangements. Polygyny, divorce, and the sorry fate of "fallen" women are popular themes in the media and among women everywhere. Although relatively rare (especially in Iran), polygyny and divorce are a source of power for men and of anxiety for women, and this is communicated to children and produces fear of loss of mother.

Girls learn skills, outlook on life, and patterns of behavior, thinking, and feeling by observing men and imitating women. They rehearse infant care and chores along with the expression of affect and pain, elicitation of support and pity, supplication of saints, and resistance (for example, dodging demands). Teasing and lying as tools of control lead to general distrust, but experience also teaches girls to feel safe with their mother and female relatives (especially in Iran). They also learn that competence leads to confidence and that support of males, even to the detriment of women, gains approval. Yet, everywhere girls also come to realize that "good" (self effacing, compliant) women are less successful as persons, mothers, and wives than those who earn money and are vocal, manipulative, and pushy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Aghajanian, The status of women and female children in Iran. An update from the 1986 census, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 44-60.
- E. Friedl, Children of Deh Koh. Young lives in an Iranian village, Syracuse, N.Y. 1997.
- S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1988.
- M. Kousha, Voices from Iran. The changing lives of Iranian women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
- G. Mehran, Socialization of schoolchildren in the Islamic Republic of Iran, in Iranian Studies 22 (1989), 35-50.
- A. Najmabadi, Crafting an educated housewife in Iran, in L. Abu-Lughod (ed.), Remaking women. Feminism and modernity in the Middle East, Princeton, N.J. 1998, 92-125.
- N. Rachlin, Would I have become a writer without my sister? in E.W. Fernea (comp. and ed.), Remembering childhood in the Middle East. Memoirs from a century of change, Austin, Tex. 2002, 320-8.
- Save the Children, Afghanistan's children in crisis, Westport, Conn. 2002.
- A. C. Shalinski, Learning sexual identity. Parents and children in northern Afghanistan, in Anthropology and Education Quarterly 11 (1980), 254-65.

N. Tapper, Bartered brides. Politics, gender, and marriage in a tribal society, Cambridge 1991.

B. S. Yasgur, Behind the burqa. Our life in Afghanistan and how we escaped to freedom / by "Sulima" and "Hala" as told to Batya Swift Yasgur, Hoboken, N.J. 2002.

ERIKA LOEFFLER FRIEDL

The Ottoman Empire

Muslim women's place in Ottoman society was constructed on a complex foundation of ideals and actualities. As in other Islamic communities, the internal configuration of the family and the socio-economic location of the household were shaping conditions. In combination with these, the patriarchally inclined customs and expectations of the larger society, particularly as projected in Islamic law, served to define women's roles. However, the ambiguities and contradictions of law and custom, and women's own efforts to operate within that interpretive space, moderated patriarchal rigidities, enabling women to achieve a larger share of familial and communal power.

Although women were generally excluded from Ottoman narratives of empire, their experience in real-life terms emerges from less hierarchical documentation. Court records, which are uniquely voluminous for the Ottoman period, have overturned the received wisdom of strictly enforced female seclusion and subordination. The degree of women's autonomous action cannot be compared to that of the present era, but Ottoman women, despite misogynistic popular discourse and restrictive government policies, were able to affect decisions about their own lives and to exercise control over others.

As in the premodern world generally, Ottoman women's social existence and personal identity centered on the family. Marriage, childbearing, and participation in the family economy were paramount. Family members were the principal – usually the only – source of female instruction in religion, social conduct, and work. Most young women married into domestic households like those of their mothers and grandmothers. Virgin brides, prized for their youth, sexual innocence, and tractability, fetched the highest bride-price (Arabic, mahr; Turkish, mehr), but previously married women were not at all shunned. Divorcees, widows, and the deserted, prompted by the absence of independent economic opportunities for women, sought and found new husbands.

Despite the idealization of female submission, factors internal and external to the family often compelled more egalitarian practice. The size of the Ottoman Empire, its heterogeneous demographics, and the difficulties of communication before the nineteenth century, promoted regional distinctions. Different understandings of appropriate female behavior also arose from changes in provincial governors, shifts in women's productive roles, and other structural and historical factors.

Probably no one geographical area or socio-economic arrangement was consistently more liberal than others with respect to women's status and roles. Women in Cairo seem to have enjoyed greater public visibility and voice than women in Istanbul, but the evidence is not systematic for the entirety of Ottoman rule. In any case, as the imperial capital, Istanbul was the main arena for the exemplary projection of government power. Thus Istanbul's women were subject to more frequent and forceful policing than women elsewhere. Even in kindred Turkish-speaking cities such as Bursa and Edirne, women had to contend with fewer official limitations on their movements and dress. Veiling, including concealment of the face, was the norm for all classes on urban streets, but styles of head and face covering differed from place to place and across ethnic groups as well as between classes. In Istanbul, the fashion center of the empire, the prescribed dress for Muslim women in the seventeenth through the mid-nineteenth centuries was the ferace dust-coat with separate pieces of fabric for the head wrap and veil. Poorer women, tribal women, and provincial visitors obeyed the spirit of the law with respect to facial and bodily anonymity, but adoption of Istanbul's female uniform was not always necessary if women kept to their own residential neighborhoods or enclaves.

In general, women were denied access to institutions and collectivities that bespoke sociopolitical equality with male members of the community. Thus women were discouraged, if not forcibly prevented, from attending congregational mosques at prayer time, and with few exceptions over the centuries women were kept from active membership in the craft guilds. Again, though, restrictions varied, especially with regard to mosque attendance. Istanbul's massive cathedral mosques, physically and psychologically located at the center of power, tended to be off-limits to female worshippers. Some other mosques, in the capital and elsewhere, were more genuinely communal. Women's long-recognized patronage of popular forms of worship, notably local pilgrimage and saint reverence, helped compensate for their exclusion from male-gendered rituals. The most revered of the shrines frequented by women in the Ottoman Turkish-speaking world was the burial place of Abū Ayyūb (Eyüp) al-Anṣārī, a Companion of the Prophet who died in a seventh-century Muslim siege of Byzantine Constantinople.

Women's involvement with the empire's justice system, particularly the Islamic courts, reflects the relative openness of this mainstay of imperial legitimacy. For reasons that have still to be explained, women's use of the court system varied from place to place. For example, seventeenth-century court cases from the Anatolian towns of Kayseri, Amasya, Karaman, and Trabzon reveal that women's participation in legal actions ranged from 17 percent to a surprising 42 percent (Jennings 1975, 59). The variety of female commercial and financial litigation further refutes the stereotypes of female passivity and isolation. On the other hand, most women who came to the court did so as plaintiffs, and most plaintiffs were in conflict with husbands and ex-husbands.

The high incidence of divorce, child custody, support, and property cases in the court records of the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries illuminates the paradox of family – especially conjugal – instability in the Ottoman Islamic patriarchal setting. Recourse to formal adjudication points to women's social vulnerability and their difficulty in gaining entitlements without legal arm-twisting. Women showed their willingness to pursue claims in a public forum, sometimes speaking in their own voices, at other times through designees. The fact that there were courts in which they could make their case was a particular mark of Ottoman rule, which took care to establish and staff hundreds of courts throughout its territories.

The natural and man-made disasters afflicting the Ottoman Empire in the seventeenth through the nineteenth centuries also challenged prescribed gender roles. The proportion of women who headed their own households waxed and waned with warfare, plague, banditry, and male migration. As in today's Middle East, Ottoman men were highly, though episodically, mobile. Islamic law's provisions for women to inherit from husbands and fathers, and to receive compensation from divorcing husbands for mahr balances and other debts, lessened women's economic dependency overall. Independent means as bargaining leverage was most evident in the case of mature widows or divorcees contemplating remarriage. In fact, there is some evidence that wealthier women sought to avoid remarriage.

In the eighteenth century, the empire's military and economic incapacities and its growing susceptibility to European intervention were manifested in domestic politics in a heightening of gender tensions. Sumptuary laws, particularly restrictions on clothing, were issued with increasing frequency and severity to force women and other targeted groups to adhere to the colors, fabrics, and styles that had traditionally been prescribed for them. The moralist critique of the legislation resembled that of other Islamic – and non-Islamic – regimes with respect to the causal link between women's comportment and social order. Women's behavior was often a convenient foil for larger state worries. Prior to the eighteenth century, however, women were usually singled out in connection with specific historical occurrences. The barrage of decrees affecting women in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries served similar purposes in Ottoman politics. Nonetheless, the constant focus on women through both conservative and reformist sultanates in the late Ottoman centuries suggests newly enduring social and political anxieties with which women were consistently and inextricably linked.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. C. Jennings, Women in early 17th-century Ottoman judicial records. The sharia court of Anatolian Kayseri, in Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 18 (1975), 53–114.
 A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
 M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997.

MADELINE C. ZILFI

South Asia

Muslims came to the Indian subcontinent in the eighth century and established trading relations between India and Arabia. Nearly a century later Muslim warriors from across its northern borders, including Afghans, Persians, and Turks invaded India and established political hegemony. The Muslim population in India grew both through conversion of Hindus to Islam and intermarriage with local women, as the invading armies did not bring their wives along with them. The Muslim population of India is the largest in South Asia. According to the census of 1941 (the last census before the 1947 partition into India and Pakistan and the 1971 division of Bangladesh from Pakistan), Muslims were nearly a quarter of the total population of India. Post-partition the Muslim population was larger in India than in Pakistan or Bangladesh, and it continues to be so.

South Asian Muslims are not a monolithic community and cannot be represented by a uniform Islamic image. Muslims in South Asian countries have been greatly influenced by the local socio-economic and cultural conditions. The countries of the subcontinent share a common cultural heritage, predominantly Hindu, highly patriarchal, and characterized by a high level of gender discrimination and suppression of women that finds expression in the socializing practices of girls. The social position of Muslim women has been influenced by the corresponding position of Hindu women. In the compounding of Hindu and Muslim cultures the conservative and restrictive elements of Hindu tradition neutralized the liberal elements of Islam, so that Muslim women lost out on the Islamic right of widow remarriage and women's rights to inheritance, which were denied to Hindu women. In turn, Hindu women adopted the Muslim restrictive tradition of purdah (seclusion).

Socialization of girls in South Asia starts from early childhood. Little girls are fed on the model of submissive, passive, obedient, sacrificing, serving, and pious non-persons, who are to live and die as daughters, wives, and mothers, and who should never as much as even aspire to have an identity of their own. Female role behavior is instilled into girls through socialization and the socializing agents are, ironically, women themselves. The socializing process takes place at different levels, in the family, at educational institutions, and through the mass media.

Girl children are socialized into being different from boys; from the time of birth they are clothed differently: newborn infant girls are dressed in a pink embroidered or smocked frock while infant boys are dressed in a simple loose upper garment. From the very start girl babies are given different toys to play with, mostly dolls and kitchen utensils, while boys are given balls, toy motor cars, airplanes, and even small guns. The girls are brought up to be defenseless, non-aggressive, and dependent. They are taught to look upon their fathers and brothers, even younger brothers, and after marriage their husbands, as their protectors and providers. Girls are not socialized into being economically independent; they are generally denied professional skills that could enable them to take up jobs. Socialization of girls aims at stifling and curbing natural instincts of curiosity and adventure, and at molding them into domesticated, non-aggressive, submissive beings. Girls are discouraged from playing outdoor games. Running, jumping, climbing, swimming, and even kite-flying is disapproved for girls.

The concept of 'izzat (honor) in the subcontinent plays an important part in the process of socializing girls. 'Izzat is closely associated with women's sexuality, around which gender relations are structured. A woman is central to the concept of 'izzat, as she can lose or enhance her family's 'izzat through her sexual conduct. So she is guarded and her sexuality controlled. There is duality in this respect: while girls' sexuality is enhanced for the consumption of men, and girls are taught to take care of their physical appearance and be shy and coquettish, they are socialized into suppressing their own sexuality. They are kept ignorant of sexual knowledge, and segregated from boys and adult men. Any deviant behavior is most severely punished as it brings shame and disgrace to the family, and a socially deviant girl may not find a good husband. It is the responsibility of parents to marry off a daughter with her virginity intact.

Nothing can sully a family's 'izzat as much as the loss of virginity of an unmarried girl. A girl is, therefore, instructed to cover her body; at the slightest sign of puberty she must cover the upper part of her body with a long scarf, even inside the house. Girls' interactions with adult men are closely watched and restricted. Girls are mostly confined inside the house, but if they are obliged to go out they must cover themselves with the burqa', a garment that covers the body from head to toe with netting over the eyes to enable vision. The burqa' is common in India and Pakistan and a girl is usually required to use it from the age of nine or ten. Purdah is mostly observed by upper- and middle-class women. In lower classes women are required to work outside their homes and cannot afford to live in seclusion. However in urban areas and with the rise of fundamentalism, and a desire to emulate the Islamic countries of West Asia, the burqa' is gradually being replaced with the hijāb, a square scarf tied round the head to cover hair. Those girls and women who resist using the burqa' are considered shameless.

The concept of shame permeates every aspect of a girl's life. Girls are watched closely and admonished severely if their behavior deviates even slightly from the prescribed female norms. Girls are taught to avoid unbecoming behavior: they should not raise their voice, walk fast, or eat too much. Girls should not become fat. Among North Indian Muslims a baby girl is breast-fed for one year and nine months while a baby boy is breast-fed for two years and three months; it is believed that baby boys need to grow physically stronger than baby girls. The gender discrimination in feeding practices starts from infancy and continues throughout life. Girls are socialized into serving the best of food to men of the household, and prepare the menu according to their tastes.

Obedience to men forms an important aspect of female socialization, and is expressed through women being respectful and obedient to men. This requires total submission to the will of men and elders, especially male elders. The message given to every girl is that she should not answer back or argue with her father or husband and should accept her situation ungrudgingly. Avoiding the use of a person's first name is regarded as a sign of respect and girls are taught not to address their husbands by their first name, and to use the pronoun "aap," rather than "tum," which signifies familiarity and disrespect. Girls learn about the higher value of men compared to women by observing and participating in rituals and superstitions signifying male superiority. Two goats are sacrificed at the 'aqīqa (naming ceremony) of a baby boy but only one at the naming of a baby girl. Married women try to conceive during moonlit nights and sleep on their right side to give birth to baby boys in order to enhance their position in the family. Girls are forbidden from eating a twin growth of any fruit or vegetable to avoid having a co-wife. Because polygamy is permitted on the subcontinent, Muslim women live in constant fear of their husband taking another wife.

Formal education was traditionally not considered necessary for girls. However, with the introduction of British rule in the subcontinent, liberal-minded men felt that girls could be given some elementary education in order to bring up their sons to better adjust to the changing society. In the early twentieth century, separate girls' schools were started where girls wore burqa and traveled in covered vehicles. The curriculum for girls' schools was designed to enhance only their role as mothers and housewives. Textbooks were written exclusively for girl students emphasizing female virtues of chastity, sacrifice, submission, and obedience. In recent years in urban areas co-educational schools and colleges are becoming more common, although separate girls' schools and colleges also continue and Muslims prefer to send their daughters to them. Those girls who go to co-educational institutions follow the common curriculum, which includes sciences and computer training.

The mass media also reflect the social conditioning of males and females. Songs, dramas, and films depict women's helplessness, their dependence on men, and their preoccupation with domestic chores and the enhancement of their physical assets to keep their husband's attention. Television programs, advertising bites, and exclusive women's magazines are full of fairness creams, slimming devices, and beauty tips, in addition to recipes and home-making suggestions. These indirectly socialize girls and boys into being different along conventional lines.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Z. Bhatti, Socialisation of Muslim female child in India, in K. Karuna (ed.), Socialisation, education and women. Explorations in gender identity, New Delhi 1988, 231-9.
- , Fundamentalism, symbolism, and women, in S. M. Naseem and K. Nadvi (eds.), The post-colonial state and social transformation in India and Pakistan, Karachi 2002.
- A. A. Engineer, Islam, women and gender justice, New Delhi 2001.
- Government of India, Hindu women's marriage act, 1955.
- , Hindu inheritance and adoption act, rev. version 1956.
- R. Hasan, Feminism in Islam, in A. Sharma and K. Young (eds.), Feminism and world religions, Albany, N.Y. 1999, 248-78.
- Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, New Delhi 1994.

ZARINA BHATTY

Sub-Saharan Africa: Swahili Societies

Unyago is an initiation ritual performed as part of the socialization process in Swahili societies. These societies along the coast of East Africa and on the nearby islands have absorbed many different cultural traits through close ties within Africa and across the Indian Ocean. Girls' initiation rituals were introduced in Swahili societies by female slaves from Tanganyika, Zaire, Mozambique, Malawi, and Zambia who continued to perform their rituals after they arrived on the coast. The rituals continued after slavery was abolished and women who were previously freeborn joined the various ritual groups, bringing their daughters for initiation (Strobel 1979). Over the years, the rituals have been modified according to social and religious customs as well as to notions that were prevalent in the various Swahili societies (Caplan 1976, Larsen 1990, Middleton 1992), together with the widespread Muslim faith that constitutes a basis for a shared moral code and cultural practices. Although several virtues such as assiduity in religious devotion, formal and religious education, generosity to the poor, and hospitality are endorsed as important for both genders, girls and boys from an early age are assigned different activities and positions. While girls are expected to be involved in domestic tasks and the care of younger children, boys are sent outside to play with friends of their own age. In contrast to boys, girls are continuously reminded about the significance of virginity and chastity (Caplan 1976, Larsen 1990, Topan 1995). When puberty approaches sex segregation becomes crucial with regard to the much lauded ideal of purity and notions of respectability and shame. Many girls, for instance, at this time in life will leave their educational program in order not to be too exposed in gender-mixed milieus. The physical segregation between women and men is managed through the organization of social space and the material environment, division of labor by sex, and clothing, such as the women's veil called bui-bui (Larsen 1990). Ideally, knowledge about sexuality and sexual relations should remain taboo, especially for girls, until their initiation ritual and their first marriage. A girl's mother will choose a somo for her daughter. The responsibility of a somo is to teach the girl, mwari (which refers generally to girls from their first menstruation until marriage), first about how to behave in relation to menstruation and later about matters relating to sex and sexuality. These themes are never explicitly dealt with between mothers and daughters. A girl will only gradually come to know her somo, and the first time a girl goes to stay with her somo is during her first menstruation. From then on the relationship becomes formalized; it is the somo, not the mother, who brings the girl to her initiation (unyago). Unyago is seen to produce social, not physical, maturation. Young women should be initiated before their first marriage. Not all women become members of a ritual group; nor do all women go through the initiation rituals. Although unyago has never been universally performed, its existence has played an important role in the formation of female gender identity (Caplan 1976, Larsen 1990, Eile 1990). Initiation rituals are basically understood to have a socialization function (Richards 1956) and concern what is called "social puberty," while puberty rituals mark "physical growth" (Van Gennep 1960). In some places along the coast the term unyago refers to both girls' and boys' initiation rituals, while in other areas boys' rituals are called jando. Only male initiation rituals include circumcision.

UNYAGO RITUALS

Unyago is surrounded by secrecy. It is usually performed on the outskirts of the town or in the forest and the initiates remain secluded until the teachings are finished. At the onset of the ritual mwari has to be purified and prepared in order to receive and accommodate new knowledge. During the ritual, mwari has to learn secret riddles by heart as well as secret names of objects and actions associated with women's everyday tasks and activities. It is said that during her initiation mwari has to learn everything by rote, and that only later when she is exposed to married life will she understand the meaning of the teaching she receives. The various trials to which mwari is exposed focus on fertility and reproduction, and the dance movement and the dance performed by all women present, called kata kiuno, focuses on sensuality, desire, and sexual pleasure. Dancing women sing a number of songs that only initiated women (warombo, sing. mrombo) are expected to know. During the dancing mwari is ordered to move in certain prescribed ways by the ritual leader, called nyakanga, and the other initiated women present punish her when she fails. The ritual ends with a common meal and a coming-out ceremony in which the initiates receive particular ritual names. This also marks the girl's initiation into the ritual group. From this point on, she has access to knowledge about adult life and thus about sexual relations. Nothing regarding the teaching received during her initiation is explained to her by the ritual leader (nyakanga), her somo, and the other initiated women (warombo), if she is not herself able to formulate relevant questions. The idea is that only on the basis of experience will a girl be able to ask the right questions and reflect upon, and thus grasp, the "meaning behind the meaning" (mana ndani kwa ndani) in the various songs, riddles, and trials. To reach this level of understanding implies that a girl has learned to cope as a woman in relation to a man and in society.

There is a hierarchy of knowledge among initiated women, with the ritual leader or nyakanga in first rank, and a line of distinction between those who are initiated and those who are not. If a woman is not initiated she will, equally with men, not have access to women's unyago knowledge, which is considered to represent the actual meaning of gender difference. At present, various reasons are given by those who do not participate or who do not want their daughters to be initiated in unyago (Larsen 1990, 2000). Some claim that unyago is against Islam, and that what women learn and do during the ritual is incompatible with being a good Muslim. Others say that the rituals are old-fashioned (-ya zamani) and that girls today can learn all they need to know from school, and from television, videos, and magazines. Some girls claim that they will not go through unyago because it implies suffering and harassment by the ritual leader and the other women present. To participate in unyago is taken by some as a sign of not being "modern" (-endelea, -kwenda na wakati). Still, for those who participate in unyago the ritual practice and the knowledge involved do not contradict Islamic values or what they consider a modern lifestyle. In general in Swahili societies there is an idea that both girls and boys have to be transformed into women and men, rather than simply becoming adults as a result of physical growth. Within this context, the female initiation ritual deals with a woman's understanding and representation of her position in the world and of the relations involved according to experience rather than to abstract moral ideals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Caplan, Boys circumcision and girls' puberty rituals among the Swahili of Mafia Island, in Africa 46:1 (1976), 21-33.
- L. Eile, Jando. The rite of circumcision and initiation in East African Islam, Lund 1990.
- A. van Gennep, The rites of passage, London 1960.
- K. Larsen, Unyago - from girl to woman. The construction of female gender identity in the light of initiation rituals, religiosity and modernisation in Zanzibar, Oslo 1990.
- , The other side of "nature." Expanding tourism, changing landscapes and problems of privacy in urban Zanzibar, in V. Broch-Due et al. (eds.), Producing poverty in Africa, Lund 2000, 198-219.
- J. Middleton, The world of the Swahili. An African mercantile civilization, London 1992.
- M. Ntukula, The initiation rite, in Z. Tunbo-Masabo et al. (eds.), Chelewa, chelewa. The dilemma of teenage girls, Uppsala 1994, 96-119.
- A. Richards, Chisungu, London 1956.
- M. Strobel, Muslim women in Mombasa 1890-1975, New Haven, Conn. 1979.
- M. J. Swartz, The way the world is. Cultural processes and social relations among the Mombasa Swahili, Berkeley 1991.
- F. Topan, Vugo. A virginity celebration ceremony among the Swahili of Mombasa, in Journal of African Language and Cultures 8:1 (1995), 87-107.

KJERSTI LARSEN

Turkey and the Caucasus

The gender socialization of women in Turkey and the Caucasus has been subject to the particular cultural norms and societal values determining the role and position of women according to region, class/social status, and the state ideologies governing these societies. These norms and values underwent fundamental changes in the twentieth century, with Kemalist modernization programs in Turkey and the Soviet revolution in the Caucasus.

Broadly speaking, the institution of the family has been the most crucial support system in the lives of women. Much of the early socialization of girls is through the role models provided by mothers and grandmothers. The latter are particularly significant in the case of urban centers in the Caucasus where under the Soviet system large numbers of women who were employed outside the home shared childcare with their own mothers. Given the rather distant father-daughter relationships, and the more authoritarian attitude of brothers, mothers are very often the mediators in settling disputes and negotiating differences. The different socialization patterns for girls and boys are based on the assumed male and female roles within the household and outside in society. For girls, housekeeping and childcare, almost solely female responsibilities, are arenas of activity in preparation for their future role as wife and mother, in addition to any formal education. The internalization of women's double burden begins early on from the end of primary school age. The boys, in contrast, are left free to engage far more in play, socializing with friends and family, and performing outdoor chores. The sense of authority, confidence, and self-esteem gained by the male children as they develop social skills is further reinforced through their privileged status as the future head of the family. This is especially the case for boys who are only sons.

TURKEY

The issue of nāmūs (male honor related to female sexual propriety) is a primary determinant in regulating girls' mobility, autonomy, and interaction with unrelated males. There is strict expectation of chastity (virginity) before marriage for girls, made the more crucial as marriage is considered their primary goal in life regardless of level of education and family status. The exceptions here are the secularized middle and upper classes in western Turkey for whom the question of a girl's educational attainment and career may be of greater concern than her marriage prospects. Attitudes to premarital sexual relations have also altered significantly among the young in this stratum of Turkish society (Kandiyoti 1981). Nevertheless, gender asymmetry is still reflected in the expectations of a greater level of education for a husband than for his wife. In Turkey's rural areas and small towns a high level of education in a girl is actually considered detrimental to her marriage prospects. This accords with the subservient position a wife is expected to assume in relation to her husband, particularly when living communally with his family. In later years, however, when the wife's children have grown up, there is a shift in power relations with regard to both the husband and the in-laws. Sociability in these regions is also very much along the traditional gender segregated pattern: males gathering outside the home (tea and coffee houses, civic centers, and so forth) and women paying house visits to friends and family (Kıray 1981).

More generally, women's position in Turkish society and their experience of socialization have undergone significant changes over the last few decades with the acceleration of capitalist development in the country and the high rates of internal and external migrations. This is especially noted for women dwellers of shanty towns (gecekondu) and those running households of male migrant workers. These women's aspirations for their children and expectations of gender power balance are more akin to the modern attitudes prevailing in the large urban centers than those in their rural points of origin. Among such communities a change in the male authority relations is observed in the greater autonomy women are able to assume, whether it is in the choice of marriage partners, consumption patterns, or the management of family finances (Abadan-Unat 1981). Similarly, in the case of working-class households with women breadwinners, the girlhood dream of being a perfect wife and mother (commended for domestic skills such as cooking, sewing, and maintaining hygiene) conflicts with the modern ideal of role-sharing demanded in consequence of outside employment (Cihan Bolak 1981).

The stereotype of the perfect housewife/mother is one that still dominates the ideal of womanhood even among the professional middle classes. This is despite the large numbers of Turkish women entering white-collar work and a range of professions. The media promote domesticity for women through the popular press and television programs that constantly deal with love and emotions, valorizing housework and home life (as, for example, with the Latin American soap operas). They further project the image of gentility, understanding, and devotion to the family as the undisputable core of femininity, whilst adapting to requirements of modernity (Saktanber 1991). The education system, however, reinforces gender discrimination through the sexist content of primary level textbooks and the range of subjects (particularly at the vocational school level) deemed suitable for male and female students (Gök 1991). The growing spread of religious functionary schools since the 1970s is a further reinforcement of conservatism in the educational agenda for women, and a platform for the Islamist forces that have entered Turkish politics in a major way. The Islamic model of womanhood presented by these establishments and the media controlled by them contrasts the pious Muslim woman, who is an obedient wife and devoted mother, with the overworked, exploited, and oppressed Westernized woman (Acar 1991).

THE CAUCASUS

In the Caucasus, where there is as yet little intrusion by the outside Islamist groups, women's education, outside employment, and power relations vary greatly according to the specific region and rural/urban divisions. In the rural areas a strongly patriarchal system dominates women's gender and intergenerational relations, and women have little control over their fertility. In mountainous Daghestan it has been noted that women constitute a highly exploited labor force, engaged in very heavy physical work (Chenciner 1997), a situation similar to the Black Sea region of Turkey a few decades ago.

In Azerbaijan, where early capitalist development of the oil industry in the tsarist period led to a degree of modernization, including the education and unveiling of women of elite families, large-scale industrialization and modernization took place in the seven decades following the Soviet revolution. By the 1980s Azeri women had already entered the workforce en masse, forming a majority in some fields, such as education and medicine (see Heyat 2002 for a study of women in Azerbaijan). This has entailed profound changes in women's status in society, and their gender and inter-generational relations, particularly in urban areas. The authoritarian mother/daughter-in-law relations prevalent in many Muslim societies, for instance, have been mostly transformed to mutual support and bonds of affection and loyalty. More generally, the institution of family has been central to enabling women to cope with the multiple tasks expected of them: housewife, career woman, and educator of the children. For the professional Azeri women dealing with the double burden of career and heavy domestic duties a crucial factor was the vertical support across generations, particularly that of grandmothers. The system of kin-based loyalty and support also enabled these women to call on the labor of others for the management of household chores. This was particularly crucial under the Soviet system, given the difficulties of obtaining hired domestic labor, unlike in Turkey and other Muslim Middle Eastern countries where professional women may easily rely on this sector.

In Azeri culture there is a strong association between domesticity and ideals of femininity, whilst masculinity is associated with tasks that require dealings outside the home. The codes of hospitality are very demanding, in part due to investment in personal networks that were crucial to gaining access to scarce goods and services under the Soviet system. All this required a great deal of time and attention from women. It also placed them in a central position in regulating social relations, which subsequently empowered women in subtle ways. Moreover, expectations of womanhood in Azerbaijan were subject to the conflicting demands of the socialist state's egalitarianism, including gender equality, and the patriarchal and authoritarian features of the ethnic Azeri culture. This led to an ambiguous and complex gender system that varied in its degree of male bias and adherence to traditions according to urban/rural divide, as in the example of Baku, the cosmopolitan and Europeanized capital city, and the surrounding villages.

A particularly crucial gain for women was the state's promotion of female education, which is at a level above all other Muslim countries. Consequently, higher education for daughters is valorized, increasing their chances of marriage, even among the lower strata of society. In the area of school curriculum, some gender differentiation is maintained in the way boys are offered practical skills in building, carpentry, and electrical work and encouraged to take up outdoor sports, whilst girls are offered domestic skills and almost never taught swimming, though in science and mathematics girls are equally encouraged. At the same time there is a strong emphasis on the gender division of domestic labor, highlighting women's servicing role in the home. Whilst femininity is closely associated with domesticity, masculinity is associated with avoidance of domestic chores (washing and cleaning in particular). However, these cultural norms are mostly adhered to depending on practical imperatives. For example, in the urban households with only sons, given that most women were employed outside, the males had to participate in housework.

The strong stereotyping of gender roles in the home begins early with children in the immediate family. In the case of families with both sons and daughters the brother-sister relationship contributes to socializing children into appropriate gender roles. Otherwise a similar process may take place within the extended family between male and female cousins. The extended family is still a very important institution in conducting social relations in Azeri society, and the primary locus of socialization for the children. For girls this is further reinforced by the notion that women are the custodians of Azeri custom and tradition, to be passed on through the female line (Heyat 2002, Tohidi 1998).

In the past, gender segregation, in tandem with sexual division of labor and maintenance of codes of sexual propriety, was manifested outside the home through restriction of public places such as tea houses and cafes to males (even at restaurants women only attended in the company of family members).

In the post-Soviet era much of this has changed in Baku, the center of the oil industry and the largest city in the Muslim Caucasus, though not much in small towns and other regions. The media, heavily influenced by the West, via Turkish and Russian television broadcasts, have projected images of femininity that orient women toward consumerism, following of Western fashions, and generally the cult of the "beautiful." At the same time, for a small sector of women of the new rich and those with knowledge of Western languages new opportunities in employment and travel abroad have opened the way to greater autonomy and eventually alterations in gender roles and relations. Thus for the middle-class professional families today, the daughters' attainment of higher education and career development are of major consideration in their upbringing.

Generally, for the vast majority of the girls in the region socialization still takes place within the kin group, with mothers and grandmothers as the primary agents. In Azerbaijan, as in other former Soviet republics where primary and secondary education are compulsory, schools are also important sites of socialization for children and young teens. In the Soviet era, the pioneer and Komsomol groups were further sites of socialization as they regularly organized extra-curricular activities. For the girls, values, beliefs, and attitudes that govern their process of socialization concern notions of domesticity, motherhood, and sexual propriety, with "good" marriage as the primary goal. Nonetheless, in the post-Soviet era in the Caucasus, as in Turkey, perceptions of women's role and function in the home and in society, and cultural norms governing their code of conduct are undergoing significant changes according to region, class, status, and economic position.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Abadan-Unat, Turkish women and social change, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 5-31.
- F. Acar, Women and Islam in Turkey, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society. A reader, London 1991, 46-65.
- R. Chenciner, Daghestan. Tradition and survival, London 1997.
- H. Cihan Bolak, Towards a conceptualization of marital power dynamics. Women breadwinners and working-class households in Turkey, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society, London 1991, 173-98.
- F. Gök, Women and education in Turkey, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish Society, London 1991, 131-40.
- F. Heyat, Azeri women in transition. Women in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, London 2002.
- D. Kandiyoti, Intergenerational change among Turkish women, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 233-58.
- M. B. Kiray, The women of small town, in N. Abadan-Unat (ed.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 259-74.

- A. Saktanber, Women in the media in Turkey. The free, available woman or the good wife and selfless mother, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society, London 1991, 153–69.
- N. Tohidi, “Guardians of the nation.” Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 137–63.

FARIDEH HEYAT

Gossip

Arab States

The expression kalām al-nās (talk of the people) is a common term for gossip throughout much of the Arab Middle East and how information in the form of gossip circulates in communities can be quite important.

Gossip, positive or negative, can be used to reinforce group norms or to negotiate and further differing interests. Comments can be embellished to highlight basic points or outright falsified, perhaps backfiring upon the speaker. Men may depend upon wives or female relatives for certain types of information and vice versa. Secrets may be kept or revealed, including by eavesdropping children. People may recall events inaccurately. Public opinion may be of one mind or many minds. In such ways, the spoken word is very much the lived word.

Positions of honor and status of an individual or a family can be achieved, lost, or stay the same through gossip. The hospitality shown to guests at a home by one person, for instance, can reflect upon the honorable reputation of their entire family. In the United Arab Emirates, where people reportedly dreaded being the subject of bad gossip, violating the rites of hospitality would expose the host family to severe social disapproval. If the hostess failed to meet the guest's expectations, gossip ensued: "God forgive us, not even coffee was offered." Whereas, when the guest was satisfied, the praise to others could be: "They honored me, they fulfilled their duty toward me" (Kanafani 1993, 133-4). This continues to be true in many places.

GOSSIP AND SOCIAL CONTROL

When there is a family dispute, the gossip of visitors and neighbors can be the channel by which a family member makes the problem public, whether by accident or deliberately. In Egypt, a young Beduin woman who had left her husband to have her marital problems formally mediated by her father had this to say about her mother-in-law's attempt to generate negative gossip against her, just before she left:

Nowadays people get each other into disputes through talk. I took my good clothes along to my father's because I was upset, for my husband and I had had an argument. And some clothes which I didn't want and had no need for – if I had tried to give them to a poor, old woman, even she would not have accepted them – I had taken them and I had burned them. My husband's mother came and said, "She has burned her house, and now she wants to burn ours and go." I always burn the garbage there, but she just wants to talk empty talk so that people will say that I am wrong and she is good and such. She says meaningless things. People know I would not burn good things.

The mother-in-law had rushed over from her house next door screaming those remarks. An elderly neighbor visiting the mother-in-law heard the loud marital argument and the mother-in-law's reaction, as did others nearby. This incident took place in a tribal village in South Sinai where gossip was being used by both genders as a method of social control to keep women and older girls at, or near, home. It was considered immodest for them to be outside, in increasingly crowded conditions (Gardner 2000). Yet public support, garnered by sympathetic gossip, could also have a bearing on the resolution of a marital dispute. The young wife was confident that people would not be swayed by her mother-in-law, who was known for having a flash temper and exaggerating. She was right.

In more serious situations, South Sinai Beduins can be held responsible for slander. When another woman was repeatedly slandered by her unhappy husband and his family to others, the offenders were found liable in a tribal court. Both of these cases took place in 1990 but being a topic of gossip could have long-term, dangerous effects. Some of the most stubborn evil-eye illnesses in women are considered by believers to be the result of attention caused or compounded by gossip, as the young wife who had left her husband thought was the case when she became chronically ill.

WOMEN, JUDGMENT, AND HONOR

An activist group of Palestinian women in Israel, al-Fanār (The lighthouse), stressed how controlling and damning gossip can be:

Damage to the reputation of a girl by means of the rumor and gossip system means damage to the reputation and honor of the family. This leads to the mobilization of all the "family forces" to uphold this honor, usually by inflicting heavy punishments on the young woman, the victim. It should be noted that the degree of truth of this gossip and its relation to reality is usually unimportant (al-Fanār newsletter 1991, 7).

Such gossip can contribute directly to femicide, when a male murders a female family member for being deemed as having had improper relations outside of wedlock. These murders have especially been reported in some Arab communities in Israel and also in Jordan, with researchers examining the role that gossip plays and how men are held to a different standard of behavior (Glazer and Abu Ras 1994, Faqir 2001). Yet protecting the family honor can sometimes mean just trying to keep the information out of the public eye. In the Negev Desert, for example, Beduin “informants claimed that when marriage is conducted between parallel cousins and the girl turns out not to be a virgin it is highly unlikely that the matter be disclosed to the community” (Jakubowska 1990, 889).

While both women and men gossip, it is the women who are often in a position to observe other women and girls. In the Muslim Moroccan community of the Spanish border enclave Ceuta, it is even considered heretical for women to openly gossip about men’s behavior in critical terms, but not about women’s behavior (Evers Rosander 1991, 226). In some other areas, it is deemed improper to gossip about either gender. Social anthropologist Unni Wikan found that in the town of Sohar, Oman, “they did not gossip and thereby tell me about neighbors, acquaintances, and local events. They did not judge others and thereby reveal their own values. They did not chatter idly – indeed, they often hardly even talked” (1991, 10–11). Humor could still be an acceptable way to gossip and judge though, for more than half of the women’s neighborhood group conversations that took place in her presence were devoted to talk and jokes about sexual matters such as infidelity and non-virginity (136–7). They did not, however, talk about specific people.

The Qur’an states, “O ye who believe! Shun much suspicion; for lo! some suspicion is a crime. And spy not, neither backbite one another. Would one of you love to eat the flesh of his dead brother? Ye abhor that (so abhor the other)! And keep your duty (to Allah). Lo! Allah is Relenting, Merciful” (49:12). This is commonly read as a directive for both men and women not to gossip.

From Morocco, in a book with examples of gossip, comes this admonishment related to a group of women, including the author, by a gossip who was having concerns about her own conduct:

There was a man who prayed and fasted and was charitable and went to Mecca. There was little to prevent him from going to paradise. But he used to talk. And that gossip sent him to hell. One arm records the good, the other records the bad. His bad accounts added up and he got the fire on the spot (Kapchan 1996, 221).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- al-Fanār, al-Ishā’āt wa-al-aqāwīl wa-dawrahā fī qam’ al-mar’a, in al-Fanār newsletter, June 1991, 6–7.
- F. Faqir, Intrafamily femicide in defence of honour. The case of Jordan, in Third World Quarterly 22:1 (2001), 65–82.
- A. Gardner, At home in South Sinai, in Nomadic peoples 4:2 (2000), 48–67.
- I. M. Glazer and W. Abu Ras, On aggression, human rights, and hegemonic discourse. The case of murder for family honor in Israel, in Sex Roles. A Journal of Research 30:3/4 (1994), 269–89.
- L. Jakubowska, Terra e onore. La sessualità femminile fra i Beduini sedentari, in Quarterni Storici 75:3 (1990), 879–94.
- A. Kanafani, Aesthetics and ritual in the United Arab Emirates, Beirut 1983, adapted as Rites of hospitality and aesthetics, in D. L. Bowen and E. A. Early (eds.), Everyday life in the Muslim Middle East, Bloomington, Ind. 1993, 128–35.
- D. Kapchan, Gender on the market. Moroccan women and the revoicing of tradition, Philadelphia 1996.
- M. Pickthall (trans.), The Koran, New York 1930, repr. 1992.
- E. Evers Rosander, Women in a borderland. Managing Muslim identity where Morocco meets Spain, Stockholm 1991.
- U. Wikan, Behind the veil in Arabia. Women in Oman, Chicago 1982, repr. 1991.

ANN GARDNER

Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia

The notion of ghaybat or talking in a negative way about a woman behind her back plays a significant role in the lives of Iranian, Afghan, and South Asian women. Fear of gossip puts pressure on them to uphold traditional and restrictive gender expectations. Given the emphasis on female chastity and modesty, reports about a female’s improper behavior, even if unfounded, can ruin a reputation and chances for a good marriage, and even result in physical chastisement or, in extreme cases, death. Women are more at risk than men of harm from gossip. Most women maintain consciousness about how any dress, behavior, interaction, or location can result in people talking and lead to serious harm to their social position and well-being.

In addition to severely restricting women’s behavior and mobility, the notion of gossip plays a part in the formation of gender identity. People view gossip negatively. Women are the ones who gossip, people generally believe. The association of gossip with femaleness conveys a characterization of women as lacking character, dignity, and restraint. Women, with their assumed tendency to gossip, are seen as idle, weak-willed, unreliable, and frivolous. Often women themselves view speaking negatively about others behind their backs as a sin, and think women are the ones who participate in this social evil. Women even fear that other women will not keep disclosed information to themselves.

Women may try to avoid revealing transgressions, weaknesses, or distress, worrying that others may take a perverse satisfaction from their misery or be unable to avoid the temptation of passing on some juicy, scandalous, privileged information. Such caution may have negative effects. Frequently women suffer in silence rather than risk confiding in others. The reputation of a female influences the status and social standing of her family, the marriage opportunities for its young people, and even its economic and political interests. As people highly value social ties and interaction, they are extremely sensitive about leaking incriminating information and becoming the object of gossip. Much of people's sense of well-being, for females more so than males, depends on enjoyable interaction and relationship with others. Females fear the potential of gossip to provoke disrespect, rupture relationships, or cause ostracism or perhaps the need to leave a setting. People often put on a good front and keep unpleasant realities out of sight to avoid blame, critical commentary, and public discussion. Fearing that they themselves will be seen as the cause, women may keep domestic abuse, philandering of husbands, or children's problems to themselves. Sometimes a woman may find a friend who is outside her circle of neighbors and relatives with whom she may be more spontaneous and less censored.

People frequently hold that women waste much time in idle and even sinful talk about other people. Males often have a tendency to look down on females, believing them to engage in frivolous, useless, undignified, destructive gossip, unable to restrain their verbal activity. Unfortunately, the negative connotation placed on the word "gossip" in the languages of these areas and the association of women's talk with this negative word results in the obliteration of the important work that women achieve through their verbal exchanges.

Although fearful that sensitive information might fall into the wrong hands, women may find other women with whom they can share confidences and problematic situations. A woman might unburden her heart, perhaps weeping as she tells her story, to a neighbor, relative, or friend, and feel catharsis through doing so. Through practice and observation, women generally are adept in a listening, comforting, and counseling role. Women's intimate exchanges with each other, particularly in situations where marriages are arranged, provide close social ties and crucial emotional support. Women frequently work with one another, assuming a role much like that of a therapist. Women learn which women provide good support and advice and which women might gossip to others about disclosures. Some women gain the reputation of extending wise assistance to other women and maintaining confidentially, and thereby the respect and admiration of the community.

Particularly in times of more rigid gender segregation and where women were not occupied with schooling and work outside the home, they spent much time in telling each other stories of their own or other women's difficulties. Generally not disclosed to men, these stories and the telling of them developed as underground networks of communication and reservoirs of tales of women's troubles, frequently involving males. Women may use these stories for various purposes – to provide guidance, elicit compassion and assistance, build a sense of community of women as mistreated by males, show a young relative in an unhappy marriage how well off she is comparatively, or to arouse awareness of violence against women and a desire to bring about change.

Males often left the home, courtyard, and neighborhood to go to school or work. Females stayed in the home and neighborhood and interacted with other females more frequently than with males, sometimes even communicating little with their own husbands. Such verbal exchange constituted a main source of a woman's enjoyment. In groups and networks, through the use of their fine conversational abilities, women developed gratifying social lives for themselves, positions of respect within the world of women, and reservoirs of knowledge and relationships that could be useful personally, socially, politically, and economically. Through such communication networks, a woman could present her family in a positive light, attempt to persuade people to her own or a family member's viewpoint on a situation, disseminate information about a conflict, or collect data for the benefit of herself, her family, or her faction.

Women wield their verbal abilities for their group and goals in local factional, political, and sectarian competition and conflict. They cooperate to help other women and to force males into different behavior. They teach and discuss religion. They organize gender-segregated religious rituals. They work to develop and maintain social networks through their organizing and verbal work in the area of religion, as well as other areas such as poetry, literature, sports, women's rights, philanthropy, political parties, kinship, education, and so on. During the Iranian Revolution of 1978–9, female activists discussed the issues at stake, spread information about developments, and attempted to persuade others toward their own viewpoints. Although most Afghan women are more secluded than their more economically advantaged, modernized Iranian counterparts, some Afghan women worked to promote female education, resisted the Taliban's rigidly discriminatory treatment of women, and tried to provide support for each other in loss and suffering, both inside Afghanistan and as refugees outside the county. Pakistani Muslim women host gender-segregated religious rituals, participate in party politics, especially in attracting the female vote, and organize and mobilize for sectarian competition, as do Muslim women in India.

In the smaller, more localized communities of years past, women greatly enjoyed opportunities to talk with other women and appreciated the sense of support and community built through frequent and relatively spontaneous interaction with women. They developed much of their sense of well-being, identity, and self-worth through their verbal exchanges. Women did most of the work of spreading news. The fact that everyone seemed to know everyone else's business carried many advantages. Learning that someone was ill or had suffered the death of a loved one, or was looking for a spouse for a child, other women could go to visit and extend sympathy and advice. However, some women mention the freedom from being the object of close observation and extensive discussion as one of the advantages of moving from village to a somewhat more impersonal urban setting. With women's education, migration, and modernization, women are no longer as available for regular intensive verbal exchange. As women gain many other interests and spheres of activity, their thoughts and discussions are no longer limited to other people in their immediate circles and their behavior. With modernization and globalization, over the last few decades communities, family groups, and social networks have been growing looser, particularly in oil-rich Iran. As economic and political relations become more regularized and institutionalized, women's "gossip" becomes less crucial for these spheres. In Afghanistan, particularly among the majority ethnic group, the Pushtun or Pukhtun, women were secluded in their own courtyard or kin group. They focused their verbal activity on their own or their children's interests within the family. Because of the war with the Soviet Union and subsequent fighting among Afghan factions, many Afghans became refugees. Often living in Pakistan and concerned about their women surrounded by strangers, Afghani men secluded their womenfolk and thereby restricted their verbal exchanges all the more severely. In Pakistan and India, some Muslim females have been able to gain an education and then work outside the home, but the majority become stay-at-home wives and mothers upon marriage. Many Pakistani and Indian Muslims are socially conservative. These women may be limited in their access to verbal interactions beyond their own family, kin, neighborhood, and religious groups and networks and thus look positively on opportunities for verbal exchanges as entertainment and emotional support. Given the sectarian conflict and violence, in Pakistan between Sunnī and Shī'ī Muslims and in India between Hindus and Muslims, women's verbal work of persuading, building networks, creating unity, mobilizing, and disseminating information continues to promote the interests of their religious groups. In all of these countries, even if in a tiny minority, some women have been using their verbal skills to work with other women and speak out to try to improve conditions for women and in society in general.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Ali, Madras on rainy days, New York 2004.
 F. Barth, Political leadership among Swat Pathans, London 1986.
 M. Behnam, Zelzelah. A woman before her time, London 1994.
 A. Betteridge, The controversial vows of urban Muslim women in Iran, in N. A. Falk and R. M. Gross (eds.), Unspoken worlds. Women's religious lives, Belmont, Calif. 1989, 102–11.
 V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin, Tex. 1988.
 T. Durrani with W. and M. Hoffer, My feudal lord, London 1994.
 Z. Eglar, A Punjabi village in Pakistan, New York 1960.
 H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, London 2002.
 S. Farman-Farmaian, Daughter of Persia. A woman's journey from her father's harem through the Islamic Revolution, New York 1992.
 E. Friedl, Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, New York 1991.
 —, Sources of female power in Iran, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 151–67.
 B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxtun women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
 S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1988.
 S. Haeri, No shame for the sun. Lives of professional Pakistani women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
 M. E. Hegland, Political roles of Aliabad women. The public-private dichotomy transcended, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 215–30.
 —, Flagellation and fundamentalism. (Trans)forming meaning, identity, and gender through Pakistani women's rituals of mourning, in American Ethnologist 25 (1998), 240–66.

- , Gender and religion in the Middle East and South Asia. Women's voices rising, in J. E. Tucker and M. L. Meriwether (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999, 177–212.
- , Talking politics. A village widow in Iran, in L. S. Walbridge and A. K. Sievert (eds.), Personal encounters. A reader in cultural anthropology, New York 2003, 53–9.
- J. Howard, Inside Iran. Women's lives, Washington, D.C. 2002.
- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1989.
- Z. Kamalkhani, Women's Islam. Religious practice among women in today's Iran, London 1997.
- M. Kousha, Voices from Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities, New Delhi 1990.
- C. Lindholm, Generosity and jealousy. The Swat Pukhtun of Northern Pakistan, New York 1982.
- F. Milani, Veils and words. The emerging voices of Iranian women writers, Syracuse, N.Y. 1992.
- K. Mumtaz and F. Shaheed, Women of Pakistan. Two steps forward one step back?, London 1987.
- A. Nafisi, Reading Lolita in Tehran, New York 2003.
- P. Omidian, Aging and family in an Afghan refugee community. Transitions and transformation, New York 1996.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- N. Rahat, The role of women in reciprocal relationships in a Punjab village, in T. S. Epstein and R. A. Watts (eds.), The endless day. Some case material on Asian rural women, Oxford 1981, 47–81.
- A. Rauf, Rural women and the family. A study of a Punjabi village in Pakistan, in Journal of Comparative Family Studies 18 (1987), 403–15.
- V. J. Schubel, Religious performance in contemporary Islam. Shī'i devotional rituals in South Asia, Columbia, S.C. 1993.
- F. Shaheed, Controlled or autonomous. Identity and the experience of the network, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 19 (1994), 997–1019.
- N. Tapper (Lindisfarne), The women's subsociety among the Shahsevan nomads of Iran, in L. Beck and N. R. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 374–98.
- , Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
- A. Torab, Piety as gendered agency. A study of jalaseh ritual discourse in an urban neighbourhood in Iran, in Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 2 (1996), 235–51.
- A. M. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life histories of working women in the old city of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992.
- S. Wright, Prattle and politics. The position of women in Dushman-Ziari, in Anthropological Society of Oxford Journal 9 (1978), 98–112.

MARY ELAINE HEGLAND

Honor

Iran and Afghanistan

“Honor,” a translation of nāmūs, sharaf, and a number of related concepts, is a central term in the languages and cultures of Afghanistan and Iran. In spite of the amazing diversity of the two countries – in culture, ethnicity, religion, language, class, and social formations – honor bridges the historical and geographic divides, and regulates the exercise of gender power with remarkable consistency.

Nāmūs, in Persian, Dari, Tajik, and other languages of the region, is at the core of a semantic field, which includes synonyms such as ābirū, reputation, sharaf, honor, dignity, ‘iffat, chastity, ‘ird, reputation, honor, ‘iṣmat, chastity, hayā, timidity, ḥujb, shyness, modesty, najābat, decency, pākdā manī, chastity, and sharm, shame. Although polysemic, these concepts point to the hierarchical organization of female and male sexualities, as well as class and status. Some are defined primarily as female qualities (pākdāmanī, ‘iṣmat, ‘iffat, or ḥujb) and are used as female personal names (‘Iṣmat and ‘Iffat) or names of women’s institutions (for example, Nāmūs Girls’ School). Each noun or its derivatives has antonyms (biābirū’ī, bīḥayā’ī, and so forth), which, in spite of their pejorative meanings, depict the ability of women to deviate from the strictly regulated regime of gender relations. Men also violate rules of honor by engaging in hatk-i ‘iṣmat or hatk-i nāmūs (hatk, tearing, rending, rape), zinā, adultery, and incest.

A female, her body, sexuality, name, and fame, is the bearer or, rather, the repository of nāmūs, and is always liable to lose it through extra- or premarital relations, real or imagined, with or without her consent, for example, in rape or incest. A woman’s nāmūs belongs to the male members of the family, kin, community, tribe, and nation. One of the meanings of nāmūs, in a number of languages including Persian, is “wife, and all the women belonging to a man, such as mother and sister and daughter and the like; female (members) of a family” (Dihkhudā 1994).

The violation of a female’s honor generally leads to the loss of her life. The family, kin, and community, including females, participate, directly or indirectly, in the killing by expecting it to happen. While pre-Islamic in origins and non-Qur’anic, honor killing is sanctioned in Shari’a texts, which in turn inform modern penal codes that do not criminalize it or are lenient in punishing the killers. In the Islamic Republic of Iran and Afghanistan, married adulterers are killed judicially through public ceremonies of stoning to death (sangsār kardan or rajm kardan).

Honor-centered norms of propriety, although rooted in the male control of women’s bodies and female sexuality, are not limited to the regulation of sexual relations. Honor is a complex social institution, which is crucial for the (re)production of patriarchal social relations.

Honor is closely inscribed in the values of bravery, courage, pugnacity, fearlessness, and generosity, all of which are meanings for the word mard, man and mardānagī, manliness, in Persian (Dihkhudā 1994) and other languages of the region. The defense of the family, kin, tribe, village, city, and country is an honor conferred on the members of the male gender. In Persian oral and written traditions, the word zan, woman, is the antonym of mard. It implies, among other pejorative connotations, timidity, cowardice, and weakness (intellectual and physical). While this gender regime does not leave much room for females to lead an “honorable” life, individual women can achieve honor, fame, and respect on accounts of bravery, hospitality, piety, generosity, knowledge, and wisdom. In princely or aristocratic families, for instance, individual women have occasionally ruled over tribes, regions, and territories, although always in the absence of a male member of the ruling family, and anticipating the transfer of power to a male child on adulthood. Since the early 1970s, women have participated in armed struggles against the state.

The practice of honor varies according to context, for example, class, socioeconomic formation, religion, education, and ethnicity. For instance, among the Bilbas tribal confederacy in Kurdistan, it has been an honor for a woman to elope at least once in her life, whereas such a practice would bring shame to urban upper-class families (Mengurī 1999). While shyness and delicacy define the ideal urban upper-class woman, female strength and stubbornness are highly valued in pastoral-nomadic and agrarian formations, where women are a major force in the labor-intensive production system.

While individual women have always resisted the honor-based hierarchy of gender power, conscious efforts to change the status quo began, in Iran, with the emergence of women's rights ideas in late nineteenth-century poetry and journalism, and especially during and after the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11. In Afghanistan, too, urban intellectuals took the first steps toward challenging the status quo in the early twentieth century. Legal reforms granting women limited rights from the 1920s and 1930s could not displace the ancient hierarchies of honor. In the mid-1950s, Furūgh Farrukhād (1935–67) revolted, in her poetry and personal relations, against the male-centered regime of propriety and morality (Hillmann 1987). Although by the mid-1960s women were granted suffrage rights, an important step toward legal equality, honor values continued to regulate gender relations in and outside the body politic.

By the end of the twentieth century, the theocratic regimes in both countries tried to reverse what they considered to be Westernization of gender roles. They constructed detailed codes of propriety based on the Sharī'a, in order to restore the dignity and honor that Muslim women had lost to modernity. In Iran, Fāṭima (the Prophet's daughter and the wife of Imām 'Alī) and Zaynab (Fāṭima's daughter) were promoted as role models to be emulated by the new Muslim woman. The Islamic Republic created a network of patrols, including the Sisters of Zaynab, which toured the streets in special cars and warned, arrested, or punished women who deviated from the new propriety. The Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan (1996–2001) created a regime of gender apartheid closely monitored by the al-Amr bi-al-mar'uf wa-al-nahy 'an al-munkar (Ministry of enjoining good and forbidding evil). Men, too, had to observe codes of propriety by emulating the Prophet Muḥammad (Haj Bābāyī 2002). The fall of the emirate did not visibly change the status quo, while in Iran women's resistance has led to relaxation in implementing propriety codes. In 2004, honor killing and women's suicide continued unabated in both countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Haj Bābāyī, Qavānīn-i Mullā 'Umar. Majmū'i-yi qavānīn-i Talibān dar Afghānistān, Tehran 1381/2002.
 'A.-A. Dihkhudā, Lughatnāmi, Tehran 1373/1994.
 M. Hillmann, A lonely woman. Forugh Farrokhzad and her poetry, Washington, D.C. 1987.
 M. M. A. Mengurī, Beserhatī siyāsī Kurd. Le 1914eweheta 1958, Sweden 1999.

South Asia

Honor (ijjat, ezzat, paxto) refers to good character, doing what is appropriate and moral for one's gender, age, kin relations, caste, and religion. Honor often centers on the family, male authority, and community linkages. Both men and women construct notions of female honor. However, they are not always in agreement. A woman's honor may be subsumed into family obligations of reciprocity and hospitality or it may be particular to her gender.

Moore (1998a) describes a Muslim community in northeastern Rajasthan where the exercise of honor is fairly typical of rural South Asian customs. In the male council, honor is defined by the men in terms of control: elders over juniors, men over women, and the groom's family over the bride's family. Parents are responsible to see that a child is married near the age of puberty. Rahman notes that in rural Bangladesh "the marriage of a daughter at an 'appropriate age' brings honor – social and symbolic capital – for the household" (1999, 94). Jewelry that women receive at the time of their marriages should be passed to a daughter's dowry. Reciprocal money donations are recorded in red ledgers as the village community marries its sons and daughters. Girls are married to men outside their villages. The wedding is performed in the bride's village but the groom's female kin should not attend. Following notions of hypergamy, after a daughter is married, it is honorable for a bride's family to give lavishly to the groom's family but not to visit or take from them. The young daughter-in-law in an extended family is expected to work hard for her mother-in-law. In a custom that was not expected in her natal village, she now draws her head shawl over her face in the presence of any male her husband's age or older. The council of male elders says, "a wife must live with her husband, however he keeps her 'wet or dry'" (Moore 1998a, 117, 1998b).

Divorce and the patrilineal community's inability to control their women are threats to honor. In this area, affairs are somewhat common. Male elders threaten beatings and even murder but most cases are settled by outcasting. Women, too, define women's moral obligations in terms of staying with and serving her husband, caring for her children, respecting her in-laws, and caring for the elderly. However, the obligation that outweighs all others is the duty to a woman's children (Moore 1998a, 148). A female villager commented, "If you want to have an affair do it here; why run away!" (ibid., 147). Running away and abandoning land would ruin a woman's house, life, and children. Although many villagers spoke of a family's right to kill a daughter who conceives outside marriage, today family honor is more often preserved through an abortion. Men and women explained that today women love their daughters too much to bring themselves to kill them. Many villagers still argued that a family with honor would kill their daughter unless she already had children that needed her. "In the past the lover would be hung from the tree and his limbs would be broken," a villager remembered (Moore 1998a, 152-3). In recent years the state has outlawed these local remedies. Still, crimes of honor are not totally obliterated. Communities swear their members to secrecy and perjure themselves in court to protect their right to administer their own justice (ibid., 150).

Among Paxtun women in Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province paxto, gherat, and sharm define honor. Grima notes that men and women demonstrate honor in distinct ways. Adult women exchange gifts, songs, visits, and personal narratives at times of great sadness or joy. Women show shame, modesty, and subservience by remaining silent in the presence of designated others, obedience, and eating after the men (1992, 37). Veiling of adult women in public is expected as part of the honor complex, but throwing off the veil or "forgetting" to wear it in public is used by women as an expression of severe pain and trauma (ibid., 39-40). This is important because enduring great suffering and the sharing of hardships is at the core of women's identity and honor. Grima concludes that women hold the key to men's honor: "She can help or hinder honor, but she cannot control it" (ibid., 164). A woman's honor should be under the control of a man; if alone or with a weak man, the community sees her as without honor. "Paxto makes no allowances for a woman alone" (ibid.).

Rahman writes about women and microcredit in rural Bangladesh. He notes that hierarchical control in patrilineal, patrilocal villages, notions of honor and shame, and a village council that is responsible for maintaining moral conduct are all manipulated to help ensure there are high repayment rates at the bank. According to Rahman, the microcredit industry uses women's "positional vulnerability" to ensure repayment of loans. Loans are most often used by men but given to women who are seen as "more disciplined (passive/submissive)" than men. These loans must be repaid in weekly installments or the group of peer borrowers will not be granted future loans. The recalcitrant borrower will be humiliated in public, bringing durnam (bad reputation) to the household, lineage, and village. For a man the same humiliation would mean almost nothing (Rahman 1999, 75). Thus women and household members try to arrange women's loan installments on time to safeguard the family honor.

Traditionally, a woman's working outside the home for pay was considered dishonorable. Women were expected to remain modestly within the domestic sphere or work in the family fields. Men were expected to protect and provide for women. Today, the relationship between women, purdah, and social status is changing in both rural and urban areas. In Bangladesh, poverty combined with microcredit loans leads families to allow Muslim women to travel abroad or migrate to urban areas for work (Rahman 1999, White 1992, Zaman 1996). Kabeer spoke with female garment workers in Dhaka, Bangladesh where she found that women were pragmatic about their financial needs, the breakdown of traditional family ties, and community safety nets. Women argued for individual responsibility, a "purdah of the mind," instead of lineage control (2000, 91). Family honor was reinterpreted in terms of factory honor where co-workers were seen as fictive kin and workers were instructed on moral factory behavior (not talking to others, not retaliating insults, and concentrating on work). Kabeer found that levels of tolerance to change were different for women and men. Women welcomed the added income for their families while men felt that women's work challenged men's masculinity and their material privileges.

Shaheed found that challenges to control-based notions of honor in Pakistan come most from women who are educated, unmarried, or heads of households. Honor codes were most strictly enforced with young reproductive wives. A persistent complaint was that strictly controlled mobility affected women's leisure, socializing, studies, work, and coping with crises (1998, 151).

Rahman noted that notions of honor are focused on the status of women in society irrespective of religious beliefs, Hindu or Muslim (1999, 74). Jeffery and Jeffery agree. They comment, "Casting slurs on another man's womenfolk or subjecting them to sexual harassment are means through which men compete for dominance. All women, then, regularly experience controls over their mobility and demeanor that structure their experience of the world beyond their homes" (1998, 123-4).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxton women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
 P. Jeffery and R. Jeffery, Gender, community and the local state in Bijnor, India, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 123-41.

- N. Kabeer, The power to choose. Bangladeshi women and labour market decisions in London and Dhaka, Dhaka 2000.
- D. Mandelbaum, Women's seclusion and men's honor. Sex roles in North India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan, Tucson 1988.
- E. P. Moore, Gender, law and resistance in India, Tucson 1998a.
- , Keep her under control. Law's patriarchy in India, ethnographic film, contact author, 1998b.
- A. Rahman, Women and microcredit in rural Bangladesh, Denver, Colo. 1999.
- F. Shaheed, The other side of the discourse. Women's experience of identity, religion, and activism in Pakistan, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 143–64.
- F. White, Arguing with the crocodile. Gender and class in Bangladesh, Dhaka 1992.
- H. Zaman, Women and work in a Bangladesh village, Dhaka 1996.

ERIN PATRICE MOORE

Turkey and the Caucasus

The initial formulations of the “honor and shame code,” which dominated the literature on social and sexual relations in the Mediterranean and the Middle East into the 1980s, held men's honor to be proportionally linked to women's chastity (Peristiany 1966). While the significance of honor as an index of personal and group prestige is still acknowledged, scholars have challenged the ways in which the honor/ shame model obscured other relevant factors in the construction of honor beyond sexual propriety (Herzfeld 1987, Wikan 1984), as well as the model's assignment of honor exclusively to the realm of men, when, in fact, women strive for honor as well (Abu-Lughod 1986).

Before focusing on sexual honor, therefore, it is important to recognize that honor also extends to cultural practices of hospitality, reputation, social status, and family in Turkey and the Caucasus. Honor in the sense of esteem (itibar) is as important for women as it is for men, and is related most conspicuously to women's role as mothers and nurturers. Sirman's (1990) ethnographic research among rural women in western Turkey demonstrates, however, that women do not achieve social status merely by becoming mothers or by being appropriated into their husbands' households. Rather, they need to develop strategies toward forming networks of solidarity with other women in the community. Being sought as a host and for advice, along with the public avowal of particular skills – from picking cotton quickly to story telling to cooking – are integral to women's reputation. Similarly, fieldwork by Yalçın-Heckman (1990) among semi-nomadic Kurds in southeast Turkey reveals that women's reputations are earned through working fast and fastidiously, especially in jobs of high prestige such as baking bread, carpet weaving, and milk production, and assuming a nonchalant posture even under a heavy workload.

Seniority and the competition among women in the same household also pertain to women's honor. Although the bride takes on most of the housework and services, the respect and honor from their noteworthy execution often accrue to the mother-in-law, who gains further esteem by having a hard-working, agreeable daughter-in-law (Sirman 1990). Likewise, in Circassian households in Adygeia, grandmothers vie for authority over their daughters-in-law through laying claims to their grandchildren's upbringing and to religious knowledge, as well as through the invocation of memories of hardship and exile during Soviet rule (Shami 2000). Women across the Caucasus are also constructed by honor as bearers of authenticity, measured through their difference from the perceived image of the “Russian other” (Heyat 2002).

Nonetheless, sexual honor (namus) remains primary throughout the region. In a recent survey in Azerbaijan, namus was ranked as the most important theme in early socialization, with women's chastity being the primary connotation (Tohidi 2000). In Turkey, beginning with puberty, girls are strictly socialized into codes of modest demeanor – from dress to speech to body gestures – that will protect and affirm their chastity. A woman's sexual misconduct or even rumors thereof tarnish not only her own reputation, but also bring shame and dishonor to her family/lineage. The importance of women's purity as an icon of family honor manifests itself linguistically in the myriad of injunctions against “staining the family honor.” What is designated as sexual misconduct, however, varies greatly. In parts of Turkey, the very possibility of unsupervised interactions with boys may provide sufficient grounds for an “honor killing,” the murder of the dishonored girl by male kin. By contrast, it is taken for granted in Circassian communities that adolescent girls will attend parties and mingle with several potential suitors (kashen) (see box). The freer attitudes among Circassians may be attributed to the Soviet influence as well as to the absence of institutionalized forms of Islam, though the latter have been gaining increasing prominence in the post-Soviet era (Shami 2000).

Indeed, a major question has been over the influence of Islam on the persistent link between women's purity and family honor. Pointing to the fact that ideas of honor and shame are embedded in the monotheistic religions, Delaney (1991) has argued for the determining role of Islam in the Turkish context. According to the theory of procreation in Islam, men are creators; they produce by providing the "seed" in the making of the child. Women, however, are mere receptors; they reproduce because they only provide the "soil" on which the seed is fertilized. Women, therefore, need to be closely monitored, for the legitimacy of paternity – and thereby the honor of men – can only be assured through the monogamy of women.

Other scholars have found the attribution of such a definitive role to Islam ahistorical, noting that the notion of honor is contingent on the nationalist histories and social policies of each nation-state (Kandiyoti 1987). Attention to the role of the state is also crucial to avoid confining the concern with honor to the traditional rural community. The Turkish modernizing elite, for example, who took it upon themselves to emancipate Turkish women, granted women legal rights and fashioned the image of the public, modern woman, while simultaneously reaffirming the importance of women's virtue and chastity. Women who entered the public sphere thus had either to downplay their female sexuality to the point of invisibility or contain it within the boundaries dictated by men (Arat 1997, Durakbaşa 1988). Furthermore, now that women were unveiled and no longer confined to the private sphere, their honor, previously monitored through kinship networks, came under the surveillance of the modern state, as evidenced by the existence until 1999 of state enforced virginity examinations, which were routinely performed on political detainees, women suspected of prostitution, and on girls in state orphanages, dormitories, and high schools (Parla 2001).

Soviet modernization, on the other hand, did not concern itself with women's chastity, and was far more successful in promoting gender equality and ensuring education and careers for women. However, its effects with regard to gender and honor among its Muslim minority echo the Turkish case. Women in the Caucasus, too, faced a double burden: on the one hand, they had to fulfill the communist requirement to participate equally in the workforce and in public life and on the other hand, they were expected to sustain the call of their ethnic communities for modesty (Heyat 2002).

WWHR – New Ways

Espousing the view that honor crimes are only the tip of the iceberg beneath which lies a system of patriarchal traditional norms limiting women's control over their own bodies and sexualities, Women for Women's Human Rights (WWHR) – New Ways, an autonomous women's organization based in Turkey, has been working toward the realization of women's sexual rights since its foundation in 1993. The publication of a reader entitled Women and Sexuality in Muslim Societies (Ilkkaracan 2000) aimed at rendering visible the voices and efforts of women activists, academicians, poets, and cartoonists living in Muslim countries against practices such as honor crimes that are wrongfully justified in the name of Islam. Most recently, WWHR – New Ways has assembled a working group, composed of feminist activists, lawyers, academicians, and representatives of non-governmental organizations, to draft a reform of the Turkish Penal Code from a gender perspective, a pressing task as the code continues to sanction the concept of honor that links the honor of the family and community directly to women's sexual behavior.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments. Honor and poetry in a Bedouin society, Berkeley 1986.
- Y. Arat, The project of modernity and women in Turkey, in S. Bozdoğan and R. Kasaba (eds.), Rethinking modernity and national identity in Turkey, Seattle 1997, 95–112.
- C. Delaney, The seed and the soil. Gender and cosmology in Turkish village society, Berkeley 1991.
- A. Durakbaşa, Cumhuriyet döneminde kadın kimliğinin oluşumu, in Tarih Toplum 51 (1988), 43.
- M. Herzfeld, "As in your own home." Hospitality, ethnography, and the stereotype of Mediterranean society, in D. Gilmore (ed.), Honor and shame and the unity of the Mediterranean, Washington, D.C. 1987, 75–89.
- F. Heyat, Azeri women in transition. Women in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, London 2002.
- P. Ilkkaracan (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000.
- D. Kandiyoti, Emancipated but unliberated? Reflections on the Turkish case, in Feminist Studies 13 (Summer 1987), 317–38.
- A. Parla, The "honor" of the state. Virginity examinations in Turkey, in Feminist Studies 27 (Spring 2001), 65–89.
- J. G. Peristiany (ed.), Honour and shame. The values of Mediterranean society, Chicago 1966.
- S. Shami, Engendering social memory. Domestic rituals, resistance and identity in the North Caucasus in F. Acar and A. Guneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 306–31.
- N. Sirman, State, village and gender in Western Turkey, in N. Sirman and A. Finkel (eds.), Turkish state, Turkish society, London 1990, 21–51.
- N. Tohidi, Gender and national identity in post-Soviet Azerbaijan. A regional perspective, in F. Acar and A. Guneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 249–92.
- U. Wikan, Shame and honour. A contestable pair, in Man 19 (1984), 635–52.

L. Yalçın-Heckmann, Aşiretli kadın. Göçer ve yarı-göçer toplumlarda cinsiyet rolleri ve kadın stratejileri, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), 1980'ler Türkiye'sinde kadın bakış açısından kadımlar, İstanbul 1990, 1995⁵, 277-90.

AYŞE PARLA

Honor: Crimes of

Overview

DEFINITION

While it was anthropologists and sociologists who studied the cultural construct “honor” (and its corollary “shame”) in Muslim countries, it was mostly human rights activists and lawyers who took on the phenomenon of crimes of honor. “Crimes of honor” refers to the legal regulation of a cultural practice known as “honor killings.” In some Muslim cultural contexts, an honor killing takes place when a woman is killed by a male member of her family for engaging in, or for being suspected of engaging in, a prohibited sexual practice before or outside marriage. The spilling of the blood of the victim is seen as necessary to erase the shame she has brought upon her family by her sexual misconduct. Sometimes an honor crime is merely an attempt to mask a more serious crime that has taken place within the family, such as rape or incest, or is carried out with the intent to disenfranchise the woman of her property or inheritance. The most common relation the male perpetrator has to his female victim is that of either father or brother. Husbands and lovers commit “honor killings” too, although in this instance, their action tends to be understood as driven by a different cultural idea, namely, “passion,” or rage of sexual jealousy. Which countries to include in the list of those where honor killings occur depends on the understanding of the relationship between honor and passion: is an honor killing the same as a passion killing, continuous with it, or sharply distinct from it? Should Brazil, where passion crimes occur, be treated as not dissimilar from Jordan, where honor crimes occur, or should they be treated as distinct because a culture of passion is distinct from that of honor?

Honor killings often occur within immigrant communities living in the West where the country of residence is usually more at home legally with the notion of a crime of passion than that of honor. Such killings raise the issue of “cultural defense” for the particular Western legal system: should the immigrant killer be allowed to appeal to the culture of origin to justify his killing and to get sympathetic understanding from the court/jury?

ISLAMIC LAW

Most schools of Islamic jurisprudence treat as legitimate the killing by private individuals of a married person caught committing adultery re-handled. They argue that since death is the ḥadd punishment assigned under Islamic law for adultery committed by married persons, an adulterer has made his blood ḥalāl. The same is true for killing an unmarried person caught fornicating, even though the punishment assigned under Islamic law for fornication is a mere one hundred lashes. Some jurists justify legal tolerance for the killing in this case on the basis of “provocation” and they limit it to women the killer is related to. Most jurists, however, justify killing on the basis of “the duty to fend off sin,” which they treat as a religious duty. In this case, the killing is tolerated whether it includes women the killer is related to or not. It is important to note that if a later court judgment determines that adultery/fornication did not in fact take place, the killer is punished for murder. It is also a rule of Islamic jurisprudence that retaliation is not inflicted against a parent who kills his/her child in the course of correction. Killing for honor is seen as such an instance. There is evidence to suggest that the Ottomans, rulers and jurists alike, tolerated the practice of honor killings and left it to the domain of self-help. In contrast, sixteenth- and seventeenth-century muftis of Syria condemned the practice as un-Islamic. Contemporary Saudi Arabia, which characterizes its own legal system as Islamic, allows the killing of females if they disgrace their family on the basis of custom (urf). Urf is treated as one of the sources of the law.

The contemporary liberal Muslim response to this cultural practice insists that honor killings are un-Islamic. It argues that there is no such sanction, whether in the Qurʾān or ḥadīth, that allows a person to take the life of another. When a woman or a man is accused of zinā (illicit sexual behavior), the Qurʾān requires that four men must actually have witnessed the act of sexual intercourse taking place. If guilt is proven, the same punishment is inflicted on men and women. Moreover, if a person accuses another of such a crime and the accusation transpires to be baseless, then the accuser is punished.

MODERN LAW

The legal regulation of honor killings in various Arab and Islamic countries varies from complete prohibition of the crime, to partial tolerance, to indifference through either lack of regulation or lack of prosecutorial enforcement. Judges often interpret the gaps, conflicts, and ambiguities in the rules with an eye of sympathy for the male perpetrator of the crime. Arab criminal codes (originally legal transplants from Europe) vary in their attitudes toward honor killings, each offering a different kind of excuse (total exemption from penalty or partial reduction in penalty) to different kinds of male perpetrators (father, brother, husband), depending on the particular code. Which kind of excuse offered to which kind of male relative determines the extent to which the particular code is tolerant of the idea of an "honor" defense, or alternatively, that of "passion." Most criminal codes represent a compromise between the two ideas. Arab judicial practice in Jordan, Syria, and Egypt has the tendency to reinterpret the criminal codes of their respective countries to increase the legal tolerance of these crimes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled sentiments, Berkeley 1986.
- L. Abu-Odeh, Crimes of honour and the construction of gender in Arab societies, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, Berks, U.K. 1996, 141–94.
- , Comparatively speaking. The "honor" of the "East" and the "passion" of the "West," in Utah Law Review 2 (1997), 287–307.
- S. Al-Khayyat, Honor and shame. Women in modern Iraq, London 1993.
- R. T. Antoun, Arab villages. A social structural study of a Trans-Jordanian peasant community, Bloomington, Ind. 1977.
- ‘A. al-Q. ‘Awda, al-Tashrī‘ al-jinā‘ī al-Islāmī muqāraran bi-al-qānūn al-wadī‘, Cairo [1985?].
- A. Basarudin, Are Islam and human rights compatible? Revisiting Muslim women's rights, <<http://www.iifhr.com/Global%20Fellowship/Azza%27sFellowPape.html>>.
- D. D. Gilmore (ed.), Honor and shame and the unity of the Mediterranean, Washington, D.C. 1987.
- S. Haeri, The politics of dishonor. Rape and power in Pakistan, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995, 161–74.
- C. Imber, Ebu's-Su'ud. The Islamic legal tradition, Edinburgh 1997.
- M. Lippman, S. McConville, and M. Yerushalmi, Islamic criminal law and procedure. An introduction, New York 1988.
- S. Mackey, The Saudis. Inside the desert kingdom, Boston 1987.
- H. Maguigan, Cultural evidence and male violence. Are feminist and multiculturalist reformers on a collision course in criminal courts?, in New York University Law Review 70 (1995), 36–99.
- F. Mughayzil and M. ‘Abd al-Sātir, Jarā‘im al-sharaf. Dirāsa qānūniyya, Beirut 1999.
- B. Sarwar, . . . On suspicion of illicit relations, in M. Davis (ed.), Women and violence, London 1994, 220–22.
- Strategies to address "honour crimes," roundtable held at School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, 15–17 February 2002, transcript of proceedings.
- J. E. Tucker, In the house of the law. Gender and Islamic law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, Berkeley 1998.

LAMA ABU-ODEH

Sub-Saharan Africa: Northern Nigeria

Discussion of gender and violence in Muslim societies in Sub-Saharan Africa quickly brings to mind the issue of stoning to death for adultery in the northern states of Nigeria. Because this is such an important region, and because it has been the scene of such well publicized issues, this entry focuses on northern Nigeria, and on the relationship between legal practice and violence, with comments where relevant on other centers of Muslim population south of the Sahara.

Observers might conclude from the public support for restoring Islamic penal law in the northern states of Nigeria that this region offers a graphic example of Islamic values underwriting patriarchal violence against women. However, a close examination can lead to different conclusions. While at least one sentence of lashing has been carried out, the sentence of stoning to death in the widely discussed case of Amina Lawal was rejected by a Muslim court in September 2003. Moreover, "honor killing" is not a common phenomenon in northern Nigeria. Indeed, as a conservative Muslim region where honor killing seldom takes place, the northern states of Nigeria offer an important comparative case to help in assessing the roots of "honor killing" in other predominantly Muslim societies.

The northernmost tier of Nigerian states, which includes much of the former Sokoto Caliphate and the Sultanate of Bornu, comprises one of the most heavily Muslim areas of Sub-Saharan Africa, with the proportion of Muslims in many localities being 90 percent or more. Islamic penal law, with the exceptions of stoning for adultery, amputation for theft, and death for apostasy, was applied in the region under British rule up until the implementation of the Northern Region criminal and penal codes in 1959. This is a pattern found in no other area of Sub-Saharan Africa, and in few other areas of the Muslim world. While civil and commercial law were handled by Muslim judges (alkali, pl. alkalai), criminal law was in the hands of the emir's judicial councils, and so its application was closely bound up with the image and practice of traditional rulership.

“Honor killing” is a term used to refer to the killing by male patrilineal kin of women whose perceived behavior is thought to have brought shame to the family. While it is well documented in a number of modern Muslim societies, notably in the Middle East and Southwest Asia, it is difficult to gauge its frequency over the longer historical term.

Islamic law is relevant to this phenomenon in two ways. First, Islamic law calls for the punishment of adultery (zinā), with lashing for those never married, and stoning to death for those married or formerly married. Both the man and woman involved are liable for punishment. But in most schools of Islamic law, it is difficult to prove adultery since four witnesses are required. Thus the law condemns adultery in the most severe of terms, yet makes it difficult to punish by formal legal process.

This reality may suggest that because the courts are constrained by legal technicalities it is legitimate for male kin to take matters into their own hands. Islamic homicide law is also relevant, for it treats homicide as a tort rather than a crime, except when it occurs in the context of highway robbery or rebellion – in other words when it challenges state authority. The built in assumption is that killing usually involves conflict between lineages. When the court finds that homicide has taken place it authorizes the aggrieved male patrilineal next of kin to take proportional revenge, or to claim compensation. The court can also exact “Allah’s right” (ḥaqq Allāh) and apply its own punishment to the guilty individual. In northern Nigeria this was typically one hundred lashes and a year in prison. When a killing takes place within the patrilineal group, as it does in the honor killing of an adulteress, only this second punishment is relevant. This legal pattern may help explain modern situations such as that in Jordan, where the courts apply a lesser punishment in cases of honor killing.

The legal setting in northern Nigeria adds a further wrinkle. Here it is the Mālikī school of Islamic law that is applied, and in this school pregnancy out of wedlock is accepted as circumstantial proof of adultery. Of course, short of DNA testing, this proof is only relevant to the woman. In the past, Mālikī jurists in North Africa and Spain came up with a number of ingenious devices to curtail the impact of this. For instance, they agreed that it was possible for a child to sleep within its mother’s womb for up to five years. European colonial legal scholars scoffed at the unscientific character of this doctrine, but clearly it had a humane intent. The use of force, deception, or magic might also constitute a valid argument against the charge of adultery. In a curious way, the Mālikī system may have worked to lure cases into the courts where they would die a slow death through legal technicalities, saving the life of a woman who, in areas under the ostensibly more liberal schools such as the Ḥanafī or Shaffī, might have been quickly put to death in an honor killing carried out under the informal authority of “tribal law.” One conclusion, also suggested by women’s roles in Muslim courts in East Africa, is that courts grounded in a formal tradition of written law can provide a counterweight to social norms unfavorable to women’s rights.

In searching for insights as to why northern Nigeria lacks honor killing, one also needs to investigate social and cultural patterns. In Muslim societies where honor killing is common, and apparently sanctioned by public opinion, lineages often have key roles in social and political life. Marriage articulates the lineage internally, and it cements external alliances. But among the Hausa, the predominant ethnic group in northern Nigeria, lineage does not have a prevalent role. Hausa society is best characterized as territorial and hierarchical. Individuals are identified by village, or urban quarter of residence, rather than by lineage. Social interactions in lineage based societies are often egalitarian and competitive. In Hausa society they are characterized instead by an emphasis on deference and decorum.

In lineage based Muslim societies, violence often erupts between competing lineages who share a larger cultural identity. In northern Nigeria, the most frequent examples of violence are those that involve attacks on individual outsiders, or conflicts between culturally different communities. Legal records show the frequent killing of thieves. At least in the early twentieth century these were frequently slaves or ex-slaves – outsiders with no kin to support their rights or claim compensation. Since the 1950s, there have been periodic eruptions of intercommunal violence involving southerners or, in the case of the 1980 Mai Tatsine disturbances, a dissident Islamic sect.

There have been occasional notorious acts of violence against women in northern Nigeria that have come before the courts and received widespread publicity. One dramatic case was recorded in the register of the Emir of Kano’s Judicial Council in 1913. In this case, a prominent man, Sarki Maiduwa, killed his wife, Hafsa, by striking her on her neck and head. The motive for this, revealed in testimony of her mother, was that Hafsa had refused to countenance her husband's taking her bed and giving it to his concubine. He claimed that an attack of jinn, malevolent spirits, had been the cause of her death. The written account suggests that there was an expectation that Sarki Maiduwa would be held guilty, but in the end, because there was only circumstantial and hearsay evidence, he was let off. In 1980 in Kano there was a highly publicized case involving Nafiu Rabi, son of a prominent Kano businessman. He killed his wife, whom he had kept confined in an urban Kano apartment by locking her in. The trial was held in a court presided over by Kano's last British judge, who found him not guilty. Public rumor had it that the judge departed Kano airport with his bags stuffed with cash given him by Nafiu Rabi. There was such a public outcry that a new trial was held, under a Nigerian judge, and Rabi was convicted of manslaughter and sent to prison.

These two cases suggest that the dominant motive in violence against women is not family honor but rather the dynamics of jealousy and resentment that are commonplace in the polygynous household. Public opinion certainly does not ascribe an honorable rationale to such violence, in contrast to the case for honor killing. There are no allegations of sexual misbehavior on the part of the woman in these cases, but rather suggestions that she was assertive enough to arouse her husband's ire. The reference to illness caused by jinn may suggest a recognition that a woman's depression is closely connected to the dynamics of violence. Both cases can probably be understood as excesses of domestic violence that occurred normally but did not result in death.

In examining the support for stoning to death for adultery that has surfaced since 1999, one needs to ask whether this is a reversion to tradition or instead needs to be seen as a new phenomenon, the product of new forces in the society. In records from the pre-colonial and early colonial periods there are no references to this penalty. It was outlawed by the British, but if it had been common there would certainly have been cases arising from the informal application of this punishment. Yet there are none. This supports the argument that deteriorating economic conditions since the 1980s must be suspected as having a role in the present situation, creating situations where adultery occurs, and perhaps lending to growing hostility to independent women. The sharp deterioration in economic conditions may explain a greater frequency of situations in which women are divorced and left on their own, but can find no man who can afford to marry them. They are thus left vulnerable to sexual victimization. This factor can be seen in the most widely publicized case, that of Amina Lawal. Apprehension over rising rates of HIV/AIDS may also contribute to the focus on adultery.

There is wide recognition in Nigeria that women such as Amina Lawal are victims, not criminals. There are women's rights groups such as Baobab that speak out strongly in their defense. Northern Muslim men in positions of responsibility tend rather to follow the traditional jurist's tack of quietly pursuing legal arguments to prevent a finding of adultery. When such a case is brought to court, as opposed to being settled informally as with the honor killing pattern, the court can provide a forum for public discussion of all the issues involved, a discussion that can put the incident into reasoned and compassionate perspective.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Baobab for Women's Human Rights, <<http://www/baobabwomen.org>>.
- J. Boyd and B. B. Mack, One woman's jihad. Nana Asma'u, scholar and scribe, Bloomington, Ind. 2000.
- Centre for Democratic Development and Research Training, <<http://www.ceddert.com>>.
- A. Christelow, Thus ruled Emir Abbas. Selected cases from the Emir of Kano's Judicial Council, East Lansing, Mich. 1994.
- C. Coles and B. B. Mack, Hausa women in the twentieth century, Madison, Wis. 1991.
- B. Cooper, Marriage in Maradi. Gender and culture in a Hausa society in Niger (1900-1989), Portsmouth, N.H. 1997.
- R. A. Dunbar, Muslim women in African history, in N. Levtzion and R. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Oxford 2000, 397-418.
- S. Hirsch, Pronouncing and persevering. Gender and the discourses of disputing in an African Islamic court, Chicago 1998.
- C. Fluehr-Lobban, Islamic law and society in the Sudan, London 1987.
- M. Smith, Baba of Karo. A woman of the Muslim Hausa, New Haven, Conn. 1981.

ALLAN CHRISTELOW

Honor: Feminist Approaches to

Overview

Recently, human rights activists and feminist scholars have turned their attention to crimes of honor and have mobilized their efforts to combat this social practice, especially in the context of some Arab and Islamic countries. Surveying the literature on crimes of honor that Western as well as non-Western feminist legal scholars and human rights activists have produced, it is clear that the kind of feminism the particular activist or scholar adopts influences the way she frames crimes of honor conceptually. The framing determines the way the feminist understands the wrongs of the crime, the way it relates to other cultural phenomena, and the particular remedies she proposes to abolish the crime. It is important to note, however, that since the fight against crimes of honor consists of an alliance between local activists and activists involved in international human rights organizations, the feminist discourse deployed to fight those crimes has been trafficking back and forth from the international to the local and back again. This trajectory affects the discourse's internal coherence, as users mix and match ideas between different theories of feminism. It also loses memory of its place of origin, so that what is "Muslim" and what is "Western" about these feminist discourses becomes lost along the way.

LIBERAL FEMINISTS

Liberal feminists, for whom "equality" is the main analytical category, argue that the trouble with the legal regulation of honor killings is that it discriminates between men and women. According to these feminists, not only are the social norms more tolerant of men's extramarital sexual conduct where men are rarely killed for honor, but the legal norms themselves rarely punish men for such conduct. This is evident from the criminal codes of Turkey, the Arab states, Bangladesh, and Pakistan. Moreover, criminal codes fail to award the same kind of procedural protection to women as they do to men. When a woman is tried and executed privately by her family for dishonoring them and the legal system tolerates such private acts, what this in effect means is that extrajudicial trials are allowed when they involve female victims. This would never happen if the victims of the homicides were men. Such discrimination, liberal feminists argue, is a violation of a woman's right to life.

Liberal feminists typically evoke the language of international human rights to support their claims of discrimination against women. They argue that domestic laws are in violation of international laws such as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and need to be reformed to bring honor crimes in line with other homicides. Killers of women should be given as harsh a treatment as killers of men.

For some liberal feminists, passion as a motivation for crime is seen as different from that of honor. Killing for passion, as when a man kills his wife and her lover when he catches them having sex, is different from killing for honor, as when a father kills his daughter for sexual misconduct to erase the shame she has brought upon him. For these feminists, an honor killing is instrumental in nature; it is calculated murder to avoid shame. Passion, in contrast, is driven by jealousy and rage, and is inherently involuntary. A possible liberal feminist response therefore is to maintain that when it comes to passion killings women should be awarded the excuse as well, because women have feelings too.

Regarding matters of sexuality and sexual practice, liberal feminism is generally libertarian in its attitude. A given sexual practice is legitimate as long as it is based on the consent of the parties involved. Generally though, liberal feminist activists tend to say little about the disciplinary function of crimes of honor on women's sexuality. Instead of protesting at the crime as a violation, say, of a woman's right to consent to sex, they resort to the liberal arguments outlined here: right to life, right to equal access to due process, and so forth. There are two reasons for this kind of avoidance: right to life arguments work better than right to sex in more traditional societies such as the Arab and Islamic ones. Moreover, "right to sex" evokes fears of "Western cultural imperialism" in many. Indeed if matters of sex have to be referred to, the "right to privacy" and the "right to bodily integrity" are usually evoked, as in the case of state virginity controls in Turkey.

Against the grain of this practice, some Muslim feminist scholars called for the equalization of sexual mores in Arab societies: either virginity is eliminated as a social expectation or it is expected equally of both men and women. Also, a minority of Western human rights activists have argued for the formulation of a new human right, namely, “sexual autonomy,” to combat practices associated with honor.

RADICAL FEMINISTS

Radical feminists, for whom “patriarchy” and “violence against women” are the main analytical categories, treat honor killings as a symptom of a larger regime of patriarchy or male dominance over women. These killings are not an instance, singular and unique, of particular cultures, but are on a par with and similar to other forms of violence inflicted on women by men, universally and in all cultures. Coercing minors to marry, domestic abuse, rape, polygamy, are all acts of male violence against women and are on a continuum with the crime of honor. In a sense, they are all crimes of honor. Each culture has its own peculiar variation of male acts of violence.

Most of these practices of violence, in the view of radical feminism, go unremedied. What is required therefore is a more severe response from the legal system: acts of violence against women, including crimes of honor, should all be grouped together and treated more seriously. Indeed, the sexual dimension of the crime of honor cries out for special treatment (harsher punishment) not equal treatment (to other types of homicides) as liberal feminism contends.

According to radical feminism, passion is the same as honor. Both honor crimes and crimes driven by passion are symptoms of a regime of male dominance. Whether a man is overcome with the passion of jealousy or the shame of dishonor when he kills a woman makes no difference. Both types of killings function to subordinate women to men; they are the acting out of the societal script of male dominance.

Some feminist activists in the Islamic world find this brand of feminism appealing because of its insistence on the universality of male violence. It frees them from the sense of shame they might feel toward their own culture’s practice of honor killings and its peculiar form of control of women’s sexuality. Since passion crimes do occur in less sexually repressive cultures in the West, and since according to radical feminism passion is the same as honor, then one culture cannot hold itself morally superior to the other. We are all victims of male violence.

Radical feminism in general is skeptical of the liberal categories of consent and choice, especially when deployed in the arena of sexuality. Freeing women to have sex with men may only result in making women available to male violence and control. Both the idea that male violence is everywhere and the general skepticism concerning questions of sexual liberation allow radical feminists to avoid talking about sex in other cultures.

Some radical feminists influenced by cultural feminism argue that sexuality in honor cultures should be transformed to become more feminine: caring, sensitive, and communicative.

It is worth noting that many activists and scholars on the question of honor tend to mix, in their analytics and advocacy rhetoric, the two strands of feminism, liberal and radical. They believe in the universality of patriarchy and they are advocates of women’s equality to men. Male violence is everywhere but women must reclaim their autonomy and agency.

POSTSTRUCTURALIST FEMINISM

While poststructuralist feminists agree generally with the radical feminist idea of male dominance, they assert that violence against women does not work in the interests of all men against all women, but in the interests of some men against those of many women and men. Moreover, male dominance as a regime of power is not total because it is shot through with various forms of resistance everywhere by both men and women. Law works as a set of background rules, along with social norms, to influence the particular dynamic of power and resistance within the system. A la Foucault, poststructuralist feminism also believes that law plays a role in “subjection,” that is, participating in the creation of forms of being a gendered subject.

Poststructuralist feminists note that in the societies where honor killings take place, women’s virginity is a highly prized social practice, the loss of which is penalized in extreme cases through these killings. At the end of the day, this produces a hymenized space between men and women, where the preservation of men’s virginity is no less the effect of the system than that of women’s. This regime of virginity by command (for women) and virginity by default (for men) is no less taxing on women than it is on men. It coerces both genders to bargain their way around this particular form of prohibition to interact sexually. Such forms of being (virgin/virgin by default) and bargaining (different kinds of sexual deviance designed to preserve virginity while still having sex) are unique to the cultures that produce honor killings. According to this view, the interaction between the legal rules on honor killings a particular legal regime opts for, judicial practice of that regime through interpretation of those rules, and prosecutorial practice, leave a residue of social violence that influences those forms of being (a virgin) and bargaining (for sex) described here. In the modern Arab world, partial liberalization of the normative command of virginity was introduced by the nationalist elites that took power after Arab states gained independence. Desegregation of gendered public space through education and work wrapped the command of virginity with a particular form of ambiguity that allowed for sexual maneuvering that did not exist before. The criminal codes put in place by these elites reinforced this partial liberalization by combining rules taken from a “passion” legal regime with those taken from an “honor” legal regime.

Poststructuralist feminism deconstructs the liberal distinction between honor (seen as instrumental and rational) and passion (seen as driven by the irrational rage of jealousy). Honor killers can be driven by rage, seen culturally as a natural reaction, and passion crimes can be executed to maintain the honor of the killer. But poststructural feminism does not see passion and honor as the same, either, in the way radical feminism does. Rather, it asserts that passion and honor have a differential impact on the culture of sex. Which kind of rules a particular regime picks to award which kind of excuses to which kind of men will distribute power and sexual subjectivities differently between men and women. The difference makes a difference.

Poststructuralist feminists do not avoid talk about sex. Since honor killings are disciplinary of sexual practice, the goal is to open up resistance through reformed law and social norms that allow for more pleasure and new forms of pleasure.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

E. Accad, Sexuality and sexual politics. Conflicts and contradictions for contemporary women in the Middle East, in C. T. Mohanty, A. Russo, and L. Torres (eds.), Third World women and the politics of feminism, Bloomington, Ind. 1991, 215–36, repr. in P. Ilkkaracan (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000, 37–50.

Amnesty International, Pakistan. No progress on women’s rights, 1 September 1998, AI Index ASA 33/013/98, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGASA330131998?open&cof=ENG-2S4>>.

—, Pakistan. Violence against women in the name of honour, 22 September 1999, AI Index ASA 33/017/99, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/index/ENGASA330171999>>.

—, Pakistan. Honour killings of girls and women, 1 September 1999, AI Index ASA 33/018/99, <<http://web.amnesty.org/library/Index/ENGASA330181999?open&cof=ENG-PAK>>.

CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women), <<http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/cedaw/econvention.htm>>. See Article 2 (f) and (g).

Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, G.A. res. 48/104, 48 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49) at 217, U.N. Doc. A/48/49 (1993), <<http://www.un.org/documents/ga/res/48/a48r104.htm>>. See Preamble and Article 4(d).

F. Faqir, Intrafamily femicide in defense of honor. The case of Jordan, in Third World Quarterly 22:1 (2001), 65–82.

Human Rights Watch, Women’s Rights Project, A matter of power. State control of women’s virginity in Turkey, June 1994 <<http://www.hrw.org/reports/1994/turkey/>>.

S. Y. Lai and R. E. Ralphy, Female sexual autonomy and human rights, in Harvard Human Rights Journal 8 (1995), 201–27.

F. Mernissi, Virginity and patriarchy, in Women’s Studies International Forum 5:2 (1982), 183–94, repr. in P. Ilkkaracan (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000, 203–14.

R. P. Petchesky, Sexual rights. Inventing a concept, mapping an international practice, in R. Parker, R. Maria, and P. Aggleton (eds.), Framing the sexual subject, Berkeley 2000, 81–103.

N. Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Femicide and the Palestinian criminal justice system. Seeds of change in the context of state building?, in Law and Society Review 36 (2002), 577–99.

M. Spatz, A “lesser” crime. A comparative study of legal defences for men who kill their wives, in Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems 24 (1991), 597–638.

LAMA ABU-ODEH

Hospitality

Central Asia

The legendary hospitality of Central Asians was the consequence of several influences. Foremost was the role played by the Great Silk Road, which depended on hospitality to support caravans of goods. Village and neighborhood communal hospitality houses, as well as Beduin and Islamic norms, also bolstered Central Asian hospitality, as did the influence of Russian culture in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Ethnographers have acknowledged the importance of hospitality in Central Asian culture exclusively from the male perspective. Among sedentary Central Asians, the role of women has remained secreted in the ichkari (interior of the house). The literature describes traditional communal hospitality houses (alovkhona and mehmonkhona) (Rahimov 1990). The alovkhona (house of fire) derives from the Zoroastrian temple of eternal flame and is usually attributed to the mountain Tajiks. It was a space for ritual practice and men's feasts as well as for guests.

Like the alovkhona, the communal mehmonkhona (guesthouse) was kept by the sedentary population in the Central Asian plains. However, they played an essential role for the nomadic population as well. Nomads always had extra yurts for guests. In their winter settlements semi-nomadic tribes built stationary guesthouses, mosques, and enclosures for livestock before they built personal dwellings. The hospitality houses were maintained communally and provided hospitality without charge. There were also mehmonkhonas in private residences, usually a room remote from the women's part of the dwelling. Established originally in houses of rich Soghdians, they are now a focal point in every Central Asian dwelling.

Many sayings and expressions reflect an exalted idea of hospitality: the guest is a messenger of God (Tajik); God's guest (Kyrgyz); dearer than a father (Uzbek). The gates are always open to symbolize hospitality and the readiness to receive guests. The host is expected to share everything he possesses down to his last loaf of bread.

Male and female roles and responsibilities were sharply divided. Females of all ages and boys served. Women maintained a clean and orderly household in case guests arrived. Men were responsible for supplying refreshments (sweets and dried fruits) because women had limited access to public bazaars. When the Soviets lifted restrictions on women's socializing, women added the masculine obligations of hospitality (as well as working outside the home) to their traditional women's obligations.

It is customary for women and girls to prepare food. In public places such as the mehmonkhona or choykhona (teahouse) men cook and have feasts with various names depending on the region: Gap, Jura, Jumagap, Tukma, Gashtak, Gurung, Ziyofat (Rahimov 1990, Snesev 1963), Joro bolo (Simakov 1984). Women also have gatherings. In these gatherings, as well as at weddings, funerals, and other women's occasions, an important woman specialist in rituals – the dasturkhanchi – plays a key role as master of ceremonies or hospitality leader. She is elected to this honorary position by women of the residential community. The dasturkhanchi initiates all ritual events; she monitors the correct sequence of observance, helps hostesses to receive and seat guests, and decides on the division of labor for preparation of meals or gifts. She is well versed in the details of ceremonies and the norms of behavior and etiquette during their observance (Alimova and Azimova 2000, Kandiyoti and Azimova forthcoming). Similar masters act for men but they are not elected.

Gifts are given on almost all occasions, such as guest receptions (esteemed male guests are garbed in ethnic robes, while women receive choice outfits and scarves), weddings, or other family life-cycle or community events, Islamic and secular holidays, and meetings of gender and age groups (in the latter case it is a host who receives a gift or cash from each member). Sometimes women pack food or sweets for guests to take home. Women also exchange special holiday recipes.

Etiquette determines the physical allocation of family members and guests. For instance, in traditional families women and children do not sit at the table with guests. While many families influenced by Russian culture no longer do this, they still practice ranking around the table. Guests occupy the best places at the head of table, which is always opposite to an entrance. Father and son sit next to guests, while mother and girls take peripheral positions. Men sit comfortably cross-legged on the floor, while women sit with one leg under them and the other with bent knee. This is convenient, for they always serve at the table and need to get up easily, and is also considered a sign of female modesty. Dishes are first served to guests and men.

The host and hostess meet the first guests together. Later guests are welcomed by one of them while the other entertains the guests who came earlier. When guests leave, hosts usher them to the gate. If there are grown sons in the household, they escort guests to a bus or home to ensure that they arrive safely.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- A. S. Agaronyan, The culture of everyday life [in Russian], Tashkent 1982.
- D. Alimova and N. Azimova, Women's position in Uzbekistan before and after independence, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000.
- M. A. Hamidjanova, Party for girls or Choygashtak in Stalinabad, in Izvestiy AN Tadjik SSR 10-11, Stalinabad 1956.
- D. Kandiyoti and N. Azimova, The communal and the sacred. Women's worlds of ritual in Uzbekistan (forthcoming).
- K. Mahmudov, Hospitality [in Russian], Tashkent 1967.
- V. Nalivkin and M. Nalivkina, The everyday life of women in the settled native population of Fergana [in Russian], Kazan 1886.
- R. R. Rahimov, Men's houses [in Russian], in Traditsionii Kulture Tadjikov, Leningrad 1990.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- S. M. Abramzon, K. I. Antipina, and G. P. Vasilyeva i dr., Everyday life of collective farms in Kirgiz Seleny Darhan and Chichkan [in Russian], in Trudy Instituta Etnografii AN SSSR, NS 37, Moscow 1958.
- G. N. Simakov, The social role of popular Kirgiz entertainment [in Russian], in Obshchestvennyye Funktsii Kirgizskih Narodnykh Razvlecheniy v Kontse 19 - Nachalo 20 Vekov, Leningrad 1984.
- G. P. Snesarev, Material on the origins of the vestiges of rituals and customs among the Uzbeks of Khorezm [in Russian], in Materialy Khorezmskoy Ekspeditsii, Vyp. 4, Moscow 1957.
- , Traditions of male associations and their contemporary variations among the peoples of Central Asia [in Russian], in Materialy Khorezmskoy Ekspeditsii, Vyp. 7, Moscow 1963.
- K. L. Zadykhina, Vestiges of developing classes among the peoples of Central Asia [in Russian], in Rodovoe Obshchestvo, Moscow 1951.

NODIRA KHAITBAEVNA AZIMOVA

The Gulf and Yemen

The hospitality of the Arabs is so famed as to seem sometimes stereotypical, yet the centrality of hospitality to women's lives is evident in ethnographic accounts of the Arabian Peninsula. While there are important regional variations, a common thread is that hospitality is often understood in a religious frame. Extending food and drink to a guest who arrives at one's home is held to be a religious obligation incumbent upon a pious Muslim. A miserly woman (bakhila) is not only a bad person in an everyday sense, but one whose lack of generosity (karāma) will be punished in the afterlife. The offering and receiving of generous hospitality is fundamental to one's recognition in the social world; people who refuse to engage sociably with others are viewed with suspicion.

Engaging with others through the exchange of generous hospitality is a central way in which a woman maintains ties with kin, neighbors, and friends, ties that are vital to her quotidian social support. Visiting is also part of the important political work that women do for their families; through their practices of sociability, they maintain and keep viable ties between families. While visiting is, for many women on the Arabian Peninsula, a daily practice, extending and accepting hospitality is particularly important at key life cycle events, particularly birth, marriage, and death and key dates in the religious calendar. Yet while the everyday exchange of hospitality and generosity is vitally important to the production of a sense of community, it is often competitive, and indexes hierarchical relationships.

GREETINGS AND WORDS

Hospitality begins with vibrant greetings. A less than effusive greeting may be read as a snub. Verbal greetings in Zabid are accompanied by the exchange of kisses on hands, shoulders, or cheeks, varying according to the age and status of the women (Meneley 1996, 99-107). In contrast, women in the Omani village of Hamra greet with handshakes rather than kisses (Eickelman 1984, 124-5). In the Omani oasis town of Bahla, an initial greeting provides a phatic entrance to initiate the social visit. Not to exchange words in everyday conversation during social visits in Bahla would be as rude as not offering or accepting hospitality (Limbert 2002). Women's visits appear in the ethnographic literature as times of the exchange of gregarious conversation: in the Omani village of Hamra (Eickelman 1984); in the Iraqi village of al-Nahla (Fernea 1969); among the elite women of Jeddah (Altorki 1986) and the people of 'Unayzah (Altorki and Cole 1989); and in the Yemeni cities of Sana'a (vom Bruck 2002), 'Amran (Dorsky 1986) and Zabid (Meneley 1996). A notable exception is Wikan's account of Sohari women's silence during visits (1982).

ICONS OF HOSPITALITY

After greetings, guests in the Gulf and Yemen are offered refreshment, although what substance stands for appropriate hospitality varies. In Oman and the United Arab Emirates, coffee is central to hospitality; a United Arab Emirates proverb says offering coffee is considered “the aesthetic greeting of the Arabs: (tabiyat il ‘arab il fannānah)” (Kanafani 1983, 39). In the United Arab Emirates, morning or afternoon visitors are given a fuālah, a hospitality ritual that involves first offering guests fruit, sweets, and nuts, followed by coffee served in tiny cups; when the visitor has had enough, she shakes the cup sideways (Kanafani 1983, 20–3). In the Omani town of Bahla, groups of neighbors drink coffee in the morning, each woman bringing and sharing her thermos of coffee and container of dates. Together with the exchange of words, coffee and dates are digested; balancing the exchange of these items serves as a metaphor for sociality itself (Limbert 2002). In Zabid, sweetened tea or qishr, a spiced drink made from coffee husks, is brought to a guest upon her arrival. In the Yemeni cities of Sana‘a and Zabid, everyday sociability centers around chewing qāt, a leaf which contains a mild amphetamine. Hosts provide the cool, incensed water and waterpipes full of tobacco that are thought to enhance the pleasure of qāt, but guests bring their own qāt, which they often exchange with their hosts and the other guests present. In the Gulf, and parts of Yemen where women do not chew qāt, snack food, dates, and fruit tend to play a greater role in hospitality (for Oman, Eickelman 1985; for ‘Amran, Dorsky 1986). Deaths are occasions where the normal rules of hospitality are reversed. For instance, in Zabid, a staple of hospitality, sugar, is left out of the qishr during mourning visits. In the United Arab Emirates, the usual food snacks are not served in mourning visits, lest the enjoyment of the food take people’s minds from the loss (Kanafani 1983, 79).

AESTHETICS OF HOSPITALITY:
AROMAS, CLEANLINESS, AND ADORNMENT

Scents, perfumes, incenses, and flowers play a central role in hospitality all over the Gulf. In the United Arab Emirates, women take pride in making their own special blends of perfumes and incenses from scented oils and gums. The special blend of perfume that a hostess offers her guest lingers and is evaluated by those in the next house a guest visits (Kanafani 1983, 101). Omani hostesses in the village of Hamra offer their guests the fragrant herbs saffron and mahaleb with which to paint their faces (Eickelman 1984, 156), while in Bahla guests are offered an incense brazier and perfumes at the close of the visit (Limbert 2002). Zabidi hosts welcome a new bride or special guest with a string of aromatic jasmine flowers.

In the United Arab Emirates, houses should also be sweet smelling and clean (Kanafani 1983); Altorki notes that among the Jiddah elite a hostess should keep a “glittering, spotless, generous house valued by the community” (1986, 102). Just as it is a duty (wājib) for the hostess to honor the guest by being clean and well dressed, in a spotless house, it is also the duty of the guests to honor the hostess by appearing clean and nicely attired. As in so many aspects of social life in the Gulf and Yemen, the etiquette of hospitality is not separate from religious morality. Indeed, in the United Arab Emirates, the social obligation for people to be clean is understood in reference to a ḥadīth of the Prophet Muḥammad, who notes that the clean person is a considerate person (Kanafani 1983, 93).

A woman should be dressed and bejeweled according to her status; the inevitable differences in adornment index not only indicate the relative wealth of families, but gold jewelry also communicates a woman’s moral worth and her husband’s or father’s love (ḥubb). In Yemen’s capital, Sana‘a, women’s adult identities are constituted through adornment in the public sphere of tafriḥa, women’s daily afternoon visits. Despite its association with marriage, adornment is appreciated beyond its significance for sexual attraction between men and women (vom Bruck 2002). Weddings are often the apotheosis of hospitality events; hosts and guests wear their nicest finery; in Zabid, this is the time when the host family’s widest network of connections will recognize their generosity by partaking in the wedding lunch (Meneley 1996, 124–5).

There is a reciprocal effect to generosity: the host offers hospitality, but the guest must accept it properly. Not to accept what the host offers, or to appear inappropriately adorned at a formal social event is to dishonor the host. In this moral economy, prestige is garnered in the social world for generous hospitality. However, the wealthy are those who are most able to offer generous hospitality and therefore to reap the moral value perceived to redound from it, in this world and the next.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Altorki, Women in Saudi Arabia. Ideology and behavior among the elite, New York 1986.
S. Altorki and D. P. Cole, Arabian oasis city. The transformation of ‘Unayzah, Austin, Tex. 1989.
G. vom Bruck, Elusive bodies. The politics of aesthetics among Yemeni elite women, in T. Saliba, C. Allen, and

- J. Howard (eds.), Gender, politics, and Islam, Chicago 2002, 161–200.
- S. Dorsky, Women of 'Amran. A Middle Eastern ethnographic survey, Salt Lake City 1986.
- C. Eickelman, Women and community in Oman, New York 1984.
- E. Fernea, The guests of the sheik. An ethnography of an Iraqi village, New York 1969.
- A. Kanafani, Aesthetics and ritual in the United Arab Emirates, Beirut 1983.
- W. Lancaster, The Rwala Bedouin today, Cambridge 1981.
- M. Limbert, Of ties and time. Sociality, gender and modernity in an Omani town, Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 2002.
- C. Makhoul, Changing veils. Women and modernization in North Yemen, Austin, Tex. 1979.
- A. Meneley, Tournaments of value. Sociability and hierarchy in a Yemeni town, Toronto 1996.
- U. Wikan, Behind the veil in Arabia. Women in Oman, Chicago 1982.

ANNE MENELEY

Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia

Hospitality is an extremely significant part of Muslim culture. The obligation to give hospitality confers status and honor on the host. Religious gatherings, and life cycle rituals for engagements, weddings, births, and mourning all entail hospitality. Until recent decades, such occasions and even political and economic meetings took place in homes, as did visiting and socializing. People rarely ate in restaurants. Restaurant food served only the needs of travelers and working people. Some men frequent tea and coffee houses or kabābīs and simple roadside food providers. By tradition females do not go to public places. They socialize in the home, sometimes at picnics in walled orchards or relatively secluded outdoor areas, in the company of family members.

Women, responsible for maintaining homes, shoulder great responsibilities for hospitality. In light of the relatively informal structure of social institutions, personal relations have been crucial to conducting business. Building trust and personal relations requires refreshments and conviviality in a comfortable setting. The work of women in providing hospitality and thereby gaining respect, emotional attachment, and a sense of obligation thus contributes not only to the conversation and social interaction valued in itself, but also to the social connections through which economics, politics, and religion operate.

Gendered division of labor resembles gender structure elsewhere. Females in the home clean and decorate interiors and process, prepare, and serve refreshments and food. In Iran and Afghanistan, females among herding nomads and in agricultural areas milk animals and produce buttermilk, yogurt, butter, and dried yogurt. They also use wool and hair of animals to make items necessary for entertaining guests. They weave, knot, and sew rugs, kilims, tents, and cushions. Nomadic and peasant women also gather wild herbs, fruits, nuts and vegetables to set before guests. Women care for chickens. They spend hours baking thin sheets of bread, the diet staple, with rice as an important dish in better off families. Iranian and Afghan women must always be prepared to boil water in a charcoal samovar and brew tea. They cut up sugar lumps from large cones to serve with the tea. Pakistani and Indian women stew tea with milk, sugar, and spices. Iranian cuisine includes a great variety of regional dishes with subtle spicing and unique combinations. Pakistani and Indian women carefully prepare, grind, and learn how to use spices.

Excelling in cooking delicious food brings a woman respect and admiration. The pleasures of eating well prepared food according to familiar recipes is accorded great value. Women with more resources and access to wider networks of information will subtly compete to provide different preparations and many dishes to guests. Girls learn to help their mothers at an early age. Cleaning rice, legumes, and greens for cooking are time consuming activities. Nomadic and peasant women cook over wood and charcoal fires, first gathering the wood and carrying water for cooking. The women-folk of important men are especially busy cooking, and serving guests.

An important part of a wife's duty lies in serving her husband's guests to reflect well on him and his family. Given the segregated gender organization, males often visit without their wives, and the women who prepare the food are out of sight. In an earlier period and still today in more conservative homes, boys might actually bring the tea and food to seated males. Among the Pukhtun (also known as Pathan or Pushtun), better off men or families or neighborhoods arranged men's houses or separate areas within a home for receiving male visitors. In less rigidly segregated areas, women might serve tea and food to a visiting group of men discussing political or economic issues, or perhaps asking for the hand of a daughter. Being present to distribute refreshments or listening out of sight, women might learn about the proceedings of the meeting, then talk among themselves and later with the household men.

When men visit, hospitality usually assumes a higher level of formality and generosity. They are hosted in the best available room, provided with the most comfortable pillows and seating and served more refreshments. Because of women's lower status and traditional modesty, they can more easily than men drop in at a neighbor's or relative's home for a short, informal visit. Especially in better off families or when women do not work outside the home, they spend a great deal of time visiting each other's homes, giving and receiving hospitality. Failure to return visits or to attend a gathering can be interpreted as an insult. Gender segregation and the high value placed on relationships and social interaction create significant bonds between women.

In addition to informal visits, women, especially in higher class families, have many opportunities to entertain groups of women for specific purposes. Religious and kin-related gatherings provide a framework for women's segregated gatherings. Traditionally, celebrations of weddings or pilgrims returning from Mecca and mourning rituals are held separately for males and females, sometimes in different homes or at least in different rooms of a home. In mosques too women's and men's gatherings take place either at different times or in different sections. For Shī'i women these gatherings often commemorate the martyrdom of Imam Ḥusayn and his male relatives and the female hostages taken on the plains of Karbala in present day Iraq in 680 C.E. Sunnī women might host Qur'ān readings and celebrations of the birthday of the Prophet Muḥammad and other religious figures. Menfolk generally permit women to attend such events, and women can participate in religious gatherings without harming their reputations. Women who arrange such gatherings achieve a sense of accomplishment and status. The gatherings are also a source of enjoyment, food, verbal interaction, social intimacy, emotional support, and entertainment. They are opportunities to spread and gather news, as well to participate in spiritual and religious rituals.

By the early decades of the twentieth century, modernization began to have a effect on hospitality, more so in oil-rich Iran than in poorer Afghanistan and South Asia. By the 1960s and 1970s many Iranian females were attending school and working as teachers and in other employment. The nuclear family became more important than the extended family. Girls and women busy with education and work were not as available to provide hospitality. It became increasingly expensive to maintain maids, who had often been poor little girls or perhaps women from rural areas. Even in poorer Afghanistan, Pakistan, and India, middle- and upper-class females were increasingly occupied with education and work and less available for home and hospitality work, despite the fact that families expected them to put the honor and interests of the family ahead of their own pursuits. Especially in Iran, with more people working in the modern sector and fast moving modernization, social gatherings in the upper-middle and higher classes became integrated. People began to entertain outside the home. Increasingly, rituals and life cycle commemorations were held in public spaces, with purchased catering and service. Although the strong pressure to drop everything to serve a guest remains, a few women find ways to evade the heavy responsibilities of hospitality. For example, a young woman might inform her visiting mother-in-law that she has a commitment to go elsewhere. Many women have become active in mosque gatherings. Places of employment may have halls available to employees for reasonable cost.

After the Iranian Revolution of 1979 and the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran, which emphasizes female modesty and segregation, the government attempted to reimpose gender segregation. Women's segregated religious gatherings in homes and religious buildings became more frequent. Among women in Afghanistan and South Asia, modernization has been much slower than in Iran, and women participate in schooling and work in professions in smaller numbers. But hosting women's religious gatherings and segregated life cycle rituals continue to be significant in women's social lives. Afghan females – refugees or victims of the war with the Soviet Union, internal fighting, and finally Taliban control – often found movement beyond the segregated home area severely restricted. Visiting and providing hospitality became more difficult. Some brave Afghan women attempted to secretly create schools for girls in their homes during the Taliban period. Some Iranian women meet at each other's homes to hold reading and study groups and strategize to improve women's lives under the gender restrictions of the republic.

Hospitality in Iran, Afghanistan, and South Asia continues to be significant for women and men alike in spite of restrictive government, warfare, work and study responsibilities, and economic constraints. The desire to provide hospitality, to treat the guest as God's beloved remains a main definition of a woman's reputation. Women who seek education, jobs and careers, and a larger circle of friends and associates and activities may find it difficult to balance hospitality demands and their own aims and interests. Whether they provide hospitality for their menfolk's guests or their female guests, the great majority of women still feel gratification and acquire status through their skill in tending to the comfort of guests.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Ali, Madras on rainy days, New York 2004.
- F. Barth, Political leadership among Swat Pathans, London 1986.
- M. Behnam, Zelzelah. A woman before her time, London 1994.
- A. Betteridge, The controversial vows of urban Muslim women in Iran, in N. A. Falk and R. M. Gross (eds.), Unspoken worlds. Women's religious lives, Belmont, Calif. 1989, 102–11.
- V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin, Tex. 1988.
- T. Durrani with W. and M. Hoffer, My feudal lord, London 1994.
- Z. Eglar, A Punjabi village in Pakistan, New York 1960.
- H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, London 2002.
- S. Farman-Farmaian, Daughter of Persia. A woman's journey from her father's harem through the Islamic Revolution, New York 1992.
- E. Friedl, Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, New York 1991.
- , The dynamics of women's spheres of action in rural Iran, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn 1991, 195–214.
- , Sources of female power in Iran, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), In the eye of the storm. Women in post-revolutionary Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 1994, 151–67.
- , Children of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, Syracuse, N.Y. 1997.
- B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxtun women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
- S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1988.
- S. Haeri, No shame for the sun. Lives of professional Pakistani women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
- M. E. Hegland, Political roles of Aliabad women. The public-private dichotomy transcended, in N. R. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 215–30.
- , The power paradox in Muslim women's majales. North-West Pakistani mourning rituals as sites of contestation over religious politics, ethnicity, and gender, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 23 (1998), 391–428.
- J. Howard, Inside Iran. Women's lives, Washington, D.C. 2002.
- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, London 1989.
- Z. Kamalkhani, Women's Islam. Religious practice among women in today's Iran, London 1997.
- M. Kousha, Voices from Iran, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities, New Delhi 1990.
- C. Lindholm, Generosity and jealousy. The Swat Pukhtun of Northern Pakistan, New York 1982.
- A. Nafisi, Reading Lolita in Tehran, New York 2003.
- P. Omidian, Aging and family in an Afghan refugee community. Transitions and transformation, New York 1996.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- N. Rahat, The role of women in reciprocal relationships in a Punjab village, in T. S. Epstein and R. A. Watts (eds.), The endless day. Some case material on Asian rural women, Oxford 1981, 47–81.
- A. Rauf, Rural women and the family. A study of a Punjabi village in Pakistan, in Journal of Comparative Family Studies 18 (1987), 403–15.
- V. J. Schubel, Religious performance in contemporary Islam. Shī'i devotional rituals in South Asia, Columbia, S.C. 1993.
- F. Shaheed, Controlled or autonomous. Identity and the experience of the network, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 19 (1994), 997–1019.
- Y. Suzuki, Negotiations, concessions, and adaptation during fieldwork in a tribal society, in E. Friedl and M. E. Hegland (eds.), Iranian Studies. Special issue on ethnographic fieldwork 37:4 (forthcoming).
- N. Tapper (Lindisfarne), The women's subsociety among the Shahsevan nomads of Iran, in L. Beck and N. R. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 374–98.
- , Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
- A. Torab, The politicization of women's religious circles in post-revolutionary Iran, in S. Ansari and V. Martin (eds.), Women, religion, and culture in Iran, London 2002, 143–68.
- A. M. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life histories of working women in the old city of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992.
- S. Wright, Prattle and politics. The position of women in Dushman-Ziari, in Anthropological Society of Oxford Journal 9 (1978), 98–112.

MARY ELAINE HEGLAND

North Africa

Although the Arab and Muslim cultural tradition of generous hospitality has long been recognized in literature on the Middle East and North Africa, the gendered nature of serving and attending to guests and the central role that North African women play in maintaining the family's status through their hospitality rituals has only recently received significant scholarly attention. Arab and Beduin traditions of generously providing food, drink, and accommodation to parched and lost visitors are documented in travelers' reports to the region as long ago as the Roman era, and even earlier. Such hospitality was not merely customary generosity, however, but a critical component of survival in nomadic society. Should members of the tribe become lost or injured in the harsh desert, they could count upon the hospitality of a nearby group to nurse them back to health. With the arrival of Islam, Arab values of generosity and hospitality became incorporated into religious tradition. Numerous verses in the Qur'an, such as Sura 107 (al-Mā'ūn, Neighborly Assistance), as well as various ḥadīth emphasize the importance of generously sharing one's wealth, food, and possessions with guests, the needy, and the community.

As Arab culture and Islam spread – first to the cities of the Arabian Peninsula and then throughout the Middle East and North Africa – lavish hospitality became not merely a form of aid to travelers but a symbol of the status, wealth, and honor of the host as well as his guest. At the height of the Islamic empire, travelers' accounts of the sumptuous tables, beautiful serving girls, and lavish entertainment provided in the palaces of various sultans and caliphs were legendary, continuing to this day in folklore, fables, and fairy tales such as the Thousand and One Nights.

In North Africa today, the tradition of offering guests the finest and most choice dishes, while patiently catering to all their needs for hours, or even days, continues to be a central matter of family pride and honor. Indeed, after an important visit or a special celebration such as a wedding or circumcision, the central topic of discussion in the community is invariably the expense and quality of the food, drink, and entertainment provided to the guests. Given that the most highly prized dishes typically require the most expensive ingredients (such as meat, nuts, or honey) and demand many hours of preparation, a special event, such as a wedding, can pose an intense economic and practical burden, particularly upon the poorer households of the community. Few things are a more humiliating slur to a family's honor and prestige than rumors that the hosts were rude, the food and drink poorly prepared and, worst offense of all, the guests were sent away early, hungry, tired, or mistreated. Hence it is not unknown for a household to almost bankrupt itself for an important guest or event, preferring to offer the family's only piece of meat or to prepare an expensive array of dishes to an honored guest rather than be perceived as stingy or inhospitable.

Although men will outwardly play the role of host to male guests, the preparation and serving of food and drink is primarily a woman's responsibility. Thus much of the burden of hospitality and demonstration of the family's honor falls directly on the women of the household. This largely unrecognized form of female labor for the household is defined by Papanek (1979) as "family status production": those activities that define and maintain the status and position of the family within the community.

Given that hospitality is primarily "women's work," households without women, or lacking adequate female labor, typically rely on an extended network of female relatives, friends, and neighbors to assist in social obligations. Thus single and widowed men commonly live with or near female relatives who can step in to serve guests when necessary. Likewise women without daughters or other females in the home will frequently call upon nearby female kin and neighbors to assist in providing missing ingredients, and preparing and serving food should an unexpected or important guest arrive. Major life cycle events such as weddings and circumcisions typically involve numerous generations of female kin working together to create a successful celebration.

Interestingly, despite the increasing entry of women into the workforce in North Africa, the time demands and expense of hospitality appear to have increased rather than waned. Working women often lead frantic lives in which their weekends are devoted to visiting, not only relatives, but now also work colleagues and former schoolmates. Frequently, women's added income is used to increase their ability to be a good hostess: paying for luxury goods (such as refrigerators, microwaves, and expensive foods) and services (such as maids and catering).

This conspicuous social consumption appears to result, in part, from the North African expectation that hospitality is a reciprocal relationship. While the quality and expense of food served does reflect upon the status of the host's household, it also indicates the status of the guest. To pay a visit to someone is to confer an honor: the higher the status of the guest, the higher the honor bestowed upon the host. With the exception of clearly unequal households (such as patron-client relationships), the honor of visiting is expected to be returned within a reasonable period of time, along with the understanding that an equivalent or more lavish spread will be offered. As a result, visits are generally made between households of similar status and wealth. Thus an upwardly mobile family will frequently seek to expand their visiting network by demonstrating their wealth through more extravagant hospitality.

Perhaps the most obvious indicator of the prestige of the guest, and correspondingly, the social importance of the visit is reflected in the North African tea ceremony. Regardless of the occasion, a sweet infusion of tea is expected to be offered at all visits: the status and importance of the visitor and host are reflected in the kinds of nuts and ingredients added to the tea, along with the quality of the tea leaves. Typically the serving of tea with very expensive nuts such as pine nuts indicates a very wealthy family and important visitor. Cheaper ingredients such as peanuts or mint indicate a less formal event or a poorer family.

Yet regardless of the status and wealth of the family, throughout North Africa hospitality continues to represent an important cultural value, the implementation of which is women's work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Abu-Lughod, Writing women's worlds. Bedouin stories, Berkeley 1993.
- R. Bourquia, M. Charrad, and N. Gallagher (eds.), Femmes, culture et société au Maghreb, Casablanca 1996.
- S. S. Davis, Patience and power. Women's lives in a Moroccan village, Bloomington, Ind. 1983.
- P. Holmes-Eber, Daughters of Tunis. Women, family and networks in a Muslim city, Boulder, Colo. 2002.
- A. S. Kanafani, Rites of hospitality and aesthetics, in D. L. Bowen and E. A. Early (eds.), Everyday life in the Muslim world, Bloomington, Ind. 1993, 128–35.
- H. Papanek, Family status production. The “work” and “non-work” of women, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 4:4 (1979), 775–81.

PAULA HOLMES-EBER

Turkey and the Caucasus

Three factors have played important roles in the social institution of hospitality in Turkey and the Caucasus. These factors are gender, age, and social status within the context of the Islamic culture and the non-Islamic layer of tradition (‘āda, common practice).

Traditional culture is conventionally represented in familial and social everyday life by four basic tenets: reverence to older people, respect for women, mutual assistance, and hospitality.

The tradition of hospitality emerged long ago and it still exists, though in a somewhat altered state. There are certain rules of hospitality. The attitude toward guests has varied and still does, but the reasons for treating guests differently have changed. For example, the Adygs who lived in the Northwest Caucasus used certain criteria to define the level of “honorability” of the guest, such as how far the guest had to travel to get there, the social status of the guest in comparison with the social status of the host, the goals of the visit, special personal traits (talents or achievements) of the guest, his age, and the kind of kinship or camaraderie between the guest and the host. The way hospitality was conducted depended upon all these factors.

When the guest came, the partition of the house into male (selamlık) and female (harem) parts became of special importance. The guests were met in the kunatskaya (guesthouse, from kunak, comrade) or in the male half of the house. The kunatskaya is a part of the social (male) space in Turkey and the Caucasus. That is why the chief role in meeting the guests is played by the man, the head of the family.

Feasts in Turkey and the Caucasus have always been conducted according to principles of seniority and gender differentiation. When the guest came into the house, women had to go to their rooms. Women played attendant roles in hospitality: they cooked and helped with arranging of the hand-washing and sleeping arrangements. In the Caucasus since the second half of the nineteenth century young women have been allowed to enter the kunatskaya and attend to the guests during the meal. Sometimes the oldest woman in the family helped to wash the hands of the most honorable guests, but usually she only came into the kunatskaya to greet and welcome the guests. Women had the right to participate only in meeting the most honorable guests. The latter could even be invited to the female half of the house, as a sign of special honor. In former times, the guests were usually men. If the guest were a woman, she might be met in the female half of the house.

Under certain circumstances a woman also could be seen as a distinguished guest. In hierarchical Caucasian societies reception depended on the social status of the guest, his wife, and the host; for instance, a prince and his wife were always given a grand welcome. The wife of the clan leader or family head, or a woman with extraordinary talents (for instance, a medicine woman, a witch, or a woman who read or spoke Arabic) were also considered distinguished guests. At a party such a guest would have the prime seat and be accorded all the honors.

Hospitality in Turkey and the Caucasus has lost much of its peculiarities and functions, in particular the function of communication. In a sense the institution is preserved as a symbol and attribute of ethnic identity and has acquired a hue of purposeful display. Recently the number of female guests has grown sharply and receptions for men and women have become similar. Still, women's status and role have not seen much change: male guests are entertained by the host and the hostess does not take part in male receptions. When a mixed group comes, the hostess can join them for a meal if the host or one of the guests requests it; under very rare circumstances girls are allowed to attend.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(all works cited are in Russian)

- I. L. Babich, Folk traditions in the social life of Kabardians, Moscow 1995.
- B. H. Bgazhnokov, The etiquette of Adygs, Nalchik 1978.
- J. V. Chesnov, Women and the ethics of the Chechen's life, in Ethnographic Review (Moscow) 5 (1994).
- D. E. Ereemeev, The women of Turkey and traditions, in Peoples of Asia and Africa (Moscow) 3:4 (1978).
- , Between Asia and Europe. Essay on Turkey and the Turkish woman and man, Moscow 1980.
- U. U. Karpov, Female space in the culture of the Caucasian peoples, St. Petersburg 2001.

- A. I. Musucaev, The traditional hospitality of Kabardians and Balkarians, Nalchik 1990.
- M. N. Serebrjakova, A few aspects of ethnoetiquette among modern Turkish women and men, in Etiquette among the peoples of Middle East Asia, Moscow 1988.
- G. A. Sergeeva, The status of women in Daghestan, in Caucasian Ethnographic Collection (Moscow) 4 (1969).
- J. S. Smirnova, The status of the elder women of the Caucasian peoples and their historical interpretation, in Caucasian Ethnographic Collection (Moscow) 8 (1984).

IRINA BABICH

Household Division of Labor

Central Asia

The status of family in Central Asia has always been very high. A family with many children is a symbol of wealth and prosperity; it is also a role model to respect and follow. In the Central Asian context, marriage is more than a union of two loving individuals – it is an important alliance, linking wider kinship networks. Family, being a reproductive unit, also serves as a survival mechanism, helping to cope with socioeconomic and political problems, at times of both crisis and peace, by providing relatives with mutual support and help.

The traditional extended family is predominant in Central Asia and usually represents a household with three generations (parents, married sons, and their children) living together. Big households are particularly common in rural areas where the majority of population lives (more than 60 percent in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan). The region is marked by high birth rates, especially in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan where, despite some decline in the early 1990s, population growth still remains the highest compared to other parts of the former Soviet Union.

Usually associated with a high level of consolidation, integrity, and solidarity of family members, at the same time big families are marked by strict regulations and strong gender-age hierarchy. Such traditional families are rarely open to change, and are an ideal instrument for passing traditional and religious values from older to younger generations. In turn, it is traditions and customs that give strength to these families. Sovietization of Central Asian society in the twentieth century aimed to uproot the pillars of the patriarchal family based on Islamic and traditional values, but its basic principles survived despite the revolutionary changes that occurred in other spheres of society. The relentless methods used by the Soviet regime to transform Central Asian societies in the 1920s and 1930s forced local culture and traditions inside family life, creating two parallel systems of values. Thus, newly imposed ideology could not succeed in eradicating traditional views and attitudes that continue to endure.

Gender roles and responsibilities in traditional families are predetermined and leave little space for informed choice or decision. Men are considered breadwinners and women mothers or “hearth guardians,” with deviations from socially prescribed roles not easily accepted by public perceptions. Marriage is patrilocal, and a couple moves to the house of the husband’s father, where the young dutiful bride is expected to do all domestic work, taking care of her husband, his parents, and unmarried brothers and sisters. According to custom, the newly married young woman occupies the lowest rank in a family hierarchy under the supervision of her mother-in-law and is exploited for her domestic labor – until she establishes herself by giving birth to sons. In the meantime, her numerous responsibilities include cleaning, washing, cooking, and other services, all performed with demonstration of respect and obedience to her parents-in-law. In rural areas, domestic chores also include work in plots of land adjoining the house, for food for family consumption, and often milking a cow. But even in smaller nuclear families more typical of the urban environment, women have a multitude of responsibilities ranging between paid and unpaid, productive and reproductive activities.

The realities of the Soviet period and the current transition from centrally planned to free market economy could not leave gender roles completely unchanged. It is now not only culturally accepted that women participate in the labor force and contribute to the family budget, but given the current downturn in the region’s economy, families would not survive otherwise. However, it is men who continue to be considered and treated as head of the family.

In big households with extended families, the survival strategies dictate that women share their responsibilities, as in addition to numerous tasks they already have in both paid and unpaid work, women contribute to community level activities. This presumes more service-oriented work that includes (but is not limited to) preparation of special food for numerous weddings, funerals, and other traditional rituals involving large numbers of people. These tasks take the entire time and income of women, leaving no opportunity for them for self-improvement, personal development, or recreation. The biggest burden falls, however, on rural women, where lack of facilities (gasification, safe water, services such as health care, and the like) as well as bigger families, stronger traditional perceptions, and growing poverty, make life particularly hard.

The transition from centrally planned to free market economy has left many men in Central Asia out of work, with accompanying depression, alcoholism, and drug addiction that aggravate the problem. A disproportionate burden of domestic and community-based unpaid work placed on women and the high pressures placed on men as breadwinners turn families into sources of stress and tension, posing a serious threat to women. Studies conducted with the support of international agencies over the last decade show that domestic violence is common in the region, as the subservient role of women in the traditional environment makes them particularly vulnerable. Women's suicide may take a form of self-immolation. This act of desperation is typical of sedentary rural areas. In Uzbekistan, the first ever officially announced figure of female self-immolation was as high as 270 in 1986/7 (Alimova 1991). Due to lack of information, it is not possible to provide current figures, but according to some estimates the dynamics show an increase over the last decade.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- D. Alimova, Women's issues in Central Asia. A history of studies and current problems [in Russian], Tashkent 1991.
- M. Bikjanova, Family in kolkhoses of Uzbekistan [in Russian], Tashkent 1959.
- D. Kandiyoti, Women and social policy, in K. Griffin (ed.), Social policy and economic transformation in Uzbekistan, Tashkent 1995, 129-47.
- S. Poliakov, Everyday Islam. Religion and tradition in rural Central Asia, New York 1992.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, Tashkent 2000.
- UNICEF, Societies in transition. A situation analysis of the status of children and women in the Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan 2000, Almaty 2000.
- , Women in transition, Florence 1999.

DONO ABDURAZAKOVA

Iran and Afghanistan

Important variables are the local gender philosophy and ideology; class, linked to modernization; and different labor demands in urban and rural life.

Popular gender ideology, supported (but not created) by Islam, endows men with bodily and moral strength and leadership qualities and women with frailty, empathy, and a natural inclination toward nurturing, care of husband, children, and house. In traditional families girls acquire appropriate skills as apprentice helpers to women in their father's or in-laws' house. Domestic labor is organized less by skills than social position: senior women (head women in Afghanistan) delegate work to junior women and girls. The more cooperative young, healthy women there are in a household, the better for all. A daughterless mother is pitied for her lack of help. Girls learn to work early; boys have no obligations in the house save to obey and serve elder men. Although belittled, women's work creates self worth and a small power base for women.

The more traditional a household is, the more will men and women be interdependent labor-wise, but unequally so: men demand services from women and children rather than render them. The male household head has to provide all means, including the house, by which the women can fulfill their duties; he has to keep the house repaired, supervise the household generally and represent it to the outside, and discipline/educate children, especially sons. Men are not responsible for housework and avoid it as demeaning, although most can cook simple dishes and prestige food such as kebab and can take care of children temporarily. Modern young men occasionally wash, even iron, their own clothes. A widow heading a household will likely take on male responsibilities (management, breadwinning, male chores) in addition to her female duties while a widower will remarry soon to get housework done. Shopping is a male responsibility, especially if it involves travel, but with great variations by location and class: in Afghanistan today women are less likely to be seen in the street for any purpose than in Iran; a middle-class woman is more likely to insist on choosing her clothes herself than a poor and uneducated one; rural and lower-class women have some cash for small purchases from itinerant vendors; among nomads women work in the open.

Household chores reflect the socioeconomic standing of the household. In wealthy, large houses, social obligations make time-consuming preparations of a variety of foods and the upkeep of clothes and furnishings a full-time chore for many hands while in poor households, baking or buying bread and some vegetables, hauling water, sweeping floors, brewing tea, cooking a simple dish, and washing pots and clothes constitute housekeeping. Most Iranian middle-class households now have indoor plumbing, a gas range, refrigerator, vacuum cleaner, meat grinder, rice cooker, and television set. Men buy appliances (often in fulfillment of marriage contracts) and keep them repaired; women use them. Men buy, drive, and maintain cars, but in Iran an increasing number of women drive as well. In Afghanistan household amenities are rare, especially in rural areas, and more women thus have to fetch water, wash, and cook unaided. Everywhere, women manage kinship networks. In middle-class families they elaborately care for and supervise children, especially in Iran. In well-appointed households with few children or where servants or several women share the work, women are under-employed and spend their time with embroidery (clothes, pillows, draperies), knitting, socializing (in Iran), and preparing hope chests for unmarried girls in the house (especially in Afghanistan.) In Iran women everywhere now aim for diversion and income-creating skills by taking courses where offered (literacy, cooking, languages, computers, make-up, sewing, even exercise.)

Among working women the double shift of job and housework is the norm, with few exceptions. For men home is the place to relax. Wherever women work at home on income-creating projects (spinning, weaving, embroidery, sewing, beadwork, stitching of cotton-yarn shoes), men market these goods, and the male household head usually controls this income like any other. There are exceptions, though: a traditional, pious father (husband) may refuse to touch his daughters' (wife's) money and will not allow it to be spent on anything he ought to provide (such as clothes); and working middle-class women increasingly demand and retain control over their income, especially in Iran.

In rural areas and nomadic camps women have many more chores of vital importance to the family's economy; again, their labor is less gender-restricted than is men's. Men are responsible for animals, fields, the upkeep of the family, and representation, but women provide help ranging from entertaining guests to collecting wild vegetables and berries, getting grass for cows, herding young animals, fetching and holding sheep and goats (by young girls) at milking, to hoeing, weeding, planting rice seedlings, harvesting legumes, sapping poppies, binding sheaves, picking fruit, and carrying things. Men herd, water, shear, market, and butcher animals. Women care for and control poultry. In pre-Islamic Nuristan (Afghanistan) goats were linked to the realm of fairies, too pure to be touched by women. Everywhere else women milk animals and process milk and wool. In Afghanistan felt rugs are made by women, in Iran mostly by male itinerant felt makers. The heaviest tasks for rural/ nomadic women are hauling water (traditionally in goatskin bags carried on the hip), handling heavy household goods including heavy tent planes and beams while pitching and razing tents, and carrying children and wooden cradles on the back. (In Iran, households increasingly are transported by trucks.) Collecting and lugging firewood and the transport of grain sheaves to threshing areas in some parts of rural Iran and Afghanistan are women's back-breaking tasks, as they were in the past. Women complain about these chores. In the absence of radical changes in rural women's work and in the gender division of labor generally, the relative leisure of urban lifestyles is becoming increasingly attractive to women. At present, women in rapidly modernizing, relatively wealthy Iran have better chances of attaining urban labor patterns than women in deprived Afghanistan.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Beck, Women among Qashqa'i nomadic pastoralists in Iran, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 351-73.
- D. Bradburd, Ambiguous relations. Kin, class, and conflict among Komachi pastoralists, Washington, D.C. 1990.
- V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin 1988.
- S. Farman-Farmaian, Daughter of Persia, New York 1992.
- E. Friedl, Women and the division of labor in an Iranian village, in Middle East Report 95 (1981), 12-18.
- , Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, Washington, D.C. 1989.
- B. Glatzer, Nomaden von Gharjistan, Wiesbaden 1977.
- B. Grima, The performance of emotion among Paxtun women, Austin, Tex. 1992.
- H. Hansen, The Kurdish woman's life, Copenhagen 1961.
- M. E. Hegland, Political roles of Aliabad women. The public-private dichotomy transcended, in N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 215-30.
- W. Maggi, Our women are free. Gender and ethnicity in the Hindukush, Ann Arbor 2001.
- G. S. Robertson, The kafirs of the Hindu-Kush, London 1896.
- N. Tapper, Bartered brides. Politics, gender and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
- B. Tavakolian, Sheikhanzai women. Sisters, mothers and wives, in Ethnos 52 (1987), 180-99.

ERIKA LOEFFLER FRIEDL

South Asia

South Asia represents considerable cultural, religious, ethnic, and linguistic diversity that is reflected in domestic and cultural life. The lives of Muslim women are as diverse across South Asia as the lives of Hindu and Christian women. These differences influence women's participation in paid work but their implications for gendering of work within the home is less evident. Regional diversity can be characterized by a general northwest/south split and in some indicators the east has distinctive features as well (Dyson and Moore 1983). Women in the south fare better in education and survival than women in the north, although even in the south women have relatively low autonomy and mobility compared to the rest of the world.

According to the Demographic and Health Surveys (Table 1), women's education and workforce participation, as measured by mean years of education and percentage of all women who report working for a salary, vary regionally for Hindu and Muslim women alike. In general, within most states Muslim women have lower education and considerably less work participation than Hindu women. However, in two of the largest states of the south, Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh, Muslim women have higher education than Hindu women and Muslim women's education and workforce participation in the southern states are higher than those of Hindu women in the north or the east.

In Bangladesh, Hindu women have higher education and workforce participation than Muslim women. These levels and religious differentials are similar to the states of India that surround Bangladesh, specifically those of West Bengal. Overall levels of educational attainment are low everywhere in Pakistan but there is a range in the levels of workforce participation among Muslim women. The proportion of Hindus in Pakistan is negligible and it is not possible to estimate rates from national surveys. As with Bangladesh and areas of India surrounding it, perhaps more striking than the variation within Pakistan is the similarity with contiguous regions across the border – Muslim women in both Punjab (India and Pakistan) have exactly the same workforce participation rate of 13 percent. Sindh and Balochistan have somewhat higher rates than Punjab and levels are similar to the neighboring region of Rajasthan.

Table 1: Mean years of education and percentage of women working for salary by religion and state, ever-married women, Bangladesh (1996–7), India (1998–9), Pakistan (1990–1)

	Average Years of Education		% Working for Salary
	Hindu	Muslim	Hindu	Muslim
Bangladesh	5	3	44	19
India, East
Assam	4.0	2.4	22	10
Bihar	2.0	1.0	19	15
Manipur	5.9	2.5	54	13
Meghalaya	2.9	1.2	30	–
Mizoram	3.2	5.3	22	33
Nagaland	2.7	0.9	34	27
Orissa	2.9	2.5	26	17
Sikkim	3.7	4.2	19	13
West Bengal	4.1	2.2	27	17
Arunachalpradesh	3.9	1.7	16	11
Tripura	5.0	2.6	19	15
India, North
Gujarat	4.3	4.3	33	20
Haryana	4.0	0.8	10	3
Himachal Pradesh	5.2	2.5	9	9
Jammu	3.9	1.8	10	15
Madhya Pradesh	2.5	3.2	33	20
Punjab	6.1	2.2	11	13
Rajasthan	2.0	1.2	15	19
Uttar Pradesh	2.7	1.8	11	10
New Delhi	7.5	3.6	20	11
India, South
Andhra Pradesh	2.8	3.8	46	19
Goa	6.1	4.4	33	22
Karnataka	4.0	3.2	38	35
Kerala	8.3	6.4	31	8
Maharashtra	4.6	4.8	38	19
Tamil Nadu	4.4	5.3	46	23
Pakistan
Punjab	–	2	–	13
Sindh	–	2	–	17
NWFP	–	1	–	3
Balochistan	–	0	–	19

Source: author's calculations from Demographic and Health Surveys, Bangladesh, 1996–7, India 1998–9, Pakistan 1990–1.

Much less is known about division of labor within the household and variations regionally. A study of time use data collected in six states in India (Table 2) shows that, regardless of region, women in India bear all of the responsibility for domestic work – men account for less than 5 percent of all domestic or care-giving activities (Narasimhan and Panday 2000). Women's time in productive work also does not vary systematically by regions represented by the six states. The only indicator of variation across states is that women in the northern states of Haryana and Gujarat are far less likely to be paid for work while women in the southern state of Tamil Nadu are more likely to be paid for productive work and also have the lowest number of hours spent in such work.

Table 2: Average number of hours per week by type of activity, rural areas in six states, 1998–9

State	Women's Domestic Work	Women's Productive Work	% of Women's Productive Work Unpaid
Haryana, North	23.5	30.7	86
Madhya Pradesh, North	23.0	35.5	52
Gujarat, North	24.0	37.5	45
Orissa, East	19.0	35.3	69
Tamil Nadu, South	23.5	29.5	33
Meghalaya, East	29.0	34.5	76

Source: Narasimhan and Panday 2000.

Time use data are seldom found disaggregated by religion. A survey of married adolescents in Bangladesh showed that Hindu and Muslim women do not differ much in the average hours of time spent in domestic work versus productive work (6.35 hours for Muslim women compared to 6.73 hours for Hindu women) (data from Amin, adolescent survey, 2001).

Table 3 shows detailed daily time accounts from rural women living in agricultural households in Bangladesh, West Bengal, and Rajasthan. The table shows that there is more similarity in time use pattern by region than by religion. Surveys conducted among Bengali women in Hindu and Muslim villages in India and Bangladesh showed they had similar patterns of work. The main contrast shown in the table is that women in Rajasthan spend an average of three hours a day in crop production related activities and thus have longer hours of work overall. By contrast women in Bengal spend less than half an hour in crop production.

Table 3: Average hours worked per day in various tasks by rural women in four studies in India and Bangladesh

Activities	Mohanpur, Bangladesh 1991	West Bengal, India 1976	Char Gopalpur, Bangladesh 1976	Rajasthan, North India 1976
Dominant Religion	Muslim	Hindu	Muslim	Hindu
Crop Production	0.22	0.56	0.28	3.03
Wage Work	0.15	0.13	0.49	0.03
Animal Care and Other
Non-Domestic	0.86	0.52	0.56	0.61
Rice Processing	0.30	0.26	1.29	0.21
Childcare	0.32	0.32	0.80	0.91
Handicrafts	0.27	0.36	0.28	0.03
Fuel Collection	0.81	0.36	0.36	0.55
Food Prep/Housework	4.35	5.12	4.24	3.64
Total Hours Worked	7.32	7.82	7.81	9.01
Persons Observed	215	381	174	189

Source: Amin 1997.

Muslim influence is frequently invoked to explain the relatively low status of women in the north but there is little evidence to support a causal influence. While it is true that Mughal influence is more evident in the north relative to the south or the east in terms of music, art, architecture, and cuisine, it appears not to extend to the treatment of women (Morgan et al. 2002, Jejeebhoy and Sathar 2001). Indeed, there is strong numerical dominance of Muslims in Sri Lanka, Kerala, and Karnataka, three states where women's status indicators are most favorable.

Dyson and Moore (1983) suggest that regional variation in women's autonomy is related to kinship systems of patrilineality and exogamous marriage that differ systematically between the north and south and influence all religious groups. These differences result in women in the south being more active outside the home while the pattern in the north is one of confinement to the home with women having very limited mobility. These underlying differences are importantly associated with gendered notions of public space.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Amin, The poverty-purdah trap in rural Bangladesh. Implications for women's roles in the family, in Development and Change 28:2 (1997), 213-33.
- Demographic and Health Surveys, <<http://www.measuredhs.com/>>.
- T. Dyson and M. Moore, On kinship structure, female autonomy, and demographic behavior in India, in Population and Development Review 9:1 (1983), 35-60.
- S. Jejeebhoy and Z. Sathar, Women's autonomy in India and Pakistan. The influence of religion and region, in Population and Development Review 27:4 (2001), 687-712.
- S. P. Morgan et al., On Muslim and non-Muslim differences in female autonomy and fertility, in Population and Development Review 28:3 (2002), 515-38.
- R. L. Narasimhan and R. N. Pandey, Some main results of the pilot time use survey in India and their main policy implications, 2000, <www.unescap.org/stat/meet/timeuse/Programme.htm>.

SAJEDA AMIN

Southeast Asia

ISLAMIC TEACHINGS ON GENDER ROLES

The conjugal relationship is marked by rights and duties since Muslim marriage is a contract. By Islamic law, a man is contractually obliged to provide lodging, clothing, food, and general care for his wife according to his means: "Lodge them where you are lodging, according to your means, and do not press them, so as to straiten their circumstances . . . Let the man of plenty expend out of his plenty. As for him whose provision is stinted for him, let him expend of what God has given him. God charges no one beyond his means. After difficulty, God will soon grant relief" (Qur'an 65: 5-6, as cited in Ali 1977, 150). The rationale for a man's role as provider stems from the notion that he is head of the family: "Men are the protectors and maintainers of women, because God has made some of them to excel others, and because they support them from their means (Qur'an 4: 34, as cited in Khan 1995, 82).

Should a man fail in his obligation (nafaqa), his wife has the right to initiate a divorce. In the same vein, the wife is bound by law to contribute to the success and blissfulness of the marriage. Her role includes managing the affairs of the household by meeting her husband's needs, nurturing the children, and protecting the family property and name (Ali 1977, 168-9), as shown by this Qur'anic verse: "The woman is the guardian of her husband's home and she is accountable for it" (Bukhari, Ṣaḥīḥ, as cited in Khan 1995, 89).

Although tutoring the children in religious matters is regarded as a joint responsibility, the wife may adopt a leading role (Roberts 1982, 116), assuming she spends more time at home. A Muslim woman also understands that her husband has been granted authority over her and that she is obliged to obey him, failing which the division of labor in the family is said to be meaningless (Khan 1995, 86). Hence, it is the duty of men to support women, implying that women need not work but rather focus on the affairs of the household.

Although the wife is expected to manage the hearth, she is not obliged to take on the role of food provider; instead this task is regarded the marital obligation of the husband who either carries out the role himself or employs a cook. In the event a man cannot afford to employ a cook, and his wife decides to take on this task out of willingness (sadaqa), she stands to gain religious merit (pahala) for this gracious act.

CULTURAL NOTIONS OF MEN'S AND WOMEN'S ROLES

In spite of Islamic teachings on gender roles in the family, indigenous cultural ideologies persist across Southeast Asia. Among Malays, tradition (adat) dictates that women oversee the private domain and its activities, while men dominate public activities. In rural Malaysia, a striking gender division of labor is evident in families where women manage the household, in contrast to men who were said to have had "other things to do" (Firth 1966, 24-5, Laderman 1984). Carsten (1987, 154) found a similar separation of gender roles in Langkawi with Malay women fostering kinship bonds within and beyond the family. Men who were absent from the house for a substantial part of the day were found engaged in fishing, and activities in the local surau (mosque) and village politics, and were frequently seen in the village coffee-shops (Carsten 1995, 111).

But Southeast Asian women are not entirely indifferent to engagement in the economic sphere to supplement the household budget. Many are active in income-generating activities, as were their sisters in precolonial Southeast Asia (Reid 1988, 634–5). Wealthier women of Lampung engage in petty trade, although this is always home-based rather than market-based (Elmhirst 2000). Among the coastal fishing households of Sabah, women operate small shops or engage in cottage industries to supplement the family income (Schulze and Suratman 1999, 73–87). In the Muslim fishing communities of Thailand, women are actively involved in the sale of seafood produce in the markets, which they buy from fishermen (Dorairajoo 2002). In the village of Kelantan, the bulk of the cutting of the rice grain is the women's task, while threshing is done by men (Yoshihiro 2001, 24).

Although women may partner men in the role of breadwinner, the home and family are clearly female domains. Some scholars have argued that this division of labor persists because of widespread acceptance of the nature of the sexes, which governs men's and women's self expectations and social behavior (Brenner 1995). Brenner's ethnographic explorations in Solo, central Java amongst the merchant community, revealed that women believe "they have a naturally stronger bond with their offspring than their husbands do, which leads them to take the burden of securing their descendants' futures more heavily on their own shoulders" (ibid., 36). Exceptions may be unmarried daughters who return home from a hard day's work in wage employment. In a barangay in Darangen city in central Mindanao, young working daughters are exempted from household chores, which are carried out by the other women residing in the same household (Hilsdon 2003). Here, the practice of veiling meant that married women were most likely to remain in the home executing the household labor, while men sought after wage employment to maintain the household, thus spending more time outside the home.

Given that women manage the hearth, they also act as managers of the household finances. Whether the husband (father) or children work, cash is always handed over to the wife (mother) for the expenses of the household in Lampung (Elmhirst 2000). Although women retain the money, decisions as to how it is spent may be jointly made by a couple, as was found in central Java (Hull 1975, as cited in Wolf 2000). The Islamic teaching that men are ascribed the role of providers is clearly seen in how finances are budgeted among Malays in Singapore. The husband pays for daily essentials, including rent, utilities, the children's education, basic foods such as rice, oil and milk, and other major objects such as the refrigerator, furniture, and television set (Li 1989, 18–19). Although it is not obligatory, the wife usually pays for supplementary items such as her own and her children's clothing, other smaller consumer goods, and major items such as a washing machine or kitchenware. Should the food budget run out, the wife usually pays and is later reimbursed by her husband. When the wife goes out of her way to supplement the household budget or to provide extras for her family, this is viewed by the couple as her voluntary contribution or a gift to the family.

Although men are obliged to take on the role of provider in the family, male responsibility for provision of food is not explicitly defined in the Qur'an (Devasahayam 2003). Thus, it is common practice for Malay men to purchase food, leaving the women to cook it. In urban Malaysia, a Malay man may either shop for food independently or accompany his wife on food shopping trips, although he pays for the purchases. This gender division of labor was observed in earlier generations, as well as among rural folk (Devasahayam 2001, 207–8). By no means does this suggest that men do not engage in cooking. Instances when men are enlisted to cook are in the public domain as part of ritual or social service, such as in mosques or at a village feast (kenduri) for a marriage. While men's engagement in public cooking may have emerged because they dominate activities outside the house (Carsten 1989, 138), celebratory events reverse traditional forms of normal household practices (Carsten 1987, 164). In public cooking, however, women are never entirely disengaged from the scene; instead they play a significant role in a supportive capacity by cutting and chopping up the foodstuff before it is cooked (Carsten 1987, 164, Devasahayam 2001, 186–9). Thus, while cooking is identified with women in the domestic context, when food is prepared in public, the activity does not conform to the dominant gender ideology connecting women to food.

Symbolically linked to food, women are also associated with the kitchen. This link is reinforced by the fact that when Kelantanese women of the east coast of Malaysia trade in the marketplace, they liken this work to "searching for side dishes" (cari lauk) (Rudie 1995, 239). Cultural values positing cooking as the prerogative of women are inculcated at a very young age when girls (anak dara) are taught by their mothers skills related to household management (Carsten 1989, 120, 121, Laderman 1982, 82). When girls in the past received a formal education, they were usually enrolled in vernacular girls' schools where they learned to cook, weave, and sew (Manderson 1979, 239–40).

The intent for a girl to learn these skills was to refine her female deportment (Omar 1994, 28–9) and create feminine qualities that would enable her to secure a spouse and maintain a household later on in life. That traditional gender role patterns are demanded by the older women of younger girls in Kelantan has been argued to “have an almost all-embracing grip on role formation” (Rudie 1983, 137–8). Yet this “grip” has been seen to be positive in that it creates a cooperative network among women who even help each other by selling produce in the marketplace for those who cannot make the trip themselves.

STATE CONSTRUCTIONS OF GENDER ROLES

State discourses have also reinforced women’s caretaker role in the family. Malaysia’s modernity project as captured in Vision 2020 calls for the active contribution of women from the middle and upper income echelons to wage employment, while stressing that they continue to retain their role of mother in the family. The dichotomy of gender roles was echoed in earlier policies such as the 70 million target National Population Policy and the National Policy on Women or Dasar Wanita Negara. In the Family Development section of the Sixth Malaysia Plan (1991, 424, as cited in Puthuchery 1991, 11–12), which principally emphasized women’s role in providing a “conducive and harmonious family environment,” while being simultaneously actively engaged in the country’s wage economy, work was defined as an added dimension to a woman’s familial responsibilities, thus reinforcing the rhetoric of the “ideal” woman as one who is able to successfully balance the roles of worker and mother/wife (Puthuchery 1991, 12). For many urban women who want a career and family, the employment of a foreign domestic worker has been the solution (Chin 1998).

In Indonesia, official discourses assign women to take the lead role in the performance of reproductive duties. In contrast, the husband is recognized as the head of the household whose primary role is that of breadwinner. Although colonial and post-independence regimes subscribed to this dominant discourse, it only became vigorously institutionalized during Suharto’s reign through two key state institutions – the Family Welfare Movement (PKK) and Dharma Wanita (Parawansa 2002, Brenner 1995, Wolf 1992). Through these institutions, the ideals of state “Ibuisism” (maternalism) were propagated, emphasizing the primary functions of women as producers of the nation’s future generations, loyal companions to their husbands, mothers and educators of children, managers of households, and useful members of society (Sen 1998, Wolf 1992). However, PKK and Dharma Wanita failed to recognize women’s worker identity – whether as paid employees or executors of unpaid family labor. A shift occurred when the Ministry for the Role of Women began to portray women in their dual roles in both the domestic and public spheres (Parawansa 2002, Sen 1998, 43). From then onwards, the term peran ganda (dual role) was frequently echoed in the official discourses of the New Order regime. However, Indonesian feminists picked up on the implications of peran ganda, highlighting the actual workload of women in raising a family. This led to the formulation of the Broad Outlines of State Policy (GBHN) (1993–8), emphasizing shared responsibility of men and women in the domestic sphere, especially in the education of children and the “cultural and philosophical guidance of children” (Sen 1998, 45). In redefining gender equity, however, the economic well-being of a household was left out of the equation, thereby disregarding the experiences of working-class urban and rural women who were unable to afford hired help. Since the Suharto era, efforts at promoting gender equity in the family, society, and nation continue; yet official discourses of gender roles and identities have remained unchanged (Parawansa 2002).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. ‘Abd al-Āṭī, The family structure in Islam, Indianapolis 1982.
- S. Brenner, Why women rule the roost. Rethinking Javanese ideologies of gender and self-control, in A. Ong and M. Peletz (eds.), Bewitching women, pious men. Gender and body politics in Southeast Asia, Berkeley 1995, 19–50.
- J. Carsten, Analogues or opposites. Household and community in Pulau Langkawi, Malaysia, in C. MacDonald (ed.), De la hutte au palais. Sociétés “à maison” en Asie du Sud-Est insulaire, Paris 1987, 153–68.
- , Cooking money. Gender and the symbolic transformation of means of exchange in a Malay fishing community, in J. Parry and M. Bloch (eds.), Money and the morality of exchange, Cambridge 1989, 117–41.
- , Houses in Langkawi. Stable structures or mobile homes?, in J. Carsten and S. Hugh-Jones (eds.), About the house. Levi-Strauss and beyond, Cambridge 1995, 105–28.
- C. B. N. Chin, In service and servitude. Foreign female domestic workers and the Malaysian “modernity” project, New York 1998.
- T. W. Devasahayam, Consumed with modernity and “tradition.” Food, women, and ethnicity in changing urban Malaysia, Ph.D. diss., Department of Anthropology, Syracuse University 2001.
- , Empowering or enslaving? What adat and agama mean for gender relations and domestic food production in Malay households, paper presented at Urban Malaysia. Eat Drink, Halal Haram: Food, Islam and Society in Asia Workshop, 3–5 December 2003, Asia Research Institute, National University of Singapore.

- S. Dorairajoo, "No fish in the sea." Thai-Malay tactics of negotiation in a time of scarcity, Ph.D. diss., Department of Anthropology, Harvard University 2002.
- B. Elmhirst, Negotiating gender, kinship and livelihood practices in an Indonesian transmigration area, in J. Koning, M. Nolten, J. Rodenburg, and R. Saptari (eds.), Women and households in Indonesia. Cultural notions and social practices, Richmond, Surrey 2000, 208-34.
- R. Firth, Housekeeping among Malay peasants, London 1943, 1966².
- A.-M. Hilsdon, Violence among Maranao Muslim women in the Philippines, in L. Manderson and L. R. Bennett (eds.), Violence against women in Asian societies, London 2003, 20-40.
- M. W. Khan, Woman in Islamic shari'ah, trans. F. Khanam, New Delhi 1995.
- C. Laderman, Putting Malay women in their place, in P. Van Esterik (ed.), Women of Southeast Asia, Detroit, Mich. 1982, 79-99.
- , Wives and midwives. Childbirth and nutrition in rural Malaysia, Berkeley 1984.
- T. Li, Malays in Singapore. Culture, economy, and ideology, Oxford 1989.
- L. Manderson, A woman's place. Malay women and development in Peninsular Malaysia, in J. C. Jackson and M. Rudner (eds.), Issues in Malaysian development, Singapore 1979, 233-72.
- R. Omar, The Malay woman in the body. Between biology and culture, Kuala Lumpur 1994.
- K. I. Parawansa, Institution building. An effort to improve Indonesian women's role and status, in K. Robinson and S. Bessel (eds.), Women in Indonesia. Gender, equity and development, Singapore 2002, 68-77.
- M. Puthuchear, Government policies and perceptions of policy makers and women leaders on the status and role of women in society. Status and role of Malaysian women in development and family welfare, Research report no. 2, Faculty of Economics and Administration, University of Malaya, Kuala Lumpur 1991.
- A. Reid, Female roles in pre-colonial Southeast Asia, in Modern Asian Studies 22:3 (1998), 629-45.
- D. S. Roberts, Islam. A Westerner's guide, London 1982.
- I. Rudie, The significance of "eating." Cooperation, support, and reputation in Kelantan Malay households, in W. J. Karim (ed.), "Male" and "Female" in developing Southeast Asia, Oxford 1995, 227-45.
- , Women in Malaysia. Economic autonomy, ritual segregation and some future possibilities, in B. Utas (ed.), Women in Islamic societies. Social attitudes and historical perspectives, London 1983, 128-43.
- H. Schulze and S. Suratman, Villagers in transition. Case studies from Sabah, Sabah, Malaysia 1999.
- K. Sen, Indonesian women at work. Reframing the subject, in K. Sen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998, 35-62.
- D. Wolf, Factory daughters. Gender, household dynamics and rural industrialization in Java, Berkeley 2000.
- T. Yoshihiro, One Malay village. A thirty-year community study, trans. P. Hawkes, Kyoto 2001.

THERESA W. DEVASAHAYAM

Sub-Saharan Africa

The gendered division of labor within the family in societies in Sub-Saharan Africa is a consequence of the particular historical conditions under which family structures emerge and the ways in which family relations are constantly renegotiated.

ISLAM

Islam is practiced today by the majority of men and women in Mauritania, Senegal, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Gambia, Guinea, Chad, Sudan, Somalia, Djibouti, and the Comoro Islands. Additionally, Islam is an important minority religion in the East African countries such as Kenya and in the Gulf of Benin countries (Coulon 1983, 6). The mass appeal of Muslim reform movements throughout Sub-Saharan Africa at the turn of the twentieth century can be understood in part by transformations taking place in the domestic sphere. These changes took place in the context of a social crisis that was engendered by the French conquest and the disintegration of the political structures in the region, particularly West Africa, which destabilized the material basis of social production. Though early converts to Islam were, as Robinson (1991) suggests, "weary of war," most likely they also sought land and bridewealth. Former slaves as well as young men converted to Islam to acquire land through the patronage of Muslim shaykhs. Klein (1998) suggests that many people in the region of the Senegambia turned to Islam to escape slavery and focuses on the ways in which former slaves were incorporated into social and familial structures under Islam. Though Muslim missionaries, traders, and scholars spread Islam throughout much of Sub-Saharan Africa, Launay and Soares argue that the Islamization of many communities was the "unintended consequence" of French colonial rule. Islamic reform movements can be understood in terms of "the emergence of a qualitatively new 'Islamic' sphere; conceptually separate from 'particular' affiliations such as ethnicity, kin group membership or slave origins, as well as from the colonial state" (1999, 497).

SLAVE TRADE AND LABOR MIGRATION

Colonial rule and the Atlantic slave trade fundamentally altered the social basis of rural and urban artisanal economies in West African societies (Sow 1985, 567). In other parts of Africa during the colonial period men from many communities, particularly in Eastern and Southern Africa, left their rural homes in search of employment in colonial projects such as road building, portage, and mining, in addition to work on agricultural plantations. On the heels of this largely male migration to the urban centers of production, many adult women followed to provide services and in search of a livelihood through restaurants or prostitution. During the two world wars many men in French and British colonies were conscripted to fight for the Allies with the encouragement of Muslim shaykhs; many were not paid by the European powers for their services. The slave trade and labor migration were thus major factors affecting the relations of production within the household economy, with wide ranging consequences for the economy proper.

POSTCOLONIAL PERIOD

The French anthropologist Claude Meillassoux (1975) analyzed West African agricultural communities and their articulation with capitalism through the process of colonization to illuminate the connections between the kinship structures that control reproduction and the exploitation of workers. Meillassoux thus considered the historical and material conditions that contributed to the development of this particular form of social organization to avoid thinking of the family as an extra social given.

In the postcolonial period, many agriculturally based communities have suffered environmental degradation as a result of poor farming practices related to monocropping during the colonial period. They have come to rely increasingly on trade in local, national, and overseas markets and overseas remittances as the prices for raw goods have fallen in the global market and their currencies have been devalued through structural adjustment programs of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. As a result, men have become increasingly involved in overseas migration and women have become increasingly involved in domestic markets. Women are thus often the consumers and distributors of good imported by their male counterparts. In some societies, such as northern Nigeria, women practice seclusion and must rely on exchanges between households to earn money rather than working outside the home.

Thus the household division of labor within the family is not comprised of a fixed set of duties and responsibilities, but rather by a set of obligations that are the product of a process of constant renegotiation in the context of changing social, political, and economic conditions. The division of labor within the family is influenced in part by Qur'anic law and by the ḥadīth, the sayings of the Prophet Muḥammad (Sow 1985, 563). For example, in Senegal, men and women place a premium on generosity. For men this means giving charity and alms as well as gifts to religious leaders and aid to friends, associates, and business partners. Ideas about generosity form the basis of relations of patronage that reach up toward the state. For women, the emphasis on generosity means giving liberally at family ceremonies and staging elaborate feasts. Thus men and women often come into conflict concerning the allocation of household resources.

In many families across the continent, women participate in rotating credit unions and Islamic forms of banking that avoid payment of interest, which is prohibited in Islam. These economic organizations may be composed of family members, neighbors, religious devotees, or participants in local development projects sponsored by non-governmental organizations. One such organization that has been very successful is ENDA T.M. in Senegal. Exchange relations, and their affective qualities, go beyond family to encompass rotating credit unions, and ritual, neighborhood, and political associations. Relations among women neighbors have become a significant resource pooling unit, much like the kinship unit.

Qur'anic law is applied differently to varying forms of family structures and relations of obligation across the continent. What is universal is the emergence of a discourse about how Qur'anic law ought to be interpreted with respect to the generation and distribution of resources along the lines of age and gender. Arguments concerning the division of labor and household economy play out over the manipulation of rules of filiation, paternity, engagement, marriage, and inheritance. But as Sow argues, "the advent of Islam in black Africa did not lead to acute conflict of family structures and law" (1985, 563). She gives two reasons, the first of which is a historical argument based on the pluralistic basis of many of these societies and the second is that "Koranic thought lends itself to interpretation (ijtihad), in the sense of adaptation" (1985, 563).

Conventionally, the head of the family is a senior male. This person is in a position to control the production, exchange, and distribution of resources; this includes material resources such as land and cash and symbolic payments such as bridewealth within the extended family. This person also distributes work along the lines of age and gender, provides for the needs of the family members, and endeavors to establish good relations beyond the household (Sow 1985, 564). Women aim to sustain good relations within the household and extended family. Authority follows the lines of age and generation in the first order and gender in the second, in most cases. With regard to relations of alliance, mothers-in-law have control over the productive and reproductive possibilities of their daughters-in-law. Thus younger women often take on the burden of domestic labor, freeing their in-laws for ritual work outside the household, which often involves elaborate forms of reciprocal gift exchange, an important source of wealth and authority within the lineage and neighborhood. Thus while it may appear that men dominate and control economic life, women divert those resources toward the production of their power and authority through family ceremonies that require enormous outlays of cash.

Increasing male migration in relation to economic liberalization in many regions of the continent has meant that women have become de facto heads of households. They have used remittances from male kin to shore up the household economy and to engage in their own productive endeavors, such as trading, and have diverted these earnings into their ritual economies. In many communities there is discourse concerning a crisis of social production that is related to neoliberal reform. Men in particular discuss their failure to constitute relations of kinship and alliance due to their prolonged sojourns abroad and the absence of the kinds of resources necessary to sustain these alliances.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Klein, The impact of the Atlantic slave trade on the societies of the western Sudan, in J. Inikori and S. Engerman (eds.), The Atlantic slave trade. Effects of economies, societies and peoples in Africa, the Americas, and Europe, Durham, N.C. 1992, 25–47.
- C. Meillassoux, Maidens, meal and money. Capitalism and the domestic community, Cambridge 1975.
- D. Robinson, Beyond resistance and collaboration. Amadu Bamba and the Murids of Senegal, in Journal of Religion in Africa 21:2 (1991), 149–69.
- F. Sow, Muslim families in Black Africa, in Current Anthropology 26:5 (1985), 563–70.

BETH ANNE BUGGENHAGEN

Turkey and the Caucasus

In general, the domestic division of labor varies with contextual factors such as the labor market and industrial structure, and with household characteristics such as family structure, social class, income source, ethnicity, and relative factor endowments of male versus female family members. To identify patterns across the region, it is useful to focus on the interplay between social norms and everyday practices producing gendered definitions of work. Social norms either differentially assign obligations to men and women, or differentially prohibit them from certain tasks.

Throughout Turkey and the heavily Turkic areas of the Caucasus, cultural expectations dictate that adult men earn a living and protect the domestic unit (and the nation) against external threats. Women are responsible for childcare, food preparation, and quotidian household maintenance. Failure to fulfill these obligations results in loss of self-respect and social respectability, for both men and women. Men are generally prohibited from performing female duties, whereas the converse rarely holds. For example, a man who is forced by circumstance to regularly cook or to take care of children is considered much more gender-deviant than a woman who is forced to provide for her family or take up arms in defense of home and country. In other words, the norms that impose prohibitions on women's work are considerably more flexible than those for men, and are more easily overridden when in conflict with the family's needs. Thus, most of the regional variability in domestic arrangements is accounted for by the wide range of tasks that women perform in response to varying outcomes of the constant negotiation between broad cultural expectations and the practical requirements of daily survival. For the same reason, women's work has undergone more dramatic changes than men's in response to socioeconomic transformations.

Agricultural production in the region is dominated by small-scale family holdings where both men and women engage in crop cultivation and animal husbandry. Clearing and plowing of fields are generally men's work, while weeding (hoeing), transplanting, and hand-irrigation are mostly performed by women aided by children. The whole household works in the fields during the harvest. The maintenance of poultry and milking of livestock are also women's work. Women, aided by children, process raw agricultural products into fuel, cooking ingredients (such as cracked wheat, yogurt-wheat-soup mix [tarhana], noodles, tomato paste, dried vegetables, smoked meats, cheese, and butter), and crafting materials (such as straw for basket-weaving, thread, and yarn). Along the Black Sea coast where farms are relatively small and the major crops (tea, tobacco, hazelnuts) do not require annual plowing, women are frequently the major cultivators while adult men engage in seasonal cash-earning activities.

In rural households, the physical strength requirement of a task is rarely a determining factor in its gendering. For example, women frequently haul heavy loads of straw, kindling, and water across long distances, even when adult males are available. It is not unusual for rural women to carry the stones or bricks for a building while men do the masonry (Erdentuğ 1959). Additionally, rural women are almost solely responsible for childcare, cooking, cleaning, knitting, weaving, and sewing.

Even in cases where the resulting products are marketed, constituting significant contributions to household income, these activities are generally regarded by both men and women as either leisure or simply part of womanhood (Berik 1987, Kağıtçıbaşı 1982, 13-14).

In urban households where the husband's income can support a comfortable standard of living, a woman who chooses full-time homemaking is not regarded as deviant as long as she fulfills domestic and childcare obligations. These duties are performed by (usually female) domestic servants if household income can support their wages without threatening the secure survival of the family. Since supervision of domestic servants is easily combined with full-time employment, it is common for (especially younger) women from affluent households to pursue professional and managerial careers without breaking serious gender norms (Öncü 1981, Erkut 1982). However, an able-bodied woman who does not contribute to a household income that is insufficient for a culturally expected level of security and comfort invites social disapproval. Thus, in urban households where adult men are un(der)-employed, women commonly engage in income-earning activities ranging from taking in piecework (White 1994), to waged work in both the informal and formal sectors (Ecevit 1998, İlkaracan 1998). However, men's contribution to housework and childcare is considered inappropriate by the majority except in times of family crisis, and there appears to be a consensus that under those circumstances, the most suitable domestic chore for adult men is shopping (Başaran 1985).

These asymmetries in definitions of gender-appropriate work impose serious strains on women, especially in low-to-middle-income households. Additionally, and somewhat paradoxically, they create and maintain two highly gender-segregated domestic role clusters and relative autonomy for (especially older) women carrying out female-appropriate daily tasks. Consequently, most scholars of the Turkish family agree that it follows a duofocal pattern rather than a classical patriarchal one (Olson-Prather 1976, Olson 1982)

Though by no means unique to the region in its broad outlines, the particulars of this division of labor nonetheless bear the marks of a highly specific set of historical and sociocultural factors. Male and female duties clearly derive from Islamic family norms, as does the dependence of masculinity on the ability to distance itself from feminine tasks, and the resulting autonomy of women within the domestic sphere (Ahmed 1982). Norms governing women's roles outside the home, however, underwent drastic revisions under the Kemalist reforms in Turkey and the Bolshevik Revolution in the Caucasus.

Both movements incorporated women's emancipation as an integral part of their program, and as a litmus test of success. Observing gender asymmetries in domestic labor, Bolshevik reformers concluded that women, and not the working class, were the truly exploited and hence were their potential allies in the predominantly Muslim areas around the Caucasus (Massell 1974). In Turkey, the modernization of women was a key component of Atatürk's reformist agenda. Through speeches and legislative reforms, he actively coaxed Turkish women into the public sphere of work, career, and politics. The female comrade in Soviet revolutionary culture (Wood 1997) and the (especially rural) woman within the Turkish discourse of national liberation and rebirth (Atatürk 1923) are both represented as strong workers and brave fighters. Both discourses, however, were silent about domestic labor except to reassert women's importance as mothers. Consequently, neither reform movement significantly altered masculine duties and prohibitions as defined by Islamic law and practice, while they drastically widened the scope of female duties and aggressively challenged prohibitions against women's public roles. In other words, women's emancipation came with high labor costs.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Western ethnocentrism and perceptions of the harem, in Feminist Studies 8 (1982), 521-34.
- M. K. Atatürk, Atatürk'ün söylev ve demeçleri, ii, İstanbul 1952, 84-7, 148-54.
- F. Başaran, Attitude changes related to sex roles in the family, in T. Erder (ed.), Family in Turkish society. Sociological and legal studies, Ankara 1985, 167-82.
- G. Berik, Women carpet weavers in rural Turkey. Patterns of employment, earnings and status, Geneva 1987.
- Y. Ecevit, Türkiye'de kadın emeğinin toplumsal cinsiyet temelinde analizi, in A. Hacımirzaoğlu (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 267-84.
- N. Erdentuğ, A study on the social structure of a Turkish village, Ankara 1959.
- S. Erkut, Dualism in values toward education of Turkish women, in Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı (ed.), Sex roles, family, and community in Turkey, Bloomington, Ind. 1982, 121-32.
- İ. İlkaracan, Kentli kadınlar ve çalışma yaşamı, in A. Hacımirzaoğlu (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 285-302.
- Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı, Introduction, in Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı (ed.), Sex roles, family, and community in Turkey, Bloomington, Ind. 1982, 1-32.
- G. J. Massell, The surrogate proletariat. Moslem women and revolutionary strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1919-1929, Princeton, N.J. 1974.
- E. Olson, Duofocal family structure and an alternative model of husband-wife relationships, in Ç. Kağıtçıbaşı (ed.), Sex roles, family, and community in Turkey, Bloomington, Ind. 1982, 33-72.

- E. Olson-Prather, Family planning and husband-wife relationships in contemporary Turkey, Ph.D. diss., University of California, Los Angeles 1976.
- A. Öncü, Turkish women in professional occupations. Why so many? in N. Abadan-Unat, D. Kandiyoti, and M. B. Kiray (eds.), Women in Turkish society, Leiden 1981, 181-93.
- J. B. White, Money makes us relatives. Women's labor in urban Turkey, Austin, Tex. 1994.
- E. Wood, The baba and the comrade. Gender and politics in revolutionary Russia, Bloomington, Ind. 1997.

NİLÜFER A. İSVAN

Household Forms and Composition

The Caucasus

This entry deals mainly with Azerbaijan. This is because of the shortage of relevant scholarship on the rest of the Muslim Caucasus. At the turn of the twentieth century in the Caucasus, where the great majority of the population lived in rural areas, aila ijmasi (family communes) were the common form of household composition. These were based on common ownership and use of land and livestock by large extended families. The complex organization of such social groups was marked by a rigid system of etiquette governing intergenerational and affinal relations, with the male elders, ak saqqal, predominating in authority. But on matters concerning women, the ak birchek, female elder, would also be the authority referred to (Heyat 2002, 60). Generally, the status of an elder was achieved as much through their personal qualities of leadership as their age.

Later, through the early part of the twentieth century with developments in trade and industry (especially the oil industry), family communes began to break up and nuclear families started to evolve. This process was greatly accelerated by the Soviet system; under collectivization the rural family unit lost much of its economic function and power. From the 1970s the nuclearization of families further accelerated with urbanization and the increase in apartment building and the housing stock generally. However, in the rural areas households of three or more generations living as one unit were very common. In Baku composite households of different generations with the addition of young relatives from the regions was not uncommon. For young people from rural areas who came to study at the capital city one of the means of being accommodated was to move in with a relative. This was often done in exchange for child minding or other domestic chores. Hiring domestic labor often had to be disguised as an interfamily arrangement of labor and financial exchange.

Today in the Muslim Caucasus, the tradition of closely-knit extended families seeking residence in close geographical proximity to each other and maintaining frequent contact continues (Chenciner 1997, Hortaçsu and Baştuğ 2000). The economy of shortages and the all-pervasive Soviet system of nepotism had reinforced reliance on family members as the core of personal networks essential for access to scarce resources and employment opportunities (Tohidi 1998, Heyat 2000). In the present post-Soviet era, despite the emergence of money as a source of power and influence, the need for pooling of family resources as a means of survival in the face of severe economic difficulties has led to the continuity in the strength of the extended family.

In Azerbaijan, the demographic, social, and cultural changes following the economic breakdown, transition to free market, and the war with Armenia in the early 1990s have led to the departure from the country of large numbers of men in search of work in Russia, other former Soviet republics, and further afield (Heyat 2002, 175). Consequently, there are today far greater numbers of female-headed households than there have ever been in the region's history. The economic empowerment of young people with knowledge of Western languages and expertise working for multinational organizations, Western non-governmental organizations, and foreign companies in Baku has also led to the formation of single occupancy households there. In the past, given the shortage of housing, living alone was highly unusual and not socially condoned, especially for women.

In the present free market era, there is a growing gap in wealth and social distinctions (Heyat 2002). As the new rich are able to build and acquire much larger accommodation space, some in the form of mansions, their household size is reduced since newly married couples and even some of the single young professionals are able to afford their own separate apartments. At the same time, economic difficulties and the influx of foreigners have led to some families in Baku renting out their homes and moving in with parents, in-laws, or even siblings in order to gain an additional income. This has meant a contra-nuclearization process in which three or more generations, or adult siblings and their respective families, cram into apartments previously assigned to a nuclear family household. In the rural areas, however, there is increasing gender and generational imbalance as young people in search of work, particularly the males, depart for urban centers or abroad. In Azerbaijan, female-headed households and households where the adult males are mostly absent, or often in transit, have increasingly become the norm.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Chenciner, Daghestan. Tradition and survival, London 1997.
- F. Heyat, Azeri professional women's life strategies, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 177–201.
- F. Heyat, Azeri women in transition. Women in Soviet and post-Soviet Azerbaijan, London 2002.
- N. Hortaçsu and S. Baştuğ, Women in marriage in Ashkabad, Baku and Ankara, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 75–100.
- N. Tohid, "Guardians of the Nation." Women, Islam, and the Soviet legacy of modernization in Azerbaijan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohid (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998, 147–67.

FARIDEH HEYAT

Central Asia

A significant characteristic of the Central Asian family is its flexibility in make-up and also, in many aspects, in location. This was even more marked before the 1917 Russian Revolution when there were several distinct lifestyles in Central Asia: the nomadic Kazakhs and Kyrgyz, and the sedentary Uzbeks and Tajiks, with the Turkmens, Karakalpak, and other related groups drawing on elements from both.

The nomadic peoples typically lived in tents, or yurts, easy to dismantle structures divided into men's and women's quarters, with separate sleeping sections for the parents and a central kitchen. Their household can be conceptualized as a group of family units residing in a cluster of yurts, forming a camp or aul, and jointly owning the family herds. These auls usually moved location from winter to summer and did not always consist of an identical group of people.

The sedentary household was situated within a courtyard (havli), containing anything from one room to a large group of houses/rooms, each accommodating a family unit. The 1897 Central Asian census data indicated an average of 5.5 people per household but this figure obscures large differences in size, from one-person households to those containing 50 or more (Krader 1971, 147–9).

Both nomadic and sedentary peoples lived in extended patrilineal families, usually consisting of a patriarch, his wife or wives, and their unmarried offspring, married sons and their wives and children, and in larger households the patriarch's younger brothers, their wives and progeny, and perhaps also distant cousins. Thus, most male members would be related by blood, with wives marrying in. Richer men might live between several households, each run by a different wife, sometimes in a different town.

When they became too big or at the patriarch's death, households would split, each son forming his own. In smaller households a son would separate soon after marriage or at the marriage of the following son, except for the youngest, who would remain with his parents for life and inherit the yurt or havli after their death. However, wives who did not get along with their in-laws might try to persuade their husbands to split from the extended family sooner. Families without sons might prevail upon a son-in-law to move in with them permanently to carry on the line.

Those too poor to afford their own homes could serve the rich. Poor women might work as indoor servants. They might even accompany a daughter married to a wealthy man as her servant. In nomadic areas men with insufficient herds to support themselves could act as servants to those with large herds until they could afford independence. Similarly, among the sedentary, poor men would hire out their services to wealthier ones in whose households they would live. An impoverished man might arrange to give bride labor instead of the usual bride-price, living as a servant in his future wife's household meanwhile. In general, class distinctions were not strong, servants frequently intermarried with their employers' families, and there was little differentiation between kin and non-kin within the household.

After the revolution, the Soviet regime encouraged the development of nuclear households throughout the region. Nevertheless, in rural areas today the extended family remains the norm, despite changes in economic relations as a consequence of collectivization and the forcible settling of the nomadic tribes. In urban areas the government tried to enforce its policies by building apartments too small for extended families. However, even when fathers and sons live in physically separate residences, they and their families may spend most of their free time together, functioning virtually as an extended family, so that it is often difficult to decide where to draw the line round the household unit. Moreover, offspring often give their eldest child to their parents to rear, which also skews the division of households into nuclear units.

The Soviet government provided dormitories for factory employees from rural areas. Today these may house whole families, each living in a single room and sharing bathrooms. Some workers have a home elsewhere. However, for the poorest, and especially single mothers, their dormitory room may be their sole accommodation, and thus might be considered to contain a household.

Family size changed during Soviet times as improved health conditions allowed increasing numbers of children to survive to maturity. As of 1996, for instance, the average family size in Tajikistan was 7.1 (Tajikistan 1996, 82). Recently, economic pressures have reduced birth rates. Simultaneously, however, they also make it harder for families to afford to live separately. For the first time, divorce rates have risen so high that for want of other living quarters adult women have started to return to their parents' home in significant numbers, usually accompanied by their children. As a result, overall household size has increased.

Especially in postwar Tajikistan, numbers of female-headed households have grown considerably, both nuclear households, where a woman lives alone with her children, and extended ones where her married sons reside with her.

New forms of polygynous residence have also arisen. That least encountered consists of two wives living in the same home. More commonly, one wife is chosen by, and resides with, her husband's parents, while he additionally marries a woman of his own choice, either establishing her in an urban apartment or moving in with her if she already has her own place. This happens frequently when men from rural areas migrate to work in a town, whether in Central Asia or the Russian Federation. In Tajikistan at least, the imbalance between the sexes has led to women consenting to become third and even fourth wives rather than never marrying. Such women may continue to reside with their natal families and be visited only occasionally by their husbands, who take little or no responsibility for them or their offspring.

While multiple wives can be married by nikāḥ, civil law permits only one wife. If parents do not register the first marriage then the husband can register his second. Since civil registration is entered into one's passport some men "lose" these and obtain a second one so as to register a second time, thus effectively committing bigamy. Registration of marriage is especially important for marriages in Russia for the purpose of obtaining residence permits.

Same-sex households remain rare. Divorced or widowed men usually remarry, invite a female relative to keep house, or move in with another family member. They tend to live together only as a last resort, such as during labor migration to the Russian Federation. Most homosexual men marry or live with their parents.

Slightly more common are households consisting of one or more women, with or without children and/or siblings. These are unlikely to be lesbians but rather sisters, mothers and daughters, or even friends. I have also come across rare cases of apparently intersexed persons living together in what resemble women-only households in that those concerned may present themselves as females, irrespective of genetic make-up.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- E. E. Bacon, Central Asians under Russian rule. A study in cultural change, Ithaca, N.Y. 1966.
 L. Krader, The peoples of Central Asia, Bloomington, Ind. 1971.
 A. Meakin, In Russian Turkestan, London 1903.
 L. F. Monogarova, Contemporary urban family structure in Tajikistan (on materials from Ura-Tyube and Isfary) [in Russian], in Sovetskaya Etnografiya 3 (1982).
 V. Nalivkin and M. Nalivkina, A study of women's lifestyles among the settled indigenous population of Fergana [in Russian], Kazan 1886.
 E. Schuyler, Turkistan, New York 1876.
 Tajikistan/UNDP, Tajikistan. Human development report, Dushanbe 1996, <<http://www.undp.org/rbec/nhdt/1996/tajikistan/>>.
 T. A. Zhdankova, Study of changes in the traditional structure of family among the peoples of Central Asia under the conditions of socialism [in Russian], in Slovensky Narodopis 31:3 (1983), 414-25.

COLETTE HARRIS

Iran and Afghanistan

Households vary with class and location. Traditional agricultural/pastoral households contain an extended patrilineal/patrilocal family spanning several generations, forming a production and consumption unit with complementary sexual division of labor. In urban and non-agricultural households women do not produce much (except children); they prepare food and provide care with materials provided by the men. These households change to nuclear family patterns earlier than agricultural ones under the influence of changing work patterns, limited urban spaces, and modernist ideas. Traditional wealthy urban households usually are the largest, including multiple wives of the household head, an extended family, other relatives, and servants.

Structurally, the developmental logic of the extended family informs household composition and relationships: a man will try to exert control over wife (wives) and sons as early and as long as possible, staying in his father's house, compound, or camp and identifying with his father's and brothers' interests as long as necessary or advantageous for him. Eventually, he will establish an independent nuclear household, which leads to the next extended family as his sons bring their wives into the household. The sons, in turn, will start the circle anew. Households of extended families are structurally unstable.

Practically, this household form ranges from a production and consumption unit under one roof (including several wives) to a loosely cooperating production unit with different contributions (cash from a teacher son, labor from a farmer son) and separate consumption, as different nuclear families (or mother and children units in polygynous families) live in separate rooms in a compound, apartments in a house, or tents in a camp. Built into these structures are the demand for cooperation, resentment of authoritarian relations, and competition for resources especially among married brothers. It is said that nothing breaks up a household faster than brothers' wives fighting with each other and with their mother-in-law. Co-wives are proverbially adversary. This is mostly due to the household structure: co-wives are pitched against each other as are sons' wives, and all against their mother-in-law over resources and workloads; mothers-in-law back their sons, especially in polygynous marriages, because sons are their source of power and of support in old age. The often bad relationship between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law leads to many old women's reliance on their own visiting daughters for care.

Rich men are more likely to be polygynous than are poor men (although any man may be saddled with his dead brother's widow in addition to his own wife), but they can also maintain separate homes for their wives, minimizing contact and potential strife among them. Such households in effect are headed by a woman, with a visiting husband. There are reports of older wives selecting a young wife for their husband for various reasons. The first wife will usually stay in charge of the household, including management of co-wives and supervising work. In the wealthy households of the past, male and female servants did most of the menial chores; with the trend toward nuclear families such large households have become rare. Modernity is expected to lower the rate of polygyny, but especially in Iran today many wealthy professional men are said to maintain several wives. Women in Iran today are admonished to stipulate a separate home if they contract a marriage with a married man.

While sons may stay in their father's household with their wives, daughters leave upon marriage and are replaced by their brother's wives. As strangers to the husband's people and to each other, ignorant of the new household's customs, the young wives must expect to be everybody's servants. Unless the mother-in-law is amiable and the young woman is hard-working and cooperative, tensions and emotional and physical abuse are frequent. Expected to keep wives and children under control and to side with father, brothers, mother (in this order), a man will not likely support his wives against his own people. Contrary to Islamic law, daughters especially in lower classes and rural areas do not inherit, making them the more vulnerable economically. In instances of hostile relations, only through separation from the extended household can a woman gain peace and control over resources in the house, including, eventually, over her own daughters-in-law. An old or widowed woman expects to live in the nuclear-to-extended household of a son (the youngest, where ultimogeniture is practiced). Only if earlier she had established warm relationships with the daughter-in-law who now is responsible for her care can she hope realistically to be treated well. Recently, there is a notable increase in the number of old women (but not old men) living alone by choice, especially in Iran, with financial assistance of their sons. An old widower will stay with a son if he does not take another wife and establish a new nuclear household. Since about 1990, as marriage age and divorce rates are increasing (in Iran), single-person households have increased in cities as have households of several unmarried young women (or men) renting an apartment to share costs, and even women-headed households with children. Any household, especially in cities, at times will include temporary residents such as a wife's parents, a relative who is indigent, in need of education or medical care, or who can provide childcare.

Men have few household duties and skills and rely on service from women. In the traditional households with many children and complementary gender roles, the division of labor made sense to people. In the new, nuclear middle-class households with fewer children (in Iran), women accuse men of being lazy and indolent, especially if the women work outside the home. New patterns for household forms and relationships are developing especially in socially dynamic Iran, where people aspire to middle-class lifestyles, while war and the social ideology of the Taliban in Afghanistan have encouraged large, traditionally structured households including many children, the extended family and/or multiple wives and other relatives.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami, Death of the patriarch, in E. W. Fernea (ed.), Remembering childhood in the Middle East, Austin, Tex. 2002, 157-62.

- V. Doubleday, Three women of Herat, Austin, Tex. 1988.
 S. Farman-Farmaian, Daughter of Persia, New York 1992.
 E. Friedl, Women of Deh Koh. Lives in an Iranian village, Washington, D.C. 1989.
 S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1988.
 H. Hansen, The Kurdish woman's life, Copenhagen 1961.
 M. Kousha, Voices from Iran. The changing lives of Iranian women, Syracuse, N.Y. 2002.
 N. Tapper, Bartered brides. Politics, gender, and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.

ERIKA LOEFFLER FRIEDL

The Ottoman Empire

ETYMOLOGY AND METHODOLOGY

The household, usually termed hane, was the base layer of society in the Ottoman Empire. Administratively, the term meant a fiscal unit until the nineteenth century, but after the first census was carried out in 1828–9, the term came to mean a census unit. Substantial research has been done since Ömer Lütfi Barkan discovered that the hanes recorded in tahrir (survey) registers in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries could be important sources for the study of historical demography (Barkan 1953). Research on households in the Ottoman Empire before the nineteenth century is rare, however, with only a few instances (for example, Laslett and Clarke 1972). Even after the nineteenth century, because of limited accessibility to census records, analysis is primarily in urban areas such as Istanbul, Cairo, and Damascus (Duben and Behar 1990, Fargues 1999–2000, Okawara 2003). Households in rural areas are not well understood except for some Balkan and Egyptian examples (Hammel 1972, Cuno 1995). Only Maria Nikolaeva Todorova's study (1993) of Bulgarian households covers both urban and rural areas.

A variety of approaches and definitions have been applied to household forms and composition. The definition adopted by the Cambridge Group for the History of Population and Social Structure, the most widely used criterion at present, defines a household as a domestic group, members of which slept habitually under the same roof (a locational criterion), shared a number of activities (a functional criterion), and were related to each other by blood or by marriage (a kinship criterion). Resident servants or maids are also members of the household (Laslett 1972, 23–7).

HOUSEHOLD FORMATION

The most typical Ottoman household formation system is the joint family household, a kind of multiple family household characterized by early marriage for men and rather earlier marriage for women, young married couples frequently starting life together in a household in which an older couple is in charge, and formation by the fission or fusion of one or more existent households. The death of a household head is more important than marriage in this type of household formation. The system contrasts with the northwest European system, which is characterized by later marriage for both sexes, all couples in charge of their own households after marriage (neolocality), and young people frequently circulating between households as servants before marriage (Hajnal 1983, 68–72).

The joint family household system became the ideal in the Ottoman Empire for three reasons: property holding, living space, and family strategies. For example, Islamic law (Shari'a) requires an equalized inheritance system (a female's share, however, is half that of a male), and therefore a household's property can easily be subdivided further between heirs. Households in rural areas that include agricultural land, and urban households that include large estates, seemingly prefer to maintain a joint household for economic reasons. The system is also confirmed by the large courtyard-style houses that afforded ample living space for such a household, and by the domestic servants and maids who took care of domestic affairs before, and in some cases even after, the abolition of slavery. Finally, in terms of family survival strategies a simple family household was not preferable because high mortality and short life expectancy would increase the risk of extinguishing the family.

HOUSEHOLD COMPOSITION AND SIZE

Even in societies where the joint family household was ideal, such as Ottoman societies, households did not always tend toward a large and complex structure. In reality, any joint family household was difficult to continue through generations; a father had no guarantee that his son(s) would arrive at maturity and marry.

The domestic cycle was also a problem. The rule for Ottoman-Turkish domestic cycle households is as follows: a simple family household is transformed into a multiple family household, composed of married offspring and their children in patrilocal residence. Daughters leave their natal households as they marry. The fission of the household into extended or simple family households is precipitated by the death of the father (Duben 1985, 84). In contrast, the rule for the Ottoman-Syrian domestic cycle is that even after the death of the patriarch, and even after the death of the mother, frères (households of married brothers) live together, and thus fission of the household did not take place easily (Okawara 2003, 63–4). This is also the rule in Egyptian rural households (Cuno 1995, 490).

These findings indicate that any household could experience the stages of simple family, extended family, and multiple family, depending on its domestic cycle. An average for the duration of a joint family household could affect the proportion of households in any given period and place. For example, simple family households were dominant in Istanbul in 1907 (40.0 percent), while multiple family households were dominant in Damascus in the same year (40.1 percent). Their mean household sizes also differ, 4.2 in the former and 6.6 in the latter (Okawara 2003, 60–3).

WOMEN, GENDER, AND HOUSEHOLD

How did the Ottoman household system affect the status, life course, and fate of Ottoman women? First, in matters of marriage the system was often harsh to women. For example, female early marriage, particularly child marriage, was sometimes a source of trouble. In general, marriage was likely to be arranged by the patriarch for the purpose of reproduction of the patriarchal system (Pierce 2003, 129–31, Meriwether 1999, 103). Also, a female's position was shakier than that of a male, as indicated by the domestic cycle. Daughters might have to leave their natal households as they marry, return if they divorce, or leave again if they remarry, and new brides, as yet lacking their own identity, had to establish full membership in the husband's household by childbearing and child-rearing rather than by marriage itself (Pierce 2003, 150).

Various fiscal registers and census records before 1877–8 serve as evidence of this because they exclude women from their listings. Even census records after that date prefer male to female as a rule. In census records, therefore, female household heads appear in solitaries or no family households, which may consist of a divorcee, aged woman, female slave, or the like. Some simple, extended or multiple family households are also composed of female members only. Such a household rarely lasts long, and is likely to be fused with another household of relatives. In Istanbul, some independent households in the second half of the nineteenth century were composed of manumitted female slaves (Behar 2003, 144).

NUCLEARIZATION

The nuclear or simple family household exists in any society to some extent. As for Ottoman societies, even in the Istanbul of 1907, which set trends for the rest of the empire, the simple family household was not overwhelmingly dominant. At the same time, late marriage and a decline in fertility, which are important factors of nuclearization, were increasing in Istanbul due to modernization and the more comprehensive integration of the empire into the world economy. The empire itself, however, had disintegrated before the nuclearization trend prevailed throughout its realm.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ö. L. Barkan, "Tarihi demografi" araştırmaları ve Osmanlı tarihi, in Türkiyat Mecmuası 10 (1953), 1–26.
- C. Behar, A neighborhood in Ottoman Istanbul. Fruit vendors and civil servants in the Kasap İlyas mahalle, Albany, N.Y. 2003.
- K. M. Cuno, Joint family households and rural notables in 19th-century Egypt, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 27 (1995), 485–502.
- A. Duben, Turkish families and households in historical perspective, in Journal of Family History 10 (1985), 75–97.
- A. Duben and C. Behar, Istanbul households. Marriage, family and fertility, 1880–1940, Cambridge 1991.
- P. Fargues, The stage of the family life cycle in Cairo at the end of the reign of Muḥammad 'Alī, according to the 1848 census, in Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review 5 (1999–2000), 1–39.
- J. Hajnal, Two kinds of pre-industrial household formation system, in R. Wall, J. Robin, and P. Laslett (eds.), Family forms in historic Europe, Cambridge 1983, 65–104.
- E. A. Hammel, The Zadruga as process, in P. Laslett and R. Wall (eds.), Household and family in past time, Cambridge 1972, 335–73.
- P. Laslett, Introduction. The history of the family, in P. Laslett and R. Wall (eds.), Household and family in past time, Cambridge 1972, 1–89.
- P. Laslett and M. Clarke, Houseful and household in an eighteenth-century Balkan city. A tabular analysis of the listing of the Serbian sector of Belgrade in 1733–4, in P. Laslett and R. Wall (eds.), Household and family in past time, Cambridge 1972, 375–400.
- M. L. Meriwether, The kin who count. Family and society in Ottoman Aleppo 1770–1840, Austin, Tex. 1999.
- T. Okawara, Size and structure of Damascus households in the late Ottoman period as compared with Istanbul households, in B. Doumani (ed.), Family history in the Middle East. Household, property, and gender, Albany, N.Y. 2003, 51–75.
- L. Peirce, Morality tales. Law and gender in the Ottoman court of Aintab, Berkeley 2003.
- M. N. Todorova, Balkan family structure and the European pattern. Demographic developments in Ottoman Bulgaria, Washington, D.C. 1993.

TOMOKI OKAWARA

South Asia

Modern scholars have defined the South Asian household as a co-residential and commensal unit. This scholarship has been fashioned by two different trends. Social historians, frustrated by finding that the records came from ruling households rather than from peasants or commoners, felt free to ignore them as unrepresentative. Only historians interested in state formation studied the ruling households of the region. Thus Blake (1979) studying the Mughal Empire (1526–1858) found it necessary to focus on the imperial household as a microcosm of the “patrimonial-bureaucratic empire.” Social anthropologists, on the other hand, have written much on the household but have paid little attention to religion (Vatuk 1989, 109). Since neither the historians nor the anthropologists have seen Islam as significant for the household, it is at present only possible to outline a history of Muslim households in the subcontinent.

Islam arrived in South Asia in the seventh century. By the middle of the twentieth century, Sunnī Islam had become the dominant school though other variants of Islam maintained a strong presence within the Muslim community. This long history was marked by enormous diversity in the ethnic-cultural practices that shaped Islamic institutions. The first Arab Muslim migrants were joined by large numbers of Muslims from Central and West Asia, and East Africa. The group and individual conversion of South Asians to Islam increased the diversity of belief and practice within the community. Thus Muslims were linguistically, ethnically, and socially diverse. Through the centuries, connections developed between soldiers, courtiers, scribes, and rural societies organized around Islamic holy men, and class-rank distinctions and hierarchies were elaborated within the South Asian Muslim community.

Of these four main social groups, only women from the courtly groups have left any significant literary traces. A comparative study of such records allows us to simultaneously locate significant continuities in Muslim elite conceptions of “family,” “ancestry,” and “kinship” as well as to glimpse the tectonic shifts that had occurred by the twentieth century. Structurally speaking, the multi-layered household described by a sixteenth-century Mughal princess in her History of Humāyūn resembles those depicted in twentieth-century memoirs of women from the landed gentry of Northern India. But while the sixteenth-century household may have contained the multiple wives of a Mughal grandee, later elite households in the region were rarely polygynous. In both periods, however, these households contained multiple generations of consanguineous kin, as well as large numbers of unrelated people. The wealthier households encompassed large numbers of dependents who were either distant kindred or elderly kinswomen, or non-kin recipients of charity. Since believing Muslims are enjoined to give a portion of their income to charity, the presence of unrelated or very minimally related people within these households was itself a public display of piety. But charitable intent notwithstanding, such households were also organized to extract, and differentially reward, labor services of various kinds. It is always, therefore, difficult to distinguish the dependent but free kinsman or kinswoman from the dependent non-free servitor.

All accounts record an elaborate hierarchy of female and male servants. Elderly supervisors and wet-nurses were the most powerful and new young slaves the least powerful. But the same accounts also record change: thus wet-nurses often acquired the status of foster-parents to children they had suckled; and the children of wet-nurses were to be regarded as foster-siblings by their charges. This elevation would be registered during ceremonial moments in the life cycle of the child and of the household. The longer the record of service, the greater the moral claim of such a servant upon the attention and resources of the household.

With the spread of British colonialism in the nineteenth century, attention shifted to the gender-segregated and secluded nature of women’s lives within such households. While some accounts may be exaggerated, it is important to understand that seclusion practices were being adopted by growing numbers of Muslims as part of intensified social stratification. While some ruling groups lost their wealth and fell in status, families of scholars, artisans, and substantial peasants began to claim higher rank. Since seclusion had been an important symbol of social position, upwardly mobile groups in the nineteenth century also adopted this aristocratic practice. Purdah, or the seclusion of women, accompanied claims to genealogical depth, and/or “foreign” origins and served to consolidate social prestige among Muslims.

Another social practice associated with a particular moment in the ascent of such a lineage was increasing marital exclusivity. Anthropologists refer to this as the adoption of endogamous marriage for junior members. Endogamous marriages were justified by the learned as required by kafā’a (Arabic) or barabari (Urdu) (similarity of status of bride and groom). The criteria for status, however, differed between groups. Among the southern Indian Muslim followers of the Shāfi’ī law, the principal criteria in the nineteenth century were descent, freedom, religion, and occupation. Some even required a formal assent to a certain austerity in marriage rites and celebrations. Simultaneously, the northern Muslims following Hanafi law applied the criteria of pedigree, generations elapsed since conversion to Islam, religiosity, wealth, occupational status, and intellect.

This attention to legal detail in social life coincided with the increasing “purification” of Islam within South Asia during the nineteenth century. In this social and legal context, memories of accepting brides from socially distinct or even non-Muslim communities became an embarrassment in the contemporary Islamic scale of values. While the historical record for many such households in the subcontinent reveals a range of relationships from slave-concubinage to ritualized unions with daughters and sisters of local non-Muslim hegemony, the indigenous language histories produced by these Muslim households either tended to erase these women from the relevant family histories or spoke of them as mankūha. This last usage inverted the formal meaning of nikāh (Islamic nuptials) by recording it as a ceremony inferior to the elaborately performed shādī in South Asia. So custom continued to operate alongside a growing reference to Sharīʿa among many Muslim households.

The role of the colonial administration in both reshaping and maintaining customs among Muslims in South Asia is a deeply contentious one. In some annexed provinces like Punjab (annexed in 1849), colonial administrators maintained customary practices such as unilineal descent, patrilineal inheritance, and primogeniture. This legitimized deviation from the system of proportionate shares allotted to women in Islamic law, and appears to have seriously affected the property rights of daughters, sisters, and widowed and divorced Muslim women.

Imperial British law directly reshaped household customs at another level too. While diverse sexual relationships could co-exist within the same household from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century, colonial legal measures and interpretations of Islamic laws diminished the viability of such patterns by classifying children born of non-ritual unions as illegitimate. This process also led to the degradation of earlier fosterage and adoption practices that had prevailed in these households, and now began to be identified by Muslim legists too as un-Islamic.

These changes significantly altered relations within substantial households. Hortatory Islamic literature in the nineteenth century addressed women in print for the first time. Texts began to urge women of upwardly mobile Muslim groups to become knowledgeable and skilled laborers. This signals both the entry of new groups without established claims upon, and the older elites’ loss of command over, servile and dependent labor. The autobiographies of educated Muslim men in the nineteenth century suggest that skilled labors by women, particularly as seamstresses and spinners, in turn sustained households through the stress of economic and social transition.

Muslim households everywhere were affected by the Partition of 1947. Large numbers of Muslims migrated from India to the newly established nation of Pakistan. Joint-family households were split up. Property-owning Muslim households in both nations appear to have responded to financial and political stresses by becoming ever more vigilant about marriage and family constitution. In some areas, the survival strategies of Muslim households headed by widows and unmarried women reinforced kinship claims upon the younger males, who would reside in multiple households by rotation. Such membership of multiple households may be located in a continuum that includes the dual residence (rural-urban) households of incipient professional groups of the nineteenth century and the households from which males migrated as precolonial soldiers and postcolonial blue-collar workers in the Middle East. In sum, the shape and function of Muslim households in South Asia should be seen as historically responsive to the challenges faced by diverse Islamic groups, rather than as fixed and permanent through all time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ahmed (ed.), Caste and social stratification among the Muslims, New Delhi 1973.
- S. P. Blake, The patrimonial-bureaucratic empire of the Mughals, in Journal of Asian Studies 39:1 (1979), 77–94.
- R. Brara, Kinship and the political order. The Afghan Sherwani chiefs of Malerkotla (1454–1957), in T. N. Madan (ed.), Muslim communities of South Asia. Culture, society and power, New Delhi 2001.
- L. Carroll, The Muslim family in India. Law, custom and empirical research, in Contributions to Indian Sociology 18 (1983), 293–300.
- I. Chatterjee, Gender, slavery and the law in colonial India, New Delhi 1999.
- (ed.), Unfamiliar relations. Family and history in South Asia, New Brunswick, N.J. 2004.
- S. Dale, Islamic society on the South Asian frontier. The Mappilas of Malabar 1498–1922, Oxford 1980.
- R. M. Eaton, Essays on Islam and Indian history, New Delhi 2001.
- (ed.), India’s Islamic traditions 711–1750, New Delhi 2003.
- Gulbadan Begam, History of Humāyūn (Humāyūn nāma) by Gulbadan Begam (Princess Rose-Body), trans. A. S. Beveridge, London 1902, repr. Delhi 2001.
- J. Habibullah, Remembrance of days past. Glimpses of a princely state during the Raj, Karachi 2001.
- G. R. G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world. Power, patronage and piety, New York 1998.
- S. S. Ikramulla, Behind the veil, Karachi 1953, repr. 1998.
- S. M. Khan, The Begums of Bhopal, London 2000.

- Lutfallah, Autobiography of Lutfallah, a Mohamedan gentleman; and his transactions with his fellow-creatures, ed. E. B. Eastwick, London 1857.
- B. D. Metcalf, Perfecting women. Maulana Ashraf 'Ali Thanawi's Bihishti Zewar, Berkeley 1990.
- Mrs. B. Mir Hasan 'Ali, Observations on the Mussulmans of India, ed. and intro. W. Crooke, Karachi 1974².
- S. Vatuk, Household form and formation. Variability and social change among South Indian Muslims, in J. N. Gray and D. J. Mearns (eds.), Society from the inside out. Anthropological perspectives on the South Asian household, New Delhi 1989.
- , The cultural construction of shared identity. A south Indian family history, in P. Werbner (ed.), Person, myth and society in South Asian Islam, special issue of Social Analysis 28 (1990), 114–31.
- , Identity and difference or equality and inequality in South Asian Muslim society, in C. J. Fuller (ed.), Caste today, Delhi 1996, 227–62.
- A. M. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life histories of working women in the old city of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992.

INDRANI CHATTERJEE

Sub-Saharan Africa

Centering on women in Muslim communities of Sub-Saharan Africa, this entry begins with an overview of household forms and composition; it then emphasizes the complexity of women's experiences by considering households in the context of broader social processes, including intra- and inter-household dynamics.

All statistical data in the entry, unless otherwise noted, comes from Demographic and Health Surveys (2003), which includes all countries in the region with significant or majority Muslim populations.

OVERVIEW

The household is the residential unit. It is generally patrilocal; that is, upon marriage women move to men's households. Most houses are owned by men, but in some towns along the Swahili coast 85 percent are owned by women (Askew 1999). Six primary household forms include: three elementary types (single parent, nuclear, and polygynous); two extended types (three-generational and lateral); and same sex. In addition, "hearth-holds" (Ekejiuba 1995) are nested within most households. Over their lifetimes, most women reside at least briefly in each of these forms. By most definitions, each household includes a head. Twenty-five percent are female-headed. Nuclear households are the norm; that is, slightly more households are nuclear than any other form. There is no evidence that nuclear households are becoming more common or smaller (Bongaarts 2001). Three-generational and lateral households, about equal in number, are the next most common; these are followed closely by polygynous and same sex, also roughly equal in number. Single-parent households are by far the least common.

The mean household size is about six, including 2.8 adults and 3.2 children. Twenty percent of households have only one or two members, whereas 15 percent have nine or more members. Extended households are generally larger than elementary ones, but no systematic evidence exists linking household form and size. Twenty-five percent include at least one foster child. Although no statistical data is available, many households include residential domestic workers.

Single-parent households consist only of a head and his or her children. The majority are female headed.

Nuclear households consist only of a head, one spouse, and their children. A tiny minority are female-headed.

Polygynous households consist only of a male head, two to four spouses, and their children.

Three-generational households include grandparents, their adult male offspring often together with their wives, and their grandchildren. Very few are female-headed. Typically they are headed by either a grandfather or the eldest male of the middle generation.

Laterally extended households often include siblings and sometimes their spouses, cousins and other relatives of the head, and sometimes friends of the siblings, usually of the head. The vast majority are male headed.

Same sex households consist primarily of either adult males or females, who may or may not be relatives. Females head all female same sex households.

Hearth-holds are mother-children units within households, symbolically defined by the hearths owned by virtually all adult women.

LIVED EXPERIENCES OF WOMEN IN HOUSEHOLDS

This overview of general patterns provides only a snapshot view of household forms and composition. "The household" is not a static institution. Household forms have evolved through centuries of complex interaction between Islam and African models, and through a century in adaptation to colonialism, urbanization, capitalism, nationalism, and global media. Households are not discrete entities; they are embedded within wider structures and broader systems of production, consumption, and distribution (Guyer and Peters 1987). Household forms are "in continual flux as the domestic cycle unfolds and as families respond to changing opportunities and constraints” (Gage et al. 1997, 299).

Households are the dynamic center of female social life. Girls are born and mature in households. Women do most of their work and socializing, and experience marriage, sex, and motherhood, and die in households.

POWER AND INTERPERSONAL RELATIONS

While some researchers insist that women are categorically subordinate in the household, recent studies reveal a far more complex reality. In practice, even in cases where a woman is the main provider for the household, a man is often designated as its head. Even so, as noted earlier, 25 percent of households in the region are female-headed according to survey data. Five percent of female heads live with husbands, and “high proportions of married women are living separately from their husbands” (Guyer 1981, 104).

Merely identifying a head reveals little about hierarchical power relationships within households, obscuring the agency of women. Power is complex in the household, all “participate in the decision-making process. A patriarch rarely makes decisions alone” (Sow 1985, 564). Households are sites “of separable, often competing, interests, rights, and responsibilities” (Guyer and Peters 1987, 210). Innovative terms such as “hearth-holds” reveal that virtually all women enjoy some measure of independence within broader households. Senior women command respect and deference from junior women.

Women’s money-making jobs are a source of significant power in households. The vast majority are self-employed; “they manage their own business affairs, with little or no input from males other than from those the women specifically ask for advice or whom they employ” (Sudarkasa 1985, 56). Women control their own incomes, which often exceed men’s (Cooper 2001, Quimby 1979, Sudarkasa 1985). Despite Muslim family law, which stipulates that husbands must provide food, shelter, clothing, and medical care for all their wives and children, women “increasingly take on the burden of feeding themselves and their children” (Cooper 2001, 268).

Pervasive gender segregation of space and activities can be a source of great power and autonomy for women, including wives in seclusion. Many women value the household as a refuge from a hostile world where they are fighting a difficult struggle for the “right to be seen publicly without being stigmatized morally” (Cooper 2001, 268). Only female visitors are permitted to enter. Complex women’s networks and voluntary associations are created by systematic visiting patterns and meetings in households.

Women’s interpersonal relationships in households are highly variable. Many enjoy loving, kind, and hardworking husbands, and close relationships with other women, including co-wives (Sudarkasa 1982). In contrast, many women suffer from domestic violence and other abuse at the hands of men. Furthermore, tension between co-wives is a widespread problem. In the Hausa language, the term for co-wife is kishiya, “jealous one.” Women’s music and dance often expresses anger regarding all of these problems (Askew 1999, Quimby 1979).

MEMBERSHIP

Defining household membership is difficult. Individuals regularly enter through marriage, birth, adoption, and immigration, and regularly leave through divorce, death, and emigration. Muslim Sub-Saharan Africans experience some of the highest rates of nuptiality, fertility, adoption, and migration in the world, and divorce is fairly common. The hardships of living with in-laws endured by married women with migrant husbands, including being treated disrespectfully and facing increased workloads, is one of the most common themes in women’s oral literature and emerging voice in published novels, poetry, and short stories (Buggs-Boyd and Scott 2003).

Boundaries between household forms and particular households are often highly permeable. For example, polygynous households are often embedded in three-generational households. In some places, polygyny is practiced non-coresidentially (Tipple et al. 1994). Many women maintain overlapping memberships by spending roughly equal amounts of time in their rural nuclear households, their natal three-generational households, and in urban same-sex households as migrant workers.

ACTIVITIES

Households are also defined by their activities. This includes sleeping under the same roof or within the same self-contained compound dwelling. Most women, including all women in polygynous households, have their own spatially separate living and sleeping space. This can be a separate room within one structure, or more typically a stand-alone single-room dwelling within the compound. Household members share costs and contribute labor toward its maintenance. Most of the actual labor in women’s income generating jobs – typically as food processors, traders, crafts producers, and purveyors of cooked foods – is performed in households. Mothers play an essential role in the socialization process: "before the child is seven, the father has no direct role in childrearing" (Sow 1985, 565). Women are responsible for all household cleaning and cooking, except in same sex male households. Most meals are taken at the same time within the household in gender and age segregated groups.

MATERIAL LIVING CONDITIONS

Compounds include one or more households. Compounds are enclosed spaces, usually square in shape, bounded by two-meter high walls. There is only one entrance. Houses are built against the outer walls, with their doors and windows facing an interior courtyard. Households consist of a mean of three rooms each about twelve square meters, including a living room and two sleeping rooms with a mean of three persons per sleeping room. Houses are constructed of either local, handmade mud bricks or thatch, in roughly equal prevalence. A tiny minority are built with industrially manufactured bricks.

Most households lack industrially manufactured amenities. Only 25 percent have electricity, and only 33 percent enjoy piped water. Only 7 percent include flush toilets, while 49 percent have pit toilets, and 44 percent have no toilet. Fifty-five percent have dirt floors. Fifty percent of households own radios, while only 10 percent have televisions, and 2 percent have telephones.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- K. Askew, Female circles and male lines. Gender dynamics along the Swahili coast, in Africa Today 46 (1999), 67-102.
- J. Bongaarts, Household size and composition in the developing world in the 1990s, in Population Studies 55 (2001), 263-79.
- D. Boyd-Buggs and J. H. Scott (eds.), Camel tracks. Critical perspectives on Sahelian literature, Trenton, N.J. 2003.
- B. Callaway, Ambiguous consequences of the socialisation and seclusion of Hausa women, in Journal of Modern African Studies 22 (1984), 429-50.
- B. Cooper, The politics of difference and women's associations in Niger. Of "prostitutes," the public, and politics, in D. Hodgson and S. McDurdy (eds.), "Wicked" women and the reconfiguration of gender in Africa, Portsmouth, N.H. 2001, 255-73.
- Demographic and Health Surveys, <<http://www.measuredhs.com>>.
- F. Ekejiuba, Down to fundamentals. Women-centered hearth-holds in rural West Africa, in D. Bryceson (ed.), Women wielding the hoe. Lessons from rural Africa for feminist theory and development practice, Oxford 1995, 47-62.
- A. Gage et al., Household structure and childhood immunization in Niger and Nigeria, in Demography 35 (1997), 295-309.

- J. I. Guyer, Household and community in African studies, in African Studies Review 24 (1981), 87-137.
- J. I. Guyer and P. E. Peters, Conceptualizing the household. Issues of theory and policy in Africa, in Development and Change 18 (1987), 197-213.
- K. Hansen, Introduction. Domesticity in Africa, in K. Hansen (ed.), African encounters with domesticity, New Brunswick, N.J. 1992, 1-33.
- L. Quimby, Islam, sex roles, and modernization in Bobo-Dioulasso, in B. Jules-Rosette (ed.), The new religions of Africa, Norwood, N.J. 1979, 203-18.
- F. Sow, Muslim families in contemporary Black Africa, in Current Anthropology 26 (1985), 563-70.
- N. Sudarkasa, African and Afro-American family structure, in J. Cole (ed.), Anthropology for the eighties, New York 1982, 132-60.
- , Female employment and family organization in West Africa, in F. Steady (ed.), The black woman cross-culturally, Rochester, Vt. 1985, 49-63.
- G. Tiple et al., House and dwelling, family and household. Towards defining housing units in West African cities, in Third World Planning Review 16 (1994), 429-50.

SCOTT M. YOUNGSTEDT

Turkey

European travelers often described Ottoman Muslim households as patriarchal extended families having large numbers of slaves and servants. They focused their descriptions on harem life, polygynous marriages, and concubines. They degraded Muslim women, seeing them as sexual objects who were kept strictly inside the harem. This Orientalist perspective was adopted by the modernizing elites in Turkey, who criticized family life in their writings. Only during the last two decades have serious studies on Ottoman families and harem life emerged and the Orientalist myths about Muslim families and women been refuted (Duben 1985, Geber 1989, Duben and Behar 1991, Peirce 1993).

Using the 1885 and 1907 Ottoman census records (Tahrir Defterleri), Duben and Behar (1991) showed that the dominant household type in Istanbul was the simple family. Polygyny was practiced in not more than 2 percent of households. Late marriage and low fertility levels, comparable to the large European cities, were prevalent in Istanbul at the turn of the century. Even in rural Anatolia the majority lived in simple family households from the nineteenth century (Duben 1985). High mortality and poor economic conditions meant few could live in extended family households with large numbers of kin and non-kin members. In addition, late age at marriage (particularly of men) was responsible for the dominance of simple families in Istanbul.

Domestic slave use was widespread among the Muslim elites. Ubcini (1998) claimed that some households had hundreds of slaves and that slaves constituted one third of the Muslim population of Istanbul in the early nineteenth century. Restriction of slave trade, economic crises, and the spread of Western ideas gradually reduced the total number of slaves. In 1907, about one fifth of the households had slaves; most of these had one or two slaves (Özbay 1999).

In the period from the Ottoman-Russian War in 1877 to the establishment of the republic (1923), war casualties, internal conflicts, and mass migration from the Balkans and Caucasia to Anatolia led to a radical increase of single-parent families, non-family, and single person households. In 1885 the proportion of non-family and single person households reached 30 percent in Istanbul and declined to 20 percent in 1907 (Duben and Behar 1991). Even in 1907, 14 percent of all households heads were female. This proportion often did not include single-parent households. Women tended to declare their sons, no matter how young they were, as heads. During these years, for the first time Muslim women were allowed to work in urban areas (Özbay 1998a). Thousands of girl orphans and daughters of poor villagers had to work as residential servants in middle-class urban households (Özbay 1999).

Patriarchal extended family living, though not a dominant type, was idealized by the masses. The nationalist state advocated monogamous, simple families with no servants as the ideal national family (milli aile). It required that religious marriage be contracted only after fulfillment of the civil marriage contract, which was part of the Civil Code, in which polygamous marriage was restricted and inheritance and divorce rights for women were given, yet male headship was acknowledged. Accordingly, the law allowed men to decide upon the location of the marital house, and a woman had to obtain the permission of her husband to work outside the house. The family was considered to be the basis of society and this statement was included in the constitution. The state encouraged marriages and high fertility. This exaggerated concern with the family shaped the place of women in the family as well as in society. When the male deficiency in population recovered women retired from the labor force and many of them devoted their life to their family members and to good housekeeping activities in order to be "modern" and good citizens.

The findings of the first nationwide survey on family indicated that the dominant type was a nuclear family household in both urban and rural areas in 1968 (Timur 1972). Patriarchal extended households were found among well-to-do families. Thirty years later, in 1998, the proportion of simple family households increased to 72 percent. Multiple family households declined considerably to 10 percent. Research conducted in an Anatolian town, Ereğli, revealed that while former multiple family households of the elite rapidly turned to the nuclear form, a relatively small proportion of such household type was adopted by lower-middle classes solely as a survival strategy between 1962 and 1982 (Özbay 1998).

The average household size was 5.6 persons in 1968 and declined to 4.2 in 1998. This was partially related to declining fertility. In 1965 the state adopted a policy to reduce family size and advocated family planning methods for couples who wanted to control their family size. Total fertility rate declined from 7 to 2 children per family between 1950 and 2000 (Yavuz 2003).

Consanguineous marriages constituted 25 percent of the total marriages in 1998 (Hancıoğlu et al. 2001). This high proportion helps maintain the prevailing family-oriented lifestyles. Children usually stay with their parents until they marry (Koç 2002). Turkish families are protective of their elderly members, who, however, prefer to live in separate households close by. The incidence of co-residence with the elderly was low (20 percent), and that of living nearby was quite high (50 percent) in 1988 (Aytaç 1998). Increased life expectancy did not lead to a higher proportion of extended living, but instead to an increasing proportion of solitary, simple, and other non-family living patterns. Single person households (5 percent) were mostly females, widows and particularly elderly women, although those with young and unmarried single people consisted mostly of men. The proportion of non-family households was low (2 percent), though it slightly increased between 1978 and 1998; they mostly consisted of kin members. Gay and lesbian living is not significant.

The proportion of female-headed households is low (10 percent in 1998) but shows an increasing trend. These households consist of single-parent as well as solitary and non-family households. They are poorer than the average (Yavuz 2003).

Long years of feminist pressures coming from inside and outside Turkey resulted in a new Civil Code in which gender inequality was eliminated in 2002. Wives are no longer assistants of their husbands, but are equals with them in the eyes of the law. In practice, gender inequality in the family continues. Division of labor within the household between husband and wife reflects this inequality. Even in households where both marital partners are working outside, husbands do not share any housework responsibilities; women often care for children and the sick, cook, wash, clean the house, and iron alone. In only about 20 percent of households do women have domestic help (Koç and Ergöçmen 2001).

Studies show that domestic violence is considerably high across the classes (AAK 1995). The prevalence of honor killing is especially a problem for women in less developed eastern Turkey. The state issued the Law for the Protection of the Family in 1998. The primary aim of this law is to protect the family in cases of domestic violence by recommending the “faulty party” – often men – to behave themselves.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A.A.K. (Aile Araştırma Kurumu), Aile içi şiddetin sebep ve sonuçları, Ankara 1995.
- I. Aytaç, Intergenerational living arrangements in Turkey, in Journal of Cross-Cultural Gerontology 13 (1995), 241–64.
- A. Duben, Turkish families and households in historical perspective, in Journal of Family History 10:1 (1985), 75–97.
- A. Duben and C. Behar, Istanbul households. Marriage, family, and fertility, 1880–1940, Cambridge 1991.
- H. Geber, Anthropology and family history. The Ottoman and Turkish families, in Journal of Family History 14:4 (1989), 409–21.
- A. Hancıoğlu et al., Türkiye’de akraba evlilikleri. 1998 Türkiye nüfus ve sağlık araştırması, in Nüfusbilim Yazıları 3 (2001), 1–14.
- İ. Koç, Female headed households in Turkey and socio-demographic and economic characteristics of female household heads, in Turkish Journal of Population Studies 19 (1997), 73–99.
- , Timing of leaving home in Turkey and its relationship with other life course events, in Turkish Journal of Population Studies 23 (2001), 16–24.
- İ. Koç and B. Ergöçmen, Analysis of the relationship between women’s modernity level and women’s attitudes, beliefs and values about intra-household relation, in Women’s Studies Review 7 (2001), 31–44.
- F. Özbay, Türkiye’de kadın emeği ve istihdamına ilişkin çalışmaların gelişimi, in F. Özbay (ed.), Küresel pazar açısından kadın emeği ve istihdamındaki değişimler. Türkiye örneği, Ankara 1998a, 147–81.
- , Türkiye’de aile ve hane yapısı. Dün, bugün, yarın, in A. B. Hacımirzaoğlu (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998b, 155–72.
- , Turkish female child domestic workers, İstanbul 1999.
- L. Peirce, The imperial harem. Women and sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, New York 1993.
- S. Timur, Türkiye’de aile yapısı, Ankara 1972.
- M. A. Ubicini, Osmanlı’da modernleşme sancısı, İstanbul 1998.
- S. Yavuz, Household composition and complexity in Turkey. Findings from the Turkish Demographic and Health Survey, 1998, M.A. thesis, Hacettepe University, Ankara 2002.

The United States

Household form and membership among Muslims living in the United States differ greatly according to country of origin, education, class, generation since emigration, and many other factors. Some young Muslims who came to the United States for education live on their own or with roommates. Sometimes siblings or other relatives may share a home. The mother who can afford it may accompany one or more children who have come to attend high school or college. Often a young person coming for education may live for a while with relatives. Even when people finish school, start working, and become settled in the United States, households may fluctuate as parents and other relatives come to visit for extended periods of time.

In general, household boundaries among people of Muslim background are relatively permeable and flexible. Visits to family, relatives, and friends are frequent and may involve staying for several nights. Even when people are living separately, they may frequently gather together, maintain daily telephone contact, and cooperate closely with such tasks as cooking or childcare. A nephew or niece, grandparent or other relative may live with a family for a time. Some families of means own two homes, one in the United States and one in the country of origin to accommodate their transnational households.

Parents of Muslim background generally want their children to attend a university close by so that they can continue to live at home. Even if children go to another city for educational purposes, they may frequently live with their parents again upon graduation. Muslim parents generally expect their children, and especially females, to live at home until they marry, despite social or educational class. Especially among first and second generation emigrants, ideas of female modesty and the emphasis on female virginity and chastity influence residential choice for young, unmarried females and even for divorced and widowed adult women. Often parents expect children, especially females, to stay at home and engage in any outside activities with the family rather than with peers. Among conservative families, sometimes a young girl will be sent back to the country of origin for schooling, in order to keep her away from the more liberal interaction between sexes in the United States. Conversely, males may go back to the country of origin to find a bride who has not lived in the freer American environment. Generally only young adults from educated, modernized, secularized, middle- or upper-class backgrounds will consider cohabiting before marriage. As homosexuality is generally not tolerated among Muslims, gay cohabitation is relatively rare and will usually be kept a secret. Only unusually open minded parents from Muslim backgrounds will tolerate a son or daughter's gay sexual orientation and welcome a partner to their family gatherings.

Among first and second generation working-class emigrants from socially conservative Muslim countries, parents may play a strong role in marriage choice, and often continue to marry their daughters at a relatively young age to somewhat older men. Often in such families there is little emphasis on birth control. The marital relationship and family hierarchy may continue to follow home country cultural expectations, with women relatively isolated within the home. For more modern, well-off, educated, and Westernized Muslims, age of marriage, marriage choice, marital and family dynamics, and postponement and spacing of children will generally become more similar to those of other United States couples.

Generally people from Muslim backgrounds place great importance on obtaining a separate residence for a bridal couple, even if a young couple traditionally lived with the groom's parents for a period in their country of origin. Sometimes, young couples are able to find homes near parents or other relatives, especially in more localized Muslim communities. Depending on class and level of education, modern couples may live at a distance to take advantage of career possibilities. Although relatives may be scattered among the home country and other countries abroad, generally they attempt to maintain close relations through frequent telephoning and visiting.

Polygyny, allowed in Islam although illegal in the United States, does exist in rare instances, particularly among people from less modern, more conservative Muslim backgrounds. Some African American sectarian movements allow for multiple wives. A second wife and her children may live in a separate residence, although financial pressures often result in common residency. People may be cautious about revealing a polygynous marriage, and a second wife may be presented as a sister or other relative, rather than a spouse.

Although in past decades even middle-class families in Muslim countries of origin often had live-in servants, this practice is rarely followed in the United States. American Muslim households are relatively self-sufficient, and members generally attend to home and childcare work themselves. Professional families may hire yard workers, house cleaners, or other help, as is common among American upper classes and increasingly among the middle class as well. People of Muslim background are generally hesitant to hire baby-sitters or send pre-schoolers to childcare facilities although professional or wealthy families and women who must work and have no other alternatives may do so.

In general, depending on different circumstances, families from Islamic cultures are becoming increasingly nuclear. As young people attend university in different parts of the country and find jobs in cities away from their parents, they may find a spouse who is either from their own country of origin or another Muslim country, or even a non-Muslim American. Parents usually want their children to marry a Muslim from the same country, but out-marriage, especially among more educated modern groups is not unusual. Rarely will a young couple live with parents in an extended family situation beyond a period of time that some less advantaged couples need to establish themselves economically. When parents still live in the country of origin or when the spouse is not from the same background, interaction and amount of time spent together will generally be minimized. In the American environment, as young wives are more often educated, have been enculturated into higher expectation of personal autonomy, and work outside the home, the influence and interference of parents-in-law in their lives and decision-making is declining.

Especially among the better off and educated Muslim emigrant populations, divorce rates are rising. Thus the proportion of households with a single parent, especially a mother, is increasing. Although among more conservative American Muslims pressures still exist to prevent a female living by herself, among modernized groups divorced and single women often live alone.

Until recently elderly parents commonly lived with their children, or one or more children and their families continued to live in the parental home. Such extended family households are becoming less common in the United States. Among more conservative, less advantaged groups whose parents are with them and do not know English, parents often live with the children. Among better off groups, when parents come to the United States to be closer to their children, they often live separately. Even widowed mothers may live in their own homes. Some families look for homes with a semi-separate section or adjacent structure for older parents. If they do not know English, older parents may feel lonely and isolated, even if living with their children, when the middle generation are all out working and the children are in school. Sometimes better off older parents living in the United States make regular trips back to home countries to visit relatives and friends. Conversely, more financially comfortable older parents living in home countries may come and stay with their children in the United States for extended periods of time. Not unusually, older parents, more often mothers, will care for grandchildren on a regular basis, either living in the same home or not far away, so that the mother can work or attend university.

A small minority of elderly Muslims live in senior facilities and nursing homes, especially those without families, or those who need constant care and whose children are working. Muslims place high value on caring for parents within the home and, when circumstances force them to seek care facilities for their parents, they feel emotionally distressed. Slowly Muslim communities are beginning to establish clubs, centers, and day care or activity centers for seniors. Because Muslim men tend to marry younger women, and also because of women's greater longevity, women are widowed more commonly than men. Further, widowed or divorced men more often tend to remarry, or to live with one of their children or another relative, or at least receive care from a daughter who may come regularly to cook and clean.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afghami (ed.), Women in exile, Charlottesville 1994.
 S. Ali, Madras on rainy days, New York 2004.
 B. C. Aswad and B. Bilg  (eds.), Family and gender among American Muslims. Issues facing Middle Eastern immigrants and their descendants, Philadelphia 1996.
 T. Bahrapour, To see and see again. A life in Iran and America, Berkeley 1999.
 F. Dumas, Funny in Farsi. A memoir of growing up Iranian in America, New York 2003.
 Y. Y. Haddad, The Muslims of America, New York 1991.
 Y. Y. Haddad and J. I. Smith (eds.), Muslim communities in North America, Albany, N.Y. 1994.
 M. E. Hegland, Iranian women immigrants facing modernity in California's Bay Area. The courage, creativity, and trepidation of transformation, in G. Amin (ed.), The Iranian woman and modernity. Proceedings of the ninth international conference of the Iranian Women's Studies Foundation, Cambridge, Mass. 1999, 35-62.
 K. Hosseini, The kite runner, New York 2003.
 R. Kelly and J. Friedlander (eds.), Irangenes. Iranians in Los Angeles, Berkeley 1993.
 P. Omidian, Aging and family in an Afghan refugee community. Transitions and transformation, New York 1996.
 S. Pari, The fortune catcher. A novel, New York 1997.

MARY ELAINE HEGLAND

Human Rights

Overview

The area of human rights is a “limited exception” to the general absence and impact of women from and on the substance and process of international law (Charlesworth and Chinkin 2000, 16). The term human rights refers herein to the human rights norms established in the international system in and following from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 (UDHR). The discourse of “women’s rights are human rights” is one of several ongoing discourses and debates provoked by a consideration of women, gender, and human rights, and indicates the relatively recent concentration on the specific subject of women’s rights by “traditional” human rights institutions and organizations. Another is the debate on universality of rights versus cultural relativity, and closely related to this is the discourse of “Islamic human rights,” the compatibility or otherwise of the “status of woman in Islam” with the requirements of international human rights standards. This in turn involves both state practice, in terms of the determinations made by Muslim majority states as to the requirements and applications of Islamic law on matters to do with the status and position of women, and the debates in Muslim communities (domestically, regionally, and internationally) as to these requirements. Issues of “voice,” of “authority,” and of representation figure prominently in these debates, linking to the discourses of postcolonialism and feminism.

Commentators credit the efforts of women’s non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in securing provisions in the United Nations Charter (1945) prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of sex and providing for equal rights of men and women, in advance of the UDHR. Similar efforts secured the establishment of the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women (CSW) in 1946. The CSW has always had a majority of women delegates, and maintains close links with the women’s NGO movement. Despite the CSW’s considerable achievements, Connors observes that on the specific subject of human rights, “its existence has, ironically, contributed to the neglect by both the traditional United Nations human rights framework and human rights NGOs of issues of concern to women” (1996, 152). For the first decades, most women’s NGOs focused on the CSW rather than the mainstream human rights mechanisms. Women’s organizations did participate in the 1960s in the drafting processes for the two International Covenants, on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which include the requirements of non-discrimination and equal rights. Nevertheless, writing in 1997, Gallagher noted “a near-unanimity amongst women human rights activists that ‘specialization’ has become ‘marginalization’ – that women and their concerns remain on the sidelines of United Nations activity for the protection and promotion of human rights” (1997, 285). One reason advanced by commentators for this marginalization is the “public/private divide” (contested in postcolonial and feminist discourses) that tended to leave abuses in the “private” sphere of the home and family outside the purview of state-focused international human rights law.

A formal call for the “mainstreaming” of women’s rights in the United Nations system was made at the Second World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna in 1993. In the final document of the conference, states agreed that the human rights of women were “an inalienable, integral and indivisible part of human rights.” For Sullivan, the most striking result at Vienna was that “the conference crystallized a political consensus that various forms of violence against women should be examined within the context of human rights standards and in conjunction with gender discrimination” (1994, 152). The intense preparatory and lobbying efforts of women’s rights and NGO activists worldwide are generally credited with the achievements at Vienna. Links between women’s rights and human rights organizations were strengthened, and the 1990s also saw increasing attention paid to abuses of women’s human rights by the “traditional” international human rights NGOs. This period also saw a preference for the term “gender” over the use of “women.” In 1994, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights appointed the first Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women, in this action mandating the first gender-specific brief for a Special Rapporteur. In 2000, the Human Rights Committee issued in its General Comment 28 an analysis of the gender-specific implications of the ICCPR, article by article. This particular effort at mainstreaming gender perspectives came nearly two decades after a specialized convention on women's rights came into force, its origins lying in the CSW. Most recently, some observers and activists have questioned the effectiveness of the "mainstreaming" approach.

In 1965, a resolution was sponsored at the United Nations General Assembly by a group of Eastern European and developing countries calling for a declaration on the elimination of discrimination against women. The declaration was voted on in the General Assembly in 1967 and the CSW tasked with overseeing its implementation. In advance of the International Women's Year declared by the United Nations General Assembly for 1975, the CSW set up a working group to prepare for a convention specifically addressing discrimination against women. The International Women's Year Conference in Mexico City decided on an International Decade for Women (1976–85) and formally called for the drafting of a convention. The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW, also referred to as the Women's Convention) was adopted by the General Assembly in 1979 and opened for signature; it entered into force in 1981. According to Charlesworth and Chinkin, the approach of the Women's Convention "acknowledges that, for women, protection of civil and political rights is meaningless without attention to the economic, social and cultural context in which they operate" (2000, 217). This meant, inter alia, tackling the "private sphere" and the conduct of non-state actors. Among its provisions, the Women's Convention requires states parties to take appropriate measures to modify laws, customs, and practices that constitute discrimination against women, and to ensure equality of rights for women and men in a range of matters relating to marriage and the family. These areas are central to the debates on cultural relativity and on women's rights in Islam.

Although Muslim majority states were involved from the inception of work on the Women's Convention at the CSW, the General Assembly debates were long and intense, and several involved issues presented as in conflict with the requirements of Islamic law or, more precisely, the Shari'a. A number of Muslim majority states abstained on specific articles and five abstained on the final vote for the convention. Today most Muslim majority states are parties. As at 3 June 2003, the convention had 174 states parties; of the 57 members of the Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC), 49 are parties to CEDAW, with 6 of the exceptions also being members of the League of Arab States.

The Women's Convention has drawn an unusual number of reservations from states parties across the world, prompting commentators to question the actual commitment of the world community of states to the implementation of women's rights (Cook 1990, 644). According to Connors, however, "the most notorious reservations to the Women's Convention have been made by countries who apply, to a greater or lesser extent, the Islamic shari'a" (1996, 352). The controversial nature of reservations entered by certain Muslim majority states arises from their generality, purporting to subject commitments under the entire convention to the principles or norms of Shari'a law or applying a reservation to the general undertaking (in article 2) to take legislative action to eliminate discrimination. Substantive articles of the convention frequently reserved by Muslim majority states parties are article 15, which provides for equality of women with men before the law, including in legal capacity and at all stages of court procedure, and in "the law relating to the movement of persons and the freedom to choose their residence and domicile"; and article 16 requiring states to "take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations." A number of states have also made reservations to article 9 regarding equal rights to nationality and to the nationality of children.

In the 1980s, following the entering into force of the Women's Convention, objections were filed by co-parties to the convention to certain reservations including the broad texts submitted by Egypt and Bangladesh, and the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (responsible for monitoring implementation of the Women's Convention) proposed in its General Recommendation 4, in the context of its general concern at the number and type of reservations entered to the convention, that the United Nations should "promote or undertake studies on the status of women under Islamic laws and customs and in particular on the status and equality of women in the family . . . taking into consideration the principle of El Ijtihad in Islam." Debates on these issues at the United Nations were heated; Connors reports allegations of "cultural imperialism and religious intolerance" and warnings against "using the Convention as a pretext for doctrinaire attacks on Islam," and the General Assembly subsequently agreed that no further action be taken on the CEDAW suggestion (1996, 362). Objections continue to be filed to similar reservations entered by certain Muslim majority parties who have become parties to the convention in more recent years, such as Saudi Arabia, the Maldives, and Mauritania, and the committee continues to seek information from states on progress toward the withdrawal of reservations.

Such debates raise the substantive question of compatibility of such reservations with the Women's Convention, on the one hand, and the compatibility of the convention with Islamic law on the other. Also arising is the substance and interpretation of "Islamic law," or "the Islamic Shar'ā," as presented by state representatives at the United Nations and in their domestic legal systems. In terms of process, they also illustrate the politicized nature of debates when "Islamic law" and "international women's rights" are posed as conflicting norms of competing authority. The risk that certain interventions may be perceived or presented as "attacks on Islam" poses particular challenges to advocates of women's human rights, both domestically and internationally. More recently, the General Assembly has seen similarly heated interventions and a lack of consensus in debates on draft resolutions on the subject of eliminating crimes against women committed in the name of honor; in 2000, the majority of the 25 abstentions to the resolution on this subject were from Muslim majority states, with delegates objecting to the apparent singling out of a particular "culture" and the perceived association of "honor killings" with Islam.

Muslim majority states articulate concern at the exploitation of the human rights discourse for political ends. The 1997 OIC summit, while recalling the objectives of the UDHR, called on members "to continue to actively coordinate and cooperate among themselves in the field of human rights in order to strengthen Islamic solidarity to confront any initiative leading to the exploitation of human rights as a means of exerting political pressure against any Member State." While Muslim majority states under criticism for their human rights record in international forums have political interests in seeking to divert and undermine such criticism, it is the case that in the Muslim world more generally there is a perception of selectivity in the application of human rights discourse and principles by powerful "Western" states. According to Mayer, "to Muslims, this suggests that the West is biased against Islam and more inclined to charge Muslims than others with rights violations, while at the same time the West minimizes or disregards the sufferings of Muslims deprived of their rights" (1994, 313). The question of Palestine is among grievances contributing to this perception. More broadly, Moosa sets "the abuse of human rights discourse" in the context of the "hegemony of market capitalism and the globalization of Western political culture," observing that "it has become a political weapon in the hands of powerful nations in order to subdue emerging nations and those communities contesting the monopoly of global political power." He combines this with a criticism of the response of some "Islamic nations" to describe "a monumental, unrelentingly bleak account of the status of human rights in the international discourse" (2000-1, 205). These issues have been heightened in the aftermath of the attacks in the United States of 11 September 2001.

As well as being implicated in these dynamics in Muslim communities, the international women's human rights discourse is a central feature in the debate on cultural relativity versus universality of rights. Charlesworth and Chinkin observe that "it is striking that 'culture' is much more frequently invoked in the context of women's rights than in any other area" (2000, 222). Central to the debate is the equality paradigm, which underpins the women's human rights norms and discourse, and which is held by critics to illustrate the "Eurocentrism" of human rights norms. The universality/cultural relativity debate was a contentious issue at the 1993 Vienna World Conference on Human Rights, and likewise at the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing in 1995. At the latter, the term "gender" also became an issue, with certain Muslim majority states joining the Holy See and others to oppose any inference of sexual orientation in its usage.

In response to the equality norm, Muslim majority states have argued for "equitable" or "equivalent" rights for men and women. Illustrative of this is the approach of the Cairo Declaration of Human Rights in Islam, adopted in 1990 by OIC member states to serve "as a general guidance for Member States in the field of human rights." The declaration states that "woman is equal to man in dignity, and has her own rights to enjoy as well as duties to perform" while making the husband "responsible for the maintenance and welfare of the family." This approach points to the gendered text and practice of laws and norms presented by governments, and by the dominant and traditional discourses in Islamic jurisprudence, as an integral part of Islamic culture and indeed religion, particularly although not only in the "private sphere" of marriage and the family. Many Muslim critics, while stressing that numerous areas of traditional Islamic law are entirely consistent with international human rights norms, including certain rights of women, argue against the particularity of "Islamic human rights schemes," and against laws and practices justified by reference to Islam that constitute discrimination under international human rights standards.

The debate on “human rights in Islam” includes what Moosa has described as a “vibrant debate taking place in almost all Muslim societies about the status of women” (2000–1, 204). An important focus is the presentation in state or societal practice of what Islam requires or mandates regarding women’s rights, and different understandings of these requirements formulated by a broad spectrum of critics. These understandings range from “Islamist” positions eschewing international human rights norms as a framework in holding that the Sharī’a gives women all their rights if implemented in full under a Muslim authority, to “secularist” positions that states should leave matters of religion to individuals in their private faith practices. Among the different approaches, some scholars and activists call for a new approach to the text and principles of the sources of Islamic law, a reformulation or reconstruction of Islamic jurisprudence expanding the existing common ground with human rights norms. Among the more recent discourses is “feminist ijtihad”; al-Hibri, for example, criticizes the culturally inspired “social and political assumptions” in traditional, historically-conditioned Islamic jurisprudence as giving rise to “a then common model of state and family relationships which are best described today as authoritarian/patriarchal” (1997, 5).

A number of the Muslim scholars applying themselves to the source texts in this way are based in the West. Challenging the dominant discourses in this regard, whether through textual approaches or through advocacy and activism aimed at state policy, remains a controversial undertaking in different Muslim societies and states. Challenges to advocates of women’s human rights include the conflation of “cultural” or “national” with a particular “authoritative” articulation of Islamic norms in the rise of identity politics. States’ political interests may be served by the invocation of Islam over contested areas of law and policy, while “Islamist” groups may attack the discourse of women’s rights to undermine the credentials of existing regimes. Advocates of international women’s human rights may be accused of alienation, a lack of cultural authenticity, and of seeking to undermine the unity and stability of the Muslim family, and by extension Muslim society, through the importation of Western ideas associated with moral laxity. Opponents of the discourse of gender equality situate it, along with the discourses of “Western feminism,” within the larger context of colonial and neocolonia agendas, cultural imperialism, and hostility to Islam.

Within the rights movements, there is criticism of a Western influence over the agenda of the human rights movement in general and the women’s human rights movement in particular, seeking, for example, greater prioritization of socioeconomic rights and the disproportionate effect on women in the South of structural adjustment policies and the economics of the global market. Generally, there is a consensus on the need to increase internal resonance with human rights norms and discourse, as well as to focus on national and international state law and policy, in order to increase the prospects for implementation of the range of women’s human rights in Islamic cultures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. An-Na’im, Human rights in the Muslim world. Socio-political conditions and scriptural imperatives, in Harvard Human Rights Journal 3 (1990), 13–52.
- M. Baderin, Establishing areas of common ground between Islamic law and international human rights, in International Journal of Human Rights 5:2 (2001), 72–113.
- H. Charlesworth and H. Chinkin, The boundaries of international law. A feminist analysis, Manchester, U.K. 2000.
- J. Connors, Non-governmental organizations and the human rights of women at the United Nations, in P. Willetts (ed.), “The conscience of the world.” The influence of non-governmental organizations in the United Nations system, London 1996, 147–80.
- , The Women’s Convention in the Muslim world, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, Reading, U.K. 1996, 351–71.
- R. Cook, Reservations to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, in Virginia Journal of International Law 30 (1990), 643–716.
- A. Fraser, Becoming human. The origins and development of women’s human rights, in Human Rights Quarterly 21 (1999), 853–906.
- A. Gallagher, Ending the marginalization. Strategies for incorporating women into the United Nations human rights system, in Human Rights Quarterly 19 (1997) 283–333.
- A. al-Hibri, Islam, law and custom. Redefining Muslim women’s rights, American University Journal of International Law and Policy 12:1 (1997), 1–44.
- A. E. Mayer, Universal versus Islamic human rights. A clash of cultures or a clash with a construct?, in Michigan Journal of International Law 15 (1994), 307–404.
- E. Moosa, The dilemma of Islamic rights schemes, in Journal of Law and Religion 15:1/2 (2000–1), 185–215.
- D. Otto, Holding up half the sky, but for whose benefit? A critical analysis of the Fourth World Conference on Women, in Australian Feminist Law Journal 7 (1996), 7–28.
- D. Sullivan, Women’s human rights and the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights, in American Journal of International Law 88:1 (1994), 152–67.

Arab Gulf and Yemen

The current general status of women's human rights conditions in Yemen and the Arab Gulf states is broadly characterized by international and local human rights non-governmental organizations (NGOs) as being abysmal. Progressive changes toward achieving equality for women, particularly in states that maintain religiously based personal status laws that discriminate against women, have been slow. Despite the existence of regional commonalities, reasons for this gloomy status are numerous and vary from country to country. One principal reason, however, relates to the weak status of civil movement for women's human rights.

Civil activism pertaining to women's human rights is widely conditioned by the political framework within which civil society operates in the region. Historically undemocratic state regimes and ostensibly self-declared Islamic ruling elites have consistently inhibited the emergence of effective civil activism for promoting gender equality. Using a plethora of techniques that range from official refusal, to registering local human rights NGOs, to openly imposing life-threatening experiences, harassment, and imprisonment on activists, autocratic regimes in the region have continuously repressed the maturity of not just women's civil activism but credible human rights movements in general (An-Na'im 2001). Existing NGOs representing women's issues are either influenced or controlled by the ruling regimes, a factor that renders them suspect of being government showcases to foreign human rights monitors. Consequently basic human rights enjoyed by women in the region, such as the right to work and to education, are attained not through a history of civil activism but by government sanctions. This reality of inhibited civil activism subjects gender related human rights to the ideological dispositions as well as the political positions of the ruling regimes vis-à-vis internal conservative and religious pressure elements the state may face. Historically, and in the face of thriving political Islamist groups, the autocratic states of the region often appear, paradoxically, as the protectors of women's rights, albeit in limited ways, against the excessive demands of internal politico-religious movements in connection with women's rights.

Commonly in the societies of the region, gender related human rights are intrinsically conditioned by larger normative legal rights granted or suspended by the Shari'a, a divinely ordained system of law that covers the totality of the Muslim way of living, including gender relations and rights.

Consequently, actual rights and triumphant dialogues on women's status within society tend to be those rights and dialogues consistent with interpretations of the Shari'a. External systems of women's human rights norms, such as the universal rights proposed by the United Nations and international conventions, are incorporated when and if they can be rationalized within the internal Shari'a norms.

In the moderate countries of the region, such as Yemen and Bahrain, international human rights standards pertaining to gender equality are incorporated as constitutional rights of all female citizens. Such incorporation, however, cannot override the power of the Shari'a law, which the constitution assigns as the supreme basis of all civil rights, including those regulating marriage contracts and inheritance. Consequently the rights stipulated under the Shari'a override the constitutionally proclaimed rights. Those universal human rights proposed by international organizations are generally faced with difficulties when they contradict or undermine the gender related rights prescribed by the Shari'a.

Despite the Shari'a's evident supremacy, there are other sources that prescribe gender relations, status, and rights. Centuries-old patriarchal customary laws and contemporary socioeconomic factors often coalesce and provide the rationale under which gender inequalities and the violations of women's human rights are perpetuated in this region. In Yemen, for example, legalized insurance policies provide only half the financial indemnities and compensations due to female victims in cases of automobile accidents. The genesis of these policies is a tribal customary law that assigns women half the blood retribution in cases pertaining to homicide or accidental death. Another case is a state decree in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia that denies Saudi women as well as foreign women living in the kingdom the right to drive vehicles. It would be inconceivable to rationalize this law under the Shari'a since women in the early Islamic period had the right to ride camels and horses, the era's means of transportation. Reasons cited for officially suspending such rights relate to social insecurities allegedly associated with the presence of a high percentage of single foreign male migrant workers in the kingdom. Following the Iran-Iraq War (1980–8), a group of 20 Saudi women activists challenged this law by taking to the streets of Riyadh driving cars. Their actions were seen as illegally mutinous and prompted brutal governmental responses. Severe humiliation accompanied by imprisonment and loss of employment opportunities befell those involved.

In spite of the overarching similarities pertaining to suppressed or weak civil activism, autocratic state regimes, and the supremacy of the Sharī'a, gender related human rights conditions in the region are hardly monolithic. In some countries, for example, Bahrain, Qatar, and Yemen, there exist recently adopted democratic reforms (freedom of press, elections, and legalized political parties) that have benefited women. These reforms depart from the undemocratic conservativeness of the remaining countries, especially Saudi Arabia, Oman, and Kuwait, where civil activism and human rights monitoring are entirely prohibited or severely restricted and gender equality still looms rudimentary (An-Na'im 2001). Under these favorably democratic environments, women tend to enjoy a relatively high degree of political freedom. In Yemen and Bahrain, women have equal voting rights. In the former, women's political rights are further advanced than any other country in the region and women can be elected to parliament. Yet these plausible rights do not alter the fact that the largest women's NGO in the country is currently run as a governmental branch.

Gender related human rights civil activism and conditions are not only varied but also have been subject to historical and political transformations. For example, in the case of southern Yemen under two decades of socialist regime in the 1970s and 1980s, radical laws pertaining to gender equality were executed by the state, thereby undermining pre-existing tribalist customary laws and conservative applications of the Sharī'a. Yet these reforms did not come as a result of gender related civil movements but as the ambitions of the socialist state that sought to build a welfare society in which citizens were all productively accountable vis-à-vis the power of the state (Molyneux 1981, Seif 1995, 1997, 2002). The abruptness with which these advantageous human rights conditions were removed in the 1990s following south Yemen's unification with conservative north Yemen attests to the absence of a strong women's movement that could protect gender related rights. Women in Kuwait and Bahrain, on the other hand, are currently benefiting from recently flourishing waves of democratic processes and debates that may allow them full political participation in elections in the general assemblies (majlis al-shūrā).

Similarly, and in spite of inhibited civil activism, several countries in the region including Bahrain, Kuwait, and Yemen have recently appointed or are in the process of appointing ministerial level posts, offices, and committees for the protection of human rights, all of which will have positive effects on the status of gender related human rights in the future. In the case of Yemen, a woman heads the new ministry for human rights.

Notwithstanding these general positive changes, there exist specific groups of women in the region whose basic human rights are systematically violated due to reasons that go beyond societal discriminatory approaches to generalized sexual difference. In Yemen, for example, long histories of cultural persecution and prejudices against minority social groups often subject women perceived to be of African origin to different sets of discrimination and human rights abuses. Equally true is the existence in the region of thousands of foreign female workers from Asia who suffer severe human rights abuses through their status as non-citizen domestic workers. Currently, with no credible human rights civil movements, neither the states themselves nor human rights groups within them seem to be effectively engaged with the protection of the human rights of these groups of women. The gender related basic human rights of women from marginalized minority groups and those of migrant domestic workers, like the rights of all female citizens in the region, still remain unprotected.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Amnesty International, Report on Saudi Arabia, New York 2000.
- A. A. An-Na'im, Islamic foundations of religious human rights, in J. Witte Jr. and J. D. van Vyver (eds.), Religious human rights in global perspective. Religious perspectives, The Hague 1996, 337-59.
- , Human rights in the Arab world. A regional perspective, in Human Rights Quarterly 23:3 (2001), 701-32.
- A. E. Mayer, Islam and human rights. Tradition and politics, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 1995².
- M. Molyneux, State policies and the position of women workers in the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, 1967-77, Geneva 1982.
- H. A. Seif, Contextualizing labor and gender. Class, ethnicity, and global politics in the Yemeni socio-economy, in J. Peters and A. Wolber (eds.), Women's rights, human rights. International feminist perspectives, London 1995, 289-300.
- , Social impediments to girls' access to education in Yemen, Unicef report, San'a 1997.
- , Moralities and outcasts. Domination and allegories of resentment in Southern Yemen, Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 2003.
- United States Department of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, Country report on human rights in Saudi Arabia, Washington, D.C. 2002.

HUDA A. SEIF

Canada

Human rights movements and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in Canada serve to assist Muslim Canadians attain and retain their rights and civil liberties within Canada as well as to highlight their concerns. Women play significant roles as active members of these organizations

The Muslim community in Canada maintains a vibrant and visible role as its largest minority group, with a population of over 650,000 Muslims. In order to assist Canadian Muslims in understanding their role, and to address and disclose injustices they may confront, several organizations have been formed to educate the average citizen about his/her civil rights and freedoms within Canadian society. In 2004, the major organizations include the Muslim Lawyer's Association (MLA); the Canadian-Muslim Civil Liberties Association (CMCLA); the Canadian Council of Muslim Women (CCMW); the Federation of Muslim Women (FMW); the Council of American Islamic Relations-Canada (CAIR-CAN); and the Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC).

The human rights movements in Canada reflect parallel objectives, such as advocating for equal participation of Canadian Muslims in social, educational, legal, and political spheres in accordance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; highlighting educational and legal avenues to guarantee the affiliation of health, social, and public services in order to ensure that they are culturally sensitive and fully accessible to Canadian Muslims; undertaking relevant aspects of public education; disseminating and publicizing material in relation to Islam and Muslims; making resources available in reference to Islam and Muslims; developing, publishing, and distributing resource materials concerning discrimination and cross-cultural education; and presenting the Islamic perspective on issues of importance and relevance to the Canadian public and academia.

The MLA unofficially began in 1992 and was officially inaugurated in 1998. The group consists of individuals of diverse backgrounds in the legal profession. The goals of the MLA are networking, peer support, educational outreach to the Muslim community, and professional advocacy. The organization exists to interact with and assist Muslim lawyers, law students, the Muslim community, the legal profession and the public at large. Women within the organization comprise less than half of the membership and work primarily with the government, NGOs, and commercial companies or organizations. The disproportion of male and female membership of the MLA is due neither to the scarcity of Muslim women lawyers nor their qualification. Following graduation from law school female lawyers face realities such as difficulty in finding an appropriate practice, reduced or changed interest, or their personal preference to tend to domestic responsibilities. Few women have occupied leadership positions. Yusra Siddiquee, an immigration lawyer, was the first and only female interim governor of the MLA, 1994–97. Siddiquee occupied the position of vice-chair and assisted in helping to formalize the organization in light of the constitution. Haniya Sheikh, a woman lawyer in the area of commercial, regulatory, health, malicious prosecutions, and negligence who works for the Government of Canada in the Department of Justice, is a current governor of the MLA. After 11 September 2001, the MLA became a nationwide network. Various internal concerns were phased out as the organization considered its services in relation to the demands of the community. The MLA is an important resource for the Canadian Muslim community in educating its members of their rights and identifying and connecting them with lawyers and other resources best capable of advising and/or representing them in issues, challenges, and injustices they may confront.

The CMCLA was founded in 1994 to address matters that reflect the intricacies of Muslim life in Canada. Members of the CMCLA consist of concerned individuals, scholars, students, and community activists who are versed in the Canadian legal system, including those who have worked in the area of social policy-making as well as activists in the field of education and the mass media. The CMCLA maintains long-term goals on the national front in order to assert change at both institutional and political levels. It also works at the grassroots level by providing assistance to individuals and communities when resources are available. The organization has maintained a predominately male board, but it has depended upon the involvement of women at all levels of various CMCLA campaigns. The organization also relies on the volunteer experience and assistance of women and has had women supervise many projects. Sajidah Kutty has been the only female board member of CMCLA, 1994–2001, and has assisted in the public relations sector. She has also directed a fund-raising and awareness campaign and assisted in daily communication endeavors. CMCLA strives to empower the Muslim community in Canada through legal, political, and social avenues.

Canadian-based Muslim women's organizations such as the CCMW, founded in 1982, and the FMW, founded in 1997, serve as catalysts for Muslim women to attain a voice within the larger Islamic movement and the Canadian community at large. Both organizations were established with the mandate to attain and maintain equality, equity, and empowerment for Canadian Muslim women in the North American setting, and to develop a vibrant human rights sector within their organizations. The CCMW collaborates with the Canadian government at the municipal, provincial, and federal levels in order to achieve its objectives. It also seeks to develop strategies to counteract racism and violence against women, publishes reports and newsletters, hosts conferences and workshops, and initiates local and national projects to disseminate information that further their objectives. The FMW engages in initiatives similar to those of the CCMW, and in addition deals with such issues as violence against children, rights of physically and mentally disabled citizens, alleviation of poverty, and discrimination against hijab-wearing Muslim women.

The CAIR was inaugurated in the United States in 1994. Subsequently, the CAIR-CAN chapter was launched in 2000. The CAIR-CAN undertakes tasks such as monitoring local and national media in order to challenge stereotyping, hosting information seminars and workshops, formulating and distributing action alerts, and assisting with inter-community relations. Physicist Sheema Khan is its founder and current chairperson and is responsible for overseeing most of its projects. CAIR executive members and members-at-large include men and women who may play parallel roles within the media-related organization.

The CIC was founded in 1998 with numerous objectives including education of Canadians about Islam and Muslims, networking with all levels of government and with NGOs, and undertaking national research initiatives. Wahida Chishti Valiante, a family counselor, is a founding member and the current vice president of the CIC. While overseeing the various CIC initiatives, she lectures regularly at both national and international conferences, and is an author of major research papers related to media and social work. Similar to the CAIR, CIC executive members and members-at-large include men and women who may play parallel roles within their organization.

Muslim women are increasingly evident in human rights movements and NGOs in Canada, representing the wide diversity of cultures, races, languages, and ethnicities within the Muslim Canadian community.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

CAIR-CAN (Council of American Islamic Relations-Canada), <<http://www.caircan.ca/>>.
CCMW (Canadian Council of Muslim Women), <<http://www.ccmw.com/>>.

CIC (Canadian Islamic Congress), <<http://www.cicnow.com/>>.

CMCLA (Canadian-Muslim Civil Liberties Association), <<http://www.cmcla.org/>>.

FMW (Federation of Muslim Women), <<http://www.fmw.org/>>.

MLA (Muslim Lawyer's Association), <<http://www.muslimlaw.org/>>.

NADIRA MUSTAPHA

Iran

This entry examines Iranian women's use of the human rights discourse to contest legal limitations under an Islamic regime. Based on field research in the year 2000, findings indicate human rights ideals serve as instruments of reform for women seeking to revise their legal, social, and political rights in Iran. This struggle takes place in the context of a reform movement that began in 1997.

Discovered in 1878 at the Babylon excavation site, Cyrus the Great's cuneiform cylinder was declared the first ever human rights charter by the United Nations in 1971. Most Iranians take pride in this historical tie with the human rights movement. However, the development of this movement in Iran has differed from its progress in the West.

With roots in the ideals of enlightenment, human rights ideology generally places great importance on individualism. Islam, however, values the roles that individuals play in society. Hence, the rights movement in Iran has often relied on this paradigm, focusing on the rights of women as mothers, children, and students, that is, within a social location.

The Iranian women's rights movement gained particular visibility in the early twentieth century after the Constitutional Revolution. Secret women's organizations were formed dealing with wide-ranging issues including the right to participate in government, vote, publish women's magazines, and mandated education for girls (Price 2000).

After the Second World War, the United Nations was created to protect individuals from oppression at the hands of their governments. Concurrently, the Pahlavi regime was in the process of Westernizing and secularizing Iran (Mackey 1996). This historical backdrop provided an ideal impetus for the advancement of women's efforts for equality. By 1962 women gained the right to vote, and in 1968 the Family Protection Law expanded women's rights in marriage, divorce, and custody (Mir-Hosseini 1993). Many of these rights were lost after the Revolution of 1979. In 1998 the Supreme Council decided Iran would not become party to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) because many of its provisions contradict Islamic law.

Some argue that for the human rights ideology to succeed in non-Western nations, it must allow for multiculturalism. Others argue that allowing special privileges for cultural and religious practices of diverse ethnic groups potentially threatens gains made by feminists (Okin 1999). The refusal to sign CEDAW can be viewed as an example of the negative aspects of multiculturalism.

The tension between multiculturalism and universal human rights has created a dual system of laws that govern women's status in Iran. A conflict is caused by the adoption of modern legal systems in a country that also codifies Islamic law, the Shari'a, giving rise to "two parallel but distinct notions of legitimacy: Shari'a and legal" (Mir-Hosseini 1993, vii). Laws derived from dominant readings of the Shari'a, such as marriage, divorce, and custody laws, usually contradict secular norms derived from human rights principles concerning, for example, legal equality between the sexes. Often, one of these notions of legitimacy is challenged in court, blurring the boundaries between the secular and the religious. Women renegotiate their legal status through manipulation of these obscure boundaries (Mir-Hosseini 1993).

Today, Iranian women play a vital role in various human rights non-governmental organizations. One such group is the Society for Protecting the Rights of the Child (SPRC), headed by activist female lawyer, Shirin Ebadi. Shirin Ebadi was the first female judge in Iran in 1975. After the 1979 Revolution, women judges were dismissed, forcing Ms. Ebadi to step down from the bench. She continued her work as an attorney and a human rights activist. In 2003 Ms. Ebadi was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize making her the first Iranian, the first Muslim woman, and the third woman ever to receive the award.

The work of SPRC and other such groups often falls in the obscure gap between modern legal standards (international human rights) and religious laws (governing marriage, custody, and the family). SPRC relies on human rights law to improve children's rights. However, the use of these principles in conjunction with the group's focus on family and custody laws exemplifies reliance on prescribed gender roles to promote women's rights.

In 1997 SPRC and Ebadi succeeded in codifying a proposed amendment to the custody law, prohibiting automatic custody of children to unfit fathers. Such victories demonstrate women's use of human rights standards to improve child welfare, reinvent their own rights as mothers, and legitimize their roles as activists in the reform movement.

Through activism in human rights organizations and adherence to prescribed gender roles, Iranian women are engaged in everyday forms of resistance. Relying on human rights ideology and focusing on traditionally female roles has legitimized women's struggle for equality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Mackey, The Iranians. Persia, Islam and the soul of a nation, New York 1996.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Marriage on trial. A study of Islamic family law. Iran and Morocco compared, London 1993.
- S. M. Okin, Is multiculturalism bad for women?, in S. M. Okin with respondents; J. Cohen, M. Howard, and M. C. Nussbaum (eds.), Is multiculturalism bad for women?, Princeton, N.J. 1999, 7–26.
- M. Price, A brief history of women's movements in Iran (1850–2000), <www.iranonline.com/History/women-history/4html>, 2000.

NIJAZ KASRAVI

Mashriq Arab States

Women's rights activists in the central Arab States point to discrimination and violence against women as major violations of women's rights. The systematic nature of the subordination of women as embedded in law and social practice permeates nearly every aspect of women's lives. The inferior legal status of women in the region is rooted in personal status codes (PSC) that are religiously derived. These laws discriminate against women and privilege men in both the public and private spheres. Modern legislation on nationality, penal, and other laws has generally reinforced the discriminatory clauses of the PSC. This discrimination is translated and put into practice in civil, political, and economic life with the rights, statuses, and roles of men and women organized hierarchically.

Women's subordinate status in society limits their access to education, employment, and political representation, in addition to making them more vulnerable to violence. Laws on violence against women in the region do not sufficiently address the size and scope of the problem, and the few laws that exist lack enforcement mechanisms to guarantee their implementation. The notion of marital rape does not exist in the law, and unmarried women with children and rape victims are particularly vulnerable and not always protected under the law. In addition, lack of official quantitative and qualitative statistics on the extent, forms, and manifestations of violence against women, enables states in the region to shun their responsibilities, notably to take the necessary legal measures to set up shelters and to train doctors, police, and magistrates in how to deal with cases of violence against women.

Female illiteracy rates in the region are still very high, an average of 42 percent in comparison to 21 percent for males. The average female participation in the workforce peaks at 29 percent though it is 39 percent for countries with comparable revenues. Discrimination against women in paid employment is widespread, and is reinforced by the absence of laws and enforcement mechanisms that protect women from wage discrimination and sexual harassment in the workplace. Furthermore, women have traditionally worked in agriculture, which, as well as their household work, is not accounted for in the national economy of their countries. This has led to further marginalization of women's contribution to their respective societies.

The constitutions of countries in the region guarantee in principal equal political rights for men and women. Yet, in practice the participation of women in political decision-making processes is among the weakest in the world. Some countries, like Jordan, have adopted affirmative action by introducing a quota for female parliamentary members. However, with the regimes in the region suppressing and controlling the right of any citizen to freely participate in political life, the mere presence of women in powerless institutions will not necessarily improve women's status. In some cases, affirmative action even has the reverse effect, providing the state with the opportunity to demonstrate its commitment to women's rights, and thus making it all the more difficult to argue in favor of genuine empowerment of women in political decision-making.

Governments in the region have signed and ratified international pacts and conventions relating to women's rights, particularly the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), but have added reservations that go against the spirit and letter of those conventions. They have been particularly hesitant over articles 2, 9 (paragraph 2), 15 (paragraph 4), and 16 of CEDAW. Article 2 demands parties to condemn all forms of discrimination against women and thereby establish legal protection for women; article 9(2) demands equality between men and women with respect to the nationality of their children; article 15(4) demands equality for women in regard to their freedom of movement and freedom to choose their residence and domicile; and article 16 demands the elimination of discrimination in all matters relating to marriage and family relations. States often resort to cultural and religious explanations for not implementing the provisions of these international conventions. Furthermore, international human rights norms are usually not integrated in the national legislation of these countries.

However, despite or even because of the exclusion of women from the official political sphere, women have been active in associational life in many countries in the region. The history and evolution of women's rights organizations in the region varies enormously across political, social, and economic contexts. Traditionally, the women's rights movement has been linked to national liberation movements and today there is a strong link between the women's rights movement and the movement for human rights and democracy.

Particularly during the United Nations Decade for Women 1976–85, women's rights activists from the region began to attend regional and international meetings on women's rights. By the 1990s they began building regional networks such as Aisha, Court of Arab Women, Sisterhood is Global Institute (SIGI), Maghreb/Mashrek Network for Information and Training on Gender, along with many other unofficial networks. Women's rights organizations and networks are involved in different activities, such as campaigning on specific issues pertaining to violence against women, or more generally informing women about their rights and providing legal aid and counseling. Yet, despite these activities in promoting women's rights, there is still a lack of information about the status of women in the region and a tendency to stereotype women in the media as suppressed and thereby to overlook their capacities and the role they play in implementing change in their respective societies.

The relationship of the women's rights movement in the region with the ruling regimes and Islamist factions poses a serious challenge to the movement. The ruling powers attempt to limit, curb, and exercise total control over civic initiatives through legislation on public and associative freedoms. Thus, in the name of fighting the Islamist groups, the ruling powers try to co-opt or control the women's rights movement and use it for their own ends. In Syria and in Egypt, for example, organizations require government authorization in order to be registered and receive funding. Another means of control is for the regime, as is the case in Jordan, to create para-official structures in the guise of independent NGOs – the so-called GONGOs (government organized non-governmental organizations) – which often receive funding from international donors, while presenting themselves as national networks uniting the whole of the women's rights movement.

The Islamists, whose model for society and women's role within it often corresponds with society's cultural references, accuse women from the women's rights movement of being in the pay of the West. They try to cast doubt on the women's religious beliefs and morals by arguing that they misappropriate funds from donors for personal gain or that they promote homosexuality and want to ruin family values. They claim that international human rights instruments are the tools of a vast Western conspiracy against Islam and the Arab countries.

In addition, women's rights organizations face internal challenges regarding organizational structuring, leadership, transparency, funding, and reaching out to a wider constituency. These challenges to the women's rights movement, both external and internal, have translated into different strategies among women's rights activists regarding the promotion of women's rights in the region. One strategy focuses on disseminating knowledge of international women's rights instruments and lobbying for states to lift their reservations to CEDAW and adopt the Beijing Platform for Action. They also call on states to raise public awareness of discrimination and violence against women, tackle the social bias against women, and provide protection for women from discrimination and violence. The other strategy is to encourage a more progressive interpretation and historical reading of the religious texts in regard to women's rights and law reform.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami, Introduction, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, New York 1995, 1–16.
- M. Badran, Toward Islamic feminisms. A look at the Middle East, in A. Afsaruddin (ed.), Hermeneutics and honor. Negotiating female "public" space in Islamic/ate societies, Cambridge, Mass. 1999, 159–88.
- A. Basu, Introduction, in A. Basu (ed.), The challenge of local feminisms. Women's movements in global perspectives, Boulder, Colo. 1995, 1–21.
- C. Bunch, Women's human rights. The challenges of global feminism and diversity, in M. Dekoven (ed.), Feminist locations. Global and local, theory and practice, New Brunswick, N.J. 2001, 129–46.
- R. Cook, Women's international human rights law. The way forward, in R. Cook (ed.), Human rights of women. National and international perspectives, Philadelphia 1994, 3–36.
- S. Graham-Brown, Women's activism in the Middle East. A historical perspective, in S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001, 23–33.
- S. Joseph, Gendering citizenship in the Middle East, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, New York 2000, 3–30.
- D. Kandiyoti, Contemporary feminist scholarship and Middle East studies, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Gendering the Middle East. Emerging perspective, New York 1996, 1–28.
- , Beyond Beijing. Obstacles and prospects for the Middle East, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.),

- Muslim women and the politics of participation. Implementing the Beijing Platform*, New York, 1997, 3–10.
- , The Politics of gender and conundrums of citizenship, in S. Joseph and S. Slyomovics (eds.), Women and power in the Middle East, Philadelphia 2001, 52–8.
- S. Kazi, Muslim law and women living under Muslim law, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), Muslim women and the politics of participation. Implementing the Beijing Platform, New York 1997, 141–6.
- Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Islam and justice, New York 1997.
- , Islam and equality, New York 1999.
- A. Mayer, Rhetorical strategies and official policies on women's rights. The merits and drawbacks of the new world hypocrisy, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's human rights in the Muslim world, New York 1995, 104–32.
- R. Naciri, Engaging the state. The women's movement and political discourse in Morocco, in C. Miller and S. Razavi (eds.), Missionaries and mandarins. Feminist engagement with development institutions, London 1998, 87–111.
- R. Naciri and I. Nusair, The integration of the human rights of women from the Middle East and North Africa in the Euro-Mediterranean partnership, Denmark 2003.
- al-Raida Magazine, Arab women's movements*, 100 (2003).
- M. Tallawy, International organizations, national machinery, Islam and foreign policy, in M. Afkhami and E. Friedl (eds.), Muslim women and the politics of participation. Implementing the Beijing Platform, New York 1997, 128–40.
- M. Yamani, Introduction, in M. Yamani (ed.), Feminisms and Islam. Legal and literary perspectives, New York 1996, 1–27.

ISIS NUSAIR

North Africa

Human rights discourse emerged throughout the Maghrib as part of the anti-colonial struggle (arguing against inequality between colonizer and colonized with regard to work, education, health, and so forth). Against this general background, the way in which women contributed to the discourse and to the development of a focus on women's rights varied from country to country. The steps to promote women's rights that were taken during the first decades after independence were the product of state action, supported by state-dominated women's organizations; later, a second generation of reforms, starting in the 1980s, was a consequence of the struggle undertaken by the new feminine elites working within women's non-governmental organizations in civil society. Among these were l'Association marocaine des droits des femmes, la Ligue démocratique pour les droits des femmes (Morocco), the Collectif 95 Maghreb Égalité, l'Association pour l'égalité devant la loi entre les hommes et les femmes (AELHF, Algeria), l'Association pour la défense et la promotion des droits des femmes (ADPDE, Algeria), l'Association tunisienne des femmes démocrates (ATFD), l'Association des femmes tunisiennes pour la recherche et le développement (AFTURD). These associations were composed of women who were born around the time of independence, raised within the new state's education system, and who were primarily middle-class. The associations grew in force in a context of civil society democratization, mass education, economic crisis, and structural adjustment, and what might be termed external factors (such as new notions of development), and where women were finding themselves marginalized in structures of political opposition. It was also a context in which they saw movements based on religion as threatening (following the Iranian Revolution in 1979) and in which they struggled to find space for expression in the sphere of civil society (Marzouki 1999). Organizations that arose during this period and their successors continue to contribute today to the debate on human rights and women's rights (Dwyer 1991), democracy, and the establishment of the rule of law (Belarbi 2002, 141–57).

The legal context of the struggle for women's rights differed from country to country and measures to establish and reinforce women's rights were adopted at different times. The civil codes governing these issues – the Mudawwana in Morocco, the Family Code in Algeria, and the Personal Status Code in Tunisia – while differing significantly, have some points in common. An underlying tension in all these codes – on the one hand the recognition of equality between the sexes and in citizenship rights, in conformity with international law and, on the other, the inequality in personal civil rights related to the application of Shari'a and to laws that have their source in religious decrees – has been a motor of women's activity throughout the struggle of feminists for an equal civil status. Ijtihād and the secularization of family law – the Tunisian model being the one that has adopted the most liberal reading – are dimensions that distinguish these societies from one another.

MOROCCO

Among the positive aspects of the Mudawwana in Morocco, which was introduced in 1957 and in 1959, are that the eligible marriage age for girls was raised to 15 and for boys to 18; a woman's freedom to exploit and dispose of her own wealth and inheritance was reaffirmed; and she gained the right to divorce in certain circumstances. Her obligation to obey her husband was legally abolished in 1993, except in cases where immoral conduct was feared. Significant legal changes were introduced to the Mudawwana in 2004, including the principle of equality, whereby the spouses run the family jointly; the mahr is merely symbolic; the eligible marriage age is the same for men and women; obedience to the monogamy clause in the marriage contract (if this is accepted at marriage) is obligatory; polygamy is limited to two wives; and divorce requires a judicial proceeding (discontinuing recognition of non-judicial repudiation). Also, civil marriages performed abroad (between 40 and 50 percent of emigrants are women) are now recognized as legal. One change that weakens the rights of women is that in cases of separation the father gains the right to designate a guardian for his children, whereas in 1993 the mother had been awarded guardianship. For Moroccans living abroad, the procedures related to polygamy and an unmarried woman's right to adopt a child under the regime of kafāla (a customary form where the child keeps his/her birth name) have not been specified. In the workplace the rule of non-discrimination between the sexes has not been legally affirmed.

ALGERIA

Upon independence in 1962, Algeria extended the colonial statute of 1959, which did not allow repudiation, and this law continued in effect until 1975. The Algerian Family Code is, among the three countries of the Maghrib, the most prejudicial to women's rights and when proposed to the national assembly in 1981, it led to protests, but without effect. Although not having a religious foundation the code, finally adopted in 1984, treats women as minors. It recognizes polygamy, guardianship over the woman, and the woman's obedience to her husband. Following this, the mobilization of Algerian women took on an unprecedented dynamic.

In addition to early and continuing protest against the Family Code in Algeria, women also were active, starting in 1990, in opposing measures taken in municipalities dominated by the Islamic Salvation Front (Front islamique du salut, FIS) by which the veil was imposed upon women working in the administration, women's sports facilities were closed, girls were forbidden to study music and dance in public conservatories, and the separation of sexes on beaches was applied. Women also mobilized in favor of democracy and in solidarity with the families of "disappeared" persons. In 1997, a number of women's civil society associations launched an appeal to collect a million signatures to promote significant amendments to the Family Code and, in 2004, the group "20 years, enough!" bears witness to continuing mobilization for women's rights. In October 2003, the government established a commission to examine raising the eligible marriage age for women to 19; the woman's right to marry without her family's consent; increased financial support from the husband in cases where he decides unilaterally on separation; housing support for the children and the mother; and stricter rules on polygamy. Unlike in Morocco, in Algeria laws mandate equality of the sexes in the workplace but, in the Maghrib, Algeria has the lowest proportion of working women. As in Tunisia, legal statute mandates that wages be equal for both sexes, but inequality appears in the differential access each has to employment, to credit, and to education. Finally, whereas in Morocco the presence of women in religious institutions and in business is the most visible of the three countries, Algeria saw the participation of a woman candidate in the presidential elections of April 2004.

TUNISIA

In Tunisia, the Personal Status Code introduced in 1956 adopted the principle of equality between men and women, and guaranteed it by constitutional and legislative texts. Polygamy was outlawed, the eligible marriage age for girls was raised to 17 and her consent was required, and guardianship was given to the mother in case of the father's death. Adoption was made legal. In 1968, the same penalties were instituted for the adulterous man as for the adulterous woman. In 1981, the right to live in the family residence was given to the woman in case of divorce as was custody of the children. Starting in 1993, amendments introduced imposed upon both spouses the obligation of treating one another with kindness and mutual aid in running the household and caring for the children. The woman's duty to obey the husband was abolished. The mother shares in managing the affairs of her children and the married girl who is still a legal minor has the right to control her own life and wealth. A fund to guarantee the payment of food support for the divorced woman and her children was established and a woman married to a non-Tunisian may transmit her nationality to the children, with the consent of the father. In cases of conjugal violence, the situation of matrimony is considered to be an aggravating circumstance, leading to more severe penalties; and violence against a spouse for acts such as adultery are now treated simply as crimes, with so-called attenuating circumstances no longer considered. Since 1996, maintenance payments are awarded to the mother who has custody of the children, orphan's payments continue up to the age of 25 if the youth remains in education, and the possibility of both spouses to contract an individual loan to buy a residence is introduced. In the workplace, non-discrimination between the sexes is mandated.

Now that women have gained new rights and protective mechanisms, varying greatly from country to country, several general problems remain throughout the region. The first involves maintaining the effort to gain further advances. Second, the awareness women have of their rights needs to be extended and implementation of these rights improved – a problem that is particularly acute among rural women and other underprivileged sectors. Third, in the absence of a democratic political culture (both on the level of formal politics as well as within women's movements themselves), women's movements are at risk of being weakened without having accomplished the deconstruction of dominant representations: on the one hand, dependence on foreign funds and discourse raises a number of problems; on the other, they are in danger of being instrumentalized by their states that may be looking for legitimacy from hegemonic forces abroad as a way to shore up their own internal authority.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Belarbi, Femmes et société civile. Réflexions sur le cas du Maroc, in A. Belarbi et al., Droits de citoyenneté des femmes au Maghreb. La condition socio-économique et juridique des femmes. Le mouvement des femmes, Casablanca 1997, 249–72.
- K. Dwyer, Arab voices. The human rights debate in the Middle East, London 1991.
- I. Marzouki, Femmes d'ordre ou désordre de femmes?, Tunis 1999.
- M. K. Remaoun, Le mouvement des droits des femmes entre visions spécifiques et visions sociétales, in O. Derras (comp.), Mouvements associatifs au Maghreb, Oran 2002, 141–57.

LILIA LABIDI

Sudan

Sudan's history regarding women's rights and human rights is a mixed one. Important advances were made by indigenous activists in the post-independence period after 1956; international pressure on the issue of female genital mutilation (FGM) has yielded some positive results; however, since 1989 Sudan has been cited by human rights groups as a "human rights disaster" for its longstanding civil war affecting its southern citizens, and also for its treatment of women in the north.

The Sudanese constitution of 1973 provides for equal rights of all citizens irrespective of gender, and women have held responsible positions as government ministers and judges at various times. However, since 1989, under an Islamist regime led by the National Islamic Front (NIF), questions of citizenship and human rights of women have been raised in the following areas: 1. mandatory wearing of hijāb in public and empowering morals protection police and courts to enforce public morality. Cases of lashing for immoral public behavior have been brought to international attention by human rights groups; 2. the purging of non-NIF women from government employment and the judiciary. The few public female figures are closely associated with the NIF, such as Wisal al-Mahdī, the wife of Islamist leader Ḥasan al-Turābī; and 3. application of the ḥadd punishment of stoning for adultery or fornication to women.

Sudan was once a leader in legal reform of Shari'a marriage and divorce laws (Fluehr-Lobban 1987). Judicial divorce for women on the grounds of harm or abuse (ḍarar) was allowed in Sudan in 1915, years before such reform was undertaken in Egypt and elsewhere in the Muslim world. In the 1970s Sudan continued its path of legal innovation under the leadership of the last qāḍī al-quḍāt (supreme judge), Shaykh Muḥammad al-Jizūlī, who took the bold move to appoint women judges to the Shari'a courts and who expanded legal divorce for women using the concept of ransom (fiḍya) whereby a woman could use her bride-price (mahr) to obtain her release from a harmful marriage.

After 1983, Shari'a was made state law, and since 1989 conservative legal opinion has been influenced by the NIF. Non-Muslim men and women as well as Muslims in northern Sudan have been sentenced to the ḥadd penalty of stoning for adultery. Southern non-Muslim women have been sentenced to this penalty in remote parts of the country (Darfur), but as of this writing no sentence of stoning has been carried out. However, numerous amputations for theft have been carried out upon men since 1983.

Historically, the struggle for Sudanese women's rights was part of the larger nationalist movement. The first organized group of women, the Sudanese Women's Union, was formed in 1946 as part of the Sudanese Communist Party. After independence, through the 1950s and 1960s, the Women's Union published its Ṣawt al-mar'a (Woman's voice) in which numerous issues relating to the political and social status of women were raised, such as polygamy, divorce reform, and female circumcision. Suffrage was extended to women, not at the time of independence, but after the 1964 popular revolution against the Abboud military government, when women openly and enthusiastically demonstrated for popular democracy. Fāṭima Aḥmad Ibrāhīm, a founder of the Women's Union, was the first woman elected to parliament in 1965. The Women's Union was also influential in agitating for the reforms in the Shari'a law of marriage and divorce that took place in the 1960s and early 1970s. In 1993 Fāṭima Ibrāhīm accepted the United Nations Human Rights Prize on behalf of the Sudanese Women's Union. Since 1989 the Islamist regime of 'Umar al-Bashīr has officially suppressed all democratic organizations, including the Sudanese Women's Union, banning their publications and ability to speak freely in public.

Also since 1989, female supporters of the NIF have had greater opportunities defending the regime's policies toward women internally and in external media outlets. Sudanese Islamist feminists were especially active at the 1995 Fourth International Congress on Women held in Beijing, raising challenges to human rights activist criticism of Islamist regimes. They argued that Islam and the Shari'a provide comprehensive legal, political, and religious rights for women. Their critics, especially the Republican Brothers and Muslim liberal secularists, counter-argue that the ban some Muslim countries impose on women as heads of state and their lack of equal legal rights in divorce and inheritance amount to a violation of women's rights as human rights.

Since independence in 1956 the movement for women's rights has been dominated by northern Muslim women and their supporters while the rights of southern women were left out of the process, or merely offered lip service. Rural women have also all but been forgotten.

The special issue of FGM has attracted the greatest attention by international human rights groups. The topic of "female circumcision" has been a subject of fascination, horror, and feminist agitation in the West. The current NIF government has reinstated a ban on female circumcision; however, it remains to be seen how this latest ban will be enforced.

Allegations of the revival of slavery in the context of the civil war since 1983 have focused on the abduction of southern women and children by "Arab" militias in the border areas between north and south, especially Bahr al-Ghazal. American and European Christian groups have intervened to slow or stop such abductions as they perceive the civil war in Sudan to be a conflict between the Muslim north and Christian south.

While equal rights for women are protected in the Permanent Constitution of 1973, a great deal remains to be addressed in practice, including a national approach to family law reform, increased political participation of women at all levels, and a concerted effort to include women in development planning and economic development. The historically secular women's movement and Sudanese feminists have been critical of the recent drives toward greater Islamization. With a peace agreement close to being signed in 2004 a national approach to the Shari'a and the status of women becomes a priority in a country in which a third of its population is non-Muslim.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. Fluehr-Lobban, Islamic law and society in the Sudan, London 1987.
 R. Lobban, R. Kramer, and C. Fluehr-Lobban, Historical dictionary of the Sudan, Lanham, Md. 2002³, see Sudanese women's movement, 282-3.
 N. Toubia, Female genital mutilation. A call for global action, New York 1995.

CAROLYN FLUEHR-LOBBAN

Sub-Saharan Africa

Women engaged in law in Africa, and Muslim women in particular, have a long history of participation in the over 19 currently existing general professional organizations for lawyers and judges. Some of these same professional women have also organized themselves around their Muslim identity.

Women's rights as human rights came into their own in preparations for the Vienna World Human Rights conference sponsored by the United Nations Commission for Human Rights (now the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights) in 1993. The move reflected the spectacular progress made in global consciousness of women's rights since the last world meeting on human rights in Tehran in 1968, when the women's rights movement was still in an embryonic stage. The 1993 conference resulted in the creation of a new office, that of the Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women.

The Regional Report from Africa prepared in Tunis in 1992 for the 1993 Vienna Conference made an appeal to African governments and the international community to rapidly eliminate "all forms of discrimination against women" in Africa by allocating resources for the provision of legal aid services with a view to the promotion and protection of human rights. The African states were also called upon to encourage non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to participate in the advancement of women. The effects of religion on women were specifically highlighted. African states were to take "all appropriate measures in order to promote the rights of women, to put an end to discrimination based on sex and to protect women from all forms of violence and traditional practices of intolerance and extremism, particularly religious extremism, affecting their rights and freedoms" (UNCHR 1992).

In 1990 the Ford Foundation provided funding for the Women in Law and Development in Africa (WILDAF) network. With a boost from the Vienna resolutions in 1993, the Ford Foundation pushed women's rights to center stage, leading to an expansion of WILDAF into regional centers in eastern, southern, and most recently western Africa. These NGOs combine research and advocacy for women's rights as human rights. Individual Muslim women experts have joined. Various WILDAFs have also paired up with local national professional organizations, for example, with the Tanzania Media Women's Association in East Africa, which has key Muslim members, in order to assure a broad dissemination of research findings. WILDAF's strategy is to get women's rights legislation passed and to initiate litigation challenging gender adverse laws. Women's issues are not divided according to religion or ethnicity. Test litigation in African courts has been supported by the International Women's Rights Action Watch (IWRAP, based in Minnesota, USA), founded in 1985 at the Women's World Conference in Nairobi with the aim of making the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) a global reality. The IWRAP newsletter established strong links with women in Africa who sent information on all discriminatory customs and laws, whether secular or religious. The WILDAF legal support has been supplemented in South Africa since 1999 by a religiously neutral organization called the Women's Legal Center, which has litigated cases in order to advance equality for women under customary and Muslim laws. It is funded in part by the Ford Foundation and the International Commission of Jurists.

Alongside women's human rights NGOs in Africa, in which Muslim women participate, are organizations that are founded by Muslim women, but that do not have a Muslim identity as such. One example is Amanitare, a well-known organization focusing on health, sexuality, and reproduction as women's human rights issues, and the elimination of violence against women. Amanitare, which is coordinated by the Research, Action and Information Network for the Bodily Integrity of Women (Rainbo), was founded by a Muslim Sudanese medical doctor in 1994. The Amanitare/Rainbo project, started in 1999, bases its mandate on the Vienna Conference, the Cairo International Conference on Population and Development (1994), and the Beijing World Conference on Women (1995). One of its key research projects involves the progressive reduction of female genital mutilation (FGM) in Africa, including African Muslim societies. The organization has published a guide to laws on FGM (2000). Another example is the Gender Desk (founded 1993) of the Muslim Youth Movement (MYM 1970) in South Africa. Shamima Shaykh, a Muslim woman activist, worked with MYM to involve Muslim youth in the politics of the anti-apartheid movement. With the coming of political freedom, she founded the Gender Desk in order to promote the interests of Muslim women in the gender policy of the new political order. More specifically, she sought equal access for women to Muslim religious institutions and positions.

Other women's organizations have an explicit Muslim identity and focus. The 1993 Vienna Conference spurred the Ford Foundation to support organizations that had consolidated their activities earlier as a result of the 1985 Nairobi International Women's conference. The major Muslim women's organization from that era founded by Muslim women in 1984–5 was Women Living Under Muslim Laws (WLUML), with its headquarters in France. It mobilized initially around the imprisonment of Algerian feminists and extended its concerns to all women affected by Muslim laws globally. Its object is to network and encourage women "to reflect, analyze and reformulate the identity imposed on them through the application of Muslim laws and by doing so, to assume greater control over their lives." In the 1990s, Ford Foundation grants greatly boosted the organization's networking and global communications capabilities. With headquarters now located in London, the WLUML works throughout the Muslim world primarily through local sister NGOs that have a rights centered approach. One of its major coordinating organizations for Africa and the Middle East is BAOBAB for Women's Human Rights, in Nigeria (founded 1996). BAOBAB's mandate includes improving development of rights under religious and customary laws. Like WILDAF, BAOBAB involves itself in court litigation among other activities. It has supported Muslim women brought to trial under recent Islamic criminal laws in northern Nigeria.

Umbrella organizations with a Muslim focus such as WLUML and BAOBAB have long operated alongside non-rights oriented older Muslim women's organizations in Sub-Saharan African countries. This is fast changing, however. The Ghanaian Federation of Muslim Women's Association, funded by the Women's Global Fund, promotes human rights over against traditional practices such as female circumcision. The Muslim Sisters Network in Kenya has joined the national constitutional debate to give voice to both traditional and liberal perspectives on Islamic law. The corresponding role of the Ugandan Muslim Women Vision (UMWV) in the debate on the draft domestic relations bill, which would prohibit polygamy and has been contested publicly by the mufti of the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council (March 2004), is not widely known. Also with headquarters in Nigeria is the Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN), which participated in the 1985 International Women's Conference in Nairobi. It was created in 1985 as a result of dissatisfaction with the liberal academic feminist philosophy of the Nigerian National Council of Women's Societies. FOMWAN is faith oriented and participates in forming opinions on social and political issues for women from the less educated strata of society. It has organized, for example, forums on HIV/AIDS and expanding women's education. Some of its branches have become members of Nigeria's democracy and governance project funded by grants from Johns Hopkins University. The Nigerian Federation has sister federations in Gambia, Ghana, Liberia, and Sierra Leone. In 2003, at a meeting in Accra sponsored by the Ghana Center for Democratic Development, the Africa Democracy Forum expressed interest in encouraging a new activity for Muslim women's organizations. They hope to bring Christian and Muslim activists and communities together, along the lines of the work of Women in Black in former Yugoslavia and the joint peace efforts of Muslim and Christian women in an organization called The Women's Movement that Cares for Maluku (GPP, founded in 2003) in Maluku Province in Indonesia.

The latest continent-wide legal development for women's human rights has been the signing in Maputo of the Protocol to the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa, known in short as the Charter for Rights of Women in Africa (July 2003). The protocol addresses and proscribes controversial African religious and customary practices involving, inter alia, inheritance, gives women the right to protection against HIV/AIDS, and guarantees women the right to participate in the determination of cultural policies and equal representation at all levels of decision-making (which presumably includes the judiciary). The protocol is a triumph for the efforts of the African regional office in Nairobi of the Lawyers Alliance for Women, an initiative of Equality Now (based in New York). Several states have already made reservations to the protocol on grounds of conservative jurists' interpretations of Islamic law. The role of African Muslim women's organizations in the drafting and, now more urgently, the implementation of the protocol has yet to be fully researched.

It is clear that all the major women's NGOs need international finance and high profile participation in United Nations women's international conferences in order to survive. The extent of financial underwriting from wealthier Muslim governments has not been comprehensively researched. There is a further need to study the organizational culture of African Muslim women's NGOs as well as the role of Muslim women in non-Muslim women's human rights organizations. Such studies would include mapping whether and how African Muslim women should organize themselves to create a Muslim human rights identity, and how they decide whether to coordinate with other religiously neutral organizations on human rights affecting all women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- BAOBAB for Women's Human Rights, <www.baobabwomen.org>.
- Equality Now, The Law Project, <www.equalitynow.org/English/law_project/law_project_en.html>.
- FOMWAN (Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria), <www.ifh.org.uk/fomwan.html>.
- International Women's Rights Action Watch, <http://iwwaw.igc.org>.
- Jakarta Post*, Christian, Muslim women promote peace in Maluku, 1 January 2003, <www.infomaluku.net/ar/03/030101jp.html>.
- Jenda. A Journal of Culture and African Women Studies, <www.jendajournal.com>.
- A. Kiondo, Policy advocacy. The case of Tanzania Media Women Association (TAMWA), <www.eldis.org>.
- Legalbrief, Kenyan leader to block rights bills, 16 November 2003, <www.legalbrief.co.za>.
- MYM (Muslim Youth Movement) of South Africa, <http://shams.za.org/gender.htm>.
- New Vision (Kampala), Muslims warn on marriage bill, 8 March 2004, <http://allafrica.com/stories/printable/200403080969.html>.
- Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa, 11 July 2003, <www.africa-union.org>.
- A. Rahman and N. Toubia, Female genital mutilation A guide to laws and policies worldwide, London 2000.
- Research, Action and Information Network for Bodily Integrity of Women (RAINBO), <www.rainbo.org>.
- A. Samiuddin and R. Khanam (eds.), Muslim feminism and feminist movement in Africa, 2 vols., Delhi 2002.
- TAMWA (Tanzania Media Women Association), <www.tamwa.or.tz>.
- UMWV (Uganda Muslim Women Vision) <www.wougnet.org>.

UNCHR (United Nations High Commission on Human Rights), Report of the regional meeting for Africa, Tunis, 2-6 November 1992, <http://www.unhchr.ch/html/menu5/wctunis.htm>.

Virginia Gildersleeve International Fund, Project Grants Library, No. 1512, Muslim Women's Action Against Traditional Practices, Tamale, Northern Region, Ghana, <www.thegildersleeve.org>.

WILDAF (Women in Law and Development in Africa), <www.wildaf.org.zw>.

WLUM (Women Living Under Muslim Laws), <www.wlum.org>.

CHRISTINA JONES-PAULY

Turkey

Turkish women, who have had the vote since 1934, still experience human rights violation and discrimination in modern Turkey. There is no clear form of Kurdish dress but Kurdish nationalists, both male and female, are exposed to discrimination regardless of whether they dress according to secular or Islamic norms. However, recent international pressure, especially from the European Union (EU), has promoted greater human rights for women and encouraged them to more freely express their demands. The new Civil Code of 2001 consolidated the equal status of women within the family by annulling men's position as head of family, supporting women's right to take decisions in marital matters, and granting them an equal share of the assets accumulated during marriage.

Nonetheless, numerous Turkish laws on sensitive matters such as the Kurds, military interference in politics, and political Islam still curtail freedom of expression and association. Violation of these laws is punished by fines, imprisonment of journalists and politicians, and closure of Kurdish and Islamic political parties. The leaders of these parties lose their political rights, as well as their right to publish their newspapers and broadcast on television. These restrictions are based on the assumption that the use of the Kurdish language and Islamic discourse threatens national security. In other words, the rationale for these restrictions is that to acknowledge the ethnic and religious heterogeneity of Turkish society could undermine the republic's unitary and secular structure. These fears have been exacerbated by two decades of armed clashes between the separatist Kurdish guerillas and the Turkish security forces and by the rise of Islamic fundamentalism.

Dissidents are frequently "disappeared," tortured, and ill-treated, particularly in southeastern Turkey, inhabited mainly by Kurds. Detainees, routinely blindfolded during interrogations, are held incommunicado. They are harshly beaten, stripped naked, and deprived of sleep, food, drink, and toilet facilities. Their torturers administer electric shocks, hang them by their arms, spray them with cold pressurized water, and sexually abuse them. The perpetrators are rarely tried in court, while victims are often charged with insulting members of the security forces. This discourages victims from seeking justice. In particular, victims rarely report sexual assaults because of the grave limitations on impartial and comprehensive independent investigation.

In the case of women, the violation of human rights is exacerbated by gender discrimination. Female detainees are strip-searched and raped by male officers when they are in police custody or in prison, often in the sight of their husbands or family members, to force them to confess (Human Rights Watch World Report 2002). In addition to the physical and psychological effects of such sexual assaults, the female survivors risk death, further violence, forced marriage, and ostracism by their families as a result of the state's cynical utilization of "honor" to demean them before the community. Revealing that they have been exposed to sexual violence encourages a discriminatory culture that threatens all women. Moreover, the forced virginity test in custody is a form of abusing women's sexuality and physical integrity; to refuse to submit to this test is assumed to be a sign of stained honor. The woman who survives sexual abuse and humiliation suffers further serious consequences, because the intact hymen of an unmarried woman is regarded as material proof of virginity. It is not only a matter of individual choice, but also a sociocultural construct within the protection of the family (Cindoğlu 2000, 215–16). Such sexual violence has led women detainees to commit suicide, especially in southeastern Turkey, or to flee their homes, with or without their families. There is, however, nowhere to go; the number of shelters for such women is limited in Turkey. Further, male relatives are known to practice the "honor murders" of sexually "impure" women to cleanse family honor: this is justified by the Turkish Penal Code, which pronounces the victim's behavior as grave provocation.

Since the 1980s the number of female students with başörtüsü (headscarf) has mushroomed in the universities, "the castles of modernity" (Göle 1996). Their demands for higher education pervade the Turkish daily agenda. There were debates in the early 1980s in the Council of Higher Education (YÖK) to prohibit the headscarf but allow the türban, a kind of scarf that covers the head but not shoulders. In 1982 a law abrogated the wearing of the türban, but was resolved in 1988 by the Constitutional Courts by leaving the issue to the individual decision of universities in 1989 (Özdalga 1998, 41–6).

On 28 February 1997 the military generals in the National Security Council promulgated an extrajudicial decree that prohibited the headscarf in order to buttress secularism. This demonstrated the vulnerability of Turkish democracy to interference by the military, which decided that the headscarf is the "ideological uniform" of fundamentalism. But the decision led to the greatest massive civil disobedience for freedom of education in Turkish history when three million people formed a human chain throughout Turkey on 11 October 1998 demanding women's right to wear the headscarf. At the time of writing, the government of the Islamic Justice and Development Party (AKP), with its overwhelming parliamentary majority and zeal to develop human rights, backed by the EU for its possible membership, has frozen the headscarf problem, the frontline between Islamists and the military.

The terrifying experiences of Kurdish women and the protests of headscarved women as a form of political activity deepened women's awareness of human rights. They question state oppression and also their traditional gender status. It is to be hoped that such violations of human rights will cease as Turkey adopts the EU's acquis communautaire.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Y. Arat, Women's rights as human rights. The Turkish case, in Human Rights Review 3/1 (2001), 27–34.
- Z. Arat (ed.), Deconstructing the images of Turkish women, New York 1998.
- S. Bozdoğan and R. Kasaba (eds.), Rethinking modernity and Turkish identity in Turkey, Seattle 1997.
- D. Cindoğlu, Virginity tests and artificial virginity in modern Turkish medicine, in Women for Women's Human Rights (ed.), Women and sexuality in Muslim societies, Istanbul 2000, 215–228.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor 1996.
- Human Rights Watch World Report 2002*, <www.hrw.org/wr2k2/europe19.html>.
- A. Kadioğlu, Women's subordination in Turkey. Is Islam really the villain?, in Middle East Journal, 48 (1994), 654–60.
- D. Kandiyoti, Women, Islam and the state, Philadelphia 1989.
- E. Özdalga, The veiling issue, official secularism, and popular Islam in modern Turkey, Richmond, Surrey 1998.
- S. Tekeli, Women in modern Turkish society. A reader, London 1991.

Identity Politics

Central Asia

Identity politics in Central Asia exists on different levels – international, regional, and local. In the first, East (tradition) confronts West (modernity). In the second, attempts are made to distinguish among the various national groupings of the region, while the third focuses on internal differences, at national, local, or clan level. In all three, much of the discourse takes place around gender identities, and images of women are used as counters in male political games.

During the 1920s the Bolsheviks attempted to re-engineer Central Asian gender identities, especially femininity, characterized by submission to male control and sexual purity. The region's women found themselves contested terrain between the Soviet state and their own cultures. Throughout the Soviet period, images of veiled Muslim women and Sovietized female workers were used in struggles over identity politics, with different meanings by each side, so that Asian women retained their central place in the continuing battle between opposing, albeit shifting, visions of identities. Notwithstanding the ideological variations among the successive Soviet leaders, which shaped the relationship of different generations of Central Asian women with socialism and nationalism (Kuehnst 1997), the basic dichotomy between Sovietized modernity and Central Asian traditions continued to be expressed through much the same female images.

Since 1991, in their endeavors to legitimize their existence as distinct nations, the governments of all Central Asia's five republics have acknowledged Islam as an integral part of their heritage. Here, pride in nation (as well as, in Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Turkmenistan, clan or tribe) is underpinned by images of heroic masculinity, in which is embedded control over women. The imagined new nationhood is to be supported by women's return to a notional pre-Soviet submission and domesticity, with a combination of Islam and nationalism employed to legitimize both the new states and male claims to power, situating women who refuse to comply as potential traitors both to the nation-building project and their religion. This resurgence of traditional gender identities coexists with national constitutions that in general legalize formal equality between the sexes, in keeping with both Soviet and international law.

Opposition forces, especially in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan, also make use of gender identities in their political strategizing. The most important are the Islamic parties, who challenge state-run religious establishments with images of bearded men and women in hijāb, important issues both in the Tajik civil war and in recent political clashes in Uzbekistan. To the governments of Central Asia, the specter of Afghanistan is sufficient to legitimize serious repression of Islamic movements. Beards have been banned from the Tajik army and those wearing them have been beaten by police in Uzbekistan, where veiled students also encounter problems.

Women's endeavors to negotiate their identities through these political minefields are very varied. Older educated women may prefer a Sovietized image, while many younger ones are fascinated by representations of fashionable Western women portrayed in advertisements and soap operas. While neither of these conforms to current political trends, neither do the hijāb wearers, who, in Uzbekistan at least, are practically considered enemies of the state.

Governments promote traditional identities, part-way between these extremes, using local media to encourage a concept of Asian women as primarily housewives and mothers, supported by breadwinner husbands. Thus, implicitly they concur with religious extremists' calls for women to renounce paid labor and secular higher education.

In the current depressed economy, such feminine identities permit to go unchallenged the significant decrease of women's participation in politics and public life in general. They were the first to be laid off from state enterprises and the last to be rehired; they have noticeably been discriminated against in such matters as the redistribution of land from the former collective and state farms. Ironically, high male unemployment and low wages have forced large numbers of women to enter the informal labor market. They thereby retain notional domesticated identities while simultaneously making a living, thus partially satisfying the demands of the conservatives while reducing the obligations of governments to provide jobs.

In all five states, personal identities are strongly connected to sub-national groupings, tribes or clans in Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Turkmenistan, locality (mahalla) in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. Just how important these are became apparent during the Tajik civil war, when political factions divided sharply along mahalla lines, with gender identities serving as important distinguishing characteristics. After the war, the political positioning of the mahallas became increasingly unequal, with the president's locality hogging the best posts, while people from mahallas that had supported the wartime opposition, as well as non-titular nationalities, were disadvantaged. In Central Asia generally, pressures toward group and/or national endogamy are growing, with access to political posts, patronage, and other resources often dependent on membership in internal groupings. In all of this gender identities serve as cultural markers, and have thus come to play a role at all levels of identity politics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Akiner, Tajikistan. Disintegration or reconciliation? London 2001.
- L. Handrahan, Gender and ethnicity in the transitional democracy of Kyrgyzstan, in Central Asian Survey 20:4 (2001), 467–96.
- M. Kamp, Unveiling Uzbek women. Liberation, representation and discourse, 1906–1929, Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago 1998.
- K. Kuehnast, Let the stone lie where it has fallen. Dilemmas of gender and generation in Post-Soviet Kyrgyzstan, Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota 1997.
- A. Kuru, Between the state and cultural zones. Nation building in Turkmenistan, in Central Asian Survey 21:1 (2002), 71–90.
- N. Lubin, Central Asians take stock. Reform, corruption, and identity, Washington, D.C. 1995.
- W. Mee, Country briefing paper. Women in the Republic of Uzbekistan, Asian Development Bank 2001, <www.adb.org/Documents/Books/Country_Briefing_Papers>.
- N. Megoran, Theorizing gender, ethnicity and the nation-state in Central Asia, in Central Asian Survey 18:1 (1999), 99–110.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam, trans. S. Aslam, ed. C. Balchin, Lahore 1995.
- M. Tolmacheva, The Muslim woman in Soviet Central Asia, in Central Asian Survey 12:4 (1993), 531–48.

COLETTE HARRIS

Iran and Afghanistan

A century of political and social upheavals in Iran and Afghanistan, beginning in the late nineteenth century, situated women at the heart of diverse class, ethnic, national, and religious “imagined communities.” In both countries, the link between gender and modernity played a significant role in shaping and representing the nation, women in the nation, and various subnational identities. Neither Iran nor Afghanistan was formally colonized, and both countries underwent periods of indigenous reform and revolution in the twentieth century.

During the Iranian Constitutional Revolution (1905–11), nationalists used female images – the daughters of Iran, wives/women of the millat (nation), and homeland (vatan) as mother – not only to define the concept of tajaddud (modernity), but also to link national, sexual, and religious boundaries. Contemporary press reports about the trafficking of peasant Shīʿi girls by Sunnī Turkmen tribes and Armenians of Ashkhabad, for example, produced a tragic context for collective ethnic and religious grievances and led to the emergence of new legal codes for the construction of “Iranian-ness.” Notwithstanding women’s political participation, secular nationalists (from Muslim as well as Armenian, Assyrian Christian, Jewish, Bahāʿī, and Zoroastrian communities) and Islamic conservatives used the concept of educated mothers and wives to debate various visions of the constitution.

Before Afghanistan’s independence in 1919, Push-tun political dominance over Tajiks, Uzbeks, and Turkmens, with its emblematic tattoo on women’s bodies and animals as private properties, strengthened the pre-Islamic feudal and qabila (tribe) patriarchal concepts of women as signifier for sexuality, fitna (temptation), and nāmūs (honor) to enforce a Sunnī Shariʿa identity for nation. Rebellious against King Amān Allāh’s modern nationalist reforms, tribal chiefs demanded he divorce the queen for her unveiled presence at Loya Jirga assemblies and ceremonies. Women were caught between two opposing visions of Afghan’s nationhood: the 1926 reformist Family Law with its symbolic urban-based modern representation of femininity and the conservative 1928 Loya Jirga’s Nizām-nāmeḥ with its legitimization of purdah (seclusion).

The Pahlavī legal sanction on tribal clothing and women’s veiling was instrumental in the consolidation of a unified state against Iran’s diverse tribal and ethnic authorities (Azeris, Bakhtiaris, Gilanis, Kurds). The newly emerged nation-state and its icon, public women, conflicted with Iran’s “national honor” – the familial position of women within Shariʿa – and created a heterogeneous concept of nationhood, combining modern and traditional, Iranian culture and Islam. While the modernization of gender relations caught urban elite women between these two visions, the modernization policies of the “Great Civilization” dislocated the tribal productive center, the family, and turned village women from the owners of their produce into factory laborers and consumers. The acceleration of migration to the cities generated ideological and material tensions for the young generation of the popular classes, exposing them to new, public Westernized roles of women in mass media, higher education, and the professions. In the 1970s, intellectual, Islamic, and leftist responses to the monarchy's constructed metaphor of the modern nationhood addressed the regime's dominant "lip-sticked" image of the modern emancipated (and sexualized) women as a threat to the moral fabric of society. Jalāl Āl Aḥmad's socially committed female characters in his literary works, 'Alī Sharī'atī's formulation of the linkages between women's oppression and "cultural imperialism," his elevation of an Islamic role model for women within family and nation, and Fidā'iyyīn-i Khalq's "masculinization" of women offered alternative identities. Āl Aḥmad's notion of gharbzadigī (Westoxification) pitted a nation of good and authentic Iranian men and women against a corrupt autocracy and its alien consumer-capitalist and neocolonialist agenda.

An "innovative" language of Shi'ism, elevating the militant sister and wife of shāhid (martyr) Imām Ḥusayn (grandson of the Prophet) in the "Tragedy of Karbala" (680 C.E.), and various female-specific symbols idealizing the cultural spectacle of the Islamization of gender – scarves, segregation of sexes in university classrooms, and female-led religious gathering – emerged as an indigenous, yet modern and progressive politics of the Islamic Revolution's identity, to mobilize women in the name of national unity. Despite a constitutional ban on the commercial use of the images of women, ideal images of veiled mothers, who raise "pious children for the Prophet's Kingdom," were used on posters, billboards, and stamps during the Iran-Iraq War, not only to elevate the concept of Iran's national identity but also to distinguish Shi'i Iran from Sunni Iraq. In the midst of crushing the country's workers' movement during the 1980s, valorizing "good hijāb" versus "bad hijāb," family over profession, the government used an invented tradition to create a sharp identity division between secular middle-class urban women and the Islamist provincial women of the popular class, asserting the future direction of Iran as well as controlling and making women conform to an idealized construct of womanhood. Since the emergence of a moderate state in the 1990s, and pressured by the Islamist and secular feminists who have found common ground to claim a counter-culture to the politicization of gender identities, the government has adopted a policy of Islamic/Shi'i modernization that attempts to reconcile the images of women as mothers and housewives with Iranian women's aspirations and achievements in public and professional life.

Kabul's Nixon Market shopping center symbolized modernist Westernization in the 1960s and early 1970s. However, mini-skirts, beauty pageants, co-education, and women's presence at nightclubs and rock concerts bore little relation to the experience of rural women. The 1978 Saur Revolution, the 1979 invasion by the Soviet Union, the 1992 seizure of power by the Mujāhidīn, and the 1996 takeover by the Taliban linked the major dichotomy between modernity and tradition with a politicized, gendered demarcation of Afghan's national identity. The PDPA's (People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan) support for Soviet occupation produced a split between secular, pro-Soviet women's organizations and feminist, anti-Soviet women's movements (for example, RAWA, the Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan). The subjugated women under the culturally and politically loaded symbol of the burqa replaced the socialist image of women, ranging from urban educators in the countryside to singers and stage performers, and marked the nation's identification with a political yet conflictive tribal Islam, clearly expressed in Sebghatullah Mojaddadi's election speech, which, while claiming the equality of men and women under Islam, called the election of a woman president as a sign of a "nation in decline."

In Iran and Afghanistan, the search for a post-colonial modernity – Western, socialist, and Islamic – with its metaphorical association of new womanhood with new nationhood, has failed to subsume traditional and subnational identities within a hegemonic national culture. In both countries, the struggles over the nation and its "fragments" (women, ethnic and religious communities, popular classes) have always been strongly gendered. Women, though included like men as citizens, were given a limited space – as mothers and symbols of national and cultural identity – in the project of the national process. At the crossroads of modernization and the globalizing discourse of consumerism, human rights, and identity politics, women in Iran and Afghanistan will continue to contribute to the shaping of the meanings of "woman" and "nation."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. Afary, Shi'i narratives of Karbala and Christian rites of penance. Michel Foucault and the culture of the Iranian Revolution, 1978–1979, in Radical History 86 (2003), 7–35.
 B. Anderson, Imagined communities, New York 1991.
 C. M. Amin, The making of the modern Iranian woman.

- Gender, state policy, and popular culture, 1865–1946*, Gainesville, Fla. 2002.
- A. Brodsky, With all our strength. The Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, New York 2003.
- P. Chatterjee, The nation and its fragments. Colonial and postcolonial histories, Princeton, N.J. 1993.
- N. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women, in M. N. Shahrani and R. L. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan, Berkeley 1984, 306–40.
- D. Ellis, Women of the Afghan war, Westport, Conn. 2000.
- H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, Westport, Conn. 2002.
- H. Esfandiari, Reconstructed lives. Women and Iran's Islamic Revolution, Washington, D.C. 1997.
- J. de Groot, Coexisting and conflicting identities. Women and nationalisms in twentieth-century Iran, in R. R. Pierson, N. Chaudhuri, and B. McAuley (eds.), Nation, empire, colony. Historicizing gender and race, Bloomington, Ind. 1998, 139–65.
- V. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, Oxford 1994.
- , Identity politics and women. Cultural reassertions and feminisms in international perspective, Boulder, Colo. 1995.
- A. Najmabadi, Hazards of modernity and morality. Women, state, and ideology in contemporary Iran, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, Philadelphia 1991, 663–87.
- , The story of the daughters of Quchan. Gender and national memory in Iranian history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1998.
- G. Nashat, Women and revolution in Iran, Boulder, Colo. 1983.
- P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.
- E. Sanasarian, The women's rights movement in Iran. Mutiny, appeasement, and repression from 1900 to Khomeini, New York 1982.
- F. Shirazi, The veil unveiled. The hijab in modern culture, Gainesville, Fla. 2001.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Woman, nation, state, New York 1989.

FAKHRI HAGHANI

South Asia

Although South Asia is segmented along various axes of difference – ethnic, caste, class, gender, religion, language – the mobilization of these identities is the result of particular configurations of local and global political, social, and economic forces and of the emergence of specific constituencies and identity politics based on new forms of politicized religion. Located in a broader crisis of modernity and state legitimacy, identity politics based on politicized religion are modernist with a clear political project for control over the state and imposition of their agenda on others. This was seen in the Islamization campaign during Zia ul-Haq's regime in Pakistan, under General Ershad's rule in Bangladesh, and in the propagation of the Hindutva ideology espoused by the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party in India.

Since the 1980s a new configuration and redefinition of the contours and boundaries of the state, community, and the family in the region has emerged. Multiple identities are being particularized into singular religion-based identities imposed through force as well as embraced through affinity. Women in particular have been subject to contradictory political, economic, and social pressures and they have defined themselves, and have been defined and redefined, in their identities as women and as members of a nation, community, caste, and class group. That these identities are often at the cost of equal citizenship rights is epitomized by the following statement by Nur Jahan, a working class Muslim feminist from India: "If by making separate laws for Muslim women, you are trying to say that we are not citizens of this country, then why don't you tell us clearly and unequivocally that we should establish another country – not Hindustan or Pakistan but Auratstan [women's land]" (Chhachhi 1994, 74).

The characterization of the emergence of politicized religion in the region is contested. Analysts continue to debate whether contemporary states and particular religio-political identity groups should be labeled fundamentalist, communalist, nationalist, Islamist, majoritarian, fascist, or right-wing – each characterization reflecting particular political positionings. Although there are variations in the strength of politicized religion in each country there are common features in the ways in which the boundaries of the nation/community/family are constructed, (re)defined and protected with women/gender relations figuring as a crucial marker and signifier of identity.

A key determinant of identity politics in the South Asian region today is the role of the state in mobilizing and reproducing politicized religious identities. The process of the formation of India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh was itself based on an ideological mobilization that equated the nation with a particular community identity, despite avowals of secularism. The often forced recovery of women abducted by both sides during Indian partition was cast within a discourse of protection/contamination/control over women's bodies in which citizenship was defined in religious community terms. In India and Pakistan each side emphasizes its difference through external discourses and internal processes of "othering" through the media, history textbooks, and popular discourses, often using the masculine/feminine dualism to bolster a militarized masculinity.

In India, nationalist identity was derived from a Sanskritized upper caste version of Hinduism, excluding other communities, tribals, and dalits (untouchables) at the same time as it incorporated a particular notion of gender relations and womanhood. Indian nationalism contained in itself the seeds of divisions that proliferated in the post-independence period. The continued existence of separate religion-based laws (called personal laws) to regulate marriage, inheritance, divorce, and adoption constructed a sharp disjunction between the professed secularism of the Indian state and the legal structure that governed the private domain. In the post-independence period the controversies over personal law led to a questioning of the state ideology of secularism itself. Social citizenship remains based on membership of a community and in all personal laws women are denied equal rights in varying degrees. These laws and the appropriation by Hindutva forces of the feminist demand for a uniform civil code have become a battleground for the defense of “authentic” minority Muslim and majority Hindu community identities. This defense is ironic since the process of codification of these laws for Hindus, Muslims, and Christians incorporated colonial Victorian assumptions and selective interpretation of texts by priests and mullahs, thereby constructing “imaginary” boundaries of each community and the family. Given the minority status of Muslims in India a progressive-regressive movement has determined the construction of Muslim identity and equal citizenship rights for Muslim women have been subordinated to the defense of the community. The upsurge in majoritarian Hindu fundamentalism, the destruction of the Babri Masjid in 1992, and the pogrom against Muslims in Gujarat in 2003 have once again led to a defensive reassertion of personal law as a symbol of Muslim identity.

Pakistan resolved the dilemma posed at its birth of whether it was a country “of Muslims” or “for Muslims” by constructing a national identity through a twin process of homogenizing Islam and enhancing the differences between men and women and Muslim and others. This was constructed through gender segregation, dress codes (shalwar kameez versus sari and chador and chardiwari) and legislating secondary status to women, minorities, and all Muslim sects other than Sunnī. From 1977 onwards issues of sexual, geographical, cultural, and moral boundary protection became central in public discourse and the private realm of the family came under increasing state supervision and control. The Hudood Ordinances, which combined misogynist views with public morality to control women’s sexuality, were accompanied by an increase in public violence against women – those who transgressed social norms as well as those who were victims (for instance, rape was redefined as adultery in the Zina Ordinance).

The creation of Bangladesh on the basis of ethnic/linguistic/cultural nationalism (which required the dismantling of a Muslim identity uniting both wings of Pakistan) also contained contradictions. Contestations over secularism were subsequently framed within religious discourse as later military regimes moved away from the nationalist/socialist project of the Mujib period and slowly incorporated Islam as a state religion in the constitution and built alliances with fundamentalist groups. The government hence failed to prevent or control the increased issuance of fatwas by rural religious leaders backed by village elites ordering the burning or stoning to death of women, the harassment of intellectuals, the banning of the work of “blasphemous” writers, and attacks on non-governmental organizations Global alliances have also played a significant role in bolstering fundamentalisms in the region – Saudi oil connections and patronage in Bangladesh, United States support to Pakistan as a frontline state against the Soviet supported Afghanistan, which fostered the Taliban, and the financial support from the Hindu diaspora for Hindutva in India. Integration into a global economy, capitalist markets, urban consumerism and political alliances have led to the emergence of particular constituencies – primarily middle-class – who support the political agenda of Islamization in Pakistan and Bangladesh and Hindutva in India.

In all three countries the state is neither monolithic nor are its policies uniform. Concurrent with the carving of national/communal identities with specific gender constructs, modernization policies have drawn women into the labor force, granted degrees of political representation at the national and local level, and provided for education. Similarly regime types do not necessarily indicate internal processes. In Pakistan the Family Laws Ordinance 1961, which gave women some rights in relation to marriage, divorce, and child custody was passed by a military government; while the Hudood Ordinances were not repealed by the democratic government, the Jamaat-e-Islami, a fundamentalist group, expanded under a democratic government in Bangladesh; and the worst forms of violence have been unleashed against Muslims and Christians in democratic secular India.

Central to the projects of religio-political groups is the control over women’s bodies, mobility, sexuality, and reproductive capacity, and a reinscription of gender relations. The increase in public violence against women and the gendered and sexualized discourse of fundamentalist groups is in part a response to the increasing public visibility of women, the undermining of hegemonic masculinity in traditional patriarchal structures, and the growing consciousness and assertion of women's rights in the region.

Increasing numbers of women in all three countries are entering the more visible sectors of employment – export industries, banks, and offices – and in some cases taking on hitherto male jobs. Simultaneously there are reports of numerous cases where women have started asserting their rights to choice in marriage, property, maintenance, and divorce. It is in this changing context of modernity that the state and community has responded with measures to reassert control and redefine the contours of identity. State discourses and legal measures have wider implications since they sanction the right of control over women from the family/community to any man on the street. For instance, in Pakistan the institutionalization of laws such as Hudood, Evidence, and Qisas and Diyat – which reduce women to second-class citizens – have been primarily used against poor working-class and destitute women, but they also expose upper- and middle-class women to the constant threat of surveillance by the police, mullahs, and the evidence of any man. In Bangladesh community control was asserted through fatwas against women who transgressed social norms. In India the controversy over Muslim personal laws (the Shah Bano case) reasserted community control over Muslim women who sought to assert independent citizenship rights. There has been escalation in direct forms of violence against women ranging from tarring the mid-ribs of women wearing saris in Bangladesh, acid throwing, honor killings, to the glorification of sati (widow immolation) as a symbol of true Indian/Hindu womanhood. The centrality of sexual violence in the Hindutva political project was manifest in the pogrom in Gujarat in 2003. Violation of Muslim women's bodies/community boundaries, by acts of public rape and targeted attacks on their reproductive organs functioned to eliminate/humiliate/violate the minority community and simultaneously forge a new form of Hindu hegemonic masculinity that was virile and omnipotent.

Women have been agents as well as objects in the discourse and practice of religious fundamentalist movements in South Asia. The extensive mobilization and activism of women in fundamentalist movements in the region have raised problematic questions about agency, activism, and empowerment. Women in fundamentalist movements have incited, participated and justified violence against the "other" community. Despite supporting an agenda that curtails their rights and constructs images of the dependent, self-sacrificing, dutiful wife/mother, women in these movements have also experienced freedom from traditional restrictions on early marriage and mobility and have gained access to physical training and participation in the public political sphere. This feature of Hindu fundamentalism has been characterized as "controlled emancipation." The paradoxical nature of women's complicity and collusion in communalized identity politics is an area for further research and political engagement for women's movements that stress the significance of feminist agency.

The complexity of identity politics in the region is reflected in the diversity of political positions within the women's movements of the region. There are broadly three kinds of group: those who continue to speak on the basis of an undifferentiated notion of women, see religion as inherently irrational and patriarchal, and argue for a secular non-sexist law that guarantees equal citizenship and justice; those who articulate a dual identity as Muslim and Christian feminists and focus on reforming religious laws drawing on progressive reinterpretations of the Qur'an and the Bible; and those who propose a combined strategy of reform plus a secular code of equal rights for women. New identity groups continue to emerge, such as the dalit feminist group in India who argue from an epistemological standpoint of the most oppressed and are critical of the mainstream women's movement. Women's groups in the region have also linked with transnational networks such as Women Living Under Muslim Laws as well as established regional and cross-border alliances, such as South Asian feminist networks and peace and democracy coalitions, thereby linking the issue of women/gender and identity politics with militarism and democratization in the region.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Agnes, Women, marriage and the subordination of rights, in P. Chatterjee and P. Jeganathan (eds.), Community, gender and violence, New Delhi 2000, 106–37.
- P. Baccheta, Hindu nationalist women as ideologues. The Sangh, the Samiti and differential concepts of the Hindu nation, in K. Jayawardena and M. de Alwis (eds.), Embodied violence. Communalising women's sexuality in South Asia, London 1996, 126–67.
- A. Basu, Hindu women's activism in India and the questions it raises, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 167–84.
- C. Bayly, The origins of nationalism in South Asia. Patriotism and ethical government in the making of India, Oxford 1998.

- U. Butalia, Muslims and Hindus, men and women. Communal stereotypes and the partition of India, in T. Sarkar and U. Butalia (eds.), Women and the Hindu right. A collection of essays, New Delhi 1995, 58–81.
- A. Chhachhi, The state, religious fundamentalism and women. Trends in South Asia, in Economic and Political Weekly 24:11 (1989), 567–78.
- , Forced identities. The state, communalism, fundamentalism and women in India, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.) Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 144–75.
- , Identity politics, secularism and women. A South Asian perspective, in Z. Hasan (ed.), Forging identities. Gender, communities and the state, New Delhi 1994, 74–95.
- S. Feldman, Manipulating gender, shifting state practices, and class frustrations in Bangladesh, in P. Jeffery and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 33–52.
- F. Gardezi, Nationalism and state formation. Women's struggles and Islamization in Pakistan, in N. Hussain, S. Mumtaz, and R. Saigol (eds.), Engendering the nation-state, i, Lahore 1997, 79–110.
- M. Guhathakurta, Religion, politics and women. The Bangladesh scenario, in Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Dossier 25 (2003), 71–6, <<http://www.wluml.org/english/publistype.shtml?cmd%5B72%5D=c-1-Dossiers>>.
- T. Hansen, Controlled emancipation. Women and Hindu nationalism, in F. Wilson and B. D. Frederiksen (eds.), Ethnicity, gender and the subversion of nationalism, London 1994, 82–94.
- N. Hussain, S. Mumtaz, and R. Saigol (eds.), Engendering the nation-state, i, Lahore 1997.
- International Initiative for Justice, Threatened existence. A feminist analysis of the genocide in Gujarat, Bombay/Delhi 2003, <<http://www.onlinevolunteers.org/gujarat/reports/iijg/2003/>>.
- A. Jalal, The convenience of subservience. Women and the state in Pakistan, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.) Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 77–114.
- K. Jayawardena and M. de Alwis (eds.), Embodied violence. Communalising women's sexuality in South Asia, London 1996.
- P. Jeffrey, Agency, activism, and agendas, in P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 221–44.
- P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998.
- P. Jeffrey and R. Jeffrey, Gender, community, and the local state in Bijnor, India, in P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 123–42.
- N. Kaber, The quest for national identity. Women, Islam and the state in Bangladesh, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 115–43.
- N. Keddie, The new religious politics and women worldwide. A comparative study, in Journal of Women's History 10:4 (1999), 11–34.
- N. Menon, Women and citizenship, in P. Chatterjee (ed.), Wages of freedom. Fifty years of the Indian nation-state, New Delhi 1998, 241–66.
- J. Mirza, Between chaddar and the market. Female office workers in Lahore, Oxford 2002.
- S. Rege, A dalit feminist standpoint, in A. Rao (ed.), Gender and caste, New Delhi 2003, 90–101.
- S. Rouse, The outsider(s) within. Sovereignty and citizenship in Pakistan, in P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 53–70.
- T. Sarkar, Woman, community, and nation. A historical trajectory for Hindu identity politics, in P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 89–106.
- F. Shaheed, The other side of the discourse. Women's experiences of identity, religion and activism in Pakistan, in P. Jeffrey and A. Basu (eds.), Appropriating gender. Women's activism and politicized religion in South Asia, New York 1998, 143–66.
- , Constructing identities. Culture, women's agency and the Muslim world, in Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Dossier 23/24 (2001), 1–11, <<http://www.wluml.org/english/publistregional.shtml?cmd%5B24%5D=c-1-International>>.
- S. Shobhan, National identity, fundamentalism and the women's movement in Bangladesh, in V. M. Moghadam (ed.), Gender and national identity. Women and politics in Muslim societies, London 1994, 63–80.
- P. van der Veer, Religious nationalism. Hindus and Muslims in India, Berkeley 1994.

AMRITA CHHACHHI

Turkey

Images of women have played a central role in Turkey's national project since the creation of a secularist republic in 1923. "Turkish" identity emerged from the process of nation-building that was associated with the transition from the Ottoman Empire, with its ties to Arabic and Persian Islamic culture, to the Republic of Turkey, which looked to Turkic roots and modern secularism as sources of identity. "Turkishness" was retrieved from folk culture (Mardin 2002) to become the vehicle of "modern" culture. In the process of shaping Turkish secular, national identities, policymakers sought to suppress ethnic diversity. In a continuation of reforms based on European models that had begun in the nineteenth century, Atatürk's government aimed to create a nationalist Turkish identity by transforming not only state institutions but also everyday life and customs, dress, bodily practices, and gender relations. The government abolished the fez (a distinctively Ottoman hat worn by men and often associated with the Islamic Sufi orders) in 1926, banned the headscarf in government buildings including schools, and generated an ideological promotion of gender equality. In this "state feminism," women were expected embody national ideals by appearing in public spaces, getting an education, entering the political realm, and pursuing unorthodox careers, a role epitomized by Atatürk's adopted daughter Sabiha Gökçen, who became a fighter pilot (Altınay 2004). But Altınay and other feminists have argued that women have also faced growing pressures to be loyal wives and sacrificing mothers, that the public image of the modern Turkish woman had little impact on everyday gender relations (Sirman 1989), and that women's liberated bodies have been the source of a "schizophrenic identity," which has left little room for women's personal fulfillment (Tekeli 1990) or even a sexualized or gendered identity.

The goals of the early Turkish Republic equated secularization and Westernization, which were contrasted with traditional Islamic practices. The traditionally dressed woman wearing a headscarf was the embodiment of backwardness and the Ottoman past. In the secularist imagination, such women continue to inhabit the margins of modern society, epitomized in Turkey's villages which have not yet been fully modernized and in the shanty towns on the outskirts of major cities where migrants from rural areas congregate and form the lowest class.

With the rise of Islamism, women's dress and the organization of gender became the focal point of yet another controversy over identity and national policy. In 1984, political protests erupted over the government's policy of banning headscarves on university campuses (Olsen 1985). Before this, women adopted modern dress when they entered schools and universities, giving up the headscarf as a sign of the traditional uneducated woman. Young Islamist women in the early 1980s were at the vanguard of a movement that had developed a new perspective on the relationship between national identity and the West. Influenced by the writings of thinkers such as Maudūdī in Pakistan and al-Qutb in Egypt, Islamism was a growing transnational movement; it disrupted Orientalist dichotomies which equated modernity, technological development, and the West and contrasted them with the backwardness of the Muslim world. For many Islamists, the position of women and the headscarf became key symbols for asserting the relevance of Islam for the modern world. Women's identity in the Islamist movement is sharply distinguished from what both Islamists and secularists label the "traditional" Muslim woman, whom both see as a passive bearer of habits and local practices. The Islamist woman's headscarf is worn in a style distinctively different from that of the traditional village woman but similar to that of Islamist women across the globe, marking a Muslim identity that transcends national differences and identities.

The woman who adopts the Islamist headscarf is asserting a Muslim identity based on a conscious, personal decision rather than on submission to her community or to the authority of men (Göle 1996, Ewing 2000). Becoming knowledgeable about Islam through study groups and maintaining public visibility are important elements of women's Islamist practice which contrast with the traditional organization of gendered spaces. Some women have asserted an Islamic feminist position. When the Islamist Welfare Party first came to power for a short time in the late 1990s, some women who had played an active political role in the party were disappointed when their male colleagues failed to give them significant positions in the new government, and openly spoke out against efforts to relegate them back into the home. The Islamist headscarf also has a class dimension (White 2002): many of these women have gained access to higher education, seek professional careers, and lead urban middle-class lives. They assert an identity, not against modernity, but against specific forms of secularism and the dominance of Western European cultural ideals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Altınay, The myth of the military nation. Militarism, gender and education in Turkey, New York 2004.
- F. Acar, Women and Islam in Turkey, in Ş. Tekeli (ed.), Women in modern Turkish society. A reader, London 1995, 46–65.
- Y. Arat, Feminists, Islamists, and political change in Turkey, in Political Psychology 19:1 (1998) 117–31.
- F. M. Coşar, Women in Turkish Society, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 124–40.
- C. Delaney, The seed and the soil. Gender and cosmology in Turkish village society, Berkeley 1991.
- K. P. Ewing, The violence of non-recognition. Becoming a "conscious" Muslim woman in Turkey, in A. Robben and M. Suárez-Orozco (eds.), Cultures under siege. Collective violence and trauma in anthropological and psychoanalytic perspective, Cambridge 2000, 248–71.
- N. Göle, The forbidden modern. Civilization and veiling, Ann Arbor, 1996.
- A. Kadioğlu, Women's subordination in Turkey. Is Islam really the villain?, in Middle East Journal 48 (1994), 645–60.
- D. A. Kandiyoti, Women and the Turkish state. Political actors or symbolic pawns?, in N. Yuval-Davis and F. Anthias (eds.), Woman, nation, state, London 1989, 126–49.
- , End of empire. Islam, nationalism, and women in Turkey, in D. A. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam, and the state, London 1991, 22–47.
- D. A. Kandiyoti and A. Saktanber (eds.), Fragments of culture. The everyday of modern Turkey, New Brunswick, N.J. 2002, 191–217.
- Ş. Mardin, Religion and social change in modern Turkey, Albany, N.Y. 1989.
- Y. Navaro-Yashin, Faces of the state. Secularism and public life in Turkey, Princeton, N.J. 2002.
- E. Olsen, Muslim identity and secularism in contemporary Turkey. "The headscarf dispute," in Anthropological Quarterly 58:4 (1985), 161–9.
- A. Saktanber, Becoming the "other" as a Muslim in Turkey. Turkish women vs. Islamist women, in New Perspectives on Turkey 11 (Fall 1994), 99–134.

- N. Sirman, Feminism in Turkey. A short history, in New Perspectives on Turkey 3:1 (Fall 1989), 1–34.
- Ş. Tekeli, The meaning and limits of feminist ideology in Turkey, in F. Özbay (ed.), Women, family and social change in Turkey, Bangkok 1990, 1–12.
- J. B. White, Islamist mobilization in Turkey. A study in vernacular politics, Seattle 2002.

KATHERINE PRATT EWING

The United States

In the United States Muslims face a constant challenge to assert their identities as Muslim, but also have a legitimate stake in being “American.” This is due to the widespread racism, prejudice and negative stereotypes of Islam as a backward and violent religion, oppressive of women. Mainstream society suspects an American cannot also be a Muslim.

Research into Muslim women’s identity in the United States is still in its infancy, with many studies focusing only on the issue of hijāb, rather than on broader questions of identity (Read and Bartkowski 1999, Alvi, Hoodfar, and McDonough 2003). Shahnaz Khan’s Muslim Women: Crafting a North American Identity is an exception. Though her study focuses on women in Toronto, it can be easily argued that her findings are equally applicable to the United States (due to the similarity in political, economical, and social/cultural mores and contexts). Khan identified a “third space” for Muslim women’s identity – an ambiguous, even hybrid identity, where Muslim women carve out a space between the mainstream racism and discrimination they face as Muslims, and any patriarchal religious dogmas that seek to control them (Khan 2000).

An identity not deeply explored by Khan in her book, but highlighted by Aminah Beverly McCloud in her work on African American Muslims (1995), is one not of hybridity, but more of synthesis. McCloud looks at the ways African Americans, who already have an American identity, take on or adapt Islamic practices, beliefs, and customs when becoming Muslim, or establishing Muslim communities. Her observations on the fusion of these two identities (American and Muslim) are also applicable to immigrants, and especially the children of immigrants. Racism, discrimination, and a sense of being cut off from one’s home culture often galvanize Muslim women into feeling pride in their heritage, so that they seek to become observant and pious Muslims while retaining a strong sense of the right to be modern American women. This is one of the most interesting aspects of Muslim women’s identity in the United States in the twenty-first century.

Observant Muslims in the United States are usually associated in some way with one of the major Muslim associations, whether as formal members, as recipients of a magazine, or as regular attendees at national or regional conferences. Major associations such as the Islamic Society of North America (ISNA), the Islamic Circle of North America (ICNA), the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), the Muslim American Society (MAS) broadly agree on issues related to Muslims as United States citizens, namely that the United States Constitution offers Muslims rights and guarantees to practice their faith and to be full citizens in the United States polity. These mainstream associations promote a vision of Islam that stresses peaceful co-existence, interfaith dialogue, and integration into mainstream United States society, while at the same time maintaining Islamic heritage. (See numerous articles in Islamic Horizons, the ISNA’s magazine, and news releases by CAIR.) At the 2003 Annual ISNA Convention, held in Chicago, the American Muslim Political Coordinating Council (made up of the American Muslim Alliance, the American Muslim Council, CAIR, and the Muslim Political Action Committee) distributed an open letter to the ISNA attendees urging Muslims to vote in the next federal election. Voting is presented as Muslims’ fulfilling their “duty to [their] religion in part by fulfilling [their] duty to [their] nation” (CAIR 2003).

Muslim women are not well represented in the executive bodies of these associations, though they are involved as activists at all other levels (as well as behind the scenes, as wives of executives, see Ali 2003, 16–24). Nevertheless, the associations themselves promote the concept that men and women are equal in Islam. A new generation of Muslim women, especially the youth born in the United States to immigrant parents, along with those converting to Islam from United States society, has been influenced by this discourse. Hence, right across the United States there are self-assured, dynamic young women who also embrace their Islamic faith with confidence (see the profile of Asma Gul Hasan in Rhodes 2002). Some creative synthesis of traditional Muslim practices and traditional United States customs are taking place.

For instance, many of the young women in this category embrace the traditional Islamic dress of hijāb. But their rationale for doing so is tied to an inverted Western feminist discourse. Mainstream Western feminists view the hijāb as a symbol of Muslim women’s oppression (Govier 1995). These young women claim the hijāb as an empowerment for women. Their argument is based on the Western feminist critique of the male gaze and the “beauty myth” (Wolf 1992). Hijāb is seen as liberation from mainstream American culture’s obsession with and promotion of the beautiful, thin female body. In newspaper articles, these young women emphasize that their body is their own, that in hijāb they are not sex objects, and that they have been liberated from the “thin is beautiful” pressures that lead many of their non-Muslim friends into anorexia or bulimia (Farooqi 2002, Bullock 2002).

The hijāb itself is usually an adaptation of mainstream American fashion. Rather than a traditional wide piece of cloth wrapped around the body, many will wear Western dress – a skirt from Gap, a shirt from Chateau, and shoes from Payless – with a headscarf pinned under the chin. This outfit allows for greater freedom of movement than the traditional wrap. Many will play sport, attend a gym, or ride a bicycle dressed in this way.

Another creative adaptation of a traditional American institution is the emergence of an “all-girls Muslim prom.” Since the pious Muslim cannot date or attend dances with men, the high school ritual of the prom is an existential dilemma for many Muslims. Not wanting to succumb to the pressure of being “too nerdy” not to have a date for the prom, many girls want to attend, even without a date. The prom occasions power struggles between parents adamant the teen should not go, and the teen adamant she should. A creative solution has emerged in San Jose and other towns across the United States. For the 2003 graduates in San Jose, a banquet hall was hired. The girls arrived at the hall in their hijāb, but removed it once inside, being dressed in a typical prom outfit, with make-up, jewelry, and their hair done. They sat down to eat a three-course meal, and then danced to Britney Spears. And at sunset, they turned the music off, donned their hijāb, and prayed the maghrib (sunset) prayer (Brown 2003).

Muslim women in this category of those attempting to synthesize being American and being Muslim have a strong sense of their equality with men in Islam. Many will argue that equality need not mean identicality as liberal feminists promote; rather they align more with the “different but equal” school, more akin to French feminism (Badawi 1995). They believe, like Aminah Assilmi, a popular Muslim woman speaker at religious conferences, that they adhere to true Islam, rejecting the cultural “baggage” of practices from their countries of origin that may be oppressive of Muslim women (Assilmi and Disuqi). Indeed, as Cayer found for young women in Toronto, though it can be replicated across the United States also, many young women embrace Islam and the headscarf as a way of resisting parental pressures that they find limiting and restrictive, especially parental pressure to marry someone from their own ethnic background (“I have the right in Islam to say ‘no’ to your suggested candidate”) or as a way to promote their desire for education and a career (“Islam gives me the right to be educated, and if I am covered and a practicing Muslim woman, no one can deny me the right to a career”) (Cayer 1996). So while embracing an observant Muslim lifestyle (praying, fasting, wearing hijāb), these young Muslim women are not jettisoning a modern or American lifestyle. Many expect to have careers, and if they marry, to have husbands who will do housework and share child-care (Bullock 2002).

Another example of creative synthesis is the growing Muslim music industry in the United States: this conforms to traditional Islamic law’s eschewing of all instruments but the drum, but addresses the needs and concerns of the youth. Songs in English, such as “Do you think you can fool him?” by Mustaqim Sahir, or “Allah is enough for me,” by Zain Bhikha, praise the Prophet Muḥammad, extol the beauties of Paradise, stress the necessity of prayer, and warn of the dangers of a United States “sex and drug” culture.

All this has also had an impact on immigrant parents, and it is not uncommon, as I have seen, to find mothers adopting the headscarf after their daughters have done so, or to find themselves praying and observing Ramadan, while in their twenties in their countries of origin they may not have (Bullock 2003). In addition, many Americans, from all walks of life (Native, African, Latino, Caucasian), are attracted by the vision of Islam this youth movement adheres to, and are converting in large numbers to Islam, adopting an observant practice of the religion. Thus many Muslims negotiate their identity in the United States as an effort at synthesizing a modern American lifestyle with an observant Islamic lifestyle.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- S. Ali, Building a movement. A woman’s work, in Islamic Horizons (May/June 1424/2003), 16–24.
- A. Assilmi and R. al-Disuqi, Rights of Muslim women and their potential for impact in society, video lecture produced by MeccaCentric Da’wah Group.
- P. Brown, At Muslim prom, it’s a girls-only night out, in New York Times, 9 June 2003, 9.
- CAIR (Council on American-Islamic Relations), America Muslim News Briefs, 2 September 2003, email distribution list.
- M. Farooqi, Wearing hijab changed my life, Las Postias College Express, 29 October 2002, 10.

- K. Govier, Shrouded in black, Toronto Star, 25 September 1995, A19.
 A. J. Rhodes, Riding tall. A Muslim cowgirl, in Azizah Magazine (Winter 2002), 68–70.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- S. S. Alvi, H. Hoodfar, and S. McDonough (eds.), The Muslim veil in North America. Issues and debates, Toronto 2003.
 J. Badawi, Gender equity in Islam. Basic principles, Plainfield, Ind. 1995.
 K. Bullock, Rethinking Muslim women and the veil. Challenging historical and modern stereotypes, Herndon, Va. 2002.
 C. Cayer, Hijab, narrative, and the production of gender among second generation, Indo-Pakistani, Muslim women in greater Toronto, M.A. thesis, York University, Toronto 1996.
 S. Khan, Muslim women. Crafting a North American identity, Gainesville, Fla. 2000.
 A. B. McCloud, African American Islam, New York 1995.
 J. Read and J. P. Bartkowski, Identity negotiation in contemporary Islam. Muslim women's view of the veil, Association Paper, American Sociological Association (ASA) 1999.
 A. S. Roald, Women in Islam. The Western experience, London 2001.
 N. Wolf, The beauty myth. How images of beauty are used against women, New York 1992.
 J. Zine, Redefining resistance. Towards an Islamic subculture in schools, in Race Ethnicity and Education 3 (2000), 293–316.

KATHERINE BULLOCK

Western Europe

THE POLITICAL MOBILIZATION OF MUSLIM MINORITIES IN THE WEST: A GENDER (UN)FRIENDLY PROJECT?

Mass migration movements are very symptomatic of this age we call global. Massive flows of people move from north to south, from east to west to seek a better future for themselves and their children (Appadurai 2000). During the 1950s and the 1960s a sizeable number of Muslims participated in an exodus from south to north within the scope of larger labor agreements that brought them to Western Europe (see, for example, the case of Belgium in Martens 1976). Having left with the hope of returning home after a few years of hard work, they found that the few years became an indefinite period once the second generation was born. Today this diaspora of Muslims, which is ethnically very heterogeneous in its composition, forms with its 12 million citizens one of the largest religious minorities in Western Europe (Dassetto et al. 2001). However, the considerable unemployment rate and low level of education make this group also one of the weakest groups on the sociopolitical level. In most Western European countries the Muslim populations are locally perceived as a problem category, which can only be dealt with through adjusted policy measures focused on the key concept of integration. Events like those of 11 September 2001 have added to this problematic perspective through inscribing this group into a wider, global discourse in which terrorism and security are the key words (Zemni 2002, Shahid and van Koningsveld 2002). The actual development of European Islam is monitored on the premise that certain tendencies may develop that could threaten the national security.

In a context in which Islam is perceived as a threat and Muslims are seen as a problem, several counter-movements have been developing to contest these a priori racist positions. At first these protest movements mainly organized themselves as a reaction against the electoral successes of extreme right movements in several European countries and also against the persistent exclusion of Muslims. The driving ideology of universal humanism of this first anti-racist movement, however, has underrated the importance that minorities accord to the recognition of their cultural and religious identities (Modood 1997). This importance in the last decades has become clear through the mobilization of different groups around cultural and religious claims, for example the Islamic headscarf issue in most Western European countries. More than just seeking socioeconomical and political equality, these groups redefine the notion of citizenship, including a recognition of their religious and cultural identity (one of the clearest illustrations of this development can be found in the spectacular rise of the Arab European League in Belgium and in Holland). The so-called neutrality of the universalistic premises of citizenship is defied and unmasked as a particular white middle-class self definition (Werbner 2003).

The notion of identity politics – to which this last political mobilization refers – is, however, not an undisputed concept, either in politics or in theoretical writing. In a large sense identity politics refers to any political mobilization centered around a particular identity, be it ethnic, sexual (women's issues, gay movement), or functional (labor movement centered around the workers as a defined category) (Calhoun 1994). In this entry this concept is used primarily to refer to the mobilization of ethnic and religious groups. The entry tries to offer a summary elaboration of this issue through a focus on the relationship between identity politics and women's rights. When the political mobilization of Muslim minorities in Western Europe is discussed, the issue of gender quickly pops up into the foreground.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS OR GROUP RIGHTS?

When identity claims are articulated by Muslim groups, feminist critiques arise immediately. Political mobilization of Muslims is often criticized because of its lack of attention to gender issues. One of the most famous essays offering this argument is that of Okin (1999). She states that the widely heard call for recognition of cultural rights sustains the patriarchal structure of these groups. To illustrate this statement, she refers to the Islamic societies where practices such as female genital mutilation are present.

Following the same line of argument, though from a different theoretical perspective, are authors such as Yuval-Davis (1993, 1997) who analyze the genesis of nationalism and other ethnic movements. While Okin can be situated within the liberal school of thought, Yuval-Davis rather belongs to classical "gender studies," combining poststructuralist, politologist, and anthropological perspectives. She takes over Benedict Anderson's argument for the definition of nations or ethnic groups – which she equates analytically in her argument – as "imagined communities." To maintain this collective imaginary, boundaries have to be constructed and kept. To achieve this, women take key positions: they are designated as the transmitters of cultural traditions and customs, and often symbolize the collective honor. When the ethnical or national group is threatened, the control of women and their sexual activity will be the first target of the group (Yuval-Davis 1993). Consequently, Yuval-Davis argues, in a context in which the ethnic group is in constant defense, such as is the case with migration, women will be subjected to a much greater control from the community. Every identity claim will go in the direction of more "cultural purity" and more control of the women. Again, the example of Muslim women in Great Britain is offered to illustrate this position (Yuval-Davis 1997, 201).

What is needed, then, is a transversal policy in which women of different identities ally themselves for the struggle, without losing the ethnical rootedness that would generate a constant dialogue and negotiation among the women (Yuval-Davis, 1997, 202). Other alternatives are found in the creation of a "third space" – a term developed by Homi Bhabha – in which neither the culture of origin nor the dominant culture would rule, a space of hybridity in which ethnicity would not be reduced to a particular vision over culture, and in which women could recompose their cultural identity and contest the patriarchal order of their community (Thiara 2003, Khan 1998).

EMPOWERMENT THROUGH IDENTITY POLITICS

In the first line of arguments outlined here, a skeptical position was taken as to the possible compatibility of political mobilization through an ethnic line and the effects it would have for female members of that community. This argument assumes the a priori position of an oppressive patriarchal ethnic community. Any political measure that would empower the community as a whole would be negative for women. Though it is a fact that issues related to women are regularly marginalized in the political struggle for cultural recognition – just as they are marginalized in any struggle for political rights that is not explicitly feminist – we argue that this opposition, which is presented between ethnic mobilization and women's rights, is based on an essentialization of both the community and the women.

A first reason to argue against this opposition is the homogeneous and oppressive description that is given of minority cultures, and more specifically of Muslim cultures. It is quite striking to see how an opposition is made between the majority culture in which oppressive structures would not be as active, and an Islamic minority culture in which they are dominant. This vision underestimates the complexity and diversity present among Muslim minorities; it also reproduces the Orientalist view in which a liberated Western majority is contrasted with an oppressive Muslim minority (Ahmed 1994, Khan 1998). Furthermore, by stating in advance that an identity politics approach that is organized across ethnic lines can only reproduce the patriarchal structures, the same equation of ethnicity with culture, criticized by authors such as Yuval-Davis (1997, 200), is made. The ethnic group is equated with a particular vision of their culture, which undercuts any dynamism. The diverse and hybrid characteristic of culture is, however, not an objective to strive for, but is rather the reality from which analysis ought to depart (Friedman 1997). To fully understand the dynamism of identity politics, a dissociation has to be made between ethnicity – which refers to a "we-belonging" related to common origin (Roosens, 1998) – and culture. This means understanding these political claims as claims for recognition, in which religion plays a fundamental structuring role of identification for the group here concerned (Calhoun 1994, Modood 1997, 1998, Werbner 2003). It also means analyzing how this political struggle for recognition always goes together with a constant internal renegotiation of the different dynamics that are present among the community. Political struggle does not change the complexity of the social reality, it merely reduces its representation in order to attain goals. Arguing the contrary would serve to reduce the social reality to the political representation of it (see also Modood 1998 382).

A second fundamental reason why we argue against this opposition is because of the construction and definition of emancipation in relation to the women here concerned. Firstly, the only relationship this vision acknowledges between a woman and her community is one of victimhood. Women – and certainly Muslim women – can only be oppressed. Secondly, the only true emancipation for these women will be attained through an individual, secular process of emancipation. This affirmation not only reproduces a very particular definition of emancipation – a Western liberal definition in which the individual is artificially cut off from the group – it also and foremost ignores the empowering processes that are active within the community precisely through the use of group-logics. Only a few women will accept a vision of feminism that puts them in conflict with their origin and ethnic background. They will rather seek for a way of emancipation that respects all aspects of their identity (Khan 1998, Thiara 2003). Several empirical studies on Muslim women in a migration context and in the homeland show how one can speak of an “Islamic feminism” that does not oppose the essential structuring role that religion takes in the self-identity of the group (Amiriaux 2003, Göle 2003, Torab 1996). Several authors have, however, debated the feminist calibre of these movements (see, for example, Moghadam 2002). The empowering of women is legitimized through the construction of alternative interpretations of the religious sources that are women-friendly and contest patriarchal dominance. To ignore the fact that these women are racialized and ethnicized next to being women, and thus that a struggle for ethnical and/or religious recognition is as important to them as it is for their fathers and brothers, is to ignore a fundamental dimension of their identity and emancipation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- V. Amiriaux, Discours voilés sur les musulmanes en Europe. Comment les musulmans sont-ils devenus des musulmanes?, in Social Compass 50:1 (2003), 85–96.
- A. Appadurai, Modernity at large. Cultural dimensions of globalization, Minneapolis 2000.
- C. Calhoun, Social theory and the politics of identity, in C. Calhoun (ed.), Social theory and the politics of identity, Oxford 1994, 9–36.
- F. Dassetto, B. Maréchal, and J. Nielsen (eds.), Convergences musulmanes. Aspects contemporains de l'Islam dans l'Europe élargie, Louvain-la-Neuve 2001.
- J. Friedman, Global crises, the struggle for cultural identity and intellectual porkbarrelling. Cosmopolitans versus locals, ethnics and nationals in an era of de-hegemonization, in P. Werbner and T. Modood (eds.), Debating cultural hybridity. Multi-cultural identities and the politics of anti-racism, London 1997, 70–89.
- N. Göle, Musulmanes et modernes. Voile et civilisation en Turquie, Paris 2003.
- S. Khan, Muslim women. Negotiations in the third space, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 23:2 (1998), 463–94.
- A. Martens, Les immigrés. Flux et reflux d'une main-d'œuvre appoint, Louvain 1976.
- T. Modood, “Difference,” cultural racism and anti-racism, in P. Werbner and T. Modood, (eds.), Debating cultural hybridity. Multi-cultural identities and the politics of anti-racism, London 1997, 238–54.
- , Anti-essentialism, multiculturalism and the “recognition” of religious groups, in Journal of Political Philosophy 6:4 (1998), 378–99.
- V. M. Moghadam, Islamic feminism and its discontents. Towards a resolution of the debate, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 27:4 (2002), 1135–71.
- S. M. Okin, Is multiculturalism bad for women?, Princeton, N.J. 1999.
- E. Roosens, Eigen grond eerst? Primordiale autochtonie. Dilemma van de multiculturele samenleving, Leuven 1998.
- W. A. R. Shahid and P. S. van Koningsveld, The negative image of Islam and Muslims in the West. Causes and solutions, in W. A. R. Shahid and P. S. van Koningsveld (eds.), Religious freedom and the neutrality of the state. The position of Islam in the European Union, Leuven 2001, 74–94.
- R. K. Thiara, South Asian woman and collective action in Britain, in J. Andall (ed.), Gender and ethnicity in contemporary Europe, Oxford 2003, 79–96.
- A. Torab, Piety as gendered agency. A study of Jalaseh ritual discourse in an urban neighbourhood in Iran, in Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 2:2 (1996), 235–52.
- P. Werbner, The politics of multiculturalism in the New Europe, in B. Saunders and D. Haljan (eds.), Whither multiculturalism. A politics of dissensus, Leuven 2003, 47–58.
- N. Yuval-Davis, Gender and nation, in Ethnic and Racial Studies 16:4 (1993), 621–32.
- , Ethnicity, gender relations and multiculturalism, in P. Werbner and T. Modood (eds.), Debating cultural hybridity. Multicultural identities and the politics of anti-racism, London 1997, 175–80.
- S. Zemni, Islam, European identity and the limits of multiculturalism, in W. A. R. Shadid and P. S. van Koningsveld (eds.), Religious freedom and the neutrality of the state. The position of Islam in the European Union, Leuven 2001.

Infanticide and Abandonment of Female Children

Overview

Female infanticide has been practiced from earliest times to the present in a wide variety of cultures. The practice usually results from a combination of poverty, lack or scarcity of resources, patriarchal social order, preservation of family honor, and the low status of women. If inheritance goes through the male line, if sons and not daughters support their parents in old age, if daughters join their husbands' families and thereafter contribute their labor to them, if families must furnish daughters with dowries upon marriage, if adequate food and care is available only in quantities sufficient for existing children, then a newborn daughter may be considered a burden and the preference for a male child may be a rational if regrettable economic choice.

In Muslim societies, the practice of female infanticide is the subject of an extensive and well-known religious discourse. The Qur'an addresses the practice in a famous and much-quoted verse: "When the sun shall be darkened, when the stars shall be thrown down, when the mountains shall be set moving, when the pregnant camels shall be neglected, when the savage beasts shall be mustered, when the seas shall be set boiling, when the souls shall be coupled, when the buried infant shall be asked for what sin she was slain, when the scrolls shall be unrolled, when heaven shall be stripped off, when Hell shall be set blazing, when Paradise shall be brought nigh, then shall a soul know what it has produced" (81:1-14). This passage refers to the events that will precede the Day of Judgment. Taken together, events such as polluting the earth with blood from an infant buried alive or of her accusing her murderers who must face the harshest of judgments for their crime are unimaginably horrific calamities. Virtually all jurists have taken this passage to confirm that female infanticide is in Islamic law equivalent to the crime of murder. Criticizing the attitudes of such parents who reject their female children, the Qur'an further states: "And when any of them is given the good tidings of a girl, his face is darkened and he chokes inwardly, as he hides him from the people because of the evil of the good tidings that have been given unto him, whether he shall preserve it in humiliation, or trample it into the dust. Ah, evil is that they judge!" (16:58-9).

Other passages reinforce the illegality of infanticide and place a high value on family relations: "Say: 'Come, I will recite what your Lord has forbidden you: that you associate not anything with Him, and to be good to your parents, and not to slay your children because of poverty; We will provide you and them'" (6:151). Similarly, we read, "And slay not your children for fear of poverty; We will provide for you and them; surely the slaying of them is a grievous sin" (17:31); "What, has your Lord favored you with sons and taken to Himself from the angels females? Surely it is a monstrous thing you are saying!" (17:42).

According to the Qur'an, providence determines the sex of the fetus: "To God belongs the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth; He creates what He will; He gives to whom He will females, and He gives to whom He will males or He couples them, both males and females; and He makes whom He will barren. Surely He is all knowing, All-powerful" (42:49).

The hadith literature also contains many sayings of the Prophet Muḥammad that express his high regard for daughters and for their proper upbringing. According to both Bukhārī and Muslim, the Prophet said, "Whoever maintains two girls till they attain maturity, he and I will come on the Resurrection Day like this; and he joined his fingers." Similarly, Ibn Ḥanbal reported, "Whosoever has a daughter and he does not bury her alive, does not insult her, and does not favor his son over her; God will enter him into Paradise," and "Whosoever supports two sisters till they mature, he and I will come in the Day of Judgment as this (and he pointed with his two fingers held together)." Islamic modernists have cited these and other hadiths to demonstrate that Islam calls for kind and respectful treatment of daughters.

In recent years, women's rights advocates have built on the work of the Islamic modernists to show that Islam does not favor males over females. Indeed, they insist, the Qur'an from the outset called for women's equality and inherent rights. Verse 16:59 quoted earlier is among the passages taken to demonstrate that Islam condemns all forms of violence against women. The usual approach is to emphasize the low status of women before Islam, which is proven by the practice of female infanticide, and the improved status of women after Islam was revealed, which is proven by the many verses guaranteeing women's rights. Islam's most fundamental guarantee of women's rights is simply the right to live. Islam then calls on parents to treat both male and female children with kindness, thereby making gender equality central to its message. Islam, they argue, clearly protects the rights of women but also the disadvantaged such as orphans, the infirm, and the aged, indicating that its goal is to secure social justice for all. Nevertheless, the Qur'ān and ḥadīth do not determine behavior as much as interact with local custom, family honor, and economic need to produce guidelines, which vary enormously from region to region. In some regions mothers may decide to commit infanticide or abandon a newborn child when an older child is still nursing. The mother knows that the older child will die without adequate nutrition and if the older child is healthy and male and if the newborn is female or perhaps handicapped or sickly, the latter may be killed or abandoned. This is considered regrettable but not a crime. The real crime, of course, is the global and regional economic inequality that forces families to make such unhappy choices.

In recent years, new reproductive technologies such as ultrasound and amniocentesis procedures have enabled prospective parents to determine the sex of the unborn and this has led to the intentional abortion of female fetuses and to the prevalence of male infants in certain regions and social strata in India, China, and many other societies. Worldwide, at least 80 million girls who would otherwise be expected to be alive are "missing," as a result of sex-selective abortions, infanticide, or neglect.

Islamic authorities have viewed the new reproductive technologies with favor only if the purpose is to enable an infertile couple to have children. The use of egg or sperm donors is generally frowned upon because it tampers with family lineage. While opinions vary on the legality of abortion for the purpose of family planning, abortions for the purpose of sex selection are not approved.

Despite the views of the religious authorities, many women are caught in a dilemma. They must produce sons or risk social censure and abandonment. The woman who successfully produces sons for her husband's family can expect to gain marital stability, higher social status, greater authority within the family, and material rewards. Often a young woman will accept a low status within her marriage in the expectation of a higher status at a more senior age. It is a means of self-preservation in families and societies constrained by patriarchal customs. The woman has been socialized to understand that rebelling may mean the end of her marriage, loss of status, and economic loss not only for herself but also for her kinship network. While the stable nuclear or extended family remains the basis of Muslim society in theory, the reality for many women is very different. Divorce, the former husband's failure to pay alimony and child support, and outright abandonment confront many women. Such fears may make sex-selected abortion the best course of action for individual and family survival. Some women also state that they do not wish to bring daughters into a social context in which they are not wanted. Such women, and indeed their families, should not be condemned, for they are trying to advance their mutual or divergent interests in a discriminatory and difficult environment.

In Pakistan, women activists have been exceptionally visible in campaigning against sex-selective reproductive practices. In utero diagnosis has enabled physicians to identify hundreds of diseases at an early stage of pregnancy, but the valuable medical procedure can easily be misused. Ultrasound is more often than not used to determine the sex of the fetus and female fetuses are aborted not only by impoverished women but also by women in the middle and upper classes who find it in their interests to bear male children. Such women and their marital families covet the prestige associated with producing male children and social pressure can be considerable. Pakistani medical personnel increasingly refuse to disclose the sex of the fetus because of the prevalence of sex selection, but prospective parents may then seek another more cooperative medical care provider. The result is a disproportionate number of male infants and perhaps 3.1 million missing females in Pakistan.

Neglect of female infants may be more common than infanticide or sex-selected abortion in some areas. In Egypt, more than 600,000 females are missing from the Egyptian population, thereby skewing the expected male:female sex ratio. Impoverished parents give inferior food and medical care to the less valued female infants and children who may then succumb to respiratory infections, diarrhea, and malnutrition. Researchers in Egypt conducted a national survey, which showed that while infant mortality was lower for females for the first month after birth, it rose rapidly after the neonatal period, indicating parental or care-giver neglect. To date there are few statistical surveys on the neglect of female infants elsewhere, though indications are that the practice is far from rare in impoverished regions.

In Sudan, female or male infanticide is illegal and rare but is considered less shameful than is pregnancy in unmarried women. Often a family may abandon the infant to avoid damaging family honor. Such infants may end up in orphanages where care is limited. Sudanese families wanting household servants sometimes informally adopt female children from the orphanages, but males usually remain without a respectable social role. Reliable statistics on the abandonment of female children in Sudan and elsewhere are virtually non-existent, although anecdotal evidence suggests a need for a viable childcare system in many urban areas.

In recent years, human rights activists have made female infanticide, neglect, and abandonment the first of many human rights violations that threaten women's lives. Critics have argued that the human rights framework ignores political, social, cultural, and economic constraints on women's behavior and derives in part from assumptions that non-European peoples and cultures are encased in passive and unchanging traditions that are fundamentally oppressive to women. The universalizing human rights discourse has indeed confronted local ethnic, religious, and cultural norms that may command the loyalty of women and men. The solution is to emphasize the wide range and variation in cultural practices within any given tradition, the many ways to interpret religious texts, and the fact that all cultures are formed from multiple influences and evolve with the times.

It is not clear whether the international women's human rights campaigns against violence against women will help advance Muslim women's rights. Certainly the new medical technologies have enabled governments and extended families to extend their control over women's sexuality and reproductive practices. Sex-selective feticide is considered more humane and certainly far easier than infanticide, neglect, or abandonment and is far more common than the earlier means of sex selection. The resulting imbalance between males and females may cause social disturbances in the future including trafficking in women, forced prostitution, and other social ills. The human rights campaigns may draw attention to the problem and the heightened awareness may lead governments and non-governmental organizations to press for reforms.

Change may come in part through criminalizing feticide, abandonment, and neglect, but more importantly through family law reform that gives women equal rights in marriage and divorce, inheritance, child custody, alimony, and a choice of domestic arrangements. Women of all social classes and in urban and rural areas need improved access to education and work opportunities. Governmental incentives such as extra educational and work provisions, social security programs, tax credits, and improved medical facilities for women and girls along with limitations on dowries and prohibition of sex-selective medical procedures will help to correct the male: female ratio. These reforms, however, will not suffice or even be possible unless the enormous inequalities produced by the global economic system, the structural adjustment programs, and the spiraling debts held by developing nations are addressed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. J. Arberry, The Koran interpreted, New York 1955.
 J. Bargach, Orphans of Islam. Family, abandonment, and secret adoption in Morocco, Lanham, Md. 2002.
 F. M. Denny, An introduction to Islam, New York 1994.
 E. Gruenbaum, The female circumcision controversy, Philadelphia 2001.
 M. Inhorn, Infertility and patriarchy. The cultural politics of gender and family life in Egypt, Philadelphia 1996.
 —, Quest for conception. Gender, infertility, and Egyptian medical traditions, Philadelphia 1994.
 R. A. Kanaaneh, Birthing the nation. Strategies of Palestinian women in Israel, Berkeley, Calif. 2002.
 D. Kandiyoti, Bargaining with patriarchy, in Gender and society 2 (1988), 274–90.
 F. Rahman, Health and medicine in the Islamic tradition, New York 1987.

NANCY GALLAGHER

Inheritance: Contemporary Practice

Arab States

The last decades have seen major shifts in academic studies about women and inheritance. If earlier work often considered legal texts either as having a determining impact on social practice or as irrelevant for social practice, more recent work questions such dichotomies and investigates the multiple, complex relations between legal texts and social action. This has also been encouraged by the use of a wider variety of sources and methods, such as court records, ethnography, and oral history.

This entry starts with a discussion of the various laws of succession in the Arab world, and then moves on to social practice. If women are legally entitled to inherit, this raises the question whether they indeed receive their inheritance share, or rather, which women are able to claim their inheritance and what inheriting actually means.

LAWS OF SUCCESSION IN THE ARAB WORLD

In those areas once part of the Ottoman Empire, succession is legally regulated through two different law systems. Property held in full ownership (mulk), such as urban real estate, buildings, vineyards, orchards, and movables, is inherited in accordance with the Islamic law of succession. Most agricultural land (but not the plantations) is not mulk but mīrī, land to which individuals could acquire rights of usufruct and possession, but with ultimate ownership remaining vested in the state. This right of possession is also inheritable, but in this case a secular law of succession is applied.

Within these two systems gender, marital status, kin relation, and the presence of contending heirs impact upon inheritance rights. The Sunnī Islamic law of inheritance is prescriptive and strongly partible; it restricts the right of testation and stipulates allotments to a large number of heirs, divided into two categories. First in line are the Qurʾānic heirs (ahl al-farāʿid), who are entitled to a fixed percentage of the estate, varying from one-half to one-sixth. This category mainly consists of close kin, such as the father, mother, daughter, and sister of the deceased, and the widow or widower. The remainder is divided amongst the male agnatic heirs (the ʿasaba), with the nearer agnate excluding the farther. Certain categories of women, such as the daughter and the sister, turn from farāʿid into ʿasaba heirs if there are male heirs of the same category; in that case they receive one-half of the share of their male counterparts. A widow is entitled to a fixed share of one-eighth of her late husband's estate if he had children (not necessarily by her) and one-quarter if not. A widower in a similar situation would take twice as much: one-quarter and one-half of his wife's estate respectively. Daughters receive a fixed share if the deceased has no sons: one daughter is entitled to half the estate, two or more sharing two-thirds of it. Thus, if a man dies without leaving sons, a considerable part of the estate goes to his male agnates, usually his brothers. If, on the other hand, there are sons, these are the first heirs and daughters turn into agnatic heirs, entrusted with one-half the share of a son. Shīʿī law, in contrast, does not give such preference to agnates, as parents and lineal descendants exclude all other heirs. This allows for limited partition of the estate; an only daughter may inherit the whole estate, even excluding the grandfather.

While mulk property is inherited according to Islamic law, a very different law of succession is applied to mīrī land: the Ottoman intiqāl (succession) system. Its main principles are gender equality and distribution of the estate on the basis of generations. The major heirs are the children of the deceased, and if there are none, then the parents, with the surviving spouse receiving one-quarter of the estate if the deceased had children and one-half if there were none.

In contrast to what may seem apparent in the foregoing, the Islamic inheritance system was, and to some extent still is, flexible as it allowed for donations inter vivos and for family endowments that make it possible to designate particular family members and descendants as beneficiaries. Whereas, as Powers (1990, 27–8) has argued, these forms of property transmission were widely practiced, the system became more rigid under the impact of colonialism when the system of family endowment came under widespread attack. Contemporary debates about reforming inheritance law have remained limited. Most legal systems have remedied the problem of the exclusion of orphaned grandchildren. One interesting case is the Iraqi family law reform of 1959, which extended the gender-neutral rules for state (mīrī) land to all forms of property. As early as 1963, however, the law was amended to basically apply the order of succession in Shī'ī inheritance law to the Sunnī population as well (Coulson and Hinchcliffe 1978, 47). In Jordan reform has gone in a different direction: from 1990 on, the rules of Islamic law were extended to mīrī land (Brand 1998, 105, 134).

THE NATURE OF THE PROPERTY

One major divide in the literature about inheritance is that between urban and rural women. Historians working on Ottoman cities using court documents have emphasized that women indeed received their share in the estate (Gerber 1980, 232, 240, Jennings 1975, 98, 111, Marcus 1985, 120, Reilly 1990). Anthropologists doing fieldwork in rural areas have underlined that in practice women often did not receive their inheritance share (Granqvist 1935, 256, Rosenfeld 1960, 66, Antoun 1972, 140). Looking more closely at the nature of the property involved, other differences come to the fore. The Ottoman historians have pointed out that urban women had more access to residential than to commercial or agricultural property (Jennings 1975, 101, Gerber 1980, 233, Marcus 1983, 144), while anthropologists have also provided examples of settings in which women as a rule took their share (Peters 1978 for South Lebanon and Mundy 1979 for Highland Yemen, even if in the latter case usually when they were in mid-life and had adult sons to transfer the land to). Whether women inherit or not seems to tie in with the structures of production, in particular with the nature of the property-holding unit; women stand a better chance to inherit land if it is individually owned rather than held by a collectivity (Peters 1978, Mundy 1988). Yet, in the latter case they may receive compensation in the form of movable property (Pastner 1980, 152), while they may also keep a claim to land held collectively. Doumani (1998, 36ff) highlights the importance of particular political economies in a comparison of family endowments in Tripoli and Nablus in the early nineteenth century. In the former, where the major economic activity was horticulture with land held in private ownership, women did inherit or were beneficiaries in family endowments; in the latter, where land was collectively owned and the key source of wealth was control of the rural surplus that demanded personal mobility and political participation in non-kin patron-client relationships, women had only limited rights in family endowments.

THE WOMEN INVOLVED: TWENTIETH-CENTURY NABLUS

The remainder of this entry investigates inheritance practices of daughters in twentieth-century Nablus, underlining the importance of taking factors such as the absence or presence of competing heirs, class positions, and marital status into account. If for the sake of brevity structural elements are highlighted in a rather generalizing manner, this does not mean that these can be taken as a blueprint. Rather, they point to the field of possibilities that frames women's ability to act.

Case studies, such as Moors (1995, 1996) about Jabal Nablus, point out that it is not so much the nature of the property that counts (mulk or mīrī, urban or rural), but rather the presence of contending heirs. A daughter in a small property-owning household often prefers to give up her share in the estate in order to reaffirm and strengthen her ties with her brothers (see also Granqvist 1935). Also, after marriage women tend to identify with their own kin and feel a special closeness to their natal household, while at the same time they may well be dependent on their male kin for their economic security, especially if they have no access to education and employment. By not claiming her share, a woman enhances the status of her brothers (and by implication her own) and accentuates their obligations toward her, as they are in the position of owing their sister. If, in contrast, a woman demands her share in the estate, she may receive this, but then is often no longer able to invoke her brother's help and support, which in turn undermines her position vis-à-vis her husband. The situation is different if a daughter does not have brothers. Then it is socially accepted if she claims her share (that otherwise would go to her father's brothers). Still, the attempts to claim of daughters without brothers are not easily successful and such daughters often receive considerably less than what they are legally entitled to.

Women tend to stand a better chance to inherit if their families are wealthy or if they are single. It is true that also in better off families productive property and real estate are often transmitted patrilineally and remain under (male) family control. If, however, enough cash is available, giving daughters a share in their father's estate is seen as enhancing the status of the family as a whole. In the case of large estate owners whose major resource was agricultural land, a common solution was to allow a daughter to marry only her paternal cousin, so the land would remain in the same lineage; if it was not possible to arrange such a marriage, such a daughter would have to remain single (also Peters 1978, 337).

The inheritance question of elderly single women is structurally different from that of married women. In the case of a single woman without means of her own, her brothers are legally obliged to provide for her. In a sense, a brother's contributions to his sister are hard to distinguish from a gradual pay-off of her inheritance share. If tensions arise, these tend to be expressed in terms of maintenance rather than in terms of inheritance. Elderly single women usually hold strong usufruct rights to their father's house. Especially when it became increasingly common for married sons to move soon after marriage into a house of their own, the most convenient solution often was for an elderly unmarried daughter to remain in her father's house.

One particularly interesting case is women inheriting gold, as it often argued that rural women tend to inherit gold rather than land. However, it may not be so much the nature of the property that is at stake, but the relation between testator and heir. Gold is, after all, mostly inherited from mothers. Because of the often strong bonds between a mother and her daughter it is rather common for a woman to support her daughter through (pre-mortem) donating some of her gold to her. And even if she does not do so in her lifetime, this close mother-daughter tie gives women a particular claim on their mother's estate, which often consists of gold. In that sense it seems more difficult to disinherit women from gold than from any other type of property.

THE MULTIPLE MEANINGS AND POWER EFFECTS OF INHERITING PROPERTY

Much of the literature on women and inheritance in the Arab world assumes that claiming inheritance rights is an indication of gendered power. Yet inheriting property has multiple meanings and divergent power effects. If women from this area often refrained from claiming their inheritance rights, this was not necessarily an expression of their subordination, nor was claiming their rights in the estate an indication of power. Some women received (part of) their share automatically because they were from an urban wealthy family background, where men would raise their own status by "giving" to their sisters. Their inheriting was first and foremost an expression of their class position, rather than of gendered power. Others inherited because their husbands put great pressure on them to claim their share. Rather than an indication of power, under such circumstances inheriting property may well undermine a woman's position. These women were not only likely to lose kin support, but, as a result, would also often find themselves in a weaker position in regard to their husband and his kin. Then there were women, in particular daughters without brothers, who claimed their share because they were in a highly vulnerable situation. On the other hand, when daughters renounced their rights to the estate, they often did so as in order to underline their close kin's obligations toward them, expecting to gain more from giving up their rights to the estate than from claiming them. This implies that legal texts, even if not implemented, are still important. For it is the widespread awareness of women's rights to inherit that produces these effects.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- R. Antoun, Arab village. A social structural study of a trans-Jordan peasant community, Bloomington, Ind. 1972.
- L. Brand, Women, the state, and political liberalization. Middle Eastern and North African experiences, New York 1998.
- N. Coulson and D. Hinchcliffe, Women and law reform in contemporary Islam, in L. Beck and N. Keddie, Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 37-52.
- B. Doumani, Endowing family. Waqf, property devolution, and gender in Greater Syria, 1800 to 1860, in Comparative Study of Society and History 40 (1998), 3-41.
- H. Gerber, Social and economic position of women in an Ottoman city, Bursa, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 12 (1980), 231-44.
- H. Granqvist, Marriage conditions in a Palestinian village II, Helsinki 1935.
- R. Jennings, Women in early 17th-century Ottoman judicial records. The Sharia court of Anatolian Kayseri, in Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 18 (1975), 53-114.
- A. Marcus, Men, women and property. Dealers in real estate in eighteenth-century Aleppo, in Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 26 (1983), 137-63.
- A. Moors, Women, property and Islam. Palestinian experiences, 1920-1990, Cambridge 1995.
- , Gender relations and inheritance. Person, power and property, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Gendering the Middle East. Emerging perspectives, London 1996, 69-84.
- M. Mundy, Women's inheritance of land in Highland Yemen, in Arabian Studies 5 (1979), 161-87.
- , The family, inheritance, and Islam. A re-examination of the sociology of fara'id law, in A. al-Azmeh (ed.), Islamic law. Social and historical contexts, London 1988, 1-123.
- C. Pastner, Access to property and the status of women in Islam, in J. Smith (ed.), Women in contemporary Muslim societies, Lewisburg, Pa. 1980, 146-86.
- E. Peters, The status of women in four Middle Eastern communities, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 311-51.

- D. Powers, The Islamic inheritance system. A socio-economic approach, in C. Mallat and J. Connors (eds.), Islamic family law, London 1990, 11–31.
- J. Reilly, Properties around Damascus in the nineteenth century, in Arabica 37:1 (1990), 91–115.
- H. Rosenfeld, On the determinants of the status of Arab village women, in Man 40 (1960), 66–74.

ANNELIES MOORS

Iran and Afghanistan

Inheritance laws in both countries are based on the Sharī'a. They assign females regardless of age precisely defined shares of an estate according to detailed genealogical considerations. These shares are always less than a male's of equal genealogical position. This "Golden Rule" is praised as a great improvement for women over pre-Islamic customs regarding property. Its inherent gender inequality is defended within an ideology of practicality: men need resources for their obligations to care for and protect their dependents, including women, while women have no such obligations and can spend their resources frivolously; the mahr (bride-price) women receive from their husband at the time of marriage together with their father's inheritance (half of a brother's share) is enough for their discretionary spending; in cases of special hardship (for example, a sick daughter), a man may bequeath extra funds through a testament.

In both countries local inheritance customs supersede these laws, to the effect that women – with exceptions – are not considered heirs. The traditional gender philosophy justifies this exclusion: women are considered part of a man's estate rather than heirs (as shown, for example, in the custom of the levirate and in the term "buy," colloquially used for the acquisition of a wife); a woman's God-ordained main function is to bear and raise children for her husband's group and to work for the benefit of her family (first natal, later conjugal-extended), while men's obligations are manifold – in order to fulfill them men need to inherit, women do not; in the logic of patrilineal descent and management of property, women as heirs alienate property from the agnatic group by passing it to the husband and his children; a woman should not be trusted with agnatic property because she will have to obey a husband's and son's potential order to surrender her inheritance; women are said to be weak stewards of property because of their purported lack of managerial inclinations and skills and their weakness of resolve, which again will compel them to give in to the inevitable pressure by men for control of the inheritance anyway. For these reasons a compassionate, wise woman will pardon her inheritance for the benefit of her male relatives, most likely her brothers (as a sister) and her sons (as a widow).

The commonsensical inequality informing traditions and Qur'ānic laws is also evident in legal reforms. The 1931 Civil Code and the Family Protection Act of 1967 in Iran retained unequal inheritance despite modernist goals. In addition, men rarely apply these laws voluntarily, and women either are ignorant of their rights or choose not to press for them. Likewise, legal changes in Afghanistan under Soviet rule made little difference to most common people – the laws were ignored, just as the Taliban-ordained Qur'ānic laws were later. Then as now, in both countries women who claim their legal share of an inheritance likely belong to the small, educated, West-oriented elite, to local traditional, wealthy families in leadership positions, or to those who have access to consciousness-raising religious instruction. Rarely is a woman able to press a claim on her own, especially not a rural or uneducated woman, for reasons of logistics and of compromising family honor by going to court. Frequently, women who claim inheritance do so at the instigation and under the guidance of a husband or son who risks his cordial relationships with the woman's relatives trying to enrich himself through her.

In practice, therefore, inheritance considerations are embedded in family politics: a daughter who claims her share of her father's inheritance strains relationships with her brothers; a widow who insists on her share of her husband's estate may start a fight with her sons or husband's brothers; a successful claim by one sister may lead to discontent among the others. But even accepting an inheritance when offered may undermine a woman's position: her brothers will chalk it up as their generosity; her husband or son may withhold support by referring to her own property. In contrast, a woman who pardons her share may strengthen her political position: the beneficiary will be obliged to her. A father who passes on property to a daughter's children as a gift in lieu of the inheritance to his daughter will raise his moral standing with his daughter's husband. Even a husband can benefit by turning his wife's pardon of her share into the morally superior position of generosity toward his wife's male relatives.

As long as patrilineal structures and women's dependency on men continue in either country, inheritance practices will not change much. Where these structures become weaker, as today in the modern middle class in Iran with its scores of well-educated, knowledgeable women, inheritance claims are increasing and will increase further, but Shari'a law will not allow for gender equality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Emadi, Repression, resistance, and women in Afghanistan, London 2002.
- H. A. Jawad, The rights of women in Islam, New York 1998.
- M. Kazemzadeh, Islamic fundamentalism, feminism, and gender inequality in Iran under Khomeini, New York 2002.
- A. Moors, Debating Islamic family law. Legal texts and social practices, in M. L. Meriwether and J. E. Tucker (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999, 141–60.
- N. Tapper, Bartered brides. Politics, gender, and marriage in a tribal society, Cambridge 1991.

ERIKA LOEFFLER FRIEDL

South Asia

Inheritance laws in South Asia fall within the jurisdiction of personal laws. These are not universal, but are differentiated by religious denomination. However, in precolonial times, the civil law of the land, now defined as customary law, tended to be homogeneous. Thus Muslim daughters frequently did not claim their full share of inheritance, permissible under Qur'anic laws. They gave their share to their brothers to protect their right to return to the family home in case of conflict, divorce, or widowhood. Significantly, Hindu daughters rarely inherited from fathers under the laws of the Dharmashastras (law books), but were permitted a limited share under custom (Agarwal 1998). Both were compensated through gifts mainly of immovable property at the time of marriage, a practice that continues today. The underlying principles were to keep landed holdings intact so as to maintain the power and prestige of families in the male line.

The principle of property ownership and management by Muslim women was accepted, however. It was only under colonial rule, through the introduction of the category of pardanishin, or veiled lady, in an 1867 court case in Calcutta, that officials sought to curtail their unlimited right of property alienation: they were required to prove that independent advice had been obtained before making any transactions (Murshid 2002). Numerous cases under this category reached the Privy Council, the highest court of appeal. These demonstrate the wealth of the litigants, and the fact that women inherited landed property both as daughters and as widows.

From the nineteenth century, inheritance rights of Indians were regulated through customary practice, legislation, and court proceedings. The contrary claims of religion and custom under British colonial rule determined the regional variation in the nature and implementation of inheritance laws. Religion was paramount in formulating the inheritance laws of Bengal, whereas, in the Punjab, custom defined those rights (Mahmood 1977).

Contrary to popular perceptions, personal laws were not always based on perceived religious injunctions. For example, through an 1847 landmark decision, the Bombay Supreme Court exempted the Khojas and Memons from the application of Anglo-Muhammadan Law, which would have permitted daughters a share of the inheritance. Justice C. J. Perry argued that the Company Charter had made no absolute enactment for the adoption of the Qur'an in matters of inheritance, and that the practice of excluding females from inheritance had become a Muslim custom (Perry 1988 reprint).

Appealing to religion to bring about legal changes was common. Based on the Qur'anic principle that charity begins at home, Muslims created family endowments and charitable trusts (wakfs) to protect future generations from hardship and poverty. Only the remaining properties were available for disposal under inheritance laws. Classical theory acknowledged that although Islamic inheritance laws were egalitarian, they led to the fragmentation of properties, and eventually made them economically unviable. British Orientalists, like their French counterparts in Algeria, argued that these endowments were un-Islamic (Powers 1989). Indian courts held that endowments had to be primarily charitable to be legal under Islamic law. Muslims were accused of wanting to escape the rules of their religion. The effect of this ruling was to break down large holdings, cripple the old aristocracy, and free up land for the land market. It was only through popular pressure backed by political mobilization that the Privy Council decision was overturned through legislative enactments. Indian Muslims led by Muhammad Ali Jinnah and supported by the Congress Party secured the Muslim Wakf Validating Act 1913. However, it was given retroactive effect only after the passage of the Muslim Wakf Validating Act 1930. The long-term impact was to diminish the practice of establishing family endowments in South Asia.

The courts often deprived women of the ownership of property: daughters frequently were not permitted to inherit, even if it could be proved through the record of customs called the Riwaj-i-am that the practice would be welcomed by the community. In 1934, the Lahore Full Bench argued that a valid custom had to date back to time immemorial, rather than be the expressed wish of a community (Indian Law Reporter 1935). Thus, in practice, the inheritance rights of Muslim daughters were similar to those of Hindu daughters.

Widows were favored over daughters to an extent in being permitted the use of inherited property, but without any powers of alienation. There was evidence to prove that widows became maliks or absolute proprietors in Dewa (Oudh). However, in a 1929 landmark case, the Privy Council decided that in the absence of sons, widows succeeded to a life estate only, rather than one with survivorship. The ruling brought the property inheritance rights of Muslim widows to the same level as those of Hindu widows (Murshid 2002). But, there was an anomaly in the conceptualization of these rights. A Hindu widow was permitted a limited inheritance as a member of the husband's joint family, whereas a married daughter was not as she technically belonged to another family. However, the joint family as a legal concept was not applied to Muslims in matters of property ownership, although the notion was invoked in mediating the inheritance claims of Muslim widows.

These cases highlight three features. The limited rights of inheritance by women demonstrate that the administrative objective of preserving landed estates was pursued at the cost of female ownership. The colonial state reserved the right to determine customary law by selecting authentic custom. Finally, it formulated Anglo-Muhammadan Law through creating binding rules of decision, which could only be overturned by acts of legislature.

Colonial officials admitted to interference in one area only: that of inheritance and succession in the case of apostasy. Through the 1850 Caste Disabilities Removal Act (XXI), the legislature provided that renunciation of religion or loss of caste would not impair the right of inheritance in the Company Courts (Grady 1869).

The workings of Anglo-Muhammadan Law were unsatisfactory in that it placed too much emphasis on custom in regions such as the Punjab, or on religion in provinces such as Bengal. Muslims resented their inability to exercise absolute control over land through powers of alienation, wills, or bequests of more than one-third of their property. To a lesser extent, they were concerned about the limited rights of inheritance available to women (Murshid 2003).

It was in this context that the demand for a Shariat act arose in western India. The Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act 1937 over-rode all custom and usage in favor of personal law in matters of adoption, inheritance, gifts, marriage, divorce, trusts, wakfs, and so forth, and was made binding on all Muslims.

After independence, the states of South Asia modified their family laws, but left the minorities untouched. There were few changes in Muslim inheritance laws. The Hindu Code of 1956 recognized formal equality between the sexes, but in practice continued the status quo. The Succession Act of 1956 favored the mitakshara system whereby only males were coparceners, and had the right to will away their shares in joint property. The right of a daughter to a share in the self-acquired property of her father was restricted. Husbands' relatives were given rights to inherit women's property or stridhan, not their parents. Moreover, fathers and brothers often made women sign away their inheritance rights before they married. Thus the law and the practice facilitated the disinheritance of women, in the interest of preventing fragmentation. In reality, it permitted individual males to dispose of their properties without hindrance, which suited big businesses (Kishwar 1994, 2156).

Opponents of the Succession Act cited Muslim law to seek protection for Hindu women. In theory at least, Muslims could will away one-third of their property, or gift away all of it during their lifetime. At wedlock, Muslim wives often received gifts in property, which could not be affected by debt.

The only changes to the inheritance laws in Pakistan and Bangladesh stem from the 1961 Muslim Family Laws Ordinance. It accepted the principle of inheritance by grandchildren, where the father had already died. While this principle continues to be observed in Bangladesh, it was annulled in Pakistan during President Zia ul-Huq's Islamization drive.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- B. Agarwal, Widows versus daughters or widows as daughters? Property, land and economic security in India, in Modern Asian Studies 32:1 (1998), 1-48.
- S. G. Grady, A manual of Mahomedan law of inheritance and contract. Comprising the doctrines of Soonee and Sheea schools and based upon the text of Sir W. H. Macnaghten's Principles and Precedents together with the decisions of the Privy Council, and high courts of the presidencies in India, London 1869.
- M. Kishwar, Codified Hindu law. Myth or reality, in Economic and Political Weekly, 13 August 1994, 2145-61.
- G. C. Kozłowski, Muslim endowments and society in British India, Cambridge 1985.
- T. Mahmood, Muslim personal law. Role of the state in the sub-continent, New Delhi 1977.
- T. Murshid, Law and female autonomy in colonial India, in Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bangladesh. Humanities 47:1 (2002), 25-42.

- , Social construction of Shariah. Validating difference, paper given at the Centre d'Etudes de l'Inde et de l'Asie du Sud, Paris, 20 May 2003.
- E. Perry, Cases illustrative of Oriental life decided in H. M. Supreme Court at Bombay (1847). The application of English law to India, London 1853, repr. New Delhi 1988.
- D. S. Powers, Orientalism, colonialism and legal history. The attack on Muslim family endowments in Algeria and India, in Comparative Studies in Society and History 31:1 (1989), 535–71.

CASES

- Mst Sardar Bibi v. Haq Nawaz Khan, Indian Law Reporter, Lahore 1935, 425–59.
- Roshan Ali Khan v. Chaudhuri Asghar Ali, Indian Law Reporter, Lucknow 1930, 70–80.

TAZEEN MAHNAZ MURSHID

International Conventions

Overview

INTRODUCTION

International law is a significant symbolic tool, but may be a very weak device in reality to assist in improving the actual lives of women around the world, including Muslim women. This entry examines one major aspect of international law – the role of conventions or treaties, which are “international agreements concluded between States in written form and governed by international law” (art. 2(1)(a), Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). They cover a wide array of topics, including human rights, arms control, trade, international humanitarian law, and terrorism. Since conventions constitute agreements that bind governments, these documents are usually negotiated and drafted by representatives of those states, whether the individuals work in a foreign ministry or other executive branch agency or in an international institution like the United Nations. Multilateral treaties with a large number of countries involved may be drafted at special diplomatic conferences where each state has a delegation that includes legal advisers.

As women were rarely represented in the professional upper echelons of these entities during the twentieth century when most conventions were drafted, female input and the concerns of women have been minimal in the development and application of most international treaties. Many conventions lack any references to gender or sex, such as environmental agreements like the Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, or trade agreements like the Uruguay Round Final Act, creating the World Trade Organization. Even human rights agreements like the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) may not mention gender. As such conventions are “genderless,” one view is to regard them as applying to “people” or “human beings,” so that they should not be applied in any gendered manner, that is, only to one sex. Thus, protecting the ozone, for example, would be seen as equally applicable to both genders. Another view is that since these types of conventions cover “people,” they include either or both genders. It would thus be permissible to apply them to one gender. For example, CERD could be applied to assist minority group women, including Muslim women of color in non-Muslim predominantly white countries like the United States, who face special kinds of multiple or intersectional discrimination (Wing 2003).

Some conventions may specifically mention the masculine “he.” For example, the Convention against Torture, and Other Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) defines torture as “intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes of obtaining from him . . . a confession” (art. 1, CAT). One interpretation is to regard “he” in the “traditional” fashion as the generic term for he or she. Both men and women are tortured around the world, including in a number of Muslim countries. Another view is to read such phrases literally, as only applying to men, leaving women outside the scope of protection.

Other agreements clearly state that the convention applies equally to men and women. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) says, for instance, “The States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to ensure the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all civil and political rights” (art. 3, ICCPR). Its companion agreement, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) requires that states protect the equal rights of males and females to enjoy economic, social, and cultural rights (art. 3, ICESCR).

Some conventions contain language clearly meant to refer in part to women, such as the Genocide Convention’s definition of genocide including, “imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group” (art. 2(d), Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide). This statement could include abortion against the will of the mother or the killing of pregnant women and their fetuses. During the 1990s, there were also examples of Bosnian Serbian Christian fighters impregnating Bosnian Muslim women and holding them as captives to ensure the birth of non-Muslim babies, the religion of the child being determined by the father’s (Wing and Merchan 1993). These kinds of clauses could also be applied to men as well. Using the same example, rounding up, imprisoning, and exterminating Bosnian Muslim men and boys clearly affected births in the group.

There are some conventions that may disproportionately affect women, such as the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. With respect to the Muslim world, there are numerous examples where Western court child custody decrees grant custody to the mother, and fathers from Muslim countries abduct the children and take them to their home country, where the law recognizes that the child in a divorce belongs to the father after a certain age (Andrews 2000). This convention is designed to prevent such abductions and make sure the children are returned to the custodial parent.

Finally, a few international agreements were designed specifically to apply to women, the most comprehensive being the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), written in part to remedy the gaps in the previously mentioned approaches. CEDAW had 174 States Parties as of June 2003. Other treaties range from the post-Second World War Convention on the Political Rights of Women (1953), the Convention on the Nationality of Married Women (1957), to the twenty-first century International Labor Organization Maternity Protection Convention (2000).

Even when a treaty is designed specifically to apply to women, there can be glaring omissions. For example, CEDAW does not explicitly mention violence against women, although various provisions could be interpreted as covering that topic. The 1994 Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women tries to fill in the gaps, but like all declarations, is not binding in international law. With respect to violence, CEDAW does not specifically mention customary practices of some countries of the Islamic world such as honor killings. Valuing female chastity and modesty, male members of a family feel justified in killing any female relative, including their own mothers, sisters, or wives. Practices like dating, wearing clothes regarded as revealing, leaving the house without permission, or being seen in the presence of male non-relatives, may invoke lethal force to avenge the insult to the family "honor." Scholars have analyzed these killings as violation of CEDAW obligations in countries such as Jordan, where the domestic law still treats honor killers lightly (Arnold 2001).

A superficial analysis of the text of a convention for applicability to women is only the first step in determining whether an agreement might be helpful for female concerns, including those of Muslim women. Once a multilateral convention or treaty is finalized, it must "enter into force," to have any significance. This occurs once a certain number of states designated in the treaty have accepted the agreement (art. 24(1), Vienna Convention). In many instances, a country signifies that it is willing to be bound by "signing," "ratifying," "accepting," "approving," or "acceding" to it (art. 11). There are some agreements that are not yet in force for lack of signatories or ratifications. For example, the Protocol to the Banjul Charter for the Establishment of the African Human Rights Court was adopted in 1998, but had not yet entered into force as of April 2003, since it only had 6 of the 15 ratifications it needed. Such a court might have jurisdiction over situations where African countries prioritize customary or religious practices that discriminate against women over their obligations under the Banjul Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.

The most accepted treaty in the world is the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), which has been ratified by every country, except the United States and Somalia. This convention applies irrespective of the child or parent's gender and specifically uses male and female pronouns throughout the agreement (CRC, art. 2).

States do not have to completely accept all aspects of an agreement, which is one reason why the wide variety of states have been able to join so many conventions. They have the opportunity to make exceptions to their ratification of a treaty by issuing a "reservation," "declaration," "understanding," or "clarification." A reservation, for example, "excludes or modifies the legal effect of certain provisions of the treaty in their application to that State" (art. 2 (d), Vienna Convention). Reservations are generally allowed unless the treaty prohibits them, or only permits certain types, or they are "incompatible with the object and purpose" of the treaty, the latter being very difficult to determine in many instances (art. 19). Unfortunately, the treaty with the most reservations is CEDAW, most of which exempt the states from complying with any provision that undercuts their existing customs or religion (Clark 1991). Since most gender discrimination is based upon patriarchal customs and religious practices, these kinds of reservations gut the treaty. States gain approbation from the international community for joining the treaty, yet in reality have committed themselves to nothing more than they were already doing.

Many of the Muslim states that have ratified CEDAW have made such reservations. For example, Egypt's reservation states that it complies with Article 2, condemning discrimination against women, but only to the extent that it does not conflict with Islamic Shari'a law (Brandt and Kaplan 1995-6, Multilateral Treaties 1995). Kuwait ratified CEDAW, but made a reservation justifying the continued failure to permit women to vote.

Scholars have vigorously criticized these sorts of reservations as incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty (Mayer 1995b).

Understandings or declarations occur when a nation states what a certain provision means, usually for domestic political or legal reasons. Courts in that country may invoke the understanding to interpret the treaty. If the government does not intend the understanding to have effect between it and other states, it will not be considered a reservation (Buergethal and Maier 1990). The end result is that the understanding or declaration may have almost the same text as a reservation. In other words, a Muslim state may make an understanding that ICCPR article 2 does not require men and women to have the same opportunities in violation of Islamic principles, whereas another country would have called the same statement a reservation.

Since it is well understood that reservations can undermine the application of a treaty, there are several choices one state can make if it does not like the reservation of another state party. It can do nothing and just ignore the issue. It can accept that the reserving state is a party to the convention, but ignore their reservation. It can object to the reservation as well, which a number of Western states have done with respect to Islamic countries reservations to CEDAW. For example, Sweden objected to Egypt's reservations concerning CEDAW (Mayer 1995b). Alternatively, it can decide that it will not even acknowledge that the reserving state is a party to the treaty (art. 20, Vienna Convention). An objecting state can even take the matter to an international court like the International Court of Justice (ICJ) for a ruling. Unfortunately, since the ICJ and other international tribunals have no effective police power to implement their decisions, the opinions can be ignored or flouted much as the United States flouted the ICJ's Nicaragua decision holding the mining of the Nicaraguan harbors to be a violation of international law. Thus, the embarrassment of the large number of reservations to CEDAW is unlikely ever to be rectified.

While the international level is the place to begin regarding the implementation of conventions, it is the national level where real change must then take place to affect the lives of women. A major problem that can arise with international agreements is that even if a state properly ratifies an in-force treaty with no reservations, it may never follow national law procedures to implement the treaty, such as revising existing or passing new legislation. Since most treaties are not "self-executing," a lack of implementing legislation means the treaty is meaningless. For example, article 15(4) of CEDAW says that "States Parties shall accord to men and women the same rights with regard to the movement of persons and freedom to choose their residence and domicile." Some Muslim countries have customs and laws that give a husband legal control over his wife's or wives' movements, ranging from the most restrictive in which a wife needs permission of the husband even to leave the house to slightly less restrictive policies on holding a job or traveling outside the country. Assuming for the moment that the country made no reservation on this matter, if the national law is not amended to bring it into compliance with CEDAW, then article 15 remains irrelevant.

Even if the proper legislation is passed, the treaty may still have no penetrative ability; the branches of government may make no effort or have limited capacity to change practices required to implement the treaty. Using the last example, suppose the national law is changed and a husband still refuses to let his wife leave the house. Making the large assumption that the wife hears about the new law and manages to leave the house, her efforts to appeal to the local police or a court are likely to be rebuffed, as deeply rooted customs and laws are hard to change in the minds of the enforcers. Of course, the likelihood that the wife would dare even attempt to bring a claim under the new law is mooted by the fact that she, even if illiterate, could properly weigh the consequences. The sequelae range from being beaten (which may be legal), to being thrown out of the house permanently, divorced against her will with no recourse, left without any financial resources by the major or sole breadwinner, rejected by her birth family who might refuse to then support her, and losing any access to her children (who remain the legal property of their father).

Since a country can not be put into a literal prison, few remedies exist for noncompliance. The weak remedies available usually include bringing the matter to the attention of whatever body is created to oversee implementation of the treaty. For example, there is a 23-member CEDAW committee of experts that meets for only a few weeks a year to review reports of state parties, make recommendations, and develop links with other organizations (arts. 18, 21, 22, CEDAW). The committee is several years behind in reviewing reports, and many nations are years behind in submitting their documents, which may be superficial in nature. The committee has little ability other than shame to make recalcitrant governments live up to their obligations.

UNIVERSALISM VERSUS CULTURAL RELATIVISM

A major issue intertwined with the foregoing discussion that arises with respect to implementation of international conventions is the debate between universalism and cultural relativism, namely, whether the convention is to be universal in its application or relative depending on the culture. In other words, even if a country signs and ratifies a convention without reservations and passes implementing legislation and is prepared to enforce the convention, a provision will not mean the same thing in different countries. For example, the ICCPR provision on treating men and women equally may not mean that women will have the same opportunities for access to jobs, education, property, and health care as men in two different countries.

The issue of universalism versus cultural relativism in implementation of international conventions is a major one with respect to the Muslim world and gender issues. Various human rights organizations originating in the West as well as Western governments point to practices in many Islamic countries as violations of human rights conventions. Most of the practices implicate women's rights. With respect to clothing, the veiling of Muslim women is often the most prominent symbol of Islam portrayed as a human rights violation in the West. The practices range from wearing an Afghani burqa to an Iranian chador to a mere headscarf covering the hair. The Islamic practice of polygamy, which permits a Muslim man to have up to four wives who are either Muslim, Christian or Jewish, but a Muslim woman to only have one husband, who must be a Muslim, is often mentioned as well. There have been internationally publicized incidents of Muslim Nigerian women being faced with the Islamic punishment for adultery of being stoned to death for bearing a child out of wedlock, while their partners go free for lack of four male witnesses (Dowden 2002). Under Islamic inheritance laws women only inherit a half share as compared to men of the same degree of relationship. Customary practices that predate Islam ranging from female genital surgeries to dowries, arranged marriages, and honor killings, may be mentioned as well.

The notion is that human rights documents such as the International Bill of Rights consisting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), the ICCPR (1967), and the ICESCR (1967), were conceptualized and drafted by Western countries. Some Muslim nations and scholars claim that adhering to these documents without violating Islamic law is impossible, and thus making reservations is justified (Entelis 1997). Some scholars such as An-Naim (1987) claim that it is possible to reconcile Islam and international human rights. Al-Hibri (2000) focuses on the need to omit patriarchal interpretations. Mayer (1995b) has pointed out that Western nations are often hypocritical, criticizing Islamic nations, while their own laws remain sexist. For example, the United States signed CEDAW during the Jimmy Carter administration, but has yet to ratify it. United States feminist efforts to pass a gender equality amendment to the United States Constitution failed decades ago, and have not been revived.

The Islamic world has begun to develop its own human rights instruments. There is a Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights (UIDHR), which was developed in 1981 by the International Islamic Council. While declarations are not binding treaties, the UIDHR is clearly an attempt to present an Islamic perspective as opposed to a Western view on human rights issues. Western scholars have found that it constrains Islamic women (Mayer 1995a). For example, article 19 states, "Within the family, men and women are to share in their obligations and responsibilities according to their sex, their natural endowments." Such a statement can be interpreted as confirming the customary limitations on Muslim women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. Al-Hibri, Deconstructing patriarchal jurisprudence in Islamic law, in A. K. Wing (ed.), Global critical race feminism. An international reader, New York 2003, 221-33.
- D. M. Andrews, Non-Muslim mothers v. Egyptian Muslim fathers. The conflict between religion and law in international child custody disputes and abductions, in Suffolk Transnational Law Review 23 (2000), 595-630.
- A. An-Naim, The rights of women and international law in the Muslim context, in Whittier Law Review 9 (1987), 491-516.
- K. Arnold, Are the perpetrators of honor killings getting away with murder? Article 340 of the Jordanian Penal Code analyzed under the Convention of the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, in American University International Law Review 16 (2001), 1343-1409.
- B. Clark, The Vienna Convention reservations regime and the convention on discrimination against women, in American Journal of International Law 85 (1991), 281-321.
- M. Brandt and J. A. Kaplan, The tension between women's rights and religious rights. Reservations to CEDAW by Egypt, Bangladesh and Tunisia, in Journal of Law and Religion 12 (1995-6), 105-42.
- T. Buergenthal and H. G. Maier, Public international law, St. Paul, Minn. 1990.
- R. Dowden, Death by stoning, in New York Times Magazine, 27 January 2002, 28.

- J. Entelis, International human rights. Islam's friend or foe? Algeria as an example of compatibility of international human rights regarding women's equality and Islamic law, in Fordham International Law Journal 20 (1997), 1251-1305.
- A. E. Mayer, Islam and human rights. Tradition and politics, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 1995a², 102-9.
- , Rhetorical strategies and official policies on women's rights. The merits and drawbacks of the New World hypocrisy, in M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom. Women's rights in the Muslim world, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995b, 104-32.
- Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. US), Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1986, 14, <<http://www.studiperlapace.it/documentazione/nicaragua86.html>>.
- A. K. Wing (ed.), Critical race feminism. A reader, New York 2003.
- A. K. Wing and S. Merchan, Rape, ethnicity and culture. Spirit injury from Bosnia to Black America, in Columbia Human Rights Law Review 25 (1993), 1-48.
- INTERNATIONAL TREATIES
- African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (Banjul Charter), 21 I.L.M. 59 (1981).
- Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984).
- Convention on Rights of the Child, 28 I.L.M. 1448 (1989).
- Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, 19 I.L.M. 33 (1980).
- Convention on the Nationality of Married Women, 309 U.N.T.S. 65 (1957).
- Convention on the Political Rights of Women, 193 U.N.T.S. 135 (1953).
- Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 78 U.N.T.S. 277 (1948).
- Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, 33 I.L.M. 1049 (1994).
- Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, 33 I.L.M. 225 (1993).
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (1966).
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 (1966).
- International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Race Discrimination, 5 I.L.M. 352 (1966).
- International Labor Organization Maternity Protection Convention, No. 183 (2000).
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights, U.N. G.A. Res. 217 (1948).
- Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights (1981), <<http://www.alhewar.com/islamdecl.html>>.
- Uruguay Round Final Act, 33 I.L.M. 1143 (1994).
- Vienna Convention on Protection of the Ozone Layer, 26 I.L.M. 1516 (1987).
- Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331 (1969).

ADRIEN KATHERINE WING

International Organizations

Overview

The end of the Second World War and the emergence of the United Nations system and the official international intergovernmental organizations (IGOs) ushered in a new era in the women's movement and women's rights along with the expansion of human rights ideology. Added impetus to the concept of development came later, mainly through the United Nations Decade for Women (1976–85), which brought women, particularly those of the developing countries, into the limelight of development discourse. Meanwhile, in the 1970s, the work of Esther Boserup brought about a paradigm shift in demonstrating the skewed relationship of women to men. She showed that the underrepresentation of women in agricultural statistics led to a male-biased development. She maintained that twentieth-century modernization produced a dichotomy in which men work in a sector of enhanced productivity, either in farming for the market or in migrant urban and industrial labor, while women remain in an untransformed sector in which they use traditional and low-productivity technology to farm for subsistence (Boserup 1970). The historical dominance of men over women was attributed to two prime factors. Women lag behind men because of the reproductive behaviors of women followed by the formation of rational behavior emanating from the protection of their offspring (Rubin 1975). Such understanding of the skewed relationship between men and women influenced gender planning to correct the situation for women through the interrelationship between gender and development, the formulation of gender policy, and the implementation of gender planning practice (Moser 1993), with particular emphasis on the identification of women's strategic gender needs and practical gender needs (Moser 1989). The understanding of gender planning opened a floodgate for the promotion of particular gender norms as manifested in Women in Development (WID), Woman and Development (WAD), Gender, Environment and Development (GED), Gender and Development (GAD), and the like.

GENDER, INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS, AND MUSLIM SOCIETIES

The question that needs to be addressed is: what happens when gender programs and projects are implemented at the level of organizations and societies in Islamic developing countries? In the first place there is a need to develop an understanding of the nature of Muslim societies. Muslim societies, in general, include a hierarchy of social structures and relations that start with the ideology of the Muslim umma, institutionalized Islam, and family laws. The Muslim umma lays emphasis on a community within which all – women and men – are equal in their relationship to Allah. The notion of umma has, at least theoretically, curtailed the power of men over women and allows women to enjoy their rights. The Qur'an provides many rights for women and women's rights over men (Doi 1993). While the notion of umma emphasizes the balanced nature of gender relations, the historical process of the formation of Islamic societies has systematically excluded women from the power structures of institutionalized Islam. The problem of representation of women in power structures is that when different Islamic schools of thought interpreted the Qur'an, the interpretation appeared to be gender blind. The male theologians have historically misinterpreted the equal Qur'anic rights of women in order to produce a male biased system of Islamic laws and interpretations (Hassan 1991a, 1991b, 1994). Islamic laws are concerned with inheritance, marriage, and similar issues, and these constitute a social system that encourages the reproduction of extended family groupings (Rippin 1993, 115–16). The ideology of reproduction of family places pressure particularly on women to undertake all types of household tasks and duties, and to bear and raise children. A contradiction in present Muslim society is that while the ideology of Islamic umma emphasizes gender equality in all spheres of life, Muslim men create obstacles to equitable participation of women in the traditional institutions. The organizations of Islamist women, which are rapidly growing, are relentlessly working to rectify the incorrect view of women so long promoted by male Islamic scholars.

Thus, unlike in the West, the women's movement did not evolve from within Muslim society to establish gender norms. On the contrary, gender issues are gaining prominence in Muslim societies because of the proactive measures taken by international organizations. The effort of international organizations to spread particular gender norms is in contest with the notion of women embedded in the laws of Islam as stated in the Qur'an. In Islam, women have non-negotiable rights to be paid as wives and mothers and to be respected as women (Afshar 2002, 134). Globalization has made the two world-views on women even more complex and confusing. Globalization has led to the emergence of a category of Westernized elite women who are willing to embrace Western values including those relating to gender ideologies. At the same time, Western education has transformed large numbers of women who readily accept Western economy and technology but reject the ideology of the West. These are the Islamist women who use their modern education to actively support Islamification that may mean that women are returning to their roots, rediscovering Islam and demanding their non-negotiable rights given to them by the Qur'an. The Islamist women invoke a backlash, which is an outcome of disillusionment born out of the failure of industrialization and modernization to liberate women, against the West and its values (Afshar 2002, 133).

Although the international organizations and their partners in Islamic developing countries enjoy organizational and financial support from the West, they are prone to show weakness when it comes to the question of implementing gender programs and projects. The weakness lies in the way they create spaces for women and recruit modern elite women staff from the privileged and affluent classes for whom Islam has a weak appeal. These elite women uncritically accept Western gender norms without understanding the historical context in the West through which the concept of gender has evolved. Thereby, they also give a new meaning to gender in the context of development and Islam. They often interpret gender not as a mere development of balanced relationship between men and women, but as a condition for binary opposition to set women against men under the notion of positive discrimination. Now women replace men and different facilities and opportunities are provided to women, but these severely delimit any organizational approach for developing gender policies to deconstruct the male dominated environment. Moreover, the proponents of gender are unable to see and comprehend how the broader environment reproduces and nurtures the male-dominated culture and adopts policies that are not conducive to the needs of women.

These elite women staff are conversant with Western models of gender relations, but have hardly any understanding of how Islamic values and society shape the everyday reality of the rural poor women – their ultimate customer. They provide a universal analysis of women ignoring differences of class, cultural, and religious backgrounds of women in different societies. Many gender practitioners suggest that the sheer presence and practices of elite women reproduce capitalist patriarchy within the international organizations and their partner non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Capitalist patriarchy is operational as Western males often place local modern elite women at the head of the international organizations and their partner organizations as their counterparts and colleagues. The capitalist patriarchs take it for granted that purdah (seclusion) prevails across Muslim society. They fail to see that it is not the practice of purdah but rather hierarchical social structures and relationships that are largely responsible for the backwardness of women.

The failure to deconstruct and comprehend the broader environment by international organizations creates obstacles in the way of their operations. Paradoxically, international organizations and their partners, while trying to promote gender parity and world-view, continuously reproduce within their rank and file the broader Islamic cultures and values. When these organizations implement projects and programs by ensuring women's participation in the project planning cycle, they confront an Islamic patriarchy. Islamic patriarchs are the rural elite, village elders and religious leaders who practice orthodox Islam sustained by the hierarchy of Islamic culture. Despite organizational contradictions, the promotion of gender programs by international organizations has brought a favorable change among male and female staff in development organizations and NGOs. The growing awareness has now led government and international organizations to grant aid for setting up sections or focal points to be responsible for integrating women's issues into administrative projects (Østergaard 1992, 7). All organizations ensure the reflection of gender issues in project planning cycles. Despite the complex problem of separating the impact of projects on men and women, the usual approach to understanding the impact of gender on a project is to assess the outcome or product of an organization and explore how this affects men and women differently (Roche 1999, 236).

While international organizations and their partners have initiated a process of increased gender sensitivity, the same cannot be said to be true for the rural societies where organizations carry out projects. Transformative politics begins when development organizations mobilize women through implementing different projects, which also brings out women from their private sphere in households. The participation of women in development activities then gives them visibility in the male dominated public sphere. The mobilization of women from the private to the public sphere also gives women a discursive identity and new image of their womanhood. The discursive identity poses problems to both international organizations and Islamists, as they are unsure as to how to deal with the new image of women. The new image of women is also a source of rift and tension over the construction of women's identities between the international organizations and Islamists. International organizations and NGOs see the new identities as an element of modernization and secularism. The development organizations, particularly the World Bank, consider the visibility of women as engendering development (King et al. 2001), which they understand as the transformation of traditional women into modern and secular women. On the contrary, Islamists see the new identities as undermining of traditional norms and nuances, values and visions. Islamists consider women's visibility as an effort on the part of modern organizations for "de-Islamization." De-Islamization is a process in which Islamic faith and beliefs of women are systematically deconstructed and distorted to induce a belief that Islam cannot free the poor from abject poverty. De-Islamization may in some cases be a first step in the process of converting women into Christianity (Mannan 2000).

CONCLUDING THOUGHT

The net outcome of the tensions between the gender programs and the de-Islaminization of women produces at least three fractional images of women in Muslim societies. First, there is the image of modern and secular women promoted by the work of development NGOs. These women are measured against a poverty scale upon which the international organizations map the modernity and progress of poor women. The paradigm of modernity is designed to "developmentalize" women. Second, there is the image of a Muslim woman upheld and promoted by Islamic patriarchy. The women adopt hijab as a symbol of Islamic modernity. Moreover, Islamic actors believe that the North, as in colonial days, is either employing NGOs to create more poverty or to pollute their Islamic belief and faith. Finally, there is the image of a woman based on the prevailing reality construed by local customs, beliefs, culture, and ecology (Shiva 1988). In reality, women continue to exist beyond the Western and Islamic paradigms as a part of a historical stream to form subaltern subjects. These three contending interpretations compete with each other to control the lives of women.

In the last analysis, the historically evolved gender norms in developed countries have split into concepts of gender in developing Islamic countries. As both capitalist patriarchy and Islamic patriarchy try to construct women's identities with their respective paradigms, they create problems for their partner organizations. All partner NGOs and international organizations locate themselves in the tension between capitalist patriarchy and Islamic patriarchy. As a logical outcome, many NGOs in the name of gender try to maintain the status quo; others adopt a reformist approach, but women's movements and gender ideologies still have a long way to go to bring about positive changes in the life of women in Islamic cultures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Afshar, Gendering the millennium. Globalising women, in D. Eade (ed.), Development and culture, Oxford 2002, 336–47.
- N. Berkovitch, The emergence and transformation of the international women's movement, in J. Boli and G. M. Thomas (eds.), Constructing world culture. International nongovernmental organizations since 1875, Stanford 1999, 100–26.
- E. Boserup, Women's role in economic development, London 1970.
- A. R. Doi, Women in the Qur'an and the Sunnah, London 1993.
- R. Hassan, The issue of woman-man equality in the Islamic tradition, in L. Grob, R. Hassan, and G. Gordon (eds.), Women's and men's liberation. Testimonies of spirit, New York 1991a, 65–82.
- , Muslim women and post-patriarchal Islam, in P. M. Cooney et al. (eds.), After patriarchy. Feminist transformations of the world religions, Maryknoll, N.Y. 1991b, 39–64.
- , Women's interpretation of Islam, in H. Thijssen (ed.), Women and Islam in Muslim societies, The Hague 1994, 113–21.
- E. M. King et al., Engendering development. Through gender equality in rights, resources, and voice, Washington, D.C. 2001.
- M. Mannan, Islam, gender and conflict models. NGOs and the discursive process, paper presented to the European Network for Bangladesh Studies Conference, Oslo 2000, <<http://www.bath.ac.uk/cds/enbs-paperspdfs/mannan.pdf>>.
- C. O. M. Moser, Gender planning in the Third World. Meeting practical and strategic gender needs, in World Development 17:11 (1989), 1799–1825.
- , Gender planning and development. Theory, practice and training, London 1993.
- L. Østergaard, Gender and development. A practical guide, London 1992.

- A. Penrose, Partnership, in D. H. Robinson and J. Harriss (eds.), Managing development. Understanding inter-organizational relations, London 2000, 243–60.
- A. Rippin, Muslims. Their religious beliefs and practices, ii, The contemporary period, London 1993.
- C. Roche, Impact assessment for development agencies. Learning to value change, Oxford 1999.
- G. Rubin, The traffic in women. Notes on the “political economy” of sex, in R. Reiter (ed.), Toward an anthropology of women, New York 1975, 157–210.
- V. Shiva, Staying alive. Women, ecology and survival in India, New Delhi 1988.

MANZURUL MANNAN

Jewish Women

Overview

The status and condition of Jewish women living in Muslim societies are based on Jewish law and traditions and influenced by Muslim law and practice, conditions specific to individual regions and developments over time. Thus, while there are those basics common to Jewish women in general, specifics change due to neighboring cultural and societal influences and historical and economic developments.

The status of women as subordinate to men is stated at the very beginning of the Bible, in the story of the creation of the human race. According to one version, the first man, Adam, was created by God in his own image “male and female He created them” (Genesis 1:27), thus giving women the same divine origin as men. Nonetheless, another story of creation is more popular and better known. It states that Adam was created by God from the dust of the earth and the first woman, Eve, was formed by God from the rib of Adam, aimed to serve the man and be his companion and helper (Genesis 2:7, 21–3). Accordingly, women were to be subordinate to men, mainly under their husbands’ rule and their chief function in life was childbearing. Thus, the primary reason for the creation of two sexes was not companionship and service but reproduction, and much of the difference in Judaism between the status of men and women derives from this.

In Biblical times marriage was usually arranged between parents, but the woman’s approval was requested. In later periods, this latter option often remained only a formality and the daughter did not have much say in the selection of the bridegroom. In some regions, there were occasions in which young Jews could see each other and choose a mate, although parental approval was required. In Tripoli, Libya, on the last day of Passover, Jewish maidens stood at the gate of their home, beautified and nicely dressed, and young Jewish men walked by to look at them. Afterwards, the men went to the woman’s parents to ask for her in marriage. In villages, young people could often see each other at the well, and then try to arrange an engagement. At times, in Tripolitania, Jewish men got the help of Muslim tribal chiefs for that purpose. Usually, however, marriage was arranged by parents, and was the beginning of an alliance. Even when it grew into companionship, it was rarely one between equals, as the husband remained the master and the wife took care of his needs.

Until the twentieth century, Jewish brides in Muslim countries were often very young, between the ages of 8 and 14. In some regions, even babies were promised in marriage. In Yemen, this practice was justified as a prevention measure, so that the Muslim state could not claim “protection” over Jewish orphans and Islamize them. This practice, however, was often used to enable old men to marry young girls. Among the crypto-Jews of Mashhad, Iran, the practice was used after the 1839 forced Islamization to prevent intermarriage with Muslims. When foreign schools were established in Muslim countries, they tried to postpone the marriage age of Jewish girls.

Virginity was considered of paramount importance. When it was found that a woman was not a virgin when married for the first time, she was brought to the door of her father’s house and stoned to death by the town’s people (Deuteronomy 22:20). In many Jewish communities under Islam, it was common for the mother of the bride to wait until the marriage was consummated and then show the bloody dress or sheet as a proof of her daughter’s virginity.

Although Biblical law allowed polygamy, the more common practice was monogamy. Since childbearing was considered the woman’s chief function, barrenness could be a reason for bigamous relations and divorce, in order to enable men to have children: it was the woman who was considered the guilty party when a couple did not have children. In later periods, if the couple did not have children for ten years, the husband had to take another wife or divorce his first wife if she refused to accept his marrying a second wife. In the case of a man with no heir special arrangements were developed in Biblical times and elaborated later. His widow had to marry his brother, or in the absence of a brother another close relative. This practice (yibum, levirate marriage) could cause polygamous marriages. When the widow refused to marry the relative, she had to receive his approval and undergo an elaborate and humiliating ceremony, halitsah, removal (of the shoe of the man and spitting at his face). These rules are still in force, and men might demand a hefty sum for releasing the widow from an enforced marriage. Since medieval times the common view was that halitsah has priority over yibum, though not all rabbis (for example, Maimonides, who lived in Egypt in the twelfth century) and communities (for example, Algeria) accepted this view.

Biblical law permits divorce, but only the husband can initiate it. While numerous regulations were added to the process over time the principle remained the same, and the wife cannot initiate divorce, except in a very limited number of cases (for example, when the Jewish court of law agrees that the husband is incompetent physically or mentally). Thus, husbands can prevent wives from being absolved of a failed marriage and starting a new life, and men might require a large payment and put forward difficult conditions for divorcing their wives. One of the most painful problems in this regard is when a husband disappears without leaving trace (for example, missing in action, gone on business trip). The deserted wife (agunah, “anchored” to her husband) cannot then be divorced, nor is the Jewish court of law able to force her husband to divorce her. Though attempts were made over time to solve this problem, it is still an acute one.

In the medieval period, Rabbi Gershom, the “Light of the Diaspora” (ca. 960–1028), of Germany prohibited polygamy and divorcing a wife against her will. This became known as the “Ban of Rabbi Gershom,” the violation of which carried severe judicial sanctions by the Jewish court of law. These prohibitions are still followed by the Ashkenazi communities (that is, by most European Jews) and were influenced by the prevalent Christian laws requiring monogamy. This is one of the major differences between the condition of Jewish women under Christianity and under Islam. In the latter, the Ban of Rabbi Gershom was not observed, influenced by the Muslim acceptance in principle of polygamy. Sephardi and Mizrahi communities (Jews originating from Spain and their offspring as well as those originating from Muslim countries) did not accept Rabbi Gershom’s Ban, while Ashkenazi communities generally did, even after Ashkenazim settled in Muslim countries. This does not mean, though, that polygamy was prevalent among Jews under Islam, but it was allowed and occasionally did take place even in the twentieth century.

Both genders were subject to strict laws of purity, and women were regarded as impure during their menstrual period followed by another 7 “clean” days (Leviticus, 15). Women were also considered impure for 7 days following the birth of a son and were forbidden to touch consecrated objects or visit a sanctuary for the following 33 days; both figures were doubled when women gave birth to a girl (Leviticus 12:2–5). While impure men and women are forbidden to each other, only women are under a mandatory period of impurity. Over time, the regulations regarding purification and immersion in the ritual bath (mikva) became very elaborate, and they are still in force. Conjugal relations were stipulated as a duty in the marriage contract, and it became customary to have them at least on those Friday nights in which the woman was “clean.”

Women’s various tasks within the family included service to their husbands, maintaining the home, and taking care of her children, for which they were praised as a good wife and mother. Influenced apparently by the sociocultural attitudes of twelfth-century Egypt, Maimonides ruled that if a wife refuses to carry out her duties toward her husband, such as washing his hands and feet, or serving him at the table, she is to be chastised with a rod. This was not, however, the common view among contemporary rabbis who objected, stating that they never heard that it was permitted to raise a rod to a woman. This was also contrary to the practice in Ashkenazi communities at the time, where husbands were not allowed to beat their wives. This is not to say, however, that Jewish battered wives did not exist.

The division between the public and private realm was strongly observed among Jews in Muslim countries. Since women were basically restricted to the private realm, and contacts with non-kin men were frowned upon, men did the shopping in the market. Women usually went out in groups or chaperoned by a male relative, and their visits were mostly to other female friends and relatives, to the mikva, the synagogue, the cemetery, or to saints’ shrines. Although women’s work was mostly at home or in its vicinity (for example, in the vegetable garden), it was usually the women’s job in rural areas to draw water and to fetch wood – activities that were usually conducted by a group of women. Most Jewish women did not work outside their homes until the late nineteenth century. Some women, though, worked in exclusively female jobs, such as midwives, cosmeticians (mainly for brides), and mikva supervisors. Others became maids when economics forced them, but usually only until they married. A few were peddlers, merchants, or in finance. Some women worked at home and sold their extra produce (embroidery, sewing, spinning, or foodstuffs). With the advent of female formal education, women trained in professions, but the society was slow to accept their participation in the job market, where most women were both young and unmarried or older widows.

Not only was women's role in life and in the family viewed as different from that of men, but the Bible also regards their basic character as different. While Adam is shown as God-fearing and obedient, disobedience is attributed to women: it was Eve who ate from the forbidden tree in the Garden of Eden, and convinced Adam to follow suit, whereupon their eyes were opened and they gained wisdom. While this is usually presented as an act of sacrilege and disobedience, it can also be interpreted as independent thinking and desire for knowledge. This dichotomy was further developed in later periods, attributing to women earthly, sensual, lascivious behavior in contrast to men's spiritual character. It is the man who is described as innocent, and he is warned to beware of the evil temptress who seeks to beguile him.

Over time, additional negative qualities were attributed to women: they were said to be greedy, eavesdroppers, lazy, and jealous, as well as querulous, garrulous, and "light-minded," namely, frivolous, inconsistent, and unstable. It was also claimed that "ten measures of speech descended to the earth; women took nine." Moreover, women were feared as a source of temptation, and it was specifically stated that their voice, hair, and legs are a sexual incitement. Consequently, various restrictions were placed on women, though none on men, and nowhere was it explained why men are so easily tempted, while women are not. Thus, women were forbidden to sing and dance in public in front of non-kin men. Besides, the hair of married women had to be covered as well as most of their body. In many regions under Muslim rule, Jewish women used the veil, similar to Muslim women, but at times there were differences in color and shape. During the Safavid period in Iran (1501–1731), Jewish women had to sew bells on the bottom of their veil to warn Muslims of their arrival. During the nineteenth century, they had to cover their faces with a black piece of fabric, contrary to the white used by Muslim women. In Kurdistan, they were not allowed to cover their faces, when this was a sign of looseness and immorality, and their veils were of two colors. These practices ended in Iran in 1936 with the official unveiling of women.

The general attitude toward women in later periods is reflected in the wording of the benediction recited daily by men, praising God for not having made them women. From the context one might conclude that the thanks are for the greater opportunities men have because they have to carry out more precepts (mitzvot) than women: while men have to carry out all precepts, women are exempt from precepts that depend upon a specific time. Still, this acknowledges that Judaism provides women with fewer opportunities to fully carry out religious obligations. Moreover, the prevalent interpretation of the benediction is indeed that men regard themselves fortunate for being born male and not female, and that they view men as superior to women.

In Biblical times, the three annual pilgrimages to the Temple of Jerusalem were mandatory only for men although women could accompany their husbands. In post-Biblical times, when the synagogue gradually replaced the Jerusalem Temple as the center of religious worship, the status of women regarding worship did not change and they could not actively participate in the service. Moreover, according to Maimonides, women should not be appointed to any communal office. This had physical and spiritual-educational implications for women. As time passed and procedural regulations became more elaborate, a special section was set up in the synagogue for women who wanted to be present at the service and observe it. This section (ezrat nashim) was often in a balcony or at the rear of the auditorium, constructed in such a way that allowed women to watch and hear the service without letting the men see them lest they be distracted during their prayers. Synagogues in Muslim countries, especially in rural areas, were slower to add a women's section. Women, though, used to clean the synagogue and its vicinity and viewed it as a great privilege. Women also composed special songs in the vernacular in honor of the synagogue and the Torah scroll and regarded it as a special omen to kiss the latter or other sacred objects. Women also used sacred objects as talismans guaranteeing health and longevity for themselves and for family members.

Since women were not obliged to participate in the service in the synagogue and had no role in the temporal and religious administration of the community, the latter did not regard it as mandatory to provide formal education for women. There were, however, girls who received formal education, usually when their brothers were tutored at home or when they had no brothers and their fathers were learned men who often taught them themselves. Some communities had religious primary schools that allowed young girls to study together with little boys before they reached puberty, and in any case only for two or three years. But the general practice was not to provide formal education for girls. One of the most radical statements in this regard was "whosoever teaches his daughter the Torah it is as though he teaches her lasciviousness." Consequently, girls were educated at home by their female relatives, who taught them how to maintain a Jewish home. This included not only manual work but also prayers and related Jewish laws (for example, kosher food, times of work and rest, especially as regards the Shabat, and purity laws). Thus, boys and girls received different education, leading toward different goals based on the perceived place in the world destined for each gender.

It would be wrong to conclude that girls were less educated than boys, but it is true that they received what the Jewish community perceived as the less prestigious education. Since the main goal of boys' education was to enable them to participate in the service in the synagogue, they learned to read the Hebrew holy scriptures, mainly the Pentateuch. Nonetheless, they usually could only recite the text without properly understanding it, because the spoken language of Jews in most communities of the Jewish diaspora was a Jewish dialect of the local language (for example, Yiddish, Ladino, Judeo-Arabic, Judeo-Persian). Only relatively few men became religious scholars who understood the holy scriptures and other religious writings, and even fewer could write in Hebrew or in the vernacular. Adult education for men in the synagogue was usually limited to recitation of religious texts in Hebrew and Aramaic, which most of the audience did not understand. Girls' education was experience-based and was much more creative and individualistic than that of boys. Moreover, women developed oral poetry in the vernacular, which was understood by all and was constantly changed by individuals based on current events and personal feelings. Women were also involved in other branches of art such as embroidery, singing, and dancing (the latter two only in front of women or close family members). Every woman could contribute to these constantly evolving art forms based on her inclinations and talents, regardless of her level of formal education or socioeconomic status.

Women were often the ones passing on tradition to children. This was an important issue among the crypto-Jews of Mashhad who after the forced Islamization of 1839 tried to keep their Jewish faith alive in secret. Since women were secluded, it was easier for them to clandestinely pass on tradition to their children.

Modern schools, especially those for girls, were established in Muslim countries later than in the West. At first, schools were established by Western institutions, most of which were Christian religious ones. Later on, Jewish European organizations opened schools so that local Jews could receive a combination of modern and Jewish education. The next step was the establishment of modernized Jewish communal education for boys and state schools for both genders. As a result of these developments, Jewish girls could receive formal education, and contrary to Jewish boys, all female formal education was modern. However, Jewish girls often received an education that was not in tune with their cultural and social environment.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean society. The Jewish communities of the Arab world as portrayed in the documents of the Cairo Geniza, Berkeley 1967–93.
- R. Lamdan, A separate people. Jewish women in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt in the sixteenth century, Boston 2000.
- B. Lewis, The Jews of Islam, Princeton, N.J. 1984.
- A. Rodrigue, Images of Sephardi and Eastern Jewries in transition. The teachers of the Alliance israélite universelle, 1860–1939, Seattle 1993.
- H. Sarshar (ed.), Esther's children. A portrait of Iranian Jews, Beverly Hills 2002.
- R. Simon, Change within tradition among Jewish women in Libya, Seattle 1992.
- , Between the family and the outside world. Jewish girls in the modern Middle East and North Africa, in Jewish Social Studies 7 (2000), 81–108.
- N. A. Stillman, The Jews of Arab lands. A history and source book, Philadelphia 1979.

RACHEL SIMON

Jihad

Arab States

There is, especially in the West, a popular misconception that jihad means “holy war,” referring only to military struggle against non-Muslims with the purpose of spreading Islam. Both scholars of Islam and Muslim activists alike, however, stress the wider meaning of jihad, which refers more generally to praiseworthy and pious efforts, “the struggle against one’s bad inclinations,” and “the struggle for the good of Muslim society and against corruption and decadence” (Peters 1996, 116). Muslim authorities have taken different positions on the appropriateness of women’s participation in various forms of jihad. Jihad has been deemed an obligation for all Muslims, but its purposes, forms, and participants have been explained, justified, and mobilized differently over time, depending on the sociopolitical circumstances. The variable conceptions and practices of jihad have both challenged and reinforced dominant gender relations in different contexts. There is a notable dearth of research into the topic of women and jihad, and even fewer scholarly treatments focus on the non-military aspects of the concept.

ISLAMIC HISTORY

A ḥadīth (one of the sayings of the Prophet) reports that Muḥammad, on returning from a battle, exclaimed “we have come back from the lesser jihad to the greater jihad.” When asked what he meant by the “greater jihad,” he answered “the jihad against oneself.” Throughout Islamic history, Muslim women have publicly participated in jihad, including both the “great jihad” of internal struggle for self-improvement, and the “little jihad” of martial struggle against the enemies of Islam. Four famous women from the time of the Prophet Muḥammad joined the jihad to defend Islam against its foes, all having been involved in battle: Khadija, Muḥammad’s first wife, ‘Ā’isha, his youngest wife, Zaynab bt. ‘Alī, his granddaughter, and Nusayba bt. Ka’b. The latter, also referred to as al-Najariyya and al-Mazayniyya, is one of the most famous jihad warriors. She fought at the battle of Uhud in 625 C.E. and is reported to have personally defended the Prophet Muḥammad there (Cooke 2002). These historical figures became models for future Muslim activists, who cited them as precedents when justifying their participation in jihad and their calls for Muslims, including women, to struggle likewise in the path of God (Cooke 2000, 55).

Layla bt. Ṭarīf is also mentioned as a fighter among the seventh-century Khārijīs (Cooke forthcoming). Based on the fact that women fought with the Prophet Muḥammad and accompanied him in battle, the Khārijīs argued that fighting jihad was not only legitimate, but a religious requirement for women. Other women, such as the famous poet al-Khansā’, were present at battles, encouraging Muslim warriors with their verse (Ahmed 1992, 71–2).

The dominant orthodox Muslims fighting the Khārijīs opposed women’s participation in jihad and “killed and exposed naked the women captured in their battles with the Kharijīs” (Ahmed 1992, 71). In the period following the death of the Prophet Muḥammad, it was claimed that women should not be visible in public, nor should they fight. Jihad was portrayed as a male domain, especially after the fight against the Crusades (Cooke 2002, 230).

EGYPT

Sayyid Quṭb (1906–66), a modern Egyptian Islamist ideologue and a leader of the Ikhwān al-Muslimīn (Muslim Brotherhood) was influential in shaping the thought and agenda of much contemporary Islamic revivalism. Jihad was a concept central to his interpretation of Islam, and he considered military jihad, as part of Islam’s “pragmatic activist system of life,” to be a precondition for the da’wa (call to Islam) to proceed, such that a just Islamic society could be established. He wrote that while peace is the essential character of Islam, so too is jihad a necessity against forces that would impede the dominance of Islam (Haddad 1983).

Quṭb argued that preaching, persuasion, as well as the use of force “to set human beings free from the yoke of human enslavement and make them serve the One and Only God” are principles of equal importance. Quṭb’s exegesis of the history, meanings, and purpose of jihad in one of his most well-known tracts, Milestones, does not articulate a position on women’s role in jihad. Saudi preacher Fāṭima Nasīf, however, cites Quṭb as affirming that women may participate in jihad if absolutely necessary (Cooke forthcoming).

The Egyptian Zaynab al-Ghazālī, prior to becoming a leader in the Muslim Brotherhood, formed the Muslim Women's Society in 1936. While she emphasized the domestic role as women's proper form of participation in jihad, her own politico-religious endeavors went far beyond this. During Nasser's crackdown against Islamists, al-Ghazālī helped organize the Brotherhood to resume its activities, and made "a vow to God to struggle even to the point of death in the path of His call." She also refused to let her husband get in the way of her "struggle in the path of God," asking him to sign an agreement promising his non-interference. In her prison memoirs, Days From My Life (1986), she expressly refers to famous warriors from the time of the Prophet as being role models (Hoffman 1984).

In the current Islamist "piety movement" in Egypt, of which the women's mosque movement is a part, participants focus on learning Islamic scriptures and proper practice of Islam as part of their ethical self-fashioning. In their efforts to cultivate virtuous selves, careful enactment of moral behavior and thought, including modesty, honesty, and self-willed obedience to religious strictures are paramount concerns (Mahmood 2003).

PALESTINE

Unlike Egyptian Islamists whose jihad has been geared toward the establishment of an Islamic state, Palestinian efforts are aimed at ending the Israeli occupation, and are motivated by a mix of nationalist and, only for some, religious, concerns. In this political context, jihad has taken on a meaning that encompasses several notions of struggle: for land, for country, for freedom, and for religion.

Palestinian women have been involved in political and military efforts to block Zionist colonial settlement since the 1936–9 Arab Revolt led by Shaykh 'Izz al-Dīn al-Qassām, and throughout the "revolution" in the 1960s when the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) began its armed guerilla movement. Several women became famous for their military operations, including Layla Khālid, a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), and Fatah operative Dalāl al-Mughrabī, but their involvement in these largely secular political organizations was not necessarily framed in terms of jihad. 'Āṭif 'Alyān, a member of Islamic Jihad, was arrested before carrying out a suicide attack using a car bomb in Jerusalem in 1987.

On 27 January 2002, Wafā' Idrīs became the first of several Palestinian woman to execute what most Palestinians refer to as a "martyrdom operation," exploding herself, killing one Israeli and injuring 100 others in Jerusalem. The discourse surrounding her act, and that of the other women who carried out similar attacks, included an explicitly gendered challenge, directed both at Palestinian society and the international community. The communiqué issued by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the Fatah-linked militia that facilitated Idrīs's bombing, described her as being "a woman, but worth a thousand men." The defiant challenges of their messages and actions did not, however, disrupt traditional gender roles. In the video-taped final testimony of female suicide bomber, Ayāt al-Akhras, she declared that her action was in revenge for women who had lost their children, and those who were orphaned. She criticized the Arab leaders for neglecting Palestine to such an extent that even Palestinian girls are fighting. Women combatants such as these are popularly considered martyrs and heroes, but not always referred to as mujāhidāt. Another woman suicide bomber, however, Darīn Abū 'Ā'isha, was labeled a mujāhida, and her death was recognized as being for the sake of God. In her final note she specifically framed her act as being part of struggle "in the way of God," and claimed for women the right to jihad against oppression, since women's role is no less than that of the (male) mujāhidīn. While some scholars interpret women's use of jihad rhetoric as being an excuse and justification for what is actually feminist behavior (Cooke 2002, 229), this development in women's militancy has not translated into overall shifts in gender roles, or into women's greater political participation.

Women's militant anti-occupation activities have sparked another level of debate in the ongoing discussion of the religious legitimacy of suicide bombings. Shaykh Yūsuf al-Qaraḍāwī, a leading Egyptian Muslim scholar, and president of the European Council for Fatwa and Research, declared that martyrdom operations are the highest form of jihad. While other Islamic scholars echoed his opinion, it was not a universally held ruling among muftis. As for women's participation, Shaykh al-Qaraḍāwī also declared that this is permitted, because when the enemy attacks part of the Muslim territories, jihad becomes an individual duty of all. Woman can participate in this form of jihad "according to her own means and condition." Qaraḍāwī's fatwa included strategic reasoning when he maintained that women could carry out attacks and reach places that men could not. This recalls the emergence of mujāhidāt, women militants of the Algerian Revolution who became heroines in the 1960s for transporting bombs in their dresses, thus evading French capture (Moghadam 2003).

Leaders of the Palestinian Islamic Resistance Movement, Hamas, a branch of the Muslim Brotherhood established in 1988 in Palestine, concurred with Qaraḏāwī's reasoning. But the Hamas spiritual leader, Shaykh Aḥmad Yāsīn, said that women need not be deployed so long as there are men volunteering for such attacks. Sayyid Qutb's thoughts on the subject of jihad are echoed in the charter of Hamas. Article 12 of its charter declares that jihad against the enemy is an individual obligation of every Muslim man and woman when the enemy invades the land of the Muslims. In this situation, a woman can fight even without her husband's permission. Jihad, which the charter discusses in nationalist terms as being necessary to the solution of the Palestinian problem, is expansively defined in Article 30: "Jihad is not confined to carrying arms and clashing with the enemy. The good word, the excellent article, the useful book, support, and aid – all that, too, is jihad for the sake of Allah, as long as the intentions are sincere to make Allah's banner paramount." A woman's role in the war of liberation is described as being no less than that of men, but is focused on her reproductive and domestic capabilities as a "manufacturer of men." Women are seen to play a major role in guiding future generations by educating children so they will be prepared for jihad (Mishal and Sela 2000, 182–95).

After women started carrying out suicide attacks, the general response in Palestine was to say that it was no surprise, as women have always been part of the resistance against occupation, and continue to be gravely oppressed, just as men are. This directly contradicts those Western sources that claim that these women have been exploited, and their female fragility taken advantage of. It also belies the Orientalist explanation of suicide bombers which, disregarding political motivation and sociohistorical context, holds that Middle Eastern men are seduced to commit such acts, lured by the promise of 70 doe-eyed virgins in heaven.

LEBANON

Women have been active participants in other resistance movements, including Amal and Hizballah (established in 1982), both Shī'i groups fighting in the Lebanese civil war (1975–91) and against the Israeli occupation of Lebanon. In 1985, a young woman drove a car full of explosives into an Israeli checkpoint in Lebanon, killing two soldiers. Attitudes toward women's participation similar to those found in Palestine and Egypt were voiced by Mūsā al-Ṣadr, founder of Amal, who said that women complemented men's role in the struggle, and equaled them in heroism, nobility, and glory. Women's primary responsibility was in the domestic sphere, nurturing children, supporting men, and preparing them for jihad, but they could be called to fight if the political situation required it (Shehadeh 1999). Contemporary women's jihad among Shī'i Muslims has been parsed into three major forms: resistance jihad of those participating in the Islamic Resistance, the personal jihad of self-improvement and building self-confidence, and gender jihad, which involves struggling for equity between women and men (Deeb 2003).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam. Historical roots of a modern debate, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- M. Cooke, Women claim Islam. Creating Islamic feminism through literature, New York 2000.
- , Islamic feminism before and after September 11th, in Duke Journal of Gender Law and Policy 9 (2002), 227–36.
- , Women's jihad before and after September 11, in S. Zuhur (ed.), Women and gender in the Middle East and Islam today, University of California Press (forthcoming).
- L. Deeb, An enchanted modern. Gender and public piety among Islamist Shī'i Muslims in Beirut, Ph.D. diss., Department of Anthropology, Emory University 2003.
- V. Hoffman, An Islamic activist. Zaynab al-Ghazali, in E. Fernea (ed.), Women and the family in the Middle East. New voices of change, Austin, Tex. 1984, 233–54.
- S. Mahmood, Ethical formation and politics of individual autonomy in contemporary Egypt, in Social Research 70:3 (Fall 2003), 837–66.
- S. Mishal and A. Sela, The Palestinian Hamas. Vision, violence, and coexistence, New York 2000.
- V. Moghadam, Modernizing women. Gender and social change in the Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 2003.
- R. Peters, Jihad in classical and modern Islam. A reader, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- L. Shehadeh, Women in the Lebanese militias, in L. Shehadeh (ed.), Women and war in Lebanon, Gainesville, Fla. 1999, 145–66.

LORI A. ALLEN

East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia

This entry deals with modern interpretations and expressions of jihad (literally meaning "struggle") and the role of Muslim women in jihad in East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia. Muslim women have been passionate defenders of religion in multiple ways, but most of them have placed less emphasis on armed struggle against the infidels than on the intellectual and moral struggle against backwardness, poverty, and social injustice. Although Muslim women agree on the universal applicability of jihad and on the high position of women in Islam, they interpret and apply jihad according to social, cultural, political, and economic circumstances.

EAST ASIA

In modern China, jihad has become part of civil society in the form of the women's movement. A number of women's organizations, including the Women's Association for Muslim Widows and Orphans, have been involved in the efforts to better the life of the marginalized, especially poor and uneducated women and children. Women teachers at the Shanghai Women's Mosque, for example, have also been progressive in their ideas and activities in seeking greater equality and justice. In Hui Muslim villages and townships, there has been a culture of resistance against the stagnation of faith (weiganji), youth disenchantment, criminality, economic backwardness, and the neglect of religious education. An example of the latter is the attempt to educate Chinese children and women for the defense of faith by publishing Chinese literature. Yet, for many Chinese women, jihad primarily means self-purification in the context of the three prevailing, often competing traditions: traditional Chinese law, modern law, and Islamic law.

In Japan, Muslim women have to reconcile diverse competing traditions. Most Muslim women in Japan converted to Islam through marrying Muslim immigrants from South Asia, Iran, and Central Europe. For many, the primary concern is the shift from a Japanese tradition to an Islamic identity. Japanese women converts often face ostracism from their family and alienation from friends. Struggle against the predominant Japanese culture takes different forms. If they work, they face the problem of performing daily prayers in a workplace where there is no prayer room and no break time for prayer. They also have to change their diet. Women encounter difficulties in educating their children about Islam and often face problems in dealing with authorities regarding school regulations.

For those who grow up in a nation focused on material development while religion is often kept in the background, jihad means primarily the search for meaning. The veil (hijāb) continues to be stressed not as a symbol of oppression but as a sign of identity. By wearing the veil many Japanese Muslim women become self-confident, serene, and dignified. For these women, hijāb and jihad have become closely intertwined: hijāb has become not only a sign of modesty and religious faith but also a symbol of the defense of Islam (jihad), the preservation of family, and therefore the identity of Muslim society. Associations like the Islamic Center of Japan, the Islamic Cultural Association, and the Japan Muslim Association aim to ensure self-purification and to preserve a sense of Islamic community. Providing men and women with a wide variety of Islamic information and services, they have become religious, social, and cultural spaces for Muslim families and their children to promote mutual Islamic fraternity.

In Korea, women's jihad has both internal and external dimensions. Because Christianity and Buddhism dominate the religious scene in modern Korea, Islam has developed as an outsider. While struggling for self-empowerment, Korean Muslim women have to counter stereotypes and misunderstandings about Islam. Recently, the Muslim Association has engaged in an increasing number of activities intended to improve public understanding of Islam. Some efforts are bearing fruit. For example, Islam is now accorded a status almost equivalent to that of Christianity and Buddhism in revised textbooks for middle and high school students. As in Japan, Muslim women in Korea interpret jihad in terms of proper observance of Islam.

SOUTHEAST ASIA

In the country with the largest Muslim population, Indonesia, contemporary Muslim women have become increasingly diverse in their understanding and implementation of jihad. In Aceh, with its history of seventeenth-century queens and nationalist female leaders, jihad symbolizes armed struggle against the infidel (kāfir), first in the form of Dutch colonialism and then the Indonesian nation-state. However, in most of the other regions, the term jihad connotes fighting against poverty, ignorance, and social injustice. In the colonial era, Aisyiyah, the women's wing of the Muhammadiyah (founded in 1912) established the Laskar Sabilillah (Defenders of God's path) and Laskar Hizbulwatan (Defenders of the nation), but in the postcolonial period such paramilitary organizations were deemed irrelevant. The meaning of jihad has therefore shifted from armed struggle to enjoining good and forbidding evil (amar maruf nahi munkar) in a wide variety of areas previously dominated by men, including politics, education, and religious propagation. Aisyiyah now runs orphanages, maternity clinics, hospitals, day-care and family planning centers, and girls' dormitories. Women are taught how to set up cooperatives and how to market their products in order to increase the family income. Similar organizations were established, including Muslimat, the women's wing of the Nahdlatul Ulama (founded in 1926).

Muslimat has focused on educating and empowering women mostly in rural areas, aiming to eradicate illiteracy and encouraging women to be more independent. Together with Aisyiyah and other smaller organizations, Muslimat has stressed economic progress, efficiency, and productivity. More recent feminist organizations, such as Rahima (Center for Training and Information on Islam and Women's Rights Issues), based in Jakarta, are particularly concerned to apply an Islamic perspective to women's empowerment and liberation. These women activists have avoided associating jihad with holy war. Resistance against state oppression, male supremacy, gender inequality, and injustice are for them much more relevant and urgent.

In modern Malaysia, Islamization has become the concern of both the state and civil society. For many women, jihad has meant a struggle for a greater conformity toward Islamic orthodoxy, but for liberal women activists, such as Sisters in Islam (SIS), jihad should signify women's liberation in all aspects of public and private life. These women, mostly middle-class, have taken the lead in opposing the Islamic establishment in the country as well as Islamic literalism. For example, they criticized the 1993 Shari'a Criminal Code (II) of the State of Kelantan and the 1994 Domestic Violence Act. SIS has also been vocal in advocating women's rights. The SIS leader Zainah Anwar argues that cultural traditions affirm women's public contribution and participation in often positive, non-hierarchical ways. Another kind of jihad has been promoted by missionary (da'wa) movements, which flourish in schools, campuses, and businesses. The latter have been seeking economic autonomy and ritual segregation and have been promoting their own concept of gender equity, based on their interpretation of the Qur'an and the hadith, rather than on Western feminism. There are also moderate Muslim women who insist that there is no discrimination by God between men and women in any of their work. These moderate women believe that Muslim women should be able to reconcile authenticity and modernity. For these women, jihad should open up a wide variety of opportunities for female advancement, but pursuit of these should be peaceful.

In the Philippines, the meaning of jihad similarly varies according to different individuals and groups. Bangsamoro Muslim women, for example, are not monolithic in their beliefs. To them, jihad has meant armed resistance to the aggressive actions of martial law, personified by Ferdinand Marcos (president 1965–86) as well as actions by subsequent governments. Jihad has implied the continuous effort to defend their cultural tradition, property, land, livelihood, and life. Their rebel songs provide a unique indication of how they interpret jihad in relation to the defense of the indigenous community of the believers and their homeland. As the result, homeland (inged) and jihad have become closely interwoven in Bangsamoro thinking. However, in contemporary times, even for the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF), jihad has come to convey more complex meanings. While it retains the old connotations (namely, fighting against colonialism and the enemy from within), it has also come to signify a moral struggle that aims to bring about a positive transformation of the inner self and the socioeconomic and political order.

Although many women are actively involved in the armed struggle and are trained in military camps, many others engage in medical services and educational or economic activities. Among the educated women are activists who have established foundations, such as the Salama Women Foundation and the Bangsamoro Women's Foundation for Peace and Development. Among Bangsamoro women who have excelled in the educational field are Bai Matabay Plang, Bai Tanto Sinsuat, and Bai Yasmin Sinsuat. The first Bangsamoro Women's Assembly was held in April 2003, where some 100,000 women tackled various concerns of Bangsamoro women in the context of the raging war in Mindanao, where the victims were mostly women and children. Unlike the MILF and other Moro fronts, important initiatives in Bangsamoro civil society have been promoting peaceful alternatives to solve the conflict – to bridge the gap of misunderstanding between the Manila government and the Bangsamoro people.

AUSTRALIA

The notion of jihad as armed struggle has never entered the minds of Muslim women in Australia. However, since the Australian constitution recognizes freedom of religion in the sense that the Commonwealth cannot make any law imposing religious observances or prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, Muslim women are increasingly realizing that Muslims continue to encounter problems in obtaining and practicing their rights, whether personal, human, or religious. Jihad for Muslim women in such contexts is thus not physical but intellectual and spiritual. They feel the need to demonstrate their overlapping Australian and Islamic identities, and have attempted to be the defenders of Islamic heritage in Australia's multicultural environment. They have to demonstrate their loyalty to Islam while avoiding placing themselves on the periphery of the wider Australian community. Amatullah Armstrong, a follower of Sufism, for example, emphasizes that jihad is essentially the conquering of selfhood. She insists that the struggle along the spiritual path in Australia is great, for not only must a Muslim woman struggle against the enemies within herself but she must wage determined war against the irreligious tide in an era of decadence. For her, jihad is the battle to bring peace to the earth – not the physical earth out there – but the earth of the self.

Muslim women in Australia have been active in advocating Muslim rights. The Islamic Women's Welfare Council of Victoria (IWWCV) is the most famous in providing Islamic information and services. Their struggles have included an effort to correct misconceptions about Islam, including the meaning of jihad as holy war. According to IWWCV, the concept of jihad is generally misconstrued and limited to holy war. More broadly, jihad means to struggle and make an effort in any activity carried out for the sake of God. The greatest jihad is the struggle of the inner self. Since Islam is stereotypically associated with Arabs, especially after the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States, Muslim women in Australia often suffer discrimination, harassment, and assault. Under these circumstances, they attempt to challenge the often biased media and politicians in order to improve the representation and public understanding of Islamic symbols. Jihad in Australia is therefore largely interpreted and implemented in the context of a multicultural society through mass media and education.

Referring to both an internal and external struggle, the passion attached to the Islamic concept of jihad has never been lost. Jihad provides the language of struggle in contexts where religious ideas and symbols are central. Women's jihad has accommodated a broad, diverse, and complex meaning according to different agencies and environments. However, although Muslim groups in certain parts of Southeast Asia still emphasize the military aspect of jihad, the vast majority of Muslim women in East Asia, Southeast Asia, and Australia have stressed its non-military aspects, especially in the context of the struggle against illiteracy, poverty, and social injustice.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- T. Alawiyah, International seminar on women in Islam, conference report, Jakarta 2000.
- A. Armstrong, And the sky is not the limit. An Australian woman's spiritual journey within the traditions, Karachi 2001.
- B. Baried, Islam and the modernization of Indonesian women, in T. Abdullah and S. Siddique (eds.), Islam and society in Southeast Asia, Pasir Pajang, Singapore 1986, 139–54.
- S. R. Dzuhayatin, Gender and pluralism in Indonesia, in R. W. Hefner (ed.), The politics of multiculturalism. Pluralism and citizenship in Malaysia, Singapore, and Indonesia, Honolulu 2001, 253–67.
- A. Feillard, Indonesia's emerging Muslim feminism. Women leaders on equality, inheritance, and other gender issues, in Studia Islamika 4:1 (1997), 83–111.
- P. G. Gowing, Muslim Filipinos. Heritage and horizon, Quezon City 1979.
- Hsiung P.-C., M. Jaschok, and C. Milwertz (eds.), Chinese women organizing. Cadres, feminists, Muslims, queers, Oxford 2001.
- R. Israeli, Islam in China. Religion, ethnicity, culture, and politics, Lanham, Md. 2002.
- Istiadah, Muslim women in contemporary Indonesia. Investigating paths to resist the patriarchal system, Clayton, Vic. 1995.
- M. Jaschok and Shui J. J., The history of women's mosques in Chinese Islam. A mosque of their own, Richmond, Surrey 2000.
- W. J. Karim, Women and culture. Between Malay adat and Islam, Boulder, Colo. 1992.
- L. Marcoes-Natsir et al. (eds.), Conference on Indonesian Islamic women. Textual and contextual studies [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1993.
- S. Marden, Heirs of oppression or progeny of optimism? Muslim women in modern China in the light of traditional Chinese and Islamic perspectives, M.A. thesis, University of Hawaii at Manoa 1997.
- T. M. McKenna, Muslim rulers and rebels. Everyday politics and armed separatism in the Southern Philippines, Berkeley 1998.
- R. L. P. Moore, Women and warriors defending Islam in the Southern Philippines, Ph.D. diss., University of California, San Diego 1981.
- L. Z. Munir, Positioning woman's character. Women and change from women's perspective [in Indonesian], Bandung 1999.
- L. Y. Nakano, Muslim women in Japan, in Japan Times, 19 November 1992.
- Pimpinan Pusat Aisyiyah, A history of the rise and development of Aisyiyah [in Indonesian], Yogyakarta 1995.
- S. Rozaria, On being Australian and Muslim. Muslim women as defenders of Islamic heritage, in Women's Studies International Forum 21:6 (November–December 1998), 649–61.
- I. Rudie, Women in Malaysia. Economic autonomy, ritual segregation, and some future possibilities, in B. Utas (ed.), Women in Islamic societies. Social attitudes and historical perspectives, London 1983, 12–143.
- S. M. Samarai, History and development of Islam in Japan, paper presented at the symposium on Islam in East Asia: History and Culture, in Seoul, Korea, 22–4 August 1997.
- L. R. Shehadeh, The idea of women in fundamentalist Islam, Gainesville, Fla. 2003.
- J. A. Siapno, Gender, Islam, nationalism and the state in Aceh. The paradox of power, co-optation and resistance, London 2002.
- J. Sleboda, Islam and women's rights advocacy in Malaysia, in Asian Journal of Asian Studies 7:2 (2001), 94–136.

Iran and Afghanistan

In Western vocabulary the term “jihad” has been especially used to denote the “sacred war” of Muslims against their enemies. The 11 September 2001 tragedy has led to the identification of jihad, which was largely unknown to the Western public, with terrorism. But jihad also means “effort” made in social and political domains in order to enhance the territorial expansion of Islam. Religious authorities are unanimous in maintaining that neither this “offensive jihad” nor the “sacred war” is compulsory for Muslim women. Martyrdom (shahāda) associated with participation in these two forms of jihad is therefore peculiar to male warriors. In 1979, when the Islamic Republic of Iran was engaged in a war in Iranian Kurdistan, Ayatollah Khomeini, the leader, declared: “Some women asked me for authorization to fight in Kurdistan. They said they wanted to be martyrs. I did not agree, arguing that it was not convenient for women, that the army would do the job.” For a number of religious authorities, including Ayatollah Khomeini, if a Muslim country is invaded by non-Muslims, “defensive jihad” becomes mandatory for all Muslims regardless of their gender, age, or status. Women and men alike should mobilize to defend the honor of Islam. For this reason Khomeini endorsed women’s military training and their enrolment in the army and the pasdaran (revolutionary guards).

During the Iran-Iraq War (1980–8) women volunteers demanded authorization to go to the front. The Ayatollah argued that at the time of the Prophet women went to the front but their main role was to treat the wounded. Committed Iranian women participated in “defensive jihad” mainly through a multitude of activities ranging from taking care of the wounded or the families of martyrs, to baking bread or sewing uniforms for the soldiers of Islam. Although Marziyeh Haddidchi-Dabbagh, a confidante of Khomeini, one of his bodyguards, and a member of the second, third, and fifth Islamic parliaments was appointed commander of the pasdaran in western Iran, women were not asked to sacrifice their lives to the community. They were expected to show their commitment to Islam and to the Islamic Republic by accepting gendered roles. As presumed main guardians of traditions they were required to reinforce Islamic family ties, thereby maintaining social cohesion.

In Afghanistan, following the Soviet army’s invasion in 1979, the religious authorities did not ask women to take arms and to fight against the army of infidels but they and the mujāhidīn (combatants of jihad) required women to contribute to the cause of jihad. The punishment for those who did not was severe. Mina Keshvar Kamal, a health worker and founding member of RAWA (Revolutionary Association of the Women of Afghanistan, a leftist group campaigning for women’s rights and providing education and health facilities for women and children), was accused by the Hezb-i Islami (a fundamentalist group founded by Golboddin Hekmatyar within the mujāhidīn) of anti-jihad activities. She was assassinated in 1987 in Quetta.

In Iran as in Afghanistan women are especially required to participate in a different form of jihad called jihād-i nafs, or the effort made by all Muslim believers to raise themselves to the level of human perfection through piety and worldly asceticism. Although jihād-i nafs concerns both men and women, its symbols are gendered: the blood of the martyr and the Islamic veil, with equal symbolic values. Committed women’s participation in jihād-i nafs, however, is not limited to their individual spiritual or inner struggle against the vices. Through engaging in the public sphere, they conduct an openly political and ideological jihad against poverty, illiteracy, and the like, in order to construct an Islamic society. The aim is to empower women to better serve the society and to be better mothers and wives. The Fatemeh Zahra Religious Seminary for women in Tehran trains women mujtahids (legists engaged in theological interpretation); it also financially and morally assists deprived women in order to boost their activities in the public sphere. The seminary established a credit system, which collects money from the pious rich and grants interest-free loans to the poor. It helps poor families in Tehran and Qom, paying for the education of their children, and provides several female university students with financial assistance. Fatemeh Amini, its founder, who established the first religious seminary for women in 1972 declared: “Our goal is to contribute to women’s development by giving impetus to their creativity, thereby also increasing their self-esteem.” Women are also active in the Nehzat-i Savād Āmūzī (Literacy movement organization) established in December 1979. It provides literacy education for adults, especially women, who comprise the majority of adult learners. The objectives are to teach reading and writing, and the promotion and dissemination of Islamic culture. It is believed that an Islamic society cannot be built unless women are educated. The female role models presented in literacy books are Fāṭima and Zaynab, respectively the daughter and granddaughter of the Prophet, symbols of courage and devotion, of women's pivotal role in the home and their active presence in the society. Although taking good care of the husband is presented as the holy task of women, equivalent to jihad in the path of Allah, booklets promote equal worth of male and female offspring and the need to treat children justly. When, contrary to pro-birth traditions of Islam, the Islamic Republic re-established the family planning program in 1989 to lower the birth rate, committed women took active part in educating rural and lower class women, promoting the idea that they can be better mothers with fewer children. This political and ideological jihad however, has had unintended social, cultural, and political consequences for the power elite. Iranian women, who are now better educated than before (51 percent of women aged 15 and over are now literate against 30 percent in 1976), have a much lower number of children (2.1 in 2001 against 7 in 1976), and play a more active role in the society, challenging patriarchal order and male domination. In Iran as in Afghanistan women also increasingly reject divine justifications for segregation policies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Fatemeh Amini, personal interview, Tehran 1994.
 H. Hoodfar, Reforming from within. Islamist women activists in Iran, in Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Reconstructing fundamentalism and feminism. The dynamics of change in Iran, Grabels, France 1995, 12-38.
 G. Kepel, Jihad, in Pouvoirs 104 (2003), 135-42.
 R. Khumayni (Ayatollah Khomeini), Sahifa-yi nur, Tehran 1989, ix, 242.
 A. Kian-Thiébaud, Women's religious seminaries in Iran, in ISIM Newsletter 6 (2000), 23.
 —, Les femmes iraniennes entre islam, état et famille, Paris 2002.
 G. Mehran, Lifelong learning. New opportunities for women in a Muslim country (Iran), in Comparative Education 2 (1999), 201-15.
 V. Moghadam, Revolution, the state, Islam, and women. Gender politics in Iran and Afghanistan, Women Living Under Muslim Laws, Dossier 7:8 (1991), 32-41.
 Women living Under Muslim Laws, Women's situation in Afghanistan, Grabels, France 1998.

AZADEH KIAN-THIÉBAUD

South Asia

In South Asia, the dominant feature of women's way of life is known as purdah (Papanek and Minault 1982). This tradition is respected by both Muslim and Hindu women. Strictly observed, purdah can lead to the complete seclusion of women. Despite this, Muslim women, like their male counterparts, recognize two different kinds of jihad: the physical jihād-e asghar and the spiritual jihād-e akbar. As early as the eleventh century, Muslim mystics distinguished the two jihads.

JIHĀD-E ASGHAR

The jihād-e asghar or "lesser" jihad is the battle enjoined as a religious duty when Islam and the Muslims are threatened by infidels. In the history of Muslim South Asia, there are a few instances of women taking up arms, or even ruling the country, for example Raziyya Sultāna (d. 1240), who ruled the Delhi sultanate for three-and-a-half years. In the modern Indian subcontinent, Shāh Walī Allāh and his son and successor Shāh 'Abd al-'Azīz issued fatwas in which they officially declared as dār al-harb the part of India that was under British rule. During the colonial period, it seems that the different jihads upheld by Indian Muslims did not involve women.

Recently, the situation has changed. After the attacks on the United States on 11 September 2001, the feminist wings of the Islamist parties were asked to attend protest rallies in the larger cities of Pakistan. Women were seen in the streets with banners demanding jihad against the American coalition during the war against the Taliban in Afghanistan. Some women were members of the Jamaat-e-Islami, but the most active were linked to the so-called jihādī groups, such as the Lashkar-i Tayba and Jaysh-i Muḥammad, which published newspapers for women in which they were asked to give their jewelry for the sake of jihad. Another example of ways in which women participated in the jihad effort is the letters in which mothers, sisters, and wives eulogized the sacrifice of their dear ones, the shahīds. In November 2001, the jihādī newspaper Dharb-i-Mu'min, reported that 5,000 armed and veiled women had expressed their desire to take part in a jihad to help the Taliban in Afghanistan. These cases remain marginal because it is paradoxical to require women to live in seclusion and take an active role in a physical fight. Despite this attitude, when Dr. Farhat Hashmi, who ran Qur'anic classes in Al-Huda Institution for Islamic Education, stated that women had many important things to achieve before thinking of jihad, she was called a kāfir by an 'ālim.

JIHĀD-E AKBAR

Here the situation is quite different. Jihād-e akbar, "greater" jihad, is the Sufi fight against the self (nafs). In the patriarchal society of South Asia, nothing forbids women from devoting their lives to religion, though there are very few Sufi-related organizations for women. An individual woman can nevertheless, in certain circumstances, turn to the mystic way, although this is not common because of the role women play in the family sphere. The jihād-e akbar is understood as the control of the nafs and it is not necessarily conducted in a Sufi group. But given the difficulty of this inner fight, the conditions of the Sufi life are more convenient for attaining the goal. Some women who are on the way of the jihād-e akbar can even choose the qalandarī way (that is, free of any Sufi order). If the qalandars do not form a real congregation or even a group, the jihād-e akbar can be realized through their participation in different kinds of Sufi rituals, such as piyālo (initiation), dhikr (meditation), dhammāl (ecstatic dance), and so forth. It is noteworthy that in the Sufi context no gender discrimination is generally observed. The sajjadā nashīn can be the spiritual guide of a woman, and she can be his murid, although it is nevertheless difficult to find women saints. Moreover, the traditional guise of the qalandar is the dress of a woman, with bangles, earrings, long hair, and ostentatious jewels and it is hard to distinguish a man from a woman.

Literature gives another view of the jihād-e akbar as it relates to women. In folk poetry of Sindh, for example, the figure of the bride is a polysemical symbol. The heroine always plays the most important role in the narrative proper, and she is also the symbol of the divinity such that the union of her bridegroom with her is understood as his union with God. The seeker must therefore attain immersion in God through the mediation of the female. The ultimate goal of the jihād-e akbar is the fanā fī Allāh. There are many allusions to the virahinī, the woman who longs for her beloved, namely God or the Prophet. In his Shāh-jo Risālo, the great poet Shāh ‘Abd al-Lātif (d. 1757) gives a detailed description of the jihād-e akbar performed by the heroine Sūhnī: “Do not encumber yourself with self-consciousness or ego in your journey to the beloved” (1985, iii, 1675). Many references to marriage can also be found in other Muslim devotional literature in South Asia. In the hymns (gināns) sung by the Khojās, who are Aghākhānī Ismā‘īlīs, Pīr Ḥasan Kabīr al-Dīn uttered: “O Master, how long can I remain alone, while my days pass in lack of love? Banish this lack of love, Master, and turn it into a married bliss” (cited in Shackle and Moir 1992, 99). In another ginān, Pīr Mīra Sayyid Khān addresses God with the following verse: “Listen, my Consort, and do as I say. Do not remain so aloof from me, your wife” (ibid., 95).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

S. Alī, Les romancières pakistanaïses de 1947 à nos jours, doctoral thesis, University of Paris III 1985.

- M. Boivin, Jihād and national reassertion in post-9/11 Pakistan, in S. Shafqat and B. Spooner (eds.), New perspectives on Pakistan. Contexts, realities, and visions for the future, Columbia University Press (forthcoming).
- C. Dedeband, Le voile et la bannière. Mouvements féministes du Pakistan, Paris 2001.
- B. Metcalf (ed. and trans.), Perfecting women. Maulana Ashraf ‘Ali Thanawi’s Bihishti Zewar, Berkeley 1990.
- H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds.), Separate worlds. Studies of purdah in South Asia, Columbia, Mo. 1982.
- C. Shackle and Z. Moir, Ismaili hymns of South Asia. An introduction to the ginans, London 1992.
- Shāh ‘Abd al-Lātif, Shāh-jo risālo, Hyderabad 1985.
- A. Weiss, Walls within walls. Life history of working women in the old city of Lahore, Boulder, Colo. 1992, Oxford 2002².

MICHEL BOIVIN

Sub-Saharan Africa: West Africa

Jihad in West Africa is a complex phenomenon, initially expressed in a series of reform movements in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and culminating in the creation of a number of Islamic states in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. These progressive revolutions impacted a region stretching from present-day Senegal and Gambia in the east to Cameroon in the west. Although there had been African Muslims in the region since the eleventh century, their connections and allegiances to the faith were through North Africa and across the Mediterranean. The leaders of the jihads created Islamic authorities where none had existed before and brought West Africa fully into the Dār al-Islām. They accomplished this by combining the religious goal of returning to a purer form of Islam with military action, territorial expansion, and state building.

There were a number of key “links” in the jihadic chain, starting with late seventeenth-century scholarly reformist traditions. Important eighteenth-century developments were the Futa Jallon jihad and the Futa Toro jihad, providing the ideological blueprint for the Sokoto jihad of Usman dan Fodio, which became the model – and at times legitimization – for subsequent nineteenth-century jihads. The imposition of European colonial rule in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries brought to an end this period of West African jihads. Yet, as elsewhere in Sub-Saharan Africa, Western colonialism itself provided the impetus for later calls to jihad, albeit with limited military success, as have post-independence reformist movements that evoke their great predecessors.

There were many shared features among the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century jihads. These include dominance by the Fulbe, an ethnic group who were primarily rural pastoralists; a leadership outside the established political system; the conquest of urban states; and a belief in Sufi ideas and practices (the Qādiriyya and Tijāniyya orders were important theological influences). These religious teachings encouraged the development of new doctrines and pious literatures and the use of vernacular languages, which in turn led to new roles for women.

One legacy of these jihads was the spread of Muslim beliefs from urban centers to the countryside where people from a variety of ethnic groups were encountered, some nominally Muslim, others following traditional religions. Conversion became a goal, especially in combating local spiritual practices. This particular struggle was often a gendered project and the battle one of words. For example, the Fulbe scholars of the Labe region of Futa Jallon wrote religious verse in their own language instead of Arabic in order to proselytize women and slaves (that is, non-Muslims) and free Fulbe Muslim women were enlisted to be teachers and pedagogues.

The leadership role of women was especially important in the establishment of the Sokoto Caliphate, founded by Usman dan Fodio (1754–1817). The explicit purpose of his military jihad was to establish a society where men and women could be Muslims under Muslim organizations and where un-Islamic behavior, epitomized by adherence to Bori spirit possession practices, would not be allowed. Dan Fodio came from an intellectual Fulbe elite (his family is believed by some to descend from Futa Toro reformists), which for generations had chosen to live in village settings, remote from the distractions of urban commerce and rule, that is, a form of hijra (migrating away from disbelievers). In his family it was normal for women to be educated, some becoming highly trained scholars. He said it was a positive duty to instruct women, and criticized men who kept their wives in ignorance: “Men treat these beings like household implements which become broken after long use, and which are thrown out on the dung-heap” (from Usman dan Fodio, Nūr al-Albāb, Hodgkin 1960).

Children were taught that the heart had to be purified from the whisperings of Satan, pride, false hope, anger, envy, and showing off. They were told they had to turn away from anything superfluous to a simple life. This training in the inner struggle was directed by women teachers, notably dan Fodio’s wives Aisha and Hawwa, who both outlived him by 20 years and promoted post-jihad standards throughout the caliphate.

Dan Fodio started preaching in the 1790s and after inspiring large numbers of people to join his community, became a threat to the Hausa status quo and the jihad ensued. From February 1804 to October 1808 the Shehu was on the move, sometimes in retreat, sometimes on the attack. Losses were considerable and the privations suffered affected the women and children who traveled with the army, there being no safe haven for them. These women had to do things they had never dreamed of doing. In one crucial battle it was recorded,

Then, they [the enemy] turned away and most of them were struck down by arrows,
And there were slain among them about fifty impious men,
And our women added to it by stoning and leaving them exposed in the sun (A. Danfodio 1963).

By 1808 the period of intensive warfare was over although military actions continued for decades. When Usman dan Fodio’s son and eventual successor, Muhammad Bello, began building a defensive ribāt at Sokoto, he had as his objectives the safeguarding of the frontier, the resettlement of a huge number of captives, and the reconciliation of all factions of the population.

The young female slaves who became concubines posed a threat to the integrity of the new caliphate because they were ignorant of Islam, while at the same time being knowledgeable about the spirit world of Bori. The Bori spirit cult originated and is most associated with the Hausa of Nigeria and Niger. Dan Fodio’s establishment of the Sokoto Caliphate in Northern Nigeria involved the consolidation of a number of Hausa emirates that had included both Muslim and “pagan” Hausas, Muslim and “pagan” Fulbes, and members of other ethnic groups. This possession cult included such un-Islamic practices as the use of hallucinatory herbs, hypnotic drumming, confidence in magic, belief in the efficacy of animal sacrifice, and female religious leaders such as the Inna of Gobir. The invasion of the Sokoto wives’ domains by foreign women who, in due course, bore their masters’ children presented a threefold challenge. First, the wives had to accommodate the newcomers emotionally, exercising tact and patience. Second, they had to strive to keep the homogeneity of the caliphate heartland intact by educating the concubines and requiring from them religious conformity. Third, they had to ensure that the children of the concubines received proper training and grew up as Muslims.

In the postwar period, educated women were highly useful to the new caliphate. Of the 29 female scholars known by name, several of dan Fodio's daughters were outstanding leaders, including Maryam, Fatima, and Asma'u. Nana Asma'u (1793–1864) is the most famous. Her brother Caliph Muhammad Bello recognized and used her creative and organizational talents in furthering his aim of promoting Islam to women.

An important development in the consolidation of the post-jihadic state occurred in the 1830s when Asma'u directed her educational message to rural women. She identified senior village women and authorized them to bring groups of girls and grandmothers to her. Their task was to memorize the verses she composed for them and then to return home and teach others. These associates, the famed Yan Taru, flourished for decades and continue to make their journeys to Sokoto in the twenty-first century. The room she used as a classroom is still in use today, 140 years after her death.

Asma'u's deep concern for the women at the fringes of society ensured that her memory lived on, but it was her scholarly writings that guaranteed her fame. In more than 60 works, written over a period of 40 years in three languages, she expressed herself on a variety of subjects. Her translation of her father's poem Tabbat Hakika (Be sure of this) on rights and responsibilities in an Islamic state is now part of the Sokoto tradition together with her history of the jihad, Wakar Gewaye (The journey). Nothing so convincingly shows how her influence spread from the world of women to that of men as the elegant verses she exchanged with scholars such as a visiting Mauritanian shaykh or the admonishment she sent to a misbehaving provincial governor. Interviewed in 2003 on the eve of the 200th anniversary of the caliphate, Alhaji Mohammodu Maccido, the Sultan of Sokoto, said that Asma'u primarily helped women because as a woman she was limited to teaching them rather than men, but her knowledge was of benefit to everyone, men and women alike.

Hajiya Sa'adiya Omar, Director of the Centre for Hausa Studies at Usmanu Danfodiyo University, is the leader of the Sokoto branch of the Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN). Interviewed on Nigerian television in 2003, she spoke of the meaning Asma'u's life had for her and for her four female colleagues who appeared on the same program – a physician, a lecturer in modern European languages, a librarian, and an engineer:

The aim of FOMWAN is to upgrade the status of Muslim women through increasing their religious awareness and education – exactly what Nana Asma'u did. She mobilized women and brought them together, she taught and reformed them making them better members of society. Our inspiration came from her and we look on her as a model. Whatever we achieve is indigenous. Our ideas do not come from the United States, nor the United Kingdom, nor from Saudi Arabia. We have our model here. We may learn from others but our upbringing, our development is through Nana Asma'u.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- N. Asma'u, The collected works of Nana Asma'u, ed. J. Boyd and B. B. Mack, Lansing, Mich. 1997.
- R. Botte, Pouvoir du livre, pouvoir des hommes. La religion comme critère de distinction, in Journal des Africanistes 60:2 (1990), 37–51.
- A. Danfodio, Tazyin al-waraqat, ed. and trans. M. Hiskett, Ibadan, Nigeria 1963.
- M. Hiskett, The development of Islam in West Africa, London 1984.
- T. L. Hodgkin, 'Uthman dan Fodio, Nur al-albab. Extract, in T. L. Hodgkin (comp.), Nigerian perspectives. An historical anthology, Oxford 1960, 194–5.
- M. Last, Reform in West Africa. The jihad movements in the nineteenth century, in J. F. A. Ajayi and M. Crowder (eds.), History of West Africa, ii, London 1974, 1–29.
- N. Levtzion, Islam in the Bilad al-Sudan to 1800, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 62–91.
- B. B. Mack and J. Boyd, One woman's jihad. Nana Asma'u, scholar and scribe, Bloomington, Ind. 2000.
- D. Robinson, Revolutions in the western Sudan, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 131–52.

JEAN BOYD

Kinship, Descent Systems

Sahelian West Africa and North Central Africa (Chad/Sudan)

With the gradual conversion to Islam, Sahelian societies have been influenced by Islamic organization systems, reinforcing the patrilineality that already existed in these societies. However, within this organization matrilineal elements guarantee women room for negotiation and flexibility in gender relations.

In the West and Central Sahel, Islamization is a continuing process. The first contacts with Islam stem from more than a thousand years ago, when trade routes and traveling Muslims were the avenues for Islam and were closely related to early state-building (for example, the empires of Ghana, Mali, Gao [Songhai], Bornu, and Darfur). Islam has long been the religion of the elites. This changed during the nineteenth century when the Fulani empires in the Western Sahel were firmly established. Their rulers made an effort to spread Islam among the common people and tried to impose Muslim rule. It could not, however, be imposed on everyone. First, many did not want to become Muslim, and second, those who imposed Islam did not want their entire slave reservoir depleted through conversion since it was forbidden to enslave fellow Muslims.

Today Islam touches all ethnic groups in the area. The interpretation of Muslim rule at the popular level takes many different forms in a continuous dialogue between custom and religion (Launay 1992, Holy 1991). It is very difficult to disentangle the influence of Islam and the so-called pre-Islamic elements in the social and cultural organization of these diverse ethnic groups. It is therefore not easy to attribute the dominant patrilineal organization, which is neither exclusive nor fixed, to Islamic culture. Differences between ethnic groups and social categories, and between urban and rural areas, must also be considered.

Political hierarchies of the widely spread nineteenth-century empires made a clear distinction between noble and non-noble people, one that generally still pertains. The distinction, linked to adherence to Islam, influences social organization and gender relations. The noble warriors and political elites were and still are strict Muslims (especially Hausa, Fulani, Tuareg, Moors, Kenembou, and Arabs). They live in large villages and towns and claim to be descended from the nineteenth-century kings. They are patrilineally organized and follow the inheritance rules of Islam. Women are sometimes secluded in a rigorous way and are not allowed to live alone. Widows are immediately remarried, or go to their brother's home until marriage takes place. Social organization is explained in Muslim terms (VerEecke 1989, de Bruijn and Van Dijk 1995, Fortier 2001, Coles and Mack 1991).

The social organization of the noble seminomadic pastoralists is more flexible so as to respond to the vagaries of the climate and allow them to best raise their livestock (Baroin 1984, Bernus 1993, de Bruijn and van Dijk 1995). In general, political and economic relations are defined in patrilineal terms, while relationships of care are defined along matrilineal lines. The basic unit of production is the patrilineal household, and the basis for reproduction and care of family members is the union between mother and children, defined as the "hearthhold" (de Bruijn 1997). As most of these groups have a pre-inheritance system, the children of the hearthhold are the proprietors of the livestock. The Tuareg have a special inheritance system that they call "the living milk." A portion of the cattle is inherited through the matrilineal line. During the past few decades this inheritance system has led to many disputes, with the result that the Islamic form of inheritance has been gaining influence (Oxby 1990). An important matrifocal element in these societies is the preference for cross-cousin and parallel cousin marriages sometimes including the matri-parallel cousin, a partner forbidden by Muslim law. These alliances are not exclusive, however, since distance marriages are frequent. Furthermore, divorce rates are very high.

Slaves are people without history and in principle without a clear kinship system. After the abolition of slavery and in the gradual formation of their own society, former slaves have copied the model of the noble strata and developed a patrilineal system. Today most of them are sedentary and work in agriculture. Among the Tuareg, Moors, and Tubu they are also herders and nomads. They do not restrict their women as much as the nobles do because women play an important role in the economy of daily life (on Riimaybe, former slaves of Fulani, de Bruijn and van Dijk 1995, Gibbal 1994; on Tuareg, Bouman 2003; on Tubu, Baroin 1984).

The agricultural and sedentary groups are considered by the nobles to have a status equal to that of non-nobles. Among these are the Berti, the Zaghawa, and the Wolof who are today Islamized, but in whose culture other religious forms are recognizable, comparable to the situation of pastoral semi-nomads. Others, like the Dogon, Kapsiki, Hadjerai, and Nuba were in contact with Islam, but in a negative way especially in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when they were subject to slave raids. Conversion of these groups to Islam began in the twentieth century, most intensively after the Second World War. Islamization often goes together with migration to towns (van Santen 1993), or with repression during war (Davidson 1996, de Bruijn, van Dijk, and Djindil 2004, Manger 1994). In one village and even within one family a mixture of religious forms can be found. For example, the Dogon in Mali have a marabout mask in their ritual dances (Joly 1994) and the Hadjerai in Chad both conserve their altars in the mountains and go to the mosque. These groups are all more or less patrilineally organized, which fits their livelihoods well. In what way the conversion to Islam influenced the kinship system is not very clear. For the Kapsiki in Cameroon, for instance, the turn to Islam goes together with a decreasing importance of the maximal clan. For the Hadjerai the introduction of Islam not so much influences the descent system as affects the position of women as their role as animistic priestess diminishes, a process also described for the Jola in Senegal (Linares 1992).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- C. Baroin, Anarchie et cohésion sociale chez les Toubou. Les Daza Kéšerda (Niger), Cambridge 1984.
- E. Bernus, Touaregs nigériens. Unité culturelle et diversité régionale d'un peuple pasteur, Paris 1993.
- A. Bouman, Benefits of belonging. Bella in Burkina Faso, Amsterdam 2003.
- M. de Bruijn, The hearthhold in pastoral Fulbe society, central Mali. Social relations, milk and drought, in Africa 67:4 (1997), 625–51.
- M. de Bruijn and H. van Dijk, Arid ways, cultural understandings of insecurity in Fulbe society, central Mali, Amsterdam 1995.
- M. de Bruijn, H. van Dijk, and N. Djindil, Chad revisited. Long-term effects of war and drought in central Chad, manuscript, Leiden 2004.
- C. Coles and B. B. Mack (eds.), Hausa women in the twentieth century, Madison, Wis. 1991.
- A. P. Davidson, In the shadow of history. The passing of lineage society, New Brunswick, N.J. 1996.
- M. Dupire, Peuls nomads. Étude descriptive des Wodaabe du Sahel nigérien, Paris 1962.
- C. Fortier, Le lait, le sperme, le dos, et le sang? Représentations physiologiques de la filiation et de la parenté de lait en islam malekite et dans la société maure, in Cahiers d'études africaines 41:161 (2001), 97–138.
- J. M. Gibbal, Genii of the river Niger, Chicago 1994.
- L. Holy, Religion and custom in a Muslim society. The Berti of Sudan, Cambridge 1991.
- O. F. Linares, Power, prayer and production. The Jola of Casamance, Senegal, Cambridge 1992.
- L. Manger, From the mountains to the plains. The integration of the Lafofa Nuba into Sudanese society, Uppsala 1994.
- C. Oxby, The “living milk” runs dry. The decline of a form of joint ownership and matrilineal inheritance among the Twareg (Niger), in P. T. W. Baxter and R. Hogg (eds.), Property, poverty and people. Changing rights in property and problems in pastoral development, Manchester, England 1990, 222–7.
- J. C. M. van Santen, They leave their jars behind. The conversion of Mafa women to Islam, Leiden 1993.
- C. VerEecke, Cultural construction of women's economic marginality. The Fulbe of Northeastern Nigeria, Working Paper 195, Michigan State University 1989.

MIRJAM DE BRUIJN

East Asia, Southeast Asia, Australia, and the Pacific

INTRODUCTION

This entry discusses kinship, descent, and inheritance systems in Southeast Asia, East Asia, and the Australia-Pacific regions. Due to the multiplicity of ethnic groups with varieties of local customs in these regions, the entry focuses on certain ethnic groups that exemplify how Islamic rule is in conflict with, or has adapted to or co-opted local pre-Islamic laws. The argument is that the acculturation of Islamic law and local customary laws has had different effects on the women living in these regions.

SOUTHEAST ASIA

Although as early as the seventh and eighth centuries Arab Muslim traders traveled throughout the islands of Southeast Asia, Islam started to affect the region after the first settlement of a Muslim town, established around the late thirteenth century, in the Pasai region of North Sumatra (Reid 1993, 133). It is said that Islam's popularity and its acceptance by local people was due to the Islamic propagators' ability to syncretize Islamic ideas with existing local beliefs and display tolerance toward local pre-Islamic practice (Osman 1985, 44). The dissemination of Islam into Southeast Asia has significantly affected the structures of its social organization, especially in relation to its gender relations and inheritance systems. The fact that Islamic principles of descent and inheritance favor men has led to conflict with more gender-equal customs in many places in Southeast Asia. The entry here focuses on the Minangkabau social organization that favors women in order to explore ramifications of the integration of Islamic rules into a pre-existing matrilineal society.

The acculturation of adat (a collective term for Minangkabau laws and customs) and Islam in the Minangkabau culture of West Sumatra is expressed in the ideological aphorism: Adat basandi syarak, syarak basandi Kitabullah. Syarak, mangato, adat mamakai. Alam takambang jadi guru, which roughly translates as “Minangkabau customary laws are based on religious laws; the religious laws are based on the Holy Book, the Qur’ān. For religious law, orders, adat applies. Nature is the teacher of humankind.”

The integral impact of Islam on the practice of Minangkabau adat in daily life can be seen from the fact that there is a modification of the standard norm for a family pattern in Minangkabau society. Matrilineal Minangkabau kinship system considers a husband/father as an outsider (orang lua) to his wife’s family. His children will automatically become part of their mother’s family, and will bear the mother’s clan name rather than their father’s. Furthermore, it is a mamak’s (maternal uncle) responsibility to take care of his sisters’ children. The relationship between a mamak and his kamanakan, niece/nephew, is close and is perhaps even stronger than that between a father and his own son with mamak representing the “sociological father” of his sisters’ children. A mamak also bequeaths his wealth to his kamanakan. His sako, inheritance of position, will pass to his nephews, while his pusako, inheritance of wealth, will pass to his nieces. According to adat, traditionally the smallest family unit is a mother and her children, known as samande (one mother) and is headed or owned by a woman as a mother. However, based on research undertaken in West Sumatra by the Indonesian Supreme Court in 1976, samande has now been modified to refer to a nuclear family, consisting of mother, children, and the father who is regarded as the family’s head. This modification may partly be influenced by Islamic rule that positions the man as the head of the family (Qur’ān 4:34). However, in practice a woman (as a wife or mother) is still the de facto leader of the family, notwithstanding the fact that de jure a man (as a husband or father) is the head of the family. This situation is also found in Acehese society.

While the Acehese kinship system, like the Malay, is bilateral, tracing descent through both male and female sides, the residence system is matrilineal. The implementation of the matrilineal residence system requires that a married couple lives in the household or place of the bride’s kin. This marginalizes men’s role and authority within households (Siegel 1969). Despite the influence of Islamic law, the concept of household is still the domain of women (Siapno 2002, 63).

Another impact of the imposition of Islamic values on adat can be seen from the change of the inheritance system in Minangkabau society. In order to integrate adat with Islamic laws, the Minangkabau assembly, which consists of the representatives of Minangkabau clan heads, village leaders, religious scholars and intellectuals, and an Indonesian government representative who functions as a witness, was held in Bukit Tinggi on 2–4 May 1953. The assembly members, most of whom were men, launched a regulation that while pusaka tinggi (ancestral property) is still inherited based on matrilineal principle, pusaka rendah (self-acquired property) is inherited based on syariah (Islamic law) (Hamka 1963, 7). According to syariah, sons inherit twice as much as daughters. This consensus was made in order to avoid dispute between the rights of a person’s own children and that person’s sisters’ children. But in practice, the matrilineal system is still very influential. Maila Stivens’s research on the Rembau of Negeri Sembilan, Malaysia, whose ancestors are from Minangkabau, suggests that there has been a reconstitution of the inheritance system there. She terms this shift a feminization of property relations. It means that female-centered inheritance practices are not confined to ancestral land but also operate in a new way in relation to acquired property land, which is frequently registered under women’s names, sometimes passing on occasion from parents to daughters, or from brothers to sisters (Stivens 1996, 6).

It is misleading to assume that the practice of Islamic values has categorically disadvantaged women. On the contrary, these practices have given benefits to women such as in the modification of the customary law among the Batak Karo of North Sumatra who mark their ethnicity by clan identities. The five-clan social system distinguishes the Batak Karo from the Malays, their closest neighbors, who do not have a clan system. Clan membership is assigned unequivocally and automatically through patrilineal descent into one of its five clans. In order to be able to trace clan membership unambiguously through father only, the Batak Karo practice exogamic marriage and prefer matrilineal cross-cousin marriages (Kipp 1996, 33). At some points Islamic law conflicts with Batak Karo adat law, for example, in marital and inheritance law. According to the practices of patrilineal descent system and patrilineal residence, inheritance, specifically land, also goes through a father to a son. Traditionally, a daughter will not inherit from her parents as after marriage she belongs to her husband's family. Although receiving unequal shares under Islamic law, a daughter has a right to inherit her parents' property.

The Batak Karo concept of marriage is also in conflict with Islamic marital law. The Batak Karo consider marriage within the same clan as incest and punish it severely by exclusion from the Batak Karo world. Islamic law, on the other hand, allows marriage within one clan as long as the persons are not closely related by blood. Islamic rule only prohibits a man from marrying his own mother, daughter, sister, parent's aunt, or niece. This prohibition is extended to include to step, foster, and in-law relations (Qur'an 4:23). Among the Batak Karo, the Malay system is partly identified with Islam and the practice of "incest." Because of that Batak Karo refer to a person who has committed incest as having becoming Malay (menjadi Melayu), therefore ceasing to be Batak Karo. Like Christian Batak Karo, Muslim Batak Karo, who are a minority, try to reconcile their religion and adat law by obeying religious rules as well as whatever norms are appropriate for their society (Kipp 1996, 234).

EAST ASIA

China, Korea, and Japan are considered to be most typically patriarchal and patrilineal among East Asian societies. Chinese, Korean, and Japanese cultures are rooted in Confucian principles, founded in China by Kung-futze, "Master Kung" or Confucius (551–479 B.C.) (Hwang 1979, 11). These principles, incorporated into Chinese law in 210 BC and adopted as the state ideology by the Japanese Tokugawa Bakufu dynasty (1603–1868) and the Choson dynasty in Korea (1392–1910), form a code of conduct by which to live (ibid.). Confucianism had a tremendous impact on the social systems in these communities. It is fundamentally patriarchal: the sole authority in the family rests with the father and only those on the paternal line are considered relatives. Social class and rights are transmitted only from fathers to sons who have higher status than daughters, and first-born males hold the right to lineal succession. Its residence pattern is patrilocal. After marriage, a woman forfeits her natal family membership and becomes a member of her husband's family, joining them in their family ancestral ceremonies. A woman does not have rights to inherit family property. However, as a housewife, she can control the family property and manage the family household, although this may not be seen outwardly (Lee 1997, 52).

Islam is a relatively new religion in Japan and Korea, whereas China has known Islam since as early as the seventh century. There are some Islamic rules that differ from local customs in these countries. For example, Islamic law decrees that a married woman can hold two agnatic group memberships. She can retain her natal family membership while she is also part of her husband's. Moreover, women as daughters and wives have a right to inherit property from their parents and husbands. Islam has not yet greatly affected these communities, especially in relation to women's rights. In order to survive over the centuries Chinese Muslims, known as Hui, while maintaining their identity as devotees of Islam, have had to become increasingly integrated into Han Chinese society (Voll 1987, 141).

There have been some changes that benefit women. For example, the Korean government launched the Family Law Act of 19 December 1989, which states that all property is divided equally between all children regardless of sex in the absence of a will (Hampson 2000, 175). Although in modern times in most East Asian societies women's status has been made to equal that of men by regulating non-gender-bias law and constitutions, to some degree women still face inequality in both the public and private spheres as it is difficult to change a culture that favors men.

AUSTRALIA-PACIFIC REGION

As in the East Asian region, Muslims are also a minority in the Australia and Pacific region. According to the census taken in 2001 the number of Australian Muslims was approximately 1.5 per cent of the total population. The majority of the Australian Muslim population were born overseas in countries such as Lebanon, Pakistan, Bosnia, and Indonesia (Saeed 2003, 1–2). The fact that these people come from different social and ethnic backgrounds is reflected in the way they apply Islamic values, which are varied and rooted in their own cultural traditions.

There are some social and legal problems surrounding the practice of Islamic laws that are in conflict with Australian law or mainstream culture, for example, child custody and property settlement in divorce cases. Australian law tends to favor an equal division of assets, irrespective of whether both parties have earned income, while under Islamic law division depends on the amount of contribution of each party during the duration of the marriage. Moreover, Australian mainstream norms favor the mother's role in child rearing. In contrast, in Islamic law the father generally gains custody of children once they reach a particular age (Humphrey 1984, 43).

Traditionally, mainstream Australia is a bilateral society and the concept of the family is that of a nuclear family consisting of a husband and his wife who live with their children apart from the relatives of either spouse. One-parent families, de facto couples, heterosexual or homosexual, with or without children, and childless couples are becoming much more common as family units. This concept is at variance with Islamic family law, which strictly prohibits both de facto and homosexual relationships and prevents illegitimate children from inheriting wealth from the father. In Australia, most Muslim migrants try to maintain their traditional values, although some of them are being affected by Australian values. This has led to conflict between spouses, parents and children, as well as relatives in Australia and abroad (Hussain 2001, 163).

CONCLUSION

As a result of the adaptation of Islamic law alongside local customary law, women often act or are treated differently from their traditional roles. It seems that the implementation of Islamic law in patriarchal societies tends to give more benefit and advantages to women than they have previously experienced. However, the dissemination of Islamic law in matrilineal societies such as the Minangkabau of West Sumatra has adversely affected women in relation to materialist concerns such as inheritance and social position.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Byung, T. H., Confucianism in modernization. Comparative study of China, Japan and Korea, Ph.D. diss., University of California, Berkeley 1979.
- Hamka, Minangkabau customary laws facing revolution [in Indonesian], Djakarta 1963.
- S. Hampson, Rhetoric or reality? Contesting definitions of women in Korea, in L. Edwards and M. Roces (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity, and globalisation, St. Leonards, N.S.W. 2000, 170–87.
- R. W. Hefner and P. Horvath (eds.), Politics and religious renewal in Muslim Southeast Asia, Honolulu 1997.
- M. Humphrey, Islamic law in Australia, in M. Humphrey and A. Mograby (eds.), Islam in Australia, Sydney 1985, 36–47.
- J. Hussain, Family law and Muslim communities, in A. Saeed and S. Akbarzadeh (eds.), Muslim communities in Australia, Sydney 2001, 161–87.
- R. S. Kipp, Dissociated identities. Ethnicity, religion, and class in an Indonesian society, Ann Arbor 1996.
- Kwang Kyu Lee, Korean family and kinship, Seoul 1997.
- Mahkamah Agung (Indonesian Supreme Court), Research on customary laws related to inheritance matters within the area of the Appellate Court of Padang [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1980.
- M. T. Osman, Islamization of the Malays. A transformation of culture, in A. Ibrahim, S. Shiddique, and Y. Hussain (eds.), Readings on Southeast Asia, Singapore 1985.
- A. Reid, The making of an Islamic Political discourse in Southeast Asia, Clayton, Vic. 1993.
- A. Saeed, Islam in Australia, Sydney 2003.
- J. A. Siapno, Gender, Islam, nationalism and the state in Aceh. The paradox of power, co-optation and resistance, London 2002.
- J. Siegel, The rope of God, Berkeley 1969.
- M. Stevens, Matriliney and modernity. Sexual politics and social change in rural Malaysia, Sydney 1996.
- J. O. Voll, Soviet Central Asia and China. Integration or isolation of Muslim societies, in J. L. Esposito (ed.), Islam in Asia. Religion, politics, and society, New York 1987, 125–51.

Kinship, Descent Systems and State

Afghanistan

Afghanistan is a multiethnic, tribal society with a predominantly rural population. Islam as the foundation of the value system is the common denominator that binds together diverse ethnic groups. About 85 percent of Afghans are Sunnī Muslims and adhere to Ḥanafī law; the rest are Shī'īs. Small populations of Hindus and Sikhs live in urban centers.

The Pashtun, Tajik, Hazara, Uzbek, Turkmen, Baluchi, and Nuristani ethnic groups (qawm) vary in patrilineal kinship, language, and regional customs. Kinship networks constitute the foundation of wealth and security. Loyalty to kin and tribe (qabīla) has historically posed a challenge to the authority of the state. Patriarchal values dominate the kinship-based society. In the eastern and south-eastern regions, inhabited principally by Pashtun tribes, the tribal code of behavior (Pashtunwali) governs all aspect of tribal life, including kinship and gender relations. Concepts of honor and shame prescribe appropriate behavior for men and women. Women symbolize family honor (nāmūs) for all Afghans. They are protected within the extended family system and compelled to comply to accepted norms of behavior.

The practice of female seclusion varies with age, regional customs, and lifestyle. Before the process of modernization began in Afghanistan, urban women were required by a strict interpretation of Ḥanafī law to cover their faces and wear the all-enveloping chadari, or burqa', outside the home. Covering the face was not required in the countryside, where peasant and nomadic women were often needed to work on farms and in pastures.

Most marriages take place between members of the same lineage. Since tribal membership is determined by patrilineal lines, a woman who marries outside a tribe has to leave her tribe. Therefore, marriage between cousins and second cousins is encouraged to secure kinship bonds and lineage solidarity. Marriage among close relatives, as Dupree has pointed out, keeps female family members together in groups: "Intimate aunt-niece relationships, as well as daughter-in-law mother-in-law closeness strengthens the already strong matri-core in the society" (1973, 181).

Although Islam permits men to marry up to four wives, the vast majority of Afghan men have only one wife. The practice of polygamy is a sign of wealth and power and a means of forging alliances with other powerful families or tribes (see, for example, Anderson 1975). At the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries concubinage was common among the elite. The concubines came from Tajik, Kafari (Nuristani), and mostly Shī'ī Hazara ethnic groups; they were captured and sold in slave markets in Afghanistan and Central Asia (Kakar 1979, 173–6). As in most other parts of the Muslim world, the children born of a slave mother had exactly the same rights as those born of a legal wife and were integrated in their father's pedigree.

Local customs in some instances contradict the Sharī'a on gender issues. For example, although the Sharī'a grants women the right of inheritance, Pashtunwali denies it. In rural areas marriages are arranged by exchanging one girl for another or by paying the customary bridal price, shirbaha, also known as walwar and qailin. Unlike mabr, which is sanctioned by the Sharī'a and is paid to women in the instance of divorce, shirbaha must be paid to the bride's family at the time of marriage. In northern Afghanistan, where a woman's skills as a carpet weaver contribute significantly to a family's income, the bridal price is based on carpet weaving and other skills. In the areas inhabited by the Pashtuns, tribal and subtribal disputes are usually settled by giving one or several women in marriage to the family of the victim without having to pay the bridal price (Tapper 1991). These practices vary significantly between urban and rural areas.

STATE POLICIES ON GENDER AND KINSHIP

The first systematic attempt by the state to change the social structure of the country was undertaken in the 1920s during the reign of King Amān Allāh. Amān Allāh's social reforms were intended to weaken kinship and undermine the exclusive claims of family by legislating against arranged marriages and by emancipating women. The abolition of slavery in 1920 freed hundreds of women from the bondage of concubinage. The family law, issued shortly afterwards, discouraged marriage between close relatives and the payment of bridal money to the bride's family. A new code, issued in the following year, imposed restrictions on polygamy and outlawed the Pashtun practices of bartering women as retribution for crime and forcing a widow to marry the closest male relative of her deceased husband. Both of these practices were declared to be contrary to Shari'a law.

The state's efforts to regulate and monitor family matters provoked widespread hostility and resistance. Opposition to these and other social reforms resulted in general revolts in 1928, the abdication of King Amān Allāh, and the repeal of his social reforms. Kinship and tribal loyalties remained prevalent despite modernization attempts and economic development during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s. Although urban women, a small segment of the total population, benefited from development projects in the areas of education, employment, and political representation, the situation of women in rural areas remained essentially unchanged. Uneven development actually widened the gap between urban and rural populations.

In 1978, the pro-Soviet People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) gained power in a military coup referred to as the Saur (April) Revolution. The new regime targeted first the structure of "tribal-feudalism" and pushed for radical changes. In 1979, the Revolutionary Council of the Marxist regime issued several decrees to transform the traditional bases of economic and social exchange that held extended families together and "knitted them into a qawm or tribe" (Rubin 1995, 116). Women's emancipation was integral to this policy. Decree No. 7 issued in October declared the equal rights of women and men and the regime's goal "to free the toiling women of Afghanistan from humiliating feudalistic relations and provide opportunities for their advancement at all levels." The land reform act (Decree No. 8), issued a month later, awarded each family about 15 acres of first quality land and defined family to include a husband, wife, and unmarried children under 18 years of age. In conformity with other reforms, land reform was intended to replace the extended family system and larger kinship units with nuclear families dependent on the state. As Rubin points out, the reforms undertaken by the Marxist government would have changed the social fabric of Afghanistan, had they been implemented (Rubin 116-17). As it turned out, the government's revolutionary approach stirred up resentment in the countryside that impeded the implementation of social reforms, even those of previous regimes, particularly those relating to the rights of women.

EFFECTS OF WAR

Islam became the rallying point in uniting various ethnic groups in a jihad (holy war) against the regime and its Soviet backer. The war of resistance (1978-92) and the ensuing civil war that lasted until United States military operations in 2001, had disastrous social consequences. About two million Afghans were killed or wounded and about six million more, mostly women and children, were displaced internally or fled into Pakistan and Iran as refugees. A systematic study of the impact of displacement on kinship and extended family in Afghanistan has not been yet undertaken. Reports prepared by various international relief societies, however, confirm that thousands of women lost their homes and their husbands, fathers, and sons and were left with no means of support. The majority of these women were forced to assume new responsibilities as the head and breadwinner of their household.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. W. Anderson, Tribe and community among the Ghilzai Pashtuns. Preliminary notes on ethnographic distribution and variation in eastern Afghanistan, in Anthropos 70 (1975), 575-601.
- A. Banuazizi and M. Weiner (eds.), The state, religion, and ethnic politics. Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan, Syracuse, N.Y. 1986.
- H. Bradsher, Afghan communism and Soviet intervention, Karachi 1999.
- L. Dupree, Afghanistan, Princeton, N.J. 1973.
- N. H. Dupree, Revolutionary rhetoric and Afghan women, in M. N. Shahrani and R. L. Canfield (eds.), Revolutions and rebellions in Afghanistan, Berkeley 1984.
- H. Kakar, Government and Society in Afghanistan. The reign of Amir Abd al-Rahman Khan, Austin, Tex. 1979.
- N. Lindisfarne (Tapper), Bartered brides. Politics, gender, and marriage in an Afghan tribal society, Cambridge 1991.
- S. Nawid, Religious response to social change in Afghanistan. King Aman-Allah and the Afghan ulama, 1919-1929, Costa Mesa 1999.
- O. Roy, Le double code afghan. Marxisme et tribalisme, in Revue française de science politique 36 (December 1986), 846-61.
- B. Rubin, The fragmentation of Afghanistan. State formation and collapse in the international system, New Haven, Conn. 1995.
- B. Sultan and G. Wardel, Capitalizing on capacities of Afghan women. Women's role in Afghanistan's reconstruction and development, International Labor Organization, Working Paper 4, Geneva 31 December 2001.

SENZIL NAWID

The Caucasus

Kinship in the Caucasus is discussed in this entry in light of the general debate in anthropology on patrilineal descent societies, with specific reference to works in anthropology on kinship in the Middle East and Central Asia and to the author's own research results in Azerbaijan.

Recently published works on the Caucasus and Central Asia point to the existence of genealogically defined patrilineal and patrilocal descent groups, regarding them as still important today despite the economic and social changes during the Soviet regime. Patrilineal descent reckoning and the transmission of economic resources along the male line are considered as structural characteristics of these agnatic groups and held responsible for the social devaluation of women.

Such descriptions of unilineal descent groups are strictly based on the British functionalist lineage theory, in which an opposition between agnation and matrilineality was created. Women as daughters, sisters, and wives were defined exclusively with reference to fathers, brothers, and spouses and were condemned to jural irrelevance. Even criticism of this functionalist design continued to define women in an agnatic perspective and independent kinship classifications were not enlarged upon.

An analysis of patrilineal descent groups according to the functionalist theory relieves these groups from their embeddedness in the political, social, economic, and religious contexts of their states and is, therefore, inadequate. The author's research in rural Azerbaijan has shown that kinship systems do develop in these contexts and that they are in fact dependent upon them. Patrilineal descent categories exist in the consciousness of people. However, they neither form a permanent social structure nor do they include every individual. Patrilineal descent categories are not a structure but an option which is chosen in specific situations, for instance, when particular economically successful members gain material advantage through the enmeshment of primarily agnatic kin in the state bureaucracy. Only then are solidarity groups formed, whose members support one another in all social, political, and economic matters. Yet, since these groups are extremely dependent upon the economic success and the social networks of their prominent members, the durability of their solidarity is fragile and could collapse at any time. Indeed, these solidarity groups follow the well-known pattern of genealogically recruiting members, but these are modern adaptations from the ideological reservoir of patrilineal descent.

Patrilineal descent systems are held responsible for the disadvantaged position of women. In the perspective of patrilineal descent groups, daughters or sisters who are given in marriage to other groups are lost members. The solidarity groups in Azerbaijan do not comply with this. Because of their economic strength married daughters remain incorporated in the group. For the women in question the consequence is that even after marriage their status as daughter/sister prevails over their status as daughter-in-law; like their brothers they continue to participate in the decision-making of the group. Social marginality rests upon their husbands, provided that they have no solidarity group of their own.

Kinship terminology in Azerbaijan differentiates between agnatic and uterine kin: agnatic kin is conceived as süyük qohumluq (kinship of the bone) and uterine kin as süd qohumluq (milk kinship). Just as süyük qohumluq refers to the patrilineal descent category, süd qohumluq describes the uterine kin, who are firstly the descendants of both sexes of a remembered great-grandmother. Seen genealogically süd qohumluq describes the transmission of milk. However, it is not uterine descent that is marked, but the equality of uterine positions (mother, mother's mother, mother's sister, and so forth), and this equality is based on the central concept of motherhood. In its very essence süd qohumluq evolves after the birth of the first child of the daughter. It is ritually marked but does not emphasize the continuity of groups, but rather the life process in general.

Süd qohumluq between women dissects the socially dominant borderlines of agnatic solidarity groups and dispels them. This is manifested in the context of feuds between two groups who have an affinal relationship with one another. While the men of the two groups are obliged to their agnatic bonds and interrupt the existing affinal relationship between the two parties, the women continue their relations of süd qohumluq with the women of the other group.

In principle, the two sexes always belong to both, süyük and süd qohumluq. However, men as a category are associated with süyük (bone) and women with süd (milk). Just as men cannot pass milk to the next generation, women are excluded from the transmission of agnatic descent. In sum, various aspects are concealed behind the terms süyük and süd, depending one's perspective. Süyük qohumluq refers primarily to men, is realized through agnation, objectivates "milk" during the marriage process and regards the wife as alien. Süd qohumluq refers primarily to women, emphasizes uterinity and stresses with the concepts of motherhood and birth the life process itself. But süyük and süd equally denote the unity of the sibling group, of "brother" and "sister"; the value of consanguinity is placed hierarchically before the value of affinity.

The topic of the general life process is encountered again in the field of religion and cosmology. Here, the meaning of the life process is constituted in conflict with the concepts of the newly arising so-called orthodox Islam. It is the relationship of the female body to Islamic purity rules which is formulated differently. In the life cycle rituals of the qirx (literally “forty”), female impurity after marriage and birth is no longer negatively defined, as part of the social exclusion of women. Quite the contrary, female impurity and fertility stipulate each other and are dependent on one another.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Baştuğ and N. Hortaçsu, The price of value. Kinship, marriage and meta-narratives of gender in Turkmenistan, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 117–40.
- P. Bourdieu, Outline of a theory of practice, trans. R. Nice, Cambridge 1976.
- R. Callois and G. E. von Grunebaum (eds.), Le rêve et les sociétés humaines, Paris 1967.
- J. Collier and S. Yanagisako, Gender and kinship, Stanford 1987.
- T. Dragadze, Islam in Azerbaijan. The position of women, in C. F. El-Sohl and J. Mabro (eds.), Muslim women's choices. Religious belief and social reality, Oxford 1994, 152–63.
- M. Fortes, The structure of unilineal descent groups, in American Anthropologist 55 (1951), 17–41.
- H. A. Habilov, Ethnography of Azerbaijan [in Azeri], Baku 1991.
- L. Holy, Kinship, honour and solidarity. Cousin marriage in the Middle East, Manchester, England 1989.
- A. Kuper, Lineage theory. A critical retrospect, in Annual Review of Anthropology 11 (1982), 71–92.
- J. Marcus, A world of difference. Islam and gender hierarchy in Turkey, London 1992.
- I. Pfluger-Schindlbeck, Verwandtschaft, Religion und Geschlecht in Aserbaidshan, Reichert Verlag (forthcoming).
- N. Tohidi, Gender and national identity in post-Soviet Azerbaijan. A regional perspective, in F. Acar and A. Güneş-Ayata (eds.), Gender and identity construction. Women of Central Asia, the Caucasus and Turkey, Leiden 2000, 249–92.

INGRID PFLUGER-SCHINDLBECK

South Asia

INTRODUCTION

Officially, Islam entered South Asia in 712 C.E., with the conquest of Sindh by an Arab general, but the rise of Islam in Arabia impacted South Asia much earlier, since trade in the Indian Ocean area had existed since prehistoric times. Much of this impact was mediated by women – a fact largely ignored by history books that tell only of conquering “Muslim armies,” forcible conversions, and gentle Sufi persuasion. These early female mediators were South Asian non-Muslims who attended to and lived, possibly in muṭʿa marriages (Bouchon 1986), with merchants, sailors, and fishermen from the Gulf and the Hadramawt, who had converted to the new faith. Later South Asian non-Muslim women even lived with East African slave converts traded by Arabs and Persians till the late nineteenth century. Living over generations as wives, mothers, and daughters with Muslim men, these women combined the new faith with much of their pre-Islamic (notably Hindu or Buddhist) cultures. From the thirteenth century onwards Muslim women from Iran and Central Asia came in as wives, companions, and slaves of the elite, and transmitted to their descendants their blend of pre-Islamic and Islamic practice – often construed in the South Asian setting as “ideally Muslim.” Between the ninth and the twentieth centuries Muslim women in South Asia toiled as peasants, pastoralists, professional craftswomen, and artistes; they ruled over territories and lived as bonded labor; they were among the fabulously wealthy and the abject destitute; they acquiesced with invading powers and resisted them, as for example in the struggle against British colonialism. Today, South Asian Muslim women play complex roles in the broader framework of relations between Muslims and non-Muslims at the levels of both community and state. This entry touches upon some of the numerous issues concerning Muslim women, kinship, and Islam in different South Asian states with large Muslim populations – Bangladesh (ca. 130 million), India (ca. 150 million), Maldives (ca. 0.30 million), Nepal (ca. 0.96 million), Pakistan (ca. 145 million), and Sri Lanka (ca. 1.35 million). At the outset it must be stressed that there has always been great variation within every region and micro-region, according to specific community, locality, particular religious denomination, and, above all, class.

DESCENT, RANKING, AND COMMUNITY

Transmission of nationality in South Asia is a male prerogative in Bangladesh and Pakistan and was so in India till 1992. Most South Asian communities were and are patrilineal and patrifocal, and the advent of Islam brought little change, if any. The primacy of agnatic kin is marked even when kinship terminology is bilateral, as among the Pakistani Baluch (Pastner 1978). More bilinear in practice, but not in ideology are the Sidi of Gujarat, India (Basu 1995). The few matrilineal communities – notably the Māppilla of Kerala, the people of Lakshadweep (both in India), and of the Maldives – continued to remain so even after adopting Islam. Here, men have rights of usufruct over property held in common by the matrilineal group, while the transmission of individually owned property is governed by the principles of the Shāfi school of Sunnī Islam (Dube 1969, 1994, Kutty 1972). Traditional residence patterns were matrilineal, with the system of visiting husbands. In recent decades, with increasing interaction with dominant non-Muslim communities in India and Muslims in the Gulf, matrilocality here is giving way to patrilocality among both Muslims and non-Muslims. Simultaneously, elsewhere in South Asia, long-term male labor migration within and beyond the subcontinent is forcing many patrilineal communities to become “matri-weighted” (Naveed-i-Rahat 1990) in practice, though not in ideology.

While matri-centered socioeconomic units have long existed in many Muslim and non-Muslim agricultural and herding communities – for example in Rajasthan (India) and Sindh (Pakistan) – where men entrust the cash earned for safe-keeping to mothers and wives, among most traditional Muslims, Hindus, and Sikhs direct female participation in production processes outside the precincts of the household economy depends on and is an indicator of family wealth and social status and the concept of (male) honor. The less the visibility of such participation, the higher the status, especially in urban areas (Jeffery 1979, Mandelbaum 1988, Vreede-de Stuers 1968), but also in many rural settings (Kotalová 1993, Lindholm 1982, Naveed-i-Rahat 1990).

Status among South Asian Muslims is also closely related to concepts of “origin,” pedigree and blood (nasab), caste (jāt/jāti) and lineage (birāderi, khāndān, kaum/qoum, kul, nukh are among terms used, depending on locality). This is despite the fact that for several centuries, community boundaries remained fairly flexible, because of individual and group conversions and immigration from surrounding regions. Only in the early sixteenth century did the Māppilla, for instance, evolve into an endogamous community. Almost identical, language-specific kinship terminology and (especially female) first names among Muslims and non-Muslims, as well as the numerous communities who blended Islam and non-Brahmanical Hinduism – Bishnois, Guptis, Hussaini Brahmins, Pranamis, and so forth – may indicate a degree of intermarriage. This continued between Muslims and Hindus into the late Mughal and early colonial period among the ruling elite (for example, the Rajputs) and certain lower status professional groups (for example, classical musicians). In remoter regions (for example, Ladakh) Muslims and Buddhists intermarried till even the late twentieth century, when general religious fanaticism encouraged by state policies intervened. In Bangladesh no laws bar inter-faith marriages, but social pressure to convert to Islam is strong. Pakistani law prohibits a Muslim woman from marrying a non-Muslim and a Muslim man from marrying a Hindu, while in Nepal a Hindu loses his/her legal (and social) identity on marrying a Muslim (Gaborieau 1995). In India, under the Special Marriage Act 1954, Muslims and non-Muslims may marry and retain their respective religions; to remain valid such a marriage must be monogamous. In reality, however, when Hindu girls marry Muslim boys, increasingly the couples, their respective families, and their possessions are targeted by gangs affiliated to various Hindutva organizations; the couples are forcibly separated, the boys charged with abduction and the girls put away – all this usually with the connivance of the local police.

Ritual sororal and sibling bonds across religious boundaries played major roles in subcontinental history and still unite individuals and groups in village India. The cognitive flexibility regarding community boundaries did not clash in practice with the primacy accorded to traits transmitted through paternal blood and maternal milk (Rao 2000). Female mediated “fictive kinship” across religious and community boundaries was most clearly embodied in the precolonial elite institution of the wet nurse, which existed well into the early decades of the twentieth century. Based on the principle that through the milk, the child would imbibe the traits of the community/caste of the wet nurse, it united families, while also following the Islamic rule governing riḍāʿa.¹

Well ensconced in the overarching hierarchy of the local version of the caste (varna-jāti) system – with the partial exception of the (Indian administered) Kashmir Valley, some Pakistani “tribal areas” (but see Barth 1971), and parts of Bangladesh (Bertocci 1995) – Muslims also observe the norms of caste stratification (albeit often with less extreme adherence to notions of purity and pollution) that prevail in socioeconomic interaction within any given micro-region (Ansari 1960, Eglar 1960). Islamization of local communities and immigrant Muslim groups may have introduced a certain spirit of egalitarianism, but they also brought along other principles of ranking, which had been well worked out, for example by jurists of the Ḥanafi school that predominates in South Asia. As Ahmad observes, “caste among Muslims . . . owes . . . directly to Hindu influences, but . . . has been reinforced by the justification offered for the idea of birth and descent as criteria of status in Islamic law” (1978, 15). Status is intimately connected to norms governing marriage, which vary regionally and according to specific community, rather than creed only.

FORGING ALLIANCES: MARRIAGE, ECONOMICS, AND POLITICS

While in December 2003 a constitutional Pakistani court ruled that an adult woman may marry without her guardian's permission, in July 2004, the Muttahida Majlis-i Amal, the ruling party in Pakistan's North West Frontier Province drafted the Hisbah Bill, a law according to which marriage without parental consent will be construed as an act of disobedience, and hence forbidden (Rahman 2004). Indeed, among all South Asians marriage continues to be overwhelmingly arranged by parents or other elders, often against the explicit wishes of the adult woman, or minor girl. Though often interpreted as expressions of mystic love, the famous legends of Hīr-Rānjhā, Dholā-Maru, Mahendra-Mūmal, and others, eulogizing romantic love, are often sung at engagement ceremonies, which, however, only males may attend. Female sexuality is recognized exclusively within the bounds of heterosexual marriage, which is considered essential. Significantly, no legal provisions exist regarding the maintenance of unmarried major Muslim women during their father's life time. Even prostitutes in Bangladesh are “married” to “banana trees . . . the sun or the moon” (Kotlová 1993, 194) as part of their professional initiation rites. The only category of unmarried Muslim women who were provided for were perhaps courtesans who, drawing on economic resources intended for the legitimate domestic unit, provided cultured noblemen of past centuries with intelligent companionship, taught them refined manners and the fine arts, and sometimes also initiated their sons into the pleasures of sexuality.

Birth rituals draw heavily on local pre-Islamic customs, and though in India active female infanticide is minimal among Muslims as compared to Hindus, daughters tend to be neglected throughout South Asia. Wedding rituals also largely resemble local non-Muslim practice, the signing of the nikāḥ (marriage contract) being an additional, obligatory act. In India if such nikāḥ marriages are additionally registered under the Special Marriage Act of 1954, the husband may bequeath a greater share of inheritance to his wife and children than would be permissible under the existing traditional fiqh laws. The Pakistan Muslim Family Ordinance of 1962 makes nikāḥ registration compulsory. In Bangladesh the registration of marriages is rare in rural areas; so is polygamy, though the Bangladesh Muslim Family Ordinance of 1961 allows it. In Indian-administered Kashmir, though the Dukhtarān-e Millat, a militant women's organization closely linked to the local Jamā'at-i Islāmī advocates polygamy, its practice is extremely rare. In Pakistan polygamy is restricted by law to cases where the court certifies that the first wife is barren or suffering from terminal illness and requires her consent. Practice, however, does not always adhere to these legal restrictions. Even after marriage, Muslim women retain membership of their patri-group and act as major socioeconomic balancing links between their natal and conjugal families, for example through the continued exchange of gifts incorporated in the institutions of vartan-bhāñji and salāmi in Pakistani Punjab (Alavi 1995, Eglar 1960, Naveed-i-Rahat 1981). Preferential lineage and/or caste endogamy is the norm, and giving a daughter/sister in marriage outside such a unit is tantamount to lowering social status and publicly acknowledging this decrease. While many groups prefer cousin marriage, some who were closely linked to non-Muslim elites avoid marrying close kin (Ahmad 1976, Donnan 1988, Rao 2000). In parts of pre-partition urban India, marriages with close kin appear to have been less frequent, partly because the pool of potential partners was larger and partly because the sense of social insecurity as a minority community was absent. Exchange marriages of siblings or other close kin, sometimes over generations, are not rare. These consolidate existing networks and are usually less expensive, with low marriage prestations. They also inhibit excessive conflict between a man's wife and mother (and other senior female kin) and further enable some relaxation of the otherwise strict avoidance behavior vis-à-vis his senior male kin. The disadvantages of preferential exchange are the lack of individual freedom and the dangers of one unhappy marriage in such a set easily affecting the other, especially given the strong emotional bonds between siblings. Short stories by noted Muslim women authors portray further problems inherent in such preferential systems in rapidly changing socioeconomic environments, where women from poor, traditional families wait in desperation for the wealthier and less traditional cousin's family to propose.

The choice of a spouse for one's child and the practice of marriage reflect the inextricable intermeshing of kinship rules and social organization with dominant economic and political structures. Dowry has no legal sanction in Bangladesh, India, or Pakistan, but the ban is not enforced. Irrespective of religion, such transactions are the norm among most groups, except the tribally organized, such as the Baluch, among whom the bride gets some jewelry, clothes, cash, and household goods from her father, which he in turn received as māl from the groom's family. Even communities with bridewealth or equivalent transaction systems are increasingly adopting dowry – in India as a sign of upward socioeconomic mobility, in Bangladesh because of rising male unemployment (Rahman 2001). With spiraling demands, women are increasingly victimized and even killed by their husbands or other conjugal kin for not having provided “enough” dowry, and legal action against the culprits is rare. When dowry is absent (for example, among the Ithnā ‘Ashariyya Shī‘īs of Indian Uttar Pradesh, Roy 1984), a married woman receives clothes and jewelry for herself and her children from her natal family throughout her life, as compensation for her unclaimed share of parental property. At least in India, most Muslim women appear unaware of the size of their share (Lateef 1990, 143). In pre-partition South Asia, this did not include agricultural land, which was governed by customary laws rather than by the Shariat Act. This still applies to northern India, but almost everywhere, sisters relinquish their rights to all paternal inheritance in favor of their brothers. Though rarely recorded formally, such relinquishing is universally appreciated and construed as done in exchange for the right to fraternal asylum, were her conjugal household to fall apart due to divorce or widowhood. Often, however, brothers cannot or do not fulfill their part of such informal agreements, and especially widows are at the mercy of one and all (Chen 1986, Haram 2002). Widow remarriage is not socially approved except in some communities in the form of levirate. In urban Kashmir widows and even fiancées whose grooms die are considered inauspicious (Manchanda forthcoming). Till recently, however, divorce carried little stigma in rural Kashmir if the woman's agnates or new husband returned the bridewealth. But elsewhere, divorce can be highly stigmatizing, and while it must be registered in court in Pakistan and Bangladesh, in the latter alimony is not always paid. Indeed, with growing globalization and male mobility, women are being increasingly divorced, or simply abandoned. Thus in July 2003, a Kerala court ordered a husband to pay maintenance to his abandoned wife, saying that although she was a minor at marriage, both partners were post-pubertal and the marriage was performed following customary law. Increasingly women also find themselves in legal limbo, due to modern technologies used in contracting both marriage and divorce. Notably migrants to the Gulf are divorcing their first wives back home via SMS, email, or telephone. In these so-called “triple ṭalāq” cases (ṭalāq-ul bidd'ṭalāq-e badaiṭṭalāq-e bain) divorce pronounced by the husband in one sitting is considered binding by most Ḥanafī Sunnis (but not by Ahl-i Ḥadīth and not by Ithnā ‘Ashariyya or Musta‘lian Ismā‘īlī Shī‘īs), provided it was originally pronounced in the presence of Muslim witnesses and later confirmed by a Sharī‘a court. Such practice tends to leave the divorcees without a minimum of financial security, and the gravity of the situation is apparent from the current debate surrounding the issue among Muslim Indians. At the time of writing, ‘ulamā’ of various persuasions (Barelvi, Deobandi, Ahl-i Ḥadīth and Shī‘a) who are members of the Muslim Personal Law Board in India are at odds concerning the theological validity of this manner of divorce and its associated practice of ḥalāla, following which a divorced woman may not remarry her divorced husband unless she first marries another man. As long as she does not remarry, a divorced mother usually retains the rights and duties of hiḍānat (physical custody and daily care) toward a male toddler and a pre-pubertal female. Thereafter, the father alone is entitled to guardianship over the child's person and property (the right of wilāyat-e naḥs and wilāyat-e nikāḥ respectively). Fatherless children are considered “orphans,” and few wish to marry such girls.

South Asian states encourage the intermeshing of kinship, politics, and economics, implicitly by recognizing and tolerating specific customs and “traditions,” and explicitly through legislation. The following examples illustrate this issue:

1. In addition to millions of deaths and rapes, the partition of colonial India led to the abduction of at least 50,000 Muslim and 33,000 non-Muslim women in India and Pakistan respectively. They did not accompany the roughly 8 millions crossing the newly formed borders. Between 1948 and 1956 the Central Recovery Operation of the newly formed Indian government sought to “recover” abducted and forcibly converted women on either side of the border. Following what it considered the moral bonds of kinship, the state forcibly “returned” some 30,000 women, the great majority of whom were Muslim, to their original families, often against their own wishes (Böck and Rao 2000, 29ff), thus underscoring the principle of the appropriation of women through the community and the state. Ever since, marriages across the borders are fraught with danger and the looming threat of especially rural women being imprisoned as illegal immigrants.

2. On 8 October 2003, Shazia Khaskheli, a bank officer's daughter and her husband, Mohammad Hassan Solangi, originally from the lowly fisherman (machi) caste, were tortured and murdered in the presence of thousands. It was one more case of "honor killings"² (karo kari) in Sind, Pakistan, where the first three months of 1999 and the first nine months of 2003 saw 132 and 176 women respectively (and dozens of men) thus murdered. According to figures obtained from the Human Rights Commission and the Pakistan and Sindh Graduates Association 286 women were similarly killed in 1999 in Punjab. Official statistics presented before the Pakistani Senate in July 2004 put the total number of lives lost through such killings between 1998 and 2004 at 4,000 (Dawn 2004). The murdered (and the hundreds of other forcibly divorced) women had soiled the honor of their families and communities, by flouting social norms (Shazia had married beyond her tribe and a lower caste man as well). Among many communities in Pakistan and Azad Kashmir marriage entails transfer of all rights over the woman from her natal to her conjugal family, including that of killing her, often on the slightest suspicion of marital infidelity. Such infidelity constitutes an attack on the husband's honor and he must retaliate by killing the woman and her presumed lover (Ahmed and Ahmed 1981). Her natal family has the right of revenge, by killing a kinsman of the murderer, or demanding a young girl of his family as marital compensation. If the infidelity is genuine, the murdered woman's family gains in status by forgiving the murderer. The Pakistani law of Qisas and Diyat (concerning physical injury, manslaughter, and murder) permits the victim's heirs to decide the fate of the murderer, thus accepting that women may be murdered and/or used as objects of compensation. The December 2003 court ruling in Multan (Pakistan) ordering a man's public blinding and imprisonment for having blinded his fiancé with acid – an increasingly frequent occurrence in both Pakistan and Bangladesh – also indicates such tacit approval of gender-related "custom."

3. Some 20,000 women languish in Pakistani prisons, charged with adultery under the Hudood Ordinances 1979 (Burney 1999, Jahangir and Jilani 1990) promulgated as part of the government's declared "Islamization program." Many are rape victims, charged with adultery for failing to provide four male witnesses on their behalf. Others were charged in revenge, by their parents for marrying against their will, or by their divorced husbands because they wished to remarry; yet others are charged by brothers or neighbors to deprive them of their property. Ongoing efforts to repeal these laws, which include death by stoning, are meeting with great opposition.

4. A current controversy in Indian administered Jammu and Kashmir concerns the rights of women who marry outside this region. At stake is their status, guaranteed by the Kashmiri constitution, as "permanent residents" (or "state subjects") of the territory, that enables them to inherit immovable property and obtain state employment within the territory. While the non-state subject wife of a male state subject can acquire such rights as long as she resides in the territory, the position of female state subjects who marry non-state subjects appears uncertain. Most Kashmiris perceive this issue as essential to their specific political identity, as is evident from its current manipulation by various Kashmiri and Indian political parties.

5. In precolonial and colonial South Asia community-specific customary laws prevailed over creed-specific personal laws. Thus, in Baluchistan, lub, promised to a wife on divorce (unless she was barren, unfaithful, or remarried) was managed by her agnates and inherited by her children. In Indian-administered rural Kashmir customary laws still regulate most lives, despite recent transforming attempts by groups adhering to more scriptural readings of Islam. In practice, customary and personal laws in India vary depending on region and community, but formally, the Muslim Personal Law (MPL), based on the Shariat Act 1937 and on what was known as the Anglo-Mohammedan Law, regulates the civil concerns of Muslim Indians. The ongoing debate in India about a uniform civil code (UCC) received much publicity with the so-called Shah Bano case (Rao 1992) and reflects the discursive importance of Islam in the formation of the postcolonial Indian state. Article 44 of the Indian constitution advocates as a directive principle that the state endeavor in future to secure a UCC, primarily through social evolution (Dhagamwar 1989, Faruqi 1985, Mahmood 1977, 1995, Parashar 1992, Wahiduddin Khan 2001). Today, some favor the enactment of an UCC to promote "gender equality," and/or "national integration." Others see it as an onslaught by fanatical Hindutva hegemons on Muslim religious identity, especially in a state whose rulers and educated elite increasingly flout the constitutional principles of secularism and democracy. But even among those who reject a UCC, there have been many diverging voices, going back more than 30 years (Fyze 1971), who plead strongly for reforms within the MPL, and for a conceptual distinction between what they consider the path ordained by God and the man-made corpus of jurisprudence.

CONCLUSION: MUSLIM WOMEN AS SYMBOLS AND TARGETS

Authored by men, reformist literature of the mid-late nineteenth century (for example, Mir'āt al-'arūs [The bride's mirror] by Nazīr Aḥmad in 1869 and Bihisht-i Zewar [Heavenly ornaments] by the Deobandi scholar Ashraf 'Alī Thānawī) served upper-class Muslim women as practical guides to family and religious life. Simultaneously, with the Muslim conception of Islamic law being confined by British rule "to the parameters laid down for it by colonial imperatives," "reformist fervor focused on women's rights in marriage, divorce and inheritance" (Jalal 2001, 72), and MPL became the core of South Asian Muslim identity. The All-India Anjuman-i-Khawatin-i Islam (Muslim Women's Conference) attempted several reforms (Minault 1998), passing a resolution against polygamy in 1918 and lobbying to enable women to initiate divorce through delegation (ṭalāq-i tafwīd). In postcolonial India, Muslims as an increasingly embattled minority must necessarily perceive any change in personal laws as a threat to community identity and survival. Here, women are projected as the cornerstone of this identity, both by those who attack it and those who defend it. Though in practice polygamy is at least as frequent among non-Muslims as among Muslims, and because of greater poverty live births among Muslims are lower than among Hindus, fascist Hindutva rhetoric in India has cobbled up an image of the "Muslim woman" as a breeding ground for millions of fanatic, violent, and "backward," "anti-national" Muslims. Simultaneously, the shades of opinion among Muslims regarding wide ranging reforms within the MPL are largely ignored, in attempts to portray the community as a homogeneous, threatening whole.

Since women are used as symbols of their respective communities, they are also targeted as such. A much publicized case was the persecution of the Bangladeshi novelist Taslima Nasreen for, among other things, writing about the repression of women and its effects on their health. Less known perhaps, is how individual and gang rape are used as instruments of repression: during partition in 1947, thereafter in every "communal riot" in India, by the Pakistani army in Bangladesh, and by Indian security personnel in Kashmir. The Gujarat genocide of 2002 (IIJG 2003) highlights how central sexual violence is to the state sponsored Hindutva project and its newly constructed notions of honor and virility. But women are also perpetrators. Mothers and mothers-in-law instigate, encourage, and participate in "honor killings," just as much as men do. Upper-class Pakistani women lauded their raping soldiers for attempts to "improve the race" of Bangladeshis, and in September 2003 women activists of the Pakistani Jamaat-e-Islami demonstrated against the proposed repeal of the Hudood Ordinances. Women members of Hindutva associations and even women members of parliament from extreme right-wing parties in India have abetted young Hindu men to attack Muslims and their places of worship, spurring them on in the name of "male honor" and "national pride."

Social, economic, and political conflict at various levels of South Asian society exacerbate the situation of all women, including Muslim women, and deep-seated fear of social boycott and physical reprisal coupled with the state's implicit if not explicit complicity in crimes against women tend to force the victims into silence. While the frequency of abductions and rapes of village girls by state sponsored gunmen in Indian-administered Kashmir exemplifies their defencelessness in the context of a war economy that has long ruptured a variety of social institutions, the widespread sexual abuse of children in Pakistan (nearly half of all children there, according to Human Rights reports, see Terzieff 2004) by village landlords and other men in positions of authority and power testifies to the weakness in practice of normative values. All South Asian states have ratified the United Nations Women's Convention, and there are increasingly active women's movements in all these countries. It remains to be seen how far their efforts will impinge on the multiple ways in which the ideologies and practice of kinship affect Muslim women and their relations with the state.

NOTES

1. In Islam the kinship of milk (riḍā'a), like that of blood, restricts marriage between those considered to be milk-siblings; by the same token it also functions to broaden bonds between individuals and groups (for an anthropological overview see Rao 2000, 107–12).

2. Similar "honor killings" (also known in certain regions as vani) are equally prevalent in parts of northern India among non-Muslims, especially middle- and upper-caste Hindus and Sikhs, but no figures appear to be available. Such killings are also practiced among the South Asian diaspora, for example in Britain and in Sweden.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- I. Ahmad (ed.), Family, kinship and marriage among Muslims in India, Delhi 1976.
- , Introduction, in I. Ahmad (ed.), Caste and social stratification among Muslims in India, Delhi 1978, 1–17.
- A. S. Ahmed and Z. Ahmed, “Mor” and “Tor.” Binary and opposing meanings of Pakhtun womanhood, in T. S. Epstein and R. A. Watts (eds.), The endless day. Some case material on Asian rural women, New York 1981, 31–46.
- H. Alavi, The two biraderies. Kinship in rural west Punjab, in T. N. Madan (ed.), Muslim communities of South Asia. Culture, society, and power, Delhi 1995, 1–62.
- G. Ansari, Muslim caste in Uttar Pradesh, Lucknow 1960.
- F. Barth, The system of social stratification in Swat, North Pakistan, in E. R. Leach (ed.), Aspects of caste in South India, Ceylon and North-West Pakistan, Cambridge 1971, 113–46.
- H. Basu, Habshi Sklaven, Sidi-Fakire. Muslimische Heilgenverehrung in westlichen Indien, Berlin 1995.
- P. J. Bertocci, Community structure and social rank in two villages in Bangladesh, in T. N. Madan (ed.), Muslim communities of South Asia. Culture, society, and power, Delhi 1995, 177–209.
- M. Böck and A. Rao, Indigenous models and kinship theories. An introduction to a South Asian perspective, in M. Böck and A. Rao (eds.), Culture, creation, and procreation. Concepts of kinship in South Asian practice, Oxford 2000, 1–49.
- G. Bouchon, Quelques aspects de l’islamisation des régions maritimes de l’Inde à l’époque médiévale (xii^e–xvi^e s.), in M. Gaborieau (ed.), Islam et société en Asie du sud. Puruṣārtha 9 (1986), 29–36.
- S. Burney, Crime or custom? Violence against women in Pakistan, Washington D.C. 1999.
- U. Butalia, Community, state and gender. On women’s agency during partition, in Economic and Political Weekly 28:17 (1993), 12–24.
- M. Chen, Poverty, gender, and work in Bangladesh, in Economic and Political Weekly 21:5 (1986), 217–22.
- Dawn* (newspaper, Pakistan), Editorial, Law on honour killing, 11 July 2004.
- V. Dhagamwar, Towards the uniform civil code, Delhi 1989.
- H. Donnan, Marriage among Muslims. Preference and choice in northern Pakistan, Delhi 1988.
- L. Dube, Matriliny and Islam. Religion and society in the Laccadives. Delhi 1969.
- , Conflict and compromise. Devolution and disposal of property in a matrilineal Muslim society, in Economic and Political Weekly, May 1994, 1273–84.
- Z. Eglar, A Punjabi village in Pakistan, New York 1960.
- Z. al-H. Faruqi, Orthodoxy and heterodoxy in India, in M. Hasan (ed.), Communal and pan-Islamic trends in colonial India, Delhi 1985, 382–99.
- A. A. Fyzee, The reform of Muslim personal law in India, Bombay 1971.
- M. Gaborieau, Muslims in the Hindu kingdom of Nepal, in T. N. Madan (ed.), Muslim communities of South Asia. Culture, society, and power, Delhi 1995, 211–39.
- N. Haram, Muslim widow, Delhi 2002.
- IJJG (International Initiative for Justice in Gujarat), Threatened existence. A feminist analysis of the genocide in Gujarat. Redressing violence against women committed by state and non-state agencies, Bombay 2003.
- A. Jahangir and H. Jilani, The Hudood Ordinances. A divine sanction? Lahore 1990.
- A. Jalal, Self and sovereignty. Individual and community in South Asian Islam since 1850, Delhi 2001.
- P. Jeffery, Frogs in a well. Indian women in purdah, Delhi 1979.
- J. Kotalová, Belonging to others. Cultural construction of womanhood among Muslims in a village in Bangladesh, Uppsala 1993.
- A. R. Kutty, Marriage and kinship in an island society, Delhi 1972.
- S. Lateef, Muslim women in India. Political and private realities 1890–1980s, Delhi 1990.
- C. Lindholm, Generosity and jealousy. The Swat Pakhtun of northern Pakistan, New York 1982.
- T. Mahmood, Muslim personal law. Role of the state in the Subcontinent, Delhi 1977.
- , Uniform civil code. Fictions and facts, Delhi 1995.
- R. Manchanda, Kashmiri women and the armed conflict. From icon to agency, in T. N. Madan and A. Rao (eds.), The valley of Kashmir. The making and unmaking of a composite culture?, Berghahn Books and Manohar (forthcoming).
- D. G. Mandelbaum, Women’s seclusion and men’s honor. Sex roles in North India, Bangladesh, and Pakistan, Tucson 1988.
- G. Minault, Women, legal reform and Muslim identity, in M. Hasan (ed.), Islam, communities and the nation. Muslim identities in South Asia and beyond, Delhi 1998, 138–58.
- Naveed-i-Rahat, The role of women in reciprocal relationships in a Punjab village, in T. S. Epstein and R. A. Watts (eds.), The endless day. Some case material on Asian rural women, New York 1981, 47–81.
- , Male outmigration and matri-weighted households. A case study of a Punjabi village in Pakistan, Delhi 1990.
- A. Parashar, Women and family law reform in India, Delhi 1992.
- C. M. Pastner, The status of women and property on a Baluchistan oasis in Pakistan, in L. Beck and N. Keddie (eds.), Women in the Muslim world, Cambridge, Mass. 1978, 434–50.
- M. J. Rahman, Shariah in Nowshera, in News International, 10 July 2004.
- S. Rahman, Women in Bangladesh. Reflections on women and violence in 2000, 2001, <<http://www.ahrchk.net/hrsolid/mainfile.php/2001vol11no5/67/>>.
- A. Rao, Die Stellung der Frau und die Ehre der Gruppe. Einige Bemerkungen zur Situation islamischer Frauen in Nordindien, in Sociologus 42:2 (1992), 157–79.
- , Autonomy. Life cycle, gender, and status among Himalayan pastoralists, Oxford 1998.
- , Blood, milk and mountains. Marriage practice and concepts of predictability among the Bakkarwal of Jammu and Kashmir, in M. Böck and A. Rao (eds.), Culture, creation, and procreation. Concepts of kinship in South Asian practice, Oxford 2000, 101–34.
- S. Roy, Concept of zar, zan and zamin. A cultural analysis of Indian Islamic tradition of inheritance and kinship, in Man in India 64:4 (1984), 388–96.
- J. Terzieff, Child rape victims struggle for justice in Pakistan, in San Francisco Chronicle, 28 June 2004.
- C. Vreede-de Stuers, Pardā. A study of Muslim women’s life in northern India, Assen 1968.
- M. Wahiduddin Khan, Uniform civil code. A critical study, Delhi 2001.

Kinship, Idiomatic

Iran

Kin terms vary considerably by language and local dialect, all within a bilateral structure with patrilineal emphasis. Terms for the father's relatives carry more authority, respect, and distance than for the mother's, which more likely carry familiarity. Women are said to be more attuned to correct use and subtle meanings of kin terms than are men. These meanings can be manipulated by the speaker: endearing maman may change to formal mādar (mother), conveying insistence or urging attention. The suffix jān (life, soul) emphasizes endearment; the prefix khān in connection with "mother's brother" (dāi), conveys respect. Increasing genealogical distance increases formality. Recently, names started to replace kin terms: adults use personal names within the speaker's generation and for younger relatives, last names for older and more distant ones, often with polite titles such as "madam/sir."

The most versatile kin terms one may extend to unrelated people to create so-called fictive kinship are those for members of the nuclear family and for parents' siblings. Children may use their parents' kin terms for a person regardless of their own actual kinship relationship. Thus, a child may call any man "mother's brother" whom the child's father calls "mother's brother," although the man actually is a "father's brother" (amū) to the child. Older children adopt appropriate kin terms for their relatives or avoid addressing them directly, and in reference or when in doubt use a descriptive term – "mother's brother's wife" (zān-i dāi).

For children, the default term for friendly, unrelated females (mother's friends, for example,) is "mother's sister" (khāla), connotating kindness and generosity: "All khālas are good except khāla Bear" says a proverb. It may also cover female caretakers, nannies, and old female servants. Familiar but unrelated men such as elder sisters' husbands likely are called "father's brother," emphasizing respect over familiarity. Adults often admonish young children to call other young children "sister" (khuwāhar) or "brother" (barādar), encouraging friendly interaction. Children do not extend terms for parents.

Spouses may use each other's kin-terms for in-laws: a wife may call some of the husband's relatives, especially close, female ones, by his terms for them. This practice is less common for husbands for distant-formal relatives, in rural areas, and in traditional-formal families. A few people generally become known as "uncle (amū, dāi)/aunt (amma, khāla) plus personal name" in their kin group, even neighborhood, regardless of actual kinship. The spouses of some relatives may be called by the gender-appropriate equivalent of the term used for the connecting relative: thus the husband of a "father's sister" becomes a "father's brother." Terms for mother's siblings are more readily extended than those for father's siblings.

When a man and an unrelated woman must interact, they may use kin terms as a buffer, to stress a non-sexual, supportive, or submissive intent. If they presume age and status equality, they use "sister" or "brother." (The old terms dādā, kākā, still used by Luri speakers today, also covered slaves or servants in the past.) Great age difference requires the use of "son, daughter" (pisar, dukhtar) and "mother, father," even "grandmother" (nānā) or, rarely, "grandfather" (bābā). Only the most formal term for mother and father (pidar, mādar) is extended; colloquial-intimate forms (such as maman, "mom," baba, "dad") are limited to one's own parents and, rarely, grandparents. All these terms suggest the religiously lawful (maḥram) relationships within the nuclear family.

Two unrelated women may use "sister" or "mother's sister" for each other if they are of about equal age and status; or else father's sister, often teknonymously. This is tricky, though, as a woman may take offense at being reduced to a "mother's sister" by a younger or lower-ranking woman, while one addressed as "father's sister" may resent being made older than the speaker is: amma carries respect and deference due paternal relatives; khāla carries familiarity and intimacy, suggesting the easy-going relationship with mother's relatives. Kin terms express status as well as age differences between speaker and the addressed.

When two unrelated men of about equal age and status wish to address each other informally – asking for help, for example – they will probably use one of several terms for "brother," in this order of increasing familiarity: barādar, dādāsh, kākā (Luri also gyegu). Unequal age and status require terms that cross a generation ("my father/my son").

An adult, especially female, speaker is likely to add the possessive suffix man or am to extended kin terms to emphasize positive qualities connected with closeness (madare-man, “my mother”); without the possessive, pisar and dukhtar are condescending and belittling, stressing authority over closeness.

In the political language of the Islamic Republic, “brother” and “sister” appear in speeches, when officials want to persuade, reprimand, or demand something of people, and in titles for religious organizations (for example, Sisters of Zaynab). This use emphasizes equality and the obligations Muslims have toward each other in the family of believers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- F. Barth, Nomads of South Persia, New York 1961.
 L. Beck, The Qashqa'i of Iran, New Haven, Conn. 1986.
 D. Bradburd, Ambiguous relations, Washington, D.C. 1990.
 E. Friedl, Children of Deh Koh, Syracuse, N.Y. 1997.
 S. Guppy, The blindfold horse. Memories of a Persian childhood, Boston 1986.
 I. Pezeshkzad, My Uncle Napoleon, Washington, D.C. 1996.
 B. Spooner, Kinship and marriage in Eastern Persia, in Sociologus 15 (1965), 22-31.

ERIKA LOEFFLER FRIEDL

Kinship and State

Arab States

Although the Arab world is geographically vast and features considerable sociocultural diversity, its peoples have in common patrilineal kinship, a way of organizing kin relations that places emphasis on agnatic descent groups. Patrilineages have long formed the basis for other modes of social organization, including the tribe and the state (Khoury and Kostiner 1990). They may have been preceded by matrilineages in pre-Islamic Arabia (Keddie 1991), although this is disputed. Matrilineal relations remain important during an individual's lifetime and provide an alternative to the idealized patrilineal family (Joseph 2000, 125). However, they do not persist structurally through time as do patrilineages.

Impingement by kinship modalities on systems of governance, and the reverse phenomenon, have occupied analysts of Arab societies at least since the advent of Islam. For Ibn Khaldun, writing in the fourteenth century, a successful society is best organized along kinship lines, which naturally produce ʿasabiyya (group feeling) (1969, 98). He even argued that a successful caliph needed this in addition to the requisite divine mandate to rule (ibid., 160). But he then noted that the Qurʾān discourages it, citing Qurʾān 49:13 and its admonishment to leave behind “pride in ancestry,” allowing that, “still, we find that Mohammed censured group feeling and urged us to reject it and leave it alone” (ibid.). Anthropologist E. R. Wolf also regards the advent of Islam as introducing a new concept of territoriality – one based on religion rather than kin relationships, breaking with “the traditional notion of a territory’s belonging to a certain kin group and representing its inviolable property” (2001, 109).

Despite these early mitigations, however, observers have argued that the Arab family “constitutes the dominant social institution through which persons and groups inherit their religious, class, and cultural affiliations. It also provides security and support in times of individual and societal stress” (Barakat 1993, 98). A significant number of theorists have argued that Arab states both encompass and are constituted by this dominant social institution in what is both a fraught and inextricable relationship whether in “weak” states, such as Lebanon, or “strong” states, such as Baʿthist Iraq, and that Arab family structures have proven remarkably adaptive to political change.

CULTURAL LOGICS OF KINSHIP AND STATE

Many people in Arab and Mediterranean societies adhere to a cultural logic in which the male/female binary is strongly linked to thinking about territoriality, autochthony, governance, and succession and in which woman is to soil as man is to seed (Delaney 1992), sovereignty over land is akin to sexual consummation (Layoun 2001), and marriage (for a man) is like the purchase of a plot of land (Bourdieu 1977, 46). The metaphorical and lived similarities between political and kinship systems are multiple. Peteeet (1992, 176) argues that the Arab family is fundamentally male-centered, even when circumstances work against this as in the case of Palestinian families in which men are absent from the household due to migration for political or economic reasons. Others have theorized that Arab states are likewise male-centered, bestowing their fullest citizenship rights only on men (for example, Joseph 2000), that Arab kin groups famously seek to acquire and maintain honor while avoiding shame (for example, Peristiany 1966), and that the bodies of the women and girls who are members of the lineage, and by extension the clan or tribe and state, are their most powerful repository. Kin groups restrict/protect these living repositories from non-kin, usually by limiting mobility and autonomy, through social pressure within affectively close communities linked by “patriarchal connectivity” (Joseph 1993). Correspondingly, Arab states limit women through jural codes, such as in Saudi Arabia, where they are not allowed to drive or to be seen in public unaccompanied by a male kinsman. As with kin groups, the goal is protection from exogenous threats, including “the age-old antagonism between Islam and Christendom . . . [which] created an area of cultural resistance around women and the family” (Kandiyoti 1991, 7).

In all Arab states, then, it appears that patrilineal kinship, or what Joseph (1997, 80) calls “patriarchal kinship” forms the model for the state. This model has endured through the centuries and, during the past hundred years, since the demise of the Ottoman state, through the intensification and decline of European colonialism, and the advent of the modern Arab state.

Women living enmeshed in the kin relations and networks found in these states face a host of consequences that compromise or deny their rights as citizens. If suspected of sexual relations outside marriage a girl or woman may face severe reprimand ranging from banishment to honor killing, in which a male family member kills her in order to restore the family's honor. In many states this is sanctioned by the law in that the perpetrator is subjected to a lighter sentence than for a different type of murder. Women are likewise often barred from the workplace and from public life. In some cases the state has even reversed gains made in recent decades, such as in Iraq during the 1990s, when the government, pressured by economic sanctions imposed by the West, introduced policies aimed at removing some women from the workplace (Human Rights Watch 2003).

MODERN ARAB STATES AND FAMILY AS METAPHOR

Among modern Arab states there exists considerable diversity in governance, including republics, single-party military dictatorships, and monarchies. But across these diverse Arab states the metaphor of state leader as father is frequently invoked and images of the Arab state as a family writ large are seemingly ubiquitous. Eickelman and Piscatori (1996, 83) note instances in which Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and King Hussein of Jordan referred to their political constituents as their "family." Wedeen describes Hafiz al-Asad's role as head of the Syrian "national family" which manifested itself in "a chain of filial piety and paternal authority that culminates, and stops, in Asad" (1999, 49–65). The various versions of this chain are portrayed as both a bottom-up movement, in which "the political leader has been seen as a family member, an honorary family patriarch" (Joseph 1997, 87), and a top-down movement of the kind suggested by Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who made a point of being photographed playing with a child during the start of his 1991 invasion of Kuwait – a reminder to his followers of "the extreme need of the vulnerable for protection exercised by an all-powerful father" (Saghieh 2000).

Changes in kinship and gender often accompany, or are at least expected to accompany, the modernization process. But as Sharabi and others after him argue, the contemporary Arab state simply reshapes and preserves patriarchy, creating a modernized form of it called "neopatriarchy" that is "in many ways no more than a modernized version of the traditional patriarchal sultanate" (1992, 7). Sharabi identifies this state's "central psychological feature" as "the dominance of the Father (patriarch), the center around which the national and natural family are organized. Thus between ruler and ruled, between father and child, there exist vertical relations: in both settings, paternal will is the absolute will mediated by a forced consensus based on ritual and coercion" (1992, 7).

The central role of kin loyalties in the nascent modern Arab states was evident from the beginning. Early Arab nationalist Khalil al-Sakakini wrote in his diary of families in post-First World War Jerusalem, "The family interest comes before any other interest . . . If you assign someone to vote . . . he will vote for the elder of his family, whether or not that person is fit for the job" (al-Sakakini 1990, 115, cited in Segev 2001, 103).

As the new Arab states searched for their footing, they both were offered and looked for new father figures. Thompson describes a 1918 speech by occupying French general Henri Gourand in which he welcomed his Lebanese hearers "to France's colonial family" (2000, 39) and stated that "colonial children who were loyal would be rewarded" and resisters punished. Thompson notes that Gourand was, in his subtext, competing with another father figure, King Faysal (ibid., 40). What had brought about this "crisis of paternity" in the first place? The demise of the Ottoman Empire, in which "each sultan had ruled as a father" (ibid., 41).

In her 2002 presidential address to the Middle East Studies Association of North America, Lisa Anderson described the region as featuring "decades of despotism, once fed by Cold War imperatives [that] continued as if by inertia." The "inertia" she describes might well be the mutual constitution of state and kinship in the Arab world. Libyan president Mu'amar Qaddafi, one of the major figures of the "decades of despotism" (presumably her remarks apply to Arab North Africa as well as to the Middle East), lays out his political philosophies in his Green Book, a tract analogous to Mao's Little Red Book. "The nation," he writes, "is a large family which has passed through the stage of the tribe . . . The family, likewise, grows into a nation only after passing through the stages of the tribe and its ramifications . . . Inevitably this is achieved over long periods of time" (Qaddafi 1980, 19–20). Several pages later (22) he states that he regards a state as rightly being comprised of a nation. Qaddafi's remarks portray a seemingly attractive sense of nested collective identities and a telos, but unfortunately whitewash the despotism, marginalization of women, and other realities inherent in the conflation of patriarchy and state.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Anderson, Scholarship, policy, debate and conflict. Why we study the Middle East and why it matters, 2003 MESA presidential address, Middle East Studies Association Bulletin 38:1 (2004), <<http://fp.arizona.edu/mesassoc/Bulletin/Pres%20Addresses/Anderson.htm>>.
- H. Barakat, The Arab world. Society, culture, and state, Berkeley 1993.
- P. Bourdieu, Outline of a theory of practice, Cambridge 1977.
- C. Delaney, The seed and the soil. Gender and cosmology in Turkish village society, Berkeley 1992.
- D. F. Eckelman and J. P. Piscatori, Muslim politics, Princeton, N.J. 1996.
- Human Rights Watch, Human rights watch briefing paper, Background on women's status in Iraq prior to the fall of the Saddam Hussein government, New York 2003, <<http://www.hrw.org/background/wrd/iraq-women.pdf>>.
- Ibn Khaldun, The muqaddimah. An introduction to history, trans. F. Rosenthal, ed. and abridged N. J. Dawood, Princeton, N.J. 1969.
- S. Joseph, Connectivity and patriarchy among urban working-class Arab families in Lebanon, in Ethos 21 (1993), 452–84.
- , The public/private. The imagined boundary in the imagined nation/state/community. The Lebanese case, in Feminist Review 57 (1997), 73–92.
- (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse 2000.
- D. Kandiyoti, Introduction, in D. Kandiyoti (ed.), Women, Islam and the state, London 1991, 1–21.
- N. Keddie, Introduction, in N. Keddie and B. Baron (eds.), Women in Middle Eastern history. Shifting boundaries in sex and gender, New Haven, Conn. 1991, 1–22.
- P. S. Khoury and J. Kostiner, Tribes and state formation in the Middle East, Berkeley 1990.
- M. N. Layoun, Wedded to the land? Gender, boundaries, and nationalism in crisis, Durham, N.C. 2001.
- J. G. Peristiany (ed.), Honour and shame. The values of Mediterranean societies, Chicago 1966.
- J. Peteet, Gender in crisis. Women and the Palestinian resistance movement, New York 1992.
- M. al-Qaddafi, The green book, Part III. The social basis of the third universal theory, Tripoli 1980.
- H. Saghieh, Saddam, manhood and the image, in M. Ghousoub and E. Sinclair-Webb, Imagined masculinities. Male identity and culture in the modern Middle East, London 2000, 236–248.
- K. al-Sakakini, Such am I, o world [in Hebrew], Jerusalem 1990.
- T. Segev, One Palestine, complete. Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate, New York 2001.
- H. Sharabi, Neopatriarchy. A theory of distorted change in Arab society, Oxford 1988, repr. 1992.
- E. Thompson, Colonial citizens. Republican rights, paternal privilege, and gender in French Syria and Lebanon, New York 2000.
- L. Wedeen, Ambiguities of domination. Politics, rhetoric, and symbols in contemporary Syria, Chicago 1999.
- E. R. Wolf, Pathways of power. Building an anthropology of the modern world, Berkeley 2001.

The Ottoman Empire

The Ottoman Empire included diverse ethnic and religious groups that adhered to a variety of kinship practices. To establish legitimacy and power over these groups, the Ottomans regularly co-opted kinship units of the different populations into the organization of the Ottoman state. For example, rival Turkish and Arab tribal groups and leaders were often given regional powers within the Ottoman state apparatus. This tactic allowed the Ottoman Empire to expand its boundaries and its sovereignty over people and resources, even as each of the various ethnic groups was able to maintain a fair amount of autonomy within their respective territories. While the relationship between kinship and state in the Ottoman era is a complex topic, this entry focuses specifically on how the Ottoman dynasty of the classical era (1300–1600) used kinship discourse to help consolidate its power and legitimate itself as the dynasty whose right to rule was mandated by Turkish tradition and by association with the Prophet Muḥammad. This resort to kinship to justify positions of power differentially implicated women in the Ottoman dynasty, depending on the context of the legitimating discourse.

Early in its history the Ottoman dynasty's right to rule over the numerous territories and peoples of Anatolia was repeatedly contested by various rivals. After the Seljuk Turkish sultanate of Anatolia crumbled during the thirteenth century, Mongol invaders and various Turkmen tribes competed for control of the Anatolian lands; the Ottoman tribe emerged as dominant by the end of the fourteenth century. In 1395 the Ottoman ruler Bayezid I sought to reinforce political supremacy in Anatolia by petitioning the 'Abbāsīd emperor for the official title of Şultān al-Rūm (ruler of the Byzantine territories), which was a designation that had traditionally belonged to the Seljuk rulers. But the Mongol leader Tamerlane and his successor Şahruh countered the Ottoman drive for dominance by laying claim to all former Mongol territories in Anatolia gained during the Mongol invasion of the thirteenth century. To frustrate this challenge, the Ottomans produced a long, largely fabricated, genealogy connecting the Ottoman lineage to the ancient and glorious Turkish khans of Central Asia, who were extolled as gazi leaders – that is, warriors in the service of jihad. Early Turkish historians claimed that Osman I (ca. 1299–1324), the founder of the Ottoman Empire, was descended directly from the legendary Oğuz Khān, and that an assembly of Turkish beys of the frontier had formally recognized Osman as the rightful heir to Oğuz's rule. At the same time, the Ottomans purposely revived ancient Turkish traditions to reinforce their connection to the Turkish khans and to justify their claim to the Islamic sultanate of Anatolia and Rum (Byzantine lands).

The practice of fabricating a lineage that connects a current ruler with mythic or ancient rulers is a legitimating practice in many dynastic contexts – both Muslim and non-Muslim – and the Ottomans were no exception. Two points bear emphasizing here. First, the practice of polygyny guaranteed the continuity of the Ottoman lineage. Unlike some monarchies, the Ottoman Empire was entirely identified with the Ottoman dynasty, so that the production of an heir to the throne was of paramount importance not only for the continuity of the dynasty but also for political stability. This problem was easily solved through polygyny, a practice probably derived from Islamic law that gave the Ottoman lineage the necessary flexibility and strength to guarantee many sons and a continuous dynasty.

Second, the lineages drawn up by Turkish historians reflect the fact that the Ottomans were decidedly patrilineal, meaning a child inherited all titles and power from the father while the mother's culture and background were largely inconsequential to a child's identity. By the fifteenth century, the practice of capturing non-Muslim slave women to serve as concubines – and not wives – to the sultan and become mothers of the princes became established, based on the logic that a converted slave woman would not introduce fanatical or heretical religious ideas into the inner sanctum of the palace. Indeed, after Orhan I (ca. 1324–62), only Süleyman the Magnificent (1520–66) chose to marry one of his concubines, his beloved Hürrem Sultan. Whether the sultan's consort served as a wife or a slave-concubine had no effect on the legitimacy of his offspring. What established a child's royal pedigree was not the mother's blood but the father's.

Once the Ottomans were established as the heirs of the Byzantine Empire (after the capture of Constantinople in 1453) and as the seat of the caliphate (after 1517), asserting the Ottoman dynasty's right to rule over far-flung and multiethnic populations remained an important political issue. By the sixteenth century the Ottomans adopted a legitimizing kinship discourse that sought to link the Ottoman house to the house of the Prophet. Certainly the Ottomans could never claim any direct genealogical link to the Prophet and his family, as was common among Muslim rulers throughout the history of Islam. Early Ottomans did assert that their renowned ancestor Oğuz Khān and his descendents were all Muslims, had close contact with early Muslim leaders, and were involved in the spread of Islam from the beginning. Yet the importance of linking the Ottoman dynasty to the Prophet's family was clearly recognized. Rather than connect males (members of the Ottoman bloodline) to the Prophet's lineage, legitimizing discourse adopted the practice of linking the women of the Ottoman house – particularly the concubines and mothers of the sultans – to the women of the Prophet's family, who were also not blood members of the Prophet Muḥammad's lineage. For example, royal Ottoman women were given honorific titles, such as the "Khadija of the age" or were likened to 'Ā'isha, the youngest wife of the Prophet. As Leslie Peirce (1993) has suggested, linking the dynasty to the Prophet's family through women demonstrates a discursive function that royal women, but not royal men, could serve. That is, the royal women could be likened to the Prophet's family precisely because they were not blood members of the Ottoman lineage or house, just as Muḥammad's wives were not members of his lineage. The notion of conversion also played into this. Just as the Ottoman slave concubines were foreign elements who converted to Islam, so were the wives of Muḥammad some of the first converts from paganism to Islam.

In sum, kinship discourse was an important, if not exclusive, means of legitimizing Ottoman power first over the inhabitants of Anatolia and then over the widely dispersed peoples of the Ottoman Empire. In the case of the Ottomans, legitimacy of birth and legitimacy of power were one and the same.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- İ. T. Ahmedî, Dastan ve tevarih-i mümlük-i al-i Osman, in N. Atsız (ed.), Osmanlı tarihleri, Istanbul 1947, 1–35.
 O. Bon, The sultan's seraglio. An intimate portrait of life at the Ottoman court, trans. R. Withers, London 1996 (first published ca. 1650).
 M. N. Mevlana, Kitâb-ı Cihan-nümâ. Neşri tarîhi, 2 vols., ed. F. R. Unat and M. A. Köymen, Ankara 1949–57.
 R. al-D. Ṭabîb, Jāmi' al-tavārikh, trans. Z. V. Togan, Oğuz destanı, Istanbul 1982.
 Turhan Hadice Sultan, Süleymaniye Library 150.
 Tursun Beg, The history of Mehmet the Conqueror, ed. and trans. H. İnalçık and R. Murphey, Minneapolis 1978.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- D. Goffman, The Ottoman Empire and early modern Europe, Cambridge 2002.
 G. Goodwin, The private world of Ottoman women, London 1997.

- C. Imber, The Ottoman dynastic myth, in Turcica 19 (1987), 7–27.
- H. İnalcık, The Ottoman Empire. The classical age 1300–1600, trans. C. Imber and N. Itzkiowitz, London 1973.
- C. Kafadar, Between two worlds. The construction of the Ottoman state, Berkeley 1995.
- L. Peirce, The imperial harem. Women and sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, New York 1993.
- S. J. Shaw, History of the Ottoman Empire and modern Turkey, i, Empire of the Gazis, Cambridge 1976.

KIM SHIVELY

Southeast Asia, East Asia, Australia, and the Pacific

Recent transformations in many countries of the Asia-Pacific region, home to the world's largest Muslim population, have dramatically reconfigured gender relations. In both Muslim majority and Muslim minority nations, the complex interplays between development (often state-led), consumer capitalist culture, economy, polity, and religious practice have had profound implications for women's and men's everyday lived experiences, and for wider processes of identity formation. Expanding education, the entry of large numbers of women into modern labor sectors, rapidly rising ages at marriage, the decline of arranged marriages, changing divorce rates, and birth rates declining well below replacement level in a number of countries, notably Japan, Singapore, and Thailand, have all meant widening opportunities for some women, and deepening exploitation for others. Women have been important political actors, especially in their engagements with states over issues of family law and violence against women; but they have also frequently found themselves placed ideologically by state nation-building projects and media as keepers of family and bearers of cultural and national identity and honor (Ong and Peletz 1995, Sen and Stevens 1998, Edwards and Roces 2000).

Although the so-called Malay World contains the world's largest Muslim population, it is often treated as peripheral within discussions of Islam. Muslims, however, account for over 88 percent of Indonesia's 220 million inhabitants, 65 percent of Malaysia's 23.27 million population, the majority of Brunei's 300,000 plus population, 14 percent of Singapore's 4 million population, and are a significant presence in the Southern Philippines and Southern Thailand. Indeed, Malay identity in Malaysia and Singapore is synonymous with being a Muslim. Outside the Malay World, in other parts of Southeast Asia, in East Asia and in Australasia, Muslims form important minorities (although Glad-ney has counseled against understanding the concept of "minority" to imply any simple idea of marginality, 1991).

The intensifying Islamization of the last few decades has had particular implications for Muslim women, especially in the area of personal laws. From the colonial period, issues concerning Muslim women's situation and Islamic family law have formed a site of extensive social and cultural contests in both the majority and minority societies of the region, with divisions within communities of believers between conservative and modernist, liberal forces. Debates around polygamy and divorce have been especial concerns. In Indonesia, Malaysia, and the Philippines, for example, colonial legal apparatuses set up separate spheres for Islamic family law, alongside the remnants of customary law (adat) and the new civil laws. This often produced confusing, contradictory, and disparate legal systems, with an overall lack of uniformity of laws and their application (ADB 2002). It is notable, however, that the everyday kinship practices of most Muslim social groups within the Malay World are in fact often strongly female-centered, in contrast to dominant images of Muslim family life in global discourses. Although the complexities of modernity have greatly modified the underlying bilateral and female-centered kinship patterns, these continue to have significance.

Recent Islamization has also brought new sources of identity and identity politics: in embracing a "revived" Islam, many women have become important new religious agents in their own right, and shapers of contemporary local, regional, and globalizing Islam. But women's long-term significance as religious agents, both acting as such, and in instructing the young from generation to generation, has not been adequately recognized either in political spheres or in scholarship.

MUSLIM MAJORITIES

It is often argued that women in the Malay World possess a degree of relative autonomy that contrasts with women's experiences in East and Southeast Asia: it is suggested that East Asian kinship and family relations have tended to be more male centered and patriarchal, whereas Southeast Asian kinship has mostly been bilateral (kinship links traced through both males and females), according greater gender equality in inheritance. These advantages are ascribed to women's economic importance in the precolonial economies of the region. Such categorizations, however, can oversimplify the complex histories of interrelationships between gender, indigenous kinship relations, state, and religious ideologies and practices from the colonial period onwards: the long and cosmopolitan history of the region, especially the Malay World's position at the crossroads of East and West, has produced enormous social diversity and complexity. Moreover, the model of the autonomous woman has given way in recent decades to more critical versions, in which women's previous autonomy is often assumed to be undermined by intensifying social change.

Kinship patterns in the Malay World fall into several categories historically: a majority bilateral principle, which has often favored the female side, especially in residence patterns; systems of marriage exchange like those of eastern Indonesia; and a unilineal kinship pattern, which includes the more male emphasis of Balinese kinship practices, and the famous matrilineal practices of the Minangkabau of West Sumatra in Indonesia (population of nearly 4 million in 1990) and their small daughter society Negeri Sembilan in Malaysia, who trace descent through women. In rural areas the elementary or extended family has normally been the basic unit of production and consumption, even when several such families co-reside (Bowen 1992).

Anthropologists emphasize the ways in which this bilateral kinship grid has underlain diverse kinship beliefs and practices, supporting relatively egalitarian ideas of gender across the region (Bowen 1992). They also underline the importance of sibling relationships within these systems. Thus everyday inheritance practices have frequently emphasized both the male and female sides, although they have also reworked into local patterns the formal requirements of both Muslim law and local kinship (Stivens 1996). In Minangkabau, for example, scholars have seen a long-term accommodation between the female-focused adat (customary law) and Islamic rules (Blackwood 2000). Naming, however, mostly follows the Muslim practice of tracing descent from the father. There is disagreement about the extent of male authority in households historically, although many researchers view colonial and modern states as frequently supporting the rights of males in households over those of females.

Muslim patterns of marriage and fertility in Southeast Asia are distinctive. They share the regional pattern of rising ages at marriage and falling birth rates, but divorce trends have deviated from the assumed "modern" patterns characterizing the West: the very high rates of the 1950s, especially in the first years of marriage, have declined to rates that are in some cases only a third of those in the West (Jones 1994). The possible causes are highly complex and variable, but include growth in incomes, rising ages at marriage, and the decline of arranged marriages (ibid.). Muslim populations mostly have fertility rates above the prevailing averages, although their birth rates have also been falling. Contemporary Muslim women clearly experience in common with other women in the region the relentless pressures between rising demands both at home and at work caused by modern economic developments and globalization. Negotiations within households around these demanding domestic labor divisions, especially among "modern" middle-class dual income families, are growing. Latterly, governments under pressure to acknowledge some of the realities of modern gender divisions, have incorporated more images of the working woman into representations of women, as in Indonesia (Sen and Stivens 1998). But negotiations within households can also be forestalled, as among the middle classes in Malaysia and Singapore, where the employment of domestic workers has reshaped the domestic arena. Often recruited from neighboring countries such as Indonesia and the Philippines, these workers have joined other waves of transnational migration in facing sizeable risks of abuse and exploitation.

There has been a long history of women's organizations working for women's interests in pre- and post-independent Indonesia and Malay(si)a. Muslim women have been particularly active in past and contemporary campaigns to reform Islamic family law, especially divorce and polygyny provisions. Campaigns against domestic violence have been a feature of the last decade. In Indonesia, the government established the National Commission on Anti-Violence against Women in October 1998, with a draft bill working its way toward enactment. In Malaysia the Domestic Violence Act of 1994 came into effect in 1996. Groups engaged in campaigns for sexuality rights have also arisen, including Pink Triangle in Malaysia and Gaya Nusantara in Indonesia. The activities of reformist groups like the Sisters in Islam in Malaysia promoting a social justice agenda within Islam have been especially important in forging new public spaces for Muslim women intellectuals and activists.

MUSLIM MINORITIES

Muslims form important sectors of the population in the other countries under discussion, where their integration has long been contentious politically: there have been active separatist movements in the Philippines, Thailand, and Burma, for example. In the Philippines, Muslims comprise an estimated 5–7 percent of the total population of 82 million, concentrated on the southern islands. In Thailand, Muslims constitute an estimated 5–10 percent of the 62 million population: a significant population of Malay-speaking Muslims in Southern Thailand share cultural and historical ties with Malays, which have been promoted within a recent ethnic resurgence; in Indochina as well, the Cham, many of whom are Muslim, have formed an important minority (Nakamura 1999). Nakamura also describes Indian Muslims in Indochina, who form small groups there, as in many other parts of Southeast and East Asia.

Philippine, Thai, and Singapore Malay Muslim family and kinship practices follow versions of the basic insular Southeast Asian bilateral, extended, female-focused kinship patterns, but as in Indonesia and Malaysia, there are separate family law provisions for Muslims in each of these countries. In the areas affected by separatist movements, however, there has been extensive disruption of family and kinship patterns. There is little focused information on the kinship practices of Muslims in Indochina, although Nakamura has reported female-centered kinship and family patterns among the Cham (1999; see also EWIC I, 228–31).

The 1990 census in China lists 17.6 million Muslims in China, mainly in the northwest and central provinces. Jaschok and Shui (2000) note how Islamic law defines the relationship between husband and wife in a way that overlaps with Chinese “traditional” (sic) practices, granting men a range of rights over women in households. Jaschok and Shui see women’s engagement in the post-revolutionary, modern labor force as bringing a greater degree of equality, and divorces, once infrequent, are on the rise. They argue that Muslim women’s instrumentality in China, especially within female mosques, preserves and invigorates the faith. Gladney also sees Hui Muslim Chinese marriage networks across large geographical distances as an important way of preserving cultural identity (1991, 255). In the other East Asian countries, Muslim numbers are small, and information sparse, although transnational migrants, such as Indonesian domestic workers, are a growing presence in places such as Hong Kong.

Among the 280,000 Muslims in Australia (from 70 countries), women have higher than average post-school qualifications and involvement in non-standard occupations, marry at a younger age than average, and divorce more frequently, with Islamic beliefs around marriage and divorce subjected to Australian family law (Saeed 2003). Muslim women have been active in organizations, including the influential Muslim women’s National Network of Australia. Saeed notes that there is extensive disagreement among Australian Muslims about women’s roles, especially segregation and dress codes (2003).

In the Pacific, the main Muslim presence is the 16 percent of Indo-Fijians who are Muslim. (Descendants of indentured plantation labor, Indo-Fijians comprise 44 percent of Fiji’s 830,000 population.) There is little focused material on Indo-Fijian gender, family, and kinship relations, but Lateef (1993) reports the re-establishment in the diaspora of some patterns from India, extensive change in family and kinship patterns recently with modernization, a persistence of arranged marriage (albeit via marriage bureaus), and growing numbers of love marriages which parents still try to contain. Women’s groups have highlighted issues of domestic and ethnically-based violence toward Indo-Fijian women.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- ADB (Asian Development Bank), Sociolegal status of women in Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, and Thailand, Poverty Reduction and Social Development Division, Poverty and Social Development Paper No. 1, January 2002, <http://www.adb.org/Documents/Studies/Sociolegal_Status_Women/sociolegal.pdf> Publication.
- D. J. Banks, Malay kinship, Philadelphia 1983.
- E. Blackwood, Webs of power. Women, kin, and community in a Sumatran village, Lanham, Md. 2000.
- J. R. Bowen, Family and kinship in Indonesia, in M. L. Cohen (ed.), Asia. Case studies in the social sciences. A guide for teaching, Armonk, N.Y. 1992.
- L. Edwards and M. Rocas (eds.), Women in Asia. Tradition, modernity and globalisation, St. Leonards, N.S.W. 2000.
- D. Gladney, Muslim Chinese. Ethnic nationalism in the People’s Republic, Cambridge, Mass. 1991.
- M. Jaschok and Shui J.J., The history of women’s mosques in Chinese Islam. A mosque of their own, Richmond, Surrey 2000.
- G. W. Jones, Marriage and divorce in Islamic South-east Asia, Kuala Lumpur 1994.
- S. Lateef, Indo-Fijian marriage in Suva. A little love, a little romance, and a visa, in R. A. Marksby (ed.), The business of marriage. Transformations in Oceanic matrimony, Pittsburgh 1993, 205–23.
- R. Nakamura, Cham in Vietnam. Dynamics of ethnicity, Ph.D. diss., Department of Anthropology, University of Washington 1999.
- A. Ong and M. G. Peletz, Bewitching women, pious men. Gender and body politics in Southeast Asia, Berkeley 1995.
- A. Saeed, Islam in Australia, St. Leonards, N.S.W. 2003.
- P. Saihoo, Social organization of an inland Malay village community in Southern Thailand (with emphasis on the pattern of leadership), D Phil. thesis, University of Oxford 1974.

- K. Sen and M. Stivens (eds.), Gender and power in affluent Asia, London 1998.
- M. Stivens, Matriliney and modernity. Sexual politics and social change in rural Malaysia, St. Leonards, N.S.W 1996.

MAILA STIVENS

Kinship: Milk

Overview

This entry examines the legal-ethical rules and practices, prevalent in Muslim societies, past and present, which stem from the idea that transmission of milk from a nursing woman to a strange (that is, another woman's) nursling creates impediments to marriage.

The idea that the relations created through lactation between a nurse and her (strange) nursling are similar, from the viewpoint of prohibitions of marriage, to blood relations, is based on a pre-Islamic Arabic concept. In Arabic medical writings of the classical period of Islam this idea was supported by the notion, found in ancient Greek learned medicine, that the breast milk is formed of the blood of the mother's womb undergoing, after birth, a slight change in the breasts. It was, moreover, believed that the milk influenced not only the physical as well as psychological traits of the nurse's own offspring but also those of her strange nurslings. Documenting milk kinship is, therefore, essential in drawing the social map of relationships in Islamic societies.

Like their counterparts in the first centuries of Islam, Muslim doctors and jurists today encourage mothers to breastfeed their own babies. Maternal lactation for relatively long periods of time was and still is very popular (as emerges from recent child and family health surveys), particularly in village societies, in the Muslim world. It plays, however, a less important role nowadays among mothers of the urban elites.

Early Islamic religious and medical writings supported voluntary non-maternal lactation by relatives, friends, neighbors, and the like, and allowed for mercenary wet nursing, viewing both as the most acceptable alternative when the mother herself proved incapable of breastfeeding her own infant. As shown by recent ethnographic and anthropological studies, no less than in the past Muslims today are well aware of the legal-moral implications of non-maternal lactation. Similarly, contemporary religious scholars, particularly in the fatwas they issue on the subject, but also Muslim physicians, reveal a great concern for impediments to marriage through milk kinship. For instance, unlike in the West, milk banks in Muslim countries remain largely a theoretical issue because pooling the milk of several donors for potential, as yet unknown, consumers precludes the possibility of establishing legal marriage ties. Still, the issue is widely discussed because it serves as a useful foil when it comes to outlining the legal ramifications of milk kinship.

By adding milk mothers and milk sisters to the list of those with whom a man may not have sexual relations, the Qur'an, in a single verse, laid down the foundation for the Islamic rules of milk kinship: "Forbidden to you are your mothers, your daughters, your sisters, your parental aunts, brothers' daughters, sisters' daughters, those who are your mothers by having suckled you, those who are your sisters by suckling" (4:23, English translation by Richard Bell). Thus, following pre-Islamic Arabic custom, the Qur'an extended the range of incest beyond its definition in Judaism and Christianity.

Qur'an exegeses in the first centuries of Islam regard this verse, which mentions only a milk mother and milk sisters, as intended to duplicate for milk relationships the list of those blood relatives with whom a Muslim man is forbidden to contract marriage. According to this widely accepted concept which was, in fact, adopted by Islamic law, a man is forbidden to marry his milk niece (maternal and paternal), milk aunt, milk daughter, and the milk mother of his wife. He is also forbidden to have simultaneous intimate relationships with women who are milk sisters.

Hadith reports attributed to the Prophet Muḥammad and his companions add another dimension to this idea by postulating a connection between the nurse's milk and her husband's semen: it is the man's semen that causes the breast milk to flow in the woman it made pregnant. The man, therefore, is the actual "owner" of the milk as the term "sire's milk" (laban al-fahl) indicates. This means, among other things, that suckling creates ties similar to blood ties not only between the nursling and his or her (strange) nurse but also between the nursling, on the one hand, and the nurse's husband and his relatives, on the other. Thus, for instance, a woman and a man who, in their infancy, separately suckled from two women unrelated to one another but married to the same husband are not allowed to get married since, as Mālik b. Anas (the eponym of the Mālikī school of law, d. 795 C.E.) puts it, "the semen which impregnated both [wet nurses] and which was the source of the milk of both was one and . . . the two sucklings had thus become as though they were the children of the two women's husband" (1977, 414).

By enabling it to form the basis for a complex and ramified network of impediments to marriage, Islamic law made non-maternal breastfeeding play an important role in much wider circles of social life. Firstly, it influenced the way in which relations between different families were established. Like adoption in other societies, Islam emphasized the importance of milk relationships as a means to create legal pseudo-familial relations with people or groups outside the original framework of kinship. Breastfeeding was practiced in the early Islamic community so as to broaden the network of relatives on whom one could rely for assistance and cooperation. Assuming that the Prophet Muḥammad's biographies reflect patterns of social behavior in the first centuries of Islam, one may conclude that wet nursing functioned as a means of creating relations, for instance, between sedentary communities and the tribes of the desert. The Prophet's biography by Ibn Ishāq and Ibn Hishām (eighth-ninth centuries C.E.) gives detailed information about the ancestry of Muḥammad's Beduin milk parents – Ḥalīma and her husband of the Banū Sa'd b. Bakr – as if they were his blood parents. There are indications to the effect that breastfeeding was continually used for the purpose of establishing relations between strange families. Ibn Bābawayh, the Shī'ī scholar of the tenth century, no doubt had this in mind when he distinguished between wet nurses who offer their services to make a living and those who seek nurslings to gain nobility and glory.

Second, by creating milk kinship with neighbors, who often would be members of the same extended family, non-maternal breastfeeding probably led to a reduction in endogamous marriages, in any case limited by the Qur'ān to paternal cousins only. Ḥadīth reports tell us how Muslims, including the Prophet Muḥammad himself, had to cancel marriage plans, or even break off existing marriage ties, because a milk relationship was found to exist between the two people involved. A survey of the fatwas section of Majallat al-Azhar, the monthly periodical issued by al-Azhar University in Cairo, shows that such situations are also familiar to Muslim societies today. It seems that in early Islam believers were encouraged to seek their marriage partners beyond the boundaries of their own patrilineal-patrilocal extended families so as to consolidate a larger community based not only on blood ties but also on common values and aims.

Third, establishing milk relationships with neighboring families creates semi-private spaces which allow women greater freedom of conduct, for instance, to appear unveiled and do work like cooking and washing clothes outside their houses.

It was the effect non-maternal nursing had in obstructing the common practice of paternal cousin marriages which probably aroused reservations even among the early representatives of the "great tradition" of Islam. Being loyal to local patrilineal-patriarchal traditions, quite a few of them began to look for ways to reduce the effect of the rules on prohibitions of marriage. Thus, there are ḥadīth reports which exclude "suckling a grown-up" (riḍā'at al-kabīr), claiming that as far as impediments to marriage are concerned only the suckling of infants not older than two years, that is, suckling intended to "stave off hunger" is effective. Two years, the formal minimal period of nursing, according to Qur'ān 2:233, is regarded as crucial for the physical development of the infant. Establishing the minimum number of suckling sessions that, within the first two years of a nursling's life, would guarantee milk kinship was another source of discord. There was, on the one hand, the notion, based on a literal interpretation of Qur'ān 4:23, that a single suck, of even one drop of milk, was enough to create impediment of marriage between the nursling and its nurse and her relatives. On the other hand, a group of ḥadīth reports claimed that no less than five, or even ten successive sucklings are required to create milk bonds.

The tension between these two tendencies, namely, to reduce the occurrence of the rules concerning prohibitions of marriage by making boundary conditions, on the one hand, and to stick to the more comprehensive attitude of the ḥadīth in this regard, on the other, is well reflected in legal (shar'ī) writings. Muslim jurists in their collections of positive law (furū'), fatwas, and nawāzil (real-life cases and the way they resolve them) from the eighth-ninth centuries onwards devoted long and detailed discussions to milk kinship. This is in an environment of a fully developed Muslim urban civilization outside the Arab peninsula, where mercenary professional wet nursing, for instance, was probably common within the circles of the elite. Among the legal questions they dealt with in this context were: is there symmetry between blood relationships and milk relationships as far as prohibitions of marriage are concerned or not? Are milk relationships created between strange nurslings and the nurse's husband, the actual owner of the milk, and his relatives? Which ways of transmitting milk from a nurse to a nursling create an impediment to marriage? Is it direct suckling from the nurse's breast to the nursling's mouth only or also other, indirect ways, such as pouring milk from the breasts of a woman into a strange infant's mouth with no act of sucking, giving an infant the milk of a strange woman from a vessel, feeding an infant with bread or with other kinds of food mixed with a strange woman's milk, or pouring strange woman's milk into an infant's nose, eye, ear, and so forth? What is the minimal number of sucklings that create an impediment to marriage? What is the maximal age at which breastfeeding creates an impediment to marriage? Does the absorption of the milk of a dead woman create an impediment to marriage? Legal discussions on these themes reveal there was much disagreement among those Muslim jurists who tried to define exactly under which circumstances breastfeeding created impediments to marriage. Fatwas, in many cases reflecting aspects of daily life, are an indication of the relevance of these questions in Muslim societies throughout premodern times.

In Shī'i Islam, the rules of milk kinship were developed along more or less the same lines as in the Sunnī law. However, the discussion of milk kinship in the writings of contemporary religious scholars in Iran reveals some differences. For instance, according to Ayatollah Khomeini, a minimum of fifteen suckling sessions in succession are needed to create a milk relationship between a nursling and a non-maternal nurse, and the milk must be suckled at the breast. Moreover, it is recommended that the wet nurse be a practicing Twelver Imāmī Shī'i Muslim. In practice, non-maternal nurses have been employed in contemporary Iran only when it was absolutely essential and attention has been paid to avoid the choice of a wet nurse that could affect future marriage arrangements.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- S. Altorki, Milk-kinship in Arab society. An unexplored problem in the ethnography of marriage, in Ethnology 19 (1980), 233–44.
- Bahrain, Ministry of Health, Bahrain child health survey 1989, managing editor S. Farid, Manama 1992.
- G. J. Ebrahim, Cross-cultural aspects of breast-feeding, in Ciba Foundation, Breast-feeding and the mother, Amsterdam 1976, 195–204.
- A. Giladi, Breastfeeding in medieval Islamic thought. A preliminary study of legal and medical writings, in Journal of Family History 23 (1998), 107–23.
- , Infants, parents and wet nurses. Medieval Islamic views on breastfeeding and their social implications, Leiden 1999.
- F. Héritier, Les deux sœurs et leur mère. Anthropologie de l'inceste, Paris 1994.
- A. al-Kaḥlāwī, Bunūk al-laban. Shubuhāt ḥawla bunūk al-laban. Dirāsa fiqhīyya muqārana, Cairo 1998.
- J. Khatib-Chahidi, Milk kinship in Shī'ite Islamic Iran, in V. Maher (ed.), The anthropology of breast-feeding. Natural law or social construct, Oxford 1992, 109–32.
- , Sexual prohibitions, shared space and fictive marriages in Shī'ite Iran in S. Ardener (ed.), Women and space. Ground rules and social maps, London 1981, 112–35.
- V. Maher, Breast-feeding in cross-cultural perspective. Paradoxes and proposals, in V. Maher (ed.), The anthropology of breast-feeding. Natural law or social construct, Oxford 1992, 1–35.
- Mālik b. Anas, al-Muwatta', n.p. 1977.
- ‘A. M. al-Najjār, Mawqif al-islām min bank laban al-ummahāt, in Majallat al-Azhar 59 (1986), 447–55.
- Oman, Ministry of Health, Oman child health survey, ed. M. J. Suleiman, A. al-Ghassany, and S. Farid, Muscat 1992.
- Oman, Ministry of Health, and Council of Health Ministers of GCC States, Oman family health survey 1995. Principal Report, ed. A. J. M. Suleiman, A. al-Riyami, and S. Farid, Muscat 1996.
- Qatar, Ministry of Health, Qatar child health survey, ed. A. Salman, K. al-Jaber, and S. Farid, Doha 1991.
- Saudi Arabia, Ministry of Health, Saudi Arabia child health survey, ed. Y. al-Mazrou and S. Farid, Riyadh 1991.
- J. Schacht, J. Burton, and J. Chelhod, Raḍā' or Riḍā'a, Encyclopaedia of Islam, new ed., viii, 361–2.
- United Arab Emirates, United Arab Emirates child health survey, ed. A. al-Muhaideb et al., Abu Dhabi 1991.

Kurdish Women

Overview

“Kurdish women” are members of a non-state nation, the Kurds, who have lived since ancient times in their homeland, Kurdistan, a contiguous territory divided, since 1918, among the neighboring countries of Turkey (southeast), Iran (northwest), Iraq (north), and Syria (northeast). They also live in small and large communities scattered outside Kurdistan in each of the four countries, in Caucasus and Central Asia, and as refugee and immigrant communities in Lebanon, Europe, North America, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, and other countries.

In the absence of census figures, estimates of the size of the Kurdish population vary between 25 and 35 million, making them the fourth largest ethnic people of the Middle East, outnumbered by Arabs, Turks, and Persians. While the population is densely Kurdish, other peoples such as Armenians, Assyrians, and Jews have lived in Kurdistan.

The Kurds are often depicted in both the Middle East and the West as a “nomadic and tribal Muslim people.” However, Kurdish society, throughout its recorded history, has been complex, including tribal-nomadic, rural-feudal, and urban non-agrarian social and economic formations. It is now highly differentiated in terms of social class, profession, religion, politics, and culture. The majority religion is Sunnī Islam, with minorities such as Shīʿīs, ʿAlawīs, Yazīdīs, and Ahl-e Haqq.

The two powerful empires of the region, Ottoman Turkey and Iran, engaged in unceasing wars for the control of Kurdistan, and divided it into two parts in 1639, but failed, until the mid-1850s, to overthrow Kurdish mini-states and semi-independent principalities. Kurdish political life has so far been characterized by, often concurrently, statehood and statelessness (for a general history, see McDowall 2000; for a pictorial history, see Meiselas 1997).

KURDISH WOMEN: A HISTORICAL SKETCH

Our knowledge about the early history of Kurdish women is limited by both the dearth of records and the near absence of research. Sharaf-Nāmi, the first history of the Kurds, written in 1597 by the Kurdish prince Sharaf al-Dīn Bidlīsī, is a chronicle of Kurdish dynasties, mini-states, and principalities. More or less silent on women and non-princely classes, it makes references to the women of the ruling landowning class, and their exclusion from public life and the exercise of state power. According to this source, the Kurds, following the Islamic tradition, took four wives and, if they could afford it, four maids or slave girls (jāriyya). This regime of polygyny was, however, practiced by a minority, which included primarily the members of the ruling landowning class, the nobility, and the religious establishment. Daughters and sisters were given or exchanged in marriage as a means of settling wars and blood feuds. When one side was defeated, the victor took over the women of the enemy as booty and as proof of the humiliating defeat of the adversary. Although state power was exercised only by males, Bidlīsī mentions three women who, after losing their husbands, assumed the reins of power in order to transfer it to their sons upon their adulthood. While generally referring to women using degrading words such as “weakling,” Bidlīsī extols the ability of the three women to rule in the manner of males, and calls one of them a “lioness” (Bidlīsī 1964, 33, 176, 184, 226, 228, 497, 508).

In the mid-seventeenth century, the Turkish traveler Evliya Çelebi confirmed the picture depicted by Sharaf-Nāmi. He was associated with the Ottoman court, and stayed in a number of Kurdish cities as the guest of Kurdish rulers. In the court of the powerful Bidlis principality, he found the female members of the prince’s family, together with maids or slave girls, confined to the harem. Apparently exaggerating, he noted that women were not allowed into the marketplace, and would be killed if they went there. At the same time, Çelebi noted that in Kurdish principalities where rule was hereditary, women did occasionally assume power, to the extent that the Ottoman state accepted the succession of a male ruler by a female in Kurdistan (Çelebi 1990, Bruinessen 1991).

By the mid-nineteenth century, Mela Maḥmūd Bayazīdī, a learned mullah, provided the first Kurdish account of the life of women in tribal, nomadic, and rural communities. In his Customs and Manners of the Kurds (1858–9), he noted that the majority of marriages were monogamous. Women did not veil, and together with men participated in production work as well as singing, dancing, and other entertainment. Nomadic women did all the work related to animal husbandry, which was the main source of livelihood. When the tribe was attacked, women took part in war alongside men. They were “unique” in so far as they were, simultaneously, men’s “wives, slaves, and guards” as well as fighters. By contrast, settled rural women were not as courageous, and were much less involved in agricultural production. Nomadic and rural women were, according to Bāyazīdī, as free as the women of Europe in socializing with men. However, the family would kill them with impunity if they engaged in or were suspected of extra- or pre-marital sexual relations. The goal was to instill fear in women so that they refrained from such “bad deeds.” Elopement was also punished by death, although compromise was usually reached if the couple could take sanctuary with a tribal chief, a respected or religious figure, and seek mediation. Documenting male domination in Kurdistan, Bāyazīdī believed: “Kurdish women are much wiser, accomplished, perceptive and humane than men. They are very affectionate and very compassionate with those from other lands and strangers” (Bāyazīdī 1963, 138–9, also 75, 98, 115, 174, 180–1).

Kurdish oral tradition, collected since the latter part of the nineteenth century, depicts a complex regime of gender relations. In oral literature, one finds both the patriarchal regime presented in the written sources cited earlier, and a tribal quasi-matriarchal order in, for instance, Beytî Las û Xezal (Ballad of Las and Khazal). In this ballad, two women, each the ruler of a tribe, openly compete over a lover, a man who chooses one and freely socializes with the other. In patriarchal contexts, peasant women are subjected to the violence of male feudal lords, for example, in Beytî Kake Mîr û Kake Şêx (Ballad of Kaka Mîr and Kak Sheikh, both texts in Mann 1906). At the same time, women resist being sold as property or exchanged in marriage in the interests of the male members of the family. This resistance takes the form of eloping with their lovers, an act which may risk their lives, for example, Beytî Xec û Syamend (Ballad of Khaj and Syamand), or leaving their family and tribe in search of their lovers, for example, Beytî Şor Mehmûd û Merzîngan (Ballad of Shor Mahmud and Marzîngan, text in Fattâhî Qāḏî 1970). Proverbs, too, treat women in conflicting, though patriarchal, ways, ranging from “source of life” to “pain” (Rohat 1994). The Kurdish language, like other languages studied so far, is lexically and semantically androcentric, sexist, and misogynist (Hassanpour 2001).

Western travelers and scholars have found Kurdish women notably different from other “Muslim” or “Oriental” women. Although travel literature points to the existence of harems and gender segregation in upper-class families, it finds Kurdish rural women enjoying more freedom than their Arab, Persian, and Turkish sisters. The evidence cited in support of this relative freedom includes, among other things, the absence of veiling, free association with males including strangers and guests, and a list of female rulers (Galletti 2001).

The majority of women lived, until the late twentieth century, in rural areas. Unlike rural women, urban women, especially in well-to-do families, were largely confined to the domestic realm. Until the late twentieth century, the majority of women were illiterate. Literacy was limited to the all-male clergy, scribes, and certain members of the feudal and mercantile classes; however, women in these social milieus acquired literacy through private tutoring. Thus, a few female names appear in the list of poets who lived before the First World War. The only well-known intellectual, Mâh Sharaf Khānum, known as Mastura Kurdîstani (1805–47), was a member of the court of Ardalān principality. She was a poet, writer of a brief work on Islamic doctrine, and is known as the first female historian of the Middle East. A considerable part of her poetry laments the untimely death of her husband, the young ruler of the principality (Mâh Sharaf Khānum 1948). In her work, there is no evidence of consciousness about gender inequality or women’s rights (Mojab 2001e).

WOMEN, NATIONALISM, AND THE NATION-STATE

The fall of Kurdish principalities eliminated the last trace of Kurdish self-rule, and extended Ottoman and Iranian power over all parts of Kurdistan; however, rural areas and their population remained largely under the control of tribal and feudal chiefs. This centralization of state power was part of the administrative, financial, and military reforms in the latter half of the nineteenth century. The reforms occurred, in part, due to the pressure from emerging liberal-minded elites and nascent democratic movements, and, to some extent, under the pressure of Western powers interested in a safe environment for their economic pursuits.

The constitutionalization of monarchical regimes in Ottoman Turkey (1876 and 1908–9) and Iran (1906) did not immediately turn the subjects (raʿāyā) into citizens. Inspired by European constitutions, the Iranian and Ottoman documents denied women full citizenship. The emerging nation-state was, like its Western counterparts, a male entity, which denied women the right to participate in the exercise of state power. Women were expected to contribute to nation-building primarily by producing and nurturing good sons and daughters. While state power remained male gendered, it was also ethnicized on the basis of Turkish ethnic identity. In the same vein, the Iranian state emerged as a patriarchal unitary regime centered on Persian ethnicity.

In the wake of the defeat of the Ottoman state in 1918, Ottoman Kurdistan was re-divided, and incorporated into the newly formed states of Iraq (under British rule, 1918–32) and Syria (under French rule, 1920–46), and Turkey. The small Kurdish population of Russia came under Soviet rule by 1921. The five states – Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Syria, and the Soviet Union – pursued different policies in integrating women into their nation-building projects, and thus shaped the lives of Kurdish women in diverse ways.

Modern state- and nation-building has often entailed the use of violence. In this region, identified as a “zone of genocide” (Levene 1998), the Ottoman regime and the Republic of Turkey eliminated the Armenian and Assyrian peoples in the course of genocidal campaigns from the late nineteenth century to 1923. Beginning in 1917, the government forcibly moved hundreds of thousands of Kurds to the western parts of the country; many perished during these operations. State violence in the form of genocide, ethnocide, linguicide, or ethnic cleansing continued throughout the twentieth century in republican Turkey, in Iraq under the Ba’th regime, and, to varying degrees, in other countries (Fernandes 1999). The gender dimension of this violence has not received adequate research attention.

WOMEN IN THE KURDISH NATIONALIST PROJECT

Nationalist and feminist consciousness emerged, more or less simultaneously, in the Ottoman Empire in the latter part of the nineteenth century. The Kurdish aristocrats and intellectuals exiled in Istanbul formed literary, political, and journalistic circles, which promoted the idea of a distinct Kurdish nation with claims to self-rule within the Ottoman state. The circle, led by the uprooted Badir Khan rulers of Botan principality, launched the first Kurdish newspaper in Cairo in 1898. One of the members of this group, Haji Qadir Koyi (1817?–97), a mullah and poet, emerged later as the ideologue of Kurdish nationalism. He encouraged the Kurds to embrace modern science and education, and learn from the national liberation movements of the time. Part of his modernist politics was advocacy of women’s education. Referring to the Prophet Muḥammad’s saying that Muslims should search for knowledge by going as far as China, Koyi addressed the Kurds: “There is no difference between males and females in this saying, if the mullah forbids it [women’s education], he is a non-believer” (Koyi 1986, 186–7). The emerging modernist Kurdish intelligentsia, mostly males, developed this nascent idea of gender equality into a full-fledged nationalist discourse on the Woman Question between the 1908 constitutional revolution and the formation of the Turkish Republic in 1923.

For the intelligentsia, the Kurds constituted a nation because they possessed a homeland, a distinct language, a literary tradition, and their own culture and history. They conferred on women a prominent role in these early efforts to map the conditions of a modern Kurdish nation. Women constituted half the nation, and had to be equal to men in rights and privileges. Moreover, women, especially those in rural areas, were the bearers of genuine Kurdish language and culture, which distinguished the Kurds from the Turks, and conferred on them national rights including self-determination. Rural women were the embodiment of a distinct nation in so far as they enjoyed more freedom than Muslim Turkish women, and at the same time were bearers of a pure language and culture not tainted by the Turkification rampant in the cities. However, women whose illiteracy and domestic life had protected them from assimilation into the dominant nation had to be educated so that they could contribute to Kurdish nation-building (Klein 2001). Religion was not a constituent of nationhood and womanhood since the Kurds were, like their adversary, the Ottoman state, predominantly Muslims. Nationalists founded the first Kurdish women’s organization (Kürd Kadımları: Teali Cemiyeti, Society for the advancement of Kurdish women) in 1919 in Istanbul where the size of the Kurdish population had been growing due to forced migrations and war (Alakom 1995).

THE REPUBLIC OF TURKEY (SINCE 1923)

Turkish nationalists led by an army officer, Mustafa Kemal Pasha, later celebrated as Atatürk, “Father of the Turks,” defeated the invading foreign armies, and declared the formation of the Republic of Turkey in 1923. Formally abolishing the Ottoman regime, Atatürk replaced it by a secular, Western-type, and nationalist order based on Turkish ethnic identity. Women were assigned a special role in this project, which included reforms such as the separation of state and religion, and Westernization of dress and calendar. Unveiled women, studying in coeducational institutions and participating in public life, and universal suffrage (as of 1934) were the hallmark of the modernizing state.

The Kemalist project of building a unitary, secular, and ethnically Turkish nation-state met with considerable resistance from Kurdish religious and nationalist leaders. A series of revolts from 1925 to 1938 were brutally suppressed. The suppression of the Dersim revolt of 1937–8 has been identified as genocide. The army targeted males and females, and many women committed suicide in order to escape rape and abuse (McDowall 2000, 207–10, van Bruinessen 2000). Ethnic cleansing projects included forced resettlements of Kurds in western provinces, the banning of all expressions of Kurdish identity including the names “Kurd” and “Kurdistan,” and the criminalization of the use of the Kurdish language. All Kurdish organizations, including the women’s society of 1919, and publishing disappeared after the 1925 revolt.

Official propaganda and the media identified Kurdish resistance to Turkification as tribalism, feudalism, religious fanaticism, reactionary politics, backwardness, and banditry, all directed against a civilizing state. The emancipated women of the republic were recruited to highlight the civilizing role of the Turkish nation. Sabiha Gökçen, an adopted daughter of Atatürk, was promoted as the world’s first woman combat pilot, who dropped the bomb that killed the leader of the Dersim revolt, and brought it to a successful end (Mojab 2001c). The only alternative open to Kurds, women or men, was to discard their national or ethnic identity, and become Turks.

In assessing eight decades of nationalist intervention in gender relations, Turkey’s feminists of a critical persuasion argue that male dominance and patriarchal structures remain intact in spite of the progress made in legal equality and the remarkable advances in women’s access to the public domains of life (Arat 1994, Müftüler-Bac 1999). If state feminism failed to displace patriarchy in Turkey, it also failed to assimilate Kurdish women into its ethnicist project. By the mid-twentieth century, the number of educated women in Kurdish provinces was increasing, and in the 1980s, a stratum of professionals and intellectuals had already changed the fabric of Kurdish society. The new wave of Kurdish opposition movements of the 1960s and 1970s was different from the revolts of the 1920s and 1930s in so far as they were urban, secular, cultural, political, and led by communists, leftists, and nationalists. The movements, involving mostly students and youth, continued to be male dominated, but the left was interested in women’s emancipation without authorizing independent feminist organizing. Still, by the time the leaders of the 1980 military coup d’état suppressed leftist movements and crushed any trace of civil society, the Kurdish Marxist director Yılmaz Güney raised the question of women’s oppression, and strongly condemned, in his movie Yol (Road, 1982), the patriarchal violence prevalent in rural Kurdish society (Benge 1985).

After the 1980 coup, women undertook independent feminist initiatives, and feminism gained more currency. This trend was still Kemalist, and denied the existence of Kurdish women. The political environment changed, however, when in 1984 the Kurdistan Workers Party (known as PKK in its Kurdish acronym) began armed struggle aimed at Kurdish self-determination. By the mid-1990s, thousands of women had joined the ranks of the PKK and its guerrilla army. The organization was identified as “terrorist” by Turkey and its Western allies, and the government and the mainstream media launched a misogynist propaganda campaign against women guerrillas, vilifying them as “prostitutes” (Kurdistan Information Centre Publications 1992, 1995). Under conditions of harsh state violence against the Kurds, gender consciousness was overshadowed by nationalism.

Another development was the resurgence of Islamist political movements in Turkey and throughout the Middle East in the wake of the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran in 1979. Turkish Islamist movements, in spite of their own cleavages, do not deviate from the Kemalist line of denying the Kurds national rights. While they share with Kurdish Islamists a politics of Islamization of gender relations, their devotion to Turkish ethnicity distances them from the Kurds. At the same time, the secular Turkish state, faced with the challenge of Kurdish nationalism, has used Islam and religious divisions among the Kurds including the ‘Alawī/Sunnī divide against this nationalism. For its part, the secular PKK responded by endorsing religion as a legitimate component of Kurdish life, and thus recruiting Islamists and ‘Alawīs. Under these conditions, ethnic, national, and religious cleavages created a regime of ever shifting alliances (Houston 2002), which undermined the potential for non-sectarian feminist organizing.

The military operations against the PKK included the destruction or evacuation of more than 3,500 villages, the uprooting of the population, forced urbanization, and countless disappearances and extrajudicial killings. Women in custody of armed and security forces were subjected to various forms of “sexual torture,” including rape. The mothers of the disappeared organized into a vocal group called Saturday Mothers, and demonstrated every Saturday in Istanbul, which has emerged as the city with the largest Kurdish population (Kurdish Human Rights Project 2002).

In 2002, Turkey took new steps in extending legal gender equality. However, in the Kurdish provinces (officially called the “southeast”), violations of women’s rights were prevalent in, for instance, domestic violence including honor killing, polygyny, wife exchange, and early, forced, arranged, and child marriages. Women were not aware of their rights under the existing legal system (Ilkkaracan 1999). However, non-official and non-party feminist initiatives emerged in Istanbul and major cities, which ranged from “Islamic feminisms” to radical secular projects. While the phrase “Kurdish woman” was officially considered “separatist propaganda” and a crime against the “indivisibility of the Turkish nation,” Kurdish women had formed their own feminist groups, and launched feminist journals (for example, Roza and Jujîn, both launched in 1996), rights advocacy groups (for example, K. Ka. DaV, The foundation for solidarity with Kurdish women and research on the Woman Question, Istanbul), shelters, and literacy and skills training programs (for example, Ka-Mer, the women’s center in Diyarbakir). They also engaged in debate or dialogue with Turkish feminists.

IRAN

Demands for the reform of gender relations in Iran date back to the late nineteenth century, when nationalist and liberal intellectuals questioned the oppression of women, especially veiling, segregation, polygyny, seclusion, and illiteracy. During the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11, social democrats and radical members of the new parliament demanded women’s suffrage rights, and there was considerable women’s grassroots organizing in the Caspian region. The violent suppression of the revolution in 1911 silenced radical voices, although outside the sphere of the state, women continued their organizing activities, journalism, advocacy of equal rights, and opening girls’ schools (Afary 1996). Most of these activities were confined to Tehran and major cities, leaving Kurdish provinces and much of the country marginally affected. Opposition to women’s demands came especially from conservatives among the clergy and in the government.

Kurdish women were a target of the armies of Russia and Ottoman Turkey when they invaded the northern parts of Kurdistan during the First World War. In 1915, the Russian army massacred the male population of Sauj Bulaq (Mahabad) and took away about two hundred women for abuse (Fossum 1918).

State intervention in gender relations in Kurdistan was more visible after the 1921 coup d’état, when the central government further expanded its military and civil administration to all the cities and towns. Reza Shah, army officer and founder of the Pahlavī dynasty (1925–79), established a highly centralized dictatorial regime largely through the use of military power. By the early 1930s, he had suppressed all independent women’s activism and crushed the religious centers of power. Much like republican Turkey, and inspired by it, the Pahlavī monarchy was a nationalist, secular, modernizing, and Westernizing unitary state, which assigned women a major role in its nation-building project. In this multiethnic and multicultural country, women had to be modern, Westernized, and Persian(ized).

The most visible intervention in gender relations, Reza Shah’s 1936 decree on the unveiling of women, was enforced largely through coercion. According to confidential government correspondence of the period, there was no need for unveiling in the rural and tribal areas of the country, especially in Kurdistan, where women were always unveiled. However, the colorful and distinctly Kurdish clothing of women was treated as “ugly and dirty,” and had to be replaced by the “attire of civilized women,” that is, Western-type dress (Iran National Archives 1992, 171, 250, 249, 273). In Kurdistan, this state-imposed “unified dress” was known as Pahlavī or Persian (ecemī) rather than European clothing. Another official initiative was the opening of the first public schools for girls in Kurdish cities in the 1930s, of which there were few.

The Soviet Union and Britain occupied Iran during the Second World War, and replaced Reza Shah with his son Mohammad Reza in 1941. Soon after the war ended, Kurdish and Azerbaijani nationalists established their short-lived autonomous governments in northwestern Iran in 1946. The National Government of Azerbaijan granted women suffrage rights, while the Kurdish Republic encouraged women’s participation in public life outside the sphere of the family. The Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), founder of this mini-state, launched a women’s party (Hizbī Jinan), which promoted women’s education and rallied them in support of the republic. Women teachers and students from girls’ schools appeared unveiled in official ceremonies and other public spaces wearing their uniforms, and wore the Kurdish national dress.

The short-lived experience of the two governments, overthrown within a year through Tehran’s military offensive, demonstrated the failure of the Pahlavī monarchy to integrate non-Persian women into the unitary ethnicist state. In fact, Kurdish nationalists created their own alternative, a Kurdish state based on Kurdish ethnicity, with its language, culture, history, homeland (nîstman), in other words Kurdistan, with its own ideal “Kurdish woman.” This Kurdish woman shared more with the women envisioned by the Kurdish nationalists of the late Ottoman period than the modern “Iranian women” fostered by the Pahlavī state (Mojab 2001b).

Participants in the 1978–9 Revolution against the monarchy were extremely diverse socially and politically, and pursued different goals. In Kurdistan, the struggle was predominantly nationalist and secular, and the demand was autonomy within a democratic and federal state structure. Even the two Kurdish Islamic leaders who came to prominence in 1978–80 called for self-rule. The Islamic theocracy is, like the monarchical regime, a unitary state rooted in Persian ethnicity (its language, religion, and culture), and rejects the idea of autonomy for non-Persian nationalities. “Muslim women” were given a special role in the Islamization of the ancient monarchical state; they were expected to play a leading role in reversing the social and cultural changes that had occurred in Iran since the constitutional revolution. In Kurdistan, resistance against the Islamization of gender relations assumed a nationalist dimension, although religious cleavages were present (most Kurds are Sunnis while the Iranian theocracy is Shīī). Resistance included, among others, using Kurdish, non-Islamic, female names, and violating Islamic dress codes by wearing Kurdish clothing, and participating in weddings, which are centered on mixed dances and music.

Kurdish opposition parties engaged in armed resistance when the army launched a major offensive, in August 1979, to wipe out the autonomy movement. One of the political organizations, Komele, the Kurdistan organization of the Communist Party of Iran, and other leftist groups recruited hundreds of women into their military and political ranks. Komele’s military camps formed a sharp contrast to the gender apartheid regime imposed throughout Iran. The organization abolished gender segregation, and women participated in traditionally male domains such as combat and military/political training, while men undertook traditionally female work such as cooking, washing, and cleaning.

By 2000, the Islamization of gender relations had failed in Kurdistan, where the active presence of “Kurdish woman” was in sharp contrast with the contested, state-sponsored, “Muslim woman.” While a considerable number of Kurdish women had entered the non-domestic labor force, both skilled and unskilled, an increasing number of poets (for example, Miryam Hula and Zhila Huseini), writers (for example, Nasrin Ja’fari and N. J. Ashna), musicians (for example, Qashang Kamkar), teachers, and artists pointed to the formation of an intelligentsia. At the same time, the unprecedented increase in women’s suicide, especially through self-immolation, revealed the pressures of both theocratic patriarchy and domestic violence (Yūsifi and Yūsifi 1997), all exacerbated by the wars of the 1980s, poverty, and a ruined economy.

IRAQ

Formed under British occupation (1917–20) and mandate (1920–32) supervised by the League of Nations, the Iraqi state accepted the existence of the Kurds as a people with limited rights to use their language in primary schools, publishing, and broadcasting. However, Britain rejected Kurdish demands for autonomous status within a federal Iraqi state, fearing that it would spread Kurdish nationalism to the neighboring countries, and inhibit the integration of the Kurds. Unlike the nationalist regimes of Turkey and Iran, Britain did not adopt “state feminism” in the course of building Iraq as a monarchical Arab state. In fact, British authorities complained to the League of Nations about incessant Kurdish educational demands (Great Britain 1930, 139–40), including more girls’ schools. The monarchical regime (1932–58) continued the policy of ignoring gender equality. The Communist Party of Iraq, like its counterparts in Iran, Syria, and Turkey, was vocal in advocating women’s rights.

Resisting assimilation into the Arab state, Kurdish nationalists emphasized their ethnic, linguistic, cultural, territorial, racial, and historical distinctness, which included the claim to the relative freedom of Kurdish women. However, the autonomous government of Sheikh Mahmoud formed in the early 1920s was a patriarchal, feudal regime with no interest in women’s rights. Still, intellectuals, ranging from religious to nationalist to Communist, denounced the oppression of women. The most prominent modern poet, Abdullah Goran (1904–62), condemned, in his poetry, gender and class violence, especially honor killing. The KDP of Iraq published, clandestinely, the first issue of Dengi Afret (Woman’s voice) in 1953.

In the more or less open environment following the overthrow of monarchy in 1958, the Communist Party's powerful women's organization cooperated with the Union of Kurdish Women, and lobbied for legal reform, which brought marriage under civil control, and abolished the tribal custom of honor killing. The Ba'th regime, which came to power in 1968, used military might to crush the Kurdish autonomist movement, and in 1988 perpetrated a genocide officially named Anfal, "spoils of war" (Ismael and Ismael 2000). The coercive organs of the state institutionalized rape as a method of punishment, which violated the honor of both women and the (Kurdish) nation. The entire adult male population of the Barzani tribe was eliminated and women were kept in concentration camps and subjected to rape and terror (Makiya 1993, 135–50, 289–98).

After the defeat of Iraq in the Gulf War of 1991, much of Kurdistan came under the rule of two Kurdish organizations, the KDP and Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), which created the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG). Six of the 105 members of the parliament were women (5.7 percent). However, in the course of parliamentary elections, male and female voters were segregated at the voting centers. Although virtually independent from Baghdad, the KRG, especially its KDP faction, refused to repeal the Ba'th regime's personal status codes and other laws that were lenient on honor killing. In 1994, women marched from Sulaymaniyya to Arbil in protest at the civil war between the KDP and the PUK, which lasted, intermittently, until 1996, and led to the formation of two Kurdish governments. The genocide and the 1991 Gulf War disrupted the fabric of Kurdish society, and unleashed extensive male violence including honor killing; suicide through self-immolation, previously a rare phenomenon, occurred regularly. In the wake of continuing protest, the PUK-led government issued resolutions aimed at criminalizing honor killing, although they remained on paper. The KDP, however, justified patriarchal violence as part of Islamic and Kurdish traditions (Çingiyani 1993).

The Ba'th regime's policy of creating a "new Iraqi woman," one who is totally devoted to the ideology and politics of the party, failed largely due to Kurdish nationalist resistance. However, the experience of self-rule from 1991 revealed that Kurdish nationalism in power, as in other cases, Western and non-Western, ensures women's loyalty to the state. By the late 1990s, feminist knowledge and critique was gaining ground, and women were already resisting indigenous national patriarchy. Several women's groups and magazines ranging from secular to Islamic, and communist to nationalist, engaged in debates on issues such as legal reform, violence against women, and especially honor killing.

SYRIA

Built largely under French rule (1920–46), the Syrian state was, like Iraq under British rule, without a "state feminist" project. The majority of the Kurds lived in rural areas of the northeast, although there were sizeable Kurdish settlements in Damascus, Aleppo, and other cities. A nationalist movement emerged in the 1920s among the urban notables and intelligentsia, but there was no Kurdish women's movement. However, individual women of the aristocratic families were active in education and culture in the 1930s and 1940s. The ruling Ba'th party has eliminated all opposition movements since it came to power in the mid-1960s, and revoked the citizenship of thousands of Kurds.

THE SOVIET UNION (1921–91)

Women were granted suffrage rights once Soviet power was established, in 1921, over the Caucasian regions of Armenia and Azerbaijan, where most Kurds lived in rural areas. Tribal-feudal socioeconomic relations, considered the engine of patriarchy, were promptly dismantled; women were expected to be active in the building of socialist society and economy (Abdal 1960). In sharp contrast to other parts of Kurdistan, where female illiteracy rates in the villages are still as high as 50 percent, illiteracy was eliminated in the Soviet Union by the early 1930s. The reform of gender relations entailed extensive educational and ideological work in the newly established Kurdish print media, film, and schools. By the mid-1950s, a generation of professional women were active in areas such as teaching, journalism, broadcasting, medicine, agriculture, and music. Also sharply different from the case in Turkey and Iran, Kurds enjoyed the freedom to use their language and maintain their culture. None of the states in the region allowed any contact with the Kurdish women of the Soviet Union. After the fall of the Soviet regime, the size of the Kurdish population was reduced and displaced due to the war between Armenia and Azerbaijan, and Kurdish linguistic, cultural, and human rights were restricted (McDowall 2000, 490–4, Russo 2000).

THE DIASPORAS

The Kurdish diasporas that emerged since the 1960s, in the West and elsewhere, consist of around one million "guest workers" (mostly in Germany), refugees, and immigrants. Gender relations among the Kurds enter into complex relationships with the prevalent regime in each country. Patriarchal relations ranging from arranged marriages to honor killing persist in the first generation, while resistance, including feminist organizing, has also emerged.

CONCLUSIONS

The modernizing projects of the nation-states to transform “Kurdish woman” into “Iranian woman,” “new Turkish woman,” “new Iraqi woman,” or “Muslim woman” have failed. Eight decades of forcible assimilation have, in fact, contributed to the formation of the polity of “Kurdish woman.” While there is no single definition of Kurdish womanhood, the ideal “Kurdish woman” is predominantly nationalist, secular, and modern. At the same time, the persistence of tribal-feudal forms of Kurdish patriarchy and the failure of Kurdish nationalism to democratize gender relations has encouraged feminist awareness and organizing. Leyla Zana, the first and only Kurdish woman member of Turkey’s parliament, defended Kurdish rights, and was sentenced in 1994 to 15 years in prison. She has stated, “I view my imprisonment as synonymous with the freedom of my people” (Zana 1999, 111). Fadime Şahindal, a young Kurdish-Swedish woman killed by her father for reasons of “honor” in Sweden in 2002, revolted against indigenous patriarchal violence. Leyla and Fadime both spoke of significant developments in the lives of women in the transnational, non-state, Kurdish nation (Mojab 2001a, Savelsberg 2000).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- M. Bayezidi, Customs and manners of the Kurds [in Kurdish and Russian translation], ed. and trans. M. B. Rudenko, Moscow 1963.
 Sh. Bidlîsî, Şaraf-nâmi, Tehran 1964.
 E. Çelebi, Evlîya Çelebi in Bitlîs, trans. and ed. R. Dankoff, Leiden 1990.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- A. Abdal, La structure sociale des Kurdes de la Transcaucasie, trans. M. B. Nikitine, in L’Afrique et l’Asie 49 (1960), 61–6.
 J. Afary, The Iranian constitutional revolution, 1906–1911. Grassroots democracy, social democracy, and the origins of feminism, New York 1996.
 R. Alakom, Kurdish women. A new force in Kurdistan [in Kurdish], Spånga, Sweden 1995.
 —, Kurdish women in Constantinople at the beginning of the twentieth century, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 53–70.
 Z. F. Arat, Kemalism and Turkish women, in Women and politics 14:4 (1994), 57–80.
 A. Benge, Güney, Turkey and the West. An interview, in Race and class 26:3 (1985), 31–46.

- M. van Bruinessen, Kurdish ethno-nationalism versus nation-building states, Istanbul 2000, 10–11, 70–5.
 —, From Adela Khanum to Leyla Zana. Women as political leaders in Kurdish history, in S. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 95–112.
 C. Çingiyani, An interview with four women belonging to the Union of the Women of Kurdistan, in Xermene 9–10 (1993), 122, 124.
 A. Dzhindi (ed.), Kurdish epic song-stories [in Kurdish and Russian], Moscow 1962.
 Q. Fattâhî Qâdi (ed. and trans.), Mandûmi-yi kurdîyi şhur mahmûd va marzîngân, Tabriz 1970.
 D. Fernandes, The Kurdish genocide in Turkey, 1924–1998, in Armenian Forum 1:4 (1999), 57–107.
 L. O. Fossum, The war-stricken Kurds, in The Kurdistan Missionary 10:7 (1918), 5–6.
 M. Galletti, Western images of the woman’s role in Kurdish society, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 209–25.
 Great Britain. Colonial Office, Report by His Majesty’s Government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the Council of the League of Nations on the administration of Iraq for the year 1929, London 1930.
 H. H. Hansen, Daughters of Allah. Among Muslim women in Kurdistan, trans. R. Spink, London 1960.
 —, The Kurdish women’s life. Field research in a Muslim society, Iraq, Copenhagen 1961.
 A. Hassanpour, The (re)production of patriarchy in the Kurdish language, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 227–63.
 C. Houston, Islam, Kurds and the Turkish nation state, Oxford 2001.
 P. Ilkcaracan, Exploring the context of women’s sexuality in Eastern Turkey, in Women living under Muslim laws, Dossier 22 (1999), 100–13.
 Iran National Archives, Violence and culture. Confidential records about the abolition of hijab, 1313–1322 H. Sh [in Persian], Tehran 1992.
 J. S. Ismael and Sh. T. Ismael, Gender and state in Iraq, in S. Joseph (ed.), Gender and citizenship in the Middle East, Syracuse, N.Y. 2000, 185–211.
 Kurdistan Information Centre/Kurdistan Solidarity Committee Publications, Resistance. Women in Kurdistan, London 1992.
 —, Kurdish women. The struggle for national liberation and women’s rights, London 1995.
 J. Klein, En-gendering nationalism. The “woman question” in Kurdish nationalist discourse of the late Ottoman period, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001, 25–51.
 H. Q. Koyî, Dîwan [collected poems] of Hacı Qadîrî Koyî [in Kurdish], Baghdad 1986.
 Kurdish Human Rights Project, State violence against women in Turkey and attacks on human rights defenders of victims of sexual violence in custody. Trial observation report, London 2001.
 M. Levene, Creating a modern “zone of genocide.” The impact of nation- and state-formation on Eastern Anatolia, 1878–1923, in Holocaust and genocide studies 12:3 (1998), 393–433.
 Mâh Sharaf Khânûm (Mastûri Kurdistânî), Divan of Mastûr-i-yi Kurdistânî, ed. S. Safizâdi, Tehran 1998.
 K. Makiya, Cruelty and silence. War, tyranny, uprising and the Arab world, New York 1993.
 O. Mann, Die Mundart der Mukri-Kurden, Berlin 1906.
 D. McDowall, A modern history of the Kurds, London 2000.

- S. Meiselas, Kurdistan. In the shadow of history, New York 1997.
- S. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation, The Kurds, Costa Mesa, 2001a.
- , Women and nationalism in the Kurdish Republic of 1946, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation. The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001b, 71–91.
- , Introduction. The solitude of the stateless. Kurdish women at the margins of feminist knowledge, in Sh. Mojab (ed.), Women of a non-state nation, The Kurds, Costa Mesa 2001c, 1–21.
- , The politics of “cyberfeminism” in the Middle East. The case of Kurdish women, in Race, gender and class 8:4 (2001d), 42–61.
- , Theorizing the politics of ‘Islamic feminism’, in Feminist review, 69 (1 November 2001e), 124–46.
- , No “safe haven” for women. Violence against women in Iraqi Kurdistan, in W. Giles and J. Hyndman (eds.), Sites of violence. Gender and conflict zones, Berkeley 2004.
- S. Mojab and A. Hassanpour, The women of Kurdistan. A subject bibliography, Greenwood (forthcoming).
- M. Müftüleri-Bac, Turkish women’s predicament, in Women’s studies international forum 22:3 (6 May 1999), 303–15.
- Rohat, The sovereignty of women in Kurdish folklore [in Kurdish], Sweden 1994.
- D. Russo, Azerbaijan and Armenia. An update on ethnic minorities and human rights, London 2000.
- E. Savelsberg et al. (eds.), Kurdische Frauen und das Bild der kurdischen Frau, Münster 2000.
- M. H. Yüsifi and F. Yüsifi, A survey of the causes of self-immolation in the city of Sanandaj in 1995–96 [in Farsi], Abidar 8 (1997), 5.
- L. Zana, Writings from prison, Watertown, Mass. 1999.

SHAHRZAD MOJAB

Law: Access to the Legal System

Afghanistan

With a well-defined judiciary in the constitution and jurisprudence composed of the Sharī'a, Civil Code, and traditions of its ethnic groups, Afghanistan does not lack laws. Women's access to and ability to use the judicial system are mainly affected by lack of legal literacy, cultural pressure, and inadequate judicial infrastructure. The concept of claiming and taking rights does not exist in the society. Men and especially women believe rights are given to them. They seldom understand the relationship of rights and laws to the official bureaucracy and processes of a court system. Ninety-nine percent of Afghans being Muslims, Islamic literacy is widespread in the areas of marriage, divorce, and inheritance. With illiteracy at around 90 percent for women and 80 percent for men, this has implications on how fast Afghanistan can – and perhaps should – implement more civil codes. Knowledge of Islamic rights, transmitted mostly through oral interpretations, is mixed with ethnic traditions and currently imbued with extremist political ideologies that utilize negation of rights of women as their axis of control. Very few Afghans have ever read either the Afghan constitution to understand their rights and the judiciary, or the Qur'ān translated into their own languages. Fewer still know Arabic. This is why the Afghan Women Roqia Center for Rights, Studies and Education in Kabul has published, and distributes gratis, a translation in Dari of the Qur'ānic verses pertaining to women.

In addition, the obstacles to women using law are the cultural mores and traditions of the ethnic groups and the pervasive social patriarchy. This is more pronounced among the tribal Pashtuns whose oral code of conduct, the Pashtunwali, counts zan, zar, zameen (women, gold, land) the most important things in life. All Afghans consider women to represent the family honor and/or an economic opportunity. Losing face and being shamed is the highest disgrace. The code of silence to show family/clan/tribal solidarity is very strong. Thus, marriages occur in front of a mullah, not a judge, divorces happen in front of family, or men sell their wives to other men for as little as two rifles; rarely is any of this reported to the court and so justice for women is affected. Suffering and injustice occur not because the Sharī'a gives daughters half of the inheritance received by sons. Rather, due to socio-cultural pressures daughters can rarely claim and/or get that half from brothers or uncles (often sons also suffer this difficulty). Daughters claiming this right are often subjected to being disowned for life by the family (qat'-e kleegary in Pashtunwali).

Another factor affecting women's access to law is the state of the judiciary in contemporary Afghanistan. After long decades of war, much of the infrastructure has been destroyed. Courthouses do not exist everywhere; roads to reach a courthouse are impassable; judges are no longer trained in Afghan jurisprudence (most have Sharī'a training); the legal reference books were reassembled and reprinted in 2002 (17 tons of them) but have not yet been distributed to each courthouse. Lawyers are in short supply as are law enforcement officers and other paralegal professionals around a courthouse. In such a situation, in faraway villages or less accessible provincial towns the population in general and women in particular have difficulty reaching a court.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

N. Gross, Steps of peace and our responsibility as Afghans [in Dari], Falls Church, Va. 2000.

NASRINE GROSS

Arab States

Until the 1970s, scholarship neglected the question of how women might have fared in premodern legal systems. This was due to lack of archival sources, but also to scholars' basic assumption that the discriminatory provisions of Islamic law as found in legal text books (muṭūn) would predetermine how women fared in legal systems. When Ottoman archival sources became more widely accessible in the 1970s and 1980s, scholars discovered that women of all walks of life fared better than expected in Ottoman courts. In contrast, the selective codification of Islamic law, the bureaucratization of procedures, and the patriarchal nature of modern state institutions appear to have limited women's access to colonial and postcolonial courts.

Contemporary legal systems in the Arab states are diverse, ranging from systems based on selective combinations of Islamic legal concepts with French law (North Africa, Egypt), Ottoman law (Jordan, Syria, Palestine), and English law (Kuwait, Yemen, Gulf states). All Arab court systems recognize a hierarchy of courts and some have specialized jurisdictions. Only Iran, and more recently Egypt, have specialized courts for family matters. Otherwise, personal status matters are handled by Shari'a courts (Jordan, Lebanon, Palestine, Syria, United Arab Emirates) or by courts with general jurisdiction (Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, Kuwait, Morocco, Saudi Arabia), sometimes also called Shari'a courts.

While Arab constitutions generally provide for citizens' right to bring legal action, actual access to the legal system is hampered by several factors, some affecting women and men differently. Those who work in Arab legal systems often cite corruption, slowness, and lack of enforcement of legal rulings as the main issues affecting access to and respect for the legal system. Widespread illiteracy in rural areas and among the urban poor make these groups dependent on the advice of legal specialists, thus creating yet another obstacle and increasing the costs. While court fees are often regulated, constituting a percentage of the value of the civil case, lawyers' fees tend to be high; in addition there are many hidden fees.

Court proceedings tend to be drawn out. In the last decades, Egyptian women suing for divorce spent between three and seven years on the different aspects of their cases (Brown 1997, 200, Fahmi 1987, 15, 61-70, 73, Hill 1979, 43). Reliable statistics on length of proceedings are, however, hard to come by. The same holds true for a gender-relevant analysis of cases brought to and decided by courts; court registers are difficult to access, often requiring extended fieldwork. However, the Jordanian office of the qāḍī al-quḍāt (supreme judge) has published its 2000 breakdown of personal status law cases (www.sjd.gov.jo/html/fahresn.htm); the Moroccan ministry of justice runs a website advising citizens about personal status law and legal procedure (www.justice.gov.ma/justfamille/mariage.htm); and a Tunisian site has a comprehensive FAQ section on family, criminal, and civil law to facilitate access to the legal system (www.jurisitetunisie.com). But judicial statistics, even where published, appear not to be very accurate (for Egyptian crime statistics, Bernard-Maugiron and Dupret 2002, li).

Access to courts, courts' efficiency, and implementation of rulings are among the most under-researched topics in respect to contemporary legal systems. Attempts to reform Arab legal systems, particularly with an eye to improving women's access to the courts, often therefore suffer from lack of information, as recent studies funded by the United Nations Development Programme on judicial reform in the Arab states have pointed out (see www.pogar.org).

LEGAL LITERACY AND THE LEGAL PROFESSION

Whereas most citizens in the Arab states hold notions of what is right in moral terms, knowledge about national legal codes is as rudimentary among lay people as elsewhere in the world. In some countries, local leaders, such as village headmen or tribal leaders, have some legal knowledge, but they often attempt to persuade parties to avoid legal proceedings; in addition their services are targeted solely at men.

Numerous donor-funded projects support legal literacy campaigns in the Arab states. The impact of these programs is hard to evaluate; when focusing on the production of written material, impact would be highest among urban, educated middle-class women.

All Arab legal systems allow, some even mandate, legal representation by professionals at all stages. Where it is not mandatory, the bureaucratic nature of court proceedings is often only manageable with a lawyer, even at the primary stage (Mir-Hosseini 1993, 112 for Morocco; compare Würth 2000, 117 for Yemen and Brown 1997, 190 ff. for Egypt). Legal services differ in quality; top lawyers are as expensive as elsewhere, hampering access to high-quality legal representation for everybody but the well-off middle and upper classes.

In all Arab states, legal professionals are educated in universities. Judges usually receive between one and three years' postgraduate judicial training. Curricula differ widely in respect to the amount and depth of Islamic law teaching and specialization.

While women make up a large proportion of law students, they are usually not well represented in the legal profession; there are, however, no reliable statistics. Countries such as Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates do not permit women in the judiciary. Even in countries where women enter the judiciary, they are a tiny minority. The police is likewise an overwhelmingly male domain; only very few Arab states employ women officers and most of them work as warders in women's prisons.

CULTURAL CONTEXTS AND CONSTRAINTS

While factors like corruption and inefficiency affect men and women alike, women's access to the legal system is in addition hindered by other factors. Whereas many women do make it to court – in a number of countries women appear to be the majority of litigants in family law at the primary stage (Rosen 1997, 93, Würth 2000, 144) – they only do so after overcoming cultural and social negative images of court proceedings, especially against a blood relative or spouse. This holds particularly true in family law, where the better off favor out-of-court resolutions and only resort to the courts if all else fails (Hill 1979, 15, Moors 1995, 140). For women, taking a family member to court thus tends to signify cultural and social failure at settling the dispute, and ultimately speaks to the lack of family standing. The repercussions depend largely on the case at hand; taking a brother or father to court for assault will obviously have different effects in a woman's family environment than divorcing an abusive husband.

Women's access to the criminal justice system is likewise disadvantaged by political, cultural, and legal factors. Many citizens are reluctant to report crimes to the police to begin with, the lack of rights awareness being one factor. In addition, Arab police forces have a well established record for mistreatment and extortion. Reporting violence and particularly domestic violence is risky, due to widely-held cultural assumptions that women are to blame if they become the victim of a violent crime. Initiatives like the Arab Women Court (<http://www.arabwomenscourt.org/womenscourt/aboutus/aboutus.htm>) publicize testimonies of victims of domestic violence to change these stereotypes. While women can, in theory, invoke penal provisions of assault against perpetrators of domestic violence, marital rape is not defined as a criminal offense in any Arab state. In theory, rape by unrelated men is punished severely (Mohsen 1990 for Egypt). In contrast, a rapist could marry his victim and avert punishment in Egypt – only in 2000 were the respective provisions repealed. This type of provision has contributed to severe under-reporting of rape and impunity for those who physically and sexually assault women.

SCHOLARSHIP

The locus classicus for the assumption on the part of Islamic scholars that women fared badly in premodern legal systems is J. N. D. Anderson's work, claiming that nineteenth- and twentieth-century legal reforms came as a blessing to Muslim women, who, due to the provisions of the Ḥanafī school, were unable to obtain a divorce should their husband have left them for prolonged periods (Anderson 1968, 224, 225 ff.). As Nahal (1979, 47) and Tucker (1998, 78–87) have shown, the Ottoman legal system was flexible enough to accommodate women in this situation, and permitted divorce rulings issued by Shāfi'ī judges.

If “immutable rigidity” was the catchword for scholars' perception of Islamic legal systems until the 1970s, access to Ottoman archives (sijillāt) led scholars to the contrary conclusion. Whatever the legal text books said, the sijillāt demonstrated a high degree of flexibility and plurivocality, accommodating changing needs of the population, minorities included, and particularly women's needs. Studies in Ottoman archives demonstrated that women did indeed use urban and rural courts, to secure property and financial rights, divorce their husbands, and gain custody of their children (Doumani 1985, Jennings 1999, Tucker 1985 and 1998). These studies also demonstrated, rather surprisingly, that minority women resorted to Muslim courts frequently, requesting a divorce not available to them under their denomination (al-Qattan 1999).

Studies based on a systematic reading of twentieth-century family law archives and jurisprudence have shown judges' different interpretations of relevant legal provisions (Shaham 1997), the selective reconstruction of Islamic legal concepts by courts (Dennerlein 1998), the relevance of class in the use of the courts (Hill 1979, Moors 1995, Würth 2000), and the political nature of family law reform (Welchman 2000).

But many intriguing social and legal questions remain: were and are women using the legal system representative of the larger female population or rather an exception? What do women win if courts rule in their favor and how can women secure the implementation of rulings, particularly if financial rights are involved? How do women fare in the different layers in the legal process? How do governments use legal and judicial reform and the reference to differing legal norms to enhance their own legitimacy? How have social change and economic crisis affected the use of courts and women's access to them?

These issues remain largely unresolved, but overall recent scholarship, often by women historians and anthropologists, has shown that women's access to contemporary Arab legal systems is determined by patriarchal and class-based understandings of proper behavior, by numerous factors common to Third-World judiciaries and judicial policies, and finally by women's strategies, often, but not always, mediated by their lawyers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

J. N. D. Anderson, The eclipse of the patriarchal family in contemporary Islamic law, in J. N. D. Anderson (ed.), Family law in Asia and Africa, London 1968, 221–34.

- N. Bernard-Maugiron and B. Dupret, Introduction. A general presentation of law and judicial bodies, in N. Bernard-Maugiron and B. Dupret (eds.), Egypt and its laws, The Hague 2002, xiv–lii.
- N. Brown, The rule of law in the Arab world. Courts in Egypt and the Gulf, Cambridge 1997.
- , Arab judicial structures. A study presented to the United National Development Program, August 2001, <www.pogar.org/publications/judiciary/nbrown>.
- B. Dennerlein, Islamisches Recht und sozialer Wandel in Algerien. Zur Entwicklung des Personalstatuts seit 1962, Berlin 1998.
- B. Doumani, The Islamic court records of Palestine, in Birzeit Research Review 2 (1985), 3–30.
- G. H. El-Nahal, The judicial administration of Ottoman Egypt in the seventeenth century, Chicago 1979.
- H. Fahmi, Divorcer en Egypte. Etude de l'application des lois du statut personnel, Cairo 1987.
- E. Hill, Mahkama! Studies in the Egyptian legal system, London 1979.
- R. Jennings, Studies on Ottoman social history in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Women, zimmi and Sharia courts in Kayseri, Cyprus and Trabzon, Istanbul 1999.
- Z. Mir-Hosseini, Marriage on trial. A study of Islamic family law, London 1993.
- S. Mohsen, Women and criminal justice in Egypt, in D. Dwyer (ed.), Law and Islam in the Middle East, New York 1990, 15–34.
- A. Moors, Women, property and Islam. Palestinian experiences 1920–1990, Cambridge 1995.
- N. al-Qattan, Dhimmis in the Muslim court. Legal autonomy and religious discrimination, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 31:3 (1999), 429–44.
- L. Rosen, A la barre. Regard sur les archives d'un tribunal marocain (1965–1995), in G. Boëtsch, B. Dupret, and J.-N. Ferrié (eds.), Droits et sociétés dans le monde arabe. Perspectives socio-anthropologiques, Aix-en-Provence 1997, 85–99.
- R. Shaham, Family and the courts in modern Egypt. A study based on decisions by the Sharī'a courts, 1900–1955, Leiden 1997.
- A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- , Women, labor and the law in Jordan, Syracuse, N.Y. 2003.
- J. E. Tucker, Women in nineteenth-century Egypt, Cambridge 1985.
- , In the house of the law. Gender and Islamic law in Syria and Palestine, 17th–18th centuries, Berkeley 1998.
- J. E. Tucker and M. L. Meriwether (eds.), Social history of women and gender in the modern Middle East, Boulder, Colo. 1999.
- L. Welchman, Beyond the code. Muslim family law and the Sharī'i judiciary in the Palestinian West Bank, The Hague 2000.
- A. Würth, Ash-Sharī'a fī bāb al-Yaman. Recht, Richter und Rechtspraxis an der familienrechtlichen Kammer des Gerichtes Süd-Sanaa (Republik Jemen) 1983–1995, Berlin 2000.
- M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997.

ANNA WÜRTH

The Balkans

This entry focuses on the successor countries of the former Yugoslavia with an emphasis on the Bosniaks. Bosnia and Herzegovina formed part of the Ottoman Empire from 1463, when Sharī'a courts were introduced to the southern Slav lands, till the 1878 Berlin Congress, which accorded the administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Austria-Hungary passed legislation applying Sharī'a law to Muslim women in Bosnia and Herzegovina in family and inheritance matters, as a result of which the Sharī'a courts were incorporated into the Dual Monarchy's state judiciary. Based on the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain on the protection of minorities, the Kingdom of Yugoslavia retained state Sharī'a courts for matters of family and inheritance law affecting Muslims. Access to the legal system was not uniform throughout the region – there were six legal systems, the result of the different histories and legal systems in the various parts of the country. In addition, the social role and legal status of women and men was determined by the dominant patriarchal cultural matrix, the impact of which still survives to this day.

1918–40: KINGDOM OF YUGOSLAVIA

In this period, Sharī'a courts were administratively a division of the civil courts, but in reality they constituted a separate entity within the state authorities, independently applying separate laws to a specific group of Yugoslav citizens. In their organization, character, staffing, and judicial practice, they were of the type of modernized judicial institutions to be found at that time in Muslim countries, and were the best system in the Balkans: this was because the Muslims were so numerous and because they had their own specialist law schools. Sarajevo had a Sharī'a judges' school (1887–1937), founded by the Austro-Hungarian authorities, and an Islamic Sharī'a and theological college (1935–45) for higher education in these subjects. From 1931, a specialist course in Sharī'a law was offered by Belgrade's Faculty of Law. The operation of the Sharī'a courts was influenced by the half-century's experience of encountering European administration.

Muslim women's status in marriage was similar to that of women from other religious communities, to whom the Austrian Civil Code applied. Freedom of movement and public activity were contingent on their husbands' approval. Muslim women had the right to manage, enjoy, and freely dispose of their own property, but pursuant to Shari'a law there were inequalities in their inheritance rights. In addition, Muslim women were too poorly educated and too isolated to be able to fully enjoy the right to work. For the majority of rural women, economic independence was impossible to achieve.

As regards access to the Shari'a courts, Muslim women also had difficulties in being represented; it was not considered fitting for women to appear in court. This was exacerbated by the fact that it was unknown in the history of the Shari'a judiciary for lawyers to represent their clients; as a result, the lawyers who did so in the Shari'a courts were not necessarily familiar with Shari'a law. Advocates' unfamiliarity with Shari'a law as much as the ignorance of the women themselves undermined the effectiveness of judicial protection.

1945-91: SOCIALIST FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA

In common with other communist states and countries in the region, women and men were declared to be equal constitutionally and before the law. This led to the abolition of the Shari'a courts by a law enacted on 5 March 1946. Their jurisdiction was transferred to the ordinary civil courts, and civil law was applied to Muslims in matters of personal and family status and inheritance. The common feature was the separation of the state, and its legal system, from religion and religious institutions. For example, only marriages conducted by the relevant state authorities were legally valid.

Religion and the culture associated with it still had considerable influence on the private lives of Muslims, though this differed in rural and urban areas. In the case of Muslim women from rural areas, it was reflected in their education levels. In conservative rural areas there were even cases of girls being kept out of school.

Although discrimination on the grounds of sex was prohibited in principle, in practice women failed to achieve full equality. The courts failed to provide effective protection against discrimination at work, sexual harassment, or violence in the family. Access to justice and effective legal protection were also made more difficult by the length of time court proceedings took, lack of money to pay for legal representation, ignorance of the law, and women's lack of education.

AFTER 1991: THE SUCCESSOR COUNTRIES

The common features of the region for this period are the experience of war, and economic and political transition. Gender analyses have shed light on the still present equality gap between men and women; studies have been written on the position and problems of women in the transition period; women's groups have been formed to promote women's rights; and the process of adopting legislation and other measures aimed at achieving gender equality and equality of opportunity for men and women is under way. As regards Bosnian women, within the Muslim community there are some small groups rethinking the position and rights of women and applying the standards and practice of other Islamic countries in the way they dress, in relations between men and women, and in married life and life in the community. The human rights context is the expression of specific religious features and cultural traditions. The current situation is characterized by constitutional and legal equality and efforts to introduce mechanisms to ensure equality of standing in practice. The grave economic situation, the absence of legal and civic education, and lack of self-confidence prevent women from using existing legal mechanisms to protect their rights on the one hand and ensure their personal advancement on the other.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- A. Božić, Position of women in private law [in Serbian], Ph.D. diss., Faculty of Law, Belgrade University 1939.
- Z. Grebo, Social policy of employment of women and their social rights at work and in the family [in Bosnian], Ph.D. diss., Faculty of Political Sciences, University of Sarajevo 1971.
- F. Karčić, Shari'a courts in Yugoslavia, 1918-1941 [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1986.
- F. Kožul, Self-management and legal status of women in Bosnia-Herzegovina [in Croatian], Ph.D. diss., Faculty of Political Sciences, University of Sarajevo 1972.
- National report on implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women* [in Serbo Croatian], Edvard Kardelj Yugoslav Centre for the Theory and Practice of Self-Management, Ljubljana 1985.
- United Nations Development Programme, Human development report 1988. Bosnia and Herzegovina, New York 1988.
- , Human development report 2002. Bosnia and Herzegovina, New York 2002, <<http://www.undp.ba/nhdr/NHDR2002ENG.pdf>>
- Women's human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina*, national NGO report published by a group of local non-governmental organizations in cooperation with the International Human Rights Law Group BiH Project, Sarajevo 15 May 1999.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- B. Baranović, Images of women in textbooks [in Croatian], Zagreb 2000.
- T. Bringa, Being Muslim the Bosnian way, Princeton, N.J. 1995.

- O. N. Hadžić, Islam and culture [in Croatian], Zagreb 1894.
- A. Hangi, Life and customs of the Muslims [in Bosnian], Sarajevo 1906, 1990³.
- S. Pletikosić, Arguments over the emancipation of women. Response to Hamdija Karamehmedović, et al. [in Croatian], Opatija 1911.

JASNA BAKŠIĆ MUFTIĆ

The Caucasus

Caucasian legal history can be divided into two periods: the seventeenth century to 1917 and 1920 to 1990. Until the 1920s, the legal system of the Caucasus was a fusion of standards of ʿāda, Sharīʿa, and state law established by the Russian Empire during the nineteenth century.

PRE-SOVIET PERIOD

Some communities were dominated by ʿāda (Northwest and Central Caucasus) with Sharīʿa family norms disseminated throughout, others by Sharīʿa (East and Northeastern Caucasus: Chechnya, Dagestan, Azerbaijan). Imam Shamil's role in the dissemination of Sharīʿa in North Caucasus during the period of his imamate (1834–59) was important.

Criminal cases were heard according to the ʿāda and, later, Russian law; civil cases were subject to Russian legal standards. The family law norms that regulated divorce and division of property and inheritance filled a separate niche. This area of law was strongly influenced by Islamic law. Elements of Islamic land and finance law (bond norms, stale debt, fine imposition and payment) were found only in Dagestan and Azerbaijan.

Until the 1920s, the access of women to ʿāda, Sharīʿa, and the Russian legal system was significantly limited. The obstacles they faced were: inequality of rights and duties to the communal authority and court in ʿāda law; subjection of women in society and family; influence of Islamic restrictions on women's participation in social life; and ʿāda interpretation of crimes against women as a harm done to the group to which the victim belongs. These groups could be kindred unions (families of near relations, clans) or territorial unions (communities, community unions).

In customary law, the legal actors were: man, family, clan, community, community union. Men, relatives and communities could stand as a legal person in various circumstances.

With the introduction of Russian courts into the Caucasus in the nineteenth century (Highlander Verbal or Gorskiy Courts), women acquired the right to go to Russian courts independently. However, they still faced obstacles: the narrow range of cases tried by Russian courts and the pressure of Caucasian and Islamic standards regarding the social status of women. The Highlander Courts tried virtually no cases concerned with women. Caucasian women rarely used courts as a way to fight for their rights.

SOVIET PERIOD

Soviet law introduced the concepts of domestic crime (1920s–1940s) and useful and harmful customs (1950s–1980s). The useful aspects of customary law included such traditions as homage to elders, mediation at negotiations, peacekeeping, and property protection, while the harmful ones were blood revenge and subjection of Caucasian women.

Under Soviet law equal rights and duties for men and women of the Soviet Union were established. Women's rights were promulgated among hill-women. Propaganda campaigns were conducted to promote Soviet law. Women gained the right to receive higher legal education and the right to work in Soviet judicial bodies.

The criminal code of the Soviet Union and Caucasus of 1960 included a special category of crimes that represented the relics of local customs (chapter 11). There were three groups of crimes: crimes that affront the equality of women and men, namely payment and acceptance of the bride-price (kalyim), compulsion of a woman to marry, compulsion of a woman to continue marital cohabitation, obstruction of a woman's marrying, abduction of a woman for marriage, bigamy, and polygamy; second, crimes that affect the physical or moral development of non-adults of either sex, namely marriage to an unmarriageable person or cohabitation with an unmarriageable person; and third, reconciliation evasion, blood feud murder, and feticide "on the basis of the relics of former attitudes towards women." In 1998 a new criminal code of the Russian Federation was passed in which this chapter was eliminated but the blood feud clause kept.

THE PRESENT

Women in the Caucasus have the opportunity to use the state legal system for defending their rights. Formally, Caucasian women can be both plaintiff and defendant, although in fact fathers, husbands, or brothers still appear for women in the courts. Women use the state court for fighting for their rights as rarely as before. Statistics on petitions show that the majority of cases are concerned with rape.

Major obstacles to the active use of the modern courts by Caucasian women are the preservation of the traditional sense of justice among Caucasian men and women and the preservation of the traditional social status of men and women, which partly relies on Islamic ideology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(all works cited are in Russian)

PRIMARY SOURCES

- L. A. Chibirova (comp.), The Caucasian periodical press on Osetia and the Osetians, 5 vols., Ckhinvali 1981–91.
- V. K. Gardanov (comp.), Adygs, Balkarians, and Karachians in the materials of the European authors of the thirteenth–nineteenth centuries, Nalchik 1974.
- Gidatlinsky ėada*, Makhachkala 1957.
- B. A. Kaloev (comp.), Osetians from the point of view of foreign travelers (thirteenth–fourteenth centuries), Vladikavkaz 1967.
- H. O. Khashaev (comp.), The monuments of Daghestan customary law of the seventeenth–nineteenth centuries, Moscow 1965.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- I. L. Babich. The evolution of legal culture of Adygs, Moscow 1999.
- V. O. Bobrovnikov, The Muslims of North Caucasus, Moscow 2002.
- Customary law in Russia*, Rostov-in-Don 1999.
- H. M. Hashaev, Sharĕa and ėada in Daghestan, Moscow 1949.
- L. G. Svechnikova, The family law of Caucasian peoples in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Moscow 1994.

IRINA BABICH

Central Asia

Securing equal access to legal assistance is a precondition for achieving equal justice in a society. In the Central Asian republics, equal access to justice is a right declared by constitutions and therefore the states have a legal obligation to provide the arrangements necessary to exercise this right. However, there are few reliable data sources, statistics, or specialized studies that could help to assess usage patterns, especially when it comes to indicators disaggregated by sex, age, ethnicity, and territorial division that may provide more precise information by highlighting underprivileged groups.

Overall analysis of the situation reveals that the use of court services and other judicial mechanisms for dispute resolution at family or community levels is not common among the Muslim population. With the collapse of the Soviet Union and the formation of independent republics, traditional approaches and mindsets become stronger, being associated with “national identification.” The situation characterizing access to qualified legal services that was never ideal during Soviet times was further complicated by new economic, legal, cultural, historic, and other obstacles that emerged in the process of transition from centrally planned to free market economies.

The economic barriers to access to the legal system are significant in the Central Asian states. During the Soviet past, legal services as a rule were not free but could be afforded by the majority of population, as the principal costs were largely borne by the state. With the transition from centrally planned to free market economy and the commercialization of life, including legal and judicial systems, and growing poverty of the population in the region, many people without the necessary financial means are unable to obtain legal aid, and thus become discouraged from defending their interests in the courts that are often slow and expensive. Therefore, the affordability of legal action has become an important issue in the region.

Geographical distribution is a serious barrier, in the Central Asian context, in determining access to justice, given that the majority of the population live in rural areas where legal services, for both criminal and civil cases, are scarce. The situation is even worse in remote mountainous regions. In contrast, in urban areas, the quality of civil legal aid, lack of standards, and corruption lead to a high level of distrust of the judiciary.

Another important factor in influencing the ability to use the legal system is strong cultural and informational barriers. Central Asian women, especially in rural areas, are brought up in the spirit of obedience and subordination to the will of the elders and to the power of men. Traditions nurture and cultivate young women as patient and submissive wives. At the same time, women bear a disproportionate burden of household responsibilities and unpaid domestic work, with limited access to and control over resources, including any time they could use for self-improvement and learning. The claiming of rights by women, whether in the family or workplace, is not approved and is usually viewed as washing dirty linen in public. This is further exacerbated by the fact that the population (both women and men), although highly educated, has very low levels of legal awareness. As a result, women are vulnerable when it comes to protecting their own interests and rights through legal means, and this may partly explain why cases concerning polygamy or sexual harassment in the workplace, which have been legally prohibited in both the Soviet and post-Soviet periods, have almost never been instigated in the courts.

The survival of traditional approaches in regulating gender relations could be explained by the Sovietization of Central Asia (1917–91), which modified but did not change traditional societies by bringing a new social polarization unknown before: the Soviet-oriented ruling elite as against the rest of the indigenous population. The latter continued to preserve and even particularly value traditions at family and local neighborhood levels, in many ways as a means of silent and unconscious protest against the forceful Russification of social norms and education that penetrated Muslim societies but were never internalized by the masses, especially in rural areas. Therefore, relations between sexes and disputes at the family and community levels often continued to be regulated by customs that might not necessarily have been of Islamic origin (for example, bride kidnapping in the areas where nomadic culture had been dominant) but were “traditional.”

Post-Soviet Central Asian countries have separated religion from the state, and the Sharī'a (Islamic law) does not formally have any legal power. However, the services of mullahs are easily accessible for the wider population, especially in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan. This is facilitated by the fact that some provisions in secular laws and norms refer to traditional means in settling civil cases. For instance, in Kyrgyzstan, so-called aksakal (elderly people) courts in local communities have a right to represent public approval/disapproval when judging a situation through the lens of their life experience. In Uzbekistan, the mahalla (neighborhood community) is given powers by the local authorities to act as a “clearance house” for couples before they apply to a court to file for divorce. Given traditional approaches, predominant among mahalla dwellers, the goal is to reconcile families and prevent divorce at any cost, but most often at the high costs paid by women. A family code adopted in independent Uzbekistan contains a provision allowing referral to “customs and traditions” if the legislation does not provide a solution otherwise.

Meanwhile, the current environment provides little alternative. Qualified and free legal aid provided by public psychological-consultative and crisis centers is not a norm, but such centers are being established in Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan and, to a lesser extent, in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, mostly by the efforts of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and with support from international donor organizations. Over the past decade, the Central Asian NGOs have been active, through seminars and training programs, in educating legal professionals in issues such as domestic violence and human trafficking. They also have been active in conducting legal literacy programs that train rural residents, at community levels, in the principles of gender equality, setting up hot lines, and providing free legal aid to the neediest. However, such work has been neither systematic nor coordinated. It has been largely limited in scope and outreach. Equal access to the justice and legal system, particularly with respect to disadvantaged groups, remains a deeply underestimated issue, at the margins of the mainstream of policy-making in the Central Asian countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Academy of Science of Uzbekistan, Islam and women of the Orient. History and present day [in Russian], Tashkent 1990.
- D. Alimova, The Woman Question in Central Asia. Historical study and current problems [in Russian], Tashkent 1991.
- International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights (IHF), Women 2000, New York 2000.
- M. B. Olcott, Women and society in Central Asia, in W. Fierman (ed.), Soviet Central Asia. The failed transformation, Boulder, Colo. 1991, 235–56.
- S. Saidbaev, Islam and society. Results of historical and sociological study [in Russian], Moscow 1984².
- S. Tadjibakhsh, Between Lenin and Allah. Women and ideology in Tajikistan, in H. L. Bodman and N. Tohidi (eds.), Women in Muslim societies. Diversity within unity, Boulder, Colo. 1998.
- M. Tokhtakhodjaeva, Between the slogans of communism and the laws of Islam. The women of Uzbekistan, trans. S. Aslam, ed. C. Balchin, Lahore 1995.

DONO ABDURAZAKOVA

Iran

Although Iranian women have made important strides regarding entry into public schools and institutions of higher learning, they continue to lack sufficient access to their limited legal rights. In pursuing their rights they either do not seek relief from the judiciary or, if they do, end up abandoning their demands as they discover that even with perseverance the judiciary remains unresponsive. The obstacles they face in their attempts to access the legal system include laws that explicitly discourage women from seeing themselves as individuals endowed with rights equal to those of men, a consequently low level of legal literacy required for the pursuit of the limited rights they do have, a legal structure that is not friendly to women, a paucity of legal advisors with sufficient knowledge of women's issues, and a cultural context that discourages women from litigating for their rights, particularly within the confines of family law.

Contemporary Iranian laws are explicit in their unequal treatment of men and women in the arenas of criminal, civil, and family law. This explicit inequality, for instance in giving men the absolute right to divorce and only a limited right to women, is itself an important obstacle to access. Women, particularly in the rural areas and smaller cities, often assume that they do not possess any rights even in situations in which the law does give them limited rights, such as the right to divorce in case of evident spousal abuse, spousal addiction to illicit drugs, or delinquency in financial support. Operating under a patriarchal mindset, they deem their husbands' actions to be immune to any legal recourse. Unmarried women also often assume the absolute authority of their fathers or paternal grandfathers in making decisions about their marriage even though the law allows a woman to marry with the permission of the court if the father or paternal grandfather's opposition to the marriage is deemed unreasonable.

The paucity of lawyers specializing in women's rights adds to the problem of lack of knowledge about legal recourse. In many villages, smaller cities, or even larger cities outside the capital city of Tehran, lawyers are simply not available to women. This is an important drawback, because many of the rights with which women are endowed, particularly in the arena of family law, are ensconced in a very complicated legal framework that requires adequate legal representation for their attainment in a court of law.

In cases where women do pursue their limited rights, the embedded inequalities and the intransigence of the legal system force them to compromise and give up parts of their rights. For instance, the legal imbalance that exists usually leads women to forfeit all or parts of the financial claims they have in their years of marriage in exchange for the right to divorce.

Women are also inhibited in their legal access by the composition of the judiciary, which does not employ female judges. The new system of justice that came into effect after the Islamic Revolution of 1979 dismissed all female judges, gradually allowing women only to act as advisors in courts and not pass sentences. While women's groups continue to put pressure on the judiciary to change, the current essentially all male make-up of the judiciary is undoubtedly unfriendly to women and an important obstacle to access. In addition, the existence of widespread corruption in the judiciary makes its members open to bribes by husbands who are generally better off economically. Many lawyers report that their clients or even they themselves have been threatened by influential persons within the judiciary or other revolutionary institutions who were inspired to do so on the basis of bribes paid by husbands.

Finally, perhaps the most important set of obstacles to access to the legal system is generated by cultural and social impediments, particularly in the domain of family law. Even among families that are seemingly modern, litigation against fathers, paternal grandparents, or husbands is considered unseemly and a source of family shame. Women who are seeking the right to marriage without their father's permission, or divorce, often feel isolated, and married women cannot rely on other family members to act as witnesses in cases of abuse, and are prevented from making their cases public by social pressures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Afshar, Islam and feminisms. An Iranian case study, New York 1998.
 M. Kār, Raf'-'i tab'iz az zanān. Muqāyisah-'i Kumvānsiyūn Raf'-'i tab'iz az zanān bā qavānin-i dākhilī-i Irān, Tehran 1999.
 —, Kudām haqq? Kudām taklif?, Tehran 2001.
 Z. Mir-Hosseini, Women, marriage and the law in post-revolutionary Iran, in H. Afshar (ed.), Women in the Middle East, London 1993, 59–84.
 P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1995.

MEHRANGIZ KAR

The Ottoman Empire

The Ottoman legal system was a complex one that included administrative and public law (kanun), Islamic law (Sharī'a), and customary law ('urf). The Sharī'a had the most direct impact on women's lives, and this examination of women's access to the Ottoman legal system largely focuses on the Sharī'a court (muḥākama shar'iyya). Women in rural areas were also directly affected by customary law, but we do not have sources that would let us study how it affected women. Women had significant access to the Ottoman legal system; that they did so was closely linked to the role of the qāḍī (judge) and the Sharī'a courts in imperial administration. To bolster their authority and legitimacy to a greater degree than in any previous Islamic state, the Ottomans formalized the role of legal scholars in the state by organizing qāḍīs into an official hierarchy and making them part of the state bureaucracy. They also developed a more institutionalized Islamic legal system throughout the empire with the establishment of a more uniform and extensive network of Islamic courts. Ḥanafī judges, trained in the madrāsas of Istanbul and appointed by the central government, presided over the courts in the major provincial cities, assisted by local ‘ulamā’ who served as deputy judges, clerks, and intermediaries between the judge and the local population.

By the end of the sixteenth century Shari‘a courts were found in all the major cities and towns throughout the empire. The larger cities of the empire had several courts to better serve the needs of the local population; for example seventeenth-century Cairo, the second largest city in the empire, had 15 (Hanna 1998, 11). The physical proximity of the Shari‘a courts to the urban population facilitated their use. Women as well as men took advantage of the services the courts provided. The surviving records of these courts provide the single most direct evidence of women’s access to the legal system. In the first study of women’s use of the courts, Ronald Jennings noted that the women of seventeenth-century Kayseri, “came to court regularly, freely, and openly. Manifestly the court was accessible to them and relevant to their lives” (1975, 65). Much of the social and economic history of the Ottoman Empire written in the last 30 years is based on Shari‘a court archives from all parts of the empire. This scholarship confirms the striking visibility of women in these sources; this visibility is itself evidence of women’s participation in the social and economic life of the empire. Some evidence suggests that the number of women using the courts increased in the later centuries of Ottoman rule, a reflection that this participation of women was growing (Zarinebaf-Shahr 1998, 308).

The circumstances under which women utilized the courts were linked to the functions of the Shari‘a courts, and women went to court for the same reasons that men did. First, the courts were similar to the notary offices of Europe – a place to register transactions that fell under the jurisdiction of the Shari‘a, such as a property sale, a marriage contract, or the establishment of a religious endowment (waqf). The vast majority of the entries in the registers of the Shari‘a court archives fall into this category. There is no requirement in Islamic law that these transactions be registered with the qāḍī, but registration provided a written record that might be useful evidence in the future. In other words the courts served as “communal witnesses” (Peirce 1998, 296). Women as well as men used the courts for this purpose. Having a written record might have been particularly important for women since their rights to property were more likely to be challenged.

The second function of the court was to resolve conflicts. If a dispute went to court, it usually meant that other means of mediation and resolution had failed. Most people did not want to take disputes to court, especially family conflicts, and women were under particular pressure not to do so. Nevertheless, some women sued their husbands, brothers, or fathers when they thought their rights had been violated and often these rights were upheld. The courts served as intermediary institutions that mediated family disputes and provided recourse where there were grievances.

Women’s access to the courts appears to have been facilitated by several factors, in addition to the physical proximity of the courts. One, the qāḍī’s court was seen as a “legitimate destination,” a public space in which it was acceptable for women to appear (Seng 1998, 247). While some women were represented by wakīls (agents) and did not appear, many others did attend court. Second, cases were handled expeditiously and court procedures, based primarily on oral testimony, were simple. Third, women expected that their legal rights would be upheld. Historians are generally in agreement that women were aware of their rights and used the norms, laws, and institutions available to them to defend those rights. “That so many women were capable of understanding and managing their own legal problems bespeaks a degree of sophistication on their part” (Jennings 1975, 65). The knowledge of their rights and how to use the system came from formal education, from access to courts and judges who were relatively close by, and/or from the exchange of information in female networks within extended families and urban neighborhoods. They went to court with the expectation that the qāḍīs would protect these rights when they were violated.

Despite the accessibility of the system to women, obstacles restricted access to the legal system for many women. Both class and place of residence played a large role in whether they had access to the courts. For all practical purposes the jurisdiction of the Shari‘a courts did not extend into the rural areas, where customary law (urf) remained in effect. Women in rural areas therefore rarely had access to the formal legal system and to whatever protection this system could provide. Class also played a role. Poor urban women, like their rural counterparts, did not usually have the opportunity or the means to seek protection from the courts. Most of the women who used the courts were women of the propertied classes, women of the social and political elites, though the records do include women of modest means. Women primarily used the courts to protect property rights. The registration of a property sale, a loan, or the establishment of a waqf provided a written record if challenged. When women were involved in litigation, it usually was a lawsuit over the denial of property rights. Finally, for all women the difficulties of going to court to protect their rights in the face of family opposition would have been daunting. Only women who had strong personalities or support networks would have been able to do so.

Urban middle- and upper-class women had access to the Ottoman legal system, and the legal system usually upheld the rights granted to women in the Shari'a. At the same time many women faced obstacles in using this system. Ultimately, the system upheld basic patriarchal structures of society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Gerber, State, society, and law in Islam. Ottoman law in comparative perspective, Syracuse, N.Y. 1995.
- F. M. Göçek and M. D. Baer, Women's experience in Ottoman society through the eighteenth-century Galata Court records, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 48–65.
- N. Hanna, Making big money in 1600. The life and times of Isma'il Abu Taqiyya, Egyptian merchant, Syracuse, N.Y. 1998.
- R. Jennings, Women in early seventeenth-century Ottoman judicial records. The sharia court of Anatolian Kayseri, in Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 18 (1975), 53–114.
- L. Peirce, She is trouble, and I will divorce her, in G. R. G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world. Power, patronage, and piety, New York 1998, 267–300.
- Y. J. Seng, Invisible women. Residents of early sixteenth-century Istanbul, in G. R. G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world. Power, patronage, and piety, New York 1998, 241–68.
- A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- F. Zarinebaf-Shahr, Ottoman women and the tradition of seeking justice in the eighteenth century, in M. C. Zilfi (ed.), Women in the Ottoman Empire. Middle Eastern women in the early modern era, Leiden 1997, 253–63.
- , Women and the public eye in eighteenth-century Istanbul, in G. R. G. Hambly (ed.), Women in the medieval Islamic world. Power, patronage, and piety, New York 1998, 301–24.

MARGARET L. MERIWETHER

South Asia

South Asia's relatively well-established legal system allows Muslim women to exercise their rights in marriage, divorce, maintenance, custody, and inheritance under Shari'a and secular laws. Their ability to do so depends on their level of education, and their economic, political, and sociocultural situation. The continuation of feudal patriarchal social structures, poverty, widespread illiteracy, and cumbersome court procedures tend to work against women. The struggles over legislative changes in India and Pakistan demonstrate the difficulties faced by women in realizing their rights. Despite the ostensible success of the Indian women's movement in India (which before 1947 included Pakistan and Bangladesh), every legislative initiative that improved women's rights relating to inheritance, divorce, and polygamy was strongly resisted by conservatives of both Muslim and Hindu communities. Following partition, despite constitutional and legislated rights, the same forces actively oppose the realization of rights, often citing the same political and social reasons that devolve around family and community loyalty, adversely affecting poor, rural, and semi-literate women.

After 1947, with the creation of Pakistan and later of Bangladesh, the safeguards under Shari'a laws, such as a waiting and arbitration period after declaration of divorce, were legislatively and administratively tightened, as were laws on polygamy and inheritance. Indian Muslim law remained without such safeguards, but Shari'a laws interpreted by secular civil courts have benefited women.

INDIA

In India a number of cases have highlighted the inadequacies of the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act (DMMA) in the absence of safeguards particularly with regard to maintenance, divorce, and polygamy. The Indian courts had used the mahr or bridal gift as the compensation due to women at divorce in place of maintenance. In the Bai Tahira case the court, citing section 125 of the Criminal Procedure Code 1973, ruled that it was the obligation of a divorced husband to provide maintenance if the wife were indigent. This set a precedent for other maintenance cases, in particular Muhammad Ahmed v. Shah Bano Begum, which created a political furor and led to the passage of the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act 1986. This act provides some latitude to courts in Section 2, stating that a Muslim husband's obligation extends to reasonable and fair provision as well as the amount of mahr due or other properties promised at the time of marriage. This was demonstrated by Ali v. Sufaira in 1988 when it was noted "that the unmistakable intent of the 1986 Act was to protect the interests of divorced Muslim women" (Pearl and W. Menski 1998, 216–17). Indian Muslim law has effectively established the Qur'anic basis for the husband's responsibility on divorce and the 1986 act has through its distinction between mahr, maintenance, and fair provision supported that (Pearl and W. Menski 1998, 222).

PAKISTAN

Pakistan enacted the Muslim Family Law Ordinance (MFLO) in 1961, which established codes for marriage, divorce, and inheritance. Arbitration councils and nikāh registrars would regulate unilateral divorce and polygamy by enforcing the waiting and arbitration period and the terms of the marriage contract. The Pakistan Women Lawyers Association has tried to compensate for the poverty and illiteracy of women by working to represent women and to advocate simplification of judicial procedures. Some changes are apparent. In 1952 the Supreme Court ruled in Syeeda Khanum v. Muhammad Sami that “if the wives were allowed to dissolve their marriage without consent of their husbands by merely giving up their dowers, paid or promised to be paid, the institution of marriage would be meaningless as there would be no stability attached to it.” In 1959 the Lahore High Court ruled in Balquis Fatima v. Najm-ul-Ikram Qureshi that the court could grant the wife a divorce if the couple were incompatible, departing from accepted Ḥanafī law by quoting a Qur’ānic verse: “Unless they both fear they cannot comply with God’s bounds . . . Then it is no offence if the woman ransoms herself” (2:28). This in effect utilized Mālikī law, which recognized marital discord as grounds for divorce. In rendering judgment the court referred directly to the Qur’ān’s support of women (Esposito and DeLong 2001, 79–80). Pakistani women’s groups have been extremely critical of the Hudood Ordinances passed in 1988, and of the Enforcement of Shariah Ordinance (which declared the Sharī’a as the main source of law in Pakistan) as it failed to distinguish between rape and adultery and endorsed the unequal weight of testimony under the law of evidence, which favored men.

BANGLADESH

In Bangladesh the Shariat Act, the DMMA, and the MFLO laws were included in the legal system. In addition to the arbitration council, rural courts called salish were sought to be regulated by the Village Courts Ordinance 1976 and the Council of Dispute (Municipal Areas) 1979 (Hashmi 2000, 103–4). Village courts rulings, a mixture of rural tradition and conservatism, work against women. Non-governmental organizations that work on women’s issues have been subjected to fatwas that denounce their activities (Hashmi 2000, 103–113). Federal courts have referred directly to the Qur’ān to support women’s right to maintenance as in the case of Md. Hefzur Rahman v. Shamsun Nahar Begum in 1995 (Pearl and Menski 1998, 205) and that of Jesmin Sultana v. Mohammad Elias in 1977, upholding the right to mahr and maintenance unless the wife remits the mahr amount voluntarily (Pearl and Menski 1998, 374).

SRI LANKA

In Sri Lanka Shāfi’ī law is followed in the Sharī’a courts, and under pressure from conservatives, women judges cannot be appointed despite the fact that in secular courts Muslim women were both lawyers and judges.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. L. Esposito and N. J. DeLong, Women in Muslim family law, New York 2001.
 T. I. Hashmi, Women and Islam in Bangladesh, London 2000.
 M. A. Nuhuman, Religious identity, religious fundamentalism and Muslim women in Sri Lanka, in Women Living under Muslim Laws, Dossier 21 (September 1998), 89–111.
 D. Pearl and W. Menski, Muslim family law, London 1998.

SHAHIDA LATEEF

Southeast Asia

This entry describes and evaluates issues within the legal systems of the Southeast Asian nations (mainly Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, Brunei, the Philippines, and Thailand) and how they affect Muslim women’s access to justice.

OVERVIEW OF THE LEGAL SYSTEMS IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

The legal systems of the Southeast Asian nations are typically characterized by pluralism. In a particular country there will be a generally applicable system of law enforced for matters common to the general population. This generally applicable law regulates the lives of citizens with regard to crime, commerce, and a broad spectrum of civil matters covering tort, contract, trust, and modern business and social transactions. In many of the countries, the commonly prescribed system of law is based on the legal system of a country’s pre-independent colonial power. The prevailing legal systems of Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei, for example, are broadly based on the common law originating in England. The Philippine system of law reflects Spanish and American influences. Colonial Dutch law, on the other hand, heavily influences Indonesia’s legal system.

In the majority of the countries, however, matters pertaining to the major faiths and cultures of citizens are formally regulated by separate, co-existing systems of personal laws. These matters mainly consist of the observation of religious rituals and adherence to religious precepts. Most importantly they include rules on marriage and divorce and matters ancillary to these issues, such as maintenance, inheritance, guardianship of children, adoption, and the constitution and administration of personal court systems.

Muslims form significant percentages of the population in many of the Southeast Asian countries. Muslims constitute the majority population in Malaysia, Indonesia, and Brunei. In countries where Muslims are minorities, they have long histories of practicing Islamic law and way of life. Historically, governments of the day in these countries have allowed Muslims to continue applying Islamic rules and principles in many aspects of their private transactions. Thus, Islamic law develops into an important personal legal structure within many of the Southeast Asian legal systems featuring it as a distinct subset of legal pluralism in these countries.

In Malaysia, the mandatory prescription of Islamic law to Muslims for specific personal and family matters is constitutionally provided. The provision delineates the specific powers and jurisdictions of institutions to be charged with the legislation and administration of Islamic law. It includes a prohibition from interference by the ordinary courts and the federal legislature. In Indonesia, the Marriage Act (No. 1/1974) stipulates that a marriage is legitimate when it is conducted within the law of each of the parties' religion and belief. For a Muslim, the Compilation of Islamic Law provides that such a marriage must be conducted in accordance with Islamic law. Malaysia, Singapore, Brunei, and the Philippines have formal Shari'a court structures with jurisdictions and administrations separate from the ordinary courts. In Thailand, the enforceability of Islamic law is less clear. However, historical evidence shows that past governments have positively included Islamic law as a legitimate source of personal law for Muslims in the southern areas of the country where Muslims form the majority. The substance and structure of Islamic law as historically developed in these areas continue to prevail.

In many of the Southeast Asian countries, Islamic law is interpreted to suit local situations. It is enacted and codified through formal and contemporary processes of legislation. In Malaysia, each of the 13 states and federal territories has its own body of Islamic legislation that includes the Islamic Family Law Enactment and the Syariah Criminal Code. In Singapore personal law matters for Muslims are codified in the Administration of Muslim Law Act 1966, while in Brunei they are included in the Islamic Council and Kadi's Court Act (Term 77). Indonesia collates Islamic rules and principles to be applied to Muslims in its Compilation of Islamic Law. Muslim-governed provinces in Mindanao, in the Philippines, enforce the Muslim Code on Personal Law. Thailand regulates the prescription of Islamic law in a Royal Decree of 1945, which gives discretion to the Ministry of Internal Affairs to establish Islamic Committees, now known as the Islamic Councils, in provinces with significant percentages of Muslims. These councils advise the provinces' Administrative Committees on matters pertaining to Muslims.

MUSLIM WOMEN AND ISLAMIC LAW

Muslim women within these regions are significantly affected by the legal systems through their encounters with the substantive and procedural aspects of Islamic law as administered in the various countries. Since the use of Islamic law is prescribed mostly for matrimonial issues, women, disproportionately, become plaintiffs in cases involving divorce, maintenance, and guardianship of children.

Within this region, it is accepted that Islamic matrimonial law gives a husband a unilateral right to pronounce a divorce. Such a pronouncement, in effect, may be made at the husband's behest. Although a modern interpretation of Islamic law enables the legislature to deem a pronouncement outside of the Shari'a court a matrimonial offence, such a pronouncement is rarely considered to invalidate the divorce. A woman, in contrast, is not given similar freedom to dissolve her marriage. This means that a woman who intends to separate from her husband without his consent has to use the court to apply for an order of a dissolution of marriage. Similarly, if she disagrees with her husband's pronouncement of divorce, she must take steps to contest it in court.

A husband is also the person vested with the paramount responsibility for providing for the financial and material maintenance of his wife and children. When he fails to do this, and the wife has no other means of support, it often falls on her to seek redress in the court for herself and her children. Women also, more often than men, have to instigate court proceedings to settle issues relating to the custody of their children in cases of separation and divorce. Since Islamic law in many of the Southeast Asian countries stipulates that a father shall have the legal guardianship of his children, even when their physical custody is vested in someone else, a mother who has custody may find it difficult to deal with issues that require the consent of a legal guardian. Consequently, she has to go to court to seek redress. In these ways, women become primary plaintiffs in Islamic matrimonial proceedings and face many issues with regard to the substance and procedure of the law.

SUBSTANCE AND STRUCTURE OF ISLAMIC LEGAL SYSTEMS AFFECTING WOMEN'S ACCESS TO JUSTICE

Substantial aspects of Islamic law refer to the body of legal principles to be applied in resolving disputes. With respect to the Southeast Asian region, the substantial part of the law is legislated based on a particular community's interpretation of the Sharī'a's primary sources, namely the Qur'ān and ḥadīth, or Prophetic traditions. Furthermore, a community's adherence to particular Islamic schools of thought (madhāhib) is also influential in determining the kind of legal principles developed. The resulting effect of such practice is that while Qur'ānic principles and provisions of the ḥadīth that are clearly stated are commonly accepted, those with more general statements are interpreted in varied ways within the region. The basic concept of a man's right to unilateral divorce, for example, is commonly adopted, but the ways in which a woman may seek a dissolution of marriage by an order of court differs quite significantly among the countries. In Malaysia and Singapore, the laws allow for three methods in which women may apply for such orders. These are the divorce for breach of a marriage stipulation (ta'liq), divorce by way of khul' (returning of the mahr), and faskh (dissolution on specified grounds). Detailed provisions of these methods, however, vary substantially between the two countries. The Philippines regulates khul' and faskh divorces but not ta'liq. In addition, it allows for divorce by tafwid (delegation). In Brunei, a Muslim woman may seek a dissolution of marriage by way of faskh on a very general ground of "accordance with bukum syarak [principles of Islamic law]." A Muslim woman in Indonesia may bring a divorce suit in court on the grounds that include adultery, desertion, violence, physical incapacity, violation of ta'liq, and apostasy.

Muslim women in the region are further affected by the procedural aspects of Islamic law. These refer to the rules governing access to courts and proceedings in them. The problem of the Islamic law structure in the Southeast Asian region emanates from its distinct position as a sub-system within the general legal framework. Since it constitutes a separate system, it operates with different modes of access and processes from the general court system. This can prove to be problematic to many Muslim women in the region. In Malaysia where each of the 13 states and federal territories have separate and independent legislative and judicial jurisdictions over Islamic law, a woman faces difficulties in proving she falls under a particular court's jurisdiction for a divorce case where her marriage has been contracted within a different boundary. Even where a court accepts jurisdiction, the enforcement of its judgment against the defendant husband may be problematic if he relocates to another jurisdiction.

Effective procedures are lacking in many of the countries with regard to controlling a husband's arbitrary pronouncement of divorce. Even where rules exist that render pronouncement outside of the court a matrimonial offence, such as in Malaysia and Singapore, the limited sentencing jurisdictions of the Sharī'a courts means that they are unable to mete out effective sanctions against the action. In Malaysia, husbands willingly pay fines for making such pronouncements without their wives' knowledge. Upon payment, the courts declare the pronouncements valid.

Procedural issues in the region also occur where one party to a marriage converts or denounces Islam. They include questions such as whether the Muslim courts have jurisdiction to declare that a marriage subsists or is dissolved after a conversion or denouncement and whether the courts can make matrimonial orders against the non-Muslim spouses. Since Islamic law has limited jurisdiction over the population, when a woman converts to Islam, she may not be able to apply for a divorce in the ordinary courts if, as the case for Malaysia, the legal system specifies that Muslim marriages may only be ruled by Islamic law. On the other hand, she may not use the Sharī'a court since the court will not have jurisdiction over her non-converting spouse.

A fundamental factor within the Sharī'a legal sub-systems in the Southeast Asian nations that may affect Muslim women's access to justice is the elements of patriarchy that persist in the administration of Islamic justice. Judges of Muslim courts are mainly men and consequently decisions made are gendered, especially in issues such as domestic violence and guardianship of children. In many of the countries, women who flee their homes to seek shelter from wife abuse face problems when claiming maintenance in court in divorce cases. They are often considered nusyuz (disobedient) for leaving the matrimonial homes without their husbands' permission and are thus not entitled to maintenance. Many judges do not think domestic violence a legitimate ground to abrogate from the rules on nusyuz behavior.

In the case of guardianship of children, decision-making about the person and the property of minors are consistently deemed to be vested in the father or, in his absence, his relatives. Physical care, on the other hand, is usually considered the primary responsibility of the mother. In cases of divorce, women find this problematic since while caring for their children they are not able to decide on issues such as their children's birth registration and schooling.

Efforts to eradicate problems Muslim women face in obtaining access to the legal systems in the Southeast Asian region are substantially pervasive. They are carried out at local levels and regionally. In general, female advocacy activities are not instigated by religious-based but by cross-cultural organizations. However, where the Muslim population is the majority, programs that focus on the well-being of Muslim women often feature as major undertakings. Legal reform of the Islamic law structure is central to these pursuits.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- A. A. An-Na'im (ed.), Islamic family law in a changing world. A global resource book, London 2002.
- A. H. Buang (ed.), Islamic law in Syariah courts in Malaysia [in Malay], Kuala Lumpur 1998.
- Z. Kamaruddin (ed.), Islamic family law issues 2000, Kuala Lumpur 2001.
- Sisters in Islam Regional Workshop, Islamic family law and justice for Muslim women. Divorce. Singapore, Indonesia, Philippines, Malaysia, unpublished, Kuala Lumpur 2001.
- , Islamic family law and justice for Muslim women. Financial provisions. Singapore, Indonesia, Philippines, Malaysia, unpublished, Kuala Lumpur 2001.
- A. M. Yaacob (ed.), Islamic family law and women in ASEAN countries [in Malay], Kuala Lumpur 1999.

NORAIDA ENDUT

Sub-Saharan Africa

INTRODUCTION

The access of women to legal systems is integral to the consolidation of democracy and pursuit of good governance through the rule of law. The rule of law presupposes parity of rights, privileges, and opportunities for women to participate in and affect public deliberations, and gain greater control over their lives. Consistent with evolving international objectives, most national constitutions espouse anti-discrimination principles. However, the significance of inclusive paradigms and guarantees is circumscribed by gender stratification and asymmetry. The issues and challenges of women's access to the legal system in Sub-Saharan Africa are not peculiar. They share striking parallels with similar concerns in other parts of the world. In the African context, the concerns are exacerbated by cutbacks in social spending and the exigencies of oppositional movements fueled by legitimacy crises concerning the inherent inequities of the global political economy.

Legal pluralism characterizes many Sub-Saharan African states where contemporary legal institutions hammered out during the early post-independence years show various degrees of accommodation to customary, Islamic, and European-derived systems of law. There is considerable variation throughout the region regarding how central a role Shari'a (Islamic religious law) is accorded, from limited, mixed jurisdiction in minority Muslim states such as Ghana, Kenya, and Tanzania, to the regional authority of northern Nigeria, to the use of Shari'a as civil code in Sudan. However, there are some underlying similarities and these have resonance for women's experiences of the law. The Shari'a has long derived power in African societies because it is written law, unlike the oral-memory nature of customary law and in counterpoint to the written law of Europeans. It guarantees women basic rights in marriage, divorce, adoption, inheritance, and property. Most Sub-Saharan countries have a national Shari'a court of appeals to adjudicate disputes pertaining to family matters even where other kinds of law, such as criminal or commercial, have superseded Islamic law. Shari'a can therefore be applied to various aspects of life, varying by country in Muslim Africa, but it will always include the domestic concerns of women. For many, Islamic law is embodied in the person of the local qadi (Muslim scholar/judge) who hears disputes. The qadis have knowledge of the extensive written commentary on the Shari'a and grasp the processes of selectivity, procedural precedent, and reinterpretation that can allow for a flexible and vital system. In recent decades, thinly-veiled protests against eroding material bases of patriarchal privileges and shifting thresholds of traditional authority are increasingly proffered to justify the systematic imposition of the Shari'a to govern gender relations, as in the high-profile case of the twelve northernmost Nigerian states. Religious injunctions and prohibitions are not the only determinants of women's access; nor are they invariably adverse. In interrogating and contemplating strategies to enhance the access of women to the legal system, the premium placed on resource distribution under the Shari'a is noteworthy. In fact, there are grounds to assert socioeconomic justice as a reciprocal and valid prerequisite for the enactment of the Shari'a penal and justice system in those areas that have adopted its criminal code, such as northern Nigeria. In some respects, the upsurge in the adoption of the Shari'a advanced the goals of decentralization and fostered the accessibility of grassroots communities to the legal system. Nevertheless, this dividend is offset by the gender backlash reinforced by the trend. Similarly, the value of expediting and settling disputes without strict adherence to written rules of procedure in Shari'a courts is discounted by disparate rules for testimonial competence that spell civil death for women and impinge on due process norms. The extent to which patriarchal prejudice informs the realities and options of women varies. Women are not a monolithic category; they are differentiated by socioeconomic status, ethnicity, and other variables that mediate their individual experiences. Furthermore, women are not passive objects of patriarchal institutions and discourses, but autonomous agents who actively negotiate their subjectivities. For example, Hirsch (1998), dealing with Swahili marital disputes, shows how Muslim women successfully navigate and at times manipulate the qādi court system in Kenya.

IMPEDIMENTS AND REMEDIES

Gender disparities characterize the access of women to the legal system. This phenomenon is attributable to a confluence of factors that are compounded by women's poverty and illiteracy. The burden that women bear magnifies the geographic distance of legal forums and ordinary challenges of the legal sector such as prohibitive costs, cumbersome procedures and technicalities, protracted proceedings, and language difficulties. The handicap posed by inadequate services and out-reaches, the shortage of skilled or competent personnel, and the non-implementation of judgments and policy or legislative decisions, among other factors, attains harsher proportions in the face of persistent inconsistencies and conflicts of laws, lack of knowledge and understanding, social reprobation, and fear of reprisals. These constraints are further complicated in settings characterized by civil war and conflict.

Strategies to improve the access of African women to the legal system address considerations of demand, supply, and context to promote just outcomes, fair and equitable treatment, responsive and affordable procedures, comprehensibility, and predictability. Frameworks articulated to enhance the effectiveness, efficiency, credibility, and accessibility of the legal system often outline an inventory of interventions to inspire confidence and build capacity, stimulate enabling environment, and redress systematic gender bias in the content of law, the nature of legal processes, and the delivery of legal services. Some interventions give centrality to progressive reinterpretations of Shari'a, cultivating dynamic civil society, nurturing transparency and accountability, influencing favorable policy levers and legislative instruments, supporting participation and training of stakeholder and auxiliaries, and promoting gender-friendly legal education.

Other remedial measures give differing degrees of emphasis to contesting gender-specific derivative rights, regularizing rules of evidence and proof, streamlining exacting procedures, rethinking concessions to legal pluralism, dispelling fears and countering disincentives to access, establishing specialized tribunals and summary proceedings for gender-sensitive matters, instituting mobile clinics and courts, and safeguarding due process.

CONCLUSION

Effective access denotes the recognition of rights and entitlements, capabilities to assert rights and seek protection, and infrastructure to enforce remedies and catalyze autonomous agency. As anti-discrimination norms travel across radically different histories, cultures, and structures, substantive access to the legal system is fundamental to vindicate Muslim women's needs, constraints, and vulnerabilities. Gender-responsive legal reform initiatives typically privilege advocacy, policy dialogue or negotiation, and legislative review or reform. Once enacted, laws do not grow limbs with which to run after and apprehend transgressors. It takes the initiative of relevant beneficiaries to harness the transformative potentials of law.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. Afkhami (ed.), Faith and freedom, Syracuse N.Y. 1995.
- J. N. D. Anderson, Islamic law in Africa, London 1954.
- A. Christelow, Islamic law in Africa, in N. Levtzion and R. L. Pouwels, The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 373–96.
- J. Ezeilo, L. M. Tawfiq, and A. Afolabi-Akiyode (eds.), Sharia implementation in Nigeria. Issues and challenges on women's rights and access to justice, Enugu, Nigeria 2003.
- S. Golub, Beyond the rule of law orthodoxy. The legal empowerment alternative, in Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Working Papers, Rule of Law Series, Democracy and Rule of Law Project 41 (October 2003), Washington, D.C., <<http://www.ceip.org/files/Publications/wp41.asp?p=1&from=pubauthor.>>
- M. Greico, Women, legal reform and development in Sub-Saharan Africa, in World Bank, Findings, Africa Region 20 (1994), Washington, D.C., <http://www.worldbank.org/afr/findings/english/find20.htm.>

- S. F. Hirsch, Pronouncing and preserving. Gender and discourses in an African Islamic court, Chicago 1998.
- M. H. Kamali, Appellate review and judicial independence in Islamic law, in C. Mallat (ed.), Islam and public law, London 1993, 49–83.
- D. Manning, The role of legal services organizations in attacking poverty, 2001, <http://www.worldbank.org/legal/ljr_01/doc/Manning.pdf>, 24–6.
- L. A. Obiora, Supri, supri, supri, Oyibo? An interrogation of gender mainstreaming deficits, in Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 29:2 (2004), <www.journals.uchicago.edu/Signs/journal/issues/v29n2/290224/290224.html>.
- L. Welchman (ed.), Women's rights and Islamic family law. Perspectives on reform, London 2004.
- Women in Law and Development (WiLDAF), Access of women to legal and judicial services in Sub-Saharan Africa, Ghana 2000. See also Asian Development Bank, Legal empowerment. Advancing good governance and poverty reduction, in Law and Policy Reform Series, 2001, <<http://www.adb.org/Documents/Others/Law>>.

LESLYE AMEDE OBIORA

Turkey

The founding of the Turkish Republic in 1923 brought an end to the Ottoman Empire's system of parallel laws, which were applied depending on a citizen's religion, gender, community, and occupational status or sect, and established a single, secular, and standardized judicial system based the European system of law. The Turkish Civil Code of 1926, adapted from the Swiss Civil Code, abolished polygyny and granted women equal rights in matters of divorce, child custody, and inheritance. The Turkish Penal Code, also adopted in 1926, is based on the Italian Criminal Code.

An extensive reform of the Turkish Civil Code was accomplished in November 2001. The new Civil Code, which came into effect on 1 January 2002, abolished the supremacy of men in marriage and thus established the full equality of men and women in the family. It also set the equal division of property acquired during marriage as the default property regime, raised the legal minimum age of marriage to 18 for both men and women (previously 17 for men and 15 for women), gave children born out of wedlock the same inheritance rights as those born inside a marriage, and allowed single parents to adopt children. Another recent (October 2001) step toward gender equality in the Turkish legal system is the amendment of Article 41 of the constitution, redefining the family as an entity "based on equality between spouses" (WWHR – New Ways 2002).

However, it is evident that legal reforms alone are not sufficient to prevent gender discrimination and women's rights violations. The majority of women in Turkey are unaware of their legal rights and have very little access to pertinent information. Many women have little or no income and, until very recently, free or inexpensive legal counseling services for women were non-existent in Turkey. In the last decade, women lawyers have established some legal counseling services under the auspices of bar associations in the larger cities, but their number and capacity are very limited. A human rights education program, implemented by Women for Women's Human Rights (WWHR) – New Ways since 1998 in 30 community centers throughout the country in cooperation with the directorate for social services, aims to provide ongoing training sessions where women not only learn what their rights are, but are also given the skills and support that allow them to actively achieve those rights. An evaluation of the program shows that only 11 percent of those who participated had some knowledge of their legal rights prior to the training. The majority indicated that the knowledge and competencies acquired through the training have helped them achieve greater gender equality in both the home and the community (Kardam 2003).

In addition to lack of knowledge, education, economic means, and state resources for legal counseling, other factors limiting women's access to the legal system include the prevalence of customary and religious practices, language barriers for women belonging to non-Turkish ethnic groups living in Turkey, and oppression within the family preventing women from seeking their legal rights.

The lives of the majority of women living in Turkey continue to be shaped by a multiplicity of traditional practices that violate existing laws, including early and forced marriage, polygamous marriage, "honor" crimes, virginity testing, and restrictions on women's mobility. Research conducted with 599 women living in the eastern and southeastern regions of Turkey shows that 16.3 percent of women in the region were married earlier than the minimum legal age of 15 (raised to 18 in 2002). More than half of the women (51 percent) were married without their consent although consent of both parties is a precondition for marriage under Turkish law. One in ten women live in polygynous marriages, although polygamy was banned under the Civil Code in 1926 (Ilkcaracan and WWHR 1998).

Research findings also show that it is not uncommon for uncodified customary or religious laws to be applied in matters related to marriage, despite their lack of validity under the Turkish legal system. For example, only 54 percent of women in civil marriages indicated that, in the event of divorce, the Civil Code would dictate the terms; 23 percent said customary laws would govern divorce and 14 percent said religious laws would prevail (Ilkkaracan 1998).

Women who were married in a religious ceremony but who had no civil marriage constitute a distinct group without access to the legal system. According to the Turkish constitution and the Civil Code, only a civil marriage enacted by legally authorized officials is considered a valid marriage before the law. Religious marriage alone confers no legally binding rights. In fact, according to law, couples must have an officially documented civil marriage before a religious marriage ceremony can take place. Violation of this is a crime under Article 237 of the Penal Code, both for the person who conducts the religious ceremony as well as for the couple (WWHR – New Ways 2002). Despite these legal provisions, 8.3 percent of married women living in Turkey have only a religious marriage, and thus have no recourse to the legal system on matters relating to their marriage (SIS 1994).

Many women belonging to non-Turkish ethnic groups, including Kurds, Zaza, and Arabs, have little or no command of the Turkish language. They are thus severely disadvantaged in terms of accessing the legal system, as the official language of all governmental institutions, including judicial ones, is Turkish.

While the reform of the Turkish Civil Code constitutes a major step toward establishing gender equality in Turkey, lack of substantive reforms in legal, social, and political domains – such as a variety of coordinated state programs and services for women, including legal counseling services, and state programs to eradicate violence against women, prevent gender discrimination in the educational and economic spheres, and increase women's participation in political life – makes its real effect in eradication of gender discrimination less of a success story.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- P. Ilkkaracan and WWHR (Women for Women's Human Rights), Exploring the context of sexuality in eastern Turkey, in Reproductive Health Matters, 6 (1998), 66–75, < <http://www.wwhr.org/?id=743> >.
- P. Ilkkaracan, Doğu Anadolu'da kadın ve aile, in A. B. Hacimirzaoğlu (ed.), 75 yılda kadınlar ve erkekler, İstanbul 1998, 173–92.
- N. Kardam, WWHR – New Ways women's human rights training program (1995–2003). Evaluation report, İstanbul 2003.

SIS (State Institute of Statistics), Main indicators. Women in Turkey, 1978–1993, Ankara 1994.

WWHR (Women for Women's Human Rights) – New Ways, The new legal status of women in Turkey, İstanbul 2002.

PINAR ILKKARACAN

Western Europe

The fifteen million-strong Muslim population of Europe is now a well established part of the Muslim diaspora, giving rise to a new form of “European Islam.” The willingness and capacity of European societies to accommodate the presence of Muslims on the basis of religious difference has become a particularly challenging political issue in many states. The primary mechanism by which states have accommodated Islamic difference is through the establishment of particular legal provisions addressing specific needs. Such accommodation is problematic, however, as most European legal systems are avowedly secular in nature and aim to maintain a centralist and uniform legal system within national boundaries. The philosophy of secular liberalism that underpins most European conceptions of law has prevented such states from taking the more radical step of officially recognizing Shari'a as a legitimate counterpart to official state law. Thus, although there are fundamental differences of approach between European states in the extent to which official laws have recognized Muslim practices, states are united in their rejection of formal recognition of Islamic law having status and application equal to official laws. Consequently, the question of official recognition of Shari'a is one that affects Muslim men and women equally. Crucial differences arise, however, in the way legal rights are gendered to the detriment of women in Shari'a, and the extent to which these are sanctioned by European states.

Some of the main legal issues pertinent to Muslim women are marriage, divorce, rights of inheritance, child custody, the laws of evidence, and the wearing of the hijab in public spaces such as the workplace and schools. The relationship between European laws and Shari'a can be categorized in terms of three models, all of which can be located on a spectrum which posits assimilation/absorption at one end and pluralism/multi-culturalism at the other. The first model consists of cases where the accommodation of Muslim difference is incorporated into the fabric of official law. For example, it is acknowledged that a woman must be afforded legal protection against possible discrimination in the workplace on the basis of wearing the hijāb. Individual states have been forced to comply with recent developments in European law such as the Equal Treatment at Work Directive (2000/78/EC), itself promulgated under Article 13 of the European Community Treaty, which outlaws discrimination in the workplace on a number of grounds, including religion. Muslim women who wear hijāb are among the main beneficiaries of state implementations of this significant directive.

The second approach is one whereby Muslims have developed means by which official laws can be legitimately avoided. Muslims are following those aspects of state law they consider appropriate or not in direct conflict with Islamic precepts. Bracketing together Islamic obligations with provisions in state law, a synthesized form of Shari'a is developed that avoids breaching official law. This hybrid form of law remains unrecognized by official law but is a potent and dominant force for many Muslim communities in European states. The area of marriage laws may be seen as an example of this approach whereby the nikāh ceremony, although not formally recognized by state law, functions as an integral part of the marriage ceremony and is incorporated within civil procedures. This has elements of both the pluralist and assimilationist models. There is no official recognition of Muslim difference and so assimilation takes place in the need to comply with the civil marriage procedure. However, the nikāh is tolerated at the margins of state law, giving rise to a nebulous form of legal pluralism.

The third model is found in the conflict between state laws and Shari'a injunctions. Here, liberal secular ideals come into play. There is a clear rejection of Muslim religious difference by the state on the basis that Muslim demands do not comply with so-called secular ideals such as gender equality. The assimilationist rationale underpins state rejections of such Muslim claims as men's unilateral right to divorce and polygyny, mothers' lesser rights of child custody, women's reduced rights of inheritance, the diminished weight accorded a woman's evidence against a man and, most recently, state restrictions on the wearing of the hijāb. It is important to note here the burgeoning feminist literature exploring women's legal rights in Islam and the new exegetical work on scripture that is challenging the restricted notion of such gendered rights. Muslims concerned with state rejection of Islamic family and personal laws also have the choice of bringing legal claims outside the official legal system and in Muslim organizations that apply Islamic law. The European-wide Fatwa Council and the British Shariah Council are examples of community institutions that will adjudicate and mediate within an Islamic legal framework.

Both the second and third models are leading to the development of legal measures for Muslim women that are less discriminatory than conservative interpretations of such rights under Shari'a. To take the model of hybridity, the fact that Muslim men have to comply with state procedures to register a marriage has resulted in the granting of important rights to Muslim wives and the prohibition of unfair practices, under the aegis of secular state laws. Thus women do not have to challenge their husbands' "right" to take on additional wives – it is simply banned by state law. Because the state registers marriages, women have greater custody rights of children upon divorce. The model of assimilation has also provided for greater rights for women in areas of inheritance, the rules of evidence, men's unilateral right to divorce and, of course, polygyny. The European picture is not one of homogeneity, however. Individual state systems vary in their approach, as do Islamic schools of jurisprudence and Islamic interpretations of women's rights in such discourses.

Legal protection of the right to wear the hijāb is a particularly pertinent issue in the light of European law. The wearing of the hijāb in schools is a good example of the inconsistency of rights in European states. The stances taken by Britain (tolerance) and France (proscription) illustrate the diversity of state laws in this area. The issue is further complicated by the fact that the European Convention on Human Rights 1950 gives European citizens the right to practice their religion (Article 9) and also the right not to be discriminated against on the ground, inter alia, of religion (Article 14). Thus, French Muslim women may challenge the ban as a human rights legal issue as they are being forced to choose between religiously mandated attire and access to public education. Additionally, a claim could be made under the French constitutional right to freedom of conscience, education, and expressions of religious belief. This example illustrates the situation in other European states where laws may be contradictory and inconsistent.

Powerful cultural norms and the stigma attached to such issues as divorce have resulted in women failing to access their legal rights – either in state or community courts. Many are unaware of their rights, under either Shari'a or state legal systems. State courts can also view Muslim women in a stereotypical manner, often as passive victims in cases such as forced marriage. State systems often require litigants to possess substantial financial and other resources, to which poorer Muslim women often do not have ready access. Migrant Muslim women may also encounter substantial language problems in instigating legal claims in state courts. The reliance on alternative dispute resolution in the form of local community courts may result in traditional interpretations of Sharī'a and discriminate against women in the key areas outlined above. A continued problem is that many interpreters and enforcers of Sharī'a are male community "experts" who interpret women's legal rights in a conservative manner, often reinforcing entrenched patriarchal interpretations of scripture. State legal systems also often rely on such "experts" to give definitive interpretations of Islamic law. Consequently, women's access to European state and community legal systems has been limited.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- M. D. Evans, Religious liberty and international law in Europe, Cambridge 1997.
- S. Ferrari and A. Bradney (eds.), Islam in European legal systems, Aldershot, U.K. 2000.
- S. Hunter (ed.), Islam, Europe's second religion. The new social, cultural and political landscape, Westport, Conn., 2002.
- Q. Mirza, Islam, hybridity and the laws of marriage, in Australian Feminist Law Journal 14 (2000), 1–22.
- J. Nielsen, Muslims in Western Europe, Edinburgh 1995.
- , Towards a European Islam, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1999.
- D. Pearl and W. Menski, Muslim family law, London 1998.
- S. Roald, Women in Islam. The Western experience, London 2001.
- W. A. R. Shadid and P. S. Koningsveld, Religious freedom and the position of Islam in Western Europe, Kampen, The Netherlands 1995.
- (eds.), Political participation and identities of Muslims in non-Muslim states, Kampen, The Netherlands 1996.
- , Religious freedom and the neutrality of the state. The position of Islam in the European Union, Leuven 2002.
- S. Vertoc (ed.), Islam in Europe. The politics of religion and community, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire 1997.

QUDSIA MIRZA

Law: Articulation of Islamic and non-Islamic Systems

Arab States

Patricia Crone's Roman, Provincial, and Islamic Law: The Origins of the Islamic Patronate (1987) set the cue for focusing on the synthesizing nature of Islam and the syncretic pragmatic approach taken by Arab conquerors when confronted with ancient sophisticated societies in Persia and Egypt. The new conquerors built on the pre-existing bureaucratic and legal systems.

In regard to women, however, Islamic jurists presented Islam as a vast improvement over the pre-Islamic treatment of women. While Islam did indeed improve some practices detrimental to women, for example, the killing of girl babies, it restricted pre-Islamic rights of women in terms of their status as heads of households.

In the course of time the Qur'ān did not stand alone as the source of Islamic law. Much legal weight was given to the Prophetic tradition (ḥadīth, pl. ahādīth) as a vital supplement to the Qur'ān. This process can be seen as an attempt by jurists to legitimate customs – Arab and non-Arab, Muslim and non-Muslim – as a valid source for developing Islamic law. The founder of the Mālikī school of law and author of one of the earliest Islamic legal books, the Muwatta', a collection of ahādīth rulings, stressed the use of local customs to formulate Islamic legal rules. Medinese rulings reflected consensus and custom in Medina. It was expected that Kufans and Basrans far away on the frontier would not imitate them but form whatever rules were needed for their situation. The rule of stoning adulterers, for example, exemplifies how local non-Arab and non-Qur'ānic customs influenced the development of Islamic penal law. The rule is based on a ḥadīth in which the Prophet applied the Mosaic law of stoning to a Jewish couple who came to him to settle a dispute. In inheritance law, the introduction of certain female heirs who are not mentioned in the Qur'ān reflects the influence of blood money customs. The ahādīth uphold a grandmother's claim to inherit, but also convert female heirs into residuary heirs so as to reduce their Qur'ānic shares vis-à-vis male heirs and thus reconcile custom and revelation. Customs not so favorable to women were also incorporated into law as exemplified by the story of how 'Umar tried to convince the Prophet to adopt the Persian custom of veiling women.

Al-Ṭabarī's official history of Islam relates how the Arab Muslim leaders in the first century of conquest guaranteed in treaties with non-Arabs and non-Muslims the continuance of their local customs and faiths in exchange for their pledge not to ally with the military enemies of Arabs and Muslims. The Qur'ān acknowledges Christian and Jewish core beliefs (Mary's virginity, the law as the valid expression of faith, and so forth) and confers preferential status on monotheists. This legal autonomy coincided with the introduction of Arab Muslim women to military frontier posts, which constrained the right of Muslim Arab men to intermarry with local non-Muslim women. This evidences a restrictive interpretation of the Qur'ānic verse on intermarriage that was later expanded to allow only Muslim men to marry non-Muslim women.

As the Arab-Islamic empire grew in riches and the number of female slaves expanded, rules were devised to extend men's right to polygamy. The Qur'ān limited a man to four wives. The question arose as to whether the rule applied to sexual relations with enslaved women, be they non-Muslims or converts. This led to a debate not on whether polygamy should be restricted to marriage with widows with children, but on whether the Prophet, who left nine widows, intended that the Qur'ān be interpreted to allow nine wives for every man.

The differences between the Islamic schools of law over the right of an adult woman to marry with or without the consent of a guardian (walī), or the ease with which she could divorce her husband are probably due to different customs, although more research is needed on this point. The right of a husband to divorce (talāq) without the consent of his wife and to condense the repudiation into one sitting, contrary to explicit Qur'ānic prescriptions of a process extending over three menstrual cycles, reflects the custom as revealed in the ḥadīth of men in pre-Islamic Arabia divorcing whenever and however they wished.

With the increased stability of the Islamic empire in its second century, the consensus was adopted that local custom was in principle a source of law. Muslims could decide whether they wanted to go to a judge who followed a particular madhhab (school of law) which honored certain rules and customs over others. A woman could choose the judge who gave her the most freedom. The present-day Tunisian Code of Personal Status, for example, explicitly allows courts to apply customary law in disputes over division of expensive gifts brought into the marriage by the wife and her family, such as shirts for the husband, household goods, and linens (Art. 28).

The guarantees in treaties initially concluded with the conquered non-Muslim populations were sustained throughout the centuries. Christians and Jews continued to choose to go to their own faith-based courts, including appealing to the Jewish high court in Jerusalem. This pattern prevails to this day in most Arab jurisdictions, for example, among the Copts in Egypt and the Orthodox Christians in Lebanon. The major change under Islamic imperial rule occurred in criminal matters. Islamic penal law became the law of the land, applicable to Muslims as well as non-Muslims, but with some modifications in terms of penalties. Market practices and professions also became subject to Islamic law. For example, midwives, whether Muslim or not, were under the control of the Islamic market administrator.

Contact during the Ottoman era with Europeans harboring imperial and colonial ambitions began to spur new approaches as to how Islamic law was going to synthesize the notion of a non-faith based legal concept, that is, a law applicable to all. The first step was to codify all the laws of the Ottoman Empire into one book known as the Mecelle or Majalla. This process raised issues about what options a Muslim ruler had: to codify the religious law of each and every community; to combine all non-Muslim laws with Islamic law into one code; or to formulate entirely new laws independent of faith. Before these questions could be resolved, the European conquest of the Arab regions of the Ottoman Empire was sealed. The Europeans found a collection of semi-autonomous faith based legal systems alongside overarching codes regulating criminal, commercial, and property matters, all the result of centuries of the Islamic process of synthesizing and syncretizing. The Europeans did not sweep the system away. They added a new dimension. The court system became divided along lines of discrimination. The European rulers, though Christians, did not go to the indigenous Christian courts created by their Muslim predecessors. They set up separate courts for themselves as Europeans, though not exclusively. The Mixed Court system of Egypt and the French courts in North Africa were established as “universal” courts, available to non-Muslims and Muslims alike. While Muslims were thus offered a choice, the local system was deprecated as beneath the dignity of a European, who was not given the choice of going to pre-European courts.

Colonial influence and rule resulted in the next 50 to 70 years in a more formalized and hierarchical syncretic court system which regulated the relation between Shari’a and other faith based courts and the new state courts. The European rulers continued codifying laws. The law of the land was, however, no longer Islamic, but rather state law which fused European and Islamic law. The law of procedure and evidence was codified along European lines. Islamic law was confined mainly to personal status. The nascent appellate system of the Ottomans evolved into a model based on the European notion of a strict hierarchy of courts.

Since the 1930s women have not hesitated to use and manipulate the system. For example, in Tunisia, when Muslim women with a Shari’a court order of child support could not get an enforcement order, they relied on the European-style courts. In Egypt, abused wives sued in government courts rather than in the Shari’a courts because of expedited enforcement of penalties against the husbands. Today in Egypt, non-Muslim women likewise cross lines (in 1998 and 2003) to find the justice most favorable to them, for example, seeking divorce relief from the Shari’a chamber of the national courts because under Coptic law adultery is the only ground for divorce for a woman.

On the periphery of the evolution of legal systems under the Ottomans and Europeans were the Arabian Peninsula and the Gulf states. Tribal custom allowed alternative approaches to mainstream Islamic rules, for example punishing adulterers with social ostracism and a symbolic pile of stones in front of their houses, or agreeing to very high rates of compensation for physical abuse or death of a woman, presumably because of her high labor value for the family and to discourage men from taking advantage of her exposure while tending family herds without a male protector.

Decolonialization in the 1950s and 1960s ushered in an era of consolidation of centuries of syncretic evolution. Official legislation and/or presidential, or kingly, decrees, even in the Saudi and Gulf regions continue the codification of the law. The classically trained jurists (‘ulamā) lost their monopoly over the formulation and interpretation of Islamic legal sources. The state became the source of ijtihād, the process of reinterpreting Islamic law in light of new social circumstances and values. Constitutions were written according to international standards and included guarantees for gender equality as well as a Muslim identity. Arab countries began reconciling the demands of international law, classical mainstream Islamic legal opinions, and local customs. The process goes on today despite attempts of extremist Islamic political movements to come to power. Egypt's legislature, for example, enacted with the approval of the Shaykh al-Islām a divorce law that reaffirms the wife's right to divorce by returning her marriage dowry, without having to give elaborate reasons. The divorce, khul', is an old practice, although the word does not appear in the Qur'ān. It can be found in the customary law of the Thonga in southern Africa. The Egyptian law aims to eradicate the customary practices of men that undermine the simplicity of the classical khul' divorce. Husbands had habitually negotiated not only the return of the mahr, but also release from child support and retention of all marriage gifts contributed by the wife and her family.

Of all the Arab countries, Tunisia took the bold-est leap in reinterpreting personal status law. The law is fully rooted in the Qur'ān and aḥādīth, which were cited in the first version of the Personal Status Code of 1956. The dichotomy in courts and laws according to the faith of the litigants was abolished. All laws, including personal status laws, became applicable to all Tunisians irrespective of their faith affiliation. One law for all was based on the notion that all three monotheistic faiths could find something in common to agree upon. As a result, polygamy was abolished; divorce grounds were made equal for men and women; and the mahr was reduced to a symbolic value. Classical Islamic inheritance rules remained the same, but the law has allowed all citizens, Muslims or non-Muslims, to use gifts to equalize shares between female and male heirs.

In one sense, the Tunisian law has brought Islamic law back full circle. The Tunisian Islamic law reflects the original spirit of the Qur'ān; that is, Islam should be the means by which the other monotheistic faiths are harmonized and debates about women's rights are resolved in favor of equalization.

The process of legal consolidation since independence has cemented the state's centralization and homogenization of the interpretations of the Sharī'a. This has to some extent reduced forum shopping on the part of women. Under the traditionally fragmented legal system, a woman could seek out a judge specializing in women's affairs or a madhhab known to favor women if, for example, she were seeking liberation from a marriage guardian. Centralization has narrowed the space for competition. Women now have to find new strategies to compete with the male voice. Centralization demands that women strive to access the literary sources of Islamic law (the Qur'ān, ḥadīth, jurists' compilations of interpretations) that governments consult. Beyond this, centralization also requires women to vie in the public political space, that is, the institutional world of legislating, administering, and adjudicating, where Islamic law and policy are now formed and madhāhib combined. How women decide to deal with the transition from fragmentation to homogenization will determine their future in Islamic law.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- L. Ahmed, Women and gender in Islam, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- A. Bayindir, The functioning of the judiciary in the Ottoman Empire, in K. Çiçek (ed.), The great Ottoman-Turkish civilisation, iii, Philosophy, science and institutions, Ankara 2000, 639–56.
- R. Brunschvig, Considérations sociologiques sur le droit musulman ancien, in Studia Islamica 3 (1955), 61–73.
- N. J. Coulson, A history of Islamic law, Edinburgh 1964.
- P. Crone, Roman, provincial, and Islamic law. The origins of the Islamic patronate, Cambridge 1987.
- Egypt, Law 1 of 2000, Al-jarīda al-rasmiyya, No. 3, 29 January 2000, p. 10.
- Egypt, Regulation of the personal status matters of the Orthodox Coptics, in A. Bergmann and M. Ferid, Internationales Ehe- und Kindschaftsrecht, Frankfurt/Main 1993, ongoing updates, 81–98.
- S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean society. The Jewish communities of the Arab world as portrayed in the documents of the Cairo Geniza, iii, Berkeley 1978.
- E. Hill, Mahkamat! Studies in the Egyptian legal system, London 1979.
- K. A. al-Hilw and S. M. Darwish, Customary law in northern Sinai, ed. A. al-M. Haridi, trans. R. I. Dougherty, Cairo 1989.
- M. Y. 'Izz al-Dīn, The theory and the practice of market law in medieval Islam. A study of Kitāb niṣāb al-iḥtisāb of 'Umar b. Muḥammad al-Sunāmī (fl. 7th–8th century/13th–14th century) by M. Izzī Dien, [Cambridge, England?] 1997.
- C. Jones, Reforms in the Islamic legal judicial system and the Sharia inheritance and family law in Tunisia, in Yearbook of African Law 7 (1993), 3–23.
- F. Kholeif, A study on Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzi and his controversies in Transoxiana, Beirut 1966.
- F. I. Khuri, State, religion and sects in Islam, London 1990.
- H. Pensa, L'avenir de la Tunisie, Paris 1903.
- Fakhr al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn 'Umar Rāzī, Al-tafsīr al-kabīr, ix, Beirut 1967³, 173ff.
- R. Shaham, Family and the courts in modern Egypt. A study based on decisions by the sharī'a courts, 1900–1955, Leiden 1997.
- A. E. Sonbol (ed.), Women, the family, and divorce laws in Islamic history, Syracuse, N.Y. 1996.
- J. Starr, Law as metaphor. From Islamic courts to the Palace of Justice, Albany, N.Y. 1992.
- F. H. Stewart, The contract of surety in Bedouin customary law, in UCLA Journal of Islamic and Near Eastern Law 12:2 (2003), 163–280, citing F. H. Stewart, The woman, her guardian, and her husband in the law of the Sinai Bedouin, in Arabica 38 (1991), 102–29.
- 'A. Tha'ālibī, Rūḥ al-taḥarrur fī al-Qur'ān/L'esprit libéral du Coran, Paris 1905.

- Al-Ṭabarī, Tarīkh al-rusūl wa-al-mulūk, Cairo 1960–77, Year 22.
- J. E. Tucker, In the house of the law. Gender and Islamic law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, Berkeley 1998.
- Tunisia, Majallat al-aḥwāl al-shakhsiyya, Tunis 1956, 1970, 1998.
- F. E. Vogel, Islamic law and legal system. Studies of Saudi Arabia, Leiden 2000.
- D. Webster, Abafazi bathonga bafiblakala. Ethnicity and gender in a KwaZulu border community, in P. A. McAllister et al. (eds.), Tradition and transition in Southern Africa, Johannesburg 1991, 243–71.

CHRISTINA JONES-PAULY

The Caucasus and Turkey

A pluralistic legal system had developed in the Caucasus based on customary law (‘āda), Sharī‘a, and state laws (Russian). This system was applied until the 1920s when Soviet power and law were established and all other legal codes were declared unlawful.

THE CAUCASUS

Pre-Soviet period

Until the 1920s, criminal cases were judged according to ‘āda, domestic cases according to the Sharī‘a, and other civil cases were subject to Russian law. The predominance of customary law in the Caucasus made it possible for women to feel relatively free in society, though upholding their rights was impossible for them.

Access to all the legal systems was limited for women due to their special social status originating in Caucasian national traditions and Islamic traditions that spread from the Ottoman Empire and Iran to the Caucasus from the tenth to the nineteenth centuries. If a man enjoyed a high social status, his wife was able to maintain her rights in the society. Married women with children also enjoyed a certain amount of legal freedom and protection. Islam introduced some legal protection into the family circle of Caucasian women. The following Sharī‘a regulations appeared: husband’s correct deportment toward his wife; observance of divorce rules; and the introduction (in addition to the ‘āda bride-price) of the mahr, and of the share of inheritance that was due to a woman, which equaled half a man’s share (according to ‘āda, women received nothing).

‘Āda and Sharī‘a legal procedures were conducted by between five and ten men who had knowledge of the ‘āda and Sharī‘a norms. Caucasian social traditions emphasized veneration of the elders and arbitrators were selected from among the older men. In the Sharī‘a court, the qāḍī (judge) settled all the cases alone, using Arabic works on Sharī‘a, which had penetrated the Caucasus between the tenth and nineteenth centuries. Few women had knowledge of Arabic.

The ‘āda and Sharī‘a courts initiated proceedings only if there were applications filed by the participants in the case in dispute or their relatives (near or distant). ‘Āda and Sharī‘a legal proceedings comprised four stages: the plaintiff’s case was heard; the defendant’s plea was heard; the witnesses’ testimony was taken; and the judgment was passed.

Women as plaintiffs

In general, women were able to take any legal action but they had to do it indirectly, through their male relations (father, brother, husband) or proxies. A relation between the type of case and the person who defended the woman’s rights can be observed: the girl’s father drew up the marriage settlement (nikāḥ); full brothers or first cousins took vengeance for an offence against the woman; and an uncle took part in negotiations to settle questions connected with the abduction of the bride (a traditional part of the arrangement of marriage). If a widow of a murdered man had no relations able to plead her cause, then proxies were appointed.

Women as defendants

A woman could not be a defendant in the ‘āda or Sharī‘a courts. Her father or husband stood as defendant if she were being tried.

Women and testimonies

The following were considered as evidence in ‘āda or Sharī‘a courts: the confession of the accused; physical evidence; and witnesses’ statements under oath. A Qur’ānic oath was typical of the traditional legal procedure. The defendant was able to purge himself by means of the co-oath of his relatives or fellow villagers. Testimony of one man was equal to that of two women. Women’s testimonies were used very rarely. Only men could evaluate testimony (Russian atauly, Kabardian th’eryiueshchyh’et).

In murder cases, after the court’s decision was made, there was a rite in the Caucasus called a conciliatory feast (Ossetian fynga or tuji fyng, Russian stol krovi, blood table). The conciliatory ritual included visiting the mother of the murdered person: a delegation of authoritative mediators together with the criminal’s relations went to the house of the mother, or sister if the mother was dead, and begged forgiveness.

Caucasian women were prohibited from taking part in ‘āda or Shari‘a legal proceedings, though there were other forms of action open to them. Women were able indirectly to participate in taking vengeance: they could ask their sons or husbands to act on their behalf. In cases involving disputing parties Caucasian women could remove their kerchief and break into a brawl or fight between men, and the latter were obliged to stop their conflict. A hillman who had committed any crime could hide from his pursuers in the female half of the house.

Introduction of Russian courts to the Caucasus (Highlander Verbal Courts, Gorskiy Courts) in the second half of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century brought no significant changes to Caucasian women’s life. Members of the Highlander Courts were male Russian officials. Cases related to the defence of women’s rights were rarely brought before these courts and more usually passed to the ‘āda or Shari‘a courts.

The Soviet period

Soviet law was applied in the Caucasus from the 1920s to the 1980s. The Soviet judicial system engaged women in both legal proceedings and in defending their rights in the state court. The role in juridical life of women in Transcaucasia expanded noticeably. Women of the North Caucasus rarely exercised their right to be a judge in the state courts, which were still male.

The Soviet family code and court system did little to change the marriage and family traditions in the North Caucasus, which remained the domain of religious laws. Traditionally marriage was performed through abduction of the bride followed by nikāh, religious marriage registration. The bride-price was paid to the bride’s family, and the bride received a mahr, which was hers to keep after divorce. Official Soviet laws failed to have a profound influence on North Caucasian woman’s life, her rights or social standing. Soviet laws were more widely used in Transcaucasian republics (in particular in Armenia and Georgia, to some extent in Azerbaijan) where women saw significant emancipation, real freedom, and a chance to defend their rights in court.

Post-Soviet period

From the 1990s to the present there has been a slight development of the state law in the North Caucasus. A number of juridical traditions have been kept, such as marriage as a way to settle rape cases; traditional reconciliation when a girl is abducted for marriage; the drawing up of a marriage agreement (nikāh); and the institution of women encouraging their men to take vengeance. The process of revival of use of the Shari‘a in matters concerning divorce and division of property/inheritance is underway.

TURKEY

The history of the Turkish judicial system can be divided into two periods. From the fourteenth to the early twentieth century, Shari‘a law was applied in the Ottoman Empire. After the Kemalist revolution (1926) a secular state was declared and Islam was made independent of the state, together with its legal system. A secular civil statute was established following the Swiss Civil Code and Islamic law was declared illegal. Formal equalization of men’s and women’s rights, equal access to legal procedures, and equal marriage, divorce, and property succession rights followed. Changes in gender status were slow. Informally, the Shari‘a still applied, especially in rural areas, in matters of polygyny, Islamic weddings (nikāh), mahr, and divorce. The division of inheritance whereby a woman received half the share of a man also continued.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

(all works cited are in Russian)

- N. M. Agishev, V. D. Bushen, and N. M. Reinke, Materials concerning the Gorskiy court in the Caucasus, St. Petersburg 1912.
 H. M. Dumanov and F. H. Dumanova (comps.), The legal norms of Adygs and Balkaro-Karachains, Maikop 1997.
 N. F. Grabovskiy, Courts and criminal cases in Kabarda. A collection of information about the Caucasian peoples, vol. 9, Tbilisi 1876.
 H. O. Khashaev (comp.), The monuments of the Daghestan customary law of the 17th–19th centuries, Moscow 1965.
 M. M. Kovalevskiy, ‘Āda of the Daghestan region and Zakatalsky Krai, Tbilisi 1899.
 —, Law and tradition in the Caucasus, 2 vols., Moscow 1890.
 F. I. Leontovich, Caucasian ‘āda, 2 vols., Odessa 1882.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- T. Ansay and D. Wallace (eds.), Introduction to Turkish law, The Hague 1996⁴.
 I. L. Babich, The evolution of legal culture of Adygs [in Russian], Moscow 1999.
 V. O. Bobrovnikov, The Muslims of North Caucasus [in Russian], Moscow 2002.
 Customary law in Russia [in Russian], Rostov-in-Don 1999.
 D. E. Ereemeev, Islam in Turkey [in Russian], Moscow 1990.
 V. H. Kazharov, The traditional social institutions of Kabardians and their crisis at the end of the 19th and

- the beginning of the 19th century* [in Russian], Halchik 1992.
- H. M. Khashaev, Sharī'a and 'āda in Daghestan [in Russian], Moscow 1949.
- E. Örücü, Turkey. Reconciling traditional society and secular demands, in Journal of Family Law 10 (1986), 221–36.
- E. Ural, Handbook of Turkish law for foreigners, Ankara 1991.

IRINA BABICH

Iran

From the Safavid period (1501–1722) Iran has been a Shī'i country and its law is based on the rules of the Twelver Shī'a. Shī'i family law differs only in some minor points from Sunnī law, for example, in the pronunciation of the phrase of repudiation by the husband, the right of male and female lines to inheritance after the distribution of the property as prescribed by the Qur'ān, and the validity of the so-called temporary marriage (mut'a, Persian ṣiḡha, izdivāj-i muvaqqat).

In the nineteenth century legislation and jurisdiction were mainly influenced by the rules of the Sharī'a, which were applied in shar'i courts presided over by religious scholars, and by customary law ('urf). In his wish to create a modern nation state with a secular judicial system based on modern legal codes, Reza Shah Pahlavī (r. 1926–41) abolished the religious courts and reduced the influence of the Sharī'a. Family law was codified between 1928 and 1935 as part of the Iranian Civil Code. In 1967 Mohammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79) enacted the Family Protection Law, which was regarded at that time as one of the most modern family laws in the Islamic world. It was amended in 1975. However, as family law and the law of inheritance have always been regarded as central to the Sharī'a, even in this Family Protection Law equality between the sexes was not achieved; rather, certain discriminatory rules such as men's right to arbitrary divorce, polygamy, and child custody were restricted. The woman was given permission to initiate divorce if her husband took another wife without her consent. Secularization of marriage and divorce was introduced through submission to the control of a family protection court. Divorce was possible only after reconciliation had failed. The responsibility for reaching agreement on maintenance and custody of children was placed on the couple. The court only intervened when agreement was not reached. The age of marriage was raised to 20 for men and 18 for women.

Despite its Sharī'a origin, this law provoked a strong protest amongst the clergy. The Shī'i clergy and especially the late leader of the Islamic Revolution, Khomeini, sharply criticized this law as contrary to Islamic law. In the Islamic Republic (1979) most of the stipulations of the Family Protection Law were revoked. Among others, the marriage age of girls was reduced to nine years. The Islamic state encouraged a proliferation of the practice of ṣiḡha (second temporary marriage to the same man). However, this return to unrestricted Sharī'a rules proved to be socially and politically unacceptable.

A legal discourse, especially among women, the clergy, and responsible state officials emerged in the following period. In 1992 a law was enacted that (as in 1967) outlawed divorces without a court certificate and required the registering of marriages. Female legal advisors were admitted at the family courts and the rights given to women in 1967 were reintroduced, this time legitimated on the basis of Islamic law. At the beginning of the twenty-first century the family law of the Islamic Republic did not differ substantially from the Shah's 1967 Family Protection Law.

Since the late 1990s the discourse on women's rights in Iran has been increasingly dominated by female voices. This discourse is shaped by the influence of different systems of law, especially the influence of modern Western law and the human rights discussion, but also by the obvious flexibility of the Sharī'a rules. Interpretation of Sharī'a rules, especially in matters of family law, is currently the subject of an ongoing public legal discourse.

Legal pluralism, the coexistence of different legal codes or legal cultural practices, for example, customary law and – more importantly – European law beside Islamic law, has further influenced legal reasoning of women. Nomadic customary law affected the position of women in nomadic societies before their gradual decline since the early twentieth century. Religious groups such as Christians (mostly Armenians) and Jews have their own legal systems concerning personal statute, which sometimes provides women with better legal or social conditions, allowing more political participation and a reduction of segregation.

The Islamic Republic of Iran propagated a concept of gender in accordance with Islamic law, favoring complementarity as opposed to equality of sexes. The Islamic Republic thus tried to create its own blueprint of the position of women in a modern society. However, in the face of the existing legal inequality of sexes in family law, women of different social, religious, and political backgrounds in Iran formed a movement to demand improvement in their legal position. These demands are formulated by women in women's journals such as Zanān. Women trained in Islamic jurisprudence have challenged some traditional interpretations of the sources of law (the Qur'an and the sayings of the Prophet and the imams). They demand admittance of women as candidates in presidential elections and their appointment as judges. Several amendments to improve family law have been submitted to parliament. Islamic legislation can surely be said to have gained a new feminist dimension at the turn of the twenty-first century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- H. Afshar, Islam and feminisms, London 1998.
 K. Amirpur, Islamischer Feminismus in der Islamischen Republik Iran, in Orient 40 (1999), 439–52.
 L. Beck, Women among Qashqa'i nomadic pastorlists in Iran, in N. Keddie (ed.), Women in the Muslim world, London 1978, 351–73.
 N. J. Coulson, A history of Islamic law, Edinburgh 1964, repr. Delhi 1997.
 S. Haeri, Law of desire, London 1989.
 Z. Mir-Hosseini, Marriage on trial, London 2000.
 —, Islam, women and civil rights. The religious debate in the Iran of the 1990s, in S. Ansari and V. Martin (eds.), Women, religion and culture in Iran, Richmond, Surrey 2002, 169–88.
 P. Paidar, Women and the political process in twentieth-century Iran, Cambridge 1997.
 S. Šadr, ʿArḥ-i 'affāf va sāyir-i qaḍāyā, in Zanān 11 (2002), 16–17.
 Sh. Sardar Ali, Gender and human rights in Islam and international law, The Hague 2000.
 N. Tapper, The women's subsociety among the Shahsevan nomads of Iran, in N. Keddie, Women in the Middle East, London 1978, 374–98.

IRENE SCHNEIDER

Southeast Asia

Measured by conventional status indicators, the social and legal standing of Southeast Asian women in the pre-Islamic era was relatively strong (Tiwon 2003). Most importantly for present purposes, the predominant family structure in the region is based on bilateral descent and inheritance, though Southeast Asia also includes the world's largest matrilineal group. Women have also always been active in the region's mainly agricultural economy. Because Southeast Asian women have enjoyed relatively high social status as compared to other predominantly Muslim regions, a persistent theme in the history of Islamic law in Southeast Asia has been the tension between the distinctly patrilineal and patriarchal Sunnī legal doctrines and Southeast Asian social patterns and cultural norms. Opponents of recent Islamization efforts have pointed to the enduring social and cultural differences between the Arab society in which standard Sunnī legal doctrine developed and Southeast Asia as an argument against contemporary campaigns for broader enforcement of conventional understandings of Islamic law.

In addition to Indonesia and Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, and Brunei Darussalam also enforce Islamic legal doctrines, but the discussion here focuses on selected aspects of the two countries with the largest Muslim populations.

INDONESIA

Belief in one God is a foundational principle of Indonesia's state ideology, but there is no official state religion, and Indonesian law guarantees a limited freedom of religion. Efforts to implement a constitutional obligation to enforce Islamic law have been repeatedly abandoned for lack of support. A national system of Islamic courts exercises jurisdiction over Muslim marriage, inheritance, and charitable foundations.

In 1974 Indonesia enacted a National Marriage Law. The act and other important family and gender initiatives in the last decades of the twentieth century reflect the conservative gender policies of the New Order government of President Suharto, which ruled the country from the mid 1960s to the late 1990s. The Suharto government's family policy idealized female domesticity and small, stable families as the foundation of a stable and ordered nation. This policy was promoted through, among other means, a variety of governmental and quasi-governmental organizations that emphasized the role of women as wives and homemakers whose function is to promote the careers of their husbands.

Although the National Marriage Act prescribes a single set of rules applicable to Indonesians of all religions, Islamic marriage doctrine is made applicable to marriages of Muslims through a provision stating that a marriage is "valid when carried out according to the religious law of the parties." The Marriage Act requires that marriage be based on the consent of the parties, and establishes minimum marriage ages of 19 years for males and 16 years for females. The minimum age rules were designed to reduce the practice, common among many communities, of parentally arranged marriages of very young couples. Although failure to comply with statutory age requirements does not necessarily invalidate the marriage, the frequency of arranged and underage marriage is declining.

The Marriage Act states that marriage is "in principle monogamous," but authorizes Muslim men to marry as many as four wives. The act establishes a number of conditions that must be satisfied by a husband desiring polygamy, including the permission of his existing wife or wives, and requires approval from the Islamic court.

A principal purpose of the Marriage Act was to reduce the frequency of divorce. The statute prescribes different divorce procedures for Muslim men and Muslim women. The procedure applicable to men involves a repudiation (talāq) pronounced in the presence of the Islamic court. Women are required to present witnesses and prove statutory grounds for divorce. As interpreted by the courts, however, men are now also required to prove the same grounds for divorce as the wife before they will be permitted to utter the repudiation. These rules have not eliminated the practice of unilateral arbitrary repudiation, which remains common. Moreover, divorces initiated by wives often take longer to process than talāq divorces.

The Marriage Act incorporates customary property doctrines as the marital property regime for Indonesian Muslims. Upon dissolution of the marriage each spouse retains ownership of separate property acquired prior to the marriage or obtained by gift or inheritance. Property accumulated during the marriage through the combined effort of the spouses is owned by the spouses jointly. Although not treated in the Marriage Act, the subsequent Kompilasi Hukum Islam (Compilation of Islamic Law) implemented in 1991 by presidential edict declares an equal division of marital property upon dissolution of the marriage by death or divorce.

As of 2003 Indonesian inheritance law had not been codified, but is treated in the Compilation. A government-backed proposal to equalize the shares of male and female children was dropped during the drafting process because of objections from the Muslim establishment, and the final version of the Compilation preserves the traditional rule granting sons a share equal to two daughters. One potentially significant innovation provides that children of predeceased heirs succeed to the share of the inheritance that would have passed to the predeceased heir had she or he survived.

Women have full political rights, and there are no formal barriers to women owning property or participating in the economy. The law requires that 30 percent of candidates nominated by political parties for the national legislature be women, though there is no mechanism for enforcing this requirement. While Indonesian women occupy important positions in both the private sector and public life, representation of women in the highest levels of business and government is low. In 2001 Megawati Sukarnoputri, a Muslim woman, became the country's fifth president despite pronouncements by several political parties and prominent political leaders that Islam does not permit a woman to serve as head of state. A substantial minority of Islamic court judges are women.

MALAYSIA

Indonesia and Malaysia share much in common, but while Indonesia is nearly 90 percent Muslim, Malaysia includes large non-Muslim Chinese and South Asian minorities resulting in a significantly more religiously plural society. Malay ethnicity is regarded as virtually synonymous with being Muslim, and Islamic law has been one of the means by which Malays have expressed their identity and asserted their claim to political dominance.

Malaysia also has a very different political structure from that in Indonesia. While Indonesia has until recently been highly centralized, Malaysia is a federally structured constitutional monarchy comprised of 13 states and 3 federal territories. The constitution declares Islam to be the state religion, but further states that all religions may be practiced in peace and harmony, and provides that discrimination on the basis of religion is forbidden. The ninth schedule to the constitution contains a list of matters reserved to the states, which includes the power to make laws on matters of Islam.

In the early 1980s the federal government enacted an Islamic Family Law Act for the country's three federal territories. The act was also intended to serve as a model to promote uniformity among the states. However, the family law of some states deviates from the federal model in several important respects.

The Federal Act and most states require the consent of the bride to marry and do not permit marriage by compulsion. However, the Family Law Enactment for Kelantan follows conventional Shāfi'ī doctrine in permitting the forced marriage of a virgin if the person who acts as her ritual marriage guardian (walī) is either her father or paternal grandfather (walī mujbūr).

In contrast to Malaysian civil marriage, Muslim marriages are regarded as polygamous in principle, even if the man has only one wife. The Federal Territories Act seeks to regulate the practice of polygamy to avoid injustice to women by imposing conditions to take a second wife. These conditions are not required in all states, and are not always strictly enforced. Some men have been able to evade compliance with legal restrictions on polygamy in their home states by contracting the marriage in another state where the rules are more lenient.

The Islamic Family Law Act seeks to limit arbitrary unilateral repudiations (talāq) by requiring husbands to apply to the court for permission to pronounce the talāq in court. Although extra-judicial repudiation is subject to punishment by fine and/or imprisonment not exceeding six months, imprisonment is rare. The law provides a number of avenues for wives to obtain a divorce, but legal proceedings for divorces initiated by women tend to be lengthier and more complex than requests by husbands for permission to pronounce the talāq.

The law distinguishes between separate property and marital property (harta sepencarian). Upon dissolution of the marriage harta sepencarian is usually divided according to a ratio of two parts for the husband and one part for the wife. While the wife's contribution in maintaining the household is supposed to be considered in determining the division of the property, direct financial contributions are often given greater weight.

Upon divorce the mother takes custody of children who have not yet reached the age of discernment (mumaiyyiz). Children who have reached the age of discernment, considered to be between seven and nine years for boys and between nine and eleven years for girls, are allowed to choose which parent to follow. Based upon a disputed interpretation of a Prophetic dictum (hadīth), mothers can be deprived of custody upon remarriage, though the remarriage of the father does not affect his custody rights. The law requires the father to provide for the children financially.

Malaysian Islamic courts apply conventional Sunnī inheritance doctrines, including the rules that grant sons and male heirs a share equal to two females. In recent years the application of Islamic inheritance rules has been broadened, often to the detriment of women, by including, for example, lump sum provident fund pension benefits and insurance in the estate that is subject to inheritance, rather than assigning those assets to contractual beneficiaries. The practice found among some groups in southwestern areas of peninsular Malaysia of assigning control over inalienable clan properties according to female blood lines has been condemned as un-Islamic by some advocates for broad enforcement of Sunnī fiqh rules.

The constitution as implemented by federal statute grants states the power to enforce offenses against Islam subject to maximum penalties of fine not to exceed RM 5,000, three years imprisonment, or six strokes with a cane. The offenses falling within this jurisdiction include gambling, drinking intoxicating drinks, seclusion for an immoral purpose likely to lead to adultery or fornication, and disrespect of the fasting month. An effort to include domestic violence among the offenses punishable by the Syariah Courts was defeated. The possibility of state enforcement of dress regulations for women has been discussed, but as of 2003 no dress rules had been enacted.

In 1993 the state of Kelantan enacted a hudūd bill prescribing Islamic punishments (hudūd) for six offenses, including theft, highway robbery, unlawful sexual intercourse, slanderous accusation of unlawful intercourse that cannot be proven with four witnesses, wine drinking, and apostasy. The legislature for Trengganu passed a similar statute in 2002. The enactments have been criticized on a number of grounds, but two issues of particular concern to women are the rules disqualifying women from acting as witnesses in hudūd offenses, and the provision regarding unlawful intercourse (zinā). The enactments provide that an unmarried pregnant woman is presumed to be guilty of zinā unless she can prove to the contrary. This provision would have the implication of imposing on a pregnant rape victim the burden of proving rape, or facing punishment for committing zinā as well as for making an unlawful accusation of zinā (qadhf). Because the constitutional jurisdiction of the Syariah courts does not include general criminal matters, implementation of the hudūd law requires a constitutional amendment, which has not occurred.

Women have full political rights. While there are no legal impediments to women holding public office, representation of women in high public office is low, and leaders of the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS) have voiced public opposition to women standing for public office. The head of state (Yang di-Pertuan Agong) is chosen from among the hereditary sultans from the states, who by tradition must be male. Although not prohibited by law, there are no women in the Islamic judiciary.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

- Indonesia, Law No. 1 [in Indonesian], 1974.
Indonesia, Compilation of Islamic law [in Indonesian], 1991.

SECONDARY SOURCES

- M. Cammack, Inching toward equality. Recent developments in Indonesian inheritance law, in Indonesian Law and Administration Review 5 (1999), 19.
M. B. Hooker, Islamic law in Southeast Asia, Singapore 1984.
M. Hashim Kamali, Punishment in Islamic law. An enquiry into the Hudud Bill of Kelantan, Kuala Lumpur 1995.
—, Islamic law in Malaysia. Issues and developments, Kuala Lumpur 2000.
A. Ibrahim, Family law in Malaysia, Kuala Lumpur 1997.
J. Katz and R. Katz, The new Indonesian marriage law. A

- mirror of Indonesia's political, cultural, and legal systems, in American Journal of Comparative Law 23 (1975), 653.
- D. S. Lev, Islamic courts in Indonesia. A study in the political bases of legal institutions, Berkeley 1972.
- M. Nakamura, Divorce in Java. A study of the dissolution of marriage among Javanese Muslims, Yogyakarta 1983.
- N. Noriani Nik Badlishah (ed.) Islamic family law and justice for Muslim women, Kuala Lumpur 2003.
- N. Othman, Grounding human rights arguments in non-Western culture. Sharia and the citizen rights of women in a modern Islamic state, in J. R. Bauer and D. A. Bell (eds.), The East Asian challenge for human rights, Cambridge 1999, 169–92.
- S. Pompe, Mixed marriages in Indonesia. Some comments on the law and literature, in Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land-, en Volkenkunde 144 (1988), 259.
- S. Pompe and J. Otto, Some comments on recent developments in the Indonesian marriage law with particular respect to the rights of women, in Verfassung und Recht in Ubersee 4 (1990), 415–33.
- J. Prins, Adatlaw and Muslim religious law in modern Indonesia, in Welt des Islams 1 (1951), 283.
- N. Soewondo, Law and the status of women in Indonesia, in Columbia Human Rights Law Review 8 (1976), 123.
- , The Indonesian marriage law and its implementing regulations, in Archipel 13 (1977), 283.
- S. Thalib, Indonesian family law [in Indonesian], Jakarta 1974.
- S. Tiwon, Indonesia. Early 20th century to present, in EWIC I, Leiden 2003, 235–8.
- C. Vreede-de Stuers, The Indonesian woman. Struggles and achievements, The Hague 1960.

MARK CAMMACK

Sub-Saharan Africa

Islamic law is an important part of legal thought and dispute resolution processes in much of Sub-Saharan Africa. The application and jurisdiction of Islamic law vis-à-vis other systems of law and social norms varies tremendously, however. In some African states, Islamic law constitutes a part of the official legal system. Elsewhere, Islamic law is not part of state law but informs local-level dispute resolution and influences community moral guidelines and ethical norms. Most African states that incorporate Islamic law into the state legal system do so only for matters of family law; Islamic legal institutions can therefore be arenas of great importance to women. In some areas, people refer to Islamic courts as “women’s courts.”

The spread of Islam into Sub-Saharan Africa brought important changes regarding law, dispute resolution, and women’s social, legal, and political status. In Nigeria, the Islamic court system became widespread after Usman dan Fodio’s jihad movement of 1804, which overthrew the rule of the Hausa Emirs and strove to establish a leadership derived directly from the Shari‘a. Dan Fodio’s daughter, the poet Nana Asma’u, supported his aims and sought to increase women’s knowledge of Islamic law to improve their social position (Callaway and Creevey 1994).

With the spread of Islam, women sometimes gained rights and sometimes lost them. Women often won rights within the family, such as the right to the custody of children and to marital maintenance. Islamic law brought an increased focus on the rights of the individual over kin groups, which affected women’s status through land usage and inheritance rights. In parts of Nigeria, women specifically benefited from Islamic inheritance rights that they had not previously enjoyed (Callaway and Creevey 1994). Elsewhere, as in eighteenth-century Sudan, women lost economic advantages when the adoption of Islamic legal norms influenced family economies by drawing women away from their conventional roles in household-level production (Spaulding 1984).

The relationship between Islamic and customary law played out differently from place to place. The distinction between what is appropriately “Islamic” and what is “customary” is often unclear, and even members of the same community may differ on this point. In some parts of Africa, custom was woven into the fabric of Islam. Elsewhere, distinctly recognized customary legal norms held sway. Among the Yao of Malawi, for example, Islamic norms regulated marriage, but customary norms of matrilineality controlled inheritance – only occasionally was wealth distributed to children and spouses according to Islamic norms (Anderson 1970).

In writing of the relationship between custom and Islam, some scholars have linked women with “custom” and men with “Islam.” Eastman suggested that in East Africa, Islamic law was the domain of men while custom (in Kiswahili mila) was that of women (1984, 1988; see also Caplan 1982). Other scholars have criticized the assumption of two religio-legal spheres by arguing that men and women exert considerable influence in both arenas (Middleton 1992, Caplan 1995). Hirsch found that Kenyan Swahili women are less likely than men to move to an Islamic legal discourse in framing their disputes for a kadhi’s (qāḍī) court, although both men and women will make use of Islamic discourse (1998).

In the colonial period, European rule brought changes that affected women’s status through law. In many areas, Islamic legal institutions were already established, and colonial governments sometimes kept them in place; Britain, for example, kept such institutions intact in Nigeria and Zanzibar. Often, the jurisdiction of Islamic courts was restricted to family law, which was sometimes modified to improve women's rights. In 1930s Sudan, where the British supported the pre-existing centralized Islamic legal system, Islamic authorities encouraged legal reform that benefited women; for example, divorce through unilateral repudiation, ṭalāq, was made illegal (Fluehr-Lobban 1994). In some areas, despite popular conceptions that European law was more progressive in terms of women's rights, women often received greater benefit from Islamic courts. In colonial Zanzibar, a woman could obtain a divorce from an Islamic court on the grounds of a husband's cruelty but could not from a British judge. Rather, a judicial separation might be ordered to influence her husband to divorce her himself or to cease paying maintenance, which could lead to a divorce (Anderson 1970).

The dawn of independence sparked debates about women and Islamic law vis-à-vis other legal spheres in many African states, several of which had to address issues of religious pluralism, the co-existence of multiple legal systems, and women's status. Some states, such as Senegal and Mali, abolished Islamic courts. Issues of gender equality vis-à-vis Shari'a came to the forefront in others. Could a state committed to equality of all persons permit, for example, Islamic legal rules of witnessing and inheritance in which women and men are treated differently?

In Nigeria, the issue of Islamic law has been controversial since independence. Much of the debate centered on the Shari'a court of appeals, which became a symbol of the public role of Islam on the national level. Nigerian Muslims proposed that Islamic courts were a necessary component of religious freedom in a secular state, and argued that Muslims could not freely practice religion without them (Laitin 1986). The controversy peaked with the 1999 decision of twelve northern states to instate Islamic criminal law. The media frenzy surrounding the 2003 case of Amina Lawal, who was accused of adultery and sentenced to stoning by a primary Islamic court, fanned the flames. An Islamic appeals court eventually rescinded the lower court's decision by citing a violation of procedural law and the Mālikī legal principle of a "sleeping fetus," which asserts that a fetus can "sleep" in the womb for several years.

Controversy over Islamic law also raged in religiously plural Sudan. In the 1970s, al-Numayrī issued presidential decrees to improve the status of women by easing judicial divorce in abusive marriages and improving women's maintenance rights. In the 1980s, he declared Islamic law state law. Unlike elsewhere in Africa, Islamic law was to be applied to all matters – not just family law. This was very controversial, largely because of Sudan's substantial non-Muslim population, and led to civil war. Despite the controversy, in 1990 the Islamist government codified Islamic family law. The codification aimed to improve women's status by, for example, easing marriage restrictions and increasing benefits of marital maintenance (Fluehr-Lobban 1994).

Tanzania has a substantial Muslim minority, and with independence, Nyerere hoped to prevent religious strife by instituting different laws for different religions with the Marriage Act introduced in the early 1970s. Islamic courts were established in the Muslim-majority island state of Zanzibar, but not on the mainland. Though Islamic family law is not codified in Zanzibar, the Kadhi's Act of 1985 addressed gender issues in procedural law by requiring that judges give equal weight to the testimony of all witnesses, regardless of gender, ethnicity, or religion. The extent to which judges adhere to this is a different matter. On the mainland, experts in religious law advise the secular courts on Muslim family law. This is similar to the approach taken in Mali and South Africa.

Today, there is much regional specificity in the way in which Islamic law is incorporated and articulated vis-à-vis other legal orders. In religiously plural states like Nigeria, Kenya, and Niger, religious courts are important arenas for addressing gender and cultural pluralism. Islamic legal institutions can be an important way for Muslim women to assert rights, and in most Islamic courts, women open the majority of cases in court. They successfully present claims and win cases in courts that outsiders have often viewed as more favorable to men. Kenyan women, for example, use the courts to resist and challenge patriarchal relationships in the home (Hirsch 1997). In legally plural environments, it is common for women to make shrewd choices of judge or venue in hopes of a favorable settlement. In Niger, for example, women strategically use Islamic or customary law as a resource to secure land (Walker 1992).

Activists and scholars of gender policy assert the importance of reforming religious and/or customary personal status law to improve women's social and economic positions. Some propose that stricter adherence to Islamic law will improve women's status. In Zanzibar, for example, activists and Islamic scholars alike argue that following Islamic marriage laws would improve women's position. An example often cited concerns the mahari (mahr), the marriage gift paid by the groom to the bride, which the bride's elders often appropriate. If families followed Islamic legal norms, the argument goes, brides would have full control of the mahari and be in a better financial position in marriage (Stiles 2002).

Assessing the relationship between Islamic law, secular law, and social norms in Africa provides an important opportunity for gauging changes in women's status. Muslim women's movements have influenced the status of personal status law throughout Sub-Saharan Africa. The Federation of Muslim Women's Associations of Nigeria (FOMWAN), established in 1985, has attempted to engage Muslim women in political activity, and in the 1990s called for the establishment of Islamic courts and argued that women need to be more active in interpreting Islamic law (Callaway and Creevey 1994). In Niger, the Association of Nigerien Women has supported similar legal reforms (Dunbar 2000).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- J. N. D. Anderson, Islamic law in Africa, London 1970.
- B. Brown, Islamic law, qadhi's courts, and women's legal status. The case of Kenya, in Journal of the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 14 (1993), 94-101.
- B. Callaway and L. Creevey, The heritage of Islam. Women, religion and politics in West Africa, London 1994.
- P. Caplan, "Law" and "Custom." Marital disputes on Northern Mafia Island, Tanzania, in P. Caplan (ed.), Understanding disputes. The politics of argument, Providence, R.I. 1995, 203-21.
- A. Christelow, Islamic law in Africa, in N. Levtzion and R. Pouwells (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 373-96.
- (ed.), Thus ruled Emir Abbas. Selected cases from the records of the Emir of Kano's judicial council, East Lansing, Mich. 1994.
- R. A. Dunbar, Muslim women in African history, in N. Levtzion and R. Pouwells (eds.), The history of Islam in Africa, Athens, Ohio 2000, 397-418.
- C. Fluehr-Lobban, Islamic law and society in the Sudan, London 1987.
- , Islamic society in practice, Gainseville, Fla. 1994.
- S. Hirsch, Pronouncing and persevering. Gender and the discourse of disputing in an African Islamic court, Chicago 1998.
- D. Laitin, Hegemony and culture. Politics and religious change among the Yoruba, Chicago 1986.
- J. Middleton, The world of the Swahili. An African mercantile civilization, New Haven, Conn. 1992.
- R. S. O'Fahey, The past in the present? The issue of Sharia in the Sudan, in M. Twaddle and H. B. Hansen (eds.), Religion and politics in East Africa, London 1995, 32-44.
- J. Spaulding, The misfortunes of some – the advantages of others. Land sales by women in Sinnar, in M. J. Hay and M. Wright (eds.), African women and the law. Historical perspectives, Boston 1982, 2-18.
- E. E. Stiles, A kadhi in his court. Marriage, divorce and the Islamic legal tradition in Zanzibar, Ph.D. diss., Washington University 2002.
- M. J. Swartz, Religious courts, community and ethnicity among the Swahili of Mombasa. An historical study of social boundaries, in Africa 49:1 (1979), 29-40.
- A. H. Yadudu, The prospects for Shari'ah in Nigeria, in Islam in Africa Conference (Nigeria 1989), Islam in Africa, ed. N. Alkali et al., Ibadan 1993, 37-58.

ERIN E. STILES

Law: Criminal

Overview

Women in Islamic cultures, in common with women in other cultures, are likely to be subject to distinctly gendered criminal law and process. The majority of official actors in the criminal legal system – whether secular or Islamic – are male; this includes police officers, lawyers, prosecutors, and judges, as well as legislators. Another cross-cultural phenomenon is the under-reporting of crimes of violence – particularly sexual violence – against women and girls, including incest, rape, domestic violence, and sexual harassment, both because of the nature of the complaint and prosecution process that may ensue, and because of shame that may attach to the victim/survivor in the eyes of society, community, or family. In the area of criminal law and women in Islamic cultures, particular attention is focused on the treatment of crimes related in one way or another to the sexual conduct (actual, alleged, or potential) of females and its control by formal or informal law. In recent years, a particular focus has developed among activist women's groups and among academics on "crimes of honor" against women, which involve not only an unwritten law considered by the perpetrator(s) to sanction a murder, but also the state criminal legal system (again, secular or Islamic) in viewing the perpetrator's claimed motivation with indulgence and hence in reducing the protections afforded by state law to the lives of women citizens. A further focus, in light of the "Islamization" of the legal systems of a number of states since the 1970s, has been the discriminatory impact upon women of the implementation of the ḥadd penalties for extramarital sexual relations. In addition, since the 11 September 2001 attacks in the United States, women in Muslim communities in the United States and Europe have been disproportionately affected by state actions – mostly against husbands and male family members – taken under anti-terrorism criminal and internal security legislation and criticized by civil society groups as not meeting due process and other human rights standards.

Since the 1970s, a number of Muslim majority states have announced programs of the Islamization of laws in which the codification of Islamic criminal law is a prominent and, according to observers, highly symbolic feature. These include

